Mr. Song, a farmer with the unusual distinction of having drunk sewage, became a hero overnight. As people shoved poisonous weeds into the wells and shat and pissed by the streams, they wondered why he hadn't placed first in the civil service exams.

All while saying that the only good barbarian was a dead one—words that would have shocked someone if they'd heard them.

The road here won't be easy.

Jin Wikyung smiled coldly.

Shanxi Province was undeniably a frontier.

It produced plenty of grain, but it was neither as developed as the Central Plains nor as strong militarily.

Yet that was why its people could unite all the more fiercely in a crisis.

Long years of raids by mounted bandits and nomads had instilled a stubborn resolve in the people of Shanxi. Now that resolve had caught fire.

We will protect it. No matter what.

Wikyung had already made up his mind.

He had gone without sleep or rest to devote himself to the preparations. He sent swift-footed subordinates to watch the north and organized small detachments to look for any enemy forces that might split off from the main army.

He had ordered traps and iron caltrops set along every detour except Jeongyang. Checking the progress of the work himself was part of that effort.

"How is the earthen fort coming along?"

"With the reinforcement work included, it should be finished within half a day at the latest."

Eight Spring Gorge.

At the far end of the vase-shaped gorge, which had swallowed countless lives from the Great Faction War to the present day, stood five towers where none had stood before.

Built of mud, wood, and stone, each rose three jang[3485] high. Each had a level platform large enough to hold a little over two hundred people.

Two hundred archers, to be exact.

“Taking the heights above the gorge isn’t enough. These forts are essential to victory. Please do everything you can to make sure they don’t collapse.”

“Of course, sir.”

The old carpenter answered in a folksy drawl.

Even as the two spoke, countless people around them went about their assigned tasks.

They came from all walks of life.

Martial artists in uniforms bearing the names of their sects hauled weapons and heavy materials without pause. Government troops in official uniforms moved at their officers’ commands.

But Wikyung’s gaze settled on another group, people dressed in all sorts of clothes with no affiliation to mark them, working just as hard.

“Pull on three!”

“One, twooo!”

“Hyaah!”

Men covered in dust kept up the grueling labor, sweat pouring off them.

“Where should we put these arrows?”

“Oil! Bring the oil over here!”

Women carried supplies for the battle and prepared simple food.

Looking at the thousands of commoners, Wikyung felt a tightness in his chest.

I told them to flee as far away as they could.

He had warned them sincerely, again and again. He had tried to persuade them.

This wasn’t merely a dispute among martial artists.

It was a brutal war that would claim countless lives, and they, with no strength to defend themselves, would suffer the most.

But they had made up their minds and refused to leave.

They had even come to help here, on a battlefield that would soon be swept by bloodshed.

Like the old carpenter standing before him.

“Looks like our Lesser Family Head has a lot on his mind.”

The old carpenter, who had been glancing sideways at Jin Wikyung, chuckled.

He had passed seventy several years ago. When he laughed, air whistled through the gaps between the few teeth he had left.

[3485] A jang is a traditional Korean length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft); three jang is about 9.09 m (29.8 ft).

“Don’t you worry about it. This old man and all those folks out there came prepared.”

“But still… how could I not worry?”

“Goodness, please don’t speak so formally to me. I may be an old man without much time left, but I’m not shameless enough to expect honorifics from the Lesser Family Head.”

The old carpenter hurriedly waved his hands. Warmth shone in his pale gray eyes as he looked at Wikyung.

“Even a beast that can’t speak will repay a kindness someday. How could people turn their backs at a time like this?”

“What do you mean…?”

“When I was young and full of life, you’d have thought the country was falling apart. The Demonic Cult, or demons, or whatever those wretches were, stirred up trouble everywhere. Then came years of famine.”

It had happened long ago, before Jin Wikyung was born.

But the old carpenter remembered it clearly: boiling leather to eat and stripping bark from trees to chew.

Everyone was starving. There was no one they could ask for help, and no one able to give it.

If a group of men hadn’t come to their village one day under the blazing sun, he and his family would have starved to death before long.

“Is this Hong Family Village?”

“Y-yes, it is. What brings you here…?”

“Phew. Thank goodness we found the right place.”

What was the point of tilling fields that yielded not a single grain?

They had abandoned the barren land long before, gone into the mountains, and become slash-and-burn farmers.

So at first, they had thought the newcomers were bandits.

Or men sent by someone powerful to squeeze the last drops from people who had neither an iron coin nor a handful of grain left.

Why else would anyone come this deep into the mountains?

But instead of drawing the swords at their waists, the men set down the loads on their backs.

They were huge sacks.

Dozens of them, filled to the brim with grain and meat—the kind of sight they could barely remember ever seeing.

“W-what in the world is this…?”

“Get in line. We’ll hand it out in order.”

It felt like a dream.

It still felt like one when everyone in the village lined up as the men instructed, and when he watched his wife and children, who had lain weak and helpless for days, eat until their bellies were full to bursting.

Only after staring at that unbelievable sight and swallowing a mouthful of warm meat broth did he realize it was real.

So he cried.

No—everyone cried.

They wept aloud even as they chewed and swallowed the food in their mouths.

Because they wanted to live. Because they wanted to know they were alive.

"If they hadn't helped us that day, this old man and my family would have starved to death there."

The old carpenter looked at Wikyung with tears in his eyes. Unlike back then, he had a broad smile on his face.

"But those good people tried to leave without a word. So I grabbed one of them by the leg and hung on."

He couldn't read, not even the writing on their clothes.

So he'd clung on stubbornly, asking where they were from and begging them to tell him their three-character names.[3486]

After a long struggle, he got the answer he wanted.

"From that day on, I vowed that if the Jin Family of Taiyuan ever needed me, I would give this worthless life of mine."

"…!"

"And I'm not the only one. Every person here has received help from the Jin Family of Taiyuan, large or small."

Some of those who had received that kindness had left. Others had stayed.

And those who stayed were ready to lay down their lives.

To protect the land where their fathers and mothers had lived, where they themselves had lived.

For the Jin Family of Taiyuan, who had reached out to them when they lay exhausted, waiting to die.

That was the Jin Family of Taiyuan's true strength. It was what had sustained a distinguished family through three hundred years of rises and falls.

Ah.

Wikyung felt an ache deep in his chest.

Perhaps he was the one who had underestimated the Jin Family of Taiyuan—and Shanxi Province—most of all.

He turned away to hide his reddened eyes.

[3486] Traditionally, a Korean full name often consists of a one-character family name and a two-character given name.

Thududududu!

Hooves pounded fiercely, their sound clear even from far away.

A fine horse raced across the gorge as though something were chasing it. Hanging from the horse was a martial artist of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, dead with his eyes wide open.

"…!"

"…!"

The air froze in an instant. Jin Wikyung shouted as if spitting blood.

"Everyone, prepare for battle!"

They were here.

Chapter 954

When the sun sank toward the western mountains and darkness settled over the land, the quiet world carried sounds on the wind that no one could hear by day.

The cries of insects. Leaves brushing against one another.

And, from hundreds of jang[3487] away, something like a shout from someone whose voice carried internal energy.

“I don’t know who that bastard is, but he’s got a set of lungs on him. Don’t you think?”

At the low voice that pierced his ears, Temur swallowed nervously.

In his trembling eyes was the reflection of a man smiling beneath the faint moonlight.

Chinggen.

His blood relative, who had grown up alongside him since a childhood now hazy in his memory.

They hadn’t been born to the same parents, but Chinggen was a cousin closer than any brother, and a sworn brother bound to him by the anda oath.[3488]

And… a dead man. Someone who no longer belonged to this world.

This is no time to laugh and chatter, Temur.

The memory flashed before Temur’s eyes: Chinggen speaking to him with a worried look, just before an unusually cold steppe wind pushed open the entrance to the ger.[3489]

Brother, I’m sorry. You were right.

Temur lowered his head in misery.

Why hadn’t he listened to Chinggen?

Even before that day—the day of a tragedy that made him shudder just to remember it—Chinggen had sent word through messengers several times.

Something was wrong on the grasslands.

Something unknown seemed to be starting beyond their reach.

But Temur had let the warnings go in one ear and out the other. He’d filled his ger[3490] with rare treasures brought along the trade routes, then feasted on meat and liquor with his men.

He’d never dreamed what would come of it.

“What’s got you so lost in thought this time, brother?”

[3487] A Korean jang is about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[3488] An anda is a sworn brother in Mongolian tradition; the oath binds two people as brothers.

[3489] A ger is a portable, round dwelling traditionally used by nomads on the Mongolian steppe.

[3490] A ger is a portable, round dwelling traditionally used by nomads on the Mongolian steppe.

The Chinggen of his memory vanished. Temur jerked his head up like a man startled awake and answered in a trembling voice.

To the man who had killed Chinggen—and had now become Chinggen.

“Nothing. It’s nothing.”

“Goodness. You must be nervous before the battle. Is that why you didn’t hear me?”

“What do you mean…?”

“That shout just now. Don’t you recognize the voice?”

Only then did Temur understand. He answered quickly.

“Y-yes. The Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. It has to be him.”

“Ah, I see. I thought I’d heard that voice before.”

Of course, the man was lying to keep anyone nearby from growing suspicious. Temur might be simple, but the meticulous Chinggen would never have forgotten someone important whom he’d met several times.

“Jin Wikyung… So that’s who it is.”

Chinggen smacked his lips in satisfaction and glanced over his shoulder. At the look he gave him, Jamukha, riding with his customary calm, nodded slightly.

The Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan has more than a loud voice. He has nerve, too.

Their Sound Transmission passed discreetly through the darkness. A faint smile touched Jamukha’s lips.

If he’d meant to flee from the start, he wouldn’t have gone to the trouble of pulling that stunt.

It was quite a stunt. It cost us more than we expected.

Chinggen frowned and spat phlegm from his swaying saddle.

The Great Wall, which a cruel emperor had built across a full ten thousand li[3491] after unifying the continent long ago, hardly deserved to be called a wall.

Yet the north, which should have been unoccupied, was littered with obstacles everywhere.

Losing the vanguard was one thing. I didn’t expect them to turn the whole place into such a filthy shitshow.

A shitshow. Chinggen couldn’t think of a better word for it.

Northern Shanxi Province, which they had reached through wind and rain, had been devastated. Paddies and fields that should have been nearing harvest were ruined. Wells and streams were fouled with poison and filth. Even the houses had been reduced to ashes.

Those lunatics. They burned down the places they’d been living in until recently, then left.

[3491] A Chinese li is about 500 m (0.311 mi); ten thousand li is about 5,000 km (3,100 mi).

At Chinggen's Sound Transmission, Jamukha's lips moved, his expression still calm.

Do you know Emperor Gaozu of Han?

I've heard of him. Liu Bang, from the story of Xiang Yu and Liu Bang?

Yes. Even the eventual victor was once driven back by Xiang Yu and had to leave for Hanzhong. On the advice of his strategist Zhang Liang, he burned the plank roads behind him.

He cut off his own way back.

But he returned to the Central Plains, defeated Xiang Yu, and became ruler of all under Heaven. This land is their plank road. As long as its people survive, they can always rebuild it.

One person alone was an individual. Ten made a group.

But gather a hundred or a thousand, and villages and cities arose.

People were what mattered.

Though everything in the north had been destroyed, those who burned their own homes must have made a vow as they left. They would return and reclaim this land. Just as their ancestors had done long ago, they would begin again amid the ruins, even with nothing left.

Of course, it's all a vain hope.

Jamukha smiled faintly.

Xiang Yu had been arrogant and foolish. Despite possessing the martial might and forces to look down on all under Heaven, he had ultimately lost to Liu Bang.

Jamukha was different.

For decades, he had strengthened his hold on the western grasslands and built up his forces, waiting for that person to call him.

And at last…

The time has come.

Jamukha gazed into the pitch-black darkness. There, where even the moonlight was dimmed by dark clouds, he could almost see the enemy holding their spears and swords upright, struggling to master their trembling hearts.

"Can you feel it? Their fear."

His low voice rang through the darkness. Charged with internal energy, it reached every ear clearly, and his eyes shone fiercely.

"Our enemies have spent their lives hiding behind tall walls. They're no different from cows and pigs—softened by peace, doing nothing but eating!"

What of the grasslands?

[3492] A ger is a portable, round dwelling traditionally used by nomads on the Mongolian steppe.

Their people had been born of grass and earth. They had endured the cold north wind in gers,[3492] not behind walls, and ridden through snowy fields to hunt wild beasts.

To the nomads, death came cheap. Plunder and killing were taken for granted.

"They don't know where we came from! They don't know what great conquerors our ancestors were!"

His forceful voice pressed down upon the night air.

It was as if the sound of their ancestors' hooves, trampling across lands covered in frost and ice and crossing the dreadful, scorching desert, were faintly echoing in everyone's ears.

"Keep your eyes sharp as you draw your bows! Thrust your spears like a tiger's claws! Cut through their flesh with crescent sabers like an eagle's talons, then trample them beneath your horses' hooves!"

A light slowly kindled in the nomads' slack eyes.

They had marched without rest for more than half a month, through traps laid on every side. Thousands had lost horses they treasured as much as their own lives to poisoned iron caltrops. Thousands more had collapsed after drinking fouled water.

And that wasn't all.

With the houses burned down, they'd had to sleep outdoors beneath the night dew and fill their bellies with tough jerky made while sitting in the saddle, all to keep up their speed.

It didn't matter.

Thousands of men and horses had fallen, but tens of thousands remained. If they crushed an enemy less than half their number—if they won this battle—it would all be over.

Beyond the gorge, shrouded in darkness, more than weak enemies awaited them.

Wealth. Honor. A new age.

"My beloved brothers, remember our ancestors! Remember the grasslands in all their former glory!"

Jamukha cried out like a king of the beasts that ruled the grasslands. Like one of the great conquerors of old, who had ridden out from their gers[3493] and shaken the continent with thunderous hoofbeats.

Then he fixed his eyes on the gorge, now only a hundred or so jang[3494] ahead, and spoke in a low, clear voice.

"Now, it's time to conquer."

At that moment—

Clang-clang-clang-clang!

[3493] A ger is a portable, round dwelling traditionally used by nomads on the Mongolian steppe.

[3494] A Korean jang is about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

A wave of steel swallowed the darkness. Gently curved crescent sabers, sharp lances, and arrows nocked to bowstrings in a flash gleamed on every side.

“Waaaaah!”

A roar shattered the deep night and seemed to shake heaven and earth.

Thududududu!

Dozens became hundreds. Hundreds became thousands. At last, tens of thousands swept toward the gorge like the wind.

They cried out in strange voices that chilled anyone who heard them, their hair streaming behind them like horses’ tails with every jolt of the ride. They drove forward with all their might to avenge a tragedy stained by lies and claim the glory their ancestors had once won.

Rrrrummmble!

Beyond the gorge, the people waiting there felt the fierce vibration through their bodies, as if an earthquake had struck.

“So it comes to this, after all.”

Jin Wikyung murmured, then looked down at his hand. It was clenched around his sword hilt, and it had begun to tremble.

Why?

Was he afraid of the enemy bearing down on them with such overwhelming momentum?

No.

He feared the countless allies who would die here. He feared that he would not be able to protect them all.

That’s why… we have to win.

He had taken every measure he could. There was no undoing any of it, and no retreating now.

Do everything within your power, then leave the rest to Heaven.

The old saying came to him suddenly. So did someone who hated it more than anyone—someone who wasn’t here.

No. If you’re just going to leave it to Heaven in the end, why go through all that hell? You’ve got to make Heaven change its mind, even if you have to raise all kinds of hell to do it.

Yes, that was exactly what the guy would have said.

At the sound of that voice, so vivid in his ears, Jin Wikyung let out a quiet laugh before he knew it.

Then, the next moment, he realized his hand had stopped trembling.

“Wipeng.”

At the low call that cut through the thunder of approaching hooves, his longtime loyal retainer answered.

"Your orders, my lord."

Tens of thousands of men and horses would be upon them in moments. Ragged breaths sounded all around.

Every eye turned to Jin Wikyung, their commander-in-chief. Then he said the last thing anyone expected.

"I think we should spend next year's Double Ninth Festival[3495] on Mount Heng."

"…!"

"All of us together. We'll drink chrysanthemum wine, make music, and enjoy ourselves."

"M-my lord."

"Why? Don't you like the sound of it?"

Wipeng and the others stared at Wikyung's faint smile. Then, as if by agreement, they smiled just like him, holding back the emotion rising in their chests.

Next year's Double Ninth Festival.[3496] All of us together.

Those few words stirred something deep within them.

As they smiled, their fear faded. When they laughed aloud, the stiffness left their bodies. The darkness surrounding them no longer felt so ominous.

Step.

A footfall sounded with startling clarity. Someone stepped out in front of them and spoke.

"Next year's Double Ninth Festival[3497] sounds rather enjoyable."

Jin Mukyung was smiling.

Amid the vibration and shouts that had swallowed the gorge.

In the darkness that had been his only friend for the past two years.

And in the next moment—

Thudududu—whoosh!

He turned toward the dozens of men and horses bursting from the pitch-black darkness, as though a curtain had been drawn aside.

Shing!

A dazzling flash rose from his waist and cleaved through the faint moonlight.

[3495] The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month. Traditions include climbing to high places and drinking chrysanthemum wine.

[3496] The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month. Traditions include climbing to high places and drinking chrysanthemum wine.

[3497] The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month. Traditions include climbing to high places and drinking chrysanthemum wine.

Chapter 955

Tap.

Something cold touched me, and my eyes flew open.

My body moved on instinct, too.

Whoosh!

My fist cut through empty air.

As my vision snapped back into focus, the Bow Saint—watching me from the tree across from us—spoke with a calm expression.

“Looks like you had a nightmare.”

Ah.

Only then did I realize I’d been asleep—so deeply that I hadn’t even noticed myself drifting off.

And, just as the Bow Saint had said, everything I’d seen and experienced in it had been the worst of the worst.

“How long was I asleep?”

I asked as I tried to steady my ragged breathing. The Bow Saint dropped lightly from the branch and answered.

“Let’s see. About one shichen[3498].”

“One shichen[3499]…”

“Sleep a little longer. At least until daybreak.”

Dawn was still dim.

Above us, the morning dew that had woken me was slowly rolling down a leaf, and now and then the only sound in the deserted mountain woods was the chirping of insects.

“Old—no, where’s Master?”

“Hunting. We’ve had nothing but jerky and water for more than seven days and nights. It’s the least he can do. And…”

The Bow Saint tossed a dry twig onto the dying campfire.

“You needn’t worry about what to call him. I’ve already guessed the general situation. You two are surprisingly sentimental for such rough-looking men.”

“How did you—”

“If you have the energy to ask about every little thing, come warm yourself by the fire.”

After a moment’s hesitation, I got up and started walking.

Not toward the campfire, but toward the still-dark woods.

[3498] A shichen is a traditional unit of time lasting about two hours.

[3499] A shichen is a traditional unit of time lasting about two hours.

“Where are you going?”

“I’ll go on ahead, slowly. When Old Master gets back, we can—”

“You really are a stubborn brat.”

The Bow Saint clicked her tongue and reached out.

Fwish!

Finger Qi shot toward me with a sound like tearing wind and grazed the back of my neck. Its chilling whistle drove away every trace of sleepiness.

“…What are you doing?”

“A beating is the best medicine for a disobedient child. Sit by the fire while I’m still asking nicely. Or lie down and go back to sleep.”

I’d forgotten. The woman who looked barely thirty was still a Murim martial artist, and force came more naturally to her than words.

And the Three Saints were, among other things, a top-tier corporation—no, a nationwide gang.

I glared at her in silence, then said, “I have to go.”

“Of course you do.”

“I mean right now.”

“And I mean a little later.”

“So that’s how you’re going to play it?”

“If I do, what will you do about it?”

She answered calmly, poking at the fire.

“I was like you once. I struggled with everything I had to save even one person. I risked my life to shave off a few moments.”

“Not anymore?”

“Who knows.”

There was something hollow in her answer.

She watched the fire slowly come back to life, lost in thought as though remembering long ago. Then she spoke.

“I’ve learned one small thing.”

“What’s that?”

“That my impatience was driving me further into danger.”

“…”

“I gave every moment my best, but the results still fell short. There wasn’t even time to sit back and enjoy a meal or a cup of tea. I had to kill people and watch others die. Even after I discovered the inner demon that had taken root deep in my heart, that didn’t change.”

The eyes she fixed on the campfire glowed red, like the flames of the wars she had witnessed so many times long ago.

“I don’t like the word ‘fate.‘ If everything happens as it was always going to, no matter how hard we struggle, then what does our struggle mean? But…”

Crackle. Fwoosh.

The fire swelled as it came back to life. Beyond the drifting sparks, the Bow Saint looked at me, her gaze deep and steady.

“If something can’t be stopped even by someone who’s run without rest for seven whole days and nights… Then yes. That, surely, is fate.”

I gritted my teeth.

And I felt my body, drenched in exhaustion like a waterlogged cotton rag.

I knew she was right.

To me, fate was the shittiest word in the world. Even so, there were times when I had no choice but to admit it existed.

I was only human, after all. Not an all-knowing, all-powerful god.

“I had a dream. A nightmare.”

The cracked voice that came from my mouth sounded like someone else’s. My back had been damp from the moment I woke—not with morning dew, but with cold sweat.

“When I finally got there… everyone was dead. Every last one of them. Not a single exception.”

“Is that so?”

My voice trembled. The Bow Saint’s remained calm.

“You must have been terribly sad.”

I shook my head.

It wasn’t sadness. It was despair—despair that seemed to punch through the earth and plunge deep beneath it.

Even now that I was awake, I could still see them before me, all of them horribly dead.

“That’s why I have to go. Before it’s too late. As soon as possible.”

At first, I’d thought this was just a game. Nothing more than data made by bespectacled developers in black turtlenecks or plaid shirts.

But before long, I’d learned the truth. This was another world, and the people in it were individuals with feelings and wills of their own.

So I’d opened my heart to them.

To the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, who firmly believed I was his own flesh and blood. To the young gate guard who’d picked a fight with me the moment we met, looking at me like he couldn’t stand the sight of me.

And to the deranged old man who’d wandered the world searching for the Disciple who remained his final regret and lingering attachment.

The sincerity they’d shown me had gathered in my heart until it overflowed.

Another friend and comrade. A Master and family.

When I closed my eyes, the faces and names of everyone I'd met rose out of the darkness.

That was why I had to run, even if it meant wringing every last bit of strength from this tired, impatient body.

Just as I have for the past seven days and nights.

I'd given it everything I had.

I'd crossed rugged mountains that even seasoned hunters avoided. Rather than waste time waiting for a boat, I'd burned through an enormous amount of internal energy to cross a river using Rising on Duckweed, Crossing Water.

That was how I'd made it here. To this place.

Only about two days to Taiyuan now.

I might already have overtaken the imperial messengers or the messenger eagles. I'd abandoned even the fine horse the Son of Heaven had given me, seeking the fastest route and running day and night without rest.

But those two short days were also enough time for the nightmare I'd had today to become reality.

I can't let that happen.

I curled my hand into a tight fist. My nails dug into my flesh, and I felt hot blood well up.

The Bow Saint had been watching me in silence. Just then, she spoke.

"Strange."

"What do you mean…?"

"You treasure them beyond measure, yet you don't trust them at all."

"…"

"Sometimes you need to trust them. They aren't as weak as you think, or so easily uprooted."

My whole body stiffened. For a moment I was at a loss for words, and then the Bow Saint's voice continued in my ear.

"Of course, you can do a great deal. You could shatter a boulder weighing ten thousand geun[3500] with one hand, and split a river with the other. But what if it were a mountain instead of a boulder? An ocean instead of a river? Would you just quietly bear it alone, like Yu Gong long ago?"

Yu Gong. The foolish old man who had tried to bring down a vast mountain by digging out its earth and carrying away its stones.

In the end, the Jade Emperor was moved by his devotion and helped him achieve his goal. Yu Gong hadn't done it through his own strength and effort alone.

[3500] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun is about 6,000 kg (13,000 lb).

"What if the countless people who heard Yu Gong's story hadn't laughed at him for being a fool, but had joined forces to help him?"

I didn't answer, but I thought to myself:

With their help, the old man would have achieved his goal in the end. Not through the Jade Emperor, but through the people who believed in him and followed him.

Through all of them.

Ah.

Something stirred in a corner of my heart. I looked down at my hands, smudged with dirt here and there.

As the Bow Saint had said, I had tremendous power. I could crush a huge boulder with a single punch, or split a small river for a short while with one palm.

But even that wasn't nearly enough to move a mountain or an ocean.

The same was true of the disaster looming over Shanxi Province. To clear away the dark clouds filling the sky, I needed everyone's help.

"Let me ask you something."

Her gaze was calm, yet somehow warm. She looked at me like a grandmother gently chiding her young grandson.

"Which do you believe in—Heaven or people?"

Instead of answering, I looked east, where light was slowly spreading.

Then I spoke.

"Do you happen to know what the Jade Emperor looks like?"

"What?"

"I'm a suspicious sort. I can't really put my faith in someone I haven't seen with my own eyes."

"…"

The Bow Saint blinked at my unexpected answer. Then she caught my meaning and let out a quiet laugh.

"The Daoists would be horrified if they heard you."

"That's all right. The man behind me may not be the Jade Emperor, but he's at least Yama[3501]."

Shff.

A deliberately loud footstep.

I turned and saw Yama[3502] himself—no, Jeok Cheongang—standing there with a frown.

Thump.

Jeok Cheongang set down a large deer, who knew where he'd caught it, and spoke.

[3501] Yama is a ruler of the underworld in Buddhist tradition.

[3502] Yama is a ruler of the underworld in Buddhist tradition.

"You cheeky brat. I leave for a moment, and you call me Yama[3503]?"

His tone was gruff and his brow deeply furrowed. But the corner of his mouth was twitching—a sure sign he was hiding a smile.

He'd plainly heard my conversation with the Bow Saint. Pretending otherwise, he asked, "Enough. Spare me the excuses. How about some meat for a change?"

Meat, when every second mattered.

I glanced toward the thick woods to the north, then answered with a faint smile.

"Sounds good."

I wasn't Yu Gong. I was Jin Taekyung.

And now, I trusted them. All of them.

Don't die. Not a single one of you.

I spoke the words in my heart, where none of them could hear, and sat down by the campfire.

My first proper rest in seven days and nights.

I had to save all the strength I could for the two days still ahead.

[3503]Yama is a ruler of the underworld in Buddhist tradition.

Chapter 956

Eight Spring Gorge was a little over a hundred jang[3504] long.

A natural gateway enclosed by cliffs some thirty jang high.

It was barely wide enough for thirty grown men to stand shoulder to shoulder—the worst possible place to attack. Yet there was a reason two great battles for the fate of Shanxi Province had been fought in this jar-shaped gorge.

“Break through! Trample them and keep going!”

“Brothers of the Great Steppe! Once we cross this godforsaken gorge, Shanxi Province will be ours!”

Eight Spring Gorge was the most important strategic passage in Shanxi.

It offered the quickest route through the rugged northern mountains and was the last gateway to the plains of central Shanxi.

If they took this place, positioned on the border between north and central Shanxi, nothing would remain to stop tens of thousands of cavalry charging side by side, shaking the earth beneath their hooves.

And even if something did stand in their way, they could simply trample it.

Sand and gravel could not hold back a wave.

That was precisely why the defenders had to stop the invaders before them, whatever it took.

“Hold the line! Don’t give up a single step!”

“Proud people of Shanxi! Defend your homeland from these merciless barbarians!”

“Raaaaaah!”

Screams of defiance pierced the darkness and echoed through the gorge.

Amid the dense rain of arrows the two armies loosed at each other, a single streak of light moved with graceful ease, seemingly untouched by the chaos around it.

Whoosh!

Space split apart.

The dozen or so mounted warriors charging forward with the steppe nomads’ distinctive cries suddenly felt a wind.

Not one that merely brushed past them, but a cold wind that swept through the depths of their bodies.

“…Huh?”

Their eyes widened. Their vision wavered.

And then—

Shhk.

[3504] A jang is a traditional length of ten ja, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Eternal darkness. Light would never reach them again.

Fwoosh!

Fountains of blood surged into the air. The things that had once been people and horses were severed into pieces and flung in every direction.

They hurtled onward with all the speed of their charge—toward the enemies they had chosen as their first targets, whom they would never reach alive.

Crunch!

Even the lightest man and horse had weighed hundreds of geun[3505] in life, and some nearly a thousand.

Jin Mukyung calmly looked down at the enormous chunks of flesh, caked in dirt and blood, that had carved deep furrows as they slid to his feet.

More precisely, he looked at their impossibly clean cut surfaces—and the sword in his grasp.

It really is sharp. Unbelievably so.

Admiration flickered in Jin Mukyung's eyes as he gazed at the blade, which radiated a cold, keen aura even in the dark.

Only two days earlier, he had seen what the new sword could do in battle against a thousand enemies. Yet it still astonished him.

He was a swordsman with an appetite for fine blades, after all.

I wondered what was going on when he suddenly handed me a sword I'd never seen before. If I'd refused it, I'd have regretted it for the rest of my life.

To a martial artist, a cherished weapon was his closest friend and family.

But just before Jin Mukyung's first campaign, as he was polishing his beloved sword, a sturdy old man came to see him. He dropped a long bundle of cloth in front of him and said:

"Get rid of that one. Use this from today on. I forged it for you well in advance, Second Young Master."

At first, Mukyung had thought the old man was out of his mind.

He wanted him to discard the sword he had used for over ten years? The fine blade his older brother Jin Wikyung had practically torn a pillar out of the Jin Family of Taiyuan to pay for?

But then a sword appeared between the folds of cloth. When its pure-white blade finally emerged naked from its scabbard, Jin Mukyung understood.

The mad old man before him was an extraordinary artisan, unlike any he had ever seen.

One with more than enough skill to forge a divine weapon.

[3505] A Korean geun is a traditional weight of 600 g (1.32 lb).

“You’ve got a good eye, judging by your face. That’s a relief. You look worthy of being its owner, at least.”

“What on earth is this…?”

“Can’t you tell? One of the finest things this old man has ever made. I worked myself to the bone on it in my old age. I forged it from something that can rival Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron, so take good care of it.”

The old man had left without hesitation after saying that. Jin Mukyung remained absorbed in his new sword for a long while, until one of the family retainers finally told him who the old man was.

“Come to think of it, Second Young Master might not know. The Ironcraft Hall was newly established in our family while you were in secluded training.”

“The Ironcraft Hall? Then that old man was…”

“Yes. Hall Master Jang Taebo, head of the Ironcraft Hall. Before that, he served as Guild Leader of the Ironcraft Guild for over thirty years.”

“…!”

Even Jin Mukyung, who had devoted himself to martial arts both at the Jin Family of Taiyuan and at Heaven’s Gate Temple, knew of the Ironcraft Guild.

It was home to some of the finest artisans in the world.

They had the skill and pride to refuse to sell a weapon to anyone they deemed unworthy, even for a fortune in gold.

The retainer didn’t know why Jang Taebo, who had reigned as the guild’s greatest artisan for decades, was now at the Jin Family of Taiyuan. But there was one thing he knew for certain.

“I believe he formed a connection with the Third Young Master. So, around the time you entered secluded training, he reversed his retirement and joined our family.”

“Taekyung? That guy?”

“Yes. And somehow, Hall Master Jang brought a great many artisans who’d belonged to the Ironcraft Guild along with him. It was probably because of his old ties to them.”

But there was something neither the retainer who’d given him that information nor Jin Mukyung, fresh out of secluded training, knew.

The artisans who had dropped everything and rushed to the Jin Family of Taiyuan had not done it out of loyalty.

What had drawn even the old Master Artisans who had left their forges before Jang Taebo back to work was the final gift of a great spiritual creature that had once swum in a deep river more than ten thousand li[3506] away.

The Water God Dragon.

[3506] This uses the Chinese li, a traditional distance of approximately 500 m (0.311 mi).

The imugi had never obtained a dragon pearl and so had failed to become a dragon. In the end, Dark Heaven had corrupted it. But with a young man's help, it had found eternal rest, leaving its sacred body behind.

An ingredient for working metal so rare that even a meteorite fallen from the heavens or Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron might pale in comparison—something no famous artisan could resist.

And, naturally, a considerable portion had secretly made its way to the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

Its flesh and blood, steeped in spiritual power over hundreds of years, had become elixirs in their own right. Its immensely strong bones had become weapons, while its thick, sturdy tendons and muscles had become parts of armor.

Before long, parts of the Water God Dragon had found their way throughout the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

Just as they were at this very moment.

Whoosh!

No matter how fine the net, it could not catch every minnow.

With their path blocked by Jin Mukyung alone, the steppe nomads had faltered at the sight of their comrades' gruesome deaths. The arrows they loosed to keep the Jin forces at bay slipped between the government troops' shields and struck a martial artist of the Jin Family of Taiyuan in the chest.

Or so it seemed for a moment.

Thunk!

Despite its powerful whistle through the air, the arrow bounced away feebly.

The martial artist, certain he had been dealt a mortal wound and about to scream, stared wide-eyed.

"Guh—huh?"

He blinked in confusion. Then he remembered the thin layer the Lesser Family Head had strictly ordered him to place over his chest beneath his martial uniform.

It was so light, with such a strange sheen, that he could not tell whether it was iron or leather.

The moment he remembered, he burst out laughing as though nothing had happened.

"You stupid barbarian bastards! Shooting like that, you couldn't hit our family dog!"

"…!"

"…!"

The nomads, who had been ready to trample the weak Han Chinese, could only look at one another in dismay.

Their bows could pierce most leather armor with ease. Now they were useless.

It was only natural for unease to spread at the thought that one of the grasslands' greatest weapons had been taken away from them.

But they soon learned that even a moment spent worrying was a luxury they could not afford.

"Now! Now's the time!"

"Loose!"

The nomads, who by then filled the gorge, heard a forceful shout from high above—from the steep cliffs rising on either side.

Another layer of darkness fell over their heads.

Shhhhhhh.

A chill sound like the rush of waves filled the air. Countless arrows blotted out even the faint moonlight as they plunged down across the entire gorge.

"E-everyone, shields—!"

The cry, almost a scream, was swallowed before it could finish.

Clang-clang-clang!

Sparks sprang from arrowheads striking the rock walls.

In the slowed world, through that brief, hazy light born of friction, they could see countless men and horses collapsing, spattering blood.

Whoosh—thud-thud-thud!

By the time they heard the arrows tearing through the air, it was too late.

The steel rain drove straight down from thirty jang above with more force than the nomads' composite bows could muster. It drenched the gorge in dark red blood and cries of pain.

"Raaaaagh!"

"Neigh!"

A vast tangle of screams filled the gorge, impossible to tell apart.

A nomad who had instinctively looked up rolled on the ground, clutching the arrow lodged in his eye. A steppe horse thrashed with all its might, heedless of its rider. And a lucky hundred-man commander who had saved himself with a tough leather shield breathed a sigh of relief.

Before he could finish that breath, he heard an ominous sound overhead.

Rumble. Rrrrattle.

Thunder?

No. He was wrong.

He soon saw the answer for himself.

"Ah."

A hollow sigh escaped him.

Thump.

The shield, now bristling like a porcupine, slipped from the middle-aged commander's weakened grasp. He paid it no mind.

He already knew that the shield that had saved his life could not stop the enormous things bearing down on him through the darkness.

Rrrrrumble!

Black spheres poured down the rock face out of the darkness, shaking the earth as they came.

The steel rain had scarcely stopped when the avalanche of rocks arrived. The hundred-man commander looked up at a sky where even moonlight could not reach him.

"…Tengri."[3507]

Ka-boom!

No answer came.

His sky closed over him.

"Isn't this dangerous?"

Chinggen scratched his chin as he asked. Jamukha answered without changing expression.

"How many did you send in?"

"Five or six hundred-man companies?"

Chinggen smacked his lips and added:

"Though they're gone now."

A mere half an hour.

That was all it had taken for more than five hundred troops to vanish.

And they hadn't even had a proper chance to begin fighting.

Their enemies were proving more capable than expected.

"That man's quite something."

Jamukha knew whom Chinggen meant. He nodded quietly.

"He has the makings of a Sword Demon. Like you."

"He must be the one who wiped out the vanguard, too."

"So, you want him?"

"If I asked, would you give him to me?"

Chinggen's eyes gleamed red.

[3507] Tengri is the sky deity in Mongolian and Turkic steppe traditions.

[3508] A ger is a portable, round dwelling traditionally used by nomadic peoples of the steppe.

How many years had he spent in a ger[3508] reeking of horse manure? Now, catching the scent of prey for the first time in ages, he could feel his blood boil. Jamukha clicked his tongue softly.

“Still young, I see. At your age, and you still haven’t broken that habit.”

“You haven’t answered me.”

“I’ll give it to you now. No.”

“What a shame.”

Chinggen frowned, but Jamukha continued.

“No need to be disappointed. There’s prey elsewhere.”

“You mean…”

“Take the cliffs. They’re being a nuisance, so we should deal with them before any more time passes.”

“An excellent choice.”

Chinggen beamed.

Then he set off toward the prey waiting for him atop the high cliffs.

Chapter 957

The cliffs flanking Eight Spring Gorge were enormous walls in their own right.

How could they not be?

They stood more than thirty jang[3509] high.

Even the Great Wall, built long ago by a tyrant who unified the continent by squeezing the lifeblood out of his people, was barely three jang tall.

To go around the cliffs and reach this place, an army would have to spend days crossing rugged mountain ridges. To break through head-on, they would have to climb the rock face towering above them.

Of course, that wasn't impossible.

It was generally accepted that even an experienced Mountain Herb Gatherer or hunter could climb the cliffs given enough preparation and time. The uneven rock offered plenty of handholds and footholds.

But that was a different story if the thousand archers stationed atop the cliffs on either side of the gorge had no intention of welcoming visitors.

As they did now.

"AAAAAAAH!"

The nomads surged toward the cliffs like a swarm of ants, their cries somewhere between screams and battle shouts.

At that very moment, the officers, their sharp eyes fixed on the scene in the darkness below, spoke as one.

"Everyone!"

"Loose!"

Flap!

A red flag, its color barely discernible in the dark, dropped like lightning. At once, a thousand taut bowstrings were set free.

Thrum-thrum-thrum! Fwooooooosh!

The sound of waves echoed through the deep mountains.

Arrows quivered as they cut through the faint moonlight, as if they knew what awaited them at the end of their brief journey.

Clang! Thud-thud-thud!

"Gaaah!"

"No! Holrogu!"

Bodies tumbled in every direction amid the screams.

But the man watching the gruesome scene from high atop the cliff looked grim.

Even with every archer firing in a concentrated volley, we only got a hundred.

[3509] A jang is a traditional Korean measure of length equal to 3.03 m, or about 9.94 ft.

A faint, clear light shone in his eyes—a sign that he had mastered high-level martial arts and could see through the darkness below.

Their losses are smaller than expected. Even if they abandoned their horses beforehand and came prepared with shields, this is…

There was only one answer.

After a moment's thought, the man raised his baton. His adjutant, waiting with a tense expression, tied his superior's order to an arrow and shot it toward the opposite cliff.

Fwish.

The arrow traced a smooth arc, but it was still an arrow. Yet as it came whistling in, someone caught it as easily as if it had flown straight into his hand.

Tap.

The old man caught the arrow without looking, untied the missive fastened to its shaft, and handed it to an officer nearby. The armored officer quickly scanned its contents.

"Well? What does it say?"

"He says that, judging by how sharply their casualties have fallen, the enemy must have sent in their elite troops."

"That's a headache, but… it might actually work in our favor."

The old man stroked his snow-white beard.

These towering cliffs were the perfect defensive position. They were one of the main reasons Eight Spring Gorge had become a natural fortress—and why the defenders had won decisive victories in both great battles fought here.

The enemy elites sent to scale them were about to see a hellscape.

"And what else?"

"He asks our left wing to deal with the men climbing the cliffs. The right wing will keep the enemy trying to break through the gorge in check."

"Asked? By age, I may be the presiding chair, but on a battlefield like this, I follow the general's orders. Don't I?"

The officer answered with an uncertain smile.

As far as he knew, the old man before him was an astonishing master with a great reputation in Murim, while the man on the opposite cliff was his superior by far.

As a mid-ranking officer caught between them, he had no ready answer.

All he could do was follow orders and offer a cautious suggestion.

"The Assistant Military Commissioner did ask…"

"Enough, enough. It means this old man has to step in, doesn't it?"

The old man waved a hand, patted his lower back, and stood. Something dark and dull was already in his hand.

Thump.

At nearly a jang long, it was far too long to be a cane. And the sound it made against the rock was too heavy for wood.

What in the world is that?

Leaving the officer's unspoken question behind, the old man walked in front of the archers, who were firing without pause, and plopped himself down.

He recalled his conversation with Jin Wikyung before the battle.

"Senior, I'll need you to take charge of the cliffs."

"I owe you a debt, so of course I'll do as you ask… but this doesn't sound like you. Wouldn't I be far more useful down below?"

The old man's objection was reasonable enough.

Of the fifteen thousand troops, a thousand carefully selected archers held the cliffs and rained arrows down from above. How many enemies could possibly make it up alive? What need was there for a powerful master?

But Jin Wikyung had answered without hesitation.

"You're right. They'll think the same thing."

"…!"

"They'll climb the cliffs. They'll have to."

"You're already certain of it."

"Our allies on the ground will fight to the death with everything they have. It's only a matter of time before the enemy targets the cliffs, and their very best troops will be among those they send."

"And you want this old man to stop them?"

"If we can stop them from scaling the cliffs, we can deal them a major blow. If we hold that position to the end, we can level the scales, even though they're tipped so heavily against us."

Only then had the old man remembered something.

He had known the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan for less than a year, but in all that time, Jin Wikyung had always made the wise choice.

"Fine. I'll land you a big fish in this battle, just as you want."

"Don't push yourself too hard. I know you've recovered completely, Senior, but you still need time to recuperate…"

"Don't worry. I already owe the Jin Family of Taiyuan my life twice. This time, I'll repay that debt in full."

People of Murim did not forget gratitude and grudges.

The older they were, and the more Fame they had earned, the truer that became.

The old man was both old and renowned.

He had spent his entire life in his hometown, never joining a sect. Even after reaching the lofty realm of Supreme Peak, he had stayed there.

He'd meant to lay his bones in the place where he was born and raised.

Until the day he met a woman of extraordinary beauty and, soon afterward, lost his mind.

“At last… the time has come to repay my debt.”

The old man murmured in a low voice.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan was not the only one to whom he owed a debt. They had restored the mind that had been taken from him against his will and spent months treating his grievous injuries.

There was Dark Heaven, too.

He owed them a debt of vengeance, too.

No—he had to take revenge.

“Come on, then.”

The small-framed old man smiled faintly and gripped his beloved weapon. With a motion he had repeated countless times since childhood, he swung both arms with force.

Whoom.

His weapon—an impressive three jang long—whipped and bent as it scattered a dark, dull flash.

A silver-white line and hook extended from its tip, shooting toward the enemies climbing the cliff to escape the rain of arrows.

Shwaaaaa! Shhk!

White streaks tore through everything in their path.

Flesh and bone split like tofu. Dozens of severed limbs, armor and all, slid down the cliff.

Overwhelming power.

With both his martial prowess and the terrain in his favor, it seemed no enemy could evade the old man’s attack.

No—or so it seemed.

Then a red flash flickered through the dense silver net spread across the cliff.

Shhk. Shhk!

The whistle it made was fainter than the wind.

But the old man felt it clearly. The blow had severed part of the silver line that writhed like a living thing as it tore enemies apart.

And the power behind that red flash was in no way beneath his own.

Force…!

There was no doubt about it. Only power of the same kind could sever Heavenly Silkworm Thread imbued with Force in a single swing.

“How dare you!”

Shwick!

The old man roared, and his hand blurred.

His beloved weapon, imbued with strength and speed, thrashed like an imugi.[3510] The archers, sensing something was wrong, gritted their teeth and drew their bows.

“Concentrate your fire!”

“That one! The man in front is their leader! Fire together!”

Thrum! Sh-sh-sh-shhk!

Thud-thud-thud!

“Gah… urk!”

“Aaaah!”

Arrows whistled and men screamed without pause.

But nothing could stop the figure that had slipped through the mighty web of arrows covering the cliff.

Clang!

He batted away the old man’s next attack.

Whoosh!

He twisted his body, dodging dozens of arrows aimed at him from every direction as if performing an acrobatic feat.

Tap.

He stepped onto the steep cliff.

No—he blasted off it.

Ka-boom! Fwooooooosh!

He was running and flying at once.

Even a master of the Wall Lizard Technique could not have matched his speed. He charged onward in defiance of the laws that had governed the world since time immemorial.

And finally—

Tap.

The figure reached the edge of the distant cliff and faced the old man waiting for him.

Or, more precisely, with the silver flash whipping around at the old man’s fingertips.

Whoom. Shwaaaaa!

Space split apart.

Amid wind cut into dozens, then hundreds of pieces and the brilliant white glow of Force, the old man saw the figure’s face.

A gaunt build. Sharp eyes.

The man was unmistakably a nomad—and at that moment, he was smiling.

[3510] An imugi is a serpent-like creature in Korean folklore, often associated with dragons.

"…!"

Crack!

A section of the cliff crumbled under the tremendous force.

But there was no sign that anyone had died.

As the archers on the cliff wavered, the old man clicked his tongue and suddenly spoke to the man standing upright on empty air.

"Who are you?"

The man answered.

"A hunter."

"Then you've come to the wrong place."

"That's what I thought at first, too. But I changed my mind."

The man—Chinggen—looked at the old man and licked his lips.

"You're a little old, but you look pretty appetizing. Don't you think?"

The old man snorted.

"Third Rate hunter. You don't even know that the older you get, the tougher you are."

"That's fine. I've got strong teeth."

Chinggen bared his teeth in a grin, then asked,

"So who are you?"

"A fisherman."

The old man answered calmly, then added,

"I thought there were only minnows here. Catching an unexpected whopper has put me in a fine mood."

"That fish looks too big for an old man like you to catch."

"What can a brat like you do, no matter how hard you flop around? I'll grab you by the tail and slam you down a couple of times. That'll be the end of it."

"Oh, yeah?"

The hunter smiled at the fisherman. At that moment, the sobriquet of someone who resembled the old fisherman before him circled in his mind.

A previous-generation master who had reached great heights, yet never left the riverbank—and wielded a strange weapon.

"We'll soon see who succeeds in the hunt. Won't we, Dongting Fisherman?"

The old man, Dongting Fisherman, raised his beloved black-wood fishing rod and answered,

"Indeed. What a catch."

Shwaaa!

Two currents of wind collided head-on.

Chapter 958

Ka-boom!

A faint tremor followed the explosion.

Jamukha stroked his beard as he watched a pale cloud of dust rise from the distant cliff, visible even in the darkness.

Looks like they've started.

Jamukha knew Chinggen—or, more precisely, the person wearing Chinggen's face—well.

Cruel, savage, and strong.

No matter who he encountered up there, he would carry out his assigned task. And he would do it exceedingly well.

Clang! Krrrunch!

Flashes flickered without pause through the dust cloud, followed by more deafening crashes.

Below, the nomads had shed their armor and taken up hooks and daggers. As the archers' fire slackened, they seized the opportunity and rapidly climbed the cliffs.

"Loose!"

Fwish-fwish-fwish!

Arrows continued to fly, accompanied by occasional shouts, but that was all.

The archers' composure and accuracy had faltered. So had the dense crossfire pouring down from either side. None of it compared to what it had been moments before.

Of the thousand archers holding the two cliffs facing each other, half were already tied up by Chinggen. The other half had to keep the ground forces in check as they surged into the gorge once more.

A loosened net would eventually tear.

Jamukha intended to bring that moment a little closer.

"Mukal. Jerme."

"Yes."

"Give your orders, Khan."

At Jamukha's quiet summons, two men stepped forward.

Their clothing alone set them apart from the other nomads. Among the Keshik Jamukha had personally trained over many years, they were two of the most capable.

Following the example of the great conqueror who had once crossed the steppe and ruled the continent, Jamukha called them the Five Steeds and Five Hounds.

Five fine steeds and five loyal hounds.

The ten commanders of a hundred were outstanding leaders and fearsome warriors alike. For decades, they had served Jamukha faithfully.

Though only days ago, he had lost one of them in vain.

“There are cowards hiding up there, doing nothing but shooting arrows. What should we do?”

“We’ll break their bows, cut their throats, and return.”

“It’s close to the heavens. Tengri[3511] will be watching over us.”

The two commanders struck their studded armor with clenched fists, then turned away.

Jamukha watched them lead a hundred Keshik apiece up the cliffs, deflecting arrows as they climbed. Then he spoke again.

“Tiraun. Boorchu. Ongge.”

Three this time.

Jamukha pointed toward the gorge, where screams rang out without end.

“Your sworn brother’s killer is there.”

“…!”

“…!”

“…!”

The corners of the three men’s eyes twitched.

It wasn’t simply that they remembered their sworn brother, who had left days ago at the head of the vanguard with a hundred Keshik under his command, only for his head to return without him.

It was their pride.

Their lord was telling them to join forces and avenge the sworn brother who had died before them.

“Khan. I’m more than enough for him on my own.”

“The same goes for me, Tiraun!”

“Please send me, Ongge!”

Jamukha watched the three commanders vie to step forward.

Their bulging temples and sharp, shining eyes showed that these masters had reached the far edge of the Peak realm.

But Jamukha was both their lord and their teacher. He knew them better than anyone.

A few days ago, his subordinate’s severed head had returned instead of news of victory. Jamukha had seen the wound on its neck, leaving him no choice but to make this decision.

He’s no pushover.

[3511] Tengri is the sky deity in traditional Turkic and Mongolic belief.

Send one man, and he would never return. Send two, and only one would make it back. Send three, and they would surely return with the man's head.

That was why their eagerness to fight could not sway him.

"Go."

His voice was calm, but its chill was unmistakable.

This was an order. They could not refuse it.

Realizing there was no way to defy Jamukha, the three commanders bit their lips and turned away.

Then, like their comrades who had set off for the cliffs ahead of them, they led their Keshik forward at a run.

Hundreds of figures shot across the gorge, leaving their horses behind and vaulting over rocks and the bodies of fallen men and mounts.

Their first victims were not the Shanxi defenders, who continued to resist fiercely, but their own allies, backing away in fear.

"T-this isn't right! This isn't right!"

"Black Sheep Clan, withdraw at once! Fall back and regroup—!"

Shhk!

The old chieftain's head flew into the air.

Several hundred members of his small tribe had joined the battle at the Great Steppe's call to arms. Now, reduced to half their original number, the survivors stared wide-eyed.

"C-Chieftain!"

"How dare you!"

But dozens of spears and swords were already closing in from every direction.

Fwoooosh! Thunk!

"Guh—!"

With every flash of a blade, heads and limbs rolled across the ground.

The Keshik slaughtered a hundred or so tribespeople in moments with their lances and scimitars. The entire gorge froze at the sight.

So did someone watching from far away.

"W-what are you doing?!"

Temur's voice shook as if the ground beneath him were quaking.

But the voice and gaze that answered him were drier than the steppe's bitter wind.

"They disobeyed the Khan's orders and ordered a retreat on their own. We simply carried out the summary execution."

"B-but they're under my command—"

"That's right. They're under your command, Khan Temur."

Jamukha's next words were too quiet for anyone else to hear.

“And you, the man who commands them, are standing right beside me.”

“…!”

“Is there a problem? If you have any complaints, speak now.”

Under a pressure that seemed to grip his heart, Temur suddenly understood.

This was the limit the man before him had set for him.

Cross it even slightly, and he would not escape death either.

“N-no problem.”

“I can’t hear you very well. I must be getting old.”

“N-no problem.”

Only when Temur had forced out those words through his fear and humiliation did Jamukha nod.

“A wise choice. Military discipline must always be strict. Don’t you agree?”

Temur trembled instead of answering.

He had foreseen this when he begged for his life in front of Chinggen’s corpse, but he had tried to look away. Now that terrible future was unfolding before his eyes.

Clang-clang-clang!

Raaaagh!

From the cliffs. From the gorge.

Most of the ceaseless clashes of weapons and screams belonged to the tribespeople who had followed him into battle.

Yet as they died, those who had pledged loyalty and vengeance on the strength of a fabricated lie would never know that the two young Great Chieftains who had brought them a brief peace and prosperity had already betrayed them.

No. I’m the only traitor. I’m the one who led them to their deaths.

Temur clenched his teeth until they drew blood.

Chinggen had died with his courage intact. Temur had survived in shame.

He had fallen for the promise that if he cooperated fully, they would spare his life and let him keep his position as Khan.

No—that was just an excuse.

He had simply…

Wanted to survive. No matter what it took.

Yes. That was the only truth.

And this was the result.

Sending twenty thousand tribespeople who followed him and Chinggen ahead as arrow fodder, as human shields, to get through that dreadful gorge.

“Damn it.”

Jamukha’s brow furrowed at the mutter that slipped through Temur’s clenched teeth. Just then—

"Khan!"

A figure approached at a run, calling out urgently.

Jamukha recognized him as one of the Keshik who had headed into the gorge with the three commanders moments earlier. His gaze darkened.

More precisely, it darkened at the weapons in the man's hands.

"These are…"

A lance, a scimitar, and a bow.

Even at a glance, the three weapons gave off a cutting edge far beyond that of anything the other nomads carried. They were familiar to Jamukha.

They had been specially made as gifts for the ten commanders of a hundred who had excelled above all others among the Keshik, his personal guard.

He didn't need to ask what fate had befallen their owners.

"Did those boys go peacefully?"

The Keshik set down the weapons, now keepsakes, and bowed his head.

"They fought bravely as warriors. Surely they'll be welcomed into Tengri's embrace."

"Yes. I see."

Jamukha murmured softly.

Kill someone, and be killed by someone.

That was the inescapable fate of a warrior of the Great Steppe. The same fate awaited everyone else.

"What of the other losses?"

Everyone present understood what he meant.

Even now, dozens of nomads were bleeding and falling somewhere in the gorge, but their lives counted for nothing in his calculations.

Jamukha cared only about the losses among his personal guard.

"Though three commanders of a hundred have fallen, our overall casualties are small. Only around twenty are dead or wounded. The rest have withdrawn to the rear and await new orders."

Three commanders had died, but their troops had suffered few losses. That could mean only one thing.

Remembering the commanders' confidence that each of them was enough on his own, Jamukha let out a quiet laugh.

"They disobeyed my order."

There was no doubt those three had fought a life-and-death duel.

One at a time.

Foolish as commanders, brave as warriors.

And one by one, they must have lost their lives to the young Sword Demon of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

“Those pathetic fools.”

Jamukha silently looked down at the Keshik, who could only bow his head even lower rather than agree. Then, abruptly, he spoke.

“Order the Keshik still in the gorge to charge.”

“Khan. You mean—”

“The senior ten-man commanders will temporarily take the vacant posts of commanders of a hundred. Minimize our losses as much as possible and wear them down.”

There would be no more reinforcements.

Several other commanders of a hundred remained at Jamukha’s side, but Eight Spring Gorge was only the first hill they had to cross.

He had no intention of wasting more of his forces in this narrow gorge, or of trusting commanders who might do something foolish again.

He wanted a surer hand.

Not one of the fine steeds or loyal hounds that raced like the wind at the turn of his reins, but a vicious dog that served the same master he did.

Ka-boom!

Jamukha watched calmly as a tremendous roar shook heaven and earth. A streak of red light came hurtling toward the ground along with a section of the cliff.

Fwoosh.

The breeze felt cool as it brushed Jin Mukyung’s hair.

It was a freshness he could never have felt in the training hall deep inside the cave.

Like a reed swaying in the wind, he twisted his body smoothly.

Shwaack!

Five lances grazed his arms, legs, and waist as they passed.

Jin Mukyung reached out, and a gleaming white-silver blade slid along the steel shaft of a lance.

Shhk!

A cold slicing sound announced another death.

At the same moment, the strength and weight behind the shaft vanished.

Jin Mukyung seized the shafts that had crossed past him, grazing his body, and spun rapidly.

Krrrunch!

There were no screams. Only a thick mist of blood.

With the five lances as teeth and his own body as the turning axle, Jin Mukyung ground everything within a three-jang[3512] radius to pieces. When he stopped, there were no enemies left around him.

And he knew his martial prowess was not the only reason.

Ka-boom! Rrrumble!

The gorge shook.

Rocks large and small came pouring down amid a roar that seemed to split the sky. Among them, Jin Mukyung caught sight of a streak of red light bending like a living creature.

Clang!

A tremendous blow struck his sword.

As Jin Mukyung retreated, a dull ache running up to his wrist, an exuberant voice reached his ears.

“Now that’s a shame. If I’d gotten a little more used to it, I could’ve landed a whopper.”

Chinggen.

He tossed aside his black-wood fishing rod, soaked in dark red blood, and raised two swords, one long and one short. He smiled.

At his new prey.

[3512] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Three jang is about 9.09 m (29.8 ft).

Chapter 959

Everything in the world had its own color, and people were no exception.

Their eyes, their expressions, the distinctive qi surrounding them—all of it revealed who they were.

The moment Jin Mukyung saw the man before him, he knew instinctively what he was.

A demon.

The two syllables flashed through his mind.

There was no mistake. The eyes drunk on killing intent. The corners of his mouth lifted in a lazy smile. The scent of blood seeping from his entire body was so strong it stung Mukyung's nose just to stand before him.

What… is this bastard?

Mukyung watched him, his gaze steady.

He could feel it in his skin. He understood it in his mind. This new enemy was nothing like an ordinary villain.

Even Pung Yang, the Red Wind Band Leader who had once raided the Mount Heng Sword Sect and inflicted a serious internal injury on Mukyung with his unexpected martial prowess, seemed like a mere mounted bandit beside this man.

A different breed. A different class.

In the lives he had taken, and in his martial prowess.

Chinggen looked back at Mukyung and grinned.

"Just as I thought. You've got good eyes."

Step. Whish!

Chinggen took a light step, as though out for a stroll. Mukyung instantly sprang back and raised his sword at an angle.

"Your Qi Sense is useful, too."

Chinggen nodded with satisfaction.

He had let only the faintest trace of killing intent slip, yet the young man had reacted without an instant's hesitation.

Enemy though he was, Chinggen liked the young Sword Demon more than he had expected. It almost seemed a waste to treat him as mere prey.

"You're as gloomy as an old man on his last legs, but you're still just a brat… Who are you? Want to be my Disciple?"

No one had expected that. The battlefield, briefly stilled by Chinggen's arrival, stirred with alarm.

More than anyone, the hundred or so nomads groaning amid the gaps in the collapsed rocks stared wide-eyed at their Great Chieftain, doubting their own eyes and ears.

They belonged to the western grasslands ruled by Temur and Chinggen. They knew both young Great Chieftains well, which made the offer all the harder to believe.

Chinggen had become Khan through strategy and leadership rather than personal martial prowess. Yet here he was, offering to take as a Disciple the man who, through extraordinary martial skill, had single-handedly slaughtered hundreds of their brothers from the grasslands.

"K-Khan!"

"What are you saying…?!"

Cries of shock rang out from every side.

The joy they'd felt at the arrival of Chinggen and the Keshik had vanished long ago.

Chinggen smacked his lips at the sight of the nomads staring at him with wide eyes, each nursing injuries of varying severity.

"Come to think of it, this is a strange time to make the offer, isn't it? Especially with people watching."

The short sword in his left hand blurred.

Shk. Rrrrrumble!

A cold slicing sound rang out. The pile of rocks, barely holding together, collapsed onto the nomads.

Their screams as they waited for rescue were swallowed by the roar, then disappeared completely.

"Useless things. Never any help, but they sure do run their mouths."

"…!"

"Now that no one's watching, let's get back to our conversation. Hmm?"

In the sudden silence, Mukyung fixed Chinggen with a steady gaze.

"So you're Chinggen, you bastard?"

"Hey, now. Is that any way to address me?"

Chinggen clicked his tongue.

"You may be a brat, but that's no way to speak to your Master. I ought to rip your tongue out."

The swaggering manner. The ease of a man certain of his strength.

Mukyung had little trouble seeing that the man before him, wearing a nomad's distinctive hairstyle, was hiding a great many secrets.

"You've disguised yourself. Where's the real Chinggen?"

Chinggen thought for a moment.

"Who knows? Probably inside an eagle's belly by now."

"And the other one?"

"The other one? Oh, I left Temur alive. Had to keep one of them around to control the westerners."

He answered without hesitation.

The Keshik controlled everything within several dozen jang.[3513] Jamukha had spent years raising them as his personal guard, and they would never betray their master.

Even the fiercest hunting dog did not bite its owner.

“Well, that should satisfy your curiosity. What do you say to my generous offer?”

Chinggen was looking at Mukyung with great anticipation when—

“Impossible.”

A low voice cut in. Chinggen frowned at the face he saw over Mukyung’s shoulder.

“Impossible? Why? No, first—who the hell are you?”

The uninvited guest answered calmly.

“How could a wolf serve under a mangy dog? He’s my little brother, whom I’ve cherished like my own son. As his older brother, I can’t let that happen.”

“Little brother? Older brother?”

Chinggen’s eyes widened slightly as he looked at Jin Wikyung. Then he let out a short laugh.

“The Jin brothers… This is a much bigger catch than I expected.”

A big catch.

Wikyung’s gaze grew heavy at those words. He remembered the old fisherman who had laughed heartily before the battle and promised to bring back a big catch.

“What happened to Senior?”

He had his suspicions, but he wanted to hear it from Chinggen himself.

What had become of the Dongting Fisherman, who had willingly risked his life for the Jin Family of Taiyuan? Of the owner of that dark fishing rod lying on the ground?

His worst fears were seldom wrong.

“Oh, that old man.”

Chinggen smiled faintly.

“He was a decent fisherman, but he wasn’t strong enough. Hooked something too big for him and snapped. Just like that rod.”

“…!”

“Actually, ‘snapped’ isn’t enough. More like crushed to pieces. He was slammed more than thirty jang[3514] down.”

Wikyung swallowed a groan.

The black-wood fishing rod, soaked in dark red blood and cracked in several places, showed how fiercely the Dongting Fisherman had fought.

[3513] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[3514] Thirty jang is about 91 m (300 ft).

The old fisherman had often said that when he died, he wanted his remains scattered in a blue river. Today, he had laid his bones in this gray gorge instead.

He had given his life for the Jin Family of Taiyuan, repaying the life he owed them.

Now the Jin Family owed him a debt. Him, and everyone else who had died here.

“Give me your name and title.”

“What?”

“I need to know who you are, so I can speak with my head held high when we offer a memorial rite for the dead in the future.”

Wikyung met Chinggen’s eyes with a cold gaze.

“So we can say we personally tore apart and killed the bastard who dared invade Shanxi Province and harm you all.”

“…!”

“No matter how rotten the world gets, isn’t that what people ought to do?”

Chinggen blinked his wide-open eyes, then suddenly burst into loud laughter.

“Ha! Hahahahaha!”

His laughter boomed through the gorge, pressing down on everything around it.

No—it was no longer mere sound.

Vrrrrm. Rrrrattle!

The air swelled. An immense pressure shook the ground and cliffs as though an earthquake had struck, drawing groans from all around.

“Urgh…!”

Was this what it felt like to be caught in a giant’s grasp?

The tremendous qi carried in Chinggen’s laughter made those nearby stagger. Some of the lower-level martial artists, whose internal energy was meager, went pale and coughed up blood.

“A Supreme Peak master…!”

The words slipped from someone’s lips like a groan. They gave voice to everyone’s shock.

And yet even that did not go far enough.

Just as mountain peaks differed in height, the man wearing Chinggen’s face could not be fully described by the words Supreme Peak.

Sssssss.

At that moment, the martial artists of Shanxi Province could hardly believe their eyes.

Fragments of broken rock were rising into the air as though suspended on invisible threads. There were a hundred or so of them.

Their jagged edges were hidden weapons in their own right, and the man standing tall at their center was nothing less than a monster.

A monster of endless change, wearing human skin.

Crack. Crrrunch!

Bone shifted and flesh compressed with sickening sounds. His appearance changed by the moment.

Everyone stared, stunned by the sight. Then three streaks of light flashed from somewhere.

Shwaaa!

The air split.

Three figures crossed the space like lightning, too fast for even the Keshik to react. As though they had planned it, all three struck at once.

Whoom. Whish!

A mighty punch and two swords blazed with brilliant light as they rushed toward Chinggen—

"How dare you!"

KABOOM!

With an enraged shout, an enormous surge of qi erupted like lava, driving everything around him away. A violent gale whipped through the gorge.

Fwooooooosh!

A thick cloud of pale dust rose, obscuring everything beyond arm's reach.

The three attackers were thrown back three jang[3515] by the irresistible force. They exchanged deep, steady looks—when—

Pop!

A sharp crack cut through the air, and Chinggen appeared before them.

No. Not Chinggen. Someone none of them had ever seen.

Thud.

A heavy footstep.

The old man was as bulky as two or three ordinary men put together. He wiped the sweat from his brow with his sleeve and muttered, "Damn it. I just can't get used to this."

The man who had been called Chinggen moments ago felt his own face, restored after so long, then the flesh that seemed ready to burst from his body.

Old and ugly.

That alone was unpleasant enough. Being ambushed while enduring the painful reversal of his disguise technique and Bone-Shrinking Technique had made his mood far worse.

"You ungrateful little bastard…"

The old man glared at the rats who had dared to ambush him. His eyes were so narrow and buried in fat they seemed impossible to see.

[3515] Three jang is about 9.1 m (30 ft).

He was furious—especially because Jin Mukyung, the first person in a long while to catch his interest, was among them.

“You dared ambush your Master? You’re expelled.”

At the old man’s declaration, Mukyung found himself wondering how his troublesome younger brother would have answered such nonsense if he were here.

Then he came up with a likely answer.

“Go suck a dog’s dick.”

“…!”

“Oh. And you’re a pig bastard, too.”

The old man’s eyes reddened with rage. Reflected in them were the two men smiling on either side of Mukyung.

“And who are you two?”

The two men, one young and one old, answered readily.

“Ghost Sword Wipeng.”

“Tiger of Mount Heng, Cheol Mubaek.”

At the answers of the two Peak masters representing the Jin Family of Taiyuan and the Mount Heng Sword Sect, the old man licked his lips with a tongue surprisingly quick for his size.

“So, one of you’s about to die and become a ghost, and the other’s a dog from Mount Heng. Good to know.”

Shing.

Metal scraped coldly against metal. The old man crossed the two swords in his hands.

“When you reach the underworld, tell them the Demon Bird sent you.”

Those words were the signal.

The battlefield’s suspended moment ended, and the wick that had barely kept burning caught in a blood-red blaze.

Waaaaaah!

With a great roar that woke the deep night, two waves crashed into each other.

Chapter 960

The time it takes to drink a cup of tea.

That was all the time that had passed, but the Demon Bird had to admit it: he had underestimated the prey before him. No—the people of Shanxi.

“Loose!”

Fwish-fwish-fwish-fwish!

The defenders had done more than hold the cliffs.

Five earthen forts stood near the entrance to the gorge. Their ramparts of earth and stone were still incomplete, but a considerable number of archers waited atop them. At a sharp command, a rain of arrows fell on the heads of the people surging together into a single mass.

More precisely, on the steppe forces streaming toward the gorge without pause.

Fwoosh! Thud-thud-thud!

“Aaagh!”

“M-my eye! My eye!”

Screams rose on every side, and blood sprayed into the air. Nomads struck in vital spots writhed where they fell.

Several volleys followed in quick succession, opening gaps in the densely packed formation. The people of Shanxi, led by the Jin Family of Taiyuan, drove into those gaps like awls.

“Attack!”

“Waaaaah!”

Those trying to break through and those trying to stop them.

The two waves of people surged toward each other. Where they met, there would be no white foam—only red blood.

Clang! Krrrunch!

Thwack!

Steel struck steel, throwing sparks.

A nomad’s lance pierced a government soldier through the chest. A martial artist of the Jin Family of Taiyuan leaped over the soldier’s collapsing body and cut the nomad’s throat.

Shhk!

“Ghk—cough!”

Screams and groans spilled from every direction. Everyone kept killing, and everyone kept dying.

On this battlefield, there was no trace of the mercy or compassion a human being ought to possess.

The strong devoured the weak. The weak could never survive here.

That was a battlefield. And at the center of this terrible slaughter, the Demon Bird felt a pleasure he had forgotten decades ago.

“Yes! More! More!”

He laughed aloud and swung his two swords, just as he had in the days when nothing could stand in his way. He remembered the great war called the Great Faction War, when he had taken his enemies’ lives and drunk their blood to his heart’s content.

Shwaaa!

The wind split. Force surged from the long and short swords, cleaving through the air toward the most delectable prey.

“Scatter!”

Whoosh!

It all happened at almost the same instant: Jin Mukyung, at the head of the line, shouted like a thunderclap; Cheol Mubaek, the Tiger of Mount Heng, and Wipeng, the Ghost Sword, twisted aside at his command; and—

Shhk!

The red Force barely missed them and swept away the unlucky men standing near its target.

Fwoooosh!

There were no screams. Only severed bodies and fountains of blood.

“Aah! Aaaaaah!”

Someone screamed in terror. It was the only clue to what had happened to the thirty or so government soldiers and martial artists.

In an instant, a single swing had taken dozens of lives.

No—erased them.

As though they had never existed. As though that had been their inevitable fate.

So this is a Supreme Peak master…!

A chill ran down Wipeng’s and Cheol Mubaek’s spines.

Peak and Supreme Peak. Only one character separated the names, but the wall between those realms was vast beyond measure.

If another Supreme Peak master hadn’t unexpectedly become a retainer of the Jin Family of Taiyuan about half a year earlier, they might have lost the will to fight just from seeing that attack.

But even that Senior, as powerful as he was, fell to that monster.

That was true even considering that the Dongting Fisherman had only recently recovered enough to leave his sickbed.

Wipeng and Cheol Mubaek had studied under him for months. They knew better than anyone how strong he was—and what a fortuitous encounter it had been to hear even a few words from a master of his caliber, much less spar with him so often.

The Dongting Fisherman had always been grateful to the Jin Family brothers for stopping him when he had run wild, then helping him recover. Through the goodwill he showed them, the Jin Family of Taiyuan had grown dramatically stronger.

And yet he was dead.

Killed by one man.

No—by a monster who hardly seemed human.

Now the monster who had chewed up and swallowed the old fisherman opened his jaws toward the new prey charging at him.

Even now.

Whish.

The air split with a faint sound. The instant a red flash flickered in the darkness, Wipeng and Cheol Mubaek twisted aside with all their strength.

Pipip!

Hot.

They had dodged the attack by a handspan, yet its pressure split the skin at the backs of their necks.

The sudden sting cleared their muddled thoughts.

This is…

Their eyes had widened for a moment. Now their gazes steadied.

That dodge had been no coincidence, no movement born of instinct alone. It was the result of everything they had gained from sparring with the Dongting Fisherman—their senses, their techniques, all of it.

And in half of those countless bouts, the two of them had fought together.

We can do this.

They needed only a glance to know what the other intended. Their gazes crossed for an instant, and both men blurred into motion.

Fwap!

They shot off to either side. They vaulted over friend and foe swinging blades at one another in the blood-soaked chaos, then raced along the steep rock face, throwing everything they had into evading the monster’s Force. It was faster and stronger than the Dongting Fisherman’s.

Shhk! KABOOM!

The solid cliff face, formed over what must have been hundreds of years, split like tofu. The tremendous energy that seeped into it tore everything around it to shreds, but Wipeng and Cheol Mubaek didn’t stop.

They couldn’t.

If they failed to bring down the enemy before them, everything would be over. And if they gave in to fear, or faltered at the wounds multiplying as they drew closer, how could they face the young man already ahead of them?

Second Young Master.

Heaven Shaking Sword.

They could see Jin Mukyung clearly, charging without hesitation through the ceaseless shower of Force. Flecks of blood scattered from him, but there was not the slightest tremor in his sturdy back or legs.

They found themselves wondering how he had spent those two years. How this other genius, briefly overshadowed by Jin Taekyung and Cheongpung, had lived in lightless darkness before finally emerging into the world.

And then they saw it.

Hssss.

Moonlight slid along the white blade.

No. It was a massive Sword Energy, shining brighter than either Wipeng's or Cheol Mubaek's.

Whish.

In a world that seemed to have slowed, the blue Sword Energy swept down at an angle and met the Demon Bird's red Force.

KABOOOOM!

The explosion stopped everyone in their tracks for an instant and shook the gorge.

For someone at its center, it brought joy and astonishment as well.

Rumble.

"Ha! Hahahahaha!"

Beyond the fragments of rock scattering in every direction and the cloud of dust rising thick in the air, the Demon Bird laughed like a madman and thrust out his hand like a thunderbolt.

Boom!

Compressed air burst outward, clearing his view. Jin Mukyung stood at the far end of a deep furrow a full jang[3516] long. The Demon Bird bared his yellow teeth.

"Well, well! What a brazen little brat!"

Powerful killing intent mingled with delight. The two swords in his hands trembled—but not just because of what he was feeling.

Tap.

He already knew what had touched his heel.

[3516] A jang is a traditional length of ten ja, about 3.03 m or 9.94 ft.

A rock.

A fragment of stone that had been three steps behind him just moments ago, but now touched his heel. He felt its hardness and chill through his blood-soaked leather shoes, and that was the greatest reason for his smile.

“I can’t remember the last time someone made me step back.”

The rock had not moved toward him. He had retreated.

No—he had been forced back.

A brat not yet thirty had forced back an old monster whose life had been steeped in blood since the Great Faction War.

Though the distance of three steps and a jang[3517] was considerable, it meant nothing to the Demon Bird. He had seen it clearly.

Just before the two different streams of Sword Energy and Force met, the beautiful path traced by the brat’s fingertips.

That light, as blue as the sea.

“Ah. So that was it.”

Squelch.

The Demon Bird stepped forward slowly, his foot sinking into a pool of blood. Blood overflowed with his heavy step, a testament to his bulk.

“I thought it strange. Even while I fought that old Dongting Fisherman, why did your face keep coming to mind when I’d never seen it?”

A few days earlier, a messenger had brought news of the vanguard’s annihilation, along with the severed head of a Keshik commander of a hundred. In the cut, the Demon Bird had seen the Sword Demon’s handiwork.

“The moment I saw it, I was interested. The work was that perfect.”

Everything leaves a trace.

Beasts, people, martial arts.

Every death has its own cause, and that is especially true for a martial artist of Murim. Looking at the chillingly smooth cut, the Demon Bird had felt blood long gone cold begin to boil.

Was it because he had found traces of a divine art believed lost long ago?

Or because he had sensed the work of someone whose strength rivaled his own?

No.

Only now did he understand why he had been unable to put the Sword Demon out of his mind, even while fighting a Supreme Peak master like the Dongting Fisherman.

“One Strike.”

He could watch it hundreds, thousands of times and find not one wasted movement.

[3517] A jang is a traditional length of ten ja, about 3.03 m or 9.94 ft.

Dazzling. Beautiful, even.

A perfect strike.

That single movement was what the young Sword Demon before him possessed.

He had not accumulated several jiazi[3518] of internal energy or mastered a divine art that could look down on the world.

It was colorless and odorless.

That was what made it more lethal than anything else.

Like the Formless Ultimate Poison, swallowing a life before its victim could react. Like an assassin approaching unseen in the dark to cut a man's throat.

"Amazing. No—extraordinary."

The Demon Bird's admiration was genuine. As he looked at Jin Mukyung, regret and sorrow entered his eyes.

"Why? Why did I have to meet someone like you now?"

Ptooey.

Jin Mukyung spat out dark red, bloody phlegm and answered evenly.

"Even if I'd met you much earlier, there's no way I'd have called a mangy pig like you my Master."

Wipeng and Cheol Mubaek closed in alongside him, moving to surround the Demon Bird. The old man sighed regretfully.

Why? Why now, of all times?

If they had met a year—no, three years—later, their match might have made his whole body tremble with joy.

Only a half-collapsed wall stood before Jin Mukyung now.

That moment of joy would never come again.

Jin Mukyung wouldn't survive this place today.

"What a shame. Truly."

Hssss.

Blood-red light rose from the Demon Bird's entire body.

[3518] A jiazi is a sixty-year cycle in the traditional East Asian calendar.

Chapter 961

The moment he saw the faint blood-red glow rising through the darkness, the Tiger of Mount Heng, Cheol Mubaek, finally recognized the obese old man who had introduced himself as the Demon Bird.

“Blood Soul Fat Demon.”

The name escaped him like a groan. The Demon Bird’s face twisted.

“How does a brat like you know…?”

Cheol Mubaek would turn sixty in a few years, but even a veteran like him was little more than a green young pup in the Demon Bird’s eyes.

What bothered the old man most, though, was hearing that long-buried title again.

Blood Soul Fat Demon.

He had earned it by treating murder as a hunt. Even among the countless fiends, he had been unusually obsessed with death and blood. But the title carried mockery, too.

Fat.

That one word had always gotten under his skin, and the Demon Bird had never been one to resist his feelings or instincts.

“It’s been a long time since I heard that damned title. I’ve killed so many people for saying it that now, even when they recognize me, plenty pretend they don’t.”

He had killed the execution squads sent by the orthodox faction, the unorthodox rabble who bowed and scraped to curry favor with him, and even fiends he’d once been fairly close to.

The reason was simple.

They had called him by the title he couldn’t stand to hear.

Why else would he have named himself the Demon Bird, a title that didn’t suit his appearance in the slightest?

And now a green young pup with the unheard-of title Tiger of Mount Heng had dug up memories he’d put away.

How dare you.

Cheol Mubaek’s fate was all but sealed. The Demon Bird put his name at the top of the list of people he intended to kill, then spoke.

“A brat like you couldn’t possibly have met me before… Who was your master?”

Crack.

Cheol Mubaek clenched both fists.

“Fist Hero.”

“Fist Hero?”

The Demon Bird stopped in the middle of his unhurried approach.

He hadn't expected much when he asked. He had spent his life killing, and once the count passed a thousand, he'd stopped keeping track. There was no reason to remember them all.

But Fist Hero's title remained vivid in his memory. The man was one of the few who had survived a life-and-death duel with him.

"Well, isn't this something. You're Fist Hero's Disciple? Wait—he raised a successor with that body?"

The Demon Bird forgot his anger and burst out laughing. Cheol Mubaek answered coldly.

"Don't insult my master. He was a far greater man than you could ever be."

"Of course he was. Even after his life as a fist fighter was over, he managed to raise a Disciple. I'll give him credit for his grit. You should've seen his face when I cut off both his arms."

"…!"

"Now that I look again, this is quite a lavish feast. The young Sword Demon of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, and the successor of the Shura Annihilating Fist."

As the Demon Bird surveyed them with satisfaction, Wipeng spat.

"Can't see me?"

"Of course I can. I can already picture your corpse lying there in a moment."

"You have to see how long or short it is before you can tell."

"That's the kind of bullshit weaklings say."

Thud.

The old man's heavy, wrinkled flesh rippled as he stepped forward. His sharp gaze seemed at odds with his massive frame as he sized up the three men.

"Well, then…"

Whoosh.

"Who should I kill first?"

In a single step, the Demon Bird closed a distance of several jang.[3519] The two swords in his hands swept through the air in arcs.

Like the blood-red claws of a bird.

Whoooosh!

Shhk—KRRRUNCH!

A gale howled.

Mighty pressure swallowed the air and tore at their skin. Dirt and shards of rock blasted outward with a roar.

[3519] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten ja, approximately 3.03 meters or 9.94 feet.

—Second Young Master!

Wipeng's Sound Transmission pierced Jin Mukyung's ears.

Mukyung had been retreating again and again to avoid the Demon Bird's Force. He jerked his head aside.

Whoom.

Two razor-sharp streams of wind skimmed past the back of his neck.

The two Keshik gripping crescent-shaped sabers clicked their tongues in disappointment. Mukyung had dodged their ambush as though he'd been expecting it.

That was the last anyone saw of them alive.

Shhk!

By the time the blood-red flash appeared, it was already over.

The Keshik fell quietly, never knowing how—or why—they had died.

Behind their collapsing, headless bodies stood someone who could have told them, radiating enormous killing intent.

"You dare try to steal my prey?"

CRUNCH!

Blood Soul Fat Demon. Or the Demon Bird.

The obese old man angrily trampled the fallen Keshik's bodies, as though he'd completely forgotten the other prey rushing at him from behind.

Or as though they weren't worth noticing.

"You bastard!"

The Tiger of Mount Heng, Cheol Mubaek, roared and threw a punch.

He was the Disciple of a great fist fighter who had lost both arms to a fiend long ago. He had become a protector of the Mount Heng Sword Sect to help a friend's only daughter.

Whoooooom—BANG!

Compressed air exploded. Fist Energy shot from his spinning fist and engulfed his master's killer.

Or at least, that was how it appeared for an instant.

Fwoosh!

A long sword, tinged red like its owner, sliced through the air.

The Fist Energy that had seemed ready to reduce anything in its path to ash faded and scattered. A sneer touched the Demon Bird's lips.

"You're certainly no match for your master. I'm not even sure that's the Shura Annihilating Fist I knew."

But the Demon Bird knew the truth.

Some two hundred years ago, the Shura Annihilating Fist had ranked among the ten greatest fist-and-foot arts in the world. Cheol Mubaek's current realm wasn't all that far from Fist Hero's, either.

Neither the art nor its successor fell short. The Demon Bird had simply grown stronger.

"Come!"

He felt the blood in his body boil.

The two swords in his hands had never felt lighter. Every movement his prey made looked clear—and slow.

As though reading a future that had yet to happen, he raised his blade to meet a flash thrusting in at an angle.

KABOOM!

The impact was far too loud to have come from two swords simply clashing.

Wipeng groaned as the tremendous recoil sent him flying. The Demon Bird launched his massive body after him, certain of what would come next.

One first.

Water flowed from high to low. People grew old and died. Everything in the world had its destined course.

To the Demon Bird, Wipeng's death was just as certain.

A Peak master who had reached an impressive realm for his age. An outstanding swordsman whose practical sword technique justified the title Ghost Sword.

But that was all Wipeng was.

With enough effort and luck, he might reach Supreme Peak in ten or fifteen years. That day would never come. Meeting the Demon Bird in this gorge was proof that Heaven had already abandoned him.

Those who had yet to cross the wall, and those who had.

That was the difference between Peak and Supreme Peak.

Become a ghost. Live up to your title.

Blood-red light flashed as the Demon Bird swung both swords.

The short sword in his left hand went for Cheol Mubaek, who was rushing to save his comrade. The long sword in his right went for Wipeng, who met it with all his strength.

But the clash unfolded in a way the Demon Bird hadn't expected.

CRUNCH—KRRRRANG!

"…!"

A substantial recoil traveled up both sword blades.

The Demon Bird's eyes widened at the dazzling sparks blooming where three different streams of energy met.

What?

He was more shaken than he could have imagined.

Cheol Mubaek and Wipeng—those young pups who hadn't crossed the wall, prey who should have been no more than a meal—had stopped his strike.

With nothing more than their paltry Fist Energy and Sword Energy, they were holding out against Sword Force he had unleashed with all his strength.

How?

The Demon Bird was a born killer and hunter. He knew better than anyone how far beneath him his prey stood, both in their enlightenment in martial arts and in the internal energy they held.

Yet the impossible was happening before his eyes.

A mere Peak master had met head-on the Force he'd swung with several jiazi[3520] of internal energy. It was something that couldn't happen—and shouldn't.

Cough. Spurt.

Blood mixed with bits of their innards poured from Cheol Mubaek's and Wipeng's split lips.

The Demon Bird stared, frozen in shock. The two men bared their bloodied teeth and smiled.

They could barely hold out against the blood-red Force. Cheol Mubaek's snow-white gauntlet and Wipeng's sword blade trembled beneath its overwhelming power.

Then the Demon Bird noticed the faint glow of their prized weapons, visible even through the thick blood, and remembered something he had briefly forgotten.

A Supreme Peak master's Force could be resisted by something other than Force of the same kind.

Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron…!

The Demon Bird caught his breath.

How could he have known? In all his long life, even he had never obtained a divine weapon like these. Yet two Peak masters from remote Shanxi Province each held one.

Nor could he have guessed that the weapons he mistook for Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron were made from the bones of a spiritual creature that had guarded a river unseen for hundreds of years.

His moment of surprise gave someone who was still standing an opening.

Hup!

Wipeng wrung out every last bit of his strength and twisted his sword.

His wrist was already broken and his hand mangled, but he swallowed the blood rising from his severe Internal Injury and turned aside the energy bearing down on him.

[3520] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

KRRRRUNCH!

The long sword slid along the snow-white blade and drove into the ground.

Deep—driven by all the force behind it.

Thud!

Anger flared in the Demon Bird's eyes as he recovered from his shock. At that very instant—

CRUNCH!

Cheol Mubaek grabbed the short sword that had been slowly forcing his gauntlet back. His hand closed around the Force shrouding its blade.

Crack. Krrrunch.

Something broke with a sickening sound, and unbearable pain followed.

The irresistible power crushed the flesh inside his gauntlet and splintered his bones. Without a divine weapon made from the Water God Dragon's bones, both his hands would have vanished without a trace the moment they touched the Force.

But Cheol Mubaek did not let go.

The pain was too great even to groan. His organs twisted under the immense energy, yet he held on to the blade with all his strength.

He remembered the great master who had taught him long ago, even without his arms.

And he waited for someone to kill the bastard in his stead, to do what he, an unworthy Disciple, could not.

At last, that wish reached someone's sword.

Shwaash.

A sound so faint it raised goose bumps.

A flash shot forward like a bolt of lightning and descended toward the Demon Bird.

Chapter 962

In an instant split into ever smaller fragments, the Demon Bird realized he had only one choice left.

Shwaa.

A faint whistle of displaced air approached like a ghost and brushed his ear.

At the same time, the world slowed.

Everything was clear.

The shallow breaths of Wipeng and Cheol Mubaek, both suffering severe Internal Injuries. The drops of blood spilling from between their lips.

And then the Demon Bird finally released the two beloved swords he had been gripping tightly and turned around.

He kicked off the ground with all his strength and thrust both palms forward like a bolt of lightning.

Fwoosh!

Blood-red Force flashed around his hands.

The tremendous energy, enough to reduce even a boulder weighing ten thousand geun[3521] to dust in an instant, surged forward without resistance.

Toward the sea-blue Sword Energy falling over the Demon Bird's head.

Toward the man who had brought that blade-sharp wave of Sword Energy crashing down.

Jin Mukyung.

The eyes of the young Sword Demon of the Jin Family of Taiyuan met those of an old fiend who had spent his life killing.

The two men could hardly have been less alike.

Not in the lives they had led, the eras they had been born into, or what they held in their hearts.

The young man had learned martial arts simply because he loved the sword. The old man had wielded one to kill.

The young man had wanted strength to restore his declining family.

The old man had craved strength because the stronger he became, the more people he could trample underfoot.

The young man was one of countless people who wanted no part of an age of chaos. The old man longed more than anyone for those bygone days when blood ran in rivers and corpses piled up like mountains.

The paths they had walked were different, as were the directions they would go from here.

[3521] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun is about 6,000 kg (13,200 lb).

Even now, the Sword Energy and palm force they hurled at each other sounded different.

Shhk.

The Sword Energy descended like a blue wave, or a single bolt of lightning, yet its sound was as faint as a child's breath.

RROOOAR!

The enormous blood-red palm force roared like thunder.

And between those small differences lay a gulf as deep and wide as all the differences that had come before.

One crushed the wind. The other cut through it.

Gooooom.

A distant flash. Air seething with heat.

As the red and blue lights raced toward each other, a thought struck the Demon Bird.

Supreme Peak and Peak.

Perhaps the wall of enlightenment between Sword Energy Becoming Force and the level of injuring others with Sword Energy was not as high or imposing as he had thought.

This is…

Even amid the raging gale, the Demon Bird could see the blue light shining clearly.

That unwavering strike, descending at an angle along its destined path, was proof of all the enlightenment the young man had gained so far—and of his progress toward a new realm.

Rumble.

At last, the two immense forces met. They erased the wind.

They warped space.

And under pressure great enough to tear his body apart, Jin Mukyung closed his eyes.

It was a deep night, with even the moonlight dim. Once his sight was cut off, pitch-black darkness settled over him.

It was so familiar. Every bit of energy and sensation in his body surged and flowed into the sword in his hand.

He could see nothing, but he could feel it.

His opponent's overwhelming power, ready to sweep everything away.

The openings in that ferocious, and therefore unstable, palm force.

Yes.

There.

As if entranced, Jin Mukyung brought his sword down. Blue light slipped between his closed eyelids, clearer than ever before.

A thousand times, ten thousand times—or dozens, hundreds of times more.

Hammer and cool it beyond counting, and even worthless scrap iron will one day become a fine sword.

A single drop of water can crack solid rock. A single thorn lodged in an elephant's foot can bring it down.

Just as it did now.

Shwaaaash.

The Demon Bird saw it clearly.

A blue flash, so sharp it looked like a single thread, split his palm force from side to side. It was unbelievable.

And he marveled.

Ah.

Speed, power, trajectory.

All of it was dazzling. So perfect it sent a shiver through him.

That sharpness could no longer be called Sword Energy. The flash of a divine weapon cut through the blood-red Force and pressed on.

Truly beautiful.

The words never left his lips. The Demon Bird smiled brightly and reached both trembling hands toward the blue streak falling over his head.

Shhk.

That beautiful, dazzling wave was cold enough to make him shudder.

The world stopped.

No—everyone in it stopped moving.

The nomads who had kept fighting, not daring to interfere in the battle of a superior who was practically a tyrant. The Shanxi defenders who had been slowly tiring against the endless waves of troops.

Even Cheol Mubaek and Wipeng, who had watched everything from closer than anyone else on the battlefield, could do no more than cling to their fading consciousness.

Shhk.

The single, startlingly clear slicing sound from moments ago still rang in their ears.

Along with a question they couldn't understand.

What on earth…?

What just happened?

The same thought crossed everyone's mind.

Red and blue had flashed within a distant, swelling blaze of light. That was all.

Everyone on the battlefield had seen that dazzling light clearly, and at the same time, no one had seen a thing.

Now, only the two men standing a jang[3522] apart with their backs to each other could break the silence that had settled over the narrow gorge, thick with blood and corpses.

Jin Mukyung and the Demon Bird.

The Demon Bird and Jin Mukyung.

The old fiend, who had spent long years killing countless people, and the young Sword Demon, who had spent the past two years swinging a sword in pitch-black darkness, slowly turned to face each other.

Splash.

A heavy step sent blood spilling from a puddle. No one knew whose it was.

Soon, someone's fresh blood filled the space it had left.

Cough.

Lips pressed tightly together parted. Like a cracked dam giving way, blood mixed with fragments of innards burst through the tiny gap.

Splaaash!

Dark red blood sprayed through the air and soaked the ground. Reflected in the refilled puddle was the young Sword Demon's pallid face.

"No! Mukyung!"

CLANG!

At the desperate cry from somewhere far away, the clamor of steel began again.

Thinking of the familiar voice behind that cry, Jin Mukyung smiled faintly. The Demon Bird suddenly spoke to him.

"What was that strike?"

The question was far too short to contain everything he felt and wanted to know.

Jin Mukyung swallowed another surge of blood before answering.

"I don't know either. I've never done it before."

The Demon Bird gave a wry laugh.

He wasn't mocking him. Those who stepped into a new realm in a moment of No-self, forgetting even themselves, always gave the same answer.

He had too, when he was young.

"Honest, at least."

"Can't help it. It's true."

"If only I could see that strike of yours one more time. Just once, before the end."

"I'll pass. I've seen enough of your face."

The Demon Bird's smile widened.

[3522] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten cheok, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

“Have you named that form?”

Jin Mukyung quietly shook his head.

What he had trained was a martial art. In a sense, it wasn’t one at all.

Only One Strike.

He had spent two years searching for a single path for his sword, and today, in this place, he had glimpsed its very edge.

He had never thought to give the form a name.

Not until the old monster in front of him brought it up.

“Blue Wave, Falling Bird.”

A blue wave surges, and a bird falls.

The Demon Bird murmured it like a line of poetry, then asked Jin Mukyung with unmistakable pride, “Well? Pretty good, isn’t it?”

“Hard to say. It’s kind of cheesy.”

“Oh.”

Disappointment spread across the Demon Bird’s face. Then Jin Mukyung went on, his voice calm.

“But I suppose I could get used to it.”

“Really? I knew you’d see it my way.”

The Demon Bird grinned from ear to ear.

He had no idea faint red lines were beginning to appear all over his body.

No—he was doing his best to pretend he hadn’t noticed.

“Heaven Shaking Sword, Jin Mukyung. Of the Jin Family of Taiyuan… Cough, you young Sword Demon.”

Drip. Drip.

Blood fell in scattered drops.

The Shanxi defenders rushing to save Jin Mukyung and the steppe fighters who had held them back, certain of their superior’s victory, stared wide-eyed at the Demon Bird.

The old fiend steadied himself as he swayed, his gaze fixed on Jin Mukyung alone.

“Kill. Kill, and kill again.”

His eyes and voice burned with the obsession he had kept all his life: murder.

“With the strike that cut me down. Everything that stands in your way. Every last thing. Guh. Every last…!”

Slith.

The Demon Bird never finished.

The red lines crossing his body, and the beads of blood swelling along them, finally burst in a magnificent explosion.

FWOOSH!

A fountain of blood surged upward, staining the air.

Everyone stared in shock as the Demon Bird collapsed like a rotten tree.

One man had fallen. One still stood.

There was no mistaking the victor.

Jin Mukyung looked down at the corpse lying face-first in the pool of blood it had made, its upper body and both arms severed. Then he spoke quietly, returning the words the Demon Bird had said before the battle began.

“When you get to the afterlife, tell them a man from Shanxi killed you.”

He gripped the sword hilt, which felt heavier than ever, and without hesitation cut off his enemy’s head. He raised it for all to see.

Shhk.

“I, Jin Mukyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, have slain the Blood Soul Fat Demon!”

“…!”

“…!”

The force of his shout, carrying what little internal energy he had left, froze the air in the gorge.

Jamukha’s personal guard, already well aware of the Demon Bird’s identity, was stunned by his end. The Shanxi defenders stared wide-eyed at the title of the fiend who had stained the world with blood long ago.

The Demon Bird was dead.

And in that same moment, another Supreme Peak master had been born.

“Waaaaah!”

A tremendous roar shook the gorge. Their blood boiling like erupting lava, the Shanxi defenders charged without regard for their lives.

They looked ready to swallow the personal guard, still frozen by the unexpected turn of events, and the nomads in the rear, bewildered by the connection between their Great Chieftain Chinggen and the Blood Soul Fat Demon.

“Attack!”

“We are Shanxi! We will not fall!”

“Wipe out every barbarian who dared invade this land!”

“Loose!”

Shh-shh-shh-shshsh!

Beneath a downpour of arrows, thousands of martial artists and government troops drove like a wedge into the broken enemy line. Jin Wikyung led them, his eyes bloodshot.

“They’re coming!”

“Shields! Sh—!”

Puhpuhpuk! KRRUNCH!

The blood mist that had briefly settled rose thick again.

With the tide turned and their morale at its peak, the Shanxi defenders charged into the jaws of death.

They swung their weapons with every last ounce of strength, and endured the pain, biting at their enemies until their final breath.

Shhk! CRUNCH!

Cut one down, and two took his place. Cut two down, and three came on.

After that, there was nothing. Only death.

CRUNCH!

Seven in ten Keshik were First Rate warriors. They were unquestionably the finest troops on the grasslands. Yet the roughly three hundred deployed in the gorge were cut in half in no time.

“What do we do? What are we supposed to do now?”

The Keshik squad leader gave no answer to his subordinate’s desperate shout.

He couldn’t.

The three commanders of a hundred were dead. So was the Demon Bird, an absolute master alongside Jamukha.

And that was not all.

Even now, his men were dying to blades coming at them from every direction.

And at the center of it all was a ghost, staggering as he drank in blood without end.

Shhk. Shhk!

He brought his sword down, slashed, and thrust.

With those simple movements, Jin Mukyung felled twenty Keshik.

Despite his unmistakably severe Internal Injury, the Sword Demon of the Jin Family of Taiyuan stood in the middle of the gorge, protecting his two companions.

What is this…?

The Keshik squad leader squeezed his eyes shut.

After a brief hesitation, he ordered a retreat.

Or rather, he was about to.

Then a familiar sound rang out behind him.

Boooooo!

The squad leader knew what it meant.

That great call from dozens of horns sounding at once was for one man alone.

Jamukha.

The great Khan, the supreme ruler of the grasslands.

Chapter 963

Boooooo!

As the horn's unintelligible call rang through the night, Jin Mukyung found himself wondering what was moving his body now: will or instinct?

Shhk!

A flash cut through the air. Another enemy fell beneath his gleaming sword.

The movements carved into his whole body through countless repetitions still traced their paths with precision, even as he staggered and bled.

Shhk, thud!

He slipped past a thrusting spear from behind and drove his sword, held in a reverse grip, into his attacker's side.

"Guh!"

The dying groan reached his ears. Mukyung pulled the sword from the man's chest and left the collapsing body behind, already rushing toward another enemy.

His eyes, impossibly, were closed.

And yet…

It's all so clear.

He could feel everything without seeing it. No—with his eyes closed, everything around him felt even more vivid.

Darkness.

He had spent two years in darkness so complete that not a single ray of light could enter. He had swung his sword to grow stronger and, at times, to keep from going mad.

As his sight dulled, his other senses sharpened beyond measure. His Qi Sense had grown by leaps and bounds.

"K-kill him!"

"He's only one man! If we take him down…!"

Crunch!

A grisly sound of torn flesh cut the shout short. Mukyung felled yet another enemy amid the endless carnage—he had lost count of how many—and steadied his ragged breathing.

He was dizzy. His body felt as heavy as waterlogged cotton, his mind as hazy as a dream.

The fight against the Demon Bird had given him more than a moment of enlightenment.

A severe Internal Injury.

His organs and acupoints were twisted and torn. He could almost hear them screaming.

Mukyung knew defeating the Demon Bird had taken something close to a miracle. Cheol Mubaek and Wipeng had risked their lives to help him. He had delivered a perfect strike, one he wasn't sure he could ever repeat. And he had wielded a divine weapon capable of standing up to Force.

If any one of those three things had gone differently, the Demon Bird would be standing here instead of him.

But…

Damn it.

Nothing came without a price.

Mukyung swallowed the blood rising in his throat and drew a breath. He closed his fingers tight once more around the hilt that kept slipping from his grasp and felt, with every sense, the enemies surrounding him. Their breathing was thick with fear and rage.

Beyond the ceaseless shouts and screams, he heard a faint voice.

"Hurry. Go on."

Jin Mukyung already knew who owned that hoarse, elderly voice.

"I'm not going. No—I can't go."

Mukyung opened his eyes. Blood running down his forehead stained his vision red, but he could see Cheol Mubaek and Wipeng, each on one knee and gasping for breath.

"We're going back. All of us."

Wipeng laughed at the resolve in his voice.

"See? What did I tell you? Those Jin Family people are stubborn as hell, h—"

Hack. Drip, drip.

He broke off and coughed up blood. Mukyung's gaze darkened.

The color of coughed-up blood, and what came with it, could tell you how bad an injury was. By that measure, it was a miracle Wipeng was still conscious.

"Damn it. After coughing up bucketfuls, now all I've got left is a handful."

He said it as though it were nothing, but Wipeng knew how dire things were. He fought to keep his eyes open and looked at Mukyung.

"Second Young Master. May I say one thing?"

"No. Don't say any more. Save what strength you—"

"Mukyung."

"…!"

Mukyung went rigid. Wipeng bared his bloodstained teeth in a smile.

"Go. Stop being so stubborn."

"…"

"I know it, Great Hero Cheol here knows it, and you know it too. You know what's best."

Mukyung clenched his teeth.

“It’s not too late. We can still go back.”

“Yes. We can go back,” Wipeng added gently.

“If you go alone.”

“What are you—!”

“Leave before it’s too late. You can still break through.”

Pushing deep into the enemy ranks to spare their allies as many casualties as possible had been the right choice. It had also been a costly mistake. Even now, hundreds of enemies surrounded them, watching for their chance to strike.

Wipeng and Cheol Mubaek saw that cruel reality clearly.

The old tiger who had once commanded Mount Heng was no more. Neither was the Peak swordsman with his ghostly swordplay.

The tiger’s claws were broken. The Ghost Sword’s swordplay was gone with his shattered arm.

That was the price they had accepted to tie down, for just one moment, the hand of a fiend who had once shaken an entire age.

But…

“You, Mukyung—you, of all people, have to live.”

“Not because you’re the Second Young Master of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.”

Wipeng and Cheol Mubaek looked at Jin Mukyung through eyes that seemed ready to go dark at any moment.

The young man reflected in those eyes was no longer simply Jin Mukyung. He was the hope they had to save, even at the cost of their lives. He was the revenge that would one day return upon their enemies tens, hundreds of times over.

“Live. Survive, whatever it takes.”

“And come back. To us, and to them.”

Spring. Summer. Fall. Winter.

The four seasons returned without fail. Only people vanished as they passed.

That was why Wipeng believed, and Cheol Mubaek was certain: the winter that had come early for them today would one day reach their enemies too. The young Sword Demon of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, who would protect countless people in the years ahead, would bring them down.

“So…”

Wipeng gave Mukyung a faint smile. He remembered the young man as a boy, coming to ask him to teach him the sword.

“Leave this place at once. Jin Mukyung—no, Commander of the Heaven Shaking Squad.”

“…!”

“This is an order from your superior in the family.”

Mukyung was struck speechless. He squeezed his eyes shut.

He knew. What the best choice was. What he had to do to save more people.

But his feet would not move.

He still remembered the lesson he had learned alongside martial arts when he first picked up a sword.

Chivalry.

Stand against the strong and help the weak. Never turn away from injustice. Keep faith as dearly as life itself.

That was what it meant to be a chivalrous hero. It was the way of life a martial artist of the orthodox faction, one who stood for what was right, was supposed to follow.

He had learned martial arts because he loved the sword, because he wanted to grow stronger. But he had never forgotten the weight and meaning behind those two words.

What's best?

Wipeng and Cheol Mubaek had said it, and Jin Mukyung had endlessly repeated it in his heart even as he cut down his enemies.

And suddenly, he understood.

"You're both wrong."

Shhk.

He opened his eyes and pressed his foot into the blood-soaked earth.

His sword tip, trembling a moment ago with fatigue and doubt, pointed toward the enemy without the slightest wavering.

"Before we ask what's best or worst, there's something we mustn't forget."

Shhk, shhk!

A nomad creeping closer was split diagonally through the torso. Blood ran down the snow-white blade that had cut through both the man and his spear.

"What's right?"

Mukyung moved like flowing water. The blue Sword Energy that had been fading now surged along his blade, the insight of that fleeting moment slowly finding its way into his sword.

Shwaaash!

A thick mist of blood bloomed. Mukyung cut down three Keshik with a single stroke, snatched a crescent saber from a dead man's hand, and sent it flying.

"What choice won't I regret?"

Whoosh! Thud!

A single streak of light cut through the air. At its end, death came without even a scream.

A man stringing his composite bow fell. At that signal, the enemies packed around Mukyung gave vent to their pent-up fear and rage and charged as one.

Shhk-shhk-shhk!

Fwoosh! CLANG!

Flashes gleamed in the darkness.

Jin Mukyung knocked away the throwing blades, but a dozen thrusting spears and crescent sabers came down on him.

Pit, pit!

Heat. Drops of blood mingled with the wind whipping past.

He knew he could avoid them, but his body refused. The places all over his body where blades had grazed him burned with pain.

Or perhaps what burned was his disappointment and anger at himself. For even a moment, he had thought about what was best instead of what was right.

This is the only right choice.

The turmoil in his head cleared. Mukyung clenched his teeth with all his strength.

Crack.

The stench of blood filled his mouth.

One pain drowned out another. His fading awareness returned.

And at the same time—

Tsutsutsu.

The blue Sword Energy, rippling like small waves, gathered into one. Guided by the will of the man holding the sword, its currents joined and merged, then traced a single beautiful arc.

An arc so perfect that the dead old fiend would have laughed aloud to see it.

Shwaaaash.

The wind disappeared. A chill cleaved through the darkness.

The ten Keshik squad leaders charging at Mukyung widened their eyes as one.

At last, they understood what the Demon Bird had seen in his final moments. What that monster of a martial artist had felt.

Shing.

Their spears, shining with tangible energy, groaned. So did their crescent sabers.

As the energy around each weapon faded, the ten Peak masters watched their prized weapons break into pieces. Their vision tilted.

“S-Sword Demon…”

Fwoosh!

A dense fountain of blood stained the air.

Beneath the sticky blood pouring down like a shower, Jin Mukyung had felled ten birds with a single strike, like a blue wave. He murmured softly.

"I'll keep that promise."

Blue Wave, Falling Bird.

Thinking of the old fiend who had become the first prey of that once-nameless strike, Mukyung stepped toward the enemies frozen before him.

At that very moment—

"May I hear who you made that promise to, and what you promised?"

"…!"

Mukyung's whole body went rigid.

The unfamiliar voice had come from a man standing barely ten feet away, looking at him.

"You…"

"Jamukha Khan!"

One shout—no, the same cry erupted from every direction, drowning out Mukyung's voice.

Jamukha.

The voice was unfamiliar. The name was not.

The words spoken by the strongest nomad warrior as he died—the day Jin Mukyung annihilated the thousand-man vanguard that had invaded Shanxi Province ahead of the main force—were still vivid in his mind.

He will punish you. Jamukha Khan will. He'll take everything from you and burn it—your family, your friends, your home.

Now, facing Jamukha at last, Mukyung understood. There had not been the slightest exaggeration in that curse.

"So it's you. The Sword Demon."

Jamukha.

The supreme ruler of the grasslands took a step toward Mukyung.

Rrrumble.

A faint but unmistakable tremor traveled up through everyone's feet.

Chapter 964

Rrrumble.

Ripples spread across the pool of blood that had lain still.

Tiny fragments of stone trembled. So did the countless corpses, their eyes wide open in death.

This is…

Everyone felt the tremor, small but unmistakable.

And at the same time, they knew instinctively what it meant.

An earthquake?

Ridiculous.

This tremor was undeniable proof that at least several thousand men and horses were closing in.

The cruel omen was enough to give some people hope, and others deep despair.

“Waaaaah!”

Wheeeee!

The gorge filled with shouts.

The nomads, whose morale had plummeted at the Demon Bird’s death, let out shrill cries and charged.

“Reinforcements!”

“Jamukha Khan has arrived!”

If Jin Mukyung’s defeat of the Demon Bird had turned the tide of battle, now the reverse was happening.

Jamukha.

A name unfamiliar to the people of Shanxi. The ruler of the western grasslands, the absolute master of the vast Great Steppe. As if his arrival weren’t enough, at least several thousand reinforcements had joined him.

The nomads had been pushed back, their morale dwindling like a dying ember. Now it soared. The Shanxi defenders, who had been driving back the invaders moments ago, felt their forgotten fatigue and fear return.

Even the man leading them felt it.

What do I do now? What am I supposed to do?

Jin Wikyung swallowed a groan.

Blood from his enemies ran down the commander in chief’s sword, proof of how fiercely he had fought.

He had given the battle everything he had.

He had joined the fighting himself to raise his men's spirits. Whenever a crisis arose, he had given flawless orders, sealing the gorge entrance so thoroughly that not even a drop of water could pass.

Fifteen thousand troops, scraped together from across Shanxi Province.

But reality was cold.

Less than half of those fifteen thousand could be called the main force, and even they had suffered heavy losses against the enemies who kept pouring in.

For every enemy they felled, there were two. For every two, five.

For every five, ten.

And behind them, tens of thousands more still waited.

In this long, dreadful war of attrition around the narrow gorge, it was not the rocks that would break first, but the pebbles.

Was this how it had to end?

Jin Wikyung breathed hard and looked around.

Everything was hazy, muffled.

Enemies and allies charged over heaps of corpses and tangled together. He stood rooted to the spot while a retainer called to him, but the enemy's shouts drowned out the words. They reached him only in broken snatches, like stepping-stones across a stream.

"…urry, hurry!"

He couldn't make out the words, but Jin Wikyung understood exactly what his retainer meant.

A hand tugged hard at his sleeve.

The retainer's face was full of despair and urgency.

And it wasn't just the retainer in front of him. Everyone around him—the martial artists of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, the Sect Leaders of their vassal sects, and the government troops—was speaking to him with their eyes.

You have to get out of here.

You have to live.

Yes. I suppose so.

Jin Wikyung understood how they felt.

The scales of victory and defeat had already tipped, and the invaders from the steppe were stronger than anyone had expected.

No—the strength of Dark Heaven, planted deep in the steppe, was far more terrifying than he had imagined.

Even now, the best course was to order a retreat.

While the troops at the front held out to buy time, he—the commander in chief—could gather the remaining forces and withdraw. That was the best strategy.

But…

There's no reason the commander in chief has to be me.

Jin Wikyung smiled faintly and tightened his grip on his sword hilt.

He had spent the past few years more accustomed to a brush than a sword, but the Sword Energy of a Peak master had not dulled in the slightest.

Shhk!

A Keshik trying to break through his guards crumpled without a fight.

Jin Wikyung advanced, cutting down the enemy with clean, precise movements. His retainer hurried after him again.

"Lesser Family Head, why—"

Thuk!

Jin Wikyung took another life and spoke.

"Tell Lee Seowol, the Sect Leader of the Mount Heng Sword Sect, that from this moment on, I'm leaving everything that follows to her."

"…!"

"Go. Now!"

With that shout, Jin Wikyung swept his sword through the air.

A defeated commander had nowhere to return to. After sacrificing the lives of so many of his people, this was where he belonged.

She's clever. She'll manage.

With the weight on his heart lifted, his sword felt lighter. Pain flared from the wounds where lances and arrows had grazed him, setting his blood ablaze.

I promised everyone I would protect this land—Shanxi Province.

He had made another vow, too.

Even if everyone else fled in terror, he would remain here.

He would live and die with them.

"Come on, then! I am Jin Wikyung, Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan! I'm right here!"

Crack!

At the sight of Jin Wikyung advancing with a beast's roar, a flame sprang up deep in the eyes of the Shanxi defenders who had been wavering.

A shiver, its origin unknown, raced from the crowns of their heads through their bodies.

There he is.

The man they had been searching for all this time was right there.

The man who cherished and loved this barren land and the people living on it more than anyone.

The true Alliance Leader of Shanxi Province.

"Yaaaaah!"

“Protect the Lesser Family Head! Protect Shanxi Province!”

With a tremendous roar that shook the gorge, the people of Shanxi charged with all their strength.

They did not retreat.

Not one of them.

Jin Mukyung suddenly felt fatigue seep through his whole body.

It was the pain of his flesh, which he had momentarily forgotten, and the vague helplessness of facing an insurmountable wall.

Was this how it had to end?

Jin Mukyung looked up at the sky and muttered inwardly.

Even the faint moonlight had been swallowed by the clouds. As always, the sky offered no answer.

It simply hung over everyone in silence, watching, as though this too were fate.

The countless enemies and allies.

The corpses that had left this world and could no longer move.

And the two men standing tall at the center of it all.

Jin Mukyung and Jamukha.

“That’s a fine sword. More than worthy of being called a divine weapon.”

Jamukha’s gaze moved slowly.

To the blade, shining white even in the darkness. To Jin Mukyung. And, finally, to the Demon Bird’s corpse, sprawled in a pool of blood without so much as a twitch.

“He always called himself a hunter. Arrogant and stupid, considering how long he’d lived.”

His eyes and tone were calm.

Jamukha showed not the slightest regret at the Demon Bird’s death. Jin Mukyung tightened his grip on the hilt and spoke.

“If he’d heard that, he’d have been sad. You’re saying he was a hunting dog his master didn’t even acknowledge.”

“Master?”

“He was a subordinate you cared for, wasn’t he? Or was I wrong?”

Jin Mukyung had tossed out the remark to create even the smallest opening. But Jamukha’s gaze did not waver in the slightest.

“I’m disappointed.”

“What?”

“Speak with your sword, not that tongue of yours. A provocation like that doesn’t suit someone like you.”

"…!"

"You're still far too clumsy at it. Though choosing the wrong opponent was a big part of it. Like that pathetic fool lying over there."

At Jamukha's scornful glance toward the Demon Bird's corpse, Jin Mukyung bit his lip.

Jamukha was right.

Trying to provoke an opening by using the Demon Bird's death had been the wrong move from the start.

Jin Mukyung didn't know why, but even after losing his sharpest-toothed hunting dog, Jamukha seemed entirely unmoved.

No—somehow, he even seemed pleased.

What is it? Why?

As Jin Mukyung wrestled with the question, Jamukha, who had been studying the Sword Demon with interest, suddenly spoke.

"If you're not going to swing that sword, why not put it down?"

For a moment, Jin Mukyung understood what he meant and let out a quiet laugh.

"You want me to surrender? To you, of all people?"

"Surrender?"

Jamukha frowned and shook his head.

"No. I mean submit. Roll over and show your belly to your master, wag your tail, and lick the tops of his feet like a dog."

"…!"

"You'll have to become my new hunting dog. Fortunately, I happen to have a spare collar."

Jin Mukyung stared silently at Jamukha.

Then he spoke without warning.

"The Blood Soul Fat Demon—the Demon Bird—said something similar to me."

"Did he offer to take you as his disciple?"

"I didn't listen closely. It sounded like a pig squealing. But something like that."

"That's no surprise. He would've trained you and eventually tried to kill you himself. Though, looking at how he ended up, he'd have been the one to die."

Jamukha spoke calmly, then continued.

"But don't misunderstand me. I'm not like the Demon Bird."

"You don't look any better than him. If anything, you look worse."

"I only intend to raise you as a hunting dog instead of prey. I might even let you off the leash when the time is right."

"Sure. I bet you would."

Shing.

A cold, sharp edge filled the air.

Jin Mukyung slowly raised his sword upright and spoke across its white blade.

“By the time that ‘right time’ you’re talking about comes, everything I want to protect will be gone.”

Their conversation was over. He had no regrets.

Better to die as a human being, the Second Young Master of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, than survive as a hunting dog.

To Jin Mukyung, who had already resolved to die, everything Jamukha had said was bullshit from beginning to end.

At least, until he heard Jamukha’s next words.

“I’ll spare your life. Yours, and all of theirs.”

“…What?”

“If you refuse to become a hunting dog because you have something to protect, then I mean to give you enough food.”

Jamukha looked at Jin Mukyung, whose eyes had widened, and gestured toward the battlefield, filled with screams and shouts.

“Do you know how to tame a hunting dog? It’s surprisingly simple.”

A leash alone was not enough.

A hunting dog that hadn’t been fully tamed would become a beast the moment its leash came off, and bite its master.

“But what if it’s starving?”

A hunting dog kept on a tight leash and starved for days on end would grow docile. It would have no strength left to bite anyone, and in the helplessness it had never experienced before, it would realize it was nothing but an animal.

“That’s when the master appears and tosses it some food.”

Shk.

Jamukha held out his hand toward Jin Mukyung.

There was nothing in his empty palm. Yet Jin Mukyung could see it clearly.

Not meat dripping with blood, but the countless people of Shanxi fighting to the death inside the gorge.

Everyone’s lives—including his own.

“…!”

Jin Mukyung gritted his teeth without realizing it.

Was it fear of the man in front of him?

Wrong.

It was hope.

Just for a little while.

The hope that if he betrayed righteousness and turned his back on chivalry for only a short time, everyone could survive.

That he could save the people continuing a blood-soaked battle whose ending was already decided, his one and only older brother, and the two Peak masters waiting to die behind him.

“Mukyung!”

“No! Absolutely not!”

Wipeng and Cheol Mubaek.

Jin Mukyung looked at the two men shouting with what little strength they had left, his gaze sunk deep.

“I’m sorry. Both of you.”

“…!”

“…!”

Wipeng and Cheol Mubaek’s eyes widened. Jamukha smiled.

Jin Mukyung looked at Jamukha and parted his lips.

“Did I ever tell you?”

“Tell me what?”

“What I said to a certain pig bastard who wanted to take me as his disciple.”

Jamukha’s smile faded a little as Jin Mukyung stepped toward him.

With a single phrase, spat out through clenched teeth, he answered:

“Go suck a dick.”

“…!”

At the instant Jamukha’s expression hardened—

Booooooo!

Far away, the sound of dozens of horns blowing at once reached the gorge.

Jamukha knew better than anyone what that urgent blast meant.

An enemy attack!

And at the same time, he realized something.

The tremor everyone in the gorge had felt moments ago hadn’t come from the nomads alone.

Chapter 965

Boooo! Boooooo!

The horns sounded in wave after wave, but this was nothing like their earlier call.

Instead of joining in one great roar, the blasts broke off in fits and starts. There was urgency in them, too.

Even the people of Shanxi, who did not know exactly what the horns meant, could tell that something unexpected had happened to the enemy before them. And that this sudden turn would bring them a stroke of luck they had never imagined.

“Now! Now’s our chance!”

“Don’t fall back! Keep pressing them!”

Not one of the Shanxi defenders stopped to wonder what had happened.

Not a single one.

They had already made peace with dying. They had stayed to protect their homes, their families, and their friends, and now they faced the invaders head-on.

Those who came to take, and those who stayed to protect.

They did not share the same desperation, or the same weight of resolve.

The people of Shanxi wrung out every last bit of strength. They stumbled forward and swung weapons that felt heavier than ever.

At the enemies faltering as they grasped what the horns meant.

At the cruel invaders from the steppe.

Klang!

Thud, thud!

Sparks flew where sharp blades met.

The Keshik, frozen for a moment in confusion, scrambled to fight back. But that moment of distraction was all the furious Shanxi defenders needed.

Shhk!

Saber Force surged along a crescent saber, sending the limbs of three or four men flying. Yet even in their agony, those who had not died threw themselves at a Keshik squad leader with all the strength they had left.

“Y-you crazy bastards…!”

Crack!

Flesh split with a sickening sound. The shout stopped short.

Not many people could survive an axe buried in the crown of their head.

No. None could.

“That’s what you get for setting your sights on Shanxi Province, you damned barbarian.”

Ptooey.

An unknown martial artist spat phlegm onto the squad leader's corpse, its eyes still wide open in death. Then he carefully took the sword from the hand of a comrade who had fulfilled his final duty and closed his eyes in peace.

His voice was thick as he said goodbye.

"Rest here a little while. I'll kill just ten more and be right back."

He knew the truth.

No—all the people of Shanxi knew.

They might never come back. They might never meet again in this life.

But knowing that changed nothing.

Nothing except the resolve with which they faced certain death.

"Yaaaaah!"

A cry like a scream shook the gorge.

It broke the stillness of the deep night, pierced the blare of dozens of horns, and traveled farther and farther on.

Past grass darkened by night and ground packed hard by countless hooves, until it reached a band of horsemen cresting a high hill and racing toward the battlefield.

The towering old man at their head smiled when he heard the fierce cry rising from the people of Shanxi.

"Yes. I hear you loud and clear. This old man does—and so do we all."

Thud, thud, thud!

Pounding hooves shook the earth.

The wind drove the stench of blood deep into their nostrils. The ceaseless clangor of steel set blood that had gone cold boiling again.

"Thank you. You've held out well."

His murmur faded into the wind rushing over him.

The towering old man spoke from the heart to those who had fought without giving an inch in the worst of circumstances. To those still desperately facing an overwhelming enemy.

He offered them his respect, his gratitude, and his apology.

"We swore to stand together beneath one banner. Yet some turned away when our neighbors were in danger, afraid their own fences would come down."

His voice rang clear over the pounding hooves.

The words were a reminder of his own shame, and a rebuke to everyone riding behind him.

"Spilled water cannot be gathered again, nor can an arrow be called back once it leaves the bow. But…"

The Jin Family of Taiyuan and the people of Shanxi had not been easily broken.

They were still here, burning with countless lives as fuel.

Their cup had not yet shattered. Their enemies' arrows might still be on the string.

“Look at them. And remember this well!”

His shout rose like wildfire, tearing through the night air.

The old man pointed toward the gorge, where a fierce battle was raging.

Below the hill, the steppe army was rapidly closing in, moving toward them to the sound of horns. He paid it no heed and continued to shout.

“They are our neighbors, our friends, our comrades-in-arms! They swore beneath the same banner as we did. And they are the very people our family tried to turn its back on!”

The old man was ashamed.

Ashamed of the family that had tried to abandon the people of Shanxi. Ashamed that he himself had wavered, if only for a moment, at that pathetic proposal.

But he had not forgotten the vow they had made long ago: to rise together against the injustice of Dark Heaven and save a world sunk in misery.

That was why he had ridden here with all his strength, repeating the same hopes to himself again and again.

Hold out until the end. Let us not be too late.

The people of Shanxi had not let him down.

They had given him another chance to unfurl the banner he had been too ashamed to raise.

“What are you?”

At the old man’s roar, like the bellow of a beast, two thousand tightly shut mouths opened as one.

“Fighters!”

Fighters.

For a very long time, they had called themselves fighters, not martial artists.

To them, martial arts were not something to hone for their own sake. They were tools for battle.

“And what is an enemy to you?”

At the old man’s next shouted question, the eyes of those riding through the darkness flashed.

“Weak losers who will kneel before a fighter’s spear and blade!”

Thud, thud, thud!

Boooooo!

Thunderous hooves and blaring horns rang out one after the other.

The sight of countless horsemen charging toward them through a hazy cloud of dust, just over thirty meters[3523] away, did not shake a single one of them.

[3523] Thirty meters is about 98 ft.

They were valiant fighters. Those men were losers who would soon be broken and crushed.

“I’ll ask you one last time!”

The old man roared. The enormous saber in his hand now scattered dazzling flashes of light.

“Who are we!”

The gap closed. Watching a wave of lances glint in the darkness, the two thousand fighters shouted with one voice.

“The masters of Hebei!”

At that very moment—

Flap.

The twenty or so standard-bearers, who had waited through the past several days for this moment alone, raised their flags high.

A blue tiger that looked ready to leap to life, and four characters stitched in a rough hand, billowed fiercely in the rushing wind.

At last, they revealed themselves to everyone on the battlefield.

The Hebei Peng Family.

The Tiger of the North. One of the Five Great Families.

And the towering old man leading them was a great tiger, grown stronger still through the long years.

“Charge!”

With a roar that shook earth and sky, the old man kicked off his saddle and shot toward the enemies closing in on him.

Rrrumble.

Thunder that chilled body and mind.

The old man—no, the Thunderbolt Saber King—swept his great saber through the dense forest of spears and blades like a massive bolt of lightning.

Kaboom!

A blinding flash and a deafening boom swallowed everything around them.

Behind the old tiger, who rampaged through the enemy formation and shattered it, two thousand fighters burst through the thick haze of blood. Together they pierced the enemy ranks like a single awl.

Crack!

In the deep of night, when even the birds slept—

The battle, and the Double Ninth Festival,[3524] were not over yet.

[3524] A traditional festival held on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month.

Everyone heard it.

And everyone saw it.

The strange thunder that had come from the ground, not the sky.

Beyond the flash and the boom, dozens of blood-soaked flags snapped in the wind as the enemy shrieked.

“The Hebei Peng Family! It’s the Hebei Peng Family!”

“T-The Thunderbolt Saber King…!”

The first was the Shanxi defenders’ cry of joy. The second was the nomads’ lament.

Peng Cheolhu, the Thunderbolt Saber King.

His name and title were no relics of a bygone age.

An old tiger might lose its strength and standing among its own, but the teeth and claws of the great tiger called the Thunderbolt Saber King had only grown sharper.

What’s more, the Hebei Peng Family was a renowned great family that ruled the north alongside the Murong Family.

In that sense, the Thunderbolt Saber King and the martial artists of Hebei following him were showing exactly how they had earned the titles of Ten Kings and one of the Five Great Families.

Boooo! Boooooo!

As the horns blared without pause, Jamukha had a sudden thought.

This is going to be a long night.

But he was not flustered.

The Shanxi defenders, united around the Jin Family of Taiyuan, had fought harder than he expected. The arrival of the Hebei Peng Family, though, was within the range of what he had anticipated.

So was the Thunderbolt Saber King himself.

“Just as that person said.”

At Jamukha’s muttered words, Jin Mukyung’s face stiffened. He had been trying to steady himself, to keep his emotions from taking hold.

“What did you just say?”

“The Thunderbolt Saber King’s temper is so fiery that he’ll act without thinking of the consequences. So even if he leads the Hebei Peng Family to Shanxi’s aid, it will be no surprise.”

Jamukha spoke without hesitation, then added quietly:

“That is what that person said. I remember it clearly.”

“…!”

“Don’t look at me like that. If you thought we couldn’t anticipate even this much, I’d be very disappointed in you.”

“W…e?”

“Yes. We.”

Jamukha nodded slightly and clicked his tongue as he looked at Jin Mukyung.

“A pity. If you’d taken my hand, you could have been one of us.”

Step.

Jamukha took a step as casually as if he were out for a stroll.

Shwack!

The crescent saber in his hand sliced through the air.

The strike was so precise and swift it made Jin Mukyung’s skin crawl. His eyes widened as he twisted aside.

Shhk!

His hair fluttered. Blood sprayed from the gash cut into his forehead by the pressure alone, blinding him.

Damn it.

Jin Mukyung’s body jerked to a halt for an instant. His two years of training had made losing his sight no problem—but the blood in his eyes was enough to shake his composure.

For Jamukha, it was the perfect opening.

A chance to uproot the young Sword Demon, still unfinished but full of potential.

“If you’d put that collar on yourself, this wouldn’t have happened.”

Jamukha raised his crescent saber, his voice low.

He surpassed the Demon Bird in every respect. Even facing Jin Mukyung, exhausted to the limit, he did not let his guard down.

Calmly and without a word, he found the fastest, most precise path and brought his saber down.

Farewell, young Sword Demon.

Blue-green Force flowed along the smooth blade, about to cut through the air—

Whoosh! Whoom!

With a fearsome whistle, a great saber shot in like a bolt of lightning and plunged squarely between Jamukha and Jin Mukyung.

Kaboom!

Beyond the boom that sounded as though the sky had split and the cloud of dust rising pale in its wake, the towering old man appeared. He bared his teeth in a grin at Jamukha.

“Ready to die?”

At the sight of the Thunderbolt Saber King drenched in blood from head to toe, Jamukha replied in fluent Chinese.

“Thanks for saying what I was about to.”

For Jamukha, nothing had changed.

Nothing at all.

Chapter 966

If two martial artists were evenly matched, what decided a life-and-death duel? For ages, that question had been a favorite topic among the gossips of the martial world.

Some said it was superior internal energy and peerless martial arts. Others put a divine weapon first. Still others insisted it was an unshakable mind and exceptional physical ability.

Every one of those answers was right. And every one was wrong.

Masters who had reached a certain realm knew. They had felt it firsthand.

In a life-and-death duel, a single difference—however small, however trivial it might seem—could decide the outcome.

That was why they often agreed on one thing:

What martial art you've learned isn't all that important. What matters most is having the eyes and instincts to see through your opponent's movements.

And now, everyone in the gorge understood exactly what those words meant, though they had once seemed so distant.

Whoosh! Kaboom!

They couldn't see the movements. They couldn't even sense them.

They could only stare, dazed, forgetting for a moment to swing their blades at the enemies before them.

Beyond the endless flashes and thunderous booms, three figures tangled together at speeds too great to see.

Whoom!

An absurdly massive saber cleaved through the air. The mighty Force along its edge tore through Jamukha's body with the wind.

Or seemed to.

Shhk.

A single step.

Jamukha's form blurred for an instant, then reappeared about ten feet away.

He had dodged the attack with a ghostly movement. Just as he surged toward the Thunderbolt Saber King, a faint whistle sounded from beyond his blind spot.

Shwaa!

In that instant, Jamukha was reminded of something.

The Thunderbolt Saber King wasn't the only enemy he had to defeat here today.

Shk—KABOOM!

The crescent saber met a gleaming white sword.

Amid the shock wave and deafening boom that reverberated through the gorge, Jamukha took an unexpected step back. A smile formed at the corner of his mouth.

Impressive. Even better than I expected.

His gaze fell on Jin Mukyung, who had been driven back, carving a deep furrow through the ground.

The young Sword Demon of the Jin Family of Taiyuan had delivered an unexpected strike despite his battered body.

And at last, Jamukha understood how Jin Mukyung, who had only just broken through to Supreme Peak, had defeated the Demon Bird, a master firmly established in that realm.

The sword Mukyung wielded had neither the prescribed movements nor the shapes considered fundamental to martial arts.

Only One Strike.

He found the fastest, most perfect path to end his opponent's life, then took it.

And that strike, driven by the will to kill, carried far greater power than Mukyung's own martial prowess should have allowed.

Enough to defeat the Demon Bird, a superior master, in the realm of Supreme Peak, where a single form could decide the fight.

But…

This is as far as it goes.

Without a word anyone could hear, Jamukha shook out both arms.

Green Force, like the vast grasslands where he had been born and raised, surged along his crescent saber and his empty hand.

Fwoosh!

Beyond the blinding flash swelling to an immense size, the two streams of Force shot in different directions.

One toward the Thunderbolt Saber King, who was bringing his great saber down as if to cleave the world in two.

The other toward Jin Mukyung, who was staggering and swallowing blood.

The result went far beyond what one man had expected.

Craaaack!

The Thunderbolt Saber King's eyes widened as he stared at the two blades locked together without the slightest give.

What in the—!

He was a warrior to the bone. He had made his name in the Great Faction War and become a living legend, yet he had never underestimated an opponent standing before him.

And still, his full-powered strike had been blocked.

With astonishing ease.

As though his opponent had seen through both the form and the flow of the martial art he had used.

"How could you…!"

Confusion and anger mingled in his voice.

The two blades remained locked in midair, their wielders' bodies still apart. Jamukha looked at the Thunderbolt Saber King with calm eyes.

"I'm disappointed. Shouldn't you have saved your much younger junior first, Thunderbolt Saber King?"

"…!"

The Thunderbolt Saber King's eyes wavered.

Over Jamukha's shoulder, he belatedly saw Jin Mukyung on his knees, vomiting blood, unable to withstand the force of the palm strike.

Damn it.

A mistake.

No—a grievous misjudgment.

Jamukha was stronger than he had thought, and he was a far more formidable master, with deeper secrets.

BOOM!

After a fierce contest of strength, their sabers finally tore apart with a deafening boom.

The Thunderbolt Saber King let the force of the impact pass through him, then brought his great saber down at Jamukha again.

Fwoosh!

A strike combining his innate divine strength with several jiazi[3525] of internal energy.

Born the third son of the Hebei Peng Family, he had become its Family Head and the Thunderbolt Saber King through the family's peerless martial art, the Primordial Thunderbolt Saber. Now it fell like a bolt of lightning.

As if it would split the world in two along with the enemy before him.

Shing! KRAAAASH!

A keen slicing sound rang out as the gorge shook.

Yet even after delivering a strike worthy of one of the Ten Kings, the Thunderbolt Saber King swept his gaze over the area, eyes grave, while a hazy cloud of dust billowed around him.

Where is he?

He had swung his saber countless times and cut down more than a thousand people, by his estimate.

[3525] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

So he knew better than anyone:

That strike had cut through wind and earth, not a man's flesh and bone.

"You bastard!"

The Thunderbolt Saber King roared like a tiger and swung his great saber.

Beyond the dust cloud scattering under the force of his blow, Jamukha was crouched in silence, like a wolf preparing to hunt.

Hup.

Neither moved first.

As if on cue, both men shot toward each other.

No one there could see the teeth and claws of the great tiger from the Hebei Peng Family or the wolf of the Great Steppe—so fast and so powerful were they.

BOOM! BOOM! KRAAA-BOOM!

Every time their sabers collided, a boom like cannon fire rang out.

The screams of those caught in the tremendous shock waves sweeping across the gorge rose over the noise.

"Gwaaaah!"

Arms and legs tore from bodies. Fountains of blood shot into the air.

Beyond a thick haze of blood, flashes of light kept sparking without pause. The nomads caught at the heart of the calamity fled for their lives.

Some ran toward the relatively safe entrance at the rear.

Others ran toward the exit at the opposite end.

Those with no choice but to take the latter route found themselves face-to-face with a forest of spears and blades, now almost upon them.

Thud-thud-thud!

Dozens of nomads, unable to dodge the arrows raining down from the still-standing earthen rampart, fell like pincushions. The blades in the hands of Shanxi fighters flashed as they pressed forward, trampling the crumbling bodies.

Shhk!

Jin Wikyung was exhausted, but the keen edge of his sword had lost none of its bite.

Having cut through a crescent saber and its wielder, he steadied his ragged breathing and advanced.

Toward the enemies inside the gorge, who had once seemed endless no matter how many they killed, but were now being swept away like a wave.

Toward the heart of the gorge, where two monsters were locked in a fierce battle.

Danger?

It didn't matter.

The arrow had already been loosed. If they retreated now, only a defeat they could never undo awaited them all.

We have to seize the gorge and drive them out as soon as possible. That's our only chance.

The arrival of the Hebei Peng Family, led by the Thunderbolt Saber King, had greatly improved the desperate battle situation. But Jin Wikyung's cool head saw every detail of the position his side was in.

This momentum is only temporary. If the enemy regains their composure, the tide will turn again.

The Hebei Peng Family was undoubtedly strong.

Its power reached beyond its home province of Hebei to encompass the entire north alongside the Murong Family. And the Thunderbolt Saber King, a peerless Supreme Peak master, could take on an army by himself.

But the enemy was strong, too.

Jamukha was fighting the Thunderbolt Saber King without giving an inch, and beyond the gorge, tens of thousands of steppe warriors were still fighting the Hebei Peng Family.

Their morale had faltered, but they still outnumbered the Hebei Peng Family ten to one—perhaps more.

Even after thousands of their soldiers had been killed or put out of action in the narrow gorge, the fundamental gap in their forces remained.

There was only one answer.

To win a battle still hanging in the balance, they had to keep advancing with everything they had until the very end.

"Follow me!"

Jin Wikyung shouted at the top of his lungs and charged.

His body now soaked in blood, he plunged into the crumbling enemy line and swung his sword like a madman.

Craaaack!

He had too much to protect.

The people who followed him, ready to give their lives.

The land where they had been born and raised.

And, far in the distance, his little brother, staggering back to his feet despite his grievous internal injuries.

Jin Wikyung couldn't give up any of it.

Not one thing.

Whatever else happened, Jin Wikyung's judgment was right.

Outside the gorge, the terrain opened into a broad basin beyond its narrow, jar-like entrance. There, the battle raged on without either side giving an inch.

Thud-thud-thud!

Shhk! KRAAA-BOOM!

The Hebei Peng Family and the nomads.

The nomads and the Hebei Peng Family.

The two forces had shared a border and been at odds for many years. Now they swung their weapons and shouted themselves hoarse as if facing the enemies of a lifetime.

“They’re weak barbarians! Crush them in one blow!”

“Brothers of the Great Steppe! Will you retreat before a mere handful of Han Chinese?”

Those cries, carried on the wind as they rang out against each other, perfectly reflected the situation they were in.

The Hebei Peng Family’s martial artists were individually superior. But the nomads outnumbered them more than ten to one, surrounded them on all sides, and attacked without pause.

“Attack! Don’t fall back—surround them!”

“Break through!”

Sharp spears against enormous shields.

If the Thunderbolt Saber King had stayed, the Hebei Peng Family would have held the advantage. But after throwing the enemy ranks into disarray, he had headed into the gorge with some of his elite fighters. The nomads had quickly closed the gap in their encirclement and counterattacked.

Still, a trace of unease lingered in their hearts.

If this keeps up…

This is bad. Very bad.

The Keshik centurions Jamukha had left outside the gorge exchanged grim looks.

The Hebei Peng Family’s sudden arrival had sent the morale of the Shanxi fighters soaring, while brutally crushing the nomads’ momentum.

There was the imposing presence of a master like the Thunderbolt Saber King.

And there was the Hebei Peng Family’s reputation, which had kept the nomads from daring to encroach on Hebei.

Some of the centurions were already reaching inside their robes without realizing it.

If we use that now, we could turn this battle around in an instant.

But the thought quickly faded.

They remembered Jamukha’s order—the command of the absolute ruler of the Great Steppe, the lord they served.

“No one uses it without my order. This won’t be the last battle we have to fight.”

They had not objected to that firm command or doubted it in the slightest.

Not simply because they were his subjects, but because it was Jamukha who had given it.

Jamukha was always coolheaded and certain. Everything he had said so far had proved right, and this would, too.

That wouldn’t change even if the opponent was the Thunderbolt Saber King.

They had only one small question.

What made him so certain?

Before they reached Shanxi Province, Jamukha had already predicted that other enemies would come to the aid of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

And he had declared without a trace of doubt:

“Nothing will change. Nothing at all.”

As the centurions recalled those words from several days ago and watched the battlefield with questioning eyes—

Rrrrattle.

Beyond the vast basin, where tens of thousands of enemies and allies were tangled together, a group suddenly emerged from the darkness. All at once, they drew their bows.

Shwaaaaa!

Beneath the storm clouds, thousands of arrowheads flashed as they cut through the wind and plunged down.

Chapter 967

To a martial artist, martial arts were like fingerprints: each person's took a different shape.

Even disciples who studied under the same master, learned the same martial arts, and followed the same formulas would move differently according to their temperaments and physical traits.

A man who doesn't fear death might use a sword technique more boldly than prescribed. Someone with short arms and legs might widen their stride when using a footwork technique.

And at that moment, something about Jamukha felt strangely familiar to Peng Cheolhu, the Thunderbolt Saber King.

BOOM! BOOM! KRAAA-BOOM!

The two saber blades clashed without pause, accompanied by a barrage of fierce impacts.

Beyond them, Jamukha's calm face—and every movement he made—grew more familiar the longer the Thunderbolt Saber King watched.

What is it?

For a martial artist who had reached a high realm, letting his mind wander during a life-and-death duel was forbidden.

Yet the Thunderbolt Saber King kept watching Jamukha, breaking that rule until he finally recalled a scene buried deep in his memory.

Could it be?

His eyes flew wide.

Jamukha seized that instant of distraction and brought his crescent saber down with all his might.

BOOM! KRRRACK!

Two sabers worthy of being called treasured blades locked together, scattering sparks.

Neither man gave an inch. The Thunderbolt Saber King studied Jamukha's face beyond their crossed blades, his gaze growing grave.

"I wondered where a barbarian like you had come from… Now I see we've met before."

Jamukha was silent for a moment. Then he spoke in Chinese so fluent that no nomad from the western steppe, so far from the Central Plains, should have known it so well.

"So you finally remember. Your head's still as thick as ever, Thunderbolt Saber Peng Cheolhu."

"Thunderbolt Saber. There was a time when they called me that."

The Thunderbolt Saber King murmured as if to himself.

Only one character separated that title from his current one, but more than half a lifetime lay between them.

The first time the two had crossed paths was before the unprecedented Great War called the Great Faction War, back when Peng Cheolhu was the Lesser Family Head of the Hebei Peng Family.

I thought so. He's that barbarian from back then.

The Thunderbolt Saber King looked at Jamukha with fresh eyes.

It was a fragment of a memory more than half a century old. And yet he could still dredge it up from his aging mind because the young nomad, who had rampaged like a wolf despite his terrible injuries, had left such a powerful impression on him.

Right. That's how it was.

Nomads crossed the Great Wall and raided the borderlands. Those who lived there fought to protect their homes and possessions.

Such clashes were a fact of life along the frontier near the Great Steppe. Hebei, where the Peng Family stood like a great tree, was no exception.

What made this encounter different was the young chieftain who had risen to power amid the turmoil of the eastern steppe. He had set his sights on Hebei and brought thousands of warriors with him.

Even along a frontier accustomed to raids and resistance, that was rare.

No—it was the first large-scale invasion in over a decade.

Peng Cheolhu had led his family in place of the bedridden Family Head. Recognizing the gravity of the situation, the Murong Family had sent a thousand elite fighters to help, including its own Lesser Family Head.

The Hebei Peng Family and the Murong Family each held a place among the Five Great Families. Their forces were led by two Lesser Family Heads emerging as the finest young masters of their generation.

Before the Great Faction War, the two families had been at odds over supremacy in the north. Their dramatic alliance proved enough to secure a fitting reward.

A flawless victory, without a single misstep.

Or perhaps a glorious triumph.

No one in the world questioned either description.

So complete was their victory that the young chieftain of the eastern steppe, routed by Peng Cheolhu and the Hebei Peng Family, had barely escaped the Murong Family's pursuit when its fighters arrived.

Leaving behind only the blood of the countless warriors who had followed him.

Then he vanished without a trace, seemingly forever.

Or so everyone, including the Thunderbolt Saber King, had believed.

Until they met again today.

“I never thought you’d still be alive. You’re a hard one to kill.”

They said a needle in a bag would eventually poke through. Someone that sharp was bound to reveal himself—even if he was out on the vast steppe rather than inside a bag.

Yet the young chieftain, with ambition and skill to spare, had not shown himself for more than half a century. The nomads had never invaded Hebei again.

That was why the Thunderbolt Saber King had forgotten Jamukha.

Barbarian or not, a man of his ability would not have failed to rise again without good reason. Peng Cheolhu had assumed that the wounds he’d inflicted that day had killed him, or that he’d fallen victim to another conflict on the steppe.

Whatever had happened, Peng Cheolhu had been certain of the outcome: Jamukha was dead.

“I should’ve done whatever it took to root you out back then. I should’ve torn out the source of this trouble.”

The Thunderbolt Saber King sighed quietly across their locked blades. Jamukha saw him reflected in his own gleaming eyes.

“I couldn’t die. Not before I repaid an old debt.”

Jamukha spat out the words.

How could he forget that bitter past?

He had returned from Hebei in defeat, then left the eastern steppe with the surviving members of his tribe. After marching thousands of li,[3526] he had reached its distant western edge and raised a ger[3527] of his own.

There, he could no longer see the hated banners of the Hebei Peng Family. There, he could avoid the teeth of the wolves waiting for his downfall. He settled in and waited for his chance to rise again.

Some fifty years flowed by like a river.

So much changed.

The new name he had taken to avoid a possible pursuit—Jamukha—had become a symbol of authority across the western steppe. His ranks teemed with fine steeds and warriors like hunting dogs. The few dozen gers[3528] he had started with had grown into tens of thousands of households.

But even when he had become all but king of the steppe, Jamukha had not forgotten Peng Cheolhu’s saber cutting across his body like a bolt of lightning.

Nor had he forgotten the humiliation of that defeat.

Wooooom.

[3526] In this setting, one Chinese li is 500 m (0.311 mi). Thousands of li amount to at least 1,000 km (621 mi).

[3527] A ger is a portable, round dwelling traditionally used by nomads on the steppe.

[3528] A ger is a portable, round dwelling traditionally used by nomads on the steppe.

The green Force around his crescent saber set the air trembling as it swelled larger and larger.

In Jamukha's gaze, fixed on the Thunderbolt Saber King, lay a past he had yet to put to rest.

"Thunderbolt Saber. No—Thunderbolt Saber King Peng Cheolhu."

The young chieftain who had dreamed of restoring his ancestors' achievements had returned as the absolute ruler of the steppe, leading a vast army. The Lesser Family Head of the Hebei Peng Family, who had taken everything from him, had come through the Great Faction War to become one of the Ten Kings—a great tree supporting the martial world.

One thing, though, had not changed: their old grudge.

"Do you still not understand?"

Krrrrk.

The crescent saber, engulfed in radiant green Force, pressed down on the great saber.

The Thunderbolt Saber King groaned as his blade trembled. Jamukha's lips twisted.

"I waited. I waited for you—for the Hebei Peng Family—to appear here."

"…!"

The Thunderbolt Saber King's eyes widened at the unexpected words.

KA-BOOM!

With a thunderclap that seemed to split the sky, the great saber—until then like a colossal wall—was forced back, unable to withstand the crescent saber's power.

KRAAAASH!

A gale swept through. Part of the rocky cliff cracked and burst apart under the terrible pressure.

Yet even amid the dust swirling around them, Jamukha moved with precision and speed.

Shwaa!

Space split along his saber's path. Streams of green Force shot from the crescent-shaped blade toward the retreating Thunderbolt Saber King.

BOOM! BOOM!

The roar of the two sabers colliding had already gone beyond the realm of steel.

Jamukha's gaze, so composed until now, had begun to boil like lava. So had the voice rising from his lips.

Just like—

"I'll kill you! Every last one of you!"

—the young chieftain who had lost everything in a bitter defeat and been forced to leave.

FWOOOSH!

Green Force erupted from his saber with all his strength. The dazzling beam lit the gorge like an early dawn as it slashed diagonally toward the Thunderbolt Saber King.

Shhk!

A single, chilling sound of something being cut rang out amid the flash.

"Cough."

Thud, thud.

The Thunderbolt Saber King staggered backward, spat out a mouthful of blood, and looked at Jamukha. Pain from his internal injuries twisted his deeply furrowed brow.

"…Impressive. Truly impressive."

There was no sarcasm in his voice. He meant it.

As a martial artist and a warrior who carried on the Peng Family's legacy, the Thunderbolt Saber King admired Jamukha's patience through all those years spent seeking revenge for his defeat. He admired his astonishing martial prowess.

And he admired Jamukha himself—a man who had kept his wits about him to the very end, even with his revenge almost within reach.

"How did you think to pull back? You had the perfect chance."

Even an enemy deserved respect when he had shown courage and fighting spirit worthy of praise.

But Jamukha did not answer the Thunderbolt Saber King's question.

No—he couldn't answer.

Crack.

The sound was so faint it could only be heard by someone listening closely. His crescent saber trembled, and in the next instant—

KA-BOOM!

—the blade shattered. Blood spraying from Jamukha's shoulder fell onto the fragments of steel.

FWASH! THUD-THUD-THUD!

The blood bursting through his skin was red. Pain surged from his deeply cut shoulder and his internal organs, hot as lightning, as fire.

Through the searing agony, Jamukha steadied himself and spoke.

"Cough. How—how did you…?"

He could not understand it.

The martial arts of the Hebei Peng Family were the very embodiment of domineering power. For generations, its members had made their name throughout the world with strength honed through training and explosive internal energy cultivated through their techniques. That reliance was also their one limitation.

So Jamukha had pursued speed above all else.

For the past fifty years, he had trained in saber techniques of the utmost speed and studied the Thunderbolt Saber King's martial arts, believing the speed he had perfected would overcome the Hebei Peng Family's overwhelming power.

But—

"Why? How…!"

As the Thunderbolt Saber King approached, steadying himself despite his internal injuries, Jamukha cried out, his voice thick with blood.

Unlike Jamukha, who had been unable to answer the earlier question, the Thunderbolt Saber King replied calmly.

"The Great Faction War. On that damn battlefield, I learned there were plenty of monsters in this world worse than this old man."

Enlightenment had no end. Progress was not a privilege reserved for the young.

Especially not for an old master like the Thunderbolt Saber King.

"Among them, there was this crazy old man who toyed with me and laughed at me. Said I was built like a bear and moved like molasses."

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

Hoping to surpass that deranged old monster someday, Peng Cheolhu had kept training even after peace returned.

He had not missed a single day.

"Still don't understand?"

The Thunderbolt Saber King raised his massive saber upright and looked at Jamukha, who was groaning as he clutched his half-severed shoulder.

"How Peng Cheolhu, the Thunderbolt Saber, became the Thunderbolt Saber King?"

Only one character separated the two titles.

But in this vast world, only ten great martial artists had earned the right to be called kings. They stood beneath the endless sky and three stars.

"The only place you can be called a king is out there on the steppe."

Peng Cheolhu, the Thunderbolt Saber King, looked at Jamukha's wide eyes and laughed aloud.

Chapter 968

Someone once said:

When three people walk together, one of them is sure to have something to teach me.

Of course, the Thunderbolt Saber King wasn't sure whether it had been Confucius or Mencius.[3529]

But the main reason he was smiling now was that he'd thought of someone who wasn't there.

If it weren't for the Fire King—that crazy old man—I'd never have grown stronger.

He had spent his life in the spotlight. Not merely because he'd been born into the Hebei Peng Family, one of the Five Great Families, but because he had the talent and skill to earn that attention.

Namgung Cheon. Murong Baek. Peng Cheolhu.

Of all the young prodigies born to prestigious families, those three had stood above the rest. Unexpected misfortune had kept Murong Baek from joining the other two at the top, while Namgung Cheon and Peng Cheolhu had come to be known as the Sword King and the Saber King.

But the Thunderbolt Saber King knew why he had made it that far.

Fire King Jeok Cheongang.

That old man had laid into him at every opportunity. Without him, Peng Cheolhu would have kept treading water instead of growing stronger.

"I'll tell you something. That grassland you were born and raised on isn't as vast as you think."

The Thunderbolt Saber King slowly raised his great saber toward Jamukha, who trembled as he clutched the shoulder Peng's Force had nearly severed.

Toward the king of the steppe, holding back a groan before a giant who stood tall beneath heaven.

"Now, let's finish this."

Whoosh.

With a single step, the space between them vanished.

The Thunderbolt Saber King's form blurred. For a man of his enormous build, he moved at an unbelievable speed, yet the path of the great saber plunging down like lightning was precise and controlled.

Shhk!

A single slicing sound rang out. Pain spread through Jamukha like fire, and he clenched his teeth against the scream rising in his throat.

Ghk…!

[3529] Mencius was a Chinese philosopher associated with the Confucian tradition.

He'd dodged. He should have dodged.

But the wound in his shoulder throbbed without cease. The Thunderbolt Saber King's internal energy had seeped through it and shaken his organs, slowing his feet.

Wooooom.

A resonant hum filled everyone's ears.

Jamukha's crescent saber lay shattered. The Thunderbolt Saber King's great saber bore only a few scratches. It trembled, then surged forward once more.

No. It split as it advanced.

The single blade became five, then ten, then dozens. Its afterimages formed an enormous net and shot forward.

The Thunderbolt Saber King spoke quietly.

"Go."

There was certainty in his voice and in his eyes as he faced Jamukha. Not a trace of carelessness toward a wounded, bleeding enemy—only confidence in his own strike and his own skill.

Fwoooosh!

The net of Force swept down. Jamukha threw himself backward, but the immense energy stayed close on his heels, cutting through everything it touched.

The cliffs on either side. The rocks and corpses scattered across the ground.

Even the loyal men who rushed in to save him.

"Stop him! The Khan is in danger—!"

Puk! Fwooooooosh!

No scream followed.

Those who had rushed forward with desperate cries crumpled into dozens of chunks of flesh. Jamukha, teeth clenched, reached for a weapon abandoned by its owner.

Woom.

The air shuddered. A crescent saber flew into his hand, drawn by Seizing an Object Through Empty Space, and he unleashed a burst of Force.

BOOM!

Part of the net scattered. Jamukha swallowed the blood that surged up his throat as the impact shook his entire body.

His saber techniques, wielded with only one arm, were slower. Every time he met a strike head-on, the impact battered his insides, which kept screaming in pain.

But—

Do you think I'll die like this? And at your hands?

With that cry in his heart, Jamukha sent his crescent saber flashing in every direction.

Thunderous impacts rang out, flashes of light filling his vision. Beyond them, the distant past swept through his mind: his younger self struggling to survive, clenching his teeth until they bled as he swore revenge. And the voice of someone who had willingly reached out to him.

“Don’t you want to live?”

He had thought everything was over.

The warriors who had once numbered in the thousands had been all but wiped out by the Hebei Peng Family’s elite, led by Peng Cheolhu. His rivals had been waiting for his fall. They would take his livestock and wealth, then enslave the few people his tribe had left.

That was the law of the steppe, passed down through the survival of the strong.

But just when he thought it was over, one last chance appeared.

Sitting amid the wreckage of his ambitions and the bodies of his men, the young chieftain seized the hand held out to him—the lifeline dropped from heaven—with all his strength.

“I want to live. No—I must survive!”

“If you live, what will you live for?”

“Revenge. I’ll repay today’s humiliation and grudge, no matter what. If you save me, I swear by Tengri[3530]…”

“I’m not helping you.”

“What do you mean?”

“I’m using you.”

“…!”

He did not think for long. The decision he made in that instant was as firm as an iron tower.

“Show me the path I must follow, my lord.”

The savior smiled, pleased to see him prostrate himself like a slave. He pointed beyond the endless horizon.

“Go. Build a new home where neither the Hebei Peng Family nor the eyes of the Central Plains can reach you.”

“You mean I should head west?”

“Don’t worry. The west is still in chaos, and you’re no longer alone. You have ‘us’ now.”

“Us…”

“Yes. We’ll help you, Jamukha—warrior of the Great Steppe, reborn here today.”

The savior had been right.

[3530]Tengri is the sky deity in traditional Mongol and other Central Asian beliefs.

The young chieftain left with a new name and soon distinguished himself on the western steppe. The greatest reason he was able to build such a powerful force was the savior's support.

Livestock and wealth in vast quantities. Even people and information.

"They're quite capable. Make good use of them."

And so Jamukha's personal guard, the Keshik, was born.

"These are supreme martial arts for you to learn, along with the Hebei Peng Family's martial arts. They don't include the secret techniques passed down to only a select few, but studying them will certainly help you."

The savior had even given him a sword and shield with which to face the enemy of a lifetime—the man who had since become the Thunderbolt Saber King.

Clang!

The crash shattered his reverie. Blood burst from his torn palm, and Jamukha swung his crescent saber wildly at the net of Force bearing down on him.

One arm was useless, its flesh, muscle, and even bone torn apart. But the immense internal energy he had accumulated over long years still flowed into his fingertips, along with the supreme martial arts he had learned.

So did a memory from years after he had settled on the western steppe.

"Tell me. When should we march?"

"Not yet. Wait. You are not to leave the west until you receive an explicit order."

"Not yet? How much longer must I wait?"

What?

"If I keep waiting for that order, we'll miss our chance. The Central Plains are in turmoil because of the Great Faction War. If we strike Hebei now…"

"Remarkable. A hunting dog that speaks like a man."

"…!"

"Draw your saber. Now."

The savior's eyes filled with killing intent. Jamukha did not refuse. He charged—and found himself facing a wall that seemed even higher and more imposing than the one he had encountered against Peng Cheolhu in his youth. He fell to his knees.

Only then did he understand.

"Remember this. Until 'that person' gives the order, we do not move."

"…That person?"

Even the savior, who had seemed like heaven itself to Jamukha, was someone else's hunting dog.

From the beginning, the "us" he spoke of had meant something far deeper and more powerful than Jamukha had imagined.

"Keep that in mind until the day you take your revenge and claim the steppe. You will not be forgiven twice."

Jamukha felt neither humiliation nor defiance. He trembled with fear and joy.

If he followed the owner of the leash around his neck, he could reach the goal that had seemed to be slipping farther and farther away. Once that master had swallowed the world, he would toss the vast Great Steppe to the hunting dog who had carried out his task.

"…As you command."

From that day on, every trace of defiance vanished from Jamukha's heart. Years passed, frost settling in his hair, until one day he realized the time had finally come.

"What is this?"

"A kind of pill. It lets you draw on power beyond your limits for a short time, though you'll pay a price to match."

Its effects were too ominous for a spiritual elixir. The savior called it a Temporary Strength Pill.

"Why are you giving it to me?"

"Consider it an experiment. For the near future."

"Then… could it be?"

"That person has awakened. Begin building a bridgehead for our advance into the Central Plains."

"…!"

After a wait of more than fifty years, the last few years passed in a flash.

On orders, Jamukha scattered pills and a number of martial arts manuals across the steppe. Each pill found its own owner. Armed with power they could never have imagined, those people spread chaos and disrupted the established order.

Not just on the steppe, but in the Central Plains beyond the Great Wall.

Pung Yang.

The leader of the mounted bandits known as the Red Wind Band on the eastern steppe was an ambitious man. With the Temporary Strength Pill's help, he built his forces at an astonishing pace. Then he turned his horse toward Shanxi Province and met his death there.

His killer was the scion of a borderland martial family in slow decline, a young man with the unfamiliar epithet Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi.

Jin Taekyung. Jin Taekyung…

Roughly two years passed. So much happened in that time.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan rose to rule Shanxi Province. On the eastern steppe, where Jamukha's old name had been forgotten, two young upstarts named Temur and Chinggen distinguished themselves. Far away in the Central Plains, the Star-Array Grand Banquet was held.

Then, like dams breaking one after another, everything that had been held back burst forth.

The bloodshed began with Shaolin Temple in Henan, swept through Sichuan and Anhui, then spread as far as distant Yunnan.

The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi came to be called the Divine Dragon. Sensing danger, the people of the Central Plains gathered under the Murim Alliance's banner. Even the great sects drew back, wary of an enemy blade that might strike at any moment.

Of course, none of this applied to Jamukha.

Dark Heaven, which everyone in the Central Plains dreaded, was "us" to him.

This was the moment he had waited for all his life.

"By the coming Double Ninth Festival,[3531] take control of the eastern steppe. Mobilize every soldier and seize Shanxi."

Jamukha summoned his warriors at once. After so long a wait, he moved with lightning speed.

At last he assembled an army drawn from across the steppe. The savior, meanwhile, passed along timely news from beyond the Great Wall.

The strength of Shanxi Province, gathered around the Jin Family of Taiyuan. The place where the fiercest fighting was expected.

And one last thing.

"The Thunderbolt Saber King will go there. Without fail."

He had even given Jamukha the place where he could finally settle his oldest grudge.

Everything had happened as the savior predicted.

Except for one thing.

Why? Why?!

With a cry that circled only on the tip of his tongue, Jamukha twisted his unsteady body around.

Shhk! Puh-puh-puk!

Pain like a branding iron.

He could see the attacks coming. His mind registered them. His body simply could not move fast enough.

The net of Force that had pursued him relentlessly had faded after leaving dozens of large and small wounds across his body. But beyond it stood a great tiger that would never let its prey escape.

Lips pressed tight. Eyes alight with a cold flame.

[3531] The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth month of the lunar calendar.

Both hands gripped the great saber so hard they had gone white. Brilliant light enveloped the blade from end to end.

Whoooom.

The Thunderbolt Saber King swung without hesitation. Jamukha watched the terrible strike, a fusion of defeat and swiftness, cut through the air.

And he understood.

Only one choice remained. Even if that choice left him drained and collapsed in this narrow gorge, it would be a hundred—a thousand—times better than dying at the Thunderbolt Saber King's hands.

Shk.

As the Force came at him from several yards away, the world seemed to slow. Jamukha took something from inside his robe.

He tossed the small, blood-red pill into his mouth without hesitation.

Or tried to.

At that very moment, a flash of light fell from above.

Thuk!

Through a stab of pain and disbelief, Jamukha saw a spearhead gleaming in five colors.

It had pierced the back of his hand—and the Temporary Strength Pill in his grasp. His last hope.

"…!"

Jamukha looked up, forgetting even the pain.

The owner of the spear that had fallen from the darkened sky spoke not to Jamukha, but to the Thunderbolt Saber King.

"With people like this, no amount of caution is ever enough. Don't you agree?"

Shwaa!

The great saber, poised to sweep everything away, whistled through the air and stopped.

The Thunderbolt Saber King recognized the face. A surprised smile touched his lips.

"I knew you'd come."

He looked at the graying, middle-aged man, who appeared twenty years younger than he truly was, and spoke with deep feeling.

"It's been a long time, Murong Baek. Or should I call you Family Head Murong now?"

They had fought countless times for supremacy in the north. Through the Great Faction War, they had become true comrades and friends. The Thunderbolt Saber King grinned broadly at Murong Baek and lowered his saber.

Good.

The war was over.

Jamukha could no longer fight, and the elite fighters Murong Baek had brought from the Murong Family must already have joined the battle.

Just as he expected, a shout rose from beyond the gorge.

“The Murong Family! It’s the Murong Family!”

The tension that had held the Thunderbolt Saber King’s entire body taut began to ease.

At least, until a panicked shout from someone who was surely a member of the Hebei Peng Family followed in the next moment.

“Grand Family Head! The enemy—the Murong Family—!”

What?

For an instant, the Thunderbolt Saber King’s thoughts stopped. A sudden chill sank deep into his body.

Shhk!

Through the blinding pain, he heard a quiet voice.

“I told you. You can never be too careful.”

“…!”

As his vision faded, the Thunderbolt Saber King understood.

Jamukha.

The young chieftain who should have lost all his forces and died a defeated man—how had he shaken off his pursuers and survived until now?

The Murong Family.

Of course.

More than fifty years ago, the man who had pursued him was Murong Baek.

The true source of all this calamity.

Chapter 969

The people of Shanxi didn’t see what happened in that fleeting moment.

They were throwing all their strength into driving back the enemies who filled the gaps among the corpses of men and horses and between the scattered rocks.

No—even if they’d been nearby, they wouldn’t have seen a thing.

The strike was so natural and swift that it could deceive the Qi Sense of a Supreme Peak master ranked among the top three of the Ten Kings.

Shhk!

Through pain that felt like fire, the Thunderbolt Saber King summoned superhuman endurance to keep his body from collapsing.

He trembled at the unbelievable truth that had struck him like a giant iron hammer.

So that’s what happened.

Now he knew. At last, he understood.

Why the young chieftain who had crossed the Great Wall and invaded Hebei had survived.

Why a man who, for all his ambition and skill, had been no more than an exceptional nomad had gained such powerful internal energy and learned martial arts unknown on the steppe.

That day, Jamukha hadn’t survived.

He’d been spared.

By the Murong Family that had pursued him. By the man who had led them.

Murong Baek.

His vision blurred with rage and pain. Pressing a trembling hand to the deep gash in his chest to stop the bleeding, the Thunderbolt Saber King stared in shock at the middle-aged man before him.

His features looked as though they belonged somewhere between the Han Chinese and the nomads.

“Impressive. You managed to react even then.”

His voice was as still as a quiet pond.

Yet his sword—when had he drawn it?—was already coming down like a flash of light.

Whoosh!

The air screamed.

The Thunderbolt Saber King’s eyes widened at the merciless strike from Murong Baek, whom he had believed to be his friend.

Twisting away on instinct at the last moment had saved his life, but nothing more.

The Force that had cut deep across his chest left his whole body heavy as soaked cotton.

Boom! Krrrk!

His great saber wavered as it barely caught the sword.

Murong Baek let out a quiet exclamation. Even with his internal energy in disarray, the Thunderbolt Saber King had blocked the attack.

“As I thought. You’re still absurdly strong.”

“Murong Baek, how could you…!”

The Thunderbolt Saber King clenched his teeth until blood came.

The Murong Family and the Hebei Peng Family.

The Hebei Peng Family and the Murong Family.

It was true that the two families, known throughout the world, had once been at odds.

But that was the past.

An old feud long since buried by the years.

Even now, the Thunderbolt Saber King could hardly believe that Murong Baek had betrayed him. Murong Baek, who had fought back-to-back with him in the Great Faction War. The rival of his youth who had become his friend, who had grown old alongside him.

No. He had betrayed everyone on this land.

“When? When did you…”

His breathing was ragged with anger and shock. Beyond the trembling blades, he fixed the traitor with his gaze and moved his split lips.

“When did you join hands with Dark Heaven?”

Murong Baek answered by pressing his sword harder against the great saber. Force surged along the blade toward its tip.

Shhk.

The Thunderbolt Saber King swallowed a groan.

It burned. Murong Baek’s Force had reached his skin before the sword, and now it was digging into his collarbone.

Slowly. Little by little.

Cutting through flesh and bone as though it would not stop until it reached his heart.

“Graaaah!”

Blood burst between his clenched teeth.

Roaring like a furious tiger, the Thunderbolt Saber King drove his great saber upward.

His rage blotted out the pain. Through the Chaos Thunderbolt Divine Art, reserved for the Hebei Peng Family Head, he poured every last bit of internal energy in his body into the blade.

BOOM!

With a crash like the sky splitting apart, Murong Baek's sword was knocked away.

Agony tore through his damaged acupoints and the collarbone split by Force. The Thunderbolt Saber King endured it with a will harder than steel and thrust out his hand.

"You bastard!"

Poom!

Compressed air burst outward.

A strike from the Great Strength Vajra Palm, a technique the Hebei Peng Family took pride in, swept toward Murong Baek with such ferocity that it outran its own sound.

For the briefest moment, at least, that was how it looked.

Shwaa!

A flash of light—and it was over.

Murong Baek's figure blurred as he cut apart the palm force flying with the wind. The instant the Thunderbolt Saber King thought he saw him disappear, a red warning light flashed in his mind.

Shifting Form and Position!

There was no time to stop the bleeding from his collarbone. No time to swing his great saber.

He twisted with all his strength and turned toward the fleeting presence behind him, throwing a punch.

Whoosh.

It connected.

Not with a human body of flesh and bone, but with the wind, crushed beneath his fist.

At the same instant, he sensed it: a flash of light shooting beneath the fist he'd swung through empty air, scattering icy killing intent.

"…!"

The world slowed. Eyes wide, the Thunderbolt Saber King moved by instinct rather than reason.

He let go of the great saber he had carried all his life and reached for the flash closing in on his chest.

Thuk.

The sound of flesh being pierced rang out, sharp and slow.

The pointed sword tip drove through the Palm Force he'd hastily summoned as though it were tofu, cut through the flesh and bone of his hand, and emerged from the back of it.

As though that obstacle were nothing, it kept driving toward its target.

Until the Thunderbolt Saber King, holding back a scream, gripped the blade with all his strength.

Krrrk!

The sword stopped.

No—more precisely, it broke.

Plip.

Fragments of the blade fell with his blood.

His whole body went rigid under the overwhelming pain of his hand being crushed in an instant.

All he could do was stare, eyes wide, at Murong Baek staring back. Then he watched, dazed, as Murong Baek—without so much as a scratch on him—thrust out a palm.

Fwoosh.

Beyond the dazzling light filling his vision, Murong Baek's quiet voice reached him as faintly as a dream.

"You fought well. Like a true warrior."

And then—

Poom.

An explosion sounded deep inside his body, and the Thunderbolt Saber King's world turned upside down.

A massive tremor swept through the gorge.

KABOOM!

The ground shook. With a thunderous crash, part of the cliff collapsed.

Even rock built up by nature over ages too long to measure had given way. A human body of flesh stood no chance.

Krrrrk!

Boulders that had been part of the cliff came crashing down beneath the immense weight of earth and sand above them. Dust and debris flew wildly in every direction.

Yet even in the pale cloud, where he couldn't see a hand in front of his face, Murong Baek kept his eyes fixed on one spot.

He slowly closed the hand that had brought about this devastation, taking in everything within several dozen zhang[3532] through his Qi Sense.

Including a faint cough that had just escaped from beneath a shifting mound of earth.

Khk.

Murong Baek didn't turn his head. He merely reached out and eased the weight of earth pressing down on the person who had coughed.

He retrieved something that had once belonged to him as well.

Wooooom.

The air shuddered as immense qi flowed from his gesture. Then a spear buried deep in the ground flew into his grasp as though pulled by an invisible string.

Fresh blood ran down it—proof that it had pierced someone's flesh and bone.

"Thank you."

Jamukha's voice came from behind him. Murong Baek spoke without turning.

"Why didn't you follow my orders? I told you to buy as much time as possible."

"Well…"

"I suppose you underestimated the Thunderbolt Saber King."

Jamukha bit his lip instead of answering.

Murong Baek was right. He had disobeyed his savior.

Holding his own against the Thunderbolt Saber King had made him greedy. Little by little, he had pushed aside Murong Baek's order to wait for him.

And there was one more order he had pushed aside.

He, at least, was never to take the Temporary Strength Pill.

"I have no excuse."

"No, you don't. If you'd swallowed it, we wouldn't be having this conversation."

The Temporary Strength Pill was a double-edged sword.

The early versions that had found their way into the hands of Pung Yang, the Red Wind Band Leader, and others were dangerous enough. Even the newly improved pill was highly addictive and carried severe side effects.

The ordinary foot soldiers might take it, but Jamukha could not. He was the commander-in-chief of a great army, with much yet to do.

Not from Murong Baek's point of view, when he had placed Jamukha at the forefront.

"How are you?"

"Not as bad as you might think. Once I finish regulating my qi, my Internal Injury should heal soon."

Despite his words, nearly half of one shoulder had been cut away. His future as a saber fighter was in danger, yet there was not a trace of gloom on his face.

[3532] Here, one zhang (Korean jang) is approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Jamukha knew how mysterious and powerful his savior's Dark Heaven was—the Dark Heaven Murong Baek had called "us" long ago.

With no worry at all showing on his face, he went on.

"Though that bastard will be wandering the Nine Springs[3533] now, unlike me."

That was when Murong Baek's gaze, fixed in one direction all this time, shifted to Jamukha.

"You still have a long way to go."

"What do you…?"

Jamukha trailed off. Suddenly understanding what Murong Baek meant, he bit his lip.

"You're saying he's alive? The Thunderbolt Saber King? Even now?"

It was a natural question.

He had seen what happened with his own eyes: the Thunderbolt Saber King crumbling beneath Murong Baek's attacks, delivered without hesitation or mercy.

A palm strike of terrifying power had driven him deep into the cliff, where he'd looked like a corpse as he spat blood.

But unlike Jamukha, Murong Baek could sense a thread of breath beneath the countless rocks and mounds of earth.

Stubborn bastard. Just as always.

Thinking back, the Thunderbolt Saber King—Peng Cheolhu—had always been like that.

His natural strength and sturdy body had made him stand out not only within the Hebei Peng Family but among the young prodigies of the entire world. The countless battlefields he had crossed had been no exception.

He always survived. Always.

So Murong Baek intended to end the Thunderbolt Saber King's life with his own hands.

And now that the cliffs had collapsed in front of and behind them, shutting out every witness nearby, he needed to kill all the survivors, including the Thunderbolt Saber King. Any one of them might pose a risk.

The longer his secret remained hidden, the better.

Then he could deal another devastating blow to the reinforcements coming from the Nine Sects and One Gang.

At least half a day until Huashan and Zhongnan arrive.

There was still plenty of time.

Once everything was ready, Murong Baek would meet the orthodox faction's reinforcements right here.

[3533] The Nine Springs is a traditional Chinese euphemism for the realm of the dead.

By then, he would have dealt with the Thunderbolt Saber King. The Hebei Peng Family martial artists beyond the gorge, now falling to the Murong Family's unexpected ambush, would be dead as well.

So would the people of Shanxi, slaughtering nomads on the far side of the suddenly collapsed cliff.

First, though, he must not forget the rats hiding beneath the earth, holding their breath.

Shhk.

His spearhead swept through like a streak of light, splitting a huge boulder and the mound of earth beneath it as easily as tofu.

Murong Baek looked down impassively at Jin Mukyung, who held the bloodied Cheol Mubaek and Wipeng in his arms.

Without a word, he brought his spear straight down.

No—he was about to.

Whoooom.

A tremendous rush of air sounded from somewhere, and Murong Baek turned his head on instinct.

He saw it.

KABOOOM!

A spear came crashing through, smashing apart the great mass of cliff rock in its path.

A blue-white flame burned along its icy, translucent spearhead.

Chapter 970

In the hazy darkness, unable to see an inch ahead, Jin Mukyung faced the only path left to him. He saw it not with his eyes, but with his heart.

A future that could never come to pass.

Eternal death.

So this is the end.

Even Jin Mukyung was surprised by how calmly he accepted it.

He'd already done everything he could.

He'd fought with all his strength, enough to look up at the heavens without a shred of shame. At last, that strength had run out.

Body and soul.

He'd poured everything into the fight. There was nothing left. In a world that had slowed to a crawl, he watched a spear rise and knew the death in its blade was drawing near, yet he couldn't twitch a finger.

And still, somewhere deep in his heart, one thread of regret remained. It was for the people he would leave behind.

What will happen to them now?

He didn't care what awaited him after death.

Even if a pale-faced Grim Reaper dressed head to toe in black appeared right now, bound him in chains, and dragged him before Yama,[3534] it wouldn't matter.

He had lived an honorable life as a martial artist and as the Jin Family of Taiyuan's Second Young Master. The lives he'd taken had been taken to protect others, not because he wanted to kill.

But now he had to leave.

He had to leave everyone behind and be dragged into the unknown darkness. Not by choice.

Everything he'd wanted to protect, everything he had ultimately failed to save, would remain here.

...No. Anything but that.

In that instant, Jin Mukyung clenched his teeth.

He forced his fading consciousness awake and screamed silently.

Everything I could? What did that even mean?

How could he accept death so weakly?

If he was still alive, it wasn't over. Not until his last breath.

He had to get up. He had to fight until his pounding heart stopped.

I—I...!

[3534] Yama is the lord and judge of the dead in Buddhist tradition.

His fingertips trembled. The smell of blood rose between his clenched teeth.

But even biting his own tongue couldn't rouse a body that had long since passed its limit. The cruel reality didn't change.

Whoosh.

The sound of something cutting through the air rang clearly in his ears. In his blurred vision, the slanting flash seemed unusually slow.

Slow enough to look back on his entire life.

Slow enough to picture the most infuriating face in the world.

If you were here instead of me… everything would be different.

As the spearhead fell toward his head, Jin Mukyung spoke in his heart to the only younger brother he had. The words would never reach him.

Looks like I won't be able to keep that promise after all.

Two years ago, the brothers had made a promise through the wall of the training hall.

They would meet at the Star-Array Grand Banquet, the gathering of countless stars that lit up the world.

In the end, Jin Mukyung hadn't kept his promise.

He'd been ashamed. His accomplishments had felt nowhere near enough.

When he'd first picked up a sword, he'd wanted to become a great martial artist. Later, he'd wanted to become the pride of the Jin Family of Taiyuan and a younger brother his elder brother could be proud of.

But there was another reason—his greatest reason—for spending the past two years swinging his sword without rest in suffocating darkness.

He wanted to be an older brother who could hold his head high.

He wanted to become strong enough to surpass the wall that was Cheongpung, so his younger brother, who'd become the Divine Dragon and soared freely through the sky, wouldn't be ashamed of him.

But…

So this is how it ends.

Jin Mukyung, the Heaven Shaking Sword.

The time of opportunity granted to a young genius, overshadowed by other monsters, was over.

The sword he'd honed in the dark had shone brightly enough to light this gorge today. But that fleeting light would be swallowed by the long, deep night.

Forever.

Damn it.

Jin Mukyung struggled to lift his half-closed eyelids.

He would not close his eyes in the face of death. It was the last pride he had as a martial artist, proof that his fighting spirit remained unbroken. And he wanted to say goodbye to his troublesome younger brother, even if his voice would never reach him.

"…I'm sorry."

The words had barely left Jin Mukyung's lips when—

KABOOOOOM!

The sky and earth shook.

His world, dark and hazy until then, turned blue-white. The flash falling toward his head changed course and swept sideways.

Toward the terrible heat that had arrived faster than light, outrunning even the thunder of its arrival.

No—toward the spear carrying that heat.

Wooooom.

The wind vanished. The air stood still.

Two currents of qi met. In that instant, they enveloped everything within dozens of zhang,[3535] then swelled.

KRAAAAAASH!

A tremendous shock wave tore across the gorge, its roar deafening.

Lying in the deep pit, Jin Mukyung reached out on instinct. He held the unconscious Cheol Mubaek and Wipeng with all his strength and watched the corpses of people and horses, along with countless fragments of rock, fly in every direction as if caught in a storm.

Amid the blinding light that engulfed everything around him, he could just make out someone's back.

Jin Mukyung coughed up dark-red blood. A thought struck him.

Perhaps he was already dead. Perhaps his lingering attachment to life was making him see things even now.

But…

No.

Everything he saw, heard, and felt was too vivid to belong to the dead.

The stinging pain in his skin where the rock fragments had scraped past. The muscles screaming throughout his body. The blood surging from his insides, twisted by severe Internal Injury.

And, finally, the familiar voice that reached his ears.

"What are you throwing up for? Did you drink too much last night?"

Jin Mukyung's body went rigid.

His eyes flew wide, a storm raging in their depths.

There was no mistaking it. This wasn't a hallucination. He wasn't hearing things.

[3535] A zhang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten chi, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

This was…

"I'd pat you on the back, but, well, the situation's a little tricky."

The voice came through clearly as the roar died away.

In the fading light, he could see him.

That infuriating voice alone was enough to make Jin Mukyung want to raise a fist. That wastrel's back had, at some point, grown broader and sturdier than his own.

"You…!"

Where had the strength come from?

Jin Mukyung squeezed out a voice rough as scraping metal and raised his hand. Though his fingers shook like leaves, he reached toward his only younger brother's robe.

Rustle.

The sound of fabric brushing against something was so faint he had to strain to hear it.

Perhaps it was the wind, not Jin Mukyung's hand, that touched the edge of the tattered robe.

But that was enough.

What he wanted to convey was more than a touch. It was a desperate wish for his brother to protect everyone.

Thud.

His hand fell limply. His whole body went slack.

At last, the pathetic older brother, having spent every last bit of his strength, lost consciousness.

Before him stood his wastrel younger brother, returned after two years away. A dozen zhang[3536] from him stood an unfamiliar, graying middle-aged man, watching him with a dark, steady gaze.

"I have one question."

His eyes blazed with flame. His voice, by contrast, was cold as ice.

"Did you beat up my hyung?"[3537]

The wastrel had returned.

As a dragon whose roar shook the heavens.

Beyond his low voice rose the tearful cheers of the people of Shanxi.

Not long ago, someone told me not to carry everything alone.

To trust them a little more.

[3536] A zhang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten chi, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[3537] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for his older brother or an older male he is close to.

Now I knew they'd been right.

I could tell the moment I reached the battlefield.

Blood was everywhere. Limbs torn from bodies I couldn't identify lay among countless corpses of people and horses. They had piled into small hills that filled the narrow gorge.

Most of the dead were nomads.

The enemy had outnumbered the people of Shanxi by at least two to one. They'd been badly outmatched in fighting strength, too. But they hadn't given in.

No. They'd fought back with every bit of strength they had.

The Imperial Army. The martial artists. Even ordinary people who probably hadn't learned a single move of martial arts.

And Jin Mukyung.

They did everything they could. Even when it meant overcoming their fear of death.

I knew how hard it was for the weak to stand against the strong.

And I'd taken Jin Mukyung's wish to heart. There could be no more sacrifices like theirs.

Wooooom. BOOM!

I reached out. With a thunderous crash, the spear buried deep in the cliff twisted like a living creature and flew toward me.

White Flame trembled faintly in my grasp, back from its brief journey.

The blue-white flames coiling around its blade lit the pitch-black darkness and heated the cold night air as they surged toward the enemy before me.

> System Lv.??? Murong Baek

A graying, middle-aged man stood before me, gripping a dark spear much like the charging spears the nomads used.

I'd be lying if I said the System window I read with my razor-sharp Qi Sense hadn't caught me off guard. But the reality before my eyes was the truth.

I looked at the Family Head of the Murong Family, a man I'd heard of but never met.

Another blade Dark Heaven had hidden in the vast forest of the Central Plains' Murim.

The North Heaven Demon Lord.

"I asked you. Did you beat up my hyung?"[3538]

The North Heaven Demon Lord was silent for a moment.

"Well, now."

[3538] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for his older brother or an older male he is close to.

His gaze swept over me, and he gave a small sigh at the arrival of an uninvited guest.

“This complicates things. In more ways than one.”

I bet it was. In more ways than one.

I lifted my spearhead, ready to strike at any moment.

“Why so troubled? You’re making me worry.”

Why the Family Head of the Murong Family had become Dark Heaven’s lackey, or when, didn’t matter to me right now.

I had only one thing to do: take down Murong Baek, without a doubt the North Heaven Demon Lord, and the nomad behind him, standing there with a thoroughly stiff expression.

“So why not just crack your skull while we’re at it? Then it won’t hurt anymore.”

Step.

The North Heaven Demon Lord took a step forward and answered calmly.

“That’s a treatment I’ve never heard of.”

“I know more about medicine than you’d think. I picked up a thing or two watching the Divine Physician.”

“Maybe. Even so, I suspect that method would be a problem.”

The North Heaven Demon Lord looked at me with a clear gaze that seemed to see through everything, then added:

“Especially in your current condition.”

I wanted to deny it, but he was right.

I’d paid a price for crossing ten thousand li[3539] without proper sleep, meals, or time to circulate my qi.

So I answered without hesitation.

“Yeah. You’re right.”

Step.

The footsteps that had been steadily closing the distance suddenly stopped. The North Heaven Demon Lord furrowed his brow as he looked at me.

“What did you say?”

“I said you’re right. Honestly, like this, it’d be tough. Really tough.”

“What are you—”

His voice trailed off. I shrugged at the North Heaven Demon Lord, who was staring at me as if I were crazy.

“So I brought someone I know along while I was at it.”

Before the North Heaven Demon Lord could grasp what I meant, two sharp whistles swept through the air.

[3539] In this Chinese setting, a li is about 500 m (0.311 mi); ten thousand li is about 5,000 km (3,107 mi).

Chapter 971

Human senses provide far more information than you might imagine.

That was especially true of martial artists, whose five senses were incomparably sharper than those of ordinary people. Living by the law of the jungle, they honed those senses through brutal training until they could detect things happening far beyond what the naked eye could see.

Just as the North Heaven Demon Lord did now.

“So I brought someone I know along while I was at it.”

Jin Taekyung, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon.

Despite the overwhelming force of his arrival, the young upstart looked plainly exhausted. But the moment the North Heaven Demon Lord heard his easygoing voice, a red warning light went on in his head.

A title and a name sprang to mind.

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

A giant who stood astride the orthodox and unorthodox factions. An old monster of Mount Jiuhua. And the master who had taken the wastrel Third Young Master of the Jin Family of Taiyuan as his Disciple.

The North Heaven Demon Lord’s eyes widened.

If that’s the case…

He was certain something had gone wrong. He didn’t know when or where, but it had.

Not every plan went exactly as intended. Still, Jin Taekyung and Jeok Cheongang were not supposed to be here.

Information leaked.

But he never got as far as wondering who had leaked it, or how.

More precisely, he wasn’t given the chance.

Whoosh! Whoooooom!

One sound was faint and swift. The other swept in like a furious gale.

The two streaks of sound reached him through senses that had gone beyond the five and into the sixth. The North Heaven Demon Lord furrowed his brow.

Not one. Two.

That mattered even more than the direction they had come from: the cliffs on either side, not the ground ahead.

KABOOOOOM!

A crash rang out from atop the cliffs, more than thirty zhang[3540] high. Horrific screams mingled with it.

[3540] A zhang is a traditional unit of length, here about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Thirty zhang is about 91 m (300 ft).

It sounded like thunder.

Thunder that swallowed someone's life and summoned an untimely shower.

Drip. Drip-drip.

Beside the North Heaven Demon Lord, Jamukha stood silently looking up at the darkened cliff. Then he felt something hot land on his face.

Red, sticky blood.

"…!"

The corners of Jamukha's mouth trembled. The North Heaven Demon Lord's gaze darkened.

They both knew what it meant.

Annihilation.

The nomads they had sent up the cliff at considerable cost were gone. In a span too brief to call even a moment, every one of them had been killed or captured.

What mattered most to the North Heaven Demon Lord was the identity of the two monsters who had swept the cliff clear so quickly.

"One of them is obviously your master. Who's the other?"

At his dry question, the young monster—still a little green—put on a stern expression.

"Now, now. You should figure it out for yourself. What kind of upbringing did you have, trying to peek at the answer sheet at your age?"

For a moment, the North Heaven Demon Lord wanted to crack open Jin Taekyung's skull and take a look inside. But the monsters on the cliff would not even let him take a step.

Shwaa!

The narrow gorge lit up. The North Heaven Demon Lord swung the spear in his hand without hesitation, striking a streak of light hurtling through the air.

BOOM!

The crash was far too loud to have come from two blades meeting.

The flash ricocheted from the impact and buried itself deep in the ground. The North Heaven Demon Lord frowned as he recognized it.

"A charging spear?"

There was no doubt. It was an utterly ordinary charging spear of the sort the steppe nomads used.

Yet the strike had been so swift he could hardly believe someone had simply thrown it.

It was as if the spear had been shot like an arrow.

Wait. Could it be…?

The North Heaven Demon Lord looked up.

Just then, moonlight slipped through a break in the clouds, revealing a woman holding a bow so enormous it could have been mistaken for a long spear.

"…The Bow Saint."

The words left his lips like a groan.

At the same moment, flashes rained down again.

KABOOOM!

The bowstring moved at dazzling speed, each release ringing through the gorge. The Bow Saint fired a dozen or so charging spears as lightly as arrows, then slowly drew back the string.

Wooooom.

Space trembled.

Brilliant qi gathered along a silver line formed from internal energy, taking the shape of an arrow. Then it shot forth, charged with immense power.

Not toward the North Heaven Demon Lord, but toward other enemies.

FWOOSH!

The deep darkness tore open.

Everyone on the battlefield could see that dazzling, destructive flash.

The people of Shanxi, hacking their way through the enemies in the gorge with hoarse, unrelenting battle cries.

The nomads dying helplessly at their hands.

And the martial artists of the Hebei Peng Family, fighting desperately in the broad basin beyond the gorge while surrounded by nomads and the Murong Family.

"What in the world is that…?"

The Keshik centurion had only just spotted the dozen or so streaks of light raining down from the sky. He had no idea the bewildered words leaving his lips would be his last.

Nor that this would be the last sight he and hundreds of his comrades saw in this world.

KABOOOOOM!

The earth turned over with a terrifying crash.

Arms and legs flew up through fountains of blood, along with pieces of flesh and organs too mangled to recognize. They scattered in every direction.

Krrrsh. Splatter.

Blood and flesh pattered down onto the ground, their late arrival ringing in everyone's ears.

Peng Cheolyeong, Family Head of the Hebei Peng Family and the Iron Blood Saber, blinked blankly. The Murong Family's unexpected betrayal had left him surrounded on all sides and covered in blood.

What just happened?

He had been fighting dozens of enemies alone with his back to the gorge. He hadn’t seen a thing.

He had only sensed the sky brighten. A chill had run down his spine, and his hand had stopped on instinct.

And… that was all.

He shut his eyes against the brilliant light stabbing into them. When he opened them again, the enemies who had filled the space around him were gone.

No. To be precise, they were still there.

Just no longer in shapes that could be called human.

Some had lost their upper bodies. Others had limbs torn away.

“Ugh—aaah!”

“Graaaah!”

The body feels pain first, but the brain is what recognizes it.

As the survivors finally grasped the unbelievable reality, they let out desperate screams. Unlike the hundreds killed by the flash, those lucky enough to survive writhed in pain.

Before their horrific screams could die away, the sky lit up once more.

FWOOSH.

In that moment, Peng Cheolyeong understood.

That dazzling beam of light—something he would normally have stopped to stare at—meant death.

And that death was not meant for him or the martial artists of the Hebei Peng Family.

“Attack!”

Fear is contagious. Hope catches fire.

With the flash lighting up the blood- and corpse-covered basin behind them, the martial artists of the Hebei Peng Family surged forward, tearing apart the encirclement that had already crumbled.

Their fierce cries rang out across the battlefield, loud enough to echo all the way into the depths of the narrow gorge.

“Sounds nice. Not for you, though.”

The North Heaven Demon Lord silently watched Jin Taekyung’s smiling face.

For all the mischief in the young bastard’s voice, his eyes were dark and solemn. Reflected in them, the North Heaven Demon Lord saw his own face, stiff with tension.

The Bow Saint.

He had not anticipated her presence. She was a ghost from a past too distant to appear here.

“So that’s why you were so relaxed.”

After a brief silence, the North Heaven Demon Lord spoke again, the broad outline of what had happened finally falling into place.

“So it was the Imperial Palace.”

The Bow Saint’s appearance brought the scattered clues together.

Why Jin Taekyung had been able to come here. Whether Dark Heaven’s plan centered on the Imperial Capital had succeeded. And where the Bow Saint had taken refuge after vanishing without a trace.

“But how did you find out so quickly?”

“Your friend told me,” Jin Taekyung answered.

“My friend?”

“The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord.”

“…!”

“You should’ve been friendlier with him. Had meals together more often, swapped catalog numbers[3541] like proper members of the martial world. Well, I’m just glad I found out before it was too late.”

Jin Taekyung shrugged with an irritating look on his face and added, “When you see him in a bit, thank him for me. He deserved to die, but at the end, I found myself a little concerned about him.”

The North Heaven Demon Lord understood what he meant and smiled bitterly.

“I’ll have to politely decline.”

“What, were you two that unfriendly? Was there a love triangle or something?”

“Crazy bastard. Does your tongue ever rest?”

“I was about to stop anyway. I can move a little now.”

The smile faded from Jin Taekyung’s lips.

He had already shaken off the weakness left by the strike he’d launched with all his strength to save Jin Mukyung, exhausted as he was.

“Thanks for waiting while I caught my breath.”

The North Heaven Demon Lord looked at him with a subdued gaze.

He had not given Jin Taekyung that time willingly. Someone else had forced him to.

“Enough of this. Why don’t you come out, Fire King?”

At his words to the empty air, a figure blended into the darkness drifted gently down.

“What a shame. If you’d taken so much as one step, I’d have burned your limbs off.”

“I wonder if you really could.”

[3541] The Korean term pumbeon means an adult video’s catalog number. Swapping numbers implies trading recommendations.

The North Heaven Demon Lord gripped his spear at an angle. Unprecedented qi surged along its blade—nothing like what Jeok Cheongang remembered from their encounter on a battlefield long ago.

“You’ve grown bold, haven’t you? A mere pup, speaking to this old man like an equal and even daring to act tough.”

Jeok Cheongang grinned, baring his teeth. White hellfire rippled over both his outstretched hands.

“When did you join forces with them?”

“What a strange thing. The two of you, who were like cats and dogs, asking me the same question here today.”

The smile vanished from Jeok Cheongang’s face.

He knew whom the North Heaven Demon Lord meant. He knew, too, that the man’s life hung by a thread.

“…My Disciple owes that Peng bastard a great debt. I’ll repay it with your life.”

“You can both go together—to the afterlife.”

The North Heaven Demon Lord answered calmly and tossed what he held into his mouth.

Slip.

A red pill dissolved against his tongue. At the same moment, Jin Taekyung’s spearhead flashed behind him.

Chapter 972

Jeok Cheongang and Jin Taekyung.

Jin Taekyung and Jeok Cheongang.

The moment it began, Master and Disciple moved as one.

As their heat closed in on him in a single step, fierce enough to set his whole body ablaze, the North Heaven Demon Lord realized once more:

He had made the right choice.

To make this plan—which had gone wildly off course from what he'd expected—succeed, he had to use everything he'd been given as quickly as possible.

Fwoosh!

Hot. Everything before his eyes turned red.

As the world slowed, the North Heaven Demon Lord felt a heat that seemed to burn through his entire body.

But it wasn't only the power of the Fire Gate Divine Technique, passed down for more than three hundred years, that made him feel that way.

KABOOOOOM!

A tremendous roar, audible only to him, reverberated from deep within his body.

At the same time, the qi throughout his body surged.

Lava-hot energy raced through hundreds of acupoints, swelling and surging as if it might burst at any moment.

A colossal wave of power from a strange artifact he had never once used was tearing down part of the high, sturdy wall that had stood in his way.

Ah…!

The North Heaven Demon Lord groaned amid overwhelming pain and ecstasy.

Everything in his reddened field of vision—even things he couldn't see—felt slow and vivid.

The wind. The air. The qi within it.

And the two streams of flame rushing toward him, smashing everything in their path to pieces.

So this is what it feels like. This is what it is.

The North Heaven Demon Lord thought.

He felt he could almost understand the world the Heavenly Demon had seen as he ruled over the Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples with martial prowess that reached the heavens and sought to conquer the world. The world the Martial God had seen when he defeated him and brought peace to it.

Perhaps that was why he could smile, even amid heat fierce enough to melt his Body-Protecting Qi.

Whoooom.

Perhaps that was why their movements looked so slow and weak.

Is that all you've got?

The view changed depending on where you stood.

Seized by the sensation that the Temporary Strength Pill had carried him over the summit and above the clouds, the North Heaven Demon Lord looked down on them with disdain.

His gaze swept over the entire battlefield beyond the narrow gorge, taking in even the old monster and the young Divine Dragon—men whose names alone could make the world tremble.

At the same time, he flung out both arms with a speed and power he had imagined countless times, yet had always felt as distant as a dream.

Fwoooosh!

Space warped under the unprecedented energy. A spearhead and a fist, their forms obscured beneath dark crimson Force, shot in different directions.

Toward the foolish descendants of the Fire Gate Clan, who had failed to recognize the power of an absolute being.

Die.

In the North Heaven Demon Lord's red-hot vision, Jeok Cheongang and Jin Taekyung stared wide-eyed at the overwhelming power before them.

Dark crimson Force swept toward them like a wave.

KABOOOOOM!

The entire gorge shook. The shock wave swelled and exploded, sweeping everything within a radius of more than ten zhang[3542].

No—seized and swallowed would have been better words for it.

The blinding flash and thunderous roar robbed everyone in the gorge of sight and hearing. Everything within reach of the shock wave lost its shape and vanished.

Rrrrrumble!

Part of the cliff collapsed, unable to withstand the aftershock.

The pools of blood and countless corpses scattered all around had vanished into dust. Amid what remained, the North Heaven Demon Lord drew a slow breath.

He shuddered at the power still welling up from deep inside him after that outburst—and at the fact that he had unleashed a calamity like a natural disaster with his own two hands.

Then he turned his head toward somewhere beyond the choking silence and clouds of dust.

No—he sensed them.

[3542] A zhang is a traditional Chinese length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

The presences that had survived this horrific disaster, not yet entirely extinguished.

“You managed to survive. As you should have.”

His voice was calm and relaxed.

The Temporary Strength Pill had given him martial prowess far beyond what he’d possessed only moments ago. Still, he had never expected to win with a single strike.

His opponent was the old monster of Mount Jiuhua, returned stronger than he’d been fifty years ago. And his Disciple had grown beyond a young prodigy into a towering figure who was leaving his mark on this vast world.

Even so, the North Heaven Demon Lord could remain at ease. He knew better than anyone the scale of the power throbbing within him, ready to burst.

Even if someone else intervened, that wouldn’t change.

As someone did now.

Whoom! KABOOM!

In the blink of an eye, a mass of concentrated energy struck the spearhead the North Heaven Demon Lord had swung, bouncing off from an unseen blind spot.

The North Heaven Demon Lord looked up at the figure standing atop a fractured, crumbling cliff more than thirty zhang[3543] high. A faint smile touched his lips.

“You’ve had a rough time, Bow Saint.”

Deflecting that attack confirmed it for him once more: his martial prowess now surpassed that of the Three Saints.

He had set foot, if only by one step, into the realm of those called the Invincible—or the absolute.

KRAKAKAKANG!

A mass of light packed with such tremendous power it could hardly be called an arrow.

The North Heaven Demon Lord deflected a barrage of them, each powerful enough to kill even a skilled Peak master with one strike. His smile deepened.

“You should’ve come a little slower. If you’d taken your time and saved some strength, a lot might have turned out differently.”

The distance from Zhejiang Province, where the Imperial Capital stood, to Shanxi Province was well over a few thousand li[3544].

And for those three to have crossed that distance and appeared here without catching the North Heaven Demon Lord’s attention meant they’d moved faster than a messenger eagle or a courier.

[3543] A zhang is a traditional Chinese length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[3544] A Chinese li is approximately 500 m (0.311 mi).

They had rushed here without sparing even a moment, let alone taking proper rest before a battle.

That guess was enough to convince the North Heaven Demon Lord that victory was certain.

“Unfortunately, it’s too late to turn back now.”

Shhhh…

Dark crimson energy rose from his whole body like heat haze.

As the Bow Saint’s attacks bounced off his densely concentrated Force, exhilaration swept through him more intensely than ever before.

An absolute being.

Here, today, he was the absolute being.

The Fire Gate Clan’s Master and Disciple, who must be lying beyond that cloud of dust, groaning, could not stand against him now. Neither could the Bow Saint.

They were all exhausted, while his power continued to well up without end.

Crack.

A deep rumble spread from the tip of his foot as he stepped forward lightly.

The colossal power had frozen everyone in the gorge.

An unprecedented energy no one had ever imagined a human could possess expanded his dantian and raced through hundreds of acupoints.

The North Heaven Demon Lord laughed aloud.

It feels like I could do anything right now.

No—he could.

And just as his senses stretched out to envelop the entire gorge—

“Old Master, that bastard’s laughing.”

“Leave him be. He must think he’s the Lord of Heaven just because he took a Temporary Strength Pill.”

The North Heaven Demon Lord’s smile vanished. Two voices were conversing through Sound Transmission inside the dust cloud that had yet to settle.

“Uh, he’s not laughing anymore.”

“He was ugly to begin with, but now he’s scowling. His face looks like shit.”

“Why would you say it like that? My little guy is handsome and looks plenty clever.”

“All right, I get it. Take your damn hand off your waistband right now, before I turn you into a eunuch with one palm strike.”

The North Heaven Demon Lord’s gaze darkened. Confusion and shock unmistakable in his eyes, he looked in one direction.

“Uh, he’s looking this way.”

“Must’ve just gotten lucky. This old man knows at a glance.”

“We need to jump him all at once. What if he’s spotted us? Try moving to the side.”

“I was about to. Stop pushing me. How dare you touch this old man’s body?”

“That’s not a hand.”

“Huh?”

At that moment, the North Heaven Demon Lord’s mouth twitched.

“Come out.”

At the low words that slipped between his lips, a breathless silence descended.

Seemed to.

“He says come out. And he’s looking right at us.”

“Didn’t I tell you? He definitely guessed.”

“I don’t think so. Wait, can he hear our Sound Transmission?”

“Just because he took some pill? There’s no way that bastard can do that. I’ll stake that Hyuk bastard’s balls on it.”

Tap.

The last thread of the North Heaven Demon Lord’s patience broke. A cold voice slipped through his clenched teeth.

“What a shame. I don’t know who he is, but he’s going to lose his balls.”

At last, he received the answer he’d been waiting for.

Poom!

The dust cloud split as if cut by a sword. Jeok Cheongang emerged in tattered clothes, brushed the dirt from his shoulder, and replied, “That’s fine. Just in case, I didn’t stake my own.”

Behind the Master, who had said something so embarrassing with an unnecessarily solemn expression, his Disciple—several heads taller—spoke with an uneasy look.

“Why stake the balls of someone who isn’t even here? You won’t need them anyway. You might as well stake your own.”

“Isn’t that true of you, too?”

“Hey, that’s crossing a line. Why would you say—”

KABOOM!

A thunderous crash swallowed the rest of his words.

A moment later came a cough.

“Cough. Jeez, look at all this fine dust. Wouldn’t want anyone thinking you’re not a Chinese bastard.”

“Ahem. Stop making a fuss. You’ll bring shame on the Fire Gate Clan.”

“My God, is there even more shame left to bring?”

At the sight of Jin Taekyung and Jeok Cheongang standing there unharmed, the North Heaven Demon Lord’s gaze darkened.

How…?

He hadn’t attacked at full power, but they had evaded a strike backed by more than seventy percent of his strength. They clearly still had plenty in reserve.

The North Heaven Demon Lord had no choice but to admit that, at some point, he’d come to trust too much in the power he’d been given.

And that he had underestimated the enemies before him.

“Jamukha.”

At his quiet call, the hunting dog he had commanded for decades answered.

“Give your command, my lord.”

“We won’t stand by any longer. Change the plan.”

“You mean…”

“I will not tolerate any more interference. Before things go wrong, use every force we have and wipe them out at once.”

Jamukha understood exactly what the North Heaven Demon Lord meant by using every last bit of their strength.

Today, the Thunderbolt Saber King and the Hebei Peng Family had been invited guests on this battlefield. The three Supreme Peak masters who had appeared unexpectedly, however, were uninvited.

The die had been cast. They had to secure victory before the whole game was overturned.

As the North Heaven Demon Lord had just done, they would use every means at their disposal.

“As you command.”

With that curt reply, Jamukha pulled a signal flare from his robes and yanked its cord without hesitation.

Fwish! Fwish! Fwish!

Smoke shot up into the night.

The Bow Saint swiftly fired arrows of light that swept away most of it, but even she could do nothing about the wisps that scattered through the air.

Poom! Poom! Poom!

Fireworks blossomed across the blackened sky.

Obeying his master’s command, Jamukha had let the countless hunting dogs under him off their leashes. Now he tipped into his mouth the Temporary Strength Pill the North Heaven Demon Lord had stopped him from taking earlier.

Beyond the gorge, the Keshiks who had just seen the signal did the same.

Swish. Shhhh…

Red heat haze began to rise across the battlefield.

Chapter 973

The word unavoidable applied to everyone.

To farmers who faced drought before the harvest. To the sick who lay in bed, waiting for death to draw closer by the moment.

And to a woman whose astonishing power made it hard to believe she was human like them.

I should have stopped them.

The Bow Saint let out a low groan.

High atop a sheer cliff, she stared down at a group spewing streams of ghastly blood-red light.

Shhk! Krrrunch!

Every one of them had bloodshot eyes. A thick mist of blood gathered in the wake of their spears and blades as they advanced without hesitation.

On a battlefield where tens of thousands clashed, two hundred people were only a handful. But the Temporary Strength Pills had pushed each of them beyond their limits, making them more dangerous than any other enemy there.

Especially to the Hebei Peng Family's fighters, of whom only about two thousand remained.

Graaaah!

A harrowing scream rang through the night air.

As the enemy finally broke the Hebei Peng Family's vaunted Linked Tyrant King Formation, the Bow Saint lowered her drawn bow and bit her lip.

They were not only dangerous. They were clever.

After suffering heavy losses from several of her attacks, they had immediately spread out and plunged into the heart of her allies' formation to guard against any more.

If I keep attacking like this, I'll hit our own people too.

Even apart from the two hundred or so Keshiks, she had more than enough enemies to deal with.

The vast steppe army seemed endless, no matter how many she killed. The battle had already gone on for several shichen[3545], and the steppe forces had surely suffered far greater losses than the people of Shanxi. Yet nearly twenty thousand of them remained.

If she held the high ground and rained arrows down until she had no strength left, she could inflict tremendous damage. That much was obvious.

But she had only one choice.

[3545] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours.

To gain one thing was to lose another. If she kept attacking, she could bring down countless enemies—but by then, every last fighter of the Hebei Peng Family would be dead.

Her mind was made up. There was no need to hesitate.

I have to go. I have to do it myself.

Click.

She twisted her enormous bow with a sharp wrench, revealing two strangely shaped curved blades.

Their cool grips settled into her hands. The Bow Saint kicked off the cliff and soared into the sky.

Whoosh.

The cold night wind swept over her, setting her long hair streaming behind her.

She stepped through the empty air toward the ground as though descending an invisible staircase. Then she turned to look behind her.

The narrow gorge lay hidden in darkness now, its depths awash with waves of powerful qi. To someone there, she said silently:

Survive. Then prove yourself once more.

The Chosen One.

The Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung.

His name weighed heavily on her heart as the Bow Saint plunged toward the distant ground.

Shwaa!

The two curved blades in her hands became razor-sharp winds, carving through space.

The Bow Saint was gone.

She had crossed to the other battlefield beyond the gorge—not to help Jeok Cheongang and me, but to aid the Hebei Peng Family's fighters.

I watched her disappear across the distant sky without feeling hurt that she'd left. Jeok Cheongang met my eyes and simply nodded, his expression calm.

Someone else here felt differently, of course.

"I expected as much, but it still amazes me."

The North Heaven Demon Lord spoke up without warning and went on without waiting for a reply.

"Why do you people always make such foolish choices? Every single time."

He shook his head with a hollow laugh. I answered calmly.

“Of course you’d think that. Bastards like you wouldn’t understand even if you died and came back dozens of times.”

The North Heaven Demon Lord thought of his followers as nothing more than pawns to secure victory. He could never understand that all of us here were risking our lives not to kill someone, but to protect someone.

Or that this small difference was the most important measure of what separated the righteous from the demonic.

“What a rotten age. The Murong Family Head goes and stabs someone in the back, then starts popping pills the moment things get a little rough. Right?”

Jeok Cheongang answered me.

“Live long enough, and you’ll meet things worse than beasts. Creatures wearing human skin and pretending to be people, hiding their black hearts behind pretty words and smiles.”

His voice was cold. His eyes burned.

At that moment, all his anger was directed at the North Heaven Demon Lord.

“I used to think you just had a sly streak… If I’d known it would come to this, I should have killed you back then.”

To me, he was the North Heaven Demon Lord. To Jeok Cheongang, he was Murong Baek.

Unlike me, Jeok Cheongang had known him. They had once fought alongside each other as comrades. Now their gazes met across the air.

“Why didn’t you, Fire King? That was your first and last chance to kill me.”

Jeok Cheongang’s eyes darkened at the mocking reply.

“First and last? Do you truly believe that?”

“You don’t?”

Rrrrumble.

The space around us shook as though an earthquake had struck. A mighty aura rose from the North Heaven Demon Lord, pressing down on everything around him.

An unprecedented surge of qi, rougher and greater than Jeok Cheongang’s.

“I’ll show you now. You’ll never get a second chance.”

His low words reached everyone’s ears, and the North Heaven Demon Lord vanished.

Swish.

He moved faster than the faint whistle of air left in his wake.

But I could see him, if only faintly. No—I could sense him.

The North Heaven Demon Lord shot forward faster than sound. His spearhead cut through space, and his loyal hunting dog rushed after its master.

Shwaa!

A belated gust of wind followed the descending spearhead.

I swung White Flame up toward the flash driving at my upper body.

BANG!

The roar hardly sounded as though it had come from two spears colliding.

Tremendous pressure traveled down White Flame's shaft to my toes. The ground split into a spiderweb of cracks.

Beyond the spearhead I had stopped, I met the North Heaven Demon Lord's eyes for an instant. I could almost hear the question in them.

How can a brat like you…?

I knew that look all too well.

The eyes gone wide. The question mark in them.

And every enemy I'd faced had found an exclamation point in its place before that question had even faded.

Just like now.

Ka-drrrk!

I gritted my teeth and drove my spear shaft upward.

The muscles throughout my body swelled as if they were about to burst. A power no one but me could understand—supernatural powers—surged up and shook off the tremendous pressure bearing down on the spearhead.

KABOOOOOM!

The North Heaven Demon Lord's eyes widened as the force drove him back.

That was when the hunting dog, arriving a step behind its master, bared its teeth.

Shwaek!

Before the dust kicked up by the shock wave could rise, a blade split through it.

The curved blade flashed through space toward the crown of my head. Just as it was about to strike, the air behind me blazed with heat.

Fwoosh.

A terrible heat. Merely touching it felt as though it would melt flesh and bone and burn even the soul.

Flame Divine Palm.

The instant I felt that familiar energy swell, I ducked without hesitation.

Paaang!

A mass of concentrated flame skimmed past the back of my head.

I looked up again, the back of my head burning as though scorched. The old nomad who had brought his curved blade down like a wild beast was already hurtling backward.

Krrrunch!

His feet gouged deep furrows in the ground. He was driven back nearly three zhang[3546] before Jeok Cheongang sniffed in his direction.

"Damn it. I was wondering where that horse shit smell was coming from. Turns out it was this barbarian."

"…!"

"That's quite a face you're making. What, now that you've had a taste of the heat, are you homesick for a steppe full of horse shit and weeds?"

Style may be temporary, but class is forever.

The old nomad's face went rigid under Jeok Cheongang's inspired verbal assault. Then a low voice rang out.

"Still the same. That tongue of yours still knows how to get under people's skin."

The remark was aimed at Jeok Cheongang, but the North Heaven Demon Lord's gaze was fixed on me.

Jeok Cheongang tapped my shoulder.

"When it comes to running his mouth, this brat is several steps ahead of this old man."

"He's surpassed his Master in all the wrong ways."

Jeok Cheongang gave a quiet laugh.

"Come now. You know it isn't just that."

The North Heaven Demon Lord said nothing. He looked at me as though he couldn't make sense of what he was seeing.

Honestly, that was only natural.

It wasn't just him. Anyone would have felt the same.

The Blood Lord, the Western Heaven Demon Lord, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord—and the other enemies I'd faced.

None of them had been able to make sense of me. None had found an answer, and the question had only grown with time.

No. More accurately…

I'd gotten that much stronger.

Looking back, every battle I'd fought over the last two years had been hard. My enemies were always strong, and I was always weaker than they were. I'd had to struggle with everything I had just to survive. Just to win.

But then, one day, I suddenly realized something.

I kept finding myself at death's door not because I was weak, but because stronger enemies kept appearing.

And somewhere along the way, I'd started catching up to them.

[3546] A zhang is a traditional length unit. Three zhang are roughly 9–10 m (30–33 ft).

The Head Elder, whose martial prowess had been so mighty. Pung Yang, whom I'd barely managed to defeat in a joint attack with Jin Mukyung.

The Demon Lords and Demon Empresses of Dark Heaven, each of them a nightmare in their own right.

Whenever I thought back on those battles that had brought me close to death, one thought would come to me:

Back then—if I'd moved like this, I could've won so much more easily.

Now I understood.

What I'd taken for regret and lingering misgivings was proof that I'd grown. It wasn't just a change in the numbers on the System window. I'd grown as a martial artist.

And maybe I was still growing, even now.

"Hey. This is just something I'm personally curious about."

I spoke up out of nowhere, then carefully put my question to the North Heaven Demon Lord.

Like a student asking a professor about a difficult assignment.

"Just now, wouldn't kicking you in the balls have been a lot better than knocking your spear up?"

The professor's face twisted beyond description.

Chapter 974

Sometimes, your true feelings just don’t get through to the other person.

It was sad to cause a misunderstanding I’d never intended, but there was nothing I could do about it.

We weren’t going to settle this by talking anyway.

“That mouth of yours…”

The words died before he could finish, leaving only a breath that scattered into the air.

The professor—or rather, the North Heaven Demon Lord—looked dizzy with rage. His face twisted as he steadied his breathing.

Since he seemed to be struggling, I spoke for him.

“I’ll tear it open.”

“What?”

“That’s what you were going to say, right? I’ve heard it plenty of times. I know.”

The North Heaven Demon Lord stared at me, momentarily at a loss for words, then clenched his teeth.

“Shut up.”

“Come on. A man has to say what’s on his mind. Even a shameless pill-popping bastard.”

“I said shut up.”

“But I’ve heard that line so many times, it feels a little stale. ‘I’ll tear your mouth open so you can never wag that unruly tongue again.‘ Doesn’t that have more flavor?”

“Words truly are wasted on you.”

“Force won’t work either. The guys who said that to me and died could line up in formation, count off, and circle the Murim Alliance training ground twice.”

Jeok Cheongang, standing beside me, added, “For the record, mine would circle it more than ten times.”

“That’s because you’ve lived a lot longer than me.”

“If you don’t like it, live a long, healthy life yourself.”

“You’ve lived a long, sickly life. Don’t you remember? When I first met you…”

Fwoosh!

A sharp whistle swallowed the rest of my words.

I ducked on instinct, without a moment’s hesitation. A dagger shot past overhead at the speed of a streak of light and slammed into the cliff face.

KABOOM!

It struck with the force of a cannonball.

But no matter how much power an attack carried, it didn't matter if it missed.

I brushed off the grit thrown up by the shock wave and stared wide-eyed at the North Heaven Demon Lord, who had thrown the dagger.

"Wow. That almost hit me."

"…!"

"Those pills really do make you strong. Old Master, I'd never beat him one-on-one."

Jeok Cheongang frowned. "Was that even a question? Of course you wouldn't. Keep going as you have been, though, and in another year or two at the earliest, you might have a chance."

Only a year or two.

Jeok Cheongang knew my past and even my deepest secrets, so it was a fairly reasonable assessment. To someone listening, though, it was an intolerable insult.

"Jamukha."

There was no anger left on the North Heaven Demon Lord's face. At his low voice, the old nomad bowed his head.

"Give your command, my lord."

"Do you remember the promise we made long ago?"

"I have never forgotten it for a single moment."

"Then stake your life on it."

"…!"

"If you survive, I'll give you Hebei along with the vast grasslands. Everything the Peng Family possessed—even their lives—I'll put in your hands."

The old nomad Jamukha's eyelids trembled.

"That is the very reason I have lived until now."

"Then what will you give me?"

"Today's victory, and the head of Jin Taekyung, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon."

"Yes. That is the answer I wanted."

Step. Shhhhh…

With a heavy step, the dark crimson energy that had risen like heat haze gathered into a thick mist.

The two men had finally drawn out every last drop of their strength. Watching them, Jeok Cheongang spoke calmly.

"Taekyung."

"Yes?"

"Do you remember the promise we made long ago?"

I answered without hesitation. "No."

"…"

"And what do you mean, 'long ago'? It's only been two years since we first met."

Jeok Cheongang fell silent for a moment, then sighed.

“Do you have some kind of disease that makes blood gush from your seven apertures[3547] and kills you if you play along at a time like this?”

“What’s the point? We can’t even get our timing right. Better to land another hit on those bastards.”

“Hmm. Hard to argue with that.”

“Just do what you’ve always done. Be the Fire King.”

Jeok Cheongang’s gaze shifted from the North Heaven Demon Lord and Jamukha, who were approaching slowly and cautiously, to me.

“What? Is there something else you want to say?”

“No, nothing much. It just struck me that accepting you as my Disciple was the right choice.”

For a moment, I didn’t know what to say. Then Jeok Cheongang’s quiet voice reached my ear.

“We’ve never made any embarrassing promises to each other, but as always, remember one thing.”

“What should I keep in mind…?”

“This old man is always by your side.”

“…!”

“So don’t do anything stupid like fighting to the death. Even if Yama[3548] comes for you, I’ll kick him in the ass and send him packing.”

The more I thought about it, the stranger it seemed.

People were all made of the same flesh and blood. How could they think so differently?

One person offered another everything he wanted in exchange for his life. Another asked for nothing—he only wanted the other person to survive.

And that was exactly what I wanted to say to Jeok Cheongang, too.

“If I keep that promise, what will you give me?”

Step by step, the two enemies drew closer. I watched the dark crimson mist grow thicker as I spoke, and Jeok Cheongang gave a dry laugh.

“You shameless bastard. Fine, what do you want?”

“Nothing much. You’ve already been sick once, so a long, healthy life is out of the question. Just make sure you live a long, sickly one from now on.”

“A long life at my age, huh? Seems I have a reason to live at least another hundred years.”

Jeok Cheongang laughed heartily, clearly delighted.

[3547] In traditional East Asian usage, the seven apertures are the eyes, ears, nostrils, and mouth.

[3548] Yama is the Buddhist lord of the underworld, associated with judgment of the dead.

Pale light-flames gathered in his outstretched hands. Alongside them, blue-white flames surged over the spearhead of White Flame, burning away the chill of the deep night.

Fwoooosh.

Beyond the darkness melting before those two flames—alike, yet different—

I stepped toward the ominously thick dark crimson mist.

No. We stepped forward together, as if we'd promised to.

Shwaa!

Everyone who faced that mist, red as blood and frighteningly thick, felt a chill sink deep into their spines and stopped.

No. They had no choice but to stop.

Their instincts knew before their minds did.

If I get close, I'll die.

The sight alone was chilling.

The qi hanging thick in the air had become almost tangible. Entering it would be like walking into a forest of blades and spears, ready to slice and tear their bodies apart.

But the greatest reason so many people from Shanxi were held back was the terrifying battle raging inside it.

KABOOM! KABOOOOM!

What could describe the scene better than heaven and earth shaking?

Beyond the mist, writhing like a living creature, four Supreme Peak masters were entangled with one another at the speed of flashes of light.

Without a moment's pause.

Even now.

Shhk!

Force sliced through the hard ground as if it were tofu.

Jeok Cheongang narrowly dodged the North Heaven Demon Lord's strike and clenched his fist.

Pale light-flames surged over the fist of a man whose regained youth had erased his wrinkles.

Fwoosh!

Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

A tremendous blaze erupted from a technique he had brought to the tenth level of mastery through more than a century of training.

It stained the air and shot toward the enemy before him—toward the North Heaven Demon Lord.

KABOOOOOM!

Compressed air exploded in layers.

The ground melted and the cliff walls shook, but at the last instant, the North Heaven Demon Lord's figure blurred and vanished.

Or rather, it vanished from human sight, with all its limitations.

Whoosh.

A tiny, faint whistle slipped quietly into his ear.

But he knew well that movement faster than sound could fool his hearing, too.

Above!

He felt it.

His opponent's presence, plunging down from the unseen space above his head.

And the immense Force riding the spearhead as it thrust forward, erasing the wind in its path.

Poom!

Jeok Cheongang struck out with both palms without hesitation.

The dark crimson mist surrounding them scattered in an instant.

Flame Divine Palm, unleashed at full strength, surged upward as a pillar of fire.

It raced toward an opponent who had tried to hide his presence, but whose immense energy made it impossible to conceal himself completely.

And in the next moment, Jeok Cheongang understood all over again.

With the Temporary Strength Pill's power behind him, the North Heaven Demon Lord could look down on even Jeok Cheongang—who had reached his current realm through several moments of enlightenment—as half a step beneath him.

Shwaa!

The spearhead pierced a single precise point.

The immense Force at its tip split flames that had seemed capable of burning the whole world, and the distance between the two men vanished.

"…!"

Jeok Cheongang's eyes widened at the overwhelming force.

This wasn't a question of enlightenment in the martial arts.

The North Heaven Demon Lord's movements, enhanced to an extreme, made everything possible—along with internal energy so powerful it made Jeok Cheongang wonder if he had drawn out every last bit of his innate qi.

Damn it.

Swallowing the curse rising to his lips, Jeok Cheongang drew on all the internal energy in his body.

He slammed both hands together against the spearhead plunging toward his chest.

Krrrrk!

The spearhead trembled between his palms, pressed together as if in prayer.

Dark crimson Force tore into flesh and bone despite his Body-Protecting Qi. Jeok Cheongang clenched his teeth against the pain.

Crack.

The pain of breaking a molar was nothing beside what came from his hands as they grew more mangled by the second.

Jeok Cheongang swallowed the blood rising in his throat and held fast to the spearhead. The North Heaven Demon Lord bared his teeth in a grin.

“Why not stop now and get some rest? You look exhausted.”

Jeok Cheongang’s reply came through clenched teeth, edged with mockery.

“Right back at you.”

The North Heaven Demon Lord’s eyes darkened.

He could feel throughout his body that Jeok Cheongang wasn’t bluffing.

What kind of monster is this old man?

Crack. Krrrunch.

Though he drove it with all his strength, the spearhead could go no farther.

Jeok Cheongang’s skin was crushed by the Force, but his toes were dug deep into the ground, perfectly still.

The old monster of Mount Jiuhua had returned decades younger—and far stronger than the North Heaven Demon Lord remembered.

Strong enough that even after taking the Temporary Strength Pill, he couldn’t bring him down easily.

But…

It ends here.

The moment that thought formed, the North Heaven Demon Lord twisted the spear shaft with every ounce of strength he had.

This time, even Jeok Cheongang would be unable to bear the pain.

Crack.

At the grisly sound of flesh tearing, Jeok Cheongang’s body shuddered. Then a thunderous shout burst from Jamukha’s lips.

“Jamukha!”

At that instant—

KABOOM! Shhk!

With a thunderous crash, a razor-sharp gust of wind shot toward Jeok Cheongang’s back.

Chapter 975

No matter how well trained a hunting dog was, it couldn't take down a predator on its own.

There was no getting around the difference between what they had been born to be.

But Jamukha was different. Born a predator, he had become a hunting dog to achieve his own ends.

He was a trained beast, with both the strength to face any enemy and the loyalty of a hunting dog.

That was why, the moment he heard his master call, he could spring into action without a second's hesitation.

"Jamukha!"

The signal he'd been waiting for had barely sounded when Jamukha swung his curved blade with all his might.

BOOM!

Two waves of Force collided in midair.

The dark green Force of his blade, made darker and larger by the effects of the Temporary Strength Pill, pushed back the blue-white flames, if only for a moment. Just then, Jamukha's foot shot forward like an arrow.

Whoosh.

His figure blurred.

Using Shifting Form and Position in that fleeting instant, Jamukha became a streak of wind and crossed more than ten jang[3549].

He raced toward the Fire King—a predator more ferocious and powerful than any quarry he'd ever faced.

One strike. One strike is all it takes.

There was near-certainty in Jamukha's movements, and it was no baseless boast.

For more than fifty years, he had pursued speed above all else, honing his martial arts to counter the Hebei Peng Family's overbearing style.

Jamukha had no doubt that even Jin Taekyung, called the Divine Dragon, had his limits. He couldn't make up for all those years of difference.

And besides…

With this power, I can do anything.

Everything had changed. Like a caterpillar shedding a layer and being born anew, he saw the whole world afresh.

[3549] A jang is ten cheok, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

His feet, skimming over the ground, and the beloved weapon gripped in both hands felt lighter than ever.

The Temporary Strength Pill had drawn his power beyond its limits. Even now, that power seethed ceaselessly deep within him.

His sixth sense, awakened beyond the five, let him easily evade even the streak of flame bearing down on him from behind.

Shweeeee!

Jamukha picked up speed and turned his head. A spearhead that had left Jin Taekyung's hand tore through the air, grazed the back of his neck, and buried itself in the cliff face.

KABOOM!

Sharp fragments of rock flew in every direction. Jamukha leaped over the rising cloud of dust and raced on, his figure seeming to erase the wind.

I'll bring him down. No matter what.

Jamukha's resolve wasn't a hunting dog's loyalty to its master.

No—he couldn't have called it loyalty from the start.

It hadn't come from his heart. The other man's strength and his own ambitions had simply come together to force him into submission.

But that was enough.

Even if his loyalty was feigned, the North Heaven Demon Lord had promised him a sure reward. Dark Heaven had enough power to make him king of the steppe and ruler of the north.

And now, Jamukha's mighty downward slash was bringing him one step closer to that grand ambition.

Shwack.

In the slowed world, Jeok Cheongang still had his back to him, seemingly unable to react at all. He remained locked in combat with the North Heaven Demon Lord, his back utterly exposed.

Dark green Force, arriving before its own sound, filled Jamukha's eyes.

It's over.

Jamukha was certain.

No one could dodge this strike.

Even if his opponent was the giant known as the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, the outcome would be the same: death.

But it took only an instant for that certainty, which had risen like an exclamation point, to turn into a question mark.

Fwoosh.

A terrible heat suddenly washed over him from behind.

At the same time, someone's fingertips flashed out and touched Jamukha's long hair, braided into a queue in the custom of the steppe.

No—by the time he felt them touch it, his head was already being wrenched backward.

Grab.

A hand seized his hair with brutal force. His upper body bent back, and his curved blade wavered off course.

Through the sudden pain and shock, Jamukha understood why Jeok Cheongang hadn't even turned his head in the face of such danger.

It wasn't that he couldn't react.

There was no doubt about it.

Jeok Cheongang had known from the beginning.

No—he had trusted him.

His one and only Disciple.

His Disciple's might, something no number of years could measure.

Whoosh!

The dark green Force skimmed past Jeok Cheongang's head by a hair and slashed through empty air.

As Jamukha clenched his teeth against the pain and frustration, a quiet voice reached his ear.

"Nice braid."

"…!"

"Looks easy to rip right off."

Krrk, krrrunch!

The world before Jamukha's eyes turned white.

The pain of having his hair and scalp torn off together drew a silent scream from him. He spun around and swung his curved blade.

Whoooosh!

The dark green Force hadn't died out despite his terrible pain. If anything, it surged more fiercely, tearing through space.

A blade technique perfected over more than half a century in pursuit of ultimate speed.

But Jamukha had no idea.

More precisely, he could never have imagined it.

The strength and speed with which he had subdued the vast steppe in a flash fell short of the enlightenment and rewards Jin Taekyung had gained over the past two years, crossing the line between life and death again and again.

Poom!

Flame Divine Palm.

The tremendous blaze swept in, burning even the air. Jamukha's upper body lurched. Unimaginable heat burned through the acupoints all over his body and ravaged them.

Ah.

As his vision faded, Jamukha swallowed the blood surging up from deep in his dantian.

But even after taking that horrifically powerful strike, he could still feel a spark of hope that hadn't gone out.

The Temporary Strength Pill.

A source of power that kept welling up.

The vitality holding his body together when it should have crumpled long ago.

Not yet. Not yet…!

Jamukha gritted his teeth.

With all his might, he tightened his grip on the hilt as it began to slip from his hand and drove the blade down toward Jin Taekyung's chest.

Ka-drrk, crack!

Two opposing sounds mingled in midair.

And then—

"Ah, that hurts like hell."

Jin Taekyung was drenched in dark red blood and groaning in pain. Staring at him, Jamukha forced out a question.

"How…?"

His voice broke apart like stepping-stones in a stream.

He couldn't understand it.

Setting everything else aside, he genuinely wanted to know.

How had Jin Taekyung blocked that strike?

What kind of sorcery had made red-tinged armor appear over the bare skin showing through his tattered clothes just moments ago?

"This… cough, this doesn't make—"

Krrrunch.

His voice scattered in a silent scream.

Twisting the five fingers he had driven into Jamukha's flank like a hook, Jin Taekyung answered with a tired look.

"Why couldn't we just make this easy? Why'd you have to keep hanging on? I was saving this for later."

What did he mean?

How was any of this possible?

His questions unanswered, Jamukha tightened his grip as if in a daze.

He had forgotten that the Force once surging like waves had died away, and that his once razor-sharp blade had gone dull.

Scrape. Clang.

The curved blade never pierced Fire Dragon Armor. As if clinging to its owner's regret, it scraped across the armor's surface before slipping from his hand.

Poom.

With another burst of heat from Flame Divine Palm, Jamukha heard an explosion deep inside his body.

"Guh—!"

His vision dimmed. His ears went muffled.

Everything felt strange, as if it belonged to someone else.

Distant, as though he were watching from hundreds of ri[3550] away.

The heat of the blood spilling from his lips. The shout that could only have come from the North Heaven Demon Lord.

And yet one thing remained vivid.

The blows that kept pounding and breaking his body.

Poom. Poom. Pooom.

Jamukha staggered. Even as that terrifying force battered him, he couldn't take a single step back.

Through pain so intense it felt as if his soul were burning white, the five fingers buried in his flank held him fast like a hook.

One punch, one palm strike—each carrying terrifying power—filled his vision, raining down in a blue-white torrent.

Until everything the Temporary Strength Pill had given him was spent.

Until that vast sea of power, which had seemed as though it would spring forth forever, ran dry.

And at some point, Jamukha realized he could no longer feel pain.

Thud.

Like a leaf falling at the end of autumn, Jamukha crumpled.

His eyes moved weakly upward. Reflected in them were the endless dark night sky and Jin Taekyung, standing tall as a giant.

You… You're…

What are you?

Before he could finish the thought, Jamukha's world tilted.

Thud.

Heat rose in a wavering haze. Jin Taekyung looked down at the king of the steppe, blackened and lifeless, then let out the breath he had been holding.

[3550] A Korean ri is about 393 m (0.244 mi).

Hoo.

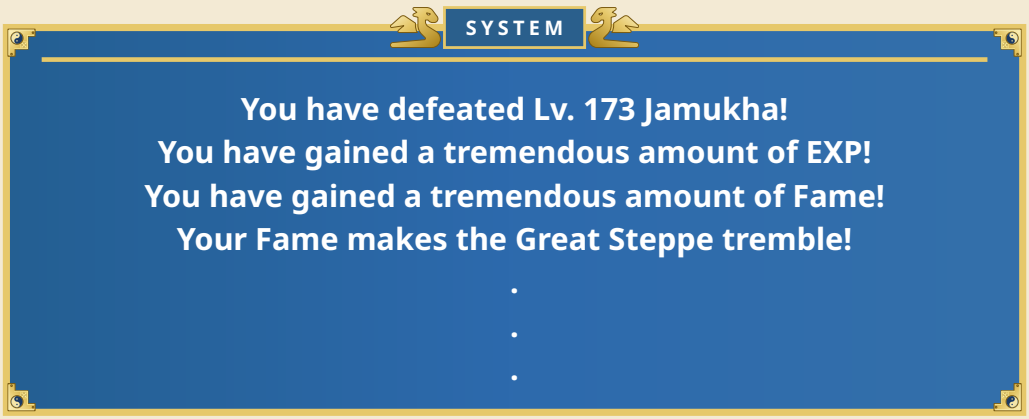
A quiet breath.

But despite unleashing strike after strike infused with tremendous internal energy, his lips, white a moment ago, were flushing red.

As if time were running backward.

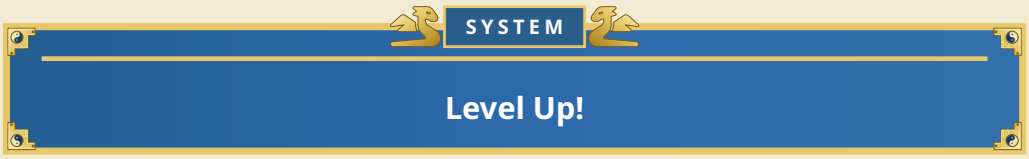
As if everything spent and worn away were returning to its original state.

Ding. Ding. Ding.



Clear chimes rang in only one person's ears as translucent letters filled the air.

At the end of them were the words he'd been waiting for so long.



"Now I'm finally feeling alive."

Feeling that stroke of luck arrive just when he needed it, Jin Taekyung shivered.

Then he smiled past the shoulder of Jeok Cheongang, who stood firm as Mount Taishan, at the North Heaven Demon Lord staring back with wide eyes.

"There were two of you. Now you're alone."

Crack.

The North Heaven Demon Lord clenched his teeth hard enough to break them and drove Jeok Cheongang back with all his might.

Krrrunch! Bang!

Their tremendous clash flung them in opposite directions.

Rather than absorb the shock wave, the North Heaven Demon Lord used it to speed his retreat. Jeok Cheongang saw through his intent at once and shouted.

"You—!"

But the North Heaven Demon Lord didn't stop.

He cut through the wind and seemed to erase the space around him as he shot toward the narrow gorge's exit.

Shweeeee! Boom!

A casually thrown punch shattered the massive rocks filling the gorge. The North Heaven Demon Lord thrust his spear toward the people of Shanxi, still unable to advance past the obstacles blocking their way and the force of the collisions.

Rrrrrum.

Space warped. At its center, the spearhead gave off a blindingly ominous flash.

But that strike, carrying an unprecedented force, never swept across the people of Shanxi.

Shwack!

A gigantic arrow of light tore through the air and plunged toward the North Heaven Demon Lord.

Chapter 976

The instant the North Heaven Demon Lord sensed a chilling force plunge toward his back like a bolt of lightning, he spun around and swung his spear.

BOOOOM!

A tremendous collision.

Yet even as the unprecedented force carried on his spearhead swallowed the arrow of light, the North Heaven Demon Lord's face remained as hard as stone.

Because the attack aimed at him wasn't over.

Shwaaa!

The wind split apart.

A dozen or so streaks of light rushed at him through the pitch-black air. The North Heaven Demon Lord's eyes turned red.

"Bow Saint—!"

With an angry shout, the North Heaven Demon Lord realized he had no choice left and thrust out his spear.

Space warped along the path of its spearhead.

BOOOOM!

Krrrrk!

Space shuddered as if struck by an earthquake. A tremendous shock wave burst forth with a deafening roar, sweeping everything within a dozen or so zhang.[3551]

An enormous cloud of dust swallowed the narrow gorge in an instant. Through it came two gusts of wind, hotter than a midsummer afternoon and more suffocating than the desert sands far to the west.

Fwoosh.

The North Heaven Demon Lord felt that sudden blast of heat all too clearly.

And he saw them.

Two figures shooting toward him through the flash of light.

Two fists, born of the same root, wreathed in flames of different colors.

Gooooong.

Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

Staring into the terrifying heat burning its way through space, the North Heaven Demon Lord thrust out his spear with all his strength.

Rrrrrum!

At its tip, a distant flash of light blazed.

[3551] A zhang is a traditional Chinese length of about 3.03 meters (9.94 ft); a dozen zhang is about 36 meters (120 ft).

It all began and ended in an instant.

Pangu.

As if the primordial giant said to have split the world with a single axe had drawn a deep breath, the air on every side pulled taut. Then it burst outward, sweeping everything away.

Rrrrrum!

What could they call it?

An explosion? A catastrophe?

Jin Wikyung and the people of Shanxi had no answer.

Crushed beneath an overwhelming force they had never experienced before—no, one they couldn't even have imagined—they could only watch as a vast wave of power swept toward them.

KABOOM! KAAAAABOOM!

The world turned upside down.

To keep from being flung away by the invisible shock wave, the people of Shanxi braced one another and drove their blades deep into the ground.

Their ears rang. Instinctive awe and terror gripped their bodies.

All of them, that was, except the few people responsible for the shock wave.

Shhk.

A spearhead cleaved through space.

Moving in a realm beyond sight and sound, Jin Taekyung and Jeok Cheongang dodged the Force shooting along its path and thrust out their fists.

Poom!

Air erupted with a blast of terrible heat.

The boom came late. By the time the flames that preceded it coiled through space, the North Heaven Demon Lord was already swooping down over their heads.

Shwaa!

His spearhead slashed down at an angle.

Just as Jin Taekyung twisted aside, the Force carried on the spearhead swelled and fell toward his shoulder.

Shhk.

I cut him.

The North Heaven Demon Lord was certain of it. He was right.

Except he had cut faintly red armor, not flesh and bone.

Pshk!

Blood spurted from the split in the Fire Dragon Armor, cut open by the Force.

That tiny amount—not even a handful—was all he had managed to draw. Master and disciple seized the opening.

Crack.

The instant Jin Taekyung clamped both hands around the spear shaft like hooks, the North Heaven Demon Lord understood on instinct.

Even with his physical abilities pushed to their limits by the Temporary Strength Pill, even with several jiazi[3552] of internal energy welling up without end, he could not withstand the strength of the young man before him.

What kind of monster is this…!

The higher you climbed, the farther you could see.

But even across the North Heaven Demon Lord's vast world, Jin Taekyung was a monster the likes of which he had never seen.

His accomplishments were unbelievable for his age. His physical abilities far surpassed even those called superhuman. And for some reason, ever since defeating Jamukha, his movements had grown faster and stronger, and his internal energy more powerful.

That alone made him a dangerous opponent. But what chilled the North Heaven Demon Lord's spine even more was the old monster fighting at the young one's side.

Whoom.

The moisture in the cold dawn air evaporated in an instant.

Jeok Cheongang charged in with a palm strike brimming with terrifying heat. Its glow lit the North Heaven Demon Lord's eyes red.

The Fire King…!

There was no other choice. No time even to look for one.

The North Heaven Demon Lord let go of the cherished spear he had carried for so many years and kicked off the ground.

Sss!

Burning pain seemed to seep into his very soul.

The flames surged after him as he retreated. Even a glancing touch melted his armor and scorched his skin.

And as the North Heaven Demon Lord endured that instant of pain and stumbled backward in a desperate retreat, the spearhead that had left him for a new master flashed toward him.

Shshshshk!

Dozens of spear images poured down, filling the air. The North Heaven Demon Lord drew on every sense, twisting and turning without pause, but the spearhead pursued him relentlessly. Blue-white flames surged from its tip.

[3552] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

Fwoosh! Shhk!

Hot.

Blood spurted through gaps in his armor where it had been cut and melted open. More blood than Jin Taekyung had shed, dark crimson blood that stained the North Heaven Demon Lord's vision as dizziness swept over him.

Then a quiet voice reached his ear.

"It's not over yet."

"…!"

"Grit your teeth."

Shhk, shhk, shhk!

It takes years to build something up. It takes only an instant to bring it down.

The spearhead swung again and again. The armor that had covered the North Heaven Demon Lord's entire body without a gap was all but useless.

Clank. Clatter!

Blood sprayed across shattered iron plates.

The North Heaven Demon Lord gritted his teeth against the searing pain.

His armor was not the only thing melting and breaking beneath the flames that struck him without pause.

Everything.

Everything he had accomplished as Murong Baek. Everything he had hoped to accomplish as the North Heaven Demon Lord. His past and future were turning to ash and scattering bit by bit.

Why!

He screamed inwardly, gathered the immense power he had left into his fist, and hurled it outward.

BOOM!

Space shook with a roar like the heavens splitting open.

Yet the strike, powerful enough to bring down a mountain, touched nothing. It only tore through empty air.

"Long ago, whenever I saw you, I had the same thought."

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

The old monster of Mount Jiuhua, who had lived for more than a hundred years, stepped toward the North Heaven Demon Lord.

Whoosh.

Jeok vanished as if he had evaporated. At the same instant, tremendous heat scorched the North Heaven Demon Lord's side.

Fwoosh.

Blinding light-flames swallowed the darkness. The North Heaven Demon Lord instinctively looked up, his eyes turning white with their light.

“You really do have the kind of eyes no one can trust.”

In that instant, the North Heaven Demon Lord saw it.

A savage blaze at odds with Jeok Cheongang’s calm voice.

A dazzling wave of fire, neither red nor blue.

BOOOOM!

The roar followed the movement a moment later, shaking everything around them.

Unable to withstand the force, the North Heaven Demon Lord crashed deep into the cliff wall and swallowed the blood surging up his throat.

Not yet. Not yet.

It wasn’t over. He couldn’t fall.

His vision blurring, he pushed against the cliff wall cradling his body and tried to rise.

Tried to.

Until a flash of light flickered through the dust cloud rising pale beyond the countless rock fragments raining down from the collision.

Thud! Krrrk!

The spearhead, wreathed in blue-white flame and terrible heat, pierced his shoulder. It smashed through bone and flesh and lodged deep in the cliff.

“…!”

His entire body quivered with indescribable pain.

But the North Heaven Demon Lord refused to give up. Though pain turned his vision white, he struggled with all his strength.

“GRAAAAAH!”

Crack! Fwoosh!

At last, the spearhead came free—or rather, his body did.

Rather than pull the spear from the cliff, the North Heaven Demon Lord gritted his teeth and tore his shoulder off the blade. Then he kicked off the ground and shot upward.

He burst through the churning dust cloud, bounding off the cliff face and the very air.

Away from the two monsters who had driven him to the brink of death.

Toward the only path of escape left to him.

Shweee!

The pain and injuries should have felled him long ago. His internal energy should have dwindled to a mere handful. But the Temporary Strength Pill made him forget both.

The North Heaven Demon Lord pushed onward with every ounce of strength he had.

Thinking of the prey who would be frozen in disbelief beyond the thick dust cloud settling all around.

The only lifeline that could save him.

Jin Wikyung.

The Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, and the Alliance Leader from Shanxi Province who had led its forces in today's battle.

And someone's precious flesh and blood.

If I capture him, I have a way out.

He had spent his life first as heir, then as Family Head of the Murong Family, one of the Five Great Families.

Black on the inside, white on the outside.

How many years had he lived among the orthodox faction, hiding the teeth of a beast?

The North Heaven Demon Lord knew those who called themselves orthodox better than anyone: their nature, their habits, the way they thought.

He knew, too, that the young upstart of the Jin Family of Taiyuan who had cornered him alongside the Fire King was bound more tightly than anyone by the word righteousness.

That's why. It's the greatest reason you can't defeat me—or us.

They had lost a battle in which both sides had given everything, and the grand plan they had been certain would succeed had come to nothing.

But that didn't mean the end.

If he survived, another chance would come.

And the North Heaven Demon Lord would return.

In the not-too-distant future, before the sting of his defeat and his enemies' cheers had faded, he would once more unfurl the Murong Family's banner and stride across the land.

Beneath a dark sky, with his hidden fangs bared to the fullest.

I will return. Even if I have to stake everything on it.

Remembering the defeat and humiliation he had suffered today, the North Heaven Demon Lord renewed his resolve.

He failed to notice that pain and hope had numbed his reason into making a foolish judgment.

He couldn't even properly wonder why Jeok Cheongang and Jin Taekyung weren't chasing him, even in this situation.

At last, beyond the dispersing dust, he saw Jin Wikyung—the man he had been so desperate to find.

And someone else standing tall before him, in front of Jin Wikyung, who had led everyone from the front since the beginning.

“Bow… Saint.”

Splash.

A low groan escaped the North Heaven Demon Lord’s lips.

Just as his steps—which had seemed as if they would go on forever—stopped in a pool of blood, he stared at the Bow Saint with hollow eyes. Then someone’s voice drifted into his ears.

“Poppy. Where did you go, Poppy?”

An anxious voice rang through the dust cloud.

Moments later, Jin Taekyung suddenly emerged from within it and stared wide-eyed at the North Heaven Demon Lord.

“Oh my god, Poppy! What are you doing here?”

“…!”

The North Heaven Demon Lord’s eyelids twitched.

Chapter 977

Shame was only one of the many emotions every human being felt, but its weight varied enormously from person to person.

For a slave scorned from the moment they were in their mother's womb, shame might be no different from fate. For the noble and the wealthy, it could tear at the heart more cruelly and sharply than any blade.

And the North Heaven Demon Lord was very much the latter.

"Our Poppy! I was wondering where you'd run off to in such a panic. There you are."

A face and voice full of concern.

And a smile whose lopsidedly raised corners made that concern look all the more absurd.

"I was so worried. I thought I might've lost you for good."

With every mocking word Jin Taekyung spoke, the North Heaven Demon Lord's eyelids twitched.

As if walking into an obvious trap of his own accord weren't bad enough, now he was being treated like a dog that had run away from home.

The shame and despair gripping him were unlike anything he had ever felt before.

"How dare a nobody like you—"

"Shut up."

Jeok Cheongang appeared beyond the thinning cloud of dust, cutting the North Heaven Demon Lord off. His gaze had gone cold and deep.

"Who do you think you are, running your mouth like that? You're a nobody."

The North Heaven Demon Lord gritted his teeth.

Why was this happening?

In his eyes, Jeok Cheongang had grown as imposing and brilliant as he had been long ago, during the Great Faction War.

The sight brought back the man he had once been, shrinking without realizing it before the giant known as the Fire King.

Step.

Footsteps rang unusually clear in his ears.

But Jeok Cheongang stopped on his way toward him and let out a short laugh.

"I've walked a good ten paces, yet I'm no closer. I feel like I've been bewitched. Don't you?"

At his Master's question, Jin Taekyung frowned as if puzzled.

"Come on, that can't be right. Maybe you're imagining it?"

"Imagining it?"

“That makes no sense. It’s not like you’re walking in place. Why wouldn’t you be any closer?”

Scratching his chin, Jin Taekyung went on with a perfectly straight face. He glanced at the North Heaven Demon Lord’s stiff expression.

“Unless some coward got scared and started backing away.”

“…!”

“Oh, wait. Is that it? Seriously?”

Crack.

Skin split, and blood flowed.

The North Heaven Demon Lord had clenched his teeth hard enough to split his lips. He looked down at the legs that had carried him backward on instinct.

Or perhaps he’d looked away because he couldn’t bear to face the mockery on that bloodied brat’s face.

If he didn’t at least look away, he felt he might lose the last thread of reason he had left.

“Wow, it really was true. A minute ago, you took a pill and started acting all high and mighty, throwing a goddamn fit.”

Jin Taekyung strode closer with another taunt.

But this time, the North Heaven Demon Lord didn’t retreat.

No—he couldn’t.

Soft step.

Unlike the master and Disciple blocking his path, the footsteps behind him were light as feathers.

He half-turned. A woman approached like a gentle breeze.

The Bow Saint.

Caught between them. Surrounded on all sides.

Neither phrase came close to describing his situation.

Three Supreme Peak masters.

One was a member of the Three Saints, known throughout the world. Another was an old sovereign who stood shoulder to shoulder with her. And the last was a young Divine Dragon, soaring toward the heavens with that sovereign’s teachings as his dragon pearl.

This can’t be happening. It can’t.

The words slipped out alone from a hollow corner of his heart.

Then, at some point, the trembling in the North Heaven Demon Lord’s eyes subsided. His gaze settled.

“Even if you defeat me here today, nothing will change.”

Jin Taekyung shot back without hesitation.

“Do you people go around memorizing speeches or something? Is there a punishment if you get even one word wrong? Your internal energy gets confiscated for a week?”

“Say whatever you want. It makes no difference. That is the only truth.”

“We’ve done a pretty good job stopping you so far, though. Today included.”

At Jin Taekyung’s reply, the North Heaven Demon Lord let out a short laugh despite himself.

“If that’s what you believe, then so be it. There’s nothing wrong with holding on to hope.”

“What?”

“Finding myself in this situation made me wonder. Why did the Western Heaven Demon Lord, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress, and the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord fail? How did a plan they’d spent so long preparing fall apart in an instant?”

Jin Taekyung’s face hardened at the unexpected words. So did everyone else’s.

“What are you trying to say?”

Jeok Cheongang’s voice was cold. He looked ready to burn the man alive on the spot, but the North Heaven Demon Lord answered calmly.

“I don’t know. I’m not sure what I’m trying to say.”

“You bastard—!”

“Don’t rush, Fire King. Even if you don’t hurry me, we don’t have much time left.”

With his mind emptied, his voice was calm as well. The North Heaven Demon Lord looked inward, contemplating the energy that remained in his body, and continued.

“Half a year at most. That’s all.”

The war had already begun.

It had begun the day the absolute ruler in the darkness awoke from a long slumber.

No—long before that.

“Power beyond anything the hundred thousand followers of the Demonic Path possessed. Unbelievable powers. ‘A new heaven’ refers to that person.”

Everyone there knew whom the North Heaven Demon Lord meant.

“The Lord of Heaven…”

The Bow Saint murmured to herself, then lifted her clear eyes to look at the North Heaven Demon Lord.

“Was that why you abandoned the comrades who shared life and death with you, and betrayed the world?”

“Comrades? Did you just call them comrades?”

The North Heaven Demon Lord suddenly burst into a hearty laugh.

Comrades. People who walked the same path.

The meaning held in those two words—their utterly worthless value and the past they called to mind—made him laugh in spite of himself.

“It seems you lived in a different world from me. Well, what could you possibly know, when you shut yourselves away in remote mountain valleys without roots, turning your backs on the world?”

His bloodshot eyes moved over Jeok Cheongang and the Bow Saint in turn.

Neither of them had been known by name before the Great Faction War. They had been eccentric, reclusive masters.

But the North Heaven Demon Lord—Murong Baek—was different.

As a direct descendant of the Murong Family, one of the Five Great Families, he had seen the world. He had to wage covert battles against others who shared the same orthodox fold.

“Everyone smiled and spoke of righteousness while hiding unseen blades in their sleeves. Is that what you call comrades? Is this the orthodox faction?”

Even the stars looking down on the world would one day lose their light and fade.

Everything grew old and declined.

The world of martial artists was no different.

As time passed, the martial world had disappeared. All that remained was a cold Murim.

Chivalry had lost more and more of its worth, while the orthodox faction—including the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families—poured its strength into struggles for power.

Taking in countless lay disciples to expand the sects under their control had become commonplace.

Some even committed the taboo of bringing the unorthodox faction into their fold. Others caused numerous casualties in clashes waged in secret.

Expansion ended in an explosion.

The power they had built up over so many years was eating away at the orthodox faction in the form of conflict.

And the northern lands, far from the Central Plains, were no exception.

If anything, things were harsher there.

At least for the Murong Family.

“You can’t claim you don’t know what roots I—or rather, the Murong Family—come from.”

The North Heaven Demon Lord looked down at the pool of blood beneath his feet.

He had the handsome features of a man who had spent his life as the Family Head of a prestigious great family, and the authority and strength to match.

Yet even after all the years the Murong Family had been rooted in Liaoning Province, the faint traces of his foreign ancestry still flowed through his veins.

Enough to bring to mind, for a moment, the face of Jamukha lying dead.

“Nomad?”

At Jin Taekyung’s murmured question, the North Heaven Demon Lord’s fist clenched on instinct, his knuckles turning white.

He had heard that word countless times.

The pointing fingers and voices that had followed him from out of sight were still there in his eyes and ears.

Nomad. Invader. Outsider.

And barbarian.

Long ago, the northeastern people called the Murong Xianbei had occupied the edge of the continent and founded a nation.

It was an age of chaos.

Five foreign peoples and sixteen small kingdoms[3553] stood divided across the land.

But the divided land eventually found stability, and the invaders who had used the turmoil to charge across the continent with lances and composite bows were either driven beyond the Great Wall or absorbed.

The Murong Xianbei were among those absorbed.

They remained in Liaoning Province and laid new foundations, establishing a great family.

The Murong Family was born.

A family of invaders descended from barbarian blood.

Their peerless martial arts and superb horsemanship had made them a towering force in Murim. Yet the other towering forces—the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families—had looked down on them and treated them with contempt, though never openly.

“Sometimes I wondered: if the Great Faction War had never happened, would the Murong Family have survived to this day?”

Expansion ended in an explosion, but the aftermath of an explosion beyond anyone’s imagination could leave reconciliation and peace behind.

The arrival of the Demonic Cult as an outside enemy changed everything.

To survive, everyone had to join forces and fight together. The Murim Alliance, formed around the Martial God, united the feuding orthodox faction.

But Murong Baek—and the Murong Family—hadn’t forgotten.

They remembered it all clearly.

[3553] The Five Barbarians and Sixteen Kingdoms refers to a period of upheaval in northern China during the fourth and fifth centuries CE, when non-Han peoples founded competing states.

“There is no more chivalry. No more benevolence or righteousness. In the end, the only ones who survive through the years are the strong.”

The strong prey on the weak.

That was the only truth of the world the North Heaven Demon Lord had learned.

The only value and purpose in a Murim built on violence.

And so Murong Baek became the North Heaven Demon Lord.

“That was why. Nothing else.”

Rumble. Rumble.

A powerful tremor spread across the ground.

The North Heaven Demon Lord’s eyes were now so red that “bloodshot” no longer described them. His blood-red gaze swept over everyone in the gorge as he roared.

“Who dares! What hypocrite has the right to condemn me!”

BOOOOM!

The internal energy carried in his aged shout burst outward as a mighty sonic wave.

The aura was truly terrifying.

Blood flowed from the ears of the people of Shanxi, frozen like statues. Several who had been shaken to their cores by the roar alone coughed up blood and dropped to their knees.

Vrrrrm.

Terrible power churned around one man.

Though gravely wounded, he radiated a vast wave of qi that seemed to squeeze the air on every side. Jeok Cheongang realized the North Heaven Demon Lord had already crossed the point of no return.

Innate qi.

Just like the heads of Dark Heaven who had gone to the afterlife before him, the North Heaven Demon Lord was burning up everything he had been given in that moment.

Even knowing death waited at the end.

“If I tell you to back off, will you?”

At Jeok Cheongang’s quiet question, his Disciple reached out without a word.

Whoosh—tap.

A spear shaft shot toward Jin Taekyung from behind like an arrow, and he caught it firmly. Blue-white flames surged up and wound around the almost transparent spearhead. That was answer enough.

“I’ve had to listen to this bullshit for so long my whole body aches.”

“You’re too young to ache all over.”

Jeok Cheongang gave a short laugh, and Jin Taekyung laughed with him.

“I’ll go on ahead. You two can take your time catching up.”

At the same moment, dirt and rock crumbled beneath Jin Taekyung's toes.

Crack—BOOM!

The ground split like a spiderweb, and a streak of flame shot forward.

The two old monsters blurred, following the Divine Dragon as he charged ahead with greater speed and force than ever.

Flash.

As the distance vanished between them, a blood-red glow surged upward.

Chapter 978

Every now and then, I catch myself realizing how much I've changed.

In this miserable fight, where every moment demands that I risk my life, I keep moving forward—and feel a thrill I can't explain.

"Jin Taekyung!"

A shout like a lion's roar lashed at my ears.

Beyond the wind whipping around me, I brought White Flame down on the blood-red light bursting from the North Heaven Demon Lord's fingertips.

Shhk!

The enormous Palm Force split in two along the path of my spearhead.

Leaving behind the tremendous impact and explosion as the deflected Palm Force shook the cliffs on either side, I planted my foot on the ground once more.

Tap.

The flames that should have burst forth from Flamefire Path were nowhere to be seen.

My feet, guided by the Slaughter Saint's teachings, felt lighter than ever. I shot forward like a flash of light.

Like the beam that had suddenly come streaking from far across the gorge.

Shwaaa!

Compressed air tore apart. At the arrow of light that had outrun even sound, the North Heaven Demon Lord swung a fist seething with rage and internal energy.

BOOOOM!

Contact. Then an explosion.

Within the swelling flash, I saw the beam the Bow Saint had shot vanish into the dark red glow.

I seized the opening. By the time the North Heaven Demon Lord's eyes caught my reflection, I was right in front of him.

I can see it.

The world slowed in an instant.

Everything around me was sharp and vivid.

His lips moving slowly, as though he were trying to say something.

His eyes, so red there wasn't a trace of white left in them.

And the condensed Palm Force blocking the spearhead I had thrust forward with all my might.

Krrrk!

Two different Forces collided. Blue-white flames and dark red shadows met in midair, mingling as they sent out a violent wave of force.

“Just… this much.”

His words came in broken fragments.

The North Heaven Demon Lord glared at me, gripping my spearhead in one hand. Streams of blazing red seemed to pour from his eyes.

“Did you think you could defeat me—Murong Baek—with this?”

Zzzzzzt!

An unprecedented energy flared up like a wildfire, pressing down on the flames carried by my spearhead. The power the North Heaven Demon Lord had gained by burning even his own life came at a steep and tremendous price: a death already set in stone.

Even with all my fatigue and injuries completely healed after I took down Jamukha, victory seemed impossible.

But…

Yeah. This is about what I expected.

I smiled.

The strength I sensed from the North Heaven Demon Lord was within the range I’d expected.

And the energy rushing in from behind me, fast as a flash of light, was immense enough to rival his.

Now.

There was no shouted warning. No Sound Transmission.

But I knew. So did he.

Even without seeing each other, we knew each other too well.

So, without the slightest fear or hesitation, we moved as the thought flashed through our minds.

Slip.

The instant I let go of the spear shaft and turned halfway around—

A streak of flame, hidden behind my body—a frame massive enough to be called a giant—filled the space I’d left and exploded.

Gooooong.

Like the breath of a fire dragon from legend, pure white hellfire blazed across the darkness.

It burned away the dew in the dawn air, vaporizing it as it rushed toward the North Heaven Demon Lord.

Fire. King.

His lips moved ever so slightly, forming a soundless cry. His eyes, heated by the scorching air, wavered, losing their focus.

Confusion and fear he couldn’t hide.

Those emotions, revealed on instinct, meant the North Heaven Demon Lord had sensed someone else—not me or Jeok Cheongang.

Shwaaa!

Behind him, two gently curved blades traced beautiful arcs.

The strike was utterly unlike the furious flames bearing down on him from the front, yet the energy it carried was no less deadly.

"…!"

In the slowed world, the North Heaven Demon Lord's eyes flew wide.

Jeok Cheongang's Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist came from the front. From behind, the Bow Saint's twin blades, transformed into curved swords, came down on him.

Two Supreme Peak masters unleashed a terrifying combined attack. With neither time nor room to dodge, he had no choice left.

BOOM! KAAAAAABOOM!

In an instant, all the darkness hanging over the gorge lifted.

A blood-red glow burst out, wrapping around the North Heaven Demon Lord's entire body.

Krrrrrk!

The world shook. A relentless wave of force swept in every direction, and the ground crumbled beneath the three combatants' feet.

Crack! Krrrk!

The ground split like a spiderweb, unable to withstand the tremendous pressure.

As I had done at the last moment, the North Heaven Demon Lord twisted his body and changed direction. His whole frame shuddered violently like a tree caught in a typhoon.

His face twisted like a Fiend's as he caught Jeok Cheongang's fist in one hand and both of the Bow Saint's curved blades in the other.

No. He was already a Fiend. Had been for a long time.

No matter how many years a monster spent wearing a human face, its nature didn't disappear.

The North Heaven Demon Lord—Murong Baek—had crossed a river from which there was no return.

Like so many other monsters who had pursued the Demonic Path for their own reasons, heading off somewhere.

Crack—splatter!

Blood gushed from the flesh and joints of bone, slowly being cut and crushed.

The North Heaven Demon Lord convulsed in pain beyond anything he had imagined.

Both hands, holding off the Fire King and the Bow Saint, were losing their shape even now.

Yet one thing would remain unchanged to the end: those eyes filled with bitter hatred.

“Why? Why…?”

I could feel all the pain and hatred in the North Heaven Demon Lord’s voice as he ground the words out through teeth clenched hard enough to draw blood.

I could feel the sliver of fear he couldn’t quite hide as I slowly approached, too.

“I… won’t… die.”

The North Heaven Demon Lord’s words broke apart between gasping breaths. Jeok Cheongang answered, his expression calm.

“Everyone dies. People and monsters alike.”

The blood-red light that seemed about to devour the whole world and the force that had been pressing down on everything around us were nowhere to be seen now.

Even if some remained, they were fading like a lamp before the wind.

Krrrk.

The pressure was more than one hand could withstand.

Before the white hellfire Jeok Cheongang drew forth with all his strength, alongside his quiet reply, the North Heaven Demon Lord finally dropped to one knee.

BOOM!

The ground caved in beneath him. The Bow Saint’s voice reached the North Heaven Demon Lord as he stared with eyes bulging wide.

“We’re born human, and we make our choices by our own judgment. There is no right answer. But… this is the consequence of your choice.”

What life has a right answer?

Life isn’t multiple choice. It isn’t a test graded on short answers or essays, either.

Whatever life a person has lived, looking back, there will always be at least one thing they regret. That is what human life is.

But both the judgment and the consequences are your own. That’s all.

“Murong Baek, the Divine Spear of the Imugi. No—the North Heaven Demon Lord. It’s time to accept the consequence of your choice.”

There’s a reason and a history behind every martial artist’s sobriquet.

When I heard that unfamiliar one from the Bow Saint’s lips, I felt as though I’d caught a glimpse of the life Murong Baek had lived.

The imugi.

An imugi that never became a dragon.

And at the same time, an imugi that had wanted to become a dragon more than anyone.

Maybe that was why.

Why he had struggled so desperately to obtain the dragon pearl.

Why he had searched for every excuse and justification to remain beneath Dark Heaven's shadow, hoping to become a dragon soaring freely through the azure heaven.

But knowing something and understanding it are different.

Even if every story he'd told us was true, I would never understand Murong Baek, the North Heaven Demon Lord.

No. I would refuse to understand him.

The day I understood him would be the day I became a monster, too, on the far side of that deep, dark river.

"Before you go, know this."

With a quiet voice, I reached out.

The pure white spear shaft the North Heaven Demon Lord had been forced to let go of to face Jeok Cheongang and the Bow Saint flew into my grip as though drawn there.

"Not everyone in the world makes the same choice you did."

The weak are cast aside, and the strong survive.

That's how this world has always been—always, without fail.

The law of the jungle existed not just in Murim, but in the modern world, too. And it would continue to exist, with means other than spears and swords.

But if everyone made the same choice as the North Heaven Demon Lord out of fear of being cast aside, the world would already have become a hellscape.

A place without even the barest sense of decency or benevolence.

A terrible world that went on endlessly for one purpose alone: to devour others or be devoured.

But not everyone is like the North Heaven Demon Lord. That's why I still think this world is worth living in.

And I believe, too—

Among all those countless people scattered like stars across the night sky, whoever gave such inexplicable power to an unremarkable F-rank Hunter must feel the same way.

"Now, go."

I didn't wait for an answer.

I simply thrust my spearhead, wreathed in blue-white flames, into him—quietly and without hesitation.

Toward the North Heaven Demon Lord, who still refused to give up, struggling as he burned through every bit of life left in his body.

Toward the chest of a monster who had lived not simply to protect what was precious to him, but to seize what belonged to others and make himself greater.

Thud.

The blazing flames pierced flesh and bone.

As if someone had lit a candle, the being in the darkness suddenly opened its eyes.

How long had it been asleep?

How much time had passed in that abyssal dream where everything was tangled together?

It couldn’t know.

The question was familiar, and the conclusion was always the same.

It had always been that way for the being in the darkness.

Whenever it woke, the world had changed. It had once slept for decades, after all.

But as the years passed and the intervals between its awakenings grew shorter, it had begun to realize something.

The day it had thought it would never reach had, at some point, drawn right up to its doorstep.

Fwoooosh.

A cool wind swept through the area. In moments, it became a raging gale.

It extinguished the torches that faintly lit the thick darkness and shook the ground and roof.

That sudden upheaval, like great waves rising on a tranquil lake, was proof that the being in the darkness had realized why it had opened its eyes.

North Heaven.

The fourth heaven had fallen. Another faithful servant was gone.

The news would soon shock all beneath the heavens.

But alone in the darkness, the being smiled.

Chapter 979

At some point, everyone realized.

“Waaaaah!”

A tremendous roar shook heaven and earth as it rolled over the narrow gorge called Eight Spring Gorge.

The fighters locked in fierce battle across the vast basin all turned their heads at once.

Their lips were cracked like drought-stricken fields. Their hands and feet trembled with exhaustion and fear of death.

After hours of fighting, they were covered in blood from head to toe. They stared desperately toward the gorge’s entrance, praying that the roar drawing closer—and the countless footsteps pounding the earth—belonged to their allies.

Then, beyond the thinning darkness, a streak of light flashed.

Shwaaaaa! BOOM!

In an instant, a deafening crash mingled with screams.

But Iron Blood Saber Peng Cheolyeong, Family Head of the Hebei Peng Family, recognized the light and laughed at the top of his lungs.

“Ha! Hahahaha!”

Crack!

With that booming laugh, he swung his great saber and swept through a dozen nomads in a single stroke.

Beneath the fountain of blood soaring into the air, the fewer than one thousand remaining warriors of Hebei pressed forward behind their Family Head.

Just moments ago, their bodies and weapons had felt as heavy as waterlogged cotton. Now, they felt impossibly light.

As they advanced, laughing like madmen, a thick mist of blood rose in their wake.

Shhk! Shhk-shhk!

“Aaargh!”

“Guh!”

Screams erupted everywhere. Neither the Murong Family’s martial artists, trained in their family’s secret arts, nor the nomads who had once swept across the land with lance and bow could stop the Hebei Peng Family.

No—more precisely, they had frozen at the unbelievable sight before them.

Rumble!

The ground shuddered.

As dawn approached and the darkness faded, thousands of figures poured from the narrow gorge’s entrance. A blood-soaked banner rose high above them.

The Great Jin Family of Taiyuan.

“…!”

“…!”

It could mean only one thing.

Eyes fixed on the characters embroidered on the banner trembled.

Some with shock and despair. Others with hope and joy.

But there were those who belonged to neither side.

“Enough! What are you all thinking?”

The Murong Family’s Head Elder, Murong Wijin, who had been directing the battlefield in Murong Baek’s place, shouted with internal energy behind his voice.

His followers flinched beneath his venomous glare.

“Don’t fall for their petty tricks! This is—this is just…”

Murong Wijin clenched his teeth, unable to finish.

What else could he say?

Anyone who wasn’t a fool could see what was happening.

Reality was chillingly cold.

They had lost. Their enemies had won.

And the ones who had returned to finish it all were neither Jamukha nor Murong Baek. They were the people of Shanxi.

Holding the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s banner so high it seemed to pierce the sky, they approached in tight formation. There was certainty in every step.

Certainty of victory.

Perhaps certainty in the four people leading them.

“Hold on. I’ve seen that guy’s face somewhere.”

His hair had grown into prickly stubble, like a lazy monk’s, and was so red it seemed to be on fire.

Facing the old monster who looked decades younger than he ought to, Murong Wijin trembled.

“F-Fire King…!”

“Oh, now I vaguely remember. Murong… whatever. Right?”

Jeok Cheongang nodded as if he’d finally figured it out. The woman beside him sighed.

“Murong Wijin. Not ‘whatever’—Wijin. And if he’s wearing the Murong Family’s uniform, obviously his surname is Murong.”

“Wijin? Who’s that?”

“That’s understandable. During the Great Faction War, he wasn’t even thirty. He was a child.”

Though Murong Wijin was nearing eighty, he couldn’t say a word.

In front of two monsters like the Fire King and the Bow Saint, he was still no more than a hot-blooded novice in Murim.

In age and in martial arts.

And there was someone else here who didn't give a damn about either.

"Hey, what's your name again? Murong… thingy."

Murong Wijin's face stiffened at being renamed by both Master and Disciple. Then Jin Taekyung stepped forward and swung his spear.

Whoosh!

The spear's fierce whistle crossed dozens of yards. The round shape impaled on its tip fell precisely at Murong Wijin's feet.

Thump.

When Murong Wijin saw what touched the tips of his shoes—an object that was, in fact, a person's head—a groan escaped him before he could stop it.

"…Family Head."

Once spoken, words couldn't be taken back.

Murong Wijin belatedly realized his mistake and clamped his mouth shut, but the damage was done.

"You… You dare…"

"What? Not enough? Want another?"

Jin Taekyung swung his spear again, and another head sailed through the air.

This time, the nomads bit their lips as they recognized the face of Jamukha, the steppe's greatest warrior and Great Chieftain.

"If you need more, say so. No, wait. I take that back."

Jin Taekyung shook his head and started walking.

Thud.

His footsteps rang out with unusual weight and clarity.

His reddish, smoldering eyes swept across the vast basin.

"There are too many to bring here one by one. Better to make them on the spot. Fresh from the source."

"…!"

"…!"

The Murong Family and the nomads—every one of them—instinctively stepped back.

Though they still had nearly ten thousand troops, an overwhelming aura and killing intent flowed from Jin Taekyung. No one dared stand against him.

And in that suffocating silence, another voice rang out.

"If you lay down your weapons and surrender now, your lives will be spared."

One man had been overshadowed by the three Supreme Peak masters.

He had neither several jiazi[3554] of internal energy nor the godlike power to stand shoulder to shoulder with them. Yet he carried an inexplicable authority.

Perhaps it was an authority only someone who had raised a declining family and become the Alliance Leader of Shanxi Province could possess.

“You have my word. On my name, and on the authority of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.”

Jin Wikyung continued calmly.

His gaze rested on a young chieftain who looked particularly haggard.

“Choose, Temur.”

“…!”

“I know you. And I know you didn’t come here of your own will.”

Temur clenched his teeth.

“I’ve… come too far.”

His brother, with whom he’d shared years of hardship, was dead. And Temur had submitted.

He meant what he said. He had come too far to return to the steppe, to his homeland.

But Jin Wikyung shook his head.

“It’s not too late. Not yet.”

“…Why? Why are you offering me this?”

“Because too much blood has already been spilled. If I can prevent any more deaths, I’ll do whatever it takes.”

Despite his composed voice, a tear ran down Jin Wikyung’s cheek.

“That’s all.”

Seeing Jin Wikyung weep, feeling the sincerity in his words, Temur could hardly breathe.

He thought of the path he had chosen, so different from Jin Wikyung’s. Of all the tribespeople who had died here today because he had submitted to save his own life.

“What… do you want me to do?”

“You bastard!”

At Murong Wijin’s furious shout, the Murong Family’s martial artists moved. But a dense forest of lances had already closed in around them.

Before the army of ten thousand, now split in two in the blink of an eye, Jin Wikyung spoke.

“Surrender and submit to us. Completely.”

“…!”

[3554] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

"Too much? Then refuse. You can join forces with the Murong Family right now if you wish. But—"

Jin Wikyung's voice hardened, then burst into a mighty shout.

"We will fight. We will cross the Great Wall and trample the steppe. Whatever the cost, we will drive you out of there!"

At that moment, a chill ran down Temur's spine.

The thousands of surviving nomads felt it, too.

They all heard and felt Jin Wikyung's resolve to repay this grudge, even if it took hundreds of years and cost countless lives.

They heard the sincerity in his tightly restrained voice, seeping through clenched teeth.

And then, Temur had no choice but to decide.

"…Temur of the Golden Clan."

Temur—the only chieftain who could fill Jamukha's place—bowed his head.

To the Han Chinese beyond the Great Wall.

To the Alliance Leader of Shanxi and the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

"I offer my greetings, my lord."

In that instant, time on the battlefield—which had stood still—began to flow again.

Shhk-shhk-shhk!

The forest of lances swallowed the Murong Family. Behind it, thousands of people of Shanxi charged beneath the Jin Family of Taiyuan's fluttering banner.

The blood-soaked night of the Double Ninth Festival[3555] finally woke to the dawn.

In the hazy space between dream and reality, the young man had forgotten even his own existence. He was trapped in the layers of memory piled up in his mind.

Shwaack!

The child could have been no more than four or five.

With a seriousness that didn't suit his age, he swung a wooden sword as tall as he was. Each stroke cut the air with a sharp hiss.

No one knew when he'd begun or how many times he'd swung it. His little body was already soaked with sweat.

People standing at one side of the training ground watched in amazement, repeatedly letting out cries of admiration.

"Incredible. He's held a sword for only six months, and he can already deliver a strike like that."

[3555]The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month.

“Good heavens. What a martial talent.”

“Look at that speed and trajectory. Fast and precise. It’s hard to believe he’s so young.”

“What’s truly remarkable is that he knows how to work hard. Think about it. Have any of you ever seen a child like him?”

“Never. Even the Head Elder, who was called Shanxi Province’s greatest prodigy in his youth, wasn’t like this. Though the Central Plains did have so many outstanding talents.”

“The Lesser Family Head showed such promise as a child, but then one day he became more interested in books than martial arts.”

“A shame. If he’d kept training with the sword, he’d have reached at least the Supreme First Rate realm by now.”

“What can you do? It’s in the past. The Family Head has always been unpredictable. I suppose the son inherited it from him.”

Family Head.

At the two words someone let slip, everyone clicked their tongues.

They exchanged strange glances and fell silent, but only for a moment.

Watching the child practice his sword with flawless form, stroke after stroke, they resumed their conversation as if nothing had happened.

“In any case, I don’t know much about the great sects of the Central Plains, but I doubt they have many talents like him. No, they must be quite rare.”

“He’s a great blessing to our family. Though it troubles me how gloomy he’s become for a child his age since his mother died in childbirth…”

“Mm.”

The words trailed off, and everyone’s face darkened.

“It’s tragic, but there’s nothing to be done.”

“What can we do? It’s the fate ordained by Heaven.”

“Fate? What fate?”

At the voice from somewhere nearby, the murmured conversation stopped short.

The next moment, as if by agreement, everyone fell silent and looked urgently in the same direction.

So did the young man, who had been watching it all from a spot neither near nor far.

“F-Family Head!”

Hearing someone blurt out the cry in a rush, the young man—who had just turned his head—furrowed his brow.

Perhaps it was the sunset glow spreading from the west. He couldn’t make out the face of the man slowly approaching.

Only a voice reached him, strangely familiar and faintly wistful.

“Well, judging by your reactions, I must be an unwelcome guest.”

He was a man of ordinary build.

Nothing more to add, nothing to take away.

Yet even without seeing his face, the young man could sense something distinctive about him as he scratched the back of his head.

The others facing the man, of course, couldn’t hide their confusion.

“N-No, of course not.”

“Don’t give me that. Do I look so oblivious?”

Beneath the face hidden by the sunset, his faintly visible lips curved into a smile.

He looked over the people silently watching him, then spoke again.

“I was passing by and stopped in for a moment. Don’t mind me. It seems you were watching my second son train.”

“We could hardly claim to be teaching him. The Second Young Master is so gifted that we wouldn’t dare try to correct him.”

“Of course he is. Whose son do you think he is?”

The man puffed out his chest, plainly proud. But the young man saw the smile at his lips falter and turn bitter.

Nor were the people who’d been restless ever since the man appeared any different.

“We’re sorry, Family Head.”

“We spoke out of turn. Please punish us.”

Their voices and expressions were heavy.

As they lowered their heads, the young man clicked his tongue softly without realizing it.

He didn’t know who he was or where he was, but he could infer what was happening from what he’d heard and seen.

Speaking of Heaven’s fate in front of a Family Head who had recently lost his wife…

Whatever they had intended, they deserved punishment.

Just as a nation needed strict laws to stand firm, a family had rules that must be observed.

But the man called Family Head answered in a way the young man hadn’t expected at all.

“Punishment? What are you talking about all of a sudden?”

“Pardon?”

“I told you, I just stopped by on my way past. Oh, was that talk about fate related to me? I wondered what profound conversation you were having.”

“W-Well, that is…”

“Now I’m starting to get the picture. I know how this goes. You were bad-mouthing the Family Head who lazes around all day again, weren’t you?”

“F-Family Head, that’s not…”

“Enough. You people, honestly. I may be the Family Head, but you can’t just gossip about me behind my back.”

The man folded his arms. The others, now on tenterhooks, glanced at one another.

Should they tell the truth, or let it go?

As they agonized, their mouths going dry, the man let out a deep sigh.

“Whew. You’ve confessed this much, so there’s no choice. As Family Head, I can’t just pretend I didn’t hear it. I’ll punish you now.”

Around him, people let out breaths they’d been holding.

Better to take the punishment than keep carrying the weight of guilt. Their faces relaxed as the man continued.

“Confined to your quarters. For half a day.”

“F-Family Head…”

“You’ve looked tired lately. Stay in your quarters for half a day, then get back to work. Oh, and make sure you give our eldest plenty of help.”

That was all.

The man waved away the retainers who tried to say something, dismissing them. Then he looked toward the child, who kept swinging his sword, unaware anyone had arrived.

Only after every pair of eyes around them had turned away did he murmur softly.

“Fate. Fate…”

His eyes lifted suddenly to the sky, empty. His next words were filled with nothing but bitterness.

“No. It’s all my fault.”

Then he turned his head abruptly and added,

“I’m sorry, Mukyung.”

As the man looked straight at him, the young man’s—Jin Mukyung’s—vision turned white.

Father.

At that moment—

Rrrrrumble.

The world around Jin Mukyung crumbled away. Brilliant light poured down from above, and a familiar voice reached his ears.

“Hey, you awake?”

Chapter 980

Jin Mukyung's wide-eyed expression was quite a sight.

Maybe that was because, in my memory, he was always so stiff and curt.

"Hey, you awake?"

I greeted him, glad to see him.

He was looking right at me, but the focus in his dazed eyes wavered.

"F-Father…"

Maybe he'd been unconscious for too long. His voice was so hoarse that the word faded before he could finish it.

Mukyung looked thoroughly confused. Beside me, Hyuk Mujin spoke up, worry plain on his face.

"Um, could there be something wrong with his head?"

"That's strange. The Medicine King Hall Master examined him and said there wasn't much to worry about."

"Even monkeys fall from trees. The Medicine King Hall Master might be one of the best physicians in Shanxi Province, but he can still make a mistake. He's getting on in years, too."

"Hmm. You think so?"

"To be honest, I had a bad feeling about him. Isn't he the old geezer who threatens to ram a giant needle into a patient's Huiyin Acupoint[3556] if they refuse treatment? Captain, don't you remember when he pulled that on you while we were trading blows with the Mount Heng Sword Sect?"

Of course I remembered.

The Medicine King Hall Master had been terrifying when he'd announced he was going to perform a forced opening ceremony with a needle as thick as my forearm.

Still, for all his temper, he seemed to know his stuff.

I'd checked Mukyung myself several times, too.

There were limits to examining someone's insides by channeling internal energy into them. Even taking that into account, though, his condition wasn't all that serious.

Not for someone who'd just fought a Supreme Peak master a level above him.

"Go get the Medicine King Hall Master first. Oh, and if you can…"

"I'll bring Great Hero Jeok too, if possible. Right?"

"Yeah."

That kid was quick on the uptake. These days, he knew what I meant before I even finished saying it.

[3556] Huiyin is an acupuncture point on the perineum, between the genitals and anus.

Hyuk Mujin gave a small bow and turned away. He was just about to take his first step when—

“Where… am I?”

His lips were cracked like drought-stricken fields. His voice came out in broken, hoarse bursts.

But it was too soon to relax.

His eyes were only beginning to focus again, so I cautiously waved my hand in front of them.

“Can you see this?”

“I can… see it. But where am I…?”

“Where do you think? The Jin Family of Taiyuan.”

“If that’s… the case…”

I could guess what he was trying to ask. Since he was struggling to get the words out, I gave him the answer he wanted most.

“We won.”

“Ah.”

“The nomads who were left surrendered to us completely, and everyone in the Murong Family was either killed or captured.”

“What about… the others?”

His questions kept coming, one after another. I pretended not to hear and ignored them.

I couldn’t tell him yet.

Not yet.

“I’ll tell you later.”

“What?”

“Look at you. Your eyes are still out of it. Tell me how many fingers I’m holding up.”

Mukyung knew better than anyone that he hadn’t fully come around. I held up three fingers, slipping the change of subject in while he frowned at me.

“Three.”

“Good. And now?”

“Five.”

He answered both without hesitation. His head seemed to be clearing.

But the most important final step remained.

With a grave expression, I took off my shoe and stuck out my toes.

“And now?”

Mukyung was quiet for a moment. Then he spoke, his voice astonishingly firm.

“Move your filthy foot before I kill you.”

"Hmm. Perfect. Feeling more like yourself now, patient?"

Mukyung let out a shallow sigh.

"Yeah, you son of a bitch."

"Now, now. You can't talk like that to your own brother. Spit while lying down, and it'll land on your own face."

I didn't bother adding though in reality, I was an outsider with not a drop of their blood in me.

At least in the world I was living in now—Murim—the three sons of the Jin Family of Taiyuan had been born to the same parents.

But at that teasing remark, an odd swirl of emotion surfaced on Mukyung's face for the briefest moment.

"What? Why are you looking at me like that?"

"None of your business. I just…"

Mukyung hesitated.

"I just had a strange dream."

"A strange dream? A nightmare?"

"Not quite a nightmare… I don't know. It was strange. That's all."

He still looked a little confused, but I shrugged it off.

Well, it happens. I have all kinds of dreams every time I pass out.

I was used to it.

No—maybe it was one of the chronic problems shared by Hunters and Murim people alike.

Keep coming close to death, and your state of mind is bound to change. That unease often comes out in dreams.

"So, how do you feel?"

"How do I feel…"

Mukyung tried to sit up too quickly and frowned.

"Broken bones. Three, from what I can tell."

I nodded, satisfied. A patient who could feel the pain and assess his own condition was showing a good sign.

"Exactly. That matches the Medicine King Hall Master's diagnosis."

"My muscles hurt so much I can't even move. It feels like someone tore every muscle in my body to shreds."

"Of course you're in pain. You fought like a maniac. Perfectly normal."

"My internal injury… For some reason, it's not as bad as I expected."

I puffed out my chest, as if I'd been waiting for him to say that.

"I put in a little effort."

"You did?"

“Yep. You can thank me.”

Mukyung stared at me for a while, then nodded.

“I see.”

“That’s it?”

“Yeah.”

“Hmm. Strange. People who were raised right usually say thank you in a situation like this.”

“…Didn’t you just say something about spitting while lying down?”

“Me? When?”

I put on an innocent, confused expression. Mukyung sighed softly.

“Thank you.”

“I don’t feel any sincerity.”

“Thank you. I mean it.”

“Hmm. Somehow it feels like I’m making you bow down and thank me.”

“…”

“Let’s call that practice. One more time, and mean it this time.”

Mukyung took a deep breath.

“I survived thanks to you. I’m truly grateful.”

I wanted to tease him some more, but the look in his eyes told me I’d better stop there. Hiding my disappointment, I patted his shoulder.

