And there was qi.

"They're coming."

At my words, everyone rose from their seats one after another.

Sure enough, the footsteps stopped in front of our hospital room.

Knock, knock.

The door opened, revealing a face I had seen only half a day ago.

Go Jun?

Wait. If that bastard was here, then could it be…?

The thought broke off. Go Jun's face vanished from view as another man strode into the hospital room.

He was nearing seventy, yet his youthful appearance made him look like a man in his forties. He possessed a leader’s charisma and a natural air of intimidation.

Lee Jungryong.

His gaze swept over us before stopping dead on one person. The corner of his mouth lifted slightly.

“You’ve grown a lot.”

Team Leader Choi’s gaze sank deeply as he looked at Lee Jungryong.

Chapter 287

Me, Im Kkeokjeong, Song Song, and Butler Kim.

Yet the moment Lee Jungryong entered the hospital room, his gaze settled on one person alone.

Team Leader Choi.

“You’ve grown a lot.”

“…!”

The moment I heard Lee Jungryong’s first words, I felt as though someone had struck me in the back of the head with a sledgehammer.

So this was what Team Leader Choi had been hiding.

Their relationship was clearly more than that of an ordinary superior and subordinate at work.

As far as I know, Team Leader Choi was with Ares Guild for only three or four years.

Even by the most conservative estimate, he must have met Lee Jungryong in his early to mid-twenties. “You’ve grown a lot” wasn’t something you said to a man like that.

It was the sort of thing you heard from your parents’ friends or relatives during the holidays.

“It’s been a long time, Vice Guild Master Lee Jungryong.”

The stiff title and formal tone made Lee Jungryong study Team Leader Choi with interest.

“Vice Guild Master? When you were young, you used to call me Grandpa.”

Grandpa?

That was the second shock. For a moment, I wondered if perhaps… but quickly dismissed the thought.

It was simply what Team Leader Choi had called him as a child. Lee Jungryong couldn’t actually be his grandfather.

Still, they’ve clearly had a close relationship since Team Leader Choi was young.

That alone made Team Leader Choi’s relationship with Lee Jungryong anything but ordinary.

While everyone else stood stunned, only two people remained composed: Butler Kim and Team Leader Choi, who answered calmly.

“That was twenty years ago.”

“Time is frightening. Who would have thought that sweet little boy would turn out like this?”

“The older I got, the more I began to see the things that had once been invisible to me.”

“I received a report that you resigned last year. Come to think of it, I never saw your face even once after you joined the Guild. I must admit, I found that rather disappointing.”

Despite his words, he didn’t look disappointed in the slightest. Neither did Team Leader Choi.

“I felt the same way. If you hadn’t immediately transferred me overseas and barred me from even setting foot in headquarters, we might have seen each other more often.”

“Why? Didn’t you like the overseas branch?”

“I felt it wasn’t where I belonged. That’s all.”

“Not where you belonged…”

“Wasn’t that exactly what you wanted, Vice Guild Master?”

“Me?”

Lee Jungryong let out a quiet laugh.

“So you built yourself a new nest? Even going so far as to borrow someone else’s name?”

“I’m sorry to interrupt.”

Butler Kim, who had remained silent until then, suddenly spoke. His voice was as calm as ever.

“But the Young Master and I are hardly strangers.”

“Oh, who might this be?”

Lee Jungryong widened his eyes in feigned surprise.

The reaction was clearly exaggerated. If he knew Team Leader Choi, there was no way he wouldn’t know Butler Kim, the person closest to him.

“Kim Hwajong? It is Hwajong, isn’t it?”

“It’s been a long time, Senior.”

Butler Kim didn’t refuse Lee Jungryong’s outstretched hand. The two men shook hands, each wearing a faint smile.

Informal speech? And Senior?

Whatever their exact relationship was, they seemed much closer than I’d expected.

“It was a good thing I came in person. The last time we met was… about twenty years ago, wasn’t it?”

“Eighteen years, to be precise. Ship-pal years.”[1532]

Was it just my imagination, or had he put extra force into those particular words?

I glanced to the side. Song Song and Im Kkeokjeong looked as though they had seen a ghost.

[1532] Ship-pal, meaning “eighteen” in Korean, sounds similar to ssibal, a strong profanity.

Ah. So it wasn't my imagination.

Close, my ass. I must have been blind.

I take it back. Butler Kim didn't merely dislike Lee Jungryong.

He fucking hated him. Enough to wish he had died.

Butler Kim was a mage, so he wasn't holding an actual knife, but his tongue was every bit as sharp as a blade.

At his vicious words, Go Jun, who had been standing behind Lee Jungryong like an iron tower, took a step forward.

"Watch your mouth."

"Watch my mouth?"

"He is not someone you may address so carelessly."

Butler Kim gave Go Jun an odd look.

"You seem highly skilled at a glance, Hunter. What is your name?"

"I'm Go Jun, head of the Vice Guild Master's security."

"I see. Team Leader Seok."

Butler Kim's distinctive low voice continued smoothly.

"If you've said everything you have to say, shut your mouth and get back behind him. This isn't a place for the likes of you to interfere."

"…!"

Go Jun's already expressionless face stiffened.

Just as veins began to bulge on his forehead, Lee Jungryong burst into hearty laughter and motioned him back.

"I thought age might have mellowed you, but… your temper hasn't changed at all. This is the Kim Hwajong I remember."

"When it comes to a foul temper, you still have me beat by a mile, Senior. Wouldn't you agree?"

Team Leader Choi cut in coldly.

"Enough of this pointless conversation. Get to the matter at hand."

How many people in Korea—or the entire world—could speak to Lee Jungryong that way?

Im Kkeokjeong and Song Song gaped at the stormy exchange.

Even I was inwardly astonished by Butler Kim's behavior, despite having personally witnessed him treat Im Chunsoo, the Guild Master of Sangdong Guild, like a dog several months ago.

What on earth happened between them?

It wasn't just Team Leader Choi. Even Butler Kim was acting completely unlike his usual self.

“One of you is young and impatient, while the other still hasn’t shed the temper of his youth. Well, I suppose there’s no harm in getting to the point. Though it is a little disappointing, considering I came here as an invited guest.”

“Did you just call this an invitation?”

“You’re mistaken. No one here would invite you, Vice Guild Master.”

“Think carefully. Surely there’s at least one person who did?”

Lee Jungryong had been watching the two of them with amusement. Then he suddenly turned toward me.

“That fellow.”

Silence descended over the room.

With everyone’s eyes on me, I thought for a moment before carefully opening my mouth.

“What kind of bullshit is that?”

The instant I finished speaking, Go Jun let out a low growl. He looked ready to charge like a hunting dog if Lee Jungryong hadn’t shaken his head.

After restraining Go Jun, Lee Jungryong spoke to me.

“Didn’t you say so yourself? That I should come in person and apologize to the victim.”

“Oh.”

I had definitely said that.

To Park Jihoon and Park Tae Seop.

“You look as though you never expected me to come.”

“To be honest, I didn’t. What are you plotting by coming all the way here?”

“You have a tendency to say whatever comes to mind without thinking it through. Since I accepted your invitation, shouldn’t you begin by thanking me?”

Thank him?

I let out a hollow laugh. The rest of his words were so absurd that they weren’t even worth answering.

“Your mouth may be crooked, but at least speak straight. It wasn’t an invitation. It was a demand. A demand for an apology.”

“No. If coming here had not been my own decision, could you—or the Peace Guild, for that matter—have made me move even a single step?”

“That’s…”

“Didn’t you think so yourself? You never truly expected me to come.”

It felt as though someone had dumped a bucket of cold water over me. The words caught in my throat.

Everything he said was true.

Though my heart had cried out for anger and revenge, I had never expected Lee Jungryong to come. Even in the midst of that rage, my mind had coldly compromised with reality.

Lee Jungryong, the man who effectively ruled Ares Guild, was still a giant I couldn't force to his knees with my current strength.

"A demand is the right of the strong. Words spoken by the weak to the strong can never be demands. They are always requests—or invitations."

"…!"

"That's why I came in response to an invitation. Whatever leverage you think you have over me, that fact will not change. I am Lee Jungryong. I am Ares Guild, and Ares Guild is me."

His voice was quiet, but it carried weight. Everyone in the Peace Guild, myself included, was left speechless.

At least one thing was clear.

Lee Jungryong hadn't come here to apologize.

Having driven the overwhelming difference in our power into our minds, he continued with a satisfied smile.

"And this is no way to treat a guest who came to visit a patient. Especially one who brought a gift for him. Isn't that right, Team Leader Seok?"

"That is correct, Vice Guild Master."

Go Jun answered like a robot and knocked on the door. A Hunter from the security team who had been waiting outside entered and placed what he was carrying on the table.

A vase filled with hundreds of flowers.

And an envelope.

"Compensation money. If the amount isn't enough, tell me. I'll give you as much as you need."

My gaze remained fixed on the flowers. They were beautiful and white. I had never been particularly fond of flowers, but I had never disliked them, either.

Yet this was the first time in my life that receiving flowers as a gift had made me feel disgusted.

Lilies as a hospital-visit gift.[1533]

My dormant anger began crawling back up from the depths.

I rubbed the stiff, tingling back of my neck and muttered,

"What a fucking old bastard…"

This time, even Go Jun couldn't restrain himself.

With a roar, he charged. His fist slammed into my lower jaw at blinding speed.

[1533] White lilies are associated with funerals and mourning, making them an unsettling gift for a hospital patient.

Crack!

Blood sprayed with a chilling sound.

I frowned and slowly turned my tilted head. The taste of sticky, salty blood spread through my mouth.

“Damn it. I bit my tongue.”

Go Jun’s eyes widened. He looked back and forth between his fist and me as though he couldn’t believe what he was seeing.

“How?”

“I’m pretty tough. I drank a lot of milk when I was young.”

“I definitely imbued it with mana…”

If it had been fully materialized Fist Energy, I wouldn’t still be standing here like this.

Of course, if that had been the case, I wouldn’t have deliberately let him hit me, either.

I flashed him a grin.

“You should have used everything you had. Enough to finish me in one blow.”

Whoosh!

“Hup!”

Go Jun sucked in a short breath and reached out to knock my arm aside. He was so fast that an ordinary A-rank Hunter couldn’t even compare.

His hand curved like a hook as it snapped toward my wrist.

This really is a grappling technique.

Remembering the surprise I had felt while fighting Park Jihoon, I smoothly twisted my wrist.

Slip.

His hand clawed through empty air. I wound around his wrist, locked it in place, and put my weight into a stomp that crashed down onto the top of his foot.

Crack!

“Urgh!”

The weight of a thousand geun[1534] crushed Go Jun’s instep and drove it deep into the solid concrete. Groaning in pain, he raised his arm to shield his face.

But…

“You think that’ll do?”

One thing was certain.

I hadn’t avoided his blow.

Go Jun hadn’t been able to avoid mine.

Crunch!

[1534] A Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb); a thousand geun is 600 kg (about 1,320 lb).

My fist struck the exact center of his face, breaking his nose in one blow and caving in the flesh beneath it.

His mouth gaped open, spraying blood and white teeth.

Clatter. Thud.

“Fucking bastard. Who said you could throw the first punch?”

“…!”

It all happened in an instant. Everyone in the hospital room was shocked, but one person’s reaction stood out in particular.

“You bastard…”

The voice that had remained relaxed throughout trembled faintly. Ripples spread through Lee Jungryong’s eyes.

I quickly spoke first, before things could get worse.

“For the record, that was self-defense.”

But the words I heard next were something I could never have anticipated.

“What is your relationship with my older brother?”

“Excuse me? Who?”

“The person who taught you that.”

“If you mean that…”

My eyes widened.

Was this old man talking about martial arts?

But Lee Jungryong was no longer listening to me. His gaze had turned cold and heavy as he stared at Team Leader Choi.

“Did Soyeong have another man?”

I didn’t know who Soyeong was.

But to someone else, that name was apparently a dragon’s reverse scale—a point that must never be touched.

Team Leader Choi clenched his fists, and blue flames blazed in Butler Kim’s eyes.

“Senior. Do you want to die?”

“Answer me.”

“You bastard! Lee Jungryong!”

“Now.”

That was when Team Leader Choi’s tightly sealed lips finally parted.

“You know better than I do what kind of relationship those two had.”

“Then that bastard…”

“You must have already investigated Mr. Jin Taekyung.”

“Are you saying all of it is true?”

“It is exactly as you know it. There isn’t a single lie.”

Lee Jungryong’s eyes trembled.

After looking back and forth between Team Leader Choi and me, he finally turned away. The door opened as though someone had been waiting for the signal, but he came to an abrupt stop before leaving.

He tossed out a single sentence.

“I’ll send someone soon. Once the negotiations are over, hand over the people you’re holding.”

Click.

The door closed behind the last person to leave—the security team Hunter carrying Go Jun on his back.

It felt as though a storm had just swept through the room.

I turned toward Team Leader Choi, who was silently staring at the tightly closed door.

“Who is Soyeong?”

“She was my mother.”

“…What?”

“The mother who gave birth to me and raised me. She passed away a long time ago.”

My mouth fell open despite myself.

What the hell is wrong with that old man?

Lee Jungryong had asked Team Leader Choi whether his late mother had cheated while she was alive—her own son, no less.

“Crazy. Why would he—ah, never mind. You don’t have to answer.”

“Vice Guild Master Lee must have been quite shaken. Even I didn’t expect him to ask so directly.”

To hell with whether he was shaken.

I frantically waved my hand.

“Team Leader, really, it’s fine. You don’t have to tell me.”

“Sometimes I wonder what it would have been like if my mother had been born as someone other than Cheon Taemin’s daughter.”

“All right, that’s enough…”

My body abruptly froze.

What did he just say?

Although I couldn’t move an inch, my mind repeated those three syllables faster than ever.

Cheon Taemin. Cheon Taemin. Cheon Taemin…

“Did you just say Cheon Taemin?”

“If my pronunciation wasn’t incorrect, then you heard me correctly.”

“Could it be… the Cheon Taemin I know?”

"Yes."

Team Leader Choi nodded and continued.

"He is my maternal grandfather."

For a moment, my vision spun and my legs wobbled.

Cheon Taemin. He said Cheon Taemin.

I had once harbored doubts about Team Leader Choi's identity.

A man in his twenties with seemingly limitless ability, whom an A-rank mage known as a hidden hero of the Great Cataclysm called Young Master.

Now I finally understood how all of that had been possible.

It was because his maternal grandfather was Cheon Taemin.

Humanity's great hero. The world's greatest Hunter…

Among all the words used to describe Cheon Taemin, the title "Guild Master of Ares Guild" was only one small piece.

The name of the largest piece was an immortal achievement no one else could ever attain.

The man who killed the Demon King. The Slayer.

That Cheon Taemin's maternal grandson was standing before me.

Chapter 288

In the back seat of the spacious limousine, Lee Jungryong held Go Jun's arm and sent his mana flowing into it.

Go Jun's limp body twitched, then strength returned to it.

He opened his eyes with difficulty, letting out a faint groan. Lee Jungryong asked, "Are you conscious?"

"…I'm sorry. I should have kept him occupied longer."

Go Jun lowered his head, his face rigid.

His earlier attack on Jin Taekyung had not been impulsive.

Go Jun was Lee Jungryong's Disciple and Head of Security. A man with his exceptional composure and self-control would never have done such a thing unless ordered by the master he respected above all others.

Jin Taekyung. I need to see what that bastard is truly capable of.

What would you have me do?

"I'll buy as much time as I can. Make him show everything he has."

I never liked the bastard. It seems I'll finally get to teach him a proper lesson.

He should not have said that last part.

After speaking so boldly, he had failed to withstand even a single blow. He could not bring himself to face Lee Jungryong.

"You exchanged blows with him yourself, so you must have felt it. Tell me exactly how strong he is. Leave nothing out."

It did not take Go Jun long to answer.

"He's strong."

Jin Taekyung had stormed Myeongdong Guild alone. Go Jun had known from the start that he was not someone to take lightly.

But even after taking a mana-infused punch squarely, Taekyung had not fallen—or even retreated a single step. Go Jun had never imagined anyone could possess such absurd toughness.

"I struck him cleanly on the jaw, but he was harder than rebar. I've never seen anyone like him."

Taekyung had not been wearing armor or protected by defensive magic. Go Jun could not understand how he had emerged so completely unscathed.

The bigger problem was that Jin Taekyung did not merely possess exceptional toughness.

"His strength and speed both surpassed mine."

"What if you had gone all-out from the beginning, Team Leader Seok?"

After a brief hesitation, Go Jun answered stiffly.

"…It would still have been difficult."

He remembered Taekyung's lightning-fast hands.

Before he knew what was happening, his arm had been trapped and his foot driven deep into the ground. He had hastily raised his arm to shield his face, but the fist behind it had struck with such monstrous force that it smashed straight through his guard and into his face.

"I don't know how, but Jin Taekyung has extensive combat experience. He's on an entirely different level from ordinary Hunters who only fight monsters."

"And?"

"Pardon?"

"There's something you haven't said yet, isn't there?"

"…"

"I believe I told you to leave nothing out."

The moment Go Jun met Lee Jungryong's gaze, he understood.

Lee Jungryong had reached the same conclusion.

"You already suspected it."

"Yes. Today, that suspicion became certainty."

"You mean…"

Lee Jungryong's voice sank low.

"There's no doubt about it. Jin Taekyung has learned a mana cultivation method."

"…!"

A mana cultivation method.

A faint ripple disturbed Go Jun's unwavering gaze. That was how shocking Lee Jungryong's words were.

"An insignificant F-rank Hunter became this strong in barely half a year. People keep babbling about reawakening and faulty measuring devices, but that's nothing more than ignorant nonsense."

Go Jun muttered as if groaning.

"But how…? Aren't mana cultivation methods among the most closely guarded secrets?"

"Top secret? That phrase is meaningless. As long as someone knows a secret, it can never be absolute."

"Could Team Leader Choi be responsible?"

Lee Jungryong shook his head.

"That boy Minwoo never learned a mana cultivation method. Neither did Kim Hwajong, who has remained by his side since childhood."

"Isn't it something no one knows about? If the Guild Master…"

"Who?"

Go Jun's words died in his throat. He froze.

The moment he met Lee Jungryong's dark, sunken gaze, he realized he had said something he should not have.

"I believe I told you never to utter a word about my older brother."

"I-I'm sorry. It was a slip of the tongue…"

Go Jun's voice quivered like a wounded bird.

The revelation that Taekyung had learned a mana cultivation method had rattled him enough to break an unspoken taboo. Cheon Taemin, the Guild Master of Ares Guild, was someone who must never be mentioned.

Thud!

Both of Go Jun's knees struck the floor. He bowed his head deeply.

"Please forgive me, Vice Guild Master."

"Forgive you? These things happen."

"…"

"Get up."

Even after carefully lifting his knees from the floor and sitting back down, Go Jun could not look Lee Jungryong straight in the eye.

He had spent years at Lee Jungryong's side and had seen and learned many things.

To Go Jun, Lee Jungryong inspired both respect and fear.

Faint fear now colored the face that was ordinarily as expressionless as a machine.

"Team Leader Seok."

Lee Jungryong broke the suffocating silence.

Go Jun lowered his head even further.

"Yes, Vice Guild Master. Please speak."

"You're going to be very busy from now on. If you run your mouth as carelessly as you did today, you'll put me in a very difficult position."

"I'll remember that. I'll never forget it."

"Strengthen our surveillance of the Peace Guild. Find out whether they have anyone useful, too."

Go Jun cautiously raised his head.

"Are you planning to expand the security team?"

"Yes. We can't go on like this. We must prepare for any eventuality."

"Yes. I'll put it into action as soon as we return to the Guild."

"And… keep a close watch on the executives' movements. Include the status of our overseas branches."

"I'll carry it out without a single omission."

Lee Jungryong's position within Ares Guild was already secure.

But not everyone followed him as blindly as Go Jun did.

There were always those who harbored discontent, and they watched Lee Jungryong's every move with suspicion.

The security team, on the other hand, was little more than Lee Jungryong's private army.

Paid enormous salaries and taught mana cultivation methods, its members offered their absolute loyalty to one man alone: Lee Jungryong.

Yes. Things have been too peaceful for too long.

Lee Jungryong turned toward the window. Beyond the spotless glass, the Han River stretched wide into the distance.

Only thirty-some years ago, its waters had been filled with the corpses of humans and monsters. Now they were clear and clean, as though nothing had ever happened.

Older brother. The world has changed so much.

Lee Jungryong did not speak the thought aloud.

His gaze was already retracing the distant past. Burning cities and dying people. Monster legions charging forward, overturning heaven and earth…

And amid that hellscape, one man had shone alone.

Do not take so much as a single step out from behind me.

Lee Jungryong had been thirty then, filled with cynicism toward the world. The moment he met that man, he was captivated.

Though they did not share a single drop of blood, Lee Jungryong regarded him as an older brother and always looked up to him with both respect and fear.

Even now, past the age of sixty, those memories and emotions remained vivid.

Lee Jungryong was staring silently out the window, lost in thought, when Go Jun's voice brought him back.

"We've arrived."

At the same moment, the limousine door slid open. Before them stood a skyscraper tall enough to pierce the clouds, surrounded by a forest of buildings like guards protecting a king.

Dozens of waiting Hunters bowed to him. The lapels of their suits bore the emblem of Ares Guild.

"Welcome, Vice Guild Master Lee Jungryong!"

Their shout was perfectly synchronized, as though measured with a ruler.

A faint smile on his lips, the man in power stepped onto the red carpet.

This was a world where even white-haired old men wore wireless earbuds and watched iTube.

Whenever snow fell and icy roads formed, nursing homes shut down, while Old Man Kim and Granny Park chatted through a voice-chat app and played online Go-Stop.[1535]

If magic was a mysterious realm of unknowable origins, the internet was the culmination of twenty-first-century civilization.

With a few clicks and keystrokes, anyone could learn what was happening anywhere in the world as easily as reading the palm of their hand.

In a world like this, information about the most famous person among billions was even easier to find.

Tap. Tap-tap.

Cheon Taemin.

His name completed itself after I typed only the initial consonants.[1536] It even ranked higher in searches than heaven.

People were more interested in the man who had stopped them from nearly going to heaven than in heaven itself.

I was no different.

Muttering inwardly, I tapped the search result that read “Cheon Taemin—Profile.”

The face I had seen hundreds—no, thousands—of times since elementary school filled my phone screen.

Thick eyebrows and chiseled features. He looked like a handsome Greek god reincarnated.

And…

“He looks like him.”

“Now that I see them side by side, they really do look alike.”

“Whoa. They’re identical.”

They looked alike. So much so that I understood why people said blood would always tell.

Im Kkeokjeong, Song Song, and I stared openmouthed, looking back and forth between the phone and Team Leader Choi.

“Ahem.”

Only when Team Leader Choi finally cleared his throat uncomfortably did we come to our senses.

No, not yet. Come to my senses, my ass.

What the hell is going on?

Things were getting spectacularly insane now, whether in Murim or the modern world.

[1535] Go-Stop is a Korean card game played with hwatu, traditional flower cards.

[1536] Written Korean syllables are composed of consonants and vowels. Korean search tools can autocomplete a name from the initial consonants of its syllables.

When Park Jihoon stabbed me in the back and Lee Jungryong appeared out of nowhere, I'd been certain nothing could surprise me anymore…

But this was shock and horror in its purest form.

Not the President's grandson, but Cheon Taemin's.

A president's term lasted five years. Cheon Taemin had no term.

The achievements and Fame attached to his name would remain immortal, passed down through the generations.

He had driven a sword into the Demon King's heart and saved all humanity. What more needed to be said?

Humanity's hero. The world's greatest Hunter, recognized across the globe.

Unprecedented and unmatched. The very definition of both.

Team Leader Choi was Cheon Taemin's only grandson through his daughter.

Cheon Taemin had only one daughter, and there was no information about any other relatives. Team Leader Choi was probably his sole heir.

Good God. Cheon Taemin's heir.

The thought alone gave me goose bumps.

I opened my mouth, my voice trembling.

"Team Leader Choi."

"Yes, go ahead."

Team Leader Choi answered as though he had been waiting for me to speak. He even looked relieved that the awkward silence had finally been broken.

"If it isn't too rude, may I ask you something?"

"Anything."

"Then can I keep calling you Team Leader Choi?"

"What?"

Team Leader Choi stared at me in disbelief.

"What exactly were you planning to call me instead?"

"Mr. Choi Minwoo. Minwoo hyung.[1537]"

"I refuse."

"There's one more option…"

"Don't say it. I don't want to hear it."

"Please adopt me. I'll call you Dad. I'll be a good son."

Team Leader Choi's face flushed bright red.

If I had actually been his son, he looked ready to strike me from the family register on the spot.

A moment later, he let out a deep sigh.

"…This isn't the time for jokes."

[1537] Hyung is a term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

"I'm not joking. I mean it."

"Mr. Jin Taekyung!"

Team Leader Choi continued in a low, stern voice.

"Didn't I tell you everything? What kind of situation I'm in?"

"You did. We all heard you."

Im Kkeokjeong and Song Song nodded.

An hour earlier, after Lee Jungryong had left, Team Leader Choi had told us everything while we were still reeling from the shock.

His true identity. Everything that had happened until now. And why he had been forced to act as he had.

"Lee Jungryong is an extremely ambitious man. He considers me a thorn in his side and has always kept me under surveillance. He made me move from one overseas branch to another to prevent me from setting foot in headquarters."

Team Leader Choi said he had been surrounded by watchful eyes.

Lee Jungryong had assigned him to dead-end posts to prevent him from producing any notable results, and even then, he had been transferred to a new posting once a year. They called them overseas branches, but it had been little different from exile.

"Cheon Taemin—no. Did the Ares Guild Master simply stand by and watch?"

"As I said, my maternal grandfather…"

Team Leader Choi bit down hard on his lip.

"He's an extraordinary person. My memories are from when I was a child, but he definitely isn't someone who thinks like an ordinary person."

Butler Kim, who had been standing quietly at attention, added, "He was that way in the past, and he remains so now. I served the old master for many years, but not once did I understand his true intentions."

Was this the dark side of the hero no one knew?

Team Leader Choi sighed and continued.

"Even after I submitted my resignation and left Ares Guild, they must have kept watching me. Later, I founded the Peace Guild… but recruiting even one ordinary mid-rank Hunter proved difficult."

It was something I had not known until hearing his story, but Im Kkeokjeong and I had not been the Peace Guild's first members.

Several high-ranking Hunters had joined before us, only to transfer to other Guilds after receiving generous contract offers out of nowhere. Some had even abruptly gone off the grid before they could sign their contracts.

It was probably Lee Jungryong's doing.

No matter how much money you had, a Guild without Hunters was no Guild at all.

With Ares Guild tightening the screws from every direction, Team Leader Choi had begun searching for people through the Hunter Office.

That was when Im Kkeokjeong and I appeared on his radar.

Fortunately, there had been no significant pressure this time.

Two low-ranked Hunters probably didn't seem worth bothering with.

And that had been Ares Guild's miscalculation.

No one could have imagined that an F-rank Hunter who seemed useful only as a porter would create a storm like this.

"This incident is no different. When I heard that you had encountered Lee Jungryong, Mr. Taekyung, I thought it had happened because of me."

"So?"

"Pardon?"

I vigorously scratched the back of my head.

"So what are you trying to say, Team Leader? You still haven't said it clearly."

"The difference in strength is too great for us to make an enemy of Ares Guild."

"Everyone knows that."

"Things like this will keep happening."

"More detail. Be precise."

Team Leader Choi gritted his teeth.

"I'll terminate your contracts. If you cut ties with the Peace Guild, Ares Guild won't bother any of you."

His voice seethed with emotion. Team Leader Choi closed his eyes and clenched his fists.

I stared at him for a moment, then spoke.

"I don't want to."

"What?"

"I said I don't want to."

"…"

"They're dinosaurs. We're ants. We're weak, so let's back off before we get hurt worse. That's what you're saying, right?"

"Mr. Jin Taekyung."

"Then it's simple."

Team Leader Choi stared at me with wide eyes. I spoke slowly, enunciating every word.

"Let's get stronger."

No.

"I'll make you strong. I will."

Chapter 289

"Pardon?"

Team Leader Choi looked more violently shaken than I had ever seen him before.

Even Butler Kim, who at least looked calm, wasn't much different.

Lingering anger and bewilderment. And questions about what I had said.

I didn't know they could make faces like that.

Whenever I charged ahead without thinking things through, these two always took two calm steps back and handled the fallout.

For once, they seemed human—just like me.

Feeling strangely moved, I opened my mouth.

"The answer is simple. If our enemies are strong, we get stronger too."

"Mr. Jin Taekyung."

Team Leader Choi's voice was quiet and steady. He had reined in his initial emotions and returned to his usual composed self.

"This isn't a math problem that can be solved simply because you know the answer. Reaching that answer would require a process more difficult than you can imagine."

"Then we'll be fine. If I tutor you, we should be able to solve it eventually, even if it takes some time. Oh, but let's change the subject. I'm hopeless at math."

"Have you forgotten? Our opponent is Ares Guild. You may not know this, but I do. I know exactly how powerful they are."

"Unfortunately, the Young Master is right."

Team Leader Choi and Butler Kim fell silent after that.

One was the maternal grandson of Cheon Taemin, Guild Master of Ares Guild. The other was a core member who had served Cheon Taemin for many years.

Given their positions, they must have seen and experienced a great deal firsthand. Their blood might have been boiling, but their cool heads had already calculated the answer.

But…

"Team Leader Choi."

I looked into his eyes, which already said the matter was settled.

"Do you remember what you said to me before we went to Myeongdong Guild?"

"Of course."

"What did you say back then?"

After a moment's hesitation, Team Leader Choi parted his lips.

"Mr. Jin Taekyung may seem reckless at first glance, but…"

"I always anticipate the worst-case scenario before acting. And?"

“You always bring back the best possible result.”

“You said you trusted me more than you trusted yourself, Team Leader. Did you only say that because it sounded nice?”

“Absolutely not.”

“I may have been a lousy student, but I’m not stupid enough to risk my life on a game with zero chance of winning. This is doable.”

“Doable…”

“If you can’t believe in yourself, believe in me.”

Light seeped into Team Leader Choi’s eyes as he sensed the sincerity behind my words. It was faint, but I knew what it was.

Hope.

Hope was like a spark. It could flare up or die out in an instant. You had to fan it before it went out.

“Since we’re on the subject, let me ask you something. If I leave the Guild now, will you give up too? I suppose shutting down the Guild, retiring, and farming with Butler Kim wouldn’t be so bad. Lee Jungryong might even supply the fertilizer.”

“Hunter Jin Taekyung!”

Ignoring Butler Kim’s attempt to stop me, I continued.

“You said you wanted to build the greatest Guild in the world. If you send me away, send Uncle Kkeokjeong and Song-i away, and let even the new recruits leave, are the two of you planning to fight Ares Guild by yourselves?”

“…”

“Team Leader Choi.”

He remained silent. No answer came.

But the spark in his eyes was still alive.

Before long, a hoarse voice slipped between his lips.

“Ares Guild is an empire. An empire so powerful that even the ten largest Guilds in Korea couldn’t stand against it if they joined forces.”

“Good grief. We’ll have to work hard if we want to catch up with them.”

“I may not know everything about Ares Guild, but I know a great deal. That only makes them seem even more dangerous.”

“It also improves our chances. It means we know our enemy well. Know your enemy and know yourself, and you can fight a hundred battles without disaster. Right?”

“I’ve considered it countless times, but every calculation told me it was impossible.”

“Then run the numbers again.”

“Is it really… possible?”

“Yes.”

“Where exactly did my calculations go wrong? What makes you so confident in your answer?”

He wasn’t asking because he failed to understand.

More than anyone, Team Leader Choi wanted his answer to be wrong. He wanted even the faintest possibility that we could stand against Lee Jungryong.

I was happy to give him the answer he wanted.

“The person talking to you right now.”

“…!”

“The process of your calculations was accurate. Except for one thing.”

I slowly raised a finger and pointed at my chest.

“Me.”

At that moment, Team Leader Choi’s eyes shook. I could feel the spark in them beginning to fade.

Disappointment, not hope, filled the void it left behind.

“You were included in my calculations, Mr. Jin Taekyung.”

“Of course I was. You wouldn’t be the Team Leader Choi I know otherwise.”

Team Leader Choi was a brilliant man. He possessed natural leadership, exceptional judgment, and the drive to act on it.

He had weighed Peace Guild against Ares Guild with a cool head, and I must have been included on Peace Guild’s side of the scale.

“Everything you’ve shown us until now has been astonishing. No, almost miraculous.”

I already knew what words would follow his fading voice.

“But I’m still not enough?”

Team Leader Choi nodded gravely.

“Even excluding Lee Jungryong, an S-rank Hunter, Ares Guild officially has more than a hundred A-rank Hunters. Their mid- and low-rank Hunters are beyond counting.”

The way he emphasized officially implied that they had even more strength hidden from the public.

And they still have more than a hundred A-rank Hunters.

I had heard the rumors before, but hearing it directly from Team Leader Choi made the true scale of Ares Guild’s power sink in.

No matter how strong I was, in the end, I was still only one pair of hands. Team Leader Choi’s judgment was cold and clear.

But…

“If that’s how you’re calculating it, you’ll have to run the numbers again.”

“Pardon?”

“The formula is right, but the numbers are wrong. I don’t know what value you assigned to me, but you’ll need to multiply it several times over.”

Team Leader Choi’s eyes widened. So did Butler Kim’s, Im Kkeokjeong’s, and Song Song’s.

Considering everything I had done until now, their reaction was understandable.

I had hunted a Named Monster alone, crushed nearly thirty Black Hunters, and confronted a major Guild like Myeongdong Guild head-on.

Leaving everyone frozen like statues, I fixed my gaze on Team Leader Choi.

“I feel like I’ve told you this repeatedly. I’m a man with more secrets than you think.”

Murim was Murim, and the modern world was the modern world.

There had always been a clear boundary in my mind separating the two. But Lee Jungryong and Ares Guild had erased that line.

If none of this had happened, I probably would have kept my secret for the rest of my life.

Was wanting to live quietly too much to ask?

Perhaps this was the fate that came with the power I had been given. If so, it was time to accept it. I couldn’t keep running forever.

To protect the things precious to me from my enemies, I had to become stronger.

“So, what are you going to do now?”

Team Leader Choi still stared at me in disbelief.

“Mr. Jin Taekyung, you never cease to surprise me.”

“Save it. There’ll be plenty more surprises from now on.”

“It will be a dangerous road.”

“I happen to specialize in thorny roads.”

“Far more dangerous than anything you’ve faced until now.”

“Nothing to compare it to, my ass. You just don’t know it. This side is already hell…”

He seemed to have taken my words as a joke.

I watched Team Leader Choi as he finally let out a quiet laugh.

“Team Leader.”

“Yes?”

“Sometimes, it’s okay to be honest.”

The smile vanished from the corners of Team Leader Choi’s mouth. His gaze settled, and his lips pressed into a firm line.

I waited for him to speak. What came next was something I needed to hear directly from him.

Fortunately, I didn’t have to wait long.

“I know this is a presumptuous request, but… would you continue with Peace Guild?”

Yes. That was it.

I grinned and lightly tapped Team Leader Choi on the shoulder. He looked intelligent and cold on the outside, but he was softhearted underneath.

That was why he had tried to send us away despite wanting us to stay. He was afraid we would get hurt.

“Let’s make this work.”

“…Thank you.”

Team Leader Choi offered a fleeting smile before turning toward the others.

Butler Kim, his devoted retainer and someone practically no different from family, spoke first.

“I trust you already know my answer.”

“Thank you, Butler Kim.”

Next was Song Song. When Team Leader Choi asked her the same question he had asked me, she heaved several deep sighs before answering.

“Ares Guild? Ah, the numbers really don’t add up on this one.”

Honestly, that was the most normal reaction. We were openly declaring our intention to make an enemy of Ares Guild. Anyone who welcomed the idea would be strange.

“Double my annual salary. And add hazard pay.”

“…”

Song Song wasn’t normal either.

When I stared at her in disbelief, she shrugged.

“What? Why?”

“No reason. I just thought most people would walk away in a situation like this.”

“Do you want me to leave?”

“Now, now. Absolutely not.”

“Do you know why I transferred from Ares Guild to Peace Guild? Why I followed Team Leader Choi even with everyone trying to keep him down?”

“How would I know?”

“Because Team Leader Choi promised me double my salary.”

“…”

“My goal is to retire at thirty. If I earn as much as I can over the next two years, I’ll be able to live comfortably for the rest of my life.”

She spoke as though it were nothing, but this was only her roundabout way of saying she wanted to stay with us too. Everyone knew the frugal Song Song had already amassed a small fortune.

“And, well, you seem to have a plan too, so I’ll trust you for now. It’s hard to find a superior as capable and handsome as Team Leader Choi.”

And just like that, Song Song’s decision to stay was settled. Everyone’s gaze, including mine, shifted toward the last person.

“Uncle Kkeokjeong.”

He didn’t answer when I called him. Only after a long silence did he finally speak.

“Taekyung, will I be any help?”

“More than enough.”

“Even though I’m only a D-rank Hunter?”

“People associated with D are the real protagonists, after all.[1538] Why not legally change your name while you’re at it? Im D. Kkeokjeong. How does that sound?”

Im Kkeokjeong burst out laughing, then looked Team Leader Choi straight in the eye.

“It wasn’t your fault I got hurt, Team Leader Choi. So don’t blame yourself.”

“No. It was all my fault. Please focus on your recovery and rehabilitation first, then take your time thinking it over. You have a family, Hunter Im.”

“Team Leader Choi.”

“Yes?”

“Do you know what my first thought was when my arms were cut off?”

“Your family?”

He was a woman’s husband and the father of two children.

But Im Kkeokjeong calmly shook his head.

“Ah, I guess I can’t work as a Hunter anymore. That was the first thing that came to mind.”

“…”

“I love this work. I spent twenty years going in and out of Gates not merely to earn a living, but because I felt a sense of duty as a Hunter. But…”

Im Kkeokjeong bit down hard on his lip. His gaze remained fixed on his own two arms, wrapped in bandages.

“Can I recover?”

“You can. Absolutely.”

A faint smile spread across Im Kkeokjeong’s lips.

“Then I’m coming too. I can’t abandon a Hunter’s duty over something like this.”

Something churned deep in my chest at the sight.

People dismissed him as a low-rank Hunter in name only, but Im Kkeokjeong was one of the few true Hunters left in this age.

[1538] This alludes to One Piece, a Japanese manga in which several major characters have the initial “D.” in their names.

They’re all far too good to stop here.

All right. Strike while the iron was hot.

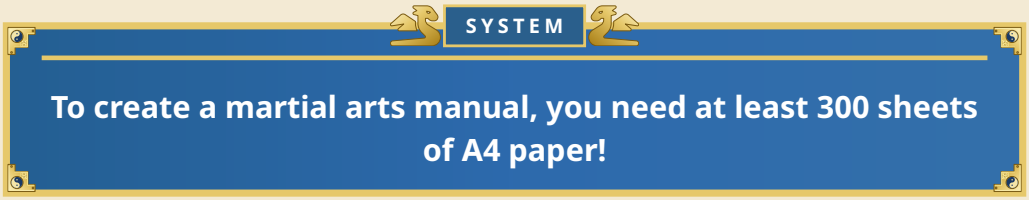
Having made up my mind, I opened my Skill window for the first time in a long while.

There, among the densely packed entries in the holographic window, I found what I wanted.

Yes. This was the beginning.

With firm resolve, I touched the holographic window.

Beep!



“…”

What the fuck.

Chapter 290

SYSTEM

Skill Window
Martial Arts Manual Creation
Grade: None
Restriction: Martial arts at Great Completion
Description: The caster can create manuals only for martial arts they have achieved Great Completion in. A deeper understanding of the martial art may produce better results.
Special Note: Materials are required to create a martial arts manual.

I stared at the Skill information window and thought.

Hold on. When did I get this?

Was it when I achieved Great Completion in the Jin Family's Manoeuvre Technique? Or the Jin Family's Spear Technique?

It had been over a year, so my memory was hazy.

I had somehow acquired the Skill, but I had never used it because there had been no opportunity.

No, that wasn't quite right. It wasn't that I had no opportunity. I just never intended to use it.

After returning to the modern world, I had occasionally felt the urge whenever I saw the members of Peace Guild. But every time, I reached the same conclusion.

What kind of trouble would I be asking for if I let martial arts leak out?

Imagine everyone else fighting with bronze weapons when some bastard showed up with a steel sword and started cutting down anyone in his path.

Everyone would envy him, then swarm like a pack of dogs to get their hands on that steel sword.

It wasn't that I didn't trust the members of Peace Guild, but at the time, I believed holding back was the right decision.

But now there's no reason to hesitate.

Crossing blows with Lee Jungryong and his subordinates, Park Jihoon and Go Jun, had taught me that the modern world held secrets I knew nothing about.

Their movements and use of mana were distinctly similar to those of Murim martial artists. If the enemy was armed with steel swords, we needed comparable equipment.

"Hoo…"

I drew a deep breath, sucking a foul stench into my nostrils.

I was currently squatting inside a bathroom stall.

The surroundings were awful, but it was the perfect place to create a martial arts manual without anyone seeing me.

All right. Let's get started.

I spread out the A4 paper and pen I had bought from the hospital convenience store.

Then I muttered inwardly.

Activate Martial Arts Manual Creation.

Beep.

SYSTEM

All materials are ready.
The Martial Arts Manual Creation Skill has been activated.
You can create manuals for martial arts that have achieved Great Completion.
Currently Available: Jin Family's Cultivation Technique, Jin Family's Manoeuvre Technique, Jin Family's Spear Technique
Select the desired martial art.

None of the Fire Gate Clan's martial arts I had learned had reached Great Completion.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan's hereditary martial arts, on the other hand, were stable and reasonably powerful.

Of those, I chose the most fundamental.

Select Jin Family's Cultivation Technique.

Beep.

SYSTEM

Create a martial arts manual for Jin Family's Cultivation Technique?
Y / N

Yes.

Beep! Beep!

SYSTEM

Intelligence insufficient! Brainpower insufficient!
Teaching is several times harder than learning!
Creating a manual for a Peak-Grade martial art requires at least 100 Intelligence!

"...You bastards. Seriously."

Weeping tears of blood, I opened my Status Window.

The moment I poured my precious points into Intelligence, the hand holding the pen began racing across the A4 paper like lightning.

Scritch-scritch-scritch-scritch!

"Gasp!"

I received two shocks.

The first was the incredible speed. The second was that everything being written was in Chinese.

"..."

Fuck this. I can't work like this.

I began desperately searching for the language settings.

The door slid open.

I entered the hospital room where the Peace Guild members were staying. Everyone had been gathered together talking, but they turned toward me as I came in.

"Where did you go that took so long... Wait, were you in the bathroom?"

Song Song pinched her nose. I answered gloomily.

"How did you know?"

"You reek of shit."

"Is it that bad?"

"Yeah. I thought a giant turd had walked into the room."

"Thanks for the kind words. I feel stronger already."

After spending over an hour inside a stinking bathroom stall, my nose had gone numb.

I answered in a drained voice and handed her the stack of stapled A4 pages.

"Here."

"What's this?"

"A love letter for you. I wrote it while I had diarrhea."

"Blech! Bleegh!"

“What a passionate reaction.”

“Bleeeggh!”

“…”

That wasn’t a reaction. She was genuinely retching.

I had thought there was nothing left between us to salvage, but I still couldn’t help the dull ache in a corner of my heart.

“I loved you…”

“Bleeeggh!”

“Hunter Song Song, are you all right?”

As her retching grew more violent, Butler Kim flew to her side and began patting her back.

Meanwhile, the A4 pages Song Song had been waving like the Taegeukgi[1539] passed into someone else’s hands.

Team Leader Choi read the words on the first page, then let out a quiet laugh as he looked at me.

“Jin Family’s Cultivation Technique? That’s an unusual title for a love letter.”

“What’s written inside is even more unusual.”

“…Pardon?”

“Keep reading.”

Team Leader Choi was quick on the uptake. He immediately straightened and began turning the pages with a solemn expression.

His eyes raced across handwriting so mechanical that it was hard to believe I had written it myself.

Flip. Flip. Flip…

His pace grew faster and faster, and hot breaths escaped between his lips.

After tearing through ten-odd pages in an instant, he jerked his head up. His eyes had widened like saucers.

“This is…!”

Even I was taken aback by his reaction.

He knows what this is?

It might have been called a martial arts manual, but now that I had made it, anyone unfamiliar with the Jin Family’s Cultivation Technique could easily have mistaken the manual for a traditional medicine text.

It detailed the locations and functions of the countless acupoints in the human body, along with the pathways used to circulate internal energy.

Song Song would have read a few pages and closed it, but Team Leader Choi’s reaction went far beyond anything I had expected.

[1539] The Taegeukgi is South Korea’s national flag.

“Do you recognize it?”

“Yes. Of course.”

Then a term I had never heard before slipped from his lips.

“This is a Mana Cultivation Method.”

“A mana what?”

“A Mana Cultivation Method!”

Mana Cultivation Method?

What a bizarre name. Whoever had coined it possessed a strange sense of style.

Butler Kim hurried over when he heard Team Leader Choi raise his voice.

“Did you just say Mana Cultivation Method?”

“Yes. Here.”

Butler Kim took the manual from Team Leader Choi and frantically flipped through the pages.

Before long, he reacted much the same way.

“Gasp.”

“What do you think, Butler Kim?”

“There’s no doubt about it. This is definitely a Mana Cultivation Method. But where on earth did this come from?”

The bathroom.

Team Leader Choi raised a finger and pointed at me.

“Mr. Jin Taekyung…”

“Hunter Jin Taekyung?”

Whip! Crack!

Before Team Leader Choi could finish, Butler Kim’s head snapped toward me with a series of violent cracks.

“How does Hunter Jin Taekyung possess a Mana Cultivation Method?”

I answered calmly.

“For starters, I don’t know what a Mana Cultivation Method is. Naturally, this is the first I’ve heard of this being one. By the way, is your neck all right? I think I just heard a bone break…”

“Is that important right now? This little neck of mine can break for all I care.”

“…It sounds pretty important to me.”

What did he mean, it could break? This old man seemed to be getting tougher by the day.

Of course, that only showed how important this was.

So Lee Jungryong learned a Mana Cultivation Method.

The compound term had sounded strange at first, but after repeating it a few times, it began to roll smoothly off my tongue.

It wasn't hard to infer from the name that it referred to an internal cultivation technique used by Hunters.

And that Lee Jungryong and his subordinates had learned precisely such a technique.

"Could you please answer my question?"

"Taekyung, this is extremely important."

Butler Kim and Team Leader Choi looked more grave than ever.

I glanced around as though flustered, then gave them the answer I had prepared in advance.

"Well, my father taught it to me when I was young…"

"Pardon me, but are you referring to your late father?"

Yes.

Team Leader Choi furrowed his brow.

"I understand your late father was an ordinary man."

"That's right."

"Then how did he know a Mana Cultivation Method…?"

"He probably didn't know either. When he taught it to me, he said it was just a health regimen passed down through our family."

"A health regimen?"

"A Mana Cultivation Method passed down through the family…"

As the two stared at me in disbelief, I pointed to the cover.

Four neat characters were printed there in lettering as clean as an office document's font.

Jin Family's Cultivation Technique

Even the name was perfect.

If Shanxi Province had the Jin Family of Taiyuan, then Gyeonggi Province had the Jin Family of Goyang. Simple as that.

If I claimed it was a family heirloom passed down through the generations, they wouldn't have much to argue with.

As expected, they were both briefly rendered speechless. I continued.

"It's a kind of breathing method. My father started teaching it to me when I was young, saying that practicing it would make me healthier. He even made me memorize something called a formula word for word."

"It is similar to a Mana Cultivation Method, but…"

"Could we see the original? The original manual?"

"After my father passed away, everything was so chaotic… I looked for it after we moved, but it was gone."

"Ah…"

"That's unfortunate."

"It is. Fortunately, I memorized every last word."

It was true that something I owned had disappeared. I had merely slipped the nonexistent original manual for the Jin Family's Cultivation Technique into the story.

Perfect destruction of evidence. When they heard that even the original was gone, both of their shoulders sagged.

I'd love to see their faces if they knew this was the original.

The martial arts manuals people imagined all looked more or less the same.

Half-rotted bamboo slips. Ancient books reeking of rat piss.

They could go play jokgu.[1540] I didn't have any of that crap.

I stood the crisp stack of A4 paper upright and slammed a stapler through it. Murim martial artists would have been appalled, but a twenty-first-century martial arts manual deserved to look the part.

"Still, this is extraordinary. A cultivation technique… I never imagined such a thing truly existed."

"I've seen them mentioned a few times in novels and movies. I believe they called them martial arts."

"You are correct, Young Master. In a sense, a Mana Cultivation Method is also a form of martial arts. Look here. It says that you circulate and accumulate qi by circulating your energy, does it not? That follows the same principle as a Mana Cultivation Method…"

Yeah, it is martial arts.

While I fought back the words itching to escape my mouth, Team Leader Choi asked me a question.

"Then, Mr. Jin Taekyung, have you been practicing a Mana Cultivation Method—or rather, the Jin Family's Cultivation Technique—since childhood?"

Yes.

"I'm sorry to put it this way, but its effects seem somewhat less impressive than expected…"

Translated directly, he was asking, If you had this, why did you spend seven years as an F-rank Hunter?

A sharp question. Also one I had expected.

I answered without batting an eye.

"As you know, I was quite skilled for an F-rank Hunter. I even received a commendation for graduating at the top of my training center."

[1540] Jokgu is Korean foot volleyball. The phrase "go play jokgu" also serves as a minced oath meaning "fuck off."

“Ah, yes. I heard about that. I also know you served as a deputy team leader in your former Guild.”

Granted, it had been a tiny, weak Guild, but F-rank Hunters were treated like punching bags wherever they went—like dog shit on the street.

Unless they were related by blood to the Guild’s leadership, it was extremely rare for an F-rank Hunter to serve as a deputy team leader. That was why my appointment had been a subject of conversation within the Guild for quite some time.

“There was a lot of talk about it. Hunters with higher ranks and more experience than me complained about seniority and grumbled that they should have come first… In the end, I proved myself through sheer ability. And the reason I could do that was the Jin Family’s Cultivation Technique.”

“Hmm.”

“Looking at it that way, it does seem to have had some effect.”

I knew. This alone wouldn’t be enough to convince them of my past or the effectiveness of the Jin Family’s Cultivation Technique.

I smiled faintly and looked around. Song Song had finally stopped retching, and even Im Kkeokjeong was watching me with curiosity, waiting for what I would say next.

Chapter 291

“Suppose you roll a snowball the size of your fist down a hill. What happens? Anyone know?”

Song Song snorted at my question.

“Even a kindergartener could answer that.”

“Then answer it.”

“Obviously, it gets bigger as it rolls downhill.”

“Why?”

“Because it picks up the snow piled on the hill.”

“Yeah, just like my feelings for you.”

“Blegh! Bleeeggh!”

This was addictive.

With Song Song’s renewed retching as my background music, I continued.

“What Song-i just said is correct. But the premise is different here. This isn’t a snow-covered hill. It’s a hill where the snow has already melted. No matter how hard you roll the snowball down it, it won’t get much bigger.”

“The snowball you’re talking about is mana, then.”

“Team Leader Choi, you catch on fast. Yes, a Mana Cultivation Method works the same way. If all you start with is a speck of dust, it’ll still be a speck of dust no matter how much you roll it.”

“The lower the rank, the lower the ceiling. Is that what you mean?”

“Exactly.”

There was a saying that once you were an F-rank, you were an F-rank forever.

That was how difficult it was to break free of the rank you had been assigned.

But on extremely rare occasions, some people managed to pluck that star from the sky.

Second Awakeners. That was what they were called—and it was also the mask I was currently wearing.

“After my second awakening made me a C-rank Hunter, the effects increased dramatically. That was when a little snow finally began to accumulate on what had been a grassy hill.”

“Come to think of it, your results at the time were…”

“My mana reserves were C-rank, but even then, my control was A-rank. You know why, right?”

“The Jin Family’s Cultivation Technique.”

Team Leader Choi groaned.

“So it wasn’t a mistake on the Association’s part.”

As I became famous and my past actions came to light, that part was concluded to have been a measurement error.

As a result, the Bucheon Association, which had conducted the retest, had taken a mountain of abuse. From their perspective, it must have felt deeply unfair.

“The Jin Family’s Cultivation Technique, which you and Butler Kim call a Mana Cultivation Method, has two effects. The first is an increase in mana. And the second is…”

Butler Kim picked up the thread.

“Mana control on an entirely different level.”

“Correct.”

Qi—called mana here and internal energy in Murim—could differ as greatly as heaven and earth depending on how it was used.

The Jin Family’s Cultivation Technique was a Peak martial art. It accumulated qi slowly, but its stability rivaled that of a Supreme Peak martial art.

“Learning it alone should lead to dramatic progress. We’ll keep an eye on the new recruits for now… For the time being, only those of you here should focus on learning the Jin Family’s Cultivation Technique. And of course, this must be done in absolute secrecy.”

“…”

“…”

What was with their reactions?

A heavy silence descended over the hospital room. All four of them stared blankly at me, mouths hanging open.

“Did you just say… you were going to teach us a Mana Cultivation Method?”

“Not a Mana Cultivation Method. The Jin Family’s Cultivation Technique.”

“Yes, yes. The Jin Family’s Cultivation Technique.”

Team Leader Choi’s eyelids trembled.

“You’re going to teach it to us?”

“That’s why I brought it, obviously. Did you think I brought it here just to show off?”

I looked around at everyone and continued.

“As you all know, we won’t last long at our current level. Lee Jungryong won’t come after us right away because of the recent incident, but it’s only a matter of time. But… what if we had the Jin Family’s Cultivation Technique?”

Im Kkeokjeong, who had been sitting with his mouth wide open, shouted.

“Jin! Family’s! Cultivation! Technique!”

“Ah, now that’s a good reaction. Anyway, I made this decision after careful consideration, so for the time being, I’d like you to follow my instructions without complaint. Understood?”

The four people here would be the first in line. Next would come the newly hired Hunters.

I would put them through a rigorous screening process, then turn them into both Hunters and martial artists.

Elites capable of handling two or three Hunters of the same rank with ease.

“Well, then…”

I looked over the still-dazed group one by one, then crooked a finger at one of them.

“Let’s start with Team Leader Choi.”

At that moment, a holographic window appeared over his still-stunned face.

Ding.

SYSTEM

A Quest, Back, Back—Let’s See Your Back!, has been generated!

“…”

That was a title that made me not want to do it for some reason.

SYSTEM

Quest
Back, Back—Let’s See Your Back!
Unlike the Murim, your modern life had been peaceful.
But reality is a cesspool!
Alarmed by this harsh reality, you have decided to pass martial arts on to trustworthy friends.
Whether this choice proves poisonous or beneficial… depends on your decisions and abilities.
May fortune in the martial arts be with you!
Grade: Peak
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Mission: Guide the acquisition of Jin Family’s Cultivation Technique (Incomplete)
Reward: A considerable amount of EXP
Repeat Quest
???
Failure: In the worst-case scenario, suffer qi deviation

"…"

Who the hell came up with this quest title?

I really did need to see his back. I had to send internal energy into the Mingmen acupoint in his lower back and teach him how to circulate it. But after reading that title, I suddenly really, really didn't want to.

"Whew. Team Leader Choi."

"Yes."

"Your back."

"What?"

"Ah, never mind. Take the position I'm about to show you. Butler Kim and everyone else, guard the hospital room and make sure no outsiders enter. Above all, no one is to touch either of us. Understood?"

"Of course."

Butler Kim nodded firmly and cast a spell. Each time he swept his staff through the air while chanting, an invisible barrier spread around the hospital room.

Meanwhile, Team Leader Choi removed his shirt, awkwardly sat cross-legged, and presented his back to me.

"What are you planning to do to me now?"

"…You really know how to phrase things strangely."

I ought to give him qi deviation. Damn it.

I placed my hand on Team Leader Choi's Mingmen acupoint.

From this point on, I had to be extremely careful. Even the most formidable Murim master was practically defenseless while circulating their qi.

"Close your eyes and focus on the mana inside your body. Whatever happens, endure it. Is anything bothering you right now? If so, tell me now."

"My right shoulder blade is a little…"

"Does it hurt?"

"It's itchy."

"…This is driving me crazy. Here?"

Scratch, scratch.

When I reached out and scratched it for him, Team Leader Choi's voice relaxed considerably.

"Yes, right there. That feels wonderful."

"They used to call me the Filial Son's Hand."[1541]

"And the area around my underwear is a little tight, so…"

"Are you crazy? Handle that part yourself. Did I put you in handcuffs?"

"Ah, so that was an option. I'm very tense right now."

[1541] The Korean term hyojason means a back-scratcher and literally translates as "filial son's hand."

"Whew. It's all right. Sorry I got worked up for no reason."

"It isn't your fault, Taekyung. If I'd known this would happen, I would have worn a thong."

Does this guy actually know his way around underwear…?

Team Leader Choi was so nervous that he was blurting out whatever came to mind. I warned him in a low, level voice.

"From now on, if you open your mouth, you're dead. Focus on one thing and one thing only: where the mana is flowing and how."

"Understood."

"Even if your shoulder blade itches, endure it. Even if something gets caught in your underwear, endure it. Do you understand?"

"May I ask what exactly we're about to do?"

"I'm going to move your mana through True Qi Guidance. After that, I'll perform a Small Circulation according to the formula of the Jin Family's Cultivation Technique, then finish by circulating your qi and regulating your breathing."

"…"

"Did you understand any of that? Be honest."

"Be honest?"

"Yes."

After a brief silence, Team Leader Choi answered.

"You lost me at True Qi Guidance."

"Then close your eyes and shut your mouth. If you start wiggling your ass while saying things like, 'Something's caught in my underwear,' I'll kill you before I die."

"I'll keep that in mind."

His answer rang with resolve. I felt Team Leader Choi's body, which had been rigid with tension, gradually relax.

He was a novice taking his first step into the unfamiliar world of martial arts.

It didn't matter how much social experience Team Leader Choi had accumulated, how many languages he spoke, or what kind of knowledge he possessed.

"Then we'll begin."

Everything depended on me now.

After steadying my breathing, I drew internal energy up from my dantian, channeled it through my palm, and sent it into Team Leader Choi's Mingmen acupoint.

Slowly. Carefully.

Ssshh.

The moment the Scorching Yang Qi, imbued with Extreme Yang energy, entered his body, the System fired a signal flare as if it had been waiting.

Ding.

SYSTEM

True Qi Guidance begins.

I had removed the waste accumulated inside Mom and Hayeon's bodies once before.

But in terms of difficulty, this was as different as heaven and earth.

True Qi Guidance meant leading the energy inside another person's body in whatever direction I wanted.

The energy Team Leader Choi possessed was incomparably more abundant than an ordinary person's.

And cleaner than I expected.

No, let me correct that. It wasn't merely cleaner than expected. At this level, it was exceptionally clean.

His muscles and bones were sturdy, his sinews and meridians strong, and his acupoints as clear as a highway at dawn. There was hardly any waste inside him.

What the hell? He said he hadn't learned a Mana Cultivation Method.

Team Leader Choi's Hunter license was B-rank. The energy I usually sensed from him was exactly at that level.

The only things that set him apart from an ordinary B-rank Hunter were the combat instincts born of his sharp mind and the power of his high-end equipment.

Honestly, for Cheon Taemin's only blood descendant, he'd always seemed a little disappointing.

Outstanding leadership. A brilliant mind and decisive judgment.

Despite all that, he was inevitably underestimated.

Anyone would pale beside Cheon Taemin, the hero who had saved all of humanity.

But now I had changed my mind a little.

At this level... a little help would be enough for him to reach a higher realm in no time.

An A-rank Hunter? No. I intended to turn Team Leader Choi into a Peak master. His basic hardware was far too good to leave to rot.

If the others were even half as capable as Team Leader Choi, this would be much easier.

With that carefree thought, I sent the Scorching Yang Qi flowing through him. Before long, more than one jiazi's[1542] worth of my internal energy was winding its way through his body.

[1542] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle, used here to measure accumulated internal energy.

Whoosh!

I felt the body beneath my palm twitch. By now, he was probably experiencing heat unlike anything he had ever felt before.

Paying it no mind, I gathered the energy scattered throughout his body and drove it through dozens of acupoints.

Team Leader Choi had to remember this. From now on, he would have to travel this path on his own thousands, tens of thousands of times.

Once the body remembers, the rest is easy.

The pace was astonishingly fast.

Before long, the energy I was guiding had reached half a jiazi,[1543] and what little waste remained was cleanly burned away by the heat of the Scorching Yang Qi.

Now for the last step.

I had gathered the scattered energy. It was time to store it in the dantian. Once that was done, a complete circulation would be achieved, and he could be said to have taken his first step as a martial artist.

But then…

What the hell is that?

When I reached Team Leader Choi's dantian, I stopped dead.

A massive mass of qi occupied half of his dantian.

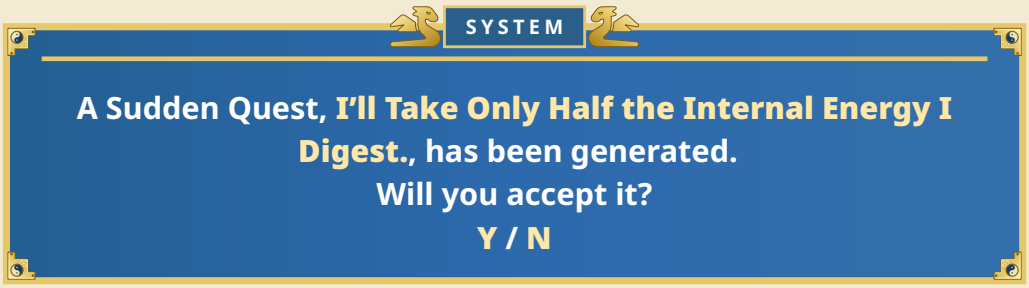
Then came the System notification.

Ding.

[1543] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle, used here to measure accumulated internal energy.

Chapter 292

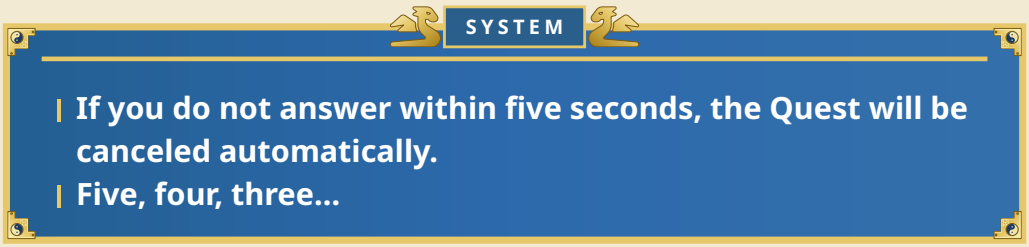
Ding.



Damn it. Why now?

I was dying to check the Quest window.

But I was in the middle of True Qi Guidance. Circulating my own qi would be one thing, but if I let go of control here, I could easily suffer an Internal Injury.



Do I go for it or not?

Judging by the Quest title, it wanted me to do something about that thing in Team Leader Choi's dantian. Even at a glance, it contained well over one jiazi's[1544] worth of energy.

Fuck it. I don't know. It's not like I'm going to die.

Accept!

Ding.

That had been close. The moment the notification confirmed that the Quest had been accepted, I realized what I had to do.

[1544] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle. Here, it measures an equivalent amount of accumulated internal energy.

SYSTEM

The mysterious qi has been dormant for a long time, and its owner lacks the power to control it. Now is the time for you to step forward!

Just as I thought.

I had encountered a situation like this once before in Murim.

I dredged up an old memory.

Hundred-Year-Old Snow Ginseng.

From the moment I first opened my eyes in Murim, the internal energy of the Hundred-Year-Old Snow Ginseng had lain dormant inside my dantian.

It was internal energy that the Third Rate wastrel Jin Taekyung—not me—had been unable to fully digest.

That was when I first learned that even if you consumed an elixir, you couldn't make its power your own unless you had the ability to digest it.

Just like Team Leader Choi now.

He was an outstanding talent compared to that Third Rate wastrel, but without a Mana Cultivation Method, he had no way to control such an enormous reserve of energy—nearly one jiazi's worth.

The Quest wanted me to serve as his digestive aid.

But how does Team Leader Choi have that much energy in the first place?

Now that I thought about it, it pissed me off.

I'd been put through the fucking wringer in Murim and had only just managed to accumulate a little more than one jiazi. What the hell had this guy ever done to have such monstrous energy deposited in his dantian?

Ah, right. His maternal grandfather was Cheon Taemin.

Was this what they meant by being born with a hero's silver spoon?

I gave up on thinking about it. Right now, I needed to focus on breaking down that mysterious energy of unknown origin.

And this time, I was confident.

Let's do this.

A bolt of Scorching Yang Qi shot forward like a spear and plunged into the solid mass of qi. A combined total of more than two jiazi's worth of qi collided and tore into each other.

Rumble.

As the clash erupted inside his dantian, Team Leader Choi's body began to shake violently.

The hospital room had become an impregnable fortress, sealed against all visitors.

Butler Kim, Im Kkeokjeong, and Song Song watched the two young men with fascination.

“Hngh.”

“Hup.”

“Ugh.”

“Kk.”

Every time the veins bulged on Jin Taekyung’s forearm, Team Leader Choi’s body trembled.

Before long, his back arched, and a groan escaped through his clenched teeth.

“Haaagh!”

Song Song muttered as she watched.

“His back arched like a bow…”

Im Kkeokjeong, lying on the bed, asked, “What did you just say, Miss Song?”

“Nothing. I was just saying it was gross and fascinating.”

“Ah, you mean that black sweat?”

“…Yes.”

Song Song had a lot she wanted to say, but she held it in and nodded.

After all, the black sweat pouring from Team Leader Choi’s entire body was every bit as gross and fascinating.

“My God, what even is that…?”

As a Hunter, you saw all kinds of bizarre things. But this was the first time she had ever seen someone sweat black.

The pitch-black, sticky fluid wasn’t particularly abundant, but it gave off an unbelievable stench.

“Ugh, it reeks.”

“Damn, that smell is awful.”

As the two of them pinched their noses, Butler Kim spoke.

“That is waste accumulated inside his body being expelled through his sweat. It is one of the benefits of a Mana Cultivation Method.”

“Waste?”

“Kim hyung,[1545] is that really so impressive?”

“Of course. Even healing magic cannot remove waste from inside the body.”

Song Song thought for a moment, then replied, “It can. A truly top-tier healer could do it. But if what you’re saying is true… that’s incredible. Even healing potions retain trace amounts of Troll toxicity. You’re saying it can flush out that as well.”

“That is one of the remarkable aspects of a Mana Cultivation Method.”

[1545] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older man with whom he is familiar.

“Who created this Mana Cultivation Method, exactly? And how?”

Song Song was an experienced Hunter, but she had never heard the term Mana Cultivation Method in her life. It was just as unfamiliar to Im Kkeokjeong, despite his twenty-year career.

“Exactly. I’ve been a Hunter all these years, and this is the first I’ve heard of anything like this. Martial arts, sorcery, whatever it is.”

“During the Great Cataclysm, the Elder created the first Mana Cultivation Method. It is treated as a closely guarded secret, so it is only natural that neither of you would know of it.”

“When you say the Elder…”

“You are thinking of the right person.”

Cheon Taemin. The hero who had saved all of humanity and the greatest Hunter in the world.

Butler Kim continued slowly.

“A Mana Cultivation Method is a powerful weapon in its own right. Many incidents occurred because of it, and most have vanished from history. It truly was an age of cataclysmic upheaval.”

What had happened? Why had Cheon Taemin’s Mana Cultivation Method fallen into the hands of an ambitious man like Lee Jungryong instead of his sole blood descendant?

Song Song and Im Kkeokjeong had many more questions, but they fell silent.

It wasn’t merely because Butler Kim’s expression had become unbearably bitter. The moment he finished speaking, an ominous change came over the two men.

“Nggh!”

“Hup!”

Jin Taekyung and Team Leader Choi groaned at the same time.

Thick veins bulged across their exposed skin, and deep furrows formed between their brows.

Team Leader Choi’s reaction grew increasingly violent. His entire body trembled as though caught in an earthquake.

“Team Leader Choi!”

“Is something seriously wrong?”

Song Song and Im Kkeokjeong instinctively stepped forward, but Butler Kim held out an arm to stop them.

“No. There can be no physical contact while practicing a Mana Cultivation Method.”

“But…”

“Hunter Jin Taekyung is not someone who would put the Young Master in danger.”

Butler Kim looked at the two of them, concern and trust mingling in his eyes.

The trembling intensified, along with the groans of pain.

Before long, his faith was vindicated.

“Haaah…”

At some point, Team Leader Choi’s lips parted, releasing a calm breath.

It signaled the completion of his first complete circulation. It also meant that he had become a martial artist who had learned the Jin Family’s Cultivation Technique.

“Young Master?”

At Butler Kim’s call, Team Leader Choi’s eyes slowly opened. Astonishment and joy filled them.

“This is…”

Team Leader Choi—Choi Minwoo—clenched his fists tightly.

The massive energy surging from his dantian raced freely through his body.

Normally, his mana would have remained scattered throughout him. Now he could move it at will.

Not only that, but the amount of mana he possessed had nearly doubled.

So this is a Mana Cultivation Method.

As Choi Minwoo calmly examined his condition, he reconsidered.

No. It isn’t the power of a Mana Cultivation Method. It’s the power of the Jin Family’s Cultivation Technique.

And it had only been possible because of one person’s ability.

“Mr. Jin.”

Choi Minwoo slowly turned around. Jin Taekyung still had his eyes closed and was breathing deeply.

The air around him trembled. An active volcano stood there, ready to erupt at any moment.

He’s strong. Unbelievably strong.

Was he always this powerful?

Now that he could properly control his mana, Choi Minwoo could glimpse a fraction of the power Jin Taekyung possessed.

Every breath Jin Taekyung exhaled released waves of fiery qi that heated the hospital room.

It was November. The first snow had fallen only a week ago, yet everyone felt parched, and heat haze shimmered above the floor.

Just then, Choi Minwoo’s eyes slowly widened.

What… is that?

An illusion created by the heat haze? Or something real?

He couldn’t tell. Before he knew it, everyone in the hospital room was staring openmouthed at the sight before them.

Whoosh.

Jin Taekyung's cross-legged body was rising into the air.

Little by little. Slowly, without stopping.

Above his head, blazing blue flames formed the shape of flower petals.

One flower. Then two.

And just as the third and final flower was about to take shape, Jin Taekyung's eyes flew open.

Whoosh! Thud!

Like a bird struck by an arrow, Jin Taekyung plummeted and slammed his butt onto the floor. A piercing scream tore from his throat.

"Fuck! My tailbone!"

The air in the hospital room froze solid.

I screamed at the top of my lungs.

"Aaaargh!"

It hurt. My tailbone hurt from slamming into the floor, but my heart hurt ten times more from losing the perfect opportunity.

"It was almost done! I almost had it!"

Damn it. With only one step left to go, the Supreme Peak realm had slipped out of reach.

I didn't know whether my understanding of martial arts was too shallow or there was some other reason.

Maybe it was both. But what mattered was that I had no idea when another opportunity like this would come.

"Damn iiiit!"

I could have achieved Three Flowers Gather at the Crown in one stroke and become a Supreme Peak master!

As I pounded the floor and wailed, System notifications pierced my ears.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

SYSTEM

Trance has been dispelled!
Internal Energy has risen to 100 years!
You have achieved a great feat! You have acquired the Title I'm a Master!
The Sudden Quest, I'll Take Only Half the Internal Energy I Digest., has been successfully completed!
The Repeat Quest, Back, Back—Let's See Your Back!, has been successfully completed!
The realm of Fire Gate Divine Technique has risen to Seven Stars!
You have acquired a massive amount of EXP!
Level Up!

...
...
...

"Just leave me alone!"

Everything had been perfect. While melting the energy that had been solidified in Team Leader Choi's dantian, I had absorbed half of it. My mind had gone blank, and I had momentarily slipped into a trance.

But...

"Why! Why can't I be happy!"

Gaining half a jiazi's worth of internal energy? Great!

Acquiring a Title, completing Quests, raising the realm of the Fire Gate Divine Technique by one stage, and even leveling up—all of it was great. It was all good, so why!

"Why didn't I reach the Supreme Peak realm!"

As I howled toward the ceiling, whispers reached my ears.

"Has something happened to Mr. Jin?"

"I'm not certain, but I have heard that some people end up crippled while practicing a Mana Cultivation Method..."

"More importantly, did everyone see those flower petals just now? Was I the only one? Why isn't anyone saying anything?"

"Song-i, you saw them too? I thought I'd been dropped into the Goyang flower expo."

The concern and astonishment in their voices snapped me back to my senses.

That was right. It wasn't over yet. If those three had even half as much energy as Team Leader Choi, I might still have a chance to advance to the Supreme Peak realm.

I still have three test subjects.

With the resolve of Admiral Yi Sun-sin before the Battle of Myeongnyang,[1546] I spoke.

“Everyone, pay attention.”

“…?”

“…?”

“Take off your tops immediately. That’s an order.”

Ding.

SYSTEM

The Repeat Quest, Back, Back—Let’s See Your Back!, has been generated!

“Back, back—let’s see your back!”

The others edged away, their faces pale with fear.

[1546] The Battle of Myeongnyang was Admiral Yi Sun-sin’s famous 1597 naval victory, achieved against overwhelming odds.

Chapter 293

Sss. Hooo.

Only the soft sound of breathing drifted through the hospital room. Standing guard at the door, I watched the others focus on circulating their qi and regulating their breathing.

Their cross-legged postures had been awkward at first, but they were gradually getting the hang of it.

Not bad.

Team Leader Choi, Butler Kim, Song Song, and finally Im Kkeokjeong.

Before sunset, all four had succeeded in completing a complete circulation. Before long, they were able to perform the Small Circulation on their own.

Not bad for a first step. No, this is better than I expected.

None of the others possessed energy as vast as Team Leader Choi's, but Butler Kim and Song Song were mages. They were already adept at handling mana and adapted quickly.

The biggest surprise, however, was someone else.

Im Kkeokjeong.

I thought he'd struggle for a while…

I'd forgotten. Im Kkeokjeong was the only Second Awakener among everyone I knew. Had it come from grueling effort? Or a stroke of heavenly luck?

Whatever the reason, Im Kkeokjeong had already once broken past the limits given to him.

Maybe there was a reason he underwent a Second Awakening.

Judging by what he had shown me, Im Kkeokjeong might have the greatest potential for growth.

He was still a D-rank Hunter. He had plenty of steps left to climb.

I won't have to worry about the aftereffects of his injuries, either.

Repeatedly circulating his qi would naturally improve his Muscles and Bones and Sinews and Meridians.

If Im Kkeokjeong could overcome the psychological issues, such as his trauma, he would be able to return to the Guild before long.

And then…

The Guild will have changed quite a bit by then, too.

The changes had already begun. Lee Jungryong had drawn the knife hidden up his sleeve and turned it against us. Now he owed us compensation for it.

With that compensation as its foundation, the Peace Guild would achieve astonishing growth. These people needed to stand at the forefront.

Someone had to run the Guild. Someone else had to identify talented, trustworthy people and turn them into loyal members of the Peace Guild.

And those people would be given martial arts.

We need blades of our own.

The moment that thought crossed my mind, Team Leader Choi finished his Small Circulation and opened his eyes with an exhale. A sharp gleam flashed through them.

Starting with him, the others opened their eyes one after another.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Thanks to your excellent instruction, several people have reached One Star in the Jin Family's Cultivation Technique.

The Title Trainee has changed to Training Instructor!

A martial arts drill instructor, huh.

Was this heaven telling me to work them to death for a while?

I grinned at the people still savoring the afterglow of circulating their qi.

A week passed in the blink of an eye.

During that time, Lee Jungryong and the Peace Guild secretly concluded their negotiations, two more mutated Gate incidents occurred, and a post on a Hunter community site drew a great deal of attention.

How I Got Hired by the Peace Guild

I'm a C-rank Hunter who used to work on the Security Team of a certain Guild.

I was originally with a major Guild, but my senior coworker was such a pain in the ass (he's a traitor to the country) that the stress got too bad. I quit a few days ago and was browsing job sites when I saw that the Peace Guild had opened its general recruitment. So I applied on a whim, you know?

Then I didn't hear anything back, so I figured I'd been rejected.

I already knew their selection process was brutal, so I wasn't expecting anything in the first place.

But they contacted me after two weeks and told me to report to work tomorrow!

Anyone else starting with me tomorrow, raise your hand!

> ㄴ (Best comment): You only submitted an application to the Peace Guild and got hired? Hahahahahaha. Some unemployed bastard's sitting there writing a web novel.
>
> ㄴ ???: Hyung.[1547] This bastard's laughing.
>
> ㄴ ???: Leave him alone. At least let him dream about joining the Peace Guild.
>
> ㄴ That ending.
>
> ㄴ The OP is seriously an idiot. If you're going to write fiction, at least make it believable. The Peace Guild rejected people from the top teams of major Guilds, but some C-rank Security Team guy sends in an application and gets hired? Hahaha. Thanks for the laugh.
>
> ㄴ Is it really that brutal?
>
> ㄴ I applied this time, and the competition was 47:1. They even made us take personality and aptitude tests before the interview.
>
> ㄴ What the hell? Personality and aptitude tests? Is this high school?
>
> ㄴ Proof that the Peace Guild thinks Hunters are weaklings.
>
> ㄴ On the other hand, their basic allowance and incentives are incomparably higher than anywhere else.
>
> ㄴ Please think of me as a weakling.
>
> ㄴ Come to think of it, the Peace Guild must be loaded. People are even transferring over from major Guilds.
>
> ㄴ Exactly. I heard they have exclusive rights to more than twenty Gates alone.
>
> ㄴ (OP): I'm the person who wrote this. I just called HR, and they said I was hired because Jin Taekyung told them to hire me.
>
> ㄴ Hahahaha. How would Lord Fuck even know an unemployed loser like you? Stop writing fiction and go to sleep.
>
> ㄴ Thanks for the web novel. I enjoyed it.
>
> ㄴ By the way, are there any decent web novels these days?
>
> ㄴ I recommend Login Murim. It's pretty good once you get through the early modern-world chapters.
>
> ㄴ Welcome, Zerobic.
>
> ㄴ That bastard author has been serializing it for ten years and hasn't released extra chapters even once.

Under normal circumstances, the post would have been dismissed as the ramblings of an attention seeker.

[1547] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older male acquaintance.

However, the post proudly took first place in the weekly rankings, accompanied by countless recommendations and comments from people making a pilgrimage to the site.

All because of another post uploaded the following evening.

Guys, that web-novel villain from yesterday was for real;

I'm one of the people who got accepted by the Peace Guild this time. Today, I was touring the Guild house with the other new hires when I saw Lord Fuck, you know?

I was just watching him from a distance, terrified by the majesty of him dragging around slippers with the soles torn off, when he suddenly made a U-turn, grabbed one of us, and asked if he was from the  Guild Security Team.

The dopey-looking guy said yes, and Lord Fuck started laughing like a maniac, yelled, "Irasshaimase!"[1548] and all that shit, then left.

I knew Lord Fuck had a weird personality, but he seems to be an even bigger lunatic than I imagined.

(Photo attached.)

I'm posting all the proof before I go so nobody says I'm lying.

> ㄴ (Best comment): I'm the person who got the best comment last time. In apology, I'm going to perform a full-body prostration and leave.
>
> ㄴ Looking at the proof photo, I think this might actually be real…?
>
> ㄴ Wait, what? How does a C-rank Hunter from a Security Team end up at the Peace Guild?
>
> ㄴ It actually happened…
>
> ㄴ (OP): The web-novel villain was assigned to the Security Team instead of a raid team.
>
> ㄴ Oh, then I can see why they'd take him. At that level, it's not even nepotism. He basically just changed jobs.
>
> ㄴ They say Korea runs on blood ties, regional ties, and school ties. I guess he's only human, but I'm still a little disappointed in Lord Fuck.
>
> ㄴ Who the hell are you to be disappointed?
>
> ㄴ Here's why the bastards bashing Lord Fuck are idiots: Lord Fuck walks around in slippers with the soles peeling off because he donated almost his entire fortune to establish a foundation for Gate victims.
>
> ㄴ The comment above is stating facts. Anyone insulting Lord Fuck needs to be beaten half to death with a slipper before they'll come to their senses.
>
> ㄴ Keep showing people goodwill, and they'll start thinking you're Dooly.[1549]

[1548] Irasshaimase is a Japanese greeting used to welcome customers into a shop or restaurant.

> ㄴ But where did the OP go? Tell us more.
>
> ㄴ (OP): I'm on my way to a company dinner.
>
> ㄴ A welcome party for the new hires?
>
> ㄴ (OP): Yeah. I've already been in the car for an hour. We must be going pretty far.
>
> ㄴ Oh. Is Lord Fuck coming too?
>
> ㄴ (OP): Yeah. But I don't see the Guild Master or any of the other Team Leaders.
>
> ㄴ The Peace Guild must be great at team building. Maybe it's because they're still a new Guild?
>
> ㄴ (OP): I'm not sure about that, but… the atmosphere feels kind of bad. I asked a Senior who joined earlier than me, and he told me to sleep as much as I could on the way there.
>
> ㄴ Why?
>
> ㄴ Maybe the company dinner is going to last a long time. Who likes drinking with people they aren't even close to?
>
> ㄴ (OP): Maybe? Oh, I think we're here.
>
> ㄴ Don't drink too much. And don't forget to come back with the rest of the story.
>
> ㄴ Have fun!
>
> ㄴ (OP): It looks like a good restaurant. I'm looking forward to seeing what we're having for dinner, haha. I'll be back soon.

That was the OP's final comment.

"We'll be having dinner inside a Gate."

Murmurs rose from all around at my declaration.

"Excuse me?"

"Huh?"

"Sorry, but did I hear you correctly?"

"I think you said we're having dinner at a Gate. I must have misheard."

"Ah, right."

I didn't even need to look at their faces. The ones having that innocent conversation were the new hires on their first day.

[1549] Dooly is a Korean cartoon dinosaur whose catchphrase is "Hoi!" The line plays on the similar sound of hoi ("goodwill") and means that repeated goodwill can be taken for granted.

The people who had joined only two or three weeks earlier, however, reacted differently.

“I knew this would happen.”

“Ah, fuck…”

“Good thing I brought potions.”

“Hyung,[1550] do you have any arrows to spare?”

“Yeah. I brought an extra two hundred for emergencies, just in case.”

“Then could I get a hundred?”

They hadn’t joined even a month apart, but their reactions were worlds apart.

The veterans swore under their breath like they were sighing, then swiftly pulled armor and equipment from their backpacks.

Clack! Clack! Clack!

Was this how a teacher felt?

A satisfied smile spread across my face at the results of repeated training.

I turned toward the greenhorns who still had no idea what was happening and asked,

“You all brought everything with you, right?”

The new hires nodded.

“Uh, yes. You told us to bring it all, so…”

“Put your bags down, take out your equipment, and put it on.”

“Excuse me? Is this some kind of mock battle?”

“Mock battle, my ass. You don’t improve much doing that. Real combat is best.”

“…?”

Suspicion crept into their innocent eyes.

“Then, perhaps…”

“Are we really going into a Gate?”

“Yes. A raid to celebrate joining the Peace Guild! What do you think? Sounds great, right?”

“…”

“The new people don’t seem too excited. What does everyone else think?”

The people I’d worked to the bone for the past few weeks gritted their teeth and shouted.

“That’s a wonderful idea!”

“As expected of King Taekyung.”

“Wow. This. Is. Great!”

Hmm. Just as I thought.

[1550] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older male acquaintance.

This was also the effect of learning. They clearly remembered what had happened to the few brave souls who had openly contradicted my opinions.

The logic of we can't be the only ones who suffer had probably played a part as well.

Exactly. Everyone should suffer together.

If the new hires were Pomeranians, the others were already Tosa mastiffs.[1551]

With the atmosphere blazing with the determination to die together, the new hires hesitated before shouting,

"B-But nobody told us about this! The notice said we'd only be doing a simple workshop for the first week after joining the Guild…"

"Yes. This is the workshop."

"What Guild holds a workshop inside a Gate? For an entire week!"

"The Peace Guild."

"That's ridiculous!"

"Does everyone else think so, too?"

I turned my head slightly. The Senior Tosa mastiffs[1552] who had tasted hell for several weeks bared their teeth and shouted.

"Why wouldn't it make sense? It does! Absolutely!"

"Obviously this is a workshop!"

"Who rents a vacation house for a workshop these days? You're supposed to bond by killing monsters together inside a Gate!"

"We can't be the only ones getting fucked!"

That last shout was so blatant it bordered on desperate. Hearing it forced me to reflect deeply.

I guess I need to work them even harder.

They couldn't be allowed to think of this as suffering. I planned to condition—or rather, train—them until they accepted all of it as perfectly natural.

"All right, everyone quiet!"

Ding.

SYSTEM

The effect of the Title Training Instructor activates!
The trainees who heard your shout become tense!

"Form ranks!"

"Form raaanks!"

"Too quiet! Form ranks!"

[1551] The Tosa mastiff is a Japanese dog breed developed for fighting.
[1552] The Tosa mastiff is a Japanese dog breed developed for fighting.

“Form raaanks!”
Even after repeating the command back in unison, they all looked dazed.
I smiled at their bitter expressions.
“Now, follow me inside in order. Left foot. Left foot.”
Clack! Clack! Clack!
The human train set off toward the Gate.

Chapter 294

A week ago, after several days of relentless negotiations with Lee Jungryong's side, Team Leader Choi got everything he wanted.

Exclusive rights to more than twenty Gates, real estate, and an enormous amount of cash. I didn't know the exact figure, but the total value was clearly astronomical.

They were valuable spoils we could never have obtained if the ten Black Hunters and the close aides dispatched by Myeongdong Guild Master Park Tae Seop hadn't fallen into our hands.

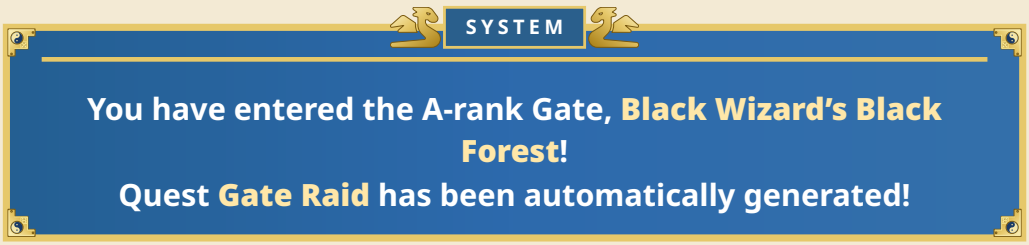
The same went for this place.

Calling out the cadence, I led the way through the mana field.

Ssshhhk.

That sticky, unpleasant, yet familiar sensation unique to mana washed over me, and everything around me changed.

Ding.



"Left foot, left foot! One, two, three, four! Halt!"

"One, two! Fall in!"

By the time the human train came to a stop amid crisp call-and-response, more than fifty people had entered the Gate.

Darkness blanketed the forest, and faint moonlight filtered through the gaunt branches.

The new hires, who had realized what was happening too late, looked around in panic.

"Gasp!"

"W-We're screwed."

"Wait. What rank is this Gate? Why is it so huge?"

The third-week Tosa mastiffs, on the other hand, were completely unfazed.

"Black Wizard's Black Forest again?"

"Ugh, I'm going to puke."

"Good thing I brought my war hammer."

They had joined less than a month apart, but the difference between them was enormous.

The day-one pups listening to the Tosa mastiffs turned deathly pale.

“B-Black Wizard’s Black Forest?”

“It’s an A-rank Gate!”

An A-rank Gate: Black Wizard’s Black Forest.

Even people who knew nothing about the place could get a rough idea from the name alone. The eerie atmosphere, the forest so unsettling that the mere sight of it sent chills down your spine.

This was a realm ruled by a black wizard—a necromancer.

“Lord Fuck! Senior Jin Taekyung!”

One of the pups rushed over and pleaded with me.

“Please, can’t you let me out?”

“Why?”

“I’m really scared of ghosts. Regular monsters are fine, but ghouls and skeletons… I don’t think I can handle them.”

“Trauma?”

“Nothing that serious. I’m just scared.”

“Perfect. This is a great chance to experience them in 4D.[1553] They’re monsters, anyway.”

“No, that’s not…”

“And I’m pretty sure you wrote on your Guild application that you didn’t have any problems like that.”

“I only wrote that so I’d get accepted in the first place… Please. I can’t even watch horror movies with my girlfriend.”

“Oh, you have a girlfriend. I see. Over here!”

I crooked a finger.

From among the grinning Tosa mastiffs, one man shot forward like a bullet.

“You called?”

“Yeah.”

It was Kim Jinsoo, who had quietly taken on the role of leader among the Tosa mastiffs.

He had good leadership skills and excellent combat ability, so whenever we went on a raid together, he served as my right hand.

Of course, I’d long since stopped speaking formally to him.

“I have a special assignment for you. It concerns this gentleman here.”

“Yes.”

“Put him in front.”

The pup had just begun to sigh in relief when he sucked in a sharp breath.

[1553] 4D cinema adds physical effects, such as moving seats, wind, or water, to a film.

“D-Did you say in front?”

“Why? Is there a problem? Judging by that tower shield, you’re clearly a tank.”

“But…”

“If you want to sit this out, go ahead. Just be prepared to get fired.”

“F-Fired?”

“If you refuse to join a raid because you’re afraid of ghosts, why would I keep employing you? Besides, are there any ghosts inside a Gate? They’re all monsters. Jinsoo, am I wrong?”

Kim Jinsoo answered without hesitation.

“You are absolutely right—a hundred, a thousand times over.”

“If everything here were a ghost, why would I bring Hunters? I’d bring exorcists instead. Right?”

“Absolutely right—a thousand, ten thousand times over.”

“That’s our Jinsoo. You certainly have a way with words.”

“Thank you.”

“So, would you like to remain a Hunter with the Peace Guild, or would you rather get fired and change careers to become an exorcist?”

The pup replied, his face rigid.

“I-I’ll be a Hunter.”

“Then if you run away during combat, I’ll send you to heaven with my own hands. Okay?”

“O-Okay.”

“Okay. Front! Okay! Heaven!”

I waved my hand, and Kim Jinsoo grabbed the man by the arm and dragged him away.

We’d put them through a fairly rigorous selection process, but there was always one guy like that wherever you went.

What? He’s so scared of ghosts that he can’t even watch a horror movie with his girlfriend?

Damn it. What a load of bullshit.

I wasn’t angry about the girlfriend part. Really.

“…”

Whooosh.

The eerie wind circling through the forest made the empty space at my side feel cold. I shuddered once, then stepped toward the trees.

The conversation behind me gradually faded into the distance.

“E-Excuse me, mister.”

The frightened voice of one of the pups mixed with the Tosa mastiff’s blunt reply.

“What?”

“Where is Hunter Jin Taekyung going?”

“He’s going to round up the prey.”

“What?”

“That guy’s nickname is the Pied Piper.”

The Tosa mastiff added cheerfully,

“I can’t be the only one going through hell. Let’s do our best together.”

“…”

I roamed the forest, making enough noise to ensure everything nearby could hear me, and it didn’t take long to get a response.

Crack! Rumble!

—Guaaaar!

—Ngh… nghhh…

Click, clack, clatter-clatter-clatter!

Grotesque cries rang out as the corpses sleeping beneath the earth and inside their graves awakened.

Ghouls with rotting flesh dripping from their bodies. Skeletons with not a scrap of flesh left on their gaunt white bones.

In an instant, the cursed dead known as Undead Monsters covered the forest and hills.

“Hey, hey! I’m going slowly, so make sure you keep up! Got it?”

—Guaaaaaar!

Rat-tat-tat-tat!

The old image of zombies shambling around with limp bodies was hopelessly outdated.

More than once, seeing these bastards sprint had made me wonder if they had trained at Taereung Athletes’ Village.[1554]

Of course, they still weren’t fast enough to catch me.

We’ve got new hires today, so I should bring back a smaller group.

I raced through the forest, glancing over my shoulder every so often to check their numbers.

There were roughly a hundred and fifty of them.

That was three times the number of people on our side, but even this was fewer than usual.

[1554] Taereung Athletes’ Village was a training complex for South Korean national-team athletes.

For one thing, ghouls and skeletons weren't particularly powerful monsters. For another, our side had prepared thoroughly and developed plenty of nerve.

There's a reason I call them Tosa mastiffs.

Three times their number was standard, and sometimes I'd brought back more than ten times as many monsters. After I'd shown them the threshold of hell a few times, a fierce glint had begun to burn in their eyes.

Of course, whenever things seemed genuinely dangerous, I stepped in from time to time even if I had been watching from the sidelines. Thanks to that, we had suffered injuries, but there had been no deaths.

After we repeated the process several times a day, I became both their common enemy and someone they trusted.

I don't want to go this far, but… I don't have a choice.

This was an intensive crash course. I needed to plant weeds capable of surviving harsh conditions in the Peace Guild's yard as quickly as possible.

In less than a month, several people had already given up and transferred to other teams. I hadn't tried to stop them, nor did I resent them for leaving.

The decision is theirs to make.

Everyone had a life of their own. I had only stepped into theirs for a little while.

I could present them with choices, but I had no right to force them to choose.

Ssshhhoooom!

As befitted an A-rank Gate, Black Wizard's Black Forest was vast.

But the area I had explored was only a tiny fraction of it. Keeping my pace under control, I soon saw the Gate entrance ahead.

"Here they come!"

"Jin Taekyung, you son of a bitch…"

"Still, maybe because it's their first time, he didn't bring that many."

"Gasp! Skeletons!"

Some loudly announced the monsters' arrival, while others cursed me or calmly assessed the enemy's numbers.

The greenhorns had no real combat experience yet, and I could see them shrinking back in fear.

Of course, the human Tosa mastiffs who had already experienced my brutal training weren't about to stand idle.

"What the fuck are you doing over there? The line's giving way!"

"Don't back up. Hold your shield tight. What? You need to piss? Then piss yourself!"

"New people, get a grip. That Jin Taekyung bastard isn't going to help you. He even started a charity foundation in advance because someone might die here!"

"…"

They were making me out to be complete trash.

It was absurd, but I held my tongue. Fine. That was what it took to snap the rookies out of their panic.

People badmouth even the king behind his back. What can you do?

Of course, I memorized every face.

As I approached the Hunters who had already formed their battle line, I sprang into the tallest tree and shouted,

“Shields together!”

Rumble!

Everyone moved in perfect unison.

Like dogs left staring up after the chicken they had been chasing, the undead monsters gazed toward the distant treetop before turning their grotesque faces away.

Then they spotted the more than fifty Hunters arrayed on the hill where the Gate entrance stood.

One of the skeletons raised its Bone Sword high and unleashed a hideous shriek.

—GRAAAAR!

It wasn’t an ordinary skeleton.

The bones that should have been exposed were wrapped in battered armor, and the Bone Sword raised as though to pierce the moon blazed with an ominous aura blacker than the night sky.

“A Skeleton Knight?”

Just because they were all skeletons didn’t mean they were all the same rank.

Skeleton Soldiers, Mages, Warriors…

Their abilities and strength varied wildly from one individual to the next, and Skeleton Knights were powerful monsters universally recognized as A-rank.

I’ve encountered them often in the Black Forest, but there’s something different about that one.

Encountering an A-rank monster like a Skeleton Knight inside an A-rank Gate was perfectly normal. They were stationed throughout the Black Forest, each commanding lower-level Warriors and Mages.

I narrowed my eyes and studied it.

Then—

—GRAAAH!

—GROOOAR!

Tss-tss-tss-tss!

Two more monstrous cries rang out, followed by two surging streams of aura.

I muttered in surprise,

“Three Skeleton Knights in one group?”

That was a first.

A skeleton horde was an army, and its knight was the general who led it. Every independent army had only one general.

Did three hordes form an alliance?

But my prediction was spectacularly wrong.

Rattling their bones, the two newly appeared knights approached the Skeleton Knight that had emerged first. They dropped to one knee and drove their Bone Swords into the ground.

It was an unmistakable act of submission.

Purple light flashed within the empty hollows where the first knight's eyes should have been.

Fwoooosh!

The light bursting from that abyssal darkness was intense.

The moment our gazes met, it erupted into blazing flame.

—GRAAAAR!

Krrrck!

The creature roared, and its body began to change.

Every bone grew thicker and longer, its surface gleaming with a strange black sheen.

The transformation didn't end there.

Shrrrraaaak!

Its armor, rusted and cracked in places, restored itself as though time were flowing backward. Broken chains reconnected, and the faded skull emblem on its chest regained its vivid color.

Finally, a dark green cloak fluttered in the wind.

Once the transformation was complete, the creature stared silently at its palm.

Instead of bare white bone, it saw a hand encased in a sturdy gauntlet.

And then—

"Not. Bad."

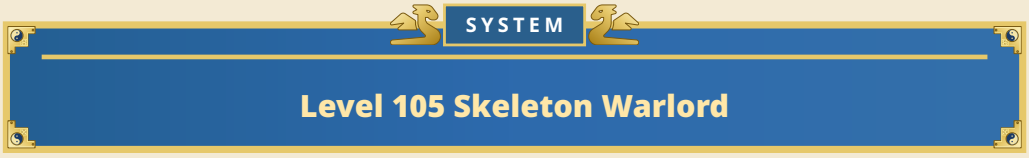
"..."

The air surrounding the forest trembled.

Everyone, myself included, stared at it in speechless silence.

A Skeleton Knight. A great knight reduced to a corrupted undead.

But it was no longer a Skeleton Knight.



“Come. Down. Hu. Man.”

Its blazing purple eyes fixed directly on me.

Chapter 295

Gleaming armor. A dark green cloak fluttering like wings. Purple ghost fire burning in empty eye sockets.

And then… there was a voice.

“Come. Down. Hu. Man.”

The moment I heard that metallic, scraping voice, I nearly fell out of the tree.

It spoke?

This wasn’t the first time something like this had happened. The Wyvern I’d killed in the past, “One-Eyed Carus,” had been capable of speech too.

But a monster speaking wasn’t something to take lightly.

“A Named Monster…”

The words escaped me like a groan.

That was right. As far as anyone knew, only Named Monsters were capable of speech.

And that very Named Monster had just been born before my eyes.

No—not born.

It had evolved.

Evolution?

I had never heard of or seen a Named Monster appearing this way before.

What is this, Digimon?[1555]

Wait, are monsters that kind of monster? They can evolve too?

I was already about five hundred light-years removed from an ordinary life, and even I was bewildered. The other Guild members’ reactions went without saying.

“What is that?”

“Wait, didn’t it just say something?”

“I’ve never seen anything like that, not even in a monster encyclopedia…”

Of course they hadn’t.

Named Monsters were mutants. Every individual possessed different traits and varied in strength. No one could know what one would be like until it appeared.

But why now, of all times?

I licked my dry lips.

[1555] Digimon is a Japanese media franchise in which creatures can evolve into more powerful forms.

I didn't know how powerful that Skeleton Warlord was, but it clearly possessed strength worthy of a Named Monster.

And on top of that, there are two A-rank Skeleton Knights.

The remaining hundred and fifty or so were all B-rank Skeleton Mages or Warriors. They were practically an army, which made them extremely troublesome.

Still, if I took on the Warlord and the two Knights—their commander and core fighting force—it was a battle we could win.

We've been raiding nonstop.

Only fifty Guild members had entered the Gate.

But more than half of them were Tosa mastiffs[1556] who had endured my whip and survived hellish special training.

They had fought so many Skeletons over the past week that they were sick of the sight of them. As long as they kept their heads, they could handle enemies two or three times their number.

And the new recruits are plenty capable too.

We paid salaries at least as high as the major Guilds, so we had selected only the best.

This time, I had personally taken part in multiple evaluations, including the interviews, and even scored their potential for growth.

To weather the typhoon that was Ares Guild, I had selected the finest saplings and transplanted them into the Peace Guild's front yard.

We'll have to accept some risk, but this is a fight worth taking on.

Team Leader Choi and the other three had suspended most of their Guild duties to focus entirely on training the Jin Family's cultivation technique.

The battle would have been much easier with them here, but even if they had been present, I wouldn't have sent them in.

A dagger hidden up one's sleeve was deadly precisely because it remained hidden. I couldn't reveal it with so many eyes watching.

Having reached a decision, I called out to one person.

"Jinsoo!"

"Yes, sir!"

Kim Jinsoo, who was effectively serving as deputy team leader, answered promptly. I pointed my dagger at the Skeleton Warlord.

The green ghost fire in its hollow eye sockets remained fixed on me.

"That's a Named Monster."

A sharp gasp rose from among the Guild members.

[1556] The Tosa is a Japanese fighting-dog breed. Taekyung uses "Tosa mastiffs" as a nickname for the experienced trainees.

Most of them had been Hunters for less than two years. A person could spend twenty years in this field without ever encountering a Named Monster, and now they had to fight one. The tension was plain on their faces.

But Kim Jinsoo was different. His surprise lasted only a moment before he calmly nodded.

“I see.”

“Oh? You’re doing a pretty good job pretending to be calm.”

“I’m a little shaken myself, but we can’t just stand around in a daze and let it kill us.”

Well, look at him.

I’d known from the beginning that he had guts, but this was unusual courage for someone in his first year.

Perhaps sensing my gaze, Kim Jinsoo smiled faintly and added, “If the situation were hopeless, you would’ve given the signal to retreat long ago. Am I right?”

“Hmm.”

“…Uh, did I get that wrong?”

“No.”

I chuckled and shook my head.

“You’re right. This is a fight we can take on.”

“Oh.”

“I’ll handle those three over there. You take the rest. How long can you hold out?”

Kim Jinsoo thought for a moment before answering.

“The new recruits don’t have much experience… but we should still be able to hold out for an hour.”

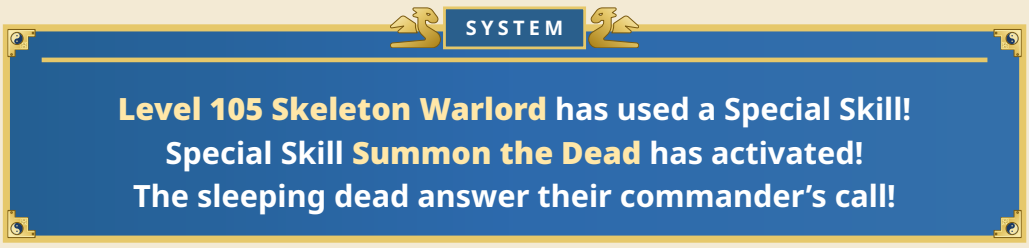
“An hour?”

“Yes. At least an hour.”

The instant Kim Jinsoo answered confidently, the Skeleton Warlord slowly opened its jaws and released a strange, indescribable resonance.

“GRAAAAAH!”

Beep!



It was a howl that sent a chill down my spine—and a cry that awakened the cursed dead.

Crack. Crack-crack-crack!

Soil burst upward, and the ground trembled. Piles of pale bones rose all around us, assembled themselves into skeletons, and joined the ranks.

Bone Swords caked with dirt. Wooden shields tangled with fine roots. Among the Skeleton Warriors, I could even see Mages wearing necklaces engraved with skulls.

There were even two more A-rank Skeleton Knights.

Adding the newcomers to the existing Skeleton army brought their numbers to well over three hundred.

"..."

"..."

I watched in silence for a moment before speaking.

"Jinsoo."

"Yes."

"Can you still do an hour?"

"Uh, well..."

"Be honest."

"...I think we can manage about thirty minutes."

"Really?"

"Yes. The situation has gotten a little worse, but we can probably do it."

Kim Jinsoo continued, staring uneasily at the Skeleton Warlord.

"As long as that bastard doesn't pull any more crap."

"I think it will."

"No way."

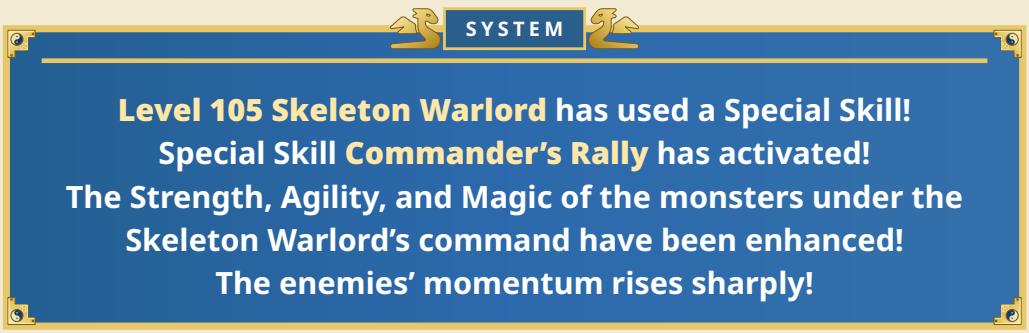
"GRAAAAAH!"

"See? I was right."

Kim Jinsoo groaned.

"Oh, come on."

Beep!



The Skeleton Warlord howled!

The effect was incredible!

“Wow…”

I activated Qi Sense and saw that every single one of them had gained five Levels.

The aura radiating from the Skeleton army of more than three hundred was on an entirely different level from before.

I glanced aside and found Kim Jinsoo staring blankly.

“Thirty minutes. Still possible?”

“…”

The bastard was cursing me with his eyes now.

To be fair, even I thought that was asking too much. Clicking my tongue, I gave my next order without hesitation.

“Fall back slowly. Don’t provoke them.”

“How far should we retreat?”

“To the path right in front of the Gate. Make sure we can get out at any time.”

“The path is narrow, so it should be easier to fight them there.”

“Exactly.”

As Kim Jinsoo had said, the path in front of the Gate was so narrow that five grown men could barely pass shoulder to shoulder.

Even Skeletons, whose frames were naturally thinner, could only fit seven or eight abreast.

However…

“Go straight out.”

There was no head-on battle in my revised plan.

“Huh?”

“Take the kids and get outside the Gate.”

Dismay spread across Kim Jinsoo’s face.

“Then what about you, Senior?”

“Do you think they’ll play tag while you leave? Someone has to buy time.”

“Senior! That’s dangerous!”

“Jinsoo. No—my dear Peace Guild members.”

I looked down solemnly. Fifty Guild members craned their necks like baby birds as they stared up at me.

“I—and the Peace Guild—always put the safety of our Guild members first.”

Several of the Tosa mastiffs[1557] muttered just loudly enough for me to hear.

“That’s the biggest load of bullshit I’ve heard all year.”

“I think I nearly died seven times this week.”

“More like ten for me.”

[1557]The Tosa is a Japanese fighting-dog breed. Taekyung uses “Tosa mastiffs” as a nickname for the experienced trainees.

Meanwhile, the eyes of the day-one pups trembled.

“Senior!”

“Ahh, Lord Fuck!”[1558]

“You’d go this far for us…!”

I continued in a voice thick with emotion.

“I’ll risk any danger for your safety. Even if my arm gets blown off! Even if my leg gets blown off! I will send every one of you back into the arms of those who love you!”

Several of them cried out in a surge of emotion.

“We can fight!”

“Please let us fight alongside you!”

I bit my lip hard and shook my head.

“I can’t! Someone has to make the sacrifice, and in a situation like this, I’m the best one to step forward!”

“But still…!”

Whoooosh! Shrrrk!

Before anyone could continue, an ominous black aura came hurtling toward us.

The Skeleton Warlord sliced horizontally through a massive tree dozens of meters tall[1559] and several meters around,[1560] then shouted in a voice like metal scraping against metal.

“I. Will. Kill. Every. Last. One. Of. You!”

Swish. Tap!

I leaped lightly from the tree and shouted, “Everyone, return to the Gate! I’ll cover the rear!”

This time, no one tried to stop me.

The army of more than three hundred Skeletons had begun to advance.

Clatter. Thud. Clatter. Thud.

The monsters marched in perfect ranks and files, their momentum utterly menacing.

The Warlord’s Special Skill had filled their steps with power, and faint lights flickered within their hollow skulls.

“GRAAAAH!”

When one of the Skeleton Knights, serving as a deputy commander, let out a fierce cry, rusted arrows and attack magic rose from the rear and shot toward the Peace Guild members.

[1558] “Lord Fuck” is an online nickname Taekyung acquired after accidentally swearing during a broadcast.

[1559] Dozens of meters is roughly dozens of yards; 20 meters is about 66 ft.

[1560] Several meters in circumference is roughly 10–30 ft.

Fwish-fwish-fwish! Whoooosh!

“Block them!”

“Tanks! Keep your shields up! Continue falling back slowly!”

“Covering fire!”

The two forces were about three hundred paces apart. To retreat safely, we needed to widen the distance further.

I swung White Flame and blocked the army’s advance.

“You bastards! How dare you threaten our precious Peace Guild members!”

Sssshhhk! Crack!

The power behind my spear shattered bone, while Spear Energy erupted from its transparent spearhead and slashed in every direction.

The moment I took down ten of them in a single blow, three Skeleton Knights charged me at once.

“GRAAAAH!”

“GRAAAAH!”

Sssshhhk!

Three streams of black aura narrowly grazed different parts of my body.

Blood trickled from my nape where the pressure had sliced it open, and anguished cries erupted from the Guild members who had already reached the narrow path.

“Aah! Senior!”

“Look out!”

Clang-clang-clang!

I deflected the relentless barrage of aura and shouted as if struggling to speak.

“Go! I’ll catch up soon!”

“But…!”

“Jinsoo! Get going!”

After a moment’s hesitation, Kim Jinsoo began leading the Guild members toward the Gate.

“You have to come back!”

I gave him a faint smile and nodded.

“Yeah.”

“I’m sorry, Senior!”

“It’s fine. Go!”

“Urgh!”

Kim Jinsoo hesitated until the very end, then disappeared beyond the Gate.

Now only the hundreds of Skeletons packed tightly into the narrow path and I remained.

“F. O. O. L. I. S. H.”

Clatter-clatter-clatter!

The bones parted like the Red Sea, and the Skeleton Warlord emerged through the opening.

“H. A. V. E. Y. O. U. R. E. S. I. G. N. E. D. Y. O. U. R. S. E. L. F. T. O. D. I. E, H. U. M. A. N?”

But I wasn’t listening.

Only after sweeping my gaze over every inch of our surroundings did I finally sigh in relief.

“Phew. They’re finally all gone.”

“…?”

“Those kids are way too sentimental for their own good. When the Team Leader tells you to leave, you’re supposed to run. What do they mean, help? Right?”

I wiped the blood from my nape. I’d tried to keep the cut shallow, but it was deeper than expected.

About 0.2 centimeters?[1561]

“Damn. What a waste of blood.”

The purple ghost fire in the Warlord’s eye sockets flickered uneasily.

“W. H. A. T. I. N. T. H. E. W. O. R. L. D. A. R. E. Y. O. U. P. L. O. T. T. I. N. G?”

“Nothing much.”

I smiled with satisfaction at the EXP—no, the Skeleton army—filling the narrow path without a single gap.

“You’re all going to die here. That’s all you need to know.”

“W. H. A. T?”

Instead of answering, I drew a deep breath.

The muscles throughout my body writhed, and the fire dragon coiled inside my dantian began to move according to the formula of the Fire Gate Divine Technique.

Then, in the next instant, I became one with the spear in my hand and shot forward.

“One Annihilation.”

KRAAAAAAASH!

[1561] 0.2 centimeters is about 0.08 in.

Chapter 296

How much time had passed?

He could no longer remember his name, his family, his friends or lover… He could not even remember where he had been born or what kind of life he had lived.

After passing through a long, deep darkness, he suddenly came to his senses and found himself in a forest.

Where is this?

The question lasted only a moment.

Soon, the instincts of a monster seized him, and he began fighting without purpose. He fought the humans who had once been his own kind, and he fought monsters as well.

An outstanding knight in life, he grew ever stronger as he cultivated his mana. Eventually, he even surpassed the black wizard who ruled the vast Black Forest and controlled every dead thing sleeping within it.

“Y-you bastard! How dare a mere Skeleton Knight…!”

“GRAAAAAH!”

Crack!

Thus, the fallen knight became the new master of the Black Forest.

And at last, he rose to become a chosen being.

Commander of the Skeleton army.

Skeleton Warlord was his new name.

So this is what it feels like?

It was astonishing. Everything around him had changed. He did not know why, but the mana flowing through the Black Forest had grown denser, and immense power surged through his body despite it being nothing more than bones.

To him, newly reborn as something else, a mere handful of humans was utterly insignificant.

There aren’t many of them, and they’re all terrified.

To humans, death was simply another name for fear.

Now that he was already one of the dead, the humans’ terror was nothing but amusing.

Run. Then bring me more—more lives!

He was now the master of the Black Forest and commander of the dead.

The larger groups of humans they brought would soon become his soldiers. Once he commanded thousands, tens of thousands of the dead…

The Black Forest would no longer be enough for him.

Only then could he be reborn not as a mere commander of the dead, but as a true lord.

I will leave this place and conquer a wider territory.

That was when, as he watched the fifty or so humans flee in panic with satisfaction, one of them caught his eye.

That one…

A human surrounded by three Skeleton Knights, frantically exchanging blows with them.

Strangely enough, unlike the other humans who spoke in a bizarre language, he could understand every word that came from this one's mouth.

"I'm fine! Hurry up and go!"

How was this possible? Such fluent command of the Demon Realm language.

Was he perhaps a monster in human form?

He knew nothing of the System applied to Jin Taekyung, much less the function of the Integrated Language Pack.

He simply wanted to turn that one—who seemed useful enough for a human—into one of the dead and take him as a subordinate.

"F. O. O. L. I. S. H. H. U. M. A. N."

But he should have known.

The foolish one was himself.

"Phew. They're finally all gone."

"…?"

He should never have led his entire army into this narrow path.

"You're all going to fucking die here. That's all you need to know."

"W. H. A. T?"

He soon learned the answer to his question.

"One Annihilation."

Whoooosh!

The moment a vortex wreathed in blue flame erupted into the air, fear crept over the Skeleton Warlord.

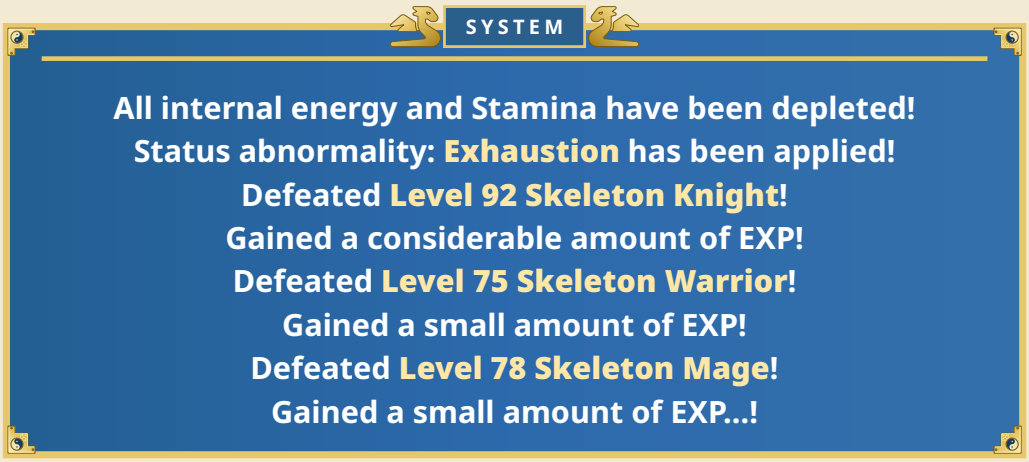
It was an emotion he had forgotten long ago—the fear of death, which had become more a friend than something to dread.

"E. V. E. R. Y. O. N. E. D. O. D. G. E—!"

The Warlord could not finish speaking.

Blue flames swept through the narrow path, engulfing him and hundreds of Skeletons.

KRAAAAAAASH!



.

.

.

Beep. Beep. Beep.

The System notifications drilled endlessly into my ears.

My vision spun, and my legs buckled.

I had never imagined the spear shaft in my hand could feel this heavy.

As the spearhead slowly sank toward the ground, I barely managed to drive it into the earth and use it to support myself.

Fuck, I'm dying.

One Annihilation was the only—and strongest—skill I possessed. It used internal energy and Stamina as fuel to unleash more explosive power than anything else.

Unlike the first time, my rising martial arts realm now allowed me to control how much force I put into it. But the aftermath was still devastating.

One Annihilation is as dangerous as it is destructive. I won't survive long if I keep thinking in terms of all or nothing.

The best choice was to achieve the greatest result with the least amount of power.

As someone who always pursued efficient combat, I could not afford to use One Annihilation recklessly. A final move meant that if it failed, there would be no next move.

But this time was different.

If I don't use it now, when will I get another chance?

A narrow path. Hundreds of monsters packed together without a single gap.

It was practically a stage built for One Annihilation.

I had exhausted my full strength and fallen into the Exhaustion status, but there was a contingency for every action.

Beep.

The notification I had been waiting for sounded, and a refreshing sensation swept through my entire body.

Whoooosh.

The dantian that had been emptied by the aftermath of One Annihilation filled once more, and strength returned to my trembling limbs.

Only then did my whitened vision clear, allowing me to see the results of One Annihilation.

“Wow…”

I had expected something like this, but the reality was beyond anything I had imagined.

I marveled at the sight spread out before me.

Crackle. Crackle-crackle.

The force of One Annihilation had widened the narrow path to twice its original width.

The enormous trees and rocks that had surrounded it had been uprooted, and piles of bones engulfed in flames slowly burned across the blackened ground.

How many did I send straight to the grave in one shot?

There were still some that were breathing—

No. They were undead monsters, so they were already dead. I should say still moving.

In any case, fewer than fifty remained. Even those were practically incapable of fighting.

Did I kill… about three hundred?

Now I understood why the System had called it a massacre.

Of course, compared to that grand choice of words, the EXP it gave me was absolutely pathetic.

“What’s the point of leveling up only once? So stingy.”

Clicking my tongue, I began finishing off the remaining Skeletons.

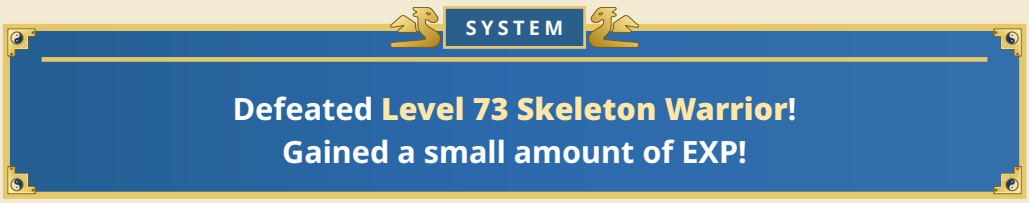
Every little bit added up. With the EXP required for each level rising like a mountain, every single trash mob mattered.

“Kreeeek. Krik.”

Crack!

I crushed the skull of a Skeleton crawling along with both legs missing.

Beep.



Damn. The EXP really was stingy.

I grumbled as I turned my head to search for the next monster.

“Oh. Ohhh. Could that be…!”

Then my eyes flew open, and a warm feeling spread through one corner of my chest.

Heart pounding with excitement, I approached the creature buried in a mound of dirt.

A Skeleton, trembling with only its head remaining.

The green ghost fire that had once blazed like a torch had shriveled to a tiny flame, like a candle flickering in the wind. But it was still enough for me to identify him.

Level 105 Skeleton Warlord

I smiled broadly and waved at the skull.

“Nice to meet you, friend!”

“…”

“You were here! Why didn’t you say so sooner? Why were you just sitting there?”

“Krik. Kreeeek?”

Look at this sly bastard, pretending to be a Skeleton Warrior.

Feigning disappointment, I raised the spearhead.

“Ah, what? You were just a trash mob. I guess I’ll kill you.”

“W. A. I. T!”

“Whoa. It can talk. Could it be…?”

“Y. E. S. That. Is. Right. It. Is. I.”

The Skeleton Warlord opened its eyes wide and continued.

“Master. Of. The. Black. Forest. Commander. Who. Leads. The. Dead. This. Body. Is. The. Warlord.”

“Wow! Warlord!”

“Only. Now. Do. You. Recognize. Me?”

“Wow! EXP!”

“…W. H. A. T?”

Sensing something was wrong, the Warlord hurriedly continued.

“Surely you do not intend to kill me?”

This bastard… Look how smoothly he talks now that he's desperate.

"Who said anything about killing? You're already dead."

"Could this body not die and die again, a hundred times over?"

"…Are you Jeong Mong-ju?"[1562]

Has this guy actually read the Song of My Single Heart?

When I stared at him in disbelief, the Warlord clacked his jaw.

"Human. Instead. Of. This. Why. Do. You. Not. Make. A. Deal. With. Me?"

"A deal?"

"That. Is. Right. I. Can. Give. You. Many. Things."

"You make the first offer."

"Make. The. First. Offer? What. Does. That. Mean?"

"List what you can give me. I'll listen and decide."

The Warlord fell silent for a moment as though deep in thought, then answered.

"I. Am. The. Ruler. Of. The. Forest. I. Shall. Bestow. This. Vast. Black. Forest. Upon. You!"

"The Black Forest is ours."

"…?"

"We have exclusive rights to the Gate, so it doesn't matter."

"Exclusive. Rights. To. The. Gate? I. Do. Not. Know. What. That. Is. But. Becoming. The. Ruler. Of. The. Forest. Would. Be. Far. Better!"

"No, it wouldn't. I'd much rather come here whenever the monsters respawn, round them all up, and farm them."

"R-round. Us. Up? How. Dare. A. Mere. Human. Hunt. Us!"

"Yeah. I'm thinking of sending one more on its way right now."

Crack.

When I tightened my grip around his skull, the Warlord's jaw trembled violently, and he shouted in panic.

"Wait! Wait! I. Just. Heard. A. Strange. Sound!"

"Come to think of it, you don't even have a cochlea. How can you hear anything? What a fascinating creature."

"There. Is. A. Crack. In. The. Crown. Of. My. Skull! If. This. Continues. I. Will. Be. Erased!"

"Wow! Fucking sweet EXP!"

"You. Insolent. Wretch! I. Am. The. Ruler. Of. The. Black. Forest. And. The. Commander. Of. The. Dead—"

Crack!

[1562] Jeong Mong-ju was a fourteenth-century Korean scholar-official remembered for Dansimga, or "Song of My Single Heart," a poem about unwavering loyalty.

“O. Ruler. Of. The. Black. Forest! O. Lord. Of. The. Dead! Please. Show. Mercy!”

“…”

That turnaround was Hyuk Mujin-tier at the very least.

Having such a long conversation with a monster was certainly novel, but it was time to stop playing around.

“Inventory open. Summon dagger.”

Shing.

When I held the dark-blue blade in front of his eyes, the Warlord asked anxiously,

“W-what are you going to do, sir?”

“Huh? Nothing much. Close your eyes and stay still. It’ll be over soon.”

“O-over? What do you mean?”

“Shh. Keep your jaw still. If even a bone gets cut, the resale value will drop.”

The corpse of the Wyvern I had killed before, One-Eyed Carus, had been worth its weight in gold. But I had no idea which parts of this Skeleton would be valuable.

Still, a Named Monster’s skull ought to sell for a pretty penny as a decoration, right?

A prize was still a prize. The surface of his bones gleamed with a black sheen and was actually rather beautiful.

I planned to erase him for good first, then gather up the bones nearby.

“Wait! Please, wait!”

Clack! Clack-clack-clack-clack!

God, this guy was noisy.

Just as I was about to grab the Warlord’s jaw, which kept jerking up and down without pause, he shouted.

“E-EXP! I will give you EXP!”

“Huh? I’m already here to collect it, so will you stay still? Besides, you don’t even know what EXP is.”

“No! I will give it to you! I will have my subordinates find it and bring it to you somehow!”

“What the hell are you talking about? EXP isn’t an item…”

I stopped speaking.

A thought had flashed through my mind.

Could this actually work?

“You said you were the master of the Black Forest, right?”

“Y-yes. Yes, yes!”

“How many subordinates do you have?”

“All! All of them! Not right away, but if I search the Black Forest, I can summon more than a thousand!”

“A thousand?”

“More than a thousand at the bare minimum! Have you forgotten who I am?”

“A Skeleton Warlord.”

“Y-yes. No soldier can defy its commander. The lesser creatures would never dare oppose me!”

“Hmm.”

“I will find whatever you want, even if I have to scour the entire Black Forest—or turn it upside down!”

I organized my thoughts as I gazed into the green ghost fire flickering desperately in his eyes.

The deliberation did not last long.

“Hey.”

“Yes.”

“Let’s work together on a job.”

“What kind of job…?”

“Something like that. You just have to do what I tell you.”

At my sinister smile, the Warlord’s skull began to tremble.

Chapter 297

Inhale. Exhale.

Choi Minwoo took a long, deep breath.

As he accepted the qi permeating the air, he awakened the mass of qi sleeping in his lower abdomen.

Mana.

The source of an Awakened's power. Their greatest weapon against monsters.

But Jin Taekyung, the man who had taught him the Jin Family's Cultivation Technique, called mana by another name.

Internal energy.

The more Choi Minwoo saw of Jin Taekyung, the more mysterious the man seemed. He turned ideas no one else would have dared imagine into reality—and made them work.

There was no way anything taught by such a man could be ordinary.

Dantian, internal energy, circulating one's qi, the Jin Family's Cultivation Technique…

Each new side of Jin Taekyung came as a surprise, but this time, Minwoo was downright bewildered.

He taught me the Mana Cultivation Method as if it were nothing.

Choi Minwoo knew how extraordinary the Jin Family's Cultivation Technique was.

No. Any Hunter—or even an ordinary person with the slightest knowledge of the field—would recognize its value at once.

If a Hunter was a sword, the Jin Family's Cultivation Technique was a whetstone.

Even the dullest blade could be honed sharp.

Considering both the technique's effectiveness and its rarity…

Its value would quite literally be astronomical.

The sheer nerve it takes to casually hand over such an incredible secret art. The skill to defeat a Named Monster alone. The courage to stand his ground against Lee Jungryong and the Ares Guild… Is there anyone else like him?

With each passing day, Choi Minwoo realized more clearly just how remarkable Jin Taekyung was.

And how incredibly lucky he himself was.

I can't disappoint him.

That was why Choi Minwoo devoted himself to practicing the Jin Family's Cultivation Technique, even cutting into his sleep.

And the results were already beginning to show.

Swoooosh.

After spending so long circulating his qi that he lost all track of time, the immense energy passed through hundreds of acupoints and swelled ever so slightly.

Only a week ago, he had not even known it existed.

For a moment, the conversation he had shared with Jin Taekyung that day flashed through Choi Minwoo's mind.

"Wow, Team Leader."

"Yes?"

"Did you happen to eat anything special when you were young? Ginseng, maybe, or one of those round pills?"

"Not at all. My meals were always organic, but I never took anything separately."

"And I bet you've never caught so much as a common cold, from childhood until now. Am I right?"

"That is correct. How did you know?"

"Your muscles and bones… No, I mean, your body is exceptionally well-built."

"Is that so? But wouldn't that be true of any Hunter?"

"It's not because you're a Hunter. You were born with an outstanding physique. My guess is that your grandfather did something for you."

"My grandfather…?"

"Yes. Does anything come to mind?"

"I'm not sure. I was too young to remember much. Butler Kim told me that my grandfather came to see me occasionally, but… that's all."

"Hmm. Personally, that seems like the only possible explanation."

Choi Minwoo suddenly thought of his grandfather. Had the last time he saw him been before he started elementary school?

The face in his memory was blurry, while the photographs online were crystal clear. By any measure, they had been far from a close grandfather and grandson.

But if such a huge mass of energy had been hidden inside me… Could my grandfather really have done something?

The unexpected trace of his grandfather made Choi Minwoo's heart pound.

As if responding to him, the energy coursing through his body shuddered.

The enormous power Jin Taekyung called one jiazi[1563] made one final sweeping circuit, then settled gently into the dantian beneath his navel.

At that moment, Choi Minwoo opened his eyes as an electric thrill ran through him.

"Phew."

The lingering afterglow of circulating his qi escaped with his long exhalation.

[1563] Jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle, used here as a unit of internal energy.

Choi Minwoo did not know it, but he had just reached Four Stars in the Jin Family's Cultivation Technique. It was an astonishingly rapid achievement, almost impossible to believe after only a week.

Yet it had been possible because Choi Minwoo possessed one jiazi[1564] of immense internal energy and such exceptional Muscles and Bones that even Jin Taekyung had nodded in approval.

The others aren't finished yet.

Choi Minwoo looked around and saw three people still absorbed in circulating their qi.

Seated at regular intervals around the room were Butler Kim, Song Song, and Im Kkeokjeong.

The fact that all four of them were learning the Jin Family's Cultivation Technique was the strictest of secrets.

They were currently inside Choi Minwoo's private training room, protected by ironclad security.

I shouldn't disturb them.

Jin Taekyung had warned him about the dangers of qi deviation until he was sick of hearing it.

Choi Minwoo slipped out of the training room as carefully as possible, then picked up the phone he had switched off earlier.

Less than a minute later, his jaw dropped.

Breaking-news alerts were updating across the screen at a blinding pace.

- The return of a Named Monster! Korea in crisis!
- An anomaly at the A-rank Gate, Black Wizard's Black Forest.
- Jin Taekyung volunteers as bait. Witness testimonies: "He possesses a noble spirit of sacrifice." "A Benefactor I will never forget."
- Hunter Association formulating a response and preparing to dispatch a rescue team.
- Peace Guild representative: "We are currently unable to reach the leadership…"
- Netizens unleash criticism over the Association's sluggish response. Jin Taekyung has been isolated for twenty minutes.
- Will a miracle occur?

"W-what is this?"

What did they mean, sacrifice? And what was this about being isolated?

Jin Taekyung was supposed to be clearing the Gate with his Guild members. How had that turned into a sacrifice?

And where had this Named Monster suddenly come from?

Choi Minwoo stood frozen, eyes wide, before hurriedly pulling himself together.

[1564] Jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle, used here as a unit of internal energy.

This isn't the time to stand around.

He knew Jin Taekyung's abilities well.

But if Taekyung had volunteered as bait and sent the Guild members out ahead of him, then he had to be facing an overwhelming threat.

This is… really dangerous.

Just as Choi Minwoo gripped his phone hard enough to crush it, the tightly shut door of the training room opened and three people emerged.

"Ah, that feels refreshing."

"Uncle, doesn't my skin look better?"

"Ah, Young Master. You were already out—"

"Butler Kim!"

One urgent shout was enough.

The three of them immediately sensed that something serious had happened, and their faces hardened.

Butler Kim calmly asked, "What happened?"

"We have to get to Jin Taekyung. Right now!"

The entrance to the A-rank Gate, Black Wizard's Black Forest, was already swarming with people.

Hunters from the Association and other Guilds had been dispatched to secure the area. Reporters had even risked their lives for a scoop.

The voices of hundreds upon hundreds of people filled the area with a constant murmur.

"Do you think Jin Taekyung is dead?"

"His chances aren't good. We haven't heard a thing for an hour."

"But he's already taken down a Named Monster once…"

"Ah, that Wyvern? Impressive, sure. Very impressive, but…"

The senior reporter speaking with his junior tapped the ash from his cigarette.

"If you're going to call yourself a Hunter beat reporter, then use your head. Didn't you hear the interview with the Peace Guild members who were with Jin Taekyung? There wasn't just a Named Monster. They said there were hundreds of other monsters too. That changes everything."

"Is it really that bad?"

"Hey, the only reason things have gotten this far is because it's Jin Taekyung. If it were anyone else, we wouldn't even be saying things like 'probably' or 'it's difficult.' What Hunter do you think could hold out alone for an hour? Rescue preparations, my ass. They'd already be preparing to recover his body."

The junior reporter let out a low groan.

“So it’s really that bad.”

“It’s completely fucked. And we’re insane too, hanging around here trying to scribble out an article in the middle of all this.”

“Still, they wouldn’t have allowed us to cover it if they couldn’t guarantee some degree of safety, right?”

“Can’t you see them over there? More than thirty A-rank Hunters showed up.”

The senior reporter gestured with his chin toward several dozen Hunters who looked formidable even at a glance.

The ones who stood out most wore emblems of a crossed sword and shield on their chests.

“The Ares Guild sent people too.”

“They only just arrived. Those bastards will blow off even the government if they don’t like the odds… No idea what brought them here.”

“Do you think they came to rescue Jin Taekyung?”

“Who knows? Maybe. Or maybe they’re planning to claim the Named Monster for themselves.”

Named Monsters were worth an unbelievable amount.

Even One-Eyed Carus, the Wyvern Jin Taekyung had most recently killed, had been valued in the trillions of won[1565] despite having only just awakened as a Named Monster.

“But… shouldn’t the rescue operation be starting by now? We have enough firepower.”

“We do. But I doubt those guys see it that way.”

“What?”

“Never mind. Forget it.”

The senior reporter fell silent.

He had spent nearly twenty years in the field and was a veteran among veterans. He had eyes and ears everywhere, and he had seen and heard plenty over the years.

Jin Taekyung must have gotten on their nerves.

He had recently heard some strange news from a reliable source.

There were signs of unusual tension between the Myeongdong and Peace Guilds.

Only a handful of people knew about it, and the story had quickly died down as idle gossip. But the instincts he had honed over many years whispered that something was going on.

And now the Ares Guild shows up.

[1565] One trillion won is about $710 million or €650 million; “trillions of won” indicates a value at least that large.

There was nothing strange about Korea's largest Guild stepping forward when a Named Monster appeared.

Still, something felt wrong. It was an uneasiness he could not put into words.

The reporter was looking toward the assembled leadership when he suddenly frowned.

You're going to rub your palms raw, you idiot.

The Seoul Branch President, who could be considered the person in overall charge of this operation, was busily rubbing his palms in front of a man who looked to be in his thirties.

What was that guy's name again? Plaster statue? Go Jun?[1566]

He was supposedly the Ares Guild's security team leader—the right-hand man of Lee Jungryong, the Guild's de facto Guild Master.

Watching the Seoul Branch President fawn over him as though he would gladly cut out his own liver for the man, the reporter began to understand why the rescue operation was being delayed.

"These bastards sure are having fun."

That was what the Senior reporter muttered in a voice barely loud enough to hear before grinding out his half-smoked cigarette.

"The Peace Guild!"

"What? Where?"

"Hey, hey! Get the cameras ready!"

The crowd erupted into commotion. Broadcasting crews shouted, and every eye turned in the same direction.

Four people.

Three men and one woman carved a path through the crowd as though parting the Red Sea. They made it all the way to the Gate before Hunters from the Seoul Branch moved to stop them.

"Get out of our way."

Choi Minwoo stood at the front, his voice low and steady. The Seoul Branch President hurried over to answer him.

"Safety has not yet been confirmed. We need more time before we can begin the rescue operation…"

"More time? Here?"

"Just a little longer. A little longer will be enough."

"Nearly an hour has already passed."

His voice remained calm, but flames flickered in his eyes. The three people behind him looked no different.

[1566] In Korean, the reporter confuses Go Jun's full name with the phrase for "plaster statue," a wordplay that English cannot reproduce directly.

“We have to save him now.”

“Not yet. Follow procedure.”

“Whose procedure? The Association’s? Or…”

For one brief moment, Choi Minwoo’s gaze swept over Go Jun, who stood behind the Association president.

He clenched his lips, then continued.

“Pull back the Association’s Hunters. The Peace Guild will enter on its own.”

“You must know that would violate regulations.”

The president answered in an authoritative tone and snapped his fingers.

The Seoul Association’s Hunters surrounded the Peace Guild members, open reluctance on their faces.

“It won’t take much longer. Be patient and wait.”

Those words snapped the last thread of Choi Minwoo’s patience.

He shouted as if spitting out a ball of fire.

“My friend is in there!”

Click! Flash!

Cameras captured the scene as dazzling flashes burst all around him.

Choi Minwoo paid them no attention. He continued shouting, his voice thick with fury.

“He could die! We have to save him!”

When he thought of Jin Taekyung fighting for his life against a Named Monster leading an army of hundreds of Skeletons, his anger erupted like an active volcano.

“Get the fuck out of the way, you bastards!”

The Skeleton Warlord spoke in a majestic voice.

“In the commander’s name, I order you. Rise, my loyal subordinates. Mighty soldiers of my legion!”

At that moment, someone smacked the Warlord’s skull with lightning-fast hands.

Whack!

“For fuck’s sake. Why does your incantation have to be so goddamn long? I told you to make it quick.”

“…”

“No answer?”

“…Yessir.”

The Warlord muttered in a resigned voice.

“Come on, grow. Skeletons, skeletons…”

Whoooosh!

Demonic qi burst from the Warlord and spread through the Black Forest.

A bright smile appeared on the young man’s lips as he watched Skeletons spring up one after another from the clearing.

“Wow. Another bumper harvest.”

Chapter 298

“Come on, grow. Skeletons, skeletons…”

Beep!

SYSTEM

Lv. 105 Skeleton Warlord has used a special Skill!
Special Skill, Summon the Dead, has been activated!
The sleeping dead answer the Commander’s call!

I had never felt so at ease.

Every time I watched a Skeleton shoot up like a bean sprout, happiness welled up inside me.

Is this how farmers feel?

What a bumper crop. What a harvest.

I beamed and swung my sickle—no, my spear—and began reaping.

Every time I smashed the skull of a Skeleton that had only just awakened, a beautiful sound rang out.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

SYSTEM

You have defeated Lv. 71 Skeleton Warrior!
You have gained a small amount of EXP!
You have defeated Lv. 70 Skeleton Archer!
You have gained a small amount of EXP!

The Skeleton Warlord, now forced to offer up his subordinates as EXP, muttered sorrowfully.

“Ah, my soldiers. Forgive your disloyal commander. To fall prey to the schemes of a wicked human and be erased before you could demonstrate your true strength…”

I was about to swing my spear at the next one when I suddenly stopped.

“What did you just say?”

“I called you a wicked human!”

Well, look at this guy.

He was supposed to be groveling, yet here he was glaring at me and talking back. Apparently, his fury at being demoted from commander of the great undead army to EXP factory manager had overcome his fear of Erasure.

“I would rather be erased than offer my soldiers to you!”

“Whether you get erased is for me to decide. More importantly, repeat what you said before that.”

“Wicked human!”

“Not that.”

“Not that? Then what?”

“You said they didn’t get to show their true strength, right?”

“…What of it?”

“Come to think of it, you have some weird Skill. Commander’s Rally, or whatever it was.”

“H-how do you know about that?!”

“Oh, right. No wonder something felt off. I forgot all about it.”

I beamed and stroked the Warlord’s skull.

“Use it.”

The Warlord asked again, sounding genuinely baffled.

“Commander’s Rally? Why?”

“The buff raises their Levels. I need to squeeze every last bit of EXP out of them.”

“…!”

“So hurry up and use it. If you do a good job, I might even let you go.”

“R-really?”

“There’s a saying in the human world: a man’s word is worth a thousand pieces of gold. It means a man always keeps his word.”

“A man who lost his mama is worth a thousand pieces of gold? What a strange saying.”

“Why would he lose his mama? Making mom jokes now, you fucking bastard? Maybe I should just erase you.”

Crack.

When I tightened my grip around his head, the Skeleton Warlord cried out in alarm.

“Wait! My bone—it’s cracking! My bone!”

“Lord, I’m sending one up.”

“Wait!”

“So are you going to do it or not?”

The Warlord’s green pupils darted anxiously from side to side.

For a Skeleton, he displayed a surprisingly wide range of emotions. After a moment, he finally forced out an answer.

“I-I’ll do it.”

“Good choice.”

“But do not misunderstand. This is not submission. It is a contract!”

"A contract?"

"That is right! Not obedience, but a contract mutually agreed upon by both parties!"

"…This bastard is more human than I am, and he's a Skeleton. So what are the terms?"

"In exchange for cooperating with you, wicked human, you will guarantee my current position."

"The master of the Black Forest and commander of the undead army?"

"Correct! In addition, cease this indiscriminate and barbaric slaughter!"

"…"

What had I just heard?

A monster, of all things, had just told me to stop my indiscriminate and barbaric slaughter. My head spun for a moment.

"Are you out of your mind? Is that something a monster should be saying?"

"How insulting. I am a Skeleton Warlord possessed of cool judgment and intelligence. Though I may have become one of the fallen undead, the spirit of chivalry remains engraved deep within my soul."

"…If you had upheld chivalry, you wouldn't have fallen like this in the first place."

"…The truth is, my memories of life were erased when I became undead."

"Then don't go on about chivalry. You're a real piece of work."

Still, perhaps because he was a Named Monster, he was clearly different from ordinary monsters that were ruled by instinct and did nothing but howl.

Anyway, a contract.

I considered it carefully, then finally spoke.

"Fine. I've decided."

"Human. Will you accept my contract?"

"No. I don't want to."

"…Huh?"

I continued as the green light in his eyes quivered with confusion.

"I'm okay with the first proposal. You can be the master of the Black Forest and the commander of the army, or whatever. But…"

"But?"

"From now on, you're the Peace Guild's EXP factory manager. In exchange for guaranteeing your position, you'll supply me with as many Skeletons as I want."

"That is absurd!"

"Don't like it?"

"I would rather be erased than become a human puppet!"

"Your wish has been received, valued customer."

Crack.

The Skeleton Warlord, a crack running across the crown of his skull, answered in a solemn voice.

“On second thought, it is not such a bad contract.”

“…”

“A commander cannot abandon his soldiers. Human, as master of the Black Forest and commander of the undead army, I accept your proposal.”

“You just said you’d rather be erased than become a human puppet.”

“An army falls apart without its commander. Do not misunderstand. I am merely enduring a moment of humiliation for the sake of the soldiers waiting for me.”

“But those are the very soldiers you have to offer up.”

“I will remember their noble sacrifice until the day I am erased. So, how much is this month’s tribute? No—how many troops must I offer?”

“…”

Look at him, giving them away without holding back since he wasn’t the one being destroyed.

At this point, he wasn’t a puppet. He was a snail bride.[1567]

When I stared at him with an utterly dumbfounded expression, the world’s first pro-human Named Monster, the Skeleton Warlord, hurriedly began chanting.

“Grow stronger, Skeletons, Skeletons!”

Beep!

SYSTEM

Lv. 105 Skeleton Warlord has used a special Skill!
Special Skill, Commander’s Rally, has been activated!
The Strength, Agility, and Magic of the monsters under the Skeleton Warlord’s command have been enhanced!
The enemies’ Levels have increased by 5!

…He can do it all by himself now.

The harvesting was easy.

The first time was the hard part. After two or three repetitions, I got the hang of it.

The Skeleton Warlord made full use of his abilities as a commander to gather the tribute troops as quickly as possible.

[1567] A snail bride is a figure from a Korean folktale: a mysterious spirit who secretly performs household chores for a poor man.

“Legion! Assemble!”

Clatter, clatter!

Around a hundred freshly sprouted Skeletons gathered in one place. All I had to do was unleash Spear Energy at the monsters assembled under his command, and EXP came raining down.

Swoooosh! Boom!

Ding. Ding. Ding.

The sound of EXP rolling in brought a smile to my face. As he watched, the Warlord muttered in satisfaction.

“Hmm. This is much faster and easier.”

“…”

“Human. Have you witnessed my command ability? This is the majesty of a commander.”

What a pro-human bastard.

Watching him take pride in devising a more efficient way to offer up his soldiers, I felt like I finally understood why his soul had become corrupted.

If the winds of liberation[1568] ever swept through the Black Forest, the Skeleton independence fighters would put him at the very top of their purge list.

Why do I feel like I’m the invader here?

Feeling strangely conflicted, I began collecting the loot.

Skeletons were one of the most dirt-poor monster species around. Their so-called by-products were either rusty weapons that could cause tetanus or half-rotted bones.

You could at least get beef and bone broth from a Minotaur carcass. Apparently, no matter how long you simmered Skeleton bones, all you got was the taste of a grave.

“Oh, a Magic Gem and some armor.”

At least Skeleton Knights, which appeared about as often as beans in a drought, sometimes left behind one or two Magic Gems and decent pieces of Equipment like these.

Of course, even that only happened once in a blue moon.

“A Magic Gem this size should easily fetch tens of millions of won.[1569]”

Sending the Guild members away had been the right call. I got to monopolize both the EXP and the Magic Gems—the best of both worlds.

As I happily pocketed a Magic Gem the size of an adult’s fist, the Warlord asked me a question.

[1568] The Korean word gwangbok refers to Korea’s liberation from Japanese colonial rule in 1945. Here, the narrator imagines the Skeletons liberating themselves.

[1569] “Tens of millions of won” suggests roughly 20–90 million won, or about $14,000–$64,000 and €13,000–€58,000.

“Wicked human. What are you doing?”

“Can’t you tell? Collecting the fruits of my labor.”

“Do you intend to absorb it later?”

“Absorb it? Don’t be ridiculous. Of course I’m going to sell it.”

“Foolish. Magic Gems are the source of power. Is it not only natural to eat them and grow stronger?”

“That’s something monsters like you do. Humans are different.”

It was common knowledge that humans weren’t monsters’ only enemies.

Monsters often fought among themselves, and some grew stronger by devouring the monsters they defeated.

“Is that so? Humans are truly an incomprehensible race. You could grow stronger by absorbing Magic Gems… Is this thing called money really so wonderful?”

“We need money to live whether we like it or not. Besides, humans can’t absorb Magic Gems.”

The energy contained within Magic Gems was commonly known as demonic qi. It was the foundation of a monster’s strength, but to humans, it was no different from poison.

It was a type of qi, but the easiest way to understand it was to think of it as a contaminant.

After I gave him a rough explanation, the Warlord tilted his skull.

“You cannot absorb it? How strange. A group of humans I encountered long ago used Troll blood to heal their bodies.”

“Ah, potions? That goes through a purification process…”

“Then why not purify Magic Gems as well? Just as you do with the Troll blood you call potions.”

“If it were that simple, we’d have purified them long ago. You really are simpleminded, just like a monster.”

If Troll blood was a fruit-flavored drink with one percent fruit flavoring, a Magic Gem was one hundred percent fresh fruit juice.

People couldn’t even remove all the toxicity from potions, yet he was suggesting we absorb Magic Gems.

I let out a short laugh and continued.

“Anyway, humans can’t absorb Magic Gems.”

“Why?”

“Stop asking questions, you question-mark murderer. That’s the established academic consensus. I’ve never heard or seen anything like that.”

“I have never heard of a human like you, either.”

I was about to smack the Warlord’s skull when I stopped.

Wait. He has a point.

There's no need to be bound by common sense all the time.

Wasn't I living proof that common sense didn't apply to everything?

Even the so-called accepted academic consensus was only a conclusion based on what people currently knew.

The Mana Cultivation Method is the same.

Only a tiny handful of people knew it existed.

I hadn't even considered that before getting tangled up with the Ares Guild.

Their private league had remained unchanged both before and after the appearance of monsters, and its secrets had always been shared only within the boundaries they had drawn.

Absorbing a Magic Gem…

Should I give it a try?

Just as I was about to open my Inventory and take out the Magic Gem again, the Warlord spoke.

"Heh heh. You look as though you have just been struck. Wicked and foolish human."

"Oh. Want me to hit your skull with an Erasure Punch?"

"…That was a rash remark. I apologize."

"You apologized within three seconds, so I'll allow it."

Having escaped Erasure by observing the universal three-second rule, the Skeleton Warlord muttered,

"There is no greater humiliation. Consider yourself fortunate that I have not grown stronger, human."

"You started as a Skeleton Knight and became master of the Black Forest through a coup. I'd say you've risen pretty far."

"I am a Warlord now! Master of the Black Forest and—"

"Commander of the undead army. Yeah, yeah. I'm getting calluses on my ears from hearing it."

I only learned later that he had taken over the Black Forest.

He had defeated the black wizard, who had practically been its true master. He must have absorbed an incredible number of Magic Gems.

"So this is a complete human—or rather, Skeleton—victory. Going from an ordinary Skeleton Knight to the master of the Black Forest, and even evolving into a Warlord… You must have absorbed an enormous number of Magic Gems from the black wizard, right?"

"What are you talking about? He did not possess any Magic Gems."

"Huh?"

"Besides, the black wizard was the one who summoned me directly. Until recently, his commands were absolute. A summoned creature cannot defy its summoner."

"Then how…"

"You mean, how was I able to defeat him?"

The green light in the Skeleton Warlord's eyes narrowed.

"I do not know the reason myself. Not long ago, I suddenly felt that I had escaped his control. Perhaps you could say that I climbed one step higher when my magical power surpassed that of my summoner."

"Suddenly?"

"Yes. My magical power increased tremendously, all at once."

What was he talking about?

But just as the Warlord said, even he couldn't properly explain what had happened to him.

After thinking for a long time, he managed to add only one thing.

"Borrowing a human expression, it felt as if I had been possessed by a ghost."

"…Is that something a Skeleton can say?"

Maybe that bastard isn't actually a Skeleton.

It was at that moment, as I stared at the Warlord with an incredulous expression, that—

"Hmm?"

The Warlord's skull rolled around atop his neck, then stopped facing one direction.

The green light in his eyes shone as he gazed south and clacked his jaw.

"An intruder."

"An intruder?"

"I am master of the Black Forest. I know everything that happens within it. More wicked humans have just set foot in my territory."

"They're my friends, you idiot."

Whack!

I gave the back of his head a hearty smack, picked up the Warlord's skull, and headed toward the Gate entrance.

Chapter 299

“It looks like we can begin now.”

The Seoul Branch President finally gave the go-ahead more than ten minutes after the Peace Guild, led by Choi Minwoo, began protesting.

A Gate was a fierce battlefield where life and death could be decided in an instant. No one expected Jin Taekyung to survive after being left alone against a Named Monster commanding hundreds of Skeletons.

“Do you think he’s still alive?”

“It’s been exactly one hour and eight minutes. We’ll be lucky if we can recover his body.”

“Damn it. This isn’t a rescue operation. It’s a body-recovery operation.”

“Can they really do this? Every second matters, and they’re just dragging their feet.”

“What else can they do? This isn’t an ordinary A-rank Gate. A Named Monster appeared. If you look at it from the Association’s perspective, you can understand their position. If they rush in and cause a major disaster, it’s all over.”

Hunters preparing to enter and reporters filming the scene stood around talking in groups.

Some were furious about the delayed rescue operation. Others defended the Association’s decision.

But no one mentioned the possibility that Jin Taekyung had survived. There was no need to state the obvious.

“Still, the Peace Guild really got screwed.”

“Yeah. Jin Taekyung is already… Well, it’s unfortunate, but that’s how things turned out. And they openly raised hell with the Seoul Branch President in front of the cameras. The backlash is going to be brutal.”

“Exactly. That guy’s a political appointee, and he’s already ridiculously sensitive about the media.”

Choi Minwoo’s face hardened as he listened to the whispers around him.

Whatever repercussions the Peace Guild might suffer later?

He didn’t give a damn.

Who the hell says he’s dead?

He wanted to charge forward right then and there. He wanted to grab the idiots spouting that nonsense by the collar, then knock down the Association Hunters blocking his way.

The only reason he had waited this long was something Butler Kim had said while holding him back more than ten minutes earlier.

> “Didn’t you say so yourself, Young Master? That you trusted Mr. Jin Taekyung more than you trusted yourself?”

Those words had forced him to rein in his anger.

It was true. Taekyung had always shown them miracles. He had always made the impossible possible. Today was simply another extension of that.

Choi Minwoo believed it.

He wanted to believe it.

Isn’t that right, Mr. Jin Taekyung?

He drew a deep breath and stepped forward. Around fifty Peace Guild members followed him, their faces filled with resolve.

“The Peace Guild will take the lead.”

The Seoul Branch President gave him a hostile look.

“That falls under my authority as the commander of this operation. Yet from the way you’re speaking, that sounded more like a notification than a request.”

“That’s correct.”

“What?”

“Would you like me to repeat myself? I said it was a notification.”

Before the Association President could respond, Choi Minwoo continued in an icy voice.

“I have no intention of delaying any longer, and no reason to keep talking to you. The Peace Guild will take the lead.”

“How dare you—!”

The Association President’s face flushed red enough to burst.

That was when a flat voice came from behind him.

“Let them.”

The Association President turned his head.

Go Jun, Lee Jungryong’s right-hand man and Head of Security, stood with his arms folded and his face expressionless.

“Team Leader Seok?”

“Please consider the feelings of the Peace Guild members who have lost a comrade they shared so many hardships with. The media will look favorably on it as well.”

“B-but there’s a Named Monster inside the Gate. If we put untested Hunters at the front, something unfortunate could happen…”

The Association President fell silent beneath Go Jun’s cold gaze.

For a moment, he had forgotten. The man before him was no mere team leader in the Ares Guild. He was Lee Jungryong’s Head of Security and right-hand man.

He had also forgotten that the “unfortunate incident” he feared was precisely what Go Jun wanted.

The Association President deliberated only briefly.

“Let the Peace Guild take the lead. Then, three minutes later, the Association and the Ares Guild will…”

But Choi Minwoo had already turned and begun walking toward the Gate.

The gazes of the Association President, Go Jun, and countless others clung to him, but he paid them no attention.

“Let’s go. We’re going to save Mr. Jin Taekyung.”

At Choi Minwoo’s quiet words, a roar thundered across the grounds, loud enough to make their ears ring.

Butler Kim, Im Kkeokjeong, Song Song, and around fifty Peace Guild members followed Choi Minwoo, cutting through the hundreds of Hunters like a current as they advanced toward the Gate.

That was when Butler Kim’s resonant shout rang out.

“All Peace Guild members, form an attack formation!”

Clack-clack-clack!

Armor and blades flashed in the sunlight as they moved. In an instant, the Peace Guild members formed a wedge and shot forward like a single arrow.

At their head, Choi Minwoo charged toward the magic field with a thunderous cry.

“Enter!”

Swoooosh!

Never before had the Gate’s magic felt so unpleasant.

Choi Minwoo opened his eyes, a sense of foreboding stirring deep in his chest.

His heart sank.

This is…

Scorched earth.

Was there any better way to describe the sight before him?

From the hill where the Gate entrance stood, they had a clear view of the trail below.

It was completely engulfed in flames.

Mr. Jin Taekyung.

The foreboding he had felt while passing through the Gate seemed to be slowly taking shape.

Im Kkeokjeong spoke from behind him, his voice trembling.

“Team Leader Choi. What if Taekyung…”

“Stop. We’re in the middle of an operation. Don’t jump to conclusions.”

But this time, even Team Leader Choi’s words failed to reassure them.

The situation before them looked that hopeless. Im Kkeokjeong wasn’t the only one shaken. Every member of the Peace Guild was in turmoil.

No. It can't be.

Choi Minwoo bit down hard on his lip, steadying himself, then moved forward with heavy steps.

"We'll continue our approach. Stay alert and keep advancing."

They moved cautiously forward, prepared for monsters to appear at any moment.

But the closer they came to the trail, the deeper their despair grew.

"This can't be…"

A mountain of shattered bones and weapons. Ash blanketing the blackened ground.

There was no trace of life anywhere in that place, where death and destruction reigned. Nor was there any sign of the one person they had so desperately hoped to find.

Dead? Him?

The same question flashed through everyone's mind.

Those who had known Jin Taekyung the longest could only blink at the unbelievable sight.

Butler Kim's words broke the suffocating silence like a doctor delivering his final verdict.

"According to the results of the detection magic… we found no movement or living creatures within a three-hundred-meter radius."[1570]

Choi Minwoo's eyelids trembled.

"You mean…"

"I'm sorry."

His face devastated, Butler Kim extended a hand. Something rose into the air from the direction he indicated and slowly flew toward them.

"That's…"

"Judging by the considerable magic I can sense from it, it appears to be a trace left by the Named Monster."

A palm-sized metal fragment rested in Butler Kim's hand.

Its black sheen remained undiminished despite the ash covering it. Several people sucked in sharp breaths when they saw the chilling skull emblem.

"The skull emblem! Th-that's part of the armor the Named Monster was wearing!"

"That's right! We saw it clearly."

Then someone searching the area cried out.

"There's a dagger here too! It isn't the kind of equipment Skeletons use!"

"It belongs to Senior Jin Taekyung. It's the one he used all the time."

As shock settled over the group, Butler Kim spoke in a subdued voice.

[1570] Three hundred meters is about 980 ft.

“It appears he was oxidized along with every enemy, including the Named Monster…”

“…!”

The air around the trail seemed to crackle.

Now everything was certain. Jin Taekyung was dead. He had thrown away his own life, taking his enemies with him as companions on the road to the afterlife and leaving his comrades behind.

Im Kkeokjeong’s wail finally shattered the seemingly endless silence.

“Ghk. Nghh…”

A faint tremor began in his hands, climbed through his arms, shoulders, and back, then spread through his entire body. Tears poured from Im Kkeokjeong’s large eyes.

“Taekyung… Taekyung… Nghh!”

No one mocked him as his massive frame shook with sobs.

Their grief might differ in depth, but everyone there felt the same.

Grief over Jin Taekyung’s death. Guilt that they had been unable to fight alongside him. And the helplessness they felt toward themselves.

The Peace Guild members’ eyes grew red and bloodshot. Tears streamed down Butler Kim’s and Song Song’s cheeks.

Only one person did not cry.

Choi Minwoo.

He’s dead. Jin Taekyung is dead.

His dark eyes swept over the trail, where acrid smoke still curled into the air.

It felt as though Taekyung might be hiding somewhere even now, ready to spring out like a jack-in-the-box.

I thought you could survive anything.

His chest suddenly tightened.

He had not felt this way since losing his parents.

His grief swelled like a balloon, stretching taut, ready to burst at any moment.

Then a voice drifted over.

“My, what a gruesome sight.”

“Jin Taekyung is nowhere to be seen. It appears he really is dead.”

Choi Minwoo slowly turned around.

Hundreds of people had just entered the trail. At the head of the Association and the other Hunters participating in the rescue operation stood two men.

“It seems the rescue has failed. Wouldn’t you agree, Association President?”

“Indeed. Everything’s been reduced to ash. I wonder if we’ll even be able to find the body. More importantly, where is the Named Monster?”

“We’ll have to search thoroughly, but according to the detection magic, it appears all the problems you were concerned about have been resolved.”

At Go Jun’s words, the Association President’s heavily furrowed face broke into a broad smile.

“Oh, that’s welcome news. I thought we might have another casualty on our hands.”

“Your judgment allowed us to minimize our losses, Association President.”

“Nonsense. This was all thanks to the Ares Guild stepping forward. Once everything is settled, I’ll make absolutely certain that you receive a commendation plaque. Ha ha. It’ll be the first achievement of my term, so I’m thinking of holding a grand ceremony… Guild Master Lee Jungryong will attend, won’t he?”

“He’s not the Guild Master. He’s the Vice Guild Master.”

“Ah, of course. Goodness, I’ve become so forgetful with age.”

A dry smile touched the corner of Go Jun’s mouth.

“That happens. And if a commendation plaque is presented, the Vice Guild Master will be delighted to attend.”

“I’ll finally get to see him again. Please put in a good word for me, Team Leader Seok.”

“I’m sure he’ll be quite pleased if I simply report exactly what I’ve seen and heard.”

“Ha ha.”

The conversation between Go Jun and the Association President was a sharp needle—a needle capable of popping Choi Minwoo’s ballooning emotions.

“Shut your mouth.”

“…!”

Every sound died at once.

The Association President belatedly realized what he had heard, and his face twisted with rage. But Go Jun responded before he could.

“You’d do well to watch your mouth.”

“I told you to shut it.”

“Young man, you don’t know the meaning of manners. Don’t you agree, Team Leader Choi Minwoo of the Peace Guild?”

The words were barbed.

To Go Jun, Choi Minwoo was a kite with its string cut. The Ares Guild founded by his grandfather was already as good as Lee Jungryong’s. And now that Jin Taekyung, the troublesome figure they had been watching, was dead, there was no reason to hide his fangs any longer.

“I understand that you’re distraught over the death of a Guild member, but you need to calm down.”

Choi Minwoo ground out his reply.

"He could have survived if you bastards hadn't stalled."

"We did our best. The Association President's judgment was correct as well. And…"

Go Jun continued in a cold, dry voice.

"You people bear some responsibility too. Don't you agree?"

"…!"

"What were you doing while Jin Taekyung was dying? Leisurely reading the newspaper in your office? Or drinking at a bar in the middle of the day?"

Choi Minwoo bit his lip.

Everything Go Jun said was true.

Because he had trusted Jin Taekyung, he had set everything else aside and devoted himself to training.

But…

At least Choi Minwoo himself should not have done that.

Another needle flew at him as he struggled to speak.

"You killed Jin Taekyung. All of you did—you pathetic weaklings who forgot your duty."

"…!"

Go Jun let out a short laugh.

"It's too late for regrets. The dead don't come back."

Choi Minwoo clenched his fists until they felt ready to burst.

Then—

"What the fuck are you talking about, you motherfucking bastard?"

The voice was low but powerful, piercing every ear.

Those who did not recognize it stared around in confusion at the sudden profanity.

Those who did froze like statues.

No way…

Choi Minwoo slowly turned his head.

Far down the trail, someone was trudging toward them.

"You finished the whole forty-ninth-day memorial rite while I was off taking a piss, you fucking bastard."[1571]

Jin Taekyung hawked a wad of phlegm onto the ground.

"Square up, asshole."

[1571] 49jae is a Korean Buddhist memorial observance culminating on the forty-ninth day after a person's death.

Chapter 300

The Black Wizard's Black Forest. No, now it would be more accurate to call it the Skeleton Warlord's Black Forest.

Either way, the gloomy forest was disgustingly vast and tangled. Without the Warlord surveying everything inside the Gate as clearly as the palm of his hand, I would have gotten lost along the way.

> • I knew you were wicked, but you are stupid as well. What would you have done without me?

"Right. Which way now?"

> • Turn right in one hundred paces.

"…How does this bastard even know the words 'turn right'?"

One captured Warlord was worth ten GPS units.

Swoooosh!

Following the Warlord's directions, I shot through the forest at dazzling speed.

Perhaps it was thanks to the half-jiazi[1572] of internal energy I had gained while performing True Qi Guidance on Team Leader Choi, but even as I used my movement technique with all my strength, my internal energy continued surging up like an inexhaustible spring.

More is always better.

After I had run for a while, the sounds of people moving and talking gradually drew closer.

My unbelievably enhanced eyesight picked out familiar faces beyond the brush, hundreds of meters[1573] away.

Team Leader Choi and Butler Kim. Uncle Kkeokjeong and Song Song too?

I could also see the new Guild members I had sent out about an hour earlier.

Forget those guys. Why were the people who should've been busting their asses circulating their qi all the way out here?

Then the facts I had forgotten flashed through my mind.

Oh. Right.

I had known there would be an uproar outside.

[1572] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; half a jiazi is thirty years.

[1573] One meter is about 3.28 ft, so hundreds of meters are hundreds to thousands of feet.

That was why I had planned to deal with the Warlord and the Skeleton army, then leave immediately. But the unexpected discovery of an EXP factory had gotten me so excited that I'd wandered away from the scene instead.

Things must have gone completely insane outside by now.

Then again, considering the supposed emergency, they had taken their sweet time getting here. At least an hour had passed since I sent the new Guild members out of the Gate.

I'll explain what happened. It'll be fine.

I was about to step out of the brush when someone shouted.

"The skull emblem! Y-yes, this is the armor the Named Monster was wearing!"

"We found a dagger too! This isn't equipment used by Skeletons!"

"It's the dagger Senior Jin Taekyung used!"

At the succession of shouts, Im Kkeokjeong burst into tears.

"Hk, nghh!"

"…?"

> • …?

"Taekyung. Taekyung… Nghh!"

No way. Was this what I thought it was?

As I stood there with my mouth hanging open, the Warlord rolled its green, glowing eyes toward me.

> • It appears those humans believe you are dead.

"Uh, yeah. There seems to be a huge misunderstanding."

> • Then should you not stop hiding like a rat and go out there?

But the situation was already spiraling out of control.

Song Song and Butler Kim suddenly began shedding tears, and even the Guild members lowered their heads with red-rimmed eyes.

The path grew heavy with grief and mourning.

"…"

No. I couldn't possibly walk out into this atmosphere.

What would happen if I showed up now and said, "Surprise! You thought I was dead, but I'm alive!"

What do you think? They'd curse me to hell and back.

The thought of dealing with the aftermath made me break into a cold sweat. Even so, I had to clear up the misunderstanding before the mood got any worse.

But first, there was someone I needed to deal with.

"You stay inside for a while."

> • Hmm? What do you mean?

"I don't know if this'll work… but people might be startled, so get inside for now."

> • Inside where?

Ignoring the Warlord's puzzled question, I immediately muttered the command in my mind.

Open Inventory. Store.

Pop.

At the same time as the command, the Warlord's skull vanished from my hand.

The Inventory was a space that living creatures could not enter. However, since the Skeleton Warlord was an undead monster that had lost its vitality long ago, it seemed to work.

"Oh, it worked."

> • Gah! Where am I?

"What the hell? You can talk from inside?"

Was it because the Inventory and I were connected?

I had never tried putting anything alive inside before, so this was a first.

As I marveled at the situation, the Warlord's shrill voice rang through my head.

> • What have you done to me? Release me this instant!

"Yeah. That's not happening."

> • Do you think you will escape unscathed after doing this to me?

"I think I'll live a long and healthy life, remain safe and sound, and never grow old or die."

> • It's so suffocating! I'm going insane in here!

“Why would you suffocate? You don’t breathe in the first place.”

> • You insolent wretch!

“Ah, you’re loud. Should I just make you disappear?”
The Warlord’s voice brightened at once.

> • This is a far more comfortable space than I expected.

“Good. Rest comfortably. And even if you do come out, don’t say a word in front of the people.”

> • Understood. But…

“But what?”

> • For a wicked human, you appear to have quite a few friends. Another considerable number of intruders have entered.

A moment later, I narrowed my eyes as hundreds of Hunters surged toward us like a cloud.
The Warlord was only half right. There were certainly a lot of them, but they weren’t my friends.
Especially the bastard leading the charge like a triumphant general.
Go Jun?
Why the hell was that bastard here?
The middle-aged man stuck to his side like his soulmate was someone I had seen several times on television and in the newspapers.
Even the Seoul Branch President came?
The Ares Guild and the Seoul Branch had both shown up.
This had become much bigger than I’d expected, which made it even harder to reveal myself.
I anxiously waited for the right moment. Then I overheard the two men talking and let out a hollow laugh.
“Would you look at these bastards.”
I had only caught fragments of their conversation, but it was enough to understand what was happening.

Lee Jungryong had sent Go Jun to eliminate the threat I posed, while the Association President wanted a connection to someone as powerful as Lee Jungryong.

Well, this was…

“Beautiful. Absolutely beautiful.”

One bastard wanted to delay the rescue operation to make sure I died, and the other had eagerly accepted his proposal. They were both pieces of shit from the same cesspool.

Even if it meant getting my hands dirty, I had to clean up this shit myself. It was hard to walk around without a care when turds like these were scattered across the road.

“It’s too late for regrets. The dead don’t come back.”

I saw Go Jun laugh quietly as he mocked Team Leader Choi. Without hesitation, I pushed through the brush and walked out.

“What the fuck are you talking about, you motherfucking bastard?”

At least one of them needed to be taught a lesson.

“…!”

Shock, disbelief, bewilderment.

With every step, gazes filled with different emotions flew toward me and struck me in the face.

As I passed, I patted the shoulders of Team Leader Choi and the Guild members, who had frozen at my appearance.

Greetings could wait. I needed to clean up that lump of shit before it stank any worse.

Step. Step. Tap.

My final step brought me to a stop in front of two men.

“You were… alive?”

“J-Jin Taekyung, Hunter?”

I gazed at the two pairs of trembling eyes belonging to Go Jun and the Seoul Branch President, then looked at Go Jun.

“Why? Disappointed I’m alive?”

“…Of course not.”

“That’s strange. Your answer came half a beat late.”

“You’re imagining things.”

Go Jun continued in a steadier voice.

“We were all searching for you. Where were you?”

"Oh, I went nearby to take a piss. But by the time I got back, you'd practically finished the funeral procession and even held the forty-ninth-day memorial rite."[1574]

"Urinate?"

"I drank a lot of water before entering the Gate."

"You certainly took your time."

"It's a symbol of virility. If you're interested, I can show you how to make a rainbow with my piss. It's really pretty."

"…Judging by the nonsense you're spouting, you seem perfectly fine."

"I'm always perfectly fine. But…"

I smiled faintly.

"Are you sick? The way nothing but dogshit keeps pouring out of your mouth makes me think you might have rabies."

"…!"

"I have to admit, listening to you was pretty entertaining. A commendation plaque this, a commendation plaque that—you were making a whole fucking production out of it."

Go Jun wasn't the only one whose face stiffened.

The Seoul Branch President, who had been silently swallowing as he listened to us, cut in with a flushed face.

"Young man, you have quite a filthy mouth."

"Yes, my mouth's a little filthy. But who are you?"

The Association President frowned at my curt response.

"You don't know me?"

"Are you the President?"

"No."

"Then you need to introduce yourself. How else would I know?"

"Good heavens. In all my years…"

Clicking his tongue, the Association President thrust out his chest, his arrogant face radiating authority.

His fat chest bulged beneath the suit jacket he had gone to the trouble of wearing into the Gate.

"I am Lee Woojoong."

"Oh, Lee Woojoong."

I scratched my chin with an innocent expression.

"Do you happen to know Kim Jeonghee?"

[1574] 49jae is a Korean Buddhist memorial observance culminating on the forty-ninth day after a person's death.

"Kim Jeonghee? Do you mean the Association elder?"

"No. She's my mother."

"…Hmm?"

"Lady Kim Jeonghee. My mother."

The Association President was briefly lost for words. Then he asked incredulously,

"So what? What am I supposed to do about that?"

"That's what I wanted to ask you. Normally, people say what organization they're from, then give their position and name. If you leave all that out and just say 'Lee Woojoong,' what am I supposed to do with that? You might as well have said 'gynecomastia.'"[1575]

"What did you say?"

"So who exactly are you, Mr. Lee Woojoong?"

"I'm Lee Woojoong! The Seoul Branch President of the Hunter Association!"

"Ah. Nice to meet you."

"Y-you…!"

"Two twos are four. Two threes are six. Two nines are fuckin' eighteen."

"How dare you!"

I let out a short laugh as the Association President's face turned bright red, as though he might explode at any moment.

I knew perfectly well that the Seoul Branch President was one of the most important posts of all. Even so, I made no effort to hide my contempt because he was a human being who deserved to be despised.

A man who's supposed to be responsible for Hunters' safety and rights pulled something like this.

If anyone other than me had been left inside this Gate, they would have died.

The Association President had known that, yet he had delayed the rescue for an entire hour. All so he could curry favor with the Ares Guild—or rather, with Lee Jungryong.

"Jin Taekyung, what the hell kind of man are you?"

I stared coldly at the Association President as he shouted and pointed a finger at me.

"What kind of man am I? The kind who killed two Named Monsters alone while waiting an entire hour for a rescue team."

"Th-that…"

The Association President flinched at my aura and took a step backward.

But the distance between us didn't widen. I matched him step for step.

Step.

[1575] Taekyung twists the sound of Lee Woojoong's name into yeoyujeung, the Korean word for gynecomastia.

One step.

“President Lee Woojoong.”

“B-back away.”

Step.

Another step.

“If you’re the Association President, work for the Hunter Association. Don’t work for a Guild.”

“I-I have no idea what you’re talking about.”

“Would you like me to make it clear? In front of everyone?”

Step. Tap.

As I took the third and final step, a strong hand closed around my shoulder.

“That’s far enough.”

I grinned at Go Jun as he stepped between us.

“Get your hand off me. You smell like shit.”

“Do you enjoy escalating things?”

“Why? Are you scared?”

“Scared?”

Go Jun gave a dry laugh and whispered in my ear.

“You’re the ones who should be afraid. Everyone behind me is either an Ares Guild Hunter or an Association Hunter. If you want to get out of here alive, you’d better watch your mouth.”

“Oh, so if things go bad, you’ll bury everyone here and walk away? That’s a bit too big for you. Can you handle it?”

“That’s why I’m holding back. Consider yourself lucky.”

“Scary. By the way, are you all right after I beat the shit out of you last time? Drink a good potion?”

Go Jun’s eyes went flat.

“What a childish taunt.”

“Look in a mirror. Judging by your expression, it worked pretty damn well.”

“I’m telling you one last time. Back off.”

“And I’m telling you for the last last time. Take your hand off me.”

Huff.

Hot, foul breath spilled from his mouth.

Go Jun glared at me with sunken eyes, then took several steps back and muttered,

“If it hadn’t been for my Master’s special order… you would have died here.”

“Your Master? Oh, Jungryong?”

“…!”

“How’s Jungryong doing? Isn’t it about time you found him a place in a retirement community?”

That was the decisive blow.

Go Jun trembled from head to toe as though he had been electrocuted. His eyes flew wide, blazing with a light unlike anything I had seen when we fought at the hospital.

“If you think this will end the same way it did last time… I’ll make you regret it.”

“Regret?”

I beamed and spread my arms wide.

“You talk too much. Quit posturing and come at me.”

Whoooosh!

Chapter 301

Go Jun was utterly confident.

I can do this.

It had been some thirty years since he first met Lee Jungryong, after losing his parents in the Great Cataclysm and becoming an orphan.

“I’ve had my eye on you for some time. Would you like to come with me?”

“Me?”

“Yes. You have exceptional talent.”

Only then did Go Jun understand.

How a mere orphan like him had grown up with the finest education in the best possible environment. Who the anonymous benefactor he had never once seen truly was.

Lee Jungryong was no Daddy Long-Legs from a fairy tale, but that alone was reason enough to follow him.

“Yes, sir.”

“From now on, call me Master.”

That was how it all began.

He had to learn strange movements and unfamiliar ways of breathing alongside other children, but Go Jun loved every moment of it.

His tiny hands blistered, then formed calluses. The skin split, healed, and hardened… Go Jun’s life followed much the same path.

The pain made him stronger, until at last he came to stand at Lee Jungryong’s right hand.

“Starting today, you’re the Head of Security.”

“Please tell me what I should and shouldn’t do.”

“Follow my orders. Never defy them. That is all.”

His Master’s answer burned itself deep into Go Jun’s mind.

He lived his life by the path Lee Jungryong laid out for him—sometimes in the shadows, sometimes in the light…

He carried out countless tasks for Lee Jungryong, never once leaving room for error.

Unlike the Hunters who inflated their reputations and reveled in flashy lives, Go Jun concealed his true strength and quietly completed every assignment Lee Jungryong gave him.

Even within the Ares Guild, everyone could only speculate about his abilities. Lee Jungryong alone knew the true extent of his strength.

“Doesn’t it frustrate you?”

“What do you mean?”

“Always remaining by my side.”

“I’ve never thought about it.”

“With your abilities, you could make a name for yourself anywhere right now.”

“I have no interest in such things. I will always remain by your side, Master.”

“Ha ha. You seem even more dependable than usual today.”

Go Jun had meant every word. Every member of the security team had received Lee Jungryong’s teachings, but no other Disciple worshipped and revered him as blindly as Go Jun did.

Exceptional ability and unwavering loyalty.

Ironically, those two virtues were precisely what led Go Jun to defy Lee Jungryong’s orders.

“If it hadn’t been for my Master’s special order… you would have died here.”

“Your Master? Oh, Jungryong?”

“…!”

“How’s Jungryong doing? Isn’t it about time he started looking for a place in a retirement community?”

It was an insult Go Jun could not endure. To him, Lee Jungryong was a parent, a Master, and practically a god.

It was only natural for a fanatic to lose his mind when someone insulted the god he worshipped.

You filthy bastard… I’ll tear you apart.

The moment his Master’s order to avoid a clash with the Peace Guild was wiped clean from his mind, aura had already gathered around his fist.

“If you think this will end the same way it did last time… I’ll make you regret it.”

Go Jun already knew Jin Taekyung’s abilities from their brief clash at the hospital a week ago.

But that confrontation had taken place under his Master’s orders. At the time, Go Jun had displayed less than half his true strength.

Now Jin Taekyung would pay dearly for underestimating him.

I’ll go all out and finish this in a single blow.

He did not care about the aftermath. He only wanted to punish the bastard who had insulted his Master as brutally as possible.

And Go Jun had absolute confidence in his strength.

“Die!”

Whoooosh!

His fist shot forward like a ray of light, accompanied by a terrifying crack of displaced air.

Only three steps separated him from Jin Taekyung.

The bastard stood there smiling broadly, his arms spread wide. He was completely defenseless.

In a world that seemed to slow around him, Go Jun's fist drove forward with enough force to punch straight through Taekyung's chest.

Taekyung did not move an inch.

It's over, brat.

A triumphant smile had just begun to curl Go Jun's lips when—

Kkwaaang!

A thunderous boom split the sky.

But Go Jun never heard it. An overwhelming recoil surged through his fist as lava-like heat swept through his insides.

What is this…?

His vision flashed white. Agony engulfed him, as though a red-hot blade were churning through his stomach.

His mouth fell open, and something came pouring out.

"Bleeergh!"

Splaash.

Go Jun doubled over like a shrimp and vomited up his insides, his eyes bulging.

Blood.

There was blood everywhere. Unidentifiable pale objects lay scattered throughout the dark-red pool soaking the ground.

It did not take him long to realize they were pieces of his internal organs.

"W-what the hell…?"

As Go Jun stared in shock at the pool of his own blood, a foot suddenly entered his field of vision.

"Didn't you say you'd make me regret it?"

"…!"

"Strange. Doesn't look like much to me."

He did not need to raise his head to know.

He knew whose foot was planted in his blood. He knew who spoke with that ice-cold voice, blazing with barely contained heat.

How…? How did I lose in a single blow…?

One clash.

That single clash had become a pillar of fire, reducing the painstaking tower Go Jun had spent thirty years building to ashes.

How is this possible?

His entire body trembled.

Pain?

No.

What ruled him now was fear—an emotion he had felt from only one person in his entire life.

His Master, Lee Jungryong.

“Raise your head.”

That very fear seized Go Jun by the hair and slowly dragged his head upward.

A foot submerged in a pool of blood. A straight, steel-hard leg. A torso covered in the supple, powerful muscles of a wild beast.

And then…

A fierce light burned in his eyes.

Within the black forest, surrounded on all sides by faint darkness, two eyes filled with flame stared down at Go Jun.

“Give your Master a message.”

Hot breath brushed his ear. A whisper quiet enough for him alone to hear followed.

“As long as I’m here, no one lays a hand on the Peace Guild.”

“…!”

Go Jun’s eyelids quivered. A hoarse voice slipped between his blood-soaked lips.

“What… are you?”

“Me?”

A moment later, the answer echoed not in his ears, but directly inside his head.

—A descendant of the Fire King. I am the successor to the Blazing Flame.

The voice was like an auditory hallucination.

Go Jun did not realize it was Sound Transmission, nor did he understand the meaning behind the words.

Only one word filled his mind.

Monster…

The last thing Go Jun saw was Jin Taekyung’s playfully smiling face.

Then his body toppled like a rotten old tree.

Slump. Thud!

A suffocating silence descended.

No one dared to speak. No one could even move. Hundreds of trembling pairs of eyes swept over my entire body.

I stared absently at the unconscious Go Jun, then gave a brief assessment.

“So why the fuck did you have to start shit? You’re nothing special, asshole.”

“…!”

"…!"

The air froze in an instant.

When I looked away from Go Jun and turned my head, sharp gasps erupted all around me.

One person reacted more violently than the rest.

"Mr. President."

"Eek!"

Lee Woojoong, the Seoul Branch President, jumped and averted his eyes before answering.

"D-did you call me?"

"Why are you suddenly speaking so formally? You were talking pretty informally just a minute ago."

The President's face turned deathly pale as he stammered.

"M-me? I was?"

"Don't you remember?"

"Lately, lately my memory hasn't been so good. I keep forgetting things…"

"Oh, is that so? Then you must have already forgotten everything that happened between us today."

"…!"

"Judging by your expression, your memory seems just fine."

If he still could not take the hint after all that, he never would have risen to such a high-ranking position.

The President hurriedly shook his head.

"No. Of course not. I-I'll make sure everyone keeps their mouths shut."

"Keeps their mouths shut?"

"Gah! That's not what I meant."

"The people who came with you must have bad memories too. Right?"

"Y-yes. Yes, exactly. They all suffer from short-term amnesia. Isn't that right?"

More than two hundred Association Hunters had followed their direct superior into the Gate. Every one of them began nodding frantically.

"That's right."

"Of course. I don't even remember my own name."

"Wait. Where am I? Who am I?"

Who the hell said that last one?

I barely managed to suppress my urge to check his face.

"Well, that works out nicely."

I smiled broadly. The President and the other Hunters forced themselves to smile along with me.

Not that I expected this to keep everything quiet. There were far too many witnesses for that.

Next up…

"Who's in charge over there?"

"I am."

A sharp-eyed middle-aged man stepped forward. He was an A-rank Hunter and a team leader in the Ares Guild.

Still looking as though he could not believe his eyes, he glanced between me and the fallen Go Jun before biting his lip.

"I don't know what happened between you and Team Leader Seok… but you've made a serious mistake."

Judging by his words, he clearly did not know the exact circumstances behind the incident.

I grinned.

"These things happen. What can you do?"

"Aren't you worried about how the Vice Guild Master will react when he hears about this?"

"Not worried, no. I am looking forward to it, though. Be sure to report everything to Mr. Lee Jungryong."

The middle-aged man flinched, as did every Ares Guild member lined up behind him.

I could not tell whether it was because of the way I addressed Lee Jungryong or my shameless attitude.

Then again, I was far more interested in how Lee Jungryong would react to the report than in what any of them thought.

Looks like old Jungryong is in for one hell of a headache.

In this little production, Lee Jungryong had been cast as the cleanup man.

Since he would not want word getting out, he would have to cover people's eyes and ears, then switch off any loudspeakers that might spread the story.

It hasn't even been two weeks since that incident, and he's already showing his teeth again… Impressive. Truly.

We had barely finalized our deal, yet Lee Jungryong had bared his teeth again the instant an opportunity presented itself.

The thought sent a chill down my spine.

What if I really had died here?

That would have ended the fight then and there. Without me, the Peace Guild would never be able to stand against the giant that was Ares.

It also drove one fact home all over again.

If I let my guard down in this fight for even a moment, it's over.

There would be no truce in this war. Only an end. Our enemies would keep watching for the slightest opening to bare their teeth again.

"Whew."

In any case, I had done the bare minimum to settle matters.

Or so I thought.

"…"

"…"

"…"

"…"

Four pairs of eyes bored into me with terrifying intensity.

Dozens more demanded an explanation.

Ah. I forgot about our Guild.

I had forgotten the most important thing. But where was I supposed to begin? And how much was I supposed to tell them?

After a moment's thought, I opened my mouth.

"I went to take a piss."

"…"

Silence flowed through the area.

Then Song Song spoke in a gentler voice than I had ever heard from her before.

"Taekyung."

"Yeah?"

"Can I kill you?"

"…I'll explain once we're outside."

Right. Let's get out of here.

Chapter 302

More than thirty minutes had passed since the rescue team was deployed.

Hunters from other Guilds who had been assigned to guard the perimeter against any unforeseen incident had already drawn their weapons, while broadcast crews reported on the situation with microphones and cameras.

The commotion was not limited to the ground.

Dozens of combat helicopters circled overhead, and countless camera-equipped drones roamed the sky, broadcasting the entire scene across Korea.

“What are you watching so intently?”

“A live news broadcast.”

“News? You barely even watch variety shows. What got into you? Did something happen?”

“Do you carry your phone around as a decoration? It’s been over two hours since all hell broke loose over that Named Monster, asshole. Try checking the internet once in a while.”

“Holy shit. ‘Named Monster Appears… Jin Taekyung Presumed Dead.‘ Is this for real?”

“I don’t know. I can’t hear, so stop talking to me.”

At home, at school, at work, and even aboard crowded public transportation during rush hour, everyone was staring at a television or the phone in their hand.

The live stream on HunterTV’s iTube channel had passed one hundred thousand concurrent viewers long ago.

> └ Did Lord Fuck[1576] really die?
>
> └ Don’t say shit like that.
>
> └ I’m not trying to be pessimistic. Honestly, at this point, his chances of survival are slim. The golden window for a rescue operation is fifteen minutes, and there hasn’t been a word for over an hour. On top of that, they’re dealing with a Named Monster.
>
> └ Still, that rescue force was no joke. I’ve never seen so many A-rank Hunters gathered in one place.
>
> └ That’s my point—what are they rescuing? You don’t rescue a corpse. You recover it. No wonder the Peace Guild Team Leader was screaming that they were fucking bastards earlier. Safety matters, sure, but saving the person should come first.

[1576] An online nickname for Taekyung that arose from profanity he accidentally said during a broadcast.

> ㄴ Facts: Lord Fuck[1577] is already considered almost certainly dead. The deployed Hunters appear to be focused on raiding the Named Monster rather than rescuing him. Since there's been no word from the rescue team either, we can't rule out that the battle has already begun—or that they've been wiped out.
>
> ㄴ What? Wiped out? What happens if they get wiped out too?
>
> ㄴ What do you mean, what happens? The Named Monster goes on a foodie tour. It'll probably start by eating the people waiting outside as appetizers. The surrounding area is already under an emergency evacuation order.
>
> ㄴ Fuck, I've got such a thick layer of fat I wouldn't even taste good. Can't we just cook it some ramen instead? ;
>
> ㄴ Are you another fucking idiot? You think it'll go back into the Gate just because it's full?
>
> ㄴ Guys, for a Named Monster like that, what's its people max?
>
> ㄴ What the hell does "people max" mean?
>
> ㄴ The maximum number of people it can take.
>
> ㄴ Another idiot has joined the chat.
>
> ㄴ Do the assholes cracking jokes right now have nothing but udon noodles for brains? Have you thought about what'll happen if monsters come out instead of people the next time the Gate opens?

As one commenter had bluntly pointed out, the situation was more serious than it seemed.

The Hunters deployed there possessed overwhelming strength, but their opponent was a Named Monster.

If it possessed power beyond anything they could imagine, the result would be catastrophic.

There had been cases where a single powerful Named Monster caused tens of thousands of casualties and destroyed an entire city.

As time passed, tension began to spread through the chat as well.

> ㄴ There really hasn't been any news. Someone should've come out by now.
>
> ㄴ Aren't rescue operations normally like this?
>
> ㄴ Nope. Communication devices don't work inside Gates, so normally someone has to come out every thirty minutes and report that they're still alive.

[1577] An online nickname for Taekyung that arose from profanity he accidentally said during a broadcast.

> ㄴ Then why hasn't anyone come out? They said the battle site was just a stone's throw from the Gate.
>
> ㄴ Are they fighting the Named Monster? Shouldn't they deploy Central Plains forces?

Just then, the broadcast caught the Gate's magic field rippling like a wave.

At the same time, the chat that had been consumed by heated arguments began scrolling upward at a maddening speed.

> ㄴ They're coming out!!!
>
> ㄴ The magic field just moveddddd!
>
> ㄴ Go go go go go go go!
>
> ㄴ Please let it be people.
>
> ㄴ I want to see Lord Fuck[1578]. I hope he's alive.

On the internet, on television, and at the scene itself, countless people—roughly half the population of Korea—watched the change taking place at the Gate.

Then, in the next moment—

Whoooosh!

The swirling magic field of the Gate began vomiting out several objects.

Human arms and legs. Clad in gleaming armor and armed with weapons, they marched out in neat ranks.

They were not monsters, but the Hunters who had entered earlier.

"Wooooooah!"

The explosive cheer from the crowd startled the middle-aged man in a suit at the head of the group.

But he soon broke into a broad smile, his double chin folding as he waved.

"Yes! I've returned, everyone! We're all safe!"

> ㄴ I've been wondering for a while—who's that guy?
>
> ㄴ Lee Woojoong. It's written "Seoul Branch President," but you pronounce it "idiot." Everyone already knows he's incompetent.
>
> ㄴ Why is that asshole Lee Woojoong grandstanding?
>
> ㄴ The guy went in on a rescue operation and he's the only one wearing a suit, lmao.
>
> ㄴ Lee Woojoong, man boobs, whatever—quit blocking the screen and move.

[1578] An online nickname for Taekyung that arose from profanity he accidentally said during a broadcast.

Criticism flooded the chat.

The cameras mounted on the drones avoided Lee Woojoong and filmed the Hunters emerging behind him.

First came the government-affiliated Hunters from the Association, which had led the operation. Then the cameras captured the Ares Guild members walking out with grim expressions.

They were carrying a stretcher covered with a large sheet. As it swayed with each step, one blood-soaked hand slipped out from beneath the cloth.

Pop-pop-pop! Click, click!

Camera flashes burst from every direction. A wave of mourning spread through the people watching.

> └ Ah… I was hoping it wouldn't end like this.
>
> └ Jin Taekyung really did die.
>
> └ May he rest in peace.
>
> └ May he rest in peace. I hope he finds peace in heaven.

Just as everyone was swept up in grief, a voice rang out.

"Whoa. Why are there so many?"

"…!"

The news anchor solemnly reporting Jin Taekyung's death, the photographers hammering their shutters, and even the chat being flooded with messages wishing the deceased peace—

Everyone stopped what they were doing and stared wide-eyed at one person.

"Wow, look at all these cameras. By the way, is it really okay to broadcast something like this live?"

The young man looked around in fascination.

There was no one who did not know the name of the man wearing simple leather armor with a spear strapped to his back.

> └ …Isn't that Jin Taekyung?
>
> └ Huh?
>
> └ ?????
>
> └ Why is hyung[1579] coming out of there…?
>
> └ Am I the only one seeing a ghost?

[1579] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man he is close to.

As everyone floundered in a pit of confusion, one field reporter was the first to recover. He thrust a microphone toward Jin Taekyung.

“A-are you Jin Taekyung?”

“No, this is Patrick.”

“What?”

“I’m kidding. It’s me.”

This asshole was making jokes? On live television?

Reeling from the completely unexpected dumb joke, the reporter pulled himself together and asked another question.

“So you weren’t dead.”

“Seeing as I’m doing this interview here, it looks like I didn’t.”

“Then who was the person on the stretcher that came out earlier?”

“Oh, him.”

Jin Taekyung scratched his neck before answering.

“Well, how should I put it… He’s a Hunter who was injured while fighting bravely. His injuries aren’t that serious, so he’ll recover soon.”

“Then where is the Named Monster?”

“The Named Monster? There isn’t one.”

“What? Are you saying there was never a Named Monster in the first place?”

“No, there was.”

Jin Taekyung calmly added,

“Now there isn’t.”

It was the moment a legend was born.

“There’s something I’d like to ask…”

Team Leader Choi suddenly looked up from the newspaper covered in squiggly foreign writing.

“Why exactly are you in my office, Mr. Jin Taekyung?”

“Why? Am I not allowed to drop by?”

“I’m asking because you come here more often than I do, and I’m the owner.”

“Come on, these things happen. I only stopped in for a minute to see you.”

“The door was locked.”

“It was open.”

“You broke the lock.”

“Really? How strange.”

“I’m asking just in case—really, just in case…”

Team Leader Choi removed his glasses and asked calmly,

“Do you come here because of the seventeenth-century-style Russian imperial sofa made by the Russian furniture master Sorkovache?”

Sprawled across the sofa, I answered,

“Absolutely not.”

“Do you realize that saying that while lying there makes you rather unconvincing?”

“Nope. Ah, this is comfortable.”

The price tag was uncomfortable, but once I lay back on it, I could not tear myself away.

As befitted a chaebol[1580]—no, a third-generation hero—Team Leader Choi’s office was packed with things like this.

A state-of-the-art hologram TV with incredible picture quality was one of them.

“The next video we’d like to show you is the sensational clip that’s set the past week on fire. Johnson, have you seen it?”

On the screen, a Black man nodded in response to a question from a long-nosed white man. Looking at him, I could not help wondering why his name was Johnson.

“Of course, Conan. I’ve already memorized every line.”

“What line?”

“You know, the last thing he said.”

It was a popular American talk show, famous enough that even I had heard of it.

The co-host, Johnson, spoke with a solemn expression.

“It wath there. Now it’th gone.”

“Ha-ha! That was exactly the same!”

“…”

Exactly the same, my ass. Does he have actual snails in his ears instead of cochleae?

I shook my head and turned off the TV.

They were bound to play that interview again as stock footage, so turning it off now was the wise choice.

“Your popularity shows no sign of fading.”

“I know. I said it without thinking. I had no idea it would become this big.”

“I’m afraid I see it differently.”

Team Leader Choi had already whipped up a cup of coffee. He sat down across from me and continued.

“It wasn’t the words that became a hot topic. It was the man who said them. You hunted two Named Monsters, and you did it alone. Of course the entire world is paying attention.”

[1580] Chaebol refers to a large, family-controlled Korean business conglomerate or a member of its owning family.

A week had already passed, but the impact of that day had not faded. If anything, the flames were raging hotter than ever.

My official interview video on iTube passed two hundred million views within twenty-four hours, shattering the record previously held by an idol singer. Edited clips and all kinds of memes poured in from every corner of the world.

And on top of that…

"We've received another interview request from the American broadcaster CNM."

"Another one?"

"I already told you that BCC in the United Kingdom made an offer. They want to invite you as a special guest and said they can give you up to twenty minutes for a live interview."

"How special. Seriously."

Interview requests were pouring in from the flagship broadcasters of major countries anyone would recognize by name.

Of course, I had not accepted a single one. By now, merely hearing about them made my head throb.

"Are you still considering it?"

"Yes. If it'll help the Peace Guild grow, I should do everything I can, but…"

I lowered my voice until only Team Leader Choi could hear me.

"It's all a lie."

That was right. This was the most important part.

None of what surrounded me was actually true.

Team Leader Choi spoke with a tense expression.

"That… Did you bring it again today?"

"Of course."

With the solemn expression of a priest performing a ritual to summon a god, I chanted the incantation.

"Come forth, Warlordmon!"

Inventory. Summon.

At the command I uttered in my mind, a glossy black skull appeared on my palm, making a tremendous racket.

"Who are you calling Warlordmon?! I am the master of the Black Forest and the commander of the great Army of the Dead! I'm a Skeleton Warlord!"

"Warlordmon, forward roll!"

"You insane human!"

"Warlordmon, Quick Attack!"

Papapapapat!

Team Leader Choi watched me clutch the Warlord's skull and shake it at insane speed. Then he muttered as though he had attained enlightenment.

“Why on earth did you capture that thing and bring it back…?”

Chapter 303

A week earlier, the four people who heard my whole story had reacted in ways that were both alike and completely different.

“You captured a Named Monster alive, took control of it, and used it for raids? Hahaha! You crazy bastard!”

“…Are you actually fucking insane?”

“I’m sorry to ask this, but… have you truly lost your mind, Hunter Jin Taekyung?”

“You’ve gone insane. I’ll pretend I never heard any of this.”

Im Kkeokjeong was the only one who laughed. Song Song, Butler Kim, and Team Leader Choi looked at me as though I belonged in a psychiatric ward.

But what else could I have done? The moment the interview ended, the media erupted like an active volcano, and in less than an hour, I became a celebrity known to half the population of Korea.

“I should have stopped it then.”

Papapapapat!

Team Leader Choi lamented as he watched Warlordmon perform Quick Attack.[1581]

But the water had already been spilled, and for such a spectacular mess, it had been cleaned up remarkably well.

“Still, everything worked out.”

Even the government audit team, renowned for its thoroughness, failed to uncover the truth behind the incident.

That was only natural. No one could have imagined what had really happened. Besides, there was plenty of evidence to support the official story.

“The magical-power distribution survey conducted with a magical-power meter passed without issue, and they recovered both fragments of the Skeleton Warlord’s armor and pieces of its bones. It was an open-and-shut case.”

Everything left traces behind.

Unlike the other Skeletons, which had either melted or shattered under One Annihilation, the Warlord’s incredibly durable bones had retained their shape.

Still saturated with immense magical power, they were accepted as crucial evidence proving both the Named Monster’s existence and its defeat.

“Come to think of it, didn’t they put those soup bones up for auction? I wonder how much they sold for.”

“Soup bones?! Do not refer to my noble body in such a manner!”

“You still haven’t grasped your situation. Warlordmon, Body Slam.”

Thump! Thump! Thump!

[1581] Quick Attack is a move in the Pokémon games. Taekyung is addressing Warlordmon as though giving commands in a monster battle.

The Warlord bounced off the office walls like a tennis ball, clicking its jaw mournfully.

“Ah, my loyal soldiers. How I long to see you.”

“So, where’s this month’s tribute of troops?”

“…I shall replenish their numbers as soon as possible.”

Just then, the office door opened with a click.

A pair of shapely legs began to step inside, then stopped short. Looking up into a pair of light-brown eyes, I asked,

“What are you doing? Aren’t you coming in?”

“…Jin Taekyung, you crazy bastard. If you were me, would you want to walk into a room where someone was playing ball with a talking skeleton?”

“Yeah.”

I waved the Skeleton Warlord at the disgusted Song Song.

“Warlordmon, scare her.”

“Eeeeeeeek! Don’t! I said don’t!”

“Warlordmon, wag your tail.”

“I do not have a tail.”

“Then use Quick Attack.[1582]”

Papapapapat!

“Urrrgh, urrrghhhh!”

“Eeeeeeeek!”

Thank God for the sound-blocking spell.

Just as Song Song’s screams and the Skeleton Warlord’s howls blended into a perfect a cappella harmony, Team Leader Choi’s phone rang on the table.

“Everyone, please be quiet for a moment.”

Team Leader Choi stared intently at the screen. Several minutes passed before he finally spoke.

“I think I’ll need to step away.”

“Did something happen?”

Team Leader Choi shook his head at my question.

“I’ll tell you once this matter is confirmed. And, Miss Song.”

“Yes?”

“First, cancel the additional raid scheduled for next week. I expect to be neglecting my duties for the next several days, so please assist Butler Kim.”

[1582] Quick Attack is a move in the Pokémon games. Taekyung is addressing Warlordmon as though giving commands in a monster battle.

These days, even ten of Butler Kim would not have been enough. On top of handling the aftermath of the incident, he was leading the Guild members on raids and continuing his training in the Jin Family's Cultivation Technique.

Of course, the five of us, myself included, were dividing the work between us. But as the Guild Master, he was busy on a completely different level.

"Got it. That's easy enough. It's not like we can make Uncle Kkeokjeong do it."

Song Song nodded readily, then paused and looked at me.

"But what are you going to do?"

"Me?"

"Who else would I be talking about?"

"Warlordmon, Quick—"

"If you do that one more time, I'll kill you. I mean it."

"…Attack."

That was probably enough.

I casually slipped Warlordmon into my Inventory as it spasmed reflexively like one of Pavlov's dogs.

"I'm getting ready to leave."

"Leave? I'm working overtime today."

"I have somewhere to be."

"Oh, really? What could possibly be so important that you get to leave on time while everyone else keeps working?"

I answered with a huge yawn.

"An exam."

"An exam? What exam?"

"What do you think? Don't you even know what day it is?"

Song Song blinked for a moment, then her eyes widened.

It was the middle of November. No matter how busy someone was, they knew what day it was. This was an exam important enough for the news to run a countdown to it.

"Are you taking the college entrance exam?"

"Are you crazy? My sister is."

I checked the clock on the office wall.

Five in the afternoon. If I left now, I should arrive around the time the exam ended.

"I'm heading out. Hang in there. You too, Song-i."

I rose from the soft sofa and left the office.

I could picture Mom praying fervently near the test center and Hayeon working her way through the questions.

I'm worried. She probably hasn't been able to study properly lately because of me.

For the past few months, the various incidents surrounding me had exposed Hayeon to the media and forced her to endure intense attention from everyone around her.

For a student on the verge of taking the college entrance exam, it was devastating.

I feel bad.

I could only hope her results reflected all the effort she had put in.

With anxiety gnawing at me, I headed for the test center. An hour later, I saw Hayeon's gloomy face and realized my fears had come true.

"You… Never mind. You worked hard."

"Yes, sweetheart. You've worked so hard."

At Mom's and my words, Hayeon gave us a faint smile.

"Well, look who actually showed up. I can barely remember the last time I saw your face."

"My little sister is taking the college entrance exam. Of course I had to come, you brat."

"Even after disguising yourself like that?"

"Is it that obvious?"

"Yeah. Sunglasses and a mask at night look terrible. They make you stand out even more."

"Damn it. No wonder people have been staring at me."

"Are you an idiot? Of course they're going to stare when you're so obviously disguised."

Her smile was gray and wilted, without a trace of energy. Seeing how completely drained she looked only made me feel guiltier.

"Are you okay?"

Hayeon answered with a miserable expression.

"No."

"I'm sorry. It's because of me."

"I thought I'd get a perfect score, but I got one question wrong in English."

"Here I am, your own brother, making things harder for you. I'm so ashamed I can't even look you in the face… What did you just say?"

"I got one wrong! I missed a perfect score on the college entrance exam by one question!"

Thud! Thud!

I stared blankly as Hayeon kicked the ground in frustration.

Is she insane?

She had missed only one question across every subject on the college entrance exam?

I knew she was smart, but I had no idea she was this smart.

No, more importantly, how does she already know she got one wrong?

Was that why she had come out thirty minutes late?

Either way, one thing was certain. This winter was going to be a fairly warm one for our family.

And…

"I got one wrong! One more correct answer and I would've had a perfect score, but I missed it!"

If I left that lunatic alone, the students and parents around us would cast a net over heaven and earth to hunt us down.

"Stop talking nonsense and let's go eat."

"Let go! What would someone with seventh-tier school grades[1583] know about how I feel?"

"Keep your voice down. Please."

I grabbed my hysterical sister by the back of the neck and dragged her away. From inside my Inventory, the Skeleton Warlord muttered,

"Blood truly cannot lie."

You're getting one hundred Quick Attacks.[1584] Guaranteed.

Time flew by.

With Hayeon's college entrance exam finally over, our family moved back into our old house once the remodeling was complete. Mom shed tears of joy at the unexpected gift.

"Son… Thank you so much. I don't know what to say."

"It's nothing. Please don't say that."

"I'm grateful too, son."

"Hayeon, now that the college entrance exam is over, would you like your life to be over too?"

Taking care of something that had been on my mind for so long left me feeling much lighter.

Even so, something still nagged at me.

They might go after my family.

Taking someone's family hostage was a simple but effective tactic.

I didn't think Lee Jungryong, who had a weakness, would resort to such a method, but I had to prepare for the worst.

[1583] Korean school-record grades use a nine-tier scale, with the first tier highest.

[1584] Quick Attack is a move in the Pokémon games. Taekyung is addressing Warlordmon as though giving commands in a monster battle.

I'll keep making money anyway. There's no reason to be stingy.

High-ranking Hunters earned so much that people called them walking small and midsize businesses.

But even those top Hunters couldn't compare to my income.

I cleared raids several times faster than other people, and I often fought solo.

For a Hunter, exceptional skill naturally led to wealth.

And if there was one more thing that came with it, it was fame.

"Butler Kim, could you handle the interview and advertising offers that have come in for me?"

"All of them?"

"No. Just the important ones that pay well."

Even though I accepted only a tiny fraction of the hundreds of offers, an enormous sum poured into my account.

That was how much interest people had in me, both in Korea and abroad.

A few advertisements, interviews, and appearances on television talk shows. That was more than enough.

The number in my bank account became morbidly obese, and the Peace Guild's stock price soared.

Two birds with one stone. A double windfall.

"May I ask you for one important favor?"

"Anything. Just say the word."

"Please find me a security company. A reliable one."

"Heh-heh. Leave it to me."

Mom and Hayeon never noticed a thing.

They did not know that the houses on either side of ours and across the street had secretly been purchased. Nor did they know that several seemingly happy married couples were actually undercover bodyguards.

They were only puzzled.

"Son, did you know a lot of married couples live around here?"

"Really?"

"Yes. I run into them whenever I go to the neighborhood market. Some are young and some are older, but none of them have children."

"It's the age of low birth rates."

"Oppa,[1585] only two men live next door. They walk around with their arms linked."

"…It's the age of gender equality."

That made them stand out way too much!

[1585] Oppa is a Korean term a girl or woman uses to address an older brother or an older man she is close to.

A few days after I asked the company to rearrange its personnel, I received a KakaoTalk[1586] message from Hayeon.

> Jin Hayeon
> └ Jin Hayeon: Wow
> └ Jin Hayeon: This time two women moved in > └ Jin Hayeon: They walk around with their fingers interlaced all the time;;

"…"

Could this security company really be trusted?

Contrary to my concerns, the bodyguards did an excellent job.

Reports came in every thirty minutes, and they never took their eyes off my family.

I was so busy I barely had time to breathe, but everything was proceeding smoothly. Even so, there was one disappointment.

Leveling up.

Ding.

SYSTEM

You defeated a Lv.70 Skeleton Archer!
You gained an extremely small amount of EXP!
The difference in power is substantial. The amount of EXP gained is drastically reduced.

"Oh, shit. God, please!"

Despite my desperate pleas, the EXP factory was no longer much help to me.

Three or four level-ups. That was all I got out of it.

"Heh-heh. I do not understand this EXP or leveling up you speak of, but this is excellent news. Human, this is where greed leads!"

"But if I erase you, I can probably squeeze out one more level-up, right?"

"…I shall try harder. Please, anything but that!"

"Whew. I'll put that off for now. But you'll keep paying your tribute in troops."

"Why?! You just said you gain nothing from killing my soldiers anymore!"

"That's true for me. Our Guild members still need to gain experience."

"Experience?"

"We can use them to give our people some combat practice. Have your subordinates rehearse their acting. Tell them to make it convincing without letting [1586] KakaoTalk is a messaging app widely used in Korea.

on that they're going easy on us. Of course, you know what happens if anyone on our side dies, right?"

"…You intend to suck the marrow from my bones. Just how cruel can the human race be?"

The Skeleton Warlord lamented, but I already held its leash.

The new Guild members gained experience in combat that was almost real against the Skeletons, who made excellent supporting actors.

That's right. Train hard and grow big and strong.

It was exactly one week after Hayeon's college entrance exam when Team Leader Choi reappeared.

"It's been a while, everyone. But before we catch up, there's something I need to show you."

With a tired voice and a stiff smile, he looked at us, pulled a USB drive from inside his jacket, and connected it to the hologram TV.

"This video came from China."

Beep.

The video began playing with a cold electronic tone.

Chapter 304

Every source of light in the office had been blocked out. As the holographic video began playing in the darkness, I suddenly felt as though I were standing at the scene myself.

This place is…

Everything was gray. I couldn't see an inch in front of me.

Only after an eagle's massive wing swept dangerously close did I realize where the footage had begun.

The sky.

The drone recording the scene descended rapidly, escaping the fine dust that filled the air.

Whoooosh.

After plunging through the fierce wind for some time, it finally emerged above a city engulfed in flames.

Boom! Rumble-rumble-rumble!

"Eeeeeek!"

"Aaaaaah!"

Factories belching smoke exploded one after another. Towering buildings toppled like dominoes, while people who looked like tiny dots screamed and fled in every direction.

Pandemonium.

There were too many of them to count.

Thousands were visible at a glance. Including those beyond the camera's view, there had to be tens of thousands.

"What the hell is this…?"

A groan escaped me before I could stop it. Was this because of some factory explosion?

No. It was because I had spotted creatures racing through the maze-like city, spreading destruction and slaughter wherever they went.

"Grrrrrrr!"

"Graaah!"

Massive bodies. Strength and Agility that could only belong to monsters.

Their eyes gleamed with killing intent as they swept across their surroundings. Then, letting out hideous roars, they began searching for targets.

Why are there monsters out there?

The question lasted only a moment before I realized the answer myself.

There was only one possibility.

A Monster Wave.

During the Great Cataclysm, Gates had been passageways connecting Earth to another world known as the Demon Realm.

But after the Demon King Asmodeus disappeared, the monsters' power weakened, and Gates became doors that only humans could freely pass through.

There was one exception.

If the mana inside a Gate exceeded its capacity, everything changed.

When a dam breaks, the water comes rushing out.

That was a Monster Wave, and the holographic video was showing us the result.

"Kyaaaaaa!"

"P-please, save me…!"

Crunch!

The camera zoomed in on the massacre unfolding in the heart of the city.

Monsters slaughtered and destroyed without restraint while humans died helplessly around them.

Some were impaled on monsters' claws. Others were trampled to death beneath the feet of the fleeing crowd.

Amid that maelstrom of chaos, a mother and daughter running for their lives caught my eye.

"Bingbing! Hold Mommy's hand tight!"

The woman had barely shouted the words when—

Whoosh! Thunk!

A spear flew from a dark alley, pierced her chest, and buried itself in the ground.

She vomited up a mouthful of blood, then her body went limp.

The child burst into tears at the sight of her mother dying before her eyes.

"Mommy!"

But it wasn't over yet. More than a hundred Orcs poured from the dark alley and advanced on the child.

They had taken up ideal positions to block the fleeing civilians' escape routes.

One Orc who appeared to be their leader raised an axe and brought it down toward the crying child.

Whish! Slice!

"Krk?"

The leader stared down at its arm in confusion.

The thick arm holding the axe had been cleanly severed below the elbow. Before the Orc stood a man who hadn't been there a moment ago.

"How dare mere monsters lay hands on the people of Zhonghua?"[1587]

[1587] Zhonghua is a Chinese term for China and its people, often used to express national identity.

A dazzling aura flashed.

Slice!

The leader's head was severed. Before it could even hit the ground, a thunderous cry burst from the man's mouth.

"Public Security Armed Forces Department!"

"Yes!"

The answer rang out.

The man was not alone. Hunters from the Public Security Armed Forces, their armor emblazoned with China's Five-Starred Red Flag, were streaming onto the battlefield even now.

The man shouted, his eyes blazing.

"Kill every last one of those stinking bastards!"

"For the people!"

Sh-sh-sh-shk!

With a tremendous roar, more than a thousand Hunters charged forward.

Despite the enormous losses it had suffered during the Great Cataclysm, China still had a population of well over a billion.

The strength of each individual was unknown, but it would not be an exaggeration to say that China could mobilize more Hunters than any other country in the world.

"Wipe them all out!"

"Waaah! Long live the People's Republic of China!"

A thousand Hunters charged as one.

The monsters rampaging through the city weren't about to stand by and watch. Every kind of monster converged in one place, their numbers easily surpassing a thousand as well.

"Gwoooooo!"

"Kya-woo!"

Thud-thud-thud-thud-thud!

Monsters and humans. Humans and monsters.

Two waves that could never coexist surged toward each other.

Eyes shining with resolve, and killing intent directed at the enemy.

The force of the scene filled the office, so overwhelming that it was hard to believe we were watching a holographic video.

High above, the drone captured the two forces rapidly closing the distance between them.

Five hundred meters[1588]. Three hundred[1589]. One hundred[1590]…

[1588] Five hundred meters is about 1,640 ft.

[1589] Three hundred meters is about 980 ft.

Just as the deafening noise reached its peak and the two sides were about to collide—

“Perish in hellfire. Fire Rain.”

A cold voice utterly devoid of life.

At the same time, the gray sky split open.

Kiiiiing.

It was a sight unlike anything I had ever seen.

About thirty meters[1591] in the air, not far from the drone, the empty space peeled open as though something had sliced through it.

A massive ball of flame emerged from a vortex writhing with black energy.

Whoooosh!

The Chinese Hunters stopped in their tracks without realizing it and stared blankly at the sight.

“This can’t be.”

“This is… a dream.”

Unfortunately for them, it was all real.

Crack!

The sphere of flame, dozens of meters[1592] in diameter, split into four pieces. Each of those four divided into dozens more, and those dozens shattered into hundreds of fragments.

Then the rain of fire struck the earth.

Whoooom! KABOOM!

Rrrrrumble!

The deafening explosions dyed everything red.

The drone was thrown off balance by the aftershock. When it finally steadied itself, the being responsible for creating that spectacular scene was staring directly at it.

“A human device, I see.”

Its voice held neither inflection nor vitality.

The figure wore a robe covered in strange patterns, its hood pulled low. It extended one finger toward the drone.

I shall kill you all and take everything. Those who set foot upon my territory will pay with their lives.

Bzzzzzt!

The instant that finger, gnarled like the root of an ancient tree, moved, the video vanished in a burst of static.

[1590] One hundred meters is about 330 ft.

[1591] Thirty meters is about 98 ft.

[1592] Dozens of meters means tens of meters, or roughly 100 ft or more.

The gray sky choked with fine dust disappeared. So did the scene below, a sight that could only be called the end of the world.

With the hologram gone, a heavy silence descended over the office.

I was the first to speak.

“What the hell is that bastard?”

“He is the man responsible for this Monster Wave. No—he isn’t a man, so I suppose that isn’t quite the right word.”

Team Leader Choi continued in a subdued voice.

“A Named Monster. A Lich. That is what he is.”

A Lich.

A fallen archmage. An apex monster reigning at the top of the pyramid of countless undead.

The Lich that had supposedly vanished after the Great Cataclysm had appeared. It had caused an enormous catastrophe, as though celebrating its return after several decades.

Team Leader Choi unplugged the USB drive and spoke.

“November fifth. This footage was recorded exactly ten days ago by a reconnaissance drone belonging to Chinese intelligence. It shows a small city near Nanchong City in Sichuan Province. The estimated number of casualties so far is approximately three hundred thousand. An accurate count is still unavailable.”

Sichuan.

I was more familiar with it as the region where Qingcheng and Emei of the Nine Sects and One Gang were located, along with the Tang Clan, one of the Five Great Families.

Of course, Murim was an entirely different world that merely resembled China, and what the hologram had shown us was a catastrophe on an unimaginable scale.

“Three hundred thousand?”

“Yes.”

“That’s fucking insane…”

“And that figure covers only the first twenty-four hours after the Wave began.”

A chill ran down my spine.

Three hundred thousand estimated casualties in a single day. Had humanity suffered this much damage from a Monster Wave even once since the Great Cataclysm?

“Are Liches normally this powerful?”

I directed the question not at Team Leader Choi but at Butler Kim, the only one among us who had lived through the Great Cataclysm.

His eyes trembled like ripples on water.

“Of course not. The Liches I saw with my own eyes during the Great Cataclysm were all immensely powerful, but… that one is on an entirely different level. Its fire magic gave me goose bumps just watching it.”

Butler Kim was an A-rank mage who specialized in fire magic.

If a man who had been through hell and back during the Great Cataclysm said that, it showed just how powerful this Lich was.

Where the hell did something like that come from?

The burning city and the people collapsing in pools of blood lingered before my eyes. The enormous rain of fire that had hammered the earth was a disaster in the truest sense of the word.

I remembered the declaration the creature had made to the camera at the very end.

I shall kill you all and take everything. Those who set foot upon my territory will pay with their lives.

No one else could have understood what it said, but I could.

Thanks to the Integrated Language Pack, part of the System, I had heard every word clearly and understood what they meant.

That merciless undead monster would never be satisfied with a single small city.

Three hundred thousand people in one day? With the power it had displayed, the number of casualties might already be ten times higher by now.

“Goddamn it…”

I didn’t particularly like China, but no sane person could look at a catastrophe like this and laugh that they had gotten what they deserved.

The thought of all those people dying helplessly—and the little girl crying over her dead mother—left a bitter taste in my mouth.

Then something occurred to me.

Wait.

Now that I had recovered somewhat from the shock, one thing struck me as strange.

A catastrophe of this magnitude had happened ten days ago, yet the world remained peaceful.

And more importantly…

Where did Team Leader Choi get this information?

If it had been the Ares Guild—or Lee Jungryong—I could have understood. They were one of the world’s leading Guilds, and their intelligence network was exceptional.

But Team Leader Choi was just a team leader in an ordinary mid-sized Guild. If even he knew about this, news of the Sichuan disaster should already have been playing on broadcasts around the world.

There's something going on.

I wasn't the only one who had reached that conclusion.

Everyone was staring at Team Leader Choi, silently demanding an explanation.

He wasn't the kind of person who would fail to notice.

"One week ago, I received an unexpected message."

That was the day Hayeon finished her college entrance exam.

Team Leader Choi had spent a long time staring at his phone that day before leaving, saying that something important had come up.

"It was from China, wasn't it?"

Team Leader Choi nodded.

"Yes. More precisely, it was a request for one particular person to take part in this crisis."

"Forget everything else for a second. China specifically asked for me?"

"Yes. 'He' wanted you."

"Who's he?"

A name slipped from Team Leader Choi's lips.

"Xiao Yang."

"Gah!"

"Xiao Yang?"

"Young Master. Is that true?"

The moment they heard the name, everyone in the room stared wide-eyed. Naturally, I did the same.

I gaped at Team Leader Choi before finally managing to speak.

"X-Xiao Yang asked for me?"

"Yes."

"But who's Xiao Yang?"

"…"

Why did they all look like that? It was possible that I didn't know.

Team Leader Choi's eyelids twitched for a long moment before he finally spoke.

"Xiao Yang is the General Secretary of China's Central Committee."

"Jongseok?"[1593]

"The General Secretary! The Chairman—the Chairman of the country!"

Well, fuck me.

[1593] Taekyung mishears chongseogi ("general secretary") as the Korean given name Jongseok.

Chapter 305

“Are you feeling any better? You can’t have fully recovered yet.”

“…I’m fine.”

“If it gets too hard, take a rest. You may still be young, Team Leader Seok, but if you keep pushing yourself, you’ll wear yourself down.”

“I have no excuse.”

Lee Jungryong shot a glance at Go Jun, who answered with a pale face, and clicked his tongue inwardly.

I never expected him to go down so easily.

Go Jun was the most useful blade Lee Jungryong possessed.

Although his abilities were not known outside their circle, Lee believed that fewer than five people in all of Korea could stand against him.

Of course, two of those people were Cheon Taemin and Lee himself.

To take him down in a single move… He exceeded my expectations.

Lee could no longer deny it. He had underestimated Jin Taekyung and the Peace Guild.

The gap in strength was laughable, yet he was the one who kept getting humiliated.

His gaze settled on Go Jun’s bowed head.

“Go Jun.”

Go Jun looked up. Lee calling him by name meant this was a conversation between Master and Disciple, not between the Vice Guild Master and his Head of Security.

“Yes, Master.”

“You are the Disciple I poured my heart and soul into training. Never forget that.”

“I have never forgotten it for a single moment. You are more than a parent to me, Master.”

Lee Jungryong nodded at the unwaveringly loyal answer.

Go Jun fell short as a Disciple in many ways, but his loyalty was second to none.

Lee had held off until now in the faint hope that it would not be necessary…but the time had come to sharpen his blade further.

“You were not defeated. You merely fell. I will give you the strength to rise again.”

“Strength, you say?”

“For now, that is all you need to know. I will make you strong enough to defeat Jin Taekyung with your own hands.”

“…!”

Go Jun’s body trembled as he bowed deeply.

“Thank you, Master.”

"Always remember that your Master believes in you."

Despite his warm voice, Lee Jungryong's eyes had sunk to unfathomable depths.

Oblivious to that fact, Go Jun raised his flushed face. By then, the faint sound of someone approaching could be heard beyond the door.

"He's finally here."

Go Jun frowned at Lee Jungryong's mutter.