“Good. That’s more like it. I’ll pass along your thanks.”

“Even after all this time, you’re exactly the same… What? Pass them along? What do you mean?”

“It’s nothing. Don’t worry about it. Some people helped treat your internal injury, that’s all.”

“Helped? Who?”

“They’re here. The Fire King and the Bow Saint. They’re both pretty nice people.”

“…?”

“Oh, right. You passed out early, so you wouldn’t know. Somehow, they ended up coming with me.”

Mukyung had seen Jeok Cheongang while I was staying with the Jin Family of Taiyuan. But hearing that the Bow Saint was here, too, must have been a shock in his weakened state.

He struggled to steady his ragged breathing before forcing out his next words.

“The Bow Saint? The one I know?”

“Yeah.”

“The Bow Saint from the Great Faction War? The one who uses a bow?”

“Ah. I thought so too, but if you mess with that bow, it turns into a pair of blades. Kind of like a transforming robot. Pretty amazing the first time you see it.”

“A crippled old servant…?”

“No, not a disabled old servant. A transforming robot. Though you probably wouldn’t understand even if I explained it.”

As expected, Mukyung hadn’t understood a word. He gave me a flat look.

“What the hell are you talking about?”

“Forget it. Let’s move on.”

“Fine. That’s probably for the best. So this crippled old servant you mentioned… No, the Bow Saint. You mean the one I know, one of the Three Saints?”

His words were starting to trip over themselves. I kindly nodded.

“Exactly.”

“…How did you even meet them?”

“At the Imperial Palace.”

“The Imperial Palace?”

“Yeah. The very same Imperial Palace everyone in the land knows about.”

“No, how did you get there?”

“It’s a long story, so I’ll give you the short version.”

Mukyung looked even more confused than when he’d first woken up. For his sake, I quickly organized the events in my brilliant mind and gave him a brief summary.

First: I went to the Imperial Palace and met the Emperor. It was a pretty scary place.

Second: We all pulled together and defeated the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord.

Third: Right afterward, I learned about the conspiracy surrounding Shanxi Province. The Emperor gave me an official post and even saw me off.

“…And that’s what happened. Got it?”

Hyuk Mujin, who’d listened to my clear and concise explanation, muttered under his breath.

“My diary from when I was six was more detailed than that.”

Mukyung, who’d stared blankly through the whole story, finally spoke.

“Are you actually insane?”

Hmm.

Ordinary people who couldn’t understand the thought process of a genius were everywhere.

In any case, after hearing the bare minimum, Jin Mukyung finally understood the situation and nodded.

“So those two treated my internal injury.”

“Right. They lived up to their reputations.”

“And you got thanked even though you did nothing.”

“Nothing? They’re my connections. I accepted your thanks on their behalf, as their representative.”

“Do you know something?”

“No. How would I? I haven’t said anything yet.”

“Sometimes, talking to you makes me feel like I’m losing my mind.”

“I’m a pretty cheerful guy. Ordinary people can’t always handle it.”

I flashed him a deliberately obnoxious grin. A bitter smile touched Mukyung’s lips.

“Is that all?”

“What?”

“I asked if that’s the only reason you’re pretending to be even cheerier than usual. Talking nonstop. Acting restless.”

I scratched the back of my head.

“Who knows? I’m not sure what you’re getting at.”

“It reminds me of two years ago. I came back to the family after a long time, and the hopeless good-for-nothing had become a completely different person.”

“…”

“The sudden change was strange, but deep down, I was a little happy. The youngest seemed to have been reborn as someone entirely new, and the more I got to know him, the more decent he seemed.”

Mukyung added, “At the very least, he wasn’t someone who’d laugh and chatter thoughtlessly while leaving behind the deaths and sacrifices of so many people.”

The corners of my mouth, which I’d forced upward, slackened.

Mukyung looked straight at me as my smile disappeared.

“You know you can’t avoid this any longer. So tell me the truth.”

The air grew heavy. My face, gone stiff, was reflected in his wavering eyes.

“Who was it, and how many people were sacrificed?”

Chapter 981

Jin Mukyung didn't know how much time had passed.

After his younger brother had told him everything, a long silence followed. In the end, there was only one thing Mukyung could say.

"I'm tired."

And so he was left alone.

He forced his aching body upright, leaned against the bed, and stared blankly out the window.

In the first light spreading from the distant east, he watched his younger brother leave the pavilion with a subordinate. The words he'd heard a moment ago came back to him.

Five thousand.

Just two syllables. Far too short to hold the weight of thousands of lives. The number didn't feel real.

But it was, without a doubt, reality.

Over three thousand died. The rest suffered injuries, big and small, and many were left crippled.

Of the fifteen thousand people of Shanxi who'd gathered at Eight Spring Gorge that day, a third had been killed or wounded.

Many of the casualties were government soldiers from the Shanxi Provincial Office, relatively weak in martial arts. But Mukyung knew they, too, were part of us—people who had put down roots and made their lives on this land.

…A great victory.

Yeah. A great victory. One for the history books.

More than five thousand casualties, yet in a single night they'd annihilated an army of well over thirty thousand.

They'd won an incredible victory against foreign enemies who outnumbered and overpowered them. It was no exaggeration to say they'd written a new page in the history of the Great Nation.

And yet, not a single person looked happy as they spoke of the great victory.

Those who took what belonged to others reveled in their victories. But those who fought to protect what was theirs mourned what they'd lost along the way.

The bodies and blood left behind by the dead were a burden the survivors alone had to bear.

The Hebei Peng Family lost more than half its forces. Great Hero Peng, the Thunderbolt Saber King, still hasn't regained consciousness.

The great tiger of the Peng Family, which had held sway over Hebei for so long, had yet to wake from his grievous injuries.

No one could have anticipated that the North Heaven Demon Lord—someone he'd considered a friend—would betray him. And the martial arts he'd used in his sudden ambush were in no way inferior to those of the Thunderbolt Saber King.

Even after we took down Jamukha and the North Heaven Demon Lord, things didn't go smoothly. If we hadn't subdued the nomads, we would probably have suffered much heavier losses.

Despite having joined the battlefield some time before, the Murong Family's forces had remained relatively intact until the fighting was nearly over.

If Jamukha had lived to see it, he would have realized the truth too late—and trembled.

Just as he'd used Temur to put the tribes of the eastern steppe in front as human shields, the North Heaven Demon Lord had used Jamukha to keep the Murong Family's losses to a minimum.

The law of the strong preying on the weak applied everywhere.

That's when the final battle began.

Sensing their end, the Murong Family fought with everything they had.

While their allies were dying all around them, they took the Temporary Strength Pill they'd held back until then and fought to open an escape route alongside the western steppe nomads who'd refused to abandon their cause even after Jamukha's death.

Together, they numbered a staggering five thousand.

The people of Shanxi and the Hebei Peng Family were exhausted from the long battle, however high their spirits remained. Thousands of enemies, strengthened beyond their limits, scattered in every direction to avoid the three Supreme Peak masters. They tore through the weakened encirclement and fled.

No—they tried to flee.

Then, beyond the faint dawn light pushing through the darkness, came a roar that shook the whole world.

Three forces appeared beneath banners that should never have been here.

We didn't expect them either. They arrived much sooner than we thought.

They said the scent of plum blossoms from Huashan filled the ridge in place of the Double Ninth Festival[3557] chrysanthemums, soaked in blood and stripped of their fragrance.

A force with a hundred Peak masters at its head charged beneath the Murim Alliance banner and swept through the enemy. Other new arrivals entered the narrow gorge, where quiet had fallen after the terrible fighting.

Their brilliant golden armor gleamed as they rode like the wind.

[3557]The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month. Chrysanthemums are traditionally associated with it.

The world called them the Embroidered Uniform Guard.[3558]

And that was the end of it.

A dense fog of blood rolled over the gorge and engulfed the broad basin.

With the first light of dawn, reinforcements swept in from every direction and crushed the enemy. The Bow Saint and the Fire King dominated the battlefield, while Jin Taekyung drove his spearhead into the chest of Murong Wijin, Head Elder of the Murong Family, who had resisted until the very end.

The battle—the war—ended that day.

Its beginning and end marked by the Double Ninth Festival.[3559]

It left behind the joy of a great victory, and a sorrow heavier still.

Three full days had passed since then. Mukyung had finally regained consciousness, and his younger brother had told him everything that had happened. Now Taekyung was walking away, growing smaller beyond the window.

Before he left, he'd left behind an old book.

He asked me to give it to you. No—to hyung.[3560]

Remembering the last words Taekyung had tossed out on his way through the door, Mukyung blinked like someone only just waking from sleep.

"…Ah."

A stifled groan escaped him.

His vision slowly clouded over. Taekyung was no longer in sight.

Only the four characters on the cover of the book resting on his knees remained clear.

Shura Annihilating Fist.

It was the last trace an old master had left in this world—and the legacy of his martial lineage, entrusted to the Sword Demon of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

Another casualty of the battle three days ago. A man who had fought back-to-back with Mukyung but had not survived.

Great Hero Cheol.

Mukyung thought of Cheol Mubaek, the Tiger of Mount Heng.

Cheol had risked his life to buy him a moment against the formidable Demon Bird.

Mukyung remembered his last smile, blood staining his bared teeth. And he remembered Cheol's voice from a day two years earlier, when the man had approached him as he was leaving the Mount Heng Sword Sect and spoken as though making a joke.

[3558] The Embroidered Uniform Guard was an imperial guard and security institution in dynastic China.

[3559] The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month. Chrysanthemums are traditionally associated with it.

[3560] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

"I hear you're crazy about martial arts."

"Pardon?"

"So, I was wondering—are you interested in Seowol?"

"I'm sorry, what are you talking about all of a sudden…?"

"Exactly what I said. I don't have much, so I can't offer you gold or silver. But if the two of you got together, I'd gladly give you the Shura Annihilating Fist manual…"

"Uncle Cheol!"

"Goodness, you'll burst my eardrums. You've only just become Sect Leader, and you're already trying to boss me around?"

It was strange.

Mukyung had thought Cheol was someone whose path had merely crossed his own. Why, then, could he remember that hearty laugh so clearly?

Why did a heavy ache press against his chest?

So that's what this is.

Only then did he recognize the emotions gripping him.

Sorrow. Anger. And…

Guilt over what he'd already lost.

If I'd been stronger. If I'd been just a little stronger that day.

He could have protected them. Saved more people.

But he hadn't.

He'd fought with everything he had, swinging his sword without rest through a pitch-black darkness where a day felt like ten years. Still, he hadn't been able to reach them.

If it had been you instead of me—no, both of you—everything would have been different.

Meeting Cheongpung had made him feel, for the first time, that there was a wall he could not cross.

Watching Jin Taekyung improve at an astonishing pace had rekindled a longing that had faded within him.

He'd been called a genius since the day he first picked up a sword. Only after seeing what those two were truly capable of had he understood: if his talent was a gift from Heaven, theirs was talent they'd taken from it.

What do I… What do I have to do to reach you? To keep from losing anyone else?

Emotions he couldn't put into words swirled inside him.

He was staring out the window where his brother had disappeared when—

Tap.

A faint sound came from the crack around the firmly shut door.

Then a familiar voice reached him.

“Hey, Mujin. Remember that time?”

Mukyung’s eyes widened. He’d thought his brother had gone. An answer followed, so stiff it sounded unnatural.

“Um. W-Which time do you mean?”

“You know. When we formed that recon squad and were busting our asses.”

“Oh. Ah, yes. I remember.”

“Yeah, I saw a lot of things I wish I hadn’t back then. I just… at some point, I got so angry at how pathetic I was. Why was I only capable of this much? Why did people whose faces I’d gotten to know in passing have to die?”

“…”

“But you know what pissed me off the most?”

On the other side of the door, Taekyung leaned against it and went on as if talking to himself.

“No matter how hard I fucking try, I can’t get used to it. Nothing changes.”

Mukyung’s eyes trembled.

Forgetting even the pain, he clenched his fist as hard as he could and squeezed his eyes shut. Taekyung’s voice kept coming through the door.

“It’s always the same. I thought if I got stronger than I am now, I could stop bad things from happening. I thought once I could use Sword Energy and send out Force whenever I wanted, nothing as shitty as what happened back then would happen again…”

A low sigh slipped through the crack.

“But no. Every time, I still feel like shit. I was asking for too much.”

More. More. More.

The stronger a person became, the more they wanted. Their hopes grew grander, and their sense of responsibility swelled until it felt ready to burst.

Mukyung thought of himself as a boy, endlessly swinging a sword simply because he loved it.

Had that boy felt anything like the responsibility he felt now?

Back then, all he’d had was talent. He hadn’t even thought about restoring his family’s fortunes.

Taekyung’s voice reached him again.

“But I know this much. If we give up, it ends here.”

Taekyung no longer waited for an answer. Hyuk Mujin’s awkward attempts to play along had stopped, too.

The voice continued as though its words were meant for someone else.

“We just have to keep trying. Do the best we can with what we can do right now. If you despair and give up because nothing changes, that’s when hell really begins.

Because later, you realize that all the effort you put in meant fewer people were taken from you.”

“…!”

“So just keep doing what you’ve been doing. Keep at it, like you always have.”

The bitterness in Taekyung’s voice slowly faded. A brief silence fell.

Then something whistled fiercely through the air.

Whoosh—thwack!

“Ow! Why’d you hit me?”

“Answer me, you bastard. When someone’s talking, you’re supposed to give them something back. Don’t make it awkward.”

“Seriously? You’re not even talking to me anyw—Mmph! Mmph!”

At the muffled sounds and the scrape of something being dragged away, Mukyung smiled faintly.

Then, in a voice clear enough to pass through the crack around the door, he saw the uninvited visitors off as they left the pavilion.

“Thank you. Truly.”

Their footsteps paused, as though they’d heard him. Then they quickly faded away.

Chapter 982

I’m a selfish bastard.

As long as the people around me and I can be happy, I don’t much care what happens elsewhere.

But every now and then, I notice that somewhere along the way, I’ve changed.

Like when I put on a ridiculous little show because I couldn’t stop worrying about someone who was beating himself up and crying.

“Sometimes, when I look at you, Captain, I think…”

It had been a while since I’d fled the pavilion, practically running away from Jin Mukyung.

We were walking in silence when Hyuk Mujin spoke up. I cut him off.

“Don’t think. No, just don’t talk.”

“Why not?”

“Because I don’t want to hear it.”

“It’s not because you’re embarrassed, is it?”

He was right.

That was why I’d been trying so hard to ignore the way Hyuk Mujin kept staring at me.

“It’s just…”

“Just?”

“I somehow felt concerned, so I stuck my nose in where it didn’t belong. That’s all.”

The words I’d said to Jin Mukyung through the door were also the conclusion I’d reached after a long time thinking about it.

I didn’t know if it was the right answer. If it could comfort him even a little right now, that was enough.

In the end, time and experience solved most problems.

An answer wasn’t something someone else could hand you. You had to find it yourself.

For him, this is only the first step.

He was an unparalleled genius born of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, and in this world, at least, he was my older brother. But Jin Mukyung was only in his mid-twenties.

He’d spent his life honing his martial arts. He could count his experiences in real combat on one hand, and he wasn’t used to the loss that came with them.

If a few embarrassing words could bring him even a little comfort, I’d say them dozens or hundreds of times.

Jin Mukyung's heart and his feet were pointed toward the righteous path, without a hair's breadth of deviation.

The more he grew, the more livable the world would become.

Walk. Don't sit down. Keep walking, and walking, and walking.

At the end of that road was an answer.

There was light.

I believed that.

With all my heart.

"But, Captain. Can I tell you something?"

"What?"

"This is the wrong way. If we keep going, we'll hit a dead end."

I was silent for a moment, then looked at Hyuk Mujin in disbelief.

"Wait… Why are you only telling me now, you bastard?"

"Well, you suddenly got this intense look in your eyes and started making a cool face."

"…"

I wanted to hit him.

I really did.

Too much had happened over the past three days for me to tell Jin Mukyung everything.

A great battle, with tens of thousands of allies and enemies tangled together.

Three days had already passed since the people of Shanxi won their great victory, but the battle had left a staggering mess behind.

When uninvited guests show up and leave a place filthy and wrecked, the cleanup falls to the homeowner.

From the day of our victory, Jin Wikyung had more work than ten people could handle. Before he'd even recovered from the battle, he had to begin dealing with its aftermath.

Of course, the people around him weren't going to stand by and let him do that.

"I'm going to give the Lesser Family Head three choices. Hear them all before you pick one."

The first to step in was the Medicine King Hall Master.

At a glance, he looked like a stubborn old man. But with a menacing gleam in his eyes that didn't match his calm tone, he glanced back and forth between the long needle in his hand and Jin Wikyung, then said:

“You can keep ignoring my orders and working until you ruin your health and die. Or you can get treated now, take it easy, and live a long life. Or, if you’d rather not drag it out, you can die by my hand. Which will it be?”

Only then did Jin Wikyung begin to get some proper rest. Everyone who’d witnessed the exchange fiercely debated what they’d seen behind his back.

Had his face gone as pale as a corpse’s from exhaustion, or from the Medicine King Hall Master’s long needle?

Hyuk Mujin put it plainly.

“The needle. No question. Didn’t you see that old man’s eyes? If he hadn’t studied medicine, he’d have a position in Dark Heaven by now.”

What mattered was that Jin Wikyung had relented. Others had helped make that possible, too.

“That quack who calls himself the Medicine King Hall Master is absolutely right. You focus on recovering. The others will take care of what’s left.”

We’d won the battle on the Double Ninth Festival[3561], but we still couldn’t be sure every threat was gone.

Even so, the presence of a giant like the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, was enough to wash away the slightest worry.

So was the Bow Saint, who had finally appeared before people again after decades.

“I’ll go to Hebei.”

The Bow Saint left as soon as the battle ended, with only those few words.

Peng Cheolyeong—the Thunderbolt Saber King’s son, the current Family Head of the Hebei Peng Family, and the Iron Blood Saber—had no choice but to take the family members fit to travel and return to Hebei with her.

It was only natural.

The North Heaven Demon Lord—no, Murong Baek—hadn’t betrayed us alone.

That meant the entire Murong Family had joined Dark Heaven. Two days later, a messenger eagle arrived at the Jin Family of Taiyuan with news confirming part of what we’d suspected.

“As we expected, there was trouble in Hebei.”

Several people had forced Jin Wikyung to rest, but getting the paperwork out of his hands was nearly impossible.

The instant the messenger eagle arrived at the Jin Family of Taiyuan, Jin Wikyung received the news. He immediately called me in and told me what had happened in Hebei.

“It seems the Murong Family targeted both Shanxi and Hebei from the start. They used their offer to support us as a pretext to cross Hebei, leaving some of their forces behind to ambush the Peng Family.”

[3561] The Double Ninth Festival, or Chongyang Festival, falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month.

The bloodshed on the Double Ninth Festival[3562] hadn't been confined to Shanxi Province.

The Hebei Peng Family had been caught completely off guard by the Murong Family's betrayal. With the Thunderbolt Saber King and many of their strongest masters away, they'd suffered heavy losses and had barely managed to defend their family home, fighting to the death.

"But even that would only have bought them time. If everything had been delayed by two days, something irreversible would have happened."

But just as the family stood on the brink of ruin, Peng Cheolyeong, its Family Head, finally arrived.

Peng Cheolyeong announced himself with a roar. Behind him came some five hundred family members who'd returned from Shanxi at his side, along with hundreds of martial artists from the Jinzhou Yan Family, who were effectively vassals of the Hebei Peng Family.

If that had been all, the battle would have been a hard one for the Hebei Peng Family.

The surprise attack had already devastated the Hebei Peng Family, and the thousand troops Peng Cheolyeong had assembled in haste were exhausted.

But at their head stood a giant whom even Peng Cheolyeong, Family Head of the Hebei Peng Family, would not dare step ahead of.

"Once Senior Bow Saint made up her mind, the outcome was as good as decided."

It was another victory for us—and a terrible defeat for the Murong Family.

The kind of defeat they could never recover from.

And so the Murong Family was annihilated.

Several dozen enemies, including its Lesser Family Head, Murong Yeonghwi, barely escaped the battlefield and vanished. But who knew?

"Unless they have a Moving Formation hidden somewhere, they'll be caught soon enough. We have eyes everywhere."

Jin Wikyung wasn't boasting.

Even if the dark clouds cast by Dark Heaven eventually covered everyone's heads, for now, the orthodox Murim factions still ruled the land.

The Murong Family had made an enemy of the world.

They couldn't flee into the vast Central Plains without breaking through the Jin Family of Taiyuan and the Hebei Peng Family. To the east, the Great Nation's warships guarded the open sea.

And the Great Steppe—their roots and little more than the final destination for outlaws—was already practically under the Jin Family of Taiyuan's control.

[3562]The Double Ninth Festival, or Chongyang Festival, falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month.

“Send your tribespeople after them. Hunt them to the ends of the earth if you have to.”

It wasn’t a request.

As Shanxi’s Alliance Leader, the victor of the great battle, and the master who had brought a defeated hunting dog to heel, Jin Wikyung gave his first order.

“You don’t want to leave yourself trouble later, either. Do you, Temur?”

“I… will obey.”

The young chieftain who had once dreamed of uniting the vast steppe as its Great Khan submitted helplessly.

Of course he did.

He was a commander defeated in battle, and a coward who had betrayed his brothers and tribespeople for fear of death.

For his defeat, he’d been given a pretext: Jamukha and the North Heaven Demon Lord had drawn him into their schemes. He’d also been given the false absolution of having prevented greater losses by submitting to the Jin Family of Taiyuan. His betrayal was another matter.

If the whole truth came out, Temur would die.

Not at our hands or Dark Heaven’s. At the hands of his own tribespeople.

That was the leash Jin Wikyung held tight. The hunting dog couldn’t even think of betraying him.

From the moment Temur accepted Jin Wikyung’s offer and joined the attack on the Murong Family, every other choice had effectively disappeared.

It’s disgusting, but now that we’re holding his leash, we need him on our side.

How many lives had Temur’s petty cowardice and instinct for survival cost?

“Go. Just looking at you pisses me off.”

Temur lowered his head at my contemptuous words and left. I called over the man who could deal with the remaining problem once and for all.

“You called?”

His brilliant golden armor drew every eye wherever he went.

His expression and manner of speaking were as stiff as the helmet tucked under his arm.

I deliberately frowned at Jeong Hogun, Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

“What’s with you? Why do you look so fine?”

“Because I fought well.”

“Or did you just show up at the end and take all the credit?”

“Is that what you say to a Benefactor who traveled thousands of li[3563] to help you?”

[3563] A Chinese li is 500 m (0.311 mi).

“Hey, remember who helped you first. What would you have done at the Imperial Palace without me?”

“What would I have done? The Bow Saint would have helped.”

“…Huh. Now that I think about it, you’re right.”

“…I didn’t expect you to admit that.”

Silence settled between us for a moment. Then, as if on cue, we both chuckled.

I’d been teasing him for no reason, but I was grateful to the guy.

He was grateful to me, and I felt the same way about him.

“I called you because I have a favor to ask.”

“A favor?”

“Yeah. It might be a little difficult. No, very difficult.”

“Someone might die.”

I nodded quietly. Jeong Hogun answered without a moment’s hesitation.

“Then I refuse.”

“Ah.”

His tone was as sharp as a blade.

I swallowed a groan at the unexpected refusal. Then he continued in a low voice.

“An order.”

“What?”

“I can’t grant a personal favor. An order is different.”

I finally understood what he meant and let out a short laugh.

“Why go this far?”

“Because that is the Great Nation’s military code.”

What an interesting guy.

And for a moment, I thought: perhaps the Great Nation could exist because it had people like Jeong Hogun.

So I gave him what he wanted.

“Jeong Hogun, Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard.”

As though our conversation had never happened, Jeong Hogun respectfully bowed his head.

“Give your order.”

“Lead the Embroidered Uniform Guard under your command to Liaoning.”

Liaoning Province.

The Murong Family’s stronghold, and the last threat left to deal with.

At my order, Jeong Hogun struck his armor.

“I obey the Marquis of Shangshan’s command.”

Chapter 983

By the time the thousand Embroidered Uniform Guards led by Jeong Hogun crossed Hebei and reached Liaoning Province, everyone in the region knew the truth. Not just the martial artists—even the common people.

The nomads' invasion. The Murong Family's betrayal.

And, finally, Dark Heaven lurking behind it all.

Not even the most hot-blooded martial artist dared stand in the Embroidered Uniform Guard's way. There were two main reasons.

First was the force and authority of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, among the Great Nation's finest troops. Second was the banner flying beside the imperial flag.

The Murim Alliance.

Even a renowned veteran of the martial world who had loudly insisted that martial artists should handle Murim affairs themselves would have had no choice but to accept it quietly before the Murim Alliance's towering banner.

The two great powers guiding the world had joined forces. All that remained was to punish the Murong Family.

Before long, everyone's attention turned to one place.

Shenyang, Liaoning Province.

The Murong Family's ancestral estate. They had once thundered across the continent with a charging spear and a composite bow and founded a nation.

Now they faced ruin.

"Surround it."

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

Jeong Hogun's terse command shook the earth.

There was no need for all thousand Embroidered Uniform Guards to take action.

The authority of the Marquis of Shangshan, personally appointed by the Son of Heaven not long ago, was vast enough to encompass the entire northern frontier. And when the Embroidered Uniform Guard—the force said to knock birds from the sky—arrived, Liaoning Province's City Lord had rushed out to greet them and immediately surrendered all the military authority at his disposal.

Thud. Thud. Thud.

The first thousand cavalrymen galloped out to surround the Murong Family estate. Heavily armored infantry filled every gap with shields, spears, and swords.

Finally, the archers took their positions. Everything was ready.

Like any Murim family on the frontier, the Murong Family estate was a fortress made by nature itself. And now it was sealed off without a single gap.

Grrrrrr.

With a heavy grinding sound, the iron gate slowly began to open.

A man dressed in white as snow appeared beyond it. Jeong Hogun spoke.

“Loose.”

There was not a moment’s hesitation in the order.

The archers were already in formation, ready to fire.

Fwoosh!

For an instant, part of the sky turned black. Hundreds of arrows tore through the air toward the man in white, and he hastily swung his sword.

Clang-clang-clang!

Steel struck steel, scattering sparks.

When the rain of arrows had swept past the gate, the man stood there looking shaken. From behind him came anguished cries.

“Young Master!”

“You mustn’t! Please, come back!”

“What are you doing? Bring the Young Master back—!”

Instead of answering, the man waved them back. He bit his lip, fixed his gaze on Jeong Hogun in the distance, and took a heavy step forward.

Step.

Jeong Hogun watched him in silence, then spoke again.

“Loose.”

Another rain of arrows fell. The sword flashed.

This time, blood spattered the ground.

Drip. Drip.

The shoulder pierced by an arrow twitched, but the man kept walking. He did not stop even when arrows from the third volley drove into him in several places.

Thwack!

At last, his knees buckled. His once-white clothes had long since turned red.

The family retainers could bear it no longer and rushed out through the gate. Yet there was not a trace of pain in his shout.

“Stop! Have you all forgotten my orders?”

“B-but—!”

“Don’t come any closer! Whatever happens, you must not act rashly!”

The family members who had started to run through the gate clenched their teeth and stopped.

The man gave a small nod, then leaned on his sword and staggered to his feet.

At last, he faced Jeong Hogun, who was riding slowly toward him.

“We finally meet. It seems risking my life was worth it.”

Jeong Hogun looked down at him quietly from the saddle.

Up close, he could see that the man was barely twenty.

“Are you of the Murong bloodline?”

“I am. My father committed an unforgivable wrong.”

They said blood could not lie.

Looking at the young man’s distinctly foreign features, Jeong Hogun suddenly recalled a face he had seen while collecting the dead, just after the fierce battle around Eight Spring Gorge had ended.

“Then you’re Murong Baek’s…?”

“His seventh son, born in his old age. The son of a father burdened with sin.”

The young man answered calmly and cupped his hands in greeting.

“I am Murong Su, the Murong Family’s Seventh Young Master. I greet you, Thousand Captain Jeong.”

“You know me.”

“I have eyes and ears. I’d heard you were coming.”

“Then why did you stay?”

“If I fled like my elder brothers, I would be admitting that I was a traitor and an enemy of Murim.”

“Staying changes nothing. But let’s hear your second reason.”

The young man, Murong Su, lowered his hands and lifted his head.

His gaze at Jeong Hogun was clear, and his voice was calm.

“Someone has to take responsibility, don’t they?”

“…Responsibility.”

“I’m the only direct descendant left at the estate. Everyone involved has either died or fled.”

Jeong Hogun studied him in silence beneath the brim of his helmet, then looked past his shoulder.

“Then who are those people who stayed with you?”

“I don’t know if you’ll believe me, but they, too, were betrayed by my father. And they aren’t people who could really be called members of the Murong bloodline.”

Jeong Hogun could guess who they were.

People so isolated within the family that they could never have learned the truth. Distant branches of distant branches, perhaps, or people who had never fit in. There would also be former guests who had become part of the Murong Family without sharing a drop of its blood.

All but one.

“Did you not know about your father’s crimes, either?”

“I can’t say I knew. Nor can I say I didn’t. I had only a vague feeling that something was wrong.”

“And?”

“I simply watched from a distance.”

“Was it your affection for your own blood?”

“I don’t know when I was ever considered part of the Murong Family. My mother was a barbarian, my birth lowly, and my martial talent nothing worth speaking of…”

Murong Su smiled bitterly.

“But one thing I do know. Saving those who remain is the best I can do.”

“So in the end, you’re the only one left. Murong Su, Murong Baek’s son. A traitor’s blood.”

“That’s right. So, the others—”

“Execute them on the spot.”

At Jeong Hogun’s firm interruption, all color drained from Murong Su’s face.

“What do you—”

“The Murong Family Head, Murong Baek, and his family colluded with foreign enemies, disrupted the order of the Great Nation, and caused immense harm throughout the northern frontier. This was clearly an act of treason. Not the slightest mercy can be shown in punishing it.”

“Thousand Captain!”

Blood mingled with the cry he forced out.

Crack. Murong Su snapped the arrows lodged in his body, his face contorted with anguish.

“I told you! They—they…!”

He coughed up blood and fell to his knees before he could finish.

The retainers, who had watched it all from a distance, could bear no more. They rushed out through the iron gate.

“Young Master!”

“No! The Young Master has done nothing wrong!”

As they ran toward him, crying out in desperation, Jeong Hogun slowly raised a hand.

In Murong Su’s wide eyes, hundreds of archers drew their bowstrings taut.

There was no choice left.

One small gesture. Or one short command.

That would end it. Everything.

“N-no! Please, stop!”

Murong Su’s desperate plea burst out with a spray of dark red blood.

And then, a hoarse old voice spoke from behind Jeong Hogun.

“People only show their true hearts when their lives are in danger. Don’t you agree, Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard?”

The speaker was a small old man with dark skin and distinctive features unlike those of a Han[3564] man.

But what made him truly unusual was his mount. He rode neither a horse nor a mule, but a person.

A huge man who might have rivaled a bear.

“Taishan can’t understand what you’re saying. Has Namho gone senile?”

“Damn you. Not again.”

The old man, Namho, was unfazed.

As if he had been waiting for the moment, he pulled out a chunk of jerky and stuffed it into Taishan’s mouth. Then he nodded toward Jeong Hogun.

“Anyway. In this old man’s opinion, this is probably enough for now. What do you think?”

Jeong Hogun thought for a moment, then lowered his hand.

As his fingers slowly relaxed, hundreds of taut bowstrings lowered in silence.

“We’ll take them into custody and bring them to the government office first. Their fate will be decided after a thorough interrogation.”

“Do that. An old man like me couldn’t stop you from going that far. They should be grateful for even that much.”

Namho shrugged and patted the top of Taishan’s head.

The huge man crouched, bringing Namho roughly eye to eye with Murong Su. The young man could only blink, still unable to make sense of what was happening.

“You said your name was Murong Su?”

“Y-yes. But who are you, sir?”

“No need to know an old man’s name. Just know that I belong to the Murim Alliance.”

“The Murim Alliance…!”

“Oh, one more thing. Right now, I also represent the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon—no, the Marquis of Shangshan.”

Namho smiled bitterly at Murong Su’s face, which had gone stiff as stone.

“Don’t look so surprised. I’m only offering you a chance.”

“A chance…?”

“Yes. A chance for those who haven’t strayed from the orthodox path.”

Namho knew.

No—Jin Taekyung knew.

There was light even in deep darkness, and darkness even in the brightest light.

That was why Jin Taekyung had sent Namho here.

[3564] Han refers to China’s majority ethnic group.

There was more than one way to eliminate a future threat. If what remained was not diseased plants but strong, green shoots, there was no reason to pull them up by the roots.

If we're the orthodox faction, shouldn't we at least live up to the name?

Remembering what Jin Taekyung had said before leaving the Jin Family of Taiyuan, Namho smiled faintly.

Then he addressed Murong Su and all the others who had come running, though barely a hundred of them remained.

"From this moment on, the Murong Family no longer exists."

"…!"

"Those who abandoned benevolence and righteousness and strayed from the orthodox path can no longer belong to the Murim Alliance's orthodox factions, nor can they be a great family."

His voice carried a force that seemed impossible for someone so small. Though he had put not a trace of internal energy into it, every word reached their ears clearly.

"But if any among you still walk the right path, the Murim Alliance will not cast you aside. That is the right thing to do."

Namho looked straight at Murong Su.

"As I said, the Murong Family no longer exists. The Murong household, however, is another matter."

This was not his decision alone. Every sect in the north and the Murim Alliance had agreed to it.

"If your innocence is proven in the future, the Murong family will have another chance to prove itself under a new Family Head."

"…!"

"…!"

At that moment, the hundred or so members of the family trembled.

They had thought everything was over. Now they had one last chance to clear their names and prove themselves—all because of the sacrifice and courage of the one man who had not abandoned them to the very end.

"Young Master!"

No longer retainers of the Murong Family but of the Murong household, they surrounded Murong Su with fervent voices and shining eyes.

The man they would soon call Family Head.

As Namho watched the scene with a calm gaze, he suddenly remembered something he had forgotten and smiled faintly.

The Five Great Families.

Together with the Nine Sects and One Gang, they were the fifteen pillars holding up the vast world of the Nine Provinces.

He already knew who would fill the vacant fifth seat left by the fall of the Murong name.

No—in fact, all the martial world knew.

Chapter 984

The saying that words without feet can travel a thousand ri[3565] was wrong. They could travel ten thousand—or even farther—in the blink of an eye.

The chain of events in the north spread with astonishing speed, and without end.

From person to person, on the beating wings of messenger eagles, and on the pounding hooves of horses driven by messengers' hurried whips.

Before long, the fallout from the truth that had come to light was enough to shake the entire Central Plains.

"How could the Murong Family…!"

"That's impossible. It can't be true!"

Disbelief was the first reaction of the martial artists who heard the news.

Of course it was.

The traitors exposed before the whole world weren't groups rooted in demonic, heterodox arts, like the Yangtze River Channel League or the Green Forest Alliance. They were none other than the Murong Family.

One of the Five Great Families.

Though based at the very edge of the north, it was a great family in the truest sense, renowned from the vast lands of Liaoning all the way to the Central Plains.

And yet that very Murong Family had supposedly joined forces with Dark Heaven.

Worse, it wasn't the work of a handful of rogue members. Most of the family, including its Family Head, Murong Baek, had been involved.

The shock this unbelievable news dealt to those who heard it was beyond words.

"The Family Head, the Divine Spear of the Imugi, distinguished himself in the Great Faction War. Why would he—or the Murong Family—do such a thing…?"

But their disbelief lasted only a moment.

The Beggars' Sect, the Lower District Sect, Huashan, and the Hebei Peng Family—and the Murim Alliance, the heart of the martial world—

all officially confirmed that every word of it was true, without the slightest falsehood.

Even the giant beyond the martial world—who existed, yet might as well not have—confirmed it.

"Clear the way!"

Groups of government soldiers, some numbering dozens and others hundreds, swept through the land.

[3565] A Korean ri is about 393 m (0.244 mi). The opening uses a Korean proverb.

For so long, they had spent their days leaning against their spears, their faces slack with the ease of a lasting peace. Now, fully armed, they carried out their orders with sharp eyes beneath their helmets, watching every direction.

“Hey, what’s going on?”

“How should I know? But with things this tense, I’d guess it has something to do with whatever happened in the Imperial Capital recently.”

“Oh, I heard about that too. You mean those bastards called Dark Heaven? I heard from a martial artist I know that they went on another rampage…”

This wasn’t happening in just one place.

Seeing the soldiers’ sudden change in demeanor, people gathered, both bewildered and on edge.

Before long, they read the proclamations the soldiers had posted all around before leaving.

> Let it be known to all under Heaven, to all the people:

That was how the proclamation began. Men of letters in every province had written it in a single flowing hand. Pressed forward under the crowd’s gaze, the scholars reading it aloud found their voices trembling more and more as the recitation went on.

> “…Th-therefore, I shall join forces with the martial men outside government service to make an example of the traitorous band known as Dark Heaven. This is my will and Heaven’s decree.”

Even after the lengthy recitation ended, the gathering remained silent as the grave.

Those who understood the sudden proclamation stared wide-eyed, like the scholars reading it. The country folk who didn’t understand glanced about and whispered under their breath.

“What in the world does that mean?”

“I don’t rightly know. Seems like ‘martial men who don’t belong to the government’ means martial artists, though… Couldn’t they just say it plain? Why’d they have to write it so fancy?”

They lived from day to day, earning only enough to eat.

They had been born with little chance to learn anything but hard work and how to use their bodies. Their pockets were always light, while their shoulders bore the [3566] A Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb); a thousand geun is 600 kg (about 1,320 lb).

weight of a thousand geun.[3566] How could they be expected to read a line of writing?

But there were always people who couldn't stand silence or ignorance.

"It is an imperial decree personally issued by His Majesty. He has declared Dark Heaven a band of traitors and announced to all his people that he will join forces with the martial artists of the world to punish them."

Only then did people look down.

Beneath the tiny letters was a clear imprint of a seal.

It was the mark of the imperial seal, reserved for only one person in all the vast Nine Provinces—one that countless people had never even seen.

Even those who couldn't read could tell at a glance that it was no ordinary seal.

"This is more serious than I expected. They're even borrowing the martial world's swords and spears."

At the young scholar's sudden remark, someone else murmured with a sigh.

"I've heard all the rumors about Dark Heaven, but… I never thought it was this bad."

The first to hear news from every corner of the world were martial artists and merchants.

People outside those circles rarely had their ear to the ground unless they had special connections. And even when something happened, they generally saw no reason to worry.

The Great Nation stood on a firm foundation.

The countless purges and provincial warlord rebellions that had followed its founding were long over.

With the passage of time, the world had settled into peace. Even during the calamity some fifty years ago that martial artists called the Great Faction War, the common people had suffered almost no harm.

Why?

It was simple.

Even the fanatics from far to the west, who bore the chilling name of the Demonic Cult, had feared the Great Nation joining the war.

They had wanted it to be seen as nothing more than a struggle between martial-world factions.

But…

"This time will be different. Different from any other."

When Shaolin Temple's Abbot, once likened to a living Buddha, entered nirvana and the grounds where only the peaceful sound of wooden fish[3567] had once echoed ran red with blood, no one there had felt anything beyond sorrow.

[3567] A wooden fish is a wooden percussion instrument used to mark the rhythm of Buddhist chanting.

It was the same when they heard that the Daoists of Qingcheng and Emei, who seemed like immortals, had fallen, and that the Sichuan Tang Clan—whose people had a reputation for being a fearsome bunch even among ordinary folk—had suffered terrible losses.

That was the Murim everyone knew.

In that cruel forest, where spears and swords ran wild in place of green trees, even venerable monks and Daoists could die at any moment.

No, there was another reason they had watched it all without much concern.

Whatever happens, surely nothing will happen to us.

They lived in different worlds, behind different walls.

The people had entrusted their safety to the Great Nation's walls. All they had done was watch the martial artists fight their fierce battles in their own domain.

Now and then, they pitied the unlucky common folk caught up in Murim affairs and killed. But that was all.

A fire blazing hundreds of li[3568] away couldn't warm everyone.

The people's feelings and interest burned hot for a moment, then quickly cooled.

Compared to the whole, the victims were only a handful. The rest could wake up tomorrow just fine.

They had the Great Nation, a great and sturdy wall.

But that unshakable faith was crumbling at that very moment.

"W-wait, sirs. Then what you're saying is…"

Gulp.

The village elder couldn't finish. He only swallowed dryly, and the old scholar spoke in his place.

He spoke the truth no one wanted to believe or even hear.

The truth they had no choice but to face.

"That's right. It's exactly what you think."

He let out a quiet sigh.

The old scholar looked down at his wrinkled hands, etched with the marks of time.

He remembered when they had been white and smooth.

He remembered his younger self, with so many possibilities before him, unable to go any farther because an age of chaos refused to end. He remembered those turbulent years.

Slowly, he continued.

"The war has already begun."

"…!"

"…!"

[3568] A Chinese li, used for distances in this setting, is 500 m (0.311 mi).

Some clenched their teeth and fists. Others squeezed their eyes shut.

Soundless shock surged through the crowd like a wave.

The word war spread in every direction, carried in wide-open eyes and slackened lips.

Along broad avenues, through narrow, dark alleys, and with the hurried footsteps of those rushing to carry the unbelievable news onward.

War.

The flames of a great war that would burn everything.

At that moment, the old scholar saw it.

The darkness that had slumbered for so many years had finally awoken, painting everyone's faces with despair.

And suddenly, he repeated in his mind an unfamiliar name from the proclamation bearing the Son of Heaven's command.

Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

No—the Marquis of Shangshan, Jin Taekyung.

The foremost contributor to stopping this rebellion, a martial artist still so young, yet raised to the rank of marquis.

I don't know much about the affairs of the martial world… but one thing is certain.

The old scholar had once served in government. He could guess well enough what future awaited that young martial artist, who had achieved something without precedent—and something that would never happen again.

I don't know who you are, but please, give it everything you have and keep moving forward. Not only for the Murim you've always known, but for this country as well.

Though his words would never reach him, the old scholar bowed toward the proclamation.

First, to the Son of Heaven, who watched over all things from the distant Imperial Capital.

Second, to the countless heroic souls who would shed their blood and fall to protect this world.

And lastly, to the new marquis who stood at the heart of the martial world by virtue of the solemn imperial decree.

The old scholar continued to bow.

In full view of the crowd, he did so silently, offering all the respect and sincerity he could.

And thousands of li[3569] away, in a narrow gorge, bright yellow chrysanthemums colored the landscape in every direction.

[3569] A Chinese li, used for distances in this setting, is 500 m (0.311 mi).

I'd heard of the Double Ninth Festival[3570] a few times in passing, but that was about all I knew.

As a Korean born and raised, I'd always observed the big holidays like Lunar New Year and Chuseok.[3571] But I didn't have so much time on my hands that I could take an interest in the customs of those guys on the continent.

Today, though, I followed the customs of the Double Ninth Festival[3572] too.

I held more bright yellow chrysanthemums than my arms could contain, and awkwardly wore a pouch of cornelian berries at my side.

It was a way to honor those who had passed before they could celebrate the Double Ninth Festival[3573] themselves.

And we had to keep moving forward, leaving their sacrifice behind us.

Whoosh.

Wind from far away stirred the chrysanthemums in my arms.

It came out of nowhere and tugged insistently at them, as if taking them by the hand. Several petals, large and small, gave in and went along with it.

Before long, they fluttered through the air like a rain of flowers.

Riding the wind, they swam through the twists and turns of the Eight Spring Gorge, as those who had lived on this land long ago had named it.

Ah.

I swallowed the exclamation that almost escaped me.

It was beautiful and, at the same time, unbearably sad.

I wasn't the only one who felt it. Tens of thousands of people filled the Eight Spring Gorge, and I knew they felt it too.

Watching the yellow petals fall, I found myself wondering: Even now, as they drifted farther and farther away with the wind, were they only petals? Or were they the souls of those who had willingly thrown away their lives to protect what they cherished?

There was no single right answer.

There was no need to find one.

We could believe whatever we wanted to believe. Someday, we would return here and remember them.

Each in our own way.

With laughter. With chrysanthemums and cornelian berries.

Or…

With tears.

[3570] The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month.

[3571] Chuseok is a Korean harvest festival celebrated on the fifteenth day of the eighth lunar month.

[3572] The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month.

[3573] The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month.

Drip. Drip, drip.

Senses far beyond human limits sometimes told me things I didn’t want to know.

Like the tears wetting the leather shoes of a man whose head was bowed and whose body was trembling slightly.

No. Raindrops.

Yeah. That’s how it is.

I quietly looked up at the sky.

I couldn’t bring myself to look at Jin Wikyung like that, or at Lee Seowol silently mourning the death of her uncle, who had been her strongest support, or at the countless others in tears.

Whoosh.

The wind blew again.

The rain of flowers rose high, then fell around everyone as if to comfort them.

Yet beneath a sky clearer than ever, countless raindrops kept falling.

The Double Ninth Festival[3574] had passed, but the chrysanthemums hadn’t withered.

I knew that those who had left and those who remained were all here together.

And I knew that because of them, the road ahead had grown wider and brighter.

Ding.

A clear chime rang through the sky, mingling with the rain of flowers.

[3574] The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month.

Chapter 985

Leaving behind countless tears and a ceaseless rain of petals, tens of thousands of people—martial artists and ordinary folk alike—departed Eight Spring Gorge and returned to their places.

The memorial for the departed, and the belated Double Ninth Festival,[3575] had come to an end. But those who remained had to keep moving forward, toward tomorrow and the day after.

And when we returned to the Jin Family of Taiyuan, more than the few family members left behind in case of an emergency were waiting for us.

“My name is Huang. I serve, though inadequately, as a Hall Master of the Murim Alliance. I’ve come to deliver a message from the Alliance Leader.”

The Murim Alliance’s envoy introduced himself with impeccable courtesy, and everyone’s gaze turned toward the three of us brothers.

More precisely, toward Jin Wikyung.

“I see.”

His voice was calm, though the corners of his eyes were still red.

As if welcoming a guest he had long expected, Jin Wikyung calmly led the envoy inside.

“Before we talk, please come in and rest after your journey.”

“I’m deeply grateful for your consideration, Great Hero Jin.”

In that moment, an unmistakable emotion passed over the faces of the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s senior members and the Sect Leaders under its protection.

It wasn’t only because the envoy bowed so deeply, with genuine respect and reverence.

Great Hero.

Just two words, but they carried a special weight.

This wasn’t some nobody, one of those self-important fools forever puffing each other up. A renowned master of the martial world, entrusted with the important position of Hall Master in the Murim Alliance, had come as an envoy and addressed him that way.

Everything is changing.

I, too, felt the weight of it all over again.

Jin Wikyung was no longer the Lesser Family Head who had led a fading family in place of a father whose whereabouts were unknown. Nor was he merely a young martial artist.

[3575] The Double Ninth Festival, or Jungyangjeol in Korean, falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month.

He was the ruler of Shanxi Province, another Alliance Leader recognized by everyone in this land.

No, now he was…

“What are you thinking about so hard?”

At Hyuk Mujin’s sudden question in my ear, I shook my head.

“Nothing.”

“Doesn’t look like nothing.”

“Mujin.”

“Yes?”

“Want me to make your life a living hell?”

“…No. I was just going to tell you to hurry up and follow them. You were standing there by yourself.”

Hyuk Mujin was right.

Behind Jin Wikyung, who strode forward with confidence, came the Murim Alliance’s envoy, the family’s senior members, and the Sect Leaders under the Jin Family of Taiyuan, including Lee Seowol.

Their faces held a mixture of grief that had not yet faded and joy over something soon to become reality.

I watched them walk away in silence, then turned and headed in another direction.

“Huh? Where are you going?”

“No idea. Wherever I feel like.”

“What do you mean? Maybe someone else could miss it, but you of all people shouldn’t, Captain.”

“Doesn’t matter. I more or less know what they’re going to say anyway.”

“What?”

Hyuk Mujin tilted his head in confusion, then hurried after me. Hearing his footsteps behind me, I laughed softly.

At the same time, a memory came to me.

Eight Spring Gorge.

The narrow gorge that had swallowed so many lives, and the clear chime that rang out amid the rain of petals.

The holographic window that had announced yet another change.

Ding. Ding-ding.

SYSTEM

Since the world first began, nothing beneath the heavens has been eternal. The vast land and sea, the countless lives that dwell within them, and even the mighty power held by the rarest few are no exception.
No flower stays red for ten days (□□□□□), and no matter how great one's power, it does not last ten years (□□□□).
But when a tree's roots run deep, its branches grow thick (□□□□). When a spring runs deep, its waters flow far (□□□□). At last, it will become another world where many can dwell and find rest.

As the System had told me, the Jin Family of Taiyuan, once rotting like an ancient tree, had now become a forest.

It bore fruit at the ends of countless branches and created a lake as vast as the sea.

Though they might lack strength, the people I had seen and known among them had always been just and righteous.

Unlike those who had chosen the wrong path, seized by anger and greed.

SYSTEM

The Murong Family has fallen. They are no longer one of the Five Great Families.
At long last, the fame of the Jin Family of Taiyuan resounds throughout the world!
The fame and power of the Jin Family of Taiyuan have risen to that of a member of the Five Great Families!

The Nine Sects and One Gang. The Five Great Families.

Fifteen pillars that had upheld the martial world for hundreds of years.

And now, the Jin Family of Taiyuan had become one of those mighty pillars.

It wasn't simply because the Murim Alliance had appointed them, or because renowned masters from across the martial world had strongly urged it.

The whole world had accepted it. They had recognized the Jin Family's courage in standing against an army of tens of thousands.

They had recognized its resolve to protect not just Murim, but this land and its people.

And so, the provincial martial family that had once been slowly fading, its glory behind it, had come together and grown stronger than ever.

SYSTEM

The Title Scion of a Prestigious Family has been removed!
You have acquired a new Title: Direct Descendant of a Prestigious Family!
As your family's standing has risen, you have gained a tremendous amount of Fame!
Hidden Quest Might As Well Go All the Way to the Five Great Families successfully completed!
You have earned the very rare Achievement Dad, Where Are You? Glory and blessings to the three Jin Family brothers, who overcame countless hardships and trials through their own efforts!
Jin Wikyung and Jin Mukyung have been granted the effects of Amazing Natural Healing and various bonus buffs. It goes without saying that these effects will not be displayed to the individuals in question.
You have acquired 10 bonus stat points as an Achievement reward!
You have gained a tremendous amount of EXP!
Level Up!
You have gained a tremendous amount of Fame!
Your name and reputation have now reached beyond Murim and across the world. You are a feudal lord appointed by the Son of Heaven,[3576] a successor of the Fire King Jeok Cheongang, and a great martial artist in your own right.
Your footsteps have been inscribed in history.
Martial artists have begun to speak cautiously of the glorious Title granted to only ten martial artists beneath the vast sky and its three stars. They speak of the birth of a new young king.
Nothing has been decided yet. Just as the small flap of a butterfly's wings can bring a typhoon from afar, each of your choices, big or small, will gradually change this world.
But remember: time keeps moving.
May you have good fortune in Murim.

The System window had been far longer than usual. It had made the changes all the more palpable, but as always, it ended with a wish for good fortune in Murim.

For the first time in a long while, there was no follow-up Quest.

And yet that was the one thing that left me uneasy, even in the peace that had finally arrived.

[3576] "Son of Heaven" is a traditional title for the Chinese emperor.

What is this? I was sure something else would happen.

It had been a long time since I'd cared about getting stronger just for the sake of it.

In the Quests that came one after another, someone's death had been so inevitable that it might as well have been written into the bargain. And the burden I carried had grown just as heavy.

On top of that, a greater crisis than ever hung over all of Murim.

They're not the type to back off just because this plan failed.

It had always been like that.

Dark Heaven had carried out numerous schemes across Murim. Since murdering the Dharma King Hong Dao and stealing Shaolin Temple's divine artifact, the Green Jade Buddha Staff, they hadn't made a move anyone could call a success.

And yet, in Sichuan. In Hubei.

Then Nanman,[3577] the Imperial Palace, and now even here in Shanxi Province, they had brought one blood-soaked disaster after another.

The Murong Family's betrayal and the nomads' invasion were certainly huge events. But the forces Dark Heaven has revealed in the process are still far below what I expected.

Apart from the four Demon Lords and Demon Empress who were certainly key figures within Dark Heaven, more than half the enemies we had fought so far had been traitors and underlings.

In other words, it was as if they'd recruited their forces locally.

And they still haven't shown themselves. Why? And why keep up this string of costly battles that lead only to failure?

My steps had carried me onward without my noticing, but I stopped and frowned.

Then another memory came to me: part of a conversation with Murong Baek, Family Head of the Murong Family, who had met his end as the North Heaven Demon Lord.

"If that's what you all believe, fine. There's nothing wrong with continuing to hope."

"What?"

"Now that I'm in this situation, I find myself wondering why the Western Heaven Demon Lord, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress, and the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord failed. How did a plan prepared so carefully for so long fall apart in an instant?"

We never found out what those incomprehensible words meant.

The North Heaven Demon Lord died without explaining them.

But even after I drove the spearhead into his heart, and even now, days after all the fighting had ended, I remembered every detail of that moment clearly.

[3577] Nanman is a historical Chinese term for peoples and regions to the south.

His utterly calm voice and expression.

The North Heaven Demon Lord had been ready to die. He'd proved it moments later by drawing on even his innate qi.

He wasn't just saying it to shake my composure.

I know how honest a person can become when facing certain death.

At the end of a life they've chosen for themselves, people don't tell lies.

Then why? Why say that at all?

Of course, the North Heaven Demon Lord's tone and manner had given me some idea.

I just hadn't thought much about it because the possibility seemed so utterly unrealistic.

It was as if he thought this situation had been fated from the beginning—or as if he, too, had been used…

No matter how I looked at it, it made no sense.

After the fierce battle ended, I'd shared my thoughts with Jeok Cheongang. He'd answered more firmly than ever.

"Fate, my ass. And as much as those bastards deserve to die, you think masters that powerful grow on trees?"

"Yeah. Something does seem off, doesn't it?"

"Lord of Heaven. No matter how powerful that bastard is, he can't use people like them as disposable pawns. Not unless they've had their heads cracked open a couple of times by my Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist."

He was right.

There wasn't a madman anywhere in the world who would use Supreme Peak masters as pawns.

The Bow Saint hadn't agreed or disagreed. She'd only made an inscrutable face, but whatever she might have said probably wouldn't have differed much from Jeok Cheongang's answer.

No. Then why say it at all? And what's with this suspiciously quiet stretch of time?

I screwed up my face and thought it over.

Had he just spouted bullshit before he died? Or had his words carried some other meaning none of us, myself included, could guess?

As I clung to that endless chain of thoughts, a familiar voice suddenly broke in.

"No wonder you never came, even after I waited all that time. So this is where you were."

Jeok Cheongang.

His expression was heavier than ever. His voice was low and subdued as he continued.

"Come with me. There's someone who wants to see you."

Chapter 986

Truth be told, I'd had some idea from the start.

Jeok Cheongang's expression and tone were nothing like usual. Grief lay beneath his low, subdued voice—something the giant known as the Fire King rarely let anyone see.

But…

As always, a bad feeling never misses.

"You've arrived."

The first person to greet us was the Medicine King Hall Master, who had been standing guard at the door.

As he picked up his bundle and prepared to leave, Jeok Cheongang spoke quietly.

"As I asked, please don't tell anyone."

"…"

"Thank you. You're an excellent physician."

The Medicine King Hall Master bowed his head slightly without a word and left. Only then could we face the man waiting inside.

"Oh, you brought him sooner than I expected. That old man's legs are so short, I figured it'd take another seven days and nights."

Another giant had regained consciousness after several days.

I watched the Thunderbolt Saber King laugh heartily at his own joke. Only when Jeok Cheongang nudged my shoulder did I belatedly clasp my hands in a salute, showing him all the respect I could.

"I am Jin Taekyung, a humble junior of Murim. It's an honor to meet you, Great Hero Peng."

"Enough. Too much humility can be its own poison. If you're a humble junior, are all the other juniors in the world dead?"

The Thunderbolt Saber King smiled at me with satisfaction, then turned to Jeok Cheongang.

"Now that I've seen him, I'd say you were complaining for nothing. You kept telling me he ran wilder every day, like a brat with no respect for his elders."

"Friend, my ass. You've got a lot of nerve talking to someone so much older than you like that."

Jeok Cheongang tried to sound as gruff as ever, but he couldn't hide the heaviness in his eyes.

Whether the Thunderbolt Saber King noticed or not, he laughed even louder.

"Wahaha! What are you so sore about? We're both getting old."

"Don't you know the Three Bonds and Five Relationships[3578]? Never heard of respect for elders?"

"Would knowing them get someone to feed me? Or make my martial arts stronger?"

"Forget it. I'm the fool for trying to discuss this with an ignorant Peng."

"Admitting your own shortcomings. I like it. I was just getting tired of talking to a stinky old man, so this works out nicely. Don't you agree?"

At the Thunderbolt Saber King's offhand question, I nodded.

"Well, my Master is a little old."

"What did you say? Hahaha!"

A booming laugh rang out.

It didn't suit the Thunderbolt Saber King's pallid face. It was so loud it sounded forced.

No. It probably was forced.

What you could see with your eyes wasn't everything. I could feel it.

Even now, the qi within the Thunderbolt Saber King wavered precariously, like a glass vessel cracked all over.

Like a flame that could go out at any moment.

"I heard you wanted to see me."

At my somber words, the Thunderbolt Saber King seemed to realize I'd noticed his condition. He spoke with a smile still on his face.

"Perceptive, aren't you? You're worlds apart from the last time I saw you. The Fire King may not be good at much else, but he's raised his Disciple well."

"…"

"No need to look so miserable. For martial artists like us, life and death come with the territory."

He was right.

That was the life of a martial artist.

The Thunderbolt Saber King had spent his life making his way through a mountain of sabers and a forest of swords, past countless threats and schemes. Now he accepted what lay ahead with calm composure.

"I had a very long dream. In it, I looked back on my whole life. I even saw my friend Murong Baek as a young man again, for the first time in ages."

"Friend, my ass. That bastard deserved to die."

The Thunderbolt Saber King let out a quiet laugh at Jeok Cheongang's remark and continued.

[3578]The Three Bonds and Five Relationships are Confucian principles governing duties between people, including those between elders and juniors.

“That’s all in the past. Nothing to be done about it now. No use trying to gather up spilled water. In the end, we stopped Dark Heaven’s plot and saved more people. That’s enough for me.”

He was famous for a temper as fiery as Jeok Cheongang’s, yet he looked at me with eyes as still as a pond.

“When I first saw you at the Star-Array Grand Banquet, I had a feeling you’d accomplish great things before long. We could all tell you’d become a pillar of the world, protecting it alongside the Sword Saint’s Disciple.”

Of course, I’d been inexperienced back then.

I couldn’t stand shoulder to shoulder with so many powerful masters the way I could now. The monster known as the Blood Lord had crushed me.

“But no one expected you to grow so much, so quickly.”

The threats to my life had come one after another, each greater than the last, and I’d grown at a staggering pace because of them.

Fast enough to make even those who’d watched me most closely doubt their eyes.

“That’s why I asked for you right away. This is my last chance to put the little time and energy I have left to the best possible use.”

“…You mean…”

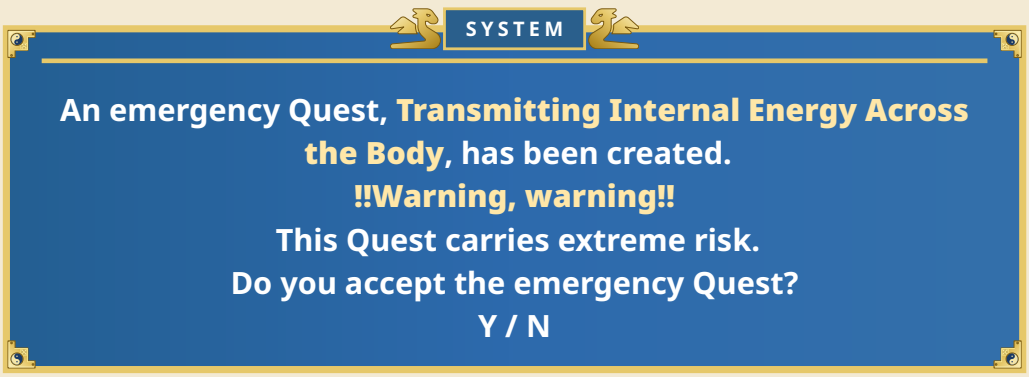
“They say an ordinary tiger leaves its hide behind when it dies. The great tiger of Hebei will be different.”

At the Thunderbolt Saber King’s faint smile, I finally understood why he’d asked to see me before his own flesh and blood. He had barely regained consciousness, and death was already at his door.

“Take it. Everything I have left.”

The moment his calm voice rang out—

Ding.



Through the holographic window that had appeared with the clear chime, I stared silently at the Thunderbolt Saber King’s smiling face.

Then, all at once, I spoke.

“Why… Why did you choose me?”

His answer came without the slightest hesitation.

“Because I believe in you.”

“…!”

“And I’m not the only one. The Dharma King believes in you. Your Master believes in you. Now the whole world believes in you.”

I could hardly breathe.

My heart tightened, and my blood seemed to surge through my veins.

Through it all, the Thunderbolt Saber King’s voice reached me clearly.

“This is all for the world, not for you. Do you need any other reason?”

“No.”

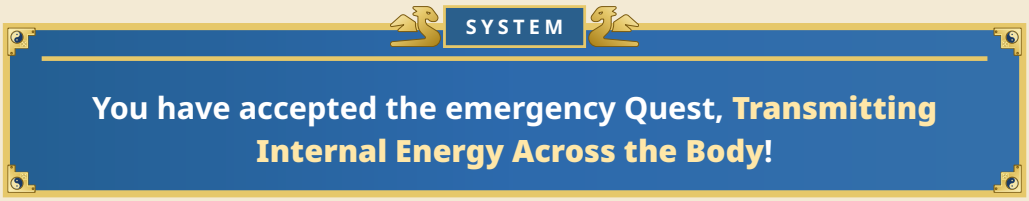
I took a small, steadying breath and continued.

“That’s reason enough.”

A smile crossed the Thunderbolt Saber King’s pallid face.

“Sit in the lotus position.”

Ding.



Internal energy was an intangible force that existed everywhere in the world.

Those who practiced martial arts accumulated it within their bodies. Through grueling training, they strengthened body and mind, hoping to step beyond human limits into the realm of the superhuman.

But not everyone wanted that kind of power.

The more energy they accumulated, the greater the backlash it could bring.

If someone tried to circulate their internal energy recklessly by following an incorrect formula, they were likely to end up crippled. And without enlightenment, many fell into a heart demon[3579] and became half-mad.

Even so, martial artists’ desire to reach ever higher realms rarely faded.

Theirs was a world ruled by the law of the jungle.

They devised all kinds of ways to grow stronger more safely and quickly. In the process, they discovered one astonishing method.

What if, instead of spending years accumulating internal energy, you received someone else’s in its entirety?

[3579] A heart demon is an inner obsession or mental disturbance that can obstruct spiritual or martial cultivation.

Inherit the power of an old master on the verge of death? Huh? Isn't that basically rock honey[3580]?

That was how Transmitting Internal Energy Across the Body came into being in the distant past.

And from the moment it did, it became a taboo—something never to be attempted.

The reason was simple.

It looked sweet on the surface, but in reality, it was a double-edged sword.

No, even calling it that was laughable. Failures overwhelmingly outnumbered successes.

"M-Master!"

"No!"

People died. And died. And died again.

Even those lucky enough to survive often ended up crippled, their qi and blood tangled within them, or could never regain their former martial prowess. The attempts cost the world Supreme Peak masters who had dominated their eras, along with gifted young prodigies.

So when the Thunderbolt Saber King told Jin Taekyung he intended to transmit his internal energy to him, Jeok Cheongang could only ask in disbelief:

"Have you gone mad?"

"Not at all."

"No, you're definitely mad. Normally, you'd be flying into a rage by now."

"I've only been awake for half a shichen[3581], but my mind is unbelievably clear. I can't remember ever being this sharp in my life."

"Well, that's a hell of a thing to celebrate. Does that mean you can finally finish the Thousand Character Classic?"

"Cut the nonsense. You know this isn't simply madness."

In truth, the Thunderbolt Saber King was right.

Jeok Cheongang had answered that way only on reflex. In his heart, he was already weighing the chances that this insane undertaking could succeed.

"I hate to admit it, but that precious Disciple of yours could withstand Transmitting Internal Energy Across the Body. He and that child Cheongpung were both born with the good fortune of a Heavenly Martial Physique, weren't they?"

"…The Heavenly Martial Physique."

"If that were all, I wouldn't be having this conversation with you. He has the Muscles and Bones Heaven granted him, as well as enough potential and insight as a martial artist."

[3580] Seokcheong, or rock honey, is wild honey gathered from bees nesting in rock crevices. In martial arts fiction, it is often imagined as a potent tonic.

[3581] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is approximately one hour.

A few months earlier, Jeok Cheongang would never have accepted a proposal that put his Disciple's life at risk, no matter how strongly anyone pressed him.

Not even from the Thunderbolt Saber King, who now stood at death's door after decades in which their rivalry had grown into a grudging affection.

But Jeok Cheongang had since heard the truth from Jin Taekyung himself.

There's a chance. No, he has what it takes.

A transfer of internal energy between two Supreme Peak masters who had reached their realms. There was no precedent for it in the long history of Murim.

And Jin Taekyung, whose superhuman body could only be described as a Heavenly Martial Physique, possessed one more strange power.

The Prison of Karma.

A divine strength that could purify his body and even heal injuries.

With that power, he had a chance as long as he remained alive.

Besides…

He's already succeeded at Transmitting Internal Energy Across the Body once.

Jeok Cheongang had heard about it only later: Jin Taekyung had received the internal energy of the Heavenly Power Demon, a great fiend of the Demonic Cult imprisoned in the Sichuan Tang Clan's underground prison, and gone on to defeat the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

When Jeok Cheongang first heard, the knowledge that his Disciple had nearly died had almost made his heart burst. But the differences between then and now were clear.

The desperate circumstances were different. So was the martial prowess Jin Taekyung had since achieved.

He can do it. No…

He will do it.

He had to.

Jeok Cheongang steadied his wavering heart with firm resolve and watched the two men, joined through the Great Palace acupoint, his gaze deep and subdued.

Whoosh.

Internal energy beyond anything ever seen surged out in every direction.

Chapter 987

I still remember every moment of the day I first circulated my qi.

The qi-sea acupoint.

The energy I first encountered inside my body, in the place also known as the lower dantian, was pitiful.

Its name meant “sea of qi,” which felt almost laughable. In that cramped vessel, more like a little stream than a sea, only a handful of murky energy rippled.

That was right.

It had definitely been that way.

But…

Now it was different.

Ding.

SYSTEM

An emergency Quest, Transmitting Internal Energy Across the Body, has begun.
Transmitting Internal Energy Across the Body carries extreme risks. If anything goes wrong while internal energy is being transferred and absorbed, it may lead to qi deviation or death.

As the System’s notification gradually faded into the distance, my consciousness sank deep into my body.

When my eyes opened within that world, an endless ocean stretched before me.

Roooooar.

It stretched beyond sight. And it was hot.

Instead of clear blue waves, waves of fire surged without end.

An ocean of flame, vast beyond measure.

At its center, a gigantic fire dragon lay coiled atop a reef as black as pitch.

That’s…

I knew instinctively the moment I saw it.

In this place, filled with nothing but flames and heat, the reef where the fire dragon had made its home stood out as something especially alien.

The energy I received from the Heavenly Power Demon.

How could I forget?

The Heavenly Power Demon, once a great fiend of the Demonic Cult who had shaken the whole world, had passed his internal energy to me and asked me to defeat the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

Decades of imprisonment and torture had worn him down, leaving him with far less internal energy than his old reputation suggested. Perhaps that was why Transmitting Internal Energy Across the Body had succeeded without killing me.

Put too much power into a vessel, and you break it.

The Heavenly Power Demon's energy had remained inside me ever since.

That energy served as the nest of the fire dragon, the very embodiment of Scorching Yang Qi born of the Fire Gate Clan's martial arts.

The two had coexisted well enough. They had even sustained each other. But now I instinctively understood something.

If I wanted to climb higher, I had to bring this strange relationship between two energies with different roots to an end.

Wake up.

The world around me responded to my focused will.

An unseen vibration swept across the ocean of flames and reached the fire dragon sleeping peacefully atop the reef.

Rumble.

Its massive body trembled. At last, its eyelids lifted, revealing blue-white eyes fixed directly on me.

The vertically slit eyes of a vicious beast.

But the emotion within them wasn't anger at being woken. It was obedience to its master.

Of course.

The fire dragon and the reef were both, in the end, part of this ocean.

And the master of this vast world deep inside my body was none other than me.

So, the instant our eyes met, that tremendous concentration of Scorching Yang Qi joined with my consciousness.

Whoosh!

Warmth and consciousness mingled.

My vision turned blue-white. One with the fire dragon, I flung out both arms without hesitation.

No—I spread wings as vast as my body and took flight.

Boom!

The reef shook as though an earthquake had struck. With a shockwave, I shot into the air and drew a deep breath high above it.

Hummm.

The energy, compressed layer upon layer, screamed.

Appalling heat surged from deep inside my body and raced up to my throat. If it hadn't been mine, it would have reduced me to ash long ago.

Now.

There was no hesitation. With the breath I finally released, pale blue flames burst forth and wrapped around the reef.

Before that hellfire, powerful enough to destroy the world, the pitch-black reef began to lose its shape and melt.

Then it was swept up by the waves of fire surging all around, rising high into the air. Having just breathed out a torrent of hellfire, I opened my mouth toward it.

Whooosh.

The moment I swallowed the dark-red liquid into which the reef had melted—

Gasp…!

My breath caught. It felt as though invisible blades were savagely carving through my insides.

Sharp pain assailed my mind before I could take any satisfaction in having quenched my thirst.

But I clenched my teeth.

I steadied my wavering mind and used all my strength to swallow back the energy surging up my throat.

So it could never regain its original form.

So it could dissolve into me anew.

My endurance and that choice were soon rewarded.

Rumble.

I could feel it.

Power swelling inside me.

The reef—or rather, the Heavenly Power Demon's energy—hadn't vanished.

I had absorbed it. In another sense, we had found a new way to coexist.

Unlike before, when it had been imperfect, now it had melted together into one. A perfect coexistence.

And with that astonishing change, something else began.

Rrrrrumble!

The world, red with flame, flashed.

A massive bolt of lightning split open the closed sky and pierced the ocean of flames.

Ah.

Before I could fully feel the change in my power, a genuine exclamation escaped me.

Yes.

It was a thunderbolt in the truest sense of the word.

The end of a long and fierce life.

It was the symbol of a giant standing at death's door—and the final legacy he meant to leave in this world through me.

As that massive bolt of lightning finally entered deep into my body through the Great Palace Acupoint, I moved toward it as if entranced.

I followed it upward and upward, along the current joining sea to sky.

Whooosh!

I couldn't hear it. And yet I seemed to hear it.

The sound of the fierce wind.

Everything I felt through the fire dragon's massive body, which had long since come to feel like my own.

My consciousness raced into the depths, perceiving everything as reality. I had risen so high that the ocean was no longer visible, and at last I saw it.

A gigantic mountain rising as though it would pierce the sky.

I already knew what it was.

The Middle Dantian.

The mountain known as the Jade Hall Acupoint glittered like a jewel, just as its name suggested.

All but one part of it: the highest peak.

Why? How come?

The question had barely surfaced before I found the answer.

It means I'm still not ready.

It had been quite some time since I opened my Middle Dantian, but even my incredible pace of growth had its limits.

That peak belonged to the realm of enlightenment.

A realm only those with heaven-given talent, blood-soaked effort, and long years behind them could enter.

Even after growing stronger at a dazzling pace, I couldn't easily reach that height.

But…

If not now, when will I ever get another chance to try?

I'd had countless strokes of good fortune, but heavenly fortune never came easily.

And an opportunity created by someone prepared to die was one I would never see again.

Let's go.

Maybe my hesitation had vanished the moment all this began. Maybe the System's warning had lost its meaning then, too.

I'd already swallowed the Heavenly Power Demon's energy. I already knew what I had to do.

Crackle. Crackle-crackle!

The bolt of lightning kept shining, refusing to fade.

I leaped into its massive pillar of light.

Rooooar!

Everything turned white. Agony beyond anything I'd felt while absorbing the Heavenly Power Demon's energy wrung every muscle in my body and burned away my consciousness.

Gyaaaah!

I didn't know where I was.

I couldn't tell whether the desperate scream ringing in my mind was mine or the fire dragon's.

As my consciousness grew hazy, all I heard was someone's thunderous shout.

"Hah!"

The instant Jeok Cheongang's unmistakable shout rang out—

"…!"

My rapidly sinking consciousness snapped awake.

Strength returned to my limp body. Memories of reality came back to me.

Who I was. Where I was.

And…

What I had to do for everyone who had believed in me, a callow, inadequate brat.

Endure. And keep enduring.

With all my strength, I bore the pain that kept tearing through my body.

I mustered the Scorching Yang Qi within the fire dragon and the Heavenly Power Demon's energy I'd just absorbed. Drawing on every last scrap of strength, I bit into the pillar of lightning.

Crunch. Crunch.

Lightning flashed before my eyes. It held everything that giant had been, and now it was numbing my mind beyond the point of pain.

Luckily for me.

Fuck, it's not like I've never shit blood before.

At some point, I started laughing like a madman.

I bit into the lightning, swallowed it, and kept going without pause, even as I nearly blacked out from the pain I'd known was coming.

Until the distant flash that had filled my vision slowly dimmed.

Until at last it vanished completely, as though it had never existed.

Rumble.

Suddenly, through my hazy consciousness, I realized:

The massive bolt of lightning that had connected my Middle and Lower Dantians was gone.

The thunder I could hear from somewhere was ringing out inside me.

I did it…

The moment I understood that Transmitting Internal Energy Across the Body had succeeded—

Ding. Ding. Ding-ding-ding!

Clear chimes began ringing without pause, somewhere far off in my consciousness.

But the sound hadn’t come from the ocean of the Lower Dantian, now far in the distance, or from the peak of the Middle Dantian, finally glowing like a brilliant jewel.

I raised my head and saw it.

Clouds beyond the mountain peak’s reach.

Another world hidden behind them.

The upper dantian.

I was thirsty. With my goal achieved, my consciousness, which had nearly unraveled to a thread, began to grow clearer.

It was thirst. Longing.

More, more, more…!

I wanted to grow stronger. I wanted to go farther.

I wanted to break through those white clouds, soar above them, and look down on everything.

But I had to force down that burning thirst and longing.

I was already at my limit.

Any more would be greed.

I knew what this momentary impulse would bring.

Next time. I swear.

With that vow, I looked down over the mountain and ocean that had become wholly mine.

For the first time, I faced the essence within the three currents of energy, now united, and the vast power they formed.

No—I became one with it.

Ah. Ahhh.

I shuddered and groaned.

I floundered in my fading consciousness.

Enveloped in a dazzling radiance where three lights mingled, I forgot everything around me.

No-self.

As I sank into that endless swamp of consciousness, I heard a voice like a hallucination.

“Good judgment. Just like back then.”

The voice felt unfamiliar, yet somehow familiar, as though I’d heard it before.

Then the thread of my consciousness snapped.

Chapter 988

At some point, the Thunderbolt Saber King, Peng Cheolhu, had begun to laugh without a sound.

Even as the several sixty-year cycles' worth of internal energy he'd accumulated, along with every ounce of strength in his body, melted away and vanished, the clear smile at the corners of his wrinkled mouth remained.

Just like the brilliant halo of light still brightening his view in this very moment.

Whoooosh.

The wind howled.

An energy unlike anything seen before swelled within it. Three lights, each a different color, drew together and mingled without pause.

And at last, they changed.

Whoosh!

The air turned searing hot. Through it, the Thunderbolt Saber King saw three radiant flower buds bloom.

No—what he saw was a young man seated cross-legged, slowly rising into the air.

Yes. I suppose so.

He was witnessing Three Flowers Gather at the Crown, the realm every martial artist in Murim dreamed of reaching. But he wasn't surprised.

He'd walked this path himself once. And it was someone else's present.

The Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung.

Heir to the Fire Gate Clan and successor to the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

The Thunderbolt Saber King knew. He believed it, too.

For that callow brat, who'd only passed twenty two years ago, the realm of Three Flowers Gather at the Crown was nothing more than a step on the way to a greater height.

Even now, Jin Taekyung was moving toward the next step.

Before long, the Thunderbolt Saber King saw that belief become reality.

Fwoosh.

The three flower buds suddenly caught fire.

After a fierce struggle, the Extreme Yang flames swallowed the pitch-black energy. The moment five rings formed, the Thunderbolt Saber King gave a quiet laugh.

Beyond Three Flowers Gather at the Crown… Five Qi Returning to Origin.

Jin Taekyung probably didn't know exactly what those five rings meant.

But the Thunderbolt Saber King did.

No, every martial artist under Heaven knew. To set foot in the realm of Five Qi Returning to Origin was to meet the bare minimum qualification for being called a king across the vast Nine Provinces.

But the transformation didn't end there.

Crackle!

Flame and lightning intertwined.

The struggle between the hellfire that had swallowed the darkness and the thunderbolt was fierce, desperate enough to leave Jin Taekyung trembling with pain as he floated in the air.

A tremendous reverberation burst from his body and spread in every direction, far beyond the pavilion.

"Hah!"

At Jeok Cheongang's sudden shout, Jin Taekyung's violent trembling slowly began to subside.

His face, contorted like a fiend's by the terrible pain, took on a new expression.

Will.

It was Will: a fierce resolve to break rather than yield, to get past this wall and reach higher still.

When the Thunderbolt Saber King felt Jin Taekyung's Will, he was finally certain.

I made the right choice.

A smile brighter than any before spread across his face.

He watched the internal energy he'd spent a lifetime accumulating—those long years, and the little life he had left—melt into the flames. Then he spoke, making his voice gruff despite everything he felt.

"Damn it. I've done nothing but good things for the Fire Gate Clan before I go."

The old master gazed at his Disciple, enveloped in the energy that had finally become one amid the distant blaze of light, and answered.

"If you're so sore about it, you should've had more kids. If you'd tried a little harder, maybe the Peng Family would've had a brat like him."

"Would you listen to this senile old man? You took a monster for a Disciple by pure luck, and now you're saying whatever you please."

"That's right. I was lucky."

"Damn it. Don't admit it!"

"Why not?"

"Because if you admit it that easily, I've got nothing to say."

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, and the Thunderbolt Saber King, Peng Cheolhu, looked at each other and chuckled.

"Remember that time?"

"What time?"

“Just after the Great Faction War ended, I think. When we all got together for a drink to celebrate.”

“Oh, the day you mouthed off to this old man and got a bloody nose?”

The Thunderbolt Saber King frowned.

“Get it straight. We were evenly matched until then.”

“We were. For about thirty exchanges. Then you got beaten. I was clearly a cut above.”

“…Childish to the very end. There’s a reason they say people never change.”

“If a man changes, it means he’s about to die. Anyway, it was my complete victory.”

“You insufferable old bastard. Did you eat all those years through your asshole?”

Fifty years ago, they would surely have been throwing punches at each other by now.

Instead, the two old men kept smiling.

One was doing his best to hide the bitterness rising from deep within him. The other had accepted both the years long gone and the death drawing near.

Jeok Cheongang looked at Peng Cheolhu, whose hair had turned completely white, and made a show of scowling.

“You ill-mannered brat. I told you, if you’re going to treat me like an old man, you ought to count our years properly and show me the respect I’m due.”

“Damn it. The age thing again.”

“I’ve told you hundreds of times. Is your skull made of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron? Is that why you can’t remember?”

“Enough of what I don’t want to hear. Fine, I understand. I’ll show you respect, all right?”

“Peng Family bastards, honestly… What did you just say?”

Jeok Cheongang stopped mid-sentence. At his startled expression, the Thunderbolt Saber King let out a hearty laugh.

“What’s the matter? Have you gotten so old you’ve gone deaf, Jeok hyung[3582]?”

“…!”

“Tsk, tsk. What’s the point of looking young again? All those years, and nothing to show for them.”

Jeok Cheongang stared at him in silence as he clicked his tongue loudly enough to be heard. Then, all at once, he laughed aloud.

“What are you laughing at?”

“Nothing. I just lived long enough to see this day. Have you got a problem with that?”

[3582] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

"I always have a problem with something. But can a younger brother talk back to his hyung[3583]?"

Younger brother.

Why did those two simple words stir something in Jeok Cheongang's chest? He forced his fading smile back onto his lips.

"You've finally come to your senses. I wondered how long you'd keep digging in your heels."

"Now, now. Is that any way to speak to your younger brother? It seems Jeok hyung[3584] still hasn't come to his senses."

"Then shall I call you Peng, my younger brother, from now on?"

This time, the Thunderbolt Saber King laughed aloud. His face, covered in fine wrinkles and age spots after he'd given away everything he had, creased deeply.

"No. Better not. Hearing you say that makes me itch right down to my guts."

"You damnable bastard. What do I have to do to satisfy you?"

"That's much better. You've finally turned back into the Fire King Jeok Cheongang I know."

At last, the Thunderbolt Saber King smiled in satisfaction. When he spoke again, his voice was gentle.

"Jeok hyung[3585]."

Jeok Cheongang didn't answer.

No—he couldn't.

The sudden change in the Thunderbolt Saber King's tone and expression, the voice that now sounded unmistakably like an old man's—something about it lodged in Jeok Cheongang's throat and left him speechless.

The Thunderbolt Saber King looked at him as if he understood and went on.

"You, at least… don't change, Jeok hyung[3586]."

"…!"

"Stay in Murim as you are, just as you always have."

So many years had passed.

The sun and moon kept changing places. The mountains and rivers changed their clothes in turn, and those born into this world with vigorous cries returned to the soil.

Yet some had not changed.

[3583] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

[3584] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

[3585] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

[3586] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

Their bodies had aged with the years, but their hearts remained steadfast.

“Looking back, I’ve been very lucky.”

Years flashed like meteors through the Thunderbolt Saber King’s fading eyes.

He had been born into the Hebei Peng Family, a power that commanded its region, and spent a childhood wanting for nothing.

In his youth, his name had spread beyond the northern lands and across the world.

And then—

“Even in that terrible war, I had friends I could fight back to back with.”

“…Yes. You did. You still do.”

Jeok Cheongang’s voice was dry. He quietly bit his lip. He was no longer smiling.

“Jeok hyung[3587].”

“Go on. I’m listening.”

“Do you remember what I used to say all the time?”

Jeok Cheongang nodded without hesitation.

“That a man should meet his death proudly on the battlefield.”

“You remembered.”

“How could I forget? You said it several times a day.”

“I did. And every time, you threatened to rip my mouth open.”

The Thunderbolt Saber King laughed happily at the old memory. But instead of the thunderous laughter that had once boomed from him, only a faint breath came out.

“I take it back. Now that I’ve come this far… this kind of death isn’t so bad after all.”

His head kept drooping. He forced it up, straightened his bent back, and looked over Jeok Cheongang’s shoulder.

At the figure floating there, engulfed in deep light.

Crack. Creak.

The sound of flesh tearing came from Jin Taekyung’s body as fine tremors spread through it. The Thunderbolt Saber King watched with joy in his eyes as Jin Taekyung entered Bone Transformation—a process he himself had never experienced.

Supreme Peak.

He had climbed the summit and reached the utmost height: the highest place on earth, and the path closest to Heaven.

[3587] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

"Jeok hyung[3588]. Do you see him?"

At the Thunderbolt Saber King's voice, trembling with emotion, Jeok Cheongang turned to look at his Disciple.

"Yes. I see him. My one and only Disciple—and the successor who inherited everything you had."

"Is that so?"

Death had already dimmed the Thunderbolt Saber King's eyes. He could no longer see Jeok Cheongang's face or Jin Taekyung's form.

And yet, in the darkness slowly approaching, he saw a radiant halo of light that would not go out.

"Th-that child…"

He struggled for breath.

Clinging to his fading consciousness, he reached toward the light shining beyond the darkness.

Toward the future he had left behind. Toward hope.

Then he cast off everything pressing down on his body and lunged toward the light.

Toward a new mountain peak that didn't exist in this world, waiting for him.

Toward another Supreme Peak: death.

Tap.

His fingertips fell limply, touching nothing.

Jeok Cheongang quietly closed his eyes. A low voice slipped between his lips.

"Farewell, you Peng bastard."

He would save the words younger brother for the day they met again.

That was his last promise to the Thunderbolt Saber King—no, to Peng Cheolhu.

And as the Fire King Jeok Cheongang, rather than Jeok hyung[3589], he still had far too much left to do.

Whoosh.

Feeling the halo of light finally begin to fade, Jeok Cheongang opened his eyes.

[3588] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

[3589] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

Chapter 989

The Thousand-Faced Fox, Song Ho, was having another day so busy he couldn't catch his breath.

Or, more accurately, he was supposed to be.

When he rose after less than two hours of sleep, he already had his day planned out in fifteen-minute increments.

But the moment he read the red missive brought by a Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent before sunrise, the Thousand-Faced Fox realized one thing:

Today would not go according to plan.

"Cancel the meeting already on the schedule. Instead, summon the Inner Hall's officers within fifteen minutes."

"I'll make sure every one of them is notified."

"What's the situation in the Outer Hall?"

"They're already on alert. The messenger eagles bound for each province are ready and waiting for your orders, Pavilion Master—"

"Send them out at once. I'll see the Alliance Leader in the meantime."

After giving several more orders, the Thousand-Faced Fox hurried toward his destination.

As always, Sword Saint Mae Jonghak was waiting for him, seated cross-legged.

"It's early for bad news. You could've waited until sunrise, at least."

His voice and gaze were as clear as the water at a lakeshore.

Usually, the Number One Sword Under Heaven's composure made him seem utterly carefree. Faced with it now, the Thousand-Faced Fox spoke cautiously.

"Did you already… know?"

"I can't say I know. I just found it hard to sleep last night."

Mae Jonghak slowly opened his eyes and looked at the Thousand-Faced Fox.

Or, more precisely, at the red missive in his hand.

"So. Who is it this time?"

Mae Jonghak's voice had sunk low.

Many years had passed, and much had changed. But some things remained the same.

Red missives bearing tragic news were one of them.

During the Great Faction War, whenever an important figure died or heavy casualties were reported, they had written those missives with heavy hearts.

Just like the one in the Thousand-Faced Fox's hand now.

"Alliance Leader."

"It's all right. Tell me the name written in that red missive."

The Thousand-Faced Fox hesitated, then spoke somberly.

“The Thunderbolt Saber King, who was staying with the Jin Family of Taiyuan, has finally…”

“Enough. That will do.”

Mae Jonghak waved a hand, his expression bitter.

“So it came to this, after all.”

“I’m sorry to bring you such news.”

“You? No. If someone must be blamed, it should be me—the Alliance Leader.”

The Thousand-Faced Fox bowed his head without a word.

The two men had known each other for decades: first as promising young martial artists of the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families, then as comrades who had joined forces to weather the war.

For now, he needed to give Mae Jonghak time to receive the news as the dead man’s friend, not as the Alliance Leader. Fortunately, the silence did not last long.

“How did Senior Peng pass?”

“They say he was smiling until the end. He knew he had little time left, so he passed on everything he had through Transmitting Internal Energy Across the Body.”

The astonishing news left out one crucial detail: to whom.

But Mae Jonghak didn’t need to ask. Before the Thousand-Faced Fox had finished speaking, a name had already come to mind.

“Jin Taekyung. It must have been that boy.”

“Yes. It was an extremely dangerous attempt, but I’m told the technique succeeded.”

Mae Jonghak nodded quietly.

Though he’d spent only a short time with Jin Taekyung, he’d had a vague sense that the transfer would succeed.

“That boy could certainly pull it off. There’s no telling how deep his abilities run.”

The Thousand-Faced Fox’s next report, however, drew a disbelieving laugh even from Mae Jonghak.

“Bone Transformation?”

The Heavenly Martial Physique was something one was born with. Bone Transformation, by contrast, completely rebuilt the body through immense internal energy and enlightenment.

Even a white-haired old man on the verge of death could regain his youth and make remarkable gains in martial arts through Bone Transformation.

And yet that fortune, coveted by all, had come to a young man around twenty.

Even the Thousand-Faced Fox, who had read the report with his own eyes, plainly struggled to believe it.

“Is this truly… possible?”

“You don’t seem convinced.”

“I doubt most people would be.”

“Why do you think it’s impossible?”

“In the entire thousand-year history of Murim, how many have experienced Bone Transformation? As far as I know, fewer than twenty.”

“You have a point. But there’s something you’re overlooking.”

“What is it?”

Mae Jonghak spread one hand instead of answering.

“Five.”

“What does that—”

“Of those fewer than twenty, five have appeared in this age alone.”

“…!”

“No—now there’ll be six.”

The Martial God and the Three Saints.

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, and his Disciple, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung.

Mae Jonghak raised another finger as he named them, then continued calmly.

“Isn’t it strange? Only around twenty people have undergone Bone Transformation in the last thousand years, yet the orthodox Murim alone already has six.”

“That’s…”

“You’ve felt it yourself, I’m sure. You just can’t easily accept it out loud.”

Mae Jonghak uncrossed his legs and stood.

He looked so ordinary that the Thousand-Faced Fox might have passed him anywhere without a second glance. But the eyes meeting his were clear as glass.

“We live in a truly strange age. The boundaries of common sense collapsed long ago, and a vast, unimaginable shadow has fallen over the world.”

More than fifty years ago, two supreme figures had appeared in the same age: the Martial God and the Heavenly Demon.

And that was hardly all.

Dozens of Supreme Peak masters from the orthodox, unorthodox, and Demonic factions had gathered around them, and a battle had begun between superhumans wielding unprecedented power.

The Three Saints and the Ten Kings. Great fiends of the Demonic Cult and the unorthodox faction, with power enough to shake heaven and earth.

And…

“Now Dark Heaven has appeared, surpassing even the Demonic Cult of that era by far.”

Does the age make the people, or do the people make the age?

The question had inspired countless debates, but no one had found a clear answer. Sword Saint Mae Jonghak was no exception.

Yet deep down, he knew the age he lived in was more than a mere time of chaos.

He sensed something hidden behind the conflict between superhumans—whether they had been born of this chaotic age or were bringing it into being.

“Supernatural powers we cannot understand. Monsters in horrific forms. And at the center of it all, someone called the Lord of Heaven.”

His gaze deepened as he murmured, almost to himself.

“Sometimes I wonder if all of this is a scheme devised by someone beyond our imagining.”

Mae Jonghak suddenly turned to look out the window.

White snowflakes drifted slowly down, so thick they obscured the sunlight spreading from the distant east.

Snow in early autumn. A tremendous snowfall, at that.

In Henan’s warm climate, such a thing was not merely rare—it had been unheard of. Yet it had begun happening several months ago.

And not only in Henan. It was happening across the world.

The changes were not confined to the ground, either.

The sky that had always hung above them—the heavenly patterns whose change Dharma King Hong Dao had long ago foreseen—was changing rapidly.

“Can you make sense of any of this?”

At Mae Jonghak’s question, the Thousand-Faced Fox, Song Ho, bit his lip without a word.

Cold sweat had soaked his back.

“I—I can’t. I can’t even begin to guess what’s about to happen.”

His voice trembled.

Even a man who had served the Martial God at close quarters and fought the hundred thousand followers of the Demonic Path led by the Heavenly Demon could not stay calm when he thought of what lay ahead.

It was as though…

Something beyond the bounds of the human world.

The words hovered on the tip of his tongue. The Thousand-Faced Fox could not bring himself to say them, so he swallowed them instead.

He couldn’t believe it.

No—he didn’t want to believe it.

Mae Jonghak watched the Thousand-Faced Fox’s agitation with clear eyes.

“Pavilion Master Song. May I say one thing to you as your superior and the Alliance Leader?”

"Please."

"Admit that you're afraid. Accept it."

"…!"

"Be more afraid than anyone else. Always be on guard against our enemies and distrust them. You and I have no choice. We're in positions where we have to."

The Thousand-Faced Fox understood the meaning behind Mae Jonghak's words at once.

"I'll take your words to heart, Alliance Leader."

"Thank you. You're a coolheaded, intelligent man. One of the most… no, not the most, but certainly among the ten most intelligent people I've known."

The Thousand-Faced Fox let out a dry chuckle.

"So there are quite a few ahead of me."

"I have to get the numbers right. Try not to be offended."

"I won't take that part to heart."

"Good news. You already have more than enough pressing matters on your mind."

"Of course. Then I'll take my leave."

Mae Jonghak smiled faintly but did not stop the Thousand-Faced Fox as he hurried away, moving as briskly as he had when he arrived.

Once he was alone, Mae Jonghak slowly read the red missive left behind. Then he murmured under his breath.

"So I'm saying goodbye to someone again."

Beyond their friendship, the Thunderbolt Saber King's death was a tremendous loss to the orthodox Murim as a whole.

Half of the Ten Kings had fallen over the long years. Of the five who remained, another was gone.

Perhaps the trace left by that giant's final step could ease the grief of his passing, if only a little.

"The Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung."

Mae Jonghak quietly spoke the name that had lingered in his mind.

A great star, the Thunderbolt Saber King, had fallen, and a new star had risen to fill the void.

No—he had already been shining brightly before this.

As if to prove his title, Divine Dragon.

Before long, two dragons will finally ascend to the heavens.

Mae Jonghak did not doubt it for a moment.

Jin Taekyung, now a giant of Murim, and the last successor Mae Jonghak had raised like his own grandson would stand at the center of this strange age.

Thinking of Cheongpung, who must by now have finally heard the news from Shanxi Province even where he was so far away, Mae Jonghak poured internal energy into the missive in his hand.

Fwoosh. Crackle.

The flames of Samadhi True Fire tinted Mae Jonghak's clear eyes red.

Chapter 990

The Thunderbolt Saber King, Peng Cheolhu.

News that the Grand Family Head of the Hebei Peng Family—yet another giant born of the Great Faction War—had fallen spread like a raging wildfire.

“I thought he, at least, would hold firm… And yet it’s come to this.”

“Even so, who could’ve imagined the Saber King would meet such a pointless end?”

“Pointless? Don’t ever say that in front of me again. Great Hero Peng held fast to his chivalrous spirit until the very end.”

“Enough. You think he said that because he didn’t know? He’s just heartbroken.”

“I know. Damn it, I know.”

The martial artists who received the unexpected and tragic news could not hide their grief.

To them, the title of one of the Ten Kings carried a meaning unlike any other.

Yet Hong Dao, the Dharma King who had earned everyone’s respect, was gone.

So was Tang Taesang, the Poison King who had struck fear into countless members of the Demonic Cult.

And now even the Thunderbolt Saber King—the man who, apart from the overwhelming presence of the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, had been all but the foremost of the Ten Kings—had met his death.

None of them had died of old age or illness.

“Don’t forget. They died honorably, fighting for what was right. Avenge them—that duty falls to us now.”

The old masters who had symbolized the orthodox Murim and stood for chivalry were dying one after another.

The martial artists of Murim layered anger over their grief.

To avenge those they had lost.

To defeat the new enemy, which had emerged for the first time since the Demonic Cult and revealed a power more threatening than ever.

“Who will stand against Dark Heaven!”

“Take up your swords! For the Nine Provinces, for justice and chivalry—rise up and fight those fiends!”

Rousing shouts rang out on streets everywhere. They had become an everyday occurrence.

Learning from the Murong Family’s example, Sect Leaders and Family Heads of various factions met often and put old grudges behind them. Young people, their blood burning with fervor, swung weapons they had never so much as bloodied until their palms split.

Even a stone leaves a mark when it moves. How much greater the mark left by a mountain?

The bloody battle fought across a narrow gorge in Shanxi Province—the incident that came to be known as the Eight Heavens Blood Calamity—and the death of the Thunderbolt Saber King had been the final sparks.

Dark Heaven had stirred up bloodshed across the land without ever revealing its full strength. Those who feared it now understood, as did the martial artists caught between the orthodox and unorthodox factions who had once been reluctant to oppose it.

The razor-sharp blade in Dark Heaven's hand was aimed not only at the orthodox Murim, but at the entire world.

And the repercussions had long since spread far beyond Murim's borders.

"So, who are you, and where are you from?"

"I'm Jang-pal, from Jeong Family Village."

"Jang-pal? If you're from Jeong Family Village, why is your surname Jang?"

"Pardon?"

"Why Jang-pal?"

"Oh, well…"

"Well, what?"

"My father's from somewhere else."

"Somewhere else, huh? So he married into the family and settled in Jeong Family Village."

"Yes, yes. That's right."

"How old are you?"

"I turned twenty this year."

The low-ranking official assigned to recruit soldiers looked the applicant up and down. Young man? The fellow standing before him ought to have been called a boy.

"Twenty?"

"Yes, sir!"

"I see. Then what is your mother's full name?"

"What?"

"The more we talk, the more familiar you look. I might know your family. If I do, I could send you somewhere you'd have a good chance to earn military merit."

At the official's coaxing tone, the boy's eyes lit up.

"Y-you really mean it?"

"Of course. So, what's your mother's name?"

The boy hesitated, but not for long.

He might not have his family's permission, but his sense of chivalry and his dreams of making his mark on the world had never burned brighter.

If his parents were acquainted with the official in front of him, this was the perfect chance to be posted to a good battlefield, earn brilliant merit, and become a young general.

Me too. I'll be like him one day.

He had already made up his mind.

Thinking of the idol he had never once seen in person, the boy found his courage. He gripped the bamboo spear he had clumsily whittled himself and opened his mouth.

"Th-the second daughter of the Oh family from the house by the persimmon tree. She said people nearby would know her…"

"Go home."

"What?"

"Your father's a Jeong, your mother's an Oh, so why do you live in Jeong Family Village?"

"…!"

"What, still got something to say?"

The official glared at him as though he already knew everything. The boy stiffened, then barely managed to force out a reply.

"Actually, my whole family came from somewhere else…"

"What are you waiting for? Drag this brat out!"

"Gah, sir! No! You can't! You'll really regret turning me away!"

The boy's eyes widened with fierce determination. Deeply moved by the sight, the official gave an order to the guards holding him by both arms.

"Give him three swats on the rear and toss him out. Twenty, my ass. You little brat—first you lie, and then you glare at an adult?"

"Siiir!"

His desperate cries changed nothing.

Ever since the Emperor's proclamation had spread throughout the land, government offices in every province had been packed with people who couldn't contain their dreams of making a name for themselves or the hot blood in their veins.

The official was in danger of dying from overwork before Dark Heaven ever got to him. He'd had his fill of boys lying about their age to enlist.

"Give him two more!"

"Nooo!"

"Yes!"

In the end, the guards gave the boy a sound kick to the rear and drove him out. The applicants, whose line stretched all the way outside the government office, watched him go and murmured among themselves.

“He looks younger than my little brother.”

“Still, the kid’s got spirit. Shame his head’s a complete rock.”

“But where did he say he was from again?”

“Doesn’t matter. He obviously made it up.”

“No, I still need to know.”

“Why are you so hung up on it?”

“I made mine up too.”

“…”

“I can’t have the place name overlapping by accident. They’ll catch me, and I’ll end up like him.”

“…How old are you, by the way?”

“Sixteen.”

“Cut the crap. You’ve got the face of a grizzled veteran.”

“Thank you, hyung[3590]. Looks like I’ll get through just fine. And please keep this a secret.”

“…Wait, you weren’t joking?”

While everyone else was still reeling, the applicant with the weathered face called to the boy as he staggered to his feet.

“How old are you?”

The boy, staring blankly at the government office, answered.

“Sixteen.”

“Same as me. Since we’ve met, let’s drop the formalities.”

“Not even a stray dog would believe that. I’m in a lousy enough mood already.”

“I’m serious.”

“I’m not falling for… it, sir.”

“Anyway, where’d you get that spear?”

The boy fidgeted before answering.

“I whittled it myself…”

“Don’t people our age usually use swords? Like me.”

The boy’s face twisted at once.

“Who says that? The spear is the king of all weapons.”

“There, you’re talking to me normally now. And I never said swords were the best. I just said most people use them.”

[3590] Hyung is a Korean term a male speaker uses to address an older brother or an older male acquaintance.

“Oh.”

“Seeing you get worked up over weapons tells me one thing. You came here because you want to be like ‘that person,‘ didn’t you?”

The boy hesitated, then answered in a much softer voice.

“Show him some respect.”

“What?”

“Don’t call him ‘that person.‘ Speak of him with respect.”

His dejected look had vanished.

As if nothing had happened, he seemed to have forgotten he’d just been thrown out of the government office. His eyes brightened as he continued.

“Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung. I’m going to be like him. I will!”

Everyone had a goal they wanted to reach.

For the boy, Jin Taekyung was that goal.

A young hero of the martial world, watched by the entire land, and a noble marquis personally appointed by the Son of Heaven.

He admired him. Respected him.

When he’d strode here so confidently, he’d been full of ambition. Before long, he’d thought, he would stand shoulder to shoulder with Jin Taekyung.

Reality, of course, had kicked him in the rear and thrown him out.

“Damn it.”

The boy lowered his head gloomily.

Then a strange voice suddenly rang out from somewhere.

“Wow! That’s so cool!”

The boy looked up and blinked at the speaker. Everyone waiting outside the government office did the same.

Who’s that?

When did he show up? I don’t think he was here a moment ago.

Huh. Or was he?

Now that I think about it, maybe he was here the whole time…

They exchanged bewildered glances. But before anyone could make sense of it, the young man who had suddenly appeared before them was smiling brightly at the boy.

“My grandpa told me— No, someone told me it’s good to have a goal you want to achieve!”

“Y-yes?”

The boy stared at the young man, bewildered.

Perhaps it was the long robe caked in dust. The young man looked more than ordinary—he looked downright shabby.

Maybe that was why the shock of his sudden appearance and his attempt to strike up a conversation soon gave way to an inexplicable sense of familiarity. The boy felt it, and so did everyone else.

It was like… like…

Right.

That one slow older guy every neighborhood seems to have.

For once, everyone was thinking the same thing. How could they not?

Just look at that spotless, pure-white smile.

There wasn't a speck of malice in his eyes. They were clearer than a stream, and then he grabbed the boy's hand and shook it over and over—the way a little kid might.

"That's so cool! You're determined to become like the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon. That's amazing!"

With both hands trapped in the young man's grip, the wide-eyed boy finally came back to his senses when his shoulders began to ache.

"P-please let go."

"Oh, sorry. I got excited. Did I hurt you?"

You couldn't spit in a smiling face. Seeing how genuinely worried the young man looked, the boy couldn't bring himself to complain.

"…No, I'm fine. But who exactly are you?"

"Just a passing hero who wants to save the world, like you, Young Hero!"

He puffed out his chest and declared it proudly. The boy and everyone else reached the same conclusion.

Yep. Definitely slow.

And, proving their suspicions, the young man kept babbling about whatever came to mind, oblivious to the strange atmosphere.

"But, Young Hero, if you want to become like the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, why come to the government office? Wouldn't it be better to go straight to the Jin Family of Taiyuan?"

"Oh, it's just so far away. I've never been more than a hundred li[3591] from home in my life. How could I…?"

"It's far, but not that far."

"Not that far? From here in Qinghai to Shanxi?"

"It goes by faster than you'd think. As long as you keep running hard and don't give up."

Snickers broke out around them.

[3591] A Chinese li is 500 m (0.311 mi). A hundred li is about 50 km (31 mi); ten thousand li is about 5,000 km (3,100 mi).

From Qinghai Province to Shanxi Province was nearly ten thousand li[3592], give or take a little exaggeration.

Even old peddlers who roamed the land with a few packs on their backs, and even the major Escort Bureaus, avoided taking on journeys that long whenever possible.

The trip would be grueling and mind-numbingly dull.

If even people who made their living on the road felt that way, what about those who lived in Qinghai, on the far western edge of the realm?

It was the sort of nonsense only a fool would say.

But to a boy whose own impossible dream had drawn laughter, the young man's words sounded different.

"Just keep at it and don't give up?"

"Right! And even if the Jin Family of Taiyuan is too far away, there are other options. For example…"

"Do you mean the Kunlun Sect?"

"Oh, you know about it?"

"Yes. I'm from around here, of course I do. And I know I'm too old to join the Kunlun Sect."

The boy sighed deeply before going on.

"But I don't want to join the Black Dragon Demon Gate. I know it belongs to the Murim Alliance, but its roots are still in the unorthodox faction. There are some unpleasant rumors about it, too."

"Hmm. What about the other sects…?"

"The details are different, but it's much the same with them. I'd rather join the military, learn strategy, and someday become a general leading an army. That might bring me a little closer to his fame."

After pouring all that out, the boy gave a self-mocking laugh.

What was the point of telling a complete stranger—one who seemed none too bright—all this?

"I should go. Maybe I'll see you again sometime."

"Hey, wait."

The boy kept trudging off despite the young man calling after him.

As the young man watched him go with a dejected expression, a round face popped up beside him.

"Hyung[3593], what are you doing here? I've been looking all over for you."

[3592] A Chinese li is 500 m (0.311 mi). A hundred li is about 50 km (31 mi); ten thousand li is about 5,000 km (3,100 mi).

[3593] Hyung is a Korean term a male speaker uses to address an older brother or an older male acquaintance.

The people nearby assumed the bright-eyed child had come looking for the slow older guy. They chuckled and lost interest.

They never dreamed that, at that very moment, the adorable child was driving a sinister voice into the young man's ear—one nobody else could hear.

"Didn't I tell you? Disappear without a word one more time and I'll kill you. Sword Saint's Disciple or not, I don't give a damn."

The young man, Cheongpung, answered innocently.

"Sorry. I was only going to be gone for a little while."

"Were you my enemy in a past life or something? Why do you keep doing this to this old man?"

"I had a reason."

"Then tell me."

"I ran out of candied hawthorn skewers[3594]."

"You little shit…!"

As he listened to the Slaughter Saint's deep sigh, Cheongpung watched the boy's retreating back.

Then he thought of someone and smiled to himself.

"Hehe. Did I ever tell you? When my Benefactor first saw me, the candied hawthorn skewers[3595]—"

"Shut up. Please."

In Qinghai, the Slaughter Saint was suffering.

[3594] Bingtanghulu are fruit skewers coated in hardened sugar, traditionally made with hawthorn berries.
[3595] Bingtanghulu are fruit skewers coated in hardened sugar, traditionally made with hawthorn berries.

Chapter 991

Whenever I lost consciousness or fell into a deep sleep, I found myself caught up in some kind of dream. It was nothing unusual anymore.

Someone once said dreams were a window into the mind. Worries I hadn't managed to shake and memories that still lingered would mix together and surface as the illusion we called a dream.

Everything in this world had a cause or a reason. Dreams were no different.

Right.

That had to be true.

At least, as far as I knew.

But then why…

Why am I having this dream?

I blinked slowly. My vision was a blur.

Everything was hazy.

Unlike my other dreams, which had been horrifyingly vivid, I couldn't even make out the illusions around me.

Then someone spoke, and I finally understood why I felt so groggy.

"Looks like you're awfully sleepy, little guy."

Sleepy.

As the realization sank in, I lifted my head.

No—my head lifted might be more accurate.

The blinking of my eyes, the movement of my head, even the voice slipping between my lips now—none of it was under my control.

"Yeah. I'm sleepy."

The voice sounded muffled, as though I were underwater, but one thing was clear.

I was a child.

Young enough that hearing myself whine didn't feel strange at all.

That answered one question, but another took its place.

Who was the unfamiliar man indulging the child's whining?

I've never heard his voice before.

A voice wasn't an ID card. I couldn't expect to recognize someone the instant I heard him. Still, anyone who appeared in my dreams ought to be familiar to me.

But everything here was strange. The voice coming through the haze. The scene playing out slowly, like a TV screen full of static.

Then I heard the child speak again through lips that weren't mine, and I understood where that strangeness came from.

"Dad. Can I go to sleep?"

If I'd been able to speak of my own accord, I would have groaned.

What I'd just realized was that startling—and that hard to understand.

Dad?

No. That couldn't be.

I could turn the oldest drawer of my memories upside down and shake it, and I still wouldn't find a memory like this.

The faint memory I had of my father's voice sounded nothing like the man I was hearing now.

Which meant this was—

Not my memory.

Just then, an inexplicable chill ran down my spine.

Then the unfamiliar man the child had called Dad spoke close to my ear.

"Have a good dream, my son."

A warm hand stroked my hair. His voice was gentle.

As my vision plunged into darkness, the man's final word echoed faintly.

"…a."

It was faint, but I'd heard it clearly.

A father speaking to his son. Calling him by name.

And at that moment, my thoughts ground to a halt with the shock of something I'd never expected.

Fwoosh.

Light poured down from beyond the pitch-black darkness, wrapping around the child lost in deep sleep.

No—around me.

If someone asked me what I usually saw first when I regained consciousness, I'd say the ceiling.

Or Hyuk Mujin, snoring in a corner under the pretense of standing guard. Or Jeok Cheongang's face as he waited by my side for me to wake.

This time, it was none of those.

"Hah… hah…"

I sprang upright and gasped for breath.

Was this what it felt like to be on the verge of suffocating?

My newly regained vision wavered like melting candle wax. Voices from every direction thundered in my ears.

"Medicine King…! Come here! Hurry!"

"…tain, Captain!"

“What the hell…!”

Was I still dreaming? Or was this real?

I couldn’t tell. I kept batting away the hands reaching for me, acting on instinct through the confusion.

Then someone seized my shoulder.

Even in the middle of all that, I could feel the strength in that hand with perfect clarity.

It hurt a little, but an unfamiliar warmth came through that hand, too.

Shaa…

My rigid body slowly relaxed.

Only then did I realize whose energy was flowing along the acupoint pathways known to just two people in this vast world—the Extreme Yang qi flowing through me.

“…Old Master.”

I let the words out with the breath I’d been holding. A voice I knew all too well answered.

“Stay just as you are for a moment. Just a moment.”

I closed my eyes as Jeok Cheongang told me to.

I reminded myself that this place I was in was real, not an illusion, and slowly calmed my heart, which was pounding without pause.

How much time passed like that?

After a while, I opened my eyes to a world that was quiet and clear.

And to a familiar face watching me with concern.

“You fool. Are you finally coming around?”

I hesitated before answering his abrupt question.

“More or less.”

“So not quite.”

“Could you hit me hard once?”

“What?”

“Just once. Don’t hold back at all. Put your whole heart into it.”

“…”

“Please.”

At my solemn request, Jeok Cheongang sighed and raised his fist.

“Fine.”

Whoosh.

White flames sprang up around his tightly clenched fist.

As I watched him prepare to fire off a move from the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist without further discussion, I spoke calmly.

“Wow, that’s hot.”

“What kind of nonsense is that? The Fire Gate Clan’s martial arts have always been hot.”

“If I can feel the heat, I think I’ve definitely come to my senses.”

Jeok Cheongang shook his head.

“Doesn’t look like it to me.”

“On second thought, I think I’m all right.”

“You said to put my whole heart into it.”

“Not to this extent.”

“Weren’t you the one who asked?”

“If you were going to take me that seriously, you should’ve refused three times first. Isn’t that only polite?”

“You lunatic. Do you think I’m Zhuge Cheongang?[3596] Quit flapping that mouth and brace yourself.”

Despite his words, Jeok Cheongang lowered his fist. He flicked his hand, and a water bottle on the bedside table shot toward me.

“What are you waiting for? Drink.”

“Thank you.”

I drained the full bottle without stopping for breath.

The cold water ran down my parched throat. At last, I felt like I could breathe again.

“Whew.”

“Well? Can you tell whether you’re dreaming or awake now?”

“More or less.”

At the same answer I’d given before, Jeok Cheongang clenched his fist again.

“And now?”

“…Wow, I’m awake! Definitely awake! The whole world is beautiful! I’m so happy to be alive!”

“Good. You’re finally back to the reckless little brat I know.”

“Was I not a moment ago?”

“Do you really have to ask? You woke up and immediately started thrashing around like you couldn’t tell up from down, so I sent everyone else out.”

“Hmm.”

Now that I thought about it, that did sound familiar.

I’d been overwhelmed with confusion and had instinctively fought off the hands trying to hold me.

[3596] The “three visits to the thatched cottage” refers to Liu Bei visiting the strategist Zhuge Liang three times to recruit him.

Besides, the proof was right in front of me.

“What a mess.”

I muttered as I looked at the fragments scattered everywhere, their original forms lost. Jeok Cheongang nodded emphatically in agreement.

“A hell of a mess.”

“Did I do this, too?”

“Half right, half wrong.”

“What do you mean…?”

“Your eldest brother was the one who made a scene. Built like a mountain, bawling his eyes out and insisting he couldn’t leave. I had no choice but to deal with him myself.”

I stared at Jeok Cheongang, eyes wide.

“Did you kill him?”

“Want me to kill you first?”

“No. I’m joking.”

“I’m not.”

“Oh.”

A long time ago, I would’ve clutched my ass like it came with built-in dynamite and started counting down. Not anymore.

I gave a quiet laugh instead of answering. Jeok Cheongang clicked his tongue.

“Damn it. Now you really do think I’m worth less than dirt.”

“Come on, you’re sulking again. You know that’s not true.”

“Know what, my ass. More importantly… what caused this?”

The question came with a brief pause, his voice trailing off.

I opened my mouth, feeling the sweat that had soaked my back.

“It was just a dream.”

“What sort of nightmare?”

“No, it wasn’t exactly a nightmare… I don’t know. It was a strange dream. I can’t really describe it.”

Even as I answered, an odd feeling crept over me. I frowned.

What is it?

It felt strangely familiar.

But the sudden sense of déjà vu vanished when Jeok Cheongang spoke again, his voice grave.

“Tell me more. That nightmare could be a trace of the Heart Demon lurking inside you.”

I pushed aside my brief hesitation and answered.

“I don’t think so. It was a memory.”

“An unhappy memory can leave a trace of the Heart Demon, too. I’ve seen people trapped by their past until it destroyed them.”

I knew what Jeok Cheongang was worried about.

In modern terms, it was something like trauma.

For a Murim martial artist to break past their limits and reach the highest realms, powerful internal energy and martial arts weren’t enough.

They also needed the mental enlightenment gained through cultivating the mind.

Whether their path was good or evil, they had to reach an understanding of their own to keep walking it.

And for those who had begun that training, an unhealed illness of the mind could be devastating.

Like Old Master suffering from the infirmities of old age after losing Jopil. No—Jangcheon.

So Jeok Cheongang’s concern wasn’t an overreaction.

The world knew the Fire King Jeok Cheongang for a temper like hellfire. But inside him lay the caution and wisdom honed over many long years.

This time, though, I could answer him without hesitation.

“It’s not the Heart Demon.”

Jeok Cheongang’s expression hardened. I met his gaze and slowly continued.

“Because the memory I saw in the dream wasn’t mine to begin with.”

“What do you mean, it wasn’t yours?”

I swallowed a trembling breath.

And I remembered the man’s voice, faintly reaching the child as he fell into a deep sleep in that hazy dream.

No—the voice of another father.

“Have a good dream, my son… Taekyung.”

It was my memory, and at the same time, the memory of someone I could only call you.

Jin Taekyung, Third Young Master of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

The Shame of the Family, and the original owner of this body.

Chapter 992

The fact that Jeok Cheongang was the only person left in the room was a huge relief.

He already knew the truth about me, and he hadn't dismissed the words I'd spoken in a trembling voice as the ramblings of a lunatic.

"…So that was the last of it?"

"Yes. After I woke up, well, you know the rest, Old Master."

Was it the shock of finally facing the truth?

Or had something actually changed inside me?

I didn't know the exact reason, but I'd been left to flounder alone in a state of utter confusion.

No—maybe I still was.

"Damn it. That's downright bizarre."

Jeok Cheongang muttered the words like a groan, then studied me cautiously.

"What is it?"

"No, well… Has anything changed?"

"Changed? Of course."

"What?"

He cried out in alarm.

Cold sweat still clung unpleasantly to my skin. Apart from that, I could feel power surging through my whole body.

"Well, my mood's in the gutter, but I feel great physically."

Jeok Cheongang swallowed.

"A-and?"

"That's it."

"…That's all?"

"Yes."

He gave me a flat look, then sighed.

"Fine. In a situation like this, that's probably for the best."

I agreed, though I kept it to myself. I felt awful, but nothing had actually happened to me.

The bigger problem was what this inexplicable phenomenon meant.

"Just to be safe, let me ask you something. Has anything like this ever happened before?"

"No. Not once, from the beginning until now."

I answered firmly, then added, "That's what makes it so strange. If this is a sign of something to come…"

“Don’t say that. Words have a way of coming true. Keep that rotten-luck talk to yourself.”

“Seeds can sprout without anyone watering them. It’s a hundred times better to predict what we can and prepare for it.”

“…Even in a situation like this, you’ve got a silver tongue.”

Jeok Cheongang said it with a sour expression, but he didn’t exactly argue with me.

With far more years behind him than I had, he must already have known it deep down.

What was going to happen would happen, one way or another.

And this wasn’t just a coincidence.

“If your consciousness and Jin Taekyung’s had been mixed together from the beginning… Damn it. I don’t know what to call him. Fine, if your consciousness and that good-for-nothing’s had been mixed together, wouldn’t that make sense?”

After a brief silence, I considered his question, then shook my head.

“I don’t think so. No, I’m sure that’s not it.”

“What makes you say that?”

“I had no memories at all when I first arrived. If our consciousnesses had merged, as you say, then at least some tiny memory should’ve remained. That’s the only way it would add up.”

I still remembered that time clearly.

When I first opened my eyes in the pleasure house, I didn’t even know Murim was another world rather than a virtual reality game.

I spoke with Wolhwa without knowing exactly who I was or where I was. That conversation was how I managed to learn even the bare minimum.

And even that was so basic I had to lie to Jin Wikyung and tell him my memories were jumbled.

If even the tiniest fragment of a memory had remained, I could’ve adjusted to this strange world much faster.

You know how it goes in web novels. The protagonist gets hit with a splitting headache, and a flood of memories comes rushing in.

But reality and fiction were worlds apart.

All I’d been given when I first set foot here was the same three-syllable name I’d had in the modern world.

And a body half-rotted from drink and women.

“…”

Now that I thought about it, that pissed me the fuck off.

Anyway, my conclusion was simple.

My consciousness and that of this world's Jin Taekyung, who'd been nothing but a good-for-nothing, were completely separate.

No—they had been separate.

At least until today, before I had that strange dream.

"You're so certain, so I'll take your word for it for now. But the fact that the good-for-nothing's memories appeared, even if only in a dream…"

His words trailed off.

Jeok Cheongang held my gaze, his expression grave. At last, he continued.

"Maybe some part of that good-for-nothing's consciousness was inside you from the beginning."

A groan escaped me before I could stop it.

It was one of the theories I'd been considering myself, but hearing someone else say it gave it a whole different weight.

Damn it. What is this, one house with two families?

There had been a time when I'd wondered about this, too.

It was after I'd spent a while living as Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan—more precisely, after I realized this strange world wasn't a game but another reality.

Two worlds.

Two people who'd lived different lives under the same name.

Even if my head were made of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron, it would've been only natural to wonder about it at least once.

If this body wasn't a game character…

Then what had happened to its original owner?

His body was still here, so where was that good-for-nothing's soul?

But at some point, I'd had to stop dwelling on it. Crises kept coming at me, one after another. I couldn't afford to cling to a question I had no way to answer.

I'd simply assumed he'd disappeared the moment I took over this body.

Maybe whoever had made the piece-of-junk capsule that brought me here had thought that was the better outcome, too.

But that wasn't what happened?

For once, I didn't know what to say.

I rubbed my stomach, wearing an expression I couldn't have described if I'd tried.

Jeok Cheongang watched me in silence until he finally spoke.

"I understand you're feeling conflicted, but what the hell are you rubbing your stomach for? It's not like you're pregnant. You're a hairy man, for crying out loud."

"…I did it without thinking. Why do you have to put it like that?"

Was this the danger of media?

The moment I thought there might be something inside me, my hand had gone to my stomach on instinct.

Must be a side effect of watching too many commercials about babies and toddlers, I muttered to myself. Then I quietly moved my hand from my stomach to my chest and looked at Jeok Cheongang.

“Did something land on your chest, too? Are you all worked up, huh? Burning up with rage?”

“…I was just trying it out.”

“Fine, let’s say so. You went from your stomach to your chest. Where were you planning to touch next?”

“My head.”

Jeok Cheongang answered without hesitation.

“Don’t. You’ll look like an idiot.”

“Yes, sir.”

I was already starting to regret it. I snatched my hand back, and Jeok Cheongang let out a deep sigh.

“What’s wrong?”

“Seeing the way you carry on makes me worry.”

“About what?”

“From what I’ve heard, that good-for-nothing was a complete idiot. If he suddenly took over your body one day, I might not even notice.”

“Ah, because I’m just as much of an idiot?”

“Exactly. Nothing to add, nothing to take away.”

“Come on, that’s a little harsh. You’re hurting my feelings.”

“What are you going to do if your feelings are hurt? What can you even do? Hm? You…”

“Hey, why are you getting worked up all of a sudden? Calm down. Take it easy.”

Thankfully, Jeok Cheongang came to his senses at the last moment. He spoke calmly, as though nothing had happened.

“Anyway, keep discussing this with me. Do you understand?”

“I was planning to. Who else could I talk to about something like this, if not you?”

It wasn’t a choice. It was a necessity.

If I told people and even one word got out, I’d go from Divine Dragon to Mad Dragon in no time.

Jeok Cheongang believed me because of what he’d seen and experienced himself. But if the truth about me became known throughout the world, the orthodox faction’s chivalrous heroes would take numbers and line up to tear me apart for using unprecedented dark arts.

Who knew? Maybe I'd become the Lord of Heaven's classmate as a public enemy of Murim.

But in response to my obvious answer, Jeok Cheongang shook his head.

"No. There's one more person besides me. Have you already forgotten?"

"Who… Oh."

I'd asked on instinct. Now I clicked my tongue.

Right. There was someone else.

Someone who wasn't close enough for me to have a deep conversation with about something like this, but who was still somewhat near the truth.

That's right. The Bow Saint.

I was still a little wary of her.

No—not a little. Very.

I have no idea what she's thinking.

The distance between us never seemed to shrink.

Even when we'd had several chances to talk at length while staying in the Imperial Palace, we'd never crossed the line she'd drawn.

An invisible wall stood between the Bow Saint and me.

No, she seemed to treat everyone that way. Whenever anyone tried to break through that wall and get closer, she quietly withdrew.

Like magnets with the same pole facing each other.

As if that were the answer.

But the Bow Saint might know something. She knows at least part of the truth.

She'd believed the outlandish contents of a letter and spent decades wandering the world in search of me—or, more precisely, the "chosen one."

Aside from Jeok Cheongang, who was standing right in front of me, and the mysterious absolute being known as the Martial God, whose very survival was uncertain, the Bow Saint was unquestionably the right person to ask.

Of course, first she'd have to agree to talk.

"Old Master. Then, by any chance…"

Before I could finish, Jeok Cheongang guessed what I was about to say and shook his head.

"Meeting the Bow Saint right now isn't possible. She still hasn't returned from Hebei."

"Hebei…"

"The situation hasn't fully settled down. Even the Family Head of the Peng Family hasn't been able to return yet, so it'll probably take a little longer."

Hebei. The Peng Family.

At the sound of those two words, something stirred in a corner of my chest.

Someone came to mind—someone who'd done his best for everyone until the very last moment of his life, then left.

"The Thunderbolt Saber King… Is he…?"

I had to force the question out.

"He's gone," Jeok Cheongang answered. Then he added, "He was smiling. So brightly I could hardly stand to look at him."

"…!"

"That's enough. That's all that matters."

I nodded quietly instead of answering.

Then Jeok Cheongang left, and silence settled into the space he'd occupied.

A quiet that had finally come at long last—one I hadn't felt in a very long time.

Open System window.

Ding.

A clear chime shattered the silence.

Chapter 993

Open System window.

The moment I muttered that short command in my mind—

Ding. Ding. Diiiing!

A familiar, clear chime rang out, and countless holographic windows poured from the air as if a dam had burst.

> System Sudden Quest, Transmitting Internal Energy Across the Body, completed successfully!
>
> Quest rewards have been issued!
>
> Your internal energy has increased dramatically!
>
> You have gained a large amount of EXP!
>
> You have received 20 bonus stat points!
>
> Level up!
>
> Transmitting Internal Energy Across the Body is a technique with such a low chance of success that no martial artist dares attempt it anymore. We commend your patience and audacity in succeeding at the process twice.
>
> You have earned the rare achievement You Did That Twice. You Did That Twice.
>
> Achievement rewards have been issued!
>
> You have gained a large amount of EXP!
>
> Your Endurance has increased dramatically!

The first things that caught my eye were the System messages announcing the completed Quest and earned achievement.

I'd only leveled up once, but the stat increase from successfully completing Transmitting Internal Energy Across the Body was enormous.

I skimmed the messages, then erased a dozen or so with a single wave of my hand. There were still more holographic windows I needed to check.

> System Successfully absorbed the internal energy of the Heavenly Power Demon!
>
> Successfully absorbed the internal energy of the Thunderbolt Saber King!
>
> The nature of Scorching Yang Qi is changing. The new flame born deep within your body will burn fiercer and hotter than ever!
>
> He who conquers the great sea will look down upon the world, but he who climbs the peak closest to heaven will look down even upon the great sea.

> Congratulations! Your Middle Dantian has been fully opened!
>
> You have reached the Supreme Peak realm!
>
> Sudden Quest, Bone Transformation, has begun. You cannot refuse this Quest!
>
> Sudden Quest, Bone Transformation, completed successfully!
>
> You can now draw in and release qi with great freedom. Your Muscles and Bones, now perfect in themselves, even reject impure qi!
>
> You have earned the great achievement Full-Body Plastic Surgery!
>
> Quest and achievement rewards have been issued!
>
> All attributes have increased significantly! Open the Status Window to check the details.
>
> You have received 30 bonus stat points!
>
> You have gained a large amount of EXP and Fame!
>
> Level up!

As I read through the holographic windows pouring out one after another, only one thought came to mind.

This is insane.

Of course, I'd expected massive rewards.

The Thunderbolt Saber King, Peng Cheolhu.

The power that giant, who'd defined an entire era, had passed on to me at the cost of what little life he had left was just as pure as it was immense.

Even so, the rewards listed by the System went far beyond what I'd expected.

Two level-ups, a huge number of bonus points on top of that, and a boost to all my attributes.

I'll have to check the details to see just how much my attributes increased, but even so, if I add all this together…

It wouldn't be an exaggeration to say I'd gained more than ten levels in one go.

No, in practice, it was even better than that.

The stronger I got, the farther away my next level-up seemed. The EXP required rose exponentially with each level, but the huge number of stat points I'd just received as a reward was pure bonus.

I'm in debt. Deep in debt.

Even with all those incredible rewards, I felt conflicted.

Caught between joy and bitterness, I remembered the Thunderbolt Saber King smiling brightly as he said he would pass everything he had on to me.

And with him, I remembered all the victims who'd fallen at Eight Spring Gorge that day, when the chrysanthemums covering the mountain had turned red and the bodies of people and horses had piled up like mountains.

I etched one thing deep in my heart: these enormous rewards had been paid for with the lives of the dead.

I'll repay this debt… no matter what.

I'd never been well-off, and debt had always been a miserable thing to me. But not this time.

I was looking toward the same place they were.

The day I finally paid it all back, the peace everyone wanted would arrive.

And to make that happen, I had to endure and overcome whatever hardships came my way.

I couldn't collapse under my grief or settle for where I was. I had to keep moving higher, with no thought of giving up.

Toward the place I'd glimpsed while completing Transmitting Internal Energy Across the Body, hidden behind thick, billowing clouds.

Toward the sky above the summit.

Right. The upper dantian.

Of course, I knew it wouldn't be easy.

I couldn't even be sure whether the Three Saints, the greatest masters in the Central Plains, or Jeok Cheongang, who stood shoulder to shoulder with them, had opened their upper dantian.

No, even if they've already reached that stage, there must still be differences between them.

Everything had its proper order.

I'd widened a narrow stream into a vast sea. Now I had to climb a mountain peak that rose as if it would pierce the clouds.

Until now, I'd grown at a terrifying pace thanks to the System I'd gained by chance and countless fortuitous encounters. But even I had been stopped by the clouds.

I still couldn't reach the absolute beings who looked down on the lower world from above them.

What if I'd ridden that momentum and kept pushing forward back then?

A pang of regret struck me.

But I already knew the answer.

I would've failed. And the odds would've been very high.

Trying to break through to the upper dantian in those circumstances wouldn't have been a challenge. It would've been a gamble.

Even I, despite having fully opened my Middle Dantian and feeling an intense surge of elation, had instinctively understood the difference between courage and recklessness—and pulled back.

The more I thought about it, the more indescribably frustrating it felt. But looking at it objectively, it had been a very good decision…

Wait.

What was this feeling?

I furrowed my brow and thought back to the excruciating process of Transmitting Internal Energy Across the Body, then to the strange dream born of memories that weren't mine.

But that wasn't all.

The inexplicable déjà vu sweeping through me pointed to the trace of a memory worn away somewhere between the two.

"Decision. A good decision… I'm sure I heard that somewhere."

My lips moved on their own. The voice that came out sounded unfamiliar, as though it belonged to someone else.

How much time passed?

I stared blankly into empty air, muttering the same words over and over like a man in a trance. At last, I recovered part of the memory I'd forgotten.

Someone definitely said something like that. Not in reality, but inside my consciousness.

My eyes stung. I'd forgotten even to blink.

After turning the thought over for so long, my head felt hot.

No—an invisible little awl was slowly burrowing into my mind.

A headache slowly spread through me.

But even as the pain made me wince, I kept searching my memory. I groped through the darkness for a tiny fragment hidden behind larger memories.

And finally—

I remembered.

I remembered realizing it wasn't time yet and turning away from the upper dantian beyond the clouds.

Then, as I slipped into the world of No-self, someone's words echoed faintly in my ear.

That was a good decision. Just like back then.

"…!"

My eyes flew wide open.

Because I'd realized who the voice belonged to?

No.

Because an immense pain had suddenly struck me.

Hk.

I sucked in a breath on instinct. Clenching my teeth wasn't enough; I squeezed my eyes shut, too.

The headache that had been slowly burrowing into my mind like an invisible awl had grown as huge as the long acupuncture needle the Medicine King Hall Master carried around like a prized weapon. Now it was tearing through my head.

What the hell is this…!

With my vision gone white, I flailed my limbs like someone on the verge of drowning.

Even then, I couldn't let go of the one question still unanswered in my mind.

Who did that voice, which had rung out like a hallucination at the last moment, belong to?

Who could speak to me in a space inside my mind rather than in the real world?

How? How could they do that?

There was one thing I could be sure of.

The voice I'd heard belonged neither to Jeok Cheongang nor, least of all, to the Thunderbolt Saber King.

And aside from those two old martial-world veterans, no one else could have communicated with me then.

Then who was it?

I genuinely wanted to know. Even as it felt like my head was splitting open, I wanted to know.

Who owned that voice, and how had they approached me and whispered without any of us noticing?

At the same time, I wanted to ask:

How did you know me?

Just like back then… That's what they said. I'm sure of it.

There was no doubt.

I didn't know them, but they knew me.

I couldn't say when or where we'd met, but today wasn't the first time we'd encountered each other.

But…

Why can't I remember anything? Why?

I remembered only what they'd said. I couldn't distinguish the pitch or depth of their voice, or even their gender.

I couldn't guess whether they were a woman or a man—or, if they were a man, how old they might be.

All I could vaguely recall was the sensation of that moment, dredged up at the cost of enduring that terrible headache.

A strange familiarity.

The voice seemed as unfamiliar as something I'd never heard before, yet faintly, peculiarly familiar.

And that was all I could recover.

Whoosh!

A flash of light exploded. The whiteness in my vision slowly receded, and my blurred sight began to come back into focus.

"…Ah."

I let out the breath I'd been holding and realized that the pain, which had seemed as though it would go on forever, had finally ended.

And with it, the memory I'd been allowed to recover had reached its limit.

Damn it.

I stared silently at my fingertips, still trembling from the pain, then curled them into a tight fist.

Crunch.

The skin of my palm, now almost like iron after Bone Transformation, pressed taut against my sharp fingernails.

Perhaps it was the strange turmoil of my emotions.

At that very moment, the vast qi sleeping inside my body began to boil—

Ding.

> System A new Quest, Unknown Voice, has been created.
> You cannot choose whether to accept this Quest.
> The Quest will proceed by force.
> Would you like to check the newly updated Quest information?

Unknown Voice.

I stared at the Quest title on the holographic window, then parted my tightly shut lips.

"Yes."

Chapter 994

The System often—maybe even pretty frequently—sprang clues on me in the form of Quests without making clear what they meant.

Just like now.

> System Quest
>
> Unknown Voice
>
> At some point, you became aware of the voice of someone whose identity you cannot determine.
>
> This may or may not be the first time this has happened, but one thing is certain.
>
> In the not-too-distant future, you may come face-to-face with the owner of that voice.
>
> May that meeting not be an unhappy one.
>
> Grade: None
>
> Restriction: Jin Taekyung
>
> Objective: Continue to survive (In progress)
>
> Reward: ???
>
> Failure: ???

The moment I saw the translucent holographic window, only one thought came to mind.

Here we fucking go again.

What, would the screen go blue if it gave me a straight answer?

The whole description was vague, as if someone had hidden it in fog.

This wasn't the first time I'd received a Quest like this, of course. That didn't make it any easier to get used to.

But at the same time—

It's something I have to go through.

As I knew from experience, the System wasn't an answer sheet.

It was more like a signpost, pointing me in a direction and telling me what lay ahead.

Depending on my choices, the arrows on that sign might change. Sometimes, like now, I had to figure out what they meant.

So I read the words in the holographic window again and again, trying to work out what those Twenty Questions-style clues were hiding.

The last two sentences of the Quest description, in particular, caught my eye.

I might meet the owner of that unknown voice? And in the not-too-distant future?

Not too distant, huh.

Time was relative, so that was a pretty vague way to put it.

A year could feel long and distant to a little kid with a runny nose, but to a white-haired old man, it might pass in the blink of an eye.

I couldn't guess how much time the System meant by "not too distant."

A few days. A few months. Or… No. Even the System couldn't be so shameless as to lump years together under that phrase.

Days would be too soon, and years would be too long. A few months seems like the reasonable guess.

Then what was that last line about the meeting not being unhappy?

And who on earth was the owner of that unknown voice—the person at the heart of this riddle of a Quest?

Someone who could approach without me, the Thunderbolt Saber King, or even the Old Master noticing. Someone who could intrude into my own inner world.

While Transmitting Internal Energy Across the Body was underway, the Thunderbolt Saber King and I had our hands full giving and receiving energy. But Jeok Cheongang was different.

He'd stood guard throughout that dangerous technique, every sense strained to its limit.

For someone to evade his notice and speak to me should have been impossible. He was a Supreme Peak master who now stood shoulder to shoulder with the Three Saints, beyond even the Ten Kings.

Well, strictly speaking, it wasn't completely impossible.

If they were the greatest assassin of all time, with a concealment technique unlike anything ever seen before—or a master at least two moves ahead of the Old Master…

As far as I knew, only two people in the world could meet those minimum requirements.

The first was undoubtedly the greatest assassin of all time, but I couldn't be sure they had any reason to do this—or that they could pull it off.

The other one was different.

A wonder of the world itself.

The sky looking down over this vast land alone. A being who, though human, had come to be called a god.

"…The Martial God?"

The two syllables slipped from my lips before I realized it. A shiver ran down my spine.

The Martial God. The Martial God himself?

That can't be right.

It had been half a century since the Martial God disappeared.

He'd vanished as suddenly as he'd first appeared, and no one under heaven knew where he was now.

No one could even say for sure whether he was alive or dead.

Not even the Bow Saint, who'd found me through the letter he'd left behind.

And now he'd suddenly reveal his presence like this?

No way.

But realistically, the Martial God was the only person capable of what had happened today.

As far as I knew, he alone was an overwhelming presence beyond even the superhumans known as the Three Saints.

And perhaps I knew more about the truth hidden behind the Martial God than anyone else under heaven.

If my guess is right…

A thought flashed through my mind, and my heart began to pound.

I remembered the first deep conversation I'd had with the Bow Saint at the Imperial Palace. Amid the hectic days that followed, there had been one name I could only turn over in the back of my mind.

Now it filled my thoughts.

Cheon Taemin.

Another absolute being, existing beyond a distant space.

Just as the Martial God had fought the Heavenly Demon and restored peace, Cheon Taemin was a hero who'd saved humanity from the demon known as the Demon King Asmodeus.

I could still see him clearly in the Ares Guild's restricted area, unconscious as if in a deep sleep, attached to a life-support system that combined Magic and science.

Over that image, I could faintly hear a woman's voice.

"He left a message for the chosen one."

"A message? What does that mean?"

"Divine strength. He said the chosen one should overcome the crisis with that divine strength and a Will like steel. Just as…"

That day, the Bow Saint had watched me with a deep, solemn gaze.

Then her voice had echoed faintly in my ears, like a distant refrain.

"Just as you did."

I still remembered the shock I'd felt in that moment.

No—I'd remember it until the day I died.

I'd vaguely entertained the thought before, only to laugh at myself and shake my head. Then an unexpected piece of the puzzle had fallen into place.

Divine strength.

A strange power possessed only by the chosen one.

The supernatural ability that belonged to me now—and had belonged to the Martial God in the past.

If the message the Martial God had left the Bow Saint meant what I thought it did, it could mean only one thing.

System user. Player.

That was probably the Martial God's true identity.

The truth hidden behind an unparalleled hero the likes of whom had never been seen before, and would never be seen again: a man who'd appeared out of nowhere, saved a world in turmoil, then disappeared.

But if that theory was true…

Cheon Taemin and the Martial God can't possibly be the same person.

According to the capsule's user manual, the System was a power granted to only one person.

The moment my thoughts reached that point, a headache struck.

Two heroes in different worlds.

Their actions were astonishingly alike. The more I learned about them, the more I found myself wondering whether Cheon Taemin or the Martial God might have had the same ability as me. Whether the two of them might even be the same person.

But now I didn't know what to think.

What connection existed between the Martial God and Cheon Taemin? If they were two entirely different people, what truth were they hiding?

There was one thing I did know: how to resolve at least some of my doubts—and the headache still stabbing at my mind like a needle.

I'm going back. Right now.

That's right.

The answer didn't have to be found in just one place.

The modern world and Murim. In these two worlds connected by a power I couldn't begin to explain, I had to find a clear answer to my question.

And right now was the perfect time.

I'd completed the important Quest concerning the crisis in Shanxi Province, and the Logout function it had blocked was available again.

One month. Maybe two. That should be enough.

Learning more about Cheon Taemin wasn't my only reason to go back.

I also had to deal with the fallout from the Doppelganger incident, which had happened right before I last Logged In.

On top of that, the ominous words it had left behind before its Erasure hinted at more trouble to come. Even through the frantic days in Murim, they'd bothered me like a fish bone stuck in my throat.

I'll find out when I get back. Why the Doppelganger said those things. What it went that far for.

Now that I'd made up my mind, there was no hesitation. I lay straight on the bed and pulled the covers up to my neck.

Even if I spent a couple of months in the modern world, only about three shichen[3597] would pass in Murim.

I didn't know whose presence was hurrying toward me from somewhere far beyond the window, but by the time they reached my room, all they'd find was me already gone to the modern world—or rather, fast asleep.

Logout.

I slowly closed my eyes and gave the familiar command. The next moment, I realized something.

Some things in this world didn't go the way you expected.

Bip-bip-bip!

> System Logout failed!
> The System has rejected your Logout command!
> Error! Error!
> Due to a System error, the Logout function has been temporarily disabled!
> Unknown error! Temporary Maintenance has begun!

...What?

My eyes flew open, even though I hadn't meant to open them.

But the System's voice in my ears hadn't changed. Neither had the dozens of error messages floating in the air. Confusion seized me.

Logout rejected? Why on earth?

This had never happened before.

No—it had, but only when I was in the middle of an important Quest. Even then, it hadn't happened like this.

System error? Temporary Maintenance?

An update, sure. But I'd never heard of anything like this.

An error in the System, which had always been absolute? How could that be possible?

"What the...!"

[3597] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

A groan escaped me. I bit down hard and shouted over and over in my mind.

Logout! Logout!

But nothing changed.

Nothing at all.

The holographic windows that poured out with every command showed only the words “System error.” Faced with this unbelievable reality, all I could do was stare blankly and take it in.

Actually, if I had to name one more thing I could do, it was let the person whose presence had drawn close to the door know that he was an unwelcome guest before he entered my room.

“Don’t come in. I’m… damn it. Anyway, I’m busy.”

I assumed it was Hyuk Mujin without even looking. If it wasn’t him, it had to be one of the Fire Dragon Pavilion members.

But my guess was just as spectacularly wrong as I’d been when I tried to Logout.

Click.

“Must be because we’re brothers. Even on this, we’re of one mind.”

The next moment, the unwelcome guest opened the door without hesitation. No—it was Jin Wikyung, his expression heavy and grave.

The sight of him sent a chill down my spine.

Chapter 995

Some conversations don’t need many words.

Especially when the matter is urgent.

That was true of my conversation with Jin Wikyung, who’d come to my room out of the blue. It lasted less than fifteen minutes.

But what he told me weighed as heavily as a massive boulder. As soon as he left, I called everyone together—the people who could help me bear that weight.

Rattle.

“Well, I’ll be damned. Live long enough and you see everything. Who’d have thought martial-world lowlifes like us would ever lay eyes on the Marquis of Shangshan?”

Namho tossed out the silly joke the moment the door opened, and I couldn’t help laughing.

For two reasons.

First, seeing Namho again—or rather, seeing all of them—felt good. Comfortable, too, as though it had been ages since we’d met.

Second, because Namho was sitting astride Taishan’s shoulders as though that were the most natural thing in the world. It was ridiculous.

“What are you doing?”

“What does it look like? Sitting.”

“I can see that. Why are you sitting there?”

“Easy. It’s incredibly comfortable. This fellow’s a real find.”

Namho smiled with the satisfaction of an inventor who’d made a world-changing discovery, then patted the top of Taishan’s head.

“What are you waiting for? Get inside.”

Taishan stood blankly in the doorway. He glanced off into the distance before answering.

“Taishan. Feet won’t move. Must be hungry.”

“What the hell are you talking about? The jerky you stuffed into your mouth barely fifteen minutes ago amounted to a whole calf.”

“…”

Apparently, the ride was pay-as-you-go.

And the mileage was terrible.

“Don’t remember. Hungry.”

“You bottomless pit…”

With a deep sigh, Namho pulled a piece of taffy from his sleeve and waved it in front of Taishan’s eyes.

“There. Will you move now?”

In that instant, Taishan’s eyes narrowed to razor-sharp slits.

“Just one?”

“Damn it. I’ll give you another as soon as we get back.”

“Three.”

“You little bandit. Not a chance. Two. That’s my final offer, so think carefully.”

Taishan’s resolve was beginning to waver when a voice sounded from behind his enormous body, ending the negotiations.

“Move. Now. Or I’ll personally stab each of you twice.”

“…!”

“…!”

“What, two stabs each aren’t enough? Should I make it three?”

Her voice was low and calm, which somehow made the warning more dangerous. Taishan swallowed hard and hurried into the room.

He even snatched the taffy Namho had been waving in front of him.

With the doorway finally clear, Ju Hwaran—the one who’d put an end to the rush-hour jam—strode toward me. She called out in a voice suddenly thick with emotion, as though nothing had happened.

“Young Master Jin! No, Benefactor! No, Pavilion Master!”

“…”

I was pretty sure I’d asked her several times to pick one.

It was funny, but her sudden change of attitude caught me off guard. While I floundered, her eyes filled with tears.

“I’m sorry I arrived so late during the last battle. You must’ve had such a hard time.”

Over Ju Hwaran’s shoulder, Sama Pyo stood like an invisible man and muttered to himself.

“I’d guess the enemies had a harder time.”

Song Ilseom, arms crossed and his willow-leaf saber tucked against his chest as always, nodded.

“Judging by the aftermath, he was a monster. The enemies were smashed to pieces.”

Jaw clenched, Ju Hwaran ignored the voices behind her and continued.

“Were you hurt? Are you all right now?”

Sama Pyo and Song Ilseom at least had some sense. They slipped away at the right moment instead of barging in like Hyuk Mujin.

“Come on, Young Lady Ju. Why ask how someone’s feeling when he went through Bone Transformation just the other day—”

A chill settled over the room.

I didn’t know what expression Ju Hwaran had on her face as she slowly turned around, but I saw terror spread across Hyuk Mujin’s face as his voice trailed off. I decided I’d go on living without ever finding out.

“Mujin, shut your blabbering mouth. Young Lady Ju, I’m fine. Completely fine, so please don’t worry. And Taishan, I have something important to say, so swallow that taffy before we start—oh, you’ve finished it already. Did you chew it, or drink it?”

With Taishan’s magic trick over—and me wondering whether taffy might actually be a liquid—I’d finally sorted out the traffic. Namho gave me an uneasy look.

“Something important, huh? For some reason, I already have a very bad feeling about this… Am I just being an old worrywart?”

“If only that were all.”

I wasn’t the one who said it.

The last guest, Jeok Cheongang, strode into the room and gave me a nod.

“Tell them what’s happening beyond Shanxi Province.”

His grave eyes told me he’d heard the same news I had.

I looked silently from one face to the next in the now-crowded room. At last, I spoke.

“Something troubling is happening in the west.”

“The west? Where in the west…?”

As expected, Namho was the first to react. His brow furrowed as he spoke, then his narrow eyes widened.

“Y-you don’t mean…?”

“Yes. The place you’re thinking of.”

I nodded, then spoke in a heavy voice.

The far western edge, the birthplace of the Heavenly Demon Divine Cult—called the Demonic Cult in the Central Plains—and now the home base of Dark Heaven. That accursed land.

“Xinjiang.”

“…!”

“…!”

A massive shock swept through the room like an invisible wave.

When did Murim—that other world within the world—and the martial artists who lived in it first come into being?

No one knew for sure.

Oral traditions passed down through the generations, along with the few surviving lines in records from the distant past, led many to claim that Shaolin Temple in Henan had begun Murim's long history. In time, that became the accepted account.

Jeok Cheongang had told me something different while I was enduring grueling training on Mount Jiuhua.

"History is shaped and pieced together. People believe what they want to believe—whatever suits them."

Back then, Jeok Cheongang had been suffering from the infirmities of old age, and he'd begun reminiscing more often. Or rather, I'd half-begged him to. I thought I'd read somewhere that recalling and revisiting old memories whenever he had time might slow the illness's progression.

And among Jeok Cheongang's vast store of knowledge were secret histories of Murim that few people knew.

"Light and darkness go hand in hand. The idea that martial arts were born in Shaolin, packed with fellows trying to become Buddhas, is absurd enough. But did you think no one would try to use such power for evil?"

"Are you saying…?"

"That's right. According to records left by our sect's forebears, the Demonic Cult came into being that way, too. No one knows exactly when, but it was probably around the same time as Shaolin Temple."

Murim could only have become a mountain of sabers and a forest of swords because the age itself was so chaotic.

The Shaolin warrior monks learned martial arts to protect. Others, on encountering that astonishing power, learned martial arts to conquer the world.

"People of every stripe must've gathered from all directions, in droves. They used martial arts to wield such mysterious power that they hardly seemed human. Just imagine how astonished everyone must've been."

There must have been only a few dozen of them at first.

The world around them was dark even in daylight. Having encountered a power like a great light, they soon became followers and spread in every direction.

They told others what they'd seen with their own eyes. When people refused to believe them, they took hold of their sleeves and led them to him.

To the man with that unbelievable power. To the leader who would protect them in this wretched age of chaos.

The followers grew to hundreds, then thousands, and finally a hundred thousand. Their leader declared himself the Cult Leader and a divine man sent by Heaven.

"That was the beginning of the Heavenly Demon and the Demonic Cult."

Jeok Cheongang had also said that they probably hadn't called themselves the Heavenly Demon or the Demonic Cult from the very beginning.

What mattered was that the first Heavenly Demon never conquered the world. He and his followers settled instead in a desert on the western frontier.

Over nearly a thousand years, they sometimes turned their blades on one another. After several divisions and reunifications, they brought about the Great Faction War, a calamity of enormous scale.

Throughout those long years, the scorching desert ruled absolutely by Fiends became a Land of Ruin that even Murim of the Central Plains couldn't hope to challenge.

And so it remained, even now that a new shadow called Dark Heaven had fallen across it.

But…

"Something unprecedented is happening in that Xinjiang?"

A long silence had followed my brief account. Namho's question finally broke it, and I nodded.

"That's what I heard."

"Where did the information come from?"

"Where do you think?"

I pointed upward. Namho let out a weary breath.

"The Murim Alliance… No, the Hidden Shadow Pavilion."

"I heard they lost more than thirty elite agents. After their first and last messenger eagle, all contact was lost."

"Damn it. Then there's no room for doubt. How many enemies are we looking at?"

"That…"

Even I couldn't bring myself to answer right away. Namho groaned at the look on my face.

"I see. The Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples all over again."

"Maybe more than that. At least, that's what the information I received suggests."

More important, these enemies would be far stronger and more terrifying than the Demonic Cult's followers had been fifty years ago.

The desert no longer belonged to the Demonic Cult. It belonged to Dark Heaven.

They weren't merely the successors of the Demonic Cult under a different name. They were a new group of followers, ruled by a power incomparably stronger and more dangerous.

Could that be why Logout was suddenly blocked?

The thought crossed my mind, but I shook my head.

No. That wasn't it.

The Quest hadn't appeared yet, because I hadn't made my choice.

Now was the moment to make it.

"From this moment on, we're heading west."

Ding.

An alert sounded, announcing a new Quest.

Chapter 996

Sometimes, I wonder.

Maybe the real benefit of circulating your qi isn't growing stronger by accumulating internal energy. Maybe it's calming your mind.

Kwoooosh.

I had no idea how much time had passed.

I simply let myself be carried by the swift, powerful current.

At last, the wave of internal energy swept through the Eight Extraordinary Meridians and hundreds of acupoints. The moment I gathered it in, I opened my eyes to a breathless silence.

Ding.

A clear chime rang out right on cue.

As the alert confirmed that I'd successfully finished circulating my qi, I calmly examined the energy within me.

The very best.

The words came to mind without hesitation, and there wasn't a shred of exaggeration in them.

That's right.

I'm stronger now than I've ever been.

I'd fully absorbed the Heavenly Power Demon's energy, which had remained inside me for quite some time without being completely assimilated, and the Thunderbolt Saber King's as well.

Four jiazi[3598].

An incredible amount of internal energy—especially considering my age and how long I'd been practicing martial arts.

A greenhorn just starting out in Murim might wonder why I'd gained only one jiazi[3599] after receiving Transmitting Internal Energy Across the Body from two old masters. But martial artists who'd reached a certain realm knew better.

Martial arts weren't as simple as one plus one.

No matter how much internal energy you possessed, if its essence was impure, you couldn't draw out even half of it. You couldn't control it properly, either.

In that sense, the four jiazi[3600] of internal energy reborn through complete fusion was pure power I could control entirely.

[3598] A jiazi is a sixty-year cycle in the traditional East Asian calendar. As a measure of accumulated internal energy, four jiazi represents 240 years.

[3599] A jiazi is a sixty-year cycle in the traditional East Asian calendar. As a measure of accumulated internal energy, four jiazi represents 240 years.

[3600] A jiazi is a sixty-year cycle in the traditional East Asian calendar. As a measure of accumulated internal energy, four jiazi represents 240 years.

If the Heavenly Power Demon and the Thunderbolt Saber King had been in their usual condition when they transferred their energy, I might've grown even stronger, but…

Wanting more would be greedy.

Even I, with the mysterious divine strength known as the System, had risked my life twice while undergoing Transmitting Internal Energy Across the Body.

And yet I couldn't help feeling a little disappointed. The reason was the reality I'd faced the moment I finished circulating my qi.

SYSTEM

Quest
Desert Mirage
You have learned of troubling signs in Xinjiang, at the far western edge of your world.
A cursed land, long separated from the Central Plains.
A group is crossing the scorching desert, where nothing exists but hot sand and the blazing sun, and heading toward the center of the world. But their true nature remains hidden behind a dense mirage.
Please remember. Never forget.
The world—and the heavens—are changing.
Nothing is set in stone.
The countless enemies drawing near from far away, even now, may prove to be no more than a momentary spark.
Or they may become a hellfire that brings the world to ruin.
Grade: Supreme Peak
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Mission: Head west (Incomplete)
Reward: A large amount of EXP and Fame
Follow-up Quests depending on your choice
Failure: ???

I'd read the Quest window dozens of times already, ever since sending the Fire Dragon Pavilion members away to prepare for the perilous journey ahead.

I gestured it away from the corner of my vision and remembered the conversation I'd had with Jin Wikyung two hours earlier.

"If Dark Heaven crosses Xinjiang and cuts through the desert, as the information from the Hidden Shadow Pavilion suggests, where would it focus its attack?"

"The Murim Alliance is considering three possibilities at once. They might advance through Tibet, which could be considered part of the Outer Lands. They might target Gansu Province, where the Kongtong Sect and Black Dragon Demon Gate are holding their ground. But the most dangerous place is probably…”

“Qinghai. The Kunlun Sect, then.”

“That’s right. Kunlun Mountain is a natural fortress, but for Dark Heaven, which has its sights on the Central Plains, it’s also the first obstacle they must overcome. They won’t leave Qinghai alone.”

Shanxi Province was a remote backwater, but it was nothing compared to Qinghai, at the westernmost edge of the Central Plains.

Its highlands included terrain so rugged it was downright forbidding, making it difficult to produce abundant supplies. Commerce and industry hadn’t developed much, either, thanks to the Demonic Cult’s long hold over the desert.

Merchants would risk their lives for profit, but even they couldn’t cross a desert knowing death awaited them.

But even setting all that aside, Qinghai was an indispensable strategic stronghold from a military standpoint.

One side had to defend it. The other had to trample it underfoot to get past.

Dark Heaven has the strength to do it. Besides, Qinghai has been overrun before.

Over fifty years ago, the hundred thousand demonic soldiers led by the Heavenly Demon defeated the Kunlun Sect and took Qinghai. That was the beginning of the Great Faction War.

And now, that brutal history of bloodshed was about to repeat itself after all these years.

Qinghai. Qinghai Province…

I stared out the window, my gaze heavy.

Beyond the latticed frame, hundreds of torches swayed in the darkness that had settled without my noticing.

Night had fallen, but everyone in the Jin Family of Taiyuan was still awake.

No, it wouldn’t be just the Jin Family.

I could picture the whole of Murim in the Central Plains—including the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families—boiling like a cauldron over hot coals.

It’s coming. The all-out war we can’t avoid.

The drums of war had been pounding across the land for a long time. But the countless enemies even now crossing the desert toward somewhere in the west weighed on my heart more heavily than ever.

Those who meant to defend, and those who meant to take.

A battle unlike anything we’d faced so far awaited us all in the west. Each side would stake its fate on it.

The fate of this world might be decided by a single battle, soon to come.

Maybe that was why the System had suddenly malfunctioned. Why this absolute law, which had never strayed from its set path no matter what happened, had begun to waver.

Then what had caught me by the ankle when I tried to leave this place for a little while—just a little while?

The System? Or…

Dark Heaven. No—the Lord of Heaven, to be precise.

I couldn't be sure yet, but I could guess one thing.

Far away in the west, somewhere hidden in that pitch-black darkness, an answer to this mystery was waiting.

Or perhaps death.

Damn it.

Nothing ever goes smoothly.

I gave a bitter smile to myself, then spoke to someone waiting beyond the firmly shut door.

"We leave in exactly fifteen minutes."

"As you command."

I heard Hyuk Mujin's footsteps receding after his unusually forceful reply. As I stood, I suddenly sensed something strange and turned around.

Tap. Tap-tap.

Something damp and white drifted into the room on the wind.

I looked at the unwelcome visitor that had arrived months ahead of schedule—the snowflakes slowly piling up—and remembered a line from the Quest window.

The world—and the heavens—are being turned upside down.

I prayed silently that those words, at least, weren't an error.

Because the world as I felt it now—and the sky spilling those white snowflakes—seemed to have finished changing already.

The light in the room was dim.

It was already pitch-black outside, and the wind seeping through the crack in the door made the candle flame flicker precariously.

Yet the man reading the letter in his hand didn't so much as twitch an eyebrow. Years of grueling training since childhood had honed his eyesight enough to distinguish its tiny writing even by a flame that looked ready to go out.

He stared at the letter he'd already read several times. In his eyes, the wavering candlelight reflected part of its message.

Return immediately.

The handwriting was sharp as a blade, and beside it was a familiar official seal.

Guessing who had sent the letter, he muttered softly.

“You haven’t changed, have you?”

His voice echoed hollowly, low and subdued.

The letter wasn’t a request or a favor. It was an order.

It had always been this way. Everyone took it for granted, but he had never grown used to it.

The person who’d written that dry, impersonal command, as though ordering a servant, was his own flesh and blood.

More precisely, the person who had given him that blood.

“…Father.”

The word came after a brief hesitation.

It still felt unfamiliar. As he murmured it, he remembered a rigid, cold childhood with no room for dreams, only purpose—and the stern pair of eyes that had watched him through it.

Creepy as it was, those eyes still seemed to be watching everything he did.

Perhaps that was why he failed to notice someone approaching outside the door.

Thump.

“Ugh!”

A sudden noise overlapped with a cry of pain. Then a sharp shout rang out, breaking the silence.

“You idiot! Height! I told you to mind your height!”

“Taishan not stupid. Namho stupid. You saw it. Why didn’t you dodge?”

“You little punk! Is this because I didn’t give you any sweets?”

The familiar voices reached his ears. Guessing the intruders’ identities, he tossed the letter in his hand into the lamp.

Fwoosh. Crackle.

The paper was less than half the size of his palm and had been treated with oil to keep it dry. It went up in flames at once.

At that moment, the firmly shut door flew open.

Or rather, it was smashed to pieces.

“My lord! Are you ready?”

Bam!

The booming shout came with a shower of splinters. But the man—Sama Pyo—didn’t look the least bit startled. He picked up the travel bag beside him and stood.

“Of course. What about you, Taishan?”

“Taishan ready! Perfect!”

Namho, perched on Taishan’s shoulders, spat out a few pieces of wood.

“Of course it’s perfect. Bring just the jerky he packed back to life and you’d have five cows.”

“That sounds like a reasonable amount to me. Not excessive.”

“…It’s a wonder the Black Dragon Demon Gate hasn’t gone bankrupt. He’s a gluttonous demon through and through.”

Sama Pyo gave a short laugh. He already knew that the old Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent, who hadn’t seemed all that pleasant at first, had a warm heart and a fair amount of affection for others.

“More importantly, what were you doing in here alone?”

“I stopped by for a moment. There was something I needed to take care of before we left.”

“Is that so?”

Namho glanced over Sama Pyo’s shoulder, but the letter, soaked through with oil, had already burned away without a trace.

“Then put that fire out before you come out. The weather’s shitty enough without you burning down someone else’s thatched cottage.”

“Oh, I almost forgot.”

Sama Pyo answered mildly and waved a hand, snuffing out the candle. Then, as though nothing had happened, he headed for the doorway.

“Let’s go. Everyone must be waiting.”

Namho watched Sama Pyo’s back with a curious look.

But only for a moment.

Thump.

“Ugh!”

Namho struck his forehead on the eaves again. With a cry, he grabbed Taishan by the hair and yanked.

Chapter 997

Fifteen minutes.

Too short to properly savor even a cup of tea, but plenty of time for the Fire Dragon Pavilion members, myself included, to finish our preparations.

And to prepare a send-off no one else had expected.

Whoooosh. Fwoosh.

Countless torches swayed.

Neither the early darkness nor the snowstorm now whipping fiercely through the air could put out that vast blaze.

Crunch.

Footprints marked the snow-covered ground.

Leaving behind hundreds of people standing like iron towers, each holding a torch in one hand, Jin Wikyung stepped forward alone. Then he suddenly spoke.

“The prodigal son finally came home, only to leave again.”

His voice was stern, as if he were passing judgment on a criminal, but prodigal son drew quiet laughter from here and there.

By now, everyone in the Jin Family of Taiyuan knew it. Not just them, but all of Shanxi Province—or rather, the whole world.

Jin Taekyung was no longer the Shame of the Family or a dissolute rogue.

Ever since the day, more than a year ago, when I defeated the traitors—including the Head Elder—and restored peace, I had been their pride and their symbol.

“I never wanted to send you away again.”

I shrugged at Jin Wikyung, who muttered the words with a bitter expression.

“What can I do? Guess it’s fate.”

“What came from the Murim Alliance was information, not an order. If you change your mind, even now, you can stay with the family and leave with everyone else.”

“That sounds nice. But I’ll go ahead and wait for you. I hate being late.”

Jin Wikyung let out a small groan at my polite refusal.

He was practically the Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, so he couldn’t simply leave. He had to keep not only the family members but countless martial artists from Shanxi under control as they moved—and the nomads they had subdued, too.

It was much the same for the Bow Saint and the Embroidered Uniform Guard, who still hadn’t returned after rooting out the Murong Family’s threat.

A massive army and a small advance unit.

It was obvious which would be slower and which would be faster. And that considerable gap in timing might become the flap of a butterfly’s wings somewhere far away and change a great many things.

Of course, knowing that did nothing to ease his worry for his own flesh and blood.

“It will be dangerous. More than ever before.”

At the sight of Jin Wikyung’s worried expression, my journey so far flashed before my eyes.

Dangerous, huh?

Yeah, of course it would be.

But…

“It always has been. Not once has it been any different, and it won’t be from here on out.”

Looking back, there had never been a time when I wasn’t in danger.

There had never been an easy moment, either.

When I first opened my eyes, I was a tadpole. I struggled to survive and became a frog.

I leaped and leaped with all my might until I escaped the well. Beyond it waited a world incomparably wider and more treacherous than the one I’d left behind.

And at every fork in the road that blocked my way, I had always made a choice.

“It’s the road I chose. I don’t know when I’ll be able to stop, but… I have to keep running. All the way to the end.”

Jin Wikyung was silent for a moment at my matter-of-fact answer. Then he let out a quiet laugh.

“You’ve grown up. Before I knew it, you’d grown so much I hardly recognized you.”

Looking at Jin Wikyung, whose imposing build was enough to make me wonder if he had Hebei Peng blood, I smiled back.

“I’m still not as big as you, hyung[3601].”

“Hyung[3602]. That sounds especially good today. Maybe because it’s been so long since you called me that.”

It wasn’t just because I’d spent so long away. I’d simply needed a little more time to truly accept the new family I’d found in this unfamiliar world.

Even if this body’s true owner wasn’t me.

Right. The real owner—the Jin Family’s Third Young Master—is someone else.

The thought weighed on me, but the familiar face that appeared beside Jin Wikyung a moment later washed it away.

“Oh, would you look at that. Isn’t that our family’s second son?”

At my exaggeratedly wide-eyed look, Jin Mukyung shook his head.

[3601] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

[3602] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

“Here we go again.”

“What? Did I say anything wrong? You are the second son.”

“You conveniently left out the ‘hyung’[3603] that’s supposed to come after it.”

“I’ll add it if you want. Beat me first.”

“…You shameless bastard.”

“What, you don’t think you can?”

Jin Mukyung stared at me in disbelief, then gave a short laugh.

“Of course I can. Just wait. I’ll catch up soon.”

“Confidence is good, but don’t expect it to be easy.”

“I know. But you’d better remember one thing, too.”

“What?”

“Until I catch up, don’t let anyone else take you down. Ever.”

“…!”

For a moment, I couldn’t speak. Seeing me blink at him in silence, Jin Mukyung seemed to regret what he’d said. He hesitated, then suddenly extended his fist.

Tap.

His slow but solid punch landed against my chest.

Even with the snowstorm raging all around us, warmth spread through the spot where his fist had touched before drawing away.

“Go ahead. This time, I won’t be late. I promise.”

Maybe he was embarrassed to have shown a side of himself he usually kept hidden. Or maybe some emotion had welled up in him.

Whatever the reason, Jin Mukyung turned away after those words. In the direction he headed, more familiar faces were waiting for me.

Wipeng, who had come to see me off despite his grievous injuries.

Lee Seowol, forcing a smile despite the death of her uncle, Cheol Mubaek—the Tiger of Mount Heng—who had been her staunchest guardian and almost another father to her.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan’s senior members, who had served Jin Wikyung with unwavering loyalty and helped him raise the once-declining family into one of the Five Great Families.

The scouts who had once crossed life and death alongside me. The young brother and sister who had grown so much while I was away from the Jin Family of Taiyuan. And countless family retainers whose faces were more familiar than their names.

Every one of them was looking at me.

[3603] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

As I met each person's eyes, they smiled brightly, nodded quietly, and stamped their feet with such overwhelming emotion that their hearts seemed ready to burst.

Hard and strong. Without anyone having to lead, they stamped the ground, now blanketed in white, and drew their weapons like lightning.

Clang-clang-clang-clang!

Amid hundreds of swaying torches, a dazzling wave of steel lit up everything around us, brighter than the snowstorm pouring down overhead. An aura like wildfire rose and heated the air.

Thud. Thud. Thoom!

The ground shook beneath their vigorous footfalls. My heart, which had gradually settled into a steady rhythm to match them, began to pound. Just then, Jin Wikyung's quiet voice slipped into my ear.

"Do you see it?"

I didn't answer.

No—I couldn't.

I could only listen to Jin Wikyung's voice echoing around me, my chest trembling deep inside.

"You are our pride."

"…!"

"Go. Down the road you chose."

Go forward without hesitation, with all your might.

Hearing the rest of his words swallowed by the fierce snowstorm, I finally moved my feet.

Crunch.

Beneath a roof of countless crossed blades, new footprints began to mark the white snow.

The untimely snowstorm wasn't confined to Shanxi Province.

The young man had remained silent for a long time, even after his expected guest arrived. Watching the snow whip past the window, he suddenly spoke.

"Long ago—very long ago—someone said something like that to me."

Across the rough table, the guest sat with perfect composure despite a full shichen—about two hours—of silence.

"You've made me curious already. Who was it?"

To anyone who didn't know them, it would have seemed a strange sight.

The room's owner was a young man, while his guest looked to be about eighty.

Yet the scar visible beneath the older man's graying hair spoke of a life spent in secrecy. The same was true of the young man opposite him.

"You know the person, too. I can tell you now, if you want."

The casual way he addressed the older man came as naturally as breathing.

The Thousand-Faced Fox, Song Ho, lightly declined the Sword Saint Mae Jonghak's offer.

"I'll try to guess after I hear what was said. I prefer figuring things out for myself to being given the answer."

"Wouldn't most people choose the former?"

"As Chief of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion, shouldn't I be able to manage at least that much?"

"That's a fair point."

"So, what did this person say to you, Alliance Leader?"

Still gazing out the window, Mae Jonghak answered.

"He told me to protect it. The place where I stood, the convictions I held in my heart, and the world."

"…!"

"I was told to remain here, unchanged, even if that person disappeared one day. Of course, at the time, it sounded like a passing remark, so I didn't think much of it. That's all."

The Thousand-Faced Fox let out a breath he'd been holding.

"I think I know who it was."

"You do?"

"Yes. As it happens, I believe I heard something similar myself."

"That person would be pleased to know it. You didn't take those words lightly. You've kept the Hidden Shadow Pavilion's intelligence network going all this time."

The Thousand-Faced Fox nodded without a word.

He certainly would have been pleased. Maybe he would even have clapped his hands and burst out laughing.

In Song Ho's memories, the Martial God seemed to carry every worry in the world, yet at times he could be as innocent as a child.

"There's something I'd like to ask you."

"Go ahead, Alliance Leader."

The Thousand-Faced Fox tensed without meaning to.

He feared that the Number One Sword Under Heaven, now the new symbol of the Central Plains Murim in the Martial God's place, might waver at the most crucial moment.

But Mae Jonghak's next words swept that fear away at once.

“When this war is over, what are you going to do?”

“Pardon?”

“No, I just started worrying about you. You hardly get paid for all the work you do. Should I give you a raise now? How about doubling your salary?”

“…!”

“Hmm. Or tripling it? Then you wouldn’t have to worry about retirement.”

The Thousand-Faced Fox stared blankly at Mae Jonghak, frozen like a statue. Then he suddenly burst into a hearty laugh.

When he stopped laughing, he answered.

“Don’t worry about my retirement. If I need to, I can always siphon some money off to the side.”

“Oh. So you already have a plan.”

“Of course.”

“But let’s keep this between the two of us. If our friends outside that door find out, we might get some dirty looks. Don’t you think?”

Mae Jonghak stood without waiting for an answer.

A gust of qi swept through the air and threw open the firmly shut door. Beyond it, dozens of people sat around a massive table.

“I’ll say this up front: as long as the amount is reasonable, I’m willing to turn a blind eye to whatever the Chief of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion does.”

At the first playful remark from a middle-aged man, Mae Jonghak nodded with satisfaction.

“Clever, as always. You know just what to say and when.”

“You’re too kind.”

“Now then, did you complete your mission safely, Family Head Zhuge?”

The middle-aged man, Zhuge Feng—the Crouching Dragon Guest—waved his tattered feather fan.

“Can you see it?”

“Quite clearly.”

“These are the marks of my suffering. I thought I was going to die.”

“Which means…”

“The Zhuge Clan has completed every task assigned to it.”

Exclamations rose from around the room. Everyone present knew what Zhuge Feng had been assigned to do, and how important it was.

And it meant one thing.

All preparations were complete. A new phase was beginning.

“Well, then. Everyone’s going to be busy from here on out.”

The opening act of an all-out war had begun.

Chapter 998

As Jin Wikyung had already said, the most likely place for a major battle with Dark Heaven was Qinghai, where the Kunlun Sect was located.

It was a strategic foothold the enemy would have to take before advancing into the Central Plains—and one the orthodox Murim would have to defend with their lives.

That was exactly why I could answer Hyuk Mujin's question about how we would get to Qinghai without hesitation.

"We run. Fucking hard."

"I know that much. What I wanted to ask was…"

"Running fucking hard is fine, but how long do we keep it up?"

"Ah, Captain. You know exactly what I'm thinking."

"Keep going."

"…Excuse me?"

"Keep going. All the way."

"Wait, all the way to Qinghai?"

I asked without easing the reins of my galloping horse.

"Otherwise?"

"I think taking the water route would be better. We can travel overland as you said, then take a tributary of the Yangtze from Shaanxi straight to Qinghai. It'd save us about half a day and take a lot less effort."

On the face of it, the suggestion made sense.

Half a day wasn't much, but we'd arrive sooner and conserve our Stamina before an important battle.

Besides, even the Yangtze River Channel League—the river's gangsters, notorious across the country for generations—was part of the Murim Alliance. If we were lucky, we might be able to hijack a swift ship… No, borrow one.

Or at the very least, a Great Nation military vessel.

But I shook my head at once.

"The land route is better."

"Why? Do you get seasick?"

"…"

"Even if you do, try to bear with it. I'll pat your back."

Was this bastard looking down on a Supreme Peak master?

And I wasn't some newly minted Supreme Peak master, either. I'd reached the pinnacle of martial arts and completed Bone Transformation. I was a superhuman among superhumans.

I could ride a Wolmido Disco Pang Pang[3604] and feel perfectly steady. Seasickness?

I stared at Hyuk Mujin in disbelief, momentarily at a loss for words. Just then, a fierce gust of wind swept toward the back of his head.

Whoosh—smack!

"Gah!"

It was the sort of impact that felt satisfying just to hear. Jeok Cheongang, who had expertly smacked the back of Hyuk Mujin's head, clicked his tongue.

He'd found the saddle uncomfortable, so he was traveling by stepping from branch to branch along the trees lining the road.

"You stupid fool. Why do you talk so much? If your superior tells you to do something, you do it."

If anyone but me had smacked Hyuk Mujin on the back of the head, he'd have been glaring daggers. But when that someone was the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, it was a different story.

Unable to talk back, Hyuk Mujin rubbed his aching head and glanced around before speaking.

"I was just offering a better suggestion. Why are you doing this to me?"

"A better suggestion? Do you really think so?"

"Wasn't it…?"

"I'll admit it sounded plausible. But you overlooked the most important thing."

Before Hyuk Mujin could answer, Jeok Cheongang's low voice carried through the wind.

"Dark Heaven. Whether those devious bastards are truly targeting Qinghai."

"…!"

"We know nothing for certain yet. No one knows where Dark Heaven's army, said to be marching beyond the desert, is headed. Qinghai isn't the only route into the Central Plains."

I nodded. Jeok Cheongang had the situation exactly right.

There wasn't just one route. There were three, maybe more.

Qinghai, Gansu, and even Tibet, beyond the borderlands and counted among the Outer Lands.

Qinghai was the likeliest main target because of its strategic importance, but an invasion through Gansu or Tibet was entirely possible too.

And besides…

They have a Warp Gate—or rather, a Moving Formation.

The Moving Formation gave the enemy more options, while serving as a painfully sharp dagger aimed at our backs.

[3604] Wolmido Disco Pang Pang is a Korean amusement-park ride with a spinning, bouncing platform.

They could send as many as a thousand people—at least, that was the number we'd confirmed so far—to somewhere in the Central Plains through a Moving Formation. How could we take that lightly?

Of course, there was a way to deal with it.

The Zhuge Clan, renowned as the finest in the world at mechanisms and formations, possessed a formation called the Demon-Sealing Formation. As its name suggested, it could suppress and seal magical power.

When a "rift" had opened at Dongting Lake, the Zhuge Clan had managed to contain it with the Demon-Sealing Formation, led by their Family Head, Zhuge Feng. That was why the incident had been brought to an end without even greater losses.

If they can stop a rift, they should be able to neutralize a Moving Formation, too. I've seen the Demon-Sealing Formation myself, so I know it works. The problem is time and manpower.

The world was vast.

And no one knew how many Moving Formations Dark Heaven had built somewhere in that boundless sea of sand.

We'd found a way to deal with them well over half a year ago, yet several sects near Shanxi Province had still hesitated to send reinforcements, even for a short while. That alone showed how serious the risk was.

Even if just one Moving Formation remained, it would be like a sharp shard of glass, digging deep into the sole of someone walking carelessly across the sand.

That's why we have to travel overland.

Qinghai had been a battlefield whenever foreign invaders came over the centuries. The Murim Alliance would have prepared the best defenses it could.

Those defenses wouldn't be so flimsy that half a day—or even a full day—would make the difference between holding and falling.

Tibet should be reasonably safe, too. Even if the Potala Palace has joined hands with Dark Heaven, the forces stationed in Sichuan should be able to hold out.

The Sichuan Tang Clan, which the Western Heaven Demon Lord had targeted personally, had suffered tremendous losses. But Qingcheng and Emei were still intact.

And some unexpected guests were staying in Sichuan as well.

The Nanman Beast Palace.

Though we'd left in a hurry with a long road ahead, I'd heard news of them from time to time.

The warriors of the tropics had finally left their jungle in an unprecedented mass migration. They'd readily accepted the Murim Alliance's request and were now defending Sichuan.

"The western front will have made preparations to some extent. Except in one place."

I wasn't speaking to Hyuk Mujin alone.

After finishing my train of thought, I suddenly spoke. I looked around at the Fire Dragon Pavilion members riding alongside me, then added quietly,

"Gansu."

"…!"

"…!"

"If Dark Heaven goes against everyone's expectations and targets Gansu, that's where the biggest battle of this war will be fought."

That was no exaggeration.

Dark Heaven had always found ways to catch us off guard.

Thanks to the efforts of countless people, myself included, who'd practically shit ourselves trying to stop them, their schemes had been thwarted time and again. But that didn't mean the Murim Alliance had gained the upper hand in this war.

No. It would be more accurate to say Dark Heaven had been toying with us.

Shutting the stable door after the horse has bolted.

If we'd caught the arsonist before he set fire to the stable, that would have been a victory.

But the stable had burned every time, and countless people had been slaughtered like livestock.

As the person who'd repeatedly run around dousing the stables wherever I went, I was sick and tired of all of it.

So…

This time, we have to stop them. No matter what.

Before another fire started. Before there were more terrible losses.

We had to be cautious, then cautious again. Test the stone bridge before crossing it. I needed to see the situation in Gansu with my own eyes before moving on to Qinghai.

That was the biggest reason I'd chosen the land route over the slightly faster, more comfortable water route.

And this choice should be a lot more reassuring for him, too.

I glanced at one man.

Half a day had passed since we left the Jin Family of Taiyuan, and Sama Pyo still hadn't said a word. He simply held his reins in silence.

He'd always been taciturn, but lately it had grown more pronounced.

No wonder. If Dark Heaven's army is crossing the deserts of Xinjiang right now, his family could be in danger.

Along with the Kongtong Sect, one of the Nine Sects and One Gang, the Black Dragon Demon Gate was one of the two powers that divided Gansu Province between them.

As the Black Dragon Demon Gate's Young Sect Leader, Sama Pyo was bound to have a lot on his mind. All the more so after hearing what Jeok Cheongang and I had just said.

But I didn't try to console him.

Comfort was a luxury in a situation like this. When our eyes met, Sama Pyo gave me a slight, silent nod. I looked away and tightened my grip on the reins.

"Hyah!"

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

The grassland horses, said to surpass even sweat-blood horses in endurance, galloped on without a trace of fatigue.

Night and day passed once more, and the moon and sun crossed paths overhead.

Three days swept by like the wind. We left Shanxi Province and reached the border between Shaanxi and Gansu.

"Stop. We'll rest here for half a shichen.[3605]"

The man who suddenly spoke, bringing everyone to a halt, appeared to be around sixty. He was slender, with strikingly narrow eyes.

Of course, the several hundred people following him knew appearances didn't tell the whole story.

Just as what they saw with their eyes wasn't all there was, the old man had lived far longer than he looked. Only his formidable martial prowess could account for it.

Great age and formidable skill.

Of everyone present, only one person could refuse an order from a man who possessed both.

"A rest, out of nowhere? What on earth do you mean, Eldest Senior Brother?"

A half-white-haired Daoist in a clean robe hurried over, looking confused. The old man answered without a care.

"This old body of mine is giving me trouble. I can't go any farther, so I thought we'd rest for half a shichen. Is there a problem?"

"Eldest Senior Brother!"

"Lower your voice, Junior Brother Sect Leader. How can you be so rude to Eldest Senior Brother?"

[3605] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

Someone else had cut in. The graying Daoist turned toward the reproachful voice and sighed.

“Why are you doing this too, Senior Brother? It’s been two days since we left the main sect, and we still haven’t reached Gansu. You both know that…”

“Enough.”

The man he’d called Senior Brother—an old Daoist with a luxuriant white beard that made him look like an immortal—raised a hand to cut him off.

“What can we do? Our bodies have grown weak. There’s a limit to how far we can travel. Eldest Senior Brother and I are disappointed in you, Junior Brother Sect Leader.”

“What do you mean?”

“After spending so long recuperating, your two Senior Brothers have only just become able to get around again. Why must you rush us?”

The graying Daoist’s lips moved as if he wanted to say something, but no words came. He turned away.

Even if he had spoken his mind, the outcome would probably have been much the same.

At that very moment, pounding hooves rang through the deserted forest.

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

Several grassland horses burst through the rising cloud of dust. They spotted the group halted in the middle of the forest path and began to slow.

More precisely, they slowed when they saw the flag rising above the group.

The Great Zhongnan Sect.

From atop his panting grassland horse, the young man riding in front read the characters embroidered in a single flowing stroke and muttered under his breath,

“I think there’s a typo…”

Chapter 999

When I first started working as a Hunter, the veterans had a saying they repeated all the time: you never knew when or where you might cross paths with someone again. So you had to be careful and flexible about making or breaking ties, or you'd have trouble later.

Looking back, I can't think of a more useful piece of advice.

There was just one problem. Advice like that didn't mean a damn thing to a guy like me.

"I think there's a typo…"

The Great Zhongnan Sect.

The words slipped out the moment I read the four characters embroidered on the ornate silk. The nearest Daoist frowned.

"Daoist friend, what did you just say?"

"Oh, nothing. Talking to myself."

"Talking to yourself?"

"Yeah."

"That's rather familiar of you."

"Yeah, sir."

The middle-aged Daoist stared at me, momentarily dumbfounded. He drew a breath before he managed to speak.

"What are you playing at?"

"You called me a friend, so I talked to you like one. Besides, you started speaking casually to me first."

"You look to be a fellow martial artist, but you're much younger than I am. You have quite a mouth on you."

"I can get away with it. I'm young, but in martial seniority I'm an old man."

"What… did you say?"

At that point, it was only natural for him to sense something was amiss. My answer had thrown him off, and an uneasy murmur spread among the Zhongnan Sect disciples watching me and the Fire Dragon Pavilion members who'd appeared so suddenly.

"It's true."

At the sound of a low voice, the crowd parted to either side. I smiled warmly at the familiar faces beyond them.

"It's been a while. Both of you."

Neither returned my greeting. The two old Daoists had stopped abruptly three jang[3606] away.

“May your health be… uh… what comes after that?”

Hyuk Mujin answered without hesitation.

“Split in two.”

“May your health be split in two. That sounds a little off. Are you sure?”

“No. I don’t really know either. I just said the first thing that came to mind.”

“Are you insane? Now I’m even more confused.”

“I’m sorry.”

“Whatever. Anybody know it?”

Ju Hwaran shot up a hand.

“May you be healthy in every way. May your health be sound in every respect.”

“Oh. As expected of Young Lady Ju. Ten points to the Griffin Yongbong Escort Bureau.”

“Hehe.”

She smiled bashfully, though she had no idea what I meant. I gave her a thumbs-up, then respectfully clasped my hands toward the two old Daoists.

“Anyway. Have you both been split in two?”

“…!”

“…!”

The mood turned as cold as if someone had dumped a bucket of water over us.

I belatedly realized I’d said it wrong and let out a deep sigh. Depending on how they took it, they might misunderstand, but it really was a slip of the tongue.

“Damn it, I got mixed up. Hyuk Mujin.”

“Yes?”

“Get down and put your head on the ground.”

“Ah, yes.”

As Hyuk Mujin performed the remarkable feat of putting his head down while seated in the saddle, one of the old Daoists finally spoke.

“You haven’t changed. Still as brazen as ever.”

He was the first of the two to speak, an old Daoist with a thick snow-white beard. It hung down to his navel, making him look like an immortal who’d descended to the mortal world. But I already knew better.

Hwangbo Eom, the Taeeul Merciless Sword, was about as far from an immortal as a man could get.

Not even close. If he were half as good inside as he looked, he never would’ve pulled a stunt that shameless.

[3606] A jang is a traditional unit of length, approximately 3.03 meters (9.94 ft); three jang are about 9.09 meters (29.8 ft).

It might be unfortunate for him and the Zhongnan Sect, but I didn't have the memory of a goldfish.

They'd entrusted Ju Hwaran's Yongbong Escort Bureau with transporting their priceless Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng, then secretly stolen it back and demanded compensation. It was an insurance scam meant to swallow the Bureau whole. I'd remember it for the rest of my life.

Of course, the old man beside Hwangbo Eom, darting his eyes this way and that, had a colorful record of his own.

"Looking for someone?"

"…What?"

"I asked if you were looking for someone, Great Hero Song Il."

The Roaring Fury Swordsman's eyebrows twitched at the amusement in my voice.

A year and several months ago, Song Il had tried to overturn the Jin Family of Taiyuan's banquet, backed by his Supreme Peak martial prowess and his illustrious position as a Zhongnan Sect Elder. He'd nearly ended up the guest of honor at a funeral instead.

Now he was anxiously scanning our group, searching for one person: a man who, Zhongnan Sect or not, wouldn't think twice about slapping someone across the face and kicking them in the shins for good measure if the mood took him.

I spoke gently.

"You can relax. The person you're looking for isn't here."

"…!"

"Oh, did I get it wrong? Were you looking for someone else?"

Song Il glared at me in silence before squeezing out his answer.

"You dare—"

"Dare to what?"

That wasn't me.

Jeok Cheongang dropped out of empty air, and Song Il's eyes went wide.

"H-How can you be here?"

"What? 'You'?"

"N-No, that's not what I meant."

Song Il stammered and backed away.

A bristly crop of red hair had grown over Jeok Cheongang's once-smooth scalp, and his face now looked middle-aged. Word that he'd broken through to another great realm and regained his youth had spread far and wide. The Zhongnan Sect was no exception.

"F-Fire King Jeok Cheongang…!"

Someone blurted out the name, and shock swept through the crowd. They were seeing the Fire King himself for the first time—and realizing that the young upstart who'd appeared out of nowhere was the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung.

Song Il looked between Jeok Cheongang and me as though he couldn't believe his eyes. I spread my arms wide.

"Ta-da! I lied!"

"…!"

"What do you think? Surprised?"

We hadn't seen each other in ages. A little surprise was only fair.

From the way he sucked in a breath and started trembling, I'd definitely surprised him. He looked less startled than on the verge of a fit, though.

Fortunately for Song Il, someone intervened before he keeled over.

"This humble Gong of the Zhongnan Sect pays his respects to Great Hero Jeok."

A graying Daoist with a goatee of awkward, in-between length clasped his hands respectfully despite his haste. At the sight of the Zhongnan Sect Leader, Jeok Cheongang clicked his tongue, disappointed that he couldn't keep tormenting Song Il.

"Well, it's been a while. What was your name again? Gong Piljung?"

"Not Piljung. Iljung. I'm Gong Iljung, Great Hero Jeok."

"Ah, yes. I remember now. Wind-and-Cloud War God Gong Iljung."

"…Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord."

"Good grief. I keep getting my words mixed up today. Sorry about that, Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord Gong Piljung."

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord looked at me, all the fight gone out of him. His half-resigned eyes held a question he desperately wanted answered.

Is he doing this to mess with me on purpose?

Eyes can be an excellent way to communicate. I answered with mine.

No. He's just like that.

That wasn't empty reassurance. Honestly, neither Jeok Cheongang nor I had any particular grudge against Gong Iljung.

We had plenty against his Senior Brothers, Song Il and Hwangbo Eom. But we'd only crossed paths with Gong Iljung a couple of times, at the Star-Array Grand Banquet and the founding of the Murim Alliance. We had no reason to hold anything against him.

Jeok Cheongang looked ready to punch Song Il, yet he was still addressing Gong Iljung with a measure of courtesy. That said enough.

Besides, people don't have much bad to say about the Zhongnan Sect Leader.

Feeling a little sorry that he'd caught some of the insult unintentionally, I shook my head. Gong Iljung seemed to relax.

"I'm surprised. I didn't expect to see you here again."

"Likewise."

Jeok Cheongang answered without hesitation, then looked over the Zhongnan Sect Disciples filling the forest path and added,

"I thought you'd be in Gansu or Qinghai by now."

"…"

"Shaanxi's right next door. Why are you sprawled out resting here?"

Now that was a direct hit. Gong Iljung flushed.

"W-Well…"

He couldn't bring himself to finish, but his eyes shifted toward the answer.

Song Il and Hwangbo Eom watched us with grim faces. I could piece together most of what had happened.

They'd dug in their heels and dared anyone to do something about it.

For some reason, those old bastards seemed to have held the whole Zhongnan Sect back. I was almost certain of it, especially since something similar had happened recently.

Come to think of it, those two were the only ones who didn't show up.

When the bloodshed erupted in Shanxi Province, the Hebei Peng Family, Huashan, and even Murim Alliance Headquarters sent reinforcements. Their timely arrival helped us bring the fighting to a complete end.

The Zhongnan Sect?

Strictly speaking, they came.

A day after the battle was over.

Of course, sending reinforcements meant taking some risk, and I was grateful for that much. But it still left a bad taste in my mouth.

They said they'd sent a thousand troops. Three hundred reached Shanxi Province, more than half of them useless nobodies. And even that lot was late.

Put all three together, and the feeling of this is fucking bullshit was bound to rise from deep in my gut. Add the sight of two faces I never wanted to see again, and my mouth moved on its own.

"Well, it happens. Making the journey at all in your condition is a fine display of righteous spirit."

Song Il and Hwangbo Eom frowned as the remark found its marks.

"You brat! I told you to stop running your mouth!"

Jeok Cheongang's stern rebuke was directed at me. He went on without pause.

"Just making it this far while pissing blood all the way here makes you heroes! These great seniors of the Murim are only now beginning to act their age after all this time. How can you speak to them so rudely?"

"…!"

"…!"

“What have they done that’s so wrong? Did they throw their weight around to force a weaker sect to close its doors? Or steal a Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng and try to swallow an innocent Escort Bureau whole?”

Each word from the merciless Tongue King cut to the bone. Gong Iljung struggled to get his voice out.

“G-Great Hero Jeok. Please, for my sake and my Master’s…”

“All right. I’ll stop here.”

“Thank you.”

“No need to thank me, Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord Gong Piljung.”

“…”

Vicious. Absolutely vicious.

Chapter 1000

If the Roaring Fury Swordsman and the Taeeul Merciless Sword had shown even a hint of displeasure at that moment—or if they'd been unable to keep their itching hands still and started fiddling with their sword hilts—something serious might have happened.

Me aside, Jeok Cheongang was not the sort of man to stand by and let that happen.

And the Zhongnan Sect Leader, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord Gong Pil—no, Gong Iljung—shared that concern.

—Tell me, Friend Jin. Are you just going to watch?

A low voice reached my ear through Sound Transmission.

Jeok Cheongang's brow twitched as he sensed the sound waves. At that very moment, someone spoke.

"What must we do… to earn your forgiveness?"

Everyone's eyes widened, mine included.

Why?

Simple.

Someone we never expected had said something we never expected to hear.

The Roaring Fury Swordsman, Song Il.

That old Daoist, whose pride bordered on arrogance, had opened his tightly sealed lips and asked for forgiveness.

And the "we" he'd used included someone else.

"I've thought about it countless times over the past few months. About the wrongs I committed, and what came of them."

The Taeeul Merciless Sword, Hwangbo Eom.

He and the Roaring Fury Swordsman were the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord's only two Senior Brothers and the most senior members of the Zhongnan Sect. Hwangbo Eom looked at me as he continued.

"It was my fault. I can't deny that."

His gaze sank. His voice trembled.

I watched him in silence, then suddenly spoke.

"Did you mean what you just said?"

"Do you doubt my sincerity?"

"Of course not."

I swallowed hard and added, "I believe you. At the same time, I'll put the unpleasant memories of the past behind me. I can't say I was blameless in the trouble that happened that day, either."

Everyone's eyes widened at my calm reply. Those who knew me well were probably the most surprised.

Even to me, the voice coming out of my mouth sounded like someone else's.

But another voice slipped out at the same time, and that one was different.

It was what I truly thought, but couldn't say aloud in front of everyone.

—I don't believe you. No, I won't believe you.

—…!

—If Great Hero Hwangbo truly regretted what he did, I can't explain what we saw just a moment ago. I think you both know what I mean.

I sent the Sound Transmission and looked calmly at the Roaring Fury Swordsman and the Taeeul Merciless Sword.

Only moments had passed since they'd clenched their teeth and trembled with their fists balled tight. That wasn't long enough to forget.

And yet it must have been a long, painful road for them to stand here on their own two feet.

There's still resentment. Of course there is.

I wasn't asking them to erase it completely.

People don't change easily.

Not me. Not them.

But now was the time to set aside the bad blood between us and move forward. Everyone knew that.

—What answer do you want from us?

—The truth. What you genuinely think—not something meant to be shown or said for someone else's benefit.

—…!

—You don't have to understand each other. But you have to acknowledge your own feelings and accept the distance between you before you can join hands. I think you both know that already.

A silence that lasted too long would invite suspicion.

In the brief hush, the two old Daoists looked at each other, then clasped their hands toward us.

"I, Song Il, bow my head and apologize for the disrespect I showed the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

"Please forgive me for forgetting my duty as a Daoist and putting the Yongbong Escort Bureau in danger. I promise to apologize again and do everything I can to compensate you."

The Roaring Fury Swordsman bowed to me. The Taeeul Merciless Sword bowed to Ju Hwaran.

The Zhongnan Sect Disciples who witnessed it reacted in all sorts of ways.

Some bit their lips in frustration. Some wore faint smiles. Others couldn't bear to watch their elders apologize to outsiders, so they closed their eyes as if they hadn't seen it or looked away.

But most of them probably didn't notice that those stiff bows, made by men who had gone so long without bending to anyone, hid the slight movement of their lips.

—Yes, you're right. Bad blood doesn't disappear so easily once it's there. And I know that you, who say so, aren't much different from us.

—But now is the time to gather our strength and face our great enemy. That is why we, as members of the great Zhongnan Sect and respected masters of the Murim, will fight for the world. Nothing more.

Their Sound Transmissions reached both my ears at once.

If those were their genuine feelings, I had no reason to refuse.

Step.

For the first time since we'd encountered the Zhongnan Sect, I dismounted. Ju Hwaran followed my cue and set her feet on the ground.

Then?

We clasped our hands toward the two old Daoists, so respectfully that no one could have found fault with it.

Jeok Cheongang watched me in silence with a curious smile, then shrugged at the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord.

"Better to keep things friendly. Right, Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord Gong Iljung?"

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord had looked like he'd just aged ten years. Now, as the situation came to a gentle close, he let out a sigh.

"Piljung. I've told you several times already, it's Gong Piljung…"

"Gong Piljung? Wasn't it Gong Iljung?"

"…?"

"…?"

"Ah."

"What's the problem?"

Only then did the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord realize something was off. He shook his head as if he'd been bewitched.

The tense atmosphere had lasted only a little while at the start.

Once things had settled, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord—briefly confused by Jeok Cheongang's dazzling name-changing technique—was the first to speak.

"May I ask where you're headed?"

Jeok Cheongang answered flatly.

“Of course not.”

“Pardon?”

“Ask someone else. I’m only here as a guest. Someone else is in the presiding chair.”

Who was Jeok Cheongang? The Fire King himself.

He was also the head of the Five Kings Hall, newly established alongside the Murim Alliance. The idea that he was merely a guest was ridiculous.

But the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord nodded without argument and came over to me.

If Jeok Cheongang said so, then that was how it was. If he said otherwise, then it wasn’t.

As the leader of a great sect like the Zhongnan Sect, he took Jeok Cheongang’s answer to mean that his Master wanted to give his Disciple the authority to speak.

I saw it differently, of course.

“Great Hero Jeok cares for you a great deal.”

“He must have found you pretty annoying.”

“…?”

“He doesn’t like it when people he isn’t close to keep talking to him. Give him some space for the next half day or so.”

“…!”

“I’m telling you so you don’t misunderstand. I’m not joking.”

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord looked back and forth between me and Jeok Cheongang as if he couldn’t believe what he was hearing. He gave an awkward reply.

“Thank you for the kind advice.”

“Don’t mention it.”

“And as Sect Leader, I can’t say this in public, but I’m grateful to you for the other matter, too.”

The other matter.

It was vague, but I had no trouble understanding him.

He was thanking me, in his own way, for settling things peacefully with his two Senior Brothers.

“You don’t have to thank me. Honestly… they were the ones who brought it up, and that helped resolve things.”

What would have happened if even the slightest killing intent had slipped from the Roaring Fury Swordsman or the Taeeul Merciless Sword?

Given the situation, it probably wouldn’t have turned into a massive bloodbath. But neither Jeok Cheongang nor I would have stood by and done nothing.

No matter how close Dark Heaven's blade was to our throats, we couldn't ignore a dagger coming at us from behind.

"Well, thanks to them, things are more or less settled for now. That's a relief."

"Mm. It surprised me, too. Though I doubt my Senior Brothers have entirely let go of their feelings."

I looked at him in surprise. The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord gave a faint, wry laugh.

"What, did you think I wouldn't know?"

"No. I just…"

"I joined Zhongnan when I was twelve. We served the same Master, and we've spent well over fifty years together. I know my Senior Brothers better than anyone. But as their Junior Brother and as Sect Leader, I should say no more."

From the sound of it, he'd cleaned up the messes his Senior Brothers made more than once.

I decided this was the time to ask him directly.

"Is that why the reinforcements never really came?"

"…That's a sharp question."

"I just want to know what happened. I'm not accusing you."

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord let out a faint sigh under my unwavering gaze.

"It wasn't any one person's fault. Even I couldn't bring myself to send a large portion of our sect's main force."

"Meaning?"

"I made that decision out of concern for Zhongnan's safety. If it upset you and the Jin Family of Taiyuan, there was nothing to be done."

Sometimes a direct, plain answer is the right one.

Like now.

I thought for a moment, then quietly nodded.

"What does that mean?"

"I mean I understand. Completely."

"Then…"

"It would be ridiculous to tell people who are helping us exactly how they should help. We had enough reinforcements without Zhongnan. I only wanted to know why."

"I see. Then is that enough?"

"Of course."

I didn't bother adding for now.

Nor did I bring up the bad blood between the Zhongnan Sect and the Nanman Beast Palace from the Great Faction War.

For the moment, this was the best we could do.

Now was the time to look at the forest, not the branches. There was nothing to gain from falling out with the Zhongnan Sect.

We need Zhongnan's strength to face Dark Heaven's army threatening the west.

There were three Supreme Peak masters here alone.

And even at a glance, the Zhongnan Sect Disciples they led were the elite of the main sect.

That meant they, too, intended to give their all in the great battle to come.

Remembering the bad blood of the past without dwelling on it was the right choice.

I hoped that choice would lead everyone in a better direction.

That was the only way we could send the Fire Dragon Pavilion members back home in one piece after a short rest—one they were getting up from now, after days of marching without respite.

Actually, two of them are already on their way home.

I was lost in thought, looking at Sama Pyo and Taishan, when the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord spoke.

"So, where are you headed? Qinghai, like Huashan, who passed us earlier? Or…"

"Gansu. We're going to Gansu."

I'd been about to ask where the Zhongnan Sect was headed, but realized I didn't need to.

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord's face had brightened considerably. That told me they were going the same way we were.

Chapter 1001

We ended up traveling with the Zhongnan Sect almost before I knew it.

Their Sect Leader, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord, proposed it, and while I was still thinking it over, Jeok Cheongang cut in and accepted.

“Traveling together? That wouldn’t be a bad idea.”

“Old—no, Master.”

“What are you standing around for? Get your subordinates ready. And you too, Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord—start by kicking those lazy disciples of yours in the ass.”

Just like that, the preparations were over.

Our party, now a little over a thousand if I rounded generously, set off toward Gansu. The Roaring Fury Swordsman and the Taeeul Merciless Sword came along too, neither looking pleased about it.

“Those two have looked downright miserable for a while now. If we’d met them exactly six months earlier, I’d have punched them in the jaw first thing.”

Jeok Cheongang smacked his lips. I clicked my tongue.

“If you didn’t want to look at them, you shouldn’t have accepted.”

“Is that why your lips are sticking out three inches?”

“Who says my lips are sticking out?”

“Correction. They’re sticking out four inches now.”

I shook my head at his teasing.

We’d taken the rear, a good thirty jang[3607] behind the Zhongnan Sect. Being far enough away to talk openly was about the only advantage I could see.

“Yes, I’m annoyed. Happy?”

“I can never quite figure you out. Why make up with them if it was only for show?”

Only for show.

I couldn’t have put it better myself.

I’d already guessed Jeok Cheongang had heard everything we’d said through Sound Transmission, so I answered without surprise.

“Well, obviously…”

“Because you need to?”

“Yes.”

“You make peace because you need to, and smile as if the old grudges are behind you… You’ve grown up.”

There was something odd about his tone.

[3607] A jang is ten ja, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Thirty jang is about 91 m (298 ft).

I couldn’t tell whether that was praise or a rebuke. When I stared at him without answering, he gave a quiet laugh.

“Don’t overthink it. I’m glad to see you’ve grown, whichever direction it may be in.”

“Do you think it might be the wrong direction?”

“Who knows? What matters is the outcome.”

“Don’t people usually say the process matters just as much? Sometimes more?”

“The first is what narrow-minded fools say. The second is bullshit from people who’ve thoroughly botched the outcome.”

Jeok Cheongang answered with cutting certainty, then went on.

“If I thought you’d done wrong, I’d have given you a proper scolding. So far, though, you haven’t done too badly. Besides, driving those lazy bastards all the way to Gansu like cattle has its appeal.”

He wasn’t wrong. Even now, the Zhongnan Sect Disciples were running their asses off, thanks to the declaration Jeok Cheongang had made before we set out and he’d claimed the rear for himself.

“From now until we reach Gansu, anyone who falls even a little behind or tries to slack off gets a private meeting with this old man.”

A private lesson with an elder who’d reached a distant realm would be a fortuitous encounter anyone would pray for—unless the teacher was the Fire King. In that case, there was a good chance you’d become a dead man.

Whoosh, whoosh, whoosh!

Have you ever seen hyenas racing for their lives along a mountainside? Or rather, Zhongnan Sect Disciples?

I have.

Jeok Cheongang watched them sprint with every last bit of strength they had, looking thoroughly satisfied. Then he suddenly kicked off the ground.

Boom! Whoooosh!

A sharp boom rang out. His figure shot forward, leaving an afterimage behind.

Jeok Cheongang’s afterimage seemed to remain behind as he rapidly closed in. The Zhongnan Sect Disciples sucked in their breath, and panicked shouts rang out among them.

“Run!”

“If he catches us, we’re finished!”

“S-Senior Brother, I can’t go on. Don’t worry about this useless Junior Brother. Just go…”

“No! Don’t give up! You can make it!”

“…”

My thoughts on the scene were brief.

You're all making a damn spectacle of yourselves.

"Anyone would think Dark Heaven had shown up or someth—huh?"

I was clicking my tongue at the Zhongnan Sect Disciples fleeing like locusts from a wildfire when I spotted something and narrowed my eyes.

Then I understood why Jeok Cheongang had suddenly sped ahead.

What's that?

We had come out of the narrow mountain path, and a hill opened up the view ahead. In the distance stood a small village, its hundred or so thatched cottages huddled together. A crowd had gathered around it.

There had to be several hundred people.

Hyuk Mujin spotted the crowd at the village entrance a moment after I did. His eyes widened.

"Captain. Could that be…"

I could hear the urgency in his voice. Before he could finish, I said, "Don't panic. They don't look like enemies."

"Huh? Then…"

"They're all civilians."

I thought for a moment and added, "At least, from what I can see."

I wasn't completely sure. Judging by our route, we were somewhere on the border between Shaanxi and Gansu. Dark Heaven had the dark art known as the Moving Formation, so running into its people disguised as civilians here wouldn't be all that surprising.

They'd already disguised themselves as government troops in Sichuan once.

If something had happened in Gansu, word would've reached us by now. So what are that many people doing in a tiny mountain village? Is Dark Heaven preparing an ambush with a Moving Formation?

One question led to another.

Then, all of a sudden, I heard a chilling sound.

Shing.

At the sudden sound of a blade being drawn, I turned. Sama Pyo had drawn the Black Dragon Saber, the weapon that shared its name with his sobriquet.

"Whoever they are, it won't hurt to be prepared. Wouldn't you agree, Pavilion Master?"

His voice was calm, but his eyes were dark and intent. The closer we'd come to Gansu, the more somber Sama Pyo had grown.

I nodded and urged my horse on.

Thud, thud, thud, thud!

My grassland horse's hooves pounded the ground.

I didn't know who the people ahead of us were, but I was sure of one thing.

Even if Dark Heaven prepared an ambush, all we have to do is trample them and keep going.

We might be riding into a fierce battle. My heartbeat didn't change.

I'd grown far too strong to be stopped in a mountain valley like this.

In the end, the disaster I'd feared never happened.

No. Let me correct that.

It never happened to our side.

"They're here! Those bastards are here!"

"Aaaah!"

"E-Everyone, get out of the way!"

The shouts and screams were only natural. Close to a thousand suspicious people had come pouring over the steep hill like water through a broken embankment, and some already had blades in their hands.

To the hundreds gathered at the little village entrance, it must have looked like a catastrophe.

Their terror was impossible to fake. The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord, racing at the front alongside Jeok Cheongang, shouted like thunder.

"Enough! Everyone, stop!"

Whoosh!

It was an order from the Sect Leader himself. His voice carried internal energy, and the Zhongnan Sect Disciples quickly slowed to a halt.

But there are always exceptions.

Whoosh.

A faint sound of air being cut, distinct from the rest.

Two figures kept shooting forward like the wind, ignoring the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord's command. I'd been slowing with the Zhongnan Sect Disciples, but at the sight of their backs, I clicked my tongue to myself.

Yeah. I had a feeling they'd do that.

Old habits die hard.

The Roaring Fury Swordsman and the Taeeul Merciless Sword.

Sect Leader or not, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord was their Junior Brother. Those two old dogs ignored his order and kept going.

I kicked off the ground after them.

Whoosh!

[3608] A jang is ten ja, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Thirty jang is about 91 m (298 ft).

A gale wrapped around me as I crossed dozens of jang[3608] in an instant. The two old Daoists drew closer. So did the civilians' screams.

Then a voice reached every ear, including mine.

"Stop."

"…!"

"…!"

It was quiet—not a forceful shout, and it carried no particular internal energy.

One word was enough to stop the Roaring Fury Swordsman and the Taeeul Merciless Sword in their tracks. More important than the word itself was the man who'd said it.

"Are you deaf? Those ears don't seem much use. Want me to rip one off?"

The Roaring Fury Swordsman had stopped only a few steps away from a civilian who stood frozen with his eyes squeezed shut. His face stiff, he began to speak.

"Senior, I was only trying to make sure…"

"Answer the question. Should I rip it off or not?"

"…"

"I thought you were just deaf, but now it seems your mouth's sealed shut too. Fine. You answer for your ailing Senior Brother."

Fire flickered in Jeok Cheongang's eyes. The Taeeul Merciless Sword met his gaze and bowed his head slightly.

"I only wanted to confirm who they were. I had no other intention. If my rash action upset you, Great Hero Jeok…"

"You didn't upset me. You just made an even bigger mess."

"I apologize."

"At least one of you has a working mouth."

Jeok Cheongang frowned at him and let out a small sigh.

"Save your apologies for the people you scared half to death."

He was right. Unlike the few who'd been quick enough to flee, the civilians still standing there were trembling. One man who looked somewhat less shaken than the others hurriedly waved his hands.

"Oh, it's all right, sir. It happened so suddenly that we were startled, but…"

He glanced at the Roaring Fury Swordsman and the Taeeul Merciless Sword, letting the sentence trail off, then looked at Jeok Cheongang and me.

"Y-You're from the Murim Alliance, aren't you? The heroes?"

Calling ourselves heroes after the commotion we'd caused was embarrassing, but I nodded. The man relaxed, and so did the civilians around him.

"Good grief. That took ten years off my life."

"The Murim Alliance… Isn't that the group fighting those wicked foreign invaders?"

“That’s right. There’s been a little misunderstanding.”

“Damn it. I thought we were going to die.”

Sighs of relief rose all around us. The first man’s face brightened, and he spoke again.

“To think you’re the Murim Alliance heroes we’ve heard so much about! What a relief. When we saw a bunch of strange fellows coming, we thought you were them… Oh, listen to me. Calling you strange fellows!”

He hurriedly clapped a hand over his mouth, but neither Jeok Cheongang nor I cared about the slip. We had looked strange enough, and he’d said something far more important.

“Who did you think they were?”

The man answered without hesitation.

“Who else? That vicious gang of mounted bandits.”

What?

Chapter 1002

"Who else would it be? Those vicious mounted bandits."

The moment I heard the man's answer, Jeok Cheongang and I looked at each other.

And for good reason. Mounted bandits were the last people I'd expected to hear about now.

Mounted bandits.

Just what the name said: bandits on horseback.

Just as the Yangtze River Channel League had strongholds along every branch of the Yangtze, and the Green Forest Alliance had mountain strongholds on every mountainside with a road, mounted bandits could be found wherever broad plateaus and plains stretched out.

Pung Yang's Red Wind Band had been one of them.

The vast northern Great Steppe wasn't home to nomads alone.

It was a refuge for all kinds of people who'd crossed the Great Wall—and their only sanctuary.

For those who could never return to the lives they'd left behind, there were two choices.

Eat or be eaten.

Naturally, most chose the former.

It was a hundred, a thousand times better to survive as a predator than become prey.

Pung Yang had probably followed the same path.

I had no idea how he'd obtained a Temporary Strength Pill or learned demonic martial arts worthy of being called a secret technique, but he'd made quite a name for himself as a predator.

He'd even had the nerve to lead hundreds of subordinates across the Great Wall.

In the end, though, Pung Yang and the Red Wind Band had met their end at the Mount Heng Sword Sect.

However large they grew, they were still bandits.

Even in Shanxi Province, dismissed as a backwater compared with the Central Plains, there were clear limits to what a band of mounted bandits could do.

And now mounted bandits are hanging around here? Right on the border between Gansu and Shaanxi?

Even the craziest bastards knew to check whether they had somewhere to lie down before stretching out their legs.

With the Kongtong Sect and the Black Dragon Demon Gate standing firm in Gansu, and Huashan and the Zhongnan Sect in Shaanxi, it made no sense for mounted bandits to swagger around here.

Something's going on. It has to be.

Jeok Cheongang must have been thinking the same thing.

He was frowning in thought, so I spoke to the man.

"Could you tell us more about them?"

"You mean the mounted bandits?"

"Yes. Their exact location and numbers, if you know them. If not, even a rumor would help."

The man had been blinking at us in silence, apparently picking up on the serious mood. Then he spoke.

"How much will you pay?"

"What?"

"Four silver nyang[3609]. That should be enough."

"…?"

What was this guy's deal all of a sudden?

Before I could answer, the man scratched his cheek awkwardly.

Or rather, he pretended to scratch it while tracing letters on his cheek.

The name of someone who wasn't here—but whom I could never forget.

Wol…hwa. Wait. Wolhwa?

I finally understood. My mouth fell open as the man—or rather, the Lower District Sect member—winked at me.

"You seem to be in a hurry. Why don't we talk on the way?"

"…!"

I'd almost forgotten.

The Lower District Sect's eyes and ears were everywhere.

I let out a quiet laugh at his shameless act, as though nothing had happened, then called out.

"Mujin."

Hyuk Mujin came hurrying over and answered at once.

"Yes, Captain. What do you need?"

"Give this gentleman four silver nyang[3610]—no, ten. And provide him with a horse."

I was turning away after delivering the order when Hyuk Mujin's muttering reached my ears.

"You could at least toss me a money pouch before saying that. And if you give him a horse, what am I supposed to ride?"

"…Ahem."

[3609] Nyang is a traditional unit used to reckon silver currency. Its value varied by period and place.

[3610] Nyang is a traditional unit used to reckon silver currency. Its value varied by period and place.

“See? You heard me, but you’re pretending you didn’t. I’m so fed up, I ought to just quit—”

“Ahem!”

“Uh, what is it? Did you have another order for me?”

Hyuk Mujin’s eyes went wide and innocent, as if he’d never said a thing. I gave him a cold look and tossed him the money pouch I’d just taken out of my Inventory.

“Oh my, you really shouldn’t have. You could just deduct whatever you spend from my monthly pay, and if it’s not enough, I could ask my family for more. Or beg.”

“I’m… sorry.”

“What do you have to apologize for, Captain? Even if the pillars of the Hyuk Family Textile Shop start shaking, that’s my problem. Right?”

“I get it. Just stop already. That should cover it, right?”

“What about the horse?”

“…!”

“If you give away the horse too, what am I supposed to ride? Are my dead ancestors going to carry me?”

Out of answers, I quietly turned my head toward a nearby Zhongnan Sect Disciple.

More specifically, toward the fine horse he was riding.

After that whirlwind of shakedowns, we got an outcome everyone could be satisfied with and set off toward Gansu Province again.

Of course, one Zhongnan Sect Disciple had to climb down from his comfortable saddle and travel on his own two sturdy legs. But that wasn’t my problem.

What mattered to me was the information the Lower District Sect member had.

“You should all stay around here for the time being. No—better not stay anywhere near here. Head toward Shaanxi. Those vicious mounted bandits could attack at any moment.”

The Lower District Sect member repeated his warnings to the civilians who remained, then mounted his horse. The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord left a dozen or so Disciples behind to lead them safely to Shaanxi if danger arose.

As soon as we set off, the Lower District Sect member’s first words were enough to leave everyone feeling as if they’d been smacked in the back of the head.

“To be honest, there are no mounted bandits.”

“…?”

“…?”

After a brief silence, Hyuk Mujin fingered the hilt of the sword at his waist.

“Ten silver nyang[3611]. Spit it back out while I’m still asking nicely.”

“Enough! Hold your tongue! Threatening an ally—how are you any different from those demonic, heterodox villains?”

Jeok Cheongang sternly rebuked Hyuk Mujin, then turned to the frightened Lower District Sect member and spoke with unusual kindness.

“Don’t mind that fool. Go on. Ten silver nyang[3612] is a small price to pay for your fare to the afterlife.”

“…”

God, he’s terrifying.

Just from listening to them, you’d think we were the Demonic Path Alliance, not the Murim Alliance.

The Lower District Sect member, who didn’t seem to have a shred of internal energy, had gone pale under the pressure. He stammered out an explanation.

“To be precise, there were mounted bandits, but they’ve disappeared.”

“Oh? They were there, and now they’re gone.”

Jeok Cheongang let out an appreciative sound and smiled kindly.

“That makes perfect sense, given the situation. You’ll soon disappear from this world, too.”

“Eek!”

“I’ll take back nine silver nyang[3613]. You can keep one for the trip.”

“Gah!”

“Enough, all of you!”

Only after I stepped in did tempers, boiling like a cauldron over a charcoal fire, finally settle down. The poor Lower District Sect member hurriedly explained the details.

“So the mounted bandits in Ningxia Province really have started acting strangely?”

“Y-Yes.”

“Then all those people gathered in the village…”

“I deliberately spread an exaggerated rumor. Trouble is about to break out in the western region, so we wanted to keep the civilians from getting caught up in it as much as possible.”

“Dark Heaven is far away, but the mounted bandits are close?”

“Exactly. Ningxia Province is pretty close, so the mounted bandits there are a greater threat than Dark Heaven beyond the desert. All the more so for someone like me, who hasn’t learned martial arts.”

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord, riding alongside us, frowned and cut in.

[3611] Nyang is a traditional unit used to reckon silver currency. Its value varied by period and place.
[3612] Nyang is a traditional unit used to reckon silver currency. Its value varied by period and place.
[3613] Nyang is a traditional unit used to reckon silver currency. Its value varied by period and place.

“Wait. Ningxia was once a lawless land ruled by mounted bandits, but weren’t they put down long ago?”

What was this now?

Everyone turned toward him. The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord cleared his throat and continued.

“To start from the beginning, Ningxia used to be a longstanding headache for us. Hundreds of mounted-bandit groups, large and small, were scattered across the region. Even the government troops couldn’t control them.”

“If even the government troops wouldn’t step in, what happened to the civilians living in Ningxia Province?”

“Would any fish remain in a rotten stream? Most of the civilians either left or joined them.”

“So it was no different from the steppe.”

“You could call it another steppe. Ningxia lies between Gansu and Shaanxi, but it was also the final destination for nomads who’d come down from the north and minority peoples driven out of the Central Plains. And the final touch was…”

“Fugitives. People who’d fled after committing unforgivable crimes.”

Namho cut in, picking up where the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord had left off.

“That’s why Ningxia had always been a prize the Murim sects of the Central Plains couldn’t quite bring themselves to claim. The land was small and barren, and the people left there were all sorts of vicious bastards. Even if a sect took losses securing the territory, dealing with it afterward would be another problem. Am I right?”

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord smacked his lips softly and nodded.

“I don’t like admitting it, but I can’t deny it. Before the Great Faction War, we could only watch one another. Afterward, we suffered such heavy losses that we had to focus entirely on recovering.”

I was starting to get the picture.

The Nine Sects and One Gang.

The Five Great Families.

They were symbols of the orthodox faction’s honor, but on the other side of the coin, they were a ruling class that had monopolized power and privilege for ages.

Even the Murong Family, which had recently caused a bloodbath, had started harboring other ambitions partly because it had been excluded as a foreign people during the fierce power struggles before the Great Faction War.

Though that’s still nothing but a traitor’s excuse.

I muttered to myself, then asked the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord, whose face had reddened as he admitted that shameful truth, the most important question.

"But you said the mounted bandits in Ningxia Province were put down long ago. Which sect led the effort?"

His answer took me by surprise.

"No one stepped forward."

"What?"

"No, they couldn't. Ningxia was already lawless, and not only our sect but every martial faction in the surrounding area had only just recovered from the aftermath of the Great Faction War."

"Then how on earth…"

"I don't know the details, but I've heard Ningxia Province became stable because of one person alone. That was nearly ten years ago."

"…!"

Not a major sect like the Nine Sects and One Gang, but a single individual?

Everyone's eyes widened at the answer they'd never expected.

No wonder. From what we'd heard, Ningxia Province had once been utterly lawless.

It was practically Murim's Wild West. For one person to put down hundreds of mounted-bandit groups…

"A master, then. At least someone who'd reached the Supreme Peak realm."

Jeok Cheongang, who'd been listening in silence, made the brief remark. It matched my own thoughts exactly.

A mysterious Supreme Peak master who swept away countless mounted bandits and pacified Ningxia Province a decade or so ago…

That wasn't the only suspicious thing.

The problem was that Ningxia Province's mounted bandits had started acting strangely after a decade of quiet—long enough for the mountains and rivers to change.

What the hell is going on?

I frowned and rode on in silence until a voice rang out.

"Gansu. It's Gansu!"

Four days had passed since we'd set out from the Jin Family of Taiyuan, driving our horses onward without rest.

Beyond the rugged mountain range that had hidden it from view, a vast plateau spread out before us.

Gansu.

No one could know whether the land before our eyes would become a place of death or a staging ground for another battlefield.

No one.

Chapter 1003

The realization that we'd finally entered Gansu Province brought a strange tension over the group.

It reminded us why we'd come here.

And of the danger lurking somewhere in this land.

How many of us will make it out alive?

I swallowed the thought as soon as it came.

The great battle looming ahead was unavoidable. The only questions were when and where. Countless people would die, and blood would spill across the land.

If not Gansu, then Qinghai. If not Qinghai, then Tibet and Sichuan.

Or it could break out on several fronts at once.

If the Hidden Shadow Pavilion's information was right, Dark Heaven's forces were approaching from beyond the desert. Their numbers rivaled those of the Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples—if they didn't surpass them.

An army that size wouldn't have to concentrate on a single target.

As many as the Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples, even more dangerous, and they have Moving Formations on top of it all… This isn't going well.

With the Great Nation joining us, our own forces were formidable. But there was no denying that the enemy had more options than we did.

And if even part of my vague suspicion was right, Dark Heaven wasn't just a group held together by dark arts and fanaticism.

It can't be helped. The Murim Alliance leadership knows what Dark Heaven is capable of. I'll have to trust them.

I'd never once held back. I'd survived one brush with death after another, defeated opponents stronger than myself, and fought to prevent even greater disasters.

But I couldn't solve everything alone.

This time was no different.

Just as they'd trusted me, I had to trust them.

One person could light a fuse. Dealing with the aftermath of the explosion took many.

My thoughts came to an end along with the mountain road.

Once we crossed the rugged range between Shaanxi and Gansu, a completely different landscape appeared, as if a layer of camouflage had been pulled away.

High ground, and the cold air that came with it.

Beyond lay a vast, open plain, with ocher-colored city walls rising at its center.

No one could mistake the city that appeared through the blowing sand. This was Tianshui, on the eastern edge of Gansu Province, bordering Shaanxi.

"…Well, that's one hell of an atmosphere."

Hyuk Mujin's uneasy remark probably spoke for all of us.

Bleak. Desolate.

That was my first impression of Gansu, and I suspected most of the others felt the same.

"Ugh, what's with this weather?"

Hyuk Mujin shivered in the chilly, dust-laden wind and pulled his collar shut. Plenty of people were breathing out white clouds.

There were exceptions, of course: those whose Supreme Peak martial arts had brought them to the realm of being Unaffected by Cold and Heat, and Peak masters who could at least use their internal energy to ward off the cold.

Or…

"Taishan likes it! Nice and cool!"

Right. One of them was from here in the first place.

Actually, make that two.

"It's been a while, hasn't it?"

At my question, Sama Pyo stopped looking around and answered.

"Hard to say. It feels strange. I've only been gone a little over a year, but… it feels like ten years."

A little over a year could be short or long, depending on who you asked. I understood how Sama Pyo felt.

From the rebirth of the Murim Alliance to today, we'd faced too many crises together as members of the Fire Dragon Pavilion to fit into so little time.

Yeah. Has it really been that long already…?

Watching Sama Pyo and Taishan return to the place where they'd been born and raised stirred something in me, too.

So much had happened. We could have talked for days without getting through it all.

And at every desperate turn, those two had been beside us.

No. They were us.

Comrades bound by the name of the Fire Dragon Pavilion. Men we could trust to watch our backs.

Maybe that was why my gaze lingered on them. Sama Pyo looked back at me, his eyes trembling as though he felt it too.

"Pavilion Master. May I say something?"

"Sure. Anything."

"I have no interest whatsoever in men."

"…What?"

“I trust you don’t either, Pavilion Master, but I thought it best to say so, just in case. I hope there’s no misunderstanding. I’ll be going now.”

“…!”

A moving moment, my ass.

Sama Pyo hurriedly rode ahead. I stared after him, then felt a pointed gaze from beside me and let out a long sigh.

“What? Got something to say?”

The Lower District Sect member who’d been keeping pace with me quickly shook his head.

“No, sir—well, actually, I do, but I’ll say it later.”

“…”

“…”

“Please say it now. Putting it off makes you look even more suspicious.”

“W-Would that be all right?”

“Oh, for the love of—”

He flinched as I scratched the back of my head, then studied my face and spoke.

“The mission I was assigned ends here.”

“Ends here…?”

“I was to evacuate the nearby residents and travelers, then tell Great Hero Jin what’s happened recently. Fortunately, we’ve entered Gansu without incident, so I believe it’s time for me to turn back.”

“Where to?”

“Our sect and the Beggars’ Sect have members watching the western region in case anything happens. I intend to report this to the Branch Leader as quickly as possible.”

The man belonged to the Lower District Sect’s Shaanxi branch, and I knew its Branch Leader well.

Wolhwa, proprietor of Honghwaru in Shanxi Province—and the first martial artist I’d met in this world.

“Give Wolhwa my regards. The Branch Leader, I mean. Tell her I appreciate her looking out for us.”

“The Branch Leader is looking forward to seeing you again, too. She originally planned to come in person while you were passing through Shaanxi, but circumstances…”

He trailed off, reached into his robe, and held something out.

“What’s this?”

“The Branch Leader ordered me to give it directly to you. She told me again and again—make sure, absolutely, don’t you dare forget!”

He offered me a tightly sealed bamboo tube, then gave me a suggestive smile and a thumbs-up.

"Personally, I have a great deal of respect for you."

"…All of a sudden?"

"Doesn't seem all that sudden to me."

I followed his darting eyes and saw Ju Hwaran staring our way. More precisely, she was staring at the bamboo tube he'd extended toward me, her expression subdued.

But only for a moment. As soon as our eyes met, she turned away and began talking to the people beside her as naturally as could be.

It happened so quickly that I wondered if I'd imagined it.

What was that about?

I blinked, then took the tube. With his final task complete, the Lower District Sect member began to slow his horse.

"I'll be going, then. I wish you good fortune in battle."

He clasped his hands in farewell and turned his horse. Just then, something I'd left unresolved flashed through my mind.

"Oh, wait. May I ask one last favor?"

"What would that be?"

"I want to know everything that happens in Qinghai and Gansu. Even the smallest sign. Please get word to us as quickly as you can."

"You needn't worry about that. The Murim Alliance's intelligence network has been operating for some time. Information should already be reaching every nearby sect under emergency orders."

I'd asked out of caution, but I wasn't too worried about it. The Hidden Shadow Pavilion had learned what was happening beyond the desert—a place called the Land of Ruin. That alone showed how broad and thorough our intelligence network was.

There was still one thing on my mind.

"Does that network include Ningxia Province?"

"You're worried about those mounted bandits?"

"From what I've heard, I have reason to be."

Of course I was.

A little over ten years ago, peace had suddenly come to a lawless land that could give the American Wild West a run for its money. At the center of it all was an unidentified Supreme Peak master.

If there was even a chance he was another hidden blade Dark Heaven had planted somewhere in the world, I had to consider turning my horse around right now.

Stopping the enemy coming at us head-on will be hard enough. If we end up fighting on two fronts, it'll be a disaster.

But the Lower District Sect member smiled.

"It seems I didn't explain it well enough. I've worried you for nothing, Great Hero Jin."

"What do you mean?"

"Though it's a frontier region, it's still part of the world. Our sect and several other intelligence groups have been keeping an eye on Ningxia Province for a long time. We watched even more closely after the trouble there ended at the hands of that unidentified master."

"Ah."

I'd overlooked something. Information was money, and that wasn't true only in the modern world. If anything, useful information was even more valuable here.

And despite being spoken of in the same breath as the Beggars' Sect, the Lower District Sect was far less of a martial sect. They were information merchants through and through.

There was no way they'd ignored the major incident in Ningxia Province.

Sure enough, his next words were matter-of-fact enough to make my worries seem misplaced.

"The mounted-bandit gangs in Ningxia Province disbanded long ago. Their most notorious leaders were all killed, and the rest didn't dare resist. We carefully reexamined everything that happened at the time and found nothing particularly suspicious."

"Then what about the mounted bandits said to have appeared nearby?"

"Horse caravans. Or rather, horse caravans made up of people who used to be mounted bandits."

Horse caravans.

They roamed the land with their horses and the stars for company. Merchants and guides alike, they were fixtures of the regions they traveled.

"So the disbanded mounted bandits became horse caravans."

He nodded.

"They couldn't remain mounted bandits. Some became horse caravans; others formed merchant companies or Escort Bureaus. They changed with the times."

"Then what about the Supreme Peak master who pacified the mounted bandits?"

"That's the one question we haven't answered. We're told he's remained in Ningxia Province ever since, but no one knows who he is. All we know is that he isn't a fiend. Even our best informants have thrown up their hands."

If he wasn't a fiend, perhaps he was an eccentric recluse from some remote mountain valley.

It wasn’t certain, but his answer eased my mind for now.

The Lower District Sect member set off, and when we reached Tianshui, we came face-to-face with someone we’d never expected to see.

Chapter 1004

Everything in the world has its own atmosphere.

A feeling that belongs not only to a person, but to a place or an object, too.

Ordinary civilians have a hard time reading it clearly. Martial artists are different. Life-or-death battles and grueling training have honed their five senses to their limits.

Jeok Cheongang, for instance, was watching me with a grave, searching gaze.

Why?

Before I could ask, the question vanished.

As we drew closer to the ocher-colored walls rising from the middle of the vast plain, I began to feel it too.

"Hmm."

A low murmur came from nearby.

I turned and met the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord's gaze. He had been staring at me.

"You feel it too?"

"Yes."

I nodded, then watched the walls draw closer with every pounding hoofbeat.

"It's quiet. Too quiet."

Anything in excess had poison hidden in it.

That was the feeling coming from the small city, now barely a hundred jang[3614] away.

The Great Nation's flag flew above the walls, as it did everywhere, and below it stood a firmly shut iron gate.

But even setting aside the unusual desolation, something essential was missing.

People.

Civilians didn't spend their whole lives inside city walls. Some worked the fields outside; others traveled the roads.

Yet the sun hadn't set, and there were few signs of anyone.

No—not a single person was in sight.

No people meant no noise, making the place feel all the more eerie.

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord had noticed it too. His voice grew heavier.

"Do you think it could be a trap?"

I fell silent for a moment.

According to the Lower District Sect member Wolhwa had sent, the Murim Alliance already had a tight surveillance network throughout the western region.

[3614] A jang is a traditional Korean length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Could an entire city—not some small village—have been occupied without them knowing?

Besides…

It's eerie, but that's all.

I could see no signs of battle, and the wind carried not a trace of blood.

How much flesh and bone had I cut through by now? I knew the thick, cloying stench of blood wouldn't vanish in a day or two. Not when taking a city would have spilled so much of it.

It's not a trap.

Just as I reached that conclusion, Sama Pyo urged his horse up beside us. One calm remark turned my guess into certainty.

"There's no harm in continuing on as we are. Nothing's going to happen anyway."

His voice was steady, his gaze just as calm.

A thought struck me.

"Could it be?"

"That's right. It looks like they've prepared quite an extravagant welcome."

At that moment—

Rumble.

Several dozen jang[3615] ahead, the firmly shut iron gate began to slowly open.

As the enormous mass of iron, weighing over a thousand geun[3616], parted, a cold-faced middle-aged man appeared in the gap.

He was slender but powerfully built. Though he was entering old age, his neatly combed, jet-black hair held not a single gray strand.

He reminded me of a black panther, and an epithet and name I'd only heard spoken flashed through my mind.

The Black Night King, Sima Gong.

Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate, which stood alongside the Yangtze River Channel League and the Green Forest Alliance as a great power of the unorthodox faction. Together with the Kongtong Sect, it divided Gansu Province between them.

But as I recognized the father, I noticed something else.

For some reason, the closer he came, the more his son's eyes darkened.

"This junior martial artist, Sima Gong, pays his respects to you, Senior."

[3615] A jang is a traditional Korean length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[3616] A Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb); a thousand geun is about 600 kg (1,320 lb).

Sima Gong's greeting to Jeok Cheongang was more than polite. It was almost excessive, especially given his standing in Murim and his own considerable age.

Jeok Cheongang, of course, didn't care in the slightest.

"Spare me the 'junior martial artist' nonsense."

He snorted so hard I worried a booger might fly out, then looked at Sima Gong.

"Are you that desperate to pretend you're young, or do you wish you were young again?"

Sima Gong lowered his clasped hands and straightened.

"That wasn't my intention, but embarrassing as it is to admit, I suppose both."

"Your silver tongue hasn't changed."

"Nor have you, Senior. Though your appearance has changed quite a bit."

"The shell may change, but what's inside stays the same. Speaking of shells, yours has grown rather grand."

Jeok Cheongang paused to survey the area.

The streets were empty of civilians—not even a rat was in sight—and around a thousand armed men filled the space by the city gate.

Their black martial uniforms left no doubt that they belonged to the Black Dragon Demon Gate.

"You brought plenty with you. Swarming around like a pack of dogs. Quite a sight."

Displeasure filled Jeok Cheongang's eyes and voice.

For the three hundred years since its founding, the Fire Gate Clan had walked the line between the orthodox and unorthodox factions. If pressed, though, it leaned a little closer to the orthodox side.

The Black Night King Sima Gong and the Black Dragon Demon Gate he led, on the other hand, were heirs to the tradition of demonic, heterodox arts.

And judging from the things I'd heard about Sima Gong in the time we'd spent together, Jeok Cheongang's opinion of him had been poor ever since the Great Faction War.

"Things have been looking rather strange lately, so it came to this."

"So you emptied your sect and came pouring over here because things are unsettled? Stirring up innocent civilians while you're at it."

"You seem to have misunderstood. Even with this many troops away, our sect's defenses remain secure. The civilians left of their own accord. If they were frightened because of us, then there's nothing we can do about that… but it isn't necessarily a bad thing, is it?"

"What?"

Jeok Cheongang narrowed his eyes. Sima Gong smiled gently, an expression at odds with his cold face.

"I have no intention of being disrespectful to you, Senior. I only meant that, amid these signs, the civilians would sense a greater danger. That, too, could be a way to save their lives."

"…!"

I had to admit one thing.

This guy can talk.

He could dress up word games and sophistry to sound convincing, then soothe the person listening with just the right manner and smile.

On top of that, he had martial arts that could rival the two Alliance Leaders of the Yangtze and the Green Forest. That was probably the biggest reason the Black Dragon Demon Gate was what it was today.

Like father, like son? They're definitely alike in that respect. Sama Pyo was just like that when I first met him.

That was then, though.

At our first meeting, Sama Pyo had spoken and acted like a slippery eel. The longer we spent together, the more I realized he wasn't actually much of a talker.

Was "keep your outside and inside different" something his father taught him?

I glanced between father and son—and met Sima Gong's eyes.

"Oh, so that's the young man. The rare genius you took in as a Disciple, Senior."

He was speaking to Jeok Cheongang, but the interest gleaming in his eyes was directed at me.

It was already too late to pretend I hadn't noticed his gaze and look away. I glanced at Jeok Cheongang, who was still frowning at Sima Gong. He nodded.

"I'm Jin Taekyung, of the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

"I know. How could I not? There's hardly anyone in Gansu who hasn't heard of your fame."

It was the same tired pleasantry people exchanged whenever they met in Murim. But he'd said it with a smile, so I had to answer in kind.

After all, the man before me was an ally—and Sama Pyo's father.

"You're too kind. I've heard a great deal about you too, Great Hero Sima."

I clasped my hands politely. Sima Gong smiled and turned to Jeok Cheongang.

"Well, this is unexpected. I thought you'd never had a very good opinion of me, Senior."

"Never had a good opinion of you? Me?"

"Was I mistaken?"

"Of course you were."

Well, even Jeok Cheongang couldn't spit in the face of a smiling man.

I gave Sima Gong a warm smile, as if to say, See?

Then Jeok Cheongang went on.

“It’s not that I have a poor opinion of you. I just don’t like you.”

“…”

“So I’ve talked behind your back a little.”

“…”

“Jin Taekyung there is lying through his teeth. ‘Heard a great deal about you,‘ my ass. What kind of bullshit is—”

Whoosh. Thwack!

“Gyaaaah!”

The faint sound of something cutting through the air was followed by a sudden scream that swallowed Jeok Cheongang’s voice.

Clang! Clang! Clang!

At the same time, dazzling flashes of swordlight sprang up in every direction, and shouts rang out.

“Prepare for battle!”

“The Black Dragon Demon Gate, prepare for an enemy attack!”

“By order of the Sect Leader! Zhongnan Disciples, form the Moon-Shattering Sword Formation at once! …What are you doing?”

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord had been ordering his Disciples to form a sword formation, but his voice trailed off in bafflement. Only then did everyone realize something was strange. Following the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord’s gaze, they all looked toward one person.

A homely-looking guy who’d fallen from his saddle with a thunderous scream.

No, Hyuk Mujin.

“Ugh, what the hell was that all of a—”

He groaned and staggered to his feet, then froze like a statue.

Countless eyes were fixed on him like spotlights. He blinked silently until he finally spotted me. The corners of his eyes twitched.

“Captain. That was you, wasn’t it?”

Everyone’s gaze shifted to me.

Sima Gong’s eyes in particular were fixed on me. I did my best to keep my expression calm as I opened my mouth.

“Don’t misunderstand. I don’t really know him.”

Sima Gong turned to Hyuk Mujin.

“Who are you? You don’t seem to be a Zhongnan Sect Disciple.”

“I’m Hyuk Mujin, of the Jin Family of Taiyuan,” he answered indignantly.

“So he says,” Sima Gong said.

Of all the times to be oblivious, you idiot.

I should’ve knocked him out in one shot. Since when did he get so sturdy?

Cursing myself for failing to land the Finger Qi properly, I said, “We’ve met a few times. I didn’t say I’d never met him.”

“So you do know him.”

“Hmm. I suppose I do.”

“Then what do you think caused that young man to suddenly scream and fall over?”

In the suffocating silence, I considered my options and gave the best answer I could.

“He’s always been a bit sick. He has a condition.”

Hyuk Mujin’s mouth fell open. Perhaps the pain had stimulated his salivary glands, because a translucent string of drool ran down his chin.

“See? He comes and goes a few times a day. This sort of thing happens as regularly as his three meals—”

“Wow, you’re really going to do this? You’re seriously going to do this? You want to take it all the way?”

At that critical moment, I sent a discreet Sound Transmission over Hyuk Mujin’s shoulder.

More precisely, to the quick-witted Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent behind him, whose eyes were darting in alarm.

Now!

Fortunately, Namho was nothing like Hyuk Mujin.

With speed and agility that belied his age, he stealthily dropped the strip of jerky in his hand onto the top of Hyuk Mujin’s head.

That tempting piece of jerky was enough to rouse the appetite of someone who’d gone a whole shichen[3617] without food.

“Nooo! Jerky!”

Whack!

A palm as big as a pot lid slammed down on Hyuk Mujin’s head. He collapsed, and a deathly silence followed.

It lasted until I, having barely dealt with the emergency, spoke up.

“Now, don’t mind him. Let’s all go inside.”

“…”

“…”

Why are they all looking at me like I’m a madman?

[3617] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

Chapter 1005

Four days.

You couldn't exactly call that a long time.

But if you'd spent all four days riding hard, barely stopping to rest and catching snatches of sleep in the saddle, that was another matter.

Rest while you can. Who knows when we'll have another chance?

Jin Taekyung had left them with those words, then gone off to a meeting with the leadership. The Fire Dragon Pavilion members he'd left behind had followed their Pavilion Master's orders to the letter.

Now they'd unpacked their few belongings, bathed in warm water, and settled before a sumptuous feast that had somehow already been laid out.

Naturally, Jeok Cheongang and Sama Pyo were the exceptions.

Jeok Cheongang was the Fire King, a giant of his generation. His place at the meeting needed no explanation. And as Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate, Sama Pyo belonged among the leadership too.

"Whew. I finally feel alive again."

Ju Hwaran spoke for every member of the Fire Dragon Pavilion.

Physical exhaustion was bad enough, but mental fatigue weighed on both body and mind far more heavily.

What could they do?

For a martial artist, crossing the line between life and death was a lifelong fate. The grief and pain brought on by war were the lot of those living through troubled times.

It had always been that way, and it would stay that way.

At least everyone in the Fire Dragon Pavilion understood their circumstances—and had accepted them.

"Our Pavilion Master was right. We have to rest as much as we can while there's time, so we're ready for what comes next. With that in mind, let's eat."

At Song Ilseom's invitation, Hyuk Mujin looked up, his cheeks already bulging with food.

"Wha'?"

"…"

"Wha' did you jus' say?"

"…"

"Sounded like you said somethin'."

Song Ilseom stared at him in silence, then answered.

"Nothing. Don't worry about it. Go ahead and eat. The more pain you're in, the hungrier you get."

“Ah, okay.”

Perhaps the bump on the crown of his head was bothering him. Now that he’d paused, Hyuk Mujin took the opportunity to rub it, then buried his face in his plate again.

A moment later, he looked up and stared at Song Ilseom.

“Wait. Why’re you talkin’ down to me? I don’t like that.”

“I’ve been doing it this whole time.”

“That’s why I don’t like it. I’ve told you a bunch of times not to.”

“It’s simple. I’m older than you.”

Gulp.

Hyuk Mujin swallowed what was in his mouth and frowned.

“What a ridiculous guy. You’re only a year or two older than me.”

“Does a year or two not count as an age difference?”

“Well… I guess it does.”

“And you know perfectly well that I have more experience as a martial artist.”

“That too… I guess.”

“I’m your senior, and I’m older. So what’s the problem?”

The longer the conversation went on, the worse things got for Hyuk Mujin.

His eyes darted about as he searched for a counterargument. Then an idea came to him.

“You know how old our Captain is, right?”

“More or less.”

“He’s way younger than me.”

“So?”

“Hey, what do you mean, ‘So?‘ You speak at least somewhat politely to the Captain. Why do you get to talk down to me—”

“So?”

“…Huh?”

“So. What are you going to do about it?”

“…”

There was nothing he could say to that.

As Hyuk Mujin blinked at Song Ilseom’s absurdly confident expression, anger rose from deep in his chest.

Now that he thought about it, how unfair was this?

He could put up with Jin Taekyung giving him a hard time whenever he got the chance. That much he could gladly accept as his Captain’s loyal right hand and self-proclaimed heart.

But now he was getting the same treatment from Song Ilseom—a mere wandering martial artist who'd joined them along the way. Sure, Song Ilseom was famous as hell among wanderers, and, as it turned out, he came from an impressive martial family. But still!

I mean, come on! By rank, I'm the Vice Pavilion Master of the Fire Dragon Pavilion! And the Jin Family of Taiyuan is one of the Five Great Families now!

Fire lit in Hyuk Mujin's eyes as he glared at Song Ilseom. The roasted chicken leg he'd been holding trembled like a sword resonating with its wielder.

"Planning to throw that thing you're holding?"

"Why? Think I can't?"

At Hyuk Mujin's chilly reply, Song Ilseom nodded without hesitation.

"Of course you can't."

"That's right. You know me well."

"But you'll have to deal with what happens afterward… Wait, what did you say?"

"If you throw away food, heaven will punish you. Besides, my parents always told me to get along with the people around me."

"…"

"What? Got something to say? Then say it quickly. I'm hungry, and I don't want this precious food to get cold."

Was that confidence? Cowardice?

Or both?

What is with this guy?

How could anyone be so brazen about being a coward?

Song Ilseom watched Hyuk Mujin with a thoroughly unimpressed look, then spoke.

"…Never mind. You had good parents."

"They're simple, good-hearted people. Thanks for the compliment."

Hyuk Mujin replied as if he'd been waiting for those words, then set to work sweeping the food in front of him into his mouth with renewed vigor. Song Ilseom sighed inwardly.

Every last one of them is out of their minds.

They'd been told to rest and take it easy, but who would look at them and think they were about to go into battle?

A pack of beggars come to bankrupt an inn, maybe.

Or do they not feel fear at all?

Song Ilseom had spent years among wandering martial artists, where crazies were everywhere. But the people he'd been with for the past year or so were strange from top to bottom.

For example…

True madness.

They were on another level from any madman he'd met before.

And Hyuk Mujin, who was already plenty crazy himself, was merely average by Fire Dragon Pavilion standards.

First, there was Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King.

"…"

No words were needed. Just thinking about him made Song Ilseom's breath catch.

Watching Jeok Cheongang up close had driven one point home once again: the law of the strong devouring the weak still ruled this world.

Otherwise, he'd have been dead several times over by now.

Why did Song Ilseom think that?

Simple.

Jeok Cheongang beat the living daylights out of anyone he didn't like. Anyone at all. He was fair about it, at least.

Their sect, their principles, their age, their sex—it made no difference.

If they belonged to the orthodox faction, he'd cut them to the heart with a tongue sharper than a famous sword. If they were from the unorthodox faction or were dark-path figures, he'd look for an opening to throw a punch. As for fiends, he'd once said:

> "I may as well tell you now: for many years, this old man's wish has been to reform every fiend beneath heaven and make them good."

Jin Taekyung had asked on everyone's behalf if he'd gone senile. Jeok Cheongang had beaten his own Disciple senseless, then added, as brazen as ever:

> "Of course, the only good fiend is a dead fiend."

That was the kind of person Jeok Cheongang was.

Why else would his one and only Disciple say this about his own Master?

> "I thought about it seriously, and helping the orthodox faction during the Great Faction War was the best move that old man ever made. Now he gets to be called a king and wreak havoc wherever he wants, all perfectly legally. Am I right, everyone?"

Jin Taekyung probably didn't know.

Everyone had agreed with him, but the moment he turned away, they'd exchanged looks that all meant roughly the same thing.

> Look who's talking.
> How does he have the nerve to say that?
> Does our Captain even know what the word "conscience" means?
> Sorry, Young Master Jin. This is a bit much, even for you…
> Taishan hungry.

No one dared say it outright, but everyone knew the only person crazier than Jeok Cheongang was Jin Taekyung.

That guy's the real lunatic, in more ways than one.

His martial arts were insane, and so was his temper.

Sometimes, for reasons known only to him, he'd act like a perfectly normal person. But when something rubbed him the wrong way, he could outdo even his Master, Jeok Cheongang.

In that sense, he's even worse.

If Song Ilseom had to fight either Jeok Cheongang or Jin Taekyung, he'd choose the former without hesitation.

Because he thought Jeok Cheongang's martial arts were no match for his Disciple's anymore?

Wrong.

Even if Jeok Cheongang cursed him with every filthy word he knew until Song Ilseom feared qi deviation, even if his Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist crushed Song Ilseom's Eight Extraordinary Meridians[3618], Jeok Cheongang would still be preferable.

Because he was the Fire King.

A giant known throughout the world, an old monster who had lived through ages beyond counting.

But Jin Taekyung?

…I don't even want to think about it.

Just thinking about him made Song Ilseom's stomach churn.

His martial prowess, now so far beyond Song Ilseom's reach, was one thing. But his tongue, widely held to have surpassed even his Master's, was the stuff of nightmares.

The one small comfort was that his terrifying tongue only ever seemed to show its full power against enemies.

Even aside from that, Song Ilseom was among those who got the least grief from Jin Taekyung, along with Sama Pyo and Ju Hwaran.

[3618] In traditional Chinese medicine, the Eight Extraordinary Meridians are channels distinct from the twelve principal meridians.

Even when he did something worth getting chewed out for, Jin Taekyung would just toss out a short line and turn away.

> “So boring.”

Song Ilseom didn’t know exactly what the expression meant, but he could guess it wasn’t a compliment.

He said I was “so boring.” He called Sama Pyo “ten times more boring.” But he didn’t say anything to Young Lady Ju.

What else could that mean? It was obvious.

Song Ilseom had once spent a long time seriously puzzling over the exact meaning of the expression, but at some point he’d stopped caring.

Had he gotten used to it?

Maybe. Or maybe…

“Hmm.”

With that unconscious murmur, Song Ilseom surfaced from his thoughts.

Only then did he notice what was happening around him—and realize that something was terribly wrong.

“What on earth… is going on?”

It wasn’t a question directed at anyone in particular. It was closer to an exclamation of shock.

Song Ilseom froze, eyes wide. Ju Hwaran and Hyuk Mujin, both wearing serious expressions, answered in turn.

“We don’t know either. How did this happen?”

“Incredibuh! Makes no shensh!”

Ju Hwaran’s answer was full of worry. Hyuk Mujin’s was full of food.

Pth, pth!

Ordinarily, Song Ilseom would have dodged the spray of food with a quick movement. This time, he couldn’t.

Splut!

Something unpleasant touched his skin.

Hyuk Mujin froze, worried about what he’d done. But despite his fears, Song Ilseom didn’t move.

He could only stare at one person, as stunned as if he’d come face-to-face with a living dragon.

Taishan sat before a mouthwatering feast, his shoulders drooping, without moving a muscle.

“Am I seeing things?”

The disbelieving words had barely left someone’s lips when another voice answered.

“You’re seeing it right. But I’d like you to keep it down for now.”

The voice was low and subdued.

Namho, who’d sat motionless and lost in thought all this time, twitched his nose.

As if trying to catch a scent he remembered from a day not so long ago.

Chapter 1006

Rustle.

A thick animal hide unfurled across the large table. Its surface, tanned by human hands, was covered edge to edge with drawings and writing that detailed the terrain.

“As you can see, this map was made by our sect. We’ve spent many years documenting every feature of Gansu in detail, revising each change as it occurred, until it was complete.”

Sima Gong’s voice was calm, but every leader gathered around the table understood what the map meant.

A province might sound like a mere piece of the world, but even the smallest was comparable in size to a country. And it wasn’t as if they had drones or satellites. Making a map like this took enormous wealth and manpower.

The Black Dragon Demon Gate’s ability to produce one so vast and detailed showed how much control it held across Gansu. It also showed the reach of Sima Gong’s intelligence network.

“You must’ve put a lot of work into this. So what, are you trying to brag that you’ve got this whole area locked down?”

Jeok Cheongang had no use for subtlety. A faint smile appeared on Sima Gong’s lips.

“Of course not. The Kongtong Sect is one of the pillars of the Central Plains. How could we presume to claim Gansu for ourselves?”

His words were humble, but everyone knew where Sima Gong and the Black Dragon Demon Gate stood in Gansu Province.

And besides…

“This is an important meeting, but that very pillar is missing.”

It was true. The Kongtong Sect wasn’t here.

Even after I’d pointed that out, Sima Gong’s smile didn’t waver.

“No need to worry. The pillar is elsewhere, preparing to hold back the downpour that’s about to come.”

“So the Kongtong Sect has already been sent to the front lines.”

Sima Gong nodded at the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord, who’d cut in.

“Just as the Sect Leader guessed. We’ve established three lines of defense stretching across Dunhuang, the Great Snow Mountain, and the Qilian Mountains in Gansu Province.”

“Three lines? Aren’t your forces spread too thin?”

The others in the room nodded at the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord’s concern.

If Dark Heaven's vast army marched into Gansu, a single great battle could decide everything. But Sima Gong's expression remained unchanged.

"They may not rival Kunlun, but the Great Snow Mountain and the Qilian Mountains are both among the ten most treacherous mountain ranges under heaven. And our enemies have that bizarre dark art they call the Moving Formation. We judged it too dangerous to concentrate all our forces in Dunhuang."

"I agree with you, Sect Leader Sima. The question is whether you have enough forces to hold three fronts."

Being outnumbered was our greatest obstacle.

The enemy had an army of a hundred thousand. Even if they split their forces to attack three provinces at once, that still left more than thirty thousand pouring into each one like a pack of dogs.

To face that many, we need to gather in one place. And we'll only stand a chance if we make the most of the terrain.

That was how we'd fought in Shanxi Province not long ago. Luck and determination together had won us the day.

Anyone could see the problem, whether they knew military strategy or not. And Sima Gong was no village bumpkin. He was the Black Night King, the man who'd built the Black Dragon Demon Gate into a major power. Could he really have missed something so obvious?

No way.

He met everyone's gaze without a trace of unease. I could sense the confidence behind his calm.

"You already have enough forces in Gansu."

Sima Gong's smile deepened.

"About a month ago, I put all of Gansu Murim on alert. Our sect, the Kongtong Sect, and every other martial faction in the area had already been keeping watch for some time, so we were able to gather our forces quickly."

Which means…

"Thirty thousand. That's how many we've assembled so far. We've mobilized everything Gansu Murim has."

"…!"

"…!"

The leaders' eyes widened. Mine did too.

Thirty thousand?

It was an enormous force. Shanxi Province had fielded only fifteen thousand to hold Eight Spring Gorge against the forces of the Great Steppe.

And Sima Gong had specified Gansu Murim. All thirty thousand were martial artists. There was no comparing that to Shanxi's army, more than half of which had been government soldiers.

Granted, Shanxi Murim had already suffered grievous losses in the conflict with the Mount Heng Sword Sect and the Head Elder's betrayal. Even taking that into account, thirty thousand was almost beyond imagining.

"W-where did you find that many people?"

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord had voiced what everyone must have been wondering. Jeok Cheongang, who'd been watching with a frown, spoke before Sima Gong could answer.

"Unorthodox factions have always had numbers, if nothing else. Isn't that right?"

Sima Gong smiled and nodded.

"I won't deny it."

"Even so, thirty thousand would be nearly impossible for the Nine Sects and One Gang of the Central Plains."

"That's also true. Would the Great Nation have stood idly by if this many ruffians, liable to turn the swords at their waists against the state at any moment, had gathered?"

The phrase the government and Murim shall not interfere in one another's affairs had been rendered nearly meaningless since the Son of Heaven declared Dark Heaven traitors. But the principle had arisen for a reason.

It was an unspoken rule that had arisen naturally alongside Murim itself.

A stone that stuck out was bound to get hammered down. The countless martial factions scattered across the land had long checked one another and made agreements to avoid conflict. In turn, the Great Nation tolerated them so long as they posed no threat to its foundations.

People even said that dynasties changed, but Murim remained.

Now Gansu Murim had crossed that unspoken line. They'd gathered thirty thousand martial artists in the frontier, not even the Central Plains. That was an army they couldn't have raised even if they'd turned every martial faction in Gansu Province upside down and shaken them out.

Which means…

Only one possibility remained. The majority had no affiliation with any particular sect. They were the sort of people who followed only their own needs and interests.

"You even scraped together the dark-path figures. You must've been desperate."

The dark path.

Those people had coexisted uneasily with Murim for ages. Several faces darkened at the mention of them, and the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord's eyes grew especially grave.

“Sect Leader Sima. Is what Great Hero Jeok said true?”

Sima Gong answered calmly.

“Some of them are dark-path figures. Is that a problem?”

“Well…”

“I won’t pretend otherwise. I’m an unorthodox martial artist. The Yangtze River Channel League and the Green Forest Alliance have their roots in the dark path. Ah, and so does that son of mine over there.”

Sama Pyo, silent until now, looked shaken at being singled out by his father. But Sima Gong spoke again, drawing everyone’s attention back.

“And all the people I just mentioned have one thing in common. Do you know what it is?”

They did. Everyone in the room knew.

Yet they remained silent, their expressions heavy.

All but one.

“They fought for the Murim Alliance, and they’re fighting for it now.”

Jeok Cheongang.

Sima Gong’s reflection appeared in his reddish, fever-bright eyes, befitting the title of Fire King.

“Unorthodox, dark-path figures, or nobodies who crawled in from God knows where—I don’t give a damn. If the weapons in their hands are pointed at Dark Heaven, that’s all that matters.”

Sima Gong nodded, his face set.

“As it was in the past, so it will be this time.”

“I’m not doubting you. But dark-path figures who’ve drifted all the way out to this frontier must be a rotten lot. If something goes wrong…”

“I’ll stake my head on it.”

Jeok Cheongang stared at him in silence. Then he turned and swept his gaze around the room.

“What do you all think?”

Respected elders of Gansu Murim had come to greet us alongside Sima Gong, but Jeok Cheongang wasn’t asking them. His question was for the senior members of the Zhongnan Sect who’d traveled with us.

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord stood at their center, hesitating. His Senior Brothers, the Roaring Fury Swordsman and the Taeeul Merciless Sword, answered one after the other.

“Someone once said it doesn’t matter whether a cat is white or black, so long as it catches mice.”

“The Sima Gong I know is a comrade-in-arms and a hero, someone who weathered the war alongside us, before he is an unorthodox martial artist. That a man like him should have to stake his life on this—isn’t that a crying shame?”

I watched the two old Daoists pour out their answers as smoothly as if they’d been waiting for their turn. Then Jeok Cheongang looked my way.

“So, are you done stuffing your face with honey?”

He meant I’d been sitting there with my mouth full, acting like I couldn’t speak. I smacked my lips and answered.

“Yeah. It was sweet.”

“You’ve held that precious honey in your mouth long enough. You must have something to say by now.”

“Is this something I get to decide?”

“Not a chance. Who do you think you are?”

I gave a short laugh and looked around.

Most of the faces were unfamiliar; I knew neither their names nor their titles. There were senior members of the Black Dragon Demon Gate and leaders of Gansu Murim, each of them heading a martial faction large or small.

Sima Gong was at their center.

“Can I ask a few questions?”

“Anything.”

“I doubt you made all these decisions alone. Am I right?”

“Of course. The Sect Leaders here agreed, as did the Kongtong Sect.”

“Then if Dark Heaven isn’t targeting Gansu…”

“We’ll leave some forces behind and head straight for Qinghai. But that won’t happen.”

“Why not?”

“The signs are troubling. The enemy beyond the desert used to be the Demonic Cult; now it’s Dark Heaven. Either way, they’ve always been our greatest concern, even after the Great Faction War.”

“What signs?”

“It’s too early to say. I’ve already selected people I can trust and sent them to scout beyond the desert. We’ll know for certain when they return. So…”

Sima Gong’s gaze moved from me to Jeok Cheongang.

“Please leave Gansu’s defenses to us and go to Qinghai, Senior. Even with reinforcements from Huashan and the others, Qinghai is the place where every moment counts.”

“Qinghai… Qinghai.”

Jeok Cheongang murmured the name, almost groaning.

That was when a frantic voice rang out through the gap between the tightly shut doors.

“S-Sect Leader!”

Chapter 1007

For anyone born and raised in Gansu Province, the pale sandstorms that swept through year-round were nothing unusual.

Their ancestors had recorded the loess-colored plateau's existence as far back as the days when the river flowing through the region came to be called the Yellow River.

No one knew exactly when the plateau had formed or why, but it was still there. Whenever a strong wind blew in, a cloud would rise like a waterspout and sweep across the area before vanishing, scattering fine loess like stars.

That was probably why the Black Dragon Demon Gate martial artists standing watch atop the city wall felt nothing in particular as they watched a cloud of dust approach from the far north.

"Damn it. Here we go again."

One of the martial artists frowned. The middle-aged squad leader pulled a scrap of cloth from inside his clothes with a practiced motion.

"Shut your mouth and put on your mask. Don't stand there trying to tough it out like last time, then complain for days afterward."

"I really couldn't help it that time. How are you supposed to dodge it when it hits all at once? You can't even breathe."

"Suit yourself. If you'd rather eat a handful of sand than your next meal."

The others were chuckling when someone watching the cloud of dust spoke up.

"Still, this one's little. Almost cute. Looks like it'll die down before it reaches us. The scouts way out front are going to get covered in it, though."

"Oh, you're right. Captain, why'd you put on your mask?"

They'd been through this often enough to know what they were looking at. This wasn't a sandstorm towering more than ten jang[3619] high. There was no need to make a fuss over a little cloud of dust.

Without bothering to take another look, the martial artists teased the Captain for putting on his mask so early.

"Look at you, Captain. You've lost your touch."

"The Blood-Death Sword will be weeping. Heh."

"Come on, you can tell how big it is at a glance. Why the rush? I used to be a mounted bandit, and I know thirty riders galloping side by side kick up a cloud about that size. It's nothing."

The Captain's already fearsome face twisted into something monstrous.

"What?"

[3619] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten cheok, approximately 3.03 meters (9.94 ft).

The laughter slowly died. His subordinates remembered how notorious the Captain had once been in the area and swallowed hard.

"W-we didn't mean it like that, Captain…"

But his next words left them staring at him in confusion.

"No, not that."

"Pardon?"

"The last thing he said. What was it?"

Everyone turned toward the former mounted bandit. He blinked.

"Me?"

"Yes. Say that again."

"Uh, you can tell how big it is at a glance, so why the rush—"

"Not that, you bastard! The part after it!"

"Th-that a cloud of dust that size means about thirty riders…"

"And how many scouts left half a shichen[3620] ago?"

"Exactly thirty. Was that when they got their horses earlier? I remember because they made a huge fuss, demanding better mounts since they had to patrol until sunset…"

His voice cut off.

Only then did the martial artists realize something was wrong. Their eyes darted between one another as they carried on a silent conversation.

Wait. What's going on?

An unusually small cloud of dust. Thirty riders. And thirty scouts.

Something feels off.

Why are they back already if they're not due until after sunset?

That feels even more off.

Maybe someone had to take a dump?

You can shit anywhere, cover it up, and call it a latrine. What kind of lunatic would abandon a mission just to come back and relieve himself?

Doesn't everyone? I do.

You're a real lunatic.

This feels seriously wrong.

No matter how they put their heads together, no matter what explanation they came up with, something was clearly amiss.

Gulp.

In the strange tension, just as someone swallowed dryly—

Fwoooosh! Boom!

[3620] A shichen is a traditional time period of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

Hundreds of jang away, red smoke shot up from the pale cloud of dust. The Captain recognized what the signal flare assigned to the scouts meant and forced his voice out.

“Suspicious person spotted…!”

That was the signal for someone acting strangely—an unfamiliar intruder.

At last realizing what was happening, the martial artists atop the wall shouted as if coughing up blood.

“This is real! It’s really happening!”

“What are you waiting for, you bastards? Move your asses!”

“L-let the Sect Leader know! Hurry!”

The wall erupted into chaos as if a powder magazine had exploded. Meanwhile, the flare that had burst brilliantly in the sky slowly drifted down over the thirty scouts racing toward them with all their might, raising a cloud of dust.

On one of the dozens of winding hills, a group stood watching with the shadows at their backs.

“Well… this is a hell of a mess.”

There were about fifty unidentified riders. At their head, a giant of a man let out a low groan. Another man beside him scratched vigorously at his shaggy hair.

“Ah, damn it. This is driving me crazy. Didn’t your little brother tell you we should approach slowly and gently?”

The giant frowned.

“I didn’t think they’d panic and run. We even brought a white flag just in case. Why are those bastards so scared?”

“Do you really need to ask? Look at your face, Big Brother. Who’s going to take a white flag as a friendly gesture from someone who looks like you?”

Agreement erupted from all around them.

“He’s right. Your face is downright terrifying. What good’s a white flag going to do?”

“They probably thought you were offering your condolences in advance to the poor bastards about to die.”

“It wouldn’t have helped if you’d gone over dressed in white instead.”

“Then they’d think you’d put on mourning clothes in advance to offer your condolences to the poor bastards about to die.”

“No need to say another word. Not even the Heavenly Demon’s granddaddy could beat Big Brother at looking vicious.”

“Damn it. This whole thing’s going to shit, and now I’m getting nervous. What if we ride over there and they shower us with arrows?”

“Can’t be helped. Big Brother, since it’s come to this, let’s just turn around and go back.”

“Second Brother, are you scared?”

“Bah! Who’s scared? I just remembered I left something important behind!”

“Looks like you brought your shriveled-up guts along… Ah, you left your balls behind.”

“Bah! Third Brother, how dare you!”

“There you go again with the bah, bah. That only sounds impressive when a Supreme Peak master says it. You can’t pull it off, Second Brother.”

“Bah! Must you see your own coffin before you learn your lesson?”

“I’m going to lose my mind if I have to keep listening to that. You’ve picked up a weird habit. So, Big Brother, what are you going to do?”

At the question from the man called Third Brother, the giant, who’d stayed silent through the rapid-fire exchange, finally spoke.

“We’re not turning back.”

His voice was as heavy as his build. He fixed his gaze on the loess-colored wall rising beyond the heat haze.

“I know what you’re all worried about… But Great Sir asked this of us himself. If you’re men who understand loyalty, follow my lead.”

“…!”

“…!”

The six men who called him Big Brother stared at him, their eyes trembling at his stern words.

The mutters that followed, however, weren’t the reaction he’d hoped for.

“There he goes, putting on a show again.”

“Now we’re the bad guys.”

“He’s a bear until it suits him to be a fox. Am I right, brothers?”

“Still, we should do as Big Brother says. Besides, Great Sir himself asked us. What choice do we have?”

“Bah…!”

“Please, someone gag Second Brother. Listening to him is going to give me qi deviation.”

Most of them grumbled like children whose sweets had been taken away. But they knew, as did the giant and the dozens of riders watching from behind them, that their purpose hadn’t changed just because things had turned out this way.

The strongest reason for that certainty was the person who had sent them here.

“Let’s go. The sun’ll set at this rate.”

With the late sunset beginning to spread from the west, the giant led the fifty or so riders over the hill.

Before long, they reached the wall. Hundreds of arrowheads were trained on them, with unfamiliar faces visible between them.

“Stop! Stop! Stop! Hands up! Move and we’ll shoot!”

At the shout from some young pretty boy, the giant calmly reached inside his clothes for the white flag he’d prepared.

Or rather, he tried to.

Before he could pull it out, the young man gave an order he hadn’t expected.

“Fire!”

“…Huh?”

Fwoosh, fwoosh, fwoosh, fwoosh!

Hundreds of arrows tore through the air.

Some carried more force than others, but every arrow, large or small, had been imbued with internal energy. Instead of arcing, they plunged straight down at the unexpected visitors.

Clang-clang-clang-clang!

Sparks flew in every direction.

The giant had ridden ahead alone, leaving his dozens of subordinates behind. He survived the net of arrows that covered a thirty-jang radius and bellowed.

“Are you out of your damn mind? Who starts shooting arrows without warning?”

Jeok Cheongang, standing beside me, nodded.

“He looks vicious as hell, but this old man has to agree with him. Has some inner demon taken hold of you?”

“No, I’m fine.”

“Then why?”

“I told him to put his hands up, and he didn’t listen. That bastard tried to pull a fast one.”

“You’re insane.”

“Honestly, I didn’t think they’d actually shoot. I thought they’d ignore my order. Judging by his level, though, I figured he’d survive a volley like that, so it was a warning too. Anyway, no harm done, right?”

“Infinite Life Buddha…”[3621]

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord looked appalled by my clear-cut conclusion. The Black Night King, Sima Gong, burst into hearty laughter instead.

“Haha! Straight to the point. We could’ve used someone like you on our side.”

“…”

Was that a compliment or an insult?

[3621] “Infinite Life Buddha” is an invocation of Amitabha Buddha, whose name refers to infinite life.

While I considered how to respond, the giant—whose face was so vicious I could hardly believe anyone could look like that—shouted again.

“Don’t shoot! I said don’t shoot! Can’t you see what I’m holding?”

Flap.

So that was why he’d reached inside his clothes. He was waving a large piece of cloth.

It was covered in sand and loess, leaving it a thoroughly ambiguous yellowish color.

“What on earth is that supposed to mean? What does he want us to see on that dingy yellow thing?”

“Yellow cloth… Wait, could he be a Yellow Turban?”[3622]

“That’s ridiculous. What era do you think this is? How could the Yellow Turbans still be around?”

Watching everyone debate, I felt the weighty responsibility of providing another clear-cut answer.

He’s acting suspicious, he looks vicious, and the men with him look like they’ve each got at least eighteen prior convictions.

No matter how I looked at it, only one solution came to mind.

“Prepare a volley.”

“Uh…?”

“Fire!”

Fwoosh, fwoosh, fwoosh!

[3622]The Yellow Turbans were rebels in late Han China, named for the yellow cloth they wore on their heads.

Chapter 1008

To cut to the chase, by the time the third volley of arrows ended, the leaders of Gansu Murim had decided to let the fifty-odd suspicious-looking men—including the giant—inside the gates.

Of course, it would be misleading to call it a decision made by the entire leadership. Jeok Cheongang's presence had a great deal to do with it.

"I don't know what hole these mangy mutts crawled out of, but let them in alive for now."

Then he added, addressing the murmuring leaders, "What are you agonizing over? If they seem suspicious, kill them and send them back out."

"Oh."

"Ah."

It was such a clear-cut answer that even Judge Bao[3623] would've brought his dog-headed execution blade down with a smack. The meeting that hardly deserved to be called a meeting came to an end, and the Black Night King, Sima Gong, immediately ordered his subordinates to admit the vicious-looking visitors.

Rumble, rumble.

The massive iron gates began to open, little by little.

The giant was the first to step through the gap. He swept his bulging eyes around him.

He'd damn near shit blood dodging three volleys of arrows, and now his clothes were practically rags. His half-rolled eyes darted about, searching for someone.

Someone like the young bastard who'd suddenly ordered the archers to fire.

"Looking for someone? Keep that up and you'll get a crick in your neck. Want me to find them for you?"

I'd come down first to greet our unexpected visitors. I tossed out the question as I stepped forward, and the giant's eyes widened.

"You, you…!"

"I saw it all from up there. Nice job blocking them. Nice job dodging, too."

"You look like a gisaeng's[3624] older brother, you bastard! How dare you!"

"What did you just call me?"

My expression hardened. At the unsettling pressure coming off me, the giant flinched on instinct, then forced out another strained reply.

[3623] Judge Bao is a legendary Chinese magistrate associated with execution blades bearing animal-head designs.

[3624] A gisaeng was a Korean female entertainer. Comparing a man to a gisaeng's older brother mocks his pretty face.

"I said you look like a gisaeng's[3625] older brother...!"

"Hold on. Just hold on a second."

"What?"

Leaving the giant's angry, baffled question hanging, I closed my eyes.

He said I look like a gisaeng's[3626] older brother.

What a wonderful thing to hear.

For a man of the same sex, with the same chromosomes, to say that to me was the highest praise imaginable.

I savored the lingering swell of emotion, then opened my eyes.

"Thanks. Turns out you're a good guy."

"...?"

"So, Junggeol, where are you from?"

"...!"

The giant—or rather, Ma Junggeol—nearly popped his eyes out of his head.

"How did you know?!"

"Hm? Know what?"

"My, my name."

Seeing him stumble over his words now, I answered as casually as could be.

"Didn't I tell you? We already introduced ourselves. You've forgotten that fast?"

"I...?"

"You must still be rattled. Fair enough. You had to dodge all those arrows."

Ma Junggeol would probably never know that, at this very moment, a translucent holographic window was floating like a ghost above his head.

> System
> Level: 80
> Name: Ma Junggeol

Level 80.

A person's level wasn't an absolute measure of their strength, but even so, it was awfully low for someone I'd suspect of being a Dark Heaven lackey.

Going by what I saw earlier, he's maybe a fairly seasoned Peak master?

Still, you couldn't let your guard down so easily.

As I slowly looked Ma Junggeol over, his expression still dazed, the leaders atop the wall finally came down the stairs, Jeok Cheongang among them.

[3625] A gisaeng was a Korean female entertainer. Comparing a man to a gisaeng's older brother mocks his pretty face.

[3626] A gisaeng was a Korean female entertainer. Comparing a man to a gisaeng's older brother mocks his pretty face.

At the same time, the fifty-odd mounted men came rushing toward us.

“Stop!”

“Let’s talk! Let’s talk!”

“We don’t want to fight!”

“Big Brother! Are you all right?”

“Enough!”

“I’m going to lose my mind. I told you to stop doing that.”

Six men, riding side by side at the very front of the group, surrounded Ma Junggeol.

What the hell are these guys?

I was sure everyone there was thinking much the same thing.

The lanky one. The dwarf. The bulbous-nosed one. The tiny-eyed one…

Every one of them had striking features that seemed to have gone their own way. You didn’t see a combination like that every day. And Ma Junggeol, standing in the middle of those six men, was the finishing touch.

Was his father Picasso?

They all had such strong impressionist faces that even the Black Dragon Demon Gate’s martial artists—who’d spent their share of time at the bottom—instinctively reached for their sword hilts.

Shing.

As the faint sounds of friction from here and there heightened the tension, a low voice reached everyone’s ears.

“I guarantee that anyone who tries something stupid from this point on will spend a very hot time with this old man.”

No one present needed to ask who’d spoken.

And, naturally, not even Tokyo Hot[3627] could hold a candle to the JCK-444 Fire Show Special. No one wanted to star in it.

Shuffle, shuffle.

The crowd parted to either side as though fleeing a fire demon.

Jeok Cheongang emerged through the gap, leading the other leaders. He glanced at Ma Junggeol, then turned to me.

“So, who is he, and where did he come from?”

“His name is Ma Junggeol. I don’t know where he came from yet.”

“Could he be a Dark Heaven lackey?”

“We’d have to beat the truth out of him to be sure. But, as you already know, he doesn’t look or seem capable of pulling anything clever…”

[3627] Tokyo Hot is a Japanese adult-video studio.

“You can’t judge by a feeling alone. What do you think of the possibility that they’re deliberately hiding their strength?”

Jeok Cheongang wasn’t asking because he didn’t know. He meant for everyone listening to our conversation to hear the question. Once I understood his intent, I answered without hesitation.

“No chance.”

“You must have a reason for thinking so.”

“Old—no, Master, if they were strong enough to fool you and the others here, they’d have to have undergone at least Returning to Simplicity or Bone Transformation.”

“And?”

“Look at those faces. Supreme Peak masters who’d reached that level couldn’t possibly look like that.”

“…!”

“…!”

The seven terrifying-looking men, Ma Junggeol included, shuddered. What could I do? It was true.

I’d suddenly found myself playing lawyer, and I felt an inexplicable sense of duty as I continued.

“Therefore, I find no grounds to charge them with ‘vicious-looking men concealing their martial arts,‘ and I rest my case.”

Jeok Cheongang nodded with an expression of admiration.

“Your argument is so logical that even this old man hardly dares to dispute it.”

“Thank you.”

“But looking at those faces—whether they’re Yellow Turbans,[3628] Dark Heaven, or men who’ve held important posts in the Demonic Cult at the very least—I can’t help but find them suspicious.”

“So what are you going to do?”

“Either they confess everything right now, or I’ll beat it out of them with the Flame Divine Palm.”

His voice was directed at me, but his gaze wasn’t.

Under Jeok Cheongang’s stare, which seemed to pour streams of fire, Ma Junggeol went pale and stammered, “A-are you really the Fire King, Great Hero Jeok Cheongang…?”

Jeok Cheongang replied with a bored look.

“Of course I’m real. Did you think I was a fake?”

[3628] The Yellow Turbans were a rebel movement in late Han-dynasty China.

“If that’s true, then the gisaeng’s[3629] older brother—no, the young man—is the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon…”

It was my turn to speak.

Smiling broadly at hearing that pleasant description again, I tried to reassure the terrified Ma Junggeol.

“Keep calling me a gisaeng’s[3630] older brother. Make yourself comfortable. Come to think of it, I was rude, speaking so casually to you all this time. I’m sorry. Okay?”

“N-no, that’s all right. But it seems there’s been a misunderstanding for a while now. May I say something to clear it up?”

“Now you’re talking. You should’ve said—spoken up sooner.”

“I was trying to explain, but you jumped straight to—”

“Go on, then. Skip the preamble.”

At my gentle but forceful urging, Ma Junggeol hesitated, then straightened his shoulders and cautiously addressed the leaders, Jeok Cheongang included.

“To cut to the chase, we came from Ningxia.”

“Hold on. Ningxia? Could you be…?”

A thought crossed my mind, and I frowned. Ma Junggeol hurriedly added, “We’re not mounted bandits!”

Jeok Cheongang muttered, “So that’s why their faces looked suspicious. They’re those mounted bandits who’ve been spreading filth all over Ningxia Province.”

“I-it’s true that I belonged to a band of mounted bandits for a short time, but that’s not who we are now…”

Just then, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord cut in, eyeing Ma Junggeol and his men with narrowed eyes.

“Infinite Life Buddha.[3631] I shouldn’t say this as a man who pursues the Way, but as Senior Jeok said, those faces clearly belong to men still in the trade.”

People nodded here and there in agreement.

Then, as if to prove why looks ruled modern society, the mood slowly turned hostile. One person spoke up.

“Ma Junggeol, Ma Junggeol… Could you be that very Ma Junggeol of Baekma Bang?”

It was the Black Night King, Sima Gong.

He’d been deep in thought with his brow furrowed. At his question, Ma Junggeol and his men—whose faces had been turning more and more sallow—visibly brightened.

[3629] A gisaeng was a Korean female entertainer. Comparing a man to a gisaeng’s older brother mocks his pretty face.

[3630] A gisaeng was a Korean female entertainer. Comparing a man to a gisaeng’s older brother mocks his pretty face.

[3631] “Infinite Life Buddha” is a Buddhist invocation referring to Amitabha, the Buddha of Infinite Life.

“Y-you know me?”

“I’ve heard of you through the grapevine. More than ten years ago, an unknown master pacified the mounted-bandit gangs in Ningxia Province. A few of their leaders changed their ways under his guidance, joined forces, and founded a horse caravan.”

“That’s right! That’s me—or rather, that’s us!”

As though he’d finally found someone he could talk to, Ma Junggeol’s color returned. His expression grew serious as he saluted everyone with clasped hands.

“I am Ma Junggeol, Chief of Baekma Bang. The Seven Masters of Baekma Bang greet the heroes of the Murim Alliance.”

“…?”

“…?”

A suffocating silence pressed in from all sides.

The elegant title didn’t fit their vicious faces at all. The leaders and I silently exchanged glances, while the six men, prompted belatedly by Ma Junggeol, awkwardly copied his salute and whispered among themselves.

“Uh, is this how you do the salute, hyungs?[3632]”

“You idiot. How many times have I told you to cover your left hand with your right palm?”

“What are you talking about? The youngest did it right. Fourth Hyung’s[3633] the one doing it wrong.”

“Oh, you’re right…”

“Enough! Can’t you all shut up? Do you know what kind of place this is?”

“Sheesh. A minute ago you were shouting ‘Enough! Enough!‘ at the top of your lungs. Now you lower your voice because there are masters around. Being born later is my fucking crime. My crime.”

“…”

What the hell was going on with these guys?

Their voices were low, but their conversation still came through clearly. Everyone’s eyes went flat. Only Sima Gong kept his composure as he spoke.

“Yes, I’ve heard about Baekma Bang a few times. I hear you’ve fought off the nomads who invaded through the northern Great Steppe and given plenty of help to the commoners who’ve begun settling there. But…”

Sima Gong let his voice trail off. His gaze suddenly sharpened.

“What brings you here so abruptly?”

[3632] Hyung is a Korean form of address used by a man for an older brother or an older man close to him; hyungs is its English plural.

[3633] Hyung is a Korean form of address used by a man for an older brother or an older man close to him; hyungs is its English plural.

With everyone’s attention on him, Ma Junggeol straightened his bent back and answered.

“We came here to offer our help.”

“Help with what?”

“Dark Heaven. We have important information about them.”

“…!”

Chapter 1009

If Ma Junggeol had given even the slightest suspicious or flimsy reason, he would've been thrown straight back out the gate—or stuffed into the underground prison somewhere inside the city to have a long chat with the torture specialists.

But when he lowered his voice, the reason he gave was more important than I'd expected.

"Dark Heaven. I have important information about them."

"…!"

The moment he said it, everyone among the leadership, myself included, realized our unwelcome visitors might be a lot more useful than we'd thought.

"Well, we've kept our distinguished guests standing outside for far too long. Why don't you come in for a cup of tea?"

At Sima Gong's subtle invitation, Ma Junggeol straightened his shoulders as though nothing had happened and nodded.

"Sounds good. Just so you know, of all the teas, my brothers and I favor grain tea most."

"I heard the Seven Masters of Baekma Bang were renowned drinkers. You're every bit as forthright as they say. Come on in, then."

Important conversations were best held with as few people watching as possible.

A few moments later, Ma Junggeol and his six men—no, the Seven Masters of Baekma Bang—had gone from unwelcome visitors to honored guests, each with a seat in the grand meeting hall.

"Ahhh. That's good."

Starting with Ma Junggeol, his six sworn brothers drained a small wine jar in one go, then smacked their lips.

"Whew, that's really something."

"What kind of liquor is this? It just melts on your tongue."

"Right? It's insane."

"…It's liquor. Of course it does. What the hell do you mean, 'melts'? This is why people call you an idiot."

"Enough! Fourth, is that any way to speak to your brothers?"

"Whew, look at you raising your voice again the second you can breathe easy. Honestly, I'd like to crack this wine jar over the back of your head right now."

Naturally, no one's head met the wine jar.

That was thanks to one remark from Jeok Cheongang, who'd been silently watching the seven-colored mounted-bandit rangers—or rather, the Seven Masters of Baekma Bang.

"Did you come here to drink?"

"…!"

"…!"

"You've wet your throats. Now, go on and spit it out."

Ma Junggeol flinched at the menacing aura rolling off Jeok Cheongang, then stammered out a reply.

"F-first, I assume you already know something about the situation in Ningxia."

"I've heard the basics. Because of mounted bandits like you, the place nearly became a battlefield, but it's been quiet for the past few years. Is that right?"

"We're no longer mounted bandits, but yes. Great Hero Jeok is right."

"Still look like a bunch of mounted bandits to this old man, but go on."