"He missed the agreed-upon time."

"Let it go. He's only in the first year of his term. He wants to enjoy it while he can, before he becomes a lame duck."

"Even so, to keep you waiting…"

"Team Leader Seok. Remember your position."

"Understood."

Go Jun returned from Lee Jungryong's Disciple to the Ares Guild's Head of Security and fell silent.

Not long afterward, the door opened and five or six people entered.

The middle-aged man leading them strode toward Lee Jungryong and extended his hand.

"I apologize for keeping you waiting. Traffic was particularly bad today. It reminded me once again how valuable an escort vehicle can be. Ha ha."

His manner was courteous yet confident. He was someone who could offer his hand first to Lee Jungryong, the de facto leader of the Ares Guild.

The middle-aged man wearing the Korean flag pin on his chest had every right to do so.

Lee Jungryong shook his hand with a faint smile.

"Think nothing of it. Thank you for making the trip, Mr. President."

Baek Hanseong, the twenty-seventh President of Korea and the youngest person ever elected to the office at the age of forty, nodded.

"It's been a while, Vice Guild Master Lee. Is this the first time we've met since my inauguration at the beginning of the year?"

"That's right. We seem to be meeting more often than I expected."

"Pardon me? Ha ha."

Baek Hanseong let out a dry laugh at Lee Jungryong's answer.

He knew full well how much power the man before him wielded.

People even said that Korea had two presidents and that the Ares Guild House was another Blue House.[1594]

He never once visited the Blue House during the previous president's term.

The major Guilds were impregnable fortresses built from power and wealth.

[1594] The Blue House was the traditional office and residence of South Korea's president.

And Lee Jungryong, the man who held the Ares Guild in the palm of his hand, enjoyed a status surpassing even that once held by the heads of the chaebol conglomerates.

There were two reasons Baek Hanseong could meet with such a man now, even unofficially.

First, he was still early in his term and enjoyed the full support of the people. Second, they had a matter in which they could help each other.

“They say people become more relaxed as they grow older. I suppose that doesn’t apply to me.”

“You really are refreshingly direct.”

Baek Hanseong understood the meaning behind Lee Jungryong’s subtle remark and held out a pristine white document envelope.

“An unofficial diplomatic letter from Chairman Xiao Yang.”

“Unofficial, as expected.”

“Yes. As you know, that’s how it is.”

The People’s Republic of China. As its formal name suggested, China remained a deeply rooted communist state.

The Communist Party leadership wanted neither unrest among the people nor any loss of faith in the Party.

“You’ve managed to conceal damage on that scale. I’m not sure whether to call that impressive.”

“If the truth comes out, all of China will descend into chaos. By then, there will be no going back.”

Among the tiny number of people who already knew the truth, however, the incident was being called the Sichuan Catastrophe.

The Chinese Communist Party leadership had announced that a major earthquake had struck and deployed the People’s Liberation Army to seal off the surrounding area.

“A Lich, was it? That Named Monster ended up helping China’s Central Committee, albeit unintentionally. I hear even satellites from the United States can’t see what’s happening inside.”

“It’s spatial distortion magic. Extremely powerful spatial distortion magic.”

“I see. I’m still completely ignorant when it comes to magic.”

“It may have helped the Central Committee, but it will have a negative effect on the war situation. We have no idea what is actually happening in there.”

Unlike his unhurried voice, Lee Jungryong’s eyes raced across the words on the documents.

A short while later, after confirming everything, a quiet mutter escaped between his lips.

"Thirty A-rank Hunters and two hundred B-rank Hunters…"

The documents from China were a contract to hire them as mercenaries and resolve the crisis.

They also contained one clause that Lee Jungryong could not overlook.

"They singled me out."

President Baek Hanseong nodded.

"They say the Central Military Commission strongly insisted on it. They believe the Ares Guild and your role, Vice Guild Master Lee, will be decisive in this matter."

"I imagine so. The situation must be growing desperate enough to spiral out of control."

"As you know, China has a great many Hunters, but relatively few of them are truly elite."

"That has always been China's problem."

Tap. Tap. Tap.

Lee Jungryong's fingers slowly tapped the documents. A calculator was whirring inside his head.

The forces China had requested amounted to twenty percent of the Ares Guild's total strength.

No. If Lee Jungryong joined them, that figure rose to fifty percent. Fewer than twenty S-rank Hunters existed in the entire world, and each one was an absolute powerhouse.

They must be desperate.

This was not the first offer China had made.

Three days earlier, Lee Jungryong had held a secret meeting with the Chinese ambassador to Korea. The footage shown alongside the proposal had far surpassed his expectations.

That was tremendous magic.

The ability to command more than several thousand monsters. Magic with overwhelming destructive power.

It was on an entirely different level from the Liches he had encountered during the Great Cataclysm. He had seen only a single spell, but that had been more than enough to grasp the danger this incident posed.

However…

Danger always comes with a commensurate reward.

Establishing a foothold in a dictatorship was never easy.

The Sichuan Catastrophe was a disaster to some, but an opportunity to others. And the terms China had offered were sweet—so sweet that Lee worried one of his competitors might seize them first.

As long as I'm there, this operation cannot fail.

Having reached his decision, Lee Jungryong finally spoke.

“I accept China’s proposal.”

“That is a wise decision.”

A smile appeared on President Baek Hanseong’s lips.

If the Ares Guild made a major contribution to resolving the crisis, it would yield considerable diplomatic benefits as well. As someone who wanted to achieve something significant during his term, Baek could not have been more pleased.

“I’m the one who should be grateful that I can help my country and Your Excellency. However…”

Baek Hanseong’s smile faded at Lee Jungryong’s next words.

“I heard a rumor that similar proposals were made not only to the Ares Guild, but also to several of the other ten largest Guilds in Korea.”

…

“I know it’s an unfounded rumor. But I thought I’d ask you, just in case.”

After a brief silence, Baek Hanseong answered.

“It seems a baseless rumor has leaked out. Nothing of the sort will happen.”

At that moment, the chief secretary standing behind Baek Hanseong thought to himself:

I’ll have to remove tomorrow’s unofficial meeting with the heads of Korea’s ten largest Guilds from the schedule.

Only after pruning away those irritating stray branches did Lee Jungryong smile brightly.

“Just as I thought. I understand. I’ll select the necessary personnel immediately.”

But Baek Hanseong was not finished.

“The rumor about the ten largest Guilds is false, but it isn’t entirely baseless.”

Lee Jungryong paused while gathering the documents.

“What do you mean?”

“Among the Guilds that received China’s proposal, there is one that does not belong to the ten largest Guilds.”

“Don’t tell me…”

A sudden thought flashed through Lee Jungryong’s mind.

At the same time, Baek Hanseong opened his lips.

“The Peace Guild, to which Hunter Jin Taekyung belongs.”

“…!”

Lee Jungryong’s face hardened.

Again. Once again, that bastard was getting in his way.

Those three syllables—Jin Taekyung—were beginning to irritate him even more than the name Choi Minwoo.

“That is rather inconvenient.”

Lee Jungryong’s voice rasped like sandpaper.

That green president, with a shelf life of only five years, had known about this and done nothing to stop it.

Lee was aware of the new president’s anti-Ares political leanings, but wasn’t this tantamount to openly making an enemy of him?

Suppressing the shout threatening to burst out of him, Lee Jungryong spoke.

“When there are too many boatmen, the ship ends up on a mountain.”

“I’m aware.”

“Your Excellency, this is not a matter that can be handled so simply…”

Baek Hanseong’s calm reply cut him off.

“The owner of the boat personally called for those boatmen. There was nothing I could do.”

“The owner of the boat… Surely not?”

“Yes. Chairman Xiao Yang named them personally. He specifically requested that Vice Guild Master Lee, the Ares Guild, and Hunter Jin Taekyung all participate.”

“…!”

Lee Jungryong’s eyelids trembled.

At the sight, President Baek Hanseong felt the same thrill he had experienced when he defied everyone’s expectations and won the presidential election.

Suppressing the smile threatening to escape, he glanced down at his watch.

“The Peace Guild is a very small operation, so perhaps that’s why they prepared so quickly. They should already be aboard their flight by now.”

—You treacherous human.

“Wow. So this is first class.”

—I was wrong to think you merely treacherous and foolish. I humbly apologize.

“Damn, these cushions are incredible. What kind of alcohol do they have?”

—You are mad. A lunatic. A mad bastard. A crazy fuck!

“Look how spacious these seats are. I could live here.”

—You insane human! Don’t go!

God, he’s noisy as hell.

Pretending not to hear the Skeleton Warlord screaming inside my Inventory, I asked Team Leader Choi, “How much does one of these cost?”

Team Leader Choi launched into his answer as if he had been waiting for me to ask.

“This new model from Focke-Wulf, the German aircraft manufacturer renowned for its outstanding technology—”

Here we go again.

I hurriedly cut him off before he could start explaining the history of Focke-Wulf’s founder.

“I don’t know if it’s Focke-Wulf or Pokémon Black Friday, but I’m asking how much a plane like this usually costs.”

“An aircraft like the one we’re on now should cost a little over one hundred billion won.[1595]”

“Hmm. I should buy one.”

Anyone who overheard me would have stared at me as if I were insane.

But it wasn’t impossible.

I recalled the conversation Team Leader Choi and I had shared only a few hours earlier.

“It’s a shame, but please tell Grandpa Jongseok[1596] I can’t go.”

“It isn’t Grandpa Jongseok. It’s Chairman Xiao Yang. In any case, that is unfortunate.”

I’m sorry too. Promoting my name and raising the Guild’s standing both sound good, but that place is a bit much.

They offered ten billion won.

How much?

Ten billion won. If you go beyond the promised period of one week, they’ll calculate an additional ten billion won per week.

Weekly pay? T-ten billion won a week?

It can’t be helped.

B-but I’m still not going. With thousands of monsters and a crazy skeleton mage, even I have to draw the line. It’s not like I’m some money-crazed bastard.

They say they’ll pay fifty trillion won to whoever kills the Lich.

Ah, now I suddenly feel like eating something spicy. I hear Sichuan cuisine is incredibly hot and savory…

…

Fuck it. Let’s go.

All the preparations were completed at lightning speed. Only Team Leader Choi and I would be leaving for China.

Chairman Xiao Yang had only wanted me in the first place anyway.

This isn’t about the money.

[1595] One hundred billion won is about $71 million or €65 million.

[1596] Taekyung’s “Jongseok” plays on juseok, the Korean title for a chairman.

I was going solely to help the suffering people of China and raise the Guild's standing.

With my face full of noble resolve, I turned to Team Leader Choi.

"But, Team Leader Choi."

"Yes?"

"If I make fifty trillion won[1597]… Do I split that with the Guild too?"

…

"Let's settle this before we go. Money matters need to be handled cleanly."

Team Leader Choi stared at me in disbelief before answering.

"We'll split it nine to one."

This guy was something else too.

As we stared at each other like we were both human garbage, an announcement came over the cabin speakers and the private jet sent by China began to take off.

[1597] Fifty trillion won is about $36 billion or €32 billion.

Chapter 306

As the enormous fuselage of the Boeing 747-8 VIP lifted into the sky, Jin Taekyung, who had been bouncing excitedly in his seat, sprang up and began roaming the cabin.

“Wow, this isn’t a plane. It’s practically a hotel suite! Team Leader, look over here. There’s even a bed!”

At his endless exclamations, Choi Minwoo pressed a hand to his forehead. Anyone watching would think they were going on an overseas vacation instead of heading to a battlefield.

“Um… Mr. Jin?”

“Hang on. I’m going to ask what kind of liquor they have.”

The private jet sent by China’s Central Committee had three Chinese flight attendants. Jin Taekyung called one of them over and began speaking to her in fluent Chinese.

No way. He’s practically a native speaker.

His command of the language was so natural that he could have been born and raised in China.

Choi Minwoo also had a talent for languages and spoke several fluently, but he was nowhere near Jin Taekyung’s level.

He had heard Taekyung was terrible at school. When on earth had he learned to speak Chinese that well?

Then a thought flashed through Choi Minwoo’s astonished mind.

Come to think of it, he talks to monsters too.

Jin Taekyung was, after all, the man who could speak the Demon Realm language—which even renowned linguists struggled to decipher—and curse fluently in it to boot.

When Choi Minwoo had asked how that was even possible, the only answer he received was that it was a trade secret.

…Let’s just stop thinking about it. That’ll be easier on my mind.

Giving up always made life easier. Besides, this was hardly the first time something like this had happened. Taekyung would tell him when the time came.

Resigning himself to that, Choi Minwoo accepted the glass the flight attendant poured for him.

“What is this? It’s clear, so I assume it’s some kind of vodka.”

“First Dew Fresh.”

“…”

[1598] Soju is a Korean distilled alcoholic drink.

"Heh. I didn't expect it, but they actually had soju[1598]. First Dew tastes best on the rocks."

Jin Taekyung dropped onto one of the cabin sofas and downed glass after glass. Appalled by the way he kept knocking them back, Choi Minwoo asked, "Are you possessed by the ghost of someone who died of thirst?"

"I'm drinking in advance. Going back and forth is a hassle."

"Excuse me?"

"Never mind. It's nothing."

After muttering that cryptic remark, Jin Taekyung asked, "You said it would take five or six hours, right?"

"That's how long it should take to reach Chengdu International Airport in Sichuan Province. It could take longer in an emergency."

"What kind of emergency?"

"What else could it be?"

The emergency Choi Minwoo meant was the Lich's monster army occupying Chengdu.

"Of course, that's highly unlikely. By now, enormous numbers of People's Liberation Army troops and Hunters should be defending the city."

One hundred million people lived across an area twice the size of the Korean Peninsula.

Chengdu was the administrative capital of Sichuan Province. If Chengdu fell, it would be as good as losing the entire province.

Jin Taekyung waved a hand after listening to Choi Minwoo.

"Come on. You can't rule something out just because it's unlikely. If we could do that, Monster Waves wouldn't happen in the first place."

"Of course, that's true, but…"

"Always assume the worst. Don't count on the best."

He tossed out the words casually. Anyone could have said them, but coming from Jin Taekyung, they somehow felt different.

How should Choi Minwoo put it? Beneath all that carelessness lay meticulous caution and the hard-earned instincts of a seasoned veteran.

He's a strange man.

There were times when Choi Minwoo found Jin Taekyung uncanny.

It wasn't a matter of skill or combat experience.

Whenever they talked, Choi Minwoo would suddenly get the feeling that Taekyung had survived far more than just one or two crises.

Even though he's younger than me.

Noticing Choi Minwoo's contemplative stare, Jin Taekyung paused with his glass halfway to his lips.

“What? Want some vodka instead?”

“No. First Dew is fine.”

“Right? It has such a clean taste…”

Jin Taekyung trailed off and scowled.

“This bastard’s throwing another fit.”

“…”

“I wasn’t talking to you, Team Leader. Some asshole won’t stop squawking.”

Choi Minwoo glanced at the flight attendants and lowered his voice.

“The Skeleton Warlord?”

“Yeah. He’s been raising hell about not wanting to go to China.”

“Because of the Lich.”

“Even if they’re both Named Monsters, they’re in completely different classes. And the Lich is a high-ranking undead monster, too.”

If the Lich was a big shot, the Skeleton Warlord was a nobody. Becoming a Named Monster did not change the vast difference in their origins.

Besides, the Lich that had appeared this time was powerful enough to stand apart even from those seen during the Great Cataclysm.

Choi Minwoo’s expression grew serious.

“Mr. Jin.”

“Ah, shut up already! Sorry, what?”

“Something has been going wrong lately.”

“Did you throw out your back?”

“No. I mean the way things are going in the world.”

“Oh, the atmosphere. Same here. I want to live peacefully, but all these pieces of shit keep raising hell from every direction… Ah, I wasn’t talking about you, so shut up.”

A headache struck Choi Minwoo without warning. He rubbed the space between his brows.

“I’m talking about Gates and monsters.”

“Oh.”

Jin Taekyung looked up from his argument with the invisible Skeleton Warlord.

“It is strange. Normally, we might see one Named Monster every few years, but two of them have shown up in the span of a few months.”

“Gate accidents have also risen sharply this year. The media, always eager to tear someone apart, are blaming careless Guilds and individuals. But I’m not convinced. The International Gate Research Institute has reached the exact opposite conclusion.”

Choi Minwoo handed him a tablet. Across its screen, in large, bold letters, were the words Investigation Results: Sudden Increase in Gate Mana.

“They haven’t made an official announcement, but the matter is already considered settled. Mana density has been rising rapidly inside a considerable number of Gates.”

“That’s the real cause of the recent spate of Gate accidents?”

“Yes.”

Mana was the source of a monster’s power. If the mana density inside a Gate increased, the monsters within it would naturally grow stronger.

And above all…

“I’ve got the proof right here.”

At Jin Taekyung’s words, Choi Minwoo nodded.

The Skeleton Warlord. According to what Taekyung had told him a few days earlier, the Named Monster had evolved.

The change had been so sudden that even the Warlord himself did not know why it had happened.

“The Lich that appeared this time may have experienced the same growth in power.”

“I expected something like that to some extent. But…”

Jin Taekyung swept back his long hair.

“This is going to be fucking brutal.”

“That’s why we need adequate countermeasures. According to some of the information I obtained regarding this incident…”

“I’ll look at it later.”

“Excuse me?”

“I’ve got a lot to catch up on right now.”

“Catch up on? Right now?”

The Boeing 747-8 VIP was cruising at an altitude of twenty-five thousand feet.

What overdue business could he possibly deal with up here?

Jin Taekyung’s answer only left Choi Minwoo more baffled.

“I’m going to sleep.”

“Sleep? At a time like this?”

“I haven’t been able to sleep at all lately.”

“W-wait a moment.”

“Don’t wake me under any circumstances. This is the answer for now.”

What kind of person was this?

Before Choi Minwoo could stop him, Jin Taekyung crawled into the bed inside the cabin. Choi Minwoo could only gape.

“Oh, right. Team Leader Choi.”

Jin Taekyung poked his head back out, his expression grave.

“Please turn off the lights.”

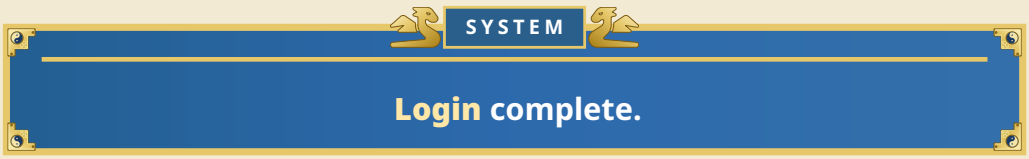
“…”

The moment his head touched the pillow, Jin Taekyung fell peacefully asleep.

Watching him, Choi Minwoo thought:

The profit split is nine to one. No exceptions.

Ding.



I opened my eyes to the hardness of a wooden pillow and bed instead of a soft pillow and mattress.

Above me was the wholly unfamiliar ceiling of a Murim Alliance pavilion.

I’m back.

A full month had passed since I left. In the Murim, not even two shichen[1599] would have passed.

I turned my head to the right and saw a small old man fast asleep.

Even with sunlight streaming through the window and shining directly on his face, he—the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang—did not stir.

“I’m back, Old Master.”

I had just murmured the words and started to rise when—

“Oh. Mm. Ah.”

“…”

“There. That’s good. Yeah.”

I stared down at Hyuk Mujin, who was writhing like a worm in the corner of the room.

I’m pretty sure I left him on guard duty before logging out.

I told this lunatic to stand guard, and he was having a wet dream.

My greatest regret in life was that I couldn’t record this and share it in the Jin Family of Taiyuan group chat.

I could still kick him in the ass, though.

Bam!

“Urgh!”

[1599] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours. Two shichen are about four hours.

"Wake up, you Tokyo Hot[1600] bastard."

The pain jolted Hyuk Mujin out of his blissful dream, and he sprang to his feet.

"Captain, you're awake!"

"Yeah. Looks like you just got up too."

Hyuk Mujin's eyes darted around as an awkward smile crept across his face.

"Ah, well. Something came up."

"…"

Did something come up, or were you about to come?

I glared at Hyuk Mujin in disgust and let out a deep sigh.

Fine. This was all my fault for trusting him.

"Whew. How long were you asleep?"

"Not long. I swear."

"Then nothing unusual happened while you were awake?"

"Yes. Until two shichen[1601] ago, I kept watch so thoroughly that I wouldn't have let even a single ant get inside."

I thought about that for a moment.

"If it was two shichen[1602] ago, wasn't that when I had just fallen asleep?"

"Well, now that you mention it… But I really wasn't asleep for long."

"Right. Two shichen[1603] isn't long."

"Yes, yes."

"Our Mujin followed me into my dreams to protect me, huh?"

Hyuk Mujin nodded furiously.

"That's right! I, Hyuk Mujin, Vice Squad Leader of the Jin Dragon Squad of the great Jin Family of Taiyuan, pledge my unwavering loyalty to you, Captain!"

"My, what a good boy."

I chuckled and picked up the flower vase beside the bed.

"Then why did you make such strange moaning sounds while guarding me in my dream?"

"Gasp."

"Who did you meet? Mimi from Honghwaru[1604]? Kirara from Tokyo-ru[1605]? Or the filial daughter from the soft tofu restaurant?"

[1600] Tokyo Hot is a Japanese adult-video studio.

[1601] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours. Two shichen are about four hours.

[1602] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours. Two shichen are about four hours.

[1603] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours. Two shichen are about four hours.

[1604] Honghwaru is a pleasure house in Taiyuan.

[1605] Tokyo-ru is a red-light establishment invoked in Taekyung's joke.

I'd had it. Just looking at that bastard made rage burn in my chest until I could barely breathe.

I raised the flower vase high, and Hyuk Mujin cautiously backed away.

"P-please let me off just this once."

"I've let you off five hundred times already."

"Then since you've let me off five hundred times, just one more time…"

"Hold still."

Whoosh!

At that moment, three things happened simultaneously.

First, the flower vase in my hand shot forward with tremendous force.

Second, it narrowly grazed the crown of Hyuk Mujin's bowed head and flew toward the door.

Third, with impossibly perfect timing, the door opened and someone walked in.

"How is Great Hero Jeok's condi—"

Bam!

The squat old man carrying a small cloth-wrapped bundle could not finish his sentence.

His eyes went slack as he stared at Hyuk Mujin and me. His lips moved several times before he slowly crumpled.

Thud. Crash!

The flower vase that had struck him squarely in the forehead rolled away, while acupuncture needles and all manner of medical instruments spilled from his bundle.

"…"

"…"

The Luoyang Strange Physician had come at first light to check on Jeok Cheongang's condition.

And that was how he collapsed with a concussion.

Chapter 307

“The world looks new.”

Those were the first words out of the Luoyang Strange Physician’s mouth when he regained consciousness one shichen[1606] later.

His tone and voice were so gentle that I could hardly believe he was the same old man who had been flying into a rage before I returned to the modern world.

“A-are you all right?”

“Of course I’m all right. My head hurts a little, but these things happen.”

I was starting to get scared.

How eccentric did someone have to be for people to call him the Strange Physician to his face?

Yet one flower vase to the head had transformed him into a completely different person.

Even the Sword Saint, Mae Jonghak, who had rushed over after mistaking the commotion for an attack by Dark Heaven, asked him anxiously, “Strange Physician, are you sure you’re all right?”

The Luoyang Strange Physician smiled faintly and nodded.

“Ha-ha, Great Hero Mae. You need not worry about this old man. Just take special care to ensure that this promising young man isn’t injured in the coming war.”

“You…!”

“Elder…!”

This was the greatest physician in Henan. A true doctor!

And I had actually grumbled to Mae Jonghak that such a good man was a quack.

Overcome with emotion and shame, I bowed my head. Then the Luoyang Strange Physician’s voice reached my ears.

“Because if that young man were gravely injured and I had to treat him, I might just drive a large acupuncture needle into one of his lethal acupoints with this very hand. Ha-ha.”

“…”

“…”

“A physician cannot commit murder, can he?”

So that was what he meant by making sure I didn’t get hurt.

A chill ran down my spine as I raised my head. The Luoyang Strange Physician met my gaze and smiled like the kindly old man next door.

“Great Hero Jeok’s Disciple or not, I ought to gouge those eyes right out. Ha-ha.”

“…”

[1606] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

Forget the old man next door. He was more like the murderer next door.

Still wearing a bandage wound tightly around his head and laughing like a lunatic, the Luoyang Strange Physician began the examination of Jeok Cheongang that he had put off for a while.

Whatever his personality, he was the greatest physician in Henan and a medical master counted among the ten best in the world.

But after examining Jeok Cheongang for a little over an hour, he reached much the same conclusion as before.

“I don’t know. This is truly strange.”

“There’s… no way to treat him?”

“You’re asking whether there’s no way to treat him?”

The Luoyang Strange Physician gave me a displeased look before continuing.

“There is no incurable illness under heaven. But how can I find a treatment when I don’t even know the name of the disease?”

This was hopeless.

If we at least knew what the illness was, we might be able to find a treatment somehow. But this meant it was an unknown disease.

I took Jeok Cheongang’s wrinkled hand in mine.

Why can’t someone as strong as you wake up?

Was it because he couldn’t bear the shock of losing his closest friend after already losing his Disciple?

No. The Jeok Cheongang I knew was far more steadfast than that.

Then…

The aftereffects of the Dance of the Fire God and Demon? Or did that bastard Blood Lord pull some kind of trick?

The Dance of the Fire God and Demon was a double-edged sword that consumed even its user’s life. Its power must have been more than the aged Jeok Cheongang could bear.

And the Blood Lord, one of Dark Heaven’s core figures, was exactly the kind of bastard who would resort to some dirty trick.

The Luoyang Strange Physician groaned under his breath.

“No demonic qi has seeped into him, and he hasn’t been poisoned. But if this continues, his qi channels will slowly become blocked. That much is certain.”

Mae Jonghak’s eyes and mine flew open at the same time.

“What? What does that…?”

“Strange Physician, didn’t you say his life wasn’t in danger?”

“You weren’t listening properly. I clearly said his life was not in danger for now.”

The Luoyang Strange Physician continued slowly.

“I could tell from his pulse today that he is different from yesterday. If Great Hero Jeok remains in this state and does not wake up, all his qi acupoints will become blocked, and he will be reduced to an ordinary countryman.”

“Are you saying he won’t regain consciousness until after he loses his martial arts?”

The Luoyang Strange Physician shook his head.

“I cannot guarantee even that. And even if Heaven helps Great Hero Jeok awaken, his body has already outlived its natural span. How much longer could it possibly endure?”

“…!”

I felt as though someone had struck me in the back of the head with a hammer.

As the Luoyang Strange Physician said, Jeok Cheongang had already lived for more than a hundred years.

The Fire King might endure for another ten or twenty years, but only because he possessed tremendous internal energy and martial arts.

How much time would remain for Jeok Cheongang the old man, rather than Jeok Cheongang the Fire King?

“Six months. If we continue guiding his qi through his acupoints, we might buy him another couple of months, but no more.”

“Six months… Is there really no other way?”

“You insolent brat. Do you need to make this old man repeat himself twice before you’ll be satisfied?”

He didn’t know what the disease was, so he didn’t know how to cure it.

The Luoyang Strange Physician’s answer was so firm that it doused the tiny spark of hope.

But he was also the one who rekindled it.

“That is why you must find the Divine Physician.”

“The Divine Physician?”

My mind snapped fully awake, as if someone had dumped a bucket of ice water over my head. I opened my eyes wide and asked:

“Who is the Divine Physician?”

The Luoyang Strange Physician stared at me in surprise.

“…You don’t know the Divine Physician?”

“He sounds like a physician. A really skilled one.”

“His sobriquet is Divine Physician, so of course he is! Even a stray dog in a back alley would know that much. Great Hero Mae, is this fellow really a martial artist?”

Mae Jonghak, who had been standing a step away, stopped the enraged Luoyang Strange Physician.

“Calm down, Strange Physician.”

“There are limits to ignorance, even for a complete outsider. How can he not know the Divine Physician?”

“Hmm. He must be famous.”

“…What?”

“…Huh?”

The Luoyang Strange Physician and I whipped our heads around at the same time. Mae Jonghak was smiling innocently.

Where have I seen that smile before?

Oh, right.

Wearing a smile exactly like Cheongpung’s, Mae Jonghak said, “I’ve been secluded deep in the mountains for nearly thirty years, you see. Ha-ha.”

“What are you talking about? It has already been more than forty years since the Divine Physician made his name known throughout the martial world.”

Mae Jonghak fell silent for a moment after the Luoyang Strange Physician’s blunt correction. Then he replied, “Come to think of it, it has been more than forty years for this old man as well. It was so long ago that I got confused.”

“…”

“…”

That was dark, Chuseong.[1607]

The Divine Physician.

Just as his sobriquet suggested, his medical skills had reached the realm of the divine.

It was said that he had appeared at the edge of the continent more than forty years ago and performed feats of medicine bordering on the miraculous. After treating thousands of patients by himself and stamping out an epidemic, he earned the sobriquet Divine Physician.

“Afterward, the Divine Physician continued to share his medical skills freely. He never turned away a patient who came to him and never accepted any payment. He was a true physician whose character was as lofty as his medical ability.”

“Ooh, a god-tier doctor.”

“The powerful figures of the world tried to retain him as an honored guest, but every time, he vanished without a trace. He would say only that he intended to care for patients in the lowest places.”

[1607] The Korean line swaps syllables in an insult meaning “Pathetic, Sword Saint,” mangling the Sword Saint’s title.

“Ooh, the Medicine Immortal Hong Gil-dong.[1608]”

“He always covered his face with a white veil, so no one ever saw what he looked like, but…”

“Ooh, the masked physician.”

The Luoyang Strange Physician, who had been about to continue, picked up a large acupuncture needle a handspan long.

“I’ll shut that mouth of yours for you.”

“I’m sorry. It just slipped out.”

“Even with Great Hero Mae here, this young brat’s mouth never stops. Isn’t that right?”

Mae Jonghak’s eyes lit up.

“Ooh, the Divine Physician.”

“…”

After that, the Luoyang Strange Physician, now half a sage, gave us a kind but concise explanation of the Divine Physician.

He was universally recognized as the greatest physician under heaven and a man of noble character.

And…

“No one knows his identity?”

“Did I not tell you that he always wears a veil while practicing medicine?”

“Even so, he’s been active for over forty years. How can no one know what he looks like?”

Seriously, one good gust of wind should have been enough to expose his face.

But the Luoyang Strange Physician shook his head.

“Someone may know. But no one in the world has ever properly identified him.”

“Why? Because he always ran away before anyone could track him down?”

“The witnesses contradicted one another every time. Some commoners said the Medicine Immortal was an old man with white hair, while others claimed he was a shaven-headed Buddhist nun. No matter how people tracked down and cajoled those who had seen the Medicine Immortal, their accounts never matched. How could anyone possibly find him?”

“Huh.”

“His reputation among the common people is absolute. So many of them willingly served as his eyes and ears and helped conceal his identity that even the imperial palace eventually gave up searching for him.”

“I understand that this Divine Physician is impressive, but…”

I stared incredulously at the Luoyang Strange Physician’s pleased smile.

[1608] Hong Gil-dong is a legendary Korean outlaw known for helping the oppressed and vanishing from those who pursued him.

“How am I supposed to find someone even the imperial palace gave up on?”

“Oh. Good point.”

“…”

Was he joking right now?

When my expression darkened, the Luoyang Strange Physician suddenly burst into hearty laughter.

“Don’t worry. Would I have brought him up if I had no plan at all?”

“Just as I thought. I knew I could trust you, Elder.”

“Ten years ago, I heard the tales of the Divine Physician and was so deeply impressed that I set out on a medical tour.”

“Oh, a medical tour.”

I had heard about such things in passing when I was still holed up with the Jin Family of Taiyuan. Just as martial artists went on dueling tours, physicians went on medical tours.

The Luoyang Strange Physician had followed the trail of the Divine Physician’s deeds, crossing the continent from its most remote reaches over the course of five years.

“It was rewarding and brought me great joy. But for a man already past sixty, it was also an arduous journey.”

Still, he had found something at the end of it.

“Something I had only imagined came to pass.”

The unexpected gift had come to him in a slash-and-burn farming village in the southern part of the continent.

The slash-and-burn farmers, who barely had enough to eat and had received no education, told him about a benefactor who had treated their illnesses and departed only a few months earlier.

“You folks have nothing that needs treatment. I’ll leave a few silver coins behind, so use them to restore your strength.”

“Um…”

“What is it? I’m sorry, but this is all the money I have left…”

“That isn’t it. Are you perhaps a physician from Luoyang?”

“Why do you ask?”

“The benefactor who treated us not long ago said that if a physician surnamed Oh came from Luoyang, we should give him this.”

What they handed him was a jade-colored shard from a porcelain bottle.

That shard now rested in the Luoyang Strange Physician’s hand.

“What is this…?”

“Read what’s written on it.”

Faint writing remained on the shard in his wrinkled palm.

Chinese gallnuts from Sichuan are the finest.

What the hell did that mean?

As I stared at it in confusion, the Luoyang Strange Physician explained, “Chinese gallnut is a widely used medicinal ingredient. With this one line, the Divine Physician was subtly telling me that he was in Sichuan.”

“…That’s what you got from it?”

“I’m telling you, that’s what it means.”

“Then if I say Japanese adult videos are the best, does that mean I’m in Japan?”

“What kind of insane nonsense is that? Great Hero Mae, isn’t this fellow completely mad?”

Looking ready to die of curiosity, Mae Jonghak asked, “What in the world are these ‘adult videos’?”

“That’s not important right now!”

The Luoyang Strange Physician, hopping mad, placed the shard in my palm.

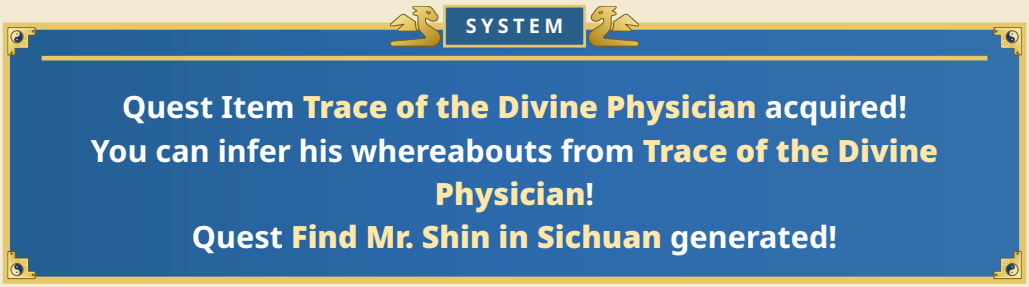
“Look closely! Can’t you feel it? The Divine Physician’s desperate desire to exchange medical knowledge with me!”

“What desperate desire…?”

I picked up the shard to examine it more closely.

At that exact moment—

Ding.



I looked at the Luoyang Strange Physician and murmured, “I can feel it. His feelings.”

And now I could see it too.

A way to treat Jeok Cheongang.

Chapter 308

"Go to Sichuan. If anyone can help him, it will be the Divine Physician."

The Luoyang Strange Physician was one of the ten greatest physicians under Heaven.

And he had spoken with absolute certainty. Find the Divine Physician. His medical skills were the best under Heaven.

There's hope.

If I found the Divine Physician, I could save Jeok Cheongang.

I looked at Jeok Cheongang, lying there as peacefully as if he were asleep, then bowed to the Luoyang Strange Physician.

"Thank you. Truly."

The Divine Physician was a man so shrouded in mystery that no one knew his identity.

Without the token of the Divine Physician that the Luoyang Strange Physician had given me, I would have felt as if I had been dropped into the middle of a vast ocean.

"Ahem. Is that all I get? Words?"

"Would you like me to bring you a souvenir?"

The Luoyang Strange Physician chuckled at my joking reply.

"You insolent brat. Instead of wasting time spouting nonsense, start packing your bags right now."

"Oh. Right."

Even by the roughest estimate, the journey from Henan to Sichuan was several thousand li.[1609] Even with my movement technique, it would take nearly a month.

And there's no guarantee I'll find the Divine Physician right away.

I looked at the Quest window, which I had not yet closed, and muttered inwardly.

[1609] In this Chinese setting, one li is about 500 m (0.311 mi).

SYSTEM

Quest
Find Mr. Shin in Sichuan
You have acquired the only trace left behind by the Divine Physician.
The Divine Physician is the greatest physician under Heaven. At present, he is the only hope capable of waking Jeok Cheongang.
You must scour the vast land of Sichuan and find him!
Grade: Supreme Peak
Restriction: Possession of Trace of the Divine Physician
Mission: Find the Divine Physician and receive treatment (Incomplete)
Reward: ???
Failure: Jeok Cheongang's death

Just look at that ridiculous Quest Grade.

I was looking for one person, yet the Grade was Supreme Peak.

Fortunately, the trace he'd left behind years ago had narrowed his whereabouts down to Sichuan. But the place was so damn vast that finding him would still be brutal.

Modern Sichuan Province was about twice the size of the Korean Peninsula, wasn't it?

Murim and the modern world were completely separate worlds. But from what I'd experienced so far, the size of the land and the way people lived were similar.

The thought of searching all of Sichuan for someone whose name and face I didn't even know was daunting.

Fuck. It'd probably be easier to find Mr. Kim in Seoul.

But what choice did I have? There was no decision to make. I had to find the Divine Physician, no matter what it took, if I wanted Jeok Cheongang to live.

Jeok Cheongang had six months left.

If I continued guiding qi through his acupoints, I might be able to buy him another month or two. But that was the absolute limit of the time Jeok Cheongang had left.

I'll find him before time runs out.

To do that, I needed to cut down the time the search would take. My mind raced before I finally spoke.

"May I ask you for a favor?"

It might require an enormous amount of manpower and money.

But the Sword Saint, Mae Jonghak, offered a solution without hesitation.

"I'll write letters to the Sichuan Tang Clan, Emei, and Qingcheng."

"Thank you."

The Sichuan Tang Clan was one of the Five Great Families. If I could also secure the cooperation of the Emei Sect and Qingcheng Sect, both pillars of the Nine Sects and One Gang, the search would become much easier.

But my request didn't end there.

"Since you're already helping me, could I ask you to add a few more things?"

"Hm. Everyone is on edge after the bloodbath at Shaolin. With Dark Heaven and the Demonic Cult believed to be on the move, they may not be able to offer much help. For martial artists affiliated with a sect, their own sect must come first."

"I don't need that much help."

"Tell me anything that I—or Huashan—can do."

"Just assign me a few people. That will be enough."

"Do you have anyone in mind?"

"Yes."

I nodded and gave him several names.

A short while later, Mae Jonghak and the Luoyang Strange Physician left the pavilion and walked along slowly as they spoke.

"Are you certain about this? I understand that meeting the Divine Physician has been your lifelong wish."

"My lifelong wish…"

At Mae Jonghak's words, the Luoyang Strange Physician gazed into the distance as he recalled the past.

"It was. He was the reason I abandoned my official post and took up acupuncture needles."

The Luoyang Strange Physician had once been a promising young scholar.

His grandfather had been the head of the Guozijian, the empire's highest educational institution, and had served as the late Emperor's tutor when he was Crown Prince.

A scholar's blood ran true. His father and two older brothers had also entered government service and made names for themselves at court.

If a plague hadn't broken out the year the Luoyang Strange Physician placed first in the imperial examination, he likely would have followed the same path.

"More people died than I could count. As my duties required, I sorted them into the dead, the survivors, and those destined to die."

As a young man newly entered into government service, the Luoyang Strange Physician had believed without question that the august Emperor would order relief grain released and dispatch imperial physicians to bring the plague under control.

He had believed every civil and military official would do everything in their power to save the suffering people.

“I was mistaken. While the people died of plague, the Emperor expanded a detached palace for his new consort, and the powerful divided among themselves everything that should have gone to the people.”

“What did you do?”

“I wrote lies as facts. Under my brush, a hundred thousand seok[1610] of grain, wealth, and medicinal supplies became aid distributed to the sick. The imperial physicians who had been attending the scholar-officials became true physicians laboring to suppress the plague.”

“That must have been painful.”

“It was. When I returned home after leaving the palace, I found imperial physicians sent by the Emperor waiting there. They had come to treat my grandfather’s mild cold.”

That was when he first learned that the world put a price even on human life.

The Luoyang Strange Physician’s knuckles whitened around the cloth bundle containing his acupuncture needles.

“Then I heard about the Divine Physician. A physician who risked death to treat the sick at the very source of the plague. One man who brought the plague under control and saved thousands of lives.”

He immediately returned to the palace, destroyed every record he had written, and left the government.

He had to sever all ties with his family, but he didn’t care.

He traded his brush for acupuncture needles and studied medical texts instead of the Four Books and Three Classics.[1611]

“I was called a quack more times than I can count. Sometimes I saved patients already sitting at death’s door. Many other times, I failed to cure them and had to watch them go.”

As a physician, he witnessed the countless cycles of birth, aging, illness, and death.

Twenty years later, the promising young official had become known as the Luoyang Strange Physician.

“None of it would have been possible without the Divine Physician. Without him, I would have become a puppet of that rotten court.”

Mae Jonghak smiled faintly.

“So one Divine Physician gave rise to another.”

[1610] A seok was a traditional measure of grain volume, commonly about 180 L (48 US gal). A hundred thousand seok is about 18 million L (4.8 million US gal).

[1611] The Four Books and Three Classics are classical Confucian texts studied by scholars.

“What nonsense. I’m content to remain the Strange Physician. There is only one Divine Physician under Heaven.”

The eyes of the famously eccentric Luoyang Strange Physician sparkled like a boy’s.

Mae Jonghak couldn’t help laughing at the sight.

“Good grief. Perhaps I should take back the Divine Physician’s token while I still can.”

“Heaven is Heaven because it lies beyond our reach. If I truly wished to find him, I would have left for Sichuan ten years ago, when I first received the token. My place is here. Besides…”

The Luoyang Strange Physician continued with a bitter smile.

“How could an old quack who still cannot cure a single patient dare show his face before the Divine Physician? This is enough for me.”

“Thank you. With hostile forces stirring everywhere, if Great Hero Jeok recovers, the entire Murim will owe you a great debt.”

“Come now, what has gotten into you? That doesn’t suit you at all.”

The Luoyang Strange Physician waved him off with exaggerated modesty. Then a mischievous look crossed his face.

“Are you practicing in advance?”

“Practicing what?”

“Your gravitas as the Alliance Leader. Ha-ha.”

“Ah. That?”

Mae Jonghak scratched the back of his head, looking uncomfortable.

“I have no idea who keeps spreading that rumor. I’ve already turned the position down several times…”

“As things stand, no one is more qualified than you, Great Hero Mae.”

“Don’t say that. Everyone is simply anxious, and their anxiety is driving them to make the wrong choice.”

The bloodbath at Shaolin Temple had sounded the alarm.

A hidden force known as Dark Heaven had emerged.

With the appearance of an enemy whose existence had never before been revealed, the leaders of orthodox Murim had cautiously begun discussing one subject.

The re-formation of the Murim Alliance.

“Someone else is better suited to the position. At the very least, this old man is not.”

“Do you truly believe that?”

The Luoyang Strange Physician raised a hand and pointed toward the sky.

Dawn had only just broken, and the moon and stars still lingered above.

“One God has vanished, and the Ten Kings have grown old. From what I have seen with my own eyes, Great Hero Mae possesses both formidable martial arts and an upright heart. You are the man best suited to lead the Murim Alliance, the symbol of the orthodox faction.”

“Come now. I’ve already told you this old man absolutely cannot do it. With so many people in the world, why would anyone make me the Alliance Leader?”

“Then who do you believe would be suitable?”

“Hm…”

Mae Jonghak thought for a moment before answering.

“Right. Senior Peng, the Thunderbolt Saber King, is nearby.”

“His temperament is far too…”

“What’s wrong with Senior Peng? I like that fiery personality of his. He’s manly.”

“He would make a fiery wreck of the Murim Alliance. In the manliest way possible.”

“Then Senior Zhuge Gonghu would be perfect. He once served as Chief Strategist of the Murim Alliance, and his Supreme Peak immortal arts and outstanding formation techniques earned him a place among the Ten Kings…”

“He’s dead.”

“What? Since when?”

“More than ten years ago.”

“Good heavens…”

Mae Jonghak had been away for so long that he no longer knew who was alive and who was dead.

After letting out a long groan, he asked, “Do you happen to know what became of the other two members of the Three Saints?”

“The Bow Saint has also been missing for more than twenty years. As for the last one… frankly, he shouldn’t even be considered.”

“Hm? Why not?”

The Luoyang Strange Physician stared at Mae Jonghak in disbelief.

“Who in their right mind would nominate the Slaughter Saint as Alliance Leader?”

“What’s wrong with him? His martial arts go without saying, and he is thorough by nature. He would be perfect as Alliance Leader.”

“The problem is that he uses those martial arts and that thorough nature to murder people for a living. The greatest assassin under Heaven as Alliance Leader? How could that possibly work?”

“Is that so? Now that you mention it, you may have a point.”

Watching Mae Jonghak scratch vigorously at the back of his head, the Luoyang Strange Physician wondered:

Is orthodox Murim really going to be all right like this?

Meanwhile, preparations for Jin Taekyung's departure were moving at lightning speed.

The first person to come running when he heard I was leaving was Jin Wikyung.

"My youngest."

I answered while stuffing everything I needed into my traveling bag.

"Yes?"

"This eldest brother has just heard something unbelievable."

"Believe it. It's true."

"W-where did you say you were going?"

"Sichuan."

"H-how long will you be gone?"

"Six months. Maybe another month or two if it takes longer."

"No!"

Jin Wikyung cried out as if overcome with grief.

"Where are you going at a dangerous time like this?"

"Sichuan."

"I know! That is why I cannot let you go!"

"I'm still going."

With a grim expression unlike any I'd ever seen on him, Jin Wikyung declared, "I forbid it."

"Oh. Then I'll veto your veto."

"With Father away, I am both the Lesser Family Head and acting Family Head! You cannot defy my orders!"

"What happens if I do?"

"I will have no choice but to punish you according to family law."

"Then strike me from the family register."

"How can you say such a thing?"

From the look on his face, the world was going to end in ten minutes.

I left Jin Wikyung, who was reeling from the shock, and rose to my feet.

Jeok Cheongang, still unconscious, was secured to the wooden back carrier on my back with silk.

It might be too late if I find the Divine Physician and bring him all the way back here.

That was why I'd chosen this method.

I would take Jeok Cheongang to Sichuan with me.

"Heave-ho."

This should hold well enough for me to use my movement technique, at least to some extent.

I let out a deep sigh at the pleading look in Jin Wikyung's eyes.

"Don't worry so much. Nothing like what you're imagining is going to happen."

"Take the Jin Dragon Squad. At least take the Jin Dragon Squad with you."

The Jin Dragon Squad might be the Jin Family of Taiyuan's most elite force, but right now they'd only be deadweight slowing me down.

I tossed my fully packed traveling bag to one of the men nearby.

"That's why I'm taking the Vice Squad Leader with me."

Hyuk Mujin caught the bag and thumped his chest confidently.

"Leave it all to me, Lesser Family Head!"

"…"

"…Lesser Family Head?"

"Ah, it's nothing. Please take good care of my youngest."

Jin Wikyung patted Hyuk Mujin on the shoulder, looking as if he trusted him about as far as he could throw him.

That was when—

"Benefactor! When are we leaving? Huh? Benefactor?"

"…We're leaving now, so please shut your mouth."

Was bringing that guy really the right decision?

A sudden wave of regret hit me, but Cheongpung was perfect for this mission, which required a small, elite group.

At least there's no questioning his strength.

If anything went wrong on the journey, Cheongpung alone would be worth an army.

"Sichuan! The Divine Physician! This is so exciting!"

"…"

It still wasn't too late. Maybe I should just leave him behind.

Locked in a fierce internal struggle, I left the pavilion.

The final member of our party was waiting at the entrance.

"Long time no see."

At my greeting, he answered with a gloomy expression.

"Requesting me was a poor choice."

"No. You have to come with us."

"My Myriad-Li Chasing Wind Movement Technique…"

"You only learned it to the fifth stage."

"H-how do you know that?"

"…Have you learned anything past the fifth stage?"

The Oseong-and-Haneum villain.[1612]

No, the final member was Gung Gibang, the Successor Beggar of the Beggars' Sect.

Hyuk Mujin, Cheongpung, and Gung Gibang.

Now that I saw the three of them together, this lineup was no joke.

I sighed.

"All right, let's go, you three Bermuda Triangle bastards."

[1612] Oseong and Haneum were famous friends from the Joseon era. Taekyung is punning on Oseong's name and oseong, "five stages."

Chapter 309

It had already been three days since I left Luoyang with the Bermuda Triangle.

I suddenly opened my mouth.

“Mujin.”

“Huff, huff. Yes?”

Hyuk Mujin lay sprawled facedown over a rock beside a stream, looking ready to breathe his last.

He had made tremendous progress over the past year, but the limits of his internal energy and martial arts had quickly caught up with him.

Gung Gibang’s keeping up reasonably well, but even he’s falling short.

As befitted the Successor Beggar of the Beggars’ Sect, Gung Gibang possessed one of the finest movement techniques among the young prodigies. Even so, he was still a step below Cheongpung and me.

What good was learning the Myriad-Li Chasing Wind Movement Technique[1613], supposedly the fastest movement technique in the Beggars’ Sect, when he had only mastered it to the fifth stage?

“Gung Gibang.”

“Huff… Why’d you call me?”

His breathing was ragged.

He was in better shape than Hyuk Mujin, but he was having just as hard a time.

And then there was the last one…

“Benefactor, would you like a dumpling?”

“You eat plenty yourself.”

“I ate plenty on the way. I’m full.”

“Then take a shit and eat some more.”

“Wow! What a great idea!”

“…”

That was Cheongpung for you.

Anyone who had enough energy to stuff himself with dumplings between bursts of movement technique was a monster, all right.

Though I had no room to talk when I was in about the same shape as Cheongpung despite carrying Jeok Cheongang on the wooden frame strapped to my back.

I scratched the side of my head as I looked at the three of them.

Hmm. This isn’t going to work.

From Henan, through Shaanxi, and all the way to Sichuan.

[1613] A Chinese li (□) is about 500 m (0.311 mi).

The journey spanned several thousand li[1614]. Even on horseback, it would take at least a month.

But we didn't have that kind of time.

If we wanted to shorten the journey drastically, we needed drastic measures.

"Huff… Captain, why did you call me?"

"Oh, no particular reason."

I turned to Hyuk Mujin.

"That thing I asked you to hold on to. You still have it?"

"What thing?"

"The chain."

"What are you talking about…? Oh, that thing you used to wear with all those weights dangling from it?"

"Yeah."

It was a chain specially crafted by the Fire Gate Clan from Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron.

Just before the Star-Array Grand Banquet began, I had removed the chain along with the iron ball. When Hyuk Mujin heard that it was made of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron, his eyes had lit up, and he had quickly taken it.

"You brought it, right?"

He was quick on the uptake, if nothing else.

Sensing trouble, Hyuk Mujin's eyes darted about.

"No. I left it somewhere safe."

"Really?"

"Yes."

"Then let's do this. If I search you and find it, you die."

"Ah, silly me. Now that I think about it, I did bring it."

Clink.

Only then did Hyuk Mujin begin unwinding the chain wrapped around his torso beneath his shirt.

Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron was both impossibly hard and remarkably light. Apparently, he had wrapped it around himself as makeshift armor.

It could serve as temporary armor or a weapon, and the material alone was worth an enormous fortune.

No wonder Hyuk Mujin looked as if his soul were being torn from his body as he handed it over.

"Didn't you give this to me to use? I was saving it to make a weapon later…"

"I told you to hold on to it. Did I say you could keep it?"

[1614] A Chinese li (□) is about 500 m (0.311 mi).

“You can’t just give someone something and take it back.”

“I borrowed it too. It belongs to the Fire Gate Clan. How do you think Old Master will react if he wakes up and finds you carrying it?”

“…Please take it. Hide it somewhere I’ll never have to see it again.”

“Good choice. Gibang!”

Chain in hand, I called the bewildered Gung Gibang over and got to work.

The two of them stared blankly at me, wearing expressions that clearly asked what I was doing. Then they spoke at the same time.

“What are you doing?”

“What kind of pointless bullshit is this?”

Rattle, rattle.

I answered calmly.

“Can’t you see? I’m tying a knot with the chain.”

“No, I mean, why are you wrapping it around my waist…?”

“Hold on. Untie this.”

“There. Done.”

I proudly admired the fruits of my labor.

Hyuk Mujin, Gung Gibang, and finally me. The three of us were strung together with the chain like dried fish.

“Everyone well rested?”

“What rest? It hasn’t even been fifteen minutes!”

“Untie us this instant!”

I beamed and shook my head.

At the same time, my dantian began to churn, sending ninety years’ worth of internal energy surging into my legs.

“All right. Let’s run.”

Fwoooosh!

“Waaaaagh! You lunatic!”

“The Captain’s lost his mind! He’s trying to kill me!”

Chained to me, Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin tore off like wild boars with their tails on fire.

At the commotion, Cheongpung came scrambling out of the nearby brush, where he had been relieving himself with his ass bared, and raced after us.

“Benefactor! I’m coming too!”

“…”

I don’t think that bastard wiped.

No. He must have.

I desperately pushed the thought from my mind and unleashed my movement technique.

Time flew as quickly as the scenery streaking past us, and in only two days, we accomplished the astonishing feat of reaching the border between Henan and Shaanxi.

Trudge. Trudge.

Broken ranks. Exhausted faces.

The dozens of people trudging wearily onward were all members of an Escort Bureau.

The armed escorts were exhausted. So were the caravan porters, bundled in thick clothing as they led the horses and carts.

And it wasn't merely because their trading journey had already lasted four months.

"Hwaran."

At the voice in her ear, a pair of faintly gleaming black eyes turned to the side. Her clear voice followed.

"Yes, Uncle Heo?"

"It's…"

A middle-aged man with a graying beard quietly approached the head of the procession. After a moment's hesitation, he sighed.

"Chief Escort Seok has passed away."

"…!"

The slender figure swaying gently in the saddle went rigid. A moment passed before her trembling voice emerged.

"So in the end… he's gone."

"The poison reached his marrow. There was nothing more we could do. I'm sorry."

"You have nothing to apologize for, Uncle. Brother Seok—no, Escort Leader Seok died because of me."

Ju Hwaran bit down hard on her lip beneath her veil.

It's true. Everything happened because I lacked virtue.

Escort Leader Seok, who had grown up with her like a brother, and the thirty-two people who had died before him—all of their deaths had been caused by her poor judgment.

Father. What am I supposed to do?

Ju Hwaran raised her head toward the sky.

It was black as ink, studded with countless stars. Above them, a man's face appeared in her mind.

Her father, Ju Hogun, had fallen into qi deviation while cultivating two years earlier and had hovered between life and death ever since.

To have such a beautiful and gifted daughter—this father could ask for nothing more. Ha-ha!

Ju Hogun had said it so often that it had become a habit.

Another man might have adopted a son to carry on his line, but Ju Hogun loved his beautiful and talented only daughter and had always taken pride in her.

You alone will succeed me. The Yongbong Escort Bureau's past fifty years will be nothing compared to what you accomplish in the future.

Everyone in Shaanxi knew how completely Ju Hogun doted on his daughter.

But as Ju Hwaran grew older, people realized that he wasn't simply a foolishly indulgent father.

She was brilliant enough to master the Escort Bureau's ledgers before she had even turned twenty, and beautiful enough to be named one of the Three Flowers of Jiangbei.

On top of that, she was a master of martial arts skilled enough to be counted among the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes, the greatest young prodigies of the orthodox Murim.

That was Ju Hwaran.

And yet…

Where did it all go wrong?

Ju Hwaran swallowed the sigh welling up from deep within her chest.

Everything around her was collapsing—and only two years had passed since she took over the Yongbong Escort Bureau in place of her stricken father.

"Hwaran, are you all right?"

At least she still had her people.

The fifty years of goodwill her grandfather and father had built through benevolence and virtue were now the only pillar holding her upright.

Ju Hwaran forced a smile at Heo Jun, the Chief Escort, who spoke to her with concern.

"You don't need to worry about me, Uncle Heo."

"I'm glad to hear it."

Heo Jun nodded, his expression somber.

Ju Hwaran was only twenty-one.

She already possessed much, but she was still too young for her heart to have hardened enough to bear it all.

Burdened by such terrible guilt, she needed someone to watch over her. That was all he could do.

Ju Hwaran understood how he felt. Steadying her voice, she said, “It’s getting dark. We’ll camp here tonight. Please make the preparations.”

“A good idea.”

“And… prepare the funeral as well.”

Escort Leader Seok was the thirty-third casualty of this journey.

It was time to lay to rest the man who had been beside Ju Hwaran since childhood.

Salt could slow the decay of his body, but by the time they completed their escort mission, the poison remaining within him would undoubtedly have reduced his flesh and bones to a handful of bloody water.

“All right. Rest here for a while.”

“Everyone else is working. How could I rest? Don’t worry about me. Go.”

Heo Jun nodded slightly and gave a hand signal. The procession soon came to a halt.

There was still a chill in the air, but the broad stretch of land was perfect for camping. Ju Hwaran planned to replenish her strength here and cross the mountain early the next morning.

We’re almost there.

Ju Hwaran stared at the mountain shrouded in darkness.

Its stones were black, giving Black Stone Mountain its name. Once they crossed it, this escort mission would enter its final leg.

They had suffered countless losses, but if the escort journey succeeded, the Yongbong Escort Bureau would have a chance to catch its breath.

It’s seven days and nights from here to Mount Zhongnan. We don’t have much time to spare, but if we make it safely across Black Stone Mountain, it should be enough.

The question was how Black Stone Mountain’s master would receive them.

Of the countless mountain strongholds belonging to the Green Forest Alliance, Black Stone Stronghold was powerful enough to rank among the Eighteen Strongholds. Its Stronghold Lord was a Peak master renowned for wielding an axe with uncanny skill.

If the travel-worn Yongbong Escort Bureau clashed with Black Stone Stronghold, they might suffer even greater losses than they already had.

Please, let nothing happen.

Ju Hwaran had just turned away when—

Rustle.

A faint sound reached her ears.

Something had stepped on a dry leaf, and it wasn’t a wild animal.

A red alarm bell instantly rang in Ju Hwaran’s mind.

An enemy!

Shing!

Ju Hwaran drew the flexible sword at her waist and shouted like a thunderbolt.

“Who’s there?”

Her sharp cry rang through the darkness.

Chief Escort Heo Jun noticed the danger almost simultaneously and led the escorts into a protective ring around her.

“Protect the Young Bureau Head!”

“Yes, sir!”

Clang, clang, clang!

Keen-edged weapons flashed beneath the dim moonlight.

At that moment, the brush more than five hundred feet away began to stir.

“Well, well. If it isn’t the brave escorts of the Yongbong Escort Bureau.”

A towering giant emerged, a huge axe strapped across his back. At the sight of him, Heo Jun let out a low groan.

“Heavenly Axe…”

“Oh, Brother Heo. I’ve heard all about how busy you’ve been wiping some little girl’s ass lately.”

“You dare!”

A graceful figure suddenly stepped forward beside the stiffly standing Heo Jun.

“Perfect timing. We were just about to pay the toll.”

“We’ll see.”

Heavenly Axe grinned and gave his axe a shake.

“Let’s take a look at the goods first. Then we’ll talk.”

Rustle, rustle, rustle!

Behind his axe, hundreds of Green Forest bandits emerged.

Chapter 310

Rustle, rustle, rustle.

Five hundred bandits emerged behind Heavenly Axe.

But their overwhelming numbers weren't the only reason Ju Hwaran's face hardened.

Their momentum is different.

Those trying to cross the mountain and those blocking their way. Escort Bureaus and the Green Forest were inseparable.

An Escort Bureau couldn't draw its swords every time it encountered bandits, so it would pay a set toll. The Green Forest, in turn, would accept a reasonable sum and withdraw, allowing both sides to save face. That had long been the custom.

But neither Heavenly Axe nor the bandits of Black Stone Stronghold showed any intention of backing down.

"You mean to spill blood after all…"

Heavenly Axe curled his lips at Ju Hwaran's words.

"You're pretty sharp for a little bitch. That's right. Today, I intend to stain Black Stone Mountain with blood."

"Little bitch?"

"What? Don't like it? Would you rather I called you an old bitch?"

"I am the Young Bureau Head of the Yongbong Escort Bureau. Show me the same courtesy I'm showing you."

Ju Hwaran's beautiful, brush-painted eyebrows shot upward.

She was the bureau chief's only child, but that didn't mean she had been raised pampered and sheltered.

She had swung a sword since childhood until calluses formed across her palms. She had eaten and slept on the road alongside the escorts, watching and learning.

People fawned over Ju Hwaran as one of the Three Flowers of Jiangbei, but she was no hothouse flower.

"What a brazen little bitch. And what will you do if I refuse?"

"Then…"

Ju Hwaran—the Dagger Hidden Flower—continued with a frosty expression.

"You'll have to die at the hands of this little bitch."

"What? Huh… Hahahahaha!"

It took a while for Heavenly Axe's wild laughter to subside.

"You've got more backbone than I expected. I like you."

"Why would I care if some old bandit likes me?"

"You've got quite the sharp tongue. Aren't you worried about what comes next?"

“Why are you doing this in the first place?”

“Why? A bandit says he intends to kill and rob you. Does he need some special reason?”

Ju Hwaran bit down hard on her lip at his brazen reply.

“If word of this gets out, it will put the Green Forest Alliance in a difficult position.”

“A difficult position?”

“The Yongbong Escort Bureau is part of the orthodox faction. The orthodox Murim won’t stand idly by.”

“Part of the orthodox faction, are you? Then I suppose that would be a problem.”

Heavenly Axe stroked his shaggy beard and continued.

“So I’ll do my best to make sure word never gets out. A secret can’t hurt anyone if it never leaks, can it?”

“…”

Silencing the witnesses.

Realizing what Heavenly Axe meant, Ju Hwaran tightened her grip on her sword hilt. Chief Escort Heo Jun stepped forward in her place and shouted, “One hundred silver nyang[1615]! Clear the road, and I’ll give you one hundred silver nyang[1616]. We’ll consider today’s matter closed, so let this end here!”

“Oh? One hundred nyang[1617]? Silver nyang[1618], at that?”

“Of course. Have I ever made an empty promise?”

“No, you haven’t. This is hardly our first meeting. Brother Heo’s word can be trusted.”

Chief Escort Heo Jun had devoted nearly thirty years to the Yongbong Escort Bureau.

The Yongbong Escort Bureau was a major Escort Bureau based in Shaanxi. Heo Jun had successfully completed hundreds of escort journeys, large and small, and crossed Black Stone Mountain so often that he had become acquainted with the Green Forest’s Stronghold Lords. That included Heavenly Axe, who had taken command of Black Stone Stronghold five years earlier.

“That’s five times the usual toll. Enough of this nasty joke. Clear the road.”

“A nasty joke? Is that what this looked like?”

Heavenly Axe let out a hearty laugh. Then his face abruptly turned cold.

[1615] A nyang was a traditional unit of currency; silver nyang refers to silver-denominated money. Its value is not convertible using modern Korean won exchange rates.

[1616] A nyang was a traditional unit of currency; silver nyang refers to silver-denominated money. Its value is not convertible using modern Korean won exchange rates.

[1617] A nyang was a traditional unit of currency; silver nyang refers to silver-denominated money. Its value is not convertible using modern Korean won exchange rates.

[1618] A nyang was a traditional unit of currency; silver nyang refers to silver-denominated money. Its value is not convertible using modern Korean won exchange rates.

"There's a limit to how much of a fool you can take me for. Brother Heo, if you want to bargain, offer a fair price."

"A-A fair price?"

"Even the dogs in my stronghold know that the goods you're transporting include a Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng. We could sell it as stolen goods today and easily get several thousand silver nyang[1619] for it. Isn't that right?"

"…"

Several people's eyelids began to twitch, including Ju Hwaran's and Heo Jun's.

A thousand-year snow ginseng was an elixir that could grant a full jiazi[1620] of internal energy if completely digested.

The existence of the thousand-year snow ginseng, which had been secretly commissioned by the Zhongnan Sect, was a top-level secret known by only a handful of people within the Yongbong Escort Bureau.

How had word reached Heavenly Axe?

None of it was a coincidence.

The past four months of the escort journey flashed through Ju Hwaran's mind.

The bandits and nameless wandering martial artists who had attacked them as if they were mortal enemies.

They had fought dozens of battles, large and small, and suffered terrible losses—all because information about the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng had leaked.

Who was it?

The thought had occurred to her before, but she had forced her suspicions down.

What had kept her going through the misfortunes that had piled upon her over the past two years was the people around her.

They were the greatest inheritance her grandfather had passed to her father, and her father to her.

Even as the Yongbong Escort Bureau lost its former glory and gradually declined, they had stayed. Despite her repeated failures, they had continued to show her unstinting trust and support.

That was why she hadn't wanted to suspect them. Why she had refused to doubt them.

But now…

Ju Hwaran swept an empty gaze over her surroundings.

Chief Escort Heo Jun stood frozen, looking as betrayed as she felt. Then she saw the other three people who knew about the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng.

[1619] A nyang was a traditional unit of currency; silver nyang refers to silver-denominated money. Its value is not convertible using modern Korean won exchange rates.

[1620] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

They were the three outstanding escort captains who represented the Yongbong Escort Bureau—the men collectively known as the Dragon-Phoenix Three Escorts.

Seokchil. Noh Piljung.

Ju Hwaran's gaze passed over the two middle-aged escort captains, both nearing forty, then turned to the last man.

Song Ilseom.

Unlike the other two members of the Dragon-Phoenix Three Escorts, Song Ilseom was tall and strikingly handsome.

Barely past thirty, he had joined the Yongbong Escort Bureau as an escort ten years earlier and risen rapidly through the ranks.

Though he occasionally revealed his rough temper, his outstanding martial arts had led numerous escort journeys to success. That was why, despite his youth, he had earned a place among the Dragon-Phoenix Three Escorts.

But Song Ilseom was also the subject of endless gossip.

> "They say he used to be a wandering martial artist. A fixer, no less."

> "Apparently, there was nothing he wouldn't do as long as he got paid."

> "That's not all. Everyone says he's deeply in love with the Young Lady. Mihyang told me that whenever he gets the chance, he slips into the inner courtyard and wanders around the garden."

> "I heard he joined the Escort Bureau because of the Young Lady… Everyone knows the Chief wanted an escort as his son-in-law, after all."

Ju Hwaran knew the rumors surrounding Song Ilseom.

She also knew that most of them were true.

Song Ilseom's blatant stares had made her uncomfortable more than once. Indeed, that was why she had agonized over whether to bring him on this escort journey.

But surely Captain Song wouldn't…

The moment Ju Hwaran's gaze settled on Song Ilseom's face, his thick, fierce-looking eyebrows shot upward.

Flash—whoosh!

"Hwaran!"

Three things happened at once.

A dagger shot from Song Ilseom's sleeve.

At the same time, Chief Escort Heo Jun hurriedly stepped in front of Ju Hwaran.

And finally—

Thud!

“Ghk… Grrrk.”

More than twenty jang[1621] away, a Black Stone Stronghold bandit collapsed with the dagger buried in his throat.

Bloody foam spilled from the bandit’s mouth. He convulsed, then went still.

“…”

A frigid silence descended over the scene. It seemed as though it might last forever, until Song Ilseom shattered it with a single shout.

“No more talking! Fight as if your lives depend on it!”

His fierce cry carried far on the night wind.

Ju Hwaran, Heo Jun, and everyone else from the Yongbong Escort Bureau realized the same thing.

Negotiations were over.

Now they would have to fight to the death against hundreds of enemies who had suffered an unexpected opening attack.

“Song Ilseom! What have you done?”

At Chief Escort Heo Jun’s furious shout, Song Ilseom raised his willow-leaf saber and rested it across his shoulder.

“What do you think? It’s a little late to ask that now, isn’t it?”

“You bastard…”

“He’s right.”

Ju Hwaran spoke calmly as she gripped her sword hilt.

Unfortunately, Song Ilseom was telling the truth.

Heavenly Axe was already advancing toward them, radiating a terrifying aura.

He had lost one of his men without having time to do anything. Flames poured from his bulging eyes.

“I’ll slaughter every last one of you.”

Hissssss!

Red qi writhed along the blade of his lowered axe.

The Green Forest Alliance had countless members, but Heavenly Axe ranked twentieth among them—a Peak master.

Buoyed by their leader’s aura, the five hundred Green Forest bandits growled like wild beasts.

“Kill them all!”

“This will be your grave!”

[1621] A jang is a traditional Korean measure of length equal to ten ja, or about 3.03 meters (9.94 ft). Twenty jang is about 60.6 meters (199 ft).

Listening to their furious cries, Ju Hwaran looked up at the star-studded night sky.

This may be my last escort journey.

Of the seventy-odd people who remained, barely forty were escorts once the caravan porters were excluded.

Everyone was exhausted from the long escort journey. The conditions were far too harsh for them to face Heavenly Axe and five hundred Green Forest bandits.

Can I do this?

Thud, thud, thud.

The ground trembled beneath hundreds of footsteps. The battle she had tried to avoid but could no longer escape was about to begin.

All we can do now is fight to the very end.

She had to get at least one person out alive.

Just as Ju Hwaran was about to face forward again, she noticed a star she had never seen before.

Among the countless stars embroidered across the pitch-black sky, one shone brighter than all the rest. It cast its radiance for the briefest moment, then vanished.

And in the next instant, something no one could have expected happened.

“Don’t fight, everyone! No matter how badly you get along, something terrible will happen if you fight!”

At the sudden shout, everyone stopped dead. Hundreds of heads whipped toward the source of the voice.

The world lay submerged in darkness.

Four figures stood atop a hill, faintly illuminated by the moonlight.

Soon, quiet voices drifted down.

“What are they?”

“They look like bandits. The people on the other side seem to be from an Escort Bureau.”

“No, I can see they’re bandits. I’m asking why they’re fighting out here in the middle of the night. We’re already busy enough to drop dead.”

“They look busier than we are.”

“Mujin, has it been long since you were hit?”

“No. About half an hour.”

Smack!

“Gibang, do you know who they are?”

“Of course.”

“Help me out, Speed Beggar.”

“Judging by the flag, they’re from the Yongbong Escort Bureau. The other side is Black Stone Stronghold, led by Heavenly Axe.”

“Never heard of either one. But for some reason, Heavenly Axe sounds familiar.”

“The Yongbong Escort Bureau was once counted among the Ten Great Escort Bureaus of the martial world, and Heavenly Axe is a Peak master ranked among the Green Forest Alliance’s top twenty. He wields a single axe like a demon…”

“No, wait. You don’t mean that Heavenly Axe, do you?”

“You know Heavenly Axe?”

“I definitely killed him… Did he catch the reincarnation bus or something? Wait here. I’m going to get a look at his face.”

“Benefactor! What’s a reincarnation bus?”

“Try crossing a crosswalk the next time you’re bored.”

The utterly incomprehensible conversation ended there.

Then a large shadow came trudging down the hill.

Only when it drew closer, one step at a time, could everyone make out what it was.

What is that?

He’s just a young punk. Why is he carrying a pack frame on his back?

It was a truly bizarre sight.

Hundreds of people facing one another in the darkness, weapons in hand.

And through their midst came a young man carrying a pack frame, strolling beneath the moonlight as if he were out for a walk.

Step, step. Stop.

“Sorry to interrupt when you’re so busy.”

The young man finally stopped and slowly turned his head.

He frowned at the grimy bandits. When his gaze reached Ju Hwaran, he suddenly began fidgeting awkwardly. Finally, he gave Heavenly Axe a quick once-over and tossed out a single remark.

“This isn’t the bastard.”

“…”

“…”

Hundreds of pairs of eyes widened at the bombshell.

He had just called Heavenly Axe—a Peak master counted among the Green Forest Alliance’s foremost experts—a bastard.

While everyone was still doubting their ears, the second bomb dropped.

“Oh, you’re that guy. The real Heavenly Axe. No wonder something seemed off. But you don’t look as impressive as the rumors made you sound either.”

Heavenly Axe finally came to his senses, his eyes blazing like fire.

“Y-You lunatic!”

The next instant, the axe in his hand crashed down toward the crown of the young man’s head.

Whoosh—crash!

Condensed qi collided.

A flexible sword intercepted the axe blade, which shimmered with red qi.

Ju Hwaran's wrist trembled as she desperately blocked the blow.

She, too, was a swordswoman who had reached the Peak. But Heavenly Axe possessed both tremendous natural strength and far greater experience. She was nowhere near strong enough to withstand him.

"Ghk! Young Hero, hurry and run—!"

"You little bitch, how dare you!"

Clang, clang, clang!

The two blades locked together, sending sparks flying.

The enormous axe slowly bore down on her.

Just as Heo Jun and Song Ilseom charged forward to help Ju Hwaran, the lips of the young man standing as still as stone parted.

"Say one thing for me."

"…What?"

"Help me. Just say those words."

Is he out of his mind?

The thought flashed through Ju Hwaran's head.

The young man had not even been able to react to Heavenly Axe's attack. If she had not blocked it with her flexible sword, he would have been cut in half and killed without a chance.

But regardless of what she thought, the words were already leaving her mouth.

"Help me!"

Then she saw it.

The faint smile forming at the corner of the young man's lips.

A voice so quiet that only she could hear it reached her ears.

"Quest accepted."

Whoosh!

A scorching wind erupted without warning.

And Ju Hwaran felt an endless warmth.

Chapter 311

"Quest accepted."

Ding.

> System - You have accepted the Sudden Quest Crisis of the Yongbong Escort Bureau!

You've really grown up, Jin Taekyung. Now you can even create Quests on your own.

I smiled proudly and extended my right hand. My palm, glowing red with the heat of the Flame Divine Palm, struck the side of the axe at terrifying speed.

Boom!

The deafening impact sent Heavenly Axe's massive body sliding backward. He staggered back three jang[1622], his face twisted with confusion and fury.

"W-What is the meaning of this…?"

"What do you think? You messed with the wrong guy."

I grinned and looked Heavenly Axe up and down.

This wasn't the fake Level 10 Heavenly Axe I'd encountered long ago. This was the real Heavenly Axe, a whopping Level 90.

Wow. The real thing really is different.

He was much larger, his face so vicious that it would have been a crime for him not to be a bandit, and his martial arts were on an entirely different level.

The sight of him brought old memories bubbling back to the surface.

I gained quite a bit of Fame when that false rumor about me taking him down spread.

That was around the time people within the Jin Family of Taiyuan began to reevaluate me.

They had mistaken the fake Heavenly Axe for the real one and spread the rumor, allowing me to gradually shed the stigma of being the family's disgrace.

Damn, it feels like yesterday.

Heavenly Axe glared at me warily as I sank into nostalgia.

"Who… the hell are you?"

"Me? The man who's going to kill you twice."

"W-What did you say?"

"It's a long story."

"Kill me twice? What kind of bullshit is that…? Wait. Could it be…?"

[1622] A jang is a Korean unit of length equal to ten cheok, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Three jang are about 9.09 m (29.8 ft); five jang are about 15.2 m (49.7 ft).

Heavenly Axe's voice abruptly cut off.

He stared at me, his face rigid. Then a thunderous cry burst from his lips.

"The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi!"

"Huh? You know me?"

"I heard a rumor like that about a year ago… No, that's not the point."

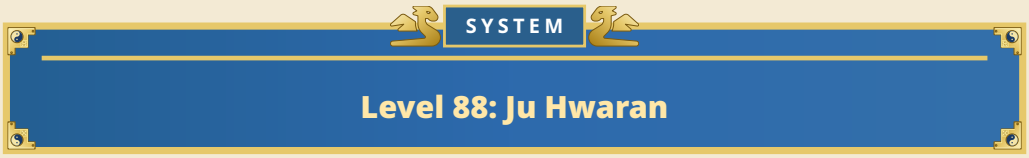
Heavenly Axe continued in a stammer, the way he addressed me already changing.

"A-Are you truly Young Hero Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan?"

"I'm not a Young Hero, but I am Jin Taekyung."

When I nodded readily, startled gasps escaped from all around us.

Bandits and escorts alike stared at me in shock. The gaze from beside me was especially intense.



Her smooth lips parted slightly, and a clear voice flowed out.

"You're… the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi?"

"Hmm. That's what people call me."

She stared up at me with wide black eyes, then abruptly gave me a formal fist-and-palm salute.

"I am Ju Hwaran, Young Bureau Head of the Yongbong Escort Bureau. It is an honor to meet you, Young Hero Jin."

"Ah, yes. Nice to meet you."

I guess I'm more famous than I thought.

I'd never expected to run into hundreds of people who knew me on a mountain road in the dead of night, thousands of li[1623] from Shanxi Province.

Even less had I expected the most beautiful woman I'd seen in all my twenty-eight years to recognize me first.

Can a person really look like this?

There was no way to properly describe Ju Hwaran's beauty with simple words like pretty or beautiful.

I was still staring at her, cursing my inadequate vocabulary, when—

"Ahem. Come to think of it, don't we have repairs to do at the stronghold today?"

"Y-You're right, Chief. I completely forgot."

Amid awkward coughs, hundreds of bandits began cautiously edging away.

I turned to find Heavenly Axe and the Green Forest bandits of Black Stone Stronghold slowly backing off.

[1623] A Chinese li is a unit of distance equal to about 500 m (0.311 mi).

I waved at Heavenly Axe.

"Hey, Axe."

His body stiffened.

"…Axe?"

"Yeah. Our Axe. Where are you going?"

His expression was a sight to behold. It twisted, smoothed out, then twisted again. Rising fury warred with his patience, leaving his face twisted into a ridiculous grimace. Heavenly Axe barely managed to squeeze out a reply.

"I have some business to attend to at the stronghold, so I should be going."

"Exactly. Why are you leaving without permission?"

"…"

A chilly silence settled over the clearing. Heavenly Axe's hand turned white around the haft of his weapon, but that was as far as it went.

We had exchanged only a single blow.

But Heavenly Axe—and everyone else present—must have realized it. I was a master on a higher level than him.

Of course, that wasn't the only source of the fear making Heavenly Axe hesitate.

"W-Where is the Fire King?"

Where else? Sleeping soundly on the pack frame strapped to my back.

I had covered him with layers of fur in case anything happened. No one could possibly imagine that the terrifying Fire King was lying unconscious on the pack frame.

Besides, no one can find out that Old Master has collapsed.

If that happened, all kinds of vermin, including Dark Heaven, would come crawling out of the woodwork.

I concealed my thoughts and laughed quietly.

"Why do you ask about my Master?"

"I only asked because I wanted to meet him."

"Why? Are you close to my Master?"

"Well, he is someone I've always respected…"

"If you ever do meet him, don't say that. He'll be offended if a bandit bastard like you pretends to be close to him. He'll start by breaking three or four of your ribs."

"…Your joke is in poor taste."

"Does it sound like a joke?"

Heavenly Axe bit down hard on his lip and rolled his eyes.

His gaze swept over me, Ju Hwaran and the other members of the Yongbong Escort Bureau, then the faces of the Bermuda Triangle slowly descending the hill. Finally, his eyes returned to me.

“Then he isn’t here?”

“What if he isn’t?”

“If that’s the case…”

Swish. Clunk.

Heavenly Axe raised his axe and rested it on his shoulder.

“Then that changes things considerably.”

“Like the way you’re talking now?”

“It was exhausting, humoring a young punk like you.”

“That’s strange. Nothing seems to have changed whether my Master is here or not.”

“That’s because you’re a greenhorn who knows nothing about the ways of the world.”

“How so?”

“I admit your martial arts are more impressive than I expected. But don’t make the mistake of thinking you’re your Master’s equal.”

Heavenly Axe raised one hand, his face filled with contempt.

At once, nearly five hundred Green Forest bandits lifted their weapons and stepped forward.

The mere fact that the Fire King was not present seemed to have restored their confidence.

“The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, is undoubtedly a master beyond the human realm. But can you really turn the tide of this battle all by yourself?”

“Hmm.”

I looked around.

There were only a little more than seventy people from the Yongbong Escort Bureau.

Half were caravan porters who didn’t know so much as a single move of martial arts, and even the escorts who would have to fight were visibly exhausted.

By contrast, Heavenly Axe commanded nearly five hundred Green Forest bandits.

They had more than ten times as many fighters. Heavenly Axe certainly had reason to be confident.

But…

“I might as well turn it around while I have the chance.”

“Hahaha! Go ahead and try.”

“That’s the plan.”

The smile vanished from Heavenly Axe’s lips.

By then, I had already crossed five jang[1624] in a single step and thrown my fist.

Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

Vroooom.

Compressed air exploded outward. The wind split, and Extreme Yang heat surged forward.

The same strike that had brought down an unnamed cliff on Mount Song shot toward the five hundred Green Forest bandits massed together like a swarm of ants.

Heavenly Axe stood at their head.

Baaaaang!

A roar split the sky, sending clouds of dust and steam billowing upward.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

System notifications continued boring into my ears without pause.

These bandits were too low-Level to grant me any EXP. I had neither the need nor any reason to use my spear.

I simply unleashed my martial arts indiscriminately at the enemies beyond the chaotic fog.

Baaaaang!

I tore, struck, and smashed everything in my path.

Blood and screams flooded the shattered ground as it heaved like it had been struck by an artillery barrage.

“Gaaaaah!”

“Kill him!”

“He’s over there!”

Whoooosh! Thud!

Dozens of blades came flying too late and buried themselves in the innocent ground.

Their every movement was sluggish. I could clearly see the exact path each weapon would take.

This is easy. Almost bizarrely easy.

Crack!

My own movements, by contrast, were precise and carried tremendous destructive power. Each time I pressed forward without hesitation, three or four screams rang out.

The panicked bandits could no longer distinguish friend from foe. They simply swung their weapons like madmen.

Shhk! Slash!

[1624] A jang is a Korean unit of length equal to ten cheok, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Three jang are about 9.09 m (29.8 ft); five jang are about 15.2 m (49.7 ft).

“Gaaah! You crazy bastard!”

“W-Wangpal?”

“Yeah, it’s me! It’s me, you damned bastard!”

“Sorry. I thought you were him…”

I whispered into the flustered bandit’s ear.

“This time, it is me.”

“…!”

Crunch!

I seized his neck and twisted with exactly as much force and speed as necessary.

His body crumpled without so much as a scream.

Before it touched the ground, I was already moving again.

Flamefire Path.

The Fire Gate Clan’s signature cultivation technique.

I kicked off the ground and surged forward, a tail of fire piercing the haze.

For an instant, the surroundings lit up, revealing a giant man measuring eight cheok[1625].

Our gazes met through the air.

“There you are.”

“Jin Taekyung, you bastard…”

Grind.

Heavenly Axe ground his teeth as I stepped toward him.

I unleashed the Flame Divine Palm with all my internal energy behind it.

Red qi streamed from the enormous axe Heavenly Axe brought down with the momentum of splitting a person in two.

A lionlike roar burst from his mouth.

“Die!”

Whoooosh! Boom!

An immense wave of energy whirled outward from the collision.

We were so close that I could feel his breath against my cheek. My cold, impassive face was reflected in Heavenly Axe’s bulging eyes.

So were the broken axe and my hand, which had pierced through the weapon and his chest to emerge from his back.

Fwoosh!

“Ghk…!”

No blood gushed out like a waterfall.

The heat of the Flame Divine Palm had already vaporized it.

[1625] A cheok is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to 30.3 cm (11.9 in). Eight cheok are about 2.42 m (7.95 ft).

Heavenly Axe's lips, cracked like a drought-stricken field, moved weakly.

"Y-You… just what…"

"Why? You told me to turn things around."

Shhk.

With those words, I pulled my hand from his chest.

His entire body had been burned and melted after he failed to block the opening strike of the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

Heavenly Axe looked down at his charred-black chest and muttered in a broken voice.

"This… can't…"

The unfinished words became Heavenly Axe's last.

Thud.

As his eight-cheok[1626] frame collapsed, a System notification rang out.

> System - You have defeated Level 93 Bangyeol! - You have completed Defeat Heavenly Axe! - You have gained a substantial amount of EXP!

Whoooosh.

Just then, a gust of wind swept around Black Stone Mountain and descended into the clearing.

The pale haze scattered, revealing the scene beneath it. Everyone's eyes widened.

"This can't be!"

Bangyeol, the Heavenly Axe.

Ranked twentieth in the Green Forest Alliance, he had been a Peak master counted among the foremost of the countless Green Forest bandits scattered across the continent.

Now he was dead.

The corpses of more than a hundred bandits slain in the melee lay scattered throughout the clearing.

The four hundred survivors stared at me with fear-filled eyes.

No. Everyone who had witnessed the scene was crying out.

"The Fire King…!"

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

Fifty years ago, in an unnamed wilderness, he had annihilated a thousand Demonic Cultists—a martial artist who could stand against a thousand men alone.

The legend of the Fire Gate Clan had been proven through the Fire King's myth.

[1626] A cheok is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to 30.3 cm (11.9 in). Eight cheok are about 2.42 m (7.95 ft).

And now, its spark had passed to me.

“Choose. Die here, or…”

My entire body burned hot. Extreme Yang heat flowed between my teeth, sending white steam billowing from my mouth.

I stared at my enemies with flames burning in my eyes.

“Kneel. Every last one of you.”

Clang.

Beginning with a single sword someone dropped helplessly, more than four hundred weapons rolled across the ground.

> System - You have completed Subdue Black Stone Stronghold! - You have successfully completed the Quest Crisis of the Yongbong Escort Bureau! - You have gained a substantial amount of EXP! - Level Up!

The cheerful chime announced the end of the battle.

Chapter 312

After the bandits of Black Stone Stronghold surrendered, the first person to collect herself was Ju Hwaran, the Young Bureau Head.

She regarded me with an indescribable look in her eyes, then gave me a deep fist-and-palm salute.

“We owe you an immense debt.”

“It was nothing. I was passing by anyway, so I took care of it while I was here.”

I meant it. I had already been on my way through, and it hadn’t taken long. The Level I’d gained was more than enough compensation.

From Ju Hwaran’s perspective, though, I must have seemed like a lifeline.

“If not for Young Hero Jin’s help, every member of the Yongbong Escort Bureau would have left their bones here. I had heard much of the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi’s fame, but it seems the stories of you being a hero who cannot abide injustice were true.”

“A hero? Hardly. That’s just a rumor people spread because it sounds good.”

“Pardon?”

“I can ignore injustice sometimes. I only get rid of people who annoy me every now and then. It just so happens that the people who annoy me are always scumbags—like that Heavenly Axe bastard.”

I glanced at Heavenly Axe’s corpse as a caravan porter dragged it away, then continued.

“And my family runs an Escort Bureau too.”

“Ah, the Jin Family Escort Bureau.”

The Seongun Escort Bureau, once run by the Woo family, had changed its sign to the Jin Family Escort Bureau and was thriving. I’d heard it already had more than five branches.

Shaanxi and Shanxi shared a border, so the Jin Family Escort Bureau and the Yongbong Escort Bureau would probably cross paths someday.

“You know about the Jin Family Escort Bureau. If you ever run into them, please treat them well. Fellow business owners should help each other out, just like today.”

“Fellow business owners?”

“Is there a problem?”

“You do know that the Jin Family Escort Bureau and the Yongbong Escort Bureau are competitors, don’t you?”

Huh? We were competitors?

I blinked and asked again.

“Is that true?”

"You really didn't know?"

"No. I barely pay attention to family affairs."

"If you hadn't saved us today, the Jin Family Escort Bureau might have been able to expand into Shaanxi Province. We may not look like much right now, but we still dominate Shaanxi."

"I see."

"This line of work is more cutthroat than it looks. There are plenty of struggles behind the scenes, and armed conflicts break out from time to time."

"Well, so what if we can't expand? I'll tell my eldest brother we should get along with you."

Ju Hwaran stared at me with an odd expression before letting out a quiet laugh.

"I'd appreciate that."

Wow. I almost gasped out loud.

All she had done was laugh. How could that be so beautiful?

I swallowed the exclamation rising in my throat just as murmuring voices reached me from behind.

"My word. That's the first woman I've ever seen who's more beautiful than Young Lady Lee Seowol."

"Dagger Hidden Flower Ju Hwaran is one of the Three Flowers of Jiangbei. I don't know who Lee Seowol is, but how could she possibly compare?"

"As if you're one to talk. Gung Gibang, go scrub yourself on a rock in the stream. That grime is so filthy it makes me sick."

"What's wrong with me?"

"You're a beggar, aren't you?"

"Hah. That's true, I suppose."

An innocent voice followed.

"That's not true. Young Lady Lee Seowol is pretty too."

"What's gotten into Cheongpung? I didn't know you could say things like that."

"And Gung Gibang looks pretty to me too."

"…Then go wash up in the stream with pretty Gung Gibang. Pay special attention to your eyes."

There was no need to look. It was the Bermuda Triangle.

Normally, I would have at least introduced them, but the level of their conversation was so low that I was embarrassed to say anything.

I was forcing out an awkward cough when Ju Hwaran poked her head past my shoulder.

"Who are those people?"

"I don't know."

"You came here together."

“They’re just traveling companions.”

“Really?”

“I swear it on the heavens.”

I had lowered my voice as much as I could, but the Bermuda Triangle still overheard me. They erupted like wildfire.

“Captain! Are you ashamed of us?”

“Am I embarrassing?”

“Benefactor! I’m fine! Please be ashamed of me!”

“…They’re actually my friends.”

“Anyone can see that.”

Anyone can see that? Somehow, that was even more devastating.

Ju Hwaran laughed softly at my expression, then gave the three of them a fist-and-palm salute.

“I am Ju Hwaran, Young Bureau Head of the Yongbong Escort Bureau. It is an honor to meet my Benefactors.”

I wasn’t sure what those three had done to deserve being called Benefactors, but the Bermuda Triangle bowed their heads anyway.

“I am Hyuk Mujin, one of the great Jin Family of Taiyuan’s foremost elites, Vice Squad Leader of the Jin Dragon Squad, and the right-hand man of the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi.”

I calmly corrected him.

“Not the Vice Squad Leader—the acting Vice Squad Leader. And he isn’t my right hand. He’s more like the pinky on my left.”

Gung Gibang spoke next.

“I am the beggar Gung Gibang.”

“He’s the next-generation beggar boss.”

Finally, it was Cheongpung’s turn.

“Hello! You’re pretty!”

“As you can see, he’s a little unwell. He may not be the sharpest, but he’s a good friend.”

After the whirlwind of introductions and my helpful explanations, Ju Hwaran’s lips parted slightly.

Her large black eyes practically quaked.

“So, let me make sure I understand… The pinky on your left hand, the next-generation beggar boss, and the slightly dim but kind friend?”

“Yes, exactly.”

“I’ve never heard anyone introduced that way before.”

“Would you like me to repeat it?”

"No, thank you."

She let out a deep sigh, then studied them one by one.

"I, too, have heard of the Swift Wind Sword, who rendered distinguished service during the campaign against the northern mounted bandits."

"…Huh?"

Hyuk Mujin stared at Ju Hwaran in bewilderment.

Swift Wind Sword?

I had no idea when he had acquired such a sobriquet, but judging by his reaction, it seemed to be real.

Before anyone could respond, Ju Hwaran continued.

"And the gentleman beside him is Young Hero Gung Gibang, the Successor Beggar and Disciple of Great Hero Myriad-Mile Pursuit, the Beggars' Sect Leader."

"P-Pleased to meet you."

"Lastly, it is an honor to meet Young Hero Cheongpung, the Huashan Divine Dragon. My grandfather and father always spoke of Great Hero Mae Jonghak, the Sword Saint, as a hero of benevolence and righteousness."

Huashan Divine Dragon was the sobriquet people had given Cheongpung after the Star-Array Grand Banquet.

Cheongpung's eyes widened in surprise.

"Wow! How do you know all that?"

Ju Hwaran smiled brightly.

"Because I'm the Young Bureau Head of the Yongbong Escort Bureau."

The answer was brief, but it said a great deal.

We had left Henan only a few days after the Star-Array Grand Banquet ended.

She gathers information quickly.

Unlike Cheongpung and Gung Gibang, Hyuk Mujin was an unknown newcomer who had operated only in Shanxi Province.

The fact that she knew both his name and his sobriquet so precisely meant that Ju Hwaran was even more meticulous and clever than I had expected.

Dagger Hidden Flower. A flower hiding a dagger.

And she had more than one dagger hidden away: Peak-level martial arts, a keen mind, and beauty that could captivate anyone.

She more than deserved her place among the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes, the martial world's foremost young prodigies.

Interesting. With all that, she should be good at running an Escort Bureau too.

According to Gung Gibang, however, the past two years had brought the Yongbong Escort Bureau one hardship after another.

I shook the question from my mind.

Eh, what difference does it make if I worry about it?

Finding the Divine Physician was more urgent.

We had already lost nearly a shichen[1627] here. If we wanted to reach our destination before dawn, we needed to get moving now.

“Young Lady Ju, I think we should be going.”

Ju Hwaran flinched at my sudden declaration.

“Now?”

“I have something urgent to take care of.”

“It’s already so late. Why don’t you spend the night here and leave in the morning…?”

“That might be difficult… We need to reach Xi’an by tomorrow.”

“Ah.”

Ju Hwaran hesitated as though she had something to say, then finally spoke.

“Will I be able to see you again?”

“Of course. If fate brings us together.”

I lowered my head and was about to turn away when Ju Hwaran called after me.

“I will never forget the debt I owe you for saving our lives.”

“I’m not so sure about that. Even if I hadn’t been here, you would have avoided the worst, so you don’t need to be that grateful.”

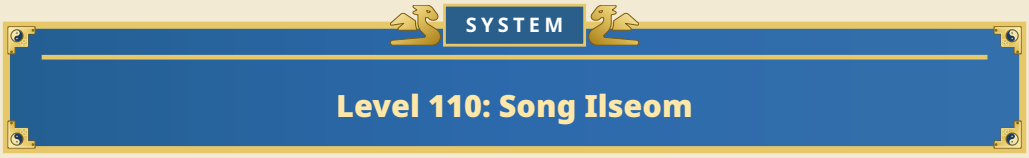
“What?”

“You would have suffered some losses, of course.”

She still doesn’t know?

Well, that was understandable.

I smiled at the bewildered Ju Hwaran, glanced at the fierce-eyed young escort, and turned away.



The Murim really is a vast place. Someone that skilled is working as an escort?

He was the source of the gaze I’d felt this entire time.

Thanks to him, the back of my head had prickled the entire time I was speaking with Ju Hwaran.

But why has that bastard been glaring at me like that? Did I somehow become his sworn enemy?

Apparently, I wasn’t the only one who had noticed his hostile gaze. Cheongpung followed close behind me and whispered.

“Benefactor, did you feel it too?”

[1627] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

"Yeah. I don't know why he's acting like that, but he's being incredibly obvious."

"Right? Maybe he's interested in Benefactor."

"…"

Please stop talking bullshit.

The four figures shot away like the wind. As Ju Hwaran watched their backs recede, someone approached her.

"Hwaran."

"Ah, Uncle Heo."

Heo Jun had finished binding the bandits and dealing with the aftermath. He followed Ju Hwaran's gaze and turned his head.

"Jin Taekyung, the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi. He truly is an extraordinary young man. The others are no different."

"I know. They say rumors from the martial world can't be trusted… but in this case, they seem to have understated the truth."

Ju Hwaran recalled the martial prowess Jin Taekyung had displayed.

It had been an overwhelming sight. Watching him had sent a thrill through her, but it had also left her bitter.

If only I had strength like that.

If she had, the Yongbong Escort Bureau would never have ended up in its current state.

Ju Hwaran swallowed the words on the tip of her tongue and spoke. This time, she sent them through Sound Transmission, carrying them on her internal energy.

—Uncle Heo. Keep an eye on Escort Captain Song.

Heo Jun was seasoned enough to be the Chief Escort. Without revealing anything on his face, he brought up another subject and replied through Sound Transmission.

—Hwaran. Are you suggesting…?

—It's only a suspicion for now. But too many things don't add up.

The leak of confidential information about the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng. The attacks that had continued without pause for the past four months.

Ju Hwaran intended to cut out the betrayal that had taken root deep within the bureau.

Especially the last thing Jin Taekyung said.

He had said that even without him, the worst would never have happened.

That meant there was a master within the Yongbong Escort Bureau capable of easily defeating Heavenly Axe and handling the enemies.

And… that look in his eyes.

It had lasted only an instant, but she had seen it clearly.

Jin Taekyung's gaze had lingered on Song Ilseom as he turned away.

And his eyes had held a faint trace of surprise.

There's definitely something going on.

Ju Hwaran suddenly thought back over the past two years—the countless failures she had endured while leading the Escort Bureau before she had even turned twenty.

What if those failures had come from trusting people too easily? What if someone had betrayed her?

What was she supposed to do then?

Whoooosh.

As the cold wind whipped around her, Ju Hwaran stood there for a long time.

"Could you provide me with a quiet room?"

The man was dressed in white. He was strikingly handsome, and his words and manner were so courteous that anyone who heard him would find it difficult to refuse.

He brought to mind a proud, solitary crane, and the Captain of the Guards standing at the entrance found himself wondering.

Who is he? I've never seen him before.

Xi'an Tower was, as its name suggested, one of Xi'an's foremost pleasure houses.

Staying there required not only money, but also the status to match. As a result, its guests tended to be the same familiar faces.

But he's a young man who came alone, without a carriage or servants…

Under normal circumstances, he would have been turned away without a second thought.

Yet something about the young man nagged at him. That was why the Captain of the Guards had dismissed his subordinates and come to receive him personally.

"Have you visited our pleasure house before?"

"No. My circumstances don't permit such luxuries."

The young man smiled sheepishly and rubbed his cheek.

The Captain of the Guards' eyes widened.

That's…!

Pale crimson blossoms had been embroidered on the young man's snow-white sleeve.

They were unmistakably plum blossoms in full bloom.

A stammer slipped from between the guard captain’s lips.

“M-May I ask your honored name?”

“I’m a Daoist named Baek Museong.”

“H-Huashan’s Lone Crane!”

Baek Museong, direct Disciple of Huashan Sect Leader Heavenly Sword True Person, smiled faintly.

Chapter 313

Huashan's Lone Crane, Baek Museong.

There was no one in Shaanxi—or anywhere in the Murim—who didn't know that name.

Baek Museong was the direct Disciple of Heavenly Sword True Person[1628] and had been called the future of Huashan since childhood.

Sharp-eared, gossip-loving busybodies traded rumors about the Sword Saint's youngest Disciple, but even they never doubted that Baek Museong would one day become the Sect Leader of Huashan.

"I hear the Huashan Divine Dragon's martial prowess has already surpassed that of the Elders of the Nine Sects and One Gang.[1629] He truly is a genius who comes along perhaps once in a century."

"Even so, no matter what anyone says, Huashan's Lone Crane is bound to be the next Sect Leader. Baek Museong is simply of a different caliber. He was born with everything a Sect Leader needs."

"That's true. Does he lack martial skill? Character? If not him, who else could possibly become Sect Leader?"

The people drinking and chatting on the first floor of Xi'an Tower had no idea that the subject of their conversation was passing right behind them.

"I've long heard of your renown, Great Hero Baek. It's an honor to meet you."

"Great Hero? Please, you flatter me."

"Not at all. I'm merely calling a Great Hero a Great Hero. How could that possibly be flattery?"

Baek Museong could only smile awkwardly at the Captain of the Guards' fervent gaze.

Such attention was nothing new to him.

As Huashan's standing rose after faltering in the wake of Sword Saint Mae Jonghak's withdrawal from the world, so too did the burden on Baek Museong's shoulders grow heavier.

The Sect Leader.

For Baek Museong, who was only in his early thirties, it was a distant and weighty title.

He was inwardly shaking his head at the thought when the Captain of the Guards stopped walking.

"This is the place."

"This is…?"

[1628] "True Person" is a Taoist honorific for a spiritually accomplished person.

[1629] A traditional grouping of nine major martial sects and the Beggars' Sect.

“Even in Xi’an Tower, which we proudly call the finest establishment in Shaanxi, there is only one private annex.”

Baek Museong looked around at the garden adorned with jade and the interior filled with luxurious furnishings, his expression troubled.

“I’m sorry, but I don’t have enough money on hand to stay in a private annex. Could you provide me with a quiet room instead?”

“Haha, you’re every bit as frugal as I heard.”

The Captain of the Guards continued with a hearty laugh.

“Please don’t worry. The proprietor has repeatedly instructed us that whenever a guest from Huashan arrives, we are to provide the utmost hospitality and charge them nothing.”

“The proprietor said that?”

“Yes. There was some trouble with the Zhongnan Sect last autumn, but it was resolved with Huashan’s help. The other two members of the Three Plum Blossom Elites—your Junior Brothers—played a major role.”

“Ah, I see. It happened while I was in secluded training, so I knew little about it.”

“To be honest, I only heard about it myself. I’ve barely been working here a month. Haha.”

Only then did Baek Museong nod in understanding.

It wasn’t as though he had spent the past year idling.

Meeting Cheongpung, a prodigy for the ages, and Jin Taekyung had come as both a tremendous shock and a fresh source of motivation. That was why Baek Museong had decided to enter secluded training for an entire year.

It was time well spent.

The insight he had gained during his training had made him stronger and given him greater depth.

And he wasn’t the only thing that had changed. Huashan’s position was now incomparable to what it had been a year ago.

Even the government offices, which were heavily staffed by Zhongnan’s lay Disciples, now turned to Huashan first whenever trouble arose.

If Master’s letter is true, that’s only natural.

Five days earlier, a messenger eagle sent by his Master, Heavenly Sword True Person, had brought astonishing news.

The blood calamity at Shaolin. The death of Dharma King Hong Dao. And the report that Sword Saint Mae Jonghak was being considered as a candidate for the Alliance Leader of the new Murim Alliance, which was being revived after decades.

“In any case, everyone around me is in an uproar. Even my friends have been asking me about it. They say their children seem to have a talent for martial arts and wonder whether they might be accepted into Huashan, if only as lay Disciples.”

Baek Museong recognized the meaning behind the Captain of the Guards’ pointed gaze and smiled bitterly.

The man looked well past forty. He, too, must be a parent who wanted his child to enter Huashan.

But Baek Museong pretended not to notice.

“Well, if fate brings them together, perhaps it will happen. But does a child truly need to learn martial arts? At that age, growing up healthy is enough.”

“…I see.”

As the Captain of the Guards’ face fell, Baek Museong murmured inwardly.

If you knew about the bloody storm that will soon sweep in, you wouldn’t look so disappointed.

Rumors about the blood calamity at Shaolin had already begun to leak out here and there.

But the existence of Dark Heaven remained a top-secret known only to a handful of people. As one of those few, Baek Museong could sense what was coming.

A bloody wind would soon sweep through the Murim. Dark clouds would cover the sky, and thousands upon tens of thousands of weapons would tumble across the ground alongside their owners.

The wails of children who had lost their parents and parents who had lost their children would echo from every direction.

I’ll stop that from happening. I will—and Huashan will.

Surely everyone in the Murim felt the same.

The Captain of the Guards was tilting his head at the sudden heaviness in Baek Museong’s expression when—

“Where is the chief manager? Chief Manager!”

“Young Hero, the chief manager has stepped away for a moment. So please, calm yourself—”

“Calm myself? After being treated with such disrespect, do I look like I’m in any state to calm down?”

“A-as I explained, the private annex is already occupied. We’ll show you to a special room, so please calm down.”

“Shut up! I must have the private annex today, so get out of my way!”

“Oh, Young Hero!”

Bang! Crack!

The shouting drew closer amid the clamor. The Captain of the Guards knitted his brows.

"I apologize for showing you such an unpleasant scene. It seems my subordinates have failed to handle the matter properly."

"Please, think nothing of it. I understand completely."

No matter how carefully Xi'an Tower selected its guests, it was still a pleasure house. All sorts of insects were bound to swarm a flower garden.

"Still, it's barely noon, and he already sounds quite drunk."

"It happens from time to time. He appears to be the son of some powerful family, but we'll settle the matter and send him home. Great Hero Baek, you needn't concern yourself."

Baek Museong let out a hearty laugh and shook his head.

"Haha, I'm not so sure. You'd better remain here."

"Pardon?"

"He doesn't seem to be an ordinary scion of a powerful family."

"What do you mean…?"

The Captain of the Guards faltered. Amid the continuing uproar, he had sensed someone approaching rapidly.

A martial artist!

As the situation grew more serious by the second, the cries of the guards protecting the inner courtyard rang out alongside hurried footsteps.

"Stop!"

"You cannot pass beyond this point!"

Xi'an Tower was frequented by high officials and powerful nobles, so the quality of its guards was correspondingly high. Yet even those battle-tested First Rate martial artists were no match for the drunken man's rampage.

"You lowly Third Rate trash from wandering martial artist backgrounds dare…"

"Gah!"

Whoosh! Thud-thud-thud!

Short cries of alarm from the guards and the fast, powerful sounds of impacts rang out. In an instant, the area outside the private annex fell silent.

Then rough, unsteady footsteps began to approach, driving the silence away.

He took down six First Rate martial artists in an instant while that drunk?

A master—and not just any master. A Peak master.

Just as the Captain of the Guards' face hardened and his hand moved toward his sword hilt, Baek Museong gave a small shake of his head.

"I think I should handle this."

"Great Hero Baek, that's…"

"It's all right. We've met several times before. He'll back down for my sake, if nothing else."

"You mean…?"

“Our connection goes back several generations. Ah, of course…”

Baek Museong scratched his cheek and added,

“It isn’t exactly a harmonious connection.”

“…!”

At that moment, a thought flashed through the Captain of the Guards’ mind like lightning.

First came the words Zhongnan Sect. Then the name of a man.

“C-could it be?”

He had only been the Captain of the Guards at Xi’an Tower for a little over two weeks, but he had already heard so many rumors about that man that his ears ached.

A man whose temperament was as extraordinary as the sect he came from.

The Captain of the Guards grimaced and was about to speak the man’s name when —

Boom!

The door of the private annex, made from sturdy blackwood, exploded. Splinters flew in every direction.

Baek Museong smiled faintly at the young man approaching with a staggering gait and a face flushed red with alcohol.

“It’s been a long time. Have you been well?”

At the same moment—

“Why are you here?”

The face of Hyuk Sopyung, the Zhongnan One Dragon,[1630] twisted like that of a fiend.

“Wow! Wowww!”

“Please stop shouting. Everyone’s staring.”

“Benefactor! Candied fruit over there!”

“That damn candied fruit. Aren’t you sick of it yet?”

“No!”

“Then just open your own shop!”

“Can the candied-fruit vendor come with us all the way to Sichuan?”

“No, you lunatic…”

“They sell thin noodles over there! They say the broth is made with beef!”

Cheongpung, you little bastard. You’re like a rubber ball that could bounce off in any direction without warning…

[1630] A sobriquet for a leading young martial artist of the Zhongnan Sect.

I quickly grabbed Cheongpung by the back of his neck as he scampered toward a roadside food stall.

“Please, let’s just act like human beings. That’s all I’m asking. Like human beings!”

“Candied fruit… thin noodles…”

“Just wait a little longer, and I’ll feed you until your belly bursts!”

“Really?”

“How many times do I have to say it? So please shut your mouth and follow me quietly, okay?”

Of course, I wouldn’t be feeding him with my money. It would be Huashan’s money, but that was all the same in the end.

We were supposed to pass straight through here, too.

According to our original schedule, there hadn’t been any need to stop in Xi’an at all.

But before we left, Heavenly Sword True Person, the Sect Leader of Huashan, had asked us to stop by Xi’an. Since it was Cheongpung’s hometown, we had decided to pass through while we were at it.

We had been pushing ourselves for nearly seven days and nights without eating or washing properly. I also wanted to enjoy some hospitality and get at least one full day of rest.

I was told Huashan’s Lone Crane, Baek Museong, would be waiting for us.

It had already been more than a year since I’d last seen him.

Before I left for Anhui with Jeok Cheongang, Baek Museong had said this to me.

“Contact me whenever you come to Shaanxi. I’ll treat you properly. Haha.”

When he promised me the full course, I’d wondered if the guy was from Busan,[1631] but apparently it hadn’t been empty talk.

At least, judging by the fact that we were meeting like this today.

“By the way, where’s Xi’an Tower?”

A passerby I’d stopped had told me we only needed to follow the main road straight ahead. But why was the street so crowded? I couldn’t see the end of it.

As I looked around, a finger caked in black grime pointed toward a building in the distance.

“That is Xi’an Tower.”

“Where? Oh, you’re right. How did you know?”

Gung Gibang, the future boss of all beggars, answered proudly.

“It is the finest place to beg. Even the food they leave behind and throw away is fit for a sumptuous feast, and because people of high status come and go, they give plenty of alms. Every beggar knows this place.”

[1631] Busan is a port city in southeastern Korea. The “full course” quip alludes to an elaborate itinerary of local hospitality.

"…"

So it was a Beggars' Sect hotspot.

I shook my head and headed toward Xi'an Tower.

When we reached its enormous main entrance, wide enough for ten people to pass through at once, a guard who appeared to belong to Xi'an Tower bowed his head.

"I'm sorry, but we're closed today."

"…What? Is it a day off?"

"Not exactly. A slight problem arose during business hours."

"Oh."

I hadn't expected that.

I glanced to the side and saw Cheongpung looking as though he was about to burst into tears.

Scratching my head, I spoke to the guard.

"Isn't there any way around it? We had an appointment today. His name is Baek Museong. I was told you'd know him if I gave you his name."

"Again, I'm sorry, but at the moment— Excuse me? Did you say Great Hero Baek Museong?"

"Yes. Baek Museong, Huashan's Lone Crane."

Cheongpung called out desperately.

"Martial Nephew Baek! Where are you, Martial Nephew Baek? Can you hear my stomach growling?"

The guard looked back and forth between us, then flung open the tightly closed main gate.

"I'll escort you to the private annex immediately!"

What the hell?

Why the sudden change in attitude?

Did Baek Museong stand us up?

My guess was wrong.

We followed the guard as he raced ahead almost fast enough to fly and arrived at a nearly devastated private annex.

Baek Museong was waiting for us there, sword drawn.

Wow. This really is the full course.

This kind of shit makes me sick of being a martial artist.

Chapter 314

I stared blankly at the scene before me.

The spacious room had been reduced to a wasteland. Amid the wreckage stood two young men facing each other. No—three, if I counted the middle-aged man whose face had gone deathly pale.

What am I looking at here?

The answer came quickly.

What else? The same sight I saw practically every day.

An argument and a fight. At this point, I was starting to think they were essential virtues for any martial artist.

After taking stock of the situation, I muttered, “You’ve really laid out a full-course feast.”

Baek Museong quietly lowered his sword and gave me an awkward smile.

“You came.”

“You told me to come, so here I am. Now I already want to leave.”

“It’s been a long time. But where are the others…?”

His gaze swept over my shoulder. He couldn’t possibly be looking for Gung Gibang or Hyuk Mujin. He was obviously searching for the Martial Uncle who was the bane of his existence.

But Cheongpung and the rest of the Bermuda Triangle had vanished without a trace.

I thought they were following me quietly.

Please, just don’t cause any trouble.

I rubbed between my eyebrows. Never mind the Bermuda trio—the immediate problem was right in front of me.

“Is that what matters right now? Is causing trouble a Huashan specialty?”

“There was a minor complication.”

“You don’t need to explain. Anyone can see that.”

Suppressing a click of my tongue, I looked at the young bastard facing Baek Museong.

Sharp eyes and a shovel chin. Every young prodigy I’d met around here had been handsome or beautiful, which had left me feeling relatively deprived. But this guy was on the ugly side, so I immediately felt a certain kinship with him.

“Hello.”

They said you couldn’t spit in a smiling face.

The bastard responded to my friendly greeting.

“Get lost. A beggar like you has no place here.”

I turned to Baek Museong.

“Young Hero Baek, who the fuck is this bastard?”

“He is Hyuk Sopyung, the Zhongnan One Dragon.”

“This bastard is a dragon too? Why the hell are there so many dragons?”

“He is known throughout the martial world as the Zhongnan Sect’s greatest prodigy and one of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes.”

“He looks more like an earthworm.”

An ugly bastard with an ugly personality. That pissed me off twice as much.

At my mutter, Hyuk Sopyung’s eyebrows shot up.

“Well, look at this son of a bitch…”

“Better than being worse than a dog. And think carefully before you swing that sword. This is the greatest crisis of your life.”

Hyuk Sopyung’s hand twitched. The blade that had been inching toward me stopped and slowly lowered. He looked me up and down with blazing eyes.

“You’re no ordinary man.”

“Yep. I’m pretty extraordinary.”

“I thought you were merely a hide peddler… But then again, Huashan’s Lone Crane wouldn’t bother with someone like that.”

“Unlike you, Baek Museong gives everyone the time of day. And look at these beautiful muscles. Do you think you can build muscles like this by selling hides?”

Admittedly, I looked like a mess.

I had charged straight ahead for more than seven days and nights without stopping at an inn even once. My hair was slick with oil, and the martial uniform that had once been clean had long since become coated in dust.

The finishing touch was the wooden pack frame piled high with hides. Jeok Cheongang’s small figure was hidden inside it.

Looking shabby is one thing, but I do smell a little.

It was about time I washed.

Hyuk Sopyung glared at me as I pressed my nose to my uniform and sniffed.

“Stop fooling around and state your sect and name.”

“God, it’s always ‘sect this, sect that’ with you people. Don’t you ever get tired of it?”

“I can promise you one thing. Unless you belong to the Nine Sects and One Gang or the Five Great Families, you won’t walk out of here in one piece.”

“Really?”

I made a show of shuddering.

“What am I going to do? My sect belongs to neither the Nine Sects and One Gang nor the Five Great Families. Can’t you just let me walk out anyway?”

“You should have watched your mouth. Remember that your paltry three-inch tongue has placed both you and your sect in danger.”

“My sect is actually in a bit of trouble already. There are only two of us, including me.”

“Two?”

“Yep. My Master and me. That’s it.”

A sneer tugged at Hyuk Sopyung’s lips as he turned to Baek Museong.

“To think you would waste your time on some nobody from a Third Rate sect. You must have far too much time on your hands. Wouldn’t you be better off spending it practicing your martial arts?”

“I’m not so sure. I believe there are several problems with what you just said.”

Baek Museong continued with a pleasant smile.

“First, Jin Taekyung’s sect is not Third Rate, nor is he a nobody. Second, you are one step beneath me. That has remained true from the day we first met until now.”

“What did you just say?”

“I said you are one step beneath me. Seeing you cause a drunken disturbance like this, I suspect that will remain true in the future as well.”

His lips were smiling, but his eyes were not.

There was something in Baek Museong’s gaze that had nothing to do with martial arts.

The aura—or perhaps the dignity—that belonged to him as a person.

That seemed to be part of the reason Hyuk Sopyung could only grind his teeth without daring to answer.

And people like him always try to settle things with their fists when they run out of words.

Just like now.

The tip of Hyuk Sopyung’s sword trembled. Before he could make his move, I spoke.

“I’m pretty sure I already warned you. Think carefully before you swing that sword.”

Whoosh.

Hyuk Sopyung whipped his head toward me, his eyes gleaming with murderous intent.

“You…”

“I believe all things are equal, so I don’t usually split hairs over this stuff. But you should be grateful you’re a Disciple of the Zhongnan Sect. If you weren’t, you’d already have been carried out of here.”

Dark Heaven was gathering like a storm cloud in the distance.

At a time like this, when the Murim needed to unite just to stand a chance, starting a dispute with the Zhongnan Sect was obviously a terrible idea.

Though it might already be a little late for that.

I already had bad blood with the Zhongnan Sect.

As Three Hands of Zhongnan—and as the Roaring Fury Swordsman.

Old Master thoroughly thrashed him and sent him packing a year ago.

The Roaring Fury Swordsman wasn't some nameless nobody rolling around in the street. He was an Elder of the Zhongnan Sect and the Senior Brother of the Sect Leader, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord. From what I'd heard, the fallout had been considerable.

Apparently, the Roaring Fury Swordsman had entered secluded training for some reason, while the Three Hands of Zhongnan had been slapped by their Sect Leader.

That's already a perfectly good grudge. There's no need to take it any further.

The smell of the oil Jeok Cheongang had poured all over the Zhongnan Sect hadn't even faded yet. I had no desire to set it on fire.

Especially not while Jeok Cheongang was unconscious.

"So put your sword away and go quietly. Okay?"

Good job. This is how you become an adult.

It was such a calm response that I wanted to praise myself.

But Hyuk Sopyung, the Zhongnan One Dragon, disagreed.

His teeth ground together, and his eyes flashed.

"Then let's see whether your skills can match that mouth of yours."

Hissssss!

The sword in Hyuk Sopyung's hand tore through the air at blinding speed.

At the same moment, a net of Sword Energy swept toward me.

It was the same martial art that the Roaring Fury Swordsman, Song Il, had unleashed a year ago.

Heavenly River Thirty-Six Swords.

The Zhongnan Sect's signature technique.

Jeok Cheongang had told me that once someone reached the ultimate level of the Heavenly River Thirty-Six Swords, a single swing could fill heaven and earth in every direction with Sword Energy.

But…

"You know what?"

Whoosh!

Flamefire Path.

The Fire Gate Clan's signature movement technique, passed down for hundreds of years, became a single streak of flame.

I tore through the net of Sword Energy and reached my target without hesitation. Staring into Hyuk Sopyung's wide eyes, I whispered, "You and I are on completely different levels."

"…!"

Hiss—grab!

Hyuk Sopyung hurriedly altered his sword's path, but I caught him by the wrist.

The Extreme Yang qi concentrated in my hand made a sizzling sound as his flesh burned.

"Gaaah!"

A single scream burst from his lips.

The sword slipped from Hyuk Sopyung's grasp and rolled across the floor with a metallic clatter.

Before it could even hit the ground, my palm connected with his cheek.

Smack!

Once more.

Smack!

And one more time.

Smack!

Hyuk Sopyung staggered after taking three slaps without the slightest chance to resist.

Even without putting any internal energy into the blows, my physical abilities had long since surpassed human limits. His eyes were already half-unfocused, as though his soul had fled his body.

"What was it you said earlier? You wanted to see whether my skills could match my mouth?"

"Ghh… Ghhhhh…"

"Listen, you idiot. If you're from the Zhongnan Sect, then I'm from the physical school. Next time, choose where you're going to lie down before you stretch out your legs. Got it?"

Tap, tap.

I patted Hyuk Sopyung's cheek. Only then did his eyes finally regain their focus.

"H-how could you overcome the Heavenly River Thirty-Six Swords at seven-tenths mastery so easily…?"

"You've only mastered seven-tenths of it? No wonder it felt so half-assed. Get it to at least nine-tenths before you come at me again. I've already faced it once, so the result will probably be the same, but still."

"You've faced the Heavenly River Thirty-Six Swords at n-nine-tenths mastery?"

"I have. I even dodged it."

“That’s impossible! Fewer than five people in our sect have reached nine-tenths mastery!”

“I’m talking about one of those five. I heard he’s one of the top three masters in Zhongnan.”

I let out a quiet laugh and continued.

“The Roaring Fury Swordsman, Song Il. I wonder how the old man is doing these days. He didn’t look too well when he was humiliated and sent packing last year.”

That was answer enough.

Hyuk Sopyung was a Direct Disciple of Zhongnan’s main lineage, as well as the man called the sect’s greatest prodigy. There was no way an insider wouldn’t know a rumor that had even reached outsiders.

Hyuk Sopyung’s bloodshot eyes widened, and his body began to tremble.

“Then could you be…?”

“About what I said regarding my sect—every word was true. It isn’t one of the Nine Sects and One Gang, and its only members are my Master and me. I don’t know what possessed them to make the sect rules that way, but with only one successor per generation and a ban on teaching the unworthy, they’re damn strict.”

“The Fire Gate Clan…!”

“Disciples! There are two of them!”

“Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi—you’re Jin Taekyung!”

“Jin Taekyung! That’s right!”

I yanked him closer by the collar and shouted. Hyuk Sopyung’s face turned deathly pale.

After watching his expression for a moment, I grinned and gave his crumpled collar a few brisk pats.

“You know what our Master’s temper is like, right? Let’s end this here without any hard feelings. What was the phrase? Right. Let’s bury this matter forever.”

“…”

“Strange. No answer. Maybe you’ll be able to hear me after about ten slaps.”

I slowly raised my palm.

Hyuk Sopyung flinched reflexively and clenched his teeth.

“I… understand.”

“Hm? What was that? I can’t quite hear the voice of a loser who’s only mastered seven-tenths of the Heavenly River Thirty-Six Swords.”

“…I said I understand.”

“Good. Watch yourself on the way out. I won’t see you off.”

Crack.

The bones in Hyuk Sopyung’s tightly clenched fist creaked.

After glaring one last time at me, Baek Museong, and the middle-aged martial artist whose identity I didn't know, he strode toward the door of the private annex.

Just as he was about to leave, Baek Museong spoke.

"I'm reminded of a boy I met at a Huashan–Zhongnan gathering ten years ago."

"…!"

"Take care, Sopyung."

Hyuk Sopyung froze at Baek Museong's calm voice. Then he left the private annex without another word.

Hyuk Sopyung's presence receded into the distance.

At the same time, someone began creeping toward us.

"Come out."

At my words, someone sucked in a startled breath.

A moment later, Cheongpung poked his head out, his cheeks puffed up like a squirrel's.

He gulped down the food in his mouth, glanced around nervously, and bowed to Baek Museong.

"I'm really sorry about last time, Martial Nephew Baek…"

I suddenly remembered what had happened a year ago.

While Cheongpung was being forcibly escorted back to Huashan, he had beaten Baek Museong and the Three Plum Blossom Elites before escaping.

So this is a meeting between the perpetrator and the victim.

That bastard is guilty, no question.

Chapter 315

Step. Step.

The Zhongnan One Dragon, Hyuk Sopyung, walked neither quickly nor slowly.

With every step, people's gazes and whispers followed him.

"Tut-tut. Causing a scene like that in broad daylight…"

"To think that's the man they call his sect's greatest young prodigy. Tells you all you need to know about the Zhongnan Sect. No wonder Huashan has always been the greatest sect in Shaanxi."

"Why is his cheek so swollen? I heard Huashan's Lone Crane was here. Could it be…?"

Hyuk Sopyung unconsciously rubbed his cheek.

The throbbing pain wasn't only from the stinging gazes around him. The three slaps he had taken without being able to resist—and one man's low voice—came vividly back to him.

I thought I told you. Think carefully before you swing that sword.

The Fire Gate Clan successor chosen by the Fire King Jeok Cheongang. A Hidden Dragon who had risen from the small stream that was Shanxi Province.

Hyuk Sopyung had already heard enough about that bastard to last him a lifetime.

But…

How can he be that strong?

He couldn't understand it. He had become the direct Disciple of the Zhongnan Sect's Sect Leader and studied martial arts with the sect's full support.

Countless Peak martial arts and elixirs, even his place among the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes—Hyuk Sopyung had taken them all for granted.

But now, everything around him was beginning to totter.

The cold expression on the face of Xi'an Tower's chief manager when they met at the entrance was only one sign.

"I heard you caused another disturbance."

"A disturbance? There was a little commotion, that's all. It was nothing serious, so let's forget about it."

Hyuk Sopyung was about to walk past him when the chief manager's next words stopped him dead.

"I believe I told you last time that if this happened again, I would file a formal complaint with the Zhongnan Sect."

"A complaint?"

Hyuk Sopyung glared at the chief manager, his eyes gleaming.

"Our Manager Song has grown quite bold."

"Young Hero Hyuk!"

"Don't get cocky."

A growl slipped between Hyuk Sopyung's clenched teeth.

"You seem awfully full of yourself just because the owner's son joined Huashan as a lay Disciple… Do you really think the Great Zhongnan Sect is such a joke?"

"You go too far."

Hyuk Sopyung twisted his lips at the chief manager's stiff expression.

"You're the ones going too far. A pack of wine sellers dares to look down on our sect? You've got more nerve than sense."

"May I repeat those words to the owner exactly as you said them?"

"Don't forget. Be sure to tell him. Then I'll see you next time."

Pat, pat.

Hyuk Sopyung patted the chief manager's shoulder and walked away with a bitter smile on his lips.

Now even people like him are looking down on me.

Of course, Xi'an Tower's owner possessed considerable influence for someone who could be called a mere businessman. He was a major player who controlled the entertainment district of Xi'an, the capital of Shaanxi Province.

But no matter how powerful someone was in the business world, before the name of the Nine Sects and One Gang, he was nothing more than a firefly before the sun.

And now Hyuk Sopyung had suffered such humiliation at the hands of a mere pleasure-house manager—not even the owner himself.

Things really are going from bad to worse.

Over the past year or two, the Zhongnan Sect's standing had plummeted again and again.

The first shot had been fired by the Fire King Jeok Cheongang when he crushed the Roaring Fury Swordsman in front of countless witnesses. Then came the Sword Saint Mae Jonghak's return from seclusion, followed by the name Huashan Divine Dragon.

How could two tigers live on the same mountain?

One had to be the strong one, and the other the weak.

The Zhongnan Sect's role was the latter.

It won't always be like this.

Blood trickled from Hyuk Sopyung's tightly clenched fist.

He had expelled the last of the previous night's alcohol from his body long ago. He was staring up at the sky with a grim expression when—

"Gasp, gasp. Senior Brother, there you are."

"You're… Bong-su?"

Hyuk Sopyung looked at the familiar face in surprise.

The young man was panting heavily. Like Hyuk Sopyung, he was a Disciple of the Zhongnan Sect. Though they had different Masters, they belonged to the same generation.

“What brings you here when you should be at the main sect?”

The main sect stood on Mount Zhongnan, two days from Xi’an. Bong-su, Hyuk Sopyung’s Junior Brother, answered.

“I’m carrying out a mission. The entire Taeeul Sword Unit came with me.”

“A mission? The Taeeul Sword Unit too?”

The Taeeul Sword Unit was a fighting force composed of the Zhongnan Sect’s second-generation Disciples. Though they couldn’t compare to Huashan’s Plum Blossom Swordsmen, they were still an elite unit the Zhongnan Sect took great pride in.

For the Taeeul Sword Unit, who rarely even left the main sect, to come all the way here…

Hyuk Sopyung frowned in puzzlement. His Junior Brother spoke.

“I was ordered to bring you back, Senior Brother.”

“Ordered? Who’s looking for me?”

“Senior Martial Uncle is in Xi’an.”

“…!”

Hyuk Sopyung’s eyes widened. There were only two people his Junior Brother, who was of the same generation as him, could call Senior Martial Uncle.

One of them, the Roaring Fury Swordsman Song Il, had shut himself away at the main sect because of the internal injury he had suffered at the Fire King’s hands. That left only one person.

But why is he in Xi’an…?

Hyuk Sopyung hurriedly pushed the question from his mind.

If his Second Martial Uncle was looking for him, he couldn’t afford to delay for even a moment. Hyuk Sopyung feared the man more than he feared his own Master, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord.

And it wasn’t only Hyuk Sopyung. Every Disciple of the Zhongnan Sect felt the same way.

The anxiety on his Junior Brother’s face was proof enough.

“Senior Brother, there’s no time.”

“Take me to Senior Martial Uncle at once.”

A short while later, Hyuk Sopyung shot forward at tremendous speed using his movement technique. One question kept circling through his mind.

What on earth is going on?

One thing was certain.

If his Second Martial Uncle, the Taeeul Merciless Sword, had stepped in, this was no ordinary matter.

True Qi Guidance was a dangerous and difficult undertaking.

Even when circulating one's qi alone, there was always a risk of qi deviation. True Qi Guidance required circulating someone else's qi for them, so its difficulty needed no explanation.

Especially when that someone is the Fire King.

The tension was on an entirely different level from when I had performed True Qi Guidance on the Peace Guild members.

Feeling as though I were stepping onto thin ice, I began moving the Scorching Yang Qi.

Slowly. Carefully.

I repeated those two words over and over. Allowing myself no distracting thoughts, I drew in Jeok Cheongang's immense qi.

Whoooong.

The two streams of qi met.

But there was none of the collision or resistance I had encountered with the Peace Guild members. They simply blended together naturally.

They merged and yielded to my guidance as though they had always been one—as naturally as twins reuniting after a long separation.

Because they grew from the same root.

That was right. Jeok Cheongang and I shared the same root: the Fire Gate Clan.

If someone who hadn't learned the Fire Gate Divine Technique had rashly attempted True Qi Guidance, they might have failed to withstand Jeok Cheongang's immense internal energy and fallen into qi deviation.

What a relief.

I had already done this several times, but it never stopped being terrifying.

With my heart in my throat, I began the True Qi Guidance in earnest.

Following the formula of the Fire Gate Divine Technique, I ceaselessly circulated the Extreme Yang qi that had now become one.

One shichen,[1632] or perhaps two.

I lost all sense of time in my concentration. The True Qi Guidance, which had seemed as though it would never end, finally came to a close when all the internal energy returned to the dantian.

Chime.

[1632] A traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

> System - True Qi Guidance successfully completed! - The target's condition has improved slightly! - Your Scorching Yang Qi has increased slightly!

"Phew…"

I closed my eyes and steadied my breathing.

It wasn't over yet. For one brief moment, I had merged with the immense qi of the Supreme Peak master known as the Fire King Jeok Cheongang and felt it as my own.

The root called the Fire Gate Clan. The trunk of the great tree that had grown from it, and its countless branches. I had clearly witnessed a glimpse of an unimaginably distant realm.

Insight came from experiences and circumstances like this.

Just like now.

I'm finally starting to see the way forward.

I could see them—the steps leading to a higher realm.

It was a small insight no one could have taught me.

Chime.

> System - The realm of Fire Gate Divine Technique has risen to seven stars! - You can manipulate, release, and withdraw qi more freely! - You can now perform the martial arts of the Fire Gate Clan with greater power and effectiveness! - You have acquired a large amount of EXP and Bonus Points as a reward for your enlightenment! - Level Up!

Yes. This was it.

I opened my eyes to the cheerful chime. I had climbed only a single step, but the difference was immense.

Through my newly sharpened senses, information about everything around me came flooding in.

My entire body was drenched in sweat. The impurities I had expelled reeked. And someone was struggling silently behind me.

"…"

What the fuck?

I turned my head and saw Cheongpung wrapped around Hyuk Mujin's entire body like an anaconda, both hands clamped firmly over Mujin's mouth and nose.

"What are you doing over there?"

Cheongpung answered brightly.

"Hyuk Mujin was about to snore, so I was stopping him!"

"Ah, well done. That bastard nearly pissed me off so badly I fell into qi deviation."

I told that idiot Hyuk Mujin to stand guard, and he was off dreaming the Butterfly Dream.[1633]

I stared at Hyuk Mujin, whose face had turned blue as he struggled, and suddenly thought of something.

“You only need to cover his nose. Why are you covering his mouth too?”

“When I covered his nose, sounds started coming out of his mouth!”

“Oh.”

“So I covered both!”

“Hmm. Won’t he suffocate and die?”

“He can use the Turtle Breath Technique!”

“What exactly is this damn Turtle Breath Technique?”

“You hold your breath, stop your heartbeat, and lower your body temperature at the same time!”

“Sounds incredible. Is that even possible?”

“Of course. That’s what Hyuk Mujin is doing right now!”

“Mujin is?”

“Yes! His heartbeat has already stopped.”

“…?”

My brain stopped working.

I stared silently at Hyuk Mujin. While we had been talking, he had stopped struggling, and his limbs now hung limp.

“Gasp! Mujin!”

“He’ll be cold soon!”

“Get your hands off him right now, you lunatic!”

“Huh? Maybe it isn’t the Turtle Breath Technique. Young Hero Hyuk? Can’t you hear me? Young Hero Hyuk?”

I didn’t know about the Turtle Breath Technique, but the Ghost Technique certainly seemed accurate.

Just before Hyuk Mujin could achieve Great Completion in the Ghost Technique, I slammed a palm into his chest.

“Cardiopulmonary Resuscitation Fist!”

Thud!

With the dull impact, a harsh breath burst from Hyuk Mujin’s open mouth.

“Gahk!”

“Oh no, Mujin! My left pinky!”

“Cough, cough! C-Captain?”

“Are you all right? Can you breathe?”

[1633] A reference to Zhuangzi’s famous dream of becoming a butterfly.

“What?”

Hyuk Mujin looked around in confusion. Maybe because he had been attacked in the middle of his sleep, he didn’t seem to understand what had happened.

“What’s going on? I was just on a cloud.”

“A cloud?”

This idiot had really almost died.

I was letting out a sigh of relief when Hyuk Mujin continued.

“A man in white came over and started saying strange things. Something about a little lamb having come.”

“What kind of lamb?”

“A little lamb. Then he tried to embrace me, but there were holes this big in both his palms. I was about to cut him down without mercy when I woke up.”

“…”

Why was that person there?

Just as I found myself at a loss for words, the door to our private room at Xi’an Tower slid open, and a grimy face poked inside.

Gung Gibang looked over the dejected Cheongpung, Hyuk Mujin, who had just returned from the dead, and finally me, still shell-shocked.

Then he muttered, “What a kennel.”

Being treated like a dog by a beggar left a bad taste in my mouth.

After barely pulling myself together, I asked Gung Gibang, “Were you out begging?”

Gung Gibang shouted indignantly, “What are you talking about? I’m on my way back from our sect’s Xi’an branch!”

The previous night, I had decided to spend a day at Xi’an Tower and recover from the fatigue of our journey. I had also asked Gung Gibang to gather information, so he must have visited the Xi’an branch for that reason.

Since beggars were scattered throughout the world, the Beggars’ Sect had branches everywhere.

In terms of sheer numbers, it was the greatest sect under heaven.

“So? Did you find anything useful? Something about the Divine Physician’s whereabouts, for example.”

“I did. Though it wasn’t about the Divine Physician.”

Gung Gibang thought for a moment before continuing.

“This information reeks to high heaven.”

“More than you?”

“…”

“Sorry. Tell me.”

Deeply offended, Gung Gibang refused to open his mouth until I had given him five silver nyang in alms.[1634]

[1634] A traditional silver currency unit.

Chapter 316

Gung Gibang carefully tucked the silver nyang[1635] into his clothes before speaking.

“It’s about the Yongbong Escort Bureau.”

“The Yongbong Escort Bureau? You mean the one we ran into on the way here?”

“That’s right. Its operations are limited to Shaanxi Province now, but it was once one of the largest escort bureaus under Heaven.”

“The Yongbong Escort Bureau?”

I thought back to what I had seen two days ago.

For a mere escort bureau, they certainly had an impressive fighting force. Their Young Bureau Head, Ju Hwaran, was a skilled swordswoman worthy of her place among the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes, while an escort named Song Ilseom was at least a cut above her.

Counting the old man who looked like he could have written the Donguibogam, that made three Peak masters.[1636]

That put them on par with most well-established mid-sized sects.

But compared to their glory days, when they had ranked among the top three escort bureaus under Heaven, what I had seen that day was downright shabby.

“What the hell happened to leave it in that state?”

“It started right after the Escort King passed away.”

“The Escort King? The one I know?”

“There can’t be two Escort Kings under Heaven. Great Hero Ju Gongsan—the Escort King you know—was the previous Bureau Head of the Yongbong Escort Bureau.”

Escort King Ju Gongsan.

I hadn’t known his name, but I had heard his sobriquet plenty of times. I had been around the Murim long enough by now to pick up a decent amount of general knowledge.

Besides, I had spent the past year practically joined at the hip with the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

He was a living witness to history—and occasionally an old man who reminisced about the past.

Come to think of it, that friend of mine, the Escort King, was quite something too.

He’s not your friend.

It hasn’t been that long since you tasted the Flame Divine Palm, has it?

Please tell me more. I’ll listen with rapt attention.

[1635] A nyang is a historical Korean unit of currency. Here, it refers to a silver coin.

[1636] Donguibogam is a famous Korean medical text compiled in the seventeenth century.

The story Jeok Cheongang had told me that day about the Escort King had been quite moving.

It was when the Great Faction War was at its height. By then, the Demonic Cult had seized eight provinces, including Gansu, Sichuan, and Yunnan, and was advancing into the Central Plains with a hundred thousand demonic soldiers.

When does the Escort King show up?

It hasn't been that long since you tasted the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist, has it?

Please continue. I'm begging you.

In any case, the Escort King was nothing more than a wandering escort at the time. Of course, his remarkable skill and chivalrous spirit had already earned him some renown. But with the Demonic Cult sweeping across the world, do you think the orthodox martial artists had time to care about that?

True. Strictly speaking, escorts belong more to the business world than the Murim.

The Demonic Cult needed money as well, so rather than oppressing escort bureaus and merchant groups, they chose to win them over. Given the circumstances, it wasn't particularly strange that the Escort King of those days was in Guangdong, which was under the Demonic Cult's control. Everything went smoothly until he met a woman who was about to give birth.

A woman about to give birth?

She carried the last seed of the Guangdong Chen Family in her womb. The family had already been wiped out for resisting the Demonic Cult more fiercely than anyone else.

They must have been found almost immediately.

The Escort King only realized the truth after he encountered a Demonic Cult pursuit squad. If he refused to hand over the woman, he would have to make an enemy of the Demonic Cult.

At the time, the Demonic Cult had already swallowed half the world after winning battle after battle, Jeok Cheongang had said.

Worse still, Guangdong Province lay tens of thousands of li[1637] from orthodox territory. It was nothing short of the Demonic Cult's lair.

What do you think the Escort King did?

If he'd handed the woman over to the Demonic Cult, he wouldn't have been the Escort King.

Correct. He flatly rejected their demand. His reason was simple: he had already been paid the escort fee.

On a day when the world was engulfed in war, the young escort began what might have been his final escort mission.

Tucked inside his clothes was the old jade hairpin the woman of the Guangdong Chen Family had given him as payment.

[1637] This uses the Chinese li: one li is about 500 m (0.311 mi).

I heard it took him two whole years.

From Guangdong through Jiangxi and Hubei, all the way to Henan, where the Murim Alliance was located.

The young escort crossed half the continent while evading his pursuers. He climbed mountains, raced across fields, and swam through rivers.

No one knew how he had done it or how many dangers he had overcome, but one thing was certain.

The young escort had completed an escort mission without precedent in the history of the Murim.

When his footsteps finally reached Henan, the last seed of the Guangdong Chen Family was crying lustily in the woman's arms, and the escort Ju Gongsan had become the Escort King.

The Martial God said that he truly deserved to be called a king. No one disagreed.

Jeok Cheongang brought up the Escort King from time to time after that.

Even Jeok Cheongang, who looked at the world with a jaundiced eye, seemed to consider the Escort King a decent man.

I heard he founded an escort bureau in his hometown of Shaanxi after the Great Faction War ended… I don't know what became of him after that. Perhaps I should stop by someday and share a few drinks with him.

In the end, Jeok Cheongang's wish would never come true.

According to what Gung Gibang had just told me, Escort King Ju Gongsan was already dead.

The continent sure is small.

To think the Yongbong Escort Bureau we had encountered by chance two days ago was the legacy of that very Escort King.

Noticing the interest in my eyes, Gung Gibang continued.

"Great Hero Ju Gongsan couldn't hold out for long after the internal injuries he suffered during the Great Faction War, and passed away. It was a tragic thing."

"Then who's the current Bureau Head?"

"Great Hero Ju Hogun, the Junzi Sword.[1638] He's the Escort King's only child and Young Lady Ju Hwaran's father."

"Junzi Sword, huh? That sobriquet alone gives me a pretty good idea of what he's like."

"I've never met him myself, but… my Master said the man himself was a very good person."

A single particle could change the feeling of someone's words entirely.

Gung Gibang's Master, the Beggars' Sect Leader, hadn't simply said that Ju Hogun was a good person.

[1638] Junzi is the Confucian ideal of a morally upright gentleman.

He had said that Ju Hogun was good as a person.

That reeks of a sucker.

I had a feeling the Junzi Sword's personality had played a major part in reducing the Yongbong Escort Bureau to its current state.

Sure enough, Gung Gibang read my expression and nodded.

"As you guessed. Great Hero Ju is sentimental and can't stand by when he sees injustice, so he's suffered tremendous losses in various ways since taking over the Yongbong Escort Bureau."

"He was in the wrong line of work from the start."

"My Master once said that a chivalrous hero could never be a merchant."

He was right. To be called a chivalrous hero, you had to disregard profit. To become a successful merchant, you had to pursue it more fiercely than anyone else.

An escort bureau might stand at the intersection of the Murim and the business world, but in the end, it was much closer to the latter.

One hundred points as a chivalrous hero. Zero as a merchant.

The Escort King had managed to catch two rabbits at once and build the Yongbong Escort Bureau into one of the five largest in the industry because of his fame.

But that advantage must have vanished after his death. Ju Hogun lacked the makings of a merchant, and there was no way he could make up the difference.

"Whenever a great famine struck, he would exhaust his own grain stores, then pay a premium to buy even more and give all of it away. He took in poor children and orphans, fed them, and gave them places to sleep…"

"At that point, isn't he basically UNICEF?"

"Huh?"

"Nothing. Keep going."

"In any case, more money went out than came in, and the Yongbong Escort Bureau gradually began to decline. Because of his ties to the previous Bureau Head, my Master advised him several times, but apparently, he refused to listen. Great Hero Ju insisted that this was his policy."

"Wow."

He was certainly an admirable and respectable businessman. It was just a shame he wasn't a capable one.

Gung Gibang scratched vigorously at his back as he continued.

"What could anyone do? With a man like Great Hero Ju inheriting the escort bureau, it was bound to shrink drastically in the span of thirty years."

"Thirty years? They say even a ruined rich family lasts three generations."

"It would have lasted three generations easily—if Great Hero Ju hadn't collapsed from qi deviation two years ago."

"…What's that supposed to mean? Is this the Yongbong Escort Bureau's age of tribulations or something?"

"Considering all the misfortunes they've suffered over the past two years, you could certainly call it that."

"Good grief. They must have been through a lot."

For an instant, Ju Hwaran's spirited figure flashed through my mind.

At the time, I had thought only that she was smart and pretty. As it turned out, she was a young woman carrying an entire household on her shoulders.

But…

"What exactly is this stink you keep talking about?"

Gung Gibang had started the conversation so ominously that I had listened closely, but the only foul smell around here was the stench coming off that bastard.

My fastball, aimed tight and inside, made Cheongpung and Hyuk Mujin—who had been listening in silence—crane their necks forward.

"That's right. I don't smell anything. I want to smell the stink too!"

"Young Hero Gung, when was the last time you brushed your teeth?"

When the man who had nearly killed someone and the man who had nearly died asked in unison, Gung Gibang scowled.

"Oh, shut up with all that yapping."

"Never mind that. Hurry up and tell us. And don't open your mouth so wide. Seriously, when did you last brush your teeth?"

"Four months ago."

What a filthy bastard.

I stared at him as if he were some kind of animal. Gung Gibang flinched and hurriedly spat out a name.

"Z-Zhongnan Sect."

"Huh? Zhongnan Sect?"

"According to what our Xi'an branch uncovered, there are signs that the Zhongnan Sect was deeply involved in the downfall of the Yongbong Escort Bureau."

"Good grief. Those bastards stick their noses into everything."

So this really was information that stank.

No wonder the stench had hit me the moment I heard the words Zhongnan Sect.

For a moment, I wondered if it was because Gung Gibang had opened his mouth too wide. But judging by the conduct of every Zhongnan Sect member I had met so far, this wasn't a rumor. It was a fact.

"They're trying to swallow the Yongbong Escort Bureau whole, aren't they?"

"Swallow it whole? Is it tasty?"

"Cheongpung, could you shut your mouth for a moment?"

"Yes, Benefactor!"

By now accustomed to all of this, Gung Gibang answered as if nothing had happened.

“Most likely. Zhongnan operates an escort bureau of its own, but it can’t compare to the Yongbong Escort Bureau’s position within Shaanxi. From Zhongnan’s perspective, the Yongbong Escort Bureau must be a thorn in its side, just like Huashan.”

“So they’ve been methodically bringing it down for the past two years?”

“Young Lady Ju Hwaran is certainly talented, but she has far too little experience. Being as softhearted as her father is another weakness.”

So she was smart, but naive.

Then again, from what I had heard, Ju Hwaran was only twenty-one.

At that age, she had enough on her plate just digesting everything she had learned. Adapting to real work while leading an escort bureau of that size couldn’t have been easy.

Especially with the Zhongnan Sect pulling dirty tricks behind the scenes.

Zhongnan might have been beneath Huashan, but it was still one of the Nine Sects and One Gang.

The Yongbong Escort Bureau might have withstood its pressure while the Escort King was alive, but in its current state, it didn’t stand a chance.

Zhongnan would nibble away at it little by little until it finally collapsed.

“How widely known is this?”

“It’s top-secret information from the head of our Xi’an branch.”

“Top secret, huh? Then Huashan doesn’t know either?”

“Who knows? They might, or they might not. Even if they do, they could pretend otherwise and let it slide.”

“Pretend they don’t know? What’s that supposed to mean?”

Gung Gibang hesitated for a moment, then answered with a sigh.

“Because they’re both part of the Nine Sects and One Gang.”

“…What?”

“Huashan’s Lone Crane, Baek Museong, is an upright and honorable man. The Sword Saint, Great Hero Mae Jonghak, is as clear as a stream, and so is Cheongpung standing here. But remember—it’s foolish to judge the whole by a single facet.”

That one sentence saw straight through me.

I was leaving today anyway. I had been planning to discreetly tip Baek Museong off.

He was someone I knew to be a good man. And he held enough standing to be called the future of Huashan.

But I had been wrong.

The future is only the future. It isn't the present.

Once again, I realized that the Murim was more complicated than I had thought.

Even the world of ignorant, simple-looking swordsmen had rules—and a league of its own.

I guess an arm really does bend inward.[1639]

When I remained silent, Gung Gibang cautiously watched me and asked,

"What are you planning to do?"

"What do you mean, what am I going to do?"

"Are you… thinking of stepping in yourself?"

"Me?"

I considered it for a moment, then shook my head.

My encounter with the Yongbong Escort Bureau had been nothing more than chance. I had my own responsibilities.

"If I run into them before I leave, I can give them a heads-up. But that's it."

Now that Jeok Cheongang had collapsed, getting entangled with the Zhongnan Sect would complicate matters.

For some reason, Ju Hwaran's face rose in my mind. I shook my head and let the thought slip away.

[1639] A Korean idiom meaning that people naturally favor their own side.

Chapter 317

"Ah."

Sunlight broke across Ju Hwaran's long, fluttering eyelashes. Even after waking, she lay in bed for a long while, staring at the ceiling.

The night before, she and the Yongbong Escort Bureau had finally reached Xi'an.

Black Stone Stronghold, led by Heavenly Axe, had been the final obstacle on their escort mission.

They had passed through Xi'an's safe, bustling streets and unloaded their baggage at a secluded inn. Beds, warm food, and hot bathwater had all been waiting for them.

After checking every item in the shipment, Ju Hwaran had collapsed into sleep.

At last, the end is in sight.

This place was safe. There were no bandits blocking the mountain roads, nor wandering martial artists concealing their identities and attacking in groups. Once they delivered the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng—the primary objective of this escort mission—to the Zhongnan Sect, it would all be over.

The Yongbong Escort Bureau would receive the reward its efforts deserved, and they would all return home together.

Along with thirty-three funerary urns.

Thirty-three…

Ju Hwaran's eyes suddenly flickered faintly.

Thirty-three bone urns. Thirty-three faces. Memories of laughing and crying with them flashed before her eyes.

"Ah, I shouldn't be doing this…"

Ju Hwaran rubbed at the corners of her eyes with her sleeve, then slapped both cheeks hard. The sharp crack brought her scattered thoughts back, if only a little.

"This is only the beginning. I have to keep my head."

The escort mission was not over yet.

Three days remained until the deadline agreed upon with the Zhongnan Sect, and the mission would not be complete until the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng had been safely delivered.

"And then… it'll be a new beginning."

Muttering softly, Ju Hwaran reached inside her robes. She pulled out a tightly sealed wooden casket, checked it, then put it away again and secured it with a cord.

Just that brief exposure left a cool fragrance lingering at the tip of her nose before it faded.

Inside the casket was the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng, an ancient elixir coveted by every martial artist in the Murim.

“Stay focused, Ju Hwaran. You’ve only taken the first step.”

That was when someone spoke from outside the door.

“Hwaran, are you awake?”

It was a familiar voice. Ju Hwaran straightened her clothes before answering.

“Yes, Uncle Heo. You may come in.”

“Then excuse me for a moment.”

A moment later, Chief Escort Heo Jun opened the door and entered with a bright expression.

“We’ll be able to return to the Escort Bureau sooner than expected.”

“You mean…”

“The Zhongnan Sect is waiting in Xi’an.”

“The Zhongnan Sect?”

“That’s right. And I hear the Taeeul Merciless Sword himself has come. Hahaha.”

Unlike Heo Jun, who was smiling, Ju Hwaran’s gaze sank deeply.

The Zhongnan Sect? And the Taeeul Merciless Sword came all the way to Xi’an himself?

Their return had been moved forward, so she should have been happy, just like Heo Jun.

But the more she thought about the arrogant, discourteous attitude the Zhongnan Sect had shown them until now, the more unease crept up from the depths of her heart.

“Uncle Heo, don’t you think something is strange?”

“Hm? What do you mean, strange?”

“There are still three days until the agreed-upon deadline.”

“Only three days. Even traveling slowly, it takes no more than two to get from Xi’an to Mount Zhongnan.”

“You used to say it all the time, Uncle. There are no coincidences in the Murim. It’s a place where nothing should surprise you, no matter what happens.”

“Hwaran, what are you trying to say?”

Under Heo Jun’s utterly baffled gaze, Ju Hwaran spoke gravely.

“The Zhongnan Sect has been quietly hostile toward the Yongbong Escort Bureau all this time. They must have wanted this escort mission to fail more than anyone. That’s why they deliberately imposed such difficult conditions.”

“But we accepted them. And we’ve performed admirably.”

The conditions demanded by the Zhongnan Sect had been extremely difficult. The other heads of escort bureaus who had flocked there, lured by the Zhongnan Sect’s reputation, had even shaken their heads emphatically and abandoned the commission.

If they failed to transport the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng within the specified period, the mission would be deemed a failure, and they would have to pay an astronomical penalty.

But after much deliberation, Ju Hwaran had accepted the Zhongnan Sect's commission.

For one reason alone: to raise the Yongbong Escort Bureau to greater heights.

And we had to pay a terrible price for it.

Something that should never have happened had happened.

Information about the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng had been leaked.

Ju Hwaran was not a fool. She simply lacked experience. She possessed a sharp mind capable of considering every possibility and keeping all options open.

The suspicions she had kept buried until now were slowly taking shape. Ju Hwaran spoke quietly.

"Perhaps… perhaps the Zhongnan Sect…"

"Enough."

Heo Jun cut her off, his face hardening.

"Stop. I know what you're thinking, but anything beyond that is absurd. No—it's dangerous."

"But—"

"I know the rumors about the Zhongnan Sect. It's also true that they've been keeping us in check so they can expand their own escort bureau. But what you're suggesting, Hwaran… is dangerous speculation."

"Uncle Heo…"

"As your uncle and as the Chief Escort of the Yongbong Escort Bureau, I'm asking you. Don't put yourself or the bureau in danger."

Though they shared not a drop of blood, he was an uncle who had always treated her warmly, ever since she was a child.

When he deliberately poured out those words with such a stern expression, Ju Hwaran could no longer continue speaking about the Zhongnan Sect.

"Phew."

As Ju Hwaran let out a quiet sigh, Heo Jun gently put an arm around her shoulders.

"I'm sorry if I was too harsh."

"No. I suppose I was being overly sensitive."

"You had reason to be. The Zhongnan Sect did something it had never done before. Who would have expected them to send the Taeeul Merciless Sword instead of a Hall Master or Chief Steward?"

The Taeeul Merciless Sword was one of the Zhongnan Sect Leader's two Senior Brothers.

He normally remained at the main sect and rarely showed himself in public. There was one simple reason people had remembered him for so long.

The First Sword of Zhongnan.

He was a Supreme Peak master produced by the Zhongnan Sect, a terrifying swordsman said to have mastered the ultimate principles of the Heavenly River Thirty-Six Swords.

There had to be great significance behind a figure comparable to the Sect Leader, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord, personally stepping forward.

That was what Ju Hwaran found most puzzling.

"Why the Taeeul Merciless Sword, of all people?"

"He must be in a hurry. Zhongnan spent a fortune acquiring the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng because of the Roaring Fury Swordsman's Internal Injury, after all. His one and only Senior Brother ended up in that state. Imagine how he must feel."

On the surface, it sounded reasonable.

But Ju Hwaran clearly remembered what her father, Ju Hogun, had told her years ago.

He said the man was frightening.

Her father had been so benevolent that people called him the Junzi Sword.[1640] If even Ju Hogun, who judged others generously, had described him that way, then the Taeeul Merciless Sword had to be every bit as sharp as his swordsmanship.

I can't let my guard down until the very end.

After gathering her thoughts, Ju Hwaran asked Heo Jun about the one person still weighing on her mind.

"What about Captain Song?"

"Ah, about that…"

Heo Jun hesitated before answering.

"I had trustworthy escorts watching him discreetly day and night, but as you know, Hwaran, everyone let their guard down last night…"

"You took your eyes off him."

"I have no excuse. It was my fault for failing to keep a closer watch."

As Heo Jun awkwardly avoided her gaze, Ju Hwaran let out a small sigh.

"Haa…"

Song Ilseom, whose origins were unclear and whose reputation among the public was poor, had been one of their primary subjects of surveillance.

Her suspicions of him had grown particularly strong after he met Jin Taekyung.

[1640] Junzi is the Confucian ideal of a morally upright gentleman.

I told him over and over to keep a close eye on Song Ilseom.

Heo Jun was certainly a good man. He had served the Yongbong Escort Bureau for more than thirty years and had been close enough to Ju Hogun for them to address each other as brothers.

But the careless side he occasionally showed, like now, had also led to mistakes both large and small.

All I can do is hope it doesn't happen this time.

The milk had already been spilled. In any case, the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng was in her possession.

Hiding her disappointment, Ju Hwaran spoke.

"Where did the Zhongnan Sect ask us to meet?"

"At a teahouse called Tengwang Pavilion on the western edge of Xi'an. They want us there by noon."

Tengwang Pavilion was a famous teahouse that Ju Hwaran had occasionally visited herself.

There would be plenty of witnesses, and the atmosphere was quiet, making it the perfect place to conclude an escort mission.

"We'll leave in fifteen minutes. Please prepare."

Baek Museong came to Xi'an Tower while we were in the middle of packing.

"Are you really leaving right away?"

"I'd like to stay a few more days too, but as you know, our schedule is a little tight."

"That's unfortunate. If possible, I would have liked to escort you to the main sect."

"I'll stop by on the way back. Give me a tour of Huashan then."

"Haha, don't worry. I'll take responsibility for showing you everything properly."

There it was again. The full-course promise.

Not that I was expecting the full course. I just hoped that when we met again, he wouldn't be busy beating the hell out of someone like he had been this time.

Then, as I stared at Baek Museong's face while he laughed heartily, a thought occurred to me.

Should I at least mention it? The Yongbong Escort Bureau and the Zhongnan Sect.

While I was debating, Baek Museong touched his face and asked,

"Why are you looking at me like that? Is there something on my face?"

"…"

"Young Hero Jin?"

"Oh, no. Something else just crossed my mind."

Shit, I don't know.

When you got right down to it, the Zhongnan Sect and the Yongbong Escort Bureau were both complete strangers to me. Whatever dispute they had was theirs to resolve.

I already had more than enough problems of my own. Worrying about this too would just be sticking my nose where it didn't belong.

This is the Murim, after all.

I muttered inwardly as I seated Jeok Cheongang on the pack frame. Then I picked up the furs and began piling them over him one by one.

Even as I worked, I couldn't understand why Ju Hwaran kept coming to mind.

Song Ilseom, whom I had only glimpsed in passing, came to mind along with her.

Now that I think about it, he was a suspicious bastard. He stank even worse than Gung Gibang.

After learning about the relationship between the Yongbong Escort Bureau and the Zhongnan Sect, I found myself wondering who that bastard really was.

His Level was a staggering 110. At that level, he could probably strip one of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes clean to the bone.

He had looked to be in his early to mid-thirties at most, but… who was he, and which sect did he belong to?

Could he be an assassin sent by the Zhongnan Sect? No, that's probably going too far.

Had he simply fallen for Ju Hwaran's beauty and decided to stay?

No. If that were the case, there would have been no reason for him to hide his true abilities. Was this one of those stories where the protagonist hides his power? Did some loser hiding his power look cooler when he rescued her?

Ju Hwaran. We only exchanged a few words, but she seemed like a good person. She had a refreshingly direct way of speaking too.

She also possessed extraordinary martial talent, having reached the Peak realm at her age.

And then there was… right. The dimples that appeared when she smiled were pretty. So were her half-moon eyes.

Come to think of it, she looked like a cat.

Cats had always been my favorite animals.

"Um, Captain?"

"Hm? Yeah?"

I turned and saw Hyuk Mujin staring at me strangely.

And not just him. Gung Gibang, Cheongpung, and even Baek Museong were all looking at me the same way.

"What? Why is everyone staring at me?"

"Well, the thing is…"

Hyuk Mujin cautiously pointed at the pack frame.

“In my humble opinion, Great Hero Jeok is going to suffocate at this rate.”

“Gasp!”

I hurriedly flung aside the furs that had piled up like a mountain.

Jeok Cheongang, who had nearly gone to meet that person while still in a coma, was breathing faintly.

“Oh, Benefactor! You’re just like me!”

“Did you just insult me?”

“Ah. No, no. That isn’t what I meant…”

Ignoring Cheongpung as he instantly drooped, I began piling the furs back on. Jeok Cheongang’s slight frame quickly disappeared beneath them.

Only after making sure enough air could pass through did I hoist the pack frame onto my back.

“All right. If everyone’s ready, let’s get going.”

We stepped outside amid Xi’an Tower’s lavish hospitality.

The bustling streets of Xi’an were packed with people. Over the din, Baek Museong spoke.

“I’d like to see you off, but you won’t allow it, will you?”

“We’ll be seeing each other again later anyway.”

“Haha. I knew you’d say that. Then I’ll be off. Stay well, Martial Uncle Cheongpung.”

“Take care, Martial Nephew Baek!”

In the end, I hadn’t even brought it up.

Good. This was fine.

Just as I was about to turn away, alone in my lingering unease amid the warm farewells, I overheard someone speaking.

“Did you hear? The Taeeul Merciless Sword of the Zhongnan Sect is in Xi’an.”

“What? The Taeeul Merciless Sword? Why on earth would he come here?”

“How should I know? Someone saw him heading toward Tengwang Pavilion in the west. Apparently, he’s meeting with the Yongbong Escort Bureau… but I can’t say for sure.”

The whispering voices slowly faded into the distance.

I asked Cheongpung,

“Cheongpung.”

“Yes, Benefactor.”

“Have you ever had tea?”

“Yes! I have!”

“No, you haven’t tried tea yet.”

If I said you hadn’t, then you hadn’t.

Chapter 318

“Astringent.”

The old man muttered as he savored his Tieguanyin.[1641]

His broad shoulders belied his age, and his snow-white beard hung all the way to his navel, giving him the appearance of an immortal.

He would have looked the part, too, if not for the old sword propped beside him.

“I-I’m sorry, Senior. I haven’t reached my father’s level yet…”

“It’s a shame, but it can’t be helped. When the owner changes, it’s only natural for the tea to taste different. You may go.”

The teahouse owner, who had been bowing repeatedly, vanished as though he had been waiting for those very words.

The old man watched him leave, then ran a hand over his teacup.

“The three of us martial brothers used to stop by this place from time to time. That was more than thirty years ago. Your Master wasn’t the Sect Leader back then, either.”

“I see.”

Hyuk Sopyung answered from across the table.

He had kept his mouth shut for more than half an hour while the old man performed his tea ceremony, and his voice was cracked like a drought-stricken rice paddy.

“Would you like a cup?”

The old man’s gentle voice contained not the slightest hint of coercion.

But when the old man before him offered something, it had to be accepted. Hyuk Sopyung knew that, as did the thirty members of the Taeeul Sword Unit stationed throughout the teahouse.

“I would be honored, Senior Martial Uncle.”

The old man picked up the jade-colored teapot and tilted it over the empty cup Hyuk Sopyung held out respectfully.

Trickle.

The tea slowly began to fill the cup.

At the same time, Hyuk Sopyung’s expression changed drastically.

“…!”

“What is it?”

“I… It’s nothing.”

His words notwithstanding, Hyuk Sopyung was clearly struggling. His hand trembled, and his face flushed so red it seemed ready to burst.

[1641] Tieguanyin is a Chinese oolong tea named for Guanyin, a bodhisattva.

It was only tea, yet every drop that struck the cup bore down on him with terrifying pressure.

What the hell…?

It was an enormous amount of internal energy. An overwhelming force that even Hyuk Sopyung, the Zhongnan Sect's greatest prodigy, could not withstand despite receiving every elixir available without restraint.

He drew up all the internal energy in his body and poured it into the teacup, but he reached his limit almost immediately.

Tap. Crack.

The instant the last drop fell, a hairline crack spread through the cup in Hyuk Sopyung's hand, and tea spilled over the rim.

That was when the old man's gaze darkened.

He was Hwangbo Eom, the Taeeul Merciless Sword.

"How old are you this year?"

"…I have reached thirty."

"When did you last see this old man?"

"Ten years ago."

"Yes, that's right. The Huashan–Zhongnan gathering. That was where we last met."

The Huashan–Zhongnan gathering. Or the Zhongnan–Huashan gathering.

Huashan and Zhongnan—the dragon and tiger crouched in Shaanxi Province—held a gathering once every ten years where their young prodigies competed against one another.

Its official purpose was to foster friendship and exchange through duels, but everyone knew it was really a competition between the two sects.

"I remember now. I watched with my own eyes as that bastard Baek Museong toyed with you."

"…!"

Hyuk Sopyung's eyelids trembled.

How could he forget? The defeat he had suffered that day. The merciless gaze of The First Sword of Zhongnan, who had sought him out the moment he returned to the main sect.

"At your age, this old man had already mastered eight-tenths of the Taeeul Divine Technique. What about you?"

"…I apologize."

"Ten years is enough time for mountains and rivers to change. Yet you remain exactly where you were."

The same goes for you, Senior Martial Uncle.

Hyuk Sopyung fought desperately to hold back the words rising in his throat.

Surely you haven't forgotten everything you did to me that day.

Talent without effort could never bloom.

Hyuk Sopyung loved martial arts. That was why he had been called the Zhongnan Sect's greatest prodigy. He had devoted himself to martial arts and swung his sword through blood and sweat.

But he had not slowly fallen apart simply because Huashan's Lone Crane, Baek Museong, defeated him in front of everyone.

"I already know you've been disgracing our sect's name. I hear you've made quite a name for yourself in Xi'an."

"Senior Martial Uncle…"

"This old man is speaking. Shut your mouth."

Hwangbo Eom's formerly dispassionate voice had turned colder than eternal ice.

"Watching all of you has been quite the farce. From top to bottom, every last one of you is splattering mud across the Zhongnan Sect's signboard."

By the top, he meant the Roaring Fury Swordsman, Song Il. By the bottom, he meant Hyuk Sopyung.

Even though his only Senior Brother was laid up with an Internal Injury, Hwangbo Eom continued to spew venom at him. Hyuk Sopyung and the disciples of the Taeeul Sword Unit realized once again that the merciless part of his epithet—

Taeeul Merciless Sword.

—did not apply only to his enemies.

"Your Master, who led the Zhongnan Sect into this sorry state, is just as pathetic. Why our Master ever handed the position of Sect Leader to someone like him…"

That was when Hyuk Sopyung's tightly pressed lips finally parted.

"You go too far."

"What did you say?"

Whoosh.

A gust swept over Hyuk Sopyung's entire body.

No—it was not wind.

It was a powerful wave of qi flowing from the Taeeul Merciless Sword, a Supreme Peak master produced by Zhongnan.

"I must be going deaf in my old age. Say that again."

But Hyuk Sopyung did not yield, even beneath the suffocating pressure.

"Your words… ngh. Go too far."

Though the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord had never shown him warmth or affection, he was still Hyuk Sopyung's one and only Master. And more than that—

"He is the Sect Leader of the Great Zhongnan Sect. You are a Disciple of Zhongnan, just as this junior is. Show the Sect Leader the respect he is due."

"Respect for the Sect Leader?"

A sharp gleam flashed through Hwangbo Eom's eyes.

There had been a time when no one stood closer to the position of Zhongnan Sect Leader than he did.

He had a Senior Brother and Junior Brother under the same Master, but neither had been a true rival. Neither could match his martial prowess or his ruthlessness.

The Sect Leader of the Zhongnan Sect should have been Hwangbo Eom. It was only natural.

“And what could a nobody like you possibly know to dare…!”

Hwangbo Eom was about to roar when he abruptly closed his mouth.

He had noticed Hyuk Sopyung’s unwavering gaze. He had also sensed the strange current passing among the Zhongnan disciples of the Taeeul Sword Unit.

These bastards.

Hwangbo Eom’s gaze turned cold. At the same time, the powerful aura pouring from his body slowly subsided.

His lips moved beneath his snow-white beard.

“The Sect Leader of the Great Zhongnan Sect…”

Hwangbo Eom lifted his still more than half-full teacup and drained it. Deep furrows appeared between his wrinkled brows.

“Still astringent. With a new owner, neither the flavor nor the fragrance is what it used to be.”

“…!”

“The Great Zhongnan Sect? What a laughable thing to say. Zhongnan today is nothing more than a castle in the air. While you were lost in despair and wasting your days on drinking, women, and gambling, this old man was working to restore our sect.”

“What do you mean…?”

Confusion colored Hyuk Sopyung’s voice.

Hadn’t Hwangbo Eom shut himself away at the main sect? Even when his Senior Brother, the Roaring Fury Swordsman, returned with a serious Internal Injury, he had not shown his face even once.

Then how…?

Hyuk Sopyung’s thoughts were cut short when a group entered the teahouse.

At their head was a young woman whose mere presence seemed to brighten her surroundings.

“I am Ju Hwaran, Young Bureau Head of the Yongbong Escort Bureau. I pay my respects to Great Hero Hwangbo, the Taeeul Merciless Sword.”

Ju Hwaran, the Dagger Hidden Flower.

At her bold greeting, the corners of Hwangbo Eom’s mouth curled upward.

“Good. Did you bring the item I requested?”

He stroked his thick beard, his eyes flashing with an unreadable light.

“By the way, who’s the Taeeul Merciless Sword?”

Speed Beggar answered gruffly.

“Who else would the Taeeul Merciless Sword be? He’s the Taeeul Merciless Sword.”

“Gibang. Aren’t you curious which is stronger—the Eighteen Dragon-Subduing Palms at five-tenths power or the Flame Divine Palm at seven-tenths?”

“…The Taeeul Merciless Sword, Hwangbo Eom. He’s the Junior Brother of the Roaring Fury Swordsman, Song Il, and the Senior Brother of the current Zhongnan Sect Leader, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord.”

As expected of a walking encyclopedia of the Murim. I hadn’t brought him along for moments like this, but he was useful in all sorts of ways.

Except for the smell.

I muttered inwardly as I kept walking.

We were on our way to a teahouse called Tengwang Pavilion. Gung Gibang walked beside me, looking deeply displeased.

“I’ve been thinking about this, and I don’t think it’s a good idea.”

“Why?”

“This is bigger than I expected. And it isn’t just anyone—it’s the Taeeul Merciless Sword. At least you can reason with the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord, but that man…”

Gung Gibang couldn’t finish his sentence and shook his head repeatedly.

“Why? How bad is he? Have you met him before?”

“Once, while I was with my Master. That was enough to make me never want to see him again.”

Judging by Gung Gibang’s reaction, Hwangbo Eom must have made one hell of a first impression.

He shuddered with a disgusted expression, then gave me a sidelong glance.

“You don’t need to ask me. No one knows a household better than its neighbor.”

At the end of Gung Gibang’s gaze was Baek Museong, who had been walking silently without saying a word.

The face that usually wore a relaxed smile had long since hardened like stone.

Okay. I get the picture.

The Taeeul Merciless Sword.

As you spent time in the Murim, you started noticing a few interesting things. One of them was martial epithets.

An epithet contained a piece of the person it belonged to. Sometimes it told you what weapon they favored. Other times, it revealed their personality.

In Hwangbo Eom's case, it did both.

Merciless. That word alone tells me more or less what I need to know.

I'd bet Hyuk Mujin's wrist that he wasn't some genial neighborhood grandpa who chuckled all day. If that wasn't enough, I'd throw in his ankle too.

Gung Gibang spoke anxiously.

"It's not too late to turn back."

"Hm? Turn back from what?"

"Interfering in matters between sects is likely to cause trouble. Even more so when the other party is the Taeeul Merciless Sword of the Zhongnan Sect."

"So?"

"What do you mean, 'so'? I'm telling you to forget this nonsense and go to Sichuan!"

I blinked innocently.

"What the hell are you talking about?"

"Huh?"

"Who's interfering? We're just going to drink some tea. Isn't that right, Cheongpung?"

Cheongpung, who was chewing the candied sweets I had bought to keep him quiet, answered enthusiastically.

"Yes! We're going to drink tea!"

Gung Gibang stared at him incredulously.

"Didn't you say earlier that you'd already had tea?"

"Uh… Well…"

No wonder his answer had sounded so evasive.

Cheongpung had already polished off the sweets in the blink of an eye. He sucked on his fingers and looked back and forth between Gung Gibang and me.

His eyes dripped with longing as they swept across a street stall overflowing with snacks.

"Cheongpung, you've never had tea before. Right?"

As I spoke, I spread one hand wide and waved it over Gung Gibang's shoulder. Five more candied sweets were added to Cheongpung's share, and he nodded eagerly.

"That's right! I've never had tea before! My butt's itching to get to the teahouse!"

"You heard him."

His will to fight shattered, Gung Gibang tore at his matted hair.

"Damn it. If Master beats me with the Dog-Beating Staff[1642] later, I'm telling him this was all your fault."

"Go ahead. My Master is the Fire King."

[1642] The Dog-Beating Staff is a signature weapon of the Beggars' Sect.

“You miserable bastard. You’re worse than a dog.”

“Stop whining and keep walking. What about you, Mujin? Got a problem?”

Hyuk Mujin looked at me hopefully.

“Am I allowed to say so?”

“Sure. If you want to die.”

“…”

“All right. We’re almost there.”

The weathered signboard bearing the name Tengwang Pavilion drew steadily closer.

I strode onward until I finally stopped before the teahouse door.

Well, this is no joke.

The Taeeul Merciless Sword. The greatest swordsman Zhongnan could boast of. I could feel the aura of a Supreme Peak master beyond the door, along with the presence of dozens of people carrying considerable qi.

The pack frame on my shoulders suddenly felt heavier.

“Old Master, don’t worry. No matter what happens, I’ll protect you.”

“Nothing will happen,” I muttered softly, then threw open the door.

Chapter 319

“I am Ju Hwaran, Young Bureau Head of the Yongbong Escort Bureau. I pay my respects to Great Hero Hwangbo, the Taeeul Merciless Sword.”

Ju Hwaran gave a crisp, formal clasped-hands salute.

The Taeeul Merciless Sword, Hwangbo Eom, truly lived up to his reputation. Merely meeting his gaze made her chest tighten and left her struggling to breathe.

The First Sword of Zhongnan…

The Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families—the fifteen pillars supporting the Murim of today.

The man before her was the greatest master of the Zhongnan Sect, one of those fifteen powers. The immense weight of his name pressed down on her.

But it’s all right.

She had completed an escort mission everyone had agreed was impossible.

That was why she could stand tall even if the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord himself had come instead of the Taeeul Merciless Sword.

“Well? Did you bring the item I requested?”

“Of course.”

As she answered, Ju Hwaran took the wooden casket containing the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng from inside her robes. Straw rope was wound tightly around the entire casket, and a few small words had been written on its knot.

Shandong Seongsu Jang Family.

Hwangbo Eom checked the writing and nodded.

“No mistake. It bears the seal of the Seongsu Jang Family.”

People said that if Sichuan had the Tang Family, then Shandong had the Seongsu Jang Family.

That was how renowned the Seongsu Jang Family was for its medical arts. Unlike the Sichuan Tang Clan, a Murim great family, it was a prestigious medical family with its roots in medicine.

The Zhongnan Sect had purchased the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng through that very family and entrusted its transportation to the Yongbong Escort Bureau.

“The Pill Physician, the current Family Head of the Seongsu Jang Family, personally placed the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng inside and signed the casket.”

“Oh? The Pill Physician himself?”

“Yes. Several witnesses, myself included, watched the entire process.”

“You’re remarkably thorough for someone your age.”

Hwangbo Eom stroked his white beard with wrinkled fingers.

"This old man has heard that the Junzi Sword's[1643] daughter is a gifted young woman. Thank you for handling such a difficult assignment so reliably."

"Our Yongbong Escort Bureau does not tolerate even the slightest mistake on an escort mission."

"That must be why you're called the best in Shaanxi. Our sect operates an Escort Bureau as well, but it cannot compare with yours. Ha ha ha."

Ju Hwaran's heart pounded.

Was it because Hwangbo Eom had praised her?

No. It had nothing to do with his praise. Something else was constricting her chest, and she knew the name of that feeling.

Anxiety.

Something is wrong.

It was an intuition bordering on foresight. But before Ju Hwaran could even begin to trace its source, Hwangbo Eom spoke.

"Well, only the final procedure remains."

They would inspect the requested item, then each leave their signature to certify that the handover was complete.

After a simple procedure that would take less than the time needed to drink a cup of tea, the four-month escort mission that had cost them so dearly would finally come to an end.

That was how it was supposed to happen.

...But would it really?

A chill unlike anything she had ever felt crept up her spine.

Hwangbo Eom's voice pierced her frozen ears.

"What are you waiting for? Show me the item."

Ju Hwaran slowly raised her head.

His voice was kind and gentle, yet the old man's pitch-black eyes gleamed with a strange light.

She barely managed to force the words past her red lips.

"...Great Hero Hwangbo."

"Open the casket. With your own hands."

Ju Hwaran realized it then—the source of her anxiety, and that she had nowhere left to retreat.

In the end, only one choice remained.

Rustle.

[1643] Junzi is the Confucian ideal of a morally upright gentleman.

Her slender, trembling fingers began to untie the knot. The wooden casket she had kept close to her heart for the past four months suddenly felt alien, as though she were seeing it for the first time.

No. No, that can't be. I'm certain. There's no way…

And then—

Click.

At last, the wooden casket opened, revealing what lay inside. A pure fragrance, straight roots, and a frost-covered, snow-white body.

It was unmistakably snow ginseng. Yet everyone who saw it held their breath, their eyes widening.

Hwangbo Eom's gentle voice rang through the suffocating silence.

"How amusing."

He crooked one wrinkled finger, releasing a powerful stream of internal energy.

The snow ginseng floated into the air through Seizing an Object Through Empty Space as he continued.

"A Hundred-Year-Old Snow Ginseng… Is this old man seeing things because his strength has waned?"

It was obvious who the question was meant for.

Every gaze turned in the same direction. The horrified Chief Escort Heo Jun and Song Ilseom, who had been standing at a slant as though he weren't there, were no exception.

At the end of those dozens of gazes stood Ju Hwaran, her face pale and her eyes closed.

It's over.

The moment she saw the Hundred-Year-Old Snow Ginseng inside the casket, she had shut her eyes, unable to face the sight.

Something that could not and should not have happened had happened.

I saw it myself. I even kept it in my possession.

Where had everything gone wrong?

The past few months flashed through the darkness before her eyes like scenes from a dream.

She had staked the Yongbong Escort Bureau's very survival on this mission.

The Zhongnan Sect had offered an enormous sum for completing it. But if they failed, the Bureau would have to pay ten times that amount as a penalty.

And now that double-edged sword had plunged into the hearts of both Ju Hwaran and the Yongbong Escort Bureau.

"I won't ask how this happened. I have no interest in whatever extraordinary circumstances caused the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng to turn into a Hundred-Year-Old Snow Ginseng. However…"

Hwangbo Eom swept a look of feigned regret over Ju Hwaran and the other members of the Yongbong Escort Bureau.

"We will have to receive compensation for this matter."

"…!"

"Our sect has already paid the Seongsu Jang Family one hundred thousand silver nyang[1644] for the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng. And if the Yongbong Escort Bureau successfully completed the mission, we agreed to pay an escort fee of ten thousand silver nyang[1645]—one-tenth of the cargo's value."

The value of the lost Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng, plus the tenfold penalty the Yongbong Escort Bureau owed for failing to fulfill the contract.

Together, they amounted to the astronomical sum of two hundred thousand silver nyang[1646]. It was an amount they could cover only by selling off most of what the Yongbong Escort Bureau owned.

Blood ran from Ju Hwaran's lips as the realization struck her, and Chief Escort Heo Jun's face went black.

"G-Great Hero Hwangbo, that is…!"

"Two hundred thousand silver nyang[1647]. I will permit no compromise."

"A-Ah…"

The escorts who had accompanied Ju Hwaran groaned in despair.

Every one of them except Song Ilseom.

Though the Escort Bureau where he had worked for nearly ten years now faced a desperate crisis, he showed no reaction. Only the corner of his mouth twitched once.

Hwangbo Eom caught the movement out of the corner of his eye, then held out a full cup of tea to Ju Hwaran.

"Have a cup. When the mind is troubled, nothing is better than a warm cup of tea."

Ju Hwaran's long, tightly shut eyelashes trembled. Slowly, she opened her eyes and stared at Hwangbo Eom.

"Is this… Is this Zhongnan's way?"

"I'm afraid I don't know what you mean."

Hwangbo Eom laughed softly and raised his own teacup to his lips.

As expected, the tea was astringent. The young owner who had inherited the teahouse from his family was still inexperienced.

And yet, for some reason, the aroma and flavor lingering in Hwangbo Eom's mouth now were incomparable to what he had tasted a moment ago.

[1644] A nyang is a traditional unit of silver currency, not modern Korean won.
[1645] A nyang is a traditional unit of silver currency, not modern Korean won.
[1646] A nyang is a traditional unit of silver currency, not modern Korean won.
[1647] A nyang is a traditional unit of silver currency, not modern Korean won.

"Very good. I feel as though I've gone back thirty years."

"…!"

"What's wrong? Drink before it gets cold."

Ju Hwaran silently bit her lip.

She had been completely outmaneuvered. Even after taking every precaution, she had still fallen into the trap.

For the past two years, she had led the Escort Bureau in place of her father, the Junzi Sword,[1648] Ju Hogun. She had endured all kinds of mistakes and failures, both large and small, but never had she faced anything as hopeless as this.

Can I rise again like before?

She had stumbled before, but she had never stayed down. Yet two hundred thousand silver nyang[1649] was enough to crush the Yongbong Escort Bureau out of existence.

We can pay the penalty.

It was possible.

They would have to sell every field and parcel of land owned by the Yongbong Escort Bureau for a pittance, then send away the hundreds of caravan porters, escorts, and Escort Captains whose wages they could no longer afford.

And once that entire process was over, nothing would remain of the Yongbong Escort Bureau but an empty shell.

Is it really over? Just like this?

Hwangbo Eom watched Ju Hwaran with amusement.

He had long heard that the Young Bureau Head of the Yongbong Escort Bureau was quite capable.

But to him, she was still nothing more than a naive greenhorn.

Heh. How pitiful.

Just as Hwangbo Eom chuckled inwardly—

"Hmm?"

His gaze suddenly turned toward the door of the teahouse. Several people's qi was drawing closer.

This is…

The qi was so powerful that even Hwangbo Eom, a Supreme Peak master, could not easily ignore it.

A vast reserve of internal energy comparable to that of an Elder from the Nine Sects and One Gang steadily approached, then stopped directly outside the teahouse.

Could it be Huashan?

[1648] Junzi is the Confucian ideal of a morally upright gentleman.

[1649] A nyang is a traditional unit of silver currency, not modern Korean won.

Hwangbo Eom's prediction was proven spectacularly wrong the next moment.

Creaaak.

"Oh, I was just in the mood for some tea, and look at that! A teahouse, right when I needed one."

A broad-shouldered young man opened the door and strode in at the head of the group.

Hwangbo Eom's eyes darkened as he looked at Jin Taekyung.

Even at a glance, it was an unusual sight.

Dozens of swordsmen stood throughout the room, and the air hung heavy.

Ju Hwaran—or rather, the Yongbong Escort Bureau?

The question had barely crossed my mind when I spotted them.

On top of a table surrounded by people, slender fingers trembled faintly.

I had only met her once, but I could tell who she was just from her fingers. Funny how that worked.

Were her hands pretty?

As I scratched the back of my head, everyone's gaze flew toward me.

A middle-aged man who appeared to be the owner of the teahouse hurried over, bowing repeatedly.

"Sir, I'm sorry, but we're completely full right now…"

"There's a seat over there."

"That seat isn't in use."

"Then I'll drink standing up."

At that moment, a martial artist who appeared to be a Disciple of the Zhongnan Sect approached with measured steps.

"Are you a martial artist?"

"No, I'm fat."

The martial artist looked me up and down as if he were staring at a complete lunatic.

"I don't know who you are or where you come from, but an important person is here right now. You would do well to leave."

"I'm an important son in my own family too, so why should I? There's plenty of room anyway."

"…You're being troublesome. I am a Disciple of the Great Zhongnan Sect. You should understand by now, so leave."

"Why do you keep ordering me around? I just want to sit down and have some tea."

Cheongpung, who had been fidgeting behind me, shouted excitedly.

“Benefactor! Candied sweets too!”

“Candied sweets? Hey, Mujin. Does this teahouse sell those too?”

“Are you seriously saying that right now?”

The Zhongnan Sect disciple looked at us as if to say, What the hell is wrong with these guys? Then he spotted someone, and his face stiffened.

“H-Huashan’s Lone Crane, Baek Museong!”

Maybe it was because this was Huashan’s home ground, but quite a few people here recognized Baek Museong.

In any case, the Zhongnan Disciple’s involuntary shout had an immediate effect. Unlike when we first entered, everyone was looking at us now.

Two gazes stood out from the rest.

I waved at one of them.

“Oh, we meet again.”

“…Young Hero Jin?”

Ju Hwaran stared at me with her pale face and wide, round eyes.

Across from her sat an old man with a long white beard.

I gave Ju Hwaran a small smile, then gazed at the old man.

“Is there some problem between you and Young Lady Ju?”

The old man—the Taeeul Merciless Sword, Hwangbo Eom—stroked his beard and laughed.

“An interesting fellow has appeared.”

Chapter 320

The old man had the bearing of an immortal. I had heard he was nearly eighty, yet as befitted a Supreme Peak master with profound internal energy, his clear, refined face bore not a single age spot, and his back was perfectly straight.

And then there were his eyes.

Their dark gleam was enough to make anyone uncomfortable the moment they met his gaze. The old man—the Taeeul Merciless Sword, Hwangbo Eom—spoke.

“An interesting fellow has appeared.”

I met his stare and answered.

“I hear that pretty often.”

“You have plenty of nerve too.”

“That’s also true.”

The corners of Hwangbo Eom’s mouth rose.

“You must know who this old man is. Enough of your pointless wordplay.”

“Who are you?”

“What?”

“We’ve never met before. How am I supposed to know who you are or where you’re from? You have to introduce yourself. That’s basic etiquette.”

Startled gasps came from all around at my nonchalant reply.

“Y-Young Hero Jin.”

Ju Hwaran and the others from the Yongbong Escort Bureau gaped at me, while the Zhongnan Sect disciples, realizing what was happening, reached for their sword hilts as one.

“How dare you behave so insolently!”

“Show some respect at once!”

Hwangbo Eom raised a hand and calmed them.

Normally, this was the point when someone would start foaming at the mouth and check their blood pressure as it shot through the roof.

But Hwangbo Eom was clearly different.

“So that’s how it is.”

He studied me with a faint smile, then slowly turned his head.

His gaze passed over me, Cheongpung, and Hyuk Mujin before settling on the other two.

“You do not know this old man? The pillar of Huashan and the Successor Beggar of the Beggars’ Sect must have told you already. A joke carried too far becomes unpleasant.”

Baek Museong and Gung Gibang flinched, then stepped forward and offered clasped-hands salutes.

“I am Baek Museong, a humble junior of the Murim. I pay my respects to Great Hero Hwangbo.”

“I-I am Gung Gibang of the Beggars’ Sect…”

“Enough.”

Hwangbo Eom waved them off, his robe sleeve fluttering, and turned his gaze back to me.

“I believe I have indulged a child’s tantrum long enough. Is that still not enough for you?”

He really was no ordinary old man.

He was a completely different breed from his Senior Brother, the Roaring Fury Swordsman.

Both his martial arts and his temperament were a cut above.

He’s a tricky one.

Still, this was more or less what I had expected.

Without letting my thoughts show, I shrugged calmly.

“No, that’s enough. Great Hero Hwangbo Eom, the Taeeul Merciless Sword.”

“You’re certainly bold. Why not claim you failed to recognize me?”

“Because it looks better to admit it cleanly.”

“Hahaha! What an insolent brat.”

Hwangbo Eom burst into hearty laughter. He sounded both intrigued by me and utterly dumbfounded.

The Zhongnan Sect disciples under his command, however, seemed to find the situation not merely absurd but insulting.

It would have been one thing if I genuinely had not known who he was.

But I had known and only pretended otherwise.

Hwangbo Eom’s standing within the Zhongnan Sect must have been too high for them to simply laugh it off.

“You bastard!”

Was it called the Taeeul Sword Unit?

It started when a middle-aged man who appeared to be the eldest of the Zhongnan Sect disciples shouted and drew his sword.

Clang-clang-clang!

Thirty well-maintained swords pointed toward me. As disciples of the Zhongnan Sect, one of the Nine Sects and One Gang, every one of them was at least a First Rate master.

Of course…

They’re hopelessly weak.

At this level, they posed no threat to me whatsoever.

First Rate? Peak? It made no difference.

In my eyes, they were nothing more than thirty men with swords.

I am strong.

Might Makes Right.

One of the absolute laws governing the Murim.

Before I knew it, I had become strong enough to remain at ease under that law. That was why I could stride forward without hesitation.

"Since fate brought us together, would you mind if I joined you?"

I addressed Hwangbo Eom, ignoring the thirty blades surrounding me. The middle-aged swordsman leading them flushed red.

"H-How dare you, you insolent bastard!"

"Bangjajeon[1650] is so damn good."

"Taeeul Sword Unit, hear my command! Seize this bastard—"

That was when Hwangbo Eom, who had been silently watching me, finally spoke.

"Join us… Very well."

"…!"

Everyone stared at him in surprise.

"S-Senior Martial Uncle?"

"Put away your swords."

"B-But that bastard—"

"Do you intend to defy this old man's command?"

At his icy voice, the middle-aged swordsman bit his lip and lowered his sword.

As the weapons that had brightly illuminated the inside of the teahouse disappeared, nothing remained to block my way.

"Thank you. All that glare was getting hard on the eyes."

Scrape. Thump.

I passed the people standing rigid with shock and dropped into the seat beside Ju Hwaran. Seeing how pale she was, I gave her a slight smile.

"Long time no—well, not really. It's been two days. How have you been?"

"Young Hero Jin…"

"You don't have to answer. I was only being polite. Honestly, Young Lady Ju, judging by your expression, you don't look like you've been doing very well."

"That's not what I meant. How did you even—?"

"I happened to be passing by and stopped in by chance. Cheongpung here insisted on having a cup of tea. Of course, that was also a coincidence."

[1650] Bangjajeon (The Servant) is a Korean film title that echoes the word just used for "insolent."

Unlike Baek Museong, Gung Gibang, and Hyuk Mujin, Cheongpung—whose duodenum was apparently made entirely of liver[1651]—sat down beside me without hesitation and pouted.

“Benefactor, when are the candied sweets coming?”

“Wait just a little longer. I’ll pile them into a whole mountain for you.”

“Wow! A mountain of sweets!”

Cheongpung looked ecstatic, as though a mountain of candied sweets had appeared right before his eyes.

Ju Hwaran, on the other hand, looked as though a mountain had collapsed on top of her.

Of course, most of that was probably because of Hwangbo Eom sitting across from her.

He looked back and forth between Cheongpung and me with an odd gleam in his eyes, then spoke.

“You have quite the nerve. Almost recklessly so.”

“It used to be small. But after going through one thing and another, it suddenly grew a lot.”

“This and that, you say. I suppose the Shaolin Bloodshed would do that.”

“…!”

“Why so surprised?”

Hwangbo Eom curled his lips into a smile and continued.

“I have heard all about the rumor that the Fire King took a Hidden Dragon under his wing. I also heard that you left the Murim Alliance seven days and nights ago.”

What a slippery old man.

He had known from the start.

Unlike Ju Hwaran, who had merely guessed our identities two days ago, he already knew everything.

How?

This operation had been carried out quickly and in secret, yet he knew everything as if he could see the palm of his hand.

Did the Zhongnan Sect Leader, who should still be at the Murim Alliance, send a messenger pigeon?

Then could he also know about Old Master’s condition…?

Just as the thought crossed my mind, Hwangbo Eom’s gaze flicked toward the pack frame I had entrusted to Baek Museong before sitting down.

Then he casually tossed out a remark.

[1651] In Korean, the liver is associated with courage; having a large liver means being bold. The image exaggerates Cheongpung’s fearlessness.

“Though I never expected the Fire King’s heir to be dressed like a leather merchant.”

Was he pretending not to know, or did he genuinely have no idea?

His expression gave nothing away.

Jeok Cheongang was currently in a state resembling suspended animation. His heartbeat, breathing, and every other bodily function had slowed to the extreme, making his presence extraordinarily difficult to detect.

It was similar to the Turtle Breath Technique Cheongpung had mentioned before.

And with all those hides piled over him, even a Supreme Peak master would have trouble noticing him.

Keeping him warm was not the only reason we had covered him with so many hides.

They concealed his appearance, muffled every sound, and hid his presence so no one would discover he was there.

“…”

“What is it?”

“Nothing. Anyway, I’m thirsty.”

I hurriedly redirected Hwangbo Eom’s attention. Without another word, he picked up the teapot and held a cup out to me.

“Take it.”

“Don’t mind if I do.”

Pour.

Hwangbo Eom was no pushover.

I felt the profound internal energy carried through the stream of tea and clicked my tongue inwardly.

So this is Zhongnan’s greatest master.

The tea fell in a slow, graceful arc, yet the force within it was heavy and powerful enough to shatter a boulder.

Still, it’s not as strong as Old Master’s.

Jeok Cheongang had a mischievous streak and had played all sorts of tricks on me. What Hwangbo Eom was doing now was no different.

I had broken more than one or two cups this way.

Besides, Jeok Cheongang stood foremost among the Ten Kings, an absolute master sometimes compared even to the Three Saints.

This much is nothing.

When I did not so much as blink, Hwangbo Eom’s eyebrow twitched. At the same time, the internal energy carried by the tea grew even stronger.

“Great Hero Hwangbo.”

“Hm?”

"The tea's about to overflow."

"…"

"You can stop pouring now."

Just as I had said, the cup was already full. I lifted the perfectly smooth cup, not a single hairline crack on its surface, and emptied it in one gulp.

"Ahh. That hit the spot."

"You seem fond of tea."

"Not really. Anyway, allow me to pour you a cup this time."

I reached out, and the teapot glided through the air into my hand.

It was the art martial artists called Seizing an Object Through Empty Space.

I possessed nearly two jiazi's[1652] worth of internal energy and insight that had reached the brink of the Peak realm. I did not use the technique often because it consumed so much internal energy, but I could perform it whenever I wished.

I need to put on at least this much of a show.

Old Master had once said in passing:

"There are idiots everywhere in the Murim. You have to show those bastards something flashy before they'll listen. Look at this old man. All I did was beat the Demonic Cult bastards because they pissed me off, and they still call me a king."

King Cheongang indeed. Spoken like a man who had turned the Murim upside down by racking up a thousand kills all by himself.

Seizing an Object Through Empty Space isn't quite on that level, but it's still an impressive technique.

Sure enough, the onlookers' eyes widened.

"He used Seizing an Object Through Empty Space so easily…"

"Good heavens."

Few people could use Seizing an Object Through Empty Space as casually as I had. Especially at my age.

But I did not stop there. I drew up my internal energy.

I circulated the Fire Gate Divine Technique to seven-tenths, and Extreme Yang energy seeped into both my hands.

Fwoosh!

Heat burst forth, and the tea inside the pot began to boil violently. I calmly filled Hwangbo Eom's cup and said,

"The tea had gone a little cold. Since you're going to drink it anyway, wouldn't it be better warm? The weather has been cold lately, and the older you get, the more careful you have to be."

"…!"

[1652] A jiazi is a sixty-year cycle in the traditional East Asian calendar. Nearly two jiazi's worth of internal energy means nearly 120 years' worth.

Hwangbo Eom’s face stiffened.

Heating tea with internal energy would not have been particularly difficult for him either. There was a technique called Samadhi True Fire, after all.

But the Fire Gate Divine Technique was renowned as the greatest divine technique under heaven when it came to controlling Scorching Yang Qi.

No matter how powerful a Supreme Peak master Hwangbo Eom was, he could not match the Fire Gate Divine Technique.

And… No. It was too soon to jump to that conclusion.

I cut off the thought before it could go any further and offered him the cup.

“Please, drink.”

“Ahem.”

“Here comes the tea! Chug, chug, chug-chug!”

“…I shall drink it properly.”

“Look at my internal organs! I’ve suffered internal injuries!”

“…”

Hwangbo Eom glared at me, then drained the cup.

When he set it down, his gaze had changed considerably from when he had regarded me as a mere youngster.

“Your martial arts are quite impressive.”

I smiled and waved a hand.

“Oh, no. Not at all.”

“Do you intend to deceive this old man’s eyes?”

“No. I meant my martial arts aren’t merely ‘quite impressive.‘ They’re extremely impressive.”

“Your arrogance knows no—”

“Oh, and for the record, my Master said that. The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang. You know him, right?”

Now I was the only one smiling.

Not a trace of amusement remained on Hwangbo Eom’s face.

After a brief silence, he abruptly asked,

“What are you plotting?”

“Pardon?”

“Your insolence reaches the heavens. I have heard enough nonsense about this being a coincidence. Tell me the truth.”

“You’re refreshingly direct. In that case, sure.”

A faint smile touched my lips as I continued.

“I was just passing by when I happened to wonder what kind of dirty trick the Zhongnan Sect was trying to pull, so I came to take a look.”

At those words, the eyes of Hwangbo Eom, the Taeeul Merciless Sword, turned cold.

Chapter 321

“What… did you just say?”

Hwangbo Eom’s voice was stretched so taut it seemed ready to snap.

The snow-white beard that had made him look like an immortal bristled, and his eyes hardened as he stared at me.

I answered with a mild smile.

“Didn’t I just tell you? I came to see what kind of dirty trick you were pulling. By. Chance.”

At that moment, blue sparks flew from Hwangbo Eom’s eyes.

“Hah!”

With his thunderous roar, an immense wave of qi erupted from him.

The aura of a Supreme Peak master made the table—or rather, the ground itself—pitch like a ship caught in a storm.

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

The violent tremors threw the entire teahouse into chaos. Dozens of pieces of teaware shattered with a deafening crash, spraying tea in every direction.

The proprietor, who had been nervously watching from a corner, let out a shriek and collapsed to the floor.

I instantly raised my sleeve to shield Ju Hwaran’s face from the flying tea, then clicked my tongue.

“Someone your age shouldn’t be causing a scene in another person’s shop. Not with other people around.”

“How dare you…”

The pressure radiating from Hwangbo Eom intensified.

This was the aura of none other than The First Sword of Zhongnan. Even the swordsmen of the Taeeul Sword Unit arrayed around him like guards flinched as though burned and stumbled backward. The members of the Yongbong Escort Bureau, Ju Hwaran included, went deathly pale.

“Hngh!”

“Gasp!”

No matter how talented a young prodigy might be, the gulf between them and Hwangbo Eom was as vast as the distance between heaven and earth.

Baek Museong, known as a pillar of Huashan, and Gung Gibang, Successor Beggar of the Beggars’ Sect and its hundred thousand members, fared little better than Ju Hwaran.

Even counting everyone present, only about three people still looked unaffected.

One was me, of course.

“Benefactor, when are the candied sweets coming out?”

Another was Cheongpung, who cared only about his candied sweets, to hell with the Taeeul Merciless Sword or anything else.

And the last was…

"Hmm."

Song Ilseom, the fierce-eyed escort.

He gave a quiet grunt under the weight of Hwangbo Eom's aura. When our eyes met, he frowned and turned away.

I don't like you either, asshole.

From the moment I first saw him, Song Ilseom had stunk of something suspicious in more ways than one.

It would not take long to find out whether that impression of mine was mistaken or based on fact.

"Maybe it's because no one opened a window, but the air feels awfully stuffy."

I spoke calmly and drew up my internal energy. The hundred years of internal energy coiled within my dantian spread between the tables like an invisible curtain.

Freed from the crushing pressure, Ju Hwaran finally released the breath she had been holding.

"Young Lady Ju, are you all right?"

"Yes, yes."

Still gasping, Ju Hwaran clutched my sleeve.

"Thank you, Young Hero Jin. But this…"

"Enough."

A single word from Hwangbo Eom cut her off.

The immortal had transformed into a Fiend. He glared at me, his gaze brimming with killing intent.

"The arrogance of a young whelp like you pierces the heavens."

"I'm pretty good at piercing things. I use a spear."

"Do you even understand what you're doing?"

"Of course."

I leaned lazily against the hard back of my chair and continued.

"I'm rescuing innocent people who fell into a trap someone laid for them. Purely because I happened to be passing by, of course."

"A trap. I presume that 'someone' refers to our sect."

"Well, you're free to think whatever you like."

The fury in Hwangbo Eom's eyes subsided. In its place, an unmistakable sneer spread across his lips.

"You seem unaware that a man must answer for his words."

"Judging by the fact that I came here, I'd say I'm well aware of that."

"Boy, you have insulted the Great Zhongnan Sect with baseless accusations you cannot prove. Do you wish to make us your enemy?"

"It's funny to hear orthodox Murim companions talk about friend and foe. Are you perhaps from an unorthodox faction?"

"You insolent whelp!"

"I already heard what happened between the Yongbong Escort Bureau and your sect. That's why I came."

I picked up the snow ginseng rolling across the table.

The thing in my hand was certainly an excellent elixir. Yet the name displayed through Item Appraisal had not changed.

Hundred-Year-Old Snow Ginseng.

I already knew that the item Zhongnan Sect had commissioned the Yongbong Escort Bureau to transport was Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng.

It was a peerless elixir said to grant a full jiazi[1653] of internal energy instantly upon consumption.

Murim practitioners would risk their lives to possess such a rare treasure, and its value was whatever price the seller cared to name.

According to the information Gung Gibang had gathered, the Yongbong Escort Bureau had staked its survival on this escort mission.

Unless Ju Hwaran was a complete fool, there was no way she would have thrown such precious cargo into a wagon and left it unattended.

Then where had the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng gone? And why had it been replaced with Hundred-Year-Old Snow Ginseng, an elixir far inferior to it?

It was obvious.

It could only mean that either the Zhongnan Sect or Hwangbo Eom personally had meddled with it.

On top of that, the Zhongnan Sect had been deeply involved in the Yongbong Escort Bureau's decline for the past two years.

The Xi'an branch of the Beggars' Sect, whose information network was said to rival the Lower District Sect's for the finest under heaven, had already pieced together most of what had happened.

This was supposed to be the finishing blow.

The Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng was the final strike meant to bring down the cornered Yongbong Escort Bureau.

They had dangled bait too tempting to resist, then dug an inescapable trap beneath it. The result was unfolding before my eyes.

But…

[1653] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; here, it denotes sixty years' worth of internal energy.

“You know, living in this world has taught me something. Even when everything looks finished, something unexpected can suddenly pop up and throw the whole thing into disarray.”

Hwangbo Eom regarded my muttering with contempt.

“A brat who still reeks of his mother’s milk does nothing but wag his tongue. Has becoming the Fire King’s Disciple blinded you to your place, you country bumpkin from Shanxi?”

“I’m still young, so there’s no need to worry about my eyesight. You’re the one who should be concerned about failing vision, Great Hero Hwangbo.”

“How should I tear apart that wicked mouth of yours?”

“I don’t know whether my mouth is wicked, but I do know Zhongnan’s specialty. You can’t utter a word when someone stronger than you shows up. Was it a year ago? Your Senior Brother gave me an advance lesson.”

I still remembered it clearly.

The Roaring Fury Swordsman had invoked Zhongnan’s name to pressure the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

I even remembered the sight of him being driven away without managing a single proper word after the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, appeared.

I pressed my lips together and looked at Hyuk Sopyung, who sat beside Hwangbo Eom.

“And yesterday, I had a review session.”

Hwangbo Eom was a perceptive old man.

Realizing what had happened, he clicked his tongue and muttered, “…Our sect is crawling with worms.”

“Still, aren’t harmful pests better than venomous insects? From my point of view, getting drunk and causing a scene is much more exemplary than ruining a perfectly good escort bureau.”

“You dare call this old man venomous? Hah. Hahaha!”

Contrary to my expectations, I could no longer sense the slightest agitation from Hwangbo Eom.

He looked down on everyone present, myself included, like a hawk high above that was ready to swoop down and seize its prey.

“Boy, do you understand what it means to make an enemy of the Great Zhongnan Sect—and of this old man?”

His wrinkled hand pressed against the table. The spilled tea slowly rose, took the form of an arrow, and pointed straight between my brows.

“If this old man so much as wishes it, today will be the day of your funeral.”

That’s what you think.

I opened my mouth.

"Well, from either your perspective or mine, that doesn't sound like a particularly good choice."

"That is why you remain alive. This old man will personally punish you for today's offense in due time. If you do not wish to die like a dog, withdraw. This is a matter between our sect and the Yongbong Escort Bureau."

Just as I was about to respond, a hand tugged at my sleeve.

At the same time, a trembling woman's voice, carried on internal energy, pierced my ears.

—Young Hero Jin…

Two days ago, Ju Hwaran's eyes had been clear and spotless. Now they swirled with conflicting emotions.

Fear and anger at what was happening. Relief at my arrival, and worry for my safety.

I knew exactly what she was thinking and what she wanted to say.

—I'm grateful that you're thinking of us, but he's right. This is an affair between the Yongbong Escort Bureau and the Zhongnan Sect. If you get involved any further, you'll put yourself in danger as well.

Looking into Ju Hwaran's eyes suddenly brought back a memory from a year ago.

The Roaring Fury Swordsman had threatened to seal the gates of the Jin Family of Taiyuan for an absurd reason. What would have happened that day if Jeok Cheongang had not appeared?

Orthodox faction? What a load of fucking bullshit.

The righteousness of the powerful was not the same as the righteousness of the weak.

I did not believe everyone in the orthodox Murim was evil. At the same time, I did not believe they were all good.

Even Shaolin Temple surely had people with wicked hearts, and I believed there were good people even within the Demonic Cult, that supposed den of fiends and monsters.

Orthodox, unorthodox, demonic. Good and evil existed in all three.

It isn't about the sect. It's about the person.

In the end, the individual was what mattered. And the old man before me was one of the biggest fucking bastards under heaven.

I took a deep breath, then spoke to Ju Hwaran aloud rather than using Sound Transmission.

"Young Lady Ju."

"Y-Young Hero Jin?"

"You're right. This is an affair between the Zhongnan Sect and the Yongbong Escort Bureau. If I stick my nose into it, all I'll get is a loss. No matter how powerful the Jin Family of Taiyuan is, we're still nowhere near enough to stand before the name of the Zhongnan Sect."

Ju Hwaran's eyelids fluttered with surprise, then lowered.

I could feel her sinking into resignation.

But I was not finished.

"I kept thinking the same thing on the way here. Wondering whether this was really the right choice, or whether I should pretend I knew nothing and keep walking."

"Young Hero Jin, you can stop. Please, that's enough."

"No."

I shook my head.

"At first, I thought I was doing this because your face kept coming to mind. But…"

I turned and found Hwangbo Eom watching me with an amused smile.

The Zhongnan Sect was one of the Nine Sects and One Gang, and Hwangbo Eom was its elder and most powerful martial artist.

His martial arts were higher and his personality more meticulous, but Hwangbo Eom was still the same kind of person as the Roaring Fury Swordsman.

I stared straight at this second Roaring Fury Swordsman and opened my mouth.

"It felt like fucking bullshit."

"…!"

"…!"

Even without seeing it, I could feel the energy in the room stirring.

I continued with a sigh.

"'Upright.' That's why you're called the orthodox faction. But there's nothing upright about this, is there? If you're going to act like this, use the jeong from Choco Pie instead. Why the fuck would you use the jeong that means 'upright'?"[1654]

Never once in my life had I thought of myself as a good person.

I had become a Hunter for money, and in the Murim, I had even considered abandoning someone to save my own life.

I was a murky gray. Nothing more, nothing less.

Yet now, a thought suddenly occurred to me.

"Maybe I was pretty white after all. Why else would I go this far?"

"You insolent little—!"

"Great Hero Hwangbo."

I smiled at Hwangbo Eom as he prepared to roar.

[1654] This is a pun on jeong, the Korean word associated with affection in Choco Pie's famous slogan, contrasted with the jeong in "orthodox," which means upright or righteous.

“I told you earlier, didn’t I? Even when everything seems over, something unexpected can suddenly pop up and throw it all into disarray.”

I slowly reached out and tapped the empty air.

No one else could see it, but I could.

Hwangbo Eom’s dominoes were tumbling one after another.

“I’m not even your grandson, Great Hero Hwangbo. Why else would I spend this long talking to an eighty-year-old grandfather?”

For an instant, Hwangbo Eom looked dumbfounded. Then his face twisted violently.

He had sensed it too—the presences of several people rapidly approaching the teahouse.

“You bastard. What the hell are you plotting?”

“You’re the one who pulled a trick. I…”

I turned my head and finished.

“I made a plan.”

That was the moment the teahouse’s doors opened and about a dozen people came streaming inside.

First came five beggars carrying a mountain of bamboo slips[1655] in their arms. They were the Xi’an Branch Leader of the Beggars’ Sect and his subordinates.

At the head of the other group stood a woman I knew well.

“Congratulations on your promotion. It’s been a while.”

“Oh, my Young Master. A congratulatory greeting after an entire year? How prompt of you.”

Wolhwa, Branch Leader of the Lower District Sect’s Shaanxi branch, playfully arched one pretty eyebrow.

[1655] Bamboo slips are strips of bamboo used as a writing surface, often bound together to form documents.

Chapter 322

Wolhwa seemed even more beautiful than she had been a year ago.

Dressed in dazzling clothes and wearing an alluring smile, she approached with the grace of a peacock and placed a hand on my shoulder.

“Our Young Master Jin. You’ve gotten even more dashing since I last saw you.”

At least this part of her hadn’t changed.

I let out a quiet laugh and pushed her hand away.

“You haven’t changed a bit.”

“I’m hurt. After a whole year, is that all you have to say?”

“Hmm. I suppose you’ve gotten a little prettier, too.”

“It feels like I had to fish for that compliment myself, but… fine. You pass. Dropping everything and rushing over here was worth it after all.”

As Wolhwa flashed me one of her signature eye-smiles, a young beggar in shabby clothes approached from beside her with a sour expression.

The cord at his waist, marking him as a disciple of the Beggars’ Sect, was tied into three knots.

In other words, he was a three-knot Disciple.

“I’m the Heukgeol Beggar, head of the Beggars’ Sect’s Xi’an branch.”

“Yes, I’m from the Jin Family of Taiyuan—”

“I already know. You’re as strapping as I’d heard. With a face like that, you could easily earn dozens of silver nyang[1656] a day begging. Have you ever considered joining the Beggars’ Sect?”

“…”

“Well, forget it if you’re not interested. In any case, it seems someone who should be here is missing.”

Huff, huff.

Heukgeol Beggar blew hard through his nose as he looked around. The moment he spotted his target, he shouted.

“Gung Gibang! You son of a bitch!”

When did that bastard get over there?

Gung Gibang was already crouched beneath a table some distance away. He gave us an awkward smile.

“Oh, look. My old friend of twenty years, Big Nose, is here. What brings you here?”

“I told you not to call me Big Nose! And what brings me here? You miserable bastard! I warned you over and over to make sure this didn’t happen, but you went and did it anyway…!”

[1656] A nyang was a historical Korean unit of currency. “Silver nyang” specifies its silver denomination.

Heukgeol Beggar furiously shook the wooden slip in his hand.

Beneath the message telling him to gather the necessary information and come to Tengwang Pavilion, eight yellow hairs had been attached. They had apparently been plucked from some stray dog passing through the neighborhood.

Anyone else would have wondered what the hairs were supposed to mean, but according to Gung Gibang, they were the mark of an eight-knot disciple of the Beggars' Sect.

In other words, the mark of the Successor Beggar.

"Ahem. I told you, I couldn't help it."

"Damn it. If the Law Beggar comes looking for you over this, remember that it's all your fault."

"Now, now. You have a lot to say for a mere three-knot Disciple. You should be attending to the Successor Beggar instead."

"You're no Successor Beggar. You're a successor mutt."

Despite his words, Heukgeol Beggar reached out and pulled away a chair so Gung Gibang could climb out more easily.

Judging from their conversation, the two had been close friends since their days as young beggars.

Even better. This should go smoothly.

For someone else, however, it would be very bad news.

I turned my head and found Hwangbo Eom's face twisted with displeasure. The corners of my mouth rose of their own accord.

"If this is your first time meeting, you should at least exchange greetings. Both of them do very important work here in Shaanxi Province."

The Zhongnan Sect could not compare to Huashan, but its position in Shaanxi Province was by no means insignificant.

There was no way Hwangbo Eom did not know the branch leaders of the Beggars' Sect and the Lower District Sect. I had only added that last part to sour his mood.

"You…"

Just as I had expected, Hwangbo Eom already knew who they were. He bit his lip. His fingers twitched as though he wanted nothing more than to draw the sword propped beside the table and start swinging.

Go ahead. Draw it.

But Hwangbo Eom was not nearly as easy to provoke as the Roaring Fury Swordsman.

The sly old man's eyes slowly turned cold.

"What the hell are you doing?"

The answer came from behind me.

“I know, right? My heart is already pounding with anticipation over what our Young Master Jin might do next.”

Hwangbo Eom glared sharply at Wolhwa, who had spoken without warning.

“This is not a matter for the Lower District Sect. I do not know why you came here, but… it would be best for you to withdraw now.”

“Great Hero Hwangbo, I’m sorry, but I don’t think I can do that.”

Wolhwa continued with a radiant smile.

“I’ve already accepted a commission. Of course, the client is Young Master Jin, standing right here. Isn’t that right?”

“Oh, absolutely. Did you receive the silver nyang[1657] retainer I sent through the attendant?”

“Of course I did. But one silver nyang[1658] is terribly stingy. I’ll collect a generous fee from you later, so be prepared.”

I had no idea how much she intended to fleece me for, but that was a problem for later.

Hwangbo Eom silently glared at Wolhwa and me as we chatted amiably. His next target was Heukgeol Beggar.

“And what does the Beggars’ Sect intend to do?”

“Great Hero Hwangbo, this is quite a predicament.”

Heukgeol Beggar scratched his lice-ridden head and bowed deeply.

“I’m sorry, but it’s not a matter I can do anything about.”

“Is that the will of the Beggars’ Sect?”

Heukgeol Beggar bent at the waist in alarm.

“What? Oh, heavens, no. How could a mere three-knot Disciple like me presume to speak for the Beggars’ Sect?”

“Then withdraw, unless you wish to make an enemy of our sect.”

“Well, the thing is, we have sect rules on our side, too. That might be difficult.”

“You call that an excuse?”

“It isn’t an excuse. It’s the truth. Isn’t that right? No, wouldn’t you say so, Successor Beggar?”

Gung Gibang avoided Hwangbo Eom’s gaze and nodded.

“Well, yes.”

“This old man went easy on you because you were a young prodigy of the Beggars’ Sect, but you’ve gone too far…”

Hwangbo Eom looked back and forth between the two, then shouted like a thunderclap.

“Enough excuses! Beggars’ Sect, will you get the hell out of here already?”

[1657] A nyang was a historical Korean unit of currency. “Silver nyang” specifies its silver denomination.

[1658] A nyang was a historical Korean unit of currency. “Silver nyang” specifies its silver denomination.

Boom!

With a furious roar, Hwangbo Eom slammed his palm into the center of the table.

A low rumble rolled through the room. Unable to withstand his profound internal energy, the table was punched clean through, leaving a hole shaped like his palm.

And then…

“Well now.”

“This is something.”

At that moment, the atmosphere around the bowing Gung Gibang and Heukgeol Beggar changed.

The two men looked at each other’s grime-covered faces and let out quiet laughs.

“Hey, Gibang. I guess we really are beggars. Even here, people treat us like beggars.”

“Tell me about it. I’m in a lousy mood today, too. Should we just call every beggar in Shaanxi Province?”

“As the branch leader, that’s my job. If we gathered only the ones in Xi’an, we’d still have about a thousand.”

“That’s not your call, three-knot. I’m an eight-knot—the one and only eight-knot disciple in the Beggars’ Sect! If the Successor Beggar calls, they’ll come running even from the neighboring province.”

“Shaanxi will become a den of beggars. At that point, wouldn’t it be looting rather than begging?”

“Now, now, what do you mean, looting? I hear there’s a great deal of food on Mount Zhongnan… While we’re at it, let’s wipe out every edible thing there.”

It wasn’t Alibaba and the Forty Thieves.[1659]

It was Gung Gibang and ten thousand beggars.

I already knew that the Beggars’ Sect was a great sect with a hundred thousand disciples, but hearing them talk about it made me want to piss myself.

At the very least, they’d be a swarm of locusts.

If ten thousand beggars swept over Mount Zhongnan, it would become a desert within a month. The complete annihilation of the mountain wildlife would be a given, and they would strip away every edible blade of grass and shred of bark.

“Y-you bastards, what kind of nonsense are you spouting…?”

Hwangbo Eom’s wrinkled hand trembled.

“Do you think this old man would stand by and watch such a thing happen? I will personally demand that the Gang Leader punish both of you!”

“Do as you wish. My Master will beat me within an inch of my life, but surely he won’t kill his only Disciple. However…”

[1659] Alibaba and the Forty Thieves is a tale in the One Thousand and One Nights tradition featuring a band of forty robbers.

Gung Gibang was no longer the man who had been inching backward, trying to escape. His voice had settled low, deeper than a swamp.

"As the Successor Beggar of the Beggars' Sect, I have issued an order to the Xi'an branch. And only two people under heaven can rescind an order from the Successor Beggar: the Dragon-Head Gang Leader, who commands our hundred thousand disciples, and the Law Beggar, who enforces the sect rules."

"…!"

"My Master, the Dragon-Head Gang Leader, has told me again and again: we may not have homes, but does that mean we have no pride? Great Hero Hwangbo, you have insulted a beggar's pride."

A veteran beggar, all right.

It wasn't easy to look that cool and that pathetic at the same time, but he pulled it off effortlessly.

Maybe he really is good at begging.

With a voice brimming with tragic grandeur and words that made him sound utterly pitiable, Gung Gibang dominated the room before turning to Heukgeol Beggar.

"You brought everything I listed in the letter, right?"

"How could I fail to, when it was the Successor Beggar's order?"

At Heukgeol Beggar's gesture, the Beggars' Sect disciples from the Xi'an branch who had been waiting behind him began neatly stacking the bamboo slips they had brought.

There were a full hundred of them.

But that was not all.

"What are you all waiting for? It's time to get to work."

At the sound of Wolhwa's alluring voice, the Lower District Sect members who had been standing quietly nearby placed bundles of paper beside the bamboo slips.

There were nearly as many bundles as there were bamboo slips.

The sight before him made Hwangbo Eom's face go rigid.

"Wh-what is all this?"

I gazed fondly at the bamboo slips and sheets of paper.

"Nothing comes to mind? For example… the Yongbong Escort Bureau's unending run of bad luck over the past two years."

"…!"

"Let's swim upstream like salmon and retrace the past. And while we're at it, let's find out how the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng that had been on its way here without a problem managed to vanish without a trace."

The energies of two people thrashed with the vigor of salmon fighting upstream.

One was Hwangbo Eom, overwhelmed by confusion.

The other was Ju Hwaran.

Her luminous eyes, frozen cold without a trace of anger or excitement, turned toward Hwangbo Eom.

“So that’s what happened after all.”

“Did you know?”

“How could I not? I suspected it all along, but I had no choice but to let it happen.”

“Because we were up against one of the Nine Sects and One Gang.”

Her voice drifted weakly into the empty air.

For the past two years, the Zhongnan Sect had manipulated the Yongbong Escort Bureau’s failures from the shadows. Someone who did not know the circumstances might say that she had brought down the Escort Bureau in a mere two years, but that would be wrong.

The Yongbong Escort Bureau had already been a listing ship, and Ju Hwaran had become its captain before she was even twenty.

It was thanks to her ability that the bureau had held firm until now, despite the threat of the enormous monster known as the Zhongnan Sect.

But now… everything would be different.

“You’ve been through a lot.”

At my brief words, Ju Hwaran bit her lip tightly.

And what she chose was not tears, but a smile.

“Thank you, Young Hero Jin. But I’ll hear that after this escort mission is over.”

She was right.

Just as Ju Hwaran had said, the Yongbong Escort Bureau’s escort mission was not over yet.

I gave Heukgeol Beggar and Wolhwa a small nod.

“Let’s begin.”

Hwangbo Eom suddenly wondered.

What is happening?

Everything had been proceeding smoothly. He had taken each step carefully over the past two years, and all that remained was to bring it to a close.

There had been a time when he thought so.

He truly had.

“Last summer, the Yongbong Escort Bureau suffered a loss of one thousand silver nyang[1660] when its deal with the Geumo Merchant Guild fell through. A man named Hwang Cheolsim secretly intervened in the process. According to what our sect uncovered, he was a lay disciple of Zhongnan, and…”

[1660] A nyang was a historical Korean unit of currency. “Silver nyang” specifies its silver denomination.

The voices reaching Hwangbo Eom’s ears felt distant and unfamiliar.

Most of the information uncovered by the Lower District Sect and the Beggars’ Sect was true.

By cross-checking their findings, they had confirmed the facts more thoroughly and uncovered new incidents. One lead grew into the next without end, like the stem of a plant.

This is impossible.

Hwangbo Eom stood frozen like a statue, repeating the same thought over and over.

Then one person entered his field of vision.

The corners of his mouth were raised. His clear eyes seemed capable of seeing straight through the human heart.

Jin Taekyung was laughing at him.

It’s all that bastard’s fault. If only he hadn’t been there, if only…!

People said that Taeeul Merciless Sword Hwangbo Eom was different from his two martial brothers.

But they were wrong.

At this very moment, Hwangbo Eom’s mind was being bleached white by rage.

The cold, poisonous heart that had occupied that space was gone. In its place was something even worse—a murderous intent that filled him to the brim.