"There've been a few minor disputes over the years, but it's become a fairly livable place. Anyone who'd done something they might feel guilty about left long ago. The ones who remain have completely turned over a new leaf and live ordinary lives, like me and my brothers. Sect Leader Sima here knows this well, too."

Everyone's eyes turned to Sima Gong. He nodded calmly.

"It's true. As Ningxia Province settled down, various merchant caravans began passing through, and we heard all sorts of things from them. That was when I first heard about Baekma Bang."

With Sima Gong backing him up, Ma Junggeol quickly picked up the thread.

"I don't know exactly what you heard, Sect Leader Sima, but Baekma Bang is by far the largest group in Ningxia Province. Recently, we've even been opening a new trade route to help Ningxia Province prosper."

"Wait. This new trade route you mentioned—is it perhaps…?"

"It's probably where you're thinking."

Surprise spread across Sima Gong's face. Watching him, I had a sudden thought.

"West. You mean west."

"…!"

My sudden words sent an invisible ripple through the room.

Naturally. The west I meant wasn't Gansu or Qinghai.

"Xinjiang…"

The word slipped through the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord's lips like a groan.

The Taeeul Merciless Sword and the Roaring Fury Swordsman had been watching Ma Junggeol with obvious disapproval for a while now, as though something about him rubbed them the wrong way. They frowned and spoke up, too.

"So that's what this is about. Xinjiang, huh. Hah."

"I can't listen to this anymore. How long are we supposed to sit here listening to such ridiculous nonsense?"

Much as I hated to admit it, theirs was the reasonable reaction.

What kind of place was Xinjiang?

It was even called the Land of Ruin.

A cursed land of endless deserts, teeming with Fiends who proclaimed the world belonged to the Demonic Path.

And a mere horse-caravan group—not one of the Nine Sects and One Gang or the Five Great Families—was supposed to open a trade route to Xinjiang?

What a joke.

And yet I could feel my heart beginning to beat faster.

The Taeeul Merciless Sword and the Roaring Fury Swordsman had forgotten the most important thing.

This wasn't a pitch for investment or a business presentation.

Ma Junggeol's story wasn't over. The real story was only just beginning.

"That's enough preamble, isn't it?"

Jeok Cheongang's low question left no doubt what he meant. Ma Junggeol drew a deep breath and spoke again.

"Even after things settled down, Ningxia Province was still in bad shape. The land was barren, and the nomads from the Great Steppe along our border raided us every harvest season. We needed a new way out."

"So you wanted to cross the desert and open a trade route?"

"That was the idea, but it was nothing more than a dream. Even an uneducated fool like me knew people like us had no business dreaming of something so far beyond our reach. But…"

Ma Junggeol's gaze suddenly shifted toward me.

"Not long ago, an opportunity came out of nowhere. The many nomads occupying the western Great Steppe suddenly began a mass migration."

"Jamukha."

The name slipped from my lips before I could stop it.

Only then did I understand why Ma Junggeol was looking at me, and what he'd meant by an unexpected opportunity.

Jamukha's massive army had controlled the western steppe. They'd taken almost all their forces and marched into Shanxi Province. The gap they left behind had given Baekma Bang its chance.

"Then were you trying to reach Xinjiang through the steppe?"

At my question, gasps came from around the room.

Of course. There was another route, one so obvious now that everyone had forgotten it.

To the people of the Central Plains, the Great Steppe had long been another forbidden land, just like Xinjiang. But it was also the fastest shortcut across the desert.

Under everyone's gaze, Ma Junggeol nodded, his face tense.

"That's right."

"…!"

"I picked out the men under me who were good riders, and we kept driving our horses without stopping. After riding like mad for ten whole days, we finally saw a vast yellow stretch of land in the distance. We'd reached the desert."

Just then, his six sworn brothers, who'd been keeping an eye on everyone's reaction behind him, nodded and chimed in.

"Man, it was a real shitshow. Honestly, I wanted to say to hell with the Chief and the whole damn venture and turn back."

"But what could we do? We'd already come that far. We figured we might as well set foot on the sand before going home."

"Then we traveled another ten days or so, right?"

"Don't remind me. Even now, just thinking about that goddamn desert makes my knees buckle."

"Enough! What a bunch of weaklings. Even through all that hardship, I trusted Big Brother and followed him."

The diminutive middle-aged man, who looked rather old, delivered a stern rebuke. The man with the bulbous nose snorted.

"They say even if a horse's hooves go crooked, you should keep the reins straight. So at least get your story straight. What did you do the moment those black bastards showed up on the tenth day, Second Hyung[3634]? You didn't even look back. You got ready to run."

"Enough…!"

The dwarf's face turned as red as a ripe persimmon. He lunged at the bulbous-nosed man, but I was much faster.

Snatch.

His small fist landed squarely in my grasp.

I'd caught the dwarf's punch with ridiculous ease. I fixed the bulbous-nosed man with a cold stare.

"Say that again."

"W-what?"

"You just said those black bastards appeared on the tenth day after you entered the desert."

He'd said it in passing, but everyone in the room had heard him clearly.

And the moment we heard it, our suspicion turned to certainty.

"It was Dark Heaven."

Ma Junggeol spoke up in place of the bulbous-nosed man and continued.

"There were only a few dozen of them, but I'm certain. I'll stake my life on it."

[3634] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older male he is close to.

Sima Gong spoke in a grave voice.

“What makes you so certain?”

“We followed them.”

“What?”

“For a day and a half. That was the best we could do. But I saw it with my own eyes. That night, when the moon was unusually bright, at least a thousand tents covered the sand dunes.”

“…!”

“There’s only one force in the western desert that could mobilize an army that large. Dark Heaven. Isn’t that right?”

A cold silence filled the meeting hall instead of an answer.

A thousand. Not a thousand people—a thousand tents.

What’s more, Ma Junggeol’s route across the desert was clearly closer to Gansu than Qinghai.

Even by the lowest estimate, that meant thousands, perhaps tens of thousands, of enemies were targeting Gansu Province.

And that might not even be all of them.

My mind went cold. Meanwhile, my heartbeat had grown so fast it was thundering in my ears.

Of course, it was too soon to be certain. There was still a question I needed answered before making a decision.

“You’re lucky you made it back alive.”

Sima Gong’s low voice broke the silence. Under his unfathomable gaze, Ma Junggeol licked his parched lips.

“It was close. I thought my heart was going to burst.”

“You know what I mean. Are you pretending not to?”

“We followed at a distance of exactly a hundred li.[3635] The beginning was hard, but after that, their numbers kept growing, which made it much easier.”

“A mere horse caravan followed Dark Heaven without being spotted? Is that possible?”

“I’m ashamed to say it, but we’re not an ordinary horse caravan, are we? We may not wear our hair in queues, but when it comes to riding and keeping a sharp eye out, we’re no different from the nomads.”

“You could have turned back as soon as you spotted them. Why follow them for another day and a half?”

“That… well…”

Ma Junggeol hesitated, glanced at Sima Gong, then answered cautiously.

[3635] In the Chinese setting, one li is 500 m (0.311 mi); a hundred li is about 50 km (31 mi).

“I’d heard that if you render a service for the good of the realm, no one holds your origins against you.”

“You were thinking about a reward?”

“Yes.”

They’d managed it because there were few enough of them to avoid notice, and because their years as mounted bandits had taught them how to survive.

Their reason was clear, too.

After a moment’s thought, I turned to Jeok Cheongang and spoke.

“Now we know for sure which battlefield we need to be on.”

Chapter 1010

"So, that's what you've decided?"

At Jeok Cheongang's question, I nodded.

"Yes. I think I need to stay here after all."

If Ma Junggeol and his men had arrived half a day later, I'd probably already be on my way to Qinghai with the Fire Dragon Pavilion members.

Gansu had enough forces as things stood.

The Kongtong Sect and the Zhongnan Sect.

Two towering powers of the Nine Sects and One Gang stood firm here, and the Black Dragon Demon Gate, led by Sima Gong, was every bit their equal.

The dark-path figures and unorthodox factions gathered under the Black Dragon Demon Gate might have been inferior in quality, but their sheer numbers made them an enormous force.

But now the situation had changed.

The massive Dark Heaven army—estimated to number at least tens of thousands—was a problem. But the biggest reason I'd decided to stay in Gansu was time.

The time it would take them to reach us.

"When exactly did you return to Ningxia?"

Ma Junggeol answered.

"Three days ago. We arrived in the middle of the night, so I suppose you could say it was two days ago."

"Three days ago?"

Jeok Cheongang cut in abruptly, furrowing his brow. Ma Junggeol hurriedly continued.

"W-we were facing an emergency ourselves. We were so busy sending urgent messages throughout Ningxia and getting our men moving that we barely had time to think."

He'd apparently taken Jeok Cheongang's reaction to mean, You arrived three days ago, so why are you only coming to us now? But I knew why Jeok Cheongang had frowned.

That was right around the time.

A memory suddenly came to mind.

Several hundred people, trembling with fear, had said mounted bandits were roaming not far away.

Ningxia Province must still have seemed lawless to them. With Ma Junggeol's urgent message causing an uproar, they'd probably mistaken the commotion for a mounted-bandit attack.

It had all happened so recently that even the Lower District Sect member from the Shaanxi branch hadn't known the details.

So that's what it was.

Things come around, and everything connects.

The outcome of one incident becomes the beginning of another, until eventually it all leads here.

And Ma Junggeol's answer—that they'd arrived three days ago—gave everyone plenty to think about.

"How long did it take you to get back?"

At the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord's question, Ma Junggeol counted on his fingers.

"Let's see. It took seven days and nights just to get out of the desert, and crossing the grasslands again took a day longer than that… About a month, I'd say."

"Wait. Didn't you say earlier that it took twenty days just to get there? And then you spent another day and a half following Dark Heaven."

"That's right. But traveling a route for the first time isn't the same as taking it on the way back. Do you think we're mounted bandits—no, horse caravans—for nothing?"

"…Hmm."

It was hard to argue with that.

Just as the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord, a Supreme Peak master, could judge an opponent's level and the kind of martial arts they practiced from only a few forms, no one could match mounted bandits and horse caravans at finding the fastest route.

"Too much caution can be its own poison. There's something more important here."

Jeok Cheongang stopped the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord before he could respond and fixed his gaze on Ma Junggeol.

"If you were leading an army of tens of thousands, how long would it take you to reach here?"

"W-well…"

Ma Junggeol thought hard for a moment, then sighed.

"That's hard to answer. But…"

"But?"

"Assuming they had enough camels, desert horses, and supplies—and every last one of them knew enough martial arts to endure a grueling forced march… Yes. Even with delays, a month at most."

"One month. Just a month."

"Of course, depending on the circumstances, it could be much shorter."

Ma Junggeol glanced around as he added that last part. Sima Gong's face stiffened.

"What circumstances do you mean?"

"Have you forgotten? We lost more time than necessary crossing the grasslands. Where we spotted them wasn't all that far from Gansu. Even taking that enormous force into account…"

Ma Junggeol trailed off. He swallowed hard before continuing.

"A-about twenty days should be enough."

"…!"

"…!"

The air in the meeting room turned cold.

No—it froze like a glacier.

His words reminded everyone of a fact they'd briefly forgotten. They stared at one another, eyes wide.

That was right.

Unlike Ma Junggeol, who'd had to hurry back the way he came, Dark Heaven had another option.

They could advance.

Instead of detouring across the grasslands, they could break through the front by sheer force.

And if they chose a direct assault, there would be precious little time left before the fighting began.

One day, or maybe two.

Of course, that was the worst-case scenario.

No one knew whether Dark Heaven's army had stayed there for several more days after Ma Junggeol left—or whether they were still there now.

But we had to plan for the worst.

That was war.

"I think we can throw any more armchair strategizing out the window. Don't you all agree?"

Over Jeok Cheongang's low voice, which broke the silence, rang a clear chime that didn't fit the situation at all.

Ding.

Rumble, rumble.

Was this what a small mountain would look like in motion?

With the Black Dragon Demon Gate, the Zhongnan Sect, and the hundreds of martial artists Sima Gong had conscripted from nearby, our force had grown to more than two thousand—close to three thousand. I looked at the endless wave of people and horses stretching out behind me, then raised my eyes to the air.

More precisely, to the translucent holographic window floating there.

> System
> The conditions for the current Quest have been met!
> Head West — Complete
> Quest Desert Mirage successfully completed!
> Quest rewards have been granted!
> Gained a large amount of EXP and Fame!
> A new linked Quest has been generated upon completion of Desert Mirage.
> Would you like to view the new Quest?

Barely half an hour.

That was an impossibly short time for an army of nearly three thousand to finish its preparations and set out. I certainly hadn't had a chance to check the newly generated linked Quest.

Not that I needed to check it right away. I had a rough idea what it would say.

I adjusted my grip on the reins of my galloping horse and gave the command in my head.

Open Quest window.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Quest
Road of Blood
Long ago, this land was a trade route linking one continent to another. Today, it has fallen into grave peril.
The foreign merchants with their unfamiliar features are gone. So are those who crossed the desert for foreign lands with wagons piled high with silk.
The rulers of the vast desert have cut off the trade route that once brought prosperity to the Central Plains. Now they want everything within the Great Wall.
The old days, when silk flowed in abundance, have become a distant, dusty past.
Steel without end, blood, and corpses will be the present and future of this land.
May fortune be with you.
Grade: Supreme Peak
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Mission: Annihilate enemy forces in the Gansu region — Incomplete
Reward: A large amount of EXP and Fame
Linked Quest based on your choice
Failure: Dark Heaven wins
— Lose control of the Gansu region

As expected.

It was more or less what I'd anticipated.

Actually, I knew full well that if we failed, it wouldn't end there.

If the Gansu front collapses, the entire west will be in danger.

War was like a line of dominoes.

No matter how carefully and thoroughly you prepared from beginning to end, one mistake could bring everything you'd built crashing down in an instant.

We have to stop them before it's too late.

At least Gansu Murim had prepared thoroughly.

Three successive defensive lines, with thirty thousand troops deployed according to each line's importance.

Dunhuang, the foremost of those three lines, was close enough to reach within three days if we pushed ourselves to the limit.

The Silk Road.

Better known by that name to people in the modern world, this region was an endless stretch of plains and wilderness.

There was no narrow path to slow us down, no terrain so rugged we'd have to abandon our horses.

We just had to ride until the horses collapsed from exhaustion.

The problem was…

Dark Heaven could do the same.

That was why we couldn't afford to lose even a moment.

Even with camels and desert horses, there was a limit to how fast they could travel through the desert. But once they reached land covered in soil and grass instead of sand, that would change.

Dunhuang would be the first domino to fall, and tens of thousands of enemies would soon swarm across Gansu like locusts—

"What are you staring at so intently?"

"…!"

"Checking the shape of the clouds or something?"

I wasn't exaggerating when I said I nearly jumped out of my skin.

It wasn't the sudden voice that startled me. It was the menacing face that filled my vision the moment I turned my head.

"Ah, damn. You scared me. What's with you all of a sudden?"

Ma Junggeol answered, sitting as comfortably as ever on his violently bouncing saddle. A former mounted bandit and current horse-caravan chief through and through.

"Nothing much. You've been staring into the air for a while, so I thought I'd talk to you."

"What's it to you where I'm looking? And I don't think we're close enough to be chatting."

"Of course we're not. You're the one who had them rain arrows down on me. Three times, no less."

His already vicious face twisted into a scowl. I answered flatly.

"So?"

"…You've got no conscience, do you? And even if I can understand the first two times, what on earth were you thinking when you ordered them to fire the third?"

"Just thought stopping at two would make me look cold."

"…?"

"That's it. Happy?"

At my offhand answer, Ma Junggeol gaped at me as if I were insane.

"What do you mean, 'that's it'? Are you even human?"

"Feels like that's a question I should be asking you."

"…What's that supposed to mean?"

What did it mean? He knew perfectly well.

But I was too tenderhearted to hit him with the facts about his looks.

I silently shrugged. Looking at Ma Junggeol, I had another thought.

Still, he really is nothing like he looks.

Judging by his face alone, he looked like some evil spirit who could plunge the world into ruin. But from the way he acted, and the bits of his personality that showed through now and then, he seemed surprisingly stupid.

Even now, at the strong insistence of a few leaders who still suspected Ma Junggeol and the other horse-caravan men, he was practically being held hostage. Yet he seemed utterly carefree.

Chapter 1011

Suspecting someone was hardly a good thing.

But in a time of war, suspicion was another word for caution.

The longer and more closely you looked, the clearer the truth became—and the closer you came to victory.

That was the main reason Ma Junggeol and the other six members of the Seven Masters of Baekma Bang had joined our party.

Or, to be precise, the Fire Dragon Pavilion I led.

Though I was the one who volunteered to take them.

They were originally supposed to be placed under Sima Gong's watch. But when I pointed out that he already had a sizable force to command, the decision came quickly.

They would be assigned to the Fire Dragon Pavilion.

Time was so short that no one raised any further objections. Still, I saw it clearly.

The moment the decision about the Seven Masters of Baekma Bang was made, Sima Gong's eyes sank deeper than before.

Am I imagining it? Or…

I let the thought trail off and glanced at Ma Junggeol.

He'd been grumbling about how rude it was to ignore someone standing right in front of you, but at some point he'd gone quiet.

Or so it seemed.

Thud-thud-thud!

Hooves thundered beneath us. A fierce wind wrapped around my body and rushed past.

And through it all…

Wooooong.

A faint ripple reached me, almost hidden by the noise.

This is…

I knew it instinctively. It was a flow of qi only someone who had reached a profound realm could sense.

Buried beneath the pounding hooves and rushing wind, that faint ripple carried a voice I had never heard before.

Ssshhh.

I hadn't reasoned it out. This was an instinct I'd forgotten for a moment.

Like a child just discovering he could stand on two feet, I sent my qi toward the ripple emanating from Ma Junggeol.

It touched, mingled with, and became one with the ripple.

So naturally that even Ma Junggeol, its source, didn't notice.

The same went for the ripples his six sworn brothers were exchanging nearby.

"…long do we have to be dragged along like this?"

The faint ripple—no, the Sound Transmission—rang clearly in my ears at last.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Hidden achievement A Bug in My Ear achieved! You can now detect and eavesdrop on nearby Sound Transmissions! This is another ability granted to those who reach a great realm. But don't get too excited. The Sound Transmissions you can eavesdrop on are limited by the levels of both the target and the user!

…So I can do this now.

I blinked in a daze, then focused on the Sound Transmissions reaching my ears.

Let's hear what they're plotting.

"Honestly, how long do we have to be dragged along like this?"

"Exactly. What are we, hostages?"

"Whew, Father. I miss you so much today."

"Huh? Didn't your father pass away more than twenty years ago?"

"That's why I miss him even more."

"Oh."

Ma Junggeol answered his younger brothers' grumbling Sound Transmissions sternly.

"Now, now. Why are you all complaining? We expected this from the start."

The second brother, who fled faster than anyone in an emergency but worshipped the Chief like the heavens the rest of the time, nodded.

"Enough! The Chief is a hundred, a thousand times right, so all of you shut up. If he hadn't foreseen this from the beginning, would he have dragged us into such a deathtrap?"

That was the second brother for you.

There was a reason people said no younger brother could outdo his older brother.

Ma Junggeol smiled with satisfaction as the little man gently put the others in their place.

"Didn't you hear what the Chief said earlier?"

The third brother, who always had to stick his foot in, broke in. The second blinked.

“Earlier? When?”

“Right before we left. He went off by himself, supposedly to check a perfectly good saddle, and started muttering under his breath. I listened, and…”

“And?”

“No, there’s nothing to hear. It was nothing, so don’t worry about it.”

Ma Junggeol remembered what had happened half a shichen[3636] earlier and hurried to cut him off. But the third brother’s Sound Transmission was already riding the wind.

“We’re fucked. What do we do now?”

“…”

“…”

A wind colder than the bitter north wind swept through the group.

In the heavy silence, six pairs of eyes bored mercilessly into the back of Ma Junggeol’s head. His gaze darkened.

“Chief…”

“Third Brother, is that true?”

“It’s not, is it? It isn’t, right?”

“If that’s true, then seriously…”

“E-enough! There’s no way the Chief would say that.”

“What do you mean, ‘there’s no way’? I heard him with my own ears.”

At a loss for words, Ma Junggeol’s eyes darted back and forth.

How was he supposed to answer? He’d never dreamed anyone would hear the words he’d let slip—least of all the third brother.

“That, well…”

Unable to stay silent forever, he sent a hesitant reply.

His six quick-witted brothers groaned at once.

“So it’s true.”

“It really is.”

“Ah, Mother. I want to see you so badly today.”

“Sometimes it’s like that. When someone passed away long ago, you miss them all the more.”

“Are you crazy? She’s still perfectly healthy. Why are you killing her off?”

“Oh.”

“Enough…!”

[3636] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

“Chief, what are we actually going to do? At this rate, they’ll drag us all the way to the front and use us to catch swords, won’t they?”

Unlike the others, who had descended into confusion, the third brother was at least facing reality. Ma Junggeol gave the faintest shake of his head.

“Don’t worry. Things are going a little—just a little—worse than I expected, but they won’t use us to catch swords like you said.”

“If it’s not swords, it’ll be arrows. Thanks, Chief. You’ve ruined all our lives.”

“Now, now. I said that won’t happen!”

“What makes you so sure? Let’s be blunt. If they give us an order, we’re in no position to refuse.”

“Well…”

“Look around. There are already several Supreme Peak masters here—people you’d be lucky to see once in your life. If those monsters start prodding us in the back and giving us the look, what choice do guys like us have except to run out and fight like hell?”

The third brother’s Sound Transmission poured out with pent-up anger. His sworn brothers joined in.

“There are those Zhongnan Sect Daoist punks treating us like outright bandits, the Black Night King himself, the Fire King, and that young Disciple of his who looks half-mad.”

“Especially that Jin Taekyung right in front of the Chief. He’s not right in the head. Have you forgotten how we nearly crossed the Sanzu River[3637] before we’d even made it through the gate?”

“Damn it, is this why we quit being mounted bandits? I’ll admit our past wasn’t exactly something to brag about, but we quit before we’d even gotten to rob anyone! We spent all day, every day sharpening our swords and never even got to draw them.”

“Enough! Now that I think about it, this is downright unfair. Have we robbed anyone? Killed any innocent civilians? We’d only just made up our minds to pull off one good score when we met Great Sir and turned over a new leaf. We’re trying to live decent lives, and this is what we get?”

“Second Brother’s right. Sure, we look like this, but if we’d gone around doing only the most vicious things like everyone else, do you think Great Sir would’ve left us alone? Isn’t that right?”

Their Sound Transmissions were full of wounded indignation. Listening to them, Ma Junggeol felt a pang in his own heart.

They were right. What had they done wrong?

[3637] The Sanzu River is a Buddhist river said to lie between the world of the living and the afterlife.

He couldn’t deny that they used to be mounted bandits. But he could swear to heaven that they’d never done anything deserving punishment.

If we had, at least this treatment wouldn’t feel so unfair.

Robbing civilians?

Even when they steeled themselves and rode out to attack, they couldn’t bring themselves to do it.

What could they take from people other mounted bandits had already stripped bare? Countless times, they’d given food instead to families holding newborns too hungry to cry.

And that wasn’t all.

They might have looked like fiends, but Ma Junggeol and his six sworn brothers were timid by nature.

Robbing or killing civilians had been impossible for them from the start. And even when they occasionally came across a gutsy merchant caravan traveling to Ningxia Province, they just collected a toll and let it pass.

Why?

Simple.

Because they were scared.

Who would travel through a lawless place like Ningxia Province without a proper escort?

It was only natural for an Escort Bureau or merchant caravan to bring at least several dozen armed men. In that tense standoff, Ma Junggeol just had to put on his vicious face and say:

“So, you mean to shed blood after all?”

A face to rival any fiend’s, paired with a stern voice, made an excellent way to talk things over.

Whether the other party was an Escort Bureau, a merchant caravan, or a mounted-bandit group so practiced at killing that they were nearly ready to ascend to immortality.

That was how Ma Junggeol and his six sworn brothers had survived as mounted bandits back when their martial arts were still rudimentary.

Until the man they called Great Sir appeared.

Even now, Ma Junggeol firmly believed in Great Sir, who had led them onto the right path.

“Enough, all of you!”

At his forceful Sound Transmission, the complaints streaming from behind him stopped at once.

Ma Junggeol seized the brief opening.

“There’s nothing to worry about. Set me aside—surely Great Sir anticipated a situation like this?”

“Hmm.”

“That’s true.”

“The Chief might not have, but Great Sir is different.”

“Right. We can’t trust the Chief, but we can trust Great Sir.”

“Now that you mention it, that makes sense.”

“For once, you’re saying something right.”

The answers only made him feel stranger the longer he thought about them, but Ma Junggeol continued his Sound Transmission with a vague sense of unease.

“I sent a few men back on the pretext of relaying news to Ningxia, so Great Sir will hear about this. Until then, don’t do anything rash. Understood?”

The third brother, the one with the bulbous nose, cut in.

“But that’s only if Great Sir’s in his right mind.”

“What?”

“Well, isn’t it? You know as well as anyone how he can be a little… all over the place.”

Ma Junggeol blinked a few times, then stammered out a reply.

“H-he’ll be fine. Probably.”

Even without his uncertain answer, his sworn brothers knew no one could be sure of that.

“Damn. Now that Third Brother’s said it, I’ve got a bad feeling.”

“But hasn’t Great Sir been more or less all right lately? That’s why he’s been telling us where to go from here and all that.”

“He has. But with him, you never know when he’ll snap.”

“Great Sir was strange from the first time we met him. His hair was a tangled mess, and his face was so black with grime you’d think he hadn’t washed in days. He looked like a beggar. Still does.”

“This is bad. If Great Sir’s out of it right now, sending the men to him won’t do any good, will it?”

As his sworn brothers’ worry deepened, Ma Junggeol scrunched up his already ugly face and thought hard. At last, he spoke.

“We have no choice. One of us should go in person. Maybe seeing a familiar face will help him come to his senses sooner.”

“One of us? Who?”

“Hard to say. We’ll have to decide now.”

“And once we do, how are you going to send him? That’ll be difficult right now.”

“As the Chief, I’ll take care of that, so don’t worry—wait a minute.”

Ma Junggeol abruptly stopped his Sound Transmission and frowned.

“You’ve been awfully casual with me for a while now. Did you lose half your tongue or something? Which insolent bastard is it? Huh?”

At that very moment, an actual voice he hadn’t expected reached his ears.

“Me.”

“…?”

“It’s me.”

No. Impossible. Surely not.

Muttering to himself, Ma Junggeol slowly raised his head. He’d been keeping it slightly lowered to hide his moving lips.

There, facing him, was that insolent bastard, smiling menacingly.

“Uh, uhh.”

Ma Junggeol shuddered as if possessed by a ghost. Jin Taekyung smiled warmly at him.

“Looks like there’s a lot you need to tell me. Isn’t that right?”

Chapter 1012

Time swept by like the wind as the horses galloped without rest.

The sunset swallowed the wilderness, and the darkness that followed pressed down on the world. Then a dim dawn crept in between them.

By the time darkness fell for the second time, Ma Junggeol's lips, which had been moving nonstop, could finally rest.

"…And that's what happened."

By the end of his long story, Ma Junggeol looked as though he'd aged overnight.

He'd spent more than a full day recounting everything that had happened over the past decade or so. But I suspected the audience—growing one person at a time, starting with me—had taken an even greater toll.

Especially the pressure radiating from the giant known as the Fire King.

"What do you mean, 'that's what happened'? Keep talking."

At Jeok Cheongang's low growl, Ma Junggeol, already exhausted, looked ready to cry.

"I really am finished. I'm telling you, there's nothing else to say."

"If I dig around and something else comes out, it's ten hits per syllable. Still nothing?"

"What?"

It wasn't as if he had a stash of stories hidden away. What was there to dig for?

Ma Junggeol gave me a pleading look. I shook my head and spoke up.

"Give it a rest. And why would he say anything if it's a hundred hits per syllable? Even if he had more to tell, he'd hold out to the death."

"Is that so? Then I'll lower it to ten. Spill everything."

"Ten would still kill him."

"Fine. One hit. That's this old man's final offer."

"…You might as well tell him to make his last will. At this point, it seems like you just want to kill him."

Jeok Cheongang frowned at my quiet objection.

"You're too soft. Sometimes you have to squeeze a man to get even one more word out of him."

"Look at him. You couldn't squeeze a drop of broth out of him now."

I wasn't exaggerating. Ma Junggeol looked as if half his soul had left his body.

Think about it.

Ten years was easy to say. But he'd had to recall, in detail and without a wink of sleep, everything that had happened over a span long enough for mountains and rivers to change. No wonder he'd turned into a half-dried squid in just over a day.

“P-please believe me. I really told you everything. I didn’t leave a thing out.”

Ma Junggeol pleaded with tears in his eyes, and his six sworn brothers opened their mouths to back him up.

Or rather, they started to.

“What Eldest Brother said is righ—”

“Shut your mouths before I beat you. Especially you.”

The short one Jeok Cheongang had singled out froze.

“M-me?”

“Yes, you. Chatter like that one more time and you’re dead. Do you have to chime in after every sentence, you little brat?”

The short one clamped his mouth shut. Watching from beside him, the bulbous-nosed one murmured with delight.

“Finally…”

Finally what?

None of these men seemed quite right in the head, but one thing was clear.

“Mujin.”

Hyuk Mujin understood what I meant and clicked his tongue. The other members reacted much the same way, apart from Sama Pyo and Taishan, who’d joined us the day before along with the Black Dragon Demon Gate.

“Tsk. Is this really okay? It doesn’t sit right with me.”

“Benefactor—no, Young Master Jin—no, Pavilion Master.”

“I think we should at least tie them up.”

“I see it differently—damn it, this miserable saddle!”

Unlike Taishan’s shoulders, which were as comfortable as a cushioned seat, Namho was perched on a saddle that bounced violently beneath him. Grimacing at the pain in his backside, he continued:

“We should follow the Pavilion Master’s orders. That’s the right call. Besides, do you think those men would dare try anything, tied up or not?”

“I suppose not.”

Hyuk Mujin nodded in agreement. Ju Hwaran and Song Ilseom then let go of the reins they’d each been holding.

Not their own reins, of course. They belonged to the Seven Masters of Baekma Bang, who had been riding close beside them, hemmed in on all sides.

“Thank you for trusting us.”

“I’m not completely trusting you yet, so there’s no need to thank me.”

That was what I told Ma Junggeol, whose eyes had filled with tears again. Privately, though, I thought otherwise.

No matter how I look at it, they’re not spies sent by Dark Heaven.

When I first overheard their Sound Transmission, the suspicions I'd set aside had come rushing back.

At first, anyway.

Now that I'd heard Ma Junggeol's whole story, those suspicions had given way to curiosity about someone else.

The mysterious master Ma Junggeol and his sworn brothers revered as Great Sir.

—What do you think?

Jeok Cheongang's low Sound Transmission reached my ear. I knew what he was asking, so I turned my gaze toward the road ahead and answered.

—I'm not sure.

—Are you holding back? Or…

—I really don't know. The man they call Great Sir seems less suspicious than… strange. Unbelievably strange.

That was no exaggeration.

This mysterious Supreme Peak master had appeared out of nowhere one day and wiped out a band of mounted bandits beyond even the authorities' control. Yet Great Sir himself remained shrouded in mystery.

They said they didn't know his name, where he came from, or anything else about him.

The Seven Masters of Baekma Bang had served him for more than ten years. Yet none of them, Ma Junggeol included, knew who he was. Whenever we pressed them, their answers were much the same.

"No, it's all true. That's just what he's like!"

"We wouldn't dare lie to you. Please believe us."

"You heard us talking, so you already know he's a bit—no, more than a bit—all over the place. His name and age? Don't even ask. They change every time. Isn't that right, Youngest?"

"My brothers are right. Chilbok, Gaettong… Was it three years ago? He thought he was a seventeen-year-old girl named Sohyang. That's when we gave up trying to make sense of it."

"We don't know when he started living in Ningxia Province, either. He just suddenly appeared, subdued the whole area with his absurd divine might, then shut himself away in his residence and wouldn't budge. He's been like that for nearly ten years. I know it's hard to believe, but it's true."

The absurd stories kept coming, like sweet potato vines that refused to end no matter how many you pulled up. Listening to them, I couldn't help wondering:

What the hell is that guy?

Everyone had their own ambitions.

Right or wrong, everyone had some goal they'd held in their heart at least once.

But Great Sir, as they described him, fit none of the possibilities.

He hadn't taken over Ningxia and ruled it as a mighty conqueror. Nor did he sound like a notorious fiend hiding his identity on the frontier, or a hermit master wandering where no one would find him as his life drew to a close.

If he wanted to rule as a conqueror, there'd be no reason to hole up in a cave. If he were a fiend, he'd have tried his damnedest to keep his identity hidden—or from the start, he'd have put the mounted bandits under his command.

As for a hermit master, I hardly needed to think about it.

What kind of deranged hermit would pass up a remote mountain valley with beautiful scenery and clear water to settle on a frontier where fine dust hung in the air and yellow sand blew through all year?

Even an ignoramus like me knew the famous poet Paul Valéry.[3638] If he'd lived in Ningxia Province instead of France, he would've written, The yellow dust is blowing. Fuck, I want to die.

And it wasn't as if he were some senile old man, or someone so close to death that finding a mountain valley wasn't worth the trouble.

According to the Seven Masters, Great Sir washed so rarely that grime practically ran off him. Even so, what they could make out of his face and hear in his voice suggested a man around middle age.

When Ma Junggeol and his sworn brothers brought him liquor and food, he sometimes gave them a little instruction in return. And though he mostly stayed at his residence, he went out for the occasional stroll.

He said being inside all the time felt stifling. He wanted to smell other people for a change.

He must have wandered around often enough to blend into Ningxia Province without the Seven Masters making any effort to hide who he was.

Like Beggar Number One.

This is a hermit master?

Was this what it felt like to sink into a deep mire?

The more I thought about him, the more baffled and curious I became. Then Jeok Cheongang moved his lips, apparently thinking much the same thing.

—I thought I'd lived long enough to see hundreds of cartloads of madmen… but I've never seen anyone like this.

—Your hair's only just started growing back.

—…Do you want to die?

—No. But I agree with you, Old Master. I can't make sense of him.

—Could he be one of the Lord of Heaven's minions?

[3638] Paul Valéry's poem The Graveyard by the Sea includes the line commonly translated as "The wind is rising! We must try to live!"

—The Lord of Heaven must have people left working for him. But if you were him, would you take someone like that on?

Jeok Cheongang answered without hesitation.

—Are you mad?

—Exactly.

—Even if I took a Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist to the head, I wouldn't take a man like that as a subordinate. Assuming everything those vicious-looking bastards told us is true, of course.

—But you already believe them.

—That's…

His Sound Transmission trailed off as he turned his head. The instant the Seven Masters met his gaze, they went rigid as statues. Jeok Cheongang shook his head.

—Yes, you're right. I can tell they aren't lying. No—they aren't even capable of it.

That much was plain to me, and probably to everyone else.

But even if we concluded that the Seven Masters and Great Sir posed no danger to our side, the two of us couldn't decide everything on instinct alone.

—What will you do?

Jeok Cheongang's Sound Transmission reached me again. After a moment's thought, I made my decision. I gradually eased up on the reins and drew level with the Seven Masters of Baekma Bang.

"W-why now? What is it this time…?"

Ma Junggeol and his sworn brothers were frightened before I'd said a word.

I studied them in silence, then asked, "How long would you need?"

"What do you mean…?"

"To bring the man you call Great Sir to where we're headed."

"…!"

Chapter 1013

"G-Great Sir?"

Ma Junggeol and his sworn brothers stared at me, eyes wide. It took them a moment to recover.

"No, why Great Sir all of a sudden…?"

I answered calmly.

"It's not all of a sudden. He's connected to this situation to some extent. And I'm sure you know why I'm asking, so I don't need to spell it out, do I?"

"You suspect me… no, us of being Dark Heaven's spies?"

"Not exactly. At least, not the people here."

"Then you suspect Great Sir?"

I shrugged. Ma Junggeol and the rest of the Seven Masters of Baekma Bang went rigid.

"That's ridiculous!"

"Damn it, how many times do we have to tell you he isn't?"

"As our Chief already told you, Great Sir is absolutely not that kind of person. You heard it all for yourself, didn't you?"

Of course I had.

I'd learned only that he was a highly unusual person—the kind you rarely came across.

But this wasn't the time to think, Huh. People like that exist, and let it go.

"Hah! I'll stake my neck on it if I have to!"

I scratched my chin and looked at the short man who'd shouted a beat late.

"You over there. You'll stake your own neck?"

"…Huh?"

Apparently he hadn't expected me to take him up on it. He flinched and worked his lips.

"I-I mean, my neck might be a bit much. Maybe my wrist…"

"A man's word is worth a thousand pieces of gold! Of course he'll stake it! Cut off Second Brother's head!"

"Hey, you crazy bastard!"

While the shorty flailed at the bulbous-nosed man's sudden offer to wager on his behalf, I spoke in a low, measured voice.

"Wrist or neck, the math doesn't work out either way."

"What do you mean…?"

"I'm asking because I'm curious. Do you think all these people are taking a casual trip to the next town over just because they're bored?"

"…!"

The mood turned heavy in an instant. Their wavering eyes were fixed on the backs of the countless people riding far ahead.

The Black Dragon Demon Gate. The Zhongnan Sect.

Martial artists from large and small sects throughout Gansu Murim.

And finally, me and the members of the Fire Dragon Pavilion.

That wasn't all. In the direction those thousands of men and horses were racing lay tens of thousands of our allies, who could be in danger at any moment.

Even if all seven of them staked their lives, not just the short man, those lives couldn't be weighed against what was at stake.

"Am I the only one here who's heard that war isn't a gamble?"

I'd said it almost to myself, but neither Ma Junggeol nor anyone else dared answer.

Of course they didn't.

They knew how absurd it would be to dismiss every suspicion about a mysterious Supreme Peak master on the word of a few horse-caravan men.

The Great War that would decide the fate of the world was still underway. War was no gamble.

Besides…

There's good reason to be suspicious. This isn't paranoia.

I looked Ma Junggeol straight in the eye, recalling the Sound Transmissions the Seven Masters had exchanged the day before.

"I heard something interesting in your Sound Transmissions. What do you make of that?"

"Something interesting? What…?"

"I heard you say Great Sir had told you a thing or two about which way to go. Quite recently, too."

I put particular emphasis on the last part. Ma Junggeol's eyes, already lowered with worry, visibly wavered.

"T-that…"

"Now I'm curious. Exactly how recently was it? And what did he tell you? Don't you think?"

I turned to Jeok Cheongang, who had been watching. He nodded.

"Hearing you say that, this old man is curious too. Why did you keep something so important to yourselves until now?"

Looking back, it was more than enough to make anyone suspicious.

How had the Seven Masters of Baekma Bang—former mounted bandits, unremarkable wanderers who had never distinguished themselves—come up with the audacious idea of crossing the desert of the Land of Ruin?

I'd only watched them up close for a short time, but I remembered every word of their Sound Transmissions. I already had a guess.

"The idea of opening a new trade route west wasn't yours to begin with. Am I wrong?"

"…!"

"…!"

If I hadn't followed Namho's advice the day before and moved back early, quite a few people might have been startled by what I'd just said.

But for a little over thirty meters[3639] around us, there was no one else. Ma Junggeol had only one choice left.

"…There's nothing more to hide."

The words slipped out after a heavy silence. They were as good as an admission.

Before his sworn brothers could hurriedly shout something, I raised a hand to silence them and calmly continued my questions.

"Why did you hide it?"

"Because Great Sir wouldn't have wanted us to tell anyone. Thanks to him, we changed our ways and have lived well ever since. We're not beasts. How could we go around talking openly about what he'd done?"

"Tell me more."

"This wasn't the first time. From more than ten years ago right up until today, Great Sir has given my younger brothers and me all kinds of advice. When we first met him, we were so overwhelmed by his divine might that we asked to become his subordinates. He refused us outright and said…"

Ma Junggeol slowly looked over his sworn brothers and their complicated expressions before continuing.

"A caterpillar ought to eat pine needles. He asked whether we wouldn't be better off gathering mounted bandits like ourselves, men who could still change their ways, and forming a group of our own. So my brothers and I took his advice."

"Baekma Bang…"

"That's right. That was how Baekma Bang began. Whenever we ran into trouble after that, Great Sir showed us the right way forward. The new trade route was no different."

"Then when you said you'd been considering a western trade route for years, was that…"

Ma Junggeol understood what I was asking and hurriedly waved his hands.

"I don't know if you'll believe me in a situation like this, but that part is absolutely true. Great Sir simply advised us to do it. Afterward, we started searching for a [3639] A little over thirty meters is a little over 100 ft. The Korean uses ten-odd jang; one jang is approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

new route west and realized the grasslands were our only option. Of course, we hadn't dared attempt it all that time."

"And that's how you noticed the opening in the western grasslands so quickly," Jeok Cheongang muttered.

Ma Junggeol nodded.

"Yes. Of course, we had no idea things would take such an unexpected turn. Great Sir probably didn't either."

Naturally.

Even if Hong Dao, the Dharma King who could read the heavenly patterns, were still alive, how could he have predicted something years in the future in such detail?

That wouldn't be reading the heavenly patterns. That'd be prophecy. Prophecy.

And as Ma Junggeol went on, Great Sir's advice didn't sound particularly extraordinary.

He'd started by helping a few good-hearted mounted bandits, who had nowhere to go and had never farmed a day in their lives, put their skills to use and establish Baekma Bang.

A new trade route beyond the desert?

It was a bold idea, not one an ordinary person would come up with easily. But from what I'd heard of his martial prowess and his past, Great Sir was far from ordinary.

It was also the kind of wish the heads of the great groups bordering the desert or ambitious merchant-house leaders might have entertained at least once.

But what was this strange feeling I couldn't explain?

What the hell?

I shook my head to clear away my stray thoughts, then parted my lips, which had been closed for a while, toward Ma Junggeol, who was swallowing nervously.

"One last question. Whose idea was it to come find us?"

"I'm ashamed to say that was Great Sir's advice too."

"Thought so."

"We could have arrived half a day sooner. But this was too serious for us to decide on our own, so we went to see Great Sir as soon as we entered Ningxia."

"Go on."

"We told him what happened on the grasslands and in the desert. He knocked back several bowls of liquor as though he were listening to a dog bark, then said, 'You idiots should've gone to Gansu ages ago. Why are you still sitting on your asses here?'"

"…!"

"And after that, well, here we are. Damn it."

Ma Junggeol fell silent, looking half resigned. For a while, the only sounds were the horses' rough breathing and the thunder of hooves. The bulbous-nosed man glanced around and cautiously spoke up.

"Seven days and nights. I think that should be enough."

"What the hell are you talking about?" Jeok Cheongang asked with a frown.

The man panicked and pointed at me.

"Y-your Disciple asked us earlier how long it would take to bring Great Sir back. I was answering him."

The first time is hard. After that, it gets easier.

Ma Junggeol's sworn brothers, who had been moving their lips without speaking, finally chimed in.

"Third Brother's right for once. Seven days and nights will be plenty."

"Just leave it to us. We'll bring him back, even if we have to give it everything we've got."

"W-well, it'd take seven days and nights if we're going to the Qilian Mountains. It might take longer if it's the Great Snow Mountain or Dunhuang."

"It's not as if Great Sir is some vicious fiend. Rather than stay shut away in that remote backwater, he could take this chance to serve the Murim Alliance. Don't you think?"

"Hah! 'Not a bad idea,' you say? He's already done a great service by sending the seven of us to warn you about Dark Heaven. It's bound to be an excellent choice for Great Sir too, since…"

Whoosh! Smack!

"Gah!"

"You little shit! I told you to stop shouting 'Hah!' Did my words go in one ear and out the other?"

Jeok Cheongang moved like a ghost, kicked off the saddle, soared through the air, and smacked the shorty on the back of the head. Then he returned and turned to me.

"So? What will you do?"

I slowly swept my gaze across the Seven Masters of Baekma Bang and answered.

"Six days. No—five."

"What?"

"Five days. Whether this march stops at the Qilian Mountains, the Great Snow Mountain, or Dunhuang, you'll be back by then."

"…!"

"One of you stays behind, no matter what. I don't think I need to say who."

"W-wait. You mean our Chief…!"

The Seven Masters of Baekma Bang began to object all at once, having realized what my words meant. Then Ma Junggeol suddenly spoke.

“Fine.”

“Chief!”

“I can stay here. The rest of you, bring Great Sir back as quickly as you can. Go!”

Perhaps they sensed something in his firm manner. They worked their lips as though they wanted to argue, but at my quiet nod, they hurriedly turned their horses and left the formation.

Thud-thud-thud!

Ma Junggeol watched the six grassland horses disappear into the darkness, a deep look in his eyes.

And though his face was resolute, his barely moving lips held the words he couldn’t bring himself to say aloud.

“Fuck. I’m so fucking screwed…”

“…”

“…”

What the hell is with this guy?

Jeok Cheongang and I stared at him in disbelief. His eyes had grown damp.

Then Namho rode up, performing what looked like acrobatics on his bouncing saddle.

“I need to talk to you. Have you got a minute?”

I meant to report what we’d learned to the command staff right away, so I was about to shake my head.

Then Namho lowered his voice and whispered in my ear.

“It’s important. And I can only tell you now.”

Chapter 1014

Thud-thud-thud!

Thousands of men and horses raced across the vast plain. At their head, the martial artists of the Black Dragon Demon Gate served as both vanguard and guides.

Some, though, were busier stealing curious glances at someone riding far off to the side.

“I’d only heard about him, but he’s much younger than I expected. He doesn’t look much older than me.”

“They said he was around thirty, so that makes sense. Still, you can’t mistake the family resemblance. He’s the spitting image of the Sect Leader.”

“The Black Dragon Saber… What a killer sobriquet. So, is that rumor true?”

Was he barely twenty? The young man still had the down on his cheeks, and the middle-aged man frowned at his out-of-the-blue question.

“What rumor are you talking about? You know I’m just as clueless about the inner workings as you are, so you’re not asking because you think I’d know.”

At the older man’s open displeasure, the young one hurriedly waved his hands.

“It’s nothing. I just heard our Young Sect Leader is stronger than the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes of the Central Plains.”

“Who knows? I’ve never even seen the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes.”

“Right. The Ten Dragons and Phoenixes.”

“What?”

“I didn’t mean you’d necessarily met the Young Sect Leader, Uncle.”

The middle-aged man glared at the young one as he slyly looked away, then shook his head.

“I don’t know which idiot’s been running his mouth, but don’t believe it. It’s all ridiculous bullshit.”

“Bullshit?”

“Yeah.”

“That’s strange. You told me yourself last time, Uncle. When you were dead drunk.”

“…!”

“So it’s true, then? Five years ago, the man who single-handedly wiped out One Saber Cuts the Cliff, the former chief of Danhyeol Bang, and twenty of his men…”

“That’s enough. Don’t say another word.”

The middle-aged man’s firm voice cut him off, but the young man couldn’t take his awestruck eyes off the person he’d been watching.

The Black Dragon Saber, Sama Pyo.

He was the Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate, to which they both belonged, and the heir who would one day succeed the Black Night King, Sima Gong, as leader of the unorthodox Murim.

The young man's martial uniform was still stiff and new, a sure sign he hadn't been with the Black Dragon Demon Gate long. He couldn't hide his amazement.

So the whole story was true.

Everyone knew of the bloodshed at Danhyeol Bang, once one of the powers of Gansu Murim.

Its chief, One Saber Cuts the Cliff, had been one of Gansu's ten greatest saber masters. He and his closest men had all been found brutally murdered on the same day.

And after that?

What was there to say?

A body without a head was bound to fall. Especially in Gansu, which the Black Dragon Demon Gate's influence had made the de facto headquarters of the unorthodox Murim.

Danhyeol Bang, once three hundred members strong, had collapsed. Five years later, it had faded from people's minds.

No. No one had bothered to remember.

Not the minor dispute between Danhyeol Bang and the Black Dragon Demon Gate shortly before the massacre.

Not that, on the day the mysterious killer came, the Captain of the Guards—who should have been protecting the pleasure house where the chief and leaders of Danhyeol Bang had gathered to drink—had left with his men.

And not how that same Captain of the Guards had become the Black Dragon Demon Gate's Outer Hall Master less than a month later.

It had all been forgotten. It had to be.

The identity of the killer skilled enough to slay one of Gansu's ten greatest saber masters, the background of whoever had ordered the killing, and even where all of Danhyeol Bang's property and farmland had gone.

But the forgetting was only on the surface. The unorthodox martial artists who knew what had happened were certain.

And they were in awe.

Just like the young man who, as an unorthodox martial artist himself, now looked at Sama Pyo with admiration.

"That's really, really incredible. Don't you think? No wonder he became the heir over his older half-brothers—"

The young man caught his breath.

Reflected in his trembling eyes was the middle-aged man, face twisted as he gripped his sword hilt.

“You really do have a death wish, don’t you?”

His voice was so low that even the young man riding beside him would have missed it if he hadn’t been listening closely.

But the killing intent in it seemed to squeeze the raw novice’s heart.

“W-why all of a sudden…?”

“Shut your mouth if you want to live even a few more days.”

The older man cut off his stammering and quickly scanned their surroundings.

Perhaps the vast plain had spared them. There was plenty of distance between the riders, and the thunder of thousands of hooves and the fierce wind swallowed their conversation before anyone else could hear it.

“You idiot.”

“U-Uncle.”

“I won’t say it twice. Keep your mouth shut if you want to live.”

“I-I understand.”

Leaving the trembling young man behind, the middle-aged man urged his horse faster. His expression stayed cold, but inwardly he sighed.

The kid probably had no idea how careless and stupid a mistake he’d just made. If those words—practically taboo within the Black Dragon Demon Gate—had passed from mouth to ear and reached the higher-ups, they would have cost him his life.

Maybe he’ll never know.

It takes time for a person to mature. But war can arrive without warning, and enemies can steal that time before it runs its course.

The middle-aged man’s gaze grew distant as he thought of the battle to come. Then he flinched.

What was that?

An inexplicable sense of déjà vu seized him for an instant. He hurriedly looked around, but couldn’t place the feeling. At last he turned his attention back to his duty.

He never realized that two pairs of eyes had swept over him from more than thirty yards away.

“Hyah!”

Prrr, prrr.

His fine horse raced on, breathing hard. The young man finally came to his senses and hurried after him, his face deathly pale.

“W-wait for me!”

One person speaking alone was just talking. Ten voices became a shout; more than a hundred, a roar.

Yet even as three thousand men and horses raced in the same direction, father and son could hear each other clearly.

“There are a lot of faces I don’t recognize.”

“That’s how things turned out.”

“And a few who look useful, too.”

“Even in mud scraped together in a hurry, you can find a pearl or two. Though they can crack over the smallest thing.”

The son knew what his father meant by that last remark and fell silent. His father noticed.

As he always did.

“Are those people bothering you?”

At the Black Night King Sima Gong’s quiet question, Sama Pyo kept his eyes on the road ahead.

“I don’t know what you mean.”

“Seeing the sights of the Central Plains seems to have made you fond of word games.”

“There wasn’t much worth seeing. Maybe I was cursed with bad luck, but everywhere I went, I found a sea of corpses and blood. Though I’m sure you already knew that.”

“Yes, I heard the reports. But the messenger pigeons stopped returning one day. Some mishap along the way, perhaps. I had to look into matters myself, and the distance made it hard to get information in time. The Inner Hall Master had quite a time of it.”

“It couldn’t be helped. Yunnan wasn’t a good place to send messages back and forth.”

“I’m not scolding you. Your father knows what happened at the Nanman Beast Palace. But…”

Sama Pyo listened in silence, hoping his father’s next words would be the ones he wanted to hear.

They weren’t.

As always.

“Why didn’t you send a missive after that?”

“A missive…?”

“Yes. I understand you had several chances after leaving Yunnan. In the Imperial Capital, and at the Jin Family of Taiyuan. Am I wrong?”

What was he supposed to say?

His mouth felt gritty, as if he'd chewed a fistful of sand. The wind battered his body as he answered.

"You're half right and half wrong."

"What?"

"In the Imperial Capital, I had to hide my identity and even disguise myself to avoid being watched. The journey there wasn't smooth, either. And once we entered the Imperial Palace, things only got worse."

Sima Gong studied his son's profile as though searching for the tiniest crack.

"Go on."

"Things didn't improve immediately after the incident at the Imperial Palace. We had to stay there a while, then head straight for Shanxi without proper rest."

"Unlike at the Imperial Palace, you suffered no injuries of note in Shanxi, as I understand it. Am I mistaken?"

"You're right. That's when I was finally able to receive the missive from our sect."

"Then you saw the order."

"Yes. I saw it. I'm certain."

At the answer, given without a hint of hesitation, Sima Gong's gaze grew darker.

"The Fire King and his Disciple were to go to Qinghai, not here. Was that what the order said?"

"It was."

"It said our sect was in danger, and that you, at least, were to return to Gansu by any means necessary. Is that right?"

"Exactly."

"Then, lastly—do you have a proper reason or justification for seeing my seal and still not carrying out the order?"

Sama Pyo turned and looked his father straight in the eye.

"No."

"…!"

"I won't make excuses. I won't give you any reason. I failed to carry out the order properly, so I'll accept whatever punishment I deserve. Please forgive me."

Sima Gong fell silent, taken aback by his son's response. Then a low laugh broke the brief silence between them.

"Ha. Hahaha."

None of the men surrounding father and son like guards reacted. They were all Peak masters, Sima Gong's loyal hands and feet, but in their lord's presence they might as well have been blind and deaf.

Sama Pyo was different.

He watched his father calmly until the laughter stopped and a voice took its place.

"Pyo. My son."

The voice was soft as silk. His eyes were sharp as blades.

“If you dared to lie to my face—if you did…”

His words faded unfinished, and his eyes curved into crescents.

“Only today do I realize how right I was to send you to the Central Plains.”

Pat. Pat.

Perhaps it was the wind sweeping across the plain that made his touch feel so cold. Sima Gong patted his son’s shoulder, looking pleased.

“You’ve grown. Admirably so.”

He turned his horse and rode away. Sama Pyo watched him go in silence.

“Take care of those two from a moment ago.”

With a single sentence, Sima Gong had decided the fate of two nameless martial artists for a careless remark spoken only briefly. Sama Pyo kept watching until his father disappeared from view.

Then Taishan came over—an old friend who had been as steady as the mountain he was named for since childhood—and asked in a trembling voice, “M-my lord. Are you all right?”

“Yes. I’m fine,” Sama Pyo answered calmly.

It was strange.

They were riding across an immense plain. Why, then, did his chest feel so tight?

And why did a few faces pass through his mind beneath the gray sky spread over them all?

But Sama Pyo didn’t turn his horse around.

The place he belonged now was the Black Dragon Demon Gate, not the Fire Dragon Pavilion.

Chapter 1015

Our force numbered a staggering three thousand, but every last one of them was a martial artist, so we moved far faster than common sense would suggest.

Only two days after leaving Tianshui, on Gansu's eastern edge, we had already passed Lanzhou, the provincial capital, and were pressing on without slowing down.

It must have been around then that the bitterly cold plateau and vast wilderness gave way to a narrow road lined on both sides by rocky hills of every size.

This place…

Sometimes, when I left the modern world behind and roamed the Murim, I found myself stopped short by nature's grandeur. Places untouched by human hands, holding the passage of countless ages within them.

I let go of my reins and gazed in silence at the endless view below the plateau. A soft voice reached my ear.

"This is the Hexi Corridor. It's called that because it runs west of the Yellow River like a corridor. I don't know who first named it, but doesn't it suit the place?"

I agreed, but that aside, the voice was easy to recognize. It would have been even if Sama Pyo and Taishan hadn't been away.

There was only one person around me with a voice that fresh and clear.

"You certainly know your stuff, Young Lady Ju."

Ju Hwaran gave a shy smile.

"It's only natural. I did lead the Escort Bureau for a while, even if it wasn't very long. And I am the Escort King's granddaughter, after all."

She had a point, but she was being modest, too.

Being born into a martial family didn't mean you had to learn martial arts. Likewise, Ju Hwaran hadn't been obliged to take over the family business. She knew the geography of the Central Plains and so much else through her own effort.

Come to think of it, the Yongbong Escort Bureau wasn't in a situation all that different from the Jin Family of Taiyuan's at first.

Both families had left their former glory behind and begun to fall into ruin.

One small difference was that, unlike the Jin Family of Taiyuan, which had three sons and a whole lot of testosterone, Ju Hwaran was an only child—and had to bear that much heavier burden alone.

Though her father, the Head of the Escort Bureau, was still there, unlike mine, even if he was bedridden.

But that was all in the past.

The Head of the Yongbong Escort Bureau had recovered his vitality and returned to the front lines. And the huge sum of gold I'd beaten out of the Taeeul Merciless Sword in return had been more than enough to pull the crumbling family back onto its feet.

And the Jin Family of Taiyuan had risen into the ranks of the Five Great Families, filling the void left by the Murong Family—or rather, the Murong household.

If Dark Heaven didn't exist, we could've wrapped things up here with a happy ending for everyone.

But reality wasn't something you could ignore. You had to face it, and opportunity always came in the midst of crisis.

That was how Ju Hwaran and the Yongbong Escort Bureau, and I and the Jin Family of Taiyuan, had overcome their crises and grown stronger.

It was only the many sacrifices we'd made along the way—and the fact that more would inevitably come—that weighed heavily on my heart.

And besides…

No. Not right now. I'll leave it there for the moment.

I pushed away the memory of Namho coming to me just yesterday, his face unusually grave. I pushed away his low voice, too, though it still seemed to linger in my ears.

Ju Hwaran was watching me with concern. I forced a smile as if nothing were wrong.

"Ah, sorry. I was just… just thinking about something."

"It's all right. I understand. The coming battle must be weighing on you."

What was I supposed to say? I couldn't tell her something I wasn't even certain of myself.

I watched her profile as she rode beside me, then spoke almost on impulse.

"That's part of it. But I've also been thinking about relationships."

"Relationships?"

"Between people. Trust, hopes. Things like that."

I looked toward the narrow pass between the distant rocky hills, where thousands of our allies were pouring through like a flood.

"Nothing's easy, I suppose, but I find this especially hard. The connections and feelings between people."

"How they feel…"

Ju Hwaran murmured the words to herself, then added quietly, "I think I understand."

"I thought you might, Young Lady Ju."

She'd been through it herself. How could she not?

I still remembered it clearly: during the conflict with the Zhongnan Sect, Ju Hwaran had personally cut down Chief Escort Heo Jun, who had betrayed her from the shadows.

She once followed him like a real uncle. The wound from that must still be with her.

That was why relationships were so difficult.

You could readily give someone something, but no one knew whether they'd give as much in return, more—or nothing at all.

That's why I'm hesitating so much, too.

Then Ju Hwaran blurted out something that swept the doubts creeping back into my mind clean away.

"It's Wolhwa, isn't it?"

"Y-yes?"

I'd almost agreed without thinking. I blinked at her.

What? Had I heard her wrong?

"Um, sorry, what did you just say?"

Without turning her head, Ju Hwaran answered, "The woman named Wolhwa. The Lower District Sect's Branch Leader in Shaanxi. Isn't she?"

"Yes. That's right."

"Exactly."

"No, I meant that she's the Branch Leader in Shaanxi."

"Oh, really?"

"Yes."

"And?"

"Pardon?"

"Never mind."

What on earth was this conversation?

I stared at her, speechless. Then a violent fit of coughing cut through the pounding hooves.

"Cough! Cough! Couuugh!"

What was that idiot doing now?

I turned to say something to Hyuk Mujin, who was practically convulsing in his saddle, and saw him desperately shaking his head. Namho and Song Ilseom rode on either side of him, looking at me with pity.

A suspicion struck me.

Hmm.

Hmmm.

Was this… what I thought it was?

This isn't exactly the best time for something like this.

Still, I had to clear up a needless misunderstanding.

Feeling a little strange, I spoke.

“Um, Young Lady Ju?”

“Yes. Go ahead.”

She kept her eyes fixed straight ahead, as if she’d spotted her family’s sworn enemy up the road. Her ears, meanwhile, had perked up.

I scratched my chin, though it didn’t itch.

“Well, this isn’t something you’re particularly curious about, but I thought I’d mention it.”

“That’s right. I’m not particularly curious, but I’ll hear you out.”

“I’m not very close with Wolhwa.”

“…”

“We did have some dealings, sure. Just a year or two ago, she was the Branch Leader in Shanxi, not Shaanxi. The Lower District Sect and I had various mutual dealings, so we got to know each other a little.”

After a brief silence, Ju Hwaran spoke.

“You talk about her awfully casually for someone you’re not close to. You even call her by her name.”

“You’ve got the wrong idea. I only call her that because she isn’t here. Face-to-face, I’d address her properly every time.”

“I see. So you sometimes exchange heartfelt missives like this one, too?”

“Missives?”

I blinked. Only then did I begin to understand why she’d brought up Wolhwa.

The missive the Lower District Sect member who’d guided us to Gansu had given me. The one sent in Wolhwa’s name.

“Was that why?”

“Why what?”

“That’s, well…”

How was I supposed to put this? Was it even a good idea to say what I was thinking?

While I hesitated, Ju Hwaran finally turned and looked me straight in the eye.

“Can I ask what was written in that missive?”

Strange.

Our saddles jolted with every pounding hoof, and the wind whipped past us. Yet her voice reached me more clearly than anything else, though it was barely half as loud as usual.

Maybe that was why I stared at her for a moment, then answered before I knew it.

“No.”

"Ah."

Her expression dimmed slightly, and she fell silent. I went on.

"I can't tell you what's in it. I haven't read it yet."

"…!"

"With everything going on, I'd forgotten about it. Want to read it together now?"

I didn't need an answer. Her beaming smile was enough.

Inventory open. Summon.

As I slipped my hand inside my robe and spoke the command, I felt something solid between my fingers.

I pulled out the bamboo tube the Lower District Sect member had given me a few days earlier, removed the rolled-up missive, and unfolded it in front of Ju Hwaran.

Hesitation? The slightest worry?

Not a trace. Not even a pinch.

Why would I have anything like that? Wolhwa only teases me with wordplay when we meet in person. When it comes to business, she's meticulous.

I had reason to be certain. This wasn't the first time she'd sent me news.

Perhaps because of the agreement with the Jin Family of Taiyuan, I'd received a couple of missives while I was away. They'd contained useful information: the locations of Lower District Sect branches, how to make contact in an emergency, and the latest news from Shanxi or Shaanxi.

Information. Nothing more.

It was the Lower District Sect's Shaanxi Branch Leader looking after a valued client, not Wolhwa writing to me personally.

So I unfolded the missive without a moment's hesitation—and immediately realized something was wrong.

> Young Master Jin, have you been well?
>
> Maybe it's because we haven't seen each other in so long, but I miss you terribly. I missed you so much that you appeared in my dream last night!

Rustle.

I let go on instinct, and the paper rolled back up.

Ju Hwaran had brought her horse close to mine to read along. She spoke in a voice so gentle it felt out of place.

"Could you open it again?"

"…"

"I was reading it."

"…Um, Young Lady Ju?"

"Yes. Go ahead. I'm listening."

I hurriedly opened my mouth, feeling like I had to say something. But her soft reply—and the steady gaze she fixed on me—sent a chill down my spine.

It was as if my body had forgotten I'd gained the power of Unaffected by Cold and Heat long ago.

How am I supposed to explain this?

I felt as though I'd stepped into a deep swamp with no way out. While I struggled to find the words, Ju Hwaran gave a faint smile.

"Never mind. It's fine. You don't have to say anything."

"Y-yes?"

"Don't mind me. Go ahead and finish reading. It sounds like a very deep and important conversation. Well, I'll leave you to it."

"Wait, Young Lady Ju—!"

Thud-thud-thud!

Before I could finish shouting, she urged her horse forward and sped ahead.

I stared after her, then silently unfolded the missive again.

Unlike usual, it was full of trivial personal chatter. And at the very end, it had one line that put the finishing touch on the whole thing.

> Hoping for the day the Yellow River runs clear and we can meet again,[3640]
> Wolhwa

"…"

She really was trying to get me killed.

I stared at the words. Anyone who read them would think we were on very intimate terms.

Hyuk Mujin approached cautiously.

"Um, Captain."

"What."

"I can see the Qilian Mountains."

"Get lost."

"Yes, sir."

God, I want to die.

[3640] The Korean expression evokes the Yellow River running clear—a rare, auspicious event—and uses it to express the hope of meeting again.

Chapter 1016

I'd had a vague sense of it since we first met, but Wolhwa was impossible to figure out.

What on earth possessed her to send me a missive like this out of nowhere?

A Meeting When the Yellow River Runs Clear.[3641]

I didn't know much about classical idioms, but even a rough, literal translation left plenty of room for misunderstanding.

A meeting like the river running clear.

Wasn't that the sort of thing you'd say only to someone you were at least flirting with?

This is going to give the gossip mill a real boost.

Of course, I wasn't delusional enough to get the wrong idea over a single missive.

I'd known for a long time that Wolhwa's interest in me was limited to her being a member of the Lower District Sect. It had absolutely nothing to do with romantic feelings.

But…

The problem is that Young Lady Ju might misunderstand—not me.

I muttered to myself and put the crumpled missive back in my Inventory.

It bothered me a little, but there was nothing I could do about it for now. Time would sort it out eventually, and far more important problems stood in my way.

And at this very moment—

Whoosh.

A cold wind swept across the plateau, and a vast mountain range finally came into view. It was a sign that we'd taken another step toward those problems.

That's…

My eyes widened before I knew it.

Vast. Dazzling.

That was my first impression of the Qilian Mountains.

"I'd only heard about them. But seeing them for real… wow."

Hyuk Mujin murmured, sounding dazed.

But he wasn't the only one. Everyone was staring in wonder, myself included.

Sheer cliffs lined a mountain range that stretched on without end like the body of a dragon. Between them, peaks pierced the clouds, rising so high they seemed to hold up the sky.

And that wasn't all.

[3641] The Yellow River running clear is an exceptionally rare, auspicious event; here, the phrase conveys the hope of meeting again.

Perpetual snow painted the mountains white in places, lending them an air of mystery, as though we'd stepped into another world.

Yet the narrow gorges between the cliffs were long and constricted, like entrances to hell. The mountains were a natural fortress.

This is even more than I'd heard.

The Eight Spring Gorge, which had changed Shanxi's fortunes time and time again, felt like a hill behind the village compared to the Qilian Mountains before us.

But the drawback was just as obvious.

"It's too vast."

At Song Ilseom's brief remark, I nodded quietly.

He was right. The Qilian Mountains weren't merely large. They were immense.

The range stretched for thousands of li[3642], beginning in southwestern Gansu and reaching all the way to Qinghai. Spread a hastily assembled net across all that ground, and it would be torn apart in an instant.

Especially if the big fish we were trying to catch was Dark Heaven.

So, as soon as we entered the Qilian Mountains—which were already surrounded by the Gansu martial artists' tight defenses—the leaders gathered in one place to discuss this problem first.

Or, more precisely, Jeok Cheongang and I did.

"There are too many troops stationed in the rear for what they're meant to do. So, what I'm saying is—"

"Pull them out. All of them."

Jeok Cheongang cut in before I could finish. He picked at his ear, then added, "I had a bad feeling when I heard about it, but seeing the place confirms it. Even if we threw every last man at the Great Snow Mountain and Dunhuang into this, we couldn't seal it off completely. We'd be better off gathering them all and throwing them onto another front."

Jeok Cheongang swept his gaze over the gathering like a landlord telling a troublesome tenant to clear out. Then his eyes came to rest on one man.

"I thought you, at least, would know that much. Was I mistaken?"

The Black Night King, Sima Gong, answered with a gentle smile.

"Thank you for thinking so highly of me. But I, and the Sect Leaders and Family Heads gathered here, know the Gansu region better than anyone. The Qilian Mountains included, of course."

"Know it better than anyone…"

Jeok Cheongang repeated Sima Gong's words softly, as if turning them over, then spoke in an even voice.

"That sounds like you're telling me to shut up if I don't know enough."

[3642] A Chinese li is 500 m (0.311 mi).

“How could we dare show such disrespect to you, Senior Jeok, of all people? Please take back your words.”

“Please calm yourself, Great Hero Jeok.”

“We reached this decision only after thorough discussion.”

After Sima Gong’s smooth apology, the Sect Leaders and Family Heads of Gansu Murim, who’d been watching for a cue, clasped their hands in salute one after another.

Like lackeys following their boss.

And that was when, as I silently watched the scene before me, I noticed the only one among them holding his back straight.

Sama Pyo.

Our eyes met for a moment. He wore that same unreadable expression of his. Then Sama Pyo quietly lowered his head too, following his father’s lead.

Swish.

Perhaps it was the sudden silence that made the brush of clothing sound so loud.

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord spoke.

“It is difficult for this poor Daoist to judge. Everyone here is a leader of Gansu Murim, and I would like to believe you have made the right decision. But… I also think Great Hero Jeok’s concern is entirely possible.”

“More than possible. I’d say there’s a nine-in-ten chance he’s right.”

Everyone turned to look at me. I went on without the slightest embarrassment.

“Even with thirty thousand allied troops and several thousand more, splitting them up to maintain three fronts means we won’t be worth a damn anywhere. There’s a reason people say you live if you stick together and die if you scatter.”

“Thank you for reminding us all of the most basic principle, which everyone here had somehow forgotten.”

The Roaring Fury Swordsman let out a short, derisive laugh. I shrugged at him.

“You don’t have to thank me that much. People forget things now and then when they get old. Though this one’s pretty basic.”

“…!”

“Oh, sorry. Was that too cheeky?”

I hadn’t said it to get under his skin. I meant it.

Seeing the Roaring Fury Swordsman’s face turn red, I realized I might’ve gone too far—but what could I do when the words came out on their own?

Well, we were all in the same boat now. He’d understand.

Or not.

“You—no, you…”

Maybe the cheek of a young punk talking back had made his blood boil. The Roaring Fury Swordsman glanced at Jeok Cheongang, and seemed to be starting to hyperventilate. Someone else stepped in for him.

“Stick together and live, scatter and die. True enough. But not in a situation like this.”

I guess that was what fellow disciples were for.

I looked straight at the Taeeul Merciless Sword, who’d stepped in at just the right moment.

“What do you mean by ‘a situation like this’?”

“Are you asking because you don’t know, or are you pretending not to?”

The Taeeul Merciless Sword frowned.

“You seem to have forgotten what monstrous dark arts they wield.”

Nobody here failed to understand what the Taeeul Merciless Sword meant. I certainly hadn’t.

“The Moving Formation. Right. They have that.”

I nodded, then spoke again, as calmly as if nothing were wrong.

“So?”

“What!”

“What did you say?”

The questions came from all sides at once.

But I’d expected that reaction. Otherwise, I wouldn’t have brought it up.

“On the way here, I thought of something I wanted to ask…”

I let the words trail off and slowly looked around the gathering.

“If you’re so wary of the Moving Formation, why did you station an army of over thirty thousand in the front in the first place?”

“…!”

Silence pressed down on us.

It didn’t lift until someone, who’d been watching the situation with calm eyes, suddenly spoke.

“For the greater good.”

The Black Night King, Sima Gong. Him again.

Speaking on everyone’s behalf, Sima Gong continued in a low, steady voice.

“What you said earlier was right. If we spread ourselves out carelessly, we’ll accomplish nothing. So we put our heads together and considered it carefully, and this is the conclusion we reached: divide our forces among three fronts, so they can return to the rear at any time.”

At first glance, it sounded reasonable.

It was the same argument they’d made when the leaders first gathered.

But…

That was only true, as I'd just said, at first glance.

"It seems like a long way to go back. If Dark Heaven appears in the rear through the Moving Formation, how are we supposed to catch up with them?"

If tens of thousands of locusts descended on a field, it wouldn't take even half a day for everything to disappear.

Dark Heaven was that swarm of locusts.

And their fangs and wings were too savage and fast for us to make up a delay of several days and catch them.

By the time our allies arrived, Gansu would already be laid waste, and Dark Heaven would be heading for the Central Plains.

Did these men really not know that? They'd been fixtures in Gansu for decades, some for more than a century.

Of course they knew.

They had to.

Sima Gong's next words turned my suspicion into certainty.

"That's right. Without a doubt."

"…!"

"…!"

At that brief reply, Jeok Cheongang and I understood what he meant, and our gazes grew intent. But not everyone understood. The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord, for one, was looking at Sima Gong with a puzzled expression.

"Sect Leader Sima. What exactly do you mean by…?"

His words trailed off.

But the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord led the great Zhongnan Sect. Before Sima Gong's reply had faded, a thought occurred to him, and his face stiffened.

"Surely you don't mean to stand by and let it happen? Even if they use the Moving Formation to bypass our lines and ravage the rear?"

Sima Gong answered evenly.

"Stand by and let it happen? Nothing of the sort. We've simply chosen the option with the best chance of victory."

"Wait. Then what happens to the rear? To the common people and martial artists still there?"

"I told you. It's for the greater good."

"Sect Leader Sima!"

Crash!

The chair shattered in an instant.

But even as the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord shouted and sprang to his feet, Sima Gong's voice didn't waver in the slightest.

“If Dark Heaven crosses the desert and attacks us head-on, we’ll immediately concentrate every force there. They might use the Moving Formation to take the rear instead… but that would be the worst move they could make.”

A fish that tore through a net from the outside could come and go as it pleased. But if it passed through the net as if by teleportation, it would find itself trapped inside.

A two-front war.

That was Sima Gong’s plan.

Effective, but it would demand enormous sacrifice.

A truly unorthodox scheme.

But…

Was that all there was to it?

“Whether we defend this place or burn it to the ground is our choice. Neither the Zhongnan Sect nor the Jin Family of Taiyuan owns it.”

Sima Gong’s icy gaze silenced the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord. I watched him, my own gaze sinking deep.

Chapter 1017

Sima Gong and the leaders of Gansu Murim had made their position perfectly clear:

- Don’t go demanding this and that in someone else’s territory.

Honestly, there wasn’t much room to argue with that.

Every one of them was an old fixture who’d ruled Gansu Murim for decades at the very least, and some for more than a century. Besides, ever since the Great Faction War, interfering too much in another sect’s affairs had been taboo.

And then there was the Black Dragon Demon Gate, standing at the center of it all. What kind of place was it?

Despite its relatively short history of only a few decades, it wielded tremendous influence throughout Gansu. It was, without question, a pillar of the unorthodox faction.

At least in Gansu, it stood shoulder to shoulder with the Kongtong Sect, one of the Nine Sects and One Gang. In fact, it might have built an even stronger power base by now—a true regional overlord.

With Sima Gong, the beginning and end of the Black Dragon Demon Gate, speaking so bluntly, even the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord had no choice but to back down after briefly letting his anger show.

But someone else had watched it all without so much as twitching an eyebrow.

“Why are you growling? You sound like a yellow dog whose food bowl’s been taken away.”

There was only one person here who could compare the Black Night King himself to a yellow dog.

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

At last, the giant who’d left his mark on the distant history of Murim parted his lips. The icy gleam in Sima Gong’s eyes settled.

“I suppose I should growl. I’ll do it as much as I must to protect my food bowl.”

“And it never crossed your mind that someone else’s life might depend on that food bowl?”

“It’s for the greater good.”

“You mean your own good. The good of the select few who follow you and the Black Dragon Demon Gate.”

Jeok Cheongang slowly looked around the room.

There were around twenty people here, not counting those from the Zhongnan Sect and the Black Dragon Demon Gate.

As he looked from one leader of Gansu Murim to the next, an unmistakable sneer curled his lips.

“Come to think of it, isn’t it strange? As I understand it, Gansu has at least fifty sects and martial families, yet not even half of them are here. Ah… were the others already sent to different fronts?”

“They’re already carrying out other assignments,” Sima Gong answered dryly.

“So they were left behind. To delay Dark Heaven for even half a day if it uses the Moving Formation to appear in the rear.”

“Everyone agreed to it.”

“And before you got that agreement, did you lay out all the facts? Or did you put a sword to their throats first?”

“With all due respect, there’s something I’d like to say while we’re at it.”

“‘With all due respect’ already puts me in a shitty mood, but I suppose that’s what you’ve got a mouth for. Go on, then. Spit it out.”

Sima Gong let out a short breath at Jeok Cheongang’s continuing barbs. Then, with a calm expression, he spoke.

“We of Gansu Murim will not accept interference from outsiders in this decision, in any form. Even if it comes from the Nine Sects and One Gang or the Five Great Families. Or…”

Sima Gong’s gaze swept past the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord and me, then stopped on Jeok Cheongang.

“Even if it comes from you, Senior.”

“…!”

“…!”

The air around us lurched.

Stiffened hands and feet came standard. The slight bobbing of people’s throats was an added bonus.

Even if it was Sima Gong, who was he speaking to?

Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King himself.

A terrifying old monster said to rank among the top five in the Central Plains when it came to martial arts—and first when it came to a foul temper.

He’d answered Jeok Cheongang in a downright challenging tone. No wonder everyone reacted as if they’d been burned.

Everyone except me.

That’s far enough for today.

I’d been watching events unfold the whole time, and I made up my mind.

Then, at a moment nobody expected, I clapped my hands together hard.

Clap!

The sharp sound broke the silence, short and yet seemingly endless. Everyone turned toward me, startled as if they’d just woken from a dream. I blinked at them with perfect composure.

"Oh, sorry. A damn mosquito was buzzing around."

Of course, I was lying.

With snow that never melted lying all around us, what mosquito?

But the point was that my sudden clap had instantly broken the tension, which had been spiraling toward disaster.

And the two men at the center of it understood why I'd clapped at once.

"You've grown up some. Come a long way."

At last, Jeok Cheongang spoke in a low voice. Sima Gong, as if nothing had happened, respectfully clasped his hands in salute.

"I still have a long way to go. I hope you'll look kindly on this inadequate junior."

Jeok Cheongang looked at me and put on a frown, as though something displeased him.

"You certainly do have a long way to go. Just thinking about what lies ahead, it's one obstacle after another. Isn't it?"

"With you here alongside us, Senior, what need have we of an army?"

Sima Gong put particular emphasis on alongside us, then lifted his head and looked at me.

"You truly have a perceptive Disciple."

"I don't know about perceptive. He's good at reading a room."

"Remarkable martial prowess, and a mind that sees several moves ahead. He's a blessing to all Murim. My son ought to have spent more time watching and learning from you while he had the chance… What do you think of him?"

At Sima Gong's sudden question, I answered without hesitation.

"He's useful."

"What?"

"Now that I've spent some time with him, he's a pretty decent kid. A little gloomy, though."

By Murim's reckoning, Sama Pyo was much older than me.

But even though I'd just thrown the whole idea of respecting my elders to the dogs, Sima Gong only smiled in a way I couldn't quite read.

"Thank you for saying so. It makes all the effort I put into raising him worthwhile."

Over his shoulder, I saw Sama Pyo standing there without a trace of expression. It struck me that Sima Gong sounded less like a father talking about raising his son than a craftsman talking about a piece he'd made.

But the thought vanished as quickly as it had come, and I spoke again.

"So, you don't plan to change your decision?"

"Decision. A choice made by firmly settling on a course of action or attitude."

"So that's a no. Then can I assume the Kongtong Sect's position is the same?"

"The Kongtong Sect opposed it, but that changes nothing. All of Gansu Murim reached this decision after extensive discussion."

Maybe. But was this really what Gansu Murim wanted?

Or…

Was it only what the Black Dragon Demon Gate wanted?

I swallowed the words hovering on the tip of my tongue and thought for a moment.

Inventory.

I mentally felt for an item stowed somewhere in that bottomless, pitch-black subspace.

But then I shook my head.

No matter how I looked at it, the timing wasn't right yet.

Not now, at least.

"Then let's do that."

"What?"

The startled question came from neither Jeok Cheongang, who was frowning, nor Sima Gong.

It was the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord. He stared at me with wide eyes.

"You're willing to accept this as it stands? Are you serious?"

Right then, before I could answer, two other voices cut the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord off.

"Everywhere you go, people have their own rules. Our Zhongnan is no different."

"Eldest Senior Brother is right. Junior Brother, remember how you ought to conduct yourself as our sect's Sect Leader."

The Roaring Fury Swordsman and the Taeeul Merciless Sword.

Those were the two who had spoken.

After hearing his Senior Brothers speak in turn, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord muttered as though groaning.

"Senior Brothers. But how can we let this happen?"

"We understand how you feel, Sect Leader. But further discord could jeopardize what we're trying to accomplish."

Sima Gong calmly but firmly cut off the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord before he could continue. Then he surveyed the room and went on.

"I hope everyone will remember this. We are allies united beneath the Murim Alliance's banner, and we must not create discord over a decision that has already been made. Much less…"

Sima Gong's deeply lowered gaze suddenly came to rest on me.

"Acting alone without seeking everyone's agreement is even less acceptable. Wouldn't you say?"

I already knew what Sima Gong meant, so I nodded.

“I’ll keep that in mind.”

“I hope sending those horse caravans away wasn’t a grievous mistake for our allies.”

“There won’t be any problem. At least, if my expectations are right.”

“His name was Ma Junggeol, wasn’t it? If you’d let that man go as well… we would’ve been disappointed in you. Very disappointed.”

At the sudden drop in his voice, Jeok Cheongang’s eyebrow twitched. I discreetly tugged at his sleeve where Sima Gong couldn’t see, then shrugged.

“I’ll remember.”

After that, the meeting wrapped up in less than another fifteen minutes.

As the leaders of Gansu Murim filed out, they kept stealing anxious glances at Jeok Cheongang. He stayed silent, wearing the expression of someone suffering from a particularly nasty case of constipation.

Only after we were out of everyone’s sight and alone together did he finally speak.

“What are you plotting?”

“What do you mean?”

“Don’t dodge the question. You had something in mind, or you wouldn’t have tried so hard to hold this old man back.”

“I didn’t try to hold you back. I just gave you a look to calm you down.”

“What?”

“Were you planning to grab him by the collar and beat the crap out of him right there? The Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate, no less?”

“Why? You think this old man couldn’t do it?”

“…”

Fair point.

I was at a loss for words. After a deep sigh, I started walking again.

“There was something bothering me.”

“That would be Sima Gong. You can tell just by looking at that bastard’s face.”

“That’s not it. He’s hiding something.”

At my quiet words, Jeok Cheongang’s expression hardened.

“What do you mean… Wait. Don’t tell me—”

His voice rose toward the end. I gave a small shake of my head.

“Don’t jump to conclusions. I’m not sure yet.”

“Tell me more. Don’t leave anything out.”

“Do you remember how Elder Nam came to see me out of the blue a day ago and said he had something to discuss?”

“Of course. I suddenly had to relieve myself, so I didn’t hear him out.”

Jeok Cheongang furrowed his brow and continued.

“If it was that important, you’d have told me later. Why haven’t you said a word about it for more than a day?”

He was right.

I’d always discussed most important matters with Jeok Cheongang, and sometimes found the answer by doing so.

But…

There are exceptions.

That day, that moment, was one of them.

“It’s important. Something I can only tell you now.”

Namho had approached me out of the blue and, speaking in a hushed voice, told me something I hadn’t expected.

“Just before we left the Jin Family of Taiyuan, I noticed Sama Pyo was missing and went looking for him. Taishan was with him.”

And there, the old agent of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion had caught a smell that was both familiar and strange.

“There wasn’t a trace left, but I’m certain Sama Pyo was burning a missive.”

No—once Sama Pyo had tried to hide that fact, it was no ordinary missive.

It was a secret letter.

Chapter 1018

“He was burning a secret letter alone, without anyone knowing.”

The words slipped from my lips in a low murmur.

Jeok Cheongang’s gaze, fixed on me, had grown dark and still.

“Could Namho have been mistaken?”

“That…”

I fell silent instead of finishing the sentence. Jeok Cheongang let out a quiet sigh.

“Damn it. So it’s true.”

At first, I’d thought the whole thing was a simple misunderstanding. A minor incident we could clear up by calling Sama Pyo over and talking to him directly.

But…

“Elder Nam was certain by the time he told me.”

“I thought so. If he’s only just brought it up, he must have spent all this time thinking it through.”

“Yes. At first, even he wasn’t sure. He didn’t have any solid evidence to back it up, either.”

Growing old meant your senses grew dull. Namho had said he’d gone over it again and again.

Was the smell that had lingered in Sama Pyo’s room the same kind he’d encountered so many times as an agent of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion? Or were his dulled senses leading him to suspect them for no reason?

And after more than seven days and nights of worry, this old Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent had reached only one conclusion.

“It was definitely the smell of oiled paper burning. I’m certain now.”

Oiled paper—paper treated with oil.

It was customary to oil the paper used for missives so it wouldn’t get wet or tear easily. Naturally, it smelled different when burned than dry paper did.

“Another reason to oil paper is that it burns easily. The less you want a letter discovered, the faster you need to destroy the evidence.”

Namho had spent a lifetime as an intelligence agent. Though he’d found no trace of anything beyond the faint smell of something burning in the room, from that moment on he never let go of his suspicions about Sama Pyo and Taishan.

“I watched them from the day we left Shanxi Province. But until just a few days ago, I still couldn’t be sure whether it really was oiled paper I’d smelled—or, if it was, who had sent it and from where.”

There was one reason above all that Namho had hesitated to trust his judgment.

“He said the smell was unusual.”

“The smell? You mean the burning paper?”

“Yes. He said it was quite different from any of the burning smells he knew.”

“Burning paper smells like burning paper. What does that—”

“I’ve heard every region has its own customs and food. Even the animals they get their oil from are different.”

At that, Jeok Cheongang suddenly furrowed his brow.

“Wait. Could it be?”

“Elder Nam said there’s an animal found only in Gansu and Qinghai. Is that right?”

“Camels…!”

Jeok Cheongang gave a muffled gasp and nodded.

“So that was the source of the unusual smell.”

“Elder Nam’s spent his whole life in the Central Plains and Nanman.[3643] It wouldn’t have been easy for him to recognize it.”

“Right. Those odd-looking beasts are hard to come across. They live only in Qinghai and western Gansu.”

Besides, in Murim these days, people usually made animal oil from cows, horses, sheep, and pigs.

But on the day we first entered Gansu Province, Namho had been taking a break with the other Fire Dragon Pavilion members when he stumbled upon an unexpected clue.

“An incredible coincidence, really. I had no appetite, so I was sitting alone, lost in thought, when I caught a whiff of a smell I’d encountered before. I asked what it was. Camel meat, they told me.”

That clue had finally given Namho the certainty he needed. He told me Sama Pyo had received a secret letter, and that it must have come from Gansu or Qinghai.

As for who had sent it, everyone who knew about the letter had a vague idea already.

Qinghai was only a possibility Namho had raised alongside Gansu. There was just one person who would have sent a secret letter all the way to Shanxi Province, thousands of li[3644] away.

“The Black Night King, Sima Gong…”

At my murmur, which sounded almost like I was talking to myself, Jeok Cheongang spat roughly.

“You’ve gotten bold. You really have.”

“What do you think the letter said?”

“Do you have a guess?”

“I do.”

[3643] Nanman is a historical Chinese term for peoples to the south, often translated as “southern barbarians.”

[3644] A Chinese li is 500 m (0.311 mi).

"Then tell me."

"At the very least, I'm pretty sure it wasn't 'Is my son eating well?'"

A vein bulged at Jeok Cheongang's temple.

"You call that an answer? Even that Taishan—or Gangsan, whatever his name is—could tell you that."

"Taishan might not."

"…Honestly, I can't argue with you on that one. Speaking of that oversized fool, how was he on the way here?"

"Elder Nam said he was acting strange. The closer we got to Gansu, the more he picked at his food, and he moped around all day."

Of course, "picked at his food" was a slight—no, a considerable—stretch. He was still stuffing his face five times a day. How was that picking at his food? He was eating until he was full.

But considering how much Taishan usually ate, five meals a day was practically intermittent fasting.

And the closer we got to Gansu, the more miserable he looked. There was no shortage of things that seemed strange.

Knowing Sama Pyo, he might've kept it from Taishan, too.

Whatever the case, only one thing mattered right now.

While they were still in Shanxi Province, a secret letter had passed between father and son. It contained something they wanted hidden, and whatever it was, it couldn't be good news for us.

I didn't want to think about it, but if the worst really did happen…

"Hmm."

I shook my head, trying to force the thought away. Jeok Cheongang had been watching me. Now he spoke without warning.

"Worried?"

"About what?"

"That you might have to cut down Sama Pyo and Taishan with your own hands."

"…!"

Step.

I stopped without realizing it.

I'd been walking almost mechanically, but now I stood stock-still, staring silently at Jeok Cheongang.

"You look like you have a lot to say."

"…"

"Since you've gone quiet, let this old man tell you an interesting story."

I didn't answer, and Jeok Cheongang didn't wait for one.

“During the Great Faction War, when the world was going up in flames, I met a man called the Junzi Saber.[3645]”

We started walking again. My voice came out troubled.

“That’s quite a title.”

“Like hell it is. At first, I didn’t care for it much. The title was so embarrassingly grand it made my fingers curl up—and nearly break. But after spending some time with him, cutting down Demonic Cult bastards, I found he was a pretty useful fellow.”

“Useful how?”

“As a person and as a martial artist.”

“That’s quite a compliment, coming from you, Old Master.”

“Others thought even more highly of him. He came from a distinguished martial family, though it had fallen on hard times. He was an exceptional fighter with a strong sense of justice. No matter how dangerous things got, he led the way and never backed down.”

He’d been the very model of a chivalrous hero. First to charge, last to retreat, willing to give his life for others.

But I already had a feeling how this story, which had come out of nowhere, would end.

“Why are you talking about him entirely in the past tense? You sound like you regret what happened.”

A bitter smile crossed Jeok Cheongang’s lips.

“You’re a sharp one.”

“Was he a traitor?”

“Yes. He was a Demonic Cult lackey. But he hadn’t been one from the beginning.”

“You mean…”

“Do you remember what I told you about the Junzi Saber’s origins?”

“Yes. He was from a distinguished martial family in Qinghai.”

“In truth, the family had been destroyed in a war with another sect. ‘Torn apart’ would be more accurate than ‘fallen on hard times.‘ The only family he knew was an old retainer who’d raised him from infancy by begging women to nurse him.”

The only family he knew.

Suddenly, I thought I understood why a chivalrous hero whose name and face I’d never known had gone over to the Demonic Cult.

“There was a surviving relative.”

“His eldest brother, apparently. He’d been the Lesser Family Head, yet somehow survived the destruction of their family. An extraordinary stroke of luck. With that luck, and an even greater thirst for revenge, he crossed the desert and sought refuge with the Demonic Cult… You're sharp enough to guess what happened next."

[3645] Junzi is a Confucian term for a morally upright gentleman.

Why did I feel as though I could see the Korean flag waving before my eyes?[3646]

A classic movie I'd seen long ago came to mind, but only for a moment. I'd cried my eyes out watching that movie. This story would have a different ending.

And the meaning of that ending must be why Jeok Cheongang had dredged up such an unpleasant memory.

"The Junzi Saber died, didn't he?"

Jeok Cheongang answered quietly.

"Yes. I killed him myself."

"Do you regret it?"

"Regret it? What do you think you'd do in my place?"

"…!"

"If Sama Pyo and Taishan are plotting something on Sima Gong's secret orders—and those orders have something to do with Dark Heaven… what would you do?"

I fell silent.

Only a year. It wasn't long enough to form a deep bond. We'd lived in different circumstances, and we had different personalities.

So why couldn't I answer?

My lips stayed pressed together, though this was a question I should have answered without hesitation.

What would you do?

Jeok Cheongang's question echoed in my ears, colliding again and again without end.

Around the time the three thousand troops, after several days of nonstop marching, reached the Qilian Mountains and were taking a brief but sweet rest—

Elsewhere, in a pitch-black secret chamber where not a ray of light entered, three people faced one another.

"Things have gone wrong. Very wrong."

"The Fire King—that damned old monster—what's he doing here?"

The two voices came at the man in the seat of honor the moment he sat down. He answered them.

"What's done is done. The situation has changed, so I asked you both here to work out a new plan."

[3646] Taegukgi ("Korean flag") is the Korean title of a film about brothers caught up in the Korean War.

“Things have gone badly from the start, yet you’re brimming with confidence without offering a single excuse.”

“This time, Sect Leader Sima, you’ll have to convince us.”

“…Convince you.”

The eyes of the man in the seat of honor—the Black Night King, Sima Gong—suddenly gleamed.

He stared into the darkness at the two old Daoists facing him.

Chapter 1019

Boom, boom, boom.

Rough drumbeats echoed across the rugged ridges of the Qilian Mountains. Their brief, welcome rest was over, and people began getting to their feet and assembling.

Jeok Cheongang, the Fire Dragon Pavilion members, and I were no exception. We just had a little more time to spare because there were fewer of us.

“Whew. Even a quick nap makes a difference, doesn’t it?”

Hyuk Mujin had just woken up and was stretching as he spoke.

“Sure does,” I said.

“Huh? You say that, but you look awfully gloomy.”

“You’re imagining it.”

“Doesn’t seem like it. You look like you haven’t slept at all.”

“No. I’m just not fully awake yet.”

“Ah, you should’ve slept, even for a bit. Sleep’s the best medicine at a time like this.”

“…Are you not hearing me?”

Did this bastard have himself on mute or something?

At my incredulous stare, Hyuk Mujin shrugged.

“Oh, come on, Captain. I could tell something was wrong the moment I saw your face. You’ve got something on your mind, don’t you?”

Sharp instincts.

But no matter how he asked, my current position meant I couldn’t just come out and tell him the truth.

Think about it. How would the Fire Dragon Pavilion members react if they learned the truth about Sama Pyo right now?

The more people who know, the harder it is to keep a secret.

Hyuk Mujin had noticed something the moment he saw my face. Someone keeping an eye on us might notice too.

Worry had a way of showing, whether you meant it to or not.

So there was only one answer I could give him.

“When anything could happen at any moment, who wouldn’t be worried? Huh?”

“Well, that’s true. It’s just… you seem a little different from usual, Captain.”

Unable to fault my reasoning, Hyuk Mujin scratched the back of his head. Then he spoke again, more tentatively.

“But, Captain.”

“What? Something important?”

“No, not really. I just wanted to tell you I’m not worried about anything.”

“What?”

“You said it just now, didn’t you? If you have nothing to worry about in a situation like this, are you even human?”

“And?”

“I don’t know what you’ll think of this, but ever since I started following you, I haven’t really felt worried. Maybe everything we’ve been through has made me too gutsy for my own good, but…”

He kept sneaking glances at me as he spoke. Then he turned toward a distant mountain and murmured as if to himself.

“You’re always there, Captain. I know you’ll fight alongside me, every time. So no matter how dangerous things get, I’m not afraid.”

“…”

“Of course, don’t let that put any extra pressure on you. What I’m trying to say is… Well, it’s…”

Maybe things had gotten too awkward. Maybe his thoughts were tangled. Either way, he couldn’t seem to finish.

I watched him for a moment, then supplied the words in my usual, deliberately curt voice.

“Don’t get caught up in pointless worries. I’ve always trusted you. That’s basically what you’re trying to say, right?”

“That’s… right.”

“Then why are you stumbling over it? You’re old enough to say what you mean.”

Hyuk Mujin looked indignant at the sudden jab about his age.

“Then start treating me like I’m older than you before you say that. Have you got no shame?”

“Mujin.”

“What?”

“Go get in formation before I pluck every last hair from down below. Can’t you hear the drums?”

“…Honestly. The way you talk, anyone listening would think I did all the talking. You got plenty of words in yourself.”

“What was that?”

“I’m going! I’m going!”

He ran off with his lips stuck out. I couldn’t help letting out a quiet laugh.

“‘I’m going’ is a casual way to say it, you punk.”

But my mutter reached no one. The words scattered into the air, and my pale breath briefly obscured something falling from above.

Tap.

A moment later, I felt its cold touch.

I looked up. Countless snowflakes were drifting down between clouds of every size.

Boom, boom, boom.

The drums sounded again, right on cue. I started walking, repeating Hyuk Mujin's words to myself.

He trusted me, no matter what happened.

At the same time, I thought of the two people who weren't here.

Had I failed to earn your trust because I hadn't shown you enough? Or…

Had I been the only fool who thought we'd become dependable comrades and friends?

Crunch.

I planted my foot firmly on the ground, already turning white beneath the snow.

By the time the unceasing drumbeats stopped, the number of people and horses heading west over the Qilian Mountains had grown enough for anyone to notice.

Grind. Grrind.

The mountain ridges groaned beneath a force numbering in the thousands.

Sama Pyo was counting the flags visible between the bare branches. Just after they crossed yet another hill and entered the wilderness again, he spoke.

"That's unexpected."

He offered no preamble, but neither he nor the person beside him thought anything of it. Father and son were used to this.

"What is?"

His father answered without turning his head. Sama Pyo studied his profile.

"That you agreed to their demands."

"Their demands?"

"At the meeting, you even argued with them to get your way. Yet in the end, you reinforced our troops with part of the force stationed in the Qilian Mountains. Three thousand of them, no less."

Sama Pyo was right.

When the drums announcing the end of the brief rest stopped, nearly half the Black Dragon Demon Gate's martial artists stationed in the Qilian Mountains had already assembled ahead of them.

"Is that a problem?"

"I'm only surprised. It isn't like you."

"Isn't like me?"

Only then did his father turn to look him in the eye. Sama Pyo lowered his head slightly.

“It was only a small question that occurred to me.”

“Then tell me what you’re thinking.”

“I thought you would never reverse a decision once you’d made it. Especially for outsiders.”

“Why?”

“Because that’s what I’ve always seen you do.”

“Raise your head.”

Sama Pyo obediently did as his father’s dry voice commanded. His father’s eyes, black as obsidian, were already gleaming at him.

“Have you forgotten what I taught you already? Never be certain about any situation—or any person.”

“…!”

“Circumstances can change suddenly. To survive and grow stronger in this harsh world, you must keep questioning what you know and adjust your calculations to every change. This time is no different.”

A few years ago—no, even one year ago—Sama Pyo would have listened in silence.

So why did his father’s voice seem as distant as an echo today, though Sima Gong was right beside him?

Question everything. Keep calculating… You haven’t changed at all.

Sama Pyo was reminded, painfully, of what kind of man his father was and the life he’d led.

Because Sima Gong had doubted and guarded against everything, the Black Dragon Demon Gate had survived even the Great Faction War. Because his calculations had been precise to the last detail, it had prospered beyond measure.

But anyone who knew the martial world knew one more thing: blood relatives were not exempt from the suspicion and calculation that had made Sima Gong who he was.

Seven older brothers. Nine older sisters.

Sama Pyo thought of where they had all ended up—children of the same father, born to different mothers.

That’s right. Those calculations are how I became the Young Sect Leader, too.

That was the Black Night King, Sima Gong.

He would stop at nothing to survive and rule. He would put even his own children on the scales, weigh their worth, and cast the others aside without hesitation to appoint his most capable child—his seventeenth—as Young Sect Leader.

In that sense, he was a man of the unorthodox factions through and through. And the blood Sama Pyo had inherited from him ran beneath his skin.

It was like a shackle he couldn't put so much as a scratch on, no matter how he struggled. Beneath the crushing weight of the iron ball chained to it, Sama Pyo's body and mind bent.

"I'll take those words to heart as though they were worth gold and jade."

It wasn't a mere empty platitude or a ruse. The words came from deep within his heart, and his father sensed his son's feelings just as clearly.

Pyo, it seems that boy is finally coming to his senses.

Sima Gong murmured inwardly and felt his spirits lift.

After all, who was Sama Pyo? The heir he'd finally had in his old age, the son who would someday inherit everything.

His innate martial talent was at least the equal of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes, the finest young prodigies in the Central Plains. It might even surpass theirs. He had a shrewd mind as well. He was a born leader.

But something started to change in him after he joined the Fire Dragon Pavilion.

His first act of defiance.

Without an order or even permission from Sima Gong, the Sect Leader, his son had joined the Fire Dragon Pavilion on his own. By the time Sima Gong learned of it, the deed was done.

The Fire Dragon Pavilion and the Azure Dragon Pavilion were newly established strike forces under the Alliance Leader's direct command. Countless eyes were watching the actions of the two pavilions.

And in the Fire Dragon Pavilion his son had joined, there was him.

Jin Taekyung.

The Hidden Dragon of Shanxi, who had risen to become the Divine Dragon of the world. A young giant of Murim.

Every step he took left a deep, enormous mark. His path was strewn with the corpses and blood of countless enemies, while praise and cheers followed him from people throughout the land.

Sima Gong could only watch, hoping that his son's sudden defiance might give the Black Dragon Demon Gate another chance to soar.

But the secret correspondence he should have received never came, and Sama Pyo's attitude, when they met for the first time in a year, had seemed somehow different.

At least, until just now.

I'll still have to keep watching him… But for now, I can breathe a little easier.

And it was just as Sima Gong let out a quiet laugh to himself at the sight of his son gradually returning to his old self that it happened.

Shhhwick—BOOM!

Several hundred jang[3647] away, a red flame shot up above a barren hill and exploded, bathing his eyes in its brilliant light.

No—everyone's.

[3647] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Chapter 1020

It happened in an instant no one could have predicted.

Whoosh—BOOM!

Even from several hundred jang[3648] away, everyone—including me—could see the burst of red light blazing across the distant sky and hear the explosion that followed.

A signal flare!

No doubt about it. The scouts who'd gone ahead of the main force had fired it. And it was red—the signal for extreme danger.

Clang! Clang! Clang!

Everyone froze for a moment. Then, as the danger sank in, weapons came free of their sheaths.

"Prepare for battle!"

"Disciples of the Martial Might Sword Sect, prepare for an enemy ambush!"

"Zhongnan Sect Disciples, form the Moon-Shattering Sword Formation!"

The sudden shift in their aura seemed to make the air tremble.

All around me flashed a mountain of sabers and a forest of swords. As our allies moved in unison to the shouted orders, I kicked off from the saddle, leaving a quick word for Hyuk Mujin, who was closest to me.

"Hold your position until I get back."

"W-wait a—!"

Whoosh!

A fierce gust swallowed Hyuk Mujin's voice, and the distance of a dozen jang[3649] disappeared in an instant.

Buoyancy swept through my body. I stepped lightly on empty air, on the wind, soaring upward even as I raced forward.

"Th-there!"

"Archers! What are you waiting for? The enemy's here! Fire!"

"You idiots, lower your bows! He's one of ours!"

My movements were so free that a few people below, still caught up in the confusion, mistook me for an enemy.

Someone was following close behind me.

"You don't give an old man a moment's peace. What in the world is going on?"

The familiar voice came with the effortless footfalls of Stepping on Empty Air, as though Jeok Cheongang were running along the ground.

[3648] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten cheok: about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[3649] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten cheok: about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

I answered without turning around. “Something must have happened to the scouts who went ahead.”

“Something happened? You don’t mean what this old man thinks you mean?”

“We don’t know yet. But one thing’s certain…”

I fixed my gaze on the dust cloud rising over the distant, winding sand dunes.

“Whatever’s happening, it can’t be good news.”

A quarter of an hour later, I realized once again that bad premonitions, as always, never missed.

“Cough. D-Dunhuang. Dunhuang has…!”

The unfamiliar man’s lips were parched, his face pale, and his clothes little more than rags. The scouts were covered in dust but otherwise looked unharmed. He looked as though hardship and desperation had clung to every part of him.

His voice trembled as he finished.

“It’s fallen… to them.”

“…!”

“…!”

Not one of us had any doubt who he meant by “them.”

Dark Heaven.

The Fiends beyond the vast desert had finally crossed the river of sand and set foot in human territory.

The stranger was a messenger sent from the Great Snow Mountain. The news he brought stunned the entire leadership.

“S-say that again. What, what did you just say?”

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord was the Sect Leader of the prestigious Zhongnan Sect, a man who should have remained steady in any situation. Yet he stammered, and no one showed so much as a trace of amusement.

No—they couldn’t have. Everyone there felt just as he did. What had come from the messenger’s lips was almost impossible to believe.

But when he repeated his account, it didn’t change.

“I-I regret to report…”

“Start from the beginning. Explain it slowly—come on!”

The messenger squeezed his eyes shut, unable to continue. Then he bit down on his lip and, under the barrage of sharp commands, managed to speak.

“It began when Jade Gate Pass was breached.”

As far as I knew, Jade Gate Pass had long ago been a major gateway on the Silk Road connecting the Central Plains with the Western Regions.

It stood in a wide-open stretch of desert. A small earthen fortress had been built there, making it an ideal place to watch the surrounding area.

In other words, a strategic point perfectly suited to monitoring the border with a small force.

Small, of course, only compared with the total force Gansu's Murim had mobilized. At the recent leadership meeting, we'd heard that at least a hundred scouts were stationed at Jade Gate Pass.

No—at least a hundred scouts had been stationed there.

By now, they were probably all dead.

"Are you saying they all died? Every single one?"

"We had no way to confirm it, but that is likely. The enemy apparently went undetected until it was within three hundred li[3650] of Dunhuang."

"Then when exactly did Dunhuang fall into enemy hands?"

"About three days ago, I was told."

"Three days ago…!"

Low groans rose from the leadership. I spoke up.

"Wait. I heard you came from the Great Snow Mountain, not Dunhuang. Who told you this?"

"I never learned his Daoist name, but he was a Kongtong Sect Daoist who had been defending Dunhuang."

"You don't know his Daoist name?"

"N-no."

I frowned.

The Kongtong Sect was a Daoist sect, and to its members, a Daoist name was as good as their own. Just as the monks of Shaolin Temple had abandoned their worldly names and introduced themselves by their Dharma names, Daoist names were basic introductions among martial artists.

That he hadn't even done that suggested two possibilities.

First, the messenger standing before us had brought false information.

Or…

He died in such a desperate situation that he didn't even have time to give his Daoist name.

The messenger's next words supported my second guess.

"I was too flustered to mention it earlier, but the Daoist was already seriously injured when I first saw him. He died moments after reaching the Great Snow Mountain."

"Good heavens."

[3650] In this Chinese setting, a li is about 500 m (0.311 mi); three hundred li is about 150 km (93 mi).

Someone let out a groan.

The mood grew heavier, and not only because the unknown Daoist had died.

A messenger in Murim had to be fast enough to break through an enemy encirclement, with the martial skill to back it up. If the man Kongtong had sent died moments after arriving, what state had the forces at Dunhuang been in?

Of course, everyone there—including me—already knew what had happened to them. We'd only been trying to deny the shocking news we'd heard.

"So it was true. All of it."

The messenger answered Jeok Cheongang's cold mutter.

"It's a terrible report, hard to believe, but that's what I was told."

It hadn't exactly been a pleasant dream. Still, it was time to wake up and face the cruel reality.

The others remained silent, looking as though they still couldn't believe it. A chill ran down my spine as I forced the words out.

"At least two thousand dead, and three thousand seriously injured or missing. Is that right?"

The messenger didn't answer. He only lowered his head in exhaustion. Seeing him, everyone was finally forced to accept the reality they'd put off for as long as they could.

"H-how can this make any sense…?"

"What can we do? It's already happened."

"Ten thousand. A full ten thousand! How could a force that large be defeated so easily?"

Yes. Ten thousand. A full ten thousand.

Yet the force defending Dunhuang under the Kongtong Sect had lost half its numbers—even though they'd fought a defensive battle.

In just half a day.

And that wasn't the only bad news.

"About thirty percent of the Kongtong Sect's strength was lost. During the desperate retreat, two Perfected Ones[3651] serving as Kongtong Elders and all one hundred members of the Demon-Subduing Squad died at Dunhuang."

"…!"

"…!"

Gasps sounded all around us.

This was the Kongtong Sect. One of the Nine Sects and One Gang. One of the fifteen great pillars supporting the martial world.

[3651] Perfected One translates zhenren, a Daoist honorific associated with spiritual attainment.

And Kongtong had been broken. Its forces had retreated, leaving behind two Elders said to have reached Supreme Peak more than a decade ago and the Demon-Subduing Squad, whose fame had spread even to the Central Plains.

“Then… the Sect Leader? What happened to the Sect Leader?”

At the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord’s urgent question, everyone held their breath and waited for the messenger’s answer.

By modern standards, thirty percent casualties would be catastrophic enough to call a force annihilated. Murim judged things differently.

What mattered was whether its masters survived. No matter how devastating the losses, if the head of the force was still alive, there was hope.

The Kongtong Sect Leader was Gansu’s strongest martial artist, said to be half a step ahead of even the Black Night King, Sima Gong. If he’d survived, they could still counterattack.

Dozens of pairs of eyes fixed on the messenger. He swallowed hard before giving an answer that was, at least, one mercy amid the disaster.

“I heard the Sect Leader withdrew safely from the battlefield because the two Elders and the entire Demon-Subduing Squad were prepared to fight to the death.”

“Ah…”

“Thank goodness. Heaven was watching over him.”

Sighs of relief escaped all around them. At that moment, someone suddenly spoke.

“And?”

“Pardon?”

“I asked what happened next.”

Most of the leadership had risen and fallen with every word of the report. This voice remained calm.

Sima Gong stared at the messenger with a deeply sunken gaze and spoke again.

“If the Sect Leader withdrew with the surviving troops, he must have headed for the Great Snow Mountain. Yet from what you’ve said, there’s been no word of him since. Why is that?”

Silence fell again. The messenger looked helpless.

“I—I have no way of knowing.”

“No way of knowing?”

“Yes. The tide of battle turned in an instant, so the surviving allies split into two groups and retreated. The Sect Leader led many of them away and ordered a Disciple of the sect to deliver this news.”

The dead could tell us nothing.

The Disciple, sent by the Sect Leader to the Great Snow Mountain, had pushed himself to the limit and died before he could provide any more information. The ten thousand troops defending Dunhuang had been scattered to the four winds, and no word had come from them since.

"However, I left the Great Snow Mountain half a day ago, so it's possible that the troops from Dunhuang have joined up by now."

A few members of the leadership nodded hopefully. But I wasn't so sure.

If the messenger, who must have escaped the battlefield ahead of everyone else, was injured that badly…

Dark Heaven's great army would already be sweeping the area around Dunhuang like a net as it advanced toward the Great Snow Mountain—hunting down the survivors and moving to break the second defensive line in its path.

They're moving absurdly fast. Faster than I ever imagined.

At that moment, I realized we had no choice left.

"We're not too late yet. Send a messenger at once and mobilize every force in the Qilian Mountains."

"What?"

Sima Gong frowned at my abrupt words.

"What did you just say?"

"I said to mobilize every force stationed in the Qilian Mountains. If the Great Snow Mountain falls, it's over."

"We've already discussed that and reached a conclusion."

I shrugged at his dark gaze.

"Then change the conclusion."

"…You."

"Ah, just so there's no misunderstanding."

The next moment, I pulled something from inside my clothes and added in a low voice,

"This isn't a suggestion. It's an order."

Marquis of Shangshan, Jin Taekyung.

Sima Gong's eyes widened as he stared at the identity tablet, its characters engraved in elegant script.

Chapter 1021

The truth was, until a little while ago, I hadn't planned to go this far.

The rule that officials and martial artists didn't interfere with each other hadn't come from nowhere. In a world where the two sides barely spared each other a glance, flaunting either side's authority would only breed resentment.

But authority could be remarkably effective when used at the right moment.

Like now.

"Marquis of Shangshan…"

A low groan slipped from someone's lips, breaking the brief silence.

In the heavy, sunken atmosphere, Sima Gong stared wide-eyed at the identity tablet in my hand. It was then that he spoke.

"So it isn't a request. It's an order."

His voice was dry as sand. His gaze, gone cold, shifted to my face.

"How interesting. Truly interesting."

The corners of his mouth were stiff despite his words. I scratched the back of my head.

"I'm glad you find it interesting, but I'd rather hear your answer than your opinion. As you know, every fifteen minutes feels like three autumns right now."

"Am I to understand that you meant every word you said a moment ago?"

"Oh? You still didn't understand? Strange. I thought I'd made myself clear."

"…!"

"Well, if you insist, I'll say it again. Scrape together every last soldier you've got holed up in the Qilian Mountains and bring them to the Great Snow Mountain. Right now. That's an order from the Marquis of Shangshan."

Stifled gasps rose among the leaders.

Who was Sima Gong, the Black Night King?

He shared control of Gansu with the Kongtong Sect—or rather, he now held a far stronger position than they did.

It was still speculation, but if this crisis passed and peace returned, the badly battered Kongtong Sect wouldn't be able to stand against the Black Dragon Demon Gate.

But…

So what?

I calmly surveyed Sima Gong and the other leaders, one by one.

At that moment, they didn't look like heads of factions bearing the weight of immense responsibility and tens of thousands of lives. They looked like gambling addicts.

Fools fiddling with the tiles in their hands while tens of thousands of lives were wagered on the table.

This was when you used authority.

Even if it brought fierce opposition and discord.

Right then, one of the leaders spoke.

“From what I’ve heard, your words and conduct have been getting more and more out of line.”

I looked over. His face was fairly familiar.

He was the Sect Leader of a mid-sized sect with around two hundred disciples, a man with some influence in Gansu. He’d always stood near Sima Gong whenever the leaders gathered, so I recognized him more readily than the others.

A close associate, you might say.

“I’ll say this much: I agree with Sect Leader Seok.”

“Young Hero Jin—no, Great Hero Jin—we respect the sense of justice you’ve shown us, but surely there are bounds you ought to observe.”

“Although the Great Nation’s imperial court is now standing with us against the great enemy Dark Heaven, that doesn’t mean you should invoke your title as a marquis to strong-arm us like this over Murim’s affairs.”

Birds of a feather flock together; crabs side with crabs. Maybe it was the support of the neighbors, each adding their own word while watching the room. Or maybe it was because Jeok Cheongang stood there with his arms crossed, quietly watching without saying a thing.

Whatever the reason, Sect Leader Seok sounded bolder when he spoke again. Like a loyal dog checking his master’s mood, he stole a glance at the silent Sima Gong.

“You see? Everyone feels the same way. And Sect Leader Sima here gave the matter careful thought before—”

I was almost curious what nonsense he’d come out with next. But patience had never been my strong suit.

“So?”

I cut him off, then added quietly, “Is there a problem?”

The Sect Leader stared at me in silence, as though he’d been struck dumb. Then, his face stiff, he replied,

“And if there is?”

“Put up with it.”

“What… did you just say?”

“Put up with it, even if it feels dirty and unfair. What are you going to do about it, even if it pisses you off? Does a marquis appointed by the Son of Heaven—no, by His August Majesty the Emperor himself—look like jack shit to you?”

“T-that’s not what I meant!”

His face went red as he shouted. I couldn't help laughing.

"Or we can set our titles aside and fight it out. I won't tell His Majesty. We've only just joined hands with the Murim Alliance, and it'd be bad for both sides if something happened now. Right? Don't you think?"

My words were directed at the Sect Leader in front of me. My gaze wasn't.

Sima Gong met my eyes, and he wasn't stupid enough to miss the point.

"Those are memorable words."

The moment he spoke, the room fell deathly silent.

At last, Sima Gong spoke, looking at me with an expression I couldn't read.

"You're right. I, too, am a subject of the Great Nation. I should obey an order from a marquis appointed by His Majesty."

"…!"

"…!"

Eyes shifted uneasily around the room. They probably hadn't expected Sima Gong to concede so readily.

I'd more or less expected it.

"May I take that to mean you'll do as I ask?"

"You may. This time, I'll yield."

"So there won't be a second time."

"What can I do? I have my pride, which I must uphold even if it kills me, and my own judgment. I trust you and the Senior over there will understand that much."

Sima Gong was even wearing a faint smile now. My gaze darkened.

What the hell is this guy?

He was definitely hiding something, but I couldn't tell what it was. No—he wasn't giving me the slightest opening to catch a glimpse.

I came on strong on purpose, and he barely reacted.

I hadn't invoked the authority of a marquis and tried to force him into line simply because the situation was urgent.

Even a boulder weighing ten thousand geun[3652] would shake when struck. I'd hoped his reaction would tell me what he was thinking—and how many of the leaders here were with him.

I'd learned a little about the latter. With Sima Gong, I'd failed spectacularly.

And until I knew what he was hiding, Sima Gong and I were allies under the same banner.

"As you said, every fifteen minutes feels like three autumns right now. Is there anything else you need to say?"

[3652] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun is about 6,000 kg (13,200 lb).

I was silent for a moment. His gaze met mine across the space between us, but I could read nothing in it.

“No.”

“Good. Then I’ll send someone at once to bring in every force in the Qilian Mountains. Does Zhongnan agree?”

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord had been looking back and forth between us in confusion. He spoke at last.

“If the Great Snow Mountain falls, Gansu will be hanging by a thread. I see no reason to disagree.”

“Then it’s settled. Family Heads, Sect Leaders—inform your martial artists and see that they’re fully prepared. We must reach the Great Snow Mountain ahead of the enemy, within half a day at the latest.”

The leaders of Gansu’s Murim exchanged wary glances, then performed the clasped-fist salute. Sima Gong was hurrying back to his saddle when he suddenly stopped.

As though he’d forgotten something, he let out a quiet “Ah” and turned toward me.

“Could I ask one favor?”

“What favor?”

“I’d like to entrust my son to you again. The one I borrowed for a while. What do you say?”

My eyes widened. Sima Gong gave a hearty laugh and continued.

“I was glad to see a blood relative I hadn’t seen in a long time, so I kept him by my side for a few days. But in wartime, we must strictly separate public duty from private affairs. He’s a member of the Fire Dragon Pavilion before he’s the Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate. Isn’t that right?”

Sama Pyo hesitated, then answered flatly.

“…That’s right.”

What was Sima Gong up to?

Truthfully, I already had a good idea of Sima Gong’s intentions. But I couldn’t let that show—not in a situation like this.

I nodded, keeping my expression and tone as calm as I could.

“Of course. I’ve been waiting for him to come back.”

“Glad to hear it. I’ll take that as a yes and send him to the rear shortly. With no telling what might happen next, a father and son ought to have a chance to say goodbye.”

At Sima Gong’s faint smile, I found myself newly certain of the suspicion I didn’t want to believe.

Before he was a member of the Fire Dragon Pavilion, Sama Pyo was Sima Gong’s son and the Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate.

From now on, he'd be with us not as a comrade, but as a spy.

Damn it.

I gave a deep clasped-fist salute and turned away to hide the look on my face.

Thud, thud, thud, thud!

The five thousand men and horses surged forward at full speed the moment they set out.

The ground shook as though an earthquake had struck. A cloud of dust rose amid the thunder of hooves, thick enough to hide them from any prying eyes.

"Do you know why I want you to stay by Jin Taekyung's side?"

Sima Gong studied his son's face as he asked. Sama Pyo's voice didn't waver.

"What do you want me to do?"

"What you suspect. Watch their every move."

"A difficult task."

"Why do you say that?"

"Because I mustn't draw needless suspicion."

Sama Pyo had already accepted the order. Sima Gong smiled inwardly, satisfied.

No questions. No doubts.

That was exactly the way he wanted his son to be—and the way he'd wanted him to be again.

"Aren't you curious why I'm giving you this order?"

"I'll simply obey. It must be for the good of our sect."

At his son's unhesitating answer, a faint smile touched Sima Gong's lips.

"Yes. It's all for the resurgence of our family and the Black Dragon Demon Gate. Before long, it will all be yours. You'll be the undisputed ruler of Gansu then, and you may even expand into the Central Plains."

"You mean…"

His son let the words trail off. Sima Gong gave a small nod.

"There can't be two tigers on one mountain."

"…!"

"Things didn't go as we first expected, but that changes nothing. Whatever stands in our way, we'll get what we want."

As always.

The words he added quietly were swallowed by the wind. His son watched his father's eyes gleam with ambition, then turned his horse with a respectful clasped-fist salute.

There was no tender father-son farewell of the kind Sima Gong had spoken of to Jin Taekyung.

As always.

Chapter 1022

The five thousand men and horses raced forward as though their lives depended on it.

To lighten their loads by even a single geun[3653], they threw away the food and supplies they'd brought in the barest quantities. They whipped their horses on without a thought for pacing them.

If a horse foamed at the mouth and collapsed, its rider ran on foot, pouring every last bit of internal energy into a movement technique.

It was a forced march that would exhaust even a well-trained martial artist.

Unlike the martial artists of Gansu, the Zhongnan Sect and Fire Dragon Pavilion members had managed only a couple of brief rests. To them, the final half day must have felt like ten years.

But because we'd pushed everyone to their limits, we caught sight of the snow-white mountain range as the first light of dawn reached us from behind.

The Great Snow Mountain.

True to its name, the snow-covered range shone in the dawn light, dazzlingly white and strangely out of place.

No—perhaps the strangest thing was the fickle weather.

Just two hours ago, there was nothing but desert around us.

I glanced up at the sky, now dumping great flakes of snow as if the desert had never been there, then looked back at the Great Snow Mountain.

Dozens of high peaks touched the clouds, with the range winding between them.

The immense natural barrier lay quiet, still partly shrouded in darkness. Among the five thousand men and horses slowing as they drew closer, wariness and unease hung in the air.

It was only natural.

By now, everyone had heard the news that the front line at Dunhuang, built around the Kongtong Sect, had been utterly crushed half a day ago.

Of course, given the distance and the time, it's unlikely the Great Snow Mountain has already fallen to Dark Heaven…

War was a monster too unpredictable to reduce to probabilities.

Especially when the enemy wielded strange powers that the words dark arts could hardly begin to describe.

Still, I never thought the Kongtong Sect would fall this easily.

To be fair, the Kongtong Sect wasn't among the strongest of the Nine Sects and One Gang.

[3653] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (about 1.32 lb).

Even so, it had three Supreme Peak masters, including its Sect Leader. By all accounts, its disciples from the main temple—the core of its strength—were accomplished martial artists too.

Yet they hadn't held out for days. They hadn't even lasted half a day. Even I, after clashing with Dark Heaven several times, had trouble gauging the enemy's strength.

The Kongtong Sect must have had enough time to prepare, and enough strength to defend itself.

Three Supreme Peak masters at the heart of the Kongtong Sect. A thousand disciples. And a force of no fewer than ten thousand rallied around them.

Thanks to Ma Junggeol's information, we knew Dark Heaven's army numbered at least thirty thousand. But there was an enormous difference between defending a fortress and attacking one.

Hearing that Dark Heaven had overcome that difference and crushed our forces so one-sidedly brought one possibility to mind.

They have at least three Supreme Peak masters. If not… then they have one extraordinary master. Someone powerful enough to dominate the battlefield through sheer martial might.

The first possibility would be a relief. The second would make for a hard fight.

Just as not every martial artist was alike, neither were the people called superhuman.

From the foot of a mountain, you couldn't tell how many trees grew on its vast slopes or how many steep gorges cut through it.

Dozens of peaks might look much the same from afar, but up close, their heights were anything but equal.

A difference like that between superhumans must have been why our force of ten thousand, including the Kongtong Sect, had suffered near-annihilation and been forced to retreat.

Our force is formidable too. Did Dark Heaven really send tens of thousands of troops into Gansu without knowing that?

Jeok Cheongang, me, the three old Daoists of the Zhongnan Sect, and Sima Gong, the Black Night King.

There were six Supreme Peak masters right here. And thousands of men and horses crossing Gansu were bound to be noticed.

In the end, I reached one conclusion.

They advanced into Gansu because they believed they could win.

Then what made them so confident despite losing four Demon Lords and a Demon Empress?

The Blood Lord, who had vanished after the Shaolin Bloodshed?

Some other force Dark Heaven had yet to reveal?

Or…

The Lord of Heaven?

Just as those two words slipped from my lips without my realizing it, a chill ran down my spine by instinct.

Whoosh!

A sharp whistle suddenly cut through the air. I turned toward it and saw flames rising one after another from deep in the Great Snow Mountain.

Boom. Boom. Boom!

Once, twice. Then three times at the end.

Fireworks burst across the sky in quick succession, and a red line appeared along the snow-blanketed mountainside.

That's…

A signal.

The forces who had taken the Great Snow Mountain were signaling with fireworks and torches.

Sighs of relief passed through the people who'd been on edge.

Hyuk Mujin and Song Ilseom, their hands resting on their sword hilts as if ready to draw at any moment, were no exception. Neither were Ju Hwaran and Namho, who had been watching ahead with tense faces.

There was one exception: Sama Pyo, who had rejoined the Fire Dragon Pavilion half a day earlier.

…That guy.

I wanted to ask him right then and there.

Why hadn't he said a word all this time?

How could he stay so composed, as if he'd known what to expect, while everyone else had been tense and wary?

But I didn't ask. I couldn't.

I watched Sama Pyo riding alongside the still-dejected Taishan, my gaze tangled with conflicting thoughts, then quietly turned away.

If Sama Pyo and Taishan are up to something on Sima Gong's secret orders, and those orders are connected to Dark Heaven… what would you do?

Hell if I know. What should I do?

With that question still unanswered in my heart, I silently tightened my grip on the reins.

Unlike the reality before me, the dawn spreading from the east was bathing the Great Snow Mountain in light.

“Guh… ack.”

The man’s lips trembled as he vomited a mouthful of dark red blood.

His Daoist robe, once as white as snow, had long since been stained with blood and dust. His unfocused eyes could barely make out what was in front of him.

Yet he didn’t let go of the sword in his hand. He couldn’t.

Not yet. It isn’t over.

His ever-reliable Senior Brother, his tiger-like Senior Martial Uncle, and the young Junior Sister he’d thought of as a niece were no longer by his side.

They were dead. Every last one of them.

Some had been beheaded. Some had been pierced through the heart. Others had been torn apart so completely that not a trace remained.

That was why he had to get up. He had to take revenge.

Crunch.

Blood welled between his teeth as he clenched them with all his strength.

His senses had gone numb. He couldn’t even smell the blood.

He swallowed his own blood as though it were the water of life.

Forcing his unsteady legs beneath him, he swung the beloved sword his Master and his sect had bestowed upon him at the enemy before him.

With more desperation than ever. With the last scrap of strength he had left.

“Ugh. Aaargh!”

He brought the sword down with a shout so fierce that the veins stood out in his neck. At that moment, a strange sensation seized him.

Shhh.

It was as if time had stopped.

The air against his skin, the wind blowing from somewhere, even the sword blade descending at the motion of his hand—

Everything slowed. Everything grew clear.

This is…

The man shuddered.

In all his thirty-some years of life, he had felt this sensation only once before.

On the day he’d finally reached the Peak realm after grueling training, just before enlightenment came to him.

No-self.

The moment of insight every martial artist longed for: a brief instant in which they forgot even their own existence and advanced toward a higher realm.

Ah. Aah.

His eyes trembled.

His focus returned. In his now-clear vision, he saw a middle-aged man trapped in the slowed flow of time.

No—a monster who had slaughtered more than a hundred members of his sect single-handedly.

But not anymore.

Only moments ago, the monster had moved too fast for his eyes to follow. Now it stood frozen, unable to move, while his sword descended toward the crown of its head.

Die.

The man was certain.

This enlightenment had made his martial might advance by leaps and bounds.

He had broken through the wall that had held him back for so long. His Demon-Subduing Sword had finally reached eight-tenths mastery, and it would cut the monster down.

Then, in the next instant—

Whoosh! Clack.

The monster shot out a hand like a streak of light and seized the blade.

Only then did the man understand.

It had all been a delusion.

Time hadn't slowed. Only he had.

Crack!

His beloved sword shattered, and the sorrowful dream broke with it. The monster's smile filled his vacant gaze.

"That was quite a sight, watching you flail around by yourself. What do you say? Shall I give you one more chance, just in case?"

The man stared blankly at the enemy before him.

Up close, the monster looked like an utterly ordinary middle-aged man—apart from the blood covering him from head to toe.

Maybe that was why, even after feeling the truth of what he was down to his bones, even knowing that he was beyond reason, the man forced his voice out.

"Why… why are you doing this?"

"What?"

The monster—no, the middle-aged man—furrowed his brow.

"Why am I doing this? What a pathetic question. You might as well ask a fisherman why he catches fish."

"…!"

"And this is all your own fault. I told you I'd spare you for now if you surrendered quietly, but you had to… Honestly, those damned Daoist bastards don't listen until they see blood."

The middle-aged man sighed deeply and gave him a pitying look.

“From the looks of it, I won’t get the answer I want from you either.”

Already on the threshold of his final rally, the man answered faintly.

“Heaven… Heaven will punish you.”

“What? Heaven’s punishment? Did you just say Heaven’s punishment?”

The middle-aged man’s eyes widened. Then he began to chuckle. In an instant, his hand blurred and pierced the man’s chest.

Crack!

His back arched as bone and flesh were crushed. Through his darkening vision, he saw a few wisps of cloud drifting across the sky as if nothing had happened.

Then a voice pierced his ears for the last time.

“Can you see it? The new Heaven.”

“…!”

Crunch. Thud!

The hand pulled free, and his body crumpled.

The middle-aged man stepped on the corpse of the Kongtong Sword Dragon, the Kongtong Sect’s foremost young prodigy, then turned toward the vast mountain range in the distance.

The Great Snow Mountain.

Soon it would be stained red with countless streams of blood. For now, it shone dazzlingly in the rising sunlight.

“Now, let’s have some fun.”

The middle-aged man smiled. Behind him, a tremendous rumble began to shake the earth.

Chapter 1023

Huff, huff.

Footsteps climbed the steep mountain slope without a word, while clouds of white breath billowed here and there.

The Great Snow Mountain was as cold as midwinter all year round, and the air was thin. It spared no one—not even those who had come to defend this land.

If anything, these conditions might be harder on our side.

“Cough. Haa…”

Was it the altitude?

Or was Namho’s body simply getting old?

He kept coughing and struggling to catch his breath. I was about to give an order when someone reached his side ahead of me.

“Steady your breathing. Relax.”

Tap.

A hand pressed his Mingmen acupoint as a calm voice spoke. Faint qi stirred around Namho.

Whoosh.

The pallor creeping across his face eased, and his complexion regained some color. With the internal energy sent through the Mingmen acupoint, Namho looked as if nothing had happened and went back to grumbling as usual.

“Damn it. Getting old’s a crime. Anyway, thanks for the help…”

His words trailed off.

Namho had just turned to thank him when his voice faltered despite himself. Standing behind him, Sama Pyo asked with an impassive face,

“What is it? Is something wrong?”

Namho’s surprise lasted only an instant. The old Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent recovered quickly.

“Hm? No, nothing’s wrong. Thought I saw something move over there.”

“Over there?”

As Sama Pyo turned to look where Namho was pointing, a small shadow sprang out from behind a dry tree and darted across the snow.

“A mountain hare. No need to worry.”

“Is that so? Well, it’s not like they could’ve snuck all the way up here. Getting old just gives you more to worry about.”

Namho replied nonchalantly, then looked at me and smacked his lips.

“Getting this winded from a little climb? I must be getting old. If I were just ten years younger—no more, no less—I’d be leading the charge. Wouldn’t you say?”

The more someone knew, the easier it was for their reaction to give them away. Namho had hidden his well enough, though. I answered evenly.

"Have you gone senile? You wouldn't be leading the charge even if you were thirty years younger."

I wasn't just saying that to help us move past the moment. All around us, people were panting as they climbed the Great Snow Mountain.

Can't be helped. We chose quantity over quality.

Gansu Province was vast, but it was still only one province. We'd managed to gather a staggering thirty thousand people by taking in all manner of riffraff.

There were boys whose upper lips had only just begun to darken, and Third Rate swordsmen who'd spent their whole lives in back alleys before growing old. Everywhere I looked, I saw people who might never have had their lives threatened—let alone killed anyone.

In the vast sea of Murim, they were small fry. Prey for the other predators.

I didn't look down on them. I had neither the right nor the inclination. I'd been weak once myself. Even now, there were people who would consider me weak.

What worried me was that we had to face Dark Heaven's forces with an army whose numbers had been inflated without adding much strength.

And besides…

More than half of them are from the unorthodox faction.

Someone once said it didn't matter whether a cat was white or black, as long as it caught mice. I agreed. History had already proved the point.

The Great Faction War had been the decisive turning point that united Murim under one banner. And during the Great Cataclysm in the modern era, even the infamous Mexican drug cartels had joined the government forces to fight the monsters.

An outside enemy could turn yesterday's foe into today's ally.

But right now, what mattered was who had put bells on all those black cats—and what he truly intended.

The Black Night King, Sima Gong.

The biggest, strongest black cat to survive the Great Faction War. Another Alliance Leader, ruling the unorthodox Murim of today.

If he already had other plans, the crushing defeat at Dunhuang and the fall of the Kongtong Sect might be nothing more than steps in a course set long ago. At the end of it, a new Heaven called Dark Heaven would be waiting for us all.

I have to stop that. No matter what it takes.

I muttered the words inwardly and glanced behind me.

Sama Pyo, walking along in silence, caught my brief look and gave me a small nod.

He looked no different from usual. Yet just then, it felt as if a huge boulder were pressing down on one corner of my chest.

Rustle.

Dozens of jang[3654] away, the bare trees shivered all at once. A group emerged among them, hundreds of silver arrowheads glinting between the branches.

My brief alarm eased at a shout.

“Lower your bows! They’re our brothers from Gansu Murim!”

Not everyone relaxed.

“Stand by! No one lowers their guard until I give the order!”

The voice boomed. Its owner wore rough armor and had pulled his helmet low over his face. He was heavily armed.

One thought flashed through my mind.

The military.

Step, step.

Despite his heavy armor, he moved with easy grace. He covered the dozen or so jang[3655] between us at a measured pace. Sima Gong, who was leading our group, opened his mouth.

Or rather, he tried to.

The man passed Sima Gong as smoothly as water flowing downstream, fixed his gaze on me, and asked,

“May I ask your name, sir?”

“Have you no manners? Do you even know who this man is, to demand an answer from him?”

Naturally, I wasn’t the one who said that.

Before I could speak, Hyuk Mujin stepped forward, putting on airs as he raised the silver tablet in his hand—wait. When had he taken that?

“If I may introduce him, he is the Third Young Master of the great Jin Family of Taiyuan, the hegemon of Shanxi Province; a Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard who protects the Great Nation’s imperial family; and one personally appointed by His August Majesty the Emperor…”

“Hong Pyo, Deputy Thousand Captain of the Gansu Regional Military Commission!”

A roar swallowed Hyuk Mujin’s voice. The knees of the man, who had stood like an iron tower, bent.

Thud.

With a heavy sound, the man—Hong Pyo—knelt on one knee and gave me a crisp military salute.

[3654] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[3655] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

"I pay my respects to the Marquis of Shangshan!"

"We pay our respects to the Marquis of Shangshan!"

Hundreds of voices rang across the cold snowfield. Only then did the soldiers lower their bows and weapons. They knelt with Hong Pyo and bowed low.

Hyuk Mujin began to tremble.

"Nngh. Ugh. Ahhh."

"…What's that weird noise?"

"Captain. I think I'm gonna burst."

"…"

Burst, my ass. You lunatic.

I sighed and shook my head. Then I caught Sima Gong watching us with a peculiar look, and I smacked my lips.

"Mujin."

"Yes?"

"Go ahead. Let it all out."

Hyuk Mujin's face turned stern.

"What do you mean, let it out? It's just a figure of speech."

"…"

"Don't say embarrassing things like that in front of your subordinates. You need to maintain your dignity as a marquis. Otherwise, you'll look vulgar."

I really wanted to kill him.

Hong Pyo, the man with the lengthy title of Deputy Thousand Captain of the Gansu Regional Military Commission, was built like a bear.

To put it kindly, he was steadfast. To put it less kindly, he was so inflexible he didn't know when to back down.

In a word…

An unlucky Jeong Hogun, maybe.

Thinking of Thousand Captain Jeong Hogun, whom we'd had no choice but to leave behind because we were in such a hurry, Hong Pyo reminded me of him, yet was unmistakably different.

And the biggest reason I could make such a firm judgment about Hong Pyo's character, whom I'd only met today, was probably his attitude toward Sima Gong.

"So you're the Deputy Thousand Captain everyone's been talking about. They say no one in the world is more meticulous than you when it comes to carrying out official business."

Sima Gong had already been ignored once, but he addressed Hong Pyo with a gentle smile. Hong Pyo stared at him blankly for a moment, then spoke.

“Identity tablet.”

“Pardon?”

“Present your identity tablet. I’ll verify who you are, as procedure requires.”

“…You’re asking me for my identity tablet?”

Hong Pyo nodded without hesitation.

“Yes.”

“Do you not know who I am?”

“I saw you once from a distance at the City Lord’s sixtieth-birthday banquet the year before last. I asked my superior, the Regional Military Commissioner, and he told me you were the Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate.”

“I see. Then you know.”

“What does that have to do with anything? That was then. This is now. My duty is to guard this stretch of roughly three hundred jang[3656] and verify the identity of anyone passing through. Nothing more. The Marquis of Shangshan has already gone through the procedure.”

Hong Pyo frowned at Sima Gong as though he were looking at a particularly strange man.

“Don’t make me ask again. I can overlook you speaking so casually to me, since you’re clearly older. But if you keep refusing, old man, you won’t like what happens.”

“…!”

The air seemed to freeze, and not just because we were on the snow-covered Great Snow Mountain.

Who was Sima Gong?

He was the Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate, a man with enormous influence over Gansu Murim. With his standing and power, he could sit at the City Lord’s table as an equal. He had strong ties to both Murim and the government.

Hong Pyo had demanded that man’s identity tablet and called him an old man.

That alone was enough to stun everyone. Then Hong Pyo went a step further.

Swish.

“I told you. I won’t ask twice.”

He drew the iron baton from his waist. Sima Gong and everyone around him fell silent.

“Ha! Hahahaha! Yes! That’s exactly right!”

Jeok Cheongang’s laughter rang out. Holding his stomach, he guffawed as he looked at Hong Pyo.

[3656] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

“A man ought to carry out the duty he’s been given. Now, what was your name?”

Hong Pyo answered Jeok Cheongang’s friendly question.

“Identity tablet.”

“…Hm?”

“Have yours ready too. You’re next, old man.”

“…!”

“And your travel pass. That bright red hair of yours looks suspicious from root to tip.”

Silence threatened to suffocate us all. Hyuk Mujin trembled and whispered so quietly I could barely hear him.

“Captain. I really think I’m gonna burst.”

But before I could answer, a sound echoed like a distant call from beyond the white ridge stretching far away.

Boom. Ba-boom. Booooom!

An urgent drumbeat.

The sound of the war drums shook the snow-covered mountain range.

Chapter 1024

For martial artists who lived on the edge of death, hearing was an invaluable sense.

Sound carried a great deal of meaning.

When you were facing an enemy, the whisper of a sleeve brushing past could only mean they were launching a sneak attack. And you could read someone's state of mind from the pitch and tremor of their voice.

To a martial artist, sound was information.

And the drumbeats rolling in from far away at that very moment were no exception.

Thump. Thump-thump. Thuuump!

There was no proper rhythm, and each beat rang out at a different volume.

An image came to the middle-aged man's mind: somewhere in the snow-covered mountains, a drummer was pounding away with all his might, looking as if half his soul had already left his body. He scratched the back of his neck.

"Did we come on a little too strong with the greeting?"

Low laughter rippled through the group at his words.

By now, they weren't the only ones who knew that the hundred scouts from the Great Snow Mountain they had encountered nearby two hours earlier were dead.

"Can you blame them? The people they shared meals with came back as corpses overnight."

"Those horses came back with heads dangling all over them. Looks like everyone's scared out of their wits already, and this is only the beginning."

"Still, we mustn't let our guard down. We don't know exactly how powerful the Fire King, that old monster, is…"

Boom!

A deafening whoosh swallowed the rest of the old man's words.

Before he could finish speaking, an immense force slammed into his chest. He shot backward like a cannonball, righted himself in midair, and tried to land.

"Ugh, bleurgh!"

Blood spilled from his lips. He lost his balance and staggered.

Unable to withstand his internal injuries, he dropped to one knee. The other two elders, who had been laughing along moments ago, stared at the middle-aged man, their faces stiff.

Having felled a Supreme Peak master with a single move, the middle-aged man glanced from his hand to the fallen elder and back, looking perfectly unconcerned.

"Well, I put too much into that. Elder Three, are you all right?"

Elder Three knelt there coughing up blood. He answered between gasps.

“I’m… I’m fine.”

“I didn’t mean for it to come to that… More importantly, what do you think?”

“What… do you mean?”

The middle-aged man smiled at him.

“I’m asking how I compare to the Fire King, that old man.”

“…!”

“What, you think I don’t stand a chance? Well, you don’t know much about the Fire King either, so I suppose it’s hard to answer. You said you’d only seen him once, from a distance, a long time ago. Wasn’t that right?”

He looked over the three elders in turn, smacked his lips, and muttered, “Shouldn’t have asked. You ran off like rats, so how would you know?”

Could there be a greater insult to martial artists, who were said to be made of pride and confidence instead of flesh and blood?

Yet the three old men—the Three Elders of Tianshan—could only tremble in silence.

Were they trying to suppress the rage welling up inside them?

No.

How could they suppress something that wasn’t there?

There was no anger toward the middle-aged man in their aging bodies or hearts. What bound them like chains was fear.

He’d lashed out with a killing blow without hesitation over a single word that displeased him. His expression and tone made it seem as though he were looking at ants he could crush underfoot at any moment.

The middle-aged man before them had both the strength and the right to act that way.

“Please forgive us!”

“I-It’s because we’re lacking.”

“This foolish old man misspoke. How could the Fire King possibly be a match for the Demon Lord?”

The three fiends of Tianshan, who had once drenched the Central Plains in blood beneath the Demonic Cult’s banner, scrambled to prostrate themselves.

If they didn’t, they felt the middle-aged man—the Blood-Sword Demon Lord—might kill them on the spot.

He looked down at them with an unmistakable sneer.

Pathetic fools. Did we really try to conquer the world with men like these?

His scorn wasn’t limited to the Three Elders of Tianshan. It was directed at the man he had once followed, the man who had been everything to him.

You were bound to fail, Cult Leader. You were only human, yet you compared yourself to Heaven.

The Heavenly Demon.

Remembering the man who had inherited that title through the generations and ruled as the king and Heaven of the Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord let out a hollow laugh.

Looking back now, it was laughable. He had placed his faith and loyalty in a man of that caliber.

That he had dreamed of a Demonic Path ruling the world—a feat no Heavenly Demon had achieved in a thousand years.

But things were different now.

Failure had brought him enlightenment, and he had accepted a new Heaven.

A new Heaven called the Lord of Heaven.

His true master.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord firmly believed that the enemies drawing nearer on the Great Snow Mountain would soon serve the Lord of Heaven alongside him. Even if they refused, resisted with all their might, and chose death in the end, the outcome would be the same.

In the end, they'll seek shelter in that person's shadow.

Laughing softly, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord turned to look behind him.

Crunch. Crunch.

Tens of thousands of troops were marching toward the Great Snow Mountain, crushing the frost-covered plants underfoot.

At their head were seven strange figures dressed in black as pitch, and, in stark contrast, several dozen people dressed in white.

"You seem worried, so I'll tell you one thing."

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord spoke without warning, then continued slowly, addressing the Three Elders of Tianshan.

"Someone like the Fire King could never stop us."

This wasn't confidence. It was certainty.

Certainty in the strength they had kept hidden even when they crossed Jade Gate Pass and trampled Dunhuang, defended by the Zhongnan Sect, in a single sweep.

The Three Elders of Tianshan had an inkling of it too. Even they, fiends who had once dominated their age, sensed something ominous about those figures. Whoever they were, they were no ordinary people.

But…

What exactly are they?

He hasn't told us their names or titles. How can he be so certain?

There's nothing we can do. We just have to follow him.

They swallowed their questions. They didn't dare meet his eyes.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord clicked his tongue at their bowed heads, then gave his first order on the Great Snow Mountain.

“Send them a messenger.”

“A messenger?”

“We’ve already given them a greeting. We might as well show them the mercy of offering a chance to surrender. And…”

The Three Elders waited, but he left the sentence unfinished. A faint smile crossed his face.

There’s someone I’d very much like to see, too.

He didn’t mean the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang—an old enemy who had fought on a different battlefield for a different goal.

Before the fighting truly began, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord wanted to meet not the old monster from Mount Jiuhua, but his Disciple.

The Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung.

For some reason, the young colossus of the orthodox Murim had drawn the attention of his master—the Lord of Heaven—in a way the Demon Lord couldn’t understand.

From the moment he received the excessive order not to kill Taekyung even if they met, his thoughts had been fixed on him.

Let’s see if he’s worthy of that attention.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord’s eyes gleamed.

A hundred.

Not one of the Great Snow Mountain’s hundred scouts had been spared.

They had set out four hours earlier to check the enemy’s movements. Now they had returned together—as heads dangling from the saddles of their horses.

“J-Junior Sister…”

“No. No!”

Cries like screams rose all around us.

Those who had lost people close to them in the scouting party poured out their grief and rage. Even the Fire Dragon Pavilion members, who were used to gruesome sights, clenched their teeth.

“This…”

Someone’s lips trembled, unable to finish the thought.

But in a situation like this, someone had to keep a cool head. I examined the severed heads, then exchanged a look with Jeok Cheongang.

“You saw it?”

“Yes. Each was cut with a single stroke. And the wounds are all alike.”

“So that means…”

“One person did it. That sword technique is fearsome. I’ve seen few like it in all my years.”

Death left its mark. The cuts that had severed the scouts’ heads were so uniform and sharp they looked as though they’d been measured with a ruler.

If even Jeok Cheongang judged it that way, then it had to be a master at least comparable to one of the Ten Kings—or someone even stronger—who had slaughtered them all.

“And this…”

Jeok Cheongang stopped and frowned.

“Damn it, I can’t place it. I’m sure I’ve seen a wound like this somewhere before…”

He seemed to be searching his memory, but I quietly shook my head.

The enemy’s identity wasn’t what mattered right now.

What mattered was the horrifying number of enemies approaching in the distance, raising a vast cloud of dust.

I couldn’t make out their exact numbers yet, but even just counting those pouring down the hill toward us, there were a staggering twenty thousand.

They were still several hundred jang[3657] away. Even so, the aura and killing intent pouring from that enormous army sent the birds of the harsh Great Snow Mountain beating their wings in frantic flight.

“Damn it. It was real. What I saw was real. Those fiends made it all the way here.”

Ma Junggeol, chief of the Seven Masters of Baekma Bang, had been dragged here as something of a hostage. He chewed his lip as he muttered.

In his trembling hand was a telescope—or, as they called it in Murim, a ten-li[3658] scope.

“Madness. The Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples, just like I’d heard. We’re finished. It’s all over…”

“Shut your mouth, unless you want to be the first one finished.”

That was enough to silence Ma Junggeol. Hyuk Mujin snatched the scope from his hand and whispered to me.

“Captain. What do you plan to do now?”

I answered evenly.

“You know what we have to do.”

With the enemy almost upon us, only one choice remained.

Battle.

No—a bloody fight.

[3657] A jang is a traditional length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[3658] A Chinese li is about 500 m (0.311 mi); ten li is about 5 km (3.1 mi).

Once a fire took hold, it wouldn't stop until it had burned the whole field. The fire called Dark Heaven had started in the desert and reached the Great Snow Mountain. We would set a fire of our own against it.

It'll only end once everything around us is stained with blood.

Hyuk Mujin knew it. I knew it. Everyone on the Great Snow Mountain preparing to fight for their lives knew it.

And none of us knew how the battle would end.

Though someone might already have a guess.

I glanced at Sima Gong, directing the martial artists of the Black Dragon Demon Gate in the distance. Then at Sama Pyo, who stood staring down the mountainside, his face rigid instead of its usual calm.

The next moment, I realized why.

It wasn't the pressure of battle, or some secret he was hiding.

"They're coming."

At his quiet words, I turned and saw them.

A group carrying a white flag high overhead was making its way toward us through the tens of thousands of troops that had crested the hill and blackened the foot of the mountain.

Chapter 1025

There were only a dozen or so of them, yet three things made them stand out even among tens of thousands of enemies.

First, the white banner held high enough to pierce the sky.

Second, a massive black horse charging fiercely, its jet-black mane flying in stark contrast to that banner.

And third, the three old men at the front of the group.

Who are those old men?

They were too far away for even my Qi Sense to make them out. Still, I could instinctively feel that their auras were anything but ordinary.

I narrowed my eyes. By then, the group had reached the foot of the mountain, and a deep voice boomed from among them.

“You dogs of the Murim Alliance, listen!”

Backed by profound internal energy, the voice carried across the mountain range.

The old man who’d shouted had a blood-soaked shirt, though I couldn’t tell why. Jeok Cheongang looked at me and blinked.

“Goodness, how strange. I think this old man just heard a bizarre hallucination.”

“I doubt it.”

“What? Then that madman really did tell us to prostrate ourselves? And to no one else but this old man?”

“He didn’t single you out quite like that, but you do belong to the Murim Alliance at the moment.”

“I do. For now.”

“He called us dogs of the Murim Alliance, so that includes you. For now.”

“So this old man heard him correctly.”

Jeok Cheongang thought for a moment, then went on.

“Let me ask you something. When a pack of worthless mutts crawls out of nowhere and insults a Master as exalted as the heavens, how should his one and only Disciple—no, someone more or less like a Disciple—respond?”

“…”

If you’re a Disciple, you’re a Disciple. What was this “more or less like one” business?

He was still stubbornly keeping up the act. I clicked my tongue and answered with action rather than words.

Whoosh. Clack.

“H-Huh?”

Leaving the martial artist who'd suddenly been left empty-handed staring in confusion, I drew back the spear I'd borrowed from him as far as I could.

"Borrowed" wouldn't be the right word.

I wouldn't be able to give it back.

Swish.

My waist bent like a bow. My muscles contracted, my joints relaxed, and the movements flowed together as one.

At the far end of the direction the spearhead pointed, the group carrying the white banner continued shouting.

"If you throw down your weapons and surrender at once—!"

Whoosh!

The spear left my hand and tore through the air.

It outran even the fierce whistle of its own passage, becoming a streak of light. It reached its target in an instant.

Boom!

Bright red blood burst into the air.

The black horse, its body blown apart before it could even whinny, crumpled like a rotten tree trunk. The old man who'd been loudly spouting the most ridiculous nonsense dropped lightly to the ground.

A Supreme Peak master.

I'd suspected as much when he'd used enough internal energy to send his voice across the rugged mountain range. The old man was more than worthy of being called a superhuman.

Even at that distance, he'd evaded a spear carrying tremendous force and speed without much difficulty.

And he wasn't the only one in the group with that level of skill.

"That's quite a rough welcome, child."

"Launching a preemptive attack on someone carrying a white banner? Has the code of the martial world you've been going on about fallen to the ground?"

The voices were low but clear.

Through the countless bare branches, the other two old men stared straight at me.

"So it's you. That young brat we've heard about."

"Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung, is that right?"

I put internal energy behind my answer.

"Nope."

"…"

"…"

"Kidding. It is."

"…!"

"…!"

The two old men, who'd greeted me like they knew me, looked at each other in bewilderment. So did the one whose horse I'd just taken out with a spear.

There were probably two reasons.

First, this young brat had started talking nonsense right off the bat. Maybe he'd eaten something bad.

Second, whatever that brat had been eating, he'd clearly had plenty of it. The internal energy behind his nonsense was immense.

I had no intention of explaining to those senile old men how much EXP I'd eaten by now.

I was simply curious why, after using their overwhelming forces to crush even Dunhuang, they were urging us to surrender.

First, though, I needed to know who these mutts were.

"I've told you who I am, so we might as well exchange names. There's that code of the martial world you mentioned."

The old man in the middle, his face covered in pockmarks, answered readily.

"You've got no manners for a brat still wet behind the ears. Fine. We're called the Three Elders of Tianshan."

My eyes widened.

"The Three Elders of Tianshan…!"

The second old man, fat and potbellied, nodded as if he'd expected that reaction.

"So you have heard of us."

"Good heavens. You're the Three Elders of Tianshan?"

At my exclamation, the third old man—clearly the lowest-ranking of the three, with a crown like a heaping bowl of rice—gave a short laugh.

"You must have heard the tales about us that have been passed down since before the Great Faction War. Are you finally ready to talk properly?"

I kept my surprised expression.

"No."

"Don't do something you'll regret. Even now, you can—what?"

"I said no. I've never even heard that title before today. And cut the 'Elder' stuff."

"What?"

"I figured if I acted surprised, you'd start blabbing on your own. Oh, have you ever heard of the Three Elders of Tianshan?"

I turned to the living Murim encyclopedia, Jeok Wiki. Before long, he answered.

"I've long heard that three stray dogs wander around Tianshan."

"Ah-ha."

“Dogs by nature, it seems. During the Great Faction War, they sided with the Demonic Cult and raised all kinds of hell in the Central Plains. This old man was itching to teach them a lesson.”

“And?”

“And what? If this old man had made up his mind, why do you think those bastards are still breathing?”

“You never met them on the battlefield.”

“Born sons of bitches, but they had good noses. They ran so damn fast I never even caught sight of their shadows.”

“Oh.”

I drew my conclusion from our brief conversation and muttered as if to myself.

With enough internal energy behind it for everyone to hear, of course.

“They were weak as shit.”

“…!”

“…!”

“…!”

The air around us trembled.

But unlike the enemy at the foot of the mountain, whose rage was boiling hot despite being invisible, the allies lined up along the ridge reacted differently.

Who were the Three Elders of Tianshan?

Fiends from a bygone era. Supreme Peak masters who’d made their mark during the Great Faction War and struck fear into everyone.

And yet Jeok Cheongang and I looked down at them and called them nothing but a bunch of dogs. Weaklings.

Those outrageous insults and absurd antics were enough to fill our allies with both astonishment and relief.

Exactly what I was going for.

With a fierce battle ahead, I’d provoked the enemy with a few words and raised our allies’ morale at the same time.

It wouldn’t overturn our disadvantage in an instant, but momentum mattered more than anything.

Of course…

If the Lord of Heaven is here, momentum won’t mean a damn thing.

The new Heaven of the Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples.

Evil itself, possessed of power so immense I couldn’t begin to guess its limits.

The corner of my mouth had curled up for all to see, but the thought of that absolute being—someone I’d never once met—left a heaviness in my chest.

If someone can send the Three Elders of Tianshan as mere messengers, who the hell is leading them?

As though he'd read my mind, the pockmarked old man—apparently the eldest of the three—glared up at us, his eyes blazing, and spoke.

"There's no need for more talk. The Demon Lord wishes to see you."

"…What?"

The Demon Lord?

I frowned and exchanged glances with Jeok Cheongang and the other leaders.

As everyone here knew, all those who could be called Demon Lords were dead.

The three Demon Lords of the East, West, and North, and even the Southern Heaven Demon Empress, who had finally met her end at the Nanman Beast Palace.

But there's another Demon Lord left?

Had these bastards come up with something tacky and ridiculous, like the East-West Demon Lord or the Northwest Demon Empress?

Then someone came to mind.

Could it be the Blood Lord?

Had he filled the vacancy left by a coworker who'd been marked dead on the job?

Before the leaders could begin whispering about the enemy commander's identity, another shout rang out from the foot of the mountain.

"The Demon Lord says your safety will be guaranteed if you accept this offer!"

Dark Heaven was guaranteeing our safety?

That was obviously complete bullshit.

The leaders laughed at the ridiculous claim, and so did I.

Then, at a gesture from the Three Elders, one of the Dark Heaven martial artists following them took something from his saddle and handed it over.

Whoosh. Thud.

It flew high and landed halfway up the mountain. Our allies carried it straight to the leaders. Before I opened the large, blood-soaked bundle, I knew what was inside.

No—we all did.

Thump. Thump-thump.

"Ugh…!"

Dozens of severed heads rolled down with heavy thuds. Groans rose from all around us. Among them, Sima Gong recognized a familiar face and murmured,

"The Kongtong Sword Dragon."

I'd never seen him, but I'd heard the title.

A direct Disciple of the Kongtong Sect Leader and one of the greatest young prodigies in the Central Plains, known as one of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes.

And the very man said to have escaped Dunhuang alive with his Master, the Sect Leader.

"T-the two Perfected Ones[3659] who served as Elders are here, too."

"The Guardian Court Chief has also met his end. How could this have happened…?"

Those already believed dead were among the heads. So were people we'd been told had survived.

The core leadership of the Kongtong Sect had come back to us as severed heads.

"Then could it be…"

I couldn't finish. Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord shook his head gravely.

"Fortunately, it seems the Sect Leader escaped their grasp. Though I don't know if we should call that fortunate."

The fighting at Dunhuang hadn't been the end.

There had been a relentless pursuit, and a horrific slaughter.

And now, for some reason, a new Demon Lord we'd never heard of wanted to see us. He'd even sent the Three Elders of Tianshan to back his demand with a threat.

"A shame you're so far away. If you were closer, I could see your faces properly."

The three old men, furious only moments ago, went on with a cackling laugh.

"You don't think this is all, do you? Hm?"

Jeok Cheongang spoke in a low voice.

"What the hell are you talking about?"

Perhaps some old fear had surfaced. The Three Elders of Tianshan flinched at Jeok Cheongang's presence, but soon answered, putting even more force into their voices.

"A thousand. We still have another thousand prisoners."

"…!"

"If you accept the offer you made earlier, we're willing to return some of them."

My mouth went dry. My stomach twisted as I asked,

"And if we refuse?"

The three sons of bitches laughed aloud.

"Want to find out?"

Damn it.

That all but decided my answer.

[3659] Perfected One translates zhenren, a Daoist honorific for someone regarded as spiritually accomplished.

Chapter 1026

Their offer was simple.

First, we would meet halfway in half an hour, unarmed.

Second, no more than three people could attend.

And third…

One of those three had to be the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung.

I was watching the Three Elders of Tianshan ride away, going over the terms I'd just heard, when Jeok Cheongang spoke.

"You're staying behind."

His voice was firm. He looked at me, his face set, and continued.

"Not this time."

I shrugged.

"That's not quite what I was going to say, but close enough."

"What are you talking about?"

"I was about to say something similar. I think I have to go this time."

"…!"

There was no other choice.

A thousand people.

The bastards had wagered a thousand lives without hesitation. This wasn't some empty bluff to lure us down from the Great Snow Mountain.

Even now, a long line of prisoners, looking battered and miserable, was appearing on the distant hillside, bound together.

They had to be people captured at Dunhuang, or people who'd fled only to be hunted down.

"You see them, right?"

Jeok Cheongang didn't answer. I went on.

"Not ten. Not a hundred. A thousand. We don't have a choice."

Before leaving, those three bastard dogs who'd spent their lives as outlaws had delivered a stern warning, as if they were judges handing down a sentence.

If we broke even one of their conditions, they would kill every last prisoner.

And I didn't want those people sentenced to death.

"Honestly, I'm pretty damn scared too, but what can you do? I don't know how much longer I'll live, but… if I don't want to spend the rest of it losing sleep, I have to go."

Half joke, half serious.

When will the nightmares stop?

I pushed the thought aside and made myself smile. Jeok Cheongang, who had been silent for a long while, finally sighed.

“You foolish brat.”

“Hey, what’s that for? You should be cursing those bastards, not me. Shameless pricks. They won big, then went and chased everyone down too.”

“Don’t pretend to be cheerful. It doesn’t suit you.”

“Is it that obvious?”

“You’re more shameless than anyone under heaven, yet you’ve never been any good at lying.”

“…I guess not.”

“Even if there were only ten prisoners instead of ten thousand or a thousand, you’d go. That’s the kind of person you are, as far as this old man knows.”

Would I?

I didn’t know. It was hard to be certain about something that hadn’t happened.

But… yeah. I probably would.

And I thought Jeok Cheongang was that kind of person, too.

“You’re going, right? Even if I try to stop you?”

“Were you planning to?”

“No.”

I grew serious.

“If things go wrong, we could be dead in a flash. I need you beside me, Old Master.”

Only then did Jeok Cheongang let out a quiet laugh.

“So we die together?”

“Why put it like that? I mean we live together.”

“Isn’t that the same thing?”

“Of course not. One word can make all the difference. How could you say that? Keep it up and you’ll hurt my feelings. Can’t you feel my trust, hope, and love for you?”

“You never run out of words when you start wagging that tongue. But…”

His amusement faded, and his voice dropped.

“Do you think those men share that trust you’re talking about?”

Instead of answering, I looked where he was looking.

The men in question—the leaders—had finished their deliberations and were approaching from some distance away.

Squish. Squish.

Dozens of feet crossed ground turned to mud by snow and rain.

At their head was one man.

The Black Night King, Sima Gong.

"Have you made up your mind?"

For a moment, I stared at Sima Gong as he got straight to the point.

Then I answered.

"I made up my mind a while ago. And so did the old—my Master here."

"You understand how dangerous this could be?"

"Of course."

"Be careful. If they can draw in a major piece with just a thousand prisoners, it will be the best possible outcome for them."

He was right about that.

As much as I hated to say it, Jeok Cheongang and I had to be Dark Heaven's highest-priority targets. After all the damage we'd done, they must have wanted nothing more than to tear us apart.

But…

Just a thousand, huh.

No matter how you looked at it…

How could you talk so lightly about the immense weight of so many lives?

And how much did the outcome Dark Heaven wanted resemble the picture you were trying to paint? How sincere was that warning to be careful?

I swallowed the words circling the tip of my tongue. Then four characters suddenly came to mind, and I blurted them out.

"A large group doesn't die easily."

"A large group doesn't die easily… I see. If you and Senior Jeok go, you should be able to return safely even if it's a trap."

Sima Gong murmured the old Go proverb to himself, then nodded.

"I understand what you and Senior Jeok have decided."

We'd given them our answer. Now it was time to hear theirs.

"Then who's the third person?"

Three people could attend. Jeok Cheongang and I were settled, leaving one place open.

What happened next was more or less what I'd expected.

"I'll go. As Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate, I'm willing to—"

"No. I'll go."

The two spoke almost at once.

Like a couple of middle-aged men arguing over who got to pay the bill at a bar, Sima Gong and the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord each tried to stop the other.

"We don't know what danger awaits us. Sect Leader, you should remain here."

"Then all the more reason for me to go. By that reasoning, I'm better suited to it than Sect Leader Sima."

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord had a point. Choosing him for the last place was the sensible decision.

Sima Gong wasn't merely the leader of a sect. He was the beginning and end of the Black Dragon Demon Gate, the heart of the Gansu Murim world. If something happened to him, the Black Dragon Demon Gate—no, the entire Gansu force, which made up more than half our army—would be thrown into disarray.

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord, on the other hand, had two Senior Brothers who could take his place as head of the Zhongnan Sect. Whatever their faults as people, the Roaring Fury Swordsman and the Taeeul Merciless Sword had enough influence within the sect.

Given the danger and the importance of the positions they held, sending the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord was the lower-risk choice.

Of course…

Only if you're sure the person left behind is an ally you can trust completely.

It might be the sensible decision, but if common sense ruled the world, why would we be here?

Sometimes the world changed because of a tiny handful of madmen. For better or worse.

And one of those madmen might seize control of our rear while Jeok Cheongang, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord, and I are gone.

But I couldn't argue against the decision on the strength of a suspicion I couldn't prove. Nor did we have time.

We're running out of it.

More than half of the promised half hour had already passed.

I quietly met Jeok Cheongang's eyes and knew we were thinking the same thing.

If those are the choices…

The two of us should go alone. Sima Gong was someone we couldn't fully trust whether he came with us or stayed behind. That made it all the more important for the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord to remain here.

I was about to tell everyone.

Or rather, I would have—if someone no one expected hadn't spoken first.

Step.

"Forgive me for speaking out of turn, but may I ask you both to yield the place to me?"

"…!"

I saw it clearly: as his son stepped forward, his footsteps ringing unusually loud, his father's eyes sank into a deep, dark gaze.

"Please give me the last place."

Sama Pyo repeated himself, his voice clear enough for everyone to hear.

"I'll go. Myself."

Why?

Why had it turned out this way?

I didn't know. For the moment, all that mattered was that I was walking between Jeok Cheongang and Sama Pyo.

But my patience was just a little too thin to keep the questions building inside me to myself.

"Why'd you do it?"

I kept my gaze straight ahead. After a moment, Sama Pyo answered quietly.

"I don't know what you mean."

"Why'd you suddenly volunteer? It was pretty much decided."

"If it had been decided, I wouldn't be here. Would I?"

I frowned.

"Well…"

"No one wants to walk willingly into a place that might be a death trap. Not even the Sect Leader of one of the Nine Sects and One Gang, however highly he values honor."

Sama Pyo continued evenly.

"And his disciples would do whatever they could to keep their Sect Leader from going. Wouldn't they, Pavilion Master?"

I couldn't argue. He wasn't speculating. He was describing what had happened moments ago.

When Sama Pyo stepped forward at just the right time, the Zhongnan disciples had looked relieved and done everything they could to dissuade their Sect Leader. The leaders of the Gansu Murim forces had taken their chance, too, grabbing at Sima Gong's sleeves.

If everyone left, who would be in command if something happened?

What would happen to all these people?

Sama Pyo was both the Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate and a member of the Fire Dragon Pavilion. He had grounds to dissuade the leaders and the standing to volunteer himself. Perhaps that was why everyone had accepted the young man's sudden offer without much fuss.

Put in modern terms, the situation had fallen into place rather neatly.

While everyone had been trying to read each other's faces, waiting to see which leader would be left holding the bag, Sama Pyo had scratched exactly the itch they all had.

Our people already knew trying to stop us wouldn't do a damn thing.

The other Fire Dragon Pavilion members who were staying behind hadn't tried to dissuade us either. They'd simply told us to come back safely.

Anyway, everyone had gotten what they wanted.

Well, maybe not everyone.

Sima Gong.

What had gone through his mind when his son stepped forward? Had that look in his eyes been part of a plan, or had Sama Pyo caught him off guard?

And…

What the hell was Sama Pyo thinking?

He still hadn't answered my question. Instead, he brought up something that seemed to have nothing to do with it.

"By the way, I didn't know you knew Go."

"What?"

"You said it earlier, Pavilion Master. 'A large group doesn't die easily.'"

Was he changing the subject, or trying to tell me something? I couldn't tell.

"I don't know much about Go. I just picked up a few things watching and listening when I was little."

"When you were little…"

"My dad liked Go."

"I see. I've heard a little about the Strange Hero of Shanxi, your Family Head."

"I haven't seen him in a long time, but I still remember him clearly."

Sima Gong would have no idea who I meant.

In this second world, I'd found brothers who weren't related to me by blood. I'd made new companions and friends, and met a Master. But I'd only ever had one father.

Whenever he lost a game of online Go, he'd console himself by insisting those Chinese bastards must have used a cheating program. He'd also poured all his money into the stock of a certain major Korean electronics company, chanting that a large group didn't die easily.

That was Dad.

"Dad, why is the whole computer screen blue?"

"Son, what color is the sky?"

"Red."

"No, that's the sunset. The sky is usually blue. My stock's only blue for a little while too."

"Really? So it'll turn red soon?"

"Of course. This stock is a daema."

"Daema? Isn't that bad? The stuff that makes you feel good?"[3660]

"What on earth are you doing at kindergarten… No. Anyway, not that kind of daema. This means something really big and strong. And something this big and strong doesn't die easily. In Go, we say a large group doesn't die easily."

"Oh."

"Before long, that line on the screen will shoot right up. High into the sky, red like the sunset."

"Hmm. Okay. But, Dad."

"Yeah?"

"Look at Mom's face. It's really red!"

"…Honey, when did you get here?"

A quiet laugh escaped me.

I knew I shouldn't laugh at a time like this, but I couldn't hide the smile creeping onto my lips.

"It's nothing. I just… remembered something nice from a long time ago."

"A nice memory with your father."

Sama Pyo murmured as if to himself, then smiled along with me.

"I see."

His smile was dim and bitter, like the clouded sky. The sight of it gave me a strange sense of déjà vu.

Then Jeok Cheongang, who had been walking silently ahead of us, spoke.

"If you two are done laughing and chatting, it's time to greet our unwelcome guest."

At that moment, hoofbeats sounded.

Clip-clop. Clip-clop.

With the slow sound of approaching hooves, they finally appeared.

No—not they.

He did.

[3660] Daema means a large group of stones in Go; the same word also means cannabis in Korean.

Chapter 1027

Some people stand out.

Like an awl poking through a pocket. Like a reef rising from the middle of the sea. Like a wildflower in the wilderness.

The man approaching now, as leisurely as if he were admiring the scenery, was one of them.

Clip-clop. Clip-clop.

Gray hair swayed to the slow rhythm of his horse's hooves.

The middle-aged man's features were ordinary—neither particularly handsome nor ugly—but his pupils were long, vertical slits.

What truly set him apart, though, was the blood-red light in his eyes. Redder than flame, and far more chilling.

"This is the first time we've met face-to-face. Good to see you, Senior Jeok."

A respectful address, delivered with a smile in his voice.

That was when Jeok Cheongang's eyes widened. The middle-aged man had stopped over ten jang[3661] away, and Jeok was staring at his reptilian pupils.

"You can't be…"

"We were both too busy to meet the last time. What a shame. If you'd been there, Goyangcheon would still be alive and well by now. Don't you think?"

Goyangcheon.

I remembered the name from something Jeok Cheongang had told me.

He had been the Family Head of the Goyang Family, which once wielded power to rival the Five Great Families. Or rather, he had been its last survivor.

After the Demonic Cult wiped out his family, Goyangcheon became a man consumed by revenge. The world called him the Spear King. Near the end of the Great Faction War, that great martial artist was found in an unnamed field.

He had been cut into dozens of pieces, together with the spear he'd treated as an extension of himself all his life.

Not by a hundred men, or a thousand. By one person.

A killer who craved blood more than anyone else in the Demonic Cult.

"The Blood-Sword Demon Lord…"

The name escaped me in a low groan. The middle-aged man—the Blood-Sword Demon Lord—broke into a wide smile.

The infirmities of old age are a frightening thing.

[3661] A jang is ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Ten jang is about 30.3 m (99.4 ft).

Like a thief slipping in under cover of night, they steal your memories one by one.

That was why, during our stay at Mount Jiuhua, I'd deliberately pestered Jeok Cheongang with questions about his past.

I hoped it might slow his illness, even a little. Hold off the curse of time for even fifteen minutes.

As it turned out, the arrangement was pretty good for both of us.

The old man, who'd been living alone with no one to talk to, recovered forgotten memories through our countless conversations. And the young man keeping him company learned all sorts of things from a veteran of the martial world who'd lived for more than a hundred years.

One of those things concerned the killer now smiling at me.

"I'm glad. You know who I am."

The System I had couldn't read minds.

But I could feel it instinctively.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord wasn't just saying he was glad I knew him. He genuinely was.

There was a childlike innocence to his delight.

That feeling was far too pure for a murderer responsible for so much bloodshed. It made him all the more unsettling.

"I used to be a pretty big deal, you know. These friends here were fairly famous themselves, but to the Demonic Cult, they were only useful guests."

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord beamed as he spoke. The Three Elders of Tianshan might have taken offense, but they only nodded, their faces stiff.

"Y-you are right a hundred times over. A thousand times."

"How could we ever presume to compare ourselves to the Demon Lord?"

"Though we are utterly lacking, being allowed to serve the Demon Lord is the honor of a lifetime."

They were remarkably good at kissing the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's ass on cue. I wanted to ask how many times a day they brushed their teeth, but from their perspective, it made sense.

The weak fall to the strong. Might Makes Right.

Those called demonic martial artists pursued strength more openly than anyone, and the Blood-Sword Demon Lord was a great fiend beyond comparison to the Three Elders of Tianshan.

Of course, by the world's standards, the Three Elders were great fiends too. Their martial prowess and the infamy they'd earned during the Great Faction War were more than enough to justify the name.

But as Jeok Cheongang had told them to their faces half an hour ago, they were stray dogs by birth.

They were simply far more ferocious than other dogs, with sharper, stronger teeth.

Still, there was no comparing them to the one mad dog who stood out even among that insane cult of fanatics, a group that had stood shoulder to shoulder with the Murim world for more than a thousand years.

Of course, its rabid dog seemed to have a new master now.

“The Demonic Cult? Shouldn’t you call it the Divine Cult?”

At my sudden question, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord smiled. He’d just called the Three Elders guests of the Demonic Cult himself.

“That was a long time ago. You know that already, so why ask?”

“So, now that you’ve changed collars, are they feeding you on time?”

“Well.”

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord opened his eyes wide in mock surprise and turned to Jeok Cheongang.

“Senior Jeok, how did you teach your Disciple? Even if we’re on different paths, shouldn’t we show each other some courtesy? Like I do.”

Jeok Cheongang answered calmly.

“I taught him better than your parents taught you, so don’t worry.”

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord stared at him for a moment, then roared with laughter.

“Well, well. You’re just as the rumors say.”

“And you’re worse. I regret not catching you and killing you long ago.”

“I know that fiery temper of yours, Senior. Whenever you appeared on a battlefield, useful men died left and right. The Cult Leader was furious more times than I can count.”

“That must have made things hard for you. Weren’t you the Heavenly Demon’s favorite guard dog, the one he kept closest?”

“Sorry to disappoint you, but I didn’t have much trouble. I just killed as many as were dying.”

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord went on, laughter still in his voice.

“When Heaven-Poison, that foolish old man, died, the Sect Leader of Hainan wasn’t enough. I had to bring back the Spear King’s head too. But what could I do? I wanted to do it.”

“Heaven-Poison? You mean the Heaven-Poison Demon Lord?”

“Well, was there another Heaven-Poison?”

I knew that title too.

Second only to the Heavenly Demon in the Demonic Cult, the Heaven-Poison Demon Lord had been a wall even Poison King Tang Taesang could not overcome. Tang Taesang, the former Grand Family Head of the Sichuan Tang Clan, was dead now too.

Then one day, the Heaven-Poison Demon Lord encountered disciples of Huashan on a battlefield. He died there.

Someone had unleashed a brilliant purple Sword Force, radiant enough to overwhelm the sunset.

“The Sword Saint—though I suppose I should call him the Alliance Leader now? In any case, I was secretly grateful to Mae Jonghak. That old Heaven-Poison always looked at me strangely. Luckily, he died before it was too late, and things worked out well.”

I watched the Blood-Sword Demon Lord chatter away, plainly delighted with himself. His last remark made me frown.

Things worked out well because he died?

Losing a master meant losing a vital part of your fighting strength. The Heaven-Poison Demon Lord’s death must have been a tremendous blow to the Demonic Cult.

And yet…

“So that’s when you changed collars.”

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord’s brow furrowed.

“‘Changed collars’ is a bit much… But think what you like.”

I already knew Dark Heaven had appeared before the Great Faction War ended.

The Head Elder of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, Baeksang of the Nanman Beast Palace, and even the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, who’d been the Emperor’s closest confidant…

If you traced things back far enough, Dark Heaven had been taking shape from the very beginning of the Great Faction War.

No. Perhaps…

Dark Heaven might have caused the Great Faction War in the first place.

A chill ran down my spine. I looked at the Blood-Sword Demon Lord.

“When did it start?”

“When did what start? I’m not sure what you mean.”

“When you people appeared. When the Lord of Heaven appeared.”

In that instant—

Whoosh!

Wind roared around us, a violent storm of qi.

The snow and frost covering the ground, and the dirt and sand hidden beneath them, flew in every direction before swiftly settling again.

Rustle.

As the debris of nature drifted back down, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord stared at me with a cold, sunken gaze.

“You really have no manners.”

The smile had vanished from his lips. His voice was low.

He sounded calm at first, but cold lava flowed beneath the words.

“How strange. I can understand you to a point, and yet I simply can’t understand you at all. Why would that person go out of their way to…”

He broke off. Then his face opened into a good-natured smile.

“Well, there must be a reason for everything that person does. As always. I only wanted to confirm one thing.”

I didn’t need to ask what.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord slowly raised a hand and continued.

“Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung. You’re strong. Strong enough that even I’d rather avoid a bloody fight with you. Strong enough that I worry you might commit the blasphemy of defeating that person.”

I could see his eyes on me. Hear his voice.

And I could feel the pure admiration in them.

Along with…

The faint killing intent hidden beneath it.

“Your limitless potential and your sense of justice have moved me. I mean that.”

“…!”

“…!”

“…!”

It happened in an instant.

Jeok Cheongang and I sprang forward. So did Sama Pyo, who had stood silently by until then.

The order and timing of our push off the ground and our charge differed, but the desperation driving us was probably the same.

Crack.

Our toes gouged the earth. Sand crumbled.

Internal energy surged from my dantian into the muscles of my tensed lower body, then exploded.

Boom!

The world slowed. The scenery shifted.

We shot forward, closing the distance of over ten jang[3662].

In that moment, Jeok Cheongang and I were two fierce streaks of flame. Sama Pyo was a silent wind.

And in the slowed flow of time, three walls rose to block the flames and the wind.

“Ha!”

Three voices. One shout.

[3662] A jang is ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Ten jang is about 30.3 m (99.4 ft).

The Three Elders of Tianshan.

The three fiends of Tianshan unleashed their pent-up fury and energy, wielding a power too great for anyone to dismiss them as mere stray dogs.

A coordinated technique, honed over ages of working together, merged the three walls into one enormous barrier.

Boom!

A single clash shook heaven and earth.

Amid that tremendous roar and the rippling waves of power that filled a time already split into fragments, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's hand, raised toward the sky, finally came down.

Like countless blades waiting on a hillside for a single command.

"Slash!"

Shhk! Thk-thk-thk!

As a thousand or so heads rolled to the ground, my eyes met the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's. The blood in my body went cold.

He was smiling.

Chapter 1028

At that moment, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord was smiling.

Pure delight and excitement filled his crescent-shaped eyes. His long, vertically slit pupils trembled with anticipation for what was to come.

More precisely, with anticipation for one young man.

Yes. That's it. That's exactly the look.

Watching Jin Taekyung's eyes widen with shock and fury, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord felt his heart pound.

He had erased a thousand lives with a single gesture, yet he paid them no mind. All his senses were fixed on Jin Taekyung.

He felt not the slightest guilt for the dead, nor the slightest remorse for breaking his promise.

He had been born and raised in the Demonic Cult.

The cruelty he'd possessed since his mother's womb had blossomed through the demonic martial arts he'd learned from the time he could walk. Even among the twenty-four great fiends who served the Heavenly Demon, no one could match him.

Now, Jin Taekyung was the only thing that interested him.

The Divine Dragon of the Central Plains Murim, a rising star whom his master was watching closely.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord wanted to see everything about that young brat.

He wanted to feel the full extent of the martial prowess unleashed at his fingertips, the emotions pouring out of him, the something special hidden within.

Show me. Hurry!

And just as the Blood-Sword Demon Lord cried out in his heart—

Whooosh!

An immense, unprecedented energy surged up around one man.

"Who should I kill first?"

Jin Taekyung.

At the sight of the cold flames pouring from the young man's eyes, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's smile deepened.

The Three Elders of Tianshan's first reaction was suspicion.

Jin Taekyung held a spear that hadn't been there moments ago.

How?

The promise had come to nothing now, but one of the terms of their meeting had been to come unarmed. Jin Taekyung's side had honored that condition.

They had all arrived empty-handed, a considerable comfort to the Three Elders of Tianshan.

If they could handle the terrifying old monster called the Fire King, two weaponless young brats shouldn't be much trouble.

Even if one of them was the renowned Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung, the three elders were fiends of a bygone age whose infamy had spread from Tianshan to the Central Plains.

As far as they were concerned, it was a fight they could win.

At least, until a spear appeared in Jin Taekyung's hand.

Until an immense power, far beyond anything they had expected, enveloped that divine weapon, clearly made of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron.

Hummm.

The dazzling white spearhead trembled.

No—the air around it shuddered in tiny ripples.

At the same time, an immense, pure energy surged up and wrapped around the spearhead. It was far too vast to be contained in the body of a young man who had turned twenty only a few years ago.

Ssssss.

What people called Force was no longer a dazzling blue-white.

This is…

The three old men caught their breath without realizing it.

What could they even call this power?

The Force gathered at the spearhead was dark as the deep sea. It burned blue like fire at its fiercest, yet also flashed like a thunderbolt.

It's different.

The Three Elders of Tianshan felt it instinctively.

That energy was of a different kind, a different order, from the energy they had cultivated all their lives.

But they had no way of knowing what it truly was.

They did not know that the strange familiarity they felt came from the internal energy Jin Taekyung had received from the Heavenly Power Demon.

They did not know that the ominous power born of demonic martial arts had finally become one with the Fire Gate Clan's hellfire and the Hebei Peng Family's thunderbolt.

Nor did they know just how immense and keen the power within that dark-blue streak of light was.

The one person who understood all of it better than anyone stood beside Jin Taekyung.

Ah.

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, watched Jin Taekyung, his gaze deep and still.

He had suspected as much. He simply hadn't confirmed it with his own eyes.

The summit of martial mastery.

The young man had reached the highest peak, one that touched the heavens. Age and experience were no longer measures by which to judge him.

He was a great martial artist who had forged a path of his own, one no one else had walked before.

Jeok Cheongang wanted to ask him, in all sincerity:

Do you know how remarkable the realm you've reached is?

And he wanted to tell him:

Across the Central Plains Murim, people gave those who reached such a realm a name spoken with the deepest respect.

The Ten Kings.

A vast, boundless sky and three stars.

Beneath them had stood ten giants.

And today, here and now, Jin Taekyung was proving himself the eleventh.

But he was different from those who had fallen to the passage of time or collapsed beneath their enemies' cold-blue blades, spilling their blood. He was a hero of a new age.

On this battlefield, where a thousand lives had been extinguished, an immense blaze was rising.

How dazzling you are.

A shiver ran down Jeok Cheongang's spine.

Then he looked at the Three Elders of Tianshan, staring at Jin Taekyung in a daze, and saw the shadow of death slowly falling over them.

"Old Master."

A quiet call, seething with pain at having failed to prevent so many deaths—and with the fury that pain had bred.

Jeok Cheongang spoke.

"Do as you've decided."

They didn't know those few, cryptic words were the trust and encouragement of a master to his Disciple, who was willing to risk his life.

Nor did they know that the brief exchange had sealed their fate.

Whoosh!

A sharp gust of wind swept through.

A dark-blue flash—impossible to tell whether it was flame, wave, or thunderbolt—distorted space as it rushed at them, impossibly fast and carrying tremendous force.

Slash!

Goose bumps rose across the First Elder's body. He twisted aside on instinct, but blood and terrible pain spread along the path of the strike.

"Gah!"

The flash had passed, and that was all.

If he hadn't glimpsed something indistinct at the last moment, his ghost would already be wandering the Nine Springs.

How? How could this…!

The First Elder gritted his teeth and barely held back the pain and shock. His face stricken, he clutched his deeply slashed chest and staggered backward.

Against such speed and power, retreat would only lead to death. Fortunately, he had two dependable sworn brothers.

"Elder Brother!"

"No!"

The Second and Third Elders cried out and charged. One wielded a saber, the other a sword. Their hands blurred as they swung at the same target.

Jin Taekyung, who had rushed at them with the ghostlike movements of an assassin.

KWAANG!

One spear against a saber and a sword.

The three weapons, carrying several jiazi[3663] of internal energy, collided with a terrible roar that shook everything around them.

The earth heaved. The air burst apart.

Amid waves of power more violently turbulent than anything they had ever felt, the two old men saw it clearly:

The cold flames pouring from Jin Taekyung's eyes. His hand gripping the spear shaft without the slightest tremor, even against two Supreme Peak masters.

And he was holding it with only one hand.

"Wa—"

Before the warning could leave their lips, Jin Taekyung's palm slammed into the Third Elder's chest.

Ah.

His vision swam. The Third Elder felt a terrible heat smash through bone and flesh and burrow deep inside him.

[3663] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle, used here to measure accumulated internal energy.

Crack.

The sickening sound came a moment later, faint as a distant echo. Blood surged into his mouth. As his body began to crumple, familiar shouts rang in his ears.

“You bastard!”

“Little Brother!”

No mistake. His elder brothers.

The world had called them fiends and bastards, but they had cherished him as if all three had been born of the same mother.

Crunch.

The Third Elder bit his tongue and forced his collapsing body upright.

He couldn’t fall here. He hadn’t survived this long to meet such a pointless end.

Besides…

We have the Demon Lord. We have his power.

The Third Elder was certain.

By now, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord must have stepped in.

He couldn’t see clearly through the haze in his mind, but surely a single command from the Demon Lord could free him from this terrible internal injury and pain.

But…

But why?

Why can’t I feel anything?

Even with his vision blurred, his senses as a Supreme Peak master remained. Yet as the Third Elder staggered and steadied himself, his Qi Sense told him everything was just as it had been.

Even while his two sworn brothers fought Jin Taekyung with all their might, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord’s presence remained where it had been, more than ten jang[3664] away.

“Demon Lord! Demon Lord!”

Crack! Boom!

The roar erupting from the spearhead swallowed the Third Elder’s desperate cry. But the Blood-Sword Demon Lord could not have failed to hear him.

Still, nothing changed.

No—that wasn’t quite true. Something did change.

It was tiny beside the immense energies surging all around them, and all the more stealthy for it.

Whish—thunk!

“…!”

The Third Elder’s body locked up.

[3664] A Korean jang is ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Ten jang is about 30.3 m (99.4 ft).

He felt a cold blade pierce his back, with saber qi gathered at its tip. He spun around in a flash and swung his arm.

Whoom—boom!

Compressed air exploded, but his blow struck nothing.

He stood frozen, staring at the empty air he had hit. Then someone's figure slowly came into focus.

Black clothes as dark as pitch. Calm eyes.

The young man looked barely thirty, yet his voice was so low and composed it was almost hard to believe.

"You should always watch your back. Leave an opening like that, and even I can't just stand by."

"You…!"

The Third Elder bit his lip hard enough to draw blood.

It wasn't the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang. It wasn't the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung.

It was the young brat he had ignored from the beginning—the one who had somehow kept a dagger hidden and now driven it into his back.

With a single surprise attack.

"And you still call yourself a man of the orthodox faction!"

It was a hollow accusation, without sense or grounds. Sama Pyo shrugged.

"That's all right. I'm from the unorthodox faction."

"…!"

"And one more thing."

Sama Pyo paused and casually flicked his hand.

Another flash came from the ample sleeve of his martial robe.

"I brought plenty of daggers."

Whish!

A sharp whistle drowned out his last quiet words.

Watching the streak of light fly straight toward him, the Third Elder sneered inwardly.

At least, until he realized he couldn't move. The terrible internal injury Jin Taekyung had dealt him and the dagger lodged in his back held him fast.

What is this…!

Thwack!

The dagger pierced the center of his forehead, and the Third Elder felt the world go dark.

The last thing he heard was Jeok Cheongang, who had watched it all, speaking.

"That's one. No, two."

The Third Elder, whose breath had already stopped, didn’t see it.

At the very moment his final breath left his body, the spearhead of White Flame, cloaked in dark-blue Force, sliced through the Second Elder’s throat.

Slash!

Beneath the fountain of blood, the First Elder’s eyes widened in horror. His body trembled.

Chapter 1029

Tap. Patter-patter.

Hot and damp.

Blood that had shot up like a fountain fell onto my head, soaking my scalp.

Someone who was already a headless corpse would never feel it again.

> System Defeated Lv. 135 Gungongbo!
> Acquired a large amount of Fame.
> Acquired a large amount of EXP.

Splatter!

A moment later, the body lost its balance and collapsed into the pool of blood.

The Second Elder's head had come off before he could even react. With a bewildered expression, it looked up at his sworn brothers.

Or rather, at the only sworn brother still in this world.

"One down. No—two."

Jeok Cheongang's words marked the Third Elder's end. I turned and saw a silver blade jutting from the back of the man sprawled like a rotten log.

Pssht.

Blood dripped in little spurts with a deflating hiss.

Sama Pyo pulled the dagger from between the dead Third Elder's brows. When our eyes met, he shrugged.

"Did I do something I shouldn't have?"

I answered.

"Yeah."

"If he was yours to deal with, I'm sorry. I thought leaving him alive might cause trouble…"

"That's not what I mean."

A question entered Sama Pyo's eyes. I let out a breath as hot as a ball of fire.

"You shouldn't have killed him so easily."

EXP didn't matter. Neither did whose hand killed him.

He should have suffered more.

He shouldn't have left this world so easily, in a single instant.

[3665] In traditional East Asian medicine, the Eight Extraordinary Meridians are channels distinct from the twelve primary meridians.

The Second Elder hadn’t. First his collarbone had been torn away, then one arm severed. Only after his Eight Extraordinary Meridians[3665] had been ripped to shreds did his head come off.

“Don’t step in again. Not one step.”

My voice sounded strange and desolate, as if it belonged to someone else.

I didn’t even know what I looked like right now.

But Sama Pyo’s and Jeok Cheongang’s grim, hardened expressions—and the First Elder, frozen as if he’d come face-to-face with a fiend—gave me some idea.

“M-monster…”

His body trembled. So did his voice.

In the eyes of the old fiend who had lost the two sworn brothers he’d spent his life with in the blink of an eye, I saw rage he couldn’t hide. And fear, deeper and darker still.

Splosh.

I took a slow step forward.

Maybe it was the blood soaking the ground, but my footfall sounded unusually loud. The First Elder flinched and stumbled backward.

No. He dragged himself back on his rear, bracing himself with both arms.

With both knees shattered, it was the only way he could put even a little distance between us.

“D-don’t come any closer! I said don’t!”

The First Elder flung out his arms with a scream.

Boom!

I turned my head before I even heard the rush of air. The manifested palm force blasted through the space where my head had been a moment earlier.

He was already half-crippled, but the powerful internal energy flowing deep within him still burned like an inextinguishable flame.

Of course…

“Do it again.”

To my eyes, his movements were clumsy beyond words and hopelessly slow. Every move was full of openings.

“Aaaaaah!”

I couldn’t tell whether it was a scream or a battle shout.

Bang! Bang! Boom!

Panicked, the First Elder unleashed palm force after palm force, bursting the compressed air around me.

The force of his attacks whipped my hair about and tore through my collar and skin.

And that was his final struggle.

Grab—crack!

I seized his wrist like lightning and twisted.

It wasn’t a grappling technique built on complex principles, or even a move powered by internal energy.

Just raw Strength and Agility.

That power and speed, far beyond human limits, crushed frail flesh and bone with ease.

“Ghk…!”

His face twisted with terrible pain. A stifled groan escaped him.

But I knew.

If the old fiend before me were the sort to give up after this much, the name Three Elders of Tianshan would have been forgotten long ago.

Whoosh! Crash!

Five fingers curled like hooks flashed down and struck the ground.

One step.

I read his movement and stepped back ahead of him. His hand barely grazed my collar before plunging deep into the earth. I stomped on the back of it.

Crack!

I felt the bones shatter beneath my sole, a thousand geun[3666] of weight behind it.

My calm face was reflected in his eyes, wide with pain and terror beyond anything he’d imagined.

“Don’t look at me like that.”

Thud.

I struck him squarely in the jaw. His head snapped to the side, and yellow teeth flew in every direction with the blood.

“When you look at me like that…”

Thud.

One more.

“Right now…”

Thud.

Again.

“It makes me want to kill you.”

Crack!

Sticky blood clung to my fist.

I grabbed the First Elder by the hair. He no longer moved at all. Slowly, I straightened up.

“We’re only just getting started, aren’t we?”

[3666] A thousand Korean geun is about 600 kg, or 1,320 lb.

I wasn't talking to the First Elder.

I was speaking to the monster watching from more than ten jang[3667] away, his face flushed—the one who had cut off a thousand heads with a single gesture.

Clap. Clap. Clap.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord applauded slowly, gazing at me with admiration.

"Magnificent. No—beautiful."

His answer made my blood run cold.

Even with rage consuming me, I hadn't expected anything like that reaction from him.

"That's how a Murim warrior ought to fight. Crush your opponent cruelly and completely. That's a real fight, don't you think?"

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord was grinning from ear to ear.

Two of the Three Elders of Tianshan—valuable fighters who served as his own hands and feet—were dead, and the third was crippled. Yet he looked far happier than he had a moment ago.

"Crazy… bastard."

"Me? Or you?"

"What?"

"Well, isn't it true?"

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord blinked at me, then spread his arms and turned in a slow circle.

"Look at me. My clothes are terribly drab, but compared to you, don't I look positively mild-mannered?"

"…!"

"Ah, don't misunderstand. I'm certainly not saying you look unpleasant. If anything, I find this rather familiar… It's a good sight, in more ways than one."

At his satisfied smile, I suddenly felt short of breath.

Familiar, he'd said. Pleasing.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord, of all people. That old, vicious fiend.

He was talking about me, drenched in blood from head to toe.

About the person I'd been a moment ago, consumed not merely by revenge but by the desire to inflict even greater pain.

"This… What I mean is…"

"Enough."

A voice I knew all too well cut me off. It was lower than usual.

"That's enough."

Jeok Cheongang strode forward, and I suddenly wanted to ask him something.

[3667] A jang is ten ja, approximately 3.03 m or 9.94 ft. Ten jang is about 30.3 m or 99.4 ft.

Who was he speaking to?

Me? Or the Blood-Sword Demon Lord?

Or both of us?

But I didn't ask. No—I couldn't.

For a moment, I was too afraid to ask whether I'd looked like a fiend mad with blood and revenge.

And yet, ironically, it was that very fiend who helped me steady my stiffened body and mind.

"To interrupt us at a time like this, Senior. That's cruel of you. We were having quite a meaningful conversation."

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord shook his head. Jeok Cheongang spat onto the ground.

"Fuck off. This old man has never had a junior like you."

"I know. But I've admired you for so long that I can't help myself. I'll have to settle for loving you from afar."

"Do I have to turn you into charcoal while you're still alive to shut that mouth of yours?"

"Probably. To be honest, I was a little disappointed about that. I thought at least one of those three would end up that way."

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord gave a showy sigh, then continued.

"You have no idea how excited I was when I heard what happened at Mount Jiuhua all those years ago. A descendant of the Fire Gate Clan I'd only ever heard about! And when I heard those fools who dared lay a hand on you had all been reduced to ash—how satisfying that was."

"What did you say?"

"Well, isn't it? Burned alive—imagine the pain they must have felt. What revenge could be more certain or more terrible?"

"…!"

"Everyone else shuddered and called you a mad old man. Not me. I've admired you ever since."

His eyes shone like the morning star. Jeok Cheongang and I were speechless. Even Sama Pyo, who had been watching everything calmly, seemed at a loss for words.

A fiend.

More than anyone I'd ever met, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord deserved the word. He was a madman.

Now I understood better than ever why "blood" was part of his title.

And to him, the Three Elders of Tianshan were no more than livestock he'd kept close at hand.

“Those idiots, too. During the Great Faction War, the moment a battle started going against them, they couldn’t run fast enough. Today they stepped forward without knowing their place, so they deserved to die… Ah, come to think of it, one’s still alive.”

Wheeze, wheeze.

“D-Demon Lord…”

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord glanced at the First Elder, who was still drawing shallow breaths, then looked at me.

“I only ask out of concern, but you aren’t thinking of letting him live, are you?”

“Why do you ask?”

“He’s been bothering me for a while. Neither alive nor dead… Better to settle it one way or the other, don’t you think?”

“…!”

“If you’re going to kill him, do it quickly. If you want a prisoner, have that young fellow beside you take him back. He doesn’t know much, though, so he won’t be much use.”

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord gestured toward Sama Pyo, then smacked his lips.

“Ah, though perhaps there isn’t time for that anymore.”

Boom. Boom. Bwoom.

The war drums were drawing closer, each beat louder and deeper than the last.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord and us.

Behind each side, the aura of countless troops made the air tremble.

Now it begins.

I could feel it.

The bloody battle for the Great Snow Mountain—the great battle we could no longer avoid—had finally begun.

And…

I can end it right here.

I couldn’t tell exactly how strong the Blood-Sword Demon Lord was, but Jeok Cheongang and I should be enough.

Now that the Three Elders of Tianshan, a core part of the enemy’s strength, were gone, the balance of this battle had tipped heavily in our favor.

Surely.

Surely that was how it would go.

Then why…

Why had the Blood-Sword Demon Lord only watched?

Why had he treated three Supreme Peak masters—fighters that valuable—like livestock?

This is…

The moment that thought came to me, my eyes widened.

Whoosh!

Dark clouds had gathered without my noticing. A cold fiercer than the Great Snow Mountain's own approached, freezing the wind as it came.

And at the center of it all, a company of riders swept toward us like dark mist.

Sssaaaaa.

Not even a pounding of hooves accompanied their ghostlike charge. Watching them, I thought of the otherworldly beings who should never have appeared here, in Murim.

"Death Knights…?"

Chapter 1030

The absurd had invaded common sense long ago.

Laws had been broken, truths overturned, and the word death had become cheap.

At least, that was the world one young man had been born and raised in.

Monsters. Hunters.

Monsters and humans killing one another inside the boundaries between dimensions known as Gates.

Mana and magical power.

Miraculous forces that shattered truths Earth had held since ancient times, along with laws discovered by the handful of geniuses who had shaped human history.

And a war that still hadn't ended.

The young man was part of that world.

A world where Magic tore open the earth, rained down fire and lightning, and defied gravity.

Where Hunters shone with dazzling auras as they faced monsters of grotesque appearance and unimaginable strength—creatures found only in ancient myths, or beyond anything anyone had ever imagined.

Humans were adaptable creatures.

By the time the little child born on the day humanity won its great victory was approaching thirty, the absurdity that had overturned the world in the Great Cataclysm had become the new common sense.

Until another absurdity changed everything.

On a steep hill in the middle of summer, beside the recycling area outside a goshiwon[3668], lay a massive hunk of scrap metal.

No—a VR capsule. An entrance to another world.

That was how a young man with nothing to his name stepped into a new world.

So much awaited him beyond the invisible veil.

Dangers and opportunities unlike any he'd known, and rewards.

He formed bonds with good people, fought countless enemies, and grew because of it.

That was why he wished so desperately for one thing:

That nothing out of the ordinary would happen here.

Perhaps that wish was why he kept downplaying and ignoring the one suspicion that grew stronger with time.

Until this very moment, when he faced the truth he hadn't wanted to believe.

"Death Knights…?"

[3668] A goshiwon is a very small, inexpensive room-for-rent arrangement in South Korea.

The words slipped vacantly from his parted lips.

The young man—Jin Taekyung—lifted his head and stared.

Caught by the word he himself had spoken.

Overwhelmed by the unbelievable sight before him.

Sssaaaaa.

Beneath the dark clouds hanging over the snow-covered mountains, a murky haze spread.

At its center, seven ghost horses soundlessly charged forward, stepping on empty air. On their backs sat seven men dressed not in armor that covered them from head to toe, but in black clothes as dark as pitch.

No. What he sensed was the unmistakably familiar presence of death.

Its essence never changed, whatever form it took.

The deep, cloying aura of death and its stench reached every one of Jin Taekyung's senses—even his soul.

No mistake.

Jin Taekyung trembled without realizing it.

He'd been right. It was them.

Death Knights.

Knights who had given up their souls and forsaken their rest.

The absurdity of another world was invading common sense once again.

Yet amid the two vast armies advancing toward each other, Jin Taekyung was the only one who recognized it.

"Retreat! Fall back, now—!"

Whoosh!

As he shouted to his allies, Jin Taekyung felt every hair on his body stand on end. He spun around.

He'd made that movement a thousand times—no, more than ten thousand.

Urgent, yet perfectly practiced, it followed the turn of his waist and arms. Dark-blue Force rose like a tidal wave.

KWAANG!

A deafening boom shook the air. Beyond the gray-white sword blade trembling against his spearpoint, a fiend gone mad with blood grinned at Jin Taekyung.

"Why not surrender while you still can?"

"I'll return those words to you."

The reply hadn't come from Jin Taekyung.

Jeok Cheongang had become a streak of light, closing on the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's flank. His palm struck ahead of his quiet voice.

Whooosh.

Flames erupted in a dazzling burst of heat.

Faced with the terrible heat of the Flame Divine Palm, which burned the air and melted ten-thousand-year snow, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord twisted aside without hesitation.

BOOM!

Compressed air exploded. No—it vaporized on the spot.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord narrowly avoided the palm strike and sprang backward. By any measure, it was a successful dodge, but the heat had still scorched his collar and the skin beneath it black.

“Whoops. Well, look at that.”

Burning pain was said to be worse than any other.

Yet even with his skin charred and parts of it melted, a smile remained on the Blood-Sword Demon Lord’s lips.

“Just as they said, you’re a fiery one, Senior.”

“You bastard…!”

“Don’t be so angry. I may speak this way, but it stings me too.”

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord wasn’t trying to provoke him. He meant it.

They had clashed only once, but he knew one thing for certain.

He could never defeat the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, alone.

And even if Jeok Cheongang—a master half a step above him—weren’t there, capturing Jin Taekyung alive rather than killing him would be extremely difficult.

Of course, that was only how things stood for now.

“I should ask your understanding in advance for what’s about to happen, Senior. Yours too, my friend. I’m not entirely fond of doing things this way myself…”

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord had furrowed his brow as if he were troubled, but soon he burst into hearty laughter and continued.

“But what can I do? This, too, is part of proving that person’s greatness.”

At that moment—

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

The vast army of Dark Heaven had already charged to within roughly three hundred thirty yards. More precisely, the seven pairs of riders at the head of the countless fanatics rose into the air, stepping on empty space.

No—they ran.

Screee!

Everyone advancing to meet them saw it clearly.

Tens of thousands of eyes widened. Tightly closed lips parted of their own accord.

Shock. Fear.

Only those two emotions showed in their eyes and on their faces.

What could anyone call such a sight?

Stepping on Empty Air? Traversing the Void?

No word that came to mind could quite explain it.

Several masters on the Murim Alliance's side were skilled enough in body-lightness techniques to step on empty air. But running through the sky on horseback was something none of them had ever imagined.

One person, however, was different.

They're coming.

Jin Taekyung tightened his grip on White Flame.

The sight had shocked him more than anyone else on the battlefield, but he also understood what he was seeing more clearly than anyone.

Familiar, yet strange.

Called Death Knights in the modern world, these beings—whatever they might be called in Murim—were closing in at blinding speed.

They're strong. These aren't ordinary ones.

Jin Taekyung could tell that more than their appearance had changed.

The closer they came, the stronger their stench and aura of death grew. Both far surpassed anything he knew from ordinary Death Knights.

Right. This is like…

Lei Fei.

Jin Taekyung suddenly remembered another hero whose soul, not so long ago, had been forcibly corrupted by an Arch Lich.

The Death Knight Lord.

Lei Fei had been an S-rank Hunter and a hero. In his corrupted state, he had been the strongest enemy they faced after the Arch Lich itself.

A chosen leader among Death Knights, who had not only retained all his strength from life but grown stronger still.

A Named Monster fully deserving of the title Lord.

Yet each of the seven men in black riding ghost horses at the head of the enemy army gave off an aura no weaker than Lei Fei's had been.

No. Stronger.

It was already too late to turn back.

Fear was contagious.

His allies' morale had soared as they watched him defeat the Three Elders of Tianshan in an instant. Now, faced with something they had never seen or heard of, it was fading like a bubble.

He drew our entire army out of the Great Snow Mountain. He used the Three Elders of Tianshan as bait.

Jin Taekyung understood at last.

The Three Elders of Tianshan had been used as bait from the very beginning, for this exact moment.

And the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's plan had worked perfectly.

Even if their allies retreated now, the enemy would reach them all the faster.

Jin Taekyung had only two choices left.

Hold this position so his shaken allies could retreat before they ever crossed weapons with the enemy.

Or…

Risk everything and turn this around.

At his side stood the one person he trusted and could follow more than anyone.

"How many will you take?"

"All eight."

Jin Taekyung gave a quiet laugh at Jeok Cheongang's calm answer.

"That'll be tough at your age."

"Don't worry. Ever since I got younger, I've had energy to spare."

"I'm glad that Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng I brought you was worth it."

"That little thing? Bring me Ten-Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng next time."

"Have you no shame?"

"Want to open me up and check?"

The Fire Gate Clan's master and disciple stood like iron towers at the heart of the battlefield, waiting for the enemy.

About a hundred sixty-five yards away, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord watched them, his face flushed with excitement. The vast army behind him surged past its commander and poured toward them.

"They're swarming like a pack of dogs. Even the unorthodox faction would have to give them that."

At Jeok Cheongang's mutter, Sama Pyo let out a dry laugh.

"Yes. I think so too."

"Come to think of it, there's an unorthodox brat right here."

"I can't deny that."

"Unorthodox, you say. Is that truly how you see yourself?"

"This hardly seems the time to answer that, but what can I do? I was born, and the whole world called me unorthodox. I suppose that's my lot."

About a hundred yards.

The enemy's shouts shook the air from every direction, making their ears ring. Sama Pyo tightened his grip on the sword and saber that had once belonged to the Three Elders of Tianshan, one in each hand.

"That's the stupidest thing I've heard. Are you an idiot?"

At the quiet voice in his ear, Sama Pyo's body stiffened.

"What… did you say?"

"I asked if you're an idiot. You."

About sixty-five yards.

As the aura of tens of thousands of enemies made the air tremble, Jin Taekyung went on calmly.

"You live the way you were born, let other people decide what to call you, and go along with it? Is that your life?"

"That's…"

"Just live however the hell you want. Protect what needs protecting. Do something good now and then. What does it matter whether you're part of the orthodox faction, the unorthodox faction, or the dark-path figures?"

Sama Pyo's face went rigid.

His words came so freely. That made them hurt all the more—and made Sama Pyo envy him.

Unlike Sama Pyo, Jin Taekyung had been born into the orthodox faction.

"What do you know about me to say something like that?"

"Of course I don't know shit. How would I know what kind of life you've lived? You've never told me."

"What?"

"But I know what kind of person you are."

About thirty yards.

Clouds gathered overhead. Darkness fell.

Watching the shadows descend through the empty air, Jin Taekyung tossed out one short sentence.

"We're here together now."

"…!"

"I guess I'm pretty good at judging people. Right, Old Master?"

Jeok Cheongang didn't answer, and Jin Taekyung didn't wait for him to.

About a year earlier, the Pavilion Master of the Fire Dragon Pavilion had gladly welcomed the Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate when he'd come calling out of the blue.

Now Jin Taekyung swung the spear in his hand.

Whooosh.

A dark-blue tidal wave rose, hot as hellfire and swift as a thunderbolt.

And as Jin Taekyung advanced without hesitation, Sama Pyo suddenly thought he looked dazzling.

KWA-BOOM!

Chapter 1031

I didn’t wonder if I could do it.

I had to. I had to see it through.

Power came with responsibility, and the weight of that responsibility wouldn’t let me take even one step back.

That was why I was moving forward now.

Whoosh.

I lowered the First Elder, still in my grip, and planted my foot on the ground. In the same instant, I shot forward.

Ghost Illusory Slaughter Step.

The subtle art I’d learned from the greatest assassin of all time flowed through my feet.

My legs felt impossibly light. Wind brushed past me, then vanished without a trace in the heat radiating from someone nearby.

The moment I tightened my grip on the spear shaft—

Swaaash!

The world slowed.

Seven streams of Force fell like lightning from overhead. Jeok Cheongang and I flung out our hands at the same time.

KWA-BOOOOM!

A crash that seemed to split the sky rang out, and time, paused for an instant, surged forward like a raging torrent.

KRRRUNCH!

The ground flipped over from the force of the collision. My feet, light as air only moments ago, were driven back under a pressure of tens of thousands of pounds.

Damn it.

I felt the difference in strength the instant we collided, and my teeth clenched before I could stop them.

I’d expected them to be strong. Not this strong.

Seven.

Not one, not two, not three—but seven Death Knights.

No, the men in black were far too powerful. They hadn’t merely kept all their former strength; they’d grown stronger still.

Even with Jeok Cheongang at my side, their power was too much to withstand.

“Hngh…!”

A muffled breath came from right beside me.

Jeok Cheongang was holding off four enemies alone, proving his title as the Fire King. But this momentary standoff was like a glass bottle on the verge of shattering.

Just as it was now.

SHWING! KRAANG!

The three spears and swords, shrouded in pitch-black Force, met the White Flame's blade once more. The impact left me gasping, and I felt my knees bend on their own.

They're strong. The Three Elders of Tianshan don't even compare.

The Three Elders had certainly been powerful masters. But inheriting the Thunderbolt Saber King's internal energy and gaining insight weren't the only reasons I'd been able to defeat them alone.

Sometimes a pack of wolves was more frightening than a single tiger.

The Three Elders had built their infamy as a pack, much like the Qilian Three Fiends, who had followed the Western Heaven Demon Lord and drenched Sichuan in blood.

But the men in black, closing in on me with tremendous strength and momentum even now, were different.

They were tigers.

Unlike the Three Elders of Tianshan, each one could command an entire mountain range—or, at least, they must have been able to in the past.

The worst part was that these tigers had lost their souls, grown even stronger, and now moved as a pack at one man's command.

"How do they seem, now that you've faced them yourself? Impressive, aren't they? I call them Black Ghosts."

Behind the seven men in black—the seven Black Ghosts—the enemy's vast army drew closer with every passing moment. Even over its roar, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's voice rang clear.

So did his aura, growing more intense with each slow step.

"Don't struggle too hard. It's a shame about Senior Jeok, but that can't be helped. You, on the other hand, are a very important prize."

I couldn't see his face behind the Black Ghosts, but I could picture it, if only faintly.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord smiling. His eyes bright with excitement at the sea of corpses and blood to come.

"Who knows? If you surrender quietly now, perhaps both master and disciple can survive."

Grrk. Grrrk!

Under the crushing pressure, I barely managed to force out my voice.

"Fuck… off!"

KWAANG!

I thrust the spear shaft upward. All three of their spears and swords flew into the air at once.

Four jiazi[3669] of internal energy and a body far beyond human limits let me throw off the Black Ghosts' combined attack, strengthened though they were at the cost of their souls. Only for a moment.

But that moment gave me an opening I wouldn't get again.

SHHK!

I swung with all my strength and cut through them.

More precisely, I cut three huge black horses in half—ghost horses, powerful monsters in their own right.

FWOOOSH!

Instead of the blood any living creature should have had, a dark mist burst out. Jeok Cheongang, who'd been barely holding on, gaped at the unbelievable sight.

"What kind of fucked-up—!"

I'd have liked to explain, but now wasn't the time.

The Black Ghosts lost their balance as their mounts vanished beneath them. I seized the chance and charged the four facing Jeok Cheongang.

SHK-SHK! KAKAKANG!

I slashed, stabbed, and struck.

They blocked all three lightning-fast attacks without difficulty. Waiting for them, though, was Jeok Cheongang's palm strike, wreathed in brilliant white flames.

"Die."

Whoosh—BOOM!

The Flame Divine Palm shot forward without even a sound of rushing air and struck one of the Black Ghosts.

The man took the blow square in the chest and flew back like a cannonball. Jeok Cheongang bared his teeth in a grin.

Or tried to.

"Good. That's one—"

—Grrr.

The Black Ghost should have died, his whole body scorched black. Instead, he let out a strange groan and straightened up.

"…No, it isn't."

Perhaps the Flame Divine Palm's force still lingered. Jeok Cheongang stared blankly as the Black Ghost staggered to his feet, then blinked at me.

"What the hell are those things?"

[3669] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; four jiazi are 240 years.

KWAANG!

I parried a Black Ghost's sword and let out a breath before answering.

"Death. Death Knights."

"Great Hand, Great Hand, Shift-Head? What the hell are you talking about?"

Unfortunately, I couldn't clear up Jeok Cheongang's confusion.

Before I could say another word, all the Black Ghosts charged at once, including the one Jeok Cheongang had knocked away.

KWA-BOOOOM!

My ears rang. Pain shot through my wrist, and both my legs sank deep into the ground.

The pressure was terrifying, as if Taishan itself were bearing down on me.

And just as Jeok Cheongang and I were trapped in a forest of steel, a fierce rush of air sounded from somewhere.

Whoosh—CLANG-CLANG!

A Black Ghost's great saber knocked away a dozen or so throwing knives. I could guess who'd been fool enough to join this fight.

Sama Pyo. You idiot. What the hell are you doing here?

But there was only a hair's breadth between courage and stupidity.

Sama Pyo was an idiot, but he was brave. He'd distracted only one of them, yet even that gave us a little room to breathe.

"Old Master, now!"

"Damn it!"

Jeok Cheongang spat a curse and shot out his fist like lightning.

KRRRUNCH!

Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

Flames erupted like an explosion, pushing back the weapons wrapped in black Force, if only for a moment.

The earth-shaking blast rattled everything for hundreds of feet. It also concealed a streak of light racing through the flames.

SHWING! THUNK!

A throwing knife left Sama Pyo's hand and sank into a Black Ghost's throat. The blade quivered.

Of course, I knew better than anyone that it wouldn't be enough to bring him down.

Pshk.

The Black Ghost pulled out the knife as though it were nothing. I took advantage of the brief gap in their encirclement to leap back.

"You asked earlier what a Death Knight was."

"…"

"They're bastards like that."

"…Shit. This is a fine mess."

Jeok Cheongang sighed. Sama Pyo came up beside us, his face calm.

"What monsters."

"Idiot. You should've fallen back earlier. What, did you come all this way for a good view?"

"I already regret it. But what exactly are they? Some kind of jiangshi?"

"Similar, but let's say they're a bit worse."

Jiangshi would be a thousand times better.

If they were a Maoshan Sect specialty, at least the people of this world could call them native creatures.

But these Death Knights—the Black Ghosts—were an invasive species.

They would destroy the ecosystem and shatter every law and bit of common sense.

No. They already had.

How could this happen…?

I swallowed a quiet groan.

How it was possible no longer mattered.

The rules we'd all believed in had already crumbled, and now we had to deal with the wreckage.

That's right. Not just a handful of us. All of us.

Rumble, rumble.

The ground trembled. The shouts that had shaken everything around us were now at my back, drawing up beside Jeok Cheongang and Sama Pyo.

"Infinite Life Buddha."

The one approaching with a low invocation was the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord.

Beside him stood the Roaring Fury Swordsman and the Taeeul Merciless Sword, who had studied under the same master, along with nearly a thousand disciples of the Zhongnan Sect.

And there was another man, his face set hard.

"So it comes to this."

The Black Night King, Sima Gong.

He commanded countless martial artists from Gansu—numbers in no way inferior to the enemy's. His somber gaze rested on us.

No. On Sama Pyo.

His lips parted as though he meant to speak, but in the end he said nothing. He looked ahead instead, toward the rulers from beyond the desert, finally facing us on this vast snowfield.

“Enough.”

The Black Ghosts advancing silently toward us stopped as one. The Blood-Sword Demon Lord stepped out among them, an army of tens of thousands at his back.

Thud.

“Good. This is how you should meet me.”

Vrrrrm.

The gray-white blade trembled. Its color hardly suited the Blood-Sword Demon Lord’s title, though it had reaped carnage that ranked among the worst of the Great Faction War.

Dark-red Force welled from it, the surges joining and binding together without pause as he leveled the sword at the people in his way.

It was too late for us to turn back. All we could do was press forward with everything we had.

WAAAAAH!

Shouts and killing intent, fear and anger, mingled and swelled.

Amid that violent whirl of emotion, I took a slow step forward.

Crunch.

Cold. Frost broke beneath my toes.

Thump.

My heart beat.

I quickened my steps to match its harsh, rapid rhythm.

Whoosh. SHWAAAAA!

The wind blew. The mild breeze became a raging gale, and I summoned that gale.

No—the whole battlefield did.

WAAAAAH!

Shouts, clouds, wind.

Beyond them, countless blades flashed.

And two vast armies raced across the dazzling white snowfield, colliding at last in its center.

KRRRUNCH!

The white snow turned red.

Through the blood mist as it billowed and spread, through countless screams and deaths, the superhumans shot toward one another.

Chapter 1032

It was like watching two enormous waves swallow each other.

There were a few differences. This was a vast snowy plain, not the sea. The waves were made of countless people and flashing blades, not water. And the spray thrown up by their collision was red as blood.

No—it was blood itself.

KRRRUNCH!

Tens of thousands clashed with tens of thousands.

Like warhorses that had never learned to retreat, the two armies charged straight at each other and tangled together in an instant, weapons flashing in their hands.

CLANG! THUNK!

SHING!

A dense mist of blood spread through the air with the dreadful sound of blades cutting flesh.

And through the snowy plain, already awash with blood and screams, spearheads drove fiercely toward the heart of the battle.

“Infinite Life Buddha…”

Whoooosh.

The hem of a Daoist robe whipped violently, as if caught in a storm, under the force of an overwhelming aura.

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord had split five enemies apart with a single stroke. Now he brought his sword down at an angle, its blade enlarged by milky-white Force.

Swaaash!

The sheer pressure warped the space around it. A towering blade of Sword Force swept through the enemies clad in black armor.

KWA-BOOOOM!

The ground heaved with a deafening crash, and flesh and bone scattered in every direction.

Yet even after witnessing the grisly sight from point-blank range, the followers who had begun worshiping a new god called the Lord of Heaven didn’t so much as blink.

No—more precisely, they kept advancing, gazing at the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord with hazy eyes as though entranced.

All the while, they murmured their eight-character creed without pause.

“In heaven and on earth.”

“All demons bow in submission…”

CRUNCH!

Their hollow, almost chilling voices ended only when they died.

At least, that was what the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord believed in that moment.

Gurgle.

Blood bubbled in a follower's slashed throat.

His neck had been cut by the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord's sword, yet he went on muttering as the light slowly faded from his eyes.

"Heaven above… gurgle… hea…"

THUNK!

The creed stopped only when the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord drove his sword into the man's chest. A chill ran down his spine.

They're no ordinary people.

Of course they weren't. Even when the Heavenly Demon swept across the Central Plains, the hundred thousand followers of the Demonic Path gathered under him had been half-mad fanatics.

But the enemies the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord had faced back then had at least known fear.

They, too, had possessed an emotion every human ought to have.

But what in the world…

Then he understood what had felt so familiar.

Fear.

They had no fear.

Though they clearly knew he was a stronger opponent they could never defeat, the followers of Dark Heaven kept surging toward him as though they had been born for this very moment.

Spraying red blood instead of white sea foam.

Screeeee!

The tip of his sword swept toward the enemies closing in from every direction.

The Heavenly River Thirty-Six Swords.

The Zhongnan Sect's signature sword art, a technique of Supreme Peak mastery, swept through the space around him. Weapons and bodies met its razor-sharp Force and were cut apart like tofu, their pieces scattering across the snow.

SHING! THUD-THUD!

Corpses collapsed amid the sickening sounds of torn flesh.

Yet one enemy, his chest deeply cut along with one arm, didn't crumple with a groan of pain. He reached out with his one remaining hand.

BOOM!

A sharp whistle split the air, and the hem of the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord's robe burst apart.

He narrowly avoided the palm strike and thrust out his hand at blinding speed.

THUNK!

Only after the Zhongnan Sect's famed Heavenly Vault Finger Qi pierced the man between the brows did he collapse.

But though he had dispatched dozens of enemies in less than a moment, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord's face remained rigid.

This is…

There was no doubt. They had no fear, and they could barely feel pain.

He didn't know whether some secret technique or a drug that clouded the mind was responsible, but this was far beyond the bounds of common sense.

And there were tens of thousands of them.

They felt neither fear nor pain, and each was a skilled martial artist. They were weapons made to sweep across a battlefield.

This is bad. No—this is the worst.

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord bit his lip, feeling a fear he hadn't known since the Great Faction War. Then—

Swoooosh!

Along with a rush of overlapping whistles, an immense force tore into one side of the battlefield.

KWA-BOOOOM!

A sudden crash sent countless scraps of flesh flying in every direction.

The Zhongnan Sect disciples had formed a tight sword formation around the Roaring Fury Swordsman and the Taeeul Merciless Sword. Now the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord watched it shatter in an instant, his eyes wide.

"No!"

"J-Junior Sister!"

Their cries were almost screams.

Stunned by the loss of fellow disciples they had known since childhood, they stared blankly at the enemy who had broken their formation with a single blow.

Two men covered in pitch black from head to toe.

No—the Blood-Sword Demon Lord had called them Black Ghosts, and the name suited these unknown beings all too well.

Sssaaaaa.

Black energy rose in threads around their bodies, swallowing the air.

The Zhongnan Sect disciples began to tremble without realizing it. The energy gripped their hearts and locked their limbs.

"Hngh…"

Strained breaths escaped all around.

Everyone was crushed beneath their chilling aura—an overwhelming force known as Fear somewhere far away.

No—almost everyone.

SHWOOF!

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord closed the distance in an instant, more furious than he had ever been.

Dozens of disciples had died in the blink of an eye.

The people he was duty-bound to protect as Sect Leader—the future pillars of the Zhongnan Sect, whom he had watched grow since childhood—had been cut down in an instant.

“How dare you!”

SHWING-SHWING-SHWING!

His sword tip cut through the air, driven by fury. The Heavenly River Thirty-Six Swords, honed to nine-tenths mastery, sent dozens of sword images pouring forth.

Then they vanished without a trace.

Whoooosh! CLANG!

The moment those immense forces collided, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord’s eyes widened.

His beloved sword, which had cut through the wind, was being knocked aside by an axe blade swinging with the wind, erasing his sword images as it swept through them.

“What is this…!”

GRRRK. KWAANG!

Before the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord could finish his cry of shock, the blade finally gave way to the immense force and was sent flying. It trembled violently.

KRRUNCH!

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord slid back, his foot carving a deep furrow in the ground. He barely steadied himself, pain stabbing through his wrist.

Far worse than the pain was the shock.

“Y-You…”

The words stumbled from his lips.

He stared at the Black Ghost gripping a battle axe as large as a grown man, his eyes so wide they seemed ready to pop out.

No. It can’t be.

He tried to deny it, but there was no denying what stood before him.

The Black Ghost who had stopped the Zhongnan Sect Leader single-handedly had a face he remembered.

He hadn’t recognized it at first. Now he did.

That crude, strangely shaped weapon. Those features, horribly twisted and discolored, yet still faintly recognizable.

“…Black Axe Fiend.”

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord murmured the name, stunned.

A great fiend of the Demonic Cult whom he and his master had faced on the battlefield long ago. A Supreme Peak master who had first taught him the fear of death.

And…

"He should have died."

One of the twenty-four great fiends under the Heavenly Demon, who had met his end right there on that day.

"Then… how?"

It was impossible. It should never have happened.

But the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord's questions went unanswered.

A fierce rush of air swept toward him, dragging him back to the present.

Screeeee—CRUNCH!

A neck was severed. Blood sprayed into the air.

A middle-aged first-generation disciple, one marked as a future Elder, lost his head in a single stroke. Gritting his teeth, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord kicked off the ground.

"Senior Brothers!"

His shout carried internal energy. The Roaring Fury Swordsman and the Taeeul Merciless Sword, frozen after belatedly recognizing the Black Axe Fiend, finally moved.

Fwoosh!

Their figures blurred, their movement techniques making their feet as light as feathers.

But the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord's heart was heavy as he shot toward the Black Axe Fiend, returned from death as a Black Ghost, and the other Black Ghost beside him, whose aura was no less immense.

Could it be? Could it be…

Today might be the day.

He had long since joined the ranks of the superhuman. And though his two Senior Brothers were poor Daoists, they were fine martial artists.

So why?

Why did he fear those two enemies, even with his Senior Brothers and nearly a thousand disciples at his side?

…Infinite Life Buddha.

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord thought of death. He had prepared himself for it when he left Mount Zhongnan, yet still could not easily accept it. He thrust out his sword.

SHWAAASH!

A murky-black axe blade swung to meet the sword strike warping the space around it.

KWA-BOOOOM!

The impact far exceeded anything he had expected. In that instant, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord understood.

His misgivings had not come from fear alone.

He was not the one who could decide the outcome of this battle.

KRRUNCH.

The world seemed to slow. Watching the sword that had been with him all his life shatter to pieces, he suddenly thought of someone.

Someone who was not the strongest person in the world, but who had always brought winds of change no one could have predicted.

A young man who kept moving ahead of everyone else.

Jin Daoist Friend.

At that very moment—

KWA-BOOOOM!

A wave of magical power, darker than storm clouds and thick as blood, swept in every direction.

Rumble…

At some point, a distant crash rang out from somewhere behind me. I forced my head to stay facing forward, even as instinct urged me to turn.

Swoosh—thunk!

An arrow passed my side by a finger's breadth and buried itself in an enemy approaching from my blind spot.

The arrow had clearly carried internal energy, but the bastard charged at me as if he hadn't felt a speck of pain. Crimson Saber Force gathered along his crescent saber as he swung it.

No—tried to swing it.

Thwack!

My foot snapped out a beat ahead of him. I felt his shin bones shatter beneath the kick.

He was plainly out of the fight.

But I didn't stop there. I flung out one hand at the bastard, slumped to the ground with his shin crushed.

Inventory open. Summon.

A dagger appeared in my empty hand and flew the instant my fingers closed around it. Its flashing tip went straight between his brows.

Thud. Thump!

By the time I heard him fall, I'd already moved another three jang[3670] ahead.

Beside me was the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

KWA-BOOOOM!

Flames hungrily devoured everything in their path. Flesh melted in the terrible heat.

All around us, steam and a foul stench drowned out the screams. Then a fierce rush of air reached my ears.

Screeeee!

[3670] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to 10 ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Three jang are about 9.09 m (29.8 ft).

Chapter 1033

Every martial art contains at least dozens of movements, each with its own principles.

But no matter what martial art you've learned, there are ultimately only two ways to deal with an enemy's attack.

Block it, or dodge it.

And in that moment, I chose the latter.

KWA-BOOOOM! KRRRUNCH!

A flash came hurtling in with a fierce whistle and slammed into the ground.

The earth buckled as if an earthquake had struck, and a tremendous shock wave swept through the area.

At least a dozen enemies were caught in its wake and vanished without a trace. I'd escaped with only a few scratches from flying bits of rock, yet a chill ran down my spine.

Fast. And powerful.

It was hard to believe a javelin thrown from so far away could move that fast and hit that hard.

Dodging had hardly been a choice. I'd had no other option.

If I'd met it with a counterattack, that alone would have cost me a considerable amount of strength.

Jeok Cheongang, standing beside me, knew it too.

"I suspected as much, but those bastards certainly don't have ordinary internal energy."

Jeok Cheongang muttered in a low voice and clenched his fist.

Following his gaze, I saw four ghost horses approaching, each carrying a rider as they stepped through the air.

"Four, huh? How many passed us by earlier?"

The Great Snow Mountain region might not be as vast as the Qilian Mountains, but it was still enormous.

The frost-covered land at the foot of the mountain was broad enough for a battle like this, with countless enemies and allies tangled together. Jeok Cheongang and I had punched through the enemy lines ahead of everyone else like a single awl, but we couldn't stop them all.

Besides, the surest way to win a battle was to cut off the head, not the body.

"If I saw right, two."

I recalled the distant crash and tremor that had reached me before the javelin came flying.

Judging by their direction and distance…

"I think those two headed toward the Zhongnan Sect."

The Zhongnan Sect numbered only a thousand among our thirty thousand, but every one of them was an elite disciple of the main sect, not a lay affiliate. With three Supreme Peak masters among them, they were a formidable force.

If the enemy wanted to secure victory, stopping them would be crucial.

"Then that makes five, counting the ones who've just appeared."

We'd already let two slip past, and now four more had shown up.

But as far as we knew, there were seven of these monsters called Death Knights—or Black Ghosts—in all.

I adjusted my grip on White Flame and murmured, "One's unaccounted for."

"Then the last one…"

"Either guarding the Blood-Sword Demon Lord, or headed toward the Gansu martial artists led by Sima Gong. If it isn't the latter…"

I let my voice trail off, but Jeok Cheongang already knew about Sima Gong's suspicious behavior. He needed no further explanation.

"Then Sima Gong, that damned unorthodox bastard, has thrown in his lot with Dark Heaven."

Exactly.

A Black Ghost not going after Sima Gong's forces wouldn't prove it on its own. But there was no denying it would make betrayal far more likely.

If I were the Blood-Sword Demon Lord, I wouldn't bother sending a Black Ghost to Sima Gong if he was already an ally.

Especially…

With forces like these.

I watched the Black Ghosts draw closer, radiating a terrifying aura.

Armed with a saber, a sword, a spear, and a chain sickle, they sprang over the heads of the advancing enemy soldiers and shot toward us.

Each was a Supreme Peak master powerful enough to shake an entire city. They felt neither pain nor emotion, and their ability to recover was beyond human.

No—they were monsters through and through. Strange beings the likes of which no one in Murim had ever encountered.

"Old Master."

"Nothing more to say."

KRRUNCH!

Jeok Cheongang smashed the head of an enemy charging at him with soulless eyes in a single punch. Then he went on.

"I don't know what kind of monsters those things are, but we'll just keep killing them until they're dead."

The instant those quiet words left his lips—

Pop.

We kicked off the ground together and shot forward, striking with all our strength.

I swept out White Flame's spearhead, dark-blue Force surging around it. Jeok Cheongang thrust out a palm wreathed in pure white flames.

FWOOOOSH!

A brilliant flash enveloped everything within a radius of a dozen or so jang[3671]. The waves of fanatics flooding in from every direction parted.

No—they evaporated.

KWAANG! KRRRUNCH!

The ground shook with a crash that sounded as if the sky itself had split.

Bodies charred in an instant by the Flame Divine Palm's terrible heat crumpled lifelessly. Others, cut apart along with their weapons by my spear, flew away in pieces.

They had been stripped of pain and emotion, but death came equally to the hundred or so enemies who lost their lives in that moment.

And through the gap in the battlefield, blanketed in death in an instant—

Ssshh…

Four Black Ghosts rushed toward Jeok Cheongang and me, shrouded in an aura of death like dim night fog.

SHWING!

The wind split around the blades sweeping toward us with terrifying force.

Each took a direction—north, south, east, west—and struck. Their attacks meshed like finely crafted gears, leaving not the slightest opening.

But…

There is one. I'm sure of it.

I took a long step forward to meet the saber blade and spearhead streaking toward me, their outlines blurred by speed.

Straight toward those two chilling flashes aimed at my neck.

Fear of death chilled my spine, but I held fast to my conviction.

"What are you doing—!"

And just as Jeok Cheongang's urgent shout rang out—

Pshk!

The two weapons grazed either side of my neck, leaving the faintest cuts. Forgetting even that moment's pain, I smiled.

Just as I thought.

I hadn't dodged their attacks.

[3671] A jang is a traditional length of ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

In the life-or-death moment just now, the two Black Ghosts had forced their weapons to twist and change course.

Why?

Simple.

They weren't allowed to kill me.

Their commander on this battlefield—the Blood-Sword Demon Lord—had given them that order.

The Three Elders of Tianshan couldn't have done that.

No, that wasn't right.

They wouldn't have done it.

Unlike the Black Ghosts, they still had their emotions and reason. Their own lives would have mattered a hundred, a thousand times more to them than carrying out an order.

They would have known that making even this tiny mistake to capture me would lead straight to their deaths.

Just like now.

SHWOOOSH!

I didn't miss the opening that had been invisible until they exposed it themselves.

THUD!

A Black Ghost went rigid as a statue.

White Flame's spearhead pierced its throat, and the four jiazi[3672] of Scorching Yang Qi I'd sent through it erupted.

KABOOOM!

Flames exploded.

Before the headless Black Ghost could fall from its saddle, another belatedly realized its comrade was in danger. It twisted the saber that had passed beside my neck and swung.

SHNK!

Hot. The force of the wind alone sliced into my shoulder, sending blood gushing from the wound.

But when you lose something, you gain something too.

KRRUNCH.

A touch so cold it sent a shiver through me.

With my free hand, I seized the wrist encased in jet-black armor and twisted it without hesitation, as though wringing it dry.

CRACK. KRRUNCH.

Flesh and bone crushed with a sickening, wet sound.

[3672] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle. Four jiazi represent 240 years' worth of cultivated energy.

The Black Ghosts had grown stronger through death and rebirth. I had surpassed human limits by surviving countless brushes with death.

So they weren't the only monsters here.

KRRRUNCH!

I ripped off its wrist, the weapon still gripped in its hand, and drove my fist into the Black Ghost as it stood frozen.

KWAANG!

The body went flying, trailing a foul, burnt stench as its black armor shattered.

But I knew.

I knew what kind of monsters they were, and how tenacious and dreadful the cursed life they'd been given could be.

Step.

Leaving Jeok Cheongang to fight the other two Black Ghosts, I walked toward the ones already staggering to their feet.

"Fine. Let's find out."

Ssshh…

Dusky mist rose around their bodies, regenerating the arm I'd torn away, the flesh and bone melted and crumbled by flames—even the missing neck.

"Which of us is the bigger monster?"

SHWOOOOSH—SHNK!

Fire Dragon's Single Tail.

Fire blazed around the dazzling white spearhead. The strike flashed through the mist like lightning, becoming a dark-blue wave that cleaved through them.

"Magnificent. Absolutely magnificent!"

Like a child given a toy he loved on his birthday, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord watched the battlefield spread before him, his face flushed with excitement.

CLANG-CLANG-CLANG!

From the high hill to the snowy plain in the distance, a mountain of sabers and a forest of swords danced across hundreds of jang[3673]. Those gleaming blades, forged and tempered again and again for a single purpose, were finally doing their work.

THUD!

"AAAGH!"

Amid the shouts and screams pouring in from every direction, crimson blood sprayed over everyone's heads like a fountain.

[3673] A jang is a traditional length of ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Dozens of lives vanished with one breath in. With one breath out, their places were filled.

Even now, death followed death without end across the horrific battlefield. It was enough to stir the nostalgia of someone who'd spent so many years confined to the lands beyond the desert.

"This is it. This is what I wanted…"

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord murmured as if half in a daze. His eyes had grown hazy and moist.

How he'd missed it.

How he'd longed for it.

In the distant past, he'd led a hundred thousand followers of the Demonic Path across the land at the side of the one called the Heavenly Demon. But those memories weren't especially pleasant for the Blood-Sword Demon Lord.

Even then, he'd been nothing more than a hunting dog mad for blood, and the Heavenly Demon had given him little authority to command.

Now things were different.

His new master had given the Blood-Sword Demon Lord power over the lives and deaths of tens of thousands.

All he'd been given was one simple condition: under no circumstances was he to kill Jin Taekyung.

To show me such absolute trust…

The seven Black Ghosts he'd been given were proof enough.

And besides…

With them there, we cannot lose this battle. Not under any circumstances.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord looked away from the battlefield toward the white-robed figures under heavy guard not far away.

They were no less formidable than the Black Ghosts. Perhaps they would prove an even greater force.

Chapter 1034

Dressed from head to toe in white so pure it looked almost unnatural, they stood out among Dark Heaven's pitch-black ranks.

Their sleeves were so long and full they dragged on the ground. Veils hid most of their faces.

Wrapped without a gap in what looked less like clothing than great swaths of silk, they watched the battlefield in silence. Even the Blood-Sword Demon Lord was unaccustomed to the sight of them.

No—in a way, they made him uncomfortable.

Unlike the Black Ghosts—former comrades who had shared meals with him before becoming mindless killing machines—the white-robed figures answered not to him, but to "that person."

If that were all, it might have been easier to bear.

A moment ago, his eyes had been bright as he watched blood spread across the battlefield. Now displeasure flickered through them.

Such a magnificent battlefield right before me, and I have to stand here watching.

It was more than displeasure. He was beginning to feel downright offended.

His gaze swept over the twenty white-robed figures and stopped on one of them. He remembered the quiet voice that had halted him when he had eagerly moved to the front fifteen minutes earlier.

"Demon Lord, please be patient a little longer. The time is not yet ripe."

Had anyone said that to him during the Great Faction War, he would have torn open the fool's mouth and ripped out his tongue.

But fifty years was a long time. The Blood-Sword Demon Lord had grown a little more mature.

More precisely, fear and reverence for his new master, the Lord of Heaven, had stayed his feet and checked his murderous impulse.

Damn it.

There was a simple reason the slender figure he was glaring at had survived daring to interfere with him.

If not for that person…

She led the white-robed figures and had served the Lord of Heaven even more closely than he had. Born killer though he was, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord could hardly use a mere slight as grounds to strike her down.

That did not mean he could swallow his irritation.

"They're holding up rather well. If I'd stepped in sooner, the battle would have swung decisively in our favor by now."

His gaze and voice made the mockery plain. Neither the figure he had singled out nor anyone around her replied.

Their silence stoked the anger he had been struggling to contain.

“Strange, isn’t it? You stepped in without a care when you shouldn’t have. Now you’re acting like you’ve swallowed your tongue.”

His snake-like pupils narrowed further, still fixed on her.

“Or does that mean you’d like to stay silent forever?”

At the sound of his low voice, the figure finally parted her lips.

“What answer do you want from me, Demon Lord?”

Her reply was calm, without a hint of a tremor. The Blood-Sword Demon Lord’s brow twitched.

“I command this army. I came here to carry out that person’s will.”

“I know. I was there, too.”

“And yet you, a mere woman, dare to give me orders?”

“I gave no order. I only tried to dissuade you.”

Beneath the white silk veil, her cherry-red lips moved again.

“And that is what that person wishes, too.”

“…!”

At the unexpected reply, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord’s face went rigid.

“What… did you say?”

“I said that is what that person wishes.”

“That person—the great Lord of Heaven—doesn’t want me to step in? What is that supposed to…”

He trailed off in disbelief. The woman gave a small shake of her head, and the pure-white veil swayed. Its embroidered pattern was beautiful, yet somehow uncanny.

“You misunderstand. That person simply wishes you to come to no harm, if possible.”

“Harm? Me, of all people?”

For a moment, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord doubted his ears.

It was an unbearably humiliating thing to hear—as a martial artist, and as a subordinate who had devoted himself wholeheartedly to serving someone.

He commanded more than thirty thousand demonic soldiers, the Three Elders of Tianshan—three hunting dogs who had admittedly outlived their usefulness—and seven Black Ghosts besides.

And that was not all.

He hadn’t yet revealed the full extent of his strength, but the Blood-Sword Demon Lord himself had reached the realm of supreme mastery, making him one of the greatest masters alive.

The enemy, by contrast, fell short in every respect: in the number of Supreme Peak masters who could turn a battle, in the quality of their soldiers, and in sheer momentum.

The scales were tipped already. They had been tipping even before the battle began, and they were still tipping now.

So why was that woman spouting such nonsense? Why cast a boulder into his heart and crack his certainty that he had his master's complete trust?

"Will you stake your life on what you just said?"

His eyes and voice had gone cold. The woman's answer barely changed.

"That person's care for you is as vast as the sea. Please, try to understand his wishes."

It was as good as an admission.

A faint smile touched the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's lips.

"That person cares for me. Yes, I should understand."

The smile on his face didn't look like a smile at all. The woman's voice turned urgent.

"As you know, four Demon Lords and Demon Empresses have already met their ends. That person needs at least one more loyal servant to carry out his great cause…"

"Enough. All you mean to say is that I shouldn't act rashly."

"…Demon Lord, that is not—"

"Enough. Hold your tongue. I understand that person's wishes perfectly well now."

He spoke evenly, but the thoughts left behind by the storm in his mind were anything but calm.

You are watching me yourself, and this is all you think I'm capable of?

Crack.

The joints of his clenched hand popped. His fist had gone white, and his nails began to dig into his skin.

I have served you with all I have. I followed you more faithfully than anyone.

He remembered the day he first met the Lord of Heaven. The trembling born of unimaginable fear and reverence, the shock that had made him think his heart might stop—he remembered it as clearly as if it had happened yesterday.

Though I was not given the post I wanted, I have lived these fifty years and more solely to serve your great cause.

The Great Faction War.

When the Heavenly Demon met his end at the Martial God's hands near the close of that long war, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord had not been shaken in the slightest.

Of course he hadn't. The Heavenly Demon he had known was only human.

The ambition that had once seemed so grand, the martial might that had forced the young Blood-Sword Demon Lord to his knees—both had lost their luster after he met the Lord of Heaven.

He had felt no sorrow. He had been glad to find a master truly worthy of his service.

Glad until five other great fiends took seats above him in the newly risen Dark Heaven.

Even then, I simply obeyed you.

He'd understood without a word.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord had outranked him in the Demonic Cult, so his position was justified. The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord and the North Heaven Demon Lord were daggers planted deep in the Central Plains; the importance of their roles warranted high standing.

He could understand the Southern Heaven Demon Empress and the Blood Lord as well.

Discontent had taken root in his heart, but their positions were his master's will.

But…

Now, before it's too late, you should have trusted me at least a little.

The four Demon Lords and Demon Empress the Lord of Heaven had trusted so deeply had all met their ends. They had failed their missions spectacularly, then left this world before anyone could even call them to account.

At last, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's turn had come.

Together with the Blood Lord, who had stubbornly survived, he had finally become one of the Lord of Heaven's two arms. Whether he was the right or the left hardly mattered.

His master's trust and the opportunity he had been given—that was all he had wanted.

That was all.

But what was there to worry about so much?

None of the dead Demon Lords or the Demon Empress had led an army like his. None had commanded seven Black Ghosts and tens of thousands of soldiers.

He had every condition for victory that they had lacked. Yet his master still did not trust him fully.

He could hear that distrust in the words of the woman dressed in snow-white robes.

"Did you trust me so little?"

The lament meant to remain in his heart slipped between his lips.

KWA-BOOOOM!

A pillar of fire shot skyward with a roar that seemed to split the heavens. Even from dozens of jang[3674] away, where the Blood-Sword Demon Lord stood, it was unmistakable. It could be seen from anywhere on the battlefield—immense, raging, and merciless.

GRRRRRR!

A violent tremor traveled through the ground.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord had turned at the sudden wave of power even before the roar reached him. He took in the scene and murmured to his absent master once more.

“If you’d trusted me just a little more, this battle might already have been over.”

“Demon Lord…!”

“What? Am I not allowed even this much of a complaint?”

He answered the woman’s urgent cry without looking back. His eyes were on the haze rising in the distance—or rather, on the two figures streaking through the terrible heat that had produced it.

KRAK, BOOM!

Fire King Jeok Cheongang.

Each punch and palm strike burst the murky black fog apart. As the fog gathered to repair the damage, dark-blue Force slashed through it from every direction.

SHHK—KWA-BOOOOM!

Four Black Ghosts staggered again and again. Dark energy welled from the severed ends of their limbs like blood of another color. They looked unmistakably like humans on the verge of death.

No—the Blood-Sword Demon Lord knew it instinctively.

Eternal death was finally coming for them, too.

Gooooooong.

Space suddenly began to distort. Great Force surged around the white spearhead, rising and rolling in waves.

Like…

A dragon.

And at the moment the Blood-Sword Demon Lord muttered those words to himself, the spear, now one with its master, fell toward the Black Ghosts like a bolt of lightning.

SHWAAASH!

Heavenly Strike.

[3674] A jang is a traditional Korean measure of length equal to ten cheok, approximately 3.03 meters or 9.94 feet.

[3675] A jang is a traditional Korean measure of length equal to ten cheok, approximately 3.03 meters or 9.94 feet.

The distant flash swept through a radius of dozens of jang[3675], bathing everything in light and shaking the ground. In its wake, nothing remained.

Not the four Black Ghosts. Not the followers who had kept charging at the master and his disciple without pause.

Only one thing remained: the resolve of a born killer determined to prove himself to his master.

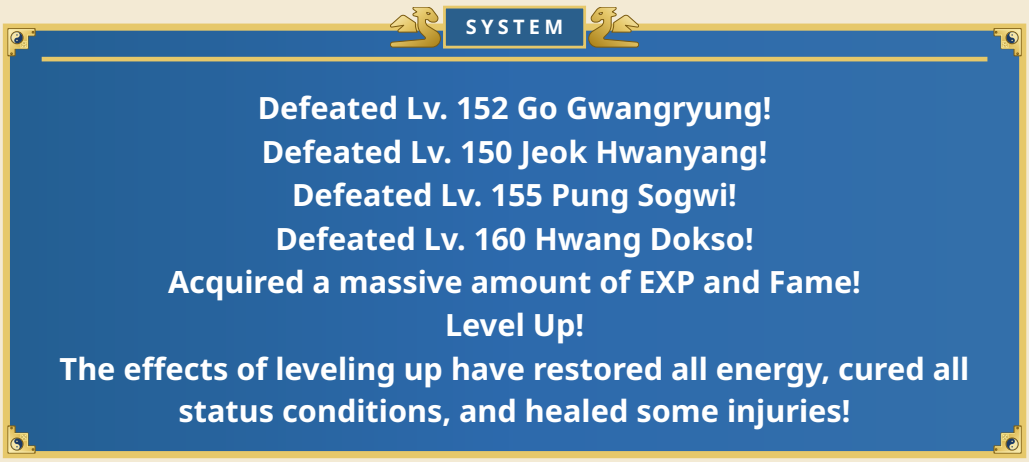
SHING.

A sharp sound brushed the Blood-Sword Demon Lord’s ear.

Chapter 1035

Ding. Ding. Ding.

Clear chimes rang in my ears. At the same moment, System notifications confirmed the results of my actions, and new vitality welled up from deep within me.



Shaaah.

Was this what it felt like to wash yourself from head to toe in a cool mountain stream on a sweltering summer day?

I took a deep breath as the exhaustion of that brief but fierce fight melted away all at once.

Whew.

But it wasn't a sigh of relief at having taken down four Black Ghosts.

It was only a breath to steady myself while I waited for the one person still standing—the one we had to defeat to win this battle.

"Old Master."

"Yeah."

Jeok Cheongang nodded at my brief call.

"He's coming."

At that moment—

Clack, clack, clack.

The Dark Heaven followers had never seemed to grow fewer, no matter how many we killed. Even after the Black Ghosts fell, those fanatics had kept closing in around us. Now they stopped in unison.

Then they opened a path with grave, orderly movements.

A path for just one person.

Step. Step.

"My apologies. I'm later than I intended."

His footsteps and calm voice carried clearly, even from a distance.

I shrugged at the Blood-Sword Demon Lord.

Thump.

I kicked the remains of what had been called Black Ghosts—now scattered into dozens of large and small fragments.

“If you’re sorry, go kill yourself.”

“That would be difficult.”

“Figured. Anyway, I’m fine. I was playing with your friends.”

“Friends? If you mean the trash lying there, you’re mistaken.”

“Trash?”

“Every one of them was pathetic. During the Great Faction War, they either ran wild like reckless brats who didn’t know their place and got themselves killed, or failed to recognize the true Heaven and raised their swords against it.”

That gave me an idea of what the Black Ghosts—the Death Knights who had appeared here today—had been in life.

“They were Demonic Cult fiends. You used to eat from the same pot.”

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord nodded readily.

“Once. A very long time ago.”

I’d suspected as much.

Everything that came into being had a cause. To make Death Knights this powerful, you obviously needed people of comparable stature to make them from.

“No wonder. Even their names sound like they belonged to a bunch of lowlife bastards.”

“Their names?”

“Go Gwangryung, Jeok Hwanyang, Pung Sogwi, Hwang Dokso… No one with a normal head comes up with names like those. Right?”

The names came out without a moment’s hesitation. The Blood-Sword Demon Lord looked at me in surprise.

“How strange. How do you know their names?”

“What, weren’t they famous? Just hearing their names puts me in a shitty mood. I can practically tell what kind of lives they led.”

“There was a time when everyone in the Central Plains knew of them. By their sobriquets, that is. But…”

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord looked between Jeok Cheongang and me before adding, “A martial artist is known by their martial arts and sobriquet, not their name. Even back then, very few knew those men’s real names. Even with someone who’s spent many years gaining experience at your side, you couldn’t have learned those names.”

He sounded certain.

And for good reason. Xinjiang, once the Demonic Cult's stronghold and now Dark Heaven's home, had always been that kind of place.

A Land of Ruin where no one could set foot without permission.

A religious state beyond the desert, whose veil even the Hidden Shadow Pavilion had managed to lift only a little, after long and meticulous preparation.

But I was different.

I could read information no one else knew, even if it was only in fragments.

As long as the subject was in front of me.

And as long as the gap between our strength and abilities wasn't too great.

Shaaah!

At that moment, a blue circle I couldn't see swallowed up the space around us in a flash of light, responding to my will.

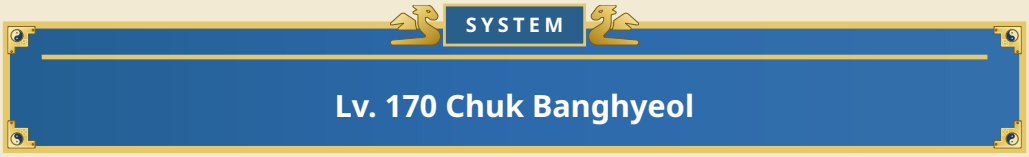
Qi Sense, now nine-tenths mastered, reached out from me and washed an area more than fifty jang[3676] in radius in blue.

Ding. Ding-ding-ding.

Countless System windows appeared over the heads of the hundreds—no, thousands—of enemies within Qi Sense's range.

But my gaze stayed fixed on one person.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord had stopped walking the instant Qi Sense activated.



I could clearly make out the Level window above his head from more than twenty jang[3677] away.

I could see his furrowed brow and puzzled expression, too.

"What in the world did you just—"

Qi Sense wasn't a term exclusive to me. Martial artists who had reached a certain realm routinely gauged and read their own qi and that of others.

But Qi Sense as part of the System felt different from theirs.

"What did you do?"

His voice had dropped. The warmth had gone from his tone.

I grinned at him.

"Our Banghyeol sure has a lot of questions. Is it because you're still in your prime?"

[3676] A jang is ten cheok, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Fifty jang is about 152 m (500 ft); twenty jang is about 61 m (200 ft).

[3677] A jang is ten cheok, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Fifty jang is about 152 m (500 ft); twenty jang is about 61 m (200 ft).

"…!"

"Oh, was that name a secret too? Why do you fiends have so much to hide?"

Jeok Cheongang had experienced my Qi Sense when we first met in Shanxi Province. He clicked his tongue and joined in.

"You may not know this, but that thing feels pretty damn unpleasant. The first time, even I thought some bizarre dark art had been used on me."

"But he's a fiend. Shouldn't dark arts feel familiar to him?"

"Well…"

Jeok Cheongang studied the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's rigid face before answering.

"Maybe he's embarrassed. Even from what little I've heard, it's not a very good name. Banghyeol? That's supposed to be a person's name? Sounds like a fart."

"Come on. Even if you're old enough to have shoved your years up your ass, you can't make fun of him for that. That man's probably almost a hundred himself."

"You wait till you're old. Sometimes you feel strange for no reason. Who knows? Maybe he sits under the moon every night with tears in his eyes."

"Oh."

The idea that a notorious great fiend had finally entered menopause was pretty interesting. But the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's next words wiped the look from my face.

"You're right, Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung."

"What?"

"Didn't you just say it yourself? That dark arts ought to be familiar to him."

He gazed down at his hands, as though trying to recall the sensation my Qi Sense had left behind.

"I see. It's a little different from what I know, but it does feel familiar."

"…!"

My eyes widened before I could stop them.

Different, but familiar.

The meaning of those few words was becoming clearer. So was the source of the unease rising within me.

"At first, I was surprised. Now I finally understand why that person watched you so closely."

Step. Step. Splash.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord crossed the dry, frozen ground and stepped into a pool of blood.

Plip.

Blood splashed with his roughened stride.

A powerful energy covered the slowly rising blade, thicker and more viscous than the blood itself.

“But this time, that person was wrong. I should have handled this myself from the start. There was never any need to stop me or worry about me.”

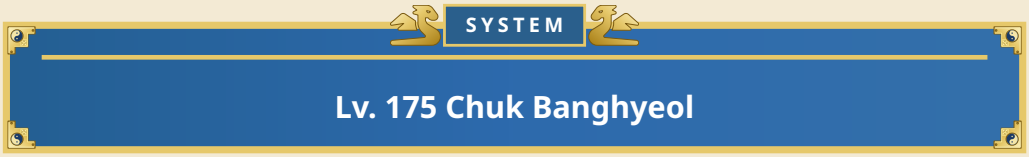
Wooooong.

I felt something change around the Blood-Sword Demon Lord.

Not because the wind had stopped and the air was trembling.

Not because the sword in his grip was roaring as it poured out immense Force.

Beep.



“...!”

It had changed.

The qi he gave off. The number in his Level window.

This is...

I knew instinctively.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord hadn’t simply been concealing his strength through Returning to Simplicity.

He definitely, definitely wasn’t this strong before.

We had clashed once before the battle began in earnest. Jeok Cheongang and I had fought at full strength, and so had the Blood-Sword Demon Lord. The result had been clear: he was at a disadvantage.

So why?

Beep.

How?

Beep.

How was the Blood-Sword Demon Lord growing stronger even now, as he slowly approached us?

“What in the world… What dark art are you using?”

There was no way a master wouldn’t feel what his Disciple felt.

Jeok Cheongang’s question cast light on the unease that had been swelling inside me.

Dark arts.

A dark, devious technique, just as the words themselves meant.

Those who used them had strayed from the straight and righteous path into demonic, heterodox arts. And those who dwelled deepest in that abyss belonged to what people called—

The Demonic Path.

People who rejected life as humans and chose the path of demons.

Then what should the dark arts wielded by beings so full of incomprehensible mysteries be called?

How had those beings known as Black Ghosts come into existence, and appeared here?

“…No.”

“What?”

“It’s not dark arts.”

The words slipped from my lips in a dazed murmur.

Jeok Cheongang’s repeated questions grew distant, like echoes. For a moment, I even forgot the Blood-Sword Demon Lord’s presence, growing stronger with every step he took toward us.

As if entranced, I looked at the white-robed figures.

Until now, his presence had obscured them. They were only a tiny part of this vast battlefield, where the fighting still raged.

No. Like the Black Ghosts, they possessed power that should not exist in this world.

“Magic.”

And the moment that familiar, unbelievable word slipped from my lips—

“Power of the Wind Ghost.”

A chant rang out clearly from far away.

“Dwell within him.”

The spell, imbued with intent, manifested in the Blood-Sword Demon Lord’s body.

Chapter 1036

Had I failed to guess it from the start? Or had I tried to deny it because the truth was so hard to believe?

This time, I could answer that question myself.

I think it was the latter.

It was true. All of it.

The realization struck my mind, leaving it blank as a sheet of paper.

At the same time, I felt the last shred of faith I'd held on to crumble, along with everything I'd thought I knew about this world.

The strange Moving Formation, whose existence had already been revealed long ago in Henan and Sichuan.

The Water God Dragon and countless Blood Fish, corrupted by something in Hubei and driven into a frenzy.

An utterly ordinary fisherman who'd eaten those Blood Fish and gained a monster's appearance and strength.

The cause of all those phenomena—and not just that, but the rift that had appeared once more in the jungles of Nanman.

Even the familiar beings called Black Ghosts, whom I'd faced right here today.

And.

And…

At last, it was unmistakable.

It was unfolding right before my eyes. I could hear it, feel it flowing clearly through my senses.

All the warnings that had come before—call them signs, omens, whatever you wanted.

They had finally broken through a great dam and come crashing down on me, turning the suspicion I'd only entertained in private into certainty.

In two characters:

Magic.

Shaaah.

The wind blew. A shadow moving with speed and power far beyond human limits glided toward me, trailing a long afterimage.

But I couldn't even twitch a finger.

In a world gone slow, with my whole body feeling as if the blood in it had turned cold, all I could do was stare, dumbfounded.

What is this…?

Where a massive bomb had exploded, nothing remained but ruins and the shock wave.

My mind was wreckage now. Words and questions scattered through it, caught in the blast.

Magic. Mage. Monster. Blood-Sword Demon Lord. Buff.

A large-scale attack spell. Allies sacrificed. Countless deaths, blood spilling everywhere, broken bodies floating in it.

How was any of this possible?

How had it come to this?

And finally—

What am I supposed to do now?

Every thought scattered. Only that question remained, and I had no answer.

Grab.

A hard, rough hand—one I knew—closed around my shoulder.

No. The instant I felt it, a powerful force had already dragged me backward, sending me stumbling without strength.

Only then did time begin to move again. A streak of light was swung through the gap like lightning.

Whoooom—KABOOM!

A roar like the sky splitting apart brought my senses rushing back.

I was already airborne somewhere behind where I'd stood. As I hung weightless, an enormous shock wave struck.

KRRRACK!

The ground heaved like an earthquake had hit. Two immense forces melted and shattered everything around them.

At the center of the clash, which swallowed dozens of jang[3678] in every direction, stood Jeok Cheongang. He had shoved me aside when I froze like a statue and stepped in to stop the Blood-Sword Demon Lord.

"Hah!"

How had I flown so far already?

Even at this distance, I could tell Jeok Cheongang's shout, charged with profound internal energy, was more than a battle cry.

That was for me. He's trying to wake me up.

It reached my ears and jolted my half-dazed mind awake. At last, I let out the breath I'd been holding.

Right. It's not over yet.

[3678] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to ten ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

I still couldn't understand how any of this could be happening. But with death right in front of me, what did understanding matter?

There was no use in understanding when the water had already spilled.

All I could do on this battlefield was accept what was happening and find a way through it.

That was how I'd save everyone.

Srrk.

Still suspended in the air, I twisted smoothly around.

My muscles and internal energy, fully restored by that last Level Up, obeyed the command in my mind without the slightest delay or error.

Now.

Boom—shwaaash!

I kicked off the air with a foot charged with qi and shot toward Jeok Cheongang, who was clashing with the Blood-Sword Demon Lord more than twenty jang[3679] away.

Or I tried to.

As I cut through the wind, an immense, invisible force descended on me.

Wooooong.

The air vanished. The wind vanished.

The instant I noticed, I heard a faint voice from far away.

"Taishan."

"…!"

I knew what that quiet invocation meant. My eyes widened, but I couldn't stop the clear voice issuing from beneath a pure-white veil on a hill fifty jang[3680] away.

"Bring him down. Crush him."

At that very moment—

Fwooom!

A weight as immense as Taishan bore down on my whole body.

No—it sent me plummeting.

Straight toward the countless enemies who had gathered like clouds during the brief moment I'd been airborne, their spears and bows aimed at me.

Gravity magic…!

I swallowed my cry of shock.

Instead of resisting this second, unexpected spell, I let it take hold and turned it into a weapon.

KWA-BOOM!

[3679] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to ten ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[3680] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to ten ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

I struck the ground under the weight of ten thousand geun.[3681] The earth split, and the enemies around me staggered off balance. At the same time, I felt the pressure pinning me down dissipate.

Of course.

Gravity acted on an area, not a single person.

While I was airborne, I'd been the first to feel the spell's effects. Once I landed, that was no longer true.

The white-robed figures were clearly mages. If they wanted to bind me even a little, their gravity magic would have to target the Dark Heaven followers who were their allies, too.

So they meant to delay me from joining Jeok Cheongang, even if only this way…

Fine by me.

The followers staggered like soulless wooden puppets. I turned in place and swept White Flame across them.

KWA-AAAH!

The spear's passage through the air sounded more than fierce—outright destructive.

Anyone could swing a spear sideways. But none of the enemies surrounding me could stop the wave of Force that burst from White Flame's translucent spearhead.

Not one.

SHHK! KRRRACK!

Everything was cut apart and crushed.

Weapons. People.

In the blink of an eye, the ground within a three-jang[3682] radius had become a field of death. Yet the fear had been stripped from them. They stared at me with dark, unseeing eyes and kept charging.

They murmured the eight-character creed as if entranced.

"Heaven above, earth below."

"All demons bow."

"Heaven above…"

CRUNCH!

A headless body toppled. My spear flashed sideways through three more enemies closing in from the flank.

SHK!

Weapons imbued with Sword Energy and bodies hardened by the external arts alike were helpless against overwhelming force.

[3681] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun is about 6,000 kg (13,200 lb).

[3682] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to ten ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

I drove through the scattering fragments of steel and flesh without hesitation.

I streaked like lightning between the enemies blocking my way like a wall, thinking and commanding without pause.

Open Inventory. Summon. Summon. Summon.

SHHK, THUNK, KRRRACK!

I cut, stabbed, and crushed my way forward.

Weapons stayed in my hands only briefly. Each took one life, or two or three, before it left me. Countless more blades still lay hidden in that vast subspace whose limits I couldn't begin to guess.

For a moment, the thought crossed my mind that perhaps I could make some ridiculous idea real.

No. There's no way.

But why?

CLANG!

I knocked aside the weapons coming at me from every direction.

THWACK!

I crushed the head of an enemy approaching from my blind spot with a single punch.

SHWEEESH—SHHK!

And the more enemies I cut down, the stronger that inexplicable certainty grew.

Could this really be nothing more than a fantasy?

SHWAAASH!

I turned and swung my spear, leaving a mist of blood along its path.

As enemies surged in from every direction to fill the gap left by the dead, I took a short breath.

I won't know until I try.

Thinking back, it had always been like this.

Every time I needed to break through a wall, I had to go beyond it. I had to make the impossible possible, turn imagination into reality.

Just as I would now.

Open Inventory.

One breath. That was all the time I needed.

With countless enemies still blocking my path, filling every space no matter how many I killed, I quietly closed my eyes. I pictured the mountain of sharp, gleaming steel somewhere in the void called the Inventory.

Then I gave the command.

Summon.

It was madness. The sort of thing that could exist only in my imagination.

But the System answered that absurd, desperate call.

The way it always did.

Ding.

One small, clear chime.

Ding. Ding. Ding-ding.

Chimes layered over one another. Their faint ripples grew into a wave that swallowed the space around me.

Ding-ding-ding-ding-ding!

My ears grew muffled. This was the first step toward making imagination real.

I opened my eyes to a chime vaster and more majestic than any I'd ever heard.

And saw it.

Shaaah.

Something had forced its way through a gap in unseen space above my head, casting a shadow below.

I heard it, too.

Shrring.

The cold sound of hundreds of pieces of steel sliding against one another.

And finally—

I can do this.

I felt it. I understood.

What I was capable of, the limits I had been given, stretched far beyond anything I'd imagined.

I had the power to make at least part of that ridiculous idea real.

Fwoosh.

In the slowed world, immense qi surged from deep within me.

The fire dragon coiled in my lower dantian flowed through every limb and bone. Blood rushed with the pounding of my heart.

Thump. Thump. Thump.

A fierce tremor. A racing pulse.

No. That's not it.

The beat wasn't coming from my heart alone.

The Jade Hall Acupoint.

What the people called martial artists had newly named the Middle Dantian.

Every nerve, every sense I possessed was fixed there.

Past the lower dantian, where lava surged in waves, to that lofty peak rising toward the heavens.

To a realm of Will that strength and speed could not measure.

Kiiiiing.

My vision blurred. Agony stabbed through my head as though someone were driving a needle into it.

But I spread my arms as if entranced.

A flash filled my sight, and I felt a thrill greater than the pain. My hands were empty, yet somewhere beyond the reach of touch, I felt and grasped each thing, one by one.

One, two, three.

Ten, twenty, thirty.

And at last…

One hundred.

I opened my eyes.

In that time that had felt like eternity, yet lasted no more than an instant.

Beneath a mountain of sabers and a forest of swords—a hundred blades aimed at countless enemies as if held by an invisible hand.

I parted my tightly closed lips.

“Move.”

SHWAAAAASH!

The sky filled with flashes of light.

Chapter 1037

Sama Pyo suddenly wondered where he was, who he was, and what he was supposed to do against the enemies still pouring in.

Thwack!

Even as the thought crossed his mind, his saber moved on instinct and cut through an enemy's neck. But Sama Pyo already knew: even if he cut down dozens, hundreds, tens of thousands more would remain.

His strength was far too meager to turn the tide of this disadvantageous battle.

Clang! Krrr-crack!

"Argh!"

"Gah…!"

Horrifying screams rang out from every direction.

No—more precisely, only their allies were screaming.

At the center of the front line, which was crumbling beneath an endless spray of blood, Sama Pyo could see what was coming.

At this rate… it's all over.

His body was exhausted, but his mind was colder than ever. His judgment was clear.

When two forces of roughly equal size clashed, the quality of their troops and their momentum decided the outcome. And Dark Heaven's army had them beaten on both counts.

Half an hour at most. No—fifteen minutes. The front line will collapse by then.

He kept to himself the thought that would have plunged any of his allies into despair and charged at another enemy.

Jin Taekyung had plunged so deep into the enemy ranks that Sama Pyo could no longer see him. Sama Pyo could barely hold the line, let alone follow. Anger at his own helplessness drove his next strike.

Slice!

One clean strike cleaved the enemy's upper body in two.

Beneath the shower of blood, a young martial artist who had been trembling in the certainty of his own death lit up with relief.

"Th-thank you… Huh?"

His eyes widened. He sounded dazed.

He looked barely twenty. Just as he recognized Sama Pyo, Sama Pyo recognized the Black Dragon Demon Gate uniform he wore. Something about him seemed familiar, too.

Where have I seen him before?

But the question only flickered through his mind. A moment later, Sama Pyo hurriedly twisted around and swung his saber.

Whish—Kkakak!

Sword Energy tore through the air and met his blade with a violent screech.

Beyond their locked weapons, his opponent's eyes were vacant as a corpse's. The Sword Energy, though, shone fiercely—brighter and sharper than Sama Pyo's own.

A master...!

One brief clash was enough to feel the gap between them down to his bones.

But there was one thing Sama Pyo had failed to notice.

Crack.

His saber had been battered and dulled in clashes with dozens of enemies. It was too weak to withstand the fierce Sword Energy of a man who stood at the threshold of the Peak realm.

KWA-CLANG!

The clash ended almost as soon as it began.

Half of Sama Pyo's blade spun high into the air. A streak of light shot straight toward him.

Danger!

An alarm blared in his mind at the sight of that devastating flash. Instinct spoke before reason could.

Dodge. Survive, whatever it takes. No matter how disgraceful it looks.

But...

Where am I supposed to dodge?

Time seemed to slow, as though his life were flashing before his eyes. Sama Pyo was acutely aware of everything around him.

Clang-clang! Thud!

"Gaaah!"

The ceaseless clash of blades. Blood scattering through the air. Dying screams.

And his allies, still facing the enemy in a line so tightly packed their shoulders brushed.

Sama Pyo could clearly sense the tremor in their breathing. And at the same time, he knew:

There's nowhere to dodge.

No. That wasn't true.

He could dart to either side right now, or duck and roll to avoid as much of the enemy's Sword Energy as possible.

Narye tagon?[3683]

[3683] Narye tagon is an idiom likening an evasive roll to a lazy donkey rolling on the ground; it implies humiliation.

Who cared? Dignity was a luxury in the face of death.

Covered in filth instead of blood, or with an ally used as his shield—it made no difference. Surviving by any means necessary was the way of the unorthodox faction.

That was what his father, the Black Night King Sima Gong, had taught him—the man who'd passed his blood down to him.

Yes. That's what he taught me.

But things had changed.

One year.

In that short time, the son had stepped out from beneath the shadow his father had cast over his entire life. He had met people, lived through much, and changed.

That was why Sama Pyo saw no way out now.

He could dodge. He couldn't dodge.

If he avoided the Sword Energy creeping toward him through that seemingly frozen moment, one of his allies would surely die.

What a damn mess.

The curse rested soundlessly on the tip of his tongue.

Sama Pyo didn't notice the faint smile forming on his lips. Nor did he notice how strangely relieved he felt, even with death right before his eyes.

He launched the dagger he'd hidden under his sleeve, thinking that if the person who'd suddenly come to mind were watching, they might even praise him for this.

Not a bad end for an unorthodox bastard, don't you think, Pavilion Master?

Sama Pyo smiled brightly.

At the same time, he felt the enemy's Sword Energy grow even fiercer. It swallowed the dagger flying toward it and surged toward his chest.

Then he heard two sharp, unexpected whistles through the air.

Slice! Thud!

Sama Pyo stared with wide eyes.

At the last moment, someone had leaped in front of him. Blood sprayed from the man's chest as he staggered. Over his shoulder, a blackish-blue saber blade drove through the enemy's throat.

This is…

Sama Pyo recognized the blade at once. It was the Black Dragon Saber, his treasured weapon, which he had left behind before the meeting with the Blood-Sword Demon Lord.

He recognized the owner of the Force imbued in it, too.

"You fool."

That chilling voice was utterly familiar—and one he could never grow used to.

Thwack!

The twisted blade of the Black Dragon Saber finished severing the enemy's neck. Black Force rose like a spreading wildfire and swept across the front.

KRRR-CRACK!

A fierce, blood-red gale engulfed dozens of enemies. The allies who witnessed that overwhelming display of martial might cried out one after another.

"S-Sect Leader!"

"The Sect Leader is here!"

The Black Night King, Sima Gong, had finally appeared on the front line. The great tree that supported the unorthodox Murim had come with the finest martial artists of the Black Dragon Demon Gate.

"Attack."

A single word escaped his tightly pressed lips.

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh! KABOOM!

Dozens of Peak masters plunged into the enemy ranks.

Cheers broke out across the front. For that moment, none of the allies holding it dared ask why Sima Gong had only appeared now, or why he had stayed in the rear when he'd had plenty of time to join them.

None but one.

"You're late."

The son did not look at the father he had met on the battlefield.

Sama Pyo was looking at the body of the young martial artist who had just thrown himself in front of him. The boy he had saved a moment earlier had looked as though the peach fuzz had scarcely left his face.

His father followed his gaze to the body. His reply was cold.

"He died because you were weak."

"That's right. If I'd been stronger, he would've lived."

Sama Pyo nodded calmly, then spoke without restraint.

"Then what were you doing, when you're so strong?"

"What?"

"The monsters called Black Ghosts never came this way. If you'd brought your forces in at the right time, we could have broken through the enemy lines."

Why hadn't the Black Ghosts appeared here? Sima Gong commanded thirty thousand troops, a force central to this battle. Why hadn't the enemy targeted it?

And why had his father stood by while that opportunity passed?

Sima Gong's gaze darkened as his son voiced the questions everyone else had momentarily forgotten.

What are you trying to say?

At the sudden Sound Transmission in his ear, Sama Pyo gave a quiet laugh.

Why? Afraid someone might hear?

How dare you…

I'd already suspected you had other plans. But I kept telling myself it couldn't be true. I wanted to believe in you.

His son—no, Sama Pyo—drew a deep breath.

You're still my father, after all.

…!

Do you still not understand why I volunteered for a position that was practically a death sentence?

Sama Pyo had known instinctively that his father was harboring other intentions. He had known that if the heir to everything Sima Gong had built over his lifetime had not been in danger, his father would not have appeared here even now.

"But please, don't worry. However this battle ends, the Black Dragon Demon Gate will survive."

For the first time, the son chose a path different from his father's. He turned away without hesitation. Before charging back toward the enemy, he offered one more remark—perhaps the last he would ever make to him.

"It looks like the other one is dead already. A pity."

The son left those cryptic words behind. The father remained.

When Sima Gong's gaze, still frozen like a statue, finally settled on the fallen body, he suddenly remembered a middle-aged man and a young man from several days earlier, as they crossed the desert. They'd dared to speak of the Black Dragon Demon Gate's and Sama Pyo's hidden history.

And the command he'd given that had decided their fate in an instant.

See to it as you see fit.

The order had been carried out. Both men had been placed in the most dangerous part of the front line, and both had died.

But the Black Night King, Sima Gong, had not known.

No one could have known that a young man whom a cold-hearted father had sent to his death would save his son.

"…What a cruel twist of fate."

Sima Gong murmured quietly, then looked down at the Black Dragon Saber in his hand.

The treasured blade he had given his son as his first and last gift now reflected an old man with a troubled look in his eyes.

At that moment, it caught a distant flash of light as well.

It was like lightning.

Bolt after bolt falling without pause, tearing and burning everything beneath them with overwhelming force.

Yet everyone staring wide-eyed at the distant scene knew what they were seeing. Their heightened senses, their instincts and common sense as martial artists, told them what those countless flashes lighting up the battlefield really were.

They were blades, like the ones in their own hands.

Fwoosh!

Dozens of brilliant streaks tore through the darkness beneath the heavy clouds.

They moved freely through the air, like living things, sweeping over beings that could no longer be called alive because they felt nothing.

KRRR-CRACK!

No screams followed—only the sickening sound of flesh being torn apart.

Weapons forged through hundreds of rounds of tempering in lands beyond the desert shattered the moment they met that wave of steel. Their wielders fared no better.

Splash. Thud-thud-thud!

Blood surged up like a wave.

Beneath that red rain, bursting from the bodies of dozens and soaking the ground, one man slowly walked forward.

Squish.

Sticky. Blood pooled up to his ankles and sloshed with each step. Its foul stench seeped into his nose.

Jin Taekyung was covered in blood from head to toe, but he kept walking.

The enormous wave of steel moved with him, subject to his Will alone.

Clack. Thud-thud-thunk!

Something clicked into place, followed by a whistle through the air. Jin Taekyung's fingers moved ever so slightly.

Clang!

Five great sabers floating through the air spread their broad blades across his flank. The steel shield opened like petals in full bloom, catching the arrowheads that came flying at him in quick succession.

It all happened in the blink of an eye.

Kakakakclang!

A dozen arrows bounced away in showers of sparks.

Jin Taekyung did not flinch. He had already made everything within a three-jang[3684] radius his own.

[3684] Three Korean jang are about 9.09 m (29.8 ft).

And whoever had hidden among his allies to fire the repeating crossbow would not get another chance to ambush him.

Go.

There was no need to turn and find the archer. At Jin Taekyung's command, the five great sabers that had shielded him shot away like enormous arrows.

Thud-thud-thud!

More than twenty people died in the time it took him to exhale: the one who had fired the crossbow, those who stood in the sabers' path, and the enemies beside them.

But the five sabers didn't return, either.

Even Jin Taekyung had limits when it came to hurling steel weighing dozens of geun[3685] apiece like bolts of lightning.

Grit.

A terrible headache struck without warning. He clenched his teeth.

Was that too ambitious?

Unlike the Lower Dantian, the Middle Dantian was the domain of Will—of mental strength.

Controlling this many weapons was nothing short of a miracle. Imbuing each one with internal energy and controlling it perfectly was another matter.

A master of a certain level could stop weapons propelled by strength and speed alone.

Just as some of them were doing now.

Thud! Kakakakclang!

The weapons shot forward again at his command, piercing flesh and bone. But over a distance of barely ten jang[3686], the blades that had once numbered close to a hundred had dwindled by half. Some of the enemies who had reached the Peak realm were beginning to knock them aside without much trouble.

Not yet. Not yet.

Since the battle began, he had cut down hundreds of enemies on his own.

No—perhaps more than a thousand.

It was a feat worthy of the name One Against a Thousand.

But…

It's not enough.

The deeper he pushed into the enemy ranks, the closer he came to Jeok Cheongang's fight with the Blood-Sword Demon Lord, the stronger the enemies grew.

[3685] One Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb).

[3686] Ten Korean jang are about 30.3 m (99.4 ft).

To bring down every enemy still surging toward him, Jin Taekyung would have to unleash everything he had.

Just one. One strike is enough.

The instant the thought arose in his mind and took shape as Will—

Slip. Clang-clang-clang!

The dozens of weapons surrounding him fell from the air.

All but one spear. It had drunk more blood than any of the other blades, yet its gleam had not faded.

Now.

Fwoosh.

In the wavering space, White Flame blazed with Force and shot forward.

At the end of its fierce passage through a human wave numbering in the hundreds stood one man.

KWA-BOOM!

A roar split the air like the sky breaking open. The immense force behind the spearhead drove a figure backward.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord had been rushing at Jeok Cheongang, who was now drenched in blood. He bared his bloodstained teeth at Jin Taekyung, standing on a red path strewn with finely chopped flesh.

“So, you’ve come?”

Chapter 1038

It was probably the power of the Middle Dantian. I'd pushed it beyond its limits.

Step.

The dead and the living—everything else seemed to vanish as I stepped onto the blood-red path. At that moment, an agonizing headache unlike anything I'd ever felt before struck me.

Hup.

It felt as if a long, sharp needle were digging around inside my skull.

I held back a groan and fought to still my trembling body. If I showed the slightest weakness in front of a beast that had already bared its fangs, it would devour me on the spot.

"So, you've come?"

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord.

The moment I heard his utterly unruffled voice, my headache doubled.

No. Maybe the real reason was the sight of Jeok Cheongang, now drenched in blood.

Or perhaps…

> System Lv. ??? Chuk Banghyeol

> Lv. ??? Chuk Banghyeol

Perhaps it was the strength of the Blood-Sword Demon Lord: a true monster whose Level I could no longer measure, even now.

At least twenty Levels above me… This is going to be an even harder fight.

Swallowing a groan, I reached out. White Flame, connected to me by an invisible thread, shot back into my grasp.

Nothing stopped it. I'd been braced for interference, but none came.

"Qi-Controlled Sword. No, should I call it Qi-Controlled Spear? You must've been in quite a hurry to push yourself this far."

He sounded as relaxed as he looked. The Blood-Sword Demon Lord smiled with the ease of a man who knew he was stronger.

"Still, I'll give you credit. Good try. At least you made it back before your master died."

He laughed and casually waved a hand. The instant he did, Jeok Cheongang spotted an opening and thrust out his palm like lightning.

"You bastard!"

KWA-AAAH!

Heat surged forward with his shout.

The force of Flame Divine Palm burned everything in its path as it bore down on the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's face. His smile never wavered.

A streak of blood-red Sword Force cut through the space between them.

SHWAK! KWA-BOOM!

The palm force split cleanly in two. Both halves flew off to either side and slammed into the ground.

A roar engulfed a dozen-jang[3687] radius. Acrid smoke billowed up, and through it the Blood-Sword Demon Lord appeared like a ghost and brought his sword down.

SHWAAASH!

Space warped under the terrible pressure.

But Jeok Cheongang threw himself aside as though he'd anticipated the strike, powerful enough to cleave a mountain.

SHK!

The ground split like tofu.

Jeok Cheongang narrowly avoided the blow and immediately found his footing. But the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's blurred figure was already moving toward his flank.

Danger...!

He was so fast that even I reacted too late. There was no time to shout.

In less than a breath, the two superhumans exchanged attacks like flashes of light. The Blood-Sword Demon Lord moved faster than sound.

WHOOOM—PAM!

Compressed air burst apart.

They were too close for him to swing his sword. Instead, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord struck Jeok Cheongang's shoulder with his palm, sending him flying backward like a cannonball.

And directly in his path—

SHWEEEE—THUD!

—I was racing toward him with all my strength.

"Old Master!"

The shout burst out before I knew it. With my help, Jeok Cheongang managed to stop himself. His reply came in a rasp.

"I'm fine. Stop making a fuss and lower your voice. You'll burst my eardrums."

He sounded as gruff as ever. Most people wouldn't have heard a difference, but I knew the Fire King Jeok Cheongang better than anyone.

[3687] A jang is a traditional Korean length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

The greater the danger, the more he pretended to be calm. Even if it was only to reassure someone else.

“You’re doing it again. Time for your medicine.”

I sighed, placed a hand on his back, and poured internal energy into him without hesitation.

Tap. Fwoosh.

Fire joined with fire.

The Scorching Yang Qi born of the same source connected in an instant, driving out the impurities pooled deep inside his body.