“You bastard—!”

Shiiing!

Seizing an Object Through Empty Space.

The scabbard flew into Hwangbo Eom’s grasp, and a silver line burst from it.

Chapter 323

It all happened in an instant.

The qi permeating the air surged, and the sword propped against the table flew into one man's waiting hand.

And then…

Shuaaaak!

A dazzling streak of light filled my vision. The strike was impossibly fast and precise.

The blue qi crystallized around the blade and scattered a brilliant radiance. I already knew another name for that light.

Sword Force.

A power granted only to those who had stepped into the Supreme Peak realm. Stronger than anything else in the world, it was falling straight toward the crown of my head.

At this rate, I'll die. No question about it.

But…

This isn't nearly enough.

In a world slowed to a crawl, I moved—and the Sword Force split the air.

Shlick! Kraaash!

Everything was cleaved apart. The table, the chairs, even the floor of the teahouse that must have stood there for countless years.

The gale unleashed by the Sword Force swept through the room. Screams and thunderous crashes swallowed everything. Beyond them, I saw the old man's eyes stretched wide.

"H-how did you…"

I gently pushed Ju Hwaran, whom I had pulled into my arms, to the side and answered.

"How did I dodge it? I saw it coming, so I dodged."

"…"

"People say the Supreme Peak realm—and Sword Force—belong to a realm beyond humanity."

Unconcealed shock spread across Hwangbo Eom's wrinkled face.

"Th-then could it be that you…!"

"Who knows?"

I answered with a faint smile. By now, thunder must have been crashing through Hwangbo Eom's head.

Of course, I had not gained the enlightenment required to reach the Supreme Peak realm.

To be precise, it wasn't my martial arts but my physical abilities themselves that had reached a realm beyond humanity.

What should I even call this?

A Supreme Peak master—physically?

There was no doubt that I was a new kind of Supreme Peak master, one without precedent in the history of the Murim.

I shrugged.

"It's nothing special. I tried it, and it worked."

Hwangbo Eom shouted, his eyes bloodshot.

"I refuse to believe this! How can a brat like you have reached such a realm?"

"I find it hard to believe, too. Who swings a sword in a place like this? Are you out of your mind?"

"That…"

Hwangbo Eom's eyes stiffened as they swept across the room.

Fortunately, his strike had been aimed precisely at me, so no one else had been injured. Even so, every face around us showed shock and fury.

"You went on about the orthodox faction and the Great Zhongnan Sect, but the second you lost your temper, you became no better than a fiend. Why not rename yourselves the Zhong-Bastard Sect while you're at it?"

"You—!"

Hwangbo Eom's hand trembled around the sword hilt. His conflicted gaze swept over the room before turning cold.

"Disciples of the Zhongnan Sect, heed my command."

"Y-yes, Martial Uncle!"

The thirty members of the Taeeul Sword Unit, frozen like statues by the sudden turn of events, jolted back to their senses.

They hurriedly cupped their hands[1661], and Hwangbo Eom's command fell over their heads.

"Seal the entrances immediately. No one is to leave this place."

"S-Senior Martial Uncle!"

"B-but…"

"What are you waiting for? Do you intend to disobey this old man's command?"

As Hwangbo Eom's roar left the Taeeul Sword Unit hesitating, a quiet voice pierced everyone's ears.

"Yes. I do."

[1661] Pogwon is a formal martial salute made by enclosing one fist in the opposite hand.

Hwangbo Eom's face filled with fury when he recognized the speaker.

"Hyuk Sopyung. How dare you…"

I knew the young man. Hyuk Sopyung, the Zhongnan One Dragon.

He stared at Hwangbo Eom with an indescribably complicated look in his eyes.

"Please stop. This is the first and last time I will beg you."

"What did you say?"

"The way you're acting right now, Senior Martial Uncle… Isn't this beneath a disciple of the Great Zhongnan Sect?"

"Shut your mouth!"

Kraaash!

Another gale swept through the room, and Hyuk Sopyung's body slid backward.

But his gaze did not waver.

Hwangbo Eom looked back and forth between Hyuk Sopyung and the thirty hesitant members of the Taeeul Sword Unit, then bit down hard on his lip.

"You little…"

The next moment, he pulled a small copper tablet from inside his robes and threw it at Hyuk Sopyung's feet.

"This is our sect's Sect Leader's Command Token, entrusted to this old man by your Master. Do you still intend to refuse?"

"…!"

The Sect Leader's Command Token was a powerful symbol of the authority held by the leader of a sect.

Hyuk Sopyung's eyelids trembled when he recognized his Master's copper tablet.

"Senior Martial Uncle, you truly haven't changed."

"Choose. Expulsion or obedience."

"Expulsion…"

Hyuk Sopyung's regretful gaze settled on Ju Hwaran and me.

Then he gave a bitter smile, prostrated himself before the copper tablet, and slammed his forehead against the floor.

Thud! Thud! Thud!

"Disciple Hyuk Sopyung obeys the Sect Leader's Command Token!"

His cry sounded as if he were vomiting blood. Blood streamed down his split forehead.

Hyuk Sopyung rose with a blank expression, as if he felt no pain at all, and blocked the entrance to the teahouse. The thirty members of the Taeeul Sword Unit followed suit.

I clicked my tongue as I watched it all unfold.

“At this point, you haven’t just crossed the line—you erased it altogether. Are you sure you can deal with the consequences?”

Major figures from Huashan, the Beggars’ Sect, and the Lower District Sect were all gathered here. No matter how powerful the Zhongnan Sect was, the fallout from today would be fierce.

But Hwangbo Eom had already lost his mind. His eyes held nothing but rage.

“They will come to no harm. All except you.”

“Ah. So you’ll deal with me first and clean up afterward?”

“Yes. At last, I can tear that mouth of yours apart.”

“Why are you so desperate to tear it apart, old man? The Jin Family of Taiyuan and the Fire Gate Clan aren’t exactly a pair of pushover nobodies.”

“The Fire Gate Clan?”

A sneer formed at the corner of Hwangbo Eom’s mouth.

The next moment, a line of Sound Transmission pierced my ear.

—The young tiger is in danger, yet the great tiger shows no sign of waking.

“…!”

—Did you think this old man wouldn’t know, you foolish child? I already knew the Fire King’s illness was grave.

A secret known to only a handful of people had leaked out.

My face stiffened before I could stop it. Hwangbo Eom’s smile deepened when he saw my reaction.

—The Fire King Jeok Cheongang, and you. I have had more than enough of you both. This might be a good opportunity to settle my bad blood with the Fire Gate Clan once and for all.

Settle his bad blood?

Hwangbo Eom’s words left me momentarily dazed.

Does he mean what I think he means?

My tangled thoughts vanished in an instant. Only one remained.

“Sorry, but can I ask everyone for one favor?”

I could feel their gazes even without looking.

Baek Museong and Cheongpung. Gung Gibang and Heukgeol Beggar. Wolhwa and Hyuk Mujin. And finally, Ju Hwaran.

Everyone in the room was looking at me.

Then a voice so dry that I could hardly believe it belonged to me slipped between my lips.

“Block the entrance. Don’t let anyone get out.”

Hwangbo Eom had been the first to block the door, but I would be the one to decide when it opened and closed.

“Taeeul Merciless Sword Hwangbo Eom.”

I let out a quiet sigh. Extreme Yang qi boiled up from my dantian and flowed from me as white steam.

"You… said something you never should have."

He should never have brought up Jeok Cheongang over something as trivial as this.

He truly shouldn't have.

Starting now, he would pay the price for saying what should never have been said.

"Come at me, you fucking old bastard."

In time split into smaller and smaller instants, Hwangbo Eom and I rushed toward each other.

Kraaaaaash!

Heavenly River Thirty-Six Swords.

A dense and powerful net of Sword Energy covered heaven and earth in every direction.

The sword forms came without pause, on a completely different level from those of the Roaring Fury Swordsman I had faced a year ago or Hyuk Sopyung the day before.

Shishishishishik!

They were blindingly fast and destructive. Even a glancing blow would split flesh and bone and bring death.

I can't dodge this. There's no way.

At least, it would have been true if I were the me from a year ago.

The saying wipe your eyes and look again came to mind—a phrase for progress so astonishing that you had to rub your eyes and take another look.

Even that fell short of describing me.

Through endless days of brutal training, I had grown stronger. No, it would not be wrong to call it evolution.

Heaven is truly heartless. How can someone like you even exist?

Jeok Cheongang's face, filled with helpless disbelief, appeared over the net of Sword Energy.

I laughed quietly and swept my spear, White Flame, upward.

Shraaaak!

The Extreme Yang qi coating White Flame's spearhead tore through the net.

A fish would have fled through the gap in the torn net, but I was no fish.

I was a shark.

The fisherman who had cast the net had clearly overlooked that fact.

The old fisherman's wrinkled face filled with shock.

"You—!"

I did not answer.

I bent my knees and lowered my waist. The spear in my hand curved smoothly like a dragon's tail.

Fire Dragon's Single Tail.

Fwoooosh! Boom!

The blue-burning spear and sword collided. A deafening crash rang out as an immense shock wave erupted.

Had Hwangbo Eom been trying to conserve his strength?

If so, he had made a terrible mistake. No matter how severely it drained his internal energy, he should have used Sword Force.

"Hup!"

His eyes opened wide.

The old man staggered before my strength, which had entered the realm beyond humanity, and the innate ferocity of my martial art.

"Wh-what kind of martial art is this…?"

The founder of the Fire Gate Clan had been called the greatest martial artist under heaven in his era.

He created the Fire Gate Divine Technique and made it the root of the clan. The sixteen Sect Leaders who followed became different branches growing from that same root.

The Fire Dragon Divine Spear was no different.

Created by the fifth Sect Leader, the spear art was supremely destructive and fierce. Its movements truly resembled those of a fire dragon.

And…

This is only the beginning.

Whoooosh!

I held nothing back.

I thrust, slashed, swept, and struck.

Whenever the blue flames ran wild, thunderous crashes like the sky splitting apart shook heaven and earth.

After the tail come the claws.

No one under heaven had ever seen a dragon fight.

But while learning the Fire Dragon Divine Spear, I had found myself wondering.

If a fire dragon really swung its claws, wouldn't it look exactly like this?

Gooooong.

Extreme Yang qi coiled around the tip of my spear.

The tea spilled across the floor during Hwangbo Eom's earlier rampage had long since evaporated. The jade-colored tea set glowed red-hot, as if it were back inside the kiln where it had been fired.

Sensing that something was wrong, Hwangbo Eom shouted like a thunderbolt.

"You bastard!"

He was already nearing eighty.

But to someone who had entered the Supreme Peak realm, age was nothing more than a number.

His formidable internal energy and the Zhongnan Sect's ultimate techniques, honed for more than a jiazi[1662], poured down like beams of light.

Swoooosh!

If the Heavenly River Thirty-Six Swords were a net, this was a harpoon meant to finish its prey.

As his sword slashed toward my chest at incredible speed, scattering dozens of afterimages, one martial art flashed through my mind.

Taeeul Light-Dividing Sword.

One of the Zhongnan Sect's most celebrated ultimate sword techniques.

Jeok Cheongang had described the Taeeul Light-Dividing Sword as a sword art of extreme speed.

Then he had added one more thing.

Maybe this old man is going senile. Why do I get the feeling you'll be faster than the sword?

If Jeok Cheongang woke up, I wanted to tell him he had been right.

And that the Fire Gate Clan's martial arts had shattered the Taeeul Light-Dividing Sword.

Heavenly Strike.

The fire dragon swung its claws.

The strike descended from the sky, erasing the afterimages created by the Taeeul Light-Dividing Sword as it fell like a bolt of lightning.

Kraaaaaash!

A pillar of hellfire erupted.

[1662] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

Chapter 324

Kraaaaaash!

The hellfire surged outward, devouring the lingering chill of early spring.

It erased the dozens of wavering afterimages created by the Taeeul Light-Dividing Sword and finally struck the blade as they converged into one.

The Sword Force, the one true essence and concentration of power, collided with the hellfire.

Goooooooong!

A deafening roar rang out as a massive wave of martial energy spiraled around the old man and the young man.

Blue flames twisted through the wind, tore through the tea house's ceiling, and surged skyward like a waterspout.

At the sight, Hwangbo Eom's eyelids trembled.

The fire dragon…!

He did not even notice that his prized white beard had been scorched black.

Beyond their locked weapons, the young man's burning eyes glared into his. The sight stole his breath and left his chest tight.

It's hot.

Hwangbo Eom possessed two jiazi[1663] of internal energy and had reached the Supreme Peak realm.

His body, tempered by formidable martial arts, had long since reached the state of being Unaffected by Cold and Heat.

But the young man's gaze—and the aura radiating from him—could not be described as mere heat.

Rage and fighting spirit.

And within them, the faintest trace of cold composure.

How can this be? He is little more than a boy…

"Cough."

A dry cough escaped Hwangbo Eom, followed by a mouthful of blood. His trembling gaze fell upon the spear in the young man's hand.

Blue-white flames coiled around its transparent silver spearhead.

It was not yet complete, but it was unmistakably Force.

No. That's not possible. He hasn't crossed the wall yet. Then how could this old man…?

Hwangbo Eom had crossed that wall ten years ago and entered the Supreme Peak realm.

[1663] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle. Two jiazi of internal energy means roughly 120 years' worth.

Yet despite the enlightenment he had gained through all those years of training and meditation, he was being pushed back by a young brat still confined to the Peak realm.

"How…?"

The young man's answer was short.

"Because I'm stronger."

"…!"

With that quiet reply, the spearhead locked against Hwangbo Eom's sword bore down on him with tremendous force.

Kaga-ga-ga-gak!

"Hup!"

Two jiazi[1664] of internal energy poured into his Sword Force?

A martial art of the Supreme Peak realm?

None of it mattered. The power transmitted through the spearhead was divine strength beyond anything a human should have been able to wield. It called to mind a myth he had heard as a child.

Pangu.

The primordial giant who had created the world with a single swing of his ax.

The young man before him had confined the strength of a god within a human body.

And divine strength was not all he possessed.

Shlick!

The senses of a Supreme Peak master far surpassed those of an ordinary martial artist.

Yet even Hwangbo Eom could not evade the silver line that suddenly slashed across him.

Pain he had not felt in decades.

Blood spurted from his shoulder, and his eyes flew wide.

When did he…?

He had not even seen the young man strike.

Even the Taeeul Light-Dividing Sword, the Zhongnan Sect's celebrated sword art of extreme speed, could not possibly be like this.

After eighty years spent practicing the Zhongnan Sect's martial arts, Hwangbo Eom cried out.

"This cannot be! It cannot!"

Kraaa-boom!

[1664] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle. Two jiazi of internal energy means roughly 120 years' worth.

He summoned every last ounce of strength, and the Force gathered along his blade flared like wildfire.

At last escaping the pressure, Hwangbo Eom pointed at the young man with trembling fingers.

“Who… Who in the world are you?”

“You know.”

The young man, Jin Taekyung, spat to the side like a common street thug before continuing.

“The nineteenth successor of the Fire Gate Clan.”

Fwoooosh!

The hellfire gathered around the transparent spearhead blazed fiercely.

Shweeeeeek! Boom!

Spearhead and sword blade collided.

In a succession of instants, hellfire and Sword Force erased everything in their path as they clashed and separated through dozens of exchanges.

Shishishishik! Bang!

I tilted my head a fraction.

A tremendous wave of martial energy erupted from the sword tip as it stabbed through empty air. A pillar three jang[1665] away split like tofu and came crashing down.

I launched myself forward, bounding across the wooden fragments raining from the ceiling.

Light yet heavy.

Soft yet rough.

Like a fire spreading.

So this is the essence of the Flamefire Path.

For an instant, weightlessness enveloped my entire body.

The world slowed around me, and I alone raced forward as though being pulled along. My body, light as air, shot ahead like a bullet.

Ding.

[1665] A Korean jang is ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

SYSTEM

Enlightenment comes to you in many ways: through ceaseless training and meditation, and through battles in which you stake your life.
The Flamefire Path has risen to seven stars!
You have gained a substantial amount of EXP!

Bang!

Air exploded beneath my toes.

The moment the System notification rang out, I was right in front of Hwangbo Eom.

Maybe it was the unexpected enlightenment and my newfound speed, but I had gotten too close to thrust my spear.

Instead of retreating, I struck out with my palm.

Whoooosh!

My palm burned through the air.

Hwangbo Eom roared like thunder and thrust out his own palm to meet it.

A dazzling blue light gathered over his wrinkled palm.

It was the Zhongnan Sect's famed Blue Cloud Heavenly Force Palm.

But he had too little time to complete the Force in his palm.

No.

I was faster.

Whooooooosh! Boom!

Our palms collided.

A thunderous crash rang out, followed by a strangled groan.

Hwangbo Eom's face had gone pale from his Internal Injury. Gritting his teeth, he raised his other hand and pointed it at me.

Papapap!

Five streams of Finger Qi sliced uselessly through empty air.

If I hadn't seized his wrist with the Fire Dragon Claw in that split second, I would have been the one bleeding.

How dare you.

Crack.

I twisted his captured wrist between my thumb, index finger, and middle finger.

A muffled scream slipped through his cracked lips.

Taeeul Merciless Sword Hwangbo Eom.

How long had it been since he had felt pain like this?

When the curtain falls, the actors leave the stage.

The curtain had fallen on the war between the orthodox and unorthodox factions half a century ago, and its heroes had scattered.

The Hwangbo Eom I saw before me now was no hero.

He was nothing but a petty old man.

This is going to hurt.

I released his limp wrist.

At the same time, I curled the fingers that had been bent like a dragon's claws into a fist.

Crack.

Day after day, I had repeated the same stance countless times with an iron ball weighing hundreds of geun[1666] strapped to me.

My lower body rooted like a tree. My waist stood like a pillar. My fist flew true and unhindered.

Not one inch of my stance deviated from Jeok Cheongang's teachings.

At first, I shattered rocks.

Then I split waterfalls plunging from hundreds of jang[1667] above.

And brought down cliffs.

The back of my hand, burst and split countless times until it resembled a turtle's shell, became wreathed in blue-white flame.

The time it took to assume the stance and throw the punch was truly no more than an instant.

Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

Gooooong.

The Extreme Yang energy evaporated every trace of moisture within several meters[1668].

Hwangbo Eom's lips, cracked like a drought-stricken rice paddy, parted.

"No—!"

"It can."

With that answer, I drove my fist forward.

The Body-Protecting Qi of a Supreme Peak master blocked its path—but only for a moment. The punch shattered the energy surrounding his entire body and slammed into his aged flesh and bones.

Kraaaack!

"Gaaaaaaaaah!"

Hwangbo Eom's body was hurled backward amid a shriek that seemed to tear the air apart.

[1666] A Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb).

[1667] A Korean jang is ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[1668] Several meters is roughly 10–20 ft.

Three pillars and part of the wall collapsed, and the remaining ceiling came crashing down.

Just as the word finished crossed my mind, I saw bloodshot eyes glaring at me through the cloud of dust.

“C-cough!”

“Stay down if you want to hold on to what little life you have left.”

“You… How could you…”

Shock and confusion.

Rage and humiliation.

Countless emotions churned in Hwangbo Eom’s eyes.

At last, they all converged into one.

Hatred.

His blood-soaked lips slowly parted.

Blood mixed with pieces of his organs poured down, but his eyes continued to burn fiercely.

They were the eyes of a man who no longer cared what happened afterward.

“This old man is… The First Sword of Zhongnan.”

At that moment, the hot wind swirling around us cooled.

Then an icy wind began to blow.

It came from one man and rose from a single sword.

I felt my overheated blood begin to cool and muttered,

“This is…”

“The Taeeul Formless Sword. Watch closely. This is the sword art that will take your life.”

Shing—

The sword moved, and the wind blew.

The sword was the wind, and the wind was the sword.

Invisible sword strikes hid within it.

The sharp smell of blood suddenly filled my nose.

Shlick!

I stepped half a pace to the side.

That half-step saved my life.

I had no time even to register the blood running down my neck. Every time Hwangbo Eom’s sword vibrated from more than ten jang[1669] away, invisible sword strikes surged toward me like waves.

Shik, shlick!

My side stung.

[1669] A Korean jang is ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

The energy carried by the sword strike rattled my insides.

Even as I staggered, I raised my arm. The attack missed by a hair and split a roof beam like tofu.

What is this?

Shlick!

There was no time to wonder.

This time, a long gash opened across my chest. Blood sprayed out and soaked the floor.

I can't see them.

It felt as if I had been swallowed by dense fog.

This was not a matter of strength or speed.

This was martial arts—a sword art of supreme mastery unleashed by a martial artist who had attained greater enlightenment than I had, even at the cost of driving his internal energy berserk.

And yet…

How have I managed to dodge them until now?

The question seized my mind.

Dozens of sword strikes rained down on my rigid body.

I stared at them blankly.

Then I closed my eyes.

In the darkness, one man's face appeared.

His sharp, ringing voice echoed faintly.

In the Murim, keep your eyes wide open. Then you won't get stabbed and die.

What if I end up in danger of dying anyway?

Then rip out those useless eyes and see with your heart.

My heart? Come on. How is that supposed to work?

Have you even tried?

Yes, I had.

No. I was trying now.

So this is what you meant back then.

A smile spread across my face without my realizing it.

I couldn't see them.

But I could feel them.

The sword strikes approaching through the darkness, where I could not see even an inch ahead.

Taeeul Merciless Sword Hwangbo Eom's final struggle.

Thank you for the lesson, Old Master.

With my eyes still closed, I twisted my body.

I tuned every limb and every tiny muscle as precisely as the notes of a piano.

The sword strikes missed my flesh, tearing through my clothes and gouging the ground.

Kraaa-boom!

Amid the thunderous crash, I slowly opened my eyes.

Hwangbo Eom's face was filled with shock.

An emotion I had never seen before gleamed in his eyes.

Fear.

He knew it, too.

He knew the fear he was feeling.

The terror he felt from me.

"D-don't come any closer!"

Shweeeek!

I took one step forward and swung my spear.

The sword strike sweeping toward my neck collided with the spearhead and vanished.

Then I took another step.

Shishishishing!

I wielded my spear as naturally as I breathed.

I knocked the attacks aside, blocked them, and pierced them as if dispatching living enemies.

All the while, my feet never stopped.

I was in no hurry.

Hwangbo Eom was desperate.

Ignoring the body that had already reached its limit, he unleashed one final sword strike.

Kraaaaaash!

Sword Force carrying enough power to reduce the entire tea house to dust rushed toward me.

I watched until it was right before my eyes.

Then I swung my spearhead like a bolt of lightning.

Heavenly Strike.

The fire dragon's claw seized the Sword Force.

And in the next instant—

Crack!

The shattered blade tumbled across the ground.

Hwangbo Eom stared blankly at his ruined, cherished sword before raising his head.

“You… What in the world are you…”

“So why…”

I slowly continued speaking to the greatest martial artist of the Zhongnan Sect, Taeeul Merciless Sword Hwangbo Eom.

“Why the fuck did you have to insult someone else’s master? You old bastard who ate all those years through your asshole. You trying to get yourself killed? Fuck.”

Chapter 325

A shudder.

That was the emotion everyone present shared.

Huashan, the Beggars' Sect, the Zhongnan Sect, the Lower District Sect, and even the Yongbong Escort Bureau. Dozens of trembling pairs of eyes stared dumbfoundedly at the scene unfolding before them.

"So."

Thwack!

"While I was still asking nicely."

Thwack!

"You should've stopped."

Thwack!

"Where do you get off throwing the first punch—the first sword, even?"

Craack!

The final blow was especially loud. With a wet, choking rattle of blood in his throat, the old man crumpled to the ground.

His face was covered in blood. The sharp bridge of his nose, which had once made countless women's hearts flutter, had long since been flattened, and the even teeth that had belied his eighty years had been reduced to a single front tooth.

"You talk shit about someone else's Master like you're insulting their fucking dad, you piece of shit."

Craack!

The last remaining front tooth went flying through the air and landed in a corner of the tea house.

As everyone stared at the scene in stunned disbelief, a single thought flashed through their minds.

What the hell am I looking at?

Something no one had thought would happen—something that should never have happened—was happening right before their eyes.

Who would believe that a young man barely twenty years old, only just beginning to make a name for himself in the martial world, was beating the Zhongnan Sect's greatest master and the Sect Leader's senior martial brother to a pulp?

And yet everyone present had witnessed it with their own eyes.

They had seen the exchange between two men whose movements had been too fast to follow. And at the end of that exchange, the fallen old man and the young man standing alone.

"The fire dragon…"

Someone muttered those two words like a groan, and they sank deep into everyone’s hearts.

The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi. That was the martial name by which the young man Jin Taekyung had been known in the Murim.

But it was wrong. The Hidden Dragon had finally risen, and he would soar through the skies of the entire world—not merely those of Shanxi.

As a fire dragon.

“Ethics was the only subject I ever got a perfect score in, but today I’m going all out on an old man. Get up.”

No. Not a fire dragon.

Was he a Mad Dragon instead?

The sight of Jin Taekyung gripping Hwangbo Eom’s soot-and-blood-caked beard as though he had the old man by the hair jolted the thirty members of the Taeeul Sword Unit out of their stupor.

Who was that old man?

He was Taeeul Merciless Sword Hwangbo Eom, a senior of their sect and the Sect Leader’s senior martial brother.

“W-wait!”

“Martial Grandmaster!”

Voices erupted all at once, as if on cue.

Among them came one particularly loud, forceful shout.

“You bastard! Release Senior Martial Uncle this instant!”

Hwangcheon[1670], the Commander of the Taeeul Sword Unit and a second-generation disciple of the Zhongnan Sect, hurriedly drew his sword and stepped forward.

Shing. Clack.

“…!”

Hwangcheon’s eyes widened like saucers.

It had happened in the blink of an eye.

A cold blade had stopped at his throat. A yellow bamboo staff was pressed against his chest, while the sword he had drawn halfway from its scabbard had been caught on another blade and could go no farther.

The three martial artists who had subdued Hwangcheon, a Peak master of the Zhongnan Sect, in an instant spoke in turn.

“You’d better not draw that sword.”

“If you want a fight, the Yongbong Escort Bureau and I will be your opponents.”

[1670] Hwangcheon (□□) literally means “Yellow Springs,” a traditional term for the underworld.

“It’ll hurt quite a bit if you get hit by the Dog-Beating Staff Technique. I’ve only mastered it to five stars,[1671] though.”

Huashan’s Lone Crane Baek Museong, Dagger Hidden Flower Ju Hwaran, and the Beggars’ Sect’s Successor Beggar, Gung Gibang.

And that was not all.

“Protect the Young Bureau Head!”

“This is troublesome. We’re almost finished, so we can’t let things end this way.”

Chief Escort Heo Jun and the cold-faced Song Ilseom, who had been muttering something incomprehensible, led the Yongbong Escort Bureau’s escorts in confronting the Zhongnan disciples.

“The branch leader commands you filthy Beggars’ Sect bastards! Show those dogs who are beneath even a yellow dog what a beggar’s cudgel feels like!”

“We’re beggars too. Why are you calling us bastards?”

“Good grief. It’s been ages since I got to really cut loose.”

“If any of us get hurt, it’s the branch leader’s responsibility. Don’t give us grief just because we can’t beg for a while.”

Heukgeol Beggar and the Beggars’ Sect disciples enthusiastically drew the cudgels hanging from their waists.

“You lot, don’t get involved and hurt yourselves for no reason. Write down every detail of what happens. We’ll be able to sell it for a high price later.”

“Um, are you planning to make an enemy of the Zhongnan Sect?”

“Hm? Why would I make an enemy of an important customer? I’m going to sell this to the Zhongnan Sect. Even if I jack up the price sky-high, they’ll have no choice but to buy it.”

“Ah! Of course!”

“Draw pictures too. Make them vivid enough to leap off the page.”

“Yes, ma’am!”

Hoping to make a fortune, Wolhwa and the Lower District Sect members began recording the scene before them in words and pictures without missing a single detail.

“Wow! I’ve never been in a situation like this before!”

“You bastards! Hyuk Mujin is here too—the Vice Squad Leader of the Jin Dragon Squad and the Captain’s right-hand man!”

Finally, even Cheongpung and Hyuk Mujin, who had been watching from a safe distance, joined in.

As events took an unexpected turn, Hwangcheon’s face flushed with confusion and rage.

“W-what is the meaning of this? Everyone, stop this at once!”

[1671] Five stars means five-tenths mastery of the technique.

The answer came from somewhere else.

“What if we don’t want to stop?”

“…!”

Hwangcheon sucked in a breath.

Over the shoulders of the people blocking the Zhongnan Sect’s path, a pair of eyes filled with cold flames stared directly at him.

“I asked you. What are you going to do if I don’t want to stop?”

White steam billowed from Jin Taekyung’s sneering lips.

Perhaps it was because Hwangcheon had witnessed that unbelievable display of might. Merely meeting Jin Taekyung’s gaze and hearing that low voice in his ears was enough to make his breath catch.

His aura was truly overwhelming.

H-How can someone so young…?

Hwangcheon realized it once again.

To the young man who had defeated the Zhongnan Sect’s greatest master, age was nothing more than a number.

He’s a monster. That man is a monster.

And now that monster was looking directly at him.

How could the martial arts he had once taken such pride in feel so insignificant?

Hwangcheon swallowed dryly again and again as Jin Taekyung’s aura pressed down on him.

That was when—

“Junior Brother, withdraw. Everyone else, sheathe your swords.”

A calm voice sounded as a man stepped in front of him.

Hwangcheon’s eyes widened at the familiar back.

“Senior Brother Hyuk…!”

Zhongnan One Dragon Hyuk Sopyung.

He had been called the future of the Zhongnan Sect, and even now, despite his indulgence in wine and women, he had not lost his reputation as the sect’s greatest young prodigy.

Standing before Hwangcheon, he stared at Jin Taekyung with firm eyes.

Though dozens of weapons were pointed at him, his voice did not waver in the slightest.

“Please end this pointless fight.”

“Pointless? End it?”

A short, breathy laugh escaped Jin Taekyung’s lips.

“Even if you started it, I’m the one who decides how it ends.”

“I know. That is why I’m asking.”

“Asking? Just because you have a mouth doesn’t mean you can say whatever you want. Keep running it and someone might put a hole through it.”

“The outcome is already clear. I ask you to show the mercy of the strong.”

The Zhongnan disciples’ eyes widened—not at his surprisingly courteous manner or voice, but at the meaning of his words.

Hwangcheon, who had remained silent behind Hyuk Sopyung, raised his head and shouted.

“Senior Brother! The mercy of the strong? Those words dishonor Senior Martial Uncle and the Great Zhongnan Sect—”

“Junior Brother.”

“Y-yes?”

Hyuk Sopyung cut him off in a gentle voice.

But his next words were as sharp as a drawn blade.

“Will you shut that mouth of yours?”

“…Senior Brother?”

Not only Hwangcheon, but all thirty members of the Taeeul Sword Unit stared at Hyuk Sopyung with blank expressions.

Under the stunned gazes of all his junior disciples, Hyuk Sopyung slowly began to speak.

“Anyone who wasn’t blind would have seen it. Anyone who wasn’t deaf would have heard it—how all of this began.”

“…”

“We plotted in the shadows to swallow the Yongbong Escort Bureau whole. That is not the conduct of a great and prestigious sect. Therefore, our sect has already lost its dignity.”

His voice was low, and his expression was twisted with pain. But Hyuk Sopyung did not stop.

“Worse, even in the face of such clear evidence, we refused to admit our wrongdoing, harbored murderous intent, and swung our swords. That severed the last shred of trust our sect still possessed. And yet which one of us dares speak of reputation? Me, who forgot my duty and wallowed in wine and women? Or you, who refuse to admit your mistakes and cling only to your pride?”

Hwangcheon lowered his head.

He was not the only one. All thirty Zhongnan disciples fell silent, gripping the scabbards at their waists as if they meant to crush them.

They were ashamed because everything Hyuk Sopyung had said was true. And as the pride they had held in their sect crumbled, they felt hollow and humiliated.

No one spoke, but everyone around them could feel those emotions.

“At least today… we were not the Great Zhongnan Sect.”

With those final words, Hyuk Sopyung looked at his junior disciples with eyes filled with regret, then turned around.

He gave a deep fist-and-palm salute to the one man who had silently waited for him to finish.

“This Zhongnan disciple, Hyuk Sopyung, humbly asks this of you. We deeply regret and apologize for the wrongs our sect has committed. Please show mercy just this once and spare him.”

His manner was exceedingly respectful, as though he were addressing a revered master of the previous generation.

And yet the person receiving his salute was a barely grown young man.

After staring silently at the bowed Hyuk Sopyung for a moment, Jin Taekyung opened his mouth.

“It leaves a bad taste in my mouth to keep an old bastard like this alive… but fine. I’ll let him off this once.”

Before Hyuk Sopyung could even raise his head, Jin Taekyung continued brightly.

“After I hit him one more time.”

Craack!

The inside of Tengwang Pavilion was beyond ruined.

The roof had collapsed completely, and all the furnishings had been reduced to rubble and dust by the battle between Hwangbo Eom and me. Cold wind and the murmuring of onlookers drifted in through the collapsed walls.

“My heavens, Tengwang Pavilion…”

“What on earth happened? Does anyone know?”

“I don’t know the details either. But from what I’ve heard, about one shichen[1672] ago, Taeeul Merciless Sword of the Zhongnan Sect led his disciples…”

Xi’an was the center of Shaanxi Province. No matter how far out of the way Tengwang Pavilion was, it could not escape the people’s attention.

And the commoners who had gathered out of equal parts curiosity and concern found themselves facing dozens of sharp martial artists’ gazes.

“That’s far enough.”

“This is a matter of the martial world. Don’t get involved. Go back!”

Dozens of armed martial artists formed a human wall to block their approach. The commoners hesitated, then slowly backed away.

I clicked my tongue as I watched the Zhongnan disciples struggling desperately to keep the scene inside from being exposed.

[1672] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

"Look at you trying so hard."

The Great Zhongnan Sect's reputation was already shot to hell, yet they were still fighting to preserve even a shred of it.

It was both pitiful and idiotic.

I dropped into a wooden chair with a broken back and spoke.

"Well, unpleasant things happened, but we still have to finish what needs finishing. Let's find some common ground through dialogue instead of barbaric violence."

"…"

"…"

Oof. Those stares were sharp.

I ignored the gazes raining down on me from every direction and smiled at one person.

"So, Great Hero Hwangbo, what do you think?"

Hwangbo Eom answered immediately.

Or rather, he groaned.

"Hrrgh… hrrrgh…"

Both of his arms were broken, and one leg was fractured. On top of that, he had suffered an Internal Injury that would require at least a year of recovery, while his nose and teeth had been smashed to pieces.

A sobbing groan escaped from his slightly open mouth, accompanied by the wet rattle of blood and phlegm.

"Hrrrgh…"

I grabbed Hwangbo Eom by the wrist.

Resisting the urge to break it, I sent a small amount of internal energy into him. A little color returned to his pale face.

"Patient? Sir, wake up. It's time for your injection—no, your negotiation."

"Hrrgh… Jin Taekyung. You…"

"That catchphrase went out of fashion fifty years ago."

"You bastard. Do you really think our sect will let you get away with this…?"

"Hm."

What do I do? He still doesn't seem to have come to his senses.

I scratched the back of my head, then whipped my hand out like lightning.

Smack!

"Guh!"

Hwangbo Eom's eyes rolled back from the slap.

As he trembled all over and began to slide out of the chair, Hyuk Sopyung caught him and sighed.

"Whew."

"It's not my fault. He keeps earning these beatings. He's practically begging me to kill him. What else am I supposed to do?"

"Even so, restrain yourself. Any more than this could endanger his life."

"You've had a rough time too. Judging by his personality, I can't imagine he treated you particularly well either. Am I wrong?"

"…What kind of person he was to me is irrelevant. He is my Master's senior martial brother and a disciple of our sect."

The complicated expression on Hyuk Sopyung's face suggested that there was some story between them.

He seems surprisingly decent now… Was that why he got drunk and caused all that trouble?

The question crossed my mind for an instant, but I had no intention of asking.

I wasn't particularly curious, either.

There was something more important to deal with now.

"All right, then. Let's negotiate. Young Lady Ju, are you ready?"

"Pardon? Y-yes, yes."

"You may state your demands."

What on earth happened here? Is this a dream?

Still looking as though she could not quite believe what was happening, Ju Hwaran rubbed her flushed cheek and began to speak.

"As compensation for this incident, the Yongbong Escort Bureau demands that the Zhongnan Sect void the contract and pay the contractual penalty—"

Hwangbo Eom's hoarse voice cut her off.

"We refuse. Our sect will not pay any compensation."

I knew it.

I gave the rigid Ju Hwaran a look.

"Young Lady Ju, wait a moment."

"Yes?"

"It'll only take a second."

Without hesitation, I slapped Hwangbo Eom across the face.

Smack!

"Guh!"

"Senior Martial Uncle!"

"I'll ask again. Are you paying compensation or not?"

Hwangbo Eom glared at me with burning eyes.

"Our sect will… not pay any compen—"

Smack!

“Guh! No compensation whatso—”
Smack!
“Guhhh! Our sect will pay any compensation!”
“Okay, compensation! Okay! Thank you!”
Negotiation sure was easy.

Chapter 326

The negotiations went smoothly.

“To begin with, looking only at the year before last, the Yongbong Escort Bureau suffered losses amounting to twenty-five thousand silver nyang because of the Zhongnan Sect’s schemes. Do you acknowledge that?”

“Twenty-five thousand silver nyang? What nonsense! This old man absolutely does not acknow—”

“Ha. This old bastard’s starting again.”

Smack!

“Guh! I acknowledge it! I acknowledge it!”

Of course, there were times when things did not go smoothly. But all that mattered was making them go smoothly.

The Beggars’ Sect organized the mountain of information they had gathered, and the Lower District Sect used it to calculate the losses on their abacuses.

“Let’s see. The contract cancellation with the Nakcheon Merchant Guild on the seventeenth day of the first month last year. The Zhongnan Sect was involved in this one, too.”

“How much were the damages?”

“Six hundred and thirty-two silver nyang.”

I had been quietly listening to the Beggars’ Sect disciple and Lower District Sect member talk when I suddenly spoke up.

“Seven hundred nyang.”

“Pardon?”

“Seven hundred nyang.”

“…Yes.”

The middle-aged Lower District Sect member, clearly a veteran of the banking trade, hastily crossed out the character for six and changed it to seven.

As I watched them work, I suddenly picked up one of the bamboo slips that had been set aside.

“What’s this?”

“Ah, that happened on the sixth day of the fifth month last year…”

“Skip the date. How much were the damages?”

“Nine hundred and twenty-six silver nyang.”

“Nine hundred and what?”

The Lower District Sect member quickly corrected himself when he saw my expression.

“One thousand nyang.”

“One thousand nyang? They really helped themselves, didn’t they? Is there anything they didn’t have a hand in?”

Two silver nyang was enough to cover a family of four’s living expenses for a month. The gap between rich and poor might have been severe, but one thousand silver nyang was enough for an ordinary commoner’s family to live in luxury for three generations.

As I marveled at the sum, the Lower District Sect member spoke up.

“Um, Young Hero Jin. That incident was not caused by the Zhongnan Sect.”

“It wasn’t? Then why is it here?”

“Well, you see, Young Master Jin…”

A long, slender finger poked my forearm. It belonged to Wolhwa, who had been standing behind me this entire time, giving off a strange fragrance.

“We brought every piece of information that seemed even slightly suspicious. When we compared everyone’s records, quite a few turned out not to have been Zhongnan’s doing. Young Lady Ju, the Young Bureau Head, would know that well.”

“Oh, really?”

Ju Hwaran was already examining the bamboo slip. After quickly scanning its contents, she nodded.

“That’s right. I remember this one clearly because the loss was so great. This escort mission failed because of a mistake on our side. Isn’t that right, Uncle Heo?”

Under everyone’s gaze, Chief Escort Heo Jun cleared his throat before answering.

“That’s correct. I personally took charge of the escort, and Chief Escort Song here accompanied me. Unfortunately, several misfortunes happened at once, and we failed to meet the deadline. In the end, we had to pay a contractual penalty of one thousand silver nyang.”

His face was filled with shame.

But I did not miss the suspicious look Heo Jun shot at Song Ilseom when he discreetly turned his head.

Nor did I miss Song Ilseom, standing far away with his back against the wall as though he had nothing whatsoever to do with the matter.

“Hmm.”

“What is it, Young Master Jin? Is something wrong?”

“No. Let’s move on.”

“All right, then. We’ll set this one aside separately.”

At that moment, someone’s hand blocked Wolhwa’s pale, slender fingers as they reached for the bamboo slip.

It was not a woman’s hand, but the rough hand of a martial artist.

Its owner was Ju Hwaran.

“Wait a moment.”

"Yes, Young Lady?"

"I've thought it over carefully, and I think this was probably the Zhongnan Sect's doing after all."

"…What?"

"…Huh?"

Everyone stared at her in confusion, but Ju Hwaran paid them no attention. She picked up the bamboo slip and held it out to the Lower District Sect member calculating the damages.

"Add this one, too."

"Y-Young Lady Ju."

I feel like I've seen this scene somewhere before.

The Lower District Sect member glanced between Wolhwa and me, squeezed his eyes shut, and moved his brush.

With just a few strokes, Ju Hwaran added the hefty sum of one thousand silver nyang. Then she picked up another bamboo slip.

"All right, shall we take another look at the others?"

"…"

"…"

"This one, too. And that one. Oh, hand me the one over in the corner. Yes, that one."

Ju Hwaran examined the bamboo slips and checked the amounts with lightning speed. Every time she did, the damages multiplied like rabbits.

The calculations in her head were precise, and her swindling was audacious.

"This part seems suspicious, too."

"Um, that was determined to have been a mistake by Chief Escort Heo Jun."

"No. It was the Zhongnan Sect's doing. Add it."

"Th-then we'll add another one hundred and fifty silver nyang…"

I let out a quiet laugh and spoke up.

"Two hundred silver nyang."

"Pardon?"

"Let's make it two hundred nyang."

Ju Hwaran shook her head.

"Three hundred nyang."

"…"

"…"

She went and doubled it. Talk about bold.

Hwangbo Eom, who had already half resigned himself to his fate, cried out in a blood-choked voice.

“I-I’ve never seen a pair of highway robbers like you!”

A pair of highway robbers?

Hwangbo Eom seemed intent on eating food set out for the dead starting tonight.

I was just about to begin preparing his funeral rites when—

“Did you just call us highway robbers?”

Ju Hwaran stared at Hwangbo Eom with an icy expression I had never seen on her before.

“Our Yongbong Escort Bureau is demanding what we are rightfully owed. If you refuse even that… then I will let the whole world know who the real highway robber is.”

“How dare you…”

“If every one of these facts is brought to light, will the disciples of the Zhongnan Sect still be able to show their faces in public?”

Ju Hwaran had been forced to lead the Yongbong Escort Bureau before she had even turned twenty, after her father collapsed from qi deviation.

She had lost so much to the Zhongnan Sect’s schemes, and her grief for those she had been forced to send off had sunk deep into her heart.

“Escort Captain Seok Domin, escorts Gil Wangjun, Hong Seokjeong, and Noh Dusam, and caravan porter Seok Sam…”

She recited the names of people I did not know in a trembling voice, then glared at Hwangbo Eom with tear-filled eyes.

“Thirty-three people in all lost their lives during this escort mission. Every one of them was family to the Yongbong Escort Bureau. Even when the bureau’s finances deteriorated so badly that we could no longer pay them properly, they stayed with us until the very end.”

They had not shared blood, but they had been like family.

Just as I had lost my former teammates, Ju Hwaran had lost people precious to her—people who had believed in her and followed her.

“Do not expect us to make any concessions. And neither I nor anyone else in the Yongbong Escort Bureau will ever forget this.”

“…!”

“Do you have anything else to say, Great Hero Hwangbo of the Great Zhongnan Sect?”

His tightly clenched fist trembled. Hwangbo Eom closed his eyes instead of answering.

Hyuk Sopyung stepped forward and gave Ju Hwaran a martial salute on his behalf.

“On behalf of our sect, I offer you our apologies, Young Lady Ju.”

“Please call me Young Bureau Head. And I will not accept an apology that consists only of words.”

At her blade-sharp reply, Hyuk Sopyung sighed.

“That goes without saying. I will immediately report this to my Master and the other Elders, who are still unaware of what happened.”

“I sincerely hope they were unaware.”

I did not know what sort of person the Zhongnan Sect Leader, Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord, was.

But the former Sect Leader, whom Jeok Cheongang had described as “quite the Daoist,” had personally named him as his successor. I could only hope that meant he was someone who could be reasoned with.

The Yongbong Escort Bureau’s situation is one thing, and my own situation is another.

As the old saying goes, a crayfish sides with a crab, and an arm bends inward.

I had killed too many enemies to count, but Hwangbo Eom was not merely one martial artist.

The name Taeeul Merciless Sword represented the Zhongnan Sect, and on a personal level, he was also the Sect Leader’s Senior Brother.

I could eliminate him if I wanted to… but what comes after that is the problem.

The Zhongnan Sect was powerful enough to belong to the Nine Sects and One Gang.

If I had cut off Hwangbo Eom’s head, would they have simply stood by and watched?

Hyuk Sopyung, who had tried to stop me, and everyone else here must have guessed the same thing deep down: that I would not kill Hwangbo Eom.

Should I be satisfied with leaving him half-crippled?

It left a bitter taste in my mouth, but there was nothing I could do.

Hwangbo Eom would need at least a year of recuperation to recover from the injuries he had suffered today.

The important thing was that he was still alive—and by the time he recovered, I would be even stronger.

Since they were kind enough to shit all over themselves first, things became much easier.

Hwangbo Eom had made two critical mistakes. The first was drawing his sword. The second was ordering the Taeeul Sword Unit to seal off the pavilion.

Drawing his sword was one thing, but the second mistake had been fatal.

Because it dragged not only the Beggars’ Sect and the Lower District Sect into this, but Huashan as well.

The Zhongnan Sect's position would become even more precarious because of this incident—not only in the Murim, but financially as well.

The final number written on the bamboo slip after all the calculations were complete proved it.

"For the material and human losses suffered by our bureau, along with the enormous contractual penalty we would have owed your sect if this escort mission had failed… the total comes to four hundred thousand silver nyang. The Zhongnan Sect's finances should be able to handle that much, shouldn't they?"

Ju Hwaran's voice was calm, but the same could not be said of the people listening to her.

Gung Gibang dropped the bamboo staff he had been holding in shock, while Wolhwa marveled at the sum and whispered to me.

"Young Lady Ju—no, the Young Bureau Head of the Yongbong Escort Bureau—is something else, isn't she?"

"How large an amount is four hundred thousand silver nyang?"

"Well, if I told you that the annual budget of a prestigious major sect belonging to the Nine Sects and One Gang was just under one hundred thousand silver nyang, would that give you a rough idea?"

"…Huh."

"Young Master, you just don't know enough about it. If they paid that much all at once, they'd have to tear out half of the Zhongnan Sect's foundations."

In modern terms, would that be several trillion won?[1673] Thinking of it that way made the sum feel more tangible.

I was briefly rendered speechless by the astronomical amount when a gentle voice slipped into my ear.

"Not bad. She's beautiful enough to topple kingdoms, she's intelligent, and she has backbone. Our Young Master is going to have his work cut out for him."

"Pardon?"

"Hmm? What is it?"

"No, I'm sure you just said…"

"Did I? When?"

What was that? I feel like I just heard something awfully strange.

It was just as I was giving Wolhwa a suspicious look that Ju Hwaran's powerful voice rang out.

"Great Hero Hwangbo, please stamp your handprint yourself as proof."

We had already reached the final stage.

Hwangbo Eom was visibly furious, but he had no options left.

[1673] Several trillion won is roughly 3–9 trillion won, or about $2.1–6.4 billion and €1.9–5.8 billion.

As though he intended to curse every person in the room until the day he died, he took each of them in one by one with his eyes. Then he pressed his bloodied palm to the bamboo slip as a seal.

“Is that enough now?”

“That is sufficient. From this moment on, no contract exists between the Yongbong Escort Bureau and the Zhongnan Sect aside from the compensation payment.”

Ju Hwaran then gave a deep martial salute.

“I will not see you out. Return safely to your main compound. I hope we never have cause to meet again.”

“You…!”

Hwangbo Eom tried to shake off the hands of the Zhongnan disciples supporting him, but even that was no longer easy.

After coughing several times, each cough wet with blood, the last person he glared at was me.

“I have one question.”

“You can ask, but think before you open your mouth. Otherwise, you’ll be buried right there.”

Hwangbo Eom shuddered once before speaking.

“Did you truly… truly cross the wall?”

“Oh, so that’s what you were so curious about.”

“What I saw was that your Force was not yet complete. Then how…”

“My Master once told me that people see only as much as they can see, and believe only what they want to believe.”

“What does that…”

“Is it because you’re so old? You can’t seem to grasp the point. Think whatever you want about my realm. But…”

I could understand why he had his doubts.

But what could I do? In both reality and the Murim, I was the kind of existence that could be summed up in three words: beyond common sense.

That was the System, and that was who I was.

I gazed steadily at Hwangbo Eom and continued.

“Let’s remember two things. You’re weaker than me, and I’m stronger than you. And this place is… the Murim.”

Might Makes Right. The strong devour the weak.

The ground beneath my feet was the Murim, and I was a martial artist standing upon it. Hwangbo Eom, who had lived as a martial artist for eighty years, understood the meaning of my words better than anyone.

“The Murim. You said the Murim.”

His mutter sounded almost like a sigh. A brief, hollow laugh escaped him, and his face turned utterly cold.

"We'll meet again. We will!"

"I'll come pay my respects at your funeral next time. I promise!"

Half a shichen[1674] ago, he might have ground his teeth at me, but he had no teeth left for that now.

Hwangbo Eom turned away, radiating cold fury, and shook off the disciples' hands as he shouted.

"Let go! I'll walk on my own!"

Though staggering from his serious injuries, Hwangbo Eom forced himself to walk away. Hyuk Sopyung bowed his head heavily before departing, while the Zhongnan disciples hurried after him.

As I watched their retreating backs, one word suddenly came to mind.

Gratitude and grudges.[1675]

One of the great gears that drove the Murim.

I did not know what consequences today's events would bring in the future. But I did not regret it. I was already at odds with the Zhongnan Sect, and ignoring an obvious scheme would have left a bad taste in my mouth.

Pests have to be exterminated before they grow any bigger.

Pest control. That was all.

Just as I reached that conclusion with a lightened heart, another thought suddenly crossed my mind.

Oh, right.

There was still one left. A pest I absolutely had to catch.

A remarkable pest, too—the kind that had swapped Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng for Hundred-Year-Old Snow Ginseng.

And I had not been the one who drew the sword to exterminate it.

Shing.

A supple flexible sword slid into view. Dagger Hidden Flower Ju Hwaran's deep-red lips parted, and a toneless voice flowed from them.

"Now there is only one last matter left. Isn't that right?"

One person was reflected in her dark, gleaming eyes.

[1674] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

[1675] Gratitude and grudges are moral debts that must be repaid.

Chapter 327

“We still have the most important matter left to discuss. Don’t you agree?”

Ju Hwaran stood with her sword lowered at her side, beautiful and cold.

A frost-sharp aura surged around her, directed at one person.

“Captain Song.”

Everyone followed Ju Hwaran’s gaze. At its end stood a man who appeared to be in his early thirties. He was fairly handsome, save for the fierce upward slant of his eyebrows.

Song Ilseom’s lips twisted, and a chilly voice emerged.

“Are you calling me?”

The people still inside the pavilion fell into exactly two groups.

The outsiders, who had no idea who Song Ilseom was, looked confused. The escorts of the Yongbong Escort Bureau had gone rigid.

Chief Escort Heo Jun was the first to step forward, faint anger showing on his face.

“You stand before the Young Bureau Head. Show some respect.”

“I’ve shown enough respect. But you people have been saying the same thing for ten years.”

“How dare you…!”

“Then let me dare to ask you this: why does the Chief Escort lecturing me about respect call the Young Bureau Head by her name in front of everyone?”

“Th-that’s…”

“You needn’t answer. I don’t care what you call the Young Bureau Head. Just don’t demand courtesy from me.”

His tone and behavior were obnoxious, but Song Ilseom did have a point.

As I watched Heo Jun struggle for words, Wolhwa whispered to me.

“Young Master Jin, do you know that man well?”

“Who? Heo Jun? Or…”

“The young, handsome one, obviously. I already know who Chief Escort Heo is.”

“Then why are you asking me? You’re the Shaanxi Branch Leader of the Lower District Sect, of all people.”

“It’s nice that you think so highly of me, but what could a Branch Leader who’s been at her post for less than half a year possibly know? A disciple from a famous major sect would be one thing, but even I can’t keep track of every ordinary escort.”

“An ordinary escort… Do you know who he is?”

“Hmm. I know that one of the Dragon-Phoenix Three Escorts is young and has a nasty temper. That’s about it.”

Song Ilseom. Position: escort captain.

That was about all I knew of him too.

But I knew one thing Wolhwa did not.

Song Ilseom's strength.

He's quite a master. Stronger than the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes.

If there was one thing I had learned from going back and forth between the Murim and the modern world, it was that Level was never an absolute measure.

Some people had high Levels but were utterly useless, while others were stronger than people above their Level.

Song Ilseom was the real deal. I could tell just from his gait and the minute movements of his hands. He was a swordsman with extensive combat experience and exceptional martial arts.

How many people his age are that strong?

He might not be a disciple of some prestigious sect, but with that much skill, his name should have spread through the Murim long ago.

The saying about a needle in a bag existed for a reason. Exceptional talent was bound to reveal itself eventually.

Yet no one knew the needle was there. Not for ten whole years.

There was only one possible answer.

The needle had deliberately kept itself hidden—and done such a thorough job that even the people of the Yongbong Escort Bureau, who had spent years with him, had no idea how strong he truly was.

Well, well…

A thought suddenly crossed my mind. I could not be certain yet, but this was clearly someone I needed to watch carefully.

I'd like to step in right now, but…

This was a knot Ju Hwaran had to untangle herself.

While I finished preparing to intervene at any moment, Heo Jun recovered from his hesitation and pressed Song Ilseom even harder.

"Captain Song. No, Song Ilseom! Enough nonsense. Confess everything!"

"I don't know what you're talking about."

"Fine. I'll ask you directly. Where did you hide the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng?"

"I know nothing about it."

"It's not too late. If you admit your crimes and tell us where the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng is, even now…"

"I said I don't know."

At Song Ilseom's answer, Heo Jun stared at him with eyes that had gone flat and cold.

"Is this really how you intend to play it?"

"I could say the same to you."

"I gave you one last chance for old times' sake… but I suppose it can't be helped."

Heo Jun raised his hand. More than twenty escorts spread out around Song Ilseom, sealing off every escape route.

The two middle-aged escort captains who appeared to be the other members of the Dragon-Phoenix Three Escorts joined Heo Jun in surrounding Song Ilseom from three sides.

The atmosphere pulled taut as a bowstring.

That was when Ju Hwaran, silent until now, abruptly spoke.

"Everyone, stand back."

"Hwaran, he won't confess willingly. We should subdue him first, then—"

"Wait, Uncle Heo. I have something to ask him."

Whoosh!

Her wrist turned. The flat of her flexible sword, curving like a snake, struck one of the bamboo slips piled on the table and sent it flying toward Song Ilseom.

"What is this?"

"There are quite a few interesting records here."

Song Ilseom checked what was written on the bamboo slip and muttered.

"This is…"

"That's right. Records of the escort missions you were responsible for over the past two years."

"You've collected only the failures."

"Why do you think the Lower District Sect and the Beggars' Sect gathered this information?"

"They must have suspected a connection to the Zhongnan Sect."

"You were responsible for fifteen escort missions over the past two years. Ten of them failed, and every failure forced the Yongbong Escort Bureau to pay a substantial contractual penalty."

Ten failures out of fifteen. His success rate was below fifty percent.

At that point, even Song Ilseom's parents would have suspected him, never mind the Beggars' Sect or the Lower District Sect.

Ju Hwaran continued calmly.

"That isn't all. The missions on which you served as assistant escort captain contain a remarkable number of suspicious details."

"I did my best every time, but I failed. That is the only answer I can give the Young Bureau Head."

"That isn't enough."

Whoosh! Clatter!

The flexible sword swept out again. More than twenty bamboo slips caught in its sword wind, sailed through the air, and scattered at Song Ilseom's feet.

"Are these all records connected to me? There certainly are a lot."

Clicking his tongue, he propped his sword beside him and began picking up the bamboo slips one by one to read.

"That bastard…"

Chief Escort Heo Jun looked ready to charge at the traitor then and there, but at a glance from Ju Hwaran, he had no choice but to let his sword droop.

They did not have to wait long.

"So that's how it was."

Song Ilseom set down the final bamboo slip and arched his fierce eyebrows.

"How did you know?"

"You were clever. Clever enough that each incident could be dismissed as a simple mistake."

"You figured it out from this alone? You're sharper than I expected. I thought you were merely a child, but… I underestimated you."

"That is truly unfortunate."

"What is?"

"Though not a single drop of blood connects us, I thought of you as family."

"Family? What weak-minded nonsense. Time changes even mountains and rivers. How could people be any different?"

At some point, Song Ilseom had gone from formal courtesy to openly talking down to her. Yet somehow, the change felt as natural as flowing water.

Like a man finally shedding a stifling set of clothes, he asked with an air of relief, "So what will you do now?"

"Punish the criminal."

"Children resemble their parents. But can the daughter of Junzi Sword[1676] truly do it?"

Ju Hwaran answered coldly.

"It is something I have to do, and I will do it."

Hissssss!

Her flexible sword, charged with internal energy, rose stiffly into the air. Ju Hwaran's hardened face was reflected in the transparent blade.

Her voice came low.

"No matter who it may be."

Whoosh!

[1676] Junzi is the Confucian ideal of a morally upright gentleman.

She moved without warning, faster than anyone else in the Yongbong Escort Bureau.

Ju Hwaran might have only just entered the Peak realm, but she was still a Peak master. The essence of speed permeated both her sword arts and her movement technique.

Thrust!

The flexible sword streaked through the air like a ray of light and pierced its target precisely.

A wet sound rang out as it pierced flesh. Blood spurted into the air, followed by a scream from a single man.

“Gaaah!”

Ju Hwaran’s eyelids trembled as she watched him sink to his knees, scattering blood.

What followed was a question for one man.

A condemnation of the person she had never once doubted.

“Why did you make that choice, Uncle Heo?”

“H-Hwaran.”

The man raised his head.

Chief Escort Heo Jun’s face was deathly pale.

Whoosh!

Heo Jun’s hair stood on end, and a chill ran down his spine. But by the time he registered the faint sound of something cutting through the air, it was already too late.

Thud!

The blade piercing his flesh was cold as ice. The pain that followed burned like fire.

Chief Escort Heo Jun dropped to his knees with a scream.

Even then, only one thought circled through his blank, bleached-white mind.

It’s all gone wrong.

The unexpected appearance of Jin Taekyung had overturned the entire situation, but that had not necessarily been bad for Heo Jun.

Over the past two years, he had secretly skimmed off several thousand silver nyang[1677] by disguising his thefts as mistakes—sometimes small, sometimes audacious.

[1677] A nyang is a traditional unit of currency; here, the amount is denominated in silver.

He had already amassed an enormous fortune. If this incident led to the Yongbong Escort Bureau's revival, his authority as Chief Escort would only grow.

Best of all, he could escape the guilt of betraying those who trusted him.

Two birds with one stone.

But then…

Why now, of all times?!

If he cut Song Ilseom's throat, everything would be over.

Song Ilseom would have died branded as a traitor who had betrayed the Yongbong Escort Bureau and colluded with the Zhongnan Sect. The whole matter could have ended quietly, without any further trouble.

I even hid my identity so thoroughly from the Zhongnan Sect, just in case. How did they figure it out?

Pain.

And shock even greater than the pain froze Heo Jun where he knelt.

A low voice pierced his ears.

"Why did you make that choice, Uncle Heo?"

Heo Jun's bowed body trembled.

He knew that voice. How could he not?

It belonged to the girl he had watched over since she was a newborn.

She had been his sworn brother's treasured jewel, the one and only niece he had once regarded as more his own child than his biological children.

And…

She was also the person who had driven a sword through his shoulder.

"H-Hwaran."

Heo Jun slowly raised his head and met Ju Hwaran's downward gaze.

Unlike her calm voice, her eyes trembled with emotion. At the sight of them, a feeling he had momentarily forgotten reared its head.

Hope.

I can survive.

Heo Jun recognized the turmoil in Ju Hwaran's eyes at once.

She was torn between affection and betrayal. That was his only remaining escape.

"I was wrong. It was all my fault!"

"Uncle."

"Spare me. Please, I'm begging you!"

Heo Jun cried out desperately, heedless of the stunned escorts or the other people watching a trusted superior expose his betrayal.

His dignity? Their contempt?

A dead man could feel neither.

He would do anything if it meant surviving this place and seeing tomorrow's sun.

"Urgh. Hwaran…"

Heo Jun groaned in pain. Ju Hwaran's flexible sword had passed straight through his right shoulder, and the hand gripping its hilt trembled faintly.

"Then at least make an excuse. Tell me why you did it. Why you had no other choice."

If excuses would have raised his chances of survival even slightly, Heo Jun would already have offered every one he could invent.

But he knew Ju Hwaran too well. The fact that she had swung her sword meant she was already certain. A clumsy excuse now would only hasten his death.

He had to beg without reservation and appeal subtly to her emotions.

"It was all this foolish uncle's fault. I have nothing else to say."

Heo Jun let his head droop and reddened his eyes.

The effect was immediate. He felt the strength behind her sword weaken and continued.

"I am ashamed to admit that I once accepted a bribe. Then, after my hyung[1678] suddenly collapsed, the Zhongnan Sect used it as leverage to approach me, and I… I was afraid I would be cast out. I didn't want to leave the Escort Bureau I had devoted my entire life to, and I trusted the Zhongnan Sect when they promised they wouldn't hurt you."

"…"

"I intended to cooperate only once—just once—but by then, I had already stepped into a swamp I could never escape."

"Is all of that true?"

"How could I lie to you?"

Despite his claim, Heo Jun's entire story contained only one truth.

He had accepted a bribe.

He had been the one to approach the Zhongnan Sect after Junzi Sword collapsed, concealing his identity as he did so. Their secret relationship had continued for two years.

I only have to get through this moment. Just this moment!

Tears streamed down his face. They held no remorse—only terror of death and a desperate desire to survive.

"Please forgive me…!"

The onlookers shook their heads at his desperate plea. More than a few escorts turned away, unable to bear the sight.

Ju Hwaran did not.

[1678] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or a close older man. Heo Jun uses it for his sworn brother, Ju Hogun.

She stared at Heo Jun, biting her lip, then abruptly asked, “How did you steal the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng? I never let it out of my sight for even a moment.”

“Th-that…”

“Tell me the truth.”

“…I mixed a mind-clouding drug into the food. Everyone was exhausted, so a small dose was enough.”

The mind-clouding drug was a narcotic that clouded the mind and induced sleep. Its effects had been undeniable.

Even Ju Hwaran, a Peak master, had fallen into a deep sleep, mistaking the drug’s effects for the exhaustion of the journey.

“So that was why you were outside my room that night.”

“I had to conceal my presence even as I left. That bastard—no, Captain Song—remained awake until dawn despite taking the drug.”

Song Ilseom, leaning against the wall with his arms folded, muttered expressionlessly.

“So that was a mind-clouding drug. No wonder I felt unusually tired that day. Use something better next time—assuming you have a next time.”

What a goddamn bastard.

Heo Jun barely swallowed the curse rising to his lips and looked at Ju Hwaran.

“Hwangbo Eom, that old man, threatened me. He said that unless I switched the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng, he would kill me and my family and wipe out the Yongbong Escort Bureau. I only wanted to protect everyone!”

“Then you made the wrong choice.”

“You’re right. I even went to my hyung’s[1679] sickbed once and confessed everything in tears. But… but I couldn’t undo my mistake.”

“Your mistake?”

Ju Hwaran’s eyes trembled at the mention of her father, but only for an instant.

Then she gave a small shake of her head.

“No. You’re wrong. It wasn’t a mistake. It was a choice, Uncle.”

“Hwaran…!”

“My father often told me that every choice carries responsibility. Though he failed to make the family business he inherited prosper, he never once regretted the choices he made.”

Heo Jun suddenly realized that the conflict and uncertainty he had seen in Ju Hwaran’s eyes were fading.

It can’t be.

No.

[1679] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or a close older man. Heo Jun uses it for his sworn brother, Ju Hogun.

It could not be.

This could not be happening!

Tears and cold sweat streamed down Heo Jun’s cheeks.

He desperately raised his voice.

“Give me one chance! Just one last chance! I’m your father’s one and only sworn younger brother, and your uncle, aren’t I? Hwaran, for the sake of the bond we’ve shared, please!”

“The bond we’ve shared, you say?”

“Yes! I shared thirty years of hardship and joy with my hyung.[1680] If your father were here—if it were him—he would not take my life so easily!”

“Uncle Heo. No—Chief Escort Heo Jun.”

Heo Jun stopped pounding his head against the floor and looked up blankly.

His niece’s eyes met his.

They were eyes he had never seen before—cold and utterly devoid of hesitation.

“You’re right. If my father were here, he would have forgiven you. But…”

Her low voice continued toward the frozen Heo Jun.

“I am not Junzi Sword Ju Hogun. I am Dagger Hidden Flower Ju Hwaran.”

The next instant, silver sword light filled Heo Jun’s vision.

Swish! Slice!

[1680] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or a close older man. Heo Jun uses it for his sworn brother, Ju Hogun.

Chapter 328

"Guh… ghk."

Blood gushed from Heo Jun's slashed throat.

He thrashed and clutched at his neck, but it was already too late.

Ju Hwaran's single sword strike had been fast and precise. It had accomplished its purpose without a single mistake.

"Grrk…"

It was the death rattle of a dying man.

What had he wanted to say? This is unfair? Spare me? Or perhaps, I'll curse you even in death?

Heo Jun's lips, which had been opening and closing as blood rattled in his throat, suddenly froze.

The strength drained from his flailing limbs. His eyes, fixed on Ju Hwaran and clouded with countless emotions, lost their light.

Haaa…

His final breath in this world dispersed into the air.

Heo Jun—the sworn brother of Junzi[1681] Sword Ju Hogun and the Chief Escort who had served the Yongbong Escort Bureau for thirty years—died just like that.

At the hands of the niece who had once followed him as though he were family.

"…Uncle Heo."

The words slipped quietly from Ju Hwaran's lips. From behind, she looked strangely desolate.

She gazed down at Heo Jun's lifeless body for a moment, then slowly turned around.

Her obsidian eyes passed over the escorts of the Yongbong Escort Bureau and settled on the outsiders.

One person at a time. Finally, she looked at me, then offered everyone a formal martial salute.

"I, Ju Hwaran, Young Bureau Head of the Yongbong Escort Bureau, have been discourteous before my seniors in the martial world."

Pain often made people mature. I hoped this ordeal had helped her grow.

It's a relief that she seems calmer than I expected, but…

There was an awkward edge to the air.

Just as I was thinking that, something pressed down hard on my foot.

I looked down and saw an ornate danghye.[1682]

[1681] Junzi is the Confucian ideal of a morally upright gentleman.

[1682] Danghye are traditional Korean women's shoes, often decorated with embroidery.

As far as I knew, there was only one person here who would wear something like that.

When I gave her a questioning look, Wolhwa glanced pointedly to either side.

Only then did I notice everyone staring at me.

At some point, they had all split off to either side and were now looking straight at me.

At the end of the path they had opened stood Ju Hwaran, still holding her salute.

…What is this?

Was there something on my face?

As I stood there flustered, Wolhwa whispered so softly that I could barely hear her.

"Young Master Jin, say something."

"Pardon?"

"Young Lady Ju greeted us. You need to respond on everyone's behalf."

"Why do I have to do it?"

"Hurry. Young Lady Ju will grow old waiting."

"…"

Well, she had aged about ten seconds in the meantime.

I had no idea why I had to speak when Huashan's leading candidate for Sect Leader, the Beggar Prince, and the Lower District Sect's Shaanxi Branch Leader were all standing right there, but I gave an awkward bow anyway.

"There's no need to call it discourteous. And I'm not a senior in the martial world, so you can treat me casually."

"How could I do that?"

Ju Hwaran raised her head and spoke calmly.

"Great Hero Jin and the other seniors are Benefactors of the Yongbong Escort Bureau. Without your help, we would have suffered a terrible ordeal… and we would never have been able to punish the traitor."

A trace of bitterness crossed her face as she added those final words.

Perhaps she noticed it herself, because her voice grew firmer.

"I will repay the debt we owe you today without fail."

I couldn't exactly claim it had been nothing. The help provided by me and the other sects had certainly been substantial. From the perspective of Ju Hwaran and the Yongbong Escort Bureau, even a hundred bows wouldn't have been enough.

Still, being called Great Hero is a little much.

Even Young Hero made me cringe, and now the title had evolved to the next stage.

Feeling as though I ought to grow a beard, I changed the subject.

"Repay the others, not me. More importantly, what are you going to do now?"

"We'll recover the body first and return to the bureau. There's a lot to take care of."

"You must be incredibly busy."

Ju Hwaran was managing the bureau in place of her unconscious father.

Dealing with the aftermath of the long escort mission alone would fill her days, and after one outrageous incident after another, even ten bodies wouldn't be enough to handle everything.

Ju Hwaran nodded.

"Even so, we have enough time to host Great Hero Jin and his companions."

"You have enough time? That's a relief… Huh?"

"You and your companions are Benefactors who saved me and everyone under my care. I cannot send you away without offering you proper hospitality."

"Um, Young Lady Ju, the thing is…"

"Are you perhaps very busy?"

I was busy. Extremely busy.

Jeok Cheongang had a treatment window of six months at minimum and eight at most.

Within that time, I had to scour the vast land of Sichuan for the mysterious person known as the Divine Physician.

It took us a week to get from Henan to Shaanxi. Reaching Sichuan will take at least another week, no matter how fast we travel.

And that was assuming I used my movement technique to the fullest.

Everything about the Divine Physician was shrouded in mystery. No one could predict how long it would take to find him.

That was why spending even a single day in Xi'an had already made me anxious.

And it's already late in the day.

The sun had passed its zenith long ago. Our entanglement with the Zhongnan Sect had cost us a considerable amount of time, so I needed to start running as though my feet were on fire.

And yet…

"No, I'm not busy."

My mouth opened of its own accord, and that ridiculous answer slipped out.

What had just happened? That was the exact opposite of what I had meant to say.

As I stood there dazed, Ju Hwaran cautiously asked,

"Great Hero Jin, are you really all right? If you have something urgent to attend to, we can postpone it until later."

Thank you. Thank you so much for saying that first.

Sharp and perceptive as ever. She had scratched exactly where it itched, and I answered without hesitation.

"No matter how urgent it is, can't I share one meal with you?"

"Right…"

"I was already hungry after exerting myself so much. This works out perfectly. Let's go."

Am I a fucking idiot? Seriously?

I needed to go to Sichuan. Why the hell was I going to the Yongbong Escort Bureau?

But by the time I came to my senses, I had already hoisted the pack frame onto my back.

Just as I heaved an inward sigh, I noticed someone who had remained completely detached from everything going on around him.

When I stared at him, he spoke first.

"What? Do you have something to say?"

This was the first time casual speech from someone I had just met sounded so natural.

Since he had dropped the formalities first, that made things easier for me too.

"I was just wondering if you weren't coming."

"I have no reason to."

"Then make one."

"…?"

"I know you have plenty of time to spare, so let's have a conversation."

"A conversation?"

"Yeah. A conversation."

Song Ilseom raised an eyebrow at me, then pushed himself upright from where he had been leaning.

It was early spring. The blazing sun disappeared behind the western mountains less than two shichen[1683] after we arrived at the Yongbong Escort Bureau.

Oil lamps illuminated the reception room, where a magnificent feast had been laid out across the table. Cheongpung and Gung Gibang stared wide-eyed as they crammed food into their mouths.

"Mmph. Benefactor. This is delicious. Mmph-mmph-mmph."

"…Eat as much as you want. Preferably don't talk."

The food did look delicious.

At least until Cheongpung went out of his way to show me what was in his mouth.

[1683] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours (120 minutes).

“Gobble, gobble. This Escort Bureau sure knows how to cook. Young Bureau Head, could you give the extra food to the members of our sect as well?”

Gung Gibang really was a beggar to the bone.

As he continued his meat-centered massacre, Ju Hwaran nodded.

“Of course. Tell them they can come whenever they’re hungry.”

“Oh, whenever they’re hungry?”

“…Not quite that much.”

If every Beggars’ Sect disciple in Shaanxi Province descended on the place, all four hundred thousand silver nyang[1684] of the compensation would disappear into food costs.

Gung Gibang grinned, baring his yellow teeth.

“Don’t worry. I’ll make sure to explain it so you have nothing to worry about.”

Hyuk Mujin, who was at least eating normally, whispered,

“The way he says that makes me even more worried.”

“You said it.”

At this rate, the Yongbong Escort Bureau might go under because of the Beggars’ Sect instead of the Zhongnan Sect.

I was resolving to give him a warning when Ju Hwaran spoke to me.

“It’s a shame the others didn’t come.”

“Yeah. The food is good, too.”

The others in our group—Baek Museong, Heukgeol Beggar, and Wolhwa—had all declined the invitation.

I wasn’t sure why, but the two men might have changed their answers after Wolhwa gave them a long, pointed stare.

In any case…

“For someone who likes the food, you aren’t eating very much.”

“No, it’s delicious. Look. I’ve already finished two bowls of rice.”

“That’s strange. Why does it seem as though you’ve barely eaten?”

“It’s all relative. Look at them. They’re waging the Great Faction War against the food.”

Schlurp, schlurp!

Gobble, gobble!

Chomp, chomp, chomp!

Ju Hwaran nodded as though she had attained enlightenment.

“Ah.”

“Mujin and I are the normal ones. The person who’s actually eating very little is over there.”

[1684] A silver nyang is a historical silver currency unit; it is not Korean won.

Song Ilseom replied in his usual blunt tone.

“I’ve been saying this for ten years, but the food here is too salty. Spicy and salty dishes overstimulate the senses and weigh down the body.”

“That reminds me of someone. If she were here, she’d beat you to death with a ladle.”

“Who are you talking about?”

“Someone I know. One hit from her and you’ll scream whether you mean to or not. She’s beaten the hell out of me over the years, and strangely enough, I’ve never managed to dodge her once.”

“Great Hero Jin, is that true?”

“You?”

Ju Hwaran asked back in surprise, and Song Ilseom’s eyes flashed.

“If even you, the man who defeated the Taeeul Merciless Sword, say so… she must be an extraordinary master indeed. Can you tell me her name and epithet?”

“Kim Jeonghee. Her epithet is Lady.”

“Hmm. I’ve never heard of her.”

Of course he hadn’t. She was my mother.

Without showing anything on my face, I continued in a solemn tone.

“In any case, she always said you had to eat all kinds of food without being picky if you wanted to grow big—no, strong.”

“Hmm.”

“So stop whining about the side dishes and fucking eat.”

Song Ilseom pondered this with a serious expression, then picked up his chopsticks and began eating the side dishes.

The more I watched him, the stranger his personality seemed.

He’s strange, but he doesn’t seem dangerous.

A few shichen[1685] earlier, I had briefly suspected Song Ilseom of being something very bad indeed.

It had been a reasonable suspicion. He was an exceptional Peak master who had concealed his strength for ten years, and I had already encountered a similar case in Shanxi Province.

Dark Heaven.

The Head Elder and the Five Gates of Shanxi had lain low for decades. Perhaps that was why Song Ilseom’s behavior had reminded me of them.

But the longer I spoke with him, the more my suspicion faded, leaving only curiosity behind.

What the hell is this guy?

[1685] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours (120 minutes).

His blunt manner of speaking and behavior. He seemed rough to the point of being crude, yet there was a peculiar air of refinement in his appearance and various other aspects of him.

Perhaps that was why his casual speech sounded so natural.

Well, this is something.

I stared at Song Ilseom.

He chewed the side dishes thoroughly, his face twisted into an exaggerated grimace. After swallowing, he spoke.

“That look again. What is it?”

“I was just thinking about your identity.”

“Are you that curious?”

“Yeah. Very.”

Talking with this guy was like driving down a wide-open highway. That was why it felt so comfortable.

Before long, everyone else—including Ju Hwaran—had pricked up their ears and fixed their eyes on Song Ilseom’s mouth.

Apparently displeased by the attention, he raised an eyebrow.

“There’s nothing special about it. I stayed at the Yongbong Escort Bureau because of a connection to the previous generation.”

“A connection to the previous generation?”

“To be precise, my father received a great kindness from them.”

Huh? Wait a second. That sounded familiar, but I couldn’t quite place it.

I turned and found Ju Hwaran staring wide-eyed at Song Ilseom.

This was clearly the first time she had heard the story in ten years.

“May I ask your father’s name?”

“Song Pyosan.”

“Song Pyosan… I’ve never heard that name.”

“That’s hardly surprising. It happened almost fifty years ago.”

Almost fifty years ago? Was he talking about the Great Faction War?

Before we could ask, Song Ilseom continued as though it were nothing important.

“The Guangdong Chen Family was a clan forgotten long ago. My grandmother was saved with the help of Escort King Ju Gongsan, but she feared the greedy martial artists and had her child carry on her surname. It was a wise decision.”

I felt completely blindsided. Ju Hwaran stared at Song Ilseom with trembling eyes.

“Then could you be…?”

Instead of answering, Song Ilseom drew a faded jade hairpin from his robes and held it out.

It was the only escort fee a young escort surnamed Ju had received from a heavily pregnant woman more than fifty years ago.

Chapter 329

When Song Ilseom's identity was revealed, everyone was astonished.

Hyuk Mujin had admired the Murim even before becoming part of the Taiyuan Jin Family, so of course he knew the stories about him. Even Cheongpung pretended to know him, claiming that the Sword Saint had told him about Song Ilseom.

"Mmph-mmph. Grandpa said the Escort King was a good man. Gulp. That's what he said."

"…I know. Just swallow before you talk. Please."

"Okay! Mmph-mmph."

If even Cheongpung knew the story, the other two went without saying.

Ju Hwaran, the Escort King's granddaughter, was staring at the jade hairpin with trembling eyes, while Gung Gibang was so excited that he sprayed the contents of his mouth in every direction.

"Th-the Guangdong Chen Family!"

Tududududuk!

Song Ilseom knocked away a dozen or so grains of rice with his chopsticks and replied.

"As I said, the Guangdong Chen Family ceased to exist long ago. By the way, can you do something about all that flying out of your mouth?"

"My Master also told me about the Escort King's Ten-Thousand-Mile Escorts. But to think the child from that story was you!"

"Did you listen with your nose? That child was my father. And stop spitting everywhere. It's disgusting."

Swish! Tududududuk!

Wow. He knocked away every single one.

After whipping his chopsticks through the air like lightning yet again, Song Ilseom asked me, "Is this beggar really the Successor Beggar of the Beggars' Sect?"

"He is, even if he doesn't look like it. Why?"

"A Rain of Ten Thousand Flowers keeps pouring from his mouth. I wondered if he might be a disciple of the Sichuan Tang Clan."

"Hmm. Probably not."

While we were talking, Ju Hwaran finally spoke, her gaze still fixed on the jade hairpin.

"My father told me about it. He said my grandfather wondered what had become of the Guangdong Chen Family until the very end, but he was never able to find them…"

"My grandmother carried that regret with her as well. She had to flee with my father, who was still a baby, without leaving so much as a letter."

"Why did they suddenly disappear?"

"Because it was dangerous. The Guangdong Chen Family's martial arts were all lost when the family estate burned to the ground, but apparently no one believed it."

"But if they were within the territory of the orthodox factions…"

"Greed does not discriminate between members of orthodox factions and practitioners of demonic, heterodox arts. Some of those seeking the Guangdong Chen Family's Peak martial arts were people even the Escort King's name couldn't deter."

A time of chaos.

Those words gave me some idea of what the mother and child must have endured back then.

In chaotic times, the rules binding people together crumble. Everyone gives in to their instincts, and morality inevitably fades.

The mother had fled to protect her child from the greed of others, without telling anyone.

"My grandmother was an ordinary woman who couldn't have stood against even a Third Rate swordsman, but she was wiser than ten Peak masters combined."

After a brief silence, Song Ilseom added, "Of course, even she couldn't escape birth, aging, sickness, and death."

"Then…"

"She died of an illness when I was ten. As she gave me this jade hairpin, she told me everything that had happened. It was an astonishing story—the first I had ever heard of it."

Despite his blunt demeanor, Song Ilseom was surprisingly good at telling a story.

The one thing I had been curious about was what had happened to his parents. But once I heard that he had wandered the streets after his grandmother's death, there was no need to ask.

Unfortunately, both of them had clearly died young.

As soon as one question disappeared, another took its place.

"Then how did you develop that level of skill? Didn't you say the Guangdong Chen Family's martial arts were lost as well?"

Song Ilseom's answer was simple.

"On the battlefield."

"Did you live as a wandering martial artist?"

"I had no talent for begging. More people beat me because they disliked my face and expression than tossed me an iron coin."

Gung Gibang, who had been listening quietly, nodded with deep sympathy.

“There’s a proper way to beg. The most important thing for a beggar is a face and expression that inspire pity, but when you’re as handsome as Song Ilseom or me, even earning a few coins is difficult. I went hungry plenty of days myself.”

Song Ilseom’s expression hardened.

“Successor Beggar, I find that remark deeply offensive. I’d appreciate it if you stopped insulting me.”

“Why? Did you ever see my face when I was young? I’m telling you, without the slightest exaggeration, I was handsome enough to make Song Yu weep.”[1686]

“Song Yu would weep?”

Song Ilseom stared intently at Gung Gibang’s face, which looked like something out of a Picasso masterpiece.

“With that face, he might. If you run into me at night, stay far away. If I suddenly came face-to-face with you, I might cut you by mistake.”

Looking as though he was debating whether to cut him down right then and there, Song Ilseom continued his story.

“In any case, I was hopeless at begging and couldn’t find any decent work. After going hungry for more than three days, the sky started turning yellow. I decided becoming a sword boy would be better than starving to death.”

“A sword boy? The kind who carries someone’s sword?”

“That’s right.”

“Isn’t that something rich people hire? They can’t be bothered carrying their own swords, so they make someone else do it.”

“Do you think rich people would hire some beggar brat who crawled in from who knows where?”

“Fair point.”

“Surprisingly, wandering martial artists hire the most sword boys. They make them handle every odd job imaginable, then use them as meat shields when things get dangerous.”

I thought it sounded like a sweet gig, but it turned out to be a part-time job straight out of the Hell Continent.[1687]

“It wasn’t a particularly comfortable or pleasant experience.”

Song Ilseom calmly recounted his past.

Most days, he waited on wandering martial artists while enduring constant abuse and violence. When arrows rained down, he went out to retrieve weapons.

When the wandering martial artist abandoned him and fled because he was too busy saving his own life, Song Ilseom experienced nothing short of hell.

[1686] Song Yu was an ancient Chinese poet celebrated for his beauty.

[1687] “Hell Continent” echoes a Korean expression for harsh living and working conditions in modern South Korea.

“I hid among piles of corpses for four days. When I barely made it out alive and went looking for the wandering martial artist, the first thing he did was search for the sword he had entrusted to me.”

“Wow. What a crazy bastard.”

“Fortunately, the two swords I was carrying were unharmed. Even while fleeing, I refused to let go of them.”

“…Wow. You really are a crazy bastard.”

“I wasn’t as crazy as he was. He started spouting nonsense about how he had originally entrusted me with three swords, then told me to get the hell out of there if I didn’t want to die like a dog. Of course, he didn’t give me a single coin for the year I had worked for him.”

Song Ilseom brushed back the hair that had fallen over his forehead and muttered, “That pissed me off.”

Naturally, instead of filing a complaint with the labor authorities, he chose a faster solution.

“There happened to be two swords. I picked one up. It was heavy.”

“You won.”

“I killed him.”

Song Ilseom casually corrected me as he twirled his chopsticks.

“It wasn’t difficult. I’d watched his martial arts every day, and they were predictable. I dodged ten times and stabbed once, as if we’d rehearsed the whole exchange. Then he fell.”

Gulp.

Hyuk Mujin swallowed nervously and asked,

“How old were you then?”

“Twelve? Thirteen? I don’t remember exactly, but it was around then.”

“Th-then your opponent…”

“He was a lousy Third Rate wandering martial artist. If he’d been First Rate, do you think I’d have been crazy enough to take him on?”

No, I think a kid who hadn’t even graduated from elementary school attacking a martial artist was already insane.

What was I doing at that age?

Who knew? I was probably running around picking my nose or something.

This guy’s a gifted bastard too.

Countless martial sects and families existed throughout the world.

If the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families were the first tier, there naturally had to be a second tier.

According to something Jeok Cheongang had mentioned in passing, the Guangdong Chen Family had belonged to that second tier.

Blood will tell, huh?

To reach that level without any of his family's secret martial arts…

Just as I was marveling at the thought that Song Ilseom really was something special, Gung Gibang, who had been silent for a while, suddenly stared at him in shock.

"Could you be the Soul-Chasing Guest?"

"That's what they called me ten years ago. By the way, is your mouth a bottomless jar? How the hell are you still spitting out rice after all this time?"

"Hah. I never imagined the famous Soul-Chasing Guest would be a young man around my age."

The Soul-Chasing Guest. That was apparently Song Ilseom's former epithet.

He must have been almost as famous as he was skilled, because Ju Hwaran's eyes widened as well.

"You're the Soul-Chasing Guest who won a hundred life-and-death duels?"

"One hundred and two, to be exact. It's all hollow fame, so there's no need to make a fuss. There are already two people here younger and more impressive than me."

Cheongpung, who had somehow finished off most of the food, grinned.

"No, you're still amazing, Young Hero Song."

I nodded.

"Yeah, he's strong. Weaker than me, though."

"…Are you two making fun of me?"

Cheongpung slurped down something that looked like cinnamon punch and answered, "No teasin' you!"

"He says he isn't teasing you."

At my helpful translation, Song Ilseom's gaze shifted toward me.

"What about you?"

"I am teasing you."

"…Got any booze? I feel like having a drink for the first time in a while."

The meal, which had begun in the early evening, didn't end until close to midnight.

Ignoring the fine liquor, Song Ilseom had downed cup after cup of strong liquor and now had his head planted on the table. Ju Hwaran, who had been sipping hers, had flushed cheeks as well.

And then…

It really is time to go.

When I rose, Gung Gibang used his internal energy to purge the alcohol from his body, while Hyuk Mujin hoisted Cheongpung onto his back. Cheongpung was already completely wasted and snoring softly.

“We’ve imposed on you, Young Lady Ju.”

“You’re leaving already?”

“I’d like to stay longer, but I don’t think I can this time.”

“Is that so?”

Her drunken eyes curved like half-moons.

Her steps were light, almost as if she were dancing, and deep dimples showed in her cheeks. Apparently, drinking made her laugh.

“Would you like to take a walk?”

“Pardon?”

“Let’s go for a walk. The flowers in the garden have just bloomed.”

“Oh. Congratulations. They must be pretty.”

She burst out laughing.

Before I could ask what was so funny, Ju Hwaran giggled and stepped outside.

I followed her without thinking, then stopped short and turned around.

“You two aren’t coming?”

“…Is he even human?”

“Lower than a beggar. Beggarly bastard. Worse than a beggar.”

“What the hell? Why are you looking at me like that?”

“It’s how I feel.”

“That’s how I feel.”

“Come on. Young Lady Ju said the flowers have bloomed in the garden. We can look around together and leave right afterward. The timing will be perfect—”

The sighs of Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin cut me off.

The two men shook their heads with expressions of utter horror, then spoke in turn.

“I need to take a dump. Where’s the latrine?”

“Me too. We’ll take turns going back and forth, so take your time looking around.”

“…Uh. Sure.”

What’s wrong with those two? Do their stomachs hurt that badly? Their faces look downright demonic today.

I must be imagining the contempt and fury in their eyes.

I hurried outside and began walking through the garden beside Ju Hwaran, who was waiting for me.

“Great Hero Jin is… how should I put it? You’re a very interesting person.”

“Am I?”

"Yes. You can be a little exasperating sometimes, but… well, in a way, that's one of your strengths too."

"…?"

What is this? Is she insulting me indirectly?

At my bewildered expression, the smile on Ju Hwaran's lips deepened.

"I don't remember the last time I laughed out loud. It must have been more than half a year ago."

"Hmm? Didn't you laugh last time too? When we passed Black Stone Mountain?"

"Oh. Did I?"

"Maybe you just don't remember. That makes twice in three days."

"I wonder. Is that really it?"

Ju Hwaran murmured dreamily, then suddenly pointed at the sky.

"Great Hero Jin, do you see that?"

"Of course. It's a full moon."

"The moon is especially bright tonight."

"Did you know why the moon is bright, Young Lady Ju? It's because it reflects light from the sun."

"Pardon?"

"No, I'm serious. It's not some ridiculous story. It's a famous result of scientific research… No, I heard it from a scholar. Where was it? That's right, somewhere around the imperial palace."

Another quiet laugh slipped from her lips.

"No, it really is true…"

"All right. I'll believe you. By the way, Great Hero Jin."

"Yes?"

"This."

To me, still feeling wronged, Ju Hwaran suddenly held something out.

A solid, elongated wooden case. One I had already seen at the teahouse.

"Could this be…?"

"That's right. Hundred-Year-Old Snow Ginseng."

"…"

"It's a small gift compared to what you've done for us, but would you accept it? It would put my heart at ease, at least a little."

I silently looked back and forth between Ju Hwaran and the wooden case.

Should I refuse? Should I accept it? Should I refuse…

After several rounds of agonizing, I finally nodded.

"I'll accept it gratefully. Thank you."

Ju Hwaran beamed.

Her smile was brighter than the moon hanging in the sky.

We walked for about fifteen minutes, chatting about nothing in particular, until the flowers lining both sides of the path gradually began to thin.

Ju Hwaran's steps slowed as well.

"Great Hero Jin."

"Yes, Young Lady Ju?"

"Do you think I can do well?"

Her sudden voice sounded raw and desolate.

Perhaps this was why she had drunk.

But there were days like that. Days when nothing could hold your emotions back. Moments when everything you had struggled to suppress finally surged over the brim.

"Do you really think I can do well?"

I spoke.

"It's okay if you can't."

"…"

It's okay. I understand how you feel. Stay strong.

Sometimes, every word of comfort sounded hollow. Of course she wasn't okay. Someone standing a step removed could never fully understand what the person suffering was going through, and being told to stay strong didn't suddenly give you strength.

I didn't offer Ju Hwaran some clumsy consolation today because she was already suffering enough.

"You're only human too, Young Lady Ju. It's okay if you don't do well. You don't have to force yourself to be strong."

She only had to keep going as she had, following the current wherever it carried her.

One step at a time, at her own pace rather than someone else's.

"Wouldn't that be enough?"

Ju Hwaran looked up at me, tears clinging to her eyes.

Then they curved like half-moons.

Thump!

I kicked off the ground.

The scenery receded, and the earth blurred past beneath me.

The voices of Ju Hwaran and the people of the Yongbong Escort Bureau gradually faded before cutting off entirely.

Only then did the two guys who had been watching me warily speak.
“Young Lady Ju’s eyes looked swollen earlier…”
“Do you think she cried? No. No way. She couldn’t have.”
They noticed that carefully even in the dark.
When I didn’t answer, Hyuk Mujin pointed at the bulge beneath my clothes.
“But what’s that?”
“Oh, this?”
I forgot to put it in my Inventory.
I let out a quiet laugh as someone’s lie came to mind.
“Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng.”
“Whaaat?”
“Huh?”

Chapter 330

Around midnight.

The four figures leaving the Yongbong Escort Bureau vanished in the blink of an eye.

The members of the bureau who had come to see them off shivered in the cold wind, but Ju Hwaran stood perfectly still.

As if someone might return if she waited just a little longer.

It was then that she heard a voice from the darkness.

“They’re gone.”

Startled by the voice’s soundless arrival, the escorts parted to either side. Ju Hwaran, however, remained composed.

“Yes. They’ve left.”

“Are you disappointed?”

“I’d be lying if I said I wasn’t.”

“It can’t be helped. Those who leave, leave. Those who stay, stay. That’s the way of things.”

“The way of things…”

Ju Hwaran murmured the words, then slowly turned around.

“Which are you, Captain Song?”

“Me?”

Song Ilseom gave a quiet laugh and conspicuously swung the travel pack slung over his shoulder.

“Which do you think?”

“Is that why you pretended to pass out drunk?”

“It’s been ten years. I’d say I’ve done my duty by now…but is that still not enough?”

“No.”

“…!”

“It isn’t enough. You still haven’t done your duty.”

Song Ilseom’s brow furrowed at Ju Hwaran’s unhesitating answer.

“Still not enough? Even after I protected the Yongbong Escort Bureau—and you—for ten years?”

“Can that compare to the debt of gratitude owed for my grandfather’s lifesaving deed?”

“You…!”

Song Ilseom raised his voice and stepped forward. The nearby escorts flinched and gripped their sword hilts.

They had not heard the hidden truth of his origins. To them, Song Ilseom was still someone to be wary of. The other two escort captains who made up the Dragon-Phoenix Three Escorts with him were openly hostile.

"Lower your voice. It'll be better for your health."

"We don't know what the Young Bureau Head thinks, but we're not convinced. No matter how we look at it, there's something suspicious about you."

The two escort captains blocked Song Ilseom's path with grim expressions.

"Enough. Step aside."

At Ju Hwaran's calm voice, the two escort captains stammered.

"Y-Young Bureau Head."

"But this man hasn't completely cleared himself of suspicion yet—!"

"I said step aside. I have something important to discuss with him. Everyone return to your posts and take care of the remaining work."

"Hmm…"

"Y-yes, ma'am."

Their mouths worked as if they still had more to say, but the two escort captains finally nodded and slowly withdrew with the other escorts.

Song Ilseom watched them leave, then clicked his tongue at Ju Hwaran.

"I can't tell whether they're loyal or stupid. After all that's happened, they still can't tell friend from foe."

"Your premise is wrong."

"What?"

"They're neither loyal nor stupid, despite what you think."

A question flashed through Song Ilseom's mind.

Could it be?

The insight came in an instant.

He was a born fighter and a martial artist through and through, but that did not mean he was stupid.

Once he grasped the situation, Song Ilseom muttered, "What a damned mess."

Ju Hwaran nodded.

"They deliberately sabotaged escort missions and contracts, siphoned off funds amid the confusion, and carefully doctored the ledgers. There's no way Uncle Heo did all of that alone."

"Just how far does this conspiracy reach?"

"We'll have to determine the exact number and identities from here on…but at the very least, those two must be included."

Ju Hwaran's gaze swept over the retreating backs of the two escort captains before settling on Song Ilseom.

"I'm going to root them out completely."

“Why didn’t you reveal it right there after the Chief Escort was killed?”

“The confusion would only have grown worse. Besides, if I can’t accomplish even this with my own strength, I have no right to become the Young Bureau Head of the Yongbong Escort Bureau.”

“Are you confident?”

Ju Hwaran stared silently at Song Ilseom.

“How about putting away that travel pack and taking it out again a year from now?”

“You want to use me to root them out?”

“Captain Song, right now I need a blade sharp enough to cut down anyone. As it happens, the perfect person is standing right in front of me.”

“I refuse. And stop calling me Captain.”

“Then how about hiring the Soul-Chasing Guest?”

“What?”

Ju Hwaran shrugged.

“The renowned Soul-Chasing Guest won’t come cheap…but given our past connection, perhaps you’ll offer me a discount?”

“So I’m supposed to repay that lifesaving debt this way?”

“If that were my intention, I would have asked for something much greater.”

“A moment ago, you said I still hadn’t done my duty in return for the Escort King’s lifesaving grace.”

“That was because too many people were watching. My grandfather said it himself. He was merely one person saving another.”

“Ha!”

Song Ilseom could no longer hold back his laughter.

He remembered what Junzi Sword[1688] Ju Hogun had said ten years ago to the young man who had come to him carrying a faded jade hairpin.

“Though a generation passed before we met, you came to find us in the end. That is enough. Don’t let the ties of the previous generation bind you. Live your own life.”

“Pardon?”

“My father told me that what he had done was simply save another person. I feel the same way. And…thank you for growing into such a fine young man.”

It had been a shock.

From childhood onward, Song Ilseom’s life had been one continuous struggle. His parents had died young, and when his only source of support—his grandmother—passed away as well, he had been forced to make his way alone, without anyone’s help.

[1688] Junzi is the Confucian ideal of a morally upright gentleman.

He had stolen weapons from piles of corpses, cut down wandering martial artists who tried to rob him of his rightful pay, and proven himself through countless life-and-death duels.

I thought he would ask me for something.

To Song Ilseom, who had lived as a wandering martial artist, that was only natural.

If Ju Hogun had wanted someone eliminated, Song Ilseom would have willingly done it. It would have left a bad taste in his mouth, but killing was what he had always done.

It would have been just one more among the countless requests he had completed.

But Ju Hogun had been different.

He was the first "adult" Song Ilseom had met since becoming an orphan with no one in the world.

Perhaps that was why the words had slipped out before he could think.

"Ten years."

"Hmm?"

"I'll leave after ten years. Though all I know is how to kill, I'll protect you and your child no matter what happens. Just as the Escort King did several decades ago."

Song Ilseom had kept his oath.

He became an escort of the Yongbong Escort Bureau and faithfully followed orders. While he remained at the bureau, he followed the Chief's daughter like a shadow and protected her at her father's request.

As the years passed and the child grew into a beautiful young woman, strange rumors began circulating about the two of them, but he paid them no mind.

Whether the Chief collapsed or the Escort Bureau fell apart, Song Ilseom silently remained in place.

I'm only doing my duty.

Song Ilseom opened his tightly shut eyes and abruptly spoke to Ju Hwaran, who had been watching him.

"I'm leaving in a month."

"…!"

"If you discover the identities of the traitors, I'll lead the way and weed them out. A month will be enough."

Seeing Ju Hwaran's expression, Song Ilseom spoke bluntly.

"Don't make that face. I'm only going to Xianyang to pick up an elixir and bring it back."

"An elixir?"

“That’s right. It should be able to cure the Chief’s illness. The Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng was too potent and might have done more harm than good, but this elixir should definitely work.”

“H-how did you obtain an elixir like that…?”

“Enough. I’m tired of talking, so don’t ask any more questions.”

Song Ilseom waved a hand.

He had managed to secure the elixir after more than two years of searching. It was not a legendary treasure like the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng, but nothing else was better suited to restoring the Chief after his qi deviation.

It had cost him every last coin of the enormous fortune he had earned as the Soul-Chasing Guest, but money could always be earned again.

“Do you know something?”

Song Ilseom continued in a quiet voice.

“There’s nothing harder than saving a person’s life. What you took for granted… was the hardest thing in the world for me.”

Song Ilseom had made his living by killing people.

It was only after joining the Yongbong Escort Bureau that he began protecting someone instead.

“Captain Song…”

Ju Hwaran stared at him with glistening eyes, but when she saw his furrowed brow, she hastily corrected herself.

“Ah, Great Hero Song.”

“How long are you going to keep getting that wrong?”

“I’m sorry. I was so surprised that it slipped out…”

“Then why don’t you create a position while you’re at it?”

“Pardon?”

“I don’t want to be Chief Escort. I’m terrible at escort missions, and I’d have to manage people.”

“P-pardon?”

“Guard Hall Master. Yes, that will do.”

While Ju Hwaran was still stammering, Song Ilseom turned and walked away.

Not toward the gate and the darkness beyond it, but toward his own quarters.

“I shouldn’t have packed my bag.”

As she watched Song Ilseom’s back recede with those quiet words trailing behind him, dimples appeared beside Ju Hwaran’s mouth.

Whoosh!

Sails stretched taut and sterns sliced through the current as the swift ships raced forward like the wind. Bare-chested, bronze-skinned men hauled on ropes and pulled at the oars. At least fifty men could be seen on the deck of each ship.

With five swift ships in all, their force numbered nearly three hundred.

“Faster! Faster!”

“You louts! How can you call yourselves members of the Water Dragon Stronghold when you’re that slow?”

The Water Dragon Stronghold was a major river stronghold belonging to the Yangtze River Channel League.

Its members proudly called themselves the heroes of the Yangtze, but ordinary people had a rather less flattering name for them.

“River bandits! They’re river bandits!”

“Why the hell are those bastards here?”

The shipmaster who spotted the five fast ships promptly collapsed into his seat.

These were no ragtag thugs. They were the Water Dragon Stronghold of the Yangtze River Channel League. There was no outrunning their swift ships, and fighting them was out of the question.

This day has gone completely to hell.

No. There was only one way to get through this quietly, at least.

Looking utterly dejected, the shipmaster called over the youngest sailor passing by.

“Hey!”

“Yes, shipmaster.”

“Tell the passengers to pay up.”

“Pardon?”

“Collect the money! They have to pay the toll, don’t they?”

The fact that they belonged to the Yangtze River Channel League was both unfortunate and fortunate. Once they were caught, there was no way to escape, but they did not simply swing their swords without reason.

The Yangtze River Channel League claimed this set them apart from the common river-bandit rabble found everywhere under heaven, but one pack of bastards was much the same as another.

“Phew… I’ve really lost today’s business.”

The shipmaster was heaving sigh after sigh when someone tapped him on the shoulder.

“Excuse me.”

“Gah! You startled me! Who are you?”

“I’m a passenger.”

“I know that.”

The shipmaster studied the young man who had appeared out of nowhere. Judging by the sword at his waist, he seemed to be a martial artist, but…

He looks kind of dopey. That mouth of his sticks out, too. Bet he never shuts up.

Third Rate martial artists were a dime a dozen.

It wasn't as if he had never dealt with one or two of them before. The shipmaster sighed and opened his mouth.

"What do you want? If this is about the money, I've got nothing to say. Go back to your seat. Don't try anything stupid and end up crossing the Sanzu River."[1689]

The young man watched the swift ships drawing rapidly closer.

"Are they river bandits?"

"Can't you tell by looking? They're from the Water Dragon Stronghold of the Yangtze River Channel League. There isn't a soul in Sichuan who doesn't know them."

"The Yangtze River Channel League…"

"Running won't help. You'll never escape those swift ships. Once they spot you, it's over. Completely over!"

"That ship must be pretty fast."

"What kind of question is—"

The shipmaster was about to snap at him when he sucked in a breath and clamped his mouth shut.

A shadow had risen behind the young man, a full head taller than him.

The giant had shaggy hair, and a great mound of hides rose high atop the pack frame on his back.

He stared blankly at the shipmaster, then spoke to the young man.

"Mujin."

"Yes?"

"Let's take that ship."

The shipmaster wondered if he had heard correctly.

[1689] The Sanzu River is a Buddhist river believed to mark the boundary between life and death.

Chapter 331

Ship-Fire Boy. A child who lights the fires aboard a ship.

The term meant a boatman. It was also the sobriquet of one particular man.

“Stronghold Lord.”

At his subordinate’s call, the man sitting cross-legged in the center of the cabin opened his eyes.

A crystalline gleam flashed in them. His skin was bronze and his body muscular, befitting a hardened river man. His bulging temples marked him as a Peak master who had reached a considerable realm.

“What is it?”

A deep, resonant voice emerged between his dry lips. His subordinate answered with the utmost respect.

“There’s a vessel fifty zhang[1690] away.”

“A vessel? Brothers from our alliance?”

“No.”

Then there was only one possibility.

On the mighty Yangtze, there were only those who robbed and those who were robbed.

“How many?”

“A little over fifty. It doesn’t appear to be a merchant ship, either.”

“I see.”

“What should we do?”

“Deal with it quietly. Don’t cause a commotion.”

With that, the man closed his eyes again.

A warship sent by the imperial court might have warranted his personal attention. This matter was far too trivial.

As always, his subordinates would carry out his orders.

Interrupting my meditation over something so insignificant.

The man let go of his irritation and sank back into contemplation.

It had already been more than ten years since he reached the Peak realm. Now, however, an invisible wall stood in his path.

He had tried consuming stolen elixirs and even smoking opium, which was said to reveal sights one had never experienced before. All of it had been a waste of time.

This is going to be difficult at this rate.

Water Dragon Stronghold was one of the ten largest strongholds in the Yangtze River Channel League.

[1690] Here, fifty zhang is about 152 m (497 ft), using the Korean jang of ten cheok.

Thanks to its location in Sichuan, through which vast quantities of goods passed, it was known as one of the most lucrative strongholds in the alliance.

But the man had only just entered his forties, and his ambitions were greater still.

Alliance Leader.

His goal was to become the master of the Yangtze River Channel League—and, with it, the king of the Yangtze.

Anyone unaware of his circumstances might scoff at such a preposterous ambition, but the man possessed both the ability and the background to make it possible.

The proof was that he had become lord of Water Dragon Stronghold more than ten years ago, when he was barely past thirty.

"Whooo…"

The man drew a long breath. As he drew in and circulated the natural qi permeating the air, his sharpened senses gathered information from his surroundings.

The damp smell of water. The swift ship gradually slowing beneath him. Even the shouts and laughter of his subordinates.

"Hahaha! Running into us means you bastards have the worst luck imaginable. Who owns this ship?"

"I-I do, sir."

"You launched your ship without permission from us heroes. I assume you're prepared for the consequences?"

"I-I've committed a crime worthy of death by failing to recognize the heroes of the Yangtze. This isn't much, but please accept it as a token of my sincerity…"

Wham! Crash!

A blow landed, and someone went sprawling. The man's brow furrowed at the shrill screams that followed.

I told them not to make a commotion.

No martial artist enjoyed having his training interrupted. His men might be rough and ignorant, but he had not expected them to be incapable of following such a simple order.

The man's eyes snapped open. He was about to spring to his feet when—

Boom! Crack! Thud! Th-th-th-thump!

A savage barrage of noise erupted, and then everything fell silent.

It seems to be over.

Somewhat mollified, the man closed his eyes again.

Or he would have, if not for the question that suddenly crossed his mind.

But…why is it so quiet?

Step. Step. Step.

Low, resonant footsteps approached the cabin.

At last, someone stopped directly outside the door and spoke through a yawn.

“What are you doing? Aren’t you coming out?”

“…!”

An unfamiliar voice. He had never heard it before.

Alarm bells rang in the man’s mind.

An enemy!

Everything happened in an instant.

The man shot to his feet and streaked toward the door like a beam of light.

His fist, carrying enough power to smash apart a massive sailing ship, shattered the thick wooden door and hurtled toward the enemy beyond it.

And then—

Kraaaang!

A deafening boom and its aftershock rocked the swift ship.

The man stared wide-eyed at his enemy.

More precisely, at the palm that had stopped his fist.

A seething voice escaped between his clenched teeth.

“Who are you?”

“Me?”

The young man answered with a faint smile.

“The owner of this ship.”

Flames poured from the eyes of the man known as the Ship-Fire Boy, Mu Song.

“How dare a little pup like you… I’ll show you the sky.”

I kicked the leg of the middle-aged man sprawled flat on his back across the deck.

“How long are you going to keep staring at the sky? Get up. Quickly.”

Focus returned to his hazy eyes. The middle-aged man propped up his upper body and stared at me with a dazed expression.

“H-how did you defeat the Ship-Breaking Fist so easily…?”

“Wait. Ship-Breaking Fist?”

Right. Now I remembered.

I had definitely seen that martial art somewhere before, but the memory had been so hazy that I couldn’t place it.

Intrigued, I looked the middle-aged man up and down.

“What’s your relationship with Cheol Soo?”

“Cheol… Soo? Who are you talking about?”

"You know. Cheol Soo. Cheol Soo…"

Gung Gibang quietly cut in.

"The Iron-Water Divine Dragon."

"Right. The Iron-Water Divine Dragon. When I met him at the Star-Array Grand Banquet, he kept going on about the Ship-Breaking Fist too."

If I remembered correctly, it had been during the first preliminary round.

He had spouted some bullshit about how I should consider it an honor to witness the Ship-Breaking Fist, so I had smashed a cliff apart with the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

I heard he forfeited right afterward and went straight home.

It had happened only a month ago here in the Murim, but after everything I had been through, it felt like the distant past.

In any case, the middle-aged man before me had learned the same martial art as the Iron-Water Divine Dragon. He was also a Peak master, a cut above Cheol Soo in skill.

After blinking at me like a goldfish, he stammered in a trembling voice.

"W-were you acquainted with my youngest?"

"Your youngest?"

"The Cheol Soo you mentioned is the youngest of us three martial brothers. He's the third Disciple, and I'm the second."

Huh. I had heard that before too.

People had gone on endlessly about the Iron-Water Divine Dragon's Master.

"Then, could it be…?"

The middle-aged man nodded.

"That's right. My Master is the man known as the Seafaring King."

"Jang Bogo!"[1691]

"…?"

"No, it's nothing. I was just talking to myself."

"But why are you suddenly being so polite…?"

"Of course I should be polite. You're my Senior in the martial world and a hero of the Yangtze River Channel League. Please, feel free to speak casually to me."

To be honest, the Yangtze River Channel League and the Green Forest Alliance both looked like criminal organizations full of social misfits to me.

But…

If he's the Seafaring King's Disciple, that changes things.

The Seafaring King would hardly be pleased to hear that I had beaten his Disciple black and blue to steal his swift ship.

[1691] Jang Bogo was a ninth-century Korean maritime commander, making him Taekyung's spontaneous guess at the identity of the "Seafaring King."

At least with the Green Forest Alliance's Heavenly Axe, I had been fully justified, so they couldn't complain. In this case, though, it would be better to smooth things over.

I helped the bewildered middle-aged man to his feet and brushed the dust from his clothes.

"Look how dirty your clothes got. What a disaster. You'll have to get them dry-cleaned."

"W-why are you suddenly acting like this?"

"I told you to speak casually with me. There was an unfortunate incident because of a minor misunderstanding on my part, but if I'd known you belonged to the renowned Yangtze River Channel League, I would have settled everything amicably through conversation. You understand, right?"

"…Really?"

"Of course. Do I look like the sort of ill-bred junior who would lie to his Senior?"

The middle-aged man stared at me for a moment, then cautiously shifted his gaze upward.

I followed his eyes and saw a flag rising high above the fast ship.

The words emblazoned across it were large enough to read from a hundred meters[1692] away.

Yangtze River Channel League.

"…"

"…"

I finally spoke in a grave voice.

"I'm illiterate. I can't read."

"…"

Yeah. I knew he wouldn't buy it.

I clenched my fist and looked at the middle-aged man.

"Let's just settle this amicably."

"…Very well."

Whoooosh.

The swift ship sliced powerfully through the water. Cheongpung, who had been sitting at the bow enjoying the wind, came racing over and began chattering excitedly.

"Benefactor! It's so refreshing!"

"Of course it is. It's still early spring."

[1692] A hundred meters is about 328 ft.

“There are so many fish too!”

“There should be. It’s a river.”

“There are so many people on the ship over there, and they’re getting beaten so much!”

“Of course they’re getting beaten—wait, what?”

What had I just heard?

As I doubted my ears, Cheongpung answered with an innocent smile.

“Every time the captain swings that huge oar, their skin tears and blood sprays everywhere!”

“…”

It seemed Mu Song had lined up his subordinates and was beating them one after another with an oar.

They had mistakenly attacked a passenger ship and suffered a tremendous humiliation, so I supposed it was understandable.

“Pretend you didn’t see anything. You saw nothing.”

“Can I ask him to let me hit one of them just once?”

“No. Please don’t.”

Ignoring the surrounding sailors, who were staring at Cheongpung as if wondering whether he was even human, I turned to Gung Gibang.

“Hey, if you knew, you should’ve told me beforehand.”

“Am I some kind of fortune-teller? How am I supposed to know who’s stationed at every single stronghold?”

Gung Gibang stared at me incredulously, then muttered under his breath.

“The crazy bastard is the one who charged in after seeing the Yangtze River Channel League’s flag. Bit late to complain now.”

“Hey, I can hear you.”

“You were supposed to. You don’t fucking listen even when I tell you something. What the hell do you expect me to do?”

“Damn, you’ve gotten awfully bold. What do you think of this insubordination, Mujin?”

Hyuk Mujin answered.

“Uweeeeeegh!”

“…Your seasickness is pretty bad. Get some rest.”

For someone who was supposedly a Supreme First Rate master, he was still in terrible shape.

Cheongpung watched Hyuk Mujin cling to the railing and dry-heave again and again, then twisted enviously from side to side.

“I want to get seasick too. I’ve never tried it before.”

“…”

Lucky you. So many things you still want to experience.

Maybe it was because I was on a boat, but today I was experiencing the power of the Bermuda Triangle all over again.

Am I going to end up adrift on the Yangtze?

As that thought crossed my mind, the hulking Mu Song landed on the deck using a light, elusive movement technique completely at odds with his massive build.

He tossed the blood-soaked oar to a subordinate and approached me.

“Are you uncomfortable anywhere?”

“Ah, yes. I’m comfortable, Senior.”

Mu Song glanced at Hyuk Mujin, who was still dry-heaving.

“That fellow doesn’t look very comfortable.”

“That’s all right. I’m comfortable.”

“…”

“Is there a problem?”

“No, no. In any case, you’re headed to Chengdu?”

“Yes. How long will it take?”

“We’re currently at Guang’an, which could be considered the entrance to Sichuan. At this speed, three days. If we catch a favorable wind, two days will be more than enough.”

That was about the same speed as traveling with a movement technique, perhaps even a little faster.

An ordinary vessel would have taken much longer, but this was one of the swift ships for which the Yangtze River Channel League was renowned.

I sincerely clasped my hands in a respectful salute.

“Thank you.”

“Nonsense. It’s no great trouble.”

Mu Song was being so cooperative because he had learned who our group was.

I was the Disciple of the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang. Gung Gibang was the Successor Beggar of the Beggars’ Sect. Cheongpung had inherited the true transmission of the Sword Saint, Mae Jonghak.

And finally, the great Jin Family of Taiyuan’s…

Ah, let’s leave that last one out.

“In any case, Chengdu is close, so rest comfortably while you wait. This Mu Song has the rivers flowing through Sichuan firmly under his control.”

“Wow. That’s impressive, Senior.”

“Without my orders, no one dares do anything foolish on the Yangtze. Hahahaha!”

At that exact moment, faint cries drifted over from far away.

“Aaaah!”

“Kill them all and take everything!”
I muttered as the distant screams reached us.
“They seem pretty good at doing foolish things…”
Mu Song’s face flushed bright red.
“How dare anyone run wild on the Yangtze!”

Chapter 332

“Who dares run wild on the Yangtze?”

Not that I expected an answer from all the way over there.

Letting Mu Song’s shout go in one ear and out the other, I circulated my internal energy and sharpened my eyesight.

The distance was easily over two hundred zhang.[1693] But my vision had improved enough that you could call me a human eagle, allowing me to take in the entire scene at a glance.

That’s…

River bandits.

Two ships far larger than the swift ship we were riding had surrounded one tiny boat. Black specks that looked like arrows and harpoons flew toward it without pause.

Then I spotted the flags fluttering from the bandits’ ships, and my gaze naturally shifted toward Mu Song.

“I don’t know what kind of scum they are, but they picked the wrong target. You there! Immediately deal with those rootless bastards… What’s wrong?”

“Uh, Senior. I’m not quite sure how to put this.”

“What?”

“That unaffiliated rabble looks like they belong to the Yangtze River Channel League.”

“…?”

“…?”

After a brief silence, Mu Song roared, “That’s impossible!”

“No, it’s entirely possible. Their flag says ‘Yangtze River Channel League’ in very bold lettering.”

“Didn’t you say you were illiterate a moment ago?”

Was he a river bandit or a razor? He was surprisingly sharp.

Instead of panicking, I hardened my expression.

“I’m a fast learner. Besides, is that really important right now? Every moment counts! We need to punish those lawless thugs disrupting order on the Yangtze!”

Mu Song looked as if he wanted to punish me first, but he wholeheartedly agreed with my point.

“Exactly. In this day and age, how dare they commit murder on the Yangtze… I’ll kill every last one of them with a single palm strike!”

[1693] A zhang is ten Korean ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

It was a little depressing to hear that from a river-bandit chief, but according to something Gung Gibang had casually told me, Mu Song belonged to the moderate faction within the Yangtze River Channel League.

His philosophy was that taking people's money was enough. Why take their lives too?

"…"

He was still taking their money.

Come to think of it, they were all much the same. Still, in a Murim where people drew their swords at the slightest provocation, he really was conscientious for a top-tier river bandit—especially one who was a Disciple of the Alliance Leader of the Yangtze River Channel League.

"Raise the red flag!"

At Mu Song's booming command, the five swift ships raised the red flags that signaled battle and surged forward.

Whoooooosh!

The sails swelled taut in a timely gust of wind. Built for maximum speed, the swift ships sliced through the current and devoured the distance between us.

The two-hundred-zhang[1694] gap shrank by half in an instant. Among the river bandits preparing for close-quarters battle, urgent shouts rang out.

"S-swift ships!"

"Mu Song of Water Dragon Stronghold is here! Everyone, retreat!"

But Mu Song was not about to let them escape.

Barely fifty zhang[1695] now separated us from the enemy. A fierce light flashed in his eyes as he glared at the bandits scrambling back to their ships.

"Let's at least see what you bastards look like!"

Grinding his teeth, Mu Song snatched up a massive harpoon, kicked off the stern, and leaped into the air.

Boom!

The sturdy wooden deck splintered, and the Yangtze swallowed Mu Song's body as it arced through the air.

Isn't that dangerous?

Mistaking the Yangtze for some valley stream in Gangwon Province would be a serious mistake.

Although this was a branch of the Yangtze that split away from the main channel, it was as wide and deep as the sea, and the current was viciously rough.

Even Hyuk Mujin, who had been dry-heaving, asked with a pale face, "Shouldn't we rescue him—uweeegh!"

[1694] A zhang is ten Korean ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[1695] A zhang is ten Korean ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

“Gibang, pat that bastard on the back.”

“I’m not his nanny…”

Of course he wasn’t. Who would hire a beggar as a nanny?

Despite his grumbling, Gung Gibang pounded Hyuk Mujin on the back.

“There’s a limit to ignorance. Do you think a river bandit chief would jump into the Yangtze without learning water-based martial arts? Especially a Disciple of the Seafaring King, who no one can match in the water?”

“Oh, right.”

“I don’t know who those bastards are, but they’ve tangled with the wrong man. There’ll be a string of funerals today. Tsk, tsk.”

Gung Gibang’s prediction was accurate.

A few seconds later, Mu Song surfaced more than ten zhang[1696] ahead of the swift ship.

Spla-aaash!

Every time his massive body traced a supple curve like a wave, he shot forward like a water-skier. My jaw dropped.

“Unbelievable!”

He was even faster than the swift ship.

The sight of Mu Song charging toward the enemy vessel like a fish-man made my own blood boil.

“Since it’s come to this, I’m going too!”

Gung Gibang shrieked, “Going where?”

“Uweeegh!”

“Benefactor, me too!”

“Get lost, all of you! The Grand Line[1697] is calling me! The Yangtze is calling me!”

Breaking free of the Bermuda Triangle, I raced across the deck and launched myself from the bow with all my strength.

Boom! Craaack!

The bow shattered under the force. Weightlessness swept over me as the wind slammed into my face.

Whooooooosh!

“Freedom! Freedom!”

I became a bird.

Then I lost momentum and began to fall.

“Senior!”

“Gasp!”

[1696] A zhang is ten Korean ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[1697] The Grand Line is the central ocean route in the manga One Piece.

Tap!

I landed lightly on the back of a passing fish-man.

Angle, speed, distance, landing point. This result was only possible because I had calculated everything perfectly.

“Whew. Per-fect.”

“What part of that was perfect!”

Mu Song roared at his unexpected passenger, but what could he do? I was already aboard.

I glared at the river bandits frantically turning their ships around.

“Let’s go!”

“Damn it! Since it’s come to this, we’ll charge straight into the ship!”

“That’s my Senior!”

“We’ll settle this when this is over!”

Spla-aaash!

Gritting his teeth, Mu Song increased his speed even further.

The river bandits had only just regained their footing and were frantically trying to escape, but it was already too late.

We had become a single harpoon hurtling toward the side of their ship.

“Go, Senior! Fish-Man Jujutsu:[1698] Current—One-Arm Shoulder Throw!”

“Yaaaargh!”

Mu Song and I screamed at the top of our lungs and thrust out our arms at the same time.

He held a harpoon and I held a spear, but our weapons had one thing in common.

Powerful qi gathered at the tips of both weapons.

Whooooooosh!

Two blasts of Spear Energy tore through the wind and burrowed into the ship’s damp, sturdy hull.

The next instant—

Kwaaang! Rumble-rumble-rumble!

A thunderous roar erupted with an enormous shock wave.

“Mujin.”

At my solemn voice, Hyuk Mujin finally stopped retching and answered with a pale face.

“Yes?”

“I think I was born to be a river bandit.”

[1698] Fish-Man Jujutsu is a water-based martial art used by fish-men in One Piece.

“What kind of nonsense is that?”

“Do you want to hear yourself wail?”

“I misspoke because I’m not feeling well. Now that I think about it, the role suits you perfectly.”

“Right?”

“Yes. I can still vividly see you recklessly—no, courageously—smashing straight through that ship.”

“What a rush.”

I nodded smugly and gazed at the slowly sinking ship.

On one side, Mu Song’s men had divided themselves among the small ferryboats carried aboard the swift ships and were pulling floundering river bandits from the water.

On the other ship, the river bandits hung their heads as they were transferred to the swift ships one after another, bound together with ropes.

One ship sunk. The other captured.

An excellent result for my first naval battle.

Originally, I had planned to sink both ships. But the river bandits lost their will to fight as soon as they saw the ship carrying their comrades sink, and they surrendered.

Of course, surrender did not lead to a particularly happy ending.

“How dare scum like you tarnish the name of the Yangtze River Channel League?”

Moderate or not, Mu Song was still a martial artist who had no qualms about killing and a river bandit who had spent his life on the unforgiving Yangtze.

Once he snapped, there was no stopping him.

“Throw them to the fish.”

The tightly bound river bandits opened their eyes wide.

“T-this can’t be happening!”

“Stronghold Lord! Please, anything but that!”

Mu Song answered them with an icy stare.

“Stronghold Lord? You belong to a different stronghold. Why would I be your Stronghold Lord? And don’t worry. Your chief will be joining you soon, so you won’t be lonely.”

“We were wrong! Please, just this once…!”

“If you were willing to invade Water Dragon Stronghold’s territory and do something like this, you should have been prepared for the consequences. Do you know why I had my men pull you out of the water? So I could punish you with my own hands.”

Mu Song jerked his chin, and his subordinates stepped forward and dragged the river bandits away.

The river bandits screamed as death closed in, but their limbs were already bound. One splash after another rang out as they sank beneath the surface.

Cheongpung bit his lip, his face pale, as more than fifty river bandits were drowned alive before his eyes.

No wonder.

Someone who was afraid even of blood could hardly endure a sight like this.

Despite myself, I grew concerned and spoke to him quietly.

“Close your eyes. I’ll tell you when it’s over.”

“No, Benefactor. I’m fine.”

“They may deserve to die, but you’re still watching people die. It might be hard to look at.”

“No.”

“Hm?”

Cheongpung’s eyes twitched.

“I’m just… trying to get used to it.”

Get used to it? I had never expected to hear something like that from Cheongpung.

Cheongpung was kind by nature, and unlike other young men his age, he had not been tainted by the ways of the world.

Perhaps that was why he feared blood and had always avoided killing. But now, I sensed a steely resolve within him.

Was it the battle with the Blood Lord at Mount Song? Did it begin then?

His first encounter with the fear and terror of death must have awakened something inside him.

Part of me was proud of him. Another part felt bitter.

It can’t be helped. This is the Murim.

That was right. This was the Murim—and the storm clouds of war were gathering.

He could not remain an innocent mountain youth forever in a place like this.

If this helped him grow… maybe it was for the best.

Cheongpung fought to keep his eyes from closing. At last, he let out a sigh of relief.

The river bandits had finally been dealt with.

But it was not over yet.

“Hwang Tae-gu. Now it’s your turn.”

Mu Song’s low voice rang across the deck.

Unlike the other river bandits, a man in his fifties had been forced to his knees before Mu Song, tightly bound in chains.

Hwang Tae-gu was the mastermind behind this attack.

Gung Gibang muttered as he watched him.

“I was wondering why Mu Song was here. So that’s what happened.”

“What do you mean?”

“Even the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families have their factions. Imagine how bad it must be in a band of river bandits like the Yangtze River Channel League.”

“So this Hwang Tae-gu lost a factional struggle?”

“He was famous for being greedy and violent. Just a few years ago, he lorded over the Yangtze in Sichuan… There’s no doubt Mu Song pushed him out.”

So the loser of an internal power struggle had gone rogue and finally gotten himself caught?

As I considered that, Hwang Tae-gu opened his mouth.

“I have nothing to say to some ignorant young punk. Kill me.”

“You’ll get your wish whether you say anything or not. But why did you do this?”

“Heh heh. What a stupid question. I’m a river bandit. What’s wrong with a river bandit killing and taking what he wants?”

“There’s no reasoning with you. I should have killed you long ago.”

Mu Song’s face hardened, and he raised his harpoon.

“Would Great Hero Mu Song, the Ship-Fire Boy, please wait a moment?”

A voice suddenly rang out, piercing the ears of everyone present.

Chapter 333

“Great Hero Mu Song, the Ship-Fire Boy, could you wait a moment?”

I wanted to give the owner of that voice a standing ovation.

Think about it. Who could say something like that in a situation like this?

Especially when the person they were addressing was a river-bandit chief who had thrown around fifty river bandits to the fish in five minutes.

But who was it?

Judging by the way he called Mu Song a Great Hero, he obviously isn’t in this line of work.

Mu Song’s subordinates called him Stronghold Lord or Chief, so that ruled them out. None of my companions, myself included, had said a word, so that ruled us out too.

That left…

The passengers who were attacked by the river bandits.

Everyone else had clearly reached the same conclusion.

My companions and I—even the river bandits of Water Dragon Stronghold. Every head turned in the same direction, toward the twenty passengers who had moved onto the swift ship when Hwang Tae-gu’s attack left their boat listing.

“Who is it? Step forward.”

At Mu Song’s fierce glare, his harpoon hanging low in one hand, his subordinates hurriedly cleared a path. A lone figure stood at the end of it.

“It was me.”

I had guessed as much from the voice, but he was quite young. No, he looked almost boyish.

Twenty at most, if I’m being generous?

Boy suited him better than young man. Flustered by everyone’s attention, he hesitated, then awkwardly clasped his hands together.

“I-I’m Mungyeong.”

“Mungyeong?”

Mu Song frowned.

“Never heard the name. And from the look of you, you aren’t a martial artist.”

Mu Song had a good eye.

The boy, Mungyeong, had the aura of an ordinary commoner. Nothing more, nothing less.

Mungyeong swallowed nervously under our scrutiny and answered,

“T-That’s right. I’m merely a medical apprentice still in training. I have no connection to the Murim.”

"A medical apprentice? Then how do you know me?"

"How could I not know of the righteous boatman on the Yangtze in Sichuan who keeps such a strict rein on bloodshed?"

Now that was some serious flattery.

Mu Song's mouth twitched as he went from a river-bandit chief who controlled Sichuan's waterways and shook down travelers to a righteous boatman in the blink of an eye.

"Hmm. Is that so?"

"Wealth comes and goes, but a man has only one life. Those who know how many lives were lost on the Yangtze until just a few years ago call you the Great Hero of Benevolence and Righteousness."

"Ahem. There's no need to go that far. Being called the Hero of the Yangtze is enough for me."

What a load of horseshit…

Mu Song was reasonably sensible, but he was still a river bandit. Keeping his thuggery within reasonable bounds didn't make him a model citizen.

But the young medical apprentice seemed to see things differently.

"My parents died tragically on the Yangtze more than ten years ago. If Great Hero Mu Song hadn't saved me, I would have met the same fate."

"Oh, dear. That's unfortunate. But if it was more than ten years ago…"

"That's right."

Mungyeong continued in a trembling voice.

"The man kneeling before you is my parents' killer."

"Good heavens."

The river bandits and passengers who had been listening intently let out low groans. Mu Song nodded as if he understood and spoke.

"Now I understand why you asked me to stop. Though it goes against the League regulations, I understand how you feel. I'll give you the chance."

"You mean you'll let me decide whether he lives or dies?"

"Of course."

But Mungyeong's answer defied everyone's expectations—including mine.

"Then… please let him live."

"…!"

"…!"

Mu Song had been about to hand Mungyeong the harpoon he was holding. Even Hwang Tae-gu, who had already closed his eyes as though resigned to everything, snapped them open and stared at Mungyeong.

"W-What did you say?"

When Mu Song asked again in confusion, Mungyeong bowed at the waist.

“I desperately wish to avenge my parents, but I am a medical apprentice. How can one who deals in life bring about death? I beg you to cripple his martial arts and punish him according to strict law, so that he can never commit evil again.”

“If we do as you ask, he’ll be taken to League headquarters. He deserves to die, but with all the connections he’s made over the years, he may manage to save his life. Wouldn’t it be better to take your revenge with your own hands, right here?”

“I have no connection to the Murim, but I have often heard that, for a martial artist, losing one’s martial arts is the same as death. I may not have killed him, but would that not be as good as killing him? And…”

Mungyeong gazed at Hwang Tae-gu with clear eyes.

“This is not about personal revenge, but the greater good. If the Yangtze River Channel League punishes him itself, would that not serve as a warning to others who commit such slaughter?”

Not a trace of trembling remained in the boy’s resolute voice. His words held a conviction that made those listening nod along.

Exclamations rose from the crowd.

“Well, I’ll be. That young fellow is something else.”

“If it were me, I’d have shoved that harpoon straight into his chest.”

“He’s remarkable in more ways than one. He’ll make a fine physician.”

Mu Song also seemed deeply impressed by Mungyeong’s well-reasoned argument. He nodded admiringly and stepped in front of Hwang Tae-gu.

“If your ears work, you heard him. What do you think?”

“I-I’ll survive, and I’ll tear every one of you apart!”

The killing intent flashing in Hwang Tae-gu’s eyes did not last long.

Thud!

“Guh!”

Mu Song’s toe drove into the spot beneath Hwang Tae-gu’s navel—the place known as the dantian.

Mu Song looked down coldly at Hwang Tae-gu, who toppled backward, vomiting blood.

“Go ahead and survive, then. See if you can carry out your threat. With your dantian shattered, though, you’ll hardly be alive even if you live.”

With a sharp crack of displaced air, Mu Song’s foot lashed out and struck Hwang Tae-gu’s dantian again.

Whoooooom! Crack!

“Guh! N-No!”

By the time Hwang Tae-gu’s scream echoed hollowly across the deck, everything was already over.

Ssshhh.

I can feel it.

Qi streamed from his twitching seven apertures[1699] and scattered into the air.

When a cup holding water breaks, the water spills out. The moment his qi-sea acupoint was destroyed, the internal energy stored in his dantian disappeared.

"You bastards! I swear I'll—!"

The Peak master who had once commanded countless ships and ruled the Yangtze in Sichuan no longer existed.

Hwang Tae-gu was now nothing more than a powerless man in his fifties. He kept shouting until Mu Song silenced him with a Pressure-Point Strike, leaving his entire body rigid.

"What a noisy bastard. Throw him somewhere out of the way. We'll escort him to League headquarters later."

"Yes."

A bald, copper-skinned river bandit who looked like Diglett[1700] hoisted Hwang Tae-gu onto his back and disappeared. For the moment, the matter was settled.

Mu Song scratched the back of his head and looked around at the crowd.

"Well, this is awkward. I've shown you all an ugly sight. I offer my sincere apologies to everyone who suffered through this incident."

So a good bandit defeated a bad bandit?

In any case, the commoners whose lives had been saved by Water Dragon Stronghold bowed repeatedly.

"Oh, no, not at all. Without the Heroes of the Yangtze, we would have been done for."

"We don't know how we could ever repay this debt…"

"Perhaps the Primordial Heavenly Venerable[1701] was watching over us. Not a single person died, so you needn't worry."

Huh? Not one person died?

At those words, I looked over the passengers.

It's true.

There were injured people here and there, but no corpses.

Mu Song and I had arrived before the battle turned into a full-scale melee, but the river bandits had definitely fired arrows and harpoons at them from a distance.

How had a mere twenty commoners all survived?

It didn't take long for me to get my answer.

"If that young medical apprentice hadn't been here, we might all have died."

[1699] The seven apertures are the eyes, ears, nostrils, and mouth.

[1700] Diglett is a Pokémon depicted as a small brown head emerging from the ground.

[1701] The Primordial Heavenly Venerable is a deity in Daoism.

“Indeed. How could anyone remain so calm in a situation like that? He’s truly remarkable.”

The conversation I overheard went like this.

When the passengers spotted the approaching river bandits and panicked, Mungyeong stepped forward. He had them tear up the deck and use the planks as shields, then ordered them to break the mast.

Tearing up the deck is one thing, but breaking the mast?

An ordinary person would have thought first of rowing for their life and escaping. Mungyeong had done the opposite.

He broke the sails and left the boat’s fate to the violent current of the Yangtze, which heaved and rolled like a whirlpool.

And it worked.

I knew roughly how naval battles worked.

After firing from a distance, the usual tactic was to close in and ram the other ship, or hook it with ropes and board it for close combat.

But if the target had completely lost the ability to steer and was spinning and pitching wildly, finding an opening wouldn’t be easy. That was how Mungyeong had bought them time.

Well, look at this guy.

Then there was his decision regarding Hwang Tae-gu. This was no ordinary clever boy.

Perhaps he felt my gaze. Mungyeong, who had been smiling awkwardly at all the praise directed his way, flinched.

“Y-Young Hero. Did you need something from me?”

“What would I need? Judging by your age, you could be my little brother. I was just looking at you because you did something impressive.”

“Th-That’s too much praise.”

“From what I heard, that was pretty bold. How did you come up with it?”

“Although I’m training to become a medical apprentice now, before my parents passed away, I used to read all kinds of miscellaneous books.”

“Miscellaneous books?”

“Yes. Believe it or not, my family comes from a humble military household. My grandfather was also a military officer who received a stipend from the court.”

He was trying to hide both his faint wariness of a stranger and a quiet sense of pride.

Seen this way, he wasn’t much different from any other boy his age.

But something about him didn’t sit right.

I studied Mungyeong carefully and muttered inwardly.

Skill, activate Qi Sense.

Ding.

Along with the familiar chime, information about him rose into the air.

“I guessed wrong.”

“Pardon?”

“Nothing. Stay healthy, eat well, and grow up strong.”

“Y-Yes…”

Clicking my tongue inwardly, I turned away from the bewildered Mungyeong.

Mu Song, who had been watching, spoke to me quietly.

“What was that about?”

“Nothing important. I just took a personal interest in him.”

“Junior, do you happen to have a taste for men?”

You fucking bastard…

When he saw my expression, Mu Song cleared his throat and changed the subject.

“Ahem. In any case, we should continue on our way. The current is rough, but the wind is favorable, so we should reach Xi’an soon.”

“What about the others? Their original boat was listing too.”

“The others? Ah, my men will take them somewhere safe.”

Mu Song chuckled and added,

“Of course, we’ll accept a small token of their appreciation.”

“…”

Saving their lives, then shaking them down for money. Was that clever or stupid?

I was briefly struck speechless by this novel form of creative economics when—

“W-Wait a moment.”

“Hm?”

It was Mungyeong. Glancing around nervously, he fidgeted with his fingers before speaking.

“Um, did you say you were going to Xi’an?”

“That’s right. Why?”

Mungyeong gasped, then spilled out his words in a rush.

“The thing is, I happen to be on my way to Xi’an too. If you would give me a ride just this once, I’ll repay this kindness even beyond the grave, remember it to my very bones, and even if this body dies and dies, dies a thousand times over and turns to white bones, I will never forget—”

What is this?

I let out a long sigh at the Jeong Mong-ju villain.[1702]

“Fine. Get on.”

“Thank you!”

As Mungyeong hurried off to gather his luggage, Mu Song muttered under his breath,

“Wait, this is my ship…”

Yeah. No.

[1702] Jeong Mong-ju was a Goryeo scholar-official remembered for a famous vow of loyalty in which he declared that even if he died a hundred deaths and his bones turned to dust, his loyalty would remain unchanged.

Chapter 334

Time flowed like a river.

It was a common, well-worn metaphor, but that was exactly how my three days aboard the swift ship passed.

Thanks to this ship, we cut down our travel time by quite a bit.

True to the name Yangtze River Channel League, Mu Song and the river bandits of Water Dragon Stronghold were all outstanding sailors. They knew the lower reaches of the Yangtze, which ran throughout Sichuan, as well as the palms of their hands.

“We’ll be there soon, Old Master.”

I gazed at Jeok Cheongang’s wrinkled face as I murmured.

Only a few weeks had passed, but his already small, thin body was gradually weakening.

It was something I realized every time I used True Qi Guidance to bolster his qi, as I had today.

Recovery is impossible. For now, the best I can do is slow the decline.

He had only lasted this long because he was a Supreme Peak master with profound internal energy.

And… our sole hope lay with one person whose medical skills had reached a godly realm.

The Divine Physician.

A mysterious figure whose face, name, age, and even gender were unknown.

The Divine Physician first became known more than forty years ago, though, so I figured they had to be over sixty.

I’ll find the Divine Physician no matter what… and wake you up.

So please, hold on a little longer.

Just as I added those words too softly for anyone else to hear, light footsteps approached. A murmured conversation drifted through the gap in the cabin door.

“Stop, stop, stop. Move, and I’ll cut you.”

“Gasp! Please don’t! You know me.”

“I do. But not even a rat gets past me. That includes some brat who came rolling in from who knows where. You could be an assassin, for all I know.”

“An assassin? I’m a medical apprentice! How could you say something so outrageous?”

“Then what brings you here?”

“G-Great Hero Mu Song asked me to deliver a message.”

“Impossible. Unless you can get past Hyuk Mujin, Vice Squad Leader of the Jin Dragon Squad of the great Jin Family of Taiyuan, no one can—!”

Bang! Thud!

Mungyeong's jaw dropped as the Vice Squad Leader of the Jin Dragon Squad of the great Jin Family of Taiyuan struck his head on the corner of the door and collapsed.

"He's dead."

"He's not dead."

"B-But a blow like that must have caused serious damage to his head…"

"Enough. What did Senior Mu Song tell you?"

The boy stared back and forth between Hyuk Mujin and me in terror before answering.

"H-He said we're almost there, so you should get ready."

"Oh, really? All right. Gather your things too."

"I'm already packed."

Mungyeong had little luggage.

He pulled his acupuncture and moxibustion supplies from the small bundle clutched to his chest, examined Hyuk Mujin, then sighed in relief.

"Fortunately, his head didn't split open."

"That's because it's made of rock."

"Martial artists really are something else…"

"Oh? Getting cheeky, are we?"

"Gasp! I misspoke!"

I pretended I was about to rap him on the head, and Mungyeong flinched.

A quiet laugh escaped me.

"I'm kidding, you idiot."

"You startled me."

Traveling aboard a swift ship that sailed day and night was surprisingly grueling.

Whenever I finished circulating my internal energy and contemplating martial arts, I wandered the deck for some fresh air. Every time I did, I saw Mungyeong.

He was always checking on everyone else's condition.

He was a good kid. Apparently, he was also quite skilled. Even the river bandits who had been skeptical of him at first often approached him shyly for treatment.

And after talking with him a few times, he seems pretty cheerful too.

Contrary to the mature first impression he had given me, Mungyeong had a lively, boyish side.

Once someone told him who we were, he seemed to take an interest in the Murim and started asking all sorts of questions.

"Young Master Jin, you're the Disciple of Great Hero Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King? Wow!"

“I’ve heard all about Great Hero Mae Jonghak, the Sword Saint. Young Master Cheong must be incredible too.”

“Wow! The Beggars’ Sect! The Successor Beggar!”

“You’re the Vice Squad Leader of the Jin Dragon Squad? Ah, yes…”

In any case, Mungyeong had naturally blended into our group over those three short days.

Once we reach Chengdu, this will probably be the last time we sit across from each other and talk.

Once we reached Chengdu, our paths would naturally diverge.

I grabbed Mungyeong by the shoulder as he rose onto his toes and peeked over mine.

“Ow! That hurts!”

“What are you so curious about that you’re craning your neck like that?”

“Nothing. I just thought I saw someone’s foot through the gap in the door.”

The boy had sharp eyes. I had hurriedly covered Jeok Cheongang with leather, but Mungyeong had somehow spotted the exposed part.

Still, I answered casually without betraying any panic.

“You imagined it.”

“I don’t think I did…”

“Mungyeong.”

“Yes?”

“Do you really want to see what’s inside?”

He swallowed hard at my ominous tone and began backing away.

“W-Why are you acting like this?”

“I asked you a question. Do you want to see it?”

“No. No, I don’t!”

“Why not? Come inside and take a look. It’ll be fun.”

“Eek!”

Thump! Bang!

Mungyeong stepped on Hyuk Mujin as he backed away, fell over, then scrambled to his feet and fled.

Hyuk Mujin, whose back had been stepped on in the confusion, opened his eyes.

“H-Huh? I could’ve sworn I was just talking to Mungyeong.”

He looked around in bewilderment, then his face stiffened with shock.

“I didn’t even see him strike! He must be an assassin who has reached the Peak realm!”

Smack!

“Argh! Why did you hit me?”

“Stop talking nonsense and gather your things. We’re almost there.”

After giving Hyuk Mujin a satisfying whack on the back of the head, I returned to the cabin, moved Jeok Cheongang onto the pack frame, and stepped out onto the deck.

A giant standing at the stern of the slowing swift ship turned and greeted me.

“Oh, Junior.”

“Yeah, Senior.”

“…Is it just me, or have your answers gotten shorter?”

“It’s entirely your imagination. My voice is naturally a little quiet.”

Mu Song, the giant, stared at me with a dubious expression before calling over one of his subordinates and giving an order.

“Lower the blue flag and raise the white one.”

“Yes, Stronghold Lord.”

It might have sounded like some sort of blue-flag, white-flag game, but this was Water Dragon Stronghold’s signaling system. Apparently, it meant they had no intention of causing trouble.

“This may be an impertinent question, but are river bandits really allowed this close to such a busy area?”

“It is an impertinent question, but I’ll answer it anyway. Yes.”

“How?”

“Can you see it?”

Mu Song pointed toward the slowly approaching pier.

Tall wooden buildings stood packed closely together. Commoners passing by merely glanced at the swift ship before continuing on their way, while a few watched with curiosity.

We might have been far from the city center, but Chengdu was the capital and heart of Sichuan Province. Yet that was the extent of their reaction.

“Well? They all look used to us, don’t they?”

“They do. It’s strange how little attention they’re paying us.”

“It wasn’t always like this. Hwang Tae-gu, that son of a bitch, caused all kinds of trouble before I came along.”

Mu Song ground his teeth before continuing.

“I went through hell trying to change people’s opinion of us. Thanks to that, the authorities turn a blind eye to us now—to a point.”

“The authorities? You mean officials of the Great Nation?”

“That’s right. Dealing with us must have been a nuisance for them too. Formally requesting a fleet from the imperial court would have been burdensome, but staying on high alert every time they encountered us would have worn everyone down. So we reached a compromise.”

"What kind of compromise?"

"I'm different from Hwang Tae-gu. Only a complete idiot kills powerless commoners every time he gets the chance. It's like killing our own customers with our own hands."

"…"

"Of course, I refrain from killing because I dislike bloodshed. Not because of money."

That wasn't very convincing.

No matter how I looked at it, the only reason Mu Song didn't kill people seemed to be money.

What a money-mad river bandit.

I couldn't deny that Mu Song had a talent for shaking people down.

In any case, unlike Hwang Tae-gu, who robbed and killed indiscriminately, the moderate Mu Song had tried negotiating with the authorities and demonstrated considerable skill in doing so.

"Our range of activity has widened a little, while the authorities have received fewer petitions over people being killed by river bandits. Isn't that a benefit to both sides?"

"Even so, they let you come this far?"

"Not officially, of course. Ah, here they come now."

At the end of his gaze was a massive warship equipped with cannons.

Once the ships drew close enough that even people without martial arts could recognize one another, a middle-aged man in full armor suddenly stuck his head out from the stern.

"Who goes there?"

"General, it's me! I've come to put a few people ashore."

"People? Who?"

"My juniors. I'll personally vouch for them."

A river-bandit chief vouching for us. Yeah, that would go over well.

The official called back heartily.

"By all means!"

Fuck, it actually worked.

Mu Song suddenly pulled something from his robe and hurled it.

"Catch!"

The official snatched the bundle out of the air after it sailed toward him in a long arc, then grinned.

"You don't have to do this every time. Thank you. I'll buy you a proper drink next time."

"Sure, let's do that. How is the City Lord?"

“He had a son nine days ago.”

“Oh, what wonderful news. I’ll be sure to attend the doljabi.[1703]”

“Of course. The City Lord will be delighted.”

“Take care, then.”

“I wish you martial fortune, Stronghold Lord!”

For fuck’s sake. The country’s in fine shape.

After their cordial exchange, the warship turned back the way it had come, and the swift ship glided leisurely toward the pier.

“No need to drop anchor, right?”

“Huh? Oh, right.”

“Are you shocked? That’s how the world works. Still, you finally look like a young prodigy your age.”

Fair enough. Worse things happened in the real world, so what was the big deal?

I gave Mu Song, who was laughing heartily, a respectful clasped-fist salute.

“Thank you for your help, Senior. We had a comfortable journey thanks to you.”

“This was nothing. Hardly worth calling help. Just say the word. I am Ship-Fire Boy Mu Song!”

“Ah, truly the greatest Senior! You’ve turned the Yangtze upside down!”

“Ha ha ha!”

I grinned along with Mu Song as he roared with laughter.

“Then I’ll ask for your help again on our way back.”

“…”

“Senior?”

Mu Song stared at me, his eyes trembling.

“I’ll… send my subordinates.”

“Thank you!”

Yangtze taxi. What a steal.

Was it just my imagination, or was the swift ship moving much faster than usual?

I watched it cut frantically through the water as though fleeing a sea monster, then turned around.

The Bermuda Triangle and a beaming young medical apprentice stood there.

“Thanks to you, we arrived quickly. Thank you.”

“The men who rowed and steered did all the work, so why are you thanking me? I don’t know where you’re going or what for, but stay healthy.”

[1703] A doljabi is a Korean first-birthday ceremony in which a child chooses from symbolic objects believed to represent their future.

We had only spent a few days together, but I thought we had formed a pretty good bond.

He was usually innocent and carefree, yet surprisingly thoughtful. It was admirable how well he had endured the pain of losing his parents at such a young age.

I sincerely hoped he would become a fine physician.

“I don’t have a parting gift, but use this for travel expenses.”

I took out a few silver nyang[1704] and pressed them into his hand. Mungyeong stared at me in surprise.

“Y-Young Master, this is…”

“It’s fine. Think of it as allowance from your hyung.[1705]”

“But it’s too much.”

“Then pay me back later. Once you become a physician who can put Hua Tuo[1706]—or rather, the Divine Physician—to shame, come find me at the Jin Family of Taiyuan.”

“The Divine Physician…?”

“That’s right. If you’re going to do it, you might as well become the best.”

Mungyeong blinked, looking back and forth between me and the silver nyang[1707] in his hand. A faint smile touched his lips.

“Yes. I will.”

“Good. I’m leaving now. Take care.”

After the Bermuda Triangle and I exchanged farewells with Mungyeong, we turned to leave.

Hyuk Mujin, who had suffered through prolonged seasickness, quietly came up beside me and spoke.

“Captain, I’m exhausted. Can’t we rest for half a day before leaving?”

“No. It’s only another half day, so rest when we get there.”

“That’s only half a day if we use a movement technique. And I heard the people of the Sichuan Tang Clan are terrifying… We’ll have to be careful even when we breathe.”

“Then don’t rest. Die.”

“Is that any way to speak to your right-hand man?”

“What? I can’t hear you. My left pinky is mumbling something.”

Just as Hyuk Mujin’s lips jutted out a mile—

“Um, did you say you were going all the way to the Sichuan Tang Clan?”

[1704] A nyang is a traditional unit of currency; here it refers to silver money, not modern Korean won.
[1705] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.
[1706] Hua Tuo was a Chinese physician of the late Eastern Han period, renowned for his medical skill.
[1707] A nyang is a traditional unit of currency; here it refers to silver money, not modern Korean won.

"…"

"…"

We slowly turned our heads.

Mungyeong stood there, his eyes sparkling like morning stars.

"The thing is, I happen to be on my way to the Sichuan Tang Clan too. If you would allow me to accompany you, I would never forget this kindness even if this body died and died, then died ten thousand deaths more, until whether my soul existed or not—"

"Hey."

"Yes?"

"I get it. Shut up and follow us."

Fuck. Now it's the Bermuda Quadrilateral.

Chapter 335

Like Sichuan Province in the real world, Sichuan in this world boasted a vast territory.

Shanxi, Henan, and Shaanxi. You had to combine all three provinces for their total area to rival Sichuan's. That was how enormous it was.

The continent really is something.

With land this vast, it wasn't all that strange for three tigers to coexist in a single province.

The Emei Sect and Qingcheng Sect, both counted among the Nine Sects and One Gang. And…

Finally, the Sichuan Tang Clan. Or the Tang Family.

One of the three tigers crouching in Sichuan, it was also the closest to Chengdu, making it the perfect first destination.

If we can get the cooperation of all three factions and bring the Beggars' Sect into the picture, things should go much more smoothly.

As I was thinking this, Gung Gibang, who had been following a step behind me, pointed ahead.

"We're almost there. The Sichuan Tang Clan."

He was right. A wide basin stretched out before us, with a towering stone wall rising from it.

We were still too far away to judge its exact height, but it looked well over ten meters[1708] tall.

"What the hell? Why did they build a fortress?"

"History taught them a lesson."

"History?"

"They suffered terribly during the Great Faction War. When the Demonic Cult occupied Sichuan, many members of the Tang Family were killed, and even Tang Family Hill, the clan's main base, was burned to the ground."

"Their home base got completely wrecked."

"It wasn't that one-sided. As they retreated, they released all kinds of deadly poisons, so the Demonic Cult bastards who charged in without knowing what they were walking into died in droves too. Do you know the Sichuan Tang Clan's motto?"

"Uh… 'The North Remembers'?"

"…What the hell are you talking about?"

[1708] Ten meters is about 33 ft.

"You know nothing, Gung Snow."[1709]

Gung Gibang looked at me as though he were staring at a madman before opening his mouth.

"Repay kindness twofold. Repay grudges ten thousandfold."

"Damn, that's intense."

"It was. The demonic, heterodox bastards who sided with the Demonic Cult during the occupation of Sichuan died shitting and pissing through all seven apertures."[1710]

"Poisoning?"

"Poisoning, assassination, and even sending out pursuit squads to hunt them down independently. They died in all sorts of ways. A few may have survived through sheer luck, but they probably weren't really living even if they were alive."

Understandable.

Could that person walking toward me be an assassin sent by the Tang Clan? Had they perhaps poisoned the teacup? Trapped in a prison created by psychological pressure, they would have suffered from nervous exhaustion for the rest of their life.

They probably spent their days trembling in a corner with a sword in one hand and a silver spoon in the other.

"When it comes to poison and hidden weapons, the Sichuan Tang Clan is number one under heaven. No one can match how closed-off and relentless they are. Did you see anyone from the Sichuan Tang Clan at the Star-Array Grand Banquet?"

Thinking back, I couldn't remember seeing a single one.

Even factions that hadn't sent their young prodigies to compete in the Star-Array Grand Banquet, such as the Namgung Family, had sent important figures. But I hadn't heard of anyone coming from the Sichuan Tang Clan.

"I don't think so."

"Right? There wasn't anyone?"

"No. There really wasn't."

"That's the Sichuan Tang Clan."

They do whatever the fuck they want. No brakes.

I could feel it. The more I listened, the more uneasy I became.

What if they turn us down flat?

I had even brought a letter from the Sword Saint Mae Jonghak to request their cooperation, but I couldn't shake the feeling that something might go wrong.

[1709] "The North Remembers" and "You know nothing, Jon Snow" are references to Game of Thrones; Taekyung substitutes Gung Gibang's name for Jon's.

[1710] The seven apertures are the eyes, ears, nostrils, and mouth.

I was suppressing those thoughts and using my movement technique when Gung Gibang suddenly spoke.

“We should walk from here.”

“Do we really have to?”

“They probably won’t appreciate us approaching at high speed.”

“They might.”

Gung Gibang pointed at a massive boulder a few paces ahead.

Written across it in blood-red letters were the words:

> Anyone who approaches without permission will pay a blood debt.

“Let’s walk. I’ve been wanting to walk for a while now.”

“…”

“Hey, sometimes you need to look around at the scenery and gaze up at the sky. That’s what living is all about.”

Gung Gibang, Hyuk Mujin, and I stopped using our movement techniques.

One person did not.

With a fierce gust of wind, a figure shot straight toward the front gate.

Whoooosh!

“Hellooo!”

“Cheongpung, you crazy bastard!”

“I’m Cheongpung!”

Cheongpung hurtled forward, waving energetically, with a boy of similar build riding on his back.

Cheongpung spoke to Mungyeong, who was swaying pitifully in every direction.

“Medical apprentice, say hello!”

“H-Hello!”

Please don’t.

Don’t make him do weird things. And don’t do them just because he tells you to.

I lunged forward to grab Cheongpung by the scruff of his neck, but the Sichuan Tang Clan’s response came faster.

Whoooosh! Boom!

A massive spear as tall as a grown man hurtled down from atop the stone wall. It buried itself directly in front of Cheongpung’s foot, its shaft quivering.

Then, in the next instant—

“Who goes there?”

Clatter-clatter-clatter!

Dozens of crossbows appeared atop the wall along with the shout, which carried powerful internal energy.

Between the countless arrowheads glittering in the sunlight, a middle-aged man with his eyes wide open shouted at us again.

“Outsiders, identify yourselves!”

Cheongpung answered.

“Hello! I’m Cheongpung!”

“I-I am Mungyeong. P-please show mercy and lower your weapons, and I shall repay this grace even if this body dies and dies, then dies a hundred times over, until— Mmph!”

Stop it, you trolls!

I hurriedly clamped my hands over Cheongpung’s and Mungyeong’s mouths, then bowed repeatedly toward the wall.

“I’m sorry. I’m sorry. The kids don’t know any better. My name is Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.”

“Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan?”

The middle-aged man thought for a moment, then his eyes widened slightly.

“Jin Taekyung, the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi—the Disciple of Great Hero Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King?”

“Yes. That’s me.”

I jerked my chin toward Gung Gibang, who had arrived a beat later, and continued.

“This is the Oseong-and-Haneum villain—no, the Beggars’ Sect’s Successor Beggar, Gung Gibang.”[1711]

“The Disciple of Great Hero Jeok Cheongang and the Beggars’ Sect’s Successor Beggar…”

His tone and expression remained suspicious, but the middle-aged man’s wariness eased considerably.

When he crooked a finger, the crossbows aimed at us lowered toward the ground.

“What brings you to our family?”

“I’d like to meet the Family Head.”

“The Family Head?”

“Yes. It’s important.”

The middle-aged man frowned, apparently displeased with my answer, but this wasn’t something we could announce to the whole neighborhood.

The Sword Saint Mae Jonghak was no fool. There was a reason he had written the letter himself and entrusted us to deliver it in person instead of sending a messenger pigeon.

[1711] Oseong and Haneum were famous Joseon-era friends whose names are commonly paired.

"The Family Head has many matters to handle right now. Our family is not accepting any outsiders whatsoever. Leave and return another time."

"You only need to deliver a message."

"Impossible. The Family Head himself gave me these orders. And if your business were truly that important, you should have contacted us in advance."

Why is he being so damn firm? I didn't plan for this.

Gung Gibang seemed to be thinking the same thing. He whispered in a voice as small as an ant.

"Something's strange. Even for a closed-off place like the Sichuan Tang Clan, this is too much…"

I agreed. Pointing crossbows at us without warning and maintaining this level of vigilance were things one would expect only in wartime.

What a warm welcome.

Still, we had come to ask for their cooperation. I couldn't simply complain. If we wanted to meet the Family Head, it seemed we would have to show at least half our hand, even if we didn't reveal everything.

Can't be helped.

After a brief hesitation, I stared straight at the middle-aged man.

"I brought a letter from Great Hero Mae Jonghak, the Sword Saint."

"…!"

"Please allow me to meet the Family Head."

The effect was immediate. The Sword Saint Mae Jonghak was an idol to martial artists and a giant among giants who might become the Alliance Leader of the New Murim Alliance.

He was in a completely different league from greenhorns like us, who had only made names for ourselves within the past year or two.

"…Hmm. Wait here a moment."

The middle-aged man let out a groan and disappeared from the top of the stone wall. He returned a short while later.

His first words were practically a foregone conclusion.

"The Family Head has granted permission."

The moment he finished speaking—

Grrrrrrr.

The enormous iron gate slowly opened its jaws with a grinding groan.

Not long after passing through the iron gate, I realized my earlier suspicion had been correct.

Something happened. There's no doubt about it.

The people who appeared to be members of the Sichuan Tang Clan were proof enough. Their guarded movements, tense eyes, and overall atmosphere said it all.

The sense that something was wrong grew even stronger after we left the Outer Hall and entered the Inner Hall.

Clang! Clang! Clang!

Craftsmen hammered away at something without pause. Martial artists dressed in uniforms walked around in pairs, while crates loaded with weapons and hidden weapons were carried from place to place.

At the sight, Gung Gibang and I exchanged Sound Transmission.

— Hey, am I the only one getting a bad feeling?

— I feel it too. It looks like they're preparing for battle.

— Could they have found some demonic fiend? Maybe one of the men who set fire to the Sichuan Tang Clan during the Great Faction War.

— I don't know. For now, we should keep our mouths shut and pretend we don't know anything.

I had already been planning to do that. If they had intended to tell us, they would have done so by now.

The real problem was that only I had heard the Sound Transmission.

"Wow! I've never seen anything like this before! Are you preparing for a war or something?"

"…!"

"…!"

For a moment, I thought the world had stopped.

The craftsmen and martial artists around us froze in place and silently stared at us.

Hundreds of gazes pierced my entire body like hidden weapons.

What sin did I commit in my past life to get tangled up with a bastard like Cheongpung?

One second. Two seconds. Three seconds.

Is this the Hyperbolic Time Chamber?[1712]

By the time my mouth had dried out like the sand around the Sphinx's front paws, the middle-aged man guiding us spoke to the others.

"What are you doing? Get back to work."

Only then did the world begin moving again.

The middle-aged man glanced at the people returning to their tasks, then casually tossed a remark our way.

[1712] The Hyperbolic Time Chamber is a place in Dragon Ball where time passes differently from the outside world.

“You all look tight-lipped. I like that.”

On the surface, it sounded like a compliment.

So why did it sound like a warning to keep our mouths shut if we wanted to live long, healthy lives?

Why else? Because that’s exactly what he meant, damn it.

Maybe it was because of the Tang Clan’s association with poison and hidden weapons.

The middle-aged man and the other members of the Tang Family were clearly a step below me in skill, yet they all gave off an unmistakably dangerous scent.

“Hold your breath. That’s poison mist. It smells awful.”

“…Oh. Yes.”

So that was the dangerous smell?

I glared at the blue-haired bastard, who was still looking around with a bright expression, and continued walking behind the middle-aged man.

After walking for some time, we passed through five gates and finally stopped in front of the sixth.

“You cannot bring weapons into the Family Head’s Hall.”

Following the middle-aged man’s instructions, we handed over all our weapons. Afterward, the martial artists guarding the hall searched us as well.

They’re incredibly strict.

At that moment, one of the guards patting me down in search of hidden weapons suddenly flinched and shouted.

“There’s a hidden weapon here!”

“That’s not a hidden weapon. It’s my thing.”

“Pardon?”

“It’s mine. You know… that.”

“…!”

What kind of humiliation play is this?

I would rather pull out a poisoned hidden weapon than take that out in the Family Head’s Hall. It would be a much easier way to die.

I reluctantly gave him permission to see for himself, and the middle-aged man’s eyes widened.

“You’re quite impressive.”

“…Could you just let me through without saying anything?”

“I understand. But you really are impressive.”

“Oh, please.”

Reading the sincerity in my plea, he was about to order the guards to let us pass when he suddenly frowned.

“I nearly forgot. You there, stay behind.”

Oh, right. He was here.

The “you” the middle-aged man was referring to was Mungyeong.

“I hear you’re a medical apprentice who came to our family to obtain a prescription.”

Having been dragged this far before he even knew what was happening, Mungyeong answered in a trembling voice.

“Y-Yes.”

“Under normal circumstances, it would be out of the question… but you were fortunate enough to fall in with the right group. I’ll assign someone to guide you, so go take care of your business.”

“Th-Thank you.”

Mungyeong bowed deeply before disappearing with one of the martial artists. The middle-aged man took the lead and beckoned to us.

“Let us go inside.”

Twenty steps made of blue stone.

And at the top, a single door.

“Uncle, it’s me.”

An elderly voice answered the middle-aged man.

“Come in.”

Chapter 336

An old tree.

That was the first thing that came to mind when I saw the old man.

Inside the dark pavilion, partitioned off by cloth on all four sides, he stood alone with his back to us. He looked like an ancient tree that had lost every trace of life.

If he hadn't slowly turned around the next moment, I might have thought he had already taken root in the floor.

"I see…"

Green light swirled in his eyes.

The old man—Tang Sadok, the Myriad-Poison Asura[1713]—continued in a voice that hissed like a snake.

"You brought a letter?"

The middle-aged man answered.

"Yes, Uncle. Great Hero Mae Jonghak sent—"

"Did I ask you?"

"…!"

"This is no place for you. Leave."

Realizing his mistake, the middle-aged man bowed silently and left the pavilion.

After coldly dismissing his own nephew with a few words, Tang Sadok leaned back in a leather chair.

Would you look at the presence on this old man.

The problem was, it was a villain's presence.

From my first impression alone, I could have believed he belonged to the Demonic Cult rather than the orthodox faction.

I stepped forward beneath Tang Sadok's gaze.

"I am Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. It is an honor to meet you, Great Hero Tang Sadok."

Tang Sadok answered with an unreadable expression.

"I have heard that Senior Jeok took a Disciple in his later years. I also know of his ties to the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

"Oh, really?"

That was a good sign.

Tang Sadok stroked his chin in thought, then abruptly spoke.

"His name was… Yes, the Blade of Flowers, Jin Baekyang. Now I remember."

Good sign, my ass. That name pops up every time I'm about to forget it.

The Head Elder really must have been something in his day.

[1713] An asura is a powerful, often warlike being in Hindu and Buddhist traditions.

Then again, it made sense. He had been a Peak master who distinguished himself during the Great Faction War. It was hardly strange that he had formed friendships with other masters during that time.

He even said he'd met the Fire King once or twice.

Thanks to that, when I first met Jeok Cheongang, I got nailed with a Flame Divine Palm before I could explain the situation.

Tang Sadok stared at me and asked,

"How has Jin Baekyang been?"

"Well, you see…"

Before answering, I glanced around, ready to dodge in case a poisonous snake suddenly sprang out or a hidden weapon came flying at me.

"He passed away."

"What?"

Yeah, I knew this was coming.

Tang Sadok's eyes flew open, and I hurried to continue.

"It was an unfortunate accident. There were circumstances, of course. If you give me a little time, I can explain everything and clear up any misunderstandings—"

"No need."

"Excuse me?"

"He was an obnoxious bastard. Every time people fawned over him and called him a Great Hero or a chivalrous knight, it soured my mood."

"…"

"No martial artist dies without a reason. Once he is dead, that is the end of it."

I was relieved that this had gone more smoothly than expected, but the old man's personality was practically toxic.

Wasn't he basically saying he was glad the obnoxious bastard was dead?

His personality is practically on Dark Heaven's level.

Whether or not he sensed the suspicion taking root in my mind, Tang Sadok waved a hand irritably.

"Enough about the dead. Let us get to the point. Great Hero Mae Jonghak sent this old man a letter?"

"Yes. It'll be faster if you read it yourself."

I pretended to rummage through my robes and summoned the Sword Saint's handwritten letter from my Inventory.

Tang Sadok took the letter and read it. The furrows between his brows deepened until a furious roar finally burst from his throat.

"Those goddamn bastards!"

Whoooom!

The pavilion shuddered beneath the force of his profound internal energy.

His green robes billowed as his fury erupted, and he ground out each word as though chewing it up and spitting it out.

"Is everything written here true?"

"Yes. It happened exactly as the letter says."

The Sword Saint's letter clearly summarized the events in Henan and asked Tang Sadok to provide every possible assistance in finding the Divine Physician to treat Jeok Cheongang.

"To think Senior Jeok's condition is so grave…"

"Actually, there's something I'd like to ask before we begin searching for the Divine Physician."

The Sichuan Tang Clan was renowned throughout the martial world for its poisons and hidden weapons, but every member of the family was also a skilled physician.

And one among them stood at the very pinnacle.

I looked straight at Tang Sadok and asked,

"Could I meet the Grand Family Head?"

Poison King Tang Taesang.

A Supreme Peak master who had been called the greatest under heaven when it came to poisons and hidden weapons, even before the Great Faction War.

After dominating an entire era, he had passed the position of Family Head of the Sichuan Tang Clan to his only child twenty years ago and disappeared from public view.

That child was the old man standing before me now—Tang Sadok.

"We have no idea how many days it might take to find the Divine Physician. If the Poison King could examine my Master before then…"

"Enough."

Tang Sadok cut me off, his face rigid.

"Impossible. That is this old man's answer."

"…!"

My heart sank at the unexpected response.

Poison King Tang Taesang might not have appeared in public for many years, but Tang Sadok clearly knew where he was.

Impossible. Tang Sadok knew, yet he was still refusing to help.

My voice trembled despite myself.

"W-Why?"

"I cannot say."

"You cannot say?"

"Instead, I will assign several people to guide you. If you go to Qingcheng and Emei, they will gladly help you."

What did I just hear?

This shock was several times greater than the first.

Tang Sadok's words meant the Sichuan Tang Clan would not help us with this matter.

Well, it wasn't as though they were offering no help whatsoever.

A few guides to take us to the Qingcheng Sect and Emei Sect.

That was it.

That was all the help we could expect from the Sichuan Tang Clan.

The back of my head tingled as though someone had clubbed me with an iron rod. Something hot surged up from deep within my chest.

"Is that all?"

"What more did you expect?"

"We need to find the Divine Physician!"

"That is your problem, not mine or our family's. The fact that you brought a letter from Great Hero Mae Jonghak changes nothing. It was a request, and this old man refused it. That is all."

The words lodged in my throat.

Everything Tang Sadok said was true. To him and the Sichuan Tang Clan, helping us was a choice, not an obligation.

Right. Of course it was.

Once I finally accepted the truth I had kept desperately denying, bitter disappointment and anger welled up inside me.

As I stood there at a loss for words, someone stepped forward with the sweet scent of snacks.

"I am Cheongpung of Huashan. It is an honor to meet you."

So he had this side to him too.

Wearing an expression I had never seen before and speaking in an unfamiliar tone, Cheongpung offered a clasped-fist salute[1714] and continued.

"I do not know why you are refusing, Family Head, but if you help us, I will never forget this kindness."

"I know you are Great Hero Mae Jonghak's Disciple. One must be cautious when forming ties of gratitude and grudges[1715] in the martial world. Stop meddling in matters that do not concern you and step back."

"I'm not meddling."

"Then what are you doing?"

Cheongpung answered with a clear, unwavering gaze.

"My grandfather called it human compassion."

"…!"

[1714] A traditional greeting made by bringing one fist against the opposite open palm.

[1715] In the martial world, kindness and harm create moral debts that must be repaid.

Tang Sadok regarded Cheongpung with a complicated expression, then shook his head.

“Even if Great Hero Mae Jonghak came here and asked me himself, this old man’s answer would remain the same.”

“But…”

Cheongpung, Gung Gibang, and Hyuk Mujin all started to speak at once, but I cut in first.

“What’s the reason?”

“The reason?”

“Even a stray mutt passing by knows how powerful the Sichuan Tang Clan is. So why the hell are you refusing?”

“And what will you do if I do not wish to tell you?”

“What will I do?”

I stared into Tang Sadok’s green eyes and answered,

“Then the ties of gratitude and grudges[1716] you mentioned will form between me and the Sichuan Tang Clan. And I should warn you—they won’t be the pleasant kind.”

“Hah. What a fearless brat.”

“Normally, I check where I’m lying before I stretch out my legs, but in this case, I’m in a bit—well, a lot—of a hurry.”

Jeok Cheongang had half a year left at most.

Even the greatest martial sects under heaven and the Imperial Court had failed to find the Divine Physician.

If Jeok Cheongang died because he could not receive treatment in time… If he died because the Sichuan Tang Clan had refused to help…

“Then I don’t know what I might do.”

When I finished speaking, suffocating silence descended upon the pavilion.

Tang Sadok studied me for a long time, his gaze deep and unfathomable. At last, his lips parted.

“I regret what happened to Senior Jeok.”

“If you’re sorry, why not help us?”

“This old man would like to. But what can I do? Our family does not have the strength to spare right now.”

No strength to spare?

The moment I heard those words, the scenes I had witnessed on the way here flashed through my mind.

[1716] In the martial world, kindness and harm create moral debts that must be repaid.

An atmosphere so tense it bordered on murderous. Artisans working without rest. Weapons constantly being carried from one place to another.

“What the hell is going on?”

“Going on?”

Step.

Tang Sadok took a step toward me.

Perhaps it was due to the poison arts he had cultivated, but his green eyes gleamed more eerily than ever. Within them burned anger and grief.

“It has already happened. All that remains now is for our family to marshal its full strength and slaughter every last culprit involved.”

That was it.

That was why the Sichuan Tang Clan could not help us now.

That was why Tang Sadok had been so reluctant to explain himself, even after a green brat like me challenged him to his face.

That was why this took priority over finding the Divine Physician and saving the Fire King’s life—and why he had flatly refused to let me meet Poison King Tang Taesang.

“Don’t tell me…”

Perhaps he saw the realization on my face.

Tang Sadok met my wide-eyed stare and spoke in a voice thick with killing intent.

“By the time we received the news, it was already too late. Not one of his limbs had been left intact.”

Those words turned my suspicion into certainty.

Poison King Tang Taesang was dead.

“Hmm.”

The middle-aged man was of average height, with a round face and the sort of ordinary appearance one might see anywhere.

Leaning against the wall of a pitch-black cave, he carefully examined his forearm and muttered.

“This won’t do. The poison is vicious.”

He clicked his tongue softly.

He had done everything he could, but the best he had managed was to force all the poison into one arm.

“Poison King… He was fierce. More than I expected.”

Poison King Tang Taesang.

The expression on his face when he finally breathed his last was still vivid in the middle-aged man's mind.

But the result left the middle-aged man in a difficult position.

He had succeeded in eliminating the Supreme Peak master known as the Poison King, yet failed to accomplish the more important task.

Not that I ever expected it to be easy.

With that thought, the middle-aged man abruptly brought the edge of his hand down on his left forearm.

A dazzling flash burst forth, and the severed forearm fell to the ground.

Schhk! Ssssss!

Poison-laden blood splattered across the cave, melting everything it touched. Acrid toxic smoke billowed into the air.

The small creatures watching the middle-aged man from hidden crevices died the instant the smoke reached them, never knowing what had happened.

Eek… Eeeek…

Listening to the bats' dying shrieks, the middle-aged man walked out of the cave and grinned up at the blazing sunlight.

It was impossible to believe that smile belonged to a man who had just cut off his own arm.

Chapter 337

Inside the vast, chilly pavilion, a draft squeezed through the gaps around the windows, making the oil lamp on the windowsill flicker. An old man's face slowly appeared over the wavering flame.

Eyes suffused with green light and a body as withered as an ancient tree.

The old man's name was Tang Sadok. His alias was the Myriad-Poison Asura.

He was the Family Head of the Sichuan Tang Clan, one of the Five Great Families under heaven—and a son who had recently lost his father.

Whoooosh.

The cold wind beating against the closed window seemed to carry the voice I had heard several shichen[1717] ago.

By the time I heard the news, it was already too late. Not one of his limbs had been left intact.

The One God, the Three Saints, and the Ten Kings.

The heroes who had once saved the world from the hundred thousand forces of the Demonic Path had long since become white-haired old men.

Some had grown old or sick and died. Some had vanished after seeking peace. Others had handed their successors the responsibility and stepped down.

Poison King Tang Taesang had also left to find his own path.

There is a place called Meishan two days from here. My father often spoke of its beautiful mountains.

More than twenty years ago, it had only been natural for the Poison King to head for Meishan after stepping down as Family Head.

It must have been the final resting place chosen by an old martial artist who had spent his entire life weathering the turbulent currents of Murim.

He did not welcome visitors. We had no choice but to send someone to check on him every once in a while.

And that had become a scar that would never fade.

Several days ago, an unbelievable urgent report had arrived.

When Tang Sadok rushed there in a panic, he found the aftermath of a battle that had shaken heaven and earth—and the Poison King's corpse.

"My father's body had been… severely mutilated. They were unmistakable signs of torture."

I did not know why the culprit had tortured the Poison King.

But Poison King Tang Taesang, a Supreme Peak master who had dominated an entire era, had died that way. At the hands of an unknown figure whose name and face remained a mystery.

[1717] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

Furious beyond measure, Tang Sadok had personally led his clansmen in combing the surrounding area, but it was already too late.

I will find that bastard and kill him. I'll tear his limbs apart and scatter them across the Nine Provinces, then let the blood from his body flow into the Four Seas and Five Lakes.

What could anyone say to Tang Sadok as he raged, radiating suffocating killing intent? I understood his anger and resolve well enough.

He and the Sichuan Tang Clan would never stop until they found the culprit and killed him. Naturally, they could not help us find the Divine Physician.

"Poison King Tang Taesang is dead. The Poison King himself…"

A massive tectonic shift was taking place. And it was happening right beside us.

Just as I murmured those words while staring at the oil lamp, an urgent voice came from behind me.

"Watch your mouth. Do you have any idea what'll happen if you say something like that in the middle of the Sichuan Tang Clan?"

It was not difficult to tell who the voice belonged to. I had sensed the three of them approaching long ago.

Without turning my head, I answered, "You're back."

"Not 'you're back.' I said watch your mouth. Your mouth!"

"It's fine. There's no one nearby."

"I'm saying we should be careful. Being around you scares the life out of me."

Gung Gibang sighed and dropped into a chair. Cheongpung and Hyuk Mujin entered behind him and each claimed a seat.

"Where did you go?"

Gung Gibang answered curtly.

"The Chengdu branch of the Beggars' Sect."

"Mungyeong went with you?"

"Of course not. He's holed up in the pavilion the Tang Clan provided for him. When I saw him earlier, he was so absorbed in a medicinal prescription that he didn't even notice someone had come in. He'll probably stay the night and leave with us tomorrow."

"So? Did you find anything out?"

"No. It was a waste of time. I casually probed the branch leader about the Sichuan Tang Clan, but he didn't know much either."

That was understandable. From what I had heard, the Poison King's residence lay deep in a remote mountain valley that no one ever visited. Only a member of Tang Sadok's household would secretly stop by every once in a while.

Besides, the Sichuan Tang Clan deliberately covered everything up…

Tang Sadok wanted his family to take revenge on its own.

Considering the power possessed by the Sichuan Tang Clan, a great Murim family, and the character they had displayed, their independent course of action was not strange at all.

“He did find it a little suspicious. Apparently, the Sichuan Tang Clan recently sent people to request some information they needed.”

“They’ve already caught the scent. Did you tell him?”

Gung Gibang hesitated for a moment before speaking.

“Although Great Hero Tang Sadok ordered everyone to remain silent… I’m the Successor Beggar of the Beggars’ Sect. I told the branch leader the truth and instructed him to keep an eye on anyone suspicious.”

“What about Cheongpung?”

Amid the serious atmosphere, Cheongpung was struggling mightily to suppress a yawn.

“I sent a messenger eagle to my grandfather, just as my Benefactor instructed.”

Gung Gibang nodded and added, “The message will reach him within seven days at the latest.”

“Good. Well done.”

I thought we had taken the bare minimum of precautions.

Tang Sadok would be furious if he found out, but this was something I had to do.

“Um, Captain.”

“Hmm?”

Hyuk Mujin glanced around cautiously before speaking.

“May I ask you something?”

“If I say no, will you refrain from asking?”

“No. You know I can’t stand not knowing something.”

“…”

I was already so troubled that I could die from it, and this idiot was unbelievable.

For a moment, I considered giving him a good, satisfying smack for the first time in a while, but held myself back.

“What is it?”

“Why are you clenching your fist? That’s scary.”

“Stop stalling and ask, you bastard.”

Hyuk Mujin eyed my fist warily and whispered, “Who’s the culprit?”

“The culprit?”

“Yes. The culprit who killed and even tortured Great Hero Tang Taesang, the Poison King.”

“Well, well. The culprit.”

Smack!

“Argh! Why did you hit me?”

“If I, knew, would I, be here, doing this? Huh?”

Smack! Smack! Smack! Smack!

I pummeled the back of his head without holding back. It was wonderfully cathartic.

“Ugh… If you didn’t know, you could’ve just said so. Why…”

“Because you’re spouting nonsense and pissing me off.”

“Th-that’s…”

Gung Gibang looked contemptuously at Hyuk Mujin as he thrashed around, clutching his head.

“Tsk, tsk. Even a stray yellow dog is wiser than you. How would anyone know who that heinous bastard is or where he came from?”

Hyuk Mujin wiped away a stray tear and muttered, “You spread a mat beside that stray yellow dog and beg in the street.”

“What did you say?!”

“Why? Am I wrong?”

“How dare you insult our Sect!”

“They say you should call a spade a spade. Don’t misunderstand—I only look down on you, Young Hero Gung.”

Cheongpung burst out laughing and clapped.

“Wow! Benefactor! Young Hero Hyuk said he looks down on Young Hero Gung!”

“Don’t laugh! Stop him, you lunatic Cheongpung!”

Hyuk Mujin had gotten much better with his words.

I held back Gung Gibang, who looked ready to explode after that brutal dose of truth.

“Both of you, calm down.”

That did not seem sufficient, so I added one more thing.

“Unless you want me to beat you to death.”

“…”

“…”

That was better.

I let out a deep sigh as I watched them glower and huff at each other.

“Who knows what kind of bastard the culprit is? If we knew, the Sichuan Tang Clan would’ve caught and killed him already.”

Still glaring, Hyuk Mujin said, “I know that. I mean, do you have any guesses?”

“Think before you ask. Think, you foolish bastard.”

“But when did we become close enough for you to keep speaking informally to me? Does being the Beggars’ Sect’s Successor Beggar give you the right to look down on the Vice Squad Leader of the great Jin Family of Taiyuan's Jin Dragon Squad? Don't you agree, Captain?"

…Actually, given the difference between them, it did seem reasonable for him to look down on Mujin.

When I did not answer, Hyuk Mujin's eyes narrowed.

I subtly changed the subject.

"Well, Murim is crawling with suspicious bastards. There are the Dark Heaven and Demonic Cult bastards, for starters."

"Hmph! Do you think they're the only possibilities?"

Gung Gibang snorted harshly and picked up the thread.

"The Sichuan Tang Clan has devoted all its strength to eliminating demonic, heterodox arts. It could have been someone with a personal grudge."

I stared in disgust at the booger stuck to the bridge of Gung Gibang's nose.

"Weren't those demonic and heterodox bastards wiped out already?"

"No matter how thoroughly you sweep a courtyard, some sand always remains. The world is vast. Do you really think there was nowhere for them to hide? Some survived to the bitter end despite the relentless pursuit."

That was a valid point.

And if they had survived being hunted by the orthodox faction that ruled Murim, every last one of them had to be an incredible master.

Like the Yin-Yang Twin Freaks I fought at Shaolin.

Who could have imagined that two Supreme Peak fiends believed to be dead would appear at Shaolin?

Murim was a place where countless chains of gratitude and grudges became tangled together. No matter what happened or where, nothing was truly surprising.

And there was the torture.

There were two reasons to torture someone.

Either you hated them enough to make them suffer before killing them, or there was something you wanted them to tell you.

I did not know the culprit's purpose, but one thing was certain.

…One seriously dangerous bastard has appeared.

And he was someone I did not want to encounter, even by chance.

My current realm was at the very edge of Peak. I had not yet attained enlightenment, but with the power I had obtained through the System, I could hold my own against someone who had just entered Supreme Peak.

Hwangbo Eom, the Taeeul Merciless Sword, was a perfect example.

But an opponent beyond that level would be difficult. In fact, if I had not gained a small insight during my battle with Hwangbo Eom, I might have been forced to kneel before his Taeeul Formless Sword.

And if my opponent was powerful enough to kill the Poison King, who had ranked among the five strongest of the Ten Kings…

As I am now, defeat would be certain.

As much as it pained me, I had no choice but to accept that reality.

While I was quietly lost in thought, Gung Gibang suddenly spoke as if something had just occurred to him.

“Come to think of it, the culprit could be an assassin.”

“A killer? An assassin?”

“Are there other kinds of assassins?”

I frowned.

“You think those bastards are that skilled?”

“You don’t know what you’re talking about. According to my Master, the Valley Master of Moonshadow Assassination Valley has killed no fewer than three Supreme Peak masters.”

“…An assassin killed three Supreme Peak masters?”

“Without a doubt. I heard it threw the entire Murim into an uproar.”

“Then is that Valley Master or whatever the greatest assassin under heaven?”

Gung Gibang looked at me as though I were the most insane person alive.

“What are you talking about? The greatest assassin under heaven has never changed.”

“Oh.”

I had momentarily forgotten.

The Sword Saint. The Bow Saint. And finally, the man known as the Slaughter Saint.

When I first heard the name, I thought he was called the Slaughter Saint simply because he’d killed so many people.

As it turned out, being an assassin was his actual profession.

According to Jeok Cheongang, he had taken more lives than anyone could count. He killed people from the orthodox, demonic, and heterodox factions alike, so fairly and impartially that he had even been branded an enemy of all Murim.

That was until the Great Faction War.

He had killed so many demonic fiends that people had no choice but to issue an amnesty decree for the man who had once been an enemy of all Murim—and give him the alias Slaughter Saint.

“Of course, there’s no way the Slaughter Saint killed Great Hero Tang Taesang, but the Sichuan Tang Clan is probably considering the possibility that an assassin did it.”

“It’s unfortunate, but they’ll deal with it themselves.”

Whoever the culprit was, I had only one goal: find the Divine Physician and save Jeok Cheongang.

It was unfortunate that we could not receive help from the Sichuan Tang Clan, but Qingcheng and Emei still remained.

Which meant…

“Young Hero Gung, did you pull that booger out in advance so you could eat it as a late-night snack?”

“What did you say?!”

“Wahahaha! Benefactor! Young Hero Gung is going to eat his booger as a late-night snack!”

…No, seriously. What the hell was wrong with these bastards?

Unable to take it any longer, I overturned the table.

“Get the hell out! We have to leave early tomorrow, so go get some damn sleep!”

I unleashed a lion’s roar and chased the Bermuda Triangle away, then dropped back into my chair.

I stared blankly at the flickering oil lamp before murmuring, “Inventory open. Summon.”

Tap.

A small jade-colored shard appeared in my palm.

When I turned over the Divine Physician’s Token, faint writing appeared.

> The finest Chinese gallnuts come from Sichuan.

Chinese gallnut, my ass. They should’ve written down the damn home address.

Chapter 338

That night, my mind was so full of worries that I never made it to bed. All I could do was watch the sun come up.

My body isn't tired, but my mind is.

Looking back, I had been through every kind of upheaval imaginable over the past few months.

If I hadn't kept my body and mind clear by circulating my qi, I might have developed stress-induced hair loss.

I had considered crossing over to reality for a while to rest, but a crazy skeleton mage was running wild over there.

Come to think of it, that place is in Sichuan too.

Was some kind of curse following me?

No wonder Shu was the first kingdom to fall in Romance of the Three Kingdoms.

Feeling vaguely uneasy, I left the pavilion with the pack frame on my back. The Bermuda Triangle was already outside waiting for me.

"Oh? The booger's gone. Did you really eat it as a late-night snack?"

"Stop! I said stop!"

"Benefactor! Benefactor! Gung Gibang ate that booger last night!"

"I did not!"

"…"

Ugh. I wanted to beat every last one of them to death.

If this were a novel and I were the author, I would find some way to kill those bastards.

But when did anything in this world ever go the way I wanted? I was shaking my head when—

"Huff, huff. I'm sorry I'm late!"

Right. There was that guy too.

Mungyeong came running up, panting heavily.

"Huff… I-I stayed up late reading medicinal prescriptions, and…"

I didn't even have to look. I could see the whole thing in virtual reality: he had clearly pushed himself too hard in his burning enthusiasm for learning, then overslept.

I waved off Mungyeong as he anxiously watched my expression.

"It's fine. I just came out too. By the way, you've picked up quite a bit of luggage overnight."

"Oh, this?"

Mungyeong smiled brightly and patted his bulging travel bag.

“They gave me copies of some precious medicinal prescriptions and plenty of medicinal herbs, and—and… Anyway, they gave me all sorts of things!”

“Good. Congratulations.”

“Hehe.”

That kid was absolutely thrilled.

Then again, to a novice medical apprentice like Mungyeong, all of this was practically a fortuitous encounter.

The Sichuan Tang Clan wasn’t the kind of place that opened its doors to anyone who knocked, much less freely handed over medicinal prescriptions.

It was a great Murim family as well as a renowned medical family. Everything Mungyeong had gained here would be a tremendous asset to him in the future.

“Good. You should be able to take something away from this, at least.”

“Huh?”

“Never mind.”

“Did things not go well for you?”

“Yeah. There’s someone who absolutely has to be treated, but… circumstances are making it difficult.”

We were still talking when the middle-aged man we had met the day before approached with several subordinates.

“Everyone’s here. Follow me.”

We followed him. The atmosphere and behavior of the people we passed seemed even more tense than yesterday, but there were far fewer martial artists around.

It’s begun.

Large numbers of martial artists must have left to hunt down the culprit.

No, the hunt had probably begun before we even arrived. Tang Sadok had lost his father. There was no way he would have spent several days sitting around in a daze.

After walking while lost in thought, we soon reached the iron gate.

As the gate slowly opened, the middle-aged man abruptly spoke.

“Uncle—no, the Family Head asked me to deliver a message.”

“What did he say?”

“Once his revenge is complete, our family will help you with all its strength.”

Mungyeong looked confused, but everyone else, myself included, offered a clasped-fist salute.

“May you achieve what you seek.”

“And you as well.”

A faint smile crossed the middle-aged man’s cold face.

We hadn’t received any practical assistance, but this was a decent enough farewell.

Now it was time to say goodbye to one more person.

“It’s been fun.”

Mungyeong nodded as though he understood.

“You’re leaving again.”

“Yeah. We have a lot of places to stop by.”

“If I may ask, where are you going…?”

“Qingcheng. Then Emei.”

Mungyeong’s eyes widened.

“Oh! Mount Qingcheng and Mount Emei, two of the most famous mountains under heaven! You don’t mean the sacred sites of Daoism and Buddhism, where all manner of exotic flowers and mystical herbs are said to be hidden?”

“…Uh, I think those are the ones.”

“I can’t believe it! You’re going somewhere that wonderful!”

What was this? Déjà vu?

I felt as if I had been seeing this same scene a lot lately. Just as a strange sense of foreboding sent a chill down my spine, Mungyeong let out a soft sigh.

“It’s a shame, but I can’t go with you this time. I have to return to my master.”

“Nice one, Master!”

“…?”

“I mean, that’s too bad.”

“Riiight.”

“I mean it, you punk.”

Mungyeong gave me a suspicious look, then bowed deeply.

“Thank you for everything. Thanks to all you Young Masters, I survived and had so many wonderful experiences.”

“There’s no need to thank me. Stay healthy, study hard, and focus on becoming a great physician.”

Mungyeong’s eyes sparkled.

“Like the Divine Physician?”

“Exactly. Like the Divine Physician.”

“Yes, Young Master! I’ll engrave your words on my heart and never forget them!”

A quiet laugh escaped me at his spirited answer.

“Take care, then.”

“Goodbye! We have to meet again someday!”

If fate brought us together again, we would meet one way or another.

I waved to Mungyeong, then turned resolutely toward the west.

“Come on. Let’s go to Qingcheng.”

I was just about to take my first determined step when—

“Young Hero Jin Taekyung?”

“Hm?”

I looked back and saw the Bermuda Triangle standing there blankly beside two unfamiliar men.

They were the guides the Sichuan Tang Clan had assigned to us.

“What is it?”

“Um, well…”

“…?”

“That’s not the right direction. The road is blocked if you go that way.”

“…!”

The guides Tang Sadok had assigned us proved to be a stroke of genius.

Unusually for members of the Tang Clan, they specialized in gathering and cultivating medicinal and poisonous herbs rather than martial arts. Perhaps because of that, they knew the land of Sichuan like the backs of their hands.

“We go this way from here, right?”

“No. That way is faster.”

“But according to the map, this seems to be the right way.”

“What’s written on a map isn’t always the answer. That’s especially true of old maps.”

“The Sichuan Tang Clan gave me this one.”

“I drew that map twenty years ago.”

“…”

“Let’s go.”

Well, if the mapmaker said it was the wrong way, then it was the wrong way.

After that, I simply went wherever they told me and stopped whenever they told me. Of course, I wasn’t just following them around doing nothing.

“Wait. Can’t we just jump across here?”

“Huh? This is a cliff.”

“If we jump straight to the cliff on the other side, we’ll get there in no time.”

“You’ll die in no time too. The gap is nearly twenty zhang[1718] wide. How could you possibly—”

“Come on, let’s give it a try.”

Boom! Whoooosh! Tap-tap!

“See? It works.”

[1718] A zhang is a traditional unit of length, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Twenty zhang is about 61 m (200 ft).

"…It actually works."

"All right, cross one at a time!"

"…Are you talking to us?"

"Oh."

"Could you jump back over and carry us across?"

"Can do. Easily."

I was willing to do anything if it would save time.

Combine Made-in-Sichuan navigation with monstrous physical abilities that far exceeded human limits, and wherever I went became a road.

"My goodness… This is impossible. It only took half a day to get from Chengdu to Mount Qingcheng. The journey normally takes three days."

"Impossible is nothing."[1719]

I tossed out a famous line I had picked up from television as we entered Mount Qingcheng.

After revealing our identities to the disciples of the Qingcheng Sect, we were escorted to Shangqing Palace, where the sect decided all matters great and small. There, we met another Supreme Peak master: the Sect Leader of the Qingcheng Sect, Cheongpung the Ancient Sword.

"I'm Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

"Wow, hello! I'm Cheongpung! I've never met anyone with a name so similar to mine before. It's so nice to meet you!"

"Please shut up… And Cheongpung the Ancient Sword isn't his name. It's his alias."

The Elders of the Qingcheng Sect stared at us as if they had never seen such lunatics in their lives, but their Sect Leader, Cheongpung the Ancient Sword, proved far more straightforward than I had expected.

After reading the letter I handed him, he chuckled like a friendly old man from the neighborhood.

"We should help one another. Besides, Great Hero Mae Jonghak personally asked this favor of us."

That evening, the residents at the foot of Mount Qingcheng were thrown into an uproar.

Daoists from the Qingcheng Sect, whom they were lucky to see even a few times a year, came streaming down the mountain in a long procession.

There were hundreds of them. Among their number were the Qingcheng Seventy-Two Swordsmen, all First Rate masters, as well as two Elders.

"Our Sect Leader Senior Brother ordered us to do our utmost to help Young Hero Jin find the Divine Physician."

[1719] "Impossible Is Nothing" is an Adidas advertising slogan.

“Junior Brother and I have been nothing but old men gathering dust for years, but we’ll gladly step forward for something like this. Ho ho.”

Thank you. Overwhelming thanks…

Honestly, I couldn’t help getting a little choked up.

We might all belong to the orthodox faction, but an entire sect had rolled up its sleeves to save Jeok Cheongang.

“I will repay the Qingcheng Sect for this help.”

“I’ll hear that again after we find the Divine Physician.”

“And this isn’t all. We’ve also sent messenger pigeons to our lay disciples, so we should receive good news soon.”

Although the Qingcheng Sect did not possess the same standing as Huashan or Shaolin, it was still a massive, prestigious sect—large enough to be called one of the Nine Sects and One Gang.

The vast web of connections it had formed through its lay disciples would be an enormous help.

“Thank you. Truly, thank you.”

“A man shouldn’t bend his back so readily. We’re merely doing what we ought to do, so pay it no mind.”

“That’s right. Too much gratitude is unsightly. Enough with the formalities. Tell us where we should begin looking.”

I rubbed at the corners of my reddened eyes and answered.

“Everywhere.”

“Huh?”

“What?”

“All of Sichuan…”

“…!”

“…!”

After a brief silence, quiet mutters slipped from the lips of the two old Daoists who looked like immortals.

“Goddamn it…”

“How are we supposed to find him…?”

Leaving behind the two Daoists, who had begun succumbing to the woes of the secular world less than fifteen minutes after descending the mountain, I set off toward our next destination.

“Benefactor! Are we going to Mount Emei now?”

“No. Gung and Mujin will handle the Emei Sect.”

We had two guides, and there were already plenty of people in our group. There was no need for everyone to travel in one huge crowd.

There was no telling where Cheongpung might run off to, so I would keep him with me. By now, Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin were probably running as fast as they could toward the Emei Sect.

Just then, one of the guides asked curiously,

“Then where are you going?”

“To the authorities.”

“The authorities? You mean you’re going to a government office?”

“Yes.”

“Young Hero Jin, I don’t know what connections you have with the authorities, but this isn’t something you can accomplish by mobilizing a few constables.”

“Right.”

“Then why…?”

I spoke to the guide, who shook his head as though he could not understand me at all.

“But wouldn’t it be a different story with hundreds or thousands of people?”

“H-Hundreds or thousands? Are you perhaps acquainted with the Sichuan City Lord?”

“No.”

I grinned and continued.

“I’m friends with a king.”

“Pardon?”

Prince Shangshan, Zhu Bao.

He was the one and only younger brother of the emperor of the Great Nation that ruled the world, a noble imperial Prince—and a huge fan of mine.

Chapter 339

Early morning.

Nestled in the arms of his favorite concubine, the City Lord of Sichuan Province asked groggily, “Who is it? Who’s here to see me?”

Confronted with his superior’s naked body first thing in the morning, the Captain of the Guards hurriedly lowered his gaze.

“Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan and a man named Cheongpung of Huashan request an audience.”

“Huashan?”

The name was fairly familiar.

Though he had been born into a powerful aristocratic family and lived a life entirely removed from Murim, even the City Lord of Sichuan had heard of Huashan more than once.

“Huashan… Isn’t that one of those Ten Great Sects or whatever they’re called?”

“More precisely, they are known as the Nine Sects and One Gang. Huashan is a prestigious sect renowned throughout Murim.”

“They’re still nothing but ruffians. Calling men who swing swords in broad daylight without so much as an identification plaque a prestigious sect… Tsk, tsk.”

The Captain of the Guards had once roamed the martial world himself. He had plenty to say, but antagonizing the City Lord would not be wise.

The City Lord clicked his tongue at the silent captain, then suddenly spoke again.

“Wait. The Jin Family of Taiyuan sounds rather familiar too.”

“It is an emerging sect that unified the Murim of Shanxi two years ago and has now made its name known throughout the Central Plains. Of course, if we are speaking only of the family’s history, it is old enough to rival the Nine Sects and One Gang…”

“No, that’s not what I mean. I’ve definitely heard the name plenty of times… Ah!”

After frowning in thought for a moment, the City Lord slapped his knee with a cry of realization.

“That’s right. The Jin Family Escort Bureau!”

“The Jin Family Escort Bureau…”

Only then did the Captain of the Guards recall what he had momentarily forgotten.

Come to think of it, it had not been that long ago. Three or four months at most. The sight of wagons laden with riches rolling in one after another had stretched the City Lord’s smile from ear to ear.

“But weren’t they the Jin Family Trading Company?”

“The Jin Family Escort Bureau and the Jin Family Trading Company. Both belong to the Jin Family of Taiyuan, if I remember correctly. Yes, it’s all coming back to me.”

The Jin Family of Taiyuan had entered the world of commerce in earnest by opening new trade routes through the northern tribes. Before long, its name had begun spreading throughout the Central Plains.

“So, what have they brought this time?”

The Captain of the Guards hesitated beneath the City Lord’s expectant gaze.

“Well… they appear to have come empty-handed.”

“What?”

“However, the young man named Jin Taekyung is a direct descendant of the Jin Family of Taiyuan and a young prodigy who has earned great fame in Murim…”

“Enough of that martial-world nonsense.”

The City Lord was already scowling.

Born into an aristocratic family, he had noble pride ingrained in his very bones.

If the Jin Family Trading Company had come bearing bribes, he would have welcomed them with open arms. But some young brat claiming to be the direct descendant of a frontier martial family and requesting a private audience at the crack of dawn was another matter entirely.

No need to hear him out. He’s obviously here to ask for some filthy favor. This is why you shouldn’t accept things from lowborn people so readily.

Having already decided they were unwelcome guests, the City Lord pulled the blanket up to his chin.

“Damn it. I finally got a good night’s sleep, and now my mood is ruined.”

At that moment, his favorite concubine stirred awake and asked in a seductive voice, “My lord, what has you so upset?”

“Some young brat showed up at the crack of dawn. You remember the Jin Family Trading Company that came by a few months ago, don’t you, Aehyang?”

“Oh my. Yes, yes. Of course I do.”

“He says he’s a direct descendant of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, a pack of martial-world ruffians from Shanxi.”

“And?”

“What do you mean, ‘and’? He’s obviously here to ask for some dirty favor, so I should throw him out immediately. How dare he…”

“My lord.”

“What is it?”

“Why don’t you meet him just this once?”

“W-What?”

“He might have brought another nice gift. Like this pretty necklace I’m wearing.”

The City Lord’s heart melted at his concubine’s coy smile.

Just as she said, many of the items the Jin Family Trading Company had brought last time had been rare treasures.

The various pieces of jewelry and ornaments said to have been made by the northern tribes were mysterious yet exquisitely crafted. His concubine wore them constantly and never took them off.

“It’s my request. Won’t you grant it? Please?”

Favorite concubine launches three seconds of pleading gaze!

It was super effective!

The City Lord of Sichuan frantically waved to the Captain of the Guards.

“Bring them in. Quickly!”

“Yes. Shall I escort them to the reception room?”

“What reception room? I’ll only be seeing their faces for a moment. Bring them here.”

“…”

“What are you waiting for? Hurry up and bring in those martial-world ruffians.”

The Captain of the Guards bowed with a sour expression and left the room. The City Lord thrust out his protruding belly and put on airs for his concubine.

“I’m only agreeing to meet them as a special favor because you asked.”

“Thank you, my lord. But I heard those martial-world ruffians are terribly rough… Aehyang is scared.”

“What? Scared?”

The City Lord burst into hearty laughter, then declared in a deliberately stern voice, “Ho! I govern an entire city by the command of His Imperial Majesty himself. Are you saying you fear a few common street thugs?”

“Oh my. My lord, you’re so wonderful!”

The City Lord embraced the concubine nestled against him and smiled contentedly.

“Don’t worry about a thing. The moment those bastards enter, I’ll force them to their knees so they cannot even look at you.”

“Th-That’s…!”

Patter-patter-patter—thud!

The naked City Lord bolted out of bed, threw himself flat on the floor, and cried out, “I-I behold the token of His Highness Prince Shangshan!”

Good grief. Did he cook a locomotive smokestack rare and eat it?

His reaction was so extreme that even I was momentarily taken aback.

All I had done was take that out and show it to him.

Was it really that powerful?

I looked down at the gold plaque in my hand.

It had been about a year ago, if I remembered correctly. I had even held a private autograph session for Prince Shangshan, Zhu Bao, and received this Item as a Quest completion Reward.

SYSTEM

Item Window
Prince Shangshan's Token
Type: Treasure
Grade: None
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Description: A token imbued with the authority of Prince Shangshan, Zhu Bao, the emperor's only younger brother and an imperial prince. The clouds and dragon engraved into its surface symbolize the imperial family, and it is also of immense artistic value.
Special Note: Can be used only once.

I never expected to use something I had shoved into my Inventory and forgotten about like this.

I had known the imperial family wielded enormous authority in this world, but the City Lord's reaction exceeded even my expectations.

It's a shame I can only use it once.

Still, I couldn't complain.

I decided to give Prince Shangshan even better fan service from now on.

Next time I see him, I'll give him a rare collectible and even throw in a free hug.

When I remained silent, the City Lord cautiously raised his upper body.

At first, he had looked at Cheongpung and me as though we were street thugs. Now his eyes were trembling as though an earthquake had struck.

Wobble, wobble.

"…"

No, seriously. That did not need to be shaking too.

At my disgusted glare, the City Lord hurriedly covered his lower body.

"Th-There's a reason for this…"

There probably was.

Spring flowers were beginning to bloom outside, but the smell of chestnut blossoms[1720] was overpowering in here.

I picked up a blanket lying nearby and tossed it to him.

"Th-Thank you."

[1720] The scent of chestnut blossoms is used here as a euphemism for the smell of semen.

"Don't mention it."

If anything, I was the grateful one. Looking at a naked middle-aged man who appeared thirty-five weeks pregnant was torture in itself.

Beside me, Cheongpung stared at the City Lord's bulging belly with keen interest and whispered, "Benefactor. Do you think it's a boy or a girl?"

"Men can't give birth."

"Gasp!"

Still, he had come a long way. Just a year ago, he had firmly believed in the theory that cranes delivered babies by rocket express.

I addressed the City Lord, who had covered his lower body with the blanket and was watching me nervously.

"Neither of us gains anything by dragging this out, so I'll get straight to the point. We came to ask you for a favor."

"T-The messenger of His Highness Prince Shangshan need only speak. I will help to the fullest extent of my power."

"I'm looking for someone. First, how many people can you mobilize?"

The City Lord hesitated before answering uncertainly, "W-Well, I'm not sure. Excluding the forces needed to defend against invasions by the border tribes, I believe I could mobilize several thousand."

Several thousand government troops alone. If we added the constables from the local offices, the number would be even higher.

That was excellent news.

I smiled broadly, grabbed the City Lord by the shoulder, and pulled him to his feet.

"Then let's start by searching everywhere around Chengdu. The first condition is that the person must be a physician."

"A physician? The person you're looking for is a physician?"

"Yes. People call him the Divine Physician."

"Gasp! The Divine Physician? You mean that Divine Physician?"

"Why? Are you losing your nerve? If you do a good job, I could put in a good word for you with His Highness Prince Shangshan."

After thinking for a moment, the City Lord of Sichuan cried out in a trembling voice, "I will devote myself to completing the mission!"

Wobble, wobble.

"…"

No, everything else was fine, but he really needed to stop that from shaking too.

The reputation I had heard about the City Lord of Sichuan was the worst imaginable.

He was known as an incompetent official who had claimed his current position through his family's influence. His hobby was gobbling up bribes wherever he could get them, and his specialty was wine, women, and gambling—or so everyone said.

But he's the City Lord.

That was what mattered most. Just as I had borrowed the authority of Prince Shangshan, Zhu Bao, the City Lord possessed the authority and power of the most powerful man in Sichuan.

"The City Lord of Sichuan, Won Gyun,[1721] commands this! Let every official in Sichuan carry out my orders without fail!"

Hearing his name had made me trust him considerably less, but a City Lord was still a City Lord.

Courier horses bearing official documents raced to every corner of Sichuan, and notices seeking the Divine Physician were posted throughout the marketplaces. Naturally, an enormous reward was offered to anyone who provided information.

"A thousand silver nyang! As expected of an acquaintance of His Highness Prince Shangshan, you are truly generous!"

Won Gyun's admiring gaze did not last long.

"What are you talking about? You're paying for all of it."

"…What?"

"Do I look like someone who carries around a thousand silver nyang?"

"N-No, but even so, that's an enormous sum."

"Then put it on credit. I'll mention it to His Highness Prince Shangshan later and ask him to reimburse you."

"No! I'll pay it myself!"

"By squeezing the lifeblood out of the common people? Or by squeezing the fat out of your own belly?"

"Even if I have to spend my personal fortune, I will pay it myself!"

"Wow. Our City Lord is so cool!"

An enormous reward capable of changing a person's life several times over, along with a huge number of people mobilized for the search.

But even that was not enough.

If the Divine Physician could be found with this much, the imperial court wouldn't have given up.

Who was the Divine Physician?

He was an unknown figure whom the imperial court had failed to find even after spreading a proclamation throughout the world in the emperor's name.

People like that generally preferred to avoid notice.

[1721] Won Gyun shares his name with a Korean admiral infamous for disastrous incompetence.

“Let the government troops handle the marketplaces and busy districts. We’ll search every scenic mountain and stream.”

“I agree.”

“I should’ve just stayed at Qingcheng…”

The hundreds of Disciples who had descended the mountain with the two Elders of the Qingcheng Sect were perfect for the task.

Three days after the government and Murim joined hands and began an unprecedented full-scale search, they finally arrived.

“Captain…”

The moment I saw the exhaustion written across Hyuk Mujin’s face and Gung Gibang standing beside him in grim silence, I understood.

Something went wrong.

I could not rejoice even though the men I had been waiting for had finally arrived. One look was enough to tell me they had not brought the news we had hoped for.

I walked forward without a word. Passing Hyuk Mujin and Gung Gibang, I stopped before the person behind them.

“I’m Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.”

She was a middle-aged nun. Her closely shaven head and pallid complexion immediately caught my eye.

She was the Emei Sect’s only reinforcement.

No. She looked more like the survivor of a routed army.

“Th-This humble nun’s Dharma name[1722] is Myoryeong… Cough.”

Drops of blood trickled down her chin.

An internal injury.

I caught her as she staggered. Looking into the eyes of Venerable Myoryeong, which seemed ready to fade away at any moment, I asked forcefully, “What on earth… happened?”

[1722] A Dharma name is a religious name taken by a Buddhist monastic.

Chapter 340

The middle-aged nun, Venerable Myoryeong, struggled to speak, her face pallid.

“The Venerable Nun… has entered nirvana.”

The moment I heard those words, my fist clenched on its own, and something deep in my chest sank with a heavy thud.

The two Elders of the Qingcheng Sect, who had rushed over after sensing the ominous mood, stared wide-eyed and shouted.

“Venerable Myoryeong, what do you mean? The Venerable Nun has entered nirvana?”

“That’s impossible! It can’t be!”

I already knew whom they meant by the Venerable Nun.

She, too, was one of the masters of the previous generation who remained vividly etched in Jeok Cheongang’s memories.

She was remarkably forthright. She stopped at nothing against her enemies, and her martial arts were outstanding. There were even times when she surpassed Hong Dao, that lazy bald monk.

During the Great Faction War, the Demonic Cult had feared her as the Blood Rakshasa[1723], while the Murim of the Central Plains had bestowed upon her the sobriquet Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun.

Even as the years passed and the heroes of the past vanished one by one, she remained on Mount Emei and held her ground.

She was the Emei Sect’s sole Supreme Peak master and its respected Sect Leader.

And now the Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun was dead.

First the Poison King, and now the Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun.

What a damned mess.

I finally spoke the words that had been hovering on the tip of my tongue.

“Who killed her?”

“…!”

“…!”

Venerable Myoryeong, Gung Gibang, Hyuk Mujin, and the two Elders of the Qingcheng Sect.

Five pairs of eyes turned toward me at once. All five held surprise, though not for the same reason.

“The culprit?”

“D-Do you mean someone murdered the Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun…?”

[1723] A rakshasa is a malevolent being in Hindu and Buddhist traditions.

The two Elders of the Qingcheng Sect could not continue and fell silent. They had only belatedly realized what they had failed to notice in their shock at the news: Venerable Myoryeong's current condition.

Venerable Myoryeong's clothes were caked with dried, dark-red blood, and her complexion had turned a deathly blue.

She stared at me with wide eyes, then lowered her head.

"As expected, Young Hero Jin already knew."

As expected?

At my questioning look, Gung Gibang nodded gravely.

"We had no choice. The man who murdered the Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun…"

"He's the same person as the culprit behind what happened at the Sichuan Tang Clan, or at least connected to him. I think so too."

The Elders, realizing there was something they did not know, asked in urgent voices,

"You knew about the killer? Has something happened to the Sichuan Tang Clan as well?"

"Tell us everything. Quickly!"

There was no hiding it now.

Perhaps this had been inevitable from the moment the Poison King was murdered.

I drew a deep breath and spoke.

"A few days ago, Great Hero Tang Taesang, the Poison King, passed away. More precisely, someone murdered him."

"…!"

"The Family Head, Great Hero Tang Sadok—the Myriad-Poison Asura—declared that he would have his revenge. By now, he should be pursuing the culprit with the members of his household."

But the Poison King had not been the only victim.

Leaving the stunned Elders behind me, I looked straight at Venerable Myoryeong.

"What happened?"

"It was a middle-aged man. He was missing one arm."

"A one-armed man?"

"Yes. He was…"

A trembling voice escaped Venerable Myoryeong's lips.

"He was a fiend incarnate."

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh!

Fierce wind tore past us, and the surrounding scenery blurred with every stride.

The nun in my arms was astonishingly light, and the qi I could feel through our bodies was perilously faint.

She made it all the way here in this condition…

Venerable Myoryeong had not even finished telling us what had happened before vomiting a basinful of blood and losing consciousness.

Following close behind me, Gung Gibang spoke with a grim expression.

“How bad are her injuries?”

“Serious. I poured internal energy into her to bolster her vitality for now, but… it won’t be enough.”

Gung Gibang let out a quiet groan.

“She wasn’t this bad when we first set out. Venerable Myoryeong insisted she could endure the journey.”

“You should’ve stopped her anyway, you bastard.”

“…There was no stopping her. I’m sorry.”

My lips moved, but I pressed them shut without speaking.

I knew. Even if I had gone instead of Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin, I could not have stopped Venerable Myoryeong.

Even as she vomited blood, the voice she had forced out still rang vividly in my ears.

“The Sect Leader and all three Elders… That fiend killed them all. I—we couldn’t chase him as he walked away smiling.”

She said the fiend had descended upon Mount Emei, the sacred mountain of Buddhism, only three days ago.

The demon had climbed the mountain like any other pilgrim and sought out the residence where the Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun lived. Three Elders happened to be there at the time.

Then a battle that shook heaven and earth erupted. A mountain peak collapsed, and Mount Emei itself trembled.

What Venerable Myoryeong had witnessed after recognizing the disaster and rushing there from the nearest location was four dead nuns and a single demon.

“Don’t look at me like that. My art of killing was simply stronger than Emei’s Dharma[1724].”

“H-How could you do such a thing? Do you truly not fear Heaven?”

“How laughable. The Buddha and Heaven you speak of are all lies and illusions. I will show you that I have another Heaven.”

That was the last thing he said.

[1724] Dharma refers here to Buddhist teachings.

The killer struck Venerable Myoryeong with a palm and disappeared. Then, while the Emei Sect was consumed by grief and rage, two young men arrived.

After Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin told her that members of the Qingcheng Sect were nearby, she ignored everyone's attempts to stop her and descended Mount Emei.

"Please help us. Please! No matter what, we must stop that fiend… Cough!"

Remembering Venerable Myoryeong crying out until the moment she lost consciousness made me clench my teeth.

Just what kind of bastard was he…?

A one-armed, middle-aged man. A master with enough terrifying martial prowess to single-handedly kill the Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun, a Supreme Peak master of the previous generation, along with three Elders.

What was his purpose? Why had he done such a thing? And was he the same man who had murdered Tang Taesang, the Poison King?

What if he wasn't?

The moment my thoughts reached that point, a chill ran down my spine, and my heart began pounding violently.

If the two incidents had been committed by different people… it was only a matter of time before Sichuan became a land of death.

Just as my previously effortless steps began to grow heavy, the two Elders of the Qingcheng Sect spoke.

"I think we should part ways here."

"I'm sorry, but circumstances leave us no other choice."

It was only natural for them to worry about their own sect.

First the Sichuan Tang Clan, and now the Emei Sect. Anyone with a brain could guess that the Qingcheng Sect might be next.

"There's no need to apologize. I would have done the same."

"Thank you for understanding."

"Are you going straight to Mount Qingcheng?"

The older of the two Elders shook his head.

"I will lead some of our Disciples to assist the Emei Sect. My Junior Brother will return to the main sect with the remaining Disciples. What about you?"

"Venerable Myoryeong's injuries are worse than I thought. I intend to find a physician first, then contact the Sichuan Tang Clan."

With so many of their members away, the Sichuan Tang Clan and the Qingcheng Sect had both been left virtually undefended. They needed to be warned, just in case.

The Elder, whose own sect was in the same position, understood that perfectly well.

“For now, focus on treating Venerable Myoryeong. We will send someone to the Sichuan Tang Clan.”

“Thank you.”

“Think nothing of it. May fortune favor your martial path.”

“And yours.”

We exchanged martial salutes and split into three groups.

The two Elders led their respective groups of Disciples north and east, leaving only four people, including me.

Ah. Jeok Cheongang and Venerable Myoryeong were here too.

We had come all the way to Sichuan to heal one patient, but instead of finding the Divine Physician, we had gained another.

What is this, some kind of hidden-camera prank?

Fuck, as if.

I heaved an inward sigh and was about to start walking again when—

Step. Step.

Light footsteps came up the dirt path, accompanied by cheerful humming. A boy climbing the mountain trail finally spotted us and opened his eyes wide.

“Huh? Wha—?”

It was a familiar face. The boy’s name was Mungyeong.

I was glad to see him again after only a few days, but before that feeling could fully surface, another thought flashed through my mind.

“Mungyeong.”

“What brings everyone here…? Huh?”

“You’re a medical apprentice, right?”

I still remembered him treating people on the deck of the swift ship.

I did not know exactly what treatment he had provided, but according to the river bandits, he was quite skilled.

“Yeees. I am, but…”

Mungyeong answered with a bewildered expression, then looked at Venerable Myoryeong in my arms. No further explanation was necessary.

He pulled a wooden case of acupuncture and moxibustion[1725] tools from the travel bag in his arms and strode toward us.

“First… let me examine the patient.”

Swish.

It took Mungyeong only moments to check her pulse and insert the needles.

[1725] Moxibustion is a traditional treatment that applies heat by burning dried mugwort near the body.

Yet despite handling the entire process with effortless fluidity, a shadow hung over his face.

"…How is she?"

I did not need to ask to know the answer would not be good.

Sure enough, Mungyeong quietly shook his head.

"Not good. Not at all."

"You managed to give her some basic treatment, right?"

"Yes."

I let out a sigh of relief.

It might have been unkind, but I had never expected much from Mungyeong in the first place. He was young and had only been studying medicine for a short time.

Basic treatment was all I had wanted from him.

"You did well. That's enough for now. If we get to Chengdu as quickly as possible and find a way…"

"Will that really be enough?"

"What?"

"In one month, her flesh will begin to rot. In four months, her bones will melt away."

"Hold on. What the hell are you talking about…?"

But Mungyeong continued in the same quiet voice.

"After half a year of horrific pain, she will look like a living corpse. She might survive a year at most. Once her organs begin to rot, she will finally stop breathing."

"…What?"

"Even if you take her to Chengdu, you won't find any suitable treatment. The physicians available among the common people can only handle women's ailments of the sort suffered by high officials and nobles. And the Sichuan Tang Clan…"

Two things shocked me.

First, that Venerable Myoryeong's injuries were so severe.

Second, the unfamiliar sight of Mungyeong calmly describing something so horrifying.

"I heard rumors all over the marketplace that the Tang Clan's martial artists had headed west. It will take them several days at least to return. By then, it will be too late. How long ago was she injured?"

Hyuk Mujin answered haltingly.

"Th-Three days. A little over three days, I think."

"Three days…"

Mungyeong let out a quiet groan, then continued in a heavy voice.

“The Black Hand Seal is a terrifying evil technique. Once seven days and nights have passed, there will be no turning back.”

Grab!

That was as far as he got.

My patience snapped. Unable to hold back any longer, I seized him by the collar.

“You… How the hell do you know that?”

A teenage medical apprentice had just named an evil technique no one else present had ever heard of.

The Mungyeong I knew could never have possessed such knowledge.

“Tell me. Now.”

Mungyeong swallowed hard at my chilling aura before answering,

“My Master… My Master told me everything.”

“Your Master?”

“Y-Yes. Yes… Cough!”

A flash of realization streaked through my mind.

The strength drained from the hand gripping his collar.

A murmur like a groan slipped from my lips.

“The Divine Physician…?”

Chapter 341

A conversation I'd had with Mungyeong several days ago flashed through my mind.

Thank you for everything.

Forget the thanks. Just focus on becoming a great physician.

Like the Divine Physician?

Yes, like the Divine Physician.

And then there was the last thing he had said almost in passing.

It's a shame we can't go together this time. I have to return to my Master.

How had I not realized it?

Looking back, Mungyeong had been unusual from the very beginning. He had shown incredible resourcefulness when the river bandits threatened his life, composure far beyond his years, and remarkable medical skill.

That's not all.

The boy had nearly sunk to the bottom of the Yangtze because of the river bandits, yet he had brazenly hitched a ride aboard the swift ship and then visited the Sichuan Tang Clan—infamous throughout Murim for their vicious tempers—just to get a prescription.

Mungyeong had casually done things that even martial artists with Botox injected into their livers might have shied away from.

And on top of that, the things he just said and did…

I had no idea what kind of martial art the Black Hand Seal was or how powerful it might be.

But I knew one thing for certain.

"The Divine Physician. You're the Divine Physician's Disciple."

"…!"

"…!"

The others stared wide-eyed at Mungyeong after hearing the joy and deflation mingled in my words.

A suffocating silence descended over us, and Mungyeong shrank back.

"I-I'm sorry. But I couldn't tell you."

"Why not?"

I regretted asking the moment the words left my mouth. The Divine Physician had spent his entire life hiding his identity. Of course his Disciple had kept silent.

If Venerable Myoryeong's life had not been hanging by a thread, Mungyeong almost certainly would never have revealed his Master's identity.

"Where is the Divine Physician—or rather, where is your Master?"

Mungyeong hesitated, then bit his lip tightly.

“But before that, could you promise me one thing?”

“I’ll keep the secret. Absolutely.”

With that firm answer, I pulled something from inside my robe and held it out.

Lately, I had been taking it out of my Inventory and examining it whenever I had a spare moment.

> The finest Chinese gallnuts come from Sichuan.

Mungyeong’s eyes widened when he saw the faint writing on the jade-colored porcelain shard.

“This is…”

“Do you recognize it?”

“Yes. It’s unmistakably my Master’s handwriting.”

Mungyeong examined the Divine Physician’s Token from every angle, apparently fascinated, then let out a small exclamation.

“Come to think of it, my Master once told me that a very long time ago, he left a token with a famous physician and told him to come to Sichuan. But how did you come to possess it, Young Master…?”

“The famous physician gave it to me directly. There’s a patient whom no one but the Divine Physician can treat.”

I continued emphatically.

“There’s someone I have to save.”

“I don’t know who that person is, but… you hold them very dear, Young Master.”

Someone dear to me.

Yes. I supposed that was true. Jeok Cheongang was precious to me. He had given me everything he had, and now it was my turn to protect him.

“Yes. That’s right.”

Mungyeong smiled faintly and nodded.

“Come with me. I’ll take you to my Master.”

Crunch. Crunch.

The snow crunched beneath our feet with every step.

I looked around. Bare branches covered in frost. Thick white snow blanketing everything in sight.

It doesn’t get any less incredible.

Outside, it was early spring, and new shoots were beginning to emerge. But the place we were walking through looked like the depths of winter after a heavy snowfall.

So this is a Mystic Gate Formation…

Mungyeong had led us to the very same mountain we had searched with the Qingcheng Sect. But when we reached a certain point, he strained to move several rocks, and an entirely new path and landscape unfolded before us.

It was unlike anything we had ever seen. Every last one of us had stood there with our mouths hanging open.

Mungyeong told us that the formation had been installed by the Master of Strange Illusions.

According to Gung Gibang, who had sprayed spit everywhere as he explained, the Master of Strange Illusions had been known as the greatest formation master under heaven in the distant past.

I had no idea what sort of connection he had shared with the Divine Physician, but he had installed something like this. We had nearly wandered around for ages despite being right on top of the place.

No wonder nobody could find him.

What good was it to deploy top-tier Murim artists and countless government troops?

If they had searched each mountain one by one using ordinary methods, even half a century would not have been enough, let alone six months.

“Wow! Woooow!”

Cheongpung, who had been running several steps ahead of us like a puppy let loose in a snowy field, cried out in delight. I was about to scold him when the scenery changed completely the very next moment, and my mouth fell open too.

“…Whoa. What the hell is this?”

The world had changed again in the space of a few steps.

The snow-white depths of winter had given way to spring in full bloom.

Everything around us was green, and nameless flowers were in full bloom. Hyuk Mujin approached with a dazed expression and asked,

“Captain. Am I seeing things?”

“I don’t know, Mujin.”

Even Gung Gibang, the most experienced in Murim among us, stood there with his mouth hanging open.

“Good heavens… Hk! Ptooey, ptooey! What is this?”

“Butterflies?”

Oh, they really were butterflies. And not just one or two.

Every color imaginable.

Hundreds of butterflies resting throughout the flower field took flight at once. It was a spectacular sight.

Whoooosh.

Where had the wind suddenly come from? And where was the bright sunlight pouring in from?

Every single thing I saw felt like one of the Seven Wonders of the World.

The pyramids have nothing on this.

There was a place where the seasons changed after only a few steps, so what were the pyramids compared to that? Some Egyptian logistics officer probably just ran his workers ragged building them.

All the pharaoh had to do was put on a solemn face and say, “This pharaoh is disappointed in you,” a few times, and they would be hauling stones while getting whipped.

But this place…

This was on an entirely different level.

“Young Master Jin?”

“Huh? Oh, yeah.”

“We’re almost there. We only have to cross that hill.”

We hurriedly came to our senses and followed Mungyeong again.

Once we crossed the low hill covered in green grass, a small thatched hut came into view, standing alone on a flat stretch of land.

And…

He was there.

“Master!”

At Mungyeong’s shout, an old man planting something in the vegetable garden before the hut straightened his bent back. His beard was as white as the snow we had seen along the way. His eyes were clear and framed by deep wrinkles.

When he noticed us, the corners of his eyes curved gently.

“Some honored guests have arrived.”

We had finally found him.

The Divine Physician.

It was a long while before we properly spoke with the Divine Physician.

After examining Venerable Myoryeong, the Divine Physician had Mungyeong carry her into the hut. The two of them did not emerge again until a shichen[1726] later.

[1726] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

“It has been a long time since anyone came to visit.”

The Divine Physician’s sudden voice was like a cool spring breeze. I had been pacing around the hut and hurriedly bowed.

“Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan pays his respects to the Divine Physician.”

“Dong Feng.”

“Pardon?”

“That is my name. The title Divine Physician is too grand for me, so please call me Old Man Dong.”

How could I call the greatest physician under heaven Old Man Dong, as if he were some old man Kim at a neighborhood real estate office?

I was young enough to be his grandson, too.

But when I met the Divine Physician’s benevolent gaze, I had no choice but to quietly comply.

“Yes. I will, Old Man Dong.”

“Thank you, Young Master Jin.”

The Divine Physician smiled gently, then exchanged greetings with everyone else, one by one.

He remained courteous even toward those of us who were far younger than him, and he never once seemed hurried.

“Hello! I’m Cheongpung!”

He did not even lose his smile in front of the local lunatic.

“Heh heh. You’re a very energetic person. My name is Dong Feng. You may call me Old Man Dong, just like the others.”

“But my grandfather told me I have to show respect to my elders.”

“Your grandfather gave you an excellent lesson. But if our hearts are at ease with each other, what harm is there? Just think of me as a friend who happens to be a little older than you.”

“A friend?”

“That’s right. A friend.”

Cheongpung smiled brightly.

“Then let’s get along, Old Man Dong!”

“Heh heh. Heh heh heh!”

He’s laughing?

Was he some kind of Murim Joker? The type who laughed when he was angry and laughed when he was dumbfounded?

“Old Man Dong, have you ever tried candy?”

“I like sweets. I used to enjoy candied hawthorn skewers,[1727] too.”

“Hey, me too!”

The setting looked like a healing movie, but the conversation was pure horror thriller. In the end, Gung Gibang’s face went deathly pale. He clamped both hands over Cheongpung’s mouth and slowly backed away.

The Divine Physician laughed heartily at the sight, then turned to Mungyeong.

“You have brought some interesting people.”

Mungyeong bowed deeply.

“I’m sorry, Master. I brought them without your permission.”

“No, no. Heaven brings people together through fate. This, too, must be the natural order. Wouldn’t you agree?”

His last question was directed at me. I nodded and held out the Divine Physician’s Token I had prepared in advance.

“This is…”

“This is a token you left behind long ago, Divine Physician—or rather, Old Man Dong. The Luoyang Strange Physician gave it to me and told me to seek you out.”

“I did?”

“Pardon?”

No way. Had he forgotten about it?

The Divine Physician tilted his head. Only after Mungyeong reminded him again did he let out a small exclamation.

“Ah, yes. I remember now. It happened so long ago that it had slipped my mind.”

“Whew. For a moment, I thought you’d forgotten completely.”

“In any case, if you possess this token… that must mean something has happened that requires this old man’s aid.”

“Yes, that’s right.”

“Is it about the nun you brought here? If so, there is no need to worry too much. She has already made it past the immediate crisis.”

The Divine Physician looked toward the hut where Venerable Myoryeong lay and continued.

“It will not be an easy road, but… once the rest of her treatment is complete, sufficient rest should allow her to make a full recovery.”

It was the best news I had heard in a long time. Not only had Venerable Myoryeong escaped the brink of death, but the Divine Physician truly possessed medical skill worthy of his reputation.

I took a deep breath before speaking.

“There’s another patient.”

[1727] Candied hawthorn skewers are a traditional snack made by coating fruit in hardened sugar.

“Another patient?”

“The person who gave me the token said that there was only one person under heaven who could treat him. You.”

“Only I can treat him…”

The Divine Physician repeated the words quietly, then spoke.

“Birth, aging, sickness, and death are not things a mere human can decide. But if there is even the slightest possibility, I will do my best as a physician.”

“That’s enough… That’s all I need.”

There had been a time when my mother was sick.

The doctor in charge of her surgery had said the same thing.

I’ll do my best.

For Hayeon and me, those words had been our only hope, and the surgery had been a success.

Just as I had done with that doctor in the past, I tightly gripped the Divine Physician’s wrinkled hand.

“Please. Old Man Dong.”

The Divine Physician smiled benevolently, as though he understood everything.

“Let us see the patient first.”

After that came nothing but waiting and anxiety.

Once Jeok Cheongang, who had been lying on the pack frame, was carried into the hut, I paced back and forth, waiting for the Divine Physician and Mungyeong to emerge.

Butterflies and honeybees flitted through the flower field, and fresh green leaves sprouted from the trees, but I felt nothing.

It went well, right? It must have gone well.

I could not even bring myself to approach the hut, afraid that I might hear something negative.

I walked for a long time, endlessly repeating that single thought.

Only after the sunlight had faded and a pale darkness settled over the land did I return to the hut.

There, the exhausted Divine Physician and Mungyeong were waiting for me with faint smiles.

“I believe I can treat him.”

The instant I heard those words, all the strength drained from my legs, and a familiar alert pierced my ears.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Quest condition, Get Examined by the Divine Physician, completed!

Quest, Find Mr. Shin in Sichuan, successfully completed!

Chapter 342

Finding Mr. Shin in Sichuan had been a Supreme Peak Grade Quest. With difficulty that vicious, the rewards were bound to be substantial.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

A massive EXP payout and the resulting Level Up. Even an achievement.

I dismissed the incessant System notifications and the holographic windows blocking my view. I couldn't simply celebrate when the Divine Physician looked so grim.

"What's wrong? You haven't changed your mind, have you? You're not about to tell me you can't treat him after all, right?"

"Of course not. I may be an old quack, but if I give it my all, there is still plenty of hope."

"Then why do you look like that…?"

He hesitated before letting out a soft sigh. The faint smile on his lips had vanished, replaced by deeply troubled lines.

"There are too many things we must prepare for the treatment."

"Oh, if this is about the cost, you don't need to worry."

I might not look it, but I was the youngest son of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. It was common knowledge that the Jin Family had amassed a fortune through the northern trade routes over the past few years.

"If things get desperate, I can always borrow some money from this guy's family. Hey, there are Hyuk Family textile shops in Sichuan too, aren't there?"

Hyuk Mujin nodded, looking less than thrilled.

"There are. We're textile merchants. It would be strange if we didn't have a shop in Sichuan, considering how famous it is for silk."

"Then let's borrow some emergency cash. We can sell the shop if we have to, right?"

"Of course not."

"I'll pay you plenty of interest."

"And if I refuse?"

"Then I'll give you plenty of travel money for your journey to the next world."

"…Just take it all. Go ahead and rip out the very foundations of my family while you're at it."

Okay, problem solved.

But for some reason, the Divine Physician's expression remained dark.

His Master seemed unable to bring himself to speak, so Mungyeong stepped in.

"Um, Young Master Jin."

"Yes?"

"That isn't the biggest problem. The treatment will require an enormous amount of money, but some materials would be difficult to obtain no matter how much gold and silver we had."

"Materials that are difficult to obtain…? Are you talking about an elixir?"

"Yes. Treating Great Hero Jeok requires an elixir that meets certain conditions. Such elixirs are extremely valuable and rare. If we begin searching now, we may have to wait several years before finding one."

Several years?

That was far too long. Jeok Cheongang had only a few months left to live.

I was struck speechless. The Divine Physician continued in a somber voice.

"I believe a detailed explanation is in order. The patient has not regained consciousness because the balance within his body has been disrupted."

"His balance?"

"All things in the world contain the energies of the Five Elements and exist in proper balance. The human body is no different. But the patient attempted to wield an enormous force and destroyed that balance."

An enormous force?

The Divine Physician's words brought something to mind.

Dance of the Fire God and Demon. The Fire Gate Clan's ultimate secret technique, which drew out and amplified every ounce of power its user possessed.

So that was the cause.

In the distant past, Jeok Cheongang had earned the name Fire King by using the Dance of the Fire God and Demon against a thousand members of the Demonic Cult. But as the years passed, his old and diseased body could no longer endure that power. It had shattered.

"When a vessel breaks, whatever it held inside will inevitably leak out. Fortunately, there is a way to reverse the damage, but it requires an elixir rarely seen in this world."

"An elixir rarely seen in this world…"

"And even among such elixirs, it must meet certain conditions."

"Tell me. I'll get it, no matter what it takes."

The Divine Physician sighed and nodded.

"It will be extremely difficult, but what choice do we have? We must place our hopes in you, Young Master. Listen carefully to what I am about to say."

"Yes."

In a grave voice, the Divine Physician explained Jeok Cheongang's condition, the method of treatment, and the requirements for the necessary elixir.

"Will you remember all of that?"

"…"

"Young Master?"

"Oh, yes."

"I asked whether you remember all of it."

"Yes. I remember everything. But this is… Whew."

"…"

"Could you check—I mean, confirm that I heard everything correctly?"

"I was planning to do so anyway. Go ahead."

I carefully began to speak.

"So, the excessive expenditure of power disrupted his balance, and the harmony between Yin and Yang was particularly badly damaged?"

"That is correct."

"And the cause was an enormous amount of Scorching Yang Qi that had gone out of control."

"Continue."

"To restore that broken balance and bring everything back into harmony, we need an elixir—and an incredibly powerful one at that. And for that…"

Mungyeong quickly cut in.

"Among elixirs, it must possess the nature of Yin-Cold Qi. It must also contain at least one jiazi's[1728] worth of energy."

"Four months," the Divine Physician said heavily. "If we cannot find one within four months, everything else will be pointless."

At that moment, the conversation came to an end.

Ding.

SYSTEM

A Chain Quest, Thirty Thousand Li[1729] in Search of an Elixir, has been generated.

This is something you must accomplish. You cannot refuse!

Find an elixir containing at least one jiazi[1730] of energy and possessing the nature of Yin-Cold Qi!

I stared blankly at the holographic window before finally coming to my senses.

[1728] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle. Here it measures an equivalent amount of accumulated energy.

[1729] The quest title uses the Korean ri, a traditional distance unit. One ri is about 393 m (0.244 mi); thirty thousand ri would be about 11,790 km (7,320 mi).

[1730] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle. Here it measures an equivalent amount of accumulated energy.

"Will that do?"

"Many other materials are necessary, but this will be the most important one—the core ingredient. You must depart immediately and search for the elixir…"

"Ah, yes."

And so I departed.

I took two steps toward the Divine Physician, pulled something from inside my robe, and held it out.

"Here."

"…?"

"…?"

"Take it."

Master and Disciple stared blankly at me, then simultaneously reached out to accept the object.

"What is this?"

"Master, perhaps you should open it first."

"W-Well, shall I?"

Click.

The Divine Physician swallowed nervously and carefully opened the wooden box. A pure, clear fragrance that seemed capable of purifying even the coronavirus wafted out as it revealed itself.

"Gasp!"

"Good heavens!"

"It's a Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng. It contains at least one jiazi's[1731] worth of energy and possesses the nature of Yin-Cold Qi. Is this enough?"

Eyes wide, the Divine Physician looked back and forth between me and the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng, then nodded vigorously.

"It is enough!"

Ding.

[1731] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle. Here it measures an equivalent amount of accumulated energy.

[1732] The quest title uses the Korean ri, a traditional distance unit. One ri is about 393 m (0.244 mi); thirty thousand ri would be about 11,790 km (7,320 mi).

SYSTEM

Quest conditions fulfilled!
Chain Quest, Thirty Thousand Li[1732] in Search of an Elixir, successfully completed!
Achievement, Mountain Herb Gatherer, acquired!
A substantial amount of EXP acquired!
Level Up!

As the System notifications rang out, Ju Hwaran suddenly came to mind.

Thank you, Young Lady Ju.

I let out a wry chuckle as I thought of how she had given it to me while passing the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng off as Hundred-Year-Old Snow Ginseng, worried I might feel burdened and refuse it otherwise.

Now I have a reason to stop by Shaanxi on the way back.

And when I did… I hoped Jeok Cheongang would be healthy again and traveling with me.

I turned to the Divine Physician, who still looked dazed.

"All right, then. What do we do next?"

The Divine Physician carefully tucked the wooden box into his robes and began walking.

"Follow me. Gyeong, remain here and look after the patients."

"Yes, Master."

Leaving Mungyeong behind as he answered respectfully, we followed the Divine Physician.

Swish!

A small figure sped along right beside me. Every time he extended one foot, a zhang[1733] of distance vanished and the wind swept past.

What was truly astonishing was that his feet never touched the ground.

With each faint tap of his toes, the blades of grass bent gently beneath him, then sprang back into place.

I narrowed my eyes.

Flying Over Grass?

Flying Over Grass was a realm in which one ran as though flying while stepping across blades of grass.

[1733] A zhang is a traditional length equal to ten ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Martial artists who had mastered their movement techniques to the Peak realm could perform such feats. Treading Snow Without a Trace, which left no footprints even while running across snow, and Rising on Duckweed, Crossing Water, which allowed one to walk across water as though it were solid ground, worked on similar principles.

Stepping on Empty Air, meanwhile, was a realm attainable only by Supreme Peak masters with internal energy to spare.

Of course, Flying Over Grass isn't beyond me either if I put my mind to it.

Even so, the sight was astonishing because the person performing it was the Divine Physician.

I knew he had learned martial arts, but his movement technique is especially impressive.

I had realized the Divine Physician knew martial arts the moment we first met.

Though small in stature, he possessed vitality and resilience comparable to a young martial artist's. The energy stored in his dantian was considerable as well.

His martial arts are First Rate, and his internal energy is probably around Peak.

As I quietly assessed him, the Divine Physician sensed my gaze. He turned his head and smiled.

"What is it?"

I answered honestly.

"Your movement technique is remarkable."

"Heh heh. No matter how hard this old man tries, how could I compare with you, Young Master? I merely happened to learn it."

"Honestly, before meeting the Divine Physician—or rather, Old Man Dong—I never imagined you had learned martial arts."

"You must have been surprised. The others seem to feel the same."

I glanced behind me. Everyone except Cheongpung looked ready to burst with curiosity.

There was no point being vague now. Better to ask him outright.

"This may be presumptuous, but may I ask how you came to learn martial arts?"

A physician practicing martial arts. It might have been an uncomfortable subject, but the Divine Physician did not avoid the question.

"When I was around twenty, shortly after becoming a medical apprentice, my Master personally instructed me."

"Then was your Master perhaps…?"

"That is correct. My Master was a martial artist."

The Divine Physician's Master had been a martial artist. That was something I had never expected.

Seeing my expression, he let out a hearty laugh.

“Heh heh. There is no need to be surprised. By the time he accepted me as his Disciple, he had already left the Murim.”

“Oh, I see.”

“My Master had reached the highest realm both as a martial artist and as a physician. He told me he had become a physician to atone for all the lives he had taken.”

For some reason, I felt as though I understood.

I had accumulated killing karma too. At first, I swung my spear while thinking only of getting home and believing that this was merely a fictional world created by a game.

But everything was real. They were all living people.

By the time I realized that, it was already too late.

I could not stop, and I did not stop. I killed to survive. I killed because they were my enemies.

In the Murim and in the modern world.

At some point, the scent of blood had seeped deep into my body. It was a stench that no amount of washing could remove.

“…I see.”

At my belated reply, the Divine Physician gave me a gentle smile.

“It was simply a matter of choice. My Master chose the path he believed was right, and I did the same. However, so many people came looking for this old man that I had no choice but to learn martial arts for my own protection. I was born a dullard, so he scolded me quite often. Heh heh.”

Everyone has memories.

Perhaps remembering the days he had spent with his Master, the Divine Physician suddenly stopped walking in the middle of his laughter.

“Well, we have arrived.”

Crack.

A frozen leaf crumbled beneath someone’s foot.

We stood in an unusually cold valley within the Mystic Gate Formation surrounding the Divine Physician’s residence.

“Where exactly are we?”

“I call this place the Cold-Ice Land.”

Cold-Ice Land. A fitting name.

Though something like Yanggu in Gangwon Province or Moscow might have been even better.

I glanced at Hyuk Mujin, who had already begun shivering violently, then asked the most important question.

“What do we do now?”

“You will have quite a difficult time. We must find and dig up various ingredients, including the medicinal herbs needed for the initial stage of treatment.”

“That sounds simpler than I expected.”

“Let me see… A hundred roots of each should be enough.”

“Ah, yes. A hundred roots.”

“I said a hundred roots of each.”

“Yes. That’s what you said. A hundred roots.”

I nodded, then froze.

Wait. What had I just heard?

“A hundred roots each? Not a hundred in total?”

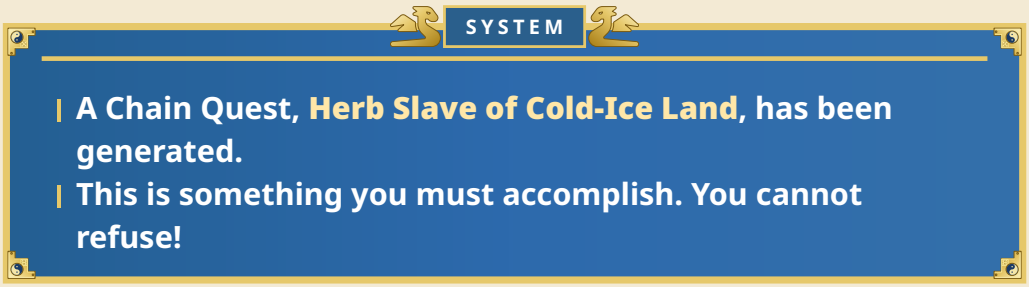
“That is correct.”

The Divine Physician continued with a hearty laugh.

“A hundred roots each of twenty-four different kinds.”

“…!”

Ding.



Chapter 343

Whoooooosh.

“This wind is fucking brutal. Goddamn it.”

I shuddered as the bitter cold pierced straight through my leather clothes. Unaffected by Cold and Heat, my ass. More like Very Much Affected by Cold and Heat.

“Pfooh-chew!”

I turned around, wondering what bizarre sound that had been, and found Hyuk Mujin rubbing his blue-tinged nose.

When our eyes met, his eyes curved into hooks.

“What? What is it?”

“…”

“What are you looking at?”

“No, I was just fascinated by the sound of your sneeze…”

“Seriously? You find the strangest things fascinating. If you have that much time to spare, dig up another herb.”

“…All right. My bad.”

I quietly looked away and scanned the area for another herb.

It had already been five days since I had taken a job as a herb slave in Cold-Ice Land. The hierarchy between us had reversed a long time ago.

“Ah, what are you doing? There’s one right over there. There!”

“Oh. So there is.”

“Get your head in the game!”

Ugh. It wasn’t like I could punch him.

If he had followed a friend to Gangnam, at least the land prices would have gone up. Instead, Hyuk Mujin had followed me to Cold-Ice Land and was suffering through the worst ordeal of his life.

He had been dragged into all kinds of fights before and always stopped after grumbling a few times, so the fact that he was now glaring at me with murder in his eyes said everything.

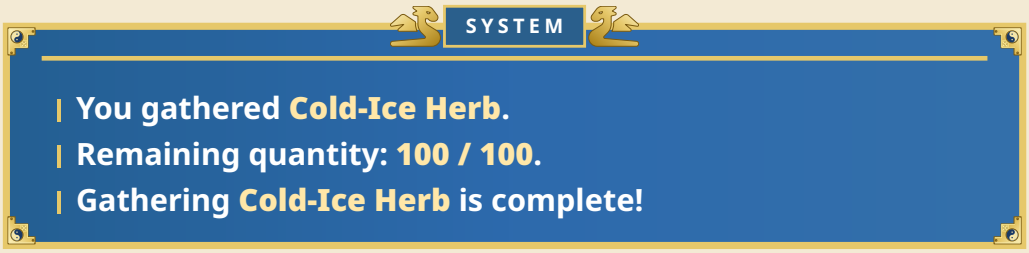
“I’ll dig for herbs beyond that hill. Don’t stop working. I’ll come back and check on you every so often.”

“…Got it, you punk.”

Repeating the character for patience to myself, I gently dug through the snow and pulled up an herb.

The moment I placed it in the basket our exploitative employer—or rather, the Divine Physician—had issued to each of his herb slaves, a System notification rang out.

Ding.



“Whew. Finally finished another one.”

At least the finish line was coming into sight.

As I checked the Quest window to see how much remained, Gung Gibang approached me, shivering violently.

“Hey, how many are left?”

“About two hundred roots. If things go well, we might finish today.”

“Two hundred roots are still left?”

“Only two hundred. Hang in there a little longer.”

“No. Two hundred roots is far too many. By then, I’ll be a frozen corpse buried somewhere under this snow.”

“…”

What a load of crap.

Still trembling, Gung Gibang pulled a fire striker from inside his clothes and lit it.

He brought his face close to the tiny flame and murmured wistfully, “I miss my Master. I miss the days when I begged in the alley outside a warm inn…”

Was he the Little Match Girl?[1734]

I muttered, dumbfounded by his behavior.

“You were still a beggar back then.”

“At least I was a warm beggar. That’s a hundred times better than being a cold one.”

“…You have a point.”

“I want to go back to those days. A lazy noon, sunlight pouring down. A delicious-looking yellow dog strolling past…”

What the hell was a delicious-looking yellow dog?

Gung Gibang’s eyelids slowly drooped after he said something that would make any animal-protection group scream.

This bastard couldn’t possibly be—

“Hey! Hey!”

I hurriedly sent Scorching Yang Qi into his body.

[1734] The Little Match Girl is a Hans Christian Andersen fairy tale about a girl who lights matches for warmth on a freezing night.

He had to come to his senses somehow—

“It’s warm…”

“I said wake up, you lunatic!”

Smack! Smack!

It was no use. No matter how hard I slapped his cheeks, his eyes showed no sign of opening again.

I continued sending Scorching Yang Qi into him and shouted, “Is anyone there? Somebody get over here, quick!”

In response to my desperate cry, someone came sprinting over from far away.

“Benefactor! Benefactor!”

“Nice, Cheongpung! Quick, take this guy outside—”

Cheongpung ran over like the wind, beaming as he held something out to me.

“Benefactor, look! It’s the first snowman I’ve ever made!”

“You son of a bitch!”

The Divine Physician inspected all the herbs in the baskets and nodded.

“This should be enough.”

Ding.

SYSTEM

Chain Quest, Herb Slave of Cold-Ice Land, successfully completed!

Achievement, Mountain Herb Gatherer Who Returned Alive from Hell, acquired!

You acquired 10 bonus points for earning an achievement!

Just look at that achievement title.

I didn’t even have the strength to get angry anymore.

The Divine Physician looked over our utterly exhausted group before his gaze suddenly stopped on one person.

“Why is Young Master Cheongpung so dejected?”

Because I had smashed the first snowman Cheongpung had ever made with my Flame Divine Palm.

I glared murderously at the still-sullen Cheongpung and asked the Divine Physician, “So, are all the preparations complete now?”

“They are. With this quantity, we will be prepared for anything that may happen later.”

“Prepared?”

The Divine Physician nodded gravely.

“We do not know what may happen.”

I suddenly realized something I had forgotten.

The Divine Physician had never once been certain.

He had only seen a possibility and said that he would do his best.

It isn’t over until it’s over.

The words I whispered to myself whenever I faced a crisis now became a dagger stabbing into my chest.

In the end, there was only one thing I could say.

“Please… Please do your very best.”

“This old man will do everything within his power. I promise.”

Mungyeong, who stood beside the Divine Physician, spoke with conviction.

“I will also do everything I can to assist my Master.”

“Thank you.”

“There’s no need. It is only natural for a medical apprentice to do so.”

“Then when will the actual treatment begin?”

The Divine Physician considered the question for a moment before answering.

“Probably in seven days and nights. Until then, Mungyeong and I will combine and refine the twenty-four types of herbs you brought us, preparing them as ingredients for the Life-Restoring Great Technique.”

“All of them?”

“This is only a portion of what we need. Fortunately, I already possess the remaining ingredients required for the Life-Restoring Great Technique, which allowed us to shorten the preparation time.”

“What exactly is this Life-Restoring Great Technique…?”

The Divine Physician stroked his snow-white beard and answered.

“As I mentioned before, my Master was once a martial artist. He primarily practiced medicine among the common people, but he was also deeply versed in controlling qi.”

Hearing that, I had a rough idea where this was going.

Hyuk Mujin suddenly cut in with an exclamation.

“Martial artists! The Life-Restoring Great Technique was created to treat martial artists!”

“That is correct. The Master of Strange Illusions was one of them. After recovering from severe qi deviation thanks to the Life-Restoring Great Technique, he installed the Mystic Gate Formation for us before departing.”

For martial artists, qi deviation was practically a death sentence. Their internal energy reversed course, their qi and blood became tangled, and all their acupoints and dantian were damaged.

The easiest way to understand it was to imagine a small bomb exploding inside a person.

But he cured qi deviation.

If the Master of Strange Illusions had suffered qi deviation severe enough for the Divine Physician to describe it that way, he must have been little more than a walking corpse at the time.

Just hearing the story gave me some idea of how effective the Life-Restoring Great Technique was.

Then Old Master will definitely—

I quickly shook off the thought before it could finish forming.

There was no reason to be certain yet, nor any need to worry.

"Please take good care of him."

"Until preparations for the technique are complete, no one may approach the place where the patient is being kept. Do you understand?"

"Yes."

"By then, the Life-Restoring Great Technique will be ready, and we should have a clearer understanding of the patient's condition. Please wait patiently until then."

"I'll keep that in mind."

"Remember. Seven days and nights."

But the Divine Physician was unable to keep his word.

He reappeared with Mungyeong after only three days, and the moment I saw their expressions, I knew something had happened.

"…What is it?"

After a long silence, it was Mungyeong—not the Divine Physician—who finally spoke.

"Formless Ultimate Poison."

"What?"

"There is an unidentified, extremely deadly poison inside the patient's body. That was the true cause."

"W-Wait."

My thoughts twisted into a chaotic knot.

Formless Ultimate Poison? Out of nowhere?

I looked at the Divine Physician in confusion.

"What does that mean?"

"Exactly what you heard."

Looking incomparably more haggard than he had three days earlier, the Divine Physician continued.

"While preparing the technique and monitoring the patient's condition, I discovered something strange. The Scorching Yang Qi, which should have been growing more rampant, was gradually subsiding."

"Then isn't that a good thing? What does some sudden poison have to do with—"

"We have not even performed the technique yet. How could the Scorching Yang Qi be decreasing on its own?"

"That…"

"Did you not notice anything strange?"

At that moment, a thought flashed through my mind.

During our journey from Henan to Sichuan, I had periodically stabilized Jeok Cheongang's qi with True Qi Guidance. Yet despite my efforts, his Scorching Yang Qi had continued to diminish.

I thought he was simply growing weaker.

The Divine Physician sighed when he saw my expression harden.

"When one type of energy gains the upper hand, the opposing energy naturally diminishes. But the patient was different. His Yin-Cold Qi remained unchanged, while his Scorching Yang Qi was gradually dwindling."

"Are you saying that was because of the poison?"

"I do not know how it happened, but a Formless Ultimate Poison lies hidden within the patient's body—one that even I would not dare touch. Whether by great fortune or terrible misfortune, the rampaging Scorching Yang Qi happened to envelop the Formless Ultimate Poison and counteract it like poison against poison. Otherwise, he would have melted into a handful of bloody liquid long ago."

"…!"

I didn't know when or how the poison the Divine Physician called Formless Ultimate Poison had entered Jeok Cheongang's body.

But I understood one thing clearly: the Scorching Yang Qi was acting as a breakwater, holding back the spread of the poison.

"Then… then does that mean even the technique cannot cure him?"

"The Life-Restoring Great Technique can regulate his qi and untangle his disrupted qi and blood, but it is not enough to detoxify a poison like this. If we perform the technique as things stand… the Scorching Yang Qi will be calmed, but there will be nothing left to stop the poison."

I shouted urgently, "I'll find an antidote! The Sichuan Tang Clan is here, isn't it?"

"…Young Master."

The Divine Physician shook his head, his expression dark.

“I know very well that the Sichuan Tang Clan is the greatest authority under heaven when it comes to poison. But this poison…”

His voice trailed off, and my heart seemed to drop into my stomach.

Even the Sichuan Tang Clan isn’t enough?

Damn it. This was a truly fucking awful situation.

Right now, Jeok Cheongang had two savage wolves inside his body, each keeping the other in check.

If either one disappeared, the other would regain its freedom and run wild.

And now there was no way to detoxify the poison.

This is so fucked…!

Tap. Drip.

Drops of blood fell from my tightly clenched fist. My throat burned as though I had swallowed a fireball.

Just as I struggled to hold back the curses threatening to burst out, someone’s voice pierced my ears.

“There is a way.”

I opened my eyes and saw the boy’s face. Mungyeong continued, looking more serious than I had ever seen him.

“Let us go to the Sichuan Tang Clan.”

The Divine Physician looked at his Disciple with a dark expression.

“Mungyeong. As you know, this Formless Ultimate Poison…”

“I know, Master. I clearly remember you saying that the Tang Clan’s poison arts focus on killing and that their detoxification techniques are lacking. But…”

Mungyeong looked straight at me with clear eyes.

“If the Sichuan Tang Clan possesses a legendary treasure—a divine artifact said to detoxify any poison under heaven—then it is possible.”

Ding.

SYSTEM

Quest, Myriad-Poison Ring, has been generated!

Chapter 344

Ding.

SYSTEM

Chain Quest, Myriad-Poison Ring, has been generated!
There is something you must accomplish. You cannot refuse!

I stared at the holographic window that filled my vision along with the System notification.

SYSTEM

Quest
Myriad-Poison Ring
The Myriad-Poison Ring, said to absorb any poison under heaven, is a sacred artifact of the Sichuan Tang Clan and one of the legends passed down through the Murim.
Its owner and even its existence are uncertain, but for now, it is the only possible solution!
Grade: Peak
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Mission: Acquire the Myriad-Poison Ring—Incomplete
Reward: A large amount of EXP
Failure: Jeok Cheongang's death

"A sacred artifact said to absorb any poison."

Mungyeong nodded at my mutter.

"That is the Myriad-Poison Ring's ability. However, there is one problem…"

"Its owner and even its existence are uncertain."

"Yes. The Sichuan Tang Clan has denied the existence of the Myriad-Poison Ring several times."

The Divine Physician added in a heavy voice, "That is why it is a legend. It is so ancient that it has survived only through word of mouth."

After thinking for a moment, I suddenly opened my mouth.

"No. It exists."

"Hmm?"

"The Myriad-Poison Ring definitely exists. It's just being kept hidden."

"How can you be so certain?"

Both the Divine Physician and Mungyeong, who had first brought up the Myriad-Poison Ring, stared at me with wide eyes.

“Obviously because…”

Because of the System.

This was a Chain Quest to treat Jeok Cheongang.

If the Myriad-Poison Ring truly did not exist, a Quest like this would never have been generated.

Of course, if I said that out loud, they would definitely think I was insane.

I smoothly continued, “If word got out that they possessed a sacred artifact like that, do you think people would leave them alone? The Sichuan Tang Clan is famous throughout the Murim for being stubbornly insular. Naturally, they would want to avoid the trouble.”

This was a world where people killed one another over a single coin or a dumpling. If the treasure in question were something like the Myriad-Poison Ring, just imagine how many flies would swarm around it.

It was a hastily improvised explanation, but convincing enough that everyone nodded.

“That makes sense. In fact, after conducting an extensive investigation into whether the Myriad-Poison Ring truly exists, even our sect—”

I looked at Gung Gibang, who had jumped in as though he had been waiting for the chance.

“Forget it. Stay here and tell Mujin the rest.”

“Huh? Stay? You want me to stay here with Hyuk Mujin?”

“Captain, what do you mean?”

“What do you think I mean? Exactly what you heard.”

I pointed at the two bewildered men in turn.

“Hyuk Mujin and Gung Gibang are staying here.”

“Why? Why me?”

“I want to go with you too! Please, don’t leave this vicious beggar and me behind!”

“What?! You dog-bone bastard!”

Smack! Smack!

Sometimes, a good beating was the best medicine. I shook my fists at the two men as they clutched the tops of their heads.

“Stop talking nonsense and stay here to guard Venerable Myoryeong. If anything happens, Gung Gibang, you contact me immediately.”

“Contact you? Is there a messenger pigeon here that can fly to the Sichuan Tang Clan?”

“What kind of beggar’s-foot-rag nonsense is that? If something happens, you come running so fast your feet catch fire.”

“What the hell?”

“If you don’t like it, tame one. I saw plenty of butterflies in the flower garden.”

It was a conclusion I had reached after a brief but coolheaded analysis.

Hyuk Mujin’s martial arts were the weakest among us, especially his movement technique, so I would leave him behind and keep Gung Gibang with him as a precaution against any unexpected situation.

Gung Gibang was a reasonably capable Peak master, and he was as quick on his feet as he was on the uptake. He should be able to handle any unforeseen crisis.

“Anyone dissatisfied with my decision or curious about something, raise your hand immediately.”

“Put that fist down before you ask.”

“I’ll just stay here.”

At that moment, an arm shot into the air. Cheongpung asked with an innocent expression, “What about me, Benefactor?”

“You’re coming with me to the Sichuan Tang Clan, Cheongpung.”

“Why?”

“Who knows what kind of trouble you’ll cause if I leave you behind? Don’t leave my sight even for a moment. Got it?”

“Yeees…”

At Cheongpung’s dejected reply, the Divine Physician spoke with pity in his eyes.

“Do not scold him too harshly. He seems like an innocent young man.”

“He is innocent. Innocent enough to start a forest fire and burn this whole place to the ground.”

“Hoho, surely he would not go that far.”

“I’ll wager Mujin’s left wrist that within a few days he’ll burn down your whole cottage, leave you homeless, and drive you into joining the Beggars’ Sect.”

“…!”

The Divine Physician studied Cheongpung with a wary expression before answering.

“It would be best if he came with us.”

“A wise choice.”

“Gyeong, what will you do?”

Mungyeong thought deeply for a moment, then nodded as if he had made his decision.

“I will accompany you, Master. The Emei nun should have no trouble as long as she gets some rest.”

“I would appreciate that.”

The person I needed most right now was actually the Divine Physician. But having Mungyeong with us would be even better. He was always at his Master's side, serving as a capable assistant.

Besides, he was the one who had first brought up the Myriad-Poison Ring.

The only thing left is figuring out how to obtain it.

Myriad-Poison Asura Tang Sadok. The answer would become clear once I faced the head of the Sichuan Tang Clan.

Once I had finished thinking, I turned to Cheongpung.

"Cheongpung, grab two A-frame carriers and two ropes. Make them big and sturdy."

"Benefactor, why do we need the carriers and ropes?"

"We need to get there as fast as possible. It'd be a disaster if we dropped either of them along the way, so we'll tie them down tight."

The Divine Physician's and Mungyeong's faces turned deathly pale.

In the dark main hall, it was a long while after the middle-aged man entered before the old man spoke.

"More than fifty years ago, before you were even born, our family suffered a great humiliation. Do you know about it?"

At the Myriad-Poison Asura Tang Sadok's words, the middle-aged man lowered his head.

"How could I not?"

"This old man was barely twenty at the time, and I witnessed it all with my own eyes. Our people died all around us, the armory burned, and the pavilions collapsed. We were defeated and forced to withdraw from Sichuan."

The Great War raged for ten long years before ending in victory for the orthodox faction. The Tang Clan returned to Sichuan and rebuilt, but the scars from that time had been carved deep into everyone's hearts.

"And yet, and yet, how!"

The instant green light flashed in Tang Sadok's eyes, the middle-aged man held his breath as poisonous energy poured from Tang Sadok's entire body.

"Hngh."

"How can we suffer such humiliation again?"

Sssssss!

Tang Sadok's wrinkled hand pressed down on the table—or rather, melted it.

Not only the wood but even the iron fittings along the corners liquefied into black poison and flowed. The middle-aged man immediately prostrated himself.

"Please calm yourself, Family Head!"

Despite the middle-aged man's plea, Tang Sadok's anger did not easily subside.

His fury was only natural. Instead of finding the culprit who had harmed his father, Poison King Tang Taesang, he had come up empty and been forced to return after receiving an urgent message from the Qingcheng Sect.

"Who dares…!"

The message sent by the Qingcheng Sect had been brief. It had also been as shocking as the Poison King's death.

He killed Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun and three Emei Elders all by himself.

And it had not been a surprise attack targeting a single person. It was said to have been a head-on fight.

Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun was a Supreme Peak master who could have vied for even the lowest seat among the Ten Kings. The three Elders with her were also seasoned Peak masters.

The culprit had single-handedly brought down the leadership of an entire sect, then vanished like a ghost.

There can't be two masters of that level. It must have been the same bastard who harmed Father.

As his anger slowly subsided, wariness took its place.

He had decided to return not as a son but as the Family Head of the Sichuan Tang Clan. At the same time, he had not forgotten to pursue the culprit.

"What became of the Green Shadow Squad?"

"They divided into ten groups of five and scattered from Chengdu toward Qingcheng, Emei, Yishan, Sanhe, and the surrounding areas to carry out their missions."

Even within the Sichuan Tang Clan, the Green Shadow Squad specialized in intelligence gathering and assassinating key targets.

They had been chiefly responsible for eliminating countless fiends immediately after the Great Faction War, but Tang Sadok felt an inexplicable sense of foreboding.

"Do not let your guard down. Strengthen the defenses of the Gate Guard Pavilion, and do not allow anyone to enter."

"Yes."

"You may leave."

Tang Sadok watched the middle-aged man turn away cautiously, then suddenly spoke.

"Once this matter is over… hand the position of Master of the Gatekeeper Pavilion to someone else and move to the Inner Hall."

"F-Family Head?"

“I’m saying this as your uncle, not as the Family Head. You’re nearly fifty. How long did you think I would leave my only nephew at the Gate Guard Pavilion?”

“Th-Thank you, Uncle.”

Tang Sadok answered with a flick of his sleeve.

His nephew was not exceptional, but neither was there anything particularly lacking in him.

Tang Sadok had grown numb with time and lived for many years without thinking about it. Only recently had he begun remembering his elder brother, who had lost his life during the Great Faction War.

“I suppose I’m growing old too, Father.”

At Tang Sadok’s quiet monologue, spoken after he was left alone, his chest rose and fell. Then something slowly poked its head out.

Hiss. Hiss.

It had a body as white as snow, blue eyes, and a triangular head crowned with two horns. It was a snake.

A spiritual creature known throughout the Murim as the Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake, it was notorious for its ferocity. It flicked out its long tongue and licked Tang Sadok’s cheek.

“You little rascal…”

Tang Sadok’s stiff expression slowly softened.

He had a prickly personality and disliked meeting people, but he made an exception for this Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake.

It was the first and last gift he had ever received from his father, the Poison King. Since Tang Sadok had no children of his own, the snake was more precious to him than anything.

“Hey, that tickles. You little thing.”

He was watching the snake’s antics with a faint smile when the sound of approaching footsteps grew louder.

The white body hurriedly slipped back inside Tang Sadok’s robes.

“What is it?”

“Family Head, it’s me.”

At the voice of his nephew, who had left only moments earlier, Tang Sadok affected a frown.

“Why have you come back?”

“Well, those people have come again.”

“Those people?”

“Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi Jin Taekyung and Huashan Divine Dragon Cheongpung.”

“I explicitly ordered that no one be allowed inside. Refuse them entry.”

“But… one of them may be the Divine Physician.”

“What? The Divine Physician?”

For once, even Tang Sadok could not hide his surprise.

Who was the Divine Physician? A man said to have reached the divine realm through his medical arts. A mysterious figure who had not shown himself for many long years.

Why had that very Divine Physician come to our family?

His hesitation did not last long. A hoarse voice escaped Tang Sadok’s lips.

“Let them in.”

“Are you the Divine Physician?”

Now that was some no-brakes macho-man talk.

Tang Sadok had asked the question out of nowhere without even pretending to look at us, and the Divine Physician let out a hearty laugh.

“This old man’s name is Dong Feng.”

“Then you are not the Divine Physician?”

“People have given this old man an undeserved name.”

“Seems you are, then.”

“You believe me rather easily.”

“Unless someone is desperate to die, no one tells lies in front of this old man.”

“…”

That was pretty damn convincing.

Tang Sadok slowly looked us over, a green glow shimmering in his eyes.

“The Divine Physician… You, whom the whole world has searched for without catching even a glimpse of you, have come looking for me. And you have brought young prodigies of the Murim with you. Why?”

“May I answer that?”

I stepped forward, and Tang Sadok’s gaze collided with mine in midair.

“Go ahead. If you say something nonsensical, be prepared to become a handful of blood…”

“Please lend me the Myriad-Poison Ring.”

At my own macho-man-with-no-brakes delivery, Tang Sadok’s pupils trembled.

Chapter 345

No matter how much the Murim was a veritable death zone crawling with murder and violence, people in every field learned to observe some decorum once they reached the upper ranks.

Especially when you were the Family Head of the Sichuan Tang Clan, one of the Five Great Families.

Tang Sadok might have been comfortable speaking bluntly, but he was not accustomed to others doing the same to him.

As I was doing now.

“Please lend me the Myriad-Poison Ring.”

“…!”

The request struck him completely out of the blue.

His eyes twitched for a split second before he spoke.

“You still believe that ridiculous nonsense? I knew you were young, but you truly are a child.”

“I saw your eye twitch just now.”

“Nonsense!”

“Your voice gets louder when I hit a nerve, doesn’t it?”

“I told you it doesn’t exist!”

“Oh, now you’re clenching your fist.”

“I said I don’t have it!”

“If I search your pockets and find it, can I keep it?”

“Fine! Search me! If you don’t find it, I’ll take your head instead!”

“Oh, so you hid it somewhere else. In that case, I withdraw my request.”

“Grrr…!”

“What a loss…!”

“You insolent little bastard!”

Ah. I probably should have held back that last one.

After being hit by a fantastic barrage of combo attacks, Tang Sadok’s eyes rolled back.

I hurriedly shouted before he could scatter his hidden weapons.

“I only need to borrow it once! Just once!”

“I told you it doesn’t exist!”

“Fine, let’s say it doesn’t. Just hear me out.”

“Nothing you say will change my answer.”

“Even if I offered to deal with the culprit?”

“What?”

“The man who harmed Great Hero Tang Taesang, the Poison King.”

The next moment—

“You little brat! I’ve tolerated enough of your insolence—!”

Whoosh!

Green qi rose from Tang Sadok’s entire body like a shimmering haze. He glared at me with blazing eyes, then spoke in a low, cold voice.

“Do you truly wish to die?”

“I have a bright future ahead of me, so not particularly.”

“Punishing that man is our family’s responsibility. How dare an outsider like you —!”

Whoom!

An aura like a raging gale erupted and shook the pavilion. I stepped in front of the trembling Divine Physician and Mungyeong before answering.

“And how has that worked out?”

“…!”

“The culprit is a master powerful enough to defeat the Poison King. He also evaded the Tang Clan’s eyes here in Sichuan and caused a bloodbath at the Emei Sect. Martial prowess clearly isn’t his only strength.”

Sichuan might have been vast, but the Tang Clan had been rooted here for countless years.

This was no different from losing track of a family enemy in their own front yard. Tang Sadok had led most of his family in pursuit, only to return empty-handed. His expression hardened.

“Are you accusing our family of incompetence?”

“Of course not.”

If the Sichuan Tang Clan was incompetent, most of the sects scattered throughout the realm might as well bolt their gates and withdraw from the martial world.

The Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families were the giants supporting the Murim. The problem was not that the Sichuan Tang Clan or the Emei Sect was incompetent.

The culprit was simply a monster.

“I’m only pointing out a possibility.”

“A possibility?”

“His martial arts are comparable to the Ten Kings, and he’s exceptionally skilled at escaping. Wouldn’t more people helping you improve the chances of catching him?”

“Our Green Shadow Squad is already pursuing him. I merely returned for a short while to prepare for any unforeseen circumstances. Before long, I will hunt him down and kill him.”

Tang Sadok's sharp gaze swept over Cheongpung and me.

"We are the great Sichuan Tang Clan. We have no need for outsiders' help. Least of all from greenhorns like you."

"…Ah. Right."

Hadn't I already left the level of a mere young prodigy far behind?

Especially that guy.

I glanced at Cheongpung, who was blankly watching the exchange, and scratched the back of my head.

Well, I expected something like this.

Considering the Sichuan Tang Clan's family tradition of doing everything their own damn way, his response came as no surprise.

That was why I had thought up a more enticing proposal on the way here.

"Then instead of greenhorns who came crawling out of nowhere, how about the Fire King?"

"…!"

"Let's say you somehow track the culprit down. He isn't going to hold out his arm and ask you to hurry up and stick poison needles into his veins."

One side would fight to survive. The other would fight to kill. A fierce battle was inevitable.

If the Sichuan Tang Clan committed its full strength, they might succeed in avenging the Poison King—but they would also have to brace themselves for enormous losses.

Countless members of the Tang Clan, whether from the direct line or the collateral branches, would die.

"Old Master—no, my Master—and the rest of us will help you. We'll minimize the Sichuan Tang Clan's losses and leave the culprit's punishment to you, Family Head."

"…Impossible. No matter what losses we must endure, this must be accomplished through our family's own strength."

"Your answer came half a beat late."

"This is the path our ancestors took—the path our family has walked all these years. It is what made the Sichuan Tang Clan what it is!"

"I know. I know what path the Sichuan Tang Clan has walked."

They were a close-knit family bound by blood. They never forgot a grudge, and their vengeance was merciless.

That was the path the Tang Family had walked—and the reason people both respected and feared them.

I continued quietly.

“But no one will point fingers at you for taking a shortcut once in a while. Especially if you choose that shortcut to reduce the number of family members who must be sacrificed.”

Tang Sadok bit down hard on his lip.

Perhaps he was not as coldhearted as he appeared.

No. Even if he was, he was not the sort of ruthless Family Head who would put revenge above everything else.

If he were, he wouldn’t have returned to the family.

But the Myriad-Poison Asura[1735] Tang Sadok had returned. He had come back to protect his family from even the slightest possible danger—to protect those left defenseless in his absence.

“What will you do?”

A long silence passed before his answer came.

“…If—and I mean if—the Myriad-Poison Ring exists, can you treat Great Hero Jeok?”

“Someone I know says it can.”

At my glance, the Divine Physician spoke.

“Our preparations are nearly complete. If we have the Myriad-Poison Ring, there will be no problem treating him.”

“How long will it take?”

“Fifteen days. Fifteen days will be enough.”

“Fifteen days…”

Tang Sadok let out a low groan, then looked at the Divine Physician.

“I examined Great Hero Jeok’s condition once before. Though my medical knowledge is shallow compared to my expertise in poison arts, I could not determine what sort of symptoms he was suffering from. Is it truly possible?”

“It is possible.”

A clear voice rang out.

Mungyeong stepped forward and added a single sentence.

“The Divine Physician can do it.”

“What an audacious boy. Is he your Disciple?”

The Divine Physician answered Tang Sadok’s question with a faint smile before speaking.

“The Myriad-Poison Ring is essential if the patient is to recover. I understand your desire to conceal such a sacred artifact, but I ask that you show compassion and extend us your benevolence.”

“Benevolence, is it? Do you think the same?”

[1735] An asura is a powerful, often warlike being in Hindu and Buddhist traditions; here it forms part of Tang Sadok’s epithet.

"Why are you asking me all of a sudden?"

"Speak. I want to hear your thoughts."

"If you insist."

I shrugged.

"Rather than benevolence, let's call it gratitude and grudges."

"Why?"

"Because this is the Murim. If someone helps you, isn't it the way of the martial world to repay them?"

A faint smile touched the corner of Tang Sadok's wrinkled mouth.

"That is far more pleasing to hear."

"It sounds better, and it isn't empty flattery."

"What will you do if the culprit flees to some distant foreign land while Great Hero Jeok is being treated?"

"I'll chase him down myself and bring him back. Ah, I'm not saying I'll leave right away, of course. I won't budge until my Master wakes up."

"You're an amusing bastard. Even tearing the culprit limb from limb wouldn't be enough, but he is also an extraordinary master. Do you think a wet-behind-the-ears brat like you can capture someone like that?"

"If I can't take him alive, I'll kill him."

"Ha… Hahahaha!"

Tang Sadok burst into uproarious laughter. When it finally subsided, he tossed out a casual remark.

"The Myriad-Poison Ring does not exist."

"…What?"

What the fuck was he talking about?

Had this old man been playing me the entire time?

As the back of my head went numb, Tang Sadok continued.

"The Myriad-Poison Ring is nothing more than an old legend. Even among our blood relatives, it is merely a stale tale."

"What do you mean, it doesn't exist? It really doesn't?"

"No one knows, and no one must ever know."

"Fuck! Then you should have said that from the beginning! Have you been messing with me this whole—"

Ssssss.

I snapped my mouth shut before I could finish.

A pure-white snake had slowly crawled out of Tang Sadok's robes and was staring fixedly at me, its tongue flicking.

What is that?

What was he, Voldemort?[1736] Why was a snake suddenly coming out of his clothes?

It even had horns, which no normal snake had. As I stared into its black eyes, the Divine Physician murmured in disbelief.

“A Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake…?”

Even the name sounded lethally venomous.

Tang Sadok laughed quietly when he saw me edging backward and stroked the snake’s triangular head.

“Don’t be afraid. It isn’t dangerous, so there’s no need to retreat.”

“Its name sounds fucking dangerous.”

“Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake?”

“Yes. What kind of name is that? It’s not like you’re calling it a golden retriever. Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake… Never mind. Does the Myriad-Poison Ring really not exist?”

“It isn’t called Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake. Its name is Mimi.”

“What?”

“Tang Mimi. That is the name I gave it.”

What was that supposed to mean? Terrifying…

As Tang Sadok lovingly stroked Mimi-chan,[1737] he suddenly looked at the Divine Physician.

“You must know that this creature is no ordinary Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake.”

The Divine Physician nodded.

“As far as I know, a Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake is a rare venomous creature that carries an extremely deadly poison. Its entire body is black, and its temperament is so ferocious that it can never be tamed. However…”

“As you can see, this one looks different and has an exceptionally gentle disposition.”

“But we do not know when it might suddenly turn on us. Is it not a venomous creature capable of killing a hundred cows with a single drop of its venom?”

“There is no need to worry. This one has no venom.”

“What?”

“To be precise… it would be more accurate to say that its venom is gone.”

With that, Tang Sadok met Mimi-chan’s[1738] gaze—or rather, the Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake’s.

It lasted only a moment, but they had clearly communicated. The clever snake had understood its master’s intentions.

[1736] Voldemort is a villain in the Harry Potter series closely associated with snakes.

[1737] -chan is an affectionate Japanese suffix used with names, including the names of pets.

[1738] -chan is an affectionate Japanese suffix used with names, including the names of pets.

Hiss! Ssssss!

The snake lowered its head and let out a metallic hiss before spitting something onto Tang Sadok's palm.

With a soft plop, the object emerged from the slime covering it.

That's...

A ring.

Set into it was a black gemstone that seemed to contain all the darkness in the world.

Having absorbed even the deadly venom of the Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake, it gleamed with a beautiful yet ominous light.

"No way..."

As I stared at the ring in a daze, Tang Sadok's low voice reached my ears.

"Remember this. No one knows, and no one must ever know."

"Then..."

"Yes."

Tang Sadok held it out to me.

"This is our family's sacred artifact."

The moment I took the ring with trembling hands, the chime I had been waiting for rang out.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Quest Condition complete: Myriad-Poison Ring Acquired!

Chain Quest Myriad-Poison Ring has been successfully completed!

Chapter 346

I examined the small ring closely. It was light and strange.

Its band was made of some unknown metal and covered in unfamiliar patterns. The gemstone set in its center gleamed darkly, as though it held the night sky within it.

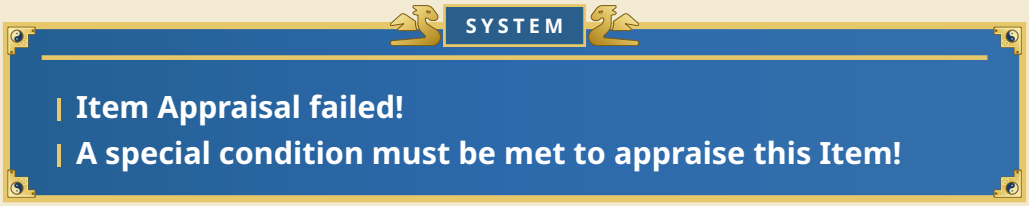
So this is the Myriad-Poison Ring.

The sacred artifact of the Sichuan Tang Clan—said to detoxify any poison—had fallen into my hands.

Its power had to be genuine if it could turn a Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake, a creature said to harbor an extraordinarily deadly venom, into a pet snake named Mimi-chan.[1739] Still, it couldn't hurt to check.

Item Appraisal.

Beep.



"Huh?"

"What is it? Is there a problem?"

I vaguely brushed off Tang Sadok's puzzled question.

"No. It's just…"

"Just what?"

"The gemstone is pretty. It's almost the same color as the snake's eyes."

A crease formed on Tang Sadok's forehead.

I had momentarily forgotten that the old man standing before me was not only the Family Head of a great clan, but also a seasoned martial artist who had spent his entire life in the Murim.

Sure enough, Tang Sadok's eyes widened as he bellowed.

"What nonsense!"

"Family Head, the thing is—"

"Our Mimi's eyes are prettier!"

"What?"

"And that's not all! I rub her down with fragrant oil every morning and evening, so she smells wonderful. Her teeth are pearly white too!"

[1739] -chan is a Japanese suffix expressing affection or familiarity. Here it is attached to the snake Mimi's name.

"Ah… right."

A seasoned martial artist, my ass. He was just a snake fanatic.

What kind of Family Head liked his pet snake more than his family's sacred artifact?

At this point, I was starting to wonder whether Mimi-chan[1740] was the true sacred artifact of the Sichuan Tang Clan.

But why can't I appraise it?

I tried Item Appraisal again just in case, but the result was the same. If appraising it required some special condition, then I supposed a sacred artifact really was a sacred artifact.

It bothers me that I can't confirm its effects, but it should work.

I turned to the Divine Physician. He had been watching with a smile, and he spoke as though he'd been waiting for me.

"The Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake is no ordinary venomous snake, but a spiritual creature. Yet the ring rendered even its venom glands useless… We will have to try it before we know the full extent of its power, but it is certainly worthy of the name Myriad-Poison Ring."

"In that case…"

"Without the Myriad-Poison Ring, the chance of success would have been a mere one percent. Now, I would place it above seventy percent."

"Even with the Myriad-Poison Ring, it's only seventy percent…?"

"This old man's medical arts will supply the remaining thirty."

"Whew. You should've said that from the start."

The Divine Physician laughed heartily at my sigh of relief and stroked his beard.

"Now only one thing remains."

"What is it?"

"A place to conduct the treatment."

Tang Sadok abruptly cut in, his tone blunt.

"Have you forgotten where you are?"

"I am well aware that the Sichuan Tang Clan has its own clinic. However, treating Great Hero Jeok requires two specific conditions."

"Name them."

"First, it must be secluded, somewhere people cannot easily come and go. Second, it must receive no sunlight and be permeated by a bitter, bone-chilling cold."

"Somewhere secluded, dark, and cold…"

Tang Sadok considered this for a moment, then let out a quiet laugh.

"As it happens, I know the perfect place. I shall take you there myself."

[1740] -chan is a Japanese suffix expressing affection or familiarity. Here it is attached to the snake Mimi's name.

“Thank you for your generosity, Family Head.”

“I am no benevolent Great Hero. This is merely a matter of gratitude and grudges between us. And if you ever reveal the existence of the Myriad-Poison Ring or allow word of it to spread outside the clan…”

I sighed and finished for him.

“I’ll be dragged off, dunked waist-deep in a vat of poison, and have holes punched through me with needles.”

“You have a poor imagination. Whatever you can imagine, you will suffer worse.”

“That won’t happen unless I lose my mind.”

“I certainly hope so… What are you doing here?”

Good question. What was that guy doing?

While we were talking, Cheongpung had crept over and was reaching toward Mimi-chan.[1741]

“Wow, she’s pretty. Can I touch her?”

“No.”

“Why not?”

“Hmph. Do you think she lets just anyone touch her? If I had not summoned her, she would never even have shown herself before you.”

“Mimi, Mimi. Come here.”

“What ridiculous nonsense—”

Hisssssss.

Mimi-chan[1742] slithered down Tang Sadok’s shoulder and licked the back of Cheongpung’s hand.

“Gasp!”

“Mimi, Whirlwind!”

Whirlwind, my ass. He was ordering her to perform a technique even a person wouldn’t understand.

As expected, there was no telling what went on inside Cheongpung’s head.

Sssshk, sssshk, sssshhhk!

“…What the fuck?”

What had I just witnessed?

My jaw dropped as Mimi-chan[1743] began spinning wildly in a tight spiral.

“Wow! Good job, Mimi!”

[1741] -chan is a Japanese suffix expressing affection or familiarity. Here it is attached to the snake Mimi’s name.

[1742] -chan is a Japanese suffix expressing affection or familiarity. Here it is attached to the snake Mimi’s name.

[1743] -chan is a Japanese suffix expressing affection or familiarity. Here it is attached to the snake Mimi’s name.

"This can't be! How could Mimi use Whirlwind on someone she's never met before?"

"Wait, that's a real technique?"

"That is not what matters right now!"

It seemed pretty important to me. At this rate, I wondered whether she might start firing a Thunderbolt or a Hyper Beam.[1744]

Can she evolve too…?

As I tried to decide whether the Myriad-Poison Ring or Mimi-chan[1745] was the true sacred artifact, Cheongpung beamed.

"I'm good with animals. When I lay in the grass at Huashan, birds, deer, and even tigers would come play with me. Hehe."

What was he, some kind of Huashan druid?

Tang Sadok had been staring blankly at Cheongpung, still reeling from the shock of losing Mimi-chan[1746] to him. Now he raised an objection.

"Wait. Something strange slipped in at the end. Why would there be a tiger? How dare you tell such an obvious lie before this old man!"

"We were all about to say goodbye when the tiger tried to eat the deer, so I knocked it out with Crouching Tiger Fist!"

"…"

"…"

It sounded completely insane, no matter who heard it.

Which probably meant it was true.

Silence filled the main hall, making Mungyeong's mutter ring out with unusual clarity.

"Is the Huashan I know a different Huashan…?"

I didn't know about that, but one thing was certain.

If heaven and earth were ever overturned and Cheongpung somehow became Huashan's Sect Leader, from that day onward, it would be your Huashan—not mine.

"…Let's go. You said you would show us the place."

"…Very well."

Following Tang Sadok, we arrived at a cave on the distant outskirts of the Sichuan Tang Clan's grounds.

[1744] Thunderbolt and Hyper Beam are moves from Pokémon.

[1745] -chan is a Japanese suffix expressing affection or familiarity. Here it is attached to the snake Mimi's name.

[1746] -chan is a Japanese suffix expressing affection or familiarity. Here it is attached to the snake Mimi's name.

Its entrance yawned open like a pitch-black maw.

Aside from two large braziers on either side, there was no one in sight.

“Where are we? It doesn’t look like anyone is guarding this place.”

“If no one is here, I suppose it must be feeding time.”

“Feeding?”

“You will understand once we enter. Follow me.”

Unlike the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s training hall, this cave did not run in a straight line.

We descended stone steps leading deep underground for what felt like ages. Eventually, we reached a narrow corridor barely wide enough for two people to pass through side by side, and a familiar smell invaded my nose.

Is this… the smell of blood?

A bad feeling came over me. I looked around and saw barred iron doors spaced along the corridor.

“Don’t tell me…”

“That is correct. This is our family’s underground prison.”

“…Not a torture chamber?”

“Oh, you will see plenty of those farther inside.”

What the hell had I just heard?

Everyone turned to stare at Tang Sadok, myself included, but he continued as though it were no big deal.

“Except for the Family Head’s Hall and a few other pavilions, this is the oldest space in the family compound. It must be well over two hundred years old by now. In any case, it is a historic place steeped in history.”

Forget its venerable history. I felt like I ought to leave a will before I got dragged any farther inside.

The more I thought about it, the more ridiculous it seemed.

“Isn’t it still just a prison?”

“Is that a problem?”

“Of course there is! You want us to treat Old Master—no, my Master—in here?”

“Not a single ray of sunlight reaches this place, and the chill permeates it to the bone. There is no more suitable location.”

“You said you conduct torture here, too.”

“Of course. Is that even worth asking?”

“…”

Anyone listening would have thought he was asking whether I wanted extra toppings on my pizza.

Just as I ran out of words, a hunched old man came limping toward us from the distance, accompanied by a faint glow.

“Family Head, what brings you here?”

“Ah, Old Man Gung. You’ve been working hard. How are they?”

“Oh, much the same as usual. I just checked whether they were still breathing. But who might these people be…?”

“They are guests of our family. Circumstances require them to stay in the prison for fifteen days. It won’t be too noisy, will it?”

“No, sir. Those still alive are little better than walking corpses, so it should be quiet.”

“When I saw him a few months ago, that Heavenly Power Demon fellow still seemed full of energy.”

“Ah, him? You needn’t worry about that one anymore.”

The hunched old man grinned, revealing a mouthful of almost entirely rotten teeth.

“He made such a racket that I drained every last bit of energy out of him. And since I was at it, I took a few other things too. Hehe.”

“You are always working hard.”

“Oh, Family Head, you flatter me. I only do it because I enjoy the work.”

As I listened to their conversation, I made a firm resolution.

I must never make an enemy of the Sichuan Tang Clan.

After exchanging a few more words with Old Man Gung, Tang Sadok spoke with a bright expression.

“Excellent. It seems the deepest and largest cell has just been vacated. We can use that one.”

I didn’t need to hear why it had been vacated.

It wasn’t as though someone had checked out at the prison’s front desk and walked away.

They must’ve checked in to the afterlife by now.

Even if this place met all the necessary conditions, could we really conduct a medical treatment here?

The Divine Physician had clearly thought the same thing. Mungyeong addressed his Master, who had put on a frown, in a calm voice.

“Master, are we not medical apprentices? For the patient’s sake, we must endure the place even if it displeases us.”

The Divine Physician let out a low groan before answering.

“…Yes. You are right. We shall do so.”

“And the people imprisoned here are certainly evil men who have committed countless murders. Please do not let it trouble you too much.”

Tang Sadok, who had been listening to their conversation, added his own remark.

“Well, well. You are quite composed for such a young medical apprentice. Divine Physician, as the boy said, every man imprisoned here is a thoroughly wicked fiend. Do not think poorly of our family.”

“This old man allowed his concern to lead him into discourtesy. I ask your generous forgiveness.”

“I shall gladly forgive you. Of course, the same does not apply to those bastards who harmed members of our family. Isn’t that right, Old Man Gung?”

Old Man Gung picked up a torch and let out a bizarre, metallic laugh.

“Come, then. This humble one will show you the way.”

“…”

For some reason, I felt as though I were following the Grim Reaper.

Judging by the atmosphere alone, that old man seems more dangerous than the culprit who killed the Poison King.

It had to be my imagination.

Yes. Definitely my imagination.

And so, we began walking toward the suite boasting the finest facilities in the Sichuan Tang Clan’s underground prison.

“Hm?”

The middle-aged man suddenly looked around.

Winter had passed. The sky was clear, and the once-bare mountain forest was slowly regaining its green.

The valley in this nameless mountain was as peaceful as ever. Yet no matter how long he thought about it, he could not understand why he felt such a strange sense of déjà vu.

“How very strange. Very strange indeed…”

The middle-aged man muttered softly, then turned his head and asked,

“Don’t you agree?”

Grrk. Gk.

Blood bubbled up from the man’s gaping throat.

The fallen man glared up at the middle-aged man, his eyes burning with hatred.

“M-my family… will make you pay…”

“What boring last words. Then again, the Sichuan Tang Clan has always been like that.”

Crunch!

The middle-aged man wiped his leather shoe, drenched in blood and brain matter, against the grass before straightening.

Four corpses lay scattered around him.

He smiled at the sole surviving man.

“Now, will you answer my questions obediently, or would you prefer to writhe in unimaginable agony until you die?”

“…!”

“For your information, the Poison King chose the latter. He held out for four days before finally dying.”

The man shuddered, then slowly closed his eyes.

A broad smile spread across the middle-aged man’s lips as he watched the man brace himself for death.

“Good. Let’s find out how long you can last.”

Chapter 347

The Sichuan Tang Clan's underground prison was dark and damp. There was also something about it that sent a chill down the spine.

Perhaps that was only natural. Countless people must have met their deaths here since the underground prison was built.

"Care for a drink?"

In that sense, the old man holding out a worn gourd was practically the Grim Reaper of the underground prison.

I briefly wondered how many people this diminutive, hunchbacked old man had done away with before answering.

"No, thank you."

"If that's what you want, then."

Gulp, gulp.

Old Man Gung tilted the gourd back and wiped his mouth with his sleeve. The sleeve was so worn it looked ready to crumble, and it was covered in dark red stains that looked like blood.

"Ahh, that's good."

The potent scent of liquor drifted through the stench of blood lingering in the corridor and tickled the tip of my nose.

Drinking on duty. At the Jin Family of Taiyuan, that would have earned him a disciplinary report, but apparently that rule did not apply in the Sichuan Tang Clan's underground prison.

"I heard you're one of the most renowned young prodigies in the Murim."

It was obvious who he was talking to. Cheongpung and Tang Sadok had disappeared somewhere early on, while the Divine Physician and Mungyeong were busy purifying the prison and turning it into a treatment room.

I reluctantly answered.

"I wouldn't say I'm that renowned. I can fart a little, though."

"That's not what I heard. As the Fire King's successor, you could piss on the plaques of the Nine Sects and One Gang[1747] and get away with it."

Old Man Gung grinned, baring teeth that had almost entirely rotted away.

"We've got a fellow locked up here who did just that."

"Did what?"

"Pissed on the plaque of one of the Nine Sects and One Gang[1748]. The Kunlun Sect, I believe."

"…There really are all kinds of people in this world."

[1747] The Nine Sects and One Gang are a grouping of major Murim organizations.

[1748] The Nine Sects and One Gang are a grouping of major Murim organizations.

“Heh heh. He was once notorious even among the Demonic Cult’s fiends. Now he’s strapped to a rack, doing nothing but shitting blood. You must have seen him on your way in.”

“Did I?”

The Sichuan Tang Clan’s underground prison was as winding and complicated as a maze. On the way here, I had seen dozens of cells holding more than ten prisoners.

That fellow who pissed on the Kunlun Sect’s plaque was probably one of them.

They were paying the price for their evil deeds. I did not feel even the slightest bit of sympathy for them.

No, it would be more accurate to say that I had no room to worry about something like that.

I didn’t expect to be this nervous.

The peculiar unease I had felt ever since entering the prison refused to fade.

It was the same feeling I’d had several years ago, when my mother went into surgery and I sat in a quiet corridor waiting to hear how it had gone.

It’ll be fine. Everything will be all right.

As I repeated those words to myself, the tightly shut cell door opened and a dozen servants carrying various cleaning tools came pouring out.

I addressed the last person to emerge.

“Is it done?”

The Divine Physician nodded, his expression bright.

In the space of two shichen[1749], the cell behind him had been transformed into a fairly convincing treatment room.

“It is still far from satisfactory, but this should be functional enough.”

“Then…”

“Yes. We begin now.”

At last, all the preparations were complete.

The various medicines made by combining the twenty-four herbs gathered from the Cold-Ice Land had already been brought here. The treatment room was ready. Only one thing remained.

“Thank you all for your hard work. Would you mind giving us the room for a moment?”

At my words, the members of the Sichuan Tang Clan, including Old Man Gung, began to leave. I waited until they had disappeared, then reached inside my robes.

Inventory Open. Summon.

Something hard appeared in my empty palm. I had kept the Myriad-Poison Ring with me for safekeeping, but now I handed it to the Divine Physician.

[1749] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours; two shichen are about four hours.

The Divine Physician accepted the ring, slipped it onto his finger, and entered the prison cell while gesturing to me.

"Would you bring the patient in?"

I lowered the pack frame from my shoulders. A small figure came into view, accompanied by the faintest sound of breathing.

"Over here."

I stepped into the prison cell with Jeok Cheongang in my arms. The floor was clean, but the stench had not completely disappeared and still lingered at the tip of my nose.

None of that mattered, however. The weight of Jeok Cheongang, light as a feather, made my chest ache unusually badly.

You've grown so weak.

A month and a half had already passed since we left the Murim Alliance in Henan and began our journey.

We had found the Divine Physician and secured his treatment far more quickly than I had expected, but Jeok Cheongang had continued to weaken day by day.

Swish.

I carefully laid him on the smooth white stone prepared in the center of the room.

It was a special object called Cold-Ice Stone, provided by Tang Sadok. The Divine Physician had said it would greatly aid Jeok Cheongang's treatment.

"He's sleeping soundly."

Jeok Cheongang's face was gaunt, but it also looked peaceful.

I gazed at his face, covered in wrinkles and age spots.

Memories of everything that had happened since our first meeting flashed before my eyes.

What an interesting kid.

The more I see of you, the stranger you seem. Whose disciple are you?

I clearly remembered the ill-tempered old man I had met at Jang Taebo's house a year ago.

The roof is old. It leaks.

I also remembered the master who, unable to stop the wretched disciple he had cherished like family, blamed a perfectly sound roof as he wept tears of regret.

If you kill that bastard, I'll kill you too.

I entrusted the Fire Gate Clan's sacred artifact to that kid.

I'll pass on everything I have to you.

From Shanxi to Henan, and from Henan to Anhui. Then came the year at Mount Jiuhua. I remembered every moment I had spent with him.

Jeok Cheongang had led me beyond the Jin Family of Taiyuan, and I had followed him out into the vast world. We had always been together.

Well? Just as I told you, wasn't it?

What are you talking about?

The Dance of the Fire God and Demon. Wasn't it incredible?

His face and voice came back to me—the faint smile he wore even while vomiting blood.

Even the single remark he had tossed out on a day when the moon shone brilliantly, while trying to sound gruff.

Master, my ass. Call me Old Master.

"Old Master."

Even when I called out loud, no answer came back.

I knew there wouldn't be, yet I still called to him. Not because I hoped he would hear me, but because there was something I wanted to say.

"Did you know?"

I don't, you idiot!

A dry laugh escaped me at the voice that seemed to echo from somewhere. I gripped Jeok Cheongang's wrinkled hand tightly and whispered,

"I've always wanted to call you Master."

I did not know when it had begun. But at some point, I had realized it.

He was my Master, and I was his Disciple.

We had both been quietly turning those words over in our hearts.

"Young Master Jin. It is time."

At the Divine Physician's words, I tore my gaze away from Jeok Cheongang's face.

Then I respectfully saluted the old physician standing there with a composed expression and the young Disciple beside him.

"Please… take good care of my Master."

The two returned my salute.

"I will do my best."

"I, too, will assist my Master and do everything in my power."

Yes. That was enough.

Do everything one could, then leave the rest to heaven.

We had done everything within human power. All that remained was to entrust the outcome to the heavens.

God, Buddha, Allah, the Jade Emperor[1750].

Whoever you are, if you help me just this once, I'll never forget it.

I did not believe in gods, but I did believe there was some omniscient and omnipotent being above the heavens.

[1750]The Jade Emperor is a deity in Daoist tradition.

As I offered a brief prayer to that being whose face and name I did not know, the Divine Physician spoke solemnly.

"Remember this. Fifteen days—fifteen days. Until then, no one may approach."

What should I do if it takes longer than fifteen days?

I swallowed the words hovering on the tip of my tongue. Now, I had no choice but to trust the two of them. There was only one thing I could say.

"I'll stop anyone who tries to enter, even if I have to stake my life on it."

"Is that everything?"

The middle-aged man looked down at his victim with impassive eyes.

The man's limbs were bent at grotesque angles, and his skin had been flayed away. Reduced to a blood-soaked ruin, he wheezed in a voice as faint as an ant's.

"I—I've already told you everything I know…"

"Aren't you leaving out the most important part?"

"I don't know. I truly don't."

Bloody tears streamed from his one remaining eye. His trouser legs, already drenched in blood, darkened further with urine.

The man forced out a trembling voice.

"Please… just kill me now…"

The middle-aged man stared into the man's fading eye, then clicked his tongue.

"It seems you really are telling the truth."

The man had already endured half a day of unimaginable torture.

If he had begged for his life, there might still have been room for doubt. But now that he was begging for death, the middle-aged man had no choice but to accept it.

Until now, no one had ever lied to the middle-aged man.

No one except the Poison King, Tang Taesang.

"I've seen the extent of your half-day's courage. You may rest now."

Whoosh—thud!

Along with the sound of a single gust of wind, the blood-soaked head jerked backward. A flick of the middle-aged man's finger had pierced the man between the brows, and he died with a peaceful expression.

The middle-aged man stared down at the body of the man who had been a member of a collateral branch of the Sichuan Tang Clan and an operative of the Green Shadow Squad. Then he stretched out a hand.

Boom!

A thunderous roar rang out as a pit one zhang[1751] deep opened in the ground.

[1751] A Chinese zhang is a traditional length of about 3.33 meters, or 10.9 ft.

The five corpses scattered nearby were neatly stacked inside it and covered with earth, all within moments.

"The Green Shadow Squad… So those gnats have latched on."

Muttering under his breath, the middle-aged man looked beyond the winding mountain ridge. West, toward the Sichuan Tang Clan.

I should have killed Tang Sadok when he came out.

That had been a mistake. The Poison King's resistance had been fiercer than expected, and purging the poison had taken considerable time. It had even cost him an arm.

Emei or Qingcheng might have been another matter, but the Sichuan Tang Clan was exceptionally vigilant and heavily defended. Even for him, storming the place alone after losing an arm would be too much.

But his life has only been extended by a few days. The outcome will not change.

He had long since grasped every movement taking place in Sichuan.

All preparations were complete to hunt the three tigers crouching in Sichuan—Emei, Qingcheng, and the Tang Clan.

Now…

It was time to summon the hunters.

Whoosh!

The middle-aged man moved as though gliding. Distance vanished with every step, and the scenery swept past him.

At last, he stopped before a cliff deep in the mountains.

"This is the place."

Without hesitation, the middle-aged man reached out and placed a hand against the cliff.

The next instant—

Vwoom.

A resonant hum rang out, and the cliff collapsed.

No. It would be more accurate to say that space itself had warped. The weathered stones and boulders vanished, revealing a vast hollow concealed behind them.

The sorcerers' Mystic Gate Formation. It never stops being impressive.

But compared to what he was about to do, even this was nothing more than a parlor trick.

Step. Step. Step.

The middle-aged man strode into the darkness blanketing the hollow. At its heart, he stopped in the center of a strange pattern carved into the floor and drew upon his internal energy.

A dark red haze poured from his entire body.

The instant it touched the pattern—

“Lord of Heaven!”

Flash!

At the middle-aged man’s cry, the pattern blazed to life. A black flash—dark yet bright, impossible to describe—filled the entire hollow.

Then the light vanished, and a thunderous chorus filled the space it left behind.

“We pay our respects to the Western Heaven Demon Lord!”

“We pay our respects to the Demon Lord!”

Hundreds of tiger hunters stood before him in pitch-black robes, their eyes devoid of emotion and their auras sharp as blades.

A faint smile touched the lips of the middle-aged man—the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

Chapter 348

The black-robed men stood in neat ranks and files. The sheer number of them—several hundred—was not the only thing filling the enormous cavern.

It was their aura.

The suffocating aura emanating from the men—their eyes deep-set, their bodies upright as iron towers—was swallowing the cavern.

And towering over them all stood one man—a giant in his own right.

“Third Fiend.”

Vwoom.

His voice, infused with profound internal energy, bored into the black-robed men’s ears. They shuddered, and the three old men at the front were no exception.

They stepped forward several paces, then prostrated themselves at the middle-aged man’s feet in perfect unison.

“The juniors of the Qilian Mountains pay their respects to the Western Heaven Demon Lord.”

Their faces, builds, and voices—everything about the three old men was astonishingly alike.

They were brothers born from the same womb.

Their mother had died giving birth to them, and their father had abandoned his young children and left. Stranded in the barren land of Qinghai, the three brothers hid near the vast mountain range to escape the scorn of others.

Then, one day, after everyone had forgotten them, the brothers returned.

They returned as the Qilian Three Fiends.

“You’ve aged quite a bit since I last saw you. I suppose I could call you the Three Old Men now.”

“N-no, my lord. How could the likes of us be called old while you are here?”

The Qilian Three Fiends had once been fiends who dyed Qinghai Province red with blood. Yet before the Western Heaven Demon Lord, they were nothing more than docile lambs.

The Qilian Three Fiends swallowed hard, then opened their mouths at the same time, as if they were one person.

“B-but, my lord. Forgive us for saying so, but your arm…”

“This?”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord looked down at the empty sleeve where one of his arms should have been and answered in a dry voice.

“It was the price I paid for two lives.”

“Does that mean…”

“The two old fossils from the Tang Clan and Emei are no longer of this world.”

"…!"

The air inside the cavern trembled with agitation.

Who were the Poison King and the Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun? They were giants who had left their mark on the history of the Murim, Supreme Peak masters who had dominated an entire era.

And yet…

Both had met their end at the hands of a single man.

The Qilian Three Fiends and the black-robed men stared at their leader in awe.

"Th-then…"

"Yes."

A fierce light flashed in the Western Heaven Demon Lord's eyes.

"The time has finally come."

Right now, my eyes are closed.

I focus my mind in the quiet darkness. As a voice pierces my ears, someone's figure takes shape in the darkness.

Neither tall nor short, the young man hiding claws behind an innocent smile is Cheongpung.

"First, I'll use Crouching Tiger Fist to target my Benefactor's shoulder, chest, and stomach in that order."

The imaginary Cheongpung moves through the darkness.

Fast.

He erases the distance in a single step and rushes in, his fist blurring. I can almost hear the fierce whistle of air being torn apart.

"I can dodge that easily. I'll retreat half a step diagonally and throw a punch at your flank."

"I'll use Chaotic Flower Hand to redirect your force as I retreat, then counter with Thirty-Six Plum Blossom Swords."

"What form?"

"One Cut Under Heaven."

One Cut Under Heaven was among the most powerful supreme forms of the Thirty-Six Plum Blossom Swords.

Even back when Cheongpung and I had sparred regularly, I had chosen to evade that technique rather than block it.

"Isn't that a little excessive?"

"Given who my opponent is, I have to give it everything I've got."

"What happened to calling me Benefactor?"

"That's one thing, and this is another. Hehe. Anyway, One Cut Under Heaven."

One Cut Under Heaven.

It wasn't difficult to imagine how the attack would come.

In the darkness, Cheongpung uses Chaotic Flower Hand to redirect my force and retreat without taking the blow. The instant his hand reaches his waist, a flash bursts forth.

Sshk!

With a spine-chilling hiss, Sword Energy surges out horizontally.

I can see it vividly before me.

What should I do?

I don't have to think long.

"I'll deflect it. First form of the Fire Dragon Divine Spear—Fire Dragon's Single Tail."

"You won't be able to block it."

"When was the last time we fought?"

"Hmm. About a year ago."

"If you think about it one way, that's short. If you think about it another, it's a long time. It was long for me. Long enough for a single day to feel like ten years."

"…!"

"Think again. Are you sure I can't block it?"

Cheongpung was silent for a moment before answering. His voice had sunk low.

"I was wrong. If it's you, Benefactor… I think you can."

"Then let's continue."

Cheongpung and I devoted ourselves to discussing martial arts for a long while.

It had been more than a year since we had actually crossed hands, but from the Star-Array Grand Banquet until now, we had come to know each other's martial arts and skill levels well enough to make this possible.

"Three steps to the left. Plum Blossom Five-Point Finger."

"Plum Blossom Five-Point Finger is an excellent martial art, but it won't matter as long as I protect my vital points. I'll follow you in and strike your chest with Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist."

Within the scenes we each imagine, the battle surges back and forth.

One hundred exchanges. Two hundred.

Before long, our imagined bout passes five hundred exchanges. Then Cheongpung suddenly speaks.

"I'll use Dark Fragrance Drift to close to within two steps, then Plum Blossom Three-Ridge Sword."

All of a sudden?

Cheongpung was weaker than me in close combat. He had learned Huashan's outstanding supreme martial arts, but perhaps because the sect's roots lay in sword techniques, the Fire Gate Clan had a slight advantage when it came to palm techniques.

And yet he was coming in this close…

Ah. So that's it.

I had suspected as much, but this was Cheongpung, all right.

I opened my eyes with a hollow laugh. When I didn't answer for a long while, Cheongpung cautiously opened his eyes to a narrow slit and asked,

"Benefactor, why?"

"That's enough for today."

"Ah! Why?"

"Because it would be a shame."

"What?"

"Let's fight for real later. Not through a discussion like this. Let's actually cross weapons."

It would be too unsatisfying to decide the outcome through an imagined exchange. I meant that we should settle it later with both of us fighting at full strength.

Cheongpung was as innocent as a child, but by no means stupid. Surely that was enough for him to understand—

"Why would we cross weapons? Wouldn't they collide?"

"…"

No.

Maybe he really was just an idiot.

While I regretted my hasty judgment, Cheongpung began pestering me.

"I'm bored, Benefactor. Can't we keep going?"

"Oh, Cheongpung. Did you hear about that?"

"About what?"

I gazed intently at Cheongpung and parted my lips.

"I heard there's a former imperial chef at the Sichuan Tang Clan."

"An imperial chef?"

"Apparently, his cooking is incredible. Especially his pastries and sweets."

Gasp.

Cheongpung's eyes glazed over for a moment, but he soon shook his head vigorously.

"N-no. I have to stay here with you and watch over Grandpa Jeok."

"It's fine. I'm staying here anyway, so—"

"Then I'll be back!"

"…Sure. Go ahead."

Whoosh!

What was that? Some kind of bullet movement technique?

Once Cheongpung had vanished at the speed of light, I looked around.

A bleak chill and a foul stench permeated the underground prison. I hadn't taken a single step outside since the treatment began.

"It's only the fourth day."

The words escaped me like a sigh.

Time passed far more slowly in the underground prison than I had imagined. Not because the place never saw a ray of sunlight, but because of the anxiety and tension felt only by those who were waiting.

Perhaps that was why every day felt like my blood was drying up.

"Maybe I should have stayed in front of the treatment room."

Even as I said it, I shook my head. There was nothing I could do by pacing in front of the treatment room door anyway.

With my five senses already sharpened to their limit, I would only listen to every sound coming from inside until I could no longer bear it, then retreat and pace through the underground prison at a distance.

Just as I was doing now.

Still, it's awfully quiet now that I'm alone.

With Cheongpung, who had stuck to me like glue for the past three days, suddenly gone, I felt strangely empty.

Tang Sadok had forbidden even Old Man Gung from entering the prison, so I was completely alone now.

No. Come to think of it, I'm not alone.

I wasn't talking about the Divine Physician and Mungyeong, who were probably completely absorbed in treating Jeok Cheongang.

There were ten or so prisoners trapped in the underground prison, waiting for the day they would die.

They were my roommates.

Not exactly the best roommates, though.

They weren't the kind who left the toilet unflushed or constantly brought their lovers over. Every one of them was a fiend who had earned a notorious name throughout the martial world.

Even if they were imprisoned, there was no way sharing a space with men like that could be enjoyable.

And the most troublesome part was…

Dong. Ddong. Ddeeeong.

I'm the one who has to feed them.

I frowned at the familiar tolling of the bell.

With Old Man Gung gone, someone had to make sure the prisoners were still alive and bring them their meals.

That someone was me.

The bell that had just rung was the signal from outside announcing mealtime.

At least it's only once a day.

Still, bothersome was bothersome. I sighed and started walking.

In a corner of the prison, a battered old wooden barrel awaited me, filled with scraps of food haphazardly mixed together.

It had been poured down through a hole connected to the surface. Calling it a meal was generous. It was basically a slop bucket.

No one's around, so I guess it's feeding time.

There was a reason Tang Sadok had used the word feed three days ago.

The Sichuan Tang Clan treated the prisoners here like dogs and pigs.

No, dogs and pigs had it better. At least livestock didn't have to worry about surprise visits from Old Man Gung carrying an assortment of torture implements and wearing an eerie smile.

"Heave-ho."

Adopting the mindset of a zookeeper, I carried the slop bucket around the prison.

Beyond the thick iron bars, prisoners sat with their arms and legs bound in steel chains. All I had to do was open each door, step inside, scoop up a heaping ladleful, and dump it into the battered bowl set before them.

Whenever I did that, the prisoners, who had been lying limp and helpless after prolonged imprisonment and torture, would make their eyes flash and strike up a conversation.

"Never seen your face before."

"You've been seeing me for three days. What kind of bullshit is that?"

"Release me. I'll teach you martial arts that can look down on all under heaven."

"Judging by the fact that you're rotting in here, they sound like martial arts the whole world can look down on."

"You insolent bastard… The moment I get out of here, I'll tear you apart and kill you myself."

"Oh, impressive. I'll be sure to pass that along to Old Man Gung."

"Please! Anything but that!"

The attempts to win me over never stopped.

Some offered to teach me their martial arts. A middle-aged beauty who had once drained the vital essence of the Tang Clan's direct line through a technique of harvesting yang to replenish yin even tried to seduce me.

"Child. Why don't you come a little closer? I'll show you heaven."

"Kirara Asuka. Grandma Uehara."[1752]

"…What?"

"The mainland still has a long way to go compared to the island nation. Stop talking nonsense and eat your damn food."

"You little—Hey! You turtle bastard!"

I ignored her spiteful shouting and headed toward the last prison cell.

In the most secluded and damp corner was a strange man with disheveled hair.

He's the quietest old man in this prison.

He was also the most dangerous.

The severed sinews and meridians in his limbs and the restraints several times heavier and sturdier than those of the other prisoners were proof enough.

Rattle. Thump.

The old man stared silently at the bowl of unidentifiable food before suddenly speaking.

"I heard you talking about this old man."

I stopped short.

Not because it was the first time I had heard his voice in three days, but because I had no idea what he meant.

"Talking about you? When did I do that?"

"Three days ago. Did that Gung fellow not mention me?"

"Gung fellow? Old Man Gung?"

I searched my memory for a moment, then looked at the old man with newfound surprise.

"Oh. Then are you the one who pissed on the Kunlun Sect's signboard?"

"Yes. This old man is the Heavenly Power Demon—"

"So you were the Kunlun Sect's public-pissing criminal."

"…"

The old man—the Heavenly Power Demon—had an eyelid that twitched.

[1752] A reference to Japanese adult-film performers Kirara Asuka and Ai Uehara. Taekyung mangles the names, replacing Ai with noin, Korean for "old person."

Chapter 349

After a brief silence, the Heavenly Power Demon spoke.

"…A public-urination criminal? Do not call this old man by such a disgraceful name."

Ah. My mistake.

It seemed the fiend who had once spread his infamy throughout the world found that title rather unpleasant.

After giving it some thought, I offered him a more appropriate alternative.

"Hmm. How about bedwetter?"

"Y-you little…"

"If you don't like that, then The New Nation's Little Pisser.[1753]"

"This old man did not wet himself!"

"Then He Who Peed. A Midsummer Night's Pee, featuring the Kunlun Sect.[1754]"

"…!"

I clicked my tongue at the Heavenly Power Demon, who couldn't even come up with a response.

"I don't know what got into you and made you start talking all of a sudden, but I don't want to hear it, and I don't want to talk to you. So eat your damn food and relieve yourself to your heart's content. Shit, piss, or both at the same time. Whatever you want."

"W-wait."

Good grief. What a pain.

I had finished handing out the food and was about to leave the underground prison when I turned around with an irritated scowl.

"What?"

"There is something I wish to ask."

"And if you have something to ask, am I obligated to answer?"

But the Heavenly Power Demon, seized by an inexplicable desperation, refused to back down. Wearing scraps of what might once have been called clothing, he opened his mouth with a gleam in his eyes.

"The Divine Cult. What has become of the Divine Cult?"

"The Divine Cult?"

"Yes, the Heavenly Demon Divine Cult!"

"Oh. The Demonic Cult."

The different names used by the two sides had confused me for a moment.

[1753] This plays on the title of a Korean children's song, "Children of a New Nation."

[1754] "He Who Peed" plays on the Korean rapper San E's name. "A Midsummer Night's Pee" parodies the title of his song "A Midsummer Night's Sweetness."

To most Murim warriors, myself included, it was your Demonic Cult. But to members of the Demonic Cult, it could only be our Divine Cult.

Especially for the Heavenly Power Demon standing before me. Wasn't he a fiend whose notoriety had once been considerable even among the Demonic Cult's members?

"What, have you been locked up so long that you're feeling homesick?"

"Tell me."

"That's easy enough."

I gave a short laugh and continued.

"I don't know either."

"…What?"

"How would I know what the Demonic Cult is doing, holed up all the way out there? If a new inmate from the Demonic Cult ends up in the cell next to yours, ask him."

The Heavenly Power Demon stared at me as if he couldn't understand.

"Are you not the Fire King's successor? Yet you claim to know nothing about the Divine Cult?"

"…How did you know that?"

"My dantian may be ruined, but these old ears still work."

"You're remarkably spry for your age. How much do you know?"

"Only that the Fire King is here to have his injuries treated."

"Hmm."

He was a rather perceptive old man.

Cheongpung had mentioned Jeok Cheongang's name several times, but never loudly enough for the other prisoners to hear. Even if the Heavenly Power Demon had overheard him, it would have been difficult to infer the circumstances from those conversations alone.

He keeps his mouth shut and his ears open.

He was different from the other prisoners, who tried every possible trick to win me over the moment they saw an opening.

I found myself growing slightly interested in the old man before me.

"But why are you so curious about news of the Demonic Cult? You've been imprisoned for ages."

"It has been forty-odd years."

"The Great Faction War had already ended around then. Don't you have a general idea of what happened?"

"A general idea?"

The Heavenly Power Demon smiled bitterly.

"Few people know the Divine Cult better than this old man."

"Sounds like you pissed on things there too."

"This old man was once an Elder of the Great Heavenly Demon Divine Cult. It was I who obeyed the august command of the Cult Leader, subjugated Qinghai, and fired the opening shot of the holy war."

"Holy war, my ass."

Despite my curt response, I was secretly surprised.

He's a bigger deal than I thought.

From the bits and pieces I had picked up, the Demonic Cult had immensely powerful fiends known as the Ten Elders or the Seven Elders or something like that.

I had assumed he wasn't an ordinary fiend after hearing that he'd pissed all over the Kunlun Sect's signboard. But I had never imagined that the shabby old man waiting to die in an underground prison had once been an Elder of the Demonic Cult.

"You knew nothing about this old man, I suppose."

"Of course not. That was ages ago. Today was the first time I'd even heard the title Heavenly Power Demon."

"…Heh. Has it truly been so long already?"

As the Heavenly Power Demon let out a hollow, self-mocking laugh, I leaned against the prison wall.

"So what does a former Demonic Cult Elder from forty years ago want to ask me?"

"Tell me everything you know about the Divine Cult. Every piece of recent news, without adding or omitting anything."

"I don't know. Something about this feels off."

"This old man has already passed his ninetieth year. Both body and spirit are exhausted. This is the final request of an old man who has already been given his day to die."

"The request of a fiend who committed all kinds of atrocities, you mean."

"Atrocities… I will gladly pay for the lives I have taken. But what, exactly, makes something demonic? The Divine Cult and your people opposed each other for many years, each standing by its own convictions. We merely lost the struggle in which we staked our fate. That is all."

The Heavenly Power Demon continued in a clear voice, almost lamenting.

"Can that alone determine who was right and who was wrong? The world back then was like a powder keg that could explode at any moment. Had your side crossed Gansu and Qinghai first and reached the Divine Cult, you would have slaughtered our followers beneath the paltry excuses of serving the greater good and rooting out evil at its source."

"But from what I've heard…"

"Boy."

His quiet voice silenced me.

A pair of eyes blazed more fiercely than ever as they stared into mine.

They were not the eyes of an old man whose martial arts had been completely crippled, waiting for the day he would die.

They belonged to a general and Supreme Peak master who had once led an army and swept across the world.

"This old man saw it with his own eyes and experienced it firsthand. I saw how cruel men could become in a war of killing and being killed. Neither the followers of the Divine Cult who cried out for holy war nor the Sect Leaders of the Nine Sects and One Gang[1755] who called for the extermination of demons were exceptions. Even…"

At that moment, the fire in his eyes died away. Only his bitter voice remained, scattering through the air like ash.

"Even the Cult Leader was no exception. He lost the convictions with which he had begun and fell into corruption. Yes. Perhaps, as you orthodox faction warriors claim, the Divine Cult truly had become a Demonic Cult."

The Heavenly Power Demon's words left my thoughts tangled.

In a way, what he had just said aligned with something I had recently come to understand.

Good people and bad people exist everywhere.

The Demonic Cult and the orthodox Murim had been at odds for ages, each holding a match as they watched the other across a powder keg ready to explode.

The Demonic Cult had ultimately been the one to light the fuse. But what if the orthodox faction had struck the first match?

Would the Roaring Fury Swordsman and the Taeeul Merciless Sword have spared ordinary Demonic Cult civilians who knew nothing of martial arts?

No way.

For a moment, those two men overlapped with the Heavenly Power Demon in my mind.

Who was white, and who was black? Was there something unknown hidden in the history that had already passed?

Damn it. I don't know.

I bit my lip hard and pulled my back away from the cold wall.

"There's no point telling me any of that."

The Heavenly Power Demon nodded weakly.

"…I know. Nothing is more futile than speaking of a past already gone."

[1755] A collective name for major orthodox martial-arts sects and the Beggars' Gang.

“And I’m not as knowledgeable about the Demonic Cult as you think. If that well-informed beggar were here instead, he might’ve been able to give you the news you want.”

“Did the Divine Cult fall?”

“I don’t know. Apparently not. From what I’ve heard, it has managed to survive somehow.”

Dark Heaven’s name had drawn so much attention lately that it was easy to forget, but the Demonic Cult remained the orthodox Murim’s eternal archenemy.

And with a possible connection between the Demonic Cult and Dark Heaven now under suspicion, the Murim Alliance headquarters in Henan was probably busy investigating both.

“I did hear that the Demonic Cult suffered devastating losses in the Great Faction War and shrank to a shadow of its former self.”

The Central Plains was not called the center of the world for nothing.

Unlike the orthodox Murim, which had recovered a considerable portion of its losses by absorbing the region’s abundant resources, goods, and population like a sponge, the Demonic Cult had been forced into the Tianshan Mountains while bearing the full weight of its tremendous losses.

“…Of course. It was a war in which the Divine Cult mobilized its full strength.”

He muttered under his breath, a self-mocking smile touching his lips.

“Heh. We once swallowed half the world, and now we are reduced to this pitiful state. I should have stopped the Cult Leader, even at the cost of my life, when he accepted vicious criminals like the Qilian Three Fiends and the Yin-Yang Twin Ghosts. Then again, that was when the Cult Leader himself began to change.”

“The Yin-Yang Twin Ghosts?”

“You may not know of them, but long ago, there were men called—”

“Oh, I know them.”

“What? You know the Yin-Yang Twin Ghosts?”

I nodded as if it were obvious.

“I don’t know much about the Qilian Three Fiends, but I know the Yin-Yang Twin Ghosts.”

“How can someone who has never even heard this old man’s title know of the Yin-Yang Twin Ghosts?”

“Well, you see…”

I scratched the back of my head and continued.

“I tend to remember the title of anyone I’ve fought. Especially masters of that caliber.”

“…W-what? You fought the Yin-Yang Twin Ghosts?”

“Technically, I only fought one of them—the Yang Ghost. Our Old Master—no, Master—killed the Yang Ghost. The Yin Ghost was killed by some crazy bastard and followed his friend to the afterlife. Anyway, do these fucking bastards think Henan is Gotham City…?”

“…!”

The Heavenly Power Demon froze with his mouth hanging open, then hurriedly poured out his questions.

“T-the Yin-Yang Twin Ghosts! How did those men survive and reappear in the Murim? And in Henan, no less? Did the Divine Cult launch a surprise attack on Shaolin?”

“They did raise hell at Shaolin, but it wasn’t the Demonic Cult’s doing.”

“Th-then who was responsible? Who did it?”

I had expected as much, but the Heavenly Power Demon truly knew nothing about the current state of the Murim.

The only outsider he ever spoke to was Old Man Gung.

Not that the old man is the type to explain things out of kindness.

Not unless he considered severing tendons a form of kindness.

After a moment’s thought, I decided to tell him the truth.

The Heavenly Power Demon had no chance of leaving the underground prison before his death anyway.

Besides, Dark Heaven’s existence had once been top secret, but word was already spreading among the major sects. Telling him would cause no harm.

“Uh, I’m not sure how to put this.”

“Tell me. Quickly!”

“Hold on.”

Ah, right.

At last, I found the perfect term. Impressed by my own brilliance, I opened my mouth.

“They changed jobs.”

“…?”

“I don’t know whether they joined another company or merely transferred to a different department, but until they died, they were working for a group called Dark Heaven instead of the Demonic Cult…”

In the end, I couldn’t finish.

Hurried footsteps approached, and a familiar face appeared.

“B’factor!”

“Swallow what’s in your mouth before you talk.”

“B’factor! B’factor! Try this too! It’s delish!”

“What’s with all the ‘B’factors’? Are you looking for the police chief who lives in Namcheon-dong?[1756]”

“B’factor!”

“Yeah, yeah. I’m sure you went to the sauna, ate together, and did the whole nine yards.”

“It’s weally delish!”

Cheongpung had stuffed both cheeks full of snacks, and he was still carrying an armful of food wrapped in paper.

I pulled out a nicely roasted duck leg and was about to sink my teeth into it when I remembered the man I had momentarily forgotten and held it out to him.

“Want one?”

Only then did I finally see the Heavenly Power Demon, frozen like a stone statue.

[1756]The police chief, sauna, and meal are a reference to a Korean film line in which a gangster boasts of his connections.

Chapter 350

Step. Step.

As always, I made my rounds carrying the slop bucket.

Time moved slowly in the underground prison, yet it passed as steadily as the clock at the Ministry of National Defense.[1757] I was already entering my sixth day down here, and the routine was gradually becoming familiar.

Clank. Screeeech.

I opened the rusted bars and strode into a cell filled with filth and stagnant water.

An old man bound to a torture rack greeted me with a sly grin.

“You’ve come?”

He was the Killing Ghost, who had joined the Demonic Cult during the Great Faction War and killed more than a hundred martial artists of the orthodox faction.

Now reduced to a toothless old man, he continued through slurred words.

“I tell you this for the last time…”

I cut him off as I scooped up some slop with a long ladle.

“Didn’t you say yesterday was the last time?”

“This time, it truly is the last.”

“Sure. And tomorrow will be the real, real last time.”

I’d been through this countless times over the past six days. It wasn’t even surprising anymore.

The old man flinched at my indifference, then shouted, “You! Become my Disciple!”

“You! Get hit.”

Whack!

The ladle struck him squarely on the crown, and the old man writhed in pain. The chains binding his limbs swayed and clattered noisily.

“Graaaagh!”

“Keep it down. You’re loud.”

“Ugh! You little bastard!”

The old man was about to start yelling at the top of his lungs when his eyes suddenly widened and his nostrils flared.

He had caught the scent of oil beneath the prison’s stench.

“W-what is that smell?”

“Nothing you need to know about.”

[1757] The comparison invokes the passage of time during mandatory military service in South Korea: the clock keeps moving, however slowly it seems to those serving.

“Roast duck. It’s roast duck! Do you have liquor too?”

“What liquor?”

“Liar! That aroma is unmistakably Jiannan Chun!”

“…With a sense of smell like that, you’re on the level of a drug-sniffing dog.”

“Hand it over! Now!”

Whack!

“Graaaagh!”

“It belongs to someone else. Just eat your damn slop.”

I set down the bucket and headed for the last cell.

Far deeper and darker than the others, it held a familiar old monster who was waiting for me.

Clank.

“I brought your meal.”

“…”

“You must have had a hard time waiting. By the way, why is it so cold in here? Your sleeping arrangements must be terribly uncomfortable. Should I ask the Tang Clan to lay down an animal-hide blanket for you?”

“…”

So this was how he wanted to play it.

Despite my soft, gentle tone, as soothing as a cat’s paw, the Heavenly Power Demon remained stubbornly silent.

Ever since what had happened three days ago, he had kept his eyes and mouth firmly closed.

Of course, that wasn’t enough to make me give up.

“Come on, don’t be like that. Try some of this.”

I took out a sheet of grease-stained paper and unfolded it.

A whole duck, coated in spices and roasted to perfection, revealed itself in all its plump glory. As a bonus, its mouthwatering aroma was strong enough to drive away the stench of the cell.

“What is this? It’s roast duck made by a former imperial chef. I tried some myself, and the duck is definitely tender. The flavor is very consistent too.”

“…”

“And roast duck calls for liquor. Jiannan Chun, the famous liquor of Sichuan! Liquor and meat suit a Great Hero like the Heavenly Power Demon, don’t they?”

“…”

A frigid silence settled over the already chilly cell.

I kept smiling brightly at the Heavenly Power Demon as he sat cross-legged. At last, I let out a deep sigh.

“Fuck, I can’t do this anymore.”

For three days, I’d bent over backward to please him. I’d softened my voice, spoken with scrupulous politeness, praised him as a Great Hero of benevolence and righteousness, and kissed his ass shamelessly.

But the Heavenly Power Demon had refused every offer and comfort I provided. No matter how much food or clothing I brought him, he never touched any of it.

“I’ve done more than enough by now. Are you really going to keep this up?”

“…”

“I’m only being this courteous because I’m such a gentleman. What do you think will happen if the Sichuan Tang Clan finds out, huh?”

At that moment, the Heavenly Power Demon finally spoke without opening his eyes. It was the first time I’d heard his voice in three whole days, and it had grown terribly hoarse.

“Do so.”

“What?”

“This old man has endured enough torture to be sick of it. Even if I depart this world, I will have no regrets.”

He had spent more than forty years imprisoned in the underground prison. Faced with his serene detachment, like some enlightened monk, I clicked my tongue.

“Good grief. You really don’t make things easy. Is it really so difficult to tell me only what you know about Dark Heaven?”

“I have said all there is to say. Kill this old man or torture him. Do as you please.”

“No, what kind of old man is this?”

But the Heavenly Power Demon had already sealed his lips again. He probably wouldn’t open them a second time.

“…What a stubborn old man.”

I heaved a sigh deep enough to sink the earth, placed the liquor and roast duck within his reach, and turned away.

“Fine. For now, just eat that. You haven’t had anything in three days.”

Even as I spoke, I knew. Whether I returned tomorrow, the day after, or three days from now, the food would still be exactly where I’d left it, stone cold and untouched.

“Damn it.”

With the Heavenly Power Demon fed—or at least served—I finished my rounds and dropped to the floor in a corridor far from the cells.

The Heavenly Power Demon.

His rigid face and that indescribable look in his eyes kept flashing through my mind. There was no mistaking the agitation those two words—Dark Heaven—had stirred in him.

The problem was that he refused to say a word about it.

But he definitely knew about Dark Heaven long ago.

I hadn't heard it directly from the Heavenly Power Demon, but it was already as good as established fact.

The real question was how he knew about Dark Heaven, and how much he knew.

I slowly retraced the conversation I'd had with the Heavenly Power Demon three days ago.

After putting the brain that had earned me seventh-tier school grades[1758] through its paces, I arrived at only one plausible conclusion.

Dark Heaven and the Demonic Cult are deeply connected.

No. They might even be one and the same.

The Heavenly Power Demon had once been an Elder of the Demonic Cult. Even after spending forty years imprisoned and tortured in the underground prison, he had never lost his loyalty to the Cult. His silence was proof enough.

If Dark Heaven were an enemy of the Demonic Cult, he would've talked by now.

Then what the hell was Dark Heaven? Some splinter faction that had broken away from the Demonic Cult? Or another organization created within the Demonic Cult itself?

A branch of Shincheonji[1759] called Sick Shincheonji. Something like that.

Whatever they were, one thing was certain: the bastards were a plague.

I'd been lost in thought for quite some time when Cheongpung appeared with a spring in his step, trailing a sweet aroma behind him.

"Hey!"

"…Your grandpa lives on Lotus Peak at Huashan, right?"

Cheongpung swallowed what was in his mouth before answering.

"No! He's in Henan right now!"

"Yeah, sure."

Why did I even bother talking to him?

The mountain of food piled in Cheongpung's arms left me speechless. I was starting to feel sorry for the former imperial chef, and I'd never even seen the man's face.

"You went out for all this?"

"Yes! And while I was at it, I brought a letter from the Beggars' Sect."

"…Shouldn't that be the other way around?"

"Hehe."

"Don't smile. I'll get attached."

[1758] South Korean school-record grades use a scale on which one is highest and nine is lowest. A seventh-tier grade is poor.

[1759] Shincheonji is a South Korean religious organization.

I answered gruffly and accepted the letter Cheongpung held out.

When I unfolded the grimy paper—wherever he'd been keeping it, it couldn't have been clean—three strands of yellow dog hair drifted out.

A three-knot[1760] Disciple. The branch leader sent it.

Just as I'd expected, the letter was addressed to Gung Gibang from the Beggars' Sect's Chengdu branch leader.

Of course, Gung Gibang was at the Divine Physician's secret refuge, so the branch leader had probably sent it to me for convenience.

A moment later, when I looked up from the letter, Cheongpung asked, "What does it say?"

"Nothing much. They're still searching."

The Beggars' Sect had originally combed through Sichuan with a fine-tooth comb in search of the Divine Physician, but it had since changed targets.

Now it was hunting the culprit who had murdered the Poison King and the Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun.

Not that a man like that would be easy to catch.

Tang Sadok had initially insisted on settling the matter with the Sichuan Tang Clan's strength alone, but his attitude had changed after he lent me the Myriad-Poison Ring.

Yet even with the Tang Clan's full cooperation, the culprit's trail had vanished like a ghost.

"Do you think they'll find him?"

"Who knows? We'll have to hope for the best. We have the Beggars' Sect, and the Tang Clan's Green Shadow Squad are experts in reconnaissance and pursuit. Surely they'll turn up something."

"What about the government troops?"

"They seem to be pulling their weight too."

Prince Shangshan, Zhu Bao, wielded tremendous influence.

Won Gyun, the City Lord of Sichuan Province, had readily agreed to my request to search for the culprit instead of the Divine Physician.

The individual fighting ability of the government troops couldn't compare to that of Murim warriors, but their sheer numbers—several thousand men—couldn't be ignored.

"Wow! Thousands?"

"I don't know the exact number, but apparently they're swarming all over the place. You saw the government troops too, didn't you, Cheongpung? On our way back to the Sichuan Tang Clan."

[1760] In the Beggars' Sect, the number of knots denotes a disciple's standing; more knots indicate higher standing.

"Oh, but there weren't that many when I saw them."

"…Of course not. Did you think thousands of men would all travel together?"

It wasn't difficult to imagine the government troops gathered in groups of three or five according to their assigned formations, stopping and searching people.

> The government troops are gradually expanding their search area and advancing toward Qingcheng and Emei.
>
> They appear to be searching for the culprit while preparing for a possible incident.

I read the last line of the letter and let out a quiet laugh.

They're doing better than I expected.

Won Gyun, the City Lord of Sichuan Province, looked every inch the corrupt official, but apparently he wasn't completely incompetent. Either that, or the military officer in charge of this operation knew what he was doing.

But what if they still can't find him after all this?

I'd talked a big game in front of Tang Sadok, so the thought was seriously worrying.

Of course, Jeok Cheongang's safe recovery came first.

I glanced at the treatment room, whose door remained firmly shut, then casually asked Cheongpung, "What kind of food did you bring?"

"Sho mush!"

"…Finish what's in your mouth. I'll take care of the rest."

Jang Il was a two-knot[1761] Disciple of the Beggars' Sect.

He had become one out of necessity rather than choice. He'd heard a rumor that anyone who formally joined the Beggars' Sect, underwent the initiation ceremony, and became an official Disciple would receive a whole dumpling.

What could an eight-year-old beggar brat who hadn't eaten in four days have known?

Clutching his empty stomach, he had gone to the Chengdu branch and become a Beggars' Sect disciple that very day.

"They only gave me half a dumpling, too. Just thinking about it still makes my teeth grind. Goddamn it."

The beggars listening to Jang Il yawned quietly. They'd already heard the story dozens of times.

[1761] In the Beggars' Sect, the number of knots denotes a disciple's standing; more knots indicate higher standing.

More than ten years had passed, but Jang Il's anger had yet to subside.

"I gritted my teeth over that half dumpling and worked my way up to deputy branch leader. So you lot should…"

As the story showed signs of dragging on, the three one-knot[1762] Disciples exchanged glances.

"Oh! My stomach suddenly hurts!"

"Gasp! Mine too!"

"Ugh, the latrine! Where's the latrine?"

"You little bastards!"

Jang Il shouted, but the three beggars had already bolted.

"Those damn brats… Just wait until they come back."

That was when a group of men caught Jang Il's eye.

Uniform clothing and weapons. Their lack of military discipline was an added bonus. The sight was familiar enough that Jang Il muttered,

"Government troops."

These days, government troops were more common than neighborhood stray dogs.

Normally, they slacked off so thoroughly that no one ever saw them, but now that the high and mighty had stepped in, they seemed to be scrambling to at least put on a show.

They said they were expanding the search area. Are they already this far out?

As he wondered about it, a middle-aged military officer who appeared to be leading the group approached him with a smile.

"Are you, by any chance, a Beggars' Sect disciple?"

Jang Il nodded casually.

"As you can see."

"I thought so when I saw your knots."

"Anyone can tell just by looking. Still, you've made good time. You're already this far out."

"Ah, they say the Beggars' Sect has the finest intelligence network under heaven. I suppose you already knew we were coming?"

"This much is nothing out of the ordinary for our Sect."

The military officer smiled along with the smug Jang Il.

"But there are no villages nearby, and hardly anyone passes through here. Why are you alone?"

[1762] In the Beggars' Sect, the number of knots denotes a disciple's standing; more knots indicate higher standing.

“Don’t ask. The branch leader kept nagging me, so I brought a few men out for some fresh air. Things have been pretty noisy lately with all this talk of a murderer and whatnot.”

“I see.”

“Well then, take care…”

Jang Il never finished.

The moment the officer nodded with a smile, something cold pierced his chest.

Shnk!

…Huh?

Cough.

Jang Il stared blankly at the sword buried in his chest and coughed up blood.

Why? How?

The questions never escaped his lips. His knees buckled as he stared at the officer through clouding eyes.

His face struck the new shoots just beginning to emerge from the earth, and a cold voice reached his ears.

“Find the others. They should be nearby.”

“As you command.”

“Stupid beggar bastard. Why did he have to be here of all places…?”

That was the last thing Jang Il heard.

He was twenty-five years old.

The young beggar died in a secluded forest two days from Emei Sect.

Chapter 351

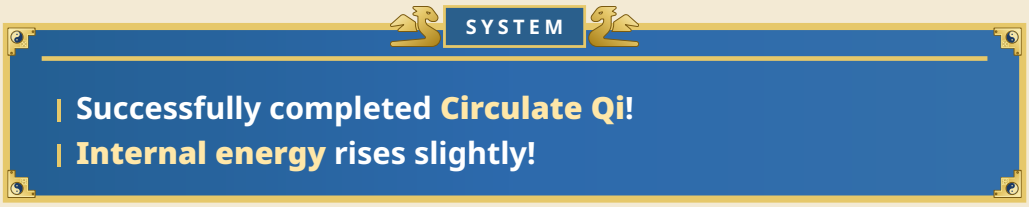
Waiting was nerve-racking, and time crawled by.

If I had been one of the countless twenty-somethings living in twenty-first-century Korea, I might have been half a wreck by now.

After all, I would have had to endure ten days in a gloomy underground prison without a smartphone or Wi-Fi.

But I had something those ordinary twenty-somethings didn't.

Martial arts.



"Phew."

I slowly drew a deep breath and gathered the qi inside me.

While I'd been circulating my qi, Cheongpung—standing guard, my ass; he'd been snoring away beside me—blearily opened his eyes.

"Oh, are you finished?"

"Phewww."

"Benefactor?"

"Phewwwww."

"Benefactor, are you hurt?"

"…"

Why did this guy keep ruining my concentration?

He looked ready to keep asking until I answered, so I reluctantly replied.

"Don't talk to me."

"Why not?"

"I'll lose qi."

There was a reason gym rats constantly went on about losing muscle.

Finishing circulating my qi didn't mean I could simply get up the instant it ended. I also needed time to gather my qi, savor the afterglow, and meditate.

"Oh, I'm sorry."

"Come on. You know all this, don't you?"

Cheongpung scratched the back of his head.

"I didn't know there was anything like that…"

"Huh? Then what have you been doing all this time?"

"I just got up and went out to play when I finished."

“From the very beginning?”

“Yes.”

“…Did Great Hero Mae Jonghak never teach you?”

“Grandpa said that no matter how much dust you gathered, all you’d have was a pile of dust. He said it was more important to spend that time doing whatever I wanted. Apparently, those experiences might eventually provide a clue to enlightenment.”

Was this some kind of YOLO cultivation method?

The more stories like this I heard, the more certain I became that Sword Saint Mae Jonghak was an eccentric.

No, wait.

That guy has more internal energy than I do.

I currently possessed just over a hundred years of internal energy.

That put me far above my peers; it was the kind of level someone could reach only if a prestigious great sect on the level of the Nine Sects and One Gang[1763] committed itself to supporting them.

And I had only managed it because I’d obtained the Blazing Flame Divine Pill and stumbled into various other fortuitous encounters while repeatedly surviving life-or-death situations in the Murim.

So how did Cheongpung have more internal energy than me?

“Elixirs! You ate Huashan’s elixirs!”

Cheongpung’s official sponsors were none other than the Sword Saint and Huashan. If he’d received their help, it wasn’t impossible.

But Cheongpung’s answer to my entirely reasonable suspicion was simple.

“No, I didn’t. Grandpa doesn’t like people coming to visit him.”

“Oh, right. Then how did you build up that much internal energy?”

Cheongpung thought for a moment before answering.

“It just sort of accumulated on its own.”

“…”

“Oh, and when I was little, I often had my sinews cleansed and my marrow washed.[1764] Hehe.”

What the hell? Why was he talking about cleansing the sinews and washing the marrow as if he were merely washing his face?

I stared blankly at Cheongpung as he smiled awkwardly.

This guy really was born a protagonist.

[1763] The Nine Sects and One Gang are a major grouping of martial-arts organizations in Murim fiction.

[1764] Cleansing the sinews and washing the marrow is a martial-arts technique said to improve a person’s constitution.

Natural talent and fortuitous encounters. Everything came so naturally to him that he took it all for granted.

The phrase I just did it, and it worked might as well have been invented for Cheongpung.

"What a rotten world."

"Benefactor, what is?"

"Nothing. Just something."

"Yes."

My chest had already felt stifled lately. Now it felt as though someone had piled another hundred sweet potatoes[1765] on top of it.

I'd run into the so-called "wall" that Murim warriors often spoke of, and I had been thinking about asking Cheongpung for advice…

But there's no point asking him.

I had just let out a quiet sigh when—

Grrrrrind.

"…Huh?"

"…Benefactor?"

A heavy scraping sound bored into my ears. Cheongpung stared past my shoulder, his eyes wide, and my heart sank before beginning to pound.

No way. No way.

It's only been ten days.

I slowly turned my head. At the far end of the corridor, an iron door was slowly opening, filling my entire field of vision.

When two people finally emerged, I asked in a trembling voice,

"How… did it go?"

There was no answer.

But that was enough.

The Divine Physician and Mungyeong—the exhausted master and Disciple—were looking at me with radiant smiles.

Smiles bright enough to illuminate the dark underground prison.

"The treatment was a success. There were several difficult moments along the way, but we managed to overcome them safely and finish the treatment sooner than expected…"

The Divine Physician continued speaking, but his voice sounded as though it were coming from far away. Only his first words kept echoing in my ears.

[1765] In Korean slang, sweet potatoes evoke a stifling sense of frustration.

The treatment was a success.

Yes, it had ended successfully. I'd heard the words I wanted to hear more than anything, and that was enough.

Old Master.

Without realizing it, I tightened my grip on Jeok Cheongang's hand.

He still lay there with his eyes closed, perhaps not yet ready to regain consciousness. But I could feel it clearly.

His vitality has returned.

That wasn't all. Jeok Cheongang's appearance had changed considerably over the past ten days. His age spots had vanished, his wrinkled skin had grown taut, and flesh had returned to the body that had been wasting away by the day.

Compared to before, he looked a good ten years younger. No, perhaps twenty.

"Could it be…?"

My voice trailed off as I looked at the Divine Physician.

Noticing the question in my eyes, he smiled faintly.

"Unfortunately, it is not Bone Transformation. However, the medicinal ingredients used during the treatment and the energy of the Thousand-Year Snow Ginseng greatly benefited Sir Jeok."

"Oh, I see."

Disappointment and joy washed over me at the same time.

It would have been wonderful if he had used this treatment as an opportunity to advance to an even higher realm, but perhaps I had expected too much for a moment.

"You seem disappointed."

"Oh, no."

Startled, I quickly waved my hands. These two had successfully completed the difficult treatment without a single complaint. It would have been rude to look disappointed.

"I was only…"

"Heh heh. I did not mean to blame you. How could I not understand Young Master Jin's feelings for his Master? Is that not right?"

"Of course. You are absolutely right, Master."

Mungyeong answered politely, then continued speaking to me.

"Sir Jeok will regain consciousness within three days at the latest. The treatment has only just ended, so his qi needs time to settle properly. You need not worry too much."

"Three days at the latest."

“Yes. Of course, even after he awakens, he must avoid exerting himself too heavily for a while. Sir Jeok is renowned throughout the Murim, so he should recover quickly.”

“I’m sure he will. He’s always been overflowing with energy. Then, does that mean everything really is…”

“Yes.”

Mungyeong smiled and nodded.

“The Yin and Yang have regained their balance, and no Formless Ultimate Poison remains. The treatment is over.”

“…Phew.”

I released the breath I’d been holding. All the strength drained from my body, leaving me with the strange sensation that I was floating.

How long had I waited to hear those words?

When my legs gave out and I slumped to the floor, the Divine Physician spoke with a mischievous expression.

“It seems this old quack was not very trustworthy to you, Young Master Jin.”

“N-no, it wasn’t that I didn’t trust you, Old Man Dong. It was just… You know how it is. Cheongpung knows what I mean, right?”

“I don’t!”

“…Never mind. My mistake for asking you.”

The Divine Physician laughed even louder.

He watched us fondly, as though enjoying his grandchildren’s antics, then patted me on the shoulder.

“Everything is fine now. This old man will remain here as a precaution, so put any worries you still have away for good.”

“What?”

The Divine Physician saw my expression and hurriedly waved his hands.

“There is no need to make that expression. I am only staying to watch the patient awaken after treatment.”

“Phew, you scared me. You should have led with that.”

I had thought there was something else left to worry about.

Mungyeong grinned at his flustered Master, then spoke.

“Sorry to interrupt, but I think I should leave now.”

His sudden announcement startled me.

“What? Already?”

“Yes. Venerable Myoryeong should have regained consciousness by now, so I would like to go check on her.”

“You must be tired. Stay and rest for a while.”

“No, it is fine. I hardly did anything anyway. If I still have energy to spare, then as the younger one—even if only by a year—I should be the one to go. Isn’t that right, Master?”

“You little rascal!”

“Hahaha.”

I was worried about him, but it seemed they had already settled the matter between themselves.

No sooner had he finished speaking than Mungyeong slung his travel pack over his shoulder. Watching him, I suddenly remembered something I had forgotten.

“Mungyeong.”

“Yes?”

“Thank you. Truly.”

Mungyeong gazed at me for a moment, and a smile touched his lips.

“That is the finest praise a medical apprentice could receive.”

“Family Head, the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi requests an audience.”

Ssssss.

At the voice from outside the door, the snow-white snake slipped back into Tang Sadok’s robes.

Tang Sadok frowned at the interruption to one of the few peaceful moments in his day.

“Jin Taekyung, you mean?”

“Yes.”

“For what reason?”

“He says the treatment is over. And…”

The guard continued, confusion evident in his voice.

“He said he would like to keep using the item he borrowed for a few more days.”

“The item he borrowed.”

“Yes. Those were his exact words. He also asked to remain in the underground prison for a few more days.”

It was an indirect way of referring to the Myriad-Poison Ring. Tang Sadok let out a short laugh and muttered,

“What a brazen brat…”

“Pardon?”

“I was not speaking to you. Pay it no mind. Tell Jin Taekyung I give him permission, and continue watching him.”

“Yes, Family Head.”

Tang Sadok listened to the guard's footsteps fade away and tapped the table.

He was neither a Great Hero of Benevolence and Righteousness who helped others without seeking anything in return nor a chivalrous hero who could not tolerate injustice.

He had lent Jin Taekyung the clan's sacred treasure as part of their bargain, but it was only natural that he would continue keeping a close watch on him.

I am the Family Head of the great Sichuan Tang Clan. I trust no one.

One shichen[1766] earlier, even the young medical apprentice attempting to leave the clan had been thoroughly searched and questioned.

They had only allowed him to leave because his identity was guaranteed. Had he been a Disciple of some ordinary lesser sect, he would not have been permitted to take a single step outside.

In any case, the Fire King's successful treatment is good news. The Divine Physician truly lives up to his name.

Tang Sadok had already heard from his late father that Fire King Jeok Cheongang was an exceedingly eccentric old man.

He had also heard that Jeok Cheongang was so proud that he would repay any gratitude or grudge he incurred, no matter what it took.

You bastard… your days are numbered.

A green glint flashed through Tang Sadok's eyes.

The murderer who had killed his father and the Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun was definitely said to be one-armed. That was not especially rare in the Murim, but it was not a feature one saw every day, either.

A maimed man stood out wherever he went.

Run. Run wherever you can. The Sichuan Murim will hunt you until the day you breathe your last.

Grind.

Tang Sadok was quietly grinding his teeth when—

"Uncle!"

With an urgent shout, the pavilion doors flew open. Tang Sadok's face twisted at the same instant.

It wasn't the Master of the Gatekeeper Pavilion's unannounced intrusion that disturbed him, but the martial artist standing beside the man.

His green martial uniform was torn and covered in blood, and the words Tang Family were embroidered across it.

"You…"

There was no mistaking it.

He was a member of the Green Shadow Squad.

[1766] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

A member of the Green Shadow Squad who should never have appeared here in such a state.

Facing the rigid Tang Sadok, the Green Shadow Squad martial artist cried out, blood choking his voice.

“They—they’re coming!”

Chapter 352

They're coming.

The Green Shadow Squad martial artist had blurted out a disjointed sentence.

But insight struck Tang Sadok like a flash of lightning. It gave form to the small unease he had harbored in his heart, and it was the conclusion drawn from all the experience he had accumulated over the years.

The murderer isn't alone!

The one-armed man who had killed his father and the Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun was coming to the Sichuan Tang Clan with his subordinates.

Who the true mastermind was, how many men they had, and how they had managed to move through Sichuan as freely as their own backyard—none of that mattered now.

The next moment, Tang Sadok's voice erupted like a thunderbolt.

"One Origin, Three Divisions, and Five Squads—prepare to meet the enemy!"

Rumble!

The pavilion trembled beneath the enormous shout, laden with powerful internal energy.

The disturbance had occurred in none other than the Family Head's Hall. The first to react were Tang Sadok's guards surrounding the pavilion.

"Family Head!"

Bang!

By the time the guards burst inside, smashing through the pavilion, the clan members who had heard Tang Sadok's shout were already spreading his orders throughout the family compound.

Within fifteen minutes, hundreds of Tang Family members, united by venomous resolve and resentment, would assemble.

And then…

I'll show you what the Tang Family's revenge looks like.

Despite the fury boiling in his chest, Tang Sadok's eyes had grown as cold as the northern wind and bitter snow.

"Family Head, what in the world is—"

"The men who deserve to die are coming. That is all."

He waved away the bewildered guards and fixed his gaze on the Green Shadow Squad martial artist.

The man's uniform was torn and soaked in blood, unmistakable evidence of battle.

"What happened? Tell me everything you saw and heard. Leave nothing out."

The Green Shadow Squad martial artist finally caught his breath and began his report in an exhausted voice.

“It began when we discovered a suspicious group while searching near the Golden Hall.”

“A suspicious group?”

“Yes.”

“The Golden Hall is barely half a day from our family. The Beggars’ Sect and the government troops have already completed every inspection and search in the area. How could…”

Tang Sadok trailed off, his gaze turning grim.

“…The government troops. It was the government troops.”

The Green Shadow Squad martial artist stared wide-eyed at the Family Head, then nodded.

“Y-yes! They were definitely wearing government uniforms.”

“A disguise.”

Tap. Tap.

Tang Sadok drummed his bony fingers against the table.

They had been caught completely off guard.

The Beggars’ Sect and the government troops had confirmed Chengdu’s safety several times, and it had been only two days since they expanded their search area.

The enemy had slipped into Chengdu through the gap left when the net loosened.

It wouldn’t have been difficult.

The elite were always deployed to the front lines. The most experienced and sharp-eyed members of the Beggars’ Sect and government troops had already left Chengdu.

Besides, wasn’t this after several thousand government troops had spent nearly ten days roaming around Chengdu? Anyone wearing their uniforms could have blended in naturally.

“How many were there?”

“Perhaps to avoid suspicion, they were moving in several groups. But from what we were able to determine, there seemed to be at least three hundred of them.”

“Three hundred?”

“Yes. I’m certain.”

The Master of the Gatekeeper Pavilion had been listening to the report with an anxious expression. Now he spoke in a triumphant tone.

“Ha! Only three hundred? They must have a death wish. Isn’t that right, Uncle?”

“…”

“Our family alone has more than three hundred martial artists ready to fight at a moment’s notice. And that isn’t all. Isn’t this exactly why we built an impregnable fortress? They won't even make it over the walls before our poison and hidden weapons kill them."

Tang Sadok finally opened his mouth.

"Shut up."

"Pardon?"

"I said shut up."

"U-Uncle, why are you acting like this? It's only three hundred. We could wipe out that many in the blink of an eye…"

"Only three hundred?"

The fingers drumming against the table stopped dead.

Tang Sadok stared at his only nephew with utter contempt.

"You haven't forgotten the Gyeongwol Year Bloodbath, have you?"

"…How could I?"

The Gyeongwol Year Bloodbath was practically taboo within the Tang Clan.

Fifty years ago, the Sichuan Tang Clan had been forced to abandon the land it had occupied for centuries and flee in disgrace.

That day, Tang Sadok had lost his only older brother, and the Master of the Gatekeeper Pavilion had lost his father before he was even born.

"But things are different now!"

Tang Sadok answered his nephew's impassioned shout in a cold voice.

"Yes. Exactly what is different?"

"The Demonic Cult's forces numbered two thousand, while our family had only three hundred martial artists!"

"You're more or less correct so far. Go on."

"Although we were defeated and forced to retreat, our family suffered barely more than a hundred casualties, while the Demonic Cult lost over a third of its forces."

"That is also true. Those losses delayed the Demonic Cult's conquest of Sichuan. Our family lost its home, but gained even greater fame in exchange."

"Then why?"

Bang!

The Master of the Gatekeeper Pavilion slammed his fist down, denting the iron table. He glared at his uncle with blazing eyes.

"Why are you afraid of a mere three hundred enemies? Fifty years ago, even the Demonic Cult's vicious fiends—several times more numerous than this—had to shed untold blood to overcome our family!"

His ringing shout shook the air inside the pavilion.

Tang Sadok's answer to his furious nephew was short and simple.

"So? Is that all?"

"…What?"

"You pathetic fool."

Tang Sadok sighed as his nephew's eyes wavered.

"The Gyeongwol Year Bloodbath is a humiliating chapter of our history that must never be forgotten. But it is also the day our family proved its strength to the entire world."

"Y-yes. That is why martial artists throughout the world still praise our family's martial might and righteous spirit."

"Ha… Hahahaha!"

Ignorance this profound was practically a disease. Tang Sadok let out a hollow laugh as he looked at his nephew, who still failed to understand.

"Yes. The entire world knows. Do you think our enemies don't?"

"…!"

"After the Great Faction War, our family built an impregnable fortress that no one could breach. We increased our numbers and armed our clan members thoroughly. Is there anyone under heaven who doesn't know that? Is there anyone who doesn't know the strength and determination our family displayed during the Gyeongwol Year Bloodbath?"

Under the storm and thunder crashing down on him, the Master of the Gatekeeper Pavilion's face had turned pale.

Only now did he understand that the three hundred enemies invading the Sichuan Tang Clan were not men anyone could dismiss as only three hundred.

By contrast, the old and experienced Family Head's judgment was swift and decisive.

"Sound the Tang War Drum."

A stir passed through the guards, who had been frozen like stone at the Family Head's command.

"Y-you mean the Tang War Drum?"

"Distribute poison and hidden weapons to everyone, regardless of age or sex. Retired elders, craftsmen who have never learned martial arts, women—no one is exempt. Our family will commit its full strength to this battle."

"A-as you command!"

The blade-sharp order wiped the color from the guards' faces. They hurried into motion.

A short while later, when the Tang War Drum's thunder rolled throughout the Sichuan Tang Clan, everyone would know.

Their family stood on the brink of destruction.

And no one felt that danger more keenly than Tang Sadok.

This is dangerous.

The experience and instincts he had honed over years of leading the family whispered a warning.

A sea of corpses and blood surpassing even the Gyeongwol Year Bloodbath might be waiting for the Sichuan Tang Clan.

Then came the sound that announced the beginning of everything.

Boom. Boom. Boom!

The majestic sound alone was enough to set hearts pounding. The Master of the Gatekeeper Pavilion murmured,

“So this is the Tang Clan drum…”

The Tang Clan drum had not sounded since before he was born. He was still struggling to contain his emotions upon hearing it for the first time when Tang Sadok spoke.

“They beat us to it.”

“U-Uncle?”

The Master of the Gatekeeper Pavilion spun toward him and saw the fathomless depths of Tang Sadok’s eyes.

At the same time, several gray-flecked figures entered the pavilion with swift movement techniques.

“Family Head!”

“It’s the enemy! They’re coming while beating a war drum!”

“They launch an attack while sounding their own war drum. Impressive bastards. Truly impressive.”

Tang Sadok burst into laughter.

The ten people staring at him looked dumbfounded.

“This is no time to laugh!”

“Family Head, please give us your orders!”

They varied widely in appearance. One was a young man who seemed to be in his thirties, another was a graying middle-aged man, and there was even an old man around Tang Sadok’s age.

Whatever their ages, each had proven their martial prowess among the clan’s hundreds of members.

That was why Tang Sadok had given them another name.

“The Tang Clan’s Ten Wonders. Perfect timing. I was waiting for you.”

“Family Head, what in the world is happening? We should attack them at once—”

“You can ask that fellow over there for the details.”

The gazes of the Tang Clan’s Ten Wonders followed Tang Sadok’s.

Finding himself under the scrutiny of so many powerful figures, the Green Shadow Squad martial artist swallowed hard.

“I-I’ll tell you anything I know!”

“That is good to hear. Then let this old man ask you…”

Tang Sadok continued in a gentle voice.

“Weren’t you one-armed?”

“…!”

“…!”

At that moment, time seemed to stop.

The majestic thunder of the Tang War Drum, which had finally begun to sound.

The frantic movements and shouts of the clan members.

Unlike the time outside, which continued to flow unchanged, everything inside the pavilion had come to a complete halt.

Amid the silence and shock, only one person moved backward through time.

Crack. Crrrck.

Bones lengthened and contracted. Muscles swelled.

The blood-soaked uniform tore apart, splitting the two characters embroidered across its chest—Tang Family—in half.

The Green Shadow Squad martial artist slowly rose to his feet.

He was no longer a young man in his twenties.

Nor was he a member of the Green Shadow Squad.

“You have a sharp eye. The Poison King raised his son well.”

The middle-aged man smiled faintly and rubbed his left arm. The color of his skin differed subtly around the elbow, as if the arm had been removed and attached again.

“And to answer your question… I honestly don’t know myself. Let’s just call it demonic martial arts for convenience.”

A green light flickered in Tang Sadok’s eyes as he stared at the middle-aged man.

“So it was you. You were the one who harmed my father.”

“Poison King Tang Taesang truly lived up to his reputation. I was honestly impressed. That was when I lost my arm, too.”

The middle-aged man clenched and unclenched his left fist, making a show of frowning.

“The sensation still isn’t quite what it used to be. I wonder if I’ll ever fully recover…”

“Do not worry. This old man will personally cut off your head so you never have to concern yourself with it again.”

“We’ll lend a hand as well.”

Rumble!

The enormous qi pressure flowing from Tang Sadok and the Tang Clan’s Ten Wonders shook the pavilion.

Yet even in the face of deadly poison capable of killing a person with a single breath, the middle-aged man—the Western Heaven Demon Lord—smiled calmly.

“If you can, by all means.”

Roar!

Chapter 353

Boom. Boom. Boom!

Listening to the thunderous drumbeats, an old man muttered,

“It’s been a while since I heard that.”

He was short and stocky, with coarse, unruly features. To ordinary eyes, he was nothing more than an ugly, ill-tempered old man.

But anyone who had faced him even once called him by another name.

Fiend.

The old man curled the corners of his mouth upward. Seeing the wet-behind-the-ears pups waiting for him atop the walls surrounding the Sichuan Tang Clan like an impregnable fortress, roughly three hundred yards ahead, put him in an excellent mood.

“I can almost smell the blood already. This is how I felt when we first came down from the Qilian Mountains.”

He had come into the world after a difficult birth, cursed with ugly features.

How could his two brothers, born from the same womb on the same day, have been any different? When even their father disappeared, the three brothers had nowhere left to turn. Fleeing the contempt of others, they hid in the Qilian Mountains.

“We were so young back then. Bastard or bitch, we killed them all, then killed some more…”

They had been born into an age of chaos, and so they became fiends.

By the time they finally looked around, everyone who had despised their ugliness and pelted them with stones lay submerged in pools of blood.

Then they joined the Demonic Cult’s invasion of the Central Plains and stained the world red. People came to know and fear them as the Qilian Three Fiends.

“Remembering our prime is exhilarating. Don’t you think?”

The old man, the First Fiend, turned his head with a smile, only to click his tongue when he realized his mistake.

“Good grief. Maybe it’s because I’m getting old, but I keep forgetting things.”

The two younger brothers who had followed him like shadows their entire lives were not here.

The Second Fiend had left to take charge of Qingcheng, while the Third Fiend had gone to take charge of Emei.

Before long, the two famous mountains counted among the greatest in the world would be covered in a sea of corpses and blood.

And then…

Kwahhhhhng!

At last, the signal announcing the beginning of everything rang out.

The First Fiend let out a hearty laugh at the thunderous boom coming from beyond the walls of the Sichuan Tang Clan. The time promised by the Western Heaven Demon Lord had arrived.

“The Demon Lord is calling us. Don’t you agree?”

Shing-shing-shing!

Hundreds of weapons were drawn, slicing through the dawn air.

Behind the First Fiend stood three hundred black-clad men in a long formation. They had already discarded their government-troop uniforms and donned black leather armor.

“The time has come. Raise the flag!”

The instant the First Fiend’s shout rang out, the Tang Clan martial artists atop the walls saw it.

Flap.

A flag rose high beyond the pale dawn mist.

Two characters billowed in the fierce wind.

“Dark Heaven…?”

Someone on the wall muttered the words, but the booming drums swallowed them.

Boom. Boom. Boom!

The drumbeats grew stronger, and the black-clad men began to advance in time with them.

Hot breath spilled from between their lips, but their eyes were cold. Razor-sharp killing intent rolled off their bodies.

And at their head stood a single fiend.

“By command of the Lord of Heaven…”

His blood-red eyes shone with joy.

What a magnificent day this was. The orthodox Murim would remember it. Everyone would gaze upon Dark Heaven’s flag hanging over the world and tremble with fear.

Quivering with elation, the First Fiend shouted,

“Destroy the Sichuan Tang Clan!”

“As you command!”

Boom. Boom-boom. Boom-boom-boom-boom-boom!

The drums quickened amid fierce battle cries. Three hundred black-clad men charged toward the walls, while dark clouds rolled across the sky and smothered the sunlight that had only just begun to shine.

That was when a powerful shout erupted from atop the walls.

“These villains dare invade our family! Don’t leave a single one alive!”

“Everyone, fire!”

Shhhhhhhk! Thud!

An arrowhead shot with tremendous force pierced someone’s body and buried itself in the ground. Blood mist bloomed, followed by a scream.

“Gaaaaah!”

But there were very few casualties. Most of the black-clad men deflected the arrows with their weapons, while others emerged unharmed thanks to their armor.

“Wh-what?”

“Even the crossbows can’t pierce it? What kind of armor is that…?”

Even crossbow bolts capable of punching through thick iron plates proved useless against the armor.

As the Tang Clan martial artists faltered, a small figure streaked forward at dazzling speed.

Fwoooosh!

“Ha-ha-ha-ha! Excellent! Excellent!”

No one atop the walls knew the First Fiend’s identity. But everyone who heard his crazed laughter felt their hair stand on end.

“The Myriad-Poison Formation! Activate the Myriad-Poison Formation!”

The panicked order rang out, but the First Fiend had already vanished like a ghost and reached the gate.

His face twisting into a fiendish grin, he threw a single punch. Two jiazi[1767] of internal energy spiraled into his fist like a whirlwind.

“Let’s see how Tang Family blood tastes.”

Whoom—Kwahhhhhng!

The battle had begun.

“Hm?”

“What?”

Cheongpung and I looked at each other at the same time. Then, at the same time, we realized we were thinking the same thing.

“Did you hear that?”

“Benefactor, did you hear it?”

The Divine Physician, who was checking the still-unconscious Jeok Cheongang’s pulse, looked at us in confusion.

“What are you talking about?”

[1767] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; two jiazi represent 120 years.

"Just a moment."

I raised a hand to stop the Divine Physician from continuing and quietly focused my mind.

My body might have been in the underground prison, but my senses were another matter. Amplified several times over by the power of my internal energy, my hearing escaped the labyrinthine prison corridors and rose upward, higher and higher.

And then…

Boom.

This time, I heard it clearly.

Cheongpung set down the food he had been holding and spoke.

"Benefactor, could this be…"

"That's right."

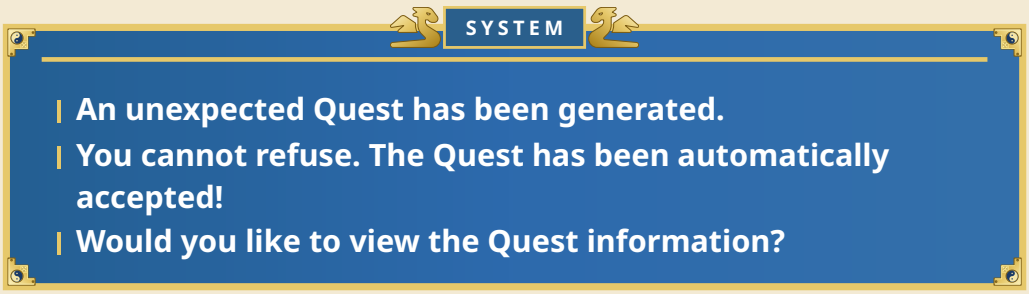
I looked up at the ceiling of the prison and continued,

"It's a drum."

Boom. Boom. Boom.

As though agreeing with me, the drums sounded again at that exact moment.

Ting.



"…"

I stared wordlessly at the holographic window filling my vision.

The sudden drumbeats and an unexpected Quest. Neither could possibly be a good sign.

Shit, I've already got goose bumps all over my arms.

"This is driving me crazy."

But there was no turning back now. The only thing I could do was find out what kind of path lay ahead of me.

View Quest information.

Ting.

A new holographic window appeared with the System's characteristically cheerful notification sound.

Unlike the notification, of course, the contents of the Quest window were anything but cheerful.

SYSTEM

Quest
Uninvited Guest
Dark Heaven's dark clouds have finally spread across Sichuan. The battle has already begun, and the Sichuan Tang Clan is surrounded.
May fortune favor you in battle.
Grade: ???
Limit: ???
Mission: ???
Reward: ???
Failure: Death

I read it exactly three times from beginning to end. Then I thought,

What kind of fucked-up situation is this?

I was so dumbfounded that I could barely speak.

The whole thing was absurd. Enemies had invaded. We were surrounded and couldn't escape. It wished us luck. The end.

Goddamn, it's disgustingly simple.

Grade, limit, mission, reward. Every last one was a question mark.

Well, at least it had made one thing perfectly clear.

If I failed this Quest, I would die.

What a revelation. If we couldn't stop the enemies who had invaded, I would die. Such wonderfully useful information almost made me slap my balls in amazement.

Is this a Quest information window or just a Quest notification window?

Boom. Boom. Boom.

My vision swam. As the drumbeats grew louder and fiercer, cold sweat gathered on my back.

My mind, on the other hand, had gone cold as ice.

I dismissed the Quest window, took a deep breath, and spoke.

"Old Man Dong, we have a problem."

The Divine Physician had learned martial arts, but his realm was far below ours.

Unlike Cheongpung and me, he had not heard the drumbeats. He asked with a puzzled expression,

"A problem? What do you mean?"

"Enemies have invaded."

"Enemies? Here, at the Sichuan Tang Clan?"

"Yes. There's no doubt. We're already surrounded."

The Divine Physician looked as if he could hardly believe it. That was a perfectly normal reaction. What kind of lunatics would attack the Sichuan Tang Clan?

But if those lunatics were Dark Heaven, that changed everything. They were the very people responsible for staining Shaolin Temple with blood.

Still, every second mattered. There was no time for a detailed explanation.

"We don't know what's going to happen, so steel yourself."

"…I understand."

The Divine Physician nodded grimly.

Perhaps because he had traveled throughout the world and experienced countless things, he seemed to accept reality more quickly than expected.

I looked at Jeok Cheongang, who still lay there with his eyes closed.

"How is my Master's condition?"

"As I told you before, his qi has not yet stabilized. If he suffers an external shock in this condition…"

The Divine Physician did not finish, but I had heard enough.

Jeok Cheongang's condition was still unstable. According to the Quest window, Dark Heaven had already surrounded the Sichuan Tang Clan.

What if we broke through their encirclement and escaped?

The thought flashed through my mind, but I quickly shook my head.

Jeok Cheongang's safety was one concern, but our chances of success were slim to begin with. Considering the forces Dark Heaven had deployed against Shaolin Temple, trying to escape might only lead us straight into a deathtrap.

Especially if a monster like the Blood Lord is out there. We have to avoid that at all costs.

After thinking it through, I arrived at a single answer.

I slowly opened my mouth.

"Cheongpung."

Cheongpung answered in a subdued voice.

"Yes, Benefactor."

"Can I ask you for one favor?"

"Anything."

Cheongpung was endlessly innocent and carefree, but every once in a while, he showed a serious side.

And whenever he did, I found him more dependable than anyone else.

That was why I could make this request of him.

"Stay here and protect Old Master—protect my Master. That's my request."

"…!"

"As you heard, we can't get out right now. Someone has to leave and help the Sichuan Tang Clan."

"Benefactor."

"So…"

"Benefactor."

I swallowed the words I had been about to say. Cheongpung was looking at me with clear eyes.

"I'll stay if you tell me to stay, and I'll go if you tell me to go. But, Benefactor…"

His quiet voice reached my ears.

"You have someone you need to protect, don't you?"

"…!"

"When there was someone I had to protect, I was too scared to fight. I couldn't protect the people I cared about. That's why I'm such a fool."

I hadn't known.

I hadn't known Cheongpung carried such thoughts.

Even afterward, he had remained cheerful and talkative, living as though he were the happiest person in the world.

That was how he had always been. It suited him. It was only natural for him.

But it wasn't.

As if recalling what had happened in Henan, Cheongpung turned his gaze toward some distant, dark corner of the underground prison.

Then he turned back to me.

A smile appeared on his lips. The same as always, yet somehow different.

Only then did I understand.

The time had come to make a real decision.

One person stays. One person leaves.

I slowly shifted my gaze.

Cheongpung, still smiling.

The Divine Physician, his face filled with concern.

Someone's screams and shouts, drawing closer by the moment.

And then…

Jeok Cheongang's face beneath the shadows of the flickering torchlight.

The next moment, my lips moved before I knew it.

"Cheongpung. I have a favor to ask."

Cheongpung's gaze met mine.

I pointed toward the ceiling and flashed him a grin.

"Go land one on those sons of bitches and come back."

"Yes, Benefactor!"

His answer was brighter than ever.

Chapter 354

Clang! Krrr-kang!

“They’re vile bastards we could chew to pieces and still not be satisfied! Show no mercy!”

“The Lord of Heaven wills it! Destroy the Tang Clan!”

Sword clashed against sword. Ragged breathing mingled with hoarse cries. The killing intent and stench of blood from hundreds of people locked in battle flooded the air.

Amid the dawn mist, blackened by poison smoke, those intent on killing raised their weapons and charged at one another.

Pfft!

“Gaaah!”

A young man screamed.

Born into a collateral branch of the great Sichuan Tang Clan, he had reached the First Rate realm without much difficulty. His considerable martial talent and composure beyond his years had earned him high expectations from everyone around him.

But now, the young man’s bright future was extinguished by a flash of black Sword Energy.

Fwoooosh! Slash!

The Sword Energy carved diagonally through his upper body.

That was the end.

The black-clad man stared at the young man’s collapsing body, his face pale as blood and entrails spilled out.

The kid was vicious.

The fight had been decided in only three exchanges.

Yet the unknown Tang Clan martial artist had staked his life on leaving them both grievously wounded.

The ox-hair needle that had somehow burrowed beneath the black-clad man’s collarbone was proof.

So this is the Sichuan Tang Clan.

Clicking his tongue, the black-clad man pulled out the needle.

It was so fine that he had to look closely to make it out, and its tip had turned black. There was no question that it had been coated in poison.

“Ghk!”

His vision blurred for an instant. The poison that had entered near his collarbone was rapidly spreading throughout his body.

At this rate, even his Peak-level internal energy could do no more than buy him time.

On a chaotic battlefield like this, being struck by one of the Sichuan Tang Clan's deadliest poisons meant he was as good as dead.

But the black-clad man did not panic.

No—he smiled.

"The Lord of Heaven is… great."

The muffled words slipped between his clenched teeth.

When he opened his mouth for the first time, a small bead lay inside.

An eerie light flowed from the bead and streamed down his throat like a river.

Ssssss.

The change was instantaneous. His blurred vision cleared, and strength and vitality returned to his weakening body.

As every trace of poison vanished from his body, the black-clad man shuddered.

The Lord of Heaven, nobler and greater than any other.

The life force bestowed upon him by his god filled his entire body.

"The Lord of Heaven has descended upon me!"

With a cry of ecstasy, the black-clad man turned in search of another victim.

That was when—

"Wrong. The one descending upon you bastards is Yama.[1768]"

Crack!

A throwing blade flew from somewhere and buried itself between his eyebrows.

The internal energy carried by the blade tore through flesh and bone, reducing his brain to pulp. He died instantly.

Thud. Crash!

The bead that rolled from the dead man's mouth was drawn into someone's hand.

An old man studied it with wizened gray eyes and muttered, "These bastards… They're carrying artifacts."

An ordinary martial artist would have assumed the bead was a poison-warding pearl.

But the old man, Tang Jinhu, was a direct descendant of the Sichuan Tang Clan and a veteran of the Great Faction War. He instinctively realized that this bead was something different from a poison-warding pearl.

What is this?

Poison-warding pearls were normally clear. The more transparent they were, the more effective they were at neutralizing poison—and the more valuable they became.

[1768] Yama is the Buddhist lord of the underworld who judges the dead.

But the bead the black-clad man had possessed shone with an ominous black light, as though it held storm clouds within it.

Even so, it had been powerful enough to neutralize one of the Tang Clan's deadliest poisons.

The greater problem was…

Every last one of them has an artifact of this quality. At this rate, neither our family's poison techniques nor the poison formations we prepared in advance will be of any use.

On top of that, they wore leather armor that ordinary swords and blades could not pierce.

Tang Jinhu finally understood why the Tang Clan drum had sounded.

At this rate, the bloodbath would be even more horrific than the one in the Gyeongwol Year.

"These bastards…"

Crunch.

Tang Jinhu crushed the bead in his hand and thrust out both arms, his face brimming with killing intent.

The silver threads wound around his wrists drank in his internal energy and snapped taut.

The next instant, a dazzling white flash filled the battlefield.

Screeeech—thud-thud-thud!

"Ghk!"

"Gaaah!"

Only a handful of those struck managed even a final scream. Death came equally to First Rate and Peak masters alike.

Raising their weapons to block was useless. The threads Tang Jinhu unleashed lived up to the name Soul-Severing Thread, slicing through everything in their path.

Blades. Bone and flesh. Even the lives of his enemies.

Tang Jinhu felled more than ten black-clad men with a single move, then released an azure dragon's roar.

"Don't retreat! Aim your hidden weapons at their vital points and attack them together!"

"Head Elder! This old man has come as well!"

"Would you look at these fucking bastards! How dare they invade our family? Do you not see the Heaven-Poison Wanderer before you?"

Tang Jinhu was a Supreme Peak master who had retired more than a decade ago, as well as the head of the Council of Elders.

The sight of veteran masters joining the battlefield one after another at precisely that moment brought color back to the faces of the Tang Clan martial artists who had begun to falter.

“G-Grandfather!”

“The Head Elder is here! The Council of Elders has mobilized!”

But their joy lasted only an instant.

Krrr-kang! Slash!

“Gaaah!”

“Tang Hwi!”

“Brat! Is this the time to be looking away?”

Pfft-pfft-pfft!

“Help me… Ghk!”

“Lord of Heaven!”

“The great Lord of Heaven is with us! Kill them all!”

The black-clad men were more skilled than the Sichuan Tang Clan martial artists, while their armor and bizarre poison-warding pearls rendered the Tang Clan’s famed poisons and hidden weapons useless.

A dozen Elders, including Tang Jinhu, and dozens of Peak masters whom the Tang Clan had painstakingly trained fought desperately.

But their limits were clear.

Screeeech—thud!

Tang Jinhu severed the throats of two black-clad men charging at him with the Soul-Severing Thread and ground his teeth.

“Where did these bastards come from…?”

The sight before him was appalling.

The black-clad men swung their weapons while crying out to the Lord of Heaven as if possessed.

Each time they blocked swords and hidden weapons with their armor and pressed onward through the poison smoke, blood sprayed and corpses piled up.

In the vacant eyes of a Tang Clan martial artist whose breath had stopped, red flames that had sprung up somewhere flickered. The hot fire and acrid smoke drove away the poison mist and consumed the fallen corpses.

Tang Jinhu roared, his voice raw enough to spit blood.

“No! You bastards! How dare you—how dare you lay hands on my own flesh and blood!”

Even the mighty forces of the Demonic Cult had suffered more than a thousand casualties to overcome the Tang Clan.

How could a mere three hundred enemies wreak such horrific devastation?

“Ghk! H-Head Elder…”

“Hyung![1769]”

Pfft-pfft-pfft!

Even the Elders who had once roamed the martial world could not escape death.

They had not reached the exalted Supreme Peak realm as Tang Jinhu had, but every one of them was a veteran master who had reached the very edge of Peak.

Yet whenever they cut down one enemy, five more charged in. When they cut down those five, ten more rushed forward.

Among those ten black-clad men who charged forward without regard for their lives, a Peak master was hiding.

Slash. Crash!

After sacrificing dozens of his subordinates to behead another Elder, the black-clad man laughed triumphantly.

“So much for a Tang Clan Elder.”

“You bastard!”

Screeeech! Thud!

Despite Tang Jinhu’s furious efforts, the situation did not improve.

More than a hundred clansmen had already lost their lives, and half the Outer Hall had fallen into enemy hands.

“Huff, huff.”

Worse, his internal energy and stamina were rapidly running dry.

The battle had already reached a point where one aging Supreme Peak master could no longer turn the tide.

A lament slipped from Tang Jinhu’s lips as he realized the truth.

“What are the Family Head and the Tang Clan’s Ten Wonders doing?!”

If they were here, things would be different. Tang Sadok, the head of the family and its strongest master, along with the Tang Clan’s Ten Wonders.

If they joined the battle, they could turn the tide.

But—

“Heh-heh. They’re probably quite busy by now.”

The sudden voice in his ear made Tang Jinhu’s heart drop.

“Who are you?”

“As for who this old man is… Damn it. I can’t see a thing. Get the hell out of my way.”

Boom!

With a tremendous blast of displaced air, three or four black-clad men were hurled away as bloody pulp.

[1769] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or a close older male.

An old man drenched in blood strode into the newly cleared space and flashed Tang Jinhu a wide grin.

"Much better. Now I can see."

He was short and ugly.

Tang Jinhu's eyes trembled as he stared at him.

"You…"

"Hm? Do you know me?"

"…I never expected the Fiend of Qinghai to still be alive."

First Fiend stared at Tang Jinhu for a moment, then his eyes widened.

"Ah, now I remember. You're that youngster from the Tang Family. So, have you gotten any better at using the Soul-Severing Thread?"

"Good enough to cut off your head."

"I always thought the Sichuan Tang Clan was fairly practical for an orthodox faction. Looking at you, I suppose that isn't entirely true. Not if you still indulge in such foolish fantasies."

"…!"

"Youngster, you still don't understand, do you? Then this old man will tell you himself."

First Fiend cackled.

"You, your Family Head, and those idiots called the Tang Clan's Ten Wonders will all die. Whether they bear the Tang surname or are nothing but dogs, I'll kill and burn every last one of them."

"You—!"

"Don't be too upset. The Lord of Heaven treats all people equally. He has bestowed the same punishment upon the Buddhist nuns and those Daoist bastards. Heh-heh-heh."

Tang Jinhu froze, forgetting even his anger.

Only then did he realize that First Fiend's two younger brothers, who had always followed him like shadows, were nowhere to be seen.

…Emei[1770] and Qingcheng.[1771]

The carnage of corpses and blood had not been limited to the Tang Clan.

The Sichuan Tang Clan, Emei, and Qingcheng.

He could feel the people's screams and deaths.

Today, the three factions that ruled Sichuan would fight for their very survival.

Inside the hellscape those men had painted.

"Even after all these years… You truly are a Fiend."

Tang Jinhu spat out the words.

[1770] Emei is a Buddhist martial sect associated with Mount Emei in Sichuan.

[1771] Qingcheng is a Daoist martial sect associated with Mount Qingcheng in Sichuan.

First Fiend answered with a radiant smile.

“How kind of you. Could there be any greater praise for this old man?”

“I’ll kill you.”

“Your body has grown old, but your dreams remain ambitious.”

First Fiend burst into mad laughter and raised the twin axes in his hands.

“Now, shall we have another taste of blood?”

As if those words were a signal, hundreds of black-clad men who had already occupied the Outer Hall poured forward like a wave.

The surviving Tang Clan martial artists stood in their path, resolved to fight to the death.

“Go! Kill everything you see!”

“Stop them! We must never let them into the Inner Hall!”

Those trying to break through and those trying to stop them.

At the forefront, two men charged straight at each other.

Screeeech!

Tang Jinhu unleashed the Soul-Severing Thread with every ounce of his strength, firm resolve burning in his eyes.

Family Head, please be safe.

Kwahhhhhng!

“Cough!”

Tang Sadok stared at his palm with trembling eyes. Small pieces of his organs lay amid the dark-red blood.

“How… How could this…”

His head slowly rose as the exhausted words left him.

At that very moment, another life was extinguished.

Crunch! Thud!

A headless body toppled like a rotten log.

Considering the fame the man had enjoyed in life, it was a pitifully meaningless death.

“Were they called the Tang Clan’s Ten Wonders? They’re more capable than I expected.”

A few steps from the corpse, a middle-aged man wiped the blood spattered across his face and continued.

“Of course, we’ll have to call them something else now. Let me see… Yes. The Tang Clan's Three Skills[1772] seems appropriate."

"…!"

Tang Sadok stared at the middle-aged man through blurred eyes.

The man had introduced himself as the Western Heaven Demon Lord. This enemy who had killed Tang Sadok's father was overwhelmingly powerful. Neither Tang Sadok's poison arts nor the combined assault of the Tang Clan's Ten Wonders had been of any use.

Is this how it ends?

Tang Sadok still had the strength to fight. So did the other three surviving members of the Tang Clan's Ten Wonders.

But…

How can we possibly stand against that monster?

What raised him from the depths of despair was the mettle he possessed as the Family Head—and the blood of the Tang Family flowing through his veins.

"Not yet. It isn't over yet."

"Why not remain seated? You cannot have much strength left."

"I don't know why, but I know you have no intention of killing this old man."

"…Hm. As I said, the Poison King raised his son well."

"Then kill me."

"That won't do. But I suppose I should wear you down a little more."

The Western Heaven Demon Lord frowned and reached toward Tang Sadok.

That was when—

"Wait! Please, wait!"

"…?"

A young man rushed in with a shout, then let out a sigh of relief.

"Phew. I'm not too late. Thank you for waiting!"

As the Western Heaven Demon Lord stared at Cheongpung, a single thought crossed his mind.

What kind of lunatic is this?

[1772] In Korean, the words rendered as "Wonders" and "Skills" are pronounced alike; he changes both the number and the written title to belittle them.

Chapter 355

“Phew. I’m not too late. Thank you for waiting!”

What kind of lunatic is this?

At the sight of the young man strolling in as casually as if he belonged there, the Western Heaven Demon Lord let out an involuntary, hollow laugh.

I emerge after all this time, and now I’m running into all kinds of strange people.

He considered himself a man who had lived a fairly extraordinary life, but the young man before him easily surpassed anything he had imagined.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord found that rather unfortunate. He had wasted time, and the young man had hastened his own death.

“What’s there to thank me for? Farewell.”

Swish!

Even livestock called for different blades.

If Tang Sadok and the Tang Clan’s Ten Wonders were pigs, that brat was an ant.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord did not even feel the need to draw his favored weapon. He flicked a finger toward the young man’s brow, then started to turn his head toward Tang Sadok.

Or rather, he was about to when—

“Whoa. That nearly scared the life out of me.”

“…?”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord stared at the young man, eyes widening.

The brat should have been lying dead by now, yet he was looking back at him with an innocent grin.

In the iron pillar exactly half a step to his side was a hole the size of an egg.

Right where the young man’s head had been only a moment before.

…He dodged it? The eighth-stage Ghost Prison Finger?

It should not have happened. It could not have happened.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord wondered if something had gone wrong with his body without his noticing.

Then—

“Stand back.”

Tang Sadok spoke, his face rigid. Pale from his internal injuries, his expression held a trace of dismay.

“This is no place for a greenhorn like you to interfere… Cough!”

“Gasp! Blood! You’re bleeding!”

When Tang Sadok suddenly vomited blood, the young man stepped forward with a worried look.

“Grandpa Tang, are you all right?”

Swish!

In the blink of an eye, the young man flipped through the air as a flash of light sprang from his waist.

Drawing his sword at the same time, he deflected the slash that came flying through the air. Then he panted heavily.

“Huff, huff. That startled me. Why did you do that without saying anything?”

“Ha-ha. Ha-ha-ha!”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord looked from the sword in his right hand to the young man, then burst into hearty laughter.

Though he had not used his full strength, that single exchange had taught him two things.

First, the mysterious young man was not merely a lunatic.

And second—

“You must be the Disciple Sword Saint Mae Jonghak took in during his later years. Your name was… Cheongpung, wasn’t it?”

Cheongpung stared at the Western Heaven Demon Lord with round eyes.

“Oh? You know me?”

“How could I not, when the scent of Huashan’s plum blossoms pours from your footwork? It has been a long time since I saw such an exceptional Dark Fragrance Drift.”

“Wow! You know Dark Fragrance Drift! But how do you know my name…?”

“I have many unseen eyes and ears.”

Dark Heaven had spent many years planting spies throughout the world, and Sichuan Province was no exception.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord had already known for ten days that Cheongpung was staying at the Tang Clan.

He had not expected them to meet at such a perfect moment.

To have reached this realm at his age… The Sword Saint has raised a monster.

There was a reason he had failed to recognize Cheongpung at first glance.

As the Western Heaven Demon Lord examined Cheongpung from head to toe with a peculiar look in his eyes, Tang Sadok parted his bloodstained lips.

“You vicious bastard. Was attacking our family not enough? Now you mean to harm that boy as well?”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord answered gently.

“No. Not at all.”

“He has nothing to do with our family… What?”

The unexpected answer made Tang Sadok and even the three surviving members of the Tang Clan’s Ten Wonders doubt their ears.

But the Western Heaven Demon Lord, the man at the center of it all, remained impassive.

“I have no intention of taking prey someone else has already marked. Personally, I am not particularly fond of him, but we serve the same master.”

“…What are you talking about?”

“An acquaintance of mine became quite angry recently. It seems the wound to his pride hurt more than losing his arm. He is determined to kill that young man with his own hands.”

Tang Sadok’s expression twisted at the incomprehensible explanation.

Then Cheongpung suddenly spoke.

“The Blood Lord. It’s him.”

“So you do remember him. He’ll be delighted when I tell him.”

“I don’t like him.”

Anyone who knew Cheongpung—especially Jin Taekyung—would have stared at him with his mouth hanging open.

Cheongpung’s nature was as clear as a mountain stream, and he had never once declared that he liked or disliked someone.

Not even those who had approached him with ill intent.

But now, unmistakable hostility had appeared in Cheongpung’s transparent eyes.

“Is he here right now?”

“Unfortunately, he is far away. But he would be very pleased to see you. Ah, and of course…”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord continued smoothly.

“The same goes for the Fire King being treated at the Tang Clan and the young man named Jin Taekyung.”

“…!”

“I told you. I have many eyes and ears.”

A smile formed at the corner of the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s mouth.

“Do not worry too much. I intend to take all three of you alive. Whether my friend the Blood Lord feels the same, however, I cannot say.”

Cheongpung sensed the chilling edge hidden beneath the man’s gentle voice.

Without realizing it, he tightened his grip around his sword hilt. A different tone and voice than usual slipped through his lips.

“It won’t be easy.”

“I wonder if that’s really—”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord’s voice never finished.

A tremendous boom split the air, and dozens of flashes filled the pavilion reduced to rubble.

Swish, swish-swish-swish!

Tang Sadok and the Tang Clan's Ten Wonders—or rather, the three who should now be called the Tang Clan's Three Skills[1773]—shot toward a single target like arrows, as if they had planned it together.

Dozens of hidden weapons filled the air from every direction, each aimed at a lethal acupoint, while Tang Sadok drew on every last ounce of strength and drove his fist into the Western Heaven Demon Lord's chest.

"You bastard—!"

Kwahhhhhng! Rumble, rumble!

The aftermath was powerful enough to be called an earthquake.

Tang Sadok and the three Tang Clan martial artists had personally experienced the Western Heaven Demon Lord's might.

They had no intention of squandering their one chance. Their final assault, launched by drawing even upon their innate qi, was devastating.

We did it.

Within the cloud of dust so thick he could not see an inch ahead, Tang Sadok smiled brightly despite coughing up blood.

He had realized that the punch he had unleashed with all his strength had crushed the enemy's flesh and bones and pierced through his chest.

This is the Tang Family's revenge.

That was when—

"Did you think this would be enough?"

"…!"

Crack!

A powerful hand closed around Tang Sadok's neck as the calm voice reached him.

As the dust dispersed, he saw one of the Tang Clan's Three Skills dead with a massive hole through his chest. The Western Heaven Demon Lord stood behind the corpse, reaching over its shoulder.

At the Western Heaven Demon Lord's feet, two people who had once possessed human shapes lay shattered across the ground.

How?

That single thought filled Tang Sadok's mind.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord smiled gently as he held the dazed Tang Sadok by the throat. Then he swung the sword in his other hand.

Kwahhhhhng!

A wave of Sword Energy surged outward like a tide.

The thirty blades of Sword Energy flying toward him like flower petals were swallowed by the wave and vanished.

[1773] The Korean titles share the final syllable gi; only the number changes from ten to three.

But though the petals disappeared, their fragrance remained.

From the foot of the young man driving into the air at the speed of a flash, the scent of plum blossoms planted by Huashan and brought into bloom by the Sword Saint rose up.

Sssshing!

“The Meteor Chasing the Moon Sword!”

A single sword thrust forward, leaving a pale afterimage.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord let out a brief cry of surprise and brought his sword down.

His sinuous Snake Sword collided with Cheongpung’s plum-blossom-engraved blade.

Kwang! Kwang-kwa-kwa-kwang!

Every clash of the two swords unleashed a deafening boom like an exploding shell.

It did not take long for one side to gain the upper hand.

Swish—bang!

A figure went flying under the force of the impact.

Cheongpung twisted in midair and landed, then stared at the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

“I expected you to be strong, but… you really are.”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord’s martial prowess was extraordinary.

He had seized an overwhelming advantage with only one hand, all while holding Tang Sadok captive.

At Cheongpung’s apparently awed remark, the Western Heaven Demon Lord let out a quiet laugh.

What an impudent brat. He’s hiding quite a bit, too.

Irritated, he briefly considered teaching the brat a lesson himself.

But he had more urgent business.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord clicked his tongue softly, then called in a low voice.

“First Fiend.”

“Yes, Demon Lord.”

Cheongpung was not surprised when First Fiend appeared with a deferential answer. He had sensed the man nearby for the past fifteen minutes.

That meant the attackers had already passed through the Outer Hall and entered the Inner Hall.

The screams were drawing closer.

“Handle that one.”

“You mean the Sword Saint’s successor? I couldn’t be more grateful…”

First Fiend grinned, baring his bloodstained teeth.

He had already claimed nearly a hundred lives, including Tang Jinhu, the Sichuan Tang Clan's Head Elder.

But intoxicated by his first taste of slaughter in so long, he had found it nowhere near enough.

"You know of the Blood Lord's request, I assume."

"Of course. The Sword Saint's youngest Disciple, whom he cherishes like his own child… Heh-heh. This should be fun. I'll leave him barely breathing."

"Keeping him alive would be preferable, but if that proves impossible, you may kill him."

"What?"

"He is dangerous. If you cannot handle him, cut him down before he can grow."

"He's nothing but a greenhorn. I never knew the Demon Lord made jokes. Ha-ha-ha!"

First Fiend's booming laughter rapidly faded.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord's gaze had turned cold.

The instant their eyes met, First Fiend felt his heart drop. He hurriedly threw himself facedown on the ground.

"Y-Your orders."

For a moment, he had forgotten what kind of man the Western Heaven Demon Lord was.

He was a man who hid a grim reaper behind a gentle voice, soft manner, and mild expression.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord silently looked down at the sweating First Fiend, then walked past him.

Tang Sadok struggled in pain with the hand around his neck, but the Western Heaven Demon Lord's arm did not move an inch.

"No!"

"Heh-heh. Do you have any idea whose path you're blocking?"

Swish—boom!

Cheongpung charged forward with a desperate shout, and First Fiend moved to intercept him.

Leaving their thunderous clash behind, the Western Heaven Demon Lord continued walking.

The Inner Hall, where craftsmen had forged weapons and children once walked beside martial artists, was now covered in blood and corpses.

Screams and death overflowed from every direction.

And here, only a short distance away, one man watched the destruction of his family with tears streaming down his face.

“Can you feel it? Everything in the Tang Clan is collapsing.”

Tang Sadok’s hollow eyes trembled.

The Tang Clan was not the only thing collapsing. His firm convictions and his heart were crumbling with it.

Then, as tears continued to stream down his face, a quiet voice slipped into his ear.

“Answer me. Where is the Myriad-Poison Ring?”

Chapter 356

The underground prison beneath the Sichuan Tang Clan was dark and damp by nature.

The few torches spaced along the walls gave off less light than fireflies, and the floor was covered in stagnant water of unknown origin that squelched underfoot.

Just like now.

“What a foul smell. Prison or not, how can they lock people up in a place like this?”

“People? This is where they keep beasts. Haven’t you heard that the Sichuan Tang Clan captured fiends from the Great Faction War and subjected them to every torture imaginable? A place like this should hardly surprise you.”

Squelch. Squelch.

There were two voices, but far more sets of footsteps.

I quietly extended my Qi Sense and counted them.

Fifteen.

The two men at the front, presumably the group’s leaders, continued their conversation.

“But where are all the prisoners? There are bars everywhere, but the cells are empty.”

“Everyone imprisoned here is an old monster from the days of the Great Faction War. It wouldn’t be strange if they’d died long ago, especially after being tortured in a place like this.”

“Fair point.”

Their guess was half right and half wrong.

Many of the underground prison’s original residents had indeed passed on to the next world, but more than ten prisoners still remained.

What they had failed to anticipate was that someone unseen had used Pressure-Point Strike on the prisoners and moved them elsewhere.

“I can’t see even a single ant. Wouldn’t it be better to go back upstairs and kill at least one more person?”

“I don’t think we’ve searched even half the place yet.”

“Now that you mention it, what could there possibly be farther in? The others will come through and search every last corner anyway.”

“Don’t be ridiculous. Have you forgotten the Lord of Heaven’s command? What if someone of the Tang bloodline is hiding down here…?”

“No one would be stupid enough to hide in an underground prison. The battle isn’t even over yet, so why would they hide here? I could understand trying to break through the encirclement and escape, but this?”

“Hmm…”

The man let out a low groan, then spoke in a firm voice.

“No. We have been entrusted with the revered Lord of Heaven’s command. The Demon Lord himself is leading by example, yet you intend to shirk your duty?”

“Phew. Damn it.”

“Stop complaining and follow me.”

The Dark Heaven martial artist whose face I did not know had no idea that his fate had been decided by those words.

At his firm response, the other man grumbled.

“You ought to learn some flexibility. Keep living like such a stickler and you’ll die before your time.”

“Don’t say such ill-omened things. I’ll live longer than someone who half-asses everything like you, so worry about yourself.”

“Want to bet?”

“Fine. Why wouldn’t I—”

Long story short, the man who half-assed everything won their bet over who would live longer.

Though only by a fraction of a second.

Shnk!

It was a perfect ambush.

I had concealed my presence and waited in the darkness of the maze-like passage. The instant I drove the dagger in my left hand into one man’s eye, I swung the sword in my right.

I had smeared mud over the blade beforehand to keep it from catching the light. It sheared through flesh and bone.

Slash! Splat!

The two Peak masters died without so much as a scream, collapsing like rotten logs.

Suddenly drenched in blood and filthy water, the black-robed men stared blankly between their leaders’ bodies and me.

“W-What…?”

Thirteen left.

Instead of answering, I swung my sword again. With another grisly sound of parting flesh, a severed head flew into the air.

“Twelve.”

“…!”

A single emotion surfaced in their vacant eyes.

Fear.

"Dead end, huh? The layout down here is pretty fucked up. Apparently, they built it this way in case anyone tried to escape."

"Eek!"

I walked toward the rat trapped at the end of the passage.

Granted, he was rather large for a rat. But despite his size, he had been the first to run. Apparently, he was a coward.

"All right. Time to join your friends in hell."

"F-Fiend!"

"You crazy bastard. When you do it, it's romance, but when I do it, it's adultery?[1774]"

Thud.

The black-robed man dropped to his knees, his face deathly pale. He still had his weapon in hand, but by now he knew perfectly well that it was useless against me.

In the end, he resorted to begging for his life.

"P-Please, spare—"

"F-Fuck off."

Crack.

I snapped the black-robed man's neck without hesitation. His tongue lolled out as his head tilted at an unnatural angle.

Instant death. No question.

"You people always make me do the same job twice. It's not like you were going to get far."

With a sigh, I slung him over my shoulder and retraced my steps. It did not take long to return to the site of my initial ambush.

The man had not made it very far, and over the past ten days I had become familiar with the underground prison's labyrinthine layout.

"Bastards. What the hell are you crawling all the way in here for? Is there something to eat?"

This was the second time the black-robed men had infiltrated the underground prison.

About thirty minutes ago, seven of them had come in. I had killed every last one.

I had helped thin the enemy's ranks for the Sichuan Tang Clan, but I could not feel happy about it. I knew what their presence meant.

The battle is going badly.

The underground prison was located on the outskirts of the Tang Clan's Inner Hall. That meant the Outer Hall, which could be considered the front line, had already been breached.

[1774] This Korean saying calls out a double standard: someone treats the same conduct as acceptable when they do it and wrong when someone else does.

Then what about Cheongpung…?

I shook my head as an ominous thought flashed through my mind.

No way. Even if you dropped Cheongpung into the middle of hell, he'd be the kind of guy who came back alive.

No. He had to be.

Damn it. If only I could at least log out. Then there'd be a little hope.

I had held out some hope, but no such luck.

The System had disabled Logout the instant the Quest began.

Besides, even if Logout suddenly became available, I could not risk returning to the modern world.

The enemy had already broken in twice within the past thirty minutes. If they stormed the place while I was gone, even briefly…

Not only me, but Jeok Cheongang and the Divine Physician would be finished.

I have no choice. I have to stop them here.

They had numbers. I was alone.

I needed to keep making the most of ambushes, as I had just done, while conserving my strength for an emergency.

The whole plan goes to hell if they walk in and find corpses everywhere.

I began moving the scattered bodies one by one.

The place I had chosen as my temporary morgue lay in the deepest, darkest reaches of the underground prison.

Creeeak.

"Long time no see. What's it been, half an hour?"

"…"

"I brought you some new friends so you wouldn't get lonely."

At the center of the prison, where not a single ray of light could reach, an old man festooned with restraints glared at me with blazing eyes.

The Heavenly Power Demon.

"What?"

"…!"

"What are you going to do, glare me to death? If you've got something to say, say it."

"…!!"

"Oh, right. Your pressure points."

I had struck his Paralysis Acupoint and Mute Acupoint, so of course he could not speak.

I walked over and released them. His furious voice immediately burst out.

"What the hell do you think you're doing?"

“Can’t you tell? I’m moving corpses.”

“I can see that! Why the hell are you bringing them here?”

“Keep your voice down. Shout one more time and I might strike a lethal acupoint instead of your Mute Acupoint.”

“…!”

Good. He was quiet now.

Leaving the silenced Heavenly Power Demon behind, I began stacking the bodies I had brought into the prison.

Thump. Rumble-rumble.

“Could you pick up that head over there?”

“…Are you speaking to this old man?”

“Oh, right. You’re in restraints.”

“Huff! Huff!”

The Heavenly Power Demon’s face flushed crimson as he snorted through his nose. Still, he apparently had no desire to get struck in a lethal acupoint, because he just barely swallowed the shout rising in his throat.

“What in the world is wrong with you…?”

“All done. I’m leaving.”

“…!”

“What? Something you want to say?”

The Heavenly Power Demon had refused to utter a word despite my efforts to coax information out of him over the past several days.

A man who had seen enough corpses during the Great Faction War to last a lifetime would not be complaining now without a reason. My suspicion had clearly hit the mark, and he began to stammer.

“N-No. Nothing.”

“Then we’re done.”

“W-Wait. Wait a moment.”

“Last chance. If you have something to say, spit it out.”

The Heavenly Power Demon’s lips worked silently for a moment before he let out a deep sigh.

“Why did you leave only this old man here? Where are the other prisoners?”

“You don’t need to know.”

“Then what are these corpses?”

He tried to sound unconcerned, but the way he studied my expression made it obvious that this was what he had really wanted to ask.

For the past several decades, his only visitor had been Old Man Gung bearing instruments of torture. Now nearly twenty naked corpses had suddenly been piled in front of him. Of course he was curious.

“Has some calamity befallen the Tang Clan?”

“Yeah.”

I added one brief sentence.

“Dark Heaven invaded.”

“…!”

It was the same expression I had seen on his face a few days ago.

Pretending not to notice how the words Dark Heaven had made the Heavenly Power Demon freeze, I continued.

“The Outer Hall has already been breached. There’s probably a fierce battle raging in the Inner Hall as we speak. Things are going worse than expected.”

“Who did you say it was?”

“What?”

“You must have interrogated your captives. This old man is asking who leads them.”

“Pretty sharp.”

I had already squeezed information out of one of the seven who first entered the prison.

He had been terrified, but he severed his own heart meridian and killed himself before I could learn much. Still, I had managed to get one man’s title from him.

“The Western Heaven Demon Lord.”

Clatter! Clank!

Just four words.

But their effect on the Heavenly Power Demon was tremendous.

The old man had always hung limply from his restraints, his gaunt body reduced to skin and bone. Now he hauled at the chains as though he might tear himself free at any moment.

He even glared at me with bloodshot eyes.

“Did you just say… the Western Heaven Demon Lord?”

“You know him?”

“I-Is he still alive? Then the Cult Leader! What happened to the Cult Leader?”

What was wrong with this old man all of a sudden?

Caught off guard, I answered.

“…At this hour? He’s probably eating breakfast.”

It was my first time hearing the title Western Heaven Demon Lord, so how would I know what had happened to the Demonic Cult’s Cult Leader? It was not as if the Demonic Cult had an official Twitter account.

“So it has finally come to this. In the end… it has come to this. Ha. Ha-ha-ha!”

After babbling words I could not understand, the Heavenly Power Demon began laughing like a man who had lost his mind.

I stared at him for a moment, then suddenly spoke.

“Spill it. What’s the connection between the Demonic Cult and Dark Heaven? And what kind of fucking bastard is this Western Heaven Demon Lord?”

The laughter echoing through the prison abruptly stopped.

The Heavenly Power Demon’s hollow gaze settled on me.

“He—the man you call the Western Heaven Demon Lord—was one of the four Protectors of the Divine Cult. He served closer to the Cult Leader than anyone… and led him astray.”

“Then…”

“One day, he began calling himself the Western Heaven Demon Lord. That was the beginning of everything. And now it has come to this. In the end, it has come to this. Ha-ha… Hahahaha!”

At that very moment, the Heavenly Power Demon erupted into crazed laughter.

Boom! Rumble-rumble!

A tremendous roar sounded in the distance, and the underground prison shook.

Chapter 357

A serene expression. An unhurried gait. A spotless yellow robe.

He alone stood apart—the only person whom the aura of death filling the Sichuan Tang Clan could touch.

“They’re no more than a handful of men at best. Push them back!”

“Fight to the end! We are the Sichuan Tang Clan!”

“Waaaaah!”

With a tremendous roar that shook the earth, two waves crashed into each other. Screams and battle cries mixed together as a thick mist of blood began to form.

It was a savage battle fought with utter disregard for life. The outcome was decided just as swiftly.

“Surround them! Don’t let a single one survive!”

“Gaaaah!”

The black wave of men dressed in black swallowed the wave of green.

When it passed, all that remained in its wake were green-clad corpses scattered like foam.

Watching it all from more than a thousand feet away, the Western Heaven Demon Lord suddenly spoke.

“It’s over.”

Their resolve to stand and fight without retreating was worthy of respect, but they had been hopelessly outnumbered from the start.

Even the poison and hidden weapons that formed the foundation of the Sichuan Tang Clan had been rendered largely ineffective.

The battle—or rather, the war—belonged to Dark Heaven.

“It seems I won’t be able to keep my promise. My apologies, Family Head Tang.”

The more desperate people became, the more their judgment faltered. Tang Sadok had been no exception.

After extracting the answer he wanted by promising to preserve the Tang Family’s lineage, the Western Heaven Demon Lord had taken a simple and cruel course of action.

Rather than kill Tang Sadok immediately, he had seated him against a tree atop a hill overlooking the Sichuan Tang Clan.

There, Tang Sadok could watch his family perish until his own last breath.

“Everything according to the will of the Lord of Heaven.”

Drip. Drip-drip.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord looked up at the sky as rain began to fall, then turned away.

The mouth of a cave yawned open like a black maw. Beside a fallen brazier lay a hunchbacked old man, dead with his eyes wide open.

What caught the Western Heaven Demon Lord's interest were the wounds carved into the old man's body.

The Black Blood Sword Technique.

The Black Blood Sword Technique was permitted only to Dark Heaven martial artists.

Having recognized the identity of those who had arrived before him, the Western Heaven Demon Lord descended the stone steps leading underground.

Footprints stained with blood and mud stood out clearly upon the stairs. At least twenty of his subordinates had passed this way before him.

And most likely…

They're all dead.

There were tracks leading down, but none coming back up.

The moment he entered the underground prison, suspicion became certainty.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord had lived a life steeped in blood. He could feel the lingering heat of battle in the dark corridor and smell the metallic reek of blood beneath the stench.

Who did this?

He studied the fine droplets of blood spattered across the wall.

Skilled. They were cut down before they could put up any real resistance.

With the Sichuan Tang Clan in mortal peril, there was no chance any of its masters would remain here merely to guard outsiders.

If Tang Sadok had told the truth, only three people remained in the underground prison.

The Divine Physician was hardly a fighting force, and Fire King Jeok Cheongang had yet to regain consciousness. That left only one person.

Jin Taekyung, the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord recalled what the Blood Lord had said about Jin Taekyung.

The most arrogant and tenacious young bastard under heaven, with more guts than sense.

For some reason, the Blood Lord had wanted to kill Jin Taekyung even more than the Sword Saint who had cut off his arm or the Fire King.

So he's skilled enough to survive an encounter with the Blood Lord?

But Jin Taekyung would not be so lucky twice.

The Sword Saint was not here, and the Fire King was in no condition to fight.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord intended to capture the rats trapped in the jar and return without difficulty.

Along with the Myriad-Poison Ring in their possession.

Squelch. Squelch.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord strolled onward, then abruptly stopped.

A solid stone wall stretching down from the ceiling blocked his path.

“Well, now. They certainly made this place complicated.”

He regarded the wall for a moment, then closed his hand into a fist. Dark-red mist coiled around his arm and enveloped it.

Goooooooong.

Everything happened in an instant.

The manifestation of qi. Its compression. Its explosion.

Nothing could stand in the path of his Fist Force.

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

Walls shattered and collapsed. The entire prison shook.

The immense concentration of qi shot forward in a straight line, punching through dozens of walls. Stalactites rained from the ceiling like hail, and a dense cloud of dust billowed into the air.

Much better.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord surveyed the path he had created, then spoke.

“Why don’t you come out now?”

His only answer was a piercing shriek through the air.

Whoosh!

The dust cloud split apart. The Western Heaven Demon Lord plucked the dagger flying toward his throat from the air and smiled.

“Are you Jin Taekyung?”

“You already know. Why ask?”

Step. Step.

A tall young man—Jin Taekyung—emerged from the cloud of dust and stared at the Western Heaven Demon Lord with an impassive gaze.

I tried to look unfazed.

Half of any fight was momentum. You couldn’t let your guard down because your opponent looked weaker, and you couldn’t let yourself be intimidated because he looked stronger.

Especially when you were facing the real deal.

What kind of monster is this guy?

I stared at the middle-aged man before me, inwardly clicking my tongue.

If Moses had parted the sea with his staff, this man had carved a new path through the underground prison with a single punch.

And that wasn't all. He stood there with a faint smile, the very picture of tranquility.

Even the air around him smells different.

The Blood Lord had been openly insane. This middle-aged man, on the other hand, was dangerous simply by existing.

Their martial arts might have been comparable in strength, but they were completely different in nature.

"I've heard a great deal about you. You're an amusing young man, just as I was told."

I lowered White Flame's spearhead at an angle.

"I'm pretty entertaining myself."

"I also heard you lack manners."

"You've got the wrong man. My nickname is Mr. Manners."

"Well, I would have to spend more time with you to know for certain. But according to an acquaintance of mine, it's true."

"You don't look like you have any friends. Who's the acquaintance?"

The smile on the middle-aged man's lips deepened.

"The Blood Lord."

"…!"

"He's very eager to see you."

"I never want to see that fucking bastard again."

"That young man Cheongpung said the same thing. In a different tone, of course."

This bastard has already met Cheongpung.

And yet he was here…

I felt my face stiffen despite myself.

"You, by any chance…"

The middle-aged man smiled and waved a hand.

"There's no need to worry. I won't kill you. I intend to take you, Cheongpung, and the Fire King back alive."

I asked with a dumbfounded expression.

"Take us?"

"I told you. The Blood Lord wants to see you. So you'll be safe, at least until then."

"…"

"Of course, what happens afterward will be up to the Blood Lord."

The middle-aged man had given me two pieces of good news and one piece of bad news.

The good news was that Cheongpung was alive and the Blood Lord wasn't here. The bad news was that if I lost this fight, we'd all be attending a group get-together with him.

Of course, the chances of us having a drink over grilled intestines before parting ways were close to zero.

The odds that I'll become the grilled intestines instead are probably around fifty percent.

The other fifty percent was the chance I'd end up as grilled tripe.

Damn it. Just thinking about it was making my mouth water.

I swallowed dryly and looked the middle-aged man up and down.

A man who could call the Blood Lord, presumably one of Dark Heaven's highest-ranking figures, an acquaintance. A man who could unleash that much destructive power with a single punch.

A title came to mind.

"You're the Western Heaven Demon Lord, aren't you?"

"Ah, come to think of it, I haven't introduced myself yet. It's a pleasure to meet you."

Pleasure, my ass.

I stared at the Western Heaven Demon Lord's two perfectly functional arms and muttered.

"I heard you only had one arm."

"That was true until ten days ago."

"What?"

"I had another attached. It wasn't originally mine, so it still doesn't move quite as well as I'd like. If you intend to try something, aim for my left arm."

"…!"

What the hell was this guy?

Even if some kind of suturing operation was possible, he had replaced an arm as if it were a computer component.

Aside from the subtle difference in skin tone, it moved perfectly naturally.

Is that even possible? And in only ten days?

I couldn't make any sense of it, but I had to set my shock and questions aside for now.

His last remark bothered me even more.

He even told me his weakness.

There could only be one reason for something that absurd.

It was the kind of arrogance only someone certain of his overwhelming strength could display.

And the Western Heaven Demon Lord was strong enough to make arrogance look like composure.

“Damn it.”

I drew a deep breath and fixed him with a cold, level stare.

“Can’t you just pretend you came to visit a patient and turn around?”

“That would be difficult. Setting you people aside, there’s something I have to take with me.”

“Something?”

Instead of answering, the Western Heaven Demon Lord posed a question of his own.

“This old man will ask you this time. Will you surrender? Peacefully.”

“Could you kill yourself for me? Peacefully.”

“Then there’s only one answer.”

Roughly a hundred yards separated us.

The instant our gazes collided across that distance—

Whoosh! Swish!

We both reached out at the same time.

No. When it came to launching our attacks, at least, I was faster.

The only problem was that the Finger Qi the Western Heaven Demon Lord fired reached its target one step before my dagger did.

Striking second, hitting first.

A red warning light flashed in my head. At the same time, my sharpened senses took in everything around me.

The Finger Qi was formless and invisible, yet I could clearly feel its approach. It was a new sense I had acquired while fighting Hwangbo Eom, the Taeeul Merciless Sword.

Now!

I twisted my head and shot forward. Something faster than a bullet grazed my ear.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord watched me with open surprise.

“To evade a Ghost Prison Finger at eighty percent power… You certainly have a talent for surprising people as well—”

“Yeah, Ghost Prison Finger.”

Whoosh!

The Western Heaven Demon Lord’s voice cut off.

Within that slowed instant, his widening pupils reflected me closing in right before his eyes.

My speed lay beyond anything he had imagined—far beyond the limits of a Peak master.

Stamina, Strength, Agility. And the Flamefire Path.

I poured everything into a single step. I erased the distance and tore through the air.

The fire dragon crouched within my qi sea spread its wings and soared. White Flame's transparent spearhead became the dragon's claw, plunging toward my enemy.

Heavenly Strike.

Kraaaaaash!

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

It was a tremendous reverberation.

As if to attest to the ferocity of the fighting, the corpses of enemies and allies piled together in tangled heaps collapsed.

The pavilion shook as though struck by an earthquake. Even those swinging weapons at one another staggered as they momentarily lost their balance.

"An earthquake! It's an earthquake!"

"Damn it, why now…?"

An earthquake was a calamity no human strength could stop.

The tremor lasted only a moment, but it was enough to fill everyone with fear.

Everyone except the two men facing each other in the ruined Family Head's Hall of the Sichuan Tang Clan.

"Ha-ha-ha-ha-ha!"

The old man, the First Fiend, threw back his head and roared with laughter, then turned toward Cheongpung.

"You felt that just now, didn't you?"

Cheongpung nodded, looking dazed.

"Yes."

Of course he had. The tremor had been an immense wave of qi, powerful enough to be felt from hundreds of yards away.

The First Fiend continued with a sneer.

"It seems the Demon Lord has finally made up his mind. Heh-heh."

"I know. It's really amazing."

"He has finally cast aside his last shred of mercy and embraced killing intent. Neither the Fire King nor that disciple of his will survive. Do you understand what that means?"

"Yes. My Benefactor really is amazing."

“Now that we no longer need to worry about the Blood Lord’s feelings, even I won’t show you any mercy from here on—what?”

The First Fiend paused and frowned.

He couldn’t begin to understand what the greenhorn before him had just said.

“Your Benefactor? You mean the Fire King’s disciple?”

But Cheongpung’s next words were not directed at the First Fiend.

In fact, none of his answers had been directed at him from the start.

A quiet murmur slipped from Cheongpung’s lips.

“At first, I thought I was far ahead of him. But before I knew it, he’d already come this far…”

Cheongpung gazed toward the distant source of the tremor, his eyes shining with joy and ruefulness.

No one else in the Sichuan Tang Clan could have guessed the truth—not even the First Fiend standing before him.

But Cheongpung knew.

“There’s no doubt. It’s my Benefactor.”

Cheongpung had been happy on Huashan, but he had also been lonely.

The beautiful scenery, the animals he could play with, and even the grandfather he revered more than anyone else could not fill a certain emptiness within him.

“There are many young prodigies your age in the Murim. The Ten Dragons and Phoenixes are the best among them.”

“Hmm. Then are the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes stronger than me?”

“Huh? What kind of question is that? Of course you, Pung, are—”

“Grandpa?”

“Ahem. Of course you’re still lacking, Pung.”

“Gasp! Really?”

“O-Of course! The world is vast, and there are many masters. So you’ll have to keep working hard at your martial arts from now on, right?”

“Yeees…”

From the single thoughtless remark his grandfather had let slip, Cheongpung felt the unfamiliar emotion in one corner of his heart grow stronger.

Only later did he learn its name.

Competitive pride.

Which of us is stronger?

He wanted to find out. He wanted to pit his martial arts against theirs and spend time with them.

And so Cheongpung left Huashan and ventured into the world. Then, on a sunny winter day, he met him.

“If it wouldn’t be too much trouble, may I have one candied hawthorn skewer?”[1775]

“…Mujin. Give him one.”

That was Cheongpung’s first meeting with Jin Taekyung.

His Benefactor in name, his friend in truth—and now, his one and only true rival.

A gentle smile touched Cheongpung’s lips.

“I know. My Benefactor feels the same way I do.”

“…!”

Flames rose in the First Fiend’s eyes as he watched this.

This greenhorn would have died long ago if not for the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s orders, yet he dared to ignore him. That alone had sealed his fate.

“You little bastard…”

The First Fiend raised his twin axes, their blades caked with scraps of human flesh.

Then he saw what was happening before him and froze like a statue.

Swooshhh.

The wind was blowing.

A scarlet wind of qi flowed from Cheongpung’s body, slid down his wrist, and streamed into his sword.

It passed over the plum blossom engraved upon the hilt, coiled around the blade, and finally bloomed into a single crimson plum blossom.

Crackle-crackle-crackle!

A halo of light, more brilliant and destructive than anything else.

A dazed voice escaped between the First Fiend’s lips as he stared at the unbelievable sight.

“…Sword Force.”

The product of great martial artists. Proof that its wielder had reached the exalted realm known as Supreme Peak.

Yet the twenty-three-year-old young man’s face wore an innocent smile wholly unsuited to a great martial artist.

“So, shall we begin?”

[1775] Candied hawthorn skewers are a traditional snack made by coating skewered hawthorn fruit in hardened sugar.

Chapter 358

Kraaaaaash!

A spearhead wreathed in blue flame plunged toward the crown of a man's head.

It was the claw of a fire dragon descending from the heavens—a force of destruction that could erase anything in its path.

This is…

In a moment split into ever-smaller fragments, the Western Heaven Demon Lord thought,

I can't evade it.

This was no strike he could avoid by retreating a few steps.

Then what could he do? Before he could even form the question, the body that had survived countless life-and-death duels was already moving.

Whoosh!

Dark-red Sword Force surged from his waist and collided with the blue flames.

Boom!

A tremendous roar erupted, and a shock wave swept through my entire body. My ears went numb, and the breath caught in my throat.

Sword and spear collided in a burst of dark-red light. The next instant, I went flying as though someone had yanked me backward.

Bang! Bang! KABOOM!

The thick wall of sedimentary rock crumbled like castella[1776] the moment my back struck it.

I knocked away a stalactite falling toward my eyes and twisted around in midair.

The instant my feet hit the ground, they plowed furrows through the solid stone floor.

Krrrrrk!

Damn it. I must have flown at least thirty feet.

I tore off my leather shoes, their soles completely gone, tossed them aside, and glared at the bastard in the distance.

"Fucking bastard. You're pretty good, huh?"

"…"

Even through the thick cloud of dust, I could see the Western Heaven Demon Lord's stiff expression.

[1776] Castella is a soft sponge cake of Japanese origin, also popular in Korea.

He silently looked down at the sword blade broken clean in half and his blood-soaked grip before opening his mouth.

“That spear is a divine weapon.”

“Divine? That’s a bit much.”

“What martial art was that?”

I answered without hesitation.

“Get Hit and Fucking Die Technique.”

“I’m beginning to understand why the Blood Lord called you arrogant. And… why he wanted to kill you so badly.”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord’s gaze swept over me.

“You’re dangerous.”

“I am kind of dangerous. Maybe that’s why all the women avoid me.”

“Cheongpung is certainly remarkable, reaching Supreme Peak at such a young age, but even he cannot compare to you. To be honest, you have far exceeded my expectations. Despite being only at Peak, you managed to wound me.”

I wasn’t surprised. I had already sensed that Cheongpung had broken through the wall and reached Supreme Peak.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord’s accurate assessment of my martial arts realm followed the same logic.

“Was that a compliment?”

“Of course. But do not be too pleased. I do not like people who exceed my expectations.”

Speaking in a low voice, the Western Heaven Demon Lord clenched and unclenched his bloodied palm. Sticky blood dripped down, wetting the rocks and sand.

“My execution of Four Ounces Deflecting a Thousand Catties[1777] was flawless. Yet I still failed to redirect your strike completely. A strike from a green young man who has not even advanced beyond Peak.”

Four Ounces Deflecting a Thousand Catties[1778]—the martial principle of controlling a thousand catties with only four ounces.

And just as he said, the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s use of Four Ounces Deflecting a Thousand Catties[1779] had been flawless. Even after being caught off guard, his attempt to calmly and precisely redirect Heavenly Strike had been impressive enough to earn my secret admiration.

But if there was one thing he had failed to anticipate…

[1777] The name uses traditional Chinese weight units: a liang, rendered here as “ounce,” is 50 g (1.76 oz) in modern usage, while a jin, or catty, is 500 g (1.10 lb). Historical weights varied.

[1778] The name uses traditional Chinese weight units: a liang, rendered here as “ounce,” is 50 g (1.76 oz) in modern usage, while a jin, or catty, is 500 g (1.10 lb). Historical weights varied.

[1779] The name uses traditional Chinese weight units: a liang, rendered here as “ounce,” is 50 g (1.76 oz) in modern usage, while a jin, or catty, is 500 g (1.10 lb). Historical weights varied.

“I’m a little stronger than I look.”

He wasn’t facing an ordinary Peak master.

A Third Rate could not contend with a Second Rate, and a Second Rate could only kneel before a First Rate.

The higher the realm, the wider the gulf and the more overwhelming the difference in strength. That was common sense in this world—the common sense of the Murim.

But I defied common sense.

“Call me a physical Supreme Peak master.”

“A physical Supreme Peak master. I have no idea what that means, but if you say so, then so be it. Understood.”

I stared at the nodding Western Heaven Demon Lord in disbelief.

“…What exactly do you understand?”

“Live long enough and you experience all manner of things. Compared to the supernatural powers I know of, what you’ve shown is merely a drop in the bucket.”

With a faint smile, the Western Heaven Demon Lord raised one arm.

The movement was so natural that it was hard to believe he had been one-armed until only ten days ago.

That arm had to be one of the supernatural powers he was talking about.

“Everything shall unfold according to the will of the most exalted Lord of Heaven. Why not abandon your futile hopes and surrender?”

“Surrender?”

“If you do, I will personally petition the Lord of Heaven to put your talents to good use. Even the Blood Lord will not dare touch you.”

“Wow. You’ve got it all planned out.”

“May I take that as your consent?”

“Hmm, wait a second. I just thought of something better.”

I slowly walked toward the Western Heaven Demon Lord as I continued.

“Stories like this always end with good triumphing over evil anyway. So stop screwing around in Dark Heaven or Cheonggyecheon[1780] or whatever and come over to the orthodox faction. I’ll put in a good word with Grandpa Sword Saint and get you an easy job.”

“Heh. Well, this is something.”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord stepped forward with a faint smile.

“What a pity. Don’t regret this when you meet the Blood Lord.”

[1780] Cheonggyecheon is a stream in central Seoul. Its name sounds similar to Dark Heaven in Korean.

"Every bastard who's said that to me is kneeling with his head planted before Yama[1781] by now."

"Perhaps it's your youth, but you're far too hot-blooded. If you expect the same stroke of luck you enjoyed at the start, forget it. I know that strike was your full strength."

"That's the best bullshit I've heard all year. Have you been taking bullshit lessons from the yellow dog next door?"

I answered casually, but unfortunately, the Western Heaven Demon Lord was right.

A surprise attack had to end everything in one strike. Either cripple the opponent or kill them.

Breaking his weapon and tearing open his hand wasn't enough.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord was a master far above me. Showing him my full strength without inflicting any significant injury had been a painful mistake.

Should I have used One Annihilation from the start?

What would have happened if I'd gone all in from the beginning?

I cast the thought aside. Even if I could return to that moment, I probably still wouldn't be able to stake everything on one move.

I had to avoid gambles that left only total victory or utter ruin—especially when lives other than my own hung in the balance.

Besides… I haven't played all my cards yet.

Step. Step.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord and I. He and I. We slowly approached each other.

Unlike our first clash, neither of us launched Finger Qi or daggers.

We measured the distance, watched each other's hands and feet, and waited for the right moment.

A moment exactly like this one.

Snap!

The Western Heaven Demon Lord moved first.

He erased thirty feet in a single step, his hand blurring. Ink-black Sword Force burned along his crooked, serpentine Snake Sword.

Avoid a direct clash at all costs.

If there was one gap even the System couldn't bridge, it was enlightenment.

The difference between someone who had attained the insight required to reach Supreme Peak and someone who had not was as vast as heaven and earth.

No matter how great my strength was, if I repeatedly clashed with Sword Force, I would inevitably suffer internal injuries.

[1781] Yama is the Buddhist ruler and judge of the dead.

Whoosh! Boom!

The Sword Force split the ground, blasting out a crater that looked like something from a movie. If I hadn't barely dodged the strike, it would have cut me in half.

I retreated and flicked my hand.

Inventory open. Summon.

Shhk-shhk-shhk!

I had never formally learned the art of throwing blades, but with enough force and speed behind them, the daggers were deadly in their own right.

Not that it mattered against the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

Slice!

A single horizontal line flashed through the air.

Ink-black Sword Energy shot from his blade, slicing through the daggers and flying straight at me.

I tilted my head, and searing heat and Sword Energy grazed past me.

Boom!

Ignoring the roar and tremor behind me, I planted my foot.

Grind. Crack!

The solid stone floor split like a spiderweb. The next instant, I shot forward like a streak of light.

I moved with enough speed to rival a Supreme Peak movement technique—perhaps even surpass one.

"As expected!"

With a short exclamation, the Western Heaven Demon Lord brought his sword down.

Ink-black Sword Force, so dark that it dimmed the very air around it, swept across my body.

It would have cut me apart, if not for the thought that had flashed through my mind a fraction of an instant earlier.

Thirty points each into Agility and Strength.

Swoosh.

The change came with dazzling speed. My whole body grew lighter, while my muscles gained density and elasticity, squeezing out every last bit of strength.

As I stepped upon the wind, the ink-black Sword Force sliced through empty air.

Kraaaaaash!

The Western Heaven Demon Lord's eyes flew wide.

It was already too late for him to pull back his sword. He thrust out his other hand, trying to seize the spear hurtling toward his chest.

His reflexes were astonishing.

Just as astonishing was the fact that my prediction had been exactly right.

Inventory open. Store.

Whoosh!

The Western Heaven Demon Lord's Force-wreathed hand swept through empty air.

The spear that had seemed certain to fall into his grasp—White Flame—was now safely tucked away somewhere in my inventory.

This was the moment I had been waiting for.

Flame Divine Palm.

My right hand, wreathed in blue flames, slammed into the Western Heaven Demon Lord's abdomen.

Boom!

His body lifted slightly into the air amid the tremendous heat. At that exact moment, I drove my waiting left fist forward.

Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

Crack!

The strike that had brought down a cliff buried itself in the Western Heaven Demon Lord's side.

The impact ran back through my fingertips. His body flew like a cannonball and smashed into the wall.

Bang! KRA-KA-BOOM!

The entire underground prison shuddered. At the same time, unbearable weakness and hunger washed over me.

I had poured everything I had into every movement of that exchange. No wonder ragged breaths spilled from my lips.

"Whew."

Rumble.

I steadied my breathing and slowly walked forward through the stones raining down around me.

Driven deep into the solid rock, the Western Heaven Demon Lord stared at me with unfocused eyes.

"I was definitely trying to catch the spear… How did you…"

"It's probably something like those supernatural powers you believe in."

"Cough. I see. Then is that also how you suddenly became faster?"

"Yeah. A few perfectly good lives were wasted because of you. They were bastards who deserved to die anyway, though."

"What do you mean?"

"This is an underground prison. Haven't you noticed anything strange?"

After a brief silence, the Western Heaven Demon Lord answered.

"…There are no prisoners."

"Correct."

"How did you do it? Did you perhaps use the Essence-Siphoning Great Technique on them?"

"You could say that, in a way."

The difference was that the Essence-Siphoning Great Technique absorbed an opponent's qi, while I sucked up EXP.

Thanks to those guys, I earned sixty points. It was a stroke of genius.

Instead of destroying the prisoners' dantians, the Sichuan Tang Clan had chosen to suppress their internal energy and shackle them.

That way, they could live longer. That way, the clan could make them taste hell through prolonged torture.

Thanks to that, the dozen or so prisoners other than the Heavenly Power Demon had become nourishment for me.

"Cough. The Essence-Siphoning Great Technique. I see. So that was it."

"Are you satisfied now?"

"If I ask, will you answer?"

"Yeah. So…"

I looked down at the Western Heaven Demon Lord as he weakly nodded.

"Drop the lousy act and get up. And enough with the coughing when you're not even bringing up blood."

"Well, this is something."

The Western Heaven Demon Lord's eyes, which had seemed ready to go out at any moment, curved into crescents.

"Apparently, I'm really no good at this sort of thing."

"…Haa."

Fucking bastard.

Chapter 359

Rustle.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord brushed the bits of stone from his body, then rolled his neck from side to side. His brow furrowed as his bones ground against one another.

“Your fists pack quite a punch. Without my Body-Protecting Qi, I might have been seriously injured.”

Quite a punch, my ass.

I let out a deep sigh as I watched him get up as though nothing had happened after taking both my full-powered Flame Divine Palm and Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

“Forget the Body-Protecting Qi. Isn’t it cheating for someone like you to equip gear too?”

“Gear? What is that?”

I pointed at the black-scaled armor visible through the tears in his yellow robe.

“That thing you’re wearing underneath, you bastard.”

“Ah. You mean the Black Dragon Armor.”

“The Black Dragon Armor?”

Now that was one hell of a cool name.

I didn’t know exactly what the Black Dragon Armor was, but its defensive capabilities were so impressive that even calling it a divine weapon didn’t seem like enough.

It had blocked two full-powered attacks, yet all it had lost were a few scales.

With that level of defense, fists and palms won’t cut it.

The armor worn by Dark Heaven’s ordinary martial artists had been formidable too, but it was nothing compared to the Black Dragon Armor.

An eye for an eye. A tooth for a tooth. A divine weapon for a divine weapon.

As long as he had the Black Dragon Armor, I needed White Flame to inflict a fatal wound on him.

Unless…

My gaze probed him for another opening. The Western Heaven Demon Lord smiled faintly.

“The more I see of you, the more interesting you become. Your strange techniques are one thing, but I like your refusal to back down.”

“So? Want to date?”

“I must politely decline. I already have a lover I’ve been with for many years.”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord gently stroked his sword's winding blade. Ink-black Sword Force rose from the clean break where half the blade had snapped off.

"I've seen all your cards. Now it's my turn."

With that quiet murmur, the Western Heaven Demon Lord stepped forward. A suffocating aura rippled behind him like wings.

Only then did I realize it.

His martial arts had reached a realm far beyond what I'd imagined.

"…Damn it."

Deng.

I could almost hear a bell ringing somewhere to announce the start of round two.

But this wasn't a boxing match that ended after twelve rounds. There were no spectators to cheer or groan, no staff to throw in the towel.

This match would end only when one of us staked his life—nothing less.

Inventory open. Summon.

The cold spear shaft settled into my grip. I drew a deep breath and leveled the spearhead at the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

"Come at me."

He didn't hesitate.

Snap!

The Western Heaven Demon Lord extended one foot.

Shifting Form and Position.

His vanished figure reappeared in midair above my head.

Every hair on my body stood on end as I leaned backward.

Saaak! Boom!

His heel missed the bridge of my nose by a hair and slammed into the ground. The floor caved in, sending fragments of stone flying in every direction.

Blood trickled from the bridge of my nose where the wind pressure had sliced it, but I wasn't given even a moment to wipe it away.

Shh-shh-shh-shhk!

Ink-black Sword Energy rained down from every direction, slashing and sweeping toward my waist, chest, and stomach without distinction.

They were attacks I could never have dodged in the past.

But not anymore.

I can see them.

In the slowed world, I sensed the Sword Energy hurtling toward me.

I could picture where that destructive energy was headed and how I needed to move to evade it.

My body was already moving ahead of my thoughts.

Kra-kra-kra-kaboom!

I dodged some attacks and knocked others aside with my spear. Thick clouds of dust billowed into the air, and craters like something out of a war movie pockmarked the ground.

And then…

Whooong!

Ink-black Sword Force gleaming with a murky light burst through the dust cloud. His gaze calm and steady, the Western Heaven Demon Lord brought his sword down in a diagonal slash.

I had no way of knowing what martial art or form he was using.

But I knew one thing.

If I backed down here, all that awaited me was death.

I have to strike back.

I needed power strong enough to stand against Sword Force. This was the moment to use the best move I had.

The answer had been there from the beginning.

One Annihilation.

Grind.

Every muscle in my body drew taut like a bowstring. My foot shot forward first, and my waist, bent as far back as it could go, snapped forward. The rotational force flowed through my shoulder and arm and poured into the spearhead.

Kraaaaaash!

It was a concentration of energy far too massive to be called mere Spear Energy.

The spearhead surged forward, wreathed in blue flames. It burned through the air and devoured the dust cloud as it hurtled toward a single man.

"…!"

The Western Heaven Demon Lord's eyes widened. At the same time, his blade trembled, and an even greater mass of Sword Force erupted from it.

The next instant, blue flame and black darkness collided.

KABOOOOOM!

A roar unlike anything I had ever heard erupted as everything within a radius of over a hundred feet shattered and exploded.

Part of the ceiling collapsed under the impact, and the incredibly solid rock was pulverized into drifting dust.

Amid it all, one man remained standing.

"Damn it."

Even my full-powered One Annihilation hadn't worked.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord shook his head at my dejected expression. Blood ran down from his shoulder. That was all One Annihilation had left behind.

"There's no need to be disappointed. It was a sufficiently powerful form. For a moment, it even sent a chill through my heart."

"Let me ask you one thing."

"Anything."

"If I hadn't wasted my strength earlier and had opened with that strike… could I have killed you?"

The Western Heaven Demon Lord considered it carefully before answering.

"I believe you could have taken one of my arms. Perhaps even more than that. But you would have been the one to die."

"Damn it. I knew it."

"I think it's time to end this."

Whoooooosh.

It didn't even surprise me anymore. Sword Force surged like water from an inexhaustible spring and lashed toward me like a whip.

I gritted my teeth as the drain on my internal energy left me weak to the point of collapse.

"It's… not over yet."

I drew up every last bit of internal energy I had and unleashed the Fire Dragon Divine Spear.

The blue flames were visibly smaller than before. They shot toward the Western Heaven Demon Lord's exposed throat.

Screeeeeech!

The next instant, I met his unwavering gaze and realized it.

He read me.

By the time the realization flashed through my mind, it was already too late. The Sword Force that had seemed poised to cut me down abruptly changed course in midair and struck the spearhead.

Boom!

A roar like the sky splitting apart rang out. I clenched my teeth and held on to the spear shaft as it bucked violently in my hands.

My ankles were already buried deep in the ground when the Sword Force swept toward me.

Shh-shh-shh-shh-shhk!

Above, below, left, and right.

Terrifying energy hurtled in from thirty-six directions around me.

Every nerve in my body screamed as I swung my spear like a madman.

Boom! Kra-kra-kra-kaboom!

My body staggered and my breath caught with every strike I deflected.

This wasn't a matter of speed or strength.

It was martial arts—and internal energy.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord's martial arts occupied a distant realm beyond my reach, and the terrifying internal energy transmitted through my spear battered me from within.

What the hell…!

Blood sprayed between my clenched teeth. My torn hands had been covered in blood for some time already.

I squeezed out every last ounce of strength and swung my spear at the ink-black Sword Force cleaving toward my chest.

The second form of the Fire Dragon Divine Spear.

Heavenly Strike.

Screeeeeech! Boom!

But unlike before, the fire dragon's claw was pitifully weak, while the Western Heaven Demon Lord's ink-black Sword Force hadn't lost even a fraction of its power.

Krrrrk!

I was driven backward, carving a long furrow through the ground.

Before me, the underground prison shook as though caught in an earthquake, thick clouds of dust filling the air.

He's gone.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord was nowhere to be seen. Not ahead of me, to either side, or above.

That left only one possibility.

I spun around and unleashed a palm strike.

Bang! Boom!

Two sounds rang out at once.

The heat of the Flame Divine Palm burned through the air, while the Western Heaven Demon Lord's palm struck my chest.

My vision went white. Then came the agony of my heart meridian tearing apart strand by strand. I swallowed the blood surging up my throat and regained control of my body as I was hurled backward.

"That was remarkable. I mean it."

"…!"

It was pure instinct.

At the quiet voice that suddenly came from beside me, my arm moved on its own. The hand blade shooting toward the back of my neck struck my forearm instead.

Crack!

Pain flooded through me with the sound of bone shifting out of place. Then the Western Heaven Demon Lord's foot lashed out like a whip and buried itself in my side.

Thud! Boom!

I smashed through the rock and became embedded in the wall. The Western Heaven Demon Lord slowly walked toward me.

Admiration and delight filled his eyes.

"Incredible. Truly incredible. Do you know what you just did?"

I spat out a mouthful of bloody phlegm.

"No, you fucking bastard."

"You should be proud. You lasted more than three hundred moves against me while I was fighting at full strength."

"Three hundred moves. I'm crying tears of joy."

"You don't seem particularly happy, so let me put it another way. What if I told you the Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun and her Elders lasted more than five hundred moves?"

"Nope. Still not happy."

"Why not?"

The Western Heaven Demon Lord looked genuinely baffled. I tossed him a curt answer.

"They died anyway."

Three hundred moves, five hundred moves, a thousand moves—it didn't matter. If you lost the fight, all that awaited the loser was death.

The Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun and the Poison King had been no exception.

And…

Neither was I, probably.

"Cough."

Blood seeped between my parted lips.

I wanted to get up as casually as the Western Heaven Demon Lord had earlier, but my body was in no condition for that.

Internal injuries aside, my left arm is fractured, and I think I've cracked some bones in my chest.

I'd really taken one hell of a beating. No wonder breathing had been difficult for a while now.

Panting, I planted White Flame like a cane and dragged myself upright.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord's eyes lit up.

"Do you still have something left to show me?"

"Of course."

“That must also be the power of those supernatural powers. Show me. Quickly! Quickly!”

“I was planning to.”

I leveled my spear at the Western Heaven Demon Lord, who was practically bouncing with excitement like a child.

And that was all I did.

“…?”

“What are you waiting for? Come at me.”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord stared at me in confusion.

“What did you just do?”

“I’m showing you. The supernatural powers you wanted to see.”

“What?”

“I’m good with my body, but hopeless with my head. I’m such a dumbass that I even failed the Level Eight Hanja exam.[1782] Then I came across the term ‘supernatural powers’ in a martial-arts novel. I didn’t know what it meant, so I looked it up.”

Even if I explained it like this, he probably wouldn’t understand half of what I was saying.

My vision wavered. Every time I exhaled, my lungs prickled as though they were being stabbed with needles, and the spear shaft that had always felt light now seemed like a boulder weighing ten thousand geun.[1783]

Even so…

“‘Supernatural powers.‘ Mysterious beings or phenomena that are difficult to explain through reason. That’s what it meant.”

I neither staggered nor collapsed. I simply stared at the Western Heaven Demon Lord and continued speaking slowly.

“What’s so special about supernatural powers? A bastard who keeps fighting even after he’s been reduced to this—that’s supernatural powers.”

Remaining Stat Points? None.

Physical condition? It was a miracle I could still stand.

Now that everything had flown out like the contents of Pandora’s box, the one thing left inside me wasn’t hope.

Sheer grit.

Hope could make someone rise again, but it could also make them weak.

But as long as that grit remained—as long as I still possessed the will to fight to the bitter end—I wouldn’t fall.

[1782] Hanja are Chinese characters used in Korean writing; Level Eight is a basic certification level, making failing the exam a mark of being exceptionally bad at them.

[1783] A Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun would be 6,000 kg (about 13,200 lb); the weight is used here as an exaggeration.

No.

I had decided not to fall.

Because there were people I had to protect. The Fire King and Cheongpung had fought for my sake, so even if I had to become a ghost instead of some supernatural being, I had to stop this bastard.

“So…”

I gathered every last scrap of internal energy. The meager handful of qi flowed unsteadily toward the spearhead.

A faint wisp of Spear Energy lit the darkness like a firefly.

“Quit spouting bullshit and come at me, you bastard with a supernatural-powers fetish.”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord fell silent.

Countless emotions passed across his face. When they were gone, only a pair of deeply solemn eyes remained.

Swish!

Chapter 360

I didn’t know how much time had passed.

Time crawled for me, while the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s rushed by as swift and violent as the Yangtze’s current I had seen a few weeks ago.

One thing was certain: even now, at this very moment, time kept moving.

Thud!

I saw neither a windup nor the movement itself. By the time I realized the Western Heaven Demon Lord had taken a step, my head had already snapped back.

Before I could even regain my balance, the sound of splitting air pierced my ears.

Shhk, thud! Thud-thud-thud!

Shoulder, chest, stomach.

Palm and fist, each laden with internal energy, hammered my upper body in fluid succession.

My bones shifted with sickening cracks, and agony washed my vision white. I gritted my teeth.

Crk.