“Cough.”

Drip-drip.

A mouthful of blood spilled from his lips against his will. It was black, a sign of considerable Internal Injury.

I clicked my tongue. “You’re fine, are you?”

Jeok Cheongang spat out bloody phlegm.

“It’s one mouthful of blood. What’s all the fuss?”

Honestly, I wanted to let it go. But when someone’s life was on the line, it mattered whether they were telling the truth.

THWACK!

The earlier strike had thinned the enemy forces behind us, but plenty remained. As one of them, unable to wait any longer, charged us, I kicked him in the chest and caved it in.

“You do know you’re covered head to toe in blood, right?”

“It isn’t mine. I’ve been running around so much, I got some on me.”

“That guy looks perfectly fine.”

I pointed to the Blood-Sword Demon Lord, strolling toward us through the parting waves of men. Jeok Cheongang smacked his lips.

“He must’ve been less busy.”

“Ah. Less busy. I see.”

“Anyway, I’m fine. Not a scratch on me… Well, that’s not quite true, but this much won’t stop me.”

PAM!

Jeok Cheongang sprang upright, turning three enemies to charcoal as he rose. Then he licked the blood from the corner of his mouth.

“Well?”

“Just tell me the truth. I won’t tell anyone else.”

“You insolent brat. Are you saying this old man is bluffing?”

“Aren’t you?”

“No. What’s a bastard like him to me?”

“Then I’ll go help the others.”

“Hm?”

“You can handle a bastard like him by yourself, right? Everyone else is fighting for their lives.”

Grab!

The instant I started to turn away, Jeok Cheongang snatched my wrist like lightning and replied in a stern voice.

“The wise men of old said even a sheet of paper is easier to lift when two people carry it.”

“…”

“I don’t know what trick he’s using, but every so often he gets startlingly stronger and faster. You’d think he was possessed.”

“…”

“And that’s not all. Whenever this old man tried to land a blow with all my strength, some unknown force kept stopping me. It was—”

“Old Master.”

I cut him off and added quietly, “You’re talking too much.”

“…”

“One sentence. Short and clear.”

Jeok Cheongang was silent for a moment. Then he answered exactly as I’d asked.

“That bastard’s strong as fuck.”

“Perfectly put.”

“And those pure-white things way over there are helping him with some bizarre dark arts. Every time that strange energy of theirs surges, he gets stronger. I tried to take them out before things got even worse, even if I had to overextend myself, but…”

“You failed. You got hit by those dark arts, too.”

“That’s right. What I felt then was like…”

“The sky was crushing you.”

Gravity magic. No doubt about it.

Jeok Cheongang stared at me, momentarily stunned that I’d described it so precisely. I continued calmly.

“More precisely, that’s not ordinary dark arts. It’s an ability called Magic.”

“Wait. If you mean Magic…”

“Yes. The Magic you know about. The kind you’d only see in my homeland.”

“…!”

Of course Jeok Cheongang's eyes widened. I hadn't told him every detail, but he knew something of where I came from and what kind of world it was.

Even so, he couldn't fully understand or accept what was happening. Neither could I.

But that mattered less than defeating the enemy in front of us.

We have to target them first. Not the Blood-Sword Demon Lord—those people in white. The mages.

Even as I sent him the message through Sound Transmission, a chill ran down my spine at how unfamiliar the idea felt.

Mages. Here, of all places. Not in the modern world, but in Murim.

Then I looked past the Blood-Sword Demon Lord, who was still closing the distance at a leisurely stroll. On the hill behind him stood the mages, their white robes fluttering. The reality of it sank in.

We have to take them out first, no matter what.

From the moment I'd realized they were mages, I hadn't considered any other option.

I knew what the word Magic could mean—how many dangers and unknowns came with it. Of the tens of thousands of allies standing or falling on this battlefield, I was the only one who knew what mages could do in a battle this large.

Besides…

One of them is especially skilled. Skilled enough to hold back both me and Old Master with Magic.

Magic worked differently, but qi was still the raw material behind it. To Jeok Cheongang or me, even a fairly advanced mage wouldn't pose much of a threat.

Unless they were among the rare few said to have reached the very edge of truth.

"…A Grand Mage."

The title escaped my lips like a groan.

But just as I was about to conclude that one of them had to be a Grand Mage, a question occurred to me.

If they really have a Grand Mage, how has the battle stayed like this?

I didn't mean we were winning. Everyone, myself included, was giving it their all, and the battle was still going badly for our side.

But if the Grand Mage had stepped in, we wouldn't even have been able to keep things at this disadvantage.

I knew better than anyone what a Grand Mage could do on a battlefield. It took no thought at all to picture a wide-area attack spell unlike anything anyone in this world had ever seen.

How long could our army last against that incomprehensible power, a natural disaster with a will of its own? More than a third of our forces were an undisciplined rabble.

Yet the Grand Mage hadn't joined the fight. He had briefly hindered Jeok Cheongang and me with gravity magic and strengthened the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's body with magic, but had done nothing beyond that.

Squish.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord crossed the blood-red path. At last, he stopped.

"What exactly… are you after?"

I was genuinely curious. And uneasy.

Were the mages holding back because they were preparing a spell powerful enough to end the battle in an instant? Or were they plotting something else?

I'd blurted the question out before I could stop myself. Three jang[3688] away, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord watched us with a smile, then furrowed his brow.

"After? From the start, I've only wanted two things from this battle. Victory. And you."

"That's a long way of saying you won't answer."

"I don't know what you're talking about, but… it doesn't matter."

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord shrugged with an expression that could have been sincere or an act, then raised the sword he'd been holding loosely and continued.

"Let's finish this. Of course, I'd prefer an ending where one of you dies and the other is taken prisoner."

Jeok Cheongang and I answered in one voice.

"Go fuck yourself."

And at that moment—

PAPAT!

We charged at the Blood-Sword Demon Lord.

No. Only Jeok Cheongang shot toward him.

Hold him off for half a quarter-hour. Just half a quarter-hour.

With that Sound Transmission sent through the wind, I twisted my body and charged toward the hill.

SHWEEEE!

[3688] A jang is a traditional Korean length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Chapter 1039

It happened in the blink of an eye.

Tap—SHWEEEE!

Jin Taekyung had been hurtling straight ahead. With a slight twist of his foot, he slipped sideways, his movement flowing as though he'd been waiting for this exact moment.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord could only stare in surprise.

What the…!

He hadn't seen this coming. No one would have. With the gap between them already clear and the situation so dangerous, what Disciple would leave his injured Master behind?

But something else startled the Blood-Sword Demon Lord even more.

He's… going after the mages!

There was no doubt. Jin Taekyung veered around his flank and shot forward again, heading straight for the twenty or so white-robed figures surveying the battlefield from the foot of a high hill.

Why in the world would he—no, how could he…?

Thoughts tangled together in his mind in that fleeting instant. But now that he'd been caught off guard, there was no time to hesitate. He pushed aside every question, twisted with all his might, and thrust out a hand.

SHWAAK!

The strike tore through the air at a terrifying speed. In that instant, as time seemed to slow, the blood-red Force coiling around his blade was about to shoot toward Jin Taekyung's back.

No—in the very instant it was about to shoot forward—

FWOOSH!

That dreadful heat suddenly rushed in. In the disarray of his composure, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord remembered someone he'd momentarily forgotten.

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

That son of a bitch…!

He didn't even have time to shout. The horrified Blood-Sword Demon Lord barely managed to turn his sword and block the flames that had rushed right up to him.

KWA-BOOM! GRRRR!

The ground buckled as though an earthquake had struck. Acrid black smoke and steam billowed up, blanketing the area. Through them, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord saw a fist streaming blinding white light-flames.

CRUNCH.

He saw the man behind it, too, steadily driving back his sword despite the blood-red Force wrapped around it.

"You dare take your eyes off me?"

Beyond the trembling blade, barely holding back the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord stared at Jeok Cheongang's faint smile. His gaze sank low.

It was too late. One moment of surprise, one moment of carelessness, and Jin Taekyung had slipped away.

"You've still got plenty of energy, Senior. At your age, shouldn't you be resting in a coffin?"

"Under normal circumstances, perhaps. But one day, someone high above the clouds told me something."

FWOOSH.

The flames rose even more fiercely, belying the Internal Injury Jeok Cheongang had suffered earlier. He breathed out a scorching sigh.

"He said he'd send me a wild little brat for a Disciple—an extraordinary one—and that I should build coffins for other bastards until the boy learned to act like an adult."

"…!"

"But what use would this old man have for coffins? I can burn the whole lot of you to ashes. Wouldn't you agree?"

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord's sword was still being pushed back. It wasn't simply because Jeok Cheongang had drawn on every last bit of strength he had.

It was his aura.

The history behind the name Fire King. The weight of the years borne by an old giant who had lived for more than a century.

And…

"Even if you died and came back a hundred times, you'd never understand why I'm here."

It was the spirit only shown by those who fought with their lives on the line—not to kill someone, but to protect something precious.

"So when you die this time, don't be reborn as a human again."

Ghostly blue fire, like the flames of hell, flickered in Jeok Cheongang's eyes.

For an instant, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord felt overwhelmed. He clenched his teeth.

"This damned old monster dares to…!"

Gone was the respectful address. His voice had turned harsh.

Jeok Cheongang's smile broadened. His opponent was losing his composure.

"Much better. I'd rather bite down on a sword and die than keep hearing you call me 'Senior.'"

"Shut your mouth!"

CRUNCH!

The balance of power, which had been tipping slowly in Jeok Cheongang's favor, reversed in an instant. The fearsome power bestowed on the Blood-Sword Demon Lord by the mages—or sorcerers, as he called them—poured into his sword. A pressure as vast as Mount Taishan bore down on Jeok Cheongang.

Hup.

Jeok Cheongang caught his breath. A vein stood out on his forehead, and he felt his feet digging deep into the ground. Still, he did not retreat.

No—he couldn't.

What? Hold him off for just half a quarter-hour?

Beyond the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's shoulder, he could see the back of a certain insolent brat disappearing into the enemy ranks. The boy had thrown aside his Master, a man he revered as the heavens, like a worn-out rag.

A faint smile touched Jeok Cheongang's lips.

Treating this old man like a feeble geezer. The nerve of him.

He knew perfectly well that the Blood-Sword Demon Lord had the advantage. Jeok Cheongang had already spent a considerable amount of internal energy fighting the Black Ghosts. His opponent, far from tiring, had gained power beyond his own limits, just as the Southern Heaven Demon Empress once had.

But…

I'll show you why they call me the Fire King.

A hundred and twenty years. Every one of them had been a struggle.

He had fought enemies, every manner of inner demon, and even himself. Once, loneliness had consumed him.

Not anymore.

There was someone who trusted him more than anyone else in the world. He had something worth protecting with his life.

If you want, I'll hold out for half a year, not half a quarter-hour. I'll wait for you as long as it takes.

That was why the Fire King Jeok Cheongang would not break.

He could not.

FWOOSH—GRRRR!

His fiercely burning light-flames wavered against the immense blood-red Force. A roar like the heavens splitting apart filled the air as overwhelming power surged toward him.

It could not wipe the smile from his face.

“Come on, then.”

KWA-BOOM!

White and red energy clashed and mingled again and again, their collisions shaking everything around them.

All of it happened far behind a man cutting through the enemy lines like the point of a sharp awl.

From some point on, I could clearly feel the constant roars and the shock waves from the immense power.

Old Master.

His face came to mind.

Half a quarter-hour. Not even enough time to leisurely finish a cup of tea.

But in a fight between superhumans trading lightning-fast blows, it was plenty of time for someone to die.

That was exactly why I had to keep moving instead of turning back to check on Jeok Cheongang.

If I kill the mages, the Magic empowering the Blood-Sword Demon Lord will break.

It was one of the reasons I’d changed direction and left Jeok Cheongang behind. As long as the Magic held, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord wouldn’t go down easily. He might even keep getting stronger.

But cut off the Magic that had made him so powerful, and we could turn the tide.

Of course, as I’d expected, things weren’t going smoothly.

SHWISH-SHWISH-SHWISH!

Weapons whistled past my ears without pause. Flashes of light skimmed dangerously close to my body.

Sabers, swords, spears, and the occasional weapon of a shape I didn’t recognize. They came in all kinds, but had two things in common.

First, every one of them had been swung at me.

Second, bright light flowed over the countless blades.

Peak masters…!

Not just a few of them. There were only about a hundred enemies stationed in the rear, but every last one had reached the level of injuring others with Sword Energy.

At their center stood someone radiating an especially powerful aura.

> System Level: 170 So Gunak

A hulking man enclosed from head to toe in jet-black armor.

Naturally, I didn't know his title. Even if I'd known who he used to be, it hardly mattered. The enemy in front of me had already lost his former self.

Black Ghost.

My heart sank, and not just because another formidable obstacle had appeared.

The last Black Ghost, who hadn't shown up on the battlefield, was still here. That made me think of one possibility I hadn't wanted to believe.

WHOOOM!

A heavy rush of air snapped me back to the present. My thoughts were anything but light, but my feet felt like feathers as I shot forward.

SWISH! KWA-BOOM!

The great saber missed me and tore into the ground, sending earth flying. As ice and dirt scattered in every direction, I thrust White Flame's spearhead forward with all my strength.

SLICE!

Its flashing arc sliced across the back of his neck.

But the feel of the strike traveled up the shaft to my fingertips. It hadn't gone deep enough to kill him.

He dodged?

I hadn't let my guard down like a fool. Every second mattered, and I'd put everything into that first strike. The spear's trajectory and timing had both been exact.

What I hadn't accounted for was just how many variables Magic could introduce.

> System Level: 173 So Gunak

Three levels.

That might sound like a small difference. In the realm of superhumans, it wasn't.

WHOOOM—KWA-BOOM!

His next strike was faster and stronger than the last.

No—a strike getting faster and stronger even now.

> System Level: 175 So Gunak

SHWEEEE!

The heavy rush of air sharpened to a shriek. His massive, blunt saber came crashing down like lightning, carving through the space before him.

KWA-KWA-KWA-BOOM!

The ground sank beneath the tremendous force. As I backed away to escape its shock wave, the sound of more than ten streaks of wind rang past my ears.

SLICE! SPURT!

Blood sprang from cuts across my body. I'd twisted aside the moment I sensed the danger, but it was too late.

No. They'd been too fast.

They'd grown stronger. Stronger than they were a moment ago.

I'd seen it clearly. At the last instant, the blades had gained speed and force, shooting toward me like flashes of light.

I'd felt it, too: the Black Ghost and the hundred or so Peak masters closing in from every side—and, beyond their shoulders, a distinct pulse of energy spilling down from the hilltop.

They're trying to stop me somehow. Before I can get any closer.

I wasn't the only one who sensed danger.

The twenty white-robed figures standing in a circle—the mages—must have felt their lives were in danger, too.

But I'm different.

Everyone fears death. Me. Them.

But what makes the difference in the face of that fear is the strength of one's Will and desperation.

Inventory open.

I spoke the command in my mind and threw myself forward with all my strength.

Toward the more than a hundred Peak masters, who had grown even stronger.

Toward the last Black Ghost, whom I had to get past.

PAPAT!

One step.

Every distance vanished, and time slowed.

At the same time, dozens of streaks of light blazed destructively, coloring the world around me. And a single bolt of lightning, more enormous than all of them combined, came crashing down toward me.

SHWAAAK!

Yeah. I knew it. I was one man against many, and the difference in our strength was plain to see.

But what the eye could see wasn't everything.

I have to get through. No matter what it takes.

Those trying to get past, and those standing in their way.

Those fighting to protect something, and those who had forgotten what they were meant to protect.

They had no Will. They had forgotten desperation. They couldn’t even remember the word duty.

But I wasn’t like them.

I knew what all of those things meant. That was why I could risk my life to keep going. Why I could throw myself into the oncoming attacks and strike with everything I had, down to my soul.

Just like now.

SHWAK!

White Flame’s spearhead tore through the air.

At the same time, I whispered the command I’d held back.

Summon Fire Dragon Armor.

Ding.

KWA-BOOOOM!

Chapter 1040

KWA-BOOOOM!

A deafening explosion shook the earth.

The shock wave burst out without warning, rattling everything around it. It reached beyond a radius of several dozen jang[3689], all the way up the steep hill.

Rumble.

“May I say something?”

The old man’s voice cut through the rumbling. Beneath a silver-white veil, red lips stirred.

“No. You may not.”

There was no trace of the woman who’d been rattled by the Blood-Sword Demon Lord’s fury just fifteen minutes ago.

At his superior’s calm, almost icy reply, the old mage flinched.

“…Grand Sorceress.”

His voice was full of concern.

But the woman called the Grand Sorceress, standing at the center of the white-robed figures, paid him no mind as she spoke.

“Put your worries aside. What you’re afraid of won’t happen.”

“B-but…”

“But what?”

Ordinarily, the old mage would have fallen silent by now.

Dark Heaven’s hierarchy was mercilessly strict, and the woman before him could crush him like an ant with a flick of her hand.

But he had seen it clearly.

At the last moment, countless flashes of light had swallowed one man.

A young man who’d thrown himself toward certain death, so far beyond recklessness that it was as if he’d already given up on living.

The old mage knew his role. Swallowing hard, he forced himself to continue.

“But if this goes on, he may be in danger. As you know, if ‘he’ dies here, how are we to bear that person’s wrath?”

He was right.

Jin Taekyung, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon.

If a man who had drawn such keen interest from the absolute one met such a futile end, they too would die for failing their mission.

No—they would die. Without a doubt.

[3689] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

The old mage believed there would be no exception, not even for the woman before him: his superior, and one of the absolute one's closest confidantes.

Of course, that was only what he thought.

Danger? Die?

The woman repeated his words, then gave a quiet laugh.

Beyond the finely woven veil, her black eyes remained fixed on the hill below.

Who, exactly?

"Pardon? Why, of course…"

The old mage was about to answer when—

FWOOSH.

The hazy cloud of dust at the foot of the hill split apart.

And, as if an invisible, razor-sharp blade had passed through it, the veil parted cleanly to reveal the scene hidden within.

"…!"

"…!"

The old mage—and everyone else on the hill—stared wide-eyed.

Amid ground devastated as if a meteor had struck it stood a towering figure.

"Th-that's…"

One mage pointed before he knew what he was doing. The gesture was pointless. Everyone was already looking.

No one could miss that nine-foot frame, with arms and legs as thick as pillars. Or the familiar black armor enclosing it from head to toe.

"Black Ghost…!"

A trembling groan escaped the old mage.

His brief shock gave way to despair as his gaze fell on the bloodied man lying at the Black Ghost's feet.

The man who must not die here.

Jin Taekyung.

It's over. All of it.

The old mage's vision blurred.

He'd taken a sliver of hope from the Grand Sorceress's composure a moment ago. That only made the shock worse.

Half the hundred elite fighters they'd kept back as guards had vanished, but that meant nothing beside Jin Taekyung's death.

All twenty mages thought the same.

At least, until the Grand Sorceress's quiet voice rang out the very next moment.

"As expected…"

The mages' eyes widened at the murmur, its meaning beyond them but its note of admiration unmistakable.

Then, all at once, they saw.

Rustle. THUD.

Far below, the Black Ghost crumpled like a rotten log.

Only now, with his enormous body falling away, could they see the silver spearhead lodged between his brows.

They could see it. But they could not hear—

Ding.

The clear chime meant for only one person.

It rang in the ears of the man everyone believed dead, but who still lived: the sound of his return to life.

> System - You defeated Lv. 175 So Gunak! - Level Up!

Warm light welled up from deep within his cooling body.

It stopped the blood seeping through the gaps in his red armor, shattered by countless strikes of Sword Energy and Force. It mended torn flesh and broken bones, rekindling the flame of life once more.

Huff.

His breath was hot as fire.

As if waking from a long dream, Jin Taekyung slowly opened his eyes. He looked up at the dark sky before him once again and muttered,

"Fuck, it's good to see you."

The moment the old mage saw it, he understood.

Danger? Die?

He understood what the Grand Sorceress had meant.

Who, exactly?

The Grand Sorceress had been right.

Jin Taekyung wasn't the one who now had to risk dying.

They were.

WHIP—GRAB.

The spear lodged deep between the Black Ghost's brows flew into its owner's grasp as if drawn by an invisible force.

No sooner had it reached his hand than it shot out in a flash.

SHWAAAAK—SPLAT!

Blue-black flames swept through the surviving enemies in a savage arc like a giant dragon's tail.

“Grand Sorceress!”

“We have to stop him, whatever it takes! If this goes on, he’ll—he’ll…”

Urgent shouts rose all around her, beginning with the old mage.

But the Grand Sorceress watched the horrifying, wondrous sight in silence, an inscrutable light in her eyes.

At last.

The quiet exclamation hovered on her tongue.

Even when the mages could wait no longer for her command and stepped forward with clenched teeth, she alone stood there, smiling quietly.

From the moment I first opened my eyes in Murim, I’d faced the same reality again and again. Put simply:

High risk, high return.

It had always been that way.

An adventure with no set ending always came with enormous danger. But the greater the risk, the more certain the reward.

Just like now.

Ding. Ding. Ding. BEEP-BEEP.

Chimes and warning beeps rang out in rapid succession, tangling together in my ears.

A message confirming I’d defeated the Black Ghost, the last obstacle. A Level Up. A holographic window telling me I’d recovered as a result.

And that final warning beep…

> System - Fire Dragon Armor has suffered severe damage from powerful energy! - Fire Dragon Armor has been automatically recalled to Inventory! It cannot be resummoned until the damaged sections are repaired to a certain degree! - Time until Fire Dragon Armor is automatically repaired: 3 days

It told me the divine weapon that had made this gamble possible had taken the hit. Despite the crazy stunt I’d pulled, it had kept death at bay, if only for a little while.

I actually survived.

Maybe it was because I’d come so close to death, but it still didn’t feel real.

I’d made the gamble hoping I would survive, of course.

I just hadn’t been a hundred percent sure.

If that damned Black Ghost had taken even a little longer to die, the best I could’ve hoped for was taking him down with me.

But…

SHK!

I was alive. I'd survived.

And just as I had from the beginning, I was still here, cutting down enemies without stopping.

My body was brimming with life—the reward I'd won for risking my life.

PUK! BOOM!

I drove my spear through three enemies in a single powerful thrust, then swept out a palm strike at those rushing in from my blind spot.

KWA-AAAA!

Flesh and bone melted in the terrible heat.

Of the fifty or so enemies who'd survived my clash with the Black Ghost, fewer remained by the moment.

Faster. Faster.

I gritted my teeth and pushed harder.

I had to end this fight as quickly as I could.

My mental strength had already been pushed to its limit. I was running on empty.

If the Level Up hadn't restored my body—if I hadn't been thinking of everyone still behind me—I might have collapsed already.

They won't fall until I bring them down.

I swung White Flame as if possessed.

I'd pushed the Middle Dantian's ability to its limit, and my mind had slowed noticeably. My hands and feet, guided by instinct and movements ingrained through endless training, swept through the enemy faster than I could think.

I was relying on instinct more than reason.

Even so, there was one last thread of reason I clung to: the reason I couldn't fall, and the greatest variable my enemies had.

Magic.

Maybe that was why my instincts, keener than ever as they raced ahead of my thoughts, picked up another change. I'd been wary of Magic all along.

WHOOOOOM.

Space trembled. The air trembled.

At the same time, desperate voices rang out in the distance.

"The power of the Wind Ghost!"

"The might to uproot mountains!"

FWOOSH!

Energy boiled up from the hilltop and hurtled toward me.

An invocation, followed by its manifestation.

But I knew this kind of body-strengthening Magic could only take effect if its target was still alive.

SHWAK!

White Flame's spearhead, wreathed in blue-black fire, tore through the air.

The terrifying ring of fire swept through a dozen or so enemies within the spell's range.

SHK! PUK!

Ten heads flew into the air.

At that very instant, pain shot through my side.

I'd been ready for it. Without slowing down, I turned and drove my elbow back.

CRACK! KWA-BOOM!

The enemy's face caved in, and he went flying. I pulled the dagger lodged deep in my side free and whipped my arm out in a flash.

SWISH—PUK!

With a dull thud, another enemy's head snapped back. Only about twenty remained.

"What is this…!"

"No! Stop him!"

Listening to the shouts of the white-robed figures—or rather, the mages—now tinged with fear, I could roughly guess what was happening.

There was a limit to the Magic they could use.

That was what set them apart from the mages I knew in the modern world.

And in the next moment, that realization lent force to my feet.

CRUNCH—BOOM!

The ground buckled, then melted.

Flamefire Path.

I shot forward in a single explosive burst. No one nearby could stop me now.

No matter how strong you made a hunting dog, it couldn't stand against a wolf. Even a thousand-year-old imugi[3690] couldn't ascend to the heavens without a dragon pearl.

Not even something inhuman could stop me.

"Taishan."

WHOOOOOM.

"Fall and crush him."

A voice I remembered rang out, and immense pressure descended on me as I shot forward like a streak of flame.

But unlike last time, I was ready.

[3690] In Korean folklore, an imugi is a serpent-like being associated with becoming a dragon.

I can see it.

I could feel it, too.

The flow of qi. A single line hidden beneath that immense power.

And…

Now.

SHK!

My spearhead crossed the space without a sound.

It cut through Taishan.

Chapter 1041

Magic was an unpredictable and powerful force.

It could strengthen allies, weaken enemies, and change the course of a battle in countless ways, from wide-area attacks to defensive barriers.

That was why mages were so highly valued even in the modern world, where the insane profession known as Hunter had taken root.

But if someone asked me whether mages were the most powerful among Hunters of the same rank, I'd answer without hesitation.

No.

Under the right circumstances, they could wield more power than anyone else on the battlefield. But they needed a few things in place first.

The first was allies who could protect them while keeping approaching enemies at bay.

SHING!

I cut through it.

There was no sensation of slicing through flesh and bone, no hot blood spurting like a fountain. And yet I felt it clearly.

I'd cut straight through something intangible and odorless that people called qi. The System knew it, too.

Ding.

> System - You successfully dispelled Gravity Magic! - Qi Sense has improved slightly! - You can now control qi a little more freely!

A translucent holographic window appeared as the System notification rang in my ears.

I paid it no mind.

I drew up every bit of qi sleeping deep within my body and kept moving forward.

SHWEEEE!

The several dozen jang[3691] between us vanished fast. As I closed in, the immense energy covering the hill surged more violently.

"F-Fire Ghost, answer our call!"

"Strange rocks and crags, block our master's enemies!"

The incantations came out in a rush.

Dozens of massive fireballs filled the air. Ahead of me, the ground turned over and a wall of stone rose high.

[3691] A jang is ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

FWOOSH! GRRRR!

If anyone else had seen it—or even a seasoned master of the martial world—they would have stared in awe, calling it the work of supernatural powers.

But in all the vast world, I was the one exception.

Fire Ball. And Stone Wall, too?

The moment I recognized the newly manifested Magic, my face stiffened.

Was it because these spells were too much for even me to dispel easily?

Wrong.

Judging by their size, range, and power, even B-rank or upper C-rank mages could cast them.

The problem was that I'd just realized my earlier theory was wrong.

They weren't limited in the kinds of Magic they could use. They just hadn't used them.

Magic was valued not only for its power, but for its variety and all the ways it could change a battle.

Yet despite having both the ability and the opportunity, all they'd shown so far was body-enhancement Magic and Gravity Magic.

Why the hell?

The question filled my mind.

But the Magic reached me before I could find an answer.

KWA-AAAA!

The dozens of fireballs had been tiny when they were first launched from afar. Now, as huge as boulders weighing a thousand geun[3692], they sailed over the stone wall and fell toward me.

The heat alone would have taken anyone else's breath away.

But the heat in White Flame's spearhead as I brought it down on them was deeper and fiercer beyond comparison.

SHING—KWA-BOOOOM!

I dodged half and cut through the rest.

The fireballs exploded in midair, scattering brilliant flame in every direction. I burst through the acrid smoke and drove my fist toward the enormous stone wall blocking my way.

WHOOOM!

My fist cut through the wind—no, burned through it.

The art had none of the ever-changing forms or profound principles boasted by the other great sects. But for sheer explosive force and destructive power, it had no equal.

[3692] A Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb); a thousand geun is about 600 kg (1,320 lb).

Long ago, the third Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan had been obsessed with fist-and-foot martial arts, unlike his spear-loving master. He'd named the martial art he created:

Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

CRUNCH—KRRR!

True to its name, the wall of strange rocks and crags gave way, breaking into hundreds, then thousands of pieces.

No—it melted and burst apart at the same time.

GRRRR!

The ground shook as if an earthquake had struck.

I passed beneath the boulders raining down overhead and shot toward the hill again.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

> System - You successfully dispelled Fire Ball! - You successfully dispelled Stone Wall! - Qi Sense has improved slightly! - You can now control qi a little more freely!

"He's—he's coming!"

"Arrows of Radiance, answer our call!"

As their shouts rose almost to screams, I stared straight at the hilltop.

Twenty people in white robes.

Some were vomiting blood from the backlash of having their Magic dispelled. Others were casting another spell. Still others trembled, their faces as white as their robes.

One person stood out because none of that applied to him.

So it's you.

The Grand Mage.

A great mage who had reached the very edge of truth—and an enemy I absolutely had to defeat. He was a man.

His voluminous robes couldn't entirely hide his slender figure. Red lips showed beneath his silver-white veil.

He was another formidable foe, one whose presence had been overshadowed by the Blood-Sword Demon Lord.

He might also be the only person who could answer my question.

SHWISH-SHWISH-SHWISH!

Magic Arrow.

I swung my spearhead up toward the countless streaks of brilliant light shooting at me.

FWOOSH!

Blue-black Force surged like wildfire and swallowed the light.

No—as soon as I thought it had, everything there burned to ash, and new spells came rushing in.

POW-POW-POW! SHWEEEE!

The air and the ground below it were blanketed in lights of every color.

A spear of ice. A rain of fire. Blades of lightning and wind.

All of it came crashing down on one person.

Me.

The countless streaks of light merged and followed one another, each as powerful as a Peak Master's Sword Energy.

But that was all they were. They could never wound me.

SHING.

I cut through the ice spear with my own.

SHWISH-SHWISH! KWA-BOOOOM!

Moving as swiftly as Shifting Form and Position, I dodged the rain of fire falling all around me.

BA-BOOM!

The heat of Flame Divine Palm swallowed the lightning and blades of wind waiting for me.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

Clear chimes rang in succession, announcing that I'd dispelled the Magic.

The pinnacle of mastery.

The high, densely wooded peak I'd built by surviving the brink of death again and again—none of their spells had come close to threatening it.

Here on the hill overlooking the blood-soaked battlefield, nothing could stop me now.

Not people. Not Magic.

"Plants sleeping beneath this earth, rise up and bind our master's enemies!"

RUSTLE!

I felt it before the incantation was even complete. I knew what it was.

The pulse of energy beneath my feet. The nature of this Magic.

But there was no reason to dodge, and no need to cut it apart.

Thick roots burst from deep underground and coiled around my whole body, binding me tight. I simply stepped forward in silence. That was enough.

CRUNCH. CRUNCH.

The stems, hardened like steel by Magic, trembled.

They were wrapped tight around my limbs, my waist, even my neck. I felt their pressure, reached out, and tore them apart.

KRRRUNCH!

Ordinarily, I shouldn't have been able to reach out at all. I certainly shouldn't have been able to take a step.

But…

That's what you think.

That was only what they thought, staring at me in disbelief.

To me, this was perfectly natural.

A Reward earned through one life-threatening adventure after another.

Pure physical strength that a simple binding spell couldn't restrain.

That strength, far beyond human limits—and the several jiazi[3693] of internal energy still surging endlessly from my lower dantian—made it possible.

CRACK! BOOM!

The stems binding my body burst apart in an instant.

They kept coming, persistent as living creatures. I trampled them again and again, then ripped them out by the roots.

So they could never rise again. And so whoever had cast the spell would collapse, spitting blood.

Ding.

Another chime announced that I'd dispelled the binding spell.

"Ugh—bleeegh!"

Another white-robed figure fell to his knees, vomiting dark red blood.

He looked like the oldest of the twenty mages. He was also the nineteenth to fall.

What that meant was clear.

One person remained.

While the mages under his command kept collapsing from the backlash of their energy, the Grand Mage stood alone on the hill without the slightest sign of being shaken.

No—more precisely, it was just him and me, now almost face-to-face.

"I'd only heard about you until now… I'm glad to see you in person."

His red lips moved beneath the closely woven silver-white veil.

His voice was calm, with what sounded almost like a hint of excitement.

"Crazy bastard."

At my heartfelt insult, a breeze accompanied by a low laugh stirred his veil.

"What an ill-mannered man. Cursing someone whose face and name you don't even know."

[3693] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

He was right.

I didn’t know this man’s name or face.

I already knew that even the supernatural ability granted to me by the System couldn’t reveal any information about him.

Otherwise, he wouldn’t dare speak to me like that with less than a jang[3694] between us.

WHOOOOOM.

I couldn’t see it, but I could feel it.

The immense, deep energy blocking the space between us.

Though we occupied the same space, it separated us as if we existed in different worlds. It was an extraordinarily solid defensive barrier.

“So you’ve been sitting up on that hill, scheming away, and this is all you’ve got?”

“Ah, I knew you’d be able to feel it.”

The Grand Mage nodded happily, then added,

“And I knew you wouldn’t try anything lightly in a situation like this.”

“…!”

“Oh, did I hit a nerve?”

I silently clenched my teeth.

He was right.

I had one attempt.

If I failed to break the barrier and take his life with that one strike, the Grand Mage would escape the narrow distance I’d managed to close.

That was why I couldn’t act rashly, even with every second counting.

But the quiet voice that slipped into my ears next was enough to shake me far more than anything he’d said before.

“Still, I’m a little disappointed. This isn’t all I prepared.”

“…What?”

“Shall I show you? I was getting a little bored anyway.”

At that very moment—

GROOOOOM.

In stark contrast to his bright, laughter-filled voice, an utterly dreadful amount of energy surged up around his slender body.

[3694] A jang is ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Chapter 1042

Gooooom.

The instant Jin Taekyung felt the enormous energy surging around the Grand Mage, two words shot through his mind like bullets, wiping it blank.

The first was wide-area Magic.

And the second…

One Annihilation.

He knew it by instinct.

To stop the insane thing the man before him was about to do, he would have to make an insane choice of his own.

Only a desperate strike he'd thought he could never use again—a strike he had even less chance of surviving this time—could stop the wide-area Magic from activating.

He realized he'd already made his decision and laughed bitterly to himself.

Damn it.

He didn't want to die yet.

He wanted to live somehow, even if he had to struggle pathetically for it.

But there was no way.

No—there was only one way.

To break through the powerful barrier surrounding the Grand Mage and take his life with a single strike, he would have to burn up his own life.

Was he certain it would work?

No.

There was only a chance.

Would he survive, or die?

Death was far more likely.

But even so, that was enough.

It was the only way to protect the tens of thousands of allies still fighting on the battlefield—and the people precious to him among them.

All right.

That was enough.

A noble sacrifice or a pointless death.

He didn't know which it would be. But in this moment, these chaotic times demanded that Jin Taekyung become a hero, and he was ready.

Perhaps he had been for a very long time.

Fwoosh.

The wind stopped. The air trembled.

Time seemed to stand still. Hundreds of acupoints awakened, and he felt every muscle in his body, down to the last strand.

And then…

Qi flowed into the white spearhead.

Dark as the deep sea, flashing like lightning, burning like flame.

At last, those forces merged and swelled larger than ever before. Powerful enough to devour its wielder's life, the energy surged along the spearhead he held drawn back like a bowstring.

In that moment, it blazed with such dazzling light that it seemed to color the Grand Mage's eyes, hidden behind his finely woven veil.

This is…

The barrier couldn't fully conceal that destructive radiance. Fear seized the Grand Mage, along with awe for the young man before him and the unbelievable choice he had made.

At this rate, I'll die. Without a doubt.

He was certain. Once that terrifying strike was complete and launched, he and his barrier would vanish without a trace.

Jin Taekyung's life would scatter like ash as well.

But neither the Grand Mage nor the master he served wanted that.

We're both lucky, you and I.

A money pouch forced to bear more weight than it could hold would tear. Tie it shut before the full weight settled, though, and it would remain intact.

The difference was that narrow.

The Grand Mage's Magic was already a step ahead. Jin Taekyung's strike was a step behind.

That sliver of time—no more than an instant—changed both their fates.

Pour forth, flames of hell.

Fwoosh!

An immense energy exploded around the Grand Mage.

It began spreading far faster than Jin Taekyung had expected. He had only one choice left.

Shwoosh!

The spearhead tore through space.

At the same time, a One Annihilation larger than ever before, and therefore not even half-formed, finally met the barrier between them.

Gooooom.

A deafening roar made his ears ring, and white light washed over the hill.

Amid the faint pain coming from all over his body, the old Daoist steadied his ragged breathing.

Hoo.

His sweetish-smelling breath slowly dispersed.

Blood running from the wound on his forehead had stained his vision red. Through it, he saw two men standing tall as iron towers.

No—the instant he thought he saw them, they vanished.

Whish.

A whistle so faint it made his skin crawl reached his ears.

An alarm sounded in his mind. His thoughts raced ahead, ordering his body to dodge.

Move. Get out of their way, now.

But already badly wounded, his body could no longer move as it normally would.

Shhk!

Excruciating pain shot through him.

Two blades he hadn't quite avoided slashed his side and shoulder, and the tremendous energy within the steel tore deep into his body.

Hng…!

His vision blurred.

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord steadied himself and swept his treasured sword out. Brilliant Sword Force flared along the blade, now only half its former length.

Bang! Bang! Baaang!

Three clashes, swift as lightning. Then a figure shot through the cloud of dust like a cannonball.

"Sect Leader!"

The Zhongnan Sect Disciples fighting amid the Dark Heaven cultists cried out.

At that moment, two figures appeared from nowhere and caught the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord as he flew backward.

Grind.

Only after sliding back about ten feet did they finally stop.

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord coughed up dark blood. He moved his lips, looking toward the two men whose faces he could barely make out.

"Senior Brothers…"

"Damn it, don't say a word."

His eldest Senior Brother, the Roaring Fury Swordsman, snapped at him. Then his second Senior Brother, the Taeeul Merciless Sword, spoke with a grave expression.

"This is enough. Junior Brother, Sect Leader."

This is enough.

It was a short sentence, but the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord understood at once what it meant.

That was precisely why he couldn't believe it.

"Enough? What in the world are you…"

"We're out of time. The longer this goes on, the greater our sect's losses will be."

"Senior Brother!"

His cry rang with shock.

The Taeeul Merciless Sword pressed his lips together. Beside him, the Roaring Fury Swordsman gritted his teeth as he watched the two Black Ghosts slowly approach.

"He's right. We've already secured a way out. Give the order! Now!"

It sounded less like an appeal than a command.

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord stared blankly at his two Senior Brothers.

"Are you… serious?"

Neither answered.

Unable to meet their Junior Brother's wide eyes, they kept their fearful gazes fixed on the Black Ghosts.

They knew how far what they were proposing strayed from the righteous path.

Seeing them like that, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord finally understood that this was real.

"…You were serious. Both of you."

What was he supposed to call this feeling?

It was strange.

They had spent their lives together, studying under the same Master. Yet they seemed unfamiliar now, as though he were seeing them for the first time.

Retreat. Retreat.

The word echoed through his hollow heart, and memories came to him, beginning with the day he first joined the Zhongnan Sect.

Even in that distant past, now buried in dust, the three of them had always been together.

He had been glad of it.

They were closer to martial artists than Daoists and sometimes caused trouble with their harsh words and actions, but they were his Senior Brothers.

When he was appointed Sect Leader of the Zhongnan Sect, they had been angry that they weren't chosen. In the end, they had accepted it and followed him.

When trouble arose with the Nanman Beast Palace during the Great Faction War.

When, only a year ago, their own mistakes had led to their humiliation at the hands of Jeok Cheongang and then Jin Taekyung.

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord had stood up for them, stopping their critics and speaking in their defense.

And when both Senior Brothers recovered from their Internal Injuries at a speed that astonished everyone, no one had been happier than he was.

But…

“How did you come to this?”

He let out a quiet sigh.

He shrugged off the support of his two Senior Brothers, who stared at him with wide eyes, and gripped the hilt—all that remained of his beloved sword—so tightly it seemed ready to break.

“Do you remember? When Master gave me this sword, he said, ‘You need not strive to become a Daoist. Just live rightly. If you uphold your duty as a human being, that makes you a Daoist.’”

“…!”

“…!”

“If you want so badly to live, then go, Senior Brothers. I’ll stay. That is the only way not to disgrace the name of the Great Zhongnan Sect we inherited from our Master.”

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord knew. So did the Roaring Fury Swordsman and the Taeeul Merciless Sword.

Everyone on the battlefield knew.

If the Zhongnan Sect, one of the forces holding the battlefront together at this point, withdrew, this battle would be a certain defeat.

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord could not retreat.

Not him.

Grnk.

He bit his tongue. The sharp pain cleared his vision.

He stepped toward the two Black Ghosts approaching through billowing clouds of black smoke.

Squish.

His feet were heavy. So was his heart.

Perhaps he wanted to flee this place too.

But he didn’t stop.

He couldn’t run away.

That was the duty his Master had taught him to uphold as a human being.

Looking back, I wasn’t much of a Daoist either.

He had always envied Huashan for forging ahead and pursued only the Zhongnan Sect’s interests.

He’d grown the sect’s influence through wealth exchanged in collusion with those in power, and accepted Disciples for their talent rather than their character.

He had believed it was the right way to serve the Zhongnan Sect.

Yet through it all, he had never forgotten affection and loyalty.

Countless allies were still fighting for their lives here.

And in the most dangerous place of all, a young man faced a greater threat than anyone else.

Shame.

That was why he couldn't retreat.

"Come. No—this time, I'll come to you."

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord's voice was thick with blood.

With eyes clearer than ever, he watched the two monsters approach and poured every last bit of his energy into the remains of his beloved sword.

Tsssss!

Brilliant Sword Force blazed.

It was the last flame he could kindle as Sect Leader of the Zhongnan Sect and as a martial artist.

"For the Great Zhongnan Sect."

The words barely left his lips before he hurled himself forward with all his strength.

"No!"

"Junior Brother, Sect Leader!"

He left his Senior Brothers' cries behind and flew toward the Black Ghosts like a moth to a flame. Two streaks of light waited for him.

Whish! Sshhh!

A massive battle-ax shattered the wind. A white sword blade sliced through space.

As he charged into that wave of destructive power, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord knew with sudden calm:

This is the end.

Even with every ounce of strength he had, this strike would not kill them.

But then something happened that neither he, having accepted his death, nor anyone else on the battlefield could have foreseen.

Whoom—KWA-BOOOOM!

A blinding flash erupted in the distance, and an enormous shock wave slammed across the battlefield.

An explosion. A calamity.

He didn't know what to call it, but one thing was clear.

Grind!

The unexpected shock wave threw the two Black Ghosts off balance where they stood, while the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord's strike, already hurtling through the air, slipped between their two streaks of light.

Shhk!

The Heavenly River Thirty-Six Swords, wrought from dazzling light, cleaved through space.

Fwoosh.

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord swept past the two Black Ghosts like the wind. Then he—and everyone else on the battlefield—looked up on instinct.

At last, they saw it.

Flicker.

A sphere of flame so enormous it seemed not to belong to this world.

Hellfire dragged up from the depths of hell—Hell Fire.

Chapter 1043

For one instant, everyone on the battlefield stared at the sky, their eyes vacant.

Not a single person was an exception.

Not even the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord, who had brought down two Black Ghosts thanks to what could only be called a stroke of heaven-sent luck.

Not even his two pathetic Senior Brothers, who had somehow gone somber and were now rushing to support their Junior Brother as he staggered, utterly spent.

Not even the Disciples of the Zhongnan Sect and the Gansu Murim Alliance, still fighting their separate battles on the blood-soaked snow.

Not even a father standing like a stone monument where his son had disappeared, or the Fire Dragon Pavilion members pouring every last bit of strength into chasing after their friend and leader, who had already raced far ahead.

Not even the Dark Heaven cultists, whose eyes were empty as they continued their mindless fighting.

Every living being looked at it.

A vast sphere of fire, unlike anything they had ever seen or heard of.

Grrrrrrr-BOOM.

Would this be the sound of an ancient giant roaring?

If the brimstone fires of hell recorded in old scriptures really existed, would they look like this?

A deafening roar poured down over everyone’s heads, leaving their ears ringing.

As the sphere fell from a dizzying height like a meteor, its terrible heat scorched the sky.

“A-aah…”

Groans rose from here and there.

Everyone froze where they stood. It was all they could do.

They were seeing it with their own eyes, and still they couldn’t believe it. Something beyond comprehension.

No—a calamity.

That was why no one knew its exact name.

No one except the person who had desperately tried to stop it, but failed in the end.

Hell Fire…!

In a world that seemed frozen in time, Jin Taekyung bit back the scream rising between his lips.

Hellfire, just as its name suggested.

One of the most powerful wide-area spells a human could wield—a calamity in its own right, capable of taking thousands of lives with a single cast.

No.

He knew its power better than anyone. That was why he'd tried to stop it.

He hadn't cared if he lost his life in the process.

If he could bring someone down in exchange—if he could stop the calamity—he could have told himself it was a decent end.

But in the end, he hadn't stopped it.

Right now, all Jin Taekyung could do was feel the weakness constricting his entire body and stare blankly as the calamity unfolded.

Even now... I have to do something. Somehow.

His vision wavered, no matter how desperately he wished otherwise.

And that wasn't all.

Every bone and muscle in his body screamed in pain, as if squeezed in a giant's fist. His dantian was already empty; he couldn't find even a trace of internal energy.

The One Annihilation he'd launched before it was complete.

That had been both misfortune and good luck.

Because it was incomplete, it hadn't shattered every defensive barrier. Because of that, Jin Taekyung had survived.

But for someone who had been prepared to give up everything, this was misfortune.

Shit.

The horrible aftereffects tore deeper and deeper through his body. Jin Taekyung shuddered without meaning to.

But he couldn't give up. He didn't want to give up on everything here.

Crack.

He clenched his teeth and moved his twitching arms and legs.

Gripping the spear shaft before it could slip from his hand, he used it as a cane and hauled his unsteady body upright.

"—Get out of the way! All of you!"

"Aaah! Aaaaaah!"

He heard the screams of those who had finally realized that the calamity falling from the sky, painting it red, was real.

He heard, too, the terrible confusion and fear covering the battlefield below the hill—and, somehow out of place amid it all, a calm voice.

"Why don't you just lie down? If you push yourself any harder, you really will be in trouble."

At the Grand Mage's composed voice, blood trickled from between Jin Taekyung's clenched lips.

"Shut your damn mouth, you bitch."

"That's a little harsh. When you think about it, I'm the one who saved your life."

Pop.

He appeared beside him as if he'd teleported—or, rather, he had used Blink, which was teleportation itself—and stopped less than a jang[3695] away.

More precisely, he stopped before the invisible magic barrier still standing between them.

"Honestly, you really surprised me just now. It gave me goose bumps."

His fingers, so thin and translucent that every vein showed through, gently traced the barrier.

The powerful barrier he'd personally layered dozens of times was down to a single layer, barely holding its shape. But he showed no sign of tension.

He knew Jin Taekyung could barely get to his feet under his own power, let alone attack.

"I'm only saying this out of concern, but don't waste your effort. You know, don't you? Killing me now won't undo what's already happened."

"Yeah. I know."

Jin Taekyung answered between ragged breaths.

But unlike his voice, his eyes weren't on the Grand Mage.

He watched the hellfire cross the blackened sky, moving slowly for all its enormous size, and continued.

"I also know you—and the rest of your lot—can never kill me."

He knew that better than anyone. Without hesitation, Jin Taekyung turned and gripped White Flame in a reverse hold.

He hadn't risked his life just to kill the Grand Mage.

He'd fought to protect one ally rather than bring down one formidable enemy—to protect tens of thousands of lives.

Please. Just once. One last time.

With a desperate prayer, Jin Taekyung wrung every last thread of energy from his body.

He made his body, ready to break at any moment, into a bow and set White Flame against its string.

Crrrk.

Excruciating pain filled his vision.

His already-weakened body screamed.

[3695] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

The acupoints damaged by his earlier, excessive release of power burned even under the tiny amount of Scorching Yang Qi he could muster.

Grind.

But Jin Taekyung clenched his teeth and endured pain no ordinary person could even imagine.

He swallowed the blood pooled in his mouth along with the pieces of a molar that had cracked and finally broken apart.

Even now, the blazing sphere was drawing closer to the ground. He aimed his spearhead at it.

Only a faint shimmer of energy clung to the spearhead, like a heat haze. It could no longer be called Force.

“You really are a fool.”

The Grand Mage’s voice came with a sigh, but Jin Taekyung didn’t hear it.

He focused every sense and every ounce of strength on seizing his last chance.

Can I do this?

The question surfaced in his mind.

But Jin Taekyung already knew the answer.

No—or rather, anyone who saw this situation would give the same answer.

He couldn’t.

It was nothing but a foolish dream.

Nothing more than the desperate struggle and wish of a man who wanted to do everything he could right up to the end.

But…

If I couldn’t even dream a foolish dream like this, I never would’ve made it this far.

For one young man, life had been a long dream.

He’d been enraged by cruel reality, resigned himself to it, and even despaired for a time. But the young man had kept dreaming.

Then, one day, the dream became reality.

In that dream, he discovered an unexpected new goal and longing, great power—and an even heavier responsibility.

That was the one reason.

The reason he could never give up, even if he was a moth flying toward a blazing flame, even if he was a firefly destined to vanish in the heat of the burning sun.

Step. Scrape.

His trembling legs finally steadied and planted themselves in the ground like iron pillars.

His shoulder drew all the way back. Then, with a powerful step forward, he sent the spearhead aimed at the distant sky flying.

Go.

Whoom!

Every bit of strength one man possessed condensed, then burst forth.

Compressed air exploded with it.

Shwoooosh!

White Flame's spearhead tore through the wind. It split open space.

A streak of light crossed the sky, dyed in ominous darkness, and shot toward a sphere whose size and power dwarfed it.

It covered more than a hundred jang[3696] of distance, shrinking until it became a single point. Jin Taekyung watched it with eyes growing dim.

The spearhead hadn't reached its target yet.

But some things could be known without seeing them.

Like this.

It's no use.

An empty murmur echoed in Jin Taekyung's heart.

Failure.

He had nowhere near enough strength, speed, or internal energy to stop the Hell Fire the Grand Mage had prepared.

That was all. That was all there was to it.

Now that he'd poured out everything, Jin Taekyung had nothing left.

If anything remained, it was exhaustion weighing even more heavily on his body, and a helplessness greater than that.

And the enemy's sneer—the one who'd brought all of this upon him.

"Oh, don't be too disappointed. From where I was standing, it was a very impressive attempt."

The Grand Mage spoke with a mix of sympathy and amusement as he watched the spearhead, carrying the faintest trace of energy, finally touch the Magic he'd cast.

And at the same time, he heard it clearly.

The deafening boom that rang out all around them, as if the sky had split apart.

KWA-BOOOOM!

"…!"

"…!"

Jin Taekyung and the Grand Mage both stared wide-eyed.

Grrrrrrr-BOOM!

Hell Fire.

The horrifying hellfire, the enormous sphere of flame, was shaking.

"What is this…!"

The Grand Mage was astonished.

[3696] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

The outcome had seemed as certain as a life-and-death duel between a child and a Supreme Peak master.

Jin Taekyung was exhausted, and the force behind White Flame's spearhead had been pitifully weak.

That was why he'd simply watched without even trying to stop him.

He'd known from the start that he couldn't do it.

To the Grand Mage, it was nothing more than a foolish dream.

And yet that single spear had changed the course of a sphere of fire hundreds of times its size.

It had bent part of the blazing flames and opened a rift in them.

"How…? How could this possibly happen?"

In the midst of a reality he couldn't begin to understand, the Grand Mage suddenly turned his head.

At last, he saw Jin Taekyung struggling to hold his unsteady body upright as he watched the unbelievable sight.

He saw the faint smile on Jin Taekyung's face, and his lips, caked with dried blood, moving.

"Yeah. Nobody wants to give up."

Jin Taekyung's voice came out with difficulty, but it rang clearly in the Grand Mage's ears.

"Me, too. And them."

"…!"

Just a few words.

But the Grand Mage felt something and whipped his head around. At the same time, he found the answer to the question he'd asked himself moments earlier.

Shwoooosh—KWA-BOOM!

Dazzling streaks of light shot up from the ground and rained down on the sphere of fire covering everyone's heads.

There were others who shared that young man's dream.

Chapter 1044

The Roaring Fury Swordsman, Song Il, suddenly wondered what he was doing.

There was barely enough time to escape this hopeless battlefield. Why was he still swinging his sword with all his might?

Shwoooosh!

Streams of Force raced along his blade and tore through the air.

The dazzling streak of light, aimed neither ahead nor behind but into empty space, crossed a distance of more than twenty jang[3697] and struck the enormous ball of fire in the blink of an eye.

KWA-BOOM!

The sphere shuddered with a deafening roar.

But it faltered for only a moment. Then the calamity resumed its descent as though nothing had happened, and despair filled the Roaring Fury Swordsman's eyes.

It's no use. I can't stop it.

He knew by instinct. He'd already given it everything he had several times.

He was worthy of being called a superhuman, yet his strength was nowhere near enough to stop that enormous fireball—a thing that might as well have been wrought by supernatural powers.

What the hell is this…

He could barely breathe.

The sphere was slowly covering part of the battlefield, its heat unbearable even from this distance. And the helplessness gripping his whole body was something he'd felt only a handful of times in his life.

But at that very moment—

Pop, sh-sh-sh-shk!

The Roaring Fury Swordsman sensed someone appear beside him. At the same time, he saw dazzling streaks of light surge forward.

Fwoosh!

This is…

His eyes widened.

Dazzling light spread. Even from more than twenty jang[3698] away, the heat that had warmed his skin vanished in an instant.

Dozens of streams of Force shot forward, woven as tightly as a net. He knew them at once.

"Junior Brother!"

[3697] A jang is a traditional Korean length of about 3.03 meters (9.94 feet).

[3698] A jang is a traditional Korean length of about 3.03 meters (9.94 feet).

KWA-BOOOOM!

His reflexive shout mingled with another deafening roar. Beneath the fiery fragments raining down from the collision, a familiar figure appeared.

“We meet again so soon, Senior Brother.”

His expression and voice were so cold that anyone else might have found them chilling. The Roaring Fury Swordsman murmured, almost groaning, at the sight of his Junior Brother, known to the world by that very demeanor as the Taeeul Merciless Sword.

“How did you get here…!”

His surprise held more confusion than joy, and even a trace of worry and anger. The Taeeul Merciless Sword answered calmly.

“What, did you think this Hwangbo Eom would obey you so readily?”

“You fool! What kind of nonsense is that? What happened to Junior Brother, the Sect Leader, and the other Disciples?”

The Roaring Fury Swordsman bellowed, living up to his fiery sobriquet.

Only moments ago, he’d left Hwangbo Eom to look after the Sect Leader—who had finally collapsed from exhaustion and injuries—and the surviving Disciples of their sect.

Hwangbo Eom should have been leading them in a swift retreat. Instead, he was here.

For a moment, the Roaring Fury Swordsman forgot everything around him and shouted at the top of his lungs.

“You idiot! If you’re gone too, who in the world is going to lead our sect…!”

“They say old habits die hard. You certainly live up to your sobriquet. Come to think of it, you’ve always been like that, Senior Brother—even as a child.”

“What?”

No answer came. Ignoring his Senior Brother’s incredulous stare, Hwangbo Eom swung his sword.

His face was as impassive as ever, but the veins standing out on his skin showed how much strength he was pouring into every strike.

Shwaak! KWA-BOOOOM!

Force shot from his blade and collided with the flames.

The fireball faltered again. Fragments broke away and fell toward the ground amid a drizzle of sparks.

“As I thought, this won’t be enough. Not on my own.”

“…”

“Are you ready for the Moon-Shattering Sword Formation?”

This time, Song Il was the one who gave no answer.

He glared furiously at Hwangbo Eom, gathered all his strength, and swung his sword upward.

Shhk, shwoooosh!

Their sword strikes, as different as their temperaments, flew side by side through the air as though competing.

No. They seemed about to collide, but instead they mingled, growing more powerful together.

As if to prove they had grown from the same root.

KWA-BOOOOM!

The roar was louder, the shock wave stronger than ever before.

The fireball's course shifted, if only slightly. Taking what encouragement they could from the sight, the two martial brothers poured out Force with everything they had.

Shhk, whoooosh!

They slashed, struck upward, and thrust.

Amid the ceaseless explosions, the two old Daoists could still hear each other speak.

"Don't worry about Junior Brother, the Sect Leader, and the other Disciples. So Pyeong will do his duty well."

"So Pyeong… I see. So that's how it ended up."

It was too late to change anything now.

Only then did the Roaring Fury Swordsman realize who was leading the Zhongnan Sect's survivors. His face darkened.

The Zhongnan Sect's thousand finest.

In less than half a shichen[3699], a third of them had been killed or wounded. Among those still able to move, few Disciples were ready to bear the sect's future.

Hyuk Sopyung, the Zhongnan One Dragon.

The Zhongnan Sect's greatest prodigy, and one of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes—the finest young martial artists of the Central Plains.

He had once been so lost in wine and women that he couldn't come to his senses. But since the dispute between the Taeeul Merciless Sword and the Yongbong Escort Bureau, he had grown remarkably, both as a person and as a martial artist.

Even so, the Roaring Fury Swordsman could not set aside his concern.

"He's still too young. You should have stayed behind."

"By that reasoning, you're the problem, Senior Brother, and we could go on forever. Besides, I was even younger than him during the Great Faction War. Junior Brother, the Sect Leader, was younger still."

"That was different."

[3699] A shichen is a traditional time period of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

“I’d like to ask how, but I’ll let it go this time.”

Shwaak!

His blade tore through the air.

Spreading a net of Force with all his might, the Taeeul Merciless Sword added in a low voice, “At least back then, supernatural powers like this weren’t running rampant.”

KWA-BOOOOM!

A roar like the sky splitting open. Heat fierce enough to burn them at any moment.

At the center of it all was a fireball much larger than it had been only moments ago.

It might shudder, and pieces might break away, but the calamity kept falling, as inexorable as a mountain.

Closer now, it loomed larger still: hellfire that would devour thousands of lives.

“Can we… stop that?”

The Roaring Fury Swordsman was breathing hard. The Taeeul Merciless Sword, just as visibly exhausted, answered with a question of his own.

“What do I look like to you, Senior Brother?”

A silence passed, brief and yet seemingly endless.

But the Roaring Fury Swordsman had a good idea what his Junior Brother meant.

Right. They couldn’t stop it.

They were only human, and that was a power beyond their understanding, a force of supernatural powers.

If anyone could hold this mad calamity back even a little, it would be true superhumans—those who, in human bodies, had reached a realm comparable to monsters or gods.

“I must be going senile. I never thought I’d want to see that mad old monster, the Fire King.”

“For once, I had a similar thought. A moment ago, I saw some reckless brat flash before my eyes. It made me wonder if I’d really lost my mind.”

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

And the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung.

The two martial brothers would never forget them for as long as they lived.

Not for any good reason, of course.

“They can’t come, can they?”

“Why ask when you already know?”

The senses of Supreme Peak masters surpassed anything ordinary people could imagine. Reading the events unfolding across the battlefield, the two men already suspected that neither the old monster nor the young one from the Fire Gate Clan could come to their aid.

And at the same time, they held the contradictory wish that they didn't want help from either of them, whatever the circumstances.

Even now, they hadn't been able to let go of their grudge against the Fire Gate Clan's Master and Disciple.

And that grudge had led them to commit an irreversible wrong.

KWA! KWA! KWA-BOOOOM!

Explosions followed one another.

But the Force Song Il and Hwangbo Eom unleashed had grown noticeably weaker. The fireball was now less than ten jang[3700] away, its heat fierce enough to burn away the last of their will to fight.

Grrrrrrr.

It was hot.

A crimson-black shadow, unlike anything they'd ever seen and something they'd never experience again, covered part of the battlefield.

"Do you… regret it?"

The Taeeul Merciless Sword's quiet question slipped between parched lips.

Staring hollow-eyed at the sky, the Roaring Fury Swordsman answered.

"Yes."

Seeing his Senior Brother like that, the Junior Brother did not ask what he regretted.

Nor did Song Il ask whether Hwangbo Eom regretted it too.

They had exchanged only a few words, but everything had been said. Each was left with his own silent thoughts.

We should never have done it.

The two men had temperaments as different as their sobriquets, but they'd lived similar lives. In this moment, the same thoughts came to them.

Their peaceful childhood, spent honing their martial arts rather than learning to act with humanity and righteousness.

Their youth, steeped in blood and death, when they'd chased achievements instead of living by a martial artist's code.

The years of regained peace, when their black hair turned white and they swiftly gave themselves over to self-interest and desire.

And then—

"I hear you two went through quite an ordeal."

One day, after paying the price for their greed, they had been left with severe Internal Injuries and inner demons. Consumed by hatred, they had received a tempting offer.

[3700] A jang is a traditional Korean length of about 3.03 meters (9.94 feet).

“This is a rare elixir I managed to acquire. Its effects rival Shaolin’s Great Restoration Pill. It will be more than enough to heal your Internal Injuries.”

They had said they would not meet him, but the uninvited guest had managed to see them anyway. When the two martial brothers doubted such unbelievable generosity, he offered them something they could not refuse.

“This isn’t generosity. It’s a transaction. If you accept, you can settle an old grudge and help safeguard the Zhongnan Sect as well.”

They had hesitated. In the end, they accepted.

They’d spent their lives as the direct disciples of the Zhongnan Sect Leader, heroes of the Great Faction War and respected masters of the martial world. They couldn’t go on living with this indelible humiliation weighing on them.

They had to take revenge.

Even if they did not kill anyone, they had to inflict on the Fire Gate Clan the same humiliation they had suffered.

And the transaction would safeguard the Zhongnan Sect too.

They could not refuse such a sweet offer.

They had willingly taken the hand extended by the uninvited guest. No—by Sima Gong, the Black Night King.

Only months later did they come to regret that decision.

Now they watched the blazing flames slowly closing over their heads.

“How did you come to this?”

The Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord.

Their youngest Junior Brother had spoken those words in a hollow voice. Hearing the regret in it, they had understood what choice remained to them.

What they had to do.

“Run. There’s still time.”

“I refuse. You go, Senior Brother.”

“I refuse, too.”

Three jang[3701].

The enormous sphere of fire filled their vision. The two martial brothers stared at it, dazed.

“We never had a chance of stopping it.”

“That’s right.”

“Then why did you come?”

“For the same reason you did, Senior Brother. I felt I had to do something. Even if it was only this. And…”

Two jang[3702].

[3701] A jang is a traditional Korean length of about 3.03 meters (9.94 feet).

[3702] A jang is a traditional Korean length of about 3.03 meters (9.94 feet).

The heat and light pouring from the flames were so blinding that the Taeeul Merciless Sword closed his eyes.

Or perhaps he was too ashamed to face the world openly as he died.

"…I was ashamed. And I was sorry."

To the Master who had taught them humanity and righteousness.

To their youngest Junior Brother and the sect's Disciples, who had treated them as Senior Brothers despite how unworthy they were.

To everyone else.

And to a certain Master and Disciple who, unlike them—who'd strayed from the path long ago—still walked the righteous path.

"What a damned mess."

Whether the words slipped from the Taeeul Merciless Sword's lips or the Roaring Fury Swordsman's, the voice sounded more hollow than ever.

Fwooooooosh!

The heat and light pouring from the enormous fireball, extending across a radius of hundreds of jang[3703], were more magnificent than ever.

[3703] A jang is a traditional Korean length of about 3.03 meters (9.94 feet).

Chapter 1045

Whatever its type or purpose, two things could bring a spell's power to its limit.

First, the caster's immense mana.

Second, a Magic Formation that could gather and release that mana as efficiently as possible.

The magic wielded by the woman known as the Grand Mage had both. It could hardly have been more perfect.

Just as a masterwork sword was born after countless rounds of hammering and quenching, magic, too, could reach its greatest power when enough time and effort were devoted to it.

The Magic Formation had been completed while the hillside below turned red with blood. Once it activated, no one could stop it. And Jin Taekyung wasn't the only one who had some idea how powerful that enormous sphere of flame would be.

Fwooooooosh!

The world slowed.

Light and flame spread, slowly.

The fireball was still two jang[3704] from the ground, but the heat pouring from it was already horrifyingly intense.

It swallowed the wind and moisture around it, and the shadow of its flames spread over part of the battlefield. Fire King Jeok Cheongang watched it descend, stunned.

So this is… Magic.

The words dark arts had long since vanished from his mind.

Yes. This was Magic.

A spell wielded not by a human, but by a demon. Jeok Cheongang knew there could be no more fitting description.

He also knew that, at this moment, he was the only one left who could stop that terrible power from exploding.

Boom!

Flames burst from beneath his toes, and he shot forward like a flash of light.

But as Jeok Cheongang raced toward the fireball along the Flamefire Path, a chilling whistle sounded behind him. He ducked.

Shwoooosh! Slice!

The back of his head suddenly grew hot.

[3704] A Korean jang is a traditional length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Like a skilled butcher slicing meat, a streak of dark-red Force skimmed past Jeok Cheongang's head, slicing off a thin layer of hair and skin before cutting through the air.

"Where are you in such a hurry to go?"

His footing had wavered for the instant it took to dodge. By then, that butcher of a man had appeared in front of him at a speed surpassing Shifting Form and Position. Jeok Cheongang bit his lip.

"Blood-Sword Demon Lord, how dare you…!"

"How dare I? Even in that state, you still haven't figured it out?"

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord smiled and gave the sword in his hand a shake.

Unlike Jeok Cheongang, who was covered in blood after their fierce battle, he had suffered only a few minor wounds. Now he was certain of the difference in their strength.

Certain of his advantage.

"You can't stop anything."

Shwaaak!

His sword blurred like a heat shimmer and came at Jeok Cheongang, tearing through the wind.

Bang! Bang! KWA-BOOOOM!

Its speed and destructive power defied imagination.

Enormous surges of Force lashed out and exploded in every direction.

Jeok Cheongang barely dodged the attacks pouring down on him, forgetting even to breathe. His gaze grew still.

I can't stop anything, huh? Yes, I suppose that's true.

If all he'd had was a fiery temper, the title of Fire King might have vanished from the world long ago.

But Jeok Cheongang had survived this long in Murim's mountain of sabers and forest of swords. Even now, with his life hanging in the balance, he faced reality with a cool head.

And he could see the one way past the Blood-Sword Demon Lord, the one way to stop the terrible calamity before it reached the ground.

Dance of the Fire God and Demon.

Yes. That was his only choice.

The final dance of a fire demon prepared to die.

The beginning and end of the Fire Gate Clan. Its fiercest blaze and its final ashes.

No flame burned forever. When the dance ended, its heat would fade and his body would burn away.

The stronger the spark within him, the greater the power of the blaze. And to sustain that growing fire, he would have to feed it more of his own life.

This will be the last time.

Fire King Jeok Cheongang knew it by instinct.

The dance about to begin would be his third—and his last.

His body held more Scorching Yang Qi than ever before. This time, it would not survive.

But he had no regrets.

Even if his body turned to ash and scattered, the spark he left behind would remain.

Even if Fire King Jeok Cheongang's flames died out, the spark called Jin Taekyung, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, would burn brighter somewhere in the world.

So…

That's enough.

Jeok Cheongang murmured the words to himself and twisted his body. Slipping through the dense net of Force surrounding him, he drew up every last bit of energy he possessed.

The Scorching Yang Qi he had accumulated over countless years—several jiazi[3705] worth.

And at last, he awoke the innate qi sleeping deep inside his body, a forbidden realm for martial artists.

No—more precisely, he tried to awaken it.

At that very moment, a massive surge of ink-black Force came flying from somewhere and blocked the Blood-Sword Demon Lord.

Whooom—KWA-BOOOOM!

Power clashed with power, Force with Force.

A thunderous crash shook the surrounding air.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord emerged through the dust before it could billow up, recognized the intruder, and frowned.

"…Why are you here?"

"Go, Fire King."

The dry words slipped between firmly closed lips.

The intruder—no, Black Night King Sima Gong—kept his eyes on the Blood-Sword Demon Lord as he spoke calmly to Jeok Cheongang behind him.

"Before I change my mind."

"…!"

Jeok Cheongang's eyes widened at this unexpected appearance.

Sima Gong was the man he'd thought a traitor.

No, he'd been certain of it.

[3705] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

There was much he wanted to ask him, and much he wanted to say.

But he had almost no time. Jeok Cheongang put it all aside and sprang forward again, leaving only a brief Sound Transmission behind.

Stay alive, you filthy unorthodox bastard.

There was no answer.

Only the wind tearing across his body as he followed the Flamefire Path, and the terrifying crashes and shouts that rang through it.

"How dare a bastard like you—!"

KWA-BOOOOM!

The air shook. That was all.

Jeok Cheongang realized that Sima Gong had barely blocked the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's Force from behind him. Gritting his teeth, he pushed himself to go faster.

Moments.

That was all Sima Gong could hold out against the Blood-Sword Demon Lord as he was now.

He might die within a few dozen exchanges.

But…

That's enough.

A single finger's breadth could decide life and death, and a gap of a split second—divided and divided again—could change one's fate.

That was Murim. The world of superhumans.

Crack!

The ground sank beneath Jeok Cheongang's toes as he pushed off with all his strength. The world slowed, and pure-white flames surged up.

BANG!

No flame could move faster than light.

But in that instant, Jeok Cheongang crossed dozens of jang[3706] in a single bound. Nothing could hold him back.

If one chain bound him, it was time alone.

Damn it!

Jeok Cheongang swallowed the groan threatening to break from his lips.

His body shot forward faster than ever, hurtling toward the enormous sphere of flame.

It hung less than one jang[3707] above the ground now, its terrible blaze spreading over everyone's heads.

Just a little farther…!

[3706] A Korean jang is a traditional length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[3707] A Korean jang is a traditional length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

But no matter how desperately he wished otherwise, events followed their cruel course.

Fwooooooosh.

Hot.

Even from more than twenty jang[3708] away, he could barely breathe.

Watching the flames swell at last before they touched the ground, Jeok Cheongang suddenly thought:

If only he'd had a few more seconds.

If only he'd been a dozen jang[3709] closer.

And…

If only someone other than him or Jin Taekyung were here. Someone who could stop this calamity.

Damn it.

Jeok Cheongang clenched his teeth and drove himself forward with the last of his strength.

He knew.

It was already too late to stop the enormous explosion.

But he had to keep going.

He belonged to neither the righteous path, the unorthodox faction, nor the Demonic Path. This was the path he had chosen.

If he didn't at least try, he felt he'd never be able to look that reckless brat of a Disciple in the face again.

"Come on!"

Jeok Cheongang unleashed an azure dragon's roar that shook the air around him and threw a punch with all his might at the calamity twenty jang[3710] away.

Then, in the next instant, he saw it clearly.

He heard it, too.

Shwooooooosh!

Just as the white light-flames of the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist shot out in an explosion, a dazzling streak of light shone across the dark sky ahead of it, cutting through space.

Brilliant bolts plunged into the enormous, swelling sphere of flame.

Goooooooong.

In a world that seemed to have stopped, light and fire mingled in a distant flash that turned everyone's vision white.

[3708] A Korean jang is a traditional length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).
[3709] A Korean jang is a traditional length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).
[3710] A Korean jang is a traditional length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

The sky and the earth split apart.

The world everyone knew gave way to a new world made of light.

At least in that moment, everyone on the battlefield—not just Jin Taekyung—must have felt that way.

Could this be…?

Fwoosh.

Before Jin Taekyung could fully recall the unbelievable sight he'd seen at the last moment, he felt his vision, which had been washed in blinding light, slowly return.

The white flash that had blinded everyone faded. In its place came a tremendous roar, arriving late, and flames surging up across the battlefield.

BANG! KWA-BOOOOM!

KOOOOROOM!

Was this what it would look like if the sun rained down from the sky?

Hundreds of fireballs, great and small, fell across a radius of more than a hundred jang[3711].

They crushed frail human flesh and bone, melted the ground, and evaporated snow mixed with blood.

Like flames of death—true to the name Hell Fire.

But death did not fall equally on everyone on the battlefield.

"Ah."

The groan that escaped someone's lips did not belong to Jin Taekyung.

The Grand Mage gazed silently at the inferno below the hill.

More precisely, at the Dark Heaven cultists collapsing into charred lumps without even a chance to scream.

Why?

She felt no sorrow at the sight of her allies dying so horribly.

Only bewilderment.

Why had the fireball that should have exploded in the midst of the enemy broken apart and swept through her own forces instead?

Among the roughly thousands of casualties, why did the enemy number fewer than a hundred?

Those questions filled her mind. She had watched only Jeok Cheongang in the final moments, but someone else had seen it all—and already knew the answer.

"Took you damn long enough."

[3711] A Korean jang is a traditional length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

“What?”

The Grand Mage turned at the voice behind her and saw Jin Taekyung smiling, weakly but unmistakably.

He was looking somewhere far beyond her shoulder. Something golden glimmered faintly in his eyes.

“Damn old hag.”

“…!”

At that instant, the Grand Mage understood something and spun around in a hurry.

At the same time, she saw the answer to her question with her own eyes.

Shwoooosh!

The streak of light that had torn the fireball apart—the Force arrows.

“Bow Saint…!”

Chapter 1046

Among the tens of thousands of allies and enemies locked in a brutal fight across the vast battlefield, killing and dying, no one noticed at first.

Not the dazzling white flash that had flown in and shattered the enormous ball of fire.

Nor the Force arrows still raining down over the slopes of the Great Snow Mountain.

Shwip, shwip, shwip!

One, two, three. Then ten.

Ten streaks of light burst forth one after another, tearing through the air as one.

Though each had been loosed a fraction of a moment after the last, the dazzling streaks flew side by side across more than two hundred jang[3712] and struck the battlefield.

More precisely, they struck the great and small fireballs falling where they had no right to fall.

KWA-BOOOOM!

Overlapping explosions roared across the battlefield, and the heat from the collisions swept over the ground.

Fwoosh, sizzle!

Collars blackened. Hair melted away.

But to those who had already seen death coming in the spheres of flame hurtling toward them, such pain was nothing.

No—their shock was so great that, for a moment, they forgot the pain altogether.

“H-How…? Cough.”

The old Daoist, the Taeeul Merciless Sword, coughed up a mouthful of blood. He couldn’t finish his sentence; the corners of his eyes trembled.

At the last moment, he had given up everything and closed his eyes. He couldn’t believe he was still among the living.

Beside him, though, someone who had watched death bear down on them reacted differently.

“Heh. Heh…”

The Roaring Fury Swordsman let out a weak laugh, not even noticing that one of his arms had been burned black.

He had wanted to die like this. He deserved to die.

And yet he had survived.

Thanks to help he had never expected.

[3712] A jang is ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Two hundred jang is about 606 m (1,990 ft).

Today, he had seen that destructive, dazzling flash again—the one he'd witnessed in his distant youth, when his now-melted white hair had still been black.

Bow Saint. Is it really you?

An incredible coincidence? Or Heaven's grace?

With those words echoing in his heart, the Roaring Fury Swordsman squeezed out what strength remained and rose to his feet.

He didn't know whether this was mere good fortune or fate decreed by Heaven.

But one thing was certain.

If there was a reason they were still alive, it was to pay for the sins they had yet to atone for.

"…Primordial Heavenly Venerable."[3713]

At last, the Roaring Fury Swordsman planted both feet on the ground. For the first time in ages, he invoked the Primordial Heavenly Venerable and looked up at the sky.

Shaa.

As if answering his call, a ray of light slipped through the black clouds blanketing the sky.

Beneath that light, the Zhongnan Sect Disciples—whom he'd thought had already left—were sweeping through their enemies.

Shing! Slice!

Swords flashed, scattering blood.

Beneath fireballs raining down only on their enemies, a desperate yet powerful battle cry rang out.

"Disciples of the Zhongnan Sect! Don't you dare retreat!"

"Yaaah!"

KWA-BOOM!

Rrrrmmble!

Flames surged endlessly, and the earth heaved.

Even as they were charred black, the Dark Heaven forces advanced as if possessed, chanting words of praise for the Lord of Heaven.

Yet the Zhongnan Sect Disciples, now fewer than five hundred, did not stop for a single moment.

"Our path is here!"

Zhongnan One Dragon, Hyuk Sopyung.

His cry, ragged as if he were coughing up blood, roused everyone from their exhaustion.

[3713] The Primordial Heavenly Venerable is one of the Three Pure Ones, the highest deities in Daoism.

The sight of the Disciples fighting with death already accepted, together with the Force arrows raining down one after another, halted the Gansu Coalition Army's retreat as defeat loomed.

"Damn it! Attack!"

"Now! Push them all back!"

"Yaaah! You fucking bastards!"

Unorthodox factions, orthodox factions, dark-path figures. Even the imperial army.

They were jumbled together as chaotically as the battle itself. They still couldn't make sense of what was happening, but all of them knew it instinctively:

If they didn't seize this chance now, they'd never get another.

And at the front of the group charging at the enemy again with screams that sounded like cries of anguish was a band of fighters who hadn't retreated for even an instant—not from the beginning, not now.

"Uoooooh!"

Whoom!

The sound of the weapon cutting through the air alone sent a chill down the spine.

With a battle cry like a beast's roar, the massive two-section staff swept through the enemies blocking the way.

KRAK-KOOM!

Blood and flesh flew in every direction.

Perched on the shoulder of the giant who stood out even on this battlefield, a small, foreign old man spat out a piece of flesh that had landed in his mouth and screamed.

"Hey! To the side! Look to the side!"

But before Taishan could make sense of Namho's shout, seven enemies rushed in from the flank, swinging Sword Energy.

Shing! Slice!

Three weapons cut through the space first, cleaving their necks and chests.

Splaash!

Amid the spray of blood, Soul-Chasing Guest Song Ilseom shook the sticky blood from his willow-leaf saber and spoke.

"Is everyone all right?"

Namho had had his mouth open and swallowed a mouthful of blood. He answered, "No. My stomach's churning."

Thwack!

With a horrifying impact, Taishan felled another enemy—or rather, smashed him halfway to pieces. His voice was unusually subdued.

"Namho. Don't throw up. Not until we find the Lord."

"Look at this little shit. Is that how you talk to an old man suffering at his age?"

"Then why'd you come? Did someone threaten you with a knife?"

"…!"

Namho was at a loss for words. Ju Hwaran, cutting down enemies with movements as graceful as a dance, spoke up.

"We're all right, too. I'm just worried about the Pavilion Master."

Hyuk Mujin clutched his side, where a long gash had opened during the fight, and muttered, "I'm hurt, though…"

"Everyone's fine. So stop hesitating and let's get to the Pavilion Master."

"No, why didn't you even ask—"

"Pavilion Master. Danger. Urgent."

Hyuk Mujin immediately shut his mouth. Ma Junggeol, the leader of the Seven Masters of Baekma Bang, who had somehow ended up here with them, looked sadly from the dagger stuck in his thigh to Ju Hwaran and back.

"Do you have something to say?"

"Young Lady, well. It's just…"

"You don't."

"…Right. Let's say that."

At the sight of Ju Hwaran, whose eyes had begun to gleam, Ma Junggeol lowered his head gloomily.

They were crazy.

There was no doubt about it. These people were completely insane.

Why did I come all the way here?

He didn't know.

He'd blinked a few times, and somehow he was running with them. Before he knew it, he was fighting on the front line.

How could anyone come through a battle like this unscathed unless they were a Supreme Peak master?

He'd been slashed by a sword and stabbed with a dagger in the thick of the fighting.

But he had to keep fighting.

No—he was being told to keep fighting.

Shit…

More than ever, Ma Junggeol wished his sworn brothers were here.

Even the face of Great Sir, who did nothing but talk nonsense, floated before his eyes.

You said you'd bring him here in time. You damn bastards.

Swallowing back tears, Ma Junggeol glanced behind him for no particular reason.

The Great Snow Mountain—perhaps the last sight he'd ever see—still stood magnificent and radiant, as it always had, even after tens of thousands of unwelcome visitors had left it behind…

"Hm?"

For a moment, Ma Junggeol doubted his eyes.

It wasn't because of the streaks of light pouring down the slopes of the Great Snow Mountain and into the battlefield one after another.

He already knew from these unsettling companions that the legendary Bow Saint had appeared.

But…

What's that?

What caught Ma Junggeol's eye was a golden wave flowing down the Great Snow Mountain.

The Great Snow Mountain was always white, blanketed in snow that never melted.

In spring, summer, fall, and winter.

It had been that way for a thousand years, and it would remain so a thousand years from now.

But today, at this very moment, was an exception.

Whoooosh!

The wind howled.

Snow scattered from the ground in the wake of figures that had appeared out of nowhere in the mountain range and were racing forward like streaks of light.

They ran down the steep mountainside as if it were flat ground, moving like a single wave.

A golden wave, its dazzling radiance undimmed wherever it went.

"The Embroidered Uniform Guard…!"

As someone's cry, thick with emotion, swept across the battlefield, a thousand Embroidered Uniform Guards in golden armor raced down the mountainside like a wave, gathering speed.

All the while, one word echoed in their minds: victory.

And their commander's voice rang clearly in their ears.

"Do you see them?"

No one answered the question from Jeong Hogun, Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

Only their aura, simmering like water in a cauldron, steadily grew stronger.

“Our enemies are there. Evil men who defy the natural order and seek to plunge the world into misery.”

More than a hundred years had passed since the age of warring heroes ended and a new dynasty took its place.

The hero of the Zhu clan ascended the throne and at last became the father of all his people. His descendants, the dragon-blooded heirs, called themselves the Sons of Heaven and firmly established their authority.

From among the countless people, those with the greatest martial skill and loyalty were selected and dressed in golden robes and armor. Thus was the Embroidered Uniform Guard born.

“They have thrown the imperial court into turmoil and sought to bring down the nation ruled by His Majesty the Emperor!”

As Jeong Hogun’s voice grew stronger, a thousand pairs of eyes glinted beneath their low-set helmets.

From Zhejiang Province, where the Imperial Capital stood, all the way to Shanxi.

Then through Liaoning and Hebei—and, as though that were not enough, across half the continent to Gansu.

It had been a grueling journey.

It would be a lie to say they weren’t tired. Even the Great Nation’s finest guards of the Imperial Family did not have bodies made of steel.

But the resolve and loyalty they carried in their hearts were harder than steel and shone as brightly as gold.

Go. You are my sharpest sword and my shield. Protect the Marquis of Shangshan, benefactor of the Imperial Family, and put his enemies to the sword.

The thousand Embroidered Uniform Guards still remembered it vividly.

No—they would never forget it for as long as they lived.

The Son of Heaven they had met the day before leaving the Imperial Capital.

The smile he had worn despite his sickly complexion as he spoke of Jin Taekyung, the Marquis of Shangshan. And his final command.

Remember. His enemies are my enemies.

As the Emperor’s commanding voice echoed in their ears, Jeong Hogun cried out,

“Do you all remember the imperial command from that day?”

At their commander’s question, they answered.

In their own way.

Clang, clang, clang!

Countless weapons finally emerged into the open, glinting in the light. Beneath their helmets, their eyes shone toward the enemies drawing rapidly closer.

A thousand weapons shimmering with tangible qi.

A thousand pairs of eyes radiating suffocating fighting spirit.

And a thousand masters, each possessing both.

The enormous golden wave covered the mountainside and poured toward the battlefield.

No—it became a wave that swept away everything in its path.

Shing! KWA-BOOM!

The instant the Force arrows fired by the Bow Saint vaporized the enemy ranks—

KRAK-KOOM!

The thousand Embroidered Uniform Guards drove through the opening like awls and changed the course of the battle.

Chapter 1047

If you asked what mattered most in deciding the outcome of a battle, every single person would give the same answer.

The quality of the troops—or their numbers.

But ask a general commanding an army, and he would answer differently.

He would name the two words that flashed through the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's mind at that very moment.

Momentum.

There was no doubt about it.

The enemy's momentum—the tide of battle—had changed.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord suddenly felt the air grow hot.

Their fighting spirit, which had been fading little by little like a campfire soaked by drizzle, was flaring up again. The shouts they raised with all their strength grew louder and fiercer.

An emotion close to desperation. A resolve to face death.

Weapons swung with their final spark of life, as if their wielders had never once considered giving up.

And then—

Shwaaa!

A dazzling streak of light cut through the air ahead of them.

KWA-BOOOOM!

A flash packed with terrible destructive force swallowed dozens of Dark Heaven cultists in an instant.

The explosions of fireballs, large and small, had already opened gaps in the cultists' ranks. Now another powerful streak of light shook their once-solid formation.

All the enemy needed was a spear to slip through that opening and pierce their heart.

Something like…

A golden spear called the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

KRAK-KOOM!

Deafening shouts mingled with thunderous booms.

The two sides collided. Blades swung like lightning, lives were lost and spared, and a thick mist of blood blanketed the area.

It took only an instant for the golden wave that had swept down the steep slopes of the Great Snow Mountain and charged onto the battlefield to turn red.

Slice! Thud-thud!

A flashing blade severed a neck in one stroke. A sharp spearhead pierced a chest.

Each guard had reached at least Supreme First Rate, and some had attained the Peak realm. That was how they had earned the honor of protecting the Imperial Family. The Great Nation's most powerful fighting force cut and stabbed through everything in its path.

Their fierce shouts proclaimed why they had come to this battlefield.

"Long live His Majesty the Emperor! May His Highness the Imperial Younger Brother live a thousand years!"

"For the Marquis of Shangshan!"

"Attack!"

Shwish-shwish-shwish!

With the fanatically loyal guards at their head, more than twenty thousand surviving Coalition Army soldiers charged forward.

Some sought revenge for their comrades. Others fought for a greater cause.

Their reasons and aims differed, but they all wanted the same thing.

Victory.

And the Blood-Sword Demon Lord, who felt the scales of battle tipping rapidly in the face of this unexpected turn, wanted a glorious victory here today just as much as they did.

"You've got to be fucking kidding me…!"

A groan escaped through his clenched lips.

The battle was unfolding in a direction he had never expected.

The Bow Saint—and now the Embroidered Uniform Guard?

The Bow Saint was one of the Three Saints; nothing more needed to be said about her. The Embroidered Uniform Guard, directly under the Imperial Family, was the Great Nation's sharpest sword.

His side still held the advantage in numbers, but he could no longer be sure they were stronger overall.

And now that this powerful reinforcement had restored the momentum of the more than twenty thousand enemy soldiers, they were charging wildly. Unease began to take root in one corner of the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's mind.

No… No, that can't be.

He tried desperately to reject the word that had appeared in his mind without warning.

Defeat.

Even now, when he had become more powerful than ever, he could feel himself shrinking from the thought.

The sorcerers are still here. The Grand Sorceress is, too. If that bitch can do what she did before, we won't be outmatched.

But why?

The enormous ball of fire that had stunned even him, though he was on her side, had not appeared again.

He sensed neither another spell nor a surge of qi heralding one.

…Why?

Could something have happened to the Grand Sorceress in that brief time?

His heart lurched, and he turned to check what was happening on the hill.

Or rather, he tried to.

Someone who had been watching him calmly spoke up.

“Things aren’t going your way, are they?”

Black Night King Sima Gong.

At the words that passed between his bloodied lips, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord’s face twisted like a fiend’s.

“What?”

“I understand. Sometimes things turn out that way.”

Sima Gong continued calmly, though his voice was weary. He looked at his arm—or rather, the shoulder where the Blood-Sword Demon Lord had brutally torn it away.

“Half an hour ago, I never imagined I’d end up like this either.”

He wasn’t saying that merely because he had lost an arm.

Sima Gong was half-submerged in a pool of blood. Thick blood that belonged to him alone.

Yet the Blood-Sword Demon Lord, who had struck down the traitor in his path in moments, trembled with rage, not the joy of punishment.

“If it weren’t for you—if it weren’t for you…!”

Everything had gone badly wrong.

Under the original plan, Sima Gong was supposed to order the Gansu Coalition Army to retreat at the right moment, leaving the Blood-Sword Demon Lord an easy victory.

That had been their bargain.

If Sima Gong helped Dark Heaven win in Gansu, they would use the province as a foothold to seize the Central Plains. In return, they would recognize his ownership of Gansu and Shaanxi.

A secret bargain, struck on terms both sides found reasonable.

And part of it had already been carried out successfully.

Not here at the Great Snow Mountain, but in Dunhuang, at the western edge of Gansu Province.

“Was this your plan from the beginning? Did you use the Kongtong Sect—of all people—as a mere decoy, just to win today and convince us you were still our spy?”

Questions poured out of him in a rush.

There was no time to waste. He ought to have killed this traitor, whom he could have torn apart without feeling satisfied, and begun salvaging the situation at once.

But the Blood-Sword Demon Lord still could not believe his judgment had been wrong. He had to hear the answer.

The Black Night King Sima Gong he knew was an unorthodox man to the bone. To survive, he would join hands with the devil himself, let alone Dark Heaven. He was a pest worse than a bat.

That was why the Blood-Sword Demon Lord had chosen him for the bargain. Even so, he had held on to his last doubts right up until he set foot in Gansu.

Only after he won a resounding victory over the Kongtong Sect guarding Dunhuang, using the information Sima Gong had given him, had he finally let those doubts go.

“Answer me! Now!”

Anyone else would have reacted the same way.

The Kongtong Sect had resisted fiercely in Dunhuang and suffered terrible losses. No one, however willing to sacrifice the few for the many, would have dreamed of using a member of the Nine Sects and One Gang as bait for a temporary ruse.

At last, under the overwhelming aura radiating from the Blood-Sword Demon Lord, Sima Gong’s tightly closed lips parted.

“I’m not a madman. I’m too rational to commit the lunacy of betraying someone a second time. That’s why I joined hands with you.”

His words confirmed what the Blood-Sword Demon Lord had thought.

But the answer he wanted only left him with a bigger question.

“Then why the hell—”

“Why? Why did I do this? Well…”

Sima Gong cut him off. He blinked weakly and asked himself the same thing.

Why had he made such a foolish choice?

When everything had been going smoothly, why had he crossed a river he could never return from?

Then he found himself thinking of someone who was not here—and should not be—and smiled bitterly.

“Maybe I lost my mind for a little while.”

“What… did you say?”

“But it’s a damn good thing I did. It worked, didn’t it?”

In the end, the moments Sima Gong had spent holding back the Blood-Sword Demon Lord had not changed the course of the battle. But Fire King Jeok Cheongang, whom he had helped, would never forget them.

That was enough for Sima Gong.

Even if he died, the Black Dragon Demon Gate would have at least some measure of absolution, enough to survive.

His heir, who wasn't here, would live and make everything Sima Gong had passed down even stronger.

"I'm tired. Time to rest."

The old unorthodox sect leader spoke calmly to the Blood-Sword Demon Lord, who stood frozen with his eyes wide.

Then he added the one thing he had long wanted to say to the fanatic before him, the man who had betrayed the Heavenly Demon to serve a new master.

"Go ahead and kill me, you bat-like Demonic Cult bastard."

"…!"

Grind.

A chilling scrape came from between the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's clenched teeth.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord clenched his molars as if to crush them, then raised his sword, pouring his rage into its tip.

He aimed it at the traitor who had ruined a plan that should have succeeded—who had dared to throw filth across the path of the mighty Lord of Heaven.

Shwaaa!

But just as the blade, wrapped in dark-red Force, was about to fall like lightning—

Shing! KRAK-KOOM!

A streak of light flew in from somewhere and struck the flat of the blade dead on.

Slice!

The sword veered off at the last moment and split the ground instead, as easily as a knife cutting tofu. The Blood-Sword Demon Lord recognized the streak of light and shouted, his voice boiling with fury.

"Bow Saint…!"

As if answering his call, another Force arrow came flying through the crumbling ranks of Dark Heaven's cultists.

Shwish-shwish-shwing!

Five streaks of light illuminated the surroundings. The Blood-Sword Demon Lord gritted his teeth, and his figure blurred.

Bang! Bang! KWA-BOOOOM!

Explosions and thunderous booms followed his sword as it moved faster than sound.

Considerable force traveled through the trembling blade into his hand, but that was all.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord easily cut or deflected every Force arrow the Bow Saint fired. He bared his teeth in a grin.

“So this is all you’ve got?”

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord remembered something his moment of doubt had made him forget.

That’s right.

With the sorcerers’ help, he was stronger now than he had ever been.

Even if the Bow Saint, one of the legendary Three Saints, had appeared, she was no match for him now that he had surpassed his limits.

I don’t know why that insolent bitch, the Grand Sorceress, is still quiet…

Tzzzz.

Beyond the blazing Force, a sinister blood-red light glinted.

“Come on. I’ll take you all on.”

And in the very next moment, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord realized—

“Now that’s good to hear.”

—there was another fact he had briefly forgotten.

“Joining forces to take on one man at my age was going to be embarrassing. You’ve set my mind at ease.”

Fire King Jeok Cheongang.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord’s pupils trembled as he spotted the old monster of Mount Jiuhua. A kindly smile rested on Jeok Cheongang’s lips, utterly at odds with the terrifyingly intense flames wrapped around both his hands.

Chapter 1048

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord stared at the two figures before him, his gaze wavering.

It was a strange sensation—one even he, a fiend who had made his mark on an entire age, had experienced only a handful of times.

Beneath a sky buried in storm clouds, countless enemies and allies were locked in a desperate battle. And yet it seemed as though those two alone filled his field of vision.

That was how much weight and meaning their titles carried: Fire King and Bow Saint.

All the more so when two living legends appeared in one place.

I can't see an opening…

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord swallowed without realizing it.

Not a hundred enemies. Not a thousand. There were only two people before him.

And yet those two made him feel as if he were surrounded on all sides by an army of more than ten thousand.

No—the pressure was greater than that.

Step.

For an instant, three footsteps sounded together.

Jeok Cheongang and the Bow Saint slowly closed in from either side. The Blood-Sword Demon Lord instinctively stepped back, then belatedly realized what he'd done and flushed.

He'd been pushed back.

By their aura. By their fighting spirit.

And Fire King Jeok Cheongang was not the sort of man to politely overlook it.

"What happened? A moment ago, you said you'd take us all on. Changed your mind already?"

"…You damn old monster."

"That sounds good today. Go on, say some more."

"What?"

"Are your ears already failing you, you little brat? I said keep running your mouth."

Jeok Cheongang grinned and continued.

He was visibly wounded, but a fierce heat still burned in his voice and on his face.

"Come to think of it, every bastard who's talked to this old man like that has ended up dead. Every last one."

"…!"

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord's eyelids quivered.

It was an obvious taunt, but he could feel that Jeok Cheongang wasn't just putting on a show.

No matter how far he'd surpassed his former limits, it was hard to imagine him gaining the upper hand against both the Fire King and the Bow Saint at once.

Shwaak!

And then, at that very moment, a streak of light cut through the air. For all its dazzling brilliance, it was more than enough to deepen the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's unease.

Rrrr, KWA-BOOM!

A Force arrow came flying without warning.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord reacted at once, batting away the terrifying streak of light. As he tightened his grip on the sword hilt trembling from the impact, a graceful figure emerged through the cloud of dust.

Swish.

Her steps were so light they seemed weightless.

Her dust-covered clothes fluttered, proof of the punishing journey she'd made across half the land without a moment to catch her breath.

But the woman's face, visible above them, was flawless, and her eyes shone cold and bright as she watched her enemy beyond the dust cloud.

Three jang[3714] ahead. Three chi[3715] to the left.

So Gyo—no, the great martial artist known as the Bow Saint—shot forward and gripped her beloved weapon.

At the same time, three streaks of Force gathered along her white fingers as they flashed into motion.

Pa-pa-pat!

The dust cloud split apart. Force arrows, carrying power greater than lightning, cut through everything in their path.

Before the Blood-Sword Demon Lord could even see past them, he felt a surge of power on the other side. He swept his sword through the air with all his strength.

Whoooom!

A horizontal slash that seemed capable of cutting through even Mount Tai.

Dark-red Force swelled around the blade, then swept aside the Force arrows with speed and strength far beyond human limits.

KWA-BOOOOM!

[3714] A jang is ten ja, a traditional Korean measure of length. Three jang is about 9.09 m (29.8 ft).

[3715] A chi is a traditional Korean measure of length equal to 3.03 cm (1.19 in). Three chi is about 9.09 cm (3.57 in).

The air burst in every direction. The Force that had swallowed the streaks of light shot straight ahead.

Rrrrmmble!

It didn't merely shake the earth. The strike laid waste to everything in its path.

But the destructive trail of that blood-red flash held no sign of the enemies the Blood-Sword Demon Lord was looking for.

Only two different whistles tore in from a blind spot.

Fwoosh! Shing!

In a world that seemed to slow, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's eyes flew wide.

One attack was as fierce as could be. The other was so stealthy it raised goose bumps.

Their energies were opposites—he could tell that from the sound alone. But the Blood-Sword Demon Lord knew better than anyone what they had in common.

If I let even one strike through, it's over.

How many martial artists in this vast land could withstand the attacks coming at him now, even if the whole world were turned upside down?

The Fire King and the Bow Saint.

The Bow Saint and the Fire King.

They weren't merely relics of a distant past.

They had written their own legends then, and carried those legends into the present. In the distant future, countless storytellers would sing of their deeds and praise them.

That was how legends lasted. How giants were remembered forever.

And perhaps, here today, a new verse would be written in that legend.

Two great martial artists had felled the fiend known as the Blood-Sword Demon Lord on the open plain of the Great Snow Mountain, amid blood and snow.

But…

That will never happen.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord clenched his teeth. As the flow of time slowly returned, he pushed every ounce of strength and every sense he possessed to its limit and twisted his body.

He moved with an agility he doubted he could ever summon again in his life.

Slice!

A sudden, burning pain ran along his arm and the side of his neck.

The Bow Saint.

She had separated her beloved weapon, which had been shaped like a bow, into two curved swords. She had already passed him by.

With two flashes of those blades, swung stealthily yet swiftly as lightning, she had torn away part of his nape and the shoulder of his left arm.

But an attack that should have taken his life outright had done surprisingly little. Before the pain could fully register, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord felt an appalling heat rush at him from the side.

Fwoosh! Poom!

Hng…!

It all happened almost at once.

Jeok Cheongang's Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist swept fiercely past his flank.

That glancing blow alone melted away a fistful of flesh.

And the unbearable pain made the Blood-Sword Demon Lord suck in a breath and stop moving without realizing it.

But that was all.

At that moment, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord was cheering deep down because he had survived.

Even though the Bow Saint had taken one of his arms, and the heat from Jeok Cheongang's fist had melted part of his flank and reached his innards as well.

That's enough.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord had something to fall back on. Injuries like these were bearable.

What mattered more than anything was that he hadn't fallen to the combined attack of the Fire King and the Bow Saint—and that, unlike them, who had already missed their perfect chance, he still had one move left.

I'll kill them. I swear it!

A decisive strike always left an opening.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord suppressed the pain surging through him and brought his sword down at Jeok Cheongang, who watched him with eyes wide.

No—more precisely, he tried to.

Before he could, someone moved with a desperate resolve equal to—or perhaps greater than—his own moments earlier.

Thuk!

A fierce, unexpected pain shot through him. The Blood-Sword Demon Lord staggered, then stared in disbelief at the dark blade buried deep in his ankle—and at the face of the man holding it.

Black Night King Sima Gong.

"You son of a—"

The moment he managed to force out a groan—

"I told you. Every last one of them died."

Poom! Krrrcrack!

At Jeok Cheongang's cold voice, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's vision flipped over.

The dark sky. The ground covered in blood and snow. The countless people fighting and killing one another across it.

Everything turned blindingly white, then red.

Flame Divine Palm.

Unlike Jeok Cheongang's cold voice, the dreadful heat melted flesh and broke bones as it sank deep into his body. Trapped by the excruciating pain, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord could do nothing.

But an unexpected stroke of luck awaited him—one even he hadn't foreseen.

KWA-BOOM! KWA-BOOM! Krrrcrack!

His body shot away like a cannonball, unable to withstand the tremendous force. It rolled and crashed along the ground before finally slamming into something.

"Well."

As the Blood-Sword Demon Lord spat blood mixed with bits of his innards, a voice drifted faintly into his ear.

"You've been badly hurt, Demon Lord."

Was he hearing things?

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord blinked weakly as he wondered. Then he realized the slope beneath his battered body was a hillside, and that the voice he'd just heard sounded uncannily familiar.

"Guh, hahahaha!"

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord burst out laughing without meaning to.

Bloody phlegm bubbled in his throat, and every time his body shook with laughter, tremendous jolts of pain shot through his broken limbs. He didn't care in the least.

He laughed like a madman.

Like the happiest person in the world. Like someone who had been rescued at the very edge of death.

Trembling with joy, he stretched a bloodied hand toward his savior.

No—he gave his subordinate an order.

"Heal me. Right now."

The savior, the Grand Sorceress, gazed silently at the Blood-Sword Demon Lord. She slowly parted her lips to speak—

Shwaak!

A streak of light whistled through the air. The Blood-Sword Demon Lord's eyes flew wide.

Beyond the Grand Sorceress's shoulder, he saw a young man hauling himself up from where he had fallen. His eyes blazing, the young man brought his spearhead down.

There was not even a thread of internal energy in it. No trace of his usual strength or speed.

Jin Taekyung was squeezing out every last bit of strength he had left for a strike with all his might.

That crazy bastard…!

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord screamed soundlessly.

Clang!

An invisible barrier around the Grand Sorceress knocked away the silver-white spearhead.

It did so with astonishing ease, as if mocking the desperate hope behind the blow.

And then—

That was all.

Thud.

The spear shaft rolled from its owner's powerless hand.

In the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's eyes, still wide with shock, a figure slowly began to topple.

Thump.

The body finally crumpled.

Jin Taekyung lay in a wretched heap, glaring weakly at him. The Blood-Sword Demon Lord sucked in a breath without realizing it.

You stubborn bastard.

He'd already reached his limit, and still he'd waited for a chance to strike.

His persistence was so terrifying it inspired awe—or rather, sent a chill down the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's spine.

But…

That desperate struggle ends here.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord bared his bloodied teeth in a grin.

If he were his former self—or even just a flesh-and-blood human—those injuries would have killed him several times over.

But his body, strengthened to an extreme degree, had granted him a brief handful of moments. Those moments would change everyone's fate.

The Fire King and the Bow Saint, both rushing here with all their strength even now.

The tens of thousands of enemies and allies swinging their weapons amid the sea of corpses and blood.

And, most important of all, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's own life and death.

"It's time… to put an end to this damned battle."

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord forced out the words, his breathing noticeably more labored. The Grand Sorceress nodded calmly.

"Of course."

At that moment—

Fwoosh.

A brilliant light spread from the Grand Sorceress’s fingertips.

A healing light, warm as the midday sun and clear as a pond deep in the mountains.

Ah.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord’s eyes closed without his meaning to.

For a moment, he let himself sink into the peace the light brought.

Then, after a moment that felt both brief and eternal, he opened his eyes.

He stared, unable to believe what he saw.

“What… is this?”

His body was still horribly mangled, not healed in the slightest.

And someone else, wrapped in the fading glow, was breathing more steadily than before.

No.

Jin Taekyung.

Chapter 1049

In that instant, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord's mind went blank save for a single thought.

Am I dreaming?

It was a perfectly natural question.

How could it not be?

The woman before him, the Grand Sorceress, was his ally.

They served the same master and shared the same goal.

That was why the Blood-Sword Demon Lord could hardly believe what he was seeing.

Not until the next moment, when the Grand Sorceress—who had been silently looking down at him—parted her tightly closed lips.

"Are you still dreaming?"

"…What?"

"This isn't a dream, Demon Lord. It's very much real."

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord stared blankly at the Grand Sorceress, thinking about what her voice had just whispered into his ear.

Why was this happening?

As if to confirm that it was all real, agony throbbed through every inch of his body. He barely managed to force out the words.

"Your joke… has gone too far."

"A joke? I'm afraid I don't know what you mean."

The woman tilted her head as if she truly had no idea. The Blood-Sword Demon Lord clenched his teeth.

Rage surged from deep in his chest, and blood came welling up with it.

"Hurry. Cough. Hurry and heal me."

"You don't need to worry about that anymore."

Beneath her veil, her red lips curved softly.

The Grand Sorceress smiled at the Blood-Sword Demon Lord as he struggled for breath. Then she turned her head and added,

"The healing is already done."

She was telling the truth.

It was healing in the literal sense.

Not enough to restore someone completely, but enough to hold on to a consciousness slowly sinking into darkness.

Hoooo.

Taekyung's labored, wheezing breaths steadied. His deathly pale face and lips gradually regained their color.

As the warm radiance surrounding him faded away completely, the Grand Sorceress's slender fingers swept through the air.

Crack! Shhhhk!

The earth split open like a sealed box being forced apart.

At the same time, plant stems hidden deep beneath it surged up, coiling around the young man—Jin Taekyung—and lifting him into the air.

As if to show him to the intruders who were still rushing toward the hill at full speed.

When Jeok Cheongang and the Bow Saint saw Jin Taekyung bound like a hostage in the distance, they had no choice but to stop, though neither knew exactly what had happened.

"It's a little sad that my sincerity didn't get through, but what can you do? This is the only way."

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord stared blankly at the Grand Sorceress as she clicked her tongue softly. Only then did he finally understand.

This was no dream. No cruel prank.

"Why?"

The question held a multitude of meanings.

But the answer was brief and clear.

"Because that person wants it."

Her silver-white veil swayed.

The Grand Sorceress's eyes, faintly visible behind it, were devoid of emotion. She no longer looked at him as a subordinate would look at a superior.

Her calm voice, addressed to the Blood-Sword Demon Lord, who had gone rigid as a statue, was no different.

"You've spent your whole life running wild. It's about time you got some rest, don't you think?"

Maybe it was because his senses were slowly growing dull even now.

Or maybe it was the shock of something he'd never expected.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord listened blankly to her voice echoing in his ears. Then a word slipped out.

"Bullshit."

His voice carried unmistakable exhaustion, but beneath it lay unshakable certainty.

He couldn't possibly be abandoned like this.

Even if his master had always thought of him as nothing more than a hunting dog, he couldn't throw him into the cauldron so pointlessly.

The old saying about cooking the hound after the hare is dead?

That only happened when the hunt was over.

But what was the state of the Lord of Heaven—of Dark Heaven—now?

The Western Heaven Demon Lord and the Southern Heaven Demon Empress had fallen. Then the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord and the North Heaven Demon Lord had fallen, too.

The four beasts he'd trusted most were gone.

The Central Plains martial world, rallied under the Murim Alliance's banner, was no mere hare. And the Blood-Sword Demon Lord, who had survived alongside the Blood Lord, was more than a hunting dog.

The proof was that he had brought an army of tens of thousands all the way here under his command.

And that wasn't all.

He only had to reach out a little farther—just a little—and sweet victory would be his.

If only this damned body could recover.

With Jin Taekyung as a hostage, he could handle even the Fire King and the Bow Saint.

Dominion over Gansu lay before him—a bridgehead to victory across the realm.

And that person would abandon me now?

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord gave a hollow laugh.

Then he fixed his dark-red glare on the insolent woman trying to drive a wedge between him and his master with such absurd lies.

"Enough of your nonsense, woman. Do you think he doesn't know you betrayed him?"

There was no doubt about it.

The Grand Sorceress. That filthy traitor had ruined everything.

He was in this situation only because he hadn't recognized the tumor within his own ranks.

"Tell me, what did those deceitful bastards promise you? A grand estate? Mountains of gold and treasure? Or a peerlessly handsome man to satisfy those filthy desires of yours?"

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord spat out the words, his voice boiling over.

He had never been angrier.

Looking back, things had been suspicious from the beginning.

The Grand Sorceress had stopped him when he tried to enter the battle without hesitation. Because of that, the Black Ghosts, a core part of their fighting force, had been wiped out.

And even though she could use powerful spells the Blood-Sword Demon Lord himself hadn't known about, she had refused to help to the very end.

He'd been deceived.

Thoroughly toyed with.

The unbearable truth made him thrash about.

"You dare! Do you think a mere woman like you can kill me? Do you think you can ruin his grand plan with this little stunt?"

Crack. Thud.

From the crater left by their earlier collision, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord used every ounce of strength he had to haul himself upright.

He had lost an arm. The tendons in his leg had been severed, and his joints shattered. Even so, he still had the endurance and vitality that an ordinary person couldn't even imagine.

But consumed by fury, he had forgotten the most important fact.

He had survived injuries that should have killed him several times over because the Grand Sorceress's Magic still dwelled in his body.

"Can I kill you? Of course I can."

The Grand Sorceress watched impassively as the Blood-Sword Demon Lord crawled out of the crater toward her, then added,

"It would be very easy."

She was telling the truth.

She didn't even need to use Magic against the Blood-Sword Demon Lord in his current state.

All she had to do was dispel the body-enhancement Magic she'd placed on him.

If the Grand Sorceress decided to kill him right now, the fiend who had once made his mark on an entire age would meet a miserable death in moments.

But—

"You're right about one thing. Someone like me can't kill you."

"…What?"

Step.

Instead of answering his reflexive question, the Grand Sorceress took a light step backward.

Then, leaving him to struggle with what she meant, she spread both arms wide in an almost exaggerated gesture.

"Because there's only one person here who can kill you today."

At that very moment—

Shhhhk.

The plant stems, now thicker and stronger than iron chains, responded to their mistress's will.

Moving as if they had minds of their own, they carried the young man before her. His eyes were closed, and he appeared to be deep asleep.

Or rather, he appeared to be.

“Enough with the act. Why don’t you say something? Staying like that will only make me more wary of you.”

The next moment—

“Fuck. If you knew, you should’ve said so sooner.”

A curse burst from Jin Taekyung’s drool-slick lips. He opened his eyes a crack and fixed her with a sharp gaze.

I’d nearly lost consciousness.

No—maybe I really had, for a moment.

If someone hadn’t helped me when I least expected it, I’d probably be floundering in another long, endless nightmare by now.

Of course, even this situation felt like a dream.

…Hah.

I swallowed the laugh that threatened to escape me.

Right. This really wasn’t a dream.

The wind was still fierce, and the sky was dark.

The unceasing cries of battle were growing louder in my ears. Beneath the blades they swung, life and death crossed paths.

Aside from Jeok Cheongang and the Bow Saint, staring this way with their faces frozen, the scene below the hill was exactly as I’d last seen it.

Nothing had changed.

Nothing at all.

But things were different up here.

In this narrow space, everything had turned upside down.

Common sense. Expectations. Even friend and foe.

I’d listened to it all with my eyes closed, looking for all the world like I was dead.

Now I had no choice but to ask the woman before me—the Grand Mage—

“You… No. What exactly are you thinking?”

I still couldn’t understand.

Why had she healed me?

Why was she trying to finish off the Blood-Sword Demon Lord when she had the power to restore him to full health right now?

“Answer me. Come on.”

I glared at the Grand Mage, my eyes burning.

I wanted to break this Binding Magic right now and grab her by that pale throat. But I didn't have the strength for that.

All I could do was barely cling to my fading consciousness and move my limbs a little more freely than before.

That was all the healing power inside me was meant to do.

The Grand Mage spoke in a calm voice.

"That's a shame. If I were you, I wouldn't waste what little strength I had on questions like that."

"What?"

"Your question is wrong. This situation isn't happening because I chose it."

"…!"

The meaning of her words hit me, and my eyes widened.

"…You mean?"

"Exactly what you're thinking. A hunting dog does its job. It follows its master's orders."

The Grand Mage calmly answered, then pointed at the Blood-Sword Demon Lord and continued,

"And once its job is done, it's no longer needed."

Her words were so cold they sent a shiver down my spine.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord had tried desperately to deny it. Anyone would have. But now, faced with a truth so shocking that anyone would be forced to deny it, he stared at her as though his soul had left his body.

"Why…?"

I wanted to ask the same thing.

Why? For what reason was the Lord of Heaven abandoning the Blood-Sword Demon Lord?

How could he throw away this crucial battle, one that might decide the course of this enormous war, without a second thought?

But the Grand Mage didn't answer.

Instead, she gazed at me with an inscrutable look and slowly parted her lips.

"You can't fall here. You have to get stronger."

"What… did you say?"

"Kill him. And then…"

Her blood-red lips moved beneath the veil.

"Get stronger."

Chapter 1050

When people faced a truth far beyond anything they'd expected, their reactions tended to fall into two camps.

They either fell into confusion, unable to understand it, or froze as they began to grasp its staggering weight.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord belonged to the first.

"What does that…?"

He muttered blankly, having forgotten even his pain.

Confronted with the crushing reality that the master he'd worshiped like a god had abandoned him, the fiend heard the Grand Sorceress's words ringing in his ears again and again.

You can't fall here. You have to get stronger than you are now.

No matter how many times the Blood-Sword Demon Lord turned over the Grand Sorceress's words about Jin Taekyung in his mind, he couldn't understand them.

Used up and thrown away?

Of course he felt betrayed.

But if the strong wanted blood, the weak had to bleed.

He had walked the Demonic Path all his life. He knew that law of the world as well as anyone.

He still didn't know why he was being discarded after devoting himself to the Lord of Heaven and Dark Heaven. But now that things had come this far, he had no choice but to accept it.

That was one thing. This was another.

Why? How? For what reason?

Why would the master he served pay such a high price to put the execution of his loyal hunting dog in an enemy's hands?

And not just any enemy. A brat who wasn't even thirty—the person who had thwarted Dark Heaven more often than anyone else in the world.

And…

Kill me, and get stronger?

What did his death, this one-sided execution, have to do with Jin Taekyung growing stronger?

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord couldn't begin to guess what the Grand Sorceress's final words meant. That was only natural.

There were limits to what he could imagine.

But at least one other person here knew the truth he couldn't.

"…You."

The young man’s lips had gone white, and the muscles of his face had stiffened.

He stared at the woman before him with vacant eyes, forgetting even to breathe. At last, he managed to force out the words.

“What are you even… saying?”

It wasn’t a question. It was a denial.

He didn’t want to believe this impossible reality, so he struggled to deny it.

The Grand Sorceress looked at the young man—Jin Taekyung—and her eyes curved into crescents.

“You already know, don’t you?”

“…!”

“Do I have to tell you what I mean, right here?”

The words turned his dreadful suspicion into certainty. Jin Taekyung felt his mind go blank.

Only one phrase remained.

Level Up.

Was this what it felt like when all the blood in your body turned cold?

For a moment, it seemed as though the whole world had stopped.

No—maybe I really had mistaken it for that.

Maybe I really would have believed it had, if not for my head burning like someone was pressing a hot iron to it while the rest of me stood frozen.

This… can’t be real.

I floundered in confusion.

Questions kept surfacing and vanishing. Reason and emotion lost their bearings and crashed into each other.

The shock was as great as—maybe greater than—what I’d felt when I realized this strange world called Murim wasn’t a game, but another reality.

Yet this was real.

I fought to suppress my shock and forced out a question.

“How? How is this possible?”

My voice came out hoarse and cracked, so unfamiliar it might have belonged to someone else.

The woman’s reply, by contrast, was calm.

“Who knows? Someone as insignificant as I am can’t know everything. But…”

The Grand Sorceress—or the Grand Mage.

She had gained power that didn't belong to this world. Now she stared straight at me, her eyes and voice so full of unwavering faith it could only be called fanaticism. The sight and sound made my senses reel.

"The Lord of Heaven is great. I am merely a servant who conveys His will and His words."

"The Lord of Heaven. The Lord of Heaven…"

I repeated that damned name like a man under a spell.

Ever since the day I'd taken my first steps in Murim, I'd heard it from countless people. And yet I'd never once encountered its true form.

The leader of Dark Heaven—or rather, their king and god. The absolute being who sought to defy heaven.

Him.

Only him.

He knew one of my most closely guarded secrets as plainly as if he were looking at the palm of his hand.

But that didn't answer my question.

Because I—Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan—had become someone else overnight.

"Were you watching me? From the beginning?"

"Watching you?"

Beneath her white veil, her red lips curved gently.

"Let's be honest. Just a few years ago, you weren't someone we needed to concern ourselves with. Everyone knows that."

"Then…"

"It's simple. We were looking down upon the world, and you shone on your own within it. Bright enough to see clearly, even from far away."

"…!"

"It was fascinating to watch the wastrel of a declining frontier martial family become a Hidden Dragon, then gain the Fire King as his dragon pearl and grow into a Divine Dragon. And to see how fast you grew."

An imugi that had cultivated itself for hundreds of years could become a dragon if it obtained a dragon pearl. But Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan had been, at best, an earthworm in muddy water.

Yet the System had given me boundless opportunities to grow. People had supplied explanation after explanation without my having to make a single excuse.

Heaven-given martial talent.

The Heavenly Martial Physique, a body as perfect as could be.

And the teachings of the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, a great martial artist.

That, they said, was how I'd reached my current strength.

So no one suspected a thing.

No—they couldn't have.

Even in this world, for all its primitive savagery, there were limits to what people considered possible.

But the Grand Mage was telling me now that someone outside their reach—at least, the Lord of Heaven—had been the exception.

And she had revealed something else I hadn't expected.

"We kept watching at His command. At last, we learned who the Chosen One was."

My eyes twitched before I could stop them.

"What… did you just say?"

"Why? Don't you like the name? I thought it was rather good."

I didn't answer.

I pressed my lips together and repeated what I'd heard in my head.

The Chosen One?

There was only one reason I'd asked her to repeat herself.

This wasn't the first time someone had called me that.

The first to call me the Chosen One was, even now, far off in the distance with her bowstring taut, aimed in this direction.

The Bow Saint.

A hero of the Great Faction War, who had protected the Nine Provinces from a hundred thousand members of the Demonic Cult.

A great martial artist who had always shone brilliantly, wherever she went, and was therefore called one of the Three Saints.

And the reason the Bow Saint had spent decades wandering the land, concealing her identity, was a letter left behind by one person.

…The Martial God.

Ten Kings. Three Saints.

Above them all stood the heaven that looked down upon everything—the universe, or perhaps Murim itself.

The greatest hero and martial artist of all time, with no equal before or since.

The Martial God had left the Bow Saint a letter.

He'd told her to find someone who might appear at any time, in any place.

The Chosen One—that is…

Me.

That made it even harder to understand.

I could accept that the Martial God had foreseen my arrival and left the Bow Saint a letter.

But why? How?

“Why are you—why is the Lord of Heaven—keeping me alive?”

I had stood in Dark Heaven’s way more than anyone else.

I’d been directly involved in the deaths of four Demon Lords and the Demon Empress, his closest subordinates and limbs. I’d caused him countless other losses, too.

From the Lord of Heaven’s perspective, I was someone he could kill a hundred times and still not be satisfied.

Yet the Grand Mage had said it plainly.

Her master didn’t want me to die here.

He wanted me to survive and grow stronger. Stronger than I was now.

I had to hear the answer.

If the Lord of Heaven wanted me alive, then my very existence would someday become a threat to everyone.

“Answer me. Now.”

The shock and trembling had passed.

All that remained was the reality before me and the cold resolve to face it.

I stared at the Grand Mage with icy eyes. Through her tightly woven white veil, I could make out the gleam of eyes burning with loyalty to their master.

At last, her red lips parted.

“No one in the world would dare presume to know His deeper purpose. But one thing is certain.”

She breathed out slowly.

The corner of her mouth lifted in unmistakable scorn.

“Even if you heard the whole truth, could someone like you resist?”

“…!”

“Let’s be honest with each other.”

As casually as she might throw off a cumbersome robe, the Grand Mage dropped her manners. Smiling, she went on.

“Do you think rain falls because people pray for it? No. The clouds gather, and it rains when the heavens will it. That’s the way of this world. Its natural order.”

Crack.

Her eyes flashed behind the veil. A thick vine crept up my body and tightened around my neck.

Slowly. And powerfully.

“If you want to die, I can kill you. But you have to survive, according to His will. You want to live, too. Don’t you?”

I couldn’t breathe.

My whole body was already bound. As the vine gradually squeezed my throat, I forced out the words.

“Then… kill me.”

“What?”

“Go on. Kill me.”

“…!”

The Grand Mage’s gaze wavered.

She’d heard the sincerity in my breathless voice and seen it in my eyes, which were steady despite my labored breathing.

“You…”

Her words trailed off, and the pressure on my neck eased. I looked at her and gave a short laugh.

“What? Can’t do it, you crazy bitch?”

Crack!

The vine tightened again, as hard as before.

Even so, I laughed aloud between gasps.

Yeah, right now I was unquestionably the weaker one.

But in this tug-of-war with our lives on the line, I was going to win.

If the Grand Mage was a crazy bitch, then I was a different kind of crazy bastard.

Now that it’s come to this, I can do it.

I smiled brightly at the Grand Mage, whose eyes had gone wide.

Then, with all the strength I had, I severed the heart meridians throughout my body.

Using the faint healing power she herself had given me.

Crunch!

Chapter 1051

"You…"

The moment the Grand Sorceress saw a smile spread across Jin Taekyung's face, which had been turning deathly pale, she instinctively realized how foolish a mistake she'd made.

Shit.

It was an irreparable blunder.

She had loosened the binding spell without thinking because his Kill me if you can had been so unmistakably sincere.

And Jin Taekyung had immediately seen her true intentions in that split-second mistake.

"What? Can't do it, you crazy bitch?"

"…!"

The Grand Sorceress bit her lip. He'd hit the mark.

A hunting dog could only tear out its target's throat when its master gave permission. She didn't yet have that authority, and her earlier bluster about the natural order had been exposed.

Of course, even so—

Nothing changes. Nothing at all.

The Grand Sorceress thought to herself, then poured her strength back into the Magic that had briefly faltered.

Crack!

The thick, sturdy vines squeezed Jin Taekyung's neck even tighter, as if they'd never loosened at all.

The gulf in strength between them, so stark in that moment, could not be bridged. Unlike him, with barely a trace of internal energy left, a tremendous force still lay coiled deep within the Grand Sorceress's body.

And that wasn't all.

With Jin Taekyung held hostage, even the Fire King and the Bow Saint couldn't risk a reckless move.

All she had to do now was make the young brat submit.

The Grand Sorceress was certain of it—until she saw the smile on his face, brighter than ever.

…He's smiling?

She couldn't understand what it meant. Or rather, she knew instinctively, but her mind refused to accept it.

There was only one thing Jin Taekyung could still do in his helpless state. And surely there wasn't a lunatic anywhere in the world who would choose suicide.

But—

Crunch!

There was.

That lunatic was right here, before her eyes.

Splatter! Splash!

In that instant, the Grand Sorceress's eyes opened wide without her meaning to.

Everything was red.

Through the blood sliding down her white veil, she saw Jin Taekyung trembling all over and coughing up blood.

"Th-This…"

A stunned gasp escaped her lips.

There was no doubt. He'd severed his own heart meridian.

Even a massive old tree, one that wouldn't easily fall to a lumberjack's axe, couldn't withstand a colony of ants boring through its bark and into its core.

For a Murim martial artist, severing the heart meridian meant death. Agonizing, but swift.

Why would he go this far?

Frozen for an instant, the Grand Sorceress stared at Jin Taekyung in utter shock.

She'd told him only half the truth. It was nowhere near enough to make him certain of anything—just enough to give him a vague suspicion.

Yet how many people under heaven would throw away their lives without hesitation because they suspected their mere existence threatened someone?

None. Surely none.

The strongest desire humans had was the desire to live. Even someone who made such a choice would need time to doubt, to steel themselves, before carrying it out.

But Jin Taekyung had done it without the slightest hesitation or fear.

Even smiling brightly as he did.

His eyes were already dimming, yet there was no wavering in them. He was certain he'd chosen the right path.

And as she looked at him, the Grand Sorceress finally understood her gravest mistake.

The Chosen One.

Letting him read her intentions earlier was nothing compared to this. She should have understood what those five characters meant. She should have guessed why her great master had searched so long for the young man before her, why he'd ordered his loyal servants to watch his every move.

Jin Taekyung was that kind of person.

He could curse and still know humanity and justice. He could spit and still pursue the chivalrous path. He might walk along the edge of the road, but he would never stray from the right one.

A chivalrous hero who led the way before everyone—and a lunatic beyond anyone's imagination.

That was why he was the Chosen One.

Crack!

The Grand Sorceress clenched her teeth.

There was no more time to hesitate, no choice left to make.

Her master had already waited far too long. If Jin Taekyung died here today, he would have to wait again, with no end in sight.

I have to save him. Whatever it takes!

As time seemed to slow, the Grand Sorceress reached out, more desperate and frantic than ever.

Swooooooosh!

Immense power surged around her slender frame.

Driven not by the will to kill, but by the will to keep him alive, the energy surrounding her heart pulsed fiercely. The energy dormant in the air answered it, then burst into light and swallowed everything around them.

Flash! Fwoom!

The swelling radiance swept over the hill.

No—it spread until it covered the entire hill.

Its dazzling brilliance bleached the eyes of the Bow Saint and Jeok Cheongang as they raced toward them, having realized something had happened to Jin Taekyung, who was being held hostage. It forced the eyes shut of the fiend, still writhing like an insect as he clung to life.

Even the Grand Sorceress herself, who had summoned that radiance.

What happened?

Her vision lost in the glare, she bit her lip.

When a pile of rocks collapses, it kicks up dust. But when a great mountain crumbles, it causes an earthquake.

A Supreme Peak master who had severed his own heart meridian had suffered an injury not even a Great Firmament Immortal could heal.

She'd unleashed the greatest healing power she could, but there was nothing she could guarantee. And the radiance that had erupted more fiercely than ever showed no sign of fading.

No—at that moment, it seemed to flash even brighter.

Like a blade shining all the more beneath the sun.

"…!"

Just as the Grand Sorceress's eyes widened when she realized something—

Shwaaak!

A chillingly low, razor-sharp whistle tore through the air. A silver-white spearhead, more than worthy of the name White Flame, ripped through space.

From beyond the dazzling light came someone's quiet voice.

"Got you."

Thud!

My stomach's churning.

My head's spinning, and my vision is blurry.

Maybe that's why I still can't tell whether this is a dream or reality.

If it's neither...

Hell? No, heaven?

Everything around me is so white I can barely open my eyes. Unless some enterprising Yama[3716] has installed ridiculously powerful LED bulbs throughout hell to improve conditions for its prisoners, this has to be heaven.

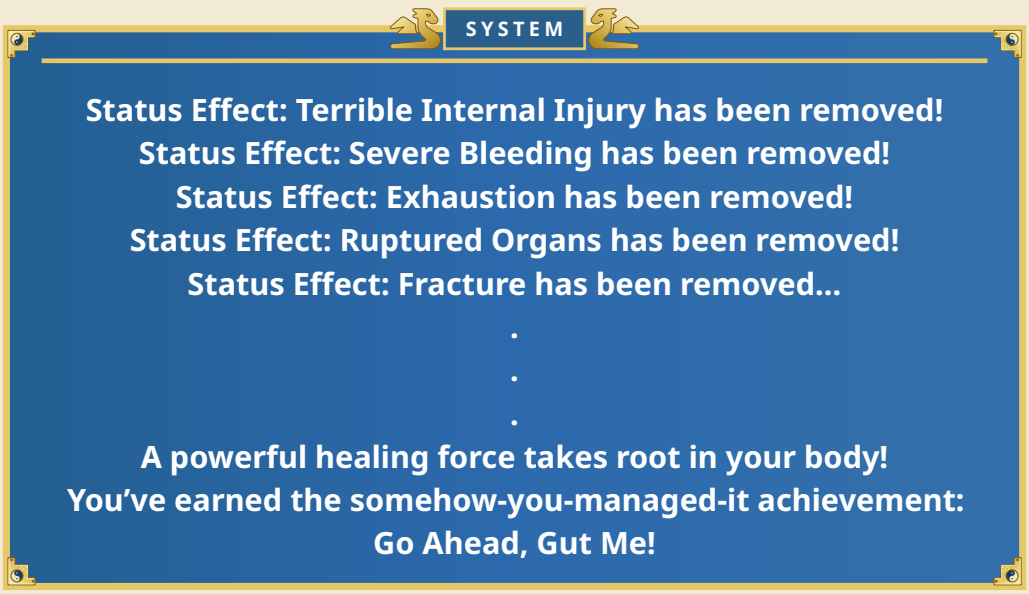
But—

Ding. Ding. Diiiing!

Clear chimes ring in my ears like an echo returning from far away. They tell me enough.

This is reality. I'm alive.

I've won again at this insane gambling table, where I put up the money I got for selling my life.



[3716] Yama is the Buddhist ruler and judge of the underworld.

Translucent holographic windows appear one after another in midair.

Along with them, my blurry vision cleared as if it had never been blurred. My breathing steadied, and my senses sharpened, letting me feel and take in everything within ten or so jang[3717].

Light. Air. Wind. Even formless things, like the thick stench of blood.

And the living beings breathing amid it all, with the same vitality as me.

Now it was time to collect my winnings from the other side of the bet.

Come.

I whisper the command inwardly and put my will behind it.

I send it toward a cold blade with no life of its own, though it has extinguished countless lives. Toward my beloved weapon, lying alone on the ground far from my hand.

Shwaaak!

It all happens almost at once, and I murmur,

“Got you.”

At that moment—

Thud!

With the sound of bone and flesh bursting, the thick vines binding my entire body loosen.

Now.

I don’t even need to draw on my internal energy. I pour into my limbs a strength beyond anything the word superhuman can describe, and let it loose.

Crack!

The vines split, then burst apart. They snap into pieces under that monstrous force, and I’m free.

I reach out toward White Flame as it shoots toward me like a streak of light.

Tap.

That cool touch is more familiar than anything.

But the blood spattered across the silver-white spearhead is still warm, and the scream that erupts nearby is agonized.

“Aaaah!”

On a battlefield where I can’t see, what could give me a better bearing than a scream?

Following the sharp cry through the lingering radiance, I take one long step.

Bang!

Compressed air explodes beneath my driving foot. The layers of light before me break apart, and the three jang[3718] between us vanish in an instant.

[3717] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to ten cheok, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[3718] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to ten cheok, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

And then…

Shaaak!

At the end of the spear's downward-slashing arc, there was someone who owed me my stake. I could feel exactly where she was, even without seeing her.

Right then—

Swish. Slice!

Dark red blood sprays with a cold cutting sound.

But there's already no one in the spot where she screamed a moment ago.

Fast.

No. Fast doesn't begin to describe it.

Any Murim martial artist who saw that movement would call it Shifting Form and Position, a technique only a Supreme Peak master could use.

But no matter what anyone else in this world thought, I was the one exception.

Blink…!

A Magic spell that made you disappear in an instant, like the literal blink of an eye—a short-range teleport.

In a Grand Mage's hands, it works even faster than Shifting Form and Position. It's an incredible way to evade an attack—but that's all it is.

Three steps from my left. Five jang.[3719]

I know Blink's limits better than anyone under heaven.

Crack.

And I'm a superhuman with the strength and senses to catch up with it, despite its limited range.

Boom!

One step.

I cross that distance in an instant and smile brightly at the Grand Mage, frozen with her eyes wide.

"See you again?"

Shing!

[3719] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to ten cheok, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Chapter 1052

“See you again?”

At the sound of his low voice, Jin Taekyung was suddenly right in front of her. The Grand Sorceress felt the blood in her body turn cold.

How?

Calling him fast didn’t begin to explain it. His speed was beyond anything she’d expected.

And as though he’d known exactly where she would be, the silver spearhead came slashing down toward her body.

Whoosh!

The air split. No—it shattered.

Space warped around the Force coiling along the spearhead. Faced with that terrifying sight, the Grand Sorceress felt a fear greater than any she had known and cried out in her mind.

Mighty power of protection!

Vwoom.

In the slowed world, the energy gathered around her heart began to boil.

Layer upon layer of translucent shields rose around her, blocking the spearhead.

Boom! Crash!

The ground shook as if an earthquake had struck.

But all the Grand Sorceress’s attention was fixed on the sight before her.

The spearhead smashed through most of the dozens of layered shields before finally stopping—just barely.

I blocked it.

A shiver ran up her spine. Only then did she release the breath she’d been holding.

Before relief could settle in, she saw Jin Taekyung smiling faintly, though the attack he’d staked everything on had failed. Suddenly, she realized what she’d forgotten.

Some very important—and very dangerous—people.

But on a battlefield, realizations always came a moment too late.

Whoosh!

A vast streak of light hurtled across the space between them.

Beyond the dazzling glare filling her vision, she made out two figures. The Grand Sorceress screamed without a sound.

The Bow Saint…!

Boom!

An enormous blast rang out, and the swelling light swallowed the entire hill.

At the last moment, it all happened almost at once.

I'd backed away, anticipating the shock of the tremendous collision.

Far away, the Force arrow had left the bowstring and come hurtling toward us. At last, it struck the shield.

And then—

Fwoom!

The distant flash of light swelled, blocking everyone's view and swallowing the Grand Sorceress's figure, which had been hidden behind the crumbling shield.

Rumble…!

The earth shook. Light burst forth in an instant, tearing through the darkness and devouring everything.

A wave of power beyond words.

Hngh…!

I sucked in a breath and curled up as tightly as I could. A gale whipped past me like a blade, slashing through the air.

The moment lasted only an instant, but it felt like an eternity. When it passed, I could finally hear again.

A familiar voice reached my muffled ears.

"Are you all right?"

I let out the breath I'd been holding and raised my head.

Beyond the fading light, I saw a white robe torn to shreds, blood scattered everywhere, and limbs severed from a body.

They were slender and white—the limbs clearly belonged to a woman.

"It's over. All of it."

"…Ah."

The Grand Mage was dead.

The moment that sank in, all the strength drained from my body.

My mental strength had been at its limit for a long time. Exhaustion washed over me, and my vision blurred.

Grab.

A strong hand caught me as I swayed.

Jeok Cheongang hauled me upright, and a laugh escaped me.

"Sorry, Old Master."

"For what?"

"Seven and a half minutes. That ran out ages ago."

Jeok Cheongang laughed with me.

“Still a hundred years too soon. Can’t you tell, seeing that damned bastard run all the way over here?”

He was covered in blood, whatever he said. With a perfectly straight face, he pointed to an old fiend who had survived like a cockroach.

Of course, there was another reason the Blood-Sword Demon Lord had survived the blast.

“You went a long way while I was gone. Recklessly far, too.”

So Gyo—or rather, the Bow Saint—looked at me with her usual calm gaze and spoke.

She must have crossed half the land without a moment’s rest, yet her aura was still as sharp as a blade.

I knew better than anyone why the Bow Saint, despite the crushing fatigue she must have felt, was keeping up this front. I also knew why she had gone out of her way to protect the Blood-Sword Demon Lord.

“But the rest will have to wait. There’s still a problem to deal with.”

She was right. The Grand Mage was dead, but the bloody battle below the hill continued.

And that wasn’t the only problem she meant.

“So this is how it’s come to pass.”

Cold killing intent edged her words. At her feet, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord lay breathing hard. He struggled to speak.

“Fine. Anything… I’ll tell you anything.”

Anything, huh?

I turned the word over in my mind as I staggered toward him and raised White Flame.

Shing.

I aimed the spearhead at him instead of answering.

Faced with its icy gleam, the Blood-Sword Demon Lord’s voice grew louder. He was still trying to sound calm.

“There was a traitor among you!”

The fiend who had radiated such terrifying power was nowhere to be seen.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord sprawled before me now was little more than a beggar, ruined at the end of a lifetime steeped in brutality.

Abandoned by his master. Betrayed by his allies. Now begging for his life by selling information to the very enemy he’d tried to kill.

“Are you afraid?”

“…What?”

“Can things like you feel fear?”

I looked down at his wide, bloodshot eyes and spoke softly.

“There’s no deal.”

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord was already a discarded dog.

Perhaps his fate had been sealed long ago: to be discarded once he’d outlived his usefulness.

I didn’t know the exact reason, but this was the outcome the Lord of Heaven had intended. No master would lavish care on a hunting dog he planned to cast aside without mercy.

So I had no reason to listen to the dog. Least of all when he wanted to talk about the traitors whose identities had begun to come to light today.

“Black Night King Sima Gong. The Roaring Fury Swordsman Song Il. And the Taeeul Merciless Sword, Hwangbo Eom.”

“…!”

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord said nothing, but his eyes shook violently.

That was enough to turn a near-certainty into certainty.

“You already… knew?”

He barely managed to force the words out.

I nodded at his dazed face.

“To a certain extent.”

“B-But then why?”

“If you’re asking why… I don’t know.”

I raised the spearhead, exhaustion bearing down on me.

And I thought about why I’d made it this far, despite suspecting there were traitors among us. Why I’d fought for my life in this impossible situation and refused to give up.

Maybe it was because…

“I wanted to believe a little longer.”

“…!”

“You can’t win without believing in them. That’s why I came all this way like a fucking idiot.”

Yeah.

That was what made victory possible.

The difference between Dark Heaven and us.

Between the Lord of Heaven and me.

I’d already seen what came of that slender thread of faith and hope. More precisely, of the faith that began with one person.

Sama Pyo.

Quiet and gloomy, but he’d never once betrayed my trust.

A comrade who had never been the first to step back, no matter how desperate things got. We'd fought back to back and laughed together, covered in each other's blood.

No. A friend.

If it weren't for him, I wouldn't have been able to place even this little faith in them.

Not long ago, Jeok Cheongang had asked what I would do if Sama Pyo and Taishan turned out to have betrayed us.

I hadn't answered.

Even as I walked down the Great Snow Mountain with Sama Pyo, I'd asked myself the same question. But I couldn't bring myself to answer it.

I wouldn't be able to kill them.

All I could do was believe. More desperately than anyone.

And I wasn't the only one who'd put faith in the traitors.

A Junior Brother in his two Senior Brothers.[3720] A son in his father.

In the end, their faith was rewarded.

It moved the traitors' hearts and finally turned the tide of battle.

I'd seen it myself.

The Taeeul Merciless Sword and the Roaring Fury Swordsman throwing themselves toward the Hell Fire. Sima Gong facing the Blood-Sword Demon Lord in Jeok Cheongang's place.

Of course, they wouldn't be forgiven for their crimes.

At least, I had no right to forgive them. Neither did Jeok Cheongang or the Bow Saint.

But I would remember that, when it mattered most, the traitors had upheld at least the smallest measure of honor.

Unlike the discarded hunting dog, who would soon be forgotten by its master.

"That's why we're different. You and us."

My voice was quiet, but clear. The Blood-Sword Demon Lord stared at me, the tiny blood vessels in his eyes burst.

"Jin Taekyung!"

His cry came out as though he were coughing up blood.

Thuk.

The spearhead sank into his chest as smoothly as a blade through tofu, swallowing the rest of his words.

No—the last faint trace of life left in him.

Ding.

A clear chime rang in my ears.

[3720] In a martial sect, Senior Brother and Junior Brother indicate relative seniority among disciples, not necessarily a family relationship.

At the same time, an energy as refreshing as mountain-stream water swept through me, once again filling my body with new strength.

Unlike the man who had died with a silver-white spearhead through his chest.

And just as the woman who had died moments before, too horribly to leave her body in one piece, had wanted.

I mustn't fall here? I have to get stronger than I am now?

Feeling the crushing mental exhaustion weighing on my body, I turned to look toward the last trace of the Grand Mage, left behind where the Force arrow had swept through.

Don't worry. I'll make sure of it.

I didn't know what the Lord of Heaven wanted.

But one thing was clear.

I had to keep going. To keep moving forward, I had to grow stronger.

Strong enough to far exceed the Lord of Heaven's expectations. Strong enough to make him regret this choice someday.

Whatever gets in my way, I'll just smash it to pieces.

That was how I'd lived until now, and how I'd live from here on.

With that thought, I turned my unsteady body around.

Or I tried to.

Then I saw a slender arm and leg lying in a pool of blood, each severed from her body. Their cut ends were sharp and clean.

No.

"…!"

Not until I spotted the traces of Teleport.

Chapter 1053

The shock was so great that the world seemed to stop. For an instant, Jin Taekyung forgot to breathe.

At the sight of this guess flashing through his mind—a guess he didn't want to believe—a corner of his chest throbbed as if he'd been stabbed.

"What happened…?"

"Wait. Just a moment."

Jin Taekyung had gone still as a statue. Jeok Cheongang seemed to realize something and raised a hand, cutting off the Bow Saint's question.

Of course he knew every moment counted. A fierce battle was still raging below the hill.

But by now, he and his young Disciple understood each other with a glance. They hardly needed even that. The old Master was certain Taekyung had a reason for stopping, and he was right.

Step. Step.

Though he staggered with exhaustion, Taekyung walked on as if entranced.

The scene ahead drew closer, its details coming into sharp focus.

Shreds of a white robe fluttered in a breeze from somewhere. Nearby lay a small pool of blood.

They were the last traces of someone who had been there. Taekyung reached out with a trembling hand and touched the largest of them.

A woman's arm and leg, slender and so pale that the veins showed through her skin.

Even now, dark red blood was gushing from their cross sections. They were cut with unbelievable precision, smooth and sharp.

As if the limbs hadn't been cut off, but separated.

This… definitely wasn't a wound caused by Force.

At last, faced with the truth, Taekyung let out the breath he'd been holding.

There was no mistaking it. He belonged to two worlds, after all. He was both a Murim martial artist and a Hunter.

That was why he could recognize the marks on the arm and leg, each separated from her body, better than anyone.

"Teleport…"

The word escaped his lips before he knew it. Jeok Cheongang, now beside him, asked with a rigid face, "Tell me it isn't what this old man thinks."

Taekyung didn't answer.

But Jeok Cheongang already knew what his silence meant.

"That bizarre sorcery again. No—Magic?"

Yes. Magic. That damn Magic.

Overcome by a helplessness he couldn't put into words, Taekyung nodded. Jeok Cheongang's eyes flashed.

He was already worn down by injuries, both large and small, and by exhaustion. Yet there wasn't a trace of resignation in those eyes, where flames seemed to pour forth.

"This isn't the time. Before it's too late, we need to—"

"It's already too late."

"What?"

Taekyung clenched his teeth.

Teleport.

A spatial travel spell notorious for its difficulty, even among the countless kinds of Magic.

Unlike Blink, which was limited to short distances, Teleport could cover dozens[3721] or even hundreds of kilometers[3722] at once, depending on the mage's Grade and how much mana they possessed.

Not hundreds of jang.[3723] Hundreds of kilometers.

Then how far could Grand Mages, who had reached the limits of Magic, go?

If… every condition were perfect, maybe they could cross half the continent.

Taekyung didn't know the exact distance. What mattered was that the Grand Mage—a big catch—had already torn through the net and fled far away.

Exhaustion pressed even more heavily on him as he spoke.

"She's beyond our range. By now, she must be at least dozens of ri[3724] away."

"What do you mean…!"

Jeok Cheongang's eyes widened, but he swallowed the rest.

Traveling dozens of ri[3725] in the blink of an eye was beyond anything reason could account for. Yet he already knew such things were possible. He had seen them with his own eyes.

The inexplicable phenomena tied to Dark Heaven. The ghostly power called Magic, which defied both words and common sense.

"Goddamn it!"

Boom!

Jeok Cheongang stamped his foot in fury, and cracks spread across the ground like a spiderweb.

Through the crash came the Bow Saint's low voice.

[3721] One dozen kilometers is 12 km, about 7.5 mi.

[3722] 100 km is about 62 mi.

[3723] A Korean jang is approximately 3.03 m, or 9.94 ft.

[3724] A Korean ri is approximately 393 m, or 0.244 mi.

[3725] A Korean ri is approximately 393 m, or 0.244 mi.

“Even if you’re right, she’s lost an arm and a leg. Her life must be in danger. Is there no chance she died?”

Taekyung shook his head weakly.

“I don’t know. But I doubt it.”

“Why?”

“There must be mages there, too—or sorcerers, as they call them here.”

“Then…”

“Yes. She returned to her allies. We can’t guess where that is, but the Grand Sorceress would have known exactly.”

Jin Taekyung added, staring at the arm and leg submerged in the pool of blood,

“She must have believed she could survive. Otherwise, she wouldn’t have taken a gamble like this.”

Teleport was a difficult spell for long-distance travel. The coordinates of both the starting point and the destination had to be exact, without the slightest error. It demanded more preparation than any other spell.

Even in the modern world, the high-ranking mages who specialized in Teleport and made their living from it were no exception. If anything, knowing the danger made them more careful.

If even the slightest figure went wrong as the spell took effect, they could die instantly, fused with a rock or a tree.

Or…

Their limbs could be separated.

The thought passed silently through Taekyung’s mind. He looked down at the flesh left behind. It was no longer a sign that someone had died.

It was proof that the Grand Mage had gambled her life—and succeeded.

I made a mistake. I should’ve finished her off myself. Made absolutely sure.

He hadn’t expected her to attempt Teleport in the middle of that frantic struggle, with her starting position changing every moment. Much less for the spell to succeed under such unstable conditions.

But regret always arrived a step too late. Taekyung still had to walk the path before him.

The narrow, treacherous path that now seemed clearer and closer—and yet, for some reason, more distant and beyond reach.

Toward the being waiting at its end.

Lord of Heaven.

The title lingered on the tip of his tongue, never spoken. Taekyung turned it over in his mind, bitter as bear gall.

Who was he?

Why was he staining the world with blood and beckoning to Taekyung from behind that dark red curtain?

And what connection did he have to the other being who had haunted Taekyung's thoughts for so long?

The Demon King. Asmodeus.

Ruler of the Demon Realm. Lord of demons.

An invader who'd torn through the boundaries between dimensions with his overwhelming power, shattered every convention and civilization, and driven billions of people to terror and death.

Yet in the end, he had fallen at the hands of one human. Now he would be remembered forever as part of history.

That's right. He's dead. I know he is.

Then why?

Why couldn't Taekyung get that accursed being out of his head?

Crack.

He bit his lip until it bled.

Over the years he'd spent moving between the modern world and Murim, he'd seen countless lights and shadows. But the darkness cast by Dark Heaven was deeper than any of them. The Lord of Heaven stood at the center of it all, and Taekyung could scarcely deny his existence any longer.

First came all those strange phenomena that overturned everything he knew. Now, Magic.

What the hell is waiting at the end of this?

Taekyung turned his head toward somewhere far to the west.

The Demon King and the Lord of Heaven.

The Lord of Heaven and the Demon King.

He didn't know whether they'd originally been one being or two entirely different people. The greatest enemy of his life was somewhere beyond the western horizon.

Beckoning to the Chosen One.

For a reason no one else yet knew.

Even knowing that, Taekyung had to keep walking the path he had chosen. Quietly, desperately, with everything he had.

Splash.

He rose, his foot landing in the pool of blood, and forced himself to take a step.

The battle wasn't over. Countless enemies were still killing and dying like soulless puppets. He headed toward them to finish it.

"Can you hold on?"

"No."

His Master was watching him with concern. Taekyung looked ready to collapse, but he gave him a faint smile.

"But I have to. Somehow."

In the past and in the present, that was what he had always done.

Whoosh!

Taekyung charged toward the enemy without hesitation, shoulder to shoulder with his old Master. Force arrows were already streaking through the air above them.

And the three of them weren't the only ones racing toward the battlefield to end this vast, horrific fight.

Bwooo!

A horn sounded without warning. Those who turned toward it saw a pale cloud of dust sweeping across the vast range of the Great Snow Mountain toward the battlefield.

At the head of thousands of men and horses, a group waved a torn banner and shouted as if coughing up blood.

"Subdue the Demons! Destroy Heaven!"

Hundreds of voices, charged with pure internal energy, burst through the air. The banner billowed in the wind as it advanced with them.

Neither the blood spattered across its white cloth nor the pieces torn from it could erase what it stood for.

It was their pride.

Long ago, it had also been a line of verse written by an old man called the Poet Sage,[3726] praising the Daoists who lived in the remote mountain valleys.

"With one long sword to guard the body, one would seek support from Kongtong."

Jeok Cheongang's voice scattered on the wind. Then the Bow Saint parted her tightly closed lips.

"If you would defend yourself with a single long sword, turn to Kongtong."

And at that moment—

Rrrrrumble!

In less than two shichen,[3727] this brutal battle had swallowed more than ten thousand lives.

Now the scales that would decide its outcome tipped completely.

No—they broke.

Just as some unknown person, somewhere thousands of ri[3728] away, had intended when they prepared the stage for this day.

[3726] The Poet Sage is an honorific for Du Fu, a Tang-dynasty poet.

[3727] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

[3728] A Korean ri is approximately 393 m, or 0.244 mi.

Chapter 1054

“Awaken.”

Nothing more was needed.

The brief whisper roused her mind as it sank beneath the surface of sleep and took hold of her thoughts. Her eyelids, shut tight and motionless until now, opened.

“Ah.”

A short gasp escaped her.

At last conscious again, the Grand Sorceress looked at the pitch-black darkness pressing in from every side and understood.

The gamble she had taken in her final moments, risking her life, had succeeded.

It was also why she was still alive despite the wound that should have killed her.

“Heaven above and earth below, all demons bow in reverence!”

The Grand Sorceress cried out the eight characters of the sacred words engraved upon her soul, then hurriedly prostrated herself before the deep darkness.

First she dropped to both knees, then placed both arms on the ground. Finally, she struck her forehead against the stone hard enough to make it ring.

Thud. Thud. Thud.

Blood drops fell onto the cold stone floor as pain throbbed through her forehead, but the Grand Sorceress paid them no mind.

She could prostrate herself like this—and had recovered the arm and leg torn away when she was swept into unstable space—only through the grace of one being.

“This foolish and lowly servant presents herself before the great Lord of Heaven.”

At the reverence in the Grand Sorceress’s voice, the darkness surrounding her rippled slowly.

“Speak. Tell me everything you saw and heard.”

The brief command echoed inside her mind.

But the Grand Sorceress knew better than anyone that her master wasn’t asking who had won the battle.

His attention was fixed on one person alone.

“I sought to carry out the Lord of Heaven’s command, even at the cost of my life.”

Not daring to raise her face, the Grand Sorceress continued.

She told him roughly how many of their allies Jin Taekyung had killed, how many Black Ghosts had fallen in the process, and how the battle had unfolded from beginning to end.

“And so, shameful as it is, I had no choice but to flee in haste. Please, kill me.”

When she had finished, the Grand Sorceress quietly bit her lip.

She had done everything she could, but not all of it had gone perfectly according to plan.

Then, as she waited in fear, his voice sounded in her mind again.

“You did not see the Blood-Sword’s life taken?”

“…No. Nor did I foresee that the two Daoists of the Zhongnan Sect and Sima Gong would betray us again. Even if I had ten mouths, I would have no excuse.”

There was the Black Night King Sima Gong, who had joined forces with the Blood-Sword Demon Lord.

Then there were the Roaring Fury Swordsman Song Il and the Taeeul Merciless Sword Hwangbo Eom, whom Sima Gong had drawn in.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord, who had recruited the traitors starting with the Black Night King, had known nothing of it. Under the original plan, they should all have been dead by now—killed by Jin Taekyung before the real battle even began.

“But things went wrong somewhere I never expected, even before that.”

“What was it?”

“Kongtong.”

The Kongtong Sect.

They were to be the first supporting players on the stage the Grand Sorceress had prepared.

The Kongtong Sect survivors who had fled Dunhuang were supposed to join their allies in the rear and give a detailed account of everything they had seen and heard.

Dark Heaven’s overwhelming forces. The strange power called Magic.

And, finally, the crucial seed of suspicion that would expose the traitors. That was what the Grand Sorceress had intended to plant.

“So I let word of the traitors reach their ears. Then I let them go, pretending I couldn’t find them.”

She hadn’t failed to catch them.

She had let them go. Deliberately.

It was an audacious claim to make about the Kongtong Sect, one of the Nine Sects and One Gang, but the Grand Sorceress remained certain of it. Had she and the mages under her command joined the pursuit intent on killing, the Kongtong Sect would have been wiped out in Dunhuang.

But she had made no effort to capture and kill them.

Unlike the Blood-Sword Demon Lord, her goal wasn’t victory.

The separate order she had received from the Lord of Heaven concerned only Jin Taekyung’s survival and growth.

That was why some of the Kongtong Sect had been allowed to survive.

When she heard that their survivors, including the Sect Leader, had shaken off the relentless pursuit and escaped the encirclement, the Grand Sorceress had smothered a laugh to keep the Blood-Sword Demon Lord from noticing. She had already been thinking of what would come next.

The survivors would return and reveal the truth. Jin Taekyung would execute the handful of traitors, become a new rallying point for Dark Heaven's enemies, and lead them to a sweeping victory.

A safe and perfect plan.

But…

"Some of the survivors who knew the truth, including the Kongtong Sect's Sect Leader, vanished without a trace."

The darkness rippled sharply.

"Vanished without a trace?"

"Yes. Forgive me, but even with the power of the sorcery you granted this servant, I could not find them. At some point, they disappeared to a place I cannot even guess."

The first unexpected crack had appeared, but even the Grand Sorceress could not follow their trail.

Time passed. The real battle began. More cracks appeared, one after another.

For some reason, the traitors had chosen the foolish path again, even with the battle turning against them.

Jin Taekyung had severed his own heart meridian and gambled his life.

And the arrival of the Fire King and the Bow Saint had put the Grand Sorceress herself in danger.

"Please punish this lowly servant for failing to carry out your heavenly command."

She had achieved her immediate objective, but only that.

The Grand Sorceress lowered her head further and waited for her master's fury to shake heaven and earth.

But contrary to her fears, the mind-voice that echoed from deep within her a moment later, as if resonating, was as emotionless as ever.

"Raise your head."

The Grand Sorceress obeyed as if entranced. Beyond the closely woven veil over her face, the darkness writhed as though alive.

It was deeper and denser than she had ever seen it in the past several decades.

"Can you see it? Can you feel it?"

The Grand Sorceress didn't answer.

No—she couldn't.

Her pupils, which had rolled back until their whites showed at the sight of the darkness, were already turning black.

"I can see it. I can feel it. Everything hidden inside you. Clearly."

Whoosh.

The darkness that had completely consumed her retinas didn't stop there. It continued to spread.

Faster. Deeper.

It took hold of its loyal servant's mind as her slender body trembled and her reason slipped away. It swept through her thoughts and shook her spirit before returning to its master.

As if nothing had happened.

Thump.

"Ah—hah. Hah!"

The moment the darkness left her eyes and their focus returned, the Grand Sorceress collapsed like a puppet with its strings cut, gasping for breath.

"L-Lord of Heaven."

Her voice quivered. Her eyes were full of fear.

She knew instinctively what had happened.

The Lord of Heaven had just looked through every one of her thoughts and memories.

At the same time, an awe so intense it raised goose bumps drove out her fleeting fear and enveloped her whole body.

That power…

Remembering the power that had seeped into her body and seized her soul, the Grand Sorceress shuddered.

She knew it had been only a tiny fragment of his power. That made her wonder and shock all the greater.

Just how far can his power reach?

Even a thousand-year-old tree could never touch the clouds.

But the Lord of Heaven was different.

From the moment she had first met him, he had been the absolute ruler, beyond compare. And day by day, he had grown stronger to a degree that made the very word limit meaningless.

The change astonished even the Grand Sorceress, one of his closest confidants.

And she already had an idea where this unbelievable change had begun.

Jin Taekyung. No—the Chosen One.

She was certain of it.

A little more than two years ago, when bloodshed swept through Shanxi Province and the epithet Hidden Dragon became known throughout the land, her master had begun to change as well.

He started waking more often from deep slumbers that had lasted nearly a year at their shortest and as long as ten years. Each time, the Grand Sorceress could feel that the Lord of Heaven had grown stronger.

Even here, today.

But what could that possibly have to do with—?

It was a natural question.

But the next moment, a thunderous echo shook her mind, turning her thoughts blank.

"It is not your place to question anything."

"…!"

"Do not forget what your master wants. Do not forget what you must do."

The Lord of Heaven's voice seemed to pierce her soul. The Grand Sorceress realized she had momentarily forgotten something.

That the being before her was an absolute ruler, transcending everything.

To serve and worship him as her master, she could permit herself no questions or doubts.

"Please, please kill this irreverent servant!"

The Grand Sorceress cried out as if she were coughing up blood.

Pressed so close to the cold stone floor she seemed ready to become part of it, she reaffirmed her fanatical loyalty and praised her master.

She went on until her voice, once as clear and calm as a silver bell, grew hoarse and cracked.

Until her master finally issued his command to the lowly servant who had dared, even for an instant, to harbor a question.

"That is enough."

Rustle.

The darkness rippled gently and wrapped around the Grand Sorceress, as though caressing her.

"Nothing of the sort will ever happen. Your master knows that, unlike the Blood-Sword, that foolish hunting dog, your loyalty is steadfast and pure."

"Lord of Heaven…!"

"Go to the place that awaits you. Join forces there with another of your master's loyal servants and complete a new mission. The great plan is now truly close to completion."

Her master's trust came through more clearly than ever. Overcome, the Grand Sorceress began to weep.

“I will risk my life to fulfill the mission entrusted to me.”

“I believe you. Just as I always have.”

As his quiet voice echoed in her mind, some of the darkness wrapped around the Grand Sorceress sank deep into her body.

No—it seeped into her as if they had always been one.

Whoosh.

The Grand Sorceress shuddered as an unprecedented energy surged from deep within her.

She could sense what the immense new power her master had given her wanted at that very moment—and where it was leading her.

Qinghai.

At that instant—

Whoom!

A brilliant white flash suddenly swelled and burst outward, engulfing her slender body.

Pop.

It all happened in an instant, and ended in an instant.

The Grand Sorceress vanished without a trace. Alone in that pitch-black space, the absolute being murmured quietly.

“Time is passing.”

As the darkness slowly dispersed, an unidentified green light glimmered faintly.

Chapter 1055

Time kept flowing, just as it always had.

It had flowed while the conversation between master and servant ended somewhere in a darkness whose distance and exact location were unknown. And it flowed now, as a young man stopped in the middle of a snowfield that had lost its pure white to blood.

Slosh.

Cold. Sticky.

The blood pooled around his ankles held the deaths of dozens of people. It was also the future of someone standing in it, waiting for death to draw near.

“So this is where you were.”

Kh—cough.

At the young man’s sudden words, the Black Night King Sima Gong blinked through a labored cough.

A face almost exactly like his own appeared in his bleary eyes. He had thought he would never see it again in this life.

“How…”

His words trailed off.

His surprise lasted only a moment. He studied the son who had returned, then spoke in the same calm voice as always.

“I thought you’d gone far away. Why have you come back here?”

“It was too far for me. As I am now.”

The young man, Sama Pyo, answered, then abruptly turned his head to look somewhere.

Amid the unending roar of battle, powerful fighters swept through the remaining enemies, scattering destructive flashes of light. At their center stood Jin Taekyung, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon.

“Perhaps… it wasn’t time yet.”

Sama Pyo had wanted to reach him, but couldn’t. He had wanted to help, but in the end had no choice but to turn back.

He knew why the few hundred jang[3729] between him and Jin Taekyung had felt like tens of thousands of ri[3730]: he wasn’t strong enough.

Yet part of him stubbornly denied something else—the real reason he had come back.

“So, of all the roads you could have taken, you chose to return here?”

“I only happened to see you.”

[3729] One jang is ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[3730] One Chinese li is 500 m (0.311 mi).

You.

It was a dry way to address his father. Sima Gong merely nodded.

“By chance. Yes, I see.”

“Yes. By chance. All of it.”

Whatever they said, father and son both knew this was no coincidence. It was a choice.

Neither saw any need to say so. In that, too, they resembled each other more than anyone else.

“How is the battle going?”

“Is that really what matters to you? When you might stop breathing at any moment?”

“My death is in the future. The battle is happening now. Nothing matters more than what’s before us.”

His father was at death’s door, yet his answer was as firm as ever. Sama Pyo let out a hollow laugh before he could stop himself.

“It’s practically over. The enemy leaders are all dead or have fled. The rest will be wiped out soon.”

It was the plain truth, no more and no less.

The scales that had once tipped toward Dark Heaven’s victory had long since shattered. The Blood-Sword Demon Lord and the mages were dead, and the Grand Sorceress had vanished like a phantom.

Even the powerful Black Ghosts were gone. With the mysterious reinforcements led by the Kongtong Sect now on the battlefield, the allied forces were fighting like men possessed.

Before long, the battle that had stained this vast snowfield red would be over.

No. It was already over.

All that remained was slaughter carried on in the name of battle.

Only after hearing all this did Sima Gong, whose fading consciousness had kept him from knowing it, give a small nod.

“A great victory.”

“A great victory. Ours.”

“Ours. Yes, I suppose you can think of it that way now. The Kongtong Sect may see things differently, of course.”

“The Kongtong Sect…?”

“Don’t pretend you don’t know. You’ve guessed already, haven’t you? The crushing defeat at Dunhuang was no accident.”

Despite the unforgivable crime of betrayal, Sima Gong confessed with pride and composure to the son who resembled him more than anyone else.

“Yes. It’s just as you suspect. I goaded the Gansu sects that opposed me into banding together with the Kongtong Sect to defend Dunhuang, then passed information to the Blood-Sword Demon Lord. I knew what was happening beyond the desert, but I didn’t tell them. If it weren’t for those mounted bandits who came from Ningxia, things wouldn’t have gone the way they did.”

“…!”

“Are you surprised? Angry? Whatever you think of this old man, I have no regrets. I made a choice for gain and survival. Nothing more.”

Sima Gong looked his son straight in the eye.

Gain and survival.

Yes. That was all. It always had been.

He had lived his entire life as a member of the unorthodox faction. To build up a force weaker than the Demonic Path or the orthodox faction—even weaker than the dark-path figures—he had always had to take dangerous gambles.

Just as, after careful calculation amid the great upheaval of the Great Faction War, he had chosen the orthodox faction and claimed the rights of the victors.

His son stood looking down at him in silence. Then he spoke.

“Why did you do it?”

“I’ve told you everything.”

“I’m not asking why you betrayed them. I know what kind of man you are.”

“Then what are you asking…?”

“Why did you make that choice? You, who pursued survival and gain so ruthlessly. Why?”

At the look in his son’s eyes, Sima Gong finally understood what he was asking. What answer he wanted.

A brief silence stretched between them, long as an eternity. When Sima Gong spoke, his voice was low and cold.

“You still have a long way to go.”

“What… What does that mean?”

“What’s done is done. The reason doesn’t matter. As my heir, you should be asking what comes next. That’s what it takes to be a Sect Leader.”

“…!”

“Everything will soon be yours. The household and the sect, vast lands and untold wealth… and, most importantly, the grudges you’ll have to settle. Yet you’re curious about the past?”

Sima Gong let out a mocking laugh at his heir.

“I judged you wrongly. You’ll soon gain half of Gansu, only to lose it all. Wolves and vultures will catch the scent of blood and descend from every direction to tear the Black Dragon Demon Gate apart.”

Thousands had died in Dunhuang alone because of his betrayal. The Kongtong Sect had suffered losses comparable to, perhaps even greater than, those it had suffered in the Great Faction War. The same was true of the many sects that formed the roots of Gansu's martial world.

Sima Gong knew what would happen if the truth came out. If Dark Heaven, betrayed for the second time, let even a little information slip, the name of the Black Dragon Demon Gate would disappear from the world.

Even the Zhongnan Sect, one of the Nine Sects and One Gang, might not escape. The crimes of the Roaring Fury Swordsman and the Taeeul Merciless Sword—whether either man was alive or dead—might force the sect to close its gates.

But…

Even when the sky falls, there's a way out. There always is.

Just as Sima Gong murmured to himself, Sama Pyo, who had been watching him with an indescribable expression, finally opened his firmly closed lips.

"There's another way."

"What?"

"A way to save the Black Dragon Demon Gate. A way past the wolves and vultures gathering on every side."

For an instant, a strange glint flashed in Sima Gong's eyes.

"Blood is repaid with blood. That is the law of the martial world. They will never forget what the Black Dragon Demon Gate has done."

"Half right, half wrong," Sama Pyo said quietly. "Blood should be repaid with blood. But not everyone in the Black Dragon Demon Gate needs to bleed."

"…!"

"Am I wrong?"

A heavy silence fell between them.

Screams and shouts still rang out, yet for a moment it seemed every sound around them had vanished.

At last, Sima Gong spoke, his voice low.

"Yes, you're right. The body itself is innocent. It only did what the head told it to. Isn't that so?"

Sama Pyo answered calmly.

"If the head doesn't satisfy them, I'll have to be prepared to cut off the limbs one by one."

"So you mean to cut down this old man and the senior members who followed my orders. Every last one."

"Too many guests will come bearing grudges. Even if each takes only a sip to wet his throat, they'll need a great deal of blood."

“Guests, is it? If you’re receiving guests rather than facing enemies, you’ll have to make the arrangements yourself. You’ll be the host soon.”

“If I cut off the head and arms myself and offer them up, along with reasonable compensation, their grounds for revenge will lose their force.”

“Yes. I suppose they would. Though some may call a son who kills his father with his own hands a monster who has forsaken filial duty…”

“More will call me a hero of turbulent times. A Great Hero of Benevolence and Righteousness, willing to forsake even filial duty for the world and the greater good.”

At that answer, given without hesitation, Sima Gong stared at his son, his face rigid.

His son had just said he would kill his own father.

Then Sima Gong smiled as though his face had never stiffened.

“Truly excellent.”

Forgetting for a moment even the terrible agony that wracked his whole body, the giant who had ruled the unorthodox faction for decades burst into a hearty laugh.

“Yes. This is what I wanted to see from you. This is why I chose you as my heir.”

At that moment, the Black Night King Sima Gong was genuinely happy. He had chosen well. Everything he had built over a lifetime would pass to a worthy successor.

Eight sons and nine daughters. Sama Pyo was his eighth son and his seventeenth and last child.

The youngest and most talented of them all had been his true heir. Now, at last, he had grown into a proper member of the unorthodox faction: a man who could kill even his own father and pursue gain and survival with a cool head in any circumstance.

This is enough.

At the end of his long, hard-fought life, Sima Gong was ready to accept death with a smile of relief.

At the same time, he parted his bloodied lips to speak to Sama Pyo, who was lifting his treasured weapon, the Black Dragon Saber, out of the pool of blood. He addressed the son who had grown from an immature young man into the master of a sect and the new ruler of the unorthodox faction.

“Go ahead and cut me down, Sect Leader.”

At the instant his unfailingly polite voice rang out—

Shwaa!

A brilliant streak of light flashed past his eyes.

Chapter 1056

Shwaa!

The flash that tore through the wind was razor-sharp and perfectly aimed.

The Black Dragon Saber.

It was the first and last treasured blade his father had given him. He had been only a boy in his teens then, though he'd distinguished himself so early that his youth hardly mattered. Now the blade followed its master's hand and cut cleanly through the target before him.

Shhk!

Blood sprayed with a cold slicing sound. The pair of eyes that had watched it all sank deeply.

"What have you done?"

The question held a great deal, but the answer was simple.

"Because this isn't the path I want."

Sama Pyo let go of the hilt, cold beneath his hand.

The keen blade, permitted only to the heir of the Black Dragon Demon Gate, had grazed the bridge of Sima Gong's nose and cut through the pool of blood.

As if mocking the father who had rejoiced to see his son become a true man of the unorthodox faction—and had willingly accepted death.

"This is my choice. The path I, Sama Pyo, have chosen as the man who will succeed you as Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate."

"Why…!"

Sama Pyo calmly met Sima Gong's gaze as his father shouted, his voice thick with blood.

"Because it isn't right."

"What?"

"Because it isn't what comes first—or what's best."

For Sama Pyo, this wasn't a question of what came first.

It was a question of what was right—of what was better.

"I'd forgotten for my whole life. No—I'd grown so used to it that I kept pretending not to know. But not anymore."

His life in Gansu had been one long struggle.

Like the siblings born before him, the youngest of the Sama family had fought desperately to avoid being cast aside.

They were family, bound by blood, and rivals competing for the one position of heir. They were little more than soldiers obeying the man who had given them that blood.

Soldiers who sometimes had to face even death.

“Father, Second Brother…!”

“I’ve already heard from the messenger. We’ll hold the funeral after we’ve wiped them all out. Understand?”

Sima Gong had been a cold conqueror. Unifying the unorthodox faction demanded blood and sacrifice.

It was an open secret that more than five of Sama Pyo’s brothers and sisters had died as the Black Dragon Demon Gate brought every unorthodox faction in the land under its banner and rose to stand alongside the Kongtong Sect.

But no one knew that the Black Dragon Demon Gate’s youngest Young Master, chosen as heir while still in his teens, wasn’t as cold as he seemed.

“Why are you crying so bitterly?”

“Father helped Black Dragon Demon Gate. But he died. Taishan sad.”

“…!”

“Need to find body. Taishan needs to bury father. But, but those people said they don’t know. Taishan sad.”

“…You said your name was Taishan. Come with me.”

Sama Pyo had found the father of the enormous boy weeping before him. He’d found him in the Black Dragon Demon Gate’s uniform, surrounded by crows, and buried him with care.

And for the first time in his life, Sama Pyo had made a friend.

A friend more precious than family—the only person who cared for him more than his own father did.

But he’d never imagined he would make more friends over a decade later.

“Living with them taught me that, in the end, everything depends on the choices I make.”

The Fire Dragon Pavilion.

Despite its grand name, it had fewer than ten members. Among them, Sama Pyo had found a path he’d never known existed.

There were no shackles or labels there.

They always trusted one another and fought together, and that was how they overcame each crisis.

Perhaps that was why Sama Pyo had begun looking back on his life again and again.

Why, at some point, he had begun to feel something unfamiliar toward his merciless father.

“It occurred to me that, when you look at it, you’re rather pitiable yourself.”

“…!”

“You probably weren’t like this from the start. Ambition took hold of you little by little. Then one day, you stopped caring what it took to get what you wanted.”

Gone was the son who couldn’t bear to meet his father’s cold gaze.

Now Sama Pyo looked at his dying father with calm, sorrowful eyes.

“It wasn’t a coincidence.”

“What… do you mean?”

“I didn’t come back by chance. I came to be with you at the end. Not as the Black Night King’s heir, but as Sima Gong’s son.”

Splash.

“Do you know?”

Sama Pyo sat in the pool of blood and met his father’s eyes. Watching them tremble, he continued slowly.

“There is no son in this world who can kill his father.”

“…!”

“I’ll tell them everything myself. I’ll tell them about the pathetic son who knew of his father’s betrayal and tried not to see it.”

“You…”

“I’m not asking to be forgiven. I’m choosing to bear it.”

There was such peace in his answer, such acceptance, that Sima Gong could say nothing.

He could only struggle to hold back a feeling he’d long forgotten—a feeling he had remembered only here, today.

His vision slowly darkened. His breathing grew short, as if signaling the end.

“You asked why I did it. Why I, who’d spent my whole life chasing survival and practical gain, made such a foolish choice…”

To save the heir who would inherit everything he had?

No. That wasn’t it.

At least in that moment, Sima Gong knew there had been another reason.

He was simply too late to confess it.

“I… This father of yours…”

Facing the son who had returned to be with him at the end, Sima Gong used all the strength he had left to force out the words.

He didn’t even realize they were his final breath.

Slump.

His head suddenly drooped.

To his father, who had died so wretchedly, as if burdened by the deeds of his life, the son whispered, “I heard you. Clearly.”

Sama Pyo's shoulders began to shake. The pool of blood soaking father and son trembled with them.

Highly trained hunting dogs always obey their master's commands.

They fix their eyes on the prey he points out, bare their teeth and growl. The moment he slips their leashes, they race forward and tear into it with all their strength.

Until their prey stops breathing.

Or until their master orders them to stop and return.

Just like now.

Shwaa!

A fierce, piercing whistle and a flash of light came from the side.

But speed was always relative.

The Sword Energy surged along a white blade and fell toward the top of my head with all the speed expected of a Peak Master. To me, though, it wasn't fast.

Shhk!

Space split in an instant.

A fraction of a beat later came the slicing sound. Everything in the silver-white spearhead's path had been cut apart.

The Sword Energy, snuffed out like a candle in the wind.

The blade that had carried that mighty energy.

And finally, the body of the person who had launched this futile attack.

Fwoosh!

A tremendous fountain of blood burst from his cleanly severed body. I didn't blink at the sight.

Neither did the other hunting dogs charging from every direction, even now.

Thud, crunch! Whump!

I drove my spearhead into the chest of the first enemy charging straight at me, then crushed the face of another who came at me from the blind spot with one punch. At the same time, I yanked out the embedded spearhead and swung it.

"Ghk—kgh."

Thump.

Three Peak Masters fell with dying cries in place of last words.

No—not three masters.

Three corpses.

But the frenzy of battle sweeping across the blood-soaked snowfield showed no sign of easing.

Shh-shh-shh-shhk!

The Dark Heaven cultists rushed in to fill the gaps without giving me a moment's pause.

At the sight of their blank faces and eyes devoid of feeling, I felt an exhaustion so deep it weighed down my whole body.

How many is that now?

I had no idea.

I had neither the time nor the reason to count every enemy I'd killed.

I could only fight. Keep knocking them down.

Those soulless wooden puppets.

Those hunting dogs, those moths to the flame blindly carrying out their final order even though the master who held their leashes was gone.

Of course, I knew what this was.

A one-sided massacre. Slaughter.

But I had to do it.

It was the only way to end this blood-soaked battle, and the only way to save as many allies as possible.

So I had no choice but to cling with all my strength to the thread of consciousness that felt ready to snap at any moment.

Come on.

I muttered the words to myself and charged toward the enemy.

Or tried to.

That was when my vision began to fade.

"…!"

A red alarm bell rang in my head.

My mental strength had reached its limit long ago. Now, unable to endure any longer, it was sending me a warning.

But by the time I gritted my teeth and forced my eyes wide, it was already too late.

Shwaa!

My view had tilted. A dozen blades were raining down on my body, which had staggered without my even realizing it.

They looked faint. Slow.

My eyesight was still sharp enough to follow them. The problem was my brain: the part that needed to tell my body to move had frozen like stone.

Damn it.

I cursed inwardly as the world slowed around me.

These men were no Blood-Sword Demon Lord or Grand Sorceress. They couldn't even compare to the Black Ghosts.

They fell far short.

Under normal circumstances, I would've scoffed at the difference between us.

Even so, I had a gut feeling I wouldn't be able to dodge all their attacks.

And while my body refused to move, one ridiculous thought crossed my mind.

If I level up, would it heal me even if my limbs got cut off?

Fortunately, I didn't have to worry about that unpleasant first experience—the sort only someone like Cheongpung might enjoy.

The next moment, an enormous rush of air sounded from somewhere and swept my worries away.

Whoooosh!

It happened in the blink of an eye.

A huge shadow rose over the shoulders of the enemies charging toward me. With it came a two-section staff, big and beautiful just as its name suggested, cleaving through the air like lightning.

Craaaack!

If anyone ever asked whether I'd seen five heads knocked flying with a single swing of a bat, I could nod without hesitation.

I could even name the top prospect who'd tear through the modern Major Leagues, now a playground for Awakened Ones.

Of course, that lunatic hulk would introduce himself before anyone else got the chance.

Just like now.

"Taishan! Came! Saw! Hit!"

"Well done! Now, Body Slam!"

Starting with Namho, perched on the shoulder of Taishan—who had just delivered a line to make Julius Caesar weep—familiar faces burst onto the scene like streaks of light.

"Young Master! No, Benefactor! No, Pavilion Master!"

Shhk!

Ju Hwaran split an enemy's skull while blurting out a three-step change of address that even Transformers would've had trouble keeping up with.

"Fools! You dare try to harm the Captain? Your courage is admirable, but first you'll have to get past me—the Captain's right arm and heart! I, Hyuk Mu—whoa, shit!"

Clang!

Hyuk Mujin had charged in with a grand entrance, only to scramble backward when his opponent's counterattack proved stronger than he'd expected.

"Uh, does that guy know how to fight with his mouth shut?"

"You should try shutting yours first."

Thrust!

Song Ilseom saved Hyuk Mujin and cut down the remaining enemies in a flash. And… wait, who was that black, shaggy old guy?

“The Seven Masters of the Black Horse?”

The name slipped out before I knew it. The middle-aged man, a former mounted bandit, twisted his already fearsome face.

“Not Black Horse—White Horse! I’m Ma Junggeol, eldest of the Seven Masters of Baekma Bang! Who do you think I went through all this shit for? And you forgot me…!”

“Lower your voice. While I’m asking nicely.”

At Ju Hwaran’s chilling warning, Ma Junggeol clamped his mouth shut. A laugh escaped me before I knew it.

It was just good to see them.

To know we hadn’t lost anyone.

And…

Because I could see the one last person I’d thought I’d never meet again.

“You made it?”

Sama Pyo, who I hadn’t even seen arrive, shrugged.

“Am I late?”

No.

Not at all.

Chapter 1057

No further surprises came in the great battle that day across the vast snowfield.

Just a few shichen[3731] earlier, the forces of Dark Heaven had flaunted their overwhelming might. Now they were no more than candles before the wind, while the allied forces—led by Supreme Peak masters and wave after wave of reinforcements—were like a tremendous storm.

A storm of steel and killing intent, tearing through everything in its path.

Crraack!

Thud! Shhk!

Fountains of blood erupted on every side.

With thick blood mist draped over them like cloaks, the allies charged, stabbing and cutting down every enemy in their path without the slightest hesitation.

An eye for an eye.

A tooth for a tooth.

And death repaid with death. That was the law of this world—of Murim—and the very essence of war.

“Heaven above and earth below, all demons—”

Thwack!

A guard’s spear pierced a cultist’s arm. An arrow and a sword from somewhere tore through his face and chest.

Before the cultists could finish their eight-character doctrine, they fell, spraying blood. The allied forces trampled over their bodies and tightened the cordon around the vast slaughterhouse.

Quickly. Ferociously.

Against Dark Heaven’s cultists, who had lost their reason, persuasion and taking prisoners were luxuries. The immense sacrifices the allies had suffered here today had made them forget mercy.

That was truest of the band who had joined last, yet were now sweeping through the enemy ranks at the very front.

Shh-shh-shhk!

Blood-soaked robes fluttered.

They plunged straight into the heart of the enemy lines as if they cared nothing for their lives. Their movements were elusive as the wind, and the sword light surging from the old man’s blade at their head was cruelly dazzling.

Boom!

A thunderous blast shook the earth.

[3731] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

Flesh mangled beyond recognition and blood flew in every direction.

Where the Force had passed, nothing remained.

Nothing but blood and death.

And the tremendous roar of the allied forces as they crashed into the broken enemy formation and crushed it completely.

“Waaah!”

“Charge! Charge!”

“Don’t leave a single one alive!”

In that moment, the allied forces were a single wave, though each part had a different color.

The Embroidered Uniform Guard charged in orderly ranks, keeping their composure amid the chaos.

The soldiers and martial artists of Gansu followed behind them, squeezing out their last strength.

Then there were the Zhongnan Sect Disciples, far fewer than at the start—and the mysterious mounted fighters who had appeared out of nowhere to join the allies.

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

The ground shook as if an earthquake had struck.

Deafening shouts echoed without end. A forest of steel filled the land, engulfing the invaders and blooming with countless flowers and branches.

Red flowers made of blood, white branches made of bone.

That was how the long, brutal battle ended.

Another half day passed. Of the fully thirty thousand Dark Heaven cultists, not one still stood on the battlefield of his own will.

Not one.

In modern military terminology, annihilation means the loss of combat effectiveness.

Troops, equipment, supplies, morale, and so on.

Generally, if at least thirty percent of a fighting force has been killed or wounded and the survivors’ will falters, the force is judged incapable of continuing to fight—and considered annihilated.

But here in Murim, what lay before Jin Taekyung at this moment was different.

Annihilation.

The word meant exactly what it said.

No, perhaps even that word wasn’t enough.

Killing. Massacre.

Or…

…Slaughter.

The word he couldn’t bring himself to say lingered on the tip of his tongue.

Taekyung looked around, his gaze heavy.

Red. Everything in sight was stained red.

The once-white snowfield. The faces of corpses submerged in pools of blood, their eyes wide open.

And the bloodshot eyes searching for enemies who might have survived, picking through rivers of blood and mountains of corpses.

Shhk!

A sword came down hard, piercing the chest of an enemy who had been writhing among the countless dead.

A miracle wouldn’t happen twice. Having survived once was a misfortune.

If he’d died sooner, his end would have been much quicker and more peaceful.

Craack.

The blade buried deep inside him slowly twisted.

At the dreadful sound of bone and flesh being crushed—and the killing intent, even more palpable than the sound—the faces of the Fire Dragon Pavilion members beside Taekyung stiffened.

“Captain.”

“Even so, this is…”

Taekyung raised a hand to stop them before they could finish.

He knew what they wanted to say.

This wasn’t murder. It was slaughter, like butchering livestock.

Yet he also understood the feelings of those giving such a cruel end to enemies who no longer had the strength to resist.

“Wait here.”

He tossed the words to the Fire Dragon Pavilion members and slowly started walking.

One step. Then another. Unbearable fatigue washed over him with each step, but a hand reached out from somewhere and steadied him when he staggered.

“I’m pretty sure I told you to wait.”

At Taekyung’s mutter, almost spoken to himself, Sama Pyo shrugged.

“Well, I didn’t hear you.”

“You’ve heard me now. Step back.”

“I can’t do that.”

“That’s an order.”

“An order? So that’s how you’re going to play it?”

"Yeah."

Taekyung's voice was firmer than ever. Sama Pyo's answer was just as firm.

"Fine. Then as of this moment, I'm leaving the Fire Dragon Pavilion."

"…!"

Taekyung's eyes widened. Sama Pyo gave him a faint smile.

"What? Didn't see that coming?"

"You…"

"I've enjoyed our time together, Pavilion Master. But this is where we part ways."

He met Taekyung's gaze calmly and added, "I can't keep bringing trouble to you or anyone else. Whatever happens, I'll have to bear it alone."

He knew why Taekyung, who had been at his limit for a long time, was still clinging to consciousness.

And he knew how great a danger might be waiting at the end of the road he now had to walk alone.

He could remain calm because he had already made up his mind.

"Whatever happens, don't get involved. And if something should happen to me…"

His voice trailed off. His gaze shifted toward Taishan—and Taekyung, who had been watching him, cut in.

"Nope."

"What?"

"I said no, asshole. Look after your own man. Don't dump him on someone who's already got enough on his plate."

Sama Pyo fell silent for a moment. Then he understood what Taekyung meant and let out a short laugh.

"You're right. I have to look after him to the very end. I will."

If I can. If I can survive, like you said.

Swallowing the words he couldn't bring himself to say, Sama Pyo set off alone.

Taekyung watched him go, then suddenly spoke.

"Something just occurred to me… Do you remember the day we left the Jin Family of Taiyuan?"

Of course Sama Pyo did.

It had been recent—not years or months ago, but barely more than a month.

And he could guess why Taekyung had brought it up.

"Of course. Right before we left for the west, Elder Namho and Taishan came looking for me."

That night, Sama Pyo had been reading a secret letter from Gansu.

He had already read it, then read it again. Over and over, even as the two approached his door.

“You’re usually punctual to the second, but that day you dragged your feet. Like you were waiting for someone to come looking for you.”

Sama Pyo stopped walking at Taekyung’s quiet remark.

“I had a lot on my mind that day.”

“Elder Namho’s old, but he’s a fine agent. His nose is pretty sharp for his age, too.”

“True. Though his hearing’s bad, so he talks loudly.”

A giant nearly nine feet tall who made the ground shake just by walking, and an old man who talked a lot and had a booming voice.

They stood out wherever they went, and there was no missing the sound of them.

Sama Pyo had heard them that night too, alone in his quarters with the secret letter.

“You planned it, didn’t you? From the start.”

“No. Not at all.”

A blatant lie.

Sama Pyo had been waiting there.

Waiting for his oldest friend, who would come looking for him before anyone else.

No—for the old Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent who was always at Taishan’s side.

Deep down, he had hoped Namho would notice at least something of the secret Sama Pyo couldn’t say aloud.

That he would take it as a warning.

“Why? Why go that far?”

At Taekyung’s quiet question from behind him, Sama Pyo resumed walking.

“Even so… he’s my father.”

He had wanted to believe in him until the very end, whatever it took.

But when that trust was betrayed, he didn’t want the people beside him put in danger.

So he had deliberately left a clue as a warning. Before he could bring himself to report his father’s suspicious actions, he wanted them to become suspicious on their own.

Even if they suspected Sama Pyo too, he didn’t care, as long as it kept everyone safe.

He was used to being suspected and hated.

That was what it meant to live as the blood relative of Sima Gong, the Black Night King, and the Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate.

And yet it was strange.

Even after Namho’s gaze toward him had grown sharper and more searching, Taekyung hadn’t said a word.

Not once, even now.

“Then why didn’t you ask me anything? Not once, all this time?”

The question had been circling in Sama Pyo’s mind for so long. The moment he finally voiced it, a short answer came from behind him without a hint of hesitation.

“Even so, we’re friends.”

The answer sent a sharp tingle through Sama Pyo’s chest.

“…!”

“Shit, I don’t know. You look dark and gloomy on the outside, but… I kept wanting to trust you. Even as everything went more and more to shit, I still wanted to.”

Sama Pyo couldn’t say anything.

He clenched his teeth against the heat rising in his eyes and kept walking, his steps unsteady.

Taekyung’s voice reached him from somewhere far behind.

“Don’t die. That’s an order.”

Sama Pyo didn’t answer that gentler-than-ever command.

He kept walking toward the band still moving through the ruined battlefield, slaughtering the enemies who had survived.

Or, to be exact, toward the old man at their center.

Splash.

At last, he stopped, sending ripples through a pool of blood.

Sama Pyo took a deep breath. The stench and reek of blood were foul enough to make him gag, but his heart was strangely calm and still.

As calm and still as the expression of the old man before him, who gazed at his enemy’s son with eyes too deep to read.

“This junior, Sama Pyo, pays his respects to the Sect Leader of the great Kongtong Sect.”

At that moment—

Shwaaah.

Killing intent, immense enough to be terrifying, surged up from every direction and pressed down on Sama Pyo’s entire body.

Chapter 1058

It happened in an instant.

The Blood-Clad Men, drenched head to toe in blood as they slaughtered their enemies, surrounded Sama Pyo and unleashed a terrifying wave of killing intent.

Shhhhhh.

There were about a hundred of them.

Their qi was so fierce that the lingering heat of the battlefield seemed to freeze. The air shifted all at once, and I could feel it clearly.

Even from thirty-odd yards away, where I'd stopped to watch.

And so could the Fire Dragon Pavilion members farther off, waiting as ordered with no idea what was happening.

"My Lord! It's dangerous!"

The killing intent was so thick it seemed to erase the distance between them.

Taishan sensed Sama Pyo's danger at once. With an urgent shout, he launched himself forward—only to be stopped in his tracks.

By me.

"What do you think you're doing, Pavilion Master!"

He practically growled the words, his fighting spirit blazing.

I'd never seen him like this before.

But I couldn't back down either.

This wasn't some damn twist of fate or stroke of bad luck. Sama Pyo had made his own choice.

"Don't go. Not yet."

"Taishan will not obey such an unreasonable order!"

"I'm not ordering you. I'm asking. Just like Sama Pyo asked me not to interfere."

"…!"

Taishan's huge eyes wavered.

The Fire Dragon Pavilion members caught up, but before any of them could speak, Namho cut in with an unusually subdued voice.

Though perched on Taishan's shoulders, he didn't look especially authoritative.

"I know how you feel, but now isn't the time."

"Namho, but—"

"Oh, look at this angry bull!"

Smack!

Namho landed a sharp slap on Taishan's forehead and gave him a stern scolding.

"Was it not enough to let sentiment blind you? Have you gone deaf too? Did you even hear what the Pavilion Master said?"

He was right.

I'd told Taishan clearly.

Not yet… Don't go yet.

That's right. Not yet.

I murmured it to myself and patted Taishan's shoulder as, after a moment's struggle, he lowered his two-section staff.

Then I turned toward the hundred figures radiating killing intent.

The Blood-Clad Men—or rather, the Kongtong Sect Disciples.

At their center stood an old man, watching Sama Pyo with deep, unreadable eyes.

Perfected Being Hyeoncheon.

The Sect Leader of the Kongtong Sect, one of the Nine Sects and One Gang. The greatest martial artist in Gansu.

And…

Another man bent on revenge, betrayed by those he'd trusted as allies and forced to lose countless Disciples.

Whoooosh.

His sleeves swelled with the force of his formidable internal energy.

At that moment, the emotionless, ink-black eyes—so deep their depths were impossible to discern—didn't reflect Sama Pyo.

They reflected the bloodline of his enemy: a man Hyeoncheon would gladly tear to pieces.

Rumble.

The air trembled for yards around them. It was hard to breathe.

In the moment the overwhelming qi began slowly tightening around him from every direction, like the hand of an invisible giant, Sama Pyo froze. Then Perfected Being Hyeoncheon suddenly spoke.

"Lately, I keep remembering the first time I met your esteemed father, my friend. It was in the middle of the Great Faction War."

The old Daoist had devoted his entire life to the Dao,[3732] from infancy to old age. His gentle nature had earned him the respect of many.

He had never joined the ranks of the Ten Kings, but even as Sect Leader of the renowned Kongtong Sect, he had always been humble.

Yet even the largest vessel has its limits.

"At the same time, I regretted it. I wondered if I should have killed him then and there."

[3732] Dao means "the Way," the central path or principle in Daoist thought.

Sama Pyo said nothing to the deep sigh in Hyeoncheon's voice.

No—he couldn't answer.

He hadn't told the old Daoist the truth, but Hyeoncheon had already glimpsed part of it.

He had first heard of it from a woman.

"At first, I didn't want to believe it. I tried to convince myself it was a ploy to stir up internal strife among the survivors from Dunhuang—that we were being used as stepping-stones for an even greater scheme."

Hyeoncheon had tried to forget what he'd heard while hiding silently in the undergrowth. But his suspicions had only deepened with each passing day.

His distrust of one man: Sima Gong, the Black Night King.

Everything, including the ominous signs he'd sensed before setting out for Dunhuang, fitted together like the teeth of a gear.

"The more I thought about it, the stranger it seemed. Every piece of information we received from the Black Dragon Demon Gate was wrong. And we were the only ones who bled."

Kongtong Mountain, the Kongtong Sect's home since ancient times, lay at the southeastern edge of Gansu. The Black Dragon Demon Gate's territory, by contrast, covered the Dunhuang region in the northwest.

So the Kongtong Sect and the many sects that followed it had acted on information provided by the Black Dragon Demon Gate—and suffered a crushing defeat.

"Thousands died. In that single day."

At the slight tremor in Hyeoncheon's voice, the hundred Disciples surrounding Sama Pyo clenched their teeth.

How could they forget that horrific battle, which had begun like a bolt of lightning?

No. It had been a one-sided slaughter.

"Defending the city meant nothing. When that enormous army appeared out of nowhere, we couldn't do a thing."

The Three Elders of Tianshan.

The three old fiends from Tianshan, returned after decades away, had led the charge. Behind them came tens of thousands of cultists who knew no fear.

Neither the defenders' unceasing volleys of arrows nor the city walls—built of solid stone coated with yellow earth—could stop them.

That immense human tide, black as night, had brought down the high walls in an instant and swept away everything in its path.

It swallowed the lives of fellow Disciples, friends, and family who had stood beside them for years.

“I would rather have fought there with them and died. Heroically, with my last breath.”

Hyeoncheon wasn’t alone in that wish. A hundred pairs of eyes, reddened and now glistening with tears, showed it.

But they had survived.

They’d had to.

If only to avenge those who had died screaming.

“So we ran away like cowards. We received unexpected help along the way and shook off our pursuers easily. The others weren’t so lucky.”

Luck wasn’t shared equally.

Thousands had died in Dunhuang alone. Those who fled in tears were still prey.

They scattered to survive, and thousands more were killed or wounded as they were hunted down.

Yet even after escaping Dark Heaven’s encirclement, Hyeoncheon and the Kongtong Sect Disciples hadn’t returned to the rear.

More precisely, they couldn’t return right away. Every one of them had been injured, some more seriously than others.

The suspicion the Grand Sorceress had planted deep in their hearts had already taken root. And as Hyeoncheon lay groaning from the severe injuries he’d suffered in battle against Dark Heaven, he suddenly realized whose familiar faces had passed through his mind.

It had happened as he hovered between life and death, vowing revenge.

They weren’t the faces of the mysterious woman behind the silver-white veil, or of the Three Elders of Tianshan and the Blood-Sword Demon Lord, who had captured and killed two Elders and hundreds of Disciples.

They belonged to the allies he’d trusted to guard their backs.

“Strange, isn’t it, my friend?”

His voice was low.

After three days at death’s door, Hyeoncheon had barely recovered from his injuries. He’d thought then:

Why?

Why, at the very moment he’d vowed revenge with the bitterness of chewing bear gall,[3733] had they come to mind?

The Black Night King, Sima Gong. The Roaring Fury Swordsman, Song Il. The Taeeul Merciless Sword, Hwangbo Eom.

And the many leaders of Gansu who were little more than the Black Dragon Demon Gate’s servants.

[3733] Chewing bitter gall recalls an East Asian allusion to keeping a resolve for revenge alive.

Why did fire rise deep in his chest whenever he recalled each face and name the woman had revealed from behind her silver-white veil?

In the end, Hyeoncheon had found an answer.

He had come here with the surviving Disciples to confirm it with his own eyes.

And now, before he could begin his revenge, a young man had come to him of his own accord.

"Boy of the Sama family."

His way of speaking had changed.

His voice was steady, edged with iron, but cold flames burned in the old Daoist's eyes.

"Bring me your father. There's something I must confirm before I draw my sword."

Rumble.

The ground trembled faintly.

Sama Pyo looked down in silence at the ripples spreading across a pool of blood. Then he raised his head, which had remained bowed all this time, and spoke.

"He's already gone. To a distant place from which he can never return."

"…!"

Perfected Being Hyeoncheon's eyes flew open.

So did the eyes of the Kongtong Sect Disciples surrounding Sama Pyo, their suffocating killing intent still bearing down on him.

They understood at once what he meant.

He was dead.

The Black Night King, Sima Gong.

The enemy they should have put to death with their own hands. The traitor whose crimes cried out to heaven.

And Sima Gong wasn't the only traitor to meet that fate.

"Sect Leader!"

A grief-stricken cry rang out from somewhere.

A Kongtong Sect Disciple closed a distance of well over a hundred yards in an instant, moving like an arrow. His face was streaked with grief and fury as he threw himself down before Hyeoncheon.

"They… those men…!"

Before his cry could give way to sobs, Hyeoncheon turned.

In the distance, he saw the Zhongnan Sect's flag rising at an angle.

Or rather, the two pieces of white cloth tied to its pole, fluttering weakly.

"A mourning flag…!"

At the anguished whisper that slipped through someone's clenched teeth, the qi surrounding them surged violently.

The white cloth signaled someone's death. Then there was the reaction of the Disciple who had just returned.

The meaning was clear.

The Roaring Fury Swordsman, Song Il, and the Taeeul Merciless Sword, Hwangbo Eom.

The two Zhongnan Sect traitors they'd meant to punish after Sima Gong were gone too.

Gone somewhere no movement technique could reach: the afterlife.

"Dead? You're telling me they're dead? Just like that?"

Grrk.

Hyeoncheon bit his lip.

The flesh split and blood flew, but that pain was nothing beside the agony in his chest, which felt ready to burst.

"How… how dare they…!"

Hyeoncheon flew into a rage.

Despite his still-healing body, his immense qi pressed down all around him. Even the Kongtong Sect Disciples nearby had to hold their breath.

Only Sama Pyo stood his ground.

"I'll take his place."

He barely forced the words out as he endured the Supreme Peak master's qi with his whole body. Hyeoncheon's gaze darkened.

"What did you say?"

"I said I'll take his place. I'll accept the punishment my sinful father owes for what he's done."

Silence fell. Sama Pyo bowed his head to everyone, Hyeoncheon included, and went on.

"I know how presumptuous that is. I know my insignificant life can't make up for the grievances of those who are gone."

He was right.

A person's heart couldn't simply be filled whenever it was emptied.

Nothing could fill a hole once it had been torn open.

You could keep putting things into it, trying to forget. Or you could look at the hole that remained no matter how much you put in and remember.

What had vanished because of a single mistake. The regret of losing it.

That was why Sama Pyo stood here. Why he wanted to walk a different path from his father.

"An eye for an eye. A tooth for a tooth. Death for death."

In Murim, a blood debt between martial artists could only be repaid with blood.

"Strike me down. I won't hold it against you."

And at that moment—

Shing.

A dazzling flash burst from the sword at Perfected Being Hyeoncheon’s waist.

Chapter 1059

For me and everyone else, it lasted only an instant.

For someone, though, it might have felt unbearably slow and suffocating—a moment in a life flashing before their eyes.

Shing.

The sound of sharp steel slipping from its scabbard was so faint it raised goose bumps. The sword had been drawn with near-perfect skill.

Not a hair's breadth off. Just the right force, at just the right speed.

And…

A clear path, following its master's will as the blade cut diagonally across its target.

Shhk!

The distance was too short to dodge. The gap in their martial prowess was too great.

And Sama Pyo had quietly closed his eyes without even trying to evade, as if accepting his fate.

Nothing unexpected happened. The sword light flashed through that split second, scattering red flowers into the air.

Shwaaa!

Time started moving again.

Beyond Sama Pyo's staggering back, a fountain of blood shot high into the air, searing itself into everyone's vision.

The Kongtong Disciples nearby. The Fire Dragon Pavilion members and me.

And someone else, too, who had been doing everything in their power to hold back the urge to rush over.

"No!"

Taishan had watched everything unfold around Sama Pyo with mounting anxiety. That was as long as his patience could last.

With a thunderous shout that rang out on every side, the nine-foot-tall giant set down the poor old man riding on his shoulders as if tossing him aside. Then he shot forward faster than I'd ever seen him move.

Whoosh!

The wind roared around him, but his path was perfectly straight.

Before anyone could stop him, Taishan hurtled like a cannonball toward Sama Pyo's back as Sama Pyo staggered backward.

He didn't seem to care one bit about the Kongtong Disciples who had surrounded Sama Pyo, as if to box him in.

"You bastard!"

“Stop right there!”

Papat!

Shouts erupted from every direction, and figures blurred into motion.

Dozens of Kongtong Disciples moved with elusive speed to block Taishan’s path. Each raised a weapon and aimed it at him.

Their blades were slick with blood. And as if to show how they had survived the brutal, desperate battle at Dunhuang, every one of those blades gleamed with Sword Energy—proof that its wielder had reached the level of injuring others with Sword Energy.

But the two-section staff in Taishan’s hands bore the same light. Even with dozens of Peak Masters blocking his way, he only charged faster.

“Raaaargh!”

Tiger Giant Child.

True to his epithet, Taishan was usually as innocent as a child. But his inborn strength and martial prowess were those of a beast.

Roaring like an enraged tiger, he swung his two-section staff with all his might. A tremendous gale swept along with it.

Whoooosh!

Even a hardened Murim veteran would have felt a chill run down their spine at that terrifying whistle through the air.

But the Kongtong Disciples didn’t take a single step back.

Instead, they met Taishan’s menacing charge with dazzling sword light.

Shwiiing!

Killing intent filled the space in an instant.

The two-section staff crushing through the wind. The blades cutting through it.

Into that life-or-death moment, I took one forceful step.

Shhk.

One step.

That was enough.

Several yards vanished, and the scene around me changed.

I had already slipped between Taishan and the Kongtong Disciples. Without hesitation, I thrust out both palms.

Bang!

Compressed air exploded. A hot blast from the Flame Divine Palm, held back as much as I could manage, burst from my palms and drove everything apart.

The weapons being swung at one another—and the people holding them.

Clatter!

Weapons flew into the air without reaching their targets. Their wielders stumbled backward, swaying like reeds in the wind.

"…!"

"…!"

Dust rose from the blood-soaked ground. Through it, I looked at the bewildered faces of the men forced back and spoke in a tired, flat voice.

"Do you all have energy to burn? Take it down a notch."

Before anyone could answer, I turned to Perfected Being Hyeoncheon, who had watched the sudden clash in silence.

"Apologies for the late greeting. We met once before in Henan."

Perfected Being Hyeoncheon had briefly met me at the Mount Song Resolution, where the new Murim Alliance was first formed. He gave a slight nod.

"It's been a while, my friend Jin."

A corner of my heart ached.

Our acquaintance had lasted less than fifteen minutes, but it still hurt.

The old Daoist who had once praised my martial arts with a kind voice and laugh, like my own grandfather, was nowhere to be found.

Perfected Being Hyeoncheon's voice was as dry and brittle as grains of desert sand. Traces of grief and anger remained around his mouth.

His sword trembled in his wrinkled hand.

Blood dripped slowly from the tip of the treasured blade he had likely carried all his life. Perhaps he still hadn't managed to put those feelings aside.

"Pavilion Master! What are you doing? Move aside, now!"

Right. That guy was here too.

Taishan's shout pulled me out of the feelings I'd sunk into. He had adjusted his grip on his two-section staff and was stepping forward again, so I stopped him.

In my own rough way.

Thump!

My fist drove straight into his abdomen. The nearly nine-foot giant doubled over like a shrimp and went rigid.

Taishan drew in a startled breath. Staring at me wide-eyed, he forced out a few words.

"P-Pavilion Master…"

"Cool your head."

I brought the edge of my hand down on the back of his neck without hesitation.

Thud.

His skin and bones were so thick that even a Pressure-Point Strike looked unlikely to work. But overwhelming force was another matter.

The sound of him falling was like a bear hitting the ground. Silence followed.

The Fire Dragon Pavilion members who arrived a moment later, and the Kongtong Disciples who had been about to charge Taishan again, stared at me in bewilderment.

Everyone except Perfected Being Hyeoncheon, who watched with a somber gaze.

“I’d heard there was a giant tiger beside the young Black Dragon… He’s as strong as they say. Loyal, too.”

Perfected Being Hyeoncheon looked at Sama Pyo, who still lay motionless.

“You have a better subordinate than he looks. Wouldn’t you agree?”

“He’s as dumb as he is big, but he’s a good guy. And…”

I added bitterly, “The friend you showed mercy to is a much better man than you think, Sect Leader.”

“…!”

“…!”

The air around us gave a sharp, electric shiver.

Those who understood what I meant widened their eyes at once, as if on cue. Perfected Being Hyeoncheon closed his eyes without a word.

As though trying to wipe away the urge to kill still lingering in his heart.

“Do you… regret it?”

I broke the silence and looked at him.

From the moment he had drawn his sword and swung it, I’d known instinctively.

There had been conflict in that perfect draw, but not the slightest trace of killing intent.

That the old Daoist’s sword would never take someone’s life.

That was why I hadn’t stepped in.

His wavering sword tip had cut shallowly into Sama Pyo’s flesh, but I could tell it was because of that last bit of conflict.

“Regret it? Of course I do.”

“Then why?”

“His eyes. I saw those eyes.”

Perfected Being Hyeoncheon suddenly opened his eyes. He looked up at the Kongtong Sect flag fluttering above his head and continued.

“They were like my Disciples’ eyes when I last saw them in Dunhuang. Deep and upright. Unbowed even before death. Those were their eyes.”

Some say a person’s eyes are the windows and mirrors of the heart.

Perhaps that was why the old Daoist, who had come here seeking revenge, could not bring himself to kill his enemy’s son, even when the young man had come to him seeking death.

“I’m nothing but an old Daoist. I spent my life absorbed in the sword rather than the Daoist scriptures, and I couldn’t save my Disciples as they bled and died. But…”

A hot breath passed between his trembling lips.

“Someone I met recently said this to me. If you take a person’s life for no reason except that they share your enemy’s blood, what is that if not the Demonic Path?”

I understood.

Though Perfected Being Hyeoncheon was speaking to me, his words were meant for every Kongtong Disciple.

Splat.

A sword slipped from someone’s hand and fell into a pool of blood.

Only moments ago, the Disciples had radiated suffocating killing intent. Now they stared at one another with vacant eyes.

As if the sight of their fellow Disciples, drenched in blood from head to toe, showed them what they themselves had been doing: hunting down the enemies who had survived and slaughtering them like livestock.

They swallowed their tears.

In silence, they struggled to hold back the emotions stirred by the beloved faces passing before their eyes.

“We will have our revenge. But guilt by association will have no place in it. The Kongtong Sect we build anew from this day forward must be that way.”

Perfected Being Hyeoncheon made his declaration to every surviving Disciple.

The tower they had painstakingly built had fallen. They would build it again on bedrock.

And no innocent blood would stain the bedrock beneath that stronger tower.

Then he looked at his Disciples with tear-filled eyes and said, “Cry your hearts out. These may be your last tears today.”

I quietly closed my eyes and shut out the sound.

Every member of the Fire Dragon Pavilion did the same, as did the others who had belatedly noticed the commotion and come over.

The anguished wails and sobs filled the air. There was no way not to hear them, however hard we tried.

But it didn’t matter.

No one on this battlefield, covered in countless corpses and pools of blood, would hear or remember their crying.

Or perhaps…

Maybe everyone was already crying together.

Tap.

At the familiar touch of a hand on my shoulder, I wiped my damp eyes with my sleeve.

“Old Master.”

“I was worried I might be late, but it seems I worried for nothing.”

I turned. Jeok Cheongang and the Bow Saint stood there. They had disappeared somewhere around the time the shouts of victory began to ring out.

No—strictly speaking, they weren't the only ones there.

"Ugh… sob… sob!"

A man was weeping as though his heart would break.

He also smelled worse than anything I'd encountered in my life. I'd spent years being worked like a dog in Gates where just standing still made me gag, but even I had never smelled anything like him.

The strange man suddenly held out a hand to me.

What the hell?

I blinked, my tears already gone, when the oddball grabbed my hand, yanked me close, and wrapped me in a tight embrace. Then he began to sob miserably.

"Waaah! Ooohhh!"

No, seriously. What was going on?

After my brain stalled for a moment, and whatever tears had been about to come out disappeared completely, I asked, "…Um, who exactly are you?"

Jeok Cheongang answered without hesitation.

"Madman."

"What?"

"Some vicious-looking mounted bandits call him Great Sir, too."

"…!"

Chapter 1060

Great Sir.

An unidentified Supreme Peak master. No one knew his name or anything about him.

About a dozen years ago, he had subdued the lawless Ningxia Province in a single stroke, then defied everyone's expectations by settling into a life of idleness. My first impression of this extraordinary man was:

He looks like a beggar.

That wasn't just a figure of speech. He really did.

His hair and beard were so long they covered his face and reached his waist. Worse, they were matted together.

His clothes were torn and stained in so many places that "rags" would have been more accurate. And the stench coming off his grime-caked body was innovative—no, revolutionary.

A beggar among beggars.

An utter pauper. The king of beggars.

Even Gung Gibang, the Beggars' Sect's Successor Beggar and a bona fide minor chief among its hundred thousand beggars, would take one look at this man and cry, "You beg like shit!" I could guarantee he'd cut the rope tied around his waist.

And yet…

"So this really is the beggar everyone's heard about—or, I mean, the Great Sir?"

"Hard as it is to believe, it's all true."

The Bow Saint answered in a nasal voice. She was already standing well away, pinching her nose shut.

That was when—

"Greeeaat Siiiir! Why did you take so long to come?!"

With a plaintive wail, Ma Junggeol, eldest of the Seven Masters of Baekma Bang, came sprinting from far off and threw his arms around the strange man.

Or, more accurately, he tried to hug him, then recoiled as if burned and doubled over like a shrimp.

"Ugh. Blegh."

"…"

Yeah, I understood.

I'd spent enough time rolling around in Gates to be able to stand there and take it. Even now, the stench was bad enough to make me wonder if it could really be coming from a human body.

Of course, even I was reaching my limit.

"Wait, just—give me a little space. Why are you doing this when we've only just met?"

My initial shock didn't last long.

I desperately breathed through my mouth to block out as much of the smell as possible, then tried to push the man away. But his legs were planted deep in the ground like a thousand-geun[3734] boulder. He didn't budge.

Looking at that, he really does seem to be the Great Sir…

Even though I'd held back, my strength was so far beyond ordinary limits that even a decent Peak master would have struggled to withstand it.

My head understood. My heart didn't.

It was like finding out that Kim, the homeless guy who ruled the second exit at Seoul Station, was actually the chairman of a major corporation.

But seriously, why are you crying so hard?

As I stood there, unsure what to do and darting my eyes around, the strange man—no, the Great Sir—who'd been wailing in my arms finally spoke in a congested voice.

"Ahem. Ahem. Forgive me. It was such a moving moment that I couldn't help crying."

I looked down at the front of my chest, soaked and sticky, and corrected him.

"I don't think tears were the only thing coming out."

"My nose was running, too."

I could understand tears and a runny nose, but why he had to let them both out while clinging to me was beyond me. Still, I nodded, summoning the bare minimum of patience and respect for my elder.

"Uh, sure. So you're feeling better now?"

"Thanks to you, I've calmed down a little. Do you mind if I blow my nose?"

"You really do everything, don't you?"

"Hmm? What was that?"

"Nothing. Go ahead."

"Thank you."

The Great Sir thanked me in a guileless voice, then blew his nose with a sound that seemed to clear out his entire head.

Phaaaang!

Into the hem of my clothes.

"Whew, that feels much better… Why are you making that face?"

"…"

Ah.

[3734] A Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb); a thousand geun is about 600 kg (1,320 lb).

I was really about to snap.

To sum it up, even with half my sanity gone, I somehow managed not to punch the Great Sir in the head.

Starting a fight in the middle of a battlefield that hadn't been fully secured yet would have been unwise. More than that, Perfected Being Hyeoncheon had quickly grasped what was happening and stepped in.

"Here you are, Great Sir."

Anyone would have found the sight surprising. No, astonishing.

Who was Perfected Being Hyeoncheon?

The Sect Leader of the Kongtong Sect, one of the Nine Sects and One Gang; a hero of the Great Faction War; and a Supreme Peak master representing Gansu.

If we were talking about the Marine Corps, he'd be a legendary first-class veteran who'd taken part in the Incheon Landing Operation.[3735] He had the seniority to stand in the middle of the world and shout, "Everyone below me and above you, fall in!"

And yet this man, whose standing in Murim and martial prowess both ranked among the highest in the world, was the first to offer a fist-and-palm salute with the utmost respect.

To a strange man who looked worse than even the Beggars' Sect leader.

It was enough to make Jeok Cheongang, watching from nearby, mutter:

"What the hell does he have on him…?"

For that moment, I had more or less the same thought.

Maybe the filthy-looking fellow had a video file titled something like Kongtong's Perfected One H and His Secret Hand Games.

But there was a reason anyone could understand why Perfected Being Hyeoncheon would show such respect to a strange man followed by a bunch of former mounted bandits.

"This Great Sir was of tremendous help to us."

The story went like this.

After their defeat at Dunhuang, Perfected Being Hyeoncheon and the Kongtong Sect survivors had no idea where to go.

They had to flee east to avoid Dark Heaven's forces gathering like clouds in the west. But now that they felt betrayed by their allies, heading east would have been like walking straight into a tiger's jaws.

So they chose to go north, toward the grasslands.

[3735] The Incheon Landing Operation was a September 1950 amphibious assault during the Korean War.

“We considered turning south for Qinghai, but we had no idea what Dark Heaven might already have done there. We had no choice but to head for the grasslands, where far fewer people lived.”

Though Qinghai lay at the far edge of the Central Plains, there were still plenty of eyes watching from every direction.

The grasslands, by contrast, were vast and sparsely populated, making them better for evading pursuit. If Dark Heaven had reached both places, anyone would have chosen the latter.

“We kept heading north without rest. Even after passing Anxi and entering the grasslands, we couldn’t let our guard down. We thought we might pause long enough to recover, then see what was happening in Gansu. Or perhaps cross the grasslands and go all the way to Shaanxi.”

But for the Kongtong Disciples, already suffering injuries both serious and minor from the fierce battle at Dunhuang, it was a grueling march.

Even Perfected Being Hyeoncheon, who had to lead them all, had reached his limit from a severe Internal Injury.

“Still, we couldn’t stop. Miserable and unsure what lay ahead, we had no choice but to keep moving. Then, after several days on the road, we saw a light flickering in the distance one night.”

The nights on the grasslands were deep and silent.

For the fugitives crossing that endless expanse, any light in the dark was something to be wary of.

“We crept closer, keeping as quiet as we could. A strange man was roasting camel meat. It was the first food we’d seen in four days, and we were all half out of our minds.”

Hyuk Mujin had drifted closer at some point and was listening intently. He let out a low, “Ah.”

“Was that the beggar—sorry, the Great Sir?”

Perfected Being Hyeoncheon nodded.

“Indeed. He saw us shivering in the cold and invited us to sit with him without hesitation.”

“Now that’s generous. He even offered you food. No wonder you’re grateful, Sect Leader.”

The heartwarming story made the air around us feel a little warmer. Then Perfected Being Hyeoncheon spoke again.

“No, we didn’t get any.”

“What?”

“As soon as he saw us, he wolfed down all the meat and told us we could warm ourselves by the fire for a while before we went our separate ways.”

“…!”

"…!"

What the hell?

Everyone's eyes turned toward the Great Sir, mine included. He bashfully smoothed his wild, tangled hair.

"I only had enough for myself at the time…"

The air turned cold again. Perfected Being Hyeoncheon continued.

"Regardless, the Great Sir helped us greatly. He gave every Disciple of our sect, myself included, a place to hide for a while and treated the wounded."

A master could recognize another master.

At first, Perfected Being Hyeoncheon had been wary of the unidentified Supreme Peak master, but he hadn't had any other real options. Before long, he'd come to feel the man's sincere goodwill.

"While we were there, we also had an unexpected visitor."

"An unexpected visitor?"

"At first, we thought the enemy had found our hideout and come to attack. But that wasn't it. It turned out some men called the Seven Masters of White Bones had come to escort the Great Sir."

"The Seven Masters of Baekma Bang," Ma Junggeol interjected through gritted teeth.

"Oh, I must have mixed that up. The Black-Horse Seven?"

"I said the Seven Masters of Baekma Bang! Honestly, this is driving me insa—"

Bap!

I smacked Ma Junggeol on the back of the head without question or explanation and shut him up. Then I looked around.

Quite a few riders were moving across the battlefield on snorting horses.

They wore relatively light leather armor and carried weapons such as lances and crescent-bladed polearms. Now I could finally be sure who they were.

"Then could those people be…?"

"You're thinking of the right people. They're the horse caravans of Ningxia Province."

Ma Junggeol, grimacing as he rubbed the back of his head, spoke in a tiny voice.

"More precisely, the horse caravans centered around Baekma Bang… Gah!"

He clamped his mouth shut when our eyes met. But this time, instead of hitting him, I patted him on the shoulder.

The Seven Masters of Baekma Bang had promised a few days ago that they would bring the Great Sir back. They'd returned with the horse caravans under their command, and thanks to them, we'd been able to deal a decisive, fatal blow to the enemies who were on the verge of collapse.

So that's how this worked out.

I'd more or less forgotten they existed.

Or perhaps it would be more accurate to say I hadn't expected much from them.

You always had to prepare for the worst in a battle, and the horse caravans, made up of former mounted bandits, weren't exactly people you could trust.

But they had kept the promise they made to me, even if they were a little later than planned. And with the Great Sir's help, Perfected Being Hyeoncheon and the Kongtong Disciples had recovered from their injuries and returned to Gansu alongside thousands of horse-caravan riders.

Still, one question remained.

So who the hell is that guy, really?

I looked at the man they called the Great Sir, my eyes full of questions.

A moment ago, he'd clung to me and sobbed as if we were reuniting with a long-lost family. Now he was yawning widely just because the story had gotten a little long. As expected, he seemed far from sane.

Just as Ma Junggeol and his sworn brothers had told me.

Quietly, secretly, I reached out toward the Great Sir.

With a hand of detection, invisible and granted to me alone.

Skill: Activate Qi Sense.

Whoooooosh.

The blue circle spread outward from me and finally reached the Great Sir.

Chapter 1061

Jin Taekyung had two kinds of Qi Sense.

One was the Qi Sense he had honed as a martial artist, a means of survival.

The other was Qi Sense granted by the System as a separate Skill.

The first worked as naturally as breathing, even in everyday life. The second required him to activate the System with a clear intention and goal.

Back when I was weak, I had no choice but to rely on the Qi Sense Skill.

Though he'd used it far less often since his martial arts had reached a certain level, the Qi Sense Skill remained incredibly useful.

Especially when he wanted a closer look at someone whose identity he didn't know.

Skill: Activate Qi Sense.

The moment Jin Taekyung gave the command in his mind, the blue circle of [Qi Sense], now at nine stars, shot outward.

Shwaaash.

The ability made no sound and had no visible form. Only a faint ripple betrayed it, one that a tiny handful of masters at the highest realms could sense.

And it offered another way to determine the identity of the strange man called Great Sir.

If the Skill succeeds, I'll find out exactly who he is. If it fails, I won't lose anything.

Of course, the Qi Sense Skill wasn't all-powerful.

Masters beyond its limits might have their Levels displayed as question marks. Some could sense the ripple when the Skill activated and immediately deflect it.

During their first meeting, Jeok Cheongang had even controlled his qi to make his Level appear absurdly low.

What mattered to Jin Taekyung now was how this beggar-looking Supreme Peak master would react—and what the Skill he'd already activated would tell him.

Who the hell are you?

Jin Taekyung watched him closely.

The wild-haired oddball scratched vigorously at his greasy head, looking so unconcerned that Jin Taekyung couldn't tell whether he had no idea what was happening or was pretending not to.

Then the blue circle that might lift the veil around the man finally reached him.

At the same time, a familiar alert sounded in Jin Taekyung's ear.

Beep-beep!

The sharp noise announced failure. Jin Taekyung knew what that meant.

He's a master. His Level is higher than mine.

But he wasn't shaken.

He'd learned firsthand, more times than he cared to count, that Level was no absolute measure of strength.

Level could reliably distinguish the strong from the weak up to First Rate, or perhaps Peak. Masters beyond those realms were different.

Even back when he was at the Peak realm, Jin Taekyung had won fight after fight against enemies dozens of Levels higher than himself. A Level difference meant especially little to him.

Yet even he was left speechless by the line that appeared before his eyes.

> System Skill Qi Sense was half successful!

"…Huh?"

The question slipped out before he knew it.

That wasn't quite what the failure alert had told him. He blinked at the message.

Success was success, and failure was failure. What the hell was half successful?

Wait. Now that I think about it, that failure alert did sound a little strange…

Before he could finish the thought, the oddball whipped his head around as though he'd only just noticed something unusual.

"Huh? I thought a strange wind blew over from your direction just now. Did you feel it too?"

Jin Taekyung didn't answer.

No—he couldn't answer. He was too busy staring at something unlike anything he'd seen since gaining the ability to use the System.

> System Lv. 119 ???

Three question marks.

That was all.

He rubbed his eyes with his sleeve and blinked hard several times. The question marks remained where the man's name should have been.

…Has this ever happened before?

He already knew the answer.

No.

Not once. Ever.

He'd seen plenty of Levels displayed as question marks, but never a name.

Everyone had a name, whether it was an alias used to hide their identity or the real one someone had given them at birth.

But Great Sir—the oddball before him—didn't.

The sheer strangeness of it left Jin Taekyung with no choice but to ask.

“What the hell are you?”

Bewilderment and a hint of suspicion came through in his abrupt question. Everyone around them looked at Great Sir at once, as if on cue.

His tone had been rude enough to draw a rebuke. Yet even Perfected Being Hyeoncheon and the Kongtong Disciples, who owed Great Sir so much, forgot to give him one.

They’d spent days and nights with their strange benefactor without learning who he was. They wanted to know at least a little about him.

The Fire King, the Bow Saint, and the members of the Fire Dragon Pavilion were no different.

A Supreme Peak master who’d spent more than a decade holed up in some remote corner of Ningxia Province was bound to make people curious.

With all those eyes on him, Great Sir calmly asked, “Hm? Were you asking me?”

“Yeah. You.”

“Oh, that’s a very good question.”

Great Sir scratched at his grime-streaked neck. Yellowed teeth showed between his long locks as he beamed.

“Come to think of it, we haven’t even introduced ourselves. Let me do it properly. I’m…”

The surroundings had gone deathly quiet.

Hundreds of pairs of eyes fixed on his lips as they slowly parted.

“Cough. All this dust has made my throat scratchy. Let me start again. I’m…”

His voice trailed off again after he cleared his throat. Everyone was about to go mad with curiosity.

Who could he be?

A reclusive master whose name of three syllables had yet to become known?

A master of the previous generation, long forgotten by the world?

Or perhaps… a former great fiend of the Demonic Cult who had turned over a new leaf?

As their guesses multiplied, Great Sir continued in a grave voice.

“Uh. So, I’m…”

“You bastard, you’re the biggest piece of shit under heaven!”

Jeok Cheongang, halfway out of his mind after hearing “I’m” for the third time, rolled his eyes and started forward. At that very moment, Great Sir let out a cry as though he’d attained some great enlightenment.

“That’s it! I think that’s it!”

“No matter how far the ways of the martial world have fallen, how can you pull this kind of dogshit—what?”

Jeok Cheongang stopped mid-step. Great Sir clapped his hands and shouted again.

“What you said just now! I think you’ve got it! Madman—that must be my name!”

“…?”

“…?”

A suffocating silence fell.

Every last person stared at Great Sir, then at one another. Their eyes exchanged the words no one said aloud.

What the hell?

Did I hear that wrong?

Madman? That’s someone’s name?

Does any of this make sense?

But no amount of exchanged looks changed the reality before them. Seized by a bewilderment he’d felt only a handful of times in his long life, Jeok Cheongang turned toward the person who’d already made him feel it several times.

His one and only Disciple.

“So… what sort of nonsense did that damned fool just spout?”

But, like his Master, his Disciple was just as incapable of fully understanding or accepting what was happening.

If anything, he was even more bewildered.

> System Lv. 119 Madman

“…”

Jin Taekyung stared blankly at the holographic window above Great Sir’s head.

What the hell?

It had changed. It definitely had.

But…

So what the hell does that mean?

Could he even call that a proper change? Or had the System developed an error?

Countless thoughts and regrets streaked through his mind like a meteor shower. Then someone he’d momentarily forgotten spoke up beside him.

“Good grief. I thought he’d gotten a little better, but here he goes again.”

Everyone turned toward the voice. The fearsome-looking, middle-aged former mounted bandit flinched.

“Uh, don’t mind him. He’s always like this.”

“Always?”

At Jin Taekyung's question, Ma Junggeol—once a mounted bandit in Ningxia Province, now the Chief of Baekma Bang and eldest of the Seven Masters of Baekma Bang—gave an uneasy nod.

"Well, yes. Didn't I tell you before?"

Jin Taekyung vaguely remembered Ma Junggeol saying Great Sir wasn't exactly normal.

"No, but still. What is this…?"

"A few months ago, when I went to see Great Sir where he was staying, do you know what his name was?"

"What?"

"Jeomsuni."

"…!"

"His name changes every time I visit. He's been Gaettong—Dog Poop—and Sottong—Cow Poop, too."

Jin Taekyung froze, unable to find a word to say. Great Sir suddenly drew a sharp breath and shouted.

"Gasp! Gaettong! Yes! I think it was Gaettong! I'm sure this time! Probably!"

Ding.

> System Lv. 119 Gaettong

At that moment, Jin Taekyung gave up on thinking.

Chapter 1062

No matter how easy a life someone leads, they're bound to meet a certain kind of madman at least once.

As for me, my life had been objectively rough—extremely rough—so that went without saying.

But I could say this with certainty:

Even I had never met anyone as purely insane as the oddball they called Great Sir.

…At this rate, should I start an encyclopedia of madmen?

I muttered to myself as I watched Great Sir's back slowly recede into the distance.

Unable to find his true identity as Gaettong, he'd moved on to Sottong (Cow Poop) and Malttong (Horse Poop), completing a trilogy of poop names. Then he'd tried switching genders and becoming Jeomsuni. Jeok Cheongang had threatened to kill him, and now the horse-caravan riders were dragging him away to keep him apart from everyone else.

"I swear on everything I have…"

Standing shoulder to shoulder with me, Jeok Cheongang watched Great Sir go. His voice was grave.

"That man is one of two things: a highly trained Dark Heaven spy, or completely and utterly insane."

Anyone who knew the circumstances would have nodded without thinking. I answered without hesitation.

"I doubt he's a spy."

"It's true that he led the horse caravans of Ningxia Province to help our side. But we mustn't trust him completely. You know that as well as I do, don't you?"

Of course I did. I'd been stabbed in the back often enough to be sick of it.

First the Head Elder of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, then even the Murong Family, one of the Five Great Families, had joined forces with Dark Heaven. Blindly trusting some unidentified Supreme Peak master who'd crawled out of who-knows-where would be stupid.

But…

"There's no reason we can't trust him if we have enough evidence."

"Evidence?"

At Jeok Cheongang's question, I barely moved my lips.

"System."

The brief Sound Transmission reached his ear, and his eyes widened.

I'd already told Jeok Cheongang what the System was, though the word meant nothing in this world. He lowered his voice.

"So what has that marvelous ability of yours told you?"

“He’s mad. Thoroughly mad.”

“Meaning he isn’t a spy?”

“Yes. I can’t say it with absolute certainty, though.”

“If you had to put a number on it?”

“Ninety-nine point nine percent. That’s the chance the madman—no, Great Sir—isn’t a spy.”

“Great Sir, my ass. He’s a lunatic.”

Jeok Cheongang frowned slightly and smacked his lips.

“You’re suspicious of everything, though it doesn’t suit you. If you’re saying this, you must be all but certain… So you think he truly suffers from madness?”

I hesitated, then nodded.

Even I, who thought I had a pretty good grasp of most of the System, had never encountered anything like this. I couldn’t be a hundred percent sure, but otherwise, there was no explaining why Great Sir’s name kept changing from one moment to the next.

At least he isn’t lying. Fooling the System is practically impossible, no matter what you try.

That left only one answer.

Gaettong, Sottong, Malttong, Jeomsuni—whatever the name, Great Sir firmly believed it was his, and the System reflected that belief.

In the purest sense of the word, he was mad.

“He’s dressed so badly that Myriad-Mile Pursuit, that head beggar, would weep. But he doesn’t look old enough to be suffering from the infirmities of old age… I haven’t the faintest idea where that stray cur came from.”

Jeok Cheongang had casually reduced the Beggars’ Sect Leader to “that head beggar.” He frowned, but even he had little chance of working out Great Sir’s identity on the spot.

Too many people remained hidden across the vast Nine Provinces and Eight Wastes, the Four Seas and Five Lakes.

Eccentrics in remote mountain valleys, far from the rest of the world. Heirs of secret sects who had chosen to be forgotten.

Fugitives and killers living quietly out of sight somewhere.

Jeok Cheongang himself had stayed shut away on Mount Jiuhua until he was nearly sixty, devoting himself entirely to martial arts. Great Sir might well be someone like him.

In fact, quite a few reclusive masters had joined the Murim Alliance since it was newly founded at the Mount Song Resolution.

Unlike Great Sir, of course, they must have been thoroughly vetted. The Murim Alliance wasn't a college club. This was wartime, with betrayal and intrigue everywhere.

But how should I put it?

A sudden conviction came over me, and before I knew it, I'd spoken aloud.

"Let's take him in as an ally."

"What?"

"Like I said, I don't think Great Sir is a Dark Heaven spy. No—I'm sure he isn't."

Jeok Cheongang looked at me in surprise. I sounded more certain than usual.

"Well, that's strange. What makes you trust that suspicious madman so much?"

"That's…"

I let the words trail off.

Honestly, I didn't know.

The System didn't tell me who was friend or foe. But alongside my curiosity about Great Sir, I felt a strangely strong conviction that this unidentified Supreme Peak master was not our enemy.

I couldn't give a reason for it, even to myself.

…Maybe I'm just exhausted.

As soon as I remembered how tired I was, my vision wavered. I looked around.

After half a day of fighting, the snowfield was covered in blood and bodies.

People were clearing the battlefield, the brief joy of victory already forgotten.

Birds had gathered in a black mass overhead, circling in the air.

Dark clouds hid the sky. The ground beneath them was red.

Through my wavering vision, it looked like a future that would repeat forever.

"Did we… really win?"

My voice came out faint. Jeok Cheongang answered.

"Yes. At least for today."

But why?

Why, after defeating more enemies than I could count, saving so many lives, and finally winning a great victory that had kept Gansu Province safe—

Why, when I was still alive and breathing—

It didn't feel like we'd won.

I wasn't happy at all.

Not even when a clear chime rang in my ears.

Ding, ding, ding.

> System Quest conditions have been met.
> Mission: Eliminate all enemies in the Gansu Province area (Complete).

> Quest Path of Blood successfully completed.
> You have acquired a massive amount of EXP and Fame.
> A new chain Quest has been created.
> Would you like to check the updated information?
> Y / N

I suddenly lifted my head.

Beyond the translucent holographic window, pitch-black clouds still hid the sky. I took a deep breath, and the air that sank deep into my body reeked of blood.

When would I finally be free of this sight?

How much more would I have to suffer, how many more deaths would I have to watch, before I could escape this horrible cycle?

But as always, I had no choice but to answer.

Accept.

It had been a cruel fucking day.

Crack. Crunch.

Beyond the faintly flickering candlelight, a pair of eyes watched a writhing shadow in silence as the gruesome sounds of tearing flesh filled the room.

At first glance, the eyes seemed so deeply sunk that it was impossible to guess what lay behind them. Even so, they held a trace of contempt and disgust—and that look remained even after the tearing sounds stopped.

The shadow's convulsions gradually subsided. At last, it rose and immediately voiced its displeasure.

"You bitch. What's with that look?"

It was a rough greeting after so long apart, but the woman paid it little mind.

She had always prided herself on being rational. She knew better than to expect a mere beast to show human courtesy.

That didn't mean she had anything kind to say to it.

"Wipe yourself off. And stop stinking up the place."

"What? I stink?"

At the woman's sharp words, the shadow started to reply, then gave a quiet laugh.

"Fine. I'll do as I'm told. You're already in a bad mood, aren't you?"

"…What nonsense are you talking about now?"

"Don't pretend you don't know when it doesn't suit you. Don't. It makes you look pathetic."

Swish.

Cloth slid over smooth muscle and skin.

In the darkness beyond the candlelight, the shadow wiped the blood from its body and spoke.

“Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung.”

“…!”

“I heard you nearly failed… So, how was it, you miserable bitch? You mocked me last time, but it wasn’t so easy when you had to face him yourself, was it?”

The Grand Sorceress silently bit her lip.

She had little room to argue. It was the truth.

When her silence dragged on, the shadow laughed aloud and continued.

“You should’ve been much more careful. I don’t care if you die, but you nearly caused a serious setback to the grand plan.”

The Grand Sorceress frowned at the continuing taunts and shot back.

“The same goes for you.”

“Isn’t it embarrassing to compare this with what happened then? I caused a bloodbath in the heart of the Central Plains with just a handful of idiots. Even squinting, you can see these are different matters.”

Step.

The shadow—no, the Blood Lord—chuckled as if to mock her, then stepped into the faint light.

“And I had an important item to secure on top of that.”

He had not shown himself since the Shaolin Bloodshed that shook the whole world. Now he crossed the spacious room with a jaunty stride.

He sat in a grand chair that bore the marks of centuries and gave off an inexplicable air of authority. Propping his chin on one hand, he gazed at the Grand Sorceress.

As if he were the ruler of a kingdom.

“Well, enough about the past. What matters is the present and the future. Don’t you agree?”

This time, the Grand Sorceress gave a quiet laugh.

She shook her head and stared at the Blood Lord sitting in the grand chair.

“Stop talking as if you’re someone important. You’re a stupid beast. No—a monster.”

“A monster, huh? To the people of the Central Plains, aren’t we as bad as each other?”

“No. Serving that person is the only thing we have in common. None of us is like you.”

Despite the contempt in her voice, the Blood Lord merely shrugged.

“True. That’s the first thing you’ve got right.”

"…What?"

The Grand Sorceress was taken aback by the response, which was nothing like what she'd expected. A smile, deep as blood, spread across the Blood Lord's lips.

"Of course none of you is like me. No one—not even you—has ever achieved as much as I have."

He laughed gleefully and stroked the grand chair.

More precisely, he stroked the two characters carved into part of it in a bold, vigorous hand.

Kunlun.

A whirling snowstorm swept past the jagged mountain peaks and crept into the Taiqing Hall, where the two of them faced each other.

Chapter 1063

People say that a rumor without feet can travel a thousand li[3736], while information with wings can reach tens of thousands of li away.

The information merchants of Murim held that saying up as a proverb, and it was no exaggeration.

Flap!

On the day dark clouds covered the sky and death claimed the land, dozens of messenger eagles took flight at once. It was quite a sight.

They left mountains of corpses and pools of blood behind, soaring high and beating their great wings toward separate destinations.

The red-stained snowfield shrank to a tiny drop of blood. The Great Snow Mountain Range, blanketed in eternal snow, disappeared from view.

The sun and moon traded places several times. Day gave way to night and night to day, until the ocher plateau that seemed to stretch to the ends of the world vanished beyond the horizon.

And at last, when the dozens of messenger eagles had each completed their journeys, the realm of the Central Plains seethed like lava in a crater.

“Waaaaah!”

“Long live the Great Nation! Long live His Majesty the Emperor!”

“What are you all doing? Come out! Hurry!”

The news reached different places at different times, but wherever people heard what had happened in Gansu Province, they rushed into the streets and cheered.

Even those roused from a sound sleep before dawn came out of their houses more bewildered than angry.

“Which goddamn fools are making a racket at this hour, when even the hens are fast asleep… Hey, you lot! What the hell are you doing carrying on in front of someone else’s house?”

On an ordinary day, sharp words like those would probably have led to people grabbing each other by the collars first and asking questions later.

But the crowd was too excited. Cheering loud enough to chase away the predawn darkness, they shouted back again and again.

“A great victory! A great victory!”

“What nonsense is that? I asked what you’re doing—wait. A great victory?”

“Good heavens, look at you. You haven’t heard the news yet, have you?”

“You haven’t heard? The rebels from Xinjiang invaded Gansu without knowing their place, and got wiped out to the last man!”

“What? They went after Gansu?”

[3736] A Chinese li is a traditional unit of distance, about 500 m (0.311 mi).

Only then did the newcomers' eyes widen. Highborn or lowborn, their shock was the same.

How could it not be?

Just a year ago, Dark Heaven was a name heard only among those with sharp eyes and ears. Now even a peasant scraping out a living in a remote village knew who they were.

The rebels of Xinjiang. Fiends from beyond the desert.

Even the Demonic Cult, which had unleashed the bloodshed known as the Great Faction War half a century ago, could not match Dark Heaven's infamy today.

The Demonic Cult of old had sought to conquer the Murim of the Central Plains. Dark Heaven sought to claim the world itself.

Defying heaven.

Those two characters said it all. Dark Heaven would overturn heaven, defy the natural order, and destroy the unified dynasty and the peace won after countless ages of turmoil.

That was Dark Heaven. And so the people of the Great Nation were still roaming the streets, cheering at that very moment.

"Good heavens, what wonderful news. But just how great a victory was it to get everyone worked up like this?"

At the question, which came from someone now thoroughly awake, a proud voice rose from the crowd.

"Don't be shocked. From what I hear, tens of thousands of rebels were killed or captured in a single battle."

"Gasp! Tens of thousands!"

The numbers were staggering—far beyond those of a mere cult—and so was the victory they represented. They had barely caught their breath when voices elsewhere in the crowd rose to contradict the claim.

"What nonsense! A martial artist I know told me they wiped out a hundred thousand in half a day."

"A hundred thousand? Wasn't it three hundred thousand?"

"What are you all talking about? I heard they crushed more than a million rebels!"

"Come on. There's a limit to how much nonsense a man can talk. A million?"

"Then let's split the difference and call it half a million. No, three hundred thousand."

"Three hundred thousand is still too many. Where did you hear that?"

"Are you with Dark Heaven? Can't you read the room?"

"Why has this suddenly become about—"

"So, are we going with three hundred thousand or not?"

"…Is that up to me?"

“Ah, three hundred thousand! Just so you know, I’m not budging any further!”

“A-all right. I’ll remember it as three hundred thousand. Just calm down.”

“Now we’re getting somewhere. Repeat after me: Long live the Great Nation!”

“L-long live the Great Nation.”

“Speak up! I can barely hear you!”

“L-long live!”

“Much better. Now, long live the Murim Alliance!”

“…When does this end?”

“We’re not done yet. After that comes long live the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon—no, the Marquis of Shangshan. Be ready.”

A few people were less than enthusiastic, but most common folk cheered the Murim Alliance just as freely.

It was a remarkable change in public opinion, even compared with only a few years ago.

The orthodox faction, led by the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families, had ruled the Murim of the Central Plains. But a long peace had brought corruption, and power had bred injustice.

Did wearing spotless white make the heart beneath it white too?

Still water eventually went foul. Perfect good and perfect evil existed nowhere.

But things were different now.

“Long live the Marquis of Shangshan!”

“Long live the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon!”

It was hard not to marvel at how much had changed because of one man.

Jin Taekyung.

His path, which had begun about two years ago, was as deep and immense as the footsteps of a giant.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan, once slowly crumbling, had become a power that ruled beyond Shanxi Province and across the northern grasslands. It had even joined the Five Great Families. And that was only a fraction of what he had achieved.

Jin Taekyung was the heir of the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, and the successor to the Fire Gate Clan. He was the young giant who had raised the banner of a new Murim Alliance alongside Murim’s most renowned leaders. With martial prowess scarcely believable for his age, he fought Dark Heaven as a man of righteousness.

There was no martial artist under heaven who did not know his name.

No one doubted or begrudged the meaning and weight of the four characters Blazing Flame Divine Dragon.

No. No one dared.

Jin Taekyung had proven himself, and countless people had seen it happen.

Nor was his standing confined within Murim’s iron fence.

“To all the people under heaven, hear this!”

The Son of Heaven.

The Son of Heaven, the great ruler who governed the land on heaven’s behalf, had proclaimed his mandate to the world.

The Emperor revealed every scheme Dark Heaven had carried out. He named his only surviving younger brother Imperial Younger Brother and heir apparent, declared the fiends beyond the desert traitors, and tore down in one stroke the solid wall that had stood between the government and Murim for ages.

His battering ram was none other than Jin Taekyung, the Marquis of Shangshan.

“By the command of the Son of Heaven, I order you: unite and fight! Protect your land from the rebels with supernatural powers who dare defy the natural order!”

And so the name Jin Taekyung resounded beyond Murim, echoing across the Nine Provinces and Eight Wastes, the Four Seas and Five Lakes.

To martial artists, he was the young giant who would lead a new era. To countless common folk, he was the guardian of the imperial court, the Great General of the realm who obeyed the Emperor’s solemn command and put down traitors.

A martial artist and, at the same time, a marquis personally appointed by the Emperor.

Nothing like it had ever happened in the Great Nation’s history—or anywhere else’s. Yet it was real, and the young hero fought at every moment to bring this terrible age of chaos to an end.

Now he had won again.

“Waaaaah!”

“The Great Nation and Murim have finally united to drive out the rebels! Isn’t it all thanks to His Majesty’s reign and the Marquis of Shangshan’s efforts?”

“On a day like this, there’s no way I’m not getting drunk. Bring me a jar of wine! No—three jars!”

The story swelled as it passed from mouth to mouth. Even without the embellishments, the victory was beyond dispute.

Taverns filled to capacity, and the revelers spilled into the streets, happily raising their cups with the victory in Gansu as their reason to drink.

They praised the Emperor, thanked Jin Taekyung and the Murim Alliance for risking their lives to protect the people of the realm, and took comfort in knowing that they and their loved ones were safe because of them.

They let themselves hope, however vaguely, that the war might soon end without much harm to anyone.

“Come on, drink! Hurry!”

“Down the hatch! That’s it!”

Laughter rang out everywhere. Amid the great feasts, there was not a trace of fear on anyone's face.

Martial artists and common folk alike laughed aloud and reveled in their victory.

For that one day, at least.

Until a peregrine falcon from the distant western frontier of Qinghai completed its weary journey.

When I was a kid, I used to be really disappointed if I couldn't remember a dream from the night before.

It must've been an exciting story, too.

But somewhere along the way, I learned that forgetting a dream meant I wouldn't have to shudder at the feeling a nightmare left behind.

Of course, it didn't mean I hadn't had the nightmare.

"Here."

I opened my eyes on a swaying saddle to find Hyuk Mujin's face in front of me. He was holding out a piece of cloth.

"…What's this?"

"What do you think? Take it. I can't wipe you down myself."

"Oh."

Only then did I feel my clothes clinging to me from head to toe. What the hell had I dreamed about to break out in this much cold sweat?

I know.

Since becoming a Hunter, my nightmares had usually featured one of two kinds of people.

People who'd died because I couldn't save them.

Or people who'd died by my hand.

Actually, there's been one more recently, for the first time in a while.

I remembered it suddenly.

A strange, unidentifiable dream.

Memories that could never have belonged to me, Jin Taekyung of Korea. Memories of a past lived by Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

I was wondering if the dream I'd just had had been like those when—

Screee!

A bird cried out somewhere above me, breaking my train of thought.

As if telling me to focus on the present instead of a dream that might as well have been an illusion.

Right. Now's not the time.

I gave my head a small shake and drew up the Scorching Yang Qi within me.

Whoosh. Crackle.

Steam billowed out, and my damp clothes dried in an instant. Hyuk Mujin's face flushed from the gentle warmth, and he muttered in a dazed voice:

"…Oh. Right. There's that way too."

"Sure. Unlike you."

"…Are you showing off?"

"Yeah."

"Well, when you admit it like that, there's not much I can say…"

Hyuk Mujin let his words trail off, still not quite satisfied. At that moment—

Screee!

The cry rang out again. I looked up at the sky without thinking.

My eyes widened.

"…!"

A blood-soaked missive was tied to the leg of a falcon gliding overhead, its great wings spread wide.

Chapter 1064

If they'd spotted it even a little later, the messenger eagle would have flown right over everyone's heads.

Even messenger eagles, raised with far more rigorous training and care than messenger pigeons, were only trained to fly between set destinations.

But a handful of people, Jin Taekyung among them, noticed it just in time. The Bow Saint was one of them.

When it came to archery, she was the greatest under heaven—perhaps even the greatest in all history.

Shing. Clack.

It happened in an instant.

Steel joints locked together with a metallic clack, transforming her two strangely curved swords into a bow. The Bow Saint drew the string without hesitation.

"Now!"

At Jin Taekyung's shout, she released the taut bowstring.

Boom!

The air tore apart.

A streak of light shot faster than sound and reached the messenger eagle, a distant speck in the sky, in the blink of an eye.

Jin Taekyung, who had anticipated all of this, shot forward at the same moment.

Whoooosh!

He surged ahead like a gust of wind.

In a single bound, he crossed dozens of jang[3737] and caught the falling eagle, an arrow through its wing.

Peep. Peep.

"Spit on it and it'll heal in no time, you idiot."

Despite his gruff words, Jin Taekyung stroked the mournfully crying eagle's beak. Then he hurriedly checked its leg.

This is…

He swallowed a groan. A missive had been rolled into a tight little bundle and fastened around the eagle's leg.

Foreboding struck before he'd even read it.

There was no doubt about the reddish substance smeared across the missive. It was blood, spilled from someone's body.

And in his experience, a premonition like this had never been wrong.

Kunlun fallen.

[3737] A jang is ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

The moment Jin Taekyung read the first line of the missive, scrawled in a rough hand, he bit down on his lip without realizing it.

The Kunlun Mountains.

This immense range at the western edge of Qinghai held an ancient history and countless legends.

Its ridges stretched for thousands of jang[3738], reaching plateaus and deserts. Its peaks rose high enough to deserve the name of the highest summits.

But the Kunlun Mountains held particular significance for the martial artists of the realm for another reason—one every bit as important as the Kunlun Sect, birthplace of Daoist martial arts and heir to a long history.

“So the pass we had to hold has been breached.”

Jeok Cheongang spat out the words. The missive, already passed through several hands, was crumpled in his fist.

“If what’s written here is true and they’ve occupied Kunlun, then we’ve effectively lost half of Qinghai.”

At his low words, everyone nodded, their faces grim.

Jeok Cheongang was right. Most of the area around the Kunlun Mountains consisted of basins, and that vast region covered nearly half of Qinghai Province. If the enemy held it, the allies had lost control of it.

“Must bring back old memories. Doesn’t it, you old hag?”

The Bow Saint frowned at Jeok Cheongang’s sudden question.

“That’s not something I want to hear from you. Whether you mean my age or the unpleasant memories of the Great Faction War.”

“So how was it at the start of the Great Faction War? When those Demonic Cult bastards crossed Kunlun.”

“It was an unexpected attack. The Demonic Cult’s last invasion before the Great Faction War had been hundreds of years earlier, and even then they’d been soundly defeated before they could cross the Kunlun Mountains. So of course we never expected it.”

But people always fixated on what they couldn’t have.

The Heavenly Demon, who had built the Demonic Cult into a force stronger than ever some fifty years ago, was no exception.

“How many days did the Kunlun Sect hold out back then?”

“Three. They fought for exactly three days and nights before they could hold out no longer and retreated. Their losses nearly destroyed them.”

[3738] A jang is ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

“Three days against a hundred thousand Demonic Cult bastards. They held out a long time.”

He wasn’t mocking them.

The Kunlun Sect had always accepted only a small number of Disciples because of its difficult location and strict rules. It had the fewest Disciples of the Nine Sects and One Gang.

Yet its Disciples were formidable, and the Kunlun Mountains were more treacherous than even the Great Snow Mountain. Together, those advantages had let the sect repel the Demonic Cult’s invasions time and again.

Even so, the Kunlun Sect had its limits.

During the Great Faction War half a century ago.

And now.

The difference was that this time, unlike in the last Great Faction War, when the Demonic Cult dealt the Kunlun Sect a devastating blow as soon as hostilities began, they had made a wiser choice.

“At least they decided to retreat right away. Isn’t that right?”

At Jeok Cheongang’s sudden question, I nodded. I’d been lost in thought.

“Even I think that was the best choice. Facing them head-on would’ve been insane.”

The Demonic Cult and Dark Heaven were different in kind.

I wasn’t talking about the quality or number of their troops. The darkness within Dark Heaven was far deeper and more boundless than anyone could imagine.

Even I couldn’t begin to guess its true size or depth.

But one thing was certain.

“If they’d decided to fight to the death like they did during the Great Faction War, the Kunlun Sect would already have been erased from the world.”

Maybe the Kunlun Sect had realized the battle was hopeless, too.

That would explain why they’d retreated so quickly despite having been joined by Qinghai’s martial artists and government troops—a combined force of some twenty thousand.

The missive said around a thousand people had been killed or wounded during the retreat, but that didn’t change the fact that retreat had been their best choice.

“Fortunately, they withdrew to Qinghai Lake with most of their forces intact. We haven’t lost all of Qinghai yet.”

Perfected Being Hyeoncheon, Sect Leader of the Kongtong Sect, had spoken up. I immediately shook my head.

“You’re not wrong, but at this rate, it’s only a matter of time. The forces left in Qinghai can’t hold them back.”

“That’s…”

"They have magic—no, dark arts with power that's hard to believe. And the Dark Heaven forces occupying the Kunlun Mountains are too numerous to count."

That wasn't a figure of speech or an exaggeration.

I was only repeating what was written in the missive carried by the messenger eagle I'd just caught.

In the missive sent when the decision to retreat was made, a Kunlun Sect Elder had written:

Enemies too numerous to count were filling the mountains and advancing toward them.

At the sight of that overwhelming, terrifying force, he had found himself thinking of a day decades ago.

"…The Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples."

The groan slipped from someone's lips, and the air grew heavy. It was only natural.

Most of those present had already seen it with their own eyes.

They'd felt it on their skin, in every part of their bodies.

Most of the people here had seen and experienced Dark Heaven wield supernatural powers.

They must have felt despair and defeat as they watched a sight that tore down every assumption they'd ever held.

And now there were a hundred thousand.

Even if fear had gripped the Elder who wrote the missive, an army that brought the Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples to mind couldn't be far off in size.

And someone I know is probably among them.

Though we'd met only briefly, one unforgettable face passed before my eyes.

The Grand Mage.

No—the Grand Sorceress.

I couldn't be certain, but I felt it in my gut. She had survived, and if she had, she would be in Qinghai by now.

If Qinghai falls, there'll be no containing this.

Not just because it was Qinghai. Gansu, which we'd barely managed to protect, was in much the same position.

The realm was one enormous dam. A small crack, and the gap it opened, could bring the whole thing down.

We need time. Time to find a better way to stop them without taking even greater losses.

A headache came on.

But once again, time wasn't on my side.

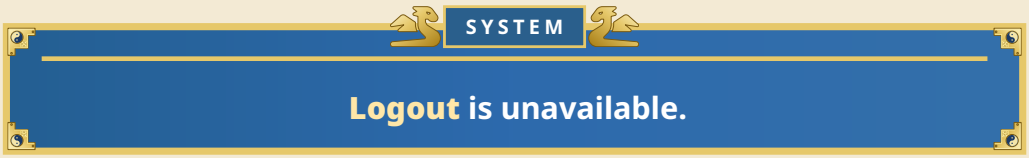
Or rather, not time. The System.

Logout.

I carefully repeated the word in my mind, holding on to a sliver of hope.

The System's answer was calm and cold.

Beep.



"...Damn it."

Everyone's attention snapped to me at the curse that escaped on instinct, but I didn't care.

No. The situation was so fucked I couldn't spare a thought for their stares.

Why?

I'd already spent months in Murim and faced death several times over.

But at some point, the System had shut the door tight and refused to open it.

It blocked my only way back to the modern world, forcing new Quests and a brutal reality on me instead.

Just as it had a few days ago, when we'd finally brought the long, cruel battle at the Great Snow Mountain to an end.

Just as it was doing now.

Crack.

I stared at the holographic window floating before me and swallowed the curse that sprang to my lips.

And, in a stroke of good luck amid all this misfortune, I cursed the System for tossing me a clue like alms in the form of a new Quest title. Then I spoke to a certain lunatic, who was the only one there nodding off like a sick chicken in the middle of this dire situation.

"You said you'd guide us, right?"

"Huh? Yeah?"

Only then did Great Sir blink blearily awake. He wiped the drool from his mouth and spoke in a sleepy voice.

"I think I did say that... So, have you decided where you're going?"

"Yes."

I straightened my back and looked around.

We had all paused here, in the Qilian Mountains. After several days of travel, we'd reached the far end of the range, where a new land awaited us.

Qinghai. Strange and dangerous.

"Let's go."

At my quiet words, everyone's eyes lit up, and they rose to their feet.

Chapter 1065

Losing a battle meant the end.

Especially in a large-scale engagement, with tens of thousands clashing head-on.

The survivors on the losing side had only two possible fates: become prisoners or run to the ends of the earth.

They couldn't choose between them. They couldn't refuse them.

The victors were different.

So, three days ago, just after the bloody battle around the Great Snow Mountain ended in a crushing victory for our side, we were given a new choice.

Would we deal with the aftermath and stay to protect Gansu Province? Or would we move to stop the Dark Heaven forces advancing somewhere else?

We chose the latter.

No—more accurately, everyone respected my wishes.

"I'll be leaving now. There's something I have to do."

The snowfield was covered in flames and smoke that day.

The fire, consuming tens of thousands of corpses, burned as if it would never go out. And my sudden announcement must have felt unbearably cruel to those watching the scene, their tears falling without end.

Yet even though I'd denied them the time to grieve, they didn't blame me.

Not one of them.

Only Perfected Being Hyeoncheon, the Sect Leader of the Kongtong Sect, stepped forward with a question.

"Where do you intend to go?"

My answer had been decided from the start.

The System had already pointed the way to our next destination with a Quest as clear as a compass.

"Qinghai. Qinghai."

"Which means…"

"Yes. They're coming."

I spoke with a certainty I couldn't explain, but Perfected Being Hyeoncheon didn't ask why. He only nodded, his expression grave.

"The world will be stained with blood once more."

"It will. Without a doubt."

"If we win another great victory against them there, do you think we can bring this accursed war to an end?"

"We'll be one step closer. And the step we take this time will be bigger and deeper than any before it."

“Deep enough to reach the Lord of Heaven?”

“I believe so.”

“Then the Kongtong Sect will stand with you.”

“…!”

“We won’t stop until we reach the end. If only for the sake of the souls who must now be under the care of the Primordial Heavenly Venerable[3739], beyond those clouds.”

If Perfected Being Hyeoncheon had been giving off the same killing intent he’d shown while slaughtering the surviving Dark Heaven followers, I would have refused his offer.

But the old Daoist had lost so much, and his eyes were clear. The same was true of the Kongtong Disciples, who had poured out their anger and grief.

“All right.”

And so Perfected Being Hyeoncheon and about a hundred Kongtong Disciples joined us. But that was only the beginning.

“I, Hyuk Sopyung, a junior martial artist, humbly ask leave to answer for my sect’s sins.”

Hyuk Sopyung, the Zhongnan One Dragon.

Along with him, more than three hundred Zhongnan Sect Disciples who had barely survived the bloody battle set down their weapons and knelt.

The Roaring Fury Swordsman, Song Il, and the Taeeul Merciless Sword, Hwangbo Eom.

The two elders of their sect were dead, and now the Disciples knew what they had done. Shame and grief filled their faces. Blood trickled between their tightly clenched teeth.

If the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord, the Zhongnan Sect Leader, hadn’t been unconscious from his severe injuries, he would have knelt beside them and asked to answer for those sins too.

Perfected Being Hyeoncheon watched the Zhongnan Disciples in silence for a long while. Then he spoke.

“A father’s sins do not belong to his children, nor a master’s to his Disciples. Why, then, do the Disciples of Zhongnan ask me to hold them to account?”

“…!”

“Still, if you insist on accepting a penalty, so be it. Follow Daoist Friend Jin here and walk a straight, honorable path. Let that be the Zhongnan Sect’s new way.”

[3739] In Daoism, the Primordial Heavenly Venerable, or Yuanshi Tianzun, is one of the Three Pure Ones, its highest deities.

At the old Daoist's wise and compassionate words, Hyuk Sopyung and the Zhongnan Disciples bowed deeply. Then they gave me a fist-and-palm salute with the utmost respect.

"We wish to walk the righteous path without straying an inch. Great Hero Jin, we ask to join you."

It was the first time I'd come face-to-face with Hyuk Sopyung since the incident at the Yongbong Escort Bureau.

He had once been the Zhongnan Sect's most promising young prodigy, one of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes. The gap between us had grown even wider than before.

Even after spending several days alongside the Zhongnan Sect in Gansu, I'd only ever passed him at a distance. Maybe that was why I'd only just noticed how much more serious his bearing had become, how much deeper his gaze.

"I'd be glad to have you."

For once, I accepted an offer with proper courtesy. Our numbers had swelled to around five hundred with the two sects joining us, and someone watching it all came over.

"Even this won't be enough. Don't you think?"

"Maybe. Still better than padding our numbers with any old riffraff."

"Funny. My ears are itching. Must be my imagination."

"Maybe not."

The new Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate gave a dry laugh at my feigned innocence, then pointed to his new followers, lined up in orderly ranks.

"Five hundred. Time was short, but I chose them carefully from the volunteers. They may not measure up to the Disciples of the Nine Sects and One Gang, but I can vouch for their loyalty and fighting spirit."

"So you're putting them under my command?"

"No. I'd be grateful if you let them come with you."

"What?"

"I, Sama Pyo, Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate, and five hundred men ask to join the Fire Dragon Pavilion Master. Please allow us to fight for the realm and make up, however little, for our past wrongs."

"…!"

For a moment, I couldn't speak.

I might not have been able to hold back the emotion welling up inside me if a giant with a little old man dangling from his neck hadn't shouted right then.

"Taishan's going! Taishan's going too! Taishan will go with the Pavilion Master to the end!"

"Goddamn it! Stop bouncing around so much! Please!"

Everyone burst out laughing at once, as if they'd planned it.

Me, Sama Pyo, the Fire Dragon Pavilion members, and the survivors of the Nine Sects and One Gang.

Even Jeong Hogun, Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, whose expression never changed whether he was happy or sad.

"You martial artists are quite an amusing lot."

"Really? Since you brought it up, want to hear something even funnier?"

"Something funnier?"

"Yeah. It's about a certain Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard who kept talking back to a Marquis like he was his equal and is now on the verge of being forcibly discharged. The funny thing is, he has the same surname as you. What a coincidence, huh?"

"…Is that how you're going to play this?"

"Then do your best. So I don't have to."

Jeong Hogun shook his head as though there was no winning with me. Then he stood as straight as an iron tower and saluted.

"Then please give your orders."

"Qinghai. We're going to Qinghai Province. At full speed."

"I, Jeong Hogun, Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, accept the solemn order of the Most Honorable Marquis of Shangshan."

And so, two days ago, the Embroidered Uniform Guard joined us as the final piece of our force. Now nearly two thousand strong, we took a brief rest and headed straight for Qinghai Province.

A few people raised the cautious possibility that Dark Heaven might target Gansu again. The Bow Saint put those concerns to rest with a single remark.

"The North is moving."

Naturally, she didn't mean northern Gansu.

She meant the North of the entire world, divided by the Great Wall—and the two powers that ruled that vast land.

The fierce tiger of Hebei: the Hebei Peng Family.

And the Azure Dragon of Shanxi Province: the Jin Family of Taiyuan, who had now claimed even the skies above the green grasslands.

"Arrows may fly at different speeds, but so long as they hold their course, each will eventually strike its target."

The Bow Saint and the Embroidered Uniform Guard, for example, were arrows shot ahead of the rest.

It was a metaphor worthy of the Bow Saint. No one argued after that.

Not merely because she was the Bow Saint. Everyone knew that with the Azure Dragon and the fierce tiger of the North spreading their wings and baring their claws, Gansu was reasonably safe.

And the brief purge just before we left Gansu was enough to wipe out any possible future threat.

"Anything you want to say before you die? Spare me the excuses. I'll hear your last words."

"I—I never colluded with Dark Heaven. There must have been some misunderstanding!"

"Young Sect Leader—no, Sect Leader! Why are you doing this? You know your late father and I were practically sworn brothers!"

"Yeah, I know. Close enough to betray us together. You were so close that my father wrote it all down in detail… Did you know that?"

"…!"

The meeting meant to decide the future of Gansu's Murim had become a trial of its traitors. The room froze.

Wide eyes. Trembling lips.

Sama Pyo gave a quiet sigh at the sight of them, took a battered old book from inside his robe, and set it on the table.

"So you didn't know. I'd have thought you might at least suspect."

Even I was surprised that the meticulous Black Night King, Sima Gong, had left such conclusive evidence behind. How much more shocked must those men have been, after knowing him for decades?

Sama Pyo went on. There was a trace of bitterness toward his father in his voice, and he looked at the men as though they were insects.

"So. Any last words?"

That did it.

"You—you little brat, with the blood barely dry on your head! You dare kill me, your uncle in all but name?!"

"Heh. Heh heh. So this is how it ends."

A cornered rat had only two choices.

Charge with its adorable little front teeth as its only weapon, or give up and accept its fate.

And waiting for the fools who chose to charge was—

"Story's over, Taishan."

"Yaaawn. Taishan nearly fell asleep listening."

Tiger Giant Child Taishan: designated hitter for the Gansu Black Dragons, with a career batting average of .999.

Wham! Whaaam!

I was there in case anything went wrong, but I never had to step in.

Taishan's two-section staff was gleefully spitting fire—no, blood.

One of the Black Dragon Demon Gate's senior members had shouted that Sama Pyo was a little brat with the blood barely dry on his head, then charged at him. His head was gone before he could spill any blood into it. Several Sect Leaders and Family Heads tried to flee with all their might, but they were surrounded the moment they left the pavilion.

By Black Dragon Demon Gate warriors who had sworn loyalty to their new lord.

And by their own followers and Disciples.

"G-Gangpyeong! How could you do this to me?!"

"How could you do what you did, Sect Leader?"

"Guard the way! Hurry! No—this is an order from your Sect Leader! Stop those men right—"

"Shut your filthy mouth."

"What?"

"Because of you, my Master, my Junior Sister, and my Martial Nephew died! That makes you guilty of deceiving your master and betraying your ancestors. Disciples of the Gorang Sword Sect, execute the Sect Leader on the spot, as the sect rules demand!"

"What are the members of the Lanzhou Hyuk Family doing?!"

"Please don't hold it against us, Family Head. You were the one who betrayed us first."

"Y-you dare…!"

Slice! Thud-thud-thud!

Spears and blades came at them from every direction. Around a dozen Sect Leaders and Family Heads died with their eyes wide open, unable even to leave proper last words.

A miserable end for men who had led Gansu's Murim, each the head of a faction with a substantial following.

But the young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate didn't so much as blink as he killed or captured twenty renowned masters in all.

He watched it all with calm, cold eyes. Then, touching his teacup, which had long since gone cold, he spoke out of the blue.

"Should I have them bring fresh tea?"

"No. It tastes awful, and we don't have time. Besides, that scatterbrained man will be joining us soon. Tea will just turn my stomach."

"Great Sir—does he really know the fastest route to Qinghai Province?"

"Ma Junggeol told me he does, anyway. I don't know what he did when he was young, but apparently he knows the terrain inside out."

“I see. Then our business here is done. I’ll go with you, Pavilion Master.”

Sama Pyo nodded and stood.

Only fifteen minutes ago, more than twenty faces had crowded around the table. Now no one remained at it, and all that lay on top were overturned teacups and a battered old book.

“Aren’t you taking it?”

“I don’t need it anymore.”

With that, Sama Pyo left. After a moment’s thought, I picked up the book.

It had served its purpose and been cast aside, but it was still something his dead father had left behind.

I clicked my tongue, turned the first page without thinking, and understood what Sama Pyo had really meant.

“…Huh.”

I let out a dry laugh and set the book down.

No. Not a book.

Just a bundle of yellowed pages without a single character written on them. It had plainly spent years gathering dust somewhere, never once put to use.

“Guess blood really does tell. In a good way.”

Muttering under my breath, I walked on, breathing in the stench of blood flowing from the traitors’ bodies.

Two days passed after that. Then another three went by as we made our way over mountain slopes so rough they made me want to curse.

“Hey, young man. What’s your name?”

“Jin Taekyung. You know that’s the twenty-fourth time I’ve told you, right?”

“Ah, yes. Jang Sam.”

“How the hell does Jin Taekyung become Jang Sam… Forget it. What do you want?”

“Well, it’s nothing terribly important.”

“Tell me anyway. While I’m still speaking politely to you.”

“It’s just that I can’t for the life of me tell where we are.”

“Pardon? What?”

“I asked where we are.”

“Fucking hell.”

I was seized by the urge to kill that lunatic guide for spouting this insanity with a straight face.

A fierce, overpowering urge, strong enough to snap my last thread of self-control.

Step.

I couldn’t hold back any longer. But just as I approached Great Sir to let our fists do the talking—

Ding!

A clear chime rang in my ears, gluing my momentarily severed thread of self-control back together.

Chapter 1066

Ding!

The System notification chimed just as I was striding toward Great Sir with my fist clenched. I stopped.

“You made the right call. There’s nothing to gain by hitting someone who’s already in rough shape… Are you listening to me?”

“Shh.”

Hyuk Mujin had sighed in relief, apparently thinking I’d changed my mind. I signaled for him to be quiet and looked around.

Dense forest lay under the cover of darkness, and insects chirped here and there.

Nothing about the landscape had changed, but all of us had just crossed an invisible boundary. The System was always accurate. It never lied.

Great Sir had somehow fulfilled the task he’d been given. Now he looked as puzzled as the question marks that had floated above his head.

“What’s wrong, Jang Sam?”

“…I’m Jin Taekyung, not Jang Sam.”

To be honest, I’d doubted him right up to the end.

Following someone who couldn’t even remember his own name was hardly a wise decision. He’d kept changing direction along the way, too. Even Sama Pyo, who’d spent his whole life in Gansu Province, had questioned him more than once.

Still.

It worked out.

We’d shaved at least two days off the journey I’d expected. The mountain route had been rough, but the time we’d saved gave us a chance to rest and build up our Stamina.

The question is, how does this guy know a route like this?

The obvious question came back to me. But then Great Sir opened his mouth in a jaw-splitting yawn, and I found myself shaking my head.

What good would it do to keep wondering? The man had been all over the place for ages, and the System had stamped him with its official Madman seal. There was no room left for doubt.

What mattered was that Great Sir was at least on our side. Thanks to him, we had reached Qinghai Province.

More precisely, the area near Qinghai Province’s northwest border.

And this place is…

Right.

Enemy territory, now under Dark Heaven’s control and filled with countless dangers.

Some three thousand people.

That was no small number. In the modern world, a Guild with that many Hunters would easily count as a major one. Even a sect among the Nine Sects and One Gang—apart from the Beggars’ Sect—would have to gather its lay Disciples from outside its main stronghold to reach that number.

But everything was relative.

Dark Heaven’s army invading Qinghai rivaled the Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples of old. Against it, three thousand people were no more than fireflies before the sun.

This is urgent, but if we rush straight in with everyone this exhausted, we’ll be the ones getting slaughtered.

So I proposed a day’s rest in the mountains where we’d stopped. No one objected.

Not even Perfected Being Hyeoncheon, whom I’d expected to be the hardest to persuade. If anything, he went out of his way to show me more respect than necessary, which only left me flustered.

“A sound judgment indeed. Very well. What are your orders after we rest?”

“Sorry? My orders?”

“Is something wrong? If you’d rather call them commands, I don’t mind.”

“…I’d rather you curse me out. Why are you doing this to me?”

Was this how a family heir felt when his grandfather’s generation bowed deeply to him during a holiday gathering?

At my thoroughly disconcerted reaction, Perfected Being Hyeoncheon gave a quiet laugh and said something I hadn’t expected.

“Perhaps you should look around you once in a while.”

“What do you mean…?”

“See how many people stand around you. See how they look at you. That will tell you where you stand now.”

“…!”

Only then did I notice how many eyes were fixed on me.

The admiration and goodwill in their gazes were so clear I felt I could reach out and touch them. Gratitude showed in their faint smiles, impossible to hide.

Then Perfected Being Hyeoncheon’s warm voice drifted into my ears.

"Whether you ask, instruct, or command us makes no difference. We all owe you a great debt."

"A debt…"

"In Murim, gratitude and grudges must be repaid. But I have forgiven my grudge. Now I wish to repay the kindness shown to me. I expect they feel the same."

I thought for a moment about how they must feel.

They'd lost comrades they'd shared years of hardship with, family, Senior and Junior Brothers. Before they'd even begun to recover from the fear and sorrow they'd felt on the battlefield, they'd chosen of their own accord to follow me into another deadly place.

They had come to repay a debt, but they were also driven by a desire for revenge that would bring darkness to this land.

And that desire was itself a light against the darkness.

"Ah."

It was a strange feeling. One I couldn't imagine ever getting used to.

I had no idea what to say.

But the old Daoist, whose wisdom matched his long life, didn't demand a reply.

Pat, pat.

He gave my shoulder a couple of silent pats and walked away. Everyone else's attention remained on me.

The Disciples of the Kongtong and Zhongnan Sects.

The martial artists of the Embroidered Uniform Guard and the Black Dragon Demon Gate.

Even Jeok Cheongang and Bow Saint, standing among the Fire Dragon Pavilion members, merely nodded in silence.

As though they'd follow me to the end, even if I were headed straight for hell.

"I… No, I…"

With some three thousand people watching me, I slowly opened my mouth.

And at the very moment the suffocating silence broke, a thought suddenly struck me.

How can it be this quiet?

Only then did I realize that the loud chirping of insects hidden throughout the thick forest had stopped at some point.

The birds perched high in the branches had vanished, too.

"…!"

A chill ran down my spine.

Rumble. Rumble.

A faint tremor finally reached us from far away. With it came the eerie cry of something unknown, carried to my ears on the desolate wind.

Grrrk.

"…Shit."

The curse slipped out on reflex.

I tightened my grip on White Flame's shaft and stared past the darkness at the enemies coming to meet their unexpected visitors.

Then I gave my first command in Qinghai Province.

"Prepare for battle."

Shing! Shing! Shing!

Countless waves of steel rose all at once, their cold gleam lighting up the darkness—and revealing the enemies who had approached behind its veil.

"…A-ah…"

At the low groan that escaped someone's lips, the enemy crawling up the ridge ahead of the others tilted his head.

Plop. Plop.

Pale brain matter dripped from his skull. Nearly half his head was already gone.

Since a time so distant it had left no written record, people had called a vast mountain range at the far western edge of the world:

"The land closest to heaven, its highest peaks touching the clouds…"

The Blood Lord murmured the words to himself, looked around, and nodded.

The mountain range stretched on in endless, overlapping ridges, its many peaks rising here and there. It was majestic and beautiful enough to make anyone gasp.

"Quite a sight. I can see why people of the Central Plains hold this place sacred. And why those worthless Kunlun Sect Daoists fought so desperately to protect it. Don't you agree?"

At the Blood Lord's sudden question, the Grand Sorceress, seated on a large rock and making strange gestures with her hands, answered,

"You seem rather taken with the scenery."

"Well, Tianshan is bleak. You can't deny that."

"Then why not formally ask to join the Kunlun Sect? Who knows? Perhaps you'll become its Sect Leader someday."

The mockery was obvious, but the Blood Lord didn't react as she'd intended. He stared at her with an odd look, then shrugged.

"Not a tempting offer. Got anything better?"

His easy reply made the Grand Sorceress frown.

"What's gotten into you?"

"What do you mean?"

"You weren't like this before."

"Wasn't I?"

The glib answer was nothing like the man she remembered. As she watched him, irritation welled up inside her.

Deranged monster. Acting as if he hasn't a care in the world.

The Blood-Sword Demon Lord had been a bloodthirsty killer, but she found the Blood Lord even harder to stomach.

Stupid, vicious, and utterly shameless.

Those three qualities gave her ample reason to dislike him. But something else bothered her more.

Why does that person keep someone like him so close?

She couldn't understand it.

As far as she had seen, the Blood Lord was neither more skilled in martial arts nor more cunning than the four Demon Lords and the Demon Empress who had died before him.

But there was no denying that, unlike the Blood-Sword Demon Lord, a mere piece on the board, the Blood Lord had his master's trust. And the fact that he stood on equal footing with her only made her more uncomfortable.

And then there was the person sitting just a few jang[3740] away, giving off a dreadful stench the entire time.

Jingle. Jangle.

The Grand Sorceress grimaced at the man in black. He sat cross-legged, muttering without pause.

The foul odor drifting over on the wind was bad enough, but the dull, grating jingling of his bells every time he moved was even worse. The more she heard it, the more it grated on her, as though an awl were digging into her ears and unsettling her mind.

"Who is he?"

"My subordinate," the Blood Lord answered readily.

"You had someone like him working for you? There's something oddly familiar about him. And unpleasant."

"That would be because he's a sorcerer."

"What?"

"Oh, don't get the wrong idea. He's a different kind of sorcerer from a certain sharp-tongued bitch. He only joined my ranks recently, actually."

The Grand Sorceress's eyes widened as she caught his meaning.

"Then…"

[3740] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten cheok, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

“That’s right. Until a few months ago, he served another Demon Lord. Though, to be precise…”

The Blood Lord’s mouth curved into a smile.

“I suppose he was that Demon Lord’s Disciple, rather than his subordinate.”

At that very moment—

Clatter.

The bell rang again, louder and deeper than before, and the man in black raised his head.

Pale skin. Eyes with a bluish cast.

And a dry voice, without a hint of emotion.

“I found it.”

Not so long ago, Ma Sanbao had held the imperial court in his grasp as the East Depot’s Brush-Holding Eunuch. At his report, the Blood Lord smiled with satisfaction.

“Now that is very welcome news.”

Chapter 1067

Half a shichen[3741].

That was how long Qinghai's first battle had lasted, from beginning to end.

"So this is where you were."

The forest was thick with the smell of blood. I sat on the body of an enemy I didn't recognize, catching my breath, and turned toward the voice.

Squish.

Footsteps strode through blood and mud. A familiar face came into view, clad in armor stained red, its original golden luster gone.

"Shouldn't that be, 'So this is where you were, sir'?"

Jeong Hogun, a Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, let out a small sigh.

"So this is where you were, sir. Happy now?"

"Not even close. You dropped the 'sir' again in your very next sentence."

"…Give it a rest. We've both had a hard time."

"I was about to. How bad are our losses?"

"Hardly worth calling them losses. Around thirty casualties, and not a single death."

Jeong Hogun glanced at the heaps of bodies around us and added, "Considering we wiped out more than a thousand enemies, it's a miracle."

Three thousand against one thousand.

We'd had the advantage in numbers from the start, but winning without a single death was an absurdly decisive victory. All the more so when it had taken only half a shichen[3742].

Still, my answer was matter-of-fact.

"It wasn't a miracle. It was only natural."

"I can't argue with that. The difference in strength was overwhelming."

Our troops were all handpicked elites, which had helped. But the Supreme Peak masters had made a far greater difference.

Bow Saint. Jeok Cheongang. Perfected Being Hyeoncheon. Me.

And, last of all, the Great Sir—though he hadn't been much help.

With forces like that, losing would have been harder than winning.

There was only one problem…

"How's everyone doing?"

"What do they look like?"

[3741] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

[3742] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

Jeong Hogun's immediate question made me click my tongue.

Honestly, I didn't need to ask. Everywhere I looked, faces were stiff. Despite the overwhelming victory and the few injuries we'd suffered, our allies were pale, with faint fear in their eyes.

As though they'd seen something terrible they were never meant to see.

Which they had.

The unknown enemy still writhing beneath my ass was a monster by any definition.

Grrk. Grrrk.

A faint, guttural cry leaked from its split throat.

Only then did Jeong Hogun notice it. His brow furrowed.

"It's still alive?"

"Maybe. If you can call this alive."

I gazed down at the cursed monster.

Its limbs had been horribly severed, and its body was rotting. It had clearly died days ago, yet it had never crossed the Sanzu River[3743]. It remained in this world, struggling stubbornly, unable even to remember who it had been in life.

But the two characters stitched into its torn, ragged clothes still remembered their owner.

"Kunlun…"

I nodded quietly at Jeong Hogun's low murmur.

That was right.

This monster was a Disciple of the Kunlun Sect.

No—it had been one.

"I heard there were casualties during the retreat from Kunlun Mountain. I suppose this was one of them."

"Probably."

"Did you know him?"

I shook my head at Jeong Hogun's cautious question.

"No. Not at all."

I'd met Hak Woo—the Kunlun Cloud Dragon, the Kunlun Sect's greatest young prodigy and a member of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes—at the Star-Array Grand Banquet. But I didn't recognize the face of this Daoist who'd become a monster.

Still, I had a rough idea who might have made him this way.

"Looks familiar, doesn't it?"

"Yes."

[3743]The Sanzu River is a Buddhist river associated with the boundary between life and death.

Jeong Hogun's eyes darkened.

"Cang Gong. It's astonishingly similar to the dark arts he used."

Wei Zhong.

The East Depot's Seal-Holding Eunuch, known as Cang Gong, had harbored two deep secrets.

First, he was the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, one of the Lord of Heaven's loyal servants.

Second, he was a descendant of the Maoshan Sect, which the imperial family had wiped out long ago.

But even after Wei Zhong met his end at my hands, the Maoshan Sect's line hadn't died out.

"Ma Sanbao. It has to be him."

The Disciple who'd inherited everything from Wei Zhong.

Like his Master, he'd worn a mask while operating in secret as an East Depot eunuch. We'd never found his body. That could mean only one thing.

"I wondered where he'd gone. Looks like he survived and joined Dark Heaven after all."

Of course, it might not be Ma Sanbao.

According to Jeok Cheongang, the Corpse Art Wei Zhong had demonstrated had gone far beyond its old limits. That meant it had been improved with the Lord of Heaven's help.

But even if Dark Heaven had trained others in the Corpse Art, none of them would have reached the level of Ma Sanbao, who'd learned directly from Wei Zhong.

Besides…

Qinghai is an important battlefield for them and for us. They'll be throwing more into this fight than ever.

Dark Heaven's army of a hundred thousand had already swallowed half of Qinghai Province.

I had no idea why the Lord of Heaven had intended to lose in Gansu, but this time he was sure to commit everything he had. Even Dark Heaven, with strength far beyond the Demonic Cult of old, wouldn't simply throw away a hundred thousand troops as fodder.

Ma Sanbao is one of the pieces they need to win. They won't leave him out.

A thought flashed through my mind, and I swallowed a groan.

If all hundred thousand enemies had been turned into jiangshi, the disaster would be impossible to stop.

And worse…

The Lord of Heaven might appear on the battlefield himself.

I'd never even faced him properly, yet the thought of those two words made my heart sink.

How could I forget?

The Lord of Heaven had appeared only once, and I remembered every moment of it clearly.

Interesting. Very interesting.

The one who'd smiled at Jeok Cheongang and me that day hadn't been the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

It had been a demon borrowing a human body. The darkness of the abyss itself. An absolute being whom no one seemed capable of opposing.

Until next time.

But after that day, the Lord of Heaven never appeared before me again.

He stayed crouched in the darkness, watching everything.

Even as his loyal servants, including the Western Heaven Demon Lord, met their ends one by one. Even as the plans he'd spent years and considerable effort preparing were dismantled piece by piece.

He never appeared.

But he watched it all, waiting for a moment no one in the world could foresee. A moment only he knew.

And deep down, I sensed that the moment he wanted wasn't far off. I sensed, too, that it was deeply and unmistakably connected to me.

What is he trying to get through me?

Just as I turned that unanswerable question over in my head—

Whoosh! Thwack!

A sharp whistle cut through the air. Snapping out of my thoughts, I heard a shout from not far away.

"Oh, I got it! I got it!"

"Wow! Sir! Amazing! Taishan is truly impressed!"

"Ahem. Did you see that? When I put my mind to it, something like this is easy."

I looked over to find the Great Sir holding a bird and looking rather pleased with himself.

Its head was smashed to a pulp. It looked like it had died from being hit by a stone.

Taishan was staring at the Great Sir—or, more precisely, at the bird—and drooling.

"Tasty—no, impressive! Taishan will start a fire, so let's hurry and roast it!"

A campfire in the middle of enemy territory. It was the kind of bullshit that made everyone else furious, me included. But one lunatic felt differently.

"Young friend, you know how to show proper courtesy. For your trouble, I'll give you some of my meat. Which part would you like?"

"The legs! Definitely the legs!"

“You’ve eaten your share of chicken, I see. Fine, I’ll give you one.”

“Both! All of them!”

“…Don’t push your luck.”

The Great Sir suddenly sobered up. Taishan drooped his head in disappointment, and that was when Namho, perched on Taishan’s shoulder as comfortably as though it were his usual seat, spoke up.

“You’re all making damn fools of yourselves. That thing stinks like hell, wherever it came from. Eat it? Bullshit.”

His words brought a thought to mind.

Wait. Could it be?

The moment Jeong Hogun examined the bird, my suspicion became certainty.

“It’s rotting. The bones are showing.”

“Which means…”

“Looks like the monsters aren’t only on the ground.”

It had been strange enough for a bird to remain there after strangers invaded its territory.

As everyone caught on and turned to look at him, the Great Sir blinked in confusion.

“Is something wrong? It was staring right at me from a branch, so…”

“It was staring at you?”

He nodded.

“I’m certain. Its eyes were bloodred, too. It made me so uneasy that I threw a stone at it.”

“…A Familiar?”

“Hm? What was that?”

“Nothing. Just talking to myself.”

I waved a hand at the Great Sir and stared silently into the air.

Dawn was only now spreading from the east. In its light, I could make out shapes here and there among the branches high overhead.

Monsters hidden in the darkness, brought back to life by its power.

They were already watching us.

My thoughts turned cold as I slowly rose. Then I spoke to the Great Sir, who still looked confused.

“If you see any more birds like that, kill every one of them.”

“Every one?”

“Yes. Every one.”

“That seems a bit much. Aren’t they precious lives, too?”

I considered my answer for a moment.

"They're harmful birds."

"Oh. Then I'll kill them."

"Please."

I patted his shoulder and started to leave, but stopped when I remembered something I'd forgotten.

I reached out and murmured, "Infinite Life Buddha."[3744]

Stab.

The monster stopped moving completely. I left it—the Kunlun Sect Disciple—behind and walked away.

There was no time to spare now.

Eyes were already watching us, and pursuers would soon be on our heels.

[3744] "Infinite Life Buddha" is a Buddhist invocation referring to Amitabha Buddha.

Chapter 1068

If anyone asked me how to shake off enemy pursuers, I'd answer without a moment's hesitation.

There were only two things that mattered:

Speed and stamina.

But knowing what to do and doing it were two different things.

Every one of us knew that, yet reality stood before us like a high, solid wall.

Our force of some three thousand hadn't had a proper rest. The pursuers closing in by the moment were monsters that didn't even feel fatigue.

"Northwest! About two thousand feet[3745] out!"

We'd been coming down the mountains without a break for barely two hours when—

"There! The bastards are here!"

The people who spotted the distant cloud of dust cried out. I immediately turned and sized up the hazy yellow cloud.

Three hundred at least. Maybe five hundred.

The F-rank Hunter who used to scrape by in narrow, pitch-dark Gates was gone.

No—even if some part of that old me still remained, I'd changed in many ways.

I'd learned how to fight multiple enemies and make snap decisions in all kinds of situations.

"Old Master."

We'd reached the point where we understood each other from a glance.

Jeok Cheongang read the meaning in my brief call and immediately poured internal energy into his voice.

"You slowpokes! What are you waiting for? Run like your feet are on fire!"

That wasn't just a scolding from a cranky old man.

Jeok Cheongang's mighty azure dragon's roar shattered the fear lodged in our allies' hearts and hurried their hesitant steps, if only for a moment.

And the great martial artist who'd come to be known as the Bow Saint after countless battles knew her abilities and her role precisely.

"Go. I'll send it at the right time."

I nodded, kicked off the ground, and charged toward the dust cloud.

Whoosh!

The wind split.

[3745] The Korean gives the distance as about 200 jang. One jang is approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft), so 200 jang is about 606 m (1,990 ft).

Dust billowed up from the ground beneath my feet, forming another cloud—one larger and denser than the cloud surrounding the several hundred enemies.

I see them.

Beyond the swirling sand and dust, the monsters who were neither dead nor alive came sharply into view.

I angled up the spear clenched in my hands just as a dazzling streak of light reached the enemy a step ahead of me.

Boom!

An arrow of Force exploded.

Shot from the Bow Saint's fingertips, it swallowed dozens of monsters charging at the front and vaporized them in an instant.

I plunged into the gap it left behind, not about to waste that perfect opening.

Whoosh!

The hair on my arms stood on end at the faint, spine-chilling whistle.

Breath, speed, strength.

As if to prove my skill advanced with every passing day, everything came together without a hair's breadth of error. The strike only grazed the enemies—but that was enough.

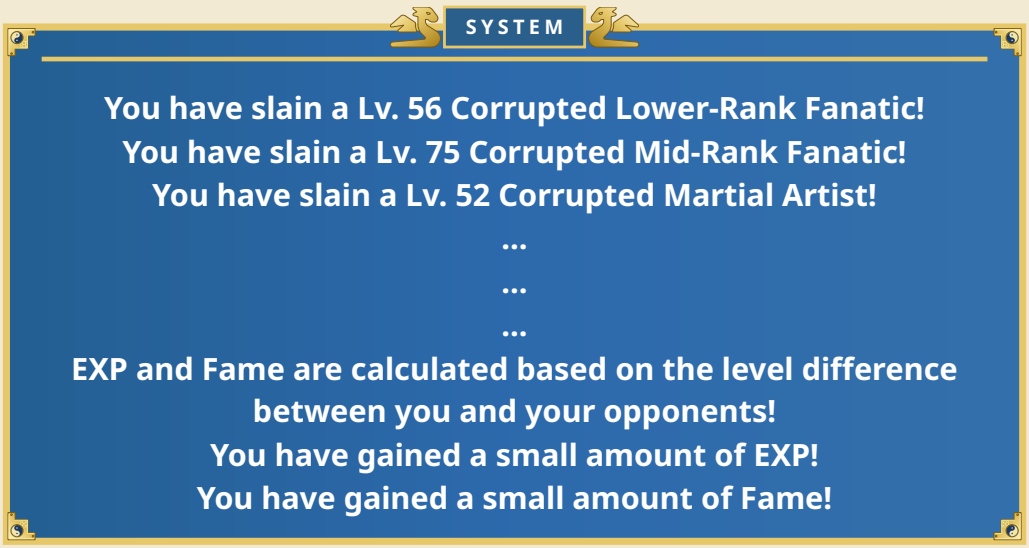
Slice! Splatter!

One cutting sound, but dozens of deaths within it.

A single downward-slanting sweep split rotting bodies and sent blood spraying.

Along with a clear chime, wholly at odds with the horrific sight.

Ding. Ding. Ding-ding-ding!



I swung my spear as if entranced, listening to the System notifications ringing one over another.

Everywhere I looked, there were monsters. Enemies.

Each time my spear traced an arc, a dozen or even dozens of them crumpled like rotten logs, never to move again.

Freed from the chains that had bound them to this world, they returned to the order of things as it was meant to be.

Ding.

At the last chime, I confirmed that nothing else was moving and lifted my head.

Beneath a cloud that half-obscured the sun, a black-winged crow drifted through the air.

Its eyes glowed bloodred.

“Come down. Let’s talk.”

Naturally, I got no answer. I picked up someone’s sword from a pool of foul-smelling blood and added,

“If you don’t like that, come yourself.”

Whoosh!

The sword shot upward, tearing through the air. In an instant, its blade covered the crow’s red eyes.

Stab.

“Hmm.”

The man opened his eyes with a low groan and rubbed the space between them.

The pain that had come with the flash of light at the last moment still lingered, as though an awl were digging into his head.

What a monster. He’s gotten even stronger.

Ma Sanbao couldn’t help but be surprised.

Jin Taekyung’s martial skill, which he’d watched through another being’s senses, had advanced even further than when Ma had seen him at the imperial palace.

Was that even possible? In less than three months?

Ma Sanbao asked himself the question, then shook his head.

It was a stupid question.

The time to wonder whether it was possible had passed long ago.

What mattered was that Jin Taekyung had made it real—and that was precisely what made that young man, not even thirty yet, so exceptional.

Ma Sanbao already knew something else, too.

Unlike Jin Taekyung, his own role was set. He would never be the star of this stage.

For now, his most important task was to watch them closely and report back.

“My Lord.”

Ma Sanbao went to the superior he'd only recently begun serving and reported everything in detail. The Blood Lord listened, then furrowed his brow.

"Wait. They even found out you were watching them?"

"Yes. I'm ashamed to say that's what happened—"

Boom!

A blast of palm force struck before he could finish.

Even an ordinary Peak master would have died on the spot if struck by that blow. Ma Sanbao was swept away by the force, yet despite the tremendous impact, he immediately prostrated himself.

"Huh. Look at how sturdy this body of yours is."

"Please kill me."

"Don't rush me. I was just considering whether to beat you to death right here."

"…My Lord."

"What, are you finally scared? I suppose you have reason to be. Your master ended up dead like that too."

Ma Sanbao bowed even lower.

Unlike his master, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, Ma hadn't achieved Great Completion in the White Illusion Jiangshi Art. His fear of death was all the greater for it.

"Please show mercy…"

"Shut your mouth. If you want to live even fifteen minutes longer."

The Blood Lord glared down at Ma Sanbao with irritation, but that was the extent of the punishment he could give.

Ma Sanbao was a useful expendable in many ways, and the Blood Lord had never intended to kill one of the few subordinates worth keeping.

He'd threatened Ma so harshly because he wanted to show off his authority and control in front of someone he disliked.

Of course, that someone paid no attention to his display and remained focused on another matter.

"They found out? This soon?"

The Blood Lord answered the Grand Sorceress's question, which sounded almost like she'd asked herself.

"No need to make a fuss. It's sooner than expected, but not all that surprising."

"Looking at the result, sure. That's about as far as your thinking goes."

"What?"

"The Bow Saint, the Fire King, Jin Taekyung. And while he's not on their level, even that old Daoist from the Kongtong Sect. They could've noticed. But that's not what I want to know."

The Grand Sorceress fixed the Blood Lord with a mocking look, then turned to Ma Sanbao.

“Come now. Don’t worry about your foolish superior. Tell me honestly: who was the first to notice your covert surveillance?”

“That was…”

“Once you’ve said something, you can’t take it back. I find it hard to believe the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord would take in a Disciple foolish enough to lie under these circumstances.”

Ma Sanbao hesitated. But when he met the Grand Sorceress’s fathomless gaze, he realized she already knew.

She had guessed what he’d been too afraid to say for fear of an even harsher rebuke from his violent superior.

“It was someone I’d heard of only vaguely, through brief rumors and scraps of information, more than a decade ago.”

At last Ma Sanbao answered cautiously. The Blood Lord let killing intent seep from him, while the Grand Sorceress wore a faint smile, as if she’d expected as much.

“I thought so. The East Depot wouldn’t be what it is otherwise.”

All under heaven lay within the borders of the Great Nation. To watch what lay both inside and beyond those borders, the imperial family had built a watchtower.

That watchtower was the East Depot.

From its commanding view of all under heaven, it had shared what it saw with Dark Heaven through the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord.

“Though the East Depot’s influence has waned in its conflict with the current Emperor, all manner of information still flowed in through the eyes and ears it had planted across the realm.”

“And among them was the man who noticed the surveillance today?”

“Yes. In Ningxia Province, he is called Great Sir.”

“Great Sir. An odd nickname for a martial artist.”

“It isn’t particularly well known, either. He’s a madman, and his past is shrouded in mystery.”

“Even the East Depot couldn’t find out who he was?”

“I can’t say for certain, but at the time, the Emperor was using the Embroidered Uniform Guard to keep the East Depot in check. That clearly limited what we could find out.”

Caught in those overlapping currents of the times, Great Sir had gradually been forgotten.

Until today, when Ma Sanbao dug through his old memories.

As she listened to the story of this mysterious man, the Grand Sorceress suddenly found an answer to a question she’d forgotten.

The Kongtong Sect. I wondered where Perfected Being Hyeoncheon and the Kongtong Disciples who survived Dunhuang had disappeared to along the way…

It was a suspicion close to certainty. At the same time, another question arose, and her gaze darkened.

Who in the world is he?

Chapter 1069

When someone changes in an instant, the people around them can’t help feeling uneasy.

Especially when it happens in the middle of a chase.

“Hh…!”

At Great Sir’s sudden groan, the silence shattered—and the air around us froze.

It hadn’t even been fifteen minutes since we’d shaken off the third group of pursuers.

We’d been moving quickly and quietly, keeping low among the shallow hills and reeds. Now everyone reflexively gripped their weapons. Jeok Cheongang was no exception.

“What is it?”

At his low question, everyone—including me—turned toward Great Sir.

His face had gone rigid without anyone noticing. His pupils, usually a little unfocused, had suddenly dilated, as if reflecting his state of mind. A bead of cold sweat rolled down his forehead.

“I have a bad feeling. A really bad one.”

If we’d been in Gansu, I might’ve wondered what crazy thing he was going to say this time and let it pass.

But however unhinged he was, Great Sir was an undisputed Supreme Peak master. We were in enemy territory, with threats lurking everywhere. And though it might have been a coincidence, he’d been the first to notice the enemy using birds to spy on us. We couldn’t simply brush off what he said.

A person’s innate sixth sense had nothing to do with how advanced their martial arts were.

“A bad feeling?”

Great Sir nodded at Jeok Cheongang’s grave question.

“That’s right.”

“Explain in more detail. And be polite if you don’t want to get beaten to death.”

“Understood.”

Jeok Cheongang chuckled at Great Sir’s answer, then turned to me.

“Would it be all right if this old man taught that lunatic a lesson?”

“Would it?”

“Probably not.”

“Then why ask?”

“I thought I’d check. So it really isn’t all right?”

“You can read his palm, but you can’t lay a hand on him.”

"Damn it. What's become of the code of the martial world?"

Jeok Cheongang sighed up at the sky, then looked at Great Sir with a half-resigned expression.

"Fine. Keep talking. What exactly does it feel like?"

"How should I put it? Like an invisible hand is squeezing my insides."

"And?"

"My stomach keeps churning, and I'm breaking out in a cold sweat."

"Any idea what's causing it?"

"I don't know. It feels familiar somehow, but… Urgh!"

Before he could finish, another groan burst from him.

Great Sir's face went pale, and he moved before anyone could stop him.

Whoosh!

He shot away so fast he left a blurred afterimage. As he vanished among the dense reeds, Jeok Cheongang, the other Supreme Peak masters, and I hurried after him.

Or rather, we were about to.

Then a sound rang out clearly from the reeds.

Prrt, splat-splat-splat!

"…?"

What the fuck?

Just as we all began to dread the answer, Great Sir's voice confirmed it.

"Ahhh, that's a relief…"

"…!"

"…!"

A deathly silence fell. Jeok Cheongang stared at me in disbelief, then finally parted his tightly shut lips.

"Are you sure it's not all right?"

"…"

"I won't kill him. I'll just break one thing. His arm or something, not his leg."

At Jeok Cheongang's earnest plea, Bow Saint muttered through her pinched nose.

"An arm might be all right…"

I'll admit, I was tempted.

But with superhuman self-control, I resisted the urge and shook my head.

Sixth sense, my ass.

If he could just refrain from acting like a complete idiot for once, that'd be a miracle. What had I expected from someone who didn't even know his own name?

Still, he more than pulls his weight.

I swallowed a sigh. Great Shit—no, Great Sir—emerged from the reeds after finishing his remarkably noisy business, looking completely at ease.

"Whew. I feel great."

"…A minute ago, you said you felt terrible."

"Me? I don't believe I did. You must've misunderstood."

"You're really pissing me off."

"Hm? What was that?"

"Nothing. Just talking to myself."

"Hm. That's a bad habit. I don't mind, but you should break it soon. If you talk to yourself too often, people might think you've lost your mind."

"…"

I must've lost my grip on reason for a moment.

My vision blurred, and when it cleared, a fierce-looking face was blocking my view.

"Whoa! Calm down, calm down!"

"Let go! Let go! That ugly face of yours is already bad enough. Want me to make it even worse?"

Ma Junggeol—the chief of the mounted bandits who'd somehow ended up following us this far, though he was in the horse-caravan business now—looked at me sadly.

"…That was a bit harsh."

"Ah, sorry. I got carried away."

Some of the sadness left his face at my apology.

"Calm down. You know Great Sir didn't mean any harm."

Of course I knew.

Maybe his innocence was what made it even more infuriating. He'd drawn everyone's attention at a critical moment, and all that fuss had been over a satisfying bowel movement.

Even Shakyamuni[3746] himself would have shouted, "Amitabha,[3747] fuck this! Guanyin,[3748] drop dead!" and cracked Great Sir's skull with a wooden fish.[3749]

But I can't exactly leave him behind.

If pure evil existed, maybe Great Sir was it.

I heaved a sigh and raised a hand where everyone could see it, signaling them to move out.

Every moment mattered, and we'd already wasted nearly fifteen minutes for nothing. We needed to move faster.

At this rate, it could take us several extra days to reach our destination.

[3746] Shakyamuni is the historical Buddha.

[3747] Amitabha is a Buddha invoked in East Asian Buddhism.

[3748] Guanyin is the bodhisattva of compassion in East Asian Buddhism.

[3749] A wooden fish is a wooden percussion instrument used to keep rhythm during Buddhist chanting.

The first attack had come before we'd even made it all the way down from the mountain range. By now, the enemy had caught up with us three times.

Each time, the Supreme Peak masters, including me, had led the charge and wiped out the pursuers. But the important thing was how quickly and relentlessly the enemy caught up to us.

They have eyes to watch us—and monsters that can chase us without resting for a moment.

Monsters that had forgotten death, pain, and fatigue.

That was what made the undead truly terrifying.

Reborn from death, they'd lost their emotions. Though they weren't dead, they were already as good as dead. They'd forgotten sensation, and for the same reason, they couldn't feel fatigue.

We haven't been down from the mountains for long. If they keep slowing us down like this…

The words surrounded and wiped out rose in my mind. I quietly swallowed them.

Anyone who thought about defeat from the start was bound to lose in the end.

Thousands, or tens of thousands.

Even if a hundred thousand undead came to close their hands around our throats, I had to lead everyone through this dense net and keep moving.

Toward our destination far to the east, where our allies in Qinghai—including the Kunlun Sect—should be waiting.

As if she'd sensed what I was thinking, Ju Hwaran broke away from the others as we moved out and came over.

"If we can make it to Qinghai Lake in the east, they won't be able to pursue us so easily."

Song Ilseom, who—as always—stayed close beside Ju Hwaran like a shadow, spoke up unexpectedly.

"You're not wrong. But only if all of Qinghai's forces have gathered there, and those monsters aren't pursuing us with everything they have."

"…Captain Song."

"No, Young Lady Ju. He's right."

It was a discouraging thing to say, but Song Ilseom's judgment was clear-eyed and accurate.

You could hold on to hope in a corner of your heart, but your head had to question everything.

Plan for the worst and strive for the best.

That was the surest way to survive and win.

"How far is it to Qinghai Lake?"

"Two days if we push ourselves to the limit. I've gone over the map thoroughly, and there's no route that would get us there any faster."

The old map in Ju Hwaran's hands was anything but ordinary.

She'd inherited it from her grandfather, the man known as the Escort King. It marked secret roads hidden throughout the land and described the features of each region in detail.

But this was Qinghai Province.

The northwest in particular was an expanse of open plains and basins, with little but scattered vegetation and reed beds. For us, it was about the worst terrain imaginable.

And for them, it's perfect.

Ju Hwaran had said that even if we pushed ourselves to the limit, it would take two days to reach Qinghai Lake.

If the pursuers kept catching up, it might take three days, four days, or even more than a fortnight.

They're pursuing us harder than I expected. Stealth or speed—we'll have to give up one of them.

That left me with only one choice.

And the first thing I needed to do was obvious.

"Take it off."

I abruptly picked up the pace as I gave the order.

Jeong Hogun, moving hunched over at the rear of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, reflexively asked, "What?"

"Say that again."

"…What did you say?"

"I said take it off. Now."

At the sight of Jeong Hogun's eyes practically shaking, I added an explanation to head off any misunderstanding.

"Don't get any dirty ideas. I'm talking about that damn armor."

I pointed at the armor, smeared with mud to hide its distinctive shine. Jeong Hogun frowned.

"I can't. His Majesty personally bestowed this armor on every member of the Embroidered Uniform Guard."

"So you refuse?"

"That's right. Even an order from the Marquis of Shangshan cannot change the fact that this armor bears the authority and honor of the imperial family."

"And you're willing to die protecting that authority and honor?"

"That's…"

"Fine. Keep wearing it. When you fall behind, we'll just leave you there."

After a brief silence, Jeong Hogun answered.

“On second thought, I believe His Majesty told us to give the Marquis of Shangshan’s orders the highest priority.”

“That’s a pretty ugly excuse.”

“Damn it.”

“I’ll take that as agreement. Don’t waste time—give the order to your men right now…”

I trailed off and stared into the hazy darkness that had settled around us.

Then I sighed and spoke to Jeong Hogun, who had just removed his helmet.

“Don’t take it off yet.”

At that moment—

Rrrrrumble.

A tremor unlike anything the previous pursuers had caused began to churn in the distance.

Chapter 1070

Senses were a source of information.

Through sight, hearing, smell, taste, and touch, people learned what was happening around them.

Just like now.

This is…

The sensation arrived without warning, like an uninvited guest. I held my breath and stared into the darkness, where I could barely make out objects a hundred feet away.

But as martial arts improved, so did the senses. The several jiazi[3750] of internal energy stored within me were more than enough to push mine beyond their limits.

“Don’t take it off yet.”

“…!”

One short sentence was all it took.

Jeong Hogun’s eyes widened, answering for him.

Nearly at the same time—or, no, a hair before me—Bow Saint and Jeok Cheongang noticed the change. They spoke in turn.

“Dust cloud. About a thousand yards out.”

“They’re not like the ones we’ve faced so far. Everyone, prepare yourselves.”

Bow Saint told us what she’d seen and heard. Jeok Cheongang voiced his suspicion.

The same ominous suspicion I’d been having.

Rumble. Rumble.

A vibration traveled through the ground, drawing closer.

But something was different this time.

The rumble was incomparably louder and deeper than anything caused by the pursuers we’d fought on three separate occasions.

What is it?

I strained my senses further and finally caught a new clue.

Boom. Boom.

Amid the constant, faint tremors came the occasional, heavier impact.

No.

A thunderous boom.

The moment I realized, a chill ran down my spine.

[3750] A jiazi is a sixty-year cycle in the traditional East Asian calendar.

That sound wasn't something a mere human could make. It belonged to the cursed monsters that should never have existed in this world, yet had become real all the same.

Rooooom!

The boom drew closer and shook the earth. Another layer of darkness and stench spread over the low hill.

And then—

"Grrrraaaah."

Something that could hardly be called human slowly raised its head above the hill, letting out a low, ominous roar.

No. A monster.

The moment the three thousand people saw the cursed monster with their own eyes, they froze.

Even the Embroidered Uniform Guard, whose loyalty was harder than steel.

Even the martial artists of the Black Dragon Demon Gate, who'd weathered every hardship the unorthodox martial world could throw at them.

Even the Disciples of the Zhongnan and Kongtong Sects, who'd spent long years refining their minds and bodies in the Daoist tradition.

In that moment, neither the level of their martial arts nor their experience in the martial world meant anything. Skill, age, experience—none of it could shield them from the shock.

It couldn't have been otherwise. It was only natural.

What the hell… is that?

Everyone had the same thought as the monster appeared atop the hill.

It was huge. Just huge.

Faced with that overwhelming sight, they forgot measurements altogether. Anyone would have, seeing a monster nearly twenty feet tall with a torso as thick as an old tree.

"Grrrraaaah."

A vast hole opened—the monster's mouth—and wind blew from it.

Its cry was too slow to call a roar, which made it all the more chilling. The wind that poured out with it carried more than a horrible stench.

Fear.

It was fear.

The darkest emotion a human could feel—and, for some monsters, a power bestowed at birth.

There was no other word for it. People from another world called that power exactly what it was: Fear.

Hummmmmm.

The people felt the air tremble. Their vision grew hazy, and their legs would no longer lift from the ground.

“P-Primordial Heavenly Venerable…”

The groan that escaped one Daoist’s lips spoke for them all.

Supernatural powers?

The inexplicable?

No. Wrong. Not enough.

What words could possibly describe this moment, this monster, in full? Why had the god they followed allowed such a cursed being upon the earth?

Only days ago, countless followers of Dark Heaven had blackened the vast snowy fields of Great Snow Mountain. Even they hadn’t inspired this much terror.

Nor had the jiangshi who, following the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord’s bell, had stained the imperial palace’s great banquet hall with blood—the ones the Embroidered Uniform Guard remembered all too well.

At least they’d had human shapes. However far they’d fallen from being human, they’d retained something of their original form.

But—

This can’t be real.

It can’t be. This is impossible.

It’s a dream. Yes. It has to be.

Frozen where they stood, the people stared through distant, clouded eyes at the monster towering over the hill.

If Pangu, the primordial giant said to have opened the world with a single swing of his axe, had existed in some unimaginably distant past, perhaps he’d looked like that.

Of course, unlike Pangu’s majestic myth, passed down through rumor alone, this monster looked as though it had been dragged straight out of someone’s nightmare.

Boom. Rumble!

One step.

But no one who saw the low hill crumble in a single step could call it “just” a step. The monster’s heavy footfall trapped them in endless terror.

It was fear of something they’d never seen or heard of before. Just looking at it felt enough to stop their breath, as if that fear had become an invisible hand squeezing their hearts until they burst.

That was what would have happened—if a dazzling flash hadn't erupted from somewhere at that very moment.

Whoosh!

In an instant, the pitch-black darkness split apart.

Space warped along a deep blue flame, dark yet bright, bright yet dark.

Something that was neither light nor darkness.

Fire.

Hellfire that held both darkness and light, powerful enough to burn and purify everything.

At the very tip of that fire, warping space as it surged forward, stood the enormous monster that had just stepped over the hill.

"Grrrraah!"

Its roar shook the air in every direction. At the same time, an arm as thick as a log swung toward the fire, bursting through the compressed air.

No.

It swung toward the small, unimpressive human flying at it as though he and his flame-wreathed spear were one.

Whoooosh!

A horrifyingly violent rush of air.

But even as the monster's fist, packed with tremendous force, bore down on him, Jin Taekyung's gaze didn't waver. He rushed toward the monster, stepping on invisible stairs in midair.

Neither did his stride, his body hurtling forward—or the silver-white spearhead wreathed in deep-blue flame.

Shhk.

The spearhead suddenly moved with fluid grace, flames rippling along it. Their tremendous heat warped the space around them, making it look as though a fire dragon were moving through the air.

Just like the name of a spear form an old ancestor of the Fire Gate Clan had devised long ago after painstaking thought.

Fire Dragon's Single Tail.

The fire dragon's tail glided through the air and met the monster's fist.

Slice!

Everyone on the ground heard the chillingly sharp cut and saw an enormous mass of flesh separate from its owner's body.

The monster saw it too.

"Grr…?"

Puzzled, it looked at its huge fist—or rather, where its fist had been.

Only now did blood begin to bead along the cleanly severed edge.

Splaaash!

Blood erupted in a fountain. The pain arrived a moment late, while the question remained unanswered. Overwhelmed by a feeling it couldn't comprehend, the monster writhed.

It never noticed the spearhead still streaking toward a single point.

Thud.

The monster felt something so hot its vision turned white, yet so cold it shuddered.

The spearhead had driven straight into its throat. It cut off the roar the monster had been about to unleash and poured out a fire it couldn't possibly resist.

Just like the eyes of the man filling its vision.

"This isn't a Troll or an ogre… What the hell are you?"

Jin Taekyung's voice was low.

The monster lacked the intelligence to understand him. He saw as much in its large, bewildered eyes.

"Yeah. I figured. That's all you were allowed, isn't it?"

A monster's Intelligence was proportional to its strength.

Jin Taekyung murmured the words as he studied it with a somber gaze. Unable to make a sound past the spearhead in its throat, the monster stared back at him, its eyes slowly dimming. He clenched his teeth.

"Who brought you into being? How?"

He wasn't asking the monster for an answer.

It was a question for himself—and for the other enemies appearing beyond the giant's shoulder.

Boom! Rumble!

Large and small shadows, cloaked in darkness, surged forward like a wave.

The ground, which had trembled faintly, now shook violently, as though an earthquake had begun. And it wasn't happening in just one direction.

Rumble.

Beneath the tremendous noise of the enemies now a few hundred feet away, he felt fainter vibrations. They came from farther off, layer upon layer, in every direction.

Jin Taekyung muttered without realizing it.

"…A net over heaven and earth."

There was no doubt. They'd been surrounded—and with meticulous care.

He knew better than anyone that low-Intelligence monsters could never have formed a net like this on their own.

Jingle. Jingle.

Faint bells sounded from all around, carried on the wind. Jin Taekyung twisted the spearhead embedded deep in the monster.

Crack. Splaaash!

The monster died without a final cry. Its body crumpled, and foul-smelling blood burst out, soaking his collar.

He didn’t care.

He’d have to be drenched in their blood countless times before the night was over. Perhaps for days to come.

It was the only way to tear through this horrifyingly tight net and make it east.

“You all saw that, right? These fuckers ain’t shit.”

Jin Taekyung spoke to everyone.

East, west, south, north.

There was nowhere to run. All they could do was fight.

“Let’s go.”

At his low command, three thousand weapons leveled toward the enemy.

Chapter 1071

I quickly took stock of our surroundings.

First, I gauged the enemy's numbers from the dust clouds rolling in on every side and the force of the tremors coming through the ground.

At least ten thousand. No fewer than that.

Things weren't looking good.

Even a rough count put them at more than three times our numbers. And the enemies closing in by the second were monsters that neither tired nor died easily.

There might even be another mutant like that one among them.

I turned toward the giant's corpse. Its head was split in half, and it was dead for good.

Whatever that enormous thing had been, it wasn't a Troll or an ogre. The monster encyclopedia recorded every kind of monster to appear since the Great Cataclysm had plunged the modern twenty-first century into chaos, and there was nothing like it in there.

As I'd thought earlier, mutant was the only word that fit. The same went for the other monsters that had begun appearing in Murim some time ago.

Right. It's the same pattern as before.

This wasn't the first time mutants had appeared.

Similar things had happened in Hubei and at the Nanman Beast Palace.

And I remembered clearly what had been at the center of those incidents every time: followers of the Lord of Heaven and the rifts they had brought about.

If that's the case, could it be…?

An ominous thought flashed through my mind. I shook my head and pushed it aside.

Even if it was true, dealing with the enemies in front of us came first.

"Sama Pyo. Jeong Hogun."

I spoke abruptly, looking the two of them straight in the eye.

"You'll take the left and right flanks."

They bowed without a word and moved at once.

Each commanded a thousand men. They would form our two wings, with help from a certain Supreme Peak master who'd held us up at the worst possible time—and, by a ridiculous coincidence, bought us time to prepare for the enemy.

"Great Sir."

"Hm? Me? Can't I sit this one out? I don't have any particular grudge against them."

"Fuck, Great Sir."

"…Where should I go?"

"Both flanks. Move between them and help whichever one's in trouble."

"Ugh. All right."

That would make our wings sharper and sturdier. Great Sir's mind might wander, but a flank with a Supreme Peak master to support it wouldn't break easily.

"And what would you have me do?"

I answered Perfected Being Hyeoncheon, the Sect Leader of the Kongtong Sect, at once.

"Please take the rear with the Kongtong Disciples, Sect Leader."

"It's unfortunate that the Zhongnan Sect has taken the vanguard from us, but in this situation, our sect must play the most important role. I understand your intentions, Daoist Friend.[3751]"

With the enemy's encirclement nearly complete, the rear mattered more than the vanguard.

Hyeoncheon understood tactics better than most martial artists. He was a veteran who'd fought his way through the Great Faction War, and he'd grasped my intention immediately.

But even he hadn't seen the whole picture.

"The Zhongnan Sect won't take the vanguard."

"What do you mean?"

Leaving Hyeoncheon looking puzzled, I called to a man who stood gripping his sword, his face tense.

"Hyuk Sopyung. You and the Zhongnan Sect will help the Kongtong Sect take the rear."

Hyuk Sopyung—the Zhongnan One Dragon—stared at me, wide-eyed.

He was leading Zhongnan's surviving Disciples in place of the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord, who'd been severely injured at Great Snow Mountain and had been forced to remain in Gansu.

And he wasn't the only one surprised. Everyone nearby had been hanging on my every word, and they all reacted the same way.

"Then who's taking the vanguard…?"

As Hyuk Sopyung trailed off, a rough voice cut through the crowd.

"What are you standing around for? Get your asses to the rear."

The Fire King. Jeok Cheongang.

Beside the giant who'd stamped his mark so violently on the vast martial world stood a woman known not as a king, but as a star.

Click.

[3751] Daoist Friend is a respectful form of address meaning "fellow practitioner" in Daoist usage. In martial fiction, it can be used more broadly.

Bow Saint silently joined her two curved swords into a massive bow. Everyone fell quiet.

Who were they?

The Fire King and the Bow Saint.

The King of Kings, who held the fiercest flames. The star of the martial world, who'd ruled countless battlefields with a single bow.

Living legends of Murim.

And—

Step.

I, too, had earned the right to stand with them. I had become a symbol in my own right, someone who could walk toward the Fire King and Bow Saint.

I might be a little smaller than they were, and weaker still.

I, Jin Taekyung—the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon—was another giant who'd risen in this goddamn war.

Rrrrrumble!

The ground trembled. No, it writhed.

Apart from the low hill behind us, this reed bed had been open on every side. Now thick dust clouds surrounded it.

No—not dust clouds. Monsters we knew nothing about, from places we couldn't name.

But—

"Anyone still scared of those worthless bastards?"

I wasn't afraid of them.

The only thing I feared was someone dying because I'd made a mistake.

"If you're afraid—if you want to get away—leave the formation now. I won't blame you."

I meant it.

Everyone had family, something they had to protect. There was no cowardice in trying to survive.

If anyone wanted to fall back so they could make it home alive, I'd gladly protect them.

Just as someone had protected me years ago in that dark, reeking cave.

And now, beside me, were people worth risking my life to protect.

"Fuck it, what's life anyway? I've spent all this time following your ass around, Captain. Now I wouldn't even flinch if the Heavenly Demon's granddad showed up."

Hyuk Mujin's sudden remark drew quiet laughter from around us. Then he added, softly:

"I'll follow you. Even to the edge of hell."

"…!"

"…!"

For an instant, the air around us rang like a struck string.

The tremendous rumbling around us and the monsters' roars beyond it might as well have vanished. In their place rose a wave of steel.

Clang, clang, clang, clang!

Weapons lifted, and a shout went up.

The fighters forgot their exhaustion and their fear of monsters they'd never seen. They roared like beasts, glaring into the shifting darkness.

They remembered why they had to be here. They remembered the faces of those they missed, the people the monsters had killed.

And at their head stood me.

"Remember only two things."

I walked toward the vanguard as I spoke.

"First. Keep the formation, no matter what happens."

Clack, clack, clack!

A tide of people parted before me, revealing the empty space beyond.

Unlike the other sections, where a thousand men had gathered in each, this vacant spot looked like a massive hole that could collapse at any moment. But it wasn't one anymore.

"Second."

Step.

I stopped among the reeds.

Bow Saint stood to my left, Jeok Cheongang to my right. Behind the three of us stood the members of the Fire Dragon Pavilion, who'd followed me as though it were the most natural thing in the world.

There were only a handful of us, but we filled the gap at the front. The formation was complete.

"Survive. Whatever it takes."

The instant I spoke those final words—

Rrrrrumble!

A deafening roar sounded as if the sky had split open, and countless shadows poured in from every direction.

Toward the circular formation of some three thousand elite fighters.

No. Toward an enormous wheel armed in steel.

Whoooosh—BOOM!

A streak of light flew from Bow Saint's fingertips, tore through the darkness, and exploded.

Craaaack!

The steel wheel—the wheel of death—met the monsters that did not belong in this world.

Jingle.

Beyond the swirling spray of blood, the eerie, sinister ringing of a bell carried through the air.

They were there in the deep darkness.

No. At least for now, perhaps they were the darkness.

They weren't merely hiding in it. They wore it like a curtain, concealing their bodies behind it. Even if they hadn't been covered head to toe in black, precious few people could have seen through that curtain.

The people capable of seeing through their concealment were hundreds of yards away, fighting countless monsters.

Monsters that, to be precise, were moving under the black-clad figures' control.

Jingle.

One of the figures shook the sinister bell in his hand.

The sound from the old, blackened bell was dull, yet it carried clearly into the distance, conveying another set of orders and information. His comrades, hidden at regular intervals on every side, were doing the same.

"So it's finally begun."

BOOM!

A flash lit up the distance with a tremendous boom, and the man muttered to himself.

The monsters' ceaseless roars made it impossible to tell much from sound alone. But that streak of light was unmistakably Bow Saint's. The battle had begun.

"It's not where we wanted them… Still, at least we managed to surround them."

He couldn't help feeling disappointed.

Fifteen minutes. If the enemy had moved just fifteen minutes faster and cleared the reed bed, he and his comrades could have begun the battle from a far more advantageous position.

"But it's started now. Nothing to be done."

The battle was underway, and the task assigned to the thirty sorcerers, himself included, was clear.

"Reduce their numbers as much as possible. If you can, capture Jin Taekyung alive."

He quietly repeated the order the Blood Lord had sent half a day earlier and frowned.

“Capture him alive? Not kill him?”

He’d received information on the enemy before the order arrived. It was absurd.

Their force included no fewer than six Supreme Peak masters. Two of them were the Fire King and Bow Saint.

If the sorcerers threw everything they had at Jin Taekyung alone, they might well kill him. Capturing him alive was another matter entirely.

“Damn it.”

The curse at the Blood Lord slipped out before he could stop it. He sucked in a breath and glanced around.

But, as always, there were only monsters standing vacantly nearby, reeking horribly.

“…This is bullshit.”

He glared at his subordinates. He hated the sight of himself trembling at the thought of the Blood Lord, who was far away. Today, the mindless monsters that did nothing but stink seemed especially loathsome too.

“Stupid things.”

Jingle.

The black-robed man shook the evil bell with a shooing motion. The hundred monsters surrounding their master to guard him immediately took a step back without hesitation.

At least, that was what the black-robed man knew was supposed to happen.

Step.

“…?”

He blinked.

Ninety-nine monsters had backed away. The remaining one had taken a step forward.

“What the hell is this?”

Before the black-robed man could find the words, the monster finally seemed to realize its situation. Its backside twitched as it fidgeted, then it said:

“W-Wow. Amazing. Never seen a monster like this before, have you?”

“…!”

“I-I haven’t either. Damn it.”

The monster—or, clearly, someone who was a person—continued in a trembling voice, then wore a miserable expression and sighed.

Chapter 1072

At that moment, only one thought ran through the black-robed man's mind.

Am I seeing things?

It was a reasonable question.

He was a sorcerer. An experienced one, and highly skilled.

He had neither internal energy measured in jiazi[3752] nor martial arts exceptional enough to be called divine. What he did have was the ability to control hundreds of monsters perfectly.

And yet…

What the hell is this guy?

He stared blankly at the monster before him—or rather, at the intruder who had clearly pulled a monster's hide over himself.

Only after pinching his arm hard enough to confirm he wasn't dreaming could he force out the question he'd been holding back.

"Who are you?"

The intruder flinched and answered haltingly.

"I-I'm a monster."

"…You're talking like a person."

"A-aren't there monsters that talk like people?"

"…There can't be."

Faced with the expert's thoroughly logical rebuttal, the intruder fell silent for a moment. Then he opened his mouth.

"Grrrooooar."

"…"

"Ahem. Grrrooooar."

"…"

"G-grraaaah."

Now he was even raising both arms like a jiangshi[3753] as he continued his uncertain attempts at a monster's roar. The black-robed man, more confused than ever, shouted, "Stop!"

The intruder gasped. "Why?"

"What the hell are you doing?"

"I was trying my best to imitate them… Wasn't that last one pretty close?"

"Well, the last one was a little close."

"Wow, I knew it! Thank you!"

[3752] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle used here to measure accumulated internal energy.

[3753] In Chinese folklore, a jiangshi is a reanimated corpse often depicted with stiff, outstretched arms.

An exchange that strayed this far from common sense could paralyze the mind.

As the black-robed man stood speechless, the intruder, unable to hide his delight, added proudly, “All that practice for two days straight paid off. I guess it’s true what they say: hard work doesn’t betray you.”

The black-robed man blinked, still floundering in confusion.

“W-what did you just say?”

“Hm?”

The intruder tilted his head. His eyes, visible beyond the rotten hide, were clear and bright.

“Oh, about hard work not betraying you? My grandfather’s been telling me that since I was little…”

“Not that!”

“Oh, I know what you mean. The big people. Well, it’s not quite right to call them people, but anyway, I hid in there and kept trying to imitate them.”

“S-so you mean…”

“That’s right. Like I said, I’ve been doing it for two days.”

“…!”

The answer was innocent enough, but the black-robed man felt a shock run down his spine.

For two days? And I never noticed?

It made no sense.

After grueling training, he’d gained the ability to control some five hundred monsters perfectly. He could detect the life energy of a living human with his eyes closed.

But…

He’s not lying.

He could feel it instinctively. Everything the intruder had said was true, without a single lie.

As far as he could tell, the man didn’t have the Intelligence to lie convincingly. And now that he’d been caught so plainly, he had no reason to hide anything.

That realization finally brought the black-robed man to his senses. Until now, he might as well have been bewitched.

“You… You’re an orthodox faction lackey.”

The intruder gasped and hurriedly waved his hands.

“N-no, I’m not!”

“Shut up, you madman.”

“Madman? That’s a very vulgar and bad word. My grandfather told me never to say it.”

“You little piece of—!”

The black-robed man felt his blood rush to his head. However unexpected the situation, he'd let this lunatic play him, if only for a moment.

He shook the evil bell in his hand, putting all his anger into the motion.

Jingle!

He hadn't imagined the extra force in its sound.

The death energy possessed by sorcerers who commanded monsters made the ringing clearer and more sinister. That chilling note carried two messages.

First, it alerted the other sorcerers stationed nearby to what was happening.

And second—

Whoosh! Thud!

It ordered the hundred or so monsters he'd brought as guards to deal with the madman.

"You have one chance left to receive my mercy."

The monsters swept around them with speed that belied their enormous frames, surrounding the intruder and forming an iron wall in front of the black-robed man. From behind it, he ground out his offer.

"Surrender quietly and tell me everything you know. I'll give you a relatively quick and painless death."

He wasn't relying on numbers alone.

Each monster guarding him had skill comparable to a master ranging from at least Supreme First Rate up to Peak.

Their strength and speed surpassed human limits, and, more than anything, their tenacious vitality was a nightmare.

And there were a hundred of them.

Even if the intruder before him was a lunatic with tremendous skill, the outcome wouldn't change in the slightest.

The monsters here weren't the only ones he'd have to face.

"Struggle all you like. In a few moments, you won't even be able to do that."

Thinking of his fellow sorcerers, who should have received the signal and be rushing here already, the black-robed man curled one corner of his mouth.

"But why haven't they answered?"

The intruder's sudden question made the black-robed man reflexively ask:

"What?"

"Answered. Uh, should I call it an answering ring? Anyway, I watched you for two days. You always send a bell signal back, even for the smallest thing."

"…Huh?"

The black-robed man suddenly realized something. He hurriedly looked around.

No. Looking would do him no good. He focused every bit of his attention on listening for his fellow sorcerers' reply—for the sinister ringing of bells like his own.

But all he heard was the wind blowing in from far away and the breathing of the monsters around him. No answer came.

Nothing at all.

"…!"

His heart lurched.

Something had gone wrong.

Terribly wrong.

As dread swept through him, his eyes turned toward the intruder. Despite being surrounded by monsters, the fellow had his ears pricked and his hands cupped around them like a trumpet, listening too.

"Oh. I definitely can't hear anything. Nothing at all."

"You… You…"

What could he say? How was he supposed to make sense of this?

The black-robed man could barely get the words out. Beyond the discolored monster hide, the intruder's eyes curved clearly into crescents.

"What a relief. I knew I could count on Little Grandpa."

"Little… Grandpa?"

"Yes. He teaches me all sorts of things. He gets really angry whenever I call him Little Grandpa, but sometimes I think he secretly likes it, too."

The intruder caught himself rambling and snapped his mouth shut with a gasp.

"Oh, don't tell Little Grandpa I said that. He'll get angry again."

The black-robed man didn't answer. He no longer had the presence of mind to.

He stared at the intruder, who had finally stopped talking, and barely managed to force out the question that had just come to him.

"Who… No, who are you people?"

His vision swam. What he'd just heard had made him realize a truth he desperately didn't want to believe.

The other thirty or so sorcerers who had come here with him were already dead.

They'd been killed the same way the intruder had slipped in beside him—or in a manner even more secretive and deadly.

If any were still alive, they wouldn't be for long.

Not if the man whose sobriquet had just flashed through the black-robed man's mind was here.

"Th-that Little Grandpa of yours… Don't tell me he's…"

"What did you just say?"

The flat voice suddenly pierced his ears, and a shock like lightning striking the crown of his head swept over him.

He was here.

Little Grandpa—no, that man.

Right behind him.

Yet the black-robed man hadn't sensed his breathing. No breath had brushed the back of his neck when the man spoke. He'd detected neither the slightest presence nor a trace of life energy.

The breathless voice sounded again in the black-robed man's ear. His body had gone rigid as a statue.

"I asked you. What were you babbling about?"

The black-robed man forgot how to speak. He even forgot how to breathe.

All he could do was make one final, instinctive struggle to survive.

He didn't even realize that a thin line had cut across his wrist before he could move the old, bloodstained evil bell, which was practically everything he had.

Slice. Plop.

Everything came a moment too late.

The severed wrist hit the ground. Only then did its owner notice it was gone.

And the black-robed man recognized the pain only when it arrived at last, then let out a scream filled with fear.

"Guh…!"

Tap. Thud.

His body crumpled helplessly as the Sleep Acupoint was pressed.

Unable even to finish his scream, he plunged into pitch-black darkness with no end in sight. The voices of two people drifted after him, faint as a dream.

"I told you I'd kill you if you called me that one more time."

"I'm sorry, Little Grandpa."

"…This is driving me crazy. Let's go find that guy."

"Yes! Little Grandpa!"

Truly, right to the very end, it was like a nightmare.

Chapter 1073

Slice!

The moment I brought my spear down and cut through its first victim, my heart sank.

Was it because the enemy was stronger than I'd expected?

Or because some part of me was already turning over the word defeat?

No. Neither was true.

I'd believed we would win from the start. I'd never doubted it.

I was simply facing my own limits again.

The limits of a mere human—limits I could never completely escape, no matter how many times I broke through them.

How many people will die this time?

Of course I knew I wasn't an all-powerful god who could save everyone. No one else could be one, either.

Not the heroes of distant myth. Not even Cheon Taemin, hailed as humanity's savior.

To gain something, you had to pay a fitting price. Whether that price was time or lives.

But knowing that didn't mean I could get used to it.

No. I must never get used to it.

If I did, I'd start taking it all for granted.

And another person's sacrifice and death must never become something I took for granted.

Crraaaack!

Just once.

The spearhead swept through, wreathed in Force. Flesh tore with a sickening sound, and a thick mist of blood spread through the air.

If the enemy had been human, the sight would have struck them with shock and fear.

But even as dozens of monsters were minced into chunks and scattered, they didn't so much as flinch. They surged in from every direction, a relentless tide.

Their tightly packed front line didn't match the savage force of their charge.

Their Intelligence isn't high enough for this. Someone's definitely directing them.

Before the battle had begun in earnest, the eerie sound of bells had carried on the wind from every direction. I hadn't imagined it.

Mutants, or monsters.

I didn't know exactly what to call those hideous creatures, but one thing was clear: somewhere, someone was controlling them like puppets.

There was just one problem…

They're well hidden.

Maybe they'd taken the presence of Supreme Peak masters like me into account. There had to be several of them, yet I couldn't find a single one.

Neither could the person with the sharpest eyes among our allies.

Whoosh—BOOM!

Four streaks of light flew in succession toward the east, west, north, and south, swallowing the space before them as they exploded.

Amid the shock waves and thunderous blasts that shook the air on every side, a familiar, calm voice reached my ears.

"I can't see or sense them from here. They're at least a hundred jang[3754] away."

Bow Saint had spoken as if she'd read my mind.

At the same moment, Jeok Cheongang appeared, drenched in the monsters' blood.

"And there are a hell of a lot of them."

Fwoosh—BOOM!

Before he'd even finished speaking, he thrust out a fist.

Flames raced forward, burning even the air, and swallowed the monsters in a blast of heat.

"Grrr…"

"Aaagh!"

Screams rang out one over another.

Yet even after that mighty strike brought down dozens more enemies, Jeok Cheongang's expression didn't brighten in the slightest.

"At this rate, it'll never end. Unless we wipe out every last one of them, we won't open a path."

The battle was going our way. That much was clear.

The problem was what would happen by the time we'd killed all the monsters surrounding us.

A substantial number of our three thousand allies would be dead or wounded, and Dark Heaven would keep pursuing us afterward.

Damn it.

I swallowed the curse rising in my throat and looked around.

The battle against ten thousand monsters had begun only moments ago.

For now, thanks to the efforts of several Supreme Peak masters, myself included, we hadn't suffered any notable casualties. But that was only a matter of time.

[3754] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft). A hundred jang is about 303 m (994 ft); two jang is about 6.06 m (19.9 ft).

They were already exhausted. They'll crumble soon.

Battle was a fight against yourself, too.

Our fighters might be handpicked elites, but unlike the enemy, they were human, made of flesh and blood.

Once you knew you stood between life and death, your body tired quickly and your thoughts began to blur.

The Supreme Peak masters were giving everything they had from the start to protect them, and we were burning through our strength faster than usual.

I was no exception.

Thwack! Thud!

My spearhead cut cleanly through the tendon in a monster's calf. The hulking beast, a full two jang[3755] tall, dropped to one knee.

Its enormous frame looked nothing like a human's.

The flesh covering these monsters was as tough as leather armor. Cutting through their bones, which were harder still, took even more strength.

Crack.

I poured a good deal of internal energy into a palm strike and crushed its skull. Gritting my teeth, I shouted, "Hold the formation!"

The order was repeated all around me, but the replies had already grown noticeably quieter and weaker.

Something has to change.

Fear.

The darkest emotion humans were given.

Of course they were afraid. They were surrounded by monsters they'd never seen or heard of before.

And right now, I had the power to break fear's hold on them.

There was one move—our best chance to turn the situation around, even if it took a tremendous amount of strength.

One chance. Just one. I'll find an opening and tear through their line in a single strike.

Even the strongest wall would fall once you forced a gap in it.

I slowly drew in a breath.

The world began to slow. The noise around me faded, and a new sense opened deep within me.

The Middle Dantian. It still felt unfamiliar.

Rumble…

The space around me suddenly trembled.

[3755] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft). A hundred jang is about 303 m (994 ft); two jang is about 6.06 m (19.9 ft).

I reached out, sensing everything around me.

Or tried to.

Right then, someone appeared, letting out a roar loud enough to shatter my intensely focused senses.

“Gaaaaal!”

His voice brimmed with resolve.

With movements far too impish to match it, Great Sir stepped in front of me and swung an iron sword back and forth. I had no idea where he’d found it.

“You foolish, pitiful monsters! Gaettong, a divine general descended upon this land by Heaven’s will, has arrived! Kneel at once!”

“…!”

“…!”

A cold silence fell.

My allies stared blankly at Great Sir. So did the monsters charging at us from every direction.

What the hell is this guy?

Same look. Same thought.

But the man who’d worked the miracle of bringing humans and monsters together in a moment of shared bewilderment carried on in a stern voice, undeterred.

“Hey! What are you waiting for? Can’t you hear Chunja’s command?”

At the Great Sir’s pronouncement, having changed not only his name but his gender, Jeok Cheongang muttered like a man sighing, “We should’ve grabbed that guy and killed him first.”

A perfectly reasonable suggestion. I almost nodded, but that wasn’t what mattered right now.

The Great Sir showing up at the vanguard meant there was a gap in the left wing, led by Sama Pyo. And that meant our entire formation might soon collapse.

That lunatic…!

I’d known he wasn’t in his right mind. I just hadn’t expected him to pull this shit at such a critical moment.

But there was no time to vent my anger.

I held back the stream of curses rising from deep in my chest and was about to send Great Sir back to his post when—

BOOM!

The ground shook with a tremendous rumble. The nearest monster suddenly dropped to one knee.

“What… What is this?”

The sound that escaped someone’s lips gave voice to the question on all our minds, mine included.

Before we could find an answer, the other monsters surrounding us like an iron wall began to tremble.

“Grrk. Grrrk.”

“Kuwo?”

Their pupils dilated. They let out groans none of us could understand.

And then it began.

Thud. Rumble!

The ground shook as heavy bodies fell one after another, raising thick clouds of dust.

Hundreds fell, then hundreds more, then hundreds again.

It went on until every monster filling the vast reed bed had collapsed.

They fell like an enormous line of dominoes. Everyone, including me, stood speechless before the impossible sight.

Everyone except one person.

“Mm. Yes, that’s right. You’re finally behaving yourselves.”

Great Sir turned toward me, muttering smugly.

“Ahem. Did you see that? That’s what I can do.”

Of course I’d seen it.

I’d seen it perfectly clearly, right in front of me.

And at that moment, I could manage only one question.

“…What is this? Am I dreaming?”

“A dream, you say? Well put. A person’s life is like a dream in broad daylight.”

Great Sir nodded with a knowing smile.

Over his shoulder, Jeok Cheongang looked at me, half dazed.

“What… What in the world is going on?”

As if I knew. I was just as dumbfounded.

“I have no idea either,” I answered.

“You don’t know?”

“No.”

“Well, I’ve seen all sorts of strange things. Have I lived too long?”

“You have lived a long time.”

“Or could we be having the same dream?”

“Maybe. If you don’t mind, could I hit you once? I think it’d hurt too much if you hit me.”

“That sounds far too much like your usual bullshit for a dream. Come to think of it, it’s been a while since you got hit, hasn’t it?”

“That’s a very realistic reaction. Definitely not a dream, then.”

I swiftly shifted my stance to avoid the misfortune of getting hit by Jeok Cheongang, and a voice reached my ears from far away.

“Those two never change. They really don’t.”

I paused. It sounded like a boy who hadn’t even gone through puberty.

“Wow! I’ve never seen a Master and Disciple like that before!”

The next voice came on the wind, bright and impossible to forget. My lips parted before I knew it.

“…Cheongpung?”

Chapter 1074

There's an old saying.

Those who meet must part; those who leave will surely return.

Every meeting ends in a farewell, and everyone who leaves will one day come back.

That old proverb came to mind as I stared wide-eyed at two figures approaching from far away, picking their way through the monsters strewn across the ground in the surrounding darkness.

"Over here! We're over here!"

"How many times do I have to tell you not to shout like that…? Never mind. Do whatever the hell you want."

"Yes! Thank you!"

"This is driving me insane."

The young man bounced along as if he had springs in the soles of his feet, while the boy beside him sighed like an old man. To some people, they might have made a strange sight.

But I—or, rather, a tiny handful of people including me—already knew who they were.

Especially the young man bouncing along in front. You could meet him only once and never forget his energy.

"…Cheongpung?"

The name slipped from my lips before I knew it. The people who'd been frozen in a daze since the monsters' bizarre collapse blinked.

"Cheongpung? Could it be…"

"T-the Huashan Divine Dragon?"

Their reaction was immediate.

There was only one Cheongpung I knew well enough to recognize at a glance who might turn up in a situation like this. You could turn the whole world upside down and shake it out without finding another.

Of course, someone raised a reasonable question.

"I can't see that far. Captain, are you sure you're not mistaken? Why would Cheongpung suddenly show up here…"

Hyuk Mujin had barely begun speaking in an uncharacteristically cautious tone when a clear voice rang out from beyond the darkness.

"Benefactooor!"

"…That's him."

"…It is."

"…Just hearing him makes my head spin. It's definitely him."

At this point, that voice was practically a fingerprint.

Hyuk Mujin and I confirmed it, and then Jeok Cheongang put the matter to rest.

“Benefactor! I’m here!”

With that final shout, Cheongpung swept in like a gust of wind and waved at me, his face flushed.

“Wow, it’s been so long! Have you been doing well?”

How was I supposed to respond to that?

I stared at the first-time-experience menace before me, half bewildered and half glad to see him. After a moment, I finally managed to speak.

“No. Not at all.”

“Oh. You do look that way, actually.”

“Then why’d you ask?”

“I haven’t been doing well, you see. But I hoped things might be different for you. Hee-hee.”

Cheongpung said something gloomy as cheerfully as ever. Watching him, I realized how to respond.

Or rather, a quiet laugh escaped me before I could help it.

“Wait, why are you laughing?”

“You call that a question? He’s laughing because the way you act is ridiculous, you little punk.”

That wasn’t my answer.

Swish.

A boy appeared from the darkness, his presence as faint as a ghost’s—or rather, the greatest assassin of all time. He stared straight at me and added:

“Though the one laughing is just as much of a reckless brat.”

His tone was as blunt as ever.

But when I saw the faint smile at the corner of his mouth, I could only laugh aloud instead of answering.

We’d met again after several months.

Reunions with people you’ve missed are always a joy.

But none of us was stupid enough to sit around a campfire chatting in a situation like this.

“We’d best get out of here quickly. Follow me.”

Before the warmth of our reunion had even faded, the Slaughter Saint wiped the smile from his face and got moving as if nothing had happened.

“Throw away anything that might slow us down. Especially that idiot over there.”

Jeong Hogun, the idiot the Slaughter Saint had pointed out, replied.

“I don’t know what sort of elder you are, but you should at least show some courtesy. I am a Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, serving under His Majesty the Emperor’s solemn command…”

Whoosh.

It happened in an instant.

The Slaughter Saint’s figure blurred. Wind swept past, and a gleaming blue dagger came to rest against Jeong Hogun’s neck.

“Go on. Keep talking. Waste even a few more moments and I’ll make you a late elder.”

Everyone, myself included, recognized the extraordinary loyalty Jeong Hogun and his Embroidered Uniform Guards bore the Emperor.

But reality was cold.

The Emperor was somewhere far away. The dagger was right against Jeong Hogun’s neck. He stared at it for a moment, then spoke with a grim face.

“As I said, I am a Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, serving under His Majesty the Emperor’s solemn command…but you appear to have a close relationship with the Marquis of Shangshan, so I’ll let this pass.”

The Slaughter Saint replied dryly to that thoroughly undignified excuse for an Embroidered Uniform Guard.

“We’re not that close.”

“You seem to know each other at least somewhat, so I’ll let it pass.”

“Of course we know each other. I said we’re not close.”

“…”

“Just let it go. Understand?”

“…”

“I’ll take that as a yes.”

The Slaughter Saint had let him keep that last scrap of dignity in the name of martial-world etiquette. By the time he put away the dagger, most of our three thousand allies were staring at him in shock.

A boy who couldn’t be twenty, even by the most generous estimate, had subdued a Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard who had reached the far end of the Peak realm.

In a single move, so fast no one could see it.

Everyone was astonished, but Perfected Being Hyeoncheon seemed more shaken than anyone.

“Fellow Daoist…who are you?”

What you can see depends on where you stand.

Perfected Being Hyeoncheon was a seasoned Supreme Peak master, skilled enough to make out something of the Slaughter Saint's true realm. Shock and confusion left him unable to say more, and Bow Saint spoke in his place.

"It's been a long time. I never thought I'd see you again like this."

The Slaughter Saint had seen through her identity, just as she had his. He answered with a bitter smile.

"I feel the same. After that day, I thought we'd never meet again."

"Mountains and rivers have changed, and the world has changed with them. I had to act to set everything right."

The people around them looked more confused with every word they exchanged. Bow Saint quietly added:

"Just as you did, Slaughter Saint."

"…!"

"…!"

"…!"

For an instant, the air seemed to crackle.

The Slaughter Saint.

Once condemned by the whole martial world, he had gone on to strike fear into countless great fiends after the Great War between the Orthodox and Demonic factions began. He was the greatest assassin of all time.

Those two words were enough to explain the situation to everyone.

The Slaughter Saint gave Bow Saint a small nod, then addressed the people frozen like statues.

"So. Is there another idiot who wants to waste this precious time?"

Of course there wasn't.

Or, to be precise, even if there was, there had better not be.

Not when the person asking was the Slaughter Saint.

Clank. Clatter!

Jeong Hogun and the other Embroidered Uniform Guards threw off their armor with the speed of reservists heading home after training. The Slaughter Saint's eyes suddenly narrowed.

"But what exactly is that thing?"

I followed his gaze and immediately understood what he meant.

I also understood why he'd called a human being with all his limbs intact a thing.

"Well, how should I put it… That gentleman's a little out of his mind."

"…I've gathered that much."

The Slaughter Saint sighed as he watched Great Sir, who had somehow blended in among the Embroidered Uniform Guards and was enthusiastically stripping off his clothes.

“I’ll have to hear the details, but it seems clear enough that we’ve got one more madman.”

The original madman, of course, was watching the newcomer’s display of physical beauty from right beside him, full of admiration.

“Wow! I’ve never seen anyone take their clothes off so boldly!”

Jeong Hogun stopped Great Sir just as he was about to remove his underwear. Great Sir spotted Cheongpung, and his eyes lit up.

“Thank you for the compliment. And who might you be?”

“Hello! I’m Cheongpung!”

“You’re a spirited young man. I like that. I’m Soonja.”

“Nice to meet you, Auntie!”

No.

Are these guys seriously insane?

Just as everyone stood aghast at the meeting of two natural disasters that shouldn’t occur even once in a hundred years, the Slaughter Saint shook his head and spoke.

“Right. Let’s get going.”

In his hand was a rope that stretched far off into the distance.

“What’s that?”

“War trophy.”

To get straight to the point, the enemies didn’t pursue us after that.

Or maybe it would be more accurate to say that they did, and they didn’t.

“Go on ahead. I’ll catch up soon.”

The Slaughter Saint said that and left us several times. Each time he returned just when we needed him, his body reeking of blood.

After nearly two full days, he said, “They should be less of a nuisance from here on.”

Not one of our three thousand allies, myself included, failed to understand what he meant. He’d shaken off Dark Heaven’s relentless pursuit.

And we all knew how he’d dealt with the pursuers so quickly—and that it was he and Cheongpung, not Great Sir, who had taken down the nearly ten thousand monsters.

“Mmph, mmph.”

The war trophy—no, the black-robed man bound from head to toe in rope—wriggled. Taishan, who was running with him tucked under one arm like a piece of luggage, raised a fist as big as a cauldron lid.

“Don’t move. I’ll hit you.”

“Mmph. Mmmph!”

“Don’t make noise. I’ll eat you.”

“…!”

It was a strange threat, but it worked perfectly.

The black-robed man went still and silent as a mouse. Our allies had been on a brutal forced march for days without rest, but before long we finally left that miserable wilderness behind.

Waiting for us was an enormous lake unlike any I’d ever seen. Around it, a group of beggars huddled together beside their campfires.

Among them was a very familiar face.

“Oh! They’re here! Over here!”

A face so shabby it made you reach for your wallet even from a distance.

Gung Gibang—the next beggar king, destined to lead a hundred thousand beggars.

Chapter 1075

Sometimes people you've been meaning to see all come back into your life at once.

Like right now.

"I'm Gung Gibang, a junior of Murim. It's an honor to meet you, Seniors!"

Gung Gibang had come running as if his feet were on fire. At his hearty greeting, I spoke on everyone's behalf in a stern voice.

"The Beggars' Sect's Successor Beggar, is it? Good. Pleased to meet you."

"…"

"I'm Jin Taekyung. We're about the same age, so from now on, feel free to call me Elder."

"…You haven't changed. Not one bit."

I shrugged at the guy, whose already ugly face looked like he'd just swallowed shit.

"Of course I haven't. If a perfectly normal person suddenly changes, it means he's about to die."

"I don't think you were ever perfectly normal."

"I was a lot better than you."

"In what way, exactly?"

"Plenty of ways. Let's start with our looks. We're on completely different levels."

"Damn it. I can't deny that one."

Gung Gibang let out a deep sigh, then chuckled.

"Still, I'm glad you haven't changed."

I laughed along with him.

It felt good to hear him say that. And I felt the same way about him.

Gung Gibang and the Beggars' Sect disciples led us over to the campfires.

A winter-cold blizzard was howling all around us, but the warmth of the fires springing up here and there was enough to make us forget the cold. They'd also laid out dry rations to replenish our exhausted allies' hunger and strength.

Plenty of them.

"Were you waiting for us?"

"Of course. We expected reinforcements to come from Gansu."

Gung Gibang handed me some jerky and added, "We even figured those reinforcements might make the insane choice of crossing the Qilian Mountains."

"Was it a rash decision? The missive from the Kunlun Sect made it sound like there wasn't an hour to spare."

“No. It was exactly the right call. We only got a chance to catch our breath a few days ago ourselves.”

A scab still marked Gung Gibang’s forehead, proof enough that he wasn’t lying.

A clear mark of battle.

His expression and voice were bright, but he’d recently been through a fight for his life, too.

“Oh, this? It’s nothing. Don’t worry about it. I survived, and that’s what matters.”

Gung Gibang gave me a bitter smile, doing his best to sound solemn. I looked him up and down.

“Yeah. It really is nothing.”

“…”

“What?”

“Could you let me hit you just once?”

“Hmm. If you ask nicely, maybe.”

“And what about revenge afterward?”

“Oh, come on. What do you take me for? Of course there’ll be revenge. I’ll beat you within an inch of your life.”

“…I had you pegged perfectly.”

Gung Gibang shook his head and went on. “Anyway, considering we stayed at the very rear until the end, we got off cheap. Though that was only thanks to help arriving at just the right time.”

Gung Gibang glanced toward the Slaughter Saint, who’d been chewing his jerky in silence.

“You were just lucky,” the Slaughter Saint said. “We happened to be nearby.”

“I was truly shocked at first. I never imagined you’d be in Qinghai with Cheongpung…”

“The more people who know about you, the harder it is to accomplish your goal. And I’m no Great Hero.”

In other words, he’d kept his existence hidden even from his own allies.

“Then had you been here the whole time since we left for the Nanman Beast Palace?” I asked.

“I wouldn’t say the whole time. We only arrived in Qinghai about a month ago.”

I thought back over the past few months.

The last time I’d seen the Slaughter Saint was just after the Two Dragons Pavilion was founded, with Cheongpung and me at its center, around the time we left for Nanman.

So even setting aside that month in Qinghai, he’d spent the past several months on some kind of mission with Cheongpung…

Why hadn’t I heard a single thing about it?

It was strange.

Since we'd parted, I'd been caught up in one major incident after another, starting with the Nanman Beast Palace. Each time, the whole world's attention had turned our way.

Rumors traveled tens of thousands of ri[3756] without needing legs.

And yet I hadn't heard anything about where the Slaughter Saint and Cheongpung had been or what they'd done.

The Slaughter Saint clearly didn't want to tell me, either. Before I could ask, he spat out the jerky he'd been chewing.

"Tough. I'll be resting nearby for a bit. Don't look for me."

He hadn't said anything directly, but his actions made his meaning clearer than words.

"Always keeping secrets," Jeok Cheongang muttered, clicking his tongue as he watched the Slaughter Saint walk away. "No wonder people say he's got a foul temper."

Then he saw my expression and frowned.

"What's with that rotten look?"

"…What did I do?"

"Explain yourself."

"N-nothing. You probably know better than I do."

"What's that supposed to mean?"

Cheongpung, sitting near the campfire with a drowsy expression, spoke up on my behalf.

"Obviously, it means Grandpa Jeok's temper is just as foul, doesn't it, Benefactor?"

"…"

"Huh? Am I wrong?"

Of course he was right.

But some uncomfortable truths couldn't be said out loud. Especially when doing so might get you beaten to death.

Cheongpung, you little shit…

I stared at him with a dead-eyed look. He'd been gone a while, but apparently he'd learned a new assassination technique from the Slaughter Saint. I did my best to ignore Jeok Cheongang's scorching gaze beside me and changed the subject.

"So, Cheongpung, where have you been and what have you been doing for the past few months?"

"Hmm. Little Grandpa told me not to say."

"You can tell me."

[3756] A Korean ri is approximately 393 m (0.244 mi).

“He knew you’d say that. He told me not to say anything even if it was you, Benefactor.”

“I’m telling you, it’s fine. If you’re worried, just whisper it to me with Sound Transmission…”

“Wow, that’s amazing. He even told me to keep quiet if you tried to talk me into telling you by Sound Transmission.”

“…”

“He said he’d kill me if I said anything. I think I’ve heard ‘Silencing the Witnesses’ about five thousand times by now.”

“…Then I won’t ask.”

Of course, the Slaughter Saint wouldn’t try to silence the witnesses just because Cheongpung told me everything that had happened so far. But at this point, it would be polite not to press him further.

Well.

To be honest, I was also a little scared he really might try to silence the witnesses.

“What about what happened in Qinghai? Is that a secret, too?”

“No. He didn’t say anything about that, so I think it’s fine.”

Cheongpung answered innocently and gave us a rough account of the past month.

He started with why they’d slipped into Qinghai without telling anyone, and what they’d come to do.

“You were looking for spies who might already be inside?”

“Yes. Little Grandpa said a traitor at your back is scarier than an enemy right in front of you.”

He was right.

I’d learned that the hard way more than once. I couldn’t take those words lightly.

“So, did you find any spies?” Jeok Cheongang asked.

“No. At least, not as far as we could tell.”

If Cheongpung had been on his own, I might’ve checked his work a hundred times and still had my doubts. But if the Slaughter Saint was part of that we, I could trust it.

He wouldn’t have been called the greatest assassin of all time if he weren’t that thorough.

Still…

“It’s too soon to relax,” Jeok Cheongang said. “You never know what might happen in Murim.”

Spoken like a veteran of the martial world. Cheongpung nodded.

“That’s right. Little Grandpa thought so, too. So he was going to infiltrate the Kunlun Sect and investigate further.”

There was a big difference between was going to and did.

And I already knew what had stopped him.

“Dark Heaven attacked just then. Right?”

“Yes. It happened in an instant.”

They had an overwhelming advantage in numbers and strength.

Some of Qinghai’s martial artists, including those of the Kunlun Sect, immediately withdrew from the sect’s headquarters and retreated east. But the Slaughter Saint and Cheongpung stayed.

“We hid among them and waited for the right moment.”

Anyone else who’d tried that would have been discovered and killed long ago.

But the Slaughter Saint was an exception.

And so was the other person who’d spent the past several months learning from him.

“I held my breath and hid my presence, just like Little Grandpa taught me. No one noticed. Like this.”

As soon as he finished speaking, Cheongpung stopped breathing with a sharp hup. Instead of answering, I let out a hollow laugh.

Not because of how ridiculous he looked, but because his presence had faded to a ghostly blur, even though he was right in front of me.

Can he really do that? After only a few months?

I’d known the answer for a long time.

Yes—if it was Cheongpung.

With that insane talent of his, as if he didn’t need a System at all, he could learn even a concealment technique that difficult in no time.

With talent like that and the Slaughter Saint teaching him, of course they could avoid being noticed.

A first-rate teacher and a heaven-sent genius.

Together, they’d managed to infiltrate the enemy.

Of course, even they had their limits.

“I did my best, but unfortunately, I couldn’t get as far as Taiqing Hall.”

“Taiqing Hall…?”

“It’s on the highest peak of Kunlun Mountain. It’s where the Kunlun Sect decides everything, big and small. But there was a strange energy surrounding the area.”

Cheongpung shuddered, as if remembering how it had felt.

“I could feel something… something invisible and sticky. It gave me chills.”

“Sticky? And it gave you chills?”

“Yes. Enough to make me shudder. Little Grandpa must have felt it too, because he decided we should blend in with the monsters coming down the mountain just then and turn back. A few days later, we met you, Benefactor.”

Even after he finished, Cheongpung’s expression didn’t improve. I watched him with a deep, steady gaze and quietly turned over the two words that had come to mind the moment I heard his story.

Magical power.

And at that very moment—

Splash!

A gentle ripple spread across the broad blue river beyond the thick veil of fog.

Chapter 1076

The river there was blue, and as wide as the sea.

Perhaps that was why.

Over a span of time stretching back beyond anyone's memory, an unnamed freshwater lake had grown ever larger. Then, one day, people began calling it Qinghai Lake.

At this very moment, a shadow was crossing the blue waters of Qinghai Lake.

Splash.

A dozen or so oars pushed through the water in smooth, perfect unison.

Gentle ripples spread in their wake. The thick mist parted, revealing the shape it had concealed.

Sleek, streamlined curves.

A hull that was not especially large, but built of sturdy wood and reinforced with steel.

A sail billowing in the wind—and, seated cross-legged in perfect calm atop a mast so narrow no one would dare set foot on it, an old man.

"What a tailwind. Couldn't ask for better."

At the old man's voice overhead, the middle-aged man standing at the bow, gazing beyond the mist, answered.

"The days ahead will be the same."

"Even though we've already lost our sect's headquarters?"

"We didn't lose it. We gave it up to save precious lives."

The middle-aged man continued steadily.

"Someone I respect once told me that what matters isn't the house, but the people. A house where no one lives becomes an abandoned ruin. But where there are people, they can build a palace even on an empty plain."

"I don't know who told you that, but he must be an old man who talks a fine game and has nothing to show for it."

"M-Master. How could you say that? I didn't mean—"

"Ha ha. I know. I'm teasing."

The old man, who had just called himself all talk and no substance, smiled at his flustered Disciple and went on.

"So the days ahead will carry us along like a tailwind… I could ask for nothing more, if only that were possible. But the headwind we've faced has been so fierce. What are we to do?"

The middle-aged man shook his head at his Master's teasing, then answered firmly.

"No matter how fierce the wind is, it can't overturn a mountain instead of a ship."

"You're right. But what if that fierce wind carries an ember?"

"…!"

"The wind isn't what we should fear. It's a single ember hidden somewhere deep in the mountains, where no one knows to look. Before long, it might turn everything to ash."

The middle-aged man pondered the meaning of his Master's words. Then his expression tightened.

Master. Do you mean…?

A line of Sound Transmission slipped between his trembling lips.

But before he could hear the answer, the old man slowly rose and murmured:

"Even so, there should be a chance to fight fire with fire."

At that moment—

Whoosh.

Beyond the mist as it scattered in all directions, hundreds of campfires lined the banks of Qinghai Lake, reflected in the old man's gray-white eyes.

The sparks drifting on the wind were sparks of hope against the coming disaster.

The moment a sleek ship appeared through the mist, I knew who they were.

Or, more precisely, I recognized the old man gazing down at the shore from atop its towering mast.

Whoosh.

The sides of his robe spread and fluttered like wings.

He soared like a bird, crossed dozens of jang[3757] through the air, and began to descend. Cries of astonishment rose all around us.

"Th-that's…"

"Stepping on Empty Air…!"

Stepping on Empty Air was a supreme lightness skill that required several jiazi[3758] of internal energy and deep enlightenment.

These people had fought a desperate battle against monsters they'd never seen or heard of until two days ago. But that hadn't made them any less awed by the highest martial arts.

I, however, saw it a little differently.

"Now that's a remarkable display of Stepping on Empty Air. Don't you think so, too?"

At Jeok Cheongang's probing question, I clicked my tongue.

[3757] One jang is ten ja, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[3758] A jiazi is a sixty-year cycle in the traditional East Asian calendar.

"Do I look like an idiot to you?"

"What kind of rude answer is that?"

"You already know what I mean."

"…Hm. So you're not completely blind, after all."

I couldn't tell whether he was displeased that I hadn't played along or pleased by the progress I'd made. Jeok Cheongang murmured and gazed into the air.

"Still, when it comes to lightness skills, he's pretty good."

I let out a quiet laugh.

Coming from Jeok Cheongang, that was extraordinary praise. But it still fell short of the lightness skill the old man was displaying as he slowly descended.

If you call Gliding Across the Void "pretty good," every martial artist who's learned a lightness skill should bite their tongue and die.

There's always another sky above the sky.

Those whose knowledge of martial arts was shallow, or who had no place in Murim, considered Stepping on Empty Air the pinnacle. But there was a realm beyond it.

Not stepping on the air or kicking off it, but moving through it as naturally as if gliding. That was Gliding Across the Void. Only a handful of Supreme Peak masters, myself included, could recognize the difference. I could see it in the old man's feet.

And in the past hundred years, only two people have reached the realm of Gliding Across the Void.

Jeok Cheongang had told me about them while I was training on Mount Jiuhua.

One had eventually come to be called a god. The other had returned to where he belonged.

To a land far to the west, to the vast slopes of a mountain that touched the sky.

Swish.

At last, his toes touched the ground without a sound, and his robes settled around him.

The kindly-looking old man clasped his hands in greeting to everyone.

"I am Cheongheoja of the Kunlun Sect. My greetings to all my fellow Daoists."

"…!"

"…!"

An invisible wave of emotion swept through the crowd.

The old man who had appeared so suddenly with such astonishing skill was none other than the Sect Leader of the Kunlun Sect.

"W-We greet the Sect Leader!"

Urgent cries rose all around, accompanied by clasped-fist bows.

But, as always, there were exceptions.

“Fellow Daoist, my ass. You’ve gotten older and now you think you can treat this old man as an equal?”

That curt greeting from Murim’s veteran drill sergeant and the bane of every prestigious sect was only the beginning.

“It’s been a long time, Cheongheoja. You’ve got a lot more gray hair now. The last time I saw you, you still looked fairly young.”

Over the shoulder of the bow-wielding lady, who was at least from a respectable family and had bothered to use polite speech, a human butcher appeared—the man who’d become the greatest of all time through his skill at cutting people down.

“I thought you looked familiar. So you ended up becoming Sect Leader?”

“…”

“…”

The commotion over the Kunlun Sect Leader’s arrival died at once.

The Slaughter Saint, the Bow Saint, and the Fire King Jeok Cheongang.

What an insane lineup. Just looking at them was enough to take your breath away.

They might look middle-aged, mature, and boyish, respectively, but with the amount of time they’d spent in Murim, they could perform the miracle of feeding five thousand with five loaves and two fish.[3759]

And Cheongheoja’s ordeal wasn’t over.

“Mm. This humble Daoist is late in greeting you. How have you been all this—”

Perfected Being Hyeoncheon, the Sect Leader of the Kongtong Sect, had hesitated at the arrival of those martial-world veterans. He had only just managed to speak when—

“Hello, Grandpa Cheongheoja! I’m Cheongpung! We both have the surname Cheong, so I hope we get along from now on!”

“I am Soonja. We don’t share a surname, but the last syllable of our names is the same. Let’s get along well enough.”

“Taishan hungry. Did you catch any meat on your way here?”

A different kind of insane lineup.

Pure, unfiltered madness.

The arrival of that hopeless trio, every bit as disastrous as the Three Saints, made my vision dim. Yet, to my surprise, Cheongheoja chuckled.

“Some respected Seniors, and some juniors I’m meeting for the first time. It’s a pleasure to meet you all again.”

At that moment, I had a thought.

Maybe the greatest sect under heaven was the Kunlun Sect.

“…Wow. He actually put up with that.”

[3759] The feeding of the five thousand is a miracle recounted in the Christian Gospels.

The exclamation slipped from my lips before I could stop it, and Cheongheoja turned his gaze toward me.

“This is the first time I’ve seen you up close. It’s good to meet you, Fellow Daoist Jin.”

As he’d said, I’d seen him before, though only from a distance.

And our connection went a little deeper than simply having crossed paths. During the Star-Array Grand Banquet, Hak Woo—the Kunlun Cloud Dragon—had spent some time with Gung Gibang and the others. He was Cheongheoja’s Disciple.

“I greet the Sect Leader.”

I belatedly clasped my hands in a formal bow. Cheongheoja nodded with a warm smile.

“It’s been a long time. I’ve heard a great deal about you since then. That boy Hak Woo was especially fond of you.”

“Um, by any chance…”

As if he’d seen through the question I couldn’t quite bring myself to finish, Cheongheoja answered gently.

“He’s doing well. You needn’t worry.”

“That’s a relief.”

I couldn’t say I’d known Hak Woo for long, but the guy I knew was a good one.

As a martial artist, and as a person.

So I was genuinely glad to hear what Cheongheoja said next.

“You’ll see him soon. Once we’ve left this place.”

“I see.”

I already knew Qinghai Lake wasn’t our home base. Gung Gibang and the Beggars’ Sect disciples had simply come ahead to meet us; the threat from Dark Heaven hadn’t disappeared completely.

But Cheongheoja’s words did raise one question…

“Even so, the boat seems a little, well… pretty small.”

I looked dubiously at the ship, which had nearly reached the shore.

It looked like it could hold a hundred people at most—nowhere near enough to carry our three thousand allies.

“Does it look that way to you, too?”

“Sorry, but yes.”

“Ha ha.”

Cheongheoja laughed aloud at my honest answer, then spoke again.

“I suppose it might. From what you can see now.”

“Pardon?”

“Ah, there they are at last.”

I followed Cheongheoja’s gaze. So did everyone else.

Splash.

Only then did we see dozens of ships emerge through the thick mist.

Chapter 1077

Around noon, a group of black-clad men appeared atop a low hill.

Swish.

Pat, pat, pat!

At a casual wave from the man in front, several dozen of them scattered across the area to investigate what had happened here and deal with the aftermath.

“So someone got here before us.”

The man murmured to himself as he looked down the hill at the vast reed beds stretching for more than ten li[3760] in every direction—and the countless birds filling the gaps between them with black.

“They must have been hungry. It can’t have been an easy journey.”

Qinghai Lake, a few days’ travel from here, was a haven for migratory birds. Reaching it meant beating their wings without rest for a thousand li[3761], but enormous numbers came each year for its clean water and abundant food.

Of course, that was all in the past now.

Whoooosh.

A wind carrying a biting chill suddenly swept through the reeds. The migratory birds, busy filling their empty stomachs, shivered.

The cold was far too severe to be explained by the high elevation alone. At noon, when the sun should have been at its highest, black clouds covered the sky. Untimely frost had frozen the reed beds solid.

And these inexplicable changes, as though the seasons had forgotten their place, had been going on for more than a day or two.

Temperatures had fallen, and bitter cold raged day and night. Without enough sunlight, the plants had lost their former lushness. Elsewhere, severe drought had struck. It seemed the work of heaven’s whims or some supernatural power—especially when all of it had happened in little more than a year.

But Ma Sanbao saw things differently.

Crunch, crunch.

Frost broke beneath his feet as he slowly descended the hill. His thoughts deepened with each footprint he left behind.

This is no mere supernatural trick. His power borders on that of a heavenly god.

Heaven itself. An all-knowing, all-powerful god.

[3760] A Chinese li is 500 m (0.311 mi). Ten li are about 5 km (3.1 mi); a thousand li are about 500 km (311 mi).

[3761] A Chinese li is 500 m (0.311 mi). Ten li are about 5 km (3.1 mi); a thousand li are about 500 km (311 mi).

Thinking of his master, the Lord of Heaven, Ma Sanbao felt fear and reverence rise from the depths of his heart. Here was a being who could threaten the whole world, change the climate, and even bring the dead back to life.

Could someone like that truly be called human?

And why had he shared a portion of that unbelievable power with Ma Sanbao, who had abandoned even his own master—a man who had served the Lord of Heaven—and fled?

No. I'm different from my Master. I can be of far greater use to him in every way.

Ma Sanbao repeated the words to himself. The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, whom he had served as Master all his life, had met a weak end. Ma Sanbao would not.

He would contribute greatly to the Lord of Heaven's grand design, and rule over a part of this world as his new servant.

Caw.

Snapping out of his thoughts, Ma Sanbao noticed countless pairs of eyes glinting at him and gave a quiet laugh.

"Looks like I've interrupted your meal. Don't mind me. Go on and finish."

His kind words made no difference. The birds covering the reed beds greeted their unexpected visitor with sharp cries, their bloodshot eyes flashing.

The killing intent in those eyes was far too intense to belong to ordinary birds.

"Well, the changes have already begun."

Clicking his tongue, Ma Sanbao studied them with interest.

Their beaks were smeared with blood. Their feathers and claws had grown thick and sharp, like those of predators. Beneath them lay the dishes that made up this lavish feast, giving off a stench of death as horrifying as the sight of them.

"Really, that instinct of yours is the problem."

It wasn't hard to work out what had happened.

The changing climate had frozen the plants to death, and the beasts and insects had long since disappeared. Unable to find food, countless migratory birds must have left Qinghai Lake and wandered the surrounding area. Some had finally found a meal in these nearby reed beds: the blood and flesh of monsters lying there like puppets with their strings cut.

"I needed to replenish my forces anyway. This worked out nicely."

Ma Sanbao smiled at the birds as they began to mutate.

Lately, some lunatic called the Great Sir had been knocking his birds out of the sky wherever he found them, making it difficult to keep watch. This many new birds was an unexpected windfall.

Cawww!

First, though, he would have to imprint the birds, now savage from eating cursed blood and flesh.

"All right. From now on, I'm your master."

Jingle.

The moment Ma Sanbao shook the ritual bell in his hand—

Whoooosh!

The countless birds hurtling toward him on beating wings changed course at once and shot high into the sky, obeying the bell's dull, eerie chime.

And the birds weren't the only ones to respond.

Shrrk. Rumble.

Bent knees straightened. Rigid backs unbent. Finally, tightly shut eyes opened halfway.

"More of them survived than I expected."

As Ma Sanbao murmured, watching the monsters rise to their full height throughout the broad reed beds, the black-clad men who had gone off earlier returned to report.

"We've checked everything."

"What did you find?"

One of the men respectfully held out something he was carrying.

Part of its face had been pecked away by birds. Otherwise, it looked just as it had in life, its perfectly natural expression frozen in place.

It was someone's head. Until a few days ago, the man had been Ma Sanbao's subordinate and their comrade.

"Most of them were in this condition."

"This…"

Ma Sanbao's eyes widened as he examined the head.

He was a sorcerer, but his martial skill had also reached Supreme Peak. Even so, the sword mark left on the head was so faint that it sent a chill down his spine.

"…A killing sword. One honed to its utmost."

"What does that mean?"

"There's a man called No Shadow. The Great Nation's imperial household raised him as its finest assassin. He guarded the Son of Heaven from the shadows, and even the East Depot I once served couldn't determine his true identity."

But even No Shadow couldn't leave a sword mark like this.

Ma Sanbao knew that well. Through relentless investigation and pursuit, he had once obtained the body of someone No Shadow had killed.

Now another man came to mind: a lame old man Jin Taekyung had killed during the bloodbath at the Grand Banquet a few months earlier.

Gye Yabu.

The last heir of Salcheonmun, the greatest assassin sect in the world, long believed to have vanished.

Why had he come to mind now?

Ma Sanbao soon found the answer.

“The Slaughter Saint…”

Yes. His presence explained everything.

Why not a single human corpse remained in these vast reed beds, where a fierce battle must have taken place. And why so many monsters had avoided a second death, even though the sorcerers had been eliminated.

“He finished it quickly. He knew exactly where we were vulnerable.”

Muttering to himself, Ma Sanbao flung his subordinate’s head far away.

The power bestowed on him by the Lord of Heaven allowed him to raise the dead, but not without limit.

“We’re leaving. By now, they must have left Qinghai Lake. We’ll hurry back and carry out the next order.”

The damage was done. At least they had recovered a considerable number of their forces and gained new subordinates. Ma Sanbao put his regret aside and turned to leave.

Or rather, he was about to.

“However…”

One of the black-clad men spoke up hesitantly.

“One man. Just one man is missing.”

“What?”

“We found a mutilated wrist, but no body anywhere.”

“Then…”

“It seems they captured him alive.”

“…!”

Ma Sanbao’s face twisted before he could stop himself.

After all his warnings to be careful, the man hadn’t even died. He’d been captured.

But his anger and agitation lasted only a moment. They had lost some valuable subordinates, and one had been taken alive, but those men were only minor branches of a much greater whole. Ma Sanbao hadn’t entrusted them with much information.

What bothered him a little was what his subordinate said next.

“The ritual bells they were carrying are gone, too. Every last one.”

“…What are they, thieves? They made sure to take everything.”

Ma Sanbao frowned, thought for a moment, then shook his head.

“No need to worry. Even with the bells, they can’t do anything.”

A country bumpkin couldn't become a Supreme Peak master overnight just by getting hold of a divine weapon. Likewise, using the bells properly required extensive training.

"Besides, even if the man they captured betrays us, he can command only a few hundred."

"That's impossible. We know him. He's loyal to the Heavenly Court, yes, but more than that, he's simply not the sort of man who could betray anyone…"

Seeing his subordinates defend their captured comrade, Ma Sanbao let out an involuntary laugh.

"He will."

"Pardon?"

"He will betray us. No—they'll make sure he does."

Ma Sanbao added quietly, "If that son of a bitch I know is involved, they will."

The face of that son of a bitch flashed before his eyes, and he reflexively reached inside his robe.

He remembered the note Jin Taekyung had handed him a few months earlier, pretending it was an important secret letter to deceive him. More precisely, he remembered the mysterious symbols written on it—symbols that even Ma Sanbao, for all his learning, couldn't decipher.

—You fucking dumbass lol

Still unable to make sense of them, Ma Sanbao ground his teeth.

Just wait. I'll pay you back soon.

His gaze, fixed on the east, seemed to be directed at someone crossing Qinghai Lake.

Chapter 1078

Qinghai Lake was like a small sea, just as its name suggested.

It was more than ten jang[3762] deep and stretched for thousands of li.[3763]

Without the ships, our allies—who'd even abandoned their horses on the way to Qinghai—would have had to walk for days and nights. But the dozens of ships that arrived after Cheongheoja, the Sect Leader of the Kunlun Sect, could easily carry all three thousand of us.

Shhhhh!

A bow carved with the shape of a cloud sliced through the water.

I was silently watching the lake, where the bitter cold had left thin ice in places, when a voice reached my ears.

"Isn't it strange? Winter is still a long way off, yet we're already seeing this."

I turned to find a sturdy-looking middle-aged Daoist. His face and voice were still unfamiliar, but we'd exchanged a brief greeting when I boarded the ship yesterday. I had no trouble remembering his Daoist name.

"Oh, Perfected One[3764] Hakso."

The Daoist's smile turned awkward.

"It's Hak Su. Not Hakso."

"…"

"…"

The silence grew awkward fast. After a moment, I forced myself to speak.

"Uh, did you happen to change your Daoist name recently?"

"No. Not once since I joined Kunlun."

"Then how long ago did you join?"

"Certainly not yesterday. It's been over forty years."

"I see."

"Yes."

No trouble remembering, my ass.

With nothing left to say, I looked up at the sky. "Uh, well. Nice weather."

Rumble, crash!

Thunder and lightning suddenly broke out overhead. Hakso—no, Hak Su—glanced at the sky and answered uncertainly.

"You must like stormy weather."

"…Of course. I don't just like it—I'm crazy about it."

[3762] A jang is a traditional Korean length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft); ten jang is about 30.3 m (99.4 ft).

[3763] The Korean ri is a traditional distance of about 393 m (0.244 mi).

[3764] Perfected One is an honorific for an accomplished Daoist.

I'm going to lose my mind.

It was far too late to take any of it back. I stared at the dark sky, knowing I'd screwed up, and Hak Su let out a quiet laugh.

"I understand. It happens now and then. Not so often that it particularly stands out."

At that generous response, befitting a Daoist of the Kunlun Sect, I swallowed back tears and bowed my head.

"…I'm sorry."

"There's no need to apologize. We've known each other for only half a day. It's an easy mistake to make. Besides, Fellow Daoist Jin, you have a great responsibility on your shoulders."

Hak Su laughed heartily, but I'd still been rude. All the more so because the man standing before me was Cheongheoja's Senior Disciple and might one day succeed him as Sect Leader of Kunlun.

"I've often heard about you, so I know what sort of person you are. Just as the third one said, you're a very amusing man."

"By the third one, you mean…"

"You've guessed correctly. Hak Woo, the Kunlun Cloud Dragon. He's my youngest Junior Brother. Though given our ages, he's closer to being my Disciple."

Hak Su looked well past forty and nearly fifty, old enough that no one would have found it strange if Hak Woo, who wasn't yet thirty, had been his Disciple. In fact, they were fellow Disciples of the same Master, Cheongheoja.

"In any case, I've wanted to meet you for a long time. It's deeply unfortunate that we've met under these circumstances…but you came all this way to save our sect. Nothing could make me happier."

Caught off guard by Hak Su's praise, I scratched my head. I'd heard thanks like this before, but I had no desire to act the hero, as though I were somebody important.

Besides, the real battle hasn't even begun.

Of course, the allies about to gather in one place were stronger than any force I'd ever seen. Two of the Three Saints had joined us, and the Fire King Jeok Cheongang—a master who could hold his own against them—was with us too.

If several other Supreme Peak masters, myself included, and our handpicked three thousand elites joined the main force, we might even have the upper hand against Dark Heaven's massive army invading Qinghai.

But…

No one knows how things will unfold from here.

I couldn't get an exact count, but as far as I could tell, Dark Heaven's forces numbered close to a hundred thousand. Every last one was a monster, little different from the undead, with physical abilities far beyond those of a human.

That alone was a serious complication. But something else had been weighing on me with fear for some time now.

The Lord of Heaven.

An absolute being lurking beyond an abyss whose depths I couldn't fathom, swallowing the world—heaven and earth alike.

I couldn't even imagine what would happen if that bastard appeared before us soon.

There's a good chance the Lord of Heaven will enter this battle. Dark Heaven can't afford to back down.

Four Demon Lords and a Demon Empress, who'd been like his own limbs, had already fallen to my hand, and we'd inflicted heavy losses on his forces along the way.

If the Lord of Heaven lost an army of a hundred thousand in Qinghai as well, the blow would be enormous, even for him.

And yet, one thing still bothered me.

Then why make such an absurd choice in Gansu?

I bit my lip and recalled the Grand Sorceress's words.

Get stronger. Even stronger than you are now.

She'd let me live instead of killing me when my life hung by a thread.

No.

What I remembered was the intent of whoever had given her that order.

The Lord of Heaven doesn't want me—Jin Taekyung, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon—to die.

The truth I'd realized on that snowfield, covered in blood and corpses, dug through my mind like a sharp awl, leaving questions I couldn't answer and suspicions I could scarcely believe.

Maybe. Maybe the Lord of Heaven's real purpose is…

A headache struck without warning. I barely swallowed the groan rising in my throat.

"…Fellow Daoist? Fellow Daoist Jin, are you all right?"

A voice broke through my thoughts. Hak Su was watching me with concern.

"Are you feeling unwell? Your face…"

As he trailed off, I reflexively looked down at the water. A rigid face stared back from the clear surface, then broke apart as the bow carried us forward.

Just like my thoughts.

"I'm fine. Just a little seasick."

A feeble excuse from a Supreme Peak master. Hak Su studied me for a moment before speaking carefully.

“I can’t claim to know everything that troubles you, but if you ever wish to talk, you’re welcome to come to me.”

He laughed heartily, then added, “Of course, I wasn’t being entirely serious, so don’t worry about it. But I can at least tell you some good news that might lighten your heart a little.”

“What good news?”

“By now, word of the situation in Qinghai must have reached the Central Plains. Before long, the Sword Saint—no, the Alliance Leader—will lead the righteous warriors of the world here to join us.”

Hak Su sounded full of hope. For a moment, I’d wondered if he really had good news. Now my spirits sank.

Could that really happen?

First secure your own life, then strike your enemy.

It was an old saying from Go:[3765] make sure you survived before you attacked. And by that measure, the world was still an unstable stockpile of bombs.

Besides…

As long as they have the Moving Formation, it’s almost impossible to commit all our forces to Qinghai alone.

But I swallowed the words on the tip of my tongue. I couldn’t bring myself to crush the hope of the earnest, kind-looking Daoist before me—not while I was still confused myself.

“Hmm.”

“Is something wrong?”

Hak Su looked puzzled by my vague response. I held back a bitter smile and shook my head.

He’d learn the harsh truth soon enough, even if it wasn’t today.

“No. It’s better news than I expected, that’s all. Caught me off guard. Anyway, how much farther to our destination?”

“About half a day, I think.”

“Half a day. Two or three shichen[3766] at most, then.”

Crossing Qinghai Lake directly by ship had saved us a considerable amount of time. I nodded, thinking about what lay ahead, then muttered as I remembered something I’d almost forgotten.

“Oh, right.”

“Is there something you’re curious about?”

“No. It’s about time we hauled him out.”

[3765] Go is an East Asian strategy board game played with black and white stones.

[3766] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours; two or three shichen is about four to six hours.

"Pardon?"

Leaving Hak Su to puzzle over that, I shouted to the house elf who had to be somewhere nearby.

"Head down!"

A moment later, the rude house elf's indignant voice rang out.

"This is driving me crazy! Why now?!"

"Just felt like calling you. Wanted to check where you were."

The house elf—Hyuk Mujin—came running. At my casual answer, he looked like he'd swallowed shit.

"What am I, some stray dog?"

"Absolutely not. What sin did a good dog commit in a past life to deserve being compared to you?"

"…One of these days, I'm going to get sick of this shit and quit."

"Good. Please do."

I laughed quietly at his grumbling and started walking.

"Anyway, how's the job I gave you going?"

"I was right in the middle of it. He's more tight-lipped than I expected."

"And?"

"So I made him heavier. Chained a water jug to his ankle. He loved it."

"Good work. You've got a knack for this."

"What can I say? I learned it all from you, Captain."

As I walked along, chatting with Hyuk Mujin, Hak Su followed behind us, caught up in the situation. He blinked.

"Forgive me, but what in the world are you talking about?"

He stared at the empty deck. I shrugged.

"You'll see."

"But see what—"

"Mujin."

"Yes, sir."

Rrrrattle.

Hyuk Mujin stepped forward briskly and pulled on a chain extending over the side of the deck. A man in black, his whole body blue, rose out of the water.

"Gah! I-I'll talk! I'll talk!"

"On your life?"

"Of course—cough—of course!"

He'd spent a full day and night as one with the blue waters of Qinghai Lake. It was hardly surprising that he might be ready to cooperate now.

Still, I studied the panting man closely.

“If there’s even the slightest lie in what you tell us, your parents will live long, sick lives.”

“…”

“Devoted son, aren’t you? Right, Mujin?”

“Yes, sir!”

“N-No! Anything but that…!”

Rrrrattle. Splash!

Hyuk Mujin answered with gusto and released the chain. The blue water swallowed the man’s desperate scream.

The ancient tradition of dipping someone in the Yangtze lived on at Qinghai Lake.

Chapter 1079

If someone asked me whether a person could survive being dunked in a river hundreds of times over a full day and night, plus another half day, I'd answer without hesitation.

Of course they could.

They might even come out of it far more honest than they'd been before.

Naturally, there might be a few minor complications along the way.

"Ugh… ugh…"

"Captain, this guy's eyes are completely glazed over."

"If they've gone slack, we'll just have to tighten them up."

"How?"

"Slap him across the face. Nice and hard."

"Ah."

Hyuk Mujin nodded as though he'd gained a great insight and promptly raised his palm.

Smack!

"He's not waking up."

"Are you stupid?"

"Why?"

"You have to hit him harder. Until he wakes up."

"Oh. Are you a genius?"

"Not a genius. Just exceptionally gifted."

"Of course."

Mujin gasped in admiration and raised both hands this time.

Smack! Smack! Smack!

"Uh, his eyes rolled back."

"He's exaggerating."

"No, I'm serious. His body's completely ice-cold, too."

"Huh. So it is."

"I told you."

"This bastard's cold because his heart is cold."

"Now isn't the time for nonsense. What if he dies?"

"He won't. I'm here, and my heart's warm."

"What?"

The moment Mujin looked at me as if to say, What kind of bullshit is this idiot talking about now? I reached out without hesitation.

Boom!

My palm struck the black-robed man's chest, delivering a burst of Scorching Yang Qi. His body, pale and growing rigid, shuddered. Then warmth flooded back into him—far more than he'd had before.

"…Wow. He actually survived."

"Told you. I have a warm heart."

"Isn't it your internal energy that's warm, not your heart?"

"Want to warm up like him? You look a little cold."

"I must politely decline…"

Crack!

"Gah!"

"What?"

"He bit his tongue! There's so much blood!"

"Oh, for fuck's sake."

"I told you not to release his Mute Acupoint! Even with his internal energy sealed, he could die like this!"

"If I'd sealed his Mute Acupoint, he might've drowned without getting a word out. Anyway, quit making a fuss and go fetch him."

"Fetch who?"

"Who do you think?"

"Oh."

A moment later, a man who'd mastered two utterly different trades—assassination and medicine—revived our emergency patient in the blink of an eye.

"I've stitched him up perfectly. He'll have no trouble speaking once he recovers."

"Thank you."

"But is this the man I'm thinking of?"

"Yes. The one you brought in last time."

"He's so swollen I nearly didn't recognize him. His wrist wound hasn't healed yet, either, so don't overdo it. If it gets infected and the flesh dies, that'll be serious."

"Oh, it's not my body, so that's fine."

"True enough. But keep treating him so roughly and he's liable to die. At a time like this, you'd be better off stabbing deep, three vertebrae below the cervical spine, then slowly…"

"Oh, that's a handy tip. But wouldn't that kill him?"

"He wouldn't die. He'd wish he had."

The expert, second to none in the world when it came to taking apart and treating the human body, passed on his useful tip and left. The black-robed man, who had watched the whole thing unfold right before his eyes, began to thrash.

"Mmph! Mmmph…"

“Hey, why are you acting up again? Hold still.”

“Mmmph!”

“This isn’t working. Mujin.”

“Yes, sir.”

“Hold him down for a bit. I’m trying to practice, but it’s hard when he keeps shaking. I used a Pressure-Point Strike, and he’s still struggling this much. How badly is he thrashing around?”

“This insolent bastard. The Captain’s trying to practice. Heave-ho. Is that good?”

“Yeah. Perfect. All right, I’m going to stab him.”

“Wait. Are you sure that’s the right spot?”

“Isn’t it? I thought he said to start two vertebrae below the cervical spine.”

“Huh? Wasn’t it two above?”

“No way. That’s a lethal acupoint.”

“Now I’m confused. Why don’t you go ask him again, Captain?”

“Why should I go? You go.”

“I could die if I go. He hates having to repeat himself.”

“You think it’d be any different if I went?”

“Fair point. How about stabbing both spots?”

“That’s not a bad idea. Shall we?”

“Yes, sir. Go ahead.”

“Mmmph! Mmmmmmph!”

Rrrrrumble!

The deck shook as if an earthquake had hit—though that might be a slight exaggeration.

The black-robed man thrashed with all his might despite the Pressure-Point Strike. I let out a quiet laugh to myself, then released his Mute Acupoint.

“Gah! Cough, cough!”

“What is it? Got any last words?”

“Th-three vertebrae.”

“Hm?”

“The cervical spine! Three vertebrae below it! Stop it, you madmen!”

There were only two reasons to call someone a madman when he could kill you with a flick of his hand.

First, you’d made peace with dying.

Second, you were too terrified to think straight, let alone worry about offending him.

He was clearly the latter.

That’s done.

One look at the terror in his eyes, one listen to his voice, and I knew he'd been reborn a far more honest man. I stood up.

"Huh? You're not going to stab him?"

"Why would I? Get him something to cover himself with, then stay right beside him and have a chat."

"What about you, Captain?"

"I'm about to get busy with something else. Isn't that right?"

At my sudden question, Hak Su swallowed hard. He'd watched the whole scene with the expression of a man who'd seen a ghost.

"I-I'm not sure what you mean."

"Oh, right. You can't see it yet. Over there."

Just as I raised my hand and pointed beyond the bow—

Whoosh.

The thick mist parted, revealing the green land it had hidden.

A group had gathered at the pier to wait for us. Beyond them, faint gray city walls rose in the distance.

Xining, the capital of Qinghai and the last stronghold against Dark Heaven.

So that's Xining.

At that moment—

Ding.

A clear chime rang out above the waters parting before our boat.

The crowd waiting to welcome us was enormous.

No. Massive wouldn't have been an exaggeration.

"Waaaaaah!"

"Reinforcements! The Murim Alliance reinforcements are here!"

Was this what those Roman triumphs I'd seen in textbooks had been like?

The cheers swelled as we drew closer to the walls, then shook the whole city the moment we entered. Everywhere I looked, the streets were packed with dark masses of people.

They filled the broad avenues and narrow alleys, as well as the rooftops of countless buildings—including rows of pavilions—and stretched both arms toward us as they cheered.

Even Cheongpung, who usually loved attention, swallowed nervously and whispered, "If this goes on much longer, my ears might burst, Benefactor."

"Yeah?"

"Yes. I'm not joking. I've never heard anything this loud."

"Mirror therapy[3767] works, all right."

"Hm? What's mirror therapy[3768]?"

"It's… never mind. Even if I told you, Cheongpung wouldn't change."

Normally, Cheongpung would have been armed with pure, unbridled curiosity and pressed me to explain what mirror therapy[3769] meant. This time, though, he simply continued in a quiet voice.

"There are so many people. Seriously, so many. I stayed in Xining for a while, but it wasn't anything like this."

Cheongpung had spent about a month in Qinghai before I arrived, so the change must have struck him all the harder.

Of course, I already had a good idea where this enormous crowd had come from.

Everyone scattered across Qinghai must have gathered in Xining.

It was only natural. The same thing had happened earlier in Shanxi, then in Gansu.

The Great Nation's imperial court had already declared Dark Heaven rebels and foreign invaders. A warning like that was essential if the common people, many of whom still thought there was nothing to fear, were going to take the threat seriously.

Unlike the Great Faction War, which had barely affected the common folk, Dark Heaven's actions had long since gone far beyond the bounds of the Murim.

If the Heavenly Demon of the past had set his sights on the Murim, the Lord of Heaven now wanted the whole world.

No—

Maybe even more than that.

I forced down the unease that grew sharper with every passing moment and curled my lips into a smile.

So that the countless people surrounding us, covering every direction, might feel a little more at ease when they saw me smile.

"It's Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung!"

"The Marquis of Shangshan is here!"

"Waaaaah! Long live the Great Nation! Long live His Majesty the Emperor!"

For all their numbers, most of these people knew little about the Murim.

In their eyes, I wasn't just a young martial artist. I was a divine general, carrying out the Son of Heaven's solemn imperial command to punish foreign invaders and save them.

[3767] "Mirror therapy" translates the Korean expression geoul chiryo: seeing one's own behavior reflected in someone else and realizing what it is like to be on the receiving end.

[3768] "Mirror therapy" translates the Korean expression geoul chiryo: seeing one's own behavior reflected in someone else and realizing what it is like to be on the receiving end.

[3769] "Mirror therapy" translates the Korean expression geoul chiryo: seeing one's own behavior reflected in someone else and realizing what it is like to be on the receiving end.

As the cheers swelled, Cheongpung's eyes widened.
"Wow. Everyone seems to like you, Benefactor."
I swallowed a bitter smile and answered quietly.
"Looks that way. For now, at least."
"They'll like you from now on, too. You're such a good person!"
"A good person…"
My voice trailed off as I looked at the crowd filling the city.
Hundreds of thousands, at a glance. Maybe more.
At this very moment, all those people were smiling brightly and cheering for me.
But I had no way of knowing how long those smiles would stay on their faces.
Or, if the worst really did happen, how many of them would survive.
"Cheongpung."
"Yes?"
"Yes?"
"Let's try. As far as we can go."
Still watching the crowd, I added quietly, "Even if it costs us our lives."
Yeah.
Just as we always had.

Chapter 1080

Even as night deepened, the lights of Xining stayed lit.

The countless people still in the streets shared their joy freely, and the city's leaders provided liquor and meat for them.

They hoped the small sparks of hope in those people's hearts would burn a little longer—and a little brighter.

But while laughter still slipped through the gaps around the windows, the mood inside the pavilion was heavy.

"Judging by those long faces, I can guess how things are going."

Jeok Cheongang broke the silence with a click of his tongue.

"Sounds like you've got some shitty news. Spit it out now instead of making a damn fuss later."

"Well…"

Only Jeok Cheongang could say something like that. But with Jeok Cheongang on the receiving end, no one dared be the first to answer.

The leaders trailed off and exchanged glances. That was when I spoke up from beside the window.

"If it's hard to say right now, let's start with the situation inside the city."

The martial world might spell it Fire Gate Clan and pronounce it bunch of bastards, but of course a young Disciple was easier to approach than an old monster notorious for his foul temper.

At my gentle tone, one of the leaders finally relaxed enough to speak.

"Things aren't looking good."

"Hmm. Not good?"

"That's right."

I pressed my lips together, then asked the speaker, "Understood. And your name?"

"Cheok Mo, Sect Leader of Qinghai's Gonghwa Sect. I don't know if you've heard of us."

Of course I hadn't.

I knew of Gonghwachun,[3770] but I hadn't memorized the dozens of martial sects in Qinghai Province. And his first answer had already made it clear I wasn't likely to remember him, either.

"All right, then. Sect Leader Cheok of the Gonghwa Sect."

"I'm listening."

He nodded lazily. I met his gaze and continued evenly.

"Do you want to be here?"

[3770] Gonghwachun is a Korean Chinese restaurant whose name sounds like Gonghwa Sect.

"…?"

"You're free to leave if you're going to keep stating the obvious."

"…!"

"And since when are we on such familiar terms? What do you think, sir?"

I turned to a middle-aged official dressed in silk robes. He swallowed before answering.

"H-How could I possibly contradict the Marquis of Shangshan?"

"Strange answer. I don't recall asking whether you'd contradict me."

"Y-You are absolutely right!"

"Sure. Anyway, I've been standing for a while, and my legs are getting tired. Is there an open seat?"

I could have stood there for days without a problem, and a slight turn of my head would have shown me plenty of empty chairs. But the official sprang from his seat.

"There's one right here!"

"Oh, you don't have to do that. Especially when you're so much older than me."

"I-I don't know what I should…"

"What do you mean, you don't know? Are you trying to get me cursed out? Make it look like some wet-behind-the-ears kid is throwing his rank around to bully an elder?"

"Th-Then I'll sit."

The official's eyes darted back and forth as he cautiously lowered himself toward the chair. I muttered as if to myself.

"He's actually going to sit. Can't read the room at all."

"…Pardon?"

"Hm? What?"

"What you just said…"

"Oh, did you hear that?"

"…Yes."

"I was only talking to myself. Go ahead and sit."

"…"

"Why do you keep making me repeat myself? Sit down."

A truly clueless man might have eased himself into the chair. This official could only stare at me, his eyes trembling, unable to sit or stand.

Then again, he must have been good at reading the room to have landed such an important post as City Lord at a relatively young age.

That same instinct must've helped him siphon off plenty over the years.

Leaving the City Lord of Qinghai sweating through an imaginary squat, I glanced to my side. Jeong Hogun was smiling with a crooked twist to his lips.

I didn't make a habit of bullying my elders, but what Jeong Hogun had told me on the way to Xining had washed away any guilt I might have felt.

A textbook corrupt official.

The Embroidered Uniform Guard—the imperial family's foremost military force, with intelligence capabilities comparable to the East Depot—had obtained the information long ago. There was no room for doubt.

More important, though, was the state of affairs his negligence had brought about.

"I heard the city's food stores are running low. What do you have to say about that, City Lord?"

"Th-That's…"

"Just the number. No lies."

"W-We had far too many commoners flood the city in a short time…"

"You've got a long tongue. Want me to shorten it?"

"On-One month! One month!"

He blurted out the answer, then added uncertainly, "…Probably."

"That won't do. Thousand Captain Jeong?"

Step.

Jeong Hogun strode forward at my call. The City Lord squeezed his eyes shut and cried out.

"F-Fifteen days! The food we have in storage will last fifteen days at most!"

"Fifteen days. Are you sure this time?"

"I stake my life on it!"

Men with plenty to lose didn't gamble with their lives. That made his answer convincing—and infuriating.

A huge number of refugees had arrived in a short time, but Xining had only been like this for about seven days.

Qinghai was a border province. It was only natural that it would have more military provisions stored away than the Central Plains, in case of an invasion.

And yet there was only enough food for fifteen more days.

He really helped himself.

I sighed and looked at the City Lord. Sweat streamed down his terrified face from his impromptu leg workout.

"Why are you so scared? Anyone would think I was trying to kill you. Wouldn't they?"

"Th-Then…"

"Don't worry. I won't kill you."

"Thank you!"

His face brightened at once. I added gently, "At least not right now."

“I’ll devote my whole heart to serving the Marquis of Shangshan from now on… Pardon?”

“Why ask me to repeat it? You heard me.”

Three or four Embroidered Uniform Guards strode up behind him and surrounded him.

“W-Wait! You can’t do this!”

“Who says I can’t?”

It was a terrible turn of events for the City Lord. But I had saved the imperial family, and the Son of Heaven had personally appointed me a marquis. I had more than enough authority and grounds to do this.

Besides, his fate had been all but decided before I set foot in Xining.

“Send him off at sunrise. And don’t forget to give him some company for the journey. He might get lonely.”

“As you command!”

Jeong Hogun’s answer was firmer than ever. At his gesture, the other Embroidered Uniform Guards waiting nearby swiftly carried out their orders.

“Songak of Qinghai’s Regional Military Commission. Is that you?”

“I-I haven’t done anything wrong!”

“That’s for us to decide. Not you.”

“…!”

“These are the Marquis of Shangshan’s strict orders. Come quietly if you want to see tomorrow’s sunrise.”

It happened in an instant.

Generals in ornate armor and officials in robes as stiff as their necks were dragged out one after another, their faces pale.

Not one of them resisted. No—they didn’t even dare try.

The presence of Supreme Peak masters who could shake the world played a part. But if they opposed the imperial Embroidered Uniform Guard, their entire families could be branded traitors.

Beheaded as corrupt officials in league with the City Lord, or branded traitors and wiped out along with their families. Faced with that choice, they could do only one thing.

Accept reality.

And despair without end.

Unlike the men dragged out wailing as though everything was over, the people would rejoice and draw closer together once this tumor was removed.

And along with that—

“Looks like we’re finally ready to have a proper discussion.”

The dozen or so seats emptied in an instant. Yet the void they left was filled by the presence of the man who had emptied them.

Me.

Jin Taekyung, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon.

“What does everyone think?”

“…!”

“…!”

Suffocating silence weighed on the pavilion.

Those close to me smiled without a sound. Those who didn’t know me exchanged dark looks.

Backs that had once been relaxed were now rigidly straight. Fingers tapped the table slowly, anxiously.

Perhaps some of them had dismissed me in private, or tried to diminish what I’d done. Rumors always grew in the telling. And in troubled times like these, people sometimes made heroes because they needed them.

But they were wrong.

There had always been people like that, everywhere. The result had always been the same.

And there had always been people who watched in silence, giving nothing away. Like the young Daoist who looked straight at me now while a few others avoided my gaze.

“Rumors are made from what people see and hear. As usual, I didn’t put much stock in them.”

His Daoist robes were neat, without a single wrinkle, and I couldn’t begin to read the depths of his eyes.

“But now that I’ve met you, fellow Daoist, I see once again that I was right.”

His voice was as calm and composed as his appearance.

“Rumors can’t be trusted. Sometimes the truth falls short of them. Other times… it far surpasses them.”

Rustle.

The young Daoist rose, clasped his hands in greeting, and spoke.

“I am Hak Eui, a First-Generation Disciple of the Kunlun Sect. It is an honor to meet you, Great Hero Jin Taekyung.”

Chapter 1081

“I am Hak Eui, a First-Generation Disciple of the Kunlun Sect. It’s an honor to meet you, Great Hero Jin Taekyung, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon.”

Slender build. Refined features.

And a natural manner—not too much, not too little.

He looked somewhere between a young man and a middle-aged one, the very picture of a Daoist. I’d guessed who he was the moment our eyes met, so I bowed in return.

“This is the first time we’ve met like this.”

I couldn’t have said that without knowing who he was. Hak Eui replied calmly, without the slightest change in expression.

“My one and only Junior Brother is rather talkative for a Daoist. So I assumed you’d already heard a thing or two about me.”

I scratched my chin as I looked at Kunlun Cloud Dragon Hak Unui’s eldest Senior Brother, Hak Su’s Junior Brother, and Cheongheoja’s second Disciple.

“Even if he’s not here, that seems a bit harsh on your one and only Junior Brother.”

“It’s all right. I would’ve said the same thing if he were here.”

So that was why people said not to judge by appearances.

Despite his refined looks, Hak Eui had a way of stating the facts coldly. Without hesitation, he continued.

“Earlier, Great Hero Jin, you said we should have a proper discussion. Before that, there’s something I’d like to ask.”

I shrugged in assent, and Hak Eui went on.

“What do you intend to do with the City Lord of Qinghai and his associates who were just taken away?”

The question felt a little out of the blue, but I answered readily.

“Of course I intend to behead them. At daybreak, in front of everyone.”

That outcome had been decided long ago.

The City Lord of Qinghai had managed to survive as a corrupt official for so long because of the conflict between the Son of Heaven and the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord. His illicit fortune had drawn the Embroidered Uniform Guard’s attention a long time ago.

In the end, it was only a question of who would take up the sword. The neck it would sever had already been chosen.

And in a situation like this, it’d be ridiculous to let a man like him live.

Peace had lasted a long time in the Great Nation, too.

The City Lord of Qinghai had spent those years secretly selling off military provisions and lining his pockets with gold. There was no way the army could have functioned properly under a man like him.

There was hardly any answer but beheading.

But Hak Eui's next words went well beyond anything I'd expected.

"No."

"…!"

"…!"

"I ask you to reconsider that decision."

His firm voice sent a stir through the pavilion. Naturally.

If asking what I planned to do with them had been a little out of the blue, this was overstepping.

Even if the Son of Heaven's decree had weakened the principle that officials and martial artists must not interfere with one another, there were still limits.

A line that someone of Hak Eui's standing—the Kunlun Sect Leader's second Disciple—couldn't cross.

And the first person to react when Hak Eui crossed that unseen line was—

"Perhaps you pursued the Dao[3771] and never learned the law. Mind your words, Daoist of the Kunlun Sect."

Jeong Hogun's voice was as blunt as ever, but I noticed a faint anger in his eyes as he looked at Hak Eui.

Some people tensed beneath Jeong Hogun's aura. Cheongheoja, meanwhile, watched his Disciple in silence.

I don't know him well, but he doesn't seem like the sort to sit back and do nothing in a situation like this.

One person makes the mess; another cleans it up.

When a Disciple did something wrong, the Master usually stepped in to handle it.

Even Jeok Cheongang, who ranked among the most hot-tempered men in the world, would sometimes remember to call me out when I acted unreasonably.

Of course, he'd take my side without a second thought first.

But Cheongheoja is different.

Watching Cheongheoja deal with the hopeless trio by the shore of Qinghai Lake had convinced me that the old Daoist was practically a saint.

If a man like him was simply watching the situation unfold, there had to be a good reason.

"Then why?"

"…Marquis of Shangshan."

[3771] Dao means "the Way," the guiding principle in Daoist thought.

Jeong Hogun frowned when I suddenly spoke to Hak Eui, but I ignored him and asked again.

“Tell me. Why should those bastards be kept alive?”

Was this the mercy of a Daoist who followed the Way of Heaven and wanted to avoid taking lives whenever possible? Or was there another reason?

By now, I was genuinely curious.

Everyone’s attention fixed on him. At last, Hak Eui’s tightly closed lips parted.

“I don’t remember saying that.”

“Hm?”

“I only asked you to reconsider beheading them.”

“No, I mean, isn’t that—”

I was about to ask what the difference was when Hak Eui added firmly:

“Beheading is far too lenient. Have them executed by slow slicing in front of the people.”

“…What?”

“At times like this, one punishment should serve as a warning to a hundred. Based on the close investigation I’ve conducted into the city’s affairs over the past few days, even slow slicing seems a little too lenient.”

“…!”

“…!”

Silence fell over the pavilion. Jeok Cheongang, who’d been watching with interest, muttered under his breath.

“What a masterpiece.”

The Slaughter Saint and the Bow Saint, seated beside him, spoke with uneasy expressions.

“Is he… sure he’s a Daoist?”

“How did the Kunlun Sect end up like this…”

As the elders sighed, the hopeless trio tilted their heads at the sight of everyone staring blankly at Hak Eui, then whispered among themselves.

“Wow, I’ve never heard of ‘slow slicing’ before. What does that even mean?”

“Taishan knows.”

Taishan answered confidently, swallowing as he continued.

“I ate it once. It was very tasty.”

No, that couldn’t be right.

“Oh! So it’s a kind of dish. I’ve never tried it. Great Sir, have you?”

“What sort of dish could that possibly be? Honestly, young people these days.”

For once, Great Sir looked at Taishan and Cheongpung with an expression of pure contempt, as if a normal person had possessed him. Then he added:

“‘Slow slicing’ isn’t a dish. It’s a sobriquet. The name of a great fiend who once terrorized the whole world.”

Cheongpung and Taishan gasped at the same time. Their eyes went wide, and they eagerly asked:

“What happened to that great fiend?”

“What do you think? He fell to this lord’s hand.”

No, that couldn’t be right, either.

“Gasp! Then what Taishan ate back then was…”

“This is driving me insane. No, it wasn’t.”

I agreed completely, but why was that guy the one saying it?

“Taishan really didn’t know. Who knew a great fiend could be so tasty?”

“How many times do I have to tell you? That’s not what it was.”

He’d said it exactly twice so far—and it hadn’t even been a great fiend.

“No. Taishan really ate it.”

“…Really?”

Don’t let him convince you now. Please.

Are these guys actually insane?

Their intelligence had suffered a thousand cuts, and my head was spinning from listening to them. Just then, an old man’s voice rang out.

“I urged you to follow the Dao[3772], yet it seems this unworthy Master failed to teach his Disciple well enough.”

At last, the Kunlun Sect Leader, Cheongheoja, broke his silence. Hak Eui bowed his head slightly.

“I’m sorry, Master.”

He didn’t look sorry at all.

But whatever he was thinking right now didn’t matter to me. I was only interested in what his unexpected answer had revealed—the fact that had just shocked everyone.

“No, let him continue. Your Disciple still seems to have plenty to say.”

Hak Eui slowly raised his bowed head. A glint passed through his eyes as he looked straight at me.

“What do you mean?”

“You said it yourself. You’ve spent the past few days investigating, and doing so very thoroughly. Wasn’t that what you wanted to talk about from the start?”

“…!”

“Oh, was it not just the past few days? Have you been at it all along?”

[3772]Dao means “the Way,” the guiding principle in Daoist thought.

Across the enormous table, where dozens of people were seated, Hak Eui's eyes widened slightly. I could tell I'd hit the mark, and I laughed quietly to myself.

He and I were both young.

No—we were very young compared to the Sect Leaders who held sway over Qinghai's affairs and the Kunlun elders seated here.

But despite that common ground, our positions were worlds apart.

I could claim one of the few seats at the head of the table. He sat at the far end.

All the more reason he needed a chance to speak.

Like this moment, with everyone's attention fixed on him.

"Go ahead. Speak freely. Nobody's going to object, right?"

"Of course not."

Jeok Cheongang answered, adding with a genial smile,

"If anyone has a problem, raise your hand now. This old man will personally persuade you."

Naturally, no one raised a hand. The meeting continued through the night.

When that long night ended, a dozen or so criminals—including the City Lord of Qinghai—were dragged into the streets amid the curses of countless people.

A shrill cry rang out.

A bird streaked across the high sky and arrived as if heralding their end.

No.

A messenger eagle.

Henan, Murim Alliance.

I stared silently at the five characters written on the missive, then drew in a deep breath.

And the next moment—

Rustle.

As soon as I unfolded the missive and read its contents, every hair on my body seemed to stand on end.

"…Damn it."

The curse slipped out as I looked up at the dark sky. Beneath it, the executioners' blades flashed cruelly.

Shhk!

A tremendous roar erupted as a severed head fell.

Chapter 1082

At the same time, Jin Taekyung wasn't the only one watching the public executions from a pavilion overlooking the streets of Xining.

Shhk!

A dozen or so heads rolled from the flashing blades.

Fountains of blood erupted, the headless bodies slumped, and the crowds blanketing the streets roared.

"Waaaaah!"

"Long live His Majesty the Emperor!"

"The Marquis of Shangshan has punished the corrupt officials!"

"You fiends! Rot in hell!"

Some people threw up both hands in celebration. Others, their anger still unsated, kept cursing and jeering.

But the young man looking down at them wore a conflicted expression.

"…Hmm."

A low groan slipped from his lips. Then someone's voice suddenly pierced his ears.

"Oh, there you are."

He spun around in alarm, then sighed in relief when he recognized the unexpected visitor.

"You startled me! When did you get here?"

"When did I get here? We all arrived yesterday. Are you an idiot?"

"Um, Uncle… I wasn't asking when you came to Xining…"

"Then what?"

The shabby, middle-aged man—Great Sir—looked genuinely puzzled. The young man clicked his tongue.

"No, you're right, Uncle Great Sir. We got here yesterday."

"As I suspected. You are an idiot. Kang Pung, you're far too naïve for your age."

"It's Cheongpung."

"That's exactly what I said. Kang Pung."

For a moment, the young man—no, Cheongpung—was at a loss for words. He scratched his chin.

They'd only met a few days ago, and even Cheongpung, whose mind ranged far beyond the limits of ordinary people, sometimes found the man difficult to understand.

For most people, of course, it probably wouldn't be sometimes. It would be all the time.

"…I've never met anyone like you."

“The world is vast. You should broaden your horizons like this maiden.”

“Hmm. I’ve been meaning to say this since we first met, but I thought ‘this maiden’ was what women called themselves.”

“So?”

“Huh?”

“Judging people by appearances alone is a grave mistake. What matters is the essence. Only then can you understand the truth hidden within.”

For a moment, Great Sir almost seemed to possess some profound insight. Cheongpung stared at him blankly before he finally spoke.

“You sounded a little like an immortal just then.”

“Did I?”

“Yeah. But at the same time, you seemed a little… unimpressive.”

“Isn’t that a bit harsh? I don’t mind, being this maiden and all, but someone else might be hurt by that.”

“Oh! I’m sorry.”

“No need to apologize. Being stupid isn’t a sin.”

“…Okaaay.”

Cheongpung answered without thinking. He was still wondering whether that had been the right response when the roar outside swelled. Great Sir came over to look out the window.

“How cruel.”

Cheongpung followed his gaze, and his face stiffened.

Some of the crowd were desecrating the bodies of the executed men.

“…It is. I shouldn’t have looked.”

“You seemed down when I saw you from behind a little while ago. Was that why?”

“I never get used to killing. If I were as strong-willed as my Benefactor, I’d be much better off.”

Muttering almost to himself, Cheongpung thought of Jin Taekyung.

No matter what waves of hardship and adversity rose before him, Taekyung always pressed on, never wavering.

People praised the two of them as the Two Dragons, but to Cheongpung, Jin Taekyung was someone to look up to. Not because of strength or talent in martial arts. He admired the way Taekyung lived.

Perhaps that was why Great Sir’s next words left him speechless.

“Did you know? This world calls someone who’s grown used to killing a Killing Ghost.”

“…!”

“The strong-willed ones simply don’t show it. They haven’t gotten used to it. They’re closer to being worn out and utterly exhausted. Someone I knew was like that, too.”

“Do you know someone like that, Uncle?”

“I told you. Broaden your horizons like this maiden.”

Great Sir let out an enormous yawn, then continued.

“But he chose to accept the reality and fate he was dealt. The person you want to be like probably feels the same way.”

“…Uncle Great Sir, is this really who you are?”

“What on earth do you mean, ‘is this who I am’?”

“No, it’s nothing.”

Cheongpung blinked at how easily the words had come from Great Sir’s mouth, then let out a long sigh.

“You’re right. I was so stupid that I spoke without thinking.”

“I’ll say it again: being stupid isn’t a sin. And those men being desecrated even after death aren’t the real sinners, either.”

“They aren’t?”

“Oh, of course they’re sinners. They committed crimes worthy of death, so they deserved to die. But isn’t the real sinner the one who created this hell?”

Great Sir pointed toward the endless sky, gloomy and overcast even at midday.

“I don’t know if the Supreme Deity or whatever is up there, but I’ll bet my balls he’s not all that impressive.”

Cheongpung, who had been listening to Great Sir with a serious expression, tilted his head.

“Um, only men like me have those…”

“I told you, I have them too.”

“No, I mean, I have them too.”

“Then that settles it.”

Great Sir continued solemnly.

“You’re clearly a woman like me.”

The Cheongpung of the past might have wondered if that was true. But over the past two years or so, he had acquired at least a little common sense.

“My Second Grandfather said I’m a man.”

“Really? And did your Second Grandfather have them, too?”

“Yeah. I caught a glimpse while he was peeing. He caught me right away, though, and I nearly died.”

“I see.”

Great Sir considered this gravely, then gasped.

“Now I understand.”

“What?”

“He isn’t your grandfather. From now on, call him Second Grandmother.”

“…Be careful. If that gets back to him, he might really kill you.”

“Second Grandmother can’t kill this maiden. Even Slow Slicing,[3773] that vicious great fiend, eventually knelt before me. Though he ended up in Baekdu Gangsan’s belly.”

“Are you talking about Taishan?”

“Well, same difference. How many times must I tell you? What matters is the essence.”

Cheongpung rubbed his temples. For some reason, his head was spinning.

“Whenever I talk to you, I get confused. This has never happened to me before.”

“I understand. Your Intelligence is low.”

“I’ve lost count of how many times you’ve called me stupid. Is that why you came to find me?”

“Of course not. Do I look like I have that much free time?”

Cheongpung answered with more certainty than ever.

“Yes.”

“Not at all. The reason I came to find you was…”

Great Sir had begun confidently, but his voice faltered.

“The, um, reason…”

“Uncle Great Sir.”

“Why do you keep interrupting me? I’m trying to tell you.”

“That was the first time I called you. Be honest—you don’t remember why you came, do you?”

“What nonsense!”

Great Sir snapped, then added hesitantly, “Truthfully, it’s a little hazy. But it can’t have been important, so let’s move on.”

“Are you sure it wasn’t important?”

“I’m sure. I think someone may have asked me to come get you, but if it had been terribly important, I’d remember.”

Just as Great Sir answered firmly, as if to allow no further argument, someone’s presence came rushing toward them from far away.

“Young Hero Cheongpung! Where are you? Damn it, Young Hero Cheongpung!”

A familiar voice. A familiar face.

Cheongpung raised a hand when he spotted Hyuk Mujin hurrying this way and that.

[3773] Slow slicing, or lingchi, was a historical form of execution by repeated cuts.

"Oh, Warrior Hyuk!"

"I'm going crazy. Why are you still here? And where'd that Great Sir go?"

"Huh? Uncle Great Sir is right here with me…"

Cheongpung trailed off and blinked.

Great Sir had been standing beside him a moment ago. Now he was crouched close behind Cheongpung, hiding.

"…Uncle?"

"Shh. Pretend you don't know me. Is your Intelligence really that low?"

Cheongpung had no chance to answer.

Before he could even feel exasperated at Great Sir's simple yet flawless concealment technique, Hyuk Mujin hurried over, panting, and said something that struck Cheongpung like a bolt of lightning.

"This is no time to stand around! The Potala Palace in Tibet has joined forces with Dark Heaven!"

"…!"

Cheongpung's eyes widened.

But Hyuk Mujin wasn't finished. What came next was an even greater shock.

"And that's not all! Seafaring King Pa Ryun and Green Forest Battle King Tae Gunak…"

Ever since the conflict with Dark Heaven had begun in earnest, the Murim Alliance had feared the Murim forces of Tibet might join them.

Now Mujin had named the two giants who divided the dark-path Murim between them. Cheongpung knew what word would follow.

Betrayal.

And, as always, his ominous suspicion soon became certainty.

"The smell of manure carried a hundred li.[3774] I knew it had to be you."

The first to break the silence was a massive old man.

His blazing eyes were more intense than the sharp edge of the crescent-bladed guandao in his hand, and the aura pouring from his entire body was as vast as a surging wave.

As vast as his title: the Seafaring King.

"Better than the smell of fish. You've spent your whole life eating it raw. Your belly must be crawling with worms by now. How about you quit your life at sea and come work under this old man?"

[3774] A Chinese li is about 500 m (0.311 mi); a hundred li is about 50 km (31 mi).

But the other old man, standing a little over thirty meters[3775] away, was no pushover either.

He was remarkably small, his bones as thin as twigs. Though he looked too old to wring a chicken's neck, he had every right to sneer at Pa Ryun.

If Seafaring King Pa Ryun was the king of the Yangtze, this man ruled the mountains.

The man who had built the Green Forest Alliance of today—the Green Forest Battle King, Tae Gunak.

"'This old man,' my ass. You're a squirt, yet you run your mouth like that. Did you swallow some rotten sewage?"

"Funny, calling me a squirt over a mere one-year age difference. And even if we're only counting our experience in Murim, I'm clearly your Senior."

"Is that why you started calling yourself a king? Because no one would count you among the Ten Kings?"

Pa Ryun fired back as if he'd been waiting for the chance. Tae Gunak's gaze darkened.

"Your tongue's always been the problem."

"Funny. I was about to say the same thing."

The two old men stared at each other in silence. Their auras had taken on visible form, billowing above their shoulders.

As if they might fight to the death at any moment.

But the next instant—

Whoosh.

The two giants of the dark-path Murim swiftly suppressed their auras and quietly clicked their tongues.

Both had spent their lives using any means necessary to get what they wanted. Neither knew when their long rivalry would end, but both knew it wouldn't be today.

"How's the plan?"

"Going smoothly. Just as we were told."

Tae Gunak looked toward the dense forest behind him, his gaze darkening, then added to Pa Ryun:

"Don't forget. Two days. Two days from now."

His voice was deep and low.

"Take control of the Yangtze. That's where it begins."

[3775] A little over 30 m is a little over 98 ft.

Chapter 1083

From the moment good and evil first split apart, things that would never disappear from the world were born.

Bandits were among them.

They stole and plundered, sometimes taking lives in the process. They had been around since time immemorial, and no one had ever managed to root them out.

Where there was light, there would be shadows. As long as people felt desire and emotion, that wheel would keep turning.

Perhaps that was why people had finally accepted this unpleasant fact of life. Rather than spill innocent blood trying to break an unbreakable cycle, they had come to tolerate a measure of coexistence through negotiation.

But now they could sense that the long years of coexistence were coming to an end.

“Hey, have you heard the news?”

Foreboding always ran a step ahead of hope.

In the county towns near the mountains and rivers, people could feel that something was wrong.

“They say a sudden landslide last night completely blocked the road over the mountain. The herb gatherers say it doesn’t look like an ordinary landslide…”

“What do you mean, not an ordinary landslide?”

“I’ve spent all fifty years of my life plowing fields, so I can’t say for sure. But those fellows know what they’re looking at.”

“And?”

“They looked at the ends of the trees swept down with the earth and sand. The trunks hadn’t just bent and snapped. It looked as if someone had taken a few halfhearted swings at them with an axe. And there’d been no real sign of a landslide beforehand.”

“Wait. Does that mean…”

“Who else could it be? Unless ghosts did it, it was those damn bandits.”

“Shh! ‘Those damn bandits’? Watch your mouth. It’s unlikely, but if someone from the Green Forest Alliance hears you…”

“Green Forest Alliance, my ass. What’s wrong with calling bandits bandits? Those highwaymen take two days’ wages just to let you cross a mountain pass!”

“Now, now. I understand how you feel, but the Green Forest Alliance is officially on our side. By imperial decree, they’ve joined forces with the Murim Alliance against the vicious enemies in the west.”

“He’s right. Everyone knows bandits are no good, but they’re not like Dark Heaven, running completely wild. Something similar happened when we were kids, didn’t it?”

“Right. It was the Demonic Cult back then, not Dark Heaven. But I remember the bandits joining forces with the Murim Alliance to fight them. The Green Forest Alliance was formed afterward.”

To these middle-aged men, now well along in years, the Great Faction War was an unforgettable childhood memory.

Ordinary people had suffered little harm, but the news that bloodthirsty murderers who believed in an evil doctrine had invaded the Central Plains had thrown the whole land into turmoil.

So even with these ominous rumors about the Green Forest Alliance, people couldn’t help but remain skeptical. The Green Forest Alliance they remembered was a group formed by bandits who were at least willing to talk. They had long since become a part of everyday life.

But there were other rumors, too.

“Remember those men who passed through our village in the dead of night two days ago?”

“Of course. You mean those strangers? I think they said they were from the Blue Flower Escort Bureau.”

“Right, those men. One of their caravan porters was big as an ox, and he held up that heavy flag without batting an eye. That startled me enough, but then I saw his face. He looked even fiercer than he was big.”

“Why bring them up now? Merchants and escort bureaus pass through here several times a month. There’s nothing unusual about that.”

At the others’ puzzled looks, the middle-aged man who had brought it up lowered his voice.

“They came through, yes. But what matters is where they ended up.”

“What?”

“See for yourself. Herb Gatherer Hong pulled this out of the landslide early this morning.”

The next moment, the middle-aged man pulled a bundled piece of cloth from his robe and unfolded it. Everyone who saw it widened their eyes.

More precisely, they stared at the two characters revealed as the dried mud and grains of sand fell away.

Blue Flower.

“T-This is…”

“If you remember that big porter, you’ll remember the flag he was carrying. That’s right. This is the escort bureau’s flag.”

They looked at one another and swallowed hard.

A flag meant something to any group. Soldiers would give their lives to protect their commander's banner, and the merchants and escort bureaus these people knew took pride in their flags, too.

So what did it mean that the flag of an escort bureau that had taken the mountain road just two nights ago had turned up buried in a landslide? That a suspicious landslide had blocked the only way through barely a day later?

"You can guess what this means, can't you?"

"…You don't think?"

"It's not a question of what I think. The Green Forest Alliance—those damned bandits—must have done something. For some reason, they killed to silence the witnesses, then tried to hide it with a staged landslide."

A suffocating silence settled over them.

Their fears were taking shape, and every detail seemed to fit. The thought left them struggling to breathe.

"B-But what would they have to gain? They fought the Demonic Cult in the past. As a reward, they got to call themselves an alliance, like the river pirates on the Yangtze, and live well enough."

"Remember what you said at the harvest two years ago?"

"Two years ago? What does that have to do with anything?"

"You were disappointed. It was the best harvest in nearly ten years, but you sighed and said it still wasn't enough. Why would those men be any different?"

"…!"

"It's obvious. Even we farmers get greedy. What about men who make their living taking what belongs to others?"

Their circumstances were different, but the comparison held.

The middle-aged tenant farmer was speaking only from his own experience and his low opinion of bandits. Still, there was reason enough behind what he said.

The Demonic Cult had wanted only the Central Plains Murim. Dark Heaven wanted the world itself.

Anyone who won this gamble could become a true king of a nation, instead of merely being called one of the Ten Kings.

A new world.

Under a new ruler.

And among the news that had reached this little village was a story far more shocking than the still-unconfirmed rumors of the Green Forest Alliance's betrayal.

"Even the Murong Family of the orthodox faction—the one supposedly full of Great Heroes of Benevolence and Righteousness—joined forces with those vicious enemies. Why wouldn't a bunch of thieves?"

At the mention of the Murong Family, one of the Five Great Families, which had unleashed a bloodbath across the northern lands, the others shut their mouths as if on cue.

Of course. Those men were bandits by nature. Taking from others was their way of life. Why would betrayal trouble them?

If they won this enormous gamble—if they survived to the end—they could gain wealth and glory beyond anything they had known before.

“What an age of chaos.”

The old man sitting in the corner had quietly voiced what they were all thinking. His next words came out like a sigh and fed their mounting unease.

“With the mountains in such an uproar, the river won’t stay calm.”

Soon, his words came true.

Two days after the two giants of the dark-path Murim faced one another.

If you asked whose the vast, boundless Yangtze was, those in the Murim would answer without hesitation.

Not the Five Great Families or the Nine Sects and One Gang. The Yangtze River Channel League.

But those outside Murim would give a different answer. Mountain or river, everything beneath the lofty sky had only one master.

The Son of Heaven.

Seafaring King Pa Ryun had never liked that one bit.

“When this old man was a child, an old man who lived next door told me the Son of Heaven had dragon blood in his veins. A child of Heaven, he said, who must be served with all one’s heart and soul.”

His voice was low but carried force, and his profound internal energy made the space around him tremble.

“He had a bad temper, but he was a decent enough old man. When I was orphaned by one bad harvest after another, he took me in for a while.”

Pa Ryun’s gaze grew distant as he looked back on his past.

He had gone over those memories hundreds, thousands of times. Almost none were good. He had lost both parents before he was old enough to grow a beard, and being taken in by that old man—working hard as a servant just to get enough to eat—had been among the better times.

Even that hadn’t lasted.

“It was a damnable age. More than ten fools called themselves kings, and so-called imperial troops could march into a village in broad daylight, loot it, and kill its people without anyone holding them to account.”

Pa Ryun stroked his sparse beard.

It was a familiar story. The old man had died then.

Not at the hands of a defeated army or bandits, but the imperial troops marching forward with sharp spears and tall banners.

The twelve-year-old boy, grateful to the old man, killed the soldier who had driven a spear into the old man's frail body, then ran.

"I ran for three days and nights without stopping. I finally shook off my pursuers, reached the riverbank, and collapsed. And a thought came to me."

Pa Ryun pointed at the sky.

"There were so many people claiming the world belonged to them. If the so-called children of Heaven were like that, who was I supposed to serve?"

The long age of chaos eventually ended.

A hero surnamed Zhu unified the continent and proclaimed to all under Heaven that he alone was the Son of Heaven.

By then, the boy had become a young man, and the servant had become a river pirate. Watching the new Son of Heaven ascend the throne, Pa Ryun found his answer.

"That was when I learned that anything could be won with spears and swords. Only the final victor could prove his claim through the outcome."

But Pa Ryun knew his own limits better than anyone. He had neither a cause that would let him claim the world nor the strength to take it.

He could, however, take this vast river.

And with it came hundreds of ships and thousands of men—enough to face the Great Nation's warships now appearing in the distance.

"Raise the sails. The time has come."

Fwoosh.

A great expanse of cloth billowed above Pa Ryun's broad smile.

As countless ships followed the flag, the black-clad man at his side quietly curled his lips into a smile.

Chapter 1084

The endless waves of the Yangtze roll on.

The line came from a poet of long ago, celebrated in his day as the Poet Sage.[3776]

He had revered the distant history held in the Yangtze's waters, and the beauty of the river itself. The man sitting at the bow with his eyes closed felt the same.

No. Naturally, he felt it even more deeply.

He had loved the Yangtze since childhood, become a river pirate, and in time made Ship-Fire Boy a name that symbolized him.

Boom. Boom. Booooom!

Drumbeats spread across the water like ripples, and the man opened his eyes. He was Mu Song, the Seafaring King's second Disciple and Stronghold Lord of Water Dragon Stronghold.

"Stronghold Lord. The order has finally come."

Mu Song nodded gravely. Even without his subordinate's report, he knew better than anyone where the drumbeats had come from.

The Sea Dragon Ship.

The vessel of his Master, Seafaring King Pa Ryun.

In the final battle against the Yellow River Channel League, once their only rival, it had sunk dozens of ships single-handedly. It was the mightiest vessel on the river.

Now the Sea Dragon Ship, which no one dared challenge, was cutting through the current with the Yangtze's greatest martial artist aboard and its sails fully spread.

It was headed toward the Great Nation's military vessels—the ships of the Yangtze's other master.

No—the Yangtze's master in all but name.

But today will be different.

Today, we'll show them that we—the Yangtze River Channel League—are the Yangtze's true rulers.

Mu Song muttered the words to himself and thrust his fist into the air. His subordinates roared, and the wind filled the sails.

Whoooosh!

The bow cut through the water.

Just as they charged toward the Great Nation's vessels like horses across an open plain, something dark and grayish emerged between the vessels that had turned obliquely to face them.

"Fire!"

At that instant—

[3776] The Poet Sage is Du Fu, a Tang-dynasty poet. The opening line quotes his poem "Ascending the Height."

Boom! Boom!

More than a hundred Hongyi cannons[3777] roared at once.

Weapons the Great Nation's navy could possess, but no mere band of river pirates could.

Lumps of iron capable of crushing a human body in an instant came hurtling through the air from two hundred zhang[3778] away. Even at that terrifying sight, Mu Song's eyes didn't waver.

He was no mere river pirate.

Whoosh.

His form blurred. He kicked off the bow and shot forward, the great saber in his hand tracing a vicious arc toward an incoming cannonball.

Kaboom!

The recoil from deflecting it sent Mu Song back onto the bow. His hand tingled around the hilt, and he shouted, "Charge! Charge!"

"Waaaah!"

Answering with a mighty roar, the swift ships the Yangtze River Channel League was so proud of surged forward even faster.

Every river pirate gathered here was a handpicked elite. Trained in martial arts, the oarsmen rowed with strength and speed, while the Peak masters stationed at the vanguard did everything they could to shield the ships from the hail of cannonballs.

Even they had limits.

Rumble!

"Arrrgh!"

"The ship—the ship's sinking!"

A tremendous boom swallowed the screams. Shattered swift ships began to sink all around them.

Hundreds of ships gathered together made one enormous target.

The League's ships were built for speed rather than durability. Their hulls were small and sleek—which meant a single cannonball could easily send one to the bottom.

Boom! Boom!

Even so, Mu Song narrowed his eyes as cannonballs missed the hulls by a wide margin and slammed into the water.

As I thought. They haven't set up a proper barrage.

[3777] Hongyi cannons were large, European-style cannons adopted by China.

[3778] A zhang is a traditional Chinese length of about 3.03 meters, or 9.94 ft. Two hundred zhang is about 606 meters, or 1,990 ft.

The latest cannonballs hadn't arrived together on a signal. In fact, nothing had been coordinated since the first volley.

Despite the constant, deafening blasts, the League's losses were minor compared with its full strength. He could even see military vessels sinking because their own cannons had misfired.

The enemy fired at staggered intervals, without waiting for orders from the flagship. They looked as though something were chasing them, shooting the moment each cannon was ready.

The river pirates had been tense, knowing full well what cannons could do. Now smiles were beginning to spread among them.

"Stronghold Lord, they look flustered."

"Shit. I nearly pissed myself, and now I just feel embarrassed."

Mu Song nodded at his subordinates' relieved remarks. "Just as my Master said."

"Pardon? The Chief Stronghold Lord—no, the Alliance Leader?"

"That's right. He said they'd be caught unprepared after so many years of peace."

Mu Song thought the same as his Master.

A predator grew lazy once the hunt was over.

For a long time, no one had risen to challenge the Great Nation, which ruled the vast continent alone. The Yangtze River Channel League was only an alliance of river pirates, tolerated to a certain extent. Peace, when it lasted too long, had a way of making people weak.

Of course, the Great Nation had an elite fleet that kept up its training in case of emergency. But that fleet was on the sea, not the river.

Ever since the Great Nation unified the continent, the only enemies it had needed to watch for were foreign ones.

We'll win this battle.

Just as Mu Song quietly repeated the words to himself, sure of victory, one of the chuckling subordinates suddenly spoke up.

"Still, there's something that feels a little off."

"What do you mean?"

"It's not that I'm complaining, exactly, but…"

The subordinate scratched the back of his head, then added hesitantly, "Are we really supposed to be doing this?"

"What?"

"It just doesn't feel right. We've managed well enough up to now, so why stab the Murim Alliance in the back and join hands with those rotten bastards in Dark Heaven…?"

He trailed off, looking uneasy. The others exchanged glances and began to chime in.

"Well, Dark Heaven does stink to high heaven. Those orthodox faction bastards may talk shit about us behind our backs, but they're not that rotten."

"Yeah, yeah."

"Orders are orders. Underlings like us have to follow them. But it doesn't sit right."

The subordinates had been murmuring among themselves, but when they saw their leader's expression stiffen, they fell silent. The truth was, Mu Song wasn't at ease either.

Are we really supposed to be doing this?

The more he thought about what the man had said, the more bitter his mouth felt.

Perhaps it tasted all the more bitter because, deep down, he knew better than anyone why they were doing it.

Even if it's my Master's order... I can't bring myself to like this.

Mu Song had never once thought of himself as a junzi.[3779]

A river pirate.

Just as the name said, he was a thief. He couldn't deny that.

But he had never crossed a certain line.

He never took from anyone who looked poor, and if one of his subordinates committed murder, Mu Song punished him severely on the spot.

But this. This is...

Mu Song looked out over the river, filled with thunder and chaos, and swallowed the words rising in his throat.

At the same time, a face suddenly came to mind.

Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung.

He'd borrowed their swift ships so many times it was practically theft, then bossed them around like servants. He was a thief worse than they were, if anything. But Jin Taekyung was still a chivalrous hero.

So was the fearsome Fire King. Even the Slaughter Saint.

They had fought Dark Heaven, which had plunged the world into misery, and stood against injustice.

Come to think of it, did helping them make me a chivalrous hero for a little while too?

At the absurd thought that flashed through his mind, Mu Song bit his lip without realizing it.

And pointless.

Now that they had come this far, he couldn't undo anything on his own.

[3779] A junzi is the Confucian ideal of a morally upright person.

He and his Junior Brother, the Iron-Water Divine Dragon, had already voted against this. But the First Disciple and several key Elders had persuaded their Master, and his resolve had held firm.

At last, the time has come. This is our one chance to become the Yangtze's true rulers.

That had settled everything.

It was an order from his Master and Alliance Leader, Seafaring King Pa Ryun—a man as exalted as the heavens in Mu Song's eyes.

For a Disciple who trusted and followed his Master as though he were a god, there could be no more objections or stray doubts. There must not be.

He was a river pirate, and he would remain one.

"…We'll finish this quickly. Everyone, get ready."

Leaving his subordinates to watch him anxiously, Mu Song gripped the great saber in his hand with all his might.

The Yangtze, shrouded in thick cannon smoke rising even now, looked strange and unsettling, as if he were seeing it for the first time.

Damn it.

Swallowing the curse on the tip of his tongue, Mu Song recalled a line from an old poet's verse. He had recited it until he was hoarse, despite never even finishing the Thousand Character Classic.[3780]

Why were the waters of the Yangtze, which should have flowed so steadily as always, churning so violently and red?

His brief reverie ended as the shadow of a military vessel drew close.

Rumble—crash!

A tremendous impact.

The moment the swift ship's sharp ram slammed into the side of the military vessel—

Whoosh!

Mu Song kicked off the bow and leaped up, bringing his great saber down with all his strength toward a group of government troops preparing to fight on deck.

At the same time, he saw them clearly.

The fear and tension in their eyes. Their trembling spears and blades. Their bodies frozen in place.

"…Damn it."

The curse escaped him at last. At the final moment, Mu Song twisted his saber with all his strength.

The blade energy gathered along it vanished like smoke, and the keen edge turned aside.

[3780] The Thousand Character Classic is a classical Chinese text used to teach reading and writing.

Thud! Thump!

The soldiers crumpled limply with dull blows instead of sharp cuts.

“Huh?”

His subordinates climbed onto the deck behind him and stared, eyes wide. Before any of them could speak, Mu Song said quietly, “Don’t kill them. We’ll need men to row.”

The river pirates looked at one another blankly, then grinned.

“You all hear that? The Stronghold Lord says to leave them alive.”

“Of course. Who’d dare disobey an order like that?”

They all knew how flimsy the excuse was.

But this was not the Yangtze they wanted to see.

Rumble! Boom!

Military vessels sank one after another in flames. Cries of agony rang out from every direction. Watching and listening, Mu Song silently addressed his Master aboard the Sea Dragon Ship far away, sinking everything that stood in its path.

Is this what the Yangtze you wanted so badly is supposed to look like?

That day, in just two shichen[3781], the Yangtze River Channel League sent around a hundred military vessels carrying thousands of government troops to the bottom of the river. Then its ships turned west.

Somewhere far to the west.

And the astonishing news was enough to turn the world upside down.

[3781] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of about two hours; two shichen are about four hours.

Chapter 1085

The rumors spread in an instant.

From mouth to mouth.

On the beating wings of messenger pigeons.

Along with the hooves of horses racing across mountains and fields under the crack of whips, and the smoke of beacon fires staining the sky gray.

Before the people shaken by the astonishing news could even determine whether it was true, they saw it with their own eyes.

Countless ships cutting swiftly through the river, their flags billowing proudly in the favorable wind.

The Yangtze River Channel League.

The moment they made out the five characters on those wind-swollen flags, they knew that denying it any longer would mean hiding from reality.

Everything they had seen and heard was no baseless rumor.

It was true.

A mere band of river pirates, who had lived off the Yangtze with the world's tacit consent, had at last become its true rulers.

And they had done it against the Great Nation itself—the master of the world.

"…Gods of heaven and earth."

The groan that slipped from someone's lips sounded hollow.

The vast empire founded under the Mandate of Heaven[3782] was collapsing.

No—their heaven was.

"If this isn't defying heaven, then what is?"

More than a hundred years had passed since the age of warring heroes ended and a unified dynasty was born.

The country folk, who had revered the Great Nation ruled by the Son of Heaven as heaven itself, trembled with unease. Confucian scholars groaned as they realized that the order they had taken for granted had crumbled. Betrayed martial artists seethed with anger and shock.

"Those bandits finally…!"

"I knew something was off. We should never have trusted dark-path figures in the first place!"

But the Yangtze River Channel League's betrayal wasn't the only news to shock everyone.

"Two days ago, the Green Forest bandits rebelled in Hubei and Shaanxi!"

[3782] The Mandate of Heaven is a traditional Chinese doctrine that a ruler's authority depends on heaven's approval, which can be lost through misrule.

The Green Forest Alliance, which divided the world's dark-path forces with the Yangtze River Channel League, had risen up.

And people belatedly realized that storm clouds were gathering beyond the distant Great Wall as well.

"An urgent report from Sichuan! Potala Palace in Tibet is on the move!"

Potala Palace.

The news that the esoteric monks—counted among the Three Outer Powers alongside the North Sea Ice Palace and Nanman Beast Palace—had finally broken their long silence and stirred to action surprised no one in the Murim.

In their eyes, as people of the Central Plains, Potala Palace had been nothing more than a pseudo-religion following evil doctrines since the distant past.

The New Murim Alliance had sent envoys to seek an alliance several times since its founding, but Potala Palace had always answered with silence. For them to act now, in a situation like this, could only mean one thing.

"…Dark Heaven. It's them again."

Fortunately, Sichuan had powerful reinforcements.

Unlike the North Sea Ice Palace, which remained neutral as always, Nanman Beast Palace had overcome the threat of civil war thanks to the astonishing exploits of a young man and resolved to ally itself with the Murim Alliance.

So attention turned to the Yangtze River Channel League and the Green Forest Alliance.

The initial shock soon passed, and quite a few people began to scoff at the dark-path forces' uprising.

"Even if they've won a great victory, dark-path figures are still dark-path figures. Nothing's changed."

It wasn't entirely wrong.

The Yangtze River Channel League and the Green Forest Alliance together had nearly twenty thousand men, but if numbers alone were enough to take everything, the Murim world would belong to the Beggars' Sect.

Everyone was confident that the orthodox factions, now completely united around the Murim Alliance, wouldn't be shaken by a force this small.

"Shaanxi has Huashan and Zhongnan, and Hubei has Wudang and the Zhuge Clan. If the Son of Heaven's Imperial Army moves out too, those bastards will regret joining hands with Dark Heaven."

But that prediction had several fatal flaws.

First, the Zhongnan Sect had very few forces left at its headquarters.

Second, most of the hundreds of thousands of Imperial Army troops were concentrated in Jiangsu, where the Imperial Capital and the Son of Heaven were located.

Third, the Green Forest Alliance and the Yangtze River Channel League were advancing west in broad daylight, making no effort to hide, and their forces were far larger than anyone had expected.

Like a snowball growing as it rolled down a snowy slope.

“The Green Forest bandits gathered in Hubei crossed Tongsan half a shichen[3783] ago! Their numbers are estimated at around five thousand!”

“Five thousand? What in the—”

“Weren’t there only around three thousand half a day ago?”

“W-Well, it seems the forces scattered among the various strongholds have joined them.”

“That’s absurd!”

But the men who so fiercely rejected the messenger’s report soon learned that another force had joined the two groups of outlaws secretly gathering around Hubei and Shaanxi since before the great battle in Gansu.

And it had reached them by the very means the Central Plains Murim feared most.

“…Damn it. They must have used that accursed dark art.”

“Dark art? You don’t mean…”

“I do. A Moving Formation.”

The existence of the Moving Formation had once been guarded with the strictest secrecy. Now it was no longer known to only a tiny handful of people.

As long as people had eyes and ears, secrets would eventually get out.

The Murim Alliance leadership and the Hidden Shadow Pavilion, led by the Thousand-Faced Fox Song Ho, had stepped forward, but for some reason, the secret of the Moving Formation had still gotten out. Now that the Sect Leaders and Family Heads had confirmed it was real, a chill ran through them.

We have to strike. Right now.

The Yangtze River Channel League and the Green Forest Alliance were, after all, coalitions of separate groups.

Their Stronghold Lords commanded anywhere from a few dozen to several hundred, or even a thousand, men each. They pledged loyalty to their respective alliance leaders and repeatedly gathered and dispersed at their command.

Now was the best time to strike.

Before the enemy had fully assembled. Before they could gather in one place and become a powerful force.

But the complication everyone had secretly feared had come to pass.

No one even knew where the Moving Formations were, and Dark Heaven’s powerful forces were using them to join the dark-path figures.

[3783] A shichen is a traditional unit of time lasting approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

What if we fight them now?

It was dangerous.

The Moving Formations alone posed an enormous threat, and there was no guarantee of victory.

Shaolin, the Mount Tai and Northern Dipper of the Murim, had suffered terrible losses. So had the Sichuan Tang Clan, which held its place among the Five Great Families with deadly poisons and hidden weapons. Even Nanman Beast Palace and the Hebei Peng Family had been badly hit.

That wasn't all. According to reports, the Kongtong and Zhongnan Sects had also been hit hard in Gansu.

The damage was no less severe than during the Great Faction War, a time no one wanted to remember. If anything, it was worse.

The Nine Sects and One Gang. The Five Great Families.

With even the fifteen great trees supporting the Murim world trembling at their roots in the typhoon stirred up by Dark Heaven's storm clouds, it was no easy thing to summon the courage to risk everything and face the danger.

Least of all Sect Leaders and Family Heads, who were responsible for their dependents' lives as well as their own.

"I… I give up."

"Sir Seok! What are you saying?"

"Let's be realistic. Do you think the forces gathered here can stand against them?"

"But—"

"You know it too, don't you? The outcome is already decided. We have to conserve what strength we can. Fortunately, those traitors who joined hands with Dark Heaven are heading only west. We can avoid a clash for now."

"Fortunately? Did you just say 'fortunately'? Do you really not know what they're after?"

"I know. They want to pin down the reinforcements from the Central Plains and take Qinghai completely into their grasp. That must be their goal."

"And you know that, yet…!"

"But this time, I have no choice. I'm no Supreme Peak master, nor am I a Sect Leader of one of the Nine Sects and One Gang. I'm sorry."

"Sir Seok!"

"Please don't call me that. I'm not worthy of it. I'm just a cowardly Sect Leader who wants to keep his dependents safe."

He muttered the words bitterly and left. Several other Sect Leaders, their faces downcast, got up and followed him.

Then the refined-looking middle-aged man who had been watching quietly from the seat of honor rose too.

Scrape.

The others had watched the departing Sect Leaders with anger and a sense of betrayal, though part of them understood. Now their eyes widened.

They had been certain that even if everyone else left, this man wouldn't.

"F-Family Head!"

"What is this?"

But contrary to their fears, the middle-aged man merely shrugged, his expression calm.

"Ah, don't misunderstand. I'm just going to get some air."

The others relaxed, then sighed.

A third of Hubei Murim's leading figures had just left, and he was going to get some air?

It was just like him. That didn't make it any less ridiculous.

"Why now, of all times?"

"Yes. Right now."

"There's so much to discuss. Even the Murim Alliance hasn't made a proper decision yet…"

"If it's that urgent, I'll just piss right here."

"Pardon?"

As the others stared at him in bewilderment, the middle-aged man clutched the front of his trousers, looking grave.

"My bladder's about to burst."

"…!"

"I don't know whether it's age or all this time I've spent away from our family, living out in the world, but my bladder seems to have gotten weak. And even when I'm sitting still, a certain private spot on my backside starts tingling…"

He rambled on until he noticed their expressions, then smacked his lips.

"Well, I shouldn't have brought it up. Let's get back to our discussion."

"…Just go."

"No, no. I'll wet myself right here. I'm sure even Zhuge Wuhou did when he was busy."

"Please go. We're begging you."

"Oh? Then it's all right if I do?"

"Yes. For our sake, please."

"You've begged me so earnestly three times. I suppose I'll have to follow the story of the Three Visits to the Thatched Cottage.[3784]"

[3784]The Three Visits to the Thatched Cottage alludes to Liu Bei visiting Zhuge Liang three times to persuade him to serve as his adviser.

The middle-aged man smiled at the half-resigned group—Zhuge Feng, Family Head of the Zhuge Clan, or rather, the Crouching Dragon Guest—and hurried out.

He didn't head for the privy. Instead, he wound through maze-like paths for some time before reaching the garden in the Inner Hall, where only the Family Head was permitted to enter. There he finally stopped.

"It's all well and good to stay out of sight, but you should at least tell me where to find you."

In a corner of the spacious garden, someone stood with their back to him, gazing at a mulberry grove said to have been planted by Zhuge Kongming himself.

Zhuge Feng added quietly, "Don't you agree, Alliance Leader?"

Chapter 1086

To put it kindly, he had an open, easygoing face. Put it less kindly, he was the sort of young man you might forget soon after meeting him.

He was neither tall nor short, with a natural air that let him blend in wherever he went.

Perhaps that was why no one had thought of the title Sword Saint when they saw the young man beside Zhuge Feng, who had returned to his family after a lengthy absence.

“Oh, there you are.”

Mae Jonghak finally turned around and smiled at Zhuge Feng.

His eyes were deep yet clear, and his smile seemed to put anyone who saw it at ease.

While the world was gripped by turmoil and anxiety, the Murim Alliance Leader—who ought to have borne a heavier burden than anyone else—continued in an almost childlike tone.

“I wandered around for a while and got bored. Then I started walking wherever I felt drawn, and somehow I ended up here.”

“You came here without knowing where you were?”

“I did.”

“This garden and everything within roughly a hundred jang[3785] of it are part of the Family Head’s Hall. Even our family’s direct descendants need my permission to enter.”

“Is that so? I did think something was a little odd. I could sense people hiding here and there, and there were all sorts of mechanisms and formations, along with quite a few arrays.”

Zhuge Feng could only let out a hollow laugh.

“Is something good happening?”

“Not at all. I just find this funny.”

The Zhuge Clan was a place even the greatest thieves in the world wouldn’t dare try to break into.

The Heaven-Stealing Thief, who was said to be capable of stealing from heaven itself, had once had the nerve to enter the Zhuge Clan’s Family Head’s Hall. He promptly got caught in its mechanisms and formations and wandered for over a month.

At the time, he was the greatest thief in the world. In the end, the Zhuge Clan’s martial artists rescued him on the merciful order of the previous Family Head. Released with nothing but skin and bones left, he had this to say:

[3785] A jang is ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). A hundred jang is about 303 m (994 ft).

> “Break into the imperial palace, and you’ll be tortured to death. Break into the Sichuan Tang Clan, and you’ll be poisoned to death. But break into the Zhuge Clan, and they’ll rob you down to your soul and let you starve to death.”

And so the Three Forbidden Places were born, leaving a painful lesson for the thieves who came after him.

Of course, it had now been proven that even the Zhuge Clan’s Family Head’s Hall—where the greatest thief of the age had nearly starved to death—was powerless before the greatest swordsman in the world.

“My apologies. If I’d known this was the Family Head’s Hall, I would’ve asked permission.”

“I was in a meeting at the time.”

“Does the door stay shut if the homeowner isn’t there? I could’ve asked the people hiding around here to let me in.”

“Even if you had asked, would they really have opened it and said, ‘Goodness, where have you been all this time?’”

“True enough. It’s not as if I could tell them I’m the Alliance Leader.”

As Mae Jonghak scratched the back of his head, Zhuge Feng shook his own.

People called Zhuge Feng a bit of an eccentric, but compared to the man before him, he couldn’t hold a candle to him.

“So, what were you doing here?”

“Taking in the scent.”

“The scent?”

Zhuge Feng cocked his head.

Though he had been the Family Head for many years, he had visited this garden only a handful of times.

Part of the reason was that he spent most of his time studying and researching mechanisms and formations. But the place was also far too rugged to call a flower garden.

“As you can see, this garden is full of nothing but mulberry trees. There isn’t much to look at, and they don’t smell especially nice.”

“That’s not so. Everything in the world has its own scent. These mulberry trees are no different.”

Mae Jonghak added quietly, “Nor are the plum blossoms that must be blooming somewhere beyond my reach right now.”

Something in his faint voice made Zhuge Feng fall silent for a moment. Then he asked carefully, “Do you… want to return to Huashan?”

“I always have. But not at a time like this. I know where I need to be.”

"Then…"

"I just miss those peaceful days. That day I lay in the sunlight, in a forest thick with plum blossoms."

Mae Jonghak reached out and stroked a nearby mulberry tree.

Perhaps because of the unseasonable cold, its branches drooped without a single fruit. It looked much like the world did now.

"One day, this mulberry tree will bear fruit too. Don't you think?"

"It will. No—I'll make sure it does. With my own hands."

Mae Jonghak gave a faint smile at Zhuge Feng's firm reply.

"Your hands are precious. Put them to work elsewhere. Rough work like this calls for a swordsman like me."

"…!"

Zhuge Feng's eyes trembled as he understood what Mae Jonghak meant.

A year.

Short, if you called it short. Long, if you called it long.

Now, at last, the results of the work they had pursued more fiercely than anything before were drawing close. He could feel it in his skin.

Even Zhuge Feng, who already knew every step and turn of the plan, was shaken.

"Alliance Leader, do you mean…"

"We can't keep taking hits forever. So many people have endured and waited for so long."

"Then, at last?"

Mae Jonghak nodded quietly.

"We can't let this chance pass us by. We may never get another."

"…!"

"You've worked hard, Family Head Zhuge. Without your efforts, we wouldn't have this opportunity today."

Zhuge Feng managed to steady himself. He took a deep breath, then replied,
"No. It's thanks to everyone's sacrifices, great and small."

He looked down at his hand, still trembling.

It was rough and coarse.

Like the hand of a martial artist who had spent their whole life training.

Gone were the slender, delicate hands of a man who had learned only the minimum martial arts required of a Family Head, hands whose calluses had slowly faded away.

Ever since the dark cloud of Dark Heaven had spread across the world, he had waited for this day.

The day he could prove why he had spent so long away from home.

“Have you decided who will stay and who will leave?”

“Yes.”

“You know what your mission is.”

“How could I not? I’ve been waiting for this moment all along.”

“The preparations are complete. Everyone under heaven is ready.”

Mae Jonghak stressed the final words, then pulled a rolled-up sheet of paper from his robes and held it out.

“This is…”

“Chief Song gave it to me before I left Henan.”

Mae Jonghak’s absence was currently being kept an absolute secret. At the mention of Song Ho, Chief of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion, Zhuge Feng’s gaze grew intent.

“What’s on it?”

“The names of the spies still in our ranks, along with the people who’ll join you and a rough map marking where you’re to meet them.”

As Zhuge Feng unrolled the letter and read it for himself, delight flashed in his eyes.

“Just as I thought…”

“It took the Hidden Shadow Pavilion, the Beggars’ Sect, and the Lower District Sect working together. Chief Song personally selected everyone involved, so there’s no need to worry about the secret getting out.”

“I thought as much. I’ll carry it out without the slightest mistake.”

“Everyone’s worked hard to cultivate this field. We can’t let birds or insects peck away at it.”

“Don’t worry. Getting here was painful and hard, but I’ll finish the harvest in one swift stroke, without a single mistake.”

“I trust you.”

Mae Jonghak took the letter back from Zhuge Feng and channeled internal energy into his hand.

Whoosh.

Flames of Samadhi True Fire engulfed the paper, and ash scattered on the wind.

Mae Jonghak had burned the letter against any chance of it being found. Watching him, Zhuge Feng clasped his hands together with utmost respect.

He already knew it was time for the greatest swordsman in the world to leave.

“Travel safely, Alliance Leader.”

Zhuge Feng bowed with sincere respect.

When he raised his head again, all that remained were hundreds of mulberry trees trembling in the cold wind.

“What a hurry. He left without even saying goodbye.”

Zhuge Feng gave a quiet chuckle and reached out to touch a drooping mulberry branch.

These trees were said to have been planted by the Zhuge Clan's ancient ancestor, Zhuge Wuhou, and were one of the clan's symbols. But the story the common folk liked to repeat was nothing more than a rumor.

Wuhou followed Emperor Zhaolie of Han[3786] to settle in Bashu.[3787] There's no way the mulberry trees he planted himself could be thousands of li[3788] away, in Hubei.

These mulberry trees had been planted by Zhuge Wuhou's descendants, who laid the foundation for the Zhuge Clan as it stood today.

They had planted them to carry on the Zhuge family line—and to remember their great ancestor.

No one knew what had become of the hundreds of mulberry trees that must have remained in Shu Han, which had ultimately fallen after Zhuge Wuhou's death.

But their roots lived on in a new land.

As long as a single seed remained, the line would not end.

"What matters is the people, not the land."

Murmuring softly, Zhuge Feng brushed the frost from the branch.

"When I come back, I hope you'll be bearing fruit."

With one last faint smile, Zhuge Feng turned and walked away without hesitation.

A few moments later, he came upon the people tearing through the Inner Hall, worried their Family Head might have been assassinated in the privy. Without warning, he said, "All right, start packing."

"What? Packing what now?"

"Wait, you haven't finished packing yet?"

Before the bewildered group could make sense of what he meant, he hit them with another thunderbolt.

"I said pack your things! The Zhuge Clan is leaving this place immediately!"

At that moment, a few of them thought that damn Family Head might have been better off getting assassinated in the privy.

Yet a smile they couldn't understand tugged at Zhuge Feng's lips as he dropped that bombshell.

May fortune be with you, Alliance Leader. And…

Just a little longer. Please, hold on just a little longer.

Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung.

With that desperate wish in his heart, Zhuge Feng gazed far to the west.

[3786] Emperor Zhaolie of Han was Liu Bei, the founding ruler of Shu Han.

[3787] Bashu is a historical name for the region around the Sichuan Basin, including parts of present-day Sichuan and Chongqing.

[3788] A Chinese li is about 500 m (0.311 mi).

Chapter 1087

While Zhuge Feng gazed west with an earnest wish in his eyes, a low laugh rang out from the highest peak in the western lands.

“Good. This is how it should be. Exactly how it should be.”

At the Blood Lord’s smiling nod, the messenger who had just finished his report felt a quiet sense of relief.

He had brought news good enough to satisfy him.

Unlike his comrades, who had become cold corpses one after another, he wouldn’t be killed by the violent man before him.

But it was too soon to feel safe.

This hour wasn’t over yet.

“So they’re all just watching and waiting to see what happens?”

At the Blood Lord’s question, the messenger lowered himself further, prostrating himself before he answered.

“That is correct. The Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families are watching the situation and strengthening their defenses, but they have made no further moves.”

“They used to praise one another as chivalrous heroes. Now that the moment has come, they’re scared stiff.”

The Blood Lord’s smile deepened. Then a clear voice rang out from somewhere.

“Better a coward than an idiot like you. Don’t you think?”

The Blood Lord frowned despite himself when he saw who had spoken, but soon answered in a leisurely tone.

“Couldn’t agree more. Stupidity leads straight to incompetence. That must be why he entrusted this plan to me.”

“And taking the sorcerers under my command and starting this without my permission?”

“I’ve been entrusted with everything in Qinghai. Why would I need to consult a defeated general?”

The Grand Sorceress smiled coldly at the reminder of her failure in Gansu.

“Your eloquence has certainly improved. Last time, was it your head that got cut off instead of your arm? I suppose I should praise you for getting a little smarter.”

For an instant, the smile on the Blood Lord’s lips faded.

Ever since Sword Saint Mae Jonghak’s strike had taken one of his arms during the incident the Central Plains Murim called the Shaolin Bloodshed, it had become a sore point he could not bear to have touched.

That damned woman.

Of course, he had accomplished his mission well enough.

He had stolen the Green Jade Buddha Staff, the most important prize, and killed numerous Shaolin Temple martial monks, including the Abbot, Hong Dao, dealing the temple a devastating blow.

But despite the success, the wound to his pride from how it had happened showed no sign of healing.

Merely remembering that violet Sword Force sent a chill through him. The place it had severed still throbbed, even now that a new arm had taken its place.

And he still carried his anger toward one reckless young pup who had stood against him to the very end without the slightest fear.

“Shut your mouth, bitch. You weren’t even there, so you’ve got no right to talk about it.”

The Blood Lord’s voice sank low. The Grand Sorceress gave him a faint smile.

“Right. That’s what I regret most.”

What?

“If I’d been there, you never could’ve come out with that nonsense about losing after fighting the Sword Saint for hundreds of exchanges.”

“…!”

“Be honest. After a life-and-death duel with the Fire King—that violent old man—you fought the Sword Saint for hundreds of exchanges? You’ve got some nerve, lying to him like that.”

“You’re imagining things. I’ve always told him the truth.”

The Blood Lord replied as calmly as he could, but he knew better than anyone that the Grand Sorceress was right.

It was true.

He had lied to the Lord of Heaven about his final fight with Mae Jonghak.

The first time he had ever lied—and the last.

Why?

It was simple.

He had been furious, and afraid.

If he had known Mae Jonghak’s identity from the start, prepared for his arrival, and conserved his strength, he wouldn’t have lost his arm before lasting even three exchanges.

And if he had reported everything without leaving out a single detail, the master he trusted and worshiped like a god might have cast him aside.

But he believed in me. That’s enough.

The Blood Lord quietly settled his thoughts.

It didn’t matter what the Grand Sorceress said to his face.

Whether the Lord of Heaven truly believed him or had simply pretended not to know, he had made no issue of it—and he never would.

"Enough. Keep this up and I'll want to blow your head off."

At the Blood Lord's warning, his composure now restored, the Grand Sorceress shrugged.

"I doubt you could, but let's leave it there. We have important work ahead. I don't want to waste my strength."

The Blood Lord nodded without a word.

The two of them had snarled at each other without pause, as if they'd been enemies since a past life. But carrying out the mission their master had given them mattered more than anything else.

"As you've probably guessed, the Central Plains won't be able to interfere in Qinghai's affairs for now."

The Green Forest Alliance and the Yangtze River Channel League were still pushing west even as they spoke.

Of course, if the Murim Alliance gathered the Central Plains' strength and brought it all to bear, it could crush them in an instant. But with the Moving Formations shackling it, taking that first, heavy step would be difficult.

No—not just difficult. Nearly impossible.

Sending enough troops to save Qinghai would leave cracks in the Central Plains' solid wall of defense.

"So if they want to save Qinghai, they leave the Central Plains exposed. And if they want to defend it, they have to abandon Qinghai."

The Blood Lord's smile returned as he continued.

"Looks like all that effort we put into those Central Plains bandits has paid off. A perfect checkmate, wouldn't you say?"

Unlike him, the Grand Sorceress's lips did not move beneath her veil.

"Of course I know. That's why I regret it even more."

"Why regret it? It's only a matter of time before Xining, where they've gathered, is surrounded from both sides."

"Is that all?"

"Take complete control of Qinghai, then, if possible, secure Jin Taekyung according to further orders. Wasn't that what he instructed?"

The Grand Sorceress let out a hollow laugh at the Blood Lord's question.

"I take back what I said earlier. You're still just as stupid."

What?

"Don't you understand? If the Murim Alliance had moved this time, we could have taken the Central Plains Murim—or even everything he wants."

The Grand Sorceress stared straight at the Blood Lord through her fine veil and added quietly,

"The whole world."

"…!"

"You should have consulted me before making your decision. To waste those precious Magic Formations, each usable only twice, on something like this…"

A low hum rose.

Qi surged with her cold voice.

At that moment, the Grand Sorceress was truly furious.

Furious that the Blood Lord had moved so many troops without so much as a word of discussion with her.

In doing so, he had wasted the dozens of Magic Formations Dark Heaven had spent so long planting throughout the world—and missed a golden opportunity to take it.

Yet even as she seethed, the smile on the Blood Lord's lips did not disappear.

If anything, it grew even broader.

What?

The Grand Sorceress realized something was wrong a moment too late. The Blood Lord spoke with a sneer.

"I think you need to take back what you just said. Did you really think I was that stupid?"

"What are you talking about?"

"The Yangtze and the Green Forest. We recruited those mangy bandits as bait from the start. I never intended to put real effort into bait."

The Grand Sorceress's eyes widened as she grasped what he meant.

"Then perhaps…"

"That's right. It was for show. Though I wondered if the Central Plains might take the bait. Unless those fools are complete idiots, they've been on guard against Magic Formations for some time."

That was why he needed to test them.

Had the dozens of Magic Formations Dark Heaven's sorcerers secretly set up throughout the world been discovered?

And if not, did they still work?

"And now we know for certain."

The test had succeeded.

A total of ten thousand Dark Heaven faithful had crossed into the Central Plains through the Magic Formations and joined the Green Forest Alliance and the Yangtze River Channel League. The Blood Lord had only just received the news.

From the messenger still unable to raise his head before them.

"Perfect. Unfortunately, a couple of the Magic Formations used when we attacked Shaolin may have lost their power, but most still have one use left."

The Grand Sorceress, who had fallen silent as she listened, murmured,

"That's enough. With that much…"

They wouldn't need to bring all of Dark Heaven's forces into play.

They could drop tens of thousands of troops into the heart of the Central Plains at once and bring down its major sects. A single great war would be enough to conquer the world.

But that alone could not quell all her anger.

The Grand Sorceress fixed the Blood Lord with a piercing gaze.

"I understand your reasons and your justification. But it's not enough."

"Why not?"

"We still have one last chance to activate the Magic Formations. But now they'll be even more wary of us."

"No. It's the other way around."

What?

"When bandits start rampaging all around them, wouldn't it be stranger if we did nothing to help or intervene?"

"…!"

"It was something we had to do anyway, if only to keep watch over those two bandit gangs in case they change their minds again."

If they could betray once, they could do it twice or three times.

The ten thousand Dark Heaven faithful sent ahead were also a deterrent against another betrayal.

Another shackle to keep the Green Forest Alliance and the Yangtze River Channel League from entertaining other ideas.

To make sure they wouldn't even dare.

"No matter how this goes, we have nothing to lose."

The Blood Lord rose to his feet and continued,

"If the Central Plains' chivalrous heroes can't bear their guilt and rise from their seats, the Magic Formations will prove their worth."

Step. Step.

His voice scattered as his footsteps rang out slowly.

"And if they stay where they are, we'll pass through Qinghai and head into the Central Plains."

Rumble.

At the Blood Lord's outstretched hand, the massive iron doors swung open.

Below them stood a vast army, blackening the mountain range.

"Raise the army. We march on Xining."

Chapter 1088

I'd made it through more crises than I could count.

Even if I counted only the life-or-death situations I'd faced inside Gates, I had enough experience to rival any old hand in Murim.

So I knew one thing very well: the worse the situation, the more clearheaded I had to be.

And now, four days after arriving in Xining, clearheaded judgment and a few more pieces of information had finally led me to a conclusion.

"Mujin."

"Yes, sir. Just give the order."

Hyuk Mujin looked at me with blazing eyes and thumped his chest.

"Your reliable right-hand man is right here, Captain."

I addressed the guy who was more like a shabby little toe.

"I think we're fucked."

"Pardon?"

"I said I think we're fucked. For real."

"…Are you serious?"

The fire in his eyes went out as if someone had doused it with cold water, but I could only answer calmly.

"Yeah. Completely."

"But you weren't saying that a few days ago."

"I wasn't. Not at first."

But the situation had changed beyond recognition.

The Yangtze River Channel League and the Green Forest Alliance.

As if getting blindsided by those two bands of thieves wasn't enough, Potala Palace in Tibet had joined forces with Dark Heaven.

Potala Palace's rise at precisely this moment also meant we could no longer count on support from Sichuan.

And the Central Plains—

"Now that even the Great Nation's military vessels guarding the Yangtze's tributaries have been wiped out, the waterways through the Central Plains are practically in their hands for the time being."

I wanted to deny it, but I couldn't anymore.

A messenger eagle had arrived the night before, confirming the reports that Seafaring King Pa Ryun's Yangtze River Channel League pirates had scored an overwhelming victory against the Great Nation.

“Even if they suffered a crushing defeat this time, don’t they still have plenty of military vessels left? The Great Nation has more strength than that, and the Yangtze is huge.”

Mujin had a point.

The Great Nation wasn’t called great for nothing.

The battle with the Yangtze River Channel League had dealt it a terrible blow, but if that alone were enough to make it lose control of the entire Yangtze, it never could have claimed to rule the world in the first place.

The important thing, though, was—

“Time. Time is the problem, isn’t it?”

A familiar voice cut in.

Bow Saint emerged from behind Jeok Cheongang, who had appeared at some point.

“Even that little time they’ve gained will be more damaging to us than anything.”

Exactly.

Whether their reign lasted only three days or their glory faded as quickly as a flower, there was no way to stop the Yangtze River Channel League right now.

By the time the Great Nation invoked its authority to requisition every ship it could and gathered its naval forces from across the land, it would already be too late.

By then, Qinghai—no, Xining itself—would be completely surrounded, front and back.

“So how many of those damn bandits have gathered?”

I answered Jeok Cheongang.

“Our estimate so far is around thirty thousand.”

“Hah. They’re coming in packs like dogs. Then again, numbers are about the only thing those dark-path bastards have to brag about.”

“If it were just numbers, that would be much better. Take out their leaders, and the rest would collapse on its own.”

As was true everywhere, dark-path figures and unorthodox factions were especially dependent on the people at their center.

They gathered and scattered around individuals who became their leaders through overwhelming strength and the ability to command others.

Seafaring King Pa Ryun.

And Green Forest Battle King Tae Gunak.

If we took out those two Supreme Peak masters who embodied the dark path, the combined forces of the Yangtze River Channel League and the Green Forest Alliance might not be such a difficult opponent.

Of course, that was only if no new uninvited guests showed up.

"Right, Dark Heaven. You said they'd joined them."

"Yes. Ten thousand of them. A full third of their forces."

Jeok Cheongang smacked his lips at my answer.

"They've put a tight leash on those two. Made sure they won't dare bare their teeth at their master."

"That's what makes it worse. Even if Pa Ryun and Tae Gunak are taken out now, their forces will still come after us."

"Of course. Those cowards have seen for themselves that the dark arts they'd only heard about are real. They'll tuck their tails between their legs even tighter."

Ten thousand enemies had appeared.

Right in the heart of the Central Plains.

The existence of Moving Formations had always worried the Central Plains Murim. Having that fear become reality was another matter entirely.

It seemed even great sects like the Zhuge Clan and Wudang couldn't ignore it.

Though they all but ruled Hubei's Murim, even they had chosen to avoid a direct confrontation.

I'd heard the Zhuge Clan had gone so far as to flee to Mount Wudang, leaving behind the family home where they'd put down roots for hundreds of years.

They're weaker than the other great sects, so I understand. But was that really the best choice?

I found myself thinking of Zhuge Feng, Family Head of the Zhuge Clan and the Crouching Dragon Guest.

We hadn't known each other all that long, but from what I'd seen of him while I was in Hubei, he was a good man.

Like a rock in a raging current, he was free-spirited yet steadfast, with the ability to back up that resolve.

And more than anything, he deserved to be called a Great Hero.

So why?

I wanted to ask.

Not in the privacy of my own thoughts, but to their faces.

The Nine Sects and One Gang. The Five Great Families. The many Sect Leaders and Family Heads of the orthodox factions.

The Murim Alliance—the single banner they had all raised together.

I wanted to look those people, who had never hesitated to call themselves righteous, straight in the eye and ask:

Was this the righteous path they were so proud of?

Was their so-called great cause the reason they couldn't stop the traitors heading west?

Crack.

The bones in my fist popped. I hadn't realized how tightly I'd clenched it.

Jeok Cheongang, who had been watching me with a somber gaze, spoke.

"Anyone can become a coward when faced with a crisis."

"I know."

I added quietly, remembering a past that still lingered like a scar.

"I've been one myself."

"It sounds like you're saying you'll never do it again."

"I promised myself."

"You must feel it in your bones, but even judging by what we know so far, their strength is beyond anything we imagined. If Xining is surrounded, we'll be in for a very difficult fight."

As if agreeing, Bow Saint nodded quietly. Both had reached heights martial artists could scarcely dream of, and yet even they had to consider the possibility of defeat. That was how dire things were.

"I told you before: anyone can become a coward in a crisis."

Jeok Cheongang fixed his deep gaze on me. His voice was low and steady.

"In a situation like this, not a soul under heaven could blame you for withdrawing to fight another day."

Withdraw to fight another day.

Mujin's eyes widened as he understood what Jeok Cheongang meant. Bow Saint stayed silent.

And I—

"Probably. No, definitely."

I met Jeok Cheongang's gaze and continued.

"Even if I withdrew to fight another day—no, if I ran away—they'd have no right to criticize me."

"Even if they did, it wouldn't matter. If anyone dared to criticize you, I'd personally rip out his tongue. If anyone pointed a finger at you, I'd turn it to ash."

"I know that too."

"Then?"

"I'm staying. Here."

At my calm reply, Jeok Cheongang's brow furrowed.

"Why?"

"Because if we leave, Qinghai is finished. The countless civilians staying in Xining won't even have time to escape."

"If we fight to the death here, it may not just be Qinghai that falls into their hands. It could be the whole world."

He wasn't being arrogant. He wasn't exaggerating.

The Three Saints and Ten Kings were symbols of the Murim world, and its strongest forces.

It was embarrassing to admit, but I, too, had become something of a symbol.

And a gap in our forces could lead straight to defeat.

As I fell silent, Jeok Cheongang went on with something like a sigh.

“The world has already looked away. The Nine Sects and One Gang, the Five Great Families, the Murim Alliance—they’ve all turned their backs. And you still mean to make such a foolish choice?”

That was when I finally parted my tightly closed lips.

“Even so, we have to.”

“What?”

“No. Because everyone has turned away and abandoned us, we have to do it even more.”

Jade is beautiful even as it shatters.

The light it gives off as it breaks into dozens of pieces is more brilliant than ever.

That is jade shattering.

That is why it is called jade shattering.

It is so brilliant, you forget the word destruction.

Because it breaks rather than be defiled.

“Have you ever seen jade covered in filth and dust?”

Jeok Cheongang stared at me, eyes wide. I continued, slowly but clearly.

“I haven’t. But I know that jade already covered in filth loses its value, at least for a while.”

Even then, the jade’s true nature doesn’t disappear.

It might look like nothing but filth, but the light is still hidden within it.

Yet no one who sees its beautiful surface covered in grime will want to touch it.

Not unless a sudden downpour washes the jade clean.

Not unless someone who remembers what it looks like finds it and carefully wipes it off.

So—

“Better to break than to be defiled.”

“…!”

“…!”

“…!”

I felt the air tremble and let out the breath I’d been holding.

Yes. This was right.

Even if it ended in death, I couldn’t let that original brilliance fade.

I had to make everyone remember. I had to make them realize what mattered most—the thing they'd briefly forgotten amid excuses about the great cause and fears of what they might lose.

The jade called justice.

And I would do everything in my power to protect it.

I wouldn't break. I wouldn't be defiled.

There was still far too much to do before I faced that brilliant final moment.

The greatest, strongest wall casting its shadow over the world was still standing.

The Lord of Heaven.

Just then, as the meaning of those two words rang through my heart and drew nearer than ever, Jeok Cheongang—head bowed, lost in thought amid the heavy silence—suddenly spoke.

"You asked whether I'd ever seen jade covered in filth and dust?"

He muttered as if speaking to himself, then raised his head.

Though his body had grown young again, a familiar face was reflected in eyes that held the weight of his years.

"Yes. I saw it. I remember it very clearly."

He looked at me.

His gaze, drawn back to that day in the not-so-distant past, began to shine.

"That was when I realized how brilliant a light the mangy, weak little whelp in front of me was carrying."

"…!"

"I told you, didn't I? If anyone dared to criticize you or point a finger at you, I'd personally punish them. But do you know something?"

The furrows between his brows deepened.

With a clear smile on his face, he slowly reached out and rested a hand on my shoulder.

"If you'd made the same choice as them, I never would have forgiven you."

Bow Saint spoke with a faint smile.

"Unfortunately, that won't be happening. Your Disciple is far too good for that."

A laugh escaped me before I knew it.

Yeah. That was probably true.

The Jeok Cheongang I knew had been that sort of person from the start.

First, he'd go find everyone who insulted his one and only Disciple and beat them to a pulp. Then he'd use whatever strength he had left to give his idiot Disciple a thorough beating.

"Looks like you'll have to use that strength somewhere else."

Jeok Cheongang laughed out loud at that.

“That’s the plan. I’ll squeeze out every last drop of strength I’ve got.”
And before half a day had passed, his words became reality.

Chapter 1089

As the hour of the Rooster[3789] began, an old beggar watched the sun inch toward the western mountains and muttered to himself.

“How strange. It’s not time for the sun to set yet.”

The other beggars huddled around a nearby campfire reacted to his words.

“Then what about weather like this at this time of year? Does that make sense?”

“Right. It’s not like this just started yesterday or the day before.”

“Branch Master, don’t stand out there in the cold wind. Come warm yourself by the fire. Have a bowl of hot soup, too.”

They had a point. The world hadn’t gone haywire just yesterday.

The old beggar—Man Chong, Branch Master of the Beggars’ Sect’s Xining branch in Qinghai—sighed and walked toward the fire.

Gung Gibang, the Successor Beggar, had returned to Xining several days ago. Man Chong, however, had stayed behind with around thirty Beggars’ Sect disciples under his command to gather information.

“Got anything to eat?”

“Of course. We may not have a damn thing to our names, but we always find a way to fill our bellies.”

“You saved some for the ones out on patrol?”

“Come now. Do you take us for beggars with no decency? Don’t worry. There’s enough for them to come back and eat till they burst.”

One of the beggars grinned, yellow teeth showing, and offered him a steaming bowl. Man Chong found himself smacking his lips.

“That smells incredible.”

“Just eat it. You’ll see it tastes as good as it smells.”

He was right.

Man Chong emptied the bowl in no time, then patted his full belly with a satisfied smile.

It looked like a hodgepodge if ever there was one, but perhaps because it was made with fish freshly caught in Qinghai Lake, it tasted like the work of a first-rate chef.

Well, I’m old. I deserve a little luxury like this.

Drowsy with contentment, Man Chong picked his teeth with a fish bone and looked around.

As he watched the waters of Qinghai Lake slowly take on the colors of the sunset, he felt his worries wash away, if only for a moment.

[3789] The hour of the Rooster is the traditional two-hour period from about 5 to 7 p.m.

Reality, of course, was still bleak.

What good are a pretty view and a full belly? I can't sleep easy until those bastards are gone.

Dark Heaven. At the thought of those terrifying Fiends, a shadow fell over Man Chong's face.

The situation had hardly improved since Jin Taekyung and the reinforcements passed through here to join the others in Xining about four days ago.

No—it was getting worse by the day, as if to crush that brief glimmer of hope.

At this rate, we'll be surrounded from both sides for sure… Damn it. We're caught in a hell of a mess.

The mere thought of Dark Heaven's massive army occupying Kunlun Mountain sent a chill down his spine. And from the rear, bandits who'd dealt the Central Plains Murim a vicious blow were said to be swarming in like ants.

There was only one thing they had going for them: Dark Heaven's main force had yet to make a serious move.

But that's only a matter of time. They're coming, and soon.

The fullness in his belly vanished. Anxiety and fear took its place.

"…Damn it."

His mood souring in an instant, Man Chong snatched up a pebble within reach and hurled it.

Whoosh!

His clothes were shabby, but he was a seasoned Branch Master and a master of the Beggars' Sect.

The pebble shot from his fingertips toward the endless expanse of Qinghai Lake.

Splash!

The water split violently. Only then did the tightness in his chest ease a little. Man Chong snorted and turned away.

Or tried to.

He stopped when the ripples from the pebble settled and the water slowly grew still again.

What is it?

It didn't take him long to place the sudden sense of déjà vu.

The color. The color of the water…

It was dark.

No—as black as if someone had poured ink into it.

Only moments ago, the waters of Qinghai Lake had glowed with the sunset. Now there was nothing beautiful about them, and even the quiet conversation behind him sounded strangely ominous.

"Man, why's it getting dark so fast today? Usually the sunset alone lasts half an hour."

"What can we do about it? It is what it is. Have some more food before the patrol comes back."

"Don't mind if I do. Branch Master, would you like another bowl?"

Man Chong didn't answer. More precisely, he couldn't.

At that moment, his instincts were sounding a red alarm in his head.

Something's… wrong.

Of course, it could be nothing, as the other Beggars' Sect disciples seemed to think.

Frost had fallen before harvest season, and giant monsters that barely looked human were running wild. What was left to be surprised by?

But he had a feeling he couldn't explain. More than sixty years of experience—and an old veteran's instinct, etched into his bones.

"The patrol. When are they due back?"

"Huh? Why do you ask all of a sudden?"

"Answer me. Now!"

The old Branch Master was usually so easygoing that his sudden bark left the disciples stammering.

"Th-they should be back soon."

"W-well, they're about half a gak[3790] later than usual, but they must be close by now. There's no need to worry, Branch Master… Huh?"

One of the disciples trailed off, eyes widening as he looked over Man Chong's shoulder. Everyone turned.

On a low hill about two hundred zhang[3791] away, a group of men and horses had just appeared, tiny as specks. They were slowly descending through the gathering darkness.

"Speak of the devil. There they are."

"Look at those lazy bastards. They're already late, and now they're taking their sweet time?"

"Branch Master, stay put. I'll give them a proper scolding this time."

As everyone tossed out remarks while watching Man Chong's expression, he stared at the patrol with sunken eyes and muttered,

"Twelve."

"What?"

"Twelve. Unless my eyes are playing tricks on me."

"What does that—"

[3790] A gak is a traditional time division of about fifteen minutes; half a gak is about seven and a half minutes.

[3791] A zhang is a traditional Chinese length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

The disciple's question died on his lips.

The patrol that had left to survey the area about two shichen[3792] ago had numbered ten.

"Th-that means…"

"Could be one of two things. Either they found survivors who made it through by sheer luck…"

Man Chong drew the iron staff, worn smooth from years of handling, from his waist and added quietly,

"Or some sons of bitches who deserve to be chewed up alive are pretending to be the patrol."

"…!"

"Get to the boat now. We'll raise anchor, put some distance between us, then see what happens."

"Y-yes, Branch Master!"

At last grasping the danger, the disciples moved as one.

By the time they'd boarded the boat moored by the shore and rowed far enough away, the mysterious group—friend or foe, they couldn't tell—had reached the campfire they'd left behind.

"Seok Sam! Seok Sam, are you there?"

Man Chong's sudden shout was answered from beyond the darkness, which had grown noticeably deeper.

"I'm here! What is it?"

In that instant, Man Chong's face went rigid.

So did every other Beggars' Sect disciple's. Not one of those staying at Qinghai Lake could have spoken down to Man Chong, their Branch Master and the oldest among them.

Worse, the voice from the darkness sounded exactly like Seok Sam's.

"B-Branch Master…"

Leaving the Beggars' Sect disciples behind, their faces pale as if they'd seen a ghost, Man Chong gritted his teeth and shouted again.

"Who are you bastards?"

For a moment, silence fell.

It lasted only a moment, but felt longer than ever—like an eternity.

Then an unfamiliar voice suddenly rang out, shattering the silence that seemed ready to suffocate them.

"Well, I guess beggar bastards are quick on the uptake."

[3792] A shichen is a traditional two-hour period; two shichen are about four hours.

With a buoyant voice that even carried a hint of laughter, the figure that had only been a silhouette emerged into view, heading for the still-burning campfire.

Tap-tap.

Amid the sparks rising into the air, a man and horse crossed the gravel without the slightest sound. Man Chong's eyes widened.

"W-what is that…?"

For a moment, he couldn't speak.

The horse was a skeleton, its white bones exposed. But it was the man seated so casually on its back who filled him with a fear unlike anything he'd ever known.

The man grinned, baring unnaturally white teeth and fangs as sharp as a wild beast's.

His blood-red eyes gleamed even at this distance. Just meeting his gaze felt as though it bound Man Chong's body and mind.

"Y-you…"

The man shrugged at the trembling Man Chong.

"You know who I am, more or less."

His nonchalance only made him more terrifying. Man Chong forced out a question.

"The patrol… What happened to them?"

"Aw. How touching. All that begging together must have made you close."

"You bastard! Answer me!"

"How am I supposed to talk with a beggar yelling at me? Fine, fine. Don't get so worked up."

The man waved a hand as though calming him down, then smacked his lips.

"To sum it up, they've gone to a better place. Didn't taste like much, though."

"W-what did you say?"

Man Chong froze, his mind settling on a suspicion too horrible to put into words. The man frowned.

"Hey, don't get the wrong idea. Maybe it's because they were mangy beggar bastards, but their bodies weren't much to write home about either. I only drank a little blood, just to have some fun."

"…!"

"What? Was that not good enough for you? I thought I got the voice pretty close."

Grit.

The pungent scent of blood filled Man Chong's mouth. Even so, he clenched his teeth with all his strength.

It wasn't only rage at losing a subordinate who had been like a brother to him. He had to do this—had to hold on somehow—to bear the fear tightening its grip on him with every passing moment.

Dark arts.

Never had those words felt so chilling.

Nor had he ever felt as if his head could be severed at any moment by someone standing a hundred zhang[3793] away.

“So you’re the one. The leader we’ve heard about.”

“Well, let’s say I am. At least here, that person has entrusted everything to me.”

The man—the Blood Lord—smiled at Man Chong.

Then he slowly swept his gaze over the twenty Beggars’ Sect disciples, frozen like statues around him, and spoke.

“So, who’ll it be?”

“What?”

“I’m planning to let at least one of you live. One of you gets to survive, and I get someone to deliver a message. Good for both sides, isn’t it?”

“…!”

“Look at your faces. What, did you think you could just run away?”

The Blood Lord grinned at their rigid faces a hundred zhang[3794] away, then turned to look behind him.

“Time to get moving, isn’t it? It’s something we have to do anyway.”

At his words, one of the figures waiting in the darkness stepped forward.

Swish.

Long robes brushed the gravel. As if the Blood Lord weren’t worth answering, the Grand Sorceress passed him, reached the lakeshore, and extended her hand.

“Cold north wind…”

Wooooom.

The air trembled. A vast chill swept across Qinghai Lake.

And then, they saw it.

“Freeze.”

Crack-crack-crack!

With a crack of ice, Qinghai Lake froze white.

“…!”

“…!”

Man Chong and all twenty Beggars’ Sect disciples stared, wide-eyed.

A miracle that should not—and could not—exist.

Faced with that impossible sight, they could do nothing.

Not even when the foul stench of monsters began to drift toward them from beyond the thick darkness in the distance.

[3793] A zhang is a traditional Chinese length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[3794] A zhang is a traditional Chinese length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Not when the Blood Lord crossed the frozen lake as casually as if out for a stroll, climbed onto the bow of their boat, and looked down at them.

“Whoever survives, go tell them. I—the Blood Lord—am coming.”

At that moment, Man Chong forced out his voice with everything he had.

“You’ll never win—”

Crunch!

Scarlet blood sprayed across the white ice.

“So, have you decided who gets to survive?”

In the cold, deep night, the Blood Lord’s blood-red eyes gleamed.

Chapter 1090

Qinghai was unquestionably a border region.

It was among the largest provinces in the world and had some of the most beautiful scenery, but its supplies and households were nowhere near as plentiful as those of the Central Plains.

So whenever people compared Qinghai to the Central Plains—which had stood at the center of the world for thousands of years and developed its culture in every direction—the people of Qinghai liked to joke:

"Qinghai and the Central Plains have only three things in common. They see the same sun, they're connected by the same water—the Yellow River—and they both have beggars."

Beggars were common everywhere, after all.

They lived along busy main roads, in dark, filthy alleys, and in shantytowns beside streams. It made no difference whether they were in the Central Plains or out on the border.

There were so many that people joked the Beggars' Sect could found a nation of its own if it took in every beggar under heaven.

But near daybreak, a scouting party searching through the faint morning mist came across a white-haired beggar unlike any they had ever seen.

No—there was something so strange about him that it made the fine hairs on their bodies stand up.

Step. Step.

He staggered as though he might collapse at any moment. His eyes were empty, as if his soul had left his body.

And then…

"Tell them. Without fail. Whoever survives."

His voice trembled with terror as it slipped between his blue lips.

Perhaps that was why the scouts stood frozen for a moment before they noticed the two knots tied at the beggar's waist.

"…The Beggars' Sect."

There was no mistaking it. The beggar before them was a Beggars' Sect martial artist.

A two-knot disciple, just one rank below a Branch Master.

And as far as they knew, there was only one reason a Beggars' Sect disciple would appear here, a hundred li[3795] west of Xining, where the scouts had set out from.

"Old man, what on earth happened at Qinghai Lake—"

[3795] In China, one li is 500 m (0.311 mi). A hundred li is about 50 km (31 mi).

One scout hurriedly dismounted and started toward him, then caught his breath and stared.

Only then did he see it.

Through the pale mist, the disciple's hair had looked white with age. In truth, it was frozen stiff, like the hair of someone trapped in a glacier.

And the face turned white beneath it belonged not to an old man, but to a young one.

"W-what is this…?"

Was this what it felt like to have a bolt of lightning strike through the crown of your head?

All twenty scouts fell silent, a chill running down their spines.

They had no idea that the disciple's next words would be the last spark of his life, spoken with every ounce of strength he had left.

"Tell them. I'm coming. I'll go to Xining and kill and burn everything there."

"…!"

"…!"

For an instant, the scouts trembled, their eyes wide with shock.

Because of the terrifying killing intent in those words?

No. That wasn't it.

The Beggars' Sect disciple was smiling. And crying at the same time.

As though imitating whoever had ordered him to deliver the message.

As though grieving for the comrades who were already dead.

Then, in the suffocating silence that pressed down on them all, his body tilted. His difficult journey had come to an end, and his voice had grown faint.

"Just wait. I, the Blood Lord, have returned—"

Thud.

His body crumpled like a rotten log.

The scouts stared blankly at the Beggars' Sect disciple's corpse. Then, all at once, they raised their heads and looked west.

Why?

Was it the fear already taking root in their hearts, or an instinctive sense of what they were about to face?

Beyond the thick mist, they could almost hear the shrieks of hideous monsters and smell their stench.

"…See to his body."

The commander had to force the words out, and even then his voice couldn't hide his fear.

"We're going back to Xining. Right now."

The office of the Qinghai City Lord—now a headless corpse—was as impossibly spacious and luxurious as ever.

As though it existed to prove why he'd had to die.

Its expensive ebony table was large enough to seat dozens of people at once. He had even used Shu brocade, prized as a first-rate luxury in Sichuan, to keep out the sunlight.

But the City Lord could never have known that the gaudy luxuries he'd treasured until his death would now be put to use for a shabby beggar.

"Enjoying this kind of luxury when you're only a two-knot disciple. You forgot what it means to be a beggar."

Gung Gibang muttered, doing his best to sound calm.

The corpse lay on the ebony table, wrapped in Shu brocade. Gung Gibang's eyes glistened as he looked at it.

"I didn't know him long, but he was a good kid. Still young, and already talented enough to be granted the second knot."

I said nothing.

Neither did any of the other leaders gathered in the office.

"He asked if he could visit the Central Plains someday, once things got better. I snapped at him for saying something so childish… Damn it."

Gung Gibang swore in a hollow voice and gave a bitter smile.

"What can you do? He and the others were just unlucky."

Nearly thirty Beggars' Sect disciples had been left on the other side of Qinghai Lake. Only one young, nameless disciple had made it back to Xining.

And even he had died along the way.

He'd been in such a terrible state that the scouts who found him could barely speak.

But his final words, which might as well have been a will, contained information more valuable than this entire goddamn lavish office.

"The Blood Lord. If it's the Blood Lord…"

I nodded at the murmur from Cheongheoja, the Kunlun Sect Leader.

"It's the same one you're thinking of, Sect Leader. The one behind the Shaolin Bloodshed."

"…!"

"…!"

An invisible ripple passed through the room.

Those who already knew of the Blood Lord let out low murmurs without a word. Those who hadn't known the details stared in shock.

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, belonged to neither group.

“A name I’ve longed to hear again.”

His voice was quiet, his expression barely changed.

But I knew better than anyone how furious Jeok Cheongang was.

And how hard he was fighting to hold that fury back.

“Now I can hold my head up in front of that damned monk.”

Hong Dao had been the Abbot of Shaolin Temple, known as the Mount Tai and Northern Dipper of the Murim,[3796] and respected enough to earn the title of Dharma King. Yet Jeok Cheongang had always called him “that damned monk.”

He’d been one of the very few friends Jeok Cheongang had ever had. Maybe the only one.

There was no way Jeok Cheongang had forgotten, even for a moment, his grudge against the man who had killed Hong Dao.

But right now, there was something more pressing than his grudge.

“So they mean to throw everything they have into this after all.”

A young Daoist spoke in a voice so calm it almost sounded cold. Hak Eui, Cheongheoja’s second Disciple, continued.

“They went to the trouble of releasing a Beggars’ Sect disciple they’d already captured. That must mean they’re certain they’ll win.”

“S-second brother.”

Hak Su, his Senior Brother, had been watching the room uneasily and tried to stop him. Hak Eui paid him no mind.

He’d gained a measure of influence since the last meeting about the Qinghai City Lord.

“But it’s unfortunate we didn’t receive the most important information. If we’d known even the enemy’s numbers, we could have made a much better plan—”

“What?”

Gung Gibang, who had been staring at the corpse in silence, suddenly scowled.

“What did you just say?”

Hak Eui answered his anger evenly.

“I was only expressing my thoughts out of regret.”

“So what? Are you blaming a man who risked his life for everyone and died? Asking why he didn’t try harder?”

“That’s…”

Hak Eui was about to respond when someone who had been watching quietly spoke up.

“Second.”

[3796] Mount Tai and the Northern Dipper are used together in a Chinese honorific for a widely revered authority in a field.

His Master, Cheongheoja.

Hak Eui paused at the quiet call, then bowed his head to Gung Gibang.

“I spoke carelessly because I’m inexperienced. I hope there will be no further misunderstanding.”

There was little feeling in the stiff apology. Gung Gibang’s expression darkened further, but Cheongheoja spoke again.

“I failed to raise my Disciple properly. I sincerely apologize.”

This was no ordinary apology. It came from a far more senior martial artist, and the Sect Leader of the Kunlun Sect at that.

There were others present who outranked even him.

No matter that Gung Gibang was the Beggars’ Sect Successor Beggar, prolonging the argument now could be seen as a grave act of disrespect.

I watched him bite his lip, then looked at Hak Eui. At the right moment, I sent Gung Gibang a Sound Transmission.

—Let it go. For now.

“…!”

—Or I can beat that socially maladjusted bastard half to death right now. Just tell me which you’d prefer.

At last, Gung Gibang gave a bitter smile and shook his head.

“Understood. I’m sorry for souring the mood, too.”

That brought the brief commotion to an end. Hak Eui spoke again, without the slightest sign of having been cowed.

“Fortunately, we still have time before the enemy reaches Xining. We should come up with adequate defenses before then.”

There was something odd about his tone.

I’d been watching him all along with a somber gaze. Now I couldn’t help asking,

“What preparations?”

“You already know, Great Hero Jin.”

Of course I did. I knew all too well.

That was what made it so surprising—that Hak Eui, heir to the Kunlun Sect’s Daoist lineage, would suggest it.

“It’s not too late. We must leave this place at once, before the route behind us is completely cut off.”

“Junior Brother, what are you saying?”

Hak Su sprang to his feet, unable to hold back any longer. Even Cheongheoja let out a troubled murmur. Hak Eui still didn’t stop.

“This isn’t a battle. It’s a war. I know it isn’t right to say this, but… we can’t make the mistake of clinging to something small and losing everything.”

“…!”

"…!"

The air in the room froze.

Then I spoke.

"Uh, first of all, there's too much bullshit there to answer point by point. So let's start with this."

I looked at Hak Eui's rigid face and added quietly.

"Does the Blood Lord look like a pushover to you?"

I pointed at the table.

More precisely, at the Beggars' Sect disciple's corpse, lying there with frost on patches of his body.

I'd known from the moment I first saw him.

That terrible cold still lingering in his dead body. I recognized its familiar trace—one only I could detect.

Blizzard.

A highest-tier ice spell with devastating power.

It meant two things.

First, just as I'd expected, the Grand Sorceress was with them.

And second—

"They've already crossed Qinghai Lake."

They wouldn't have needed boats. They could simply walk across the lake, frozen solid by magic.

The Blood Lord had only released the Beggars' Sect disciple for his own amusement in the first place.

"So," I said quietly to Hak Eui, whose expression I couldn't read, "if you want to run, leave now. You cowardly bastard."

And at that moment—

Rrrk. Rrrrrk.

A tremor came from somewhere, and the office began to shake.

No—the whole of Xining.

Chapter 1091

Xining, the capital of Qinghai, stood on a vast plateau.

Tributaries of the Yellow River flowed to its east and west, stretching all the way to the Central Plains. Mountains large and small surrounded the city, making for a view beautiful enough to draw gasps from anyone who saw it.

But at that moment, not one of the countless people crowding Xining's high walls could think the view before them was beautiful.

It wasn't that they failed to appreciate it. They couldn't.

A mountain that should have stood tall and still, as it always had, was moving. The sight alone was enough to send a chill down their spines.

Rrrk. Rrrrk.

A tremendous rumble unlike anything they had ever felt.

The whole city shook with it. So did its people, body and soul.

And at the end of all those gazes, filled with undisguised horror, was a pitch-black mountain drawing closer from the distance.

No—an army moving like a single mountain.

Dark Heaven.

At last, they had come.

Fiends from beyond the desert, come to blacken the blue sky and green earth alike.

I couldn't have been the only one who felt as though the world had suddenly grown dark.

It was dark everywhere.

Clouds hid the sun, and a chill that swallowed its light filled the space it left behind.

And.

At the center of it all, they stood.

Dark Heaven's vast army of monsters and humans.

"…Benefactor."

Cheongpung had come up onto the wall at some point. His voice was lower than usual, with a faint tremor in it, but I didn't answer.

More precisely, I couldn't.

I was overwhelmed, too, by the sight of the enemy advancing beyond the wall, filling everything in view.

I couldn't let anyone see that. Not ever.

But even if I could fool the whole world, there was one person I couldn't fool.

—Are you afraid?

At Jeok Cheongang's Sound Transmission in my ear, I quietly bit my lip.

Yes. I am.

At this moment, I was terrified enough to shudder.

Their strength was far greater than I'd imagined. And the moment I saw them for what they truly were, the word defeat had come to me by instinct. That frightened me.

Squeeze.

Warmth spread through the fist I'd clenched without realizing it. I curled my fingers tighter to keep the beads of blood from slipping between them, and answered.

—Yes. I'm afraid.

—What are you so afraid of?

—Myself, most of all. I made up my mind. I prepared for this. And I still shrank back. I'm afraid of what might happen because of that.

I wouldn't claim I wasn't afraid of dying.

That would deny every desperate struggle I'd made to survive. It would be laughable hypocrisy.

But I feared something far more: the hundreds of thousands of lives behind this wall being lost because I'd made the wrong choice.

Because of me, and no one else.

Jeok Cheongang saw right through me.

—Yes. That's the difference between you and this old man.

Before I could ask what he meant, his next Sound Transmission reached me.

—Not once in my life have I pursued some grand cause. I simply went where my feet took me, where the wind blew. The deaths of strangers I'd never met didn't trouble me much.

People saw Jeok Cheongang as the foremost of the Ten Kings, one of the great figures of the orthodox faction. But the truth was different.

He was a free man.

Like the Sect Leaders of the Fire Gate Clan before him, he belonged to none of the orthodox, unorthodox, or demonic factions. He had walked only his own path.

—Perhaps that's why the title of Great Hero, which stuck to me before I knew it, always felt like clothes that didn't fit.

—But you deserve to be called one.

—No. That's wrong.

Jeok Cheongang answered firmly and fixed me with a deep, searching gaze.

—Only someone who fears the pain of others and knows how to shed tears deserves to be called a Great Hero. Someone like you.

—…!

—But remember one thing. If you don’t want to shed tears later, you must first overcome the fear in front of you.

Then Jeok Cheongang added quietly,

—Only then do you become a hero.

A hero. A hero, huh.

I mouthed those two words in my mind. They had always felt so far away. Then I gave a bitter smile.

—I never wanted to be one.

—That doesn’t matter. Wanting to be a hero isn’t what makes you one. You earn the title when the world calls you one.

—Like how they call you a Great Hero, Old Master?

—What?

—You just said it yourself. You never went out of your way to pursue a grand cause. You went where your feet took you, where the wind blew—and before you knew it, people were calling you a Great Hero.

—…!

Jeok Cheongang stared at me, eyes wide. Then he licked his lips.

—You got me with that one.

—Let’s call it even.

—You haven’t lost your knack for running that mouth. Now you’re finally starting to feel like the little hellion I knew.

Jeok Cheongang let out a quiet laugh and gestured with his chin beyond the wall.

—Well? Still afraid?

—Yes.

I answered without hesitation, then added calmly,

—But I won’t look away from that fear.

Everyone carries fear somewhere in their heart.

But only those who admit it and face it head-on can find the strength to stand against it.

Just as I was doing now.

Rumble. Rrrumble!

The rumbling grew stronger by the moment, and the ground shook as if an earthquake had struck.

I felt the powerful vibrations travel up the tall, sturdy wall and through my whole body.

At the same time, I saw him.

At the head of the enemy forces, so numerous I couldn't begin to count them, one man was grinning as he looked straight at us.

The Blood Lord.

He looked quite different from the last time I'd seen him, but the moment I saw that crooked smile, I knew by instinct.

The thick killing intent and madness about him seemed as though they'd rub off if I touched him. Even the Blood-Sword Demon Lord I'd defeated in Gansu couldn't compare.

And in the instant we recognized each other, his lips moved.

"Looking up at you is a pain in the neck. Why don't you come down for a bit and say hello?"

His words rang out through the deafening rumble and clouds of dust. Jeok Cheongang, who had already been staring hard at the Blood Lord, had a reddish gleam in his eyes.

"I was itching for a fight anyway. How kind of him to offer."

The Bow Saint immediately sensed what was coming and tried to stop him.

"He's baiting you. It couldn't be more obvious."

At her look for support, the Slaughter Saint, who had appeared out of nowhere and taken up a place on the wall, calmly nodded.

"Yeah, it's crazy."

Jeok Cheongang furrowed his brow. The Slaughter Saint added,

"Then again, no one here is in their right mind."

As Jeok Cheongang's brow smoothed, I delivered my solemn verdict.

"Let's do it now."

"Right. It's not like we'll die or anything."

Whoosh!

There wasn't even time for anyone to stop us.

Reciting the number-one last words of men everywhere, the three of us sprang off the wall together.

Behind us came the sharpest, loudest shout I'd ever heard from the Bow Saint.

"I told you not to go!"

Uh.

Sorry.

The moment he saw three figures hurtling across the distant sky toward him, the Blood Lord muttered without realizing it,

“They’re crazy. They’re actually coming?”

He’d only tossed out a casual remark. After a few words between them, he hadn’t expected them to charge straight at him without a moment’s hesitation.

“What are they, half-mad fighting dogs…?”

The Blood Lord trailed off, more than a little taken aback. By then, the three men had closed to a dozen or so zhang[3797], moving like flashes of light. They spoke at once.

“You told us to come down, you son of a bitch.”

“You’re lower than a dog. You goddamned bastard. Burning you alive wouldn’t be enough, you miserable—”

“So you’re the Blood Lord I’ve heard about. I know this is a strange request for a first meeting, but would you mind calmly offering your neck and stepping aside?”

First came Jin Taekyung, whose curses had an oddly satisfying ring to them. Then Jeok Cheongang, hurling every obscenity he knew. And finally the Slaughter Saint, whom the Blood Lord was meeting for the first time.

For a moment, surprise had covered the Blood Lord’s anger. Now he felt it surge back to the surface.

“Are you done talking?”

At the Blood Lord’s low voice, Jin Taekyung hesitated briefly and glanced at the Slaughter Saint.

“Anything else you’d like to say?”

“Probably not. We’ve only just met, so I don’t have much to say.”

The Slaughter Saint had already been remarkably rude for someone meeting him for the first time, but Jin Taekyung merely nodded and answered the Blood Lord.

“This one says he’s done.”

Crack.

The Blood Lord clenched his teeth at that nonchalant response and opened his mouth.

Or tried to.

Before he could, another wave of obscenities swept over him.

“I’ll grind down every last bone in your body. I’ll toss your flesh to the Nanman Beast Palace for feed, then scatter your remains in the Shaolin Temple latrines, and—”

“Ah, this one isn’t done yet. Give him a moment. Honestly, aren’t you a little curious what comes next?”

At that moment, the Blood Lord’s last thread of reason snapped. His vision went white.

“Hah!”

[3797] A zhang is a traditional measure of length, roughly 3 m (9.8 ft); its exact length varied historically.

KWA-A-A!

A powerful wave of qi swept out in every direction.

The immense internal energy packed into that single shout made Dark Heaven's seemingly endless army and the people on the wall a hundred or so zhang[3798] away hold their breath.

But the three men closest to him, who felt the full force of it, were the exception.

Whoosh!

A single sharp gust cut through the billowing dust.

At its center, Jin Taekyung had already slashed down with his clear, almost transparent spearhead. He grinned.

Just as the Blood Lord had before they came down from the wall.

"Why are you getting so worked up? I'm just glad to see you after all this time."

An explosion meant destruction. Destruction, in turn, was bound up with Erasure.

The Blood Lord had gathered his anger and unleashed it all at once. Now he stared at Jin Taekyung with eyes gone cold.

"You're just the same as before. That damned mouth of yours."

The smile vanished from Jin Taekyung's lips.

"This time will be different. Everything else will be."

[3798] A zhang is a traditional measure of length, roughly 3 m (9.8 ft); its exact length varied historically.

Chapter 1092

To a martial artist, a wave of qi was power made manifest.

Jin Taekyung could feel that more clearly than ever now. He could feel just how terrifyingly powerful the enemy before him was.

Rumble.

The air refused to settle beneath the force of the Blood Lord's qi. Faint tremors came from every direction, but Taekyung's mind grew calm enough for him to answer evenly, despite the cold fire in the Blood Lord's voice and gaze.

"You're just the same as before. That damned mouth of yours."

Taekyung let his smile fade. He raised his beloved spear, White Flame, and pointed it at the Blood Lord.

"This time will be different. Everything else will be."

"Different? Ha!"

Now it was the Blood Lord's turn to laugh. He eyed Taekyung with open contempt.

"I heard the Hidden Dragon had become a Divine Dragon, but you're acting like you've gotten your hands on a dragon pearl, too. Struggle all you want. You're still no match for me. You know that yourself, don't you?"

To the Blood Lord's surprise, Taekyung nodded readily.

"Yeah. Probably."

"What?"

"Why the reaction? Shouldn't you be a little happy I admitted it so honestly?"

"…You."

The Blood Lord's voice dropped, but Taekyung spoke before he could continue.

"I knew as soon as I saw you. I couldn't tell exactly how strong you were."

Even stones scattered along a roadside varied in size and shape. Why wouldn't mountains tall enough to touch the clouds vary in height?

Taekyung had climbed from the very bottom of the Murim to the heights of Supreme Peak. The moment he came face-to-face with the Blood Lord, he understood.

"You're stronger than me. No question."

He didn't know exactly how wide the gap was. But even if it was only one move—or half a move—Jin Taekyung accepted that the Blood Lord was the stronger one.

He remembered his not-so-distant past, when he'd been no better than an ant, helpless beneath a power so immense it felt absolute. Back then, the Blood Lord had seemed as unreachable as someone above the clouds.

"But you know what?"

Taekyung held the Blood Lord's gaze as he asked the question quietly.

Past and present overlapped before his eyes. Alongside the knowledge that the Blood Lord was stronger came another realization, running down his spine like an electric current.

“Back then, I thought I could fight with everything I had and still never touch a hair on your head…”

His voice trailed off, and he smiled.

Only today had he understood. The Blood Lord whose mere presence had once left him struggling to breathe was no longer beyond the clouds.

“Now I feel like I could reach you just by stretching out my hand.”

“…!”

The Blood Lord’s eyes widened. A dozen or so zhang[3799] away, Taekyung’s figure wavered like a mirage.

Fshh.

His shape remained, but his body was gone. There wasn’t even a trace of his presence, yet the killing intent within it was unmistakable.

Whooosh!

The Blood Lord heard the eerie sound clearly, as though the wind itself were howling.

At the same instant, he saw it.

Space warped under immense pressure. With Shifting Form and Position brought to its pinnacle, a spearhead outran sound and tore through the compressed air.

“Jin Taekyung!”

And then—

KWA-A-A!

The Blood Lord’s furious shout and the muffled boom of a sonic blast rang out as a blood-red flash clashed with a dark-blue wave, swallowing the world around them.

One exchange.

A single exchange was enough to show me the gap between the Blood Lord and me.

KRRRACK!

The Blood Lord swung his Red Blade like lightning, and it locked against White Flame’s spearhead. The resulting boom was nothing a pair of weapons should have been able to make.

Neither was the shock wave that followed.

[3799] A zhang is a traditional unit of length, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Rumble!

The hard ground cracked like a spiderweb. My feet slid backward under the force, and everything in their path crumbled to dust.

“You dared wag that tongue at me when this is all you’ve got?”

Beyond our crossed weapons, his eyes flashed blood-red. His voice seethed with fury.

Killing intent I could almost touch. A terrifyingly vast surge of qi.

Strong.

I was surprised all over again. The Blood Lord had grown stronger, too, over the past year—long or short as that might seem.

At least half a move above me. No, a full move.

At Supreme Peak, a single move made an enormous difference.

But it wasn’t only his insight into the martial arts or the depth of his internal energy that surprised me.

Grnnnk.

My spearhead began to give way. Slowly—no, faster than that.

Beyond it was a red blade that flashed without any blood-red Force, and a muscular arm, bulging with veins as he squeezed out every ounce of strength.

That’s… not human strength.

I could tell by instinct. After spending years fighting monsters instead of humans, how could I not?

The physical power the Blood Lord was unleashing went far beyond human limits.

No. It was more than that.

One look at the skin exposed by the rips in his clothes told me enough to guess what he’d done over the past year.

“Unusual for a prosthetic arm.”

I put everything I had into holding back the force pressing against my spear and studied him. More precisely, I studied the arm swollen to an unnatural size and the marks that looked like seams.

The Blood Lord bared his teeth and growled at me.

“Everything is thanks to that person’s grace.”

The Sword Saint, Mae Jonghak, had taken one of the Blood Lord’s arms during the Shaolin Bloodshed. The Blood Lord had fled.

He should have spent the rest of his life with one arm. Yet here he was with two, wielding this kind of strength. That could mean only one thing.

“Did you want to get stronger that badly? Enough to splice yourself together with a monster?”

“…!”

“Then again, forget about me. If you wanted revenge on the Sword Saint, you’d have had to tear something off and stick it on. Right?”

“…You.”

Had I struck a nerve? Or had I figured out the truth too easily?

The Blood Lord glared at me, eyes wide, and clenched his teeth.

“I look forward to seeing whether you can still run that mouth after you’re dead.”

At that moment—

Crack—KWA-AANG!

His arm swelled larger still, as thick as an old tree trunk. With a force that could only have come from a monster, he knocked my spearhead upward.

Clang!

Even my Strength stat, which had been in triple digits for a long time, couldn’t withstand that combination of raw power and internal energy. The shaft flew into the air.

My grip tore open. In an instant, I was empty-handed, and the Blood Lord’s Red Blade traced a dazzling arc toward me.

Whoosh! KWAANG!

Crude and brutal, the strike could have smashed anything in its path. Another followed it, cutting through the air like lightning.

His blade pursued me as my feet kept moving, the blood-red Force at its edge bending like a whip.

Whish—slice!

Every hair on my body stood on end. The Force skimmed past, slicing off a few strands of hair before slamming into the ground.

KWAANG! Rrrumble!

The earth shook like an earthquake, unable to withstand the tremendous force carried by the Force.

Dust billowed across dozens of zhang in every direction, but even that couldn’t block the Blood Lord’s view.

“This! This is all you’ve got!”

Whoosh!

The dust cloud split beneath a fierce sonic boom. I threw myself to the side on instinct, dodging the blood-red Force plunging down like an axe swung by some ancient giant.

Slice!

The ground split in two and opened a pitch-black maw.

I’d gotten out of the way in time, but the wind from the strike alone left me covered in blood. The Blood Lord smirked.

“Narye tagon. I heard you’d become the Divine Dragon while I was away, so I expected more. Instead, I find a lazy donkey rolling around on the ground.”

To martial artists—especially proud masters—Narye tagon was humiliation itself. Nobody who was anybody in the Murim wanted to be seen rolling through the dirt.

I didn’t care.

In low-level dungeons, I’d flattened myself against damp cave floors to avoid poison darts fired by kobolds. When an enemy got too close for my spear, I’d gone for the eyes or head-butted them without hesitation.

A character in a pirate manga that still hasn’t ended[3800] once said a wound on the back was a swordsman’s shame. I’ve never agreed with that.

“A wound on your back just fucking hurts. You have to be alive to feel ashamed.”

“What?”

I stopped moving.

The Blood Lord’s face seemed to ask what the hell I was going on about. I stood up, my body aching, and continued.

“I know it’s nonsense, so stop staring at me like that. You’re so cute I want to bite you to death.”

“You little—!”

“And what the fuck does it matter whether I’m a dragon or a donkey? You’re the one who tore the limbs off some monster nobody’s ever heard of and stuck them onto yourself.”

“…!”

A heavy Patriot missile of a fact[3801] was what hurt the most.

Grind.

The Blood Lord clenched his teeth so hard they seemed ready to break and started forward again.

Or tried to.

The killing intent around him thickened. Blood-red Force stirred around his blade. Then a tremendous explosion jolted his long-paralyzed reason back to life.

KWA-AANG!

The boom shook everything around us. It had come from behind him.

The Blood Lord had chased me for over a hundred zhang, raining attacks down on me. The two giants who’d filled the opening he left behind were none other than the Fire King and the Slaughter Saint.

Crack—boom!

[3800] This alludes to One Piece, a Japanese pirate manga in which a swordsman calls wounds on the back a swordsman’s shame.

[3801] The Korean phrasing combines “fact” with “Patriot,” the name of a missile system.

Flames erupted everywhere, and fountains of blood sprayed without pause.

Only then did the Blood Lord realize what was happening. He shot me a blood-red glare, but I just shrugged.

“Baiting you. Obvious as can be.”

“You—!”

“Oh, I can’t take all the credit. Someone said something pretty similar a little while ago.”

At that moment—

Whoooosh!

From the city wall, now much closer, a streak of light like a bolt of lightning pierced the pale dust cloud and plunged down.

KWA-A-AANG!

Chapter 1093

KWA-A-A-ANG!

The deafening boom left Jeok Cheongang's ears ringing. Then a tremor ran through the ground. He turned to look behind him and finally let out a sigh of relief.

The old hag's joined the fight.

Flashes of light were still streaking through the cloud of dust.

Once he saw that the Bow Saint was helping Jin Taekyung, part of him could finally relax. With her there, his Disciple would be safe.

At least for the brief time Jeok Cheongang needed to accomplish his goal.

I was worried sick… Maybe I didn't need to be.

In Jeok Cheongang's judgment, Jin Taekyung still wasn't a match for the Blood Lord. That was why he hadn't been able to hide his unease, even after hearing the Sound Transmission that had reached his ear moments ago.

"I'll draw out the Blood Lord and buy us time. You two should target their main force."

"What?"

"Don't worry. You know my life motto, right?"

Of course he did.

However thick or thin his life might be, Taekyung meant to survive and make it last.

But if everything in the world went according to one's wishes, every martial artist in the land would be a Supreme Peak master, and the common people would live long, healthy lives.

So Jeok Cheongang had firmly opposed the idea.

No—he'd meant to oppose it.

Before he could respond to that carefree answer, Jin Taekyung had charged out without hesitation to face the Blood Lord.

You idiot. Don't you know your life is worth protecting?

Yet despite the thought, a smile had found its way onto Jeok Cheongang's lips. It was plain enough that the Slaughter Saint, who was stirring up a bloodstorm not far away, couldn't hold back a comment.

"I know you adore your one and only Disciple, but are you really so eager to die that you—"

He stopped mid-sentence and caught his breath, twisting aside.

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh!

Three streaks of sword light carved through the air, missing him by inches. At the same time, a flash glinted from the Slaughter Saint's sleeve as he spun in midair.

KLANG! Thud!

Two sparks—and the sickening sound of a blade piercing flesh.

Three black-robed men clad head to toe in pitch-black armor had charged at him like bolts of lightning. They faltered and stepped back.

Or rather, two of them did.

Thump.

The third fell like a rotting tree. A dagger the Slaughter Saint had just thrown was buried deep between the eyeholes of his helmet, which sat so low that his face was completely hidden.

“One down.”

The Slaughter Saint landed smoothly, as if nothing had happened. Jeok Cheongang, who had just swept away dozens of enemies with a flaming punch, shook his head.

“I don’t think so.”

“…What do you mean?”

“What do you think?”

Jeok Cheongang jerked his chin toward the fallen man.

“That.”

At that very moment—

Thrust.

The man they’d thought dead moved his arm and pulled the dagger from his helmet. Then he staggered to his feet and raised his sword.

As if he’d only been stung by a bee.

“…!”

The Slaughter Saint blinked in silence. Jeok Cheongang shook his head again, remembering the first time he’d seen one of those loathsome monsters.

“Didn’t that brat Taekyung tell you? There are damned things that openly defy the natural order set by Heaven.”

Only then did the Slaughter Saint realize who stood before them. He let out a low groan.

“…Black Ghosts.”

He’d already heard what had happened in Gansu. There were monsters that got back up no matter how many times they were killed, and every one of them had once been a fiend who dominated the Demonic Cult.

“I heard they were like the legendary living jiangshi. So it was true.”

“Worse bastards than living jiangshi. You can tell just by watching them move, can’t you?”

Jeok Cheongang stood beside the Slaughter Saint and gathered his internal energy once more. The Black Ghosts, now six in number, were closing in from all sides.

“How do we take them down?”

“I’ve heard there are only two ways. First, keep killing them until they die.”

Fwoosh.

White flames rolled over Jeok Cheongang’s hands. They lit the strangely dark space, revealing the Black Ghosts approaching with their eerie noises and the enemy forces packed tightly around them.

They also revealed other figures, hidden deep within that vast encirclement, controlling them.

“Second, cut off their heads and disable their arms and legs.”

And at that moment—

BOOM!

Jeok Cheongang thrust out both palms with all his might. Waves of flame scattered in every direction as he kicked off the ground and shot forward.

“Defend!”

—GRAAAAAH!

The shouts of humans and monsters mingled.

A path of fire opened through the enemies surrounding them. The Black Ghosts held their ground before Jeok Cheongang, but a sharp gust swept past their angled legs.

Whoosh. Slice!

The sword swinging toward Jeok Cheongang flew into the air. The Slaughter Saint had severed the arm of the first Black Ghost to charge.

“Go!”

The shout was brief, but its meaning was clear. Jeok Cheongang gave a small nod and advanced without slowing, clenching his fist.

Rrrrrk.

At the heart of the shimmering heat, white flame gathered around the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist, brought to the utmost limit of its power.

Even the monster standing nearly thirty feet tall and the Dark Heaven faithful packed into a defensive line widened their eyes at the heat.

And in that instant, when time itself seemed to stop—

“I am the—”

Jeok Cheongang’s fist shot forward, crushing the wind.

“Fire King!”

KWA-A-A-A-A!

Space warped. The ground sank.

Horrific heat melted the flesh and bones of everything in its path. A flash of white so brilliant it hardly seemed possible for flame blotted out his view.

Fwoosh—KRRRUMBLE!

The light faded as quickly as it had come. Jeok Cheongang saw what lay before him and finally released the breath he'd been holding.

Huu.

Heat poured between his trembling lips like flame from a weary fire dragon.

He had poured out all his strength, but the joy of accomplishing what he'd set out to do was greater than the exhaustion.

Sizzle. Szzzz.

The green ground was gone. All that remained was a hellscape spread between the scorched earth, black as a volcanic region, and a pale haze of steam.

Fsssh.

A hot wind blew from somewhere, and the bodies that had barely held their shape crumbled.

Monsters and humans alike. Even one unlucky Black Ghost who had stood directly in Jeok Cheongang's path.

With a single strike, hundreds of enemies had turned to ash and scattered. The same had happened beyond the thick veil of steam, which now spread dozens of yards in every direction.

At least, that was what Jeok Cheongang thought.

Then his senses caught something wrong.

Ssshhh.

An unseen current of qi crept through the ground and air. The moment he felt it, Jeok Cheongang realized what was amiss.

…This is.

Perhaps pouring out all his strength had left him too exhausted to notice at first.

Looking back, it had been strange from the start. How had such a dense, vast cloud of steam formed?

And why had the enemies beyond it shown no reaction at all?

Cold qi.

As the two words pierced his mind, Jeok Cheongang stamped down on the ground, which was slowly freezing over. He had already forgotten the horrifying heat from moments ago.

Crack.

A chill ran through his toes. At the same time, someone's face came to mind.

Jeok Cheongang looked at the steam with a sunken gaze and parted his lips.

"Anyone with the slightest bit of manners would greet an elder properly. You've got less respect than an eyelash, you little brat."

At that moment—

KRRRACK!

The steam blocking his way split apart.

No—it shattered in midair.

Beyond the bone-chilling cold stood an immense wall of ice. And with it, the person Jeok Cheongang had just thought of.

“You noticed. That’s just like you.”

At the Grand Sorceress’s reply, Jeok Cheongang spat out a wad of phlegm.

“Yeah. I knew it was you.”

That had been a strike delivered with all his strength—more than enough to turn even the sorcerers hidden among the countless enemies to ash in an instant.

Even a Supreme Peak master on his level would have found it nearly impossible to block the damage completely.

Unless they had the strange dark arts Jin Taekyung called Magic.

“So the brat was right. You managed to stay alive.”

“An old man who should’ve died and returned to the earth long ago is still walking around. Why should this be such a surprise?”

The Grand Sorceress continued with a sneer.

“At your age, you should be resting in a back room, watching your grandchildren play. Why come all this way to play with fire?”

“If my one and only Disciple is putting on a show for me, I can play with fire a hundred times over. A thousand, even.”

“Don’t push yourself too hard. Think of your age.”

“Don’t worry. Old as I am, I can still kill you.”

For an instant, the Grand Sorceress’s eyes darkened behind her veil. She heard the certainty in his words.

Sizzle.

The ice wall was still melting, little by little, unable to withstand the heat of the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist. It bore out his claim.

…Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King. So his reputation isn’t empty.

Just as the Grand Sorceress thought this to herself and cautiously gathered her energy, Jeok Cheongang, who had been watching her and the three Black Ghosts guarding her with a sunken gaze, suddenly spoke.

“But today isn’t our only chance.”

In truth, he was just as pressed for time.

The Slaughter Saint was fighting desperately, surrounded by the six—no, now five—Black Ghosts. And his Disciple, who must not die, was fighting the Blood Lord.

Their agreed time was up. Though Jeok Cheongang had hoped for more, they had accomplished enough.

“Clear the way. Before I burn you all to ashes.”

Across the distance of dozens of yards, Jeok Cheongang’s reddish-hot gaze met the Grand Sorceress’s ice-cold one.

After a brief but long silence, the Grand Sorceress's quiet voice rang out.

"For that person's sake, I'll kill you. Even if it isn't today."

"Got any more bullshit to say?"

Jeok Cheongang gave a quiet laugh at the Grand Sorceress's silence, then swiftly turned around.

Chapter 1094

Time was always absolute.

But the way its passage felt was relative.

For Jin Taekyung, barely half a quarter-hour had passed in a desperate exchange that seemed as though it might go on forever.

Slice!

Scorching pain flared along his side. Taekyung wondered whether his body was growing sluggish as the wounds piled up, or whether the Blood Lord was getting faster.

Or both.

But his thoughts were nothing compared to what the Blood Lord was feeling.

What… is this guy?

The Blood Lord's eyes had blazed with rage, scattering streaks of crimson light. Now his gaze had sunk deep, and his eyes trembled faintly.

Three times.

Today marked his third encounter with Jin Taekyung.

The first time, he'd only watched from afar.

On the day the Jin Family of Taiyuan rose to become the preeminent clan of Shanxi Province, the young upstart who'd gone from the family's disgrace to a Hidden Dragon had struck him as interesting.

At their second meeting, a year later, he'd felt more than interest.

To be honest, he'd been surprised.

Chosen as the Fire King's Disciple, Jin Taekyung had grown almost unrecognizably strong. He'd become a young beast with even more ferocity in him.

So the Blood Lord had crushed him.

Thoroughly.

The Sword Saint's intervention had forced the Blood Lord to retreat in humiliation, but Taekyung himself had been easy to handle. The Fire King's teachings might have helped the young beast grow, yet the gulf between them remained as vast as heaven and earth.

Now another year had passed, and the Blood Lord faced an emotion beyond interest or surprise.

Astonishment.

…Why? Why won't you fall?

He knew what had happened, of course. Four Demon Lords and Demon Empresses had met their ends at the hands of a man who'd once been nothing more than a young upstart.

But he couldn't make himself understand it.

How had that happened? How could Taekyung stand against him without giving ground, when the Blood Lord's own might had advanced even further?

"You!"

Crimson light surged in his eyes once more. A larger, more powerful arc of blade Force shot toward Jin Taekyung.

Whoosh—slice!

Severed strands of hair fluttered through the air. Wind pressure tore the skin exposed by Taekyung's already-ragged clothes.

But that was all.

He slipped past the blade Force by barely a handspan and lunged forward without slowing.

Whoosh.

The distance between them vanished.

At the same time, a flash of light shot from far away, streaking over Taekyung's shoulder as he charged.

Another Force arrow. The Blood Lord was sick of them by now.

The Bow Saint…!

He gritted his teeth and brought the Red Blade down.

KWA-ANG!

Force clashed with Force.

Through the split-second opening, a palm strike wreathed in searing heat shot toward him.

Fwoosh!

The space around them wavered. Rising wisps of heat shimmered through his vision like a dream.

The Blood Lord didn't hesitate.

"How dare you!"

His shout rang out, charged with internal energy. He thrust out his free hand and seized the flames just before they reached him.

No—the palm behind them. Taekyung's palm.

KRRK!

Hand met hand. Crimson Force and flame collided and twisted together.

A terrible burning pain came with them, enough to make an ordinary person faint on the spot.

Sizzle.

The Bow Saint's intervention had delayed the Blood Lord's counterattack by half a beat. But even as his flesh burned, he didn't blink.

Instead, he growled at Taekyung, whose attack he had stopped. His voice was low, as though he were making a vow to himself.

"Did you think this would be enough to break me?"

He knew pain well.

He'd been in situations that should have killed him not just a few times, but dozens of times over. He had always risen again.

Through the blessing his master had bestowed on him. Through his own will.

"How dare a wretch like you—!"

Taekyung spoke quietly.

"You mean wretches. Plural."

"What?"

The question escaped the Blood Lord before he knew it.

Whoooosh!

The sound of powerful movements swept in from every direction.

As the thick dust cloud slowly dispersed, the indistinct figures within it came into view.

"Sorry I'm late, Benefactor."

Cheongpung's voice was unusually subdued. His eyes had turned deep purple, and qi from the Zaha Divine Technique enveloped his body.

Over his shoulder, two aged but clear voices rang out.

"Infinite Life Buddha.[3802] At last, I meet the unwelcome guest who came to our mountain."

"So you're that vicious fiend."

Cheongheoja and Perfected Being Hyeoncheon.

Cheongpung had appeared, followed by the Sect Leaders of Kunlun and Kongtong. The Blood Lord's brow twitched.

But he had also spotted someone who troubled him more.

The Bow Saint.

She stood silently with her great bow aimed at him, steady as stone. The Blood Lord couldn't afford to underestimate her, least of all now.

And they weren't the last to arrive.

"I had a dream once. Shakyamuni,[3803] or whatever the hell his name was, came to me and said something."

Step.

Footsteps reached the Blood Lord's ears a moment late. The master who had returned to his one and only Disciple continued, his voice seething.

"Hong Dao. He told me to burn the bastard who killed that damned monk until there wasn't a hair left of him."

[3802] "Infinite Life Buddha" is a Buddhist invocation referring to Amitabha, the Buddha of Infinite Life.

[3803] Shakyamuni is a name for the historical Buddha, Siddhartha Gautama.

“I figured it had to be nonsense, coming from you. But I’ll believe you this once. I had a similar idea myself, though not quite the same.”

“It’s true.”

“Fine, let’s say it is. Though I doubt Shakyamuni[3804] called anyone a bastard.”

The Slaughter Saint had appeared like a ghost, without the slightest warning, and joined the encirclement. The Blood Lord suddenly felt as though he stood amid a mountain of sabers and a forest of swords.

Including Jin Taekyung, he faced no fewer than seven Supreme Peak masters. Two of them were among the Three Saints; another stood foremost among the Ten Kings and was fully their equal.

It was no mere illusion.

“So this is what you were after?”

Crack.

A bone shifted between their locked hands.

The Blood Lord’s hand had charred so badly it seemed ready to melt, yet it forced back the flames through sheer, unbelievable recovery.

Sizzle. Slither.

He tightened his grip as the flesh burned and healed, burned and healed. A growling laugh escaped him.

“But look. Which of us is really surrounded?”

Jin Taekyung didn’t answer.

More precisely, he couldn’t. The Blood Lord’s internal energy poured endlessly through their joined hands, backed by strength no human should possess. Holding against it took everything Taekyung had.

Yet his steady gaze and sharpened senses still registered everything around him.

Another vast encirclement stretched across a radius of hundreds of zhang.[3805]

And at its front and center stood—

Black Ghosts.

Them.

Beings reborn from the pit of death. Death Knights cursed with something close to immortality.

In another world, they were called Death Knights. Taekyung could sense them clearly. More than ten stood like an iron wall, giving off suffocating demonic qi.

He could sense someone behind them, too.

The Grand Mage. No—the Grand Sorceress.

He’d expected as much. She wasn’t someone who would die that easily.

But expecting it did nothing to lessen the weight of the reality before him.

[3804] Shakyamuni is a name for the historical Buddha, Siddhartha Gautama.

[3805] A zhang is a traditional Chinese measure of length, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

At this rate, we'll all die together.

Perhaps the outcome would be even worse.

The Blood Lord and the Grand Sorceress had gained greater martial might and supernatural abilities since the Shaolin Bloodshed. Even if Taekyung and the others brought down every Black Ghost, there was no telling what those two might do.

He wasn't the only one torn at this crossroads.

Must I truly let this man live?

The Blood Lord asked the question in his heart, wishing he could put it to his master.

He knew how badly the Lord of Heaven wanted the accursed man before him. No one in the world deserved that title more than his master.

That was why, when he'd heard that four Demon Lords and Demon Empresses had died one after another, he'd mocked and cursed them instead.

Was it simply because they'd been weak?

Only in part.

He'd cursed them because, contrary to their master's orders, they had brought Jin Taekyung to the brink of death again and again.

But…

Now I understand why those bastards tried to kill you.

At last, he understood how they'd felt.

And yet he understood his master even less. Why did the Lord of Heaven want Jin Taekyung so badly—a man who thwarted Dark Heaven at every turn and was growing at a rate without precedent in history?

Why did he care more about Taekyung's safety than about the loyal servants who had always been ready to give their lives for him?

Lord of Heaven. My one and only master. Please tell this servant.

Tell him to cut down this bright-yellow sprout now.

No—Taekyung had already grown into a towering tree. Tell him to kill the man by any means necessary.

The Blood Lord pleaded more desperately than ever.

But that was all.

His voice would not reach his master. Nothing would change.

Grit.

The Blood Lord clenched his teeth and wrenched his hand away, putting all the fury surging through him into the motion.

KWA-ANG!

The boom drove Taekyung back ten steps. The Blood Lord spat out each word.

"There won't be a next time. I'll kill you. No matter what."

At that moment—

Bwoooooo!

A deep, resonant horn sounded in the distance, cutting straight through the taut tension.

Chapter 1095

Bwooo! Bwooooooo!

The deep, resonant sound of a horn carried across hundreds of jang[3806] and pierced Jin Taekyung's ears. He was suddenly sure he'd heard a similar sound before.

In a damp, pitch-dark land thousands of li[3807] away, at the very southern edge.

…No way.

A suspicion flashed through his mind. Eyes wide, he stared toward the sound.

And at last, he saw them.

Enormous creatures were charging through a thick cloud of dust in the distance. Even from this far away, their great swinging trunks were unmistakable.

Those are…

Elephants.

The largest, strongest creatures alive—not just among beasts, but among everything that lived on land or in rivers.

The people of the Central Plains called them xiang—elephants—and regarded them as mysterious animals. But to a few people, Jin Taekyung among them, they were fairly familiar.

For a brief time, they'd lived among people who shared their home with countless animals, trained and tamed them, and carved beautiful horns from elephants' tusks after they died.

"Nanman Beast Palace! The Nanman Beast Palace is here!"

On the nearby wall, Hyuk Mujin spotted the herd—hundreds of elephants by his rough estimate—and shouted, brimming with excitement.

"See that, you bastards?!"

Barely fifteen minutes ago, he'd stood on the wall swallowing nervously as he watched the fierce battle below. Not anymore.

"Come on, then! Let's have a proper fight! We're not so badly outnumbered now!"

He had good reason to be confident.

Soon after the enormous upheaval caused by the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's scheme had been brought under control, the Nanman Beast Palace had begun to move in earnest.

No—"move" hardly did it justice. It was a migration on a staggering scale.

They'd purged every diseased shoot that had grown within their ranks. Then they'd gone further, abandoning the homeland where their ancestors had lived since time immemorial.

[3806] A jang is a traditional length of ten ja, approximately 3.03 meters or 9.94 feet.

[3807] This uses the Chinese li, approximately 500 meters or 0.311 miles.

Beast Miao King Yayul Cheok had been furious at Dark Heaven's scheme, which had drenched Nanman's jungles in blood. He'd grieved the death of his sworn brother Baeksang more than anyone. And he'd been deeply moved by the outsiders from the Central Plains who had saved his people from that terrible crisis.

United at last under the Beast Miao King, the Nanman Beast Palace swore to join the Murim Alliance and avenge their people. Then they left their bloodstained homeland.

Every last one of Nanman's tens of thousands of people went with them, along with the countless ferocious beasts they commanded.

And the fact that the Nanman Beast Palace's forces—who should have been in Sichuan—had appeared here meant something else, too.

"The Nanman Beast Palace, the Sichuan Tang Clan, Qingcheng, and Emei must have come together! You're all dead now!"

At Hyuk Mujin's shout, his fist clenched tight, the allies on the wall finally brightened. Until then, Dark Heaven's overwhelming forces had left them frozen stiff.

"Waaah!"

"Reinforcements! The reinforcements are here!"

"Yeah, you bastards! Let's have a proper fight!"

The Nanman Beast Palace's forces were said to be practically a small kingdom in their own right. And now they had three great sects with them, each representing the very heart of the martial world.

Those who had already resigned themselves to defeat and those who had been clinging to hope while forcing down their fear all cheered at the top of their lungs, as if they'd never felt either.

But amid the wave of joy sweeping the wall, one man gazed at the approaching dust cloud with eyes that had only grown darker.

The Nanman Beast Palace and the other three Sichuan factions? They couldn't possibly have left Sichuan unguarded.

Sitting on Taishan's unusually high shoulder, Namho slowly retraced his thoughts as he watched beyond the wall with a seasoned gaze.

The strength of the Nanman Beast Palace. The current state of Sichuan's Murim, already dealt a tremendous blow by the chain of events centered on the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

And the reason he'd thought they couldn't come.

Sichuan is one of the largest regions in the world. With front lines that extensive, the imperial army alone wouldn't be enough. So how could they…?

The world today was like a steep mountainside where even the boundary between Murim and the state had disappeared.

The snowball that was Dark Heaven had been rolling for half a century. By now, the enemy was a boulder weighing ten thousand geun,[3808] tumbling down the slope and about to crush the villages below.

No—the entire world.

That was why the Murim Alliance couldn't have found a way to rescue Qinghai under these circumstances.

Leave the slightest gap, and Dark Heaven would drive into it like a sharp awl.

Not merely piercing the surface. With the bizarre sorcery of a Moving Formation, they could reach somewhere deep inside.

And Sichuan's Murim was in worse shape than any other region of the Central Plains.

Worse than bad. Its situation could hardly have been more dire.

Enemies appearing like ghosts somewhere within Sichuan weren't the only threat it faced.

If they really have abandoned their base to save us, the enemies across Sichuan's border in Tibet could march straight through it and into the Central Plains…

The countless thoughts tangled together in Namho's mind, looping and colliding, vanished all at once.

A chill ran down his spine. As he froze, a low exclamation reached his ears.

"Would you look at all those elephants in one place. What a sight from up here. Glad I stayed."

Great Sir.

It was him.

Unlike Bow Saint, Cheongpung, and the other Supreme Peak masters, he had stubbornly held his position until now. He muttered in a carefree tone, like a spectator enjoying the view.

"Strange, though. I heard you can barely breathe just standing still in Nanman, but do all its people shave their heads like that?"

Namho, who had gone blank with shock, whipped around to face him.

"What… What on earth are you talking about?"

"What do you mean? I'm just saying what I see."

Great Sir tilted his head and pointed at the dust cloud slowly drawing nearer from hundreds of jang away.

From atop the wall, dozens of jang high, his Supreme Peak eyesight let him see what no one else could.

No.

[3808] A Korean geun is approximately 600 grams or 1.32 pounds; ten thousand geun is about 6,000 kilograms or 13,200 pounds.

Through the pale dust, so thick it seemed impossible to make out anything an inch ahead, thousands of people in red and yellow robes were advancing behind the elephants.

"Huh? Wait. Now that I look again…"

Great Sir stared hard at them, scratching his chin, then added:

"They look a bit like monks."

At that moment—

A shout burst from the lips of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent, who was nearing eighty. Even Namho startled himself with its volume.

"You goddamn bastard! That's the Potala Palace!"

At the same moment—

Bwooooooo!

To the deep, resonant sound of the horn, the Potala Palace's army charged like mad, hundreds of elephants leading the way.

There was an undeniable gap between the modern world of the twenty-first century and this one.

Some things were similar. Others were a little different.

And the land people here called Xizang, tens of thousands of li from the Central Plains and counted among the Outer Lands, fell closer to the latter as far as I understood it.

Xizang.

In Murim, I alone knew its other name: Tibet.

And there was another religious group living there within its own little world—the Potala Palace.

That was the identity of the enormous dust cloud that had suddenly appeared.

Bwooooo!

Hundreds of elephants trumpeted at once as they charged like mad.

Now that I could see them better, their tusks, which ought to have been long and beautiful, were blackened as if they'd been deep-fried somewhere. Their bloodshot eyes looked completely gone.

Those things… are elephants?

As they drew closer by the second, I felt it again.

They were different. On another level entirely.

They were nothing like the elephants I'd seen behind the bars at the zoo when I was a kid holding my mom's hand. Or the ones I'd seen in Nanman.

Their size, their madness, their ferocity. All of it.

Dumbo, the baby elephant I'd seen as a kid?

Give me a fucking break.

If the original author had used these lunatics as inspiration, the cartoon I'd watched would've been called He's Just a Baby, but He's a Fucking Strong Elephant: Heavenly Demon's Reign.

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

The earth shook as if they really were using the Heavenly Demon's Reign.

No, that wasn't enough. Now the ground was splitting open.

Faced with real-life versions of the giant elephants from that movie about little folk destroying a ring, Cheongpung murmured, half dazed, "Whoa. I've never seen anything like that in my life…"

Neither have I, shit.

The words nearly escaped, but I managed to hold them back.

Why?

Simple.

Even without the Potala Palace rapidly closing the distance, Dark Heaven's forces still surrounded us on every side, packed tightly around us even now.

"They arrived sooner than expected. How fortunate."

The Blood Lord spoke with a relaxed smile.

"Of course, it's the worst possible luck for you."

I tightened my grip on the shaft of my spear instead of answering.

This was getting worse by the second.

We were already at a disadvantage, and now the Potala Palace from Tibet had joined Dark Heaven, too.

They never cared about Sichuan in the first place.

It wasn't as if I'd never considered this possibility. I'd just thought it unlikely.

So had most people.

We believed Dark Heaven had drawn in the Potala Palace, which had been quietly staying in Tibet, to block the front lines in Sichuan and stop any reinforcements from reaching Qinghai Province.

We were wrong.

What the Blood Lord—or rather, the Lord of Heaven behind him—wanted from what was happening in Qinghai wasn't some foothold from which to advance into the Central Plains.

Me. It was me.

With that realization, a huge rock seemed to press down on one corner of my chest.

So heavy it made me ache.

"Why?"

The question slipped out before I knew it.

The Blood Lord understood what I meant and answered readily.

“Do you think a fishing rod cast over a lake knows what its owner is thinking?”

“What?”

“I don’t know, either. I only do as my master commands. If he’d had them attack Sichuan, they might have opened a route into the Central Plains… but the Lord of Heaven had other ideas.”

“…!”

“Don’t worry. I’ll keep my promise to spare you today. But understand this: you’re already caught in a net. One you’ll never escape.”

Then the Blood Lord’s low Sound Transmission pierced my ears.

I’ll give you one day. If you sever your Sinews and Meridians and surrender of your own accord within that time, I’ll spare everyone but you.

He slowly raised a hand and smiled at me as I stood frozen.

I swear by the name of the Lord of Heaven, that person who is my one and only light and sky. This is my last mercy—and the only way to save your people.

That was the end of it.

As the encirclement parted at the Blood Lord’s gesture, the scornful smile on his lips stabbed into my chest.

Chapter 1096

Rumble, rumble, rumble.

The enormous, heavy iron gates of Xining slowly opened their mouths.

The Grand Sorceress watched the backs of their enemies as they passed through the encirclement, parted at the Blood Lord's signal, and headed for the gates. Then she spoke.

"Don't you think you let them go too easily?"

"Perhaps. But…"

The Blood Lord replied in a low voice, then nodded toward the towering city walls.

"If we'd fought them then and there, our losses would've been considerable, too."

The Grand Sorceress agreed, at least to a point.

Qinghai was a frontier among frontiers, a province that had stood prepared against foreign invasion since ancient times. Its walls, built from enormous blocks of dressed stone, were sturdier than anything in the Central Plains. Silver arrowheads already glinted along their tops.

And beyond Xining's slowly opening gates stood a forest of spears and blades.

"Cornered, they would've fought all the harder. They still have teeth to bite with."

Even a lowly rat would charge a cat if it thought its life was at stake. How much more fiercely would those people fight?

They had no fewer than seven Supreme Peak masters among them.

No—eight, counting the mysterious Great Sir who had never come down from the walls.

Then there were the Qinghai martial artists and imperial troops who had gathered in Xining early, with barely any losses. The Blood Lord's judgment wasn't wrong.

Of course, the Grand Sorceress thought there was another, more decisive reason for his choice.

He wasn't certain. He wasn't certain he could capture Jin Taekyung as that person wished—or, for that matter, that they could win outright.

But she kept the thought to herself. She could hardly stand the Blood Lord, yet they served the same master and pursued the same goal. There was no need to touch a nerve now.

At the same time, she could partly understand why he'd let Jin Taekyung and the other Supreme Peak masters leave without resistance.

"Well, it's a shame, but there's nothing to be done. I wasn't the one that person first entrusted with Qinghai."

"That's unusual. I never expected to hear you say that."

"I can separate business from personal feelings. I knew it would be a difficult battle, too."

There were levels even among Supreme Peak masters, and the seven they'd just surrounded were far from ordinary.

Cheongpung, the Huashan Divine Dragon, whose exploits had been somewhat overshadowed by Jin Taekyung's. Judging by innate martial talent alone, it wouldn't have been strange to call him the greatest of all time.

Perfected Being Hyeoncheon and Cheongheoja, leaders of the venerable Daoist lineages of Kongtong and Kunlun.

The Bow Saint and the Slaughter Saint, who needed no introduction, and the Fire King Jeok Cheongang, their equal.

And finally, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung, who had proven through his every action that his very existence was a variable.

Looking at that overwhelming, dazzling lineup, even the Black Ghosts—nearly immortal as they were—seemed to fade into the background.

"If we'd fought, those things would have been wiped out, whether we survived or not."

The Grand Sorceress gestured toward the silent Black Ghosts.

"Though one has already melted away without leaving so much as its shape behind."

Jeok Cheongang's full-strength strike had been that powerful. It had even broken through part of the defensive magic she'd cast.

"And there'd be no question of it if the Bow Saint and Slaughter Saint joined in. Besides, there's something about Jin Taekyung that even I can't quite understand."

In Murim, where strength ruled above all, the logic of power was simple. The strong devoured the weak; the weak were trampled. That was how the world worked.

But from what the Grand Sorceress had seen, Jin Taekyung stood further outside that logic than anyone.

Even if he'd received help from those around him whenever he faced a life-or-death crisis, defeating four Demon Lords and a Demon Empress hadn't been mere luck.

She could understand why he was called the Chosen One.

"That must be it. There's something special about him, and that's why that person is so obsessed with him."

A faint note of wonder entered her voice. The Blood Lord's lips twisted.

Obsessed. Is that what it is?

He watched the gates slowly closing. More precisely, he watched Jin Taekyung's back disappear between them.

And he remembered what he'd said moments before.

Do you think a fishing rod cast over a lake knows what its owner is thinking?

He hadn’t said it only to Jin Taekyung. It was a self-mocking question directed at himself—and a plaintive complaint to the Lord of Heaven, who wasn’t there to hear it.

Why is that brat special to you? Why, exactly?

At that moment, the person the Blood Lord most wanted to kill wasn’t Mae Jonghak, who had once taken his arm, or Jeok Cheongang.

It was Jin Taekyung.

A greenhorn who had grown into a towering tree in barely two years. He was no longer a bright-yellow sprout the Blood Lord could crush underfoot. He had deep roots and thick branches now, yet his master still would not let his servants cut him down.

Lord of Heaven. What is it you truly want? This foolish servant cannot begin to guess.

A fishing rod.

Even if it broke against the strength of a great fish that had taken the bait, its owner could simply replace it.

The three words he’d spoken of his own accord, and the meaning they carried, weighed unusually heavily on the Blood Lord’s heart.

That was when it happened.

Bwooooo!

A horn sounded, long and deep. The Potala Palace’s army slowed to a halt some twenty-odd zhang[3809] away.

Of the hundreds of elephants standing like iron towers, thirteen of the largest and most lavishly adorned moved forward.

Thud. Thud.

The Blood Lord slowly raised his head as a vast shadow fell across his face. The elephants reached him, their heavy footfalls rumbling. A voice came down from atop their heads.

“It has been a long time, donor.[3810]”

Anyone from the Central Plains might have snorted at the halting Han speech. But the immense internal energy and authority behind the voice belonged to the grand master of a sect. It carried unmistakable anger, too.

“And yet…”

Thirteen figures dropped to the ground with a rush of displaced air.

At their center stood an old monk, slender and bony as a withered tree.

[3809] A zhang here is ten Korean ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Twenty-odd zhang is roughly 60–90 m (200–300 ft).

[3810] “Donor” is a Buddhist form of address for a layperson, not necessarily someone who has made a donation.

“If this humble monk has not mistaken what he sees, then I believe a convincing explanation is in order.”

The old monk ruled Tibet like a kingdom. He was the Palace Lord of the Potala Palace—or, as his people had called him by ancient custom, the Dalai Lama. He fixed his piercing gaze on the Blood Lord.

“Why did you let them go? I may be old, and my eyes may be failing, but even from a distance I could tell they were no ordinary people.”

Roused from his thoughts, the Blood Lord glanced at the gates, now firmly shut. Then he gave the Dalai Lama, who had brought a substantial force to join them, a warm smile.

“As expected of the Palace Lord. You saw them clearly.”

The Dalai Lama did not smile back, despite the Blood Lord’s unusually friendly manner.

What he’d just seen touched on one of the chief reasons the head of his fiercely insular sect had accepted Dark Heaven’s proposal decades ago and formed an alliance. It was also one of the main reasons he’d gathered the Potala Palace’s forces from across Tibet and brought them all the way to Qinghai.

“Then forgive this old monk for asking, just in case.”

When he continued, his voice was so cold that no trace of his halting speech remained.

“Were any of the enemies you just let go among those I’ve been searching for?”

At that moment, the Grand Sorceress’s lips moved behind her tightly woven silver-white veil.

I’m only saying this in case, but… don’t forget. Until we achieve our goal, the Potala Palace is a rather useful card to have.

Her warning reached the Blood Lord before he could answer. His lips twisted despite himself.

Our goal?

Ordinarily, he would have let the phrase pass. Now, for some reason, it struck him as absurd.

She and he were both fishing rods, after all. Someone could replace them whenever they pleased.

I’ve had only one goal from the beginning: to serve that person with body and soul, and help him rule as the master and father of all under heaven.

But why?

Why did he find himself thinking that his master, the great Lord of Heaven, wanted not the vast world, but one young man?

“Ha.”

A quiet laugh escaped him before he could stop it.

The Dalai Lama's gaze grew darker.

"I'm still waiting for an answer."

Amusement in his voice, the Blood Lord replied, "Surely you've already guessed."

"Does that mean…?"

"That's right. The Fire King Jeok Cheongang. And the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung. The Fire Gate Clan's scions you've searched for so desperately were among them. Ah, come to think of it…"

He extended a finger toward the ground at the Dalai Lama's feet.

"I believe they were standing right where you are now. Only moments ago, of course."

"…!"

"…!"

The air around them shook with the aura pouring from the Dalai Lama and the Twelve Secret Monks, the Potala Palace's finest fighters.

"You let them go so easily? Even knowing how much I—how much we—hate the Fire Gate Clan?"

His voice was as dry as a desert of burning sand. The ruler of Tibet's vast martial world was furious.

The Fire Gate Clan.

A cursed name every Secret Monk of the Potala Palace knew and none could forget.

They were the ones who had driven the Potala Palace's transformation from a Buddhist sect known for its excessive belligerence into a theocratic state with formidable martial power.

"How dare you break your promise? What do you think you're doing?"

"Well, now…"

The Dalai Lama glared at him with a frost-sharp aura, speaking down to him as though it were the most natural thing in the world. The Blood Lord gave a short laugh.

"Don't worry. I remember perfectly well. That heartrending story from two hundred years ago, and the close bond behind our promise."

"What?"

The Dalai Lama's eyes widened at the offhand reply. The Blood Lord continued quietly.

"But unlike me, Palace Lord, you seem to have forgotten something."

"Forgotten? What are you talking about?"

"You know better than anyone how much help that person gave you in making the Potala Palace what it is today."

"That…"

The Dalai Lama bit his lip, unable to finish. The Blood Lord clicked his tongue.

"As I said, I'll keep my promise. If you play a substantial part in capturing Jin Taekyung, I'll put the Fire King in your custody and give you a generous reward besides."

The Dalai Lama was silent for a moment before speaking heavily.

"How can I believe you?"

"What, you don't trust me?"

"I trust that person. But you let them go right before my eyes, when we had the perfect opportunity."

A sneer touched the Blood Lord's lips. It wasn't the Dalai Lama's distrust that offended him. He found it laughable that the man truly believed what he'd said.

Even accounting for Dark Heaven's full support, the strength the Potala Palace had amassed was undeniable. The Dalai Lama was its greatest master; he could stand against any one of the Ten Kings besides Jeok Cheongang without being outmatched.

But…

That's as far as you go.

It wasn't a question of martial skill.

It was a question of the size of one's inner self. Of the person one was.

The Grand Sorceress had already understood what the Blood Lord intended when he let their enemies go, and had said nothing. The Dalai Lama could only lament the great fish he'd watched slip away.

"Do you still not understand?"

"What is it I'm supposed to understand…?"

"I wanted to make certain of everything. To leave them no opening to escape, however small."

The Dalai Lama was about to say something when he suddenly realized something and opened his eyes wide.

"Could it be…?"

The Blood Lord nodded without a word.

If his guess was right, it would happen today: the Yangtze River Channel League's hundreds of ships would finally enter the Yellow River tributary leading to Qinghai, where the Green Forest Alliance would meet them alongside the ten thousand followers who had joined them in advance.

"Another day, two at most. This battle will be over within that time."

Thirty thousand additional troops would cut through the swift current to reach Qinghai and close even the smallest gap.

They were the final key to a certain victory.

They were also why he'd given Jin Taekyung a day to think.

His promise?

He had never intended to keep it. In fact, he hoped Jin Taekyung would not be foolish enough to sever his own Sinews and Meridians.

Because only then—only if Jin Taekyung resolved to fight to the death—would the Blood Lord have grounds to kill him.

Lord of Heaven, forgive me. Even if this is not what you wish, I act only out of loyalty.

As if confessing his sins, the Blood Lord murmured to himself, then slowly parted his lips.

"So…"

He turned to the Dalai Lama, who was watching him with a face much brighter than before.

"Shut your mouth. Speak down to me again, and I'll rip that mouth apart."

"…!"

Watching the Dalai Lama freeze in place, the Blood Lord laughed wildly.

Once was enough to be treated like someone else's fishing rod.

Chapter 1097

The moment he saw the Blood Lord's savage smile, the Dalai Lama felt a chill race up his spine.

What in the world is this man?

He was different. Unmistakably different.

Something about the man before him stirred the primal fear every human being carried.

A darkness as deep as an abyss, enough to make even the ruler of vast Tibet shudder.

A predator.

He looked at the Dark Heaven followers who had surrounded him and the Twelve Secret Monks as if to enclose them.

"This humble monk… has been discourteous."

For a moment, he had forgotten what sort of man the Blood Lord was. And who stood behind him.

But when the Blood Lord bared the fangs he'd kept hidden, the Dalai Lama remembered the reality he'd let slip from his mind.

Who was weak, and who was strong.

If a conflict broke out now that neither side could take back, which of them would be devoured?

That was why the king of the theocratic state that ruled Tibet had no choice but to bow his head slowly.

"I swear, I had no intention of insulting someone the Lord of Heaven favors. It's only that I was troubled, and made a mistake…"

"A mistake."

The Blood Lord cut him off and ran his red tongue over his lips, like a beast savoring the sight of its prey.

Then he smiled at the Dalai Lama.

"I understand. Anyone can make a mistake now and then. Once."

The meaning in the Blood Lord's quiet final words was unmistakable.

Once. Just once.

He would not tolerate a second mistake.

The Blood Lord had gone back to addressing him respectfully as though nothing had happened. His attitude said the opposite. The Dalai Lama gritted his teeth and accepted it.

"Thank you for saying so."

"Come now, there's no need to be so formal. We're comrades working toward a great cause, aren't we?"

"…You're absolutely right."

Of course, the Dalai Lama knew how hollow those words were.

The balance of power had been settled decades ago, when he took the hand the Lord of Heaven had offered him. This was the generosity only the strong could afford—a carrot tossed his way after a crack of the whip.

But by now, the Dalai Lama and the Potala Palace had only one choice left.

They had to acknowledge it and accept it all.

Only then could they avenge the grudge passed down from their predecessors and survive in the new world Dark Heaven would one day rule.

"The Potala Palace will do everything it can to repay, in some small measure, the grace the Lord of Heaven has bestowed upon us. However…"

"However?"

The Blood Lord's eyebrow twitched. The Dalai Lama went on in a low, subdued voice.

"I trust you'll honor your promise."

The Blood Lord studied him as though he could see right through him, then clicked his tongue.

"So that's what you meant… Don't worry. The Fire Gate Clan's lineage will end right here in Xining."

"I don't doubt you, donor[3811], but couldn't they escape Xining and flee to the Central Plains before the Green Forest Alliance and the Yangtze River Channel League seal off the rear completely?"

"Escape? Did you just say escape? The Fire King and Jin Taekyung, of all people?"

Before the Dalai Lama could answer, the Blood Lord laughed aloud and continued.

"Palace Lord, you hate the Fire Gate Clan more than anyone, yet you know nothing about them."

"If we're talking about a small handful of people—those two in particular—I'd say they have plenty of chances to get away. Even the Fire Gate Clan's fools, who can't tell up from down, might decide to live to fight another day when the odds are this bad."

He was right.

They weren't talking about the tens of thousands of troops huddled in Xining, or its hundreds of thousands of people. They were talking about a tiny handful.

And if those people were the Fire King Jeok Cheongang and the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung, they could break out through the rear right now and tear a hole in the encirclement.

But the Dalai Lama's concern only made the Blood Lord laugh harder.

"Impossible. Absolutely impossible."

[3811] Buddhist monks may address a layperson as "donor," referring to someone who gives alms.

“What makes you so sure?”

“Don’t you know? You just said it yourself.”

“What do you—”

The Dalai Lama’s question was cut short. The Blood Lord suddenly stopped laughing and spoke in a hoarse voice.

“Fucking idiots who can’t tell up from down. That’s the Fire Gate Clan.”

“…!”

“Master and Disciple alike, not one of them gives a damn about his own life. And with tens of thousands of allies and hundreds of thousands of civilians still here… well, that settles it.”

If those two had wanted to live to fight another day, they wouldn’t be in Xining now.

No. None of what they’d done up to this point would have happened.

Once they lost their temper, they’d charge straight in whether their opponent was the Demonic Cult or the Jade Emperor[3812] himself. And even with their lives at stake, if there was something they had to protect, they protected it.

Someone like the Blood Lord might mock their deeds as idiocy rather than chivalry.

But that was the Fire Gate Clan.

“I’ll say it one last time: they will never leave Xining. I’ll stake my life on it.”

More certain than ever, the Blood Lord recalled the young pup who had dared to face him a year ago in a blood-soaked valley on Mount Song, and how desperately he had fought.

He recalled the fire in the eyes of the young beast he’d faced again today—one he could no longer call a pup.

At last, he knew for certain what sort of person the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung was.

And he made up his mind.

Even if he had to defy the Lord of Heaven’s command, he would kill Jin Taekyung and eliminate the threat.

Even if someone inside smuggles him out through the rear, it won’t matter.

Farmers worried about their crops being washed away watched the sky closely. Everyone else noticed the storm clouds only when raindrops landed on their heads.

The peace that had lasted more than fifty years was long. And the storm clouds that had crept slowly toward them were now overhead.

Even as Dark Heaven’s concealed blade, planted deep within their ranks long ago, pierced their flesh, they had yet to notice it.

[3812] The Jade Emperor is a ruler of the heavens in Daoist tradition.

The moment I get the signal from inside, I'll strike and finish this in one go.

The Blood Lord smiled faintly and looked up.

One by one, raindrops fell from the dark sky, heralding a downpour unlike any before it.

An omen of the storm that would sweep away everything in Qinghai.

Tap. Plip.

As I felt the sudden raindrops wet the top of my head, I thought:

For a victory celebration, this is pretty damn soggy.

We'd fought a battle we hadn't planned on, but for such a short fight, we'd accomplished plenty.

By my estimate, we'd taken down hundreds of enemies. That included the Black Ghost Jeok Cheongang had reduced to ash with a full-powered strike.

Of course, that was only a fraction of them.

I kept that thought to myself and stared past the wall at the army blackening the land beyond it.

Hundreds fewer enemies. Thousands more.

For a moment, the balance of power had edged the tiniest bit closer to even. With the Potala Palace's arrival, it had tipped further against us than before. The weight of it pressed down on one corner of everyone's heart, mine included.

"Maybe… we've already missed our chance."

Watching the enemy build an ever tighter, more impregnable encirclement, Bow Saint continued in a heavy voice:

"Since we were already committed, we should've finished things before the Potala Palace arrived. We might've had a chance then."

At that one sentence, which put into words what everyone already felt, someone who'd been standing with his arms crossed in silence spoke up.

"Even so, if we use the cover of night to eliminate their entire leadership, we'll have a good chance."

If Hyuk Mujin had said that, I'd have hung him upside down and thrown him over the wall. Thankfully, it hadn't come to that.

The words had come from the assassin hailed as the greatest of all time.

The others looked at him hopefully, waiting for him to go on. I shook my head without hesitation.

"Absolutely not."

The Slaughter Saint asked:

"Why do you object?"

“Can I be honest?”

“When have you ever been anything else? Go on.”

“It’s simple. You’d go in there just to die like a dog.”

“…!”

The mood sank at once. The Slaughter Saint gave me a long, searching look.

“That goes beyond honesty. It’s almost a provocation.”

“I like joking around, and I’m good at provoking people. But I don’t do that to allies in the same boat. You already know that.”

“I learned something from facing them myself just now. If I go, there’s a chance.”

“How much of a chance?”

“One in ten.”

The Slaughter Saint answered as if the slim odds were no big deal, then looked at the rain, growing heavier by the moment.

“One in five, if the heavens lend a hand.”

“That’s all?”

“That’s as much as one in five. Considering what we’d gain if I succeeded, my life would be a bargain.”

He was right.

Even so, I could only smile bitterly.

“If we stood to gain anything at all, I wouldn’t have called it dying like a dog.”

“Now that they know I’m here, I expect them to prepare. They might even set every Black Ghost they have left to guard their leaders.”

“I know. I know you’ve considered the other possibilities, too.”

“Then why?”

“Because it’s simple.”

Naturally, I wasn’t the one who answered.

Jeok Cheongang had been silent all along. Now he spoke up and continued as everyone turned to look at him.

“Dark arts—no, Magic. When it comes to that damned stuff, even the greatest assassin of all time is as good as deaf and blind. Am I wrong?”

I nodded.

No—more precisely, before I could even nod, Jeok Cheongang grabbed my shoulder and made me move.

Before I could ask why, his low Sound Transmission slipped into my ear, and I had no choice but to fall silent.

—So, are you really not going to tell me until the very end?

Jeok Cheongang stared at me, his gaze sunk deep.

—What nonsense that bastard the Blood Lord was spouting at the last moment.

Chapter 1098

The human body holds more information than anyone might imagine.

And Supreme Peak masters, whose five senses have reached their limits, can read what lies behind the slightest change in another person's expression or movement.

Just like right now.

—So, you're planning to keep quiet until the very end?

A low Sound Transmission. Eyes so deep I couldn't guess what lay beneath them.

That alone was enough.

I hadn't managed to hide my momentary agitation, and the flicker in my eyes was practically a confession.

—What nonsense did that bastard the Blood Lord spout at the last moment?

As Jeok Cheongang's deep gaze seemed to see through everything, his Sound Transmission coming as if he were spitting out the words, I suddenly realized something.

Even if he hadn't been one of the world's foremost Supreme Peak masters, even if I hadn't let my agitation show, nothing would have changed.

Branches growing from the same root remain connected, however far apart they spread. My old master would have seen straight into his disciple's heart anyway.

So there was only one answer I could give.

—Maybe getting younger sharpened your hearing.

I'd be lying if I said I hadn't seen this coming at all.

Jeok Cheongang had once overheard the Roaring Fury Swordsman's Sound Transmission when the man came to the Jin Family of Taiyuan to threaten me. Then he'd beaten him to a pulp.

But comparing the Roaring Fury Swordsman to the Blood Lord was almost embarrassing.

I'd assumed that even Jeok Cheongang couldn't make out the Sound Transmission of someone who'd grown stronger still since the Shaolin Bloodshed. When he showed no sign of knowing anything after we returned to the city, I'd secretly felt relieved.

Looking back, though, I'd only had half the answer at best.

"Answer me. Now."

Jeok Cheongang spoke aloud.

Dozens of pairs of eyes turned toward me at once. I took a deep breath.

Then, at last, I told him the truth.

"You were right. The Blood Lord made me an offer."

"What offer?"

“He said he’d give me one day. I’m to leave the city alone, sever the sinews and meridians in all four of my limbs myself, and surrender.”

“…!”

“…!”

An invisible ripple shivered through the air.

Murmurs rose from the people who were only now grasping what had happened. Jeok Cheongang’s face went stiff as stone.

“And in exchange for your life, he promised to spare everyone else?”

Just as I’d expected.

I nodded with a bitter smile.

“Yes.”

“Why… didn’t you tell me from the start?”

“Because I was thinking it over. If this hadn’t happened, I’d still be thinking it over.”

“Thinking it over? That ridiculous load of crap?”

“The Blood Lord himself swore on the Lord of Heaven’s name. If he keeps his word, everyone’s safety is more than worth one life. Isn’t it?”

The Slaughter Saint frowned when I met his eyes and threw his own words back at him.

“Yes, perhaps. But you’re overlooking the most important thing.”

“What’s that?”

“Trust. Whether you can trust the person you’re making a deal with.”

The Slaughter Saint answered without hesitation, then continued:

“They’ll never keep their promise. When I spoke of taking a gamble earlier, I was betting on my own skill. You’re trying to strike a deal with someone who can’t be trusted in the first place.”

I bit my lip.

Honestly, I didn’t know.

No. Maybe some part of me already did.

Jeok Cheongang and the Slaughter Saint were right. The killing intent the Blood Lord had shown me before making his final offer had been all too real. So had his vow to kill me.

But there was another reason I couldn’t dismiss this absurd deal.

“Right now, the Lord of Heaven wants only one thing. Me.”

Looking back, the Lord of Heaven had always wanted me.

For a very long time.

Otherwise, he wouldn’t have left me alone all this time as I grew stronger by the day—so quickly that the saying “treat someone with new eyes” couldn’t keep up—even though I kept standing in the way of his path to ruling the world.

Why did the Lord of Heaven want me?

I didn't know.

But I thought I could make out one thing, however dimly.

"To him, I'm more important than anything else right now. Maybe…"

My voice trailed off. The hairs all over my body stood on end, and I let out the breath I'd been holding.

"Even more important than the world itself."

"…!"

"…!"

The truth had become too clear to hide. It was chillingly cold and dark.

Like the air around us, frozen in an instant.

And like the other reason I couldn't stop weighing his offer.

Whoooosh.

Rain hammered down all around us. I turned my head toward somewhere far to the east.

The sound filling my ears reminded me of water parting around a ship's prow.

They're coming.

I couldn't see them.

But I could feel them.

The final wave that would break the balance of this already-lopsided battlefield—and sweep away every last person in Xining.

Sometimes, there are nights like that.

The birds and insects and even the fish are asleep, and only the moon shines brightly overhead.

The fishermen of the Yangtze liked nights like those.

Whether they cast their nets or not, whether they were fishermen or not, on those nights everyone went down to the river. They'd bathe and set out in boats, filling their cups with cheap strong liquor and drinking their fill.

Grateful for the vast river that had given them so much, they'd row across the moon's reflection on the water, singing and enjoying a little time for themselves.

There had been a time like that.

There really had.

Splash!