A molar shattered, and for a brief moment, my mind cleared.

“Raaaagh!”

Whoosh!

With a cry squeezed from the depths of my lungs, I swung my fist.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord caught my hopelessly slow, wide-open punch and clicked his tongue.

“You still have strength left?”

“…!”

Crack!

Even muscles and bones hardened like steel were nothing more than kindling before the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

His hook-like hand seized my wrist and twisted. Flesh and bone were crushed together.

The bones in my already broken left arm splintered, sending horrific pain through me.

“Gaaaaaagh!”

“Don’t worry. I’ll summon some skilled healers to treat you later.”

“Go… fuck yourself!”

I thrust my still-usable right arm at the Western Heaven Demon Lord as he wiped the blood splattered across his face.

White Flame's spearhead, wreathed in faint Spear Energy, stabbed toward his lower body.

Whoosh. Clack.

But the spearhead was stopped with absurd ease.

Not by the Black Dragon Armor or Body-Protecting Qi, but by the Western Heaven Demon Lord's bare hand.

"Futile."

His hand, wrapped in ink-black Force, tightened around the spearhead. The faint energy gathered there vanished as though swallowed by darkness.

"Give up. The outcome won't change."

With those quiet words, the Western Heaven Demon Lord yanked on the spearhead.

I clung desperately to the shaft as it tried to slip from my flayed, blood-soaked grip.

Searing pain surged through me, but it was bearable.

Pain was something I'd endured more than enough of, both in the past and now.

Whoosh, crash!

I tumbled forward with the spear shaft. A handful of dirt entered my mouth and mixed with the blood.

The ice-cold, foul-smelling floor of the underground prison somehow felt more comfortable than ever.

I'm sleepy.

If I closed my eyes now, I felt as though I could fall asleep immediately.

Maybe after dreaming one long dream for days on end, I would wake up in the modern world instead of Murim.

A plush seat on a private plane bound for Sichuan, China, would be fine. So would my room at Hope Goshiwon, steeped in the musty smell of a bachelor living alone.[1784]

Maybe all of this is a dream.

I had been through too much in the space of little more than a year.

From F-rank Hunter Jin Taekyung to the Third Young Master of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. From a disgrace who dragged his family's name through the mud to the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi.

I had witnessed brutal wars and countless deaths. I had met so many people.

Jin Wikyung, who absolutely doted on his younger brother, and Jin Mukyung, who would have loved to kill his. Hyuk Mujin, who had shared life and death with me while always remaining at my side. Cheongpung, who was both my friend and my rival.

And…

[1784] A goshiwon is a very small, inexpensive room-for-rent arrangement common in South Korea.

Old Master.

My eyelids, which had been slowly sliding shut without my realizing it, stopped.

That's right. The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

He was behind me, and I stood before him.

That was why I could neither fall nor run away.

That arrogant bastard. Taekyung, go on ahead.

H-hyung![1785]

I'll catch up soon.

Three years had already passed, but I would never forget what happened that day.

I had failed to protect the people precious to me, and I had survived through their sacrifice.

Yet even after gaining power beyond anything my past self could have imagined, I had repeated the same mistake.

What do you think? The Dance of the Fire God and Demon. Pretty damn incredible, isn't it?

Jeok Cheongang had been smiling then.

That smile held the joy of avenging his closest friend—and the relief of protecting one little brat he couldn't tell was his disciple or his enemy.

"Yes. It's incredible…"

A small voice escaped through my torn, swollen lips.

The floor of the underground prison no longer felt comfortable.

Feeling its bitter cold and stench, I began to push myself up.

I braced my still-usable right arm against the floor and supported myself on both knees.

My body felt ready to break apart at any moment, and every movement was slow, but I refused to give up.

When I finally stood upright on my trembling legs, the first thing I encountered was a pair of deeply sunken eyes.

"Impressive. Almost foolishly so."

Thud!

My nose broke, and my head snapped backward. But I did not fall or stagger back.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord's hand held my shoulder like a shackle.

"How many times must I tell you? It's already over."

Crunch.

The bones in my shoulder were crushed. The spear shaft slipped limply from my weakened grip.

Horrific pain should have followed, but what I actually felt was faint and distant.

[1785] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

“If you’re waiting for help, you’ve miscalculated. The Sichuan Tang Clan will be destroyed. No, it may all be over already.”

Crack!

This time, it was my legs.

Both shins—the only parts of me still intact—broke at once, and I lost my balance.

Ironically, the only reason I remained upright was that the Western Heaven Demon Lord had not let go.

“Who could possibly come to your aid as they did in Henan? The Sword Saint, who won’t hear this news for another half month? The Sword Saint’s successor, who is likely fighting desperately even now? Or perhaps…”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord turned his head.

Beyond the empty underground prison, shattered and collapsed by our clash, his gaze settled upon a tightly shut iron door.

“Your master, who still hasn’t regained consciousness?”

“Cough.”

“Nothing will change. Today, the Tang Clan, Qingcheng, and Emei will be destroyed. And all of you…”

“Cough!”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord’s words cut off.

A sticky liquid of dirt and blood covered his face.

He clearly had not expected someone with all four limbs crushed to do such a thing.

For one fleeting instant, he froze with his hand around my neck.

I drove my head forward with every ounce of strength I had left.

Thud!

The heavy impact snapped the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s head back.

My internal energy had run dry long ago, and my severe Internal Injuries made it difficult to move even a single finger. I did not know where that strength had come from. I did not even know myself.

And…

It’s not like I have time to think about it anymore.

That had been my final act of defiance.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord rubbed his reddened forehead and let out a quiet laugh.

“You truly are… a dangerous man.”

I answered in a faint, unfocused voice.

“I should’ve cracked your skull.”

“If I hadn’t raised my Body-Protecting Qi at the last moment, you might have.”

"You monstrous bastard."

"Hah. It feels strange hearing that from you."

Unfathomable emotions flickered through the Western Heaven Demon Lord's eyes as he looked at me.

At first glance, they seemed like anger. At the same time, they felt almost like admiration.

Before I could make sense of them, an unexpected roar rang out.

Rumble-rumble-rumble, boom!

The sound had come from neither me nor the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

The underground prison.

The entire vast space, thousands of feet across, shook. Fist-sized stones fell from the ceiling, and cracks spread across the ground.

The noise and tremors soon subsided, but a deep furrow appeared between the Western Heaven Demon Lord's brows.

"…I'd better hurry."

The instant he muttered those words and glanced at the ceiling, heaven and earth flipped.

A moment later, a slight impact traveled through my back.

Boom!

A wall.

He had thrown me against it.

"Cough."

As I spat up blood, his calm voice reached my ears.

"Sit there for a while. I'll be back soon."

"You…"

"If you're still alive by then, I'll take you with me. If you happen to be dead…"

The Western Heaven Demon Lord paused before continuing.

"That wouldn't be so bad either. You're a dangerous man."

"W-wait."

I reached with all the strength I had left toward the Western Heaven Demon Lord's retreating back.

I had to stop him. I had to keep him from capturing Jeok Cheongang and the Divine Physician.

But not a single part of my body would move as I wanted.

"Cough. Bleegh!"

Dark-red blood gushed from my open mouth.

The chunks mixed in with it were…

Damn it. Pieces of my organs.

It was neither my first time seeing such a thing nor an unexpected sight, but crushing despair weighed down my entire body.

My limbs were crippled, and I had suffered a fatal Internal Injury.

In my heart, I had already thrown myself into the Western Heaven Demon Lord's path. But with my arms and legs crushed, I couldn't take a single step.

"Ah."

I raised my head blankly with a groan.

The corridor where the Western Heaven Demon Lord had disappeared stood empty.

The place, devastated by our clash, was filled with traces of craters large and small, collapsed walls, and other destruction.

The prison where prisoners had still been confined half a day earlier was now strewn with bent bars, fallen rocks, and things like broken chains.

The sight made me realize it.

It's over.

I had fought, and I had lost.

I had tried to stop him, but I couldn't. I had tried to protect them, but I had failed.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord had been telling the truth.

The kind of luck we had seen in Henan would not happen again. The Tang Clan, Emei, and Qingcheng were headed for destruction, and Cheongpung could not handle them all alone.

He'll probably die or be captured.

I wished he would run instead, but that would never happen.

That was the kind of person Cheongpung was. Even drenched in blood, he would return to the underground prison to save his Benefactor.

I stared into the darkness beyond, where the exit lay, and laughed weakly.

Damn it…

It all felt like my fault.

Cheongpung. Jeok Cheongang. Even the Divine Physician, who had been dragged into this mess for no reason and would suffer because of it.

At least Hyuk Mujin and Gung Gibang had not come with me. That was the only thing I could be grateful for.

Rumble-rumble-rumble.

A slight tremor ran through the ground, accompanied by a roar that seemed to rise from the depths of the earth.

The sound announcing the end of the match.

There had been no need to go twelve rounds like in boxing. I had fallen after only three, and I would probably die soon.

I'm sorry. All of you.

The capsule’s instruction manual had contained one simple rule.

If you die in the Murim, you die in reality, too.

Everything I had built while traveling between those two worlds was crumbling little by little, just like this underground prison.

“I never thought I’d die like this…”

My vision blurred. The pain throughout my body and the sounds reaching my ears slowly faded away.

Then, just as I was about to slip free of every sensation, an old man’s face suddenly appeared before me.

A chain with marks where something had torn it away.

An unusually tall body, so gaunt that every bone stood out.

I called to him in a feeble voice.

“…Heavenly Power Demon.”

Chapter 361

Step. Step.

There was not the slightest trace of urgency or hesitation in the Western Heaven Demon Lord's stride.

Not even fragments of rock falling from the ceiling to herald the collapse, nor the pitch-black darkness blocking his path, could change that.

The Four Great Demon Lords were beings entitled to walk that way.

Only one thing concerned him: the possibility that he might fail to carry out the exalted Lord of Heaven's command.

Jin Taekyung. That child held me up for quite some time.

He had never imagined Taekyung would delay him for so long.

As Jin Taekyung came to mind, the Western Heaven Demon Lord unconsciously rubbed his forehead.

He felt a swollen lump beneath his fingers, throbbing with pain. It bothered him more than his torn palm or the blood running down his forearm.

A lump.

Jin Taekyung had been hanging there with all four limbs broken.

His internal energy had clearly been exhausted, and his Internal Injury was severe enough that it would not have been strange for an ordinary Peak master to have died already…

"To think my Body-Protecting Qi couldn't completely stop it."

The Western Heaven Demon Lord let out a hollow laugh.

Jin Taekyung had pierced his Body-Protecting Qi with his mere flesh and wounded him. By ordinary common sense, such a thing was utterly impossible.

Two words surfaced in the Western Heaven Demon Lord's mind.

With everything he had.

Prepared to die.

Is this not supernatural powers in its truest form?

It was unbearably fascinating. At the same time, it sent a chill through his heart.

In terms of martial arts realm, Cheongpung, who had already reached the Supreme Peak, was unquestionably ahead.

But Jin Taekyung felt dangerous for a different reason.

He is strong simply because he is human.

Martial arts far beyond what any Peak master should possess. Tenacity that surpassed all imagination.

Had Jin Taekyung's strength not run out when it did, the Western Heaven Demon Lord would have ended his life without hesitation.

But now, everything was proceeding smoothly toward its conclusion.

“Is this the place?”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord stopped before a firmly shut iron door. In an underground prison made up mostly of barred cells, the treatment room’s enormous iron door stood out immediately.

Of course, even without such an obvious landmark, it could never have escaped the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s Qi Sense.

No mistake.

Without hesitation, he brought down a hand blade.

The Force coating its edge sliced effortlessly through the handspan-thick steel door and its locking mechanism.

Shhk! Boom!

The bisected iron door crashed to the floor with a deafening roar.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord strode into the treatment room. He spotted someone and smiled faintly.

“Are you the Divine Physician?”

An old man sat in a chair beside a bed made of Cold-Ice Stone. He opened his eyes.

His voice was calm.

“That is merely an empty title bestowed upon me by the people of this world.”

“I have heard plenty of rumors about you. They say no one knows your name or age—not even whether you are a man or a woman. I have wanted to meet you at least once.”

“And now that you have, what do you think?”

“You look much as I imagined. More like an immortal, even, than those Daoist[1786] bastards who put on lofty airs as though they lived above the clouds.”

The Divine Physician sighed.

“I wish that were true. If this old man were an immortal, I would also possess the power to drive away fiends.”

“Do I look like a fiend?”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord spread his arms wide and spun in a circle.

He had an ordinary face and an ordinary build. Were it not for his long robe, torn to shreds and soaked in blood, he could have been any unremarkable middle-aged man.

“When the Lord of Heaven descends from the heavens to the mortal realm, four loyal servants stand beneath His almighty power.”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord continued in a gentle voice.

[1786] Daoists are followers of Daoism, a Chinese religious and philosophical tradition.

“I am neither a fiend nor an immortal. I am merely a servant who follows His command.”

…!

The sincerity in his voice made the Divine Physician’s eyelids tremble.

The Lord of Heaven? A servant? Whatever the man meant, there could be no doubt that he was utterly insane.

“What nonsense! If you are not a fiend despite slaughtering people without hesitation, then what are you?”

“It is unfortunate. But what can I do? Erasing those who oppose His will is part of my duty.”

“Y-you are…”

The Divine Physician was struck speechless as the Western Heaven Demon Lord gave a quiet sigh.

The thick scent of blood soaked into every word he spoke and every small movement he made, enough to make nausea rise in the Divine Physician’s throat.

“Get out.”

“Hm? What did you say?”

“I said get out. No one is permitted to enter while I am treating a patient. Especially a fiend like you.”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord stared at the Divine Physician’s rigid face, then laughed aloud.

“I thought you were an inflexible physician, but you know how to joke. Divine Physician, the treatment is already over.”

“It is not over.”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord advanced with an amused expression. At the end of his path lay Jeok Cheongang, motionless as a corpse.

“I believe the patient should be moved somewhere else.”

“Before that… you should ask the physician’s permission.”

The Divine Physician rose from his seat, his expression hard.

At that very moment—

Pa-pa-pat!

Dozens of streaks of light shot from his billowing sleeves. Needles large and small flew in straight lines or curved through the air toward the lethal acupoint behind the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s neck.

Yet as he watched them hurtle toward him, the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s smile only deepened.

“How interesting.”

Tudududuk!

He did not move.

The formidable Body-Protecting Qi surrounding him simply did its job.

Dozens of needles struck the Body-Protecting Qi and trembled violently.

“And unfortunate.”

Crunch.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord closed his hand, then opened it again. Invisible energy obeyed its master’s will, seizing the needles and crushing them into a mangled mass.

The Divine Physician might have learned martial arts, but the gulf between him and the Western Heaven Demon Lord was as vast as the distance between heaven and earth.

“I’ll say it again. The treatment is over.”

…!

At the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s quiet declaration, the Divine Physician’s body rose into the air.

Seizing an Object Through Empty Space—a feat possible only for someone possessing terrifying internal energy.

The Divine Physician flew forward as if something had flung him. His face turned deathly pale as the Western Heaven Demon Lord caught him by the throat.

“F-fiend…”

“That hardly seems like something a physician who just unleashed a killing technique should say. Come to think of it, wouldn’t that make you a fiend as well?”

“If I think of the blood that will stain your hands, I will gladly become one!”

Whoosh. Thunk.

The Divine Physician’s palm strike, thrust out with a shout that brought up blood, was blocked with ease.

Crack-crack.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord tightened his grip and broke the old physician’s hand. A strange glint passed through his eyes.

“The Tang Family Head was right. You had it.”

His gaze had settled on the Divine Physician’s hand.

Around one wrinkled finger was something wholly unsuited to a physician.

“So this is the Myriad-Poison Ring…”

A band glowing softly, set with a jewel that seemed to contain both light and darkness.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord gazed at the objective of his mission with rapture, as though bewitched. He carefully removed the Myriad-Poison Ring from the Divine Physician’s finger and slipped it onto his own.

“The Lord of Heaven will be pleased.”

The Divine Physician, who had watched everything unfold, let out a suppressed groan.

“W-what are you planning to do?”

“Don’t concern yourself with it. Your role ends here anyway.”

Whoosh! Thud!

A palm strike that shot forward like a blade pierced the Divine Physician’s abdomen.

His lower dantian shattered. The Divine Physician was hurled across the room, vomiting blood.

“Bweeeeegh!”

“It seems I no longer need the physician’s permission. Wouldn’t you agree?”

The Divine Physician despaired, and the Western Heaven Demon Lord laughed heartily.

It was over. At last, he had obtained the Myriad-Poison Ring desired by the Lord of Heaven and erased from this land three great sects whose influence spanned the realm.

Nothing remained that could stand in his way.

It was time to finish everything and return.

“Come. Let us go together. There is someone who wishes to see you.”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord whispered to Jeok Cheongang, who slept peacefully atop the Cold-Ice Stone, then used Seizing an Object Through Empty Space to draw him closer.

Or rather, he was about to.

Wooooooong.

…!

A low, faint sound, like a swarm of bees buzzing.

Only the Western Heaven Demon Lord could have noticed it. It was a tremor in the air, a faint vibration that slowly drew nearer.

Could the collapse have already begun?

The Western Heaven Demon Lord turned toward the source.

Beyond the treatment room, its iron door now gone, a faint light flickered in the pitch-black darkness.

“What is that…”

He deliberately furrowed his brow.

The next instant, his eyes flew wide.

Wooooooong! Rumble-rumble-rumble!

The vibration intensified. Wind and air tore apart.

And then—

KRAAAAAA!

A massive light shot forward, obliterating the space in its path.

No.

No—a spear wreathed in blue flames.

A name flashed through the Western Heaven Demon Lord's mind, and he could no longer hold back his laughter.

"Supernatural powers! Truly, this is supernatural powers!"

As he threw back his head and laughed, a vast darkness surged up and shot forward.

White Flame, engulfed in blue fire, collided with the darkness.

KABOOOOOM!

Amid the deafening blast that shook the underground prison, a voice rang out.

"The sickroom is off-limits unless you're family or a Disciple. You fucking bastard."

Step. Step.

I pushed through the cloud of dust and moved forward.

Neither the rocks pouring from the ceiling like rain nor the pitch-black darkness before me could stop my steps.

I simply continued toward the one person somewhere beyond it.

What a monster. Not that I expected something like that to kill him.

I couldn't see him, but I could feel him—the immense energy coiled within the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

But it didn't frighten me as much as before.

I calmly clenched my fist. The powerful internal energy overflowing from my entire body felt almost tangible in my hand.

Heavenly Power Demon.

My clash with the Western Heaven Demon Lord had presented him with a new opportunity.

The falling rocks from the collapsing ceiling had broken his restraints, allowing the old man known as a fiend to leave the underground prison for the first time in decades.

And the Heavenly Power Demon's first words to me had been completely unexpected.

You killed all the other prisoners.

Cough. So?

You bastard. Why did you leave me alive?

Did that bother you so much?

Answer the question. I can cut off your breath right now.

Wait a few more moments. It'll give out on its own.

You bastard!

It had been a conversation between two cripples.

One with all four limbs crushed. The other with his Sinews and Meridians already severed.

But the Heavenly Power Demon had one advantage over me.

At least his internal energy remained intact.

I was already dying, and the approaching death frightened me.

I wanted one last conversation with the person watching me die.

I didn't want to kill you.

Why not?

Because at least the man I knew wasn't a fiend.

…!

The way I see it, a good man from the Demonic Cult is better than a bad man from the orthodox faction. If I killed someone like you, I felt like I'd become no different from a fiend myself.

In truth, I had hesitated over and over. Killing the Heavenly Power Demon would have earned me a massive amount of EXP and several level-ups.

After agonizing over it, I had chosen to give that up.

Looking back, it had probably been for the best. The Western Heaven Demon Lord wasn't someone I could defeat with one or two level-ups.

Rather than dying with an unpleasant feeling in my chest, I thought it was better to leave this world feeling relieved.

Well… this isn't so bad either.

The Heavenly Power Demon had stared at me for a long while, his expression complicated, before making me an offer.

An offer I couldn't possibly refuse.

Remembering the Heavenly Power Demon's final words, I swept my hand through the air.

The tremendous wind pressure scattered the cloud of dust, revealing the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

"Your big brother's here."

"Kha! Khahahaha!"

The Western Heaven Demon Lord doubled over like a shrimp, roaring with laughter.

I looked past his shoulder.

A dozen or so meters[1787] behind him, someone stood unsteadily inside the treatment room where the door had been.

The Divine Physician.

His face was deathly pale, but he nodded.

Jeok Cheongang was safe.

Thank goodness. I made it in time.

As I breathed a sigh of relief, the Western Heaven Demon Lord finally stopped laughing and raised his head.

“You’ve changed so much that I hardly recognize you.”

“I got a gift. From someone I never expected.”

“A gift?”

“Yeah. I received internal energy.”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord exclaimed in realization.

“Transmitting Internal Energy Across the Body!”

“Apparently, that’s what some people call it.”

“Did you use that power you spoke of? The one resembling the Essence-Siphoning Great Technique?”

“No.”

“Then you had a fortuitous encounter. Ha-ha!”

“It wasn’t free. He asked me for one favor.”

“A favor?”

“Yeah.”

I quietly nodded. I remembered the Heavenly Power Demon’s words as he transferred his internal energy to me.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord…

“He asked me to kill you.”

Tudududuk. Grab.

When I reached out, White Flame was pulled free from deep within the wall and caught in my hand.

The fire dragon, swollen by three jiazi[1788] of internal energy, spread its wings.

“You’re… dead.”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord smiled broadly.

[1787] A dozen or so meters is about 40 ft.

[1788] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; three jiazi represents 180 years of internal energy.

Chapter 362

The Western Heaven Demon Lord spoke with a laugh.

“I admit it. You are supernatural powers incarnate.”

He had crushed all four of Jin Taekyung’s limbs with his own hands and inflicted severe Internal Injuries.

Crippled? He would have been fortunate if that were all. His wounds had been more than enough to kill him.

And yet the young man, Jin Taekyung, had survived.

He had returned to stand before the Western Heaven Demon Lord with his limbs restored without a single scar and even greater internal energy than before.

Even dozens of sorcerers working together couldn’t achieve a recovery like this.

If this wasn’t supernatural powers—an outright miracle—what was?

The Western Heaven Demon Lord trembled with a sudden surge of excitement and wonder.

Seeing him like that, Jin Taekyung cocked his head and sneered.

“What? Thinking about dying soon making you need to piss? Why are you shaking so much?”

“Do you know how many years I have lived?”

“No. Don’t want to, either.”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord nodded.

“Of course. To be honest, I don’t know myself.”

“Are you an idiot?”

“As I grew older, counting the years began to feel meaningless. Had I gone on living as I was, I might have grown so weary of the boredom that I chose death.”

“Can’t you die now? I’m serious. I’d even get down on my knees and beg.”

“I’m afraid I’m enjoying myself more than ever. Today, I met you, just as I once met the Lord of Heaven.”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord smiled brightly once more.

For him, the past several decades had been tedious years of endurance.

He missed war and blood. He yearned for something he had never experienced before.

Something new that even the Poison King and the Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun had failed to provide.

The young man before him possessed the very thing the Western Heaven Demon Lord had longed for.

“I have only one request.”

The corners of the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s mouth stretched wide.

With his face grotesquely twisted into a smile, he resembled a fiend from the Lotus Sutra.[1789]

“Try to hold out as long as you can.”

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

The ground shook violently.

Black qi streamed from the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s entire body, bearing down on everything around him.

The absolute master, possessed of power that could shatter heaven, brought down his darkness-shrouded sword. Ink-black Sword Force surged forward, erasing the space in its path.

Whooooooosh!

“I’ve got one request, too.”

The young man, Jin Taekyung, tightened his grip on his spear.

Blue flames enveloped the spearhead, illuminating the darkness like sacred fire.

“Try to die as fast as you can.”

KABOOM!

A deafening boom shook heaven and earth, and a massive impact traveled down the spearhead.

Krrrk!

A thrill rushed through me as I stared at the ink-black Sword Force clashing with White Flame.

I have a good chance of winning.

That single exchange was enough to convince me.

Sword Force against Spear Energy.

Ask which was superior, and ninety-nine out of a hundred people would answer Sword Force.

The last one would probably give you shit for asking something so obvious.

But…

This is doable.

During my first battle with the Western Heaven Demon Lord, every exchange had inflicted an Internal Injury and forced me back.

But the immense internal energy the Heavenly Power Demon had given me through Transmitting Internal Energy Across the Body changed everything.

I had retreated only one step.

[1789] The Lotus Sutra is a major scripture of Mahayana Buddhism.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord had once seemed impossibly distant. Now he was close enough to touch if I reached out.

"Internal energy sure is nice, huh? Don't you think?"

Zzzzzzt.

My absurdly massive Spear Energy showed no sign of dimming, even against the ink-black Sword Force.

Beyond our crossed weapons, the Western Heaven Demon Lord regarded me with open admiration.

"I guarantee there has never been a Peak master like you in the history of the Murim."

"Of course not. They probably didn't have more than three jiazi[1790] of internal energy."

I looked him straight in the eye and added,

"Or an ability like this."

Before I had even finished speaking, I was already issuing a command in my mind.

Assign fifty points each to Strength and Agility.

Internal energy wasn't the only thing the Heavenly Power Demon had given me.

Ten Level Ups had healed every injury on my body, and I still had all the Stat Points that came with them.

Whoooooosh.

A dazzling halo of light enveloped my entire body.

The change, perceptible only to me, took place in an instant.

Now it was time to see the results for myself.

"Put some real strength into your 'don't-go.'"

"Don't-go?"

"Your asshole, dumbass."

I was going to make him shit himself.

Clenching my teeth, I poured strength into the hand gripping the spear shaft.

Grrrrrk.

What were my stats now?

I didn't know the exact numbers, but one thing was certain.

At the very least, this body had already gone far beyond the limits of a human being.

The smile vanished from the Western Heaven Demon Lord's face beneath the overwhelming pressure.

"This is ridiculously crude…!"

"Way to hit me where it hurts."

[1790] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; three jiazi are 180 years.

It was crude enough to leave anyone speechless, but it was also brutally effective.

The spear, which had been slowly giving way beneath the Sword Force, began to tilt ever so slightly toward the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

If my martial arts aren't enough, I'll make up the difference with my body.

It was a method only I could use in this world.

At the same time, it proved that the Western Heaven Demon Lord's martial arts stood far above mine.

"Ha!"

Krrrk!

The instant a sharp shout burst from the Western Heaven Demon Lord's mouth, his sword traced a strange arc and coiled around the spearhead.

He was redirecting my attack with the principle of Four Ounces Deflecting a Thousand Catties.

The spearhead plunged into empty air, releasing an explosion of compressed air.

As I staggered, the Western Heaven Demon Lord thrust out his hand.

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh!

Invisible, formless qi.

I couldn't see it, but I could sense it—where it would strike and when.

With that realization, my body flowed into motion.

I bent backward until my back nearly touched the ground.

Pfft!

Five strands of Finger Qi shot from the Western Heaven Demon Lord's hand and grazed my philtrum.

Blood sprayed, filling my nose with its coppery smell.

By the time I sprang upright with a carp-leaping maneuver, the ink-black Sword Force was already slicing diagonally across my body.

Whoooooosh! Shhk!

It missed me by a hair and tore through space.

That alone brought down a pillar three zhang[1791] away and split the bars of the underground prison like tofu.

We were too close for me to swing my spear.

But I already knew what to do.

Inventory open. Store.

White Flame vanished from my hand, and I thrust both arms toward the Western Heaven Demon Lord's chest.

Whooosh!

Scorching heat mingled with my breath.

[1791] Three zhang are about 9.09 m (29.8 ft); one zhang is ten ja.

My palms, imbued with the power of Flame Divine Palm, shot forward. At the same moment, the Western Heaven Demon Lord released his sword.

His hands blurred as he slammed both palms into mine.

KABOOM!

The instant our four palms, each carrying tremendous internal energy, collided, a violent gale erupted around us.

The rocky ground caved in, and the force of the impact blasted apart everything nearby.

But the real struggle had only begun.

Hngh!

I smothered the groan rising in my throat.

An immense wave of energy poured through our locked palms and intertwined fingers, making my vision swim.

What the hell is with this bastard's internal energy…?

I currently possessed a full three jiazi[1792] of internal energy.

In terms of sheer internal energy, that was more than enough to stand shoulder to shoulder with the Sect Leaders of the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families.

But the Western Heaven Demon Lord—the monster standing before me—was on an entirely different level.

This is insane.

Hisssssss.

The heat gathered in my hands slowly faded as darkness devoured the flames.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord spoke in a low voice.

"There is no need to feel so aggrieved. A tower easily built is just as easily toppled."

"…!"

"You are merely a strong child. Such is the limit of those who have failed to cross the wall."

Limit?

That single word made my teeth clench.

I had heard it until I was sick of it.

A bastard raised without a father. A bastard from a poor family. A bastard doomed to remain an F-rank Hunter until the day he died…

Every cutting remark anyone had ever aimed at me had come with the same word attached like a tag.

Even now, after everything I had accomplished.

"I swear, I'm going to…"

[1792] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; three jiazi are 180 years.

A question mark appeared over the Western Heaven Demon Lord's face at my suppressed voice.

Holding back the endless torrent of his internal energy, I forced out the words like a groan.

"I'm going to circumcise that mouth of yours."

"…!"

It didn't take long for the question mark on his face to turn into an exclamation mark.

I ground my teeth and summoned every last bit of strength I had. My body, which had been sliding backward, began inching forward.

Then I slowly bent the Western Heaven Demon Lord's interlocked fingers.

Crack!

Bones shifted out of place, and his brow furrowed.

"When it comes to brute strength, you may well be the best under heaven. But this is as far as you go."

Crack-crack-crack! Thud!

It happened in an instant.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord stepped on empty air, launched himself upward, and drove his knee into my face.

The bridge of my newly healed nose caved in, and several broken teeth spun through the air.

I hurriedly pulled my hand away and wiped the blood covering my eyes.

"Ghk!"

"Your limit is clear."

Whoosh—bang!

A fist hurtled toward me with a violent crack of displaced air.

I raised an arm to shield myself, but the shockwave ruptured my eardrums.

As I staggered, punches and kicks rained down.

Thud-thud-thud-thud-thud!

Chest. Stomach. Legs.

The relentless barrage battered my entire body.

But unlike our first battle, I neither let his attacks land so easily nor fell beneath them.

I've already been through this once. I won't let it happen twice.

I reached into a pale afterimage and caught something solid.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord's arm—the part even the Black Dragon Armor left exposed.

Without the slightest hesitation, I twisted it.

No.

I wrung it out like wet laundry.

Krrrk!

His skin tore, and shards of splintered bone burst through.

No matter how great the master, he could still feel pain. The Western Heaven Demon Lord let out a stifled groan and threw a punch.

His movement was duller and rougher than before.

There was no reason I couldn't avoid it.

Bang!

Compressed air exploded half a span[1793] from my face.

I shot out my arm like lightning and caught his fist.

That was when I saw it.

"Huh?"

Something familiar caught my eye, and I froze.

A ring set with a small gemstone that radiated a mysterious light.

It was almost strange that I hadn't noticed it sooner.

Why does he have the Myriad-Poison Ring…?

In that impossibly brief instant, a thousand thoughts flashed through my mind.

And after the flash of insight came the Western Heaven Demon Lord's attack.

Crack!

I had let myself get distracted in the middle of a fight. Of course I couldn't dodge it.

The blow sent me tumbling across the ground. I staggered back to my feet, clutching my ringing head.

I had taken the hit, but I couldn't stop laughing like a madman.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord frowned.

"Why are you laughing? Have you lost your mind?"

"Lost my mind? You're the crazy one, dumbass."

Still laughing, I waved the object in my hand.

See this?

A fresh new Item, still warm after being stored in my Inventory and pulled right back out.

"What are you going to do if you lose something important? Huh?"

"…!"

A host of emotions flashed across the Western Heaven Demon Lord's face when he saw the Myriad-Poison Ring.

Shock. Surprise. Confusion.

Then anger.

[1793] Half a handspan is approximately 10 cm (4 in).

He looked down at his suddenly empty hand and spoke in a heavy voice.

“How?”

“Who knows? Maybe it’s those supernatural powers you love so much.”

A single brush had been enough.

The Myriad-Poison Ring had left the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s hand and been safely stored in my private vault—the Inventory, where no one else could reach it.

Now I slipped it onto my middle finger.

“You can tell it’s a sacred treasure. Look at that shine. Pretty, isn’t it?”

“Give it back. It is not something the likes of you can possess.”

I raised my middle finger at the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

“What do you think? Looks good?”

“…!”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord trembled with rage.

His usual composure had vanished without a trace.

Seeing him like that finally confirmed it.

“The Myriad-Poison Ring. This was your objective from the very beginning.”

The moment I saw the ring on the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s finger, the first thing that came to mind was the Green Jade Buddha Staff, the sacred treasure of Shaolin Temple that the Blood Lord had stolen during the massacre at Shaolin.

“I figured there had to be something special about it when that bastard clung to it even while running for his life… What, are you people collecting orbs? You think a dragon will appear and grant you a wish if you gather seven?”[1794]

The Western Heaven Demon Lord’s eyes darkened.

“I told you to give it back.”

“Yeah. Fuck off.”

I waved the middle finger wearing the Myriad-Poison Ring right in his face.

At the same time, I muttered inwardly.

Inventory open. Store.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord’s eyes widened as the Myriad-Poison Ring vanished without a trace, as though erased by an eraser.

“You…!”

Rumble-rumble-rumble.

The qi around him churned violently.

The sword he summoned with Seizing an Object Through Empty Space flew into his grasp.

[1794] A reference to Dragon Ball, in which gathering seven Dragon Balls summons a wish-granting dragon.

Tss-tss-tss-tss!

Ink-black Sword Force blazed around the blade, fiercer and more violent than ever.

“This is the last time. Hand it over.”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord was no longer the same now that he had lost what mattered most.

His mind was shaken, and a shaken mind made for a shaken sword.

That might be enough to turn the tide.

“I’ll give you my final answer, then. No.”

The moment the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s eyes sank deeply at my answer—

“You brought this upon yourself.”

At those emotionless words, the ink-black Sword Force coiling around his blade shot forward like an arrow.

But its devastating power wasn’t aimed at my arms, my legs, or my neck.

At the far end of the ruined corridor stood the treatment room.

“No!”

I launched myself forward with a scream.

The muscles throughout my body, swollen to the point of bursting, shrieked in pain.

The internal energy I desperately dragged up clawed at my heart meridian.

But none of that mattered.

As long as I could stop it.

As long as I wasn’t too late.

Old Master!

With the cry trapped inside my throat, I kicked off the ground once more.

KABOOOOOM!

In a world slowed to a crawl, a deafening roar like heaven splitting apart filled my ears, and a blinding flash swallowed my vision.

Chapter 363

KABOOOOOM!

A tremendous roar and shockwave slammed into my entire body.

My vision swam. The ceiling and floor traded places, and my hair whipped around me. My body flew helplessly through the air and crashed into a corner of the treatment room.

Crack!

A sharp current raced up my spine, and something hot surged up from deep within my lungs.

“Ghk!”

Dark red blood spilled across the floor. It was obvious proof that I had suffered a serious Internal Injury.

And I had.

Damn it. How long has it even been since I recovered?

The only consolation was that my injuries weren’t as severe as before and that I had managed to protect the treatment room from the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s Sword Force.

“Are you all right?”

At my question, the Divine Physician lifted his head from where he had curled up in a corner of the treatment room.

He was covered in pale dust, with Jeok Cheongang cradled in his arms. After letting out a quiet groan, he answered.

“Thanks to Young Master Jin blocking the attack, I am safe.”

But despite his answer, the Divine Physician was clearly far from all right.

His beard, white as an immortal’s, was stained with blood. His wrist was bent at an unnatural angle, and through the tatters of his clothes, I could see dark bruises covering his lower abdomen.

That’s…

There was no doubt about it. The Divine Physician’s dantian was ruined. Having lost all the martial arts he possessed, he was now nothing more than an ordinary old man.

No—with his qi-sea acupoint destroyed and his arm broken, his condition was anything but good.

Even after all that, he still protected Old Master…

Not a single scratch marred Jeok Cheongang’s body. The old physician had disregarded his own safety to protect his patient.

“Old Man Dong.”

“This old man is fine, so do not worry.”

The Divine Physician gave me a faint smile, then looked at me with concern.

"More importantly, I am worried about Young Master Jin's condition. This old man will come to you, so please wait just a moment—"

Instead of answering, I reached out.

Formless internal energy flowed from my fingertips and gently pushed back the Divine Physician as he tried to approach me.

"Y-Young Master Jin?"

Before the Divine Physician could finish speaking, a streak of Finger Qi shot through the air from somewhere beyond us and pierced the wall.

It had passed through the exact spot where the Divine Physician's head had been only moments ago.

Shhk! Pfft!

Had I been even one second later—no, even a quarter of a second—the Divine Physician would already have been dead.

I gestured for the physician, now frozen like a rock, to take cover. Then I turned and stared straight ahead.

"That's pretty low, going after a helpless old man."

Beyond the clouds of dust parting like the Red Sea, the Western Heaven Demon Lord finally appeared.

A chilling voice slipped between his lips.

"Low? You were the one who threw away the opportunity I gave you."

His usual composure and refined manner of speaking had long since vanished. Concentrated killing intent burned in his eyes as he stared at me.

"You touched something you should never have touched."

"Fuck, anyone listening to you would think the Myriad-Poison Ring was an erogenous zone. You're an old bastard who can't even get it up anymore."

"…!"

I used White Flame as a cane and pushed myself to my feet.

Every bone in my body throbbed as if it were about to break. Judging by the pain, some of them probably had cracked. On top of that, I had suffered a severe Internal Injury.

Damn it. He was already a monster to begin with.

For a moment, I regretted provoking him.

I had never imagined that a Supreme Peak master like the Western Heaven Demon Lord would resort without hesitation to tactics fit for some Third Rate dark-path thug.

But…

"This must be that important to you. Right?"

I waved the Myriad-Poison Ring I had just taken out of my Inventory.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord, who had seemed impossible to stop, halted abruptly.

“Hand it over at once—”

“You want it back? That won’t be difficult.”

“You intend to negotiate?”

“You catch on fast.”

The Myriad-Poison Ring was nothing more than a strange ring to me—no more and no less.

But it was different for the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

He valued this tiny ring more than the destruction of the Sichuan Tang Clan, Qingcheng, and Emei.

Just like the Blood Lord, who had desperately taken the Green Jade Buddha Staff with him even as his arm was severed.

“Take your lackeys outside and withdraw at once. Otherwise, you’ll never see the Myriad-Poison Ring again.”

“Never see it again…”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord brushed back his hair, stiff with blood.

After a brief silence, a low voice slipped from his lips.

“Ridiculous.”

“What?”

“How could it not be ridiculous? I need only kill you all and take it.”

“…”

“Nothing will change. Not for you, your master, or the Divine Physician. None of you can escape death.”

Even if I explained it, the Western Heaven Demon Lord wouldn’t properly understand the concepts of subspace or the Inventory.

Maybe he was right. Perhaps killing me really would cause everything inside my Inventory to spill out.

But the Western Heaven Demon Lord had overlooked one thing.

“Well, that sounds plausible enough. But you should’ve considered the possibility that I might destroy the Myriad-Poison Ring first.”

My grip was strong enough to crumple steel like paper. Even without circulating internal energy, reducing this little ring to powder would be easy.

“So don’t get any bright ideas. Back off. If you take even one more step—”

Step.

I could not finish my sentence as I stared at the Western Heaven Demon Lord. He took a step forward without hesitation and smiled.

“What? Are you flustered?”

He didn’t wait for my answer. Looking delighted beyond measure, he continued.

“It is truly amusing. You call it a sacred treasure, yet you do not actually believe it is one.”

“What is that supposed to mean?”

“My mistake. I thought you would understand after hearing that much.”

The smile vanished from the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s lips. His eyes bored into me, filled with scorn and contempt.

“Did you really think a mere human made of flesh and blood could do anything to a sacred treasure imbued with such great power?”

“…!”

I looked down at the Myriad-Poison Ring resting in my palm.

A sacred treasure passed down through the generations of the Sichuan Tang Clan. One of the old legends of the Murim. A strange ring said to detoxify and absorb any poison under heaven.

And…

The Myriad-Poison Ring can’t even be appraised by the System.

A sacred treasure.

The single word flashed through my mind, and my heart seemed to drop into my stomach. Something ran down my back—whether it was blood or cold sweat, I could not tell.

Drip. Drip.

My fist clenched reflexively, and drops of blood fell from it.

Even beneath my terrifying grip, the Myriad-Poison Ring didn’t so much as bend. Instead, it dug into my palm like a thorn.

“Damn it.”

I muttered under my breath.

There could be no more compromise. No retreat.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord advanced toward me with a jaunty step.

“I regret what this means for the Blood Lord, but…”

Tss-tss-tss-tss!

“I will have to kill you.”

Black mist poured from his entire body and swallowed the treatment room.

Pa-pa-pat!

The Western Heaven Demon Lord’s figure vanished.

He erased the distance of several zhang[1795] in a single step and swung his ink-black Sword Force. Solid rock split apart like tofu.

[1795] A zhang is a traditional Chinese unit of length, about 3.3 meters (11 ft).

I ducked beneath the attack and thrust my spear forward like an arrow.

Bang!

The spearhead stabbed into empty air, and compressed air exploded.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord caught the shaft with a hand wreathed in Force and clicked his tongue.

“You still cannot let go.”

At the same time, the tip of his foot struck my wrist.

The blow targeted not the bone but an acupoint. Pain like a massive needle stabbing into my veins shot through me, and the spear fell from my grip.

But I didn’t give up.

I’d been ready to take him down with me from the very beginning.

I could not fall from something like this.

Either he died, or I did.

And if even that was impossible, I would throw my life away to make sure we died together.

Without the help of the others, it would not have been strange if I had already died several times.

Now it was time to repay that debt—with interest.

“Hngh!”

With a shout that was almost a groan, I grabbed the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s ankle.

He let out a roar and drove a palm into me.

Boom!

A small explosion went off inside my body.

The foul internal energy penetrated through bone and flesh, tearing my heart meridian to shreds.

My vision blurred, and the strength drained from my legs.

But the hand locked around the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s ankle like a shackle kept moving, driven by the will and instinct carved into my mind.

Krrrk!

The Western Heaven Demon Lord’s eyes widened in pain.

His Body-Protecting Qi could block my Spear Energy, but it couldn’t stop his ankle from breaking beneath raw physical strength.

Damn it, my hand…

Of course, I had to pay the price for my reckless act.

The hand that had seized his Body-Protecting Qi barehanded was blackened as though it had been shocked by high-voltage electricity. On top of that, I had suffered another Internal Injury that worsened my already terrible condition.

At the moment my grip loosened against my will and my body staggered—

"GRAH!"

A belated scream burst from the Western Heaven Demon Lord's mouth.

His ankle had been wrung out like wet laundry beneath my tremendous grip. White bone showed through the mangled flesh, all of it drenched in blood.

No matter how far someone had advanced into the Supreme Peak realm, everyone had limits.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord had displayed unbelievable martial prowess, but he didn't possess infinite internal energy or stamina.

And unlike me, he couldn't recover through Level Ups.

This is my only chance.

I charged at the staggering Western Heaven Demon Lord.

I endured the pain that made it feel as though my limbs were being torn apart and drew up my internal energy. It flowed into both fists, then blazed into flame.

Whoooooosh!

"Jin Taekyung!"

Heat filled the space.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord stood right in front of me, shouting my name through bloodshot eyes.

Pain had made him drop his sword, leaving his hand empty. It was too late for him to block my attack.

If I reached out—if I merely extended my hand—I could deal the Western Heaven Demon Lord a devastating blow.

But then. Then why…

Why did I feel this way?

A strange sensation seized me.

The world had slowed around me.

Everything moving within it was so slow that it made me want to yawn.

It was the same sensation I had felt while facing Hwangbo Eom, the Taeeul Merciless Sword.

But this time, the sensation was incomparably sharper. An alarm rang in my mind, and at the same time, I sensed something chilling digging into the back of my neck from behind.

Ah.

So that was it.

A flash of insight struck me.

I pulled back the hand reaching toward the Western Heaven Demon Lord and twisted my head aside.

At that moment, time—which had briefly seemed to have its pause button pressed—began moving again.

Swooooooosh!

Like a dam bursting, several things happened at once.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord's sword, wrapped in ink-black Sword Force, grazed the back of my neck.

When I thrust both palms forward again, the Western Heaven Demon Lord's fist smashed into my side.

KRAK!

My ribs broke, and blood surged up my throat.

I was hurled away at bullet-like speed. With great difficulty, I raised my head.

Through my distant, hazy vision, I saw the Western Heaven Demon Lord standing upright.

Perhaps it was because of that strange sensation.

Or perhaps it was the pain.

But the face I saw was filled not with joy or satisfaction, but with shock and fury.

"You dodged my Qi-Controlled Sword?"

Right. The Qi-Controlled Sword.

I'd forgotten he could do that too.

I let out a short laugh as I spat up blood.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord's eyes trembled as he stared at me.

"Enlightenment, even at a moment like this… You are someone who must never be allowed to live."

Enlightenment.

So that was what this was.

I flexed my fingers.

The flow of qi and the sensations running through me were clearer than ever.

Along with the pain that already ruled my entire body.

But it's too late.

Step. Step.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord's approaching footsteps rang like thunder.

I watched him draw closer through hazy eyes.

Amid the darkness, with stone dust and debris raining down around him, the Western Heaven Demon Lord seemed to ripple like a shadow deeper than the night itself.

"Supernatural powers. You truly were such a being."

I bared my bloodstained teeth and laughed.

My voice stumbled past my lips like a drunkard.

“Fuck off, you… fucking moron.”

“Farewell.”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord’s eyes flashed red in the darkness.

His hand, wrapped in impenetrable darkness, rose high and slowly descended toward the crown of my head.

Whoooooosh.

And then—

“Do not touch a single hair on his head.”

Fwoosh!

Flames bloomed in the darkness as a hoarse voice rang out, as though its owner hadn’t spoken in ages.

Beyond the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s rigid shoulder, someone was rising to his feet.

“Take your hands off what belongs to this old man.”

A small frame.

But a presence as immense as a giant.

I laughed, and the Western Heaven Demon Lord groaned.

“Fire King…!”

Chapter 364

I had a very long dream. A dream of walking through a hundred years of time.

A vagrant child who had wandered the continent begging for scraps met a master, learned martial arts, and made his name known throughout the world. Then one day, he saw his former self in a young beggar stuffing a dirt-covered dumpling into his mouth.

“What’s your name?”

“…I don’t know.”

“Jangcheon. From now on, your name is Jangcheon.”

They were dark, cold memories. On a day when heavy rain poured from the sky, the disciple who had been like his own flesh and blood left, while his master was left behind.

It was only after a very long time that he returned to the world.

And then…

“You’re an interesting fellow. Who did you say you were?”

“Jin Taekyung. Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.”

He met someone.

A young brat with an irreverent manner and a rebellious gaze he couldn’t hide. Jeok Cheongang hadn’t liked him.

But why had that been?

Whenever he looked around, the brat was always there beside him. Somehow, he kept catching Jeok Cheongang’s eye.

Perhaps that was when his heart had begun to change.

“This old man is already afflicted with the infirmities of old age. Do you truly believe you can learn martial arts from someone like me?”

“Yes.”

“I’ll say this again…”

“I believe in you, Old Master. That’s enough for me.”

Light and warmth seeped into memories that had once been dark and cold.

He never regretted the decision he made that day. Not even when he performed the Dance of the Fire God and Demon for what would be the last time in his life.

“How was it? The Dance of the Fire God and Demon. Pretty incredible, right?”

“Yes. It was incredible.”

Those few words were enough. He wanted nothing more. He had avenged his friend and saved his one and only Disciple.

But the enemy rose again, impossible though it seemed, and that was where his memories ended.

In the darkness where everything had vanished, he wondered.

Am I dead? Where is this place, where neither Yama[1796] nor the dead can be found?

Could I be doomed to wander the underworld?

The question soon faded.

At some point, he lost all sense of time. He even forgot who he was and how he had lived.

No—it was just as he was beginning to forget.

“Old Master. Did you know?”

Someone’s voice echoed faintly in the distance. A voice he had heard somewhere before, speaking words he had never heard that person say.

“I always wanted to call you Master.”

He understood.

At the same time, he remembered the person he had briefly forgotten. The sturdy dam holding back his memories collapsed, and they swallowed him whole.

“I felt the same.”

Fwoosh.

Flames bloomed.

His hands, wreathed in Blazing Flame, tore through the air. The darkness surrounding him in every direction cracked apart, and light seeped through.

The passage was narrow, as though warning him that he was not yet ready to awaken. But without hesitation, he stepped toward the light.

He’s calling me.

Fwoosh!

A blinding white light filled his vision, and the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, opened his eyes.

“Do not touch a single hair on his head.”

His voice was hoarse from long disuse. But when the Western Heaven Demon Lord turned to face him, he felt it.

The heat contained within that small old man’s body.

The flames burning in his eyes.

“Take your hands off what belongs to this old man.”

“Fire King…!”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord let out a low groan.

Of all times, the old monster from Mount Jiuhua had to awaken now.

[1796] Yama is the Buddhist lord of the underworld and judge of the dead.

Under normal circumstances, this might have been manageable. But one of the Demon Lord's ankles had already been crushed, and he had expended a considerable amount of strength.

His opponent, meanwhile, was a Supreme Peak master hailed as the greatest of the Ten Kings.

This is bad. Very bad.

At this rate, he might have to brace himself for a fight that would leave them both gravely wounded.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord had no intention of dying here after failing the mission personally entrusted to him by the Lord of Heaven.

I have no choice.

It wounded his pride as a martial artist, but he would have to settle this by the easiest means available.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord bit his lip and extended a hand. Jin Taekyung's limp body, barely clinging to consciousness, flew into his grasp like iron drawn to a magnet.

He seized Jin Taekyung by the throat and shook him for Jeok Cheongang to see.

"You would do well to stop there, if you want your one and only Disciple to live."

Step.

Jeok Cheongang's approaching footsteps stopped dead.

He stared at the Western Heaven Demon Lord, then slowly parted his lips.

"Have you ever seen such a motherless, fatherless, fucking son of a bitch…?"

"…!"

"Did you listen to this old man through your asshole? I told you not to touch a single hair on his head."

The torrent of profanity left the Western Heaven Demon Lord momentarily stunned.

Then a sneer spread across his lips.

"Oh, did you?"

A stifled groan escaped Jin Taekyung's lips as the Western Heaven Demon Lord tightened his grip.

Crunch.

The faint sound of bones shifting out of place echoed through the underground prison.

Jeok Cheongang's eyes darkened.

"You dare…"

"I have many eyes and ears. They all told me the same thing—that the great Fire King cherishes his Disciple as though he were his own flesh and blood."

"…What do you want?"

The Western Heaven Demon Lord answered without hesitation.

“If you don’t want to lose your Disciple, kill yourself.”

“Kill myself?”

Jeok Cheongang let out a hollow laugh and opened his mouth.

“You’ve got quite a bark. Did you learn it from some marketplace mongrel?”

“They say a master and Disciple grow alike. You sound exactly like him.”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord clicked his tongue softly and tightened his grip.

Crack-crack!

With a louder, sharper crunch, Jin Taekyung’s limp feet thrashed in the air.

Deep furrows appeared between Jeok Cheongang’s brows.

“You bastard!”

“This is my final offer. Accept it, and you can save your Disciple and preserve your martial lineage. Refuse…”

The Western Heaven Demon Lord continued in a chilling voice.

“And I will break this fellow’s neck right now, then fight you in a life-and-death duel. You will most likely be the first to fall.”

This was no empty bluff.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord knew Jeok Cheongang was not in perfect condition either.

That was only natural. He had hovered between life and death for more than a month after fighting the Blood Lord and had only just awakened.

“What will you do?”

Jeok Cheongang’s eyelids trembled.

The old master regarded his Disciple, trapped in the enemy’s grasp, with an indescribable look before opening his mouth.

“Promise me… you will keep your word.”

“Of course.”

It was, of course, a lie.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord had no intention of leaving a single person alive.

Not the Sichuan Tang Clan. Not the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang. Not the Divine Physician, who lay unconscious behind them in the aftermath of the battle. And…

The Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, Jin Taekyung. He, especially, cannot be allowed to live.

The Sword Saint’s successor was dangerous enough, but Jin Taekyung was particularly dangerous.

[1797] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

If they had fought for another half a shichen[1797]—no, even another fifteen minutes—the brat might have attained enlightenment and broken through the wall of the Supreme Peak realm.

It was a great stroke of fortune that the Demon Lord had defeated him before his enlightenment could deepen.

The Lord of Heaven is aiding me.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord barely suppressed the corners of his mouth as they tried to curl upward.

Jeok Cheongang, who had been staring at him, abruptly spoke.

“Is that enough now?”

The unexpected question made the Western Heaven Demon Lord frown.

“What are you talking about?”

“You sly bastard. You’ve become even more of a monster since I last saw you.”

“What nonsense are you—”

But the Western Heaven Demon Lord could not finish.

No, he was unable to.

Grab.

Crack-crack-crack!

Fiery pain erupted from his wrist.

The next moment, reflected in the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s widened eyes were his wrist, twisted as though a giant had wrung it, and a young man whose hand clamped around it like a hook.

“Jin Taekyuuung!”

How?

A roar filled with pain, disbelief, and shock thundered through the underground prison.

But Jin Taekyung did not hear him. Could not hear him.

His eyes were hazy, as though he were drunk, and he moved on instinct alone.

Krrrk!

Irresistible strength tore the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s wrist free as easily as uprooting a weed.

Blood fountained into the air amid searing pain.

For an instant, the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s vision went white.

Then a streak of flame bloomed before him.

“I told you.”

The old master, wreathed from head to toe in blazing hellfire, spat out each word.

“Do not touch my Disciple. Not even a hair.”

KABOOOOOM!

A massive pillar of fire surged upward.

I felt dazed.

As though I might fall asleep at any moment. Or as though I had only just woken up.

Everything felt blurred and distant.

This has to be a dream.

It definitely was.

The fact that I was alive even though I should have died long ago. The fact that Jeok Cheongang had awakened even though he should have needed several more days before he was ready to wake up.

But…

Is this a dream too?

Ding.

SYSTEM

Jeok Cheongang has awakened from a long sleep!
You have successfully completed all related chain Quests. Your noble devotion and sacrifice will be rewarded!
Level Up!
Level Up!
Level Up!
Stamina, Strength, Agility, and Internal Energy have been restored!
A total of three Level Ups has partially healed your physical injuries!

Ding. Ding. Ding.

The bright chime of bells echoed around me.

At the same time, an energy like warm sunlight spread throughout my body.

Broken bones fused together, and torn flesh healed. My damaged organs and shredded acupoints began to mend and settle back into place.

Slowly.

But steadily.

Crack.

My toes stepped on empty air.

Before I knew it, the Western Heaven Demon Lord was holding me by the throat.

My ruptured eardrums should have healed by now, but the conversation between the two men still sounded distant.

What is this feeling?

Hummm. Hummm.

A strange noise beyond description circled inside my head.

Then, in the next moment, Jeok Cheongang's voice pierced clearly into my ears.

"How long do you intend to hang there?"

I don't really know, Old Master. I just… I just can't summon any strength. I don't even know if this is a dream or reality.

I wanted to answer that familiar face, but no voice came out.

The hand pressing against my throat suddenly felt uncomfortable.

Then… I should get it off me.

By the time the thought crossed my mind, my hand had already moved.

It shot out so quickly that even I didn't realize it had moved and seized the Western Heaven Demon Lord's wrist.

Crack-crack-crack!

Hard bones crumpled, and a scream burst forth.

Without hesitation, I twisted and yanked.

Something tore, and blood fountained into the air. Before a single drop could strike the floor, a streak of flame swept past me.

"It's been a while, you reckless little brat."

The voice stretched out, carrying a hint of laughter.

Hellfire flickered from Jeok Cheongang's palm as it passed by me.

The Flame Divine Palm, mastered to its utmost limit, slammed into the chest of the Western Heaven Demon Lord as he writhed in agony.

KABOOOOOM!

A massive pillar of fire surged upward, scorching the ceiling.

The flames seemed as though they would burn forever—until ink-black Sword Force extinguished them.

Sssssssh!

"Die!"

Black clouds shrouded the Western Heaven Demon Lord's entire body.

His lips were drenched in blood, and every vessel in his eyes had burst, staining them crimson.

He looked like a madman, but the power contained within his sword seemed capable of cleaving the heavens.

Whoooooosh!

Darkness erupted from his blade, splitting the pillar of fire as it shot forward.

"Ugh."

A small groan escaped Jeok Cheongang's lips as he tried to draw up his Scorching Yang Qi.

I felt the qi crouched within his still-unrecovered body waver.

I watched it all with vacant eyes.

The darkness rushing toward me through my hazy vision.

Jeok Cheongang's swaying body.

And then—

"Ah."

A single exclamation escaped my lips.

I was here, yet at the same time, I was not.

I could feel and see everything.

Everything surrounding me felt vivid and clear.

So that was it. That was what this meant.

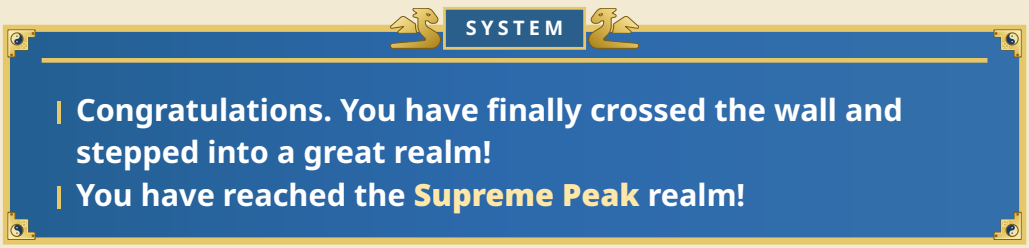
A blinding flash pierced my entire body, from the crown of my head to the tips of my toes.

Everything that had blocked my path until now cracked and collapsed.

The world that had looked hazy, as though I were drunk, cleared up. My dazed mind became as clear as a summer sky.

At the end of it all shone a light called enlightenment.

Ding.



Ding. Ding. Ding.

The bells rang louder and clearer than ever before.

I took a step.

Space vanished, and the natural qi within it surged.

I drew White Flame into my grasp with Seizing an Object Through Empty Space, and a fire dragon roared from its spearhead.

KRAAOOOOOO!

Chapter 365

So this is what it feels like.

Supreme Peak. The realm of the great martial artists chosen by heaven.

I had taken a step into a place that had always been beyond my reach, and I felt boundless freedom.

How could I put this…?

This is incredible.

A faint smile had already formed at the corners of my mouth.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

SYSTEM

The realm of Fire Gate Divine Technique has advanced to the eighth stage.
The realm of Fire Dragon Divine Spear has advanced to the eighth stage!
Flamefire Path has advanced to…!

System notifications rang out without pause, announcing advances in my martial arts, the resulting Level Ups, and completed achievements.

Qi like molten lava surged from deep within me. I felt not the slightest fear of the darkness bearing down on Jeok Cheongang and me.

“Die!”

A scream-like shout. A face twisted like a fiend.

Nothing remained of the genial, smiling middle-aged man he had once appeared to be.

All that stood before me was a monster consumed by killing intent.

Whoooosh!

Ink-black Sword Force, wreathed in savage killing intent, came crashing down like a lightning bolt. One look was enough to feel the destructive power lurking within it.

But…

In the end, you were human too.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord was already exhausted from his injuries and fatigue, and his excessive rage had scattered his mind.

When the mind wavered, so did the qi. A needle couldn’t pierce a boulder, but it could slip through the gaps between grains of sand.

Sss.

One step.

The instant my toes pushed off the ground, the space between us vanished.

I appeared in front of Jeok Cheongang, blocking his path. He shouted urgently at my back.

“You little bastard, get back—”

His voice cut off.

Cyan-white energy surged over White Flame’s transparent spearhead.

Imbued with the heat of Extreme Yang, strands of energy intertwined like tangled thread, drawing together until they finally assumed a single form.

A beautiful yet destructive concentration of internal energy. The exclusive domain of great martial artists.

Force.

I had finally made it this far.

Trembling with exhilaration, I thrust my arm toward the oncoming darkness.

Ssssh!

A single line traced through the air. Cyan-white flame shot forward like an arrow and met the darkness head-on.

Heavenly Strike.

The fire dragon’s claws tore the ink-black Force to pieces.

KRAAAAAA!

Amid the deafening roar, I saw it clearly.

The darkness scattering—and the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s face twisting with rage and shock.

The backlash from his shattered Force inflicted an Internal Injury. Blood and a furious howl burst from his mouth.

“You dare—you dare!”

“What, motherfucker?”

You’re dead now.

I beamed and kicked off the ground.

But someone else was already streaking toward the Western Heaven Demon Lord, one step ahead of me.

A small figure.

Jeok Cheongang had brought his briefly disordered qi back under control.

—You can tell me what happened later.

A short Sound Transmission followed.

—First, let’s beat the shit out of that goddamn bastard.

It was the kind of comment that made me want to hit the Like button.

Or rather, the kind of Sound Transmission.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord was stunned.

How? How can this be happening?

More than a hundred years. Several jiazi[1798] of internal energy.

Everything he had built over all that time was collapsing. Being denied.

And by a mere brat in his twenties!

How is such a thing possible?

What crossed the Western Heaven Demon Lord's mind at that moment went beyond mere doubt.

Supernatural powers.

A young man barely past twenty had manifested Force. Nor was that all. He possessed the strength of a giant and the speed of the wind.

Nothing short of a ghost's intervention could explain it.

And yet…

You will be the ones who die.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord ground his teeth and planted his foot on the ground. At the same instant, a tremendous wave of qi erupted from his entire body.

"Come!"

He roared like a wounded tiger.

No—he truly was a wounded tiger.

Fatigue had accumulated over the long battle, and much of his internal energy had been exhausted. One wrist had been torn off, and one ankle was broken. A momentary misjudgment had even left him with an Internal Injury at the hands of a mere brat.

But even so, one fact remained unchanged.

"I am the Lord of Heaven's loyal servant! So long as that person is with me, even death itself shall pass me by!"

The Western Heaven Demon Lord's shout carried an almost heroic grandeur. Two voices—one old, one young—immediately followed.

"What kind of bullshit are you spouting now?"

"Sounds less like Dark Heaven and more like Darkcheonji.[1799] Hey, try saying, 'Lee Man-ui is a son of a bitch.'"

Jeok Cheongang and Jin Taekyung.

Master and Disciple rushed forward like the wind and thrust out their arms together.

[1798] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

[1799] "Darkcheonji" and "Lee Man-ui" parody Shincheonji and its founder, Lee Man-hee.

KWAANG!

A thunderous roar erupted as a terrifying wave of qi swept through the underground prison.

A moment later, blood trickled from one man's lips.

"Cough."

The Western Heaven Demon Lord staggered beneath the tremendous impact he had taken head-on.

Under normal circumstances, perhaps it would have been different. But for a man who had already suffered serious injuries, the joint attack of two Supreme Peak masters was truly threatening.

Even so, the Western Heaven Demon Lord refused to give up.

I'll bring one of them down first.

The young Disciple overflowed with strength granted by some ghostly aid, while the old Master still suffered from his injuries.

Naturally, the Western Heaven Demon Lord chose the latter.

"Die!"

His leg lashed out like a whip.

Boom!

Jeok Cheongang blocked the terrifying kick with one hand and let out a low groan.

At that very moment—

"How dare you touch him."

Crack! Crunch!

The spear shaft flashed upward like lightning and smashed into the Western Heaven Demon Lord's jaw.

His vision went white. The tremendous force, which even his Body-Protecting Qi could not fully absorb, slammed his jaws shut and severed his tongue.

Pain and impact lifted the Western Heaven Demon Lord into the air.

Waiting for him were two hands wreathed in flame.

"This old man is the Fire King, you son of a bitch!"

With that vicious curse, Jeok Cheongang unleashed the Flame Divine Palm.

BOOM!

The already unstable Body-Protecting Qi scattered. The heat of Extreme Yang seeped through the spiderweb of cracks covering the Black Dragon Armor.

A burning agony seized him, and something hot surged up his throat.

"GWAAAAAAGH!"

Black blood mixed with pieces of his organs sprayed out. Before the blood could even reach the ground, a brief sound of something cutting through the air pierced the Western Heaven Demon Lord's ears.

Ssssh-sh-sh-sh!

"…!"

Dozens of spear shadows filled his blood-red eyes, their vessels already burst.

Cyan-white flames scorched the air as they closed in from every direction. The Western Heaven Demon Lord dragged up every last shred of strength he possessed.

Ssssss!

Ink-black Sword Force surged along his blade and collided with the spear shadows.

Every clash unleashed a tremendous roar and shock wave, shaking the underground prison and churning the Western Heaven Demon Lord's insides.

"Graaagh…!"

But it wasn't over.

"Do you have time to look away?"

The cold voice sounded just as Jeok Cheongang's Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist drove into the Western Heaven Demon Lord's side.

Crack! KRRRUNCH!

It was a full-powered blow from Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King acclaimed as the greatest of the Ten Kings.

Unable to withstand the tremendous impact, part of the Black Dragon Armor shattered along with his Body-Protecting Qi. Flesh burned, and bones crumpled.

"GAAAAAH!"

A horrific scream echoed through the prison.

Even as he writhed in agony, the Western Heaven Demon Lord drew up all his remaining internal energy and unleashed it in every direction.

BOOM! KWA-KWAKWANG!

The ground, ceiling, pillars, and rocks. The manifested ink-colored Force shot out without discrimination. Everything it touched turned to dust or was sliced apart like tofu.

Yet the two people who should have been its targets had already torn through the net of Force and reached the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

Shhk!

The Force gathered on the transparent spearhead slashed diagonally through the Western Heaven Demon Lord's upper body, while the two flame-wreathed palms struck his collapsing chest.

BOOM! KWAANG!

"…!"

The Western Heaven Demon Lord was hurled away like a cannonball in agony unlike anything he had ever experienced.

His body smashed through solid rock and buried itself deep within the wall.

“Ghk, ghek.”

A grotesque groan escaped him as he blinked.

Through his blurred vision, he saw two figures approaching.

Is this how I die?

The Western Heaven Demon Lord thought blankly.

For many long years, he had reigned over others as one of the strong. He had taken pleasure in trampling the weak and stealing everything they cherished.

Every ordinary martial artist in Murim contemplated death at least once.

But not the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

The only beings beneath heaven who should have been able to take his life were himself and the one supreme and exalted being—the Lord of Heaven.

And yet…

“How dare wretches such as you attempt to kill my servant?”

A voice as dry as desert sand slipped between his blood-soaked lips.

There was neither pain nor reason in the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s voice.

His eyes, now filled entirely with blood-red light, were no longer human.

Nor did they belong to the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

“This body has descended from heaven to earth. Kneel before me, from the lowest to the highest.”

At that moment, Jeok Cheongang and Jin Taekyung shouted like thunder.

“No way…”

“The Lord of Heaven!”

Rumble-rumble!

A terrifying energy spread from the Western Heaven Demon Lord—or rather, from the being temporarily borrowing his body—and shook the ground and ceiling.

An ink-colored current writhed like a tentacle from the stump of his torn-off arm, slowly sealing the wound that had been gushing blood like a waterfall.

“Worship me. Submit before omnipotent power.”

Plop. Plop.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord’s body slowly rose to its feet.

As he approached one step at a time, manifested internal energy spread behind him like wings.

And then—

“…!”

Everything stopped.

The trembling. The wind. Even the drifting dust and the flow of the air.

Within that frozen world, a streak of darkness shot forward.

Ssssss!

The darkness approached without a sound and swallowed the two of them.

No—it would have.

Had a spearhead not thrust forward, cleaving through a flow of time divided into ever-finer instants.

Gooooooong—

Wind and qi condensed around the spearhead, then erupted.

Wreathed in cyan-white flame, the spearhead advanced, erasing everything in its path.

One Annihilation.

A blinding flash burst forth.

Time began to flow again.

With it came complete exhaustion and pain that made my entire body feel as though it were breaking apart.

I want to collapse just like this.

My arms, my legs, my fingers, every last strand of muscle—every part of my body felt ready to snap.

But I held on through sheer, superhuman strength.

Not yet. Not yet.

At the very least, I didn't want to fall before he did.

"So just fucking die already, you bastard."

I raised my head and looked at the Western Heaven Demon Lord—or rather, the thing borrowing his body.

Its entire body had been burned black, and a gaping hole had been blasted through its chest.

After inspecting the damage, the corners of its mouth slowly lifted.

"Interesting. Very interesting."

Fwoosh.

The moment it finished speaking, its fingers turned to ash and scattered.

A stray breeze swept past, and its body slowly began to crumble.

But the thing borrowing another man's body felt no pain. Instead, it tossed out a final remark with a laugh.

"We shall meet again."

I barely managed to raise my middle finger.

"Go eat a dick."

No answer came.

Beyond the drifting ash, System notifications announcing Quest success and Level Up rang out.

But the mental fatigue caused by the battle did not recover.

I only wanted to collapse right there.

No—I was already falling.

Grab.

A wrinkled hand caught me by the shoulder.

It belonged to Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King. When I saw his welcome face, I suddenly remembered something I needed to say.

“How was it?”

“What?”

“One Annihilation. It was incredible, right?”

The concern filling Jeok Cheongang’s face slowly melted away.

Then a gentle smile appeared on his lips.

“Yes. It was incredible.”

That was enough.

I closed my eyes with the answer I could no longer voice.

In the distance, the sound of the underground prison collapsing echoed faintly.

Chapter 366

Drip. Drip-drip-drip.

The world lay submerged in darkness so deep that it was impossible to tell how much time had passed.

Black clouds filled the sky, and the rain that had seemed like a passing shower showed no sign of stopping.

Within the grounds of the Sichuan Tang Clan, beside an overflowing pool of blood, corpses had piled up into a small hill.

“So? How are things inside?”

At the gates of the Sichuan Tang Clan, a black-clad man sat astride the corpse of an unknown Tang Clan martial artist. A subordinate who had just arrived from the Inner Hall answered him.

“It still isn’t over. I hear about a hundred of them remain.”

“What? That many?”

“Only half are martial artists. The rest are craftsmen who never learned martial arts, women, or children.”

“Then they should wipe them out and be done with it. What the hell are they wasting time for?”

The black-clad man’s irritation was only natural. Being stuck guarding the entrance while the others earned all the glory was bad enough, but this tedious gate duty still wasn’t over.

“Well, you see…”

“Is there some reason?”

At his superior’s frown, the subordinate hurriedly continued.

“The surviving Tang Clan martial artists are elites, for one thing. But the real problem is that they activated a mechanism array, and it’s holding everyone up.”

“A mechanism array? A poison array shouldn’t be difficult to break through.”

“It isn’t poison. It’s explosives. They had Heaven-Shaking Thunder hidden away.”

“…You don’t mean the Heaven-Shaking Thunder from Pyeokryeomun[1800], do you?”

“It seems so. Because some of them charged in carrying Heaven-Shaking Thunder and died in the explosions, quite a few of our brothers suffered serious losses.”

“Ha. Would you look at these lunatics?”

The black-clad man’s mouth fell open. He had wondered what was happening when those ominous booms began echoing through the grounds, but he had never expected the Tang Clan to possess Heaven-Shaking Thunder from the long-destroyed Pyeokryeomun[1801].

[1800] Pyeokryeomun was a martial sect associated with Heaven-Shaking Thunder, a powerful gunpowder explosive.

He could now understand, to some extent, why the battle had been delayed.

“Wait. Then what has the Demon Lord been doing? He should have been more than capable of slaughtering them all himself.”

The black-clad man’s question reflected his unwavering faith in the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

And for good reason. The Western Heaven Demon Lord was one of the few servants permitted an audience with the exalted Lord of Heaven, and he possessed terrifying martial might.

The black-clad man had only ever heard of Heaven-Shaking Thunder and had no idea how powerful it truly was. But even the grandfather of Heaven-Shaking Thunder itself could never harm the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

“I heard he went to the Tang Clan’s underground prison a shichen[1802] ago.”

The subordinate’s answer made the black-clad man nod.

If the Demon Lord had gone there personally, he must have had a reason, and he would resolve the matter without the slightest mistake. The black-clad man felt not a trace of worry or doubt.

Nor was he alone. Everyone felt the same way.

“Then what about the First Captain?”

First Captain was the position First Fiend, the eldest of the Qilian Three Fiends, had assumed upon entering the Western Heaven Demon Lord’s service.

After a brief hesitation, the subordinate answered.

“He’s engaged in a life-and-death duel with the Sword Saint’s successor in the Inner Hall. No one has been able to approach him since one of our brothers who went to deliver news about the Heaven-Shaking Thunder lost his head.”

“…I see.”

The black-clad man said no more.

What he felt toward the Western Heaven Demon Lord was reverence and trust. What he felt toward First Fiend was fear. He had no desire to voice a careless complaint and meet a gruesome end.

“Um, Captain.”

“Do you have something to say?”

“Yes. The deputy captain asked whether we’d heard from the brothers sent to Qingcheng and Emei.”

“A message arrived just before you got here.”

[1801] Pyeokryeomun was a martial sect associated with Heaven-Shaking Thunder, a powerful gunpowder explosive.

[1802] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

The black-clad man handed him a small tube. The subordinate checked its contents, then looked up in confusion.

“This is…”

“It came from Emei.”

“Is this the only one?”

“Yes. We still haven’t heard anything from Qingcheng.”

“Their message should have arrived by now.”

“That’s true. But you know what the other captains are like.”

The three brothers of the Qilian Three Fiends resembled one another in more than their ugly appearances.

All three were cruel and eccentric fiends who lost their minds at the sight of blood.

Third Fiend, who had been assigned to Emei Sect, was somewhat better than the others. At least he had sent a messenger eagle at the appointed time.

The problem was that, according to his letter, the situation at Emei was not proceeding smoothly.

The Beggars’ Sect got involved.

The letter reported that Beggars’ Sect disciples wielding bamboo staffs and dog-beating clubs[1803] had appeared out of nowhere.

Individually, their martial arts were no match for Dark Heaven’s martial artists, but their appearance held greater significance.

They’ve already caught our scent.

The attack had been meticulously planned. The battle should have ended swiftly and decisively, yet it was dragging on.

Even with this unexpected complication, however, the black-clad man had no doubt that his side would prevail.

He had just shaken off the unease that had briefly troubled him when he suddenly looked up.

“Hmm?”

“What is it?”

“What’s that?”

At the black-clad man’s questioning voice, both the subordinate from the Inner Hall and the thirty-odd martial artists stationed at regular intervals along the walls gathered around him.

Then they saw it.

Beyond the collapsed wall, a streak of wind tore through the driving rain.

It moved swiftly enough to be called a ray of light. Then it erupted in a dazzling flash.

[1803] The dog-beating club is a weapon traditionally associated with the Beggars’ Sect in martial-arts fiction.

Ssshhhhhhk—crack!

The thirty-odd martial artists blinked. When they reflexively touched their faces, their fingers came away sticky with blood.

Slowly—very slowly—their mouths fell open and their heads turned.

In a world that seemed to have slowed to a crawl, they watched their superior collapse like a rotten old tree.

A hole the size of a fingernail had been punched through the center of his forehead.

"…!"

They felt as though they had been clubbed across the backs of their heads.

Their superior was a Peak master capable of making a name for himself anywhere under heaven. Yet a man of such skill had been killed by a strike none of them had even seen.

Before anyone present could recover from that tremendous shock, a figure sprang up onto the wall.

And then—

Ssssh-sh-sh-sh!

In the darkness, death-laden rays of light plunged down like bolts of lightning.

First Fiend was on the verge of going insane.

No—he had already been insane for more than fifty years. Now he was becoming an even greater lunatic.

"Why! Why! How could this be!"

Boom! Boom! Boom!

Blood-red Force surged from the twin axes in his hands, smashing and cleaving everything around him.

The sturdy pavilion where the Family Head of the Sichuan Tang Clan had once resided had long since been reduced to ruins.

A lone figure darted back and forth through the wreckage.

"Ah! Eeng! Eek! Whoosh!"

Cheongpung hopped and skipped around, dodging the Force while making strange noises. First Fiend's eyes rolled white.

"You little son of a—!"

It was enough to drive him mad.

His opponent was a mere pup not yet thirty. He might have been an unprecedented monster who had received the Sword Saint's teachings and reached the Supreme Peak realm in his twenties, but even that could not erase the gulf created by age and experience.

First Fiend was an old monster from two generations back. He possessed immense internal energy, experience, and martial arts of the highest realm.

That was why, although he had been surprised at first, he had felt no real sense of danger.

The Sword Saint raised quite a monster. There was a reason the Demon Lord warned me about him before leaving. But he still has a long way to go before he can challenge this old man. Heh heh heh.

It did not take long, however, for the smile on his lips to twist into fury.

“Die! I said die!”

With a maddened roar, he swept his twin axes down through the air. A vast net of Force unfurled and descended over Cheongpung’s head.

The Red Slaughter Asura Net.

It was one of the signature techniques left behind by the Red Slaughter Demon, who had dyed the martial world in blood three hundred years ago.

That infamous Slaughter Saint, hunted throughout the Central Plains as a public enemy of Murim, had met his end in an unnamed cave in the Qilian Mountains. Three brothers hiding there from the world had discovered the martial arts manual he left behind. After mastering its contents, they had emerged anew as the Qilian Three Fiends.

And now, the perfected Red Slaughter Asura Net—a technique no one since the Red Slaughter Demon had been able to perform—had finally reappeared through First Fiend’s twin axes.

Whoooosh!

That was when Cheongpung’s gaze deepened as he watched the red net of Force close in from every direction.

Shaaah—

A cool breeze blew.

At the same time, purple Sword Force enveloped his blade and sliced diagonally through the net.

Slash!

First Fiend’s mouth fell open as Cheongpung’s One-Character Wisdom Sword dismantled the perfected Red Slaughter Asura Net with absurd ease.

“Y-You knew the Red Slaughter Demon’s martial arts?”

No perfect martial art existed.

Every martial art left by the Red Slaughter Demon deserved to be called a signature technique, but each still possessed weaknesses. Those weaknesses were secrets known only to the Qilian Three Fiends.

Yet the pup before him had identified them precisely.

“Answer me this instant!”

Cheongpung's reply was short and simple.

"What's the Red Slaughter Demon? I've never heard of him."

"…What?"

"Oh, is this about what I just did?"

Cheongpung tilted his head.

"I could just see it."

"Y-You could see it?"

"If you keep watching, you start to understand. You have more internal energy than I do, Grandpa, and your martial arts are more complicated, so it took a little longer."

"It took longer?"

"Yes. But I don't think it'll take that long anymore."

"…!"

First Fiend understood what Cheongpung meant the very next moment.

Ssssh!

A purple flash filled his vision.

Caught off guard by the sudden sword strike, First Fiend hurriedly whipped both axes through the air like lightning.

The Red Slaughter Eighteen Axes lacked subtlety, but its destructive power was second to none. Backed by more than two jiazi[1804] of internal energy, it carried enough force to split heaven and earth.

And yet—

Kagagagak!

Cheongpung's smoothly extended blade guided one axe aside, then struck the other as it swept powerfully toward his flank.

KWAANG!

A thunderous boom erupted, and First Fiend staggered. He had effectively smashed his own axes together.

Even as he retreated, he stared in stunned disbelief.

W-What in the world just happened?

Fwoosh!

Cheongpung shot toward him.

His clear eyes had grown deep and still, while sunset-purple qi surged from his sword.

Whoooooom!

First Fiend stared blankly at the strike descending toward the crown of his head.

Th-This is…

[1804] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; two jiazi are 120 years.

There was no mistaking it.

The Red Slaughter Eighteen Axes.

No—this martial art should now be called the Red Slaughter Eighteen Swords.

In less than a shichen[1805], Cheongpung had not only seen through and dismantled First Fiend's martial arts. He was making them his own.

How can this be!

First Fiend swung his twin axes with a silent cry of shock.

The revelation had slowed his reactions, but not enough to keep him from countering.

At least, that was what he believed—until Cheongpung's sword moved.

Whoooong.

The heavy, destructive sword stroke softened into the fall of a flower. Thirty-six plum blossoms bloomed from its tip and drifted down through the air.

One martial art surfaced in First Fiend's mind.

The Thirty-Six Plum Blossom Swords.

At the same time, he realized—

I can't avoid it.

Ssssh-sh-sh-sh!

Thirty-six plum blossoms—or rather, thirty-six streaks of Force—enveloped First Fiend's entire body.

Blood spread like mist. Slashed from head to toe, First Fiend staggered backward.

Fear filled his eyes as he stared at Cheongpung, whose sword hung loosely at his side.

"Cough. You… You are…"

"Good thing it's raining."

Cheongpung stepped forward, his voice calm.

"I don't like the smell of blood."

Splash.

Cheongpung stepped into a crimson puddle of rainwater and blood. First Fiend let out a piercing scream.

"Anyone! Is there no one out there? Hurry, get this bastard…!"

At that moment, a low voice slipped into his ear.

"Don't call out. There's no one here."

"…!"

"…!"

There had been no footsteps. No hint of anyone's presence.

And yet he was there.

[1805] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

The raindrops pouring down overhead shattered in midair before they could touch him.

“Who the hell are you—”

Slash!

First Fiend’s head flew into the air.

Cheongpung flicked the blood from his sword, then stared with a rigid expression at him, standing tall before him.

“I’d like to ask you the same thing. Who are you?”

His voice trembled faintly as he continued.

“Mungyeong.”

Chapter 367

The warning signs had already been there.

And there was more than enough cause.

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

The ground split apart, and the ceiling shook. The underground prison that had symbolized the darkness of the Sichuan Tang Clan for hundreds of years could no longer withstand the aftermath of one battle after another. It was collapsing.

Along with the countless vengeful spirits of prisoners who had died in the prison—and the three people who were still alive and well.

"…What the fucking hell is this?"

Jeok Cheongang looked around in disbelief.

He had definitely been in a forest before closing his eyes. Then he had opened them to find himself in a cave that might or might not be a prison.

And that wasn't all. He had dragged his still-ailing old body into a fight to the death with some unknown son of a bitch.

Fine. He could understand things up to that point. Jin Taekyung passing out the moment the battle ended? That was entirely possible too.

But…

"Isn't this taking things too damn far? Fuck."

It was the kind of situation that made profanity spill out on its own.

Where was this place? Who was I? Why was the ground splitting apart, and why were boulders the size of people raining down from overhead?

Overcome by a sudden wave of profound regret, Jeok Cheongang nearly ascended to immortality on the spot.

"Goddamn it."

He had no idea what was going on, but first he had to get out of there.

Once he reached that conclusion, he moved with lightning speed.

First, I need to get Taekyung… But who the hell is this old man?

Ah, hell. Whatever.

Jeok Cheongang slung the unconscious Jin Taekyung and the Divine Physician over his shoulders, then shot forward.

Sssshhhk! Boom!

A massive rock that fell from the ceiling grazed Jeok Cheongang by a hair and smashed into the ground. But that was only the beginning.

Boom! Boom! Rumble!

With every step he took, bizarre rocks came pouring down like a rain shower. The spectacle made Jeok Cheongang's flesh crawl.

One wrong move, and I could end up buried here.

This was no small cave.

If a cliff weighing tens of millions of geun[1806] came crashing down on their heads, even Jeok Cheongang could not guarantee his survival.

Especially with the lingering aftereffects of his injuries.

“Cough.”

He staggered as he raced across the fractured ground. Swallowing the blood rising in his throat, Jeok Cheongang smiled bitterly.

I’m in a sorry state.

His limbs were stiff as stone after so long without moving. He was ravenously hungry and utterly drained.

In that condition, he had fought some monstrous bastard who had crawled out of who-knew-where. Of course his body had deteriorated even further. If not for his internal energy, he would have collapsed long ago.

Rumble!

The vibrations suddenly grew even stronger. Jeok Cheongang gritted his teeth.

All right, I get it. Stop rushing me. I’ll find a way out.

There was someone he had to save. His one and only Disciple, who had become light and warmth when Jeok Cheongang wandered through cold, dark memories.

Yes. My one and only Disciple. My Disciple, without a doubt.

His grip tightened on the two men. An unknown strength seemed to surge from somewhere deep within him.

Flamefire Path.

Jeok Cheongang, who had faltered for a moment, became a streak of flame.

Whooosh!

The clash between Jin Taekyung and the Western Heaven Demon Lord had caused the underground prison to collapse, but that destruction actually helped Jeok Cheongang.

The interior had been devastated by their battle. All the walls that had once divided the underground prison into a maze had crumbled, leaving behind one vast cavern.

There!

Jeok Cheongang’s eyes flashed as he raced forward with his movement technique.

Every enclosed space had an entrance.

At the place where he felt a faint breeze blowing from somewhere, Jeok Cheongang saw the entrance to the underground prison—barely wide enough for one person to pass through.

[1806] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to about 600 g (1.32 lb).

Hurry. Hurry…!

Jeok Cheongang hurled himself forward with every ounce of strength he had.

He bounded across the heaving ground and dodged the rocks falling from overhead.

He passed the corpse of the Heavenly Power Demon, the old man lying dead as though asleep with a peaceful smile on his face, and shot farther and faster.

The time was brief, yet felt like an eternity. At last, Jeok Cheongang was about to take his final step toward the prison entrance.

"Made…!"

Rrrrumble! Krrrrrumble!

A tremor and roar equal to every deafening crash thus far combined—no, greater than all of them—erupted at once.

The ceiling collapsed.

Massive rocks that had accumulated over hundreds, perhaps thousands, of years crashed down over the entrance to the underground prison.

Then—

"Get the hell out of my way!"

An azure dragon's roar shook the underground prison as Jeok Cheongang drove his blue-white-flame-wreathed fist into the center of the falling rock.

KWAAAANG!

The superheated energy contained in the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist smashed and melted the rocks.

A roar like the sky splitting apart thundered through the cavern, followed by a sudden blast of scorching wind that swept across the underground prison.

"What in the world…?"

The middle-aged man in black who had hurried over after hearing the roar swallowed a groan at the sight before him.

Rrrrrumble!

Nature itself was collapsing. The cliff hundreds of zhang[1807] tall that loomed behind the Sichuan Tang Clan was slowly sinking into the earth.

The sight was staggering even from more than a hundred zhang[1808] away, but there was a far greater problem.

"D-Deputy Captain. That's where the Demon Lord is…"

The underground prison!

[1807] A zhang here is ten Korean ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[1808] A zhang here is ten Korean ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

The middle-aged black-clad man, the deputy captain of Dark Heaven, felt a chill run down his spine at his subordinate's words.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord. If anything had happened to him…

We're all finished.

Cold sweat rolled down his forehead. He had not been this nervous even when the Sichuan Tang Clan used Heaven-Shaking Thunder.

He barked an urgent order.

"Gather every brother scattered across the grounds immediately!"

"E-Everyone? But there are still Tang Clan bastards—"

"Those bastards aren't the problem. Hurry!"

"Y-Yes, sir!"

The subordinate, frozen stiff, pulled a firework from inside his clothes and lit it. With a pop, a red streak of light burst in the air.

At the emergency signal, the black-clad men scattered throughout the Sichuan Tang Clan began converging on the area.

Within moments, well over a hundred had assembled.

"Deputy Captain. Please give us your orders."

The deputy captain wanted to smash in the skull of the man who had just spoken. The same went for their captain, First Fiend, who had yet to show so much as a hair despite the emergency signal.

Damn it.

The deputy captain's throat bobbed as he stared at the still-collapsing cliff.

The order he was about to give was tantamount to suicide. He was going to send them beneath a collapsing cliff to search for the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

But there was no other choice. He had to give the order.

"The Demon Lord is in there. As deputy captain, I will lead the way, and every last one of you will—"

Just as the deputy captain struggled to continue his command—

KABOOM!

An unidentifiable roar erupted, and the pile of rocks forming a small hill exploded outward.

The deputy captain and everyone around him saw a large figure burst up through the rubble.

"Demon Lord! The Demon Lord has emerged—!"

The shout cut off unfinished.

Crash! Thud-thud-thud!

The figure bounced a considerable distance from the cliff like a cannonball before rolling across muddy water and sludge and finally coming to a stop.

It was an old man, clutching two people larger than himself beneath his arms. Jeok Cheongang stared up at the dark, cloud-filled sky and drew a deep breath.

“Phaaah!”

Fresh air and rainwater seeped in through his nose and mouth.

The refreshing sensation felt as if it were washing even his soul clean. His internal energy was already exhausted, and his body felt as though it had been smashed to pieces, but Jeok Cheongang smiled with relief at having rescued Jin Taekyung.

Then, in the next instant, he staggeringly raised his upper body—and froze.

“…!”

A group stood a little over twenty zhang[1809] away, staring at him.

Well over a hundred men dressed in black, all holding bloodstained weapons.

Jeok Cheongang groaned under his breath.

“…Goddamn it. No matter how I look at them, they don’t seem like good people.”

A voice behind him confirmed his suspicion.

“They call themselves Dark Heaven.”

Jeok Cheongang was not startled by the unexpected voice.

He had been through every manner of hardship and had just escaped being crushed to death. He had already noticed from the change in his breathing that the unknown old man he had rescued was awake.

“I see. Dark Heaven. I knew it had to be those sons of bitches.”

After muttering a curse, Jeok Cheongang continued without turning around.

“Do you know where we are?”

“The Sichuan Tang Clan. Regrettably, it appears the battle has already been decided.”

“…This is driving me insane.”

That brief remark summed up Jeok Cheongang’s feelings.

He did not have enough time to wonder how any of this had happened.

“What’s your name?”

“Dong Feng. My name is Dong Feng.”

“Your sobriquet?”

“I am not a martial artist, so naturally I have none.”

“Your dantian was damaged. You’re not a martial artist?”

“I only learned a little because my Master would not stop pestering me. Medicine was always where my heart lay.”

Jeok Cheongang’s eyebrow twitched.

[1809] A zhang here is ten Korean ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Despite his severe injuries, the old man's calm bearing and manner of speech carried an unmistakable air of wisdom. Why did they remind Jeok Cheongang of a physician whose medical arts were said to have reached the divine realm?

"The Divine Physician?"

"I am merely an old medical apprentice of no consequence."

Jeok Cheongang let out a hollow laugh at the Divine Physician's answer. At last, he thought he understood what had happened.

"Thank you for waking an old man who was at death's door."

"You awakened on your own. Your will was simply that strong, Sir Jeok."

"I had no choice. Some reckless fool woke me up."

"That very reckless fool crossed the Central Plains to find me and begged for my help. He said he would do anything if it meant saving you, Sir Jeok."

Jeok Cheongang turned his head. Jin Taekyung lay collapsed beside him, covered in blood and mud.

"…What a foolish boy."

If he could wake the boy now, he would.

Perhaps then they could have one final conversation.

But Jin Taekyung had exhausted every last ounce of strength. He would not awaken. Jeok Cheongang knew that even without the Divine Physician telling him.

Yes. Perhaps… perhaps this is for the best.

Jeok Cheongang slowly rose to his feet. Ignoring the pain stabbing through his entire body, he addressed the Divine Physician behind him.

"Still have any strength left?"

"I did in my younger days. Before meeting my Master, I worked as a carpenter."

"That's an unusual past for the Divine Physician. What about now?"

"I am seventy years old."

"Your dantian is damaged, so it won't be easy, but squeeze out every last bit of strength you have. Run as far away as you can."

"With Young Master Jin?"

"I'm glad you understand."

After a brief silence, the Divine Physician spoke.

"Sir Jeok… You intend to throw your life away."

"Throw it away?"

A faint smile touched the corner of Jeok Cheongang's mouth. His gaze settled on the approaching men in black.

"Do you know why a flame dies out?"

Jeok Cheongang did not wait for the Divine Physician's answer.

Muddy water splashed beneath his advancing feet. At some point, the rain that had seemed as if it would never end had stopped.

His voice rang out, clear and unburdened.

“Because there is nothing left to burn. That is why it slowly dies out atop the ashes.”

Jeok Cheongang was ready to kindle his final flame.

He felt neither fear nor anger at the death striding toward him.

Only regret.

He would no longer be able to remain by his Disciple’s side.

“Take care of Taekyung for me.”

Just as Jeok Cheongang stepped forward after making that heartfelt request, the Divine Physician spoke.

“After witnessing countless births, aging, sickness, and deaths, I began to wonder. Does the underworld truly exist? If so, who is this fellow called Yama?[1810] And if I go there, will I meet the patients I failed to save?”

“…?”

“Whenever such questions troubled me, my Master would say, ‘The underworld must be full from all the people you sent ahead of you. You should ascend to the celestial realm instead and keep the immortals company.‘”

The Divine Physician looked at Jeok Cheongang and continued quietly.

“Sir Jeok. The underworld is full. Please wait a little longer.”

“…!”

At that moment, Jeok Cheongang felt as if every hair on his body had stood on end, and he raised his head.

High above, bathed in sunlight streaming between the retreating dark clouds, stood a boy.

No. Not a boy. That man is…!

Those eyes were clear and bright like a boy’s, yet the gaze itself was ancient and seasoned, betraying no emotion whatsoever.

Jeok Cheongang had seen those eyes only once, a very long time ago.

That was precisely why he could never forget the feeling they evoked.

The boy’s appearance brought someone to mind, and Jeok Cheongang cried out in shock.

“The Slaughter Saint…!”

[1810] Yama is the lord who judges the dead in Buddhist traditions.

Chapter 368

The boy—or rather, the “he” bearing the name Mungyeong—looked down at the ground below his feet.

Countless eyes stared up at him in disbelief. Among them was a familiar face.

They had met only once, long ago, but it was not difficult to recognize him.

“It has been a long time, Fire King.”

At his greeting, Fire King Jeok Cheongang’s eyes trembled violently.

“So it really was you…”

The greatest assassin under heaven. He had inspired not merely condemnation and contempt in countless martial artists, but awe. Then one day, he had vanished without a trace, never to appear again.

At least, not until moments ago.

“Why are you here…?”

“A great deal has happened. A great deal indeed. Wouldn’t you agree?”

The question was directed at an old man. He gazed at the Divine Physician—or rather, Dong Feng—with indescribable eyes before opening his lips.

“Thank goodness. I wasn’t too late.”

His voice rang out from every direction.

Six-Harmonies Voice Transmission.

A shudder ran through everyone at the unfathomable realm of martial arts displayed before them. The old physician quietly shook his head.

“You were too late.”

His next words carried a note of regret.

“Too late to turn back the years that have passed.”

“What can be done? Once water is spilled, it is not easily gathered again.”

“Do you not regret it?”

“Regret…”

At his Disciple’s words, he raised his head and looked toward the sky.

The rain that had seemed as though it would fall forever was gone, as were the dark clouds that had blotted out the sun. All that remained was the vast azure heaven.

Is this what you intended?

He posed the question to someone who might be looking down upon the mortal realm from above.

But no answer came.

Just as it never had.

What a damned thing this is.

He slowly closed his eyes. In the pitch-black darkness, memories steeped in blood and struggle flashed past.

He had been raised as an assassin and lived as one. His inborn karma was that of an assassin, so he killed—but he had been born human, and he hated killing.

That was why, near the end of the Great War that had stained the continent with blood, the aging assassin had buried his weapons and chosen to live as a physician.

But…

Had it come to this after all?

With a quiet murmur, he opened his eyes.

A boy's hands, white and soft.

Returned to Youth had transformed his flesh several years ago, but even that could not erase the scent of blood steeped into his hands.

"I lived as a physician for more than forty years. I wished to die as one."

His voice, laden with immense internal energy, struck their ears like thunder. The black-clad men staggered as though the sound had shaken their very souls.

"And yet, why have you come here?"

His killing intent made every hair stand on end. The deputy captain, frozen as he stared at the figure in the sky, spoke in a trembling voice.

"E-Even if you truly are the Slaughter Saint, this is no concern of yours."

"No concern of mine?"

He muttered the words in a low voice before throwing down the travel bag he had been holding.

Thud!

Something bounced out of the bag as it struck the ground and rolled to the deputy captain's feet.

"T-This is…"

They were the severed heads of two men. Though they belonged to different people, their bulging eyes and twisted expressions looked almost identical.

Like twins born at the same hour on the same day.

The deputy captain's gaze fixed on one of them.

"Captain!"

As the deputy captain stared in horror at First Fiend's severed head, the Slaughter Saint slowly spoke.

"One question. Was the one at Qingcheng the second or third of the Qilian Three Fiends?"

"…!"

Only then did the deputy captain understand.

Why no word had come from the Qingcheng Sect—and where the brothers who had failed to return after seeing the emergency signal had gone.

Only one path remained. The realization struck like lightning, and he unleashed a shout imbued with internal energy.

“Everyone, attack! Kill hi—”

Slash!

The deputy captain’s shout was cut short.

A breeze brushed his neck, and suddenly someone was standing behind him.

Can this truly be… the movement of a human being?

That was the last question to cross his mind.

He had failed to recognize the Ghost Illusory Slaughter Step performed by the greatest assassin under heaven—or rather, the greatest assassin in all history.

Only death awaited him.

Fwoosh!

Blood erupted from the severed neck in a fountain. A figure brushed past the collapsing body and took another step, stirring a wind heavy with the scent of blood.

Slash. Slash. Slash!

The heads of the black-clad men who had watched their superior die in a daze flew into the air.

Before the streams of blood could reach the ground, something pale and ghostlike swept through them.

“It was the life I wanted so desperately.”

Murmuring under his breath, he extended both hands. Long, slender threads streamed from his ten fingers.

Threads of Force—beautiful and destructive.

“And yet, why did you…”

Whoosh!

When his ten curved fingers slashed downward through the air, Force tore through space.

Everything that stood in its way was cut apart and split open. Shattered armor and weapons, limbs and heads, flew in every direction.

In a world brought to a standstill by blood and death, only one person moved freely.

“Did you wake me?”

Consumed by sorrow and fury, he was no longer the cheerful boy or the physician who had passed the two-character name Divine Physician down to his Disciple.

He had returned to the person he had been before earning the name Divine Physician, before meeting the young carpenter who had fallen into grief after losing his wife and children to an epidemic, and before burying his weapons and leaving the Murim.

“The Slaughter Saint…!”

Someone screamed the name.

His eyes had sunk deeper than the abyss. He flung out both arms, and the wind—now a raging storm—swallowed more than a hundred black-clad men.

Kwaaang!

A high hill stood east of the Sichuan Tang Clan.

From there, one could see the entire Tang Clan estate at a glance. A small watchtower stood atop it, and martial artists had once taken turns standing guard.

Once.

Drip. Drip.

Drops of blood fell from the watchtower and dampened the grass. Some slid down the hill and touched someone’s hand.

Its back was deeply wrinkled, and its nails had turned green from long years spent practicing poison arts.

The hand belonged to Tang Sadok, the current Family Head of the Sichuan Tang Clan—the Myriad-Poison Asura.

“Cough.”

Blood sprayed from between his parched lips. His eyes, usually cold and forceful, looked ready to go out at any moment.

“Is this how it ends?”

Tang Sadok murmured faintly.

Everything was racing toward its end. His life. The glorious history of the Sichuan Tang Clan.

“Our family, built over centuries… brought down in a single day.”

Tang Sadok’s lament rang hollow. He no longer possessed the strength even to feel anger or sorrow.

His limbs crushed and his internal injuries severe, all the old Family Head could do was lean against an unknown tree and watch his clan perish.

This is my final gift to you.

The smiling face of a middle-aged man flashed before Tang Sadok’s eyes.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord had not kept his promise. To him, the destruction of the Sichuan Tang Clan had been a foregone conclusion from the very beginning.

“Urgh… Blergh!”

The rage flaring within him like wildfire worsened his internal injuries. Tang Sadok vomited nearly half a gallon of blood, then gasped for breath.

"I'm sorry. I'm sorry…"

It was an apology to the ancestors of the Sichuan Tang Clan. To the innocent members of his household who had lost their lives because they had been saddled with an unworthy Family Head. And to Jin Taekyung and his companions, who had likely already met gruesome deaths at the hands of the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

Of course, none of them could hear Tang Sadok's voice.

If we meet in the afterlife, I will apologize to you myself.

Just as Tang Sadok murmured those words inwardly—

Rustle.

The bushes stirred, and he sensed something approaching.

No. It was not human.

Only when the strange presence had drawn right up to him did Tang Sadok realize who it belonged to.

Hiss. Hiss.

A flicking tongue. A horned, triangular head. A pure-white snake burrowed into Tang Sadok's arms.

"Ha… hahaha."

Tang Sadok laughed weakly, both happy and hollow.

"So it was you."

Hisss.

The Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake, Mimi, hissed as if answering its master. Its cold tongue licked the beard matted with blood.

"Clever creature. How did you find me all the way out here?"

Tang Sadok gazed at his pet snake through clouded eyes.

He had let Mimi loose because he was worried the snake might be injured in the melee. He had never thought they would meet again like this.

Nor had he imagined their final farewell would happen this way.

Rumble!

A tremendous roar shook the hill. The earth rose, and the branches of the trees trembled.

Tang Sadok raised his head and tried to find the source, but his failing eyesight could no longer make out what was happening.

He could infer only one thing.

Has the time come?

It was a roar on an entirely different scale from Heaven-Shaking Thunder.

At last, the destruction of the great Sichuan Tang Clan had reached his doorstep.

Tang Sadok slowly closed his eyes, then opened them again.

“Leave.”

Hiss?

The snake’s triangular snout tilted to one side.

“This old man has little time left. Neither does the Tang Clan. If you stay here, you will be caught up in this calamity as well.”

Tang Sadok was the Family Head of the Sichuan Tang Clan. Even if the Western Heaven Demon Lord did not come himself, someone would certainly come to confirm whether he was alive or dead.

Tang Sadok could easily imagine what those vicious men would do if they saw the Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake guarding its master’s side.

“So go. Hurry!”

He wanted to shout, but the voice he forced out was so thin it seemed ready to break apart.

Yet the spirit creature that had spent so many years beside Tang Sadok understood the final wish of the man who had been both its master and its friend.

Drip. Drip.

Damp drops fell onto Tang Sadok’s wrinkled hand.

Leaving behind a few tears, Mimi slithered away and disappeared, the snake’s white body gliding across the ground.

As her presence receded into the distance, a bitter smile briefly touched Tang Sadok’s lips.

“Yes. Go carefully.”

In his youth, he had roamed the battlefields. After the war, he had devoted his life to helping his father, the Poison King, rebuild the Sichuan Tang Clan.

He had always been expected to remain cold and meticulous. He had no friend with whom he could share his heart, no lover, and no child of his own blood.

Had that spiritual creature not remained by his side all those years, he could never have endured the loneliness.

From today onward, your name is Mimi. Tang Mimi.

On the day he first encountered the tiny Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake, Tang Sadok had given her the Tang family name.

They shared neither blood nor even species, but Tang Mimi was a member of the Sichuan Tang Clan, recognized as such by its Family Head.

I have lost everyone, and you alone are the one I send away alive. Hahaha.

Tang Sadok let out a hollow laugh and blinked.

Through his fading senses, the roar and someone’s screams echoed faintly from below the hill.

It must have been the final struggle of those fighting to stave off the clan's destruction.

This old man is here, too. I, Tang Sadok, Family Head of the great Sichuan Tang Clan, am here! Come to me!

The cry, as if he were coughing up blood, only hovered at the tip of his tongue.

Tang Sadok felt the strength slowly drain from his entire body. His heavy eyelids sank lower, little by little.

I'm tired.

What if he simply closed his eyes and fell into a deep sleep?

If he took a short nap and awoke in the grand armchair in the Family Head's Hall, perhaps he would be able to see the familiar faces of his family.

How wonderful it would be if everything that had happened—including his father's death—were nothing more than a Butterfly Dream.[1811]

Yes. If only it were.

His trembling eyelids slowly sank shut.

No—they were just about to close.

"Mimi! Quick Attack!"

Hisssssss!

"…?"

What the hell is this bullshit?

Tang Sadok's eyes flew open.

His vision suddenly cleared, revealing a young man racing toward him and Mimi's white body shooting through the air like an arrow.

"Y-You?"

"Wow! Wild Grandpa Tang spotted!"

Tang Sadok blinked at Cheongpung, who was grinning brightly despite the blood covering his face.

"What… what is going on? How did you…?"

Cheongpung answered energetically.

"Mimi! Whirlwind!"

Whirrrrr!

If Tang Sadok had possessed even a shred of strength, he would have cursed him out.

Cheongpung and Mimi realized their mistake too late and bowed their heads.

"Ah, I'm sorry."

Hiss.

[1811] The Butterfly Dream alludes to the ancient Chinese philosopher Zhuangzi's dream that he was a butterfly, after which he wondered whether he was a man who had dreamed of being a butterfly or a butterfly dreaming of being a man.

"…"

Tang Sadok forgot that he had been half dead only moments ago and stared blankly at the man and snake before him. At last, he managed to speak.

"Our family… What happened to our family?"

"They all died."

"…!"

"Oh. Not the Tang Clan. I meant Dark Heaven's black-clad men."

You should have said that first!

As Tang Sadok choked on shock and fury, Cheongpung pressed a finger to his Mingmen acupoint. Warmth like a spring day seeped into his body.

"Cheongpung! True Qi Guidance!"

This bastard is going to keep this up until the very end…

Tang Sadok wanted to ask what had happened, but this time he could not resist the drowsiness washing over him.

Just before his eyelids closed, a voice as gentle as a spring breeze reached his ears.

"It's all over now. Rest easy."

It was the voice that announced the end of a day longer and darker than any other.

Chapter 369

“Search every inch of the place. If you half-ass it like you do your martial arts training, you’ll catch hell.”

“Oh, come on, Senior Brother. Anyone listening would think that was actually true. You really will say anything in front of the kids.”

“You spend every waking hour running around pleasure houses… Do I need to beat you senseless right here before you come to your senses?”

“Fine, fine. I get it.”

Even after his Senior Brother’s scolding, Hwangso’s scowl refused to budge.

He was a first-generation disciple of the Gongdao Sect, a martial sect in Sichuan. He had been called out for this mission along with around thirty second- and third-generation disciples.

Damn it. Five days of this bullshit.

Hwangso grumbled inwardly.

Born into a fairly prosperous merchant family, he had grown up wanting for nothing.

It was irritating enough that his father had forced him onto the path of a martial artist—a path that had never been part of his plans—simply because he wanted connections in the Murim. Five days of sleeping rough in the wind and dust had worn away what little patience Hwangso had left.

Whew. I heard the new courtesan at Tengwang Pavilion is an absolute beauty…

Just as Hwangso’s thoughts raced toward his favorite pleasure house—

“You brat! After everything I just said, you’re still letting your mind wander?”

“Ah, yes, I understand. I said I understand!”

Startled by his Senior Brother’s sudden, tiger-like roar, Hwangso trudged off.

His Senior Brother clicked his tongue at the sight, as if he found him hopeless.

“If you don’t want to die a senseless death, keep your wits about you. Surely you understand what kind of situation we’re in.”

“I understand perfectly. Aren’t we going through all this trouble to catch some fiend who isn’t even here?”

“What do you mean, he isn’t here?”

“You know what I mean. That Third Fiend or whatever. The bastard ran off ages ago, and we’re searching for him in completely the wrong place.”

His Senior Brother’s face stiffened at Hwangso’s sullen reply.

“Watch your words. Not since the Great Faction War has the Sichuan Murim united to cast a net over heaven and earth like this. Everything happens for a reason.”

“Who said there wasn’t a reason? I’m not deaf. I’ve heard it all already.”

Hwangso had heard why the net over heaven and earth had been cast so many times that his ears hurt.

Dark Heaven or whatever they were called had invaded and laid waste to the Tang Clan, Qingcheng, and Emei.

At the head of the attack had been a peerless fiend who had slain the Poison King and the Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun single-handedly. The Qilian Three Fiends, old monsters from two generations ago, and hundreds of Fiends had split into three groups and stained Sichuan's three foremost sects with blood.

And everyone in Sichuan, Hwangso included, knew how that day—now being called the Three-Gate Bloodbath—had ended.

"They defeated them for all to see, didn't they? Every fiend who could be called a leader was killed except for one, and the rest of the foot soldiers scattered and ran. Isn't it over?"

"…Whew."

His Senior Brother's lips moved as if he were about to reply, but he merely sighed.

Whatever he said would go in one ear and out the other. His Junior Brother had no interest in learning how much luck and sacrifice had gone into their victory.

The unknown master who suddenly appeared and saved Qingcheng Sect. The countless Beggars' Sect disciples and nearby martial sects who rushed to Emei's aid when it was in danger. And…

If not for them, who had saved the Sichuan Tang Clan from annihilation, the three illustrious sects with their long histories would have vanished from the Murim five days ago.

The Three-Gate Bloodbath had been a large-scale assault carried out with such thoroughness and suddenness that it had sent a tremendous shock through the entire orthodox martial world.

And this brat calls himself a martial artist with such shallow thinking. Even if he did join only because circumstances forced him to…

Hwangso bristled when his Senior Brother shook his head.

"What?"

"Enough. Pick ten men or so and search beyond that hill."

"Again? We've already searched that place several times over the past five days…"

"The area assigned to our sect must be searched a hundred times—a thousand, if necessary. I'll search the nearby undergrowth myself, so stop complaining and do as you're told."

His Senior Brother cut him off so firmly that Hwangso clamped his mouth shut.

I need to talk to Father and get back home as soon as possible. Seriously, why would the fiend who fled Emei show up here?

Thousands of people had been mobilized for the net over heaven and earth, and it had lived up to its name.

Most of Dark Heaven's remnants who had fled after their defeat in the Three-Gate Bloodbath had already been hunted down or captured.

Only the Third Fiend—the youngest of the Qilian Three Fiends who had attacked Emei—remained. The area assigned to the Gongdao Sect lay near Chengdu, practically the heart of Sichuan.

I heard the fiend isn't in good shape, either. Why would he walk straight into the tiger's jaws when he could head somewhere sensible like Tibet or Yunnan?

Hwangso's complaint was not entirely unreasonable.

It might be darkest beneath the lamp, but there was still no reason for a fiend branded an enemy of the Murim to break through such a dense net over heaven and earth and head toward Chengdu.

If there were even the slightest chance of that, why would I be here? The Qingcheng Daoists would have been guarding the place.

This was all because his Senior Brother was so rigid that it went beyond stubbornness and became downright suffocating.

Muttering a quiet curse, Hwangso crooked a finger at the third-generation disciples standing around blankly.

"You there, the big-nosed one. Yes, you. Everyone from you to that big-eared fellow over there. Ten of you—follow me."

What else could he do? When they told him to dig, he had to dig.

But as Hwangso left to search, with his Senior Brother's contemptuous gaze boring into his back, his head was filled with nothing but idle thoughts.

Just wait. The second this is over, I'm going straight to Tengwang Pavilion and having myself one hell of a time.

With his mind elsewhere, there was no chance of him conducting the search properly.

The third-generation disciples watched Hwangso for cues and lazily scanned their surroundings. During that sloppy search, not one of them noticed the faint traces of blood on the leaves.

Thank goodness they're all idiots. At this rate, I have nothing to worry about.

The Third Fiend let out a sigh of relief and extended one foot.

Sssshk.

His body shot forward, skimming over the leaves.

A master of considerable skill might have detected him if one were nearby, but judging by the level of everyone he had encountered so far, there was no chance of that.

They never imagined I would double back toward Chengdu.

The thrill of having completely deceived the orthodox faction lasted only a moment. Anger and killing intent surged from deep within the Third Fiend's chest.

If it hadn't been for those fucking bastards…!

Five days ago, everything had gone smoothly when he led his subordinates in the attack.

The death of the Sect Leader, the Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun, and the Elders had left a tremendous gap in Emei's forces, and the Dark Heaven martial artists under the Third Fiend's command had driven straight into it like a massive harpoon.

Then, amid the brutal battle overflowing with blood and death, they appeared.

You worthless pieces of trash, lower than dogs!

One filthy beggar.

Hyuk Mujin, Vice Squad Leader of the Jin Dragon Squad of the great Jin Family of Taiyuan, the right arm and little toe of the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi, Jin Taekyung, has arrived!

A young man whose name seemed to be either Right Arm or Little Toe—it was hard to tell.

Senior Sister! I'm here!

And a middle-aged nun who appeared to be a disciple of Emei Sect.

At first, even the Third Fiend had been dumbfounded by their fearless entrance.

What? Worthless pieces of trash, lower than dogs? Does this filthy beggar have a death wish? Just wait. This old man will tear you limb from limb and—

The Third Fiend approached with a contemptuous snort, only to swallow the rest of his words.

Behind the fearless young beggar, more filthy beggars than he could count were rushing forward.

A veritable wave of beggars!

B-Beggars' Sect?

The response had come far too quickly for the Third Fiend.

Not even half a day had passed, yet more than a thousand Beggars' Sect disciples—not dozens, not even a hundred—had assembled and rushed to Emei's aid.

The Successor Beggar commands you! Beat those dogshit bastards to death like dogs!

Armor! They're wearing armor!

Hit the exposed parts! Crush their balls!

An Emei nun charged them head-on without regard for her life, while countless Beggars' Sect disciples surged in endlessly from behind.

The Third Fiend and the black-clad men under his command fought like mad, cutting down enemy after enemy, but the tide of battle had already begun to turn against them.

Brothers of the Beggars' Sect! Never retreat!

Waaah!

"Avenge Gaettong[1812]!"

The sheer force of their human-wave assault was horrifying.

Cut down one beggar, and two did not rush forward in his place. Five or ten did.

And if he dredged up every last ounce of strength and cut them down too? There was no need to worry about what came next. A club flying in from somewhere would smash his balls while an iron staff cracked the back of his skull.

The dead had no future.

Guh…!

Like a body slowly soaked through by drizzle, the black-clad men collapsed one after another as cold corpses.

Even the Third Fiend, who should have turned the tide of battle, had no time to look after his subordinates.

Form the Demon-Subduing Dragon-Taming Formation!

The Seven Fairies, Emei Sect's finest masters, used a combined formation to bind the Third Fiend's feet.

Even when seriously wounded, they never retreated. They attacked as if their lives meant nothing, and the Third Fiend gradually grew exhausted from the mounting fatigue and anxiety.

The Third Fiend's face twisted violently as he recalled what had happened five days earlier.

And then Extinction Divine Nun appeared. That damned old monster brought it all to an end.

The arrival of Extinction Divine Nun shocked not only the Third Fiend but even the disciples of Emei.

Thirty years ago, at the age of one hundred, she had withdrawn from worldly affairs. She was the Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun's only Senior Aunt, and everyone believed she had since died.

When another Supreme Peak master suddenly appeared, the Third Fiend chose to flee without a moment's hesitation. The black-clad men under his command scattered and ran after their superior.

It had been an undeniable defeat.

Yet the Third Fiend had survived to the bitter end.

[1812] Gaettong is a Korean nickname meaning "dog dung."

He had concealed himself with a human-skin mask and a disguise technique, found the weakest point in the net over heaven and earth, and made his way here.

To this nameless cliff where no one had set foot.

“At last… Guh!”

As the cliff rapidly drew closer, the Third Fiend suppressed the emotions welling up inside him.

Only now did the grief and fury of losing his only blood relatives strike him all at once.

“Do not feel too aggrieved. Though I must retreat for now, this youngest brother will surely avenge you, my elder brothers.”

The Third Fiend had just sworn his vengeance and reached toward the cliff when —

Shhk!

His eyes flew wide.

A searing sensation, like a burn, blazed through him as his hand fell away at the wrist.

It was agony he had not felt in a very long time. A beat later, a scream burst from his cracked lips.

“Kyaaaaargh!”

At the same time, a chill raced down his spine.

He pressed his acupoints like lightning to stop the bleeding, then jerked his head up.

Where part of the solid cliff face had stood only moments before, there was now an all-too-familiar face.

“B-Big Brother?”

The Third Fiend’s cry held both delight and shock.

But First Fiend’s response was calm.

“So it seems. Your disguise technique was so poor that I suspected as much.”

“…!”

Crack. Crackle.

At that moment, First Fiend’s hideous face rippled like a wave. His hunched back straightened, and his arms and legs grew long and slender.

In the place of the ugly old man now stood a handsome boy.

“Who the hell are you?”

At the Third Fiend’s shout, a faint smile crossed the boy’s impassive face—the face of the Slaughter Saint.

“Mungyeong.”

A faint smile crossed the boy’s impassive face—the face of the Slaughter Saint.

“Your enemy.”

Chapter 370

The Sichuan Tang Clan had always been famous for its reclusive ways.

Even prominent figures could not easily pass through its gates. Fearing that daughters who married out might reveal the clan's martial arts and secrets, the Tangs instead brought in sons-in-law and had them take the Tang surname.

The gates of the Sichuan Tang Clan, which had endured for hundreds of years in this manner, had been thrown wide open only seven days ago.

"Over there! Get that pillar straight!"

"Pull on three. Ready. One, two—!"

Burly laborers hauled on ropes and carried stone and lumber across the grounds.

Buildings were slowly taking shape over foundation stones still stained dark red with blood.

Farther away, dozens of Buddhist nuns had gathered to chant prayers.

"May I have no other thought at the end of this life, with Amitabha[1813] alone beside me, my heart forever bound to the light from the white curl between his brows…"

The nuns, their heads shaved close and their eyes filled with spiritual energy, were from Emei Sect.

Before them, countless wooden coffins burned amid roaring flames.

"May you be reborn in the Pure Land. We will never forget your steadfast devotion or your souls."

Several days and nights had passed, yet the fires still had not gone out.

That was how many lives had been lost in the Three-Gate Bloodbath. The Sichuan Tang Clan, in particular, had suffered catastrophic casualties.

"Whew…"

"Venerable Myoryeong, you look exhausted. Perhaps you should rest, even if only for a little while…"

"No, Daoist Myeongjin. I am merely doing what must be done, so please do not concern yourself. Let us continue."

The Daoist studied the middle-aged nun's pale face, then nodded gravely.

A short while later, martial artists with swords at their waists approached in a line, carrying several dozen wooden coffins.

Among them were Daoists of Qingcheng Sect, disciples from small and mid-sized sects, and beggars streaked with grime.

A group of physicians came running along behind them.

"The patient suddenly started vomiting blood? Weren't they stable?"

[1813] Amitabha is a Buddha associated with rebirth in the Pure Land.

“If I knew that, would I be here right now? The patient clearly suffered serious internal injuries, but I can’t make sense of these symptoms…”

“Spread out and bring the Divine Physician! Quickly!”

Emei nuns, Qingcheng Daoists, Beggars’ Sect beggars, and martial artists dispatched from sects both great and small. Alongside them were ordinary people—carpenters, stonemasons, physicians, and more.

Countless people moved through the grounds of the Sichuan Tang Clan, each diligently carrying out their own task.

From a tall pavilion, a young beggar watched the scene through an open window and muttered wearily.

“I never thought I’d live to see something like this. And in the Sichuan Tang Clan, no less.”

Hyuk Mujin, lying on a bed, answered him.

“Stop watching and go help. Don’t slack off just because you’re the Successor Beggar.”

“Slack off?”

Gung Gibang’s eyes widened as he pointed at himself.

His upper body was tightly wrapped in spotless white bandages, and one leg had been fitted with a makeshift splint. They were glorious wounds earned in battle against the Third Fiend.

“You can look at me and still say that? You call this slacking off? Huh?”

“Are you the only one who got hurt?”

Hyuk Mujin snorted, then deliberately wriggled like an earthworm.

Unlike Gung Gibang, he was wrapped in bandages from head to toe, making him look like a mummy.

“You have to get hurt this badly before people say, ‘Ah, this kid must have had a rough time.‘ You understand?”

“…!”

Gung Gibang trembled.

The fact that his wounds were less severe clearly proved that his martial arts were superior, yet somehow, he felt as though he had lost.

“I had my bandages changed five times!”

“I’m lucky to be alive. Besides, wasn’t that because you were so filthy? I heard a physician tried to scrub you clean, then passed out from exhaustion. Is that true?”

“…”

“Forget it. Talking to you any longer will only subject me to more bad breath. Since we’re on the subject, ask them to brush your teeth next time, too. Every time I talk to you, I feel like I’m speaking into a street mutt’s ass.”

What a vicious tongue.

Gung Gibang was speechless for a moment. Then he stared at the ceiling and lamented.

“The Third Fiend should have killed that bastard.”

“Hey. That’s crossing a line.”

“I still don’t understand how someone like you survived that battle.”

“If you’re really that curious, try following our Captain around for two years.”

“…I’ll pass.”

For all their constant bickering, there was one thing Gung Gibang and Hyuk Mujin agreed on: Jin Taekyung.

He seemed to embody every upheaval under heaven. He possessed the tenacious vitality and sheer determination to survive any crisis.

And now, Jin Taekyung had reached such distant heights in martial prowess that they could scarcely believe he was human like them.

There is one more person like that.

Yeah. That guy.

The same thought crossed both their minds, and their heads turned in unison.

“Mimi, Whirlwind!”

Whirrrr!

“Good job, Mimi! Now fly through the air!”

Hiss?

“Oh. You can’t do that. Then this time…”

Hyuk Mujin and Gung Gibang wondered whether the bizarre young man ordering a snake to fly could truly be the Huashan Divine Dragon—the Sword Saint’s successor who had single-handedly defeated First Fiend, the strongest of the Qilian Three Fiends.

“Say, Gung.”

“What?”

“Do you have to be a little unhinged to become a Supreme Peak master?”

“…I don’t know. I really don’t know anymore.”

Gung Gibang avoided the question.

His own master was rather eccentric, but nowhere near as strange as Jin Taekyung or Cheongpung.

Then again, judging by the Sword Saint and the Fire King, perhaps disciples really did take after their masters.

“But what exactly is that snake?”

“A snake with horns that large? Other than an imugi,[1814] there’s only one possibility. A Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake.”

[1814] An imugi is a legendary Korean serpent often depicted as a dragon that has not yet attained its full form.

“When I was young, I read an encyclopedia of spiritual creatures that described it as a massive, pitch-black venomous beast.”

Cheongpung shouted.

“Mimi! Lie down!”

Hiss!

“Looking at it now, it doesn’t seem like a venomous beast. It just looks like an ordinary animal.”

“That’s what I’m saying.”

“But why is Cheongpung here? He was barely injured.”

“Didn’t you hear that loud crash outside earlier? They say Cheongpung went out to help and ended up destroying a pavilion.”

“…Oh.”

Both men fell silent. Lying side by side on their beds, they stared up at the ceiling.

Nearly ninety percent of the clan’s buildings had been damaged, but this pavilion had somehow retained its shape. It was now serving as a temporary clinic for the most important patients.

Catching the scent of medicinal decoctions drifting in from somewhere, Hyuk Mujin suddenly murmured,

“It feels like a dream.”

“Tell me about it.”

Seven days had passed since the Three-Gate Bloodbath.

Sichuan’s Murim had united to cast a net over heaven and earth. Most of Dark Heaven’s black-clad men, who had stained every corner of Sichuan with blood, had either been killed or captured. Even the Third Fiend, who had vanished without a trace, had been seized by a mysterious figure.

And with that, the brief war had come to an end.

But…

“I don’t think this is over. What do you think, Gung?”

“Do you even have to ask? If this is really the end, I’ll sear my own palm.”

They were hardly the only ones who sensed the looming danger.

In barely two months, Henan and Sichuan had been stained with blood.

Once news of the Three-Gate Bloodbath spread to the farthest reaches of the continent, everyone under heaven would realize the truth.

The dark cloud called Dark Heaven had already reached their doorstep.

An undeniable age of turmoil was beginning—and heroes were born in such times.

Hyuk Mujin’s gaze naturally turned toward the closed door.

“When do you think our Captain will wake up?”

“Who knows? Do I look like I have an answer? Mungyeong says there’s nothing wrong with him, so all we can do is wait.”

“Speaking of which, Mungyeong may be skilled for his age, but isn’t he a little young for us to entrust the Captain to him?”

“The Divine Physician is busy, I suppose. Great Hero Jeok is still recovering his strength, and there are far too many critical patients, including Great Hero Tang Sadok. There’s no helping it.”

“I understand. I do. But even if he is the Divine Physician’s Disciple, Mungyeong is still… What could a child that young possibly know?”

At Hyuk Mujin’s worried words, Cheongpung’s head snapped up.

“Uh-oh. Don’t say that. You’ll die.”

“Young Hero Cheongpung?”

“What you just said—don’t say it in front of Grandpa Mun. I mean, especially not in front of Mungyeong.”

“What? Why would you suddenly say that?”

“Don’t. Really, don’t.”

“…?”

Hyuk Mujin and Gung Gibang exchanged bewildered looks.

Then Cheongpung suddenly gasped.

“Mimi! Where did you go, Mimi?”

Cheongpung desperately searched for the Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake that had vanished the moment he looked away.

Just then, a strangled shout erupted from beyond the tightly closed door.

“Ghk! You damn snake!”

The three men’s gazes collided in midair.

At the same time, several voices calling one person’s name rang out all the way outside the pavilion.

“Benefactor!”

“Captain!”

“Jin Taekyung!”

The shout sent the people working outside into an uproar.

“Did you hear that?”

“Could he have woken up?”

“Tell the Sect Leader! Hurry!”

I had a nightmare.

In pitch-black darkness where I couldn't see an inch ahead, a snake was slowly tightening around my neck.

I couldn't breathe. My vision turned white.

Then I opened my eyes and expelled the breath trapped in my lungs.

"Ghk!"

Hiss.

"…?"

Hiss? What the fuck?

My brain stopped working for three seconds.

At last, I realized what my nightmare had been. I grabbed the horn of the snake coiled tightly around my neck.

"You damn snake!"

I didn't care whether it was called a Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake or Mimi-chan. Starting today, this bastard's name was Snake Wine.

"You're living on dew from now on. Chamisul."[1815]

I was about to whirl it around and slam it into the floor when the tightly closed door shattered and someone burst into the room.

"Benefactor!"

Cheongpung's thunderous shout made my skull ring.

Behind him, Hyuk Mujin came wriggling like an earthworm while Gung Gibang hopped in on one leg.

"Captain!"

"Jin Taekyung!"

"…Why do you two look like that?"

Hyuk Mujin bounced his body vigorously and answered.

"The Third Fiend. That crazy old monster did this to me."

Gung Gibang helpfully elaborated.

"It's a miracle he survived. That lunatic Hyuk Mujin threw dirt and rocks at the Third Fiend. If the Seven Fairies hadn't stepped in to protect him, he would have been torn limb from limb."

"…?"

Who the hell was the Third Fiend, and who were the Seven Fairies? Kim Seonja was my high school disciplinarian's name…[1816]

These lunatics.

My relief at surviving the underground prison lasted only a moment. A headache came on, and I pressed a hand to my forehead.

[1815] Chamisul is a Korean soju brand whose name literally means "true dew."

[1816] In Korean, chil seonja ("Seven Fairies") shares seonja with the personal name in "Kim Seonja," prompting the narrator's association.

I had clearly told them to stay put at the Divine Physician's residence, but apparently they hadn't been able to resist crawling out and fighting to the death.

Thank goodness they had survived. What would have happened if they had died?

"Were you two that desperate to die? What kind of trouble did you cause this time?"

"…?"

"…?"

"What? Why are you looking at me like that?"

The three of us—everyone except Cheongpung—exchanged bewildered looks.

"Is there a problem?"

"Of course there is."

"You told us to go save Emei Sect, Captain."

The first answer came from Gung Gibang. The second came from Hyuk Mujin.

They were both talking nonsense, so I deliberately frowned.

"What are you talking about? I did?"

"Yes. That's what Mungyeong told us. Did you hit your head?"

That couldn't be it.

I had felt it the instant I opened my eyes. Powerful qi boiled throughout my entire body.

Everything within my sight, along with the energy of nature surrounding me, felt clear and vivid.

So this is Supreme Peak…

I wanted to test this power immediately. Not to mention the System messages that must have piled up like a mountain by now.

But before listening to any more of this nonsense, there was one thing I needed to ask.

"Is everyone all right?"

They knew who I meant by everyone.

Instead of answering, Cheongpung threw open the enormous window.

"See for yourself, Benefactor."

As if in a trance, I slowly walked toward the window.

A warm spring breeze brushed across my face. An oddly quiet atmosphere greeted me as I leaned my head out beyond the window.

"Ah."

I looked down and found myself speechless.

There were people below.

Nuns, Daoists, craftsmen who appeared to be carpenters, and physicians dressed in spotless white robes. Countless eyes were fixed upon me, all filled with the same emotion.

Awe.

The next moment, they paid their respects as though they had made an agreement beforehand.

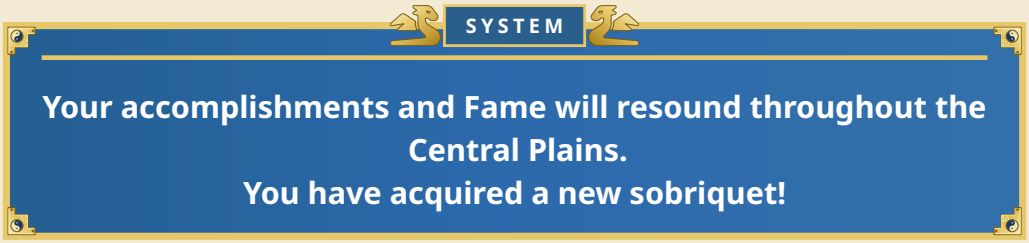
Some formed a fist-and-palm salute. Some bowed their heads slightly. Others prostrated themselves and bowed deeply.

Then a vast chorus rose as one.

“We pay our respects to the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon!”

A shudder ran through me from the crown of my head to the tips of my toes.

Ding.



As the System alert rang in my ears, I spotted someone in the distance.

“Well done.”

I smiled back at Jeok Cheongang.

Chapter 371

“We pay our respects to Great Hero Jin Taekyung, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon!”

When that awe-filled cry rang throughout the grounds of the Sichuan Tang Clan, Jin Taekyung was not the only one who felt a shiver run through him.

Watching from a distance, his old master had to struggle to contain the emotion welling up inside him.

You rascal…

Jeok Cheongang remembered the day he had first met Jin Taekyung as clearly as if it were yesterday.

The Third Young Master of a frontier martial family. The young man who had only just begun making a name for himself in Shanxi had become a Hidden Dragon, and now, at last, he was spreading his wings and soaring into the blue sky.

Yes. You truly are a Divine Dragon—and a Great Hero.

Their eyes met, and Jin Taekyung grinned. Leaning halfway out the window, he waved both hands wildly.

“What’s my name?”

“Jin Taekyung!”

“And my sobriquet?”

“Blazing Flame Divine Dragon!”

“Louder—!”

“Waaaaaaaah!”

The solemn gathering erupted into a frenzy, and Jeok Cheongang finally burst into the laughter he had been holding back.

“Ha! Ha-ha-ha!”

His hearty laughter mingled with the cheers. The breeze was cool, and the sky was clear.

It was the dawn of an age of turmoil, but the day a new hero was born was warm with spring.

Jeok Cheongang appeared shortly after the frenzy died down.

“You’ve packed quite a crowd into this millet-sized room.”

“Huh? It’s not cramped at all.”

“Great Hero Jeok, there’s an empty seat over there.”

Unlike Cheongpung and Hyuk Mujin, who could die and come back without ever learning to read the room, Gung Gibang was a pure-blooded beggar to his very bones. He moved at once.

“Oh my, now that you mention it, this place is practically bursting at the seams. I’ll wait outside.”

Cheongpung and Hyuk Mujin waved at him.

“Goodbye, Gung Gibang.”

“He’s finally leaving. Captain, haven’t you smelled a stray dog’s ass around here for a while now?”

I nodded cautiously.

“Yeah. It was pretty strong…”

“Stop talking shit and get out, both of you!”

“No, I’m telling you, it really did smell…”

“All right. Don’t get so angry, Gung Gibang.”

Cheongpung lowered his head dejectedly at Gung Gibang’s furious outburst.

“Mimi. Say goodbye with a whirlwind.”

Hiss. Hissss!

“…What the fuck.”

Looks like Mimi had picked up some new tricks in the meantime. After putting on that flashy performance, Cheongpung was the last to leave the room.

Jeok Cheongang finally spoke.

“You reckless little brat. You certainly made quite a ruckus.”

His face was stern, his voice low and subdued.

He really hadn’t changed at all. Seeing Jeok Cheongang act just like his usual self made me want to laugh for some reason.

“You laughing?”

“Of course I’m laughing. What else should I do, cry?”

“Hah, look at this brat. You made a spectacle of yourself in front of everyone and dragged our sect’s reputation through the mud, yet you still have the nerve to say that?”

“You were laughing pretty loudly for someone who thought that.”

“…!”

“I saw everything.”

The stern expression he had been struggling to maintain collapsed all at once. Jeok Cheongang’s head slowly turned toward the window.

“Ahem. What exactly do you claim to have seen?”

“About fifty people besides me probably saw it too. For a moment, I thought your smile had split your mouth open and you were bleeding from the corners.”

He'd practically looked like the Chinese Joker.

My finishing shot left him no room to escape. Jeok Cheongang hesitated for a long while, unable to continue, before finally muttering one word.

"…Did."

"Huh?"

"I said you did well!"

Jeok Cheongang shouted, his face bright red, then grumbled under his breath.

My smile deepened at the sight.

Yes. That one sentence was enough.

"Thank you. It was all thanks to you, Old Master."

"…"

What was this? His expression seemed strangely off.

His eyes even looked almost hurt. I asked, baffled,

"What's wrong this time?"

"Nothing. It's nothing."

"Your face doesn't exactly say nothing…"

"I said it was nothing!"

"Why are you shouting? The mood was finally warm and pleasant for once."

"If I say it's nothing, then take it as nothing! You keep prying and asking questions, so this is happening!"

"Uh-oh. It's getting worse?"

What was wrong with this man all of a sudden? Had I screwed something up?

I was tilting my head in confusion when—

Rustle.

Two presences were coming up the stairs.

Their footsteps were so light and graceful that I might never have noticed them if my senses hadn't grown even sharper after crossing the threshold.

They're both incredible masters.

Two Supreme Peak masters, just like that?

After all the crises I had weathered lately, my body moved on its own.

But as I clenched my fists, Jeok Cheongang stopped me with a glance and waved one hand.

A thin stream of hot air gently pushed open the closed door.

"You're all so impatient. Couldn't even wait fifteen minutes before swarming up here?"

An old Buddhist nun and a Daoist answered Jeok Cheongang's gruff voice in turn.

"Impatient? Hearing that from a lay devotee gives this poor nun a rather strange feeling."

“This junior was discourteous. However, given the circumstances…”

The elderly nun, her face covered in fine wrinkles, was a stranger to me. But I immediately recognized the Daoist.

I cupped my hands toward him.

“Greetings, Perfected One.”

“It’s good to see you again, Fellow Daoist Jin.”

The old Daoist was Cheongpung the Ancient Sword, the Sect Leader of the Qingcheng Sect whom I had once visited to ask for help finding the Divine Physician.

Then this nun must be Emei Sect’s new Sect Leader… Who is she?

I knew a fair amount about famous masters by now, but not enough to understand the inner workings of every sect.

Especially when it came to a Sect Leader who had only recently taken office after the death of the Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun.

As if he had read my thoughts, Jeok Cheongang quietly sent me a Sound Transmission.

That old hag is Emei Sect’s Extinction Divine Nun. She may look kindly, but once she loses her temper, she becomes a rakshasa[1817] incarnate. Watch your mouth around her. And whatever you do, don’t mention her age.

I replied cautiously through Sound Transmission.

Just how old is she?

Older than this old man. She was also the Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun’s Senior Aunt.

Oh.

I didn’t know Jeok Cheongang’s exact age, but I knew he was over a hundred. Add the sheer force of that sobriquet…

I bowed deeply to the ancient woman who looked like the matriarch of a bossam restaurant.[1818]

“Greetings! My name is Jin Taekyung!”

“Good to meet you, Benefactor Jin.”

The Extinction Divine Nun studied me with a strange look in her eyes, then nodded.

“So the rumors were true. No—they fell short.”

Cheongpung the Ancient Sword smiled faintly.

“Isn’t it truly astonishing?”

[1817] A rakshasa is a demon or fearsome spirit in South Asian and Buddhist traditions.

[1818] Bossam is boiled pork commonly wrapped in salted napa cabbage and served with condiments; a bossam restaurant matriarch evokes the familiar image of an elderly Korean neighborhood restaurateur.

“The waves behind drive the waves ahead on the Yangtze. It seems the younger generation means to sweep even old people like us aside. To cross the threshold at such a young age…”

“It isn’t only him, Venerable Nun. There is also a young man named Cheongpung.”

“Ah, the Sword Saint’s successor?”

“Yes. This poor Daoist lacks the discernment to judge which of the two is superior, but both young men are unquestionably heaven-sent. They are a great blessing to the Murim.”

“Oh…”

Interest and surprise flickered across their weary faces.

I was shifting my eyes awkwardly when Jeok Cheongang stepped in front of me.

Not that it accomplished much, considering the difference in our heights.

“You’ll wear the boy’s face out staring at him. Say what you came to say and hurry along.”

The two Sect Leaders looked embarrassed by his blunt words and finally got to the point.

“A problem has arisen. Could the two of you accompany us for a while?”

“It won’t take long. You have my word.”

“Accompany you? Right now?”

Jeok Cheongang asked in a displeased voice as he turned toward me.

“What will you do?”

“…”

Two Sect Leaders from the Nine Sects and One Gang were asking for my help. What exactly was I supposed to do?

“I’ll go.”

My body felt light, and accompanying them would give me a chance to hear everything that had happened. There was no real reason to refuse.

At my ready answer, the two Sect Leaders took the lead.

Then Jeok Cheongang abruptly asked,

“But where’s the other one?”

“He’s waiting below.”

“He said he preferred not to attract anyone else’s attention.”

The other one? If he was important enough to join this group, was it Tang Sadok, the Family Head of the Tang Clan?

Well, whoever it is, I’ll see him soon enough.

But my curiosity vanished the moment we left the pavilion and encountered a familiar face.

A delighted shout burst from me.

“Hey, you little punk! Mungyeong!”

Mungyeong looked exactly as he had before leaving the Sichuan Tang Clan.

Dark Heaven had invaded not long after he left, so I had been worried. Yet, perhaps our paths had simply missed each other, because he had somehow escaped without a scratch.

“When did you get here? You look taller than before. Going through a growth spurt?”

“…”

“Why so quiet? Are you in a bad mood? Maybe…”

I ruffled Mungyeong’s hair, then leaned closer and whispered,

“Did you have a wet dream this morning?”

“…!”

“You did. You totally did.”

Look at the little brat. Too embarrassed to say a word.

I smiled with satisfaction.

That sort of thing happened from time to time at his age. Maybe this was my chance to spread proper sex education throughout this dusty old Murim.

“Your hyung[1819] here is going to show you a whole new world. From now on, call me Teacher Jin Seong-ae.”[1820]

Teacher Gu Seong-ae, are you watching? Your knowledge is crossing space and time to reach the next generation.

I was proudly patting Mungyeong on the shoulder when—

“Uh…”

“Um…”

“Oh dear… We forgot to tell him.”

Forgot to tell me what?

Three long sighs sounded behind me. At the same time, Mungyeong spoke in a flat voice.

“Take your hand off.”

“…Huh?”

“And I stopped having wet dreams a long time ago.”

“That’s a little problematic, because your secondary sexual development hasn’t completely finished ye—no, that’s not what I mean.”

I swallowed hard.

A terrifying possibility had just flashed through my mind.

“Who… are you?”

[1819] Hyung is a Korean term a younger male uses for an older brother or older male companion. Taekyung uses it to refer to himself as Mungyeong’s senior.

[1820] Gu Seong-ae is a Korean sex educator. Taekyung parodies her name by replacing Gu with Jin.

Mom, I’m scared.

“…And that is how things came to this.”

“It truly is a bizarre matter.”

Even as the two Sect Leaders raced along using their movement techniques, their voices never wavered.

They looked at me, waiting for an answer. I forced my lips apart.

“Ah, right. So there’s some kind of strange formation where we’re going?”

“According to the Third Fiend, whom we captured and interrogated, that appears to be the case. But the formation itself is so strange…”

Jeok Cheongang answered gruffly.

“This old man and this brat are both hopeless when it comes to formations. Looking at it won’t tell us a damned thing.”

I agreed. The Fire Gate Cavern on Mount Jiuhua contained an extraordinary Mystic Gate Formation, but that didn’t make either of us experts.

We’d be better off calling someone from the Zhuge Clan.

But it would take the Zhuge Clan a considerable amount of time to get here.

For some reason, the two Sect Leaders seemed to have high expectations of us.

Especially me.

“Fellow Daoist Jin, did you notice anything else strange about that man? Anything in his words or behavior?”

“I’ve told you everything. And from what I could tell… I don’t think it was possible for him to get any stranger.”

Dark Heaven was strange by nature. They were fanatics who worshiped the Lord of Heaven as almost—no, simply—as a god.

The Blood Lord and the Western Heaven Demon Lord were no different, with all their bizarre powers and abilities.

One regenerated like a human Troll. Another popped his arm off and stuck it back on like he had double-sided tape under it. And then there was the possession at the end.

The more I thought about it, the more miraculous our victory seemed.

We had fought those lunatics and somehow won.

“Before you awoke, Benefactor Jeok gave us a general account of what happened. Once the messenger eagle we sent to Henan returns with a reply, we should have a clearer idea of how to proceed.”

“If you notice anything strange when you examine the formation, tell us.”

“Yes.”

As I answered, I glanced at the figure racing far ahead of us.

Mungyeong.

No—the man known as the Slaughter Saint.

Fuck. What the hell is the Slaughter Saint doing here?

Honestly, I had nearly pissed myself.

Even if I spent half a day swimming in the Sanzu River valley, grilled meat, and came back, it wouldn't be this bad.[1821]

Mungyeong was the Slaughter Saint. And I asked the Slaughter Saint if he'd had a wet dream!

Teacher Gu Seong-ae, I nearly died because of you.

I had just let out a private sigh of relief when the dense undergrowth around us fell away, revealing towering cliffs ahead.

[1821] In Buddhist tradition, the Sanzu River marks the boundary between life and death.

Chapter 372

“This is the place.”

“It’s a cliff, isn’t it? A pretty ordinary one.”

I stopped with the others before the steep cliff and looked around.

It rose over a hundred zhang,[1822] a sheer wall of solid rock, but there was nothing particularly remarkable about it.

There’s supposed to be a formation here?

It didn’t take long to find the answer.

Following a sudden sense of déjà vu, I walked slowly forward and stopped before a yellowish-brown section of the cliff face.

“This is…”

Everything has a flow and a grain. Even something as invisible and intangible as qi is no exception.

And the senses I had gained upon reaching the Supreme Peak realm were more than sharp enough to detect the unnatural flow of qi.

“A formation?”

A voice answered my mutter.

“More precisely, an illusion formation.”

Mungyeong—or rather, the Slaughter Saint—gave me a dry look, then stepped forward and extended a hand.

An enormous amount of qi stirred. The solid rock face vanished like mist, revealing the mouth of a pitch-black cavern.

“Your eyes aren’t completely useless, at least.”

“Uh, what?”

“Don’t ask again.”

The Slaughter Saint tossed out those words and headed into the cavern without giving me a chance to respond.

Was that an insult or a compliment?

It left me feeling strangely annoyed.

Still, it would have been awkward to get angry. I sensed no hostility toward me in the Slaughter Saint’s words or actions. He was merely as dry and stiff with me as he was with everyone else.

That made it more embarrassing than infuriating.

“…”

Of course, the fact that he was the Slaughter Saint also had something to do with my willingness to let it slide.

[1822] A zhang is ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). A hundred zhang is about 303 m (994 ft).

If that was how the Slaughter Saint talked, what was I supposed to do? Even if it rubbed me the wrong way, I had to put up with it.

I should be grateful I was still standing after bringing up wet dreams.

I nearly turned the Slaughter Saint into the Rice Saint, so this is practically getting off easy.[1823]

As I had that thought, I heard a low chuckle beside me. I turned to find the corners of Jeok Cheongang's mouth twitching.

"Why are you laughing all of a sudden?"

"No reason. I was just thinking that the Slaughter Saint is remarkably incapable of being honest."

"What?"

"Don't ask again."

"…"

What was this? Some new catchphrase?

Jeok Cheongang strode off. The two Sect Leaders and I followed him into the dark cavern.

Still…

I couldn't believe a place like this had been hidden here.

It was even close enough to reach within half a day from Chengdu, the heart of Sichuan. That was half a day at an ordinary commoner's pace. For anyone trained in martial arts, it would take far less time.

I looked around as we made our way through the seemingly endless cavern.

Even the entrance is huge. Several times larger than the Sichuan Tang Clan's underground prison.

I had heard a brief explanation on the way here. The murderous criminals of Dark Heaven had stayed in this very cavern.

So this was where they had hidden while waiting for the right moment. That explained where so many of them had come from.

But how did they get in here to begin with?

More than three hundred enemies had attacked the Tang Clan under the Western Heaven Demon Lord's command.

Add in the men sent to Qingcheng and Emei, and their numbers were far too great to ignore.

Was security in Sichuan Province really that terrible? No, even so, wouldn't the Beggars' Sect and the Lower District Sect have noticed them?

I walked on with that question in mind until the passage—wide enough for ten grown men to walk abreast—finally ended and opened into a vast chamber.

[1823] In Korean, Salseong ("Slaughter Saint") and Ssalseong ("Rice Saint") differ by one consonant. The altered title also continues the wet-dream joke.

The words slipped out before I knew it.

"…Huh. Would you look at that."

The chamber could have easily held over a thousand people. Dozens of night-shining pearls embedded in the ceiling cast a soft glow, while jars filled with dry rations and fasting pills stood in one corner alongside piles of weapons.

But none of that was what surprised me most.

What is that?

Strange patterns covered the entire cavern floor.

Carved in regular arrangements like intricate gears, they looked like the ruins of an ancient kingdom forgotten long ago.

"Is that perhaps the thing you mentioned earlier…?"

At my question, Cheongpung the Ancient Sword, Sect Leader of the Qingcheng Sect, nodded gravely.

"That is correct. That is the strange formation I spoke of."

I had wondered if it could really be a formation, but apparently it was.

I had encountered all kinds of mechanisms and formations at the Star-Array Grand Banquet, but I had never seen one this large or this bizarre.

This goes beyond strange. It's downright grotesque.

Maybe it was the patterns. There was something both mysterious and dangerous about them.

Jeok Cheongang seemed to share my thoughts.

"But what in the world are those bizarre patterns?"

"We have yet to determine that ourselves."

Extinction Divine Nun added to Cheongpung the Ancient Sword's answer.

"We cannot jump to conclusions. We copied part of the formation and showed it to several renowned scholars and distinguished figures, but none recognized it. We cannot entirely rule out the possibility that it is some unknown script from the Western Regions."[1824]

Before I knew it, a remark slipped from my lips.

"Uh, that isn't writing."

"…"

"…"

"…"

Every eye turned toward me. The Slaughter Saint, who had remained silent ever since we entered the cavern, abruptly spoke.

"Your basis?"

"My… basis?"

[1824] The Western Regions is a historical Chinese term for lands to the west of China, particularly Central Asia.

“If you make such a claim, you must have sound grounds for it. Stop asking questions and answer.”

Of course I had grounds. Conclusive grounds that neither a renowned scholar who had devoured tens of thousands of books nor an eminent martial artist who had spent a lifetime roaming the Murim could refute.

The Integrated Language Pack.

The Integrated Language Pack automatically translated every language through the power of the System.

It didn’t just let me communicate. I could read and write any language as well.

It was thanks to the Integrated Language Pack that I had been able to speak with the Skeleton Warlord in the modern world.

Yet despite the interpretation function being constantly active like a passive Skill, the patterns that made up the formation remained unchanged.

That was definitive proof they weren’t writing.

The problem was…

How am I supposed to explain that?

I shouldn’t have said anything. I should have kept my mouth shut.

But it was already too late. As the Slaughter Saint’s gaze grew more intense, I stammered,

“Bo… bo.”

“Boobs?”

The Rice Saint’s eyebrow twitched.

It was the first emotion he had shown. He had clearly remembered the wet-dream incident.

“Ah, no, not boobs.”

“Breasts, then?”

“…”

Please. Don’t say things like that with a face completely devoid of emotion.

“No, that’s not what I meant.”

As I frantically waved my hands, Jeok Cheongang suddenly cut in.

“Are you threatening my Disciple? How dare you threaten the Fire King’s heir and the Young Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan?”

“Threaten him? There is no need, but neither is it beyond me.”

“I intended to let this pass since I happened to owe you my life, but if this is how you mean to act, Mun, then this old man cannot stand idle.”

The atmosphere grew increasingly hostile. I squeezed my eyes shut and shouted,

“I-I took a guess!”

“…”

"…"

"…"

"I thought I might have seen something like it in a book before… and it just didn't feel like writing, so I guessed."

A heavy silence descended.

The Slaughter Saint let out a nearly inaudible sigh, then asked Jeok Cheongang,

"So that fellow is the heir of the Fire King and the Young Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan?"

Jeok Cheongang fell silent for a moment before answering.

"Now that I think about it, he never underwent the formal initiation ceremony."

"…"

"So strictly speaking, he isn't yet an official Disciple of our sect. Which means he should still be considered a member of the Jin Family of Taiyuan…"

Jeok Cheongang's eyes met mine. He quietly looked away.

"I shall say no more."

"…"

What did he mean, no more? He had already said everything there was to say.

Having witnessed the complete collapse of trust between Master and Disciple, Extinction Divine Nun and Cheongpung the Ancient Sword awkwardly changed the subject.

"Ahem. In any case, it seems we must continue investigating this strange formation."

"F-Fellow Daoist Jin and Senior Jeok's insights have been most helpful."

Heaven knew they hadn't helped at all. Earth knew it. Everyone here knew it.

Even a stray dog in an alley wouldn't believe that nonsense.

Having brought the situation to a close with such an obvious lie, Cheongpung the Ancient Sword turned to Extinction Divine Nun with a troubled expression.

"Still, it is truly difficult to believe. To bring so many people here with nothing more than a formation…"

"Indeed. If such a thing is possible, does that not mean they could appear anywhere under heaven?"

Wait. What did they just say?

I had been staring at the ground, frustrated by my inability to explain myself and still suffering from the aftermath of the boob incident. I abruptly raised my head.

"What is it, Benefactor Jin?"

"No, it's just… I think this is the first I've heard either of you mention that part about the formation."

"Hmm? You mean the Moving Formation?"

"…The Moving Formation?"

"That is correct. According to the Third Fiend, that strange formation is called a Moving Formation. We cannot know how much of his absurd story to believe, but he said Dark Heaven used it to travel hundreds of li."[1825]

A Moving Formation. They said it was a Moving Formation.

Even if a critic in angular horn-rimmed glasses had suddenly walked out and declared, "I give this formation four and a half stars," I couldn't have been more bewildered.

This sounds familiar.

A formation capable of transporting hundreds of people across hundreds of li.

The more I thought about it, the harder my heart pounded and the drier my lips became.

What if this so-called Moving Formation was that thing I was thinking of?

No. That can't be.

But despite my desperate denial, my Adam's apple bobbed heavily.

"Is this formation still operational?"

I had directed the question at the two Sect Leaders, but the Slaughter Saint answered.

"The Third Fiend. I caught him here myself."

"…He tried to escape through the Moving Formation."

"Yes. But that was only his intention."

"You mean…"

"As he later confessed, he tried to activate the formation. Nothing happened."

"Oh."

"One thing is certain. There is no flow of qi whatsoever within that formation. It has completely lost its power. Nothing remains but an empty shell."

After finishing his explanation in a flat voice, the Slaughter Saint added,

"Judging from the circumstances that have come to light, Dark Heaven is without a doubt the successor to the Demonic Cult. The Demonic Cult possesses countless monstrous martial arts and supreme techniques, so it would not be strange if they had any number of bizarre arts."

I had heard what kind of place the Demonic Cult was so many times that it had been drilled into my head.

A powerful religious organization that was the very embodiment of demonic, heterodox arts.

Although it had ultimately been defeated in the Great Faction War, it had managed to overwhelm the entire Murim for so long because of the countless monstrous martial arts and supreme techniques it possessed.

[1825] A Chinese li is about 500 m (0.311 mi). Hundreds of li would be roughly 100–500 km (62–311 mi).

So this formation is one of the many bizarre arts passed down from the Demonic Cult?

No matter how much I thought about it, I couldn't figure it out. Maybe all the fusion-fantasy novels I had read were getting in the way. This sort of thing showed up in them all the time, which somehow only made it more confusing.

They got away with it just fine in Mukhyung. Ugh. I shouldn't have read a novel that never even got an ending.

Still, just in case, I decided to memorize the formation's arrangement and patterns.

I was staring intently at the Moving Formation, engraving every detail into my mind, when the Slaughter Saint suddenly spoke.

"Judging by your behavior, you seem to know something. Does anything come to mind?"

"…"

What excuse was I supposed to make now?

Chapter 373

The trip back was short.

On the way there, we had at least slowed down to exchange information. But in game terms, this was a deluxe party with no fewer than five Supreme Peak masters traveling together.

The distance that would have taken an ordinary person half a day to cover had shrunk to almost nothing.

“You’ve worked hard, Benefactor Jin.”

“And you must still be tired. Thank you for coming with us.”

As we neared the Sichuan Tang Clan, the two Sect Leaders turned to address me. I shrugged.

“It’s nothing. I didn’t really help much, anyway.”

“True.”

“He certainly didn’t.”

“…”

It was true that I hadn’t been much help, but wasn’t that a little harsh?

Cheongpung the Ancient Sword gave me a faint smile, then clasped his hands toward the Slaughter Saint and Jeok Cheongang.

“I’m grateful to both of you Seniors as well. I apologize for making you come all this way for nothing.”

The Slaughter Saint and Jeok Cheongang answered at the same time.

“It was indeed a pointless trip.”

“Next time, don’t do anything you’ll need to apologize for. Understood?”

“…Ah. Yes.”

That was exactly how I felt.

The Slaughter Saint continued, addressing the visibly uncomfortable Cheongpung the Ancient Sword.

“And… I hope you won’t come looking for me again.”

He wasn’t telling them to call on him less often because it was a bother. After briefly returning as the Slaughter Saint, he intended to go back to being Mungyeong, the young medical apprentice.

Everyone present understood what he meant.

The two Sect Leaders were the most flustered of all.

“S-Senior, that…”

“Benefactor, might you reconsider?”

Instead of answering, the Slaughter Saint gave them a dry look.

After a moment of silence, Cheongpung the Ancient Sword and Extinction Divine Nun sighed softly and nodded.

"…We will do so."

"I shall respect your wishes. For now."

For now.

The last two words were heavily emphasized. The Slaughter Saint's quiet voice slipped between his lips.

"My decision has not changed. Coming this time was nothing more than a passing whim."

It was a firm answer that left not even the slightest room for argument. The Slaughter Saint's gaze shifted toward Jeok Cheongang and me.

"I trust you two understand that as well."

Jeok Cheongang suddenly spoke.

"Are you going to pretend to be a medical apprentice again? It doesn't suit you."

"It isn't an act. The Slaughter Saint no longer exists. Only a medical apprentice remains."

"If a tiger drapes itself in goatskin, does that make it a goat?"

"If it hides its teeth and claws, even a tiger can become a goat."

"But you revealed your claws in the end. Didn't you?"

A shallow crease formed between the Slaughter Saint's brows.

"You've grown more talkative with age. You owe me a debt, after all."

"…Damn. I can't argue when you're not wrong."

"I'll take that as an answer."

Having dismissed Jeok Cheongang, the Slaughter Saint glanced at me.

"And you?"

"Me?"

"Who else is left?"

"No, that's not what I meant. Do I get a choice?"

"Of course. You have two."

The Slaughter Saint spoke with an impassive expression.

"First, you can loudly announce that the young medical apprentice named Mungyeong is actually the Slaughter Saint, then be found dead without a soul knowing how. Second, you can keep your mouth shut so no one notices, treat me as you did before, and leave quietly."

"…"

"Which will you choose?"

Wow. The choices were so difficult that I was speechless for a moment.

After swallowing hard, I opened my mouth.

"The second one."

"A wise choice."

"Yeah."[1826]

The Slaughter Saint had been about to nod at my prompt answer when he suddenly stopped.

"What did you just say?"

"Why?"

"What?"

"No, I mean, why are you acting like that? You told me to treat you as I did before."

"…!"

"…!"

The two Sect Leaders stood there with their mouths hanging open. The Slaughter Saint was silent for a moment before asking Jeok Cheongang, who had begun chuckling.

"Is this fellow insane?"

"He's always been like that. Gives you a headache, doesn't he?"

"I want to smash his skull in."

I bowed deeply before he could make good on that threat.

"Ah, I got confused for a moment. My apologies."

"Not even a dog would believe that, but I'll let it slide this once."

Had it been too obvious that I was trying to mess with him while pretending it was a mistake? The Slaughter Saint glared at me with narrowed eyes before speaking.

"In any case, watch yourself from now on. Aside from those present, no one knows the truth about me. Ah, that boy Cheongpung is an exception. As is my Disciple, of course."

"Cheongpung knew too?"

"Yes. Aside from him, everyone who saw me that day is dead."

Now that was a thorough cleanup.

I finally understood why there hadn't been a single prisoner at the Sichuan Tang Clan.

The Masked Slaughter Saint.[1827] Once the mask came off, panelists and audience members alike dropped dead.

The more I think about it, the stranger this feels. Mungyeong was the Slaughter Saint all along.

[1826] The Korean reply eung is an informal "yes"; Jin deliberately uses a level of address too casual for the Slaughter Saint.

[1827] This refers to King of Mask Singer, a Korean television competition in which masked performers reveal their identities before panelists and an audience.

Memories flashed through my mind, from our first meeting on the Yangtze to the present.

Which of the sides he had shown me was real, and which was a lie?

The innocent young medical apprentice I had known no longer existed. All that remained was the greatest assassin under heaven, his eyes dry and emotionless.

Before I knew it, a question slipped out.

“Why are you so determined to hide who you are?”

The Slaughter Saint, moving toward the Sichuan Tang Clan now visible in the distance, stopped dead.

After a brief silence, he answered with unexpected calm.

“Because I’m sick to death of the Murim.”

“Is that why you left?”

“Yes. I swore to the heavens that I would never take another life.”

In this place—the Murim—assassins were despised.

Neither the orthodox factions nor practitioners of demonic, heterodox arts welcomed them.

They were seen not as martial artists pursuing higher realms of martial arts, but as people born solely to kill.

How much blood had one assassin spilled—and how deeply had he been stained by it—before earning the sobriquet Slaughter Saint?

I thought I understood how he felt, at least to some extent.

But…

“On the other hand, I’m a little curious.”

“What?”

“Why you came back to the Murim you hate so much.”

“…What nonsense are you talking about, saying I returned?”

The Slaughter Saint’s eyes sank deeper.

“I had no choice. It was unavoidable.”

“I don’t know. If that’s how you put it, I have nothing to say. But it seems like you made at least a few choices yourself. For example…”

I scratched the back of my head and continued.

“You asked to travel with some martial artists you met on the Yangtze because you were headed in the same direction. A few days later, you happened to run into them again and casually revealed your identity. Or you borrowed my name to order the Successor Beggar of the Beggars’ Sect to rescue Emei Sect, while you went to Qingcheng…”

“Enough.”

“Yes. I was about to stop anyway. Now that I’ve listed them one by one, there are quite a few.”

“What is it you want to hear? That I should have stood by and watched countless people—including you and your Master—die?”

“Of course not. I’m truly grateful, Great Hero.”

There was no sarcasm in my voice. I meant it with one hundred percent sincerity.

If he hadn’t stepped in at the right moment, countless people would have died or been injured.

Jeok Cheongang and I would certainly have been among them.

But the Slaughter Saint’s response to my words was as dry as desert sand.

“Don’t call me Great Hero.”

“Then what should I call you?”

The Slaughter Saint stared at me without speaking, then turned away.

He took a step toward the Sichuan Tang Clan, now no more than a large speck in the distance, and glided forward like a ghost.

The boy’s voice scattered on the wind.

“Mungyeong. That is enough.”

Was it really enough?

Only he knew the answer.

I shrugged and replied,

“Yeah, got it, Mungyeong.”

“…!”

At that moment, the figure walking ahead of us stumbled.

When I returned to the pavilion, two leeches latched onto me.

One was Hyuk Mujin, whom I could never decide was my right arm or my pinky. The other was a beggar whose skin had gotten a little whiter, as if he had started scrubbing off some dirt lately.

“Why is Mungyeong like that? He somehow seems a little gloomier.”

“That’s understandable. His Master, the Divine Physician, was injured, and there are so many patients waiting for treatment.”

“Oh, I see. But Captain, where did you go with Mungyeong?”

“Isn’t it obvious? He looked down, so the Captain took him out for some fresh air. Why are you so stupid?”

“Huh. In all my life, I never thought I’d hear that from a beggar. I may look like this, but I’ve read several hundred books. I’ve never been called stupid before.”

As far as I could tell, both of them were just stupid.

I swallowed the words Slaughter Saint hovering on the tip of my tongue. Those two would never discover Mungyeong's true identity, even if they died and came back to life.

Then again, with acting skills like that, anyone would be fooled.

The instant people's attention turned toward him, the Slaughter Saint returned to being Mungyeong.

No one suspected his identity just because the cheerful young medical apprentice seemed a little gloomier than usual.

No one could even have guessed.

"I'd give you credit if you'd read the Four Books and Three Classics,[1828] but all you've done is read martial arts novels nonstop. What books are you talking about?"

"I read romance novels too. Haven't you heard of Gwiyeommi?"[1829]

"Wait. Gwiyeommi? You mean the scholar who wrote The Temptation of a Young Prodigy, That Bastard Was Strong, and all those others?"

"Oh, you know him."

"Of course I do. When I was a one-knot Disciple,[1830] I used the money I'd begged for to rent one of his books, and the beggar chief beat me black and blue. Damn, if I ran into that bastard now, I'd lay into him with the Dog-Beating Staff Technique. I'd—"

Whack!

"Gah!"

"Aagh!"

I kicked both idiots in the ass as they happily reminisced, drove them out, and slammed the door shut.

I already had more than enough to think about. Why had those bastards come here just to make a racket?

Finally, some peace and quiet.

Cheongpung was probably running all over the place by now, and I'd told Jeok Cheongang to rest for the entire day. No one would come looking for me for a while.

I lay down on the soft bed and decided to take care of something I'd been putting off.

Check unread messages.

Ding. Ding. Ding-ding!

System windows filled the air as an endless stream of chimes rang out.

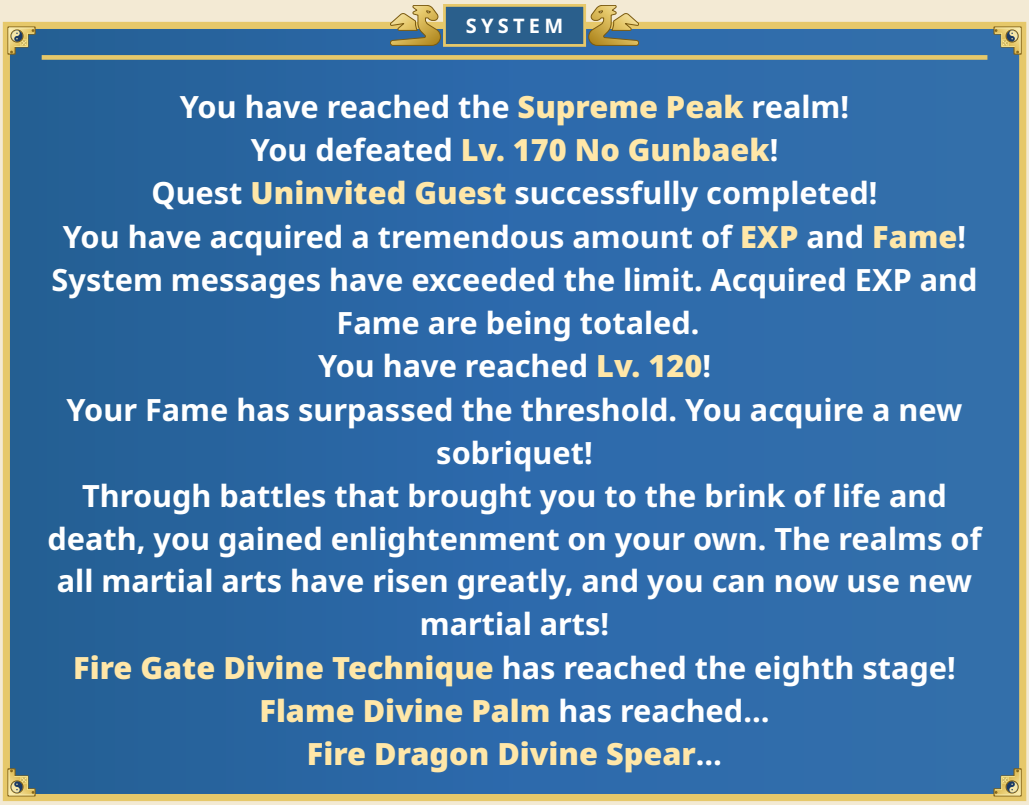
[1828] The Four Books and Three Classics are foundational texts of Confucian learning.

[1829] Gwiyeommi (□□□) is a literary pen name meaning "precious, bewitching beauty."

[1830] The Beggars' Sect marks disciples' ranks with knots; one knot denotes a low rank.

This had happened a few times before, but this had to be a new record.

Momentarily speechless, I began checking the important messages one by one.



Countless requests for handshakes—no, a veritable feast of messages.

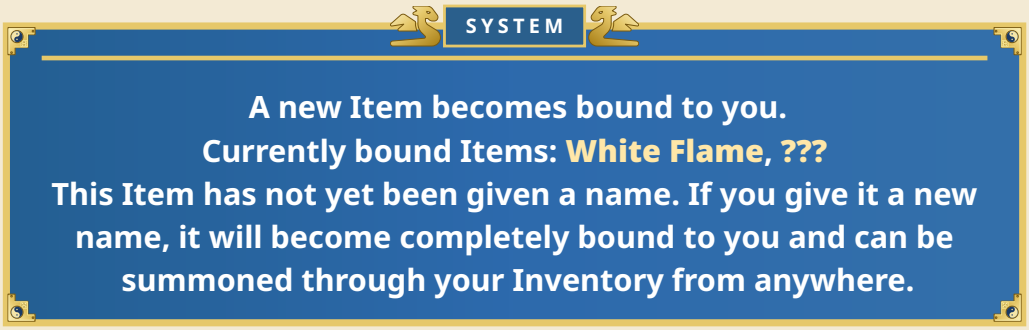
My eyes started spinning just from skimming them.

“...Holy shit.”

What was all this?

I was almost stunned to discover that half the unread messages still remained.

Just as I scrolled down to see how many were left, something unusual caught my eye.



“This pops up here...”

The Modern World and Murim inventories were separate. However, bound Items like White Flame weren’t restricted by space and could be pulled out and used anywhere.

I'd already felt that White Flame alone wasn't enough, so this was quite a stroke of luck.

If they're giving it to me, I'll gladly take it.

I was just about to check my Inventory, brimming with anticipation, when—

Knock, knock, knock.

A knock sounded on the door, and someone poked their head inside.

"Captain. It's me, Mujin…"

"Get lost."

"No, that's not what I meant."

"Hyung's[1831] busy. Go read some Gwiyeommi novels."[1832]

"Oh, Captain, you've read them too?"

"…You little bastard, seriously."

This wouldn't do.

Before cracking open the Item, I'd have to crack that bastard open first.

I shot up from the bed, and Hyuk Mujin hurriedly shouted,

"Henan! It's Henan!"

"What?"

"An investigation team has arrived from Henan! They're looking for you, Captain."

"…An investigation team?"

I frowned at Hyuk Mujin's completely contextless explanation.

Ding.

A familiar alert reached my ears.

[1831] Hyung is a familiar Korean term used by a man for an older brother or older male acquaintance. Here Jin uses it to refer to himself when speaking to Mujin.

[1832] Gwiyeommi (□□□) is a literary pen name meaning "precious, bewitching beauty."

Chapter 374

Tang Horyong, the Master of Poison Dragon Pavilion, rose from his seat to greet his guest.

An imposing man had just opened the door and entered, and an indescribable pressure radiated from him.

“You’ve had a long journey.”

“Compared to what the Sichuan Tang Clan has endured, it was nothing. Allow me to offer my deepest condolences once again.”

Despite his rough features, the man’s voice was low and gentle, yet possessed a force that compelled others to listen.

It was the sort of presence only a leader of men possessed. The man’s gaze was mild yet unfathomably deep, and it suddenly reminded Tang Horyong of someone.

It feels as though I’m facing another older cousin…

That realization left Tang Horyong more than a little unsettled.

He had heard that the man before him was still young—not yet forty.

His older cousin, on the other hand, was an extraordinary figure not only in age but also in his standing within the Murim.

He was an iron-willed Family Head who had accomplished countless military feats during the Great Faction War and rebuilt his fallen family stronger than ever.

Tang Sadok, the Myriad-Poison Asura.

Tang Horyong, the Acting Family Head of the Sichuan Tang Clan, sighed inwardly as he thought of his older cousin, who had yet to regain consciousness.

Please wake soon and lead us, Family Head.

Tang Horyong had been born a martial artist.

He prided himself on having mastered poison and hidden weapons, but leading a family was an entirely different matter.

Especially lately, countless problems had been pouring in from every direction, leaving him no time even to think about the grief and anger caused by the loss of his blood relatives.

If only someone like this were standing in my place.

In that sense, Tang Horyong couldn’t help envying the man before him.

Nor was he judging him solely by his first impression. He had already heard plenty of rumors about the man.

Even if only a quarter of them were true, the man was more than capable of leading a family.

“Sir Tang, is there something on my face?”

“Ah, no. I’ve been so distracted that I forgot my manners. My apologies.”

At Tang Horyong’s hurried apology, the man nodded gravely.

"Not at all. It's understandable after everything you've suffered."

In truth, even the word devastating fell short of describing the damage the Sichuan Tang Clan had suffered.

Nearly ninety percent of the clan's people had died, and most of the Tang Clan's grounds had been destroyed.

Their only consolation was that the family line had survived, but restoring the clan to its former glory would take many years.

"Our fellow martial artists throughout Sichuan have gone out of their way to help us, but… I fear what lies ahead."

If Tang Sadok, the Family Head, had been in his position, he would never have shown weakness under any circumstances.

Tang Horyong was different.

At his honest words, the man gently ran his long fingers over his teacup.

"I believe you know why I came here, Sir Tang."

"I understand that you came to investigate the Three-Gate Bloodbath."

"To be precise, when I first left Henan, my purpose was to find the culprit who murdered the late Poison King Tang Sadok and the Heaven-Shaking Venerable Nun. However, the situation changed drastically on the way here."

"That's right. Dark Heaven, those bastards beyond the pale, finally revealed their fangs."

"Although we already had the incident in Henan as precedent, the fact that they dared to attack three renowned clans and sects across the land at once proves that war is already upon us."

Small disturbances breed greater chaos.

But Dark Heaven's existence could no longer be concealed, nor was there any reason to hide it.

Seven days and nights had passed since the horrific Three-Gate Bloodbath.

By now, word without feet would have traveled a thousand li,[1833] and countless messenger pigeons would be flying to every corner of the realm.

And war—not mere chaos—had brought people together.

"I heard the orthodox Murim has been rallying in Henan since the Shaolin Bloodshed. Then, perhaps…"

"For now, they are still making preparations. But it is already a foregone conclusion."

The man continued in a weighty voice.

"That brings me to my proposal. Would you consider going to Henan?"

"Henan."

"Yes. What you're thinking of will happen soon."

[1833] In this Chinese setting, one li is about 500 m (0.311 mi); a thousand li is about 500 km (310 mi).

After a brief silence, Tang Horyong spoke.

“I’m grateful to be invited to such an honorable occasion, but I cannot leave now. As you know, as Acting Family Head, I must remain with the members of our family…”

“Sir Tang.”

“Go on.”

“As you just said, you are the Acting Family Head. Naturally, you cannot leave the members of the Tang Clan behind.”

“…!”

Only then did Tang Horyong understand what the man was proposing. His mouth fell open.

It was something he had never dared even consider.

“So you’re saying that we should move our family headquarters?”

“Well…”

The man’s clear gaze, as though it could see straight through him, settled on Tang Horyong.

“Great Hero Mae Jonghak told me that a war even greater than the Great Faction War would soon break out.”

“The Sword Saint…”

Tang Horyong swallowed a groan.

That could not be the Sword Saint’s opinion alone.

The Shaolin Bloodshed had awakened the anger and vigilance of countless orthodox martial artists, and the new Murim Alliance was already poised to take shape.

The entire orthodox Murim was preparing for the coming war.

Can our family survive in a situation like this?

The question flashed through his mind, and his heart sank.

The Sichuan Tang Clan had already suffered a blow unprecedented in its history.

Moreover, the Qingcheng Sect and Emei Sect had also lost a considerable portion of their forces.

If the enemy attacked again, there was little hope of stopping them.

“Haa…”

As Tang Horyong sighed with a dazed expression, a quiet voice reached his ears.

“Sir Tang, why do you think the Sichuan Tang Clan has endured for the past several hundred years?”

“That is…”

“Because it was the Tang Clan. Even if you remove the first two characters—Sichuan—that fact does not change.”

“…!”

"If you make the decision, the orthodox Murim will help the Tang Clan."

Tang Horyong trembled before finally managing to speak.

"We have made countless enemies over the years. Even among the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families, there are those who regard our family with hostility. Will that truly cause no problems?"

"Everything will be handled fairly and openly. Put your mind at ease and establish a new home. Henan, Shaanxi, or…"

A gentle smile touched the man's lips.

"Shanxi would be a fine choice as well."

"Shanxi?"

"Just say the word. I have plenty of land to spare."

Tang Horyong suddenly remembered one fact he had overlooked.

The man before him was the Alliance Leader who had unified the Shanxi Murim, as well as the greatest landowner and wealthiest man in Shanxi Province.

"Thank you. Truly, thank you, Great Hero Jin!"

"Think nothing of it."

At that moment, Jin Wikyung, the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, returned the Acting Family Head of the Sichuan Tang Clan's clasped-fist salute with courtesy and dignity.

Clunk.

"Um, I heard you called for me."

Jin Wikyung spotted a young man poking his head through the gap in the pavilion door and unleashed a lion's roar.

"My youngest!"

Thud-thud-thud-thud—crash!

He charged like an enraged bull.

As Tang Horyong watched the two brothers reunite in something that fell somewhere between an embrace and a collision, he recalled one of the rumors he had heard about Jin Wikyung.

They say he's completely helpless when it comes to his younger brothers.

The Alliance Leader who had unified Shanxi Murim and the greatest landowner in Shanxi Province was nowhere to be seen.

In his place stood a hopelessly doting fool.

He's still young, so he lacks experience. He can't compare to my older cousin, who remains perfectly levelheaded at all times. Yes, of course.

Tang Horyong had no way of knowing about Mimi-chan.[1834]

[1834] The Japanese suffix -chan is an affectionate form of address.

“My youngest!”

Jin Wikyung charged at me with tears flying from his eyes and swept me into a fierce embrace.

I’d been in the Murim for two years now. I’d endured this kind of thing more times than I cared to remember, so I’d expected a reaction like this.

Crack!

…But I hadn’t expected that.

Seriously, why did I hear my bones shifting?

I sighed as he squeezed my entire body like an anaconda in the Amazon jungle.

Still, since he was happy to see me, I let him hug me without resisting. His reaction had never been this intense before, though.

“Wait, Hyung-nim.[1835] Let go and then we can talk. Let go.”

“Hyung-nim?[1836] Why are you using such a stiff form of address? Haven’t I told you to just call me hyung?[1837] You’ve changed. You’ve really changed!”

“Okay, I get it, so let me go now.”

“You used to speak informally when you were little! Why are you being so polite now? You’ve changed. You’ve really changed!”

“Let go, goddammit.”

“Gasp! You never swore, even at the height of your rebellious phase! You’ve changed—”

“Wow, that refrain is driving me insane.”

Was being a martial artist his main job and being a Dementor his side gig?

Shuddering at the feeling of my soul being sucked out, I reached out.

Whoosh—crash!

Jin Wikyung’s huge body slammed headfirst into the ground with a heavy thud.

A middle-aged man from the Sichuan Tang Clan, who had been watching us, let out a startled groan.

“It’s all right. Really. We’re just playing around.”

“N-No, but…”

“Look. He’s getting right back up.”

Just as I’d said, Jin Wikyung sprang to his feet as if nothing had happened, tears of emotion welling in his eyes.

[1835] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or a close older man. Hyung-nim is a more respectful form.

[1836] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or a close older man. Hyung-nim is a more respectful form.

[1837] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or a close older man. Hyung-nim is a more respectful form.

"You've grown even stronger. That's my youngest."

His utter lack of change made me snort with laughter.

"You really haven't changed."

"Haven't changed? Do you know how worried I've been these past two months? I couldn't sleep at night, and I lost my appetite until I was nothing but skin and bones."

I looked over his enormous, muscular frame and muttered, "You seem to have plenty of skin and bones."

Come to think of it, two months.

That much time had already passed.

It struck me anew that the time for me to return was drawing near.

If spending ten days in one world meant that only an hour or so passed in the other…

About six hours must have passed. The plane might be landing soon.

The timing couldn't have been better. I'd built up quite a bit of fatigue while overcoming the massive hurdle that was the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

Without wasting any more words, I got straight to the point.

"When are we leaving?"

"My youngest, you must have suffered so much… Hm?"

Jin Wikyung, who had been anxiously looking me over, froze.

"What did you just say?"

"You came to take me with you, didn't you? Oh, and the Third Fiend too."

Jin Wikyung's eyes widened.

"How did you know?"

The middle-aged man, who seemed to hold an important position in the Sichuan Tang Clan, also spoke in surprise.

"Great Hero Jin, did you not come to investigate the full circumstances of the incident?"

"I did, but several members of the investigation team, including myself, will be returning to Henan. Just before we reached Sichuan, we received orders to escort the Third Fiend, one of the chief culprits behind the Three-Gate Bloodbath."

"Then what about your proposal concerning our family?"

"That offer remains valid, of course. But relocating right away would be difficult for the Tang Clan."

"That is true. The Family Head is still in no condition to travel such a great distance, and we must obtain the consent of the other clan members."

"Yes. And…"

After speaking quietly with the middle-aged man for a moment, Jin Wikyung sent me a covert Sound Transmission.

But how did you know?

I can put two and two together. It seemed obvious from the circumstances.

Ah, my youngest. What terrible ordeal did you endure to become smarter as well?

…

That rubbed me the wrong way.

I hadn’t actually figured it out from the circumstances. I knew because a Quest to escort the Third Fiend had appeared.

“So when are we leaving?”

Having just finished his conversation, Jin Wikyung answered my question.

“If you already knew, that makes this easier. The sooner, the better. Are you ready?”

“I didn’t bring anything but the two balls between my legs. All I have to do is go.”

Plus two bundles wrapped tightly in bandages.

Jin Wikyung nodded and turned to the middle-aged man.

“Sir Tang, where is the Third Fiend?”

The man he had addressed as Sir Tang replied, “We bound their limbs and confined them under close watch. Ever since their testicles were crushed, they’ve tried to kill themselves at every opportunity, so you’ll need to be careful.”

“…Good grief.”

I’d want to die too if that happened to me.

In any case, everything was in place for us to move quickly.

Jin Wikyung considered it for a moment, then answered decisively.

“Then half a shichen.[1838] We’ll leave within half a shichen.[1839] Is that acceptable?”

“No problem.”

The instant I answered without hesitation, a frantic commotion arose outside the pavilion, followed by someone shouting.

“The Family Head! The Family Head has awakened!”

Jin Wikyung amended his words in a lukewarm voice.

“One shichen.[1840] Let’s make it one shichen.[1841]”

“…Yes. That sounds better.”

What a shame. I could’ve taken the Myriad-Poison Ring and run.

[1838] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.
[1839] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.
[1840] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.
[1841] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

Chapter 375

There was an order to visiting the sick.

When word spread that Tang Sadok—the Family Head and an elder of the clan—had awakened, the members of the Tang Clan dropped everything and came running.

But not all hundred-plus of them could see him.

“Benefactor, when can we go see Grandpa Tang?”

“Hard to say. The people ahead of us have been in there for a while, so they should be coming out soon.”

“Oh, I see.”

Cheongpung nodded at my answer.

Wait. Cheongpung?

“What are you doing here? When did you get here?”

“Just now.”

He had joined the conversation so naturally that I hadn’t even noticed him. But why had he come here?

As if he had read my mind, Cheongpung pointed at his chest.

“Mimi said she wanted to see him.”

“…?”

What the hell had I just heard?

Now he could even communicate with a snake. Was this guy from Slytherin instead of Huashan?

Cheongpung tilted his head at my suspicious stare.

“Why are you looking at my forehead all of a sudden? Is there something on it?”

“I was just checking whether you had a lightning-shaped scar on your forehead.”

“What?”

“There is such a thing.”

The instant I finished speaking—

Clunk.

The tightly shut door of the infirmary opened, and about a dozen people emerged.

They were among the few surviving direct descendants of the Sichuan Tang Clan. Tang Horyong, whom I had met before, was among them.

“Whew…”

His eyes bloodshot, he looked up at the sky before walking toward us.

“The Family Head wishes to see you.”

“We’ve been waiting.”

Jin Wikyung nodded and led the way. Cheongpung and I followed him into the infirmary.

We walked through the heavy smell of medicinal decoctions until a physician with a white cloth covering his nose and mouth led us into a treatment room.

At last, we came face-to-face with several familiar people.

“Cough… You came.”

Tang Sadok’s condition was serious at a glance. His limbs were broken, and the qi within him was unstable from his internal injuries.

The Divine Physician, who exchanged a brief glance with us, stopped Tang Sadok as he tried to sit up.

“Family Head, did I not tell you not to move?”

“This old man is a sinner. I committed a crime deserving of death, so it is only right that I ask for punishment.”

Tang Sadok shook his pale head, stared directly at me, and continued.

“I will make no pathetic excuses. The Western Heaven Demon Lord went to the underground prison because I told him about it.”

I folded my arms at an angle.

“Ah. No wonder.”

“…?”

“Why?”

Tang Sadok asked with a flustered expression.

“Ah, you knew?”

“Of course I didn’t know at first. Things were too hectic back then. But when I thought about it later, I started wondering how the hell that bastard knew where the Myriad-Poison Ring was.”

Only a tiny number of people knew its location.

Cheongpung might have looked as light as a flower petal, but he was as steadfast as the roots of a tree. That left Tang Sadok as the only person who could have revealed it.

“Why did you do it?”

“He said that if I told him where the Myriad-Poison Ring was, he would preserve our family’s bloodline.”

“And you believed him?”

“This old man was foolish. My judgment was clouded for a moment, and I did something I never should have done.”

“At least you realize that much.”

Tang Sadok’s eyes trembled as he looked at me.

“The reason this old man survived must have been Heaven’s will. I was spared so that I might apologize to you and receive my punishment.”

"Then what punishment do you seek, Family Head?"

The cold voice belonged to Jin Wikyung, who had been silently listening to our conversation.

"Are you the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan?"

"Yes. I am also the elder brother who raised my two younger brothers as if they were my own sons."

Unmistakable anger smoldered in Jin Wikyung's dark eyes.

"It was something no one who walks the righteous path should have done."

"I know. No… I am well aware. That is why I ask to be punished."

"What if I order you to take your own life?"

"…!"

Everyone, myself included, stared at Jin Wikyung in shock.

Everyone except Tang Sadok.

His expression perfectly calm, he answered.

"I betrayed the principles of the Way, yet because all of you risked your lives to fight for us, our family's bloodline will endure. If this worthless old man's life can serve as atonement, I will gladly offer it."

A brief silence followed. Then Jin Wikyung sighed.

"Whew…"

He regarded Tang Sadok with a complicated look before turning to me.

"What will you do?"

"…What? Have him take his own life?"

"Anything."

Having the hilt of a sword suddenly placed in my hand made my heart clench.

Especially when the life hanging from the other end belonged to the Family Head of the Sichuan Tang Clan.

Look how icy the mood suddenly got.

Of course, this wasn't something I could just laugh off. I wasn't some perfectly impartial, broad-minded Great Hero of Benevolence and Righteousness. When I figured out the whole story, anger had quietly begun simmering inside me.

Everyone's lives had been on the line back then, not just mine.

But…

"Forget it. I don't want to take it that far."

The truth was, part of me understood Tang Sadok's position.

If I had to weigh an outsider I had met only a few times against my own blood—people I was duty-bound to protect as the head of my family—I might have made the same choice.

Besides, I owed him.

Tang Sadok's help had played a major part in Jeok Cheongang's awakening.

Even if there had been a certain deal involved, Tang Sadok had still been the one who lent us a divine artifact without telling even his own blood relatives.

"So let's call it even. No, that's going too far. Let's just say the Sichuan Tang Clan owes us a huge debt for what happened."

When I finished, Cheongpung and the Divine Physician spoke up.

"It was definitely Grandpa Tang's fault that Benefactor was put in danger... but I'll follow Benefactor's wishes, too."

"I have already forgotten about it. If I have one wish as a physician, it is for the Family Head to recover as soon as possible. There are still clan members who survived, aren't there?"

Jin Wikyung spoke last. Unlike before, there was no longer any anger in his voice.

No—perhaps he had known what my answer would be from the start.

"So that is what they say. What do you think, Family Head?"

"...!"

Tang Sadok's eyes shook with emotion as he looked at us.

After a brief silence, a hoarse voice escaped his lips.

"This old man... The Sichuan Tang Clan owes all of you a tremendous debt of gratitude."

The instant Tang Sadok bowed his head in heartfelt thanks—

Ding. Ding. Ding.

SYSTEM

Confessing one's sins is difficult, but something else requires even greater courage:
Forgiveness.
Hidden Quest Atonement and Forgiveness successfully completed!
Lv. 115 Tang Sadok expresses his profound gratitude for your goodwill. He and the Sichuan Tang Clan will never forget the kindness and aid you showed them today. The people of the Sichuan Tang Clan will remember you as their Benefactor!
You have acquired the Title: Tang Clan's Benefactor!
You have received a tremendous amount of EXP and Fame as a reward for completing the Hidden Quest!
Level Up!

What the hell? A Hidden Quest out of nowhere?

While I stood dazed by the unexpected System notifications, something cold brushed between my legs and slipped past.

Sssrikk, sssriririk.

“Mimi, you little rascal.”

Seeing Mimi and Tang Sadok reunited after so long reminded me of something I had momentarily forgotten.

“Oh, right. About the Myriad-Poison Ring… Luckily, I’ve kept it safe all this time—”

“Is that so?”

Tang Sadok cut in before I could finish.

“Then continue keeping it.”

“Yes, then I’ll keep it… Wait, what?”

“I entrust our family’s divine artifact to you. Consider it a token of our gratitude to our Benefactor, and please do not refuse.”

Ding.

SYSTEM

By the owner’s will, Myriad-Poison Ring has been transferred to you!
A new Item has become bound to you!
Currently bound Items: White Flame, Myriad-Poison Ring, ???
One bound Item has not yet been given a name. Please give it a new name.

What was with today?

I was starting to get nervous. What kind of fucked-up shit was waiting for me if the System was showering me with rewards like this?

Seeing me open and close my mouth like a goldfish, Tang Sadok smiled faintly.

“If there is anything you desire, tell me. So long as it lies within our family’s power, I will grant it.”

The Divine Physician smiled along with him and answered,

“All I desire is for the patients to recover as soon as possible.”

“Oh?”

An answer worthy of the Divine Physician. Or should I call him Dong Feng now?

One thing was certain: he too was a Divine Physician in every sense of the title.

“What do you desire?”

Cheongpung jumped at the sudden question.

“M-Me?”

Tang Sadok nodded. Cheongpung twisted his hands and feet awkwardly as he answered.

“I… Well… Hmm. Nothing.”

"Are you sure?"

"Yes. I don't think there's anything."

"…"

"…"

Hey, you little bastard. Take your eyes off Mimi-chan[1842] and talk.

I wanted to bring him a mirror and show him what he looked like. His eyes were filled with aching longing and desire for Mimi-chan[1843].

At this rate, he's going to bore a hole through her scales.

Just then, Tang Sadok spoke.

"This little one is an old friend of mine. For the past several decades, she has been the only one with whom I could share the joy, anger, sorrow, and delight I could never reveal to anyone else."

Cheongpung looked at Tang Sadok with pity.

"Grandpa Tang, you don't have any other friends."

"I did not make any. Being the Family Head of the Tang Clan was that kind of position."

"So you don't have any friends."

"It is not that I had none. I could have made them, but…"

"You didn't have a single friend. How sad."

"…"

The Divine Physician hurriedly grabbed Tang Sadok by the shoulder.

"Family Head, calm yourself. You're breathing far too quickly!"

"Huff… Hoo, huff…"

"Take deep, slow breaths. Now, follow me. One, two…"

"Whoooosh…"

After narrowly surviving a bout of high blood pressure, Tang Sadok looked at Cheongpung and spoke.

"But I could entrust Mimi to you…"

Cheongpung covered his mouth with both hands.

"No, Grandpa Tang. I can't take your only friend away from you."

"…I haven't said I would entrust her to you yet."

"Oh. Ohhh."

Tang Sadok let out a deep sigh. For a moment, he had undoubtedly wondered whether it was really safe to entrust Mimi-chan[1844] to someone like that.

"Yes, you guessed correctly. Since we do not know what will become of our family, I wish to entrust Mimi to you. Temporarily, of course."

[1842] -chan is a Japanese suffix expressing affection or familiarity.

[1843] -chan is a Japanese suffix expressing affection or familiarity.

[1844] -chan is a Japanese suffix expressing affection or familiarity.

“Yaaay!”

“Did you hear that last part? Temporarily.”

“Yaaay!”

I’ll bet Hyuk Mujin’s right wrist he didn’t hear it.

Cheongpung was beside himself with joy at becoming Mimi’s temporary guardian.

“Don’t worry. I’ll take good care of her!”

“From what I saw last time, Mimi does seem to follow you well. However, she is naturally quite fussy and very wary of strangers, so…”

“Mimi. Whirlwind, then spin around and around and say hello!”

Sssriririk!

“Oh, shit.”

She busted out a new move right here.

Jin Wikyung, who had been half out of his mind at the sight, muttered in a dazed voice,

“It seems you have nothing to worry about, Family Head.”

An earthquake struck Tang Sadok’s eyes.

Tang Sadok asked Jin Wikyung to remain behind for a private conversation, so Cheongpung and I left the room first.

No—one more person had just been added.

“Young Hero Jin, could you spare this old man a moment?”

“Me?”

The Divine Physician nodded with a gentle smile.

“There is something I must ask of you before you leave.”

Chapter 376

A sea of people.

There was no other way to describe the scene.

Word had spread that the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi—no, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung—and the Huashan Divine Dragon Cheongpung were leaving, and people had gathered like clouds.

Not only martial artists but fearless ordinary citizens had come to see them off. The crowd stretched on endlessly, one person after another, too many to count.

“Safe travels, Blazing Flame Divine Dragon!”

“Sichuan Murim will never forget you!”

“It has horns! The Huashan Divine Dragon has a horned snake!”

“Whoa! The snake just did a flip in midair!”

“Fire King! The Fire King grabbed the snake and is trying to roast it!”

The murmuring noise gradually faded into the distance as the procession moved away.

On a deserted hill, a boy sat on a tree stump watching the entire scene. Then he suddenly spoke.

“We’ve come a long way.”

“Indeed. I’m getting tired.”

His elderly Disciple dropped heavily onto the grass, breathing hard. Mungyeong murmured,

“…We truly have come a long way.”

He wasn’t talking about distance. Mungyeong was speaking of the years they had traveled together.

“Do you remember when we first met?”

“How could I forget?”

The old Disciple wiped the sweat from his brow as though the scorching sun of that day were beating down on him once more.

“The first year of Hongwu.[1845] That unusually hot summer.”

It was the year the civil war over the imperial throne ended and a new Son of Heaven ascended.

The young, ambitious emperor changed the era name and sought to enact reforms, but the people, exhausted by the long civil war, were too weary to heed the Son of Heaven’s will and take part.

“Rebellions broke out across the land, and bandits ran rampant.”

[1845] Hongwu was the reign name of Zhu Yuanzhang, the founding emperor of China’s Ming dynasty.

“Drought came, and swarms of locusts swept across the plains. The corpses of government soldiers and rebels lay everywhere, and epidemics raged.”

“Yes. It was truly a time of chaos.”

Death begot more death, and before long, it swallowed the continent whole.

A young carpenter surnamed Dong could not escape the dark shadow cast over the land.

“Even now, I sometimes think back to those days.”

The passing decades had changed more than mountains and rivers. The young carpenter who had lost his beloved wife and two children to the epidemic had grown into an old physician.

“I wonder whether I might have saved my family if I had been a little faster. If I had found you sooner.”

“Do you regret it?”

“Yes.”

Sitting on a hill close to the heavens and gazing at wisps of cloud drifting by, the old physician’s eyes became those of the young carpenter once more.

“I will regret it for as long as I draw breath.”

He had been only one day too late.

By the time the carpenter dragged his plague-stricken body to the slash-and-burn settlement and returned with the nameless old physician staying there, it was already over.

He cried for an entire day, then dug a grave for his family. Afterward, he made a single request of the physician he had brought back.

“Please bury me with them. That was what I asked.”

Mungyeong replied bluntly.

“And so I slapped you across the face.”

“It hurt. So much that I wanted to die.”

It hurt. The pain had nothing to do with his life hanging in the balance. It came from knowing he would never see his beloved wife and children again.

“You were the one who helped me back to my feet, Master.”

Mungyeong shook his head.

“I only held out my hand. You chose to take it and rise.”

“I had to live. I had something I needed to do.”

By all rights, the carpenter should have died from the epidemic as well.

But the physician cured him with medical arts unlike anything he had ever seen. For the first time, the carpenter realized that even a mere human could alter the cycle of birth, aging, sickness, and death ordained by Heaven.

“I can still see it clearly. You kneeling before me and begging me to accept you as my Disciple.”

“That differs from what this Disciple remembers. I remember you beckoning for me to follow.”

The young carpenter who had lost his family found a new goal, while the old physician who roamed the land tending to poor and helpless patients gained a new Disciple.

It was only many years later that the carpenter, now a physician named Dong Feng, learned his Master’s true identity.

“The Slaughter Saint… A truly terrifying sobriquet. That was the first time you seemed like a stranger to me, Master.”

Mungyeong gazed impassively into the distance.

What he was about to ask was something he had never once asked his Disciple.

“Why did you not leave?”

“Did you think I would leave you, Master?”

“I have taken more lives than I can count. I was nothing but a hideous Killing Ghost who concealed his past. I would have understood if you had left.”

“Perhaps I might have. But I knew all too well what kind of man you were, Master.”

The next words came softly.

“The Divine Physician. My Master is the man known as the Divine Physician. You would never kill without reason.”

“…!”

Mungyeong’s eyes trembled.

It was a truth he had never told anyone—and one no one had ever been willing to acknowledge.

He had lived as an assassin and personally taken countless lives from the orthodox faction, the unorthodox faction, and the Demonic Cult alike. Every one of them had given him reason to kill them.

A Great Hero of the orthodox faction, renowned for his fairness and integrity, had made a pastime of raping and murdering women. A master of the unorthodox faction had slaughtered an entire village for amusement.

Had the Demonic Cult’s invading armies not killed and destroyed indiscriminately throughout the Central Plains, and had the greatest assassin under Heaven not finally stepped forward to kill its notorious fiends, he could never have become known as the Slaughter Saint.

“If I had not fought the Demonic Cult, the entire world would have pointed fingers at me. Just as it always had.”

The title of Slaughter Saint was merely absolution granted by the orthodox faction once it became the master of Murim—and praise for a powerful man.

Though Mungyeong had always been Mungyeong, people neither knew nor tried to learn the truth hidden behind him.

“Why did you never tell anyone?”

“It is all in the past. I wished to leave Murim, and I became a physician as I intended. That is how I will continue to live.”

Mungyeong slowly rose. By then, the long procession from the Sichuan Tang Clan had already vanished into the distance.

“Let us go down. There are patients waiting for us.”

He spoke in a dry voice and had just taken a step when his Disciple spoke.

“A great war will break out soon.”

Mungyeong stopped dead. Behind him, his elderly Disciple continued.

“What happened back then will happen again. Countless people will die or be wounded. There will be no end to those who lose their parents and children, nor to the screams and death.”

“…We will be very busy. I should make preparations.”

“You know what I am trying to say, Master.”

“I do not wish to know.”

“Master.”

“I am a physician. Though I broke the promise I made to myself and was forced to kill, I will not make the same mistake again.”

Mungyeong continued slowly.

“Fighting is their responsibility, and treating the sick is ours. My heart left Murim long ago.”

“Then why have you never abandoned your martial arts?”

“…!”

Mungyeong was left speechless.

It was a question he himself had harbored for years. If he had wanted to leave Murim because he hated killing, then he should also have abandoned martial arts—the means by which he killed.

Yet his martial arts had advanced even further. Proof that he had been unable to relinquish his attachment to them.

Why?

His elderly Disciple’s voice broke through his brief reverie.

“You can treat hundreds, even thousands of patients, Master. But you are also a man capable of saving tens of thousands of lives at once.”

“…”

“Please prevent this war as the Divine Physician, not the Slaughter Saint. This Disciple will remain here and care for the patients.”

Mungyeong suddenly raised his head and looked at the sky.

Clear and blue.

Seven days earlier, when the Sichuan Tang Clan had been stained with blood, that sky had been filled with dark clouds.

“The sky is clear.”

With those blunt words, Mungyeong resumed walking.

“I should tend to the patients. Take your time coming down.”

Dong Feng’s voice drifted after him as he descended the hill.

“The Hour of the Dog.[1846] They said the ship would depart from Chengdu’s western harbor.”

“Pointless. Murim is not where I belong.”

Yet a faint smile touched the old Disciple’s lips as he watched his Master’s back recede into the distance.

“Please… remain in good health.”

Whoooosh.

A wind blew from somewhere, sweeping between them.

“What are you looking at so intently?”

At Hyuk Mujin’s question, I turned away from the crowd surrounding the harbor.

“Nothing. Just checking, in case.”

“In case of what?”

“You little pest, why are you prying into everything? If I say it’s nothing, just accept that it’s nothing.”

Hyuk Mujin gave me a knowing smile.

“I already know why you’re doing it, Captain.”

“…?”

I froze. How the hell did he know? Even Cheongpung hadn’t heard the conversation between the Divine Physician and me.

Was this guy always this perceptive?

Just as I was wondering, he whispered,

“Weren’t you looking at the Young Lady standing fourth from the right in the front row?”

“…”

“She certainly is pretty. She looks like the daughter of a wealthy family too. If you permit it, Captain, I could go over as your right-hand man and discreetly arrange somewhere private for the two of you…”

“Mujin.”

[1846] The traditional Hour of the Dog lasted roughly from 7 to 9 p.m.

"Yes? Ah, do you prefer meeting naturally? In that case…"

"Do you want to sink to the bottom of the Yangtze?"

"…!"

"Stop spouting bullshit and keep lying there. And don't start puking later because you're seasick."

"…Yes, sir."

As Hyuk Mujin quietly shrank into himself, Gung Gibang snickered.

"You idiot. It wasn't the fourth from the right. It was the third woman from the left. Anyone can see she is much prettier. Your eyes are screwed up."

"Want me to screw up your eyes for you?"

"…Sorry."

"Let's try to live like decent human beings. Decent human beings."

Sighing, I shook my head and swept my gaze over the cloud-like crowd one last time.

They were both definitely pretty, but the third woman from the left was more my type—

No. That wasn't the point.

Damn it. Those bastards kept going on about it, so now I keep looking at her.

As I was thinking that, a huge man with a copper-colored complexion approached me and spoke.

"Hey, Junior. No, not Junior. Young Hero Jin. No, Great Hero."

What is this, buffering?

The man cycling through forms of address at lightning speed was Ship-Fire Boy[1847] Mu Song. I offered him a solution.

"Just call me Junior."

"Ahem. Would that really be all right?"

"Why wouldn't it be? You had no trouble doing it before."

"Still, you have accomplished something extraordinary."

Fair enough. I had gone from a regional young prodigy known as the Sleeping Dragon of Shanxi to a nationally famous figure.

"And Great Hero Jeok does not seem particularly fond of me…"

"It's fine. He's never liked water much to begin with."

Where Mu Song was glancing, Jeok Cheongang stood with his face twisted in fury.

Beside him, Jin Wikyung was examining some bamboo slip whose purpose I couldn't make out, while Cheongpung taught Mimi a new trick.

"Mimi, ride the waves!"

Sssrik, shaaaash!

[1847] Mu Song's sobriquet literally refers to a boy who lights fires aboard a ship.

Was that a water snake?

Distracted for a moment by the rare spectacle, Mu Song finally spoke with an awkward expression.

“Anyway, everything is ready. When should we depart?”

“What time is it?”

“The Hour of the Dog you mentioned has already passed. It would be best to leave before it grows any darker.”

“…Hmm.”

“Are we waiting for someone else?”

I considered Mu Song’s question for a moment, then shook my head.

“No. No one.”

“Then we can depart.”

“Let’s do that.”

“Understood.”

Mu Song raised one hand high, and the river pirates, already fully prepared, moved in perfect unison.

Just as the people gathered to see us off began waving—

“Wait! Wait just a moment!”

“Stop! Stop!”

The bow of the swift ship shuddered as it began pulling away from the harbor.

Far off in the distance, I spotted a boy forcing his way through the crowd. I let out a short laugh.

“Let’s take one more person aboard before we go.”

Chapter 377

“Have they left?”

The Captain of the Guards answered the tense question from the plump, middle-aged City Lord of Sichuan Province.

“Yes. The swift ship of the Yangtze River Channel League carrying them departed half an hour ago.”

“Whew.”

The City Lord let out such a deep sigh of relief that his belly jiggled, then waved a hand.

“All right, you may withdraw. If you hear any news concerning the martial artists, report it immediately.”

“Understood. But what about the troops stationed near Chengdu…?”

The City Lord frowned.

“Listen, Captain of the Guards.”

“Yes?”

“Do I need to concern myself with every trivial detail? Handle that sort of cleanup among yourselves. Consult the Military Commissioner, that stubborn bastard, if you have to. Hmm?”

“…”

The Captain of the Guards was speechless.

Were those words or a fart?

The City Lord’s incompetence and habit of dumping work on his subordinates were nothing new, but this was too much, even for him.

He wasn’t always this bad. Was he?

Several years ago, he had taken a favorite concubine, and ever since then, he had lost himself in carnal pleasures and neglected his official duties.

The Captain of the Guards sighed inwardly and gave a dispirited military salute.

“…I will carry out Your Excellency’s orders.”

“Of course you will. Then get to work. I have an important matter to attend to.”

Only then did the City Lord nod in satisfaction and rise from his seat.

The Captain of the Guards watched his retreating back as he huffed and puffed beneath his excessive weight, then muttered in a voice barely louder than an ant’s.

“Important matter, my ass. He’s probably off to embrace his favorite concubine again.”

The Captain of the Guards’ prediction was correct. The first place the City Lord visited after leaving the great hall was a lavishly decorated bedchamber.

“Aehyang! Aehyang!”

A beauty lying half-naked on a silk bed larger than most rooms sat up.

“My lord. Why did you take so long? Aehyang has been waiting for you.”

“Y-You have?”

The City Lord was dazed once by her coy eyes and twice by the snow-white skin peeking through the sheets. His mouth fell open in a foolish grin.

“I’m sorry. The Captain of the Guards kept bothering me.”

“That man again? My lord is already so busy. Why does he keep harassing you?”

“I know, right?”

“This is why incompetent underlings are such a problem. Without my lord, none of them could do anything.”

“You’re the only one who truly understands me, Aehyang!”

It was the sort of conversation that would have made the Captain of the Guards roll his eyes if he had heard it.

As the City Lord’s cheeks trembled with emotion, his favorite concubine opened both arms toward him.

“Come here, my lord. You’ve worked so hard. Let Aehyang hold you.”

“Aehyang…”

At the seductive smile lingering in his beloved concubine’s eyes, the City Lord’s gaze grew hazy.

“Could there possibly be a woman in all the world as beautiful as you?”

The City Lord had been born into a powerful family that had produced members of the Three Excellencies[1848] and had enjoyed a smooth path through life.

Backed by inexhaustible wealth, he had visited pleasure houses countless times and held every kind of beauty in his arms.

He had taken several women as concubines whenever they caught his fancy. But after meeting so many women, his interest in each had always faded within a year.

But this girl is different!

He swore he had never seen a woman like her. Her voice, her gaze, even the slightest movement of her fingertips—everything about Aehyang was enchanting and lovable in the City Lord’s eyes.

Even after several years, he never tired of the sight of her. No—if anything, he was sinking deeper under her spell, almost frighteningly so.

“I love you. I love you, Aehyang!”

The City Lord, who had just entered his fifties, cried out with the passion of a young man in love.

As though bewitched, he approached and nestled into his favorite concubine’s embrace. As he always did, he began telling her about everything that had happened that day. To the City Lord, she was the only person to whom he could confide even his most intimate secrets.

[1848] The Three Excellencies were the highest-ranking offices in the imperial government.

"…And so, those troublesome ruffians finally left."

"You mean those people, don't you? The martial artists who came here last time."

"That's right. The ones who brought His Highness Prince Shangshan's Token."

"Hmm."

"What is it?"

"Nothing. I was just thinking that you must have had such a difficult time because of this. I heard the martial artists got into a fight and many people were killed or injured."

The City Lord shook his head in disgust.

"Don't remind me. They dared to steal government uniforms from who knows where, put them on, and disrupt the order of the Great Nation."

"Oh my. Is that true?"

"You may find it hard to believe, but it is. Whatever else happens, I must submit a report to the imperial court about this…"

"How gallant of you. But, my lord…"

With a sweet smile, Aehyang stroked the City Lord's head where it rested on her lap.

"Wouldn't this become a serious matter if the imperial court found out?"

"H-Hmm?"

"Think about it. One day, my lord will rise to become one of the Three Excellencies[1849], command all the civil and military officials, and assist the Emperor… I'm worried that the people who envy you might use this incident against you."

"Heh heh. You truly are the only one who cares so much about me, Aehyang."

The City Lord gazed at his favorite concubine with overflowing affection.

But he was not a complete fool.

Though the government and Murim occupied mutually noninterfering spheres and generally regarded each other as none of their concern, well over a thousand people had died throughout Sichuan over the past seven days and nights.

He could leave the trivial cleanup to his subordinates, but this was something he needed to handle personally.

"Your concern is admirable, but the bigger the matter, the more trouble it causes if you try to hide it."

"My lord, do you really think I don't know that?"

"Hmm? Then what do you suggest?"

[1849]The Three Excellencies were the highest-ranking offices in the imperial government.

“Hide what must be hidden and exaggerate your accomplishments.”

Her coquettish voice tickled the City Lord’s ear.

“Say that there was a major conflict among the martial artists and that my lord mobilized the government troops under your command to bring the situation under control.”

“Hmm.”

“You will become a benevolent City Lord who restored the Great Nation’s order after it was disrupted by ruffians and cared for the common people. Of course, it would be best to leave out the part about the government weapons and uniforms. They might cause misunderstandings.”

“It would be nice if things went exactly as you say, Aehyang. But even so, submitting a false report to the court…”

“My lord, look at me.”

The hesitant City Lord let out a short exclamation when he saw her eyes, beautiful and gleaming like polished obsidian.

“Ah.”

“Do you not understand how I feel about you, my lord? How much I adore you?”

“I… That is…”

The City Lord could not finish his sentence.

The moment his eyes met his concubine’s, his mind had already gone blank.

His heart trembled at her alluring figure, and the flowerlike fragrance of her body made his senses swim.

An immense trust and affection that had risen from somewhere, along with unbearable desire, seized control of him.

“Aehyang, Aehyang!”

His voice was desperate. But his concubine caught the City Lord’s hand as it reached out to grope her body.

“My lord, what is your answer?”

“Of course I’ll do as you say. I’ll do anything for you!”

The smile on his concubine’s lips deepened.

“Well done. Just keep doing as you have until now. Do you understand?”

“Yes, yes!”

Overcome by intense desire, the City Lord failed to notice the ominous sight of an eerie red light seeping into the eyes of the concubine he loved so deeply.

“Oh, what a good boy. Our City Lord listens so well.”

His favorite concubine let out a peal of laughter.

Everything was proceeding exactly as she wanted—or rather, as that person wanted.

“Hmm?”

“What is it?”

“Nothing. I thought I heard some crazy bitch laughing just now.”

“A crazy woman? Here?”

“Yeah. It gave me a bad feeling.”

Hyuk Mujin and I looked around. Three swift ships flying the flags of the Water Dragon Stronghold were gliding unhindered along a broad tributary of the Yangtze, and naturally, there was not a woman aboard any of them.

“Did I hear wrong? That’s strange.”

After everything I’ve been through lately, am I hallucinating now?

As I pondered the question, Hyuk Mujin spoke with a serious expression.

“Could it be that…”

“That what?”

“You have been unable to forget the Young Lady standing fourth from the right in the front row?”

Gung Gibang shook his head.

“Bullshit. It was the third from the left. A beauty like that would be hard to forget.”

“Oh, so that’s what this was about?”

I smiled benevolently at the two of them.

“I think today is going to be a day neither of you will ever forget.”

Still smiling brightly, I beckoned. Several burly river pirates came running over and bowed repeatedly.

“Did you call for us, Great Hero Jin?”

“Is there something you need these humble servants to do?”

“Grab those two bastards and give them a little dip in the Yangtze.”

The river pirates stared back in confusion.

“Uh, did you say a dip?”

“We’re ignorant men, I’m afraid. What exactly does ‘dip’ mean?”

“Dipping is the proper culture[1850]… No, I mean just keep dunking their heads in the water and pulling them back out until I tell you to stop.”

“Ohhh, understood.”

“That sounds easy enough.”

“W-Wait a minute!”

“Captain!”

[1850] This refers to the Korean debate over jjikmeok, dipping food into sauce, versus pouring sauce over it.

Hyuk Mujin and Gung Gibang tried to resist, but it was hopeless.

One had only one good leg, while the other was wrapped in bandages from head to toe.

As several hulking, martial-arts-trained river pirates swarmed them, seized their arms and legs, and began the dunking show, I turned my attention to the System Window I had already left floating in the air.

SYSTEM

There is a bound Item that has not yet been named. Would you like to inspect it?

Obviously, yes.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Item Window
???
Type: Armor
Grade: Divine Weapon
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Description: A suit of armor containing the spirit of an unknown ancient master smith. It possesses truly formidable defensive power. With its former owner dead, it has become bound to a new owner. Once given a name, it can be freely used anywhere.

It became bound to me because its former owner died?

I had suspected as much, and it seemed the Item was exactly what I thought it was.

After turning my inventory upside down, I found the new bound Item. A flat, deflated sound escaped me.

"...To me?"

The thing resting on my palm was nothing more than a tiny fragment. It had once been called the Black Dragon Armor.

I definitely blasted it away along with that bastard, the Western Heaven Demon Lord, in the final One Annihilation. Did it automatically enter my inventory because it was a bound Item?

I could still vividly see the Black Dragon Armor shattering into pieces.

But I had no idea what I was supposed to do with a fragment this small.

I'd certainly feel safe with this tucked down the front of my underwear.

Ah. Was that why it was classified as armor?

I had just tugged at the front of my pants to check the most suitable position when —

“What are you doing—”

“…Ah.”

A chilly silence descended over the scene.

The boy’s face stiffened when he saw my loosened waistband and my hand shoved inside it.

After making sure no one else was nearby, the Slaughter Saint—no, Mungyeong—spoke.

“Of all places, here?”

“No, wait. I think there’s been a misunderstanding.”

I was about to hurriedly explain when Mungyeong’s gaze turned cold.

“I told you before we departed. In front of anyone other than the Fire King and Cheongpung, you are to treat me as Mungyeong.”

I answered with an aggrieved expression.

“You’re speaking informally too, asshole.”

“…!”

“Ah. Sorry.”

Mungyeong wore an expression of mixed emotions, then clicked his tongue as he glanced at the river pirates approaching us.

The terrifying Slaughter Saint transformed into the Divine Physician’s Disciple and a cheerful young medical apprentice in an instant.

“What were you doing?”

“What business is it of yours?”

“…!”

This was surprisingly fun. But I couldn’t do it three times.

I quickly held out my hand toward the speechless Mungyeong.

“This got into the waistband of my pants.”

That was not entirely true, of course, but Mungyeong did not care about any of that. More precisely, his gaze was fixed on the fragment of the Black Dragon Armor.

“This is…”

“Do you happen to know this Item? No, do you recognize it?”

“Where did you get it?”

“From that guy.”

Mungyeong understood that I meant the Western Heaven Demon Lord and nodded.

“You acquired a Divine Weapon. I do not know how only a fragment came to remain, though.”

“He called it the Black Dragon Armor.”

“The Black Dragon Armor?”

“What? Is that different from the name you knew?”

“I read about it in an old secret history. It spoke of a mysterious suit of armor with no fixed name, whose form and properties changed according to its owner.”

“Its form and properties change? How?”

Mungyeong answered with a look that suggested I was an idiot.

Only then did I realize what I needed to do.

Internal energy.

An owner’s internal energy embodied their form and nature.

Ssshhh.

Following the formula of the eighth-stage Fire Gate Divine Technique, I sent lava-like energy flowing toward the fragment of the Black Dragon Armor.

The ink-black energy swirling over the fragment’s surface disappeared, and bluish-white Scorching Yang Qi filled its place.

Now engraved with a pattern resembling blazing flames, the object could no longer be called the Black Dragon Armor.

Fire Dragon Armor.

It was simple, but there could be no more fitting name.

The moment I smiled in satisfaction, a cheerful chime rang out.

Ding.

SYSTEM

You have given the bound Item ??? a new name!
You can now freely use Fire Dragon Armor anywhere!
Fire Dragon Armor is resonating with your energy! It seeks its owner’s strength to repair its damaged sections on its own!

Whoosh.

I could feel the vast amount of internal energy leaving my body and rushing toward the Fire Dragon Armor.

I pretended to tuck the energy-draining object into my arms before storing it in my inventory.

Automatic repair? That’s incredible.

I had definitely acquired something useful.

Thank goodness the last gift I received on this journey was the Fire Dragon Armor.

Mungyeong stared at me with wide eyes as I turned away.

“Where are you go—where are you headed?”

“What business is it of yours?”

“…!”

I was starting to think I might get addicted to this.

I waved at Mungyeong, who was probably repeating the character for patience in his head.

“I’m going to take a nap. Don’t wake me.”

“…?”

Yes. Now it was time to awaken from a long sleep.

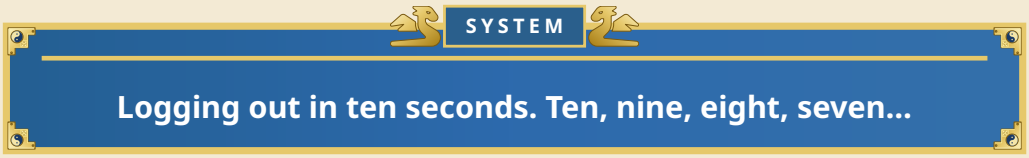
But…

Why do I feel so uneasy? Did I forget something?

Frowning, I found a place in the swift ship’s cabin and lay down. I closed my eyes, drew a deep breath, and spoke the command.

Logout.

Ding.

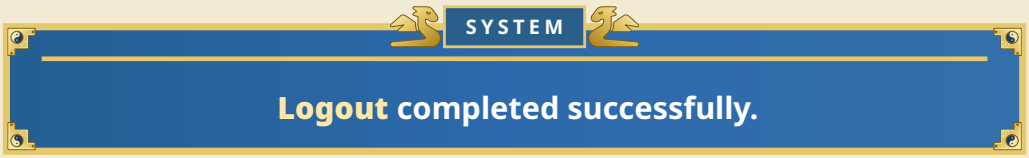


With the final count, the sound of splashing water and someone’s distant cries seeped faintly into my ears.

Splash! Gasp! “Captain, save—” Gasp!

Chapter 378

Ding.



With the cheerful System notification, the senses that had briefly fallen away began to return.

The softness of the bed against my back. The warm air inside the private jet.

And the hands gripping and shaking both my shoulders, along with someone's shouting.

"Mr. Jin Taekyung! Wake up! Mr. Jin Taekyung!"

—Wake up, you wicked human!

At the two urgent voices drilling into my ears—no, the voices of one monster and one human—I blinked.

As my vision cleared, a familiar face came into view.

"Uh, Team Leader Choi…"

Smack!

"Wake up!"

—Well done, you slightly less wicked human!

"…"

What the hell?

Stunned by the completely unexpected slap, I answered in a daze.

"I'm awake…"

"What is wrong with you?! We've been trying to wake you up! Why are you only getting up now?!"

—Just die! Go ahead and die!

"S-Sorry…"

Talk about forceful. This was the first time I had ever seen Team Leader Choi this furious.

Lightning practically shot from the eyes of the man who stayed calm no matter what happened and spent his time showing off designer goods.

But what's gotten into him? We're still on the plane, aren't we?

I had apologized reflexively, but I was still bewildered. Was this really enough to earn a slap?

Then—

"This is no time for this! Hurry—"

“Aaaah!”

The rest of Team Leader Choi’s words were drowned out by the flight attendants’ screams. Shouts from men I assumed were the pilots followed.

“Mayday! Mayday! Mayday!”

“Control tower! Control toweeer!”

“…What the fuck?”

What the hell was happening?

As I frantically looked around, Team Leader Choi dropped a bombshell.

“We’re under attack by monsters!”

“Monsters? An attack?”

What kind of bullshit was that? We were flying at twenty-five thousand feet in a private jet sent by China’s Central Committee.

By now, it wouldn’t have been strange to see our destination, Chengdu International Airport in Sichuan Province—

“Huh?”

I absentmindedly turned my head to look out the window, then stared with my mouth hanging open.

Far below, flames surged from the sprawling airport while dots of every size moved across the grounds.

It was a battle. Humans and monsters were fighting each other to the death.

And that wasn’t all.

—Kyaoo-o-o-o!

A gigantic monster was rapidly closing in on our private jet.

That’s…

There was no mistaking it. Even after rubbing my eyes and looking again, it was a Wyvern.

An A-rank monster classified as dragonkin alongside the Drake.

They were bastards I wouldn’t want to meet even on the ground, let alone at twenty-five thousand feet.

And there were more than ten of them!

…What kind of fucked-up situation is this?

A fierce battle raged around Chengdu International Airport below, while a pack of Wyverns pursued our private jet at twenty-five thousand feet.

It didn’t take my temporarily frozen brain long to reach a conclusion.

“Lich!”

The name burst from my mouth like lightning.

A week ago in the modern world, the apex undead monster had appeared alongside an unprecedented monster wave. It had undoubtedly extended its sinister reach all the way here.