Deep in the night, the pitch-black river split open.

Before the moon emerged from the clouds to see its own face reflected in the water, hundreds of prows covered the surface and surged ahead.

Fiercely. Endlessly.

It was like watching a city move. Like a wave that nothing could stop.

A mighty current that defied the order of heaven and dreamed of defying Heaven itself, one not even the Son of Heaven—the father and ruler of all under it—could stop.

And the countless flags streaming from the swollen sails had long since become objects of fear in their own right.

"What brings you here?"

Leaning against the prow, the old man had been looking silently up at the five characters painted on a flag in bold, imposing strokes: Yangtze River Channel League. Now he turned slowly and added, "Alone, and without sending word."

At the Seafaring King Pa Ryun's quiet voice, the subordinate who'd brought the unexpected visitor lowered his head, his face stiff.

"My apologies, Alliance Leader. It's just—"

"Enough."

Pa Ryun cut him off with a word, then addressed the visitor standing in the mast's shadow.

"I said anyone who neglected their duties before we reached our destination would be severely punished. Have you already forgotten?"

The visitor shook his head.

"No."

"Then did you think my disciple would be an exception?"

"No."

"Then?"

Thud.

With a heavy step, Ship-Fire Boy Mu Song emerged from the shadows.

"I came to watch the moon with you, Master."

Watch the moon.

Pa Ryun found himself looking up at the cloud-filled sky. His voice stayed gruff.

"Under the League's rules, you'll receive thirty strokes with the oar on deck at dawn."

Mu Song faltered, then promptly asked, "Wasn't it twenty?"

"You disobeyed an order and spouted nonsense on top of it. You knew what you were getting into. Thirty."

"But—"

"Forty."

Mu Song fell silent. Pa Ryun turned to the subordinate, who was still standing there.

"You neglected your duty as well. Ten strokes."

"B-But, Alliance Leader—"

"Leave us. I'll let this matter go."

The Yangtze River Channel League's punishment was no ordinary beating.

A Peak master charged with enforcing discipline administered it with an oar of hard birchwood, drenched in water.

He didn't use internal energy, but ten strokes were enough to leave a man's backside raw and break several bones. The victim could expect to spend a couple of months in bed.

Yet Seafaring King Pa Ryun's strictness made no exceptions—not for his own disciple, nor for a subordinate who'd followed him for over thirty years.

In the end, the subordinate left without another word. By the time his presence had completely faded, Pa Ryun, still watching the river split around the ships, spoke abruptly.

"Perhaps I should make it fifty."

"What?"

"It's clear whose fault this is. You're at least ten years younger and in better shape, so you can take his ten strokes for him."

Mu Song stared at his master, then nodded with a bitter smile.

"I will. Fifty strokes should keep me from moving for three months. Maybe that would be for the best."

"There's a barb in your words."

"Then you heard me right."

Mu Song took a deep breath and dropped to his knees.

Thump.

"Please. Please reconsider your decision, just this once."

Before the sound had faded, he pressed his forehead to the deck.

"No matter how I look at it… this isn't right."

But even as his Disciple suddenly prostrated himself, the Master kept his eyes on the Yangtze.

"Not right, you say."

"I know it sounds absurd. I've been a bandit since I was a snot-nosed kid, too."

Pillaging had been Mu Song's trade.

Ever since he'd taken charge of Water Dragon Stronghold at thirty, he'd led a large family of followers, taking what belonged to others and sharing it with them.

But… he had never wanted this. Not once.

"The Yangtze is being stained with blood. And it'll keep happening. That wide, blue river we all love."

Mu Song's voice had begun to tremble. Pa Ryun suddenly spoke.

“Is that why you led the way in taking so many imperial troops prisoner in the last battle?”

“You knew…?”

“Do you think anything happens on the Yangtze without this old man knowing?”

“…!”

“It wasn’t only you. The Third Disciple and quite a few senior members pulled much the same trick. Or should I call it insubordination?”

“Master, it wasn’t insubordination. We only—”

“How dare you raise your voice before me?”

Pa Ryun turned and looked down at Mu Song, his gaze dark and steady.

“This old man ordered them killed, and you should have killed them. They were people it was all right to kill.”

“No. There was no need to kill them.”

Had they been strong, Mu Song might not have shown them mercy. He had himself and his followers to protect.

But the imperial troops he’d faced that day had been so weak that spilling their blood frightened him.

“That—that wasn’t a battle. It was a massacre.”

“Yes. That’s what this old man wanted.”

“…!”

“But in the end, only your Senior Brother and the Elders carried out my orders to the letter.”

Hiss.

Mu Song shuddered.

He had to stop.

Knowing his master’s anger, he ought to stop right now.

But he clenched his teeth and held out against the overwhelming aura bearing down on him.

Someone came to mind.

A man with martial arts strong as hell and a foul temper, who’d put Mu Song through no end of trouble. But he’d also shown Mu Song that even a river bandit like him could pursue chivalry.

Jin Taekyung.

“D-Do you still not understand?”

Struggling to breathe beneath that mighty aura, Mu Song forced the words out.

“Eldest Senior Brother—and those damned Elders, too. They weren’t following you.”

“What?”

“They’re loyal to someone else. Maybe they have been for a long time, M-Mas…”

Thump.

That was as far as he got.

As far as he could endure the aura of Pa Ryun, one of the Ten Kings.

His Disciple had lost consciousness before he could finish speaking. Pa Ryun looked down at him with a deep gaze, then turned back to the river and muttered.

To the tributary of the Yellow River, to be precise, its waters already beginning to turn the color of yellow earth.

“Yes. Better to stay as you are. Even if you stepped in now, nothing would change. Things would only rush toward their end.”

Just then, the moon peeked out between the clouds again, spilling its light over the earth.

At the same time, figures began gathering among the grasses not far from the riverbank.

Thousands of shadows. No, tens of thousands.

A voice, its laugh as faint as moonlight, spoke.

“It does seem a fine night for watching the moon after all.”

Hundreds of ships bearing the Yangtze River Channel League’s flags began preparing to welcome their new allies.

Chapter 1099

That night was unusually long.

Maybe it was the torrential rain, which showed no sign of letting up. Or maybe it was the dark clouds that still hadn't budged after several shichen.[3813]

The meeting dragged on beneath them, in an atmosphere so stifling that it didn't end until the hour of the Rabbit.[3814]

"Only one final battle remains. I ask every Great Hero here to rest well and carry out the duties entrusted to you."

I sounded far more formal than usual.

But not one of the leaders gathered there seemed uncomfortable with my new manner—or with a junior so far beneath them presiding over the meeting.

Anyone who might have stirred up trouble had already been replaced.

The eminent masters and generals of Qinghai Murim paid their respects with courtesy and resolve, then left to carry out their respective duties.

All except one old Daoist, who was still sipping from a cup of tea that had gone cold long ago.

"Nothing tastes worse than cold tea. What do you say? Shall this old man warm it up for you?"

Jeok Cheongang stopped on his way out to make the offer. The old Daoist shook his head.

"Cold tea has its own flavor, as does hot tea. Besides…"

His voice was as airy as drifting clouds. He turned to me with a smile.

"Why trouble Senior when I could ask this young Fellow Daoist here?"

Anyone else might have thought he was just playing with words. Cheongheoja—the old Daoist, and Sect Leader of the Kunlun Sect—could easily have warmed the tea himself with Samadhi True Fire.

But his answer was a roundabout refusal. He still had something to discuss with me alone.

Jeok Cheongang understood.

"Spouting airy nonsense. A Daoist through and through. Do as you please."

He gave a quiet snort and left. Once we were alone, Cheongheoja picked up the teapot.

"Would you care for a cup, Fellow Daoist?"

I didn't know what he wanted to say, but I had no reason to refuse.

"I'd be grateful."

"No need for gratitude."

[3813] A shichen is a traditional time unit lasting about two hours.

[3814] The hour of the Rabbit is the traditional time period from five to seven in the morning.

Cheongheoja smiled faintly as he poured. I took a polite sip, and a taste I couldn't quite describe, along with a bitter aroma, filled my mouth.

"Well? How is it?"

"Uh, cold."

"And?"

"Bitter. Really bitter."

"I often drink it cold. I should have warmed it to suit your taste."

"Mm. It's fine. Tea doesn't really suit my taste even when it's warm."

"Is that so? I put a good deal of effort into growing those tea leaves."

"…?"

Why the hell would he wait until now to tell me that?

Cheongheoja burst into hearty laughter at the look on my face.

"I'm joking. I do tend my own tea garden, but in a situation that urgent, why would I have packed tea leaves?"

"Oh."

I shook my head as I realized he'd caught me. Of course it made no sense to bring tea leaves when a hundred thousand enemies were bearing down on Mount Kunlun.

It wasn't as if he were Geum Jandi, honorary Sect Leader.[3815]

"You got me. I didn't know you were like this."

"Likewise."

"Pardon?"

Before I could ask what he meant, Cheongheoja smiled and went on.

"You have many sides to you, Fellow Daoist. When you uprooted the Qinghai City Lord and his faction in one stroke, you seemed like a Great General who could command the world. At other times, you seem an immature hero who leaves everything to his emotions. Yet in the end, you have the bearing of a grand master whom everyone can't help but follow."

Hmm.

What was I supposed to say to that?

Embarrassed by the sudden praise, I scratched my chin.

"You're too kind."

"No one would think so. At least, no one who has ever met that person."

That person.

I knew who he meant from the reverence in those two words. Cheongheoja spoke slowly.

[3815] Geum Jandi is the heroine of the Korean television series Boys Over Flowers. Her name literally means "golden grass."

“The Martial God. The greatest grand master of any age. Though his whereabouts have long been a mystery… I sensed something of him in you, Fellow Daoist.”

A thought occurred to me.

Maybe Cheongheoja’s words touched on a truth that was growing clearer in my mind.

Someone who had crossed between the modern world and Murim before me.

A Player who had roamed this world—a world that truly existed somewhere among the endless dimensions—as if it were a game.

Maybe that was why a murmur escaped me before I could stop it.

“…Maybe.”

“Hmm?”

“No, nothing. I just meant I’d like to become like him.”

It was a flimsy excuse even to me, but Cheongheoja didn’t seem to dwell on what I’d said. My voice had been barely audible, and unlike the Martial God, whose very existence was a mystery, my origins were known.

“I see. I believe you could.”

He nodded without a hint of suspicion, took another sip of tea, and added, “Unlike a certain Daoist who devoted his whole life to the task and never even reached the man’s feet.”

Cheongheoja had lived a life of great renown, both as the Kunlun Sect Leader and as a Daoist. Yet his self-deprecating voice held a regret I couldn’t place.

“The Martial God was a truly great man. He always concealed his appearance with a disguise technique and never properly revealed his true identity. Even so, everyone under heaven trusted and followed him.”

Cheongheoja wasn’t belittling his own accomplishments or martial arts by comparing them to the Martial God’s. He was talking about character, tolerance, and leadership.

And the conversation was drawing closer to the real reason he’d wanted to speak with me.

“Of course, even he wasn’t perfect. Dark Heaven’s schemes had taken root out of sight long ago.”

“Do you think this wouldn’t be happening if he were still here?”

“Of course. I lack the gift for reading the heavens that Master Hong Dao had before he passed away, but I’m certain Dark Heaven would have thought differently if the Martial God were still with us.”

Cheongheoja answered firmly, then sighed.

“But I could never become like him. The age of turmoil that drenched the world in blood ended, and peace came. Yet I couldn’t properly lead even my own sect, let alone all under heaven.”

I frowned before I could help it.

Don't tell me…

My instincts said this was no small matter. What he was about to tell me might be crucial to the coming battle.

Cheongheoja noticed the change in my expression and stroked his teacup with a bitter look.

"Until now… I didn't mind if the tea was cold as ice. I thought that if I could swallow it—if I could accept it that way—it would be enough."

Until now.

He had definitely said until now.

"I take it that's changed."

"It has. If the cold made this old man sick, that would be one thing. But I can't let hundreds of thousands of people suffer stomachaches, can I?"

"Hundreds of thousands…?"

At those words, I knew for certain.

There was a traitor inside Xining.

Dark Heaven had hidden a sword deep within our ranks—close to us.

Along with that realization, Cheongheoja's low voice pierced my ears.

Now I understood why he'd wanted to be alone with me. Why he looked so pained and sounded so bitter toward himself.

"It's my fault. I failed to teach that child properly."

"…!"

As I stared at him wide-eyed, the old Daoist with an unworthy Disciple silently raised his teacup.

By then, he had heated it with Samadhi True Fire.

Fwoosh.

Warmth spread through the air. Steam rose from the tea as Cheongheoja drank it slowly. Then he spoke, his voice heavier than I had ever heard it.

"I have a favor to ask."

At that moment—

Ding.

A System alert rang in my ears, and a translucent holographic window appeared before my eyes.

And then… a day passed.

The air in Xining was heavier and colder than ever.

Only a few days ago, the townspeople had smiled as they welcomed the newly arrived reinforcements. Now their faces were as dark as the sky overhead, as though they had some dim sense of the future before them.

Destruction and death.

The erasure of every living thing that would come at the end.

But who was it that said humans were creatures of hope? That they found their greatest strength when something was being taken from them, not when they sought to take from others?

And so they had not fallen into utter despair.

Here and now, with the last sliver of hope and yearning in their hearts, they looked toward the saviors who would light up the darkness settling all around them.

Splash. Splash.

Dozens of people marched in step, sending up splashes from rainwater that had risen to their calves.

The rain was still falling so hard it obscured their vision. Yet the countless townspeople filling the main road made way for them, scarcely daring to breathe.

Whoooosh.

Amid the clamor of the rain, the human tide slowly parted.

At the head of the procession, striding without hesitation through the countless people, was one man.

A young giant who had already carved his name into the minds of the people under heaven and the martial artists of Murim.

Jin Taekyung.

By now, everyone knew him.

Some might remember the young man as the Marquis of Shangshan; others might know him by his sobriquet, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon.

But however they saw him, one fact would not change.

Today's battle, and the name Jin Taekyung, would enter the long record of history.

Even if his story ended in a hollow, miserable death.

"Fuck, did a hole open up in the sky or something?"

The young giant muttered the coarse curse almost too quietly to hear. Anyone who overheard him would have been shocked. He lifted his head.

The sky was dark.

Dark as fucking hell.

"Just the kind of weather I don't want to die in."

With a rueful snort, Jin Taekyung watched the shapes drawing closer through the distant rain.

A horrifyingly vast enemy army.

And at that moment—

Wooooong.

The opening shot of a battle that would decide the fate of Qinghai—perhaps of all under heaven—cut through the air.

Shhheeeek!

Hundreds of ice spikes.

Chapter 1100

Someone once said that people feel the greatest wonder and fear when they come face-to-face with the unknown.

When they encounter something they've never experienced before and see it for what it is, every emotion is pushed to its extreme.

Jin Taekyung wholeheartedly agreed.

He also agreed with something a certain philosopher had said: Humans are creatures of learning.

Whooosh!

Hundreds of ice spikes shot through the curtain of rain amid a tremendous surge of energy.

Yet even as the powerful, wide-ranging spell took shape, Jin Taekyung didn't flinch.

He'd expected it.

"Defend!"

The instant his shout, infused with deep reserves of internal energy, burst from between his lips—

Shhk! Fwssh!

Shields rose in a wave above the allies packed shoulder to shoulder along the high city wall. At the same time, brilliant beams of light shot up from all along it toward the hundreds of ice spikes.

Boom!

A thunderous crash. A flash of light.

The spikes shattered under the Sword Energy unleashed by the Peak masters, and fragments ricocheted toward the wall at high speed. But that was all.

Clang! Clang!

The massive rectangular shields, clad in steel on the outside, did their job.

If the spikes had retained their full force, things might have been different. But after that first blow had weakened them, the fragments couldn't break through the solid wall of shields.

"Everyone's safe!"

Excited reports came from all around.

But Jin Taekyung, who had anticipated the attack and prepared for it, didn't let his guard down.

They'd gotten the battle off to a good start. Holding off magic—something almost indistinguishable from a supernatural miracle in this world—had lifted their morale, too. That was no small gain.

But Jin Taekyung knew better than anyone that this was only the beginning.

So did the Grand Sorceress and the Blood Lord, watching from beyond the wall.

“Loose!”

At the forceful shout, the signalers on the wall waved their flags to pass along the command. Arrows that had gleamed from between the shields finally left their taut bowstrings.

Whooosh!

Thousands of arrows poured down, blackening a swath of the sky.

They were meant to pierce the throats of the enemies advancing below—the merciless invaders.

But the defenders’ desperate hopes came to nothing the moment the red lips hidden behind a veil in the distance moved.

“O invisible veil.”

There is a power in human speech that no one can explain.

A mage’s spoken command gives that power form.

Fwoom.

An invisible wall forced its way between spaces and split the air.

It was a powerful protective spell, one that steel arrowheads could never pierce.

Crack!

Thousands of arrowheads snapped or bounced away in an instant.

The people on the wall gasped at the impossible sight. But the woman responsible remained as calm as ever.

“They’ve prepared thoroughly enough. Their countermeasures aren’t bad, either.”

At the Grand Sorceress’s murmur, the Blood Lord spoke quietly.

“Of course. They have to fight with everything they’ve got.”

“Don’t you think we gave them more time than we needed to?”

“That’s a pointless thing to say. You know better than anyone this is the surest way. And besides…”

The Blood Lord looked calmly at the Grand Sorceress.

“You used that time to prepare, too.”

She gave a short laugh and nodded.

Her slender white fingers were already forming a hand seal. The movement looked perfectly gentle, but it held another spell of terrible destructive power.

Rumble.

The air began to tremble. Strange patterns etched beneath the Grand Sorceress’s feet flared with light in a multitude of colors.

There were dozens of them: Magic Formations she had prepared over the past two days for this battle.

“So, what do you want?” she asked.

The Blood Lord briefly considered the question.

What do I want?

Jin Taekyung's death, of course.

But he had to swallow the words welling up in his throat.

That stupid bitch would never defy that person's will, and even he had no idea how she would react if she learned what he was thinking.

So he forced himself to answer calmly.

"The wall. Aim for the wall. Hit it hard enough to bring it down in one blow."

The Dalai Lama, who had listened to their exchange in silence like a docile lamb, suddenly spoke.

"If the wall falls before the rear is completely sealed off, won't the enemies give up resisting and flee?"

His suggestion sounded reasonable at first, but neither the Blood Lord nor the Grand Sorceress paid it the slightest mind.

Bringing the wall down wasn't their only reason for targeting it first.

Fwoosh.

The Grand Sorceress slowly extended a hand. High overhead, the rain pouring endlessly from the sky stopped at her will, then began to gather.

By the time it had formed dozens of enormous spheres of water, she spoke again.

"Fly."

At her quiet command, the spheres hurtled toward the wall. Each carried the weight and force of ten thousand geun[3816], surging forward with a speed and momentum that seemed to brook no interference.

ROOOAR!

That was when the archers, who had been firing without pause at the approaching enemy, stared with their mouths open. The shield bearers guarding the front lowered their shields without realizing it.

At last, they stepped forward.

Whoosh!

Dazzling flashes cut through the air.

Some were as hot as lava. Others were stealthy enough to send a chill down the back of the neck. Still others were as swift as lightning.

By the time the martial artists and imperial troops on the wall sensed them, it was over.

Fwoosh! Boom!

The enormous spheres of water evaporated, were sliced apart, and burst.

[3816] A Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun is about 6,000 kg (13,000 lb).

Spheres that had looked capable of flattening a mountain, let alone the city wall. Terrifying calamities that had seemed as impossible for a human to stop as a natural disaster.

"…!"

"…!"

Those who'd instinctively sensed their imminent deaths opened their eyes wide in unison.

At the same time, they remembered something they had momentarily forgotten.

Those terrifying dark arts called magic weren't the only thing beyond human power.

"They're coming in hard from the start."

Across the world, only ten great martial artists had earned the right to a king's throne. Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King, held the highest seat among them, shoulder to shoulder with the stars in the heavens.

He spat out some phlegm and grinned.

"How'd they know this old man likes that sort of thing?"

His voice rumbled like a beast's growl, and warmth rose in the people's chests.

The tiny spark of hope, beginning to stir again, blazed brighter still when the giants who appeared next came into view.

"They're trying to wear down our key fighters."

He looked more like a boy than a young man. But everyone knew now that the boy, who still looked as if he hadn't even lost all his baby fuzz, was the Slaughter Saint, once revered by all.

They knew, too, that another man whose legend could rival his stood among them.

"Obvious, but effective."

The voice was clearer than raindrops. At odds with it, a rough finger drew back a bowstring.

Whoosh!

A beam of light shot forth.

And then, destruction.

Crack!

The beam shattered the invisible protective veil over the enemy forces in an instant, then exploded with a thunderous roar.

It tore through the ground and pierced the enemies beneath it.

BOOM!

The ground shook. The blast swallowed their screams.

Neither the hulking monsters moving like little hills nor the Dark Heaven followers advancing behind them under their cover could withstand that One Strike.

The name Bow Saint was no empty boast.

We can do this.

A glimmer of hope flashed through the minds of the people on the wall, and they trembled with emotion.

They saw the radiance of those who had not lost their light, even in a world this dark.

They saw the other Supreme Peak masters stepping forward to block the magic that kept crashing toward the wall, and Jin Taekyung, who remained completely unfazed even in this dire situation.

They were moved. They shuddered.

They stood shoulder to shoulder with living legends, and those legends were giving everything they had to save them.

Thud. Thud-thud. Thud-thud-thud!

A massive rumble rippled outward like a wave.

As if they had all agreed to it, they stamped their feet. They slammed down their shields, beat their spear shafts, and struck their swords and sabers together.

Even as a fierce rain of fire poured down. Even as lightning flashed and ice bearing a terrible chill came flying at them. Even as the rain that should have soaked their heads turned to arrows.

They did not yield.

No—they never doubted that, whatever end awaited them here today, they too would become part of the legend.

And as the little sparks in their hearts grew into a great torch—

Rumble!

The hulking monsters, who'd steadily advanced despite the relentless rain of arrows and other attacks, charged toward the wall with a roar like an earthquake.

—GRAAAAH!

Their roar made the defenders' hair stand on end.

At the same instant, one of the monsters launched its body forward with strength and speed far beyond human limits and slammed into the wall with all its might.

RUMBLE!

Chapter 1101

For ages, people had called the lands north and south of the Yellow River the Central Plains and considered them the heart of the world.

The birthplace of the earliest civilization. Fertile land, abundant resources, and the staggering productivity they made possible.

With advantages like those, people were bound to flock there from every direction.

The problem was that among them were foreign peoples from distant borderlands, who often wanted to “borrow” the Central Plains’ gold and silver treasures.

By their own methods: plunder or occupation.

Naturally, the people of the Central Plains weren’t too fond of that.

So they built the Great Wall, stretching a full ten thousand li.[3817] They strengthened the armies stationed along the borders, raised impregnable fortresses and walled cities throughout the land, and kept reinforcing them generation after generation.

All the more so in Xining, the capital of Qinghai—the farthest of the borderlands, practically the continent’s GOP.[3818]

But the rulers who gave those orders, and the craftsmen and laborers who sweated to carry them out, could never have dreamed there were madmen who would hurl themselves bodily against walls built of solid stone, stacked layer upon layer and sealed tight with lime.

Or that those madmen would be enormous monsters, hideous and monstrously strong.

Rumble, rumble!

The ground—or rather, the city—shook.

Several thousand monsters battered the wall with their bare bodies or with huge logs and clubs they’d gotten from who knew where. The sight alone was enough to freeze the blood.

It doused the defenders’ fighting spirit just as it had begun to blaze.

“Hah…!”

“Don’t break formation! Hold your positions!”

Choked breaths escaped here and there amid a storm of shouted commands.

And this wasn’t happening only at the West Gate, where I was stationed.

[3817] In this Chinese setting, one li is about 500 m (0.311 mi). Ten thousand li is about 5,000 km (3,100 mi).

[3818] GOP stands for General Outpost, a term for a South Korean military position near the Demilitarized Zone.

The North Gate and South Gate were the same. So was the East Gate, though the assault there was comparatively light.

Countless enemies had encircled Xining for dozens of li.[3819] Now, with those stubbornly resilient monsters in front, they were beginning their siege in earnest.

“Archers, ready!”

“Loose! Loose!”

Shhk, thud-thud!

Our response was swift, too.

A dense rain of arrows fell at nearly direct-fire angles, holding back the Dark Heaven followers, while we brought out the countermeasure we’d prepared for the monsters.

“Is it ready?”

One of the commanders answered my quiet question. Sweat had already soaked the inside of his helmet.

“Everything’s prepared, just as the Marquis of Shangshan ordered.”

Then there was no need to hesitate any longer.

I turned to the tense commander and the imperial troops standing by.

“Pour it all out. Give them the works.”

The moment I gave the order—

Groan.

Signal flags swung vigorously. With a heavy metallic groan, the great iron cauldrons set along the wall tipped and disgorged their contents.

Thick, black, boiling oil.

Splash! Ssssss!

—GRAAAAH!

Acrid smoke mingled with the smell of burning, and the monsters’ screams rose over it all.

But I knew better than anyone that oil alone wouldn’t be enough to destroy creatures that were practically undead monsters already.

And with the sorcerers controlling them still nowhere to be seen, this was the right moment for me to act.

Fwoosh.

I drew a deep breath, and the fire dragon coiled deep inside me awoke.

It had left its longtime home in my Lower Dantian. Now the enormous flame had made a nest atop the peak of my Middle Dantian, a peak that touched the heavens. It stirred and flowed into every part of my body.

Endlessly. Fiercely.

[3819] In this Chinese setting, one li is about 500 m (0.311 mi). Ten thousand li is about 5,000 km (3,100 mi).

And at the same time, as swiftly as a ray of light.

Whoosh.

The moment I stepped forward, a spine-chilling sensation of weightlessness swept through me.

Before I knew it, everything lay beneath my feet.

The city wall, rising a dozen or so jang[3820] like a barrier at the edge of the world. The monsters and fanatics blackening the ground below.

Only one thing was level with my eyes.

A spear, wreathed in the flames of dark blue Force.

Grind.

Every muscle in my body drew taut as a bowstring. My senses, sharper than ever, focused at my fingertips.

I sought the most destructive, most perfect path for the spear to take as it cut slowly through the air and plunged down.

Now.

With that thought, I sent White Flame hurtling toward the distant ground.

Whoosh!

A flash of light. Through the air warped by searing heat, a streak of dark blue flame slipped among the enemies near the wall.

Then came a roar like the sky splitting open.

BOOM!

A vast pillar of fire surged up along the wall, defying the heavy rain pouring down without end.

Beneath it lay ground soaked with the oil we'd poured out so freely—and the enemies' flesh and bones.

"Ghk, aaagh!"

"Keugh…!"

For better or worse, enemies who had barely escaped death were engulfed in flames and let out terrible screams.

Hundreds of them, at a rough count.

Maybe more.

But before the enormous roar that had shaken heaven and earth could even fade, my body was already dropping over their heads.

Bang! Bang! Ba-bang!

The air burst beneath my feet with each successive step.

The ground that had seemed impossibly far away rushed toward me. I reached into the empty air, where only wind and rain whipped past.

[3820] A jang is a traditional length of ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Inventory open. Summon.

Ding.

A System notification sounded, and something solid filled my empty hand. The enemies who had rushed toward the spot where I was descending from the sky stared wide-eyed.

“What the—”

Shhk!

One stroke, two halves.

The enemies proved those four words with their lives as their bodies split left and right.

A fountain of blood, vivid red even beneath the dark sky, spurted up. Madness glinted in the eyes of the enemies, already losing their focus.

“Heaven above and earth below, all demons bow!”

“Attack!”

Shh-shh-shhk!

A wind of blades swept in, colder than the rain.

The enemies had me surrounded on all sides, from every direction, and rushed in without regard for their lives.

Like moths drawn helplessly toward a flame.

Shhk!

Sharp Sword Energy slashed in from all sides.

Every streak was blood-red and looked dangerously unstable, as though its wielder had reached into a realm he had no business touching. Yet their power and speed rivaled a Peak master’s.

I still remembered seeing the same thing before.

Temporary Strength Pills.

A person’s final flame, fed with their own life.

I knew how tremendous the pills’ effects were, even if they lasted only a short time. Their danger matched their power.

I also knew that their hastily stacked kindling couldn’t match the heat of the furnace I’d built by surviving countless brushes with death.

Thump!

To conserve my strength, I hadn’t put so much as a trace of internal energy into the blow.

It was enough.

My body had already surpassed human limits by several steps. My senses, honed in the face of death, made it possible.

Grrk.

The Dark Heaven follower clutched at his throat, split open in an instant. By then, I'd already passed him and leaped toward the others.

Whoosh!

Half a step left.

Three streaks of Sword Energy missed me by a hair and tangled in midair. The rough broad-bladed saber that had been rusting in Xining's armory left my hand.

Wham!

Without an ounce of internal energy behind it, the blade spun with sheer, terrifying force and cut through three necks.

No—it smashed through them.

At the same time, a command rang out in my mind, and new blades appeared in both hands.

A straight sword in my left. A narrow-bladed sword in my right.

They were unfamiliar. Yet somehow, impossibly familiar.

Shreeeek! Thud-thud!

Just the right amount of strength and speed, guided by movements that followed the flow of battle.

I fell into a Trance and swept through the enemies beneath the wall. Each swing of my sword and saber brought blood and screams. With every step, corpses spread beneath my feet like a carpet.

Come.

I spared even the single breath I might have let out without thinking.

With that single thought, I cut down the enemies surging at me from every direction. I cut and kept cutting.

I dodged a thrusting sword and pierced its wielder's heart with the narrow-bladed sword. With nothing but a straight sword gone red with rust, I controlled the blades of five swords imbued with Sword Energy.

Clang-clang-clang!

I pressed against the flats of their blades and twisted. That was enough to knock the swords into one another in a tangle and cut off their wielders' breath.

Strength when strength was needed. Softness when softness was needed.

When the narrow-bladed sword broke, I summoned an axe from the nearly infinite storeroom of my Inventory. With the broken straight sword, I wielded a blade technique infused with the principles of the Flame Divine Palm.

Even I couldn't understand it. In that moment, I was free of every restriction and limit.

And suddenly, I understood.

So that's what he meant.

Jeok Cheongang had once told me that when one's understanding of martial arts reached a certain realm, every living, moving thing became a martial art.

Even a weak, bending reed would be no different from a Divine Sword.

Of course, I hadn't reached that realm. But at last, I felt I could faintly grasp what he'd meant.

Shhk!

With the sensation of death running through my fingertips, I started to turn toward another enemy—then blinked.

There was no one. Everything was quiet.

The Dark Heaven followers who had taken Temporary Strength Pills. The enormous monsters that could no longer be called human.

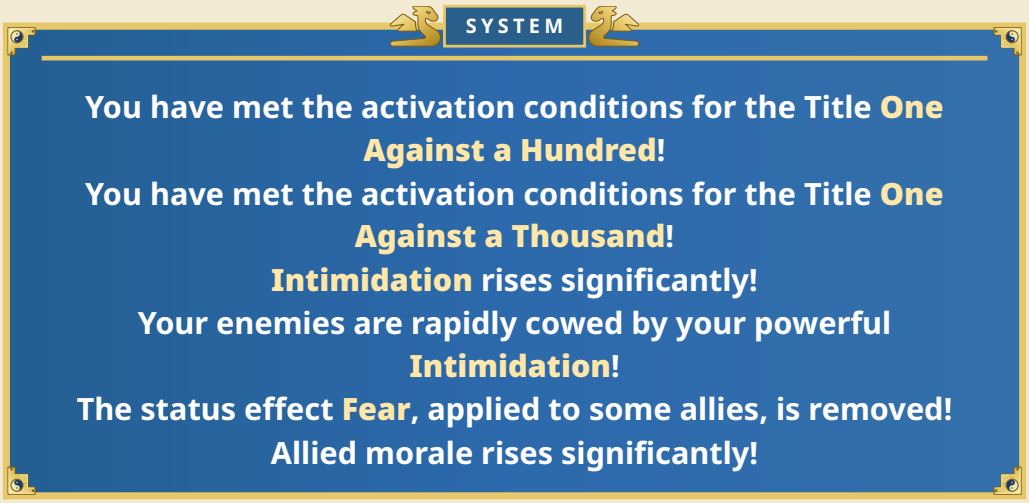
Beneath the western wall, I was the only one left standing on two feet.

The blood-soaked scene before me meant one thing.

I had wiped out the enemy vanguard, at least a thousand strong.

All by myself.

Ding. Ding. Ding.



System notifications poured into my ears like a dam breaking. A tremendous cheer erupted from atop the wall.

Then—

BWOOOOO!

A horn sounded with a deep note that made me shudder. At its call, Dark Heaven's main force—some hundred thousand strong—began advancing toward the city walls.

And I realized what their movement meant.

"…!"

The monsters.

No—the giants.

Each stood well over a jang[3821] tall. Their corpses had already piled halfway up the wall.

[3821] A jang is a traditional length of ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Chapter 1102

Looking back over the whole of human history, sieges had always overwhelmingly favored the defenders.

If you wanted to take what belonged to someone else, you had to pay a fitting price.

An attacking force needed at least three times as many soldiers to capture an ordinary castle or fortress. And even with more than that, the chances of losing a siege were still considerable.

To some people, though, that was nothing but old, rusted history.

"'Impregnable' is just nonsense left behind by weak losers."

Rumble.

A vast rumble rolled over the Blood Lord's low voice.

At that moment, Dark Heaven's enormous army advanced toward the city wall like a single wave, turning the once-green expanse of land pitch-black.

They would use the corpses of humans and monsters as footholds to scale that towering wall.

They would write a new history of their own.

The vanguard was annihilated faster than I expected…but it doesn't matter. As long as we take Xining and cut that bastard's throat.

Jin Taekyung, defending the West Gate, hadn't been the only one to stop the vanguard.

The Bow Saint and Slaughter Saint had defended the South Gate and East Gate, respectively, while the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, held the area around the North Gate. Four other Supreme Peak masters supported them from behind.

Yet even after thousands in the vanguard had vanished in reckless charges against the walls on all four sides, the Blood Lord remained unmoved.

This much loss is nothing if it means achieving my goal.

The monsters had been prepared for a moment just like this.

They would have been powerful assets in a battle on open ground, but the best use for an expendable asset depended on the situation.

Though he had lost nearly half the monsters, the Blood Lord was certain he'd made the right choice.

If he had sent ordinary followers—mere humans—out in front, they would have lost not thousands but tens of thousands before they could begin a proper siege like this.

"What about the mages? Are they all in their assigned positions?"

The Grand Sorceress nodded at the Blood Lord's sudden question.

The hundred or so mages under her command were a core part of their forces, no different from a modern magic corps. They also had a vital role in this battle.

Under the ironclad protection of their allies, they were to keep the Supreme Peak masters off balance.

“Keep up the pressure. Make sure they have to spend their strength without a moment’s rest.”

Even with an overwhelming advantage, the Blood Lord wasn’t letting his guard down.

The four Demon Lords and the Demon Empress who had already met their ends had taught him a valuable lesson. And even without them, the defenders were an impressive lot.

No fewer than eight Supreme Peak masters.

One of them, the fool they called Great Sir, seemed so far gone that it was hard to imagine he could even function. But so many powerful fighters had rarely gathered in one place, even during the countless battles of the Great Faction War.

No—for that matter, the total number of troops assembled on this battlefield might be unprecedented in the history of Murim.

That was why the Blood Lord couldn’t allow even the slightest variable.

Especially not the one person who had created more variables than anyone else, time and again.

Jin Taekyung.

His gaze grew deep and still.

In the distance, he saw the young man standing in the path of his charging followers, whose cries shook heaven and earth.

He saw the fountains of blood erupting ceaselessly around him, too.

Fwoosh!

With every flash, another life flickered out.

His movements had reached an astonishing realm: simple, swift, and utterly overwhelming.

And yet—

Nothing lasts forever.

Jin Taekyung was undoubtedly strong.

He might even be growing stronger, little by little, at this very moment.

But everything had its limits.

In the end, he’ll grow tired. Jin Taekyung, the Fire King, and all the other old men.

Unless the Blood Lord gave the order, the wheels of this enormous war of attrition, turning on the back of overwhelming numbers and strength, would never stop.

Not until the eight Supreme Peak masters—the defenders’ heads and hearts—were exhausted.

The Blood Lord sensed that moment was drawing near.

And he knew what he needed to prepare to cut Jin Taekyung's throat.

"From now on, the West Gate is mine alone."

The Grand Sorceress understood the meaning behind his sudden announcement.

"For some reason, that sounds like you're ordering me to leave. Am I imagining things?"

"That's exactly what it is. Your imagination."

"Then why should I leave the West Gate?"

"Do you need a reason? I'm the commander in chief."

"I know. I just have my doubts."

"Doubts? What exactly are you trying to say?"

"Well. For instance…"

The Grand Sorceress let her voice trail off. She looked from Jin Taekyung, fighting desperately to defend the western wall, to the Blood Lord.

"I worry that someone who's always claimed to be that person's most devoted servant might be a little too devoted—even to the point of defying his master's wishes."

It was as if she'd seen straight through him.

But the Blood Lord showed not the slightest hint of agitation.

He had considered that the Grand Sorceress might suspect his intentions from the moment he decided to kill Jin Taekyung.

"That's beyond imagining things. You're going senile. Do I look like an idiot who'd commit such an act of disloyalty?"

His reply was calm, without a trace of hesitation. The Grand Sorceress studied him for a moment, then shrugged.

"True. Disloyal is the last thing I'd call you. Though your loyalty has made you look like an idiot now and then."

In the past, the Blood Lord would have bared his teeth and snarled at that. But his mind was colder than ever.

"So, what's your answer?"

"Fine. Where should I go?"

"Take the South Gate."

"The South Gate? The Bow Saint?"

"I'll assign you three Black Ghosts. No, four. With that much force, even the Bow Saint won't have many options."

What the Blood Lord said was true, but the Grand Sorceress frowned.

"Black Ghosts? Four of them?"

Nine Black Ghosts had yet to enter the battle.

Even after one had been lost to the Fire King and Slaughter Saint's surprise attack, assigning her four was hard to understand. They retained all the martial prowess they'd possessed in life and could recover from almost any wound.

And it wasn't merely a question of her safety. Sending four to the South Gate would leave a gap in the forces available to break through the walls on all sides when the time came.

But her doubts vanished at the Blood Lord's next words.

"Don't hold back. You and the mages—press them hard. Once the Black Ghosts appear as well, the enemy will commit more of their strength to the South Gate."

The Grand Sorceress finally understood and let out a quiet laugh.

"So I'm bait to draw in the Fire King or the Slaughter Saint?"

"Half right, half wrong."

"What?"

"The Fire King won't go to the South Gate. He'll be busy greeting an unexpected guest."

The Blood Lord answered without hesitation. He turned his cold gaze toward the Dalai Lama, who had been watching the northern wall all this time.

"Isn't that right, Palace Lord?"

"…!"

The Dalai Lama's eyes trembled.

The moment of revenge he had waited so long for had finally arrived. Slowly, he parted his lips.

"What should this humble monk do?"

"Show that old man, the Fire King, the resentment and strength the Potala Palace has built through long years of endurance."

"I have waited my whole life for this moment alone."

The Dalai Lama pressed his palms together with heartfelt sincerity, then leaped atop a massive elephant.

"Come. The time has come to avenge our ancestors."

His quiet voice, infused with internal energy, carried on without end.

The Twelve Secret Monks, including two Supreme Peak masters, and the Potala Palace's ten thousand monks answered with a roar loud enough to make their ears ring.

Bwooooo!

A horn sounded, shaking the battlefield.

The great army of Tibet's Murim, now a single religious state, charged through the torrential rain toward the North Gate.

To trample the descendants of the Fire Gate Clan, sworn enemies with whom they could never share the same sky.

To offer the head of Jeok Cheongang, the current Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan and heir to that accursed lineage, before the spirits of their ancestors.

As the Dalai Lama's forces receded into the distance, the Grand Sorceress's voice reached the Blood Lord.

"Does that leave only the East Gate?"

"I'll send two Black Ghosts to the East Gate."

"Two? An awkward number. The Slaughter Saint might even take them down."

"But that won't happen. I'll order them to avoid a direct fight with the Slaughter Saint as much as possible and stick to a cautious attack."

"I take back what I said about the number being awkward."

The Grand Sorceress's lips curved softly beneath her veil.

"It's just the right number to let the Slaughter Saint leave his post to rescue the South Gate when it's in danger."

The Blood Lord gave a faint smile to match hers.

"And that will keep them from suspecting us."

If Dark Heaven sent no significant force to the East Gate, that alone would arouse suspicion.

But if they sent a substantial force and merely kept the pressure a little lighter, the troops at the East Gate, including the Slaughter Saint, would have some room to breathe. They would have time to look around.

Time to help their allies elsewhere, who would be on the verge of collapse.

The gap left at that moment would be the crack that brought down that massive, solid dam in an instant.

Whoosh!

Wind and rain whipped at the Blood Lord's clothes.

An ordinary person would have been soaked through and shivering from the cold that bit to the bone. The Blood Lord smiled and reached out his hand.

An east wind.

A fiercer east wind than ever was blowing along a tributary of the Yellow River.

And with it came more guests, riding the surging river waters to bring this battle to its grand finale after the Potala Palace.

Preee!

An eagle flew in from the east through the dark, rain-filled sky. It gave a powerful cry and landed on the Blood Lord's shoulder.

Bones showed white through its body in patches, and its blood-red eyes gleamed.

The Blood Lord knew what good news the eagle's arrival heralded. He stroked the hilt of the sword at his waist and murmured, "The time has come."

Chapter 1103

One Against a Thousand.

Just a few years ago, my life couldn't have been further from the meaning of those four words.

I'd scraped together some secondhand gear at a bargain price after a few rounds of haggling. I couldn't even afford a decent supply of the cheapest potions. The most I could handle was a few dozen small monsters in the dark, damp caves inside the subspaces known as Gates.

But a lot had changed since then.

More than I could put into words.

Thwack!

The rusty iron sword I swung on instinct sank into the crown of an enemy approaching from the side. His skull split, and bright red blood sprayed in every direction.

Plop.

A sticky, hot sensation brushed my cheek.

Once, that chilling touch would have made me flinch. Then the foul stench that crawled into my nose would have made me recoil again.

But that rookie Hunter, who'd thrown up at the horrible stench of blood he'd never smelled before, existed only in my memories now.

Thrust!

I drove my blade into the throat of an enemy charging straight at me, twisted it, and yanked it free. Blood poured from the gaping wound.

Grrk.

His body trembled as a wet rattle rose from his throat.

But to the fanatics, drunk on years of brainwashing and the strength of the Temporary Strength Pills, their comrade's gruesome death was martyrdom—and another chance to catch me off guard.

Shh-shh-shhk!

Blood-red Sword Energy rained down from every direction. The dense, destructive strands tangled together like a net and closed over my entire body.

Or at least, that was what it must have looked like to them.

Tap.

One step.

With that single step, the space between my enemies and me vanished.

I spun, and the iron sword in my hand traced a perfect, deadly arc.

Whoosh!

For an instant, the world seemed to stop.

The enemies realized that instead of retreating, I'd plunged straight into their midst. Their eyes slowly widened.

And then—

BOOM!

As the Sword Energy they'd already unleashed exploded, dozens of heads shot into the air like fireworks.

Shhk, fwoosh!

Red.

Everything I could see. The whole world.

Yet even now, every sense and every part of my body kept working without pause.

Whoosh.

Everything caught in the diagonal sweep of my sword split apart.

As I crossed the rising mound of corpses, sticky blood and screams—darker still—spilled around my feet.

Thwack! Thrust-thrust!

I cut, stabbed, and smashed without pause.

It didn't matter what I held.

An axe, a sword, even an oddly shaped weapon like a mace or a scythe—all of them were made to kill.

Crack!

A storm of blood and flesh swept through the air.

The weapons left to rust deep in Xining's armory became masterworks steeped in a craftsman's blood and sweat the moment they landed in my hands. They might break against Sword Energy, but they fulfilled their purpose to the end.

They took my enemies' lives, just as their owner intended.

…!

…!!

Shouts rang out from the enemies surrounding me and the allies on the wall above.

But I couldn't make out what any of them were saying.

My ears felt muffled, though my senses were sharp enough to catch every sound. The world before my eyes moved so slowly it was almost boring, yet every detail was clear.

I had no idea how many enemies I'd taken down or how many weapons I'd broken.

I was certain of only one thing.

Insight.

I was climbing toward another moment of enlightenment.

Wrapped in a fog of No-self, forgetting not only what was happening around me but even myself, I moved through a battlefield where life and death hung in the balance.

More. Just a little more.

As if bewitched, I kept repeating the words to myself.

At some point, everything around me had begun to feel hazy, like a dream.

A sensation I couldn't tell from pain or pleasure ran down my spine like an electric current.

I'd felt it before.

Now the Trance was more intense than ever, taking over my entire body.

Come.

As though they'd heard the quiet whisper in my mind, the enemies charged at me as one. They recited those eight words, that curse of a creed—"Heaven above and earth below, all demons bow!"—then roared and swung their weapons with all their might.

In the same instant, every one of them became a lonely soul.

Shhk. Shhk. Shhk.

Was this what the prophet in the old myths had been like?

Everything split apart as I strode forward without hesitation.

There was no sea before me, but the blood pouring from my enemies surged like waves. It was another kind of Red Sea.[3822]

And at the end of those red waves spilling away on either side, an insight awaited —one that would lift me to a higher level.

I can do this. I know I can.

Instinct spread over my fading reason.

Without looking, I dodged a blade swung at me from behind. With one stroke, I cut down five enemies charging from the side and the front.

But still, it wasn't enough.

I suddenly wanted this dreamlike sensation to last forever. This dream belonged only to me, and it was the sweetest sleep I'd ever known.

Even if I woke from it, I'd sell my soul just to see this story through to the end.

If I could make the insight drawing closer with every step my own, I could fall into this same sweet sleep whenever I wanted.

But then I remembered something I'd briefly forgotten.

If there was someone dreaming, then there was someone who could wake them.

Whooooooosh!

[3822] In the biblical book of Exodus, Moses parts the Red Sea to let the Israelites pass.

A sharp whistle cut through the distant echo that every other sound had become.

The ferocity in it, the enormous force drawing closer by the moment, dragged me out of my dream and hurled me into reality.

Along with someone's urgent, unfinished shout, suddenly bursting from somewhere in the open air.

"Dodge—!"

At that very moment—

Fwoosh.

The fog of No-self that had taken over my mind and body scattered in an instant.

No—it burst apart.

At the same time, a blood-red flash hurtled toward me from far away, its dazzling light staining my vision a thick red.

"…!"

My eyes widened. An alarm blared in my head, whispering:

Too late. You can't dodge it.

The flash was terrifyingly fast. Torn from that sweet sleep and thrown straight into reality, I couldn't move quickly enough to evade it.

Unlike the person who'd warned me half a beat earlier—who might have been watching over me all along.

Whoosh!

In the slowed-down world, I saw someone drop through the air.

A snow-white blade blocked the flash, which was already almost at my nose. Violet Sword Force scattered around it like flower petals.

Cheongpung.

The instant his name surfaced in my frozen thoughts—

BOOM!

A tremendous shock wave shook the air with a roar like the sky splitting apart.

Cough.

In the pale dust cloud that covered everything, Jin Taekyung gave a dry cough, blinked dazedly, and wondered:

Am I still alive?

The question had come to him suddenly. The answer came at once.

Pains large and small stabbed through his body like needles, accompanied by a System alert only he could hear.

No—warning sirens would be more accurate.

Beep! Beep-beep!

Trying to ignore the sirens drilling into his ears, Jin Taekyung struggled to his feet.

Pat-pat.

Stone dust slid off his body.

He felt heavy. Everything hurt.

Maybe it was because he'd suddenly woken from a Trance in which every sense had been pushed to its limit.

His body sagged like waterlogged cotton. But despite the barrage of warning sirens, he didn't seem to have any serious injuries.

He had the person who'd blocked the flash for him at the last moment to thank for that.

"Cheongpung."

His tired, cracked voice slipped past his lips. But in the dust cloud, so thick he couldn't see a hand in front of his face, all he heard were groans from people he couldn't identify.

"…Cheongpung?"

He called several more times. When no answer came, dread crept over him.

Jin Taekyung took a deep breath and swept out his arm, its sleeve already torn to shreds.

Boom!

Compressed air exploded outward. A gust imbued with internal energy drove away some of the dust, revealing what lay beyond it.

A gaping hole in the city wall, wide enough for five grown men to stand shoulder to shoulder. Allies lay sprawled all around it, groaning in pain.

But there was still no sign of Cheongpung.

Dammit.

Jin Taekyung clenched his teeth without realizing it.

Then he stretched out his hand toward the enemies charging through the ruins of the broken wall and the dust cloud.

More precisely, toward his beloved weapon, which lay behind them.

Vooooom.

His Middle Dantian opened. With a low hum, a spear buried deep in the ground shot upward and returned to its master's grasp.

It pierced every obstacle in its path.

Crack!

Blood spouted into the air.

Dozens of enemies, their spirits high as they charged, fell like rotten logs. In that brief opening, the allies formed ranks and fought with all their might to fill the gap.

Clang-clang!

Thrust!

“Gaaagh!”

“Hold them! Don’t let a single one through!”

“Cough—Archers! Where are the archers?”

Chaos spread in an instant.

Even as the melee broke out around the breached wall, Jin Taekyung cut down enemies with all his strength and shouted one person’s name.

“Young sir! Cheongpung!”

But no matter how keenly he strained his senses, there was no answer.

Only the screams and shouts of friend and foe rang out around him. That damned innocent voice was nowhere to be heard.

His heart pounded like thunder. With every moment, it grew harder to breathe.

…No way.

No. It couldn’t be.

Cheongpung—he wasn’t the kind of guy who’d go down this easily.

Like the hero in a fairy tale, he’d find some way to survive and live happily ever after.

Then why?

Why did this inexplicable dread keep growing heavier and darker?

“You… bastards!”

Jin Taekyung charged with a furious shout.

It was anger at the invaders who’d caused all this—but also blame directed at himself, the idiot who’d been consumed by a single-minded pursuit of enlightenment.

And the dazzling point of his spear, cutting through the enemy and raising a storm of blood, was drawing closer to one person approaching at a leisurely pace.

The Blood Lord.

Chapter 1104

Splash. Splash.

Footsteps crossed ground covered in blood, rainwater, and countless corpses. Each one landed with a peculiar weight.

Tens of thousands.

No—even on this vast battlefield, where friend and foe together numbered well over a hundred thousand, his presence was utterly overwhelming.

Vooooom.

Qi spread through the space around him with every step.

Even now, rain and arrows poured unceasingly from the sky, only to bounce off an invisible barrier of energy. The Dark Heaven followers charging toward the collapsed western wall split to either side and prostrated themselves.

As if bewitched, they murmured their eight-character creed.

“Heaven above and earth below.”

“All demons bow!”

It was reverence.

Reverence offered to the true ruler of this world, their god—and permitted only to the six Apostles he had personally favored.

The creed, begun with a few quiet murmurs, soon became a tremendous roar that swallowed the battlefield.

…!

…!!

A ripple became a current, then a wave sweeping in every direction.

The pounding rain, the thunder flashing between the dark clouds, even the arrows raining down to fill the sky—nothing could stop the creed pouring from their lips.

“Now! Attack!”

“Archers! Loose together!”

Shhk! Thud-thud-thud!

Blades flashed, and heads flew across the battlefield.

Nor was that all.

Severed arms and legs plunged into the mud. Arrows streaked in like flashes of light and buried themselves in backs and waists.

But that was all.

Even when their limbs were cut off, even when arrowheads pierced their backs and poked out through their chests, they stubbornly continued reciting the creed.

Right up to the moment death fell over them.

“Heaven above and earth below—cough. All demons bow…”

Thud.

Only after forcing out the last words, blood pouring from him, did the Dark Heaven follower die. The Kunlun Sect Daoist who had stabbed him through the chest stood with trembling lips.

"P-Primordial Heavenly Venerable.[3823]"

A wave of fanaticism beyond words.

And fanatics who didn't even fear death were everywhere.

No—every enemy darkening this vast battlefield was like that.

"This… What in the world is this?"

The words someone managed to squeeze out spoke for them all. They carried the utmost fear and horror a person could feel.

Splash. Clatter.

Weapons slipped from suddenly slack hands and sank into the mud.

For an instant, some of the Murim warriors and imperial troops lost their will to fight without even realizing it. Their trembling eyes stared blankly at the enemy.

They were afraid. So afraid they shuddered.

Not of some huge, savage monster, but of people who looked just like them.

Those mad fanatics, stripped of the joy, anger, sorrow, and pleasure every human being ought to feel, who followed only the Lord of Heaven with blind devotion.

And at their center, at the head of their ranks, walked a man wreathed in rippling, blood-red qi.

"What a bunch of worthless bastards."

His soft sneer revealed a row of white teeth.

At the same time, as the Blood Lord gently extended his fingertips, countless weapons that had been rolling across the ground rose upright.

No—they shot forward at their new master's command.

Toward the enemies frozen in place.

"You don't deserve to live."

At that moment—

Pa-pa-pa-pat!

Hundreds of weapons tore through the air at once.

A wave of steel swept through the ruins of the collapsed wall.

Those facing that blinding flash had no choice left. They weren't granted time to close their eyes, let alone draw one last breath.

All they could do was stare, eyes wide, at the death bearing down on them.

Then a streak of searing wind swept over their heads.

Gooooom.

[3823] The Primordial Heavenly Venerable is one of the Three Pure Ones, the highest deities in Daoism.

Space warped.

Terrifying heat and dark blue light-flames filled everyone's sight.

And at last—

Fwoosh—KRAAASH!

The wave of steel met a wall of fire.

They struck each other head-on, unleashing the unimaginable power held within them in a burst of blinding light and sound.

Rumble-rumble-rumble…!

Would a volcano, ripe to erupt and roaring awake from a long sleep, sound like this?

Would a storm like this sweep across the land if an ancient giant exhaled with all its might?

No one could say.

No one, that is, except the two people standing tall as iron towers in the fierce light and shock wave that heated and drove back everything within dozens of jang.[3824]

"Good. You, at least, deserve to live."

The Blood Lord brought the edge of his hand down as he murmured. The dust cloud coiling around the western wall split apart, revealing what it had concealed.

A young man, drenched from head to toe in blood and rain, stood perfectly steady, aiming a pure silver-white spear at him.

"Which is precisely why I can't let you live."

Admiration tinged the Blood Lord's voice as he regarded the young man.

"Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung."

At that moment, Jin Taekyung's tightly closed lips parted.

"Appreciate the sudden worship, but…"

Squelch.

He pulled out the shards of blades that had somehow pierced his body in several places as they flew through the wall of fire, then continued:

"No matter how I look at it, you don't deserve to live, you son of a bitch. That's why you have to die."

His voice was calm. Flames streamed from his eyes.

The Blood Lord gave a quiet laugh as he looked at him.

"Do you think you can do that? In your current condition?"

The Blood Lord wasn't exaggerating.

Jin Taekyung's appearance alone made him look like a man drenched in blood.

Given how many enemies he had cut down, that was only natural. But that didn't mean he'd come away unscathed.

[3824] A jang is ten ja, approximately 3.03 meters or 9.94 feet.

He was exhausted and injured, too.

So were the others now rising one by one behind his back, which stood as imposing as a mountain.

But Jin Taekyung wasn't afraid.

He had already been afraid enough.

He had acknowledged and accepted every negative feeling that had weighed down his body and mind.

And so he managed a faint smile even as the Blood Lord approached.

"Sure, you could think that. But you know something?"

"What are you talking about?"

"Your precious friends all pulled that same shit on me before they died."

"…!"

"That's what you call a death flag, you moron. Ah, would you even understand if I explained it?"

Jin Taekyung laughed. Whatever his words meant, the sneer vanished from the Blood Lord's face.

"But I'm different from those idiots. I gave up on the idea of halfheartedly letting you live long ago."

Fwoosh.

Blood-red qi rose in wisps with every step he took.

His red-glinting eyes reflected only Jin Taekyung.

"You die today. No question."

"Wouldn't the Lord of Heaven be upset to hear that? He must've been fond of you, raising you as his obedient little dog."

"He will understand. This choice I make today comes from loyalty alone."

"Is that so? Or is that just what you hope?"

"What?"

The Blood Lord stopped walking for an instant. Jin Taekyung's voice slid into his ear.

"You don't think he'll understand. You think you're screwed if he finds out, so you're going ahead and doing it anyway. You even sent the Grand Sorceress far away, just in case."

"…!"

"Why are you staring at me with those rabbit eyes? You look disgusting enough already. Anyone would think you'd been slapped awake from a good night's sleep. Hadn't you already got a rough picture of it in your dream?"

Crunch.

The Blood Lord clenched his teeth without realizing it.

It wasn't Jin Taekyung's relentless taunts that made him do it. It was the truth he'd tried to ignore, stabbing into his heart like an awl.

"You know perfectly well what your master—that damned Lord of Heaven—wants most."

He had to refute him.

That insolent brat was openly insulting the master he worshiped like a god and questioning his intentions. The Blood Lord should tear his mouth apart right now and rip out that wicked tongue.

But he couldn't refute him.

Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung.

The Blood Lord had a vague sense that everything coming from that impertinent mouth was true.

He didn't know when it had begun. He hadn't even been told why.

But everything that had led them here pointed to one painful truth.

"What your master wants most isn't the world. It sure as hell isn't the lives of hunting dogs he uses and throws away, like you."

Jin Taekyung's voice burrowed into his ears. The truth in it shook him to the core.

"It's me. Only me."

"…!"

"So go on, try to kill me. If I can screw the Lord of Heaven over by using you, I don't care how it happens."

At that instant, the Blood Lord's slowly reddening eyes turned completely bloodred, their white pupils swallowed up.

And countless corpses scattered across the ground within some ten jang[3825] convulsed and spewed blood.

Swoosh.

The blood mixed with rainwater writhed as if alive and gathered at one man's feet.

As he began walking again, it flowed together and joined, climbed his calves, and wrapped around his entire body.

No.

It was absorbed into him.

As if it had been part of him since the distant past.

Fwoosh.

Feeling an endless surge of vitality and strength rise from deep within him, the Blood Lord's eyes blazed red.

"I heard your last words."

[3825] A jang is ten ja, approximately 3.03 meters or 9.94 feet.

Jin Taekyung stared blankly at the sight he hadn’t expected. Then he smacked his lips.

“Uh, could I maybe say a little more?”

The Blood Lord answered that ridiculous question with a massive flash of blood-red light.

Whoooosh!

In an instant, the world turned red.

Chapter 1105

Was it because Xining had endured one foreign invasion after another over the years?

The four walls surrounding the city now ran a full ten ri[3826] in length, enclosing a vast area behind fortifications whose strength was rarely seen even in the Central Plains.

But everything had its advantages and drawbacks.

The walls had been reinforced little by little over time, making them better at keeping invaders out. They had also given the defenders far more ground to cover.

To communicate across those distances, the defenders relied on war drums and flags stationed along the walls.

But at this moment, the blood-red flash that suddenly erupted in the west rendered them all useless.

Fwoooosh.

Would it look like this if dozens—hundreds—of sunsets overlapped?

In the slowing world, countless eyes widened at a sight none of them could describe.

The soldiers on a dozen or more watchtowers, beating their assigned war drums and waving their flags with all their strength.

The people hiding in Xining's Inner City, clutching their families and peering through cracks in the doors.

The combined forces of the imperial troops and Murim warriors, fighting back the enemies surging toward them like waves—even the Supreme Peak masters at the heart and forefront of their ranks, cutting down enemy after enemy without pause.

And the moment they all felt a chill climb their spines—

Pop.

The blood-red flash rising over the western wall swelled.

No—it exploded in a vivid, horrifying burst of red light.

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

A roar left their ears ringing.

The ground shook. The entire stone wall trembled.

Then a colossal shock wave surged over the western wall and crashed down on the people frozen like statues.

"Watch out—!"

KA-BOOOOM!

[3826] In this Chinese setting, one li is about 500 m (0.311 mi); ten li is about 5 km (3.1 mi).

The rushing wind swallowed someone's single shout and swept across everything.

The North Gate was no different.

Dust, shattered rock, even blades that had lost their owners flew through the air. Everyone ducked and threw themselves toward cover.

Everyone except one man, still holding the front line.

Fwoosh—BOOM!

He drove out a fist, and flames burst forth, devouring the space before him.

Even that storm, like a natural disaster, bowed before the heat. Everything hurtling toward the defenders at the North Gate evaporated in an instant.

Shhhhh.

Ash drifted slowly away on the now-gentle breeze.

But the eyes of the man who had protected his allies from the unexpected threat—Fire King Jeok Cheongang—were more somber than ever.

…What in the world was that?

Though he held the chief seat among the Ten Kings, he had already reached a realm where he could stand shoulder to shoulder with the Three Saints.

He could feel it against his skin, with every one of his senses: the immense power contained in that distant blood-red flash.

And if the blast had reached the North Gate, more than two hundred jang[3827] away, what state must the West Gate—the source of it all—be in?

Blood Lord, how did you…?

Jeok Cheongang bit his lip without realizing it.

The Blood Lord's martial prowess had advanced unmistakably since their encounter at Mount Song. But what weighed on his heart was the voice of someone he couldn't stop thinking about.

"I'll take the West Gate."

Jin Taekyung.

When his Disciple had said that just before the battle, Jeok Cheongang had answered without a moment's hesitation.

"Absolutely not. Instead of spouting that nonsense, do one more complete circulation. And don't go getting yourself stabbed because you were fooling around."

"My internal energy's in great shape, and I can take a few stabs. So I'll take responsibility for the West Gate."

"I said no."

"Why not?"

[3827] One jang is ten cheok, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Two hundred jang is about 606 m (1,990 ft).

"You have to ask? That damned bastard has been mine for a long time. Today, I'll finally collect the blood debt from that day."

Jeok Cheongang's answer had been both true and untrue.

He did want revenge for Hong Dao, his old friend. But the more important reason was that the enemy's main force, including the Blood Lord, was stationed at the West Gate.

His Disciple was a reckless brat who'd long since thrown manners out the window. But he was his one and only Disciple.

He'd become more precious to Jeok Cheongang than anything else in the world. Jeok couldn't leave him alone in the most dangerous place.

Of course, Taekyung knew his Master far too well for Jeok Cheongang to hide that bashful concern behind roundabout words.

"There you go worrying again. You don't have to do that anymore."

"Worry? Don't be ridiculous. Just know that it's absolutely out of the question."

"I'll be fine. I have no intention of dying a pointless death. Do you think I'm crazy? I wouldn't be doing this if I didn't have something to count on."

"And what would that be?"

"You know already. As long as the Lord of Heaven wants me this badly, those guys can't lay a finger on me. Well, I might get a little hurt."

"That…"

Even Jeok Cheongang couldn't easily argue with that.

Ever since the incidents at Mount Song and Sichuan, powerful enemies—including the Southern Heaven Demon Empress—had been decidedly reluctant to take Jin Taekyung's life. The battle in Gansu had confirmed his suspicions.

Seeing his Master waver, Jin Taekyung drove in the final nail.

"No matter which gate I take, they'll follow me. I'm their most important target. So I might as well take the West Gate—it's the best-defended. Right?"

Every word he'd said had been right from beginning to end. In the end, Jeok Cheongang had no choice but to give in and head reluctantly to the North Gate.

But—

I shouldn't have done it.

Now he regretted that decision with all his heart.

He'd judged wrong.

The Blood Lord's martial prowess far exceeded anything he'd imagined, and Jin Taekyung, knowing exactly how his Master would react, had lied without batting an eye.

At this rate… that boy's in danger.

The attack they had all just witnessed could only have come from someone intent on killing.

So, though his body had grown young again, his heart was still that of an old man. Feeling himself grow impatient, Jeok Cheongang turned toward the west.

No—he was about to turn.

Until the next instant, when he sensed a sharp thread of killing intent shooting like a needle from beyond the wall.

"Where are you rushing off to, donor[3828]?"

The voice was low.

Yet the several jiazi[3829] of internal energy within it were enough to shake the area around the North Gate.

So was the terrifying aura emanating from the old monk standing atop a colossal elephant, the likes of which Jeok Cheongang had never seen even at the Nanman Beast Palace.

"If you leave now, donor[3830], I'll have come all this way for nothing."

His frame was tiny, his skin deeply wrinkled with age.

But his presence was like that of a giant, and Jeok Cheongang already knew who he was.

He also knew what it meant that this old monk—the Dalai Lama, Palace Lord of the Potala Palace—had appeared at the North Gate leading all those troops.

"…You planned this. From the beginning."

The words escaped him in a low groan.

Then the Dalai Lama spoke, turning his ominous suspicion into certainty.

"The Fire Gate Clan's line will end. Right here, today."

At that moment—

Bwaaaaaaa!

A war horn sounded. As the Potala Palace forces surged toward him, Jeok Cheongang gritted his teeth without realizing it.

Crack.

His lips went white. His nails dug deep into his skin, and hot blood ran from beneath them. His turmoil had no other outlet.

It wasn't too late.

He had to go. Even now.

To his Disciple. To Jin Taekyung.

But—

"P-Potala Palace! They've joined the battle!"

"Arrows! Bring more arrows!"

"Form a defensive line! Don't retreat, even if it costs us our lives!"

[3828] "Donor" translates siju, a Buddhist form of address for a layperson.

[3829] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

[3830] "Donor" translates siju, a Buddhist form of address for a layperson.

“Sir Jeok, we don’t have time to hesitate!”

Shouts and screams from every direction held him in place.

Eyes full of fear, resolve, or faith seemed to seize his hands and close around his throat. The urgent voice of Perfected Being Hyeoncheon, defending the North Gate alongside him, pierced his ears.

What would he have done? What would that boy have done?

Jeok Cheongang put the question to himself and squeezed his eyes shut.

In that brief, profound darkness, he recalled the conversation he’d had with his Disciple the day before.

“I never wanted to be a hero.”

“That doesn’t matter. You don’t become a hero just because you want to. You earn the right when the world calls you one.”

“Like people call you a Great Hero, Old Master?”

“What?”

“You just said it yourself. You didn’t set out to follow some great cause. You just went where your feet led you, where the wind took you, and before you knew it, people were calling you a Great Hero.”

“…!”

He remembered it clearly.

The bright smile Taekyung had given him when he was left speechless. His playful expression. His clear eyes.

Perhaps that was what Jeok Cheongang feared more than anything else.

Perhaps the thought that he might never see that face again had come first.

But when Jeok Cheongang had asked whether he was still afraid of the enemy, his Disciple had nodded without hesitation and added:

“Even so, I won’t turn away from that fear.”

Calm. Resolute.

And everything that had happened that day was the answer to the question Jeok Cheongang had just asked himself.

Fwoooosh.

In an instant, tremendous heat swallowed the space.

His eyelids rose slowly. His eyes glowed red with heat, blazing like flames.

He faced the Dalai Lama and the Twelve Secret Monks flying through the air toward him.

Toward the two Black Ghosts who had appeared, and the vast enemy army surging in behind them.

Grnnnnk.

As the space warped under the unbearable heat, the giant of fire roared with all his might.

“Come!”

As if he meant to burn the whole world.

“This old man is Jeok Cheongang, the eighteenth Sect Leader of the great Fire Gate Clan—the Fire King!”

He hoped his roar would reach his Disciple.

Chapter 1106

BOOM!

The flash that filled my vision was red as blood.

Pwoom!

Unfathomable power seethed in every strike.

Krrrunch!

The world kept turning upside down, then righting itself.

No—not the world. Me.

Fwooooooosh—BOOM!

A tremendous shock shot up my spine and spread through my entire body.

After dozens of exchanges in the space of a lightning flash, I ended up buried deep in the layered rubble of the wall.

Cough.

Blood surged up against my will and spilled past my lips.

A System warning chime sounded through the ringing in my ears. The pain coming from every part of my body told me the warning was real.

I'm sure I heard something.

I muttered it weakly to myself, remembering a familiar voice that had rung out somewhere in the distance just before the assault sent me flying.

But I must have imagined it.

One of those hallucinations that came to me every now and then when I was exhausted and hurting.

"…Damn it."

Blood kept welling up. My torn-up hands tingled.

Even so, I forced my aching body upright with a quiet curse.

No. I had to.

If I didn't stop that monster, none of the thousands of allies risking their lives to defend the West Gate could.

Splash. Splash.

Heavy footsteps approached, neither fast nor slow.

With every step, the blood swirling ankle-deep in the downpour trembled like a living thing.

Shhhhhh.

It was enough to chill anyone who saw it.

Hundreds of snakes, red from head to tail, seemed to slide across the surface of the water.

And at the end of their eerie advance stood a monster, ready to take in more power.

Hssss.

The blood seeped into his skin as though it had never existed outside him.

Then the monster's eyes blazed a fiercer red through the pounding rain.

They were fixed on one person among the countless allies frozen like statues.

Me.

"Didn't I tell you?"

His low voice reached me clearly.

The monster of blood had absorbed every drop within a radius of more than a hundred feet, devouring the life and strength it held. He gazed at me, eyes bright with delight.

"You can never be my equal. No one on this battlefield can."

Veterans who'd survived for years in Murim, a mountain of sabers and a forest of swords, had a saying.

Too much confidence became conceit and arrogance. Go further still, and it became hubris. Those were the feelings a martial artist had to guard against most.

And if an enemy fell prey to them, you seized on that weakness to find a way out alive.

The advice had been passed down among martial artists like a maxim. Jeok Cheongang had often told me much the same thing.

But—

This isn't conceit.

I knew it instinctively.

No—I was facing that monster myself. I knew better than anyone.

This wasn't arrogance or hubris. It was certainty.

A certainty even I, who had created more possibilities and variables than anyone under heaven, couldn't deny.

The monster who had become the Blood Lord in the truest sense approached, crushing everything around him with power and presence greater than anyone else's on this battlefield.

Krrr.

The air trembled. The ground shook.

Neither the torrential rain nor the arrows loosed by archers who'd scraped together their courage atop the parts of the wall still standing could touch a hair on his head.

They had only irritated him.

Vmmmm.

The hundred or so arrows that had stopped above the Blood Lord's head as though caught by an invisible hand trembled. Then their points turned.

Toward the insects who deserved to die for daring to bar the path of a monster who had drawn close to the absolute ruler.

"Get out of the way!"

The warning burst from my lips on instinct.

Fwhoosh! Thud-thud-thud!

The arrows streaked through the air in a flash, their fierce whistle merging into one.

Through the shield-bearers protecting the archers with iron-plated shields. Through the archers sheltering behind them.

Through everything in their path.

Thud.

The unit commander at the front was the first to drop to one knee.

The others stared blankly at one another.

Eyes wide with disbelief, they looked back and forth between the huge holes in their bodies and the monster standing hundreds of feet away. Then they breathed their last.

"T-This can't be…"

Thump. Clatter.

One by one, bodies fell onto the ground slick with blood and rain.

Some stumbled backward in terror. Some tried to advance, refusing to accept that they were dying. Some crumpled where they stood without even a final cry.

They met death in different ways, but not one escaped it.

They all died.

Two hundred of our allies—archers, shield-bearers, even martial artists.

In a single instant.

Slide. Splash!

Someone whose name I didn't know rolled down from the wall and landed in a pool of blood.

"Heaven above and earth below."

In the suffocating silence that settled over everything, Dark Heaven's followers had entered past the broken ranks and wall ruins that had crumbled with the Blood Lord's arrival. As if bewitched, they began reciting their creed.

"All demons bow!"

They no longer shouted.

The killing intent they'd given off while struggling to cross the wall was gone, too.

Shhk!

They simply swung the blades in their hands without a word.

“Heaven above and earth below…!”

Rapture filled their faces as they marveled at the miracle before their eyes.

“All demons bow…!”

They praised the one ruler who wasn’t on this battlefield, yet could bring all under heaven to its knees from within that deep darkness.

Even if death awaited them.

Crunch!

“Hea—khhk. Lord of Heaven.”

Even when a stray blade cut their throats, when their arms and legs were severed, when their chests were pierced, they never lost the smiles etched across their lips.

The dozen fanatics charging at me without a hint of fear were no different.

“A-at last. The glory of martyrdom…”

Stab! Krrrunch!

In the end, humans were made of flesh. Once their heads were gone, they couldn’t speak.

It didn’t matter whether they’d taken a Temporary Strength Pill, drawing on strength beyond their limits at the cost of their lives, or swallowed anything else.

But why?

I’d swung my hand like a blade and taken their heads off in one stroke, yet I could still hear their unfinished words.

Over and over. Without a moment’s pause.

“These… crazy bastards.”

The curse slipped out between breaths that had somehow grown ragged.

It felt as though every drop of blood in my body had turned to ice.

I’d thought I’d seen and dealt with enough lunatics to last a lifetime.

The twenty-first-century world I’d been born and raised in had its own kind of barbarity, different from Murim’s.

Skyscrapers soared above the clouds. More than half a century had passed since humanity first ventured into space. A civilization combining cutting-edge science and Magic had grown brighter and more powerful than ever.

But none of that changed a thing.

The modern world was still full of madmen.

People were murdered in broad daylight. Judges’ gavels and reporters’ cameras swayed under the weight of money and liquor.

And that wasn’t all.

Dictators, relics of a bygone age, prepared for wars—and started them.

Plenty of people tried to bridge the distance between their religions and sects with missiles and terror instead of forgiveness and reconciliation.

In the world I'd seen, they were all fanatics.

Madmen who'd lost their minds by attaching themselves blindly to their own goals. They saw and felt only what they wanted, swaying as they got drunk on it.

Of course, the most extreme had been the fanatics who followed the Doppelganger. But now I could say this with certainty.

The madness I'd seen in them, in both its scale and its purity, was nothing next to that of the Dark Heaven followers before me.

And at the center of this bloody storm of madness, a monster came hurtling forward with the momentum of a great mountain.

"Have you ever seen moths?"

I could feel it.

The Blood Lord was at ease, but he hadn't let his guard down.

His red eyes were fixed solely on me, as though he had no interest in the battles raging around us. They brimmed with certainty and killing intent.

"I have. Countless times, before the Tianshan Mountains fell under that person's control. I saw those foolish things fly toward torches and burn to death."

I didn't answer.

Instead, I drove the shaft of White Flame, still in my grip, deep into the ground at my feet. Then I kicked up the weapons strewn around me and sent them flying at him.

Fwooooooosh—BOOM!

Krrrunch!

The blades, wreathed in Force, cut through the air one after another. Then an immense shock wave slammed into the space around them with a deafening roar.

Not where I'd aimed—the Blood Lord—but somewhere in the air and ground.

"But one day, while watching the moths, a question occurred to me."

The Blood Lord swung his Red Blade at lightning speed, casually knocking aside everything flying toward him, and continued in a clear voice.

"Did they fly toward the torch knowing they would burn to death? Or did they fly toward it because they didn't know?"

Crunch!

I cut down the enemies charging at me from every direction. After the wall, our ranks were now collapsing fast, too.

The fanatics came on crying out for martyrdom. The sight of them—and the wave of fear they stirred up—was overpowering even the effect of One Against a Thousand.

“I still haven’t found the answer. No—I never bothered looking. It wasn’t long before I met that person and gained enough power that I had no need to wonder how moths felt.”

At that moment—

Whoooooom!

The Blood Lord lifted his Red Blade high. A massive Force surged along its scarlet edge.

An energy unlike anything I’d ever seen—or imagined could exist.

“But I think you might know the answer.”

Certainty in himself.

Killing intent sharp as a blade. Hatred beyond anger. The elation of finally achieving his purpose.

All of it—every feeling, every ounce of his aura and power—was directed at me.

My breath caught. My hand trembled.

But I was ready.

I’d prepared the best strike I could manage. Perhaps my last.

I took a deep breath and said what had been on the tip of my tongue.

“I’m not one of them.”

“What?”

“I’m the kind of bastard who doesn’t burn to death even if he flies into the flames. Who flies in first whether he knows what’ll happen or not. That’s me.”

“…!”

The silence felt like an eternity, though it lasted only an instant.

At its very end, the Blood Lord answered.

No—he moved.

So did I.

Pop.

More than a hundred feet of space vanished between us in an instant, and his Red Blade carved a massive blood-red line.

Chapter 1107

Murim warriors spend their whole lives lingering at the crossroads of life and death.

Some live out their natural years thanks to their skill and the luck they were born with. Others get dragged into some petty squabble and die like dogs in an instant.

That was probably why.

They lived closer to death than anyone, so they'd even coined a grand term like life-and-death duel, trying to make their own uncertain end sound a little more solemn.

But at some point, I realized that no matter how many flowery words people used, or how many valorous titles they bestowed on one another, the nature of it never changed.

In the end, this was just a fight.

Each person gave everything they had to bring down the opponent in front of them, driven by their own cause, circumstances, or private feelings.

It could be fair. It could be unfair.

That was why it was a fight.

A simple, straightforward process: the one who was even half a step faster, ten geun[3831] stronger, and far more ruthless and calculating won.

And I knew that very well.

I knew how wide the gap was between my opponent and me. I knew the best I could do right now.

And the worst, too.

Watching the Blood Lord cross a dozen or so jang[3832] through the slowed world, I muttered to myself.

Did I regret this choice? Was I afraid of dying?

I didn't know.

More precisely, I didn't have enough time to answer.

Even in the sluggish flow of time, the Blood Lord moved like a flash of light—and I was definitely slower.

Half a step.

No. At least a full step stood between us now, a gap I could never close. It was an iron wall.

So there was nothing else I could do.

I could only charge at him like a moth.

[3831] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten geun is 6 kg (13.2 lb).

[3832] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten cheok, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). A dozen jang is about 36 m (119 ft).

Before that torch, reeking of blood, swallowed everyone, I had to put it out with one last beat of my wings, giving it everything I had.

Grnnk.

Every muscle in my body contracted at once.

At the same time, the internal energy I had left—less than a third—surged from my Lower Dantian to my Middle Dantian, then awakened the hundreds of large and small acupoints and the Eight Extraordinary Meridians lying dormant in my body.

Hoo.

I was so hot I felt as if I'd become a fire dragon myself. If I opened my mouth and roared, lava might pour out.

But I couldn't do that.

I had only one chance to let that lava loose.

It wouldn't be my first time, but it was all but certain to be my last.

The System warning chime that suddenly pierced my ears seemed to say as much.

Beeeeeeep.

Slowed along with the passage of time, it stretched into a long ringing, like the flatline of a heart monitor announcing a patient's cardiac arrest. That hardly seemed an exaggeration.

One Annihilation.

The colossal mass of lava boiling up from deep within me held enough destructive power to turn even me to ash.

Fwoooosh.

Heat slowly surged outward, warping the space around me.

Flames that had seared my Lower Dantian, Middle Dantian, hundreds of acupoints, and Eight Extraordinary Meridians layered themselves over the spearhead.

All for one final chance.

This is it. The only way to bring him down.

Of course, this wasn't the first time I'd used One Annihilation against the Blood Lord.

During the Shaolin Bloodshed, he'd taken the full force of it and still gotten back up, thanks to his incredible regenerative ability.

But an almost unfathomable gulf separated the me who'd been stuck at the Peak realm back then from the me I was now.

One Annihilation had grown just as much—powerful enough to devour even its wielder's life.

Unlike last time, he won't get back up.

One blow would render even the Blood Lord's terrifying recovery useless.

Blue-black flames that would turn his body and even his soul to ash in an instant flickered along the spearhead of White Flame, drawn far back. And then—

Fssssss.

A sudden chill crept down my spine.

What was this feeling?

I was the archer. My body was the bow, and the string was already drawn all the way back.

All I had to do was let go.

All I had to do was thrust my spear at the Blood Lord, now just one jang[3833] away, as if to blow up the whole world—and it would all be over.

Then why, at the most important moment, had this inexplicable sense of wrongness come over me?

Fear of the death that was all but certain now?

Regret for the life I'd lived and the people I'd leave behind?

Or my life flashing before my eyes as I sensed the end?

No.

That wasn't it.

This feeling was different from any of those I'd experienced before.

It was a warning.

A signal from the other me—the one that followed nothing but instinct.

And at last, the moment reason and instinct met inside me—

…!

…!!

Time, held back until now, and everything around me—the noise and the surroundings—came crashing down all at once, like a massive wave breaking through a dam.

Through it all, a blurred afterimage flashed between the Blood Lord and me as we shot toward each other.

Fwoooosh!

From outside my field of vision came a fierce whistle, cutting through the wind and rain.

I realized too late that someone was there, clad from head to toe in pitch-black armor. No—something.

The blood in my body turned cold.

Black Ghost…!

So that was it.

[3833] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten cheok, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). A dozen jang is about 36 m (119 ft).

That was what the unease I'd felt earlier meant.

The card the Blood Lord had kept hidden until the very end. He had grown stronger than before, and his planning had grown sharper still.

He planned it. He'd been waiting for this moment from the start.

The realization struck like lightning through my skull.

Only then did I understand.

It wasn't the Blood Lord who'd let his guard down. It was me.

The other side could learn from past mistakes, too.

Despite his inhuman regenerative ability and overwhelming martial prowess, the Blood Lord had waited for One Annihilation until the very last moment, then put the Black Ghost he'd kept hidden in front of him as a shield.

As if he wouldn't allow even the smallest variable.

And the price of my carelessness was shoving me hard in the back, right at the edge of a cliff.

There was no other way.

I'd already come too far to turn back.

"Damn it."

With no choices left, I spat out the curse I'd been holding back and thrust my spear forward. My entire past and future rested on its tip.

Gooooom.

Space warped.

The fire dragon's flames let out a tremendous roar, flooding everything I could see in blue-black.

At the last moment, as that dreadful heat was about to devour everything in its path, a streak of light swept past the Black Ghost like an apparition.

Shhk.

A faint sound of air being cut—so faint I wouldn't have heard it if my senses hadn't been sharper than ever.

And it wasn't an apparition or a hallucination.

One Annihilation.

When that terrifying strike—the one that had briefly cornered him in the not-so-distant past—shot toward him, the Blood Lord thought:

It's over.

Certainty in a life-and-death duel was no different from poison.

But even he, who'd endlessly turned over the final moments of the four Demon Lords and the Demon Empress who had fallen to Jin Taekyung, couldn't help feeling certain now.

Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung.

His sickening history with that damned brat, who made him feel foul just to think about, ended here.

The plan was perfect. It was as good as done.

You'll never kill me.

There was no mistaking it: Jin Taekyung had grown beyond recognition.

And so, the Blood Lord had no doubt that the strike he couldn't begin to understand had grown terrifyingly powerful, too.

It had become so powerful that even the Blood Lord, who now considered himself all but immortal, had thought of death when he felt the unprecedented energy wrapped around the spearhead.

But this was as far as it went.

The lion uses all its strength, even when hunting a rabbit.

Even a predator gives everything it has to catch a single rabbit.

It had taken the loss of an arm and a long period of humiliation for the Blood Lord to learn that lesson and put it into practice. But thanks to that, he could avoid the sharp teeth the rabbit had hidden.

The one Black Ghost he'd kept by his side for this moment alone.

He'd sent as many as eight Black Ghosts to the three gates other than the West Gate, then entered through the breached wall alone. It was all to pin down the enemy and make that brat let his guard down.

So Jin Taekyung would focus solely on him.

So he would believe the Blood Lord was his only enemy.

And the Blood Lord's plan had worked.

No—more accurately, he thought it had worked.

The vast flames bursting from the spearhead swallowed the space around them. At that moment, a streak of light flew in from somewhere and swept past the Black Ghost that had moved between Jin Taekyung and the Blood Lord at his command.

Shhk.

…What?

A ripple of shock disturbed the Blood Lord's unwavering gaze.

His eyes trembled, then slowly turned to the Black Ghost's neck as it rose into the air.

In the gap between the two halves of its body, separated by empty space, a handful of purple Force scattered like flower petals.

That's…

There was no mistaking it.

That distinctive light, spreading like plum blossoms or the colors of the sunset, belonged to the Zaha Divine Technique alone.

Staring blankly at the scene, stunned as if the world had stopped, the Blood Lord remembered a face he'd momentarily forgotten.

The man bore a striking resemblance to the one who had taken his arm. Yet he'd vanished from the battlefield so anticlimactically that he'd hardly seemed worthy of inheriting that man's teachings.

But before the Blood Lord could speak the other brat's name, the blue-black flames swallowed the Black Ghost's body without a trace—and engulfed him.

KWA-AAAAA!

A colossal pillar of fire surged upward, sweeping across heaven and earth.

Chapter 1108

He was dead.

No—he'd thought he was dead.

Fifteen minutes earlier, the young man who had rushed in front of Jin Taekyung, lost in a Trance and unable to sense the danger, had been certain he was about to die.

But he hadn't.

A blood-red flash charged with an unprecedented force had struck him, followed by a tremendous impact that battered his entire body.

When he finally opened his eyes, clinging to the thread of consciousness that had briefly been severed, the young man buried beneath a pile of stones—or rather, Cheongpung—muttered to himself:

This is the most dangerous thing I've ever been through… No, it isn't.

If this had happened before—more precisely, if he hadn't gone through what happened on Mount Song—he might have trembled with fear.

Overwhelmed by the terror of death, something he'd never experienced before, and frozen by the killing intent and madness he'd never felt amid the clear streams and plum blossoms of Lotus Peak, he might have been unable to move.

But—

I have to move.

Things were different now.

The child who had wandered through Huashan's beautiful scenery had entered the martial world and learned how to run.

He'd faced the world's ugliness and learned what anger felt like. He'd spent time with good people and come to understand what it meant to do right by others.

So even knowing that countless threats and hardships awaited him, he could rise again.

That was the right path his grandfather had raised him to follow. It was the chivalry he had learned from watching Jin Taekyung.

Go. To my Benefactor. To them.

Cheongpung pushed himself to his feet, unsteady.

He shoved aside the stones weighing down his body and endured the pain of bones broken here and there, moving slowly.

And more stealthily than ever before.

"You want me to teach you martial arts?"

Perhaps it was the blood trickling from the large and small wounds etched across his body. In his wavering vision, a conversation he'd once had with the Slaughter Saint seemed to echo in his ears.

“Do you even know what you’re asking?”

“Uh, I think so.”

“Unbelievable. The Sword Saint’s Disciple, of all people, wants to become a mere assassin.”

“Huh?”

“You idiot. I don’t practice martial arts. I practice the art of killing. It’s not for someone like you.”

Back then, the Slaughter Saint had shaken his head with a bitter smile.

At least, until he heard Cheongpung’s reply.

“Huh. I don’t think so.”

“What?”

“My grandfather told me it’s not the tool that matters, but the person holding it. And there was an assassin I saw a long time ago who didn’t seem like the kind of person who’d hurt someone for no reason.”

“…!”

“Oh, and he said everyone I cross paths with in this world could become my teacher and Benefactor.”

“…You.”

“Please take care of me, Granduncle!”

Remembering how the Slaughter Saint had silently watched him, then spoken with an expression that grew complicated, Cheongpung let out a quiet breath.

Hoo.

His heart, pounding from pain and blood loss, grew calm. The blood flowing from his wounds gradually stopped, and he erased all trace of his presence.

“It won’t be easy to master even one technique. You don’t have the time, and the situation won’t allow for it.”

“Wow, so you’re saying yes, right? You are, aren’t you?”

“Damn it. Fine. But I have one condition.”

“A condition?”

“Never call me that again.”

“Yes, Little Master!”

“Damn it.”

“Oh. Sorry, Granduncle.”

“…Where in the world did the Sword Saint pick up a lunatic like you?”

The Slaughter Saint probably hadn’t known.

Before even a month of their journey had passed, he would ask that question again—but mean something entirely different by it.

“…Where in the world did the Sword Saint pick up a lunatic like this?”

“Grandpa said a stork brought me. My Benefactor said it was ovulation, fertilization, and implantation, but I couldn’t make heads or tails of it.”

“…I really can’t understand.”

“Right? I’d never heard such bizarre words in my life.”

“…It’s my first time, too. Seeing anything this bizarre.”

The Slaughter Saint’s bewildered face rose before Cheongpung’s eyes.

At the same moment, Cheongpung’s feet, now as light as feathers, touched a pool of blood.

No—they barely brushed it.

Shhk.

Ghost Illusory Slaughter Step.

The unique footwork technique created by the greatest assassin of all time—so stealthy that no other technique under heaven could match it—unfolded beneath Cheongpung’s feet.

“You were right, Granduncle. This really isn’t easy.”

“…Is that something someone who reached three-tenths mastery in only a month should be saying?”

It was the unique technique of none other than the Slaughter Saint, known as the greatest assassin of all time.

And yet Cheongpung had mastered Ghost Illusory Slaughter Step at a dazzling speed.

For someone else, a month might have been only a month. For him, it was a whole month.

“I like martial arts. A whole, whole lot.”

“That much I know… This is driving me mad. How is this even possible?”

It was possible.

To Cheongpung, all of it came as naturally as breathing.

He watched with his eyes and moved with his body, and before he knew it, the technique became his.

Not merely copied: it was reborn with Cheongpung’s own character woven into it, a new martial art that belonged to him alone.

Whoosh.

Cheongpung moved forward.

His steps were neither fast nor slow. With each one, it seemed that the fragrance of plum blossoms, perceptible only to him, spread through the air.

Dark Fragrance Drift.

The fragrance of Huashan’s plum blossoms spread through the pouring rain.

Joined with Ghost Illusory Slaughter Step, which Cheongpung had brought to nine-tenths mastery over the past six months with the Slaughter Saint, it had grown quieter and more elusive still.

So much so that even with both eyes open, no one could clearly make out his presence.

Shh-shh-shh-shhk!

“Graaagh!”

Stab! Slice!

“Heaven above and earth below; all demons—Guh!”

The fighting all around had spun beyond anyone’s control, yet no one properly noticed Cheongpung slipping past them.

As he crossed the heart of the battlefield, he blended naturally into everything around him.

He was the rain falling ceaselessly over everyone’s heads. He was a Dark Heaven fanatic, drunk on madness and the effects of a Temporary Strength Pill—and he was one of the martial artists and soldiers trying to stop them.

He was a part of this chaotic battlefield, and the battlefield itself.

Moving in only one direction, toward only one person.

Benefactor.

Cheongpung saw him.

Gooooom.

Space warped as if gripped by an invisible hand. Jin Taekyung was about to unleash an appallingly immense force all at once.

The Blood Lord was charging toward him, while a pitch-black figure lunged from his blind spot as though it had been waiting for this very moment.

Too late.

His instincts whispered it to him.

It was a shame, but this wasn’t enough.

Cheongpung had neither the strength to bring down the Blood Lord nor the time.

But—

He can do it. My Benefactor can.

That wasn’t a guess. It was certainty.

His faith in Jin Taekyung didn’t waver in the slightest.

So Cheongpung shot forward without hesitation.

Toward the enormous flames erupting in a blinding flash.

Toward the Black Ghost, which had thrown its own body in the way as a shield to counter that unprecedented force.

Fwoosh.

Time slowed. Space disappeared.

Just before One Annihilation was unleashed, a flash slipped between his tightly shut eyelids and pierced his retinas like a needle.

But Cheongpung could feel it clearly.

The Black Ghost at the end of his path.

The single line his strike was drawing toward that pitiful being.

And then—

Shhk.

The moment he passed the Black Ghost with a cut almost too quiet to hear, a lightning-like shiver surged up his spine.

A shiver that wouldn't fade, not even in the dreadful heat swallowing the space he had just crossed.

I did it.

At the same moment, a colossal fire dragon swallowed the Black Ghost's body as it tilted helplessly.

No—more precisely, it swallowed the blood-red monster charging from behind it.

KWA-AAAAA!

Even as the overwhelming shock wave swept him away, Cheongpung laughed aloud.

He watched the Red Blade shatter beneath the pillar of fire that had finally burst forth.

But he didn't know.

At that very moment, one person was watching the blue-black flames dye everything around them.

Jin Taekyung's face had gone colder than ever.

Cough.

His skin had gone deathly pale, his eyes growing cloudy.

Yet even as he coughed up a doe[3834] of blood, Jin Taekyung forced his heavy eyelids open and watched the wave of fire he had unleashed.

He took in the surest information he could get—something only he could hear.

Beep! Be-be-beep!

He'd poured everything he had into that strike.

With a body emptied of strength and senses gone dry, he tried to understand what was happening.

But he couldn't see or hear.

It wasn't in any of the countless holographic windows floating before him. It wasn't among the System warnings sounding without pause in his ears.

The clear chime announcing the enemy's death never came.

[3834] A doe is a traditional Korean measure of volume, approximately 1.8 liters (0.48 US gal).

Not even as his legs gave way beneath him, the spear shaft the only thing keeping him upright.

Splash.

And as Jin Taekyung's knees plunged into a pool of blood—

Drip. Drip.

From within the wave of fire that had engulfed a radius of dozens of jang,[3835] the monster's charred body rose to its feet.

Thirst.

That was the first thing the Blood Lord felt when he regained consciousness.

What the hell happened?

He didn't know. He couldn't know.

He remembered nothing.

He couldn't even recall who he was or what kind of life he'd lived.

Only the instinct to quench this terrible thirst remained, controlling his body.

Scuff.

His unsteady footsteps sounded as dry as if he were walking through a desert.

Why?

The Blood Lord wondered blankly.

He'd been sure there was something somewhere around here that could quench his thirst.

He'd been sure of it.

Why?

He turned his head and looked around, but he couldn't see anything. His senses had failed, his retinas burned away, trapping him in pitch-black darkness.

All he could make out was a faint sound.

…!

…!!

A strange noise.

Yes, he remembered. Screams and the sound of steel scraping against steel.

And then, from the unknown thing that touched his skin, came a feeling that was familiar—and strangely dear.

Splash.

At that moment, forgotten sensations and memories awoke.

Something hot, wet, and sticky.

[3835] A jang is a traditional Korean measure of length, approximately 3.03 meters (9.94 ft).

The Blood Lord remembered what this utterly familiar thing was.

Blood.

Something inside the human body. The source of his strength—and the only liquid that could quench his thirst now.

I'm thirsty.

Strange. Just thinking it was enough for him to feel the blood splattered across his body seeping into him.

As it did, his senses gradually sharpened.

But—

More. Give me more.

This wasn't nearly enough.

He needed far, far more blood.

"More!"

With the cry already escaping his lips, the Blood Lord swept his hand out with all his strength.

Grab.

At last, his fingertips touched someone's shoulder. At the same time, a voice rang more clearly in his ears, echoing like a distant sound.

"Blood Lord! Your subordinates will protect you—!"

But before the desperate voice could finish, the Blood Lord's teeth, already grown, sank into the man's throat.

Crunch!

He chewed and swallowed.

For greater strength. To quench his thirst.

Only then did the world around the monster grow bright.

Chapter 1109

The moment fierce flames swept through the battlefield, everyone—ally and enemy alike—thought the Blood Lord was dead.

That was how much power the strike had contained.

Even with his near-immortal regenerative ability, surviving that dreadful, hellish heat had seemed impossible.

But there was one exception.

Jin Taekyung had used even his own life as kindling to summon those flames.

Splash.

His knee sank into a pool of blood. Beyond the drifting ashes, the monster that had stopped just short of death began to rise.

Then a single shout burst from Jin Taekyung's lips, now pale as snow. He wrung it out with every ounce of strength he had left.

"Attack!"

The azure dragon's roar shook the air on every side, breaking the momentary silence and setting time in motion again.

The first to respond was another Divine Dragon, still hurtling away after being caught in the aftermath of One Annihilation.

"…!"

Cheongpung's eyes flew open.

The thrill and elation he'd felt just after cutting off the Black Ghost's head were gone.

Only overwhelming shock and confusion rushed in to take their place.

How is this even possible…!

He couldn't believe what he was seeing. But he had no choice but to accept it.

Gritting his teeth, Cheongpung twisted around.

Whoosh.

His body spun against the howling wind. He thrust out a foot and stepped into empty air.

No—he made it burst.

Boom!

Compressed air exploded.

The distance of some twenty jang[3836] closed in an instant, bringing the staggering monster sharply into view.

I'll kill him. No matter what!

Cheongpung's mind was cold as ice.

[3836] A jang is ten ja, or about 3.03 meters (9.94 ft). Twenty jang is about 60.6 meters (199 ft).

His instincts were screaming at him. If he didn't stop that terrible monster now, he might never get another chance.

He had to bring the creature down by any means necessary, before it recovered its original strength.

But another group of monsters awaited his descending sword. They went by a different name: fanatics.

"Stop him!"

"Heaven above and earth below; all demons—!"

Sh-sh-sh-shhk! Slice!

Purple Force flowed along Cheongpung's blade, cutting through flesh and bone without hesitation.

Thirty-Six Plum Blossom Swords.

Huashan's finest sword technique filled the air. Along the path traced by his blade, the Force of the Zaha Divine Technique blossomed and scattered like petals.

Beautiful, and sorrowful.

And more than anything, desperate.

Thud! Fwoosh!

He cut, and cut, and cut again.

They fell, and fell, and fell again.

But—

They're not backing down…

Cheongpung's face turned pale.

Everything around him was stained red. Blood poured out without pause, washing away the fragrance of his sword technique and obscuring the purple Force.

The defenders who had joined the fight were swinging their weapons with the resolve to die, but even so, the wall of fanatics held firm.

To them, death—the thing every living person feared—was sacred martyrdom.

"The great Lord of Heaven's power has descended upon this land! We will give our lives to protect His Apostle!"

"Lord of Heaven, lead us!"

The fanatics' spirits had never been higher than after witnessing the Blood Lord survive.

No—this had gone beyond madness.

To others, his survival was a strange and terrible calamity. To the fanatics, it was a miracle proving their faith had been right all along.

And amid that whirlpool of madness and death, Cheongpung could see the monster clearly.

A monster slowly retreating from the jaws of death, absorbing the blood of friend and foe pouring in from every direction.

Rustle.

New flesh began to grow over its charred body.

Crack.

Melted bone and muscle regenerated.

Pop. Pop.

Its lips, fused together above and below, came apart to reveal sharp white teeth.

A long, blood-red tongue flicked out between them, driven by an unbearable thirst.

"…More. Give me more."

The moment a voice like scraping metal slipped from the monster's parched lips, Cheongpung felt the blood in his whole body turn cold.

Already?

The sight was bizarre beyond words, and the recovery was far too fast. It was well beyond what he and the other allies had expected.

For a moment, he wondered whether they would be better off falling back, if that could delay the monster's recovery even a little.

But even in that fleeting moment, the mindless monster was regaining its original strength at an astonishing rate.

"More!"

The Blood Lord's sudden cry sent a shiver down Cheongpung's spine.

Because his voice was so much clearer now?

No.

It was the majestic internal energy carried in that cry—something Cheongpung hadn't been able to feel just moments ago.

No!

With that silent scream, Cheongpung thrust his sword forward with all his strength.

Sh-sh-sh-shhk!

Force brighter than ever slashed through the air.

The fanatics blocking his way, endlessly chanting their eight-character incantation, were cut to pieces and scattered.

A breakthrough aimed at a single point.

Jeong Hogun and the Embroidered Uniform Guards under his command, now among the defenders, charged in behind him.

"Wipe out the rebels!"

"Long live His Majesty the Emperor!"

They were the Great Nation's finest troops in every sense, each a martial artist of at least Supreme First Rate, with others at Peak.

They had cast aside the golden armor and helmets bestowed by the Son of Heaven, but their pride and their vows still shone. Every sword point drove in the same direction.

Toward the Blood Lord.

Fwoooosh! Boom!

A deafening crash sent a thick spray of blood surging through the air.

A narrow gap began to open among the countless fanatics, whose ranks had seemed like an unbreakable iron wall.

Slice! Thud-thud-thud!

Even with Temporary Strength Pills, they could not close the gap in martial enlightenment.

Dozens of Huashan's finest techniques poured from Cheongpung's blade, while the Embroidered Uniform Guards, led by Jeong Hogun, drove into the fanatics' formation like an awl.

Before another enemy could fill the gap.

So they could get one step closer, one moment sooner, to the Blood Lord.

At this rate, we can do it.

No—they had to do it.

They all thought so, and they were all prepared to die.

The Kunlun Sect Daoist who, even with a sword buried in his chest, used his last strength to wrap his arms around a fanatic.

The young, nameless soldier behind him, squeezing his eyes shut as he thrust his spear.

The middle-aged Embroidered Uniform Guard, holding in the entrails spilling from his split abdomen as he advanced, clad in pride that shone brighter than his armor.

They all knew it instinctively.

If they let the chance Jin Taekyung had given them slip away, they might never bring that monster down.

If the West Gate fell, they would be slaughtered—and so would the hundreds of thousands of people sheltering in the Inner City.

Their unshakable, desperate resolve shot toward the wall of fanaticism like the spear of someone kneeling behind them.

"Now!"

At Cheongpung's shout, every ally who had pushed deep into enemy lines squeezed out their remaining strength and lunged forward.

It might be their final charge. None of them would regret it.

Crack-crack-crack!

Fountains of blood burst into the air.

Cries of pain spilled from every direction, and the bodies of allies and enemies alike tangled together as they crumpled.

But it was enough.

Countless fanatics still surrounded them. Right now, though, Cheongpung had only one target.

Crunch. Crunch.

The monster was chewing something Cheongpung couldn't identify—and didn't want to. It suddenly turned to look at him.

It had two arms and two legs like a human, but could no longer be called one. In its red hand hung a corpse with its neck gone.

Dozens more bodies lay at its feet: fanatics dried out like mummies.

"Who are you?"

It looked and sounded genuinely curious.

Cheongpung didn't know why the monster couldn't remember him, but one thing was certain.

He still hasn't fully recovered.

Watching his reflection in those blood-red pupils, Cheongpung spat out his answer, his voice more hostile than ever.

"You don't deserve to hear my name."

And at that moment—

Flash.

Cheongpung's hand moved faster than sound. Purple light burst from his fingertips.

Slice!

Skin split, and blood flew.

The Blood Lord stared at Cheongpung in bewilderment, then blinked as he noticed the deep gash across his chest.

"Ah, ah…?"

With the pain, forgotten memories began to rise slowly to the surface.

And with them came anger.

"You…"

He reached out as though in a trance.

But before he could recover his memories, Cheongpung was already moving without hesitation.

Slice, slice, slice!

They moved at a speed like streaks of light, their bodies tangling and crossing. Each time they did, blood sprayed into the air.

The Blood Lord's blood.

Drip-drip-drip.

Watching his own blood spatter across the ground, the Blood Lord's eyes widened.

"…No."

It wasn't the pain.

Thirst.

The more blood he lost, the tighter that terrible thirst—briefly quenched—closed around him again.

Sh-sh-sh-shhk!

Even as sword strikes rained down like a storm, the Blood Lord looked around, his thirst growing stronger.

I need it. Blood. I need more.

But Cheongpung was pouring his last strength into the attack, giving him no time to quench it.

Crack! Crunch!

Blood flowed everywhere as the battle went on, but it wasn't nearly enough. It could only close the wounds appearing across his body, one after another.

But he had remembered something else he'd briefly forgotten.

Other beings that could quench his thirst.

Right. That's right.

The Blood Lord grinned, unable to contain his delight.

He raised both hands toward the sky and cried out eagerly.

"Come! Hurry!"

At that instant—

Whoosh!

The purple Force Cheongpung had sent flying grazed the Blood Lord's arm as he paused for an instant.

No—it cut through both arms.

Slice!

Both arms flew high into the air. Pain and thirst surged through him at once.

But even after losing the arms he had barely regenerated, the Blood Lord kept smiling.

He knew what the countless shadows plunging down toward him would do. They blocked even the heavy rain pouring over his head, turning an already dark sky utterly black.

They would quench his thirst.

Kiiieeet!

At the bloodcurdling sound that suddenly rang out from the air, Cheongpung instinctively looked up.

He saw them.

No. Everyone saw it clearly.

Countless flying beasts—too many to count—plunged toward the battlefield, their blood-red eyes flashing.

And at the center of them all, at the very end, was one being.

Flap-flap-flap!

A wave of monstrous creatures no one could block or evade.

Beyond the thunder of countless wings beating as they poured down and covered the space, the voice of the monster who had finally regained all his strength and memories pierced Cheongpung's ears.

"I remember your name."

"…!"

"And the debt I owe that bastard Mae Jonghak, the Sword Saint."

At that moment—

Crack-crack-crack!

Flesh and bone tore with a sickening sound, and sticky blood stained Cheongpung's vision red.

Chapter 1110

It all began and ended in an instant.

“I remember. Your name.”

The low voice of the monster that had absorbed the life force of countless fiends raining down from the sky rang across the battlefield.

“And the debt I owe that bastard Mae Jonghak, the Sword Saint.”

At last, the monster—the Blood Lord—had awakened with all his strength and memories restored. His red eyes flashed.

Then a blood-red flash, brighter even than the light in his eyes, shot through the air.

Whoosh!

Cheongpung had to dodge. If it hit him, he would die.

But he had already spent all his strength. He could only watch helplessly as the Blood Lord’s palm struck the air like lightning, sending a blood-red palm strike hurtling toward him.

Someone else moved, though—guided by careful judgment honed through countless experiences and by an instant’s instinct.

Crunch!

A terrible tearing sound sent a chill down Cheongpung’s spine. Flesh and bone ripped away all at once, and the blood within burst out.

Splatter. Drip-drip.

Hot, sticky blood washed over his face. Cheongpung blinked, dazed.

Not from unbearable pain, or because he’d seen death looming before him.

Through his blood-red vision, he saw a man looking down at him. Somehow, Cheongpung had ended up sprawled on his side.

“Get… up. Quickly.”

Cough.

The man swallowed the blood that surged up whenever he opened his mouth and spoke again, his voice strained but calm. It was hard to believe the palm strike had torn off his arm all the way to the shoulder.

“Leave now. Before it’s too late.”

“B-but—”

Cheongpung’s mind had gone blank at this unexpected turn. He was just starting to stammer out a reply when—

“You fool!”

The fierce shout burst out without warning. Then a growl like a beast’s came from between the man’s bloodied lips.

“Do you still not understand? Can you still not see?”

Blood spilled with every word he ground out. Even so, he did not stop.

Something mattered more to him than the pain threatening to overwhelm his mind. More even than the death he knew was coming.

“None of this is for you! It’s to save everyone—to save the whole world!”

The man roared like a great tiger. He pointed to the Blood Lord, who was approaching even now amid scattering flashes of blood-red light, and to the people throwing themselves at that unprecedented monster without a moment’s hesitation.

BOOM!

Crack! Splaaash!

Deafening crashes shook the battlefield. Fountains of blood erupted without pause, blotting out the rain.

Cheongpung stared at the horrific hellscape of slaughter. At last, he gritted his teeth and stood.

Grind.

A dull pain, and the taste of blood filled his mouth.

But that was nothing compared to what those people were suffering as they were torn apart and broken, even now.

“I’ll… thank you later.”

What more was there to say?

The man smiled faintly and nodded. Watching Cheongpung walk away, he murmured as if to himself, “Please look after him. The Marquis of Shangshan.”

That was all. There would be no later for him, and he knew it.

Step.

His footstep felt unusually heavy as he turned. He fixed a calm gaze on the monster approaching through the dense mist of blood and spoke.

“You who dared to plot rebellion and throw the world into chaos: state your identity and surrender peacefully.”

“Criminal? Surrender?”

The Blood Lord’s mouth twisted into a smile. It held mockery—and the anger of a predator whose prey had slipped away before his eyes.

“There are a lot of you idiots who’ve got a death wish.”

Shhhhh.

In a matter of moments, the blood-red beams that had swallowed hundreds of lives rose in strands from the Blood Lord’s entire body.

“You should have run. It would only have bought you a little time, but at least you might have had a chance to look back on your life.”

The man gripped the great sword in the one hand he had left and answered.

“I don’t need that chance. I’m not like you.”

And he truly wasn’t.

Not everything he had done in his life had been perfectly just. But he had lived it with true loyalty. He had never blindly submitted to orders, nor had he wavered when powerful men dangled tempting offers before him.

He had proved himself, and in doing so earned the right to stand here—just as the others forming a square around him had, though they looked ready to collapse.

“Let me ask you all: what is our duty?”

At the sudden question from their commander, the roughly three hundred surviving Embroidered Uniform Guards answered as one.

“To protect the Imperial House with an unshakable oath and unwavering loyalty!”

Some voices were young, others old.

The familiar faces of friends and comrades who had shared their lives with them—less than half remained.

Each remembered the oath they had etched into their hearts the day they first received shining golden armor.

“Then what is our obligation?”

They were exhausted in body and mind. Even raising their voices was a struggle now.

That was why they drew on every last bit of strength to answer: so the fear creeping into their hearts would not rule them, and so their oath would not fade even in death.

“To protect all the people—and beyond them, the whole world!”

“…!”

Their cry shook the air. The sneer on the Blood Lord’s lips began to fade.

Vroooom.

The great sword in the man’s hand trembled and shone with a clear light.

Force. Magnificent and radiant, it had long seemed to him a realm he could never reach.

Did enlightenment finally come when I let go of everything? Or… is Heaven telling me to fight back however I can?

The question crossed his mind, and he let out a quiet laugh.

He didn’t know where this sudden power had come from. It no longer mattered. He knew what he had to do, and that was enough.

“As a Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, carrying out His Majesty the Emperor’s exalted will, I give you your orders!”

The man—Jeong Hogun—swallowed the blood surging up his throat and shouted. He leveled his Force, burning like a final rally, at the enemies who had surrounded them and the monster at their center.

“Behead the rebels!”

At that moment—

“Loyalty!”

Their military salute rang out with more force and desperation than ever. Jeong Hogun and the roughly three hundred Embroidered Uniform Guards charged with a roar that caught in their throats.

Straight toward the death looming before them.

Their bodies would perish, but what they did at the end would remain.

They were magnificent.

Whoosh.

And it was glorious.

CRUNCH!

A massive blood-red flash erupted without warning, staining everything around them. Within it, they fell.

My vision was blurry.

Pains large and small jabbed through my body like sharp awls. Every sound reaching my ears seemed distant, like an echo from beyond a mountain ridge.

Ah.

A question suddenly occurred to me.

Where was I? Who was I? And why were my eyelids so heavy?

It was strange. I could’ve sworn I remembered everything just a moment ago.

I just want to sleep. Peacefully.

I couldn’t think of anything else. If I could just fall asleep, I felt I would be completely at peace.

A desperate longing to rest somewhere without pain or worry was the only thing ruling my body.

—Rest, huh? That doesn’t sound so bad.

An unfamiliar voice echoed in my mind, but I wasn’t even curious who it belonged to. Maybe I was hearing things as I drifted in and out. Maybe another part of me agreed.

What did it matter, as long as I could fall asleep in peace?

Right? There’s nothing wrong with taking a little rest.

The voice answered my question.

—If you put it that way… I’d have to say there are plenty of reasons it could be a problem.

A problem?

—You know why better than I do.

What?

I was bewildered. I didn't even remember who I was. How could I know why?

The voice spoke again.

—You can't feel it, can you? Even now, you're struggling with everything you have to wake up.

That couldn't be right. That was nonsense from some clueless idiot.

My vision was blurred and spinning, and pain was gnawing at every part of me. Who wouldn't want to rest like this? I wanted so badly to fall asleep.

—Are you sure?

Of course.

Or… I thought so.

—Then how are you still conscious? All you have to do is close your eyes and give in to instinct. Everything will be peaceful.

That's…

—Don't tell me you've forgotten how to fall asleep.

I had no answer.

Confusion had crept in and begun to push the drowsiness aside, though I hadn't even noticed. All I could do was turn a question over in my mind.

Why? Why am I fighting so hard to hold on?

This time, the voice gave me no answer.

Instead, fragments of memory fell one by one onto the once-calm surface of my consciousness. And from somewhere deep within me, an unfamiliar current of qi began to rise.

Whooosh.

It felt as though a wind were blowing. Clear and refreshing, it pressed down on the pain that had tormented me and rekindled the dying embers of my memory.

My name. Countless faces and voices. As my senses sharpened, the strong smell of blood and someone's shout reached me too.

…!

…!!

My vision slowly cleared, and the echo drew closer.

Amid it all, I finally remembered why I had wanted so badly to rest—and why, despite that, I had refused to let go of consciousness.

I… I…

As my mind awoke, the pain returned with it.

Was this what it felt like to fall into a pit of fire? To have my body torn into thousands of pieces?

I didn’t know. I couldn’t know.

But I knew one thing: I still had so much left to protect.

—As always, a good decision.

At the moment the unknown voice whispered its last words in my mind—

Whoooosh.

The wind sweeping through my body became a wave of qi carrying the fragrance of flowers. It washed over me.

No—it lifted my dying body and mind back to their feet.

And at last, I heard a familiar voice.

“…Benefactor! Benefactor!”

A frantic cry. A face drenched in tears.

I woke with a gasp, and Cheongpung’s voice thundered in my ears.

“The West Gate—the West Gate…!”

The reality I had barely returned to was still cruel.

Chapter 1111

Boom, boom, ba-boom!

There was nothing strange about hearing a war drum in the middle of a battle.

The drum on the highest watchtower was practically another command post, keeping watch over the walls on all sides.

But its beat had never sounded so urgent, so perilous. Something in it gripped the hearts of everyone who heard it.

Slice!

A streak of light shot across the foot of the wall like a bolt of lightning.

Dozens of fanatics charging in while scattering Sword Energy were cut to pieces and sent flying. Yet the man responsible for this display of divine might wore a rigid expression.

“This is…”

His words trailed off. The Slaughter Saint, who had been fighting enemies right beneath the wall, turned on instinct—not toward the Inner City, where the drum was sounding, but toward the west, where a muffled roar reached him from far away.

Even he didn’t know exactly why.

All he knew was that his instincts, honed by countless experiences, and the immense surge of power that had boiled over from the west moments ago were stirring every one of his senses.

For an instant, even the streaks of light plunging down from above slipped from his mind.

Shreeeeeeek!

Countless ice spikes rained down, freezing the air around them.

The Slaughter Saint felt the chill bearing down on him, but he didn’t take his eyes off the west.

Someone he could trust stood behind him.

Whoosh!

The wall lit up. A beam of light shot from someone’s fingertips and swallowed hundreds of ice spikes whole.

KABOOOOOM!

A blinding flash erupted with a thunderous crash.

Before the shockwaves of the collision had fully faded, the Bow Saint’s clear Sound Transmission rang in the Slaughter Saint’s ears.

—The West Gate has fallen.

“…!”

The Slaughter Saint swallowed the groan rising in his throat.

The ominous premonition he'd feared had come true. But that left him even less time to lament. With one of the pillars holding their already fragile balance now completely broken, everything was in danger.

—Then the allies defending the West Gate…

—More than half are casualties, according to the numbers confirmed so far. They say the Embroidered Uniform Guard bought us at least a little time by fighting to the death.

Half.

It was no wonder the Slaughter Saint bit his lip at that staggering number.

More than ten thousand defenders had been stationed at the West Gate. And half of them had vanished—in barely half an hour after the battle began in earnest.

—What happened to the survivors?

—Some retreated to the Inner City. Others seem to still be holding off the enemy from the rear.

—Then, could it be…

A grim thought crossed his mind, and he fell silent. The Bow Saint's quiet Sound Transmission continued.

—Cheongpung and Jin Taekyung. The two of them retreated to the Inner City.

—…They were lucky.

The Slaughter Saint held back a sigh of relief.

After so many had already been lost, it wouldn't be right to focus only on the survival of those two just because he had ties to them.

But the Bow Saint had more to tell him.

—If those two are alive, we still have a chance. While they defend the Inner City, we can strike back as hard as—

—Even that won't be easy. Not in their current condition.

—What… do you mean?

—Jin Taekyung is badly injured, I'm told. Cheongpung isn't in good shape, either.

—…!

The Slaughter Saint's eyes widened.

He stopped moving without realizing it. A blade swung at his shoulder.

Slice!

The strike was fast and powerful. He twisted aside at the last moment, but the Sword Energy carried by the blade grazed him and cut his skin.

Of course, even the man lucky enough to land that remarkable hit couldn't escape death.

Thud!

A dagger flew from the Slaughter Saint's fingertips and buried itself between the enemy's brows. At the same time, his figure blurred like a ghost and shot up the wall.

Whoosh, slice!

In the blink of an eye, he stood atop the wall, cutting down enemies climbing by chains and ladders as his lips moved.

—How bad?

The Bow Saint kept firing arrows of Force at the enemy as she answered.

—They can't say whether he'll live.

—…Blood Lord. We underestimated that bastard.

A low groan escaped the Slaughter Saint.

He hadn't been comfortable leaving the West Gate to Jin Taekyung from the start. He'd only been persuaded by the same argument they had used with Jeok Cheongang.

—We shouldn't have left him there after all.

—It wouldn't have changed anything, as long as the Blood Lord's intentions stayed the same.

—I have to go to the Inner City. Hold this gate until then.

There was no time to waste.

If Jin Taekyung's life hung by a thread, the Slaughter Saint was the only one who could pull him back from death.

With a heavy heart, he turned to leave.

Or tried to.

Until a clear voice reached his ears.

"Is that really the best choice?"

"…What do you mean?"

"Without you, Slaughter Saint, we can't hold this gate. I certainly can't hold it alone."

The Slaughter Saint had no answer.

Of course he knew how dangerous their position was here, at the South Gate.

Even apart from the Grand Sorceress, they faced four Black Ghosts. The mages supporting them were still hurling spells at the wall while granting the fanatics greater strength and speed.

That was why he'd been forced to leave his assigned post at the East Gate and join the defense of the South Gate after only fifteen minutes.

But…

"Are you saying we should just let him—Jin Taekyung—die?"

The Bow Saint met his disbelieving gaze. When she spoke, her voice was graver than he had ever heard it.

“We may have no choice. If that is the death fate has given him.”

“You…!”

“That boy needs the Divine Physician. I know. But right now, all of us need the Slaughter Saint.”

“…!”

“So which choice is best?”

The Slaughter Saint’s eyelids trembled.

Her question pierced his heart like an awl, and he knew the answer better than anyone.

Yet the woman standing before him felt like a stranger.

Why?

He knew why the Bow Saint had reappeared after vanishing for so long. He’d heard how she had followed a letter left by the Martial God, spending years searching for the one called the “chosen one.”

That made her words and actions now all the harder to understand.

Why wasn’t she trying to save the chosen one—or rather, Jin Taekyung?

There was something in her eyes and voice that he couldn’t begin to fathom. It was more than simple faith that Taekyung would survive.

Bow Saint, what exactly are you hiding?

He forced down the question on the tip of his tongue, along with the doubts racing through his mind.

The enemy’s assault was growing fiercer, as though it would not allow him even a moment to think.

Fwoooosh.

A massive sphere of flame suddenly turned the sky red, blotting out the wind and rain.

It hurtled toward them with terrifying force. The Slaughter Saint leaped from the wall to meet it without hesitation.

Whoosh!

A streak of light cut through the air along the path traced by his fingertips. A rift opened, followed by an explosion.

KABOOOOOM!

The ball of fire shattered into hundreds of pieces and scattered in every direction. The Slaughter Saint landed where he had started and fixed a profound gaze on the Bow Saint.

“Is that answer enough?”

Perhaps she saw the change in his eyes. A bitter smile crossed her lips.

“It does.”

Leaving her behind, the Slaughter Saint silently turned to face the enemies, who had dyed the land outside the wall pitch-black.

More precisely, he looked toward the one who had just displayed magic of a power beyond anything they'd seen so far.

The Grand Sorceress.

The face of another ringleader, who had finally stepped forward, burned itself onto the Slaughter Saint's eyes. Four Black Ghosts stood around her like guards.

Then—

Rumble…

A chilling vibration rose from deep beneath the earth. The Slaughter Saint turned his head in one direction.

He thought of the one person who cherished Jin Taekyung more than anyone in the world—the one person who would rush into any danger for him.

You're the only one left now. I'm counting on you, Fire King.

Just as the Slaughter Saint murmured those words in his heart—

Rrrrrumble!

The ground within a radius of roughly a hundred jang[3837] around the South Gate heaved its vast, heavy body upward.

A man's voice rang out across the battlefield.

"Shake it."

Earthquake.

KABOOOOOM!

Rumble!

The violent tremor began in the south and spread in every direction. Those who felt it reacted in different ways.

"A-an earthquake!"

Some thought of a disaster no human strength could stop and were seized by fear.

"Don't falter! What is there left to fear?"

Others, already prepared to die, fought the enemy without giving an inch.

"Damn bitch. She hasn't noticed already, has she?"

And one man, recognizing the power, fired blood-red flashes at the moths foolish enough to block his path to the Inner City.

He needed to take one man's life quickly—and for good—before anything else could get in his way.

[3837] A jang is a traditional Korean measure of length, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

But that man—the Blood Lord—didn't know what was happening several hundred jang[3838] away at the North Gate.

A massacre far beyond anything he had expected.

"A-a demon…"

Cough.

Blood mixed with bits of entrails spilled from the old monk's lips.

His bright yellow robe was soaked through, its original color nowhere to be seen. Blackened corpses lay scattered in every direction.

None of them knew how many people had met such a terrible end.

Not even the man who had created this hellscape.

There was only one thing he knew for certain.

Crack.

The middle-aged monk whose neck he had just broken in his grasp was the last survivor of the Twelve Secret Monks, renowned as Tibet's finest.

"Now you're the only one left."

The old monk standing rigid as a statue was the only obstacle still in his way.

"…!"

The Dalai Lama's eyes were wide open, his pupils trembling.

Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King, took a weary step toward him.

He thought of his Disciple, who must be in danger by now.

He reminded himself of his resolve.

"Let's finish this quickly. He's waiting."

Fwoosh.

A white flame spread across his fatigue-dimmed pupils.

[3838] A jang is a traditional Korean measure of length, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Chapter 1112

Is this a dream?

The Dalai Lama wondered.

At the same time, he wished more desperately than ever that it was. If this was all a terrible nightmare, he wanted to wake from it as soon as possible—and never have another like it.

But—

Grind.

The pain in the lip he'd bitten without realizing it, the stench of blood in his nostrils, and the acrid smoke all around him whispered the same truth.

That this utterly horrific, unbelievable scene was real.

"Truly… a fiend if ever there was one."

The Dalai Lama's words came out like a groan.

The man reflected in the old monk's eyes looked like a fiend torn from an ancient scripture. He had burned to death the Twelve Secret Monks—his Disciples and fellow martial brothers—and even the two Black Ghosts who had been such dependable reinforcements.

"Fire King Jeok Cheongang."

His voice trembled with anger and fear.

The fiend striding toward him, by contrast, showed no hint of hesitation.

Whoosh.

Embers scattered. The air grew hot.

The Dalai Lama's eyes flew wide as Jeok Cheongang closed more than ten jang[3839] in an instant and rushed straight at him, white flames flickering at his fingertips.

BOOM!

Compressed air exploded, and the flames swallowed wind and rain.

KABOOOOOM!

Was this what a wave of fire looked like?

Watching the searing heat sweep through the place where he had stood moments ago, the Dalai Lama felt a chill run down his spine.

"Flame Divine Palm…!"

There was no way he could mistake it.

It was the fiend's martial art, recorded by his ancestors and passed down for more than two hundred years—the very technique that had sent all twelve Secret Monks, including two Supreme Peak masters, to their deaths.

"You recognize it? Did word of this old man reach all the way to that backwater?"

[3839] A jang is ten Korean cheok, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Ten jang is about 30 m (99 ft).

Whoosh!

Jeok Cheongang's low voice sounded above him, accompanied by the rush of air. Emerging through the acrid smoke, he drove a tightly clenched fist down toward the crown of the Dalai Lama's head.

The Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist—the technique that had reduced the two Black Ghosts to ash before the Twelve Secret Monks met their end.

KABOOM!

The ground shook. A pillar of fire shot upward, and the rolling heat burned skin at a mere brush.

Sizzle.

It felt like a branding iron pressed to his flesh.

Yet the Dalai Lama dodged by a hair once more and thrust both palms forward with all his strength.

Crack!

Their hands met. The immense qi within them tangled and collided without pause.

But unlike a moment ago, the fear was gradually fading from the Dalai Lama's eyes as he clashed head-on with Jeok Cheongang.

He's strong, but that's all.

He could feel it clearly through their joined hands. The qi of the man who had displayed such unbelievable power mere moments ago was wavering sharply.

It was the truth his fear had briefly hidden from him—and the truth Jeok Cheongang had wanted to conceal.

Nothing comes without a price.

Perfected Being Hyeoncheon of the Kongtong Sect, who had helped Jeok Cheongang defend the North Gate, was already down with severe internal injuries after a battle involving no fewer than five Supreme Peak masters.

Even Jeok Cheongang could not have come through it unscathed. Realizing this at last, the Dalai Lama fixed a cold gaze on the enemy before him. His anger, briefly driven back by fear, returned.

"You're gravely mistaken."

"What?"

"We didn't learn of you through you, Fire King Jeok Cheongang. We learned of you through your predecessor—the one who should have fallen into the Eight Hot Hells[3840] long ago."

The Dalai Lama bit off each syllable.

"Our Potala Palace never forgot. No—we came to a point where we could never forget."

[3840] In Buddhist cosmology, the Eight Hot Hells are realms of progressively harsher suffering.

It had all begun more than two hundred years ago, on the day a wild-haired stranger in blood-red rags set foot in Tibet.

For the Potala Palace, it was the deepest, most devastating wound—and a history of humiliation that could never be washed away.

Bring in that suspicious foreigner staying at an inn in Chamdo immediately. I will personally interrogate him to find out who he is, where he came from, and why he's here.

The Dalai Lama who gave that order could never have guessed what would follow.

The Potala Palace considered its influence in Tibet comparable to that of the Demonic Cult. Surely even an ignorant foreigner would not dare defy them.

Nor could he have imagined that the foreigner would leave the twenty-odd martial monks sent to capture him half-crippled, then storm the palace himself, eyes rolled back in his head.

Who are you? Which bald bastard ordered you to smash the first meal this old man has seen in three days?

Perhaps that had been their last chance.

They could have apologized for the martial monks' rather rough attempt to approach him. They could have prepared enough meat and liquor to make the table sag, to make up for interrupting his long-awaited meal. Then, once the mood had warmed like an oven stuffed with firewood, they could have talked.

If only they had done that.

But as the records attest, events took no such heartwarming turn.

Twenty martial monks had already been left half-crippled for overturning his table and trying to use their weapons. And the Potala Palace, which strictly observed its principles of non-killing and abstinence, had neither liquor nor meat on hand to calm him.

When the furious stranger stormed into the main palace that day, he found no table sagging beneath meat and liquor. Instead, he found two hundred martial monks who could break a person's limbs with their bare hands.

Among them were the Dalai Lama of that era, acknowledged by all as Tibet's greatest master, and four of the Twelve Secret Monks who served at his side.

You seem to be a fairly well-known martial artist from the Central Plains… Surrender peacefully now, and I'll settle this with twenty years of wall-gazing meditation. What do you say, donor?

The stranger's answer was firm.

That's a terrible deal. I refuse.

Good grief. You're making this difficult.

You bald monks made this what it is. This old man hasn't done a damn thing wrong. At least, not yet.

…Not yet?

Ahem. Anyway, I was planning to rest for a while and leave quietly. This time, at least.

…This time, at least?

I didn't like it when bald monks I'd never seen before came barging in out of nowhere. But if you'd waited quietly in a corner until I finished eating, I would've gone along with it. Hell, if you hadn't tried to force me down, none of this would've happened.

I can't say you're entirely wrong. Still, even allowing for my Disciples' slight discourtesy, your response was excessive.

They overturned my precious meal and even tried to use weapons. You call that a slight discourtesy?

Faced with that pointed question, the Dalai Lama chose silence over admitting the truth. The stranger studied him—the man already seemed more martial artist than monk—and sighed deeply.

Hearing you say that, I deeply regret it.

Oh? Truly?

Of course. I swear it to Heaven and Earth.

The stranger's next words sealed everyone's fate.

I should've crippled them completely instead of leaving them half-crippled.

…You're a fiend to the bone. What can be done now? It's come to this. Please, don't hold it against us. May you find peace in your next life.

And so, the killing began.

A storm of blood swept through, driven by one side alone.

A dreadful storm of blood that would be remembered for more than two hundred years, and would still be remembered a thousand years later, as long as the Potala Palace endured.

"One hundred died there that day. Another hundred were crippled."

Recalling his sect's humiliation, the Dalai Lama spoke in a harsh, grating voice. His gaze on Jeok Cheongang was colder than ever, and the anger in his steady voice had swallowed his fear.

"The Dalai Lama of that time died too."

The four Twelve Secret Monks who had been there with him barely survived, but like the martial monks who lived through it, they were never able to use martial arts again.

"It was a terrible humiliation. Something that should never have happened—something we had thought impossible."

All of it had taken barely half a day. The Potala Palace's martial monks, scattered across Tibet to maintain order, rushed back to the main palace with all their might.

There, at last, they saw it.

The once-imposing palace lay in ruins. Scrawled across a charred pillar that had been wrenched from the ground was a single line:

> The Jade Emperor[3841] says: Even a dog should be left alone while it eats.

Beneath that saying of highly dubious origin, the writer had carefully inscribed his credentials in a style every bit as long and grandiose.

“Fifth Sect Leader of the great Fire Gate Clan. Ghost Flame Fist Songhak.”

The Dalai Lama ground out the accursed name that had been passed down to this day.

“If we’d captured him then, none of this would be happening today.”

But the martial monks had not captured Ghost Flame Fist Songhak and sent him to meet Yama.[3842]

After branding the Potala Palace with an indelible humiliation, he had melted through the net over heaven and earth cast by Tibet’s Murim and headed straight for the Central Plains.

Before that, he had fled the Mad Wind Society of the great desert—the reason he had entered Tibet at all. Their pursuit had kept him from eating for three days, a particular hardship for the man who valued his meals more than any other Sect Leader in the Fire Gate Clan’s history.

Songhak returned to the clan’s home on Mount Jiuhua in high spirits and wrote a brief account of his thrilling exploits.

> I have always held the Fourth Ancestor, the Third Sect Leader, in the deepest respect. Following in his footsteps, I traveled the world and the Outer Murim.
>
> As it happened, I fought the Mad Wind Society of the great desert beyond the scorching sands and uprooted the Potala Palace’s very pillars.
>
> At this, all the men and horses of Tibet grew enraged and pursued me.
>
> But who am I?
>
> I am Ghost Flame Fist Songhak, Fifth Sect Leader of the great Fire Gate Clan. Without so much as a hair harmed, I… avoided them and returned safely to the Central Plains.

Of course, Ghost Flame Fist Songhak had no idea that more than two hundred years later, a distant descendant would find this proud record and mutter that he was a madman.

[3841] The Jade Emperor is a heavenly ruler in Daoist tradition.

[3842] Yama is the ruler of the underworld in Buddhist tradition.

Nor did he know the Potala Palace would nurse its grudge for so long.

In truth, he had not cared in the slightest.

“I learned later that before all that, he’d slaughtered more than five hundred of the Mad Wind Society’s mounted bandits in the desert.”

The Mad Wind Society had tried to steal Songhak’s horse and lost most of its leadership instead. Unable to recover from the damage, it eventually vanished into history.

The Potala Palace, however, did not.

With no rival in Tibetan Murim, its members quietly vowed revenge.

Some scholarly monks urged forgiveness and mercy to prevent further bloodshed, but their voices could not overcome the fury of the martial monks, who were closer to martial artists than to monks.

And so the Potala Palace gradually changed.

Its members began spending more time with martial arts manuals than with scriptures. They accepted only children with exceptional aptitude and greatly expanded their ranks of martial monks.

“We swore that even if Ghost Flame Fist died and turned to dust before we could avenge that day, we would end the line of those fiends with our own hands.”

By the time the land had changed nearly ten times over, the Potala Palace had grown into a fighting force far stronger than it had ever been. Even its members believed the time for revenge had come.

But the man who had been chosen as the new Dalai Lama in childhood, according to Potala Palace tradition, was not satisfied. That had been about a hundred years ago.

“We had grown stronger, certainly. But it was still nowhere near enough. To take our revenge ourselves, we would have to face the entire Central Plains.”

Just as Songhak had been shunned as a foreigner the moment he set foot in Tibet, the Potala Palace would be nothing but an outsider in the Central Plains. A dangerous outsider, at that—one with enough power to unleash a storm of bloodshed.

The Fire Gate Clan might have spent years stirring up trouble and accumulating gratitude and grudges, but the martial artists of the Central Plains would never seek out the Fire Gate Clan and hand it over to dangerous outsiders from the west for revenge.

“In the end, we needed greater strength. Or… an ally who would join us against the Central Plains.”

Crack.

The force in the Dalai Lama’s hands suddenly surged, pushing Jeok Cheongang’s hands back little by little.

The balance between them was finally breaking.

“The Demonic Cult was truly foolish. The arrogant Heavenly Demon mocked us for being weak. That was his greatest mistake.”

“The Great Faction War… Hah. I thought you were just a bald monk consumed by an old grudge with no claim to justice. Now I can’t even call you a monk.”

Jeok Cheongang forced down the blood rising in his throat and gave the Dalai Lama a scornful look.

“How ridiculous. Don’t you think?”

“What?”

“Look at yourself. You’ve joined hands with fiends worse than the Demonic Cult, and you dare call anyone else a fiend?”

“…!”

The Dalai Lama flinched.

Jeok Cheongang’s sudden rebuke carried a terrifying aura. In the flames blazing within Jeok’s eyes, the Dalai Lama finally saw what he had become.

Red. His eyes were red.

Their light had taken on the color of the pool of blood at his feet.

Slowly, but steadily.

“All for that pathetic power, you even broke a taboo.”

“N-no. I…!”

His eyes and voice trembled.

But nothing he said could undo the truth of the past.

He had needed to grow stronger. Somehow, he had needed more and more power.

The countless pills and martial arts Dark Heaven offered had made that possible.

No—more precisely, that new power, infused with demonic energy, had made it possible.

Jeok Cheongang gave a quiet laugh. The Dalai Lama had been confronted with a contradiction he had forgotten—or had tried desperately to ignore.

“If you’ve got nothing to say, shut your mouth. Even this old man, with a strong stomach, can’t stand the excuses coming off a fiend’s tongue.”

“You bastard! Shut your mouth!”

Fwoosh!

A vast wave of energy surged in every direction.

Using his blazing rage as kindling, the Dalai Lama finally wrung every last bit of power and potential from deep within himself and drove his full strength against the enemy before him.

Crack!

The balance had tipped decisively. Bones shifted, and the flames around Jeok Cheongang’s hands began to dim.

Then, through lips streaked with blood—a testament to his mounting injuries and exhaustion—Jeok Cheongang released a single azure dragon's roar.

"Hyeoncheon! Now!"

At that moment—

Shhhhh.

The world seemed to slow. The Dalai Lama tore his hands free of Jeok Cheongang's with all his strength and spun around, every hair on his body standing on end.

He remembered the man who had slipped from his thoughts: the Kongtong Sect Leader, whom he had believed unable to fight.

Far away, Perfected Being Hyeoncheon was leaning against the corpse of a huge elephant, drawing only the faintest breaths. The Dalai Lama froze.

No.

Crack!

The terrible heat that drove deep into his body did not allow him even that instant.

"…!"

His body shuddered as if lightning had pierced it.

Yet no blood spilled from him. Not a single scream escaped his lips. The flames had vaporized the blood that should have burst forth, and the pain was so overwhelming he forgot even to cry out.

But perhaps the worst pain of all was his enemy's low voice, sounding beside his ear.

"Fire King Jeok Cheongang says: Never harm a being who has something it must protect, even if that being is a beast."

Like the ancestor who had carved his own words into a Potala Palace pillar, Jeok Cheongang whispered in a faint but clear voice. His hand had pierced the Dalai Lama's back and burst through his chest. He clenched it tight.

"Especially if that being belongs to the Fire Gate Clan."

The Dalai Lama could not answer.

His senses cut off from the world, and darkness swallowed his sight.

"Go on ahead, fiend of Tibet. This old man still has something to protect."

Thud.

At last, his head slumped.

With his enemy's final words echoing like Yama's, the Dalai Lama's world closed around him.

Chapter 1113

Nothing can be gained without sacrifice.

That was even more true for those seeking victory through war—the most terrible form of violence—in an age of savagery that had thrown law and benevolence to the dogs.

But even knowing that cruel reality, there were some things one could never get used to.

Like realizing that someone who had been laughing and talking with you not long ago was gone.

"…So, that's how it ended."

After hearing what had happened immediately after he lost consciousness, Jin Taekyung quietly closed his eyes, muttering to himself.

Faces came to mind. So many people who, though he had known them only a short time, had looked at him with trust.

Along with them came the stony face and voice of someone whose presence had gradually become familiar.

"It doesn't matter who you are. The Embroidered Uniform Guard obeys only His Majesty the Emperor's command. If you stand in our way in defiance of his imperial decree, I'll kill you."

"Perhaps it's because you're a martial artist without even an identity tag, but your manners are atrocious."

"Thank you. For protecting us—for protecting the imperial family."

Fleeting moments brushed faintly past his eyes and ears.

And at the end of those memories was always the figure of someone who had pressed forward without wavering.

"Jeong Hogun, Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, answers the command of the Marquis of Shangshan!"

Remembering the voice he would never hear again, Taekyung opened his eyes without a word and forced down something rising from deep in his chest.

The officer had been so stubbornly steadfast it was almost foolish. He had always been calm, and always stood tall.

Taekyung had lost consciousness before witnessing Jeong Hogun's final moments, but he was certain the man had faced them the same way.

Because that was who he was.

The Embroidered Uniform Guards who had served under Taekyung over the past three months must have been the same. So must the defenders at the West Gate, who had fought with their lives on the line.

They had all fought to protect others and died valiantly.

Taekyung would never forget that their sacrifice had allowed so many people, himself included, to survive.

Neither would the person beside him, head bowed and shedding tears.

"…I'm sorry, Benefactor. I wasn't good enough."

Cheongpung's eyes glistened, and his voice trembled.

Looking at Cheongpung as he blamed himself, Jin Taekyung spoke in a calm voice.

"You're right. We weren't good enough. Neither you nor I."

"No. You did everything you could. If only I'd been a little stronger…"

"Young Hero Cheongpung."

"Yes?"

"If only the Blood Lord—no, the Lord of Heaven—had never been born. That would've been nice, wouldn't it?"

"…!"

"If, maybe, what if… Get those stupid thoughts out of your head. Even if you're sorry to the dead, even if you hate yourself like crazy for surviving, bear it."

Grit.

Jin Taekyung slowly shifted his body, which had been propped against the Inner City wall. He clenched his jaw without meaning to, against the terrible pain that seemed to reach every cell in his body.

So were the fury and self-reproach he had been struggling to hold back since regaining consciousness. No matter how hard he suppressed them, they kept surging up from deep in his chest.

His legs suddenly went slack like a puppet with its strings cut.

He caught the wall but staggered, and Cheongpung hurriedly reached out to support him.

Or tried to.

Before Cheongpung's hand could touch him, Taekyung firmly shook his head.

"B-Benefactor."

Cheongpung watched, his eyes wavering, as Taekyung forced himself upright. Beads of sweat ran down Taekyung's forehead, and his face was deathly pale.

But what showed on the outside was not the whole story.

Cheongpung had poured his own internal energy into Taekyung to lend him strength. He knew better than anyone that the damage inside his body was even worse than it looked.

Some of the tears he had shed earlier had come from a terrible premonition: that he would be unable to stop Jin Taekyung from dying.

But—

Thump.

Taekyung did not stop. He did not give up.

Bearing the pain with everything he had and suppressing the emotions boiling like lava in his chest, he gripped the wall and stood again.

Slowly. Stubbornly.

Each second felt like ten years as he forced the words out.

“Think about why we survived. Why they had to give their lives to save us.”

They could not fall apart. They must not.

If they gave up now, it would all have been for nothing.

The sacrifice of those who had died opening a path of retreat.

The sacrifice of others who might be dying even now.

“Apologize to the dead and cry your eyes out after we’ve finished everything we have to do.”

He wasn’t speaking only to Cheongpung.

Jin Taekyung kept speaking resolutely to everyone around him. Their heads hung low, their faces marked by desperation or defeat. Exhausted in body and mind, they had briefly forgotten their duty.

“That’s the only way… we can show them the respect they deserve. It’s our duty.”

Step.

Taekyung finally took a step after forcing out those last words.

“…!”

“…!”

The air around them thrummed. An unseen surge rose together with a wave of heat.

One step.

He had taken only one step.

He was a pitiful sight, a young man so covered in blood that no one would have been surprised if he collapsed on the spot.

Yet simply watching him made their hearts pound.

The heavy sense of defeat that had gripped them began to lift, and something hot filled the space it left behind.

Thump. Thump. Thump.

A pulse began to spread like ripples across a still pond. No one knew who had started it, or where.

Outside the Inner City, the war drums beat faster and faster, announcing the approach of death. But that did not matter.

Not now. Not while they stood with him—a martial artist who had made his way through a mountain of sabers and a forest of swords, a marquis of the Great Nation, and, beyond that, a fellow subject living in this vast realm.

For a moment, they could forget.

And remember what they had forgotten.

KABOOM!

Even when a thunderous crash sounded in the distance and the war drums that had seemed destined to ring forever fell silent.

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

Countless enemies came sweeping down the avenue toward the Inner City, their footsteps shaking the ground.

Clang-clang-clang!

Steel rang out, and desperate screams filled the air.

Thump-thump-thump-thump!

Still, the defenders stamped their feet with all their strength and struck their weapons against the ground, coaxing the embers of their battle cry back into flame.

They thought of the countless people huddled deep inside the Inner City, trembling.

Their eyes, alight with renewed fire, fixed on one man.

“Remember this, all of you.”

His voice had grown clear. They watched the silver-white spearhead rise slowly.

“Remember what we’ve stayed alive for.”

Shing.

He spat out the words, and the spearhead gave off a frost-sharp aura.

Whoosh.

Behind him, standing tall as an iron tower, strands of violet light rose and blazed brighter than torches, illuminating the darkness.

And beneath the energy of the Zaha Divine Technique spreading like the sunset at dusk, the corner of one person’s eye was no longer wet.

His voice, sunk deeper than ever, was the same.

“I’ll do it. I promise.”

The battle was not over yet.

Red. Everything was red.

At least, everything one man could see was awash in corpses and blood.

Slice!

How many lives vanished in the space of a single deep breath?

Heads flew here and there. Limbs were severed. Some people died slowly in agony.

[3843] A Daoist is a practitioner of Daoism, a Chinese philosophical and religious tradition.

They had once been Daoists[3843] in fluttering white robes, as refined as immortals; soldiers fed by the nation they served; martial artists and common people. Now it was impossible to tell them apart.

Covered in blood from head to toe, they had become part of the hellscape painted across Xining's main road.

The man who had drawn its first stroke—and would put the final mark on it—watched the slaughter unfold before him.

What fools.

He couldn't understand it.

What were they fighting for?

An Emperor whose bloodline alone had qualified him to rule?

Or that embarrassing notion they called "justice," which did not even have a form?

Ridiculous.

Most of them had probably never seen the Emperor's face. And the justice the martial artists of the Central Plains would die for was nothing more than something they had made up within their own little circle.

But the Lord of Heaven was different. He alone was different.

His power and overwhelming presence made the Blood Lord tremble simply by being near him.

In a world where might made right, what ruler could be more fitting?

This loyal servant will fulfill your wish.

The Blood Lord shot forward with a vow he could not tell whether he was making to the Lord of Heaven or to himself.

Whoosh!

A chillingly low whistle cut through the air. A moment later, the front line of defenders blocking the road to the Inner City crumpled, though they had not given up the fight.

A hundred bodies fell like puppets with their strings cut. Fountains of dark blood shot high above them.

Splatter!

Blood rained in every direction.

Among the defenders who witnessed the unbelievable sight, a trembling voice spoke.

"A-a monster…"

"Yes. I suppose that's what I look like to you."

The Blood Lord smiled and reached out.

BOOM!

A flash of blood-red light swelled and exploded. The blast swallowed the screams, scattering torn flesh and bone.

“But after he takes the world, who will call me a monster?”

It was a world where might made right.

The day was not far off when a blood-mad monster would be hailed as a divine general sent by Heaven.

Though he had failed to take the life of one man whose death was necessary for that great undertaking—

“Open the way, you worthless moths.”

Slice! Stab-stab-stab!

To the Blood Lord, it was all only a matter of time.

The Inner City was close enough to see now. As long as fierce fighting continued at the other three walls, no one could stand in his way.

Grand Sorceress, you bitch, stay out of this. Even I don’t want to kill a servant girl the Lord of Heaven favors with my own hands.

The Blood Lord was about to resume the slaughter when—

Whoosh! BOOM!

A sharp, dazzling flash blocked the steps of the monster who had seemed impossible to stop.

Chapter 1114

The beam of light that crossed the space between them in an instant was dazzling—and devastating.

Even barehanded, the Blood Lord had been slaughtering the defenders without mercy. Now the flash forced him to draw the beloved blade that had rested quietly at his waist.

BOOM!

A deafening crash—and blood sprayed in every direction.

But this time, it wasn't the defenders' blood. It belonged to the fanatics who followed him.

"C-cough. Blood Lord…"

Was the man lucky or unlucky?

Dozens of his comrades had been caught in the sudden flash and died without even a chance to scream. He had barely survived. He crawled toward the Blood Lord, hoping the great Apostle chosen by the Lord of Heaven would ease his pain, even a little.

And the Blood Lord answered his desperate plea.

With the weight of a thousand geun[3844] behind his foot.

Crunch!

The man's spine shattered. That was the end of it.

The Blood Lord didn't know whether the man had been grasping at the last thread of life or hoping for the peace of death.

No, that wasn't quite right. The death of a nobody, little more than a disposable pawn, had never interested him in the first place.

His gaze had been fixed all along beyond the thick cloud of dust.

"Come out."

The instant his cold voice left his lips—

Whoosh!

A flash burst from the dust and hurtled toward him.

More precisely, it was heat that shone like a flash of light.

Fwoosh—BOOM!

Flames swept through the air.

Their terrible heat turned suspicion into certainty. The Blood Lord brought the Red Blade down with all his might.

Slice!

The flames split to either side with a sharp cutting sound.

[3844] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb). A thousand geun is about 600 kg (1,320 lb).

The avenue, more than twenty jang[3845] wide, was engulfed in fire. Through the rising heat haze, a figure wavered.

"Where are you in such a hurry to go?"

The voice was low and steady.

Even through the heat haze, the eyes pouring out flames shone clearly.

Fire King Jeok Cheongang.

The Blood Lord's eyes narrowed at the sight of him. He hadn't expected Jeok to appear yet. Perhaps he had thought he would never see him again.

"So the head of the Ten Kings, whom the orthodox faction praises so highly, is just another warrior after all. You abandoned all those allies to save your one and only disciple?"

Certain Jeok had deserted the North Gate to come here, the Blood Lord spoke with scorn.

Jeok Cheongang caught his breath before replying. "I never asked anyone to praise me. But there's a reason for everything."

"What?"

"Ever since the day I defeated a thousand demonic soldiers, the world has called me the Fire King. It's been so long I was starting to tire of the name… Perhaps that will change after today."

"…!"

The Blood Lord's face twisted as he finally understood what Jeok's arrival meant.

The Potala Palace forces sent to the North Gate had been formidable. There was the Dalai Lama, Tibet's greatest master, and the Twelve Secret Monks, who included two Supreme Peak masters, greenhorns though they were.

Two Black Ghosts had been sent as well, in case anything unexpected happened. They should have been capable of more than holding Jeok in place. It wouldn't have been surprising if they'd killed him.

But how?

The Blood Lord had no answer to the question that sprang to mind. Perhaps he never would.

The battle between those fighting to protect something and those consumed entirely by revenge could often defy expectations by a wide margin.

And Fire King Jeok Cheongang had someone he would protect even at the cost of everything he had.

"Did you think a few bald monks like that could stop this old man?"

The Blood Lord clenched his teeth at the low voice.

"You crazy old bastard. No matter how hard you struggle, nothing will change."

"I have protected him. And I will protect him."

[3845] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

“That precious disciple of yours? The one who might be dying right now?”

“…What did you say?”

Jeok Cheongang faltered. The Blood Lord’s mouth twisted into a smile.

“No. Perhaps he’s already dead. Last I saw him, he was at death’s door.”

“You dare…!”

The news of his disciple’s danger shook Jeok more than he could hide.

Whoosh!

With a faint whistle of air, the Blood Lord vanished like a phantom. He crossed more than ten jang and struck.

Slice!

The ground split like tofu.

Jeok Cheongang twisted aside just in time to avoid the blow, but blood spurted from several places on his body.

Drip, drip, drip!

The force of the blade was enough to wound him without touching him.

Jeok knew better than anyone what that blood scattering through the air meant.

My body…!

It felt as heavy as a thousand geun. Even his senses were slow to respond.

In his anger and desperation, he had forgotten how exhausted the battle at the North Gate had left him—and how badly a moment’s emotional turmoil could cost him in a life-and-death duel.

The Blood Lord saw it, too.

BOOM!

Blade strikes tore through the air like a storm.

Dozens—no, hundreds—of attacks poured back and forth, as though slicing time itself apart. Already exhausted, Jeok Cheongang sensed that this fight was close to its end.

He knew that end would be his death. He also knew he had one move left that might change it.

Dance of the Fire God and Demon.

A final flame fueled by everything he had.

The divine art had been passed down through generations of the Fire Gate Clan, yet its terrible aftermath had made it forbidden. Jeok Cheongang had nearly died from using it once already.

But now it was all he had left. It was the only way to defeat the Blood Lord, whose power came closer to Regeneration than mere healing.

Even that brief moment of thought might have been more than Jeok could afford.

An opening!

The Blood Lord's eyes flashed.

Whoom!

The Red Blade was buried deep in the ground. Instead, he drove a fist toward Jeok's side like a cannonball, putting all his strength behind it.

For some reason, his strength and speed had grown greater still since Jin Taekyung's One Annihilation had put him in danger.

"…!"

Jeok had no time even to gasp.

His body was exhausted, his senses dulled, and his internal energy was nearly spent. All he could do was cross his Force-clad arms and brace with everything he had.

BOOM!

His vision overturned.

The blow hurled Jeok more than ten jang through the air and straight through a large inn that had once been crowded with people.

CRASH!

A pillar collapsed. Splinters flew.

Not until he had smashed through seven buildings, beginning with the inn, did Jeok cough up the hot surge rising from his gut.

Splatter.

Blackened blood stained an alley he didn't recognize.

Through his blurring vision, he saw the Blood Lord rushing toward him like a gale. Joy and killing intent burned together in those blood-red eyes.

"Jeok Cheongang!"

The Blood Lord roared his name and brought the Red Blade down.

CLANG!

A sharp crash rang out.

The Blood Lord was forced back, eyes wide with disbelief, after deflecting five streaks of light fired from an unexpected angle.

Whoooom.

A vibration ran through his grip.

The Red Blade trembled, then steadied. The Blood Lord's face, twisted like a Fiend's, did not.

"Not bad… But after living this long, you ought to know when to stay out of a fight. Don't you think?"

He slowly turned his head as he growled.

His blood-red gaze fell on the five old men standing between him and Jeok Cheongang.

"If you don't want to be torn limb from limb and die."

Despite the killing intent bearing down on them, the slender old Daoist at their center quietly helped Jeok to his feet.

Fwoosh.

Internal energy flowed into Jeok, and a little color returned to his deathly pale face. He coughed up another mouthful of blood.

“Thank you for all your hard work,” the old Daoist said calmly. “We’ll take it from here.”

“Cough. You’re…”

“Jin Taekyung may not have much time left.”

“…!”

“Go. Quickly. It’s for everyone’s sake, too.”

Of course, the old Daoist’s “everyone” left out one person.

“Ha. Now there are six crazy old men.”

Sneering, the Blood Lord angled the Red Blade downward.

“Then you can all die.”

Whoosh!

A crescent of blood-red Force shot along the Red Blade. The Force alone was a full jang across, and the strike carried terrifying power.

The next instant—

BOOM!

A crash like the sky splitting apart rang out. Everything within a ten-jang radius crumbled to dust.

Above it stood six figures, high in the air.

“…!”

The Blood Lord’s gaze darkened. The slender old Daoist bowed his head slightly to Jeok Cheongang, whom he had been supporting.

“Please forgive the impertinence of one so far your junior.”

Jeok was too drained to answer. Severe exhaustion and Internal Injury had been building since the North Gate.

No—there wasn’t even time for an answer. Before he could speak, the old Daoist’s arms swung with force.

“You crazy—!”

The Blood Lord’s frantic shout came too late.

Whoooosh!

Jeok Cheongang shot through the air toward the Inner City.

Before the enraged Blood Lord could pursue him, the five old Daoists landed softly on the ground and blocked his way.

They had the bearing of immortals, an aura like noble cranes, and a movement technique astonishing enough to match.

Only then did the Blood Lord recognize the intruders.

“The Kunlun Five Immortals.”

“You know us?”

“How could I not? I’ve heard the heartbreaking tale of five old men who should have died long ago, still eating up the Kunlun Sect’s rice.”

Naturally, the Blood Lord’s account bore little resemblance to their reputation.

The Kunlun Five Immortals were Martial Uncles to Cheongheoja, the current Sect Leader, and Elders who still upheld the Kunlun Sect well into their eighties.

Each had stopped just short of Supreme Peak. But they had grown up as close as brothers, and their combined technique was said to withstand even a Supreme Peak master.

To the Blood Lord, they were merely five more troublesome old moths.

“Get out of my sight. I’d tear you apart right now, but even that would waste time.”

The slender old Daoist, the eldest of the Kunlun Five Immortals, Perfected One Taecheong, shook his head.

“I cannot accept that offer. So I’d like to suggest an alternative.”

“There is no alternative. You’ve just thrown away your last chance.”

The Blood Lord let the Red Blade hang at an angle and stepped toward them.

First Jin Taekyung. Now Jeok Cheongang. Twice he had lost prey he’d nearly caught—prey he had to kill.

Their auras felt far stronger than their reputations suggested. That was puzzling, but even a combined technique capable of facing a Supreme Peak master would be a tower built on sand before him. It would fall in moments.

Or so he’d thought.

“You’re mistaken,” the old Daoist said. “We still have a chance.”

“What?”

“This is the alternative we came up with.”

Only then did the Blood Lord notice the calm smile on Perfected One Taecheong’s lips. Something was wrong.

Shaaaaa.

Power surged from Perfected One Taecheong—no, from all five of the Kunlun Five Immortals—and shook the air around them.

Their fierce aura was hard to believe in men whose skill was said to have stopped at the very edge of Peak. It was so rough, it made the immortal meaning of their title seem absurd.

It took the Blood Lord little time to recognize what felt so familiar about it.

“You… Don’t tell me.”

“It’s as fearsome as I heard, this Temporary Strength Pill.”

“…!”

“No need to look so surprised. None of us has ever practiced demonic martial arts. We had to pay a price to take it.”

Perfected One Taecheong was telling the truth.

The Temporary Strength Pill’s power was chiefly for practitioners of demonic, heterodox arts—particularly those whose martial arts remained incomplete because they had not reached Supreme Peak.

Even if someone who cultivated pure qi took one of the spare pills carried by Dark Heaven’s followers, it would have little effect.

Unless they did something mad: broke the innate qi they had built up over more than eighty years and forced themselves to absorb the pill’s energy.

“To stop a monster…”

Whoooom.

His words faded beneath a deep rumble.

An unstable, hazy Force gathered around the sword in Perfected One Taecheong’s hand. There was no mistaking what it was.

And it wasn’t his sword alone. Force rose from the blades of all five Kunlun Five Immortals.

“If that’s what it takes, then we’ll gladly become monsters, too.”

Whoosh!

Space split, and six figures clashed in a tangle.

Fifteen minutes.

That was all the time the Kunlun Five Immortals remained on their feet.

But for someone else, they had bought a full fifteen minutes.

Perhaps that was why Perfected One Taecheong could smile even through the overwhelming pain as both his legs were torn off.

Slice!

Then his arms were severed.

Boom!

Even as the organs inside him tore apart, he swallowed his screams.

And when the shadow of death finally fell over him, the old Daoist held fast to his principles and offered a last farewell to his Junior Brothers, whose breathing had already ceased.

“Remember… Our deaths will not be in vain…”

Crack!

His brain matter burst out with a horrible pop.

The Blood Lord lifted his foot from Perfected One Taecheong's shattered head.

"No. This is a meaningless death."

As he slowly raised his head, cries sounded from every direction, louder and closer than before.

No. It was a creed of exactly eight characters.

Above heaven and below heaven, ten thousand demons bow in homage.

Above heaven and below heaven, let all things kneel.

"…So it shall be."

Leaving those low words behind, the monster continued toward the Inner City.

Sticky blood followed in his wake.

Chapter 1115

It was a fierce battle.

Unprecedented in a thousand years of Murim history, stretching back to the day a monk from a distant land crossed the Yangtze on a single reed leaf.[3846]

It was a bloodbath, too.

One without precedent in the history of the entire continent, not just Murim.

CRUNCH!

A skull split open. Brain matter sprayed.

The boy died without so much as a final cry.

But no one grieved anymore for a boy soldier who hadn't even reached twenty.

No—they couldn't.

In the relentless turning of this brutal hellscape, death had long since become cheap.

The only thing they could do for the dead was take revenge.

"The Lord of Heaven is with us…!"

A bloodshot fanatic trampled the boy's corpse as he stepped onto the wall.

Thud.

A gleaming blade burst out between his brows.

"Who's with you?"

The fanatic, already dead, couldn't answer.

A small shadow pulled the dagger from the back of his head as the body crumpled like a rotten log. Then the shadow stepped toward the other enemies, still elated at having seized the wall.

Whoosh.

The figure vanished like a ghost.

The Sword Energy that came flying a beat too late shot toward the space where the shadow had stood, but a cool breeze from somewhere had already swept past them.

Slice—SPLAT!

A fountain of blood arced into the pitch-black night sky.

The speed was blinding, every movement precise and free of waste. Yet after cutting down dozens of enemies in the blink of an eye, the shadow—the Slaughter Saint—looked grim.

This is the limit. We can't hold out any longer.

He wasn't thinking only of himself.

[3846] The reed-leaf crossing is a legend about Bodhidharma, the monk traditionally associated with the beginnings of Chan Buddhism in China.

The South Gate had been an impregnable fortress with the Slaughter Saint and the Bow Saint defending it. Now the gate was faltering, along with every defender stationed there.

It's a miracle we held out this long.

Perhaps the fight had been impossible from the start.

Their side had even needed to call up commoners, while the enemy were all trained in a certain level of martial arts and had used Temporary Strength Pills as well.

Outmatched in both numbers and quality, they had held on only by making the most of their defensive position and deploying their handful of elite troops wherever they were needed.

But—

So this is as far as we go.

The Slaughter Saint swallowed a groan and looked around.

Beyond the unrelenting downpour lay a sea of corpses and blood. His allies were collapsing from exhaustion, their bodies pushed far past the limits of their will.

Everyone was tired.

Their limbs felt as heavy as waterlogged cotton. Keeping their minds from giving way was all they could manage.

Even the Slaughter Saint felt his exhaustion mounting and his dantian running empty.

If only we'd taken out the Grand Sorceress. We might have had a chance to counterattack…

But the Grand Sorceress was no easy opponent. She was even more formidable than he'd heard.

The defenses around her and the hundred or so other mages had been as solid as an iron wall. When the Slaughter Saint threw everything he had into breaking through to its center, he found no fewer than four Black Ghosts waiting for him.

All four had been strengthened by an array of enhancement spells.

Without help from the greatest archer under Heaven, who could tear a target apart from hundreds of jang[3847] away, even the Slaughter Saint would not have returned with all his limbs intact.

Still, he had brought down two Black Ghosts. Pride and sheer determination had seen to that.

Shing!

A brilliant flash shattered his brief reverie.

BOOM!

[3847] A jang is a traditional length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

A massive beam of light swallowed the twenty or so fanatics charging at him from behind and exploded.

"You seem relaxed. You even have time to look away."

At the Bow Saint's pointed remark, the Slaughter Saint flicked his sleeve.

Thud-thud-thud!

Enemies aiming their bows from blind spots crumpled all at once, each with a long, slender ox-hair needle embedded between the brows.

"I wish I looked relaxed. Maybe then those bastards would be a little scared."

"Do you think they have any fear left?"

"…Damn it."

The Slaughter Saint launched himself forward again with a bitter curse, trying to protect as many of his allies as he could from fiends who had mortgaged their very souls to fanatic faith.

Slice! CRACK!

He cut and stabbed, broke bones and twisted limbs.

But that was all he could do.

No matter how tirelessly the two giants who had once shone so brightly in their age cut down their enemies, the exhausted defenders' resistance faded fast. The fanatics' fervent voices filled the wall.

"Great Lord of Heaven!"

"Let your majesty and power descend upon this land!"

Grit.

Facing them felt like standing before an enormous wave. The Slaughter Saint clenched his teeth without realizing it.

Kill hundreds, and thousands followed. Cut down thousands, and tens of thousands stood behind them.

Would this battle ever end?

What the hell are we supposed to do…?

He couldn't even finish the thought.

He was a man of flesh and blood, not an all-knowing, all-powerful god.

…This is the first time I've wanted to see someone this badly.

Was it the wounds scattered across his body? Or the internal energy draining away even now?

Caught in the exhaustion and emptiness he'd forgotten, the Slaughter Saint suddenly thought of someone who, long ago, had always brought him confidence and certain victory—even when facing a Demonic Cult army more than ten times their size.

Martial God, what would you have done?

It was a foolish question.

The Martial God would never have entertained such doubts in the first place. That was the kind of man he was.

A true heaven, beyond the reach of even the three brightest stars in all Murim.

And yet, at that moment, another name came to the Slaughter Saint.

Jin Taekyung.

The master of the Morning Star, the new star Dharma King Hong Dao had once spoken of—and now the young man who had drawn the Lord of Heaven's inexplicable obsession.

And—

The Chosen One.

The Slaughter Saint could be sure of nothing.

Was it all coincidence? Or had someone high above, in the distant heavens, decided their fate long ago?

All he could do was hold tight to their one hope, even if it amounted to no more than a handful.

Slice!

Force streamed from his dagger as it cut through the air, bending like a whip to sweep across the wall.

Amid severed limbs and spilling blood, the Slaughter Saint drew on what little internal energy he had left and slaughtered the enemies before him in a single attack. Then he opened his mouth.

"Everyone, retreat."

…!

…!

The defenders, barely managing to resist, stared at him wide-eyed. But he had made up his mind. His voice did not waver.

"Messenger, take word to the South and North Gates immediately. The elites stationed at each gate will cover the rear and buy us some time. The rest of the troops are to retreat as quickly and orderly as possible."

Silence pressed down on them. It lasted only an instant, but felt like an eternity.

To them, abandoning the wall meant that the word they'd been trying so hard to ignore—defeat—was finally becoming real.

Only one person present could oppose the Slaughter Saint's decision. The Bow Saint watched him, her gaze still calm.

Is that the best we can do, then?

Her Sound Transmission reached his ear.

The Slaughter Saint met her gaze and answered just as calmly.

I don't know. But… I want to believe.

That was all.

He wanted to believe in the one person chosen by Dharma King Hong Dao, who had read the heavenly patterns; by the Blood Lord, who had thrown even those patterns into disarray; and by the Martial God, whose life or death was now unknown.

I want to see with my own eyes where coincidence ends and fate begins.

Even if a wretched end awaited him, he would not regret it.

The young brat he had watched as Mungyeong, not as the Slaughter Saint, had the makings of a Great Master worth risking his life for, regardless of age or martial prowess.

Surely they all felt the same.

Bow Saint.

At his quiet call, he looked steadily at her.

I don't know exactly what you have in mind. But there's one thing I do know. No—anyone who's been even a little close to Jin Taekyung knows it.

…

You can keep your distance and refuse to say a word, but you can't bring yourself to hate that boy.

…!

I want to believe in him. And in you, too.

Her pupils wavered for an instant.

But neither her agitation nor her silence lasted long.

Fwoosh!

High above them, enormous balls of fire came pouring down like a meteor shower, evaporating even the driving rain.

Shing!

The Bow Saint's hand moved like lightning. A dazzling arrow of light shot forth.

KABOOM!

A crash that seemed to split heaven and earth rang out, and the sky turned red.

The fireballs broke into hundreds, then thousands of pieces, large and small, and rained down. The Bow Saint watched them fall, her face set.

"Honestly, I don't know what choice I should make."

The Slaughter Saint was about to groan when she added quietly, "Still, I want to believe, too."

…!

"Come with me. To the Inner City. To that boy."

At last, a faint smile touched the Slaughter Saint's tired lips.

Chapter 1116

Xining Fortress, the last line of defense in Qinghai, was well suited to withstanding a siege.

But in the dozens of battles fought over the years, its high, sturdy walls had not been the only thing to give invaders nightmares.

“As expected, even those Fiends are having trouble crossing the moat.”

At the middle-aged Daoist’s admiring murmur, Cheongheoja, Sect Leader of the Kunlun Sect, nodded.

“Without it, this fight would be twice as hard. The gate would have fallen long ago.”

Even now, the moat—which was more than ten jang[3848] wide and quite deep—was forcing the enemy to pay a terrible price.

And crossing it was only the beginning. Beyond it waited a gate made of immensely thick black iron. No matter how skilled Dark Heaven’s fanatics were in martial arts, they had little choice but to suffer the losses and scale the walls instead.

The walls had been in danger at times, thanks perhaps to the enemy’s overwhelming numbers and the strength granted by their Temporary Strength Pills. But here at the East Gate, the defense was holding more easily than anywhere else.

If they could keep it that way, they might even win.

The middle-aged Daoist beside Cheongheoja seemed to share that hope.

“If we win this battle, we can all return to the main sect together, can’t we?”

“All of us together… How wonderful that would be.”

Cheongheoja’s voice was heavier than ever. The middle-aged Daoist’s expression turned bitter.

“Are you thinking about your second Disciple?”

Cheongheoja was silent for a moment, then shook his head.

“No.”

“Then…”

“I was thinking about the shortcomings of a foolish master who failed to guide his Disciple down the right path.”

“…!”

“It was my fault. From beginning to end. All of it.”

“Master…”

[3848] A jang is a traditional Korean length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Ten jang is about 30.3 m (99.4 ft).

The middle-aged Daoist—Cheongheoja's Senior Disciple, Hak Su—looked at him with sorrow.

"Don't blame yourself. It wasn't your fault."

"Is that what you think?"

"I know it. Everyone in Kunlun does. You kept your second Disciple closer than anyone else and took special care of him."

"I had to. You were always gentle, and your third Junior Brother was full of energy. But that child always seemed rough and unsettled."

"Wasn't that why you gave him the Daoist name Hak Eui?"

"Yes. That was why."

The boy who had grown up in dark, dangerous back alleys had gained a new name and a family. Cheongheoja had always urged his rough-tempered second Disciple to live up to that name and become a more righteous man.

To never forget, even for an instant, that he was a Daoist.

"But… who could have guessed he was a spy conspiring with Dark Heaven?"

Hak Su pressed his lips together and shook his head.

"I still can't believe it. I don't want to."

His gaze shifted to the empty space beside him, as though his second Junior Brother might be standing there with his usual crooked look.

But that would never happen.

No. It was impossible.

Hak Eui was already dead.

Before dawn, he had resisted those who came under cover of night to capture the spy. In the end, he had lost his life.

Hak Su had arrived at the scene too late. He'd seen his master holding his Junior Brother's severed head and a sword dripping with blood.

He'd seen his master with eyes sadder than ever—just like now.

"Master…"

Just as Hak Su looked at Cheongheoja, torn by conflicting thoughts—

Whoosh!

A sharp whistle cut through the air. A messenger came racing toward them, using his movement technique with all his might.

"Sect Leader!"

He was covered in blood, and his face was as white as a sheet.

Cheongheoja swallowed the groan that almost escaped him and spoke in a heavy voice.

"Where have you come from?"

"The South Gate. Hah… The South Gate."

“Then the two Seniors have ordered a retreat to the Inner City?”

“How did you…?”

“I understand. It must be much the same elsewhere.”

No further words were needed. The messenger’s appearance had told Cheongheoja enough. He went on calmly.

“Go and tell them I’ll lead the East Gate forces to the Inner City shortly.”

“May fortune favor you in battle.”

The messenger bowed briefly and left. Hak Su’s face hardened.

“Go ahead without me. I’ll stay with some of the troops and buy you time.”

His eyes and voice were full of resolve, but Cheongheoja shook his head at once.

“I can’t leave you behind.”

Hearing the concern in his master’s voice, Hak Su gave a faint smile.

“The road to the Inner City won’t be easy. It may be even more dangerous than staying here. They need you more than they need me.”

It was a reasonable prediction.

The dire news that the West Gate had fallen to the Blood Lord had reached the East Gate just before the war drums were about to be destroyed.

Unlike the East Gate, where the enemy forces were comparatively weaker than at the other three gates, a retreat without a plan might lead them straight into the Blood Lord and his fanatics, who could be rampaging unchecked through the fortress from the West Gate.

Even so, Cheongheoja would not yield.

“I forbid it.”

“Master, we’re out of time!”

Hak Su could no longer contain his urgency. But then—

“Who is out of time?”

Cheongheoja’s voice sank strangely low, piercing Hak Su’s ear.

“Master…?”

“I asked who was out of time.”

Hak Su blinked at him, bewildered.

The old Daoist’s presence had changed so suddenly that the Kunlun Disciples who knew him well—and all the soldiers nearby—were staring at Cheongheoja.

Then an unexpected voice rang through the rain.

“Why hesitate? Your master, lofty as the heavens, has asked you a question.”

Splash.

A foot came down in a puddle, accompanied by a hard-edged voice.

At the same time, a man who looked to be around thirty took off his low-pulled straw hat. He stared at Hak Su with cold eyes and continued:

“Answer him, Senior Brother.”

“…!”

“…!”

A shock swept across the wall.

No, it was more than shock.

A man they believed dead had appeared before them.

While most stood frozen, Hak Su studied his Junior Brother in silence. Then he spoke calmly.

“I thought you were dead.”

“If that’s how it looked, then I was.”

Hak Eui’s face was set as he rubbed the neck that had supposedly been severed the night before.

“The fool who truly cared about you is already dead. And before dawn, I was born anew.”

“Then the head I saw…”

“You seem to have forgotten how crowded Xining’s underground prison is.”

Only then did Hak Su remember. A few days earlier, the Qinghai City Lord and several other leaders had been dragged into the streets and executed on the spot. Even after that, well over a hundred prisoners remained in the underground prison awaiting judgment.

And there was someone who could find one built like Hak Eui and make a human-skin mask convincing enough to fool them all.

“The Slaughter Saint.”

Hak Su murmured the name to himself and gave a small nod.

“So that’s what happened.”

His calm acceptance drew uneasy murmurs from those who had been watching, still hoping they were wrong.

Hak Su. It was him.

He was the traitor working with Dark Heaven.

The Kunlun Sect Leader’s Senior Disciple had betrayed the sect to which he had belonged for thirty years.

Cheongheoja looked at the Disciple he had wanted to believe in until the very end. His expression was impossible to describe.

“Why…?”

Hak Su slowly opened his mouth.

“Do not ask why. Do not question. Think only of the mission you’ve been given.”

It was an answer, and a memory: words a child born in a land beyond the distant desert had heard countless times before he turned thirteen.

A duty and a mission etched into his bones, impossible to defy even after decades.

“Heaven above and earth below, let ten thousand demons bow in homage.”

“…!”

“That is everything. I need no other reason.”

Hak Su looked directly into the trembling eyes of the man he had called Master. His face and voice were nothing like they had been before.

“I used to tell you that meeting you by Qinghai Lake was the greatest luck of my life.”

He had meant it.

No one deserved to be called a Daoist more than Cheongheoja. He had accepted his meeting with a boy wandering near Qinghai Lake as fate, never knowing the boy had made it look like chance.

“Thank you. I had no great martial talent. Even I never thought I’d rise this far.”

But Cheongheoja had cared nothing for status or talent. Even if the Kunlun Sect had not suffered such devastating losses in the Great Faction War, he would gladly have taken Hak Su as his Disciple.

Just as Hak Su had been raised to be a spy, Cheongheoja had always been that kind of man.

“It was all thanks to you, Cheongheoja.”

The instant a clear smile came to Hak Su’s lips—

“Hak Su, how dare you—!”

Hak Eui could bear no more. With an angry roar, he shot forward.

He was not the only one charging at the man who had betrayed their sect.

Whoosh!

Swift movement techniques. Formidable auras.

The Kunlun Ten Guests—regarded as the future Elders who would succeed the Kunlun Five Immortals, and as indispensable pillars of the sect—drew their swords without hesitation.

Slice!

A flash of steel cut into a torso. Hot blood gushed out.

Splatter. Thud, thud.

Blood sprayed across the wall.

Cheongheoja had stepped in front of Hak Eui. Over his master’s shoulder, Hak Eui saw something he could scarcely believe.

“What…?”

“I was getting tired of being called Hak Su.”

Hak Su—or rather, Dark Heaven’s spy—looked at the five corpses lying with severed throats and pierced hearts. Then he slowly raised his head.

Beside him stood the other shadows who had infiltrated the Kunlun Sect before him, or around the same time.

“Number Six. That is my name.”

At that moment—

Crunch.

The Kunlun Five Guests—the five remaining members, spies raised by Dark Heaven—took the Temporary Strength Pills hidden in their robes and chewed them.

Sssssss!

A vast wave of energy rose like wildfire. Through it, Cheongheoja’s low voice rang out.

“I truly cannot leave you behind.”

Chapter 1117

Today, there was nowhere in Xining where the word peace could be found.

Not to the east, west, south, or north. Not even in the sky.

Rain and blood drenched everything, while screams and crashes rang out without pause.

And yet there was one exception: a hill rising tall several hundred jang[3849] from the East Gate.

It's really coming down out there.

Hardly the sort of thought someone in a life-or-death crisis could afford to have.

As he watched the sky pour down thick sheets of rain, as though a giant hole had opened overhead, the black-robed man suddenly turned east.

Whoooosh.

In the deep darkness, a fierce, stormlike wind whipped waves across the water.

After days of unprecedented rain without a moment's pause, what had once been a fairly level stretch of ground had become something that could easily be called a river.

Of course, that wasn't what the black-robed man was looking for.

"Have they arrived?"

His companion's question came out of nowhere.

"Not yet."

"They're later than expected. They should've been here by now."

"If they were diligent enough to keep to a schedule, why would they spend their lives robbing people?"

His companion gave a quiet laugh of agreement beneath his low-pulled black hood.

"But I didn't think they'd be this stupid. They may be rootless bandits, but if they dare call themselves an Alliance, I thought they'd have at least a little skill or sense."

"Maybe this is the result of them thinking things through, in their own way."

"What do you mean?"

"Even fools can guess when they're being used as cannon fodder. Most of them are petty bandits, but their leaders—the Seafaring King and the Green Forest Battle King—know how to use their heads."

"So they're deliberately dragging their feet to minimize their losses?"

"The weather's gotten worse, too, but it's certainly possible."

"Even with nearly ten thousand of our people watching those bandits?"

[3849] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to ten ja, about 3.03 meters or 9.94 feet.

"Who knows? Those water ghosts of the Yangtze River Channel League might pull something if they put their minds to it, no matter how closely we watch."

"Ha. If that's true, they're not just stupid. They're beyond saving."

The black-robed man nodded as his companion clicked his tongue.

Neither had said it outright, but everyone in Dark Heaven knew how cruel the Blood Lord could be once he began rampaging with no thought for what came after.

If the combined forces of the Yangtze River Channel League and the Green Forest Alliance arrived only after the fighting was over…

After today, the Central Plains will be clean. You won't find so much as a hair from one of those bandits.

But they still had a chance to survive.

If they arrived in time, before the East Gate opened as planned, and earned even a little credit to save face, they might extend their stubborn lives a while longer.

Of course, that depended on the Blood Lord's mood.

If you want to live, row with every last bit of strength you've got. It'll save us both a headache.

The black-robed man looked toward the East Gate, where the battle was raging.

What did he care whether a bunch of bandits lived or died? But for someone Dark Heaven classified as a corpse sorcerer, it mattered quite a lot.

His role was less that of a soldier fighting on the battlefield than a member of the crew hauling away the corpses scattered across it.

And while he worried about the extra work, the battle around the East Gate, which had been seesawing back and forth, suddenly took a sharp turn.

BOOOOM!

A deafening crash rang out.

It swallowed the sound of the rain and even the occasional thunder. The black-robed man and his companion stared wide-eyed.

The top of the fortress wall was collapsing amid a burst of light.

"What was that…?"

The black-robed man's words came out as a groan.

The flash had lasted only an instant, but he was sure. The destructive energy still flaring across the wall was Force.

Why? We haven't even pressed the attack. Why would Cheongheoja…?

The Kunlun Sect Leader came to mind, but the black-robed man shook his head.

POP! RUMMMBLE!

Another distant flash burst into view. Its pale, ominous light could hardly have come from Daoist martial arts.

"It's not the Black Ghosts, either. They're still holding their positions as ordered."

His companion was right.

The two Black Ghosts were waiting on the battlefield in front of the wall, along with a considerable number of troops the Blood Lord had deliberately held back.

“Which means…”

The black-robed man stopped.

If that Force belonged to neither Cheongheoja nor a Black Ghost, there was only one possibility.

Spies.

The spies they had planted in the Kunlun Sect over many years had finally made their move—a step ahead of schedule.

“What do we do?”

The black-robed man bit his lip.

It was a real pain in the ass.

The combined forces of the Yangtze River Channel League and the Green Forest Alliance, who should have arrived at the battlefield by now, were still nowhere to be seen. Meanwhile, the spies who were supposed to open the East Gate were caught up in an unexpected fight.

To make matters worse, Ma Sanbao—effectively their direct superior—wasn’t there today. The black-robed man would have to make the call himself.

And fast.

He stared at the East Gate, torn between his options. The moment was brief, though it felt like an eternity. Then his eyes widened.

CLANK. GRRRRNNG!

The iron bridge began to move with a heavy grinding sound.

The massive bridge connected to the moat in front of the gate. It was coming down like a ray of light.

The bridge is connected to the gate. It can only be operated from inside.

It was clear proof that the spies planted in the Kunlun Sect were opening the gate—and the perfect opportunity.

There was no point hesitating any longer.

“I command you: answer the call!”

The black-robed man pulled the ritual bell from his belt and shook it hard.

Wooooong.

A sinister sound carried on the wind, its vibrations spreading outward.

The hill they had been standing on answered. Or rather, the enormous masses of flesh that the rain and chaos had made look like a hill did.

GRRRRKK!

The ground shook as if an earthquake had struck. A horrible corpse stench rose through the rain and mud.

BOOM. BOOOOM!

The monsters shook off the mud plastered over their bodies and stood on limbs as thick as great trees. There were a thousand in all.

Perched on one monster's shoulder, the black-robed man shook his ritual bell again and whispered, "Wipe them all out."

At that instant—

—KROOOAAAR!

With a roar as immense as their bodies, a thousand monsters surged toward the battlefield like a wave.

THUDDUDDUDDUD!

Was this what the Yellow River would look like in flood?

Screams rose belatedly from the wall as the defenders spotted the monsters bearing down on them with unstoppable momentum. But those weren't the only enemies they had to face.

"All. Troops."

"Charge."

A low voice emerged from beneath black armor.

At the same time, the two Black Ghosts who had been waiting sprang forward.

SHWOOOSH!

A ghost horse, its white bones exposed, raced ahead like the wind. Several thousand fanatics charged behind it, their cries shaking the battlefield.

"Heaven above and earth below! Let ten thousand demons bow in homage!"

"The Lord of Heaven is with us!"

The immense shouts behind him sent a thrilling shiver up the black-robed man's spine.

Things had strayed a little from the original plan, but those minor setbacks no longer mattered.

He had an army at his back. And beyond the iron bridge, which had descended nearly halfway…

I see it!

There was no doubt. He wasn't seeing things.

As the iron bridge lowered on its chains, the enormous iron gate began to open. The sight was clear in the black-robed man's eyes, brimming with delight.

Tss-tss-tss-tss!

The two corpse sorcerers shook their ritual bells with confident sweeps of their hands. The monsters pushed themselves to their limit and shot toward the East Gate.

We can do this.

Time seemed to slow. The black-robed man held his breath and watched the battlefield.

Flashes of light flickered without pause atop the wall, which was shrouded in crashes and dust. The bridge, more than halfway down, now covered the moat.

Only a little over a hundred jang[3850] remained.

Faster. Faster...!

The monsters leading the charge thundered forward, their footsteps like thunderclaps. Beside them, the ghost horse carrying the two Black Ghosts galloped as if it were a specter.

Whoooosh!

A fierce wind wrapped around the black-robed man. His heart pounded as the distance shrank.

A little over a hundred jang[3851] became half that.

Then half again.

And at last—

GRRRNNG. BOOM!

The long, sturdy iron bridge settled over the moat.

BOOOOM!

The two Black Ghosts crossed first. Behind them, a thousand monsters surged toward the wide-open gate like one enormous spear.

KRRRRRUNCH!

A terrifying crash sent dust billowing into the air. The black-robed man and his companion had finally broken through the barrier of the East Gate, and they let out the breaths they had been holding.

They had done it. By their own strength.

No one could dispute their success—or the magnitude of their feat.

Even the merciless Blood Lord would have to acknowledge it.

For that moment, at least, both men could rejoice.

SHWING—BOOM!

Then a dazzling flash of Force flew in from somewhere and shattered the thick chain connecting the gate and the iron bridge.

CLANK. RRRRRK!

It happened too quickly for anyone to react.

"...!"

"...!"

The two corpse sorcerers stared blankly as the heavy gate began to close. Beyond the settling dust, a hazy figure came into view.

[3850] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to ten ja, about 3.03 meters or 9.94 feet.

[3851] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to ten ja, about 3.03 meters or 9.94 feet.

SPLASH. SPLASH.

Staggering steps. A robe soaked in blood.

Then the middle-aged man's face emerged, his eyes glowing red as if to prove he had committed a forbidden act.

"…You."

The black-robed man slowly parted his lips.

At that moment—

Slice!

A streak of light cut through the dust and across the middle-aged man's—no, Hak Su's—neck.

A voice rang out, thick with sorrow and anger.

"By the solemn rules of the Great Kunlun Sect, I execute the criminals of our sect."

THUD. FWOOSH.

The headless body collapsed, and the dust cloud parted.

Only then did the two corpse sorcerers see their surroundings clearly. Only then did they understand.

The spies hadn't lowered the bridge and opened the gate. The defenders of the East Gate had.

A trap…!

The realization struck like lightning.

But the shock lasted only a moment. There were fewer than three thousand defenders, and Cheongheoja looked exhausted. The black-robed man's lips twisted into a grin.

"You dare try such a shoddy trick?"

It was a trap—but at the same time, it wasn't.

The gate had shut out the fanatics following them, but their strongest forces—the Black Ghosts and the monsters—were already inside.

"Did you think this would stop us?"

A young man standing beside Cheongheoja answered his scornful question.

"Why not? We've been through a whole lot worse. Right, everyone?"

The black-robed man frowned at him. There was something about the young man's face that made him want to torment him.

Just then, a young beggar with grime streaming down his face spoke up.

"Quit calling me a beggar. It hurts the feelings of the beggar listening."

"Who the hell are you…?"

"Honestly, we end up in situations like this every time. I can't even figure out how much extra pay we're owed anymore."

A cold-faced young man cut him off. Then a clear voice, utterly at odds with the mood, rang out.

“But we always made it through. Together.”

“True, but this time is different. The most important person isn’t here.”

“Right. Taishan wants to eat Pavilion Master. Old Man Nam, too.”

“Taishan. You mean you miss them, not that you want to eat them.”

“Oh. Got mixed up. My lord is smart, as expected.”

“Not bad. Still, not as good as me.”

Young men and women the corpse sorcerers had never seen before. A hulking man who looked none too bright. A wild-haired eccentric.

Faced with the bizarre sight, the two sorcerers couldn’t think of anything to ask.

More precisely, they didn’t think it was worth asking.

“Wipe them all out.”

The ritual bell began to move with his quiet mutter.

Boooooo!

A horn sounded in the distance, and everyone at the East Gate stopped moving.

For some, that sound meant hope. For others, utter despair.

“The Yangtze River Channel League…”

Someone’s low groan hung heavily in the air.

Chapter 1118

Boooooo!

The horn sounded far away, reaching the defenders at the East Gate. For a moment, they found themselves wishing it belonged to reinforcements coming to help them.

But the truth was cruel and unmistakable.

“The Yangtze River Channel League…”

The groan that slipped from someone’s lips spoke for every defender there.

They could not see its source, but they heard it clearly.

Not the west. Not the south. Not the north.

It came from beyond the East Gate wall where they stood. That could mean only one thing.

They’re here.

Everyone knew who was coming from the east.

The Green Forest Alliance and the Yangtze River Channel League.

Two vast bands of outlaws who roamed the broad, blue rivers and mountains, yet still wanted a piece of the world itself.

And with them would come the forces of Dark Heaven.

An enemy army estimated at thirty thousand had finally arrived, following the long course of the Yangtze and pushing upstream against the Yellow River’s mighty current.

As the defenders fell silent before that reality, the two corpse sorcerers twisted their mouths into grins.

“You fools.”

“Do you understand now how shallow your little scheme was?”

The black-robed man and his companion made no effort to hide their delight.

They might have fallen for the defenders’ trap and ended up inside the fortress, but their forces were strong enough to overcome a three-to-one disadvantage.

Now tens of thousands of reinforcements had arrived at just the right time. They were almost embarrassed to remember how tense they’d been when they realized they were trapped.

The Lord of Heaven truly is helping us.

The black-robed man smiled faintly at the thought of the new heaven he served.

Then—

Step.

A group moved forward. They ought to have retreated at once, but instead, they came closer.

Of course. I knew the Kunlun fools would come out like this.

He spotted Cheongheoja and the Kunlun Disciples at the front and nodded to himself. Then several others popped out beside them, and he sighed.

"I've been meaning to ask… Who the hell are you people?"

If they'd looked ordinary, he wouldn't have given them a second thought. But even to a corpse sorcerer, the seven men and women made up a bizarre group.

Unfazed, they answered—or rather, the young man at their center spoke for them.

"Swift Wind Sword Hyuk Mujin. That's who I am."

The black-robed man's eyes widened.

"Swift Wind Sword?"

"That's right. So you've heard of—"

"Never heard of you."

"…Fine. Let me introduce myself again. I'm Hyuk Mujin, Vice Squad Leader of the Jin Dragon Squad. Though I'm taking a break from that for now."

"I haven't heard of that either. You might as well keep taking a break. Not that you'll be in this world after today."

"…Damn it. Then how about Hyuk Mujin, Vice Captain of the Fire Dragon Pavilion?"

This time, his companions' eyes widened.

"What? Since when? Do Vice Captains get extra pay?"

"Why would they choose Warrior Hyuk, of all people? Wasn't the position vacant?"

"I don't know. Honestly, I thought I was the best fit among us, but it seems I've been passed over because I'm from the unorthodox faction."

"Discrimination. Know. Delicious."

"Is this guy possessed by a glutton? In all my life, I've never met anyone more of a beggar than my Master."

"Oh, so your Master's a beggar too. No wonder. The moment I saw you, I thought you looked like you'd be good at begging for a living."

Greed and distrust they couldn't hide even now. Disappointment with the orthodox faction's rigged playing field. Endless appetite. And last of all, disrespect toward their Master and a steady stream of rudeness, as natural as breathing.

The black-robed man and his companion felt dizzy, as though they were staring into a true abyss. If not for Hyuk Mujin's answer, they might not have dared open their mouths.

But Fire Dragon Pavilion was familiar even to them. Everyone in Dark Heaven knew the name, regardless of rank, because of its connection to one particular man.

"The Fire Dragon Pavilion… You're Jin Taekyung's people?"

Hyuk Mujin gave his companions a cool look, then answered solemnly.

"That's right."

“Thanks, but strictly speaking, I’m with the Beggars’ Sect, not the Fire Dragon Pavilion.”

“Neither am I. I think.”

“…Could the two of you please keep your mouths shut? Please?”

The black-robed man looked them over again.

His duties hadn’t required him to know minor details like Swift Wind Sword or the Jin Dragon Squad, but he knew of the Fire Dragon Pavilion. Whenever Jin Taekyung had stood in the way of Dark Heaven’s grand plans, the Fire Dragon Pavilion had helped him, and its reputation had spread throughout the world.

He didn’t know why the one who looked most like a nobody was its Vice Captain. Still, he could see how this strange assortment had ended up together—and why they dared step forward in a situation like this.

“Birds of a feather flock together. You’ve gathered all the crazy men and women who don’t value their lives, just like your Pavilion Master.”

The black-robed man let out a short laugh.

The Fire Dragon Pavilion? He’d admit they had been a thorn in Dark Heaven’s side. But only because Jin Taekyung had been there.

Without him, the people before the black-robed man were merely young prodigies who had yet to come into their own. Puppies drunk on bravado and dreams of heroism, unable to tell when to advance and when to retreat.

“You spent your chance to run spouting nonsense. That’s why you’re going to die.”

What more was there to say to puppies whose teeth hadn’t even come in? An old, wounded beast quietly gathering its strength for one final struggle would be another matter.

There’s a Supreme Peak master among them. We still can’t let our guard down.

You worry too much. With the forces they have, they can’t get through the monsters to hurt us.

The black-robed man and his companion exchanged a silent glance. Watching Cheongheoja and the Kunlun Disciples aim their swords at them, they raised the ritual bells in their hands.

Tss-tss-tss-tss.

—Grrrrrr.

The thousand monsters growled in response to the waves from the bells.

Each was as large as two grown men put together. Their bodies were so tough, and healed so quickly, that nothing short of the level of injuring others with Sword Energy could leave a fatal wound. Ready to lunge, they fixed their eyes on the defenders.

Ssshhhh.

Beside them, the two Black Ghosts radiated a terrifying energy. Together, they gave off such overwhelming killing intent that even the defenders, resolved to fight to the death, instinctively stepped back.

Then, at last—

"Kill every last one of them."

At the cold command, the two corpse sorcerers swept their ritual bells through the air.

Tss-tss-tss-tss-tss.

The cursed sound waves, branded deep in the souls of the Black Ghosts and monsters, swept across the East Gate.

From beyond it came a quiet voice.

"Why would we run? We need to buy time by spouting whatever bullshit we can."

"…?"

"…?"

The black-robed man and his companion stopped without realizing it and blinked.

Was it because they couldn't understand the words of that nobody—Hyuk Mujin, who'd butted in out of habit and now claimed to be the Fire Dragon Pavilion's Vice Captain?

No.

The Black Ghosts were charging toward the defenders. The thousand monsters were not. Their limbs trembled as though something invisible held them in place.

I gave the command… So why?

Just as the question struck the two corpse sorcerers—

"Hey, can't you do it?"

Hyuk Mujin turned, and someone appeared behind him. Someone the two sorcerers had never expected to see here.

"I tried to focus as hard as I could. Hngh. But there's no way I can manage the Black Ghosts…"

"…!"

"…!"

His voice trailed off as their eyes met.

The two corpse sorcerers stared wide-eyed at their missing companion. They'd thought he would be dead by now. Ever since the Slaughter Saint had captured him at Qinghai Lake, he'd vanished without a trace.

Then they saw the dozen or so ritual bells in his hands. The bells had clearly belonged to the other corpse sorcerers who had died near Qinghai Lake. A sad smile spread across his bruised face.

"Sorry. That's how it went."

At that moment—

SHWEEEE!

A dazzling streak of light cut through the darkness and blocked the two Black Ghosts, who were racing forward like the wind alongside their ghost horse.

KWA-BOOM!

A deafening crash sent wind sweeping in every direction.

At the same time, through the thick cloud of dust, Cheongheoja and a wild-haired eccentric—no, a Great Sir—appeared and spoke to the Black Ghosts.

“Where do you think you’re going?”

“Couldn’t we talk this over first…? Oh, that was quite a good line.”

The two corpse sorcerers gritted their teeth. Amid the frantic fighting at the four walls, they had failed to notice another Supreme Peak master.

Perhaps what angered them most, though, was the insolent smile on that nobody’s face.

“If Captain—no, if the Pavilion Master were here, he’d say this.”

At Hyuk Mujin’s gesture, the captured corpse sorcerer shook the bells in both hands like mad.

Not one bell. More than ten.

Tss-tss-tss-tss!

The desperate jingle, driven by a stronger instinct to survive than at any other point in his life, pushed him one step beyond the limit of his usual ability.

In other words—

—Ghk, grrk?

He could not wrest complete control from the two corpse sorcerers who had been his companions yesterday and were his enemies today. But he could throw the thousand monsters into confusion.

—Kraaaagh!

—Gueeeeee!

Red eyes flashed wildly. Their killing intent lost its original target.

THOOM!

KRRRUNCH!

Freed from whatever had held them still, the monsters rampaged without distinguishing friend from foe. As the two corpse sorcerers froze at the sight, Hyuk Mujin’s words struck their ears like arrows.

“From now on, kill each other.”

Boooooo!

Over the horn sounding ever closer by the moment, the monsters’ ferocious roars mingled with the defenders’ shouts.

Chapter 1119

BOOOOM!

A deafening crash rang out, and the ground shook.

A thousand monsters rampaged without distinguishing friend from foe. Three thousand defenders stood ready to fight to the death. And four Supreme Peak masters flashed across the battlefield, clashing again and again.

The battle around the East Gate began in greater chaos and brutality than ever before.

Even the man who had designed and set this whole situation in motion could barely suppress his fear, despite putting all his strength into it.

—Kyaaaaa!

Hyuk Mujin watched the monsters charge, his eyes trembling as they roared.

They stood over one jang[3852] tall, with limbs as thick as the trunks of great trees. Their strength and speed far exceeded human limits. Their charge felt like a wave nothing could stop.

How has Captain fought so many of these things?

Jin Taekyung came to mind at once. He had always fought at the front, at the center of everyone else, risking his life.

And Mujin understood all over again why he had survived so many crises. He understood the enormous gap Taekyung had filled alone, and the weight of the responsibility he had carried.

So this is what it felt like.

Hyuk Mujin let out a ragged breath. His question would never reach Taekyung.

He was afraid. Afraid enough to throw down his sword and run as far as he could.

I would have done it before. No question.

But things had changed. The heir to a venerable fabric shop had become a martial artist of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, and he had come too far to turn and run.

The people who had gladly taken him along despite his lack of talent and skill had taught him too much. Jin Taekyung most of all.

“Never retreat.”

The words slipped past his trembling lips. They were less a command to the allies around him than a vow to himself.

They were also words the reckless Third Young Master—who now existed only in Mujin’s memories—had once said to him.

“Once you retreat… you’ll never be able to move forward again.”

So Hyuk Mujin did not retreat.

[3852] A jang is a Korean unit of length equal to ten cheok, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

He suppressed the fear surging up from the depths of his chest, steadied his trembling sword tip, and charged at the monsters with all his might, roaring at the top of his lungs.

Just as Jin Taekyung had. Just as the other companions who had always believed in him did.

SHWEEEE!

A fierce wind whirled around him, wrapping his entire body.

Anyone who has experienced war agrees on one thing.

Battle was another word for madness, and war was all that madness gathered in one place. Keep cutting down the enemy before you and dodging the attacks that never stopped coming, and soon you would forget everything you knew.

Mujin clearly remembered hearing those words from an elderly man when he was a child.

He also remembered what the old man had told him when Mujin declared he would become a martial artist.

Hope is dazzling, but reality is cruel.

Yes. That was probably how he'd put it.

Now Mujin felt the truth of those words down to his bones.

THUD!

A heavy blow sent a shock through his entire body.

He had no time to react. Even if he had, he could not have dodged it completely. His strength had run out long ago.

KRRRUNCH!

How many times had the sky and ground turned over in his vision, bleached white? The first thing Hyuk Mujin felt after he was flung a long way was pain, great and small, sweeping through his body.

Blood came up with his cough and ran from the corner of his mouth.

His aching joints and twisted innards told him the truth: he was in terrible shape.

Damn… it.

Mujin gritted his teeth and swallowed the blood rising in his throat.

The old man's face had long since faded from his memory, but his words had not. Reality was cruel.

To Mujin, at least.

Only fifteen minutes, and look at me.

He could barely make his body move. A weak, self-mocking laugh escaped him.

Losing control had not made the monsters any less powerful. The creatures Dark Heaven had made were as strong as they were hideous.

Without the fine sword still in his hand, Mujin doubted he could have brought down twenty of them on his own.

Come to think of it, I only managed that much because of Captain.

He looked at the blade. Even after cutting through the monsters' tough bones and flesh, it had lost none of its keen edge.

The sword had been forged from part of the iron chain Jin Taekyung had given him after finally breaking free of his iron balls, just before the Star-Array Grand Banquet. It was the very chain the Fire Gate Clan had made to bind criminals of its own sect.

Only part of that chain had gone into the blade, but it contained a full four nyang[3853] of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron. Its strength and sharpness made it worthy of being called a fine sword.

People who knew its origins sometimes teased Mujin that the sword was too good for him. He always bristled, but deep down, he knew they had a point. He had been stuck in the First Rate realm, making no progress. He owned a sword this precious only because Taekyung cared for his subordinate.

"Always snapping at people… and still making sure they have everything they need."

Mujin gave a faint, amused snort and slowly forced his screaming body upright.

Then he wrung out what strength remained and rushed the nearest enemy from behind.

Slice!

Perhaps it was exhaustion. His sword tip wavered at the last moment, but it still cut through his target's neck. This enemy, after all, was made of flesh and blood like Mujin.

SPLAT.

The headless fanatic staggered and fell into a pool of blood. Looking down at the body, Mujin felt his heart sink.

If only we'd had a little more strength. Just a little…

The strategy using the captured corpse sorcerer had worked. Most of the thousand monsters had fallen into confusion, and the three thousand defenders had charged into the chaos, driving their enemies back without regard for their own lives.

But the enemies they faced were not all inside the walls.

[3853] A nyang is a traditional Korean unit of weight equal to ten don. Four nyang is about 150 g (5.29 oz).

While the East Gate defenders gave everything they had to fighting the monsters, Dark Heaven's fanatics climbed over the walls using hooks and ladders. The moment they entered the battle, they tipped the balance away from the defenders.

Even now—

"…!"

"…!"

The eight-character creed, steeped in madness and all too familiar by now, rang out with a muffled force.

Mujin saw fanatics pouring down from the walls. He saw his exhausted allies, and the monsters beginning, one by one, to come back to their senses.

He heard the strong blare of a horn, now only a few hundred jang[3854] away. And he saw the face of someone who had recovered his smile as though nothing had happened.

"Your struggle ends here."

Mujin could not hear the words. But he could see the black-robed man's lips moving far away, before the tightly shut gate.

The man's companion had been killed by the monsters under his command as soon as the battle began. This sorcerer had managed to retain some control. Dozens of monsters still shielded him, and he was alive to enjoy a victory that, after one brief scare, seemed all but certain.

Yeah, maybe it really is over. But…

If Mujin ran away here, where would he ever win?

Hyuk Mujin muttered to himself as he staggered forward.

Forward, not back.

Whoooosh!

Even through his dulled senses, he felt the violent rush of air. A monster's fist, backed by hundreds of geun[3855] of force, came down toward the crown of his head. It would crush him in an instant.

Then—

Slice.

A sharp streak of Sword Energy came from somewhere and split the thick bone and flesh.

"It's too late. If you don't want to die, get back! Now!"

That face. That voice.

But Hyuk Mujin did not stop for Song Ilseom's warning. More precisely, he heard nothing at all.

[3854] A jang is a Korean unit of length equal to ten cheok, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[3855] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb); here it describes the force behind the blow.

At that moment, only one person's voice echoed in his ears like a hallucination.

"Mujin."

Jin Taekyung.

The man Mujin wanted to be like more than anyone—and the man who had shown him that he never could be.

Mujin moved his lips, stiff with dried blood, remembering their conversation before the battle.

"Yes. Go ahead."

SHWICK!

The hiss of something cutting through the air from his blind spot answered him instead. But Song Ilseom was not the only one who wanted Mujin to live.

THUNK!

A fanatic charging Mujin from the side arched backward like a bow.

Ju Hwaran drew her sword from the collapsing man's back. A dozen or so enemies who had been moving to stop Mujin changed direction and rushed her instead.

KRRRANG!

Steel rang out amid the unending screams and shouts. Mujin walked as though entranced along the path they had opened wider for him.

He left everything around him behind and listened to the voice still ringing in his ears.

"If something goes wrong—I mean, on the slightest chance that it does…"

Taekyung had been different then. There had been no laughter in his face, no trace of mischief.

"At least die where I can see you."

And then, facing his subordinate, who had gone rigid, he'd forced a strained smile.

"Of course, that won't happen. But if it did, I'd be able to avenge you, wouldn't I?"

It was the first time Taekyung had said anything like that.

Through all the dangers they had survived together, he had only ever told Mujin one of two things.

Run.

Or make sure you survive.

Whatever danger came, Taekyung was always the one at the center, the one out in front. He had never hesitated to take the lead in this damn gamble they played with their lives.

To protect a subordinate, a companion, his master—or someone he had never even met.

Mujin could not help respecting him. And he could not help giving him the answer he wanted.

"Of course we'll win this time, too. But yes. If it comes to that, I promise I will."

Perhaps that was when Mujin had first begun quietly turning the word death over in his mind. When he had truly prepared himself to die.

But…

If I'm going to die, I won't die for nothing.

He forced up a corner of his blood-crusted mouth and brought down the sword in his clenched hand.

Slice!

The two fanatics blocking his path fell at the same time, as though they had planned it. So easily that it looked like a scene from a play.

Then, at the fanatics who had stopped short, eyes wide at this unexpected turn, a fierce torrent of saber energy swept in.

KRRRUNCH!

Beneath a fountain of blood came a cold voice, strangely at odds with the ferocity of the attack.

"Go. If that's your choice… I'll open the way."

That was all.

Sama Pyo plunged among the enemy without hesitation. A strong hand caught Mujin's shoulder as he stumbled.

"Hyuk Mu…"

Mujin quietly shook his head at Taishan.

He knew what Taishan wanted to say. Killing the black-robed corpse sorcerer, now just twenty jang[3856] away, would not change who won this battle.

But Taekyung would have said that even if they died, the trade would be worth it.

"Hur…ry."

It took nearly all Mujin's strength to get the word out.

Taishan watched him silently, then tightened his grip. And with one short sentence, he used all his strength to send Mujin flying far away.

"Let's go eat something good later, Vice Captain."

SHWEEEE!

Wind tore past Mujin's body. He answered Taishan in his heart.

We will. We'll eat until we burst.

And then the black-robed man's wide eyes were right in front of him.

Slice!

A flash carrying the last of Mujin's strength swept across the corpse sorcerer's neck.

[3856] A jang is a Korean unit of length equal to ten cheok, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

In a battle where thousands—tens of thousands—were locked together, one person's death might mean nothing.

But the single head rising into the air was enough to change the battle around the East Gate.

Thud. Clatter.

The head fell. The ritual bell dropped from the dead man's loosened hand.

At the same instant, the roughly three hundred monsters that had survived the terrible melee and were still rampaging stopped moving.

"…!"

"…!"

For one stretched-thin instant, silence fell.

Some stared wide-eyed. Some smiled faintly.

And someone else, who had made all of this possible, felt a shiver run down his spine as he silently looked at the head at his feet.

No—not at the head. At the clean cut across the corpse sorcerer's neck.

At the trace of what people under heaven called Sword Energy.

It wasn't the sword…

It had happened for only an instant. Perhaps, with his mind already half gone, he had imagined it.

That did not matter. He had finally done it with his own strength.

He had proved, at least a little, why he'd been able to defeat twenty monsters, and why he deserved to stand alongside companions who were far more than he could ever hope to deserve.

And just as a feeble smile formed on Hyuk Mujin's lips—

BOOOOM!

A blast like the sky splitting open shook heaven and earth. An immense wave of qi flung open the tightly shut gate.

Wooooooong.

The air trembled.

Through the faint darkness, a shadow wreathed in an aura as immense as a mountain leaned toward Hyuk Mujin, standing alone before the gate.

"What is your name?"

In that moment, Mujin knew this was where his life would end. He would not be able to keep the promise he had made to Taekyung before the battle.

"Fire Dragon Pavilion… No. Swift Wind Sword Hyuk Mujin."

He answered more calmly than he ever had before.

Then, with the shadow's quiet reply, he felt an immense force drive into his chest.

"I'll remember it."

POOM!

Hyuk Mujin’s vision plunged into darkness.

Chapter 1120

Boom!

The low sound of air being torn apart rang out, and the whole world seemed to stop.

At least, that was how it felt to the members of the Fire Dragon Pavilion who saw a palm strike, launched at lightning speed, hit Hyuk Mujin in the chest.

And then—

Splatter.

As Hyuk Mujin's body crumpled, scattering dark-red blood, the world that had stopped began to move again.

"No!"

Taishan's eyes were bloodshot. The muscles across his body bulged as if they might burst.

At the unbelievable sight before him, he let out a thunderous roar and charged toward the gate.

He forgot his exhaustion. He cast aside his fear.

Like an enraged bull, Taishan swung his two-section staff with all his strength and pressed forward.

Whoooosh! Wham!

Each time the furious wind rose, brains flew and bones shattered like powder.

Fanatics had taken the place of the monsters, frozen like statues at the death of the corpse sorcerer. They tried to block his path, but none could easily stop Taishan in his rage.

No—more accurately, they couldn't stop them.

KRRRUNCH!

A fierce rush of saber energy tore through the space, and severed limbs flew in every direction.

Amid the swirling spray of blood, Sama Pyo's eyes—usually so composed—blazed with blue fire.

And someone else plunged into the dozens of fanatics closing in around Sama Pyo, heedless of their fallen comrades.

SHWEEEE!

Song Ilseom's narrow-bladed sword shot through the air in swift, economical movements, each one utterly cruel.

Even the epithet Soul-Chasing Guest seemed inadequate.

Stab! Stab-stab!

Song Ilseom stabbed and twisted at every opening.

With the most efficient movements, he dealt his enemies certain pain and death.

Blood burst from a terrible scream and splashed across his face. Blades rained down indiscriminately from every direction, leaving cuts large and small across his body. But his tightly pressed lips didn't tremble.

The blood flowing through Song Ilseom's veins came from an illustrious family. But what had made him the Soul-Chasing Guest was blood shed on the battlefield.

He had once left the path of the wandering martial artist, which he'd walked all his life to repay the debt of an earlier generation. Now he was throwing his life away to repay a comrade's blood debt.

He gave himself over to pure rage, without a thought for the cost.

And Song Ilseom wasn't the only one who felt it.

"How dare you…!"

"You bastards are lower than this beggar!"

Sssshing! Slice!

Ju Hwaran, Gung Gibang, and the thousand defenders who had barely survived gritted their teeth and forced themselves to their feet.

Hope that they could win?

They'd long since erased it from their hearts.

The monsters had stopped moving, but fanatics remained—several times as many. Worse, tens of thousands of enemy reinforcements had appeared.

But hope wasn't the only thing that could move people.

In that dark, bottomless despair, they had seen it clearly:

Hyuk Mujin, refusing to lose his dignity until the very last moment before he fell.

Fire Dragon Pavilion… No.

Before an enemy they could not possibly defeat, his spirit had not bent.

Swift Wind Sword Hyuk Mujin.

CLANG-CLANG-CLANG!

At last, a thousand blades began to shine again, rippling like a wave.

The defenders clamped their hands over severed arms and slashed-open bellies. They bit their tongues to suppress their pain and fear, gripped their weapons, and stood.

With all their strength, they shouted what might be their last words—the final proof that they had existed in this world.

"Knife-and-Dagger Hero So Gyuhyeok is here!"

"Swift Blade Shakes the Heavens Mu Cheol is here too!"

"Figures the orthodox faction would have such fancy titles. I'm Black-Killing Sword Jo Hyeok, you bastards!"

Masters of the orthodox faction, the unorthodox faction, and those who belonged somewhere between the two.

Their roots, their branches, and the fruit they bore were different. But the great cause they sought to protect was the same.

“Destroy the Demonic Path and restore Heaven.”

Destroy the Demonic Path and set the heavens right.

An old Daoist[3857] murmured the four characters they had once shouted until they were spitting blood, back when they fought a hundred thousand followers of the Demonic Path. He tightened his grip on his sword.

Slice.

A body split into dozens of pieces along a streak of white light and scattered.

The Black Ghost had finally met its true end. The old Daoist[3858] turned away, and Cheongheoja’s voice rang out, carrying the force of his internal energy.

“I miss those days. The time when you and I were ‘us.‘ Don’t you?”

In Cheongheoja’s eyes, steeped in sorrow and anger, a huge figure stood before the ruined gate in the distance.

“Seafaring King Pa Ryun.”

The next moment—

“You haven’t changed, Cheongheoja.”

With a heavy voice that brushed over Hyuk Mujin’s fallen head, the master of the long, vast Yangtze strode out beneath the faint moonlight.

Two more unwelcome guests emerged from behind his imposing frame.

One was a mysterious figure dressed in black from head to toe. The other, a slight old man standing beside him, had a familiar face.

“It’s been a long time, Cheongheoja.”

At the greeting, Cheongheoja’s gaze turned cold.

“Right. You were there too. Green Forest Battle King Tae Gunak.”

“Such a sharp edge to your words. Last time we met, I believe you called me a fellow Daoist,[3859] not ‘you.‘”

“Those days will never return. Not after the irrevocable choices some people made.”

Tae Gunak looked around, his brow furrowing slightly.

“I’m sorry things came to this. I mean that.”

“You mean that…”

Cheongheoja murmured the words hollowly, then drew up every last bit of his remaining internal energy.

[3857] A Daoist follows Daoism, a Chinese religious and philosophical tradition centered on the Dao, or Way.

[3858] A Daoist follows Daoism, a Chinese religious and philosophical tradition centered on the Dao, or Way.

[3859] A Daoist follows Daoism, a Chinese religious and philosophical tradition centered on the Dao, or Way.

Hummm.

As if sensing that his master's end was near, the treasured sword that had been with him all his life trembled.

Not far away, Great Sir was still struggling against Black Ghost. But Cheongheoja's senses and energy had already focused entirely on the unwelcome guests guarding the gate.

He had to bring down more than the two giants who divided the world's dark-path forces between them.

There was also the mysterious man in black. Instinct told Cheongheoja he was no weaker than either of them.

He must be one of Dark Heaven's key figures. But who?

The question crossed his mind, but Cheongheoja could only smile bitterly.

Worry was ultimately a luxury for those who survived.

For an old Daoist[3860] who had to face three Supreme Peak masters alone, there was no point in worrying any further.

All he could do was resolve to meet his end without shame before those remarkable young people, still advancing as they cut down their enemies.

"Come, you thieves of the world. I am Cheongheoja of Kunlun."

The old Daoist's[3861] eyes flashed, colder than ever.

"Let's finish this quickly."

A quiet voice reached every ear.

Rumble.

The black-robed man stepped forward, and immense qi began to churn around him.

Cheongheoja, charging with all his strength. Great Sir, fleeing in haste from the Black Ghost's sword. The Fire Dragon Pavilion members fighting their way through the fanatics, and the thousand defenders following them in their final stand.

Every one of them stared wide-eyed, trembling at the eruption of power that filled their vision as though it would be the last thing they ever saw.

SHWAAAA!

A single line—impossible to block, impossible even to see clearly—cut across the world.

[3860] A Daoist follows Daoism, a Chinese religious and philosophical tradition centered on the Dao, or Way.

[3861] A Daoist follows Daoism, a Chinese religious and philosophical tradition centered on the Dao, or Way.

"…!"

Why had his body suddenly gone rigid?

Where had this enormous rock come from, pressing down on his chest?

Jin Taekyung couldn't tell what had caused it or why.

No—he didn't want to know.

The moment he found out what this sudden feeling of dread meant, he felt the last thread barely holding him together might snap.

But despite that, Jin Taekyung's gaze toward somewhere in the east, hidden behind enemies and buildings, had begun to tremble.

This is…

His vision was blurred as though by mist, his senses dull as an axe waiting for winter. His whole body sagged like waterlogged cotton.

Even so, he could faintly hear and feel it.

The enormous blast that had rung out far to the east. The steep surge of power.

It pointed to only one thing.

The East Gate… has fallen.

He wanted to deny it, to tell himself it couldn't possibly be true. But it was no use.

Unlike the fire raging in his chest, his mind had gone cold. It faced the reality coming toward him head-on.

It's them. It has to be.

Pa Ryun, the Alliance Leader of the Yangtze River Channel League.

And Tae Gunak, the Alliance Leader of the Green Forest Alliance—Pa Ryun's equal and lifelong rival.

The two giants who divided the world's dark-path forces between them had finally reached the battlefield.

And they'd brought an army of thirty thousand.

…Then that means—

Unable to finish the thought, Jin Taekyung raised his hazy eyes and looked around.

People leaned against the low walls of the Inner City, gasping for breath amid countless bodies and pools of blood scattered in every direction.

Some of those who had retreated from the three sides other than the East Gate had familiar faces. Others had not appeared at all.

Why?

Jin Taekyung wondered in a daze.

Why hadn't they returned yet?

He already knew the answer. Still, he asked himself again.

Right. So that's how it ended.

A weak laugh escaped him.

He thought of the faces he would never see again.

He felt the presence of tens of thousands of enemies surrounding the Inner City, and of the monster leading them.

KWA-BOOOOM!

With a tremendous crash, the Inner City crumbled.

Chapter 1121

Regardless of a wall's height, size, or durability, its mere existence made a huge difference in a siege.

Even the shabbiest wall was still a wall.

Xining's Inner City had been built with street fighting against outside invaders in mind. Its walls might not compare to those of the Outer City, but they still offered a considerable advantage.

It should have, anyway.

KWA-BOOOOM!

It began and ended in an instant.

All because of one man.

No—one monster.

Rumble.

The Inner City wall crumbled with a roar like a scream, raising a thick cloud of dust. Watching it fall, the Blood Lord laughed wildly.

He prided himself on having gained power beyond human limits. To him, the sight was laughable.

They should have been scattering in every direction, running for their lives. Instead, they'd fled to the Inner City?

"Did you think a pile of rocks like that could stop me?"

With a low mutter, the Blood Lord raised the Red Blade once more.

Shhhhh!

A blood-red flash surged along the blade.

A massive half-moon of Force took shape in an instant, about to tear across the space before him—

"Stop!"

An urgent voice rang out.

But even as someone appeared to stop him, the Blood Lord brought the Red Blade down without hesitation.

WHOOOSH!

The space turned red.

In a flash like a bolt of lightning, the Force crossed dozens of jang[3862] and sank into the dust cloud.

No—it swallowed the cloud whole.

Its ferocity could only be called monstrous.

KRRRUNCH!

[3862] A jang is a traditional length equal to ten ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

As the crash and tremor shook heaven and earth, the Blood Lord smiled. Then he turned toward the uninvited guest who had dared to stop him.

“You’re late. You should’ve said something sooner. I might’ve been able to stop just in time.”

The Blood Lord sounded almost casual. The Grand Sorceress’s gaze turned cold.

“What have you done?”

“What does it look like?”

He shrugged and gestured with his chin toward the distant cloud of dust.

“Crushing their last hope. Making sure they won’t even want to resist anymore.”

“You…”

Her voice trailed off. She stared at the still-smiling Blood Lord, unable to continue. Then she asked calmly about the one thing that mattered most: whether a certain person was still alive.

“So he’s still safe, isn’t he?”

“Safe? Better than fine. Look at me. Can’t you feel this power?”

The Blood Lord spread his arms with the innocent pride of a child showing something off to a parent. A chill settled in the Grand Sorceress’s chest.

He was different.

He had changed.

Everything about him was different from usual.

His pupils were completely blood-red. An unprecedented aura flowed naturally from his grotesque body, as though human and monster had been fused together. But the greatest change lay elsewhere.

Madness.

The Grand Sorceress could sense it now: a bottomless madness whose depth and intensity she could not begin to fathom.

Instinct also told her she must never let him know she had noticed.

“Cut the pointless nonsense. You know better than anyone that isn’t what I meant.”

“That hurts. I didn’t know there was something you cared about more than the well-being of a comrade in the same boat.”

“Since when were we so close?”

“Well, if you put it like that, I have nothing to say. Fine.”

The Blood Lord let out an exaggerated sigh.

“Jin Taekyung is still alive. Probably.”

“Probably?”

“Then let me correct that to definitely. There’s no way those old monsters in there couldn’t protect one little brat.”

Even to the Grand Sorceress, it didn’t sound like an unreasonable guess.

Just fifteen minutes earlier, the defenders had retreated from the walls on all three sides except the East Gate and gathered in the Inner City. Among them were the Bow Saint, the Slaughter Saint, and the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

They'd all suffered serious injuries while withdrawing to the Inner City, but even so, their wounds shouldn't have been severe enough to prevent them from keeping Jin Taekyung safe.

As if to prove the Blood Lord right, familiar faces appeared beyond the thinning dust cloud.

And among them was the most important person of all—the one who absolutely could not die.

"…!"

The Slaughter Saint and the Bow Saint were pale with exhaustion and internal injuries. Jeok Cheongang looked worse than either of them.

But the Grand Sorceress barely saw them now.

She saw only one person.

Jin Taekyung.

The moment she spotted him, she let out the breath she had been holding.

There was no mistaking him. He was drenched in blood from head to toe, but he was alive.

He could barely stand, using a white-glowing spear as a cane while Cheongpung supported him. For the Grand Sorceress, that was enough.

She had Magic—the mysterious power the Lord of Heaven had given her.

Still, Jin Taekyung's condition looked so grave she could sense his precarious state even from this far away.

I have to take him to that person. As soon as possible.

His injuries might be beyond even Magic's power to heal completely.

The anxious Grand Sorceress was about to recite a teleportation spell silently when—

"What's the rush?"

"…!"

The Blood Lord's low whisper came from behind her. Her eyes widened before she could stop them.

How?

If the foundation of martial arts was the accumulation of energy, Magic depended on attunement to it. That made her more sensitive than anyone to its fluctuations.

Yet the Blood Lord had taken a position behind her without her seeing or sensing him. He stood there smiling like a predator with its prey already in its mouth.

“The more I think about it, the more interesting Magic seems. Traveling thousands—tens of thousands—of ri[3863] in the blink of an eye… Even saving someone who’s half dead. Am I right?”

His hot breath touched the back of her neck. The Grand Sorceress spoke through clenched teeth.

“I already told you. Cut the pointless nonsense.”

“Nonsense?”

The Blood Lord gave a short laugh and licked his lips with his red tongue.

“Not this time, I’m afraid. I don’t want to let prey I’ve already caught escape like that.”

Realizing what he meant, the Grand Sorceress gritted her teeth.

“Blood Lord, you’ve finally gone mad.”

“That’s strange. I could’ve sworn you always called me a madman.”

“You dare go against that person’s will…?”

After a brief silence, the Blood Lord answered with a bright smile.

At last, he had cast off his mask and shackles. He was freer—and stronger—than ever.

“Why not? Just this once.”

At that moment—

Slice!

A streak of red flashed. The Grand Sorceress’s hazy figure appeared three jang[3864] away.

Then—

SPLAAASH!

Her body staggered, spraying blood, before collapsing like a puppet with its strings cut.

Splat.

That was the end.

Her body lay motionless in a pool of blood. Her eyes remained wide open, without a trace of life in them.

“I wasn’t planning to kill her… Oh, well. Can’t be helped.”

The Blood Lord muttered to himself and looked around.

Countless eyes stared at him in the sudden silence. Tens of thousands of fanatics surrounded the Inner City without a gap in their lines, watching the unexpected scene with eyes wide.

This time, even they could not hide their agitation.

[3863] In this Chinese setting, a ri corresponds to a Chinese li, about 500 m (0.311 mi).

[3864] A jang is a traditional length equal to ten ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

The Blood Lord addressed them calmly, choosing the shortest and surest method—one possible only in Dark Heaven.

"By the command of the great Lord of Heaven, I have executed the apostate. From now on, I will command the entire army."

"…!"

"…!"

"Kill every last one of them."

The order broke the heavy silence.

Rumble!

With a roar that shook heaven and earth, tens of thousands of fanatics charged toward the Inner City.

To punish the wicked heretics who dared oppose the Lord of Heaven—the living god and sole absolute ruler.

The fanatics surged forward like a giant wave. The Blood Lord laughed aloud and began to walk.

He was going to take the life of the one man he had longed to kill.

"Jin Taekyung—!"

The monster's roar, imbued with an unprecedented aura, rang across the battlefield and swallowed it whole.

"…!"

"…!"

The air trembled. Sound was muffled in my ears.

Shouts and screams burst without pause from every direction. The bone-chilling clang of steel engulfed the battlefield.

But through the chaos and my fading senses, I could still feel it:

The warmth radiating from the people fighting countless enemies to protect me.

At the same time, I heard the monster's roar, full of joy and madness.

Jin Taekyung.

Right. That was my name.

The name I had been given at birth.

In two different worlds, I existed as both one person and two.

And maybe today was the last moment I'd been given.

I have to go.

I didn't know where I found the strength.

My organs must have been twisted, my Eight Extraordinary Meridians torn to shreds. With the mere handful of internal energy I had left, I couldn't do anything.

Even so, I shook off Cheongpung’s support and staggered forward as if in a trance.

Slice!

A stray blade grazed my shoulder.

Blood flowed—blood I hadn’t even known was still there—but I felt no pain as I reached out.

CRACK.

The fanatic’s gleaming eyes widened in pain.

He instinctively tried to wrench his wrist from my grasp with all his strength, but a surge of scorching heat reached him first and engulfed him.

BOOM!

To someone else, it might have felt like flames hot enough to burn them alive. To me, it felt like the warmest thing in the world.

Maybe it was because of who had saved me.

“El…der.”

Squeezing out every last bit of my voice, I grabbed Jeok Cheongang’s shoulder and whispered.

“A path. Please open a path for me.”

“…!”

Chapter 1122

With the collapsed walls at their backs, the defenders fought more fiercely and more valiantly than ever.

After surviving against impossible odds and retreating to the Inner City, they numbered a little over five thousand.

Compared to the tens of thousands of fanatics blackening the land on every side, they were a mere handful. Yet the last-ditch defenders didn't give an inch.

No—they couldn't.

Behind them, beyond the rubble of the fallen walls, countless civilians trembled before the threat of death drawing closer by the second.

But having nowhere left to retreat didn't mean they could advance.

KRRRUNCH!

Flesh split, revealing white bone. Amid the red mist that swirled over the battlefield at the moment of impact, anguished screams and shouts rang out, muffled and dull.

"Graaaagh!"

"Hold the line! We have to hold—!"

Stab!

An axe blade cleaved through the crown of his head, cutting off the shout.

The man who crumpled had been a Peak master renowned as a hero throughout Qinghai for decades. But in this horrific melee, amid all this death, none of that meant anything.

And he wasn't the only one.

The Sect Leader of a school. The Family Head of a household surrounded by relatives.

A young man whose downy cheeks hadn't even lost their softness.

The moment the fanatics' blind blades swept them up, they fell as nothing more than lumps of meat.

CRUNCH! Stab-stab-stab!

Perhaps the outcome of this desperate final battle had been decided before it even began.

The defenders had long since pushed past the limits of exhaustion.

Surviving this long in today's battle was proof of their strength. But what lay before them couldn't be overcome by sheer will.

The energy they had left. Their numbers.

They lacked everything. Desperately.

The dead rolled limply across the ground. Those still alive could only tremble on instinct as they watched the advancing enemy trample over the bodies of their fallen comrades.

Fear and anger gripped them, along with the helplessness of being unable to do anything.

Perhaps that was why, as their bodies and hearts—and the whole world around them—seemed to sink into pitch-black darkness, the flame someone kindled shone all the brighter.

Fwoosh—BOOM!

The air caught fire. Heat like the sun evaporated the rain and swallowed the fanatics whole.

At the heart of the fierce flames surging forward stood a giant of fire, his burning eyes flashing.

“Who dares!”

With a furious roar, Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King, swept his sleeve.

The flames, whipped up by a fierce wind, melted steel and burned the fanatics’ flesh and bones.

“Stand in our way?!”

Jeok Cheongang had always called himself “this old man,” but not this time.

He wasn’t walking alone anymore.

Now, they walked together.

Along the perilous, steep path to the brink of death that Jeok Cheongang had always been forced to walk alone, there was now someone at his side—a man who had become both a part of him and his whole world.

“Don’t retreat! Don’t be afraid!”

Supporting Jin Taekyung as he staggered, Jeok Cheongang burned the enemies rushing in from every direction and shouted with all his might.

Blades he would normally have scoffed at and dodged grazed his body. Every time he summoned his internal energy, pain blazed through his tangled acupoints. None of that mattered to him now.

“Open a path!”

It was a request from Jin Taekyung, his one and only Disciple.

A reckless request. One that might truly be his last.

But the old Master couldn’t refuse his Disciple, already standing at death’s door.

And Jeok Cheongang wasn’t the only one willing to grant it.

Slice!

Dozens of heads flew into the air in a dazzling flash.

Jeok Cheongang swallowed the blood that suddenly surged into his mouth and watched with a faint smile.

“Took you long enough. You’re slow as hell.”

At the familiar reproach, the Slaughter Saint spoke, his face pale as a sheet.

He, too, had suffered serious injuries fighting to hold back the Grand Sorceress and the Black Ghosts during the retreat to the Inner City.

“I couldn’t see the patient, so I went looking. Figured I’d drag him back by the collar.”

“And what do you intend to do?”

SHWICK!

The Slaughter Saint answered by bringing down his small knife.

The strike was ghostly in its speed and precision. The fanatics rushing in to fill the momentary gap crumpled like bundles of straw.

Just as his heart had when he saw Taekyung’s condition.

“Before it’s too late…I’ll take the lead.”

At the Slaughter Saint’s quiet reply, something tightened in Jeok Cheongang’s chest.

Perhaps the man could escape this battlefield right now. He was the greatest assassin of all time.

That was why they called him the Slaughter Saint.

Yet Jeok Cheongang gritted his teeth against the weight pressing down on his heart.

Before it’s too late.

That was what he’d said. Clear as day.

Jeok Cheongang knew instinctively that the words hadn’t come from the Slaughter Saint as an assassin, but from the Divine Physician. And that his answer held not a glimmer of hope, but despair.

He’s going to die.

A cruel truth too hard to believe, too hard to accept.

Jeok Cheongang stared blankly at Jin Taekyung, limp in his grasp as if unconscious. Then he clenched his fist.

There were no choices left for them now.

All they could do was give everything they had and kindle one last flame—perhaps their final one.

Even now, that flame was slowly growing larger and hotter.

SHWAAAA!

Force suddenly shot out from somewhere and spread across the space.

Unlike the Slaughter Saint’s Force, so keen it seemed it could cut you just by looking at it, this web of Force felt as free as the wind. It wrapped around the enemies.

Calmly. Gently.

Then it struck with enough destructive power to wipe away that fleeting impression.

Slice—SPLAAASH!

A fountain of blood burst into the air.

Among the enemies crumpling to the ground, the Bow Saint appeared. Following the movement of her fingers, the broken bowstaff—split in two amid the fierce battle at the West Gate—moved with blinding speed.

KRRRUNCH!

It had lost its original shape, but her bow had always been made to come apart and serve as a pair of curved swords.

Without a word, the Bow Saint swept through the fanatics like a storm. Close behind her, another familiar face appeared.

“Benefactor!”

Despite his urgent shout, Cheongpung’s sword technique flowed as gracefully as a painter’s brush across white paper.

SHSHSHK!

A handful of purple Force, the color of sunset, sketched out flowers.

The dozens of plum blossoms seemed beautiful—until they touched the fanatics. Then they turned an even deeper red and bloomed in a glorious spray.

“Why’d you have to come along too…?”

Before the Slaughter Saint could stop Cheongpung from plunging deep into enemy lines to join this perilous undertaking, a roar from far away swallowed the battlefield.

“…!”

“…!”

If a sound could take the shape of a giant, would it look like this?

The roar was so immense it shook even the eardrums of someone whose hearing had already burst. And there was a desperate, almost spiteful edge to it.

Everyone who turned toward its source stared wide-eyed.

Jeok Cheongang and Cheongpung, injured themselves, supporting Jin Taekyung as they fought off their enemies.

The Slaughter Saint and Bow Saint, realizing that the enemy reinforcements who had finally taken the East Gate had arrived.

And one man walking slowly toward them, an overwhelming aura pouring from him.

No—a monster.

“That’s…”

His words trailed off.

The Blood Lord stared toward the source of the roar, an indescribable look on his face. Then he burst into laughter.

“Pfft—hahahahaha!”

His booming laughter had no place on a battlefield covered in a sea of corpses and blood.

But the Blood Lord didn’t care. He laughed like a madman, bending over and clutching his stomach as if he’d never heard or seen anything funnier in his life.

Then, as if he hadn’t laughed at all, he lifted his head, his expression cold, and looked at the countless people approaching from far away beneath shouts that seemed to pierce the heavens.

They were weaker and more insignificant than any enemy he had faced so far. That only made those damn moths flying into the flame more infuriating.

“What kind of lunatics are these…?”

The Blood Lord meant it. He could think of no other explanation for the absurd sight reflected in his blood-red eyes.

But no matter how he questioned it or thought it over, he couldn’t find an answer.

No—even if the Blood Lord gained the power of true immortality, he could never understand it.

The old, the powerless, the very young—people born to spend their lives being trampled and trembling in fear—were risking their lives to protect someone else. He couldn’t even imagine it.

And yet they were there.

They shouted with set faces and trembling voices, caught between desperate resolve and fear they couldn’t quite shake. They gripped crude bamboo spears and rusty axes with all their strength.

They had spent their lives yielding to fate. Now they defied it to help those who had staked their own fates on protecting them.

Countless civilians, seeking for the first time in their lives to protect someone beyond their own families.

They were here.

Today. Right here.

“How—dare you!”

The monster’s roar, charged with power beyond anything before it, crushed the civilians’ seemingly endless shouts.

“…up.”

With a faint voice only a handful of people could hear, Jin Taekyung forced his eyelids open in his Master’s arms and struggled to speak.

“Shut up already…you fucking bastard.”

Chapter 1123

“You…!”

Hearing that familiar voice tremble with agitation, I let out the breath I’d been holding.

I blinked slowly and swallowed the blood pooled in my mouth.

It was a strange feeling, unlike anything I’d ever experienced.

I felt hazy, as if I were trapped in a dream I could never escape. And yet, at the same time, everything around me came through with perfect clarity.

As for what this unfamiliar sensation was, the System gave me a clear answer, as it always did.

In its uniquely kind and cruel way.

Beep.

SYSTEM

Status Effect: Final Rally has been applied.

Final rally.

Like sunlight blazing just before sunset, it was the last flame to burn at the darkening edge of a life.

So this is what it feels like.

The thought came to me suddenly.

I thought of the final moments of those I’d brought down with my own two hands—and those I’d desperately tried to hold on to, only to lose them anyway.

All the countless emotions I’d glimpsed in them.

At last, I felt as though I could understand them all.

I understood something else, too. Unlike them, who had waited for death as it slowly drew near, I was the kind of fool who had no choice but to run toward it.

Ding.

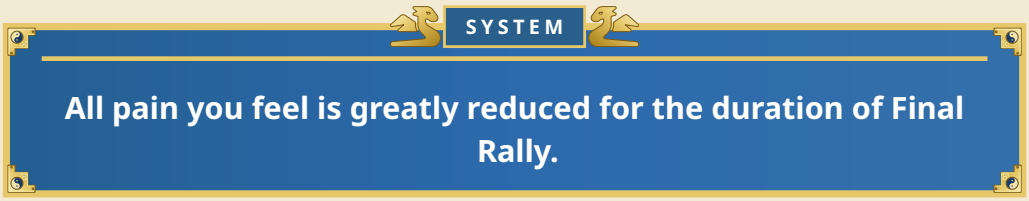
SYSTEM

Final Rally is an act of divine mercy, an expression of human will, and a candle by which you may reflect on the life you have lived. Though its flame burns only briefly, that moment of light will shine so brightly that even death may be forgotten.

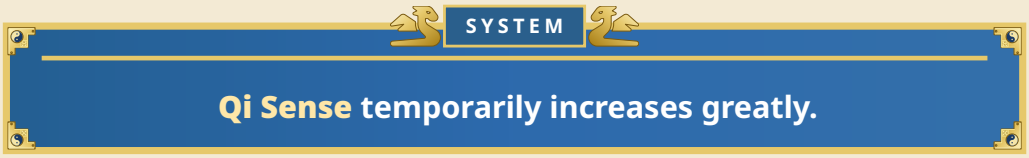
This time, it wasn’t the cold, harsh warning tone.

A familiar, clear chime rang in my ears, rousing my body and mind from their endless plunge into darkness.

Just as the System had said, it was a light bright enough to make me forget even death.



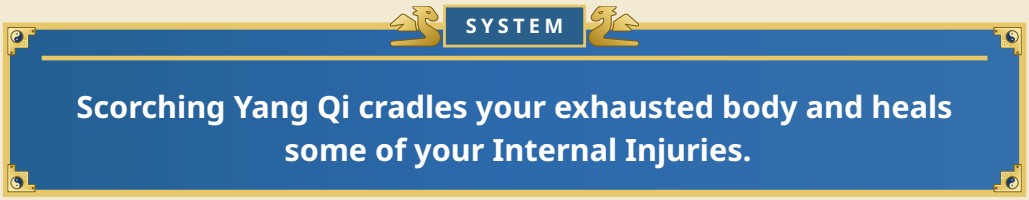
My body stopped trembling under the pain and death closing in by the second.



A spark caught in the ashes of my cooling mind.

Fwoosh.

Sudden warmth seeped into my back, and the spark swelled into a flame.



Two flames could not coexist.

Sooner or later, they would collide and destroy each other.

But if they came from the same root, they were one flame to begin with.

Just like the person who, despite suffering severe Internal Injuries of his own, had shared his qi with me without hesitation.

“What are you waiting for?”

His face was as pale as paper. Wounds large and small covered his body, and his frame trembled.

But Jeok Cheongang was smiling at me.

He was trying to hold back both his joy that his Disciple had regained a little strength and his sorrow at what that meant.

“Come on. Let’s go. Together.”

At that moment—

Ding.

SYSTEM

A sudden Quest, A Candle in the Wind, or a Flame, has been generated!
Death awaits you. You cannot refuse this Quest!
Time Limit: 9 minutes, 59 seconds

Time began to flow again. I gripped White Flame tightly and took a step forward.

Into the nightmare that wasn't over yet.

No—toward a reality worse than any nightmare.

I'll change it. I have to.

If this had been my fight alone, I might have given up already.

I might have leaned my exhausted body against a pile of corpses, looked back on the time I'd left behind, and waited for death to slowly descend.

But—

SHWICK!

I wasn't alone anymore.

KWA-BOOOOM!

Dazzling light-flames swallowed the enemies whole.

Amid the reddish, overheated earth and the shimmering haze that warped the air, a giant of fire roared.

At the same time, the Slaughter Saint, the Bow Saint, Cheongpung, and the last of the devoted defenders advanced.

Countless civilians followed behind them like a wave, no longer shouting out of desperation but calling a name none of us had expected.

"Charge! Charge! Protect the Marquis of Shangshan!"

"…!"

The great shout shook the battlefield and reached my ears. A jolt like lightning shot up my spine.

They said they would protect me.

Me, of all people.

Those people with neither a scrap of internal energy nor a proper weapon, gripping sickles and pickaxes in their hands.

They were risking their lives for me—the man who hadn't even managed to protect his own people.

Right. In the end, I couldn't protect you.

The beloved faces I would never see again flashed through my mind, and I shot toward the fanatics.

SHWIIK!

My toes. My waist. My shoulder. My arms and wrists.

My body followed movements etched into instinct through countless repetitions and real battles, splitting the raging wind and rain.

Slice!

A single, cool cutting sound crossed the air.

At the same time, more than ten pairs of eyes flew wide open.

The fanatics stared at me in disbelief, clutching their slit throats as they crumpled to the ground.

White Flame's spearhead, trailing a faint heat, was slower and weaker than it had ever been. But for some reason, the enemies waiting in its path couldn't react in time.

Neither could those surging forward to fill the gaps left by their dead comrades.

Stab! Crack!

I stabbed through everything in my way, pulled my spear free, and twisted it.

My vision was still hazy, but my senses were sharper than ever.

So were the faces and voices that flickered past, one by one, through the thickening mist of blood.

"I'll join you. Just make sure the danger pay is generous."

A pair of fierce eyes, and the willow-leaf saber he always kept close.

But despite his rough appearance, Song Ilseom had always been a reliable comrade and a good person to me.

He complained about the danger and the extra pay on every mission, yet he always fought in the most dangerous places.

He'd left behind the path he'd walked his whole life to protect someone. I was sure he'd kept that vow until his final moments.

He must have. The Song Ilseom I knew would have.

There was more to a person than what you saw.

That was true of a wandering martial artist others might have seen as nothing but rough and uncouth. It was true, too, of the two unorthodox faction members I'd unexpectedly formed ties with.

Am I too late?

That day in Gansu, when a battle like this one had raged, Sama Pyo had returned from staying with his father through his final moments and asked me that question.

I'd answered without hesitation.

No. You came right on time.

I'd meant it. There hadn't been a trace of a lie in my answer.

Even if he lost his way while wrestling with his choices and took a long detour, Sama Pyo was the sort of person who would find his way back to the right path in the end.

No.

He was that kind of friend.

The words echoed endlessly somewhere deep inside me, and I moved as if entranced.

SHWICK!

Like Song Ilseom, I rolled through a pool of blood to evade blades flying at me from every direction.

Slice!

Like Sama Pyo, I ended my enemies' lives by the cruelest, surest means.

KRRRUNCH!

Like someone else who wasn't here, I swept through everything in my way with an overwhelming aura as immense as Taishan.

Taishan believes in Pavilion Master! Likes him second best in the world, after Lord!

I pressed forward.

Voices rang like hallucinations amid flying blood and screams.

Familiar faces appeared, one after another, over the enemies collapsing like bundles of straw.

"Would you like to take a walk?"

The memories rose like mist and passed like wind.

The Fire Courtyard of the Yongbong Escort Bureau, shrouded in darkness, and the full moon, unusually bright and large that night.

"Great Hero Jin."

Her lively voice and light, dancing steps, buoyed by drink.

"Do you think…I can do it?"

And the tears in her eyes that none of it could hide.

"Can I really do it?"

I remembered it all vividly.

Every bit of it.

How I'd made a pointless fuss about the brightness of the moon, then fallen silent at her unexpected question.

Even the moment I'd looked into her tear-filled eyes and spoken.

"It's all right if you can't do it well. You don't have to force yourself."

That night, I hadn't been looking at the moon.

"Wouldn't that be enough, Young Lady Ju?"

I'd been staring blankly at her eyes, brighter than the full moon and curved like a crescent.

I'd never imagined a day like today would come—or that pitch-black Force would come rushing toward me as it was now.

WHOOOOOSH!

"Get out of the way!"

When had I gotten this far?

Jeok Cheongang's urgent shout rang out behind me, deep in enemy lines, and a terrible whooshing sound swallowed the noise around us.

But I didn't flinch.

More precisely, I didn't have even that much reason left.

I only faced the two streams of energy darkening my already hazy vision. They were so murky they hardly seemed alive at all.

Not with my eyes, but with my senses.

No—with my heart.

And in the gap between moments slowed to a crawl, I thrust out my spear.

SHWICK!

White Flame's spearhead, wreathed in a faint blaze, cut through the air.

It pierced space, the darkness beyond it, and a single point.

Fwoosh!

"…!"

"…!"

The two streams of Force, which had seemed ready to swallow everything without a trace, scattered helplessly. I felt the air tremble all around me.

Destruction? A clash?

No.

The only word for what had just happened was shattering.

It was so inexplicable that even I, the one who'd done it, couldn't understand it.

So perfectly shattered that it enraged even the dead who had just fired Force at me.

—JIN. TAE. KYUNG!

The last two Black Ghosts cried out in unison and charged.

A ghostly horse leaped across the dozen or so jang[3865] of open air in an instant, casting its shadow over me. With its blood-red eyes flashing, the now-enlarged Force came crashing down.

KWA-BOOOOOOM!

The rushing blast was violent enough to shake even my already-burst eardrums.

[3865] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten ja, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

But I wasn't the only one in its path.

KWAANG! RUMBLE!

In the blink of an eye, four streaks of light tangled in midair and swelled.

The compressed air exploded, and the earth overturned beneath the tremendous force.

At the heart of it were two superhumans who had rushed to save me.

Stab! Crack!

The Slaughter Saint's short knife and ox-hair needles, and the two curved swords clenched in the Bow Saint's hands, pierced and sliced through the Black Ghosts at lightning speed.

The two Saints gritted their teeth, faces ashen, wringing out what little strength they had left. The Black Ghosts, meanwhile, refused to fall.

They recovered from mortal wounds and even severed limbs, rising again after dozens of deaths.

Wooooong.

The air trembled.

Countless overlapping spells bolstered the Black Ghosts' ability to heal and gave them still greater strength and speed.

Enough to face two of the Three Saints, who had fought more fiercely than anyone and were now pushed to their absolute limits.

"Go! Hurry!"

The Slaughter Saint's urgent shout pierced my ears. The Bow Saint's tired, lowered gaze touched my cheek, as if telling me to prove I was the one who'd been chosen.

Or that this wasn't where I was supposed to die.

Right. I can't fall here.

I staggered forward, leaving them behind.

Following Jeok Cheongang and Cheongpung as they opened a path, I cut down the enemies looming through my dreamlike haze, again and again.

I thought of a promise to one person that could never be kept now.

Of the moment I hadn't been able to bring myself to tell someone who had become my greatest memory in this world to run away.

"I'm Hyuk Mujin, Captain of the Gatekeepers of the great Jin Family of Taiyuan. State your identity and purpose for visiting… What? A pleasure house?"

"Third Young Master, I may be a low-ranking Captain, but let me say one thing."

We'd met as enemies who couldn't seem to shake each other.

"A scouting squad? Why me, Third Young Master…?"

"I'll follow your orders. Captain—no, Captain, sir."

Before long, the two of us had fallen into step.

"Now, now, Captain. What's there to worry about when you've got me?"

"Your heart! Your right arm! Trust Hyuk Mujin!"

"...Even so, isn't your little toe a bit much?"

Then we'd become inseparable.

So close that, at some point, being apart no longer felt right.

When I couldn't see him, I missed him. When he was away, I worried about him.

My most trusted friend and subordinate.

That guy—Hyuk Mujin—had died.

In the end, I hadn't even seen where he'd died or who had killed him.

Even if some miracle saved him, I'll never see him again.

The last promise I'd made to him would never be fulfilled.

I would die before it could be.

Because I'd have to leave behind the people I'd wanted to protect—or the people waiting somewhere for me, desperate for my return—and set off down a long road from which there was no coming back.

But...!

I gritted my teeth and let out the breath I'd been holding.

I swung my spear, rekindling the dying flame without pause.

Trampling the corpses piling up with each step and the blood spurting into the air, I moved as one with the people protecting me.

Toward the last, the only path left for the living and the dead alike.

Toward the blood-red eyes I could sense clearly even through my hazy vision.

KRRRUNCH!

The fanatics' flesh and bones broke apart beneath the spearhead I brought down on instinct.

Beyond that fierce storm of blood stood a monster steeped in blood and madness.

"You should be running for your life, yet you've come to me of your own accord. I hardly know how to thank you."

The Blood Lord, at last standing before me again, smiled broadly.

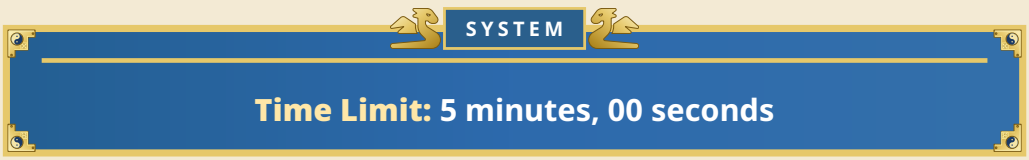
More precisely, he smiled at Jeok Cheongang and Cheongpung, both exhausted beyond measure, and at me standing between them.

"Now, it's time for you to die."

Maybe he was right.

But—

Beep.



Not yet.

Chapter 1124

Beep.

SYSTEM

Time Limit: 5 minutes, 00 seconds

The second hand of a clock granted to only one person on this vast battlefield began to move.

Flash.

Space split apart.

It was erased, shattered.

And at its center, four figures hurtled toward one another with all their might.

More precisely, one monster and the three humans standing against it.

Among them was Jin Taekyung.

SHWAAK!

A horrifyingly low whistle of air pierced his ears.

A strike that seemed capable of splitting a mountain, faster than sound itself.

The Red Blade came down at an angle, swift and fierce in equal measure.

Could Jin Taekyung have followed that movement even in his usual condition?

Even if he had, he wouldn't have dared meet the enormous Force coiling around the blade head-on.

But his senses, honed sharper than ever at the edge of death, were guiding his still-warm body toward a path of survival.

Rustle.

The wind stopped. Time slowed.

In Jin Taekyung's eyes, hazy as a clouded sky, the blood-red blade and its blazing Force passed barely an inch from his face.

Slice!

Following the strike's path, the ground split like tofu mere inches from him.

The wind pressure whipped around like a blade and raked his body, but Jin Taekyung had already forgotten pain. As if entranced, he thrust out his spear.

SHWAAK!

The spearhead pierced straight through space.

At the same time, Jeok Cheongang's Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist and Cheongpung's sword cleaved through the wind.

FWOOSH, SHWISH-SHWISH-SHWISH!

Two streams of flame surged forward as one, while sunset-violet Force scattered like flower petals.

Their renown might differ, but each of the three Supreme Peak masters could make the entire Murim tremble at the sound of his name. Together, they launched a perfect combined attack.

But waiting for them was a monster that had already far surpassed the limits of humanity.

HWAASH!

Enormous qi boiled up in an instant.

At the same time, the Blood Lord's hands, now free of the hilt, struck through space like a bolt of lightning.

KWA-BOOOOM!

Two palms, faster than sound itself.

With a roar as if the sky had split, a blood-red flash erupted around the Blood Lord and swept in every direction.

An overwhelming, destructive force that made no distinction between friend and foe.

RUMBLE, RUMBLE…!

A deep reverberation spread through the devastated space.

It swept past the fanatics' corpses, scattered in countless chunks of flesh, and reached the three men staggering as they steadied themselves.

"They survived that?"

The Blood Lord muttered despite himself.

He had put tremendous power into that strike—poured a third of his strength into a single attack.

Enough to erase every living thing within a radius of over ten jang[3866] and turn the area into a hellscape where only death remained.

Of course, the outcome wasn't entirely beyond what he'd expected.

No matter how grievously wounded and bloodied they were, a beast was still a beast.

Especially when even the weakest beast among them was called the Huashan Divine Dragon.

No—perhaps this was for the best.

If he'd killed them all with that last strike, he might have been left feeling empty.

"No. Not like this. Not so easily."

The Blood Lord let out a low laugh and took a step forward.

Rustle.

[3866] A jang is ten ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Over ten jang is over 30.3 m (99.4 ft).

Something felt wrong.

He raised his hand to see what it was, and his gaze turned cold.

Blood.

Beads welled up from a shallow split in his skin—too slight to even call a wound—and ran across his palm.

The very hand that had just met someone's attack head-on.

"This is…"

The Blood Lord trailed off and slowly lifted his head.

And saw him.

One man, covered in blood from head to toe, struggling to catch his breath.

His face was so pale he could have collapsed at any moment, yet his eyes still held a flame that hadn't died out.

Jin Taekyung.

The Blood Lord ran his red tongue over his lips.

How had this happened?

He'd been sure he had blocked the attack.

None of their strikes could have broken the Palm Force gathered in his hands.

And yet—

"Yes. This is how it should be. You ought to manage at least this much."

The Blood Lord murmured softly, almost to himself.

The light that had dimmed in his eyes flared to life, and his wavering lips curled into a gentle smile.

At this moment, he was truly enjoying himself.

Carelessness? Fear of what might happen?

He'd felt none of that from the start.

He had simply been certain.

Certain that he could hunt the prey before him, whether it was a powerless rabbit or a beast hiding its fangs.

Though it had been only a single exchange, the Blood Lord had realized once again just how immense the power within him was at this moment.

And how boundless.

Squelch.

As the monster stepped forward, the pool of blood at his feet, spread out like a small lake, swirled and rushed toward him.

SHWAAAAA!

The Blood Lord greedily swallowed the blood. Intoxicated by the strength surging through him anew, the monster shot through space like a flash of light.

Drip.

A single drop of blood fell behind him.

The Blood Lord's confidence was no arrogance.

He moved faster than anyone else on the battlefield, and the immense blood-red Force bursting from his Red Blade was enough to make anyone who saw it think of the word unprecedented.

At least at this moment.

He was the strongest predator on this vast battlefield, an absolute being no one could oppose.

With even the two giants among the Three Saints pinned down by the enemies' fierce counterattack, he was powerful enough to crush the three Supreme Peak masters—each already seriously injured—in an instant.

Jin Taekyung knew that better than anyone. Which was why he couldn't understand what was happening.

SHWEEEE!

Why—

KRRRCH!

Why was that terrifying Force, powerful enough to split a mountain—

SHWAAK!

Why was the Blood Lord's movement, seemingly faster than wind, sound, even light—

WHOOOOSH!

Missing him by a hair every time, every single moment?

Why couldn't it touch him?

"You—!"

Jin Taekyung didn't hear the monster's voice echoing through the blade-sharp wind.

No. More precisely, he couldn't hear it.

Amid the flashes that continually washed across his hazy vision, he simply kept moving as if entranced.

Slice!

He brought his advancing foot back to where it had been and ducked his head. The blood-red Force passed overhead.

A nearly flawless dodge, without a moment's hesitation.

Jin Taekyung himself didn't know how he had evaded such a swift, ferocious strike. He didn't know why he'd moved that way, either.

He just felt he had to.

It all seemed perfectly natural.

Like the sun rising in the east each morning, or water flowing downhill.

Like a duel whose every move had been carefully arranged in advance.

But that was true only for Jin Taekyung.

Rustle, SHWEEEE!

The Red Blade was descending toward the crown of his head when it abruptly changed direction.

KWAANG!

With a single deafening crash, Cheongpung, who had rushed in to attack from the blind spot, dropped to one knee and spat up blood.

Above him, the Red Blade had wiped away the path of the Thirty-Six Plum Blossom Swords in an instant. It crashed down like lightning and bore upon his sword with the weight of ten thousand geun.[3867]

CRACK.

The violet Force faded rapidly, and hairline fractures spread across the blade like a spiderweb.

As Cheongpung swallowed blood and summoned all his strength, the Blood Lord's dark-red light poured down on him.

"You dare, you little—!"

The monster's earlier delight had turned to anger.

Why? How?

With martial prowess this immense, and Jin Taekyung clearly dying, why couldn't he finish this simple fight whose outcome was so certain?

And even when victory was all but decided, why did that damned brat before him keep resisting to the end?

Just as he had on that day at Mount Song, when he'd inflicted a humiliation that was like a brand upon the Blood Lord.

"Fine. I'll kill you first."

The Blood Lord spat out the words. The blood-red Force swelled and dug into Cheongpung's blade.

Then—

HWAASH!

Heat swept in from behind him. The Blood Lord released the hilt without hesitation and thrust out a fist.

KWA-BOOOOM!

Two fists collided in midair.

[3867] A Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun is 6,000 kg (about 13,200 lb).

White light-flames and blood-red Force charged at each other, each trying to devour the other.

But the difference in their power was already clear. Through the thick heat haze, the Blood Lord bared his teeth at Jeok Cheongang.

“Get lost, old man.”

BOOM!

Blood-red Force swallowed the flames. With an explosion, Jeok Cheongang was sent flying helplessly and rolled across the ground.

Right where someone had been standing just moments before.

…What?

The realization came in an instant.

An alarm rang in the Blood Lord’s mind, and a current of air crossed the space between them.

Fwoosh.

A whistle of air so low and faint it raised goose bumps.

In time slowed to a crawl, the Blood Lord turned. Jin Taekyung filled his blood-red eyes, thrusting out his spear with a hazy gaze.

“…!”

The Blood Lord couldn’t even get out the word How?

Nor could he think how he, overwhelmingly powerful as he was, had lost track of the presence of a bloodied wretch sinking deeper into death with every passing moment.

Jin Taekyung was no different.

Now.

It was as if someone else, someone he didn’t know, were whispering in his ear.

His vision was clouded white, and he couldn’t see a thing.

Time was running out. A horrible weariness—and an even stronger feeling of death—was seeping into his body.

Shhk.

Jin Taekyung thrust out his spear smoothly.

The shouts and screams of friend and foe, ringing out without pause even now. The cold clang of steel. The sound of a trumpet, now drawing close.

Even the palm the Blood Lord thrust out on instinct.

Nothing could stop him.

Leaving it all behind, as if it had been decided from the beginning, Jin Taekyung let the flames deep inside his body flow toward a single point.

Pshk.

The spearhead, carrying a faint heat, pierced the palm wrapped in Force and drove on through.

Past that very hand, whose wound, for some reason, still hadn’t healed.

KRRRCH!

The monster’s eyes flew wide, bulging as they filled with shock.

Chapter 1125

KRRRCH!

At the ghastly sound of flesh tearing, the Blood Lord felt as though the world had stopped.

Ah.

Hot. Distant.

His vision wavered. The noise around him seemed impossibly far away.

Everything felt so unfamiliar that he wondered if all that had happened until now had been a dream.

If not for the terrible heat scorching his flesh and bones, he might truly have believed it.

No.

If not for the face he could see beyond the acrid smoke and shimmering haze of the flames.

Cough.

Fresh blood spilled past his lips.

Through pain so fierce it turned his vision white, the Blood Lord coughed up blood mixed with bits of his innards and looked at the young man before him.

The reckless young moth, now joined to him by a single spear.

He parted his blood-soaked lips.

“How?”

It was a short question, but there was much behind the genuine confusion in his eyes. Jin Taekyung answered.

“I don’t know either.”

“What?”

“I just… knew. It felt natural.”

His voice astonishingly calm, Jin Taekyung went on.

“Every move you’d make. And what I had to do.”

“…!”

“That’s all.”

The Blood Lord’s eyes widened before he even realized it.

Because of the pain burning through him?

No.

The accursed spearhead had pierced his palm and driven deep into his body, spreading heat through him. Compared to the shock he felt now, that was nothing.

He knew? Everything I’d do?

A moment ago, he would have scoffed at such absurd words.

His power had grown beyond its limits, and the gulf between them was so vast that even the word possibility had become meaningless.

But—

He isn't lying. He isn't boasting.

The moment their eyes met, the Blood Lord understood instinctively.

A truth unbearably cruel to him.

And the fact that he had been trying desperately to deny it.

"So there was no point in asking in the first place."

"Yeah."

Jin Taekyung gave a small nod, then added faintly,

"At least in that moment, I was stronger than you."

Hearing his enemy say what he could no longer deny sent a shiver down the Blood Lord's spine.

Countless emotions swept through him, overwhelming even the pain.

Bitter defeat. Fear of something he could not comprehend. And something entirely at odds with both.

Deep relief and joy.

With his whole body, he knew he had made the right choice.

Lord of Heaven, my revered master. Are you watching? Can you hear me?

The Blood Lord looked up. He whispered toward his own heaven, hidden behind the unceasing rain and dark clouds.

My choice was never wrong.

The truth was, anxiety had been stirring in a corner of his heart.

Unwavering loyalty was not the only reason he had decided to eliminate Jin Taekyung.

He'd been disappointed. Resentful.

His master seemed to spare no thought for the servants who gave their lives in his service.

And, absurdly, he'd been jealous of Jin Taekyung, who received something close to affection from that same master.

So he'd wanted to kill him.

He'd told himself he was removing an obstacle that kept standing in Dark Heaven's way, hiding his reasons behind the word loyalty.

But now he no longer had to.

Here, today, Jin Taekyung had proved for himself why he had to die.

And die he would.

"Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung. I'll admit it. You deserve to be called a Divine Dragon."

The Blood Lord whispered the words to Jin Taekyung without a trace of falsehood.

If anything, Divine Dragon seemed inadequate.

Even at death's door, Jin Taekyung had fallen into a Trance and drawn closer to a higher enlightenment. Remembering it sent a chill through the Blood Lord.

"Yes, you were right. In that moment, you were terrifyingly strong. Strong enough that even I couldn't stop you."

He didn't know what profound enlightenment Jin Taekyung had gained.

He didn't know how he could fight so fiercely with his life hanging by a thread.

Or how a spearhead carrying no more than a handful of qi had broken through his formidable Force.

But—

"None of that matters."

By then, the Blood Lord was smiling.

Wearing a bright smile no defeated man could have worn, he grasped the spearhead buried deep inside him.

The spearhead of White Flame, lodged a handspan from his heart.

Squish. Crack.

Blood burst out with a ghastly sound of tearing flesh.

The Blood Lord pulled the spearhead free with a hand wrapped in dense Palm Force and muttered,

"I thought I was dead. In that moment, I truly did."

Jin Taekyung's final attack, thrust with all his strength, had been a strike the Blood Lord could not have stopped.

If Jin Taekyung's internal energy hadn't run dry at just that moment—

If the spearhead hadn't lost power and veered off course because of it—the Blood Lord would have died.

But he hadn't.

This is Heaven's will.

Joy welled up from deep within him.

The heavens above had chosen him, not Jin Taekyung.

Not that paltry heaven you believe in. This is the will of the true Heaven I serve!

At that moment, a lightning-like thrill made him forget his pain. The Blood Lord pulled his pierced hand free and twisted the spear shaft.

SHWIK—KRRRCH!

The shaft spun violently, its force impossible to resist.

White Flame snapped through the cloth its owner had tied tightly around it so he would not lose his beloved weapon. Then it tore free of Jin Taekyung's grasp, leaving his hand covered in blood.

Splatter.

Unable to withstand the force, Jin Taekyung was driven backward. He fell, unable even to keep himself upright.

The Blood Lord stepped toward him without hesitation.

Or rather, he tried to.

Before he could, another Divine Dragon—one raised on the slopes of Huashan, not beside a pond—charged in with a roar.

“No!”

SHWAAAAK!

Sunset spread through the darkness. Force bloomed along the sword’s cracked blade and scattered into thirty-six petals.

The strike was beautiful enough to draw gasps from anyone who saw it.

But the desperation behind it was greater than ever, making it all the more heartbreaking.

FWOOM!

The blood-red Force that filled the space was strong enough to cut down not just the petals, but an entire forest.

KWA-BOOOOM!

The earth shook with a deafening crash.

Beyond a cloud of dust that even the pounding rain could not settle, a figure staggered upright and stood before the fallen Jin Taekyung.

Not one figure, but two.

“Where do you think you’re going? Cough.”

Jeok Cheongang and Cheongpung stood in his way again, both covered in blood. The Blood Lord’s red eyes darkened.

“Mount Beimang.”

He raised the spear that now belonged to him at an angle and added,

“Of course, you’re the ones going there.”

Hummm.

The spearhead, parted from its master, let out a sorrowful hum.

Shhhhh.

I stared blankly at the dark sky stretching beyond the endless rain.

This is Heaven’s will.

The Blood Lord’s voice still echoed in my ears.

Not that paltry heaven you believe in. This is the will of the true Heaven I serve!

Remembering the joy in those blood-red eyes, I muttered to myself,

Yeah. Maybe it is.

I'd done everything I could.

No—all of us had fought with everything we had.

Until there was nothing left to give.

Until I couldn't even feel regret or anger.

But…

I never followed the will of Heaven.

Quietly, desperately, I struggled.

Squish.

With my crushed, broken hand, I gripped a clod of dark red earth mixed with blood as hard as I could and pushed myself up.

I had to. There was no other choice.

For the people even now collapsing, their blood scattering around them.

They were the paltry heaven the Blood Lord had mocked.

BOOM!

A fierce crack split the air.

Through my blurred vision, I saw Jeok Cheongang stagger and drop to one knee. Cheongpung was flung away like a cannonball and rolled across the ground.

And the monster, having torn down every obstacle in his way, came toward me.

Splash.

One step, then another.

His blood-red gaze grew clearer as the distance closed. I put every bit of strength I had into getting up.

Like a baby whose earliest movements I couldn't remember, I rolled onto my front, planted my hands and knees on the ground, and somehow hauled my swaying body to its feet.

By then, the Blood Lord was close enough that his eyes seemed to burn red as the sun. The moment I met them—

Inventory open. Summon.

From the boundless storehouse granted to me alone in this vast world, I drew a finely sharpened dagger and thrust it forward.

At the same time, a low, mocking laugh reached my ears.

"As expected."

Crack.

I felt no pain, but the sound told me enough.

The Blood Lord had caught my wrist in a flash and crushed it beyond any hope of recovery.

But he wasn't the only one who could predict his opponent.

Slip. Tap.

Ignoring the pain erased by my final rally, I kicked the dagger's hilt with my toe as it fell from my grasp.

Thud.

"…!"

With a cool, tearing sound, the dagger sank deep into flesh.

The Blood Lord's eyes flew wide. He looked down at the blade buried in his shin and licked his lips.

"Impressive. Truly impressive. But that is why…"

Without a moment's hesitation, he whipped his remaining leg like a lash.

"I can never let you live."

KRRRCH!

White bone burst through mangled flesh.

Having crippled one of my arms and both my legs, the Blood Lord shot out a hand like lightning and seized my throat.

Crack.

Bones shifted, and my vision darkened.

As I gasped for breath, his low voice reached my ears.

"We've been bound by a long, ill-fated connection, Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung."

At that moment—

FWOOSH.

Like a last candle burning as a life flashed before it, my vision turned white even as it fell into pitch-black darkness.

No.

Perhaps the color was deeper and redder than sunset.

Slash.

Chapter 1126

It was a low, faint sound—one no one would have noticed under ordinary circumstances.

Nothing beside the ceaseless roar of battle shaking heaven and earth.

Just the sound of wind brushing past somewhere.

But to someone else, it struck like a sudden storm, an unstoppable bolt of lightning.

Shhk.

The cold slicing sound reached the Blood Lord's ears a moment late. His lips parted before he knew it.

"…Huh?"

The joy that had filled his eyes moments ago gave way to confusion. In his blood-red pupils, a fine line appeared across his arm.

Before he could make sense of it, blood welled through his skin and raced along the line.

PSSSHHH!

A fountain of blood shot into the air. The Blood Lord could only stare, eyes wide, as his arm fell away in a spray of crimson.

Beside the severed arm collapsed the man who had barely escaped death.

Splatter!

The moment Jin Taekyung's already-crippled body crumpled to the ground, time began to move again.

Yet even with the man he had wanted so desperately to kill lying at his feet, the Blood Lord couldn't move.

And he wasn't the only one who had stopped.

Taekyung's master, reaching a trembling hand toward his disciple, who lay in a deep pool of blood facing death.

The Bow Saint and the Slaughter Saint, who had finally shaken off countless enemies, including the two Black Ghosts, and were racing toward him with not an instant to spare.

Cheongpung, driving the blade of his sword—now only a handspan[3868] long—deep into the ground to force himself upright.

They all felt it. At the same time, they saw it.

Beyond the curtain of wind and rain, someone's figure wavered into view.

Shhhhh.

[3868] A handspan is the distance between the thumb and little finger of an outstretched hand. It varies by person but is roughly 20 cm (8 in).

Through the endless rain walked a black-clad figure. At a movement of his fingertips, an ancient silver blade swept down.

Shhhk.

In that instant, the world split apart.

The rain and wind.

The air and qi within them.

And the darkness.

SHWAAK!

The dazzling flash that filled their eyes was deeper than sunset and as brilliant as dawn.

Just like that day a year ago, burned into the Blood Lord's mind like a brand.

This is…

In a moment so brief it seemed time had been cut into slivers, the Blood Lord froze, eyes wide. Someone's presence flashed through his mind.

A name that could not—and must not—appear here today.

A man without peer when it came to the sword, known as the Number One Sword Under Heaven.

A man whose realm had reached the heavens, known as the Sword Saint.

"Mae Jonghak—!"

The name burst from the Blood Lord's lips like a scream.

FWOOSH!

Within the swelling flash, dozens of strands of purple Force bloomed.

Tap.

Beneath their dazzling petals, a hand suddenly reached out and touched the Blood Lord's foot.

No—

KRAK!

It seized the monster's ankle with all its strength as he tried to turn away.

Just like that day when Mount Song was stained with blood.

"…!"

In the monster's widened, blood-red eyes, a young man's faintly smiling face was reflected.

And the purple flash that had finally reached him.

KWA-BOOOOM!

Being unable to feel pain is both a curse and a reason for despair.

Pain is proof that you're alive and breathing.

For a living person to feel none means death is near.

But that is only one side of it.

For someone who has watched death draw close and accepted it deep in their heart, the absence of pain might be one last blessing instead.

No—it must be.

At least right now, Jin Taekyung was more grateful than ever that he couldn't feel pain.

Both his legs were crushed. One arm was shattered. Yet he could still move, and that made him so happy he could have cried.

KRAK!

Where had that strength come from?

Even Taekyung didn't know.

He had reached out as if bewitched, as though something were controlling him. Somehow, the strength in the only one of his four limbs that wasn't broken had been enough to stop the monster in his tracks.

I got… him.

Taekyung smiled.

Through his blurred vision, he raised the corners of his mouth at the Blood Lord staring down at him.

And then—

KWA-BOOOOM!

A tremendous roar battered his ears. A dreadful explosion of power shook everything around him.

Yet inside, he was as calm as a deserted lakeshore.

This is enough.

The flash swallowed his vision as he murmured to himself.

Yes. It was enough.

He had done all he could. He had no regrets.

No—he couldn't allow himself even one.

If any regret remained, he wouldn't be able to leave in peace. He would call out the names of the family and friends he wanted to see, blame himself for failing to see things through, and bawl like a child.

But now it was all right.

Mae Jonghak had come.

With the Martial God—the heavens—gone, the Sword Saint Mae Jonghak was the highest star in the sky and the greatest under heaven in this era.

Taekyung had an inkling of how Mae Jonghak could have appeared here when he should have been protecting the Central Plains as Alliance Leader. He let the thought go.

He was simply grateful for the hope that this unexpected savior could defeat the monster and save everyone who remained.

Thank goodness. Really.

With that hollow thought swallowed deep in his heart, Taekyung's eyelids began to close.

CRACK!

Amid the fading roar and flash, a hand shot out like lightning and seized his throat.

Drip. Drip.

Something hot and sticky fell onto his forehead.

Above him, the monster's blood-red eyes still burned.

"How dare… cough… the likes of you…"

The Blood Lord growled like a wounded beast.

He had to swallow mouthfuls of blood just to speak. Wounds deep enough to expose bone covered his body. Yet he was still alive.

He lifted his dying prey like a trophy and bared his bloodstained teeth again.

"Did you think you could defeat me? Me, who inherited the Lord of Heaven's mighty power?"

Just then, a faint voice escaped Taekyung's lips, which were turning white under the grip around his throat.

"Yeah. You son of a bitch."

"…What?"

"I think he can."

Taekyung smiled faintly at the Blood Lord, who stared at him in silence. At those blood-red pupils, now trembling ever so slightly.

And he understood. Anger wasn't the only thing behind that tremor.

"You're scared, aren't you? Of what's happening."

"…You."

"Yeah. Even a bastard like you has to be scared. That's why you're pulling this cheap hostage stunt."

Grind.

The Blood Lord gritted his teeth without realizing it.

A cheap hostage stunt?

Bullshit.

It had to be bullshit.

So why couldn't he answer? Why did his grip loosen instead?

Taekyung's mocking voice reached his ears.

“Look around. Then you’ll know whether you’re the hunter right now—or the prey.”

The Blood Lord didn’t answer. He didn’t look around, either.

He couldn’t bring himself to.

He didn’t want to admit that five Supreme Peak masters, led by the Sword Saint, had surrounded him. Or that he had seized Taekyung to hold them back, if only for a moment, and buy himself time.

At this rate… I’ll die.

He could feel it against his skin. He knew it instinctively.

That cruel truth, impossible to believe and unbearable to accept, pierced him to the core.

Why?

He couldn’t understand how the power bestowed on him by his great master had left him in an instant.

Gone. All of it.

The healing that might as well have been immortality. The qi that had surged endlessly from blood.

Only the strength left over after that power vanished kept him standing.

But I will not die.

The Blood Lord bit his lip, trembling with shame.

He thought of the last hope he had left—the final hammer blow that would end this terrible, immense battle.

“Watch closely. See who survives here today.”

He spat the words at Taekyung, who was still smiling.

Bwoooooo!

A powerful trumpet call shook the battlefield. At last, the hope he had waited for appeared.

Rrrrrumble!

Countless footsteps shook the earth. Enormous flags waved high, as though they might pierce the sky.

Tens of thousands of troops in all manner of dress marched beneath them. Everyone could clearly see the words on the two flags flying overhead.

Yangtze River Channel League.

And Green Forest Alliance.

“…!”

“…!”

A wave of unseen shock swept across the battlefield.

“Ah. Ahhh…”

The suicide squad and civilians, who had fought the invaders with everything they had, froze like statues.

"Lord of Heaven!"

The Dark Heaven fanatics, who had held the battle at a stalemate despite a counterattack backed by overwhelming numbers, began chanting the eight-character invocation praising the Lord of Heaven as if entranced.

The Blood Lord watched with joy in his eyes.

"In heaven and on earth, all demons bow…!"

A shiver ran down his spine. He turned to Taekyung, eager to see the despair on his face as soon as possible—and for as long as possible.

Then he realized something was wrong.

His last hope might have been despair all along.

"A meeting when the Yellow River runs clear."

"What… did you say?"

"Someone sent me a letter once. Said she'd wait for the Yellow River to run clear. That we'd meet again then."

Taekyung remembered the letter Wolhwa had sent while he was staying in Gansu.

A single line he had long since forgotten.

> Hoping that someday we can meet when the Yellow River runs clear,
> Wolhwa.

Wearing his brightest smile yet, Taekyung lifted a trembling hand and pointed east.

"Looks like this is the moment."

More precisely, he pointed to another enormous flag slowly rising behind the two at the head of the army.

Through rain falling hard enough to clear the Yellow River, three characters came into view.

Murim Alliance.

"…!"

The Blood Lord stood frozen, eyes wide.

Taekyung made his final move.

KRAK!

The Blood Lord couldn't stop Taekyung's teeth from sinking into his neck like a beast's.

Through the overwhelming pain, the world slowly tilted.

Splatter.

The monster, stripped of all the power he had been granted, finally crashed into the pool of blood.

Chapter 1127

It all began in an instant—and ended in one.

But a moment that flashed past like lightning could feel like ten years to someone caught inside it.

KWA-DRRRK!

With a grisly sound of flesh tearing, the Blood Lord's body shuddered.

Hot. Distant.

That was all. That was everything.

How?

The Blood Lord couldn't understand.

Why hadn't the palm strike he'd thrown on instinct brought his opponent down before those beastlike teeth sank into his neck?

Why was the Murim Alliance's banner flying above those damn bandits?

And as he felt his body, no longer under his control, being pushed helplessly backward, he muttered to himself:

Well, it doesn't matter anymore.

Splatter.

Sticky blood sprayed. Time, which had stopped, began to move again.

Lying in a pool of blood as broad as a pond, the Blood Lord looked up at the sky filling his vision.

Was it always this dark?

In truth, he already knew the answer.

The world was unchanged. Only he had changed.

The monster's pupils were still as red as blood, but even now, his fading gaze could no longer make out light from shadow.

A world gone entirely black.

Beyond it, all the Blood Lord could feel was the rain pouring down without pause and the chill of blood soaking his body.

No. That wasn't all.

Someone's voice echoed in his ears.

"You… still listening, you son of a bitch?"

Jin Taekyung.

It was him.

He spat out the flesh and blood filling his mouth and smiled, though he was panting as if he might collapse at any moment. Even forcing out one syllable at a time looked like a struggle.

"I can hear it. Clear as day."

The Blood Lord couldn't answer.

He could only swallow the bloody phlegm rising in his throat and listen to the roar shaking heaven and earth.

—Destroy the Demonic Path and restore Heaven!

Destroy demons and set Heaven right.

It was the old Murim Alliance's banner, the vow it had upheld to the very end—and the hoof that had trampled its invaders.

Just as it was doing now.

KWA-DRRRRCK!

He couldn't see.

But he could picture it from the sound alone.

The fanatics wavering at this unexpected turn. The forest of countless spears and blades closing over them.

The undying will and desperate sense of duty carried by every one of those weapons.

"…Why?"

The Blood Lord barely managed to force out the word.

He wanted to ask Jin Taekyung. All of them.

What were they fighting so desperately for?

What could they hold so dear that they would give their lives to protect it?

Jin Taekyung answered that short question, laden with meaning, in two even shorter words.

"Fuck off."

"So you don't want to tell me."

"I'm sick of it. You're hardly the first idiot like this I've met. I've gone out of my way to explain it before, and none of you understood a damn thing."

"I see. So that's how it was."

The Blood Lord managed a weak nod. Jin Taekyung watched him, then asked abruptly, "What about you?"

"What?"

"What the hell were you doing all this for?"

The Blood Lord fell silent for a moment. His own silence startled him.

Was it the exhaustion weighing down his eyelids?

Or the sense of death drawing closer with every passing second?

"…I don't know."

He should have said that everything he'd done was for the Lord of Heaven. That he would do anything for his great master, and would swear loyalty even if he died here and became a ghost.

But the faithful servant's lips gave a different answer.

"I don't… know anymore. Anything."

With that faint murmur, the Blood Lord looked up at the sky.

Where was the heaven he had trusted so completely?

Would his master, somewhere impossibly far away, feel even a trace of grief when he heard that his most faithful servant had died?

Of course not.

A faint smile touched the Blood Lord's lips.

Yes.

He had tried to deny it, but he already knew the answer.

The Lord of Heaven hadn't wavered when the four Demon Lords and the Demon Empress died one after another. Nor when word came that countless followers had been wiped out.

Not for a single moment.

It was almost as if he'd wanted it to happen.

Then did you want this lowly servant to die, too?

The Blood Lord reached a trembling hand toward the sky.

Too far. He couldn't touch it.

Just like the distance between him and the Lord of Heaven. No matter how hard he'd tried, they had never grown any closer.

Ah.

The Blood Lord swallowed a groan.

He had believed in and revered the Lord of Heaven. But the light pouring down from that heaven had always shone on one person alone.

On the owner of those blazing eyes, who could no longer lift a finger yet still watched him die without looking away.

Jin Taekyung.

At that moment—

Shhk!

The fingers that had been reaching desperately through empty air curled like hooks and plunged downward.

The monster's final strike carried anger and hatred he no longer knew whom to direct at, and one last duty that now seemed futile.

Just as it was about to pierce Jin Taekyung between the eyes—

KRAK!

A hand caked in dried blood blocked it.

The bones in the monster's fingers shattered, joint by joint, and his flesh and blood burned.

Hiss.

A haze rose with the smell of scorching flesh.

Beyond it, the old master who had returned to his Disciple's side parted his lips.

"How dare you lay a hand on him?"

Through heat that penetrated even his dulled senses, the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, looked down at the monster trembling in pain.

And he wasn't alone.

The Bow Saint and the Slaughter Saint. Sword Saint Mae Jonghak and Cheongpung. Others, too, who had rushed over covered in blood.

They surrounded the monster like reapers, like iron towers.

They blotted out the sky that had been his whole world and became a broad, sturdy roof sheltering someone else from the rain.

That was why Jin Taekyung could laugh aloud.

He remembered the monster's joyful cry just moments ago.

"See them?"

He spoke emphatically to the monster, its blood-red eyes wide open.

"Those faces you're looking at? That's the paltry heaven I believed in."

"…!"

What could the monster say?

What more could he do?

He blinked helplessly, swallowed the blood spilling over his lips, and forced out a few last words.

"Rejoice… all you want. This will be the last time."

As his vision darkened to pitch-black, Jin Taekyung's voice reached him, faint and distant.

"I was planning to."

A bitter smile touched Jin Taekyung's lips. The monster breathed his last, and that breath dispersed into the air.

Ding.

A clear chime rang out like the bell of an ancient cathedral, announcing that everything was over.

It carried boundless joy—and even greater sorrow.

There's a saying: animals leave their hides behind when they die, and people leave their names.

But a monster that's neither animal nor human can leave behind a massive amount of EXP.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

The familiar clear chime rang nonstop in my ears.

If everyone could hear it instead of just me, I bet it would've carried for hundreds of ri.[3869]

That bastard sure knew how to make an exit.

The Blood Lord's end was miserable and shabby, but the System's payouts were lavish.

How many times had I leveled up in that brief instant?

Three? More?

I wasn't sure.

All I knew was that several Quests had been completed the moment the Blood Lord died, and I'd turned off notifications after my third Level Up.

Any other time, I'd have passed out from happiness.

No, I definitely would have. Leveling up had become a once-in-a-blue-moon event. Doing it several times in a row was nothing short of a miracle.

But none of it meant anything to me now.

The chimes that should have sounded like heaven were just irritating noise. Even having my crushed flesh and broken bones heal offered only a little comfort.

One small, final comfort: I could pat someone's trembling shoulder.

"Quit bawling. Your dick'll fall off."

Cheongpung didn't stop crying at my attempt to comfort him. He just spoke through his sobs.

He said he was sorry. And thanked me, too.

But my farewell to Cheongpung—surely our last—was brief.

Unlike him, I still had so many last faces left to see.

And once I'd seen them all, my own final moment would be waiting.

> System Time Limit: 5 minutes 35 seconds

I gazed calmly at the hourglass of the final rally, still hanging in the air.

Truthfully, I'd already guessed. Ever since I'd launched One Annihilation at the Blood Lord.

There was a limit to how much a Level Up could heal, and the injuries I'd suffered from One Annihilation's backlash went beyond it.

Now that what was called innate qi—or original true qi—had been damaged, my fate was like a boat that had crossed a river with no way back.

The System warned me, and I accepted it.

[3869] A Korean ri is about 393 m (0.244 mi).

That was all.

I'd taken the step I had to take, even knowing death might be waiting for me.

I had been prepared for this. If anything, I was grateful for the way things had turned out.

Without the healing from those Level Ups, without the extra time it had given me in the final rally, I wouldn't even have been able to say goodbye.

If that's what happened, then it was enough.

The Blood Lord was dead. Dark Heaven's army had crumbled. And I'd been given a few precious extra minutes.

Now I was smiling at faces I'd thought I'd never see again.

As if this were an ordinary, peaceful day, with no enemy to defeat and no one dear to me in need of protection.

Just like this moment.

Yeah.

I was ready to leave.

I had to be.

Chapter 1128

If I'd let myself think for just a little longer, I might have started crying without meaning to.

I knew better than anyone that I wasn't ready to leave yet.

But the time I'd thought was endless was inching toward its end even now, and I forced the corners of my mouth upward.

For my sake.