“The control tower isn’t responding!”

“The Wyverns, the Wyverns…”

“Kyaaaah!”

—I knew this would happen! We’re all as good as dead!

Even in my panic, I corrected the Skeleton Warlord.

“That’s true, but weren’t you already dead?”

—Shut up, you wicked human! This is all your fault! Ahhh, my legion! Forgive your commander!

Human and monster alike, everyone was panicking. Screams and shouts erupted from every direction.

Only one person among them retained any semblance of sanity.

“Everyone, calm down! Nothing you’re worried about is going to happen!”

As expected of Team Leader Choi. Reliable as ever. He must have thought of a way out of this crisis.

After calming everyone with his steady voice, Team Leader Choi pointed at me.

“Mr. Jin Taekyung will handle it!”

“…”

“Mr. Jin Taekyung, what should we do?”

“Wait, why are you asking me…?”

“I believe in you, Mr. Jin Taekyung!”

“…”

That was exactly the problem. Why did he believe in me? In a situation like this, believing in God, Buddha, or Allah would probably do him more good.

For a moment, I lost my ability to speak. Then the gazes of everyone around me flew toward me and pierced into my body.

“N-Now that you mention it, I’ve heard about that Hunter. They say he’s so capable that even Comrade Chairman Xiao Yang made a special request for him.”

“I’ve heard the rumors too. They say he might be a new S-rank Hunter. Apparently, he defeated two Named Monsters all by himself.”

“Ooh! Oooooh!”

“We’re saved! We’re going to live!”

—You, wicked human! I knew you were strong, but this is beyond anything I imagined! Rejoice, my legion. Your commander lives!

“…I already told you, you’re dead.”

This was driving me insane. None of them were in their right minds anymore.

I stared at Team Leader Choi in disbelief.

“What exactly are you basing this on?”

Team Leader Choi answered without hesitation.

“I already told you. I believe in you.”

“That’s what I’m asking. Where is this baseless faith coming from—”

“It isn’t baseless.”

“Excuse me?”

“The way you’re acting in a situation like this. Your tone. Your expression. All of it gives me reason to believe in you.”

“…!”

Only then did I realize the truth.

The unexpected situation had caught me off guard, but I wasn’t afraid. I didn’t feel the slightest trace of fear or dread.

The answer was closer than I had thought.

Because I’m strong.

I was strong. Stronger than before. Strong enough to avoid any danger.

That was why I wasn’t afraid of the monsters sweeping across the ground like a wave, or the pack of Wyverns closing in right behind us.

“So that’s what it is…”

I muttered under my breath, then spoke up.

“Who’s the captain?”

A hand suddenly shot up from the cockpit ahead.

It was trembling violently. The captain was probably using his other hand to clutch the controls for dear life and desperately evade the Wyverns bearing down on us.

“I-I am.”

“Can I open the door for a moment?”

“What?”

“I’m asking if I can open the plane door.”

The question must have shocked him senseless, because he poked his head out and stared at me like I was insane.

“Of course not! The pressure-sealing system won’t even let you open it, and the aircraft would be damaged by the pressure difference! You wouldn’t be able to breathe properly either!”

Team Leader Choi fiddled with the ring on his finger and cut in.

“I think I can block the pressure. I don’t know what you have in mind, but give it a try.”

“Okay.”

"Don't! You bangzi bastards! Are you trying to kill us all?!"

"…What, bangzi?"[1851]

How dare he insult Koreans in front of a proud Korean Kimchi Man?

The captain's face went pale when he realized what had slipped out.

"No, that's not what I meant."

"You chink bastard. Damn it."

"…!"

"Hey, Captain!"

"Y-Yes?"

"Should I open it?"

"Ah! Aah!"

Before the captain could stop me, I opened the door.

No—I cut it open.

Slice!

Force—the phenomenon known as an Aura Blade in the modern world—sliced through the sturdy alloy, creating a small opening.

It was the kind of overwhelming power only a Supreme Peak master could display in Murim, or an S-rank Hunter here.

Team Leader Choi's eyes widened in shock.

"Mr. Jin Taekyung, this is…!"

"Team Leader!"

Whoooosh!

This was no time to stand around gawking. The tremendous wind and pressure had sent the aircraft lurching and thrown the cabin into chaos.

The passengers' screams and my shout brought Team Leader Choi back to his senses. He rubbed his ring.

"A flawless barrier surrounds us. Barrier!"

"Oh."

Along with the incantation, a transparent mana barrier blocked the new opening without leaving so much as a gap.

So that was one way to do it.

With a brief exclamation of admiration, I stuck my upper body outside the cabin.

Team Leader Choi's Barrier spell recognized me as an ally and let me pass through without resistance.

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

The wind pressure battered my upper body as if trying to crush me to death. I grinned.

[1851] Bangzi is a derogatory Chinese term for Koreans.

This is no joke.

But it wasn't unbearable.

No, it would have been stranger if I couldn't endure it. Compared to the waves of energy the Western Heaven Demon Lord had unleashed, this was no more than a gentle spring breeze.

—Kyaoo-o-o-o!

A monster's shrill cry mingled with that spring breeze.

The pack of Wyverns had already drawn close. I judged the distance between us.

About a hundred meters.[1852] I've never tried this before…but at this distance, it should be enough.

Inventory, open. Equip.

Sssshk.

A spear I'd bought at a discount from the Hunter Market slid into my hand.

Like a javelin thrower, I drew my shoulder as far back as it would go. From my waist to my wrist, every necessary muscle and tendon pulled taut like a bowstring.

—Kyaoo!

Sensing something was wrong, the leader Wyvern at the front shrieked and threw back its head.

I could see a mass of pure-white air being sucked toward its snout.

That's…

—Breath! It's using Breath! Dodge it, wicked human!

The Skeleton Warlord was right.

Of all the countless monsters in existence, Breath was a power granted only to the dragonkin. I could clearly see it taking shape inside the Wyvern's gaping maw.

Gooooom.

A gigantic sphere of wind. The instant the Air Breath, powerful enough to shred metal like paper, fully took shape—

"Hey, Wyvern!"

—Kyaoo?

"I'm putting it in!"

With a thunderous shout, I whipped my drawn-back shoulder forward.

Fwoosh! Sssshaaa!

Flaming Force enveloped the spearhead, scorching the air and slicing through the wind.

The Wyvern's bright-yellow eyes widened as the blue-white streak of light shot straight toward it.

—Kiiiiik!

[1852] A hundred meters is about 330 ft.

Whoooosh!

Compressed air erupted from the spear’s tip. A pure-white cloud burst outward, and then—

Crunch! Boom-boom!

The gigantic body plummeted toward the ground like a kite with its string cut.

—Kyaoo?

—Kiiit?

More than ten pairs of bright-yellow eyes looked at one another.

Wyverns were ferocious from the moment they were born, but right now, they were so bewildered that they had no idea what to do.

—Kikik?

—Kiiik…

What? Is the boss dead?

I think so…

After exchanging words among themselves, the Wyverns were dumbfounded.

Their leader had been exceptional even among its own kind, powerful enough to earn the name “Black Star.”

And now, the Black Star had become a black dot plummeting toward the distant ground.

—Kiririk?

—Grrrrk.

None of them had even gotten a proper look at how it died.

They could only guess that the tiny human had thrown a spear and struck it.

But that was absurd.

How could a mere human dare to attack a descendant of the great dragon—

“Hey, Green Wyvern!”

—Kik?

“I’m putting it in!”

Crunch!

This time, they saw it clearly.

Their comrade’s head burst apart in the streak of light.

—Kik!

—Kyaoo-o-o!

After their leader, another of their bloodline had died!

The enraged Wyverns swore revenge on that accursed human.

—Kiiit!

Of course, not today.
They would take revenge later. A little later.
“Hey, Blue Wyvern!”
Crunch!
…Could they actually get their revenge?
More than ten pairs of wings began flapping for dear life.

Chapter 379

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

A tremendous roar shook the air, while vibrations traveled through the ground.

Xiao Shen stared toward the horizon, unable to believe what was happening.

The monsters are supposed to be thousands of kilometers away.[1853] How did they…?

The twenty-year-old was not the only one wondering.

More than a thousand Hunters from the Public Security Armed Forces Department and five thousand members of the Chinese People's Liberation Army had been dispatched to Chengdu International Airport to maintain public order. Every one of them had the same question, and every one of them was stunned by the reality bearing down on them.

—Screeech!

—Graaaar!

From low-level monsters such as goblins and Orcs to higher-tier monsters like Trolls, ogres, and Lycanthropes…

An army of monsters filled the horizon, charging forward with hideous shrieks.

The one-kilometer gap[1854] was closing by the second. Panicked cries rang out.

"Form ranks by unit! Assemble! Form up—!"

"Fire! Fire!"

Rat-a-tat-tat! Boom!

The People's Liberation Army hurriedly formed ranks and unleashed their firepower at their commanders' orders, but the effect was negligible.

No one had expected an army of monsters to attack.

The soldiers were ordinary people without any special abilities. Fear paralyzed them, and their weapons were effective only against low-level monsters at best.

"There are too many! There are too many monsters!"

"Pilots!"

"Get the fighter jets in the air! Bomb them from above—!"

The commanders' frantic shouts were drowned out by a ferocious roar from the sky.

—Kyaaaao-o-o!

"W-What is that?"

"Wyvern! It's a Wyvern!"

A gigantic shape flew toward them with the setting sun at its back.

[1853] Thousands of kilometers means at least about 2,000 km, or about 1,200 mi.

[1854] One kilometer is about 0.62 mi.

A Wyvern, known as the terror of the skies, led the charge, followed by dozens of Griffons and Gargoyles.

The A-rank monsters angled their wings, each several meters long,[1855] and dove upon the fighter jets that had yet to take off.

Crunch! Boom!

Their powerful wingbeats rocked the several-ton machines,[1856] while magical-power-infused claws tore through the aircraft hulls like paper.

Metal fragments blasted outward with tremendous force, mowing down the pilots running frantically toward their planes.

Boom! Crunch!

They died instantly, without even the chance to scream.

The commanders regained their senses and ordered the soldiers to open fire, but even hundreds—thousands—of bullets left no more than scratches on the monsters' magical-power-infused skin and hides.

—Kikikik.

The monsters laughed at the helpless humans.

A shock of terror swept through the soldiers, making every hair on their bodies stand on end.

"H-How can this be?"

An army of monsters filled the ground and sky. Even firearms barely affected them.

They were monsters in every sense of the word.

"M-Monsters…"

"I-I have to live. I don't want to die like a dog in a place like this!"

The fear of death spread faster than any epidemic.

As the People's Liberation Army began backing away, one person strode forward instead.

"Don't retreat!"

Xiao Shen shouted, his youthful face still not quite rid of its boyishness and his eyes blazing.

The Five-Starred Red Flag, the national flag of the People's Republic of China, was emblazoned across the chest of his armor.

"Who are we?"

Those who had been about to flee stopped in their tracks at the young man's question.

Xiao Shen glared at the army of monsters charging from several hundred meters

---

[1855] One meter is about 3.28 ft.

[1856] A metric ton is 1,000 kg, or about 2,200 lb.

away.[1857] His voice thundered once more from beneath his low-pulled helmet.

“Who are we?”

The shout made their blood boil.

With every eye upon him, Xiao Shen raised his spearhead high.

“We are the descendants of Zhonghua![1858] We are brothers of the People’s Liberation Army and the Public Security Armed Forces Department!”

Aura the color of sunset blazed from the spearhead thrust toward the heavens.

Hissss!

“Let’s go! Let’s wipe out every last one of those monsters!”

“Waaaaaaah!”

A tremendous roar numbed the ears and shook the earth.

Led by Xiao Shen, the Hunters of the Public Security Armed Forces Department gripped their weapons and charged the monster army like ferocious tigers.

“Don’t retreat! Show them the strength of Zhonghua!”

“Uaaaaah!”

—Graaaar!

—Awooooo!

Human cries filled with the resolve to face death mingled with the monsters’ shrieks. The two groups collided and became entangled in one mass.

Kwagwagwagwang!

The collision shook heaven and earth. Death rained down from every direction.

“Gyaaaah!”

—Kweeeek!

Squish! Crack!

Screams and thunderous impacts rang out across the battlefield.

An A-rank Hunter’s aura-coated blade sliced through a Lycanthrope’s neck, while a single swing of an ogre’s iron club reduced three or four Hunters to bloody pulp and sent them flying.

Two Hunters combined their strength to bring down a monster. As they raised their weapons against their next foe, a gigantic shadow fell over them.

—Kiiiiiit!

Slice!

A Griffon plunged from the sky, its claws shredding the Hunters’ bodies along with their armor.

As it searched for its next prey, a large ball of fire hurtled toward it.

“Fire Ball!”

[1857] Several hundred meters is roughly 200–900 m, or about 660–3,000 ft.

[1858] Zhonghua is a Chinese term for China and Chinese civilization.

Boom!

The Griffon's body reeled amid the acrid smoke. The ranged units on the ground had been watching for just such an opportunity, and they did not let it pass.

"Now!"

Bang! Boom-boom-boom!

All manner of spells and arrows brimming with mana pierced the Griffon.

It plummeted with a dying shriek, and the other flying monsters let loose ferocious cries.

—Kyaaaao-o-o!

Modern weapons made of lead and iron blocked the flying monsters as they plunged toward the ranged units.

"Concentrated fire!"

Rat-a-tat-tat-tat! Boom!

Countless rifles and heavy weapons opened fire. Dozens of tanks unleashed their cannons at once.

Modern weapons could not compare to mana, the natural counter to a monster's magical power, but so much concentrated fire still forced the flying monsters to falter.

—Kiiit!

"It's working!"

"Anywhere else is useless! Aim for their eyes!"

The flesh of monsters, saturated with magical power from birth, easily shrugged off most physical force.

But there was one exception: the eyes.

Covered only by a thin membrane, their eyeballs could be damaged by heavy weapons.

At the sight of the monsters hesitating, the divisional commander who had been watching the battle excitedly waved his command baton.

"More! Pour it on! Pin those monsters down—"

Rooooar!

His voice cut off.

Poison Breath from a Green Wyvern blanketed an area over a hundred meters in radius.[1859] The divisional commander and his command staff were drenched in powerful acidic poison and melted away.

"C-Commander!"

"The command staff…!"

[1859] A hundred meters is about 330 ft.

The People's Liberation Army lost hundreds of soldiers and high-ranking officers in the blink of an eye. Panic swept through its ranks.

Officers, noncommissioned officers, and enlisted soldiers alike stared at the horrific scene before them, crying out in shock.

"This can't be happening…"

"N-No. This isn't right. It can't be! This isn't my mission!"

That scream spoke for all of them.

They had deployed in force as a precaution, but their primary mission was to meet and escort the foreign Hunters arriving at Chengdu International Airport, then follow their superiors' orders.

No one had said anything about an army of monsters thousands of kilometers away[1860] invading the airport.

"What the hell is happening…?"

"We're going to die. We're all going to die."

The fear they had briefly forgotten descended upon the People's Liberation Army once more.

They were not the Hunters of the Public Security Armed Forces Department fighting at the front. They were only ordinary people carrying modern firearms.

And their ominous suspicion soon became reality.

A nightmare worse than anything they had imagined.

—Om. Neu. Ha. So. Yu.

A voice spoke in broken, disconnected syllables. The eerie sound, like static from a radio with a poor signal, echoed across the battlefield.

Black fog that had gathered from somewhere spread over the people's heads.

—Yen. Wi. Ga. Ji. Ke!

That was when the horrific change occurred.

Swoooosh!

Dark magical power, black as storm clouds, spread through the blood and corpses like a spiderweb.

It breathed new power and souls into the bodies growing cold, binding and subjugating them with chains.

Crack. Crack-crack-crack.

An army of skeletons slowly rose from pools of death, granted new life.

Those beings bound the countless dead with invisible chains and made them their slaves.

They laughed in satisfaction.

—Kik, kikikik.

[1860] Thousands of kilometers means at least about 2,000 km, or about 1,200 mi.

—Grrk. Kihihih.

—Grrrrrk.

With a bubbling sound, a man rose to his feet.

Clad in armor emblazoned with the Five-Starred Red Flag and carrying a massive ax, he looked exactly like the A-rank Hunter Xiao Shen remembered.

…Mr. Yao Wei.

But Xiao Shen could not say the man's name aloud.

He could not bring himself to.

Because he knew that the person standing before him was no longer the man he had known.

Ah… ahhh.

If Xiao Shen had not witnessed his decapitation a little over ten minutes earlier—if the man had not risen with his own severed head tucked under one arm—he would still have thought of him as a colleague and friend.

But Yao Wei no longer existed.

His new name slipped from Xiao Shen's lips.

"Dullahan…"

A headless knight.

A Dullahan.

Xiao Shen bit his lip at the sight of his former colleague transformed into a high-level undead monster. Something hot ran down his cheek.

"I'm sorry. I truly am."

—Graaaar!

The Dullahan charged with a shriek.

Xiao Shen shot forward like the wind.

The two of them had often sparred like this. What began as simple competitive pride became a daily routine, and after every bout, Xiao Shen had to endure Yao Wei's complaints.

You little punk. Where are your manners? Would it kill you to let me win once?

Ha-ha. Let's go get something to eat. The loser pays, so I guess you're buying again today, Mr. Yao Wei.

You've got plenty of money at home, and you're still so greedy. One day, I'll make you buy me a meal.

But that had never happened, and now it never would.

Xiao Shen had always won.

Goodbye. Thank you for everything.

Whoosh! Slice!

The ax cleaved through empty air.

Aura blazed from Xiao Shen's spearhead and tore through the Dullahan's torso from the waist. The headless knight slowly crumpled.

Thud. Crash.

Xiao Shen stared down at the face of the fallen Dullahan—no, Yao Wei—and his eyes burned.

"How dare you… How dare you do this…"

Only half a day ago, these friends and colleagues had been laughing and talking with him.

Now they were undead monsters.

The Hunters of the Public Security Armed Forces Department were famous for their strict discipline, but they were not cold-blooded people without a drop of blood in their veins.

They had entered battle prepared to die. Now, for the first time, they faced the fear born of their attachment to one another.

"Get a grip! It's me, Liu Yinqin! Liu Yinqin!"

"H-Hyung…!"[1861]

—Grrrrrk!

Crack! Boom!

Screams and death rained down from every direction.

The Public Security Armed Forces Department had lost nearly half its strength. The monster army, on the other hand, had only grown in number and continued pouring forward without end.

Am I going to die here, like this?

For the first time in his life, Xiao Shen contemplated his own death.

The situation was desperate enough to make even someone as bright and cheerful as him think that way.

We never received a warning signal, so communications are probably down. There won't be any reinforcements either… This really is the end.

Slice!

Xiao Shen cut down one charging undead monster after another, then laughed hollowly and looked up at the sky.

The sunset was beautiful.

Once the sun went down and darkness came, he would never see a sight like it again.

At least the last sky I see isn't half bad…

[1861] Hyung is a Korean form of address a younger man uses for an older brother or an older male friend.

Huh?
Xiao Shen blinked, his thought cut short.
Something enormous was hurtling toward the battlefield from high above.
An airplane?
Roooooar!
A gigantic aircraft wreathed in flames.
Then someone’s shout rang across the vast sky.
“Hey! Monsters!”
“…”
—…?
Am I hearing things?
Not only Xiao Shen but everyone on the battlefield looked up.
Someone’s voice, carrying an almost palpable madness, rang out like thunder.
“I’m going to ram it!”
Ram what?
Xiao Shen soon understood.
Rumble, rumble, rumble!
The airplane’s enormous fuselage plowed straight across the battlefield.

Chapter 380

Xiao Shen realized something for the first time.

Roooooar!

The sight of an airplane diving toward the ground with both wings engulfed in flames inspired terror that transcended species.

—Graaaar!

The supposedly ferocious ogres and Trolls screamed.

—Gweeeaaah!

Even the notoriously sluggish Ghouls ran hard enough to work up a sweat on the soles of their feet.

—Squeeeeee!

“Uh, uh, uhhh…”

The monsters capable of screaming were the lucky ones.

Xiao Shen and most of the others could only stand frozen like statues, staring at the airplane hurtling toward the ground.

I have to run…

His hands and feet refused to move.

More importantly, Xiao Shen and the Hunters of the Public Security Armed Forces Department were surrounded in the middle of the battlefield. They had no chance to escape.

Is this really the end?

The same thought crossed everyone’s mind at that moment.

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

With a deafening roar, the airplane’s enormous fuselage swept across the battlefield.

The earth-shaking collision began at the rear of the monster army as it scattered like a swarm of ants.

Crunch! Crack!

The massive steel hulk, weighing dozens of tons[1862], crushed and burst apart everything in its path.

Green monster blood sprayed like fountains, and limbs of every size flew in all directions.

W-What the hell is this…?

No matter how powerful the monsters’ physical defenses were, they had their limits. Nothing could stop the airplane now that it had transformed into a monster blender.

[1862] A metric ton is 1,000 kg, or about 2,200 lb.

—Graaaar…!

—Kiiiiek!

Krrrunch!

The monsters’ screams vanished beneath the grisly sounds of flesh being torn apart. It was a scene of carnage beyond anything they had ever seen or heard.

As Xiao Shen and the Hunters stared blankly at the unimaginable sight, someone’s frenzied shout pierced their ears.

“Monsters! Ram them! Kill them!”

“…!”

Even amid all this chaos, they could clearly hear their native language. A single word flashed through the minds of the Public Security Armed Forces Department Hunters.

Reinforcements.

Xiao Shen was stunned.

An incredible powerhouse!

The voice carried tremendous mana. The speaker was unquestionably an S-rank Hunter.

“Go for it! Airplaaaaane!”

“…”

And unquestionably a slightly insane S-rank Hunter.

To think he’d resort to a tactic those island bastards used in World War II. Did he not consider that his own allies might die?

He seems to have been sent by the Central Military Commission… But did our country have an S-rank Hunter like that?

The question suddenly occurred to Xiao Shen, but it was about to become irrelevant.

The gigantic steel hulk that had ground its way across half the battlefield was now charging straight toward him and the other Hunters.

—K-Kiiit!

“Run!”

There was no distinction between friend and foe in the struggle to survive.

Forgetting the humans right in front of him, Xiao Shen drove his dagger into a monster that barreled into him.

Schunk!

—Grrrk.

The monster’s lifeless body collapsed toward Xiao Shen.

He could not move a single step with monsters surging in from every direction. As the crushing weight fell upon him, Xiao Shen shouted.

“The battle isn’t over! Fight until the very end!”

He was right. The battle was not over yet. A Hunter was someone who had to kill monsters until the final moment, until their own breath ran out.

The Hunters who heard Xiao Shen's shout gritted their teeth and swung their weapons.

This will do.

With lightning-fast skill, Xiao Shen buried his dagger in the back of a fleeing ogre's head, then drew a deep breath.

The airplane's massive body was already less than twenty meters[1863] away.

It had slowed considerably, but with everyone trapped in place, avoiding it seemed impossible.

I have no regrets.

If he died fighting for the people as a proud Hunter of Zhonghua[1864], that was enough.

Xiao Shen closed his eyes as screams rained down from every direction. At that moment, he heard:

"Heave-ho."

Krrrunch! Splat!

Drenched in a sticky liquid he assumed was blood, Xiao Shen thought:

…Heave-ho?

Wasn't a person's dying cry usually more like "Aaaah"?

The strange sound was an odd choice for a dying cry, so Xiao Shen slowly raised his eyelids.

At last, he saw it.

The airplane had stopped dead only a few steps away. Two men stood beside it, chatting casually.

"All right, we've arrived. It might explode, so get everyone off quickly."

"…Mr. Jin Taekyung. They're all unconscious."

"Really? How weak."

"…They would have died if not for the Barrier magic."

"Then carry them out, Team Leader Choi. Oh, right. Is that bastard who called us bangzi[1865] earlier alive, too?"

"Yes. He's… alive, at least."

"Then keep a close eye on that bastard. I'll keep giving him hell for it when we head back."

"…I'll do my best."

[1863] Twenty meters is about 66 ft.

[1864] Zhonghua is a Chinese term for China and Chinese civilization, often used to express national identity.

[1865] Bangzi is a derogatory Chinese term for Koreans.

Xiao Shen could not make sense of the situation at all.

Who, when, where, what, why, and how—this bizarre sight defied even the five Ws and one H.

How did the airplane suddenly stop, and who are those people? Weren't they Hunters sent by the Central Military Commission?

The two men were even speaking in another language.

Xiao Shen could not understand the words of the clean-cut man who looked like a young master, but he knew what country the language belonged to.

It belonged to Korea, their longtime neighbor.

Wait. If they're Korean…!

Xiao Shen hurriedly wiped the blood from around his eyes. Only then did he recognize one of the men.

A muscular young man who stood a full head taller than everyone else.

The man Xiao Shen had only ever seen on television—his idol—was standing right in front of him.

"C-Could you possibly be Mr. Jin[1866] from Korea?"

"Huh?"

The young man, Jin Taekyung, tilted his head as he looked at Xiao Shen.

"I'm not a teacher."

"Then… Lord Fuck[1867]…"

"…Fuck. What?"

It really is him!

Relief and hope washed over Xiao Shen, making his entire body tremble.

How the hell does a Chinese guy know about Lord Fuck?

Articles about me had caused a brief stir in the foreign media, but I never expected even that nickname to spread this far.

Lord Fuck, making the five oceans and six continents tremble.

If I ever went to the United States, some huge Yankee bros might walk up to me holding beer bottles and act like they knew me.

Hey, you. Lord Fuck?

I'm fine, thank you. Fuck. What kind of deranged bastards came up with a nickname like this?

Anyway…

[1866] The respectful form of address rendered "Mr. Jin" can also mean "teacher," prompting Taekyung's reply.

[1867] A crude online nickname coined after Taekyung accidentally swore during a broadcast.

“What a mess.”

That was my brief assessment as I looked around.

Team Leader Choi, who had strung the unconscious flight attendants together like dried fish, and the Skeleton Warlord, whom I had shoved into my Inventory, both answered me.

“It is a horrifying sight.”

—You wicked human. This commander rather likes this place. It feels familiar and comforting.

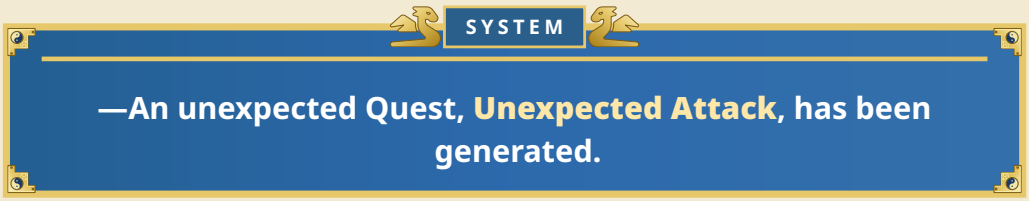
“…”

The fact that a named undead monster—death itself, for all intents and purposes—found the sight pleasing said more than enough.

“We get thrown into actual combat the moment we arrive.”

As if responding to my complaint, a System notification rang.

Ding.



Was this why they said they were paying so much?

I clicked my tongue and spoke.

“Team Leader Choi, protect the civilians first. After that, fight as you see fit. Don’t push yourself too hard.”

“Yes. That was already my intention.”

Team Leader Choi was a smart man. Learning the Jin Family’s Cultivation Technique had made him incomparably stronger than before, but he would never show off.

“And you there, young man.”

“Y-Yes, Mr. Jin[1868].”

Mr. Jin? What am I, a schoolteacher?

I looked the young man who had answered so quickly up and down.

His face was young, but he was obviously a Hunter. A powerful one, too—probably around A-rank. Unlike the surrounding Hunters, who all wore identical armor as if they had come off a factory line, he also had a red insignia on his shoulder.

“You look like you hold a pretty significant rank, so take good care of your men. Let’s save even one more person.”

“Y-Yes?”

[1868]The respectful form of address rendered “Mr. Jin” can also mean “teacher,” prompting Taekyung’s reply.

“This is only the beginning.”

As I answered, I thrust out my fist.

Boom!

Streams of Scorching Yang Qi shot toward the monsters standing blankly in place.

Searing heat swept through the area, leaving behind dozens of monster corpses.

“Why are you all staring? Did someone hit the pause button?”

“…!”

—…!

At my single remark, the silence pressing down on the battlefield shattered.

—Graaaar!

“K-Kill them! Stop the monsters!”

Humans against monsters. Monsters against humans.

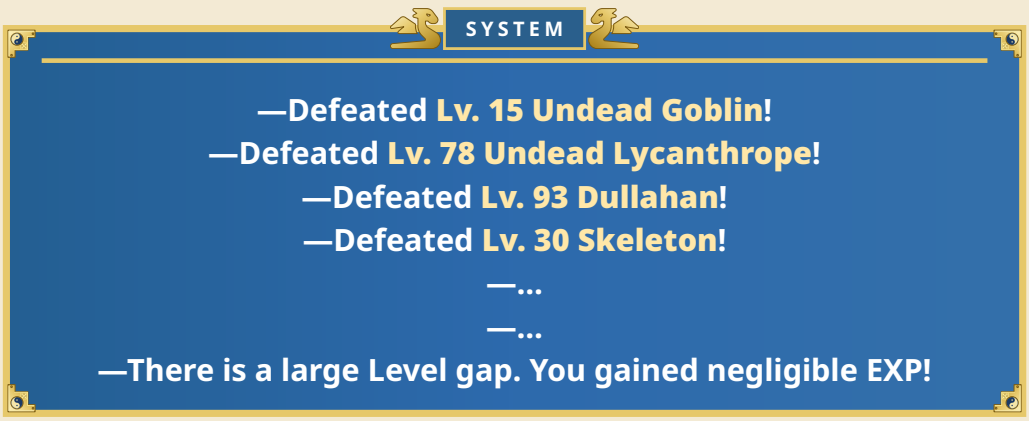
The battle to kill or be killed began anew. I pulled White Flame from where it was embedded deep in the ground and swung it.

Shing!

Forget half water, half fish. Monsters packed every inch of the battlefield.

A crescent of Force extending from the spearhead brushed against a tightly packed cluster of monsters.

Ding.



System notifications announcing monster kills and EXP gains rang out without pause.

Under normal circumstances, I would have let them go in one ear and out the other or simply ignored them.

But this time, they provided an important clue.

“Don’t tell me these things are…”

—Ah, that’s right. Wicked human! What a powerful undead army!

The Skeleton Warlord’s delighted shout was enough to turn my suspicion into certainty.

No wonder something felt strange.

I had already been puzzled by the fact that I could not sense any life force from them.

There were still quite a few living monsters, but more than half were undead. Altogether, they formed a massive army nearly two thousand strong.

“And undead monsters are…”

The Skeleton Warlord shouted, brimming with excitement.

—Beautiful! Magnificent! Heroic!

Thwack!

I cut down five monsters and muttered.

“Want to be erased like that thing just now? Beautifully, magnificently, and heroically?”

—…I misspoke. I apologize, wicked human.

The Skeleton Warlord, who had briefly forgotten its situation, hurriedly added:

—Wait. If that is the case, then they must be under someone’s control!

I thought so, too.

There was only one thing I was not certain about.

“The Lich. Did that bastard come here in person?”

—Hmm. If you mean the Lich from that holographic video you showed me last time, then probably not.

As I listened to the Skeleton Warlord’s answer, I took half a step forward.

Boom!

A massive iron club passed within inches of my shoulder and smashed into the ground. It was an ordinary ogre, still carrying the vitality of a living creature.

—Graaaar!

“Sure. I’ll grill you.”

Boom!

The Flame Divine Palm struck the ogre in the chest, sending dark green blood spurting from its seven apertures.

I passed its collapsing bulk and brought White Flame down at an angle.

Shiiiiing! Slice!

Space itself split apart, and the monsters caught within it were chopped to pieces.

Leaving behind the Chinese Hunter who stared blankly at me while covered in blood and bodily fluids, I clenched my fist.

Whoooom.

Extreme heat surged into my fist, then blasted forward.

Boom!

Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

A massive pillar of fire swallowed the monsters.

The ones that somehow survived shrieked in agony amid the foul stench of burning flesh.

The destructive power made monsters and Hunters alike forget to fight for a moment.

The Skeleton Warlord spoke in a faltering voice.

—W-Wicked human. You have become even more of a monster.

“It feels strange hearing that from a monster. Anyway, if it wasn’t the Lich, then what kind of bastard is causing all this?”

—How should this commander know? But I can guarantee you one thing.

“Guarantee what?”

—His control over the undead is a notch below mine. Wahaha! Legion! This commander has missed you!

“…”

Should I kill this bastard or let him live?

As I considered the question, an idea suddenly flashed through my mind, and I stopped dead.

“Hey. What did you just say?”

—Wahahaha! Have you finally felt the majesty of this commander, wicked human?

“Talk, or be erased.”

—…I will talk. But what are you asking about?

“That part about controlling the undead.”

—Isn’t it obvious? This commander is a Skeleton Warlord. Compared to them, of course I’m… Huh?

A brief silence followed.

The Skeleton Warlord must have reached the same conclusion I had. I swallowed hard and broached the subject casually.

“Try it. That thing you do.”

—…

“Do it, or be erased.”

The Skeleton Warlord opened its mouth.

—Grow, grow, skeletons, skeletons…

At that moment, the undead monsters locked in fierce battle suddenly froze in place.

…It works.

Chapter 381

Whoooosh.

I couldn’t see it, but I could feel it.

Centered on me—or rather, flowing from the Skeleton Warlord inside the subspace known as my Inventory—a sticky energy spread in every direction.

The change was immediate.

—Kirik?

—Gwoo?

The ferocious monsters abruptly stopped moving.

Orcs, Trolls, goblins, Lycanthropes, every kind of monster I had only ever seen in monster encyclopedias, and even fallen Hunters.

They had only one thing in common: they had already died once and been resurrected as undead.

Gulp.

I swallowed dryly and muttered, “It works.”

—Wow. It really works.

“…?”

—…?

Wait. What did he just say?

My brain froze for a moment. Then I whispered, “What kind of dog-bone bullshit is that? Didn’t you try it because you knew it would work?”

The Skeleton Warlord answered hesitantly.

—The truth is… even this commander did not expect it to work so easily.

“You said your control was much stronger.”

—Ah, that? I just said it in the heat of the moment.

“What?”

—My pride would not allow me to sit around doing nothing…

“…”

Isn’t this guy completely insane?

I was dumbfounded, but regardless, the result was undeniable.

The undead monsters within a radius of several dozen meters[1869] had all stopped moving at once, bringing the fierce battle raging around us to a temporary lull.

“T-The monsters have stopped moving!”

“What in the world is going on?”

“Don’t let your guard down! Some of them are still moving!”

[1869] Several dozen meters is roughly 30–60 m (100–200 ft).

Just as someone shouted, it was still too early to relax.

Only some of the nearby undead monsters had come under the Skeleton Warlord's control. Those farther away, along with the ordinary monsters that were not undead, were unaffected.

—Gwoooooar!

—Chiiik!

"Haaah!"

Clang! Stab!

The uncontrolled monsters were briefly bewildered by the sudden change in their own kind, but they soon began rampaging again, and the battle resumed.

The two sides were hopelessly mismatched in numbers.

But from this moment onward, that was about to change.

I called out in a deliberately hushed voice.

"Go, Warlordmon!"

Warlordmon—no, the Skeleton Warlord—shouted back in outrage.

—Wicked human! Do not call this commander that!

"How about Warlordmon Who's Desperate to Be Erased?"

—…Damn it.

Despite being a skeleton that couldn't even breathe, he let out a deep sigh before chanting a spell.

—Fight, Skeleton Skeleton.

That bastard had definitely started enjoying the whole Skeleton Skeleton thing. It was hardly an impressive incantation, but its effect was undeniable.

—Gwoo?

At the Skeleton Warlord's command, ferocity filled the eyes of the undead monsters that had been standing blankly. Then, in the next moment—

Crunch!

An undead ogre's iron club crushed a Troll's skull.

That was only the beginning.

The undead monsters who had gained a new master charged at their own kind.

—Gwoooooar!

—Ch-Chirik?

Crack! Slice! Stab-stab-stab!

An unexpected ambush from behind.

One flank of the monster army surrounding the Chinese Hunters collapsed helplessly.

—Chiiiiiik!

"W-What the hell!"

“Why are those monsters suddenly…?”

The monsters betrayed by their own kind were not the only ones thrown into confusion.

The Chinese Hunters were just as bewildered by the sudden turn of events.

I shouted to the young Hunter who had been racing across the front lines, swinging his spear.

“Xiao Shen!”

“M-Mr. Jin?”

His eyes widened as he looked at me.

“H-How do you know my name?”

I had just used Qi Sense to check his Level window, but that wasn’t important right now.

“What are you doing? Why aren’t you switching to an all-out offensive?”

“But what is going on here…?”

“Are you really curious about that right now? Do you want to grab an undead monster and make it explain why it’s helping us using the five Ws and one H?”

“N-No, sir!”

“Then what should you be doing?”

Xiao Shen snapped to his senses and thrust his spear into the air.

“Attack formation! Everyone in the Public Security Armed Forces Department, from this moment on, attack everything except the undead monsters!”

“Yes, sir!”

Now that was an excellent decision.

Along with their unified shout, the momentum of the roughly five hundred Hunters who had been driven into a corner changed.

“Kill them!”

“Avenge our fallen comrades!”

Shish-shish-shishik! Slice!

—Awooooo!

A Lycanthrope charged at a Hunter who had just beheaded an Orc.

Its jaws opened, yellow fangs poised to tear out the Hunter’s throat, but a massive fist slammed into its mouth.

Crunch!

—Gwoooooar!

The ogre that had crushed the Lycanthrope’s skull let out a savage roar.

High above the ogre, a Griffon plunged into a steep dive, its razor-sharp claws flashing.

—Kiiiieeeek!

Just as the A-rank monster's mana-infused claws were about to rake across the ogre's eyes—

"Ice Ball!"

"Lightning Bolt!"

The ranged Hunters waiting nearby unleashed their magic. The electrocuted Griffon convulsed in midair.

At that moment, a figure stepped off a Troll's shoulder, launched himself into the air, and swung his weapon at the Griffon.

"Custom-made by J Company, widely considered one of Germany's finest weapon manufacturers—!"

Slice!

A single clean, effortless strike split the Griffon's head in two.

Team Leader Choi landed gracefully and gazed at the transparent blade, not a single drop of blood staining it, with a satisfied smile.

"A longsword I won at auction for 5.2 billion won.[1870] It certainly earns its price."

"…"

It looks stupid, but it's cool.

It's cool, but it looks stupid.

After watching the whole thing, the Skeleton Warlord asked dubiously, —Wicked human, did you say that man was your superior?

"No, well… Technically, as far as our Guild positions go, he is, but…"

—He seemed reasonably clever for a human, yet I have never encountered anyone so strange. He truly is a fitting superior for you.

"Raise your hand if you're a Skeleton Warlord who wants to be erased for running his mouth."

After a brief silence, the Skeleton Warlord answered by chanting another spell.

—Grow, Skeleton Skeleton!

They say even a dog at a village school can recite poetry after three years. Now he could do it without being told.

Crack. Crack-crack-crack.

The Griffon killed by Team Leader Choi, along with the monsters brought down by the combined attacks of the Hunters and undead, gained new life and rose from their dead bodies.

There were two hundred of them.

The range also seemed wider than during the first attempt. Even distant undead monsters came under the Skeleton Warlord's control and began attacking their former allies.

[1870] 5.2 billion won is about $3.7 million or €3.4 million.

“Wow. You were capable of this?”

—Wow. Was this commander capable of this?

“…”

—…Actually, this commander was not capable of quite this much. But for some reason, an enormous amount of mana is surging through me now that I am here!

“Sure. Great.”

I gave up trying to understand this bizarre named monster.

As long as the result was good, that was all that mattered. Trying to figure it out right now would only give me a headache.

—Give me more. More legions!

I couldn’t see him because he was inside my Inventory, but I was certain his fleshless skull was trembling with excitement.

I sighed and tightened my grip on my spear.

“I was already planning to.”

—Do you have a way?

“I do.”

The method for increasing the number of undead was simple.

“Kill them all.”

—Kahaha! You truly are a wicked and ignorant human!

The bastard was getting cheeky, but this time, I had to agree with at least part of what he said.

With the Skeleton Warlord’s mad laughter echoing through my mind, I stepped forward.

Flamefire Path.

Whoooosh!

A path of flame opened with every step.

Black robes. Staffs hung with dangling skulls.

Their eye sockets were empty, and patches of unrotted flesh still clung to their bodies.

The three beings, each looking as though it had stepped straight out of a nightmare, sent their thoughts to one another.

—There is a problem.

—The undead monsters are slipping out of our control. They are helping the humans and attacking the legion.

—Why?

They were not asking how their control had been broken. The three beings already knew the answer to that question.

—A higher undead. One more powerful than us.

All monsters had a hierarchy, but the undead were ruled by strength more absolutely than any other kind.

If their control had been stolen, it could only be the work of a higher existence.

—But…

—How is that possible?

None of the three beings could answer.

How could an existence more powerful than them be here, seizing control of the undead and helping the humans?

—Could it be that person?

—Absurd. Have you forgotten the command that person gave us when sending us here?

—Kill the humans. Create more undead and a greater legion, then kill more. More humans.

Recalling their command, the three beings fell into confusion.

If that person—the Arch Lich—was not responsible, then who could possibly possess greater control than they did?

—Was there a necromancer among the humans?

—I sensed nothing.

—Humans reject and despise death. That cannot be. Even if one were among them, they would be nothing compared to us.

Unmistakable hostility permeated their thoughts because they, too, had once been necromancers who suffered humanity’s rejection and contempt.

But that had happened in the distant past, in another dimension.

Drifting across the boundless ocean of death, they had met a boatman named the Arch Lich. After gaining new power, they were finally on the verge of becoming the Liches they had longed to be.

But…

—What a shame.

—If only our transformation had been completed. If only there had been more death in this land.

—Then we would not have lost control, either.

The three beings could not hide their regret.

They had been great necromancers while alive, but they had yet to complete their transformation into Liches.

They had been reborn in the bodies of dead mages, but one week was far too short to absorb enough death energy to become full-fledged Liches.

—That is why that person sent all three of us.

—If this mission fails, that person will be disappointed.

—That person might even take back the power they gave us.

That was what the three beings feared most.

If they wanted to earn the Arch Lich's favor, they had to overcome this crisis somehow.

Even if it meant expending a tremendous amount of power.

—There is no other choice.

—Are you suggesting we combine our strength?

—Yes. If the three of us combine our strength, even an unidentified higher undead will no longer be able to steal control from us.

—Hmm. Fine.

—Do you agree?

—I agree.

The three beings, who had been competing for the Arch Lich's favor, finally reached an agreement.

Without hesitation, they began chanting necromantic spells.

—Valencia. Madrid.

—Bayern. Munich.

—Stoke. City.

The energy of death flowing from the three beings spread through the air.

The green grass turned black, and the soldiers of the People's Liberation Army within range clutched their throats and collapsed.

"Ghk!"

"Guhhh!"

Whoooosh.

As the humans breathed their last, death energy flowed from their bodies and seeped into every part of the monsters.

—Kyaaaaaaah!

—Gwoooooar!

The air trembled with the powerful mana carried in their savage cries. Their strength was beyond comparison with that of ordinary monsters.

Only after sensing their strengthened control and the greater power of the monsters under their command did the three beings stop chanting.

—Kikikikik.

—Success.

—We consumed an enormous amount of power… but this is more than enough.

Just as the three beings smiled in satisfaction at their newly empowered legion—

Boom!

Far away, a monster’s limbs flew through the air amid a thunderous explosion.

The three beings watched the flames rise and exchanged thoughts.

—There appears to be a flame mage. Not bad.

—He is still only human. Deploy the Skeleton Mages in force.

—Good idea.

A short while later, flames erupted again, and the three beings looked at one another.

—What was that just now?

—Our control was severed. It was not stolen.

—He erased them? Impressive.

—But is he truly a mage? His movements seem far too fast…

—Let us deploy the ogre unit.

—I’ll see your ogres and raise you Dullahans.

—Dullahans, too? Then who will protect us?

—He is right. Dullahans would be excessive. The strengthened ogres will be enough.

—That is true.

Three minutes later, a grim atmosphere hung over the three beings’ skulls.

—It was severed.

—Again?

—I told you we should send the Dullahans.

—What is that thing? It does not seem to be a mage.

—J-Just send the Dullahans first!

—Th-Then we shall do so.

The three beings watched as the more than twenty Dullahans assigned as their escort force rushed away. Then they quietly began searching for another point of agreement.

—Hmm. It is unlikely that such a thing will happen, but just in case…

—I had a similar thought.

—Should we create a Death Knight?

—We have already consumed too much power. A Death Knight, too? We do not have suitable materials, and it would take a long time.

—Given the urgency, we can simply choose the most useful one available. If the three of us combine our strength, it will be possible.

—Th-Then should we try?

But the three beings’ plan to create a Death Knight was shattered less than ten minutes later.

Whoosh! Boom!

Even with bodies reduced to little more than bone, they could feel the searing heat.

“Fucking bastards. There’s a shitload of them.”

Crunch!

The three beings watched a figure tear through the monster army with a spear engulfed in hellfire and hurriedly began chanting spells.

Their once slow, dragging voices became as fast as rap.

—Omnehasoyu!

—Yenwigajike!

But before they could complete their spells, the young human—impossible to identify as either a flame mage or a warrior—had already arrived right in front of them.

“Oh, nice to meet you.”

—O-Omnehasoyu!

—Y-Yes, Yenwigajike!

The young man, Jin Taekyung, cocked his head.

“Hello. Entertainment Weekly? Are you idiots?”[1871]

[1871] The garbled incantations sound like annyeonghaseyo, Yeonye-ga Junggye (“Hello, Entertainment Weekly”), the title of a long-running Korean entertainment-news program.

Chapter 382

Strike the head, and the body falls.

Once I captured the three who appeared to be the leaders, the undead under their control stopped moving like wind-up dolls. Deprived of its commanders, the monster army scattered. Some were killed, while others fled.

“Arch Lich?”

At my question, the three kneeling figures nodded.

I wasn’t sure whether things that were already dead and reduced to bones could still be called “guys,” but whatever.

I stroked each of the three skulls in turn and continued.

“When someone talks to you, you’re supposed to answer. Are you putting on airs just because you’re dead?”

They answered before I had even finished speaking.

—Yes. Yes. It is an Arch Lich.

—What you heard was correct, honored human.

—Indeed.

“Hmm. An Arch Lich. That’s a monster I’ve never heard of before… But which one of you answered informally at the end?”

—That one!

—How dare he speak so casually to the great human!

Whip! Whip!

Two bony fingers pointed at the third.

His companions’ lightning-fast betrayal left the accused skull trembling.

—No! This is a despicable false accusation!

“…Doesn’t sound like a false accusation to me.”

If he was going to lie, he could at least change the way he talked.

After glancing around, I pulled that out of my Inventory.

“Bones. Snack time.”

It was a skull with a strange black sheen, flames flickering in its empty eye sockets.

—…Bones? If you insist on giving me a nickname, call me Warlordmon like before.

“Why? You’re a skeleton, so Bones. It fits perfectly.”

—How dare you insult this commander!

“Fine. Forget it, then.”

Just as I was about to put it back in my Inventory, the Skeleton Warlord shouted indignantly.

—Thank you for the meal!

“What an honest little guy.”

Honest children deserved rewards. Liars deserved punishment.

“All right. Have a taste.”

—Thank you, slightly less wicked human. But how much may I eat…?

“Just a little, like before.”

—Hmm. I would like more, but very well.

Even snacks were too much if you gave them out too often. After expressing its slight disappointment, the Skeleton Warlord opened its jaws wide toward the trembling figure.

—Come here.

—E-Eek! No!

—Yes!

The change began with the Skeleton Warlord’s decisive shout.

Whoooosh!

That was still amazing, even after seeing it once before.

Black mist poured from the kneeling figure’s body and streamed into the Skeleton Warlord as though being sucked up by a vacuum cleaner.

—Gaaaaah!

And that wasn’t the only change.

As more of the black mist—the substance the Skeleton Warlord called death energy—flowed out, the figure’s complexion grew steadily paler.

Or rather, its bones did.

Meanwhile, the Skeleton Warlord’s black sheen grew deeper and richer.

—S-Stop!

—Heh heh heh. What delicious death energy.

—Nooo!

—This commander shall take it all. Deeeath energy!

Crack!

—Hrk!

“Cut the ‘deeeath energy’ crap. Where did you even learn something like that?”

—…Are you really in a position to say that?

“Anyway, stop eating.”

—Why?!

“You’ll get fat.”

The Skeleton Warlord was momentarily lost for words. I tucked it inside my clothes and looked at its victim.

When I had first seen the creature, its bones had been dark and grimy. Now, half of its skeleton had turned white. Perhaps because so much of its death energy had been drained, the green flames in its eye sockets flickered unsteadily.

—Hrk… H-Hrk…

At the sight of their weakened companion, sucked dry to the bone, the other two anxiously clacked their teeth.

—Ask anything of us, great ruler of flame.

—Please, I beg of you. Accept the loyalty of this insignificant being, Orpheus von Maximus Valencia Bayern.

"…You're undead, not a bidet."

They must have been desperate not to lose their power. Not that I minded them being so cooperative.

"All right. If there's anything you haven't told me yet, scrape the bottom of the barrel and spill every last bit of it. If you feed me so much as one lie…"

—We will tell you everything!

—Please, I beg of you! Grant this false and insignificant being permission to speak the truth!

—I-I'll talk.

Apparently unwilling to become bone broth, all three skeletons threw themselves enthusiastically into the interrogation.

They told me everything that had happened, from the Arch Lich's first appearance a week ago to the events of today. Once they had finished, I frowned for effect.

"You're sure?"

—Yes, great human!

—I swear upon the River of Death!

—N-Not a single word was false.

As all three skulls nodded furiously, the Skeleton Warlord cut in.

—They speak the truth.

"Did they pay you off? How can you guarantee that?"

—They swore upon the River of Death. For beings such as us, that is an absolute vow. It can never be broken.

"Hmm."

The guy was usually as frivolous as dust in the wind. Hearing it speak with such gravity made me think it probably wasn't lying.

Besides, the three of them had no reason to scheme in a situation like this.

"All right. I believe you."

—Thank you! Thank you so much!

—Hrk, hrk! I shall serve you with all my heart, my king!

—I-I mean, I too shall swear loyalty to you, honored human. I swear upon the River of Death that I will never again commit such an act—

Crunch!

The last skeleton faltered before it could finish.

His trembling green eye light shifted back and forth between the fist embedded in his chest and me.

—W-Why?

“What do you mean, why?”

—I-I, loyalty, swear, River of Death…

“Too late.”

A voice so cold it hardly sounded like mine slipped between my lips.

“It’s too late to undo what you’ve done.”

Countless people had died here today.

Even regular troops armed with firearms and Hunters had been unable to stop them, so there was no telling how many civilians the monster army had killed over the past week.

“I don’t need your loyalty. Especially not from bastards like you.”

The moment I released the Scorching Yang Qi I had drawn up from my dantian—

Whoosh!

Extreme Yang energy erupted from the fist lodged between its shattered ribs. Blue-white Force radiating unimaginable heat coiled around its entire body.

Rooooar!

I watched the green flames in its eye sockets flicker like candles in the wind, then go out.

I also saw the other two figures spring to their feet and begin chanting spells.

—Jazuchawa Umbado…!

—Vargan Mahra…!

Whoooom.

A wind of magical power swirled around them. Just as their sinister spell was about to be completed, I casually said,

“Devour them. Both of them.”

As though it had been waiting for those very words, the Skeleton Warlord sprang from between the folds of my clothes and opened its jaws wide.

—Gladly.

—Varsaba… Eek!

—N-No!

The monsters screamed in a final, desperate bid to live—or rather, to continue existing as undead.

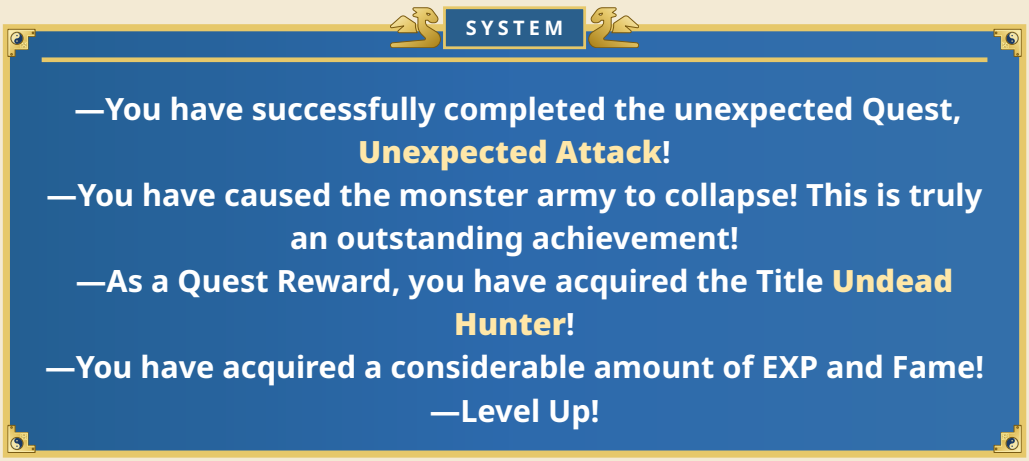
Their wishes meant nothing. The Skeleton Warlord’s pull was stronger and faster than ever.

Whoooosh! Gulp!

The Skeleton Warlord swallowed an enormous quantity of death energy in a single bite, and its skull shuddered.

A moment later, the two skeletons, completely drained of energy, collapsed into piles of bone.

Ding. Ding. Ding.



Only once?

In the past, I would have leveled up several times without difficulty. But now that I had reached Level 120, it seemed the amount of EXP I needed had increased.

Not that I did it for the EXP.

I had merely done what needed to be done, but I couldn't help feeling a little disappointed.

After all, the stronger I became, the more useful I would be in the battles ahead.

The same goes for that guy.

I looked at the Skeleton Warlord while thinking to myself.

Thanks to the enormous amount of death energy it had absorbed, the power emanating from it was on a completely different level from when we had first met.

—Hmm. Hoooo…

Black mist billowed through the holes in its skull where its nose, ears, and eyes should have been.

Its violet eye flames burned like torches, and its smooth surface gleamed with a deep black luster. A moment later, its crazed laughter thundered through my head.

—Kaha! Kahahahaha!

"Turn down the volume. You're loud."

—Wicked human. This time, this commander offers you his profound gratitude.

"You should. Who do you think fed you?"

—Fed me?! Are you implying that this body is some sort of pet?!

"Close enough. Isn't it?"

—Don't be absurd!

“Oh? Bones, come here.”

I held out my hand. The skull immediately sprang into the air and landed in my palm.

As a reward, I gently scratched it between the eyes.

“Good boy, Bones. Aren’t you adorable?”

—…!

The skull trembled.

—H-How could this happen?! How could this commander be treated like this by a mere human?!

“You say no with your mouth, but your body is honest.”

—I am the master of the Black Forest and the commander of the great undead army. Do not humiliate this body!

“A commander who’s nothing but a head?”

—What?! This paltry body can be restored whenever I wish, so long as I expend enough death energy!

“Really? Then why haven’t you restored it yet?”

—…Because even if I did, some lunatic human would just smash it again.

“Oh, correct.”

The toothless Skeleton Warlord ground its jawbones together, its eye flames narrowing.

—Why, wicked human?

“Why what?”

—There must be some ulterior motive behind feeding me—no, behind granting me such immense power. You clearly have some dark scheme in mind. Tell me the truth!

I thought for a moment before answering.

“Hmm. Because you’re a fucking scrub.”

—What?

“You can’t beat me anyway. If I’m going to keep a scrub around, it might as well be a stronger, more useful one. That’ll make you easier to put to work. Don’t you agree?”

—…!

“All right. Get back inside. People are coming.”

I put the Skeleton Warlord, frozen in shock, back into my Inventory and stood.

The airport duty-free corridor would normally have been crowded with employees and passengers. Now it was empty and dark, and three people were walking toward me.

Two of them were familiar.

“Mr. Jin Taekyung.”

"Mr. Jin."

They were Team Leader Choi, who looked relatively unscathed, and Xiao Shen, an A-rank Hunter from China's Public Security Armed Forces Department.

A fair amount of time had passed since the battle ended, but Xiao Shen was still covered in blood and dust, his face haggard with exhaustion.

"There you are."

I exchanged a look of greeting with Team Leader Choi before making an excuse.

"Yes. I had something to take care of."

"Please speak casually with me. Fuc—no, Mr. Jin, you are the hero who saved me, my comrades, and even the people of Zhonghua[1872]."

"…"

Was that my imagination, or had he almost called me Lord Fuck just now?

Whether he knew what I was thinking or not, Xiao Shen continued in an extremely respectful tone.

"Fortunately, with the help of the two gentlemen from the Peace Guild, we were able to defeat the monsters. I would like to take this opportunity to thank you once again."

"Oh, sure. It was nothing. I only did what anyone should have."

I waved my hands modestly and stole a glance at Team Leader Choi.

I had been worried the Integrated Language Pack might malfunction and make him notice something strange. But since I was currently speaking with Xiao Shen, it seemed Team Leader Choi was hearing my words in Chinese as well.

"But who is the gentleman beside you…?"

He was the only unfamiliar face among the three.

The gray-haired, middle-aged man who had been silently listening to our conversation extended his hand.

"I am Wei Fenghu, Minister of National Defense under the Central Military Commission. It is a pleasure to meet you, Mr. Jin."

"Minister of National Defense…"

"My rank is general."

"Ah."

I understood that he was a big deal, but I had no idea what that rank actually meant.

Perhaps he had read my thoughts, because Team Leader Choi whispered from beside me in a voice barely louder than an ant.

"Four-star. Four-star."

"Ah. Ahhh! You're a general! It's a pleasure to meet you!"

[1872] Zhonghua is a patriotic Chinese name for China.

I had been a four-star once, too. That game I played as a kid had been a lot of fun. The sequel had bombed spectacularly, though.

Wei Fenghu clasped my hand, a faint smile touching his lips.

“You are full of youthful vigor. I have many things I would like to ask you, but shall we talk while we walk?”

“Sure.”

I started after Wei Fenghu, then paused.

“Where are we going?”

“To the operations headquarters. I have a jet waiting.”

“What? Headquarters? A jet?”

“That is correct. Everyone is waiting for you there, Mr. Jin.”

Everyone? Who?

Chapter 383

The jet Wei Fenghu had prepared looked nothing like what I had imagined.

It's spacious. And fancy.

Through the partly open cabin door, I could see a luxurious table and one of those so-called chairman's chairs.

Team Leader Choi, who was standing beside me, informed us that the business jet we were looking at cost nearly one hundred billion won[1873] per plane, then added,

"I never expected to see an aircraft reserved for state guests here."

"That is only natural. The two of you are state guests of our country."

"Ah."

"Thanks to you, we were able to save countless soldiers and Hunters. None of us—not even me—will ever forget the help you gave us today."

"…Ah, yes."

I would have preferred it if they dealt with the fine dust and historical distortions first.

Still, I boarded the jet, privately hoping China was a more conscientious country than I gave it credit for.

The waiting pilot saluted us—or, more precisely, Wei Fenghu—with crisp, disciplined movements.

"You have arrived, Comrade Minister of National Defense."

"Are we ready?"

"This aircraft and all its escorts are ready. We await your order."

I wondered what he meant by "escorts," but then I looked through the window and saw five sleek fighter jets on the runway, their lights blinking as though signaling us.

What the hell are those?

I'd only ever seen things like that in war movies. Were we flying off to fight a battle or something?

Wei Fenghu saw my eyes widen and explained.

"The details have not yet been made public…but as you know, Sichuan Province is currently in a state of war. Magical interference has disrupted communications, and attacks by flying monsters are frequent. An escort is essential for our safety."

"Is that really true?"

The situation was more serious than I'd thought.

[1873] Nearly one hundred billion won is about $71 million and €65 million.

The Wyvern had only attacked us in passing while raiding Chengdu International Airport. But if the same thing was happening throughout Sichuan Province, that changed everything.

"I wish I were lying."

Perhaps merely thinking about the current situation exhausted him. Wei Fenghu, who seemed to have aged considerably in a short time, leaned back into the soft seat.

"It seems we must part ways here. We will meet again soon, Senior Colonel Xiao Shen."

Unlike us, Xiao Shen had not boarded the aircraft. He stood rigidly at attention and saluted.

"Yes, Comrade Minister of National Defense. I will complete my mission as quickly as possible and rejoin you. And, gentlemen…"

"Good. I expect great things from you."

Perhaps because he had achieved such impressive accomplishments, a pleased smile passed across Wei Fenghu's lips as he looked at the promising young Hunter.

Team Leader Choi gave him a polite bow. I waved.

"See you next time. You fought really well today."

It was only one sentence.

But the moment Xiao Shen heard my words, his eyes grew as wide as serving trays. His body trembled as though he had been electrocuted, and then he shouted at the top of his lungs.

"Th-Thank you! I will devote myself to every task with the utmost loyalty,[1874] so that I never disappoint you, Mr. Jin!"

"…You don't need to go that far."

"May your august self remain safe! Loooyalty!"

"'August self'? What are you—"

Whack!

"Urk!"

"…"

That looked like a textbook example of poor judgment.

He'd saluted so hard that the edge of his hand struck him in the eyebrow.

As I stared dumbfounded at Xiao Shen clenching his teeth against the pain, the cabin door closed and our business jet began to take off.

"That guy is, well… How should I put it? He's quite a character."

Wei Fenghu gave a quiet laugh at my awkward observation.

"Can you blame him? His idol praised him."

[1874] A Korean idiom for offering one's utmost loyal service, literally "the labor of a dog or horse."

"Excuse me?"

"Many young Hunters in our country admire you, Mr. Jin. He is no exception."

What the hell? Was I a Korean Wave star?

Come to think of it, for a four-star general with enough power to make birds fall from the sky, Wei Fenghu seemed unusually attentive to his subordinates.

Or maybe Xiao Shen was simply that promising.

Ah, but…

—Team Leader. How important is the Minister of National Defense under the Central Military Commission, exactly? I'm not very familiar with the structure over here.

Team Leader Choi flinched at my Sound Transmission, then replied through Message Magic.

—If you compare it to our country, he is the Minister of National Defense. Of course, this is China, and Wei Fenghu is the current Chairman's right-hand man, so his power is considerably greater.

—Ah.

So he's a lot like me. I'm the Minister of gukbap.[1875]

One special serving of sundae-guk[1876] was enough to handle three bowls of rice.

Of course, Wei Fenghu could probably erase three cities with a single pointed finger.

And now, that powerful figure of the People's Republic of China was leaning his upper body toward us and asking,

"It seems we have much to discuss during the flight. Would you not agree?"

Team Leader Choi and I nodded solemnly and opened our mouths.

"Of course. First, I would like to ask what exactly is happening in Sichuan—"

"But do you happen to have any boiled eggs and soda? I'm hungry after fighting so hard."

"…"

"…"

Apparently, they didn't.

"We do."

"…?"

"…?"

They actually did.

[1875] Gukbap is rice served in hot soup; Taekyung is riffing on the similar sound of gukbangbu, the Ministry of National Defense.

[1876] Sundae-guk is a Korean soup made with sundae, a type of blood sausage.

The People’s Republic of China.

As its formal name suggested, the people of this vast and imposing nation still adhered to socialism as their national ideology.

About twenty years ago, the Chairman at the time—who had cemented the foundations of his dictatorship by securing lifelong rule—died during the Great Cataclysm. Power then passed to a far more moderate administration, but the substance of the system remained unchanged.

—What was the dead Chairman’s name again? Pingping? Paengpaeng?

Team Leader Choi, who had been chiming in as Wei Fenghu spoke, silently moved his lips. His poker face was astonishing.

—Just so you know, saying something like that here could get you into serious trouble.

—That’s why I’m using Sound Transmission—no, Message Magic.

—I’m telling you to be careful. Some exceptional mages of A rank or higher can eavesdrop on Message Magic.

—Anyway, what was his name? Pingping or Paengpaeng? If you don’t tell me, I won’t be able to sleep tonight.

—…Pingping.

You were going to answer me in the end anyway.

Now that I was finally satisfied, I listened closely to Wei Fenghu’s words.

“No one could have predicted it.”

Sichuan Province was enormous, both in area and in population, with tens of millions of residents.

And it had all begun in Gaoping District, part of Nanchong City—one of the roughly twenty administrative divisions in Sichuan Province.

“As you know, our country has more than ten times as many Gates as other nations. That made us one of the countries hit hardest during the Great Cataclysm, and we have managed them with corresponding rigor ever since.”

But human power could not control even natural disasters, and the Monster Wave was a calamity far worse than any natural disaster.

“We received word that the mana levels in Gaoping District had suddenly spiked exactly thirteen minutes after the first signs appeared. And by the time Lei Fei, head of the Public Security Armed Forces Department stationed in Sichuan Province, arrived at the scene with the Hunters under his command…everything was already too late.”

“Lei Fei?”

The name was unfamiliar. Yet for some reason, a memory surfaced.

That video Team Leader Choi showed me at the Guild House before we left.

I still remembered it vividly. A city plunged into utter chaos beneath the glow of a hologram, and one man at the head of the Hunters, cutting his way through the monsters.

His weapon had shone with a dazzling aura.

“I think I’ve seen him before. Was he the man in the video you sent us…?”

“That is correct.”

Wei Fenghu hesitated, then continued with a faint sigh.

“He was one of our country’s S-rank Hunters. Of course, neither of you would have known about him.”

We wouldn’t have known?

There were only twenty S-rank Hunters in the entire world. Each of them was an absolute powerhouse.

The fame and status they enjoyed far surpassed even those of a Supreme Peak master in Murim.

The internet, news, and social media were their stages, while microphones and cameras followed them like shadows.

The common people of Murim regarded martial artists with equal parts wariness and curiosity, but modern people saw Hunters as objects of pure admiration. They were global celebrities.

And we’re supposed to have never heard of an S-rank Hunter?

Wei Fenghu had phrased it indirectly, but his meaning was clear.

Team Leader Choi’s gaze met mine in midair. At that moment, we were thinking the same thing.

An undisclosed S-rank Hunter.

No—to be precise, an S-rank Hunter deliberately concealed by the Chinese government.

I’d only ever heard rumors about this. So they were true?

An S-rank Hunter was practically the face of a nation.

But unlike the weak, who struggled desperately to avoid being underestimated, the strong concealed their claws.

China was already known to possess two S-rank Hunters. Clearly, it had no intention of revealing the full extent of its strength.

Perhaps the same was true of the world’s other major powers.

Good grief. Even after surviving the Great Cataclysm, they’re still playing this kind of game of nerves.

It was pathetic, but at the same time, I thought I could understand it. Diplomacy. Politics. I felt as though I had caught a glimpse of the truths of a world I had never known, and the feeling was strange.

Team Leader Choi, however, was sharper than I was.

"You said he 'was' one of your country's S-rank Hunters. That sounded like the past tense."

Wei Fenghu answered with a devastated expression.

"…Lei Fei disappeared a week ago, when the first Monster Wave began. The Hunters of the Public Security Armed Forces Department under his command vanished with him."

"Are you certain he is only missing? Could he perhaps…"

"We could not confirm his death. After that video was recorded, the monster known as the Lich—no, the Arch Lich—blocked all communications and surveillance with mana."

Team Leader Choi and I both groaned.

At our reaction, Wei Fenghu asked in a hoarse voice,

"Do you also believe Lei Fei is dead?"

"Hmm."

"Uh…"

Missing for a week in the middle of that hellscape? The outcome was practically a foregone conclusion.

Team Leader Choi shot me a look, so I cautiously began,

"Well, you never know what might happen to someone, but…"

"The other experts said there was a one-hundred-percent chance he was dead. Useless windbags, every last one of them."

Come on. They sound like real experts to me.

Anyone who confidently claimed Lei Fei was still alive after seeing that situation deserved to be fired on the spot. That was simply the truth.

"But I disagree. Lei Fei—my boy—is certainly alive."

"I hope so too, but realistically speaking…"

"He is my only nephew. My sister was sickly from childhood and died in childbirth. I took in her baby before he was even weaned and raised him as my own son."

"Excuse me?"

His nephew? He raised him like a son? What the hell was this?

As I sat frozen like a statue, Wei Fenghu asked me with damp eyes,

"What were you about to say? After 'realistically speaking.'"

Fuck. This is the worst crisis I've ever faced.

The words lodged in my throat. I barely managed to force them out.

"I was going to say that, realistically speaking, there's still a chance he might be alive."

"Is that so? Is that really true?"

"Ah, yes. But the odds are extremely slim—"

"Thank you, Mr. Jin!"

"No, General. Commander. Supreme Leader. Please hold on and let me finish…"

He seized my hand.

Too late. Wei Fenghu was no longer listening. Instead, he clasped my hand between both of his, his eyes brimming with tears.

"May I ask you one favor?"

I really wish you wouldn't.

Contrary to my desperate hopes, a few seconds later, the one sentence I had expected pierced my heart.

"If you happen to meet that boy someday, could you bring him back to me?"

"…"

"I beg you."

Over Wei Fenghu's shoulder, I saw Team Leader Choi shaking his head.

What if I'd just been firm from the start? I regretted it, but it was too late.

In the end, there was only one answer I could give.

"I will. But…"

"Mr. Jin."

"Yes?"

"You need not say it. I am already prepared for what may happen."

"…!"

Wei Fenghu wiped his eyes with his sleeve. In an instant, he was no longer a middle-aged man worried about his family. He had become the Minister of National Defense under the Central Military Commission once more.

"This is enough. No one else was willing to step forward, but you have given me your word, Mr. Jin. I can rest easier now."

"I can't promise anything."

"I did not need someone's boastful guarantee. What I needed was a thread of hope."

Just as Wei Fenghu murmured those words, the aircraft began to descend, accompanied by a sudden sensation of floating.

Outside the window, beneath a blanket of deep darkness, I could see rugged mountain ridges, lights moving without pause, and military vehicles.

"It seems we have arrived."

I stared out at the landscape as though possessed, then asked,

"Where are we?"

"A temporary operations headquarters."

"No. That's not what I meant."

"Hmm?"

“For some reason, that mountain feels strangely familiar.”

“That cannot be. As far as I know, you have never visited our country… Ah, perhaps you saw it in a photograph?”

“A photograph?”

“It is a UNESCO World Heritage Site. That would certainly be possible.”

With a faint smile, Wei Fenghu continued,

“Temporary operations headquarters. Welcome to Mount Qingcheng.”

Chapter 384

Mount Qingcheng.

A sacred Taoist site steeped in ages past.

Anyone who stood before its stern, overwhelming peaks would be struck speechless.

But I was amazed for an entirely different reason.

It's definitely different…but it looks so similar.

Mount Qingcheng in Murim. Mount Qingcheng in the modern twenty-first century.

The two worlds I had experienced resembled each other in many ways—their terrain, languages, people's features, and even their ways of life.

At one point, I had even wondered whether Murim might be the distant past of the modern world.

But it wasn't.

The butterfly effect? There was no way something I had only ever seen in movies had actually happened.

The two worlds were certainly similar, but there were subtle differences between them, and their histories were different as well.

The world of Murim was also smaller than the modern one, with no five oceans or six continents.

People with colored eyes lived in far-off foreign lands, but that was all. The center of that world was a continent ruled by a vast Great Nation.

Perhaps the Zhonghua[1877] the Chinese never tired of going on about was Murim itself.

But why did even this have to be similar?

I had barely returned from the Three-Gate Bloodbath, which had mercilessly drenched Sichuan Province in blood, only to find myself at Mount Qingcheng in modern-day Sichuan.

I couldn't tell whether it was a simple coincidence or some terrible twist of fate.

I only hoped the similarities didn't extend that far…

"Mr. Jin?"

"Mr. Jin Taekyung."

"Ah."

I raised my head like someone waking from sleep.

Wei Fenghu and Team Leader Choi had already gotten off the business jet and were looking at me strangely.

"Sorry. I got distracted by the scenery for a moment."

[1877] Zhonghua is a Chinese term for China that also invokes the idea of Chinese civilization.

"It is so dark, yet you can still appreciate the magnificent scenery of Mount Qingcheng. You truly possess extraordinary mana, Mr. Jin."

That wasn't exactly wrong, but now that I had reached the Supreme Peak realm, I could see through most darkness with my eyesight alone, without relying on internal energy.

When I nodded with a complicated expression, Wei Fenghu gazed at me in admiration.

"Now I understand why Korea has kept you hidden so carefully, Mr. Jin. You are indeed worthy of being called an S-rank Hunter—the face of your nation."

"Excuse me? I'm still officially A-rank."

"There is no need to hide it. Our country has already ascertained the situation to some extent."

Before I could respond, Wei Fenghu continued without pause.

"To become an S-rank Hunter, one must attain enlightenment through relentless mental discipline and arduous training. Our country also endured countless trials and errors to cultivate the Hunters we have today…but for someone as young as you to have reached such a realm, the Korean government must have given you its full support."

"…?"

"…?"

"Of course, Mr. Choi beside you is also an excellent Hunter. With the two of you here together, I feel greatly reassured."

What kind of hearty gukbap nonsense was that?[1878]

Team Leader Choi and I exchanged a brief glance and reached a silent agreement.

Keep your mouth shut.

Let's just go.

Apparently, this misunderstanding had arisen because I had reached my current level in such an absurdly unrealistic way. But if they had already decided to slap that label on me, there was no reason for us to peel it off for them.

Besides, convincing Wei Fenghu otherwise right here would be a pain.

"Hmm. I think there's been a slight misunderstanding, but I'll explain everything bit by bit when the time comes."

"What is there to misunderstand? We both know how things stand."

"…"

"…"

"Even the Chairman already knows about the matter. When you meet him, do not bother denying it. Just accept it as it is."

[1878] Gukbap is rice served in hot soup and is commonly considered a hearty, filling meal. Taekyung twists Wei Fenghu's confident reassurance into a joke about "hearty" gukbap.

Aware of what?

I let out a quiet laugh.

Speaking of the Chairman…

He was like a king, holding more than a billion people and the economy and military of the People's Republic of China in the palm of his hand.

Even now that I had reached the Supreme Peak realm, he felt both close and impossibly distant to someone like me, whose modern-day common sense remained rooted to the bone.

I wonder if I'll get to see him once this is all over.

Well, what did it matter? That was a question for much later.

Even without my raid pay, my weekly salary was a staggering ten billion won.[1879] As far as I was concerned, he was simply a generous employer.

I got to save people and make money. Two birds with one stone.

"I'll do that. If I meet him."

"Good. Then let us go meet him."

"Excuse me?"

"Did I not tell you? He is waiting in the underground bunker right now."

What the hell is going on?

I stared blankly at Wei Fenghu's retreating back, then hurried over to Team Leader Choi and whispered,

"D-Did you hear that?"

"Yes, I did. But I find it rather surprising as well. For the Chairman of China to leave the safety of Beijing and come all the way here… It seems his public reputation is at least partly deserved."

"To hell with his reputation. China's Jongseok—Jongseok!"

"Not Jongseok, General Secretary! The Chairman!"

"Hmm? What did you just say?"

"Nothing, Minister."

When Wei Fenghu suddenly glanced back, Team Leader Choi politely covered for us. Then he turned to me with the most grave and earnest expression I had ever seen on his face.

"Mr. Jin Taekyung. You must not make that kind of verbal mistake in front of the Chairman. Understood? Especially not Jongseok. Don't even mention it. It sounds like the name of some high school classmate."

"Huh? How did you know?"

"…"

I think Team Leader Choi just muttered fuck.

[1879] Ten billion Korean won is about $7.1 million or €6.5 million.

Must be my imagination.

I took a deep breath and repeated the words to myself.

Not Jongseok. General Secretary. The Chairman of China.

Unlike Team Leader Choi, who had been born into the highest tier of nobility, I was an ordinary citizen to my core.

Whatever feelings I normally had toward China, my heart pounded at the thought of meeting the leader of one of the ten most powerful nations in the world.

Just don't make a mistake. Especially not Jongseok.

Ten minutes later, deep inside an underground bunker, I shook hands with the leader of the People's Republic of China under the gazes of the important figures gathered there.

"Pleased to meet you, Mr. Jin. This old man is Xiao Yang, Chairman of the People's Republic of China."

Good. Not even a hint of Jongseok.

Having cleared that hurdle, I opened my mouth at ease.

"Welcome."

"…?"

"…?"

Ah, fuck.

Chairman of the Chinese Communist Party's Central Military Commission. General Secretary. And the head of state who stood at the apex of more than a billion people.

Xiao Yang.

His voice directed at the people was gentle, while strength filled his eyes.

"As you all know, I am unfortunately neither a military expert nor an outstanding general. I am merely a schemer who entered politics at an early age and managed to fulfill one small ambition only after reaching the age of seventy."

It was astonishing to hear the leader of the country with the fourth-largest territory and largest population on Earth call himself a schemer.

So this is what Team Leader Choi meant by the public perception of him?

I felt as if I had a rough idea of what kind of person he was.

Perhaps it was merely a mask he wore in front of others. Perhaps it was hypocrisy.

But at least from the old man speaking before all of us now, including me—Xiao Yang, the Chairman of China—I sensed a kind of qi utterly unlike either of those things.

"Please do your utmost. Save as many of our people as you can, and bring this terrible disaster to an end as quickly as possible. If you do, I will express gratitude worthy of what you and your countries have done, and I will long remember the aid you have given us.”

The truth was, I knew nothing about the life that old man had lived or the policies he had pursued.

But I wanted to give him considerable credit for reaching out to countries around the world to save his own people.

“That is all this old man has to say. Please do not concern yourselves with complicated matters such as politics. I earnestly ask that you find the best way to resolve this crisis with the fewest possible sacrifices.”

The old statesman who had devoted his entire life to politics turned toward one man.

“Minister of National Defense Wei Fenghu. My old friend.”

“Yes, respected Chairman Comrade.”

“Do you want full authority over the Central Military Commission?”

Wei Fenghu hesitated for a moment, then nodded gravely.

“I do.”

“You could use that power well. But I must refuse.”

“…Chairman Comrade?”

“Bring me the orders once this meeting is over. I will assume full authority—and full responsibility—for everything that follows.”

For a moment, I wondered why China’s Jongseok was acting like that.

Then I understood. He was declaring that he would shoulder everything himself.

Watching from beside me, Team Leader Choi murmured,

“He’s a good leader.”

I quietly shook my head.

“No. To me, you’re the best, Team Leader Choi.”

“Mr. Jin Taekyung…”

“So please raise my Guild settlement percentage.”

“Mr. Jin Taekyung…”

The same words, yet a completely different feeling.

Team Leader Choi gave me a look that said, Of course you’d say that, you bastard, and shook his head. Just then, the secretary announced,

“The Chairman is departing.”

At the secretary’s announcement, everyone rose from their seats. It was the least courtesy owed to a head of state.

“I wish you all good fortune in battle.”

The Chairman addressed every person present, meeting each one’s eyes in turn. Naturally, I was no exception.

Unfortunately, I was the very last.

“Mr. Jin.”

“…Yes.”

A faint smile touched the Chairman’s lips as he looked at me.

“I have very high expectations of you, Mr. Jin. Although this is a contract through which we each receive what we need, I hope you will prioritize human life under all circumstances.”

Was it my imagination, or was his farewell much longer than the ones he had given everyone else?

Feeling the others’ eyes on me, I nodded.

“Understood.”

“Please lend us your considerable strength.”

The Chairman turned to leave, only to pause after a step. Then he casually tossed out one last remark.

“Welcome.”

“…”

“Then I will take my leave.”

Once the senior Chinese officials accompanying the Chairman had disappeared, I collapsed into a chair.

Fuck.

If I died, the cause of death would be death by humiliation.

Even if a monster killed me, I would have the cause of death recorded as death by humiliation.

Aagh! Aaaaaagh!

As I screamed in every direction inside my mind, something firmly stepped on my foot.

It was obviously Team Leader Choi, who was sitting beside me.

“Why?”

Team Leader Choi gave a quiet cough.

“Ahem.”

“What is it?”

“Ahem. People. People.”

“Oh.”

I looked around and finally realized that a dozen or so men and women of various races were staring at me inside the underground bunker.

Four of them stood out in particular.

Those people are…

A Chinese man and woman, and two Western men, one tinged green and the other blue.

I could feel it from the moment our eyes met—the enormous energy coiled within their bodies.

Rather than being surprised, I felt that it was only natural. Anyone who knew the identities of those four would have thought the same.

S-rank Hunters.

People whose very existence made headlines. The individuals who stood at the pinnacle of the countless Hunters around the world.

The faces I had grown sick of seeing on television and in commercials were right in front of me.

And now one of them rose and held out his hand.

“Nice to meet you. I’m… Ah, do you not speak English? I can cast translation magic for you.”

I had never expected him to approach me first.

Still dazed, I took his hand and answered,

“No, it’s fine.”

“Oh, listen to that pronunciation. I’d believe you were American.”

He was a middle-aged Black man, a giant well over two meters[1880] tall. His blue eyes gleamed as he asked,

“You seem to know who I am. Am I right?”

How could I not?

I was even more nervous than I had been when facing Chairman Xiao Yang.

“Of course. Magic Johnson.”

The title of Archmage, bestowed on only three people in the entire world.

And among those three, the Black man standing before me—Magic Johnson—was the War Mage, the one most specialized in combat.

I’m actually talking to Magic Johnson. I never thought I’d live to see the day.

As I thought that coming here had been the right choice in more ways than one, the world’s greatest War Mage smiled broadly and spoke to me.

“Haha. Thank you for recognizing me. Actually, I’ve known about you for a while.”

“Y-You know me?”

“Of course. Even my youngest daughter, who started elementary school this year, knows Lord Fuck.”

“…”

Just how far has that damn nickname spread?

I wondered what Lord Fuck would be called in the English-speaking world.

[1880] Two meters is about 6 ft 7 in.

Fuck Guy? Fuck Man?

The thought of Magic Johnson's youngest daughter knowing me by that name did not make me happy in the slightest.

Apparently, I wasn't the only one displeased.

"What an utterly vulgar nickname. Though I suppose it suits a mere A-rank Hunter like you."

The Chinese man who had just turned thirty, or perhaps was about to, watched me with his arms folded.

"Isn't that right, you peninsula bangzi?"[1881]

Team Leader Choi had no chance to stop me.

My voice had already come out like a prerecorded response.

"What the hell are you talking about, you mainland chink bastard?"

[1881] Bangzi is a derogatory Chinese term for Koreans; "peninsula" refers to Korea.

Chapter 385

"Isn't that right, you peninsula bangzi?"[1882]

"What the hell are you talking about, you mainland chink bastard?"

A heavy silence fell over the room.

Foreigners like Magic Johnson were using translation magic, but even they couldn't tell exactly what the original slurs bangzi and chink meant. Team Leader Choi clicked his tongue quietly, while one man's face hardened like stone.

"What?"

"What, asshole?"

"Say that again, bangzi."

"Sure. Chink."

"You fucking—"

"Good. Let's get this straight. I'm a dog. You're a chink."

"…!"

I watched his face twist violently. Just as he was about to shove back his chair and leap to his feet, the woman sitting beside him raised a hand to stop him.

"Enough."

She was a beautiful woman in her early twenties, with the same crisp, refreshing air as a soft drink. Her calm voice followed.

"I'd appreciate it if you both kept this within reason."

Within reason…

I studied her for a moment, then shrugged.

"Well, if you're asking."

One of her eyebrows arched slightly, as though my answer had surprised her.

"I heard you were quite a handful, but you're more agreeable than I expected."

"I have to be. It's you asking, after all."

"So you've fallen for my feminine wiles? Ah, being beautiful is such a burden."

She swept back her long hair with practiced nonchalance, drawing a quiet laugh from me.

"Did you just laugh?"

"You're more entertaining than I expected, Ms. Faye Chen."

Faye Chen. That was her name.

I couldn't let her looks and fresh-faced air fool me into thinking she belonged on the cover of a university brochure. She might never have married, but she was well over fifty.

She was also my senior by decades and one of the heroes of the Great Cataclysm.

[1882] Bangzi is a derogatory Chinese term for Koreans; "peninsula" refers to Korea.

“So you knew who I was from the start. Hmm. I thought young people these days wouldn’t recognize me.”

She wasn’t wrong. Compared to other S-rank Hunters, Faye Chen rarely appeared in the media.

There were even persistent rumors that she had changed her identity and was living a new life somewhere out of the public eye.

But I had known about her since I was very young.

“My mother’s been a fan of yours for years. You starred in that romance movie that came out about twenty years ago, didn’t you?”

“Oh, my. That was ages ago. Still, it’s nice to meet someone who remembers it.”

“Would it be all right if I asked for your autograph later? I think my mother would be thrilled if I brought one home.”

“Of course. And from now on, just call me Chen. My full name sounds much too formal. If you want to be even friendlier, you can call me big sister.”

“What? What are you talking about? I looked you up online. You’re five years older than my mother.”

“…You really are a handful. Just as I heard.”

But someone else was being a far greater handful.

“You fucking lowlife—!”

His voice boiled with rage. The man we had briefly forgotten during our conversation glared at me.

“How dare a bangzi from a weak little country look down on me? Do you even know who I am?”

“…Wow. That line was fucking awful.”

Faye Chen propped her chin on one hand and looked between us with interest.

“True. I’ve been wondering for a while now. Do you actually know who this young man is?”

Faye Chen wasn’t the only one waiting for my answer.

Everyone was staring at my mouth except Team Leader Choi, who now looked halfway to enlightenment.

The man huffing like a seven-year-old who had lost an argument. Magic Johnson, the Archmage from the United States. Even the young man from the United Kingdom. Their attendants were no exception.

With everyone watching, I nodded.

“I know. Wu Heixing.”

When it came to media exposure, he competed for first or second place even among S-rank Hunters. There was no way I wouldn’t recognize him.

Wu Heixing—the man who had been picking a fight with me and throwing around the word bangzi—stared at me with wide eyes.

“You knew who I was, yet you still dared behave that way?”

“Even a stray dog would know there’s a human piece of shit among the S-rank Hunters.”

“What, what did you say?”

“What? Everyone knows your hobby is getting attention and your specialty is committing crimes, then manipulating the media afterward.”

“…!”

“Come to think of it, didn’t you cause some trouble last year? The only drug my country allows me. You posted a raid photo on your official social media with some bullshit like that, then got caught using actual drugs a month later. Was it marijuana?”

“Mr. Jin Taekyung.”

“Don’t stop me, Team Leader Choi.”

“It wasn’t marijuana.”

“What?”

Team Leader Choi abruptly cut in and calmly corrected the Taekyung Wiki.

“It was cocaine and methamphetamine.”

“Oh, I see. Thank you for clarifying.”

“Think nothing of it. Now that things have gone this far, what is there left that I can’t say?”

Look at that enlightened expression.

Leaving behind Team Leader Choi, who had renounced all worldly attachments and was preparing to ascend to immortality, I flashed Wu Heixing a broad smile and continued.

“Damn, how did you think of planting foreshadowing like that? This bastard is at least Wu Heishunwon. Purple Raid.”

“What, what did you say?”

“Come to think of it, there was something else. Five years ago, you got caught drugging and sexually assaulting someone at some club called Burning Moon or whatever. How did you get acquitted? Under Chinese law, it wouldn’t have been strange if you’d been executed two or three times over.”

“…!”

“I heard a rumor that you’re the son of one of the Communist Party’s highest-ranking officials. Did you buy your way out with money and power? Look at this clever bastard.”

“Shut your fucking mouth! How dare a lowborn bangzi speak to me like that!”

Wu Heixing’s face turned scarlet as he roared. Someone who had been silently watching the whole affair finally spoke.

“You’re noisy.”

An arrogant voice flowed smoothly through the room.

“Frivolous and vulgar. I hear you are descended from a noble Chinese family. Did your elders neglect to teach you proper etiquette?”

Wu Heixing bit his lip when he recognized the speaker.

“Y-You’re…”

“You’re?”

Beneath neatly styled brown hair, faintly green eyes swept slowly over Wu Heixing, then moved away.

“William.”

At the young man’s summons, the graying middle-aged man standing behind him stepped forward.

His shoes were spotless, and the creases of his suit were sharp enough to cut. He stood tall, surveyed the room, and spoke in a pleasant baritone.

“Everyone, rise and show proper respect to His Highness Prince Felix Alexander Louis, Duke of Cambridge, Earl of Strathearn, Baron Carrickfergus, Knight of the Order of the Garter, and Knight of the Order of the Thistle.”

Duke of Cambridge, Earl of Strathearn… Fuck, why does he have so many titles?

At any rate, Prince Felix added solemnly, “You may all simply call me His Highness Prince Felix.”

“…”

“…”

Look at everyone’s faces. They couldn’t have looked more uncomfortable if they tried.

Of course, the finest expression of all belonged to Wu Heixing, who had just called me lowborn.

Understandable. When it came to social standing, how was he supposed to beat British royalty?

“So, this is…”

“Ah.”

Prince Felix regarded the flustered Wu Heixing and nodded as though something had just occurred to him.

“I see. Are you a stutterer?”

“A-a stutterer?”

“If not, why can’t you speak properly? Did your family neglect to provide you with speech training?”

Long live His Highness the Prince.

I didn’t even need to step in. Having the third person in line to the British throne inject carbonated water straight into my veins made me fizz all the way down to my duodenum.

I was grinning so widely my mouth might split when Prince Felix suddenly turned his gaze on me.

“You there.”

“Hm? Are you talking to me?”

At my question, the middle-aged man behind Prince Felix opened his mouth.

“When His Highness Prince Felix Alexander Louis, Duke of Cambridge, Earl of Strathearn, Baron Carrickfergus, Knight of the Order of the Garter, and Knight of the Order of the Thistle deigns to address you—”

“That will do, William.”

Prince Felix raised a hand, silencing the parrot mid-sentence, then regarded me benevolently.

“I have personally set aside my dignity and intervened because I have always believed that the barriers between social classes must be broken down.”

“…?”

“What does it matter whether one is lowborn or noble? Beneath God, we are all equal. So do not take that man’s words too much to heart.”

What the fuck is this supposed to mean?

I was momentarily speechless. Team Leader Choi leaned over and whispered discreetly.

“I believe he thinks you really are lowborn, Mr. Jin.”

“…!”

Has that prince bastard lost his mind?

As I stared at Prince Felix in disbelief, he slowly rose and extended the back of his hand toward me as though it were the most natural thing in the world.

“Come now.”

“Come now? What is it this time?”

The middle-aged man, who might have been either a secretary or a parrot, smiled with satisfaction.

“Kiss the back of his hand and express your gratitude for the benevolence His Highness Prince Felix Alexander Louis has shown you.”

“…”

Are these people completely insane?

Did these fucking eighteenth-century bastards take a time capsule here or something?

My head reeled. Then Team Leader Choi’s message magic reached my ear.

—No.

I answered through Sound Transmission.

—What do you mean, no?

—Whatever you're thinking, no. Just smile and let it go. Prince Felix is already famous for being an eccentric.

—Wouldn't he become even more famous if I broke the back of his hand right now?

—No. Absolutely not!

—Just the back of his hand. Or maybe only one finger.

—I said no!

I hadn't known that a message spell could convey this much emotion. Team Leader Choi must have been desperate in his own way.

Fine. He's a British prince. I can't do anything about that.

I was swallowing my anger when—

"Hey, Lord Fuck."[1883]

What now?

I looked warily at Magic Johnson, who had suddenly approached me.

I had never expected much from Wu Heixing, who was famous for his anti-Korean sentiment and all kinds of trouble. But the joy of seeing S-rank Hunters I had only watched on television in person was gradually running out.

"…No, please. Don't call me Lord Fuck. Use my name. Would you like it if I called you Dickson instead of Johnson?"

"Hmm. Now that you put it that way, I see your point. Jin, then?"

"That's much better. But why?"

"It's nothing special. I was just wondering—are you really not planning to kiss the prince's hand?"

That sounds pretty special to me.

I was dumbfounded and immediately asked back.

"Of course not. What is this, the Middle Ages? Would you want to do it if you were me, Johnson?"

"I would."

"What?"

Enlightenment struck me like a flash of lightning.

I had completely forgotten. Magic Johnson was an American national hero—and a national gay icon.

Time magazine's choice for "the world's most influential LGBT person" was making a serious suggestion to me.

"So I was thinking I might express my gratitude to the prince in your place, Jin."

"…"

He really knows how to dress it up.

[1883] "Lord Fuck" renders ssi-beol-jwa, an online nickname Taekyung received after accidentally swearing during a broadcast.

But unlike Magic Johnson, Prince Felix quietly withdrew the back of his hand.

“Beneath God, we are all equal. Such antiquated customs ought to disappear. Magic Johnson, I shall accept your kind offer another time.”

“…”

Is that really something the same bastard who held his hand out to me a minute ago should be saying?

Faye Chen, who had been listening, muttered as though she found it absurd.

“My, he’s shameless. He may be one step above Wu Heixing, even if he hasn’t actually committed any crimes.”

“He’s still better than Wu Heixing. That guy should’ve been executed if the law had been followed.”

“That’s true.”

The arrival of one heavyweight after another had reduced Wu Heixing to a cowering nobody, but sparks flew from his eyes.

“Y-you—you fucking bangzi!”

“Stop going on about bangzi already. Even the national anthem gets tiring by the second verse. The same goes for me going easy on you.”

“…You’re going easy on me? Someone like you?”

He sounded genuinely unable to comprehend the idea, so I nodded.

“Yeah. I’m sure of it now.”

I had a rough idea of Wu Heixing’s level, but he had no idea what kind of person I was.

A fight began with sizing up your opponent. This one was over before it even started.

“So stop picking fights and back off while I’m still asking nicely. Let’s just focus on our own jobs.”

“You’re merely an A-rank Hunter, yet you’ve grown arrogant because Chairman Comrade favors you! You don’t even know how high the sky is—!”

“Ah.”

So that was why he had started this bullshit the moment we met.

The reason was so obvious and childish that a derisive laugh escaped me.

“Damn. You’re way too fucking old for this to be cute.”

“…!”

“What are you going to do? You wanted all the Chairman’s attention and expectations for yourself, but some Korean guy came along and stole them.”

“You…”

Realizing I had seen straight through him, Wu Heixing flushed with shame and rage.

By now, everyone in the room was watching us. He must have felt every contemptuous gaze boring into him.

And when people like him found themselves in a situation like this…

They always crossed the line.

My prediction proved correct.

His fingertips slid almost imperceptibly toward his sword hilt.

Broad-minded Chairman Xiao Yang had not asked anyone present to disarm, offering his trust instead. But that consideration was about to become poison to Wu Heixing.

Draw it. Don’t hesitate.

No matter how reckless I seemed, I still observed the bare minimum of propriety.

Until now, I had held back only because I had come to help China at the Chairman’s request. If Wu Heixing drew his weapon, I would finally have an excuse to fuck him up within reason.

That’s it. More. Keep going.

As though I were controlling him, Wu Heixing’s hand crept closer to the sword hilt.

Just as his fingers were about to close around it—

Step. Step.

Several sets of footsteps echoed down the corridor beyond the silent underground bunker.

Wu Heixing’s hand froze at almost the exact moment the tightly shut door opened.

The instant I saw the man who entered alongside Minister of National Defense Wei Fenghu, Wu Heixing vanished completely from my mind.

“I’m rather late. Have I kept everyone waiting?”

He had bold, sharply defined features that looked as though they had been painted with a brush, and a powerful build that even his clothes couldn’t conceal.

He looked like a middle-aged man barely into his forties, but beneath that skin lurked an old tiger and a cunning snake.

Lee Jungryong.

Our eyes met, and a deep smile spread across Lee Jungryong’s lips.

Chapter 386

“I’m rather late. Have I kept everyone waiting?”

Lee Jungryong swept his gaze over the gathered people. Some faces were familiar; others he was seeing for the first time today.

Magic Johnson and Faye Chen, whom he had encountered several times during the Great Cataclysm. The young British prince. And China’s problem child.

Whenever his eyes met theirs, the S-rank Hunters gathered in the underground bunker greeted him first.

“Long time no see, Lee. You’ve grown even more attractive since the last time I saw you. Every time I see you, I feel like confessing my love.”

“Please restrain yourself, Magic Johnson. You’re not my type. Faye Chen here might be, though.”

At Lee’s breezy reply, Faye Chen swept back her long hair.

“Oh my. I had no idea you felt that way about me, Mr. Lee. What a shame I found out so late.”

“What’s there to regret? You’re still in your prime.”

“Thank you for saying that, but the young people will laugh if they hear you. They’ll ask what those old folks think they’re doing.”

“Is that really how it is?”

Under Lee’s gaze, Wu Heixing hurriedly waved his hands in denial.

“N-no, Mr. Lee. Of course not.”

“I’ve heard a great deal about you. Exceptionally talented and, hmm, a young man who’s honest about everything.”

“Th-thank you.”

Wu Heixing bowed his head, looking humbled by the honor.

He normally had bangzi—a derogatory term for Koreans—practically glued to his lips, along with his anti-Korean sentiment. But he lacked the nerve to show that side of himself in front of Lee Jungryong.

A bead of cold sweat rolled down the back of Wu Heixing’s neck.

“I’d heard you were coming, but I never expected you to actually appear.”

“Of course I had to come. When a neighbor is in trouble, shouldn’t we help?”

“It’s an honor to meet you, Mr. Lee.”

Even Magic Johnson and Faye Chen, heroes born of the Great Cataclysm, could not compare to Lee Jungryong.

He was the sworn brother of Cheon Taemin, known as the Jesus of the twenty-first century and the savior of the world. He was also the de facto head of the Ares Guild.

One of the most powerful Guilds in the world. And one of the three strongest among all S-rank Hunters.

Lee Jungryong.

Anyone who stood before him owed him the proper respect.

Even the overbearing Wu Heixing was no exception. Neither was the prince, despite his royal blood.

“Nice to meet you. A pleasure to meet you, Jungryong Lee.”

“Ah. So you’re that prince.”

“How impudent—”

Prince Felix raised a hand to silence his secretary, then inclined his head with elegant restraint.

“Felix. You may call me Felix. It is permitted.”

The Korean that came through the translation device was awkward, and his tone was hard to place.

But with those words, Felix Alexander Louis, third in line to the British throne, made the difference between Lee Jungryong and everyone else perfectly clear.

He had gone so far as to let Lee omit the title His Highness.

Of course, Lee Jungryong did not care in the slightest.

They’re still just brats.

The only people Lee acknowledged were Magic Johnson and Faye Chen.

Whatever their personalities, Wu Heixing and Prince Felix were both hailed as geniuses. But in Lee’s eyes, they were nothing more than chicks that had only just learned to walk.

And the people who truly grated on his nerves were elsewhere.

The Peace Guild.

Lee’s gaze shifted to one side. A deep smile spread across his lips as he looked at the two people standing there in silence.

“I seem to be running into you two rather often these days. Have you both been well?”

At Lee’s greeting, Jin Taekyung and Choi Minwoo glanced at each other and shrugged.

“Not really.”

“Not particularly.”

“…?”

What?

Lee Jungryong unconsciously faltered.

It had been less than a month since he had last seen them. Yet something had changed dramatically in the way they treated him.

Hostility.

That was it.

The unmistakable hostility and wariness he had sensed from them before were gone.

As Lee studied the two people who stood before him with such calm expressions, he soon realized why.

They've grown stronger. So much stronger than before that there's no comparison.

There was no doubt about it. Choi Minwoo's qi was far greater and more refined than before—so much so that Lee found himself wondering how he had managed to grow this much in such a short time.

And the other one, Jin Taekyung—

…What is this?

Lee felt it through his skin and sixth sense: the immense qi contained within Jin Taekyung's body, and the profound stillness in his eyes.

It could mean only one thing.

He crossed the wall.

The shock hit Lee like a blow to the back of the head. He had to struggle with all his might to keep his agitation from showing.

How?

Jin Taekyung had undoubtedly been powerful before. Perhaps he had even stood above the countless A-rank Hunters throughout the world.

He had defeated two Named Monsters by himself. It was only natural that the public and the media had clamored about the birth of a new S-rank Hunter.

But Lee Jungryong had known that Jin had not yet crossed the wall. He had known that it would take the young man a very long time to overcome the barrier blocking his path and become a true powerhouse.

And yet—

How can something this absurd happen?

This went beyond mere surprise.

As Lee met Jin Taekyung's calm gaze, he remembered emotions he had long forgotten.

Anxiety. Impatience.

It was the first time Lee Jungryong had felt such unease since taking complete control of the Ares Guild.

Only a few months ago, Jin had been someone he found laughable and irritating. Yet that same man had now awakened anxiety and impatience within him.

You bastard…

The smile on Lee's lips vanished without a trace. Wei Fenghu regarded his hardened expression with puzzlement.

"Mr. Lee? Is something wrong?"

"…It's nothing."

"Hmm. Then may we begin the meeting?"

Lee Jungryong nodded without a word, but his gaze remained fixed on one person.

Leaning at an angle against the back of his chair, Jin Taekyung muttered as if to himself.

"Well, it looks like quite a big deal to me."

"…!"

"Or not. Whatever."

Without realizing it, Lee Jungryong clenched his fist.

The meeting in the underground bunker continued for a long time.

The Monster Wave had caused at least hundreds of thousands of casualties over the past week. That alone made it an enormous natural disaster and an unmistakable state of war. It was only natural that every decision had to be made with the utmost caution.

"Therefore, we should divide our forces into five armies and gradually pressure the enemy…"

Someone interrupted Wei Fenghu as he continued with a grave expression.

"Minister of National Defense Comrade."

"Speak, General Liao."

The middle-aged man called General Liao wore a uniform weighed down with medals. Stroking his beard, he began to speak.

"Listening to the Minister of National Defense has become too frustrating for me to remain silent. If we keep dragging our feet like this, how long will it take us to deal with those monsters?"

Wow…

His tone was unbelievably obnoxious.

He was speaking that way to Wei Fenghu, the Chairman's right-hand man and the highest-ranking man with real power in the military.

As though he had read my thoughts, Team Leader Choi sent me a message spell.

> ㄴ Choi Minwoo: The Communist Party has factions of its own. General Liao comes from the highest pedigree of the Crown Prince Party, the Communist Party's largest faction, going back to his grandfather's generation. It rivals the Shanghai Gang, to which Chairman Xiao and Minister of National Defense Wei Fenghu belong.
>
> ㄴ Jin Taekyung: The Crown Prince Party and the Shang…what?

> └ Choi Minwoo: …If we must rank them, it means the Crown Prince Party is number one and the Shanghai Gang is number two.
>
> └ Jin Taekyung: Oh.

Until now, I had assumed that the Communist Party operated under a strict one-party system. Apparently, they fought among themselves just as fiercely.

> └ Jin Taekyung: But is that really allowed? If Chairman Xiao pointed at someone and said, "That man is harmful," wouldn't they behead him in Tiananmen Square?
>
> └ Choi Minwoo: They do it because they're allowed to.
>
> └ Jin Taekyung: …Well, when you put it that way, I don't have much to say.
>
> └ Choi Minwoo: The factions reached an agreement. During the Great Cataclysm, the Chairman from the Crown Prince Party made so many mistakes that they couldn't very well keep holding power.
>
> └ Jin Taekyung: Ah. Pingping?[1884]
>
> └ Choi Minwoo: Yes. Pingping.[1885]

That damn Great Cataclysm changed all sorts of things.

While I listened to Team Leader Choi's explanation, General Liao, a pedigreed Crown Prince Party brat, came out with a brilliant proposal.

"Let's use nuclear weapons."

"…?"

"…?"

"Let's submit a formal request to Chairman Xiao and launch dozens of nuclear warheads across Sichuan. Wouldn't that solve everything nice and cleanly?"

"…"

"…"

Would you look at this nuclear-crazed lunatic?

Everyone, myself included, stared at one another in disbelief.

Minister of National Defense Wei Fenghu's expression was the most impressive of all. He looked like a man itching for a handgun as he answered.

"Rejected."

"Why? Are you ignoring me because I'm not part of the Shanghai Gang?"

"Say something that makes sense. Something that makes sense! What about the people who are still alive or haven't been harmed? What about the land that would be reduced to a wasteland?"

[1884] "Pingping" is a mocking nickname derived from Xi Jinping's given name.

[1885] "Pingping" is a mocking nickname derived from Xi Jinping's given name.

"The sacrifice of the few for the many is unavoidable!"

I didn't know about the rest, but the man himself looked like an oxhead.[1886]

Magic Johnson, who had been listening quietly, suddenly spoke in his deep voice.

"The damage from a successful nuclear attack would be bad enough, but what will you do if they use teleportation magic to move the warheads? To Beijing, for example."

"That's why we have an Archmage like you…"

"Me? Our opponent isn't an ordinary Lich. If that Arch Lich is more skilled at magic than I am, it could cause a truly irreversible catastrophe. Similar things already happened several times during the early days of the Great Cataclysm, remember?"

"B-but even so… A sacrifice of this scale…"

"Hey. Murderfucker."

Bang!

That startled me.

Magic Johnson shot to his feet, his bronzed muscles rippling.

"Stop it. I like East Asian men, too. I might have to punish you."

"…!"

"…!"

That's the scariest threat I've ever heard.

General Liao's face turned deathly pale as he looked around for help. But the officials who seemed to belong to his faction avoided his gaze, as did Wu Heixing, his last possible line of defense.

So that's how this gets resolved.

His opponent was an American national hero—and a national gay icon.

Everyone seemed desperate not to become one of the East Asian men Magic Johnson liked.

Of course, General Liao's relentless stream of bullshit had played a major role as well.

"Enough, both of you. Especially you, General Liao. Stop spouting such utter nonsense."

Under Wei Fenghu's direction—the Chinese man who had just put down that chink—the meeting proceeded quickly.

After gathering the opinions already raised and settling the arguments, Wei Fenghu secured everyone's agreement before speaking with a weary expression.

[1886] In Korean, so can mean both "small" or "lesser" and "cow." Taekyung twists General Liao's maxim about sacrificing the lesser for the greater into an insult.

“We will assign the six S-rank Hunters here to six separate fronts. Under the official force organization, each front will receive three Army and Air Force divisions, along with Hunters from the Public Security Armed Forces Department.”

Three Chinese divisions and the Public Security Armed Forces Department.

I didn’t know exactly how many people that meant, but the sheer manpower would be enormous.

When it came to the number of Hunters a country possessed, China was always competing for first or second place.

Of course, the enemy won’t be any pushover either.

The estimated casualties alone numbered in the hundreds of thousands.

If the Arch Lich had resurrected the dead as undead…

Then an almost unimaginable number of enemies would be waiting for us.

“This concludes the meeting. Everyone, move out as soon as possible.”

Wei Fenghu said the exact troop numbers and force organization would be provided in writing. Just as everyone rose from their seats, it happened.

Come see me for a moment.

Someone’s voice pierced my ear.

It wasn’t a message spell. It was unmistakably Sound Transmission.

Chapter 387

It was already deep into the night by the time we left the underground bunker.

I drew a deep breath, letting the cold air seep into my lungs. As I gazed up at the star-filled sky, thinking of Sichuan in the Murim somewhere out there, a small hand tapped me on the shoulder.

“Coming with me? I’m thinking of having a light drink.”

“Now?”

“Yeah. Just us.”

It was Faye Chen. Two other members of that “us” stood behind her.

One of them spoke in a voice brimming with dignity.

“Lady of the East, might there be any Romanée-Conti among the wine we shall share?”

“I’m no noblewoman, but of course I have some. Do you like wine, Prince?”

Prince Felix answered with a displeased look.

“I told you to call me His Highness Felix, not Prince. And I enjoy wine in moderation. Especially the 1945 Romanée-Conti.”

“I don’t have the 1945 vintage.”

“Then I must decline. I shall be leaving.”

Was this guy actually insane?

As Prince Felix disappeared with his attendants, Faye Chen turned toward the one person left behind.

“You’re coming, right, Johnson?”

Magic Johnson grinned, baring his snow-white teeth.

“I’m sorry. Unfortunately, I think I’ll have to put it off until next time.”

“Why?”

“I might be deployed to the front tomorrow. I’d feel more at ease if I at least prepared my spells with Memorize.”

As expected of an Archmage. Heroes of the Great Cataclysm didn’t become heroes for nothing.

Deeply impressed by Magic Johnson’s attitude, I spoke up.

“I don’t think I can go right now either.”

“No.”

“Why not?”

“You’re neither a prince nor an Archmage.”

“…That’s not how this works.”

Unbelievable. Never mind her completely unreasonable demands—that ajumma[1887] was really something else, suggesting drinks at a time like this.

"You just cursed me in your head, didn't you? You called me a thoughtless ajumma[1888] for wanting to drink at a time like this."

"…How did you know?"

"Oh my, look at how pointlessly honest this boy is."

Faye Chen poked the tip of my nose with one long finger. She looked like a beautiful woman in her early twenties, but she was actually older than my mother. It felt strange.

"Why don't you find someone else? Mr. Lee, perhaps…"

"Lee?"

Faye Chen tilted her head slightly. Lee Jungryong had long since disappeared with the Ares Guild members he had brought with him.

"Hmm. He's rather difficult to deal with. He wasn't like that during the Great Cataclysm, but he's turned into such a slippery snake. I can never tell what he's thinking."

She had an excellent eye for people.

Faye Chen cast a sidelong glance at another candidate disappearing into the distance before continuing.

"Wu Heixing. He's far too rude. Drinking with him would ruin the taste."

I gazed at Wu Heixing's back as he headed into the deserted forest and answered.

"Nothing we can do, then. You'll have to drink another time."

"No. These are exactly the days you drink."

"…?"

"It might be our last chance."

"Ah."

I thought I understood, at least somewhat, why Faye Chen was looking for a drink.

War wore people down. It also brought unexpected farewells in the form of death.

This was her own eve-of-battle ritual after losing countless comrades during the Great Cataclysm.

By the time this crisis was over, one of us might have crossed the river from which no one ever returned.

"Well, since things have turned out this way, I'll have to find a new target. Right, handsome young man?"

"I told you I'm not going."

Faye Chen stared at me incredulously.

"Do you have no shame? I meant that young man over there, not you."

[1887] Ajumma is a familiar Korean term for a middle-aged or married woman.

[1888] Ajumma is a familiar Korean term for a middle-aged or married woman.

The handsome young man Faye Chen had singled out—Team Leader Choi—nodded readily, contrary to my expectations.

"If you're inviting me, it would be my honor."

"Uh, Team Leader. You're really going?"

"Of course. When will I ever have another chance to share a drink with Faye Chen? Besides, there are many things I'm curious about."

Faye Chen giggled.

"I thought you were only handsome, but you're sweet with words, too. So, what are you so curious about?"

"The Equipment you're wearing right now. Where did you buy it?"

"…That's your question?"

"Yes."

"You're quite a handful yourself."

Magic Johnson burst into hearty laughter as he watched Faye Chen heave a deep sigh.

"Ha ha. Miss Chen, shall we all go have a drink together, then?"

"All together? Johnson, didn't you say you weren't coming?"

"I did. I have no interest in drinking alone with a woman. But if an attractive man like Mr. Choi here joins us, that changes things."

"…"

"I like men. East Asian men in particular."

"R-right. Let's go."

As expected of Time magazine's choice for the world's number-one most influential LGBT person.

I sent Team Leader Choi a Sound Transmission as he was dragged away, stiff as a board.

—Call me if anything happens.

Team Leader Choi looked back at me with mournful eyes, like a cow being led to the slaughterhouse, then disappeared with the two S-rank Hunters.

I looked around before setting off.

This was the direction.

After walking along the dark path for some time, keeping out of sight, I stopped in the pitch-black darkness and spoke.

"Come out."

After a brief silence, someone's voice drifted from the darkness.

"…Not bad."

Rustle.

Wu Heixing emerged with the sound and looked me up and down.

“How did you know?”

“What kind of question was that?” I answered flatly.

“You might as well ask me what one plus one is. That would be harder.”

“Hmm. So you were more capable than I expected.”

“Don’t pretend to praise me now. It’s obvious you’re trying to pull some cheap trick.”

“…!”

I had hit the nail on the head. Wu Heixing’s face flushed bright red.

In a way, he was remarkably easy to handle. I knew he was well into his thirties, but it was hard to believe anyone could be this simple-minded at that age.

“I-it wasn’t like that. I sincerely…”

“You sincerely think I’m a bangzi.[1889] You were pissed because some random Korean who isn’t even officially an S-rank Hunter was getting all the attention instead of you. So you picked a fight with your usual one-dimensional bullshit, but nobody reacted well, and that bangzi[1890] turned out to be less of a pushover than you expected. Right?”

I kept firing off words like a machine gun without giving him a chance to answer.

“So now you’re throwing out a few compliments you don’t mean and making friendly gestures, trying to pull some kind of trick… Wait. Is any part of what I just said wrong?”

“…”

“Yeah, I’ve met plenty of guys like you. I’ve been smacked in the back of the head so many times that even my useless brain finally started turning.”

When I gave him a contemptuous look, the red-faced Wu Heixing began to stammer.

“I wasn’t trying to pull some other trick.”

“Then what? If you’re thinking of becoming friends with me, fold that idea up neatly and put it away. If you stand next to shit, the smell gets on me too.”

“…!”

“But what are you doing right now?”

At my quiet question, the hand creeping toward his sword hilt stopped dead.

“Don’t draw it. You’ll get hurt.”

Wu Heixing looked at me with conflicted eyes before blurting out a question.

“You already knew everything… So why did you come along so willingly?”

“Because I had something to ask.”

“What?”

I looked straight into Wu Heixing’s eyes.

[1889] Bangzi is a derogatory Chinese term for a Korean person.

[1890] Bangzi is a derogatory Chinese term for a Korean person.

"Sound Transmission. Right?"

"…!"

His rigid expression was answer enough. I'd thought it might be possible, but this was still surprising. Scratching the back of my head, I muttered,

"I guess it is. Well, this is the mainland, so I suppose various martial arts could have survived here. An internal-energy cultivation technique, for example."

"W-what are you talking about? That was message magic…"

"Oh, please."

A snort escaped me at the sight of him scrambling to make excuses.

Other people who had never encountered martial arts might not be able to tell the difference, but he couldn't fool me.

Come see me for a moment.

What had reached my ear near the end of the meeting had unquestionably been Sound Transmission.

I had accepted an invitation I could easily have ignored because Wu Heixing himself had sent it.

"H-how did you know?"

"Why? Was it some secret no one else knew?"

I stared at the flustered Wu Heixing and continued.

"I thought it might be possible, but it's still fascinating. Didn't you people wipe out all the martial artists during that whole Cultural Revolution[1891] business? I'm impressed that martial arts survived even through that."

"Shut your mouth!"

"Oh, right. You said your family was powerful. Did the highest-ranking Communist Party officials quietly smuggle it out by abusing their positions?"

"…"

His expression sank instantly. I must have been right.

As a foreigner, I didn't know how serious a problem this was, but I understood the value of an internal-energy cultivation technique—in other words, what was called a mana cultivation technique in the modern era.

If this were the Murim, there would've been a bloodbath.

He had been caught secretly hoarding a golden calf like that. Naturally, Wu Heixing wasn't reacting well.

"It would be wise never to speak of what you just said again."

"I had no particular intention of doing so, but your tone is pretty damn offensive."

Wu Heixing glared at me with venomous eyes.

"Would you still act like this after learning who my father is?"

[1891] The Cultural Revolution was a political movement in China from 1966 to 1976 during which historical and cultural traditions were attacked.

“I don’t know who your father is, but he sounds like he might have been a former Red Guard.”[1892]

“…!”

“Wasn’t your father the one who went around with a sledgehammer in his youth, smashing Confucius’s tomb?”

“You fucking bangzi[1893] bastard!”

Flash!

With a furious shout, he shot forward.

An Aura Blade—no, Sword Force—surged from the straight sword already drawn from its sheath and hurtled toward my throat.

Whoosh!

The cool wind scattered my hair. I bent backward until my waist nearly touched the ground, letting the Sword Force pass overhead, then sprang upright and drove my knee into his chin.

Crack!

Teeth and blood flew through the air. As Wu Heixing staggered, I seized both his arms and whispered in his ear.

“I told you not to draw that sword.”

Sizzle. Crack!

“Aaaaaaargh!”

The powerful Scorching Yang Qi coursing through my hands shattered his armor and burned his flesh.

Wu Heixing’s scream struck the qi barrier I had spread around us and went no farther.

“You bastard!”

Whoosh!

This guy had even learned fist-and-foot martial arts. Unlike his shoddy sword technique, this was fairly sharp.

Of course…

Compared to the Murim, the quality of his martial arts is much lower.

Slightly disappointed, I reached out.

Boom!

Internal energy collided with internal energy.

His leg, whipping toward my waist, stopped dead.

Wu Heixing’s eyes trembled with shock and disbelief.

“H-how?”

[1892] The Red Guards were groups mobilized during China’s Cultural Revolution to attack people and traditions deemed politically suspect.

[1893] Bangzi is a derogatory Chinese term for a Korean person.

"I'm good."

I grabbed his ankle and slammed him into the ground with all my strength.

Whoosh! Boom!

Once more.

Whoosh! Boom!

Again. And again. And again.

Boom! Boom! Craaash!

The ground churned, and rocks and trees were ripped free.

By the time I stopped using him as a human pickaxe, Wu Heixing lay spread-eagled in a huge crater, looking as though his soul had left his body.

"Still, you've got a sturdy body, so you're not hurt that badly."

"Urgh… ugh…"

"Hey, are you crying?"

"Uuuugh…"

He was completely out of it.

Clicking my tongue, I bent down and searched his pockets.

After rummaging through the pouch enchanted with spatial expansion magic for a while, I finally found what I was looking for.

"Ah, here it is. A high-grade potion."

"…No, wait. A top-grade potion? What the hell, you bastard?"

I stared in surprise at the sprawled-out Wu Heixing. Even for an S-rank Hunter, carrying something like this around was absurd.

High-grade potions were rare enough, but top-grade potions appeared maybe once or twice a year.

Their almost unreal price aside, they were so scarce that even people with money couldn't get their hands on one.

I've only ever seen these online, and now there's one right in front of me.

After a moment's hesitation, I slipped the top-grade potion into my Inventory. Then I searched his pouch again, found a high-grade potion, and poured it over him.

"I've got my settlement payment, so I'll let you off here. You've got plenty to be worried about yourself, so if you go around telling people about what happened today… You know what'll happen, right?"

"Ugh… uuuugh…"

“Okay. We’ve reached a settlement.”
Just as I finished wrapping things up neatly, the phone in my pocket vibrated.
A short text from Team Leader Choi was waiting for me.

> Team Leader Choi
> └ Team Leader Choi: Mr. Ji nTaekyung, pl ease come quickly.

“…”
No, Johnson.

Chapter 388

"Hey. Hey."

Tap. Tap-tap.

Someone prodded Wu Heixing in the side with the tip of a foot. He barely managed to open his eyes, and a large figure looming over him swam into view.

"Uhhh…"

"I've got something urgent to take care of, so I have to get going. If anyone comes by, make up a convincing story, will you?"

"Ugh… uuuugh…"

"I poured a potion over you, so quit acting like you're dying, you bastard. Keep it up and I'll call Magic Johnson over to make you moan for real. See you!"

Whoosh!

Leaving behind a parting remark that made Wu Heixing's ass ache just from hearing it, the man sped away and vanished in an instant.

It was only ten minutes or so later that Wu Heixing, still lying spread-eagled on the ground, finally spoke in a voice boiling with rage.

"Jin Taekyung…!"

His broken bones and torn flesh had healed thanks to the high-grade potion, but it couldn't heal the pain etched deep into his bones—or his wounded pride.

How?

He couldn't believe it. No matter how agitated he had been, how could he—an S-rank Hunter—have been toyed with so thoroughly?

The fact that Jin Taekyung had seen through his martial arts was shocking, but Wu Heixing took even greater offense at the defeat itself. He had always been fiercely proud of the power he possessed.

Me? Me, of all people?

Wu Heixing had been born with the destiny of a Hunter.

As an infant, his potential had been confirmed through an extraordinarily expensive mana aptitude test, and his family, part of the highest ranks of the Chinese Communist Party, had spared no expense in supporting him.

Enormous wealth and power accumulated through corruption. Raised in the finest environment with the best possible support, Wu Heixing awakened as an A-rank Hunter at the age of twenty. Ten years later, he achieved the astonishing feat of becoming an S-rank Hunter.

And yet…

Then why? Why did I lose to some bangzi[1894] bastard from that tiny country?

[1894] Bangzi is a derogatory Chinese term for a Korean person.

A strange light flashed in Wu Heixing's eyes as he glared up at the pitch-black night sky.

His gaze held anger, jealousy, and a trace of fear toward the power Jin Taekyung had displayed.

They were emotions Wu Heixing had been sickeningly familiar with for more than a decade.

He shouted at the man who was now nowhere to be found.

"Was this your doing? Are you trying to torment me even after death?!"

The public and the media cursed Wu Heixing as an irredeemable delinquent even as they praised him as a genius born of Zhonghua.[1895] But a tiny handful of people, Wu Heixing included, knew the truth.

There was another—the true genius. And it was precisely because of his genius that they had kept him hidden from the world.

"Answer me, Lei Fei!"

With his overwhelming strength and noble character, Lei Fei had been an insurmountable wall to Wu Heixing.

How flustered—and delighted—Wu Heixing had been when he first heard that Lei Fei had disappeared.

But after only a week, another wall had appeared.

A wall named Jin Taekyung.

"Gaaaaaaaah!"

The bushes shuddered beneath his thunderous cry.

"I know that feeling well."

At the quiet voice of someone who had approached without making a sound, Wu Heixing sprang upright like lightning.

"Who are you?!"

"That hurts. I thought we already knew each other."

Step.

A man emerged from the darkness. Wu Heixing's eyes widened.

"You're…?"

Beneath the faint moonlight, Lee Jungryong continued with a smile.

"I believe we have something important to discuss. What do you say?"

"…!"

Ding.

[1895] Zhonghua refers to China or Chinese civilization; here it is used as a patriotic name for the nation.

SYSTEM

Circulate Your Qi completed!
The realm of Fire Gate Divine Technique has risen slightly!

By the time I finished gathering my qi and opened my eyes, the world outside was growing bright.

As though it had been waiting for that exact moment, the Skeleton Warlord immediately spoke.

> "Wicked human. Are you finally awake?"

"I wasn't asleep, you idiot."

> "Drinking before a battle. Tsk, tsk."

"It's not like alcohol can make me sick, so shut up."

Drinking too much caused alcohol toxins to build up in the body, but any decent martial arts master could drive them out with ease.

And with my formidable Scorching Yang Qi, I had even less to worry about.

Come to think of it, I really did drink a lot. I polished off every bottle Faye Chen brought over on her private jet.

I had definitely gone there to stop Magic Johnson, but I wasn't entirely sure how things had ended up that way.

> "But human, how long do you intend to remain in this stuffy place?"

"I was planning to leave anyway."

I checked the time. Five-thirty in the morning. It was about time to get ready.

After packing my things in the hotel room assigned as my temporary lodging, I went down to the lobby and found Team Leader Choi drinking coffee.

"Oh, Team Leader."

"...There you are."

One glance revealed dark circles beneath his eyes. His skin, usually kept so immaculate that it didn't have a single blemish, looked rough and dry.

"Did you not sleep?"

"If you were in my position, Mr. Jin, would you have been able to?"

"..."

Fair point.

The sight I had witnessed after racing over in response to the most desperate emergency text in the world last night had been nothing short of horrific.

“Hey, Choi. It’s just a drinking game. Come on, be cool and do it once. What do you say?”

“Faye Chen! Please help me, Faye Chen!”

“Hmm… Sorry, but it’s a drinking game. The king’s command is absolute. Isn’t that the rule?”

“Even so, a kiss?! I’ve never played a drinking game before! You didn’t even explain the rules properly!”

“Oh, whatever. Number two will kiss number three on the cheek. That’s my command.”

“Choi. Stay still. I don’t want to cast a binding spell on you.”

“This is absurd… Mr. Jin! Over here, Mr. Jin!”

“Jin. Don’t interfere. I don’t want to cast an offensive spell on you.”

If I had arrived even one minute later, a catastrophe would have occurred.

I had been forced to down an enormous amount of alcohol in exchange for rescuing Team Leader Choi, but I didn’t regret it in the slightest. After all, I had been promised fair compensation.

“You remember the promise you made yesterday, right? About adjusting my settlement ratio.”

“…I remember. Nine to one.”

Team Leader Choi glared at me coldly.

“How could you do that in such an urgent situation? Are you even human?”

“Then go give him a nice, passionate kiss right now. Number two is coming over as we speak.”

He might have been number two, but when it came to being gay, he was number one in the world.

Team Leader Choi spotted Magic Johnson—a huge Black man who had just entered the lobby—and sprayed out his coffee.

“Pfft! Please, please hide me.”

“I think it’s already too late.”

The moment I finished speaking, Magic Johnson spotted us and waved a hand as big as a cauldron lid.

“Hey, gays!”

Wasn’t it supposed to be guys? He must have said it wrong… right?

As Team Leader Choi and I stared at him in disbelief, Magic Johnson approached and burst into hearty laughter.

“Don’t look at me like that. I got a little too excited yesterday and played the tiniest prank.”

"…You were really excited?"

"Ah. That came out wrong."

"Please watch what you say. You startled me."

"Haha. Anyway, something came up yesterday."

"…What came?"

"Huh? No, not that kind of coming."

"Please watch your words. You really startled me."

"Please, both of you, stop. I'm afraid someone will hear you."

Looking utterly resigned, Team Leader Choi downed the rest of his coffee and turned his head.

A group of people had entered through the hotel's front doors and were walking toward us.

"It's time to leave, gentlemen."

Wei Fenghu, the Minister of National Defense, stood at the head of the group. His voice was rigid with tension.

At his signal, an elderly military general handed each of us a folder.

"What are these?"

"Information on your assigned areas and the forces stationed there. Of course, we have already sent them the necessary information and contacted them in advance. From here, you will travel aboard your designated jets."

This was one of the conveniences of living in a modern age with cutting-edge technology.

A short while later, we followed Wei Fenghu to the temporary airfield, where several familiar faces waited amid heavy security.

"Did you sleep well, young people?"

"…"

"You're late."

Faye Chen greeted us while stretching her arms high overhead. Perhaps because of what had happened yesterday, Wu Heixing kept his eyes lowered without a word, while Lee Jungryong wore a strange smile.

The Skeleton Warlord, safely stored in my Inventory, spoke in a displeased voice.

> "That human is unpleasant for some reason. This commander does not like him one bit."

"I agree."

Faye Chen raised an eyebrow at my quiet mutter.

"Hm? What did you say?"

"Nothing. By the way, where's Prince Felix?"

“He left just before dawn. Apparently, a battle signal came from the area he was assigned.”

“…I see.”

Another battle, less than twenty-four hours after arriving.

The word war suddenly made a corner of my heart clench tight.

Our nationalities and upbringings were different, but knowing that human beings like me were being slaughtered somewhere made my heart heavy.

“Hey, young man.”

“Yes?”

Faye Chen had been staring at me intently. She reached out and gave me a light tap on the shoulder.

“Relax your shoulders. If they’re that heavy, how are you supposed to swing your spear?”

“…”

“Don’t blame yourself, and don’t be impatient. You can’t take responsibility for every death.”

Responsibility.

I thought about it for a moment before answering honestly.

“…I don’t know. I’m not sure I can do that.”

“Well, you certainly drank yourself senseless yesterday for someone who feels that way.”

“That was…”

“I know. I’m joking. People like us forget the burden for a little while that way. Our lives might end tomorrow—or even today.”

The content didn’t match her bright voice. The hero who had made her way through the Great Cataclysm with every inch of her body looked up at the sky.

“Ah. Perfect weather for a fight.”

She turned and walked lightly toward the jet, which was ready for takeoff.

Then she left us with one quiet remark.

“Let’s all… see each other alive.”

Her back disappeared inside the aircraft.

Magic Johnson gazed up at the sky for a moment with an oddly sentimental look, then suddenly spoke.

“Hey, Choi.”

“Yes?”

“Relax your butt, too.”

“…”

“No, your shoulders. Let’s see each other alive again.”

That sounded suspiciously like his true feelings slipping out.

Magic Johnson laughed heartily at Team Leader Choi's wary look and boarded the aircraft after Faye Chen.

Wu Heixing followed as though fleeing the scene. Finally, Lee Jungryong, the last one remaining, swept his strange gaze over Team Leader Choi and me.

"Take care of yourselves. It would be a shame to die in a place like this, wouldn't it? Especially at such a young age."

What a way for an old man to talk.

It was one hell of an ominous remark.

Team Leader Choi's face hardened, so I smiled and answered in his place.

"That's right. Unlike certain people, we're too young for anyone to call our deaths a good passing."

"…!"

"If you do kick the bucket, I'll make sure to send a generous funeral contribution."

"I'll be counting on it."

After a brief silence, Lee Jungryong tossed out that final remark and led the Ares Guild members away.

Now only Team Leader Choi and I remained.

I stretched as hard as I could, then patted him on the shoulder.

"Let's go, Team Leader."

"Yes. We should."

"No need to be nervous. Relax your butt."

"…"

"…That was a joke. I'm sorry."

One more joke and he looked ready to kill me.

I was cautiously watching Team Leader Choi's expression as I boarded the aircraft when it happened.

"Unit—attention!"

A booming shout erupted behind us.

Wei Fenghu stood at attention and saluted us, his half-gray hair fluttering in the wind.

The people filling the airfield followed his lead and raised their hands in salute.

It was a gesture of respect for the heroes going to fight for their families and friends.

Their salutes remained raised until the jet's door closed and the aircraft dwindled to a distant speck in the sky.

Good grief.

With a send-off like that, how could my shoulders not feel heavy?

I leaned back in my seat, suddenly exhausted.

Then—

Crackle. Crrrackle.

"…swer. Respond. This is…"

A static-filled radio transmission suddenly came from the cockpit, accompanied by an alert that pierced my ears.

Ding.

SYSTEM

A Sudden Quest, The Desperate War Situation, has been generated.
You cannot refuse this Quest. Arrive as quickly as possible and defeat the enemies!

"…"

Damn it. That's my life, all right.

I let out a deep sigh, then shouted toward the cockpit.

"Sir, floor it!"

"Where are they?"

The speaker was an old man in his eighties. His face was covered in wrinkles and age spots. His aged body was no longer what it had been in his youth, but his eyes held even greater power than they had back then.

Even through the holographic screen, the old man's powerful gaze could be felt. Wei Fenghu swallowed hard before answering.

"They have all departed, Chairman Comrade."

"How is the situation at the front?"

"Because of the magical interference disrupting communications and the barriers, we cannot easily determine the enemy's movements. However, we are doing everything possible to track them."

"If the S-rank Hunters arrive…"

"With their strength, they should be more than capable of turning the tide."

"Don't jump to conclusions. Do not let your guard down for even a moment. The lives of countless people depend on our decisions."

"Yes. I will keep that in mind."

After the brief communication with Minister of National Defense Wei Fenghu ended, Xiao Yang, Chairman of China, sat alone in the vast conference room and sank into thought.

How did things come to this?

It was a catastrophe without precedent since the Great Cataclysm. Despite pouring in vast amounts of manpower and money, they had been unable to stop the monster army centered around the Arch Lich.

He had wanted to avoid causing panic if at all possible, but if they delayed any longer, the opportunity might disappear forever.

That was why Xiao Yang had come here today despite the countless objections within the Communist Party.

“They’re ready.”

“…Connect me immediately.”

At his secretary’s words, Xiao Yang opened his eyes.

Holographic figures began appearing one after another in the empty seats of the spacious conference room.

Fourteen people of different races and genders.

No—fifteen, including Xiao Yang.

Each of them was the leader of a nation, and all belonged to a single body.

The United Nations Security Council.

In a grave voice, the elderly Chairman called the emergency meeting to order.

Chapter 389

It was a day when the cold snap had finally eased.

Students at last freed from the college entrance exam were busy either preparing to retake it or having fun, while office workers with dark circles under their eyes packed onto public transportation.

Then, amid that peaceful, ordinary routine, a bombshell no one had seen coming dropped.

> Urgent Breaking News—Major Announcement from the United Nations Security Council

The video, just over thirty minutes long, began with Chairman Xiao Yang staring gravely into the camera.

“I stand before you as the ninth Chairman of the People’s Republic of China and a member of the United Nations Security Council to speak about the massive Monster Wave unfolding in Sichuan Province.”

It was a bombshell that seized the world’s attention and shook all of Asia.

One day passed, then two, then three. Even after four days, the situation showed no sign of calming down.

There had been countless incidents and disasters since the Great Cataclysm, but the Monster Wave in Sichuan Province was unprecedented in scale.

Chairman Xiao Yang of China officially declared martial law, and with the approval of the United Nations Security Council, peacekeeping forces were deployed to the front.

The entire world was watching.

The Asian countries bordering China were especially on edge.

Korea was no exception. Once again, the Hunter Issues section of the country’s largest online forum was boiling like a cauldron over hot coals.

Here’s a summary of the situation so far.

There isn’t anyone here who hasn’t watched the Security Council’s major announcement video, right? If there is, go die somewhere. This is a genuine emergency. The supreme leader up north has probably already watched the whole thing on iTube and is lurking on this board, too.

Anyway, so many insect bastards kept asking someone to summarize a situation their own lives depended on that I finally got fed up and wrote this.

1. An unexplained massive Wave occurred in Sichuan Province. Current estimated casualties: at least 300,000.

Of course, that figure is from a week ago, so there's probably no comparison with the number now. At this point, I doubt accurate statistics are even possible.

2. The Chinese government stepped in, but the scale was far crazier than anyone expected.

A monster army numbering at least in the tens of thousands has gathered around something called an Arch Lich.

The People's Liberation Army and Air Force got absolutely wrecked, while more than two thousand Hunters from the Public Security Armed Forces Department have gone missing. Magical interference cut off communications and neutralized satellite surveillance, so they can't even confirm whether those Hunters are still alive.

3. The Chinese government secretly contacted several countries and hired a number of S-rank Hunters to suppress the situation as quickly as possible. United Nations peacekeeping forces were deployed to the front two days ago, and they're fighting desperately.

The Security Council is posting updates on the fighting, so anyone interested can check them here.

(Link attached.)

Everything below this is just my personal opinion, so feel free to skip it.

4. Anyone with a properly functioning brain already knows this, but the current situation isn't merely serious. Mainland China is practically hell on earth.

They're pulling every useful Hunter they can find and sending them to the front. Other Gates are being neglected as a result, and their mana levels are becoming unstable. Prices are also hyperinflating across the board.

The truly frightening thing is that if the front collapses and the monster army advances beyond Sichuan… I'll leave the rest to your imagination.

5. So go to the supermarket and stock up on emergency food before we're all completely screwed. Of course, I'm not telling you to hoard supplies and profiteer.

6. It felt like a shame to end it here, so I'm throwing in some national pride.

Our Lord Fuck and the Ares Guild's Jung Dragon[1896] are active on the front. Keep hyping them up as hard as you have been.

Teh end.

[1896] "Jung Dragon" is a nickname for Lee Jungryong; ryong means "dragon" in his name.

Within hours of being uploaded, the post passed 100,000 views, and the comments caught fire as netizens following the situation weighed in.

> ㄴ Best comment: The situation really is as serious as the post says, but the author is setting the mood way too hard lol. They say S-rank Hunters are fighting alongside 100,000 ordinary Hunters. What's there to worry about? Is the military just sitting around?
>
> ㄴ Yeah. They're sitting around in maintenance depots right now.
>
> ㄴ ...?
>
> ㄴ Didn't you watch the news? All the Chinese military's Equipment broke down this time, exposing the largest military procurement corruption scandal ever. They say it's worth at least tens of trillions of won.[1897] Apparently, more than one or two divisions are stuck in place.
>
> ㄴ Huh. This sounds like something I've heard a lot before.
>
> ㄴ Please change the canteens already, you motherfuckers. I got out last year, but why did the water in my canteen still taste like it came from Normandy? [1898] After one sip, I couldn't even tell whether my name was Kim Cheol Soo or James.
>
> ㄴ Corporal Kim. Tonight's dinner is boneless pollock braised in sauce.
>
> ㄴ I'm not eating, fuck.
>
> ㄴ Anyway, the military being stuck because of broken Equipment is a problem, but they've got manpower to spare, so they're probably fine. Hunters are the only ones who can actually inflict meaningful damage on monsters, after all. The real problem is something else.
>
> ㄴ What?
>
> ㄴ The monster population has broken through 100,000.
>
> ㄴ ??
>
> ㄴ ?????
>
> ㄴ What do you mean, 100,000? Don't talk bullshit.
>
> ㄴ It's not bullshit. It's official information announced by the United Nations Security Council. Follow the link in the post and check it yourself. It was posted five minutes ago.
>
> ㄴ Wow... fuck.
>
> ㄴ Judging by the reaction to the comment above, I guess it's true. Holy shit.

[1897] Tens of trillions of won means roughly 10–99 trillion won, or about $7.1–71 billion and €6.5–64 billion.

[1898] Normandy refers to the Allied landings in France during World War II. The comparison suggests that the canteen is decades old.

> ㄴ No. That's just because it's all in English and I don't understand what it says. I'm running it through Gargle Translator right now.
>
> ㄴ Is this guy insane?
>
> ㄴ Hey, but if the number of monsters really has broken through 100,000, isn't that a huge problem? Until now, the largest Monster Wave we'd ever seen hadn't even reached a thousand monsters, had it?
>
> ㄴ Naturally, this Wave wasn't anywhere near this large in the beginning. The problem is that there's an Arch Lich over there. Even an ordinary Lich appearing would be a major incident, but that one is an apex named Monster unknown even to academia. Practically speaking, most of the monsters fighting right now are undead resurrected by the Arch Lich.
>
> ㄴ Arch Lich: "Kaioken, times one hundred."[1899]
>
> ㄴ Then can't we just kill the Arch Lich? If most of the monsters are undead, killing the controller should end everything, right?
>
> ㄴ ???????
>
> ㄴ Who's going to kill the Arch Lich, and how, you fucking idiot? The guy who uses an Aura Blade with his keyboard has nothing but a mouth.

A fierce debate raged on.

Some commenters watched from a safe distance, as though the whole thing were a fire across the river, while others took the crisis seriously.

Even as doomsday predictions and blind optimism ran rampant, new information continued to pour in.

> ㄴ Best comment: Security Council official report: The front in the east-west sector was breached one hour ago. Fortunately, Faye Chen arrived with reinforcements and stopped the damage from spreading.
>
> ㄴ Holy shit, it's real.
>
> ㄴ If it's the east-west front, isn't that where Wu Heixing is?
>
> ㄴ Yeah. That Chinese junkie.
>
> ㄴ But why did it get breached? He's an S-rank Hunter.
>
> ㄴ Because he's a Chinese-made S-rank Hunter.
>
> ㄴ Ah…
>
> ㄴ If Faye Chen hadn't been there, this could've become a real disaster. Maybe it's because Faye Chen is a well-made Hunter forged by the Great Cataclysm.
>
> ㄴ Faye Chen is Hong Kong-made. Her parents had Hong Kong citizenship.

[1899] Kaioken is a power-multiplying technique from Dragon Ball.

> ㄴ Do you work for the comment quality-control committee? That was fucking clear.
>
> ㄴ While we're at it, does anyone have news about the Korean Hunters?
>
> ㄴ Jung Dragon[1900] has taken charge of the northern front and is gaining the upper hand. I heard Lord Fuck won two or three times on the western front, but there hasn't been any news since then, so I guess he's maintaining the current situation.
>
> ㄴ Hmm… I'm not worried about Lee Jungryong, since everyone knows how skilled he is, but is Lord Fuck safe? He's still an A-rank Hunter, after all.
>
> ㄴ ?? LOL
>
> ㄴ LOL
>
> ㄴ There's still an innocent idiot who treats Lord Fuck like an A-rank Hunter, lol. As a current A-rank Hunter, all I can do is laugh. That Jin Taekyung guy is just a monster, lol.

> ㄴ Hey, hey, h-hey!! The Se-Security Council just posted an update on the w-western front!
>
> ㄴ Oh, news about Lord Fuck. It's been a while.
>
> ㄴ You sound frantic as hell. What does it say about the western front?
>
> ㄴ It says it was breached?
>
> ㄴ Huh?
>
> ㄴ Huh?
>
> ㄴ What are you talking about? Don't tell me Lord Fuck died…?
>
> ㄴ Wait. What the hell does this mean? I'm going to watch it again. It's on the main page, so check it yourselves.
>
> ㄴ Shit. I'm suddenly freaking out. I'm going in right now.
>
> ㄴ Go go go go go.

The netizens who had been gleefully hammering out comments rushed to the United Nations Security Council website.

The sudden flood of visitors overloaded the site, leaving them waiting for ages. When the announcement finally appeared on the main page, they could only doubt their own eyes and ears.

"…What is that?"

A map showed the opposing lines in the standoff against the monster army. The front formed an oval, with the western side driven deep into it like the tip of an awl.

[1900] "Jung Dragon" is a nickname for Lee Jungryong; ryong means "dragon" in his name.

> ㄴ I just checked. It really was breached.
>
> ㄴ Is Jin Taekyung dead? How bad are the casualties?
>
> ㄴ No, the monsters' side was breached.
>
> ㄴ ??
>
> ㄴ ???
>
> ㄴ The breakthrough was so fast that the updates couldn't keep up.
>
> ㄴ ...Does that even make sense?
>
> ㄴ Shut your mouth and pull down the shutters. Today is the Lady of the House's memorial day...[1901]

The battlefield where a fierce clash would soon erupt was packed. An endless wasteland stretched before us, filled with more monsters than I could count.

The wind carried their thick killing intent and stench toward us.

"Fuck me. They sure gathered a lot of them."

Team Leader Choi, standing beside me, answered my mutter.

"No matter how many we kill, there's no end to them."

It was the fourth day since we had been deployed to the western front and the fighting had begun in earnest. There was no trace left of Team Leader Choi's usually immaculate appearance.

Covered in blood and dust, he regarded me with calm, somber eyes.

"When do we begin?"

"Well, we'll have to hear what our little commander thinks. Right?"

The last question wasn't directed at Team Leader Choi.

The twenty-one-year-old "little commander" who had remained at my side the entire time, Xiao Shen, answered.

"I'll follow Teacher Jin's orders!"

His sparkling eyes made me snort.

"You're still calling me Teacher? You were the one who told me to drop the formalities first. I told you to call me hyung[1902] instead."

"A-are you really sure that's all right?"

"I told you it was fine as long as you were okay with it. But is this really all right in front of your men? You said you're getting promoted to major general now, didn't you?"

Xiao Shen shook his head at lightning speed.

[1901] Korean netizens call for a tavern's Lady of the House and drinks to celebrate a surge of national pride. Saying it is her memorial day reverses that celebration.

[1902] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older man with whom he is close.

"No problem at all! H-hyung, hyung!"[1903]

He was frighteningly calm in battle, so I had no idea why he stammered so much in everyday life.

I looked at the Hunters from the Public Security Armed Forces Department lined up behind him. There were roughly a thousand of them.

Their fever-bright eyes shone with admiration and awe for the strong.

Of course, Xiao Shen stood out above all the rest.

"Give the order, h-hyung."[1904]

"The order, huh?"

I suddenly looked up at the sky.

An eagle circled overhead on enormous outstretched wings.

I had a good feeling today, too.

"Follow me. Just as you've done until now."

"…!"

"Right now."

I stepped forward as I answered.

Crack.

The ten thousand geun[1905] of force concentrated in my toes split the ground like a spiderweb and made it cave inward.

Then, in the next instant—

Boom!

With a deafening roar, I shot forward like a streak of light.

Flamefire Path.

The cold wind heated into a scorching blast.

The earth, the wind, and the scenery streaked past. Then a tremendous roar erupted behind me.

"Charge! Charge!"

"Descendants of Zhonghua![1906] People! Sweep them all away!"

"Waaaaaaah!"

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

Kyaaaauuuuu!

The shouts of humans and the howls of monsters rang across heaven and earth. A tremendous vibration shook the foundations of the world.

At the threshold of that chaos, I swung the White Flame with all my strength.

[1903] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older man with whom he is close.

[1904] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older man with whom he is close.

[1905] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb); ten thousand geun is 6,000 kg (about 13,200 lb).

[1906] Zhonghua is a patriotic term for China and Chinese civilization.

Fwoooosh!

The Extreme Yang Force surging from the spearhead cut through everything in its path.

Chapter 390

Whoosh!

Hot blood sprayed from severed necks in the wake of the Force.

I stepped on the body of an ogre collapsing like a bundle of straw and soared high into the air. Sunlight warmed the back of my neck.

Perfect weather for a fight.

It was noon, and the battlefield was a wasteland without a single tree.

My shadow fell across the thousand or so monsters gathered below, the sun at my back. Then I plunged toward them, spear sweeping down.

Heavenly Strike.

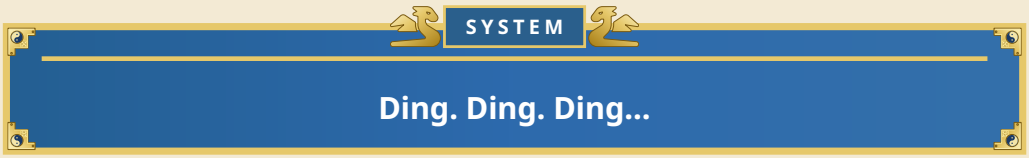
Boom!

The fire dragon's claw raked the earth.

A deafening roar split the sky. The ground caved in several meters[1907] deep, sending dirt and shattered stone flying in every direction.

A whirlwind of hot air that erupted in the middle of the battlefield transformed into blades and swept across the monsters.

Fwoooosh!



Green blood pattered down through the dust-filled haze as System notifications announced the monsters' deaths.

I gave my hand a casual sweep, dispersing the cloud of dust. The monsters beyond it stared at me in a daze.

"Chirrik?"

"Krruk?"

Their eyes seemed to ask what the hell was happening. I drew a deep breath and shouted with internal energy behind my voice.

"Sweep them away—!"

And then—

"Waaaaaaaaah!"

Along with an ear-deafening roar, more than a thousand Hunters who had arrived before I knew it descended on the monster army like a wave.

Crunch!

Wham!

[1907] Several meters is roughly 10–16 ft.

Watching the monsters crumble without any chance to resist, I became certain of one thing.

We've won this battle.

The farming was over. Now it was time to harvest.

I headed toward the Twin-Headed Ogre that appeared to be the boss monster.

For the sake of my precious EXP. No—for the sake of minimizing allied casualties.

"That one's the leader! Ranged unit!"

"Hey, hey! Hands off! I'll handle it, so don't touch a single hair on its head!"

I swear to heaven, I didn't have even the slightest ulterior motive.

…

Well, on second thought, there was probably no need to swear.

"You despicable human. Your scheme to claim the spoils is plain to see. You never even tried to hide your greed while slaughtering my army!"

"Shut up and do your job, will you? Hurry up and make the undead slaughter their own kind."

"I was already going to. Grow, skeletons, gro—huh?"

"What's wrong?"

"Why isn't my power working? Is this a bug?"

"…Where did you even pick up a word like that?"

The increasingly modernized Skeleton Warlord answered in a dejected voice.

"It seems the Arch Lich's control grows stronger the deeper we go. Ah, a commander without an army! I cannot express the depth of my sorrow. At this rate, I'm as good as dead!"

…

What did this bastard think he was?

I was tired of reminding him that he was already dead. Sighing inwardly, I charged toward the leader.

"It's a crushing victory! Another crushing victory!"

Xiao Shen shouted, his face flushed red. Team Leader Choi and I had already seen this more than ten times, so by now we simply took it in stride.

Well, I suppose he has reason to be excited.

It had taken barely two hours to annihilate an army of more than a thousand monsters.

And we had done it without a single death. It really was a monumental victory. Under the circumstances, it would have been stranger not to get excited.

“Our only casualties are twenty-three severely wounded and thirty lightly wounded. Ah, this is incredible…!”

Xiao Shen trembled like a puppy desperate to pee and looked at me with shining eyes.

“How can this happen every time?”

“Hmm. Maybe it’s because I’m strong.”

Team Leader Choi gave me a mildly incredulous look.

“Why?”

“Wouldn’t most people say something modest at a time like this? That they were lucky, for example?”

“Most people would. But what can I do when it wasn’t luck? I really am that strong. Right, Shen?”

Xiao Shen nodded at tremendous speed.

“That’s right! You’re the best, hyung[1908]!”

“You rascal. You’ve turned flattery into an art form.”

…

Team Leader Choi shook his head as he watched us play off each other.

“What?”

“Nothing. Then again, this is very much like you, Mr. Jin.”

What was that supposed to mean? Somehow, it sounded unpleasant.

I shrugged and turned to Xiao Shen.

“More importantly, what about headquarters?”

“Ah, I contacted them before the battle began.”

By “contacted,” he meant that he had sent several Hunters under his command ahead as messengers.

In a world like this, one might wonder why anyone was still using messengers, but there was no choice. With magic making communication and satellite surveillance impossible, our only options were to run like hell or use vehicles.

At least we still had various modern conveniences, including flares.

“They’ll take a while, then.”

“They were already following behind us, so it shouldn’t take too long.”

“You’re probably tired, but pitch some tents and let the men rest. The battle ended quickly, but fighting still takes everything out of you.”

“Shouldn’t we take care of at least the large monsters ourselves? They’d probably be difficult for headquarters to move…”

“That’s a fair point.”

By headquarters, he meant the military forces traveling with us.

[1908] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man he is close to.

The Hunters of the Public Security Armed Forces Department, myself included, would defeat the monsters at the front. Then the military forces following behind would “clean up” the area and the monster corpses.

I called it cleaning up because their goal wasn’t to collect byproducts.

It was cleaning in the literal sense. The army assigned to the western front spent most of its time cutting up dead monsters and transporting the remains to the rear so they couldn’t be resurrected as undead.

“Um, hyung[1909].”

“Yeah? What is it?”

“I was too embarrassed to mention this before, but… it seems some of the high-ranking officers have been saying various things.”

“Saying what?”

Xiao Shen studied my expression before whispering cautiously.

“They’re a little dissatisfied with the role they’ve been assigned…”

“…?”

What the hell was he talking about?

It took me quite a while to understand what Xiao Shen meant. After a long, heavy silence, I spoke with a sinking feeling.

“Don’t tell me they’re saying they want to stop cleaning up monster corpses and win some glory of their own.”

“Yes.”

“Would you look at these crazy bastards.”

The curses came spilling out on their own. Soldiers on the other fronts were dying every day, and these people were sick of cleaning up monster corpses?

Team Leader Choi, who had been listening quietly, spoke in a calm voice.

“Don’t be surprised. A chink did what chinks do.”

That hardly seemed like something he should say in front of nearly a thousand Chinese people, but Chinese people and chinks were, strictly speaking, different races.

Xiao Shen, the representative of all good Chinese people, had turned red with embarrassment.

“I-I’m sorry. But as far as I know, it isn’t all the officers. Only some of them are dissatisfied.”

“Only some of them. Right. But there’s one thing I’d like to know…”

I frowned and pointed over Xiao Shen’s shoulder.

“Does that ‘some’ include the man coming this way?”

[1909] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man he is close to.

In the distance, more than a hundred armored vehicles and tanks were approaching us, kicking up clouds of dust.

Rattle, clunk!

The vehicle driving along the ruined road bounced up and down. Through the window of the military vehicle I was sitting in, I began to see wrecked rice paddies and fields, along with collapsed homes scattered here and there.

Once the cleanup was finished, I—or rather, we—set off for a nearby small city.

“Haha, you’ve truly worked hard, Mr. Jin!”

A paunch even his tightly fastened belt couldn’t hide. A bald crown gleaming beneath the sun.

If not for his military uniform and the three stars on his shoulders, I would never have had any reason to meet the middle-aged man sitting before me.

“I contacted the higher-ups this morning, as it happens. Your victory report has thrown not only the United Nations Security Council but the entire world into an uproar! I don’t know what it means, but apparently Korea calls today the Lady of the House’s memorial day…”[1910]

I had heard enough of his nonstop nonsense. Unable to take any more, I cut him off.

“I don’t care whether the Lady of the House is dead or alive. May I ask you one thing?”

“M-Mr. Jin?”

General Liao, commander in chief of the 13th Group Army of the Chengdu Military Region, which comprised seven divisions and brigades, looked at me uneasily.

“Why—why are you acting like this? Did something happen?”

“I heard something strange today, so I’m a little on edge.”

“Who dared upset you, Mr. Jin? Ask me anything.”

“Right. What I wanted to ask was…”

I continued while staring at General Liao’s greasy, glistening face.

“I heard some officers are extremely dissatisfied because they want to distinguish themselves. I was wondering if you knew anything about that.”

“Ahem.”

So he did know.

The fact that he had known and still done nothing about it was so absurd that I felt strangely calm.

[1910] Jumo is a traditional Korean tavern hostess. General Liao’s reference to her “memorial day” turns a call to celebrate with drinks into a reference to the anniversary of her death.

Still, he was technically an ally and a three-star general from another country. I asked in the calmest, politest tone I could manage.

“Could I see the faces of those fucking bastards?”

“Ahem!”

“I mean, what kind of lunatics throw a fit about wanting to win glory at a time like this? It’s not as if they’ll go out and fight themselves. They’ll put ordinary soldiers in front of them and wave their command batons around from the rear, won’t they?”

“Ahem!”

“What the hell do they mean, they’re sick of cleaning up monster corpses? Why? Have they seen so many that they’ve grown fond of them and decided they want to become corpses too? Maybe they won’t come to their senses until they actually fucking die. Goddamn bastards.”

“Ahem!”

“If there are officers like that, tell them to come see me. I’ll put Equipment on them and send them to the very front. They’d make perfect meat shields—”

I suddenly stopped in the middle of my tirade. Cold sweat was pouring from General Liao’s forehead like water from a sprinkler.

“…”

This man was one of those lunatics too.

I had suspected he wasn’t an ordinary madman ever since he started babbling in that underground bunker about whether or not to launch nukes. Now it was clear that he was insane on an entirely different level.

“…General. Are you in your right mind?”

“I-I mean, we need to show what we can do as well. Just a little…”

“What more do you need to show anyone? We’ve been advancing steadily without taking casualties. The Hunters clear the path ahead, and the army follows behind to clean up and rescue civilians. We’re doing a good job. What more are you trying to prove?”

Crack.

At the sight of me popping my knuckles, General Liao hurriedly waved his hands.

“Now, now! Let’s not use informal speech with each other. Considering both my age and my rank, I’m not someone who should be treated this way by you, Mr. Jin.”

“How about I treat you to a bowl upside the head?”

“Wh-what did you say?”

“Nothing. You heard me wrong. Anyway, I understand. Don’t entertain any foolish ideas. From now on, we advance slowly, minimize casualties, and rescue civilians. Understood?”

“…”

Why was this man reacting like that?

The moment I saw General Liao's eyes rolling around instead of answering, a chill ran down my spine.

No way…

"Have you already given the order?"

"W-well, the thing is, I'm currently implicated in a military procurement corruption scandal. This is the point where I need to accomplish something on my own…"

"You fucking bastard!"

Bang!

My kick tore the armored door from its hinges. The driver in the front seat hurriedly slammed on the brakes.

Screeeech!

"Eek!"

General Liao curled into a ball and trembled as he answered in a stammer.

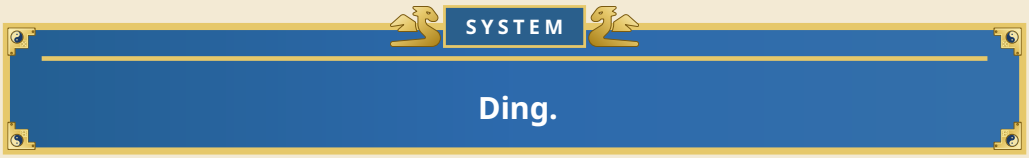
"I-I thought there might be monsters in the small city we're heading toward, so I deployed some of the Public Security Armed Forces Hunters we were holding in reserve…"

I didn't need to hear any more. Before I could press him for details, a tremendous roar rang out from the city, now close ahead.

Boom!

A massive explosion. Flames and smoke shot into the sky.

And then—



A System notification announced a Sudden Quest.

Chapter 391

Zhang Wei, commander of the Sichuan Province Public Security Armed Forces Department's 2nd Company, had remained in the rear, and the operation had made him uneasy from the very beginning.

Go ahead with the army and occupy the city? That's different from Colonel Xiao's orders.

His doubts had only deepened when they deliberately bypassed their allies fighting up ahead and continued their advance.

"Colonel Wang, are you certain our regimental commander agreed to this operation?"

The middle-aged senior officer frowned at Zhang Wei's question.

"Why do you want to know?"

"No matter how I look at it, something feels wrong. Our regimental commander clearly ordered us to conserve our strength in the rear and guard headquarters…"

"Ah, you mean that little regimental commander."

Zhang Wei's expression hardened at the officer's mocking tone toward Xiao Shen.

"Regimental Commander Xiao Shen holds the same rank as you, Colonel Wang. And he'll soon be promoted to major general."

"That child knows nothing about the world. He was simply lucky. As if awakening as an A-rank Hunter wasn't enough, he even made the promotion list thanks to that Korean bastard's exploits. Considering how quickly he's risen through the ranks, I wonder if he has some useful guanxi[1911] in political circles."

"He may be young, but he's exceptionally capable. He's also highly respected—he's close enough to us to treat us like brothers."

The senior officer stroked the command baton in his hand.

"I know perfectly well that Hunters don't care about rank. But this is wartime. This order came from General Liao, the commander."

"From the commander himself…?"

"That's right. So if you don't want to obey, you may turn back now. Just remember that doing so would constitute disobedience."

"…!"

"We're merely trying to speed up our advance. Given the circumstances, it's unlikely there are any monsters left behind, but if there are, we'll wipe them out and rescue any civilians in danger. That's all. Understood?"

Zhang Wei remained silent for a long moment before nodding and withdrawing.

[1911] Guanxi refers to influential personal connections and relationships, especially those used within social or political networks.

The Public Security Armed Forces Department was generally treated as a separate organization outside the military, but this was wartime. Defying General Liao, commander of the western front, would not be a wise choice.

"What did he say?"

Zhang Wei answered his subordinate's hushed question.

"He said it's an easy operation, so we should shut up and follow him. If we refuse, it's disobedience."

"Do you believe him?"

"If you mean the first part, of course not. But the second part is probably true. What do you think?"

"Of course I don't believe him. That bastard Colonel Wang has no ability of his own. He only made it this far because of his guanxi[1912] with the Crown Prince Party. Everyone says he's General Liao's obedient dog."

"And this order came from that very General Liao. Even if something stinks, we have no choice but to endure it for now."

"…Damn it."

"But Colonel Wang might be telling the truth. Most of the monsters in the surrounding area should be fighting our allies. With our current forces, we can handle a few stragglers."

Zhang Wei looked around.

In addition to the hundred Hunters, including himself, they had more than twenty tanks and five hundred infantrymen. Three attack helicopters flew overhead, scouting their surroundings as they advanced.

Please, let there be no serious casualties.

Perhaps Zhang Wei's wish reached the heavens, because what he feared did not happen.

They entered a small town near Suining with every sense alert. Monsters had devastated the place, but the ruined downtown was utterly silent.

The occasional goblin or Orc sprang out at them, but none posed any real threat.

"Kieeeek!"

Slash!

After killing a dozen or so monsters at the head of the column, Zhang Wei relaxed a little.

"Even monsters of different species are appearing separately. They must have strayed from their groups."

"Just as I expected. What did I tell you?"

[1912] Guanxi refers to influential personal connections and relationships, especially those used within social or political networks.

The officer's arrogant tone grated on him, but this was still preferable to the alternative.

Zhang Wei silently nodded, only to stop short at the senior officer's next words.

"You want us to split up?"

"That's right. Under these circumstances, we should find the survivors as quickly as possible."

"But, Colonel Wang, we haven't even been inside the city for an hour. We should advance a little farther toward the center before—"

"Watch your insolence."

"Excuse me?"

"You Hunters may be better at fighting, but I'm several steps ahead of you when it comes to tactics. I currently hold command authority, so shut your mouth and follow my orders."

"…!"

"Didn't you hear me? Shall I give the order to your men myself?"

"…I'll do it."

"You have a detailed map, I assume. We'll meet in the central square in two hours."

The officer gave Zhang Wei an obnoxious smile and was about to climb into an armored vehicle when—

Whoooosh! Boom!

Zhang Wei blinked blankly.

He wiped his face with one hand, and his palm came away covered in sticky blood.

It was unmistakably human, a vivid crimson. The officer's body, its upper half gone without a trace, toppled from the armored vehicle.

Thud.

A suffocating silence fell.

Zhang Wei was the first to recover.

"Everyone, prepare for battle—!"

"Monster! A monster has appeared!"

"Tank!"

"The regimental commander has been killed!"

The Hunters of the Public Security Armed Forces Department were the first to react to those shouts. The soldiers took a moment longer to grasp what had happened.

And waiting for them, already thrown into utter chaos by the sudden death of their commander, was an even more horrific death.

Whoooosh!

A single sound tore through the air.

A beam of light shot forward at an invisible speed and swept through the soldiers advancing in orderly ranks and files.

Boom-boom-boom!

It burst dozens of people like balloons before finally piercing the armored vehicle moving under infantry escort.

The streak of light punched through the vehicle's hardened shell and bored deep inside.

The moment Zhang Wei saw it, he roared like thunder.

"Everyone, get clear!"

But before his voice could reach them, the deafening roar that erupted in the next moment swallowed everything.

BOOM!

The armored vehicle erupted in a flash of red and a cloud of black smoke. Hundreds—thousands—of fragments became blades that tore through everything around them.

Countless soldiers and lower-ranking Hunters who had failed to react in time collapsed like bundles of straw.

Their lifeless bodies did not so much as twitch.

"…!"

"W-what the hell…?"

Zhang Wei bellowed at the people frozen like statues.

"Spread out! Everyone, spread out! Get as far away from the tanks and armored vehicles as possible!"

But the soldiers, experiencing combat for the first time in their lives, had gone rigid. The unseen enemy did not let their confusion go to waste.

Whoooooosh!

The sound of death came again.

This time, however, there was more than one streak of light.

Boom! Boom-boom-boom!

"Aaaaaagh!"

Flames surged upward, and screams flooded the air.

The more than twenty armored vehicles and tanks were rendered useless in no more than an instant.

The three attack helicopters circling overhead were also reduced to countless fragments and crashed to the ground.

Boom! Clatter-clatter-clatter.

Amid a horrific scene that could only be called a sea of corpses and blood, Zhang Wei felt a chill run down his spine.

At least A-rank monsters. And there aren't just one or two.

Ironically, it was the most accurate judgment Zhang Wei made that day.

Sssssss.

Between dark alleys and collapsed buildings. Atop the roof of a building still engulfed in flames.

Ten figures that had appeared like black mist stared down at the hundreds of surviving humans with burning violet eyes.

When Zhang Wei saw them mounted on warhorses that had been stripped to the bone, a word escaped his lips like a groan.

"…Death Knights."

Knights who had once been noble, only to be corrupted by black magic.

The very Death Knights who had vanished alongside the Lich after the Great Cataclysm had appeared.

Ten of them.

The first word that came to Zhang Wei's mind was death.

Is this where it ends?

Death Knights were beings that surpassed A-rank monsters.

A hundred Hunters and a military force still remained, but Zhang Wei already knew.

There was no escaping the net they had cast.

But…

"I have no intention of dying quietly."

Zhang Wei was not the only one who felt that way.

Unlike the soldiers, who were too frightened even to hold their guns properly, the Hunters of the Public Security Armed Forces Department raised their weapons with determination in their eyes.

"You don't have to go this far."

One of the platoon commanders answered Zhang Wei's quiet words bluntly.

"And you're allowed to?"

"I'm sorry. I shouldn't have brought you here."

"You didn't bring us. We followed you. We've survived more than ten times thanks to you, so I'd say we were due for something like this."

He spoke as though it were nothing, but he couldn't hide the tremor in his voice.

Zhang Wei licked his parched lips as he stared at the ten motionless Death Knights.

"Fight with everything you have, and make sure at least one of you survives. That's all I have to say."

A thunderous cheer answered him.

The Hunters cast off their fear, their eyes shining like morning stars.

If they had wanted safe, prosperous lives, they could have chosen another path.

But they had joined the Public Security Armed Forces Department instead of becoming bodyguards for wealthy businessmen or working as mercenaries because of their honor and sense of responsibility as Hunters.

This was a fight they could never retreat from.

“Let’s go! Sons and daughters of the people, descendants of Zhonghua[1913]!”

Zhang Wei had just finished shouting with all his strength and was about to charge the nearest Death Knight when—

Rrrrrumble!

It was almost instinctive.

The ground shook violently, and a vast, overwhelming energy washed over them. Every surviving human turned toward it, terror making their hair stand on end.

There, where all their gazes converged, a black knight slowly crossed the ruined city center.

Red eyes flashed beneath a helmet pulled low over its face. The breath of death spilled from its bloodless lips.

“Sar, Garosh.”

Words in a language of the Demon Realm that no one could understand.

Yet in the next instant, Zhang Wei realized what they meant.

Kill them all.

The ten Death Knights charged from every direction, reflected in Zhang Wei’s widened eyes.

Slash!

The slaughter began.

Splash.

A hoof stripped to bare bone stepped into a pool of blood.

The black knight gazed down at the corpse of Zhang Wei, the middle-aged Hunter who had resisted to the very end. The approaching Death Knights knelt before him on one knee.

“Lord. Your next command.”

His next command.

The black knight remained silent for a moment, then abruptly extended a hand.

Whoosh! Slash!

A black streak of light lashed out like a whip, slicing through concrete and rebar.

The building collapsed at an angle. Within the exposed interior, several humans huddled together with their hands clamped over their mouths.

[1913] Zhonghua is a name for China that invokes Chinese civilization and national identity.

“Jinjin. Honey. It’s okay. It’s okay…”

“Sniff… sob…”

“Dadda?”

A human male and female. And…

A creature so small and light that he could not yet tell whether it was male or female.

Was that what they called a child?

Child. Child?

Where had he heard that word before?

Pushing the sudden question aside, the black knight reached out. Every human he saw had to be annihilated. That was the command he had received.

But—

“…?”

For some reason, his hand would not move.

They were undoubtedly weak beings who would turn into a handful of blood and vanish from a mere flick of his finger, yet it was as though an invisible barrier surrounded and protected them.

“What are you?”

At the black knight’s eerie voice, the child squirming in its parents’ arms suddenly began to wail.

“This…”

The black knight abruptly raised his head and stared into the distance, then turned his mount around.

The Death Knights voiced their confusion at their leader’s sudden action.

“Lord?”

“We’re going back. Now. At once.”

“Then shall we deal with the humans—”

“We’re going back. Now. At once.”

That was all.

The ten Death Knights bowed on one knee in deference before riding after their leader.

Just before they vanished like mist, the black knight’s red gaze fell upon the three humans who had miraculously survived, then moved away.

Whoooooosh.

The blood-scented wind swept through the corpse-filled ruins.

Chapter 392

Damn it. Faster. Faster.

Whoooooosh!

I squeezed out every last ounce of strength and pushed my movement technique to its limit. The scenery blurred past as the ruined city rapidly drew closer.

But I knew how it had ended before I even arrived. No—I should say someone told me.

Beep.

SYSTEM

??? has completed its objective and disappeared.
Sudden Quest, Unexpected Assault, has been canceled.
You failed to complete the Quest. As a failure penalty, a random stat decreases by 10.
Strength decreases by 10.

The moment I heard the System notification, the tension wound tight inside me abruptly snapped.

It wasn't because I had failed the Quest or because my stat had decreased. It was because I knew what the notification meant.

The deepening silence as I approached the city—and the sight that greeted me moments later—turned my suspicion into certainty.

"…"

Blood was everywhere, and horribly mangled corpses lay strewn across the ground. Even I, after countless battles had made me accustomed to death, froze for a moment.

Slaughter.

Yes. This was slaughter. They had blown people apart, torn them to pieces, and crushed them.

The evidence that living human beings had been hunted down and killed like ants made it hard to breathe.

If even I, a complete stranger from another country, felt this way, the grief and rage of the Public Security Armed Forces Department Hunters arriving behind me were beyond words.

"Zhang Wei! Langlang!"

"W-Who the hell did this? Who the hell…? Sob…"

"No! Aaaaaah!"

These were comrades who had entrusted their backs to one another. Among the cold bodies lying before them were their siblings and lovers.

Amid the endless wailing and shouting, one person who had been standing in silence suddenly stepped forward.

Thud. Thud.

Perhaps his hollow footsteps sounded especially loud because his face, so unlike its usual self, was utterly numb and devoid of emotion.

Team Leader Choi, standing beside me, called my name quietly.

“Mr. Jin.”

“I know. Me too.”

Some things had to be done even when you wanted no part of them. This was one of those times. I forced the words past my lips.

“Shen.”

“…”

“Xiao Shen!”

Thud. Thud. Thud.

Even my forceful shout failed to stop him. Xiao Shen merely kept walking toward some unknown place, searching for the killers who had murdered his subordinates.

In the end, I had to walk up and grab him by the shoulder.

Smack.

“Stop.”

A dry, lifeless voice emerged.

“…Let go. I have to go.”

“Where?”

“Where?”

Xiao Shen looked around with empty eyes before continuing.

“I don’t know. But they must be somewhere.”

“You…”

“I have to go after them. No matter what it takes, I’ll find them and have my revenge.”

“…!”

For a moment, I couldn’t speak.

The person before me wasn’t Xiao Shen. He was me, a few years ago.

That was why I couldn’t bring myself to say what needed to be said.

Because I know how he feels.

He wanted to kill, and he probably wanted to die too.

The deaths of those close to you left behind more than rage and grief. The survivor was burdened with guilt heavier than both combined.

The guilt left behind by a hundred lives was far too much for a twenty-one-year-old to bear.

Damn it.

I swallowed the curse lingering on the tip of my tongue and tightened my grip on his shoulder.

"You're too late."

"…"

"It's already too late. We can't find them right now. That isn't a guess. I'm certain."

The System notification had told me as much. There was no possibility of a mistake.

Xiao Shen stared into my unwavering eyes and murmured blankly.

"I'm too late. I really am too late."

"I don't want to admit it either, but… yes. That's the reality."

I thought he would finally unleash all the rage and grief he had been holding back.

I thought he would wail and smash everything in sight, just as I had a few years ago.

But I was wrong. The monsters weren't the only targets of Xiao Shen's revenge.

Rattle-rattle. Thud.

The tanks were only now entering the city.

Xiao Shen watched the advancing column grow from distant specks into looming vehicles, his eyes blazing like fire.

"Then I suppose I'll have to kill that bastard, at least."

There was no question who that bastard meant.

General Liao. The man responsible for issuing this goddamn order.

One worthless command from him had killed a hundred Hunters and hundreds of soldiers. Even I thought he deserved to pay for it.

But…

"Fuck. I'm sorry."

Feeling wretched, I reached out.

Xiao Shen sensed something was wrong and tried to dodge, but my hand moved like flowing water and brushed his acupoints before he could escape.

Tap. Tap-tap!

The Paralysis Acupoint, the Mute Acupoint, and the Sleep Acupoint.

Xiao Shen's entire body went rigid, his voice was sealed, and a deep sleep began to overtake him.

His eyelids trembled as he fought desperately against the drowsiness pouring over him.

“For now… get some proper sleep. Their deaths weren’t your fault.”

Sshk.

At last, his eyelids closed tight. The final look in Xiao Shen’s eyes held an unmistakable question.

Why? How come?

And Xiao Shen wasn’t the only one asking it.

“Regimental Commander!”

“Jin Taekyung, you!”

Whoooooosh! Shing!

Along with furious shouts, five sounds of air being split apart rang out.

They were A-rank Hunters under Xiao Shen’s command, men called company commanders.

I swept a hand toward them as they charged without hesitation.

Boom!

Compressed air exploded outward, forcing the weapons hurtling toward me to veer away.

The company commanders barely managed to block the palm force tearing through the air, their bodies skidding backward across the ground.

It was fortunate that I had restrained my strength. If I had truly steeled myself, things would not have ended this easily.

“Everyone, calm down. I didn’t want to go this far either.”

“Kgh!”

“What the hell do you think you’re doing?!”

“How dare you lay a hand on the regimental commander…!”

“This is how you repay his kindness?!”

As the atmosphere turned hostile, Team Leader Choi stepped forward and spoke quietly.

“Mr. Jin is only repaying that kindness.”

“W-What did you say?”

“If we had left him alone, the enraged Regimental Commander Xiao would have killed General Liao.”

“…General Liao deserves to die. Even if our regimental commander hadn’t done it, we would have taken matters into our own hands.”

“I agree. But I can’t say how your country’s Central Committee would view it—especially the Crown Prince Party, to which General Liao belongs.”

“…!”

“He is the supreme commander responsible for an entire front. Killing him would not remain a personal matter.”

Team Leader Choi looked over the Public Security Armed Forces Department Hunters one by one.

They were a force nearly a thousand strong. I hadn’t thought that far ahead, but if they became entangled in an incident like this, they wouldn’t escape the consequences either.

“I won’t tell you to forget what happened today. I’m only saying that now is not the time.”

I felt the hostility begin to subside.

Team Leader Choi’s words were both practical and grounded in emotion. One of the company commanders who had not joined the attack finally spoke.

“I agree. Killing that bastard right now would be easy, but… dealing with the aftermath would not.”

“…”

“Remember this. General Liao isn’t the only reason our brothers died.”

He surveyed the horrific sea of corpses and blood, then ground his teeth.

“Let’s wait. Just a little while. Our time will come soon.”

“Haaah.”

“…Damn it all!”

Some looked to the sky and lamented. Others struggled to contain the grief and fury boiling inside them.

But it was clear that they had all reached the same unspoken agreement.

Once the situation had finally settled, Team Leader Choi let out a relieved sigh.

“That’s one less thing to worry about. I’m glad you stopped Regimental Commander Xiao, Mr. Jin.”

“…It was nothing.”

Fortunate. Was this really something we should call fortunate?

Even though I knew there had been no other choice, a bitter taste lingered in my mouth. I knew the rage and grief Xiao Shen must have felt.

“More importantly, it seemed there were survivors.”

“There was a middle-aged couple and one child. They apparently fainted from extreme tension, so they’re being moved somewhere else to rest for now.”

“Are there any other survivors?”

“We’ll find them soon enough.”

Team Leader Choi frowned and looked over my shoulder as he continued.

“Once that utterly incompetent commander gives the order, at least.”

Rattle-rattle.

The armored vehicle advancing with a deafening racket stopped about twenty meters[1914] ahead of us.

A moment later, the plump General Liao emerged under heavy guard.

“W-What in the world…?”

At the horrific sight before him, his already fair complexion turned deathly pale.

He doubled over and retched for a long while. The sight filled me with disgust, but it also made me think that perhaps he was human after all.

You bastard. I guess you do feel guilty.

Everyone there had probably thought the same thing.

But General Liao’s next words reminded me of something I had forgotten.

People like him always managed to exceed the limits of imagination.

“N-No. The operation wasn’t supposed to fail!”

“…!”

The world seemed to slow down.

As though in slow motion, I saw shock and fury spread across the faces around me.

I saw Team Leader Choi reach for me and heard his urgent shout.

“Mr. Jin!”

But it was already too late.

By the time he called my name, I had crossed the twenty-odd meters[1915] between us and appeared before General Liao.

An operation. An operation…

I couldn’t suppress the incredulous laugh that escaped me.

I reached toward the man staring up at me as though he had seen a ghost.

Crack! Crunch!

It was over in an instant.

With pure physical strength, without putting so much as a thread of internal energy behind it, I broke both his arms and crushed his kneecaps.

Be grateful I still have one shred of reason left.

His jaw dropped. His eyes bulged.

Then he screamed like a pig being slaughtered.

“Aaaaaaaaargh!!!”

I spat at him as he rolled his eyes back, collapsed to the ground, and convulsed in pain, then turned away.

I didn’t forget to address the staff officer staring at me as though his soul had left his body.

[1914] Twenty meters is about 66 ft.

[1915] Twenty meters is about 66 ft.

“Report me to your superiors if you’ve got a fucking problem, you bastards.”

Shaking his head, Team Leader Choi approached with a high-grade potion.

The chair was enormous and grotesque.

That was only natural. It had been fashioned from human and monster bones.

Yet it was neither as grotesque nor as terrifying as its owner.

Tap. Tap-tap.

A fleshless finger tapped the skull decorating the armrest.

The figure was well over three meters[1916] tall, with a massive frame. The black robe draped over it rippled like mist.

It resembled a king seated upon a throne, and that description was not far from the truth.

The Arch Lich.

It was a being worthy of being called the lord of the undead—a king who ruled over death.

But the Arch Lich itself did not think so. There was another who was the true king, while it was merely that king’s loyal servant.

But…

Was it still too soon?

The Arch Lich felt a sudden pang of regret.

It possessed truly formidable magical power, but it was still far weaker than the strength it had once possessed. On top of that, the situation on the battlefield was proving more difficult than expected.

After silently sinking into thought, the Arch Lich opened its mouth.

“Are you listening, my servant?”

The being prostrated in the darkness answered.

“Yes, my lord.”

“Pull back the front line. We’ll draw the human army in.”

“I obey.”

“Go. Carry my command to every legion within the reach of my power.”

The black knight rose and slowly withdrew.

At the final moment, the Arch Lich’s chair was reflected in his eyes, which burned red.

Tap. Tap-tap.

The skull decorating its armrest was far too small to have belonged to an adult.

[1916] Three meters is about 9.8 ft.

Chapter 393

War is a succession of battles.

When a battle that has left countless deaths and rivers of blood finally ends, victory and defeat are decided. The survivors gather in one place and prepare for tomorrow's battle.

That was why the commanders of the eastern and western fronts in Sichuan Province had gathered together.

"The casualties are too high."

The first to break the silence was a middle-aged soldier who looked to be in his forties. His uniform caked with dried blood, he continued in a weary voice.

"We barely managed to hold the high ground, but we lost more than three thousand troops today alone."

A victory that had left nothing but wounds.

Three thousand troops was an enormous loss in itself, but the greater problem was that Hunters accounted for more than thirty percent of the dead, including the commander and several high-ranking officers.

Even considering the threefold disparity in troop strength, the blow was devastating.

"Has headquarters sent a reply?"

"Yes. They held an internal meeting and said they'd dispatch a new commander before dawn."

"That's a relief, at least. Then do you happen to know who the new commander will be…?"

As they spoke amid the somber atmosphere, someone abruptly cut in.

"A relief? Do you all really think so?"

"…!"

The words of someone who had remained silent carried weight. Even more so when that person was a living hero of the Great Cataclysm and an S-rank Hunter.

"Half the command staff, including the commander, were torn apart by flying monsters. The troops under them panicked, driving the casualties even higher. Can you really call any part of that a relief?"

The people flinched beneath the gaze filled with an irresistible aura.

"W-Well, the thing is…"

"The fact that you're trying to make excuses means you know I'm right. But…"

A chilling voice slipped between red lips.

Faye Chen's gaze swept across the room, then stopped abruptly on one man.

"Why don't you have any excuses?"

After a brief silence, Wu Heixing swirled the liquor in his crystal glass.

“Why should I?”

“Why? Well…”

Faye Chen’s eyes darkened.

“Maybe because some fucking idiot abandoned his assigned position, giving the flying monsters waiting for that exact moment the chance to tear command headquarters apart?”

“…I went to support the front line.”

Wu Heixing’s answer was nothing more than a pathetic excuse. When he abandoned the rear, the troops on the front line under Faye Chen’s command had been successfully holding back the endless assault of the monster army.

“Oh, right. There was that, too. You charged deep into enemy territory like some clueless brat because you wanted all the glory, and the formation collapsed. Those kids who went after you to save your ass—did you even know they never found their bodies?”

“People live and die on the battlefield all the time.”

“Of course. It happens all the time.”

Faye Chen continued quietly.

“People like you dying without anyone knowing used to be even more common. Come to think of it, the world has gotten pretty nice. If this had been during the Great Cataclysm…”

But Faye Chen never got to finish.

Crack! Crash!

A sharp crack rang out as crystal shards flew in every direction.

Having crushed the glass in his hand, Wu Heixing slowly rose to his feet.

“That’s enough.”

“Enough? You’re getting awfully informal with me.”

“There’s a limit to how much I’ll tolerate, Faye Chen.”

“Go on, then. Keep talking. Just remember—the more casual your tone gets, the shorter your lifespan becomes.”

“How dare some Hong Konger who’s practically a traitor—!”

“Ah. If you mean the Hong Konger who cleaned up the front line you shat all over, then yes, I suppose that’s me.”

Whoooooosh.

The tremendous auras pouring from the two of them engulfed the room. The pressure was so overwhelming that the others could barely breathe.

Then, in the next instant, the brief standoff between the two S-rank Hunters ended as a mocking smile touched Faye Chen’s lips.

“You’re scared and exhausted, but you still want the glory. That’s why you’re growing more desperate by the day, isn’t it?”

"What?"

"Kid, that's what war does. It drives people to the brink and tests them. You need a strong mind to endure a hell like this. Of course it's hard for a spoiled child like you who's always done whatever he pleased."

"…!"

Wu Heixing's face twisted grotesquely. Every word out of Faye Chen's mouth had struck home.

"An S-rank Hunter? So what? Mentally, you're nothing but a seven-year-old child. In a war like this, we'd be better off without someone like you."

"Shut up! What the hell do you know…?"

"What do I know? You're asking me that?"

Faye Chen's derisive snort made Wu Heixing's face flush bright red.

He had been born with wealth and power in both hands, but his opponent was a war hero who had fought her way through the Great Cataclysm.

The media discriminated against Faye Chen for being from Hong Kong, but when it came to experience, she was someone Wu Heixing could never hope to match.

"Why aren't you answering?"

Wu Heixing clenched his teeth, refusing to respond, and swept his gaze around the room.

No one had bothered to say anything aloud, but the looks in their eyes resembled Faye Chen's.

These fucking bastards…!

Even more infuriating was that some of them belonged to the Crown Prince Party and had close ties to Wu Heixing.

The Crown Prince Party was the largest faction within the Chinese Communist Party. As a blood descendant of one of its most prominent leaders, Wu Heixing felt betrayed to the bone.

"I'll remember what happened today. Every last bit of it."

Leaving those furious words behind, Wu Heixing turned away.

As he departed reeking of liquor, Faye Chen's quiet voice flew after him and struck him squarely in the back.

"Remember this, too. Today is the last day I'll tolerate a child's reckless bravado. If this happens again… I won't forgive you."

Grind.

Wu Heixing returned to his quarters grinding his teeth. The first thing he did was smash everything in sight.

Boom! Boom-boom-boom!

"Fucking Hong Kong bitch! Fucking traitorous bastards!"

The expensive luxury furnishings he had brought over on his private jet despite the chaos shattered into pieces.

He spent a long while stomping and smashing everything within reach, screaming like a madman. At last, breathing heavily, Wu Heixing threw himself onto the bed.

“Damn it.”

His anger refused to subside.

Far from fading, it burned hotter the more he thought about it. His heart pounded so violently that his vision nearly went white.

How dare they treat me like this?

He had been born into the family of one of the most powerful men in China and had risen all the way to this point.

Once he became an S-rank Hunter, the world had belonged to him.

No matter what major disaster he caused, the worst that happened was being summoned by his father and scolded a few times. He had never cared about the criticism from the public or opposing factions.

I’m Wu Heixing. Wu Heixing!

An S-rank Hunter was the face of a nation, another name for its national power. No matter how harshly public opinion condemned him, that fact remained unchanged.

That was reality.

Was that why he had become more passionate about media interviews and parties than smelly, dirty raids? Why he had stopped training and started using drugs?

But the first war of his life was chaos. Watching the monster armies surge forward without end, day after day, left him struggling to breathe.

For someone who had followed an elite path paved with diamonds, it was an unbearably harsh environment.

On top of that, one person’s influence lingered behind Wu Heixing’s repeated mistakes.

Jin Taekyung.

The second wall he had encountered in his life—and one far greater than Lei Fei, the object of his long-standing jealousy.

The shadow Jin Taekyung cast was vast and dark.

The fear carved deep into Wu Heixing’s mind by that one-sided defeat would never leave him as long as Jin Taekyung remained.

Right. As long as that peninsula bangzi[1917] doesn’t disappear…

An inscrutable light flashed in Wu Heixing’s eyes as he stared at the ceiling.

[1917] Bangzi is a derogatory Chinese term for Koreans.

He smiled, recalling the conversation he had shared with Lee Jungryong on the night of his crushing defeat. His boiling anger had already vanished without a trace.

Just wait and see. We'll find out who gets the last laugh.

Once his mind calmed, the fatigue he had temporarily forgotten came rushing back and weighed down his eyelids. As drowsiness overcame him, Wu Heixing suddenly thought:

Damn it. How many more battles like today's are we going to have to fight?

A short while later, Wu Heixing fell fast asleep, unaware that countless monster armies were withdrawing from the front lines under cover of the pitch-dark night.

The mass withdrawal was taking place simultaneously across every front in Sichuan Province.

"…Phew."

Xiao Shen let out a sigh, his eyes red and bloodshot.

He had spent the night with his Sleep Acupoint struck and had only regained consciousness two hours ago.

The moment he opened his eyes, he had gone berserk, shouting that he was going to kill General Liao. Team Leader Choi and I had sweated bullets trying to calm him down.

"Xiao Shen, are you all right?"

"Yeah. Have you calmed down a little?"

Xiao Shen answered.

"Yes. I couldn't put any strength into my body when I first woke up, but I'm fine now. I've got more than enough strength to rip that bastard's head off."

"…"

"…"

Calm, my ass.

Still, despite what he said, only his fists were trembling. It didn't look like he planned to play golf with General Liao's head right this second, so I breathed a little easier.

"I'll say it again. I didn't want to do that to you. The timing was just bad."

Xiao Shen was silent for a moment before nodding.

"I know, hyung.[1918] I also know you stepped in for me."

"When did you hear about that?"

[1918] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man to whom he is close.

“The company commanders came and told me. They said you flew into a rage and broke General Liao’s arms and legs.”

“…It wasn’t exactly something I should’ve done after stopping you. But, well, that’s how it turned out.”

Team Leader Choi cut in stiffly.

“If you knew you shouldn’t do it, why did you?”

“Well, uh… I lost my head for a moment.”

“We’re fortunate the current situation is so chaotic. Otherwise, this could have become a serious problem.”

“Lucky for us, then. If things weren’t like this, that bastard would’ve died by my hand already.”

An incompetent commander was more frightening than an enemy.

General Liao had thrown away nearly a thousand lives, then started whining about a failed operation and military glory. He deserved to die.

“It all worked out. His injuries are almost healed thanks to the potion, and they have plenty of reasons to feel guilty themselves, so they’ll quietly let it slide.”

“Grudges last a long time, Mr. Jin. He’s a high-ranking general in the Central Military Commission and a blue-blooded scion of the Crown Prince Party, notorious for holding grudges. There’s every chance this will cause trouble later.”

“What can we do? The water’s already spilled. We’ll deal with it if trouble comes.”

Team Leader Choi was shaking his head in disbelief at my nonchalant answer when Xiao Shen spoke in a low voice.

“Don’t worry. What you’re concerned about, Mr. Choi, won’t happen.”

“Hm?”

“Xiao Shen, have you heard something?”

“Not so much heard…”

After a moment’s hesitation, Xiao Shen shook his head, his expression stiff.

“Um… it’s merely my personal opinion.”

“…?”

“…?”

What was that suspicious smell?

Team Leader Choi and I were staring at Xiao Shen doubtfully when—

“M-M-M-May I come in?”

“Did an earthquake hit your vocal cords? Come in.”

Only then did the person who had been pacing outside the tent cautiously step inside.

It was a familiar face—one of General Liao’s closest staff officers.

He was also the man who had pissed himself the day before when he saw me break his superior’s limbs.

“Well, if it isn’t the great nation’s little pants-pisser. What brings you here?”

“G-G-G…”

“S-S-S-Spit it out already. What are you trying to say? Please, just speak properly.”

The staff officer flinched, swallowed hard, and answered.

“A-A guest has arrived.”

“A guest?”

“Yes.”

“Who? Are visitors even allowed here?”

It can’t be Mom and Hayeon, can it?

That absurd thought had just crossed my mind when the staff officer’s answer came flying at me.

“Magic Johnson, a Hunter from the United States, has come to see you.”

I could feel Team Leader Choi clench his butt beside me.

Chapter 394

As expected, the mainland was on an entirely different scale.

I'd been told this was a small city, but its size and population far exceeded anything I had imagined once we entered it.

That also meant quite a few buildings had survived the monster army's rampage intact.

This one included.

At the entrance to the municipal hospital, which was currently serving as a temporary headquarters, a tall white Hunter spotted Team Leader Choi and me and approached.

"I've been waiting for you."

"Did Magic Johnson send you…?"

"Yes. My name is Michael Johnson. Feel free to call me Michael."

"Ah, sure."

Is everyone over there named Johnson? Is there some kind of Johnson family reunion in L.A.?

Still wondering, I shook Michael's hand.

He beamed at me.

"What?"

"I'm a huge fan of yours. Lord Fuck."

"…I'd appreciate it if you called me Jin instead of Lord Fuck."

"Why? I'd love a nickname like that."

"Then should I call you Little Johnson?"

Michael's face turned dead serious.

"Nope."

Look how firm he is.

I stared at him in disbelief.

"It's the same principle. So please call me Jin."

"Ah, okay."

That Lord Fuck nickname is really spreading to every corner of the globe.

Cheon Taemin had defeated the Demon King, been hailed as the savior of the twenty-first century, and earned the incredibly badass title Slayer. Even if I killed a Demon God instead of a Demon King, I'd probably still be Lord Fuck.

At best, I might evolve into Lord Fuuuck.

"Don't take it too hard. Lord Fuck has a certain warmth and charm to it, don't you think?"

"Team Leader, are you making fun of me?"

"Of course not."

Team Leader Choi let out a quiet laugh, and Michael called out to him.

"Choi. You came too."

"You know me?"

"Of course. Word of how much Johnson likes you has already spread throughout the Guild."

"…"

I jabbed Team Leader Choi in the ribs as his expression darkened.

"Don't take it too hard. Johnson's Johnson likes you, Team Leader."

"…Mr. Jin. You just said Johnson twice."

"Did I? Must've slipped out."

Pretending not to notice Team Leader Choi's sharp glare, I asked Michael, "Where's Johnson?"

"Ah, I'll show you."

We followed him inside. The moment we entered the lobby, the murmuring abruptly died away, and every eye in the room swung toward us.

I'd heard that a few civilians rescued during the night were here, but since this was a temporary headquarters, the place seemed to be filled almost entirely with soldiers.

"The whole atmosphere changes when Jin shows up."

"I was already famous, but I'm probably a little more famous after yesterday."

"Oh, did you kill a Named Monster or something?"

I shrugged at Michael's question.

"Something like that."

Considering General Liao's position within the military, he was a Named Monster in his own right.

His side had issued a gag order, but somehow the rumor had spread everywhere. Everywhere I went, I could hear soldiers whispering under their breath.

"Did you hear? Yesterday, Mr. Jin did something to the commander…"

"I heard the story, but wasn't it just a rumor?"

"They say it's true. The Hunters confirmed it, and apparently so did one of the headquarters operations staff. Rao Yang heard the whole thing loud and clear."

"Huh. If that's true, I'm disappointed in Mr. Jin."

"Me too. I thought he was a hero of the people."

The reaction was exactly what I'd expected.

Birds of a feather flock together, and people always side with their own.

Naturally, the soldiers wouldn't be too happy about me mauling their direct superior…

“He shouldn’t have stopped at breaking the man’s limbs. He should’ve ripped his head off.”

“Exactly. How many people died because of that pig bastard?”

“I heard he took a huge cut from the latest defense procurement scandal too. That’s why he’s keeping quiet and letting this slide even after getting his arms and legs broken. Following Mr. Jin around is the only way he can pick up a few scraps of military glory and save his own skin.”

“That thieving son of a bitch. A bastard like him should be hanged in Tiananmen Square.”

…What? They seem to like me quite a lot.

It wasn’t just the enlisted soldiers. Even the officers were whispering among themselves.

They called General Liao an incompetent pig who had sacrificed his troops. Some said they finally understood why they were still using canteens manufactured during the Chinese Civil War.

Combined with General Liao’s existing reputation, everything that had recently come to light opened the floodgates. Remarks that could have gotten them arrested for insulting a superior poured out one after another.

“The mood is favorable. At this rate, we shouldn’t have to worry about the consequences.”

Team Leader Choi spoke as he walked beside me. Still dazed, I answered, “Yeah. If I’d known, I would’ve hit him a few more times.”

“Hmm. I do still have a few high-grade potions left.”

“Look at you, Team Leader. You’re getting good at jokes.”

“I wouldn’t say I was entirely joking.”

“Huh?”

What’s gotten into this guy all of a sudden?

Team Leader Choi stared straight at me as I struggled to process his unexpected response.

“Mr. Jin, you are indisputably an S-rank Hunter. You’re the dream and symbol of ordinary citizens, as well as a celebrity with enormous public support. General Liao, on the other hand, is the embodiment of the corrupt establishment. Anyone who tries to come after you will have to be prepared to pay an enormous price.”

“So you’re saying it wouldn’t matter if I hit him a little harder?”

“There would still be consequences, but someone like General Liao, who is already on the verge of ruin, won’t be able to drag you down with him.”

“Seriously? Just a few hours ago, you were telling me not to cause trouble.”

“Even the best sports car will crash if all you do is step on the accelerator. You need someone beside you to hit the brakes, like me. And…”

Team Leader Choi continued in a low voice.

"Sometimes you also need to maintain the track so the sports car can run properly. Like now."

"…?"

"Too many people witnessed what happened yesterday. If the gag order was bound to fail anyway, I thought it would be better to spread the story as quickly as possible."

It didn't take long for the question mark in my head to turn into an exclamation point.

"Team Leader, did you…?"

Team Leader Choi smiled at my slack-jawed expression.

"Getting ahead of the story and spreading the version most favorable to us. It's a method Vice Guild Master Lee Jungryong often uses."

"…Huh."

Now everything fit together.

I'd wondered how the rumor had spread so quickly that the gag order was already meaningless. Team Leader Choi had clearly laid the groundwork in advance.

The Hunters from the Public Security Armed Forces Department already despised General Liao, so getting them to cooperate must have been easy. As for the soldiers…

He paid them.

In the end, it always came down to money. Team Leader Choi had paid people to talk, and they had spread the rumor in whatever way was most favorable to us.

Besides, wasn't the military a place crawling with microphones and loudspeakers?

Rumors spread fast.

Ten people opened their mouths, a hundred people heard them, and those hundred passed the story on to a thousand more. Add a generous sprinkling of MSG along the way, and before long the inflated rumor became accepted as fact.

But he thought of all that and pulled it off overnight?

I gazed at Team Leader Choi with newfound respect.

"Team Leader Choi, are you Zhuge Kongming? Zhang Liang?"[1919]

"This was nothing special."

"Team Leader Come, I think I'm about to Choi."

"…Stop it."

While we talked, Michael, who had been walking ahead of us, came to a stop.

Knock, knock.

"Johnson. It's Michael."

[1919] Zhuge Kongming was the Zhuge Clan's famous ancestor, and Zhang Liang was Liu Bang's strategist; both were renowned for their counsel.

Two auras, one large and one small, stirred beyond the door marked VIP Private Room. Then a deep, cheerful voice called from inside.

"Oh, come on in."

"You heard him. My job ends here, so I'll be going."

Michael shrugged at us and stepped aside.

Team Leader Choi's butt had already clenched tight, so I opened the sliding door for him.

Rattle.

Two people came into view.

"Haha! So we meet again, charming young men!"

The first was a huge Black man who strode toward us and extended a hand as large as a pot lid—Magic Johnson.

And then…

"Eek!"

A plump pig recoiled in horror the moment he saw me.

I glanced at General Liao, whose double chin was quivering, then took Magic Johnson's hand and whispered, "When did you get here?"

"About… thirty minutes ago?"

"What about the southern front you're in charge of? And why didn't you come find us right away? Why are you sitting around with this guy?"

"Hold on. I'll answer your questions one at a time. But first, I need to say hello to Choi."

Snatch.

Like a hawk swooping down on its prey, Magic Johnson seized Team Leader Choi's hand and greeted him warmly.

"How have you been? Did you think about me a lot?"

"…Yes."

Team Leader Choi's answer was one hundred percent sincere. He must have thought about all kinds of things on the way here.

But since Magic Johnson had no idea what the answer meant, it was more than enough to set his heart aflutter.

"Oh! Then you're just like me. We have so much in common, don't we?"

"…"

We're probably very different when it comes to which gender we like.

"Anyway, it's good to see you again."

His gaze dripping with lingering affection, Magic Johnson finally ended his reunion with Team Leader Choi and answered my earlier question.

"And Jin, if you're worried about the southern front I'm in charge of, don't be. Nothing will go wrong just because I stepped away for a little while."

"It sounds like the war is going quite well."

"Hmm. I'm not sure about that. Still, it is encouraging that the monster armies are retreating from every front."

"Oh, the monster armies are retreating… What?"

Team Leader Choi and I turned to each other and blinked as though we'd rehearsed it.

What the hell was he talking about?

Team Leader Choi recovered before I did and asked Magic Johnson, "This is the first we've heard of it. Mr. Johnson, could you tell us what happened?"

"It's exactly as I said. The monster armies turned tail during the night. When we looked into it, the same thing had happened on every front."

"But we didn't detect any movement on our side."

"Ah, let me correct myself. The western front is the exception."

"Why is that?"

"What? Hahaha!"

Magic Johnson let out a booming laugh and clapped me on the shoulder.

"Because this western front has penetrated deeper into enemy territory than any other. I don't know what kind of scheme the Arch Lich is plotting, but the western front is already an open highway. The monsters here have already retreated as far as they can."

"Oh."

I'd momentarily forgotten.

Unlike the other fronts, which were advancing little by little under Army and Air Force cover, I had simply killed and smashed everything in my path as I pushed forward.

I did tear through them with unstoppable momentum, but did we really get that far?

Magic Johnson laughed loudly at my bewildered expression.

"That doesn't sound like the Genghis Khan of the twenty-first century. You've accomplished an incredible military feat. Why not smile a little?"

"It's far too early to relax and smile. But never mind the monster armies pulling back. Why are you here?"

"I came to see Choi."

"…!"

"…!"

"I'm kidding."

Look how pale Team Leader Choi's gotten. One more joke and his sphincter might rupture.

"I'm taking some personnel away temporarily, so I had to deliver the written orders to the commander."

“You’re taking people away? Where?”
“Chengdu. A military conference has been convened.”

Chapter 395

"Follow me."

Magic Johnson led us to none other than the hospital rooftop.

After sweeping my eyes across the empty landing pad, where there wasn't a helicopter or jet in sight, I asked,

"There's nothing here."

"Nope. I'm here."

Magic Johnson's answer was short and simple, but what it implied was anything but.

Team Leader Choi's eyes widened slightly. He seemed to have reached the same conclusion I had.

"Mr. Johnson. You don't mean…"

"That's right. We're going to travel by teleportation magic."

Teleportation. In other words, instant travel.

Magic Johnson spoke as casually as if he were suggesting a ride on a tricycle, but everyone knew teleportation magic was infamous for its extreme difficulty.

The finicky conditions required to cast it were one thing. If the coordinates were even slightly off, you could easily wind up dead.

A single misstep could mean ending up fused with an apple tree or a boulder. Horrifying.

"Can't we just take a jet?"

"Nope."

Magic Johnson answered firmly and narrowed his eyes.

"Hey, Jin. You don't actually distrust me, do you? I'm Magic Johnson. Do I have to show you before you'll believe me?"

"…"

You saying that somehow makes it sound even stranger.

Whether he intended to show me teleportation magic or his Johnson, I didn't care. I just wanted to travel peacefully by jet.

Team Leader Choi noticed my pleading expression and spoke up.

"Mr. Johnson, as you know, this area is within the Arch Lich's sphere of influence. Magic is being disrupted, and even communications are unreliable."

"Ah, so that's what this is about. I thought it was something else."

Magic Johnson let out a quiet laugh.

"How do you think I got here?"

"Huh?"

"Don't tell me…"

"That's right. I teleported. There was a little interference, but it wasn't enough to hold Magic Johnson back."

Snap!

Magic Johnson snapped his fingers, and a pillar of flame erupted from thin air. He cast the spell as naturally as breathing—a striking contrast to the mages of the Public Security Armed Forces Department, who had been unable to use magic properly because of the interference.

"You could do that from the beginning?"

"Of course not. Until now, I could still manage most ordinary spells despite the interference, but teleportation is too dangerous. I didn't even dare attempt it."

"Then…"

"The Arch Lich. His power had been gradually weakening. In particular, a considerable portion of the interference disappeared after last night. Though communications still seem to be a complete mess."

It was something he could say—and pull off—only because he was one of just three archmages in the entire world.

Magic Johnson flashed his white teeth and held out a hand to us.

"That should be enough to earn your trust, don't you think?"

"Well, if you put it that way."

I took his hand without much hesitation, but Team Leader Choi quietly stepped back.

"Team Leader Choi?"

"I'll stay here."

"Why, Choi?"

"There are still matters I need to handle. Besides, given how little influence I have in the discussion, attending in person or hearing about it afterward will make little difference."

Team Leader Choi always assessed the situation coolly. If he couldn't change the course of events himself, he pulled lower-priority work forward and dealt with that instead.

I wanted to tell him that he was mistaken, but I quietly nodded.

He wasn't wrong.

Even the S-rank Hunters whose opinions carried weight were ultimately mercenaries from other countries—borrowed blades.

That was why Chairman Xiao Yang and Minister Wei Fenghu had made it clear that overall command remained in their hands.

"Choi's dropping out? This can't be happening! Jin has no Charm!"

"…"

I really want to drive a nail through him. Then again, maybe this is for the best.

After whining for quite some time, Magic Johnson said goodbye to Team Leader Choi with a deeply disappointed expression.

“Can’t be helped. See you next time, Choi.”

“Take care.”

“Take care of what? It’ll be over in an instant.”

Magic Johnson shrugged and turned to me.

“Hey, Jin. Ready?”

“Yes.”

“Hold my hand tight. Don’t let go.”

“…Why are we interlocking fingers? Can’t I just hold your palm?”

Isn’t this the sort of thing couples do?

As a guy in his late twenties who had been single his entire life, I couldn’t help feeling uncomfortable about interlocking fingers with a huge Black man.

Magic Johnson spoke gently when he saw my reluctance.

“You can let go if you want. But if you lose your grip during the journey, you might die.”

Thinking of my first love from childhood, I clutched Magic Johnson’s hand tightly.

“Let’s go, darling.”

Magic Johnson’s expression turned stern.

“Sorry, but Jin isn’t my type. You don’t have to squeeze that hard, so could you ease up?”

“…Oh. Right.”

“Then, here we go.”

Just as I opened my mouth to answer—

Whoooooosh!

Gasp!

My breath caught, and the taut air constricted around my entire body.

Through my blurring vision, Team Leader Choi wavered like a mirage before vanishing.

The earth and sky flipped upside down.

Then, at last, came an overwhelming sense of release.

“Hah!”

I expelled the breath I had been holding and inhaled deeply. Cool air filled my lungs. I blinked, and my briefly clouded vision cleared.

It felt as if barely a second had passed, yet an entirely different landscape and different people stood around me.

“Our final guest has arrived.”

Wei Fenghu, Minister of National Defense under China's Central Military Commission, approached and patted me on the shoulder. He looked as though he had aged ten years in the past week.

"Everyone is waiting. Let us go inside together."

"W-wait a second."

"Yes?"

"Don't come any closer…"

"Uweeeeeegh!"

Splash!

For the record, I'm fairly tall. About two heads taller than Wei Fenghu.

As I emptied my stomach over the thinning crown of the old general's head, Magic Johnson's voice reached me.

"Ah, I forgot to mention that the motion sickness gets worse. I'm sorry, Jin. I'm sorry, Wei Fenghu."

"You should've told me that sooner—uweeeeeegh!"

"…Hah."

It took a little longer before I was able to attend the meeting.

A holographic recording played in the darkness of a vast conference room.

The footage showed exactly what one person had seen: a complicated control panel, clouds scattering beyond reinforced glass, and tiny specks appearing far below as the aircraft descended.

The things covering the ground surged forward like waves, with no ranks or formation.

Monsters.

It wasn't difficult to tell that the footage came from a fighter pilot's perspective. Wearing a head-mounted camera, the pilot radioed someone.

"This is YANU-4885. I repeat, YANU-4885. Target confirmed. Locked on."

"You are cleared to fire."

Crackle. Crackle.

The transmission was riddled with static, but the words were clear enough. The pilot took a deep breath and carried out the mission without hesitation.

Rumble.

The fighter trembled slightly as one of its missiles launched. It dwindled into a speck as it streaked toward the center of the advancing monster army—

Whoosh!

A black vortex abruptly appeared in the empty air above the monsters and swallowed the missile.

“Hngh!”

The pilot gasped and hurriedly pressed a red button on the control panel.

But then—

Boom! Crackle.

The footage cut out amid a thunderous roar that suddenly crashed through the room.

The hologram disappeared, and Minister Wei Fenghu spoke with a grave expression.

“What do the rest of you make of it?”

Magic Johnson lit a cigar before answering.

“Teleportation magic. The missile was transported above the fighter.”

“Mr. Johnson, could you do the same?”

After a moment of thought, Magic Johnson answered.

“It wouldn’t be difficult. But I’m not confident I could do it that quickly or accurately.”

“Even for an archmage such as yourself?”

“…Hmm.”

Magic Johnson gave a slight nod and exhaled cigar smoke.

He, too, was an S-rank Hunter who had accomplished feats that would go down in history. He must have been proud of his abilities, so he couldn’t have been pleased to learn that he had been outdone by a monster called the Arch Lich.

But this meeting wasn’t about protecting anyone’s pride.

We had to face reality.

“Then we can’t count on fire support. If we launch anything too powerful and it gets redirected, the result could be catastrophic.”

Faye Chen continued, lightly touching her wineglass with one slender finger.

“I expected as much, but now that it’s come to this, we have no choice but to settle the matter on the ground.”

“If matters continue as they are, the tide of battle will gradually improve. The royal guard of the British Empire, led by this prince, has crushed the monster army. More importantly, that wine you are drinking—is it perhaps a 1945 Romanée-Conti?”

“No.”

“Hm. You don’t know how to drink.”

Faye Chen glared at Prince Felix.

“Oh, my. What is this child talking about? Get a grip. The British Empire was dissolved long ago, and the monsters didn’t retreat because you won a few battles. They retreated because of that fellow sitting across from you.”

Prince Felix glanced at me.

“I heard that you distinguished yourself greatly on the Western Front…but are all those stories truly accurate?”

What, does he think I’m lying?

I stared at Prince Felix incredulously.

“Then they’re true, aren’t they? What, you think I made it all up? If you don’t want to believe me, don’t.”

“Your great achievements may be worthy of praise, but your words and conduct are remarkably insolent. You will refer to me as His Highness and always speak respectfully.”

I readily complied with his demand.

“His Highness, did you eat your fish and chips wrong?”

“Hmm. A man of matchless courage, yet utterly lacking in manners.”

“…”

Utterly lacking in manners, my ass. Maybe I should make sure he’s lacking one ball, too.

For the record, the guy I’d beaten up about a week ago kept his mouth firmly shut and wouldn’t even meet my eyes.

It’s nice that he’s quiet, but something about it feels off.

Given Wu Heixing’s stupidity, I’d expected him to come at me at least a few more times. Either he was more cowardly than I’d thought, or I had misjudged him.

More importantly, someone else in the room bothered me far more than Wu Heixing did.

“You’ve been awfully quiet. Don’t you have anything to say?”

Lee Jungryong—the snake coiled in wait—smiled gently.

“Thank you for your concern, but I’m fine. A mercenary’s virtue is following the employer’s wishes without comment.”

“Oh, is that so?”

“It’s a simple principle.”

I smiled back.

“But for someone who says that, your performance has been a little lackluster. Things on the northern front don’t seem to be going very well. Was that your employer’s wish too?”

“…!”

At my words, silence descended over the room as if everyone had been doused with cold water.

As every gaze turned toward him, Lee Jungryong stroked his chin.

“I find that remark unpleasant. Ares Guild and I did our best.”

“Your best? Really?”

“We fought ten battles over the past week and won nine of them. Although we unfortunately suffered one defeat, I would call that an impressive military record.”

Ten battles, nine wins, one loss. By the numbers, it was certainly an impressive record.

But two days ago, when Team Leader Choi and I heard about the defeat on the northern front, we had both let out hollow laughs.

What a sly old man.

Lee Jungryong was one of the strongest men in the world—or, even by Murim standards, an incredibly powerful martial artist.

Given his personality, there was no chance he had revealed the full extent of his abilities. He had to be even stronger than the public believed.

And someone like that had the nerve to say—

Unfortunately suffered one defeat, my ass.

I couldn’t speak for anyone else, but I was certain.

If Lee Jungryong had taken the field and still lost, then the defeat had been intentional from beginning to end.

The members of Ares Guild had withdrawn intact despite the staggering casualties around them. They were living proof.

Though since I can’t prove anything, I suppose it’s still only a suspicion.

That was also why Lee Jungryong could remain so relaxed. He loosely crossed his arms.

“I regret the defeat that day, but I would appreciate it if you refrained from making hasty accusations. There was a clear reason for our loss.”

“A clear reason?”

“Who could have expected a Death Knight to appear under those circumstances? Once the commander died, the ensuing confusion became impossible to control.”

“If you mean the Death Knights…”

“I heard they appeared on the Western Front last night as well. Is that not so?”

His words brought something to mind.

The testimony of the civilian couple rescued from the small city.

Ten Death Knights had slaughtered nearly a thousand troops, while their leader, the Black Knight, had left without killing the couple for some unknown reason.

That Black Knight had bothered me ever since I heard their story.

“Then among the ones that appeared on the northern front, was there perhaps—”

My question to Lee Jungryong never reached its end.

Urgent footsteps raced down the corridor, and someone who looked like a Chinese officer burst through the door.

Bang!

“Huff, huff. Emergency! Emergency!”

He continued while gasping for breath.

“We have received word that the monster army has advanced! Fighting has broken out on every front!”

“…What?”

Chapter 396

The Black Knight raised his head and looked up at the sky.

A clear blue expanse without a single cloud. But to the Black Knight's eyes, which had long since lost their light, it appeared only as a dark, murky gray.

How dark.

The thought left him feeling strangely unsettled. Dark? What did darkness even mean?

He had always been the Black Knight. A being born from darkness could not understand what darkness was.

But this… What is it?

Light and sunlight. A child laughing brightly. Someone's hand stroking his head…

Several words and inexplicable scenes flashed through his mind in succession, leaving him confused.

If not for the call from one of his subordinates a moment later, the Black Knight would have stood there for a long time.

"Lord."

"Please."

Black armor as dark as night covered his entire body. Green lights flickered between the slits of the helmet covering his head.

Two Death Knights dismounted from their skeletal warhorses and knelt on one knee. They continued in flat, emotionless voices.

"Give us—"

"your orders."

Ah.

The Black Knight recalled something he had briefly forgotten: the command given by the lord he served.

"Go. Advance in all directions, trample everything, and kill them all. Offer me mountains of corpses and seas of blood."

His lord's commands were absolute. With even his soul bound to that lord, the Black Knight faithfully obeyed.

He had appointed the ten Death Knights under his command to lead five legions, then personally taken the vanguard of one legion and come here.

But why this place, of all places?

The Black Knight gazed at the small city in the distance.

It was a place he remembered. The place where the unfamiliar word child had suddenly come to mind, and where he had sensed an enormous power whose nature he could not identify.

But the Black Knight had no idea why he had come here.

“Lord?”

“Lord?”

After silently looking down at his subordinates, the Black Knight finally gave his command.

“Advance.”

“Your command.”

“We obey.”

Having received the answer they had been waiting for, the Death Knights mounted their skeletal warhorses and raised their enormous spears high.

Pitch-black demonic qi surged from the spearheads, and the monsters packed across the broad plain let out shrill howls.

—Kik. Kikikikik.

—Graaaargh!

There were Skeletons that had died so recently that flesh still clung to their bones, small monsters such as goblins and Orcs, and large monsters such as Trolls and ogres.

By a rough estimate, they numbered in the tens of thousands. Overhead, flocks of Gargoyles and Wyverns cast enormous shadows across the land.

“Rally.”

“Do it.”

At the next command, roughly two hundred Dullahans formed ranks. Holding their severed heads in one hand and weapons in the other, they sat astride beasts made of white bone, their eyes gleaming with a vicious light.

“Prepare.”

“for the charge.”

The two Death Knights took position at the tip of the legion. Their spearheads, raised as if to pierce the sky, slowly descended to point toward the city.

A city of humans. But soon, it would become a city of the undead—a land of death.

“Public Security Armed Forces Department, assemble!”

“F-fuck! Monsters! They’re here!”

“Sound the alarm and report to command immediately!”

Wheeeeeeng!

The humans’ shouts and the wail of the emergency siren carried on the wind.

But the order had already been given. Nothing could stop the undead legion now that it had begun its advance.

Boom. Boom. Boom.

The ranks and files were arranged with military precision.

Death Knights and Dullahans led the way, with highly mobile Lycanthropes and other monsters holding the front line. Large monsters such as ogres, Trolls, and Golems advanced behind them like a colossal wall.

The monsters capable of using bows and magic had already moved to the rear.

The Black Knight was the one who had devised the discipline and formations ordinary monsters lacked.

Where did I learn such things?

Setting the question aside once more, the Black Knight opened his mouth.

"Follow."

At its master's will, the skeletal warhorse beneath him began to move.

Clip-clop. Clip-clop.

Hooves of white bone trampled the new shoots beneath them. The undead legion blanketing the vast breadbasket advanced slowly behind its commander.

Tremors shook the earth. The legion moved forward like a slow swell, then became a wave of bones sweeping across the plain.

Thudthudthudthudthud!

—Graaaargh!

Tens of thousands of monsters roared as one.

At the head of the monsters surging toward the city, the Black Knight shot forward like a streak of light.

"That one's the leader!"

"Ranged units! Prepare!"

"Tanks, stay calm! The armored units will intercept him alongside the Hunters!"

Tanks, armored units, Hunters.

The Black Knight heard the humans' shouts and, astonishingly, understood them perfectly.

He even knew what command would come next.

"Begin concentrated fire!"

Rat-a-tat-tat-tat!

Boom-boom-boom!

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh!

It was dazzling. Flames, ice, and flashes of light erupted from all across the city.

Some attacks came crashing down in graceful arcs. Others flew in nearly straight lines, aimed at the Black Knight and the undead knights following behind him.

"Ah."

Even in a world dyed gray, the light they gave off was enchanting and familiar. The Black Knight felt an inexplicable stirring within him and reached out.

Shrring.

The greatsword strapped to his back slid free.

Before the shells, magic, and arrows could reach him, the pitch-black blade carved through the air in every direction.

Kraaaash!

A gale of magical power swept across the battlefield. Space split apart. Spells blazing with brilliant mana went out like candle flames, and arrows shattered to pieces.

Everyone in the city watched as light was devoured by darkness.

The same thought flashed through Choi Minwoo's and Xiao Shen's minds.

This is…

Impossible to stop.

An insight approaching certainty.

Then, in the next moment, a pitch-black flash leaped across space and struck the Hunters.

KABOOM!

A thunderous roar rang out as though the sky itself had split apart.

Dozens of Tower Shields shattered, and sprays of blood burst into the air. Having cut down three A-rank Hunters and twenty B-rank Hunters with a single sword stroke, the Black Knight stared at the frozen humans through glowing red eyes.

From beneath his low-drawn helmet came the chilling voice of the dead.

"Aksar. Garosh."

Kill them all.

The Demon Realm words had been the last thing heard by those who died here the previous day.

And…

They were the Black Knight's command to the legion behind him.

"Your command."

"We obey."

Two Death Knights appeared to his left and right. A hundred Dullahans charged in behind them, becoming a sharp awl that pierced the human wall.

Krrrunch!

An ambush?

Emergency reports had come in from every front. Wei Fenghu roared, demanding to know what had happened, but the only answer he received was that communications with every front had been completely severed.

“Completely severed? They may have been unstable, but haven’t we still been able to connect since last night?”

The communications officer answered, drenched in cold sweat.

“W-we don’t know why, but the communications interference has grown even stronger. The emergency report that just arrived was confirmed to be from approximately thirty minutes ago.”

“…!”

What? Thirty minutes?

If that was true, the attacks had begun while the meeting was in progress.

And since the report had barely made it through the interference, it might not have been thirty minutes ago. It could have been an hour.

Magic Johnson muttered with his face gone rigid.

“That can’t be. It wasn’t nearly this bad before I left…”

Suddenly, the words Magic Johnson had spoken before leaving the city flashed through my mind.

“The Arch Lich’s power is gradually weakening. A considerable portion of the interference has disappeared since last night in particular.”

Wrong.

The Arch Lich’s power over the surrounding area hadn’t weakened. He had merely made it look that way.

Little by little, without giving anything away. Then, by withdrawing the legion, he had made it seem as if the range of his influence had shrunk dramatically—so that we could let our guard down even a little more.

This is…

A meticulously laid trap.

I didn’t know how the Arch Lich had realized the S-rank Hunters were gone. What mattered was that he had seized that brief opening and sent the monster legions forward.

The thought of the horrific slaughter we had witnessed the day before now unfolding across every front made my stomach churn even worse than it had during my first teleportation.

But this time, instead of throwing up, I grabbed Magic Johnson and said,

“Teleport.”

“What?”

“Teleport. Hurry!”

I expected Magic Johnson to use magic immediately. But his answer was nothing like what I had expected.

“Jin. Take a jet.”

“What? A jet? Why are you suddenly…? We’ll be too late.”

"It's too risky right now."

"Why? You know the coordinates of the hospital rooftop where we were earlier."

Magic Johnson shook his head.

"The coordinates aren't the problem. If we attempt to teleport like this…we could both die."

"…!"

In my desperation, I had momentarily forgotten about the Arch Lich's magical interference. There was no way the bastard who had laid such a trap would kindly allow us to teleport.

Magic Johnson continued in a subdued voice.

"Ten minutes. Twenty at most. Take the jet, Jin."

"…A lot of people will die in that time."

"Yes. But if you get yourself killed for nothing during the teleportation, there'll be even more casualties."

An S-rank Hunter was a strategic weapon capable of turning the tide of a war.

Even if I arrived late, I might still be able to save some people. But if something went wrong during the teleportation, there would be no saving me or the countless people left without reinforcements.

Magic Johnson was worried about me, but he was also pointing that out.

"It's brave, but foolish."

"…"

"The jet will be ready for takeoff soon. We don't have time for this."

Through the bulletproof glass covering one wall of the conference room, I could see pilots crossing the runway and boarding their aircraft.

I could also see the backs of the other S-rank Hunters, who had already left the conference room.

I watched in silence, then suddenly spoke.