And for the sake of those who would remain and remember my final moments for a long time.

"Oh, you're here?"

Personally, I thought it was a very convincing performance.

A smiling face. A calm voice.

But the Fire Dragon Pavilion members, reunited with me at last, weren't foolish enough to miss what my condition and the heavy air around us meant.

"…Pavilion Master."

There was nothing more to say.

Sama Pyo stared at me blankly, then bit his lip. Song Ilseom quietly closed his eyes, and tears clouded Taishan's eyes, each as big as a calf's.

And Ju Hwaran—

Squish. Squish.

She staggered across a lake-like pool of blood and buried her trembling face against my shoulder.

That was all.

There were no more words, but it was enough for me.

They're all alive.

My ominous hunches were never wrong, but this time was the exception.

Seeing them safe, I felt my stiff smile soften.

Thank goodness. Really… thank goodness.

The smile on my lips wasn't an act anymore.

Gung Gibang and Cheongheoja appeared after the Fire Dragon Pavilion members.

Even the face of that wild-haired weirdo who gave me a headache every time I saw him made my heart swell with relief.

No—maybe it wasn't Great Sir himself I was so glad to see, but the person on his back.

"Don't worry. He suffered a serious internal injury, but the Seafaring King got the stagnant blood out in time. His life isn't in danger."

At the voice that suddenly reached my ears, I gave a small nod instead of answering.

Hyuk Mujin was unconscious and covered in blood from head to toe, but I could trust those words a hundred times over.

They came from none other than a man worthy of being called the greatest under heaven in this age.

“Swift Wind Sword Hyuk Mujin fought magnificently. He never gave an inch. He stood his ground with pride.”

Sword Saint Mae Jonghak added quietly, “Just like you.”

Hearing the sincerity in his voice, I parted my blood-crusted lips.

“Yes. I’m sure he did.”

I looked at Hyuk Mujin and smiled faintly.

“He’s my right arm, after all.”

Mae Jonghak had been watching me with a grave expression. Then he smiled along with me.

“So that’s how it is.”

“But he probably doesn’t know.”

“Why not?”

“I was always giving him a hard time. Told him he wasn’t nearly good enough to be my right arm.”

If there’d been even the slimmest chance I could recover, Mae Jonghak would have answered without hesitation.

Tell him yourself later.

He’ll be happy to hear it.

But like the Slaughter Saint and Bow Saint, who stood with their jaws clenched, he knew I didn’t have much time left.

“When he wakes, I’ll tell him exactly what you said. I won’t leave out a single word.”

“He’s so starved for praise that you can exaggerate all you like. For example…”

A conversation I’d had with Hyuk Mujin a long time ago came to mind, and I let out a quiet laugh.

“He has what it takes to become the Alliance Leader. Yeah. That’d make him faint with joy.”

“The next Alliance Leader, you say? I must reflect on this. My successor was right in front of me, and I failed to recognize him.”

“I’ll let it slide this time. You saved everyone, after all.”

“No. That’s not right.”

Tap.

Mae Jonghak placed a hand on my shoulder, his voice firm.

"It wasn't me who saved everyone. It was you. And they saved themselves, too."

"…!"

"Look. Listen. See who they're fighting for—and whose name they're shouting."

At that moment—

Fwoooosh.

Warm qi flowed from the fingers resting on my shoulder and seeped into me.

Like the sunset, it roused my fading consciousness. I saw the fanatics crumbling even now and heard our allies' shouts sweeping over them like a wave.

A roar that swallowed the fierce wind, the rain, and even the eight-character maxim.

"Fight back! For the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung!"

Banners soared so high they seemed to pierce the sky, whipping wildly in the wind.

A forest of glittering steel covered the city and advanced, raising red flowers as it went.

Murim warriors, government troops, and commoners.

Three forces that mixed about as well as water and oil had come together as one, driving through the invaders.

All of them shouting my name.

Their desperate will and resolve drowned out even the fanatics' madness.

"…!"

I trembled before I knew it.

A lightning-like shiver ran up my spine, and Mae Jonghak's voice reached my ears.

"A month ago, when I went to persuade the Seafaring King, he told me that ships couldn't sail on a stormy night. The sails and oars would break, and without a single glimmer of light, you wouldn't even know which way was forward or back."

The age of war had come at last.

The sun of peace that had shone over the land for more than fifty years had disappeared. Night had fallen with the dark clouds of Dark Heaven, deep and black as pitch.

Deep enough to shake even the two giants of the dark path, who had once fought the Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples led by the Heavenly Demon.

"The Green Forest Battle King said much the same thing. Both of them feared Dark Heaven's power, and spies planted in their ranks long ago had urged them to submit in order to survive."

But what I saw now was the exact opposite.

KRA-DRRRK!

Two streaks of red and blue Force flashed so fiercely I could make them out even from here.

At the heart of those vast energies, cutting down fanatics without mercy, were two Supreme Peak masters who ruled the mountains and rivers of the land.

“Yes, I managed to persuade them in the end. And it was easier than I expected.”

“How?”

“It was just like the Great Faction War. All they needed was someone they could believe in and move forward beside. A single ray of light.”

I didn’t know that distant past.

And yet I could guess what light had shone through the darkness of the Great Faction War.

That was probably why my eyes widened without my meaning to.

The brilliant light that had illuminated that age of war had vanished long ago.

“…No way.”

I looked at Mae Jonghak, smiling faintly, and asked as if groaning.

“Has the Martial God returned?”

His answer sent something hot surging up from deep in my chest.

“No. But you were here.”

“…!”

“One who goes ahead of everyone else to light the way. Someone who can bring everyone together because he isn’t bound by status or formality. That’s why you are the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon and Prince Shangshan—but before either of those, you’re a human being.”

His voice carried across the battlefield as though he were reciting a poem.

Countless feet trampled through the pools of blood left by the invaders, and dazzling spears and blades lit the darkness.

The darkness was fading. So was the flame inside me.

But the shouting didn’t stop.

Everyone in Xining was still calling my name at the top of their lungs.

As if mourning my death, just around the corner.

“Thank you. And I’m sorry. For coming too late. For failing to protect you.”

Mae Jonghak said much the same thing as Cheongpung had, crying just as he had. Then he had no choice but to turn away from me.

He was the Alliance Leader.

He had a duty to end this damn battle even a moment sooner and save as many lives as he could.

No.

Maybe he was also giving someone space.

Someone who stood a few steps behind me, frozen in body and spirit, watching it all in silence.

“What’s so amusing?”
His voice was so cold it seemed at odds with his title, the Fire King.
But I knew better than anyone that Jeok Cheongang’s anger was aimed at himself.
And I knew that smiling was the only thing I could do for him, when he must have been bleeding tears inside.
“What, I’m not even allowed to smile when I feel like it?”
“I can tell you’re forcing it.”
“…Is it that obvious?”
“Yeah. Look at the state you’re in.”
“I can’t see myself. Why don’t you bring me a mirror?”
“Do you need one? You’re covered in blood from head to toe, grinning like some evil spirit.”
“Like you’re in any position to talk.”
Jeok Cheongang and I fell silent.
Then, as if we’d planned it, we smiled at the same time.
We both knew it was the only way we could comfort each other, even a little.
Of course, we could see in each other’s eyes that neither smile was real.
“I can definitely tell you’re forcing that smile.”
“It isn’t easy.”
“No. It isn’t. Looking back, nothing ever was.”
I murmured weakly and looked at Jeok Cheongang.
The translucent hologram window stayed in the corner of my vision, no matter which way I turned my head.

> System Time Limit: 59 seconds

“Old Master.”
“Speak.”
“Do you think there really is an afterlife?”
“There must be. No—there definitely is.”
“How do you know?”
“Hong Dao said so. The great Abbot of Shaolin Temple said it, so you’d better believe him without arguing.”
“Come on. You always write him off as some damn monk.”
“This time, I intend to believe him.”
“Why?”
“…There has to be an afterlife for us to meet again.”

> System Time Limit: 30 seconds

“I don’t mind if it’s a long time before we meet. Come as late as you can.”
“It’ll take quite a while regardless. There are a lot of bastards I need to kill.”
“Now that you mention it, you’re right. That gives me an idea.”
“What is it?”
“Once you’ve killed those motherfuckers, I’ll be waiting in the afterlife to kill them again.”
“No.”
“What? Why not?”
“Just beat them until they’re about to die. Then we can kill them together one more time.”
“Wow. Are you a genius?”
“I suppose I was close to a natural disaster.”

> System Time Limit: 15 seconds

“By the way, Old Master.”
“Hmm?”
“I think I’m getting sleepy.”
“…Yeah. You must be exhausted.”
“I’m sorry, but could I ask you for a favor?”
“I’ll grant it. Anything.”
“I have family. They aren’t here, so I don’t think I’ll get to see them now.”

> System Time Limit: 10 seconds

“If you happen to meet them someday—though I know that probably won’t happen—could you tell them how I’m doing?”
“What must this old man do to reach the realm of immortals where you stayed?”
“I’m not sure. Ascend to immortality? I don’t really know.”
“Understood. I’ll find a way, whatever it takes. But you must grant this old man one favor in return.”
“Tell me.”

> System Time Limit: 5 seconds

I blinked weakly.

Through my blurring vision, I could see Jeok Cheongang crying like a child.
“Please… can’t you stay alive?”
As darkness closed in, I answered.
“I’m sorry, Master.”

> System Time Limit: 1 second

And then the entire world around me closed.

Chapter 1129

Looking back, I think I'd wondered about death since I was very young.

Not that I was particularly precocious.

I was just curious.

Why was the amusement park I'd been promised a trip to if I got a perfect score on my spelling test burning on TV?

Why was there a white bouquet on the desk of the classmate I'd played with just yesterday?

It didn't take long for me to learn the truth.

Death, destruction, grief, and anger.

Hunters and monsters. Gates left all over the world. A war that still hadn't ended.

That was simply the age we lived in.

An age of chaos, with truths too vast and terrible for anyone to hold back spilling out without end.

I soon understood why my parents had changed the TV channel with grim faces, and what the white bouquet on my friend's desk meant.

But my kindergarten teacher's description of my friend's absence as a "long journey" left me with even more questions.

I understood that she'd been trying to be kind. Still, one thought led to another.

Why do people die?

Where do they go when they die?

If they really do go on a journey, is there a world beyond death?

Even after many years, no one could answer those questions for me.

Of course they couldn't.

The departed don't speak.

So I wanted to find the answer from someone who had died, but wasn't dead anymore.

"Hey, Golgoli."

"A mere human like you dares call me by such a vulgar name? Can't you see this radiant crown?"

"Want me to make it so you can't see anything at all?"

"…Why did you call me? Get to the point."

Deep down, I'd believed Bones—or rather, the Skeleton King—could answer the question I'd carried for so long.

But faith has a way of being betrayed.

"The afterlife? I don't know why you're asking me."

"Does that mean—"

“That’s right. I don’t know a thing. I can’t remember my life before I died, so why would I know any more about what came after? I just woke up in the dark and found myself like this.”

It was ironic.

Even an undead being who had already crossed death’s threshold and been reborn didn’t know what lay beyond it.

In the end, I gave up looking for an answer.

Or rather, I put it off.

I’d find out someday.

Whether I wanted to or not, death would wait in the shadows for its moment, then swallow everything whole.

Just like now.

Ssshhh.

Everything blurred and drifted away.

The sky that had only just begun to clear. The faces looking down at me.

Their cries, and the shouts still rising from the battlefield.

The past I’d struggled through. The fleeting moments I’d let slip away.

All of it.

Ah.

With no voice left to escape my lips, I sank weakly.

Into pitch-black darkness.

Into the swamp of death, tugging hard at my soul.

And in a gap in time that felt like eternity, I heard a voice echo as if in a hallucination.

“Open your eyes.”

At that moment—

Whoosh!

A beam of light appeared from nowhere, somehow, tearing through the darkness and illuminating the world.

A new world, where everything had changed.

I blinked blankly.

Then I took in the sight before me and wondered:

Where am I?

The gray-white space stretched on without end. Even “vast” felt too small a word for it.

The horizon far in the distance was hazy. When I looked up, I saw a ceiling that seemed higher and more distant than the sky.

It felt as though I'd been shut inside a gigantic box.

Strangely, though, I wasn't afraid.

For all its emptiness, the infinite space inspired an awe I couldn't explain just by looking at it.

Yes.

The answer to the question I'd carried for so long was here.

Though it looked nothing like I'd imagined.

"Hmm. I suppose so."

"…!"

A voice came from behind me without any hint of someone's presence. I instinctively twisted away and retreated, fixing my gaze on the uninvited guest standing only a few steps away.

"…You're—"

I had no time to marvel at the fact that I could speak.

The unexpected visitor—an old man—was far more shocking.

He, on the other hand, sounded perfectly calm.

"Do you know who I am?"

I nodded and tried to answer evenly.

"The Grim Reaper?"

"…"

"Uh, no?"

After a brief silence, the old man shook his head.

"Think whatever you like. It isn't important."

"It's pretty important to me."

"Why? Worried you'll be dragged to hell?"

"Honestly, yes."

"You must have sinned a lot."

"…Who knows?"

I gave the old man, whoever he was, a bitter smile.

I'd sometimes wondered whether every enemy I'd defeated had really deserved to die like that.

Whether the mountain of corpses and river of blood I'd made with my own hands could be weighed against all the lives saved because of me.

Maybe I deserve to go to hell more than anyone.

That was when he spoke.

"You're worrying over nothing. It's not so easy to end up in hell."

The old man's sunken gaze settled on me.

As if he could see right through my thoughts.

"And the people you miss won't be there, either."

"…!"

"Isn't that what worries you most? That you might die and still never see them again?"

For a moment, I couldn't speak. I stared at him, frozen like a statue, then barely managed to force out the words.

"Wait. Is this, by any chance—"

"Ah, forgive me. I didn't mean to let that slip."

His answer all but confirmed my guess.

As I struggled to find the words, the old man shrugged.

"Well, there it is."

"I knew something was off. So it really was true."

"It happens more often than you'd think. When the thing you thought couldn't happen does. It's easier if you think of it as just one of those cases."

There was nothing simple or comforting about that. Yet, for some reason, I found it surprisingly easy to accept.

Even who owned that voice, the one that had sounded like a hallucination just before I opened my eyes in this strange place.

"You're quick on the uptake. Good."

I took another look at the old man, who now read my thoughts as naturally as breathing.

A robe without a speck of dust on it. A beard long enough to reach the floor.

And something about him that felt oddly familiar.

"Have we… met before?"

The old man seemed to ponder the question for a while before answering.

"We may have. Or we may not."

"Excuse me?"

"That's the best answer I can give. I have my own circumstances to consider. I've already gone quite far out of my way to help you."

"You helped me? How?"

"Find the answer to that question yourself. You don't have as much time as you think, so… let's get started."

I wanted to ask what on earth he was talking about, and what he meant by begin.

But the instant his figure blurred, every tangled thought in my head vanished.

Pop.

I hadn't seen him move. I hadn't even sensed it.

He was so fast he left no afterimage.

By the time I turned, he had crossed the few steps between us and taken position behind me. His fist blotted out my vision.

Thud!

My vision swam, and strength left my legs.

I'd never seen an attack so fast and precise.

I had no reason to fight anymore. Even so, I forced my buckling legs to hold and reached out on instinct.

Whoosh—BOOM!

Indigo flames engulfed the gray-white space.

Before I could even think about why I had internal energy here, the old man's calm voice rang out from beyond the scorching heat.

"The Flame Divine Palm. An excellent martial art."

"…How do you know that?"

"Didn't I tell you? Keep it simple and accept it."

Whoosh.

The flames parted as he answered.

Without even forming Palm Force, the old man waved a hand and blew away the heat of the Flame Divine Palm as if snuffing out a candle. Then he signaled to me with his eyes.

"Go on. Struggle all you like. Try the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist—or better yet, the Blazing Flame Divine Spear."

"…!"

"Ah, but not One Annihilation. For your sake, not mine."

Was this what it felt like to be haunted by a ghost?

I could only stare at the ghost—or rather, the old man—in a daze, unable to speak.

Of course, he didn't even allow me that moment.

Slash!

When had he moved? How?

He'd been standing amid the dying flames, but now he was in my blind spot. Invisible qi carried on the edge of his hand swept smoothly across my chest.

So sharp that a beat later, the flesh it sliced through—like tofu—let out a scream.

Splurt!

Blood sprayed into the air. At the same time, a distant pain I'd thought I'd never feel again came surging back.

So did the fear I'd briefly forgotten.

At this rate… I'll die.

It was bizarre.

I’d already died once, yet here I was thinking about dying again.

But I had no time to question it.

Against a power that seemed capable of erasing not just my body but my soul, I had to struggle with everything I had.

“Good. That’s right. Looks like you’re finally starting to understand the situation.”

The old man nodded, seeing straight through my thoughts. A curse escaped before I could stop it.

“You crazy old bastard.”

“High praise. Thank you.”

“What… the hell are you?”

“Who knows? I might be your grandfather.”

The old man smiled faintly for the first time. While I stood speechless at the unexpected family insult, he reached toward me.

No—he held something out.

A spear that had suddenly appeared in midair.

“Take it. Even if you’re going to die, you should at least get to fight back properly once, shouldn’t you?”

I gritted my teeth.

Then I caught the shaft as the spear flew slowly toward me and spat out the words.

“You’re dead.”

The old man replied, “May you be reborn in paradise.”

At that moment—

Shhhk!

A dazzling flash of light streaked across the vast gray-white space.

Chapter 1130

Light doesn't exist only to illuminate.

Sometimes it erases everything and lets you forget.

Just like the beam flying toward Jin Taekyung now, filling his vision with white.

Whooooooosh!

As the flash swelled, Jin Taekyung's gaze sank low.

He cleared every stray thought and question from his mind.

No—he had no choice.

The beam had split into dozens, and each one writhed as if alive, aiming for a vital point on his body.

It's no feint.

Every one of those solid beams held terrifying destructive power unlike anything he'd ever experienced.

But Jin Taekyung chose to advance, not retreat.

Fwoosh—BOOM!

Flames streamed from the foot he drove forward. Keeping low, he shot through the rain of light, narrowly slipping past each beam. The old man watched him and nodded.

"The Flamefire Path. You certainly know how to fight."

Jin Taekyung answered the praise in his own way.

Ssshh.

As the distance between them vanished, his spear surged toward the old man. Afterimages engulfed it, rippling like a wave.

Like the tail of a colossal dragon.

Whoooosh!

Indigo flames rose along the spearhead. As with the old man's move moments earlier, they split into dozens in an instant and surged forward, blanketing the space.

KWA-BOOM!

If a hell of boiling sulfurous fire existed, would it look like this?

Yet even before that lava-like heat, the old man's calm eyes did not waver.

Nor did his hands as he brought them together to meet the spearhead amid that life-or-death crisis.

Crack!

For an instant, Jin Taekyung's eyes flew wide.

The trembling spearhead was reflected in Jin Taekyung's eyes between the old man's palms, pressed together as if in prayer.

"…How?"

The question escaped before he knew it.

The old man, who had blown away every flame coming at him simply by bringing his palms together, looked puzzled.

"Hm? I just grabbed it."

"…!"

"Anyway, try something hotter this time. This is making me pleasantly drowsy. Not bad."

Jin Taekyung felt his vision swim.

The old man was already a madman for stopping his full-power strike with Empty-Hand Seizes the Blade. And now he was treating several jiazi[3870] of Scorching Yang Qi—hot enough to melt steel—as if it were hot spring water.

What kind of old man is this?

Even the Blood Lord, the strongest opponent he'd faced until now, hadn't been this powerful.

Not even close.

The Blood Lord had used blood to gain healing that bordered on Regeneration and a seemingly endless supply of internal energy. But even that terrifying power had its limits.

The old man was different. His very nature, his level, was different from the Blood Lord's.

Jin Taekyung sensed no particular killing intent in eyes as still as a secluded lake. Yet merely facing the old man made his whole body freeze.

It was like standing before an enormous wall he could never climb, no matter how hard he struggled.

And the old man saw straight into that passing thought.

"Your head's full of stray thoughts. You must still have some life left in you. In that case…"

At that moment—

CRASH!

The spearhead in the old man's grasp shattered. His palm glided forward and touched Jin Taekyung's chest.

BOOM!

An explosion rang out from deep within his body.

Jin Taekyung dropped to one knee as pain bleached his vision white. Even through the ringing in his ears, the old man's whisper came through with startling clarity.

"I'll clear those stray thoughts away for you again."

[3870] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

"…!"

Jin Taekyung had no time to answer, let alone recover from the pain.

More precisely, the old man didn't give him any.

Whoosh!

A massive force descended toward the crown of his head with a heavy rush of air.

The energy wave was so terrifying it made him forget even the pain. Jin Taekyung rolled to the side without time to think.

KWA-BOOM!

A roar like the sky splitting apart shook the space, followed by a shock wave that swept in every direction.

Jin Taekyung felt himself thrown far away, as if weightless. Behind him, the old man appeared, having crossed more than ten jang[3871] in an instant.

"Good judgment. If you hadn't used Narye tagon,[3872] it would've ended there."

Normally, Jin Taekyung would have told an enemy to shut the hell up, no matter who it was.

Not this time.

Every part of him knew that against this old man, even a single deep breath—or the smallest stray thought—was a luxury he couldn't afford.

"You only just figured out something that simple?"

…and that as long as this mysterious old man could read his mind, he would never escape this damned situation.

"Oh, that's quite an insight. So what will you do now?"

Meeting the old man's interested gaze, Jin Taekyung used what remained of his spear as a cane and pushed himself upright.

Slowly. Carefully.

By the time he stood on both feet, he had found his answer.

Ssshh.

His eyes closed.

The thought that he was doing something insane, and the fear of what might happen, lasted only a moment. His trembling eyelids grew still, shutting out everything his eyes had shown him.

By giving up that one thing, Jin Taekyung gained something new.

The thread of enlightenment he hadn't managed to follow to its end during the fierce battle against Dark Heaven.

And the only way through the situation he faced now.

At the sight of him, the old man smiled faintly once more.

[3871] A jang is a traditional Korean length of ten ja, about 3.03 m or 9.94 ft.

[3872] Narye tagon is a martial-arts expression for an evasive roll that likens the fighter to a lazy donkey rolling on the ground.

“Yes. That’s how it should be.”

At that moment—

Pop.

As if on cue, the young man and the old man shot toward each other.

Fwoosh—BOOM!

Jin Taekyung thrust out the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist as if entranced.

Heat that seemed capable of melting even a thousand-year-old boulder swept through the gray-white space. But he already knew.

He could feel it.

The old man was no longer there.

He was moving faster than sound, slipping into Jin Taekyung’s blind spot.

BOOM!

Jin Taekyung twisted like lightning. A powerful palm strike slammed through the air where his head had been a moment earlier.

“Much better.”

In the darkness behind his closed eyes, Jin Taekyung swallowed a breath as he barely evaded the attacks closing in from every direction.

Was it his imagination?

The old man’s voice, once clearer than anything else, now sounded fainter and farther away than an echo.

“The fact that you can still hear me means you’re not there yet.”

He was right. Maybe.

It was nothing new. It had always been this way.

He hadn’t been strong enough to protect everyone. The guilt and anxiety had brought nightmares night after night.

He had wavered like a candle in the wind, then guttered out.

“But that is greed. Humans cannot become perfect.”

Jin Taekyung knew that, too.

But even if what he wanted went beyond desire into greed, he didn’t care.

He only wanted to save someone, and to live himself.

To live alongside the people he cherished in a more peaceful world.

“Everyone dreams of that. Reality is cruel, though.”

Despite his calm voice, the old man pressed him without pause.

A foot that snapped like a whip, a hand slicing diagonally downward, a palm extending smoothly—each was a sword or spear.

There was no fierce killing intent in any of those moves, yet each brimmed with enough qi to seemingly obliterate not just his body, but his soul.

“Who knows? Perhaps entering perfect rest just like this would be a good thing for you.”

At those words, Jin Taekyung’s retreating steps stopped as though nailed to the ground.

KWA-BOOM!

Two fists collided in midair.

The old man was so wrinkled that Jin Taekyung couldn’t begin to guess his age, and his fist held a force almost impossible to withstand. Jin Taekyung braced himself, though his feet slowly slid back.

“What do you mean by that?”

The question came through clenched teeth. The old man answered calmly.

“What do you think I mean?”

“…You can’t mean—”

“Good. You seem to know already. There’s no time left, so let’s settle this now.”

Just as Jin Taekyung was about to ask what he meant, the old man’s fist gathered more force and shoved him away.

KWA-BOOM!

Jin Taekyung shot backward like a cannonball.

He barely regained his balance in midair. The moment he landed, he felt the space around him hum.

Hmmm.

He couldn’t see it. But he could picture it.

Far away, a formless sword pointed straight at him. The old man held it in his hands—a sword made not of metal, but entirely of qi.

“Try to dodge it. If you can’t… then this is as far as you go.”

Jin Taekyung could no longer ask what that meant.

He couldn’t even bring himself to open his eyes. If he lost his tenuous hold on this new sensation for even an instant, or let the slightest stray thought intrude, he felt certain his body would be cut to pieces.

And that judgment was right.

Gooooong.

The gray-white space trembled as the old man slowly raised both hands.

At the same time, a faint beam of light flowed into some corner of Jin Taekyung’s pitch-black vision.

What is this?

A sensation he had never felt before.

Or rather, it had come to him only very rarely after he combined three forms of internal energy, lingering briefly before fading.

Reason had no place in it. It belonged to instinct.

It was a realm where the body moved before the mind gave an order—no, somewhere beyond even that.

It was taking hold of Jin Taekyung's mind, touching on the sixth sense.

At last, he stared straight at the invisible sword slashing down from the old man's fingertips.

Sssshing!

At the instant a sound like the whole world splitting apart rang out—

Whoooosh.

Jin Taekyung saw it.

A single beam of light, brightening his vision as dark as the deep night.

And, as if entranced, he stepped forward.

Shhk!

Chapter 1131

In time brought to a standstill, amid a silence that seemed to last forever, I slowly opened my eyes.

It was a strange feeling.

My mind was hazy, as though lost in thick fog, yet I could see more clearly than ever. Clearly enough to wonder if all of this was a dream.

But the low voice that reached my ears a moment later reminded me that this was no illusion.

“Did you see it?”

I looked up at the old man, dazed.

Then, recalling the formless qi that had flown across the space moments ago, cleaving it in two and missing me by no more than a thread, I parted my lips.

“Yes. I saw it.”

Everything felt natural. The respect that had crept into my voice, and the way the old man accepted it as if it were only right.

“What did you see?”

“A ray of light. A line.”

The old man stroked his snow-white beard, which hung down to his knees.

“How could that be? It must have been formless.”

“It had a form. For that moment, at least.”

“Even with your eyes closed?”

“I didn’t see it with my eyes.”

“You saw it, but didn’t see it. Then what was it?”

“That…”

I faltered.

Not because I didn’t know the answer, but because the thought that had flashed through my mind sounded absurd even to me.

My silence was as good as an answer, though. The old man’s unfathomable gaze was already looking into my heart.

“People often have the truth right before their eyes and still pass it by because they cannot believe it. What a pity.”

Step.

One step was all it took for the old man to close the distance between us. He whispered:

“You saw what cannot be seen, and dodged what could not be dodged. Why can’t you believe you did it?”

“…!”

"Sit cross-legged."

Still hazy as though in a dream, I sat as he instructed, almost without knowing what I was doing.

Then I heard his voice again—not in my ears, but inside my head.

—Clear your mind like a stream. Hold your focus and let yourself follow the flow.

A thought came to me. I'd heard something like this before, somewhere.

But it was gone in an instant as my awareness sank deeper.

Fwoooosh.

Light and darkness flickered without end before my eyes, leaving me disoriented.

Amid that overwhelming confusion, I forgot everything.

Where I was. Who I was.

Yet the voice coming from somewhere remained astonishingly clear.

—Remember what you saw. How it felt in that moment.

I took a slow, deep breath.

Then I spoke the name of the thing with no shape, color, or scent in my mind.

Qi.

Everywhere and nowhere.

The source and seed of all things in the world.

Yes.

For a brief moment, I had seen it clearly—through a new realm beyond the senses.

And the owner of the voice echoing deep within my soul was someone who had already set foot in that realm.

—I'll ask again. What did you see it with?

Right. I still hadn't answered the old man's question.

This time, though, I could answer without hesitation. That other eye hidden within me—the one even I hadn't believed in—

My heart. No…

The Mind's Eye.

The moment those two words came to me and were branded into my mind—

—Good judgment, as always.

Flash!

At the sound of the old man's low voice, the light and darkness that had kept flickering before my eyes scattered.

Or rather, everything around me did.

"Ah."

I let out the breath I'd been holding and looked around.

Crack. Crack.

Why was this happening? How was it possible?

The vast, endless gray-white space was shaking.

Cracks spread in every direction like a pane of glass about to shatter, and the figure of the man standing beyond it twisted along with the shifting space.

“Don’t be alarmed. The time we were granted is simply coming to an end.”

His voice was calm, at odds with the impossible sight before me. I stared at him as though entranced.

Then, recalling a fragment of a memory I’d long forgotten, I finally spoke.

“I’ve met you before. I’m sure of it.”

The old man smiled faintly.

“Is that what you think?”

Neither a yes nor a no.

But now I was certain. The gray-white space and the old man might look different from how they had then, but neither had changed at the heart of it.

I knew whose voice had come to me now and then like an auditory hallucination ever since my Bone Transformation.

“You’re…”

I could barely force the word out as I looked at the old man smiling silently before me.

No.

The Helper.

The one who had first taught me to circulate my qi when I’d only just stepped into the unknown world of Murim.

The mysterious being I’d taken for part of the tutorial System, and forgotten for so long because of it.

“…Who on earth are you?”

Was this what it felt like to have lightning strike the top of your head?

Faced at last with a truth this immense, I trembled as the shock washed over me like a tidal wave.

At the same time, I knew it instinctively. The old man would never answer, and even this brief meeting was drawing to a close.

“No need to answer. I already know.”

Grgrgrk.

The space contorted. I could no longer make out the old man’s face, but I shouted toward him.

“Then what—what happens now?”

“Who knows? I don’t know what lies ahead, either. For now, we have no choice but to return to our respective places.”

“What does that—”

“Jin Taekyung.”

His voice was low. Cutting me off, he spoke.

“Do your best. Only then can you save everyone—and yourself.”

“…!”

“Now it’s time to go. To the place where you belong.”

My eyes widened as I understood what he meant.

Whoooosh.

The world in my sight rushed past as I was drawn away. Something glimmering touched my hand, and the old man’s final words rang through my head like a voice I was only imagining.

—Take it. This is the last gift this old man can give you.

I instinctively clenched my hand around it.

As my consciousness faded, I heard a sound from somewhere. A clear bell chime I’d been certain I would never hear again.

Ding.

A brilliant light came rushing from far away and filled my vision.

Left alone, the old man gazed in silence at the empty place for a long while.

To the person who had just vanished, it must have looked as though the entire gray-white space was disappearing. But the old man knew better.

This space would last forever. Jin Taekyung had only been a guest passing through.

And the old man would once again have to wait, with no telling when that wait might end.

“When will I be able to finish this?”

He murmured to himself. After so long alone, talking to himself had become a habit.

“No. Will it ever end at all?”

A bitter smile touched his wrinkled lips as he looked around.

Gray-white space stretched endlessly in every direction. Cold and pale, it was his only home—and a vast prison with neither bars nor an exit.

The emptiness that thought brought lasted only a moment. His gaze soon grew calm again.

After all, no one had forced him to become a prisoner here. He had chosen it himself.

“Yes. So that’s enough.”

He murmured the words as though renewing a promise to himself, then started walking.

Then, suddenly, he stopped and turned to look back along the way he’d come.

Or, more precisely, at the place where the guest who had visited after so long had stayed.

"Jin Taekyung."

The name left his lips, and he wondered if Taekyung could do it. If the choice he had made had truly been the right one.

And if he'd made the wrong choice, how terrible and cruel would the future ahead be?

But all those worries were meaningless.

The old man had already made his choice, and thanks to his help, Jin Taekyung had been given another chance.

"I suppose I'll have to put my faith in you."

The words would never reach Taekyung. The old man began walking again, slowly crossing the endless gray-white space as he always had.

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, was crying.

He held his Disciple's lifeless body and sobbed quietly. Nothing around him mattered anymore—not the shouts and clash of steel that still rang out, nor the people watching him.

The Master who had lost his only Disciple did not hold back his tears.

He couldn't.

Two years.

Only two years out of a life that had lasted more than a hundred. Yet his time with Jin Taekyung had shone brighter than any other.

Taekyung had been the only light to find him when he was at his darkest.

And now Jin Taekyung—his Disciple—was dead.

Despite his Master's plea for him to live, he had gone somewhere far away.

I'm sorry, Master.

That final voice wouldn't leave his ears.

The corners of Taekyung's mouth, raised with effort into a smile for his grieving Master. His half-closed, empty eyes. Even now, the sight seared into Jeok Cheongang's heart like a brand.

Grief overwhelmed him until he could make sense of nothing. Tears kept filling his eyes, hiding what he needed to see.

Plip.

A tear rolled down the Master's cheek and fell onto the back of his dead Disciple's hand.

Sss.

The surface of the blood rippled with a sudden tremor, and the finger submerged in it moved.

Chapter 1132

No one there had dared to imagine it.

That the body of someone already dead would move.

Perhaps that was why even the few who saw his fingers twitch failed to realize what it meant.

They put it down to the grieving Master's touch as he held his Disciple's body and sobbed, the lingering vibrations of the battlefield—or simply their imagination.

An illusion born of the desperate wish that the young hero who had met such a noble end might come back to life, even now.

The Master, sunk in grief, thought no differently.

Thump.

At first, he thought he'd imagined the sound.

But when a vibration traveled through the Disciple he held so tightly, Jeok Cheongang could only blink in a daze.

How?

It couldn't be. It was impossible.

Yet contrary to what Jeok Cheongang's instincts told him, the vibration, once begun, did not stop.

It grew louder and clearer.

Like a war drum beating out the order to charge.

Thump. Thump-thump.

"…!"

In an instant, Jeok Cheongang hurriedly pressed his ear to his Disciple's chest. His eyes flew wide.

There was no mistaking it. He wasn't hearing things.

The heart that had stopped was beating again. An extinguished ember had caught fire once more.

And just as Jeok Cheongang shuddered at the impossible truth—

Fwoosh!

A scorching wind surged up around one person's body.

No—

A tremendous wave of qi, powerful enough to envelop a radius of a dozen or so jang[3873].

Rrrrmmm.

The space trembled in tiny shivers, like a living creature.

Everyone still nearby stared, eyes wide.

[3873] Jang is a traditional Korean unit of length. One jang is about 3.03 meters (9.94 feet).

They watched dark blue heat waver like a mirage around the young man slowly rising at its center.

“Ah, ah…!”

An exclamation thick with emotion escaped Jeok Cheongang’s lips.

Most people were simply overwhelmed by the mysterious sight. But he knew all too well what it meant.

So did the two other giants who had remained to witness it, unlike Sword Saint Mae Jonghak, who had gone to bring the long battle to an end.

“…Am I seeing this right?”

The Slaughter Saint sounded unable to believe it. The Bow Saint answered in a voice that trembled, unlike her usual one.

“I think so. No, I’m sure of it.”

Watching the young man rise out of his Master’s arms, she murmured as if to herself.

“Bone Transformation.”

At that moment—

Ssshh!

The heat that had surged like waves and the dark blue streaks of light gathered with sudden force.

Toward the body, still warm.

To rekindle the faint ember within.

People had feared fire since ancient times.

A campfire burning in the mountains at night could give them strength, but greater heat could bring disaster.

So they saw fire as a force of destruction, overlooking the power to purify hidden behind it.

And now, the heat surrounding one person’s body was unquestionably a purifying flame.

Flicker.

Though trapped in a state of consciousness where he couldn’t tell dream from reality, Jin Taekyung could feel it clearly.

The heat surging from deep within him.

The agony of his whole body burning, and at the same time, the cool relief of his wounds being washed clean.

Kwoooosh!

A wave of fire overflowed in every direction. The terrible heat seemed ready to melt even his already-healed body in an instant.

Yet for some reason, Jin Taekyung felt not a trace of fear.

Of course he didn't.

He understood it instinctively.

That immense heat wasn't only sweeping through his body, melting every limb and bone. It was also peeling back a layer to reveal the unknown power hidden within him.

But that wasn't the only reason Jin Taekyung could calmly accept his transformation.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

Beyond his hazy sight and senses, chimes rang out one after another.

They were clearer than ever—the chimes he'd thought he would never hear again. Words swept past his eyes like the wind, tickling his retinas.

New enlightenment and achievements tied to it. Increases in Qi Sense and martial arts…

Unable to bear the weight of the words pouring down without end, Jin Taekyung closed his eyes.

He focused entirely on the landscape of his mind and sank deep beneath the surface.

The next moment, he found himself standing somewhere new.

Where is this?

He had seen it only once, yet it was familiar.

How could he forget?

Far below lay endless land and sea. Clouds filled the sky as far as he could see. It was a beautiful sight.

The peak. It's the same peak as before.

When he had brought together the Heavenly Power Demon's demonic qi, the Thunderbolt Saber King's lightning qi, and his own Scorching Yang Qi, Jin Taekyung had finally conquered this lofty peak.

He had stepped into a new realm: the Summit of Martial Achievement.

But that was all.

He had claimed the peak that touched the clouds, but no matter how far he reached, he couldn't touch the sky beyond them.

That realm hadn't been open to him then.

He hadn't yet earned the right—the enlightenment—to glimpse it, even for a moment.

Yes. That was how it had been.

Until today, when the old man had given him another insight.

Climbing higher was never the only answer.

He had simply taken that answer for granted.

But now he knew.

Raising the peak beneath his feet wasn't the only way to glimpse the sky beyond these thick clouds.

There's more than one answer.

Why hadn't he realized it?

He had always gone beyond anything he'd imagined possible. So why had he set limits on his thinking?

Jin Taekyung suddenly remembered a conversation he'd forgotten.

When he was a novice martial artist, still stuck at Second Rate, he had asked Jin Wikyung how on earth he could reach the First Rate realm. His brother had answered with a single word: faith.

"What does that… mean?"

"Exactly what it sounds like. Believe in yourself."

"What does believing have to do with advancing realms?"

"Martial arts begin with belief."

Only then had he understood.

Now he understood.

The person who had believed in Jin Taekyung least wasn't anyone else. It was Jin Taekyung himself.

Even after he'd far surpassed Jin Wikyung's martial prowess, even after he'd earned the right—he had always been that way.

But not anymore.

He decided to try believing, just a little.

In the old man's words: Don't set limits for yourself.

In the potential he had yet to discover.

If I want to see it, I can.

At the very top of the peak, Jin Taekyung lifted his head as if spellbound.

He looked at the clouds streaming across his path, blocking the view in his mind.

Not with his eyes, but with his heart.

With the Mind's Eye.

And the next moment—

Fwoosh!

The clouds scattered as if by magic. Light flooded his vision, turning it white, and pain shot through him as though his retinas were burning.

"…!"

Was this what it felt like to be thrown into a vast pit of fire?

Or would dozens, hundreds of bolts of lightning striking down at once hurt like this?

But Jin Taekyung held on to the thread of his fading consciousness with all his might.

Fighting the pain that threatened to turn his mind to mush, he endured the unprecedented heat pouring down with the light.

Even that was enough to make his body and every memory in his head feel as though they were burning away.

Who he was.

Where he was.

Yet he did not forget the one thing that mattered: why he was enduring this terrible pain.

I have to go back. No matter what.

He had left something precious behind.

He had failed to protect what he needed to protect, and there was still something he had to do.

That alone was reason enough to endure.

If he could return, he could bear this agony, each second stretching into ten years.

Even the terrible heat that had seeped deep into his body and flowed through it like lava.

But widening his own limits did not mean every boundary had disappeared.

Kiiiiing.

This was a limit he could not overcome by will. A boundary he truly lacked the qualifications to cross.

And the moment Jin Taekyung realized it—

Ssshhh.

Thick clouds once again hid the light. The immense heat still flowing inside him spread through his body, passing through hundreds of acupoints rather than his Lower or Middle Dantian.

There it was absorbed, melting into him as though it had been part of his body from the start.

As though it were replenishing the natural strength of his body, damaged beyond recovery, and giving him still greater vitality and power.

Ah.

In that instant, Jin Taekyung understood.

His endurance had not been in vain.

The old man’s words—that it was time for each of them to return to their own places—could finally come true.

And his hunch was right.

Ding.

A clear chime rang out beyond the depths of his consciousness, and Jin Taekyung —

No.

I opened my eyes.

This time, I didn’t need anyone’s help.

As the dark blue radiance that had blazed for half a day slowly faded, a suffocating silence fell over everything.

The allies who had finally won this horrific bloodbath, and the fanatics who had survived by sheer luck and been captured—

No one dared speak.

It was as if even the dead were watching the figure slowly descend through the fading heat.

But unlike those frozen in place, forgetting even how to breathe, the old Master reached out with a trembling hand to catch his Disciple.

His body was warm now, like a campfire.

A thought struck Jeok Cheongang.

What if none of this were real?

If it were a spring dream[3874] unfolding in the mind of an old man who had already gone mad, what would he do?

He couldn’t bring himself to speak.

If this truly was a dream, he would rather never wake.

But someone knew what Jeok Cheongang did not.

That all of this was undeniably real.

“I kept my promise.”

Half-raised eyelids. A languid voice.

The Disciple smiled at the Master staring at him in a daze, then added:

“Master.”

[3874] A “spring dream” (chunmong) is a Korean expression for a fleeting or illusory experience.

Chapter 1133

The moment a small but unmistakable voice slipped between someone's lips, the countless people surrounding him all widened their eyes at once, as if they'd agreed to do it together.

What should they call this?

Survival?

Or resurrection?

No one knew the answer.

All they knew was that something hot surged up from deep within their chests.

"…!"

"…!"

A choked roar rose beyond the Inner City, powerful enough to shake heaven and earth.

The rain that had poured down without end had long since stopped, but their cries didn't let up.

Some wept. Some laughed. Others raised their weapons high and roared as if the battle still raged.

Exhausted as they were, they rejoiced with all their hearts.

The brutal bloodbath that had seemed as if it would never end was over.

And yet, alongside their joy, they felt a grief too deep for words.

They saw the empty places left by comrades who had stood shoulder to shoulder and fought back to back with them only several shichen[3875] ago.

Finally, they shuddered at the sight before their eyes: a young hero awakening amid a blue-black radiance, a miracle beyond belief.

His Master watched his Disciple with an expression of disbelief, then parted his trembling lips and spoke.

"Yeah. I believed in you."

Despite his answer, his eyes were soaked with tears.

At the sight of Jeok Cheongang, Jin Taekyung said nothing. He only managed a faint smile.

Whether his Master had believed in him or not—what did it matter?

What mattered was the feeling in his Master's tears, and that he had kept his promise.

I'm back. Really.

Perhaps it was because his mind was exhausted beyond its limits.

[3875] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

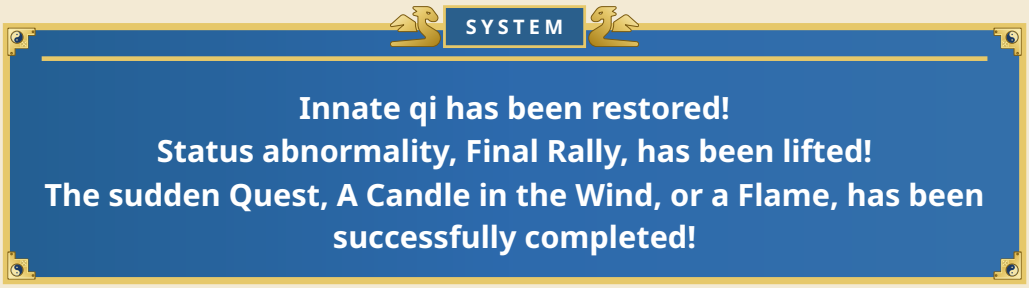
His consciousness was hazy, as if he'd sunk deep into sleep, but Jin Taekyung knew that everything around him was real.

The sky slowly clearing.

The familiar faces surrounding him now, laughing and crying, though he'd thought he would never see them again.

And—

Among the countless holographic windows floating in the air, the words that stood out largest and clearest.



Would he become a candle, its flame dying helplessly away?

Or a blaze that devoured his enemies?

At that crossroads, Jin Taekyung had chosen the latter, and the dying ember inside him had finally been reignited.

The ember called innate qi.

And the second Bone Transformation that followed was nothing short of a miracle—one no one present could have expected.

Not even the peerless giant known as the Sword Saint.

"You make a lot of noise in your sleep. More than I ever imagined."

At Mae Jonghak's joking remark as he came over, Jin Taekyung let out a quiet snort of laughter.

"I almost woke up halfway through. It was so noisy around me."

"Is it still?"

"Yes."

Jin Taekyung glanced at his allies, who were still cheering, and added:

"But… it sounds good."

It sounds good.

At Jin Taekyung's brief comment, Mae Jonghak watched him in silence, then gave a small nod.

"Yes. I think so too."

No one needed to ask about the battle's outcome, or explain it.

The proof was all around them: countless allies surrounding them, and a handful of fanatics on their knees, bound from head to toe.

The battle is over.

At those few words, something hot surged up from one corner of Jin Taekyung's chest.

Perhaps this was only a victory for today.

Today's victory might be erased by a defeat tomorrow, whenever that day came.

But… for now, this was enough.

Enough that this horrific hellscape had come to an end.

Enough that they had defeated the enormous Dark Heaven army that had stood in their way like a mountain, along with the powerful enemies who led it.

The Blood Lord. And the Grand Sorceress.

Jin Taekyung lifted his head and looked northeast.

He didn't know how many more enemies lurked beyond the vast desert outside Qinghai.

But the deaths of the Blood Lord and the Grand Sorceress on this battlefield were undoubtedly a major gain for the allies.

He couldn't be certain, but as far as he could tell, those two had been the Lord of Heaven's last hunting dogs.

But… what is this feeling?

A sudden sense of déjà vu made Jin Taekyung's eyelids flutter.

Why?

He felt as if he'd forgotten something.

Something very important—something he couldn't afford to overlook.

But it didn't take him long to realize what that feeling was.

Whoooosh!

The next moment, Jin Taekyung's eyes flew wide as he saw a dozen or so shadows shoot up into the distant sky.

Those are…!

They were none other than strange birds.

They flew across the sky with their wings spread wide, white bone joints exposed and blood-red eyes flashing.

Like messengers rushing to deliver urgent news to someone.

"No!"

The shout burst from him on instinct.

But before he could do anything, the birds, already far away, shot west at a speed far beyond anything they'd managed while alive.

They left one name flashing through Jin Taekyung's mind like a bolt of lightning.

"…Ma Sanbao?"

He'd forgotten about him for a moment.

No—that wasn't quite right. He hadn't had even a moment to think about him.

The powerful corpse sorcerer who carried on the Maoshan Sect's legacy had been hidden from sight by the shadows of the two monsters, the Blood Lord and the Grand Sorceress.

At the same time, the Blood Lord's final words before he met his end rang through Jin Taekyung's mind like an auditory hallucination.

Celebrate to your heart's content. This will be your last laugh.

He hadn't understood it then.

He'd thought those words were nothing more than the tired bluster of a defeated general.

But now, the chill running down Jin Taekyung's spine foretold another crisis.

Could it be?

The tangled threads of information in his mind began to unravel one by one.

Ma Sanbao had never appeared on the battlefield, despite being an undeniably powerful asset—even if he was no match for the Blood Lord or the Grand Sorceress.

The Sword Saint and the Murim Alliance's elite had traveled thousands of li[3876] to Qinghai without even telling their own allies the truth.

And then there were the strange birds that had watched everything unfold before flying west.

Wait. If they're heading west…

No doubt about it.

Mount Kunlun.

That place, already in Dark Heaven's grasp, had to be the birds' destination.

At the same time, Jin Taekyung recalled one of the questions he still hadn't answered.

Why had Dark Heaven's enormous army, which had occupied Mount Kunlun before he and the reinforcements even set foot in Qinghai, remained so immovable?

Had the Blood Lord really made all these moves just to catch him and every other big fish in a single sweep of the net?

No. That wasn't all the Blood Lord was after from the start. It was just… they needed time, too.

Perhaps it was because his mind was already exhausted beyond its limits.

Or perhaps because he'd finally grasped the shape of the foreboding he'd felt.

His face had turned as pale as paper as he looked at the people surrounding him.

Without realizing it, Jin Taekyung let out the breath he'd been holding.

Along with two bitter words that had lingered on the tip of his tongue.

"…Moving Formation."

[3876] In this Chinese setting, one li is approximately 500 m (0.311 mi).

That was the answer Jin Taekyung had found.

It was one of the main reasons Dark Heaven's powerful army had hunkered down on Mount Kunlun—and the Blood Lord's last move, prepared in case things went wrong.

And Ma Sanbao, the hidden blade, would move as soon as he heard this news.

Through the Moving Formation newly inscribed somewhere on Mount Kunlun, he would pierce the allies' most vital point.

The very place called the Central Plains.

"We have to move. Right now. If we don't, the Central Plains—"

Jin Taekyung's voice trembled as he groaned.

His breath came hard, and his heart pounded.

Faces passed one after another through his wavering vision. Perhaps they shouldn't have come here today at all.

Especially the man who had been known as the Sword Saint for decades, and was now the Alliance Leader.

But—

"Yes. We have to move."

That was as far as Jin Taekyung could go.

Tap.

A hand suddenly touched the back of his neck.

In the same instant, Mae Jonghak struck him with a Pressure-Point Strike, swift as lightning. In an even voice, he continued:

"But this time, you're going to rest."

Jin Taekyung answered.

Or tried to.

No. Absolutely not. He couldn't rest now.

But despite his desperate resolve, his lips wouldn't move. Exhaustion and sleep washed over him, pressing down on his eyelids with the weight of ten thousand geun[3877].

Ah.

As his vision went dark in an instant, Jin Taekyung let go of consciousness, a voice ringing in his ears like an auditory hallucination.

"You've done well, my friend."

Qinghai is vast.

[3877] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun is 6,000 kg (about 13,200 lb).

But the wings of the strange birds, granted boundless vigor by death, were swift enough to make the distance between Xining and Mount Kunlun—more than several hundred li[3878]—seem insignificant.

And the shocking news brought by these exceptional messengers, unlike any seen before or since, reached Mount Kunlun's highest peak in less than a shichen[3879].

No—

It reached a certain corpse sorcerer who carried on the Maoshan Sect's legacy.

"…So that's what happened."

Ma Sanbao muttered to himself as he stared east, his gaze sinking deep.

The news was impossible to believe, but he had no choice.

More than a dozen strange birds had already relayed everything they'd seen and heard in vivid detail.

The outcome of a bloody battle that had raged without a break for half a day—and the presence of people he'd thought could never appear in Qinghai.

I owe the Blood Lord an apology. I thought he was just a man crazed by blood.

Ma Sanbao let out a quiet snort of laughter.

More than anyone, the Blood Lord had obsessed over Jin Taekyung. Yet by keeping one last move in reserve, he hadn't forgotten his most basic loyalty to the master who held his leash.

A final sword stroke that would lay waste to the Central Plains, now all but undefended.

And Ma Sanbao was willing to play that part.

"It's about time I left this wretched mountain."

Ma Sanbao rose from the grand chair and addressed his waiting subordinates.

"Let's go. To the Central Plains."

[3878] In this Chinese setting, one li is approximately 500 m (0.311 mi).

[3879] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

Chapter 1134

The air on Mount Kunlun was heavy and cold that day.

Mist lay thick over the towering peaks. The creatures large and small that had once shared this beautiful wilderness with humans had long since vanished.

Only blood-red eyes glimmered through the dense mist, accompanied by eerie cries.

“Grrr.”

A savage growl came from between yellowed teeth.

The mountain lord[3880] that had ruled Mount Kunlun only a month ago lowered its body, now larger than it had been in life, to greet its master.

Around it, thousands of human demons surrounded Taiqing Hall—the very symbol of the Kunlun Sect—without leaving a single gap.

“Everyone has gathered, as you commanded.”

The report came from one of the hundred or so figures wrapped head to toe in jet-black robes. Ma Sanbao asked eagerly, “How many in all?”

“About five thousand. Three thousand of them are monsters.”

A smile touched Ma Sanbao’s lips.

“Then Mount Kunlun’s spiritual creatures must be extinct.”

Anyone familiar with the state of Murim who heard their purpose and conversation might have scoffed at such an absurd claim.

Five thousand was no small number, but even the Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples, who had once blanketed the world in darkness, had failed to take the Central Plains.

Ma Sanbao had good reason to smile, though.

It’s enough. More than enough.

Ma Sanbao swept his sunken gaze over the subordinates packed in all around him.

The monsters’ blood-red eyes flashed without pause. The fanatics moved only at his command, little more than soulless puppets.

Fully prepared and waiting for Ma Sanbao’s orders, they deserved to be called a Demon Army. Comparing them to the mere Demonic Cult, now a ghost of the past, would be an insult.

But the greatest source of his confidence was the hundred or so corpse sorcerers before him, including the man in black.

None could compare to Ma Sanbao himself, but each was a true monster capable of leading an army so long as there were corpses to use.

He regarded them with satisfaction, then spoke.

[3880] San-gun, literally “mountain lord,” is a traditional epithet for a tiger.

"We'll split the army in two and move out."

"Forgive me, but has the plan changed?"

Ma Sanbao nodded at the black-clad man's cautious question.

Under the original plan, they would have split into seven groups and spread chaos across the land. But circumstances had changed.

Sword Saint Mae Jonghak had appeared in Qinghai with no fewer than ten thousand elite troops from the Murim Alliance.

Who would've thought the Alliance Leader himself would bring reinforcements?

Ma Sanbao had stayed behind in case something like this happened. Even so, Mae Jonghak's arrival had surprised him as much as the Green Forest Alliance and the Yangtze River Channel League's betrayal.

But the fact that Alliance Leader Mae Jonghak had left the Murim Alliance meant he must have left at least a minimal defense in Henan.

Of course, with its main force gone, it'll be nowhere near enough. Still, to prepare for any eventuality, we'd be wise not to spread ourselves too thin.

This was an opportunity Ma Sanbao had won with great difficulty—perhaps even a stroke of heavenly fortune. Given what the corpse sorcerers could do, his caution might be excessive. But he wanted the safest, surest course.

He meant to hold a place second only to one and above ten thousand in the world remade under the Lord of Heaven's rule. He had no intention of meeting a miserable end like the Blood Lord.

After careful thought, he had narrowed his targets to two places.

"Henan and Shanxi."

At his superior's voice, which broke the brief silence, the black-clad man bowed deeply.

"As you command. An excellent decision."

With the Jin Family of Taiyuan away, Shanxi Province was all but an ownerless mountain. Henan, meanwhile, had to be taken for both its symbolic importance to Murim and its strategic location.

With Mae Jonghak gone, this was the perfect chance to seize it.

Henan and Shanxi also shared a border. Should anything go wrong, the two forces could support each other.

"If I give you two thousand troops and half the sorcerers, can you take Shanxi Province within seven days and nights?"

Shanxi Province had grown stronger by the day since the Jin Family of Taiyuan united it.

The black-clad man answered without hesitation. His force might number a mere two thousand now, but with dozens of corpse sorcerers, it would multiply without end.

“Four days will suffice.”

“And if I include Hebei?”

“Give me ten days. I’ll return leading an army of a hundred thousand.”

Ma Sanbao’s smile deepened at the ready answer.

“I’ll remember that promise.”

At that very moment—

Sssaaaa.

Faint strands of light began to rise from the ground.

The Moving Formation the Grand Sorceress had installed during her stay on Mount Kunlun—no, the Magic Formation—was activating under the hands of the sorcerers who had remained with Ma Sanbao.

Vroooom.

Two enormous circles of light spread outward, growing by the second until they enveloped everyone.

Ma Sanbao felt a mysterious surge of energy from every direction and trembled with elation.

I’ll end it all in one stroke. With my own two hands.

No one who knew him could deny that his confidence was justified.

He was the most powerful corpse sorcerer to carry on the Maoshan Sect’s legacy. As a martial artist, he was also a Supreme Peak master who could stand shoulder to shoulder with the Ten Kings.

With the Three Saints, Jin Taekyung, and Jeok Cheongang all absent, nothing in the Central Plains’ Murim frightened him.

Sword Saint, you of all people shouldn’t have left.

Whatever defenses they had prepared, this force could cut through the heart of the Central Plains in an instant.

By the time word of its arrival reached the enemy, the army would number tens of thousands rather than thousands.

An immortal army whose ranks would fill again no matter how many times its soldiers were killed.

Today, the course of history changes.

The world would remember forever that Ma Sanbao had been there for the first step of a grand new history that would endure a thousand years.

Fwoosh!

A brilliant flash washed his vision white. Smiling, Ma Sanbao closed his eyes and yielded to the mysterious force pulling his spirit and body toward a distant place.

He imagined the great strides he would take, one after another, and the mighty trail they would carve across the world.

Paht.

The change was instantaneous.

The air and wind around him were different now. Instinctively, Ma Sanbao knew the Grand Sorceress's Magic Formation had carried him and some three thousand of his subordinates to the promised place.

At last, it begins.

Thrilled to be taking that great first step, Ma Sanbao opened his eyes.

Or rather, he tried to.

Crunch—splat!

A gruesome sound of flesh being torn rang out, and something hot and sticky covered his face before he could open them.

"…!"

The smell of blood seeped deep into his nostrils, all too familiar.

It felt as though the world had stopped. Ma Sanbao struggled to lift his trembling eyelids.

Then he saw clearly what else he had failed to realize.

Thump. Splatter.

In some nameless, remote mountain valley where even the moonlight didn't reach, large and small figures crumpled like bundles of straw without so much as a dying cry.

Ma Sanbao could neither move nor stop it. The survivors around him were no different.

All they could do was stare blankly at the deaths of fully two thousand of their comrades, felled before they could take their first step in Henan.

Their bodies had become one with rocks and trees rather than falling to blades or spears. They lay dead in hideous, unnatural shapes.

"What… What in the world…"

Just then, an unexpected answer reached Ma Sanbao's ears as he muttered in a dazed voice, as if under a spell.

"What do you think? Exactly what you're looking at."

A calm voice sounded from the darkness.

Ma Sanbao whipped his head toward it like lightning and stared.

How long had that man been there?

Several dozen jang[3881] away, a middle-aged man stood atop a hill that ringed the basin like a wall. He looked down over the fear and confusion below.

No—he was looking at Ma Sanbao.

"Good to meet you. I mean that. I was so worried you wouldn't come that I could hardly stand it."

[3881] A jang is ten ja, approximately 3.03 m or 9.94 ft.

The man slowly surveyed Ma Sanbao, frozen stiff as a statue, and the subordinates who had survived. He smacked his lips.

"I can't say I'm not a little disappointed…but I suppose that was enough of a welcome. Don't you think?"

Ma Sanbao did not answer.

He couldn't. Right then, it was all he could do to grasp the word filling his blank mind.

A trap…!

Yes. This was a trap, and a meticulously prepared one.

And the refined-looking middle-aged man smiling on the hill was unmistakably the one who had laid a trap in the Moving Formation the Grand Sorceress had carved deep into a remote valley in Henan that no one ever visited.

A hunter who had set the simplest, surest, most horrific trap of all.

"Don't glare at me like that. I'm the disappointed one. If I'd known the Moving Formation's exact range, I could have finished you all in one stroke."

The man even let out a theatrical sigh. Ma Sanbao felt his blood boil.

"You'll regret that you didn't. I'll tear you and every last member of your household to pieces."

The man had not introduced himself, but Ma Sanbao already knew who he was.

The portrait Ma Sanbao had seen during his years in the East Depot and the pure-white fan in the man's hand left little doubt.

"Crouching Dragon Guest, Zhuge Feng."

Zhuge Feng, the current Family Head of the Zhuge Clan, widened his eyes.

"Oh? You know me?"

"I do. I remembered you. After today, though, I'll forget you."

Ma Sanbao drew up the qi within him.

The trap had cost him more than half his subordinates, but the corpse sorcerers—his most important force—had suffered little damage.

Once the fighting began, there would be more corpses.

Whatever Zhuge Feng had prepared, Ma Sanbao was certain he would be the one to leave this valley alive at sunrise.

At least, he was until a familiar face appeared behind Zhuge Feng.

"Then you remember me, too. Don't you, Eunuch Ma?"

A chill passed through Ma Sanbao's chest.

How could he forget a face he had seen for decades? Or the resonant voice of the veteran general who had protected the imperial household through every peril?

But Baek Yeon, the Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard and the imperial household's greatest master, was not the only reason Ma Sanbao was shaken.

If the man who served as the imperial household’s sword and shield was here, it meant something else.

Scuff.

A slender figure stepped out from behind the burly veteran.

He looked down at his former servant with the haughty gaze only someone born to noble blood could possess.

No—at the criminal for the ages who had dared to overthrow the imperial household.

“So, was playing traitor worth it?”

At the Son of Heaven’s question, Ma Sanbao groaned.

Chapter 1135

On a hill washed in faint moonlight, his sudden appearance seemed utterly out of place.

Not just to Ma Sanbao. To all of them.

Then the voice that slipped between his pale lips revealed the source of that unease.

“So, was playing traitor worth it?”

His tone was as calm as still water. Yet beneath it lay an authority only a ruler could possess.

It was dignity.

Neither his black robe, blending into the darkness, nor the bamboo hat pulled low over his face could conceal it. He needed no elaborate imperial robe or crown of hanging beads. That dignity was his by birth.

“It’s been a long time, Palace Attendant Ma.”

He spoke down to Ma Sanbao as if looking at him from a dizzying height.

Ma Sanbao stifled a groan at the Son of Heaven’s unexpected appearance, then spoke in a low voice.

“What brings Your Majesty all the way here?”

“I came to take care of some urgent business.”

“Was it important enough to leave the Imperial Capital?”

“How curious. Why don’t you think I prepared thoroughly enough to leave the capital?”

“…!”

“A mere traitor like you needn’t worry about the capital’s safety. Not while the Twelve Palaces of the Zodiac are guarding it.”

The Son of Heaven fixed his deep, sunken gaze on Ma Sanbao, who had fallen silent.

The Twelve Palaces of the Zodiac.

Twelve Supreme Peak masters who protected the imperial household.

Though few remained after the rebellion led by the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, now that they knew the Moving Formation’s location, those masters and the Imperial Guards under their command were more than enough.

Provided, of course, that the enemy attacked the capital.

“Enough bluffing. If you’d planned to strike the capital in the first place, you and I wouldn’t be facing each other here. Isn’t that right?”

The remark hit home. Ma Sanbao quietly licked his dry lips.

The Son of Heaven was right.

The instant he received word from the strange birds, Ma Sanbao had erased the Imperial Capital from his mind.

If he captured the capital and took the Son of Heaven, he could bring the world to its knees. But the Murim of the Central Plains, already left with a massive gap in its defenses, was far more tempting prey.

Why take the hard road when a faster, easier one lay open?

And that assumption had been Ma Sanbao's greatest blunder.

"…Not bad, Zhu Di."

Speaking the Son of Heaven's personal name was high treason in itself.

Ma Sanbao didn't care. He had never once considered himself the Son of Heaven's subject.

Now, with nowhere left to retreat, he wanted an answer to the one question that remained.

"How did you find this place?"

It wasn't the Son of Heaven who answered, but Zhuge Feng.

"Two years."

"What?"

"Ah, don't misunderstand. I wasn't calling you a bitch. I know you're a eunuch, but you certainly look like a man, not a woman."

Zhuge Feng smiled at Ma Sanbao's stiffened face and continued.

"Since we discovered the Moving Formation, we've searched the whole world with a fine-tooth comb. Not quite two years, actually. More like a year and a half."

"…!"

"Oh, yes. When I started this madness, I had exactly the look you have now. My retainers looked even worse. My seniors, the Sword King and Fist King, tried to strangle me. The late Blade King was worse still."

Zhuge Feng rubbed the back of his neck at the memory. Ma Sanbao stared at him in disbelief.

"You searched for them? You even brought in the Ten Kings?"

"I understand how you feel. But what else could we have done?"

With a sigh, Zhuge Feng gently waved the feather fan in his hand.

The first month or two had been hell.

No, worse. At least hell had sulfur fires burning here and there. They had felt as if they were adrift in the middle of an endless ocean.

But it hadn't taken long to find their first result.

"We found one after three months. Hidden deep in Mount Huang in Anhui. Fortunately, the search went much faster after that."

The entire operation had been conducted in the utmost secrecy, using only people who had passed the Hidden Shadow Pavilion's screening.

Membership in the Nine Sects and One Gang or the Five Great Families made no difference. Not even a Sect Leader was exempt.

They answered to one person alone—the Alliance Leader—and faithfully carried out their assigned tasks.

Myriad-Mile Pursuit, Gung Gibang's master and the Beggars' Sect Leader, mobilized every trusted subordinate he could alongside the Lower District Sect to look for places where a Moving Formation might be hidden. The Zhuge Clan's and Hidden Shadow Pavilion's strategists used what they brought back to narrow down the locations.

"No matter how difficult a problem is, you can find the answer once you know how to solve it. Fortunately, finding the Moving Formations worked the same way."

Even for Zhuge Feng, renowned as a prodigy since childhood, it had been an extraordinarily difficult problem. But before long, he worked out the method.

He looked for places few people visited, where qi flowed with unusual strength, where there was room for at least several hundred people, and where no grass grew.

Zhuge Feng selected sites that met those conditions. Once he made his choice, renowned formation masters from the Zhuge Clan and masters with exceptional Qi Sense went to verify them in person.

Supreme Peak masters such as the Azure Sky Sword King, Grand Family Head of the Namgung Family, and the Fist King were among them.

"But no matter how hard we tried, we didn't have enough people. We had a fair number, but searching the vast Nine Provinces[3882] thoroughly while keeping the secret was beyond us."

Not a single mistake could be allowed.

Even the sturdiest wall could begin to collapse with one tiny crack.

In that sense, each Moving Formation was a vast powder keg. A single one going off could set the whole world ablaze.

Then, a few months ago, help came from an unexpected source. Zhuge Feng could finally put the last of his worries to rest.

"I heard a certain person of high standing told the Alliance Leader he'd do anything he could to help. And he was a tremendous help."

At Zhuge Feng's words, the "person of high standing" spoke up.

"Surely you mean the person of highest standing?"

"Ah, forgive my discourtesy, Your Majesty."

"Of course. I'll forgive anything short of high treason."

Ma Sanbao had listened blankly to their exchange. Now he clenched his teeth.

[3882] The Nine Provinces is a traditional Chinese expression for the whole realm, not a count of current administrative provinces.

They got me. Completely.

The enemies in the Central Plains must have waited for this very moment.

Though they could have shut down the Moving Formations they found, they had left them alone and laid a perfect trap instead.

They had let their prey come running, mouths watering, so they could root out their last remaining concern.

“Is that how you dealt with the advance party, too?”

Zhuge Feng gently waved his feather fan.

“Huashan wiped them out as soon as they arrived. The Murim Alliance’s elite, led by the Alliance Leader, took their place.”

“Our information clearly said they’d joined those two bandit bastards.”

“What’s so hard about that? We only needed a similar number of people dressed in black. Word was bound to spread on its own. And it did.”

The ten thousand fanatics who were supposed to join the Green Forest Alliance and the Yangtze River Channel League had died before they ever boarded the league’s ships.

And the Seafaring King, Pa Ryun, had kept the truth thoroughly concealed.

Even subduing his disciple, Ship-Fire Boy Mu Song, had been a way to protect the secret. If Mu Song, who hadn’t been told the plan, acted on his sense of justice, he might expose the fact that the people aboard the rear ships—deliberately kept separate—belonged to the Murim Alliance.

“But then what about the fleet of hundreds of ships the river bandits destroyed…?”

Ma Sanbao trailed off.

The Son of Heaven’s cold smile had given him the answer to his last question.

“I see. So that’s what happened.”

At last, Ma Sanbao understood everything. A hollow laugh escaped him.

He had forgotten for a moment.

Beneath the Son of Heaven’s pale skin, instead of hot, red blood, ran cold iron and blood.

“The palace’s underground prison must be empty by now. Zhu Di, was this your doing?”

The Son of Heaven answered evenly.

“There were so many traitors eating away at the nation that killing them one by one became a chore. They paid a price of their own, so it wasn’t such a bad end for them.”

After the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord’s rebellion came a purge without precedent in the Great Nation’s history.

The Son of Heaven had made an offer to the many prisoners who survived it and still awaited punishment.

They could die with their families, as the law required, or spend the rest of their lives as slaves. Or they could lift even a little of the stain from their family names.

Naturally, most chose the last option.

Freed from the chains and restraints that bound them, they accepted spears and blades with trembling hands and boarded the Great Nation's ships.

All the while, they repeated the Son of Heaven's promise to themselves: because of their choice, someone of their blood would survive to carry on the family name.

"Right. No wonder it went more smoothly than I expected. Rotten as their forces were, it was strange for them to suffer a defeat that crushing."

They hadn't been trained soldiers. Even with hundreds of ships and cannons, their annihilation had been inevitable.

Now that he knew the full extent of the audacious plan—one only the Son of Heaven could have carried out, throwing all those prisoners to the enemy as bait—Ma Sanbao could only laugh.

No. He had to laugh.

A hollow laugh, as though he had given up, was the only way to conceal his last chance.

Not yet. It's not over yet.

His mouth smiled. His eyes did not.

Ma Sanbao quickly swept his sunken gaze around.

On the hills encircling them, countless arrowheads poked quietly through the thick grass. He sensed his subordinates holding their breath, waiting for his command.

They outnumber us at least five to one. Maybe more.

It didn't matter.

If he could capture just one of the enemies who had prepared so thoroughly, he could turn this desperate situation around.

No—he might do more than that. He might seize everything.

That was what the Son of Heaven represented.

Besides, Ma Sanbao and his men had no other choice.

"Now—!"

It all happened in an instant.

Ma Sanbao's mighty shout as he kicked off the ground and shot upward.

The taut bowstrings released their arrows all at once.

And—

Whoosh!

Before the countless arrows that couldn't keep up with his lightning speed had even finished sweeping across the ground, a low whistle of air split through the space above Ma Sanbao's head.

No Shadow…!

Ma Sanbao clenched his teeth at the masked figure who had appeared in his path.

It was him.

Ma Sanbao had never seen his face clearly, but he knew of the Son of Heaven's hidden bodyguard.

The imperial household's greatest assassin, who never even revealed his shadow, was bringing down a dagger wrapped in Force beneath the faint moonlight.

Just as Ma Sanbao had expected.

Shhk!

With a gruesome sound of torn flesh, the blade sank into his forearm.

Ma Sanbao paid it no mind. He thrust out his half-severed left hand and struck No Shadow.

Crack!

No Shadow went flying from the force of the blow. Ma Sanbao drove internal energy into the tips of his feet and released it.

Boom!

He shot down toward the hill like a falling star.

The White Illusion Jiangshi Art, grown stronger still since the bloody battle at the imperial palace, let him forget pain and fear.

"Zhu Di!"

Ma Sanbao roared.

A dozen or so arrows shot from his blind spots and buried themselves across his body. Zhuge Feng and Baek Yeon blocked his path. But his corpse-gray eyes remained fixed on one person alone.

The Son of Heaven, his pale face still bearing the unmistakable signs of illness, just as it had the last time Ma Sanbao saw him.

Shhk! Thud!

Crack!

There was no blood left to spill from a body already little different from a jiangshi. Only chunks of flesh and pieces of bone flew through the air.

But his desperate will remained.

Slash!

Baek Yeon's crescent-bladed polearm bit into Ma Sanbao's left shoulder and sliced diagonally through his upper body.

Crack!

Ma Sanbao's one remaining hand finally closed around what he wanted.

The Son of Heaven's throat.

"Everyone, stop."

Silence fell.

Before the Son of Heaven could draw the sword at his waist, Ma Sanbao had seized and immobilized him with lightning speed. He smiled faintly.

Then he whispered into the ear of the Son of Heaven, whose pressure points he had struck.

“Thank you. You came all the way here yourself, so—”

Thud.

Ma Sanbao blinked.

Why?

How could the Son of Heaven move after his pressure points had been struck?

And why, now that they were face-to-face, was the Son of Heaven’s skin so much like his own?

“…You. Don’t tell me—”

Crack.

The Son of Heaven slowly twisted the hand that had pierced the center of Ma Sanbao’s chest and spoke.

“A few months ago, someone gave me a great gift. Something you know well.”

“…!”

“I thought long and hard about it. It was a blessing, but every bit as much a curse.”

The Son of Heaven’s deliberation had not lasted long, though. His only remaining blood relative, the sole heir who would inherit the realm, had made him a request.

“He told me to live a thousand years. Not as the Son of Heaven, but as family—as someone he wanted to stay with for a long time.”

Moved by Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao’s sincerity—no, Imperial Younger Brother Zhu Bao’s—the Son of Heaven made his choice.

Even if it meant breaking a taboo. Even if he might one day regret it, he would stay with his younger brother for as long as he was allowed.

And that choice had brought them to this moment.

“Now I understand why Jin Taekyung gave me the White Illusion Jiangshi Art. It wasn’t just for me… It was for my brother, who would otherwise be left alone again.”

At that moment—

“By the law of the Great Nation, I punish this traitor.”

Crack!

The Son of Heaven’s voice was the last Ma Sanbao would ever hear. The world before his eyes went black.

Chapter 1136

No one could survive having their heart crushed.

That simple truth held even for someone who had mastered the White Illusion Jiangshi Art, one of the foremost among the world's countless monstrous martial arts and supreme techniques.

Thud.

His body crumpled like a rotten old tree.

The Son of Heaven looked down in silence at the traitor who had finally met his end. Then he pulled his hand from deep inside the man's chest and spoke.

"Commander."

The brief call contained no instruction, but it was enough for Baek Yeon, Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

"At your command."

The reverence he showed the Son of Heaven, who had personally executed the traitor, came as naturally as flowing water.

So did the crescent-bladed polearm that flashed downward.

Shhk!

Flesh and bone parted with a chilling slice.

Baek Yeon beheaded the traitor in a single stroke, then speared the severed head on the tip of his polearm and held it upright.

The traitor's eyes had frozen wide open before they could close. Now they would watch the scene below the hill to the very end.

Shh-shh-shh-shh-shhk!

It wasn't just one person who thought the sky had suddenly darkened.

Thousands of Imperial Guards, every one of them an elite chosen to serve the Son of Heaven, loosed their powerful bows at once. Their arrows, propelled by internal energy, covered the sky and rained down with tremendous speed and force.

They fell upon the enemies struggling desperately in the shallow basin dozens of jang[3883] away.

Thwup-thwup-thwup!

"Gaaah!"

Blood and screams burst forth without pause.

At the start of the battle, many of the fanatics had taken Temporary Strength Pills. They swung Sword Energy as they closed the distance, but even at full speed, they could not reach the hill.

"Open."

[3883] A jang is a traditional length of ten ja, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Fwoosh.

At Zhuge Feng's quiet command, a strange energy drifting through the air rose like heat haze.

Thick fog swallowed the base of the hill in an instant.

The fanatics fell into confusion at the sight of illusions unlike any they had seen before. Then a second command rang out.

"Close."

Clack.

With a cold metallic sound, countless hidden weapons and arrowheads emerged all around them.

The Zhuge Clan's mechanisms and formations, hailed as the finest in the world, had finally revealed themselves.

The result was a horrific death.

Fwoosh, splat!

The fog turned red.

Everything inside was pierced, cut, and smashed to pieces.

From between rocks, beneath the earth, and even the knots in trees, traps sprang from gaps no one would have thought to watch. In moments, the fanatics were driven to their deaths.

A few escaped the fog by using their allies' corpses as shields, but Zhuge Feng had prepared more than that.

Fwoosh!

The Zhuge Clan retainers numbered a mere hundred. The terrifying rate of fire of their Zhuge Repeating Crossbows was more than enough to make up for their small numbers.

Far more than enough.

Crack-crack-crack!

In the blink of an eye, riddled bodies piled up.

The battle that had begun in the dead of night was still going on, but what unfolded before everyone's eyes made even the word battle seem inadequate.

A slaughter this one-sided could hardly be called a battle.

And this hellscape was not unfolding only in Henan.

"Looks like it'll be a long night."

Zhuge Feng answered the Son of Heaven's sudden murmur.

"And soon, the sun will rise."

He was right.

No matter how long the night, day would come. Another day would begin beneath a sun as bright as ever—or brighter.

Tonight, they would eliminate one of the great threats hanging over the Central Plains.

"Though a wise man should never be too certain… I, Zhuge Feng, have no doubt."

He had put everything he had into this plan. For a long time, Zhuge Feng had waited, deceiving not only the enemy but even his allies.

All for today. For this very moment.

"Wherever the traitors go, they won't escape death."

Zhuge Feng spoke with conviction.

They had gathered each province's elite at every Moving Formation they had found. Wherever Dark Heaven's dagger was aimed, its forces would be dead before the night was over.

That was especially true of Shanxi, which Zhuge Feng had judged, alongside Henan, to be the enemy's most likely target.

A giant called the Azure Sky Sword King was leading the forces there.

"It is all thanks to Your Majesty's help."

The Son of Heaven gave a quiet laugh at Zhuge Feng's respectful thanks.

"Is that so? I wonder if the Commander agrees."

Baek Yeon, standing beside him, answered without hesitation.

"Of course not. They did all the hard work. The Imperial House only lent a hand at the end."

Zhuge Feng's mouth fell open at the unexpected answer, but the Son of Heaven's smile deepened.

"Why?"

"Don't ask when you already know, Your Majesty."

"That's a rather irreverent way to speak. You couldn't even stop the traitor just now."

Baek Yeon frowned.

"That was because Your Majesty kept insisting you would deal with him yourself. What, are you going to strip me of my office?"

"That would be inconvenient. I still need you."

"Your Majesty's wisdom grows deeper by the day. As your servant, I could not be happier. Though after all the trouble I go through, it's a shame my salary hasn't budged in years."

"My, my. Is that any way for the Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard to speak? We've recovered the traitors' wealth, so I'll double your salary."

"Perhaps I'm getting old. My armor feels heavy today."

"Triple it."

"I am overwhelmed by Your Majesty's grace, Your Majesty."

Baek Yeon gave a crisp salute, then glanced up at the Son of Heaven.

As if on cue, sovereign and subject burst out laughing. They laughed so heartily that Zhuge Feng, watching the absurd exchange, was left speechless.

But the man born of the noblest bloodline in the world did not mind in the slightest.

The old general who had guarded the Imperial House for decades had every right to speak that way. Besides, everything he had said was true.

“Yes. The Commander is right. I only lent a hand at the end. That isn’t enough to repay even a tenth of the debt I owe.”

The Son of Heaven smiled at the bewildered Zhuge Feng.

In the past, when life had been like walking on thin ice, danger had lurked on every side and he had fought against illness. He had not been able to smile like this.

But now things were different.

No—Jin Taekyung had made them different. He had changed everything and restored the laughter the Son of Heaven had lost long ago.

The Son of Heaven knew that better than anyone. He could not accept Zhuge Feng’s praise, even as a courtesy.

He was alive because of Jin Taekyung. The realm could weather another crisis because of him, too.

“It’s troubling. How am I supposed to repay a debt that keeps growing?”

At the Son of Heaven’s rueful murmur, Zhuge Feng’s gaze grew serious.

“Perhaps… we’re all wondering the same thing.”

The three of them turned to look west.

They could see nothing there, yet each seemed to glimpse one man somewhere thousands of li[3884] away. Like the faint light beginning to spread over their shoulders.

“The sun’s risen.”

“Yes. Day is breaking.”

The Son of Heaven blinked as though he were seeing light for the first time.

Perhaps it was only his imagination.

The basin lay silent amid pools of blood, thousands of corpses piled like mountains. Yet the sunlight reaching across them seemed brighter than ever.

“Bright.”

Darkness scattered. Light blazed.

The Son of Heaven fervently hoped the countless days ahead would be the same.

And that Jin Taekyung’s fate, which would surely once again leave him standing at the edge of life and death, casting everything he had aside, would be bright as well.

[3884] A Chinese li is approximately 500 m (0.311 mi).

“Great Ming.”

With that new name for the nation, one that would light the way ahead for everyone, the Son of Heaven of the Great Ming Empire let out the breath swelling in his chest.

“Baek Yeon.”

“Your orders, Your Majesty?”

“I think I’ll have to quadruple your salary. What lies ahead will be difficult.”

“What do you mean…?”

“I will not return to the palace.”

“…!”

“Tell every person in the realm: I will not sit upon the throne until those vile traitors lurking beyond the desert have been rooted out.”

The old general stared at the Son of Heaven, eyes wide. Then he smiled and knelt on one knee.

“I, Baek Yeon, Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, accept Your Majesty’s imperial decree.”

That day, countless messenger pigeons and mounted couriers crossed the skies and lands of the realm.

Carried by wings and hooves, the imperial decree spread across the realm in just a few days.

No—it shook the realm to its core.

Murim, the common people, even the government.

“By imperial decree!”

Messengers posted proclamations bearing the imperial seal wherever they went. At last, everyone learned of the blade that had been poised at their throats.

And of the one-sided, momentous victory that had begun and ended in a single night.

But victory was not all the Son of Heaven wished to announce.

He would lead an expedition himself.

Back when he was known as the Fourth Prince, the Son of Heaven had already been judged to have the makings of a conqueror. Now, under the new name of Great Ming, he ordered the Imperial Guards to assemble, and his destination was exactly what everyone had expected.

Xinjiang.

The former stronghold of the Demonic Cult, beyond the scorching desert.

The spearheads of the whole realm were aimed at the leader of the traitors, who dared to call himself the Lord of Heaven.

Chapter 1137

Many people call the Central Plains the center of the world, but the phrase has a more precise meaning.

The true center of the world is the Imperial Capital.

Because that is where the Son of Heaven resides—the father of all his people, wielding absolute authority.

And in that same sense, Henan, which had shared in Murim's earliest beginnings and history, could no longer be called the Murim Alliance's headquarters.

What mattered was not the place, but the people.

The symbolism attached to a place was created by people.

Sword Saint Mae Jonghak felt that keenly through the letters arriving each day from every corner of the realm.

He had also discovered that the higher the piles of paperwork grew, the more desperately he longed for a visitor.

"Come in."

Beyond the firmly shut door, the owner of a faint presence hesitated briefly before entering the study.

"Pardon me for a moment…"

The visitor trailed off, looking from Mae Jonghak's sunken eyes to the piles of papers filling the room.

"Hmm. You seem busy."

"It's all right. Have a cup of tea before you go."

"No, I'll come back later—urk!"

Whoosh! Grab!

Mae Jonghak moved in a flash.

Using Huashan's secret technique, Dark Fragrance Drift, he crossed the room in an instant and seized the visitor's sleeve.

He spoke with desperate longing in his eyes and voice.

"Have a cup of tea before you go."

"…"

"Please."

He looked ready to grab the man by the collar if the sleeve wasn't enough.

The visitor sensed a disturbing madness in Mae Jonghak's glittering eyes and swallowed nervously.

"All right, all right. Let go and we'll talk."

"If you're lying, I'll resent you even after I'm dead."

"Why go that far…? Besides, what good would resenting me do? You'd be dead."

"That's true. What kind of tea would you like?"

"Longjing[3885], please."

"It's the only kind I have. Just drink that."

Worried the man might change his mind, Mae Jonghak hurriedly let go of his sleeve. The visitor watched Mae Jonghak prepare the teapot and thought to himself:

Then why did you even ask…?

Of course, he already knew. With some people, the more you tried to understand them, the more you only hurt yourself.

It was a lesson he'd learned over the past few months with a certain madman.

"…You're the spitting image of him. I could've sworn I heard he wasn't your biological grandson."

"Hm? What did you say?"

"Nothing. Just talking to myself."

"I understand. The older you get, the more you talk to yourself."

It was hard to believe this conversation was between a fresh-faced young man and a boy who looked several years younger. But appearances weren't everything.

The Slaughter Saint knew that better than almost anyone.

"So the Alliance Leader does it too. I suppose we're all much the same."

"Hm? Much the same?"

"Didn't you just say people talk to themselves more as they get older?"

"Oh, that. I meant people in general. I've talked to myself since I was a child, so I can't say I relate."

"…Is the tea going to take much longer?"

Just as the Slaughter Saint felt his energy rapidly draining away, Mae Jonghak finally set a steaming cup on the table.

"Drink. It isn't my tea, but the aroma should be quite good."

Mae Jonghak was right.

Perhaps because it was the tea enjoyed by a man who had been a City Lord, both its aroma and quality were excellent.

The man, who had committed countless acts of corruption, had vanished like dew on the execution grounds. But his tea leaves—and his lavish study—remained.

The study now served as the Murim Alliance's temporary Alliance Leader's Hall.

"I hope I'm not taking up too much of your precious time."

The Slaughter Saint glanced at the towering piles of papers, which looked ready to collapse at any moment. Mae Jonghak tilted his hot teacup and answered.

[3885] Longjing, or Dragon Well, is a Chinese green tea.

“Time is always precious. If we’d lost the battle seven days ago, I wouldn’t be enjoying this luxury.”

Watching the wisps of steam rise like heat haze, the Slaughter Saint murmured as if to himself.

“Seven days. Has it really been that long?”

Mae Jonghak wasn’t the only one who’d been busy.

The past week had left everyone, including the Slaughter Saint, scarcely a moment to rest. They’d had to begin dealing with the aftermath before they could recover from the battle’s physical and mental toll.

And Mae Jonghak already knew that the Slaughter Saint, busy treating the wounded, wouldn’t have come without a reason.

“You’ve had time to enjoy the aroma. Well?”

Naturally, he wasn’t asking whether the man liked the tea.

The Slaughter Saint watched Mae Jonghak smile. Then he stirred the internal energy sleeping deep within him.

Wooooom.

A wave spread outward, making the air tremble.

Only when an invisible barrier had enclosed them both, shutting out sound, did the Slaughter Saint speak.

“I came to see you about the matter I mentioned before.”

Mae Jonghak’s eyes turned grave.

“Since you came yourself… I take it the news isn’t good.”

The Slaughter Saint’s voice was heavy.

“That’s right.”

“You couldn’t find it after all?”

“Based on what we know so far.”

That left a faint possibility, but Mae Jonghak looked doubtful. So did the Slaughter Saint, who had said it.

As soon as the battle ended, the surviving martial artists, government troops, and countless civilians had thrown themselves into dealing with the aftermath.

More than a hundred thousand people on both sides had been killed or wounded. If all those searching had failed to find it in seven days, the chances of finding it later were slim.

“Further searches would be pointless.”

“You mean…”

“I’m not saying we should stop entirely. Keep looking, but cut down on the manpower spent on it.”

The Slaughter Saint nodded quietly.

Mae Jonghak was right. He, too, thought it better to focus on what lay ahead than to keep pouring effort into a search with so little hope of success.

And yet, the unease weighing on him remained.

“I’m worried too. But…”

Seeing the shadow on the Slaughter Saint’s face, Mae Jonghak continued.

“The tide has already turned. The blades of the Central Plains—no, of the whole realm—have finally come together.”

Mae Jonghak reached out. Dozens of missives rose from between the piles of papers and flew toward them.

From the Nine Provinces and Eight Wastes to the Four Seas and Five Lakes, they had crossed vast stretches of sky and land to reach Xining. Each bore a different official seal, but all ended with the same four words.

“Exterminate the Demons and Set Heaven Right.”

Exterminate the demons and set heaven right.

It was the banner the old Murim Alliance had raised, and now those four words united the realm.

Even the empire, newly reborn under the name Great Ming, had embraced them.

“They’re coming. For the same single purpose as us.”

Seven days had passed since their decisive victory after a fierce battle.

But those who had spent the time since living each day as if it were a mere moment were not only the people in Xining.

On the day rivers of blood had flowed through Xining, enemy corpses had piled up like mountains in Henan Province and Shanxi Province.

Ma Sanbao’s head had been taken back to the Imperial Capital. The rest of his body had been torn apart and scattered across the realm.

The Azure Sky Sword King, who had already completed his preparations, had wiped out the enemy without suffering a single casualty. The dozen or so remaining Moving Formations had been shut down before daybreak.

As long as the Demon-Sealing Formation cast by the Zhuge Clan’s formation masters remained in place, the danger posed by the Moving Formations had effectively been eliminated.

It was the Demon-Sealing Formation that had allowed them to seal the first rift in Hubei, after all.

That newfound safety had lit a fuse that had long lain cold.

Under the banners of the Imperial House and the Murim Alliance, the westward advance had begun in earnest.

At the Son of Heaven’s decree that he would personally lead an army against the rebels, a hundred thousand elite Imperial Guards assembled. Martial artists rallied too, led by the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families.

Nor did it end there.

Even common people with no power of their own organized volunteer militias to stand against injustice. At last, the will of the realm had come together.

"Xinjiang. We can end everything in that accursed land beyond the desert."

Mae Jonghak spoke in a low but powerful voice.

"The only way to stop this wheel from turning is to defeat the Lord of Heaven."

The beginning and end of it all. Its very center.

That was the Lord of Heaven.

An absolute being who had never once shown his true form, yet whose immense shadow covered the realm.

But now that the realm had joined forces and pointed its blades at the Lord of Heaven, heaven's will was already on their side.

Or so they believed.

...But why?

For some reason, the words "Son of Heaven" filled him with an inexplicable sense of foreboding.

He raised his teacup, though the tea had gone cold.

Perhaps he hoped to hide the unease lodged deep in his heart.

As he drank, he turned over the other reason he had come to see Mae Jonghak.

I still can't make sense of what the Bow Saint said and did back then.

More precisely, he doubted anyone could have.

That was why the Slaughter Saint found it even harder to shake from his mind.

She had stood by, almost indifferent, even when Jin Taekyung was in mortal danger. Her words and actions had been impossible to read, as though she had some purpose no one else knew about.

She's hiding something. I'm certain of it.

But seven days had passed, and the Slaughter Saint still had no answer.

The Bow Saint had seldom shown herself since the battle, and Jin Taekyung had yet to regain consciousness.

What should I do?

Still deep in thought, the Slaughter Saint drained his tea.

He was about to speak to Mae Jonghak, who was watching him in silence as though he had sensed something.

Or tried to.

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

Heavy, hurried footsteps sounded. A huge man burst into the study.

Crash!

He smashed the door to pieces and shouted.

“Alliance Leader! Taishan saw it! With my own two eyes!”

The Slaughter Saint recognized the familiar face, sighed, and closed his mouth. Mae Jonghak felt his brief respite come to an end and answered mournfully.

“I see. What did you see?”

At Taishan’s next words, both men’s eyes widened.

“The Pavilion Master! The Pavilion Master woke up!”

“…!”

“…!”

Chapter 1138

Jin Taekyung blinked quietly.

Where was he?

Everything was dark and hazy.

His small body sped forward on outstretched wings, but his senses were so dull they seemed to belong to someone else. He could barely feel the wind brushing over him.

That's right.

He was a bird now.

Soon he would emerge from these damp, hazy clouds swirling all around him.

No—right now.

Whoosh.

With one powerful flap of his wings, the clouds that had filled the air around Jin Taekyung like bars vanished.

A night sky so dark it looked cold opened before him.

Brilliant, multicolored flames painted the vast sky.

Boom-boom-boom!

Explosions erupted without warning, all at once, swallowing the night sky.

From a distance, the sight might have seemed beautiful.

But with a bird's keen eyesight, Jin Taekyung could see what lay beyond the dazzling lights.

Countless fighter jets tore through the sky, bursting through the compressed air. Bullets and beams of light streamed without pause from the ground and the sky.

And—

Shriek!

Gigantic monsters flew straight through that dense web of fire.

—Kieeeek!

With chilling roars, more monsters than the eye could count crossed the dark sky.

Killing intent tangled with killing intent. Every thunderous blast was followed by someone's death.

Kwa-gwa-gwang!

A blinding flash swallowed the sky.

Jin Taekyung was only a bird. All he could do was stare, dumbfounded, at the humans and monsters falling helplessly like scattered embers amid the ceaseless clash of steel and magic.

Then a sense that the whole world had gone dark seized him, and he looked up.

Hssssss.

At first, he thought it was a storm cloud.

A huge, dark cloud, big enough to blot out the moonlight.

But it wasn't.

It was a wing.

A wing so enormous that anyone who saw it would forget to breathe. It belonged to a powerful being—and somehow, it was beautiful.

The moment he faced that overwhelming presence, Jin Taekyung felt his senses sharpen with astonishing clarity.

Perhaps that was why he thought he met the gaze of two eyes like black obsidian, looking down imperiously on everyone below, blotting out even the moonlight.

Fwoooosh!

Space warped in an instant.

A terrifying pressure, too much for a mere bird to withstand, crushed the air.

No. It wasn't only Jin Taekyung.

Crack-crack-crack!

Countless fighter jets crumpled under the pressure.

As burning steel fell like a meteor shower, Jin Taekyung felt his consciousness fading.

At the same time, a sound he couldn't make sense of grew ever clearer in his ears.

Tick.

A streak of pure white light raced toward him from far away and swallowed him.

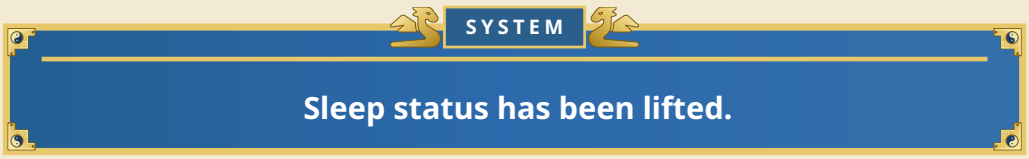
The human brain is much like iron.

Just as iron needs enough heat before it can be reshaped, a brain that has only just awakened needs a little time to start working.

But the moment I regained consciousness, I could sense everything around me more clearly than ever.

Even what had woken me from that deep sleep.

Ding.



A clear chime rang softly in my ears.

I lifted eyelids that felt lighter than down. A face filled my vision, looking down at me and half-obscuring an unfamiliar ceiling.

"A-Are you awake?"

When I met his eyes, trembling with emotion, a thought came to me.

How long I'd waited for this moment.

As I realized it, a gentle smile spread across my lips. The nightmare that had clung to me like glue just moments ago was already gone without a trace.

"Yes, Master."

"…!"

Jeok Cheongang paused at the effortless way I'd addressed him without a moment's hesitation. Then he answered in a choked voice.

Tried to.

Until a crowd of uninvited guests came rushing in with a clamor of heavy footsteps.

"Yes, my—"

Crash!

A deafening crash swallowed the rest of his words.

A huge man smashed the door to pieces and charged into the sickroom. Familiar faces streamed in behind him.

"He's awake!"

"He woke up!"

"He really woke up!"

"Wow! I've never seen anyone wake up after seven days!"

It took about one second.

That was how long the people staring at me with wide eyes, as if they couldn't believe what they were seeing, took to start screaming like mad and pounce on me.

"Aaah! Benefactor!"

"Pavilion Master!"

"Caaaaaptain!"

"…"

Yeah. It was nice.

But maybe I should've slept a little longer.

It took quite a while for everyone who'd rushed over at the news of my awakening—especially the members of the Fire Dragon Pavilion—to calm down.

"I really wasn't worried at all. I knew you'd wake up, Young Master Jin… I mean, Pavilion Master."

Ju Hwaran sniffled as she spoke. Beside her, Song Ilseom added calmly, "She cried her eyes out. Kept saying you might never wake up."

“I-I did not!”

“Yesterday. The day before. All seven days.”

Song Ilseom kept pelting the bright-red Ju Hwaran with facts. Then, in an instant, he changed his tune.

“Ah. I must have mistaken you for someone else.”

“You heard him, right? I didn’t cry at all.”

“…”

Ju Hwaran spoke with such confidence that I could only pretend I hadn’t seen the weighty money pouch she’d slipped Song Ilseom a moment ago.

Even without that cute little farce, voices were coming at me from every direction. I could barely catch my breath.

“I’m glad you’ve regained consciousness, Pavilion Master.”

Sama Pyo, whose ability to express emotion was about on par with an artificial intelligence’s, fell silent after that awkward remark. Taishan, whose emotions were closer to a wild animal’s, burst into tears.

“Taishan glad Pavilion Master awake. Worried so much, only ate three meals a day for seven days.”

“That’s incredible.”

I wasn’t being sarcastic. I was genuinely impressed.

It sounded insane at first, but considering Taishan’s usual appetite, that was practically a hunger strike.

The old man perched on Taishan’s shoulder as if it were his assigned seat sighed.

“Three meals a day is normal, you crazy bastard…”

“I cried so much, now hungry. Pavilion Master, I go eat.”

“Put me down before you go, you damned nuisance.”

Of course, Taishan paid him no mind.

He vanished like the wind. The old man clung tightly to the back of Taishan’s neck for dear life, his screams fading into the distance.

Someone else stepped into the space they left behind. He’d been waiting his turn, wrapped head to toe in bandages like a mummy.

“Captain…”

His voice was thick with tears.

I looked at him, moved.

“You…”

“Yes. It’s me. Your right arm. Your heart. Hyuk Mujin.”

“Right. You’re still alive, my little toe.”

“…”

“You look half-dead, but somehow you’re still breathing.”

Above the bandages, Hyuk Mujin's eyes, which had looked ready to overflow with tears, went cold.

"What? What's with that look?"

"…You know you're really too much, right?"

I frowned at the hurt in his voice.

"Too much? You're the one who was about to throw our promise away like it was worthless."

"What?"

"You forgot? The promise we made before the battle."

"Oh."

I'd told him plainly: if he was going to die, he had to do it in front of me. Then I'd make sure to avenge him.

But Hyuk Mujin apparently hadn't intended to keep that promise.

He'd fought recklessly, foolishly, even putting his own life on the line.

So there was only one thing I could say to him now.

"You've been through a lot."

Hyuk Mujin had been about to reply, but his eyes widened.

Or perhaps it was the look on my face and the quiet tone of my voice that stopped him.

I forced a smile and went on.

"And… thank you. For staying alive."

"…!"

"…!"

The air in the room quivered.

Everyone who'd been chattering a moment earlier fell silent as if on cue and looked at me.

They knew. Those few words weren't only for Hyuk Mujin. They were for all of them.

And this clumsy expression of emotion was the best I could manage right now.

"Well, that's all. I just felt like I had to say it."

Something stirred in my chest.

I smiled faintly, trying to hide my joy, my sorrow, and a swelling feeling I couldn't name.

The others seemed to feel much the same. Some smiled back. Some cried quietly. Others watched them without a word.

The ones who'd been through all this long ago were the ones who watched. They hadn't grown used to it. They'd grown numb.

"Come to think of it, I have something urgent to take care of."

Jeok Cheongang rose, muttering as if to himself.

“Might take about half a shichen[3886].”

With that, he left the sickroom. Two others who had appeared at the door at some point, watching us quietly, went with him.

Sometimes, a thought occurs to me.

Sword Saint Mae Jonghak, about to turn away with the Slaughter Saint, moved his lips.

Perhaps being able to laugh when you can, and cry when you want to, is a great blessing.

The old men had walked that road before. Now the young were walking it.

That was why they were giving us some space, if only for a little while.

So we could feel everything this moment held, knowing it might be our last. So we could accept both the joy of surviving and meeting again and the grief for those who had left us, then continue on our way.

“Get some rest. I’ll be back.”

I nodded quietly.

By the time they returned and our conversation was over, the whole world had sunk into darkness.

Just like the nightmare I’d had before waking.

[3886] A shichen is a traditional time unit of roughly two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

Chapter 1139

As I listened to the account unfold, I found myself holding my breath again and again.

The Central Plains Murim—or rather, the whole realm—was coming together.

I'd known it was all but inevitable. Still, hearing it from the current Alliance Leader himself gave the news a different weight.

The sheer numbers had something to do with that, too.

A hundred thousand.

No fewer than a hundred thousand elite Imperial Guards were racing north along the Yellow River, swift as shafts of light.

Under the command of none other than the Son of Heaven.

Looks like that old man managed to stay alive after all.

I suddenly remembered the last time I'd seen the Son of Heaven.

His aged face belied his youth, and his complexion had been as pale as a sheet. The ruler of a vast continent had been on the brink of death. Before long, he surely would have died.

If not for the worn-out old book I'd given him as a parting gift.

White Illusion Jiangshi Art.

A secret art of the Maoshan Sect—and demonic martial arts that defied all common sense.

The more one practiced it, the more one became a jiangshi. It was no better than a poisoned Holy Grail, but the Son of Heaven seemed to have drunk from it willingly.

A Holy Grail was still a Holy Grail, after all.

Even in an age when the Three Bonds and Five Relationships[3887] were alive and well, they meant nothing if you couldn't breathe.

Especially when he had one blood relative who would have to shoulder all his burdens.

And the Son of Heaven wasn't the only one with someone to protect.

"The Yangtze and the Yellow River are packed from bank to bank. Everyone's coming here."

Mae Jonghak hadn't exaggerated when he said "everyone."

The hundred thousand Imperial Guards led by the Son of Heaven were only part of the enormous force gathering.

From the great Murim sects to reclusive masters hidden deep in the mountains, all the way down to Third Rate swordsmen.

[3887] The Three Bonds and Five Relationships are Confucian principles governing duties between rulers and subjects, parents and children, spouses, elders and juniors, and friends.

Once the blade at their throats—the Moving Formation—had been broken, they all smashed through the fence and poured out.

Countless ships covered the rivers, while galloping hooves shook the earth.

All for one goal.

To cool the heat raging in their hearts like molten lava.

“The sacrifices made by you and so many others are what made them rise up.”

Some who had cowered in fear must have felt ashamed. Others must have blamed themselves for not being there to fight alongside us.

Of course, people weren’t as righteous as they liked to think. Some might have taken up arms simply to make a name for themselves.

But their reasons didn’t matter.

At least now, we could come together as one.

That was why I could understand the position the Alliance Leader before me had been in.

“You don’t have to apologize.”

At my sudden words, Mae Jonghak, whose face had been stern the entire time, bit his lip.

“…My friend.”

“To be honest, yes. There were times when I thought we’d been abandoned.”

To catch a big fish, you needed bait.

This time, Xining had been the bait.

The kind so tempting that Dark Heaven couldn’t help but bite.

But the Murim Alliance hadn’t thought of us as mere bait or pawns to be discarded.

They’d drawn up an elaborate plan in the strictest secrecy. Though they’d been a step too late, they’d sent powerful reinforcements—and even uprooted the last lingering threat the Blood Lord had left behind.

“So please, don’t apologize.”

I met Mae Jonghak’s wavering gaze and added quietly,

“If only for the sake of those who are gone.”

“…!”

“They chose their path. They’d already accepted that they might die, and they fought with courage to match. More bravely than anyone.”

Mae Jonghak had no reason to apologize.

No. If he did, it would be no different from insulting the dead.

Jeong Hogun and a thousand Embroidered Uniform Guards. Countless martial artists and government troops. Even the common folk who’d taken up rusty axes and sickles to hold back the invaders.

Every one of them had been a hero.

So had those who, like Mae Jonghak before me, had struggled behind the scenes for this great victory.

That left us with only one goal.

"We have to repay this blood debt many times over. All of us, together."

Everyone here knew who we had to collect that debt from. So did the whole realm.

The Lord of Heaven.

Or—

Asmodeus.

The supreme demon. The king of the Demon Realm.

The name of the being that had finally intruded into reality lingered on my tongue like a bitter poison.

And with it, the name of someone else bound to him.

Cheon Taemin.

No.

The Martial God.

Time flew by.

One day, thick snow fell as though it were the middle of winter. On another, wind and rain raged as if they meant to swallow the whole world.

Then, three days after I regained consciousness, a sight I'd never seen before appeared beyond the heat haze rising in the blazing sun.

Boom. Boom. Boom.

The war drums of Xining City, silent for ten days, sounded their deep call. But not a trace of fear showed on the faces of the people crowding the walls.

Everyone in Xining simply watched, their hearts swelling.

East, west, south, and north.

Across winding hills and vast plains, and along the Yellow River, a wave of countless banners surged toward us.

"The enemy! The enemy's here!"

"…"

Take that back about everyone.

Wherever you go, there's always some lunatic who can't read the room.

"Do you not hear me? Prepare for battle at once!"

Jeok Cheongang watched the Great Sir hopping up and down, then turned to me.

"Er, would you happen to…"

I felt his gaze on my cheek and cut him off before he could finish.

"No."

“I haven’t said anything yet.”

“You were about to ask if you could kill him.”

“Hmm.”

“You can’t break his arms and legs, either.”

“Ah.”

“Just leave him alone. Best to leave a madman be. Besides, he’s a useful madman.”

“What good is he in battle if every time he opens his mouth, I feel like I’m about to suffer qi deviation?”

Honestly, I couldn’t disagree.

They said he’d darted all over the battlefield like Hong Gil-dong,[3888] saving a great many of our people. But after the battle, he’d become plain old Gil-dung.

A pile of shit planted in the middle of the road, with everyone edging around it.

The one saving grace was that even ordinary people now knew the Great Sir wasn’t just any lunatic.

“That old man’s at it again…”

“Whew, I thought something serious had happened. When he shouted ‘enemy,‘ I nearly had a heart attack.”

He was so well-known that even the people who’d jumped at the shout calmed down as soon as they saw him.

“But what happened to that Great Hero? He looked perfectly fine when he fought those Dark Heaven bastards.”

“Who knows? Maybe he fell off a cliff looking for a fortuitous encounter.”

“…”

I was listening to these commoners, who knew a suspicious amount about martial-arts clichés, when—

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

The pounding of hooves shook the earth, and an enormous cheer erupted, swallowing up the scattered murmurs in an instant.

“Waaah!”

At that moment, a wind blew in from far away. The banners caught it and billowed above the feverish crowd.

The fifteen pillars that upheld the realm’s Murim.

The Nine Sects and One Gang. The Five Great Families.

The overlords of the various provinces, the large and small Murim sects that followed them—and a name unfamiliar to some: Nanman Beast Palace.

Among all those names fluttering fiercely toward the sky, two banners rose higher and larger than the rest.

[3888] Hong Gil-dong is the outlaw hero of a classic Korean novel, associated with appearing here and there in a flash.

“The Murim Alliance…!”

The martial artists of Xining were moved at the sight of the banner that represented them. The government troops and commoners, meanwhile, stared wide-eyed at the presence of a man they’d thought they would never meet in their lives.

“T-The Emperor!”

“So the rumors that he’d lead a personal expedition were true!”

The brilliant golden dragon embroidered on his banner shone through even the thick heat haze. At the sight of it, people dropped to their knees and bowed low.

To the ruler of the Great Nation.

No, to the ruler of Great Ming—their father.

“What an uproar. A real uproar.”

Jeok Cheongang was right. The whole place had gone wild.

Some slammed their heads against the wall until they bled. Others wailed as though they were about to faint.

They weren’t even close enough to see his face yet, and this was how they were acting.

At this rate, you could call him North Korea’s three ruling Kims[3889]—or an unlucky Lord of Heaven—and no one could argue.

“Come to think of it, he’s only one character away from the Lord of Heaven.”

Jeok Cheongang heard me mutter and spoke in a slightly uneasy voice.

“Keep your voice down. There are plenty of ears around.”

“That’s why I kept it down.”

“Lower.”

“Come on, this is fine. Since when have we worried about stuff like this?”

“No, you’re not wrong, but still, look around…”

“What did I do? You’ve always taught me, Master, to speak my mind—even if I’m dragged before Yama.”

“…!”

“What?”

Jeok Cheongang silently twitched his nose for a moment, then turned away.

Watching the procession rapidly draw nearer, he muttered as though to himself.

To himself, mind you.

“That sounds nice.”

“Huh?”

“But the more I hear it, the more I think ‘Master’ sounds a bit too stiff…”

“Are you talking to me?”

[3889] Kim Il-sung, Kim Jong-il, and Kim Jong-un are three successive rulers of North Korea.

“Ah, what a nice day. A beautiful day, and my one and only disciple is so damn clueless…”

“Yeah. Really beautiful out.”

“…”

“What?”

Maybe I should stop teasing him before he got annoyed.

His nostrils were flaring now too, and I was just about to let out the snicker I’d been holding back when—

Grrrrumble.

With a heavy rumble, the bridge lowered across the moat.

At the same time, a dazzlingly white horse stepped forward.

Beneath the people’s cheers, joy and tears mingled together.

“Long live the Emperor! Long live Great Ming!”

The Son of Heaven.

At last, he had arrived.

The ruler of the continent, who could drive fans and haters—or rather, the common people—mad just by showing up.

But unlike some miserable bastard lurking beyond the desert, this ersatz Lord of Heaven was on our side. That was what mattered.

His baby brother, whom he doted on, was the president of my fan club, and the entire Imperial House owed me a very big debt.

“It’s been a long time, Marquis of Shangshan Jin Taekyung.”

He crossed the city gates and entered Xining at last. I stood there with my back impudently straight, and he smiled gently at me.

“No, I suppose I should call you Prince Shangshan now.”

“…?”

Mom. I’m a king now.

Chapter 1140

Long before the countless government and Murim forces appeared beneath hundreds of flying banners, the people of Xining City were already bursting with excitement at the news of reinforcements.

“I never thought I’d live to see a sight like this.”

The imperial court and the Murim Alliance, united.

That alone was unprecedented in the history of the continent. And the people gathered under those banners were just as extraordinary.

“T-The Nine Sects and One Gang, and the Five Great Families, too? All of them?”

“That’s right. They’ve even rooted out every last one of those Dark Heaven bastards’ dark arts planted in the Central Plains. What is there to fear now?”

“I-I heard the Silver Flash Spear and the Taebaek Divine Elder have joined them, too.”

“Hold on. The Silver Flash Spear, sure—but wasn’t that old Taebaek Divine Elder a dark-path figure?”

“…I’m a dark-path figure, too.”

“Oh, right. I forgot. You’re with the Yangtze River Channel League.”

“Just laugh it off. Don’t ruin the mood.”

Leaders of renowned sects. Great Heroes who had roamed the realm alone. Even reclusive masters who had supposedly died long ago.

The orthodox martial artists weren’t the only ones unable to hide their excitement. Even dark-path martial artists, who reached for their weapons at the slightest provocation, felt it this time.

They had already fought alongside the legends known as the Three Saints, but wasn’t this true unity?

Even during the terrible Great Faction War, the forces of the entire Murim had never come together in one place like this.

The government troops and commoners were trembling with excitement, too, each for their own reasons.

The Son of Heaven.

A descendant of the dragon.

The father and ruler of all people, sent by Heaven to this land.

They could scarcely believe their ears when they heard that the man said to be impossible to see even if you lived in the Imperial Capital was personally leading a great army here. Before long, they learned it was true.

The Son of Heaven’s lofty authority and grace, known to them only through rumor.

And—

“It’s been a long time, Marquis of Shangshan Jin Taekyung.”

Even his connection to one particular person.

But the Son of Heaven's next words were something no one there could have predicted.

"No, I suppose I should call you Prince Shangshan now."

"…!"

"…!"

The sudden sense that the air around them had crackled wasn't one person's imagination.

Martial artists, government troops, commoners.

For a moment, they all wondered if they'd heard the same thing wrong. Then they looked at one another's wide eyes and understood.

They hadn't misheard. Not at all.

The Son of Heaven had just declared it.

No—proclaimed it.

He would make that young man, with not a single drop of noble dragon's blood in his veins, a king.

A king of another surname, a title lost to history for hundreds of years, had just been created anew right here.

And amid the unprecedented scene that had frozen everyone in place, Jin Taekyung—who, for some reason, was staring into empty space—suddenly spoke.

"Wow. The EXP for that achievement is insane."

"…?"

"…?"

What the hell was he talking about?

Having thrown everyone into confusion with words no one could understand, Jin Taekyung looked straight at the Son of Heaven and continued.

"Your Majesty."

His expression was utterly serious.

"Since you're handing them out anyway, could you go big and give me a few more royal titles?"

The Son of Heaven burst out laughing. The people, stunned for a moment, all had the same thought.

He really was a complete madman.

But the madman who'd just become a king wasn't done yet.

Afterward, people had to keep asking themselves, and reminding themselves, what they knew about the man named Jin Taekyung.

What had they heard in all those rumors about him?

Before long, they were able to confirm it with their own eyes and ears.

“Is Prince Shangshan not enough? It was also the title held by my younger brother, so it carries considerable significance.”

“Oh, it’s plenty. It’s great. I was just wondering if I could get one more. Hehe.”

Jin Taekyung was wheedling another royal title out of the Emperor as if he were asking for extra broth with his noodles. Everyone held their breath.

Some even thought the Son of Heaven, known for being iron-blooded, would punish Jin Taekyung on the spot.

For a very brief moment.

“If you tell me why, I see no reason to refuse.”

Huh?

“Um. It’s a little awkward to explain in detail. I’m just giving it a try.”

Why?

“Hm. You must have your reasons. Then you may also take the title of Prince of Ye in Hebei.”

What?

“Thank you—hm.”

“What is it?”

“Nothing. I’ll pass on Prince of Ye. Ah, I guess you can’t have duplicates.”

“I don’t know what you mean, but do as you please.”

…Seriously, what was going on?

Everyone who’d watched the whole exchange was half out of their minds.

Even after the Son of Heaven had traded a few more words and laughs with Jin Taekyung and headed toward the Inner City with the Imperial Guards, the shock didn’t fade.

Instead, a different kind of shock awaited them.

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

A flood of men and horses poured through the wide-open city gates beneath countless banners bearing the emblems of the great sects.

At the sight of the figures emerging with imposing auras and gleaming eyes, the people cried out in amazement. Then a familiar feeling struck them.

Along with the same shock as before.

“Benefactor Jin, do you remember me?”

“Daoist Jin. You’ve been through so much.”

“Long time no see. Are you hurt?”

Monks and Daoists from the Nine Sects and One Gang, along with renowned masters from the Five Great Families.

As if they'd planned it, they gathered around Jin Taekyung. He greeted the towering figures of the realm's Murim as if there were nothing unusual about it.

"How could I forget Master Unnamed? But you've gotten even more muscular since I last saw you… Wow."

Unnamed, the sole Disciple of Dharma King Hong Dao, and the man who had sworn not to take the seat of Abbot of Shaolin until Dark Heaven was rooted out.

"Heavenly Sword True Person, you came, too. Oh, Cheongpung? He was over there, but now he's gone. By the way, did your Disciples come with you?"

The Heavenly Sword True Person, Sect Leader of Huashan in his own right, quite apart from being Sword Saint Mae Jonghak's Disciple.

And—

"You haven't changed a bit, Daoist Jin."

"We owe you a great debt for what happened in Sichuan. If it hadn't been for you…"

"That reminds me of what happened in Hubei."

Other Sect Leaders, Family Heads, and heads of sects.

Even an Elder of a great sect could barely get a foot in. Anyone below that rank couldn't get close enough to greet Jin Taekyung.

There simply wasn't room.

Jin Taekyung stood surrounded by the leaders of the great sects—including Emei, Wudang, and the Beggars' Sect. It was enough to make people doubt their eyes.

The arrival of the Sichuan Tang Clan's Family Head, whose foul temper everyone knew about, and the Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace, whom they'd only heard of in rumors, poured oil on the fire.

"I've come to pay my respects to the Tang Family's Benefactor. Please forgive me for being unavoidably late."

Tang Sadok, the Myriad-Poison Asura, was said to prefer a drop of poison to a word of conversation. Yet he clasped his hands in a deeply respectful salute.

"Damn it. I thought they'd come to Sichuan, too… But I was held up by those bastards. Even feeding them to that tiger wouldn't have satisfied me. I have no excuse."

Yayul Cheok, the burly man wrapped in tiger hide, even lowered his head and watched Jin Taekyung's face for a reaction.

As if he were guilty of something.

"…Was he really that important?"

At the words someone muttered, those who had watched the whole scene felt a shiver they couldn't explain.

Who were these people?

Titans who represented not just their own provinces, but the Murim of the entire realm.

Even if Jin Taekyung was the Fire King's Disciple, the gulf between him and those people should have been vast—in age and in the forces they commanded.

But today, they finally understood.

Or rather, they saw and felt what they'd only vaguely suspected until now.

Just how great Jin Taekyung's standing was in this world.

And at the same time, they suddenly sensed something else.

The age of the stars and kings was drawing to a close.

That young Divine Dragon, coiled among countless towering trees, was the hero who would swallow the dark clouds of Dark Heaven and soar into the boundless sky.

At last—

A new age was beckoning to the realm.

Getting away from the gathering hadn't been easy.

Everyone who'd met me before wanted to greet me, and so did people who'd never met me.

"Great Hero Jin!"

"Oh, yes. Nice to meet you."

"Please accept a drink from me! I'll count it the honor of a lifetime!"

"I think I've heard that about fifty times already… But sure, hand it over."

With joy overflowing everywhere, maybe it was only natural that the cups overflowed, too.

I'd clasped hands in salute hundreds of times and accepted dozens of drinks.

Xining City had long since become one enormous banquet hall. It took a long time before I could finally make my way out.

"Mother, our youngest is a kiiiing now. Sniff, sob."

"Mother Goddess Heaven! Unbeliever Hell! The great Earth Mother Goddess will punish that fucking Lord of Heaven!"

"Long live the Emperor! I'll cross the desert right now and smash those rebels' heads in…!"

"…"

My head was spinning.

Jin Wikyung had dropped his stern-and-serious act and started crying as soon as he got drunk. The Earth Mother Goddess's fanatics—by now, she was practically Nanman's One God—were shouting their slogans.

Leaving behind the cries of Great Ming's subjects, all fired up with loyalty, I walked off alone.

I kept going until all the noise had faded away.

Past the East Gate, as far as the river beyond the reach of Xining City's lights, which filled every street.

And there, I came face-to-face with someone I hadn't seen in the past three days.

No—someone I'd deliberately avoided seeking out while I sorted through the thoughts tangled in my head.

Shhk.

Wet sand gave softly beneath my slow step.

Standing beside the Bow Saint, I watched the rippling river in silence.

For a long, long time afterward.

Chapter 1141

The Bow Saint's lips, long pressed shut, finally parted as even the music drifting from beyond the distant city walls began to fade.

"It sounds lovely."

I wasn't sure what she meant—the river flowing past us, or the laughter carried on the breeze.

I could only answer with a quiet nod.

"After a hard-fought battle ended in victory, there was always a feast like that. People would laugh and chatter until dawn, passing cups of wine back and forth without pause."

The Bow Saint's soft voice carried memories she'd held onto for a long time.

And in the scene slowly taking shape before my eyes, she must have been just as alone, just as apart from everyone, as she was today.

"They must have wanted to laugh, even if only for a little while. They needed days like that to take even one more step forward."

Enough time had passed for the mountains and rivers to change hands several times over, but the human heart remained the same.

Then and now, those who survived gathered together and raised their cups.

One for the joy of victory. One to honor their fallen comrades.

And one more for the time they had left, which might be their last.

That was why this was both a feast and a memorial rite.

"But I could never join them."

I'd been staring silently at the river. Only then did I part my lips.

"Why not?"

"The weight pressing down on my body and mind was too much to bear. I was so worried about what lay ahead that I couldn't even let myself feel those fleeting emotions."

For the first time, she took her gaze off the river and looked at me, her eyes as composed as ever.

"And whenever that happened, someone would come to me without a word and stay by my side."

"…!"

My fingertips trembled before I could stop them.

I knew.

I knew who the Bow Saint was talking about.

What I hadn't guessed was that she'd also figured out why I'd come to see her.

"So, what do you want to hear?"

Under the Bow Saint's gaze, which seemed to see straight through me, I took a moment to steady my breathing.

Then I answered.

"The Martial God. I want to know everything about him."

No.

I needed to know now. I had to.

Several decades ago, there was a man.

His sect, his face, even his name—none of them were properly known.

But the first time he appeared in history, everyone under Heaven learned of his existence.

"He was like… a divine man who had descended from the heavens."

In the early days of the Great Faction War, the Demonic Cult drenched Kunlun Mountain in blood and fired the first shot of the war. As the Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples bore down like a giant wave, the Central Plains Murim fell into utter chaos.

Until he appeared.

"Three Supreme Peak fiends, and five thousand Demonic Cultists. After suffering a crushing defeat in its first battle, the Kongtong Sect tried to retreat to Shaanxi at once, but the enemy soon caught up. The reinforcements summoned in haste couldn't arrive as quickly as the Demonic Cult."

And on that day—

An unknown man stood in the pursuers' path, and a new sky opened.

"Before even half a day had passed, every enemy had been killed or captured. It was hard to believe one person had done it all."

But the Huashan reinforcements, arriving late, saw everything with their own eyes.

Amid a battlefield that looked as though a storm had swept through it, a man stood alone among countless corpses.

They were all stunned. They shuddered with awe.

One of them must have felt something beyond awe: the man leading the reinforcements, the head of that generation's Plum Blossom Swordsmen, who at barely thirty was revered as the Number One Sword Under Heaven.

"Mae Jonghak immediately spread the news throughout the realm. Before long, everyone knew: there was another supreme being who would stand against the Heavenly Demon and protect the Central Plains."

And so the Martial God was born.

The years of war that followed, lasting more than a decade, became the legend he wrote.

Victory, and more victory.

There were countless defeats and moments of despair, too. But there was also glory and praise, as hot and dazzling as the sun.

He brought the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families, long divided and reunited by turns, together beneath the banner of the Murim Alliance. He sought no personal gain, pursuing only benevolence and righteousness.

A great hero of his age, held in awe by all.

“I watched it all from close by. Again and again, I marveled at his achievements, too great to put into words. There were those who dared to envy, resent, and doubt him, but before long, even they came to admire the Martial God deeply.”

Who under Heaven could look straight at the sun?

And without the sun, how could anyone live in this world?

The Martial God was the heavens—and the sun itself.

No matter how many jiazi[3890] of internal energy one had accumulated, no matter how high one’s martial prowess, no one dared look straight at him.

Afraid of being blinded, they could only bow their heads in the end.

And the Martial God proved himself.

He defeated a supreme being unlike any other in the thousand-year history of the Demonic Path, then disappeared without a trace not long afterward.

Glory. Honor. History.

Even this vast realm of Murim.

The Martial God cast aside everything he had built without a trace of attachment and left.

“And that was when the legend finally became a myth.”

The Bow Saint raised her head and looked up at the sky.

In the pitch-black night, stars glittered, echoing her title. But beside the vast heavens above, they were no more than tiny lights.

“Those who lived in the same era as me know. The Martial God was truly a miraculous being. No one under Heaven could ever accomplish what he did.”

When her long story ended, silence settled. I’d been looking at her without a word when I suddenly parted my lips.

“Is that all?”

The Bow Saint’s gaze slid slowly down from the sky to me.

“What do you mean?”

“I already told you. I want to know everything about him.”

[3890] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

"…Why would you think that isn't everything?"

Her answer came a fraction too late.

For an instant, I thought her eyes had wavered ever so slightly. Was that just my imagination, or had I mistaken the river reflected in them for a flicker in her gaze?

I kept the question to myself and spoke again.

"I expected a somewhat different story. Of the people I know, you spent the longest time with the Martial God. And you were the one who received his letter."

"How could I tell you everything about more than a decade in so short a time? Besides, plenty of people remember what he did. Staying a little closer to him would hardly make my account different."

Despite that fleeting hint of agitation, her voice was as calm as ever.

"The same goes for the letter. In keeping with his final wish, I spent many years searching for the 'chosen one.' That is why we stand here together now."

That was true. I knew it, too.

The Bow Saint had spent decades wandering the realm. Her own life bore out her words.

And I knew that the woman before me had walked a difficult path as a chivalrous warrior—one I wasn't qualified to judge.

But to my mind, her answer was both entirely true and incomplete.

She's definitely hiding something.

This wasn't a passing guess. Instinct and cold reason had brought me to the same conclusion.

We hadn't known each other long, but we'd faced life and death together many times. Even so, the Bow Saint had repeatedly kept herself apart from the rest of us.

And most importantly—

That battle ten days ago.

I remembered what the Slaughter Saint had cautiously told me the night before, when he came to see me alone.

The Bow Saint's inexplicable words and actions that day.

Putting it all together, she'd been closer to a bystander than anything else.

At least when it came to whether I lived or died.

What if our positions had been reversed?

I'd already turned the question over in my mind several times. It didn't even need thinking through.

I would have done everything I could to save the Bow Saint.

Whether I'd moved on instinct or reason.

But she hadn't.

On the day of the great battle surrounding Xining, she'd told the Slaughter Saint, who wanted to save me, that if Jin Taekyung died that day, then it was fate.

Of course, she wasn't wrong.

With countless people dying on every side, how could one life matter more than another?

But why had the Bow Saint, who'd spent decades searching for the "chosen one" on the strength of an old letter supposedly left by the Martial God, been so indifferent to my death?

Could it be…

Could she have…

No. The Martial God…

As I swallowed a breath—

Splash!

A surge of river water rushed up and touched my toes.

Cold seeped into my leather shoes. Snapped out of my thoughts, I instinctively stepped back.

Then I met a pair of eyes watching me intently.

"There's one last thing I'd like to ask."

She gave a small nod, and I continued, my voice trembling now.

"Why… did the Martial God want to find me?"

The Bow Saint answered at once.

"For the sake of the realm. That's all."

Her eyes shone clearly, and her voice was firm.

I could feel it instinctively.

This was the truth.

Not a trace of a lie or ill will.

And for now, that was enough.

For the sake of the realm.

I swallowed those few words as they kept ringing in my ears, then bowed my head to the Bow Saint.

"Thank you."

"Was that enough of an answer?"

"To some extent, yes."

"I'm surprised. I thought you'd want to know more about him."

"I'd be lying if I said I wasn't disappointed, but what you've told me has already helped a great deal."

I wasn't just saying what she wanted to hear. I wasn't lying.

Hearing about the beginning and end of the being called the Martial God had finally made me certain of the identity of another person like him—one who had existed beneath a different sky.

Chapter 1142

Though the hour of the Rabbit[3891] had begun, the lights of Xining City showed no sign of going out.

People wept and laughed, passing cups of wine back and forth without end as they gave themselves over to drink.

No—they could hardly do otherwise.

Wine helped them forget what they felt. They could blame the tears they'd shed without realizing it on the drink, and pretend not to notice someone weeping for a loved one they'd lost.

But one man was different. Seated on the roof of the tallest pavilion along the main road, he stared silently down at the streets below.

"What are you doing up here?"

At the unexpected voice behind him, the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, answered gruffly.

"Just thinking."

"Thinking?"

"What, do I look like a man who never thinks?"

"Of course not. Your lie was just painfully obvious."

The uninvited guest—the Slaughter Saint—plopped down beside him without permission and gave a quiet laugh.

"Why not be a little honest for once? You could admit you haven't touched a drop of wine because you're waiting for your one and only Disciple."

"…"

"You worry too much. Especially for a Master with the finest Disciple under Heaven."

At that, Jeok Cheongang's brows, which had been wriggling like a caterpillar, arched gently.

"Hm. The boy is pretty good."

"Pretty good? Who else has achieved so much at his age, in all of history?"

"Now, now. He was just lucky. He's still a long way from meeting my expectations."

"…Then why are you grinning like an idiot?"

"You must be drunk. You're imagining things."

Jeok Cheongang's mouth twitched as if he were having a spasm. The Slaughter Saint shook his head.

"Anyway, don't worry for nothing. He must have had a lot to discuss with the Bow Saint."

[3891] The hour of the Rabbit is a traditional time period from approximately 5 to 7 a.m.

“Oh, he went to see the Bow Saint? I had no idea.”

It was true.

Of course, Jeok Cheongang had been waiting for more than two shichen,[3892] ever since Jin Taekyung had quietly slipped away. But anyway, he had no idea.

“Would you stop pretending? Not even a toddler would believe your lies.”

Even with his thoughts completely exposed, Jeok Cheongang held on to his usual confidence.

“I’m serious. Besides, I’m not even sure who this Bow Saint is.”

“…Enough. Are you going to pretend to be senile just to tell one lie?”

“A martial artist must be willing to give up flesh to take bone.”

“It’s the other way around in this case.”

“If I give up bone and take flesh, I still come out ahead. My bones are strong.”

“Now you’re talking nonsense like Jin Taekyung. When it comes to things like this, Master and Disciple really are…”

The Slaughter Saint sighed softly and turned away.

He’d come looking because neither Master nor Disciple was anywhere to be seen. Somehow, everyone who bore the name of the Fire Gate Clan, old or young, gave him a headache.

That aside, there was something he wanted to say to Jeok Cheongang.

“This might be presumptuous, but may I say something?”

“Absolutely not.”

Ignoring the gruff reply, the Slaughter Saint continued.

“Don’t blame yourself so much.”

“What?”

“It wasn’t your fault the boy nearly died ten days ago. Nor was it your fault the Dharma King and the Thunderbolt Saber King died.”

“…”

“If you’re guilty of anything, blame yourself for having a Disciple who’s too outstanding. As for the other two, tear the Lord of Heaven to pieces for them.”

The Slaughter Saint was about to leave Jeok Cheongang to his silence when Jeok spoke.

“Do you have any wine?”

“Of course.”

“Leave it here.”

“Ask a little more politely, and I might consider it.”

“Fine. But first, shall we get our ages straight?”

“Come on. That’s harsh, when we’re both getting old.”

[3892] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

With a quiet laugh, the Slaughter Saint tossed the gourd at his waist over his shoulder and left. Alone again, Jeok Cheongang slowly tipped the wine-filled gourd toward the ground, looking out in the direction of the Central Plains thousands of li[3893] away.

"You damned monk. And you, Peng. You'll have to make do with this for now. I'll hold a proper memorial for you in Xinjiang."

Then Jeok Cheongang spotted the East Gate beginning to open beneath the hazy moonlight and smiled.

"With my outstanding Disciple."

Whoosh.

As he kicked off the roof and vanished, something at his neck glinted.

Leaving the Bow Saint behind, I walked alone through Xining City's dark, winding alleys.

The main road still blazed with colorful lights and rang with countless voices, but only one person occupied my thoughts.

The Martial God.

This wasn't the first time I'd heard about him.

I'd heard more than enough, in fact.

The Martial God's deeds, beginning as legend and ending as myth, had long since become sacred and untouchable. Though their memories differed somewhat, every martial artist I'd met had praised him, regardless of standing.

It was all too familiar.

Cheon Taemin.

Known as Slayer. Or Sky, a name taken from his surname.

The path he'd walked as humanity's savior and an unparalleled great hero was astonishingly similar to the Martial God's. So similar that, at some point, it had gone beyond déjà vu and started sending a chill down my spine.

At first, I thought they were just alike.

It hadn't seemed all that strange. History had seen heroes with great missions appear from time to time and bring an age of chaos to an end. Cheon Taemin and the Martial God had seemed like two such heroes to me.

Yeah. That was what I'd thought.

Until, a few months ago, I heard something unbelievable from one person.

"So it was you. You're the 'chosen one.'"

The Bow Saint.

[3893] This uses the Chinese li: one li is approximately 500 m (0.311 mi).

She'd been hiding in the imperial court under a false identity, searching for me for a long time.

No—for the Player hidden behind the title of "chosen one."

"Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung. The moment I saw you rise again after suffering what should have been a mortal wound, I finally knew who the chosen one he spoke of was."

It was as vivid as if it had happened yesterday. The shock of that day had felt like a bolt of lightning striking the top of my head.

That was when I started to suspect who the Martial God really was.

But finding an answer hadn't been easy.

After that day, the Bow Saint kept her lips firmly shut. And I'd had no time to spare while dealing with the fires erupting across the realm.

Besides, though the answer seemed obvious at first glance, one problem stood in my way—a problem I couldn't explain.

If Cheon Taemin and the Martial God are the same person… how did I come to Murim?

The capsule.

That beat-up hunk of junk had appeared before me out of nowhere one day. It was a passage connecting the modern world and Murim, and the thin User Manual that came with it contained all kinds of information.

Manufacturer. Date of manufacture. Precautions.

And finally, Main Features.

> A capsule customized for just one person! Once a user is registered, the capsule is permanently bound to them until their death.

Those two lines at the very top of the Main Features section were enough to send me into an endless maze.

After all, I was one of the few people who'd seen Cheon Taemin alive with my own eyes. Granted, he was practically in a vegetative state, but there was no doubt he was still breathing.

That was why I couldn't explain it.

If Cheon Taemin really had been a Player who owned the capsule before me, and if he was the Martial God, how could I have gained ownership of it?

But now it was time to reach some kind of conclusion to this old question.

I decided to untangle my thoughts by changing how I approached it. The method was simple.

Which is more likely: that they're the same person, or that they're two different people?

I'd asked myself that question over and over, even after regaining consciousness. And I'd arrived at an answer long ago.

First: Cheon Taemin and the Martial God are the same person.

And second—

The System may have recognized Cheon Taemin's unconscious state as a form of death.

The second part was still only a guess. But after all the time I'd spent thinking about it, this was the closest I could get to an answer.

There's one more thing that bothers me: the time ratio…

The difference in time between the Great Cataclysm in the modern world and the Great Faction War in Murim was roughly twofold. But that fell far short of the time ratio the System had given me. That generous ratio was one of the biggest reasons I'd been able to grow so quickly.

There must be something else I haven't figured out yet.

The System was meticulous. It could seem impossibly capricious at times, but it operated by set rules, and there was a reason for everything it did.

So it wouldn't be strange if there were specific conditions or secrets it didn't reveal unless a Player figured them out for himself. The System had always worked that way, and it probably always would.

And among all the thoughts tangled in my head like a skein of thread, only one presence remained.

"…Who in the world is that old man?"

The Helper.

This was the second time I'd met him face-to-face.

When I first set foot in Murim, he'd appeared as part of the System and taught me to circulate my qi. This time, he'd saved my life.

If he hadn't guided me to a higher level of enlightenment, I'd be a cold corpse by now, buried in Xining City's graveyard.

Or in an urn Jeok Cheongang had picked out himself.

Anyway, what mattered was that he wasn't merely part of the System. He was something special.

"Definitely different from what I thought I knew."

My mutter echoed through the dark alley.

"What nonsense are you talking about now?"

The voice sounded gruff at first, but there was an unmistakable warmth beneath it.

When Jeok Cheongang suddenly appeared, I started to smile.

I would have, if I hadn't seen what hung around his neck.

"…!"

My eyes flew wide. Reflected in them was a pocket watch glinting in the hazy moonlight.

Chapter 1143

It took three steps to get my stalled brain back up and running.

First, roughly thirty seconds of silence.

Second, someone's muffled shout, as if it were echoing from deep underwater.

And finally, the grand third step.

Whoosh!

A figure strode closer, and a palm came flying at me with a sharp whistle.

Smack!

Light flashed before my eyes.

As my dulled senses returned, the breath I'd unknowingly been holding burst out of me in a gasp.

"…A-are you back with us?"

I could barely answer. All I managed was a blink.

Jeok Cheongang had come right up to me, staring with a look that mingled confusion and concern.

And peeking out from the gap in his robe, as if it were a third eye, was an object glaring right back at me.

"T-that. That thing."

"What?"

"No, I mean, uh…"

So much for my brain being back up and running.

My tongue had gone stiff. I couldn't get the words out, like Mute Samryong[3894]. It wasn't until I saw my Master raising his hand again—for his Disciple's sake, naturally—that I finally came to my senses.

"W-wait!"

Smack!

Ah, the boundless grace of a master. My eardrum was ringing with it.

"…I said wait."

Jeok Cheongang flinched at the betrayal in my eyes.

"I thought you were on the verge of qi deviation…"

"Wouldn't you have to be more careful if I really were having qi deviation?"

"You're fine if you're only on the verge. Ever heard of fighting fire with fire?"

I wasn't sure that was the right expression for this situation, but the real issue was something else.

The culprit who'd made Jeok Cheongang suspect I was on the verge of qi deviation was still swaying before my eyes.

[3894] An allusion to Na Dohyang's Korean short story Mute Samryong.

As if trying to hypnotize me.

“By the way… where did you get that?”

Even as I asked, I felt uneasy.

If that unexpected object hanging around Jeok Cheongang’s neck really was the one I knew, how was I supposed to make sense of it?

His answer only made my heart sink further.

“Where did I get it? How would this old man know? You’re the owner. You’d know best.”

“…!”

“What? Is something wrong?”

“N-no.”

I managed to answer, then immediately muttered to myself.

There was one surefire way to find out.

Open Inventory. Summon.

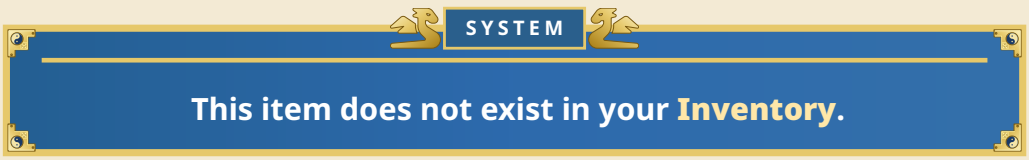
It was simple.

I just had to picture it in my mind and put my will behind the command.

But the process I’d gone through hundreds, even thousands, of times suddenly felt unfamiliar.

So did the small System window that appeared in the air.

Beep.



Shit.

I took a small breath and forced myself to speak calmly.

“I was mistaken. It is mine.”

“That’s what I thought. I’ve seen it a few times before, too. Still, it must have some story behind it. Or it’s important to you.”

“Excuse me?”

“I found it ten days ago, right where you’d collapsed unconscious. It was lying in a pool of blood, but luckily I recognized it. You’d carried it through such a fierce battle, so I figured I ought to keep it safe.”

“…I see.”

“Come to think of it, I’ve forgotten what it’s called. Chairman? Was it a makeup watch?”

I licked my lips, which had gone dry.

“A pocket watch.”

"Ah, right. One of those foreign devices used by the barbarians across the sea. It has such an odd shape that it stuck in my mind."

The part about barbarians across the sea was something I'd made up because too many people had been listening when I explained it.

As far as I could tell, this world wasn't even made up of five oceans and six continents. How would I know if there were blond, tanned punks or tyrannosaurs living across the sea?

But there was at least one thing I knew for certain.

That pocket watch had been buried deep in my Inventory for more than two months.

Had I taken it out?

A simple mistake in my memory?

Absolutely not.

I'd half forgotten the thing even existed. How could I have taken it out?

This makes no sense.

Right. This really made no sense.

The Inventory was an infinite storehouse that opened and closed only at my will.

But that thing—more precisely, the item called [Pocket Watch of Unknown Make]—had somehow broken the System's rules.

Without me even realizing it.

"I'd been meaning to give it back these past few days, but I kept forgetting, so I started wearing it around my neck. Good timing."

I took the pocket watch Jeok Cheongang handed me as if I were under a spell.

And—

"…!"

It suddenly came back to me.

"All right. It's time to go. To the place where you belong."

That fleeting voice, gentle against my ear, as my vision was swept away and pulled toward somewhere unknown.

"Take it. It's the last gift this old man can give you."

The hard feel of something I'd instinctively clutched as my consciousness faded, and the glimmer it held.

The Helper.

There was no doubt. At last, I remembered clearly.

The endless, empty space.

What he'd given me in our final moments there.

Squeeze.

I tightened my grip on the pocket watch without thinking.

Ding!

SYSTEM

Item information has been updated!
Would you like to view the new information for [Pocket Watch of Unknown Make]?
Y / N

After checking the System window, I fell into a heavy silence.

I kept my mouth shut on the way back to our quarters with Jeok Cheongang, while we climbed the stairs, and even when he prodded me, unable to stand it any longer.

No—I hadn't heard him.

The thread of thought holding my senses captive was that long and that tough.

What is it?

Memories that stay vivid long after the years have passed fall into two broad categories.

The unbelievably good kind, or the goddamn awful kind.

And the pocket watch in my hand clearly belonged in the latter.

Even after more than two months, I remembered it so clearly that I could recall every last word.

Item Window

[Pocket Watch of Unknown Make]

Type: Common Item
Grade: None
Restrictions: None
Description: A pocket watch made by someone unknown. Extremely sturdy. At a glance, it looks like an old, broken watch. Even on closer inspection, it looks like a broken watch.

The memory came back as fresh as yesterday.

The anger that had surged from deep in my chest like lava the moment I checked the item information.

How could I forget? It was such a goddamn awful memory.

Of course it was. Back then, I'd been bursting with anticipation.

This wasn't some run-of-the-mill Quest. The item had been given to me as a Reward for a [System Update].

I'd gone through all that shit because of an update I didn't even know existed.

Right after defeating the Doppelganger in the modern world, I'd been sent straight to Murim. It hadn't been my choice.

The System Update had started without warning and forced me to Log In. The System stayed dead throughout the update, only returning to normal after I'd wrapped up the events in the imperial palace.

And after going through all that bullshit, how do you think I felt when I got this piece of trash as my Reward?

Considering how I felt back then, it's a miracle I didn't throw it away.

More accurately, it wasn't that I didn't throw it away. I couldn't.

It was an update reward, after all. I'd held onto a sliver of hope that it might have something hidden up its sleeve.

But it didn't take long for that last flicker of hope to burn out completely.

The pocket watch was… actual garbage.

It was filthy and worn no matter how closely I looked, and clearly broken no matter how long I stared.

I examined it like a judge on an antiques appraisal show scrutinizing a national treasure, but the only unusual thing I found was one faint line inscribed on the back.

A broken clock is right twice a day.

Twice a day, my ass.

After a week of watching the second hand stay exactly where it was, I shoved this sturdy piece of trash deep into my Inventory.

Whoever made it, I was sure I'd beat the shit out of him if he ever showed his face.

But… why is it showing up here again? And like this, out of nowhere?

I narrowed my eyes at the holographic window floating in the air.

Item Window

[Pocket Watch of Unknown Make]

Type: Special Item
Grade: None
Restrictions: None
Description: A pocket watch made by someone unknown. Extremely sturdy. At a glance, it looks like an old, broken watch. On closer inspection, it holds a secret that has yet to be uncovered.

The newly updated item information.

Actually, calling this an update seemed a little generous.

Only a few characters had been added or changed.

The item type, and the last line of the description.

The change was tiny.

It had gone from a Common Item to a Special Item, and the sentence “Even on closer inspection, it looks like a broken watch” had been replaced with new information. That was all.

But the meaning behind that change didn’t feel small at all.

Especially when I thought about how this useless piece of junk had come back into my hands.

The Helper. The endless, infinite space. And finally, the pocket watch.

I kept repeating those three keywords in my head, which was already crowded with thoughts, when—

Tap, scuff, tap.

Irregular footsteps drew closer through the slightly open door, and an uninvited guest arrived.

“Buuuurp. Whew. I’m drunk.”

A near-mummy—no, Hyuk Mujin—appeared with a burp like a lion’s roar and looked at Jeok Cheongang and me through half-lidded eyes.

“Well, well, you’re here, are ya? Hehe.”

Before I could say anything, Jeok Cheongang spoke in a dignified tone.

“If you’re drunk, go sleep it off. Unless you want the shit beaten out of you.”

Hyuk Mujin answered.

“Nah.”

“…”

“…”

Who knew one word could leave both me and Jeok Cheongang so dumbfounded?

But Hyuk Mujin, who’d just accomplished what no great fiend had ever managed, didn’t stop there.

“Uuugh.”

“Hey, don’t you dare…”

“Bwaaaaargh!”

“…I said don’t.”

What the hell was wrong with this guy?

Jeok Cheongang recoiled in alarm as vomit poured out like Niagara Falls. I sighed and patted Mujin on the back.

When he’d finished making a whole scene, he lifted his head.

“Huh? Isn’t this that watch? Are ya finally givin’ it to me?”

He’d spotted the pocket watch around my neck. Then he said something I never would’ve expected.

“But did ya finally get it up and running?”

“You crazy bastard, why are you talking about getting it up all of a sudden—wait, what did you say?”

“You repaired it, didn’t ya?”

With his tongue thoroughly twisted, Hyuk Mujin mumbled and grinned as he grabbed the pocket watch swaying before him.

“Ya did. It’s showing a different time than the last time I saw it.”

“…!”

What did he just say?

Chapter 1144

Was this what it felt like to have ice water dumped over your head?

I stood frozen by the last thing I'd expected to hear. Then I grabbed Hyuk Mujin by the shoulder as he grinned to himself.

"What do you mean by that?"

Whoosh.

As I spoke in a low voice, I sent a thread of internal energy into him. Focus returned to the eyes of the man who'd been swimming in drink.

"Y-yes?"

"Say it again. What you just said."

The alcohol had already fled.

Facing my completely serious expression, Hyuk Mujin swallowed hard.

"What I just said? Which part… Ah, the time?"

"Yeah. This thing. Do you remember it?"

I took the pocket watch from around my neck and held it close to his face. He nodded hastily.

"Of course. That was probably when we were staying at the Imperial Palace…? I begged you for it like crazy because I wanted it so badly, but you said you'd think about it, Captain. Then you never brought it out again."

Of course he remembered.

I'd made up some story about it being a valuable item from the Western Regions, and he'd pestered me for it practically every day after that.

"I'd pretty much given up when I heard you were giving it to Young Lady Ju. I didn't know you still had it."

That was when it happened.

Then, as he turned the pocket watch this way and that, still apparently fascinated by it, he finally said what I'd been waiting to hear.

"Still, no matter how valuable it is, what woman would want a broken watch as a gift? You should fix it before you give it to her."

"…Fix it?"

"Huh? Am I wrong? The last time I saw it, this long hand here was—yeah, right about there."

I followed his finger to the hour hand and felt my face stiffen.

"Captain? Did I do something wrong?"

"No. More importantly…"

"I'm sure of it. Why would I lie about something like this?"

"Right. You wouldn't."

That was the end of the conversation.

I muttered to myself and waved him away without another word. Hyuk Mujin understood the gesture and withdrew. Watching him go, I fell into thought.

Yeah. He's right.

My gaze dropped to the pocket watch resting in my palm.

Why hadn't I noticed it immediately?

There was no minute hand, as any ordinary watch would have, or even any numbers. But its one and only hand had moved a notch from its original position.

Not forward. Backward.

Unless it was designed from the start to move counterclockwise…

Had it gone around once—or several times—before stopping here?

And if so, what did that mean?

That old man definitely knew something.

The updated item information said the pocket watch held a secret, and The Helper had clearly known what it was. That must have been why he'd handed it to me as a gift.

But…

But how had he known something even I didn't?

And how had a pocket watch buried deep in my Inventory for months found its way back to me like this?

"…No way."

My heart suddenly began to pound, and my lips went dry.

Jeok Cheongang responded to the words that had escaped me, but my mind had gone blank except for the tangled thoughts I was struggling to unravel.

And finally—

"…!"

An unbelievable theory struck me like lightning.

Swift and decisive as the king's blade that had cut through the Gordian knot no one else could untie.

That endless, infinite space.

The pocket watch that had begun to move without anyone knowing.

And The Helper—an old man whose identity was a mystery, yet whose martial prowess surpassed anyone I'd ever met.

Our meeting within my consciousness had been brief, but I'd felt his presence. It was like a colossal wall.

Not even the Three Saints, the greatest masters under Heaven, had made me feel anything so overwhelmingly terrifying.

And there was only one person who could stand above the Three Saints.

The Martial God.

I swallowed.

A shiver ran from the crown of my head to my toes as I recalled the theory I'd formed about him less than half a shichen[3895] ago.

The System may have recognized Cheon Taemin's unconscious state as a form of death.

If that was true—

And if, for some reason, his consciousness had been preserved in the System—

Then I'd already met Cheon Taemin. The Martial God.

In that infinite space where he'd been staying.

No—in the Inventory.

Good call.

The voice I'd heard long ago echoed in my ears like a hallucination.

Along with the meaningless noise that had sounded at the end of my nightmare three days ago.

Tick.

A chill unlike anything I'd ever felt climbed my spine. I stared at the pocket watch, my gaze distant.

I thought about what the dream I'd had that day meant.

Why The Helper—the old man I now suspected was Cheon Taemin—had reminded me of a pocket watch I'd nearly forgotten.

And I knew the only way to answer all these questions.

"I have something to tell you."

After a long silence, my one sentence made Jeok Cheongang's gaze sink deep.

The grand banquet, where everyone had drunk together to their hearts' content, lasted only one night. But no one in Xining was sorry to see it end.

Blood was thicker than water, and stronger than wine. A few tubs of wine could never make them forget the blood already shed.

Not when they thought of the blood still to come.

"All preparations are complete."

High atop the city wall, Sword Saint Mae Jonghak began in a calm voice.

Not a breath of wind stirred.

Beyond the wall, countless troops had gathered across the fields beneath scores—hundreds—of banners. Their eyes, bleary with drink the night before, now burned like torches.

[3895] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

“Since the dark clouds of Dark Heaven first loomed over us, the realm has been plunged into turmoil and filled with screams. We’ve shed more blood than any of us can count.”

It was true.

Dark Heaven had risen only a little over two years ago. Yet the blood shed in that short time rivaled what had been spilled during the Great Faction War, which had lasted more than a decade.

“We’ve seen with our own eyes and heard with our own ears what their vile schemes have wrought.”

The conflict in Shanxi had been only the beginning.

Shaolin Temple in Henan had burned, taking the life of the eminent monk known as the Dharma King.

Soon after, all of Sichuan was drenched in blood. Then came Hubei and distant Nanman.

The Imperial Capital, Hebei, and even Gansu had been invaded.

“And at last, the will of the entire realm has gathered here in Qinghai.”

His voice, carried endlessly outward by his powerful internal energy, brought tears to the eyes of everyone listening.

They knew.

They knew how much blood it had cost to bring them here.

And they knew how precious and meaningful the blood they would shed from now on would be.

“We will hesitate no longer. We will not retreat.”

Fervor spread through the crowd.

This was their will—the will of the realm.

“We will fight not for victory, but to protect.”

Families who’d been with them since birth had died. Friends who’d supported them through hard times had died. Neighbors who’d traded smiles with them whenever they met had died.

And anyone fortunate enough to have escaped such loss would soon face it too, unless they fought back.

Unless they brought down the Lord of Heaven and the dark clouds that threatened to swallow the realm.

This was a war to protect. A holy war to exterminate fiends without equal in all history—and a mandate from Heaven.

“So I ask you…”

Shing.

A snow-white blade emerged from its sword case.

A purple glow surrounded Mae Jonghak as a vast wave of aura burst from him.

No—at his side, everyone standing tall upon the wall unleashed the countless feelings and surging auras they'd held back.

Along with the Alliance Leader's azure dragon's roar, which swept across the dry skies of Qinghai.

"Who among you will retreat in the face of injustice?!"

At that instant—

Clang, clang, clang, clang!

The darkened fields flashed like the sun.

Countless swords and spears rose high enough to pierce the sky. The troops' rumbling shouts and the force of their auras set the motionless banners flapping.

Yes.

At last, the wind was blowing.

A wind born in the Nine Provinces and Eight Directions swept in, bearing cold steel and the bloody scent of vengeance.

It rushed toward the cursed forbidden land beyond the distant desert.

Boom, boom, boom!

To the deepest, fiercest beat of war drums yet, an army of more than two hundred thousand advanced across the vast wilderness.

Murim.

No—the sight of a coalition unprecedented in the continent's history marching as one was magnificent enough to send a shiver through everyone on the wall.

But one man's eyes still trembled.

Damn it.

Jin Taekyung felt a weight settle in his chest.

This should be the end. Why did it feel like a beginning?

After countless hardships, the united blade of the realm was finally aimed at the Lord of Heaven. Why did he feel as though he were walking along the edge of a cliff?

Now's my only chance.

Unease pressed against a corner of his mind like a massive boulder, along with questions he still couldn't answer.

There was only one way to resolve them and move forward.

Master.

At Taekyung's quiet Sound Transmission, Jeok Cheongang gave a small nod.

So you've decided to do it after all.

That was all, and it was enough.

Before dawn, Master and Disciple had shared a long, deep conversation. They had no secrets from each other.

“Go on.”

As his Disciple climbed into the carriage they’d prepared in advance, Jeok Cheongang smiled faintly and added, “This old man will be right here, waiting with everyone.”

His Disciple answered with a smile just like his Master’s.

“I’ll be back.”

And soon, the Disciple fell asleep.

A sleep so deep and vivid that he wouldn’t know it even if someone shook him awake.

Chapter 1145

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, silently looked down at his Disciple, who lay comfortably before him.

His eyelids were firmly shut. His chest rose and fell with each quiet breath.

To anyone else, Jin Taekyung was fast asleep, oblivious to the world. But Jeok Cheongang knew what they did not.

His Disciple had gone not into a dream, but to another world.

The realm of immortals.

Jeok Cheongang clearly remembered the shock of first hearing the truth from his Disciple's own lips.

No—he could never forget it.

A world where skyscrapers hundreds of jang[3896] tall stood together like a forest; where the footsteps of humanity reached beyond the sky and into the universe; where supernatural powers that defied all reason ruled the land.

It was a world Jeok Cheongang could scarcely imagine.

But the place where his Disciple had been born and raised was plainly not as peaceful or beautiful as he had first thought.

"I have to go."

The previous night, Jin Taekyung's face had been more solemn than Jeok Cheongang had ever seen it when he said he intended to return home.

Even his Master had never seen him like that.

"Has something happened in the realm of immortals?"

"I don't know. Not yet."

"Not yet, you say. From the way you put it, something bad must be happening."

"It's only a hunch, but yes."

Jin Taekyung had brushed it off as only a hunch, but Jeok Cheongang, who knew him better than anyone, understood.

His Disciple never lied.

Behind his usual lighthearted manner, which sometimes bordered on frivolous, lurked a beast alert to even the smallest change around him.

That was why Jeok Cheongang could sense the immense anxiety and burden pressing down on Jin Taekyung's shoulders. He could feel, too, how his own heart had dropped when he saw his Disciple like that.

Perhaps that was why he had suddenly pictured his Disciple ten days ago, his body hanging limp in Jeok Cheongang's arms.

"Then say it properly this time."

[3896] A jang is a traditional Korean length of ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

"What?"

"You just said you were leaving. As if you might never return."

Perhaps Jin Taekyung had been trying to spare his Master needless worry.

Jeok Cheongang had not heard everything about the place called the realm of immortals, but he knew one thing for certain.

However different the two worlds were, if the soul was erased, the body died too.

More than anything, he feared finding his Disciple one day in a sleep from which he would never wake.

After a moment of silence that seemed to last forever, Jin Taekyung smiled and answered.

"Then… I'll be back. I promise."

Why, then, did Jeok Cheongang still feel so heavyhearted?

He had heard the answer he wanted. Yet the weight remained through a sleepless night, and it remained now as he kept watch beside his Disciple on the long journey.

Another month, at the soonest.

That was how long it would take an army of more than two hundred thousand to cross the vast Taklamakan Desert in Xinjiang.

It was only an estimate, of course. But the coalition army had finished its preparations and calculations down to the last detail. It would press across the desert with unstoppable momentum and reach its destination.

Tianshan—the place regarded as cursed for the past thousand years.

Whatever danger waits there, it doesn't matter. This old man will protect you.

Those who know what they must do have no fear.

A Master belonged beside his Disciple, and Jeok Cheongang would not leave this spot until Jin Taekyung woke.

Nor would the others, who had arrived and taken up their positions without a word.

"What are you staring at?"

Jeok Cheongang answered the Slaughter Saint, who sat in one corner of the carriage with his eyes half-closed.

"There's an uninvited guest planted right there. I was wondering who the hell he was."

"Uninvited? Why would I be uninvited?"

"Because the owner of the carriage didn't invite you."

The Slaughter Saint snorted and nodded toward Jin Taekyung.

"You're mistaken. The owner of the carriage isn't you. It's that fellow lying over there. And this carriage was a gift from the Emperor and the Zhuge Clan, not you."

"But I'm his Master."

"By that logic, so am I. I taught him something valuable once."

"You mean that Ghost-whatever footwork technique? It wasn't much good."

"What? Not much good? Your lot at the Fire Gate Clan—"

"Your lot? You snot-nosed brat. How dare you speak to an elder like that—"

It was a bewildering exchange for two old masters whose combined ages exceeded two hundred, especially inside a carriage drawn by the eight finest imperial sweat-blood horses. Yet Jeok Cheongang felt warmth spreading through his heart.

Do you see? Your efforts and pain weren't in vain.

Not even one shichen[3897] had passed since the army began its full-scale march, yet the eight-horse carriage at the very back of the long, seemingly endless column had already received plenty of visitors.

Members of the Embroidered Uniform Guard who protected the Emperor's closest confidants. Masters of Murim, including the Nine Sects and One Gang.

Every one of them ranked among the most skilled in the vast army, and each had come asking to join the carriage's escort.

To repay a debt.

To show even a little respect for the great devotion and effort the owner of the carriage had shown until now.

If Jeok Cheongang hadn't sent them away with threats, there might have been more than a thousand of the finest guards surrounding the carriage by now.

A handful, of course, had stood their ground without so much as twitching an eyebrow at his threats.

"Good grief, there they go again."

"They've got plenty of energy."

"Shh. They'll hear you."

Familiar voices drifted through the gap in the carriage door. Jeok Cheongang felt a sudden swell of emotion and, before he knew it, let out a quiet laugh.

"Why are you laughing all of a sudden? You sound like a crazy old man."

"Who knows."

Even the Slaughter Saint's sour jab could not wipe the smile from his face. Perhaps it was because he was happy.

In this harsh world, he was not the only one who treasured his Disciple as much as himself and looked out for him. The joy of knowing that was small, and enormous.

Jeok Cheongang had long ago turned his back on the world and kept his distance from people. He did not want his one and only Disciple to walk the same path.

No. This boy had to be different.

He had to pursue righteousness, practice chivalry, and win people's hearts.

[3897] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

Now and in the years to come.

Always. Forever.

To see that wish fulfilled, his Master could do anything.

Even if hell waited beyond those scorching sands.

Without fail.

By now, Jeok Cheongang's eyes had sunk deep as he watched the vast desert outside the window.

Rumble.

A huge bank of dark clouds began to spread above the fierce heat shimmer.

Everything that happens in the world has two sides, like a coin.

Where there is light, there is darkness. When the sun sets, the moon rises.

Not long after someone closed their eyes in comforting warmth, the same was true of someone who awoke in a sealed chamber tens of thousands of ri[3898] away.

Though perhaps opened their eyes was the better way to put it.

The one who had just done so could never sleep again.

"What happened?"

At the low voice that seemed to ring inside his head, a subordinate shuddered and answered.

"You collapsed for a moment."

"I collapsed?"

"Yes. It seemed you had lost consciousness, but this subordinate dared not touch you…"

Crack.

Before he could finish, an invisible hand squeezed his throat. The subordinate's face went pale.

"You dare lie to me."

"C-cough. I-I'm not."

Instead of an answer, formless energy crept over him, binding his entire body and choking the breath from him.

The subordinate gasped and struggled to protest. Only when his body went limp did the energy pressing down on the chamber vanish as though washed away.

Leaving behind the realization that the dead man had told the truth—and one question that remained unanswered.

Lost consciousness? Why?

[3898] A Korean ri is about 393 m (0.244 mi).

The shadow left the subordinate's corpse behind in the dark chamber and fell into thought.

An inexplicable shock had struck in an instant, followed by a break in consciousness.

Even with all her vast knowledge, the shadow could not explain it.

The shadow rose as if floating, climbing thousands of steps. She stopped only when she reached the one being who could answer her question.

Rumble.

The enormous iron doors opened before the shadow could ask to enter.

In the perfectly complete darkness, where not a single glimmer of light could be seen, he was there.

"Your humble servant comes before the great Lord of Heaven."

The shadow cried out in reverence and immediately prostrated herself.

She already possessed power and stature far beyond human limits. Yet the pitch-black darkness held the power to crush her like an insect at any moment.

No—having grown another level, the shadow could feel that omnipotence more clearly than ever.

"I knew you would come."

She could even hear the faint delight in that flat voice, a voice that froze the soul merely to hear it.

"You must have felt the wave."

"…!"

"What surprises you so, Grand Sorceress?"

The darkness stirred and gently wrapped around the shadow's—no, the Grand Sorceress's—shoulder.

"Root and branch are one. Reborn through my grace, you must have felt it."

The Grand Sorceress's trembling eyes dropped to her own hand.

Rot had eaten through it, leaving white bone exposed: a grisly reminder that the body had already died. But the Grand Sorceress shuddered with joy and awe.

That was right.

She had been born again.

Blessed by the great and omnipotent Lord of Heaven, she had risen from death and returned to her master's side.

And at last, she understood the true purpose of the Lord of Heaven's grand design.

"Then the wave you spoke of just now…"

"Yes."

At that very moment—

Ssssh.

A faint green light rose in the pitch-black darkness.

For more than fifty years, no one in Dark Heaven had laid eyes on those snow-white fingers. Bathed in green light, they caressed a piece of jade.

Softly. Coolly.

“Once again, the heavens have opened.”

Chapter 1146

In a dark, narrow room, a man stood before a full-length mirror, silently staring at its smooth surface.

Tall and slender, with sharply defined features.

He had seen his reflection countless times over the past thirty-odd years. But what gripped him now was not familiarity. It was bitterness and anger.

“Why did it have to be you?”

The faint words slipped from his lips without warning.

Normally, he would never have muttered to himself. This time, he didn’t care.

“You’re not the one who should be here.”

Every word felt like breathing fire.

It ached deep in his chest, as though an invisible awl were digging into him. Beads of sweat had gathered without his noticing and rolled down his cheeks.

Like his heart. Endlessly.

“You’re not qualified.”

It was true.

Unlike the handful of people with the necessary “qualifications,” he had neither overwhelming strength nor the experience of a battle-hardened veteran.

But acknowledging that was one thing. He knew better than anyone how heavily this responsibility weighed on his shoulders, and how much this mission mattered.

That was when his trembling eyes suddenly flashed.

Crunch.

A sickening sound of torn flesh, and the taste of blood filled his mouth.

He spat out a mouthful of blood and faced the mirror again.

A man with a deep, unwavering gaze stared back at him now.

He looked uncannily like someone bound to him by the longest and closest of ties—and yet someone who had felt farther away than anyone else in the world.

But even that brief thought was a luxury for the man. For Choi Minwoo.

Crack.

A faint tremor traveled down from the ceiling, and hairline fractures spread across the full-length mirror like a spiderweb.

Sensing that the time had finally come, Choi Minwoo turned his back on his distorted reflection and flung open the rusted iron door that had briefly kept the harsh reality outside at bay.

Creeeak.

In the middle of a corridor barely wide enough for two grown men to stand shoulder to shoulder, a hulking figure wrapped from head to toe in a military poncho gave Choi Minwoo a nod.

“Right on time.”

“Sorry to keep you waiting. I needed a moment to prepare.”

“No need to apologize. You’re in charge here. Though…”

The figure glanced at the dust drifting slowly down from the ceiling, stirred by a tremor that had grown slightly stronger.

“Any later and we’d have been in trouble. Let’s go.”

As if they’d planned it, they quickly set off, trading words as they made their way through the winding, ant-nest-like corridors.

“What happened?”

The hulking figure answered Choi Minwoo in a subdued voice.

“I’d like to say it’s just a sandstorm…”

“It’s them.”

“Damn it. Yeah.”

Why did his worst suspicions never turn out to be wrong?

But Choi Minwoo had left his self-reproach and complaints behind at the broken mirror. He steeled himself and asked another question.

“How many?”

“From what we’ve been able to tell, at least several thousand.”

Several thousand.

It sounded like an absurdly broad estimate, but communications and every radar network had been down for some time. Choi Minwoo accepted the figure without question.

The hulking figure’s abilities were unlike anyone else’s in this old, worn-out underground bomb shelter. He was also someone Choi Minwoo trusted enough to entrust with his own life.

“…Several thousand?”

If there were already several thousand as far as they could tell, the number could exceed ten thousand, depending on the situation.

At Choi Minwoo’s darkening gaze, the hulking figure made an effort to shake his head.

“They might just be a scouting party. Those guys always move around in swarms like ants.”

It was a reasonable guess.

The enemy had already swallowed up a vast stretch of desert. Their numbers were terrifying, and growing by the day.

Even if they aren't here to attack, they could simply be passing through on their way to another city. Our routes might have crossed by chance.

Choi Minwoo walked on in silence, lost in thought.

They were staying in an underground bomb shelter secretly built by the US military during the Gulf War. It had been abandoned for more than fifty years after the war ended, and the Great Cataclysm had reshaped the land so thoroughly that even its existence had been forgotten.

Until a group hurrying across the desert happened to find its entrance beneath a sand dune.

If we only found it by luck, what are the chances the enemy knows it's here?

Slim to none.

The only thing that bothered him was the communication Magic they had barely managed to establish not long ago. But given who had sent it, the chance of the enemy detecting it was close to zero.

Which means…

At last, Choi Minwoo reached a conclusion.

This was a coincidence.

As the hulking figure had said, they were probably a scouting party, or their paths had simply crossed.

All Choi Minwoo and the others had to do was wait.

They could hold their breath in this old, musty shelter, let sand and dust rain down on their heads, and prepare for a fight just in case. Before long, peace would return.

The uninvited guests would pass right over them without ever finding the doorbell to their hidden home. Choi Minwoo could lead the others out of the shelter without a single casualty.

In just a few hours.

Yes.

That was the best choice.

…Then why?

The hulking figure's eyes widened when Choi Minwoo suddenly stopped walking.

"What's wrong? Is there a problem?"

After a brief silence, Choi Minwoo answered.

"No. There isn't."

"Damn, you scared me. We're almost there. Let's join the others before they start chirping like frightened chicks."

Shaking his head, the hulking figure started down the final corridor to the central chamber.

That was when Choi Minwoo noticed how his back bulged beneath the poncho, as though he were a hunchback.

And at the same moment, his tightly shut lips parted.

“What do you think the best choice is?”

“What?”

The hulking figure turned at the unexpected question. Beneath the hood pulled almost to his nose, hair the color of molten gold spilled out.

“What’s brought this on all of a sudden…?”

“I can’t tell what’s right or wrong. What’s the difference between the best choice and the worst?”

Choi Minwoo continued in a hoarse voice. His eyes had begun to tremble, just like the ones he’d seen in the mirror.

“Even now, more than ten times our number are coming this way. But if we keep quiet and wait, there won’t be any unnecessary casualties. They don’t know we’re here.”

Rumble.

The growing tremors shook the ceiling. The rumbling had grown stronger with every step they’d taken down the corridor.

“If we wait just ten more minutes, it’ll all be over. For us, at least.”

The last words came out weakly. The hulking figure’s gaze deepened.

“Say what you want to say.”

“Whatever they’re after, blood is going to be spilled somewhere nearby. Even with their numbers, they wouldn’t move thousands of troops for no reason.”

“Now that you mention it, you’re right. So?”

“Once we’re through this corridor, I’ll give the order as their commander. If they want to make it home alive, they’re to hold their breath and wait. They’re not to get involved, whether the enemy is chasing helpless civilians or Hunters.”

The words poured out of Choi Minwoo like water through a broken dam. He drew a deep breath.

Then he saw the hulking figure’s mouth in the dim light of a bulb nearing the end of its life.

“Yeah. I see what you mean. So…”

He was smiling.

“If you’re done talking bullshit, tell me what you really want to say.”

“…!”

“Come on, say it and get it off your chest. Like that guy we know so well.”

With the rumbling growing louder by the second, the hulking figure dropped onto the shaking floor, as if he wouldn’t move another step until Choi Minwoo answered.

“What, can’t you do it like him?”

Choi Minwoo clenched his trembling fist instead of answering.

He knew exactly who the hulking figure meant without hearing his name. He had watched Jin Taekyung from close by for a long time. He knew that, whatever crisis Taekyung faced, he always took responsibility for his actions.

And that was a gap Choi Minwoo could never close.

“Hunter Jin Taekyung… is different from me.”

“How?”

“I’m weak. I can’t compare to him. And I have a mission I absolutely have to succeed at, as the commander here.”

“Responsibility matters. But that’s got nothing to do with it.”

Before Choi Minwoo could respond to the cryptic remark, the hulking figure added quietly:

“The others still here are already planning to rush out and fight. Every last one of them.”

“…!”

“I stopped by on my way here and told them how many enemies there were. First thing they did was grab their equipment. They said there had to be a reason that many bastards were swarming around. Know what’s even funnier?”

The hulking figure let out a short laugh.

“I told them to wait for their commander’s orders. They said you’d be thinking the same thing anyway.”

He rose and approached Choi Minwoo, who stood frozen like a statue.

But he wasn’t the only one to move.

“Uh…”

“When are we heading out?”

Hunters had appeared at the far end of the corridor, their heads poking around the corner. The hulking figure shrugged at Choi Minwoo.

“There you have it.”

Choi Minwoo looked silently from him to the Hunters, who had already finished their preparations.

Then, slowly—

Very slowly, as a thunderous rumbling shook everything around them, he drew the sword at his waist.

“This is my answer.”

At that moment—

Hiss. Slash!

The aura surging fiercely along the blade split the shelter’s concrete wall like tofu.

KABOOM!

The explosion sent debris flying.

Beyond the shattered wall came blazing sunlight and the blood of cursed monsters.

“I like you. For a human.”

The hulking figure—the Skeleton King—laughed aloud and patted the large backpack hidden beneath his poncho.

“Don’t worry. I’ll keep you safe, you human who sleeps too much for no reason.”

And he shot toward the enemies.

Or he was about to.

If not for the answer no one had expected.

“Dad’s not sleeping.”

“…Huh?”

Chapter 1147

In that brief moment, split into smaller and smaller moments, the Skeleton King thought:

Have I been feeling a little weak lately?

Yes. He must have heard wrong.

They said that humans—strictly speaking, he wasn't human, and certainly not an animal—sometimes heard things that weren't there when their bodies and minds were weak.

Besides, they were about to fight enemies who outnumbered them by more than ten to one. With the odds so bad he'd borrow a cat's paw if he could, hearing things was hardly strange.

That guy—

No, Jin Taekyung was the most reliable person in the world to him.

But…

There's no way he's woken up.

It was all wishful thinking.

They'd faced countless dangers on the way to this old, musty underground bomb shelter, but every time, Jin Taekyung's eyelids had stayed firmly shut without so much as a twitch.

The Skeleton King had even begun to worry that he might never wake up at all.

That damn human.

Just as he thought it bitterly to himself—

Whoosh!

With a sharp whistle, the flow of time that had briefly stopped came rushing back like a flood.

KABOOM!

A powerful impact shook the space around them.

The Skeleton King's expression darkened as he canceled out a dozen or so streaks of light flying through the air.

This is…

There was no mistaking it.

Speed and strength on a level entirely different from ordinary monsters.

The Bone Sword trembling in his grasp told him that those guys were among the thousands of monsters. It told him, too, that this battle—now past the point of no return—would be even harder than expected.

"Shit, it's them!"

"Everyone, switch to a defensive formation!"

They were quick to judge, and quick to act.

Every Hunter here was a skilled veteran with plenty of combat experience. At the almost simultaneous shouts from the Skeleton King and Choi Minwoo, the Hunters charging behind their commander moved at once, without the slightest hesitation or sign of panic.

Or they did until a low voice stopped them in their tracks.

“Maintain the attack formation.”

“…?”

“…?”

Midway through switching to a defensive formation, the Hunters looked at one another in confusion.

First, because the order had suddenly changed.

Second, because Choi Minwoo—the only one there with the authority to give orders—looked just as strange as they did. Stranger, even.

And third—

I’ve heard that voice somewhere before.

They were sure of it. The voice sounded unfamiliar, yet somehow caught the ear at once. Though low and hoarse, there was something about it they couldn’t mistake.

Perhaps that was why the veteran Hunters, all of them battle-hardened, couldn’t hide their dismay.

And why they left a fatal opening for the enemies right in front of them.

—Grrrrrrrr!

Thousands of monsters surged toward them like a wave, roaring. Ghouls, Orcs, Lizardmen, and Manticores swung claws and weapons that could tear through steel like paper.

And then—

Whoosh.

A dazzling streak of light shot toward the fearsome monsters.

BOOM!

Flesh and bone exploded into hundreds, then thousands of pieces. Countless dying screams rose with sprays of blue-green blood.

In the thick mist of blood that enveloped them in an instant, those who witnessed the unbelievable scene suddenly understood.

Who had given the order they’d just heard.

Why that low, hoarse voice had felt so familiar.

“Hey.”

Over the shoulder of the Skeleton King, who stood rigid as a statue, a young man poked his head out of the backpack he’d been carrying.

“You were pretending not to hear me on purpose, weren’t you?”

"…!"

"…!"

Honestly, at first I thought I was dreaming.

Dreaming of a time before I was even born, when I was busy squirming around in Mom's belly.

I mean, who would think to fold up a sleeping person and stuff them whole into a huge backpack?

And judging by the turtle-shell bondage they'd done with those famously tough ogre tendons—like something out of a certain kind of Japanese video—whoever did this wasn't just crazy.

Of course, I knew exactly who that lunatic was.

"This bastard's tastes are seriously… No, let's talk about that later."

"You, you…!"

Leaving the Skeleton King stammering behind me with a look like he'd seen a ghost, I put strength back into my stiff body.

Crack, crack.

I snapped the ogre tendons binding me from head to toe like strands of thread, tore through the backpack made of equally tough hide, and stood on my own two feet. Only then did I feel like I could breathe.

How long was I like that?

I had questions lined up on the tip of my tongue. But I knew this wasn't the time to ask.

From the moment I regained consciousness until now, the stench boiling all around me and the thick magical power had been enough to make me nauseous.

"Team Leader."

I gave a slight nod in greeting. Team Leader Choi, watching me with a jumble of emotions on his face, finally let out the breath he'd been holding.

"Everyone, form up for an attack."

At once, the air around us began to boil.

The Skeleton King and Team Leader Choi, whom I hadn't seen in ages, stood alongside some two hundred Hunters of various races. Eyes alight, they raised their weapons and took their places.

Like a single arrow.

And the direction it would fly was already decided.

CRUNCH, clack!

White Flame returned to my hand after piercing dozens of monsters, just as it had on its way out. It trembled in my grasp as though it sensed what was about to come.

“Let’s go.”

That was all I said.

Nothing more, nothing less.

The thought became a sound, the sound slipped past my lips—and in that instant, I was already charging at the enemies.

Whoosh.

One step.

I closed the twenty-meter[3899] gap in an instant and brought White Flame down without hesitation.

Fwoosh!

Space warped before the deep-blue flames now burning along the spearhead. Terrible heat swallowed the monsters, and pillars of fire erupted from cracks in the ground, now as hot as a field of lava.

KABOOM!

Explosions and thunderous noise. Screams burst out all around.

But I paid no attention to the massive shock wave or the chaos.

No—more accurately, none of my allies did.

Whoosh, whoosh, whoosh!

We left the flying sparks and mangled scraps of flesh behind. The two hundred or so Hunters charged like the wind and tore the monsters apart with strength even I hadn’t expected.

Whoooooosh!

In a split second, countless streaks of light dazzled my eyes. Ogre hide—said to be impenetrable even to an anti-materiel sniper rifle—and Manticore tails split like tofu, scattering in every direction.

Slash, splatter!

The monsters’ encirclement crumbled amid fountains of dark blood.

At its center, the Hunters’ weapons shone fiercely with a power I knew well.

Aura?

My eyes widened despite myself.

There was no mistaking it. Aura, also known as Sword Energy.

A hallmark of A-rank Hunters in the modern world and the exclusive domain of Peak masters in Murim, it flowed along their weapons.

Not just ten or twenty of them. Every one of the two hundred or so Hunters.

[3899] Twenty meters is about 66 ft.

Why are there this many A-rank Hunters gathered here? The last place I remember being was more than a thousand kilometers[3900] from even the nearest ally.

What on earth had happened while I was gone?

I tried to recall what I knew of the modern world, but it was hard to make sense of the situation.

No.

Before I could even begin to understand the reality in front of me, another unexpected factor got in the way.

Ssssh.

A chillingly low whistle reached my ears. My body moved before my brain could react, bringing down White Flame's spearhead, which had paused for only an instant.

Slash, KABOOM!

It all happened in a flash.

I cut through a crescent-shaped mass of magical power flying toward me. The concentrated, sticky-cold energy swallowed the monsters to either side.

And then—

Splash.

A group came into view, stepping through a puddle of blue-green blood.

"…What are they?"

Team Leader Choi and the Skeleton King, who had moved up on either side of me, answered the question that had slipped out on instinct.

"It's them."

"Be careful, human. They're nothing like the monsters you know."

I looked at the uninvited guests instead of answering.

There were seven of them.

They looked… human. More so than even Lizardmen, who were called humanoid monsters because they walked on two legs.

But they weren't human.

It wasn't just their height, well over two meters,[3901] or their bulging muscles. It wasn't even that every one of them had exactly the same height and build, as though they'd come off a production line.

What is that energy?

Magical power too dense to be human, yet far too pure to be a monster's.

The Skeleton King was right. Each of them was strong enough to rival a Named Monster, with magical power purer than any monster's I'd ever encountered.

Like living things born with genes entirely free of flaws.

[3900] A thousand kilometers is about 620 mi.

[3901] Two meters is about 6 ft 7 in.

But…

“Yeah. They’re definitely different.”

The Skeleton King hadn’t been entirely right.

Step.

They weren’t the only ones on a different level.

And he had the wrong idea about who needed to be careful.

Slash.

I moved in an instant no one there could see or sense, feeling the sensation travel up the spearhead as I thought to myself:

Six left.

Chapter 1148

For a martial artist, growing stronger meant more than sharper senses. It meant greater concentration, too.

The terrifying focus to pour everything he had into a single instant, no matter what was happening around him, with only one thought in mind.

That was Jin Taekyung now.

Ding.

A familiar chime rang in his ears.

But his senses, honed as keen as a blade forged by a master craftsman, didn't dull in the slightest.

If anything, they sharpened further.

What was that?

The sudden appearance of the mysterious Named Monsters.

He'd already killed one, but what came first wasn't satisfaction. It was the heavy impact he'd felt through his spear and an inexplicable wariness. He moved faster still.

Flash.

A flawless Shifting Form and Position left not even an afterimage.

Six bolts of magical power fired a beat too late and pierced empty air. At the same instant, White Flame spewed fire again in Jin Taekyung's hands.

Fwoosh—KABOOM!

Space warped along the spearhead's slanting downward arc. Deep-blue flames, carrying a tremendous amount of Scorching Yang Qi, sliced through another Named Monster.

Or so it seemed.

Then Jin Taekyung felt the powerful recoil through the spearhead.

CRUNCH!

"…!"

Eyes wide, he watched the Named Monster hurtle away.

And he understood the wariness he'd felt when he killed the first one.

They're tough.

He didn't mean their movements or their aura. Their bodies were, quite literally, damn tough.

Tough enough that even he, after bringing down countless enemies, could hardly believe it.

White Flame can't even cut all the way through?

What kind of weapon was White Flame?

It was a ridiculously overpowered item he'd never have laid eyes on if the System hadn't showered him with rewards early on. In Murim, no amount of money could buy a treasure like it.

Even modern artifacts decked out with cutting-edge technology and every kind of Magic couldn't match the sharpness and strength of White Flame itself.

Yet its Force-wreathed spearhead couldn't slice through these monsters like tofu. Their bones in particular were denser than he'd ever imagined.

The monster had suffered a horrific wound, of course. But it was still standing when it should have been split cleanly from collarbone to pelvis. That alone shocked Jin Taekyung.

Its incredible regenerative ability, already restoring the wound in an instant, was just a bonus.

"How is this even possible?"

The question escaped his lips. The Skeleton King, who had joined him by now, answered.

"I thought the same thing at first. But think about it. It's not so hard to understand."

"Why not?"

"If a human as monstrous as you exists, why can't monsters like them?"

"Are you kidding? I'm an exception."

"Do you have to say something that puts me off my food like it's the most natural thing in the world?"

"Off your food? You've really become Korean. Weren't you supposed to be playing a foreigner?"

The question had been based on reasonable evidence, but Mr. Stone-King, from Atlanta, Georgia, had just learned a lot from a marvel of civilization called a smartphone.

"I'm Korean American."

"…You've gotten pretty good with words since I last saw you."

"Words aren't the only thing I've gotten better at."

WHOOOOSH.

No sooner had he spoken than a tremendous mass of magical power swelled around him.

Jin Taekyung blinked at the unmistakable difference between his power now and before. The Skeleton King shrugged.

"What? Trembling at my might?"

"…What the hell happened while I was gone?"

"A lot. But I can't tell you about it right now."

He was right about that much.

Not far away, Choi Minwoo was leading the Hunters in a fierce battle against the monsters, while the six Named Monsters had formed a semicircle around them.

Ssshhh.

Magical power, dense enough to take shape, rippled like fog.

Behind the skull masks covering their faces, emotionless eyes fixed on the two of them like blades.

“Go for the neck. It’s the easiest part to cut.”

With the Skeleton King now at his back, Jin Taekyung adjusted his grip on the spear.

“I know.”

“We’ll take half each. Three for me, three for you.”

“Can you handle that? You’re weak as hell.”

“Arrogant human. Did you plant a knife in your tongue?”

The Skeleton King stopped grumbling. Then he added, so quietly Jin Taekyung could barely hear him:

“Still… it’s good to see you.”

What was that?

“I said I’m damn glad to see you again, even if it had to be like this.”

Jin Taekyung tried to think of an answer, then simply laughed.

Before an awkward silence could settle, he pushed off the ground and charged at the enemy.

And, just as his monster friend had done, he answered in a voice barely above a whisper.

“Yeah. Me too.”

It all happened almost at once.

Whoosh!

The wind rushing over him swallowed his voice. Jin Taekyung shot forward faster than sound and reached the monsters a step ahead of the Skeleton King.

KABOOM!

Three swords met one spearhead with a deafening crash.

It was no even match. The monsters gave ground under the force of the blow, and Jin Taekyung kept advancing.

KABOOM! KABOOM! CRUNCH!

Amid the successive crashes, one Named Monster failed to keep up with his strength and speed and dropped to its knees. Jin Taekyung didn’t hesitate.

Slash!

He felt the heavy resistance through the spearhead.

He put even more strength than usual into the strike, and a head in a pure-white skull mask rose into the air.

Two swords were already swinging at him from either side, but they came half a beat too late to reach him.

No—the punch he threw after they'd begun to swing struck empty air first.

WHUMP!

Compressed air exploded.

As if he'd struck a mountain to hit the cow behind it, the shock wave burst outward, driving the monsters back and opening a gap.

An opening that lasted only an instant, but could decide who lived and who died.

Whoosh!

The sequence of movements didn't need so much as a preparatory motion.

With physical abilities that made even superhuman sound inadequate, Jin Taekyung threw his spear.

THUNK!

It shot through the air as though plunging from above and pierced another Named Monster.

Just as he'd intended, the spearhead slipped precisely between its bones.

CRUNCH!

Skin and flesh tougher than the hide of a large monster like an ogre were no use this time.

White Flame's Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron spearhead punched through its target and drove deep into the ground. Leaving the monster thrashing like a fish on a harpoon, Jin Taekyung pushed off the ground again.

And used the ability granted to him alone.

Inventory open. Summon. Summon. Summon.

Whoosh, whoosh, whoosh!

A dozen or so daggers streaked through the air like beams of light.

The only Named Monster still on its feet swung a sword brimming with magical power and knocked every dagger aside.

By then, it was too late.

Slip.

Moving with the subtle principles of Ghost Illusory Slaughter Step, Jin Taekyung slipped deep inside its reach and swung the last dagger, the one he'd kept in his hand.

He spoke quietly.

"You're damn tough, but…"

Slash!

"That doesn't mean you're strong."

THUD.

The towering figure, well over two meters[3902] tall, crumpled to the ground.

And at that moment—

Rumble.

A vast tremor shook space itself, and a dazzling flash spread above everyone's heads.

Maybe it was thanks to the enlightenment I'd gained during the past few months in Murim.

I felt a strange sense of familiarity before anyone else did. At the same time, I sensed an immense aura suddenly looming high overhead.

Shit, again?

Naturally, my first thought was that another unexpected enemy had arrived.

Another powerful being like the mysterious Named Monsters I'd brought down, and the ones the Skeleton King was still fighting.

Maybe that was why everyone on the ground froze as the tremendous rumbling shook the sky.

But why?

A terrible possibility had flashed through my mind like lightning, yet the red warning light my instincts always set off remained quiet, even as the flash swallowed the sky.

No. The larger that flash grew, the calmer I felt.

The Skeleton King, who had just taken down his second Named Monster and was locked in a desperate fight with the last one, didn't seem to feel the same way.

"Uh? Uh, hey!"

His pupils were shaking like an earthquake measuring 8.0, tsunami included.

He glanced up at the sky with a look that said, What the hell is that? Then he shouted at me, standing stock-still.

"What are you doing? Quit gawking and do something!"

"Okay."

I obediently raised both hands and waved.

At the sky.

"What are you doing, you bastard?!"

"Saying hello."

"…What?"

My helpful explanation didn't seem to clear things up. I grinned at him.

[3902] Two meters is about 6.6 ft.

“Someone came a long way to get here. I should at least say hello.”

“What the hell are you—!”

The Skeleton King could hold it in no longer. He burst out in anger—

At that very moment—

FLASH!

The light gathering in the sky exploded.

Within the blinding flash that spread in every direction, a different, destructive energy suddenly surged.

WHOOOOOSH!

I opened my arms wider still.

Toward the countless streaks of light pouring down like lightning, like arrows, with a fierce whistle—aimed only at the monsters.

Toward the one who had brought all this about.

My friend, and a great Grand Mage.

Chapter 1149

The battle didn't take long to end.

By the time most of the seven named monsters leading the enemy were dead or incapacitated, the tide had already turned. Then humanity's greatest War Mage arrived and smashed the monster army's life support.

KWA-BOOOOM!

Attack spells rained down without pause from dozens of meters[3903] overhead, tearing up the ground and sending blood spraying. His aim was nearly perfect, as if he were sniping his targets.

That was the end of the battle.

What followed was a one-sided massacre.

"Charge! Wipe them all out!"

CRUNCH!

With me, the Skeleton King, and Team Leader Choi at their center, some three hundred Hunters swept forward like a wave and swallowed enemies more than ten times their number.

Slash, splatter!

I cut down or stabbed every enemy that came into view. The medium and large monsters that trusted their strength and fought to the end, and the ones who had finally lost their nerve and turned to run.

No exceptions. No mercy.

After a little over thirty minutes of pursuit and slaughter, not a single monster stood on two feet in the blood-soaked desert.

Well.

Actually, there was one.

"Thankfully, we didn't suffer any casualties… What's that insolent look for, human?"

The Skeleton King had started toward me, then hesitated and stopped. I glanced over at him.

"Hmm. It's nothing."

"Looks like something to me."

"There are exceptions to every rule. Right?"

"Where'd that come from?"

"It's a thing. It has nothing to do with you, so don't ask."

[3903] A few dozen meters is roughly 100–300 ft.

His eyes narrowed; he'd clearly noticed something suspicious. Thankfully, I was spared any further interrogation when a huge shadow fell across me like a lifeline from heaven.

"Gentlemen. I have a question for you."

Dark skin like dark chocolate. Enormous muscles. And a staff that looked more vicious than most close-combat weapons.

The towering Grand Mage descended slowly through the air. When he spoke again, his voice trembled.

"What I'm looking at isn't some damn mirage or illusion spell, is it?"

He stared at me in disbelief. I slowly held out a fist.

"Why don't you check?"

"Oh, damn it. Jin?"

Magic Johnson, the Grand Mage from the United States, pulled me into a tight hug instead of bumping fists.

Squeeze.

"…"

The firm, heavy thing pressing into my stomach was probably his staff.

It had to be.

It took Magic Johnson quite a while to calm down. Fortunately, his excitement had come entirely from the joy of seeing me again.

Yeah. Even for a black guy, that size and hardness would be ridiculous.

"Dear God. I can see you standing here, and I still can't believe it. When did you wake up?"

He was only just regaining his composure. I'd barely escaped the enormous arms of this Grand Mage of the physical school, and I couldn't help glancing at the staff tucked into his belt as I answered.

"Not long ago. It still doesn't feel real."

"Ah, I see. The last time I managed to get in touch, I hadn't heard you'd woken up."

"What?"

Something about that phrasing made the dread I'd been trying to suppress stir inside me.

This was the modern world. Humanity had prospered so much that even global community seemed too small a phrase for it.

With Magic added to the advanced technology we already possessed, civilization had risen from the ashes of the Great Cataclysm brighter than at any other point in human history.

And yet…

The last time he managed to get in touch?

For a moment, I couldn't make sense of it.

Magic Johnson was a Grand Mage. One of only three masters of Magic among billions of people—no, only two now.

True, as a War Mage, most of his Magic was geared toward combat. But a Grand Mage could turn imagination into reality. One teleportation spell could carry him hundreds, even thousands, of kilometers.[3904] Given the right conditions, he could contact someone just as far away whenever he wanted.

So his choice of words wasn't merely strange. It was ominous.

He sounded like a signalman who'd barely managed to reach his allies through a broken radio.

Everything about this was telling me the same thing.

It was finally time to face reality.

"Johnson."

"Yeah?"

"When was that last contact?"

"Well…"

Magic Johnson trailed off. Then, as if something had just occurred to him, he turned to the Skeleton King beside him.

"Could it be…?"

The Skeleton King muttered as though making an excuse.

"Damn it. I didn't have time to tell you."

"…Shit."

"I couldn't have told you, either."

More precisely, I hadn't been able to bring myself to ask.

I'd been that afraid. That scared.

How long?

What had happened while I was gone? How much time had passed?

I let out a quiet, trembling breath. Magic Johnson looked at me and sighed deeply.

"Fuck."

It hurt to tell me. It would hurt to hear it.

But putting it off would only make it worse.

"Tell me. Right now."

And the very next moment, the answer I'd been waiting for came from over Magic Johnson's shoulder.

"The last contact was a day ago. Twenty-one hours ago, to be exact."

Team Leader Choi.

[3904] 100 km is about 62 mi; 1,000 km is about 620 mi.

Monster blood and bits of flesh had dried on his armor and sword. His gaze was drier than sand, and it pierced me like an awl.

“The first contact was three hours before that.”

Twenty-four hours. One day.

The numbers leaving Team Leader Choi’s lips seemed to grow thousands of times heavier, crushing my chest. My vision went white—whiter than all the flashes Magic Johnson had unleashed on the monsters combined.

No way.

A difference in the flow of time far beyond any ratio we’d seen before.

But that wasn’t all.

Even before Team Leader Choi spoke again, I knew instinctively that a crueler truth was coming.

“And…”

In the vast silence pressing down around us, he drew a deep breath. His voice trembled as he continued.

“Today is the tenth day since you lost consciousness.”

“…!”

At that moment—

Dum, dum, dum.

A war drum sounded, low and ominous. Before my eyes appeared a new kind of System window, unlike any I’d seen in Murim.

> System A trigger has activated due to the failure of the Main Quest, Cataclysm.
>
> Mission: Prevent the Summoning (Failed)
>
> You defeated the “Final Abyss” Doppelganger, but did not complete the mission.
>
> As a result of the Main Quest’s failure, the boundary of the Demon Realm has partially opened. Unknown beings are invading this world.
>
> A rift is in progress. Its progress will change when certain conditions are met and can be checked through the System.

The words were the same ones that had been etched clearly in my last memory of the modern world.

But a new holographic window appeared over them, bearing the name of a being I’d never seen or heard of.

> System An unknown being willingly answers the summoning.

> The immense shadow of Black Dragon Duke Morgoth has fallen over this world.
>
> Would you like to view the new Main Quest, Rift and Collapse?

Frozen like a statue, I suddenly remembered.

The enormous wings I'd seen in that meaningless nightmare on my last night in Murim.

The dragon's roar, shaking the sky swallowed by darkness.

The man was black as pitch.

His hair reached his calves, and his eyes looked as though they'd been set with obsidian. The only part of him that wasn't black was his irises. They shone silver, whiter than white, and were captivating enough to make anyone feel as though they might be drawn in.

Anyone, that is, except the old man calmly watching him enter his office.

Step. Step.

Footsteps echoed in the silence.

The man crossed the long carpet. Only when he came right up to the old man did the old man speak.

"You have no manners."

The man answered with a look, and the old man went on.

"A guest should wipe his shoes before coming in. You've dirtied the carpet."

"Ah."

At the man's soft exclamation, something stirred in the old man's chest. If not for the blood and scraps of human flesh scattered along his path, the old man might even have taken an immense liking to him.

"My apologies. I'm still a little clumsy with things like this."

The man smiled gently and offered his hand. Despite what he'd just said, the movement was perfectly natural.

"Ah, have I got it wrong again? I was told this is how you do things."

The man tilted his head. After a moment's silence, the old man replied.

"No. I was only surprised by how practiced you are. Your appearance, too—and that handshake."

The movement was more than natural. It carried grace and elegance. And the man himself might well have been the most beautiful human being in the world.

But the old man knew better.

He had seen with his own eyes what the man before him had done barely ten minutes earlier: erased his beloved Red Square with a single gesture.

“So, Morgoth. What brings you here?”

Vladimir Furin, Russia’s dictator, gritted his teeth as he clasped the hand of the monster wearing a human face.

Chapter 1150

A handshake.

Two people reaching out and clasping hands—the most common greeting in the world.

Yet the moment their hands met, Vladimir Furin felt as though every handshake he'd exchanged in his life, tens of thousands of them, had vanished from his mind.

"…!"

Cold. Hard.

Steel?

No.

The man—no, Morgoth's hand closed around his as if it were made of a substance that had never existed in this world. Then it began to move slowly up and down.

Carefully, as though handling an ant in his palm.

When the brief handshake ended, a satisfied smile touched the monster's lips.

"Just as I thought. The humans of this world are fascinating."

A short remark, but there was a great deal in it.

Furin wondered if he'd heard correctly, then opened his mouth.

"What… do you mean?"

"Do I really need to explain?"

Morgoth settled into the seat across from him and looked over the objects on the table with curious eyes.

"An astonishing civilization, no matter how many times I see it. The humans in the world where I once stayed could never have dreamed of anything like this."

"…!"

"I didn't expect that reaction. Surely you already suspected there might be another world out there, like the Demon Realm."

Morgoth was right.

Since the Great Cataclysm, countries around the world had quietly conducted countless studies into whether other worlds existed apart from the Demon Realm. The research was still ongoing.

But suspicion was one thing. Certainty was another.

Morgoth had just confirmed the existence of another world—something that had been no more than a hypothesis.

And he'd told Furin where he came from.

Could it be?

Furin wondered if the monster before him might be more than a creature mad with bloodlust.

If that were true, there was a very real chance they might still be able to contain the nightmare that had been unfolding for the past ten days, even at this late hour.

“Then you—no, sir. Did you come from the other world you mentioned?”

Morgoth answered readily.

“Perhaps. Perhaps not.”

“What does that mean?”

“I told you. I said I once stayed there.”

“Then…”

“The humans of that world had their interesting qualities, of course. But with time, everything grew dull. I needed a change. Something powerful and decisive.”

Furin’s eyes widened as he grasped what Morgoth meant. Morgoth smiled gently at him.

“So I left. For the Demon Realm.”

“…!”

“Entering someone else’s service wasn’t especially pleasant, but in the end, it was an excellent choice. I’ve had the chance to experience such an interesting game, after all. Don’t you agree?”

At that moment, the hope burning in Furin like a tiny campfire went out without a trace.

“…A game?”

“Yes. A game.”

“Then everything you’ve done up to now was this grand game of yours?”

Morgoth sighed softly at the unmistakable tremor in Furin’s voice.

“Humans really are human.”

“What?”

“Good heavens, a game? Don’t judge me by such a base way of thinking. That was merely punishment.”

“Punishment? What are you—”

“Ignorance is a sin, too. If they had bowed down and obeyed from the start, none of it would have happened. But they rejected my generous offer, and I had no choice but to give them a fitting punishment. That’s all.”

At last, Furin understood how much darkness—how much madness—the being before him held inside.

A game? Punishment?

Neither was right.

What Morgoth had done was a catastrophe. A massacre on a scale unseen since the Great Cataclysm ended.

There had been several major incidents since the Arch Lich appeared about a year ago, but they were nothing compared with the past ten days.

The estimated number of dead and injured had already reached fifty million.

The Middle East—more precisely, North Africa and West Asia—had already become a land of death with the Black Dragon's arrival.

Those who resisted were slowly rotting or had become undead. Those who survived had sworn absolute obedience and become slaves.

Not Hunters chosen by God. Not even heavily armed armies.

None of them could break the Black Dragon's massive wings.

This world already belonged to him.

"You're insane. Completely insane," Vladimir Furin muttered weakly.

Then Morgoth's smile deepened.

"Insane? Me?"

"Are you going to deny it? After killing so many people?"

"Of course not. I'm simply disappointed beyond words."

The Black Dragon's abyssal eyes fixed on the dictator as though they could pierce straight through him.

"How can someone like you dare to say that?"

"…!"

"Of course, I understand to some extent. I know from experience how shallow humans can be—and how wealth and power corrupt you. But…"

Ting.

A long, pale finger tapped the teapot. Inside, the black tea once regarded as practically synonymous with Furin rippled.

"Spare me the half-baked hypocrisy. It's an insult to my intelligence."

"You—you…"

"Yes, I already know a great deal. Though it would be more accurate to say I learned it through you."

Morgoth had lived for an immensely long time. Longer than anyone could imagine.

Yet even to him, the modern world of the twenty-first century was fascinating.

Human history. The fusion of Magic and technology. The structures and ideologies of governments.

And the countless conflicts, large and small, that had taken root all over the world as a result.

This civilization was unlike anything he had seen before, and it stirred his thirst for knowledge. His mind, which knew neither forgetfulness nor limits, absorbed everything he saw and heard in an instant.

That included information about a certain dictator who ruled the largest territory in the world.

"I found you impressive. In more ways than one."

Vladimir Furin felt himself grow strangely calm.

The monster before him—a living calamity, a Dragon—already knew everything about him.

No, perhaps even more than Furin could imagine.

Whether Morgoth had learned it while laying waste to the Middle East and other parts of the world, or from the contents of a palm-sized smartphone, no longer mattered.

All that remained were fate and choice.

And so the old dictator of the Russian Federation finally took off the mask of hypocrisy he'd worn to the very end.

"So? Did you come here for my autograph?"

"Oh, you've grown rather composed."

"I have no reason to feel ashamed."

"Good. Now I feel my visit was worthwhile."

Morgoth regarded Furin with amusement.

"Then I'll get straight to the point. Surrender."

"Become a slave?"

"Well, this world has a fine word for it: citizen."

"But they're slaves in all but name. Everyone knows what happened to those who surrendered to you."

"Then this should be easy. You must also know that countless humans survived thanks to their peaceful, wise decision to surrender."

"You still don't understand humans very well. We don't call scraping by from one day to the next like ants living. And we certainly don't want to be raised like livestock behind a fence, only to be slaughtered."

It was a shameful thing for a dictator to say after spending more than fifty years in power devoted to control and oppression. Furin didn't care in the slightest.

His shrewd eyes gleamed as he continued.

"I trust that's answer enough. So let me ask again. Why did you really come here?"

"What?"

"I've wondered about it all along. Why would someone like you go to this much trouble? And before you answer, spare me any nonsense about it being a game."

Furin picked up a cigar laid neatly on the table and lit it. He stared straight at Morgoth through the slowly rising smoke.

"Talking to you has only made it harder to understand. You regard humans as livestock or ants, yet you're trying your hand at diplomacy and negotiation? Whatever your true intentions, I don't believe it."

Different species could still follow the same path.

In that respect, Vladimir Furin thought he and Morgoth were rather alike.

They were rulers.

The gulf between them might be as wide as heaven and earth, but Morgoth, too, must have used his overwhelming power to rule over countless others as a tyrant.

And as far as Furin knew, someone with overwhelming power had no need for conversation.

Shamelessness became a natural virtue, while shame turned into something as old and musty as a grandfather's letter forgotten in a drawer.

If that was true of a mere human like him, how much more so of a Dragon whose very understanding of the world was different?

Besides, Morgoth wasn't the first Dragon to set foot in this world.

"One of your kind reduced Paris to ashes during the Great Cataclysm. It was more vicious and merciless than any other monster."

Morgoth replied calmly.

"I think I know the one. A few of them are like that."

"A million people were killed or injured in the battle against it. A thousand Hunters led by no fewer than four S-ranks died alongside them."

Another monster, Michael Silbert, had been born where that Dragon fell—but that had only come to light recently.

With the cigar's tip evenly lit, Furin put it between his lips and added.

"So why would you, with power far greater than that young Dragon had, go to such lengths?"

Silence settled over them, but not for long.

The man he'd questioned might not answer. Furin already knew the answer anyway.

"You've realized it, too. You can't fight every human. No, more precisely…"

Furin exhaled a thick cloud of cigar smoke and smiled. The old dictator was ready to lose everything.

"You're afraid of someone you haven't found yet."

At that moment—

Click. Rrrrrumble.

As the small button that had been concealed in Furin's wrinkled hand was pressed, a tremendous rumble rose from deep beneath the Kremlin.

Chapter 1151

The moment he activated the secret device that only one person in the world was permitted to use, Vladimir Furin thought:

This is as far as I go.

Was he reluctant to let go of life? Afraid of death?

Of course he was.

The more a person had, the harder it was to let go. That was human nature. And for a man who had ruled as a dictator for nearly half a century, there was no need to ask.

He wanted to live.

He had to live.

He had to raise the name Vladimir Furin to the level of a god.

He had to become greater than the tsars, who had ruled this land for generations by virtue of their noble blood, and greater even than the Iron Marshal,[3905] against whom no one had dared rebel.

But if that proved impossible—

If someone else appeared and tried to take everything he had built—

I'll burn it all down. With my own hands, so no one else can have it.

The old dictator, who had dreamed of immortality, smiled faintly.

Or rather, he tried to.

Time slowed, stretching out like a passing life flashing before his eyes. Then he saw the looter wearing a vivid smile.

"You really are an interesting human."

"…!"

Furin's shrewd eyes widened.

Rrrrrumble.

The enormous rumble, as if it would swallow the Kremlin—or Moscow itself—drew closer.

Slowly. Deliberately.

As though it moved at someone's will.

At last, Vladimir Furin saw the source of this unexpected phenomenon with his own eyes.

Wooooom.

Would thousands—tens of thousands—of bees swarming together sound like this?

Furin could only stare blankly at the vortex of flames rising through the melting floor of his office.

[3905] "Iron Marshal" alludes to Joseph Stalin; his adopted name derives from the Russian word for "steel."

Everything was red. Everything was hot.

Surrounded by an aura as dark as pitch, it had been compressed into a great sphere that blazed like a tiny sun.

And the old dictator, staring at it in shock, knew better than anyone that “tiny sun” was no exaggeration.

He also knew that a power once great enough to terrify the entire world was now in the grasp of the monster smiling at him.

Tsar Bomba.

The most powerful weapon in human history.

The mother and emperor of all bombs.

Only a handful of people involved knew that the most powerful hydrogen bomb of the Cold War—the one that had frozen the five oceans and six continents with fear—lay sleeping deep beneath the Kremlin.

They also knew that decades of secret experiments, carried out on the dictator’s orders, had given it a new name and destructive power far beyond what it had possessed before.

“Remarkable. Truly remarkable. To think you humans created power like this. What do you call this weapon?”

At Morgoth’s genuine expression of awe, Furin—sensing that everything was over—answered in a hollow voice.

“Vladimir.”

“What?”

Morgoth looked from the old dictator, already all but fallen, to the catastrophic power bearing his name. Then he laughed aloud.

“That’s a masterpiece. Or should I say, very like you?”

Morgoth found it truly amusing.

That a human granted barely a hundred years could harbor such enormous ambitions.

And that these mere mortals had tried to kill him, a being with power close to immortality, using a weapon they had made.

“Did you think this alone could bring me down? With Magic Gems taken from lowly monsters, you dare challenge me?”

At Morgoth’s words, as though he had already seen through everything, Furin quietly swallowed.

He was right. Tsar Bomba—or rather, the weapon now called Vladimir—was not merely a product of science.

The Great Cataclysm.

After that event had overturned the world’s common sense and order, one thought had taken root in the mind of the dictator who had barely survived.

I have to become stronger. So this can never happen again. So we can win any war.

And the means were close at hand.

Magic and Magic Gems. The new knowledge born from them: magical engineering.

And so Tsar Bomba became Vladimir.

As one of the world's great powers—and a dictatorship at that—Russia had countless ways to obtain Magic Gems for the experiments.

Of course, that meant violating more international treaties than anyone could count and killing even his own scientists and mages to keep everything secret…but what did that matter?

Mother Russia.

Russia—or rather, he—had to become greater still.

Even if a second Demon King descended, he and Russia alone had to survive and rewrite the world order.

Or die together.

Yes.

That was how it had to be.

Plop.

Ash fell away in clumps.

Despite decades of not smoking, Furin had managed only a few drags from the cigar. He stared at it blankly, then spoke.

"What are you going to do now?"

Morgoth didn't answer.

But Furin immediately understood the meaning behind the gentle curve of his lips.

"Right. It has nothing to do with me anymore."

The cigar trembled.

No—it was Furin himself who was shaking.

"Any last words?"

At Morgoth's kind offer, Furin raised a hand that shook like a leaf and brought the cigar to his lips.

He drew deeper than he ever had before, then blew the smoke toward the monster before him.

"No. But there's one thing I have to tell you."

He spoke the name of the man who had crossed his mind just before he activated the bomb bearing his own name.

"If Jin comes back, you're finished."

At that moment—

"I look forward to it. Truly."

Swoooosh.

With Morgoth's calm reply, the pitch-black aura restraining the catastrophic power slowly dispersed and enveloped its master.

Like the touch of death announcing the end of this land.

Whoosh.

A blinding flash swallowed the old, wretched dictator's final sight.

It was warm.

Eight meters[3906] long. Two meters[3907] in diameter. Twenty-seven tons.[3908]

Packed into a volume that could fill a large truck was the destructive power of fifty megatons[3909]—fifty million tons of TNT.

Those were the publicly known figures for Tsar Bomba.

It had enough power to make Little Boy, the bomb that turned Hiroshima into a land of death during World War II, seem like a little boy indeed.

But no one had expected it.

No one had expected this monster from a bygone era, born of the Cold War's displays of power, to awaken again more than eighty years later.

And no one had expected the monster's first cry after its long sleep to ring out from the Kremlin.

Gooooom.

The air trembled in an instant.

Everyone in the Kremlin—or rather, everyone in Moscow—felt that deep, ominous rumble.

The soldiers and Hunters holding their posts despite their fear. The citizens who had rushed into bomb shelters or out onto the streets when Red Square collapsed.

No one was spared.

Everyone felt it, and everyone instinctively understood.

This was the last moment they would ever draw breath.

And then—

Whoooosh.

There was light.

A terrible heat beyond human perception, atomic power mingled with potent energy drawn from countless Magic Gems—it all spread out, devouring everything in its path.

Endlessly. Greedily.

[3906] Eight meters is about 26 ft.
[3907] Two meters is about 6.6 ft.
[3908] Twenty-seven metric tons is about 60,000 lb.
[3909] Fifty megatons of TNT is an explosive-energy equivalent of about 55 million US tons of TNT.

Kraaaaaash!

In the storm of power, everything melted.

The living died. The lifeless lost their shape.

Underground or aboveground, whatever life they had lived—it didn't matter.

The blinding light that burst from the Kremlin made everyone equal.

Just as Icarus had lost his wings and fallen when he flew too close to the sun, the tiny sun born of a dictator's ambition and fear swallowed countless lives, including his own.

All of them, save one.

Rrrrrumble.

At the heart of the rumbling that shook everything around him, Morgoth lifted his head and surveyed the scene he had created.

Nothing remained.

Everything that had surrounded him just minutes earlier was gone.

Molten metal flowed in rivers. Above it rose a massive mushroom cloud, looming over the surface now transformed into a land of death.

It was quite a sight.

"Such power. I didn't even need to use Breath."

Morgoth felt both admiration and regret.

How could mortals be so greedy and yet so foolish?

They had saved him a great deal of trouble, but the place now shadowed by calamity was desolate beyond measure.

A city with a long history and a population of over ten million had become a land where nothing could live for hundreds of years.

"But birth awakens from within death."

The moment Morgoth spread both hands with those quiet words—

Pop.

The air stopped. The wind stopped.

And the Magic Gem energy that had swept across the city with a deadliness greater than radiation changed in response to his will.

Darker than before. Purer still.

Wooooom.

Dragon.

Great beings blessed by mana from the moment of their birth.

Morgoth had been revered as the strongest among them, yet in the end he had chosen corruption of his own accord. At his fingertips, space trembled.

Gathering. Compacting. Rising.

And at last—

Rrrrrumble.

It was built.

A gigantic castle unlike anything ever seen in this world.

His own kingdom.

In place of concrete and marble, it stood upon pitch-black earth amid air saturated with dense magical power. It was overwhelming, yet beautiful. Morgoth smiled as he gazed at its spire piercing the clouds.

Or, more precisely, at the camera lens of the drone hidden in the thick black clouds, watching him.

“Have you seen it, humans?”

That day, people all over the world saw it.

They watched Moscow disappear and a Dragon Lair come into being.

The calamity that had reached their doorstep.

Chapter 1152

There are no absolute secrets in modern society.

Cameras and the internet are everywhere, carrying countless pieces of information across the world.

And sometimes, a truth is better left unknown.

Like a Pandora's box that should never have been opened.

—KABOOOOOM!

With one last terrible roar—more than the speakers could fully convey—the screen went black.

The viewers watching a famous influencer's livestream from near the Kremlin knew instinctively what had happened. The stream had just passed one hundred million simultaneous viewers, making internet-broadcasting history. And they would never see the influencer behind that record again.

After several seconds of stillness, a single line appeared in the chat. It said enough about everything they had seen and felt over the past half hour.

> └ Oh, God.

A Dragon's wings crossing the skies above Moscow. Red Square vanishing without a trace.

The creature taking human form, just like them, then slaughtering the Hunters and soldiers who stood in its way as it strode into the Kremlin.

And then…

The calamity that engulfed Moscow.

Rrrrrumble!

The rumble traveled hundreds, even thousands of kilometers.[3910] It reached far beyond the rectangular screen and shook the world.

Countless eyes and ears—and even more cameras—caught the distant flash and the enormous mushroom cloud. The footage was quickly compiled into a single video and uploaded to the internet.

Its title captured the overwhelming shock and despair humanity felt at the news from Moscow.

—Where is God?

Where was God?

No one could answer.

No one.

[3910] One kilometer is about 0.62 mi; 100 km is about 62 mi, and 1,000 km is about 620 mi.

All they could do was hope desperately.

If God had truly abandoned them, perhaps someone else would appear to save them.

No.

Perhaps he would wake from his deep sleep as soon as possible.

And unlike God, too far away for their voices to reach, the savior of this new age answered their pleas before long.

“He has returned.”

At those first words from the flushed fifty-seventh President of the United States on the holographic TV, the whole world erupted once more.

The modern world meant something special to me.

It was where I’d been born and raised. A home I could never forget.

That was why I’d always loved it.

Compared to Murim, where danger and trouble lurked around every corner, I could rest here in relative peace.

But when had that started to change?

Like a broken gear, everything had begun to slip out of place.

And it happened faster, with consequences more terrible, than I could ever have imagined.

“So…”

What the hell was I supposed to say?

I kept trying to think, muttering words that meant nothing, but my mind had gone completely blank. Nothing came to me.

The hour-long video had just ended.

I stared silently at the black-haired man smiling at the camera in the paused holographic footage.

I wanted someone to break the heavy silence.

“I hear it happened three hours ago.”

At Magic Johnson’s low, subdued voice, the question I’d been holding back slipped past my dry lips.

“How many casualties?”

“…”

“Tell me. I’m prepared for it.”

Magic Johnson let out a quiet sigh.

“More than twenty million, even by the lowest estimate.”

“Shit.”

"Moscow, and the surrounding cities in the metropolitan area, were swept away. We've thrown every resource we have at investigating, but…"

He trailed off and bit his lip.

"There are no signs of life. They're probably all dead."

Erasure.

The word flashed through my mind. It was the most accurate way to describe what had happened.

"Vladimir. That fucking old man hid a hydrogen bomb in the Kremlin."

At the start of the Great Cataclysm, humanity learned two important things.

First:

No matter how tight the security, modern science couldn't stop teleportation magic.

Second:

Teleportation magic could move objects, not just people.

Objects like tactical nuclear weapons or hydrogen bombs.

That was why every nuclear-armed country in the world, led by the United States and Russia, had signed an international treaty and disposed of all weapons above a certain yield.

Or so we'd been told.

Until three hours ago, when a giant mushroom cloud filled the sky above Moscow.

"Russia is finished."

That was true.

For every other country, though, this was a beginning of another kind. A crossroads.

Resist to the bitter end?

Or surrender now and stay alive?

Black Dragon Duke Morgoth.

I repeated the name in my mind as I stared at the holographic screen.

On the land, blackened by magical power, a gigantic castle towered behind him. I took in his smiling face and burned it into my heart.

Can I defeat him?

The question came to me naturally. I realized my hand had clenched into a fist.

Dragon.

The unprecedented monster whose single appearance in the past had shaken the entire world.

But as his title, Black Dragon Duke, suggested, Morgoth was no ordinary Dragon.

He's strong. Horrifyingly strong.

I turned to the dozens of holographic screens filling the spacious monitor room and looked from one to the next.

A predator brought down a forest of skyscrapers with one flap of its wings, shrugged off a barrage of magic, and trampled Hunters underfoot.

Among those dying with one last scream were faces I knew.

“Die! Just die!”

On a crackling screen, a bloodied woman screamed.

Her lower body had already been crushed beyond recognition. Her abdomen was split open, her entrails spilling out.

Still, at the rear of her retreating allies, she drew her bow as if possessed.

She kept drawing until the Dragon’s claws came at her faster than an arrow and took both her arms.

Crunch!

Blood spurted along with the severed flesh.

A deep shadow fell across her face, twisted with unbearable pain.

“You foolish human. Didn’t you know this would happen?”

The Black Dragon’s question rang down from high above. She spat up bloody phlegm and answered.

“I did.”

“Then why?”

“Because we were taught to call this courage. Not foolishness.”

“Good. Then, brave human, would you follow me even now?”

“Fuck off, you monster. And…”

She grinned, baring her blood-soaked teeth.

“My name is Faye Chen. Not just human. Faye Chen.”

“I’ll remember that, human.”

“You’d better. Soon, someone incredible is going to come looking for you and ask about that name. Ask about… the name…”

Her voice faded. Then her ragged breathing stopped.

Her unfocused eyes stared into empty space.

The woman—no, Faye Chen—died just like that.

Hong Kong’s pride. An S-rank Hunter, a hero of the last Great Cataclysm, and my friend.

She had died a week ago.

How about we all grab a drink?

The memory came back to me.

The day we first met in Sichuan to hunt the Arch Lich, she’d suggested we go drinking. When I asked why it had to be that day, she answered:

Today's the kind of day you drink.

Huh?

It might be our last chance.

That day, we drank until we could barely stand.

Neither of us thought it really would be our last drink together.

"She was a good person."

A voice broke into my thoughts.

Rough and gravelly, it was different from Magic Johnson's deep voice.

"And a great Hunter."

I didn't ask who the unwelcome guest was.

The acrid smell of cigar smoke had slipped in before the monitor room door even opened, telling me who it was.

"Her sacrifice saved a lot of lives. Including one bastard who came back alive in disgrace."

Chuck Hagel.

Also known as Uncle Chuck, he approached slowly and put a hand on my shoulder.

With his right arm—the only one he had left.

"As soon as I woke up, I thought I should've died instead of Faye Chen."

"…Hagel."

"I know. It's meaningless bullshit. And I've repeated it hundreds—no, thousands of times by now."

Chuck Hagel exhaled cigar smoke and smiled bitterly.

He looked at the familiar faces and the deaths playing over and over on the dozens of holographic screens.

"I swore I'd never let anything like that happen again… Yet here we are."

What was I supposed to say?

No. What right did I have to say anything?

Whenever I needed them, they came running without hesitation. But when they needed me, I hadn't been there.

I hadn't stopped Morgoth's summoning. I hadn't realized soon enough that the axis of time had shifted.

And this was the result.

Ten days of indiscriminate destruction and death.

The weight of it all pressed down on my chest, more than I could bear.

Along with the anger roiling deep in my gut like lava.

"You know what?"

I let out the breath I'd been holding.

Reason and emotion tangled together. Then my mind went cold.

Before my eyes, Faye Chen died once more.

“From now on, I won’t let anyone else be sacrificed.”

I stared at her on the screen, my eyes burning.

At her warning Morgoth, with what little breath she had left, that someone was coming for him.

Yes.

That was exactly what would happen.

Chapter 1153

Everyone dies.

No matter how much wealth and fame a person amasses—more than anyone else in the world—or how strong their body and mind become, until they're called superhuman, they can never escape the shadow of death.

That was why we had no choice but to accept, however painfully, the news that our close companions had died.

No. We had to.

The reality before us was too horrific to let ourselves be swept away by emotion.

"…That concludes the meeting."

The lights came on with the presenter's exhausted voice, but the heavy silence pressing down on the room didn't disperse so easily.

Not until someone who had kept silent throughout the meeting finally spoke.

"Rest is important, isn't it? Especially at a time like this."

It was a simple remark, but everyone understood what he meant.

Anyone who couldn't read the room that well wouldn't have been here in the first place.

"I can finally breathe a little."

Once the conference room had mostly emptied, a middle-aged man walked over to the coffee machine in one corner and glanced at me.

"Would you like a cup, Mr. Jin?"

His hair was greasy and disheveled, and dark circles ringed his eyes. He looked like an office worker worn down by exhaustion. I shook my head.

"No, thank you, Mr. Presi—"

"You can just call me Donny."

"Sure. Donny."

At my matter-of-fact reply, Donald Doramp Jr., the fifty-seventh President of the United States, smiled faintly.

Even that was a forced smile. It appeared for a moment, then vanished without a trace.

Of course it did.

My eyes drifted to the hologram still hanging in the air. Its catastrophic figures were enough to wipe the smile from even a thoroughly jaded politician's face.

"When I first received the report at the White House, I thought, Is this a dream?"

He downed a cup of coffee heavily laced with potion and continued.

"To be honest, I still think that sometimes. I keep hoping all of this is one goddamn nightmare."

But it was real. The figures in the reports hadn't leveled off; they'd climbed higher every day.

Property damage in the tens of quadrillions. Tens of millions dead or injured, and even more refugees. The whole world was in a panic.

"That's why I had to announce as soon as possible that you'd returned."

As he said, the international community had moved quickly.

The UN Security Council, led by its permanent members, had immediately issued an emergency statement. News that I'd returned after going missing in the Middle East spread around the world before I'd even arrived here at the Pentagon.

"Some people thought it was too soon to make the announcement while we were still discussing it. But given the circumstances, we had no choice. If we made the wrong call—"

"No. You didn't."

I waved off the President's apology.

Because it was too late to take the announcement back?

That was part of it, of course.

But if the news of my return hadn't gotten out, people would have been swept into an even more uncontrollable maelstrom.

Disaster, after all, takes root in fear and confusion.

And the seed of that disaster had already blossomed, thanks to an unprecedented monster: Black Dragon Duke Morgoth.

"Jin, I've dealt with countless matters of national importance in my twelve years as President of the United States. But one issue has always come before all the others."

I knew the answer before he could continue.

Ever since Demon King Asmodeus descended upon this world, every country had been facing the same problem.

"The war against monsters."

Donald nodded at my words, spoken almost under my breath.

"That's right. Dealing with the Gates that remained after the Great Cataclysm—and preparing for the possibility of a second one—have been our highest priorities."

He stared silently at his empty coffee cup, then added weakly, "And those preparations failed. Or, more precisely…"

"Something appeared that was too strong for us to handle, even though we'd prepared for it. I understand."

Morgoth was that powerful.

Even if what I'd seen on the video wasn't the full extent of his strength, no Named Monster that had appeared since the Great Cataclysm could compare to him.

Except one.

Demon King Asmodeus, the absolute evil called not merely a calamity, but the end of the world.

And besides…

"But those preparations could only be complete with him, couldn't they?"

Donald nodded gravely.

"That's right. Our plan lost its strength when Sky fell into a coma."

Sky. Cheon Taemin.

If two atomic bombs had brought World War II to an end, Cheon Taemin had saved all of humanity by fighting his way through the Great Cataclysm.

Right. Just as the Martial God did.

I swallowed the words on the tip of my tongue. Donald continued.

"But Sky's absence isn't our only problem. Morgoth's power is a calamity in itself… but there's something about him that sets him apart from every other monster."

Once again, I knew the answer.

"Diplomacy."

"So you've noticed it too."

"I've dealt with enough monsters to be sick of them."

Just as I couldn't count every meal I'd eaten in my life, I couldn't count the monsters I'd brought down since my days as an F-rank Hunter.

So I knew.

Regardless of how intelligent or powerful they were, monsters were born with an instinct to kill.

If anything, the stronger they were, the more they wanted to crush everything beneath them. They tried to settle everything with overwhelming force.

Of course, there were exceptions.

The Skeleton King, who wasn't here, was one. The Doppelganger whose actions had led to Morgoth's summoning had even infiltrated human society long ago and worked in secret.

But Morgoth was different.

He wasn't merely bluffing or trying to deceive anyone. He offered surrender in earnest, and if people accepted, he guaranteed their survival.

A monster that keeps its promises.

And that had caused greater division than ever.

"Twenty-three countries have already surrendered to Morgoth. Along with the Arab League, which suffered the heaviest losses, several major South American countries have given up resisting."

"The Middle East has more or less fallen, but South America too?"

"What happened in Moscow had a huge impact. We tried to control the situation, but we couldn't stop the news from spreading."

Disaster breeds fear, and fear leads to fractures.

Faced with the most powerful desire of all—survival—people were crumbling one after another.

“Something similar happened early in the Great Cataclysm, but this is different. Everyone’s shaken.”

The reason humanity had managed to win the Great Cataclysm was simpler than you might think.

They united.

Ironically, it was their enemy, Asmodeus, who made that possible.

He truly lived up to the title of Demon King.

He killed those who resisted and those who surrendered.

He burned down cities and overturned mountains and seas.

Compromise? Promises?

To him, that would have been like a cockroach he’d found in his house one day pledging obedience in exchange for living there alongside him.

And so humanity had fought back with all its strength, united in purpose.

Fortunately, they’d had a savior in Cheon Taemin. They’d had no other choice.

But Morgoth kept his promises. Unlike Asmodeus.

He took human form and followed human ways.

For those who resisted, he offered devastating destruction and death. For those who surrendered, he guaranteed survival.

Like a cruel conqueror from the Middle Ages.

“If you hadn’t appeared when you did, I might be signing a goddamn surrender document right now.”

President Doramp smiled bitterly, but I couldn’t smile. My thoughts were racing.

I appeared in time? Me?

I didn’t know.

What if I hadn’t lost consciousness after defeating the Blood Lord?

If I’d woken up even a day earlier—or tried to log out just a few hours sooner…

Drip.

Blood drops fell, one after another. It was running from between my fingers where I’d clenched my fist without realizing it. After a brief silence, President Doramp spoke.

“Jin, it’s already happened. And nobody blames you. While you were gone, the rest of us were at our posts, and we still couldn’t stop Morgoth.”

I knew.

Ever since I’d gained powers unlike anyone else’s, I’d struggled at every turn. And as a result, I’d saved countless lives.

But the sudden surges of anger and self-blame still refused to fade.

They probably won't go away even after this is over.

People called me the savior of a new age, but I was human, just like them.

I fixated on what I'd lost instead of what I had, and feared the danger that was coming.

And that danger was closer than I thought.

"Mr. President!"

An aide rushed into the conference room. Behind him, I saw familiar faces.

Every one of them wore a tight expression, their eyes downcast.

The air froze in an instant. At the aide's touch, a holographic video sprang into the air.

Pop.

Through the constant crackle of static, a scene from tens of thousands of kilometers away[3911] filled the vast conference room.

A Dragon Lair rose over the blackened earth once known as Moscow, blocking everyone's view.

[3911] 10,000 kilometers is about 6,200 miles.

Chapter 1154

Everything in my field of vision was dark and murky.

The magical power that had erased even the radioactive fallout drifted as a blackish fog, and the walls, arranged in the shape of a pentagram, towered like mountains.

And—

Gooooooong.

At the center of it all stood that bastard.

Black Dragon Duke Morgoth.

KWAaaaaa!

In an instant split into ever smaller fractions, the gigantic black dragon opened its jaws, and an explosion of magical power burst forth.

A pitch-black pillar shot up from the highest spire and stretched endlessly onward.

It pierced the clouds and cleaved the sky in two, as if it meant to reach the distant moon.

No—maybe it really could.

It was the breath of the most powerful living creature in the world, and a roar filled with rage.

Dragon Breath…!

I barely managed to suppress the groan rising in my throat.

It was only a video, but the tremor and the atmosphere it conveyed were enough to awaken my instincts.

This was different.

I could say with certainty that it was on an entirely different level from any Breath I'd ever seen or experienced.

My heart was suddenly pounding wildly. The fine hairs all over my body stood on end, and the blood in my veins felt cold as ice. Together, they bore witness and passed judgment.

The One-Eyed Black Wyvern that had left me with an indelible trauma years ago.

The Water God Dragon of Dongting Lake, corrupted and driven mad by magical power.

Even Michael Silbert, who had made a Dragon Heart his own.

None of them had ever unleashed a Breath that powerful.

Perhaps it was the difference in their species itself, combined with the weight of power amassed over countless years.

So this is a Dragon.

Its terrifying power felt more real than a mere hologram. I couldn't help but shudder—and neither could anyone else in the conference room.

We even forgot to ask the obvious question: Why had Morgoth fired a Dragon Breath into empty space?

But the next moment—

Fwaaaash.

As I watched the sky turn pitch-black, I suddenly understood Morgoth's true purpose.

Rrrrrumble.

With a deafening roar, countless dark clouds surged in, covering the moon and stars. Then, like ink spreading through water, they took over the skies above Moscow for thousands of kilometers.[3912]

Like a single line dividing the world.

And the place where the abyss had settled resembled another world beyond our dimension, one humanity had only ever imagined.

The source and beginning of this entire calamity.

The Demon Realm.

"..."

"..."

Was this what it felt like to be struck by lightning right on the crown of the head?

The air had frozen. Those who grasped the meaning of the static-riddled holographic footage could only stare, eyes wide, unable to speak.

They clenched their fists as if they might crush them, gritted their teeth, and watched with bloodshot eyes.

At the same time, we heard it.

The cry of the black dragon standing atop the highest spire, calling out to the pitch-black sky.

"ᚠᚾᚷᚹᛖᚱ ᚦᛖ ᚲᚠᚠ!"

The roar seemed to ring out not in my ears, but inside my head.

It was more than a sound; it reached the level of will. No one here—or anywhere in the world—could understand the mysterious language.

Except me.

"...Answer the call."

The words escaped me in a groan.

Shaaah.

The clouds, swirling like the eye of a typhoon, parted.

[3912] One thousand kilometers is about 620 mi.

The roar that had shaken heaven and earth vanished, along with the wind that had been raging like mad.

All noise disappeared in an instant. With even the air seemingly still, the world looked impossibly peaceful.

Until a dreadful wave of disaster poured through the gap in the clouds.

Krrrk—KWAaaaaa!

The empty space rippled.

No—it tore open.

Hundreds, thousands of Wyverns and Drakes poured toward the ground, their bright yellow eyes flashing. Countless monsters clung to their enormous bodies and wings.

When the Liches cast their spells in unison, the giant monsters plunging from high above like meteors drifted gently to the ground like feathers. Death Knights raced through the air on ghostly horses and led their legions across the vast ruins.

They roared with joy and bloodlust.

—GRAAAAAH!

Clang! Clang!

Countless weapons swayed like a field of reeds in the wind.

Thud. Thud. Rrrrrumble!

The giant monsters, each one like a small mountain, stamped their feet. Hundreds of Liches and Death Knights went down on one knee, while ten times as many dragonkin cut through the sky with savage beats of their wings.

All in reverence for the one being who had brought them into this world.

But the black dragon's eyes were fixed on the camera, not on the Gate in the clouds slowly closing above, nor on the hundreds of thousands of monsters gathered beneath it.

"On my soul and in my name, I, Morgoth, master of the Silver Mountains and Archduke of the Demon Realm, swear this to you humans:"

The moment my eyes met the monster's through the hologram, I realized something.

This video was Morgoth's declaration of war—and his demand for humanity's surrender.

"If you resist, I promise you an end more horrific than any you have ever seen. If you surrender, I promise complete peace and survival."

But—

"If you wish to survive, come to this land, reborn under my rule, and swear your loyalty."

Even so—

"But everything has its price."

I hadn’t seen everything coming.

“Three days from now, I will sit upon the throne here and gladly accept the tribute you offer as a token of our eternal pact.”

Just how cunning Morgoth was.

“Just two humans—a paltry price next to the lives of billions of your kind.”

What his true purpose was.

“Make them kneel before me.”

The dragon’s eyes flashed, black as obsidian and swirling like the abyss.

“Cheon Taemin and Jin Taekyung.”

At that moment—

Ding.

A System notification pierced my ears with a chill, and a holographic window only I could see appeared, blocking my view.

Humanity was already recovering its stability faster than the various international organizations had predicted—or perhaps even faster than that.

The footage of Moscow’s destruction was enough to plunge everyone into an abyss of shock and fear. Yet a single fact announced less than a few hours later was like a ladder of salvation to them.

> ㄴ He’s back. ㄴ Oh my God. Please tell me this isn’t a joke. ㄴ It’s true. Official UN announcement. Turn on the TV right now. It’s on every channel. ㄴ Holy shit, that’s incredible. I thought we were all done for. ㄴ What the hell happened? I’m glad he’s back, but why did he only show up after things got this bad? ㄴ Because while you were becoming Pornhub’s best customer, he was traveling the world and saving people. He already came close to dying in the Middle East. ㄴ I’m genuinely worried about you, so delete that stupid comment before the FBI shows up in about thirty minutes, breaks down your door, and kicks your fat ass. ㄴ What did I do wrong? I didn’t do anything wrong. ㄴ He’s got a point, actually. The poor guy’s only guilty of having a lower IQ than a dolphin. ㄴ Yeah, don’t be too hard on him. If you happen to run into him on the street, just put a shotgun round in him. ㄴ You motherfukcer, you wanna die? ㄴ Oh, our Korean friend is here. He’s so worked up he even made a typo. That guy won’t be able to play games properly anymore. Koreans never miss a target once they’ve locked on. ㄴ And the Korean who gives him a headshot will probably be a kid around twelve. ㄴ Anyway, the important thing is that we’re alive. ㄴ Right. He’s back.

People quickly found hope again.

Ever since Morgoth appeared, the internet message boards had been frozen, without so much as an ordinary joke. Now they were lively again.

Everyone knew who he was, even without anyone saying his name.

That was what Jin Taekyung meant to humanity now.

Stronger than anyone, impossibly devoted, and able to overcome whatever hardship came his way and prove himself in the end.

Some still called him a second Cheon Taemin, but most disagreed.

Jin Taekyung had become the savior of a new age, one who needed no grand description.

He had done more than fill the place left by the unconscious Cheon Taemin. He had made it his own, dealt with disasters across the world, and saved countless lives. Who could take his place?

That was why people felt relieved.

Jin Taekyung was back. Surely everything that had fallen into disarray would return to its proper place.

Just as he always had, he would step in and set things right.

But less than a day later, a warning reached the Pentagon and the rest of the world. Humanity understood all too well:

“ᚠᚾᚷᚹᛖᚱ ᚦᛖ ᚲᚠᚠ!”

How futile their brief hope was before the vast army that had invaded Earth through a Gate unlike any before it.

“But everything has its price.”

And how they were already listening to the monster’s sweet offer.

“Make them kneel before me.”

How cowardly the desire to survive could make them.

“Cheon Taemin and Jin Taekyung.”

Once again, the whole world was thrown into turmoil.

Some were enraged, while others kept their mouths firmly shut.

The former called for a fight to the death; the latter hid their opinions to avoid criticism.

But another half day passed.

Rrrrrumble!

At last, people saw footage of the monster army that had seized all of Russia and was advancing in every direction. They had no choice but to fall silent.

All thinking the same thing, though they couldn’t bring themselves to say it to anyone.

Chapter 1155

“Russia has officially declared its surrender. General Vasily Gerasimov, current Chief of the General Staff of the Russian Armed Forces and acting president since the Moscow catastrophe, has…”

Beep.

“Eastern European countries, particularly Ukraine and Belarus, which suffered severe damage from yesterday’s catastrophe in Moscow, are mobilizing all available forces along their borders…”

Beep.

“We now bring you an update on the current disaster. Over the past eleven days, the world has seen an average of more than four Monster Waves and around fifty Mutated Gate incidents every day.”

“That’s truly horrifying news. Amy, what about the magical power distribution?”

“I’m afraid I have bad news, Steve. Today’s magical power distribution rose by 2.8 points.”

“What?”

“Yes. A full 2.8 points. If you’re having trouble judging what that means, take a close look at this graphic.”

“Here, it says the daily increase was 5.0 points. What’s the problem, you ask? This graph shows how magical power distribution changed at the beginning of the Great Cataclysm.”

“In other words, we’ve caught up to more than half of the magical power levels from the Great Cataclysm. In the Middle East, where Monster Waves and Mutated Gate incidents have been occurring in particularly high numbers, it’s no exaggeration to say that a second Great Cataclysm has begun.”

“And on top of that, the situation around Moscow is already… I’m sure you all know. There’s only one thing I can say.”

“May God be with you.”

Beep.

“Breaking news. Morgoth has accepted Russia’s surrender. As of 16:30 South Standard Time, the Russian Federation will disarm completely and, like the twenty-odd countries that surrendered before it, retain its current system of government.”

“Meanwhile, a large number of Hunter groups opposed to the decision have reportedly engaged monsters in battles throughout Russia…”

Beep.

“…I agree with part of what you’re saying. Our situation is extremely difficult right now.”

“Should we take that to mean humanity ought to surrender?”

“Not at all. I’m simply speaking on the basis of statistical evidence.”

“But according to what you said earlier, Doctor, humanity has no chance of defeating Morgoth, does it?”

“I’m beginning to wonder if your ears are attached to your anus. As I’ve told you several times, the chance is exactly 5.2 percent.”

“That’s an embarrassingly low probability. I’m sure our viewers are thinking the same thing.”

“I won’t deny the odds are low. But understand this: compared with when the Great Cataclysm first began, that figure is dramatically higher.”

“I know. According to that excellent paper that even won you a Nobel Prize, the figure was 0.2 percent.”

“Congratulations. Unlike your ears, your eyes seem to be in the right place.”

“Thank you. But I can’t overlook the fact that the 0.2 percent in your paper applied only to the period before Sky appeared.”

“True. But even Sky—”

“—had less than a 20 percent chance of winning right up until the final battle with the Demon King Asmodeus. Yes, I know. But unlike then, humanity has another option now, doesn’t it?”

“You!”

“It’s a reality too appalling to say aloud, but we can’t ignore it forever. Before it’s too late, we need to face the problem in front of us. Don’t you agree?”

“…”

“Thirty years ago, we had no choice. We could only resist with everything we had. But Morgoth is offering peace, and the countries that surrendered to him have kept their governments and are calming their people.”

“…Morgoth is a monster. A fucking monster. Do you really not understand what that cunning bastard wants?”

“I know exactly what people want. Peace. A chance to protect the lives of the people they love.”

“Bullshit. Listen, young man, cut the nonsense. You’re nothing but a despicable coward. You’re hypnotizing yourself into thinking you speak for all of humanity while arguing that we should offer up a living sacrifice. And not just anyone—two heroes who’ve done more for us than anyone else.”

“Sky and Jin are heroes who’ll be remembered throughout human history. I’m grateful for their sacrifices, too.”

“If that’s true, then shut your damn mouth and go home right now. Hug your family, one by one. Then go to your study and take out the pistol you’ve hidden there. No need to bother writing a will. Everyone watching this broadcast, myself included, knows why you need to die.”

“My, how rude. I’m simply saying I expect those two to choose a noble sacrifice of their own accord, as great heroes would, for the sake of billions of people—”

“Fine. Then I have no choice.”

“What?”

“Go to hell, you son of a bitch.”

Bang! Bang-bang!

“Aaah!”

“Fuck! Healer! Get a healer in here, now!”

“Doctor, calm down and put the gun down! This is a warn—”

BEEEEEP!

“We apologize for the unfortunate incident during our live broadcast. We will do everything we can to resolve the situation—”

Beep.

At last, silence settled over the room. The Skeleton King stared without a word at the holographic TV, now giving off only a dim glow. Then he spoke.

“Humans.”

His voice was thick with unconcealed disgust. Chuck Hagel, who had been staring at the whiskey bottle on the table, answered him.

“As a human, I have to say, that’s a weird thing to listen to.”

“Why don’t you try arguing against it, then?”

“I’m not going to. He wasn’t wrong. Especially that last guy. He deserved to get shot.”

The Skeleton King nodded.

Even he thought the old doctor, the foremost scholar on the Great Cataclysm and magical power, had handled the situation admirably.

The man looked to be in his nineties and, far from being Awakened, seemed to need a shot of stimulants just to move. But America’s venerable martial art of gun-fu had no age limit.

“Do you think he survived?”

“He wasn’t hit in the head, so probably.”

“Pity.”

“I agree completely. But it’s better for that guy to stay alive. If he died there, it could actually hurt public opinion.”

“…Fair enough.”

In the silence that followed, the Skeleton King replayed the scenes he’d seen on TV.

Anxiety and fear boiling over everywhere.

The magical power distribution soaring toward the levels of the Great Cataclysm—and the nonsense now being broadcast openly across the world.

Things were happening everywhere that the Skeleton King simply couldn't understand.

"You human, steeped in alcohol and tobacco. May I ask you something?"

"I quit drinking and smoking a few hours ago, but go ahead."

"What is the essence of humanity?"

"That's a difficult question. Philosophy isn't really my field."

"I already know you're not particularly intelligent, so don't worry."

"…Fine."

Chuck Hagel glared at the Skeleton King, then shrugged.

"All of it."

"All of it?"

"Yeah. Everything you've seen and felt while you've been with us. That's what I think, anyway."

"Humans are stupid enough to make me want to crack open their skulls and examine their brains, and so greedy and cowardly it's hard to believe. That's their essence?"

"I wish I could deny it, but that's part of it, too. It isn't all you've seen, though, is it?"

Of course it wasn't.

If all the Skeleton King had ever seen were those ugly sides of humanity, he never would have lived among them in human form.

He liked humans.

He'd always felt different from ordinary monsters. Ever since he'd met a human in the dark forest inside a Gate, he'd stayed with them.

But…

"Even so, this… This shouldn't be possible."

"Listen, my bony friend. There's no such thing as impossible."

Chuck Hagel ran his fingers over the whiskey bottle, still unopened after several hours, as if testing the limits of his own patience. Then he added:

"Things that should never happen are happening anyway."

"Then…"

"Right. More people will start agreeing with that damn 'noble sacrifice' the guy who just got shot was talking about. Humanity's running out of time, but it has a choice."

"Even if humans have an evil side, they'd offer up the heroes who risked their lives fighting for them?"

"Offer them up? What are you talking about?"

"…?"

“I said ‘sacrifice.‘ That’s what they really want. To look away without getting their hands dirty or taking the blame. To leave the people they’d sacrifice with no choice but to decide for themselves.”

“…!”

“The biggest problem is that Jin is exactly the kind of person who’d do it.”

For a moment, the Skeleton King bit down on his lip without realizing it.

Chuck was right.

That was the kind of human Jin Taekyung was.

He was always scolding and teasing the Skeleton King, but he carried a heavier burden than anyone else in the world.

And that made the Skeleton King more anxious than ever.

If the world wanted him dead, Jin Taekyung was exactly the sort of person who would sacrifice himself.

“That’s ridiculous. Even if that treacherous human… even if Jin Taekyung sacrificed himself alongside Sky, how could we be sure Morgoth would keep his promise?”

“Humans see what they want to see and believe what they want to believe. Morgoth knows that all too well.”

It was true.

As the news had just reported, Morgoth had kept his promise.

He’d left the governments of the twenty-odd countries that had declared their surrender in place, Russia among them, and completely stopped his monsters from killing people.

And that had given people hope.

Hope that Morgoth was different from the Demon King Asmodeus.

Hope that, even if they could no longer enjoy the freedom they’d had before, countless lives could be saved.

“But the chance that Morgoth will kill those two and break his promise…”

“Is overwhelmingly high. There’s no question about it. At least, we know that with absolute certainty. But do you think people, half-crazed with fear, are going to think that way?”

Chuck Hagel continued, his voice growing rougher.

“By the time those bastards realize their mistake, it’ll be too late. The only Hunter who can fight Morgoth right now will be inside that bastard’s stomach.”

As Chuck’s voice rang with pent-up anger, a thought suddenly flashed through the Skeleton King’s mind.

Chapter 1156

At the moment the Skeleton King thought of something during his conversation with Chuck Hagel, the man they were talking about stood alone in the deepest, most secret chamber of the heavily guarded Pentagon.

Or perhaps “alone” wasn’t quite right.

Strictly speaking, Jin Taekyung wasn’t alone.

“I should’ve come to see you more often. Circumstances kept me away.”

He looked slowly around the vast white space. It was as bright as if hundreds of lights were shining at once, and so empty it felt hollow.

“I heard you moved recently. I didn’t know it was to a place like this.”

He truly hadn’t. The moment he stepped inside, he’d been startled by the resemblance.

It looked so much like the mysterious space he called the Inventory, where he’d had an encounter he never could have expected.

“Just a coincidence, I’m sure. Probably.”

It had to be. The massive Grand Mage who had painstakingly designed this secret space for one person didn’t even know the Inventory existed, much less what it looked like.

But…

“Honestly, I don’t know what to believe anymore. I’m not even sure what I know, or what’s true and what’s false.”

At some point, everything he’d taken for granted had begun to fall apart. Faced with a reality beyond comprehension, his reason had grown hazy, and instinct had filled the void.

An uncertain instinct, closer to a wild guess—one even Jin Taekyung could hardly make sense of.

And now, reflected in his eyes, was the person who might well be the beginning and end of it all.

“Can you hear me? Can you see me?”

Jin Taekyung lowered his gaze.

Before him stood an oval recovery capsule connected to countless Magic Formations and machines. Inside that coffin for the living lay an old man, sunk in a sleep from which no one could wake him.

“If you can, please answer me.”

Of course, Jin Taekyung knew no answer would come, no matter how many times he asked or how long he waited.

Even so, he had to ask.

“Are you the person I think you are?”

The greatest hero humanity had ever produced.

His real name was Cheon Taemin. His titles were Slayer and Sky.

And…

"The Martial God."

Jin Taekyung let out the breath he'd been holding.

Through the translucent membrane fogged by his warm breath, he stared at Cheon Taemin's peaceful, sleeping face.

"I could feel it. The person I met back then, in that place… was you. I'm sure of it."

Hiss. Crackle!

His voice had grown louder without him noticing, echoing through the space. His hand, tensing on its own, struck the countless protective spells surrounding the capsule. But Jin Taekyung paid no mind to the pain in his skin.

He needed an answer to the conviction he'd only recently arrived at, incomplete though it was.

He needed to confirm that Cheon Taemin and the old man he called The Helper were the same person. That Cheon Taemin, too, had been a Player like him. And he needed to know how things had come to this.

More than anything—

"Why? Why won't you wake up?"

No matter how hard he tried to hold it back, the anger in his chest kept boiling over. He needed somewhere to let it out.

"…Why?"

Why do I, who fall so far short of you, have to bear this burden?

At that moment—

Hiss.

Unable to speak the thought aloud, Jin Taekyung pulled his hand from the capsule.

Then he turned and blurted, "What, I thought it was one visitor at a time?"

His surging emotions weren't the only reason he'd stopped speaking. A second visitor had just arrived.

"As far as I know, there's no such rule. And even if there were, family ought to be an exception."

"Wow. When you put it like that, what can I say?"

"For the record, I only just got here."

"They say a guilty conscience needs no accuser. Who said anything?"

Jin Taekyung's expression and tone were as playful as ever, at odds with how he'd been only moments before.

Team Leader Choi—Choi Minwoo—watched him for a moment, then shrugged.

"I should have knocked. Not that it would have made a sound through the barrier magic."

“You didn’t have to go that far.”

“I suddenly thought of my grandfather and went looking for Mr. Johnson. I heard he’d already brought you here. I’m sorry if I intruded.”

“Don’t be. If anything, I’m the one intruding.”

Jin Taekyung smiled and waved a hand as he started walking.

“May I ask why you came to see my grandfather?”

After a moment’s silence, Jin Taekyung gave a short laugh.

“What, worried something might happen?”

In a situation like this, there was only one thing to worry about: Jin Taekyung taking Cheon Taemin to the Dragon Lair, just the two of them.

Of course, Cheon Taemin had been unconscious for a long time, and nobody in the Pentagon wanted that to happen. If it did, it would effectively be Jin Taekyung acting on his own.

But while Jin Taekyung’s question had sounded like a joke, Choi Minwoo’s answer came in a low, steady voice.

“Yes.”

“…!”

“To be honest, I’m very worried.”

Before Jin Taekyung could answer, eyes widening, Choi Minwoo added calmly, “I’m worried that you, Mr. Jin Taekyung, might make the stupid choice of fighting Morgoth alone.”

“…”

“Answer me, please. Deny it if you want.”

Jin Taekyung stared at him in silence, then spoke.

“Fine. Let me make this perfectly clear. I would never do that.”

“I see.”

“Yeah. So that settles it, right?”

“No.”

“What? Why not?”

“Because I don’t believe you at all.”

“…!”

“Anyone who knows you well would feel the same. Spend enough time around you, and it becomes obvious how recklessly and foolishly you choose to act.”

Choi Minwoo stepped closer and looked at his grandfather sleeping inside the recovery capsule.

“My maternal grandfather must have been the same. The two of you are so alike.”

“Alike?”

“Yes. Realizing that has brought me a little comfort. Only very recently, in fact.”

“What do you mean…?”

“Even after you came back from the Middle East, you haven’t gone to see your family. Even though you’re staying right here in the Pentagon.”

Family.

At that one word, Jin Taekyung’s eyes trembled.

His mother and younger sister. His family by blood, more precious to him than anything else in the world, had been under the Pentagon’s protection for quite some time.

But he hadn’t gone to see them once.

No. He couldn’t see them.

If he did, the invisible pillar barely holding him up would collapse. And if he crumbled now, he wouldn’t be able to summon even the smallest shred of courage.

“You’ve refused to meet the other Guild members, too. I’m sure it’s for the same reason.”

Jin Taekyung had come to know countless Hunters, but there were only two people left whom he and Choi Minwoo could call Guild members.

Song Song and Im Kkeokjeong.

Jin Taekyung had avoided them, too.

The path ahead of him was riddled with danger. Death came for everyone, but it didn’t come for everyone at the same speed.

What would happen if those two joined the battle to come, when neither was an S-rank Hunter or a Supreme Peak master?

They’d die. Without a doubt.

This was a colossal gamble with the lives of billions at stake, not just his own. In a world without the Three Saints or the Fire King, he couldn’t bear the weight he alone had to carry.

So he ran.

From his family. From his friends.

He’d fled everyone around him and come here, wanting to face Cheon Taemin once more, even like this. The only person who could understand him. The person who might hold the answer—and the key—to everything.

Then Choi Minwoo’s next words reached him, and Jin Taekyung realized something.

“Watching you, Mr. Jin Taekyung, finally made me understand how my grandfather felt when he never came to see his only grandson.”

Something he’d failed to notice until now.

“Maybe I just want to find a reason for it. But… I’ve decided to think that he had no choice but to keep me at a distance because of some danger only he could sense.”

Choi Minwoo's voice held a bitter smile. And in his words was a meaning even he hadn't noticed.

Some danger only he could sense?

That couldn't be. At the time, there had been no danger left for humanity.

The once-mighty Demon King Asmodeus had been reduced to dust, without even a body left behind. The monster legions that had stained the Five Oceans and Six Continents with blood had become nothing more than prey.

Yet as soon as peace arrived, the hero who had achieved that great feat shut himself away from the world.

He kept everyone at a distance.

No one was an exception.

Not even his closest companions, practically sworn brothers, or the daughter he'd cherished above all else.

When that daughter and her husband died in an accident, he left his young grandson in Butler Kim's care rather than look after the boy himself.

Then, one day, without warning, he lost consciousness.

And remained unconscious for more than a decade.

…Were you that afraid, too?

With those words swallowed on the tip of his tongue, Jin Taekyung gazed at Cheon Taemin, his eyes sinking into darkness.

He'd been right.

He still had no definite proof or testimony, but Choi Minwoo's words had made him see it again: Cheon Taemin and the Martial God had been the same person all along.

The shadow of that old hero, sleeping as if dead, stretched across two worlds.

He knew. He knew it wasn't over yet. That Asmodeus hadn't been completely erased.

There was still so much Jin Taekyung hadn't uncovered, so much he wanted to ask.

But this was enough.

At least he now knew what choice he had to make.

Step.

He turned without hesitation and started walking.

He'd taken only a few steps when he noticed a tiny but important change and stopped.

The door.

It was gone.

The only exit from this secret space, created through advanced magic, had vanished without a trace.

"Team Leader."

At his quiet call, Jin Taekyung turned. Choi Minwoo stood there, his expression unwavering.

“I’m sorry.”

The brief, calm apology told Jin Taekyung everything.

“Was this your plan from the beginning?”

“As I said earlier, we know exactly what kind of person you are, Mr. Jin Taekyung.”

“We?”

“Of course, this wasn’t a decision I made on my own. Most of them, including Mr. Johnson and me, have already agreed to the plan.”

“Most? Then someone must have opposed this ridiculous plan.”

“No. No one did. We didn’t tell the people who might have caused trouble from the start, in case they became an unexpected variable. We’ve also made every other preparation we can.”

Thinking of Chuck Hagel and the Skeleton King, who still knew nothing about it, Choi Minwoo continued in a composed voice.

“So… for the time we have left, you’ll stay here with me, Mr. Jin Taekyung.”

The many people involved in the plan had a single goal: use every means at their disposal to keep Jin Taekyung—their only hope—here until the three days Morgoth had declared to the world were over.

Fortunately, the secret space Jin Taekyung had found was perfectly suited to carry out the plan. Countless barrier spells had been installed to protect Cheon Taemin.

Even so, one unpredictable element remained: Jin Taekyung himself.

The savior of a new age.

The greatest and strongest Hunter in the world, successor to Cheon Taemin—a man no one else could replace.

That was precisely why they couldn’t let him sacrifice himself in vain. And Choi Minwoo hadn’t forgotten one final precaution.

“No matter how strong you are, Mr. Jin Taekyung, you won’t be able to get out of here.”

“Is that so?”

Jin Taekyung reached into the air. A silver spear, invisible until now, appeared in his grasp.

Whoosh.

Dark blue flames surged along White Flame’s spearhead. The fire was refined to an extraordinary degree and carried heat beyond anything Choi Minwoo had felt from it the last time he’d seen it.

But Choi Minwoo didn’t waver.

“Come to think of it, there’s one thing I haven’t told you.”

The final precaution he'd taken was never meant to counter Jin Taekyung's strength.

"If you try to break the barrier spells by force, the resulting backlash could bring down the entire Pentagon."

At least, Choi Minwoo didn't waver until he heard Jin Taekyung's answer.

"You really think so?"

Grgrgrk.

As the space warped beneath the unbearable heat, Jin Taekyung's quiet voice echoed through it like a distant refrain.

"I think otherwise."

"…!"

Choi Minwoo's eyes widened.

Slice.

Along a seam only one person could see, the vast wave of mana that joined and sustained hundreds of spells split in two.

Chapter 1157

The spearhead, wreathed in dark blue flames, rose as if to pierce the ceiling. Choi Minwoo wasn't the only one whose eyes went wide.

"…!"

There wasn't even time to utter a curse.

Magic Johnson stared in shock at Jin Taekyung's unexpected move. He'd designed this secret space himself, and he'd been watching what happened inside it with a heavy heart. Now he felt as if even the hair he didn't have was standing on end.

No way. Surely not.

He swallowed hard.

Why was he so tense?

Simple. If the magic was forcibly broken, the backlash would batter him—the caster—before it ever shook the Pentagon.

No. Maybe…

I could die.

To a mage, mana was another sense beyond the five, as much a part of the body as flesh and bone. When a spell cast with a mage's own mana was forcibly dispelled, the mage suffered a worse blow than anyone else.

Magic Johnson knew that better than most. He'd only done something as insane as packing hundreds of security and barrier spells into the space because he trusted Jin Taekyung.

He trusted that the Jin Taekyung he knew would never hurt him.

But at that very moment—

Whoosh!

The spearhead swept down without hesitation, mercilessly cutting through the last shred of his trust.

"Fuuuck—!"

Johnson squeezed his eyes shut and finally let out the curse he'd been holding back.

The mana links connecting him to countless spells snapped. He felt the onset of a backlash powerful enough to kill him.

A warm breeze blew past.

…Wait. A breeze?

He heard nothing. Felt nothing. No earthshaking roar, no tremendous force rocking everything around him.

Only energy drifting away like sea fog in the sun.

His eyelids twitched. Unable to make sense of it, the massive Grand Mage finally gathered the courage to open his eyes.

Someone was standing in front of him. Johnson stared blankly for a moment, then spoke as if he'd made up his mind.

"Jin, be honest with me."

Jin Taekyung straightened his spear. "Go ahead."

"Did I die and go to heaven?"

"Whether you're dead is another question, but isn't this place a little bleak for heaven? We can't even see the sky."

"Everything's hazy. Like we're at the top of Mount Everest."

"That's water vapor, not clouds."

"Damn, you're right. Then if it's not heaven, is this a dream?"

"I hope not."

"Why?"

"If I'm showing up even in your dreams, maybe I'm your type."

"Oh, dear. I hadn't thought of that."

Johnson gave a bitter smile.

"All right. So it's come to this."

Jin Taekyung nodded calmly. "Looks like it."

"I'm truly sorry. I didn't want to go this far."

"I understand. I'm not just saying that. I really do."

"Thanks. I think our friend over there feels the same way."

Right on cue, Choi Minwoo emerged through the thick steam and studied Jin Taekyung with a complicated expression.

"You've gotten stronger. Even stronger than the last time I saw you."

In Choi Minwoo's memory, Jin Taekyung had always been strong. Even on their first raid, when Jin had gone along as a mere porter rather than a combatant. He'd gone on to surpass Choi Minwoo's expectations by a staggering margin, again and again.

Today was no different. And that pained Choi Minwoo.

"To be honest… I don't know whether I should be happy that you've gotten stronger again, or sad."

Choi Minwoo had often thought about that famous line from a superhero movie that was now a classic: With great power comes great responsibility. Sometimes it seemed as though it had been written for Jin Taekyung.

To Choi Minwoo, Jin Taekyung seemed as vulnerable as he was strong. The stronger he became, the greater the threats he tried to face alone.

But Jin Taekyung's reply was light and cheerful, nothing like Choi Minwoo's words.

"Better to be happy, if you ask me."

"Is that so?"

"That's what I'd prefer. There's always plenty to be sad about anyway."

"If you died, what would I do then?"

"What kind of question is that?"

Jin Taekyung gave a short laugh.

"Be sad when it happens. As much as you want."

"…!"

"Let's not worry about something that hasn't happened yet. I'm not exactly qualified to give you advice on that, Team Leader. I'm bad at it myself… But after going through it, I think that's the right way."

Choi Minwoo blinked.

He was different. Maybe Choi Minwoo was imagining it, but the change was unmistakable. Barely ten minutes ago, Jin Taekyung had been forcing a smile. Now his smile was genuinely at ease.

Like someone who'd set down a heavy burden.

Only Jin Taekyung knew why.

If I died…

Death.

Jin Taekyung turned that sticky, dark word over in his mind.

Of course he was afraid of dying. He'd been afraid every day, every moment. But today, he'd finally understood something clearly.

What he truly feared wasn't death itself. It was what would happen after he died.

The danger the people he left behind would face.

But this is enough.

Jin Taekyung didn't turn around, but all five of his senses were trained on the person now far behind him.

Cheon Taemin.

Another Player—someone he'd once thought couldn't possibly exist.

Even if I really do die, maybe then…

He swallowed the rest of the words on the tip of his tongue and looked squarely at his two close friends and trusted comrades.

"As the Alliance Leader of the World Hunter Federation, I'm issuing a full mobilization order, effective immediately. Destination: Moscow. Objective: annihilate Morgoth and the monsters under his command."

"…!"

"…!"

Their eyes widened. Jin Taekyung added firmly, "But no one is to do anything rash until I give further orders. Unless I'm unable to issue them, of course."

"Right. Good thinking. We'll all fight together—wait. What do you mean, 'unless you're unable to issue them'?"

Johnson had only just realized something was wrong when Jin Taekyung spoke again.

"I mean if my position becomes vacant."

Neither man could miss what that meant. Choi Minwoo bit his lip, and Johnson let out a low groan.

"Damn it, Jin."

"Nothing you say will change my mind. I'm going to Morgoth. Right now. Alone."

"…Are you sure that's the best option? You're really going to bet your life on a crazy gamble with less than a one-percent chance of winning?"

"Yes."

There wasn't a trace of hesitation or doubt in his voice or eyes.

For a moment, Johnson was at a loss for words.

But then, suddenly, he remembered someone from decades ago. When everyone had been thrown into utter confusion, that person alone had stepped forward and led the way.

A hero who'd made himself a beacon and lit up the world.

Sky.

Yes. Him.

And now another Cheon Taemin stood before Johnson.

No—Jin Taekyung.

"…Ha."

A sigh slipped through Johnson's clenched teeth.

At last, he had to accept what Jin Taekyung had told him: no argument would change his mind. He had to accept the role left to them, too.

"Fine, Jin. Go on and tell us your plan. Say whatever you want. But first, there's something I have to say."

The massive Grand Mage took a deep breath, then addressed the savior of a new age.

"Whatever happens, don't you dare die. Not unless you want me to beat you to death with my staff."

Jin Taekyung gave a rueful laugh. "That's the plan. I'd rather not die twice."

A little while later, the two men had heard him out and fallen silent.

Wheeeee!

A siren, as jarring as what they'd just heard, shook the depths beneath the Pentagon. An operator's urgent voice blared through the magical equipment.

"Code Red! Code Red!"

"Code Red?"

"It's an emergency. The highest alert level. What happened all of a sudden?"

“Unauthorized use of magic detected!”

“Security forces, deploy immediately to Area 52! Repeat: security forces, deploy immediately to Area 52!”

“Area 52… That’s where the transport Magic Formation is.”

“You mean the Warp magic?”

“Yeah. But access to the entire Pentagon has been forbidden for a week now. Is an inside collaborator we don’t know about trying to escape because they think they’re about to be found out?”

It wasn’t an unreasonable guess. Most of those who had surrendered to Morgoth had bowed to him to survive, but some were actively cooperating with him.

In Africa, rebel holdouts that hadn’t been completely rooted out in the previous incident were rampaging. In South America, drug cartels were running wild, more ferocious than the monsters.

By ordinary standards, Johnson’s guess made sense.

“Emergency! Code Name Blue! Code Name Blue has escaped through Area 52!”

The operator was nearly panting now. All three men fell silent, though for different reasons.

Jin Taekyung had no idea what the announcement meant.

The other two knew all too well.

In the end, Jin Taekyung was the first to break the silence. He couldn’t take them staring at him any longer.

“Okay. I get that I’m an idiot, so cut it out and tell me what Code Name Blue is.”

Choi Minwoo blinked. “Uh, well. Of course you wouldn’t know, Mr. Jin Taekyung.”

“Why?”

“Because it’s a secret from you.”

Magic Johnson looked back and forth between Jin Taekyung, who had no idea what was going on, and the magical equipment installed in a corner of the underground corridor.

“It’s you, Jin.”

“What? Where did that come from—”

“Code Name Blue. The one they just mentioned. That’s you.”

“…What?”

Jin Taekyung needed a moment to make sense of that.

“So they’re saying I just left the Pentagon without permission?”

“Well, to be precise…”

Someone who would do such a thing had already come to Johnson’s mind.

“Someone who looks like you.”

They hurried to the surface. The first person they ran into was—

“Goddamn it. Where the hell were all of you, leaving me on my own in a situation like this?”

Chuck Hagel, who had somehow ended up on his own.

Chapter 1158

It was a ruin.

A complete ruin. No other words were needed.

But the man who had appeared in a sudden flash of light barely ten seconds ago saw it a little differently.

A grave.

That was the first thought that came to him.

He could feel it the moment he looked around—no, even before he opened his eyes. Death saturated the air like thick fog at dawn. From every corner of this enormous grave, where the clouds overhead shut out every ray of light, rose the screams of countless vengeful spirits.

"…I suppose so."

The man muttered bitterly, then kicked off the ground and shot forward.

Fwoooosh!

Perhaps it was the magical power swirling in his wake as he streaked forward like an arrow. The spirits reacted to it, stopped screaming, and began following him one by one.

"Don't follow me. I'm not your enemy."

Whoooom.

Beyond the howl of the wind, the man heard the spirits' answer and nodded.

"Yeah. I'm going there."

Whooom—

"If that's what you really want… Fine, I'll allow it. Having you along for a little while wouldn't be so bad."

If an ordinary person had seen this, they would surely have been surprised by two things.

First, the man was behaving like a lunatic.

Second, this lunatic was someone the whole world knew.

But the spirits were different. Just as the man could sense their presence and hear their voices, they could see him as he truly was.

They were different kinds of beings, certainly, but death linked them.

"I know. It's unfair. I'm sorry I couldn't save you."

The man went on as if talking to himself.

"Of course not. You did nothing wrong. It was just a misfortune, the kind that could happen to anyone."

"You're asking whether God or heaven really exists? Why?"

“…Your child, huh? I see. But don’t worry. A child that young would have gone to heaven. No, I’m sure of it.”

“I don’t know what God looks like. It was so long ago that my memory’s a little hazy.”

“You there. Take that back. I am a great being, far beyond the likes of you. My memory’s just a little bad, that’s all.”

“Yeah, damn it. You’re right. I don’t remember a thing. But ever since I started traveling with a strange fellow, I sometimes get déjà vu. Like I’ve been through something similar several times before.”

“I’ve given it some serious thought, and I think I must have been human once, too. An incredibly noble and admirable human, just like I am now—damn it. Everyone, quiet down. I’m trying to say something important.”

“Oh, don’t cry. I wasn’t talking to you. How old are you? Where are your parents?”

“…All right. I can’t promise anything, but if I find your parents, I’ll make sure you see them.”

The man continued forward, talking with the spirits as he went.

A young man who had only just taken his first steps into adulthood. An old man who had accepted his death and wanted to know about the afterlife. Parents who had lost a child, and a child who had lost their parents.

The scenery changed in an instant, but the spirits never stopped whispering. They were indignant and furious at the death that had struck without warning, grieving even as they trembled with fear.

And the man never once turned away from their voices.

Because he was their king.

He alone had the right and the duty to guide those who had lost everything in an instant and now wandered the Nine Springs[3913]—those who had become his people.

But perhaps the spirits weren’t the only ones finding comfort and peace in this strange conversation.

“Why did I come here? Hmm, excellent question. This is an epic tale that begins with the most handsome and admirable hero in the world.”

The man leaped over the ruins in his path and continued.

“The hero had many talents. He was incredibly strong and had a noble heart. But despite all that, he was surrounded by idiots and incompetents. Then one day, he learned that the biggest fool of them all was in trouble.”

But the hero knew the surest way to help the fool. It was something only he could do.

Because he was a hero.

[3913]The Nine Springs is an East Asian expression for the realm of the dead.

“While the hero was deep in thought, some ignorant bastard who was crazy about booze and cigarettes told him that people see what they want to see and believe what they want to believe. So the hero decided to borrow the fool’s appearance for a while.”

It hadn’t been all that difficult. As he’d said, the hero was unbelievably talented, and his greatest ability was “absorption.”

“Actually, I didn’t know I could do that. No, the hero didn’t. But when he tried it, it worked. It wasn’t nearly as good as the Doppelganger’s own ability, though.”

Was it because of his innate ability to grow stronger by absorbing the magical power of monsters that had been destroyed? Or was it because his magical power levels had already reached the point of going berserk?

Amazingly, the hero, who wasn’t human, had gained a new power he’d never discovered before. After traveling thousands of kilometers[3914] by way of several Warp Gates, he had made it here.

Of course, there had been some trouble along the way.

He’d threatened the mages who refused to activate the Warp Gate. Or he’d taken a selfie in his current appearance, posted it on social media, and deliberately spread the word far and wide.

But none of those little things mattered to the man.

The crowning touch of his story was still to come.

“Most of you figured it out from the start, didn’t you? Yes, that’s right. I am that hero.”

Fwoosh.

Silence fell. The man blinked, his solemn declaration still hanging in the air.

“Why is everyone so quiet? You’d think you were dead. Oh, right. You are dead.”

“What? You didn’t see it coming? That’s impossible. The foreshadowing was perfect from the start. I said I was the most handsome and excellent man in the world—damn it. Forget it. You stupid humans.”

That was when the grumbling man suddenly stopped walking.

“…I’m here already?”

He murmured and looked at the scenery, now completely transformed.

As if someone had drawn a line across the world, pitch-black earth lay only a few steps ahead, starkly different from the ground behind him.

Whooom. Whooooooom—

At the same time, the countless spirits surrounding him began to scream.

Screams filled with a terror unlike anything they had shown before.

“Don’t be so afraid. Weak spirits like you would have a hard time entering that place anyway. Not that I was planning to take you with me in the first place.”

[3914] Thousands of kilometers is roughly thousands of miles; 2,000–9,000 km is about 1,200–5,600 mi.

But the man was different.

While the spirits writhed as if burned by fire, he knew he would grow stronger the closer he came to that ominous, pitch-black earth.

After all, the only thing I can fake is my appearance.

The thought faded hollowly in his mind as he drew the sword tucked at his waist.

Shing.

Its blade was clear as untainted ice.

The man silently gazed at his reflection.

Or rather, at the face of the person who was probably chasing him as fast as he could somewhere out there.

“You’re a step too late this time, you wily human bastard.”

The man—the Skeleton King—snickered. Someone reflected in the blade snickered along with him.

“Yeah, keep smiling like that. Don’t scowl with that ugly face of yours.”

He meant it.

That fool—Jin Taekyung—deserved to smile.

“Then, here I go.”

With a final farewell that would never reach him, the Skeleton King took a firm step forward.

Using the light spilling from his sword as a torch, he headed for the land of death, where magical power churned, and thought:

Sacrifice, huh? This isn’t so bad.

Even if he died, he wouldn’t regret it.

Once he met a glorious end in the form of Jin Taekyung—not the Skeleton King or the Stone-King—all of humanity would understand.

They would see how foolish they had been to believe the monster’s promise to stop the destruction and slaughter if they handed over Jin Taekyung.

And they would understand the only way to escape this catastrophe.

Fwoooosh.

The dense fog drifting over the pitch-black earth swallowed his retreating figure.

Morgoth recalled an old saying he’d heard long ago: Sometimes, a certain kind of curiosity can shorten a person’s life.

He’d first heard it while living among humans, and it had fascinated him.

Unlike humans, Dragons couldn’t live long without curiosity. Morgoth himself was a prime example.

He had always been curious.

Ever since he was no more than a Hatchling—before he'd even broken out of his egg.

Perhaps that was why Morgoth had become unlike other Dragons.

His curiosity would not rest until he had reached the highest level of whatever caught his interest.

Humans, Dwarves, Elves, and other races besides—driven solely by curiosity, he had spent ages among them, learning and giving in turn, and ruling over them as well.

No matter how often he changed his appearance or where he went, Morgoth was a born ruler.

His election as Dragon Lord before he was even a thousand years old was proof.

The pride of his race and the king of the world.

He was more complete and absolute than anyone.

At least, he would have been, if not for the one curiosity he had never been able to satisfy.

The Demon Realm.

The home of all monsters. A land of demons where poison, corpses, and death flowed instead of clear river water.

His curiosity about the unknown deepened with every passing day, until Morgoth took his first step into that forbidden realm.

Yes. That was where it all began.

But why? Even after an extraordinarily long time, the curiosity filling Morgoth's heart had not faded.

And among his unanswered questions was one that, as the human saying went, might truly shorten his life.

Asmodeus, why did you choose me of all people?

Morgoth possessed knowledge and power beyond measure, yet he did not know why he had come to this world.

One day, a call had reached him from beyond those distant stars and the space between them, and he had answered it. That was all.

Which made it even harder to understand.

Unlike the others, he was neither devoted to serving Demon King Asmodeus nor willing to give his life for him.

Besides, how could you, when you don't even exist in this world, have prepared a stage like this?

But Morgoth did not pursue these questions further.

No. More precisely, he had to set them aside for now.

The guest he had truly wanted to meet had just arrived at his palace.

"Come in, hero."

Morgoth rose from his throne and welcomed his first guest with delight.

Chapter 1159

Boom. Rumble, rumble.

As the iron doors opened with a heavy roar, the Skeleton King had a sudden thought.

If he'd really been human, he might have mistaken the sound for his own heartbeat.

But even without a heart, he could feel it clearly.

With every step he took, the distance narrowed. With every iron door that opened in turn, the immense magical power ahead of him swelled.

And at the end of it all, the being at the source of everything waited for him.

"Come in, hero."

The last door opened at the sound of a low voice, and the Skeleton King swallowed without meaning to.

This is…

Until now, his eyes had held nothing but darkness. Now they were filled with dazzling light.

Was this what it would look like if someone brought a palace from the myths of old gods into the world?

The chamber was hundreds of meters[3915] across, filled with antique furniture that had endured the ages and jewels of every color. Countless images were engraved into its towering ceiling and the walls on every side.

Beautiful.

No—more than beautiful. Astonishing.

Yet even amid that dazzling sight, the Skeleton King looked in only one direction.

At a being more beautiful than everything in the chamber combined, no matter how many times you added it up or multiplied it—and possessed of a power more terrifying than anything else in the world.

"You seem to like the place. Good."

The palace's master smiled as he drifted gently down from the throne towering in the distance, as if he'd spread invisible wings.

"I don't need to introduce myself, do I?"

He certainly didn't.

The Skeleton King knew who he was. So did all of humanity.

"…Morgoth."

The name escaped the Skeleton King like a groan. Morgoth smiled and nodded.

[3915] 100 meters is about 328 ft (109 yd); "hundreds of meters" does not specify an exact distance.

“So you do know me. Still, it wouldn’t hurt to formally exchange names, as is the custom in this world.”

The Skeleton King understood what he meant and replied, thinking once more of the one person who wasn’t here—and shouldn’t be.

“Jin Taekyung. Jin Taekyung.”

“I see. Jin Taekyung…”

Morgoth seemed to mull it over.

“No matter how many times I hear it, it’s a strange name. Does it have some special meaning?”

“Of course it does.”

The Skeleton King shrugged, then gave an answer so perfectly suited to Jin Taekyung that, had the real Jin Taekyung been there, he might have mistaken him for a Doppelganger.

“It means ‘fuck you.‘”

Morgoth stared at him, momentarily dumbfounded, then burst out laughing.

“Well, you got me. That’s rather funny.”

“Get all your laughing out now. After you’ve taken a few hits in a minute, you won’t find it so funny.”

The Skeleton King made no effort to hide his hostility.

The moment he’d faced Morgoth, he’d realized that a surprise attack meant to catch him off guard would never work.

How is this possible?

He’d never felt so overwhelmed just by standing before someone.

Strictly speaking, he’d felt something similar once, back when he was called the Skeleton Warlord and fought Jin Taekyung. But there was no comparing the two.

Just as the Jin Taekyung of then couldn’t be compared to the Jin Taekyung of now, the Skeleton King had grown at a terrifying pace, too.

If anything, his rate of growth might even have surpassed Jin Taekyung’s.

Since joining Jin Taekyung, he’d defeated one Named Monster after another, starting with the Arch Lich, and absorbed their vast magical power like nourishment.

He’d become so powerful that the title of king no longer seemed inadequate.

But…

We’re on different levels.

Undead: a cursed being.

A Dragon: a being born with the blessing of all creation.

The two faced each other at eye level, but everything else about them was different—their very natures, and the magnitude and depth of the power born of them.

So why did the Skeleton King feel more at ease as he gripped his sword hilt?

Even with Morgoth watching his every move, it felt as natural as folding his arms.

“Are you planning to fight me?”

“Why? Didn’t you expect it?”

“I did, from the moment you appeared alone. I only wanted to tell you it’s a poor choice.”

“There was never another choice.”

“Never another choice? I find it hard to understand why you think that.”

Morgoth tilted his head.

“I’ve lived for a very long time, and yet you’re a fascinating being. I’ve always had a weakness for exceptional talent.”

“So you’re telling me to surrender?”

“Become my Guardian. You’ll have the honor of protecting the true king at his side, and gain greater power and eternal life as well.”

“What an honor.”

“It’s an entirely reasonable and peaceful solution, too. What do you say?”

The Skeleton King gave a disbelieving laugh.

“Jin Taekyung.”

“What?”

“I told you what it means earlier.”

At that moment—

Shing.

A silver blade, its edge sharp as frost, finally emerged from its sheath.

“This is my answer.”

It was Jin Taekyung’s answer, too. The Skeleton King knew he would have done exactly the same.

Morgoth watched him and murmured, almost to himself, “How strange. I simply don’t understand.”

“What, are you that shocked I turned down your shitty offer?”

“I won’t deny that your foolish choice disappoints me. But that isn’t what I find so hard to understand.”

Rustle.

Morgoth’s obsidian eyes moved slowly over his opponent. More precisely, over the Skeleton King and the [Hero’s Sword] in his hand.

His next words sent a shiver through the Skeleton King.

“How can an Undead Monster like you wield an Ego Sword like that?”

“…!”

"Oh, forgive me if I've offended you. It's just that even I can't explain what I'm seeing. Do you have any idea why?"

The Skeleton King didn't answer.

He couldn't. It took everything he had just to steady himself against the shock that had struck through his whole body like a bolt of lightning.

He knew. He knew what I was.

Since when?

When he gave his name? Or when he drew a sword instead of the spear Jin Taekyung always used?

Or… had Morgoth known from the moment he first set foot on the pitch-black ground of his territory, leaving the spirits' pleas behind?

Damn it.

The Skeleton King clenched his teeth. He met the Black Dragon's eyes, which seemed to see through everything he was.

"You were playing with me. From beginning to end."

"Oh dear."

Morgoth let out a soft sigh.

"Don't let a misunderstanding upset you. Everything I've said was sincere. You truly are that special and fascinating. Even in thousands of years, I've encountered few cases like yours."

"Shut your mouth."

"How rude. But I'll forgive you. Unlike an inferior race, I won't let a moment's anger drive me to destroy something precious. My intelligence and curiosity won't allow it."

Morgoth wasn't the least bit shaken. If anything, he looked at the Skeleton King with even greater interest.

The old, cunning Dragon's eyes glittered like those of a child heading into the hills to collect insects.

Even as a silver blade charged with powerful energy came slashing down at him.

Fwoosh—CRASH!

Fierce wind clawed through the chamber, and the energy carried by the sword swallowed everything within a radius of a dozen or so meters.[3916]

It was a blow so fierce that even the Named Monsters who had once struck terror across the world would have faced death if it hit them directly.

But before the roar rang out, the Skeleton King knew.

The strike he'd poured all his strength into hadn't harmed so much as a hair on his enemy's head.

Rumble, rumble…

[3916] A dozen meters is about 39 ft.

Beyond the enormous tremor shaking the space, Morgoth had already moved to the towering throne in the distance. He brought his hands together in a heartfelt round of applause.

"Impressive. Truly impressive. Such immense magical power—and of so many different kinds."

"You…"

"Ah, yes. The Arch Lich, Leviathan, Behemoth. You absorbed their magical power. But your current appearance doesn't seem to be the work of magic… Have you ever met a being called a Doppelganger?"

For an instant, the Skeleton King felt his mind go cold.

Morgoth had seen through him.

Too quickly, and with such chilling accuracy.

Seeing the Skeleton King's face go rigid, Morgoth broke into a broad smile.

"So you have. You can absorb not only a target's magical power, but part of their abilities, too. Astonishing. Now I understand how a mere undead—a Skeleton, no less—came to possess such power."

"That mere undead might kill a Dragon here today."

"Is that a taunt?"

"No. I mean it. It's a lesson I learned from watching a certain lunatic of a human."

The Skeleton King spat the words out as he approached. Morgoth nodded.

"Yes, of course you might. Even the mighty Asmodeus was stopped by a mere human. But…"

He looked the Skeleton King straight in the eye.

"Just as you learned a lesson through Jin Taekyung, I also realized the most important thing when I heard the news."

Whoooom.

Space warped.

Incredibly powerful, pure magical power filled the chamber, taking the form of invisible blades.

"Asmodeus's greatest mistake was his arrogance."

"…!"

"I do not underestimate any of you."

At the moment the Skeleton King's eyes widened—

Fwoooosh!

A flash of black, deeper and darker than the night sky, shot toward his entire body.

Chapter 1160

Undead.

Beings who had met death but had not died; who could move, yet could not be called alive.

But even the undead were not immortal.

They simply met another kind of death: Erasure.

Erasure, huh.

As time slowed, the Skeleton King watched countless black flashes fill the space around him and murmured to himself.

A path he had not yet taken.

And yet, one he would have to walk in the end.

He quietly closed his eyes.

Of course, he knew. If he moved now, he could still avoid Erasure. If he struggled with every ounce of his strength, until the last fragment of his soul crumbled into ash, he might even leave a tiny sword wound on that terrifyingly powerful Ancient Dragon's body.

But it would be pointless. The gap in their power—the difference in their very being—was too vast for him to hope for anything more.

There's no turning this around. This body—no, Jin Taekyung—will fall here today. At the hands of a monster bent on destroying the world.

And word would spread soon. Everything moved fast in this world.

That was why he had drawn as much attention as possible on his way here in Jin Taekyung's form. By now, everyone around the world would be watching Moscow closely.

If that happens, I won't regret it.

But unlike the Skeleton King, the people would regret what they had done—and be furious.

At the sight of a hero driven by an unseen hand to willingly meet his end, they would finally realize their mistake. Then they would unite and fight.

Even if the whole truth came to light, hearts once set would not be easily swayed.

Yeah. That's enough.

But why?

Even after making that resolve and repeating it to himself countless times, why did his heart feel as heavy as lead?

The sound of space being crushed left his ears ringing. His eyes were shut tight, yet he could still see those faces and hear those voices. What were they?

And why—

KA-BOOOOM!

—hadn't a single one of those terrible black flashes touched him? That tremendous magical power had seemed capable of devouring both his body and the soul within it without a trace.

This is…

A sudden sense of déjà vu swept over him. The Skeleton King opened his eyes.

And saw him.

Far away, the Black Dragon leaned back at an angle against his throne, staring at him with eyes that gleamed strangely.

"Just as I thought. Was that your plan from the start?"

"…!"

"I suppose I should take back what I said earlier. It seems I underestimated all of you… No, I underestimated you."