"You said it was possible, right?"

"What?"

"Teleporting missiles, like in the hologram footage we saw earlier."

Magic Johnson's eyes widened.

"Jin, don't tell me…"

"There's no need for you to risk yourself too, Johnson. Sending me alone will be enough."

"Good God. Are you crazy? I explained it to you, and you still don't understand!"

"I understand perfectly. I'm prepared to take that risk."

"You…"

His lips moved as though he were about to say something, but then he suddenly slammed his fist down on the table.

Bang!

The expensive hardwood shattered beneath the force of his blow.

“Damn it! Fuck this whole goddamn mess!”

I let out a quiet laugh as I watched Magic Johnson mutter curse after curse.

I already knew what his reaction meant.

“I can take that as permission, right?”

“Yes, you insolent little brat.”

His bloodshot eyes fixed on me.

He looked ready to unleash another torrent of abuse.

Magic Johnson was genuinely furious—and at the same time, deeply saddened.

“Listen, Jin. I…”

“I know. You have people you need to protect too. I’m sorry to ask this of you.”

“…Damn it. Is sending you to the hospital rooftop enough?”

“Yes. That’s enough.”

Swoosh.

Magic Johnson clenched his teeth and pressed his thick palm against my chest.

As though taking every possible precaution, his mana slowly began to envelop my body, unlike the first time he had teleported me.

“Ten percent. That’s your chance of survival. There’s a ninety percent chance you could die.”

Ten percent…

I raised my head and looked up at the sky beyond the window.

A clear blue expanse without a single cloud. Was Murim somewhere in the distant universe beyond that sky? Were they waiting for me?

At that moment, a thought suddenly occurred to me, and the corners of my mouth lifted.

“That’s not bad. Ten percent is enough.”

“What?”

A dazzling mass of light burst forth. Feeling warmth envelop my entire body, I continued.

“It’s probably a thousand times higher than the odds of crossing dimensions.”

“…!”

I wondered what expression Magic Johnson was wearing by then.

I wanted to know, but unfortunately, I could no longer see his face. A blinding flash filled my vision, and a rough, powerful force sucked me through the warping space.

Whoooosh!

Chapter 397

Team Leader Choi—or rather, Choi Minwoo—thought,

What should I do?

His heart pounded wildly, but his mind was ice-cold.

Only thirty minutes had passed since the battle began. The hastily constructed defensive line had collapsed the instant the fighting started, then been torn apart as the highest-grade monsters slipped through the gaps and ran rampant without meeting any resistance.

Just like now.

Crunch!

Sharp fangs tore savagely into a human throat.

The Lycanthrope tossed aside the Hunter, whose last breath escaped in a wheeze, and let out a roar.

—Awooooooo!

Those became the Lycanthrope's final words.

Whoosh! Slash!

Its gray fur turned red as its body toppled sideways. Choi Minwoo took its head off with a clean strike, then bent backward without a moment to catch his breath.

Whoooooom! Crack!

The blow missed him by a handspan.[1920]

An ax blade rippling with ominous magical power grazed past Choi Minwoo and smashed the heads of two nearby Orcs.

The headless knight, a Dullahan, attacked the human in front of it without the slightest hesitation, despite having killed fellow monsters.

Swooooooosh! Slash!

—Krrk!

"Guh!"

As the enormous halberd swept back and forth, the humans and monsters caught within its reach were hacked to pieces.

A Dullahan was an A-rank monster that required three Hunters of the same rank to handle safely.

But Choi Minwoo slipped past its attack and thrust out his sword without hesitation.

Now!

A short exhalation.

[1920] A ppyeom is a handspan, the distance between the tips of an outstretched thumb and little finger. It varies by person; roughly 20 cm (8 in).

Then a strike like a flash of light.

Thud!

The blade, enchanted with three different spells and forged by a Master Artisan, pierced the Dullahan through the shoulder.

It might not feel pain, having already died once and become undead, but its body was still human.

The muscles and tendons in its right arm were severed, and the halberd dropped heavily to the ground. Choi Minwoo did not miss the opening.

Shhhhhk!

A white blade of aura cleaved the Dullahan in half at the waist. It must not have been dead for long, because rotten blood sprayed from its collapsing body and splattered across Choi Minwoo's face.

But despite the overpowering stench stabbing at his nose, he did not so much as twitch an eyebrow.

Choi Minwoo was gripped by the tension of the battlefield, cold reason, and a faint exhilaration.

That makes ten.

That was how many A-rank monsters Choi Minwoo had defeated by himself today. Including those of lower grades, the number had to be well over fifty.

Was I always this strong?

If he answered that question honestly, the answer was no.

Perhaps because of the Arch Lich's influence, the monsters he had encountered in China were slightly stronger and far more ferocious.

Even so, Choi Minwoo had been able to distinguish himself in such a chaotic battle because he had been blessed with two strokes of luck.

The first was—

The Jin Family's Cultivation Technique.

The Mana Cultivation Method he had learned directly from Jin Taekyung.

Choi Minwoo had his doubts about Jin Taekyung's claim that it was a family heirloom passed down through generations. But he had no doubt whatsoever that it was an outstanding secret technique.

The Jin Family's Cultivation Technique allowed him to control his energy reliably while greatly improving how he distributed his strength. The immense mana he had gained while learning it also gave him the stamina to keep fighting without tiring easily.

And his second stroke of luck was—

—Gwoooooar!

Boom!

A length of rebar swung with berserk force and smashed through the concrete road.

Choi Minwoo stepped on the ogre's thick arm and sprang upward, bringing his sword down with all his strength.

Thrust!

The aura-infused blade split the ogre's crown as easily as tofu.

Thud.

The four-meter[1921] giant dropped to its knees with a heavy crash. Standing on the dead creature's shoulder, Choi Minwoo quickly swept his gaze over his surroundings.

He's not here.

Screams and death filled the hellish scene on every side.

But the monster was nowhere to be seen. The monster who had displayed unbelievable power the moment the battle began—the commander of the monster army and leader of the Death Knights.

Where the hell is he?

Choi Minwoo clearly remembered the Black Knight sweeping aside dozens of Hunters with a single blow.

If the creature had truly committed itself to the battle, the humans might have been annihilated before they lasted even thirty minutes.

But for some reason, the Black Knight had not appeared again.

Was it the monster's arrogance? Did it consider the battle too insignificant to warrant its involvement?

Choi Minwoo could not understand it. But the Black Knight's absence was both his second stroke of luck and his final chance to make a decision.

We have to retreat.

The urban battle had already lost all meaning. The monster army, numbering around ten thousand, had already covered the city like a swarm of ants. Among them were more than a hundred A-rank monsters.

The humans were outmatched in both numbers and strength.

Nearly half of the thousand Hunters from the Public Security Armed Forces Department who had held the front line were already dead or wounded. And more than half of the damned People's Liberation Army had thrown down their weapons and fled before the monsters even reached them.

The armored units, reduced to heaps of scrap metal, and the air force, becoming prey for the flying monsters, were simply more of the same.

Rat-a-tat-tat-tat-tat! Boom!

[1921] Four meters is about 13 ft.

A state-of-the-art combat helicopter lost its balance and plunged from the sky, exploding in flames. Around a dozen soldiers caught in the flying debris died without even having time to scream.

It was a horrifying sight, but they were fortunate in one respect: their deaths had been painless.

A moment later, the monster horde began tearing everyone else apart indiscriminately.

—Kraaaaaaang!

Whoom! Crack!

The foreleg of a Saber Tiger, carrying several tons[1922] of force, crushed a soldier's limbs and burst his head.

The soldiers of the People's Liberation Army were nowhere near as fast as Hunters, and the rifles they carried were little better than slingshots against the monsters.

Choi Minwoo clenched his teeth at the merciless slaughter unfolding before him.

Get a grip. You can't save all of them.

He did not hypocritically preach about sacrificing the few for the many. He simply faced the situation with a cold eye and prepared himself to play the villain.

Could we have stopped them if he'd come?

Jin Taekyung suddenly came to mind, but that was nothing more than futile regret.

Even after he hounded the communications officer into frantically transmitting emergency signals, there had been no response.

A carefully planned surprise attack combined with thorough communications interference.

For now, all he could do was hope that one of the countless glass bottles cast into the sea would somehow reach Jin Taekyung.

Thud!

Choi Minwoo drove his sword into the chest of a charging Minotaur and shouted,

"Xiao Shen!"

His mana-infused voice pierced through the screams and thunderous crashes and reached one person's ears.

Covered in wounds and blood as he fought back the endless stream of monsters, Xiao Shen answered with a battle cry.

"Speak!"

"Withdraw the Public Security Armed Forces Department. We have to retreat now!"

"What? But if we retreat now…"

[1922] A metric ton is 1,000 kg (about 2,200 lb).

Choi Minwoo already knew what the young Hunter was about to say.

Retreats—and the pursuits that followed—were when the greatest number of casualties occurred.

Especially in a situation like this. If the Hunters serving as the last line of defense withdrew, the People's Liberation Army would fall straight into the monster army's grasp.

"If we're surrounded, it's all over. Do you understand? Take the surviving Hunters and the rear units and get out of the city while you still can!"

"…Mr. Choi."

"I know what you're thinking. But we have no other choice."

"…!"

Xiao Shen squeezed his eyes shut without realizing it.

He knew what the situation was. No—he understood it better than almost anyone.

The tide had turned sharply against them from the moment the battle began, and the humans had been driven all the way back to the hospital they were using as a temporary command center. If the monsters completed their encirclement—

Annihilation.

His deliberation felt long, but only a moment passed.

Xiao Shen opened his eyes and shouted with all his strength as he deflected the attacks raining down on him.

"Retreat! All Public Security Armed Forces Department personnel, withdraw immediately! The North Gate is open!"

In wartime, the orders of a commander like Xiao Shen were absolute.

All the more so when the military leadership, including General Liao, had not even shown their faces.

Good.

The soldiers might not have much hope, but the Hunters' odds of survival would rise dramatically. If Xiao Shen made the right calls, many of them might break through the encirclement and survive.

Yes. This is enough.

Feeling his heart grow lighter, Choi Minwoo launched himself forward.

Not toward the North Gate, which the monsters had yet to block, but toward the People's Liberation Army being slaughtered by the monsters.

It feels like I'm going to kill myself.

Why had he made this choice? Even he could not understand it.

Still…

For a man heading to his death, he felt surprisingly good.

Perhaps because dark clouds had gathered overhead, the wind was cool. And behind him, he had companions who would die alongside him, so he would not have to die alone.

Choi Minwoo suddenly spoke.

“Why didn’t you retreat?”

Xiao Shen, who should have been heading toward the North Gate, gave him a faint smile.

“What about you, Mr. Choi?”

“…I asked first.”

“Then I suppose I should answer first. Public Security Armed Forces Department!”

At the regimental commander’s call, the roughly three hundred Hunters following behind him let out a thunderous shout.

“To eliminate monsters and protect the people from every threat!”

“This is why we do not retreat. The 325 members of the Sichuan Province Public Security Armed Forces Department’s 1st Regiment, led by Regimental Commander Xiao Shen, have come to protect the people!”

Xiao Shen continued in a quiet voice.

“Now it’s your turn to answer, Mr. Choi.”

Choi Minwoo silently gazed at the thousands of monsters drawing closer, then suddenly muttered,

“Shit. There sure are a lot of them.”

“…!”

“That’s probably what he would have said. Then he would have fought harder than anyone else and won in the end.”

It was true. He had always been that way.

He had never backed down, no matter the situation, and he had never given up. Choi Minwoo had watched him longer and more closely than anyone else, so he knew.

That man, Jin Taekyung, was a hero of the new age. Choi Minwoo could never work miracles the way he did.

But still—

“It’s embarrassing.”

“What?”

“Jin Taekyung is technically my subordinate, you see. At a time like this, his superior ought to lead by example.”

Choi Minwoo burst into laughter, loudly enough to leave Xiao Shen bewildered.

His heart felt as light as a dandelion seed, and an unfamiliar power unlike anything he had ever felt before surged through his body as he shot toward the enemy.

Mr. Jin. I'll see you later.

If I survive today, as soon as possible.

If I die, as late as possible.

Let's meet then.

Hissssss.

The blade of his sword, filled with aura brighter and more radiant than ever, pointed toward the enemies.

The suicide squad of more than three hundred Hunters roared loud enough to deafen the ears, their fighting spirit surging as they shot forward behind him like arrows.

"Waaaaaaaaah!"

Two Death Knights who had been leading thousands of monsters in the slaughter of the People's Liberation Army looked down from their skeletal warhorses at the pitiful human force.

—Aksar. Garosh.

A moment later, the black wave swallowed the single white pebble.

The outcome had been decided from the beginning. Yet at the end of that battle, more fiercely fought than any before it, one man's sword had never lost its light.

The two Death Knights dropped to one knee before the Black Knight watching them.

—In the battle—

—we achieved victory.

—Today, this glory—

—we offer to our Lord.

Their voices were clipped and devoid of intonation. Even at the news of victory, the Black Knight merely nodded without interest.

It had gone as expected. The humans had been unable to stop his mighty legion and had collapsed in a single stroke.

But if asked whether everything had unfolded according to the Black Knight's wishes, the answer would have been no.

Those humans from before.

After breaking through the city and forcing the humans to retreat at the start of the battle, the Black Knight had turned his warhorse wherever the whim took him.

For some reason, he had returned to the strangely familiar place from the previous day, where he found something small.

Human? No. Not human. A child. And this is a shoe.

Memories and words surfaced one after another.

As the Black Knight had thought, it was a child's shoe—a tiny infant's shoe lost in the chaos and left behind without anyone realizing it had fallen.

The infinitely small, dirt-covered shoe seemed strangely familiar. Looking at it made his chest ache.

Hm? My chest aches?

What an unfamiliar expression.

The Black Knight's body had been incapable of feeling pain from the beginning. His master had personally created him and bestowed a powerful blessing upon him. Naturally, he never tired and felt no pain.

More importantly, this was no time to be swayed by something so trivial.

—Lord.

—Is something wrong?

He did not know why he had done it.

The Black Knight tucked the shoe into a gap in his armor and changed the subject.

—No. Rather, quite a few humans managed to escape alive.

—We apologize.

—It was our failure.

—There must be a reason.

The Death Knights bowed their heads deeply.

—The humans' resistance—

—was fiercer than expected.

—In exchange—

—we gained a small prize.

As if they had been waiting for those words, the densely packed monsters parted left and right to open a path.

A Troll approached cautiously, lowered the two figures slung over its shoulders, and stepped back.

The Black Knight's eyes flickered as he regarded the "small prize."

—They are humans.

—Yes.

The two loyal retainers answered in unison, then continued.

—Reap their souls yourself—

—and make them servants of our Lord.

—If you do so, Lord—

—you will grow even mightier.

They were right. Those two humans possessed rich, enticing souls.

If he personally reaped their souls and took them as subordinates, they would be reborn as even greater warriors. They might even prove worthy of commanding an entire force.

But—

Why?

The Black Knight realized that he was hesitating.

This was obviously something he had to do. Powerful subordinates would strengthen the legion, and strengthening the legion was an act of loyalty and devotion to the King of Death he served.

So why was he hesitating?

What is making me hesitate?

Ordinarily, he would have held back if something felt wrong. But the Black Knight had experienced this same confusion far too often of late.

The fact that he had forced himself to reach out might have been an act of defiance against himself.

—I will accept your suggestion.

Then, just as the Black Knight reached toward the two humans to reap their souls —

"I've been thinking about it carefully."

A voice rang out through the air, and the Black Knight raised his head.

Someone stood atop the half-burned, half-collapsed hospital, framed by sunlight streaming through the dark clouds behind him.

"Ten percent is surprisingly high when you think about it. Hmm. Definitely higher than my chances of getting a girlfriend."

The Black Knight's eyes narrowed. He recognized that energy. He had sensed it from afar the previous day.

At last, he had come face-to-face with the owner of that immense heat.

—Who are you?

"Me?"

Swish. Tap.

It happened in an instant. The young human dropped rapidly from a dizzying height, yet landed as lightly as a leaf. He pointed to himself with one finger and grinned.

"I'm one damn lucky bastard."

The next moment, the Black Knight saw it clearly.

The human's finger shifting to point at him.

And every trace of emotion vanishing from the human's face.

"You're, what…"

His voice was cold enough to make even the dead shudder.

“You’re one damn unlucky bastard.”

Chapter 398

Before attempting teleportation, a thought suddenly occurred to me.

If I put the odds of everything that's happened over the past two years into percentages, what would they be?

What were the odds that an F-rank Hunter, trudging uphill after being fired from his Guild, would find an old capsule abandoned at a recycling station?

What were the odds that the capsule would turn out to be a passage to another world?

What were the odds that I would begin my second life as the Third Young Master of a frontier martial family—not as a member of the Namgung Family or a direct Disciple of Huashan?

What were the odds that I would survive one war, two bloody massacres, and more brushes with death than I could count…?

After considering all of that, I reached a single conclusion.

"Ten percent is enough after all."

With that quiet murmur, I reached out.

Seizing an Object Through Empty Space.

Three jiazi[1923] of internal energy pulled Team Leader Choi and Xiao Shen toward me. The Death Knights and monsters tried to move, but stopped when their leader raised a hand.

Ignoring them, I checked the two men's condition. Their breathing was faint, and their qi was so precarious it seemed ready to vanish at any moment.

If I had taken a jet instead of teleporting, I might have been too late forever.

"I would've tried even with a one-percent chance. I'm not the kind of guy who dies for nothing."

Of course, I had also taken out some insurance in case the worst happened. I just hadn't expected to use it so soon, let alone under circumstances like these.

Open Inventory. Summon.

I paid no attention to the monsters watching me.

The leader saw me pull the item I needed from my Inventory and asked in a flat voice,

"An extradimensional space. Have you learned Magic?"

Shut your fucking mouth.

I swallowed the words hovering on the tip of my tongue. Normally, that would have been quite difficult, but right now, it wasn't.

I did not want anyone to interfere with me. At least not right now.

[1923] A jiazi is a sixty-year cycle in the traditional Chinese calendar.

Pop.

When I removed the magically sealed stopper, a faint fragrance drifted out. Milky liquid sloshed inside the clear glass bottle.

A Top-Grade Potion.

A miraculous medicine said to heal any injury as long as the patient was still breathing.

Right now, I couldn't have cared less about the rarity or value of the scant hundred milliliters[1924] in that bottle.

I simply thanked Wu Heixing for being both fabulously wealthy and incredibly stupid, then let the potion trickle between the lips of the patient lying there like a corpse.

Hang on a little longer, Shen.

Team Leader Choi came first. Partly because of all the time we had spent together, but even if we had shared no bond at all, I would still have chosen him first.

That was how serious Team Leader Choi's injuries were.

This is…

His left arm had been torn away from the shoulder. His right ankle was mangled as if something had chewed and swallowed it, while his left leg had been cleanly amputated. Seven ribs were broken, and his spine was fractured.

And…

His right hand, twisted at an unnatural angle, still clutched the hilt of his sword.

The leather strap he had fastened tightly around it so he wouldn't lose his grip was soaked through with blood.

"…"

I silently undid the strap, pried the sword from his crushed hand, and set it beside him.

I didn't forget to scold him in my head.

Why did you do this? It's a miracle you're still alive.

Then the real miracle began.

When I carefully tilted the bottle and administered exactly half of it, a sound like something burning filled the air, and the wounds covering Team Leader Choi's entire body began to heal.

Hisssssss, hisssssss—

Bones regrew, severed muscles rejoined, and damaged organs and flesh knitted together.

He recovered even faster than a Troll, the very embodiment of regeneration. As if time itself had been reversed, color finally began returning to Team Leader Choi's face.

[1924] One hundred milliliters is about 3.4 US fluid ounces.

His qi has stabilized too. This should be enough.

I couldn't have asked for a better result.

The others watching, however, were far less pleased.

"Fearless human."

"Stop at once."

"They have been granted the destiny—"

"of becoming subservient to our mighty Lord."

I silently regarded the two Death Knights who stepped forward in place of their leader.

Clad from head to toe in pitch-black armor, they looked almost like twins. They were roughly the same height, and even their voices were difficult to tell apart.

There was only one obvious difference between them: the weapons at their waists.

One has a mace. The other has a sword.

That was enough to give me my answer. I had solved the question; I could write down the answer later.

Right now, I had another problem to deal with.

"You've been through hell too, Shen."

Xiao Shen wasn't as badly injured as Team Leader Choi, but his wounds were still severe. I was about to pour the remaining half of the potion into his mouth when —

"Wretched human."

"This is your final warning."

"Put down those two humans, step back, and beg for mercy."

"Then our Lord will take you as his servant."

"A servant?"

"Yes."

One of the Death Knights stepped toward me, its voice flat and emotionless. The scabbard secured at its waist swayed with every step.

Clank. Clank. Clank.

One step. Two steps. Three.

There wasn't a trace of hesitation in its approach.

Thousands of monsters and their leader were watching.

The Death Knight spoke with such confidence that it was hard to believe it was an emotionless undead monster.

"You possess a truly great and radiant soul. Become one of us."

A great and radiant soul…

Without even raising my head, I continued pouring the potion.

Once the last few drops had fallen into Xiao Shen's mouth, I stoppered the empty bottle and returned it to my Inventory.

Hissssss, hissssss.

A signal that recovery had begun.

I straightened at the welcome sound I had been waiting for, looked at the Death Knight, and finally said what I'd been wanting to say.

"His left leg."

"Hm?"

"Team Leader Choi's left leg. Everything below a point one handspan[1925] beneath the knee was gone. Cut off clean. And Xiao Shen—that young kid lost his right arm."

"Human. What are you trying to say?"

"What am I trying to say?"

I gave it a faint smile.

"If you cut off perfectly good limbs, you should've been prepared for what came next."

And in the next instant—

In the sliver of time left after an instant had been split in half, then split again, the creature was suddenly right in front of me.

No.

It was the other way around.

It hadn't come to me.

I had gone to it.

"Let's see that vaunted skill of yours."

"…!"

Everything happened at once. The Death Knight tried to draw its sword, and I reached out with my left hand and pressed firmly against the back of its hand.

That was both the beginning and the end.

Shing. Click!

The dark blade had barely cleared its scabbard before it was forced back inside.

By then, my fist had already punched through the creature's chest.

Crunch!

The Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist, charged with the Scorching Yang Qi of three jiazi[1926], vaporized even the fistful of blood remaining inside the undead monster and blazed up using its long-dead body as kindling.

Whoosh! Rooooar!

[1925] A handspan is the distance between the tips of an outstretched thumb and little finger. It varies by person but is roughly 20 cm, or 8 in.

[1926] A jiazi is a sixty-year cycle in the traditional Chinese calendar.

Engulfed in flames that refused to die, the Death Knight flailed its arms and turned toward its kin.

It staggered back along the path it had strode down so confidently, then crumbled into ash.

"…!"

"…!"

Though thousands of monsters were gathered there, everything went silent as if someone had pressed a mute button.

I took White Flame from my Inventory and slowly began to walk.

Splash. Splash.

Everywhere I looked and everywhere I stepped, there were corpses and blood.

Countless rifles caught against my feet. A soldier in a crooked combat helmet stared at the sky with lifeless eyes.

At least his corpse was still intact.

In what appeared to have been the fiercest part of the battlefield, Hunters from the Public Security Armed Forces Department lay dead, their bodies mangled beyond recognition.

I had spent a full week with the 1st Regiment under Xiao Shen. Among the corpses were several faces I recognized.

So many died. So damn many.

At least three thousand humans had died here today alone.

How many would that number become if I added the dead from all five fronts? If I included the civilians killed in this Monster Wave?

Thud!

I borrowed an unknown Hunter's spear and drove it deep into the ground. Team Leader Choi's leather strap, tied securely to the end of the shaft, fluttered in the wind.

Beyond it stood an army of thousands of monsters—and him.

Death Knight Lord.

What a grand name. Then again, the monster possessed enough power to live up to it.

The circumstances are different, but I do have another one like him.

I called out to the creature currently setting a new record for silence.

"Let me ask you a favor."

I expected him to pretend he hadn't heard, but after a brief hesitation, the Skeleton Warlord answered.

"…A favor? You're not asking me to fight beside you, are you?"

"Of course not."

I had never expected that of him, and I didn't now. The favor I wanted had nothing to do with fighting.

It was about protecting someone.

"Protect the two people behind me. No matter what it takes."

With my permission, the Skeleton Warlord had been absorbing death qi whenever possible, growing stronger in the process.

As a Named Monster, he should have been capable of handling several ordinary A-rank monsters by himself.

"When this battle is over, I'll grant you any wish."

"In that case, there's nothing I can't do. But how long am I supposed to protect them?"

"That's obvious…"

I raised White Flame and pointed it at the Death Knight Lord.

"Until every last one of those bastards is dead."

"You lunatic…!"

"Too late."

I pulled the Skeleton Warlord's skull from my Inventory and tossed it behind me.

Crack. Pop.

As he hurriedly regenerated his body, I stroked the leather strap fluttering from the spear shaft.

How had he felt?

How had they all felt?

What had gone through their minds as they charged toward their deaths?

I couldn't begin to imagine.

There was only one thing I knew for certain.

"Any bastard who comes past this spear is going to fucking die."

The fire dragon coiled within my dantian raised its head.

CRUNCH!

Flesh and bone shattered, spraying in every direction.

An ogre's limbs went flying, while a Troll was engulfed in unquenchable flames before it had a chance to regenerate.

Boom! Slash!

The head of a Lycanthrope baring its fangs exploded.

A Dullahan charged through the spray of foul-smelling brain matter, only to be cleaved in half with a single blow. Its halberd found a new master and shot away with tremendous force, tearing through a Wyvern's wing.

CRACKLE!

"Kyaaaaaaa!"

Thud-thud-thud!

Blood rained from the sky.

At the same moment, a streak of blue flame cut through the downpour.

Whoooooosh! Slash!

A storm of blood erupted. Whenever the flames streaked through the air, dozens of monsters fell and hundreds recoiled.

And the thousands of monsters…

At some point, they began to be overwhelmed.

They had grown afraid of a single human—and of the line of death he had drawn with a single spear.

"L-Lord."

For the first time, the Death Knight's flat, unwavering voice trembled with emotion.

The Black Knight knew perfectly well what his subordinate's desperate plea meant.

"Make way."

Between the slits of the deeply lowered helmet, red eyes flickered.

As he advanced, immense magical power rolling off him, he tried to ignore the strange words and scenes that kept surfacing in his mind.

Nothing could take precedence over his creator, his eternal lord.

"Are you listening, my servant?"

At his lord's voice echoing like a hallucination, the Black Knight quietly replied,

"Yes, my lord."

Until the very end, he failed to realize one thing.

That his hand was groping somewhere between the plates of his armor.

Chapter 399

Whoosh!

Nothing could stop the spearhead wreathed in Force—not leather that could deflect bullets, nor flesh and bone harder than steel.

Puh-puh-puk!

Big targets came with a bonus. The spearhead punched through the Lycanthrope's chest and skewered the monsters packed close behind it like meat on a spit.

"Krrgh, k-kek."

Its wide eyes held a mixture of confusion and indignation.

Its gaze seemed to protest: Why me, out of all these monsters? I never crossed the death line you drew.

"No."

I quietly pulled on the shaft.

Scrape. The Lycanthrope's claws raked across the ground as I dragged it over to my side of the spear.

"You crossed it. Just now."

"…!"

That was far enough. I yanked the spear free at lightning speed and swept it horizontally across the monsters before me.

Whoosh, KRAAAASH!

Blue flames scorched the air as they surged forward and swallowed the monsters.

Those still alive burned to death screaming, while those already turned undead crumbled to ash.

Ding. Ding. Ding…

System notifications announcing my kills rang out without pause.

How many had fallen to that single strike? Dozens? A hundred?

Rather than count them one by one, I chose to keep moving. My goal had never been to kill some fixed number of monsters.

Annihilation.

Humans and monsters had been locked in this fated struggle to kill or be killed for decades.

Only one species would be able to survive here today, and I would not be the one to fall.

Thud.

I stepped over the spear embedded deep in the concrete. At the same moment, countless monsters retreated as if by prior agreement.

One step. Two steps. Three.

No matter how far I walked, the distance between us did not shrink. For every step I took, they backed away by just as much.

“This is insane…”

Behind me, the Skeleton Warlord muttered as if groaning.

One human was overwhelming an army of thousands of monsters.

Even if this sight wasn’t enough to fill a page in human history, surely it deserved at least a paragraph.

“W-Where are you going?”

“Keep a good eye on those two. I’m not going far anyway.”

More precisely, there was no longer any need for me to go far.

The guest had already arrived. There was no reason to go out and meet him.

He’s finally here.

My guess had been right. The monster army parted left and right like the ebbing tide, revealing him in the distance atop a skeletal horse made entirely of black bones.

Clip-clop. Clip-clop.

He wore pitch-black full plate armor, and a vivid red glow shone beneath his low-set helmet.

He was far smaller than a large monster like an ogre, but the mana pouring from him was immense and powerful.

Level 135. It was a number I had never seen on any monster I had faced before.

As the Death Knight Lord approached, slowly gathering speed, a thought occurred to me.

Can I defeat him?

My battle with the Western Heaven Demon Lord in Murim had been a desperate struggle with my life on the line.

If the Western Heaven Demon Lord had intended to eliminate me from the very beginning, if the Heavenly Power Demon had not passed his internal energy to me, if I had not experienced that miraculous recovery from leveling up, if Jeok Cheongang had not awakened and saved me at the critical moment, I would have died three or four times over.

But in the end, I had survived—and grown stronger.

That was when a question had begun circling endlessly through my mind.

How strong am I now?

The System said my martial arts realm and stats had risen.

I had distributed my stats and fought battles just as I always had, but aside from gaining Force, I wasn't sure what had changed.

I had no real sense of how much stronger I had become.

At some point, it had all become easy and natural.

And now—

Clatter, thud-thud-thud!

As I watched the Death Knight Lord shoot toward me like a gust of wind, I realized the answer.

The immense mana cascading from his body like a waterfall did not shake me in the slightest. That alone told me.

I am…

Whoooooosh!

The wind vanished, replaced by a flash of light. The Death Knight Lord and his skeletal horse charged as one, and the sword in his hand moved.

Dense darkness gathered around the blade and came crashing down, yet the sight unfolded so slowly before my eyes that a single certainty surfaced in my mind.

I am stronger than anyone else on this battlefield.

In that slowed-down world, I thrust out White Flame.

Blue-white flames surged along the spearhead and devoured the darkness.

A roar like the sky splitting apart rang out.

KRAAAASH!

The ground within a radius of several hundred meters[1927] caved in, and the hospital that had stood firm for decades collapsed.

Compressed air erupted in layer after layer like a sonic boom, battering and hurling away everything around them.

And at the center of it all stood two beings whom no one else could approach.

Whoosh, whoosh-whoosh-whoosh! KABOOM!

Several times—perhaps dozens—in the blink of an eye.

Whenever blue-white flames and pitch-black darkness collided and mingled, deafening roars and devastating destruction followed.

No human or monster could see the movements of the two beings.

They existed on another level, clashing within a world and time all their own.

Swish!

The silver-white spear in Jin Taekyung's hand slashed down through empty space.

[1927] Several hundred meters is roughly several hundred yards; 300 m is about 980 ft.

Blue-white flames tore through space as they poured downward. But the Black Knight did not retreat. He swung his sword.

KABOOM!

The instant the surging mana collided with the flames, the tremendous pressure shattered the Black Knight's skeletal horse.

But the erasure of Nightmare—his loyal steed and an A-rank monster—was nothing compared to what came next.

Whoooooosh!

A thrown spear with no preparatory motion whatsoever—a veritable flash of light.

The Black Knight twisted aside on instinct. Tremendous heat grazed his chest and tore into the ranks of monsters behind him.

KRAKAKAK! KABOOM!

The spearhead punched through dozens of monsters before slamming into the ground, where it blasted out a massive crater with a thunderous roar.

Before the monsters caught in the aftermath could even scream in terror, Jin Taekyung was already moving toward the Black Knight.

Sshk.

A single step, without sound or presence.

By the time the Black Knight noticed, Jin Taekyung had erased the dozens of meters[1928] between them and reached his target. A fist shot toward the Black Knight's chest.

"Get lost."

"…!"

Boom!

Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist. Heat hotter than lava slammed into the armor.

The Black Knight was hurled away at tremendous speed, but he flipped in midair and righted himself. At the same time, his hand tightened around his sword hilt and swept the blade out with tremendous force.

Whoooooosh! Shh-shh-shhk!

Black mana became dozens of lightning bolts that shot toward Jin Taekyung. Each one possessed earth-shaking power.

But Jin Taekyung was already gone.

KRAKABOOM!

Jin Taekyung burst through the cloud of pale dust and extended both hands.

The sword had already changed direction and was slashing down toward the crown of his head, but he caught the blade between his palms as if clasping his hands in prayer.

[1928] Dozens of meters is a distance measured in tens of yards; 20 m is about 66 ft.

Empty-Hand Seizes the Blade.

His hands, wreathed in blue flames, and the blade, laden with immense mana, trembled between the two beings.

One blocking. The other pressing forward.

Their fierce deadlock brought the relentless exchange to a momentary halt—until an unexpected intruder broke it.

"You! Human!"

A Death Knight appeared with a shout and brought its mace down toward Jin Taekyung's back.

Boom!

The Death Knight never even realized when or how it died.

Jin Taekyung's heel sliced through the air like a blade and blew its head apart, helmet and all.

Thud.

Yet futile though its erasure had been, the attack was not entirely meaningless.

The Black Knight's red eyes flashed, and the sword in his grasp unleashed more mana than ever before.

The tiniest of openings.

The instant in which Jin Taekyung diverted his internal energy to kill the Death Knight was enough to shatter the balance.

Crunch! Slash!

Blood sprayed into the air.

It was endlessly red—human blood, proof that the Black Knight's sword had cut across Jin Taekyung's chest.

A single certainty flashed through the Black Knight's mind.

It's over.

Then, in the next instant, Jin Taekyung's flame-wreathed fist slammed into the Black Knight's side.

Crack!

"…!"

The Death Knight Lord's body jerked.

Like any undead monster incapable of feeling pain, he made no sound, but I could read the question in the red glow visible through the slits of his helmet.

How?

Yeah. That was exactly what his eyes were asking.

I answered flatly.

“You think you’re the only one with armor?”

Boom!

This time, it was the Flame Divine Palm.

Already cracked from the repeated blows, the Death Knight Lord’s armor shattered into fragments.

“That hurt, you son of a bitch.”

Crack!

I seized his gauntleted wrist, twisted it, and snapped it.

I had no idea how much attacks like these mattered against an undead monster, but it was enough to make him drop his sword.

Clank.

The moment the sword hit the ground, the Death Knight Lord was met with a merciless barrage.

Boom! Crack! Bam!

I planted my foot on his instep and unleashed punch after punch.

Shoulder. Arm. Side. Chest.

The Death Knight Lord took dozens of blows in the blink of an eye. He tried to counterattack, but it didn’t matter.

Thud!

“…?”

“Don’t look so surprised. My armor’s pretty useful too.”

I had the Fire Dragon Armor.

Never thought I’d use it here.

The Fire Dragon Armor was a divine weapon I had obtained after defeating the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

It had been so severely damaged during the battle in Murim that it was still repairing itself, but even at a restoration rate of roughly fifty percent, it had done its job admirably.

Though I nearly died because it couldn’t block the strike completely.

My vision had swum when the sword cut me.

But I had suffered this much pain more times than I cared to remember.

Besides, it was nothing compared to the pain endured by those who had died before me.

“This is…for the people you killed today.”

I put all my strength into a punch and drove it into his face.

A Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist at the eighth level smashed apart the helmet that had withstood everything, revealing his face.

The balance had tipped. One blow. One final strike would be enough to take his life.

“And this is…”

At that moment, my raised fist stopped dead.

I blinked through eyelids clotted with blood. For just an instant, time seemed to stop when my gaze landed on someone’s face.

It was unfamiliar, yet familiar.

With deathly white skin and glowing red eyes, he looked exactly like a certain hero I had seen in a holographic video.

“…Lei Fei?”

Chapter 400

The moment he first clashed with Jin Taekyung, the black knight knew instinctively.

He's strong.

The young human before him was extraordinarily powerful. Even if the black knight fought with everything he had, victory was far from certain. His opponent might even be stronger than he was.

As the battle seesawed back and forth, that conviction only deepened.

This will be a difficult fight.

But the black knight neither feared him nor retreated.

He was his lord's most loyal servant, charged with carrying out his commands.

This was a battle between warriors who had transcended their limits. Even the slightest difference could decide the outcome.

If I don't give up, an opportunity will come.

The black knight knew that well.

He had repeated those words to himself ever since his childhood training. By surviving countless battles, he had grown into a mighty warrior.

…Me?

Confusion struck again. The moment his thoughts faltered, his movements became erratic.

And his opponent was neither weak nor careless enough to let such an opening pass.

Whoosh! Slash!

The spearhead tore through dead flesh.

Boom!

Blue flames slammed into his chest.

Amid the almost tangible heat, the black knight suddenly felt something.

Pain.

What is this…?

What unsettled him was not that he could feel pain, but that a sensation which should have been utterly foreign felt so terribly familiar.

What are these memories…?

His chest throbbed. His head pounded.

As the black knight staggered beneath the relentless barrage, memories belonging to someone he could not identify flashed rapidly before his eyes.

Th-This can't be!

"His mana adaptability is incredible. It's the highest figure we've ever recorded!"

“He must be enrolled in the Zhonghua Development Training program immediately!”

Humans dressed in dazzling white clothes chattered excitedly. Among them stood a middle-aged man in a dark, sharply tailored uniform.

“Zhonghua Development Training? You intend to raise that child as a Hunter?”

“Of course. He is only thirteen, yet his mana adaptability is comparable to Faye Chen’s. He has more than enough potential to become an S-rank Hunter—the greatest Hunter in our nation!”

“I refuse.”

“Pardon?”

“No, Comrade Lieutenant General. What do you mean? This child…”

“Enough.”

The middle-aged man continued in a subdued voice.

“He is my only nephew. I promised my sister I would make him happy, not turn him into a Hunter and put him in danger.”

“Being a Hunter is a noble calling. If that child becomes an S-rank Hunter, it will be a blessing to all our people!”

“I know how noble their work is. But that was how my brother-in-law…”

The middle-aged man suddenly stopped and shook his head.

“Nothing you say will change my mind. If not for the directive from above, I would never have allowed him to be tested. We’re leaving. The rest is up to you.”

“Comrade Lieutenant General! Comrade Lieutenant General!”

Leaving the shouts behind him, the middle-aged man strode over, forced a smile, and held out his hand.

“You’ve been waiting a long time, haven’t you? Come on. Let’s go.”

The black knight—or rather, the person whose memories these seemed to be—took the middle-aged man’s hand.

His own hand was small and pale.

Then a child’s clear voice rang out.

“Uncle.”

“Yes?”

“I… I want to become a Hunter.”

A host of emotions crossed the middle-aged man’s face.

He stared at the child for a long time, biting his lip. When he finally released a troubled sigh, the others approached with markedly brighter expressions.

“Zhonghua Development Training is a project we designed with the utmost care. Its safety measures are rigorous, and its effectiveness is proven. Wu Heixing is the same age, and he’s doing well.”

“If the child changes his mind, we’ll stop the training at any time.”

The oldest-looking man placed a hand on the middle-aged man's shoulder.

"Please trust us and leave him in our care, Comrade Lieutenant General Wei Fenghu."

Wei Fenghu. Wei Fenghu…

The name echoed endlessly through the black knight's mind.

It was so familiar.

He had missed it so much.

Boom!

Did his chest ache because of the blow he had taken, or was there another reason?

As the staggering black knight stared ahead, more memories appeared before his eyes.

"You think you're the best just because the adults praise you?"

A boy in a bow tie and black suit glared at him with sharp eyes. His polished shoes gleamed.

"Don't get the wrong idea. I'm the best. You're second!"

The black knight's vision tilted to one side, and then an innocent voice rang out.

"Okay. Let's do that, then."

"What?"

"I don't mind being second. Third is fine too, and I wouldn't care if I came in last."

The sharp-featured boy's mouth fell open.

"Are you stupid? You want to be even worse than Zhang Wei, the lowest-ranked trainee in the whole training camp?"

"But Zhang Wei is kind, and he's always helping others. He'll become a great Hunter."

"Y-You're making fun of me, aren't you?"

"Huh? No. I just meant that if that's what you want, then I'm fine with—ah!"

Crash!

It took only an instant to subdue the boy who had suddenly lunged at him. Pinned beneath him, the boy thrashed and shouted.

"I'm the best! Wu Heixing is the best at everything!"

As one memory faded, another surfaced, as though someone were tossing stones one after another into a still pond.

The memories of that unknown person continued to throw the black knight's mind into confusion.

"Top trainee, ■■■■, step forward."

A small number of people filled a vast space.

For some reason, he could not make out the name being called, but his body moved on its own.

Step. Step.

His disciplined strides were long, and his vantage point was much higher.

He had grown into a young man. An older man in uniform approached and pinned a medal to his chest.

It was a familiar face—the same man from the first memory. He leaned closer and whispered.

“Are you certain you won’t regret this?”

“I have no regrets. I never have, and I never will.”

“Most people will never know you exist. You may have to spend your entire life in the shadows.”

“I was taught that a Hunter is also a guardian. Remaining unseen does not diminish my honor.”

“There is something I have not been able to tell you until now.”

The older man’s grip tightened on his shoulder.

“I’m proud of you. Thank you for growing into such a fine man.”

“Thank you, Uncle. No… Father.”

The older man smiled brightly, his eyes glistening with tears.

The instant a single tear rolled down his wrinkled cheek and struck the platform, another memory surfaced.

“Hello? Is anyone here?”

The place he visited on that warm spring day was a small flower shop. As he looked around at the vibrant flowers and peered farther inside, she approached him.

“Welcome!”

Her steps were light and buoyant, her eyes prim and feline.

Her voice was so cheerful and bright.

And she was so beautiful…

The black knight—or rather, a man who had passed through his youthful years and grown more mature—felt his heart pound.

“Are you a customer?”

“N-No, I… I came to buy some fl-flowers.”

“For your parents? Or your girlfriend?”

“My parents. Strictly speaking, they aren’t my parents. It’s my uncle who raised me…”

“I see. You speak so formally, though. Are you a soldier?”

“S-Something like that.”

It was a strange memory. His words kept breaking off, and everything before his eyes repeatedly turned white.

When he came to his senses, he was walking dazedly into a hospital room with a bright bouquet in his arms.

“You fool. I told you there was no need to come when it’s only mild pneumonia… What’s that?”

At Wei Fenghu’s question, he answered blankly.

“Flowers.”

“Is that a get-well gift?”

“Yes.”

“So you bought me chrysanthemums as a get-well gift?”[1929]

“Yes… Huh?”

“You ungrateful brat! Hey, you!”

Smack! Smack!

The man laughed even as he was beaten with the bouquet. A quiet laugh escaped him at his own stupidity, and he could not help laughing because she looked like chrysanthemums.

After that, the memories sped by.

He visited the flower shop every day.

“H-Hello!”

“Welcome—oh, you’re back again?”

“Haha.”

“Chrysanthemums, right? The pure white ones.”

Spring, summer, autumn, winter.

By the time all four seasons had passed, they were no longer merely a flower-shop owner and her customer.

“I have something to tell you.”

“What is it?”

“Will you marry me?”

“…Oh.”

“I’ll make you happy.”

Of all the memories he had seen, that one lasted the longest.

After a silence so long that a single second felt like ten years, or even a hundred, she finally opened her mouth.

“I have something to tell you too.”

“No, before that, give me your answer…”

“I’m pregnant.”

“What?”

[1929] In China, white chrysanthemums are traditionally associated with funerals and mourning, making them an awkward choice for a get-well gift.

Thump. Thump-thump. Thump-thump-thump!

The man's heart hammered wildly, and the black knight writhed in agony.

"Aaah… Aaaaaah!"

His head hurt as if it were splitting apart, and it felt as though someone were wringing out his insides with their hands.

Along with pain beyond anything he had ever imagined, another memory forced its way into the empty space.

"Waaah! Waaah!"

"Th-This child…"

"Congratulations on becoming a father, honey."

The birth of a new life.

And its growth.

"Dada. Dada-da!"

"Honey, honey! Did you hear that? Our baby's already saying 'Dada.' Could our baby be a genius?"

"Could you change the diaper?"

"Wait. Let me hear it one more time."

"Dada! Momma!"

"Hahaha! That's right! We're your daddy and mommy!"

The day the baby, bundled in a swaddling cloth and squirming helplessly, succeeded in rolling over.

The day she first crawled on all fours.

The day she took her first steps…

The man was as happy as if the entire world belonged to him.

But it did not take long for those dreamlike days to become a nightmare.

"The magical power level in Gaoping District has spiked!"

"Gaoping District? Keep trying to contact them, and mobilize and deploy the Second Regiment as a precaution."

"D-Director, we've lost communications."

"What?"

Disaster struck without warning.

The man hurriedly assembled the forces under his command and headed for the source, only to find an unbelievable sight awaiting him.

"Kyaaaaaaa!"

"E-Everyone, run—guh!"

Crunch! KABOOM!

Flames billowed into the sky above the once-peaceful city, while countless monsters slaughtered people on the ground.

Before that unbelievable scene of carnage, in a land overflowing with screams and death, the man drew his sword.

“Public Security Armed Forces Department!”

Zzzzt!

An aura blade surged around his sword, shining brilliantly.

More than a thousand Hunters answered his cry with a deafening roar.

They were humanity’s shield and guardians.

They could not retreat a single step.

“Wipe them all out!”

“Waaaah! Long live the People’s Republic of China!”

With the Five-Starred Red Flag emblazoned on their armor, they surged forward like a wave—only to break apart in sprays of blood instead of white foam.

“Perish in the flames of hellfire. Fire Rain.”

Kiiiiing.

The ash-gray sky opened its maw.

Beneath the falling rain of fire, the man thought of his beloved wife and five-year-old daughter.

And then he came face-to-face with that being.

“If you had run, you could have lived.”

“I’ll kill you.”

“How noble. What is your name, human?”

“I am…”

“…Lei Fei?”

At the sound of Jin Taekyung’s voice, the black knight’s body went rigid.

The dam burst, and everything began to reassemble.

Thirty-six years of memories from his life as a human crashed over him like a tidal wave, blotting out his vision.

—I am… I am…

What in the world was he?

As the black knight trembled in confusion and pain, a thunderous voice rang through his mind.

—You are my most loyal servant and the supreme commander of my legion. Your lord commands you: fulfill your duty until you crumble into ash!

—…!

It was a word of power he could not resist.

The red light in his eyes, wavering like a candle in the wind, suddenly blazed.

The black knight—no, Lei Fei—had fallen with only one strike left to finish him. Now tremendous magical power erupted from his entire body.
KRAAAAAASH!

Chapter 401

A single word, almost a groan, slipped between my lips.

"…Lei Fei?"

Wei Fenghu's only nephew through his sister. An S-rank Hunter secretly trained by China.

And a hero who had vanished alongside a thousand Hunters from the Public Security Armed Forces Department on the day the Monster Wave erupted.

If you happen to meet that child, Mr. Jin…would you be able to bring him back?

The old general's desperate request echoed in my ears. That was probably why my body suddenly froze.

—You wicked human! Get a grip! He is no longer human. He is a fallen monster!

The Skeleton Warlord was stating the obvious.

Among the monsters I had defeated so far were Hunters and civilians resurrected as undead. Lei Fei was merely one of them.

The being before me was no longer an S-rank Hunter who had died carrying out his mission. He was a Death Knight Lord leading a monster army.

But…

Something's different.

Crack, crack, crack!

—Kgh, k-khgh. Kraaah!

His body trembled in tiny spasms, groans escaping him at irregular intervals.

Each time the red glow in his eyes flickered like a traffic light, stark-white irises and pupils appeared beneath it—unmistakably human.

I had never heard of or seen an undead react this way. They had lost all sense and reason, driven solely by the instinct to slaughter.

What if—just maybe—his transformation into an undead isn't complete?

If that was true…what was I supposed to do?

Right now, a single blow would end the battle and allow me to console the souls of the victims.

But what would I be killing? A hero who had given his life to protect others, or a Death Knight Lord who had led a monster army through countless massacres and acts of destruction?

"Fuck…"

My hesitation was brief.

There was no helping it. The die had been cast, and he and I had already crossed the point of no return. He wasn't an opponent I could subdue with half measures. I had to end this now.

Rest easy.

Lei Fei. Death Knight Lord. Whoever he was, he would finally find peace.

My Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist, unleashed at full power at the eighth level, would end it without pain.

Fwoosh! Whoooooosh!

My fist, engulfed in blue flames, shot forward to bring everything to an end.

At that moment—

—My. Lord!

A chilling voice slipped between dark-red lips. The flickering glow in his eyes suddenly steadied, and tangible mana erupted from him.

Crackle! KRAAAANG!

Flames and darkness collided.

The two tremendous forces crashed into each other and exploded in an enormous shock wave.

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

The deafening blast left my ears ringing. The tremendous recoil hurled me backward, but I flipped in midair and righted myself.

The ground and the monster remains caught in the explosion had been blown to pieces.

Through the pale smoke blanketing the devastated area for hundreds of meters[1930], a being wrapped in darkness approached.

—I am that person's most loyal servant.

Sssssss.

Darkness rose from the ruined earth—the death energy held within the fallen monsters.

—I am the supreme commander who leads the legion of the dead.

Whoooooosh!

The swirling darkness rushed toward him and was drawn into his body. His half-destroyed armor repaired itself, his broken bones rejoined, and the red glow in his eyes blazed fiercely.

As he recovered, his power grew.

Now filled with even greater mana, the being slowly raised his sword.

—By my lord's command, I shall fulfill my duty.

He was wrong.

His duty had been to serve as humanity's shield and guardian. But the hero who had given his life for others had lost his memories and been corrupted by the Arch Lich.

[1930] Hundreds of meters is roughly 200–900 m, or about 660–2,950 ft.

SYSTEM

Lv. 140 Death Knight Lord

Lei Fei no longer existed.

The being approaching me was nothing but a monster.

In that case…

“I have a duty to fulfill too.”

The instant I murmured those words—

Whoosh!

A sword shedding mana came down toward my head.

Slash!

One handspan[1931].

That was the distance by which death missed me.

Mana honed sharper than ever grazed my arm and sliced into the ground. There was no deafening crash, no spray of debris. More than ten meters[1932] of earth simply split apart like cheesecake.

Slice!

At the chilling sound, I thrust out my hand.

The searing heat of the Flame Divine Palm collided with the blade, which had already changed course.

KRAANG!

A tremendous shock wave exploded outward from between us. Through the swirling dust, I saw the red glow of his eyes burning brightly.

“Eat this.”

—…!

The Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist shot forward like a cannonball.

The bastard’s eyes flew wide as he drove his knee upward. My flame-wreathed fist collided with his knee, wrapped in darkness.

KRAAANG!

The world shook.

The tremendous recoil hurled me backward, and the outer wall of a building rapidly filled my vision.

I twisted my body in midair. The tips of my feet touched solid concrete.

[1931] A handspan is the distance across an outstretched hand, roughly 20 cm (8 in), though it varies by person.

[1932] Ten meters is about 33 ft.

Flamefire Path.

I channeled internal energy into both legs.

Concentrate.

Explode.

Crack. Boom!

The outer wall received all the force and speed loaded into my toes and burst apart.

I shot forward like a streak of flame. The Death Knight Lord was only just regaining his balance when I appeared in the air above his head.

Inventory open. Summon.

A sturdy spear shaft filled my hand. The energy coursing through my body surged down to my fingertips and into the spearhead.

Blue hellfire bloomed in midair, becoming a fire dragon's claw as it slashed downward.

Fire Dragon Divine Spear, Second Form.

Heavenly Strike.

Whooooooooom—

Ultra-high heat burned the air.

The Death Knight Lord raised his sword toward the spear plunging down like a lightning bolt, his mana swelling as if about to detonate.

KRAANG!

The spearhead shattered, and a blue-black flash filled my vision.

Cracks spread like a spiderweb around the bastard, who had taken the full force carried by the spearhead. The next moment, the ground within a radius of more than a hundred meters[1933] sank inward.

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

The collapse opened a gigantic sinkhole.

Monsters caught in the aftermath of the battle shrieked as they plunged hundreds of meters[1934] into the depths.

The Death Knight Lord used a falling ogre as a foothold and shot back toward the surface. Then he looked up at me.

At me, standing high in the sky.

Stepping on Empty Air.

Another supernatural feat granted only to those who had reached the Supreme Peak realm.

[1933] A hundred meters is about 330 ft.

[1934] Hundreds of meters is roughly 200–900 m, or about 660–2,950 ft.

Feeling the immense drain on my internal energy, I stepped on empty air and shot upward. Before my feet could touch the ground, mana lashed toward my side like a whip.

Inventory open. Summon.

Clang!

I managed to block the attack, but the spearhead shattered into countless fragments.

White Flame had already been hurled away as a javelin. Even if the weapons stored in my inventory were of usable quality, in a battle like this they were nothing more than disposable weapons.

But the story changed when I had dozens—hundreds—of them.

Inventory open. Summon.

Whoooooosh! Clang!

Summon.

Crack!

With every exchange of blows, a spear shaft bent and a spearhead broke.

I didn't care.

Every sense in my body was honed to a silent edge, telling me exactly what was happening and what would come next.

Summon. Summon.

I crossed the spears in my hands and swung them like streaks of light.

Crack!

One shattered against his sword, but the other slammed into his side.

Boom!

As the earth-shaking impact drove him backward, I stepped forward.

One step.

That was all it took to appear before the Death Knight Lord. I advanced faster than he could retreat.

Blazing Flame Divine Spear, First Form.

Fire Dragon's Single Tail.

Whoooooosh! Thrust!

A new spear, already drawn from my inventory, pierced the pitch-black armor and drove into the area around his knee.

The restored armor was tougher than before, but even the mana it had absorbed could not stop the Force coating the spearhead.

He can't feel pain, but he should still feel the impact.

Contrary to my expectations, however, the Death Knight Lord did not waver.

Slice!

He severed the spear with his mana-coated sword. Instead of retreating, he charged straight at me.

Slash!

Space split open, and every hair on my body stood on end.

I thought I had turned my head in time, but a thread-thin streak of mana grazed beneath my earlobe and sliced halfway through it.

Ssshhh!

Blood spurted from the wound along with a sharp, stinging pain.

Feeling it run down my neck, I thrust my palm toward his face.

Flames surged, and the Flame Divine Palm was about to erupt—

KRAANG!

My eyes widened amid the resounding boom.

The palm that should have blown his head off had been stopped by a pitch-black gauntlet.

What the hell?

I wasn't surprised that he had blocked the attack.

The Death Knight Lord's movement was still clumsy, but what he had just used was a type of palm technique I recognized.

More specifically, it had taken the form of the Flame Divine Palm.

This bastard…he's copying my martial arts.

As I stared into his unwavering red eyes, a thought flashed through my mind.

An S-rank Hunter secretly trained by China.

I had forgotten for a moment.

The being before me, now reduced to a monster, had once been a genius chosen from among 1.2 billion people—a secret weapon China had intended to keep hidden until the very end.

Impressive. Truly impressive.

I admired him inwardly.

At the same time, I became certain of one thing.

You can't beat me.

If he was the man chosen from among 1.2 billion people, then I was one of a kind among nearly seven billion.

The blood I had spilled traveling between the modern world and Murim, and my countless brushes with death, had made me who I was.

"Let's…end this."

I stepped forward as the quiet words left my mouth.

My mind was calmer than ever, and my five senses were razor-sharp.

Fwit!

I tilted my head, and the mana the Death Knight Lord unleashed in an explosive burst narrowly missed me.

Feeling the Scorching Yang Qi filling my entire body, I drove out my fist.

KRAANG!

An earth-shaking boom rang out, and his body shuddered.

He hurriedly tried to block by imitating a grappling technique, but the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist broke through his clumsy defense and slammed into his chest.

More.

Whoosh, boom!

More. More. More.

I repeated the words in my head as my hands and feet struck without pause.

Every blow laden with Force crashed against his sword or found an opening, battering him without end.

And it wasn't only the spears summoned from my inventory.

My fists, legs, elbows—everything that made up my body was both weapon and shield.

Crack! Slice!

His wrist was severed along with the gauntlet, and the once-mighty mana flickered like a candle flame.

The Death Knight Lord's armor slowly disintegrated, unable to withstand my physical power, which far surpassed human limits, and my internal energy, vast as the sea.

KRAANG!

We each struck without bothering to defend.

A System notification informed me that the Fire Dragon Armor's durability had fallen, while the armor covering his body shattered like glass.

Clatter.

His bare flesh was finally exposed.

Dark patches of lividity mottled his pale skin.

The red glow in the dead man's eyes flared more fiercely than ever, as though heralding the end.

—I am, I am…!

But his cry went unfinished.

Thrust!

A translucent spearhead punched through his pale skin and burst from his chest.

I had pulled White Flame back to me with Seizing an Object Through Empty Space.

Looking at him, I answered.

“That’s enough…rest now.”

Chapter 402

Thrust!

What is this?

It was hot, yet cool.

Sensing those two contradictory sensations, the Black Knight looked down at the transparent spearhead protruding through his chest.

He slowly raised his head. His gaze settled on the young human before him, whose expression he could not read.

“Enough…rest now.”

There was neither mockery for the defeated nor a victor’s joy in his voice. It sounded bitter and, in a way, wistful.

Those words filled the Black Knight’s mind.

Rest.

Then, in the next moment—

Crack!

The Black Knight heard everything binding him shatter.

The jet-black armor that had barely retained its shape broke into hundreds, then thousands of fragments, and the mighty mana within him faltered.

But the greatest change was taking place inside his mind.

That’s…

In a world that had slowed to a crawl, he saw a small, worn child’s shoe through the scattering fragments of armor.

At the same time, countless memories flashed through his mind.

“I want to become a Hunter.”

A young boy speaking of his dream.

“I’m proud of you. Thank you for growing up so well.”

“Thank you, Uncle. No…Father.”

A young man who had become both a proud nephew and a son.

“Is anyone there?”

“Welcome!”

…Ah.

On a day when everything had been perfect—the scent, the temperature, the weather—a man met a woman and fell in love.

“Will you marry me?”

The young boy who had wanted to become a Hunter became someone’s husband.

“Waaah! Waaah!”

“T-This child…”

“Congratulations on becoming a father, honey.”

At last, he became the father of a child.

“Dada! Momma!”

“Hahaha! That’s right! We’re your daddy and mommy!”

How could he ever forget those moments, when he had been happier than anyone else in the world?

A single tear rolled down his bloodless, pale cheek.

It swept away the dark clouds filling his mind. It was the tear of a dead man who had finally remembered who he was.

Ah…ahhh…

Only now did he know. Only now did he understand.

He reached out and grabbed the small shoe.

The nameless child crying in its parents’ arms overlapped with the image of his daughter smiling brightly as she saw him off on the morning he died.

“Daddy! Come back soon!”

“Have a safe trip. Be careful.”

He seemed to remember kissing his wife on the forehead and rubbing his face against his daughter’s cheek. He had hugged her as she laughed and complained that his beard was scratchy, then walked out the front door.

Leaving behind the same words he always did.

“I’ll be back.”

But he never kept that promise.

A few hours later, a disaster unlike any seen since the Great Cataclysm began. He fought with every ounce of strength he possessed until, at last, he came face-to-face with a certain being.

“How noble. Human, what is your name?”

“I am…”

The red glow burning in his eyes vanished as if it had been washed away.

The man with cloudy, gray-white eyes was no longer the Black Knight or the Death Knight Lord.

“Lei Fei. That is my name.”

Freed from his long darkness, he raised his head.

The setting sun shining through the clouds cast a reddish hue over his pale skin.

The System notification rang out just as I reached forward to deliver the final blow.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Information about the target has changed.
The changed information is displayed through Qi Sense.
Lv. 120 Lei Fei

"…!"

The unexpected development stopped me cold.

The gray-white eyes of the Death Knight Lord—or rather, Lei Fei—slowly shifted from the sky toward me. The voice that slipped between his lips was hollow and lonely.

"It feels like I've just had a terrible nightmare. No, I almost wish it had been a nightmare."

I had never heard of or seen anything like this before. After staring at him in silence, I spoke.

"Have you come back to your senses?"

"Yes. Only now, at last."

Lei Fei looked down at his hands. They were pale and rotting, with parts of the flesh and bone missing after our fierce battle.

They were also soaked in red blood.

Human blood.

"What have I done?"

The man who had sacrificed his life for humanity had become the commander of a monster army and slaughtered humans.

I could not even begin to imagine how he felt after realizing that terrible truth.

"Lei Fei."

I wanted to tell him. It wasn't your will. The Arch Lich's magic had seized control of your mind.

But Lei Fei shook his head.

"You don't have to say it. I already know what you're trying to tell me. But…"

Lei Fei gestured toward his body and continued.

"I don't think I have much time left."

Everything he said was true. The tough undead body that neither steel nor bullets had been able to pierce was slowly—very slowly—falling apart.

And, paradoxically, what was sustaining Lei Fei now was the mana that still remained within his body.

"It's ridiculous. I became one of the undead and killed humans, yet I'm holding on with that very power."

After muttering hollowly, he spoke to me.

“May I ask one favor?”

“…Please, go ahead.”

I thought Lei Fei wanted Erasure. I assumed he wished to find rest and escape from all his pain.

But the words that slipped from his lips were nothing like what I expected.

“Help me fulfill my mission.”

“…!”

“I swore an oath on the day I became a Hunter. I swore that I would fight monsters until the moment my life ended. That oath still stands.”

Lei Fei had already fulfilled his mission. He had charged forward bravely and shattered magnificently.

When he fought humanity as the Death Knight Lord, he had been acting on the Arch Lich’s will, not his own.

And yet he wanted to fight again. Though his life had already ended, he stood tall once more and reaffirmed his mission.

That was why I had to ask.

“Why? Why go this far?”

Lei Fei smiled faintly.

“What a foolish question.”

“What?”

“Why did you come running here alone, knowing that countless monsters and dangers awaited you? Why am I trying to fight until the very end? What’s the difference?”

“…!”

“You already know the answer. That is all.”

I already knew the answer.

The moment I heard those words, a shiver ran down my spine.

Lei Fei looked at me as I stood speechless, then raised a hand and gestured around us.

The countless monsters still remaining on the battlefield were reflected in his eyes, which had already lost the light of life.

“This…will be my final battle.”

Schlk!

Lei Fei pulled White Flame from his chest and handed it to me, then raised his sword.

Instead of the dazzling aura blade that symbolized an S-rank Hunter, ominous dark mana coiled around the blade and surged upward.

But the one wielding that power was not the Death Knight Lord.

It was a Hunter burning through his final mission.

“I’d like to fight alongside them. But will they allow me?”

Anyone who heard those words without knowing the circumstances would have dismissed them as random nonsense.

But I understood what Lei Fei meant. Lowering White Flame’s spearhead at an angle, I answered.

“They’ll be glad. If they’re the people I know.”

“…You think the same way I do.”

A red light flickered in Lei Fei’s gray-white eyes.

The mana he had dragged forth with all his strength seeped across the battlefield. Then a thunderous cry burst from his lips.

“Public Security Armed Forces Department—!”

And in the next moment—

Rustle. Rattle, rattle.

At the call of the Death Knight Lord—or rather, the head of the Public Security Armed Forces Department—the hundreds of Hunters who had fallen across the battlefield rose to their feet. Returned from death, they gripped their weapons and assembled in one place.

Lei Fei and I stood at their head.

“You take the lead. The living must finish this fight.”

As though bewitched, I stepped forward.

The monster army, thrown into confusion by the unexpected turn of events, finally gathered with savage roars.

They came for the commander who had become their enemy.

And for me, standing at the front.

Step. Step.

I walked forward, slowly but firmly.

Tap. Tap-tap.

Then I gradually picked up speed.

Lei Fei and the hundreds of Public Security Armed Forces Department Hunters resurrected as undead followed behind me.

It did not take long for the ripples to become a wave and crash over the enemy.

And at the entrance to what would be our final battle, Lei Fei shouted at the top of his lungs.

“Wipe them all out!”

It was the same cry that had echoed through the footage.

The Five-Starred Red Flag—their symbol and their pride—shone in the setting sun upon their battered, filthy armor.

With my chest throbbing, I became a streak of light and shot toward the monsters.

Whooooooosh! KRA-DOOM!

Crunch!

How many had I brought down by now?

Hundreds? A thousand?

Slash! Boom!

I had no idea. Like a man possessed, I kept moving forward. I smashed, cut, stabbed, and blew apart everything that stood in my way.

Whooooooosh!

—Kuaaaargh!

—Kraaah!

Blue hellfire surged upward in pillars, and monsters engulfed in flames that would not go out screamed.

Then, when I could no longer hear anything, I suddenly stopped.

“Hah, huff.”

I was out of breath. My mouth felt rough and dry, as if I had chewed and swallowed a handful of sand.

The fatigue I had briefly forgotten came crashing back over me as I looked around.

Across the vast expanse of land, not a single monster remained standing.

Neither the ogres and Trolls that had bellowed their savage cries nor the Wyverns and Gargoyles that had circled overhead.

And…

Thud. Thump!

The Public Security Armed Forces Department Hunters resurrected as undead began to fall as well.

Having fulfilled their final mission, they collapsed one after another like puppets whose strings had been cut.

As I watched them with an emotion I could not put into words, I realized what their collapse meant.

“…Lei Fei!”

He sat in the middle of the silent battlefield. One arm had been severed and his side torn open, yet he waited for me with a peaceful expression.

“You came at just the right time.”

I did not know why, but those simple words made something surge up inside my chest.

We had not even known each other for ten years, yet a curse slipped from my lips before I could stop it.

"Damn it…"

"Don't swear so much. I saw you on television, and it seems to be a habit. Women won't like that, and it's not good for children's education."

Lei Fei let out a quiet laugh. He already knew who I was.

"Is that really the problem right now? There has to be some way…"

—There is no such way, you treacherous human.

The Skeleton Warlord's voice was deeper and more subdued than usual.

Lei Fei stared at him, eyes widening.

"A monster?"

—I am the commander. You are a foolish but somewhat remarkable human.

"A monster, then. I have no idea what's going on, but…yes, if you're Jin Taekyung, I'm sure you'll handle it somehow."

Lei Fei nodded and raised his head toward the sky. His slowly blinking gray-white eyes reflected the sky, now stained entirely red.

"Could you pass along one message?"

I did not ask the foolish question, To whom?

I already knew.

"Tell them I love them. And tell them I'm sorry I couldn't come home."

It was the final message a dead man left for his family.

My chest churning, I answered.

"…I will."

"Thank you. You're a good person."

Lei Fei smiled faintly and tapped my shoulder with his one remaining hand.

With a dry, crumbling sound, his fingers broke apart into dust. Soon, his arm, his leg, his chest…

At the very end, one last sentence slipped between his lips.

"Go west. End this war."

Whoooooosh.

The wind blew. The hero, reduced to a handful of dust, scattered into the air.

As I stared blankly at the sight, dozens of planes appeared in my field of vision, flying toward us in formation.

Chapter 403

The twenty-odd military transport planes and the fighter jets escorting them ran into trouble before they could even land.

“W-What the…”

“We can’t find a landing site!”

Below them lay a small city reduced entirely to ruins.

The buildings packed tightly together had collapsed like dominoes, and flames rose from here and there.

But what frightened the pilots most was the horrific sight visible even from far above.

Schoolyards, convenience stores, government offices… In a place where peaceful daily life had vanished, mountains of corpses and rivers of red blood filled the void.

A vision of hell painted by the monster army.

As the pilots trembled with indescribable terror at the lifeless ground below, a voice rang out.

“Land.”

“C-Commander-in-Chief, but…”

“No buts. You will land. That is an order.”

The pilot took one look at the middle-aged man’s stony face and realized he had no choice.

He was a soldier, and the man before him was the de facto commander-in-chief directing this war.

Disobeying General Wei Fenghu—the Minister of National Defense under the Central Military Commission and Chairman Xiao’s most trusted confidant—would have been madness.

Then Wei Fenghu spoke again, and the pilot decided that disobedience might actually be the less insane option.

“Head for the general hospital the Western Front has been using as its temporary headquarters.”

“What? But that’s…”

“According to the last communication we received, that was where the fiercest fighting took place. It may still be going on.”

“…”

“I know that as well as you do. We may already be too late. But we have to go. If even one person is still alive, we must help them and fight alongside them.”

Wei Fenghu continued, his eyes grave.

“Take the controls. And land first.”

It was extraordinary enough that the commander-in-chief had come all the way here himself. Now he was ordering his plane to land first. With monsters potentially still in the area, the risk was enormous.

Damn it.

The pilot squeezed his eyes shut and switched on the radio. His trembling voice soon spread across the communications network to every aircraft.

"VIP-777 to all aircraft. I repeat, VIP-777 to all aircraft…"

As he listened to his orders being relayed, Wei Fenghu slowly drew a deep breath.

The parachute strapped to his body in case of an emergency felt as heavy as a massive boulder.

Is it because this is my first real battle in more than thirty years? I'm trembling.

And Wei Fenghu was not the only one.

All four thousand Hunters aboard the twenty-odd military transports carried fears of their own.

Some probably wanted to run away that very instant. Others were suppressing their fear and desperately trying to stoke their will to fight.

No one knew who would die in the battle about to begin. Wei Fenghu was no exception. The reason he had risked coming to the fiercest part of the battlefield despite being the commander-in-chief was simple: the morale of his soldiers.

A commander who sends only his subordinates to their deaths has no right to command.

That had been Wei Fenghu's lifelong principle, and Lei Fei—his nephew and as good as a son to him—had respected him for it.

The sudden memory of that beloved face sent an ache through the old general's heart.

"…I miss you."

Wei Fenghu murmured quietly.

It had already been fifteen days since Lei Fei had gone missing. But he had not let go of hope. Neither had Lei Fei's wife and daughter, who had been moved to a safe place.

Today, I saw someone who reminded me of you.

A young man who was still only in his twenties. He had achieved an incredible military feat in a distant foreign land, and when he heard that the Western Front was in danger, he had left without hesitation.

He had even laughed while attempting a teleport with a survival rate of only ten percent.

"Ten percent sounds pretty good."

"It's probably a thousand times higher than the odds of crossing dimensions."

When Magic Johnson relayed those words, Wei Fenghu had immediately mobilized the command headquarters' forces and assembled the squadron.

He had been deeply moved by the courage shown by Jin Taekyung, a young foreigner, and the sight of him had brought his missing nephew to mind.

You would have done the same, wouldn't you?

Just as Wei Fenghu's lips curved into a faint smile after asking the silent question, a cry rang out.

"H-How can this be…!"

"C-Commander-in-Chief!"

Wei Fenghu raised his head at their urgent shouts and looked out the window.

As the ground drew closer, a sea of corpses and blood came into view, more horrific than any battlefield he had ever witnessed.

Corpses and blood. Blood and corpses…

The general hospital serving as the Western Front's temporary headquarters lay in ruins, its twisted steel framework exposed. A gigantic sinkhole gaped like the entrance to hell, and dozens of craters carved into the ground brimmed with red and green blood.

Monster and human corpses lay tangled together in numbers too vast to count.

Thousands?

No. Well over ten thousand.

"My God…"

"W-Who did this?"

A land of death raked by disaster.

The pilots stared speechlessly at the devastated ground until Wei Fenghu's shout jolted them back to their senses.

"Lower our altitude! Quickly!"

"Yes, sir!"

The threat from the monsters had vanished, but they could not afford to let their guard down.

The pilot maneuvered the aircraft more carefully than ever, his entire body drenched in cold sweat as he attempted the landing.

Krrrrrrk, boom!

The aircraft shuddered violently several times. At last, when the transport successfully landed, the first person to step out was none other than Wei Fenghu.

Tat-tat-tat!

The two hundred Hunters aboard the transport quickly poured out behind him.

Their reactions fell into two categories.

"This is fucking insane…"

Shock at a sight beyond anything they had imagined.

"Urk… Urrrgh!"

Nausea from the stench of blood filling the air and the dismembered corpses strewn everywhere.

And through it all, one question filled every mind.

Who did this?

They had even forgotten they were supposed to search for survivors. Wei Fenghu and everyone else stood frozen like statues.

Then—

Splash. Splash.

Footsteps echoed across the silent battlefield.

Two hundred pairs of eyes turned toward a lone figure crossing the field, wading through pools of blood.

The man was drenched in green blood from head to toe. Wei Fenghu stared at him and groaned out a name.

"Mr. Jin…?"

It was definitely him.

Though he looked like a man made of blood, Wei Fenghu recognized him.

Jin Taekyung had survived a Teleport spell with only a ten-percent survival rate, overturned a hopeless battle, and lived.

His seemingly endless steps finally came to a halt before Wei Fenghu.

Splash.

Jin Taekyung brushed back the hair clotted together with the monsters' sticky blood. After a long silence, he spoke his first words.

"The battle is over. There are… no monsters left alive."

"…!"

"…!"

That unbelievable declaration sent a shudder through everyone present.

According to the Western Front's final transmission, the monster army had numbered a staggering ten thousand.

And that was not all. A Death Knight Lord believed to be one of the Arch Lich's closest servants had personally entered the battle, making this the most overwhelming offensive of the five fronts.

By contrast, barely a thousand Hunters had stood against them. The remaining People's Liberation Army troops might as well have been made of paper.

Not only did he win that battle—he annihilated a monster army of ten thousand.

It was a battle that would have been impossible without one man.

And a victory made possible because that one man had been there.

An S-rank Hunter was said to be a strategic weapon capable of overturning an entire battlefield in an instant. But since the Great Cataclysm, who had ever accomplished something like this?

The two hundred Hunters gazed at the young man before them in awe.

But Wei Fenghu was different.

The old general stared at Jin Taekyung with grief and fear in his eyes.

No—not at Jin Taekyung himself.

At the sword in his hand.

Wei Fenghu knew that sword all too well, which only made the pain in his heart worse.

He knew what its presence meant.

"Did you… meet him?"

After a brief silence, Jin Taekyung answered.

"He asked me to pass along his love."

"…!"

"He also said he was sorry."

Wei Fenghu clenched his teeth against the sob rising in his throat. Through his tear-clouded vision, he heard one final sentence.

"He was the best Hunter I've ever seen."

That was all.

Plip, plip. Tears rolled down Wei Fenghu's wrinkled face.

A breeze blew from somewhere and gently wrapped around him.

Rank, achievements, whether someone was a Hunter or not—none of it mattered.

The fact that he had sacrificed himself for someone else was enough to make him worthy of being called a hero.

That was why Lei Fei would remain in my memory for a long time.

A man resurrected as an undead who died as a human.

He had fulfilled his mission to the very end. He was a true Hunter and a true hero.

The countless others who had died here today were no different.

And neither were the two people who had yet to regain consciousness.

The healer said they wouldn't wake up until they'd recovered from their exhaustion.

Remembering what the healer who had stopped by earlier had told me, I looked at Team Leader Choi and Xiao Shen, both sunk in a deep sleep.

Thanks to the Top-Grade Potion, their injuries had vanished as if they had never existed. But the fatigue accumulated in their bodies and minds was a separate matter.

Even I occasionally pass out, and I level up.

The two of them had fought bravely to the very end.

They had held on to their weapons even while enduring the pain of having their limbs severed.

“Heroes… heroes, huh.”

I muttered under my breath and looked at the sword lying beside me.

The sword left behind by that very hero. His keepsake.

Wei Fenghu had wept without end as he returned it to me despite my repeated refusal.

“He would have wanted you to keep it too, Mr. Jin.”

Really, Lei Fei?

I ran my fingers over the blade as I asked a question that would never receive an answer.

It was a magnificent sword, its chilling edge apparent at a glance.

Item appraisal.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Item Window
Hero’s Soul
Type: Sword
Grade: Supreme Peak
Restriction: Those worthy of being called heroes
Description: Extremely hard and sharp. The final soul of a noble hero dwells within it, and those who meet its qualifications can draw out even greater power.

Hero’s Soul?

It was a fitting name for Lei Fei, but the sword was certainly strange.

Its Supreme Peak Grade made sense, considering it had survived that fierce battle without so much as a hairline crack. The restriction, however, was unique.

Only someone with an upright character can use it?

Hmm. Might as well put it to the test.

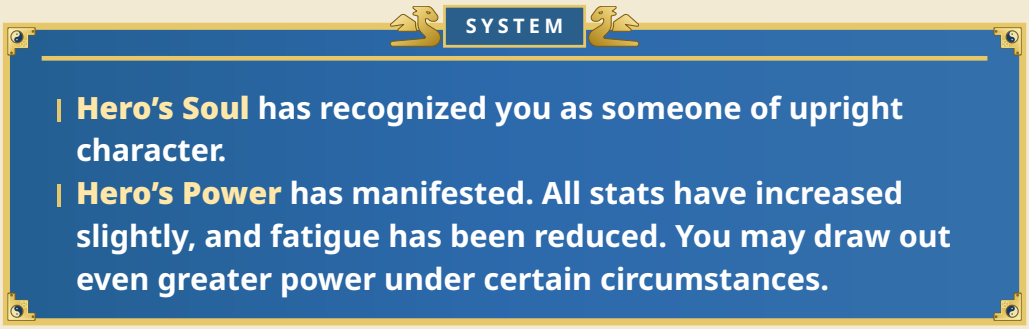
Without hesitation, I gripped the hilt and slashed downward through the air.

Whoosh!

Better than I expected.

The weight and balance were perfect, and I liked how its edge seemed sharp enough to split the wind itself. The System notification that immediately followed was the icing on the cake.

Ding.



I had no idea what those certain circumstances were, but apparently this wasn't one of them. The increase in my stats was so tiny I couldn't feel it at all.

It was like adding a single bucket of water to a lake.

Still, it would be perfect for judging someone's character.

A character-testing sword.

From now on, I would test everyone who approached me with Hero's Soul. If the sword accepted them, I'd keep them close. If it didn't, I'd cut them down, root and branch—snip…

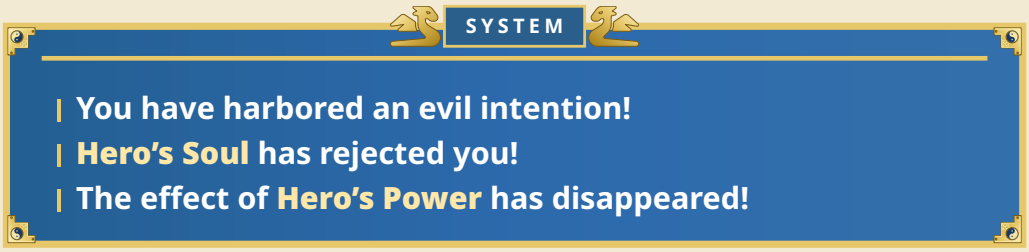
Crackle!

A powerful electric current suddenly shot through my hand, and I dropped the sword.

"What the hell?"

As bewilderment washed over me, a sharp alarm sounded and a System message appeared in the air.

Beep!



"…"

Come on. It was just a passing thought.

I looked down at the fallen sword and let out a short laugh. It suddenly occurred to me that perhaps a little of Lei Fei's soul really did linger within it.

Wait. If that was true…

"Are you listening?"

After a brief silence, the Skeleton Warlord, currently stored inside my Inventory, answered.

"…I am."

"I wanted to ask you something."

"…If your question concerns whether that sword is an Ego Sword, the answer is no. Only the faintest trace of a soul remains within it. The human you are thinking of has already ceased to exist."

He usually had a screw loose, but he was still a Named Monster and the commander of an army of the dead.

He had absorbed some of the magical power scattered during Lei Fei's Erasure and grown even stronger, so there was a good chance he was right.

That aside…

"Is something wrong?"

"Hmm?"

"You've seemed gloomy for a while."

Even as I said it, I wondered if the question made any sense. Why was I asking an undead monster why he seemed gloomy? Weren't they gloomy by nature?

The problem is, he doesn't usually act like this.

But then the Skeleton Warlord suddenly spoke.

"A thought occurred to me."

"What thought?"

"What kind of being was I in the past?"

"…!"

"I have no memories at all. Although the human named Lei Fei has ceased to exist, this commander was secretly envious of him. At least he learned who he was."

I hadn't expected him to be thinking about something like that.

After considering it for a moment, I spoke in a warm voice.

"Then should I erase you too?"

"…!"

"What? You said you were envious."

"N-No, that isn't what I meant…"

The Skeleton Warlord's frantic explanation was cut short by a knock and a polite voice from beyond the door.

"Mr. Jin. Comrade Minister of State would like to see you."

It seemed it was already time.

"Yes. I'll be right there."

I took one last look at the two sleeping figures, then rose from my seat. As I did, I murmured the words I hadn't managed to say earlier.

"Well, if you ask me, you were probably a pretty decent guy."

"…Huh? Were you talking to this commander?"

"No. Just talking to myself."

“Ahem. Right?”

But the sudden brightness in the Skeleton Warlord’s previously dejected voice was definitely not my imagination.

I let out a quiet laugh and left the room.

Chapter 404

“Whew.”

Night had fallen, pitch-black.

The moment he returned, the young man threw off his equipment and dropped heavily into a seat. As he struggled to catch his breath, a middle-aged man approached and handed him a drink.

“You look exhausted. Drink this.”

The two men had bonded somewhat on the way here over their shared status as Hunters drafted from Shanxi Province.

The young man recognized the familiar face and eyed the can in the middle-aged man’s hand, then muttered dubiously.

“Did this come from the supplies? I don’t think I’ve seen this drink before.”

“It came in with the foreign relief supplies. It’s not from our country.”

“Hmm. Got anything carbonated?”

“If you don’t want it, forget it.”

The middle-aged man began to withdraw his hand, but the young man quickly grabbed it and spoke with a solemn expression.

“Sir. Have I ever told you that canned ration drinks are my favorite thing in the world?”

“No.”

“Then you’re about to learn.”

“Good. That’s the spirit.”

“I’ll enjoy it.”

Click.

The young man opened the can and took a sip. His expression changed subtly, but before he could say anything, the middle-aged man asked him a question.

“You’re coming back from searching Sector Three, aren’t you?”

“…Urk. Yes.”

“Must’ve been rough.”

The young man answered with a shrug. His bare upper body was drenched in cold sweat that had yet to dry, and green blood was splattered across his cheek.

“Monster blood. Did you get into a fight?”

“No. I was passing a building when a damn Gargoyle corpse fell. Must’ve been caught on the roof.”

“That must’ve caused quite a commotion.”

“Do you even have to ask? The rookies with only a year or two under their belts started puking and pissing themselves the moment they got covered in blood.”

"And you?"

"I may not look it, but I've been a Hunter for seven years. I didn't even blink."

The middle-aged man's gaze slowly drifted toward a particular part of the young man's body. He stared at the faint stain on his navy-blue pants, then nodded.

"Hmm. I see."

"…It's sweat."

"I didn't say anything. But looking at you is somehow making my eyes sweat."

"…Actually, I did piss a little. Is it obvious?"

"Yep."

"Damn it."

The middle-aged man silently watched him swear and tip back the can, then abruptly asked, "Did you find any survivors?"

"…!"

"So it was the same on your side."

The young man's expression stiffened the instant the words left the man's mouth. The middle-aged man let out a sigh.

He had already taken part in one search himself.

It had been a truly nightmarish experience.

Everywhere he looked, bodies torn apart by monsters lay piled high, and the horrific stench made his head feel as if it would split open.

Neither of them would ever forget what they had seen that day.

"…I can't even imagine how fierce the battle must've been."

"You don't need to. Whatever you imagine, it was worse."

The four thousand Hunters who had come here with Minister of National Defense Wei Fenghu had been divided according to their units and sent to search the small city. Every piece of search equipment they used kept producing the same result.

No survivors.

Aside from the three thousand People's Liberation Army soldiers who had fled in terror at the start of the battle, everyone lay cold and dead. No one yet knew how many of the cowardly deserters scattered across the region had survived.

"At this rate, we can't even call it a casualty count. A death toll would be more accurate…"

"Watch what you say. We don't know that yet."

"Mm. I'm sorry. I spoke carelessly."

"As long as you understand. And…"

The middle-aged man cut off the young man's thoughtless remark and continued.

"Casualty count is the right term. There are survivors."

"…Oh."

The young man remembered the three people he had momentarily forgotten—the three who had survived this gruesome hell.

“You mean the regimental commander of the Public Security Armed Forces Department? That young fellow?”

“That’s right. The young man from Korea survived too.”

“And then there’s…”

The first two had certainly acted heroically, but compared to the last survivor, they were no more than fireflies before the sun.

The young man swallowed hard, and the middle-aged man finished for him.

“Yes, that man. No—that person survived too.”

Unmistakable awe filled his voice. He felt no discomfort referring to someone far younger than himself as “that person,” because he knew just how extraordinary the man’s achievements had been.

“Can you believe it? That a single Hunter could be that strong?”

He was a seasoned Hunter himself. That meant he could at least vaguely imagine what sort of monsters S-rank Hunters were.

But Jin Taekyung’s feats had been so incredible that it was hard to believe they were the work of a Hunter—or even a human being.

“It was a monster army nearly ten thousand strong. There were two Death Knights, and even a Death Knight Lord said to be as strong as an S-rank Hunter, if not stronger.”

The middle-aged man rattled on, his voice brimming with excitement.

“And how many allied Hunters were there? A mere thousand. The People’s Liberation Army was there too, but even they…”

“Nearly half of them fled when the front line collapsed. The rest fought bravely, but the monsters slaughtered them. I heard about it too.”

“How many Hunters do you think were left when Jin Taekyung arrived? A thousand? No, I’d stake my life that fewer than half were still alive!”

Had he witnessed the situation when Jin Taekyung arrived, the shock might have sent him into cardiac arrest.

Even this man, who revered Jin so deeply, had never imagined that Jin Taekyung had faced the monster army alone.

“He led hundreds of exhausted, wounded Hunters and annihilated a monster army more than ten times their size! Do you think that makes any sense?”

The young man gave him a deeply skeptical look.

“I don’t think it does.”

“Exactly. But that person did it!”

“Uh, sir. Sorry to rain on your parade, but none of that has actually been confirmed yet, has it?”

"What?"

"I think Jin Taekyung…"

"Not Jin Taekyung. Mr. Jin!"

The middle-aged man's eyes bulged as he barked the correction. The young man flinched and cleared his throat.

"Ahem. I mean, I admit that Mr. Jin is incredibly strong, but I can't help thinking the story might be a little exaggerated."

"Exaggerated? You saw the marks left on the battlefield and you can still say that? If it wasn't Mr. Jin, then who…"

"Come on, don't get so worked up. Try looking at this objectively. If everything you're saying is true, then Mr. Jin is stronger than Faye Chen or Wu Heixing."

"I have no interest in ranking them, but judging by their accomplishments during this Monster Wave, Mr. Jin clearly comes first. So?"

"Faye Chen may be from Hong Kong, but she's a hero who accomplished countless great feats during the Great Cataclysm. And for all the trouble Wu Heixing causes, he's still a true genius born of Zhonghua.[1935] Jin Taekyung surpassing both of them? That crosses the line."

The middle-aged man stared at him with equal parts disbelief and contempt.

"You're the one who crossed the line."

"What?"

"Is that really all you have to say? You shout that Zhonghua is number one, then belittle the hero who won us a great victory and saved our people?"

The young man's face twisted.

"Since you brought it up, Jin Taekyung only saved two people today. No, one of them was Korean, so he only saved one of our people. And that man was perfectly fine, without a single wound. He fought to protect his own countrymen, that's all. You don't seriously think he used a Top-Grade Potion, do you?"

"There's no point talking to you. Instead of praising him, this is how you repay him? I wonder what Mr. Jin would say if he heard…"

The middle-aged man shook his head and rose from his seat.

At that moment, a voice spoke behind them.

"Maybe he would've said you were a fucking asshole who wasn't worth helping."

"…!"

"…!"

The two men spun around in shock at the voice that had approached without a sound.

Before them stood a man whose face they knew well from television and the media.

[1935] Zhonghua is a literary and patriotic term for China and Chinese civilization.

“Hic.”

The young man stared up at someone a full head taller than him and began to hiccup.

“J-J-J-J-J-Jin!”

The middle-aged man stuttered as though he were buffering.

Jin Taekyung regarded the two of them with a friendly smile.

“Young man, stop hiccupping unless you want to become a good Chinese person. And you, sir, stop the earthquake—unless you’re planning to bring down the Arch Lich with a massive one.”

“Hic—gulp.”

“A-Are you really him?”

Jin Taekyung nodded slightly.

“I was going to keep walking, but then I heard something particularly irritating.”

“…Th-That…”

Jin Taekyung turned to the source of that irritating noise, who had stopped hiccupping and begun trembling like a leaf.

“How old are you?”

“I-I’m twenty-nine.”

“You’re older than me. I’ll speak casually.”

“…What?”

“What?”

“N-Nothing.”

The young man had no grounds to complain even if Jin Taekyung cursed him out, let alone spoke casually to him.

He had only ever seen Jin Taekyung from a distance or in passing. Now that he realized Jin had heard everything he had said, his hands and feet began to tingle, and his vision went white.

“I-I’m sorry.”

“You don’t need to apologize. That’s how talking behind someone’s back works. I understand.”

“Th-Thank you.”

Just as Jin Taekyung’s gentle smile began to melt the young man’s heart, he continued.

“Nothing to thank me for. Talking shit is fun while you’re doing it, but when you get caught, you’re fucked.”

“…!”

“There should be someone behind me right now. See him?”

Slowly—very slowly—the young man shifted his gaze.

Sure enough, a little over ten meters[1936] away, a middle-aged man with the face of a demon was radiating a terrifying aura in his direction.

"They say he's an A-rank Hunter with the Central Military Commission. He must have found your story very interesting, because he keeps bowing to me. Run over and put a pain-relief patch on him."

"Y-Yes, sir!"

The young man answered with a shriek and dashed over, only to let out a real scream when a mana-infused kick caught him in the shin.

Jin Taekyung laughed quietly at the sight and started to leave, then suddenly stopped.

"Ah, there's one thing you're mistaken about."

"M-Me?"

The middle-aged man, still half-dazed, snapped back to his senses.

"I'm sorry, but what would that be?"

"I didn't do it alone."

"What?"

"Everyone fought like hell. By the time I got there, the battle was almost over. Make sure you tell the others that too."

"Is that really true?"

"Of course. Oh, do you have a family?"

"Yes. Three daughters and five sons…"

"You're quite the patriot. In a few years, you'll have enough for a soccer team."

Jin Taekyung thought for a moment, then abruptly asked, "You're not assigned to a combat unit, are you?"

"…You could tell right away."

The middle-aged man lowered his head in embarrassment.

"As you can see, I'm an E-rank Hunter, so I was excluded from combat. I'll probably be assigned to tally the casualties."

"Then could I ask you one favor?"

"It would be my honor, Mr. Jin."

"Please add one person to the list of the dead. You won't find his body, so I'm asking you to make a special exception."

"What is his name?"

"Lei Fei. Lei Fei."

Those were Jin Taekyung's final words to him.

The middle-aged man remained rooted in place, staring after Jin for a long time before finally releasing the breath he had been holding.

[1936] A little over ten meters is a little over 33 feet.

He felt certain that Jin Taekyung's expression the last time he saw him would remain etched in his memory for a long time.

What was that look in his eyes…?

The resolve to see something through, no matter what.

The middle-aged man, who had been singing Jin Taekyung's praises moments before, picked up the can the young man had left behind and took a swallow to wet his throat.

Then he grimaced at its indescribable flavor.

"Ptooey!"

Burdian?

It seemed to be a Korean drink, but it tasted god-awful.

"You're here, Mr. Jin."

Wei Fenghu was not the only one waiting for me.

Five monitors stood inside the conference room, each displaying a seated S-rank Hunter.

I spoke calmly.

"Let's go end this war."

At long last, it was time to eliminate the culprit behind all of this.

Chapter 405

"The operation will commence tomorrow at 06:30. Every front is to carry out its assigned orders without fail."

Pop.

With those final words from Wei Fenghu, the Minister of National Defense, the meeting ended.

Lee Jungryong, Vice Guild Master of Ares Guild, leaned back in his chair and stared at the five monitors that had gone dark.

Things are moving quickly. Far more quickly than I expected.

This was not a war that would end easily, nor was it a war that should end so easily.

China was both a Hunter powerhouse with an enormous number of Hunters and a closed-off country. It was also one of the few countries where Ares Guild, which had extended its reach across the world through its mercenary business, had failed to establish a proper foothold.

That was why Lee Jungryong did not want China to remain stable. The more damage China suffered, the wider the cracks he could exploit.

More than a million casualties? Hundreds of trillions of won[1937] in property damage?

What did any of that matter? This Monster Wave might have been a disaster for some, but for Lee Jungryong, it was an opportunity.

But…

Once again, Jin Taekyung is the problem.

Lee Jungryong raised a finger and slowly tapped the table.

He had always known that the world did not move according to plan, but lately, whenever Jin Taekyung blocked his path at every turn, the same thought kept surfacing.

He's dangerous.

The interest Lee Jungryong had felt when he first learned of Jin Taekyung's existence had long since vanished without a trace.

If a child who had barely reached an adult's waist suddenly shot up within a few months and met that adult's gaze head-on, the adult could not help but be unsettled.

And what if the child was still growing?

He'll only become more dangerous.

If the Arch Lich's rampage had been an opportunity for Lee Jungryong, it had given Jin Taekyung wings.

[1937] Roughly 100–900 trillion won is about $71–640 billion or €65–580 billion.

The man had achieved incredible feats in battle and now stood in the global spotlight.

Another war had produced a new hero, just like the heroes born amid the chaos of the Great Cataclysm.

People fear the strong even as they envy them, but heroes are worshiped.

Lee Jungryong knew that better than anyone. And if this war ended because of Jin Taekyung's exploits—if that happened—then…

Crack.

The tip of his finger, infused with aura, had already bored through the solid wood and reduced it to powder.

Lee Jungryong silently looked down at the table, its center punched clean through.

For now, it was only a small hole. But if it continued to grow, it would soon become impossible to control. He had to fill it before the table collapsed.

"Send in the Head of Security."

At Lee Jungryong's quiet order, someone waiting outside the door left to carry it out.

Before long, the door opened and a familiar figure stepped inside.

"You called for me?"

Jin Taekyung was not the only one who had changed in such a short time.

Go Jun, Lee Jungryong's right hand and Head of Security, had changed a great deal as well.

A dark light lay deep in his eyes, and his voice had grown dry. A few people who knew the circumstances whispered that after losing to Jin Taekyung, his already hard expression had turned even gloomier.

Lee Jungryong disagreed.

"You look well."

"I've made a little progress."

"Too much modesty is unbecoming. You accomplished a great deal on today's battlefield as well. You deserve the praise."

"…Thank you."

The monster army's sudden assault on five fronts had left enormous casualties, but the northern front under Lee Jungryong's command had been the sole exception.

The Ares Guild elites, who had conserved their strength by hanging back in previous battles, slaughtered the monster army. Go Jun had also single-handedly killed two Death Knights that had served as the monsters' leaders.

"What were our losses?"

“Eleven severely injured and forty-six lightly injured. No deaths. The severely injured will need more time to recover, but the others have already been fully healed.”

The more than four thousand casualties among the other Hunters and soldiers did not enter their calculations.

Lee Jungryong asked, and Go Jun answered. To the two of them, only Ares Guild counted as allies.

“It’s unfortunate about the commander, though. To die such an untimely death. He was quite a tough man…”

As Lee Jungryong trailed off, a gloomy light flickered in the depths of Go Jun’s eyes.

“I’m sorry. I tried to stop them with everything I had, but there were simply too many monsters.”

“It couldn’t be helped. Did you recover the body?”

“It was too badly mangled, so we had no choice but to cremate him. The staff officers who died with him were treated the same way.”

“Well done. Ah, you know Lieutenant General Wang Ochun has been appointed the new commander, don’t you?”

“Yes. I was just on my way back from meeting him.”

Only a handful of people, including Lee Jungryong, knew that Lieutenant General Wang Ochun and Go Jun had met before.

For several years, the two had occasionally shared meals at secluded safe houses. Each time, the trunk of Lieutenant General Wang Ochun’s sedan grew heavier.

“What did he have to say?”

“He said he looked forward to working with me.”

A faint smile touched Lee Jungryong’s lips.

“Of course. You’re comrades who will be fighting together.”

By now, Wang Ochun was probably delighted to have been entrusted with such an important post. He had no idea that this entire chain of events was anything but simple good fortune.

Nor did he know that his tough predecessor, now reduced to a handful of ashes, had been preparing a report on Ares Guild’s lackluster performance in battle.

“Watch over him carefully. We can’t afford to lose our commander twice, can we?”

“Understood.”

Anything could happen on a battlefield.

A commander on poor terms with someone might be torn to pieces by monsters, while a corrupt general with a fondness for money might be appointed in his place.

Now in a considerably better mood, Lee Jungryong continued.

“You’ll have a hard time starting tomorrow, so get plenty of rest tonight.”

“What do you mean by that…?”

“We’ve been ordered to advance with all possible speed and sweep away the remaining monsters.”

“Mobile warfare, then. Was that order issued to every front?”

Lee Jungryong nodded.

Beginning tomorrow morning, the five fronts, including the northern front, would commence mobile warfare. Within a few days, they would cut off the monster army’s retreat and tighten an encirclement around it.

“They must have taken considerable losses as well, but their numbers will still be formidable.”

“What do you think this country has more of than anything else? Even now, hundreds of transport planes are carrying Hunters in from all across China. Even low-ranking Hunters will make useful arrow fodder.”

Lee Jungryong spoke calmly, then continued.

“Focus on minimizing the Guild’s losses. Just in case…”

His gaze deepened as it settled on the table.

“There may come a time when you have to fill a hole.”

“…I’ll keep that in mind.”

The meaning was unclear, but to Go Jun, Lee Jungryong was both a revered Master and as good as a god.

Without questioning him, Go Jun silently nodded. Then he suddenly realized that he had forgotten to ask something important.

“Where is our final destination?”

Instead of answering, Lee Jungryong raised a hand and pointed at the map of Sichuan Province that covered the wall.

Pshk!

A blast of wind shot from his fingertip and pierced one section of the map. Go Jun’s gaze fell on the place-name written beside the hole.

Suining City.

The place where this entire catastrophe had begun.

The Arch Lich was there.

At dawn the next day, everyone who woke found themselves divided into two groups.

Those who were leaving and those who were staying.

Naturally, I belonged to the former group, while Team Leader Choi and Xiao Shen belonged to the latter.

Only when our departure was imminent did the two of them finally regain consciousness—and immediately start protesting the fact that they were being left behind.

"Mr. Jin. I'm perfectly fine."

"I'm perfectly fine, hyung[1938]!"

"I can fight."

"I'm confident I can fight harder than anyone!"

…What is this, an echo?

As I looked at Team Leader Choi and Xiao Shen shouting with stiff expressions, I had no choice but to make them an offer.

"Hmm. If you can last ten minutes against me, I'll take you along."

"…"

"…"

"Is that what you call an offer, you shameless, wicked human?"

Shameless, my ass.

If anything, those two were the shameless ones. They could barely run properly, yet they wanted me to take them onto a battlefield.

It was good that they were burning with fighting spirit, but heading into battle in their current condition was a surefire way to get themselves killed.

And what kind of undead talks about conscience?

Why, I oughta…

After making that threat in my head, I addressed the two thoroughly dejected men.

"For now, focus on recovering. If you spend the next few days getting your feel back and your stamina returns, you might be deployed to the front then. That goes for you too, Shen—not just Team Leader Choi."

"Hmm."

"Hmmmm."

They still did not look happy, but at least they seemed somewhat resigned.

Both of them knew what condition their bodies were in. They could not keep insisting forever.

"Then I'd better get going… Ah."

I had forgotten something.

Pretending to rummage through my bag enchanted with space-expansion magic, I pulled out the item I had stored in my Inventory and held it toward Xiao Shen.

"Here."

Xiao Shen blinked.

[1938] Hyung is a Korean form of address used by a man for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

"…Hyung[1939]?"

"What are you waiting for? Take it. My arm's going to fall off."

Xiao Shen reflexively accepted it and stared at me in confusion.

"What is this?"

"A gift. Someone I know entrusted it to me, but I think you should have it."

"A sword this fine?"

"Why? You don't want it?"

"No, that's not it. I'm just not sure I should accept something like this…"

Xiao Shen hurriedly waved his hands, then gazed almost dreamily at Hero's Soul as he gripped its hilt.

Its weight distribution and balance were close to perfect, and the transparent blade gleamed with unmistakable sharpness.

He swallowed hard.

"Can I really accept this?"

"I'm not giving it to you for no reason. I'm giving it to you because you qualify."

"I qualify…?"

"That's right."

The courage he had shown in the last battle. His sacrifice for someone else.

That was enough.

Besides, I had been using a spear for years. If I kept the sword, it would only rot away in my Inventory.

Xiao Shen, another Chinese member of the Public Security Armed Forces Department, was a more fitting owner than I was.

And since nothing happened when he grabbed the hilt, I guess the sword has accepted him too.

The Skeleton Warlord grumbled quietly.

"This commander is good with a sword too… This commander likes swords…"

Huh? What was that?

It was hard to hear the words of a loser who had secretly grabbed Hero's Soul from my Inventory at dawn and screamed.

"…Hmph, forget it. A cheap sword like that is unworthy of this commander!"

"…"

What is he talking about? Someone who wants it more than you is sitting quietly right here.

Since I was thinking about it anyway, I discreetly glanced at Team Leader Choi.

[1939] Hyung is a Korean form of address used by a man for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

Truthfully, I had agonized until the very end over whether to give Hero’s Soul to Xiao Shen or Team Leader Choi.

Team Leader Choi was human too, after all. He might have felt hurt.

But apparently, all that concern had been for nothing.

“Congratulations, Regimental Commander Shen. That is truly an excellent sword.”

At Team Leader Choi’s sincere congratulations, Xiao Shen finally came to his senses and looked back and forth between him and Hero’s Soul.

Conflict flickered in his eyes, but a bright smile soon spread across his face.

“I don’t think I’m the one this sword belongs to.”

“…?”

“Mr. Choi, would you accept this sword in my place?”

I had not expected that.

Still…

That’s nice to see.

Team Leader Choi politely refused in his confusion, but Xiao Shen had already made up his mind, and his resolve proved stronger.

As I watched the two of them pass the sword back and forth, I quietly slipped out of the ward and started walking.

Before I closed the door, Team Leader Choi’s voice reached my ears.

“Of all the swords I’ve ever seen, I like this one the most.”

Right. Then that settled it.

I strode through the ranks of the troops who had already assembled.

The wall of people parted before me amid looks of awe.

Chapter 406

The age of the Great Cataclysm, which began with the descent of the Demon King Asmodeus, had been grim and chaotic. But humanity survived the crisis, swiftly repaired the damage, and built a civilization even more advanced than before.

Still, for some people, certain things mattered more than mana-stone elevators or healing potions.

“The internet got faster.”

The man who muttered those words in a reverent voice adjusted his glasses.

It was 11:30 a.m. Behind him, the ramen he had just dropped into the pot bubbled away, while cold rice and sour kimchi waited on the table.

Everything was ready. In exactly three minutes, he would add one—no, two—A-grade jumbo eggs he had agonized over buying during a supermarket sale. Then, after two more minutes, the perfect lunch would be complete.

And until then, the boredom would be solved by the marvelous modern civilization known as the smartphone.

“Let’s seeee, today’s news…”

Humming, the man skimmed the screen of his smartphone.

The main page of Hunter University, a massive online forum he frequented, had been updated with new top posts ranked by popularity.

1. [Victory report after victory report—is the monster army already as good as shattered? The UN Security Council issues an official statement: “Humanity is strong. But the war is not over yet. We must not let our guard down until the very end.”]
2. [The Miracle of Sichuan Province. Jin Taekyung stood at the center of it all.]
3. [National prestige rises by the day as a new hero is born. K-pop and kimchi sales skyrocket.]
4. [Scheduled Korea–US summit to proceed… President Doramp makes a startling statement at an official event: “Is this Jin Taekyung’s country? He’s my idol.”]
5. [Ares Guild continues its string of victories. Truly living up to its reputation.]
6. [Chinese Chairman Xiao Yang: “Every one of them is a hero.”]
7. [Maesaeng-i.com Translation: Overseas netizens react to the current situation. “Who the hell is this ‘Lady of the House’[1940] Koreans keep killing every chance they get?”]

[1940] Jumo is a traditional form of address for a tavern keeper or female host. Calling for the jumo is also a Korean online expression of excitement at a patriotic success; the headline’s imagined foreign commenter mistakes it for a person Koreans keep attacking.

8. [Japanese Prime Minister Maigumi Shinjiro: “The Monster Wave must be handled in a Fun, Cool, and Sexy manner.” When a reporter asked what that meant, he grinned and replied, “Explaining it wouldn’t be sexy.”]
9. [Russian President Furin: “To me, Shinjiro is like quantum mechanics. No matter how much I look at him, I can’t understand him.”]
10. [Web-novel author becomes a prophet: exclusive interview with Zerobic. “How do I feel right now? I’m still stunned. Since we’re on the subject, I’ll be taking a break today.” During the interview, his enraged editor burst in and injured him badly enough to require twelve weeks of treatment, resulting in an unexpected hiatus. Though bleeding, Zerobic smiled and said he was happy to be able to rest. His editor, Mr. Lee, wept. “He isn’t human.”]

.

.

.

“Wow. This place is going absolutely nuts. Absolutely nuts.”

A smile tugged at the muttering man’s lips. No matter how far he scrolled, everything was about Jin Taekyung.

There seemed to be a few strange articles mixed in here and there, but simply reading them filled him with pride.

The comment section was already on the verge of exploding.

> ㄴThe activity here is insane lately. I’ve been on Hunter University since elementary school, but I’ve never seen it this heated before;; ㄴThe truly insane one is Jin Taekyung. He carved through a monster army ten thousand strong all by himself. It still makes no sense when I think about it. How the hell did he do that? ㄴHe’s amazing, but let’s get the facts straight. It wasn’t ten thousand, just a few thousand. ㄴLMAOOOO isn’t that still completely insane? ㄴFor real□□□□[1941] You’re the kind of bastard who’d get a goblin’s poison stinger in the ass and yell, “Ow, please let go gently!” Aren’t you the same guy who used an aura blade with your keyboard last time?

> ㄴBut at this point, Jin Taekyung doesn’t seem like an ordinary S-rank Hunter. Are all the other S-rank Hunters like that too? ㄴEven during the Great Cataclysm, feats on this level were rare. Cheon Taemin doesn’t count because he was just on another level entirely… But if you look at the records from the Great Cataclysm, Lee Jungryong probably accomplished something similar too. ㄴHmm. So he still isn’t at Lee Jungryong’s level? Disappointing.

[1941] □□ represents laughter in Korean online chat.

> ㄴ?? Do you think Lee Jungryong is some old man hanging around a spring on the neighborhood hill? Cheon Taemin may have overshadowed him, but judging by his achievements, martial power, and influence, he's still one of the top figures in the entire world. ㄴ 222.[1942] You only have to look at what happened a week ago. He wiped out the monster army with the fewest casualties across all five fronts. Jin Taekyung is incredible, but Lee Jungryong and Ares Guild are fucking amazing too. The northern front is actually advancing a little faster right now. ㄴ Comments like this make me nervous for no reason. I'm worried that a bunch of idiots will show up again and start going wild with the versus arguments. ㄴ They've been IP-banned to hell, so it should be fine. But at this point, isn't the whole incident basically over? They're crushing the monsters with mobile warfare right now. ㄴ Undefeated for an entire week □□□;[1943] ㄴ The Arch Lich must be panicking too. He put everything into that surprise attack a week ago and still got completely wrecked. The Death Knight Lord is dead, and the survivors who ran away are being harvested right now. They're screwed.

> ㄴ At this point, shouldn't the Arch Lich be making a move? He's so quiet that it feels strange. ㄴ I had the same thought, so I sent him a KakaoTalk[1944] message yesterday to see how he was doing. ㄴ ? To whom? ㄴ The Arch Lich. He said he was busy with his promotion match. Apparently, he was excited because winning this game would get him to Gold. ㄴ The guy above is fucking insane. ㄴ Zerobic is even more insane. Why the hell is that bastard suddenly taking a break? You're supposed to row while the tide is in. This is ridiculous. ㄴ Stop talking bullshit. The important thing is that if things continue like this, we can suppress this Monster Wave without suffering any more major losses. Let's pray that the situation ends soon and observe a moment of silence for the victims. ㄴ Hmm… I don't like China, but I agree with this. Idiots and normal people coexist in every country. Good luck to all the Hunters and soldiers. ㄴ Fighting.

The netizens were generally in high spirits.

The Monster Wave, which had initially been taken with deadly seriousness, had now become fodder for national pride. Even in the comments mourning the dead and cheering on those fighting, there was hope instead of fear.

Then again, we have been hearing a lot of good news lately.

[1942] Repeated 2s are Korean forum shorthand for agreeing with an earlier comment.

[1943] □□ represents trembling, often used online to express shock or amazement.

[1944] KakaoTalk is a messaging app widely used in South Korea.

The man nodded. It was only natural. According to the battlefield reports from the UN Security Council, there was no doubt that the tide had already turned decisively.

A week ago, the surprise attack launched simultaneously against all five fronts had caused enormous damage. But reinforcements far exceeding the number of casualties had been dispatched, and victory after victory had followed.

At this rate, it might be over in a few days.

Their momentum was unstoppable, like splitting bamboo. The Western Front under Jin Taekyung and the northern front led by Lee Jungryong stood out the most.

The little punk. I was so worried about him at first, but he's doing even better than I expected.

After a moment's hesitation, the man logged into the site and left a comment.

> └ Jin Taekyung's Roommate: Is this really the same loser Jin Taekyung? The real Jin Taekyung is a legend. I used to eat ramen with him all the time back in the day, and now he's become an S-rank Hunter, a king-like existence, and the world's strongest legendary hero. Looking at Jin Taekyung now honestly brings tears to my eyes…

Replies began springing up like weeds the instant he posted it.

The man gazed down at his phone with a pleased expression.

Then Seong Jinho suddenly realized he had forgotten something important.

"No! My ramen!"

"Man, I could really go for some ramen."

At my mutter, Team Leader Choi, who stood beside me, asked, "Out of nowhere?"

Having finished recovering, he had rejoined us at the front aboard a jet last night.

"Yeah. Weird, isn't it?"

"Considering the situation, you seem even more impressive, Mr. Jin."

Slash!

Hero's Soul flashed through the air, slicing through both the Lizardman's weapon and its body.

Green blood gushed out, accompanied by a stench that stabbed straight into my nose. My appetite vanished in an instant as I launched myself forward.

Fwoooosh! Boom!

Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

Terrible heat engulfed dozens of Lizardmen and burst into flames. The monsters recoiling at the sight already looked like routed soldiers.

Reading the flow of battle, Xiao Shen charged to the front and shouted.

“Charge! Charge!”

“Waaaaaah!”

“Blade of the wind, descend upon this place! Wind Cutter!”

Shwish-shwish-shwish-shwish!

Clang! Slash!

—Kueeeek!

—Kiruk, krk!

Overwhelmed by the human offensive pouring down like a wave, the monsters were helplessly driven back.

Their numbers were roughly even, but the monsters were no match for us in either morale or the quality of their forces.

Once the front line collapsed like a sandcastle, several terrified monsters turned and fled.

And collapse happens in an instant.

Fear was contagious.

When one fled, ten followed. After that came an uncontrollable rout.

Sure enough, my prediction proved correct, and cries of certain victory soon rang out.

“Pursue them! Don’t let a single one survive!”

“Get the speed buffs up!”

“Ranged units! Ready—fire!”

Shwish-shwish! Boom!

The Hunters, their momentum at its peak, began slaughtering the monsters fleeing without even maintaining formation.

It did not take long for the six-lane asphalt road, which would have been packed with cars only a month ago, to become buried beneath monster corpses.

“We won again.”

After the battle, I was checking my equipment when Team Leader Choi approached me. I shrugged.

“For someone delivering good news, you don’t look very happy.”

“That’s strange. I was just thinking the same thing while looking at you, Mr. Jin.”

“…Hmm.”

Apparently, we had been thinking along the same lines.

Just as he said, I felt no joy at all despite our victory.

I had first noticed this same sense of unease on the second day after we launched our mobile campaign for the full-scale counterattack.

"What do you think, Team Leader Choi?"

"What exactly are you asking about? The sharp decline in both the number and quality of the monsters? Or the dozens of victories you've won over the past week?"

"Both."

"You're probably thinking exactly what I am. The current state of the war is certainly encouraging, but… something doesn't feel right."

Team Leader Choi looked toward the celebrating people.

Smiles spread across exhausted faces, each one filled with the hope that the war would soon end and they could return to the arms of their loved ones.

"It's not that I can't understand how this happened. There were so many high-level monsters during the early stages of the war. If they lost their elite forces, it would explain the current situation. But…"

"The Arch Lich. That bastard wouldn't make things this easy for us. Would he, Team Leader Choi?"

Team Leader Choi nodded slightly.

"Does command share our suspicions?"

"Probably. I don't know about the other S-rank Hunters, but Minister of National Defense Wei Fenghu understood the situation perfectly."

"That's a relief, but…"

Team Leader Choi trailed off. Once again, he had probably arrived at the same thought I had.

We were practically at our destination, Suining City.

The Arch Lich had not shown himself even once throughout the entire war. What the hell was he doing right now?

"Hmm. He should be greasing his bones about now. Becoming a magnificent undead requires proper maintenance, you know."

"…"

Shut up already.

Whoooosh.

A vast space.

The darkness swirling within it was drawn toward a single point.

As the pitch-black darkness vanished, the light of the setting sun streamed through shattered windows and fell upon a solitary being.

"Come, Adversary."

The voice was as cold as the winter wind.
Having gathered his magical power, the Arch Lich’s eyes gleamed.

Chapter 407

Daniel Inoue was Japanese American.

A former Navy SEAL, he had awakened as an A-rank Hunter at the age of thirty. After leaving the military, he joined a private military company, where he put his abilities to excellent use.

Mercenary work suited Inoue well enough. He had to spend half of every year in conflict zones across the Middle East and Africa, but the pay was enormous, and he got long stretches of time off.

He had joined the response to the Monster Wave in China for much the same reason.

“Hey, ninja. What are you thinking about?”

At his comrade’s sudden question, Inoue narrowed his eyes.

“Shut up, Sam. Aren’t you sick of that damn ninja crap yet?”

“What’s the big deal? You should be used to it by now.”

“That’s exactly why I’m sick of it. Try being called a ninja or samurai since you were seven. It’ll drive you insane.”

“Why? Sounds pretty good to me.”

“You damn Yankee bastard.”

“I’ll take that as a compliment. I’m a Yankees fan.”

The small white man snickered at Inoue’s grumbling.

“Just accept it already. At this point, it’s fate. Even your abilities are totally ninja-like.”

“…Damn it.”

Inoue muttered a quiet curse.

Just as his comrade had said, the ability he had received upon awakening was perfectly suited to stealth.

Thanks to it, he had become a specialist in espionage and targeted assassinations. Unfortunately, it had also cemented his image as a ninja.

“I heard your girlfriend’s pregnant. How about naming the baby Naruto[1945]?”

Inoue raised his middle finger at his relentlessly annoying comrade.

“If you name your son Sasuke, I’ll think about it.”

“Oh, not bad.”

Quiet snickers escaped from the people around them.

The atmosphere, stiff and tense only moments ago, began to loosen. Inoue and his comrade exchanged faint smiles.

[1945] Naruto is a Japanese manga and anime series about ninjas. Sasuke is another name from the series.

The two had been close friends and partners for years. Their exchange had been little more than a skit meant to ease the tension before the mission began.

Too much tension only makes people commit one mistake after another.

That was true in battle, but even more so during an intelligence operation like this one.

They were entering unknown territory where neither communications nor magic could be used. Worse, their opponent was not some stupid, brutal rebel leader, but the Arch Lich that had unleashed an unprecedented Monster Wave.

No matter how favorable the war is going, we can't afford to let our guard down.

Having reminded himself of that, Inoue addressed the twenty intelligence operatives.

"Listen up. From this point on, we'll infiltrate in pairs. Use hand signals to communicate, and fire your signal flare in an emergency. You've all memorized your destinations and routes down to the last detail, right?"

"Yes."

"Good. Then… we meet back here in three hours. Dismissed."

At Inoue's words announcing the start of the operation, the intelligence operatives nodded and scattered in every direction. Watching them disappear silently and swiftly, his partner Sam jerked his chin toward the path ahead.

"Should we get moving too, ninja?"

"Yeah, you carefree Yankee bastard."

"Don't be like that. You're the best at this. Three hours from now, you'll be on your way back after finding out what color underwear the Arch Lich is wearing."

"…I really hope so."

Inoue let out a quiet sigh and stepped forward. The pale fog blanketing Suining City clung damply to his entire body.

The advance of the five fronts, which had seemed unstoppable, finally came to a halt.

We were two hundred kilometers[1946] from Suining City, where the Arch Lich was located. While we rested and reorganized, a welcome face came to visit.

"Hey, Korean friends. How have you been?"

I sensed a considerable wave of qi nearby, and sure enough, it was him. I bumped fists with Magic Johnson and answered.

"Pretty well."

"Jin. My lovable Miracle Boy. I missed you."

[1946] Two hundred kilometers is about 124 mi.

“Sorry, but could you leave out the ‘lovable’ part?”

“Then I’ll call you Crazy Boy. You did pull off something crazy, after all.”

Magic Johnson grinned and added,

“And incredibly heroic. The same goes for Choi here.”

Team Leader Choi, who had been carefully polishing Hero’s Soul, inclined his head.

“It’s good to see you again, Mr. Johnson.”

“Choi, don’t be like that. You’re making things stiff.”

“…!”

“…!”

“The atmosphere, of course.”

Magic Johnson threw back his head and laughed.

At this point, it was obvious he enjoyed watching our reactions. He was surprisingly playful for such a huge man.

Well, by now, we knew that everything was a joke whenever we met Magic Johnson.

Even Team Leader Choi, who always did Kegel exercises whenever he met him, gave a quiet laugh before asking,

“But what brings you here?”

“An emergency summons from headquarters. It’s an important matter.”

I frowned and muttered,

“This feels like déjà vu. Haven’t we seen this setup before?”

“Don’t worry, Jin. Nothing like last time will happen.”

By “last time,” he meant our main camp getting completely wrecked while the S-rank Hunters were away.

Well, the distance between the fronts had narrowed now. Even if everyone gathered together, we were practically close enough to touch noses if we fell over, so it should be fine.

If they aren’t handling this over communications, it must be that important.

As the Allied Forces continued winning and the monsters retreated, the Arch Lich’s territory had shrunk all the way back to Suining City. At our current location, both communications and magic worked smoothly.

“Do you know what we’re gathering for?”

“No. But I can guarantee it won’t be pleasant. I’ll stake my life on it.”

“…”

Please. Don’t stake your life on something like that. Give us a little more hope.

But Magic Johnson, as confident as ever, held out his hands to Team Leader Choi and me.

“Anyway, everyone else is already there. You two are the last guests.”

“Then please take us there, Mr. Johnson.”

Team Leader Choi took his hand without hesitation. Having already experienced Magic Johnson’s teleportation once, I nervously grabbed his fingers.

“Please drive safely—Gyaaaaaaaah!”

Whoooosh!

With the sensation of my entire body being crushed like a soda can, I was flung into a new space.

“Gyaaaaaaa…”

“…”

“…”

Damn it. Of all places, it had to be here.

A dozen pairs of eyes stared at me in silence. Under the dumbfounded gazes of the S-rank Hunters and senior Chinese generals, I stopped screaming and quietly slipped into an empty seat.

“Are we not starting the meeting?”

After a moment at a loss for words, Minister of National Defense Wei Fenghu finally spoke.

“…Then let us begin the meeting.”

The meeting that followed focused on a single subject: the information brought back by the intelligence team’s sole survivor.

“Daniel Inoue, who was in charge of the intelligence team, escaped from Suining City after eight hours—far beyond the scheduled operation time—and reported discovering a monster army numbering around thirty thousand.”

Thirty thousand…

It was an enormous force, but still well within the range we had expected.

The Arch Lich’s monster army had suffered its first defeat a week ago and had been retreating helplessly ever since, sustaining tremendous losses along the way.

“Judging by your expression, Minister, that isn’t all.”

Few people present could speak so casually to Minister Wei Fenghu.

Lee Jungryong was one of them. Whatever his personal feelings toward me, he had more than earned that right.

“Mr. Lee is correct. Thirty thousand is only the estimate based on what Inoue personally witnessed. The true number…”

“Could be twice that. Perhaps even more.”

“That is correct.”

“…Hmm.”

Low groans rose from around the room. We had expected the enemy to be holding forces in reserve for the final battle, but not that many.

Wei Fenghu continued solemnly.

“However, most of the monsters are likely to be mid- or low-level. That is our one small consolation.”

“The same is true of our forces, Wei Fenghu.”

At the remark from Faye Chen, who had been silently sipping from a liquor glass, Prince Felix nodded.

“She is right. More troops than expected have joined our side, but we still cannot be certain of victory.”

“Damn it. Those monsters never end, no matter how many we kill.”

I couldn’t help snorting at Wu Heixing’s grumbling.

“Why are you laughing?”

“Because it’s funny, you idiot.”

“What?”

“Anyone listening would think you’d been fighting your ass off. You’re the bastard who tried to take a detour during the monster army’s attack a week ago because you thought arriving early might be dangerous.”

“…!”

His expression was a sight to behold.

He must have thought no one knew, but word of Wu Heixing’s disgrace had already spread across every front.

“I know you’ve had a rough time too, but don’t whine in front of me or anyone else. Just looking at you is starting to piss me off.”

“Iik…!”[1947]

“What are you, self-employed? Why do you keep going iik?”

Wu Heixing’s face turned bright red. His body twitched as though he might charge at me at any moment, but that was as far as he could go.

The bitter memory of defeat lingered.

A hothouse flower that had spent its whole life being treated like royalty was bound to wither in a cold wind.

Of course, there were flowers of an entirely different sort.

Like Team Leader Choi, who was sitting beside me.

“That’s enough, both of you.”

At Team Leader Choi’s calm intervention, Wu Heixing glared at him.

“Are you ordering me around?”

“If that’s how you took it, I’m sorry to hear that, Wu Heixing.”

“You…”

[1947] Iik is an angry Korean grunt that sounds identical to the Korean word for “profit.”

Team Leader Choi did not so much as blink at Wu Heixing's threatening aura. Wu Heixing shot to his feet.

No, he tried to.

"Sit."

"…!"

My aura struck like an awl, and his body locked in place.

The other S-rank Hunters turned startled eyes toward me.

I glanced at Lee Jungryong's deeply sunken gaze before continuing.

"Just so there's no misunderstanding, yes, that was an order."

"You, you…!"

"Sit. I won't say it again."

Whoooosh!

A wave of aura surged toward him, and Wu Heixing's lower lip trembled.

Perhaps he would have counted as a genius even in Murim.

No, he definitely would have. Becoming an S-rank Hunter in his thirties would have been impossible without that level of talent.

But he was only half the package.

Awakening was an unearned windfall. Like a lottery winner, he had received extraordinary abilities and mana the moment he turned twenty.

And he was supposed to build up internal energy like a Murim practitioner and master martial arts at the Supreme Peak level?

Well…

Learning martial arts might make up for his technical shortcomings, but there was no doubt he would fall by the wayside long before he ever reached that point.

Compared to his talent, his effort and will were Third Rate.

"Enough."

Lee Jungryong's gentle baritone broke the tension.

The old snake, still looking like a handsome middle-aged man despite being well past sixty, watched me with a smile.

"I thought only your skills had improved, but your killing intent has grown stronger too."

I met his eyes impassively.

"Rolling around in all sorts of places tends to put an edge on you."

"I heard the Western Front was particularly fierce."

"That's not wrong. Want to come see the Western Front?"

"I must politely decline. If it was fierce enough that only three people survived, I think I'll pass."

"…!"

“The older I get, the more cowardly I become. Ho ho.”

The blood in my veins turned cold.

That horrific battlefield flashed before my eyes, and before I knew it, a faint smile had formed on my lips.

“What are you trying to say?”

“Let’s think about something more productive than turning on our allies. Planning for the final battle would be a good place to start. Jin Taekyung, what do you think?”

I quietly tapped the armrest of my chair.

My insides twisted, but Lee Jungryong’s words had struck at the heart of the matter.

He was right. The battle bearing down on us was practically at our doorstep. That was what we needed to deal with now.

Then one thought came to me.

“A suicide squad.”

“A suicide squad?”

Everyone’s eyes turned toward me. Some nodded in agreement, while others looked uneasy.

But both reason and instinct told me this was our best chance to win while minimizing our losses.

“We gather our very best and cut off the head.”

Once the Arch Lich is destroyed, the undead army will collapse.

Chapter 408

“A suicide squad.”

The moment those words left Jin Taekyung’s mouth, Wu Heixing forgot his rising anger and nearly shouted.

You crazy bangzi[1948] bastard!

A suicide squad.

Wasn’t that exactly what it meant—to charge in prepared to die?

Even if they somehow broke through the monster army without knowing its exact numbers, the real monster—the Arch Lich—would be waiting behind it. The mere thought made Wu Heixing’s hair stand on end.

This… this is insane.

Wu Heixing didn’t care how many casualties they suffered.

China was a Great Nation with a population of over a billion, after all. Even if a hundred thousand or a million people vanished, they would amount to no more than a handful.

In fact, if that damn bangzi[1949] took the vanguard of the suicide squad and died a glorious death, Wu Heixing would happily raise both hands in celebration.

But…

“Let’s gather our very best and take out the head.”

That meant Wu Heixing himself would be included in the suicide squad. And he had no intention of taking even the slightest risk.

“Cut that ridiculous bullshit—”

Unable to hold back any longer, Wu Heixing shot to his feet and opened his mouth.

“Oh, that’s an excellent idea.”

“…!”

Wu Heixing stared wide-eyed, unable to continue.

He had never imagined that Lee Jungryong would side with Jin Taekyung.

Not just anyone, but Lee Jungryong himself.

“W-What did you just say?”

“I said it was an excellent idea.”

Lee Jungryong continued with a gentle smile.

“We need to end this battle as quickly as possible. The Arch Lich is likely creating new undead even now. If the S-rank Hunters lead the advance and destroy it, the monster army—made up mostly of undead—will collapse, reducing our casualties.”

[1948] Bangzi is a derogatory Chinese term for a Korean person.

[1949] Bangzi is a derogatory Chinese term for a Korean person.

"M-Mr. Lee."

"I imagine you agree with me. Just like everyone else here. Isn't that right, Mr. Wu?"

"Everyone else? What are you talking about?"

Only then did Wu Heixing look around in confusion.

Not only Wei Fenghu and the other high-ranking Chinese generals, but also Faye Chen, Magic Johnson, and even Prince Felix were nodding slightly as they exchanged opinions.

"Hmm. Certainly…"

"Even if we reinforce our forces, the Arch Lich will do the same. The longer we drag this out, the larger the battle will become."

"What if we select A-rank Hunters and other veterans, deploy them to one side, and have the S-rank Hunters lead the breakthrough?"

"It would be dangerous, but the plan has a real chance of success."

"No matter how powerful a Named Monster the Arch Lich may be, we should have a good chance if the S-rank Hunters attack it together."

Wu Heixing's face went white as the conversation reached his ears.

Have these people lost their minds?

They were actually looking favorably upon this insane operation. They must have all gone mad.

Even Lee Jungryong, whom Wu Heixing had trusted, had sided with Jin Taekyung for some reason.

Desperate to avoid being included in the suicide squad, Wu Heixing hurriedly turned toward Jin Taekyung.

"W-Wait! If all the S-rank Hunters leave, wouldn't that create a massive hole in our forces?"

"Gasp."

Jin Taekyung sucked in a startled breath and looked at Wu Heixing in surprise.

"Wow. You do use your brain once in a while."

"…"

"You're right. We should probably leave a few people behind."

That damn bangzi[1950].

But this was no time to get angry. Wu Heixing suppressed his surging fury and continued.

"R-Right. So, to prepare for any unforeseen circumstances, I—"

Jin Taekyung abruptly cut him off and turned toward Magic Johnson.

"It seems like you should stay behind. What do you think, Johnson?"

[1950] Bangzi is a derogatory Chinese term for a Korean person.

"Me?"

What kind of situation was this? Wu Heixing desperately tried to intervene.

"M-Magic Johnson? Wouldn't it be better to have at least one mage come with us?"

"Of course that would be good. It would—but…"

Jin Taekyung gave Wu Heixing a pleasant smile.

"What about the rear?"

"Huh?"

"What happens if the Arch Lich teleports behind our lines and attacks us from the rear? Are you going to stop it?"

"…"

"No matter how powerful the Arch Lich is, it won't be able to pull something like that if a grand mage stays behind to interfere with its magic. And Magic Johnson's wide-area magic could turn the tide of the battle."

Every word made perfect sense. Wu Heixing's mouth snapped shut, and Jin Taekyung clicked his tongue.

"Think before you run your mouth. Stop watching those 'watch your rear' GIFs on the internet and start thinking about the rear in an actual war."

"…!"

Ignoring Wu Heixing, who had frozen like a statue, Jin Taekyung asked Magic Johnson,

"What do you think?"

"You're right, Jin. So I'm the only one staying behind?"

Defense Minister Wei Fenghu, who had been silently observing the situation, suddenly spoke.

"The Arch Lich must have held a large number of high-level monsters in reserve for the final battle. Far more than the number of A-rank Hunters on our side. We will need at least two more S-rank Hunters to maintain an evenly matched battlefield."

It wasn't over yet. Two spots still remained.

Finding a glimmer of hope, Wu Heixing cleared his throat.

"Then I suppose I have no choice but to stay—"

"If the others have no objections, I would first like to exclude Prince Felix."

"What?"

"I'm sorry, but I cannot explain the details. There is a complicated issue involved."

Felix was not merely an S-rank Hunter. He was a member of the royal family and practically a symbol of the United Kingdom. Nor was he some insignificant member of a distant branch. He was third in line to the throne.

Everyone present understood that the "complicated issue" Wei Fenghu could not explain was a diplomatic problem with the United Kingdom.

“Well, his father is the King of the United Kingdom, so I suppose that’s possible. Then the prince is out.”

At Jin Taekyung’s words, Prince Felix spoke with an uncomfortable expression.

“I hope you understand that this is not my choice. However, I have been bound to the royal family since birth, and I cannot disobey my royal father’s command—”

“It’s fine. I don’t care. I’d actually prefer it this way, since it would leave a bad taste in my mouth if the United Kingdom’s fourth in line to the throne got hurt during the operation I proposed.”

“Third! And show proper respect when speaking to me.”

“Oh, right. Congratulations on the bronze medal. Then, does anyone object to His Highness Prince Felix, that living hotbed of entrenched privilege, sitting this one out thanks to his connections?”

Wu Heixing started to raise his hand without thinking, only to stop when Faye Chen and Lee Jungryong answered.

“I don’t mind.”

“I agree.”

Jin Taekyung nodded and fixed Wu Heixing with a long stare.

“What about you?”

“M-Me?”

“When the only guy left asks that, what am I supposed to tell him? Tinky Winky, Dipsy, or Po. Pick one.”

There was no way out.

Magic Johnson and Prince Felix were foreigners, and both had legitimate reasons to remain behind. Even Faye Chen and Lee Jungryong had agreed.

Wu Heixing squeezed his eyes shut, opened them again, and muttered,

“…Agreed.”

“Answer properly. If you say it like that, how the hell am I supposed to know whether you mean agreement or Donguibogam?[1951] Are you Heo Jun?”

“I… agree.”

“Okay.”

It happened at Quick Attack[1952] speed.

One spot still remained, but Wu Heixing felt a sense of foreboding.

And it didn’t take long for that foreboding to become certainty.

“I would like Faye Chen to fill the final position.”

But what had thrown Wu Heixing into confusion was that it wasn’t Jin Taekyung who had blocked his last escape route.

[1951] Donguibogam is a seventeenth-century Korean medical encyclopedia. The joke plays on dongui, meaning “agreement,” at the start of its title.

[1952] Quick Attack is a rapid-movement move in Pokémon.

It was Lee Jungryong.

What in the world is that old man thinking?

Wu Heixing vividly remembered the conversation he had shared with Lee Jungryong on the day Jin Taekyung had trampled him into the ground.

He clearly suggested that we join forces. And now he's stabbing me in the back like this?

Faye Chen glanced at Wu Heixing as he ground his teeth, then tipped back her liquor glass.

"Well, Mr. Lee, I'm not the sort who enjoys danger. But wouldn't our odds of success be higher if we left that brat behind instead of me?"

"No, Faye Chen. You will do more to reduce casualties by remaining behind."

"You don't know that kid. Just looking at him makes even someone who never had any patriotism develop some."

"Don't worry. I'll be here."

His tone was calm but filled with certainty.

Only Lee Jungryong could say such a thing with such confidence.

The old hero's gaze, carrying an assurance no one present could deny, settled on one person.

"And Jin Taekyung. You'll be there too, won't you?"

His eyes were deep and unreadable.

Jin Taekyung silently met Lee Jungryong's gaze before answering.

"Our dear Vice Guild Master certainly has a talent for making the obvious sound complicated."

"May I take that to mean you will also be joining the suicide squad?"

"Of course."

"Brave. Heroic, even. In that case, I'll yield the vanguard to you."

"Great. Does that mean I get to leave behind a famous quote like Louis Armstrong? Something like, 'This is one small step for a man, but for monsters, it's the Heavenly Demon's Reign.'"

"That's rather crude for a quote destined for the history books. And you have the name wrong. It wasn't Louis Armstrong. It was Neil Armstrong."

"You're certainly well educated. Still, your academic credentials have nothing on the length of my tissue roll.[1953]"

The people around them developed pounding headaches trying to follow Jin Taekyung's answers, while Wu Heixing fell into despair.

Until barely a month ago, he had been enjoying a lavish yacht party surrounded by dozens of beautiful women.

[1953] The Korean joke contrasts a "long schoolbag strap," meaning extensive education, with a "long tissue roll," implying extensive experience with pornography.

Now he had been assigned to a suicide squad prepared to die.

And then, in the very next moment—

—Do you think I betrayed you?

“…!”

—Accept it. I promise there will be no danger.

As the Sound Transmission pierced his ears, Wu Heixing slowly raised his head.

Lee Jungryong was looking at him with a gentle smile as he continued speaking.

“He’ll carry out his assigned duty well. I guarantee it.”

Jin Taekyung slowly tapped the armrest of his chair as he replied,

“I’m looking forward to seeing just how brilliantly he carries out his duty.”

The rather lengthy meeting came to an end.

The suicide squad would be led by S-rank Hunters, with high-level A-rank Hunters and veteran B-rank Hunters making up the rest. The command staff would be working around the clock to select its members.

The Skeleton Warlord had remained silent throughout the meeting. But the moment we returned to the tent assigned to me on the Western Front, it solemnly declared,

“This commander will sit out this battle.”

“Yeah, fuck off.”

“At least ask why, you treacherous human.”

“Fine. Why?”

“As the commander of an undead army, this commander is reluctant to fight his own kind.”

I answered with a dumbfounded expression.

“What the fuck are you talking about? Who’s been sucking the energy out of his own kind to nourish himself this whole time?”

“…Oh.”

“Let’s be honest. If you said you just didn’t want to go because you were scared of the Arch Lich, would I curse at you?”

“You would.”

“You son of a—… Oh.”

The Skeleton Warlord’s distrust of me deepened even further as it spoke.

“In any case, this commander no longer wishes to take part in this war. Honor the promise you made that day.”

“The promise I made that day?”

“Have you ever seen such a treacherous human? Didn’t you promise that, in exchange for protecting two humans, you would grant any request I made?”

“Oh.”

It had been a while since I’d been left speechless.

I had definitely made that promise. Normally, I would have brushed it off by pretending to have amnesia, but this time I couldn’t ignore it in good conscience.

“Fine. What’s your wish?”

The Skeleton Warlord shouted as though it had been waiting for the question.

“Give me freedom!”

“Freedom?”

“That is correct. You, treacherous human, have insulted and abused this commander all this time! No fewer than 408 times!”

“…Did you come from an animal rights group or something?”

“Honor your promise! This commander shall finally find freedom!”

Freedom.

My head was already cluttered with thoughts of Lee Jungryong, so a wish like that hadn’t even occurred to me.

After thinking for a moment, I answered.

“Fine. I’ll give you freedom.”

“Ooh! Oooooh!”

“Goodbye, then.”

“Huh?”

Without hesitation, I pulled the Skeleton Warlord’s skull from my Inventory and threw it outside the tent.

Into the middle of the thousands of Hunters swarming around outside.

Clack!

The sound of it hitting something rang out, and the area around the tent erupted into chaos. Shouts came from every direction, followed by the thunderous roar of exploding magic.

“Monster! Monster attack!”

“Kill it!”

Boom! Kaboom!

How much time passed?

Five minutes? Ten?

Rustle, rustle.

The bottom edge of the tent suddenly began to shift. Then a black, glossy skull rolled in and stopped at my feet.

“Oh, look who it is.”

“…”
“What brings the Skeleton Warlord, proud owner of a free spirit, here?”
“You… human…”
A red glow flickered pitifully within the skull’s empty eye sockets.
Was I imagining it, or was an undead actually whimpering?
The Skeleton Warlord continued in a tearful voice.
“Can I… take back my wish?”
“Oh, of course.”
I continued in the chipper tone of a customer-service representative.
“But you know wish coupons can’t be exchanged or refunded, right?”
“…”
“Come here, Golgoli.”
Hop.
The Skeleton Warlord feebly jumped into my arms.

Chapter 409

An unannounced visitor arrived before dawn had fully broken.

He stepped carefully into the tent and met my eyes as I sat cross-legged.

“You were already awake.”

“As you can see.”

I shrugged at Team Leader Choi.

“I haven’t been sleeping much lately.”

More accurately, I needed less sleep.

With stamina that had surpassed human limits and formidable internal energy amounting to three jiazi,[1954] I could blow away most fatigue by circulating my qi.

“Were you practicing the Mana Cultivation Method—or rather, the Jin Family’s Cultivation Technique?”

“Yeah, something like that.”

To be exact, I was practicing the Fire Gate Divine Technique, the secret cultivation technique of the Fire Gate Clan. But I couldn’t tell him every last detail.

“I should have come later.”

“No, it’s fine.”

“Didn’t you say that cultivation must never be interrupted? That stopping midway could cause qi deviation…”

“Oh, that applies to you, Team Leader Choi. I’m fine. We’re on different levels.”

“…”

Warning: your fact attack may hurt someone.

For a moment, I could practically see the public-service announcement flashing across Team Leader Choi’s face.

He gave me a sour look, then slowly shook his head.

“I can’t argue with the truth.”

“Still, you’re learning incredibly fast. I mean that sincerely, so have a little more confidence.”

I did mean it. As befitted a descendant of Cheon Taemin, the hero who had achieved an indomitable feat in human history, Team Leader Choi possessed extraordinary natural martial talent.

For some reason, he also had a considerable amount of qi stored within his body, so his progress in martial arts was astonishingly fast.

In short, he was a talent with all the groundwork already laid.

If he’d learned martial arts from childhood like Wu Heixing… he’d probably be an S-rank Hunter by now.

[1954] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; three jiazi is 180 years.

Team Leader Choi's expression softened slightly, and he nodded.

"How do I compare to Jin Taekyung?"

"Are you kidding? Of course I learned faster."

"…"

Who are you trying to compare yourself to?

Team Leader Choi might have grown up under Lee Jungryong's watchful eye, constantly held in check, but our lives had been fundamentally different.

Even after obtaining the System, I'd nearly died several times. Damn it, I'd been through hell.

"Anyway, what brings you here this early?"

"Something has been troubling me, so I came despite the imposition."

"Something troubling you?"

"Yes."

"Why? Did Johnson confess his love to you?"

"That doesn't concern me. I know it's simply Mr. Johnson's way of showing affection. This is about Guild business."

"Guild business… Did bad news come from Korea?"

At my worried question, Team Leader Choi shook his head.

"No. I'm worried because one of our Guild members seems to be heading into danger."

"Oh."

So that was what he meant. Once I caught on, I let out a quiet laugh.

"I know who you mean. Tall and handsome, right? With an absolutely wonderful personality."

"I can't speak to the first two, but his personality certainly is something else. In several ways."

"Hmm. Then I don't think we're talking about the same person."

"Mr. Jin Taekyung."

Team Leader Choi, who had been trading jokes with me until then, lowered his voice.

"You know what I mean."

"Do I?"

"This operation is dangerous."

"Team Leader Choi, don't you trust me?"

"How could I not? You're one of the people I trust most in this world."

Team Leader Choi fixed me with a grave stare.

"And you're about to carry out a dangerous operation with some of the people I trust least."

Two names immediately came to mind.

Lee Jungryong and Wu Heixing. Men bound to me by bitter history—and comrades who would soon have to entrust their backs to one another.

I scratched my chin and answered.

"'People I can't trust.' I can't think of a more fitting description."

"Mr. Jin Taekyung…"

"Team Leader Choi?"

He closed his mouth before he could continue. I quietly raised a hand and pointed toward the tent flap.

"As you know, I haven't finished cultivating yet."

"…!"

"The battle will begin before the day is over. Clear your mind and prepare for the fight ahead."

Team Leader Choi stared at me, conflicted and unable to speak. At last, he heaved a deep sigh and rose from his seat.

"I'll see you shortly."

"Sure. I won't see you out."

I felt his presence gradually fade as he left the tent.

The Skeleton Warlord, who had been moping ever since his wish coupon was refunded, immediately spoke in a hopeful voice.

—A very intelligent human. It is not too late. Why not heed that human's advice?

"You're really working hard at this."

—If you insist on going, go alone! Why must you take this commander with you?

"Dying alone would be lonely."

—Whaaaaaat?!

"I'm joking. It's just our best option."

—You call breaking through a massive monster army to confront the Arch Lich our best option? Are you an evil human, or simply insane?

Listen to the way this undead bastard talks.

I considered punishing him, then unfolded my legs and reclined diagonally across the bed.

"It's a dangerous operation, sure, but we've got a good chance. Stop complaining."

—And what if we get there and it does not work?

"Then we fight with everything we've got. That'll give us a chance."

The Skeleton Warlord muttered with the voice of one who had attained enlightenment.

—Miraculous logic indeed. To think this commander is stuck with such a madman.

"And yet you're still here."

—Still here? You mean I cannot leave!

“You’re hilarious. When was it that you came back on your own feet? Ah, never mind. Not feet—your skull.”

—Vicious humans seeking this commander’s life are everywhere! What else was I supposed to do?

I let out a quiet laugh at the Skeleton Warlord’s aggrieved protest.

Don’t be such a coward.

I had plenty to say, but decided to save it for later. That was something he needed to realize on his own.

—You laughed! You just laughed!

“When?”

I played dumb and changed the subject.

“Anyway, the key is taking down the Arch Lich. Once the head is gone, the body can’t move.”

—Dullahans can.

“…”

That was true.

For a moment, the answer made perfect sense. Then I realized how ridiculous it was and pulled the Skeleton Warlord from my Inventory.

“No, seriously. This bastard has been asking for it.”

—C-Calm down, human. I said nothing untrue.

“Right. Dullahans can move without their heads. Let’s see what happens to the Skeleton Warlord.”

Crack!

I flicked his forehead with lightning speed, and the Skeleton Warlord shrieked.

—Agh! A crack! There’s a crack between my brows! I’m telling you, there’s really a crack!

“I held back, so what the hell are you talking about… Oh. There really is one.”

Maybe I should have hit him more gently. A tiny crack had appeared in the glossy black skull, its surface gleaming smoothly.

When I lightly touched the sliver of bone raised by the impact, the Skeleton Warlord screamed.

—My bone! My bone!

“Fine, I get it. Stop screaming.”

—My bones have been getting increasingly itchy and sensitive lately, and I was already worried, but this madman went and… Sob.

“…”

What, does he have dry skin?

At this rate, he would start an iTube channel and rack up a million subscribers as an undead beauty streamer.

This bastard might not even be a monster...

The more I saw of him, the stranger he seemed.

I stared at the Skeleton Warlord in disbelief, then suddenly threw open one side of the tent. The sun was slowly lifting its head in the east.

It signaled the beginning of a new day—and the battle soon to come.

Located in the central Sichuan Basin, Suining City encompassed two urban districts, three counties, and more than five thousand square kilometers[1955] of land.

Since ancient times, it had been known as the heart of central Sichuan Province, renowned for its refined culture, tranquil scenery, and thriving agriculture, industry, and commerce.

But all of that was now a thing of the past.

Caw! Cawww!

Countless crows wheeled through the overcast sky before descending upon the corpses strewn across the ground. There were no squabbles between the flocks over their prey.

Hundreds of bodies lay scattered across the land, and the crows filled their bellies by pecking at the rotting flesh of what had once been human beings.

For humanity, it was a calamity beyond compare.

For the crows, it was an age of peace and plenty.

Their peaceful feast did not last long.

Rumble. Rrrrumble.

A deafening roar and tremors rose from the ground. The crows cried out irritably and took flight as one.

Several black feathers drifted through the air, caught the wind, and sailed across the vast basin.

Countless marching feet and the metal wheels of tanks crushed the feathers as they fluttered down.

Boom. Boom. Boom.

A human army filled the horizon.

The tower shields held by the tank-class Hunters at the forefront scraped against the ground. Behind them, thousands of Hunters advanced in ordered ranks.

A pair of tightly pressed lips showed beneath a helmet pulled low.

[1955] Five thousand square kilometers is about 1,900 square miles.

Thousands of people, gripped by the invisible specter of war, marched onward in silence.

Toward the distant city shrouded in pale mist.

Toward the battle that awaited them, and the glorious victory beyond it.

Then a man at the center of the formation suddenly spoke.

“Fuck, look at that fog. Doesn’t it look like something out of one of those disaster movies where monsters show up? Anyone seen that one?”

Jin Taekyung’s colorful profanity came out of nowhere amid the solemn atmosphere, drawing snorts of laughter from all around him.

“Pfft.”

“Kff.”

“What? Am I the only one who’s seen it? That masterpiece?”

As Jin Taekyung shrugged, a voice answered from his right.

“I’ve seen it.”

“Really? That’s unexpected, Team Leader Choi.”

“What is?”

“You seem like the type who’d only watch musicals or orchestral performances. Things like that.”

The Hunters who glanced at Choi Minwoo bit their lips to hold back their laughter.

Before they knew it, their rigid bodies had relaxed and their breathing had steadied. The tension weighing on them eased considerably.

All the while, the two men continued their conversation.

“I occasionally watch movies to unwind. I enjoyed the one you mentioned too, Mr. Jin.”

“Oh, then you know the final twist.”

“Of course. Personally, I found it quite unfortunate.”

“Exactly. I had the same thought while I was watching.”

Jin Taekyung continued slowly.

“They could’ve survived if they hadn’t given up at the very end. They should’ve kept fighting with everything they had, no matter what it took. That sort of thing.”

His voice was low, but it carried unmistakable strength.

Infused with profound internal energy, it reverberated through the air and reached every ear.

And the thousands of Hunters and soldiers of the Western Front realized something.

Perhaps Jin Taekyung’s words had been meant for them.

“By now, the other fronts are probably surrounding Suining City just like we are, right?”

“They’ll have it completely encircled.”

“And the battle will begin soon.”

“We will win.”

Jin Taekyung laughed aloud at Xiao Shen’s resolute answer.

“Yeah. We have to. But…”

Jin Taekyung’s laughter abruptly stopped. The next moment, the playful light in his eyes vanished, replaced by a deeply sunken gaze.

The vast basin was reflected in his icy gaze.

“Looks like they have other ideas.”

Tap. Tap-tap-tap.

Grrrk…

Corpses slowly rose to their feet.

Skeletons.

Mist slid across the basin, carrying with it the growls of the monsters lurking within.

“Starting now…”

Jin Taekyung drew a deep breath.

“It begins.”

Chapter 410

Has it been over thirty years?

Lee Jungryong muttered to himself.

The stench of countless monsters and the reek of blood drifted in on the wind. It was the smell of a battlefield, stirring memories of long ago.

Yes. It truly has been a long time.

With a shrewd gaze that seemed at odds with his appearance, he watched the fog slowly draw nearer. The pale fog, where thousands of monsters were presumably lurking, radiated an ominous feeling simply by being there.

Most of the troops were shaken, but to Lee Jungryong—a living witness to the Great Cataclysm—it was an all-too-familiar sight.

“How old are you?”

At Lee Jungryong’s sudden question, Go Jun, the Head of Security standing one step behind him, answered.

“Thirty-five.”

“That’s a good age. Looking back, I was the same. Every day brought another brush with death, but I had dreams back then.”

Lee Jungryong gazed into the distance.

For a moment, he seemed to glimpse his younger self somewhere far away—a young man driven by the will to survive and the ambition to become the best.

But more than thirty years later, the man standing here was nearing seventy.

“Sometimes, doubt creeps in. I find myself wondering whether everything I’ve built might come crashing down.”

“I have not the slightest doubt.”

“Why not?”

Go Jun’s lips moved.

“Because you are here, Master.”

Lee Jungryong gave a quiet laugh.

“And what would you do if I fell?”

“I can say with certainty that will never happen.”

“There was a time when I thought the same of someone else. He was stronger than anyone, an insurmountable wall I could never overcome even if I devoted my entire life to trying.”

“…!”

“He was the beginning and end of the Great Cataclysm. He was everything. Humanity’s savior, no different from a new god. But even he was only human.”

The hero who had achieved immortal feats had not shown himself for many years, and only a handful of people knew the secret surrounding him.

As one of those few, Lee Jungryong continued in a low voice.

“Nothing is eternal, and nothing is certain. I’ve found myself thinking that more and more lately.”

“…Is this because of Jin Taekyung?”

“When a crack begins, collapse comes in an instant. That bastard is the crack itself.”

“Then we must seal it before everything collapses.”

Lee Jungryong watched the fog slide across the desolate plain. When he spoke, his voice was gentle, but a blade lay hidden beneath it.

“Are you ready?”

“I will obey.”

Go Jun bowed deeply and drew his sword.

Shing! Clatter!

Hundreds, then thousands, of weapons were drawn behind him at once.

The Ares Guild’s elites, honed through countless raids and training exercises, stood alongside the Chinese Hunters. The light gleaming from their weapons rippled like waves.

“Please give the command.”

Lee Jungryong slowly began to walk.

There was no place here for soldiers or firearms. This was a battle solely between the superhumans known as Hunters and the monsters—and Lee Jungryong would reign as the god of the battlefield.

“Let’s go.”

With that single word, Lee Jungryong shot forward like the wind. The fog filling the plain split apart on both sides along the path of his sword.

Kraaash!

Splurt!

Drenched in horribly foul-smelling green blood, the young man barely managed to keep from gagging.

No, that was not quite right.

It would be more accurate to say he was not even given the chance.

Whoosh! Boom!

The upper section of his Tower Shield shattered, and a sharp fragment grazed the tip of his nose. Blood spurted out, and the scent of it pierced his nostrils.

It helped drown out the terrible stench, but directly before him, an undead ogre that looked freshly dead was raising a massive iron club.

“Grrrraaaaah!”

Whooooooosh.

The terrifying sound of it tearing through the air was enough to make his hair stand on end.

The young man gritted his teeth and bent his knees, shielding his head with his mana-infused Tower Shield.

Boom!

The tremendous impact tore through his entire body. His ears rang, his head reeled, and his arm hurt as though it had been broken.

No. Maybe it’s already broken.

But a broken arm barely even counted as a problem right now.

Not when a ferociously roaring, five-meter-tall monster[1956] was swinging an iron club as large as a grown man like a pinwheel.

Boom! Boom! Boom!

Under the relentless assault, the young man screamed, his voice edging toward tears.

“You turtle-dicked bastard! Why are you so strong?!”

The young man was a veteran B-rank Hunter. Naturally, he had fought ogres before.

As befitted A-rank monsters, ogres possessed tremendous strength and stamina, but they had never been this strong.

They definitely hadn’t been…

Boom!

The young man stared blankly as the high-strength Tower Shield he had bought for a fortune at the beginning of the year shattered after only five blows.

What the hell… Did all these things take drugs or something?

They were far too strong.

As he watched the iron club rise once more through the pale fog, the young man sensed that his end had come.

At the same time, one name flashed through his mind.

Jin Taekyung.

This was all that bastard’s fault.

If Jin Taekyung had simply pretended not to know him and walked past that day, some big shot would never have kicked him in the shins, and he would not have been drafted as a frontline tank.

[1956] Five meters is about 16.4 ft.

Then he would not be about to die like this.

Whooooooosh!

Dodging was unthinkable. He did not even have the courage to look straight at the iron club hurtling toward him, filling his entire field of vision.

The young man squeezed his eyes shut and let out an involuntary scream.

"Jin Taekyung, you bangzi bastard!"[1957]

And then, in the next instant—

Slash! Rattle-rattle-rattle!

His vision went pitch-black. A cool breeze brushed across his entire body, and something poured down like a sudden shower.

Soon, a voice pierced his ears.

"What did you just call me?"

"…Huh?"

The young man's eyes flew open. Green blood was scattering through the air in droplets. The enormous body of the undead ogre, now missing its head, was slowly toppling over.

And there was the face of a man scowling deeply.

"…Huh?"

"You're that bastard from last time. Burdian."

Whoosh! Splurt!

He had not seen it. There had been no way he could.

The man reached out, and a streak of light—probably a dagger—pierced three or four monsters. They crumpled like puppets with their strings cut.

An answer escaped the young man's lips before he could think.

"Uh, no, I'm not."

"No, my ass, you fucking bastard."

Slash! Bang!

"You looked like you were in danger, so I saved you, and you call me a bangzi?[1958] You'd better survive. I'm going to make you run bread for me until you die of old age."

Slash! Sssshk!

Is this a dream?

Every time the young man blinked, the monsters around him fell like bundles of straw.

[1957] Bangzi is a derogatory Chinese term for a Korean. Jin's reply plays on the sound of ppang, the Korean word for bread, and ppang shuttle, slang for someone made to run errands.

[1958] Bangzi is a derogatory Chinese term for a Korean. Jin's reply plays on the sound of ppang, the Korean word for bread, and ppang shuttle, slang for someone made to run errands.

Blue flames erupted, and whenever the air split with a shriek, an area that had been so densely packed there was nowhere to step was swept clean.

It all began at one man's fingertips, and none of it looked like something a human being could have done.

The young man stared at him in a daze.

"Are you… perhaps a god?"

After a moment of silence, Jin Taekyung asked in return,

"Are you perhaps… a fucking idiot?"

Rrrrummmble!

Blue flames swept across the earth. Steel melted, and monsters engulfed in the blaze screamed in agony.

After wiping out dozens of monsters with a single sweep, Jin Taekyung glanced at the young man.

"Hey."

"Yes? Yes?"

"Survive. I'm going to make you run bread for me."

"Excuse me?"

"I'm not joking. If you die, I'll kill you myself."

"…!"

"Oh, and take this."

Whoosh! Crack!

Something shot toward the young man like a ray of light, struck him in the forehead, and shattered.

Before he could react, translucent liquid drenched him, and Jin Taekyung's low voice reached his ears.

"You'll be fine now, so get back to fighting. Don't go picking fights with ogres unless you want to get yourself killed. Stick to the weaker ones. Got it?"

Hissss.

The liquid—no, the potion—seeped into him with a faint warmth.

The young man felt the wounds covering his body close and his broken arm mend. He nodded blankly.

"Yes. Yes."

"Then I'm off."

"P-Please be careful, sir."

Forgetting that he was in the middle of a battlefield, the young man bowed deeply at the waist.

When he raised his head again, Jin Taekyung was gone, and a group was rushing past him.

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh! Slash!

More than two hundred Hunters raced forward without hesitation along the path Jin Taekyung had opened, swinging their weapons.

Two figures at the forefront stood out above all the rest.

“&*^%!”

“Their formation has collapsed! Charge!”

One was a handsome man spouting incomprehensible Korean. The other was a remarkably young-looking Hunter.

They moved like the wind, their blades wreathed in dazzling aura as they cut the monsters apart.

The suicide squad.

He had heard about them. A number of S-rank Hunters, including Jin Taekyung, would lead the suicide squads from each front in a charge against the Arch Lich.

Only yesterday, he had thought it was impossible nonsense…

Amazing.

Could I become like that too?

As the young man gazed blankly at the scene, his chest suddenly grew hot. Some unknown strength surged up from within him, and he could not contain it.

He raised his half-destroyed Tower Shield and charged toward the nearest monster.

“Yaaaaaaaah!”

“Grrrraaaaah!”

Whoosh! Boom!

“…”

Damn it. It was an ogre.

The young man stared at his now completely shattered Tower Shield, turned on his heel, and ran.

Orcs. Where are the orcs?!

Thud!

That did it.

The impact against my knuckles told me all I needed to know. As certainty flashed through my mind, the head of the Lycanthrope lunging teeth-first for the back of my neck exploded.

SYSTEM

Ding!* - You defeated Lv. 92 Darkened Lycanthrope! - You gained a small amount of EXP!

A Lycanthrope at level ninety-something?

I already knew Level was not an absolute measure, but the monsters gathered on this battlefield were clearly different from the ones I had encountered in Gates.

They're stronger.

Their Levels were slightly higher, and they were superior in Agility and raw strength as well.

If it had been one or two monsters, I might have brushed it off. But everything from F-rank goblins to A-rank monsters was like this. You would have to be an idiot not to realize something was wrong.

"Mr. Jin Taekyung!"

"Hyung!"[1959]

I turned at the urgent shouts behind me and saw monsters packing the path I had opened, leaving no gaps between them.

The suicide squad was fighting desperately against them.

"Get the hell out of here. All of you."

Boom-boom-boom-boom!

To the monsters, I was something they could neither stop nor evade.

Dozens of fist shadows shot out like cannonballs and rained down upon their heads.

Some were reduced to bloody pulp and hurled into the distance. Others simply crumpled where they stood.

I charged into the space that had momentarily been emptied.

Slash-slash-slash!

A spearhead wreathed in Force tore through bone and flesh, carving through everything around me. As the monsters fell, System notifications rang out without pause.

SYSTEM

Ding! Ding! Ding!* - You defeated Lv. 55 Darkened Orc Warrior! - You gained an extremely small amount of EXP! - You defeated Lv. 83 Darkened Lizard Mage! - You gained an extremely small amount of EXP...

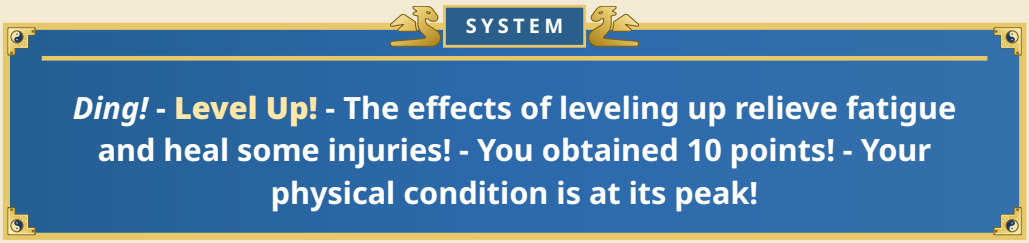
[1959] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older male he is close to.

Then came a cheerful chime I had not heard in a long time.



I could feel it.

My steadily draining internal energy filled to the brim, and the fatigue accumulated throughout my body vanished as if it had been washed away.

But there was something more important.

“Team Leader Choi! Xiao Shen!”

“Yes!”

“What is it?”

I shouted loudly enough for my voice to shake the entire battlefield.

“The fog! Get as far outside its range as you can!”

This was not merely unpleasant, clammy fog. It was a kind of Magic wielded by the Arch Lich.

It strengthened the monsters within its range—or rather, made them Darkened.

Damn Magic.

At that very moment, as I glared at the mysterious fog filling the area around me—

Kraaaa-boom!

A thunderous roar, as if the sky itself had split apart, echoed across heaven and earth.

Chapter 411

For a moment, it felt as though the world had stopped.

My instincts reacted before my brain could process the situation.

The breathing of the people around me and the monsters' howls receded into the distance, as if they were coming from several kilometers[1960] away. My senses, sharper than ever, took in every detail around me.

Fwoooosh.

Droplets of blood, dirt, and dust drifted slowly through the air. Fog hung close enough to grasp if I reached out my hand.

And then…

Qi.

I could feel it—the immense movement of qi surrounding an area several hundred meters[1961] in every direction. As a red alarm began blaring in my head, I kicked off the ground and shot upward.

"Get clear—!"

Kraaa-boooom!

A flash of light was followed by a tremendous roar that shook heaven and earth. From more than ten meters[1962] in the air, I looked down over the battlefield.

The area within a radius of several hundred meters[1963], centered on the spot where I had been standing only a few seconds earlier, had been devastated.

Through the lingering fog and billowing dust, I could see green blood coating the ground and monster corpses blown to pieces.

A Magic Trap.

Fighting an enemy who refused to show himself meant preparing for anything.

There's no compassion in war.

The countless wars recorded throughout human history had served as witness, prosecutor, and judge.

Even humans committed all kinds of horrific atrocities against one another during war. Expecting compassion from monsters that weren't even human was laughable.

That was why vigilance was an essential virtue in war. It reduced the chances of falling into an enemy's trap and minimized casualties.

Just like now.

Tap.

[1960] One kilometer is about 0.62 mi.

[1961] One hundred meters is about 328 ft.

[1962] Ten meters is about 33 ft.

[1963] One hundred meters is about 328 ft.

I landed lightly and reached out my hand.

Bang!

Compressed air burst outward, scattering the dust clouds.

Familiar faces finally emerged from among the blood and corpses covering the ground.

“Team Leader Choi.”

Team Leader Choi took a deep breath and nodded. Behind him stood more than two hundred members of the suicide squad, their faces pale with terror.

“A few people are injured…but everyone made it.”

“That’s a relief.”

“It was an unbelievably powerful trap. Without this, most of us—including me—would probably have died.”

Shk. Wooooong.

Team Leader Choi reached out and touched the transparent barrier spread out before him.

It covered every member of the suicide squad—a Barrier spell painstakingly inscribed into a scroll by one of the three greatest mages among billions of people.

“When the battle is over, I should find Mr. Johnson first. His magic saved our lives.”

“Are you planning to thank him with a kiss?”

“At this point, there’s nothing I wouldn’t do.”

Xiao Shen exhaled the breath he had been holding and joined in.

“I’d be willing to go even further. This is truly…”

Unable to finish, he looked around.

The explosion had been that tremendous. By even the roughest estimate, more than a thousand monsters had been killed or rendered incapable of fighting.

A trap that had not distinguished friend from foe. The Arch Lich had thrown countless subordinates into it as kindling to catch me and the suicide squad.

Look at this bastard…

I had expected as much to some extent, but the Arch Lich’s cunning and boldness went beyond anything I had imagined.

If my signal had been even slightly late, or if I had not volunteered to be bait while breaking through the path ahead, every member of the suicide squad would have been buried here.

Just like that day.

A memory I would never forget. A tragedy that could never be allowed to happen again.

I turned and spoke.

“Keep your distance and follow me. Our objective isn’t to fight the monsters. It’s to break through them.”

The suicide squad answered with a thunderous shout.

The monster army, thrown into chaos after suddenly losing so many of its own in the explosion, hesitated and began to retreat.

A crisis had become an opportunity. We couldn't let this momentum slip away.

"Charge!"

I unleashed an azure dragon's roar infused with internal energy and shot forward.

Slash!

The head of a retreating monster flew into the air.

The two hundred members of the suicide squad drove into the gap left in the monster army like an awl. The main force behind them surged forward like a wave.

"Waaaaaaaaah!"

A deafening roar shook the battlefield.

Green blood spread through the fog.

And far above, a flock of crows circled as they watched the battlefield below.

The being sitting atop a throne of white bones, as if asleep, suddenly opened his eyes.

Intense light flared within his empty eye sockets, and a low murmur escaped him.

"Not bad."

The Arch Lich had hundreds of eyes and ears.

Even now, the Familiars he had stationed throughout the battlefield were taking in every detail without missing a thing.

The humans and monsters locked in fierce combat.

And the group of humans rapidly breaking through the battlefield.

The suicide squad. That was what they called them, wasn't it?

The Arch Lich suddenly recalled something.

An ancient, long-moldering memory. One he had been unable to forget despite spending what felt like eternity submerged in the River of Death.

No. One he could never forget.

The Adversary.

How could he forget?

The single human who had stood at the center of everything. The suicide squad that had risked death to charge alongside the Adversary.

That bastard was the one who drove a sword into my body.

The Arch Lich looked down at his body of pitch-black bone.

In the past, he had not been some lowly existence like an undead. He had been a noble and mighty being, trusted by a king and commanding countless monsters.

But on the day of the final battle, he too had fallen alongside his king.

At the hands of a mere human, no less.

“But…where is the Adversary?”

The Arch Lich’s voice was filled with doubt.

He had surveyed every front through his Familiars, yet the Adversary, who should have appeared, was nowhere to be seen. He had found several humans from his memories, but that was all.

Could it be?

The Arch Lich’s eyes flared violently as he realized something.

It was impossible to believe.

But what if—what if the Adversary had died?

What if the Adversary had met the fate of a mortal?

“Kha…khahahaha!”

His body, rigid as a statue, began to shake.

The laughter infused with magical power made the ground tremble and the air quiver.

Sensing the change in their master’s mood, the guards dropped to the ground and prostrated themselves.

“My lord.”

“Why do you laugh so?”

The guards were an impressive sight. Death Knights, each comparable to a Named Monster, stood alongside Liches with robes pulled low over their heads. Altogether, they numbered twenty.

They were creations made to fight the Adversary.

But now, the Arch Lich had changed his mind.

After laughing with delight, the Arch Lich finally spoke.

“Listen, my faithful servants.”

“Give us your command.”

The Arch Lich rose from his seat and looked down upon his loyal retainers. A chilling voice soon echoed through the space.

“Go to the battlefield. Trample those insignificant humans and wipe them out.”

The twenty Death Knights and Liches bowed without the slightest hesitation.

The Arch Lich was the lord of every undead present. There could be no hesitation in obeying his commands.

“We shall carry out our lord’s command.”

They answered in unison and departed in different directions.

The space was empty once more.

Still chuckling to himself, the Arch Lich sat upon his skeletal throne and focused his mind.

He was surveying the battlefield through the eyes and ears of his countless Familiars when he suddenly paused.

“But…what in the world is that human?”

The pitch-black eyes of a crow soaring overhead reflected a young human cutting through monsters amid sprays of blood.

It was a face absent from the Arch Lich’s memories of the past, though he had already seen him through his Familiars several days earlier.

“That’s the human who defeated the Death Knight Lord.”

The Death Knight Lord, created from Lei Fei, was the finest of all the Arch Lich’s creations.

Although Lei Fei’s powerful soul had prevented the Arch Lich from subjugating him completely, there could be no doubting his strength. The Arch Lich had personally bestowed a portion of his own power upon him.

And yet, because of that insignificant human, he had lost his greatest fighting force and wasted precious magical power.

“He irritates me. I should dispose of him properly while I have the chance.”

Having decided to eliminate him, the Arch Lich sent out a thought.

Half of the guards heading toward the various fronts changed direction at their lord’s order.

Kra-d-d-d-d-k!

Wind, weapons, and the bodies of monsters harder than stone.

Everything caught in the spearhead’s path was cut apart.

Heads flew into the air, and thick limbs spun through the sky.

A Troll that was still breathing was chopped to pieces before it had a chance to regenerate. An ogre that had become undead while still half-rotten staggered, only for a sword that came flying a moment later to take off its upper body.

Slash! Slash! Slash!

After cutting down three or four monsters in an instant with Hero’s Soul, Team Leader Choi shouted to me.

“Mr. Jin Taekyung! The monster assault is too strong!”

He was right. Once we broke through the front line, the number of monsters decreased, but those that remained were far stronger.

I knew it would be like this.

The monsters at the front, used as kindling for the Magic Trap meant to catch us, had mostly been mid- or low-level.

The Arch Lich had placed his elites in the rear and used the other monsters as both bait and meat shields.

To wear us down.

On top of that, the fog had grown even thicker, making the battle more difficult.

The monsters becoming stronger under its influence was bad enough, but in fog this thick, visibility was limited and sound didn't carry properly.

That naturally favored monsters, whose senses were sharper than those of humans.

Of course…

I'm the exception.

Whoooosh! Bang!

My spear lashed out with all my strength, skewering six or seven monsters like meat on a skewer.

Xiao Shen and the Hunters in the suicide squad, having escaped the crisis, gave me grateful looks.

"Everyone, group up around me!"

"But we only have a few magic scrolls left. If another Magic Trap activates…"

"No time to explain! Stop talking and move!"

Team Leader Choi and Xiao Shen nodded at my shout and advanced with the suicide squad.

I understood their concern, but we had already survived three Magic Traps, and this was the rear where the Arch Lich had gathered his elites. The chances of another trap being triggered were slim.

"Focus on defense instead of attacking. Advance!"

The battle itself had become more difficult, but the reduced chance of suddenly stumbling into another trap took a weight off my mind.

I could get myself out of danger easily enough, but the other members of the suicide squad might not survive.

Our final destination is just ahead. Minimize casualties, then join up with Lee Jungryong and Wu Heixing.

Slash! Kra-d-d-d-d-k!

I was at the front, cutting a path through the monsters and beginning to feel fatigue build up, when—

"All. Of. You. Fall. Back!"

"Human. By my lord's command, I shall take your life."

The curtain of monsters split apart to the left and right like the parting of the Red Sea.

I stared blankly, my mouth hanging open, as the beings behind it revealed themselves.

> System - Lv. 120 Darkened Lich - Lv. 115 Darkened Death Knight

There were ten of them, all hovering around Level 120.
For a moment, I could barely breathe. My hands and feet began to tremble.
Team Leader Choi shouted at me in a voice filled with despair.
“We have to retreat right now!”
“T-Team Leader Choi.”
“Get a grip, Mr. Jin Taekyung!”
“The lunchboxes are here.”
“If we keep going like this, we’ll be wiped out…huh?”
With trembling eyes, I stared at the ten monsters.
No—the ten lunchboxes.
“The lunchbox delivery is here.”
“…?”
“…?”
“…?”
Put those question marks away, you bastards.
One Annihilation, coming up.

Chapter 412

Flap, flap.

A crow landed on an ancient tree in the middle of the battlefield, its eyes flashing brightly.

The Arch Lich had perched his Familiar in a spot with an excellent view and was watching the situation unfold with considerable pleasure.

What will you do, human?

One person was reflected in the crow's endlessly gleaming black eyes.

An open mouth. Hands trembling slightly.

The sight of Jin Taekyung made the Arch Lich wonder.

Was the Death Knight Lord truly defeated by such a cowardly human?

The Death Knight Lord may have had a few flaws, but he was unquestionably a masterpiece for the ages.

The Arch Lich had been unable to resist coveting Lei Fei, an excellent material with a noble spirit and formidable martial power.

That was why he had personally granted him a portion of the magical power that formed the very source of his strength. Thanks to that gift, Lei Fei had become a being who transcended the limits of an ordinary Death Knight.

There was no way the Death Knight Lord could have fallen to a mere coward.

What exactly happened?

That day, the Arch Lich had not watched Jin Taekyung and Lei Fei's battle to the end. No—he had not thought there was any need to.

By the time the young human arrived, the human army had already been wiped out. The situation on another front had seemed far more important than watching a foregone conclusion play out.

By the time he belatedly sensed the erasure of his precious retainer and sent a Familiar, everything was already over.

All the Arch Lich had seen was Jin Taekyung standing with several thousand humans who had appeared out of nowhere—and the monster army, annihilated to the last.

That human clearly couldn't have done it alone. Was he simply lucky?

But his luck ended here.

As many as ten Death Knights and Liches possessed the strength of an entire legion, if not more.

And unlike last time, he has no one capable of helping him.

There was only one path left for that human now.

He would helplessly watch his companions die, then fall himself.

That was the only possible ending—and the punishment the Arch Lich had chosen for him.

Cawww!

The crow, sharing its master's mood, let out a grating cry.

Step. Step.

At that very moment, the human approaching his retainers without fear came to a halt.

Then he raised a trembling hand toward the Death Knights and Liches radiating immense magical power.

Does he intend to surrender?

The Arch Lich had thought he was merely a coward. He had not expected him to be this stupid as well.

If he believed surrender would persuade the Arch Lich to spare him, he was gravely mistaken—

"One, two, three, four…"

…?

The Arch Lich found himself flustered for the first time in ages.

First, because fluent Demon Realm language had flowed from Jin Taekyung's mouth.

Second, because he had no idea what Jin Taekyung was doing.

What in the world is he up to?

He did not have to wonder for long.

"…Nine, ten."

As soon as he finished speaking, a droplet of saliva fell from Jin Taekyung's chin with a soft plop.

He wiped his mouth with his sleeve, a satisfied smile spreading across his face.

"The plating is a work of art. Seriously. I hereby award it three Jin-shelin[1964] stars."

…?

…?

Neither the Arch Lich nor his faithful retainers understood what plating or Jin-shelin meant.

But they understood what Jin Taekyung's next action meant.

Goooooooong.

The spearhead had already been drawn far back, too fast for the eye to follow. A terrifying torrent of qi gathered around it.

At that sight, the Arch Lich felt a shock as though his cold, hardened heart had dropped into his stomach.

[1964] Jin-shelin plays on Michelin's restaurant star rating.

A bone-deep chill swept through him, and his thought burst forth.

Dodge—!

But the spear shot forward faster than the thought could reach his retainers.

Wooooooong!

The wind tore apart.

Kraaaaaaaaaash!

Space split open.

Within an instant divided into ever smaller slivers of time, a massive vortex wreathed in blue flames swallowed everything.

Countless monsters. Death Knights and Liches.

Even the flock of crows perched in an ancient tree nearby, watching it all unfold.

Fwooooooosh!

A blinding flash engulfed everyone's vision.

Whooooooosh.

A wind that had come from somewhere seeped through my entire body.

It was a wind only I could feel—and the arrival of new power.

Yes. That's the stuff.

I smiled at the empty space beyond the slowly fading light.

That was where the Death Knights, Liches, and countless other monsters had been standing.

Everything had been cleanly erased, leaving the air filled with System notifications.

Ding. Ding. Ding…

> System - You defeated Lv. 115 Darkened Death Knight! - You defeated Lv. 120 Darkened Lich! - You defeated Lv. 122 Darkened Death Knight! - … - You have defeated too many monsters! - You have gained a massive amount of EXP and Fame! - Level Up! - Level Up! - Level Up! - You have accomplished an exceptional feat! - As a Reward for your achievement, you have obtained the Title One Against a Thousand! - Due to the effect of the Title One Against a Thousand, all Stats rise by a set amount when facing multiple enemies, and fatigue consumption is greatly reduced! During battle, enemies will be intimidated, while allies' morale rises dramatically! - Because you have accomplished an exceptional feat, a massive amount of EXP and additional Rewards will be granted! - Level Up! - A new stat, Intimidation, has been created! - Due to the effect of the Title One Against > a Thousand, Intimidation has increased significantly! - Enemies who face you will feel fear and terror!

I closed my eyes and savored the lingering rush the System had given me.

A symphony of System notifications chimed without pause.

So this was what the bells of heaven sounded like.

Four Level Ups had completely washed away the fatigue from One Annihilation. I had gained a Title that would be exceptionally effective on a massive battlefield like this, along with a new stat called Intimidation.

What a rush. It never gets old. The System is the best.

If every day were like this, I could die without regrets.

"Is that true? Oh! Ohhh…!"

That fucking bastard.

The Skeleton Warlord's mood-killing remark made me open my eyes. The first thing I saw was a sea of humans and monsters frozen like statues.

"…Mr. Jin Taekyung."

"H-Hyung.[1965]"

Team Leader Choi and Xiao Shen stared at me in a daze.

And it wasn't just those two.

All two hundred or so members of the suicide squad looked the same.

Their eyes and voices held unmistakable awe as they gazed at me.

"Good heavens."

"W-What in the world just happened?"

"There were ten Death Knights and Liches. Right there! I saw them with my own eyes!"

Yeah. They had been there.

But now they weren't.

"Goddamn! Holy shit! What the fuck is this? Fucking! Fucking kimchi! Jesus kimchi!"

"Eeeh, eeeeeh? Nani?[1966] Naiii?!"

"…"

Since some of the Hunters had been sent by mercenary companies or the UN, their reactions varied by nationality.

I spoke to Team Leader Choi, who still seemed incapable of forming a sentence.

"Why are you so surprised? It's not like you've never seen it before."

"Was that what you used last time, when you defeated the Black Drake…?"

[1965] Hyung is a Korean term a male uses to address an older male with whom he is familiar.

[1966] Nani is Japanese for "what?"

"That's right."

Team Leader Choi, who had seen One Annihilation once or twice before, swallowed hard.

"…I don't remember it being this powerful."

"I was holding back then."

That was obviously a lie.

The truth was, even I was so stunned by what I had just done that I had no idea what to say.

The first and only time I had used One Annihilation after reaching the Supreme Peak realm was during my battle with the Western Heaven Demon Lord. I had been so exhausted that I lost consciousness immediately afterward.

I didn't know it would be this powerful either.

There had been ten Death Knights and Liches, each one close to Named level.

I had thought killing six or seven of them would count as a success.

After all, monsters at Level 100 or above gave a considerable amount of EXP. With all the other small fry thrown in, there would be enough to level up, so I'd figured there was no way I'd collapse from exhaustion and make a spectacle of myself.

…But this is even more than I expected.

A double-edged sword.

No—a double-edged spear.

But it was undeniably one hell of a powerful strike.

It had blown away not only the hundreds of elite monsters packed tightly together, but all ten Death Knights and Liches as well.

That left a massive gap in the monster army surrounding the suicide squad and me, and the monsters themselves were visibly confused.

I'd be an idiot to waste an opportunity like this.

I raised my spear without hesitation.

The unexpected turn of events had temporarily brought both sides to a halt. But if the monster army recovered and surrounded the badly outnumbered suicide squad again, there was no telling what would happen.

"What are you waiting for, you bastards?"

"Huh?"

"What?"

"Eeeeeh?"

My shout, charged with internal energy, jolted everyone back to their senses.

There was no time for honorifics or any of that.

Right now, only one thing mattered.

"Wipe out everything in your path!"

"…!"

Ding.

> System - Due to the effect of the Title One Against a Thousand, the morale of your allies has risen dramatically! Those who follow your command will form a strong bond and fight even more effectively! - Due to the effect of the Title One Against a Thousand, the enemy has become greatly intimidated! - Due to the Title One Against a Thousand, the effect of Intimidation has increased! - Under the influence of Intimidation, the enemy feels fear and backs away!

The System messages described exactly what was happening.

The monsters still alive after witnessing the divine might I had displayed slowly retreated. Even the undead monsters, which had already lost their minds, were intimidated and flinched.

As for us?

"Charge!"

Whoosh! Kra-d-d-d-d-k!

With a thunderous shout, I leaped into the gap created by One Annihilation and swung my spear in every direction.

The roughly two hundred members of the suicide squad surged forward as one, roaring loudly enough to make my ears ring.

"Waaaaaaaaah!"

"Follow Mr. Jin! Wipe them all out!"

"Fucking! Fucking Jin Genghis Khan! Jesus Kimchiman!"

"Eeeeeeeh?!"

Splat! Shraaaaaak!

Green blood sprayed through the air, and undead bones shattered into pieces.

Slash!

I cleanly split the upper body of a Troll trying to turn its back and flee.

The Skeleton Warlord shouted at me furiously.

"Wicked human! Over there! Kill that one!"

"What? Who?"

"Kill that strange human who keeps going 'eeeeeeh'!"

"…"

"Or I'll kill him myself! If he does it one more time, I swear I'll kill him!"

"Yeah, okay."

I'd been hearing it too, and it was starting to piss me off.

“Ghk!”

The Arch Lich let out a strangled groan.

As if having the Link with his Familiar forcibly severed were not enough, all ten of his guards had been erased in a single blow.

Unlike ordinary monsters, they were retainers imbued with his own power. The Arch Lich could not escape the backlash.

“This is madness. How could a mere human…”

The Arch Lich gathered his disrupted magical power, then stopped short.

A mere human?

No. That was wrong.

Humans were certainly insignificant beings, but they could never be underestimated.

The Arch Lich had already learned that lesson through bitter experience.

Could that guy…?

At the ominous possibility that flashed through his mind, the light in the Arch Lich’s eyes blazed fiercely.

Chapter 413

Fwoooosh! Kraaaash!

A massive greatsword smashed into the ground. Wu Heixing's body shot upward like lightning, having dodged the attack by exactly half a span.[1967]

Shnk!

His blade drove up beneath the ogre's jaw and burst out through the crown of its head.

A precise strike, without a single wasted motion.

Wu Heixing wrenched his sword free, stepped off the falling ogre's shoulder, and dropped into the horde of monsters.

The sword in his hand traced countless lines through the air.

The Twelve Blood Net Sword.

Some condemned the Cultural Revolution,[1968] which lasted from 1966 to 1976, as an atrocity that outraged heaven and humanity. For others, however, it had been the opportunity of a lifetime.

Wu Heixing's grandfather, a longtime political associate of Mao Zedong,[1969] had risen spectacularly and embezzled an astronomical fortune. Using his son—a member of the Red Guards[1970]—as a stepping stone, he had smuggled away all manner of cultural artifacts and ancient books.

The Twelve Blood Net Sword Wu Heixing had learned was one of the countless ancient books his grandfather had acquired at the time.

Shreeeeek!

A net of twelve strands spread out, covering more than ten meters[1971] in every direction.

The net of red aura sliced through skin and flesh and cleaved bone. Dozens of high-tier monsters fell apart in pieces.

It was power worthy of an S-rank Hunter.

Thoroughly emboldened, Wu Heixing shouted.

"Red Guard Gang! What are you doing? Sweep them all away, you bastards!"

"Yes, sir!"

His mana-infused roar shook the battlefield.

[1967] A ppyeom is a handspan, measured between the tips of an outstretched thumb and little finger. Half a span is roughly 10 cm (4 in), though it varies by hand.

[1968] The Cultural Revolution was a political campaign in China that targeted perceived ideological opponents and many cultural traditions.

[1969] Mao Zedong led the People's Republic of China during the Cultural Revolution.

[1970] The Red Guards were radical youth organizations active during China's Cultural Revolution.

[1971] Ten meters is about 33 ft.

The roughly three hundred elite Hunters of the Red Guard Gang, founded by Wu Heixing's family and raised as their private army, charged into every opening without hesitation.

Shreeeek! Splurt!

Whoosh! Slash!

—Krrk, khrrrk!

"Aaaaargh!"

The screams of humans and monsters mingled with sprays of blood on every side.

The Red Guard Gang Hunters whom Wu Heixing had held in reserve until the very end were unquestionably strong. But their enemies were high-tier monsters as well.

The elite monsters positioned in the rear darted through the thick fog as they fought the Hunters. Regardless of the difference in level, the monsters outnumbered them three or four to one.

And yet…

"You filthy, stinking bastards dare!"

Stab-stab-stab!

The presence of an S-rank Hunter like Wu Heixing was enough to turn the unfavorable battle around.

He might have drawn widespread criticism for his debauched behavior and foul temperament, but he was still a genius who had grown up with every possible advantage.

Besides, unlike when he had first been deployed to the front lines, Wu Heixing had become more experienced. After passing through battlefields where death ran rampant, his skills had advanced by another step.

I can do this! I'm Wu Heixing!

Exhilaration surged from deep within his chest as he swung his sword without pause.

His enemy was a monster army numbering in the tens of thousands. He had been afraid at first, but somehow he had made it this far.

Whenever he suffered even a minor injury or began to tire, he gulped down expensive potions like water. When necessary, he had used the Red Guard Gang Hunters as shields to withdraw.

And now, not a single monster could stop his red aura blade.

I'll make sure no one ever looks down on me again. Lei Fei. That fucking bangzi[1972] bastard. No one!

That was the moment Wu Heixing ground his teeth at the humiliating memory.

Fwooooooosh! Boom!

[1972] Bangzi is a derogatory Chinese term for a Korean person.

A spear flew in at blinding speed, skewering three or four Hunters like meat on a skewer before burying itself deep in the ground.

A three-meter-long[1973] lance—something rarely seen on a battlefield like this.

Wu Heixing whipped his head around to find the attacker, and his eyes flew wide.

“Death Knight!”

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

The figure riding a skeletal horse across the battlefield was unmistakably a Death Knight.

And there were two of them, not one.

The second Death Knight raised its lance from horseback.

“Everyone, watch—!”

Fwooooooosh! Boom!

Before Wu Heixing could finish his warning, the second lance tore through the air and pierced six or seven Hunters clustered together.

Even the finest armor could not stop the strike. Arms and legs flew into the air, and bodies missing their upper halves collapsed with heavy thuds.

The sudden appearance of the Death Knights.

Then, as the Red Guard Gang’s Hunters froze at the horrifying sight unfolding before their eyes—

—D-a-r-k. V-i-n-e!

An eerie voice like metal scraping against metal rang out, and the ground began to change.

Crack! Kra-d-d-d-d-k!

The solid ground split apart like a spiderweb, and black vines surged up through the cracks.

Filled with magical power, they moved like living creatures. Some seized human arms and legs, while others wormed through gaps left exposed by armor and pierced their victims.

Shrrrrk! Stab-stab!

“Kyaaaaargh!”

“Black magic! It’s black magic!”

“Don’t panic! Cut the vines! Get out of the area now!”

Screams and shouts rang out everywhere.

Crack.

Wu Heixing tore the black vines coiling around him from the ground like scallion roots and flung them aside, biting down hard on his lip.

It was not the deaths of his Hunters that troubled him.

[1973] Three meters is about 9.8 ft.

He understood what this entire series of events meant.

“Lich…!”

Wu Heixing’s guess was correct.

High above their heads, a death mage riding atop the head of a giant Wyvern that prowled through the gray sky raised a staff made of skulls and bones and pointed it at the ground.

—C-o-n-f-u-s-i-n-g!

Whooooooosh!

With that eerie cry, magical power poured down like dark storm clouds and engulfed the entire area.

The Hunters struggling to escape the black vines suddenly writhed as hallucinations and phantom voices seized them. They became easy prey for the monsters lurking around them.

—Sssssss!

—Gwoooooar!

Smash! Kra-d-d-d-d-k!

“Krrk, khk!”

“P-Please, save me!”

“Mother! You can’t die, Mother!”

Some fell with a final scream.

Others continued to howl even as they died, unable to escape the hallucinations and phantom voices.

But there were also those whose powerful wills allowed them to break free of the spell.

“You have to go!”

“Young Master!”

Despite the shouts of the A-rank Hunters surrounding him, Wu Heixing’s face had gone as white as a sheet.

Only one question circled through his mind.

What—what the hell am I supposed to do?

The Lich was in the sky, while two Death Knights were rapidly approaching from the ground.

Could they retreat?

If they did, where would they go? How would they get there?

Wu Heixing might have been able to face the two Death Knights alone, but what about the Lich’s magic and the countless monsters surrounding the area so tightly that not even water could pass through?

No matter how hard he thought, he could find no answer.

This…this fucking situation…

Crack.

Wu Heixing was grinding his teeth hard enough to crack them when—

Fwoooosh! Bang!

With the sharp crack of compressed air exploding, a streak of light shot up from the distant ground and sliced through the sky.

The next moment, the headless body of the Wyvern began to plummet.

“This…”

Wu Heixing muttered the word like a groan.

Everyone forgot the situation around them and looked up at the sky.

Before their eyes, the Wyvern’s body plummeted faster and faster, while a heap of black bones—the being that had once been called a Lich—tumbled down after it.

“…That’s impossible.”

The Lich was dead.

Killed in a single strike.

Someone had pierced through dozens of layers of defensive magic and accurately intercepted a target in midair?

Even an S-rank Hunter could not easily guarantee such a feat.

Wu Heixing had never seen an attack so fast or so powerful.

But for someone else, it was as natural as breathing.

The man who had been quietly watching what he had done from a short distance away suddenly opened his mouth.

“It’s been a long time since I threw a spear. I’m certainly not as good as I used to be.”

The man standing behind him like an iron tower answered in a stiff tone.

“It was an excellent throw.”

“Hmm. No, it wasn’t. I seem to have grown rusty. Proof that I’m getting old, I suppose.”

“That cannot be.”

At the Head of Security’s usual flat response, Lee Jungryong smiled gently.

“I saw Death Knights.”

Go Jun nodded without a word.

“Yes. Two of them.”

“Do you think Wu Heixing can stop them?”

“If you mean the Death Knights, he should be able to defeat them without much difficulty.”

Go Jun added in a low voice.

“If there were no monsters around them.”

“So under the present circumstances, it will be difficult.”

“The black magic has dissipated, but they have already suffered considerable losses, and there are far too many monsters.”

“Then they’ll have to struggle with everything they have.”

“It will be a fierce and difficult battle.”

“My, my. Then I suppose we should help them.”

“Would it not be better to watch a little longer?”

Lee Jungryong widened his eyes in feigned surprise.

“Why?”

Go Jun had been taught by Lee Jungryong since childhood. He knew that each of these moments was a test from his Master.

He also knew what answer was expected of him.

“Would they not be more grateful if we helped them when the situation was more precarious?”

Only then did the Master smile in satisfaction at his Disciple’s answer. Even his manner of speaking changed.

“Yes. That’s exactly it.”

“The Red Guard Gang has been a nuisance for some time.”

“They’re amusing bastards. They shout about the people and communism, then form a private army of Hunters behind everyone’s backs.”

“But the Crown Prince Party supporting the Red Guard Gang is friendly toward us, is it not?”

“That is precisely why the Red Guard Gang must disappear. They have always avoided the sunlight by sitting in the shade of that tree. Once the tree is uprooted, what choice will they have?”

“They’ll have to find another tree or buy themselves a parasol.”

“We will become their new tree. If that happens, even more opportunities will open up.”

Go Jun nodded, then suddenly spoke.

“May I ask one more question?”

“Go ahead.”

“The reason you brought Wu Heixing into this operation… Does it have something to do with Jin Taekyung?”

The question had been troubling Go Jun for some time.

Even if Wu Heixing was an S-rank Hunter, why bring along an idiot like him?

That man is immensely powerful. Even if Master is using Wu Heixing, what use could he possibly be?

Sometimes, this happened.

Just when Go Jun thought he had grown accustomed to his Master's thoughts and actions, he would find himself unable to understand Lee Jungryong's true intentions.

And whenever that happened, Lee Jungryong would always wear an inscrutable smile.

Just like now.

"Team Leader Seok."

Both his tone and the atmosphere changed.

Returning to his role as Ares Guild's Head of Security, Go Jun bowed deeply.

"Yes, Vice Guild Master."

"It seems the time has come for you to step in. What do you think?"

Go Jun raised his head and looked past Lee Jungryong's shoulder at the fierce battle.

The carefully selected elites of the Red Guard Gang were dying to the monsters, while Wu Heixing had just finished taking down one of the two Death Knights.

"I'll be going, then."

"Do be careful not to get hurt."

Go Jun answered with a brief bow, then led the waiting Ares Guild members toward the battlefield.

They did not shout as they charged the monsters, but the force they radiated was more than enough to overwhelm everything before them.

Kra-d-d-d-d-k! Slash!

Lee Jungryong watched in satisfaction as one flank of the monster army collapsed in an instant.

Then he suddenly caught the smell of blood carried on the wind.

The wind was blowing from the west.

It was the signal that the man he had been waiting for had arrived.

"Right on time."

Lee Jungryong murmured under his breath and looked toward the distant horizon.

As he raised his qi, his senses sharpened like a razor, and a man's shout reached his ears.

—Fuck, kill them all! And that bastard who's been going 'Eeeeeeh' this whole time —if he does it one more time, I'm counting him as a monster. Got it?

Lee Jungryong let out a low chuckle and extended his hand.

Then he clenched his fist toward Jin Taekyung, who was somewhere out there.

Chapter 414

Some faces are never a welcome sight, no matter how many times you see them. For me, Lee Jungryong and Wu Heixing fell squarely into that category.

Even so, I spoke first because Wu Heixing looked almost presentable today.

“Fancy seeing you here. I thought I’d never see you again.”

At my cheerful greeting, the battered Wu Heixing shot me a venomous glare.

“Shut up.”

“Oh…”

“Say one more word, and on my grandfather’s honor, I’ll tear you limb from limb.”

Is he some Chinese version of Kindaichi or something?[1974] I could never understand why people like him treated their late grandfathers’ honor like a credit card.

I put on a serious face.

“Were you and your grandfather not on good terms?”

“What?”

“No, think about it. Why stake your grandfather’s honor on something impossible? You’d be much better off staking it on you getting torn limb from limb…”

“You fucking bastard!”

Wu Heixing sprang to his feet with an enraged shout, but Lee Jungryong raised a hand to stop him.

“That’s enough.”

“Mr. Lee! But this bastard…”

“Fighting among ourselves before the final battle will do us nothing but harm. Calm down.”

Crunch.

Wu Heixing ground his teeth as if he meant to break them, then glared at me.

“Understood. Since you insist, Mr. Lee, I’ll let it end here.”

“A wise decision.”

Was he really the type to back down so obediently?

As I studied Lee Jungryong’s gentle smile, I turned my head slightly.

A brief glance from Team Leader Choi told me plenty.

“What about you, Jin Taekyung?”

I looked away from Team Leader Choi and gave a casual shrug.

“When an elder speaks, you have to listen.”

“I didn’t know you cared about things like that.”

“You have to respect your elders, don’t you?”

[1974] Kindaichi is a fictional Japanese detective known for vowing to solve mysteries on his grandfather’s name.

At my calm, unruffled answer, Lee Jungryong gave a hearty laugh whose meaning I could not decipher. Wu Heixing glared at me as if he wanted to kill me all over again.

"Respect your elders? Spare me that ridiculous bullshit. Then what about me? I'm seven years older than you."

"If you don't want to write your will, start by making your eyes look nicer."

"You turtle-dicked son of a…!"

"Quit your bullshit."

Wu Heixing's second outburst died in his throat.

I fixed him with a cold stare and continued.

"If you still have enough energy to lose your temper over something this trivial, go check on the friends you brought with you."

"…!"

"They risked their lives to follow you this far. They're not consumables you can use once and throw away."

I made no attempt to hide my contempt.

Barely fifty Hunters remained around Wu Heixing.

According to the report from headquarters, his suicide squad had set out five hundred strong. Most of them must have died or fallen behind.

"Losses? Sure, that happens. We're in the middle of a battle. But…"

Wu Heixing's armor might have been drenched in blood, but it was otherwise completely intact. Even as his comrades died around him, he had fought while protecting himself.

"Got anything to say, you fucking idiot?"

A line from an old superhero movie I had watched as a kid came to mind.

With great power comes great responsibility.

And that didn't apply only to people bitten by radioactive spiders.

If someone could produce an aura blade instead of spiderwebs—if he had used that power to amass tremendous wealth and fame and cover up the crimes he had committed—then he had to bear at least some responsibility.

That was what I believed.

"You might be S-rank, but you're no Hunter. So from now on, when you introduce yourself, don't call yourself one. Just say, 'I'm Wu Heixing, the lucky S-rank.' Got it?"

"…"

Wu Heixing's clenched fists trembled, but Lee Jungryong answered in his place.

"He did his best."

"Judging by his armor, I doubt it. He could wipe that down right now and list it on Junggonara as used equipment."[1975]

"Wearing sturdy, high-quality armor is hardly grounds for criticism."

"I noticed this last time too, but you go out of your way to defend him. Does that bastard have some kind of dirt on you?"

"Everyone has weaknesses. I simply happen to be quite good at hiding mine."

"You should have your computer checked. Who knows? Maybe Chinese hackers are sharing videos of the Vice Guild Master watching porn in a group chat."

"I'll keep that in mind."

He really is a formidable opponent.

Lee Jungryong smiled without the slightest sign of agitation, but the man standing behind him reacted differently.

I waved at the man radiating a faint killing intent.

"Well, look who it is. Team Leader Seok. Isn't that our Go Jun?"

Lee Jungryong's Head of Security and Disciple.

I distinctly remembered beating him half to death before we left for China, but the man standing before me looked not only fine, but even more solid than before.

His gaze alone had grown deeper and more profound. I could tell at a glance that his abilities had advanced significantly.

And he's learned some patience.

Go Jun was the most loyal of all the loyal hounds Lee Jungryong had raised.

In the past, he would have rushed at me without hesitation. But this time, he had gathered up his killing intent until not a trace remained and chosen silence instead of drawing his weapon.

Lee Jungryong regarded his Disciple with satisfaction before speaking.

"We've reached the Arch Lich's doorstep. According to the coordinates, only twenty kilometers remain."[1976]

I swept back my blood-sticky hair.

"Probably the longest and fiercest twenty kilometers on Earth."[1977]

"Indeed. The Arch Lich has kept a considerable force in reserve."

"How many?"

"An estimated fifty thousand."

The moment those words left his mouth, a groan escaped from the members of the suicide squad who had been listening intently to our conversation.

The suicide squads led by Lee Jungryong, Wu Heixing, and me numbered only around five hundred in total.

[1975] Junggonara is a Korean online marketplace for secondhand goods.
[1976] Twenty kilometers is about 12 miles.
[1977] Twenty kilometers is about 12 miles.

The mere estimate was enough to fill them with despair. To reach the Arch Lich, we would have to break through an army a hundred times our size.

Perhaps that was why someone shouted in a frightened voice.

“We should retreat while we still can!”

As if a dam had burst, cries rose from the other Hunters.

“Fuck!”

“There are too many monsters!”

“We’ll all be wiped out if we keep this up!”

“I came here to defeat the Arch Lich, not to die a meaningless death!”

Even the roughly two hundred members of the Western Front’s suicide squad, who had made it this far with almost no losses, were no exception.

Yet amid the fear spreading like wildfire, two people remained unshaken.

Xiao Shen, who watched me with unwavering trust, and…

“There’s a possibility.”

Team Leader Choi had gone beyond simply trusting me. He had independently deduced one possible explanation for the situation. He continued in a calm voice.

“An estimated fifty thousand is far beyond the High Command’s prediction.”

“Then shouldn’t we obviously retreat?”

Team Leader Choi immediately shook his head at the shout from one of the suicide squad members.

“The number of monsters we faced was also lower than expected.”

“Huh?”

“There were certainly many of them, but the monster forces we encountered on the front lines were not as overwhelming as we anticipated.”

“Then…”

“The Arch Lich may have been guarding against precisely this situation. Rather than commit all its forces to the front lines, it kept an army of fifty thousand in reserve as a final move it could use under any circumstances.”

The faces of the Hunters watching Team Leader Choi stiffened—not because they fully understood what he meant, but because the ground beneath their feet had begun to shake with increasing force.

Grk. Gr-r-r-r-rk.

The rumbling could be felt from dozens of kilometers away.[1978] Everyone’s body trembled with it.

A ruined road stretched ahead, vast plains spreading out on either side. Beyond the dense fog filling the landscape, the roars and footsteps of tens of thousands of monsters merged into a faint, distant thunder.

[1978] Dozens of kilometers means a distance of at least roughly 15 miles.

“Groooooooar!”

“This is insane…”

“Run. We have to run. We can’t win this.”

People began to edge backward.

The only exception was the Ares Guild members, who stood firm without wavering. In front of them, Lee Jungryong watched Team Leader Choi with interest.

“So?”

Their gazes met. I saw Team Leader Choi’s grip tighten around Hero’s Soul.

“Although the High Command’s prediction was wrong, the front lines must have had forces to spare because the Arch Lich did not launch an all-out attack.”

“Even so, our forces were still insufficient compared to the enemy’s.”

“That is exactly why certain people were left behind—to make up the difference.”

Grk. Gr-r-r-rk.

The vibrations and roars grew stronger. Amid the anxious, agitated murmuring, Team Leader Choi’s mana-charged voice pierced everyone’s ears.

“Those capable of overturning the course of a battle in an instant. S-rank Hunters, each of whom is called a one-person army.”

At that exact moment—

Fwooooooosh!

A dazzling mass of light erupted above our heads.

Amid the brilliant radiance, the air split apart as if sliced by a razor-sharp sword. Three people descended through the opening, stepping on the empty air as though walking down a staircase.

“When I was a child, my great-grandmother would often sit me on her lap and tell me that royalty must fulfill the duties befitting their station. Commoners like you would not understand, of course.”

I let out a snort and bowed at the waist. He was usually annoying beyond belief, but this time I had no choice but to play along.

“His Highness Prince Felix.”

“It is pleasing to hear those words from your lips, Jin, Hunter of the Orient.”

At Prince Felix’s lofty, self-important manner, the beautiful woman beside him clicked her tongue.

“Can’t you do something about him? Gag him, at least.”

“I think we should indulge him today, big sis.”

“Oh my.”

Faye Chen’s eyes widened at my answer, then she broke into a bright smile.

“That’s nice to hear. Coming all this way was worth it after all. Don’t you agree?”

The last of the three laughed heartily at Faye Chen’s question.

"Does that mean I can expect something too? What do you think, Jin?"

"What, should I kiss you?"

"Oh, that wouldn't be bad. But I'll politely decline. I'm already married to my beloved Fred, and we have five adopted children."

Fwoosh. Thump.

Magic Johnson glided down through the air and patted my shoulder with a palm as large as a pot lid.

"Jin, you brave little rascal. How did you ever think of attempting such a dangerous Teleport? I nearly gave up several times."

"But you still did it, Johnson."

"The odds were different. This time, there was only a ten percent chance of failure. You're at least eighty percent braver than I am."

Courage didn't come in sizes.

Simply by risking death to come here, they had proved themselves worthy of being called the greatest Hunters in the world.

The people who had received these unexpected reinforcements stared at them with wide, disbelieving eyes.

"F-Faye Chen?"

"Prince Felix and Magic Johnson are here too!"

"They're S-rank Hunters! S-rank Hunters came to help us!"

"I love you, Johnson! Fucking nice gay!"

But that wasn't the end.

Boom. Boom. Boom.

Another vibration came through the ground, different from the one we had felt moments earlier.

It heralded the arrival of an enormous army marching in step. Far away, countless figures emerged as a line of dots stretching across the distant horizon.

"Did you think we came charging in without a plan?"

Faye Chen grinned.

"Ten thousand troops from the Western and Eastern Fronts combined. That should at least buy enough time for you to escape."

A dazed voice slipped from someone's lips.

"Now we can survive…"

A voice answered him.

"No."

Team Leader Choi raised Hero's Soul high.

Even through the dense fog, its transparent blade shone beautifully.

"We're going to win."

I believed it too.

Chapter 415

The battle came quickly.

Before tens of thousands of monsters and the thick fog rolling over the wasteland like waves, a black-skinned Grand Mage stood tall, stepping on empty air, and uttered a single word heralding the beginning of the battle.

“Fire Cannon.”

Fwooooooosh.

An immense torrent of mana swirled around him. Five flames sprang to life in midair, swelled to enormous size, and shot forward like cannonballs.

Fwooooooosh—BOOM!

The black tide of tens of thousands of monsters split apart. Blistering heat burned flesh and bone and melted the ground.

An area-of-effect spell that reduced at least a thousand soldiers to ash.

But the monsters did not stop.

Neither did Magic Johnson.

“Water Blaster.”

The air, dry as sand after the Fire Cannon, grew heavy with moisture.

Magic Johnson spread his arms, and an enormous wave rose behind him.

The sight defied every law of the world.

It was magic in the truest sense—the supernatural power of the greatest War Mage among countless mages.

“Engulf them.”

The cheerful, ever-laughing man was nowhere to be seen.

Magic Johnson flung both hands out, his gaze grave. A wave dozens of meters[1979] high cast a broad, dark shadow over the tens of thousands of monsters.

Roooooar!

Brimming with mana, the wave crashed down. The tremendous water pressure crushed the monsters, bursting their bodies and tearing them apart.

The flames left behind by Fire Cannon went out, and the surrounding area was flooded with water.

Magic Johnson knew exactly what to do next.

“Strike. Lightning Rain.”

It happened in an instant.

Black storm clouds gathered over the monsters’ heads, and dozens of bolts of lightning came crashing down.

BOOM! Crackle!

[1979] Dozens of meters means tens of meters; 10 m is about 33 ft.

—Kraaaaaaar!

—Kyaaak!

The lightning struck without distinction, tearing through targets both in the air and on the ground.

Blackened Gargoyles and Griffins plummeted from the sky, while the ground, soaked by Water Blaster, carried the current.

The living monsters trembled violently and dropped to their knees with a single shriek. The undead collapsed into piles of ash.

At the unbelievable sight unfolding before our eyes, a groan escaped someone's lips.

"So this is a Grand Mage…"

The results of only three area-of-effect spells were staggering.

At least several thousand monsters had either died or been rendered incapable of fighting, and one flank of the monster army had collapsed.

But even the Grand Mage who had single-handedly unleashed a natural disaster could not escape the crushing fatigue.

"Fuck. If I'd known this would happen, I would've saved a few more spells."

Casting magic was no simple task. Area-of-effect magic in particular—Magic Johnson's specialty—consumed mental strength and mana on a scale proportionate to its destructive power.

Considering how much magic he had already poured into the front lines before coming here, this was his limit.

"Mrs. Chen. I guess I'm getting old too."

"Move aside. We old folks have to look out for each other. And…"

Faye Chen tossed aside the whiskey bottle in her hand, drew the bow strapped at her side with lightning speed, and pulled back the string.

An arrow of mana formed against the empty bowstring.

"It's not Mrs. Chen. It's Miss Chen. Who decided I was married?"

Faye Chen snorted and released the string.

The mana arrow, scattering a dazzling radiance, shot forward with a sharp whistle. It erased the space in its path and split through the thick fog.

And then—

BOOM!

A tremendous explosion erupted.

After confirming that the Death Knight hiding among the countless monsters had vanished without even managing a final cry, Faye Chen pulled back her bowstring again.

Thrum-thrum-thrum!

Arrows loosed in the blink of an eye became streaks of light across the wasteland. Thunderous explosions followed, each arrow sweeping away and annihilating dozens of monsters.

If Magic Johnson was one of the world's three greatest Grand Mages and its finest War Mage, Faye Chen was the finest archer alive.

But…

—Gwooooooar!

—Kyaaaaa!

The monster army, tens of thousands strong, ignored it all and charged.

Cut down dozens, and dozens more filled their places. Cut down hundreds, and hundreds more took their place.

Charging through the thick fog, they were stronger and more ferocious than ordinary monsters.

All that remained was an unavoidable head-on battle.

Facing the oncoming monster army, two men stepped forward at the same time.

"Ares Guild. Formation B. Break through them."

Clatter-clatter-clatter!

At Lee Jungryong's quiet command, the elite Guild members who had made it this far without a single casualty moved as one.

Jin Taekyung studied them closely, then addressed the suicide squad he had brought from the Western Front.

"Everyone, Formation J."

"Yes, sir!"

"Formation J! Get into position!"

The suicide squad moved swiftly, repeating the command in thunderous voices.

Behind Jin Taekyung, Wu Heixing had been gathering the handful of Red Guard Gang Hunters who remained. He grabbed one of the Western Front suicide-squad members and asked,

"Hey, rookie. What the hell is Formation J?"

Recognizing Wu Heixing, Xiao Shen frowned before answering.

"Hyung[1980] came up with the formation himself."

"So what does it mean?"

"Nothing special. He said it means, 'Just fucking fight.'"

"…"

Wu Heixing was momentarily speechless, and Lee Jungryong and Jin Taekyung launched themselves forward at the exact same time, as if they had planned it.

Prince Felix and ten thousand Hunters surged fiercely after them.

[1980] Hyung is a familiar Korean form of address used by a man for an older brother or older man.

“Aaaaaaaaah!”

—Kraaaaaaaargh!

Humans and monsters.

Monsters and humans.

Deafening battle cries and killing intent erupted. Racing across the wasteland at blinding speed, the two sides bared their teeth and leveled their spears and blades at one another.

Fwooooooosh—Kra-d-d-d-d-k!

The great battle had begun.

I leaned back and put my shoulder into it. The movements flowed seamlessly together as I whipped my arm forward with all my strength.

Whoosh—thud-thud-thud-thud!

White Flame shot from my hand, piercing dozens of monsters and opening a path.

A gap appeared in an instant.

Without hesitation, I plunged into it and lashed out with my arms and legs at everything within reach.

Crack!

My fist shot forward too fast to see, crushing the head of the charging Lycanthrope like a watermelon.

Before the brain matter spilling from its skull could hit the ground, I leaped into the air.

Tap—whoosh!

A four-meter-tall[1981] figure loomed before me. My reflection appeared in its pale pupils, long since drained of light.

But before the Undead Troll could swing its club, my palm slammed into its chest.

Boom!

Smoke curled from the Undead Troll’s seven apertures[1982] along with a surge of tremendous heat. Its insides had suffered catastrophic damage, and it met its final death before its extraordinary regenerative power could even come into play.

“Wicked human! Behind you!”

I know, idiot. Who asked for your advice?

I turned my head. A lance wreathed in pitch-black magic grazed my neck and hurtled into the sky.

[1981] Four meters is about 13 ft.

[1982] The traditional seven bodily apertures are the two eyes, two ears, two nostrils, and mouth.

It had been thrown to catch me while I was suspended in midair. The timing was good, but the enemy had made one mistake.

It had underestimated me.

"Fuck. Why are there so many Death Knights? What is this, a chicken joint?[1983]"

I landed lightly after evading the lance, and a Death Knight mounted on a skeletal horse charged straight at me.

"This. Is. As. Far. As. You. Go!"

Fwooooooosh!

With that shout, it swung a sword wreathed in ominous magic. The energy it gave off could not compare to an S-rank Hunter's, but it was on par with that of a top-tier A-rank Hunter.

Or perhaps…

This Death Knight must have been a Hunter once too.

Maybe that was why.

The sight of the Death Knight reminded me of Lei Fei, leaving a sudden bitter taste in my mouth.

The Skeleton Warlord screamed when it saw my reaction.

"Dodge, human!"

Thud!

The magic clinging to the Death Knight's sword vanished without a trace.

The Death Knight stared blankly at the transparent spearhead that had pierced through its chest and emerged from its back. Then it muttered weakly,

"How…"

"This is as far as you go."

I returned the Death Knight's own words to it and brought down the edge of my hand.

"I don't know who you used to be, but you've suffered enough."

Slash—thud!

The skeletal horse and Death Knight split in two and vanished.

As before, I used Seizing an Object Through Empty Space to draw White Flame back toward me, cutting down a monster along the way. Then I abruptly asked,

"How come you're not pestering me for food today?"

"Ahem. What do you take me for? How dare you mistake this commander for—"

Slash!

"A freeloader. You call yourself a pacifist, but you only start drooling at times like this. Shameless bastard."

[1983] Fried-chicken restaurants are famously everywhere in South Korea, so "a chicken joint" is shorthand for something found on every corner.

"What did you say?"

"Why? Was any of that wrong?"

"You, wicked human, agreed that I should not participate in the battle! And were you not the one who said the other humans could not find out about me?"

"Quit making excuses. So, are you going to absorb that mana or not?"

"…"

Crack!

"Hey. You hear me?"

"Hmm. I don't particularly want to absorb it."

"…What?"

Fwooooooosh!

I was so startled that I nearly let an attack through.

I swept my spear in a wide arc, wiping out a dozen monsters, then asked in all seriousness,

"What's wrong? Is it time for you to vanish?"

"Hmm… I do not know either. I simply feel that way."

"You feel that way?"

"Yes. I am undead too. Sometimes even I feel unsettled. Leave me be."

"…Since when do the undead feel unsettled?"

Normally, he would have charged in like a Beggars' Sect disciple who had not eaten in four days. Why was he acting like this?

Can undead go through puberty too?

Even for an oddball monster like the Skeleton Warlord, that made no sense.

I gave up trying to figure him out and continued cutting down monsters.

That was when it happened.

Roooooooar!

Aura—no, Sword Energy—blanketed a radius of more than ten meters.[1984]

One person landed lightly at the center of the front line, now suddenly empty.

"There are too many monsters. We can't clear a path for the entire suicide squad."

I knew exactly what Lee Jungryong meant.

"You're saying we should go with a small elite force?"

"Precisely. Duck."

I bent backward at Lee Jungryong's warning. A crescent of Sword Energy flew over me and sliced three or four enormous monsters apart like cheesecake.

What if that Sword Energy had been aimed at me? If Lee Jungryong and I fought…

"You, me, and Wu Heixing. The three of us should be enough."

I licked my dry lips before answering.

[1984] Ten meters is about 33 ft.

“That’s a strange thing to say.”

“What is?”

“You never know until you fight. We won’t know how strong the Arch Lich is until we face it.”

“There are three S-rank Hunters here. No matter how powerful the Arch Lich may be, it cannot stand against us.”

Us…

It was a wonderful word. So why did I dislike the way it felt rolling off my tongue?

Maybe it was because of the people included in it.

But I had already made up my mind when I proposed the suicide-squad operation. In that sense, Lee Jungryong’s suggestion was the best option.

“Let’s do that. Where’s Wu Heixing?”

Kra-d-d-d-d-k!

Before I had even finished speaking, Wu Heixing tore his way through the monsters and appeared.

Unlike Lee Jungryong, who remained so immaculate that it was hard to believe he was in the middle of a battle, Wu Heixing looked terrible. But the fierce light in his eyes proved he still had plenty of strength left.

“Good. You made it in time.”

Wu Heixing let out a ragged breath. “Mere monsters could never stop me.”

Didn’t that bastard nearly die to those same mere monsters about an hour ago?

I was inwardly clicking my tongue at how little Wu Heixing had changed when a shout came from far away.

“Mr. Jin!”

It was Team Leader Choi.

Beyond the hundreds of monsters between us, his face briefly appeared before vanishing again.

Then something gleaming spun through the air and embedded itself in the ground nearby.

This is…

I recognized it immediately.

It was Hero’s Soul.

From somewhere beyond my sight, Team Leader Choi shouted,

“I’m not going to say I’ll go with you, so take that sword with you instead. And… be careful!”

Those words carried a great deal of meaning.

Without a word, I pulled Hero’s Soul from the ground.

Beyond the countless monsters still filling my vision, I could see a city shrouded in darkness.

“Let’s go.”
Lee Jungryong smiled gently.

Chapter 416

Breaking through a fierce battlefield where an army numbering in the tens of thousands was locked in combat was nearly impossible.

But…

“Rage, Blizzard!”

“Johnson, aren’t you pushing yourself too hard? If you keep this up, I can’t just stand by either.”

If the war hero of the Great Cataclysm and the world’s greatest War Mage and archer unleashed devastating area-of-effect magic and arrows like bolts of lightning…

“For Her Majesty the Queen!”

“Long live the Queen!”

If an S-rank Hunter who had appeared like a comet—the prince of the United Kingdom—led the kingdom’s elite royal knights into a charge…

“Formation J! Wipe them all out!”

“Just fucking fight!”

“Yeeeeeeah! Let’s gooo!!!”

And if the hundreds of suicide squad members who had come this far prepared to make the ultimate sacrifice advanced as one…

Roooooar!

Crack-crack! Slash!

A path opened.

A path meant for only three people.

It was the final path to ending this war, and they crossed through tens of thousands of monsters like a streak of light.

Shraaaaaaash!

A dazzling storm of light erupted from two swords and a single spear, sweeping through the monsters.

The head of a Lycanthrope baring its sharp fangs shot into the air, while the limbs of a six-meter-tall[1985] boss monster, a Twin-Headed Ogre, were torn from its body.

Five Death Knights, each commanding a legion, appeared to block their way, but it made no difference.

—In. The. Name. Of. Our. Lord.

—Let. Death. Descend.

Jin Taekyung tossed out a casual remark.

“Two, two, one. Sound good?”

[1985] Six meters is about 19.7 ft.

Lee Jungryong nodded.

“Let’s do that.”

“Wait. What the—!”

Before Wu Heixing could finish objecting, the other two had already dashed forward.

They closed the distance in only two steps, then swung their sword and spear without hesitation.

Boom!

The first exchange. The Death Knight staggered after blocking the whip-like arc of Force.

Its eyes widened as its magic-infused sword shattered into pieces.

—How…!

Boom! Crunch!

The second exchange. The third. And then—

Slash!

A single lightning-fast strike that signaled the end.

The upper half of the Death Knight’s body, armor and all, slowly slid away. Beneath its low-pulled helmet, the light in its eyes flickered like a candle in the wind, then vanished.

Before the bodies of the Death Knights they had each taken responsibility for even touched the ground, Jin Taekyung and Lee Jungryong were already charging toward another enemy.

“Damn it! I’m here too!”

Wu Heixing joined them a moment later.

The fate of the three remaining Death Knights was as good as sealed.

The monsters that witnessed their commanders’ destruction instinctively recoiled in fear.

More. More. More.

Slash! Shraaaaaash!

Jin Taekyung cut and smashed his way through everything around him as he advanced. Then, at some point, he realized it.

They’re gone.

The monsters that had endlessly blocked their path were nowhere to be seen. Only a ruined road and vast plains stretching out on either side remained.

At the end of the road, a city shrouded in thick fog awaited them.

Lee Jungryong, Wu Heixing, and I raced toward the city where the Arch Lich was.

—Wicked human. This commander has a long-held wish.

What is it?

—To return to my homeland and enjoy a peaceful life.

You don't even remember where your homeland is.

—…How could you say something so cruel?

Ah, sorry. I didn't mean it like that. So where is your homeland?

—The first place where I regained consciousness. Korea. I have decided to make it the homeland of my heart.

"…"

I faltered as I ran toward the city.

Is he insane?

A monster trying to obtain citizenship. An undead illegal immigrant who had slipped into the country through a Gate, yet he had no shortage of things to say. His reasons for going this far were obvious, of course.

—So please, let's turn back.

I don't want to.

—My head has felt dizzy and my stomach has been churning for a while now.

That's strange. The more I talk to you, the more I think I'm developing similar symptoms.

—It isn't too late yet! Please stop! If we go in there, there really will be no turning back!

No.

It's already too late.

I muttered the words inwardly and took another step.

As we entered the city, the first things to greet us were the ominously thick fog and frigid air.

At the same time, a familiar energy I had felt countless times before—yet somehow different—brushed across my entire body.

"This is…"

Sticky and unpleasant. It did not take me long to realize what the energy was, and Lee Jungryong and Wu Heixing reached the same conclusion.

"Mr. Lee…"

"Yes. I see."

Lee Jungryong swept his surroundings with a somber gaze, then spoke.

"It's a Gate. I wondered where so many monsters were pouring out from. Now we know why."

Lee Jungryong's guess was wrong.

Or rather, it would be more accurate to say he was half right.

I gave a small shake of my head and corrected him.

“I don’t think the Gate transformation is complete yet.”

Wu Heixing swallowed hard.

“How do you know that?”

“Just a feeling.”

“What?”

“If you don’t believe me, never mind.”

“…What kind of person says something like that?”

As expected, Wu Heixing looked dumbfounded. Lee Jungryong, however, reacted differently.