The Skeleton King's reflection gleamed in eyes like pieces of obsidian.

The Ancient Dragon's heart, worn down little by little over thousands of years, was pounding fiercely now.

"Why didn't you dodge?"

The Skeleton King gritted his teeth. Morgoth's question made it clear he had seen through not only the Skeleton King's appearance, but the whole situation.

"Because I had to."

"…!"

Crack.

The armrest of the golden throne crumbled to dust.

But Morgoth was not angry at the Skeleton King for trying to deceive him.

He was trembling with rising excitement and joy.

Because you had to?

Yes. This was it.

If the Skeleton King had tried to fight back in any way, Morgoth would have erased him with all his power, without the slightest hesitation.

He had no intention of letting a moment's curiosity cost him the two prized catches he sought: Cheon Taemin and Jin Taekyung.

The Adversary who defeated the Demon King in a mere human body. And the one who leads the world after him.

Those two alone had been Morgoth's greatest purpose and reason for coming to this world.

At least, until a moment ago.

But what the Skeleton King had just shown him was enough to shake him to the core.

A cursed undead monster, with a soul like this.

Everyone wanted to live. Humans and monsters alike.

But sacrifice was different.

Morgoth had spent vast stretches of time among many races in the name of amusement. Yet even the Elves of the forest, supposedly the noblest of them all, had never astonished him like this.

No. There was no point in comparing them.

Just as Morgoth had been born to rule the world, they had been born with pure hearts.

But the Skeleton King was unmistakably an undead monster. A being corrupted by an inescapable curse.

And yet he had tried to sacrifice himself—an undead monster who should have been made of nothing but rage and fear.

Though he feared Erasure and had the power to delay his end, if only for a little while, he had refused to retreat.

How is this possible?

It was like discovering an entirely new species.

Morgoth had chosen to become an evil Dragon, abandoning everything he had built over the ages in pursuit of curiosity alone. Now he felt the strongest urge of his life.

More precisely, a greed that even his lofty intellect could not suppress.

I want him.

No. He had to have him.

A noble soul dwelling in the most corrupted of bodies.

If he could make this strange being, unlike any he had ever seen, completely his own, he felt he might grasp not only its extraordinary nature but also the unknown realm he had longed to reach for thousands of years.

The greatest question—and driving force—that had made Morgoth who he was.

“This won’t do. I can’t hold back.”

The moment Morgoth murmured to himself and rose from his throne—

Flash.

It happened in an instant.

Morgoth vanished without a trace, though he had been dozens of meters[3917] away. The Skeleton King, every nerve on edge, felt a sudden chill rush over him.

Blink!

The thought flashed through his mind, but it was already too late.

His opponent was a Dragon, born with a blessing of mana no other race could approach.

[3917] One meter is about 3.28 ft; several dozen meters is roughly 100 ft or more.

Morgoth cast a wordless spell as naturally as breathing, surpassed the limits of Blink magic, and struck the Skeleton King in the back.

CRRACK!

He couldn't block it or dodge it.

With a dreadful cracking sound, his body flew like a cannonball.

Before the Skeleton King could regain his balance in midair, Morgoth leapt across space again and reached for him.

Fwoosh—slice!

A chillingly low whistle cut through the air by his ear.

At the same time, the Skeleton King put everything he had into widening the distance—and realized his left arm had just been severed from his body.

If he hadn't twisted instinctively at the last moment, he would have lost something other than his arm.

He was aiming for both my legs from the start. He wasn't trying to erase me.

Morgoth's voice followed, confirming his suspicion.

"Stop resisting. You're only wasting time."

It was true. There was nothing to add to it or take away.

The gap between them was dozens of times greater than the distance separating them.

"I've changed my mind. I have to have you."

Morgoth's eyes flickered with greed now, not mere curiosity.

The Skeleton King couldn't fully understand this change in him, but he was certain of one thing.

In the pitch-black darkness where he could see nothing, a faint glimmer of light had finally begun to seep in.

"I understand. I am pretty damn handsome, after all. In fact, it feels unfair to be stuck with a face this ugly."

With a calm retort, the Skeleton King raised the [Hero's Sword] at an angle in his one remaining hand.

One chance.

The only path left to him now. It would surely be the first and last.

Vwooom.

His enormous but murky magical power welled up, wrapping around his body and the silver blade—so utterly at odds with its nature.

Yet even that mighty power, rippling like living mist as it filled the space around them, could not compare to Morgoth's.

"Skeleton King. You awoke in the darkest, coldest grave and took the crown in your hand—the king of the cursed undead."

The Black Dragon Duke Morgoth, once a Dragon Lord who had ruled over three moons and a sun, twelve continents and nine seas, smiled brightly and spread his arms.

His impossibly pure and powerful magical power, worthy of his title as an Archduke of the Demon Realm, pressed down on everything.

“Come to me—to your true master.”

At that very moment—

Fwoooosh!

The space between them disappeared.

No—the Skeleton King saw it twist and vanish at the same time.

But unlike Morgoth, who came hurtling toward him faster than sound with wings of magical power spread wide, the Skeleton King kept both feet planted firmly where he stood.

All he had was the final strike he would make with his one remaining hand.

Shwoosh!

The tip of the sword shot through the air.

Without the slightest tremor.

Boldly, yet calmly.

Carrying a force greater than it had ever borne, it flew in the single direction its wielder intended.

Toward the Skeleton King’s own neck.

“…!”

If a scream could make no sound, would it look like this?

In an instant divided into countless fractions, Morgoth witnessed the unbelievable sight. His eyes flew wide, and he reached out.

And then—

FWOOSH!

A flash deeper and more vast than any darkness erupted, swallowing everything around them.

If someone living in Moscow had survived to see it, they would surely have thought of one word:

Apocalypse.

The world’s death cry.

The end of all living things.

But in that place, already a land of death and little different from part of the Demon Realm, the first to sense danger were not humans.

Thud.

A rumble seemed to rise from deep beneath the earth.

The vast wave stirred something beyond instinct, reaching into the soul. Across the area, countless monsters raised their heads in unison.

Even the large monsters who, seized by a moment's hunger, had been chewing a nearby Orc alive.

Even the Death Knights approaching to punish them, and the Liches raising undead monsters to reinforce their ranks.

Even the dragonkin circling the tall spires and beneath the black clouds.

Every last one of them stopped moving and turned toward the source of the ominous rumble.

The dwelling of the Black Dragon Duke Morgoth, now as good as their new king.

The Dragon Lair.

Whoooosh!

Suddenly, a beam of light shot upward.

No—darkness.

For some reason, it felt not the least bit familiar. It burst from the heart of the lair and rose skyward in a single enormous pillar.

Without end.

Erasing everything in its path.

It split the spires, the dragonkin, and the clouds blocking the light above them, then finally pierced the sky.

And then—

Thud.

The monsters watched the strange sight with vacant stares. At the same moment, they realized how precious the brief time they had just been given was.

Rrrrrumble!

A beam of light poured down through the rift in the torn black clouds, illuminating the earth as it heaved and rolled in waves.

Chapter 1161

A storm.

A storm of power that swept away and destroyed everything in its path—and a colossal explosion born of the collision.

KABOOOOOM!

The world shook beneath a roar that seemed to split the sky. The monsters had been staring blankly at the Dragon Lair, forgetting even the savagery etched into their souls. Now they felt darkness fall over them.

Then came a force they could never have imagined.

—!

Eyes wide. Mouths agape. Legs frozen by primal fear.

The monsters could not even let out a death cry.

No—in their final moments, the pitiful screams they managed were swallowed and erased by the deafening roar.

The impact was so horrific that “unprecedented” hardly did it justice. They were swept away helplessly, crushed into ruin.

RUMBLE, RUMBLE—!

Was this what it would look like if thousands upon thousands of meteors covered the sky?

The colossal castle, shattered into countless fragments by the blast, filled the air as its pieces plunged toward the earth. At the ends of their destructive arcs stood the monsters, frozen like statues.

CRASH! CRASH-CRASH-CRASH!

Destruction and death.

Those two things ruled the area in an instant. Sky and earth shuddered.

Everything mixed together.

Buried. Crumbling.

There was no way to stop it, no time to flee far enough.

Their tough hides and skin—so resilient that ordinary artillery could barely hurt them. Their bones, harder than alloy, and the immense durability those bones gave them.

Even the powerful magical power unique to high-tier monsters, which made all of it possible.

Nothing they possessed could save them from the death bearing down on them.

However brave a fighting dog might be, a tiger would still devour it. Strength yielded to greater strength.

CRUNCH! CRACK!

An ogre with both legs crushed let out a shriek. A Troll, half its body torn away by a fragment that had flashed past in an instant, shuddered and fell.

Even the Wyverns, descendants of Dragons who claimed the open sky as their domain, would never fly again.

Those closest to the explosion's center had either died the moment the shock wave reached them or were now falling helplessly, their proud wings gone.

The explosion of power spread in every direction beyond the vast Dragon Lair. Its unprecedented magical power engulfed the monster army that had been in the area.

Relentlessly. Greedily.

The wave of death seemed as if it would never end. Only after swallowing tens of thousands of monsters did it begin to subside.

And at the center of it all, one being opened his eyes.

Psshh.

Ash slid down his slender frame.

Morgoth rose from the ashes of the Dragon Lair—no, even calling it a ruin would be too generous now—and turned to look around.

The earth had been overturned as if by a massive earthquake. Monster corpses lay piled like mountains. Green blood flowed in rivers, while a single shaft of sunlight peered through a break in the dark clouds at the dreadful scene.

Yet in this moment, not a hint of anger shone in the Black Dragon's obsidian eyes.

"What a sight."

The brief exclamation slipped through his parched lips.

That was all.

Though a moment's carelessness had cost him countless subordinates, Morgoth didn't care in the slightest.

More precisely, he had no reason to care.

He had gained a treasure far more precious and fascinating than those trifling losses.

"To obtain something, one must pay a fitting price. Don't you agree?"

It sounded like a question to himself, but an answer came before long.

From right at his feet.

"Shut… up."

At the faint voice, as hazy as a broken radio, Morgoth breathed a sigh of relief.

"I'm glad you still have some strength left. I was worried you might be erased."

He wasn't exaggerating.

The shock wave from the collision of two immense, utterly different forces had been truly terrifying.

If Morgoth hadn’t used all his power to protect himself, his entire body might now have been covered not in dust, but in his own blood.

“Still, there was some unintended damage… What can you do? This, too, must be the order of things, determined by someone.”

Morgoth smiled and brushed the dust from his shoulder. Like the dust drifting away in a pale cloud, the deaths of inferior monsters meant nothing to him.

Only one being mattered now: the one before him, his greatest interest and his sole objective.

“Thank you for holding on. You’ve exceeded my expectations in every way.”

In truth, even exceeded didn’t begin to cover it.

The blow his opponent had aimed at himself, prepared to be erased, had awakened a sensation Morgoth had forgotten over the ages.

Tap. Drip, drip.

Liquid began to wet the ground at his feet.

Morgoth frowned at his own silver blood, gleaming like molten silver, and at the blade jutting through his palm.

“Yes. So this is pain.”

A sensation he hadn’t felt in a thousand years.

It hurt all the more for that. Stung all the more.

Perhaps the memory of the last time he had felt pain made it worse—the day he had also endured a humiliation greater than the pain itself.

“…Asmodeus.”

Morgoth whispered the name. Then, as if shaking off the memory, he yanked the [Hero’s Sword] free and seized it.

Crash!

The blade split in two, and both pieces plunged deep into the ground, reflecting the image of their owner, now reduced to a head.

“Skeleton King. King of the cursed wraiths.”

Morgoth slowly bent toward the Skeleton King, who glared up at him, and stroked the skull where blue ghostly flames flickered in place of eyes.

“Can you see it? Your true self.”

“I told you… to shut up.”

“Calm your anger. You need only acknowledge and accept where you came from—and whom you should be with.”

His captivating voice rang out like a hypnotic spell.

But the Skeleton King didn’t waver.

Clinging to a thread of consciousness that seemed ready to snap, he squeezed out what little strength remained and spoke.

“You really are different from that guy.”

"That guy?"

"Yeah. An arrogant, downright devious human. But…"

That guy—Jin Taekyung—had once told him:

You're just you.

And—

"He's my friend."

"…!"

"He's the one who pulled me out of that godforsaken darkness. He's the one who showed me a new world I'd never known."

He had seen so much.

He had learned so much.

He had left the Gate, where only darkness and death churned, and spent time with everyone beneath the shining sun.

There had been happy days and sad days, but every moment had been dazzling.

Because he wasn't alone anymore.

Because he was with them.

That was enough.

"So quit wasting your time with that stupid bullshit. You'd better get ready."

The Skeleton King smiled.

Brighter and more radiant than ever.

"My friends will be here soon."

At that moment—

Flick.

Like a lamp going out, the ghostly flames flickering in his empty eye sockets suddenly vanished.

"…Your friends, you say?"

Morgoth turned the Skeleton King's final words over in his mind. The Skeleton King had finally lost his grip on consciousness, leaving Morgoth to ponder them alone.

Friend.

A familiar word, yet strange, as though he were hearing it for the first time.

Though he had once spent many years among humans in another world, he had never been able to understand friendship.

Why did people who shared not a drop of blood care so deeply for one another? Why did they sometimes make the foolish choice to give their lives for each other?

Morgoth knew all too well that they did such things. Why they did so remained a source of fascination and astonishment to him.

First, that the Skeleton King—nothing more than a cursed Undead Monster—could show such humanity.

And second—

Jin Taekyung.

A human who might have changed the Skeleton King into this extraordinary being.

There's more I need to find out.

Of course, Morgoth already knew about Jin Taekyung.

The savior of a new age. The center of this world, a young hero who stood at the head of them all.

After Cheon Taemin, Jin Taekyung was among those Morgoth had to watch most carefully. That hadn't changed.

Now, though, Morgoth was intensely curious about him in a way he hadn't been before.

"Yes. I'll have to get ready, as you advised."

Morgoth murmured to the silent skull, then looked out over the earth. The rumbling had finally stopped.

Perhaps it was the shaft of sunlight peeking through the split dark clouds, but the overturned, fractured land had lost much of the pitch-black color that had made it resemble the Demon Realm—and much of the dense magical power that had permeated it.

Morgoth didn't care.

He began to rouse the endless power within his heart: magical power, nearly infinite and utterly pure, born of corruption.

Or rather, he was about to.

Then he sensed someone he hadn't expected.

Vwoom.

The magical power that had seemed ready to erupt like a volcano sank back down. So did the Black Dragon's gaze.

The air trembled uneasily. The wind fell still. Morgoth's tightly closed lips parted.

"My apologies. I didn't realize a guest had arrived."

Dark mist drifted away as he spoke in a low voice.

Beyond it, someone answered.

"I'm asking because I'm curious."

The voice was calm, yet seething like lava.

"What's that in your hand?"

Chapter 1162

For an instant, it was as if the world had stopped.

The faint haze of magical power around me, the mountains of monster corpses, the roars of the monsters that had survived—all of it vanished.

I could no longer feel or see any of it.

Only one sight remained: far away, a man with pitch-black hair hanging down like a cloak held a pure-white skeleton in his hand. The two of them were burned into my retinas as though they were the only things left in the world.

Pain clenched my heart.

“What are you holding?”

My restrained voice crossed the hundred or so meters[3918] between us. At the other end stood a man gazing silently at me.

No—a wicked Black Dragon wearing human skin.

“Ah. This?”

His voice was beautiful enough to seem otherworldly, and carried an evil so pure it was all the more horrifying.

“A clue to satisfying a desire I’ve held for a very long time. And a valuable trophy.”

One corner of Morgoth’s mouth curled upward.

“Perhaps someone’s friend, too.”

“…!”

“A friendship between a human and a monster. A moving story. Judging by the fact that you’ve come here alone, it seems it was all true.”

I didn’t know exactly what had happened here, or what had been said.

But I was certain of one thing.

The Skeleton King had done everything he could, and he’d done it for me—for all of us.

That was why I couldn’t ask the most important question. His obsidian eyes watched me closely, taking in every part of me.

“Are you afraid?”

As if he’d read my mind. I answered briefly.

“Yeah.”

“Of what?”

“There’s a crazy Dragon standing in front of me, and he’s holding someone I know very well. I want him to still be alive.”

Maybe it was how readily I’d answered. After a brief silence, Morgoth gave a quiet laugh.

[3918] About 100 meters is about 330 ft.

"You're honest. Almost disconcertingly so."

"So? Your answer?"

"Didn't I already tell you? A valuable trophy. He was so violent in his rampage that he's a little damaged, but I have no desire to see him shattered to pieces."

The meaning was clear.

He was still alive.

The Skeleton King.

It was the answer I'd been desperately waiting for since the moment I set foot in this godforsaken ruin. Only then did I let out the breath I'd been holding.

"Thanks, you son of a bitch."

"Don't mention it. I couldn't pass up such a precious opportunity after all this time."

"You don't make a habit of taking hostages, do you?"

"Hostage-taking? My intellect and stature are far too great for such cheap amusement."

"That's good to hear."

"Perhaps. Or perhaps it's the worst news you could have heard. I draw a clear distinction between trophies and everything else."

"A distinction?"

"If something is too dangerous to possess, it must be destroyed. That way, there's no trouble later."

Morgoth's smile deepened.

"Just like you."

At that moment—

Vwoom.

Magical power churned around us. A wave of power, unbelievably pure and vast.

And murderous intent so vivid I could almost touch it.

"Was this your plan from the start?"

"No. But the moment we first met, I realized I might make the same mistake Asmodeus once did. And, more than anything…"

His gaze swept over me, unpleasant in its mixture of interest and regret, as though it could see through my entire body.

"Prey."

His hair, long enough to reach the ground, rose into the air like the wings of a being from myth.

Not an angel's wings. A demon's.

"You already see me as prey, don't you, Jin Taekyung? Young, strong human hero."

For an instant, silence hung between us. Then I spoke.

"Yeah. I do."

A Hunter. A sword and shield for humanity, and a hunter.

But that wasn't the only reason I'd come to face him head-on.

If Morgoth had truly been someone I could trust, I would have gladly done whatever he wanted. I would have bowed at his feet. If he'd told me to cut off my own arms and legs, I would have done it.

My life?

If the deaths of Cheon Taemin and me could bring peace to billions of people, I would have given up my life without a second thought.

That was my duty.

But just as Morgoth had understood something when he first saw me, I'd understood something about him.

His eyes.

They were so clear they seemed pure—and no different from a child's eyes as he watched an ant crawl across the asphalt on a midsummer afternoon.

That was why tens of millions of lives had been ground to dust.

Right here, in the very place where I stood.

And there was one more thing.

"He's not a trophy."

"What?"

"He's not some trophy. That guy."

My voice boiled over, so strange it sounded like someone else's. I took a step.

Slowly. Heavily.

As I put my foot down harder than ever before, memories as vivid as yesterday sank in deeper than the footprint it left.

Thud.

"Human, why don't you make a deal with me instead?"

"A deal?"

Yeah. It was there.

An A-rank Gate. Black Wizard's Black Forest.

We'd first met in that dark, damp forest thick with dead trees. And then we'd stayed together.

For far longer than I'd expected.

Thud.

"Hey, Warlord Mon."

"Do not call me by such a name. I am the master of the Black Forest and commander of the mighty undead legion."

"Hmm. All right."

“At last, you understand.”

“So, Golgoli.”

“…Damn it.”

I couldn’t say exactly when it had happened—when I’d begun to see him as more than just a monster.

“Something wrong? Why’ve you been so down all day?”

“I was just thinking about something.”

“What?”

“What kind of being was I, in the past?”

That day, I’d told him as he brooded that I didn’t really know, but he’d probably been a pretty decent guy.

I’d let the words slip as though I were talking to myself, embarrassed for no good reason. He hadn’t forgotten them.

“Human, I have a question.”

Even now, I could see it all clearly.

The spearhead of White Flame, which the Arch Lich had sent flying at me when I was too exhausted and injured to move.

The Skeleton King forcing his way out of my Inventory by his own power and shielding me with his entire body.

“Why…?”

“Human. I have a question.”

That voice I’d thought I would never hear again.

“What you said to me before—did you mean it?”

“Of course I did.”

Only after hearing my answer did the dim lights in his eyes curve like a crescent moon.

“I see.”

The Skeleton Warlord I’d first met in the Black Forest fell.

“You asked me why.”

Then, on human land, a new being who’d sacrificed himself to protect humans rose once more with a shining crown.

He gave back the words I’d once said to him—words he would never forget.

“You’re cunning, but you’re a pretty decent human. That’s all.”

The Skeleton King.

King and master of the dead who wander the Nine Springs.

And…

My friend.

Hot.

My eyes, fixed solely on Morgoth. My two dantians, pouring out Scorching Yang Qi without pause like a volcano erupting after a long wait.

And the step I took, carrying every memory that had just passed through me.

Crack.

A deep rumble spread. The devastated ground crumbled again.

Hairline fractures spread in every direction like a spiderweb, then erupted.

Fwoosh—KABOOM!

Flamefire Path.

I shot forward as a single, blazing streak of fire.

It happened in an instant.

BOOM!

With a sudden flare of blue-black flames, the hundred or so meters[3919] between the two of them disappeared at once.

No—vaporized might have been more accurate.

The heat Morgoth felt was that horrifyingly intense, and the speed surpassed even sound.

But—

I can see it.

The Black Dragon's obsidian eyes flashed as he read it all: the streak of fire rushing up to his face, and something suddenly emerging from its immense heat.

Whoosh!

"…!"

Morgoth's eyes flew wide. A silver spearhead slashed down at an angle, reflected in them.

Where had it come from? How?

He hadn't sensed the power of any magic.

Before he could find an answer, the flames carried on the spearhead drove into his chest.

Or so it seemed.

For the briefest moment.

Flash—slice!

In a moment split into smaller moments, Morgoth crossed the distance in an instant. He silently raised a hand to touch the area around his chest.

More precisely, to the patch of skin that had been scorched black by the slightest graze.

[3919] About 100 meters is about 330 ft.

"…Hot."

It was only the third time in thousands of years that he'd felt pain.

But unlike the undead monster who'd caused him pain the second time, the human approaching from afar with his spear lowered still held immense power.

Enough to make Morgoth ask with genuine curiosity, "Are you, by any chance, one of my kind?"

Slowly but carefully closing the distance, Jin Taekyung answered calmly.

"Yeah. Long time no see, son."

"Your vulgar speech makes it clear you're not one of my kind…but how can a human grow so strong so quickly?"

Morgoth already knew about Jin Taekyung. He knew a great deal.

And until Morgoth had been summoned to this world, Jin Taekyung's power had been nothing like this.

"A lot's happened. Things even you couldn't possibly imagine."

"Things even I couldn't imagine…"

How could that not fascinate him?

But Morgoth forced down the curiosity rising from deep within him. The human before him was too dangerous to let a moment's curiosity distract him.

"A pity. I'll never get to hear that interesting story of yours."

Muttering under his breath, Morgoth curled both hands like claws and seized the empty air.

No—he tore it.

Grrrrrrk.

Warped space opened its jaws. Beyond the gap, where only darkness rippled, beings that had remained hidden until now emerged.

Clank, clank.

Sharp spears and blades. Armor covering every inch of their bodies.

There were hundreds of them—thousands—and they resembled one another like twins born of the same womb. Jin Taekyung recalled the first day he'd returned to this world.

"Those are…"

"My most loyal guardians."

Dragon-tooth soldiers.

Guardians born of Dragons and existing only to serve Dragons.

But they weren't the only thing that made Jin Taekyung freeze.

"…Faye Chen?"

A familiar face appeared among the Dragon-tooth soldiers, and a low groan escaped his lips.

Chapter 1163

Partings always brought sadness and regret.

All the more so when death made the parting with someone close permanent.

But this was never the kind of reunion he wanted.

"…Faye Chen?"

The name came out like a groan.

Even from a distance, the face was instantly recognizable. And yet it had never looked so unfamiliar.

No.

The faces.

"Long ago, in the world where I lived, there were some exceptionally gifted beings. They were called warriors or heroes."

The wicked Dragon's voice, steeped in old memories, reached Jin Taekyung as he stood frozen like a statue.

"At first, they were a nuisance. I didn't much care for them coming all the way to my lair and behaving rudely over some trivial matter."

Morgoth had never quite understood them.

All he'd done was burn a few cities and wipe out a kingdom. Why come all the way to his lair to make a scene?

"At least, that was how I felt until I met one human."

He had stood out even among the hundreds of heroes who had come before him.

He was strong, resilient, and fought more desperately than anyone.

Perhaps that was why, when the man died without leaving so much as a proper corpse—reduced to a little pool of blood like all the other intruders—Morgoth felt regret for the first time.

Along with it came a powerful desire to possess him, rising from deep within.

"That was when I began collecting 'trophies' in earnest."

Not mere cold, hard gold and jewels, but special trophies, each retaining its own memories and light.

Humans, elves, dwarves. Sometimes monsters.

Those he could force to submit, he did. Those who refused every offer, he killed so he could keep them by his side anyway.

His most precious trophies, given the name Guardians.

And he had continued this fascinating collection in the unfamiliar world called Earth.

"They're still unfinished, but the material is good. The results are excellent."

"…!"

“What do you think of my new Guardians?”

Jin Taekyung didn’t answer the question, which was brimming with satisfaction.

He couldn’t. All he could do was look at the bloodless faces now standing at the head of the Dragon-tooth soldiers and recite their names to himself.

Faye Chen, Joel Schumacher, Pablo Albatroses…

Seven names.

Seven S-rank Hunters.

Heroes who had represented their countries. Comrades who had trusted one another to watch their backs.

Over the past several days of the Black Dragon’s great invasion, they had been reported killed in battle, their bodies never found.

Now they stood here.

Denied rest even in death.

Puppets robbed of their very souls.

Shing.

They raised sharp swords, maces, halberds, and shields. They drew their bows.

At Jin Taekyung, of all people.

At the one light that had shown them the way when they could see nothing in the darkness. Their hope.

Fwoooosh.

A cold wind swept across the devastated land.

The monsters had surrounded him on every side. Their murderous intent whipped around him like blades. Beyond the thousand Dragon-tooth soldiers forming an immense wall before their master, the wicked Dragon smiled, his teeth gleaming white.

“Now, shall we begin?”

Those words were the signal.

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

A wave of monsters poured in without end, shaking heaven and earth.

At the same time, Jin Taekyung’s frozen expression shifted. His eyes narrowed to half-lidded slits.

Whoosh—KABOOM!

Blue-black flames burst forth, coiling around his spearhead and flooding the whole area with blinding light.

Slice!

He slashed.

Thwack! Thud-thud-thud!

He stabbed.

Crunch!

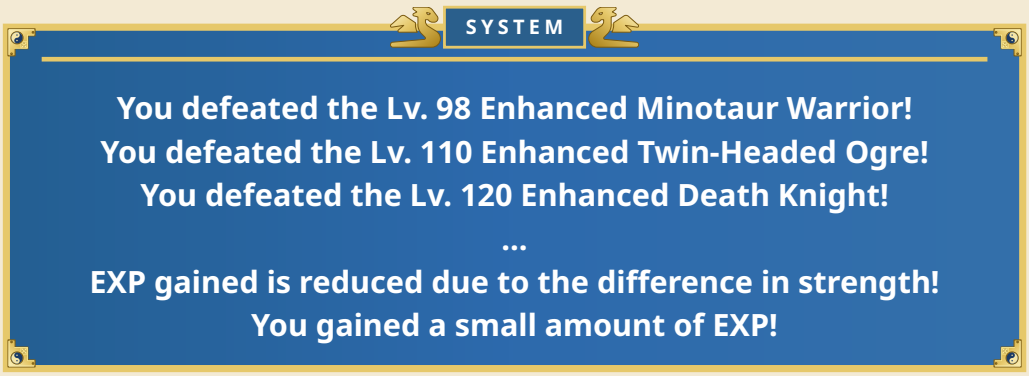
He smashed and crushed.

And then—

Rumble!

He pushed forward.

Ding. Ding. Ding.



Jin Taekyung let out the breath he'd been holding.

The chimes ringing incessantly in his ears seemed to grow more distant. The monsters' stench and roars had never felt closer or clearer.

"Gwoooar!"

Suddenly, a shadow fell across hundreds of heads.

A Cyclops—a one-eyed giant as tall as a walking skyscraper—slammed both fists down with a roar that shook heaven and earth.

BOOM!

Compressed air exploded. The mountain of force behind its fists crushed and burst everything they touched.

Everything except the one person it had to bring down.

...!

By the time the giant spotted the human, smaller than its palm, a spearhead wreathed in blue-black flames was already driving into its single eye.

Thud!

The spear pierced the eye as easily as a knife through tofu. The terrible heat carried through its tip melted the giant's brain, and its massive body toppled.

Whoooosh—BOOM!

A thick cloud of dust billowed upward.

Monsters caught beneath the dead giant screamed. Others lost sight of their target in the dust and hesitated.

They had no idea it was the last mistake they would ever make.

Fwoosh!

The cloud of dust split in two.

No—it evaporated.

A spear shot through the air like a ray of light, sweeping through the Liches commanding the monster army that had survived the enormous explosion.

Rumble!

Dozens of layered defensive spells were useless. So were Blink spells cast in the blink of an eye.

The unprecedented force behind the spearhead rendered them all meaningless.

Its power and speed were so astonishing that even overwhelming fell short.

“What an interesting world. Truly.”

Morgoth was genuinely impressed as he watched Jin Taekyung dominate the battlefield like the hero of an ancient myth.

He had seen and fought countless powerful beings over the past several thousand years.

Yet neither an elven Elder who had lived nearly a thousand years, nor a dwarf king blessed by the rocky mountains, nor the human knight called the greatest on the continent had displayed martial prowess like this.

No. None of them had come close.

“Asmodeus, I think I’m beginning to understand why you failed.”

The humans of this unfamiliar world were strong.

They grew stronger through a mysterious power even Morgoth couldn’t fathom. And a tiny chosen few surpassed their given limits by so much that they became superhumans.

Like Cheon Taemin, who was as good as dead now.

Or that recklessly brave young human hero.

And so—

Vwoom.

He had to crush them.

Even if it meant setting aside his pride.

“Ice Wall.”

A short Spell, yet one imbued with powerful Magic no other race could match, rang across the battlefield.

Fwoooosh.

Cold fierce enough to freeze everything swept across hundreds of meters.[3920]

At its far end stood the human who had reduced the endless flood of high-level monsters to a mere flock of sheep.

[3920] One meter is about 3.28 ft; hundreds of meters are roughly hundreds of yards.

Rumble!

Suddenly, an enormous shadow fell across the ground.

Ice walls several meters[3921] thick and ten times as tall erupted around Jin Taekyung, enclosing him on every side. They were less a barrier than a prison.

A prison built solely to hold Jin Taekyung—and a coffin prepared for his death.

“Hell Fire.”

Fwoooosh.

The sky turned red.

A sphere of flame emerged from between the dark clouds, enormous beyond anything a Grand Mage of any world could have imagined. Its terrible heat crashed down upon the ice walls.

KABOOM!

The flash was fierce enough to blind anyone who faced it.

The flames, worthy of being called the fires of Hell itself, melted the ice wall and burned everything trapped inside.

The thousand monsters thrown away as bait—and one human who hadn’t managed to escape the spell’s range in time.

That was what should have happened.

Tap. Tap-tap.

A tiny tremor began among the monsters’ corpses, now reduced to piles of charcoal.

A familiar face emerged from between them. Morgoth licked his lips.

He endured it? That spell just now?

It hadn’t been ordinary Hell Fire.

He had used his own knowledge to push its power and limits to the utmost, then put his full strength behind it.

A direct hit would have left even another Dragon with a potentially fatal wound.

Yet Jin Taekyung had endured all that heat with no way to dodge.

Morgoth muttered, his voice low.

“This is… a little troublesome.”

No, perhaps more than that.

Whenever events exceeded his expectations, some unknown danger lurked behind them.

And this danger was bigger and faster than Morgoth had thought.

Crack—BOOM!

An explosion burst from Jin Taekyung’s toes with a thunderous roar.

[3921] One meter is about 3.28 ft, so several meters are roughly several times that distance in feet.

True to the meaning of Flamefire Path's name, he surged forward, carving a path of blue-black flames.

Slice, rumble!

Everything in his way split and shattered.

If the monster army flooding in from every direction was a wave, he was a spearhead piercing through it.

One strike.

Then another.

An ogre's head burst beneath his fist. A Death Knight struck by his whip-like kick never rose again.

And then, in the eyes of the monsters falling and spraying green blood, Jin Taekyung saw something familiar.

Fear.

It was fear.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

SYSTEM

You have met the activation requirements for One Against a Thousand!
The effect of the Title One Against a Thousand has greatly intimidated your enemies!
The effect of the Title One Against a Thousand has greatly increased your Intimidation!
Enemies frightened by your Intimidation are beginning to retreat!

A sturdy dam crumbled.

The instinct that had craved nothing but slaughter faded, and a strange emotion called fear filled the space it left behind.

"Gwoooar!"

The monsters turned and fled, their roars stripped of their former ferocity. Jin Taekyung didn't bother chasing them.

He still had enemies left.

And the battle about to begin would decide not only the outcome here today, but everything that came after.

Squish. Squish.

His weary steps carried him through pools of blood.

Beyond the thousand Dragon-tooth soldiers still standing like iron towers, Morgoth watched him for a moment, then spoke.

“You’re tired.”

Jin Taekyung answered in a weary voice.

“Thanks to you.”

“Do you think you can defeat me in that state?”

“Who knows? Maybe, if you clear away the guys in front of you.”

“Perhaps. If I were a little more foolish, I might have.”

Morgoth fixed his gaze on Jin Taekyung, his eyes sunk deep, and continued.

“But I’m afraid I’ve already made up my mind. Today, just this once, I’ll set aside my pride.”

Clank.

At Morgoth’s gesture, the Dragon-tooth soldiers stepped forward.

Fwoooosh!

Far away, beyond the horizon where the monster army had vanished, a flash of light flared.

Chapter 1164

It was a pillar of light, vast and dazzling.

Flash!

A brilliance that seized everyone's attention in an instant.

Morgoth knew better than anyone what had descended from the distant sky. He simply couldn't understand how it had become reality.

"How?"

Someone answered the question that slipped from his lips.

"Why are you so surprised?"

Jin Taekyung.

It was him.

Despite the exhaustion in his voice, a faint smile—one that hadn't been there before—rested on his lips.

"Just accept it. The weather's nice. Don't overthink it."

"…What?"

Morgoth instinctively looked up, following Jin Taekyung's pointing finger. Only then did he realize what he'd overlooked.

It had split apart.

The dark clouds had blocked every trace of clear sky and bright sunlight. His magical power had cut everything off from the world as it was. But the Black Dragon's vast territory, once almost another Demon Realm, had begun to lose its hold.

The rift had opened because of Morgoth's own greed—and the sacrifice of someone willing to face even Erasure.

"I told you. He wasn't some trophy."

At Jin Taekyung's low voice, Morgoth thought of the precious trophy he had just moved to his subspace.

No. The Skeleton King.

"Yes. Perhaps he wasn't."

Resolve had led to sacrifice, and sacrifice had brought about this upheaval. The tremendous explosion of power the Skeleton King had unleashed by throwing away his life had made all this possible.

That was the chief reason the Magic of an utterly insignificant human had dared encroach on the great Black Dragon's domain.

But…

"What can a force that small possibly change?"

His voice steady, Morgoth looked toward the distant horizon. More precisely, toward the group coming into view beyond the fading flash.

BOOM!

Before the light had vanished, a thunderous boom shook heaven and earth.

The monster army charged at the humans who had suddenly appeared to block its retreat. Over the monsters' heads poured an endless rain of fire, unleashed by humanity's strongest War Mage.

"A Warp on this scale, and wide-area Magic. Quite impressive. A step above the human mage from a few days ago."

Quite impressive.

That was all Morgoth had to say about Magic Johnson, but there wasn't a trace of arrogance in his appraisal.

Dragons were mysterious creatures born for Magic—Magic itself, one might say—and Morgoth stood at the pinnacle of their kind. Before he had even reached adulthood, he had touched the limits of Magic. To him, the Magic of other races was little more than child's play. That remained true even in this unfamiliar world called Earth.

Otherwise, Merlin—the Grand Mage who, after Siegfried Bassmann's death, had been one of only two left alongside Magic Johnson—wouldn't have chosen to blow himself up in the battle a few days ago.

"He caught on quickly. He saw me collecting his comrades' bodies and chose death without hesitation."

Morgoth had felt a little regret at losing such a rare trophy as a Grand Mage. Not anymore.

"I suppose I should thank you. I never expected you to give me such fine trophies."

Greed he had held in check until now glinted in his obsidian eyes.

Of the thousands of humans closing in as they crushed the monster army, only two posed even the slightest threat to him.

But even Magic Johnson and Chuck Hagel were no more than trophies in Morgoth's eyes. Jin Taekyung, already worn down by considerable fatigue, faced a wall of a thousand Dragon-tooth soldiers—each one practically a Named Monster in its own right.

The seven Guardians stood with them, reborn far more powerful than before.

"Nothing has changed. This battle is over."

He was right.

Anyone would have thought so. The odds were overwhelmingly in Morgoth's favor.

And yet…

If that was true, why was Jin Taekyung still smiling?

In Jin's heat-shimmering eyes, Morgoth saw someone he barely recognized: himself, his face rigid despite the words he'd just spoken.

"What's so funny?"

Unable to hold back, Morgoth demanded an answer. Jin Taekyung raised the spear he'd been leaning on like a staff.

"I just feel a little better."

"…You feel better?"

"Yeah. I've been in situations like this plenty of times. Heard what you just said plenty of times, too."

Jin Taekyung spat out the phlegm that had gathered in his mouth.

"You know, the usual crap. 'I'm different from everyone else.' 'I never let my guard down.' 'I'll kill you for sure.' 'It's all over.' And so on."

All those times he'd hovered between life and death.

They were memories so awful Jin Taekyung never wanted to revisit them. But right now, remembering them felt different.

Why?

Simple.

"The weird thing is, not one of those bastards ever followed through on what they said."

It was true. He'd fought every one of them, and he'd beaten every one of them.

Even with his arms and legs crushed, his insides churned to mush, and death at his heels, he had survived.

But perhaps the deepest reason he'd won so many hopeless battles wasn't just his strange power, the System.

"Why was that? Some of them really could've killed me. So why did they waste time talking and doing pointless things? Why leave themselves open?"

He was afraid.

Always. At every moment.

In battle, and even in the quiet moments of everyday life.

He feared that someday a powerful enemy would kill him. It tormented him that he might have to get back on his feet at the cost of someone else's life.

So whenever he faced an enemy, he hurled insults. He piled on every kind of abuse, then dragged up even the smallest scraps of anger and grief buried deep inside him to smother his fear.

He had to make himself stronger somehow.

People called him a hero, but he knew he was far too weak to carry that burden.

Looking back, though, he hadn't been the only one afraid of the person across from him.

"Then, all of a sudden, I started feeling better."

Jin Taekyung had finally realized something.

"The guys I beat were afraid of me, too."

"…!"

"All that crap they said came from fear. Just like yours does now."

Jin Taekyung smiled faintly at Morgoth's suddenly frozen face.

"What, did I hit a nerve?"

Morgoth didn't answer.

No—he couldn't. Everything Jin Taekyung had said was true. His pride and insight were too great for him to deny it.

"…Fear."

He'd forgotten it. Or rather, he'd tried to forget the one time he had ever felt that pathetic emotion.

But at last, Morgoth had no choice but to admit that what he felt toward Jin Taekyung was more than caution.

"Yes. I see. I was a little afraid of you, too."

The strength of their fear might differ, but its nature was the same.

Muttering in a low voice, Morgoth looked at the tiny human who had dared to make him feel afraid.

"But I swear one thing to you."

Vwooom.

The wind stopped. The air around them shuddered.

"I will be different from anyone you've ever faced."

At that moment—

Fwoosh!

Darkness erupted around Morgoth, engulfed his body, and swelled. It rose as high as the spire that now lay in ruins and spread as wide as a fortress wall.

Jin Taekyung instinctively understood what the phenomenon before him meant.

Polymorph.

Would the world look like this if the sun vanished without a trace?

The Black Dragon finally shed his human skin. Darkness surrounded him, blackening the sky overhead and the battlefield for hundreds of meters[3922] around him.

As if announcing the end of the world.

But Jin Taekyung's gaze didn't waver. Not even as the darkness, its work done, slowly dissipated and a thousand Dragon-tooth soldiers charged toward him at their master's command.

It's coming. It has to.

[3922] One hundred meters is about 328 ft.

He knew that just as darkness existed wherever there was light, a new light awaited beyond this darkness.

And his faith was rewarded.

Just as Jin Taekyung had once answered the voice of someone crying out for salvation.

Flash!

In an instant, the world lit up.

The horizon, sinking into darkness like an extinguished campfire, and the land, being swallowed by an even deeper gloom, were bathed in light.

Dozens, then hundreds of pillars of it.

The hearts of those who had crossed thousands—tens of thousands—of kilometers,[3923] again and again, to answer the call.

"…What is this?"

Countless Warp Magic Formations set the horizon ablaze. At Morgoth's groan, rumbling like thunder from high in the distant sky, Jin Taekyung spoke.

"I'll swear one thing, too."

His low voice carried on the wind. He stepped forward and leveled his spear at the enemies bearing down on him.

"You'll end up just like them."

Fwoosh—slice!

As fierce flames rose like dawn and lit the battlefield, a mighty roar raced along the horizon and shook the field of battle.

[3923] One thousand kilometers is about 620 mi; ten thousand kilometers is about 6,200 mi.

Chapter 1165

Rrrrrumble!

If light could turn to liquid and overflow, would it look like this?

The ground shook as if an earthquake had struck. Watching waves of aura wash across the horizon and surge toward him, Morgoth knew instinctively:

If he didn't act now, he might never get another chance to unleash everything he had.

"Answer my call."

His low voice reverberated far and deep.

Language had power.

And the ancient Dragon's words, imbued with immense magical power, reached a realm no other race had ever entered.

Craaaack!

The empty air split open.

At the same time, countless eyes gleamed ominously from within the dark rift in space.

"Gwoooar!"

Shadows large and small plummeted to the ground with roars full of killing intent.

With a single Warp spell, Morgoth had gathered his remaining forces from the cities they occupied across the region. He gave the order in a cold voice.

"Kill them all."

That one command was the signal.

Monsters charged at humans, humans charged at monsters, and soon light and darkness blurred together.

Clang-clang-clang!

Thwack! Splatter!

The shriek of steel and the sickening sound of torn flesh swallowed the battle cries. Blood mist hung thick across the battlefield, and the Black Dragon watched it all without a flicker in his eyes.

His shock had lasted only an instant.

Morgoth had already regained his composure. His mind was colder than ever.

Even if his elite monster legion, the force that had guarded his stronghold, had suffered heavy losses, he still had the reinforcements he'd just summoned. That alone was enough.

No—even if every one of those monsters were wiped out, it wouldn't matter.

The fate of the world hung on this battle. Its outcome would be decided not by mere numbers, but by whether one human lived or died.

Jin Taekyung.

There he was.

A blue-black flame slowly cutting through the thousand Dragon-tooth soldiers surrounding him like a dense forest.

At the same time, the short vow that small, insignificant human had spoken earlier echoed in Morgoth's ears—and chilled a corner of his heart.

Me? Morgoth? Becoming just like them?

The Black Dragon bared his gleaming teeth and let out a low growl.

Wrong. He was nothing like anyone else.

With the Demon King Asmodeus gone, Morgoth alone was the true ruler destined to reign over every world—and that was exactly what he would become.

"Fire Lance."

Fwoosh—KABOOM!

A dozen or so spears of flame appeared out of nowhere, about to rain down on Jin Taekyung.

"Ice Blaster!"

A desperate shout rang out from somewhere. A massive spike of ice tore through space and intercepted the flames.

KABOOM!

Space shook.

The deflected flames struck the empty ground. Steam billowed up, thick enough to obscure everything within a hundred-meter radius.[3924]

But the Black Dragon's gleaming eyes saw clearly through it all.

A group of people covered head to toe in blood and dust, their eyes still blazing.

"Clear a…!"

The towering Grand Mage caught his breath, then roared.

"Clear a path!"

Whoosh! Whoooooosh!

With a battle cry that seemed to pierce the sky, the thousands-strong suicide squad—the first to reach this dreadful battlefield—charged toward the Dragon-tooth soldiers.

No.

They charged toward their Alliance Leader, their one and only hope.

It was a battle no one could control.

BOOM!

[3924] A hundred meters is about 330 ft.

Clang! Krrrunch!

Flashes and explosions burst and mingled without pause.

Blood sprayed like fountains. Severed arms and legs rolled limply across the ground.

And through the chaos, a voice I'd been waiting for reached my ears.

"Wind Cutter!"

Magic Johnson. There he was.

At the same time, the blades of wind that rushed in passed close by the two Dragon-tooth soldiers charging at my flank.

Shwaa!

Two heads floated into the air.

If he'd aimed anywhere but their necks, even the Grand Mage's Magic wouldn't have been enough to kill them in one blow. But Magic Johnson had fought them before, in the Middle East. He knew their weakness exactly.

He also knew this wasn't the time for a long, friendly greeting.

"Fuck."

To the man who'd greeted me with a single syllable, I sent a dagger I'd just summoned from my Inventory.

More precisely, I threw it at the Dragon-tooth soldier lunging over his shoulder.

Thwack!

A dagger thrown with all a normal Murim martial artist's strength would rightly be called a hidden weapon. But my Strength had long since surpassed that of most large monsters.

The dagger flashed forward and shattered the helmet made of some unknown metal—and the head beneath it. Drenched in the enemy's brain matter, Magic Johnson muttered another curse.

"This is hell."

"Sorry, but it's too late to go back."

"Everyone here knows that. We knew, and we came anyway."

That was true.

They'd known their lives would be in danger, yet they'd answered my call willingly.

There were only twenty S-rank Hunters left in the entire world—or rather, now only a dozen or so—and they'd chosen only the very best before racing here from all over the globe.

Across continents and oceans.

But the tide of this Great War, with everything humanity had at stake, was still as dark and damp as the clouds overhead.

"Damn it, what the hell? There are this many of those awful things?"

Anyone who'd ever faced a Dragon-tooth soldier would react the same way.

They had more magical power than even the strongest Death Knights, which ranked at the top of A-rank. Their bodies were horribly tough, and they were stubbornly hard to kill.

Calling each one as formidable as a Named Monster would be no exaggeration.

But even Magic Johnson, who knew all this well, didn't know one thing yet.

The Dragon-tooth soldiers weren't the only obstacle we had to overcome to reach Morgoth.

Shiiiiing!

Something shot toward us like a beam of light.

With no time to catch my breath, I angled my spear blade and caught it on the flat.

Clang!

I'd poured plenty of internal energy into the spear, but its shaft still trembled.

Magic Johnson let out a low groan at the familiar face beyond it.

"Faye Chen?"

His mouth fell open. His eyes wavered.

He'd known that old comrade for decades, since the beginning of the Great Cataclysm. Seeing her shook Magic Johnson more than anything had yet. And when the number of familiar faces reached seven, his whole body trembled.

"What is this?"

"Guardians."

"What?"

"That's what Morgoth calls them. His Guardians. They protect him."

"…!"

Magic Johnson clenched his teeth as he understood what I meant.

Even I, who knew nothing about Magic, could clearly sense the magical power controlling them. The Grand Mage would have felt it all the more.

"…Guardians."

Bitterness, anger, grief.

His voice carried them all. Then it gradually quieted, leaving only one.

Anger.

And Magic Johnson wasn't the only one feeling it.

"Near the end of the Great Cataclysm, we talked about it when we were all together."

Boom!

A fist shot forward like a cannonball, followed by a roar.

Chuck Hagel crushed the Dragon-tooth soldiers blocking his path one by one as he went on.

“If we survived this goddamn war, we’d live happier than anyone else in the world until the day we died.”

The fists he kept throwing carried more than the mysterious power called aura.

They carried memories.

The memories of those days, so painful they could have killed him, yet filled with hope that things would soon get better, poured forth with his aura.

“Then why?!”

Krrrunch!

Shattered weapons flew in every direction, along with pieces of the Dragon-tooth soldiers’ armor and bodies.

And the tears of an old soldier who had lost his longtime friends.

“Why are they like this now?!”

His roar held all his grief and anger.

Why had it come to this?

Why couldn’t they keep even that simple promise to live happily for a long time? Why did they have to suffer this humiliation even after death?

But no voice answered his questions.

The only answer was the Black Dragon’s Magic once again filling the sky, and the footsteps of his old comrades as they advanced.

Fwoosh, crackle!

Shiiiiing!

Giga Lightning.

Dozens of bolts plunged down like divine punishment. The seven Guardians and countless Dragon-tooth soldiers charged forward, pitch-black magical power streaming behind them like cloaks.

They came with a force that seemed impossible to stop.

But they didn’t break through.

Because I wasn’t alone anymore.

“Stone Wall!”

A single spell rang through the roar of battle.

Dozens of voices joined in it.

Magic Johnson stood at their head. Behind him were the world’s greatest mages, following humanity’s only Grand Mage.

KABOOM!

The sky darkened, then flashed.

A ceiling of rock suddenly appeared over our allies’ heads. When it met the lightning, a tremendous explosion shook the battlefield.

No—the two spells canceled each other out.

Several mages, unable to withstand the backlash, coughed up blood and fell to their knees. The enraged Black Dragon's roar thundered across the battlefield.

"How dare you!"

Rrrrrumble!

As immense magical power began shaking space again, I shot straight forward, leaving the falling rocks behind me.

Just as I always had.

But one thing was different.

This time, people were following me.

Whooooooosh!

Another group of familiar faces finally broke through the chaotic battlefield.

The brown-haired foreigner at the front tipped his head toward me.

"Too late?"

"Not at all."

"Good. Though I wouldn't have apologized if I were."

That irritating way of speaking was exactly as I remembered it.

Prince Felix had joined us with four S-rank Hunters. He added, "Go. Now. We'll handle things here."

I didn't answer.

I held back the heat rising deep in my chest and pushed forward with all my might.

Behind me, seven S-rank Hunters clashed with their old comrades.

Slice!

I cut one down, then another.

Krrrunch!

Kept going. Didn't stop.

And then—

Crack!

Toward the monster who was the beginning and end of it all.

BOOM!

I shot forward like a streak of flame.

"Morgoth!"

In the Black Dragon's vast, gleaming eyes, a human leaping upward, stomping on thin air, was reflected.

Chapter 1166

Fwoooosh.

For an instant, time slowed.

The sounds around him faded into the distance, and his heartbeat thundered in his ears.

At the same time, instinct and reason whispered in unison.

Now.

His senses sharpened until every hair on his body stood on end. Jin Taekyung shot upward on the explosive force of Flamefire Path and brought his spear down with all his strength.

Toward the Black Dragon's eye—larger than Jin's entire body, and blacker than anything else.

Fwoosh—KABOOM!

A line of fire split the air.

No—the countless seams hidden within it.

Shhhhk.

A chillingly low, faint whistle.

That was all.

Nothing else could be seen or heard.

Even if someone else had been standing right there, watching it all unfold, they would never have understood what had happened.

But the two beings who had finally come face-to-face knew.

That single strike had cut through dozens of layers of the highest-grade defensive magic at once.

I cut it.

A shiver ran up Jin Taekyung's spine.

It worked.

As his insight deepened and his martial prowess grew, he had begun to sense the flow of qi more and more clearly. Now he could sense it in the monster before him, too.

But the spearhead that had torn through the defensive magic never reached its target.

Rrrumble—!

An immense force suddenly fell on him from above.

And the force humanity called gravity was faster and heavier than Jin Taekyung had expected.

Whoooosh—BAM!

A cloud of dust rose in the wake of his body as it slammed down at tremendous speed.

Just as Jin Taekyung had cut through the defensive magic with a single attack, Morgoth had sent him crashing to the ground with overwhelming gravity. The Black Dragon muttered in a low voice.

“Did you think I wouldn’t anticipate even this?”

The words slipping between the Black Dragon’s teeth were more than mere sound.

“Wind Cutter.”

The magic within the Dragon’s words stirred. Countless blades of wind formed, then tore through the cloud of dust.

BOOM!

The thick dust cloud burst apart. Jin Taekyung raced over ground sliced through like tofu, dodging as Morgoth unleashed one spell after another.

Morgoth’s voice continued, almost as if he were talking to himself.

“Thank you. Thanks to you, I’ve finally realized something important.”

Until now, fear had seemed to a great being like Morgoth nothing more than a weak emotion.

So he had tried to forget it.

He simply hadn’t been able to.

But today, watching one human, he had glimpsed a great truth he had been refusing to face.

“If you fully acknowledge and accept the fear lurking in your heart, you can no longer call it fear.”

Yes.

Morgoth believed that was why Jin Taekyung—and humans—could be strong.

Their lives were absurdly short, their bodies fragile.

Humans were undeniably weak. They had neither the long lives of elves, nor the dwarves’ strength, nor monsters’ ability to reproduce quickly.

But because they knew their own weakness and fear, they spent their lives struggling to grow stronger, each in their own way.

Like the person fighting his way through a curtain of magic that now surrounded him on all sides, closing in without a gap, relying on nothing but a single spear.

“And so, I too will grow stronger.”

Morgoth dropped the barest courtesy he had maintained for the sake of his own dignity, not his opponent’s. He let go of the last sliver of arrogance that remained. Then he added quietly:

“Because I’m… afraid of you, you bastard.”

At that moment—

CRACK—KABOOM!

The ground caved in within a radius of a hundred meters[3925] around Jin Taekyung. Countless thorny vines burst through the cracks and surged toward him.

Shwaaa!

A sharp whistle rang out from every direction.

This was no ordinary binding spell, nor were these common thorny vines.

Their stems were as thick as the trunks of mature trees, covered from end to end in enormous thorns.

They had drunk their fill of the Black Dragon's magical power instead of sunlight. Each one was strong enough to crush a human body in an instant, and Jin Taekyung could feel the power within them.

He also knew there was only one way to escape this tenacious magical prison closing in from every direction.

Grit.

He steadied his breathing. Clenched his teeth.

He planted a step with the weight of a thousand geun[3926] and used that foot as his pivot, gathering the internal energy he had left—not even half of what he'd started with—and pouring it into the tip of White Flame.

Then—

He swung.

A storm that swept everything away, and hellfire capable of burning anything.

Whooooooosh!

Fire Dragon's Single Tail.

In the midst of a life-or-death struggle, the first form of the Blazing Flame Divine Spear, at last reaching the edge of its realm, flowed along the spearhead.

The fiery storm spread beyond a single line into a vast circle, hungrily devouring everything in its path.

The ice and lightning that had ceaselessly blanketed the sky and rained down.

The thorny vines that surged from every direction, seeming to swim through the ground.

KABOOOOOM!

White ash and embers that had not yet gone out drifted like snowflakes, brushing past Jin Taekyung as he stood alone and upright in the heat haze rising from the ground.

At the same time, Morgoth instinctively knew.

Now that Jin Taekyung had poured out all the strength he had left at once, this was the moment he had been waiting for.

[3925] A hundred meters is about 328 ft.

[3926] A thousand Korean geun is 600 kg, or about 1,320 lb.

It was why he had waged a relentless war of attrition, using tens of thousands of monsters—and even the thousand Dragon-tooth soldiers he had spent so long creating—as bait.

"Dark Vine."

CRRACK!

Black thorny vines erupted again and surged toward Jin Taekyung.

And that wasn't all.

Rrrrumble!

"Gravity."

A force far beyond the bounds of ordinary gravity magic shook the sky. Magic spells of devastating power filled the gaps, each one as powerful as the dazzling flashes they produced.

All in one direction, for one purpose.

And this time, nothing unexpected happened.

BOOM! Shrrrk!

His knees buckled first under a weight of dozens of metric tons.[3927] Thick thorny vines slithered over him like living snakes and bound his whole body.

At the same time, dozens of spells converged in the air, shining down on one human like a small sun.

Jin Taekyung.

As Morgoth watched him, bound like a criminal and waiting for death to come, a thought suddenly crossed his mind.

If he hadn't been a Dragon.

Or if Jin Taekyung had possessed a Dragon Heart, brimming with power almost without limit like his own, perhaps Jin Taekyung would be the one standing there now instead of him.

But…

At least today, I was stronger.

It was the difference in what they had been born with.

The size of the vessel that could contain their power, the total amount of strength they possessed—those were different.

Morgoth and Jin Taekyung.

Jin Taekyung and Morgoth.

The two beings were different in every way, and each had fought the other with everything they had. But Morgoth's vessel of power was deeper and larger than Jin Taekyung's.

That was all.

[3927] A metric ton is 1,000 kg, or about 2,205 lb.

That was the sole reason this battle—and, beyond it, the fate of the world—had been decided.

Meeting you was the greatest amusement I have ever experienced.

With the highest praise he could offer, the Black Dragon opened his enormous jaws.

Vwooom.

The Dragon's heart, deep within his body, shuddered.

No matter how much he emptied and poured out, pure magical power continued to fill him without end. Its chillingly low rumble swirled between the Dragon's teeth, dark as a cave.

Dragon Breath.

A supreme power granted only to dragonkin.

Because he feared harming the Dragon-tooth soldiers, and because he had so little time to release it, its range and destructive power fell far short of their usual level.

But it was more than enough.

His only purpose was to erase a single human from this world without leaving a trace.

Jin Taekyung. The weakest of humans, and yet a hero more resilient than anyone.

Gooooong.

His chest suddenly swelled.

At the same time, the immense magical power flowing from the Dragon Heart—the purest, deepest darkness—finally became a single flash and shot forward.

Carrying heartfelt respect, and a murderous intent heavier still.

This is the end.

At that moment—

KABOOOOOM!

A beam of darkness, black enough to swallow the sun, tore through space like a bolt of lightning.

The world stopped.

Or at least, that was how it seemed to Jin Taekyung.

But his eyes, dimmer than usual, weren't fixed on the countless spells coloring the air, or the Dragon's breath, which held more power than all of them combined.

So this is what it was.

Jin Taekyung gazed clearly—not with his eyes, but with his mind.

At himself, thoroughly bound and forced to his knees.

At the enormous Black Dragon looking down on him with haughty disdain.

And at this world, and the secrets it had hidden.

It was a sensation that had come to him after another life-or-death struggle, one he had already experienced once in the not-so-distant past.

“People often fail to believe the truth, even when it’s right in front of them, and pass it by. It’s truly a pity.”

The voice echoed from his memory, belonging to the old man who had served as his Helper in the Tutorial, the Martial God without equal in all history—or the savior of humanity.

“You saw what cannot be seen, and avoided what cannot be avoided. So why can’t you believe what you did yourself?”

In another space, one that existed in neither dream nor reality, the Absolute One had asked him that question.

Back then, Jin Taekyung hadn’t answered.

No—he couldn’t.

He had been caught in a sensation that ruled his body and flesh.

Just like now.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

He heard it, but didn’t hear it.

SYSTEM

Martial arts are built through endless training and pain, and perfected in battles fought on the brink between life and death.

Congratulations. The Fire Dragon Divine Spear has reached Great Completion.

You have gained a tremendous amount of EXP and Fame as a reward.

Level Up!

Status effect Trance applied.

He saw it, but didn’t see it.

No-self.

True to the meaning of those two characters, Jin Taekyung forgot everything.

His memories up to that point. The many emotions lurking like thorns in his mind and heart.

Even Jin Taekyung himself.

And yet his pupils, now tinged with a deep blue-black light, were reading everything in the world.

Mind’s Eye.

Feeling something he hadn’t experienced since that day, Jin Taekyung lifted his spear as if entranced.

Chapter 1167

It wasn’t a simple thrust.

More precisely, it was something beyond attack or defense.

Why should it be either?

The question surfaced through Jin Taekyung’s hazy consciousness. He tilted the White Flame’s spearhead, wreathed in blue-black fire, upward.

Toward the Dragon’s Breath pouring down to blanket the sky.

Like a fool trying to stop a waterfall with an umbrella that had no fabric.

Shh.

A movement so simple it could hardly be called a form.

But what that tiny movement did next was beyond even an Ancient Dragon of unprecedented power and knowledge to predict.

Rrrrrumble!

Morgoth’s pupils widened.

As time resumed its rapid flow, his eyes flew wide before he even realized it.

What is this…?!

It was splitting apart.

A massive pillar of magical power, several meters[3928] in diameter, was splitting into dozens of streams the moment it touched the spearhead.

Even now, it continued to split.

How is that possible?

Morgoth had lived for thousands of years.

Sometimes as a human, an elf, or a dwarf. Sometimes wearing the hide of a monster. He had enjoyed the pleasures only the strong could afford and amassed countless experiences and knowledge.

That was precisely why Morgoth found this all the harder to understand.

How was such a thing possible?

How could a human smaller than his claw read the flow of energy within Dragon Breath?

But Morgoth’s questions were no more than empty echoes.

Even Jin Taekyung, lost in Trance, couldn’t properly answer them.

No—his consciousness had retreated somewhere so deep and distant that he didn’t even know what he was doing.

He simply followed what he saw.

Rrrrrumble!

Dark. Pitch-black in every direction.

[3928] Several meters is roughly 10–20 ft.

A muffled roar filled his ears. The magical power diverted up, down, left, and right by the spearhead had unwittingly formed a rounded barrier around Jin Taekyung alone.

At least, that was how it looked from the outside.

Fwoooosh.

Why?

It was bright. Radiant.

Though darkness seemed to have swallowed the world, Jin Taekyung's blue-black eyes saw countless lights glittering before him.

Beautiful.

He gazed at the strands of color filling his vision.

Some were red, others blue.

Some shone a dazzling white. Others held a darkness so pure he couldn't fathom its depth.

The dozens of kinds of Magic that arrived a step behind the Breath were just like that.

Water, fire, ice, gusts of wind, lightning.

Each was powerful enough to kill thousands. All had been cast for one purpose: to erase a single person from this world. Jin Taekyung was grateful that person was him.

Had those spells been aimed at his allies instead, they would have died horribly.

Inventory open. Summon.

It all happened in an instant.

An old iron spear appeared in midair, and at the same moment, Jin Taekyung instinctively drew up the energy in his Middle Dantian.

Fwoosh!

It was swift and powerful.

More so than ever before since he had opened his Middle Dantian.

Wreathed in flame, the iron spear streaked through space like a bolt of lightning. It pierced the core of every spell in its path before finally losing all its power.

KABOOOOOM!

Sky and earth shook.

The spells, which had exploded before reaching their target, painted the sky in a dazzling display. Witnessing the unbelievable sight, the Black Dragon opened his enormous jaws wide.

He drew even more power from the vast magical force dormant within his Dragon Heart.

Rrrrrumble!

An immense pressure came through the spearhead.

And then, beneath the Dragon's Breath pouring down harder and harder without pause, Jin Taekyung raised the knee buried deep in the ground.

I have to get up.

One thought filled his mind.

He had to go. There was no other choice.

And for now, he could forget everything else.

The pain of his bones slipping out of place.

The horrifying mass of magical power that threatened to swallow his body and spearhead at any moment.

The thorny vines constricting his entire body, and the immense gravity pressing down on both shoulders.

Crack!

His foot came forward, as unsteady as a child taking its first step.

But as the deep footprint showed, Jin Taekyung's strength and Will carried more weight than ever before.

More than mere Magic could hold back.

Crack!

The thorny vines wrapped around him like chains tore apart, and the gravity that had weighed on him like a ten-thousand-geun[3929] boulder began to weaken.

Crack.

One step.

Crack.

Another.

Slowly, without hesitation, Jin Taekyung advanced.

Toward the enormous shadow in his dream-blurred vision, with the spearhead shining alone at the center of the pitch-black Breath to light his way like a torch.

And behind him stood a comrade willing to brave any danger for his sake.

"May the flames of hell consume our enemies—"

The Grand Mage's cry rang through the din like a roar.

Fwoooosh!

The sky flushed red. A dozen or so fireballs emerged from between the storm clouds and took aim at the Black Dragon's head.

"Hell Fire!"

Rrrrrumble!

The spell was complete. A fierce heat rushed in, scorching the sky.

But Morgoth wasn't even slightly startled by this sudden attack.

[3929] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun is 6,000 kg (about 13,000 lb).

No—when he saw that it was Magic, not a blade, coming for him, he sneered in anger.

He was no one but a Dragon.

Born of wonder, one of the species that ruled Magic—and once the Dragon Lord who had led all his kind from the highest place.

Disappear.

He didn't even need to speak.

Morgoth possessed a powerful will and magical power greater still. His Magic existed in a realm beyond the reach of any other species, humans included.

PAAAM!

Anti Magic.

The Dragon's magical power devoured the human's mana.

Ash and embers scattered through the air. Far away, Magic Johnson—who had risked intervening while fighting the Guardians—coughed up blood and fell to his knees.

Mana Backlash.

The deadliest injury a mage could suffer.

Yet a gentle smile had formed on the Grand Mage's blood-soaked lips.

Because the brief opening he had created gave someone else a chance, even if only for a moment, to escape the gravity.

"Go, Jin."

His lips barely moved around the faint words.

Fwoosh.

Flames surged from the tip of Jin Taekyung's foot as it touched down.

Heat strong enough to overcome the momentarily weakened gravity and carry him beyond the range of the Magic surrounding a radius of dozens of meters.[3930]

KABOOM!

Energy compressed, then exploded.

And then—

A charge.

Whooooosh!

Jin Taekyung raced forward, cutting through the Dragon Breath that stretched ahead in a single line.

The closer he came—and the more danger Morgoth sensed—the fiercer the Breath pouring toward the ground became. It didn't matter.

If anything, the rougher it grew, the more clearly he could follow the flow of its power.

[3930] Dozens of meters is roughly dozens of yards; 20–90 m is about 66–295 ft.

Leaving behind the countless roars and screams blanketing the battlefield.

Without a moment's hesitation, he pressed on. Forward, and farther forward.

At last, as the Dragon's enormous shadow loomed over him like a mountain, Jin Taekyung instinctively knew what he had to do.

Fire Dragon Divine Spear, Second Form.

Heavenly Strike.

Rrrrrumble!

No one there had ever seen anything like it.

The spearhead, wreathed in blue-black flame, rose through the colossal pillar of darkness, cleaving it in two.

Like a dragon soaring into the sky.

Becoming the fire dragon itself.

It all began and ended in an instant.

Fwoooosh!

The darkness scattered. The Dragon's Breath had finally spent its power.

And a human had done it.

As Morgoth watched the unbelievable sight, he wondered where it had all gone wrong.

Had the arrogance and complacency deep in his heart grown into a snowball large enough to come crashing down on him like this?

Or—

Had the strength and will of a mortal with barely a hundred years to live truly surpassed his own?

No. That can't be.

His name was Morgoth.

Master of the lofty Silver Mountains. Archduke of the Demon Realm.

The ancient Black Dragon muttered to himself, alone in the slowed world, and spread his enormous wings.

Then he dove toward the small figure shooting skyward once more, cutting through the heavens.

PAAAM!

Compressed air exploded.

From sky to ground.

From ground to sky.

Two shadows shot toward each other.

The Dragon’s claw, wrapped in pitch-black magical power, and the spearhead filled with blue-black fire tore through space.

As if they had lived for this moment alone.

“I—I…!”

Beyond the howling wind, Morgoth let out a fierce cry and put everything he had into a slash of his massive claw.

At that same instant, he realized something.

The foreleg he had just swung had already been cut by someone else.

And the wound remained even now, after he had returned to his true form.

The Skeleton King.

A shallow wound, but one that had never healed.

To some, he had been no more than a trophy. To someone else, he had been a friend. Perhaps it was Morgoth’s instinct that made him remember, at that very moment, the final trace of the Skeleton King’s stubborn resolve.

Perhaps.

Just perhaps.

The long game he had played for thousands of years might finally be coming to an end.

And ominous instincts were never wrong.

Shhk.

A low, sharp slicing sound.

The spearhead, carrying its wielder’s Will, cut into the last trace his friend had left behind.

Chapter 1168

It connected.

And it cut.

That was all.

The whole thing began and ended in an instant. There was nothing more to explain.

Jin Taekyung had never harbored a trace of doubt. The hellfire spearhead he drove forward without hesitation could melt and cleave through anything.

Even a Dragon's bone and hide.

Shhk.

A hair's breadth.

That was all the difference.

Yet that sliver of distance, shorter than a dagger, made a difference as vast and deep as the distance between heaven and earth.

The enormous claw barely grazed his Fire Dragon Armor. But the spearhead rose in a perfect arc and drove straight into the tiny wound etched into the Dragon's foreleg.

Fwoooosh!

Blood burst forth like a waterfall.

Strangely silver, the Dragon's blood flooded Jin Taekyung's vision. Its vicious acidity even began to melt his exposed skin and parts of his Fire Dragon Armor.

He didn't care.

No—he had no reason to.

Compared to everything that had happened and everything still to come, this much pain was nothing.

Grit.

Jin Taekyung clenched his teeth against the faint pain.

Planting a foot on the Dragon's foreleg beneath him like a stepping-stone, he drove his tightly clenched fist forward with all his strength.

Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

BAM!

Compressed air exploded from the fist he drove forward like lightning.

The fierce heat in his knuckles swallowed the spray of blood, opening a new path beyond it.

Whoooosh!

He charged.

One man staking everything on a charge, a storm of hellfire that would melt and devour anything in its way.

CRRRUNCH!

A trail of flame cut forward like an icebreaker smashing through a glacier.

The spearhead, buried deep in the enemy's flesh and bone, spewed lava as it climbed higher and higher.

Flames rose in the wake of Jin Taekyung's arrowing form, so vivid and fierce that they drew the eyes of everyone still locked in battle.

Human and monster alike.

Not one of them was an exception.

Without realizing it, they lowered the blades in their hands or hid their sharp claws and fangs.

Every living thing that had survived this horrific battlefield sensed it instinctively.

That rising flame, devouring space itself, would decide all their fates.

If there were any exceptions, they were the two beings who had faced only each other from the start.

Leaving the vast battlefield and its countless watching eyes behind, the Ancient Dragon and the human raced toward their final moment, gazing at each other like figures in a myth.

Jin Taekyung.

Morgoth.

The names passed between them without a sound—not from their mouths, but through their eyes across the open air.

They heard without hearing.

And without speaking, they felt.

And he could feel the emotions in the enemy's eyes as they drew closer like the wind, as though defying the slowing of time.

What Jin Taekyung saw now was a Dragon's eyes filled with terrible pain and fear.

Yeah. It hurts, doesn't it?

With a thought that would never reach Morgoth, Jin Taekyung put more strength into his charge.

He ran up the Dragon's long, massive foreleg like a flight of stairs, toward the head towering above him like a skyscraper.

Like it hurt the people you killed with your own hands. Or the ones who lost someone precious because of you.

Jin Taekyung suddenly wished Morgoth's pained roar—every emotion he felt, every ounce of his suffering—could reach them all.

Tens of millions had died.

Hundreds of millions had lost family, friends, and homes.

That was why Jin Taekyung couldn’t stop.

It was what fueled his will to keep moving forward.

CRRRUNCH!

Perhaps that was why his will surpassed the limits of his body.

Why the flame on his spearhead, weakening as the emptiness in his lower dantian grew, roared back to life. Why, even as the Dragon’s acidic blood melted away parts of his skin and muscle, he no longer felt the pain.

Whoooooom!

The sky suddenly darkened. Gusts slammed in from both sides.

Jin Taekyung didn’t waver.

He simply swept the spearhead that had been cutting through the enemy’s body upward, toward the two wings bearing down on him with enough force to crush a mountain.

Shhhh.

The rolling flames rose at an angle.

One line, chillingly swift and savage.

In the arc of blue-black fire that suddenly appeared in the air were the Dragon’s two wings, which had ruled the vast sky and blanketed the earth for thousands of years.

Shhk!

—Kraaaaaa!

The Dragon’s body thrashed with a muffled scream. Jin Taekyung pressed down on it and dug in his toes.

Fwoosh—BAM!

Flamefire Path.

Propelled upward by an explosion worthy of its name, his figure appeared in Morgoth’s pitch-black eyes.

No—that wasn’t right.

He soared into the sky like a fire dragon that had finally reached the time of its ascension. His form wasn’t merely reflected in those eyes; it overflowed from them.

—…!

Is this what it feels like when time stops?

In that strange sensation, with every sound and movement around him gone, Morgoth watched Jin Taekyung.

He saw eyes sunk to unfathomable depths, their blue-black light unlike anything he had ever seen. He felt the countless fragments of emotion within them.

And, a step too late, he understood.

Too late.

Morgoth couldn’t tell whether reason or instinct had reached that conclusion. But one thing was certain.

In this world where everything had stopped, the spearhead slowly descending toward him was the only thing that moved. No ability he possessed could stop it or evade it.

That left him one path.

—Kraaaaaa!

His enormous jaws gaped open.

In the Ancient Dragon’s last, death-defying struggle, the immense magical power and countless teeth lurking within his maw flashed toward a single human.

And at that very moment—

Rrrrk.

Jin Taekyung gripped the spear shaft with all the strength he had left.

Muscles swelled throughout his body. Fire raced through hundreds of acupoints and spread to every limb and bone.

Thump. Thump. Thump.

His heart hammered furiously.

His lower dantian was so empty that the recovery he’d gained from leveling up might as well never have happened. His mind, pushed far beyond its limits, had been crying out with exhaustion for some time.

But he didn’t stop.

More precisely, he had no reason to.

I can see it.

In this new world painted with lines of every color, one trajectory shone brighter than all the rest.

Following the path he had read through the Mind’s Eye, Jin Taekyung poured all his strength and will into the spearhead.

Fwoosh—

As time began to move again, the flame on the spearhead wavered.

But it wasn’t a sign of danger. It was a change—and an evolution—that took place in an instant.

Shhhh.

The wavering flame gathered into one.

It came together and connected, no longer a flame but a single line, as though it had become the spearhead itself. Then, at last, it settled.

One step beyond fire’s innate savagery lay hellfire refined to the utmost degree.

It was a peak Jin Taekyung had reached through his own enlightenment. A third path no one had ever taught him.

Fire Dragon Divine Spear.

Third Form.

Fwoooosh.

Space twisted.

The spearhead, raised as though to cleave the sky, and the refined flame within it gave off a terrifying heat.

Like another sun prepared to bring forth a new sky.

Open Heaven.

A fierce shiver seized Jin Taekyung's body and mind. With a roar that made no sound, he brought down the hellfire spearhead.

KABOOOOOM!

The blue-black sun opened a world drowned in darkness.

They heard it, but didn't hear it.

They saw it, but didn't see it.

Amid mountains of corpses and rivers of blood, countless living creatures watched an unbelievable sight unfold in the distance. In that moment, they all felt the same thing.

A shudder.

They shuddered.

A flash too bright to look at filled their vision. A muffled roar blocked their ears. Yet every survivor could feel it clearly.

This long and terrible battle had finally come to an end.

As the light slowly faded, what emerged beyond it proved them right.

Fwoooosh.

A fierce wind swept through, wrapping around the enormous body as it fell, silver blood spraying from it like a waterfall.

Yes. It was a fall.

And with it came the downfall of an Ancient Dragon who had lived for thousands of years.

What falls has wings. But his wings would never take flight again.

KABOOOOOM!

The earth shook. Dust billowed up and swept across the area like a desert sandstorm.

Yet tens of thousands of eyes that had witnessed it all remained fixed on the sky.

More precisely, on the one figure moving through the terrible stillness weighing down on the world.

Step.

He walked slowly through the air as though climbing down an invisible staircase.

Even from a distance, he looked utterly exhausted. But no one there dared entertain the thought, or feel anything of the sort.

With the sky—its clouds torn away without a trace—at his back, he descended toward the ground against the falling sun. His very presence inspired an overwhelming awe.

As if he were something beyond human.

Or a glimpse of someone the world would remember forever, as that person had once been.

"…Sky."

The breathless murmur escaped someone's lips. Watching Jin Taekyung with trembling eyes, the others remembered one important thing they had forgotten.

They had won.

They—

No. Humanity had won.

And the one who had led them was a new savior of humanity.

Chapter 1169

The Dragon’s roar, which had pierced the clouds and shaken the sky, was gone. So were the two wings that had cast an immense shadow over the earth.

Yet there wasn’t the slightest emptiness in the endless sky.

If anything, it overflowed.

With the presence of a single being.

Another Dragon—the one who had brought the first crashing down.

“Jin!”

It happened in an instant.

The Grand Mage’s shout, amplified by Magic, swept across the battlefield. A moment later, tens of thousands of voices joined as one.

“Jin! Jin! Jin!”

As if they’d made a promise, they cried out with all their might.

They staunched the bleeding from severed arms and hauled their blood-soaked bodies upright.

They stared at the man walking down through the distant sky and shouted the name of the savior who had dragged from the heavens the evil Dragon that had nearly plunged the world into ruin.

Clang, clang, clang!

Countless spears and swords swayed like a forest in the wind, then surged toward the enemy like a wave.

Shhk! Krrrrrrunch!

The two waves that had surged toward each other, roiling with thick killing intent, were gone.

There were only humans advancing and monsters being swept away.

And amid that enormous scream and roar that shook heaven and earth, the clear sound of a bell rang in one man’s ear.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

SYSTEM

The fire dragon raises its tail and sweeps the earth (□□□□), then shakes the open sky (□□), and a new heaven shall open (□□).

You have forged your own path through deep insight into the Fire Dragon Divine Spear.

A new form has been added to the Supreme Peak martial art Fire Dragon Divine Spear. Its power and underlying principles have grown stronger.

Third Form, Open Heaven, has been registered. It will be recorded in the history of the Fire Gate Clan, and future generations will remember your name and your achievement.

You have accomplished the remarkable feat Learn from the Old, Know the New!

Your understanding of the Fire Gate Clan's martial arts has deepened. When using related martial arts, you can direct qi more freely and consume less internal energy.

The realm of Flamefire Path has increased!

The realm of Flame Divine Palm has increased!

...

...

...

Congratulations. Fire Gate Divine Technique and Qi Sense have reached the ninth star!

This is both a stairway to a new realm and a massive wall blocking your path. May martial fortune be with you.

You have gained insight into Mind's Eye. This ability activates only when certain conditions are met and causes extreme fatigue.

You have gained a tremendous amount of EXP and Fame.

Level Up!

Level Up!

All injuries have been healed as a result of leveling up.

Status effect Trance has been lifted.

The moment the last holographic window appeared in his blurry vision—

Squish.

Jin Taekyung's foot came down on the ground, soaked in someone's blood, as he stumbled forward as if about to collapse.

Sssssss.

Thick steam rose in the wake of his staggering steps.

But he knew that even blood this fiercely acidic could no longer harm a single hair on his head.

So did the owner of the silver blood flowing like a small river.

“Morgoth.”

At Jin Taekyung’s quiet voice, the Ancient Dragon’s eyelids, shut without so much as a twitch, slowly lifted.

“You’re late. Why did you take so long?”

His breath came raggedly, and his upper body had half melted away.

Between the cracks in his chest lay a large black jewel.

No—a Dragon Heart.

Despite Morgoth’s calm tone, he was in a ghastly state. Jin Taekyung dropped down beside him.

“I was tired. Thanks to someone.”

That was neither a lie nor an exaggeration.

Though he’d completely shattered the Dragon’s Breath, the force of its aftermath had destroyed his divine weapon, the Fire Dragon Armor. And the mental exhaustion that had built up throughout the battle was beyond imagining.

It would have been no surprise if he lost consciousness then and there.

If leveling up hadn’t healed his body, Morgoth wouldn’t have been the only one lying here.

“Lucky for me.”

“Luck.”

Morgoth murmured the word to himself and studied Jin Taekyung with his enormous eyes.

His clothes hung in tatters, leaving him nearly half-naked, and blood and dust covered his body.

But that was only his outward appearance. The skin visible through the rags was as smooth as a newborn’s.

Though Morgoth couldn’t sense even the slightest trace of healing magic.

“I don’t think luck alone explains it.”

“I was born with heaven-sent luck.”

“Are you sure?”

“What do you mean?”

“That doesn’t quite sound right. Perhaps…”

With his gaze turned toward the sky steeped in sunset, Morgoth continued.

“Divine favor. That might be the most accurate way to put it.”

“…!”

“You can use subspace freely without ever learning a single spell, let alone becoming a Grand Mage. And healing power like that… Yes. It’s hard to explain without divine favor.”

For a moment, Jin Taekyung fell silent.

God.

Ever since that blisteringly hot summer several years ago, when he’d obtained the capsule and woken in Murim, God had seemed both closer to him and farther away than anything else.

That one word, surfacing so suddenly in a conversation he’d never expected, disturbed his thoughts like a rock thrown into a still lake.

Before he could steady himself from the confusion that had seized him for just an instant, Morgoth continued.

“Do you believe in God?”

Morgoth asked the rigid Jin Taekyung without warning, then went on without waiting for an answer.

“I do. I always have.”

Of course he did.

Morgoth had always thought that he himself was practically a blessing from God.

A lifespan approaching immortality. Immense power granted at birth.

That was what Dragons were, and even among them, Morgoth stood apart.

Perhaps that was why the greatest scholar, warrior, and mage of any race on the continent had sought to draw closer to God.

“Every desire I pursued, every pleasure I sought—all of it was for that alone.”

Now Morgoth confessed without holding anything back.

His entire life had served a single purpose: to meet the absolute being who had created humans, elves, dwarves, and even monsters.

“So much time has passed in vain. Before I knew it, I had become a being who was everywhere and nowhere. Much like the God I’d sought for so long.”

He had been a creator and destroyer of the world, and a wanderer through it.

He had founded an empire that ruled the entire continent, then broken it into pieces. He had lived as a member of every race in the world, learning their ways and their rules.

But God never appeared.

Not even when the greatest of God’s creations, pursuing the faintest clue, reached into the realm of an unforgivable taboo.

“That was how I left for the Demon Realm. No—I suppose it would be more accurate to say I met him. As it happened, he was on his way to my homeland, too.”

“If you mean him—”

“Asmodeus. The most cursed demon since the heavens opened and the earth awoke. The most terrible nightmare, and the ruler of the Demon Realm.”

“…!”

“We fought, and he won. I was crushed by helplessness and defeat unlike anything I’d ever known.”

But even in the humiliation he felt for the first time in his life, Morgoth found the answer to a question.

“Before I met Asmodeus, a thought occurred to me. If I couldn’t find God anywhere in the land where I’d lived for thousands of years, perhaps God existed in another world, in a form I’d never expected.”

Morgoth had been wrong.

Demon King Asmodeus was unquestionably a powerful being beyond Morgoth’s reach, but he could never be called a god.

“In the end, I had to continue my long journey. Even if it meant burning my homeland and striking down my own kind under Asmodeus, of all beings.”

Jin Taekyung’s eyes trembled as he listened to the story drift by like the wind. The old Dragon didn’t miss it.

“You won’t understand. Perhaps no one would. But I had a goal I absolutely had to achieve. I believed I’d been born for it.”

And so Morgoth survived.

Though he had been the Dragon Lord, he killed dozens of his own kind and took their hearts. With the power he gained, he became the Archduke of the Demon Realm, second only to Asmodeus.

A long time passed again. Then he heard news that was hard to believe.

“A mere human defeated Asmodeus? At first, I didn’t even find it funny.”

But it was true.

Some of the monsters who had returned to the Demon Realm through the Gates relayed everything they had seen and heard. Soon everyone in the Demon Realm plunged into utter chaos—everyone except Morgoth.

He thrilled at the news.

In another world, one he hadn’t known existed, someone had appeared who had defeated Asmodeus—the being closer to God than any Morgoth had ever encountered.

The astonishing news was enough to revive his interest, slowly worn down beneath the weight of years piled up like dust.

And at last, the Ancient Dragon’s long-held wish had been answered.

Right here, today.

“It was the first time. In all the thousands of years I’d watched the order of things remain unchanged, you were the first being I’d seen defy it.”

At that moment—

Pop.

The Skeleton King's head appeared out of nowhere and dropped into Jin Taekyung's arms as though nestling against him.

"Jin Taekyung. Great human hero. No…"

Morgoth's body edged closer to death, but his voice and gaze shone more vividly than ever.

"You who were chosen by God."

Chapter 1170

The relief of finally getting the Skeleton King back lasted only a moment.

Jin Taekyung's eyes darkened at the words that came through the Dragon's bloodied teeth.

"I was chosen by God?"

Morgoth gave a dry laugh at the question, spoken almost to himself.

"If you're asking me, that's foolish."

"What does that—"

"Jin Taekyung, I don't know everything about you. I can only guess. Even Asmodeus, who brought countless worlds to their knees with his immense power, would be no different. He may be omnipotent, but he is not omniscient."

Of course.

Omniscient and omnipotent described only one being.

God.

A being nowhere to be seen, yet present everywhere.

One who knew all things and could do all things.

But Morgoth was looking not at the sky, but at Jin Taekyung.

At a human wearing the shadow of the God he had spent thousands of years searching for like a cloak.

"Ask yourself, not me. The answer is there."

"…!"

Jin Taekyung's eyes trembled. His body went rigid.

He gave no answer.

No—he couldn't answer.

A shiver raced up his spine as a wave of memories swept over him without warning.

Asmodeus is dead. On the day I was born. The day of our victory.

At the heart of the enormous temple built in the desert, the Jin Taekyung of the past spoke through gritted teeth to the enemy before him.

He was erased, and we won. That's all. That's the truth.

The hoarse voice coming from his lips sounded strange, as if it belonged to someone else.

Watching him, the monster of the abyss—the Doppelganger—smiled.

That is also true, Jin Taekyung, chosen one. It must be all you know, and the truth as you understand it.

Chosen one.

When Jin Taekyung first heard those strange words from the Doppelganger, he had no idea he would soon hear them again from someone he never expected.

So it was you.

In the imperial palace's grand banquet hall, covered in the rebels' blood and corpses, the Bow Saint finally revealed her identity and spoke.

The chosen one the Martial God spoke of.

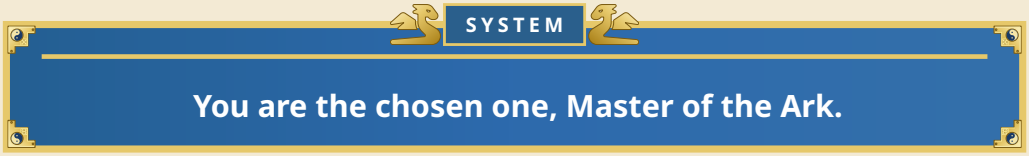
Right.

This wasn't the first time.

The Doppelganger. The Bow Saint. The Martial God, who had left her a letter.

Even the System had called him the chosen one.

On the very day he erased the Doppelganger.



Remembering that brief System message, Jin Taekyung looked at Morgoth.

More precisely, at his own reflection in the Dragon's enormous eye.

"You're right."

Though exhaustion weighed on his body, his eyes shone more clearly than ever.

Jin Taekyung continued, as if whispering to himself.

"Maybe… I already knew the answer."

He'd always wondered where this incredible power he'd acquired one day had come from, and who had given it to him.

But he'd kept denying it. Doubting it.

Why him?

Of all the billions of people in the world, why had an insignificant F-rank Hunter been chosen?

If such an omniscient and omnipotent God truly existed, why hadn't He personally stopped the countless tragedies and disasters that had happened?

But the instant Morgoth turned the question back on him, he understood why he'd kept looking away from a truth so plain before his eyes.

"It was too much. Everything I had to carry, every moment."

His father's untimely death. The family he left behind. A life that could continue only by standing on someone else's sacrifice.

The burdens took different forms, but they weighed the same.

Each one pressed down on his body and mind like a mountain.

"Maybe that's why I came to resent God."

"Resent Him?"

Morgoth laughed at the unexpected answer, bloody phlegm rattling in his throat.

“Interesting. You, who should be more grateful to Him than anyone?”

“I’ve lost too much for that. Things that mattered more than anything.”

“You gained things, too. They must have mattered to you.”

“Yeah. And the more they matter, the heavier they are. Now they’re almost too much to bear.”

“Do you really think so?”

“You don’t know me. You know even less about humans.”

“No. I know them well. Perhaps better than any of you.”

With that calm reply, Morgoth looked out at the world sinking into the colors of sunset.

“This place is certainly different. It’s nothing like the world where I was born and raised.”

Of course it was.

This strange world called Earth had neither three moons and a sun, nor twelve continents and nine seas.

Nor did it have great cities built and sustained entirely by magic, or vividly colored wilderness teeming with spirits.

There were no other races living across the world, each guarding its own territory.

If the disaster called the Great Cataclysm hadn’t brought such enormous changes, the contrast would have been even starker.

“But I found one exception. Even if Asmodeus had never invaded this world, that one thing would have remained the same.”

Jin Taekyung suddenly realized what Morgoth was about to say.

“Humans.”

“Yes. You humans. The weakest and most foolish beings of all the races I’ve seen and known. That was what I found so strange.”

Looking straight at Jin Taekyung, Morgoth added,

“Even in the world I left long ago, humans were always the rulers.”

“…!”

“At first, I couldn’t understand it. Your lifespans and wisdom couldn’t match the elves. You weren’t physically gifted like the dwarves, and you didn’t even have the reproductive capacity of monsters.”

And yet, humans had thrived in Morgoth’s homeland.

The civilization they built was so dazzling that no race except the Dragons could match it. The fame of their extraordinary mages and knights had crossed the seas and shaken every continent.

The race Morgoth had thought inferior in every way had seized dominion over a world.

After a longer period of study and amusement than any before it, he had finally found an answer.

"Desire. You humans are made of endless desire. That's why you keep changing."

He had found the answer, but he still couldn't understand it.

Humans were that complicated.

When they were weak, they banded together as if they'd made a pact. Once their groups grew large, they split apart again and again.

Even after gaining more than enough, they continued to fight.

To capture beautiful elves and enslave them.

To plunder the dwarves' mines, where gold and treasure lay.

To use monster parts to study Magic and make sharper, sturdier weapons.

They even fought to kill their own kind and take their land.

They didn't fight to survive. They bled and died to gain something more.

Desire had turned to greed.

"But not all humans were like that. If some were ruled by instincts uglier than a monster's, there were others at the opposite extreme."

The eyes that had once glinted like obsidian had long since lost their light.

Morgoth looked at Jin Taekyung, his vision slowly fading.

"Like you."

"…What are you trying to say?"

"You're human, too. You have desires rooted deep in your heart, and you must have kept changing to fulfill them, whether you wanted to or not."

"That's—"

Jin Taekyung fell silent.

Everything Morgoth said was true.

At first, he'd simply wanted to get stronger.

He'd wanted to break free of the limits placed on him, earn more money and fame, and become a son and older brother his family could be proud of.

But by the time he realized it, everything had changed.

And he'd taken on an enormous responsibility he had never imagined—could never have imagined—just two years earlier.

Then how have I managed to bear all this until now?

This time, too, the answer was close at hand.

I changed, too. Enough to bear the responsibility as it kept getting heavier. I kept changing.

And the world called that something else. Not change.

Growth.

He had grown, and he was still growing.

A child had become a boy, a boy had become a young man—and before he knew it, a torch lighting the way for all humanity. A new savior.

That was why what Jin Taekyung held deep in his heart was the purest of desires, and at the same time, something beyond the word desire.

“Hope.”

In that moment, Morgoth could feel it.

The power and bright vitality in the word that had passed through those parched lips.

“Hope. Is that the answer you found?”

Jin Taekyung shook his head.

“That’s what I thought. But it wasn’t.”

“Then?”

“I’d just forgotten it for a while. I was so overwhelmed that struggling through one suffocating moment after another was all I could manage.”

That was exactly it.

He hadn’t found hope. He had remembered it.

A feeling he’d forgotten somewhere along the way.

Though everyone looked at him and thought of hope, Jin Taekyung himself hadn’t felt at ease for a single moment.

Because he was the torch.

He had to press forward alone at the very front, fighting the deepest darkness.

But not anymore.

Jin Taekyung hoped more fervently than ever. He wished and prayed.

That he would survive to the end alongside those who were fighting even now, shouting his name.

And that this goddamn story would, please, have a happy ending.

“Honestly, I don’t care who chose me. Even if it was all a delusion or a misunderstanding.”

Using his spear as a cane, Jin Taekyung pushed his exhausted body to its feet.

“I’ve made it this far, and I’ll see it through.”

Shing.

The spearhead flashed in the sunset, its edge as keen as ever—like its master’s unwavering will.

“One question.”

“You may ask.”

“Why?”

The question was brief, but Morgoth knew what Jin Taekyung meant.

Why had he given back the Skeleton King so readily?

Why speak and act this way toward the one who was about to end his life of thousands of years?

To Morgoth, though, the answer was obvious. Simple.

“Because if you become even a little stronger, what comes next will be more interesting.”

“What?”

Morgoth laughed aloud at Jin Taekyung’s stiff-faced reply.

There was a longing for amusement in that laugh, a longing he couldn’t give up even with death before him. And there was mockery of himself.

Yes, Asmodeus. Now I understand why you summoned me to this world.

He had realized it far too late, but this was enough.

He had seen a being who stood outside the ordained order and confirmed the existence of a human chosen by God.

And—

That thing around his neck… Yes. There’s no mistaking it.

Morgoth had caught a clear glimpse of something through the tatters of Jin Taekyung’s clothes.

He could sense it just as clearly.

A mysterious energy, neither mana nor magical power, enveloped it completely.

How fortunate. At least I could confirm a trace of that person.

As those words faded into emptiness within him, Morgoth gathered the last of his strength and opened his mouth.

“Now, shall we begin a new amusement?”

In that instant—

Shwaa!

The dazzling sunset shattered along the streak of light shooting toward the Dragon Heart.

Chapter 1171

It was like a jewel.

A jewel of such beauty and mystery that no work of art in the world—not even all of them combined—could compare.

But the thing casting its ominously dark light in every direction was no mere mineral.

Dragon Heart.

Just as its name implied, it was the heart and source of power of the mighty race known as Dragons.

And now, the Dragon Lord who had been wiser and more powerful than any since heaven and earth were divided—and who had fallen deeper into corruption than any other Dragon—knew his long life had come to an end.

He felt it in his body. In his soul.

And heard it in the sound ringing through his ears like thunder.

Crack.

Hairline fractures spread across the smooth surface like a spiderweb.

The Dragon Heart had barely held its shape through its master's fierce will and the last of his strength. Now nothing could stop the cracks.

There was only a streak of light to hasten the destruction already waiting for it.

Crunch!

It broke. Split apart.

The sunset light flowing along the spearhead, and the Dragon's heart that had never allowed another's touch.

Rumble.

Darkness gushed out in place of blood.

The air trembled, as if the world itself knew what was about to happen.

Yet even as his life faded, the Demon Dragon never took his eyes off the Divine Dragon who had driven a spearhead into his heart.

"Fight with all the strength you've been given. Keep surpassing yourself. Keep struggling."

There was no regret, anger, or curse in the words he murmured.

They were encouragement his listener could not understand, and a deep wistfulness at the astonishing amusement he would not live to see.

"…So I can see it from wherever I am."

At that moment—

Rumble.

Everything in the area stopped moving.

The wind. The air.

Even the Dragon's enormous body, now that it had breathed its last after a life beyond imagining.

And then—

Whoooooom!

The Dragon Heart overflowed, spilling the millennia of time and nearly infinite magical power stored within it in every direction.

Darkness and brilliance were words that should never belong together.

But in that moment, everyone on the battlefield saw and felt them both:

A pillar of dazzling darkness surging skyward, and an enormous power erupting with enough force to shake the world.

And the first to feel it, closer than anyone else, was naturally Jin Taekyung.

Whoosh—

The instant pitch-black darkness swallowed his vision, there was no time to think.

Jin Taekyung moved on instinct alone.

He pulled his spearhead from the Dragon's heart, tucked the Skeleton King's head —recovered at last—deep against his chest, and curled up like a fetus.

The next instant, a wave of magical power tore through the brief silence and crashed over him.

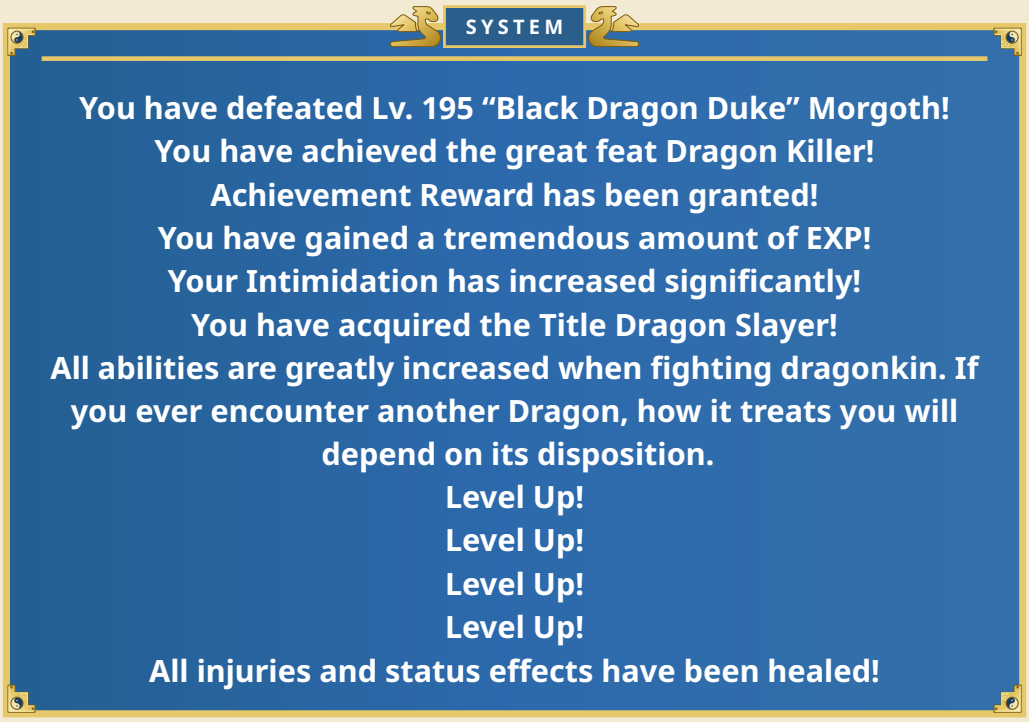
Rumble, rumble!

A deafening roar filled his ears, and the world turned upside down.

Sky and earth spun past his eyes again and again. A sensation of weightlessness took hold of his entire body.

Yet Jin Taekyung stayed conscious through the chaos, thanks to his own fierce will —and the clear chime that even the roar could not drown out.

Ding. Ding. Ding.



System notifications.

The surest proof that he had survived yet another crisis.

Maybe that was why Jin Taekyung was finally ready to let go of the thread of consciousness he had been clinging to with all his strength.

I want to rest.

That was all he could think about.

He didn’t care what happened next.

His body was still hurtling into the distance like a cannonball, but what did that matter?

Morgoth was dead. His vast monster army had been shattered and reduced to prey.

Even if Jin slammed into something and broke a few bones, he would be fine.

No—he might not even feel pain.

If he closed his eyes now, he would fall straight into a sleep deep enough to ignore any physical pain.

Everything was over. Nothing stood between him and rest.

Right. Nothing.

At least, Jin Taekyung was sure of that until, just before his terribly heavy eyelids fell shut, he heard a voice beside his ear.

“Damn it. This is awful.”

At first, he thought he had imagined it.

Or perhaps the rushing wind had made him hear things.

But neither was true.

He wasn’t asleep yet, and the voice that followed was so clear it proved all of this was real.

“Of all places to wake up, it had to be in the arms of a man reeking of sweat.”

The gruffness of that voice only made it more welcome. Jin Taekyung forced his eyes open with every ounce of strength he had.

He stared blankly at the speaker, who had somehow awakened in his arms. Then he opened his mouth.

“You can’t smell anything. You’re undead.”

“…You bastard.”

A brief silence, then a single curse.

But laughter slipped through the words, and the golden energy tracing the brow of the pure-white skull burned like a torch.

It fed on the Dragon’s magical power overflowing all around them and blazed more fiercely than ever.

Whoosh!

In an instant, the thick darkness spreading on the wind shot toward Jin Taekyung.

No—the being in his arms was drawing it in.

As rain awakens life, the sun lends it strength, and the soil nourishes its growth.

Fwoosh.

The more darkness seeped in, the clearer the golden energy became.

Beyond those two contrasting streams of color, a shadow steadily grew.

No one had ever seen anything like it.

Regeneration. Resurrection.

Perhaps even a new birth.

But the thing that grew by devouring all the darkness around it was no ominous presence.

Even if someone else might point at him and curse him, Jin Taekyung would never see him that way.

He shone as brightly as the radiant golden crown above him.

Rustle.

Jin Taekyung blinked.

His view had stopped spinning. The wind that had whipped past like blades was gone.

Through his dreamlike, hazy consciousness, he could make out only the familiar touch of someone carefully laying him on the ground, and a single line of text hovering above that person’s head.

Lv. 180 “Lord of the Dead” Undead King

The friend he had met again after a brief farewell had changed a little. Jin Taekyung let out a hollow laugh at the sight, remembering the day they had joined forces to defeat the Arch Lich.

"You've grown a lot, Bones."

The Skeleton—or rather, the Undead King—replied as casually as ever to words that still stood clear in his memory.

"Well, I was always a little taller."

"Bullshit."

"Now, now. How vulgar."

Then the two friends burst out laughing as if they had planned it.

Neither knew exactly what the other had been through while they were apart. But they knew one thing for certain.

They had trusted each other and fought to protect what they held dear.

"Human."

"What?"

"You've been through a lot."

Had he finally reached his limit? His friend's voice sounded as distant as an echo. Jin Taekyung answered faintly.

"…Yeah. You too."

Rest easy.

Ordinarily, Jin Taekyung would have grumbled, What, is someone dying? But he had nothing left.

Rest easy.

That short, tempting offer was more powerful than Morgoth's magic, and his exhausted mind was already poised to defy his will.

Thump.

His head drooped, and his eyelids shut tight. The Undead King watched as his friend sank into a deep sleep, as if he'd passed out the instant the words were spoken.

Then he murmured, as if to himself, the words he hadn't quite been able to add.

"…Though it'll be far too short a rest to rest easy."

If Jin Taekyung's mind had held out just a little longer, he would have understood exactly what those words meant.

No—he surely would have realized it himself, without being told.

The Jin Taekyung he knew had power and instincts every bit as remarkable as his foul temper.

But the massive Grand Mage who had drawn close without anyone noticing was also, without question, one of the most extraordinary people alive.

"Why? Why on earth?"

His voice shook with confusion. So did his eyes.

Magic Johnson dragged his battered body forward, looking around as if entranced.

The joy of reunion and victory had long since left his mind.

He had come to check on Jin Taekyung, but the ominous pulse of power from every direction had made him forget why he was there.

Rumble.

Magic Johnson gritted his teeth.

As a mage who had reached such heights, he could sense it all the more clearly: energy as dark as it was boundless, thick and clinging as a swamp.

Magical power.

So pure and dense that it brought back the decades-old memory of the Great Cataclysm at its height. It was saturating everything around him.

"…Dragon Heart."

Humanity's last Grand Mage trembled before he knew it. He understood the cause.

The Undead King had absorbed a vast amount of magical power, yet beside this nearly infinite source, that amount was nothing.

But the thought that had suddenly occurred to Magic Johnson was darker and more ominous than the magical power the Dragon Heart continued to pour out.

"Surely…?"

"Yes."

The Undead King tried to sound calm, but fear crept into his voice as he watched the darkness swell.

"It's begun. No—to be precise, it's complete."

He was right.

This was the final piece of the enormous puzzle. The key.

The death of the greatest and most powerful Dragon had completed the beginning of another catastrophe.

Beep.

A cold mechanical tone rang out, audible only to the chosen—yet, at this moment, reaching no one.

Rumble, rumble!

With a tremendous roar that shook the world, the pillar of magical power connecting heaven and earth exploded.

Like an active volcano with all its preparations complete.

Chapter 1172

“Active volcano” was no exaggeration.

If anything, it fell woefully short.

From the moment the last breath of the evil Dragon that had terrorized the whole world for thousands of years dispersed, an unstoppable catastrophe had been racing along its predetermined course.

An eruption—or an explosion.

It didn’t matter what you called it.

As if this were all it had left to do, the Dragon Heart slipped beyond its master’s control for the first time and vomited everything it had accumulated over untold ages into the world.

Using the body of the Dragon that had finally met its end as kindling, it raged more fiercely than a newly awakened active volcano.

Roooar!

Before the deafening roar that shook heaven and earth even reached their ears, everyone on the battlefield felt its terrifying shock wave.

The S-rank Hunters gathering the bodies of the seven Guardians who had found peace with Morgoth’s death—no, their former comrades.

The thousands of Hunters pursuing monsters that had lost the will to fight and scattered in every direction.

At that enormous, instinct-stirring rumble, they all turned their heads in the same direction as if on cue. Then they froze like statues.

Fwoooosh.

A chilling cold carried on the wind. A dark, ashen mist.

And beyond it, a towering pillar of pitch-black darkness, vast beyond comprehension.

“What is that…?”

The groan that slipped from someone’s lips spoke for everyone staring at the scene in stunned disbelief.

The evil Dragon—Morgoth—was dead. Of that there was no doubt.

They had won here today. The immediate danger was gone.

So why?

Why did that deep, pitch-black darkness feel more frightening than the unprecedented monster that had split the sky and poured its deathly breath down upon the earth?

They already knew the answer.

Their senses and minds, frozen by the icy magical power, simply hadn't responded quickly enough to the memory of that day—the day that had arrived without a word of warning just a few decades ago.

But two beings recognized what was happening before anyone else, and more clearly.

"…We have to stop it."

The Lord of the Dead spoke to the Grand Mage, who was muttering as though possessed by something unseen, his voice vacant.

"We can't stop it."

Unlike Magic Johnson's, the Undead King's tone was calm.

As if he'd already given up on everything.

But he hadn't.

There was still hope in his words, however faint—a tiny ember that had yet to lose its light.

"At least, not right now."

Holding his unconscious friend in his arms, the Undead King felt warmth against his fingertips as he spoke softly.

That was right.

Their hope hadn't gone out yet.

And protecting that ember was the best they could do now.

"We're leaving. Right now."

Before something happened that couldn't be undone.

Unable to force out the words that had risen to his throat, the Undead King turned away with Magic Johnson.

The sky above them was no longer filled with mere storm clouds. It was turning to pure darkness, casting a cold shadow over them.

The Great Cataclysm.

The ominous name humanity had forgotten over the past few decades was branded into everyone's minds once more.

And even after the Grand Mage's large-scale Warp Magic Formation appeared and vanished in a dazzling flash, a hard mechanical beep—one that hadn't reached its owner—continued to ring out somewhere in the world.

Beep.

SYSTEM

The distribution and concentration of magical power are skyrocketing. Take action immediately.
Current Rift Progress: 73%
When the Rift reaches a certain level, the ferocity and strength of monsters increase significantly.
Current Rift Progress: 85%
When the Rift reaches a certain level, the danger posed by Gates and the probability of a Monster Wave increase significantly.
Current Rift Progress: 90%

.
.
.

SYSTEM

You have failed to meet the Quest success requirements.
Mission: Defeat "Black Dragon Duke" Morgoth (Complete)
Halt the Rift's progress (Incomplete)
Main Quest Rift and Collapse has failed.
A new Main Quest, The Foreordained Collapse, has been created.
Good luck.

The System never lied.

And even people who didn't know it existed had no need for its warning messages. The changes were dramatic enough on their own.

Or like a marauder who barged in without warning.

"The magical power levels…! They're skyrocketing!"

"It's not just the Moscow area! St. Petersburg and Novosibirsk—and even the Kazan region…!"

Like waves crashing into one another, panicked shouts from all directions swallowed each other up.

Eyes webbed with red veins. Veins bulging along people's necks.

The pit of this dreadful chaos wasn't confined to any one place.

It was unfolding in underground bunkers around the world, where the people who ran entire nations had gathered; in cabinet meeting rooms; and, on a smaller scale, anywhere with an internet connection.

The Hunters still on the battlefield weren't the only ones who witnessed the unbelievable phenomenon.

When a spearhead wreathed in flames cut through Morgoth and the thick storm clouds covering Moscow's sky, billions of people had been given a brief chance to watch a battle that would decide their fate.

They shuddered at the sight of the evil Dragon falling, then cheered the young hero who had saved them once again.

But humanity didn't know that the single ray of light shining on them in their deepest despair would fade before the tears they shed had even dried.

Rumble.

Those watching the unstable, grainy feed transmitted from a satellite suddenly realized something was wrong.

A gigantic pillar spewed darkness so vivid it looked unnatural, like a black hole sucking everything in.

That was all they saw.

A blinding, oppressive beam of light—though light seemed impossible to associate with that darkness—closed the sky. This time, it never opened again.

And the darkness that had swallowed Moscow began to multiply.

Roooar.

Like a horse galloping across the wilderness, the darkness raced silently through a world gone quiet.

East, west, south, north.

Wherever its hooves passed, the light vanished.

Just as it had blotted out the sunset over Moscow, the darkness devoured every light.

Even the blazing sun couldn't pierce the darkness. No—the pure, profound magical power. The stars in the sky vanished, too.

By the time the Dragon Heart had poured out all its strength and crumbled to dust, the catastrophe now in full bloom had already scattered its spores across the world.

Just like now.

"Code Red! Code Red! Mutated Gate detected!"

"Mutated Gate? Shit, you're calling that Code Red? Report only Monster Waves!"

The superior's bark was understandable.

A few years ago, a Mutated Gate would have covered the front page of morning papers and dominated every breaking-news broadcast. Now the situation was so urgent that even that had become something to dismiss.

But the shout that came next was so clear and shocking that it wiped his jumbled thoughts clean in an instant.

“A-all Gates across Eurasia are mutating at once.”

“What?”

“At least twenty percent of them have reached levels high enough to progress into Monster Waves…”

He didn’t hear the rest.

Seized by a sudden ringing in his ears, the superior fell silent. He squeezed out every last bit of strength and managed to say one thing.

“Tell the higher-ups immediately.”

“Which higher-ups, exactly…?”

There was no time to answer.

There were more than a thousand Gates scattered across Europe and Asia.

Shoving aside his hesitant subordinate, the superior picked up a special communications device he hadn’t touched once in the more than ten years since he’d been appointed head of this place.

A direct line to one place and one place only.

After a signal that seemed to ring on forever, someone answered. A tremor crept into the recipient’s voice as they summed up the situation.

“Activate Code Black.”

That was the end of the call.

But both of them knew that this brief conversation, lasting less than a minute, would go down in history.

As would anyone who understood what Code Black meant.

And those facing the recipient on-screen—the person who had just set down the receiver, the President of the United States—belonged to the tiny fraction of humanity privy to that top-secret information.

“It’s begun.”

“…Yes. In the end.”

Though they differed in race and gender, these two hundred or so people shared one thing: they all led a nation. For a while, they looked at one another in silence.

There was only one exception among them: a distinctly young East Asian man.

He wasn’t a national leader, nor did he have the seasoned political instincts they did. But he had every right to attend this gathering.

He was also the person who best understood the wishes of someone unable to attend today.

“It’s begun, but it isn’t over.”

His face was still healing, his hair matted with blood.

But no one criticized him for appearing before them like that without showing proper respect.

No—they wouldn’t dare.

The young man before them was a hero who had bled and fought for the world in their place.

Just as his grandfather, recorded in humanity’s history, had—and just as those who had fallen in Moscow today had.

Standing alone, as if his place here belonged to someone else, Choi Minwoo continued, his eyes and voice burning like torches.

“We will end this war.”

The ominous code name that hadn’t been spoken anywhere for decades: Code Black.

No—the Great Cataclysm.

The irreversible war had already begun, and the hero was not dead yet.

Chapter 1173

Humans are creatures that learn.

Of course, they sometimes forget important things. But if they forgot everything without ever learning a thing, humanity as we know it wouldn't exist.

They kept learning, little by little.

Over millions of years, they never stopped advancing.

They learned to use fire and shape stone, until at last they glimpsed the boundless void above the clouds.

But for humanity, which had built a great civilization over such an unfathomable stretch of time, thirty-odd years were far too short to forget the horrific catastrophe known as the Great Cataclysm.

Wheeeeeee!

A blaring siren swept over the city—no, over the entire world.

It spread faster than the magical power rising from the frozen lands of the Far East could stain the sky, with an urgency beyond comparison.

Naturally, every available person and resource was thrown into action without restraint.

Governments declared martial law and deployed the military to evacuate their citizens to safe zones. The whole process moved swiftly and efficiently.

For better or worse, the fear that had gripped people since Morgoth's appearance meant they had either evacuated already or were ready to leave at a moment's notice.

But even those still beneath the blue sky faced no less danger.

—Monster Wave detected 3.2 kilometers[3931] away to the east and west!

—Sending location and scale. Deploy immediately!

The System was right again.

The rift stage was over. The Collapse had begun.

As magical power spiraled out of control, countless Gates scattered around the world opened their dark maws, one after another. Monsters poured out of that cursed world, rampaging with greater strength and savagery.

Just like now.

Rumble, rumble.

The ground trembled at vibrations coming from far away.

So did the hand gripping the handle of a Tower Shield bigger than its owner, tight enough to crush it.

Thump.

[3931] 3.2 kilometers is about 2 miles.

At the heavy touch that suddenly landed on his shoulder, the young man jumped as if burned. Then he let out a sigh of relief.

"…Team Leader."

"You're jumpy, kid."

The middle-aged man grinned, showing his teeth through his bristly beard. The young man might have been annoyed, but he swallowed hard and answered.

"N-no, I'm not."

"Sure you are. I can tell. Just be honest."

"Well… a little."

"Look at this guy. You call yourself a Hunter, and you're scared before the fight's even started?"

"…I'm sorry."

The young man's face fell. The middle-aged man, who'd only been pretending to look stern, chuckled, and so did the Hunters around them.

"Team Leader, you keep that up and the kid'll cry. Give it a rest."

"Come on. What kind of man cries over this? We've all been through it. Back in my day…"

"Jesus, here comes his 'back in my day' latte again.[3932] And all he ever drinks is Mocha Gold."

"I switched a while ago. White Gold now."

"Good for you."

"Thanks."

"Don't mention it. It's nothing."

Listening to the old guys chatter, the young man felt like his head was about to burst.

Where am I, and who am I?

This was a serious situation. He ought to be on edge. So why was their conversation enough to drain every bit of tension out of him?

Did I pick the wrong team?

Of course, there was a serious flaw in that thought.

He hadn't had a choice in the first place.

The man who'd "picked up" this twenty-year-old and brought him into a veteran party with an average age of 41.5 spoke up.

"How about it?"

"Huh?"

"Feeling a little better?"

[3932]The Korean phrase for "back in my day" sounds like "latte," setting up the instant-coffee joke.

The young man blinked, then answered in a voice much calmer than before, though even more bewildered.

“Uh, yes.”

“You were so stiff I figured I’d mess with you a little. Don’t be too hard on me for fooling around at my age.”

“N-no, not at all. I’d never think that.”

“Well, I’d understand if you did. Everyone’s nervous at first. You can’t help being on edge.”

The middle-aged man patted the young man’s shoulder encouragingly and laughed out loud.

It was such a warm laugh that it was hard to believe it came from a man whose face could make even a hardened criminal back down.

Maybe that was why the young man, who hardly dared open his mouth in this veteran party, worked up the courage to speak.

“Um, could I ask you something?”

Thankfully, that laugh hadn’t come from a vicious criminal pretending to be an ordinary person.

The middle-aged man readily nodded, and the young man cautiously continued.

“Why did you choose me…?”

His words trailed off after only a few syllables.

But that was enough. The middle-aged man answered without a moment’s hesitation.

“You reminded me of someone.”

“Reminded you of someone…?”

“Yeah. Someone I know.”

Truth be told, when the middle-aged man first saw the young man two days ago, he’d looked like every other rookie he’d ever seen.

Arms and legs locked stiff. Lips parched. Eyes darting around anxiously.

But if that had been all there was to him, the middle-aged man wouldn’t have chosen him as a teammate to entrust with his life.

“I saw you training.”

“Training?”

“Yeah. You were working hard. Hard enough to look desperate.”

“But that was…”

“I know. All the rookies there were doing it. Trying to stand out so they’d get into a decent team.”

That was true.

Two days ago, when they'd first met, hundreds of rookies fresh out of the regional Hunter Training Center had gathered there, showing what they could do while they waited for their team assignments.

They wanted a team with a better chance of survival.

Not to earn more money like before, but to protect the one thing they couldn't trade for anything: their lives.

And of all those rookies, the young man had been the only one who wasn't there.

"Where were you then?"

"Outside. I needed to find somewhere without people, somewhere with a bit of space."

"Why?"

"Because I had to train."

"You could've trained in there like everyone else and shown them what you could do, couldn't you? Even ordinary people know the staff watch the waiting room from the monitor room."

"That's true, but…"

The young man hesitated, then continued.

"I didn't think I could train properly in there."

Of course he couldn't. It was a waiting room, not the training room used for official tests. Spacious as it was, anyone would have trouble concentrating with that many people swinging bladed weapons around.

But the young man was different.

He might have been doing the same thing as the others, but his reason for doing it was entirely different.

He was giving the training everything he had.

Not to get onto a good team, but to become even a little stronger.

That day, the middle-aged man had secretly followed him to an empty lot.
Watching him train there alone brought back a memory from a few years ago.

"That guy was like that, too."

"Who?"

"The friend I mentioned earlier. I met him at a Hunter manpower office. He was young, like you—no, he was just a kid. A rookie at a glance. I figured I wouldn't be seeing him for long."

"Was there a reason you thought that?"

"He was F-rank."

"Ah."

F-rank.

That one word was enough for the young man to understand.

An untouchable in the Hunter world.

So far beneath the bottom that you could tack UCK onto the F and it would fit perfectly.

Even the young man, on the day of his first rank assessment, had looked at the E glowing on the monitor and thought:

At least I'm not F-rank.

But just as the young man was different, so was the "guy" the middle-aged man was talking about.

"At first, I had no idea I'd keep seeing him for over half a year."

"At least he managed to find work, then."

"What are you talking about? I said he was F-rank. I had some experience and connections, so there were places that'd occasionally call me in as a porter. But an F-rank rookie? Not a chance."

"But you just said…"

"I said I saw him. I didn't say we worked together."

The young man's eyes widened.

"So he just kept showing up at the manpower office? Even when there was no work?"

"Yeah. For nearly half a year. From the crack of dawn until evening, without missing a single day."

Most people would have quit by then.

If they were ordinary people, that is.

"He didn't. He'd leave a perfectly good sofa behind, climb the hill behind the office, and train like hell every day. Like some guy I saw two days ago."

"…!"

"He'd take a number, train, come back when his turn was up, get turned down like always, take another number, train again… He never even got near a Gate, but by closing time he'd be more exhausted than someone who'd done five runs in a day."

The young man listened, dazed, then answered honestly.

"I think I would've lost it halfway through."

"Right? And here's the funny part: he always looked miserable and kept mouthing fuck, fuck, but he trained harder than anyone I'd ever seen. He didn't do it because he found it easy. He did it even though it was hard. Every single day."

"That's incredible."

"Yeah. He's an incredible guy."

"No, I mean you, too, Team Leader."

"Me?"

"If you saw him every day for half a year, doesn't that mean you were doing the same thing?"

The middle-aged man was quiet for a moment, then let out a hearty laugh.

"You got me. Heh. But I'll never be like that guy."

"I don't think that's true. You're already amazing."

It wasn't flattery.

Just as the middle-aged man had watched him, the young man had been watching his superior closely, too.

Two days was hardly any time at all, but it had been more than enough to see that the man deserved his respect.

"My dream is to become like you, Team Leader."

"…Me?"

"Yes. You have character, skill, and you work hard. I even saw a news article about you once. I remember the headline: From F-rank to B-rank: One Hunter's Extraordinary Ups and Downs."

The young man had dredged up an embarrassing chapter of his life that the middle-aged man would rather forget. Laughter broke out around them, and the middle-aged man scratched his bushy beard, his face turning red.

He was just about to stammer out a reply when his expression hardened.

Rrrrrumble.

The vibrations were stronger than they'd been ten minutes ago. Now they weren't just coming up through the soles of their feet; they were shaking their whole bodies.

It's coming.

Everyone felt it at once, and realized anew how close they stood to death.

But they couldn't back down.

They were humanity's last line of defense.

They must have been given their powers for this very moment.

"Hey, rookie."

"Yes, Team Leader."

The young man answered hoarsely when the call came from behind him.

At some point, his hand and his Tower Shield had stopped shaking.

"Thanks."

"What?"

"For saying I'm someone's dream. Thanks."

Still smiling, the middle-aged man—Im Kkeokjeong, Team Leader of Ares Guild's Team 32—pulled his helmet down low.

I may not be able to become like that guy, but I'm a Hunter, too.

He fixed his gaze on the dust cloud rising a few hundred meters[3933] away and shouted with all his might.

[3933] A few hundred meters is roughly several hundred yards.

“Formation—!”

At that moment, as a roar pierced the sky, the communicator on Im Kkeokjeong’s chest received a message.

—Attention, all Hunters. Alpha—Alpha has awakened.

A blade-sharp wind swept across the battlefield.

Chapter 1174

The first thought I had when I opened my eyes was simple.

Is this a dream?

It wasn't an unreasonable thought.

Anyone who saw that spotless white ceiling, dozens of meters[3934] overhead in a room the size of a sports field, would probably have thought the same.

But a moment later, I realized it was real.

This place…

I recognized it.

Or rather, maybe not familiar exactly, but I'd definitely been here before.

I vividly remembered staying in a similar place, both in that dreamlike realm of my thoughts and in reality.

Then a voice confirmed it.

"You were sleeping soundly."

His voice carried unmistakable exhaustion.

I turned toward it, saw a familiar face, and parted my dry lips.

"Yeah. I do tend to sleep a lot."

I saw a faint smile appear on Team Leader Choi's usually stern face.

From the way he looked at me, I was probably smiling, too.

For Hunters, meeting again alive meant something special.

But the smile that briefly touched Choi Minwoo's lips, and the joy of seeing each other again, lasted only a moment.

They were alive, as they'd just said. Which meant they had to face reality.

"How long has it been?"

Jin Taekyung didn't beat around the bush, and Choi Minwoo saw no reason to hide the truth.

"Three days. About seventy-six hours, to be exact."

"…Three days."

It wasn't a long time.

For someone living an ordinary life, it was just the blink of an eye.

But Jin Taekyung knew better.

He'd known from the moment he saw Choi Minwoo, exhausted from head to toe.

No—maybe he'd known even before he lost consciousness.

[3934] One meter is about 3.28 ft.

“A lot happened while you were away, Mr. Jin.”

Choi Minwoo paused to catch his breath, then added, almost to himself,

“A lot. So much.”

For a while, only Choi Minwoo’s voice echoed through the vast, empty white space. When his story ended, the silence that followed lasted even longer.

Unlike Jin Taekyung’s mind, where countless scenes and voices were still swirling together.

Let me ask you one thing.

“You have my permission.”

Why?

“If you can grow even a little stronger, what comes next will be all the more entertaining.”

Jin Taekyung remembered the end of the wicked Dragon who had made the world tremble.

He remembered the vivid emotion that even the shadow of death looming right in front of him couldn’t hide.

“Fight with every last bit of strength you have. Keep surpassing yourself. Keep struggling.”

Even as his final breath faded, Morgoth hadn’t shown the slightest anger.

“So I can see it from where I am.”

It had been nothing more than a sigh.

A sigh born of regret: he hadn’t been the one chosen by God, and he wouldn’t get to experience the grand game about to begin.

The vague foreboding Jin Taekyung had felt then had become reality three days later, sweeping across the world.

He knew what was going to happen.

Judging by Morgoth’s actions, Jin Taekyung didn’t think he’d wanted this outcome from the start.

But that no longer mattered.

The Dragon Heart—Pandora’s box, filled with every kind of calamity—had opened.

Not in myth, but in reality.

The power contained in the wicked Dragon’s heart, which had pulsed for thousands of years, was incomparably greater than that of the Hatchling Michael Silbert had defeated in Paris.

It was without precedent.

Even if Choi Minwoo hadn’t told him what had happened, Jin Taekyung’s own senses would have proved it.

Beep-beep-beep.

SYSTEM

—There are System messages you haven't checked.
—The distribution and density of magical power are skyrocketing...
—Current progress of the rift...

Jin Taekyung wasn't the only one who'd woken up after three days.

Dozens of holographic windows he hadn't been able to check while unconscious flooded his vision like a wave, sweeping him along with them.

Among them, his eyes caught on words glowing an especially vivid red, like reefs hidden beneath a violent current.

SYSTEM

—Quest success requirements have not been met.
—Main Quest, Rift and Collapse, has failed.
—A new Main Quest, The Foreordained Collapse, has been created.
—Would you like to view this Quest? Y / N

Jin Taekyung thought that final message, asking for his consent, was crueler than ever.

He had no other choice.

...View Quest.

And a little while later, Jin Taekyung finally broke the long silence.

"Team Leader Choi."

"Yes?"

"I need you to gather everyone. Right now."

Choi Minwoo already had a good idea who Jin Taekyung meant by "everyone."

He knew the request included one being who was more human than most humans, too.

Maybe it was because the space was so vast, but Team Leader Choi's absence—he'd left without asking a single question—felt like a big one.

Still, I wasn't lonely.

I had someone to talk to.

Granted, there was the slight problem that he was in no condition to hold a conversation.

Knock, knock.

I tapped on the transparent recovery capsule as if it were a door, then gazed at the face of the man sleeping deeply inside.

Cheon Taemin.

I'd learned as soon as I regained consciousness that this was a secret space deep beneath the Pentagon.

A vast hospital room and shelter built for one person alone, inaccessible even to the President of the United States.

"Well, now there are two of us."

My muttered words received no answer.

As always.

I kept talking anyway.

"I know what kind of person you are. Better than anyone else in the world."

There was no longer any doubt that Cheon Taemin and the Martial God were the same person.

Or that he'd been a Player who'd used the System before I did.

But one question remained deep in my heart.

"How are you… still alive?"

It was a cruel thing to ask someone who was still breathing, but I had to ask.

The instruction manual for that beat-up old capsule, where all of this had begun, said the capsule remained permanently bound to its Player until the Player died.

Ironically, that incomprehensible error was what had given me the reckless courage to face Morgoth alone.

I thought that if I died, you might wake up.

I swallowed the words before they could leave my throat.

At the same time, I remembered something Morgoth had said.

The one chosen by God.

I didn't doubt it anymore.

I had been chosen.

Whether I'd wanted it or not.

Some great being existed—a being humanity had never encountered, even after reaching beyond the clouds and into space. Another dimension existed, too.

And that unknown being was asking me a question.

Through the receiver called the System.

Open System window. View Quest.

Ding!

SYSTEM

Quest
The Foreordained Collapse
At long last, the balance of the world has crumbled.
This is no mere coincidence.
It is the spark left behind by an invader from beyond this world, and the flame kindled by all of humanity, yourself included.
But one last chance remains.
Stave off the collapse, however little you can, and save the world.
At the same time, remember this:
Just as a mountain leaves its mark when it moves, every choice you make will affect the whole world.
Grade: None
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Mission: ???
Reward: ???
Failure: ???
—This Quest may change drastically depending on the Player's choices.
—Be as cautious as you can. A single choice may bring about irreversible consequences.

This was a first.

No Quest had ever warned me in words or a tone so grave.

The decision I'd already made began to waver.

Maybe—maybe my choice really would bring about the terrible consequences the System had warned me about.

But there was no time.

I couldn't shake the feeling that if I delayed any longer, things would truly become irreversible. It weighed on my body and mind as surely as the hurried footsteps I could sense beyond the countless layers of magic covering this place.

Whoosh.

The spells came undone under the Grand Mage's hand, revealing familiar faces.

Comrades I could trust with my back. Friends I'd gladly give my life for. People I could call family now.

I turned to them and spoke.

"Have any of you ever traveled between dimensions?"

The Skeleton—or rather, the Undead King—muttered uneasily.

“Uh… are you still half asleep?”

“…You little shit.”

Of course it sounded like a dream.

A nightmare, if anything.

The people—or, more precisely, several people and one monster—couldn’t bring themselves to speak even after I’d finished explaining.

The first to break the unspoken standoff was the huge Grand Mage, who’d looked dazed throughout the whole story.

“I’m serious. If you’d said something like that two or three hundred years ago, they’d have called you a witch and burned you at the stake.”

“I agree, but I’m not a woman.”

“By the time they tied you to the stake, you would’ve been. They’d just have to cut off what’s dangling down there.”

“Fair enough.”

“Actually, we don’t have to go that far back. Before the Great Cataclysm, that story would’ve landed you in a psychiatric hospital.”

“Probably.”

“But now… Yeah. This is after that damn Great Cataclysm. And I’m the Grand Mage.”

That was right.

These were the times we lived in.

It had only been three days since we’d fought to take down a Dragon the size of an aircraft carrier. After hearing my whole story, no one suggested putting me in a psychiatric hospital.

Not even the monster.

None of them doubted a word I’d said.

Even if the world were a little different, I was sure they would have believed me.

Just as Jeok Cheongang had believed in me.

And I’d had only one reason to reveal the secret I’d kept deep in my heart.

“I’m… going to leave. To put an end to all of this.”

I knew where the invader from beyond this world was.

Chapter 1175

Every story has an ending.

Jin Taekyung already knew what it would take to end this nightmarish catastrophe. He had to defeat one being.

“Demon King Asmodeus.”

The name was a curse to modern humanity. As it left his lips, the air around them seemed to freeze.

The old heroes, who still remembered that horrific past vividly after all these decades, looked especially stricken.

“…Asmodeus?”

“That—that can’t be.”

Chuck Hagel and Magic Johnson spoke almost at the same time. Their reactions were exactly what Jin Taekyung had expected.

He’d shared his deepest secrets with them, but they couldn’t take it all in so quickly.

No, this was closer to an instinctive defense: the human urge to deny reality rather than live through that nightmare again.

“I understand. I thought the same thing for a long time.”

Jin Taekyung meant every word.

He hadn’t experienced the Great Cataclysm firsthand, but he’d been born on its final day.

Growing up, he’d been taught about it until he was sick of hearing it: what had happened during the Great Cataclysm, and how humanity had survived.

And how the ruler of the Demon Realm who had caused the Great Cataclysm met his end at the hands of a great hero born of humanity, without leaving so much as a trace.

But…

“He’s alive. I’m certain of it. In another world, under the name Lord of Heaven.”

Just as Cheon Taemin had existed as the Martial God, the king of demons had gained a new name in another world.

The beginning and the end of all this.

Jin Taekyung was certain. To reach the end of the path he’d walked—and the path still ahead of him—he had to reach that bastard.

But no one else could see the shape of the enormous puzzle he’d pieced together while traveling between two worlds. They could only trust the young man standing before them.

And someone did.

“I see. Understood.”

Choi Minwoo's voice was calm. That made it sound all the more unnatural.

As Cheon Taemin's only direct blood relative, Choi Minwoo had more reason than anyone there to be shaken by what he'd heard.

His gaze passed briefly over the others, then settled on Jin Taekyung. It didn't waver in the slightest.

"If that's what you believe, Mr. Jin, that's enough for us."

This time, silence didn't fall.

Choi Minwoo's words had made everything clear.

They trusted Jin Taekyung.

The simple certainty in those words swept away even the faint doubts and denials everyone had kept hidden in their hearts.

Even when everything around you is dark, you can still see the torch moving ahead.

And to them—no, to all humanity—Jin Taekyung was the one torch burning brighter than any other.

"Right. I had it wrong for a moment."

Magic Johnson muttered to himself, then let out a small laugh.

"Still, I never thought my greatest wish would be answered like this."

"Your wish?"

"I couldn't make sense of anything about you, Jin. I wanted to talk you into letting me run all kinds of experiments on you. Maybe even a little dissection, if you agreed…"

Jin Taekyung asked in all sincerity, "Are you insane?"

"Don't worry. I'm not planning to do that anymore. Good grief, you said it was a System? My poor imagination never got that far."

"I don't think anyone would've imagined that."

Song Song, sitting alone among the mountain-sized men, gestured with her eyes toward the seat beside her.

"Look at Uncle Kkeokjeong. He's practically out of his mind."

Every eye turned to Im Kkeokjeong. Still looking dazed, he jumped as though he'd just woken up.

"Huh? Wh-what? Why me? I'm fine."

"You don't look fine."

"No, I was just… listening."

Im Kkeokjeong scratched the back of his head as he struggled to get the words out.

"Honestly, I'm not sure I should even be hearing something this incredible."

"Yeah, I feel the same. Team Leader Choi here—no, our Guild Master—has every right to hear it. But us? Well…"

Jin Taekyung gave a quiet laugh at their reactions.

"What's this about having a right? I called you because you belong here."

And they did.

They might not have known one another for a large part of their lives, but they were friends and comrades who'd been together through some of the hardest, most turbulent times.

There were others he wanted to call but couldn't.

People like Butler Kim, who had passed away, or Faye Chen.

Or his family, who couldn't accept a situation like this, and Seong Jinho, his closest friend since his days at the goshiwon.[3935]

"Oh, that's kind of touching. Didn't know you could say things like that."

"I'm pretty good at it, if I do say so myself."

"Then what were you thinking when we first met? Remember that night we were drinking, and you started going on about Taurus and—"

"…I was wrong."

Starting with that shameful memory, words came pouring in from every direction.

Some were about little things they could barely remember. Others were as vivid as if they'd happened yesterday.

For a while, they laughed and talked together.

None of them said it aloud, but they all felt it.

This might be the last time they faced one another with smiles like these.

Maybe that was why Jin Taekyung couldn't bring himself to speak when the time came to say goodbye.

Tick. Tick.

At some point, the sound of a second hand reached him through his keen senses. Jin Taekyung closed his eyes.

The broken pocket watch.

It was moving—the thing that likely linked the modern world and Murim through the absolute power of time.

I have to leave. Before it's too late.

He knew it in his head and in his heart.

Even so, he felt more conflicted than ever.

Before him were faces he was always glad to see. The faces of precious people he hadn't been able to see hovered before his eyes like mist.

If only this moment could last forever.

But it couldn't.

Time would keep moving. So would the enemy waiting for him in another world.

[3935] A goshiwon is a Korean residence of small, inexpensive rented rooms, traditionally used by people studying for exams.

Unless someone stopped him, he always would.

That's why I have to go.

It was the one thing he had to do.

The one thing only he could do.

Jin Taekyung reminded himself of that unchanging truth and opened his eyes. Everyone was looking at him.

As though they'd instinctively sensed that it was time to part.

"Go on, human. Don't make a whole thing out of it."

The Undead King made it sound as though Jin were just popping over to the neighbor's house. Jin Taekyung couldn't help laughing.

He looked at the smiling faces before him. Then, thinking of those who must be desperately searching for him somewhere, he said goodbye.

"I'll come back. I promise."

Muttering the words like a vow to himself, Jin Taekyung logged in.

Deep in the darkness, a being suddenly awoke and drew a deep breath.

Like a child opening its eyes for the first time in a new world.

Or a pitiful evil spirit struggling to feel that it was still alive.

But this time was different.

The air around him. The qi. All of it.

His breath, always ragged and labored, like that of someone on the verge of death, was calm. And a strength and vitality he hadn't felt in decades welled up in his body, which had been as good as dead.

Slowly, but without stopping.

The loyal servant who had been waiting alone for her master in the darkness and silence could sense the change, too.

"Congratulations, great Lord of Heaven."

The Grand Sorceress's voice trembled. She had always been so composed.

Moments earlier, she had recognized the source of a sudden feeling of déjà vu. She'd come here without hesitation to wait for her master.

"This lowly servant dared to wait for her master without permission. Please punish me."

The next moment, an answer rang out—one she'd thought she would never hear.

It came not as a sound, but from deep within the Grand Sorceress's mind.

—You are forgiven.

It could scarcely be called a voice. It was cold as ice, yet the Grand Sorceress trembled with joy.

She’d been right.

The strange sensation she’d felt a moment ago was real. After only a few days, her master had awoken again, having regained even greater power.

And all of this could mean only one thing.

“Has it finally been completed?”

—Far from it.

“Ah…!”

The Grand Sorceress let out a regretful groan before she could stop herself. Then another reverberation filled her mind, and she caught her breath.

—But it will be completed.

“Then…”

—Nothing can stop what has already begun. No one.

“…!”

At that pronouncement, like an oracle, the Grand Sorceress—prostrated with all five limbs on the ground, unable to dare face her master—bowed even lower.

Cold seeped up from the damp stone floor, but she didn’t care. The fierce emotion rising deep within her warmed her body like a ball of fire.

“Please give your command. What should this lowly servant do?”

Her joy was plain in the question. Her master answered in a voice that none could hear.

Not the eternal snows of the Tianshan Mountains. Not the sky touching their peaks, nor the moon and stars beyond.

Nor the countless armies crossing the vast continent, finally nearing the Land of Ruin beyond the desert, could hear the voice.

Chapter 1176

Login—or Logout.

Like the games I played as a kid, crossing an invisible boundary between two worlds had become familiar to me.

The moment everything around me vanished and my vision went dark, I found myself alone.

In darkness so deep I couldn't see an inch ahead.

Of course, it never lasted long.

An unknown force would soon take hold of my consciousness and lead it somewhere. At the end of that journey, the light of a new world would be waiting.

But why?

Something's different.

I sensed it instinctively. What startled me was that even after the thought crossed my mind, the darkness remained.

Why?

The process, the sensations—both had become as familiar as breathing. Now they felt strange.

By now, my consciousness should have crossed from the modern world into Murim. Then I would regain my usual senses and awareness in the other body I'd been apart from. That was the routine.

But this time, everything was different.

The darkness and silence went on for what felt like an eternity.

Then, at the end of that suffocating wait, came the pull.

Whoooosh.

As if caught in a massive tornado, my consciousness was sucked toward depths I couldn't begin to fathom.

I clung with all my strength to the thread of my consciousness as a pull more powerful than anything I'd ever felt threatened to shake it loose.

Damn it. What the hell is this?

If my previous trips had been rides in a limousine, this one was a locomotive.

A broken-down runaway locomotive hurtling down rusted, misaligned tracks, with no engineer to control its speed.

Stop!

The cry rang out in my mind before I could help it.

But a school bully rotten to the core wouldn't stop tormenting someone at a single shout. Neither did the powerful wave carrying my consciousness toward who knew where.

And at the end of that insane ride—

Whooosh!

Darkness split apart as though torn open. A shaft of light brighter than any I'd seen before burst through and swallowed my vision.

With it came a voice, carried to me through senses that had snapped sharply into focus.

"You've come back."

He hadn't asked if I was awake.

He'd asked if I'd come back.

Leaving the frantic ordeal behind me, I slowly opened my eyes and looked at the owner of the voice.

Bells were ringing one after another, beginning with a System message announcing that Login had succeeded. But his voice fell on my ears like spring rain.

"Yes, Master."

Master.

At the ease with which the title came from my lips, the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, widened his eyes.

Then they curved gently, like a full moon.

"Yes. Good to have you back."

At long last, I was in Murim.

The joy of our reunion was brief.

More precisely, there was no need to draw it out.

People who knew each other better than anyone else didn't need many words. Jeok Cheongang and I had been like that for a long time.

And for that very reason, he must have noticed right away that something was wrong with me.

"So, what kind of dogshit situation has happened this time?"

"Are you psychic? How'd you know?"

"Look at yourself. How could I not?"

"What about me? I—oh."

Only then did I realize I was drenched in cold sweat.

It had soaked through my clothes and even the bedding beneath me. So much for having reached the realm of Unaffected by Cold and Heat a long time ago.

"When did this start?"

"A little while ago. You were groaning so much I thought you might shit yourself."

"…"

Where had that warm feeling from a moment ago gone? Was it just me, or did the air smell like a public restroom now?

I grimaced and answered, "Hard to say. More than one thing comes to mind. Anyway, where's everyone else?"

That was what I'd wanted to ask first.

No matter how I looked around, Jeok Cheongang was the only face I could see. And aside from the snorting of the horses pulling us along, I couldn't sense anyone nearby.

His answer made my already-prickling nerves go cold.

"Gone."

"…!"

My heart dropped with a thud. That was exactly how it felt.

"Gone?" I asked, my voice trembling.

"I said they're gone."

"So they were here, but—"

"Ah, they're gone! Right now!"

Jeok Cheongang snapped, then continued.

"To be precise, they all left about one shichen[3936] ago. They needed to scout the area and find a place to camp tonight. They'll probably be back soon."

What the hell?

I stared at him in silence. My heart had long since returned to its proper place.

"You should've said that first."

"Look at this disrespectful brat. You're the one who didn't listen to the end. How's that my fault?"

As Jeok Cheongang glared at me, I turned my head slightly to the side.

Outside the large, beautiful eight-horse carriage the emperor of the Great Nation—no, the Great Ming Empire—had bestowed on me alone, darkness covered the world.

"By the way, where are we…?"

"Xinjiang."

Xinjiang.

The vastest land under heaven, and a Land of Ruin no one had dared invade for ages.

While I'd been away from Murim, the journey that began in Qinghai had finally brought us here.

[3936] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is approximately one hour.

Even now, grains of sand trickled through the gaps in the carriage, proof that we were deep in the heart of Xinjiang.

"The Taklamakan Desert."

Jeok Cheongang muttered the name, then spat out the sand that had gotten into his mouth.

"Damn desert. When I think of all the hell I've been through for nearly a month, I really…"

I didn't hear the rest.

Not because he'd trailed off, or because of the fierce sandstorm beating against the carriage window.

A month. A whole month has already passed?

I'd spent less than a week in the modern world.

Yet a month had passed in Murim during those few days.

The axis of time has gone out of alignment. Beyond the point of no return.

I'd already suspected as much.

When I returned to the modern world after fighting the Blood Lord in Qinghai, I'd realized the time ratio was badly off.

But foreboding was one thing when it stayed in my head. Seeing it become reality was another.

Tick. Tick.

The cold ticking of the [Broken Pocket Watch] I'd tucked deep in my Inventory just before logging in seemed to ring in my ears like a phantom sound.

But… maybe it's a good thing this much time has passed. It means we're that much closer to our destination.

A month was no short stretch of time.

Especially given the situation the world faced now.

But unlike the modern world, which had suffered terrible damage in just ten days since Morgoth's arrival, there hadn't been any significant damage here yet.

Or at least, that was how it felt at the moment.

Whether I'd still think so after asking my next question was another matter.

"While I was asleep, did anything…?"

"You mean, did anything happen? No. Nothing out of the ordinary."

Jeok Cheongang answered without hesitation, as if he'd known what I was going to ask. His voice dropped as he added, "It's so peaceful it feels strange."

"What do you mean?"

"Just what I said. The sky is murky and impossible to predict. One moment it's snow or rain, the next it's heat that could melt you, or even hail. But aside from that, there's nothing."

That wasn't particularly surprising.

The sudden climate changes were happening in both the modern world and Murim, and they were nothing new by now.

Besides, this was Xinjiang, where the Lord of Heaven had holed up. If anything, the changes here would be worse, not better.

What caught my attention was the last thing Jeok Cheongang had said.

"Nothing at all?"

"That's right. None of us thought much of it on the first day. But it didn't take long for everyone, this old man included, to notice."

And when Jeok Cheongang went on to explain, I realized there wasn't the slightest exaggeration or lie in what he'd said.

"At first, nobody paid it any mind. We were busy taking turns scouting the area every half shichen[3937] and standing watch through the night."

That was only natural.

This was Xinjiang.

The thousand-year Sacred Land of the Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples, who'd once swept across the land, and the base of Dark Heaven.

Dark Heaven had unleashed bloodshed across the Central Plains. It wouldn't have been surprising if they'd turned Xinjiang, practically their own front yard, into a sea of blood.

"But strangely, it was quiet. None of those crazy fanatics who'd swarmed us like a pack of dogs in Qinghai. None of those monsters that defied all reason. Not even a band of common mounted bandits. At first, I thought maybe the bastards were scared."

It wasn't arrogance or carelessness that had led him to think so.

Just before we set out from Qinghai, the emperor and the leaders of the alliance army—the foremost figures of Murim—had divided a force of well over a hundred thousand into three groups. We were one of them.

Our group numbered fewer than twenty. But look at who was in it.

Two Stars and the strongest of the Ten Kings.

The Bow Saint, the Slaughter Saint, and the Fire King, who stood shoulder to shoulder with them.

Even with me unconscious, those three alone were more than enough to be called an army.

"But the very next day, I realized I'd been wrong from the start."

Jeok Cheongang muttered in a low voice, then suddenly jerked his chin toward the window.

"Do you see?"

[3937] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is approximately one hour.

“What are you—”

I frowned at the gesture, then stopped mid-sentence.

In that instant, I understood.

Beyond the window, the vast desert stretched into the darkness, filled with nothing but sand.

At the same time, not a sound could be heard.

“Could it be…?”

“That’s right.”

Jeok Cheongang continued, his voice heavy and subdued.

“There isn’t a single living thing in this land.”

Chapter 1177

A land of death.

Just as the name said, a place utterly devoid of life.

The truth I'd failed to notice came over me with the chill of a blade pressed to the back of my neck.

No living things at all? How is that possible?

I swallowed the question almost as soon as it sprang to mind.

It was a foolish question.

If the Lord of Heaven—no, the Demon King Asmodeus—stood at the beginning and end of all this, then it was even less surprising.

He'd dragged an apocalypse that had existed only in people's imaginations into reality. From the moment I learned what he was, common sense had lost all meaning.

Another question quickly took the first one's place. One that was more practical, and closer to the heart of the matter.

I stared out the window. Not a bird called. Not an insect chirped.

"What's the purpose?"

It was far too late to ask how.

What mattered to me now—to us—was why.

And it seemed the person hiding in the sandstorm that had blown in from far away, whose presence had settled on the carriage roof a moment earlier, knew that too.

"One of two things."

The Slaughter Saint's voice was boyishly young, yet carried a bleakness that spoke of all the years he'd lived.

"The first is a final battle. Gathering everything in Xinjiang for one last fight."

"Then the second is…"

"I don't know exactly what happened, but the whole of Xinjiang has lost the breath of life. People and animals have legs; they could have gone elsewhere. But even the plants across the region have withered. Dark Heaven's probably behind it."

Jeok Cheongang cut in gruffly.

"Eavesdropping like a rat, only to tell us something that goes without saying."

"Watch your mouth. That rat might cut your throat tonight."

"I wouldn't mind. We're running low on food. Roast rat, nice and crisp, would make a fine breakfast tomorrow."

"That mouth of yours never gets any better. What the hell have you done with all the years you've lived?"

With that curt reply, a shadow fell across the window.

Like a ghost with no substance, the Slaughter Saint passed through the window as if it weren't there and entered the carriage. He stared at me as though he could see straight through whatever I was hiding.

"Anyway, you slept a long time."

I smacked my lips.

I'd been traveling with the Slaughter Saint for quite a while, but this was the first time I'd been gone for a whole month. And by any ordinary measure, no one could sleep for an entire month.

But what could I do? The day would come when I told him the truth myself. For now, I'd have to bluff with a straight face.

"Yeah, I sleep a lot."

"Even so, it's impossible to stay asleep for a month."

"I've got an unusual constitution."

"I've wandered the land for fifty years and seen all kinds of patients. No such constitution exists."

"Congratulations. After fifty years, you've discovered a new one."

"…"

"…"

A suffocating silence filled the carriage. The Slaughter Saint and even Jeok Cheongang stared at me as if I were a madman.

Fair enough. You didn't need medical training to know that was nonsense.

"I'm kidding. I did wake up a few times in between. You know, to take care of basic bodily functions and all that."

"I didn't know that."

"Of course not. Only Master knew. Right?"

Jeok Cheongang blinked at my sudden plea for help, then scratched the back of his head.

"Uh. Well, that is…"

His reaction was a little odd, but the most important thing when lying was to sound natural. I kept talking before the Slaughter Saint could notice.

"I woke up once a few days ago, too. After sleeping so long, I had to pee, and I was hungry."

"When exactly was that?"

"Um… I wasn't fully awake, so I don't really know."

"I see."

The Slaughter Saint nodded as if he understood, then muttered to himself.

"Strange. You woke up several times, and nobody noticed."

"Yeah. Strange, isn't it?"

"Something even stranger happened. Would you like to hear it?"

Was it just my imagination, or had the air gone a little stale?

Uneasy for some reason, I shook my head.

"…No. Not really."

"Surely you're curious."

"I'm fine. Sometimes it's better not to know."

"A good saying. But another one fits this situation better."

The Slaughter Saint's voice was gentler than usual, which made it all the more ominous.

"That mouth of yours is asking for a beating."

"…"

"What do you think?"

What was I supposed to think?

I forced a smile.

"Now I'm very curious. I'd love to hear what happened."

"Taken on its own, it's nothing remarkable. From where I stood, it was mostly a nuisance."

"What do you mean…?"

"What a close Master and Disciple you are. From the first day of our journey, a certain ill-tempered old man raised hell unless I checked on you morning and evening. Not a single day went by in peace."

The Slaughter Saint's eyes sank as he glared at Jeok Cheongang, as though just remembering it exhausted him.

"Lately, his fits reached new heights. You'd been asleep for nearly a month, so he decided something must be wrong. He shouted at me, demanding to know why I couldn't find the problem."

"…"

"That was only two days ago. Anything to say?"

You've got to be kidding me.

Of course I had nothing.

I knew something had felt off. Now I understood Jeok Cheongang's strange reaction earlier.

Under the Slaughter Saint's stare—and mine—Jeok Cheongang looked out the window and muttered, "Well, I didn't shout that much…"

"You even called me a quack."

"I didn't put it quite that directly…"

"True. You were a little more roundabout. You asked if I'd learned medicine at a gambling den."

“I did say that, but it wasn’t so harsh…”

“And what possessed you to accuse me of trying to live up to my title as the Slaughter Saint by killing your Disciple?”

“Hmm. I suppose I went too far there. My pride won’t let me apologize, so I’ll offer my regrets instead.”

The answer was steeped in the essence of the Fire Gate Clan—a clan that had been making Murim’s people furious on a regular basis for more than three hundred years. A sound almost escaped me.

Then I saw the Slaughter Saint’s expression and held it in with everything I had.

“You fucking—!”

I was very relieved Cheongpung wasn’t here.

If he’d seen this, he would’ve spouted some nonsense like, Wow! I’ve never seen the greatest assassin of all time swear before! Then I would’ve had to watch the greatest assassin of all time lose his temper and go on a rampage.

Fortunately, the man with another identity as the Divine Physician knew how to keep to a minimum standard of decency—unlike my dear Master—and, as a former assassin, had a near-supernatural skill for recovering his composure.

“Fine. Yes… It happens. People close to a patient sometimes can’t think clearly. It happens. I understand.”

After muttering as if trying to hypnotize himself, the Slaughter Saint took a steadying breath and turned to me.

Then he asked something I could never have anticipated.

“So, did you take care of things over there?”

“What?”

“Your hometown. The realm of immortals, wasn’t it?”

“…!”

For a moment, the world seemed to stop.

If not for the carriage’s constant rattling, the sand slipping through the window, and Jeok Cheongang’s conspicuously deliberate clearing of his throat, I might have believed it had.

“Ahem. Well, that’s how it happened.”

That happened. That happened. That happened…

His words seemed to echo, though we weren’t in some deep mountain valley. I closed my eyes for a moment, then opened them and looked at Jeok Cheongang.

He was trying very hard to look stern.

I said nothing. I just kept looking at him.

“W-why are you looking at me like that?”

“…”

"Well, I couldn't help it. You'd been out cold for a whole month. I was worried, and the Slaughter Saint kept getting suspicious…"

"…"

"I only explained a little! Just a little! He's a physician. When he asks about a patient, he ought to know something about the patient's condition!"

I let out a long sigh at his halting excuses.

"I understand."

"You'd always woken up after a few days at most. This time, I even wondered if you'd been poisoned with some sleeping drug from the demonic, heterodox arts… What did you say?"

"I said I understand. You had your reasons."

Well, what was done was done.

Maybe it was just me, but I'd grown pretty close to the Slaughter Saint. He was one of my most dependable allies, too. He deserved to know my secret.

To be honest, part of me was relieved it was out.

Besides, the decision had been made by my Master. Jeok Cheongang must have had his reasons. If he'd slept for a whole month like a bear hibernating through winter, even I would have started to suspect something.

Anyway…

"How much did you tell him about me?"

"Hmm. Well…"

Why did I suddenly feel a chill?

I'd only asked in case I needed to fill in the details, but Jeok Cheongang hesitated and glanced at me before answering.

"I told them more or less what I knew. Their reactions varied at first, but they all believed me."

"Oh, that's fine. I was planning to tell him soon anyway… Wait. Their reactions varied?"

That was strange.

There was only one of him. How could there be several reactions?

A shout from somewhere in the distance answered my question.

"Waaah! Benefactor! You're back! Did you have a good trip?"

Ah.

Chapter 1178

There’s no such thing as a perfect secret.

Birds hear what’s said by day, rats hear what’s said by night, and sooner or later, it all comes out of someone’s mouth.

“I swear to Heaven, this old man told exactly one person.”

The culprit who’d first let my secret slip made his declaration like a newborn letting out its first cry. At that, the “one person” in question licked his lips.

“Well, I was only going to check a few facts. How was I supposed to believe a word that crazy old man said?”

“And then?” I asked quietly.

“I had no choice but to corner the person who seemed to know you best and ask him.”

The Slaughter Saint’s gaze shifted to Hyuk Mujin. Huddled in a corner of the carriage, Mujin had been watching everyone’s reactions. Now he stammered out an answer.

“To be precise, you kidnapped me in the dead of night while I was sound asleep and buried me in the desert. With only my head sticking out.”

“That’s right. But he turned out to be surprisingly tight-lipped. He insisted he’d rather die than tell me anything that might put you in danger.”

Perhaps buoyed by the Slaughter Saint’s testimony, Hyuk Mujin straightened his hunched shoulders.

“You heard him, right? That’s how loyal I am.”

“So, I had no choice but to tell him a rough version of what I’d heard. Then the very next day, some random weirdo came asking about you.”

Right on cue, that “random fool” poked his head in.

“Benefactor! Benefactor! You really came from the realm of immortals? It’s true? Wow! I’ve never met anyone from the realm of immortals before!”

“Yeah. Just like that.”

The Slaughter Saint gave Cheongpung a tired glare, then added, “Anyway, I only told one person, too.”

Hyuk Mujin drew his shoulders in again and muttered, “So did I.”

Yeah. Of course he had.

But if I were Hyuk Mujin, I wouldn’t have shared a “stupendous secret I couldn’t possibly keep to myself” with Cheongpung.

Why? Simple.

Because he was Cheongpung.

“Benefactor, me too! I only told Young Lady Ju!”

Maybe an innocence-proving contest had started without my noticing.

Cheongpung shouted with tremendous enthusiasm, and Jeok Cheongang nodded.

“He’s not wrong. The problem was that he said it at just about that volume, at a meal where most of us were gathered.”

“…”

This was giving me a headache.

I shook my head and happened to meet someone’s eyes.

Unlike the others, she’d been silent this whole time, without so much as a reaction.

Ju Hwaran.

“Ah, Young Lady Ju.”

I greeted her with an awkward smile, but she didn’t answer.

She only stared at me, her gaze pricking my face like a thin needle.

No, she wasn’t the only one looking at me.

A hush had fallen over the carriage. Everyone was watching.

Well. I didn’t know.

I felt like I should say something, but what? And how?

Should I act like nothing happened? Or apologize for not telling them sooner…?

My thoughts were tangling like a ball of yarn when her tightly closed red lips parted.

“You’re not, are you?”

“Huh? What do you mean, all of a sudden?”

“You’re not actually an immortal or something instead of a human, are you?”

“An immortal?”

I blinked at her. Then I understood and let out a small, disbelieving laugh.

“Come on. Do I look that impressive to you, Young Lady Ju?”

“Don’t laugh.”

“…Sorry. I couldn’t help it. But I’m really not.”

“Are you sure?”

“Of course. What else would I be if not human? A few misunderstandings piled up, and somehow my home came to be called the realm of immortals. But people live there just like they do here.”

“Really?”

“Yes.”

Calling the two worlds the same would be a huge stretch.

Even setting aside the difference in technology, at least around here you wouldn’t run into a monster on your way to the inn at the intersection near your house.

But I didn’t bother explaining that, and Ju Hwaran didn’t seem inclined to press the point.

Instead, she asked another question I hadn't expected.

"Then how old are you really?"

"…Where did that come from?"

"I'm just curious. You said only your soul goes back and forth, and your world is different from this one."

I answered, still a little bewildered.

"Uh, well. Around twenty-eight?"

"Around?"

"No, that's right. Going back and forth a few times has messed up my sense of time, so I got confused for a second…"

I'd started rambling out excuses without meaning to when Ju Hwaran cut me off in a voice as sharp as a blade.

"So you haven't even turned thirty yet."

"That's right."

"And you're not an immortal or a celestial who's lived for five hundred years since ascending to immortality."

"…I told you, I'm human."

Ascended to immortality? Please.

I'd been called an idiot plenty of times. By Hayeon.

And if I really were a five-hundred-year-old immortal, the one pulling this eight-horse carriage right now would be the Lord of Heaven, not a horse.

Wouldn't that be nice?

I was lost in that sweet, sad thought when Ju Hwaran delivered her verdict like a judge who'd finished hearing the case.

"That settles it, then."

"Huh?"

"It's fine. You're human, and you're around twenty-eight."

It was a strange verdict.

No account of the case. No sentence.

But that was enough.

I didn't know what it was, but it was settled.

No, honestly, I think I do know.

For some reason, my chest felt tight. Somewhere close to my heart.

At the same time, another part of it grew heavy.

Was it okay to feel this way right now? Did I have any right to?

Maybe that was why I found it hard to meet her eyes as she kept looking steadily at me, with everyone else watching us and making the air between us stranger still.

And why, the next moment, I changed the subject for no good reason.

“Anyway, when will the others be back?”

“H-hm?”

“The people who aren’t here.”

Jeok Cheongang, who’d been looking back and forth between Ju Hwaran and me, cleared his throat.

“Ahem. Why do you ask all of a sudden?”

“I want to see them. And now that it’s come to this, there’s something I’d like to tell everyone myself.”

“Well, they’re searching different areas, so they’ll all be back before long. But there’s no need to gather them for that. Some of them still don’t know anything about you.”

“What? But earlier, that human Cheongpung clearly—”

“Yes, that careless mouth of his said it loud enough for everyone to hear. At a meal where most of us were gathered.”

“Oh.”

I let out a short exclamation.

At the same time, it wasn’t hard to think of the person most likely not to have heard my secret yet.

“Great Sir.”

The Supreme Peak master we’d first met in Gansu, who’d accompanied us all the way here.

A mysterious eccentric as baffling as his wild, unkempt hair. Even he didn’t know who he was.

“What Great Sir? The fellow loses his mind several times a day.”

Jeok Cheongang snorted, then continued.

“If he’d happened to be there, we couldn’t have helped it. But it still didn’t sit right with this old man to go out of my way to tell him, so I told everyone to keep quiet. He’s been quite useful, but a secret is a secret, and we don’t even know who he is.”

“Hmm.”

“I can guess what you’re thinking. I’m not going to force my judgment on you. Do as you like about that fellow you call Great Sir. But…”

Jeok Cheongang trailed off and scratched his bushy beard.

“There’s someone else I’m more concerned about than him.”

“Someone else?”

“The ones here have more or less understood and accepted it by now. But things don’t always work out so neatly. Old folks especially have trouble understanding anything new.”

Just as I’d thought of Great Sir, I remembered another person who wasn’t here.

Bow Saint.

I muttered the words to myself and looked out the window.

Perhaps because clouds were passing across the pitch-black sky, the stars looked especially dim tonight.

Desert nights were merciless.

By day, the heat seemed ready to burn the whole world. Once the sun set and darkness fell, an icy chill blanketed the land.

Yet even in the cold that seeped to the bone, the slender shadow cast alone atop a sand dune did not waver.

That was only natural. The master who cast it had long since surpassed the realm of Unaffected by Cold and Heat.

But that wasn't the only reason.

"The realm of immortals… The realm of immortals."

Bow Saint gazed into the dark desert, her eyes clouded with thought.

The boundless sea of sand before her seemed to mirror her heart.

No end in sight, no matter how far she walked. Nothing within it but hardship and rough grains of sand.

"So that was the secret you were hiding."

She murmured the words softly.

The desert at night was an excellent listener.

It asked no questions. It only let the wind pass through in silence, from wherever that wind had come.

But it was no good for conversation.

No, even if the desert could speak, that wouldn't change.

The person the Bow Saint wanted to speak to was someone else.

"…Martial God."

Her fingers, hard as steel and callused despite her translucent skin, searched inside her robe.

Through the fabric, they found the old letter the Martial God had left for her alone, containing a secret she therefore could tell no one.

"Is this what you want?"

The Bow Saint could not understand.

She had trusted and followed the letter's instructions only because the Martial God had left it. From the beginning until now, she had never been able to make sense of what it said.

And after hearing Jin Taekyung’s secret just a few days ago, she found it even harder to understand.

“Is this truly… right?”

At that moment—

Rustle.

A faint sound behind her reached the Bow Saint’s ears.

Chapter 1179

Bow Saint reacted at once.

As if she'd expected it, she kicked off the ground and retreated. At the same moment, she thrust a palm wreathed in white Force toward the source of the sound.

Boom!

A blinding flash engulfed the sand dune where she had stood alone.

No, there were two of them now.

An uninvited guest had arrived.

How could I make such a mistake…?

Normally, she could keep track of everything within twenty-odd zhang[3938] without even drawing on her internal energy. Yet she hadn't noticed an enemy approaching until they were within a dozen zhang[3939]. Bow Saint bit her lip.

She'd been too deep in thought. Her heart was more unsettled than ever, and that had surely played a part.

But none of it excused her carelessness. Not here in Xinjiang.

If there were two consolations, the first was that the enemy's stealth technique was worse than she'd expected. The second was…

"Gwaaah!"

With a strangled scream, the enemy flew into the distance and landed with a wet smack. The back of the figure sprawled there looked rather familiar.

More familiar still was the dreadful stench that had come barging in ahead of him like a thief.

…That smell.

As an archer, Bow Saint had eyesight second to none. This time, she hadn't needed it. Her nose had recognized him first.

The stench was so awful she feared smelling it in her dreams. She wondered how she had failed to notice it until now.

Suppressing a wave of nausea, Bow Saint watched the uninvited guest groan and get to his feet.

"Why are you here?"

There was a trace of suspicion in her voice.

Then, as always, he left her dumbfounded.

"Gah! An enemy! It's Dark Heaven!"

"…"

[3938] A zhang is a traditional length of ten chi, approximately 3.03 meters (9.94 feet).

[3939] A zhang is a traditional length of ten chi, approximately 3.03 meters (9.94 feet).

“Reveal your mask and take off your identity! How dare you ambush this lady! Do you not fear the Lord of Heaven?”

Bow Saint couldn’t hold back any longer. She spoke up, stunned from beginning to end.

“You’ve got it backward.”

“What?”

“You take off a mask, not your identity.”

He wasn’t wearing a mask, either, but she saw no point in explaining that. Even if she went through his mistakes one by one, he’d forget by tomorrow—no, within a shichen.[3940]

That man, who referred to himself as “this lady” without a second thought, was Great Sir.

At least he knows Dark Heaven is the enemy.

Bow Saint sighed inwardly. Just then, Great Sir finally recognized her, and his eyes widened.

“Wait, why are you here, Young Lady?”

“First, I’m not young enough to be called that. Second, that’s my question for you. I already asked it.”

She added quietly, “And I still haven’t heard an answer.”

The Force around her hand had vanished without a trace, but appearances could be deceiving. Several jiazi’s[3941] worth of internal energy continued to circulate within her, faster and more quietly than before, ready to unleash its full power whenever she wished.

One mistake was enough. If she’d made the same mistake twice, she would neither be known as Bow Saint nor have survived the Great Faction War.

“I thought you were supposed to scout somewhere else. Am I mistaken?”

Bow Saint held on to her suspicion.

They called him Great Sir for convenience, but he was an eccentric whose true identity no one knew. Great Sir himself could barely keep his mind straight. How could anyone else know who he was?

He remembered neither his name nor his past. Even when the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, had declared, “This’ll bring back memories from before you were born,” and treated him to a thorough pummeling, nothing had changed.

There was only one thing Bow Saint knew for certain about him: he had inherited the martial arts of an orthodox sect.

His internal energy is undoubtedly pure. But that alone isn’t enough to put me at ease.

[3940] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

[3941] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

Most of the traitors recruited by Dark Heaven had belonged to orthodox factions. The Murong Family, one of the Five Great Families, had been rotten from its roots. What mattered wasn't the martial art but the heart of the person who practiced it.

Besides, Great Sir is a Supreme Peak master. I came across information about him while I was staying at the Imperial Palace, but… no one ever managed to establish what he'd done in the past.

Even so, she hadn't objected when he joined their group, for two reasons.

First, though he'd joined them late, Great Sir had risked his life alongside them in Gansu and Qinghai. They had built a fair measure of trust by now.

Second, even if he was a hidden blade planted by Dark Heaven, he posed no threat to them now.

As far as Bow Saint could tell, Great Sir had only just entered the Supreme Peak realm. An extraordinary achievement in its own right, but compared with the rest of their group, only was fair.

Too blunt to be a hidden blade. Too careless to be a spy.

That was why she'd kept him close. She understood so little about him that, even now, she couldn't quite let go of her faint suspicion.

Great Sir stared blankly at her for a moment, then suddenly clapped his hands.

"Oh, right! I came here because of you, Young Lady."

"What do you mean?"

"About half an hour ago, I finished scouting the area like I was told and went back to the carriage. I hadn't even sat down before I got kicked out again."

His voice had been half tearful. Now he lowered it.

"You know the fellow with the bright red beard and the temper to match? What was his name?"

"…Great Hero Jeok Cheongang?"

"Great Hero, my foot. If that man's a Great Hero, then this lady's a fairy. Anyway, he was furious and told me to hurry up and find you. Sounded like something important had happened."

Bow Saint felt the tension go out of her.

"What's this important thing?"

"How should I know? I told you, I didn't even get to sit down. And after coming all this way, I got hit by your palm without a shred of mercy!"

"Sorry. I mistook you for an enemy."

Great Sir was stamping his feet, apparently growing angrier as he spoke. Bow Saint calmed him, then slowly settled her internal energy.

She'd have to check his story when they got back, but he didn't seem to be lying.

At least, not here and now.

“But what were you thinking about so deeply? You looked so cheerful from behind that I was going to call out, but I held back. That’s why you mistook me for an enemy, I suppose.”

Caught off guard yet again by his bizarre words, Bow Saint let out a quiet laugh.

“Did I really look cheerful?”

“You did. Standing there alone in the faint moonlight, you looked so bright and full of life… Hm. Did I get that wrong?”

“No, you’re right. What else?”

“You seemed to be muttering something, but I couldn’t make it out. Your voice was too quiet.”

That was a relief. It hadn’t been anything too serious, but it wasn’t something she wanted anyone else to hear.

It was her secret. No one could know it. And yet, someday, she would have to make a choice.

But Great Sir wasn’t finished.

“Who were you thinking about?”

Her foot stopped in midair as she was about to step forward. Slowly, she lowered it until it pressed into the sand.

“What do you mean?”

Bow Saint tried to keep her voice steady. Great Sir studied her.

His mind might be as clouded as an overcast sky, but his eyes were as clear and bright as a midsummer day.

“I don’t know, either. But… you were definitely missing someone. And you were suffering at the same time.”

“…!”

For an instant, Bow Saint’s eyes trembled.

His voice seemed to cut through her thoughts like a blade. Yet it wasn’t simply painful. It felt like cold water washing a wound left to fester far too long.

Perhaps that was why her lips, which had seemed sealed forever, suddenly parted.

Perhaps it was because the only person with her in this lonely desert beneath the dim moon was an eccentric who had forgotten his own name and would remember nothing by tomorrow.

Or perhaps that was all just an excuse.

“That’s right.”

“I knew it! What do you think of this lady’s eye for people?”

Great Sir looked as delighted as a child. Bow Saint laughed softly—a genuine laugh that would have startled anyone else in their group.

“You were right. So right I almost wondered if you were the same person I’ve known all this time.”

“It comes from experience. I don’t remember much, but I think I was quite popular in my younger days—with men and women, young and old. Anyway, who is it? This person you miss?”

“It’s a secret.”

“A secret? I like that.”

Great Sir rubbed his palms together eagerly and asked, “Were you in love with him?”

After a moment’s silence, Bow Saint shook her head.

“I respected and admired him. Like everyone else.”

“Oh, dear. It seems you never told him how you felt. What a shame.”

“I told you, that isn’t it.”

“Words are only words. When words and actions differ, the actions are the truth. You hesitated just now.”

“…!”

“Hesitation always leads to regret. And regret can sometimes lead to the wrong choice. But everyone has a chance to choose. You may not be able to gather up every drop of spilled water, but you can wipe it away.”

Was this what it felt like to have ice-cold water poured over her?

As though waking from a brief dream, Bow Saint stared at him with wide eyes.

“You…”

She wanted to ask who he really was, and how an eccentric like him could speak with such profound insight.

But before she could finish, Great Sir leaned in and whispered.

“So confess before it’s too late. Soon—no, today would be best.”

“What?”

“Oh, don’t take me for a fool. This lady knew it all along. You’re deeply interested in that ill-tempered man’s Disciple.”

For a moment, Bow Saint couldn’t make sense of what he’d said. Then she managed to speak.

“…You mean Jin Taekyung?”

“Of course I—hm. You said it was a secret. I’ll keep that part to myself.”

“…”

“There’s no need to be embarrassed. Just go for it. It’ll be a relief! Sure, that fellow’s good at martial arts and comes from a good family, but you’ve got nothing to envy there. I hear your family’s Escort Bureau is doing well, too.”

That explained everything. Even why a man old enough to be her son had been calling her Young Lady.

Bow Saint squeezed her eyes shut. She forced down a great many thoughts and feelings before answering.

“That isn’t me.”

“Don’t be ridiculous. I heard it from someone and everything… Hm?”

Great Sir stopped. He rubbed his eyes with his sleeve, then regarded her with sudden gravity.

“Why are you here, heroine?”

“…!”

“Oh, right. That ill-tempered man—no, Great Hero Jeok told me to bring you over.”

With the composure of a Bodhisattva[3942] on the verge of enlightenment, Bow Saint replied, “Let’s go. Now, please. I won’t even ask what’s so important.”

“I’m curious myself.”

But Bow Saint never reached true enlightenment. At Great Sir’s next words, she felt the thread of her reason snap.

“I wonder if something’s happened. Jin Taekyung was looking for you, too. He seemed full of energy after sleeping for a whole month.”

Bow Saint stood frozen like a statue as Great Sir ambled away.

He glanced toward the far side of the still-clouded sky and murmured, too softly for Bow Saint to hear through the hundred and eight afflictions[3943] crowding her mind.

“A downpour’s coming.”

[3942] In Buddhism, a Bodhisattva seeks enlightenment while helping other beings attain it.

[3943] The hundred and eight afflictions are, in Buddhist tradition, the desires and mental disturbances that hinder enlightenment.

Chapter 1180

Great Sir's final mutter, heard only by the desert and the darkness, had been half right and half wrong.

As the dim dawn mist receded and the first light began to spread, the sky unleashed a downpour with all its might, as if it had been waiting for this moment.

Not over the parched desert, but toward the western plateau.

Whoooosh!

Rain came down in sheets. People pulled their collars tight and their straw rain capes close against the fierce wind and rain. The beasts carrying them let out weary cries.

"It's coming down like crazy. At this rate, forget the people—the horses won't hold out."

At the deep voice from beneath an oil-treated bamboo hat, the young man riding slowly to the speaker's right spoke up.

"We're lucky they've held out this long. We'll be clear of this wretched plateau in half a day, so we'll just have to keep going a little longer."

Wretched.

The man in the bamboo hat couldn't help agreeing. He was certain the tens of thousands of martial artists trudging forward at that very moment felt the same way.

"Yes. It hasn't been easy."

He murmured the words to himself, remembering what he'd seen on the way here.

Dry rivers and dead forests.

Villages and cities—proof that people had once lived there, yet so desolate it was hard to believe anyone ever had.

Every well was rotten. They'd searched the surrounding areas thoroughly, but found no people—not even the corpse of a common flying insect.

As if none had ever existed in the first place.

What on earth happened here?

The man in the bamboo hat thought again of the question that had long gone unanswered. But he already knew that no matter how deeply he pondered it, he'd only be wasting his mental strength.

If it were something he could figure out on his own, the white-haired old man approaching now with a nod of greeting would surely have figured it out too.

"Great Hero Song."

At the man's respectful salute, Song Ho, the Thousand-Faced Fox, smiled.

“Family Head Jin, such formality leaves this old man hardly knowing what to do with himself. Just call me Chief.”

The man in the bamboo hat—Jin Wikyung—shook his head awkwardly.

“Compared to you, I’m still a junior by a long way. Besides, I’m only the Lesser Family Head acting in the Family Head’s place.”

“I know that, of course. But these are precisely the times when a family’s unity matters most. And the Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan…”

“He’s away. Still.”

At the young man’s abrupt interruption, Jin Wikyung clicked his tongue.

“Second.”

The Second Young Master of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, Jin Mukyung—the Heaven Shaking Sword—replied, “Who are you calling Second?”

“…Fine. Commander of the Heaven Shaking Squad.”

“Give your order.”

“Choose some men and search the surrounding area. No—Commander, please see to it. I need to speak privately with Great Hero Song.”

“Commander Jin Mukyung accepts the Family Head’s order.”

“You…!”

“Then I’ll be off.”

Without giving Jin Wikyung a chance to say another word, Jin Mukyung answered as casually as could be and disappeared into the rain, his long robe whipping behind him.

“Whew. That boy…”

At Jin Wikyung’s sigh, the Thousand-Faced Fox let out a quiet chuckle.

“Don’t be too hard on him. From what I’ve heard, you brothers are close. It’s good to see.”

“No, my younger brother needs a good scolding. He has no manners at all, interrupting an elder while he’s speaking.”

“Don’t mind me. I’m quite all rig—”

“And he didn’t even bring an umbrella.”

“Pardon?”

“It’s pouring! I’ve told him over and over to use one, and he won’t listen! He didn’t even put on a bamboo hat!”

“…”

“He won’t lose his hair right this instant, fine! But what if he catches a cold? What then, hm? Am I wrong?”

The Thousand-Faced Fox fell silent at Jin Wikyung’s sudden outburst before replying.

“You really are… close. Closer than I’d heard.”

“My younger brothers were frail when they were little. Taekyung must be having a hard time right now, too. I worry whether he’s taking care of himself.”

By this point, the Thousand-Faced Fox was worried too.

Worried that there might be something wrong with Jin Wikyung’s mind.

Who was Jin Mukyung, the Heaven Shaking Sword?

Since childhood, he’d been counted among the finest rising martial artists in Murim on the strength of his extraordinary talent alone. And after One-Ride Heavenly Dragon Murong Yeonghwi vanished with the downfall of his family, no one had denied Mukyung his place at the head of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes.

To be precise, he had long since surpassed the level of a young prodigy.

In the recent Battle of Eight Spring Gorge, which decided the fate of the entire northern region, that young Sword Demon of the Jin Family of Taiyuan had defeated the Blood Soul Fat Demon, a great fiend of the previous generation, announcing the birth of a new Supreme Peak master to the world.

And Jin Wikyung was worried he’d catch a cold.

When he brought up Jin Taekyung, that monster among monsters, the Thousand-Faced Fox nearly lost the power of speech altogether.

Is he joking?

He briefly wondered whether he ought to laugh. Then, with the practiced skill of the Chief of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion, he kept his expression in check.

“Jin Taekyung will be fine. Even if he runs into a little trouble, I’m sure it won’t amount to much.”

“On that score, I’m reassured.”

Jin Wikyung, who doted on both his younger brothers—and especially his youngest, who’d long been a source of worry to him—agreed with heartfelt sincerity.

The group sent across the desert was small, given the terrain and the need for speed. But it included no fewer than six Supreme Peak masters: an elite force by any measure.

Three of them were hardly inferior to Mae Jonghak, the current Sword Saint and Alliance Leader of Murim. Even if a major threat arose, they should each be capable of protecting themselves.

If Jin Wikyung had one concern, it was a single person.

Great Sir, was it?

He’d heard plenty of rumors.

The appearance of a new Supreme Peak master always drew attention, even while Dark Heaven’s schemes shook the land.

If anything, it drew more attention now.

A mysterious master appearing in such troubled times, with wild hair and half his mind seemingly elsewhere?

A chivalrous hero who'd crushed the mounted bandits running rampant in Gansu more than a decade ago, all in one stroke?

That was all it took.

The martial world's gossips were all shouting, "I can't resist this!" as they talked about Great Sir until their mouths were dry, and word of him spread across the land.

But rumors aren't worth much in the end.

As the man leading a family, Jin Wikyung was cautious in all things. When it came to his younger brothers' safety, he left nothing to chance.

So of course he'd decided to meet the suspicious eccentric who'd joined his youngest brother's group himself.

Though, in the end, he hadn't managed it.

I wish I'd had a little more time.

Great Sir was like the wind on the Great Steppe.

Jin Wikyung had seen him only briefly, standing beside Jin Taekyung atop the city wall. After that, he was always vanishing somewhere and suddenly turning up somewhere else.

If Great Sir's whereabouts had ever remained a mystery for long, Jin Wikyung might have seriously suspected him of being a spy. But his own fairly thorough investigation had ruled that out.

Great Sir announced his presence to the world with booming nonsense and a foul stench.

Just before the army set out, Jin Wikyung had been so busy he could barely find a moment to visit his quarters. Great Sir had been elsewhere, drinking with the Beggars' Sect Leader and being invited to join the sect. When even that hadn't worked out, he'd sent Jin Mukyung and other family members in his place, only to find Great Sir hiding with Cheongpung in the military supply warehouse, looking for snacks.

And most people liked Great Sir.

Even his youngest brother did, though Jin Wikyung thought the boy was every bit as finicky as his master, familial affection aside.

"Great Sir? I don't know him that well, but from what I've seen, he seems like a good person."

"Come now, youngest! How many times have I told you to be careful around people you don't know—"

"I've been watching him since Gansu, and I've thought it over. I've got a good feeling about him. Like I do about you, hyung[3944].”

“…Like me?”

“Don’t make that face. Of course I like you more, hyung[3945]. There’s no comparison.”

“Oh, right?”

“Of course. But hyung[3946], want some candy? Cheongpung left it behind.”

“Hm? Sure!”

That was the last time.

Time was pressing; fifteen minutes felt like three autumns. Jin Wikyung grew busier still, while Great Sir continued darting about like the wind.

Before long, the combined army of the government and Murim—the first of its kind in the continent’s history—split into three forces at the border between Qinghai and Xinjiang.

Two like enormous waves, and one like a sharp awl.

“…That candy was good.”

Jin Wikyung murmured without realizing it. Then he felt a hot stare on his cheek and composed his expression.

“Ah, pardon me. I was deep in thought about where the Imperial Army might be by now.”

At that remarkably shameless answer, Song Ho fell silent for a moment.

He was old and missing a leg, but he still had both ears, and his hearing was as sharp as ever.

He wanted to ask what candy Jin Wikyung had been enjoying so much, but the Thousand-Faced Fox once again put his years of experience to work and answered as calmly as he could.

“If all has gone according to plan, they crossed Lop Nur fifteen days ago and should be at Hejing by now.”

“Then…”

“Yes. Tianshan is close. We may be a day apart, but we should be able to join them at the edge of the Tianshan Mountains before sunset the day after tomorrow.”

“…!”

Tianshan Mountains.

The moment he heard the name, Jin Wikyung felt his grip tighten on the reins.

Tianshan, a giant of earth reaching closer to the heavens than any other.

[3944] Hyung is a Korean term a younger man uses for an older brother or a close older man.
[3945] Hyung is a Korean term a younger man uses for an older brother or a close older man.
[3946] Hyung is a Korean term a younger man uses for an older brother or a close older man.

The lair of darkness, an unfathomable demon-slaying battleground that had poured forth countless evils over a thousand years, yet whose depths remained impossible to gauge.

But at last.

They had come. At the end of this long journey, he was waiting.

But before Jin Wikyung could calm the shiver of awe and fear that thought sent through him, a familiar voice rang out in the distance.

"Hyung[3947]!"

Jin Mukyung. It was him.

Jin Wikyung's eyes widened as his younger brother came hurtling toward him alone like an arrow, using his lightness skill. Where had he left the horse he'd treated like an extension of himself until now?

And then Jin Wikyung saw it.

An unfamiliar landscape spread behind Jin Mukyung's approaching shoulder.

A mountain range?

A shape the deep darkness couldn't conceal.

Beyond the driving rain, it was enormous. Vast.

Is that Tianshan? The one I've heard so much about?

But why was his heart pounding so hard? Why did Jin Mukyung's cry sound so urgent?

The next moment, Jin Wikyung understood.

Or rather, a single enormous bolt of lightning, slashing down through the distant sky, showed him.

Rumble!

As the thunder boomed and a flash of light flared for an instant, the roars of countless monsters rang out.

[3947] Hyung is a Korean term a younger man uses for an older brother or a close older man.

Chapter 1181

For a brief moment, it was as if the world had stopped.

Eyes wide with shock. Lips hanging open in a daze.

At the end of countless gazes, a wave of calamity poured over the distant, winding hills of the plateau, blackening them beneath its tide.

Graaah!

A rumble seemed to rise from the depths of an abyss.

The vast shadow everyone had believed to be a mountain roared—the countless monsters crouched within it.

The earth shook. Torrential rain burst from the sky. They planted a chill in their enemies even deeper than the cold air of the plateau that touched the heavens.

And the name of that chill was fear.

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

People stood frozen, staring at the impossible sight.

Tens of thousands. Perhaps hundreds of thousands.

An unfathomable number of monsters charged forward, their eyes gleaming red.

Some had human faces and the limbs of tigers. Others had bodies larger than pavilions, with dozens of faces hanging from them. One shadow even spread wings unmistakably like an eagle's and swept across the sky.

"…Primordial Heavenly Venerable."[3948]

The dazed mutter that slipped from one Daoist's lips spoke for everyone.

Anyone who'd glimpsed the enemy in that flash of lightning couldn't help but think of a god.

They didn't know the exact name or form of that mighty being who must exist somewhere among the clouds and stars. What did such a trivial detail matter?

You long for light most desperately when you're trapped in pitch darkness.

Just like now.

So this was it…!

Jin Wikyung gritted his teeth.

The ruined city. The absence of any trace of life.

The answers to every question he'd asked came rushing toward them, hundreds of zhang[3949] away, so clear and horrifying that they became reality.

Straight toward the Murim allied forces' vanguard. Straight toward where they stood.

"Great Hero Song."

[3948] The Primordial Heavenly Venerable is one of the Three Pure Ones, the highest deities in Daoism.

[3949] A Chinese zhang is about 3.03 meters (9.94 ft).

The meaning in the quiet call was clear. Song Ho, the Thousand-Faced Fox, nodded and hurled a small cylinder with all his might. No one knew when he'd taken it from inside his robes.

Boom!

A signal firework made by the artisans of the Sichuan Tang Clan burst in a dazzling explosion.

Through the sparks drifting slowly down and painting the sky, the hideous monsters appeared once more.

Yet the light was bright enough to be seen from the rear of the army, more than ten li[3950] away, and the fierce blast briefly washed away the people's fear.

Jin Wikyung knew what he had to do now.

We have to buy time until reinforcements arrive.

Even the tightest net loosens over time.

The Murim allied forces had set out with enough momentum to bring down Tianshan in a single stroke. But after a month of nonstop advance with no chance to catch their breath, they were already exhausted. The barren land and lack of food had pushed them to their limits.

Their fatigue had piled up, and their march—once as steady as an unobstructed river—had begun to falter.

It was terrible luck that this happened while the Jin Family of Taiyuan, one of the weaker forces in the alliance, was briefly holding the vanguard. But they were fortunate in one respect: Jin Wikyung was leading them.

His martial arts might not match those of his two younger brothers, but everyone acknowledged him as a leader.

"I, Jin Wikyung, Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, ask you this!"

His shout, infused with Peak internal energy, shook the plateau. His eyes blazed like torches.

"What are you so afraid of!"

Those who'd instinctively begun to retreat stopped in their tracks.

But that alone couldn't overcome the fear gripping them. Jin Wikyung met the eyes turned toward him and shouted again.

"What did you come here for!"

Feet that had stopped began moving forward again. Trembling fingers closed around sword hilts.

They all knew the answer.

For the world. For the greater cause.

To protect what they held dear, or to avenge what they'd already lost.

That was why they'd stood beneath one banner and prepared to face death.

[3950] A Chinese li is about 500 meters (0.311 mi); ten li is about 5 kilometers (3.1 mi).

“Neither I nor any of you came here as martial artists!”

The ground trembled harder. Jin Wikyung’s voice rang out with rising force.

“We stand here as human beings! As someone’s children, as someone’s parents, here to protect what’s ours!”

The frightened horses snorted fiercely. He could see faces clouded by exhaustion of body and mind.

And yet—

Even so—

“Face them with your heads held high! If you can’t cast off your fear, cut it down along with the enemy!”

Clang, clang, clang!

As if breaking chains around their wrists, they drew their weapons.

Together, they pointed them toward the wave of monsters, now a little over a hundred zhang away.

Their breathing quickened, white puffs spilling from their mouths.

Their mouths felt gritty, as though they’d chewed a handful of sand. Their hearts hammered as if they might burst.

But no one retreated now.

Even as the horses that couldn’t overcome their fear broke free of their masters and bolted in every direction.

Not when the hundred-odd zhang between them shrank by half, then half again.

Not even when a giant monster, its height level with the pavilions of a great city, tore a massive boulder from where it lay embedded in the plateau and hurled it at them.

Whoooosh!

For an instant, the rain stopped.

No—the great boulder overhead had blocked the rain falling on them.

“Ah…!”

Someone cried out. Jin Wikyung’s tightly closed lips parted.

“Second brother.”

Shing!

A ray of blue, bluer than a cloudless sky, shot upward.

It was quiet, and it was sharp.

Sharp enough to cut through raindrops, wind, and air—and even a thousand-geun[3951] boulder that had lain there for centuries—in a single silent stroke.

Slice!

[3951] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to about 600 grams (1.32 lb). A thousand geun is about 600 kilograms (1,320 lb).

A flash like lightning blazed, and it was over.

Blue Wave, Falling Bird.

The blue wave surging from one man's sword split the enormous boulder—not a bird—into dozens of pieces and sent them tumbling down the hill.

Rumble!

Through rain so heavy that not even a cloud of dust could rise, the young Sword Demon of the Jin Family of Taiyuan returned, having finally shaken off the monsters pursuing him. He muttered under his breath.

"I told you I'm the Commander of the Heaven Shaking Squad."

Jin Wikyung smiled faintly.

"I thought you called me 'hyungnim'[3952] a moment ago."

"…You must have imagined it."

"Oh dear. I must have misheard."

Jin Wikyung answered gently, as if soothing a child, and handed him a bamboo hat.

"Put it on. You'll catch a cold."

Jin Mukyung sighed softly at his older brother's tone and accepted the hat.

Once he'd tied the oil-treated bamboo hat's chin strap tight, the driving rain no longer obscured his vision.

But why did the world look so pitch-black now that he could see it clearly?

Rumble!

The earth shuddered beneath the darkness pouring in from every direction.

The monsters showed no sign of slowing. Jin Mukyung stared at the countless creatures charging toward him and tightened his grip on his sword hilt.

His breathing was steady, his gaze composed.

There wasn't a trace of fear in him.

Not because he was confident he'd win this battle.

He simply had a reason to fight, and faith in that reason. That was why he didn't waver.

That's right. I believe in him. We all do.

Jin Mukyung thought of one person.

His younger brother, whose whole life had changed overnight—and who had then changed everything around him.

He wasn't here, but that was a good thing.

The more monsters filled the view before them, the smaller the threat to Jin Taekyung would be.

[3952] Hyungnim is a respectful Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man he regards as one.

That guy, at least, has to survive to the end.

Jin Mukyung took a deep breath, stepped out of the tightly formed defensive formation, and walked forward.

That single step closed the last distance between humans and monsters.

Whoooosh!

A monster's enormous fist plunged down with a fierce burst of air. Its horrible stench seeped deep into his nose, but he didn't care.

Whatever the outcome of this battle, by the time it was over, the stench of blood would blanket the entire plateau—worse than anything he smelled now.

Shhhhh.

Blue Wave.

True to its name, a blue wave of Force surged up once again.

It silently carved apart the fist bearing down on them, swallowing the monsters at the front whole.

Crunch!

Severed limbs and blood sprayed in every direction.

The monsters, no longer human or beast, collapsed with mournful final cries.

But why?

The stench rising from their rotting bodies wasn't as foul as the one Jin Mukyung had smelled before. And a new light was layered over the blue Sword Force that blazed through the surroundings, illuminating and tearing through everything in its path.

Like the sunset gently coloring the world as the sun slowly sank.

Or a flower petal drifting on a breeze from nowhere.

Ah.

As the realization sounded within him, Jin Mukyung understood what this strange yet warm power was.

He knew, too, whose purple Force had slipped quietly onto the battlefield like a passing breeze.

Swish.

The hem of a robe fluttered in midair.

No one had noticed exactly when he appeared or how he'd moved.

Not even Jin Mukyung.

All that remained was the rich scent of plum blossoms, lingering at the tip of his nose and erasing even the monsters' stench.

"Good. I'm not too late."

Having reached the pinnacle of the sword long ago, he was the Number One Sword Under Heaven. With no one beneath this vast sky who could compare to him, he was the brightest star above the clouds.

The Sword Saint, Mae Jonghak, spoke, his eyes sinking deep.

“Then let’s begin.”

At that moment—

Fwoosh!

Above the purple plum blossoms that finally bloomed and scattered, the Sect Leaders of the Nine Sects and One Gang and the heads of the Five Great Families plunged down like meteors, led by four of the Ten Kings.

Boom!

Deep darkness and dazzling beams of light began tearing into each other with all their might.

Chapter 1182

The thick mist of blood spreading in every direction wasn't confined to the plateau west of the desert.

A thousand li[3953] to the east, the scene unfolding in a basin was just as brutal.

No—it was all too similar.

Crunch!

The battle was fierce.

And desperate.

Through the torrential rain, heavy enough to obscure the field, blood and chunks of flesh flew—no one could tell whose. Long, razor-sharp claws like scythes and finely honed spears and blades rushed at one another.

Clang!

Sparks flew. Monsters twice the size of grown men charged with furious roars.

Graaah!

Arms and legs thick as logs. Three or four heads hanging from each rotting body.

The sight alone was enough to send a primal chill down anyone's spine. But a low, deep sound rang out the next moment and snapped the soldiers back to their senses.

Boom. Boom. Boom.

A war drum.

Dozens of strongmen struck it with all their might, its thunderous beat shaking the vast basin.

It thawed frozen hands and feet and breathed life into courage that had begun to fade.

"Defend!"

A flag snapped at the shouted command.

Tens of thousands of troops moved as one.

The monsters' claws tore into iron-plated shields instead of human flesh and bone. Spearmen packed together like the spines of a hedgehog thrust their long spears, each a zhang[3954] in length.

Crack! Splurt!

Fountains of blood erupted across the field.

But it wasn't only the enemy's blood.

[3953] In this Chinese setting, one li is about 500 m (0.311 mi); a thousand li is about 500 km (311 mi).

[3954] One zhang, a traditional Chinese unit of length, is about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Many of the monsters didn't suffer so much as a scratch from the sharpened spearheads. They smashed through the shield wall and leaped into the broken ranks.

Whoosh! Boom!

Clods of earth burst into the air.

Bodies that had been full of strength a moment ago were flung away as mere chunks of flesh. Those who witnessed the unreal sight remembered the fear they'd briefly forgotten.

And right then—

Shing!

Dozens of streaks of light plunged down from above, blocking the monsters' relentless charge.

No.

They cut them down.

Slice! Splatter!

The soldiers at the front, who'd only just escaped death, stared wide-eyed at green blood spreading like mist.

More precisely, they stared at the shadows descending over the monsters' severed corpses.

At the golden armor shining almost unnaturally bright—and the man standing tall amid those Embroidered Uniform Guards.

"Your Majesty!"

They cried out with unmistakable loyalty and reverence.

They called to the sole ruler of the Nine Provinces and Eight Wastes, the Four Seas and Five Lakes. To the father who governed all under heaven in accordance with the will of Heaven.

And the Son of Heaven of the Great Ming Empire, Zhu Di, answered their call.

In the most effective way he could at that moment.

Thud!

A monster plunging from the sky like a bolt of lightning, its unmistakably hawklike wings folded tight, shuddered.

"Who do you think you're attacking?"

The Son of Heaven spoke with astonishing calm as he twisted the sword buried deep between the monster's brows.

"But you, too, were once one of my people."

Crack.

"Rest in peace."

With one final, wet crunch, the monster stopped moving. The tens of thousands of Imperial Guards watching felt something hot rise from deep in their bellies.

Who was the Son of Heaven?

Their lord. The master of the continent.

And yet this supreme being, whom they scarcely dared look upon, was fighting alongside them.

Shoulder to shoulder, drenched in the enemy's blood.

Someone else might scoff and ask if that was all it took. But to them, it was everything.

Everything they needed to willingly give their lives.

"Long live Your Majesty!"

"Long live the Great Ming Empire!"

Hundreds of voices became thousands, then tens of thousands. At last, one unified roar rose as the Imperial Army charged.

The Son of Heaven watched them go in silence.

Until a young officer guarding him nearby spoke.

"Your Majesty, may this humble officer dare to say something?"

The Son of Heaven shook his head.

"Denied."

He answered without a moment's hesitation.

But the young officer didn't back down.

"Please return. It's dangerous here."

"Did you not hear what I said?"

"I heard you clearly."

"Then how do you intend to answer for this crime?"

"I will accept any punishment. But I beg Your Majesty to preserve your sacred person first and carry out the sentence afterward."

The young officer was respectful yet unflinching. The Son of Heaven let out a quiet laugh.

"A mere Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard dares to defy my word. The laws of the imperial house must have fallen into disarray. Wouldn't you agree?"

A middle-aged man who had appeared out of nowhere spoke up.

"Wouldn't it be a hundred times better for its laws to fall into disarray than for the imperial house itself to fall?"

It was a disrespectful answer that could have seen him branded a traitor on the spot. Yet the Son of Heaven didn't so much as raise an eyebrow.

The middle-aged man holding a silver crescent-bladed halberd had done more than anyone under heaven to protect the imperial house.

"You came, Baek Yeon."

Baek Yeon, Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, gave a brief military salute and corrected him.

“I had to.”

“How strange. No one called for you—not even me.”

“Then why is Your Majesty, who ought to be safely in the rear, here?”

“For the same reason you came here of your own accord.”

Baek Yeon paused, then gave a dry laugh.

“You’ve answered a foolish question with a wise reply. I have nothing more to say.”

Yes. It had been a foolish question.

Just as Baek Yeon had come to protect the Son of Heaven, the Son of Heaven had come to protect the people who followed him.

Not for some grand cause, but out of compassion for his people.

Compassion. Compassion…

It was a word he hadn’t thought of in a long time.

The Empire’s fourth prince, who had once raced across battlefields with hot blood and a natural gift for war, had disappeared after Dark Heaven’s shadow fell over the imperial house.

The Son of Heaven had to be cold. He had to be heartless. He’d believed it was the right course—the only way to solve every problem.

At least until a few months ago, when he met one man.

Jin Taekyung.

He was utterly free-spirited.

No matter what stood in his way, he pushed forward with all his strength.

Simply because he was brave?

No.

He felt fear and pain just like everyone else—perhaps even more than they did. But he pressed on because he believed it was the compassionate thing to do.

The path Jin Taekyung walked was narrow, but straight.

And in the end, it reached everyone. It had brought countless people all the way here.

“He’s better than I am. Enough to make me ashamed to be the Son of Heaven.”

That mutter would have thrown the court into an uproar had the civil and military officials heard it. The Son of Heaven raised the sword he’d let hang at his side.

Then he turned to the young Embroidered Uniform Guard officer who had tried to stop him.

“Has your resolve still not changed?”

The officer replied in a steady voice.

“With all due respect, no.”

“Very well. I will withdraw in accordance with your wishes, at once. In return, you are not to leave my side for even a moment.”

The officer faltered at the unexpected words. The Son of Heaven added, his voice strong,

“But we will withdraw forward, not back.”

“Your Majesty.”

“I am the Son of Heaven. The father of all the people. A father never turns away from his children when they’re bleeding. That is the will of Heaven.”

“…!”

“I ask you again. Has your resolve still not changed?”

After a moment’s silence, the young officer knelt.

“I, Jeong Hogun, Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, receive the command of Your Majesty, the august Emperor.”

“Follow me. We’ll open a path.”

“As you command!”

Jeong Hogun wasn’t the only one to answer.

The thousand Embroidered Uniform Guards who had closed ranks around the Son of Heaven roared as one, shaking the battlefield.

Their cry swept over the heads of the Imperial Guards, whose lines were rapidly collapsing under the overwhelming odds, and reached even the true enemy lying in wait beyond them.

Pitch-black armor reflected no light. Each movement brought a dull, heavy sound.

Red eyes glowed beneath helmets pulled low, and the mouths visible below them reeked of corpse stench.

“Black Ghosts…!”

True monsters, each one the equal of a Supreme Peak master.

Countless eyes trembled at the sight of no fewer than twenty of them. Then a thunderous cry burst from the Son of Heaven’s lips.

“I command the Twelve Palaces!”

At that very moment—

Crunch!

More than ten streaks of light shot up across the battlefield.

Twelve men and women crushed the monsters in their path and reached the Son of Heaven in an instant. They bowed deeply before him.

The pillars and stars that upheld and illuminated the imperial house: the Twelve Palaces of the Zodiac.

After the bloodshed in the imperial palace, these Supreme Peak masters had been newly organized under the Son of Heaven's command as a force directly serving the imperial house. Their eyes shone as they looked to their lord.

"Give your command."

The Son of Heaven took a deep breath.

When this battle was over, how many of them would still be alive?

No—could anyone even dare to predict victory against enemies so terrifyingly powerful?

What would the old me have done?

He already knew the answer to the question that had suddenly come to mind.

He would have retreated without hesitation.

Even if it meant sending tens of thousands of Imperial Guards to their deaths.

But the actions of one man had changed more than just this world.

The Son of Heaven had been reborn, too.

Though accepting the Maoshan Sect's martial arts had left his body little different from a dead man's, his heart and blood burned hotter than ever.

Like everyone else here.

Just like the man who'd awakened him once again: Jin Taekyung.

And if Jin Taekyung were here, he would surely say this:

"Wipe them all out."

The words held not a trace of decorum, and that made the freedom in them all the clearer. The Son of Heaven raced across the blood-soaked earth.

Whoooosh!

A brilliant golden wave stretched out behind him like the tail of a meteor.

Jin Taekyung suddenly raised his head.

Two streaks of light were crossing the sky, which had turned black before he'd noticed.

A meteor?

It wasn't exactly common, but it wasn't all that rare, either.

So why?

Jin Taekyung pressed down on his throbbing chest.

For a long time, he couldn't manage a proper night's sleep.

Not after night gave way to dawn and the first light appeared. Not after he and his companions finally left that damned desert behind.

Not even after they passed through mountains and fields blanketed in perennial snow and reached the place where all the allied forces were supposed to rendezvous.

No one came.

A day passed, then another.

Chapter 1183

It was a nameless ruin.

Judging by its size and the number of buildings, it had once been a small city where several thousand households lived. But as everyone had expected, there was not a person to be found.

Only the mountain range stretching endlessly along the distant horizon remained to watch over the ghost town.

The Tianshan Mountains: a giant of nature wearing a bamboo hat of snow that never melted, no matter the season.

The mountains of heaven, huh.

Muttering to myself, I gazed through the window at the vast landscape.

Overwhelming. Almost awe-inspiring.

It was a sight that could only be called Tianshan. The peaks rose through the clouds, high enough that I could almost imagine immortals living somewhere up there.

No, that wasn't such an absurd fantasy.

Replace immortals with Demon King, and fantasy became reality.

A very horrifying reality, at that.

"Captain?"

A voice suddenly pierced my ear.

Plenty of people called me their benefactor. Only one called me Captain.

I kept my eyes on the view outside. "Yeah."

Maybe it was because my thoughts were tangled like a ball of string. My voice came out subdued, and Hyuk Mujin hesitated before speaking again.

"Um, have you eaten?"

"Sort of. Why?"

"Slau—no, Great Hero Mungyeong told me to stop by if I had a chance. He wanted to make sure you weren't skipping meals."

"He did? That's unusual."

It surprised me a little. We'd grown close during our time together, but I hadn't thought he was the sort to worry about whether I'd eaten.

"He said these are special fasting pills he made before we set out, just in case. We're running low on food already, and he said he'd kill you if you left any."

"…Yeah, that sounds more like him."

I shook my head and took the fasting pill I'd tucked away in my clothes. Hyuk Mujin's eyes turned cold.

"You said you ate."

"I said sort of. I didn't say I ate."

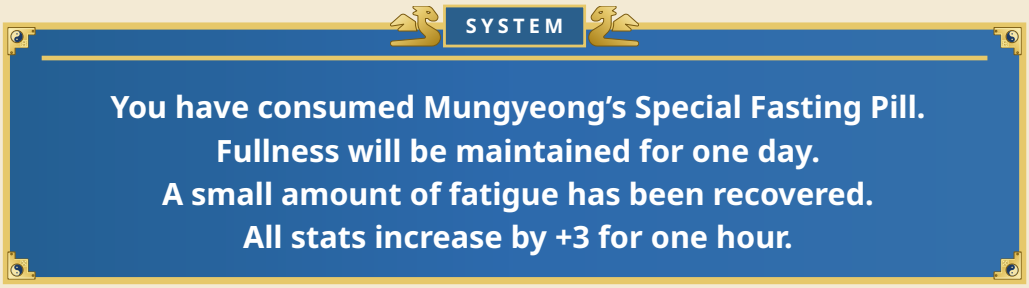
"Honestly. I knew it."

Maybe he was acting up because he hadn't been hit enough lately.

Ignoring his grumbling, I popped the pill into my mouth. I chewed and swallowed through a bitterness I couldn't begin to identify. Then, along with a surprising feeling of fullness, a System notification rang out.

Ding.



It tasted like shit, but it certainly worked.

Though for something made by the Divine Physician, its effects were a little disappointing.

I grimaced and smacked my lips. Then I met Hyuk Mujin's gaze as he stared at me with an almost uncomfortable intensity.

"What are you doing?"

"Y-yes?"

"Why are you staring? Is there something on my face?"

"Uh, no. You just look really… handsome today. Hehe."

I couldn't help a bitter smile at his ingratiating flattery.

It was obvious what he was doing. My mood had been low lately, and he was trying to cheer me up.

I didn't let on. I clicked my tongue instead.

"Enough nonsense. If you're done here, get out. Don't bother me just to make sure I eat."

"Hey, what do you mean, just? We're doing all this so we can keep living. What's more important than food?"

"You sound like someone I know."

"Are you seriously comparing me to Taishan, that A-Gwi of a bastard—"

His words trailed off.

Hyuk Mujin only moved his lips for a while, as though he'd said something he shouldn't have. I turned my gaze back out the window, too.

After a brief silence, his voice sounded through the dusty room, quieter than before.

"Captain."

"Go on."

"Taishan… he's doing all right, isn't he?"

"He should be."

"He eats so much, he might've cleaned out their food supply already. Sneaking food whenever he gets the chance, taking a few whacks from Old Man Nam, getting scolded by Sama Pyo…"

"Could be."

"I'm sure that's exactly what's happening. Want to bet?"

"No."

"Why not?"

"Because we'd both bet on the same thing."

"Oh. Right."

"Yeah."

Silence returned, longer and much heavier than before.

And this time, too, it was Hyuk Mujin—not me—who broke it first.

"Captain."

"Yeah."

"Everyone's… doing okay, right?"

I didn't answer.

Instead, I looked out at the landscape I'd watched for the past two days, a view that hadn't changed for even a moment. It was overwhelming and awe-inspiring, yet it felt utterly empty.

I wondered why a landscape filled to the last detail looked to me like a blank sheet of paper.

No.

I thought about the people.

Jin Wikyung, who would run toward me without a care for who was watching, shouting, "Youngest!" at the top of his lungs.

Jin Mukyung, watching his eldest brother rush ahead with a sullen expression.

Sama Pyo, now leading hundreds of subordinates like a proper Sect Leader, and Namho and Taishan, who had somehow become inseparable.

A Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard who'd thanked me with a face stiff as a block of wood—and the ruler of the continent, whose body was dead yet who seemed more full of life than before.

I thought of all of them, everyone we'd parted from with a smile in Qinghai.

I thought of the past, already gone, and the future soon to come.

But why?

We'd left the desert behind. Two days had passed, and now the sun was sinking. Still, there was no sign of them.

No Murim Alliance banners rising like mountains in the west. No golden armor surging like a tide from the east.

That was right.

I hadn't been looking at the landscape. I'd been looking for the people coming from somewhere far away.

Yet as the last day we'd agreed upon drew to a close, I still couldn't find them.

…Maybe.

I forced down the three syllables that had surfaced unbidden.

Then, as though a wave could erase the disordered sand on a beach, I repeated to myself:

No. That can't be.

They were strong.

Their blades and spears were sharp, and their resolve burned bright.

They were Murim. They were the Nine Provinces[3955] and all under Heaven.

So I held tight to the belief clenched in my fist.

This wait would be rewarded. However exhausted and dust-covered they were after their endless forced march, we would see each other again soon, smiling.

I believed it.

Believing was all I could do.

"Let's do it."

Hyuk Mujin had come up beside me without a word and was looking out the window with me. He glanced over.

"Do what?"

"That bet from earlier. Let's do it after all."

I watched the world slowly turn red and went on.

"They'll come before midnight. I'm sure of it."

Hyuk Mujin stared at me with wide eyes, then let out a quiet laugh.

"That can't be a bet."

"Why not?"

"Because we'd both bet on the same thing. That's not a bet."

"Damn. You're right."

"See?"

"So you're not doing it?"

"No."

[3955]The Nine Provinces are the traditional divisions of ancient China; the expression can refer to the realm as a whole.

He added firmly, “Of course I’m doing it.”

His voice drifted out the window on the wind.

Then the sunset weighed down on the world, and darkness came.

A darkness so still it was suffocating.

“We leave in fifteen minutes.”

A draft blew in from somewhere, making the candle flicker precariously. Jeok Cheongang’s voice and tone, however, were calm and composed.

“If we wait another day for these fools who forgot the agreed date—whether they’re from the Murim Alliance or the Imperial Guards—I’ll start producing relics[3956] inside my own body. It’d be a hundred times better for us to move ahead as scouts and vanguard.”

On the surface, it made sense.

Perhaps Jeok Cheongang’s composure made it seem even more reasonable. He spoke as though he’d expected all this from the start.

The Slaughter Saint and Bow Saint nodded on either side of him. The others listened in silence.

But Jin Taekyung was different.

“You want us to go ahead?”

“Is there another way?”

“It’s not that there’s another way. We can’t take that one.”

“Go on.”

“If we went back west and east—even a day’s travel, no, just half a day’s—we might run into our scouts…”

“Midnight has passed. The date we agreed on is behind us. We discussed what to do afterward in advance.”

“But…”

“Fool!”

Whoosh!

The air abruptly heated. His master’s sharp rebuke rang out, and he fixed his Disciple with a level gaze.

“I know what you fear, but moving armies of that size brings countless difficulties. We’re only going one step ahead according to the plan already made. No more arguing.”

[3956] Sarira are relics associated with the cremated remains of Buddhist practitioners. Producing them while still alive is an exaggeration for an unbearably long wait.

Normally, Jin Taekyung would have obeyed Jeok Cheongang. Their relationship might have been more informal than most between master and Disciple, but Taekyung trusted and followed him more than anyone.

Normally.

Not today. Not at this moment.

An inexplicable sense of déjà vu came over him.

What is it?

Something was wrong. No, it was more than that.

Xinjiang had long been treated as a deathtrap under the Demonic Cult's rule, but it wasn't unknown territory.

Where had the cult's immense power, fit to be called a theocratic kingdom, and the strength to fight the Murim of the Central Plains come from?

Xinjiang's vast lands held substantial manpower and resources. It had once been one of the most important trade routes under Heaven.

The Hidden Shadow Pavilion had long since obtained information about the region, including its geography. Only a few months ago, it had sent in dozens of spies, though just one had returned alive.

But the Tianshan Mountains were different.

If Xinjiang lay beneath the Demonic Cult's shadow, Tianshan was its Sacred Land: the place where the cult had first risen and put down roots.

A truly unknown land within the deathtrap of Xinjiang.

And no one had been able to reach those roots.

Yet Jeok Cheongang had just said they were merely going one step ahead according to a "plan already made."

A plan Taekyung had never heard of.

That can't be. Once we enter Tianshan, joining up with our allies will be next to impossible.

Jin Taekyung felt his heart pounding hard and heat rising inside him.

And all at once, he realized a truth he could hardly believe.

"You were lying. Just to deceive me."

Taekyung's voice trembled. Jeok Cheongang answered.

"From the beginning, only one thing was decided. If we failed to meet on the agreed date, we would advance without hesitation."

His master's heavy voice struck him like a war hammer.

"We… No. You are the main assault."

His master's heavy voice came crashing down over his Disciple's head like a war hammer.

Chapter 1184

“We… No. You are the main assault.”

“…!”

The moment Jeok Cheongang’s quiet voice reached him, Jin Taekyung went rigid.

At the same time, the fog clouding his mind finally began to lift.

But the reality emerging beyond it was neither as hopeful nor as beautiful as he’d wished.

“What… what does that mean?”

A question was supposed to express uncertainty and seek an answer that would clear it up.

But Jeok Cheongang knew there was no uncertainty in the question Taekyung had just asked. Only denial.

Taekyung wanted to hear himself deny a reality he couldn’t bear to believe.

“You already know what this old man means.”

The old master looked at his Disciple, his gaze grave. Then he spoke slowly, giving weight to every word.

“Everything we did was for us. For you.”

“…You mean—”

“Xinjiang is Dark Heaven’s domain. No, not just this land. Their eyes and ears have been hidden everywhere under Heaven. We had to consider every possibility.”

Together, they were strong. Scattered, they were vulnerable.

Even so, they hadn’t split their mighty army of more than a hundred thousand into three forces solely for practical reasons like supplies or marching speed.

“We had to keep one last dagger hidden until the very end, in case it came to that.”

That dagger was Jin Taekyung.

Not the sharpest in the world, nor the most precious—but against Dark Heaven, more lethal than any other weapon.

No. Perhaps the Lord of Heaven’s only Adversary, chosen by Heaven itself.

“That’s why everyone agreed. The Sword Saint, the Emperor. And…”

Jeok Cheongang looked around at the silent group and added,

“We did, too.”

Only then did Taekyung realize that not one person gathered here had objected.

The Slaughter Saint and the Bow Saint. Ju Hwaran and Song Ilseom. Cheongpung, Gung Gibang, even Hyuk Mujin.

Some watched him in silence, their faces dark. The others lowered their heads, unable to meet his eyes.

“You deceived me. From the very beginning.”

"I'm sorry."

Jeok Cheongang's apology was so sincere that anyone who knew him even a little would have doubted their eyes and ears.

But for Taekyung, this wasn't something an apology could settle.

A hundred thousand.

More than a hundred thousand lives were still out there, beyond the darkness outside the window. Among those whose fate was now unknown were people bound to him by ties deeper than time.

Comrades he could trust with his back. Friends he'd gladly lay down his life for. Brothers who shared no blood with him but had become family all the same.

"I'm going back."

Taekyung rose from his seat, his voice strained.

Perhaps it was the shock of what he'd just heard that churned his stomach and made his head spin. He gritted his teeth.

He had to go back and save them. Find them.

…Even if all he found were their bodies.

But before he could take a step, Jeok Cheongang's voice stopped him again.

No—it struck his frozen heart.

"Do we have time for that?"

"…!"

"The agreed date has passed. We can't hesitate any longer. If we delay even a little more, what comes next will be even harder to contain."

Those weren't just words. It was reality.

A merciless reality Taekyung understood better than anyone.

Everything was already collapsing, like a massive dam giving way.

The modern world. Murim.

Until he cleared the Quest, the bridge between the two worlds would remain broken. And nothing could turn back the flow of time, already thrown so far out of alignment.

No. There was only one way left.

Close his eyes, keep his mouth shut, and move forward.

Then, at the end of this journey, defeat the source of every disaster waiting there: the Lord of Heaven.

But…

Even if I succeed at everything, I'll regret this for the rest of my life.

That wouldn't change even if he were hailed as the savior of a new humanity and gained immense wealth and fame.

He might gain everything in the world, but it would all slip through his fingers like sand.

Even now, after all he'd accomplished, Taekyung still sometimes had nightmares.

He still trembled at the roar of the Black Wyvern—a monster he could kill with One Strike now. He still wandered through that dark cave, where his companions' screams rang out without end.

And so Taekyung made his decision.

"I'm sorry."

He steeled himself. He would go back, even if only a day's travel. Even if only half a day's.

If that half day ruined everything, he would accept it as his damnable fate.

If he couldn't save even the few people closest to him, then all of this was nothing but some being called a god playing a sick game.

Watching his Disciple, Jeok Cheongang muttered bitterly,

"So this is how it ends up."

"You know what I'm like."

"I do. That's why I took you as my Disciple."

Hearing the sincerity in his master's voice, Taekyung smiled faintly.

"I'll be back soon."

"I'm sorry."

Taekyung shook his head.

He wanted to tell his master that none of this was anyone's fault. It was simply a matter of choice; there was no need to apologize.

But for some reason, the words wouldn't leave his lips. And the step he'd already taken wasn't followed by another.

What's going on?

The question surfaced as Taekyung breathed hard.

At some point, his heart had started pounding like mad. The skin around his eyes burned as though pressed against torches, and his vision shimmered with heat haze thicker than in the midday desert.

Then, through that warped and rippling world, an unexpected voice echoed.

"No need to get worked up. You'll feel at ease soon."

A calm tone. A troubled look.

Confused as he was, Taekyung had no trouble recognizing the speaker.

"Why…?"

To the question Taekyung barely managed to force out, the Slaughter Saint returned the very words he'd spoken a moment ago.

"Because I knew what you're like."

"…!"

“And don’t blame that Hyuk brat later. He’s as stubborn as his superior. It took me ages to convince him.”

Taekyung saw Hyuk Mujin behind the Slaughter Saint, his head bowed, and finally understood.

Mujin’s odd insistence on checking that he’d taken the pill. The special fasting pills the Slaughter Saint had made.

Poison?

But something was wrong with that.

If he’d been poisoned, the System would have warned him immediately, and the Myriad-Poison Ring on his finger would have begun detoxifying him.

It was a perfectly reasonable question.

The problem was that the man before him—also known as the Divine Physician—knew those things just as well as he did.

“Poison and medicine are one and the same. Only the slightest difference separates them.”

The man who had used that slightest difference to make a medicine perilously close to poison let out a quiet sigh.

“I didn’t want to go this far. Truly.”

Taekyung answered in a cracked voice.

“I understand.”

“I’m glad to hear it.”

“Then I hope you’ll understand me, too.”

“What do you—”

The Slaughter Saint sensed something amiss and was about to ask when—

Whoom!

Taekyung’s fist came hurtling toward his face with a heavy rush of air.

Boom!

Compressed air exploded in the wake of his lightning-fast punch. The gust sent dust billowing up from the floor.

The Slaughter Saint twisted his body out of its path at the last moment, his eyes wide.

He can barely keep himself upright. How?

Taekyung’s strength and speed were hard to believe from someone who was, for all practical purposes, poisoned.

But unlike the Slaughter Saint, Taekyung had no intention of answering his question.

More precisely, he had no time.

He left the startled Slaughter Saint behind and charged through the dust cloud toward the window—only for someone else to block his path.

Shing!

Two streaks of light flashed.

At their tips lay enough force and momentum to cleave through a boulder of solid iron in a single stroke, but Jin Taekyung twisted his upper body without a moment's hesitation.

As if he'd seen it coming.

Shhk.

Blades swept past him with a low, chilling hiss.

In the same instant, he struck.

Crash!

His two palms met the Bow Saint's twin sabers.

With a boom like an exploding cannonball, the Bow Saint's sunken eyes appeared reflected on the trembling blade of her curved saber.

"Stop."

Taekyung gritted his teeth instead of answering.

Crk.

Pain shot through his jaw, jolting his fading mind awake. It lit a fire in the body that had not yet fallen asleep.

Grind.

His palms drove forward against the blades.

At the same time, the Bow Saint began to slide backward with her treasured weapon as Jin Taekyung's perfect, massive muscles flexed—too large to hide even beneath his thick robe.

It was the strength of some ancient giant. A will that refused to give out.

But that was as far as he could go.

As far as his heart and body could endure.

"I'm sorry. Truly."

The moment Jeok Cheongang's tearful voice came from behind him, Jin Taekyung felt every bit of the strength boiling inside him like lava turn cold.

Faces blurred before him, as indistinct as his vision. Memories of the time he'd spent with them rose one after another, clouding his sight more densely than any fog or dust.

Drip. Drip.

Rainwater fell from somewhere and wet the floor. At last, the old master caught his Disciple as he crumpled.

Chapter 1185

"Good. Nothing's wrong with him."

At the Slaughter Saint's first words after examining Jin Taekyung, Jeok Cheongang spoke, his face grim.

"Are you sure?"

"I guarantee it."

"That's what you told me about three shichen[3957] ago."

"Have a little faith. The medicine just took longer than expected to spread through his system."

"It's hard to trust you. Things nearly went wrong because of some quack's careless guarantee."

Their eyes met. The air seemed to tighten between them.

After a brief silence, Jeok Cheongang let out a quiet sigh.

"I went too far. I apologize."

"No need. I understand how you feel."

The Slaughter Saint truly didn't mind.

He had spent half his life as an assassin and the other half as a physician. Treating more patients than he could count had taught him more than medicine.

It had taught him about the heart.

He had come to understand the hearts of the sick, and of those closest to them who watched and shared their suffering.

That was why he knew better than anyone that the man before him was not the great martial artist known as the Fire King. He was Jeok Cheongang—a man whose Disciple lay unconscious before them, a member of the patient's family.

Besides, I failed to give him enough reason to trust me as a physician.

With that thought, the Slaughter Saint quietly studied Jin Taekyung's face. He had already lost consciousness.

And at the same time, he remembered the terrifying strength and speed Taekyung had displayed moments ago.

Everything was perfect. The medicine I prepared, the time it would take to work.

The fasting pill Taekyung had taken was the Slaughter Saint's masterpiece, painstakingly made with the Myriad-Poison Ring in mind.

At first, it was nothing more than an ordinary fasting pill. But once its effects began to spread, slowly, over more than three shichen[3958], that changed.

[3957] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; three shichen is about six hours.

[3958] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; three shichen is about six hours.

It would paralyze the limbs, cloud the mind and Qi Sense, and even disperse internal energy. The Slaughter Saint had been certain that no Supreme Peak master could easily withstand it.

He had thought even he would be in trouble if he took it without knowing what it was.

Then how did this brat…?

His gaze lingered on Taekyung.

Was it his imagination, or did his back still tingle where the fierce wind from Taekyung's fist had swept past? A faint doubt came with the sensation.

Had that truly been a blow delivered with all his strength?

"…Perhaps."

The word slipped out before he realized it.

Jeok Cheongang gave him a questioning look. Realizing his mistake, the Slaughter Saint shook his head at once.

"It's nothing. I was thinking about something."

"Could it be…?"

"Rest easy. I've told you more than once: there's nothing wrong with your Disciple. He'll wake within two days at the latest."

He watched Ju Hwaran and Hyuk Mujin support Taekyung as they moved him away, then added, "And by the time he wakes, we'll be somewhere out there."

Jeok Cheongang turned toward the window.

Beyond a world where even the stars had vanished, the immense Tianshan Mountains rose through the darkness like a monster from myth. They had stood there a thousand years ago and looked as though they would stand for another thousand.

But the Lord of Heaven, crouched somewhere in those mountains, was the true monster—a being worthy of being called an abyss. Defeating him would mean staking the fate of all under Heaven.

"I can't tell if this was truly the right choice," Jeok Cheongang murmured.

"You know as well as I do. This isn't the best choice, or even the second-best. It's only the lesser evil that barely lets us avoid the worst—and the only choice left to us now."

He was right. They had come too far to speak of the best choice.

Neither the Imperial Army nor the Murim Alliance had arrived by the agreed date. Only one path remained before them.

And it was one of several possibilities they had considered even before leaving Qinghai.

If no one arrives by the appointed date—if, by some chance, that happens…

Jeok Cheongang remembered the Sword Saint, Mae Jonghak, speaking quietly at their secret meeting in the dim light before dawn.

"Leave this place and go to Tianshan. Without a moment's hesitation."

"Leave? Are you serious?"

"If things went wrong despite following a plan devised by the strongest martial artists and wisest strategists under Heaven, what more is there to say? The Son of Heaven has already agreed."

"But—"

"This isn't a sacrifice. It's a choice for the sake of everyone. Whatever misfortune befalls us, we can still avoid the worst. We'll have one move left."

Do all that man can, then await Heaven's will.

They had done all they could. Now they would wait for Heaven's decree.

Mae Jonghak had spoken aloud those six characters etched in all their hearts. Jeok Cheongang distinctly remembered him smiling.

"Then I'll see you in Tianshan."

When morning came, they parted.

The Murim Alliance went west. The Imperial Army went east. And a single carriage carrying all their hopes went into the desert.

Every step of the operation had been kept secret against the possibility of spies.

By the time everyone realized Jin Taekyung's group was missing, Mae Jonghak announced that they had already joined the Imperial Army and were on the move. The Imperial Army did the same.

Both forces pushed forward with all their might, constantly spreading false information to keep Dark Heaven's eyes—wherever they might be hidden—away from the desert.

And so that, if the worst came to pass, they could serve as bait.

Now what they had feared had become reality.

What in the world happened?

Jeok Cheongang swallowed the question poised on his tongue.

He was not alone. Everyone there knew something had happened to their allies, but no one said it aloud.

What they needed now was courage and hope that wouldn't die—not anxiety, deep and sticky as a swamp.

All we can do is keep going.

The plan had not failed yet.

Though events had gone awry, they would press on toward Tianshan. Their allies would arrive late, follow their trail, and join them.

It was a faint hope. For now, believing in it was the best they could do.

"We leave. Before it gets any later."

At the sound of Jeok Cheongang's heavy voice—

Fwoosh.

The candle that had flickered precariously as it lit the room finally went out.

Once the decision was made, everyone moved in perfect order.

Only Jin Taekyung had been kept in the dark. The rest of the group had already considered every possibility and accepted the reality before them, so not one of them hesitated.

In that respect, the two days they had spent in the abandoned town had been invaluable. They had recovered from their accumulated fatigue, and the horses, worn down by the relentless forced march and unable to go farther, could be turned into provisions.

"Drain their blood and store it in gourds. Make jerky from the meat. The terrain will be too rough for a carriage from here on, and if we set them free, they'll starve to death anyway."

"D-do we really have to go this far?"

"Why? Have you grown attached to them?"

"I'd be lying if I said I hadn't. They may be beasts, but we've been together all this time. Look at their eyes. Don't you see the tears welling up? It's like they understand us."

"I see. Then starting tomorrow, you can go hungry, Hyuk."

"On second thought, my mouth's watering."

"…"

"What can they do about it? Their crime was being born beasts."

It was a sorry end for the eight sweat-blood horses that had given them everything they could. Set aside the moral question, though, and it was a perfectly reasonable decision.

Just after midnight, the moment they set foot in Tianshan for the first time, they all sensed it.

What is this place…?

It was different.

The weight of the air. The way the wind moved. Everything.

The atmosphere had changed as though they had entered a world cut off from their own. A chill ran up their spines, along with the unsettling sense that they were trapped in a prison built like a maze, with no way out.

What a vicious aura.

Jeok Cheongang's senses prickled. Even a pool full of corpses and poison would not feel this oppressive.

Then again, perhaps that was only natural.

Tianshan was the Land of Ruin that had harbored the poison called the Demonic for a thousand years.

And yet, it was also the final hill they had to cross.

They had rested. They had secured plenty of food. If they watched for dangers lurking somewhere in the thorny undergrowth, they would reach their destination before long.

We made it this far without being stopped. At least for now, that means we haven't caught their attention.

Jeok Cheongang gazed into the dark forest.

Things were going badly, but that fact alone gave them reason to hope.

And the old master, with his beloved Disciple on his back, would break before he bent.

Step.

Jeok Cheongang took his first step, putting his weight behind it.

A strong wind blew from somewhere. All around them, dense gray branches swayed, waving at the unwelcome intruders.

Chapter 1186

Everything has a beginning.

Even a white-haired old man was once a baby. Even a pebble by the roadside didn't always look the way it does now.

Everything in the world comes together according to a fixed order and changes with the passage of time.

Nothing is perfect from the start. Nothing lasts forever.

That is the law of nature, the order of the world as everyone knows it.

And yet, the group pushing through the pale mist was thinking the same thing.

Or rather, they were wondering whether everything they had always taken for granted might be little more than an illusion.

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, was one of them.

Damn it.

He swallowed the curse rising in his throat and looked around.

Mist coiled in every direction. Beyond it, black branches appeared and vanished in fleeting glimpses. Rugged mountains climbed without end.

Order? Laws?

Those ideas had long since been wiped from his mind.

The landscape looked as if it had been perfect in this form from the beginning and would remain unchanged ten thousand years from now. Jeok Cheongang licked his parched lips.

The sight was more chilling than a mountain of sabers and a forest of swords. Looking at it made his hundred-plus years of life, and everything he had learned in them, feel almost meaningless.

If there was any comfort, it was that he wasn't the only one who felt that way.

"Damn Tianshan."

The voice suddenly reached his ear. Jeok Cheongang silently agreed, then parted his lips.

"Don't say that. The youngsters will lose heart if they hear you."

There was only one person who would send him a Sound Transmission in a situation like this.

The Slaughter Saint's reply came at once.

"That's why I'm using Sound Transmission."

"Don't use that, either."

"Why not?"

"It wastes internal energy."

A dozen paces ahead, the Slaughter Saint turned to Jeok Cheongang with an incredulous look.

“Do I look like some Third Rate swordsman off the street? And if you’re so worried about wasting internal energy, why answer me instead of practicing what you preach?”

“This old man can afford it.”

“Why can you afford it?”

“My internal energy runs deep. Unlike some people’s.”

“…You can still crack jokes at a time like this.”

“I have to. At a time like this.”

This time, it was the Slaughter Saint’s turn to agree.

Jeok Cheongang’s subdued tone came through even in Sound Transmission, and the Slaughter Saint’s gaze grew troubled.

“Like I said earlier, this is no easy place. I thought I’d seen a fair bit of the world after traveling all across it, but… I’ve never heard of or seen anything like this.”

Unlike Jeok Cheongang, who had spent most of his life on Mount Jiuhua, the Slaughter Saint had lived as a wanderer—first as an assassin, then as a physician.

In his youth, he had traveled a thousand li[3959] to take someone’s life. In his old age, he had searched for herbs ten thousand li[3960] away to save one.

Even a young woodcutter who lived day to day cutting trees would have his own experiences and his own life. For someone who had made his mark at opposite ends of life and death, calling his experience “a fair bit” was an understatement born of extraordinary modesty.

Of course, to Jeok Cheongang, who shared the same reality, it sounded entirely sincere.

“I expected as much, but it seems even you don’t have an answer.”

“There’s no way forward, nothing we can do. We can’t even tell day from night. What can we possibly do?”

The Slaughter Saint was right.

The mist blocking their way wasn’t confined to the ground.

Dark clouds hung overhead.

At first, they had thought the enormous black mass was passing through. Instead, it had covered the sky.

It had swallowed the moon and stars that had faintly lit the way above them at first. It wouldn’t allow even a single ray of sunlight through.

[3959] In this Chinese setting, one li is about 500 m (0.311 mi). A thousand li is about 500 km (311 mi); ten thousand li is about 5,000 km (3,110 mi).

[3960] In this Chinese setting, one li is about 500 m (0.311 mi). A thousand li is about 500 km (311 mi); ten thousand li is about 5,000 km (3,110 mi).

As though it meant to frighten the rude intruders who had come without its permission.

“Do you think any of this is a coincidence?”

“A coincidence?”

Jeok Cheongang let out a hollow laugh before he knew it.

“The old me would certainly have thought so. Before I met a certain impudent brat who’s riding on his master’s back while the old man works himself to the bone at his age.”

Jeok Cheongang gazed at the face of the “impudent brat” resting on one of his shoulders.

His Disciple had appeared out of nowhere one day and turned the life of an old, sick man upside down.

Now he was changing not just one man’s life, but everyone’s world.

“There are no more coincidences for us. Everything that happens from here on is intended, inevitable. And maybe…”

Maybe it was fate, decided from the very beginning.

Jeok Cheongang quietly swallowed the words he had been about to add.

It wasn’t that he didn’t believe in fate.

If all of this was fate, it was far too cruel to Jin Taekyung. Worse, Jeok Cheongang was afraid of how this story might end.

“Maybe what?”

“No, nothing. Let’s leave it. What matters more is the situation we’re in.”

Jeok Cheongang’s words and behavior were plainly unnatural, but the Slaughter Saint didn’t press him.

He was a little disappointed, but everyone had worries of their own. And the Jeok Cheongang he had come to know was far more thoughtful and sensitive than people gave him credit for.

Especially where Jin Taekyung was concerned.

Then again, I’m hardly in a position to judge him for that.

The Slaughter Saint’s gaze shifted past Jeok Cheongang’s shoulder.

The younger members of the group were racing over the rugged terrain, breathing hard. Behind them, Great Sir and the Bow Saint brought up the rear, their faces calm.

His gaze rested on them for only a moment. Then he spoke as if nothing had happened.

This time, in his own voice rather than through Sound Transmission.

“We should take a short break.”

His voice carried through the mist, which had grown denser still.

The Slaughter Saint had made the right call.

The moment they stopped, Hyuk Mujin began retching. Instead of patting him on the back, Gung Gibang pulled out some jerky.

"…You traitor. Is that jerky really so good?"

Ju Hwaran eventually helped Hyuk Mujin stop retching. Gung Gibang answered his accusation without hesitation.

"Of course."

"…"

"Seriously, this stuff is incredible. Is it because it came from sweat-blood horses? The flavor's remarkably consistent."

"…"

"Don't glare at me. Just eat. You'll need your strength. Or you could sit down and circulate your qi like that fellow."

Hyuk Mujin glanced between Song Ilseom, who was already sitting cross-legged, and Gung Gibang, who was still tearing into his jerky. Then his expression hardened as he made up his mind.

"Give me a piece. I want to see what's so good about it that you're eating like a beggar who hasn't had a meal in three days."

When they had first met, there had been a considerable gap between them in both standing and martial prowess. But they had traveled together long enough to become all but friends.

Gung Gibang grinned, showing his yellow teeth.

"Excellent decision. Oh, Young Lady Ju, would you like some, too?"

"No, thank you. I think I'd better circulate my qi for a while."

Replenishing one's strength and refining one's internal energy were both good choices.

Climbing mountains—especially rugged ones at this altitude—was exhausting in a way that running across flat ground wasn't.

Besides, even they, whose martial arts were far less advanced than those of the masters traveling with them, could feel the heavy air hanging over all of Tianshan and the strange phenomena that defied explanation.

"Damn it. I can't even remember the last time I felt warm sunlight."

Hyuk Mujin answered Gung Gibang with his mouth stuffed full of jerky.

"We got some in the desert."

"How was that warm sunlight? I was scared to go out during the day in case I burned to death. Though by the time we were halfway across, I did start to miss it."

“Fair enough. That weather was a real pain in the ass.”

In truth, “a real pain in the ass” didn’t begin to cover it.

What kind of desert had no cacti or bugs, yet got alternating hailstorms and downpours for more than half a month?

But that was the world now.

And to survive in a changed world, they had to change, too.

“I’m dying here. How many peaks have we climbed already?”

“Five.”

“Already? That’s more than I thought.”

“Not when you consider how hard we’ve been running. And we don’t know how much farther we have to go.”

The Tianshan Mountains were wide.

No, “wide” didn’t do them justice. They were vast.

The range stretched for more than a thousand li[3961] and covered a full third of Xinjiang.

And that wasn’t all. It was a Sacred Land where only a select few of the old Demonic Cult’s members had been allowed to enter—and a Land of Ruin where outsiders were certain to die.

They still had no idea which of its hundreds of peaks held the Cult’s headquarters.

“Terrible.”

“Terrible.”

“At least nothing’s happened yet. That should mean we haven’t been spotted.”

“If the Captain heard you say that, he’d smack you one.”

“Why?”

“He hates that sort of talk. Says it’s bad luck. Then he starts on about ‘cli’ or ‘guli’ or something that sounds like copper. I never know what he means.”

“Honestly, I can never figure him out.”

“Tell me about it.”

The two muttered almost to themselves, then lay on their backs and stared blankly at the sky.

Or rather, at the dark clouds covering every inch of it.

“How long exactly have we been here?”

“More than a day, less than two.”

“Are you sure?”

“I’m sure.”

“Impressive, when we can’t even tell night from day.”

[3961] In this Chinese setting, one li is about 500 m (0.311 mi). A thousand li is about 500 km (311 mi); ten thousand li is about 5,000 km (3,110 mi).

Hyuk Mujin answered firmly.

“Because the Captain still hasn’t woken up.”

“Oh, right. He’s supposed to wake up within two days at the latest.”

“Exactly. So it definitely hasn’t been two days yet.”

Gung Gibang studied him for a moment, then gave a quiet laugh.

“What?”

“It’s just… How do I put this? You really are something.”

“What do you mean?”

“Almost everything seems to revolve around Jin Taekyung.”

“I don’t know. It’s just so natural to me.”

“Don’t get me wrong. I’m not saying it’s strange, or that I don’t understand. I’m saying it because I know exactly how it feels.”

The smile on Gung Gibang’s lips faded.

“That’s what a martial family is. You may not share blood, but sometimes the bond runs deeper than blood.”

Gung Gibang fell into memories for a moment, and Hyuk Mujin went quiet.

It felt as though a wound long held closed had finally split open.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan. The Beggars’ Sect.

Their martial families, their other homes—and the names of two enormous stones weighing down their hearts.

What had happened to the people who had marched west with their banners held high?

If they were still alive, would they ever meet again?

They could trade silly remarks and force smiles, but reality was cold enough to make them shudder.

And it moved so quickly that they had no time to fight off the chill before it seeped into their bones.

Shhhhhhhh.

A sudden sense of wrongness.

Hyuk Mujin’s eyes widened. In them, the mist writhed as though it were alive.

Chapter 1187

A snake.

That was the first word that came to everyone's mind when they saw the mist writhing toward them.

Gloomy and dark, it crept closer like a huge predator that had spotted its prey. Their legs had gone stiff as stone and would hardly lift from the ground.

Something beyond what they could see was stirring a primal fear in them.

And the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, was one of the few people who could recognize the true nature of the power within that mist before anyone else—and understand it clearly.

This is…!

There was no doubt.

Demonic qi.

No—magical power, as it was now also called. That abyssal energy flowed through his five senses, binding his body and mind.

Terrifyingly fast. Insidiously.

Yet even as fear welled up inside him, Jeok Cheongang felt an intense pull he couldn't explain.

It was a strange feeling. Like the warm embrace of a mother he could no longer remember. If he gave himself over to the mist, everything would be easier.

Surely a peaceful paradise awaited him in that hazy world, free of hardship and anguish—

Crunch!

Pain stung his tongue, and blood filled his mouth.

Jeok Cheongang had bitten down in the nick of time. His senses clear again, he spat out the blood and roared.

"Hah!"

His azure dragon's roar, driven by mighty internal energy, shook the air in every direction.

He wasn't the only one to let out a cry like a beast's roar.

The Bow Saint and the Slaughter Saint had reacted at the same instant. The two superhumans groaned as they watched the mist falter, if only briefly.

Dark arts.

An immensely powerful, sinister force unlike anything they had ever seen was consuming the space around them.

No—perhaps all of Tianshan.

But they faced an even greater problem.

"Ah…"

"Ahhh…"

Their companions stared dreamily ahead, voices vacant. Their hands reached through empty air as their feet carried them slowly toward the mist.

Not one of them was spared. Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin were closest to it, but even Ju Hwaran and Song Ilseom, farther away, were moving toward it.

They looked like people who had lost their souls. Sensing the danger, the three veteran masters shot toward them without hesitation.

And just as they reached out, their hands moving like streaks of light—

Whoosh!

A sharp whistle cut through the air. Space warped.

The mist had curled into the razor-sharp claw of a giant beast. Jeok Cheongang saw the darkness steeped within it reflected in his reddish eyes.

"How dare you!"

Fwoosh—BOOM!

Flames burst from his Flame Divine Palm with his furious cry, shattering the claw of magical power and heating the air. The infernal blaze would not let it come an inch closer.[3962]

But he soon realized the brief attack had been deliberate.

Shhhhhhh.

Pale steam billowed up. Jeok Cheongang's eyes widened.

He couldn't see them.

Gung Gibang's threadbare collar had been within reach. Hyuk Mujin's head had been right there, making Jeok Cheongang want to smack it on sight.

No.

They're gone.

That was the only way to put it. He had seen their bodies disappear into the mist, as though erased from the world.

What in the…

Jeok Cheongang swallowed the groan rising in his throat and looked around. Then he realized something else.

Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin weren't the only ones who had vanished.

"…Hah."

He let out the breath he had been holding.

When had it happened? Had it begun with that strange sense of déjà vu?

He didn't know. The scenery before him looked unchanged, but everything else was different.

[3962] One chi, a traditional Korean measure of length, is 3.03 cm (1.19 in).

No one was there. No one.

Even the Bow Saint and the Slaughter Saint, who had stood scarcely thirty feet away, were nowhere to be seen. He could sense neither their presence nor a trace of their qi.

An illusion technique? Or a Mystic Gate Formation?

Dark arts he had heard of in rumors, and others he had faced himself on the battlefields of the Great Faction War, flashed through his mind. None gave him an answer.

Even Jeok Cheongang, who had lived for more than a century and dominated an era, had never encountered dark arts like these.

This is something else entirely.

Even the great fiends of the previous generation, notorious under names like the Illusion Fiend and Guiguzi, had never managed anything like it.

More precisely, Jeok Cheongang's formidable martial prowess had never allowed them to.

Even the strongest dark arts had their limits.

The Illusion Fiend, the Demonic Cult's greatest master of illusion, had had both eyes gouged out. Guiguzi, who had slaughtered hundreds of orthodox Murim warriors with his intricate Mystic Gate Formation, had melted into a pool of blood.

Both at the hands of one man: the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

But…

I've never seen or heard of a formation like this.

Jeok Cheongang stretched his senses farther than ever before. The longer he searched, the more certain he became.

No matter how bizarre the dark arts, there should be a flow of energy and a core at its center. In this strange space, he could find neither.

Only the dark mist approaching with the uniquely sticky, unpleasant energy of demonic qi—and someone's steady breathing against his back.

"Sleeping through all this. You've got it easy, you know."

A faint smile touched his lips despite his grumbling. He glanced at the Disciple who would have protested bitterly if he were awake, then muttered as though making a promise to himself.

"Don't worry. Whatever happens, I won't let a single hair on you come to harm…"

His voice trailed off.

After a moment's silence, he added with a sigh, "Just bear with it. Losing one hair won't kill you."

His Disciple offered no answer. Jeok Cheongang fixed his fiercely shining eyes on the dense mist.

"What are you waiting for? Crawl the hell out here!"

The beings beyond the pale veil answered his call.

Grrrr.

The mist rolled in waves. At last, countless eyes gleamed within it.

Jeok Cheongang drew a slow breath.

“Come in a whole pack, have you?”

Heat shimmered around him as Extreme Yang energy spread through his limbs and every part of his body. He raised both fists, wrapped in fierce flames, toward the monsters that did not belong in this world.

“Come.”

The long night had begun.

The mist was too thick to see an inch ahead.[3963] Countless shadows surged through it.

At the center of it all, flames burned ever more fiercely.

Boom!

One palm strike.

No more, no less. The motion was devastating in its efficiency. In its wake lay only heat enough to melt rock—and death.

Thud!

A huge body that could not be called human sank to its knees.

The three red eyes in its single head were still fixed on their prey, but the chest melted away without a trace proved which of them had been the hunter.

Grrk.

Light drained swiftly from its eyes. Before the monster had breathed its last, the hunter had already turned to set other living things ablaze.

Crunch!

He smashed, burst, and crushed without pause.

Hands, feet, legs, knees, elbows—sometimes even his forehead. Every part of him was a weapon, and every blow meant something’s death.

Neither the five-foot-tall monsters[3964] nor the three-headed, six-armed ones could break through the blazing wall of fire.

Claws sharper than scythes and rusty blades in place of arms struck relentlessly at his limbs. Jeok Cheongang’s body and mind never faltered.

It was like the day Mount Jiuhua had been engulfed in flames, decades ago.

No. He was stronger and colder now than he had been then—beyond comparison.

[3963] One chi, a traditional Korean measure of length, is 3.03 cm (1.19 in).

[3964] Five cheok is about 1.52 m (5 ft). One cheok, a traditional Korean measure of length, is 30.3 cm (11.9 in).

The thousand members of the Demonic Cult who had drawn the old monster known as the Fire King out of Mount Jiuhua had at least looked human. These were cursed beings that should never have appeared in the human world.

Kyarruk!

Kraaaaah!

They carried a madness and killing intent unlike anything he had felt before. They had clearly lost their reason long ago and moved only at their master's command. Still, they charged without cease—

RrrrCRUNCH!

—and died without respite.

Splaaat!

Blood sprayed high into the air. With a single sweep of his hand, as if brushing away insects, Jeok Cheongang sent hundreds of shreds of flesh flying in every direction.

"Is that all?"

In the sudden gap left by death, he swept his gaze around him and muttered, "Did you think that would be enough to bring this old man down?"

The words of his Master came to mind. Time had blurred even the man's face.

Cheongang, the world is vast, and there are many strong people.

The world beyond Mount Jiuhua had been as vast as his Master had said.

The Heavenly Demon, who had swallowed half the world, and the great fiends who followed him were strong. So were the Daoists[3965] and the damned monks who held the Central Plains.

But that wasn't all his Master had said.

But you could become one of the strongest among them.

As always, his Master had been right.

And the young life he carried on his back made him stronger still.

"If you won't come to me, I'll come to you."

Hiss.

Heat rose where he planted his foot.

Had even these mindless monsters retained their instincts? Faced with the overwhelming difference in strength, they had halted their attack.

Jeok Cheongang started toward them.

Or rather, he meant to.

Until a voice he could never forget pierced his ear.

"You haven't changed."

Jeok Cheongang froze.

[3965] Daoists are practitioners of Daoism, a Chinese religious and philosophical tradition.

The fierce light in his eyes faded like a lamp caught by the wind. Reflected in them was the face of someone who could not be here—and should not be.

Chapter 1188

It was as if time had stopped.

The foul odors and reek of blood that had filled the air faded, and the monsters' roars became faint echoes. But Jeok Cheongang noticed none of the changes around him.

No—he couldn't.

All his senses were fixed on a single person.

Squish.

Unhurried footsteps approached through a pool of blood.

The countless monsters had stopped moving and parted to either side. Between them, someone came into view, filling Jeok Cheongang's vision.

The sight chilled his heart so deeply it hurt.

"…You."

The voice that slipped between his bloodless lips was more than a sound. It was a groan he couldn't hold back, a scream he had barely managed to suppress.

"Have you been well?"

A voice he had never forgotten. A face that had grown a little unfamiliar.

The name of the man he was seeing again after well over ten years spilled from Jeok Cheongang's lips with a cold breath.

"Cheon-ah,[3966] how are you—?"

The man, Jangcheon, smiled faintly at his former Master.

"It's been a long time since anyone called me that."

Each quiet word burrowed into Jeok Cheongang's ears, raked through his lungs, and pierced his heart.

"I was worried you might not recognize me."

As if that were possible.

Even if a hundred years had passed instead of ten, Jeok Cheongang would have recognized him. Then or now, however much had changed, Jangcheon was someone he could never forget for as long as he lived.

"But I needn't have worried. You, of all people, would never forget me, Master. I nearly failed to recognize you, though, unworthy Disciple that I am."

Since the day they had parted in a dark back alley, the Disciple had aged a little, while his Master had grown much younger.

But it wasn't only Jeok Cheongang's appearance that had changed when he Returned to Youth, leaving him looking like a middle-aged man.

Everything had changed.

[3966] -ah is a familiar Korean form of address added to a name that ends in a consonant.

Every last thing.

And among those changes was a truth no one could undo.

“You… weren’t you already dead?”

It had been a day of heavy snowfall, or so Jeok Cheongang had heard.

Somewhere on an unnamed mountainside near Jeongyang in Shanxi Province, Jangcheon had died before several witnesses. Miserably, wretchedly, as though he were being judged for the many atrocities he had committed.

But then—

How could—

“Dead? Me?”

His eyes widened for a moment, then curved with a laugh.

“Ha. Did you think I was the kind of bastard who’d die that easily?”

“No. I heard, quite clearly—”

“Yes, you heard. You didn’t see it for yourself.”

Jeok Cheongang’s gaze wavered at the calm reply.

It was true.

By the time he had asked around and found the place, only a few traces of the fierce battle remained. Jangcheon’s body was nowhere to be found. No one knew exactly why, and Jeok Cheongang hadn’t wanted to know.

Jeok Cheongang had only thought that the heavy snow said to have continued for nearly seven days and nights, along with the mountain beasts, might have erased Jangcheon’s last traces from the earth.

That was all.

He had left a bottle of liquor and a few drops of tears there, then returned to his own life.

That was what had happened.

“…You were alive all this time?”

“I nearly died. At the hands of that brat you’re looking after like a sacred ancestral tablet.”

Jangcheon’s pale, misty gaze settled on Jin Taekyung’s face over Jeok Cheongang’s shoulder.

“I can feel a familiar power in him. The qi of our sect, the Fire Gate Clan. Once, only you and I carried it.”

Jeok Cheongang said nothing. Jangcheon took another slow step.

Squish.

“I’ve heard no end of it. Apparently, I have a Junior Brother I never knew about.”

“You’re wrong. About all of it.”

Jeok Cheongang forced the words through clenched teeth.

"This boy is not your Junior Brother, and you are no Disciple of mine."

"Why not?"

"Because you were cast out. You died committing unforgivable atrocities. That is the only truth."

Crack.

His lips split, and blood filled his mouth.

But the sight before him—which had to be an illusion—didn't change. Neither the shadowed face of his former Disciple nor the voice that kept reaching his ears.

"But Master, look. I'm still alive, aren't I?"

"Don't call me that!"

Even at Jeok Cheongang's thunderous shout, Jangcheon kept coming. He looked at him with eyes full of regret.

"I knew what you must think of me, Master."

"Shut your mouth!"

"After I came back from the brink of death, I spent a great deal of time thinking about everything that had happened. Every day felt like ten years."

Squish.

The pool of blood rippled beneath his advancing steps.

Behind him, the monsters stood still as though they had agreed not to move. As Jangcheon drew closer, Jeok Cheongang could sense no danger or killing intent from him.

But—

That can't be. It's all an illusion. I'm hearing things.

Jeok Cheongang clenched his fists. The qi within him surged as though it had sensed its master's turmoil, threatening to slip beyond his control. He subdued it and began to draw it up again.

Then Jangcheon said something he had never expected to hear.

"I was wrong. This unworthy Disciple was wrong about everything."

"…!"

Jeok Cheongang's eyes trembled. Unlike his body, which had regained its youth, they still held the weight of all his years.

"Please forgive me. No—Master, punish this wretched man yourself."

No. That couldn't be.

He must not fall for lies conjured by dark arts.

And yet—

The Extreme Yang energy gathering in his clenched fists wavered like a candle in the wind, then went out.

Just as it had on the day when, despite possessing martial arts powerful enough to look down on the world, he could do nothing but watch his Disciple walk away.

“I won’t make excuses. Whatever punishment you give me, I’ll bear it all.”

The words he had wanted so badly to hear.

“I betrayed your trust, disgraced our sect, and killed innocent people. I committed sins I can never wash away.”

The scene he had imagined countless times.

“So please, kill me.”

“…Enough.”

“Kill me. With the very hands that took me in more than twenty years ago.”

“Enough. Stop.”

Jeok Cheongang couldn’t breathe. His heart ached as though an unseen hand were squeezing it.

Everything he was seeing and hearing had to be nothing but an illusion.

It had to be.

Yet the wound deep inside him, the one he had thought long since closed, was tearing open again.

“Master.”

Jeok Cheongang did not answer.

He only stared blankly at his old Disciple as his vision grew hazy. Old, worn memories overlaid the sight.

“If I can’t take you as my Master… I’ll kill myself.”

Even after more than twenty years, he remembered clearly.

“No, kill me now. With the very hands that saved me.”

The desperate look in the boy’s eyes.

“Might Makes Right. Didn’t you teach me that, Master? That’s what Murim is—no, what the world is. The weak should die at the hands of the strong.”

The murderer’s smile he could never forget.

“Kill me. It’s the only way to stop me.”

And the feeble old man who, in the end, had failed to stop him.

Even after he had gone out into the world to correct that mistake, he had lingered for a long time at the very spot where wild beasts and snow-laden winds had passed.

“Old man, has something happened?”

It was the place where the man who had lived as Jangcheon had fallen under the name Jopil.

A traveler, finding it strange that Jeok Cheongang still stood there late into the night, motionless as a stone monument, had asked him what was wrong. Jeok Cheongang had answered that his only blood relative had died there.

The man had been foolish and useless beyond words, but he had come hoping to at least recover the body.

And in that moment, he had realized that even after nearly ten years, he still wasn't ready.

"Master."

The clear voice scattered the layers of memory.

Tears streamed down Jeok Cheongang's face like water through a broken dam. Through them, he saw the Disciple he had wanted so badly to meet again.

"Cheon-ah.[3967]"

"Yes. Your Disciple is listening, Master. I'm here with you."

Squish.

One step.

Squish.

Another step.

Squish.

They were close enough to feel each other's breath.

Jeok Cheongang beckoned to the Disciple he had finally met again. Jangcheon took the last step toward his Master's small embrace.

With him came a streak of light prepared, from the very beginning, for this moment alone.

Thnk.

Pain hotter than any Scorching Yang Qi.

Blood burst forth at the same instant, as though to prove this was real.

Shhk! Patter, patter!

Fresh blood spattered the ground. Across a handspan of empty space, their gazes met.

One deeply sunken. The other wide with disbelief.

In the brief silence, Jangcheon's lips parted.

"…How?"

At Jangcheon's question, his agitation impossible to hide, Jeok Cheongang smiled sadly.

"I wanted to be fooled for a moment. I wasn't fooled."

He tightened his grip on the blade he had caught at the last instant.

Crreeeak.

It hurt.

Every time the dagger embedded in his palm twisted, a dizzying pain spread through his body.

But it didn't matter. This was nothing compared to the mind demon that had tormented him moments before.

[3967] -ah is a familiar Korean form of address added to a name that ends in a consonant.

“What’s your name?”

It had been more than twenty years ago.

He had met a boy who endured kicks raining down on his whole body and still managed to shove a dirt-covered bun into his mouth.

“…I don’t know.”

Jeok Cheongang had seen his younger self in the boy: a fierce little child who had once wandered the world begging for food, without even knowing his own name.

Perhaps that was why the old man’s heart had acted on a whim.

“Jangcheon. From now on, your name is Jangcheon.”

The Master had given him a name and a new life. The Disciple had thrown them both away and left.

The wound that departure had carved deep in Jeok Cheongang’s heart had become a scar that would never fade.

But…

“I think I can let you go now.”

Yes. At last.

With those words Jangcheon would never hear, Jeok Cheongang threw a single punch.

Kwaaaaaah!

Fierce flames consumed Jangcheon—or rather, whatever had taken on his likeness—and swept across the mountainside.

Chapter 1189

“Grrrraaaaaah!”

It wasn’t a scream a human could make—or even a sound any living creature could produce.

It was all that remained to a monster that had already died once and forgotten pain: a warning bell announcing that his corrupted soul had burned away, the final cry of his second death.

Fwooooooom!

The hellfire of the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist swept wildly through the space.

Then came a blinding flash, followed by an even louder roar.

RrrrRUMBLE!

The ground shook. Embers and ash churned together and scattered in every direction.

Beyond them, a shadow slowly crumpled.

Jangcheon.

No—one of the monsters wearing Jangcheon’s likeness.

Black Ghost.

Jeok Cheongang recognized it at once.

A monster given new life using the body and soul of the dead.

Neither dead nor alive, Black Ghosts were among the strangest and most powerful of the countless monsters under the Lord of Heaven.

Yes, this was surely—

Magic, after all.

A space where even the wind brushing his skin felt alien. Phenomena too intricate and bizarre to be explained by a mere formation.

The suspicion he had harbored became certainty. Jeok Cheongang felt the flow of qi around the area begin to churn.

And he sensed the cause of the change, too.

Shhhhh.

A sudden cold wind pressed down on the heat haze distorting the space and settled the drifting embers and ash.

It wasn’t an ordinary wind. It was a wave of qi announcing the arrival of something else.

“So, you’ve come.”

Jeok Cheongang looked steadily at the new intruders.

East, west, south, and north.

Four shadows had appeared around him, each gazing his way.

Different faces, yet somehow alike.

“Master.”

Four voices rang out as one.

There was Jangcheon as a dirt-covered child, just as he’d looked the day they first met. Jangcheon as a boy, pleading to be accepted as a Disciple. Jangcheon as a young man, and Jangcheon as he’d looked on the day he left.

All frozen in forms from a day that could never be taken back.

“Master. I’ve come. Cheon-ah is here.”

The four Jangcheons spoke together and stepped forward. At the same time, the countless monsters encircling the area tightened their ring.

A net over heaven and earth, drawn tight for one man alone.

Yet even amid the monsters’ killing intent, Jeok Cheongang spoke calmly.

“How strange. Four more Disciples I never knew I had.”

“Master. How could you forget me?”

The voice rang out from every direction, as if all four shared a single body. Jeok Cheongang gave a bitter smile.

“I haven’t forgotten. I’ve only decided to keep you in my memories.”

He wasn’t speaking to the monsters wearing the illusion. He was speaking to his old Disciple, who wasn’t there.

It didn’t matter if his words reached no one. Only now did he know for certain, and if he didn’t say it now, he might never get the chance.

Even if the living Jangcheon had appeared before him, his choice would have been the same.

“I was a poor Master, and you were a poor Disciple. But let’s leave the wrongs we did each other for some distant day when we meet again.”

Spilled water couldn’t be gathered up, and time that had passed couldn’t be turned back.

What mattered was now. And Jeok Cheongang still had someone precious to protect.

“So, Cheon-ah.”

As he had long ago, Jeok Cheongang spoke his old Disciple’s name gently, letting it leave his lips.

His eyes moved from one face to the next, taking in the features still etched vividly in his memory. He felt the warmth and breath of someone on his back.

He felt that he was alive, and resolved to stay that way.

“I expel you from the sect.”

In that instant—

Whoosh!

A flash erupted in the dark mist.

No. It was a flame burning as bright as light—a giant of fire, finally risen to his feet.

Fwooooooom!

The heat of the Flamefire Path distorted the space.

One step. Nearly a hundred yards vanished, and the monsters' wide eyes rushed closer.

Crunch!

No more words or thoughts were needed.

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, crushed everything before him.

Enemies surged in from every direction, but he saw and felt everything happening around him.

With his eyes, his ears, and sometimes with a sixth sense beyond the other five.

"Grrrraah!"

A group of monsters charged at him, each with eight arms and three heads.

They looked like asuras[3968] from legend. Their many arms—impossible now to tell whether they belonged to humans or beasts—whipped wildly, raining blows down on Jeok Cheongang's head.

Or, more precisely, on the spot where he had been.

Crack-crack-crack!

Their attacks cut through empty air and carved up the ground. Then a voice pierced the monsters' ears.

Quiet, yet hot as fire—and somehow colder than ice.

"How many hearts do you have?"

That was the last thing they heard.

Fwoosh—SPLAT!

Even as their consciousness faded, the monsters didn't know when or how they had died.

They didn't know Jeok Cheongang had launched himself off the ground, extended his Palm Force, and slashed downward with it. Nor did they know that the horrific heat within it had burned not only their hearts, but every organ in their bodies.

But the four pairs of eyes watching Jeok Cheongang did know.

They had been waiting for this moment from the start. As if on cue, they moved together without a hair's breadth of error.

ShhhhK!

A low, faint whistle slipped into his senses, keen as a blade and chilling enough to raise goose bumps.

[3968] Asuras are powerful, often warlike beings in Hindu and Buddhist traditions.

Jeok Cheongang, who had just melted dozens of monsters in an instant, immediately sensed the ominous energy closing in on him.

He sensed that there was more than one.

But their speed—and the power they carried—exceeded anything he'd expected.

"…!"

In that slowed instant, Jeok Cheongang sensed four streaks of Force flying at him from his blind spots.

He twisted with all his might, moving by instinct more than reason.

Shhk!

Blood sprayed with a cool slicing sound.

Not the monsters' green blood, with its foul stench and poisonous fumes, but the red blood of a living human.

Even through the sting of pain, Jeok Cheongang regained his balance at the last possible moment and landed with a satisfied smile.

What a relief.

His own flesh had been cut, but Jin Taekyung hadn't so much as been scratched.

The smile brought on by that relief didn't last long.

His wound wasn't serious. The battle, however, was clearly going against him.

A Master fighting to protect his Disciple, against countless monsters charging without fear of death.

And the greatest problem of all: the four Black Ghosts, carefully measuring their distance and looking for an opening even now.

Strong. Stronger than I expected.

They seemed at least a step above the other Black Ghosts he had faced—perhaps nearly two.

He had no way of knowing whether that was because of the Magic surrounding the area or because these four were particularly powerful Black Ghosts. But one thing was certain.

This will be a tough fight.

In truth, even that didn't begin to describe it.

Their individual strength was formidable, but the four Supreme Peak masters moved like one organism, sharing their thoughts. Even Jeok Cheongang couldn't afford to underestimate them.

That would have been true even if they were living humans. But these monsters felt neither emotion nor pain.

And everything was going in their favor.

Even now.

"Grrrraaaah!"

The monsters roared and charged again, while the Black Ghosts vanished among them. Jeok Cheongang understood their intentions at once.

They're taking turns wearing me down…!

To break a huge rock quickly, you needed a sharp chisel and a heavy hammer. Given enough time, though, even the occasional shower would do.

Drop by drop, the water struck the hard surface of the rock until cracks began to form.

But the monsters surging endlessly under the Black Ghosts' command were neither light raindrops nor a passing shower.

They were waves.

Raging waves, driven by the force to smash through any reef and a blind madness that sent them hurling their lives away without hesitation.

But Jeok Cheongang wasn't a rock that would stand still and wait to be worn down.

I'll end this at once.

His nature was fire. He had raised a greater flame than anyone under heaven, and so he was the Fire King.

Crack.

Jeok Cheongang clenched his teeth.

His eyes glowed red, piercing the dark mist. Space warped along the heat haze rising in strands from his entire body.

Fwoooosh.

Energy like molten lava surged through his limbs and every part of his body. A breath like steam escaped between his slowly parting lips.

"I'll kill every last one of you."

If they were rocks, he would melt them. If they were waves, he would make them evaporate.

Even if he himself turned to ash, even if everything burned away, the Fire Gate Clan's flame would not go out.

No—a blaze greater than his own would rise from it.

"Come!"

The giant's roar shook the air in every direction as he completed his preparations.

"Whoa, you startled me. My ears are going to burst."

"…!"

Jeok Cheongang barely managed to rein in the internal energy that had nearly surged back against him.

Chapter 1190

Silence fell for a moment.

The monsters blinked their glowing eyes at the unexpected turn of events. So did the four Black Ghosts who were supposed to be commanding them.

In that brief stillness, Jeok Cheongang slowly turned his head. Over his shoulder, he found a pair of eyes staring blankly at him.

“What is it, you bastard?”

Unlike his Master, who had barely managed to squeeze out the words, the Disciple answered without hesitation.

“It’s me.”

“Not that.”

“What, then?”

“When did you wake up? No—how?”

“I just woke up.”

“…I mean, how?”

Jeok Cheongang wondered if he was seeing things.

Hadn’t the Slaughter Saint—and the Divine Physician himself—insisted that the effects wouldn’t fully wear off for at least another half a day?

Could this be a hallucination caused by Magic or something?

Just as that rather plausible suspicion began to grow, a familiar voice reached his ears again.

“What kind of question is that? I woke up because I woke up.”

The expression and tone were unmistakably annoyed.

With much of his suspicion fading, Jeok Cheongang asked, “Proof?”

“What proof? Do you wake up every morning thinking, ‘Wow, that’s crazy. How on earth did I wake up today?‘ Well, considering your age, maybe you do.”

“…!”

You could imitate the outside, but what was inside never changed.

Jeok Cheongang’s fists began to itch, as though he’d been reunited with his long-lost soulmate. At last, he let go of every doubt.

“So it really is you!”

“Yes, it’s me. So could you lower your voice a little? I’ve been listening to you this whole time, and I think my eardrums are a little busted.”

“I should’ve known better than to believe a word that quack said—wait. What do you mean, you’ve been listening this whole time?”

“Exactly what it sounds like.”

“You were awake? Since when?”

“When you said, ‘How many hearts do you have?‘ Judging by that line alone, you sounded like the Heavenly Demon.”

At that answer, Jeok Cheongang let out a quiet sigh of relief.

Thank goodness.

If Jin Taekyung had regained consciousness a little earlier, he would have seen what happened before. He would have been hurt to learn that his Master still hadn’t been able to put that burden down.

Then a thought struck Jeok Cheongang.

“…If you were already awake, why did you stay quiet?”

“At first, I thought it was a dream.”

Jin Taekyung answered without a hint of shame, then added, “But it was comfortable, so I stayed put a little longer.”

“Heh.”

Jeok Cheongang smiled warmly at his Disciple’s honesty.

“Still comfortable?”

“Of course.”

“How strange. I’m not comfortable.”

“One thing I’ve learned from all my years of living is that life isn’t always comfortable.”

“And do you plan to keep living?”

“Isn’t that obvious?”

“Then how about you get down already?”

“My back’s nice and warm from your Scorching Yang Qi, so could I stay up here another seven or eight minutes?”

“Of course. Anything’s possible.”

The smile vanished from Jeok Cheongang’s lips.

“You’ll just be half dead.”

“Ah. I’d rather not.”

With a deep sigh, Jin Taekyung hopped down to the ground.

He didn’t have to focus, put any strength into it, or draw on his internal energy. The moment he thought of moving, the thick iron chains binding Master and Disciple together burst apart like a spiderweb crushed beneath a boulder.

Crack-crack-crack!

The act was as simple as breathing. Its consequences were anything but.

Shhhhing—SPLAT!

A harsh metallic shriek. A blurred streak cutting through the air. Then the dreadful sound of torn flesh and blood gushing up like a fountain.

A group of monsters caught by the chains as they flew apart crumpled like straw. Four glowing gazes flashed around them.

"—Jin. Taekyung."

The voices echoed through the space, layered over one another.

Jin Taekyung studied the Black Ghosts' faces and shrugged.

"Yeah, it's your hyung[3969]."

"—The chosen one."

"—Target confirmed."

"—Carry out the order. As that person wills."

"Pick one of you to do the talking. You all look so alike I can barely tell you apart as it is."

His tone and expression were calm. But White Flame, the spear now in his hand, gleamed unmistakably through the mist.

"Still, there's something familiar about those mugs. I feel like I've seen them somewhere."

Jeok Cheongang faltered at the unexpected response, then swallowed a bitter smile.

Perhaps it was only natural that Jin Taekyung didn't recognize those faces. To him, they were just one among countless villains he'd glimpsed for a fleeting instant.

It's probably better if he doesn't remember.

A Master should always be a pillar for his Disciple, someone he could lean on.

That was why Jeok Cheongang didn't want him to know. He couldn't let him see how rotten he was inside, beneath a surface that looked so solid.

Yes. This is enough.

Suppressing the words circling in his heart, Jeok Cheongang spoke in a deliberately calm tone.

"Well, even if you have seen them, what would that change?"

"Fair enough."

Bzzzz.

At Jin Taekyung's answer, the silver spearhead trembled.

A tremendous energy began to pulse at last, and dark blue flames rose and billowed.

"Be careful. These things are different from the ones we've faced so far."

"I know."

"You do?"

"Yeah. I've been to places like this so many times I'm sick of them."

[3969] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older male acquaintance.

Jin Taekyung drew a deep breath. The air was unpleasantly damp and foul-smelling.

He knew this place.

More precisely, he could feel its true nature against every inch of his skin.

Even if those translucent letters hadn't appeared in midair, that fact wouldn't have changed.

> System - You have entered the restricted area Tianshan Mountains. - You have entered the mutated Gate Forest of Death-I. - The abilities of all enemies within this restricted area and Gate have been greatly increased. - All manner of evil Magic and the energy of death are consuming the area. Do not let your guard down. - You have not yet met the Gate-clearing conditions.

A Gate. A passage through which demons marched into another world—and a land of death that had become their prison.

A graveyard that had swallowed countless Hunters.

Whoosh.

The flames wrapping around the spearhead surged higher.

They burned like a campfire sheltering souls that had died in the cold, and like a gravekeeper's torch driving off the unclean things wandering this vast cemetery.

Higher. Fiercer.

Until their dark blue light filled his Master's wide eyes.

Jeok Cheongang drew a sharp breath.

The flames before him were that vast, that hot—

And that bright.

They shone with a different light from his Master's, yet carried an even warmer power.

"…!"

Jin Taekyung gave his wide-eyed Master a faint smile.

"I told you. A lot's happened."

"You…"

What was Jeok Cheongang supposed to say?

He didn't spend long wondering. After a brief moment at a loss for words, he clenched his fists.

"Let's go."

No answer or question followed that brief command.

The moment the words left his lips, Master and Disciple were already surging toward their enemies, setting the air ablaze.

No.

The two Fire Kings.

Rrrrrumble!

Their flames merged into hellfire nothing could extinguish and tore through the darkness.

I don’t know.

I don’t know exactly how much time passed after I lost consciousness, or how many monsters I cut down in this place.

Truthfully, none of that mattered.

Looking back, I’d always been that kind of guy.

Like someone being chased, I’d race ahead with my eyes fixed forward, only to come to my senses somewhere I’d never expected.

And then—

I had to run again. Without even having time to look back.

I still don’t know the true name of the thing chasing so close that I can feel its breath on the back of my neck.

All I can do is cling with all my strength to a hope that seems ready to go out at any moment, and believe that if I take one more step—just one more—I’ll finally reach the end of this road.

Yeah.

Just like right now.

Shhhaaa.

Thousands of times. Tens of thousands.

No—more times than I could count.

As I repeated that familiar movement, an unnervingly low whistle ran along the spearhead slicing through the air.

The strike was precise and swift. The result it would bring was just as clear.

Shhk.

A slicing sound as familiar as the wind—and the sensation of death traveling up the shaft in my hands.

It’s over.

I was certain, and this time reality agreed.

Splash.

The enemy before me dropped to its knees in a pool of blood—or, by now, what would more accurately be called a stream.

But there was no groan of pain, no pleading look begging to survive.

The last Black Ghost stared at me with unfeeling eyes and said only this:

"—That person. Is waiting."

Like an actor carefully delivering every word of the line he'd been given.

"—For you, Jin Taekyung."

And that was all.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

> System - Mutated Gate Forest of Death-I successfully cleared! - You have gained a tremendous amount of EXP! - Level up! - All status ailments and fatigue have been recovered. - Gate-clearing conditions have been met.

A clear ringing sounded for me alone, and strength filled me once more. Beyond the fading mist, a field of magical power appeared in midair.

But neither Jeok Cheongang nor I reacted to any of the changes around us.

I looked at him. He looked silently at the Black Ghost that had met its end.

At the soulless shell of a boy who had once been someone's joy and reason for living.

Then, after a silence that was brief but felt long, Jeok Cheongang turned away.

"Damn it, what kind of place is this? I can't even tell how to get out. I feel like a lost child."

He grumbled as usual, but his voice was thick, as though soaked through. Somehow, I heard relief in it.

Or at least I wanted to.

For his sake.

I hoped the tremor in the voice that had said I can finally let you go now would ease, if only a little. The painful shudder I'd felt through my back, too.

This is enough.

If someone was facing and overcoming the pain they'd hidden inside all alone, then I could only believe that keeping my eyes closed for a moment had been the right choice.

A pillar was a reassuring support simply by being there. But it couldn't stand upright on its own.

"What are you waiting for? Get moving."

"Yes."

I smiled faintly and nodded.

"I'll lead the way."

We walked on together.

The place was still dark, covered in blood and corpses. But for some reason, it seemed a little brighter.

Chapter 1191

The only path connecting reality and a Gate.

The sensation of passing through a magical field was more than familiar to a veteran Hunter like me. Even so, it was often unpleasant enough to make me shudder.

Like now.

Whoooosh.

Was this what it felt like to be swept into a whirlpool?

The cold, sticky sensation of magical power wrapped around my entire body, then spat me out somewhere on the other side.

The moment I opened my eyes in the new space, I realized something I hadn't known before.

It's different.

Branches packed so tightly they covered the sky. Steep hills.

The mountains of corpses and rivers of blood that had filled every direction were gone.

But the scenery wasn't the only thing that had changed.

Magical power.

That filthy energy should have fallen away the moment I left the Gate. Instead, it was still clinging to my body.

No. It filled this entire space.

"This is…"

The words came out like a groan.

Jeok Cheongang, who had been shuddering at the magical field's repulsive sensation, reacted at once when I fell silent.

"What is it?"

Normally, I'd have laughed it off and said it was nothing.

But the intense sense of déjà vu pressing in on all five senses since the moment I opened my eyes brought back memories from less than a few weeks ago. And Jeok Cheongang already knew most of the truth about me.

"I've been somewhere like this before. Very recently, in fact."

"Ah. Could it be…?"

"Yes. The incident I told you about."

A gigantic mushroom cloud swallowing civilization. A metropolis with no trace of life.

And a being waiting for me in a dark castle newly raised above the blackened earth.

Morgoth.

That was it.

This place carried an energy remarkably like the Dragon Lair the Black Dragon Duke Morgoth had built atop the ruins of Moscow.

An energy intense enough that you could call it the Demon Realm.

No. It's even stronger.

According to Jeok Cheongang, I'd been unconscious for a little over a day.

I hadn't felt magical power this pure until I approached Morgoth's Dragon Lair. Here, power nearly as strong was already churning all around us.

So this is what the System meant by a restricted area.

Now I understood.

All kinds of absurd rumors floated around Murim, but if anything, the stories about this damn mountain range had understated the truth.

Now that I'd seen and felt the Tianshan Mountains for myself, I knew they were a forbidden land. A Land of Ruin.

Uninvited guests who hadn't received their master's permission shouldn't enter—and couldn't leave.

And this endless range of dark mountains showed no sign of revealing the secrets it hid within its vast bulk.

Not its master. Not the other uninvited guests besides Jeok Cheongang and me.

"I don't see the others."

"I suspected as much when that strange thing—whatever it was called—caught us. Seems I was right."

Jeok Cheongang narrowed his eyes at the mist drifting around us, but that didn't make the missing people suddenly appear.

Even a superhuman who could make out an ant over three hundred yards away couldn't peer through the space between reality and a Gate with human eyes.

…Right. That would be impossible.

Then a thought crossed my mind.

With human eyes.

I couldn't be sure this idea would work. Frankly, the odds favored me wasting my strength and making things worse.

But when there's only one path ahead—and you've already traveled it once—then no matter how huge an obstacle stands in the way, you have to smash through it and keep going.

Bzzzzzz.

The air began to tremble. I took a deep breath and raised my spearhead.

Slowly enough to make someone yawn, I spread the energy coiled within me through my entire body.

I felt Jeok Cheongang react to the move, but only for a moment. Then everything around me fell silent.

More precisely, my concentration reached its peak and shut out everything I didn't need, down to the slightest noise.

For one purpose alone.

To find the other spaces hidden behind the invisible veil.

And then—

Keeeeeng.

A ringing like thunder filled my ears. A terrible headache struck without warning, turning my vision white.

Ding.

Somewhere, a clear chime rang faintly. I knew my reckless attempt had succeeded—and that I couldn't let this fleeting opening slip away.

Drip. Drip.

Had the tiny blood vessels in my eyes burst one by one? Or was it the blood slipping between my lips without my noticing?

Everything I saw was red. Pain stabbed through my chest and brain.

It didn't matter.

I'd already seen it. Read it.

Cut.

I let out the breath I'd been holding and brought the spearhead slashing down from high above me.

Along the single path my other eye—the Mind's Eye—had shown me.

Shhhhaaa—

A blinding flash split the world. Split the invisible veil.

> System - Status effect Trance has ended.

That was the first line to appear before Jin Taekyung's eyes.

It was the signal flare. A signal flare announcing a wave of System notifications.

Ding. Beep.

> System - Special ability Mind's Eye has been activated because its activation conditions have been met! - Your insight into Mind's Eye has deepened. - Always exercise caution. This ability can cause severe harm to the user's mind and body, and in the worst case, can lead to death! - Status effect

> Exhaustion has been applied! - Status effect Extreme Fatigue has been applied! - Status effect Internal Injury has…

Jin Taekyung gasped for breath.

His chest felt tight. Nausea rose, and his disoriented body swayed from side to side.

Through vision warped like a heat haze, he saw Jeok Cheongang rush up to support him, shouting something. His battered senses could barely register the man's words or touch.

For a moment.

Then a second wave swept over him, accompanied by a cascade of chimes.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

> System - Mutated Gate Forest of Death-II destroyed! - Mutated Gate Forest of Death-III destroyed! - … - Mutated Gate Forest of Death-VI destroyed! - You have achieved the very rare achievement Knock, and It Shall Be Opened! - You have gained a tremendous amount of EXP as a reward for achieving a very rare achievement! - You have acquired the Title Door Opener! - Level up! - All injuries and fatigue have been recovered as a result of leveling up!

High risk, high reward.

The attempt had been dangerous, but the payoff was worth it.

He'd gained all at once the EXP it would take to defeat several Black Ghosts—and, more importantly, achieved his main goal.

"What on earth…!"

At his Master's stunned expression, the Disciple curled his bloodied lips into a smile.

"You can see for yourself."

The changes around them were already plain to the naked eye.

Grrrrk.

The empty air warped, like the face of a monster forced to spit something out.

And then—

Whoooosh.

Several previously invisible gaps opened their maws one after another.

They spilled out the darkness that had filled them, along with what they'd hidden away.

More precisely—

"Arrrgh! You sons of bitches—you're worse than beggars!"

“Come forth! I am Hyuk Mu—best hero the great Jin Family of Taiyuan has to offer!”

One beggar who didn’t hesitate to criticize himself, and one martial artist whose fierce loyalty to his family was matched only by his willingness to trade self-awareness for a piece of candy.

“…”

“…”

“…”

“…”

In the suffocating silence, the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s greatest hero finally spoke.

“Don’t be fooled, beggar. This is all their dark arts.”

The beggar, who was a little better than a son of a bitch, shot back.

“Do I look like an idiot who’d fall for this? I saw through this crap ages ago.”

“Heh. Just what I’d expect from the Beggars’ Sect’s Successor Beggar.”

“You’re not bad yourself. You figured it out right away.”

Master and Disciple watched them with distant eyes and had much the same thought.

Can’t we put those guys back?

Should I just put them back in?

Unfortunately, neither got the chance.

Before they could seriously consider how, a second rift opened.

Whoooosh.

Beyond the darkness fading away, a man appeared in a rush. His eyes were as cold as his expression as he surveyed the area, then asked Jin Taekyung,

“Dark arts?”

“This asshole’s at it too.”

At the answer that came without a pause, Song Ilseom lowered his blood-dripping blade.

“It’s really you.”

“Glad you’re alive. Where’s Young Lady Ju?”

“She’ll be out soon. It might’ve been a trap, so I went first.”

Song Ilseom hesitated, then added, “The employer’s safety comes first.”

“I didn’t ask— Ah, Young Lady Ju!”

“Benefactor! Great Hero Jin! Young Master Jin!”

Unlike the three before her, Ju Hwaran ran toward Jin Taekyung without the slightest hesitation.

More precisely, she would have—

If the third and fourth rifts hadn’t opened at the same time.

“Wow! I’ve never felt anything this gross before!”

Cheongpung emerged sounding remarkably cheerful for someone who’d just said that. Behind him, a shadow appeared like a ghost, as though it were one with the magical power. It acted without a word.

Shwack—CLANG!

A flash crossed the space faster than sound.

Jin Taekyung knocked aside the dagger flying at him with terrifying speed and shrugged.

“You could’ve just said something. Did you really have to go that far?”

“Assassins and physicians have a few things in common. Being suspicious of everything around us is one of them. The more we question, the fewer mistakes we make.”

“So, are you satisfied now?”

“I think I’m less suspicious of the reality I’m seeing, at least.”

The Slaughter Saint looked at Jin Taekyung with a curious glint in his eyes.

“I’m more suspicious of myself now, though. How did you wake up already?”

“Because you’re a quack.”

“Well, I’m nothing special. Anyone with the Heavenly Martial Physique and martial arts like mine could do it.”

“…”

The Slaughter Saint squeezed his eyes shut at the Master and Disciple’s mocking, arrogant answers. Just then, someone emerged from the fifth and final rift.

Unlike the others, she neither hurried nor moved stealthily. Not a drop of blood stained her clothes or skin.

But Bow Saint’s eyes were different from usual.

A tempest.

It lasted only a moment, but a few people saw it clearly: the traces of fierce emotion in eyes that were usually clear and unshakable.

Just as a wave striking a reef can’t hide its white foam, that emotion had left its mark somewhere in her eyes, black as the night sky.

Before anyone could form a clear suspicion about what they’d just seen, the low-voiced conversation between a beggar and a hero reached everyone’s ears.

“What? Is it real?”

“I told you it isn’t. Leave it to the Successor Beggar to talk like a filthy footwrap.”

“No, it looks real to me, no matter how I look at it.”

“I said it’s real dark arts.”

“Ha, shit. Is that so?”

Hyuk Mujin delivered the final blow to the frowning Gung Gibang.

“But dark arts can never be perfect. They grant power to those who abandon the proper path, but there’s always a flaw. Look—we’re one person short. They managed to imitate everyone else, but they must not have dared try that man.”

“…!”

“…!”

Everyone listening suddenly remembered something they’d forgotten.

Even now, after the final rift had closed, Great Sir was nowhere to be seen.