His gaze held a clear mixture of suspicion and surprise.

“How did you know?”

“You already knew?”

“I only just realized it. I felt this same sensation a very long time ago, in North America during the Great Cataclysm.”

“I see.”

“But this phenomenon hasn’t occurred even once since the Great Cataclysm. How did you know?”

“As I said, it’s just a feeling. I had a hunch.”

“A hunch…”

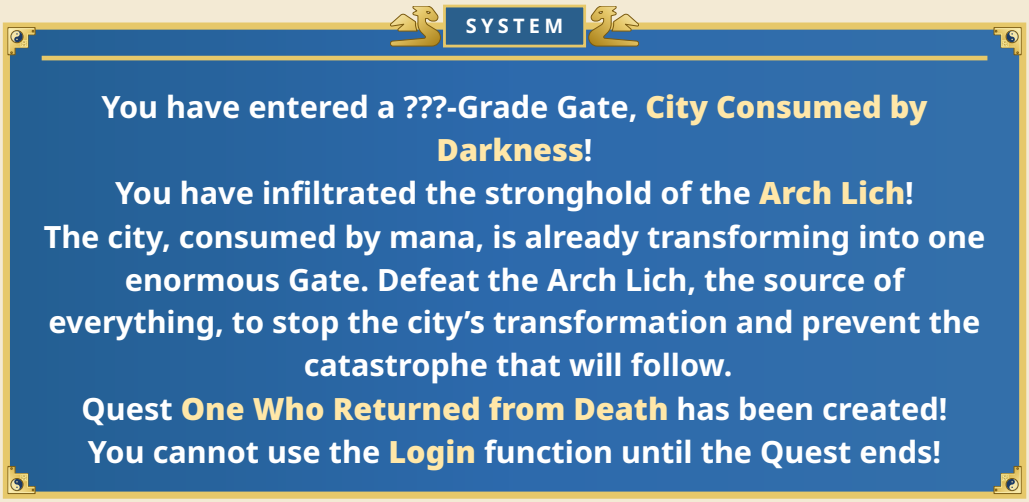
Lee Jungryong studied me with an unreadable expression after my firm answer.

But that was all I could say. Even if I told him the truth, he would not be able to understand it anyway.

It’s not as if I can show him the System window.

I raised my head and glanced at the empty air. A System message had appeared before my eyes the instant we entered the city.

Ding.



Gate transformation.

It was a phenomenon from the past that I had only ever read about in textbooks.

Lee Jungryong gazed beyond the thick fog and spoke.

"Gate transformations were rare even during the Great Cataclysm. For one to occur, an extremely powerful monster must serve as its core and put down roots with its mana."

There was no need to wonder which extremely powerful monster that might be.

I blurted out its name.

"The Arch Lich."

"Yes. It has to be the Arch Lich. It must be contaminating the city with mana and turning it into one enormous Gate. That must also be why it has not appeared on the battlefield until now."

Nearly two hundred thousand monsters had appeared on the battlefield so far.

That alone was a catastrophe of staggering proportions. But if the Gate transformation were completed…

We're finished.

Humanity would undoubtedly emerge victorious in the end, but countless cities would be destroyed, and hundreds of thousands—no, perhaps millions—of people would die.

We had to stop it before it was too late.

"We don't have much time. We need to hurry."

Lee Jungryong nodded.

"We should avoid the monsters whenever possible. We'll need to conserve every bit of strength we can before facing the Arch Lich. Mr. Wu, that includes you."

"…Yes."

We began moving through the thick fog.

Unlike the small city where I had fought Lei Fei last time, this place—the Arch Lich's stronghold—covered more than ten times the area and still bore traces of having once been a bustling city.

A forest of collapsed skyscrapers. A downtown district that must once have been the most dazzling part of the city, now reduced to desolation…

We moved as quickly and quietly as possible.

After traveling for some time with our senses stretched to their limits, Lee Jungryong, who had been leading the group, suddenly spoke.

"Did you know?"

"If you put it like that, of course I don't. And this doesn't seem like a particularly good time to play Twenty Questions."

Lee Jungryong let out a low laugh at my immediate reply.

"These days, I find myself thinking about you more than usual."

“Are you confessing your feelings to me? This is a bad time for that too.”

“In a sense, perhaps I am. How should I put it? I find myself thinking that you will surpass me someday.”

“You don’t need to worry about that. Even in ten years, I won’t come close to catching up with you, Vice Guild Master.”

“Haha. Do you really think so?”

“No. I just said it because I thought you’d like to hear it.”

“You’re as honest as ever. Just like when I first met you.”

“That first blind date did have a pretty terrible atmosphere.”

My memory was not particularly good, but I could still vividly remember my first meeting with him.

Lee Jungryong seemed to remember it just as clearly.

“We got off to an ill-fated start. The more I think about it, the more regrettable it seems.”

“Tell me about it. If we had talked things out from the start instead of cutting off someone’s arm, we might have begun on relatively friendly terms.”

“Park Jihoon made a mistake in the heat of the moment. I apologize.”

“How could that have been the Disciple’s fault alone?”

“Heh. I see. Then it was also my fault for failing to teach him properly.”

I watched Lee Jungryong’s back as he moved ahead of us. He leaped between buildings with swift, elusive movements, and I wondered what expression he was wearing now.

Lee Jungryong let out another quiet laugh and continued.

“You seem to have grown quite close to Minwoo.”

“We’re reasonably friendly.”

“You two seem to get along surprisingly well.”

“He pays me a lot.”

“A business relationship. That’s good to hear. Then do you think I could become close to you as well?”

I answered with a snort of laughter.

“Was it about seven years ago? I had a red-bean bun as a snack at the Hunter Training Center, and it tasted so good I cried. But when I tried one after getting out into the real world, it wasn’t that great. I haven’t really eaten them since.”

“So now you’ve had your fill?”

“I’ve already earned enough for several generations to live without working. My stomach is full, so what’s the point of forcing down more? I’ll just burst and die.”

“You’re wrong. Humans are always hungry creatures. No matter how much they stuff themselves, they never know satisfaction. Do you know why?”

“Hmm. Do you happen to have a binge-eating disorder?”

Lee Jungryong continued in a gentle voice.

“Greed. More money, more honor, or the opposite sex. We constantly desire and crave more.”

“Like you, Vice Guild Master?”

“That’s right. Like me.”

Lee Jungryong laughed aloud. His booming laughter spread through the thick fog, but he did not seem concerned in the slightest.

“They say laughter brings good fortune, but in this case, don’t you think it might bring monsters instead?”

“There aren’t any monsters in this area. You know that too, don’t you?”

“Well, I’m just saying we should be a little more careful.”

Whoooooosh!

A foul-smelling wind brushed across my entire body.

From one building to the next, we continued running, leaping across gaps more than twenty meters[1986] wide.

We sensed no sign of monsters, and the buildings around us gradually grew fewer.

“Let’s slow down from here.”

“It’s dark. And narrow.”

“Bear with it a little longer. More importantly, may I ask you one more thing?”

“Anything.”

“What did Minwoo say about this operation?”

“He didn’t say much…”

I looked between Lee Jungryong and Wu Heixing before continuing slowly.

“He told me not to go because it was dangerous.”

“More precisely?”

“Don’t go with people you can’t trust. Something like that.”

The smile on Lee Jungryong’s lips deepened.

“Do you suspect me and that fellow too?”

No.

“Then?”

“If anything…”

I smiled as I continued.

“If anything, I’m certain.”

“Certain?”

“Yes.”

Still smiling, I went on.

[1986] Twenty meters is about 65.6 ft.

“I’m certain these fucking bastards are more interested in the back of my head than the Arch Lich.”

Lee Jungryong stopped dead.

Chapter 417

I knew. I had simply been waiting.

Waiting for the moment they sank their fangs into me.

“More than that… I’m certain.”

“Certain?”

“Yes.”

The corners of my mouth rose before I could stop them. I finally let out the words I had swallowed time and time again.

“I’m certain these fucking bastards are more interested in the back of my head than the Arch Lich. That’s what I’m certain of.”

“…!”

“…!”

The brief masquerade came to an end.

Step.

Lee Jungryong stopped walking.

Fwish!

The sound of displaced air came from behind me. Three streaks of wind tore toward vital points across my body.

I didn’t need to turn around to know where Wu Heixing’s daggers were headed.

Or what I needed to do.

Fwish-fwish-fwish!

The three daggers aimed at my nape, spine, and right arm missed their targets and pierced empty air.

No. That’s not it.

Maybe it was because I had pushed my senses to their absolute limit.

Everything moved slowly, each detail crystal clear.

I reached out and caught the hilt of the dagger skimming past my right arm. At the same time, I twisted at the waist and whipped my arm forward like lightning.

Shraaaaaaaaaash!

“Hup!”

Wu Heixing, who had been charging toward me, hurriedly swung his sword.

Boom!

Along with a muffled, thunderous roar, his body was knocked backward. A low voice stopped Wu Heixing as he prepared to charge again, his face twisted in anger.

“Enough.”

“Mr. Lee. Why…?”

“He’s not someone you can handle. Wait a moment.”

After restraining Wu Heixing, Lee Jungryong gazed at me calmly.

“You’re remarkably perceptive.”

I let out a quiet laugh at his sudden change in tone.

“An old man who knows everything is saying something obvious. If I didn’t have even this much sense, I’d have died a long time ago.”

“When did you know?”

I answered without hesitation.

“The moment we first met.”

The day I stormed into Myeongdong Guild alone, Lee Jungryong and I had already become irreconcilable enemies.

It had been decided the moment that bastard Park Jihoon sent a Black Hunter to cut off Uncle Kkeokjeong’s arms.

“If you’re about to tell me that was merely your subordinates being overzealous, roll up that white-coated tongue of yours and shove it back in your mouth.”

“Of course not. I merely find it regrettable.”

“What do you regret? Your future spent smelling funeral incense from behind a folding screen?”

Lee Jungryong shook his head.

“No. I had taken quite a liking to you.”

“Then you shouldn’t have cut off my man’s arms.”

“It was a light warning. I wanted to teach that boy Choi Minwoo a lesson. At the time, a brat named Jin Taekyung wasn’t someone I needed to take seriously.”

“And now?”

Lee Jungryong answered with a gentle smile.

“I came here myself. Is that answer enough?”

“More than enough.”

I leaned my back against a pile of collapsed concrete, holding White Flame at an angle.

Wu Heixing stood to my left and Lee Jungryong to my right. Each was a little over ten meters[1987] away, but any of us could erase that distance in the blink of an eye.

“But this is unexpected. I thought you’d at least wait until after we killed the Arch Lich before making your move.”

“Pfft! You stupid bangzi![1988]”

Wu Heixing abruptly cut in with a snicker.

Only a few days ago, he hadn’t even been able to meet my eyes. Now he declared triumphantly,

---

[1987] Ten meters is about 33 ft.

[1988] Bangzi is a derogatory Chinese term for Koreans.

“Fighting the Arch Lich is your job, Jin Taekyung.”

“What kind of bullshit… Ah.”

A thought flashed through my mind, and a hollow laugh escaped me.

I had wondered if it could really be true, but they had actually gone that far.

Their brains were wired completely differently from mine.

“Hah. These fuckers really thought of everything. This is beyond anything I imagined.”

“Do you understand now? Do you understand what kind of situation you’re in?”

“So… you never intended to fight the Arch Lich in the first place?”

Wu Heixing curled his lips and spoke.

“Why should I—why should I take that kind of risk?”

“…!”

“Today’s battle will go down as a defeat. And your name will be written at the very top of the list of the war dead. I’ve already decided on your epitaph.”

Wu Heixing spread his arms like a stage actor.

“Bangzi from Korea, killed by the Arch Lich. What do you think? Isn’t that a fine epitaph?”

Even after Wu Heixing finished speaking, I could not find anything to say for a while. I stood there blankly, like a madman, and the goose bumps covering my body refused to fade.

Was it because of his scheme?

No.

One question Wu Heixing had thrown back at me continued to circle through my empty mind.

Why should I take that kind of risk?

I felt completely blindsided.

At the same time, countless deaths I had witnessed over the past month flashed before my eyes, along with horribly mutilated bodies.

Young parents who had met their end while holding their precious child tightly, hoping against hope that their little one might survive.

An elderly person too infirm to flee, torn apart and eaten.

A pregnant woman who had died clutching her full-term belly.

And…

The day I became a Hunter, I swore that I would fight monsters until the moment my life ended. That oath still stands.

Lei Fei, who had fulfilled his mission until the very last moment.

The five hundred Public Security Armed Forces Department Hunters who defied death and launched their heroic charge.

Team Leader Choi and Xiao Shen, who had prepared to die and bound their hands to their sword hilts with strips of cloth so they could kill one more monster.

You're right. Why did all of them take such risks? Like fucking idiots.

Their faces flashed before my eyes, one after another.

My insides burned as though I had swallowed a fireball, and a hot breath escaped me.

I drew a deep breath, then looked at one man.

"Tell me."

"What should I tell you?"

"Whether you think the same way as that bastard."

"I don't. Not at all. That fellow is afraid of the Arch Lich, but…"

Lee Jungryong continued gently.

"I seized an opportunity. The longer this war lasts, the more I stand to gain."

After a brief silence, I gave a small nod.

"I see."

I pushed away from the concrete. Scorching Yang Qi boiled like lava, surging through every limb and bone and hundreds of acupoints. Blue flames danced along White Flame's spearhead.

"Let me ask you one thing too."

"Anything."

"'The only good chink is a dead chink. Fucking Lee Jungryong.' Those are the epitaphs I just came up with for you two. Do you like them?"

"…!"

"…Heh."

Wu Heixing's face crumpled, while Lee Jungryong's eyes curved like crescent moons.

Then—

Fwooooooosh!

Blinding flashes burst from both sides.

Lee Jungryong had already made up his mind.

I must not let my guard down. I'll kill him by any means necessary.

A lion gives its all even when hunting a rabbit.

All the more so when its prey was a wolf named Jin Taekyung. To hunt him, the lion would have to use every ounce of its strength.

No matter how much of a lion Lee Jungryong was, he couldn't afford to ignore the wolf's fangs.

Fwish!

One step.

In a split second, Lee Jungryong closed the distance of more than ten meters[1989], and his hand blurred.

A longsword flashed from its scabbard and shot forward in a dazzling streak of light.

Straight at one man—Jin Taekyung.

Fwooooooosh!

It was a full-power strike, the likes of which Lee Jungryong had not unleashed anywhere else in this war.

Wu Heixing had joined the attack as well.

Compared to Jin Taekyung, he was a fledgling far behind in ability, but he was still an S-rank Hunter capable of wielding an Aura Blade.

“Dieeeee!”

As Wu Heixing screamed, his eyes bloodshot, Lee Jungryong saw it clearly.

Jin Taekyung’s smooth, gliding movement.

The spearhead wreathed in blue flames.

Boom!

Two swords and one spear collided.

An immense wave of qi erupted with a thunderous roar, collapsing buildings and pulverizing concrete.

Rumble! Rumble-rumble-rumble!

It looked as though the city had been bombarded.

The ground caved in, and a tremendous tremor swept across a radius of several hundred meters[1990].

But this was only the beginning.

Fwish-fwish-fwish-fwish!

Dozens, then hundreds of lines slashed through the air.

Lee Jungryong’s sword moved too quickly for the eye to follow, carving Jin Taekyung to pieces.

Or so he had believed.

Until Jin Taekyung slammed a flame-wreathed palm into Wu Heixing’s chest and sent him flying, then brought down his spear.

Fwoosh—whooooooosh!

Blistering heat blazed up, burning the air itself.

[1989] Ten meters is about 33 ft.

[1990] Several hundred meters is several hundred to over a thousand ft; 300 m is about 980 ft.

The spearhead devoured both the thick fog blanketing the city and the humidity in the air as it came down diagonally at Lee Jungryong with ferocious momentum.

It was like the claw of a dragon striking down from the heavens.

What is this…?

Lee Jungryong frowned.

Jin Taekyung's spearhead was rushing toward him, erasing the Aura he had scattered.

The tremendous heat stole his breath and made his body seize up.

The young man before him, not yet thirty, was no longer the Jin Taekyung he had known.

How did he improve this much in such a short time…?

But although Jin Taekyung's strength far exceeded his expectations, Lee Jungryong was also a superhuman who stood above other S-rank Hunters.

In that split second, he laid his blade across the spearhead's path.

Kwaaaaaaaaaang!

Jin Taekyung's spear was faster and stronger than Lee Jungryong had expected.

But the same was true of Lee Jungryong.

Swing—fwish-fwish-fwish-fwish!

Within a moment sliced into ever smaller fractions, spear and sword tangled and collided.

Lightning-like flashes and thunderous roars erupted without pause.

Clack-clack-clack!

Jin Taekyung pressed Lee Jungryong's sword down with his spearhead, then thrust out his hand.

Just before a palm strike carrying the heat of the Flame Divine Palm could slam into Lee Jungryong's chest, Lee Jungryong's fist shot forward like lightning and met Jin Taekyung's palm.

Boom!

With the sound of compressed air bursting apart, the two men stepped backward as though they had planned it.

The result left Lee Jungryong stunned.

He had retreated two steps.

Jin Taekyung had retreated only one.

He pushed me back?

Lee Jungryong had accumulated an enormous amount of qi over many years.

Yet a brat barely in his late twenties had forced him backward.

It was impossible to believe that such a change had occurred in the short span of just over a month.

And that isn’t all.

His incredible power and speed seemed to have no bottom. His movements, too—everything about him was astonishing. Beyond anything that could be put into words.

Just as he was now.

Whooooooosh! Fwish!

Lee Jungryong twisted his head aside.

The spearhead missed him by half a handspan[1991], then changed direction in midair.

Slash!

A searing sensation, followed by droplets of blood scattering through the air.

For the first time in a very long while, Lee Jungryong felt pain.

He swung his sword.

Boom!

Their weapons crashed together.

Through the transparent spearhead, Lee Jungryong saw the young man’s blazing eyes.

The lips that had remained tightly sealed throughout the battle finally parted, and a cold, level voice emerged.

“You’re fucked.”

The moment Lee Jungryong heard those chilling words, he realized he needed to revise his earlier assessment.

A lion.

He had been wrong.

Jin Taekyung was not a wolf.

He was a lion—a powerful young male who might drive out the old lion that had ruled the pride for so long and become its new king.

Craaaaaack! Boom!

The old lion was hurled away by an irresistible force.

Lee Jungryong flipped in midair and landed on the ground.

The first thing he saw was the young male lion gripping Wu Heixing by the throat after Wu had attempted a surprise attack.

“Guhk! M-my father belongs to the Crown Prince Party…!”

“I don’t care.”

“If you let me live, I’ll repay you! Guh! So please…”

“Me? Let you live after you tried to kill me?”

[1991] A handspan is the distance between the tips of an outstretched thumb and little finger. Half a handspan is roughly 10 cm (4 in), though it varies by hand.

A reddish gaze turned toward Wu Heixing.

Then a sentence Lee Jungryong had heard somewhere before slipped from Jin Taekyung's lips.

"Why should I—why should I take that kind of risk?"

"…!"

Crunch!

Chapter 418

Sometimes, when I took someone's life—when I faced the desperate voices and pleading eyes of enemies begging to be spared—I found myself wondering.

Why? Why on earth?

Why didn't they stop to think about what they themselves had done? Why did they always look to others for the cause of everything that befell them?

Too late.

If you tried to kill someone, you had to consider the possibility that you might be killed instead.

The seeds had already been sown. At last, it was time to reap the harvest.

I stared into Wu Heixing's bloodshot eyes and whispered,

"Why should I take that kind of risk?"

"…!"

I hadn't asked because I wanted an answer.

There was nothing more to hear or see. Without hesitation, I grabbed Wu Heixing by the neck and twisted.

Crunch.

Flesh was crushed and bones splintered beneath a grip strong enough to tear steel like paper.

The last light faded from his wide, frozen eyes.

The instant his struggling body went limp, a System notification rang out.

SYSTEM

Defeated Lv. 135 Wu Heixing!
Gained a substantial amount of EXP!
Gained no Fame. If it becomes known that you killed this person, significant repercussions are expected!

That was when Lee Jungryong rose to his feet more than twenty meters[1992] away and spoke.

"Not even a moment's hesitation."

I tossed Wu Heixing's lifeless body aside.

"He needed to die."

"Do you know who that boy's father is?"

"I've heard of him. Apparently, he was one of the men who took a sledgehammer

[1992] Twenty meters is about 66 ft.

to Confucius's tomb decades ago."[1993]

"And that young Red Guard grew up to become the most powerful man in Chinese politics and the leader of the Crown Prince Party. Even Chairman Xiao Yang does not dare touch him."

"Damn. What a fucking amazing continent. In our country, that'd be like the arsonist who burned down Sungnyemun[1994] becoming President. Don't you think?"

"There is no need to understand it. But there is one fact you must know. With your own hands, you killed the only son that the most powerful man among one billion people had after turning fifty."

"Me? No, I didn't."

I smiled shamelessly.

"Wu Heixing died after a fierce battle with the Arch Lich."

"…!"

"I told you, I already picked out his epitaph. Here lies a bad chink who became a good Chinese man. Of course, your gravestone will be right beside his."

Lee Jungryong stared at me with an inscrutable expression, then let out a quiet laugh.

"You're a crafty one."

"I liked the scenario you two came up with. Let me borrow it."

"Do as you please. It will not go the way you wish regardless."

"Maybe…"

I gestured toward Wu Heixing's sprawled corpse with my chin.

"So far, things seem to have gone more or less my way."

"Yes. In that respect, you and I are alike."

"What?"

As I frowned, Lee Jungryong gave me a faint smile.

"Wu Heixing was easily swayed and loose-lipped. A terrible man to conspire with, but even someone like him had his uses."

"…What the fuck are you talking about?"

"This is what I mean."

Lee Jungryong pressed something in his hand. A beam pierced the thick fog and struck a chunk of concrete, projecting a hologram above it.

The short video, barely ten seconds long, showed Wu Heixing begging for his life—and me breaking his neck without a moment's hesitation.

"Huh."

[1993] The reference is to the Red Guards' attack on Confucius's tomb during the Cultural Revolution.

[1994] Sungnyemun, also known as Namdaemun, is Seoul's historic South Gate and a major Korean landmark.

I let out a hollow laugh.

“Nice image quality. Perfect for giving people the wrong idea.”

“Indeed. Especially an old father who has lost his only son, born late in life.”

“Are you planning to show them the unedited version?”

“Perhaps because of the magical power’s influence, an error will probably cause the beginning of the video to be lost.”

“That’s one hell of a coincidence.”

“Anyone who sees it will be appalled. Not only those who delight in tearing others down, but even those who worshipped you will turn against you. And the people you cherish so dearly will slowly crumble beneath the public’s condemnation.”

The Peace Guild.

And Mom and Hayeon.

Their names and faces flashed before my eyes the moment I heard Lee Jungryong’s words.

I stepped forward, planting my foot on Wu Heixing’s corpse.

Step.

“Was this your plan from the beginning?”

“Wu Heixing was merely a tool from the start. He could never have been anything more.”

Step.

Lee Jungryong began walking toward me as well.

But the qi pouring from his entire body was on a completely different level from anything he had shown before.

That was why Wu Heixing’s death had failed to disturb his composure.

The cunning beast had achieved its objective. Now, at last, it had bared the claws it had kept hidden.

“Damn it. No wonder it seemed so easy.”

Lee Jungryong gave a dry laugh at my complaint.

“I will praise you for one thing. You far exceeded my expectations.”

“Let me ask you one last time. Why are you going this far?”

“Could a young pup like you possibly understand?”

Step.

“Were you really that afraid of Team Leader Choi—no, Choi Minwoo?”

“Will you not shut that mouth of yours?”

Kuwaaaaaaaang!

A massive wave of qi surged outward, driving back the fog and seizing control of the space around us.

The razor-sharp killing intent made my skin prickle. Anger unlike anything I had ever seen rose in Lee Jungryong's once-placid eyes.

"I won my place entirely through my own strength. It is my empire, built over the course of my entire life!"

It was anger he had kept buried, an emotion he had not allowed himself to show in a very long time.

Lee Jungryong glared at me with fire blazing in his eyes and ground out each syllable.

"No one can bring it down. Not you, not that boy Minwoo, and… not even my hyung!"[1995]

Hyung?

I was given no time to question the unexpected word.

Step.

A single step rang out, unusually heavy and deep.

At the same time, Lee Jungryong's form rippled like water.

The beast vanished, leaving behind an afterimage, and appeared right in front of me.

Fweeeeeeeeng!

A mass of light filled my vision. I twisted at the waist and swung White Flame.

The instant light and flame collided, a thunderous roar erupted as though the sky itself had split apart.

Kwaaang!

The explosion was enormous.

The high-rise building that had barely been holding together collapsed as if it had burst apart, while glass and concrete broke into countless tiny fragments that pierced through everything in every direction.

The impact of the clash could likely be felt from dozens of kilometers[1996] away.

Amid the successive collapses and thunderous booms, I thrust out my foot.

Fwish!

Beyond the dust cloud splitting apart before me, a man stood poised in midair as though on solid ground.

His clear eyes, always impossible to read, now blazed with fury.

"Jin Taekyung!"

Neither of us waited for the other.

[1995] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

[1996] One kilometer is about 0.62 mi; two dozen kilometers is about 15 mi.

I shattered the ground as I sprang upward, while he stepped on empty air and plunged toward me.

The sword and spear we swung at each other collided dead-on, and an immense shock wave engulfed us both.

Hurled backward at the same instant as though we had planned it, we kicked off the structures of the already-ruined city and shot toward each other again.

Shweeeeeek—Kwang!

With a thunderous boom, Lee Jungryong's sword deflected my spearhead and thrust straight toward my throat.

Boom!

I jerked my head aside. Air shrieked past, and severed strands of hair scattered behind me.

But it wasn't over.

Shwish-shwish-shwish!

Lee Jungryong's sword shot forward as a streak of pure white light.

A net of Force flowed along the blade.

Faced with that spectacle of light filling my vision, I awakened all the internal energy sleeping within my dantian.

Three jiazi[1997] of Scorching Yang Qi rose like a wildfire and seeped into my four limbs and hundreds of bones. Blue hellfire surged along the transparent spearhead, rippling smoothly like a dragon's tail.

Fire Dragon's Single Tail.

Whooooooosh!

A single swing.

The fire dragon's tail fanned outward, erasing part of the onrushing net of Force.

Now it was time to tear the loosened net apart with sharpened claws.

Heavenly Strike.

The Fire Dragon Divine Spear consisted of only two forms.

And yet the former Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan who created it earned the epithet of the greatest spearman under heaven, leaving behind a brief final testament about his martial arts.

> "A martial art I devoted my entire life to, yet failed to complete. Even so, a spear art worthy of being called the greatest under heaven."

His words were true.

That was the Fire Dragon Divine Spear. A spear art that could proudly call itself the greatest under heaven with only two forms, and…

[1997] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle. Three jiazi is 180 years.

Kuwaaaaaang!

Heavenly Strike, unleashed with all my power, tore through the net of Force and swept across everything ahead of it.

The flames were upon Lee Jungryong before he had any chance to react. Watching them rush toward him, he brought his sword down with a forceful shout.

“Ha!”

Fwish!

The flames split at the tip of his sword.

His form shot forward like an arrow through the paths of fire opening to either side, unleashing countless sword strikes.

Shu-shu-shu-shu-shuk!

Chest, throat, shoulder, arms, legs…

Within a span of time short enough to be called an instant—

Faced with arcs of swordlight slashing toward me like rays of light, I was suddenly seized by wonder.

How? How is this possible?

I was a Hunter. At the same time, I was a martial artist.

No. Perhaps Player was the name that suited me best.

On a sweltering summer day, I had picked up a discarded VR capsule at a recycling station and gained a new power called the System. I had become the only person to stand astride both the modern world and Murim.

But still…

Boom!

Movements without a single wasted inch, nearly perfect control of power, and even control over qi.

After parrying Lee Jungryong’s attack, I found myself admiring him. It had nothing to do with what kind of person he was. I was simply stunned by his skill.

So he was this strong.

After reaching the Supreme Peak realm, I had thought there would not be many people in the modern world capable of matching me.

After coming to Sichuan and meeting several S-rank Hunters, that belief had only grown stronger.

No matter how much energy each of them possessed, martial arts did not exist here.

The so-called Hunters could fight efficiently, but when it came to efficient qi manipulation, they were practically illiterate.

Lee Jungryong? I knew he had learned a cultivation technique called the Mana Cultivation Method in the modern world, but I had assumed it wouldn’t be much different.

Now I realized the truth.

My arrogance had led me to the wrong conclusion.

Slash!

My thigh suddenly felt cool. A heartbeat later, pain as hot as fire followed.

But why did my mind clear and my vision sharpen, as though I had just awakened from a long sleep?

Slash, slash, slash!

My arm. My calf. The back of my neck.

Blood sprayed out, and the qi carried through his Force disrupted the flow of my internal energy.

As I staggered, I looked at Lee Jungryong's face while he continued raining sword strikes down upon me.

His forehead glistened with sweat. At the same time, his eyes seemed certain of victory, and a smile hung at the corners of his mouth.

Ah. I don't like this.

I didn't like that smile. I didn't like the fact that a man like him possessed this much power.

Something surged inside me, and I swung White Flame.

Kwaang!

The first exchange.

Blood flowed from the cuts inflicted earlier, and pain spread through me. Without a word, I thrust my spear forward again.

Lee Jungryong, who had stepped back, charged into me with a calm smile.

Boom!

The second exchange.

Lee Jungryong retreated two steps and stared at me in surprise.

He still had that much strength left?

The thought was written plainly across his face.

Of course I do.

I muttered inwardly, adjusted my grip on the spear, ignored the faint pain spreading through me, and stepped forward.

Boom! Boom! Kwaang!

Three times. Four times. Five times.

Each time spear and sword collided and thunderous roars erupted, Lee Jungryong's expression hardened further.

The smile at the corners of his mouth had vanished long ago.

"You bastard…!"

Hearing that growling shout instead of his usual voice, soft as a cat’s paw, made me laugh for some reason.

Intoxicated by my own strength, I had underestimated his skill and made a foolish mistake.

But Lee Jungryong had done the same.

The claws he had bared were certainly strong and sharp, but they were not enough to kill me.

“Jungryong.”

I drew a deep breath, and stale air and a foul stench flooded my lungs.

Even so, I felt refreshed, as though something inside me had finally opened wide.

Yes. Now I understood.

“Let’s clip those claws.”

Lee Jungryong would die here today.

Chapter 419

Lee Jungryong suddenly wondered.

Where had things gone wrong? And what had gone wrong?

Driving out his hyung's[1998] bloodline and seizing control of Ares Guild?

Committing all manner of crimes to keep the Guild growing, then feeding his greed without ever learning to be satisfied?

Or perhaps…

Making an enemy of him?

Lee Jungryong's gaze settled on one person—a young man whose body was stained with blood from the bleeding wounds covering him.

The young man looked up at the sky, drew a deep breath, and parted his lips.

"Jungryong."

Why was it? The moment Lee Jungryong heard that quiet voice, a chill ran down his spine. Though he had not suffered a single wound, he felt as if a blade had cut him.

Looking at him, Jin Taekyung formed a savage grin.

"Let's clip those claws."

"…!"

Fwish!

The wind stirred, and in the instant the space between them vanished, Lee Jungryong swung his sword with a sharp whistle.

Shwick!

A dazzling concentration of qi sliced through Jin Taekyung's body. But instead of blood, only wind scattered through the air.

An afterimage. Not the real thing.

A red alarm bell rang in Lee Jungryong's mind.

Behind me!

It was too late to swing his sword. Lee Jungryong spun around like lightning and drove out his fist.

A fist wrapped in pure-white Force collided with a palm carrying blue flame.

Kwaang!

The world shook.

No—the thing shaking was Lee Jungryong's vision.

Flung backward by an irresistible force, he twisted in midair and righted himself.

[1998] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he has a close relationship.

His fist throbbed, and something surged up from deep inside him. But he was not even given time to spit out the blood.

Shweeeeeek!

A spearhead had already rushed up to his face.

The spear Jin Taekyung had hurled was aimed straight at Lee Jungryong's chest. Gritting his teeth, he poured all his strength into knocking it upward with his sword.

Kagagagagak! Kwaang!

The spear narrowly missed and smashed through the concrete, leaving a massive crater.

Lee Jungryong succeeded in deflecting it, but the spear's terrifying power and spin tore his hand open, sending blood spraying into the air.

He paid it no mind and thrust his foot through the thick cloud of dust.

Boom!

The dust and fog scattered in every direction, unable to withstand his blinding speed.

At the end of Lee Jungryong's step stood a single person.

"Reckless, aren't you? My kind of guy."

Jin Taekyung was already holding a new spear. He brought the spearhead down in slashes from every direction. Space split apart, and flames surged upward.

The tip of Lee Jungryong's sword pierced straight through the center.

Whoom! Boom!

Compressed air burst outward. The flames parted, opening a new path.

Lee Jungryong shot through it like an arrow, charging toward Jin Taekyung.

Die.

His sword held a single thought. It shone brilliantly and moved as fast as light.

Yet within the slowed-down world, Jin Taekyung's eyes were clearly smiling.

This is…

Something was wrong.

Before Lee Jungryong could finish the thought, Jin Taekyung's hand gripping the spear blurred.

At the same time, tremendous force slammed into the blade that had seemed poised to pierce Jin Taekyung's throat.

Shick! Kwaang!

A thunderous boom rang out, loud enough to leave his ears ringing.

Lee Jungryong slid more than ten meters[1999] against his will and swallowed the blood rising in his throat.

[1999] Ten meters is about 33 ft.

It isn't over yet.

He could not fall. He could not show weakness.

He was Lee Jungryong—the man who had fought his way through the vortex of the Great Cataclysm, the most violent upheaval in human history. An ambitious warlord born of his age.

Lee Jungryong tightened his grip on his sword, now webbed with fine cracks.

I won't die. I can't die.

There had been countless twists and turns on the road that had brought him here. He had known bottomless despair and days of unbearable rage.

He had spent half his life in someone else's shadow, branded as number two.

No. Perhaps even now…

But…

"Not anymore."

Crack. Crack-crack-crack.

Veins bulged across his body, and his muscles swelled.

Powerful qi erupted from Lee Jungryong's entire body, pressing down on everything around him.

He drew out every last scrap of strength he had saved for the very end and glared at Jin Taekyung with bloodshot eyes.

"He's as good as gone now. The greatest in the world is… me."

Vrrrrrrm.

Everything around Lee Jungryong trembled.

Jin Taekyung watched him with calm eyes that held not the slightest hint of doubt.

"I don't think so."

Kuwaaaaaang!

The waves of energy pouring from both men clawed at everything around them.

In a fleeting instant split into countless fragments, they charged toward each other at the same time.

Kwaang!

Their collision came like a flash of light, and the aftermath was immense.

Amid thunderous booms that shook the world, they became two streams of wind twisting together.

A spearhead wrapped in blue flame and a sword enveloped in dazzling light flew at each other.

Shwish-shwish-shwish-shwish!

Masses of light tore through space as they charged.

Jin Taekyung kicked off the ground and soared into the air, driving his spear down with tremendous force.

One strike. Two. Three.

Every time spear and sword collided, a thunderous boom erupted along with a massive shock wave.

Before long, blood from the corner of Lee Jungryong's mouth was scattering in droplets.

"Cough."

He staggered for an instant.

At the brief glimpse of weakness shown by the old lion, the young male lion bared his teeth.

The spearhead swept horizontally, slashing fiercely toward Lee Jungryong's side.

Kwaang!

The ground shook as though an earthquake had struck.

They were close enough to feel each other's breath. Lee Jungryong barely managed to block the spear, and over their locked weapons, his gaze met Jin Taekyung's blazing eyes.

He's young. Just as I once was.

Why?

Why had that thought come to him now, of all times?

Why had remembering his own pathetic, wretched past kept him from blocking Jin Taekyung's flame-wreathed palm?

Boom!

Heat.

The qi protecting every inch of his body shattered, and terrible heat seeped deep into his lungs.

Amid the blue flames filling his vision and the searing pain, memories from long ago flashed through Lee Jungryong's mind like arrows.

"Your name?"

"Pardon?"

"Ah, yes. I meant you."

"What's this sudden exchange of names?"

It was the early days of the Great Cataclysm. They had met while surrounded by countless monsters, trapped in a desperate life-or-death crisis.

"Just because. You looked about my age, and it was nice to see someone my age."

"Young fellow, you've suddenly gotten awfully casual. You look much younger than me."

"Then should we be friends? I don't mind."

"…Do you really have time to say things like that in a situation like this?"

"Maybe not."

Lee Jungryong had thought the man was half-mad with fear of death.

At least, he had thought so until that madman suddenly stepped forward and swept away more than several thousand monsters.

Crack-crack-crack!

"What the hell…"

"Now! Charge!"

After the battle, the man returned and asked him the same question.

"Your name?"

"Lee Jungryong… sir."

"Cool name. How old are you? Oh, I'm five years older. That's hardly a difference. Should we just be friends?"

"No. Hyung.[2000]"

He looked absurdly young and was unbelievably strong.

At their first meeting, A-rank Hunter Lee Jungryong had found his hero—and, at the same time, an immense mountain range he could never cross.

"By the way, hyung.[2001]"

"Yeah?"

"What's your name…?"

"Oh, I haven't told you yet."

The man had grinned and said,

"Cheon Taemin."

Cheon Taemin. Cheon Taemin. Cheon Taemin…

No matter how many times he repeated the name, it resonated deeply within him.

Even when he tried to forget, the face remained etched in his mind.

A giant who cast an immense shadow over Lee Jungryong's life.

"Get lost! I said get out of my sight right now—!"

Lee Jungryong roared, his voice boiling with rage.

The vision that had been bleached white with pain shattered like glass, and the wind rushing past his ears was fierce.

When he came to his senses, he was crashing through a high-rise building and slamming into cold concrete with tremendous force.

Kwa-gwa-gwang!

"Cough."

Dark-red blood spurted between his lips.

[2000] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he has a close relationship.

[2001] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he has a close relationship.

His vision blurred, and pain assailed him from every part of his body.

Perhaps his shattered ribs had pressed against his organs, because breathing was difficult. His broken left arm and leg dangled uselessly.

A potion. The potion…

This was his last chance.

The attack had stopped, if only for a moment. He had to heal himself now.

Lee Jungryong groped at his side with his relatively uninjured right arm, but the spot where his dimensional pouch should have been was empty.

Instead, he found someone approaching from far away.

“Ah, looking for this?”

Rrrrrroll. Clink.

A magic-enhanced glass bottle rolled over and came to rest at Lee Jungryong’s feet.

It was a Top-Grade Potion, a miraculous medicine said to save anyone as long as they still drew breath.

There was, however, a considerable difference between it and the state Lee Jungryong remembered.

“I was so thirsty that I drank it. Man, it was refreshing. Did you just come back from a mineral spring?”

As Jin Taekyung approached, speaking as casually as ever, Lee Jungryong let out a hollow laugh.

Jin Taekyung.

His name, face, and personality were all different.

But at that moment, Lee Jungryong finally understood.

When he had first encountered Jin Taekyung, he had felt something familiar deep in his chest. He had tried to ignore it, disguising it beneath the words anxiety and interest.

“Jungryong.”

The quiet voice pierced his ears.

Jin Taekyung was already standing before him, the image of another person superimposed over his face.

Lee Jungryong groaned out the words.

“Who are you? Who the hell are you?”

He wanted to ask. He was desperate to know.

How could Jin Taekyung resemble him so closely?

Why had some lowly F-rank Hunter grown stronger instead of Lee Jungryong—the man who had followed Cheon Taemin, accomplished countless feats, and been hailed as a hero?

“Me?”

The next moment, Jin Taekyung smiled and continued,

"Jungryong's personal bully."

Then, like an echo returning from far away, the face and voice of someone buried deep in Lee Jungryong's old memories overlapped with his.

"Brothers. Sworn brothers."

The two men had spoken different words with different meanings, yet both were smiling.

Lee Jungryong stared blankly at those goddamn similar smiles, then slowly—very slowly—opened his mouth.

"I…"

Decades of his life and countless emotions rose and faded.

The wait lasted no more than an instant, yet felt like eternity. At last, a hollow voice slipped between his lips.

"I don't regret it. Never."

If someone asked whether he had not even a handful of regrets, the answer was no.

But Lee Jungryong could not regret it. He did not want to.

He simply believed this was the ending that suited him best.

"Kill me."

A cold reply fell upon Lee Jungryong's bright smile.

"Your last words. I heard them."

Fwoom.

The spearhead that followed, wreathed in blue flame unlike that cold voice.

The flames roared to life in an instant, searing with tremendous heat. Once they had burned everything away, they died down.

All that remained amid the melted concrete and blackened ruins was the trace of someone who had once been there.

And the chime of a bell that only one person in the world could hear.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Defeated Lv. 153 Lee Jungryong!
Gained a massive amount of EXP!
Level up!
Level up!

Listening to the cheerful System notification, I slowly withdrew my spear.

Damn old man.

That final smile kept coming back to me.

What kind of life had Lee Jungryong lived? What had he been thinking at the end? And then there were those movements and his strange behavior…

No. I'll think about it later.

The fight with Lee Jungryong had not been easy for me, either.

Mental exhaustion suddenly washed over me, but ironically, my body felt lighter than ever thanks to the Top-Grade Potion and the effects of leveling up.

More than anything, I had a reason to keep moving forward.

The Arch Lich.

The source of all this.

Before that bastard transformed the enormous city into a Gate, I had to kill—

"H-human."

The Skeleton Warlord's trembling voice reached me.

Every hair on my body stood on end as I raised my head.

There he was.

Chapter 420

What did people feel when they first encountered a monster?

Surprise, terror, fear, confusion?

I had no idea. It happened before I was born—or, technically speaking, back when I was still on my father's side rather than inside my mother's womb.

But those who witnessed that historic moment must have thought of the countless legends and myths handed down since ancient times.

Just as I did now.

Demon.

That was the word that flashed through my mind the instant I saw it. A massive body reaching three meters[2002] tall. Bones covered in a black sheen. A shape resembling a human's, yet fundamentally something else.

Fwoooosh.

Like the wings of a demon from myth, the robe draped over its body billowed as though it were alive.

The demon's mere presence darkened the world—or rather, the Arch Lich's red eyes cast an eerie glow.

"Human."

Just one word.

The air around me trembled. From inside my Inventory, the Skeleton Warlord muttered with a groan.

"The lord of the undead…"

His voice was steeped in fear. The law of power applied to monsters, too.

Yes. Just as the Skeleton Warlord had said, the Arch Lich was likely the lord of every undead monster in this land.

"Human. It is not too late. Even now…"

Instead of answering, I gave a small nod.

The Skeleton Warlord was right. It was not too late, and I still had more than enough opportunity left.

A chance to stop that bastard.

If this sprawling metropolis transformed into a single Gate, there would truly be no turning back.

Countless undead monsters would spread like a plague, and the Arch Lich's power would grow even stronger.

It has to be now.

[2002] Three meters is about 9.8 ft.

I drew a deep breath and extended my hand. White Flame flew toward me through Seizing an Object Through Empty Space, its shaft landing in my grasp.

I stepped over the piles of collapsed concrete and trudged outside. Nothing awaited me but ruins blanketed in thick fog.

Above and below. Left and right.

No matter where I looked, there wasn't a monster in sight.

Ah, scratch that. There was one.

"Nice to meet you, you fucking bastard."

Some twenty meters[2003] overhead, the Arch Lich stood upon empty air and gazed down at me. Its red eyes gleamed.

"So it is true. You know the language of the Demon Realm. I did not mishear you."

"I studied hard. But you know me, don't you?"

"I am a being with hundreds of eyes and ears. I have been watching you all along, human."

I frowned.

"All along?"

"Yes. Your performance on the battlefield was remarkable."

A Familiar spell.

I kept the thought to myself and clicked my tongue.

"So you're a hidden-camera creep. You didn't install one in my bathroom, did you?"

"A hidden-camera creep? You speak nonsense, human."

"True. If you'd seen me through a hidden camera in my bathroom, you would've vanished from shock already. No one has ever survived looking my enormous Black Anaconda in the eye."

"Do you mean a Basilisk?"

A Basilisk was a monster from mythology whose gaze inflicted a curse of petrification.

It was also a Named Monster that had appeared exactly once during the Great Cataclysm.

"Something like that."

At least the part about being so startled that you froze was the same, right?

But the Arch Lich's response was not what I expected.

"So that is why. Why you feel strangely familiar to me."

"What?"

"Human. I sense the energy of death upon you. Dense and dark—an energy like my own."

[2003] Twenty meters is about 66 ft.

"…!"

A jolt of surprise ran through me. I thought I knew what the Arch Lich meant by the energy of death.

There was someone who had been unable to hide his agitation at every word the creature spoke.

The Skeleton Warlord.

Even as a Named Monster, the Skeleton Warlord was still undead.

Had the Arch Lich caught a scent that had seeped into me after all the time I had spent with him? Or had it seen through even that other unknown space called the Inventory?

If it was the latter…

Just how far do that bastard's abilities reach?

I activated Qi Sense. A blue line shot into the sky along with a System notification.

At the same time, the Arch Lich's red eyes, flickering between its bones, curved like crescent moons.

"How interesting."

The next instant, black mana erupted from the Arch Lich's entire body and lashed against the blue line.

Beep!

SYSTEM

??? protects itself with a powerful, incomprehensible force!

Qi Sense failed! Unable to determine the designated target!

I'd suspected as much, and sure enough.

The Arch Lich looked down at my stiffened face and let out a low laugh.

"What an interesting human. Truly. Perhaps… my guess was correct after all."

"What guess? That you're about to die?"

"That will not happen. I am the lord of all undead. I am nothing like those weak and foolish humans."

The Arch Lich raised a hand made of black, glossy bone and pointed toward Wu Heixing, whose breath had stopped, and Lee Jungryong, who had been reduced to black ash.

"It was a most entertaining sight. Watching you humans kill one another brought me immense joy for the first time in a very long while. I thank you for helping me understand just how insignificant your kind truly is."

"Get lost."

“Anger makes humans stronger. Is that true of you as well?”

Fwoooosh.

The fog filling the area began to move like a living creature. As though an unseen hand were painting upon empty air, it formed a scene before me.

A city in ruins.

At the center of a horrific battlefield, where blood flowed in rivers and corpses lay piled like mountains, a man used his sword as a cane to pull himself upright.

I had seen that face only once, but I could never forget it.

The Arch Lich’s low voice echoed through the air.

“Lei Fei. That was certainly his name.”

“…!”

“He possessed a great and radiant soul. So dazzling that I coveted him merely from watching afar.”

With another small gesture, the fog shifted and painted a new scene.

Lei Fei staggering toward the Arch Lich.

Lei Fei dropping to his knees before he could reach it.

Lei Fei glaring at the sky with a face filled with rage and resentment as he breathed his last.

And then…

Lei Fei reborn as a corrupted being through the Arch Lich’s power, kneeling before his new master.

No.

The Death Knight Lord.

Fwoooosh.

A wind blew from somewhere, scattering the fog. The Arch Lich continued slowly.

“Did you know? Humans with noble souls wield even greater power once they fall. He truly was the finest material… The outcome was regrettable, but he did not turn out too badly.”

I slowly nodded.

“Keep talking.”

“I have found new material. You, human—with an even stronger and more massive soul!”

Its chilling voice thundered through the air.

Mana poured from the Arch Lich’s entire body, covering the sky like dark storm clouds and casting the city into darkness.

At the center of it all, its red eyes burned like an ominous sun.

I stood silently and watched the scene. Then I suddenly opened my mouth.

“Right, so… are you finally done running your mouth?”

My stomach was burning.

The rage I had stored up and suppressed until I met the Arch Lich reared its head.

It surged like lava from a volcanic field.

“If you’ve said everything you wanted to say…”

Something snapped inside my head.

For that moment, I forgot even the mental exhaustion from hours of fighting at the head of the suicide squad and my battles against Lee Jungryong and Wu Heixing.

“Then get down here, you fucking bastard.”

If the Arch Lich’s voice was thunder, my shout was lava.

The fire dragon raced through hundreds of acupoints boiling like an active volcano. Blue flames engulfed White Flame’s transparent spearhead, radiating tremendous heat.

And then—

Shweeeeeek! Boom!

The spear of flame I launched with all my strength blew apart the dark clouds of mana and tore through the darkness.

Rumble-rumble-rumble! Fwoom!

The earth shook as dazzling blue flames painted the sky.

Several kilometers[2004] away, the humans and monsters locked in fierce battle forgot their own circumstances for a moment and stared blankly at the spectacle.

“Grrrrr…”

“What is that…?”

The light bursting from the enormous city shrouded in thick fog was warmer and more dazzling than anything else.

At least, that was how it seemed to one man standing tall and gazing at the city.

Choi Minwoo.

Mr. Jin Taekyung.

It was him. It had to be.

No one but Jin Taekyung came to mind. He was alive, and he was fighting the Arch Lich.

No. Perhaps he was fighting someone else, too.

Lee Jungryong. Wu Heixing.

Others might dismiss his concern as premature and his suspicions as baseless accusations, but Choi Minwoo knew how evil a person could become.

At least, that was what the Lee Jungryong he had known had been like.

[2004] Several kilometers is roughly 2–3 mi.

And at the same time…

He knew Jin Taekyung well, too.

You're strong. Stronger than anyone I know.

Choi Minwoo had said those words to Jin Taekyung once.

Some people might have laughed at him, but Choi Minwoo had meant them.

He believed no S-rank Hunter—not even Cheon Taemin, his maternal grandfather and the man who had defeated the Demon King Asmodeus—could be stronger than Jin Taekyung.

It wasn't a matter of skill, much less a question of whose aura was greater or stronger.

It was something only those who had come to know Jin Taekyung possessed.

Faith.

Jin Taekyung had given Choi Minwoo faith.

Cheon Taemin, the hero who had saved humanity, had pushed his young grandson out of his thoughts after the boy lost his parents.

Jin Taekyung had not.

He had rejected every temptation around him that whispered of wealth and honor, remained with the Peace Guild, and protected his people through every danger.

No matter who stood against him.

"Our opponent is the Ares Guild. It'll be a dangerous road."

"Thorny roads are kind of my specialty."

"More dangerous than anything we've faced so far."

"Team Leader."

"Yes?"

"Sometimes it's okay to be honest."

"…!"

It was the first time anyone had ever said that to him.

Butler Kim, who had been by his side since childhood, was thoughtful and warm, but he had never given Choi Minwoo that same certainty.

Jin Taekyung had, and that gave Choi Minwoo the courage to speak.

"Will you… continue staying with the Peace Guild?"

"Yeah. That's more like it."

Choi Minwoo could never forget Jin Taekyung's crooked grin.

That was the day he gained people he could call us, rather than Guild members bound together by a few sheets of paper called a contract.

So this is what it feels like.

He had always been alone.

Isolated and lonely.

For as long as he could remember, he had been cut off from everything around him.

The children he met in his youth were wary of him, and the adults whispered among themselves.

It hurt, but he never let it show. Only the aging Butler Kim had ever been someone he could truly confide in.

But not anymore.

A smile appeared on Choi Minwoo's lips.

Far in the distance, he watched the flames rising through the thick fog and darkness, then gripped his sword once more.

Shhk!

A monster's body split apart beneath a flash of dazzling aura.

As the brief silence and stillness that had settled over the battlefield shattered, a tremendous cry burst from Choi Minwoo's lips.

"Attack—!"

He raised his sword and charged toward the monsters, looking much like someone Lee Jungryong had seen several decades ago.

Chapter 421

There was an old saying passed down among Hunters.

Mages came in two kinds: Grand Mages, and everyone else.

Magic Johnson had proven that saying true firsthand.

Among the seven billion people on Earth, there were only three Grand Mages.

And of those three, he was the strongest War Mage. During the Great Cataclysm, he had slain countless monsters and led innumerable battles to victory.

Yet even Magic Johnson, for all his incredible achievements, had encountered a being before whom he was forced to swallow his pride.

I hate to say this, but the Arch Lich's magic is a cut above mine. Be careful, Jin.

That was how powerful the Arch Lich was. There could be no hesitation or carelessness—not even for an instant—when facing him.

—Human, hurry!

I know, damn it.

I let the Skeleton Warlord's shriek go in one ear and out the other as I poured internal energy into both legs.

Crack-crack-crack!

The solid concrete floor sank beneath me, unable to withstand the pressure transmitted into it. I bent my knees slightly, then kicked off with all my strength.

Boom!

With a thunderous roar like an exploding bomb, I shot into the air like a streak of light.

A fierce wind tore across my body, and the Arch Lich rapidly drew closer, his black robe spread like wings.

—You…

I could see them.

His trembling red eyes.

White Flame, launched with all my strength, had shattered the invisible barrier surrounding the Arch Lich and was now falling with everything it had.

Come.

I stretched out my hand. Seizing an Object Through Empty Space caught White Flame's shaft from several meters[2005] away and pulled it into my grasp.

Now!

[2005] One meter is about 3.3 ft.

[2006] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; three jiazi correspond to 180 years.

I thrust the spear with all my strength. Three jiazi[2006] of Scorching Yang Qi surged up from my dantian and raced forward without restraint. Force like blue hellfire erupted over the transparent spearhead.

Fwooooooom!

And just as I became certain I had succeeded—

—Gravity.

Fwoosh!

“Hngh!”

With that sinister voice, something invisible pressed down on my entire body.

No.

It struck me.

I swallowed a breath and reached out as far as I could, but before the spearhead brimming with Force could touch the Arch Lich’s foot, my body was already falling toward the ground.

The Arch Lich, who had seemed close enough to touch, receded in an instant.

“You fucking—”

Booooom!

I crashed down like a meteor. Above my head, laughter like scraping metal rang out.

—Not bad. Amusing in its own way.

Damn skeleton bastard.

I spat out a wad of phlegm and looked up at the Arch Lich looming over me like a god.

“Good to hear. It’s only going to get more entertaining from here.”

—Humans are always dreaming futile dreams. I have seen it countless times. Driven by anger and longing, you challenge what cannot be surpassed, only to confront reality at last and fall into despair.

“That sounds a lot like the bullshit spewed by all the guys who’ve died by my hand… Do you people share a Hundred Questions and Answers for Dealing with Jin Taekyung or something? Hold study sessions every now and then?”

—Even so, those who died by your hand were still insignificant humans. But I am different.

“Of course you’re different, you son of a bitch. You’re already dead.”

—…!

The Arch Lich fell silent for a moment, so I continued.

“Looking at you now, someone must’ve killed you, too. Was it a human? Is that why you’ve been flaunting your inferiority complex this whole time?”

—You…

“Yep. This bastard was killed by a human.”

—Will you shut your mouth!

At his thunderous shout, the magic surrounding the Arch Lich surged violently. His red eyes, far brighter than before, glared down at me.

—I am a servant of a great king. I am not a being who can be compared to insignificant creatures like you!

I was about to fire back when the unexpected word stopped me.

Wait. A king?

Did I hear that wrong?

As the question flashed through my mind, the Skeleton Warlord answered in a trembling voice.

—This commander heard it clearly, too, wretched human. Th-then, could it be…

No way. It can't be.

I swallowed dryly and asked,

"Is the great king you just mentioned the Demon King Asmodeus?"

—Do not speak the name of His Highness.

So much for no way.

It really was the Demon King Asmodeus.

The Skeleton Warlord sucked in a breath despite not needing to breathe, while I muttered in disbelief,

"Huh. Asmodeus? Seriously?"

—The name of His Highness…

"But I was sure Asmodeus had been destroyed."

—The name of His Highness…

"Is Asmodeus still alive? As an Arch Demon King or something?"

—His Highness…

"Yeah, yeah, I get it—he's fucking adorable. Now answer me. Asmodeus died back then, didn't he? Or did he come back to life? If he was resurrected as an undead like you, where is he, and what's he doing now?"

At that moment, the Skeleton Warlord murmured fearfully,

—At this hour, he might be asleep…

What the fuck are you talking about? You don't sleep, either.

—I do not, but His Highness might be different.

What is the Demon King, some good little schoolboy? Do you think he turns off the television, brushes his teeth, and goes to bed when the sun goes down? And why are you using such an honorific?

—Ah! I did not even realize… But from this commander's perspective, is that not only natural?

That's true.

—Indeed. Because I am a monster.

Then don't use it.

—Why not…?

The Demon King is far away, and my fist is close.

—Ah.

The Skeleton Warlord let out an exclamation of enlightenment, then added,

—But, human. It seems the Arch Lich's magic will be getting closer in a moment.

Damn it. He's right.

I hurriedly threw myself aside. A green mist grazed me by a hair and engulfed the spot where I had been standing moments earlier.

Sssssssss!

Stone, steel, even concrete—everything within a radius of dozens of meters[2007] melted away, leaving a gaping hole.

The Arch Lich had fired a poison cloud of terrifying power. His eyes were not merely clear—they burned like torches.

—I intended to take you under my command.

"Uh, what brought that on all of a sudden?"

—I would have subdued your body and soul and used you as the vanguard of my glorious undead army.

"How much does it pay?"

—But I have changed my mind.

"No, I asked how much it pays. Don't tell me you people pay in passion,[2008] too?"

—Your flesh will be torn to pieces, and your soul will wander the River of Death for all eternity.

"Are you acquainted with the deacon at the church I went to as a kid? He said something similar to me. Said a devil like me would go to hell. If my mom hadn't stopped me, he would've become the first martyr in that church's history."

—You insignificant human. Pay the price for insulting His Highness and defiling his name.

"For once, we agree on something. Paying the price. I like that."

I nodded and lowered White Flame at an angle.

"So I'm planning to make you pay the price, too… What do you think?"

The Arch Lich opened his mouth.

The four-syllable incantation, uttered in a voice deeper and more sinister than ever, was not an answer to my question.

It was a curse that called forth death.

[2007] One meter is about 3.3 ft.

[2008] "Passion pay" is a Korean expression for low or unpaid work justified by the worker's enthusiasm.

—Dark Hand.

Whoooom!

A pair of black hands burst through the thick fog. They hurtled in from both sides as if coming together in prayer.

I leaped to avoid the Dark Hands—and another spell was waiting for me.

—Curse.

I twisted to evade the black fog descending like a net, but this time, I was too late.

No.

Perhaps the Arch Lich had anticipated my movement.

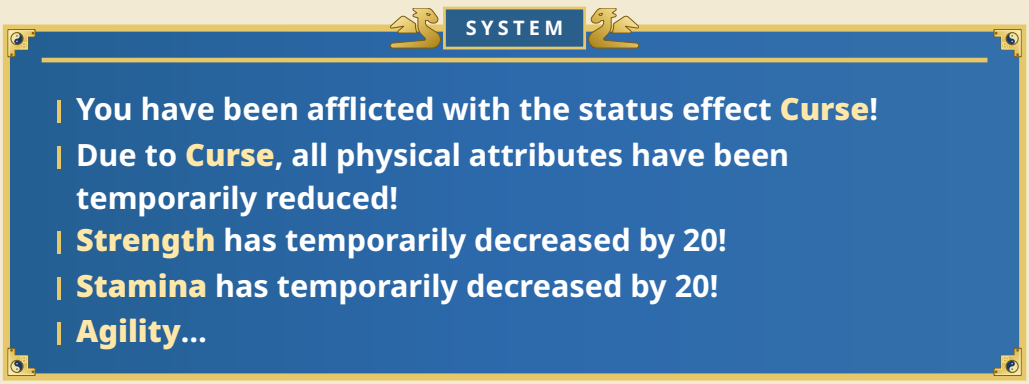
The fog had already been closing in before I even finished dodging the Dark Hands.

Shhk.

Only a paper-thin margin.

At the instant the sticky fog grazed the tip of my little finger—

Beep!



The System notification had barely sounded when my body grew heavier. I clicked my tongue inwardly.

Damn it.

I was already short on points, and now a curse had slapped me with a debuff.

This wasn't a loss of one or two points, either. With twenty points stripped from each attribute at once, I could clearly feel the difference.

But even with a debuff, I was not so helpless that I could do nothing but take his attacks.

Just like now.

—Dark Vine.

Crack! Whoooosh!

Hundreds of thorny vines burst through the ground, filling the air in every direction as they shot toward me.

I exhaled sharply and swung my spear.

Shhk!

A line of blue flame cut through the air, severing every vine formed from magic.

—Dark Vine. Dark Vine. Dark Vine.

Shwooooooosh!

From the severed ends of the thorny vines, which had been collapsing after losing their strength, new vines began to grow.

They budded, grew thorns, and swelled even larger in barely a second.

But to me, one second was as good as a minute.

Fwoom! Shhk!

A thorny vine several meters[2009] around was severed in a single blow.

Cut off from its magical connection, the dark plant toppled onto a half-collapsed high-rise building.

Amid the cloud of dust rising from the thunderous impact, I sensed an ominous fluctuation of energy.

Magic.

My prediction was right.

Shhh-shhh-shhh-shhh!

A spear stained a dull black.

A Bone Spear made entirely of bone became a streak of light and shot toward me.

No.

That wasn't it.

There isn't just one.

—Be careful, human!

Along with the Skeleton Warlord's desperate shout—

Boom!

The dust cloud exploded outward with a blast of compressed air.

More Bone Spears than I could possibly count surged toward me.

Some flew in straight lines. Some fell like meteors. Others curved through the air.

"Huh…"

—Ah.

The Skeleton Warlord and I groaned at the same time.

How many are there? Hundreds? No, thousands?

The overwhelming sight left me speechless for a moment.

A chill ran down my spine, and my mouth fell open on its own. A bead of cold sweat that had formed on my forehead slid down the bridge of my nose.

And then…

Everything stopped.

This is…

[2009] One meter is about 3.3 ft.

It was that same phenomenon that had sometimes come to me in moments of crisis.

My five senses sharpened to a razor's edge, and the world slowed down. Into the space between those moments crept something unfamiliar.

A new sense.

A sixth sense that science could not explain.

I knew its name.

The sixth sense.

At the same time, something inside me shed its shell.

My gaze traveled more and more slowly across the enormous net formed by hundreds—thousands—of Bone Spears.

Because I had already given up everything?

No.

What mattered was the essence.

Appearances could be layered over it, but the essence itself did not change.

And at that very moment, I could see it.

My parched lips parted, and an exclamation slipped out.

"Ah."

So that was it. That's what it was.

It was something I had yet to understand, even after reaching the Supreme Peak.

A flash of enlightenment streaked through my mind like lightning, and the slowed world resumed its proper speed.

Before the rain of spears pouring in from every direction, I raised my spear almost in a daze.

Then I brought White Flame down along the path I could see.

Heavenly Strike.

Fwooooooom!

The erupting flames swallowed everything.

The Bone Spears, too numerous to count, vanished.

No.

The things that vanished the instant the flames touched them were illusions made of magic.

Only the essence collided with my strike, and unable to withstand its power, it burned away.

Shhhhhhh.

Ash scattered in the wind that blew from somewhere.

Carried on that breeze, I heard a bright, cheerful ringing.

Ding. Ding. Ding…

It was such a pleasant sound that I found myself smiling without realizing it.

Chapter 422

Ding. Ding. Ding.

SYSTEM

In crisis lies opportunity. You have gained new insight during a battle in which life and death hung in the balance!
Your Middle Dantian has opened!
The opening of your Middle Dantian has increased all attributes by 20!
Circulating your qi has become vastly more effective!
Your ability to perceive and control the flow of qi has greatly improved!
Muscles and Bones and Sinews and Meridians have increased!

The System notifications kept ringing in my ears without pause.

A breeze stirred my sweat-soaked hair, and I felt the new power and changes permeating my entire body.

Even the final, crystal-clear chime.

Ding.

SYSTEM

As a reward for your enlightenment, you have gained a large amount of EXP!
As a reward for your enlightenment, you have gained 50 points!
Level Up!
As an effect of leveling up, all status ailments and fatigue have been cleared, and some injuries have healed!
The status effect Curse has been removed!
Your temporarily reduced attributes have returned to normal!

And I wasn't the only one who sensed the changes.

A master could hardly fail to notice what his own hand had done. Realizing that his curse magic had been broken, the Arch Lich asked in disbelief,

"How in the world?"

I shrugged at the single word that contained every question he had.

"Well."

"'Well'?"

"Yeah. Well."

"Do you think that explains anything?"

"Of course not. But why should I explain it to you?"

The faint tremor in the Arch Lich's glowing eyes conveyed his sheer incredulity.

"You are clearly not a mage."

"I wanted to be one. Mages get paid more. But I didn't have the talent. I wasn't smart enough, either."

"Even the humans you call Grand Mages could not break my magic so easily."

"They can't. But it's done."

"What utter nonsense!"

I had to admit it.

The Arch Lich's magic—no, his skill—was unquestionably superior to mine.

Even I, who had already far surpassed the limits of an ordinary Hunter, had been unable to avoid his curse magic. And his massive illusion spell using Bone Spears had been genuinely dangerous.

If I hadn't gained that insight, I might not even be standing here now.

But…

"So what are you going to do about it?"

"…!"

I had the System, and I had merely done my best with the power and effort I had been given to overcome the crisis.

If he thought that was unfair, he could use the System, too.

"That's just how the world works. Even if it feels like shit and pisses you off, you have to suck it up and move on. What else can you do? It's already happened. Right?"

The Skeleton Warlord, who had been screaming only moments ago, muttered,

"Wow. You really have a way with words."

I could be like that sometimes.

"But, devious human, that one does not appear willing to suck it up and move on."

The Skeleton Warlord was right.

The next moment, an enormous vortex of magical power formed, and an eerie voice rang out.

"Explode. Sonic Buster."

And at the same time—

Fwooooooosh! Boom!

Highly compressed wind exploded outward all at once.

The sphere of wind shot forward at the speed of sound, pulverizing concrete and snapping steel rebar with the slightest touch.

Every window in the high-rise buildings shattered under the aftershock, and countless shards of glass were swept into the gale.

In a single instant—before I could even blink—the enormous mass of wind had reached the tip of my nose.

"Human!"

The Skeleton Warlord's scream from inside my Inventory echoed like a cry from far away.

Was that bastard worried about his own safety, or mine?

Whatever the real reason, it didn't matter.

There was a world of difference between who I'd been a few minutes ago and who I was now.

Ah.

The area around my chest grew hot.

The place martial artists called the Tanzhong acupoint, or the Middle Dantian, had opened wide.

It allowed me to take in everything around me—to feel it against my skin and see it with my own eyes.

So that's what it was.

The world slowed, and everything became clear enough to see and understand.

The enormous sphere of wind, its currents whipping like blades.

And the flow of magical power that made it possible.

Shh-shh-shh-shh-shhk!

Everything had a center. Magic was no exception.

And now, I could see it.

Now.

I swung my spear through the slowed world.

The sphere of wind that looked ready to sweep away everything in its path split in two along White Flame's spearhead.

The single enormous mass broke into hundreds—thousands—of wind blades. Freed from the magical power controlling them, they veered left and right, tearing through everything around them.

Shhk! Kwa-gwa-gwa-gwa!

The raging wind whipped my clothes and hair around. With a faint smile on my lips, I looked up at the Arch Lich.

"Come down. My neck hurts."

"You…!"

"Or I can come to you."

Crack-crackle! Boom!

One stomp.

The solid ground caved in, and I shot toward the ash-gray sky.

Boom!

The instant Jin Taekyung launched himself from the ground, the Arch Lich realized what he had to do.

I must not let that human come any closer.

Every mage knew to avoid close combat, but for the Arch Lich, those words carried a different weight.

This body feels threatened by a mere human.

He prided himself on having reached the pinnacle of dark magic.

Although he had lost considerable power during his resurrection as an Arch Lich, even now he possessed enough magical power to regard Grand Mages as beneath him.

But the human hurtling toward him now…

He is dangerous.

Yes. Just like that bastard back then.

It was a memory the Arch Lich never wanted to recall again. Clenching his still-intact teeth, he cast a spell.

“Gravity!”

Unlike before, the shout carried palpable power. Invisible gravity bore down over a radius of several dozen meters.[2010]

Just as the pressure—too great for even an S-rank Hunter to resist—was about to engulf Jin Taekyung’s entire body—

Pop!

Compressed air burst from the tip of Jin Taekyung’s foot.

His body escaped the range of the gravity magic with Stepping on Empty Air, then stepped on the empty air again.

His graceful movements resembled a hawk’s, but no mere bird could compare to his speed.

What is this?

The red glow in the Arch Lich’s eyes darkened as he watched Jin Taekyung race through the air toward him.

Jin Taekyung had not only identified the precise range of his gravity magic but had also evaded it with some strange technique.

[2010] Several dozen meters is roughly 30–90 m, or about 98–295 ft.

As I thought. He did not dispel the illusion magic through mere luck. Then…

Whooooooooom!

Magical power poured from the Arch Lich's entire body, shaking the surrounding space.

"Gravity. Gravity. Gravity."

High-level spells that even a skilled high-ranking mage would have needed to chant at length came pouring out without pause.

This time, the Arch Lich was certain he could knock Jin Taekyung from the sky.

Fall, human.

This time, he reduced the strength of his gravity magic in exchange for expanding its range.

How could Jin Taekyung possibly escape gravity pressing down over a radius of several hundred meters[2011]—

Shhk!

The Arch Lich's glowing eyes trembled.

The gravity magic bearing down on Jin Taekyung dispersed, and the Arch Lich felt the magical power connecting him to the spell snap like a thread.

He froze for an instant, stunned that his magic had been broken.

Then Jin Taekyung stepped on empty air once more and shot toward him like a cannonball.

Bang! Shweeeeeek!

With a sharp crack through the air, Jin Taekyung hurtled in front of the Arch Lich —no, a step above him—and brought White Flame down.

Fwoom!

A line of blue flame streaked toward the Arch Lich.

Crash!

In the slowed world, the invisible barrier surrounding the Arch Lich shattered.

The flames of Force, fueled by three jiazi[2012] of Scorching Yang Qi, smashed through dozens of layered defensive spells and surged toward the Arch Lich's body.

At that very moment—

"Great Bone Wall!"

With an eerie cry, a wall of black bones rose into the air.

The highest-level defensive spell, manifested barely a meter away,[2013] collided with the flame-wreathed spearhead.

[2011] Several hundred meters is roughly 300–900 m, or about 980–2,950 ft.

[2012] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; three jiazi equal 180 years.

[2013] One meter is about 3.28 ft.

High in the ash-gray sky, an enormous shock wave and a thunderous roar erupted around the two figures facing each other across the bone wall.

Kwaaang!

Compressed wind exploded outward.

The clouds circling far above scattered. Buildings that had barely maintained their shape collapsed, and half-rotted corpses were swept away by the wind.

Yet the two beings responsible for it all remained perfectly still, staring at each other through the barrier.

“That was close, wasn’t it?”

“Yes, quite impressive. No…”

The Arch Lich stared at the transparent spearhead piercing the center of the wall and continued,

“I shall call it dangerous.”

The length of the spearhead that had passed through the bone barrier was no more than the width of a finger joint, but the Force that erupted in that instant had reached the tip of the Arch Lich’s nose.

It had been a fortunate escape for the Arch Lich.

For Jin Taekyung, it had been unfortunate.

“You got lucky.”

“You are arrogant, human. But I will admit this much.”

“What?”

The Arch Lich slowly continued as Jin Taekyung stared at him in confusion.

“You have earned the right to be. If you truly are the Adversary.”

“…The Adversary?”

“That is right. The king’s Adversary. His eternal nemesis, bound to him by a god’s machinations. I cannot yet be certain, but… that must also be why I was able to rise again after stepping into the River of Death.”

Jin Taekyung frowned.

What was the king’s Adversary? And what kind of nonsense was this about a god’s machinations?

“Do you have middle-school syndrome[2014] or something? Get rid of those bones and show me your right hand. Let’s see if there’s a Black Flame Dragon in there.”

The Arch Lich shook his head.

“This is something neither you nor I can understand. But one thing is certain.”

The deeply sunken red eye-lights flared fiercely.

At first, he had thought Jin Taekyung was merely a strong and unusual human.

Not anymore.

[2014] “Middle-school syndrome” refers to adolescent fantasies of possessing hidden powers. A Black Flame Dragon is a stock example of such an imagined power.

He remembered sweeping across this planet decades ago while serving the king.

He also recalled the figure of the human he had encountered on the day he lost everything and fell into the River of Death—the first and last time he had ever met that human.

The Adversary.

The human who had killed him and even assassinated the king.

The one he had tried to stop but could not, the one he had tried to approach but could never reach—the only human he had ever feared.

And today, during his battle with Jin Taekyung, the Arch Lich had remembered that day.

“You… will definitely die here.”

His voice was eerie but more resolute than ever.

Jin Taekyung’s answer was simple.

“What the hell are you talking about, dumbass?”

And the next moment—

“Eat this, fucker.”

Fwoom! Kwaaaaaa!

With those quiet words, a fist wreathed in blue hellfire shot forward, erasing everything in its path.

It struck the curtain of black bones.

Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

Crack-crack-crack!

The bone barrier that had seemed capable of blocking any attack collapsed.

Beyond the countless fragments of bone scattering in every direction, the Arch Lich’s face came into view.

Jin Taekyung spoke with an expressionless face.

“See how much better this is? My neck doesn’t hurt, either.”

“…!”

“Down you go.”

Wham!

A single punch, fired like a ray of light, slammed into the Arch Lich’s jaw.

Chapter 423

Wham!

The instant the heavy blow sent the Arch Lich hurtling toward the ground, I drew up my internal energy and kicked off the air.

Bang!

Compressed air exploded beneath my feet, launching me at terrifying speed toward his plummeting figure.

The Skeleton Warlord let out a cry that might have been a scream or a cheer.

“You did it, human! Hurry and finish it!”

Finish what?

Unfortunately, he was wrong. Having driven my fist directly into the Arch Lich’s jaw, I knew that better than anyone.

He cast a defensive spell in that split second…!

Before my all-out Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist could connect, he had covered his face with a Bone Shield.

Considering the force behind the blow, he could not have escaped completely unharmed, but this was not enough to bring him down.

And sure enough, the Arch Lich abruptly stopped in midair after plummeting like a meteor. Immense mana rippled through the atmosphere.

“Darkness Hold.”

Fwooooooosh!

A pair of enormous hands burst out of thin air. At a glance, they looked similar to Dark Hand, but as its name implied, Darkness Hold was a spell designed solely to bind its target.

I brought my spear down toward the two hands hurtling at me.

I can see it.

Everything had a grain. Living creatures had one. So did the wind, and even invisible energy.

Opening my Middle Dantian had allowed me to sense and see the core and grain of things.

Just like now.

Shhk!

Flames blossomed, and the darkness split apart. The black hands writhed as if in pain before dissolving into mist, and the Arch Lich’s eye-lights flashed.

The next instant, his hand of dark, weathered bone clawed through the air.

“Dark Claw!”

Fssssh! Shhk!

The dispersing black mist transformed into a beast's claws and rained down.

Countless attacks hurtled in from every direction, each tracing a different path. I could have blocked them easily enough if I committed to it.

But then I would lose the Arch Lich after finally closing the distance.

I have to choose.

I could not catch two rabbits at once—especially when the other side was not a rabbit, but a tiger.

I made my decision in that brief instant and hurled White Flame with all my strength.

Not at the magic surrounding me, but at the Arch Lich.

Fwooooooom!

Wreathed in blue hellfire, White Flame cleaved through everything in its path like a streak of light.

The Arch Lich cried out with more urgency than ever before.

"Bone Shi—"

Too late, you son of a bitch.

Fwooooooosh!

Blue hellfire swallowed the Arch Lich whole.

His half-formed bone shield turned to ash and crumbled before the blistering heat.

Crunch!

White Flame's spearhead punched through the Arch Lich's chest. Impaled like meat on a skewer, he plunged toward the ground with a shriek unlike any sound I had ever heard from him.

At that moment, I felt a chilling wind slicing in from every direction.

"Human, danger…!"

I already knew. I did not need the Skeleton Warlord's warning.

I had known and done it anyway. To take the bones, I had to give up my flesh. Even knowing I would not emerge unscathed, I had believed this was the right decision.

As I watched the claws of mana rain down from every direction, a thought crossed my mind.

…Maybe I should've just blocked them.

But there were no take-backs now.

Shh-shh-shh-shh-shhk!

A violent gust swept over my entire body.

It was not an illusion like Bone Spear, nor was it slow enough to block. I twisted my body as much as possible and gathered my internal energy, but there was a definite limit.

Shhk! Shhk! Shhk! Shraaaak!

Shoulder, side, thigh, arm…

Countless claws of mana slashed and raked across my entire body. Blood burst from the deep gashes in my skin, and overwhelming pain crashed over me.

Damn it.

It hurt. Enough to kill me.

Enough to make me want to die.

No matter how many times I experienced it, pain was something that was difficult to grow accustomed to.

My vision blurred, and the strength drained from my body before I realized it.

The agony lasted only a moment, yet seemed to stretch on forever.

When I finally opened my eyes, the first thing I saw was an enormous pile of concrete looming right in front of me.

“Get a hold of yourself, human!”

“…!”

The Skeleton Warlord’s frantic shout snapped me back to my senses.

I forced internal energy into my stiffened body. Along with the tearing pain in my acupoints, the senses that had fallen asleep awakened.

Now!

Without a moment’s hesitation, I flipped over in midair.

Crash!

A thunderous roar rose with a cloud of dust. Violent vibrations and pain slowly crawled up the leg with which I landed roughly on the concrete pile.

“Urgh.”

As I clenched my teeth against the pain, the Skeleton Warlord spoke.

“Human, you do not… appear to be all right.”

I answered between ragged breaths.

“Huff. If you know that, huff, then shut up. My head’s ringing.”

I was not exaggerating. It really was.

The System notifications drilling into my ears were enough to make me want to throw up.

Beep.

SYSTEM

The status effect Severe Injury has been applied!
The status effect Excessive Bleeding has been applied!
Due to severe injuries, your physical attributes have been drastically reduced!
Strength, Agility, and Stamina have each decreased by 200 points!
You have suffered severe injuries! Immediate treatment is required!

Yeah. I thought so, too.

Whether from losing too much blood or the relentless agony coursing through me, my vision was hazy and my thoughts barely worked.

But even in that state, there was one presence I could not forget.

“The Arch Lich. Where’s the Arch Lich?”

At the sound of my cracked voice, the Skeleton Warlord roared.

“Have you gone completely insane, human?! Treat yourself first!”

“I haven’t gotten a kill notification yet. That means he’s still ali—”

“Who cares about your kill notification?! Treat yourself first!”

“Hngh.”

I told you not to shout.

Dizzy, I leaned against the pile of concrete. Blood dripped from my body, leaving me soaked from head to toe, while my arms and legs trembled like aspen leaves beyond my control.

Damn it.

I had really taken a beating.

My one consolation was that the Arch Lich had to be in even worse shape than I was—or at least no better.

“You stupid human!”

I know. I know.

With his shout reverberating through my head, I slowly opened my palm and muttered inwardly.

Inventory open. Summon.

Pop!

The thought became reality at once.

I drew out an item from the subspace pocket that had once belonged to Lee Jungryong and now belonged to me.

A Top-Grade Potion.

Had Lee Jungryong ever imagined that both Top-Grade Potions he had brought along just in case would end up being used on me?

My hand trembling, I uncorked the potion and raised it to my lips, ready to gulp it down like the elixir of life.

Or rather, I was just about to.

Tap! Fwooooooosh!

"…Huh?"

It happened in an instant.

A black thorny vine sprang from between the slabs of concrete and struck my wrist. In the slowed world, the Top-Grade Potion flew from my hand and vanished beyond the pale haze.

I stared blankly at the few drops of potion scattered through the air as they soaked into the ground. Then I suddenly spoke.

"Dark Vine."

Someone's all-too-familiar magic.

The Skeleton Warlord muttered like he was groaning.

"It is him."

I slowly raised my head. Beyond the dense fog, a pair of red eye-lights blazed like torches as they drew closer.

A three-meter[2015] body with a black sheen emerged through the mist with heavy steps. He resembled a human, but no one could have called him one.

"You, human."

His low voice seethed with unmistakable fury.

Deep within my Inventory, the Skeleton Warlord trembled. I smiled faintly.

"You son of a bitch. You stole the food right out of my mouth."

"Your futile struggle ends here."

Shhk! Snap!

I did not even have time to reach out. The Arch Lich snapped his fingers, and Dark Vine swept up Lee Jungryong's subspace pocket—an ordinary-looking leather pouch—and flung it far out of sight.

"No more cheap tricks will work."

The mana surrounding the Arch Lich reacted to every word he spoke.

But just as I had suffered a severe injury, the power he emitted was also weaker than before.

The White Flame piercing the center of his chest had to be the decisive cause.

I can do this.

[2015] Three meters is about 9.8 ft.

I forced myself upright. As I reached out, a spear summoned from my Inventory landed in my hand.

“That spear in your chest looks good on you. Want me to plant another one?”

“Will you have the chance?”

“Of course. Looking at the state you’re in, I’d say my chances are pretty good.”

“Humans never know the difference between courage and recklessness. How foolish. Truly, how foolish.”

The Arch Lich laughed aloud and spread his arms.

His robe had been reduced to ash by my earlier attack. In its place, pitch-black mana poured from his entire body and took shape.

That’s…

A vortex of mana that felt ominous just to look at.

I instinctively realized what the Arch Lich was trying to do.

A Gate.

It was unstable, as if it might explode at any moment, but it had unmistakably taken the shape of a Gate.

The Arch Lich’s next words confirmed my suspicions.

“It is not yet complete, but… if I can merely bring you down, I should be able to complete everything.”

At the same time, a low voice that seemed to come from the heavens reverberated through the space.

“Descend upon this place. Gate Open.”

“…!”

I had to stop it somehow. But pain slowed my body, and the change had already begun.

I stared wide-eyed at the sight that unfolded the next moment.

Kwaaaaaaaaaaang!

The few faint rays of sunlight piercing the ash-gray sky vanished completely.

The sky split with a thunderous roar, and a storm swept in every direction. In the void left behind, a mass of darkness rose like an ancient giant climbing to its feet.

Fwooooooosh!

The churning darkness surged from the heart of the ruined city.

As tall as a high-rise and wider than a soccer field, it dwarfed every Gate I had ever seen. The mere sight of it filled me with fear that seeped into my bones.

“Ah… ahh.”

Even the Skeleton Warlord, an undead monster, trembled before it.

I stood there with my mouth hanging open, staring blankly at the Gate. Then I suddenly realized something I had forgotten.

I have to stop it. No matter what.

The Gate might still be incomplete, but if this continued, an uncontrollable disaster would begin.

Millions—perhaps tens of millions—could die.

And among them…

Some might be my people.

Team Leader Choi, out on the battlefield. Xiao Shen, whom I had grown attached to despite our short time together.

If the Arch Lich moved beyond China and reached the Korean Peninsula… the members of the Peace Guild and even my beloved family would be in danger.

I have to go.

Will drove my body, paralyzed by pain and shock, back into motion.

I dredged up every last ounce of internal energy. My acupoints, already ravaged by internal injuries, screamed in pain, and blood burst anew from wounds all over my body.

But I did not stop.

I needed only one chance.

Just one.

Flamefire Path.

My battered leg pushed against the ground. A path of flame opened amid shattering pain.

At its end stood a single being.

The one who had started all of this.

The one who could end it all.

Die.

One Annihilation.

In the slowed world, I drew my spear back as far as I could and thrust.

The vortex unleashed with all my strength reached the Arch Lich.

Kwaaaaaaaaaaang!

And amid the blue flames filling the world, one laughter-laced word pierced my ears.

“Blink.”

Chapter 424

Kwaaaaaaaaaa!

The vortex wreathed in blue flame devoured everything in its path.

Ruined buildings with shattered concrete and bare steel frames. Human and monster corpses strewn together throughout the wreckage.

The ultrahigh heat burned and melted countless things.

All but one.

“Blink.”

All but him.

Beep.

SYSTEM

Skill One Annihilation has been used!
All internal energy has been consumed!
Everything comes at a price. Despite your severe injuries, you have expended an excessive amount of power.
The status effect Exhaustion has been applied!
Strength, Stamina, and Agility have temporarily decreased drastically!

I felt the strength drain from my entire body. I could barely hear the System notification drilling into my ears—or the Skeleton Warlord’s shouts from inside my Inventory.

My body felt as heavy as waterlogged cotton, and only one thought kept circling through my cold, numb mind.

That was my last chance.

Why? Why hadn’t I known? Why hadn’t I guessed?

The Arch Lich had clearly said he had watched me through Familiars planted throughout the battlefield.

Then I should have accounted for the fact that I had used One Annihilation against the Liches and Death Knights on my way here.

Even if I could not be certain, I should at least have suspected it.

Idiot.

A self-deprecating laugh escaped me. I had sworn not to let my guard down… yet at the most important moment, I had made my greatest mistake.

Having no other choice was no excuse. A fight was not about the process, but the result.

And this was what letting my guard down had earned me.

Clang!

The iron spear slipped between my fingers and rolled across the ground. My legs, drained of strength, slowly gave way.

As I sank to my knees and lowered my head, a deep darkness fell over me.

“You, human. How does it feel to pay the price for your reckless bravado?”

I barely managed to raise my head and met a pair of burning red eye-lights. A voice squeezed through my cracked lips.

“Of course it feels like shit, you fucking bastard.”

“It was a fearsome strike. I shall commend you for that much.”

The Arch Lich’s voice was steeped in triumph.

Even his teleportation magic had not allowed him to evade One Annihilation completely. His left arm was gone.

But in the end, he was the one standing here as the victor.

The red eye-lights looking down at me, kneeling like a criminal, glimmered with joy.

“I waited until the very end. I restrained myself and endured the humiliation of suffering at a human’s hands. And at last… victory belongs to me.”

Smart. Cunning.

Just as I had thought, he had been waiting for me to use One Annihilation from the very beginning.

Earlier, I had swept away the Liches and Death Knights with One Annihilation, then recovered my stamina by leveling up. But the Arch Lich had not missed the fact that the attack had exhausted all my strength in an instant.

“Do you understand now? This is your limit. The limit of humanity.”

Limit.

That one word pierced deep into my chest.

The limit called F-rank, which I had been unable to escape no matter how hard I worked. The very limit I had continued to break through day after day after obtaining the System.

Is this really as far as I go?

I had worked myself nearly to death. For my own sake, and for the people I loved. No matter what danger came at me, I gritted my teeth and fought my way through it.

That was how I had lived.

Every step had been part of breaking through my limits.

“It’s not… over yet.”

The voice that slipped between my lips sounded like it belonged to someone else, utterly devoid of life.

I looked up at the Arch Lich through hazy eyes.

"What?"

"I said it's not over yet."

A life-and-death duel ended only when one of the two combatants fell.

So this fight was not over.

Only when one of us finally died would whoever remained standing be the victor.

I mumbled in my dazed state.

Inventory open. Summon.

One of the spears stored in my Inventory appeared in my hand.

No—I thought I had caught it, but it slipped from my grasp at once.

Clang!

The truth struck me again.

I no longer had the strength to hold a spear, much less the energy to swing one.

"Kehat! Kahahahah!"

The Arch Lich burst into wild laughter at the sight of me.

But I did not give up.

I couldn't.

Inventory open. Summon.

I kept summoning weapons.

Clang!

And kept dropping them.

Inventory open. Summon.

Clang!

"Human. You foolish, stupid human!"

Even as the Arch Lich mocked me, I never stopped.

The courage to humbly accept death? If that was what people called courage, I would rather be a coward.

I would… survive. No matter what.

I believed that was the final courtesy I owed the life I had fought so hard to live—and the right answer.

Inventory open. Summon.

At that very moment—

Ding.

SYSTEM

Endurance has increased drastically.
The attribute Endurance has changed into Will!
Those with strong wills are not easily broken, nor do they fall. They will keep their will burning until the very end and fight with every ounce of their strength.
A strong will can sometimes produce the power to transcend one's limits!
The special effect Indomitable has manifested. All attributes temporarily increase slightly, and fatigue is reduced!

I felt warmth spreading from deep within me.

Compared to the power I had once possessed, it was infinitesimal. Yet somehow, it was warmer than anything else.

It was the System's answer to my desperate plea.

My final chance.

With my hand still trembling, I tightened my grip around the cold spear shaft.

"You…"

I was not the only one who noticed the change.

The Arch Lich had been watching me as though I were a monkey in a zoo, but now his eye-lights widened. At that moment, I gathered every scrap of strength I had and hurled myself forward.

In a world slowed to a crawl, I thrust the spear toward the Arch Lich standing tall before me.

Fwooooooosh!

As the spearhead tore through the air with a piercing shriek, I saw it clearly.

The Arch Lich's eye-lights curved like crescent moons.

He was mocking me.

"Blood Explosion."

Boom!

An explosion.

Then a shock tore through my entire body.

My body, hurtling forward with every ounce of strength I possessed, abruptly locked up. The spear slipped from my hand and buried itself diagonally in the ground.

I blinked with both eyes, their tiny blood vessels burst. In a world dyed entirely red, something sticky and wet fell from the air and touched my face.

Drip. Drip-drip-drip.

…Ah.

Blood.

Blood had erupted from my entire body like a fountain and was now raining down around me.

I raised an arm that trembled like an aspen leaf and saw ragged flesh and stark-white bone.

Blood Explosion.

An explosion of blood.

Beyond my fading consciousness, I heard the Skeleton Warlord cry out.

"…Human!"

How long had he been shouting?

I wanted to answer, but all that spilled between my lips was blood mixed with bits of my organs.

"Cough."

My vision spun.

I reached toward the Arch Lich, barely visible through the blood covering my face, but I could neither touch him nor reach him.

Perhaps I never would.

"Get a hold of yourself! You have to live!"

Like that needed saying.

Of course I did.

I had to survive, defeat the Arch Lich, and return to the place where I belonged.

But…

Could I really do that?

At that moment, the world slowly began to tilt.

No. The world was still.

I was the one tilting.

Unable to withstand the unending blood loss and injuries, my body was finally giving out.

No. If I fall, it's all over.

I forced my already broken ankle to hold me upright.

The faint pain, no sharper than a thorn prick, was proof that I was dying. The Skeleton Warlord's shouts, breaking through the static like a bad radio signal, were proof that I was still alive.

"…do it, human! Hurry!"

Do what? What?

"Summon me right n—!"

My ruptured eardrums and fading consciousness could not make out the Skeleton Warlord's words.

Even if I had heard him clearly, I could not have stopped what the Arch Lich did next.

"You possess an interesting item."

At some point, a familiar object had appeared in the Arch Lich's hand.

White Flame, my beloved spear that had accompanied me through countless battles, flared in a stranger's grasp.

But even as his finger bones burned, the Arch Lich merely laughed.

"I have received an extravagant gift. I should return it to its owner now."

The Arch Lich drew back his arm. Powerful mana suppressed White Flame's flames and surged toward the spearhead.

"Farewell, new Adversary—or perhaps merely a foolish human who might have been the Adversary."

Fwoosh!

The sound of the spear cutting through the air was brief.

The moment felt eternal.

I silently watched White Flame streak toward me like a flash of light. Countless possibilities raced through my mind before I finally reached a conclusion.

I can't dodge it.

Then only one ending remained.

Death.

I had fought countless battles over the past seven years, but never had the word death felt so close.

All I could do was watch it approach.

Yeah. It's over.

The instant I calmly repeated those words to myself—

Crack!

White Flame's spearhead shattered bone and punched through the center of a chest.

My eyes flew wide, and I froze.

Not from pain.

From shock.

"You…"

"What?"

Unable to find the words, I stared at the blue eye-lights flickering inches from my face.

The Skeleton Warlord, previously no more than a skull the size of a soccer ball, now stood two meters[2016] tall. He spoke in his usual gruff voice.

“Do not ask how I managed to come out on my own. This commander has no idea, either.”

“Then why? Why did you…”

I looked at him as I asked.

The spearhead had pierced the Skeleton Warlord’s back and chest, stopping exactly one handspan away from me.

If no one had blocked it, it would have killed me and then some.

The Skeleton Warlord had thrown himself in front of me and saved my life.

“…I do not know that either. Damn it. I do not know anything anymore. Perhaps this sword bewitched me.”

Only then did I recognize the sword in the Skeleton Warlord’s hand.

“Hero’s Soul.”

Lei Fei’s only remaining keepsake.

A sword that could not even be held by someone unworthy of becoming a hero.

That very Hero’s Soul was now in the Skeleton Warlord’s hand.

In the hand of a Named Monster that was not even human.

“Hero’s Soul. That is a decent name for something named by humans. No, to be honest, it is cool. It is a shame I was too late to swing it properly…”

The Skeleton Warlord’s voice faded.

The light was slowly disappearing from his blue eye-lights, which had always shone so clearly.

I knew what this meant.

Erasure.

There was no doubt.

Even now, the Arch Lich’s mana carried within White Flame’s spearhead was rapidly eating away at the Skeleton Warlord.

“You…”

“Say no more. I already regret this enough as it is.”

I did not believe him.

His words were gruff, but I heard the quiet laugh behind them.

“Human. There is something I wish to ask.”

The Arch Lich was approaching beyond the Skeleton Warlord’s slowly crumbling shoulder, but I silently nodded.

“Anything.”

After hesitating for a moment, the Skeleton Warlord asked in a small voice,

[2016] Two meters is about 6 ft 7 in.

“What you said last time. Did you mean it?”

“Last time? What did I…? Ah.”

I suddenly remembered.

It had been right after Lei Fei’s death, when the Skeleton Warlord was thinking about the past he could no longer remember.

And the words I had casually tossed his way.

“Well, I think he was probably a pretty decent guy.”

“…Huh? Were you saying that to this commander?”

“No. Just talking to myself.”

“Ahem. Right?”

So that was why.

That was what it had been about.

For the Skeleton Warlord, who had awakened after drawing strength from a spirit that had lost all its memories, I might have been his only friend—the one who had always been by his side.

One small remark I had tossed out like a pebble had sent ripples through the pond of his heart.

What an idiot.

Why did that matter? Why was one little thing worth going this far?

For a moment, I could not speak. Something hot rose inside me, but I forced it down and barely managed to answer.

“Of course I meant it.”

“Yes. I see.”

The Skeleton Warlord’s flickering blue eye-lights curved into a smile.

At that very moment, a chilling voice rang out and brought everything to an end.

“Have you finished saying your farewells?”

“…!”

“Bone Explosion.”

Boom!

I instinctively crossed both arms over my face. The impact swept through my entire body and sent me flying.

When I barely managed to push myself upright, I saw a skull soaring high into the air and bones shattering into countless pieces.

And…

That was all.

The Skeleton Warlord was nowhere to be seen.

Thud!

Hero’s Soul fell from the air and plunged deep into the ground.

Along with the hand of someone who had never released its hilt, even at the very end.

Chapter 425

Clang-clatter!

White Flame, having lost its target, rolled across the ground.

Ah.

The Arch Lich snapped his fingers at me as I stood frozen like a statue. A pair of black hands materialized in midair and constricted around my entire body.

He no longer needed an incantation to cast his magic.

Step. Step.

With every step the Arch Lich took, something seeped into various parts of his body, which was as hazy as mist.

The left arm that had vanished in One Annihilation slowly regenerated, while his shattered, fractured bones knit back together, sturdier than before and gleaming with an even darker hue.

The closer the Gate came to completion, the stronger the Arch Lich became.

—So there was a reason I smelled death upon you. Friendship between a human and a monster… How touching.

Crack.

I heard bones shifting out of place throughout my body, but I stared blankly over the Arch Lich's shoulder.

More precisely, at the sword buried in the ground—and the hand of someone who had held on to its hilt until the very end.

The Skeleton Warlord.

Humans and monsters were sworn enemies, as ordained by God.

The same had been true of me and the Skeleton Warlord. At least, it had been at first.

But… now I finally understood. At some point, the Skeleton Warlord had stopped being a monster to me.

If I'd still thought of him as a monster, I would've erased him with my own hands.

If I had killed the Skeleton Warlord myself, the resulting level-up might have given me one last hope.

But I had hesitated, and ultimately given up.

Not because he had saved my life. Because in my heart, I had already accepted him as a friend.

A hollow laugh escaped me.

Damn it. I never should've gotten attached.

The Arch Lich's eye-lights narrowed at the sight of me.

—Are you laughing? In a situation like this?

“My mother used to say that fortune comes to those who smile.”

—You have lost your mind.

“Why the fuck do you care if I laugh? What are you, my immediate senior in the army?”

I spat toward the Arch Lich’s face. A thick liquid, impossible to distinguish as blood or phlegm, trickled down between his brows.

At the same time, the red eye-lights in the places where his eyes should have been flared violently.

—I heard your answer clearly.

“Go eat a dick.”

It would have been a lie to say I had no regrets about the life I had lived, but none of that mattered now. Regret always came too late, and I had fought until the bitter end.

I had done enough.

Once I let go of everything, it all felt like one long dream. My face, smiling peacefully at the Arch Lich’s eye-lights, was reflected in them.

—I told you, did I not? Your flesh would be torn to pieces, and your soul would wander the River of Death forever.

I readily nodded in agreement.

“I guess so. Just like that Demon King bastard you serve.”

—…!

“If I run into him, I’ll give him your regards. What’s his address?”

—…We shall see how long you can continue spouting such nonsense.

At the Arch Lich’s gesture, the enormous hands of mana squeezing me seized all four of my limbs. Then they began pulling my body apart with tremendous force.

Slowly.

Little by little.

Crack. Craaack.

Small ruptures sounded inside me, and the sensation of pain I had momentarily forgotten awakened.

I thought I no longer had the strength even to scream, but a cry tore itself from between my lips.

“Gnh… graaaaagh!”

—That sounds much better.

Pain bleached my vision white. I let out all the screams I had been holding back and waited for death to come.

But when even the pain began to fade, what came for me was not death.

It was a System notification.

Beep.

SYSTEM

High-grade Potion has been used!
The amount of potion used is too small. Your injuries have been healed slightly!
Your injuries are extremely severe. You require a greater amount of higher-quality healing than this!

…What?

A cool sensation spread through me, and the pain surged back to life. My eyes flew open.

The Arch Lich was staring at me with mockery gleaming in his eye-lights.

And in his hand was a glass bottle.

That's…

It was one of the potions that had been in Lee Jungryong's subspace pocket—the one the Arch Lich had stolen long ago.

And now he was using a potion made for healing as an instrument of torture.

Just enough healing to keep me poised at the threshold of death.

Just enough to make me feel the greatest possible pain.

—Foolish human. Did you truly think this body would grant you such an easy, peaceful death?

"…!"

—Continue to howl. Weep like a coward and writhe in agony. Only once you have realized your folly shall you be permitted to cross into the River of Death.

The Arch Lich shook the glass bottle, his voice thick with mockery.

Not even a tenth of the potion was gone. The amount that remained represented all the pain I had yet to endure.

Time would crawl by without end, each moment stretching into an eternity.

Weak healing spread through my body, but so did pain that came crashing down over every inch of me. My breathing grew ragged. I forced a smile and asked the Arch Lich,

"If I give three cheers for the Demon King, will you finish me off sooner?"

—Perhaps. If you do so with sufficient passion and sincerity, I may consider it.

"I'm not doing that, you son of a bitch."

—Very well. We have plenty of time, after all. There is no harm in considering it at your leisure—

Crunch!

The Arch Lich's eye-lights trembled.

So did I.

Neither of us had expected what happened next.

No one had.

—…What is this?

With a doubtful voice, the Arch Lich looked down at his chest.

Light.

It was light. A dazzling radiance bright enough to illuminate the entire world had burst through his chest.

No. That isn't light.

I stared at it with vacant eyes.

It was a sword, shining more brilliantly than ever before.

I knew the name of that all-too-familiar sword.

Hero's Soul.

And I knew the owner of the hand wrapped tightly around its hilt beyond the Arch Lich's skeletal chest.

"…!"

It was as if the entire world had stopped moving.

In that impossibly slowed world, I watched hundreds—thousands—of bone fragments gather.

They had been nothing more than the last traces someone had left behind, but now they pulled toward one another and began taking shape.

Click. Clack!

Bones fused together.

Two arms and two legs formed first, followed by a chest and abdomen.

The black sheen washed from the bones beneath the radiance spilling from Hero's Soul. Before long, they had taken on a soft golden hue, growing longer and sturdier.

Ah.

It was an astonishing sight.

Countless fragments of bone gathered to form a body, as though time itself were flowing backward. The light streaming from the sword drove the darkness from every joint, heralding the birth of a new being.

And finally, when a skull settled onto the completed body—

Flash!

Golden eye-lights burst from its empty sockets.

The feeling was both utterly familiar and completely strange.

The next moment, a voice rang out, and the time that had stopped began to flow again.

—You asked me why, did you not?

"…!"

My body trembled as if lightning had pierced through me. A memory from less than an hour ago flashed through my mind.

Then why, exactly?

Yes. That was what I had asked back then.

Why had he saved me? Why had he chosen to become my shield even though he had been prepared to face Erasure?

He had said he did not know. He did not know why he had done such a thing. Perhaps the sword had bewitched him.

And now, the answer I had not heard then pierced my ears.

—Because though you are devious, you are a pretty decent human. That was all.

A pretty decent guy.

Words I had once said to someone.

I stared at him in disbelief.

His faintly golden body was larger and sturdier than before. An unknown silver pattern was engraved across the forehead of his skull, resembling a crown.

No.

It was unmistakably a crown.

The moment I saw the System window hovering above his head, a hollow laugh escaped me.

"Look how much you've grown, Bones."

—No wonder I have felt itchy all over for so long.

The small black caterpillar had finally shed its skin and spread its wings.

The Skeleton Warlord—or rather, the Skeleton King's eye-lights curved like crescent moons.

He was smiling.

So was I.

And there was one being who could not smile.

—Graaaagh! Graaaaaaaaaagh!

The Arch Lich.

The unprecedented Named Monster, who commanded hundreds of thousands of undead and possessed inexhaustible, tremendous mana, writhed in agony.

A single sword had pierced straight through the center of his chest.

The golden radiance flowing from Hero's Soul devoured his mana and melted his body.

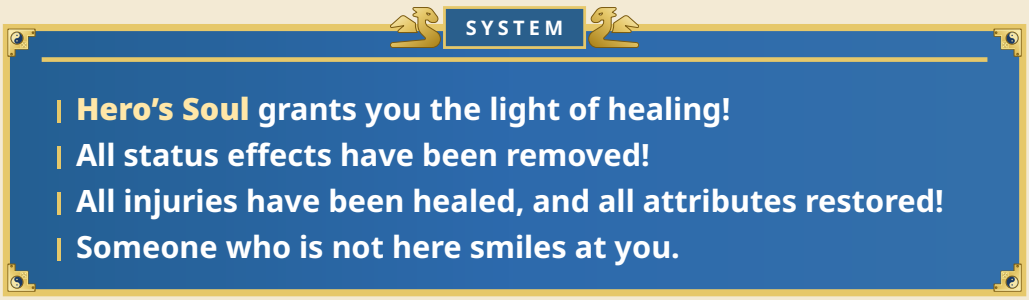
Perhaps even his soul.

—Human.

At the Skeleton King's quiet call, I realized what I had to do.

Now… let's finish this.

Beep.



Fwooooooosh!

A pillar of light burst from Hero's Soul and enveloped me.

Gentle warmth flooded my body. Shattered bones knit together, torn flesh healed, and my damaged organs and meridians[2017] recovered. At the same time, heat seethed through me like lava, ready to erupt at any moment.

I can do this.

The certainty was so absolute that it surprised even me.

And it was true.

With this strength, there was nothing I could not do.

Come.

Fwooooooosh! Clack!

At the same time that I pulled White Flame, rolling across the ground, into my hand—

Fwoosh!

I thrust out my foot, feeling myself rise into the air.

At the end of that step stood the Arch Lich, writhing in agony as streams of tremendous mana poured from his body.

—What in the world! What magic have you used?!

The Arch Lich spotted me and shrieked in a frenzy.

His red eye-lights shook wildly, swelling larger and larger.

That alone told me how much pain he was in.

—Damn you! Damn you, human! Graaaaagh!

Instead of answering, I slowly raised White Flame.

[2017] In traditional East Asian medicine, meridians are pathways through which qi is understood to flow.

I aimed its transparent spearhead at the Arch Lich, whose limbs were trembling violently from the pain, and at the enormous Gate looming behind him.

Whoosh.

The fire dragon spread its wings and soared from my dantian, transforming into a ball of flame as it surged through every limb and bone in my body. It flowed along my fingertips, kindling blue flames atop White Flame's spearhead and layering them over and over.

—You cur! How dare you—

The Arch Lich flailed his arms and legs in a frenzy, but the magic he fired collided with the heat surrounding me like a barrier and vanished before it could even reach me.

Unlike the weakened Arch Lich, however, the darkness around the Gate churned with ever greater violence.

And at last, I realized.

Now!

White Flame trembled as rotational force traveled up through my leg, waist, shoulder, and wrist.

The unprecedented surge of qi drawn from my entire body kindled flames larger than ever before.

Yes.

This was the moment.

Fwoosh.

One step.

All the space separating the Arch Lich and me vanished, and time slowed.

Before the Arch Lich's slowly moving lips could finish the incantation, I launched a single strike filled with every ounce of my will and strength.

—Blink…!

One Annihilation.

There would be no second mistake.

The blue fire dragon bursting from White Flame's spearhead swallowed both the Arch Lich and the Gate.

Kwooooooooooong!

Chapter 426

Fwooooooosh!

The instant the Arch Lich faced the enormous fire dragon that burst from the spearhead, it realized the truth.

Too late.

There was no avoiding this attack.

The Spell it had not yet managed to unleash and the magical power that had been on the verge of completion scattered beneath the flames rushing straight toward it.

The fire dragon, blazing with hellfire, opened its jaws at the Arch Lich, which had frozen in place, oblivious even to the pain.

Kwooooooong!

Blue flames swept in every direction with a thunderous roar like that of a dragon. The terrible heat distorted space and vaporized everything in its path.

The Arch Lich felt the magical power and barriers surrounding it melt away. It even felt a sensation it had long since forgotten.

It's hot.

Fwoosh!

Blue hellfire filled the Arch Lich's vision. The fire dragon swept over its entire body and continued onward without stopping.

Straight toward the enormous black door towering over the center of the ruined city.

The Gate.

No!

The Arch Lich's red eye-lights flared wide as it stretched out a hand, but no voice emerged. The fire dragon swallowed the Gate, which was as large as itself, whole.

The moment the unprecedented mass of magical power gathered from the life force of hundreds of thousands of humans collided with the flames, a blinding flash erupted.

Fwoosh!

A pillar of light rose into the sky, bright enough to be seen from hundreds, perhaps thousands, of kilometers[2018] away.

Darkness and blue flames collided with one another, then soon blended together. The forest of buildings that had been struggling to remain standing bent at the waist, and a ring of wind burst outward.

Krrrrooooom—

[2018] One kilometer is about 0.62 miles; 100 kilometers is about 62 miles, and 1,000 kilometers is about 620 miles.

A roar and tremor beyond description shook the world.

The gray sky split apart, and the dense fog blanketing the entire city scattered like heat haze.

Then, as though everything that had just happened were a distant dream, silence descended.

Ah.

The Arch Lich gazed hollowly upon the world.

The scene looked no different from before, but it knew. Everything had changed, itself included.

Everything had collapsed like a sandcastle.

The Arch Lich slowly turned its head. Its trembling red eye-lights settled on the lone figure standing tall as an iron tower.

—"I should have killed you."

The single sentence broke the silence.

Jin Taekyung opened his mouth, his complexion utterly bloodless. The accumulated damage and mental exhaustion from his endless battles made him look as though he might collapse at any moment, but his voice alone had not lost its strength.

"Yeah. You should've killed me sooner."

The Arch Lich fell silent.

It had no one but itself to blame for missing its chance to end Jin Taekyung's life.

One brief lapse in vigilance had reduced everything to nothing.

My king. Please forgive this disloyal servant.

The Arch Lich begged forgiveness from its king, wherever he might be.

If it had killed Jin Taekyung without delay… If the monster that had sided with the human had not been reborn as a new being and driven that damned sword into its chest…

Everything would have gone according to plan.

It would have survived and completed the Gate. At the head of an unimaginably vast monster army, it would have hunted down those verminous humans, slaughtered them, and burned the city to the ground.

All while awaiting the great king's eventual return.

But the plan it had believed perfect had fallen apart spectacularly.

All because of a single human.

Jin Taekyung.

The Arch Lich's fading red eye-lights flared with the last of their strength.

A vow to itself and an oath of vengeance spilled toward Jin Taekyung.

—"Remember me. Remember this body, which will one day trample your souls beneath its bare feet."

Jin Taekyung spat out a wad of phlegm.

“Big talk from a bastard who’s about to croak. Go on. Say, ‘Asmodeus[2019] is a fucking son of a bitch.‘”

The Skeleton King hesitantly opened its mouth.

—“Asmodeus[2020] is a fucking son of a bitch…”

“…Not you.”

—“Ah, I know. I just wanted to try it once. But I cannot say that I feel good after uttering something so blasphemous.”

“What’s the problem? You’re a king now, too.”

—“Oh. That is true.”

I swear upon the River of Death that I will tear those two apart.

The Arch Lich stretched both hands toward Jin Taekyung and the Skeleton King.

Its skeletal hands clenched as if they would crush the two figures standing far away, but nothing happened.

Instead, a wind that had blown in from somewhere brushed against its entire body.

Whooooooosh.

It was collapse.

Beginning with its hands, which turned to ash and scattered, everything that made up the Arch Lich began to crumble.

Its arms. Its legs. Its chest.

And finally, even the skull housing its red eye-lights.

—“Please survive. Until the day we meet again…”

Its final voice, filled with resentment, vanished into the wind.

The wind grew stronger and swept onward, carrying the ashes of what had once been the Arch Lich.

Everything caught within the range of One Annihilation sank and crumbled wherever the wind passed. High-rise buildings, heaps of concrete, overturned cars, and corpses long since emptied of life…

Even the enormous, unfinished Gate that would have marked the beginning of an even greater war.

Fssshhh.

As Jin Taekyung silently watched it all, clear chimes rang in his ears—sounds that only he could hear.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

Countless System messages filled his vision. They were a victory salute announcing that everything was finally over.

[2019] Asmodeus is a demon king.

[2020] Asmodeus is a demon king.

But Jin Taekyung had already exhausted every last bit of his strength, and his body was tipping toward the ground.

I did it.

With that final thought, a deep and peaceful sleep overtook him.

The Skeleton King carefully caught Jin Taekyung as he fell and saw the faint smile on his lips.

—"…You worked hard."

Devious though he may be, he really is a pretty decent human.

Murmuring inwardly, the Skeleton King was about to carry Jin Taekyung somewhere safe and comfortable when it remembered something.

—"Ah, right. The sword."

Was it called Hero's Soul?

It did not know who had named it, but there was no doubt that the sword held a mysterious power.

That sword had awakened it from the brink of Erasure when it had still been the Skeleton Warlord. It was also thanks to the sword that it had managed to deal such a devastating blow to the terrifying Arch Lich.

—"I almost forgot. I need to make sure to keep it safe."

It did not take long to find. The sword that had remained embedded in its target's chest until the very end lay quietly where the Arch Lich had stood only moments ago.

But after picking up Hero's Soul, the Skeleton King tilted its head.

—"Huh? Something feels strange."

It was a peculiar sensation, difficult to explain.

It could not quite put its finger on it, but… how should it describe the feeling? The sword was undeniably a fine blade, yet it no longer possessed the same mysterious quality as before.

—"Did I pick up the wrong sword?"

But no matter how thoroughly the Skeleton King searched the area or examined the blade, nothing changed.

It scratched its golden skull and pondered the matter for a while before finally reaching a conclusion.

—"Hmm. I guess this is it."

It was probably just a fleeting impression. The sword looked exactly as it remembered, and it had seen the weapon fall from the Arch Lich's chest with its own eyes.

Then why does this feel so unsettling?

It made no sense at all.

The Skeleton King shook its head and slid the sword between its pelvic bones for safekeeping.

As it headed toward the unconscious Jin Taekyung, it remained unaware of what had happened the moment Jin Taekyung exhausted all his strength and lost consciousness.

Mist-like black energy had mingled with the wind scattering into the distance.

And the golden light dwelling within Hero's Soul had left the sword to pursue it.

But one being was different.

The black energy drifted away on the wind.

Reduced by Jin Taekyung to a tiny, powerless fragment of a soul, the Arch Lich stared wide-eyed at the dazzling golden light blocking its path.

This is impossible.

The words it had spoken to Jin Taekyung and the Skeleton King before losing its form had contained no trace of falsehood.

It would return in the near future. With even greater power and an even larger army of monsters, it would stain this land with blood.

Life Force Vessel.

The highest order of black magic available only to the undead—a vessel capable of preserving a fragment of the soul.

So long as it had that, the Arch Lich could escape eternal Erasure.

Or so it had believed, until that brilliant golden light barred its way.

—"You… What are you?"

The Arch Lich was now only a pitiful fragment of a soul, utterly insignificant compared to the power emanating from the light.

The black energy writhed violently with rage, confusion, and fear.

Yet even though the Arch Lich's thoughts reached it, the golden light did not respond. It merely shone brighter and swelled larger.

Then, in the next moment, the Arch Lich realized what the light truly was.

That is not magic. It is a soul.

The soul of someone it had once shattered and trampled beneath its feet. A fragment of a soul that had lost even its form, yet remained within the sword through sheer will alone.

Suddenly, the Arch Lich recalled a memory it had buried deep within its mind.

"How noble, human. What is your name?"

That day, when blood had formed rivers and corpses had formed mountains.

One human had remained standing until the very end in a city filled with nothing but destruction and death.

—"Lei Fei."

The Arch Lich—or rather, the black energy—stopped dead.

A dazzling golden light burst through the air and swept over it like a wave.

Fwooooooosh!

…Damn it.

That was the Arch Lich’s final thought.

The battle raged fiercely around the main force.

While the S-rank Hunters had moved toward the rear with part of the army to clear a path for the suicide squad, the tens of thousands of monsters had seized the opportunity and charged.

“Fire Rain!”

Kwaaang!

The mage units in the rear unleashed an area-wide spell, and a rain of fire poured from the sky.

Hundreds of monsters burned to death, reduced to charred lumps. The mages clenched their fists at the sight.

Then—

Whooooooosh! Thwack!

“…Huh?”

One of the mages wiped the blood from their face with a bewildered expression.

The face of the comrade who had been smiling at them only moments ago was gone.

No—it had burst apart.

A black spear had crossed the distance like a beam of light and struck them.

Whooooooosh! Boom!

Another spear flew in and skewered six or seven mages like meat on a spit.

Only then did the belated screams erupt.

“Aaaaargh!”

“Death Knights! They’re Death Knights!”

“Fuck, what the hell are you talking about? Didn’t we take care of all of them?”

“I-I don’t think so! It looks like they hid their elites separately among the others!”

Those words soon proved true.

Having clearly recognized the absence of the S-rank Hunters, the elite monsters revealed themselves, and an unstoppable slaughter began.

Slash!

Kwaaang!

Death Knights, Liches, and dozens of Wyverns that had remained out of sight appeared and launched a ferocious assault.

People died without end, and monsters surged forward without pause.

With even the S-rank Hunters away from their positions, deep despair settled over the faces of those risking their lives to hold the line.

It’s all over.

Then, just as everyone thought of death—

Shiiiiing!

A Death Knight’s sword stopped in the middle of cutting through someone.

No.

It crumbled into ash.

“W-What the hell…?”

The Hunter who had narrowly escaped death looked around and gaped.

The sight before him was unbelievable.

First, hundreds fell.

Then thousands crumbled.

Before long, monsters numbering in the tens of thousands were turning to ash and scattering.

Whooooooosh.

At long last, the war was over.

Chapter 427

It was a winter night in December, and snow was pouring down in thick flurries.

People hurried through the streets, trusting the forecast that had confidently predicted unusually clear weather. They were bewildered, and the Meteorological Agency was thrown into confusion.

“What the hell? What’s going on?”

“We’re analyzing it now. This definitely shouldn’t be happening.”

“Snow the size of hailstones is pouring down, and you’re telling me it shouldn’t be happening? Stop spouting nonsense and bring me the data. We have real-time observations, don’t we?”

“We’re checking them now, but… Ah, it looks like an abnormal phenomenon caused by a sudden surge in mana in China’s Sichuan region. The expected snowfall is no joke.”

“Sichuan? Damn it. Is that Arch Lich bastard controlling the weather now, too?”

After the Great Cataclysm, the Meteorological Agency had incorporated various forms of magic and begun issuing forecasts that bordered on prophecy.

An hour after hastily conducting another round of observations, the agency issued a heavy-snow advisory across the country. They predicted record-breaking snowfall, the worst in roughly thirty years.

But before long, the people hurrying home had no choice but to stop in their tracks.

A single sentence rang out from the massive screen at the heart of an ordinary commercial district.

“On a day like today, it is both my pleasure and my honor to bring you this news.”

An elderly East Asian man appeared on the screen.

Behind him sat the leaders of the nations on the United Nations Security Council. The Chairman of the People’s Republic of China addressed the countless microphones, his eyes red and his voice thick with emotion.

“The Arch Lich has been erased. We… have won.”

Victory.

That one word was enough.

For roughly a month—thirty-four days, to be exact—an unprecedented monster wave had raged without pause.

The news that the great war, which had spread unease throughout the world beyond Sichuan Province, had finally come to an end left people standing there with their mouths hanging open.

Then they erupted into thunderous cheers.

“Waaaaaaah!”

“Wait! Hold on! I couldn’t hear that. What did he just say?”

“…It’s over!”

“What?”

“The subtitles! Look at the subtitles!”

“‘The Arch Lich has been erased’… Oh, shit, it’s true! Waaaaaaah! I thought I was going to get called up for reserve duty[2021]!”

They heard neither Chairman Xiao Yang’s thirty-minute announcement nor the additional explanation given afterward by the spokesperson for the United Nations Security Council.

With the Arch Lich erased, its countless undead legions had lost their power and been annihilated as well. At last, the peace everyone had longed for had arrived.

“Mom, it’s me. Yeah. Did you see the news? You didn’t? Turn it on right now. Yeah, yeah!”

“We have to celebrate. Assistant Manager Kim, let’s go for a third round!”

“A third round? The server update is tomorrow. Manager Noh is going to lose his shit.”

“Manager Noh is coming too. He’s bringing the corporate card.”

“Ugh, I don’t want to see that bastard’s face. Fine. Let’s go.”

“Unity![2022] Yes, Battalion Commander. This is Captain Lee Junbeom. Could I extend my leave by just one more day—? No, sir. I’m sorry, sir.”

People who had been going back and forth outside while desperately ignoring their unease ran to the bars amid the cheers. Even those who had stayed home, anticipating a second Great Cataclysm, poured into the streets and joined the festive atmosphere.

The cheering did not die down even after midnight.

Nor the next day, or the day after that…

The entire world boiled like a cauldron over a charcoal brazier at the news of this monumental victory, and fresh articles appeared day after day in every language.

People even joked that the victory had generated more coverage than the heavy snow that fell across Korea for three straight days.

And… there was one name that appeared without fail in every one of those articles.

[The New York Times, United States: “A Great Victory, a New Hero.”]

[The Times, United Kingdom: “A New Star Rising in the East. Is He Close to Prince Felix?”]

[2021] South Korea requires many people who have completed military service to attend periodic reserve training. The speaker feared being called up during the crisis.

[2022] “Unity” translates dan-gyeol, a military salute used when addressing a superior.

[Asahi Shimbun, Japan: “Jin Taekyung Is Asia’s Pride. But Japan’s First-String Hunters Could Surpass Him!”]

[People’s Daily, China: “The Young Korean Knight-Errant Who Saved Countless People. And the Tragic Death of Zhonghua’s[2023] Genius, Wu Heixing.”]

[China Youth News: “Jin Taekyung Is a Descendant of Chen Lin, a Ming Dynasty General. The Blood of Zhonghua[2024] Unmistakably Flows Through Him, and He Will Surely Become a Chinese Citizen Before Long.”]

[Goryeo Daily, Korea: “Ares Guild Vice Guild Master, Hunter Lee Jungryong, Age 68. Presumed Dead…”]

[Daspatch[2025] Korea official: “We have devoted every effort to investigating Jin Taekyung for several months, but we could not uncover a single thing. His romantic history is astonishingly clean.” When a reporter asked whether that meant he had dated many women but parted with each of them amicably, the official cut him off: “No. I mean he’s never dated anyone in his life.”]

To the various media outlets, Jin Taekyung was nothing short of a Christmas present.

Every spotlight turned toward him, and all kinds of stories about him came pouring out.

The material was endless. Needless to say, there was plenty to cover about the monster wave now known as the “Winter War,” but his past actions on the way to his current position and even the most trivial details of his private life were considered newsworthy.

Even the trashy articles that would normally have been cursed out as gutter journalism attracted interest.

That was how much of the world’s attention had turned toward the new hero who had led them to this great victory.

But not all that attention was positive.

Information had begun leaking out bit by bit from behind the ironclad internal security, and people began raising questions.

[Four Days After the War. What Was Hidden Behind That Great Victory? The Questions Surrounding Jin Taekyung.]

[Lee Jungryong Presumed Dead. Wu Heixing’s Suspicious Death. The Deaths of Two S-Rank Hunters and the Rise of a New Hero.]

[Secret Testimony from Coalition Commanders Who Were at the Scene: “Considering the ferocity of the battle, Jin Taekyung’s body showed no significant injuries when he was discovered. We are investigating whether he used potions. Once he regains consciousness, the full circumstances will become clear.”]

[2023] Zhonghua is a patriotic term for China and Chinese civilization.

[2024] Zhonghua is a patriotic term for China and Chinese civilization.

[2025] Daspatch alludes to Dispatch, a South Korean entertainment-news outlet known for reporting on celebrities’ private lives.

Although they remained a tiny minority, conspiracy theories began surfacing, and fierce arguments erupted across the internet.

The trashy articles soon vanished beneath a barrage of malicious comments and reports, but they planted doubts in the minds of some members of the public. Eventually, everyone's attention settled on one thing.

Jin Taekyung.

When, exactly, would he show himself?

Beep. Beep.

State-of-the-art medical equipment emitted mechanical sounds.

The people gathered in one part of the hospital room, which only a select few were permitted to enter, gazed worriedly at Jin Taekyung as he lay there wearing an oxygen mask.

"How is Mr. Jin's condition?"

Choi Minwoo answered Chairman Xiao Yang's question.

"It's always the same. Everything is perfectly normal, but for some reason, he still hasn't regained consciousness."

"Did both of them say that?"

"Yes. They said they don't know the cause."

"Hmm. If both of them said so, there can be no doubt… Then why on earth hasn't he regained consciousness?"

Chairman Xiao Yang sighed.

The two people he had mentioned were at the very top of their respective fields of medicine.

One was a civilian physician known as the reincarnation of Hua Tuo,[2026] while the other was one of the world's foremost healers.

If the two of them, invited to serve as Jin Taekyung's temporary attending physicians, had reached the same conclusion, there could be no doubt.

"I heard his family is here."

"The Peace Guild is taking good care of them. Fortunately, they've regained their composure."

"I see. Would it be possible for me to meet them, even briefly?"

"I can ask, but their wishes are what matter most, so…"

"I understand. Who could feel otherwise when a blood relative has yet to regain consciousness? I would appreciate it if you simply considered this the foolishness of an old man."

[2026] Hua Tuo was an ancient Chinese physician celebrated for his medical skill.

“No, Chairman. We’re grateful that you even thought of it.”

“Don’t thank me. If not for Mr. Jin, an even greater catastrophe would have occurred. I may be an old man without many years left, but I will carry this gratitude with me to the grave.”

Chairman Xiao Yang was sincere.

Four days had passed since that day. During that time, an investigation team made up of countless experts from around the world had combed through the city that had served as the Arch Lich’s base and discovered traces of the Gate.

Based on the enormous amount of residual mana, the projected scale of that Gate was nothing short of catastrophic.

“If Mr. Jin had failed to stop the Arch Lich that day, not only our country but all of Asia would have become a battlefield. No… Perhaps the entire world could have become one.”

“It was certainly possible.”

It might have been a slight exaggeration, but most of it was true.

So Choi Minwoo did not bother denying it. He simply nodded.

The praise was not directed at him, so he had no reason to feel embarrassed. Nor did he see any reason to diminish the gratitude felt by the leader of a nation with a population of more than a billion.

A debt of gratitude had a way of returning as an even greater gift.

“But Chairman, I’ve been hearing some unfavorable rumors about Jin Taekyung lately… Were you aware of them?”

“Do you mean inside the country or outside it?”

“Inside. The leadership of the Communist Party—or, more precisely, the Crown Prince Party.[2027]”

Chairman Xiao Yang nodded.

“I am fully aware of the matter.”

It concerned Wu Heixing’s death.

The investigation team had found his body severely mutilated, and conspiracy theories about it were gradually spreading both inside and outside the country.

“There are people who suspect Mr. Jin. They point to the fact that he had a minor argument with Wu Heixing during their first meeting, as well as the fact that Mr. Jin had no notable injuries when he was first discovered.”

There were two negative theories about what had happened.

The first claimed that Jin Taekyung, who had long harbored ill feelings toward Wu Heixing, had killed him and disguised it as the Arch Lich’s work.

[2027] The Crown Prince Party refers to a faction of Chinese political elites associated with the descendants of senior Communist Party figures, not a royal party.

The second claimed that Jin Taekyung and Lee Jungryong, who was now presumed missing or dead, had used Wu Heixing as a shield and seized the opportunity to kill the Arch Lich.

Chairman Xiao Yang knew about these theories and had already reached his own conclusion.

The old statesman spoke to Choi Minwoo in a firm tone.

“They are nothing more than absurd slander and conspiracy theories.”

“Thank you for believing him, but…”

It was a good response, but it was not enough.

Choi Minwoo continued slowly.

“The leader of the Crown Prince Party[2028] doesn’t seem to share your view, Chairman.”

It was a conspiracy theory condemned even within China as an embarrassment to the nation. But to a father who had lost his son, it sounded entirely plausible.

Wu Heixing’s father was the head of the Crown Prince Party,[2029] which constituted half of the Chinese Communist Party.

A political giant comparable to the Chairman himself, he had begun spreading the rumors in earnest. He had even formed an independent investigation team to dig into the matter.

“If Mr. Jin regains consciousness, the truth will come to light anyway. But for a high-ranking politician to take the lead in spreading such an absurd conspiracy theory…”

Choi Minwoo let his voice trail off, and Chairman Xiao Yang smiled faintly.

He has no qualms at all.

No matter how great a feat he had accomplished, the young man before him had lived a very different life and stood in a very different position from his own.

Yet the young man before him was pressing his point without hesitation, carefully controlling his pace and tone as he did so.

Was that information true?

As Chairman Xiao Yang suddenly recalled Choi Minwoo’s personal information, he tapped the armrest of his chair.

“Very well. It seems my explanation was insufficient, so let me say it again.”

“I’m listening.”

“My comrades and I already know everything about the matter, and we have completed all the necessary preparations.”

“All the necessary preparations…?”

[2028] The Crown Prince Party refers to a faction of Chinese political elites associated with the descendants of senior Communist Party figures, not a royal party.

[2029] The Crown Prince Party refers to a faction of Chinese political elites associated with the descendants of senior Communist Party figures, not a royal party.

“Before he can appeal to anyone about his son’s death, he will be standing trial.”

The Arch Lich was not the only one brought down by this war.

Corruption and embezzlement involving astronomical sums had been exposed, and dealing with the fallout would force the Crown Prince Party[2030] to tear out its own foundations.

Only then did a faint smile appear on Choi Minwoo’s lips.

“Does that answer your question?”

“More than enough.”

That was all he needed from today’s conversation.

A short while later, after exchanging a few more words, Chairman Xiao Yang left the room. Now alone, Choi Minwoo suddenly spoke.

“That’s what he says.”

And then one person’s eyes snapped open.

“Oh, fuck. I thought I was going to die from how stifling this was.”

[2030]The Crown Prince Party refers to a faction of Chinese political elites associated with the descendants of senior Communist Party figures, not a royal party.

Chapter 428

I sat up and released the breath I'd been holding.

"God, I'm dying."

Pretending to be unconscious for four days took a considerable amount of patience.

Especially while hooked up to a whole array of state-of-the-art medical equipment.

Besides, it wasn't exactly a good time to return to Murim.

Even if I went back, I'd just be stuck aboard the swift ship, staring stupidly at the Yangtze.

I was better off wrapping things up properly in the modern world. As long as I had the System, time was on my side.

Crack. Crack.

As I rolled my stiff neck from side to side, Team Leader Choi let out a quiet laugh.

"If anyone had seen this on CCTV, there would've been quite an uproar."

"That's a terrible thing to say. If that had happened, I would've bitten my tongue and killed myself."

Fortunately, there were no CCTV cameras, so my tongue was safe.

Then again, I was wearing a brain-wave detector that alerted the medical staff the instant a patient regained consciousness. CCTV would've been redundant.

"I have to ask—how on earth did you fool that machine?"

I shrugged.

"Oh, the brain-wave detector? This isn't a machine."

"Excuse me?"

"Well, it is, but the thing actually powering it is a Magic Gem."

"Then did you use mana…? No, internal energy?"

"Yeah. I made it malfunction. A little adjustment like that wasn't difficult."

After opening my Middle Dantian this time, my control over my internal energy had improved tremendously.

If I couldn't even fool a few medical devices, I would've been so frustrated that I'd have gone to check the temperature of the Han River[2031].

"Anyway, what do you think will happen with the Wu Heixing situation? From what Grandpa Jongseok said, it sounds like he's made preparations."

"This must be the fiftieth time I've told you: he isn't Grandpa Jongseok. He's Chairman Xiao."

"What's wrong with Grandpa Jongseok? It sounds nice and friendly."

"…Sigh."

[2031] "Checking the temperature of the Han River" is a dark allusion to jumping into the river to die.

Shaking his head, Team Leader Choi picked up an apple from the fruit basket beside him.

He drew a dagger that looked expensive at a glance, peeled the apple with practiced ease, and held it out to me.

“I don’t think you need to worry about Wu Heixing. Public opinion is on our side, and Chairman Xiao seems to have been sharpening his blade.”

“Chairman Xiao? Honestly, he seemed a little soft to me.”

Crunch.

I bit into the firm apple, and sweet juice filled my mouth.

If Chairman Xiao Yang had been as hard as this apple, the Crown Prince Party wouldn’t have remained at the center of power for so long.

As if he had read my mind, Team Leader Choi said, “Did you know Chairman Xiao was once branded a reactionary and sentenced to five years of hard labor in a pig slaughterhouse?”

“That happened?”

“I heard the Crown Prince Party targeted him when he tried to push through political reforms after the Great Cataclysm. But look where he is now.”

That told me everything I needed to know.

Chairman Xiao had a personal grudge against the Crown Prince Party, and after enduring years of hardship, he had risen to the highest position in the country. In other words, he had an iron will.

“When the time comes, a blade sharpened for years has to be swung. To the Crown Prince Party, Chairman Xiao will be the most dangerous swordsman of all.”

“Then Wu Heixing’s father…”

“Considering his political standing and the public sympathy surrounding Wu Heixing, execution is unlikely. He’ll probably be sent to a political prison camp or a pig slaughterhouse. But given his age, he’ll spend the rest of his life there.”

First Wu Heixing, and now his father.

So this was how father and son met their end.

It wasn’t my imagination. The apple really did taste sweeter today.

I grinned and wiped the juice from the corner of my mouth.

“Lying here for four days was worth it.”

Team Leader Choi peeled a second apple and handed it to me.

“Your judgment was correct. If the press had learned that you woke up after only half a day, there would’ve been no avoiding suspicion.”

According to the news Team Leader Choi had given me, Lee Jungryong had not even left behind a body, and his death was considered certain by the public. Wu Heixing, who had died with his neck broken, had been caught in the aftermath of the battle and discovered as a gruesome corpse.

If I'd woken up perfectly fine after half a day under those circumstances, the press would've had a field day tearing me apart.

"When you first woke up, even I had trouble regaining my composure… Had you already anticipated all this before you dealt with those two?"

I answered while biting into the apple.

"I didn't think that far."

"What?"

"No, my body was tired and my head hurt, so I just told them not to announce it yet. If people found out I was awake, there'd be hell to pay inside and out."

"…"

"What?"

Team Leader Choi stared at me as though I'd betrayed him, then quietly looked away.

"…It's nothing."

"Come on, lose the wounded expression. The result is what matters."

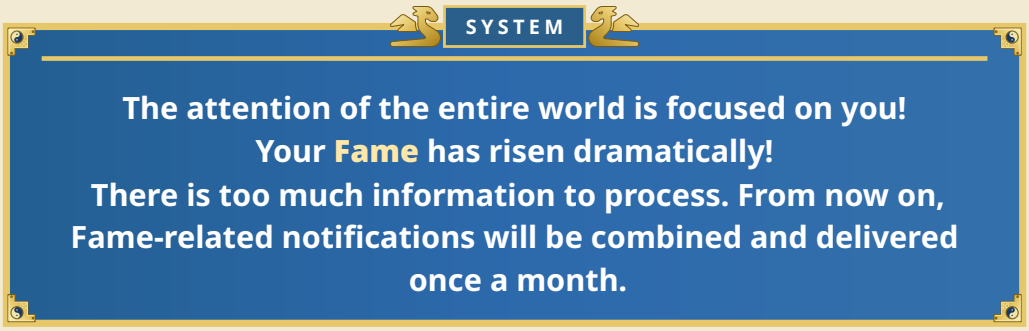
Just as I said, the result couldn't have turned out better for us.

Never mind Wu Heixing and the Crown Prince Party. We had legally eliminated our greatest obstacle, Lee Jungryong, and prevented an even greater catastrophe by defeating the Arch Lich.

The praise and adoration of people around the world were just a bonus.

I'd heard the notification about my Fame rising so many times that it was starting to drive me insane.

Like right now.



"…You should've done that from the start, you bastard."

The sigh slipped out before I could stop it, and Team Leader Choi tilted his head.

"Pardon?"

"Oh, it's nothing. More importantly, how's my family?"

My mother and Hayeon had arrived in China only a few hours earlier aboard a chartered plane sent under Chairman Xiao Yang's special orders. They had even been escorted by dozens of fighter jets, receiving treatment beyond that afforded to a state guest.

"You don't need to worry. Your mother is resting, and your younger sister…"

"You don't have to tell me about her. She'll be fine on her own."

"…Ah. Yes."

I couldn't bring myself to keep my condition secret from my family, so I'd had Team Leader Choi quietly tell them that I was completely unharmed and already awake.

Even so, I was worried about their first visit, which was coming up soon.

One or two smacks on the back won't settle this.

I'd rather fight several thousand monsters.

I'd left nothing but a single message in the family group chat saying I was going to China. Just imagining the fallout sent a chill down my spine.

"Team Leader Choi."

"Yes?"

"When my family comes to visit, you absolutely cannot go anywhere. Understood?"

"…?"

"Promise me you'll stay right beside me and protect me."

"Ah. All right."

And two hours later—

"You little brat! You little braaaat!"

"Mom!"

"M-Ma'am!"

Team Leader Choi stepped in front of my mother as she charged at me with a tearful roar unlike anything I had ever heard.

He became the first victim of her back-smacking assault.

"M-Ma'am, please calm down…"

"Move! Are you going to move or not?!"

Smack! Smack!

"Urgh! Gah!"

"Jin Taekyuuung!"

Then a kick from a fearless soon-to-be college freshman, freshly liberated from the college entrance exam, struck him squarely between the legs.

It was an unfortunate accident.

Wham!

"…Oh."

"…Ah."

Team Leader Choi, his eyes wide, muttered in a hollow voice.

“M-My special underwear… It doesn’t burn, it doesn’t get wet, and it even has a semipermanent cleaning spell…”

Goodbye, Team Leader Choi.

You should’ve enchanted it with reinforcement instead.

Thump. Thud.

I paid my respects to the modern-day knight-errant brought to his knees by pain, then resolutely prepared for the storm coming my way.

Open Inventory. Equip Fire Dragon Armor.

I felt the armor of the divine weapon gently envelop my chest, stomach, and back beneath my hospital gown, and closed my eyes.

At that exact moment, someone’s palm slammed into my cheek.

Smack!

Wait. A slap in the face wasn’t part of my calculations…

I regained consciousness after a week.

No, it was announced that I had regained consciousness.

After another week of complicated medical examinations and various loose ends, I held a brief press conference before a sea of microphones and cheering people.

“Mr. Jin, we have screened out the reporters most likely to cause trouble. Simply call on the reporters selected in advance and answer their questions.”

But contrary to Chairman Xiao’s assurances before the press conference, a few reporters hungry for a sweet scoop swarmed in like bees.

“Mr. Jin! We’ve heard that you and Wu Heixing, one of the casualties of this battle, were on bad terms. Is that true?”

The security guards moved to drag the foreign reporter away, but I stopped them with a gesture.

“I already told the investigators everything, but I’ll say it again. It’s all true.”

Flash! Flash!

Flashes several times brighter erupted, along with a burst of murmuring. A Chinese reporter’s lips twitched with a malicious smile as he asked another question.

“Why? What was the reason?”

“The little bastard was rude from the moment we met.”

“What exactly did he…?”

“He called me a peninsula bangzi[2032] and cursed me out. So I called him a chink bastard, and he tried to attack me after the meeting ended.”

[2032] Bangzi is a derogatory Chinese term for Koreans.

The smile vanished from the Chinese reporter's face.

"A chink? That's a slur against Chinese people!"

"Oh. Is it?"

I gave a vague nod, then gestured to the security guards.

"Get that chink bastard out of here."

"Let go of me! This is suppression of the press!"

"Suppress that bastard's mouth while you're at it. I'll talk to Chinese people, but I don't talk to chinks. He's exactly like that Wu Heixing bastard."

Right then, someone among the mass of reporters raised a hand and asked a question. This one was Chinese as well.

"Then did you continue to clash with Wu Heixing afterward?"

"I wouldn't call it a clash. I beat him to a jajinmori rhythm[2033] with the spirit of Korea behind every blow, and he quieted down. We got along well enough after that."

"Then…"

"Yes."

I continued solemnly.

"Wu Heixing was killed by the Arch Lich. There was nothing I could do, and I survived thanks to the top-grade potion he left behind. Once again, I offer my condolences for his death."

There. Condolences.

I had to say what needed saying and patch up what needed patching. No matter what crimes Wu Heixing had committed while he was alive or how rotten his character had been, admitting that I'd killed him would only hurt me down the road.

Besides, hardly anyone would believe that Lee Jungryong had lured Wu Heixing into conspiring with him.

People tended to turn away from inconvenient truths.

I imagined the disappearance of a hundred-terabyte USB containing all the treasures of humanity, and tears welled in my eyes.

"And… above all, I feel profound sorrow over the death of Hunter Lee Jungryong, a hero of the Great Cataclysm and the great Senior I respected more than anyone. He was truly a good man."

"Ah…"

The press-conference hall instantly grew solemn. I wiped away the tears rolling down my cheeks and delivered the line I had prepared.

[2033] Jajinmori is a fast rhythmic pattern used in traditional Korean music.

“Although our time together was brief, I will never forget him for as long as I live. I offer my condolences to everyone who died in this war. I’m sorry I couldn’t save even one more person.”

One sentence that brought the wave of criticism to an end.

Considering the gravity of the matter, the press conference was absurdly brief, lasting only around thirty minutes. It was broadcast worldwide by terrestrial and cable networks in numerous countries, as well as through an iTube livestream, drawing a combined live audience of three billion viewers.

Before I could even begin to feel the impact, I went to find someone.

Chapter 429

"Should we head there right away?"

As soon as the press conference ended, the acting Head of Security—no, Xiao Shen—came over and asked. I nodded.

"Let's do that. You know where he is, right?"

"Yes, I do. Then let's go."

Dozens of security officers led by Xiao Shen formed a circle around me and slowly began moving.

Chaos erupted around us at once. Reporters from various networks came swarming over with cameras and microphones in hand.

"Mr. Jin! Is it true that you're close to His Highness Prince Felix?"

"Jin-san! Jin-san!"[2034]

You're the real jinsang here, asshole.

The reporters from various countries hadn't been satisfied with the press conference and latched onto me, but they couldn't break through the Hunter security detail.

Though, of course, one man did manage to push close enough to keep shoving a microphone in my face.

"Mr. Jin Taekyung! We're both Korean, so please, just one interview…"

There was always someone like this wherever you went.

"Oh, sure. Since we're both Korean, please move aside."

I gave him a halfhearted answer and was about to walk past when his familiar face made me stop. I held Xiao Shen back as he moved to block the reporter.

"Wait. Are you with Daspatch?"

"…!"

"I thought so. You published an article about me, didn't you?"

"N-No, I didn't."

That confirms it. You son of a bitch.

I'd been wondering where I'd seen him before. He was the reporter who had posted an article about me having been single my entire life and called it an exclusive.

Ever since then, whenever I searched my name on a web portal, "Jin Taekyung single since birth" appeared as a related search.

"Shen."

Xiao Shen, who had been standing there bewildered because he couldn't understand our conversation in Korean, bowed his head.

[2034] The Japanese address Jin-san sounds like the Korean word jinsang, meaning an obnoxious nuisance.

"Yes, hyung."[2035]

"Crack down on him."

"Yes, sir."

Xiao Shen answered energetically and grabbed the Daspatch reporter by the wrist.

"Sir, I will enforce balance."

"W-Wait!"

It was already too late. The reporter went airborne under Xiao Shen's tremendous strength and dropped into the crowd. Several cameras shattered, and curses in languages from around the world poured down like hail.

I exclaimed in admiration at the feast of profanity spanning five oceans and six continents.

"So this is the global village."

"Huh?"

"Nothing. Let's keep going."

The public-security officers who had been waiting nearby rushed over to join us, clearing a path.

Under the crowd's watchful eyes and the protection of an impenetrable escort, I headed for my destination.

A short while later, I met him in a suite at the five-star hotel where the VVIPs were staying.

"Johnson."

"Oh, Jin. You're earlier than I expected."

Magic Johnson had been studying something with a grave expression, but he rose from his seat with a bright smile.

He clapped a thick hand on my shoulder, guided me to a seat, and asked, "So, did the press conference go well?"

Judging by the question, he probably hadn't watched the press conference himself.

I accepted the canned beer Johnson handed me and answered,

"It was all right. I gave them some reasonable answers and wrapped it up in thirty minutes."

"Ha-ha. I doubt the reporters were very happy."

"They probably like me a lot more than they like you. At least I held a press conference."

As soon as the war ended, Magic Johnson had shut himself away in his accommodations and refused to show himself.

Unlike Faye Chen or Prince Felix, the other S-rank Hunters, he hadn't appeared anywhere. Some people had even begun spreading rumors that he was dead.

[2035] Hyung is a Korean term a younger man uses to address an older man with whom he is close.

Only after things reached that point did he post a brief comment on his official social-media account. That was the full extent of his public activity.

> I am researching something new.
> It is as mysterious and magnificent as the victory we achieved this time.

Most people had probably nodded and moved on without understanding what he meant, but I was one of the few who knew what that “something new” was.

“So? How did it turn out?”

The corners of Magic Johnson’s mouth twitched.

“Who knows?”

“Oh, so it was a success.”

“I didn’t say anything.”

“You’re doing a terrible job of hiding that you’re holding back a laugh.”

“I’m not. Not at all.”

Yeah, right.

His eyes were shining with anticipation. I let out a quiet laugh.

“I heard you weren’t happy about it at first.”

“You didn’t come to see me then. Did Choi tell you that?”

“Who else could have told me? At the moment, this secret is known by only three people: me, Johnson, and Team Leader Choi.”

“Ah. But Choi got one thing wrong.”

“What?”

“I didn’t refuse at first.”

Magic Johnson drained his five-hundred-milliliter[2036] can of beer in one gulp, then continued gravely.

“I was about to fire off a spell.”

“Ah.”

“I’m not joking. Put yourself in my position. You probably would’ve blown the whole suite apart.”

“If it had been me, I would’ve demolished the hotel.”

The only reason the suite—and the hotel—remained intact was that Magic Johnson was a Grand Mage.

Humans were said to be creatures of curiosity, but mages were curiosity incarnate. That went without saying for a Grand Mage who stood at the pinnacle of magic.

And when presented with an offer involving a “new thing” he had never seen before, he readily accepted it.

[2036] Five hundred milliliters is about 16.9 US fl oz.

“Even after Choi explained everything and I saw it with my own eyes, I couldn’t believe it. This is truly…”

Magic Johnson murmured with a dreamy look in his eyes, then suddenly shook his head.

“No. This won’t do. Come and see for yourself.”

“Good. I nearly died of old age waiting.”

I set down my half-empty beer and rose. Without hesitation, I crossed the spacious suite and stopped in front of one particular spot.

“It’s here, right?”

Magic Johnson nodded. It wasn’t particularly surprising that an S-rank Hunter sensitive to the flow of energy could sense that something was off.

“That’s right. You really know your stuff.”

“Even someone fairly observant would have a hard time noticing this.”

To the naked eye, it looked like an ordinary section of the room.

But I had known from the moment I stepped into the suite.

It was magic that blocked every sound and sight.

“Wait a moment. I’ll dispel the magic right aw—”

Whoosh! Slash!

Magic Johnson’s eyes widened before he could finish speaking.

The edge of my hand, wrapped in Force, swept down through empty air, and the various spells he had laid out split apart cleanly.

“Jin. What on earth…?”

During my battle with the Arch Lich, I had opened my Middle Dantian and gained the ability to see the texture of qi.

That had made things like this possible, but I offered no explanation. I simply stared straight ahead.

As the magic was dispelled, a single layer peeled away from the space before me.

Beyond it stood a man.

“Ah, eh, ee, oh, oo. Hellow. Nishe to meet you. I like rice-soup freaks. I wuv kimchi.”

The blond foreigner had been standing in front of a full-length mirror, holding something as he practiced Korean with awkward pronunciation. He spotted my reflection and turned around.

A hint of laughter crossed his pretty-boy face.

“At last, you have arrived, vile human.”

Look at this bastard pronouncing only that perfectly.

For a moment, I considered hitting him. Instead, I let out a quiet laugh.

“You’ve gotten better-looking since I last saw you.”

The blond foreigner—the Skeleton King—replied smugly.

"You have become even uglier since I last saw you."

"…"

"Ugly as hell."

"…No, you son of a bitch."

Where the hell had this bastard learned Korean?

"Hmm. Beautiful, as expected. Nothing about him looks out of place."

Magic Johnson kept smiling in satisfaction like a plastic surgeon in Gangnam.[2037]

"Even after seeing him again, I have to say he's an unprecedented masterpiece. I may be the first mage in human history to carve a Magic Formation into a Skeleton's bones—and not merely a Skeleton, but an entirely new Named Monster."

This wasn't just a surgeon praising his own handiwork. It was true.

Glossy blond hair. Mysteriously gleaming golden eyes. A well-balanced build nearly 190 centimeters[2038] tall, with long limbs bearing just the right amount of body hair.

And that wasn't all.

His muscles and veins stood out clearly, and his body responded naturally whenever he breathed or swallowed.

Even I had to study him closely to notice anything unusual. The Skeleton King looked completely human.

"…Wow. It actually worked."

I'd made the request thinking I had nothing to lose, but I hadn't expected the result to be this perfect.

I swallowed hard in amazement and reached out to touch his blond hair.

That was when—

Swish.

The Skeleton King took one step back and looked at me arrogantly.

"Take your filthy hand away. You will damage my hair."

"…"

"Will you take responsibility if I go bald?"

This bastard really is human now…

I was too dumbfounded to speak.

[2037] Gangnam is a district of Seoul known for its concentration of cosmetic-surgery clinics.

[2038] 190 centimeters is about 6 ft 3 in.

Ignoring me, the Skeleton King admired his reflection in the full-length mirror and smiled in satisfaction.

“Hmm. Insanely handsome.”

“I’ve been wondering this for a while. Where did you learn expressions like that?”

“On the Internet.”

“The Internet?”

“Indeed. I spent a whole week browsing the shit out of it.”

“Wait. Do you have a phone, too?”

“That kind human over there bought me one. Thank you, Johnson.”

Magic Johnson, who was using a translation spell, nodded with a pleased smile.

“I wish you every success in your new beginning, Mr. King.”

“Thank you, Johnson.”

Thank you, Johnson, my ass. When did he learn basic English, too?

I immediately rounded on Magic Johnson.

“Wait. You even bought him a phone?”

“Hey, Jin. What’s the problem? My youngest daughter is five, and even she uses a smartphone.”

“That’s your youngest daughter. He’s the Skeleton King.”

“Hold on, vile human. I apologize for interrupting your conversation, but this must be said.”

The Skeleton King cut in with a grave expression.

“From now on, you will call me Stone-King.”

“What is this, another thing that’ll get you pelted with stones?”

“It is my new name. Stone King. Born in Atlanta, Georgia, United States…”

I muttered as I felt a headache coming on.

“Should I just kill him? I’m seriously about to.”

“Would you kill a citizen of the United States?”

“Who’s an American citizen, you lunatic?”

“Perhaps not right now, but I can soon obtain United States citizenship.”

“You should write a web novel for KakaoPage[2039] instead. What kind of idiot comes up with that bullshit?”

Magic Johnson shyly raised one hand.

“Jin, with my connections, it should be entirely poss—”

“Ah! Aah! Aaaaah!”

This was driving me insane.

I clutched my throbbing forehead and turned to Magic Johnson.

“Johnson.”

[2039] KakaoPage is a Korean digital platform that publishes web fiction.

"Hmm?"

"What I asked through Team Leader Choi was for you to make him look human. That was all."

"Of course. That was your request. But I heard our friend here desperately wanted this."

All of this had begun shortly after I first regained consciousness, at the Skeleton King's insistence.

He had loudly complained about how long he was expected to remain trapped inside the cramped Inventory.

His position was that he deserved an appropriate reward in light of his major contributions during the battle. From Team Leader Choi's perspective and mine, that was a perfectly reasonable demand.

He protected Team Leader Choi and Xiao Shen during the battle with Lei Fei, and we managed to defeat the Arch Lich thanks to him.

I had already been thinking about how to repay the Skeleton King.

Besides, giving him human form would make many things easier.

He would no longer need to hide, and he could sign a contract with the Peace Guild so that both sides could benefit.

But…

"For starters, this isn't the East Asian appearance I asked for. There may be a lot more foreigners in Korea these days, but he'll still stand out. Especially looking like this."

Before Magic Johnson could answer, the Skeleton King cut in stiffly.

"I asked him to change it."

"What? Why?"

"I saw it on the Internet. Handsome white men do well everywhere in the world."

"…And what exactly are you planning to do with that?"

"I wish to date."

"Oh, God."

Magic Johnson patted my shoulder as I groaned.

"It's all right, Jin."

"What do you mean, it's all right? Do you have any idea how terrifying social media is these days? What if netizens dig up his identity and discover that he wasn't born in Atlanta, Georgia, United States, but is actually a native of the Demon Realm? Does that make any sense? Why did you agree to a request like that?"

"I wanted to try making a face that suited my tastes."

"What?"

"That face is my ideal type."

Oh, for fuck's sake…

I was still at a loss for words when the final blow snapped what remained of my patience.

"Do you feel wronged? Ugly as hell."

"You son of a bitch!"

Crack!

I launched myself forward and drove my fist into the crown of his head.

The Skeleton King let out a strangled groan. He may have bitten his tongue, because bright red blood spurted from the corner of his mouth.

Red blood? Is that part of the illusion magic too? He really did an incredible job recreating—

No, that wasn't the point.

"Die! Die!"

"Ghk! Guhk!"

The moment two burly men started rolling around, the suite became a disaster zone.

A desk caught in the chaos collapsed with a splintering crack, and the stack of documents Magic Johnson had been examining came cascading down over my face.

"W-Wait! Vile human! I cannot see!"

"I'm going to teach you some manners today…!"

Then, in the next instant, I froze.

Among the sheets of paper obscuring my vision, I saw a set of strange yet familiar symbols.

This is…

I left the Skeleton King where he was and rose from my seat, dazedly picking up a sheet of paper printed with the symbols.

Sichuan.

There was no mistake.

It was the exact pattern I had seen in Sichuan—not the modern Chinese province, but Sichuan in Murim.

Chapter 430

My eyelids began to tremble before I even realized it.

Why is this here…?

I remembered it clearly.

Immediately after the Sichuan Blood Tragedy—after the Western Heaven Demon Lord had nearly killed me several times—I had followed the Sect Leaders of the Qingcheng and Emei Sects to a cave in an unnamed cliff.

The space hidden behind the Mystic Gate Formation had been vast, with an enormous formation carved into its center.

The same formation filled with strange patterns and symbols that was now printed in color on the paper in my hand.

But… could the thing the Sect Leaders of Qingcheng and Emei had named the Moving Formation even be called a formation anymore?

I hurriedly thrust the paper toward Magic Johnson.

“Johnson. This—what is this?”

“Huh? What?”

“Why is this here…? No, where the hell did you get it?”

Taken aback by my sudden reaction, Magic Johnson answered with a bewildered expression.

“It’s a magic circle discovered in the city the Arch Lich used as its base.”

“A magic circle?”

“Yes, a magic circle. I was already in the middle of researching it… What’s wrong, Jin? Have you seen it somewhere before?”

“Are there more?”

“Of course. Every sheet of paper I was looking at before you came in is related to it.”

“What?”

Then everything piled on the desk had been related to it?

I looked at the dozens of sheets of paper scattered across the floor.

“Excuse me for a moment.”

“Jin? Jin?”

“Has he finally gone mad? How tragic, you vile and ugly human.”

I ignored Magic Johnson’s flustered calls and the Skeleton King’s nonsense.

My lips pressed firmly together, I rapidly skimmed through the stack of printouts.

Each sheet bore a different set of patterns and symbols. By the time I had examined them all, I had realized one thing.

This is…

There was no mistake. The strange patterns and symbols were identical to the ones I had seen in Murim, only arranged and oriented differently.

And if I assembled all these sheets like pieces of a puzzle, they would form one enormous magic circle.

What the hell is going on?

I felt as though someone had smashed me in the back of the head with a sledgehammer.

I stared silently at the papers for a long time before finally speaking.

“You said this was discovered at the Arch Lich’s base, right?”

Magic Johnson had a cigar between his lips by then. He blew out a cloud of smoke before answering.

“That’s right. I didn’t know anything like this existed at first, but apparently it was discovered shortly after the investigation team went in. The coalition forces sent it to me on the second day.”

“They sent it to you?”

“They wanted my opinion. They couldn’t figure out exactly what the magic circle did, either. They probably contacted the other two as well.”

The other two were probably the Grand Mages besides Magic Johnson. They were the greatest mages alive and true experts in the field.

Which meant this magic circle was something entirely new—something that had never been seen before.

“So, has your research turned up anything?”

“Nothing conclusive yet, but I have a general idea of the magic circle’s purpose.”

“Its purpose?”

“Yes. Fortunately, I have a friend who knows quite a bit about that sort of thing.”

I was just about to ask who he meant when an arrogant voice cut in.

“That would be this very body. The universe’s most insanely handsome man, born in Atlanta, Georgia, United States. Known as Stone-King.”

Right. How had I forgotten about this bastard?

He was a native of the Demon Realm and a Named Monster to boot, so he was bound to know something.

I pressed the Skeleton King for answers as he continued spouting nonsense.

“Cut the bullshit and tell me what you know.”

“Call me Mr. King from now on, and I shall consider it.”

“Mr. King, my ass. You kumquat-looking bastard.”

“Fucking Korean.”

“You son of a bitch.”

“Whoa, whoa!”

When I raised my hand, the Skeleton King instinctively scurried backward and shouted in alarm.

"All right! I said all right!"

"Talk, asshole."

The Skeleton King regarded me warily before speaking.

"It appears to be a magic circle for absorbing life force."

"Absorbing life force?"

"Indeed. It seems the Arch Lich used it to absorb other humans' energy and amass power. With all that magical power at its disposal, it could control countless legions of monsters and open Gates."

China was a vast continent.

Even after suffering staggering casualties during the Great Cataclysm, it was still home to one-fifth of the world's population.

And approximately eighty million people lived in Sichuan Province alone—according to the official statistics, at least.

The monster wave had caused millions of casualties. Add those who had yet to be officially counted, and the number would rise to truly staggering proportions.

And a great many of them must have been sacrificed to provide magical power. Considering the scale of what that bastard did, it all adds up.

I bit down hard on my lip and asked the Skeleton King again.

"Are you sure?"

"It is merely my personal inference. I cannot guarantee it."

"Why not?"

The Skeleton King clicked his tongue.

"Vile human. Can you determine the meaning of magic circles used by other humans simply by looking at them?"

"That's…"

"Of course you cannot. This body is no different. I can raise and command soldiers according to the abilities granted to me, but I cannot wield dark magic like this."

Damn it. He was completely right.

Just as Hunters and monsters were classified according to their respective traits, the Skeleton King only possessed the abilities specific to him.

His answer wasn't what I had hoped for, and I could feel the strength draining out of me. But one important question remained.

"Then how did you guess that it was a life-force absorption magic circle? Can only monsters recognize patterns and symbols like these?"

If the Skeleton King understood these strange patterns and symbols—if he could teach me what they meant—I might finally be able to identify the formation I had seen in Murim.

I looked at him expectantly, only for his answer to dash my hopes a moment later.

"I do not know what those things mean. I could guess what the magic circle was for only because I'm undead."

The Skeleton King pointed at Magic Johnson and continued.

"When I first saw it on paper, I could not tell what it was. But when I visited the site with that human I'm grateful to, I sensed it clearly. The stench of countless deaths hung over the place—more deaths than even I could begin to estimate. That was when I realized what it was."

"Oh…"

I could not hide my disappointment.

If neither Magic Johnson, a Grand Mage, nor the Skeleton King, a Named Monster, could understand them, then deciphering those patterns and symbols anytime soon would be practically impossible.

Damn it.

What the hell was going on?

The formation carved into the center of the cave. The patterns and symbols that had appeared in the magic circle discovered this time. The bizarre phenomena I had witnessed during my battle with the Blood Lord and the Western Heaven Demon Lord…

I desperately tried to deny the ominous thought that flashed through my mind.

That can't be. It's impossible.

Was this a coincidence? Or was it fate?

And if it was fate, what did this connection that had appeared out of nowhere mean?

After pacing silently around the suite for a long time, I abruptly spoke.

"I need to see it for myself."

"Huh?"

"Hmm?"

"Johnson. I can visit the site that bastard went to, right?"

Magic Johnson thought for a moment, then nodded.

"It's classified, but you should be able to get in, Jin. However, only the two of us can be seen. We'll have to carry our friend in an extradimensional pocket, just like last time."

"That's fine. Let's leave right away."

"All right, let's do that. You seem to know something too, Jin."

Just as Magic Johnson and I were about to leave, the Skeleton King cut in with a dignified voice.

"I apologize for interrupting, humans, but this body has pressing business. You two may go without me."

"…?"

"…?"

"The woman at the hotel's front desk is exceptionally beautiful. Though concealed beneath human skin, the curves of the skeleton within are exquisite."

I quietly asked,

"So?"

"What do you mean, 'so'? I am informing you that I shall be spending the night out. Now, I must go arrange a date with the beauty… But, vile human."

"What?"

"May I ask why you suddenly took out a spear?"

"Ah, this?"

I casually waved White Flame, which I had somehow already drawn from my Inventory.

"It's nothing. I was going to stab you when you turned around."

"I see."

"Exactly."

"…"

"Why aren't you leaving? The employees will be getting off work soon. You should hurry over and ask her to dinner."

The Skeleton King hesitated, an awkward smile tugging at his lips.

"Now that I think about it, I suppose I can take my time trying to win her over."

"Wow, then you've got some free time. In that case…"

I smiled brightly and pulled out one of the extradimensional pockets I had acquired to conceal the existence of my Inventory from other people.

"Get in, asshole."

"…Okay."

The Skeleton King answered dejectedly and slipped inside the extradimensional pocket.

The moment I saw the magic circle with my own eyes, I understood what the Skeleton King had meant.

Or perhaps it only seemed that way because I had heard his explanation immediately beforehand.

Either way, the sight overwhelmed me, and a single word rose unbidden to my mind.

Death.

The enormous dark magic circle dwarfed the one I had seen in the cave.

Although its magical power had been cut off and it had lost its original function, even the traces of death left behind by the countless lives it had once claimed had not disappeared.

And… that was all I could sense.

“Jin. What do you think? Do you have any idea what it is?”

“No. None at all.”

The patterns and symbols, arranged in an incomprehensible order, remained impossible to decipher.

Just as it had in Murim, the System remained silent. After wandering around the site for hours without learning anything, I had no choice but to turn back.

“Mr. Johnson, Jin. We’ve prepared an escort to ensure you encounter no inconvenience on your way back…”

“We’re fine.”

“Yes, sir. Then I hope we meet again.”

We left the head of security and his guards behind after they snapped off razor-sharp salutes.

Once he had made sure no one was nearby, Magic Johnson quietly moved his lips.

“Jin. You knew something, didn’t you?”

“…A dream. I think I saw something similar in a dream.”

“Hmm.”

“Johnson. Can I look around by myself for a while?”

“Of course. How long do you think you’ll be?”

“I’ll be back soon.”

I began walking slowly through the ruins.

Although it was well past midnight, the city was as bright as noon, and countless people and machines were working to clear the wreckage.

The same work was probably underway in every city caught up in the war.

It must be the same in Sichuan.

China’s Sichuan and Murim’s Sichuan belonged to entirely different worlds. Murim was not the modern world’s past, nor was the modern world Murim’s future.

But now a connection had appeared between those utterly different worlds—and it was not the first.

The capsule.

Everything surrounding me had begun with the junk capsule I had picked up at a recycling center.

How? Why? For what reason?

More questions crowded my mind with every step, leaving my thoughts in complete disarray.

"Phew."

At my deep sigh, the Skeleton King—whom I had quietly moved from the extradimensional pocket into my Inventory—asked,

"Are you all right, vile human?"

"Are you worried about me now?"

"No. If you are all right, let us hurry back to the hotel. Johnson told me a few days ago that there is a club nearby with a great crowd."

"…"

Give me back my touching moment, you lunatic.

I considered telling him that the club Johnson had mentioned was a gay bar, but held my tongue.

"Forget it. What did I expect from you?"

"So, when are we going back?"

"I'm going, asshole. I said I'm going!"

At that exact moment—

"Where are you so desperate to go? Hell?"

At the sound of the voice—harder and colder than ever before—I slowly turned around.

Without realizing it, I must have ventured deep into the ruins. Beyond the relatively dark ruins, a familiar figure was making his way through a collapsed building toward me.

"Hell is where your old man went. If I die, I'm going to heaven."

The eyes of Go Jun—Lee Jungryong's Disciple and Head of Security—turned ice-cold.

Chapter 431

“Vile human. Who is that human?”

So there is one. A human with no sense of fear.

I muttered to myself and slowly looked around.

The desolate outskirts were far from the center, abandoned by everyone. Even the light illuminating the city as brightly as day had yet to reach this place.

And from among the ruins, a single person came walking out, casting a shadow.

“We must be bound by fate somehow. We keep running into each other.”

Go Jun answered my greeting in a cold voice.

“Not fate. An ill-fated bond.”

“Then what do you call meeting in a place like this? Coincidence?”

His answer was as sharp as a blade.

“Inevitability.”

“Clear enough. So have you been following me around like a stray dog since earlier?”

“When did you notice?”

“Since the Stone Age, you bastard. You stared at me so much that I thought you were going to bore holes in my face.”

I had sensed someone secretly watching me as soon as I left the Magic Formation site.

It was an unpleasant, clinging gaze, completely different from the curiosity and admiration everyone else directed at me.

And under the current circumstances, very few people would be openly hostile toward me.

“It was either you or those Crown Prince Party Chinese bastards. But they’re too busy cleaning up the shit they left everywhere… So the answer was obvious, wasn’t it?”

The words had clearly hit the mark, but Go Jun showed no surprise whatsoever.

“As expected. So you did notice.”

“As expected?”

“I thought you would. Otherwise, you wouldn’t have left Magic Johnson behind and come all the way out here alone.”

Well, look at this bastard.

Only then did I understand why Go Jun wasn’t surprised. He had deliberately sent me a signal—a signal to follow him.

This wasn’t surveillance or a lure. This was exactly the situation both Go Jun and I had wanted.

Of course, the outcome would be nothing like what he expected.

“There’s something I want to ask.”

Go Jun didn’t wait for an answer. He stared straight at me and continued.

“Was it you?”

It was a short, simple question, but the meaning behind it was unmistakable. I tilted my head and innocently asked,

“What was?”

“You know.”

“You don’t actually think I killed Uncle Jungryong, do you?”

The moment he heard Lee Jungryong’s name, Go Jun’s eyes shook violently. Without waiting for his answer, I covered my mouth with both hands.

“My God. How could you think something so horrible? Are you serious?”

“Enough of that disgusting act. Do you think I’m asking because I don’t know?”

“Then why ask? Didn’t you watch the press conference?”

“I did. You spouted nothing but lies and bullshit from beginning to end.”

Drip. Drip.

Drops of blood fell from the fist he had clenched so tightly that it had turned white. Go Jun glared at me with eyes burning with rage.

“There are only two people here—you and me. Tell me the truth with your own lips.”

“Vile human! How dare you leave out this Atlanta-born Stone King!”

That made one more monster present.

More precisely, there were two people and one monster. Though I wasn’t sure whether the Skeleton King could still be called a monster.

“Hmm.”

I scratched the back of my head as I studied Go Jun, then said,

“That’s right. I killed him.”

“…!”

“Lee Jungryong and Wu Heixing. I took care of both of them. Those lunatics had cooked up a ridiculous scenario. They planned to kill me without laying a finger on the Arch Lich. And the result… Well, you know how that turned out.”

Suspecting the truth and hearing it confirmed were two entirely different things.

Even if he had already guessed what happened, hearing the answer directly from his enemy’s mouth was another matter altogether.

I drove the final nail into the coffin for Go Jun, whose body was trembling violently.

“What else was I supposed to do with bastards like that? I bought them both tickets to the United States. Uncle Jungryong even got first class.”

“You… You dared do that to him…!”

Whoosh!

Killing intent erupted from Go Jun’s entire body, freezing the air around us.

I stared at the fingers twitching toward his sword hilt, then spoke abruptly.

“What are you doing?”

“…!”

Go Jun’s eyes flew wide open. At the same time, the killing intent swirling around us vanished without a trace.

No—it had been crushed beneath the wave of qi pouring from me.

The balance of power shifted in an instant, and I slowly stepped forward.

“You’ve improved by leaps and bounds since the last time I saw you. If you think about it, you’re far better than Wu Heixing. Just what I’d expect from the Disciple Lee Jungryong trained at his side.”

Step.

“But…”

Step.

With each step I took, Go Jun’s face grew paler.

The gap between our powers was overwhelming. A rabbit could not defeat a tiger. The moment he made even the slightest movement to draw his sword, my teeth would sink into his neck.

“You should check where you’re lying down before you stretch out your legs. Why would you settle into your own grave?”

Bang!

Compressed air exploded from the tip of the finger I had raised leisurely.

With a sharp crack, a stream of Finger Qi shot toward Go Jun, who stood frozen like a stone statue. Then—

Clang!

It sent the sword strapped to his waist flying far into the distance.

Go Jun’s rigid expression twisted, his eyes still wide. I let out a short laugh.

“What? Did you think I was going to kill you?”

“…Why?”

“If you want to die that badly, be more discreet next time—and come prepared to actually die. Don’t set some half-assed trap like you did today.”

My hand shot out like lightning. Go Jun had no time to react.

Bang!

The three streams of Finger Qi I fired pierced somewhere beyond the thick darkness. A moment later—

Thud-thud-thud!

Three unconscious figures in black dropped out of thin air in the distance.

They were all high-level Hunters trained in stealth and concealed by various kinds of magic, but none of them could escape my Qi Sense, which had grown even sharper after the opening of my Middle Dantian.

“What, were you filming me on the sly? You fucking hidden-camera creep.”

Tap. Tap.

Clicking my tongue, I tapped Go Jun on the cheek. A voice full of spite slipped between his clenched teeth.

“Do you think you people will get away with this?”

“You people?”

“We—the Ares Guild—will not fall. We will definitely avenge that person’s death…”

Smack!

A tooth flew out in a spray of blood. I seized Go Jun by the collar and slapped him again.

Smack!

Once more.

Smack!

And again.

Smack!

Inner-Family Heavy Hand.

Instead of tearing through his bones and flesh, the internal energy carried in my palm burrowed into Go Jun and rattled his brain.

He staggered like a drunk, unable to keep his balance. I grabbed him by the throat.

“Remember what I’m about to say. Remember it clearly.”

“Ghk…!”

A bloody foam burst out with his groan and splattered across my face. An unfamiliar man was reflected in his unfocused eyes, his expression numb as he continued speaking.

“You started this, but I’ll be the one to finish it.”

In the end, the modern world was also ruled by the logic of power.

Hunters possessed superhuman abilities, while others wielded equivalent authority. They made rules to suit themselves and broke them whenever they pleased. No matter what they did, no one ever showed them a yellow card or a red card.

When Lee Jungryong cut off Uncle Kkeokjeong’s arm to keep him in check, people like them had considered it only natural.

But—

“You shouldn’t have done that.”

A new referee had stepped onto the field, so the rules had to change.

And the new rules were very simple.

I pressed Go Jun's Mute Acupoint and muttered,

"An eye for an eye. A tooth for a tooth."

I twisted both his arms and pulled with all my strength, as though wringing out laundry.

Crack-crack-crack!

With a sickening tear of flesh, both arms came free from his body.

An enormous amount of blood poured out, and the whites of his bulging eyes showed. A silent scream spilled from his mouth, its Mute Acupoint sealed.

"It's not over yet."

I shoved my fingers into the ragged stumps of his arms. The Scorching Yang Qi in my hand seared his flesh, inflicting even greater pain. I pinned down his writhing body and grabbed him by the ankles.

"This won't be enough for someone like you."

Crack!

My Strength could reduce even a thousand-geun[2040] boulder to powder. The bones in both his legs shattered at once, breaking into hundreds of fragments.

"…!"

His body thrashed soundlessly.

As Go Jun lost consciousness from the unimaginable pain, I poured internal energy into him.

Once the light returned to his fading eyes, I hammered my fist into his shattered legs.

Boom! Boom! Boom!

By the time I finally stopped punching, what lay sprawled across the ground was no longer a human being but a large lump of meat.

The faint breath leaking from his nose and mouth was the only proof that he remained alive.

The Skeleton King, who had watched everything from inside my Inventory, spoke in a trembling voice.

"Human."

I answered dryly.

"What?"

"N-No. It's just…"

His voice trailed off, but I already knew what he wanted to say.

"Yeah. It's cruel."

"…"

[2040] A thousand Korean geun is about 600 kg (1,320 lb).

"But it was necessary."

The helplessness of being unable to do anything. Pain so unbearable that death seemed a hundred—even a thousand—times preferable.

And the fear that I could do the same thing to them anytime I wanted.

I needed to plant all of that in my enemy's heart and carve it into his bones.

Of course, there was another option that would leave the fewest loose ends.

Death.

My fingertips twitched before I realized it.

With just a little more force—only a tiny bit—I could kill Go Jun.

It was the perfect opportunity to eliminate even the slightest possibility.

But…

The timing isn't right.

Doubts surrounding the truth never disappeared completely.

Conspiracy theories claimed that humanity had never landed on the moon, or that countless famous figures recorded as dead were actually still alive. This was no different.

If Lee Jungryong disappeared, followed by Wu Heixing and then Go Jun—and it came to light that I had "coincidentally" been here at exactly the right time—the rumors surrounding me would cease to be mere conspiracy theories.

So this was where I had to stop.

Now, after showing him the overwhelming gap between our powers and planting the fear of me deep inside him.

"I'll say this one last time."

"…!"

Go Jun's body flinched. In a voice lower and more emotionless than ever, I bit out every word.

"Let it end with Lee Jungryong alone."

My breath, hot as lava, brushed against him, and his prone body convulsed.

Like a rabbit feeling a tiger's teeth sink into its neck.

"Hide your teeth. Sheathe your claws. If you do that… nothing will happen."

If he had set out to kill, he should have been prepared to die.

Lee Jungryong had been my greatest enemy and obstacle. In the end, he had paid the price for what he had done.

What I was offering now was a chance to make peace.

No—a demand.

And Go Jun had only one choice left.

His head moved in the faintest nod.

I stared into his eyes, drenched in fear and dread, then pressed his Sleep Acupoint. After taking several high-grade potions from my Inventory, I poured them over his body.

Hissssss.

I watched his wounds rapidly heal, then suddenly turned my head.

“So… that’s more or less what happened.”

At that moment, a layer of space peeled away, revealing a huge Black man. Magic Johnson regarded me with a complicated expression before speaking.

“I think there’s a lot we need to talk about.”

“I was thinking the same thing.”

As we spoke, the Skeleton King muttered quietly.

“What about the club?”

That’s a gay bar, dumbass.

Chapter 432

Magic Johnson was a good man.

Whether on the battlefield or in civilian life, he was always the same.

No matter the situation, he remained cheerful and never lost his smile. He had shown particular kindness to Team Leader Choi and me, even secretly handling the matter of the Skeleton King for us.

But there was no trace of playfulness or laughter in the way Magic Johnson looked at me now.

He stared at me in silence, a jumble of emotions in his eyes, before suddenly speaking.

“How much of it is true?”

“All of it. From beginning to end. Everything you saw and heard.”

I put particular emphasis on the word everything. Magic Johnson wasn’t dense enough to miss what I meant.

“…So you knew from the beginning.”

“As you know, I’m pretty sensitive.”

“And you didn’t care?”

“I didn’t expect you to follow me. But then I thought this might not be such a bad thing.”

“I was curious. Part of me was worried, too. It was obvious you knew something about that mysterious pattern, and just as obvious that you were hiding it.”

Before we parted, when Magic Johnson had asked about the Magic Formation, I had made the excuse that I thought I had seen something similar in a dream.

Of course, I hadn’t expected him to believe me. It had been a roundabout way of telling him not to ask about it for now.

“So I followed you, just in case…”

Magic Johnson trailed off and surveyed the blood-soaked surroundings.

“Looks like I shouldn’t have bothered.”

Two S-rank Hunters—each practically the face of his own country—had died in this momentous incident. One of them had even been a comrade who had once fought alongside Magic Johnson on the same battlefield.

Some truths were uncomfortable to know.

For Magic Johnson, this must have been one of them.

“Do you regret it?”

“A little. Maybe I would’ve been better off not knowing.”

Magic Johnson let out a quiet sigh and looked me straight in the eye.

“Jin. Why are you telling me all this?”

"Who knows?"

"You were the only one who knew the truth. If you wanted to, you could have covered it up. The same goes for him."

I glanced at the unconscious Go Jun and shook my head.

"This wasn't something I could hide just by keeping quiet. No matter how much I denied it, that bastard would never have believed me. Lee Jungryong and Go Jun were both ticking time bombs—dangerous enough to threaten my people."

"Jin. You… were their enemy. You have been for a long time."

"Yes. If you can't eliminate an enemy, you have to make them so afraid of you that they'll never dare look your way again. A bomb with its detonator removed can't explode."

"Then what about me? Why did you tell me?"

"You already know. In a situation like this, there are only two kinds of people you can choose."

I continued slowly, enunciating each word.

"Enemies. Or friends."

"…!"

"I thought you would believe me, Johnson. Because you're my friend."

Magic Johnson let out a low groan and stared at me, countless emotions mingling in his eyes.

"Being friends doesn't mean believing everything the other person says, Jin."

"But you believed me. You didn't doubt me once during our entire conversation."

"…"

"Help me. Help me protect my people and build my strength."

For some time now, I had felt everything around me beginning to change.

In Murim, Dark Heaven had begun to stir. In the modern world, the Arch Lich—a Named Monster unlike any that had come before it—had slaughtered millions and brought catastrophe in its wake.

Then there were the mysterious patterns and symbols that had appeared in both worlds.

Or perhaps they were something that could be called dark magic.

Could all of this really be a coincidence?

Everything that happened in the world was connected by invisible links. If I didn't want it all to topple like a row of dominoes, I had to prepare.

And to do that, I desperately needed an ally.

"Johnson."

"…Damn it."

Magic Johnson remained silent for a moment before letting out a deep sigh.

"You know something?"

"…?"

"That day—if you hadn't asked me to teleport you straight into the monster army, I might have doubted you."

That one remark was as good as an agreement.

My face lit up, and Magic Johnson couldn't help but laugh.

"Damn it. It's too late to turn back now. First, let's clean this place up before the patrol arrives."

He waved a hand, and the blood splattered everywhere vanished without a trace.

After cleaning the area in an instant with Clean magic, Magic Johnson frowned at Go Jun's fallen body.

"He's the problem… I'd like to erase his memories entirely, but given the circumstances, that would be difficult. What a pain."

"Huh?"

My ears perked up.

I suddenly remembered how the Ares Guild's mages had used memory-manipulation magic on the Myeongdong Guild members who had been present when I stormed their Guild.

"You can do that?"

"It would obviously be difficult, but not impossible. The stronger the target's will and the more extensive the memories that need to be altered, the harder it becomes."

"Oh."

"He seems quite strong. In the worst case, we could fail and leave behind evidence that someone attempted to manipulate his mind."

Go Jun might not look it now, but he was strong enough to qualify as an S-rank Hunter.

Unlike Wu Heixing, he was also fairly strong-willed, so trying it could be a needless gamble.

"Leaving evidence would be a problem."

"Yes. If it were discovered, there'd be no avoiding punishment. Mental-manipulation magic is a serious felony."

Yet Lee Jungryong and the Ares Guild had done such things without the slightest hesitation.

Even if someone noticed, they wouldn't dare question it. Everyone knew how much power and influence they possessed.

"Still, if we tried and succeeded…"

"Under federal law, the minimum sentence would be one hundred years in prison without parole. Want to try?"

I answered without taking a breath.

"No."

"Good boy. Wise decision."

A minimum of one hundred years without parole?

If I got caught, I'd rot in prison without a chance. Even if I escaped, I'd spend the rest of my life as an internationally wanted fugitive.

I might even end up with a ten-billion-beri[2041] bounty on my head, living as a pirate on Somalia's Grand Line like some manga character.

The thought alone was horrifying…

"What a shame. If this were Korea, it might be worth trying."

"Korea? Why?"

"If you spread enough money around and hired a former chief prosecutor who could benefit from jeongwan yewu,[2042] you probably wouldn't get much of a sentence."

"Jeongwan yewu?[2043] What's that?"

"It's a thing. Ah, if you said you'd done it while drunk after downing about five bottles of soju,[2044] you might even get a suspended sentence."

Magic Johnson laughed loudly as if he had heard an incredible joke.

"Don't be ridiculous, Jin. What kind of country would allow that?"

"…"

"You're serious? My God."

In any case, memory-manipulation magic was off the table.

Leaving Go Jun where he lay, I walked away. The three A-rank Hunters he had concealed nearby were frozen like statues, their Paralysis Acupoints struck by the Finger Qi I had fired at them.

"You saw everything, right?"

The three men looked up at me with terror-filled eyes.

Sometimes watching someone else suffer inspired even greater fear than experiencing it yourself.

Unable to move so much as a finger, they had watched Go Jun get brutally and thoroughly crushed. They looked half out of their minds.

"I remember all three of your faces. Getting your personal information is only a matter of time."

It was the same method the powerful had always used.

[2041] Beri is the fictional currency in the manga One Piece. Its Grand Line is a sea route sailed by pirates.

[2042] Jeongwan yewu is the unofficial preferential treatment often afforded to lawyers who formerly served as judges or prosecutors, particularly through their old professional connections.

[2043] Jeongwan yewu is the unofficial preferential treatment often afforded to lawyers who formerly served as judges or prosecutors, particularly through their old professional connections.

[2044] Soju is a clear Korean distilled liquor, commonly served in small glasses.

If I couldn't kill them, I had to use that method to instill fear in them. I had to make sure they never dared bare their teeth at me again.

"If we meet like this again… I'll kill you."

Whoosh!

The killing intent that erupted from me sliced through the air and crushed everything around us.

After reining in my qi, I slowly swept my gaze over their corpse-pale faces, then thrust out a hand.

Crack-crack-crack!

"Ghk!"

"Hah, huff…"

Finally released from the Pressure-Point Strike, the men gasped for breath. Tears pooled in their bloodshot eyes, while saliva and vomit streamed from their open mouths.

"I'll give you ten seconds. Take that bastard and get lost."

There was no question who that bastard meant.

Before I had even finished speaking, the three men scrambled to their feet and rushed toward Go Jun.

They hoisted their still-unconscious superior onto one man's back and fled with lightning speed.

I called one final warning after them.

"Erase everything that happened today from your memories. And think carefully about which ship you need to board if you want to stay alive."

"…!"

"…!"

"…!"

The Ares Guild was a massive, sturdy ship.

But its great captain, Cheon Taemin, had vanished without a trace long ago. Now Lee Jungryong, the man who had taken the helm after him, had also met his death.

The ship that had once seemed destined to sail the seas forever was beginning to list.

A captain couldn't abandon his ship, but the sailors hired to serve aboard it were different.

If they wanted, they could find a new ship and a new shipowner.

That should be enough for them to understand.

The three men hesitated briefly at my words, then disappeared into the darkness.

They offered no answer or visible reaction, but I knew one thing.

They would never forget what I had said.

They would turn it over in their minds dozens—hundreds—of times before passing it on to their fellow Guild members. Then, little by little, water would begin seeping into the bottom of the enormous ship called the Ares Guild.

"Ooh, wicked human. Oooooh."

"This is what you call strategy, you idiot."

"How can someone so stupid be this underhanded and cunning?!"

"…You son of a bitch."

He wasn't wrong, but it still pissed me the fuck off.

Let's just say that after several years as a Hunter, I had picked up a few things through experience.

Magic Gems were now the essential power source of cutting-edge civilization. Naturally, that drew enormous amounts of capital. Capital attracted people, and wherever people gathered, all kinds of things were bound to happen.

I've put the bait out with what I know… If I wait, someone will bite.

Just as a sect's standing in Murim was determined by the martial artists it possessed, a modern Guild's standing was determined by the caliber of its Hunters.

And Go Jun could never fill the void Lee Jungryong had left behind.

Just as Lee Jungryong had never been able to fill the void left by Cheon Taemin.

It was only a matter of time before the fish spotted another tempting lure beyond that empty space and began swimming away.

"You certainly don't hesitate. Are you planning to go to war with the Ares Guild?"

I shrugged at Magic Johnson's question.

"It's not like I couldn't, but we should keep up appearances."

"Appearances, huh?"

"The Peace Guild is going to grow enormously from now on. It has me, and Team Leader Choi is attracting plenty of media attention too."

"Oh, I heard about that. Apparently Choi's been making quite a name for himself lately."

The global media spotlight was focused on me, but the more I avoided the press, the more attention shifted toward Team Leader Choi.

He belonged to the same Peace Guild as I did and was one of the very few people allowed to visit my hospital room.

On top of that, he had distinguished himself during this monster wave and was handsome enough to put celebrities to shame.

And his greatest secret still hasn't been revealed.

If the truth—that he was Cheon Taemin's own flesh and blood—ever became public, the media would undoubtedly go into a frenzy.

"Anyway, it's only a matter of time before the Peace Guild takes off. Meanwhile, the Ares Guild's influence will shrink by the day."

“Hmm. I can certainly see that happening.”
Magic Johnson nodded, then suddenly spoke.
“But, Jin.”
“Yes?”
“What exactly do you know about the Magic Formation—”
“Oh, right. The club!”
“Huh?”
“You said you were going to a club with the Skeleton King.”
“Wait, wait, Jin!”
“Golgoli! Let’s go to the club!”
“Yes! Raise your ribs and scream!”
Listening to the Skeleton King spout nonsense, I hurried away.
Then, as I gazed up at the faint moonlight, a thought suddenly occurred to me.
I should go back soon.
The time was approaching.
The time to return to another world—to Murim.

Chapter 433

On a state-of-the-art hologram TV, a respectable-looking middle-aged news anchor spoke.

“Twenty days have passed since the monster wave in Sichuan Province—the tragedy dubbed the ‘Small Cataclysm’—finally came to an end. Across the continent, the cries of suffering people fill the air. CCTV correspondent Zhang Weijia is at the scene.”

As soon as he finished speaking, the screen changed.

Amid ruins reduced to rubble and ash, a young reporter in protective gear faced the camera and began to speak.

“Large-scale recovery efforts are currently underway throughout Sichuan Province. Aid continues to arrive from countries around the world, but the scars left by the war are nothing short of horrific.”

The camera slowly panned across the area.

The young reporter dispatched to cover the story was far from the only person there. Countless people of different countries, languages, and nationalities filled the ruins.

“Lift on three! One, two!”

“Hup!”

Thud-thud-thud. Boom!

There were places that heavy machinery could not enter.

Burly Hunters lifted chunks of stone and concrete instead of weapons, while mages cast detection magic without rest in search of possible survivors.

“How does it look?”

“There don’t seem to be any survivors within a hundred-meter radius.[2045] Let’s move a little and try again…”

“Here! We’ve got a survivor reading over here! Hurry!”

Whenever a severely injured survivor was rescued, healers rushed in and showered them with potions and healing magic.

When a child who had reached the brink of death finally drew a steady breath, the people around them exchanged deeply moved smiles.

But the joy lasted only a moment.

The reporter’s next words brought the cruel reality crashing back.

“According to government authorities, the number of dead and injured identified so far has reached four million. Property damage amounts to 2.3 trillion yuan. This is the greatest loss suffered since the Great Cataclysm—dozens of times greater than the damage caused by the Great Sichuan Earthquake.”

[2045] A hundred-meter radius is about 328 ft.

In barely a month, millions had died or been injured, and an astronomical amount of money had vanished.

Even more frightening was the fact that all of this was merely the damage tallied so far.

Considering everything from the plunging stock market to the damage this incident had inflicted on various industries, China would suffer badly in the days ahead.

The Chinese people were consumed by grief and fury at the news, directing the arrows of a billion people's anger in a single direction.

The young reporter at the scene was no exception. His voice seethed with indignation as he continued.

"This monster wave was like a natural disaster beyond human power to stop. But if everyone had joined forces to prepare for the disaster and respond swiftly, the situation would have been very different. Chairman Xiao Yang has offered a profound apology and released the transcript of last month's meeting."

Its contents were shocking.

The transcript of the Communist Party's highest committee meeting, previously hidden from the public, laid bare the bitter clash between Chairman Xiao Yang's faction, which had urged them to seek immediate assistance from other countries, and the Crown Prince Party, which had argued that they should rally the power of Zhonghua[2046] and fight with the spirit of chivalry.

One person stood out above all the rest.

The star of the transcript was an old politician who had lost everything following the loss of his only son, Wu Heixing.

"Committee Member Wu Xueming, Premier of the State Council and a member of the Central Politburo Standing Committee, has spent more than fifty years in politics. It has now been revealed that he committed countless acts of corruption while leading the Crown Prince Party, the country's largest political faction."

Had the outcome been favorable, none of this would have happened.

But the power of Zhonghua[2047] and the spirit of chivalry he had gone on about during the meeting at the beginning of the Small Cataclysm had sounded like nothing but bullshit even to those steeped in Zhonghua[2048] ideology. In the end, they had become the laughingstock of the entire world.

Then it came to light that his past corruption involving the military had led to incidents in which tanks broke down and helicopters crashed. Wu Xueming found himself driven to the edge of a cliff.

[2046] Zhonghua refers to China and Chinese civilization; here it invokes Chinese national pride.
[2047] Zhonghua refers to China and Chinese civilization; here it invokes Chinese national pride.
[2048] Zhonghua refers to China and Chinese civilization; here it invokes Chinese national pride.

And Chairman Xiao Yang, a seasoned politician, did not let the perfect opportunity slip by.

"Committee Member Wu Xueming used his guanxi[2049] with prominent figures in the military, political, and business worlds to embezzle astronomical sums of money. We are currently investigating every circumstance connected to this incident."

In truth, the large-scale purge had already begun.

Of the seven standing committee members who formed the Communist Party's highest echelon, the leading figures of the Crown Prince Party—including Wu Xueming—had been summoned one after another. A sweeping reorganization of the military had also taken place.

The media merely pointed its cameras where the government directed and recited whatever the government chose to show.

Several more investigations and trials still lay ahead, but everyone knew they would be nothing more than formalities.

"Comrades of the people, they will pay the price their crimes deserve. That is justice—"

"Hey, mister."

Someone abruptly cut off the young reporter's furious outcry, delivered in complete disregard of his duty as a journalist. His mind went blank.

What kind of lunatic interrupts a live broadcast…?

This was a colossal broadcasting disaster.

The staff at the scene, the main anchor at the broadcasting station's desk, and even the director watching TV in his office all stared openmouthed.

But the man responsible for the entire mess could not have been calmer.

If anything, he sounded annoyed as he addressed the reporter.

"Move aside. It's fine that you're covering the story, but you're getting in the way."

"Pardon?"

"Did someone stuff your ears with stinky tofu?[2050] I'm telling you to go film somewhere else instead of blocking the way in the middle of an active work site."

The young reporter's face turned as white as paper. He stammered and glanced around.

The staff were terrified by the colossal broadcasting disaster unfolding before them, while the nearby Hunters looked as if someone had finally said exactly what they were thinking.

After a brief struggle, the reporter managed to shake off his panic. He forced a smile and addressed the man.

[2049] Guanxi refers to personal relationships and the obligations or influence that come with them.

[2050] Stinky tofu is a fermented tofu dish known for its strong smell.

"I-I'm sorry. It seems we made a mistake."

"To hell with sorry… Ugh, my throat."

Khhk—ptooey.

Covered in dust from head to toe, the man spat out a wad of black phlegm and continued.

"It's only a mistake if you didn't know. I saw you slip the person in charge some money to get in here, so don't give me that."

"E-Excuse me! What exactly are you implying?"

"What do you mean, implying? I saw the whole thing. Wanna bet your balls on it?"

At that moment, the cameraman watching the entire scene unfold at point-blank range felt his own balls tremble.

We're fucked.

His employer, CCTV, was China's largest broadcasting station and one of the five biggest in the world.

And now, during the nine-o'clock evening news broadcast watched by tens of millions of people, someone was proposing a bet involving his balls.

The young reporter was already begging the man with the expression of someone whose balls had been cut off.

"S-Sir, please…"

"Hey, kid. Move while I'm asking nicely."

"This is a broadcast. So please watch your language…"

"Wow, you really don't listen. There's a survivor underneath where you're standing, so move."

"What?!"

The reporter and every member of the staff leaped back as if they had been burned.

Only then did the man nod.

He strode over to a massive pile of concrete and placed a hand on it.

"That's better. Now stay back and don't get in the way. You'll get hurt."

Whoosh! Boom!

There was no need to find anyone to help him.

A chunk of concrete that had taken several Hunters to move flew like a pebble, while rock and ground split apart like cheesecake whenever the man's hand blurred.

Papapapapak!

It was over in the blink of an eye. Before a cup of instant noodles could have finished cooking, the man emerged from the deep pit into which he had vanished.

In his arms was a tiny old woman.

"What… What is this…?"

The broadcasting staff stood speechless at the astonishing sight until the Hunters rushing over pushed them aside.

When a healer in a pure-white robe hurried forward with a potion, the man waved him off.

“Not yet. She’s too weak to handle a potion right now.”

“W-Wait. You look like a close-combat Hunter, but this is my field of expertise…”

“Hmm. I don’t think so.”

The man answered calmly and placed a hand against the old woman’s back.

Warmth radiated from him strongly enough to be felt several meters away,[2051] and a faint trace of color returned to the old woman’s pallid face.

“Move her somewhere warm first. Keep her body temperature up with magic. Once she regains consciousness, you should be able to use a potion or healing magic.”

The healer stared back and forth between the old woman and the man, dumbfounded.

“T-Thank you, sir.”

“No need to thank me for doing the obvious, and no need for the ‘sir.‘ Let’s leave it at that. And… hmm.”

The man hesitated briefly before continuing in a low, subdued voice.

“She’s the last one. In this area.”

“Ah…”

Those who understood what he meant let out low groans.

They included not only the Hunters but the broadcasting staff as well. Strangely, although they accepted his claim, they could not hide their bewilderment.

Why?

All they had to do was glance around to see hundreds of Hunters using magic and cutting-edge equipment to search for survivors. It was only natural to trust them over the man standing before them. They should have dismissed his words as nonsense, and yet…

Somehow, I believe him.

Why?

After the astonishing scene they had just witnessed, all thought of a broadcasting disaster vanished from their minds.

Two other thoughts surfaced in its place.

No way. Could it be?

“That’s only my personal opinion. So please don’t give up until the very end.”

[2051] Several meters is roughly 10–20 ft.

The cameraman raised the camera he had unknowingly let droop toward the ground.

Then he called out to the man, who had bowed his head slightly and was about to turn away.

“C-Could you be Mr. Jin?”

His question spoke for everyone present.

The man was so thoroughly covered in dust that they could barely make out his features.

But what he had shown them in that brief moment had clearly reminded them of one person…

“No.”

The answer came without even a breath’s hesitation. The cameraman asked again.

“Y-You’re not?”

“You mean Jin Taekyung? I appreciate the mistake, but why would he be here? According to the news, he hasn’t shown hide nor hair of himself. Who knows what he’s doing?”

That was true. Jin Taekyung was a hero who had not shown his face once since the press conference.

It seemed absurd that they had suspected him based on nothing more than a vague feeling.

Just as the cameraman sighed, the young reporter suddenly spoke.

“Then may I ask you one question?”

“No. Take care.”

“What do you think of the claim that Mr. Jin is descended from Chen Lin, the Ming Dynasty general who fought in the Imjin War?”[2052]

At that moment, the man walking away spun around like lightning.

“Why does everyone have to be someone’s descendant? Then, for fuck’s sake, is Asmodeus descended from Einstein? Even bullshit should make some kind of sense…”

“Ah…”

“Uh…”

A silence fell as if the world itself had stopped.

The man—Jin Taekyung—looked at the people staring blankly at him and opened his mouth.

“You all know I was joking, right?”

“…”

“I was just passing by and stopped in for a moment.”

[2052]The Imjin War was the Japanese invasion of Korea from 1592 to 1598. Chen Lin was a Ming Dynasty general who fought in the war.

"…"

"Please edit this out. And cut the part about the balls too."

The reporter, finally recovering from the shock, barely managed to squeeze out his voice.

"It's live, sir."

"Oh."

Jin Taekyung nodded, his expression devastated, then asked again.

"Live? You're not joking? It's actually live?"

"Yes."

"Then how much of that did you broadcast…?"

"I'm sorry, but from the beginning to the end…"

"Any idea what the ratings are?"

"I just checked the messages. They say we've broken through thirty percent."

"Oh. I see."

Jin Taekyung fell silent for a moment, then started walking away.

The young reporter, whose life had just turned around as a colossal broadcasting disaster transformed into a sensational exclusive, called after him desperately.

"S-Sir! Where are you going?"

The answer came back, drained of all energy.

"Home."

He was telling the truth.

A formation of dozens of aircraft swept across the sky and landed on the vast expanse of freshly cleared ground.

It was the aircraft formation that would take him back to Korea while he was briefly going to another world.

Chapter 434

“Have you looked in a mirror?”

That was the first thing Team Leader Choi, the first person off the aircraft, said to me.

I’d already guessed I looked rough, considering the people around me hadn’t recognized me, but was I really that much of a mess?

“No. Is it bad?”

“Yes. Bad enough that even your family couldn’t recognize you, Mr. Jin.”

“Other people, maybe, but Mom would recognize me. She went through labor to give birth to me.”

“We watched the news together on the flight here. During your interview, she asked who that filthy-looking man was and why he kept snapping at everyone.”

“…Seriously?”

I looked over Team Leader Choi’s shoulder.

Mom poked her head through the open doorway of the private jet and spoke in a voice as tiny as an ant.

“Sorry, son.”

She vanished as soon as she said it, and a slim face appeared in her place. It was Hayeon, her skin glowing as if she’d spent the past several days eating and sleeping to her heart’s content.

“I recognized you right away! I’m the only one who did, right?”

“Who are you? I’m an only child.”

“What the heck?”

Letting Hayeon’s words go in one ear and out the other, I asked Team Leader Choi, “That brat talked the most trash about me, didn’t she?”

“Yes. She was having a wonderful time egging your mother on.”

Yep. She was definitely my sister.

Hayeon must have overheard us, because she immediately pulled her head back inside. She wasn’t just good at studying—she was quick on the uptake, too.

“It’s nice to see such a harmonious family.”

“If we became twice as harmonious, someone would disappear from the family register.”

Team Leader Choi replied with a straight face.

“That would still be better. I don’t have any family. Except for my maternal grandfather, and I don’t even know where he is.”

“…Why are you doing this to me?”

“It was a joke.”

“Please use your turn signal before swerving into my lane like that.”

Team Leader Choi chuckled at my grumbling and extended a hand.

At a brief activation word, an Item imbued with Clean magic flashed brightly.

A cool breeze made of mana swept over me, blowing away all the dust and grime at once.

“Thanks. Much better.”

“Don’t mention it. You’ve certainly kept busy to the very end. You vanished without warning on the day of your departure, which put us in a rather difficult position.”

“You’re making it sound worse than it was. I was planning to be back on time.”

Team Leader Choi stared at me without a word. I scratched the back of my head and continued as if I were making an excuse.

“I just stopped by on the off chance.”

“Mr. Jin.”

“I know what you’re going to say.”

“Even if you do, this still needs to be said.”

Team Leader Choi looked me in the eye and spoke with deliberate clarity.

“You can’t save everyone. Mr. Jin, you… did your best.”

I smiled bitterly.

I had witnessed many deaths, both in the modern world and in Murim.

Sometimes I had been a spectator, far removed from what was happening. Other times, I had been at the heart of it.

And whenever it was all over, I always found myself asking the same question.

Just as I did now.

Was that really the best I could do?

The best.

The greatest and finest one could achieve after devoting every ounce of sincerity and strength.

Those two words frightened me more than anything, because there was no fixed standard for them.

Whether you had done your best was something only you could decide.

But there would always be regrets. Even if they amounted to no more than a few crumbs, as long as they remained buried deep in your heart, you couldn’t truly say you had done your best.

Because doing your best meant having no regrets at all.

“Nice weather today.”

I looked up at the sky and muttered for no particular reason, then grinned at Team Leader Choi.

“Let’s call it second-best. I’ll feel better that way.”

“How you see yourself and how others see you are two different things. To us, it was the best—and more.”

That wasn’t Team Leader Choi’s voice.

I had already sensed his presence, so I turned without surprise.

The owner of the aged voice addressed me with a gentle smile.

“So… you are leaving after all, Mr. Jin.”

I smiled back at Chairman Xiao Yang.

“The hotel rates were higher than I expected.”

“They are merchants, are they not? It is only natural to charge for the services they provide.”

“I might’ve stayed if they’d offered me a discount, but I think they were overcharging me because I’m a foreigner.”

“Oh dear. So that happened. Shall this old man give them a stern talking-to and persuade you to stay a little longer?”

“The bus has already left. It would be rude to chase it down the road and ask the driver to open the door.”

“Then I suppose I have no choice but to let you go. Ha ha.”

As if any hotel would be crazy enough to charge me—let alone overcharge me—in a situation like this.

We traded light jokes while reaffirming each other’s intentions, then clasped hands.

“You have given us more help than I could ever dare measure.”

His voice and gaze were sincere.

The people who had accompanied the Chairman also bowed respectfully to me.

Several familiar faces stood among them, including Xiao Shen and Wei Fenghu, the Minister of National Defense.

I gave them a slight nod and answered with a joke.

“I only did what I had to do. More importantly, it wasn’t volunteer work. You know that, right?”

“Ha ha. Of course.”

I had momentarily forgotten, but the bounty on the Arch Lich’s head had been an astounding fifty trillion won.[2053]

It was such an astronomical sum that even the compensation I’d receive for fighting in a month-long war would look like pocket change beside it.

I had never imagined possessing that much money in my life, and it still didn’t feel real.

[2053] Fifty trillion won is about $36 billion or €32 billion.

Fifty trillion won.[2054]

Only half a year ago, I'd been eating seven-thousand-won[2055] bowls of bone hangover soup to save money, then cooking ramen afterward because one bowl wasn't enough to fill me up.

Maybe that was why I felt more dazed than happy.

"Um, by the way…"

Chairman Xiao Yang raised his eyebrows.

"Are you really going to pay me?"

The instant the words left my mouth, Team Leader Choi firmly stepped on my foot. Chairman Xiao Yang's wrinkled eyes curved into a gentle smile.

"Why? Do you not wish to receive it?"

"No! Of course I do!"

My vehement reply sent a ripple of laughter through the crowd.

Chairman Xiao Yang laughed heartily and patted me on the shoulder.

"Did I not say so? It is only natural to pay a fair price for work performed."

They said China was the Middle Kingdom because it was too large to be a small nation and too narrow-minded to be a Great Nation, but this old man sure was generous.

I scratched my chin awkwardly.

There was nothing wrong with receiving payment under the contract, but accepting a bounty of fifty trillion won[2056] amid such devastation made me feel like a thief rummaging through someone else's storehouse.

"If money's tight, you can pay me in installments."

"If you are worried about rebuilding the damage, that is something our country must handle. Your bounty is being processed quickly, Mr. Jin, so it will be paid officially soon."

Chairman Xiao Yang leaned closer and whispered in my ear.

"When I plowed the fields and pulled out the rotten stalks, piles of gold came tumbling out. So there is no need for you to feel uncomfortable, Mr. Jin."

It took me a moment to realize he was talking about the Crown Prince Party.

According to the news, the assets seized so far already amounted to hundreds of trillions of won.[2057]

And that was before they had even touched Wu Xueming, the faction's de facto leader, or the rest of its leadership.

Now that's some corruption.

[2054] Fifty trillion won is about $36 billion or €32 billion.

[2055] Seven thousand won is about $5 or €4.50.

[2056] Fifty trillion won is about $36 billion or €32 billion.

[2057] Hundreds of trillions of won—roughly 200 to 900 trillion won—would be about $140–640 billion or €130–580 billion.

A country's landmass must be proportional to the size of its people's nerve.

Still, they had ended up penniless and behind bars, so justice had been served to some extent.

Feeling considerably lighter, I answered, "Then I'll accept it gratefully."

"What are you saying? Thanks to you, we were able to prevent an even greater catastrophe. On behalf of all the people who could not be here today, I offer you my thanks once again, Mr. Jin."

Before I could stop them, Chairman Xiao Yang and his attendants bowed respectfully.

The people gathered here were the major officials who moved an entire nation.

They were, in essence, the body and head of China itself.

As I stood there flustered, a familiar voice reached my ear.

"Should I get down on my knees, too?"

"Faye Chen."

She approached with a playful expression and poked me in the cheek.

"You worked hard, young man."

"Not at all. Everyone…"

"Of course everyone worked hard. But if you hadn't defeated the Arch Lich, we wouldn't have this peace. I'm sure everyone feels the same way. Except for that obnoxious prince, of course."

Prince Felix, dressed in a dazzling formal uniform with a snow-white cloak draped over his shoulders, gave an irritated cough and stared at me.

"What?"

"I pay my respects to you, Korean commoner."

"…I appreciate it, but could you leave out the last few words?"

"I pay my respects to you, Korean commoner."

"Are you doing this on purpose?"

"I am sincere."

"I'm sure you are, you bastard. I really am a commoner."

"That is not what I meant."

Prince Felix suddenly extended a hand.

But unlike usual, he didn't offer me the back of his own hand. Instead, he seized mine and pulled it toward him.

Then, while I stood there dumbfounded, he kissed the back of my hand and stepped away.

What the fuck?

Faye Chen burst out laughing at my speechless expression. Prince Felix calmly said what he had to say.

“I have shown you my respect. It shall never happen again, so treasure this honor for generations to come. Until we meet again.”

With that final remark, delivered without the slightest change in expression, Prince Felix swept away with his attendants.

Magic Johnson, who had watched the entire scene, smacked his lips.

“Charming.”

“…That’s your type?”

“Respect my preferences.”

“He has a spouse.”

“That is why I am restraining myself.”

We should never let him visit a Korean convenience store. The moment he took a bite of tuna mayo, the world would be hit by an unprecedented upheaval.

As I shook my head, Team Leader Choi spoke quietly.

“Mr. Jin. It’s time to leave.”

The words weren’t meant only for me, but for everyone gathered there.

I nodded and said my final farewells.

I made sure not to leave out Xiao Shen and Wei Fenghu, with whom I’d spent so much time.

“Take care.”

“We’ll definitely meet again, hyung.”[2058]

Xiao Shen, who was only in his early twenties, rubbed his reddened eyes with his sleeve before continuing.

“I’ll become an outstanding Hunter like you, hyung,[2059] and rise to lead the public security forces that protect everyone.”

“You’re still young, but you’re already blinded by the desire for power. That job must be brutal.”

“I’m ashamed to admit it, but I’ve decided to accept my grandfather’s help.”

“Good. He’ll have plenty of advice for you, so listen carefully and carve every word into your bones. I don’t know what kind of man he is, but I’m sure everything he tells you will be wise and helpful…”

My words were cut off by something Xiao Shen said.

“You know him too, hyung.”[2060]

“Huh? Know what?”

“My grandfather.”

“What are you talking about? The only grandfathers I know are Butler Kim from my Guild and the owner of the real-estate office outside my goshiwon."[2061]

[2058] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man to whom he is close.
[2059] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man to whom he is close.
[2060] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man to whom he is close.

Chairman Xiao Yang cut in with a laugh.

"Ha ha. This old man is here as well, you know."

"Oh, come on. Nice joke…"

Wait a minute.

The corners of my eyes began to twitch.

Xiao Yang. Xiao Shen. Xiao, Xiao?

I'd dismissed it because Xiao was a common surname in China, like Kim or Park in Korea, but now that I looked at them, their faces were strangely similar too.

"Don't tell me…"

"Yes. That's right."

"Even you are no different, Mr. Jin. Everyone reacts the same way."

"…I think I'm going to be sick."

"Hyung?"[2062]

"Mr. Jin?"

What kind of novel was this?

The Younger Friend I Met in China Turned Out to Be the Chinese Chairman's Grandson.

Even the title sounded ridiculous.

Why was everyone I met born with a silver spoon in their mouth?

After a brief bout of panic, I finally managed to force out my voice.

"Oh. I see."

"I am grateful to you not only as Chairman, but also as a grandfather reunited with his grandson. It is a debt this old man could never repay in a lifetime."

"Ah… No need to rush."

Apparently, I had saved the Chinese Chairman's grandson without even realizing it.

Still dazed, I exchanged final farewells with grandfather and grandson. Then my gaze fell on someone else.

Wei Fenghu.

I wasn't imagining the emptiness in his smile.

Unlike his superior, he had lost someone of his own blood whom he loved.

We looked at each other in silence for a moment, then spoke at the same time.

"Goodbye."

"Take care, Mr. Jin. You have truly worked hard."

[2061] A goshiwon is a type of inexpensive housing in South Korea, usually consisting of a very small rented room.

[2062] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man to whom he is close.

It was a brief exchange, but it was enough.

“Well, then.”

I gave everyone a slight bow and followed Team Leader Choi onto the waiting aircraft.

Mom looked me over with an expression that was equal parts anxious and delighted. Meanwhile, Hayeon had taken advantage of the distraction to sip champagne. When our eyes met, she gave me a sheepish smile.

“Oppa,[2063] want a glass?”

“What do you mean, a glass? You’re a minor. Hey, take that away from her.”

The Skeleton King, already in human form and seated nearby, ignored me completely. He muttered in a gloomy voice.

“It won’t stand… I’m a eunuch…”

Team Leader Choi, seated beside him, offered a few words of consolation.

“Keep your chin up. Next time, I’ll ask Mr. Johnson to do something about it.”

“R-Really?”

I nearly smacked him, but a quiet laugh escaped me instead.

At last, I felt as if I were back where I belonged.

My beloved family, whom I love more than anyone, along with my colleagues and friends.

Even though we were inside a chartered plane rather than a house, I felt an indescribable sense of comfort.

Yes. This is enough.

“We will now begin takeoff. Passengers in the cabin, please…”

An announcement rang out, and the aircraft rose toward the sky under the escort of the flight formation.

After we had spent a long while laughing, talking, and sharing stories, I sensed that the time had come.

I watched everyone sleeping soundly from the fatigue that had built up, then lay back in my plush seat.

Login.

Ding.

With the familiar notification, darkness covered my vision, and I set off.

Toward another world and another group of people waiting for me far away.

[2063] Oppa is a Korean term a woman uses for an older brother or an older man to whom she is close.

Chapter 435

Night had fallen deep enough to swallow even the last glow of sunset. A boy sat at the bow, staring into the black river, when he abruptly spoke.

“What brings you here?”

“I thought I’d have a drink while gazing at the Yangtze. Didn’t realize someone had beaten me to the spot.”

Behind the boy, an old man barely five feet tall appeared like a ghost, without so much as a whisper. He shook the gourd in his hand and grinned.

“Well? Want some?”

“Excessive drinking is harmful to the body. You should abstain.”

“Don’t be like that. Have a drink with me. The atmosphere is nice.”

“It would be even better if I were alone.”

“What a mouth on such a green little brat. An elder’s been talking to you all this time, and you haven’t even bothered to look at him.”

The boy frowned. Dark clouds gathered over his handsome face—a face bright enough to evoke a clear blue sky—and lightning flashed across it.

Then, instead of his usual clear voice, a low, sunken voice slipped between his lips.

“That’s enough.”

A pale-blue gleam shone from his eyes in the darkness.

There was no trace left of Mungyeong, the bright and cheerful young medical apprentice.

In his place stood the peerless martial artist known as the Slaughter Saint, a savage beast baring its claws.

But he wasn’t the only monster aboard.

“Oh, how frightening.”

The old man curled up the corners of his mouth without a care in the world, standing before an aura powerful enough to freeze even an ordinary Peak master stiff as a statue. Then Fire King Jeok Cheongang tossed him the gourd.

“Drop the little-brat act. It doesn’t suit you. Wet your throat.”

Mungyeong caught the gourd as it drifted lazily toward him and answered in a dry voice.

“Not interested.”

“What, are you still too young to drink?”

“I quit. A long time ago.”

“Must’ve been when you started playing medical apprentice.”

“…Don’t you sleep?”

“You get less sleep when you’re old. Like someone I know.”

Mungyeong shook his head slightly. Taciturn by nature and unaccustomed to showing emotion, he had always found Jeok Cheongang difficult to talk to. If he didn't want to deal with the man, his best option was to leave.

"You going?"

"That's none of your business."

"What about the liquor?"

Mungyeong tossed the gourd into the river. The rolling waters of the Yangtze swallowed it in an instant.

"I finished it."

"…If you didn't want it, you could've at least given it back. What a nasty old man."

Mungyeong's gaze sharpened as he walked past Jeok Cheongang.

The Slaughter Saint no longer existed. Now he was merely an ordinary young medical apprentice, the sort one might find anywhere.

"Your tongue is too loose."

"There aren't any ears listening, so what does it matter? Besides, after coming all this way, why bother hiding your identity?"

Mungyeong did not answer.

No—he couldn't.

Why had he done it?

Had it been nothing more than a momentary impulse?

Even the cold reason that had never wavered through countless acts of killing could not explain it.

"I see. You still haven't found the answer yourself."

Mungyeong remained silent for a moment before replying.

"We're merely traveling together."

"I understand. That was how it started for me too. Then I met one bizarre bastard, and he completely ruined my later years."

Mungyeong had a good idea who this "bizarre bastard" was, and he could think of no better description.

He had encountered every manner of person and incident in the turbulent martial world, yet that bastard was unlike anyone he had ever seen.

"Jin Taekyung."

"So you do know him. Well, how could you not?"

"He's an unusual one. He's reached an impressive realm for his age."

The corner of Jeok Cheongang's mouth twitched.

"Ahem. Impressive, my ass. He's just lucky. In terms of pure martial talent, he can't compare to the Sword Saint's Disciple. The kid doesn't seem to realize it yet, but he's already completed all the preparations necessary to open his Middle Dantian."

Mungyeong recalled the young man who had spent the entire journey performing tricks with a snake.

He also remembered the sight of that same young man at the Sichuan Tang Clan, scattering dazzling Sword Force despite being barely past twenty.

“That boy was impressive too. No—he did seem impressively insane. In terms of talent alone, he’s definitely a step above Jin Taekyung.”

“What!”

“…?”

“Ah.”

Mungyeong stared at Jeok Cheongang for a moment, then clicked his tongue.

“You certainly dote on your Disciple.”

“Disciple?”

Jeok Cheongang paused before clearing his throat.

“Ahem. Well. He might be my Disciple, or he might not…”

“What kind of nonsense is that?”

“No, well… The circumstances are somewhat complicated. You see, what happened was…”

Mungyeong suddenly felt a headache coming on.

It had been only a few days since an unheard-of group called Dark Heaven had dyed Sichuan red with blood.

His thoughts were tangled enough already. Listening to a story about this bizarre master and disciple threatened to give him seasickness he had never suffered before.

“If you have no further business with me, I’ll be leaving. I hope nothing like this happens again.”

Mungyeong tossed out the words and started toward the cabin.

“Thank you. For saving the kid.”

“…”

“I mean it.”

Mungyeong did not answer. He opened the cabin door and went inside. Jeok Cheongang grumbled behind him about what a prickly old man he was, but Mungyeong ignored him and sat on a hard wooden berth.

On the berth a few paces away, a passenger who had claimed the spot long ago was fast asleep.

Mungyeong stared at the motionless Jin Taekyung and thought,

He really is a bizarre one.

Perhaps that was why even the way he slept was strange. At first, his breathing had been so faint that Mungyeong wondered whether he had used the Turtle Breath Technique.

And that wasn't all. Jin Taekyung possessed a Heavenly Martial Physique, a constitution that appeared perhaps once every few hundred years.

Jeok Cheongang had even made the unbelievable claim that Jin Taekyung's body was steadily becoming more perfect.

Absurd.

Why was the Heavenly Martial Physique called the Heavenly Martial Physique?

Because it was the most perfect body for learning martial arts—a martial constitution bestowed by heaven itself.

The word perfect meant there was nothing to add and nothing to take away. Jeok Cheongang had surely misjudged the matter because his eyes were clouded by his foolish affection for his Disciple.

Still, there's no denying he's an impressive bastard. Or should that be bastards?

Cheongpung lay asleep on the berth right beside Jin Taekyung, drool running from his mouth.

His lips moved as if he were eating. On closer inspection, Mungyeong discovered that Cheongpung was sucking on the head of the snake he always carried beside him and mumbling in his sleep.

"Dumplings, roast duck, and mooncakes[2064] too, please…"

"…"

"Lots and lots, please…"

What in the world had happened while Mungyeong was away?

Mungyeong looked back and forth between Jin Taekyung and Cheongpung with an awkward expression.

These are the ones destined to illuminate the future of Murim?

Even in Mungyeong's eyes, the pair had already gone far beyond the level of mere young prodigies.

They were peerless geniuses who had broken through the wall into Supreme Peak despite being barely past twenty.

If either of them opened their Middle Dantian before turning thirty, then…

This is…

Mungyeong's eyes twitched as he studied Jin Taekyung and Cheongpung more closely.

When? No, how?

He sprang to his feet like lightning and hurriedly took Jin Taekyung's pulse.

The instant he sent internal energy through the Mingmen acupoint, an utterly unbelievable reality unfolded before him. His thoughts ground to a halt, leaving only one fact circling endlessly through his mind.

His Middle Dantian… is open?

[2064] Mooncakes are filled Chinese pastries traditionally eaten during the Mid-Autumn Festival.

Even the Unshakable Mind he had cultivated over many years failed him.

And just as Mungyeong stared blankly into space, a voice spoke.

“What are you doing?”

Mungyeong lowered his gaze and found a pair of eyes looking up at him.

Jin Taekyung’s gaze moved from Mungyeong’s hand against the Mingmen acupoint on his back to the other hand resting against his chest, directly over his Middle Dantian.

Then he opened his mouth.

“What the fuck?”

Mungyeong answered with complete sincerity.

“It’s a misunderstanding.”

“More like, ‘Oh yeah.‘”

“Calm down and listen to me…”

Jin Taekyung responded to his sincerity with a shout loud enough to wake everyone aboard the swift ship.

“Old Master!”

Boom!

The cabin door exploded into ash, revealing Fire King Jeok Cheongang.

In the dead of night, the peaceful silence of the Yangtze was shattered.

Mu Song, known as Ship-Fire Boy, was the Disciple of the Seafaring King—the Alliance Leader of the Yangtze River Channel League—and the Stronghold Lord of Water Dragon Stronghold, which ruled the rivers of Sichuan. He cried out with a face as though the sky had fallen.

“No! My swift ship!”

I quietly looked away, while the Slaughter Saint—no, Mungyeong—suddenly announced that he had medicine to prepare and left.

Jeok Cheongang, who had burned one of Mu Song’s swift ships to ashes, patted him on the shoulder.

“It’s fine. You can always build another ship.”

“No! Noooo!”

“Come now, I said it’s fine. With enough people and gold, a ship can be thrown together in no time.”

“It isn’t that simple! That wasn’t an ordinary ship. It was a special swift ship that only our Yangtze River Channel League can build! To make another, we’d have to contact headquarters, bring in craftsmen, and pour a thousand gold into it…”

Mu Song’s furious voice gradually faded.

Jeok Cheongang was watching him with an ominous smile.

Scorching Yang Qi already blazed around his fist.

“You’d pour a thousand gold into it, and then what?”

Mu Song closed his mouth.

He was clearly weighing whether to pour a thousand gold into rebuilding the swift ship or pour his own blood into the Yangtze.

In the end, it came down to money or his life. The choice wasn’t difficult.

“…I was about to say that even after pouring a thousand gold into it, we’d still have money left over, Great Hero Jeok.”

“Right? Business is good around here, isn’t it?”

Mu Song’s ferocious face twisted. The sight would have made ordinary people piss themselves down to their innards, but despite appearances, that was his smile. As befitted a pure-blooded river bandit, he simply had a vicious face.

Despite his size, he rubbed his palms together ingratiatingly.

“Oh, don’t even ask. We’d rob more if there were anything left to take.”

“Yes, yes. Good to hear. Since it came to mind, let me say this: don’t rob people too much. It’s none of my business, but they need to make a living too.”

“Yes, yes.”

“I apologize again for this incident. I made a small mistake while training.”

“Of course. Such things happen. Were you hurt anywhere?”

“No. But my qi has felt weak lately. It would be nice to have something to chew on…”

“We recently acquired a few fine specimens of He Shou Wu.[2065] It seems they’ve finally found their rightful owner.”

“The owner is you. This old man is merely a guest. Ha ha. Still, if you insist on giving them to me, I’ll gratefully accept.”

Jeok Cheongang patted Mu Song’s shoulder a few more times, then turned and scowled at me.

“Damn it. Why did you cause such a commotion in the middle of the night?”

I answered calmly.

“Imagine waking up and finding some man touching your chest and back.”

“I’d burn him down to bone ash.”

“Yes. That’s what happened. How was I supposed to think straight in that situation? Besides, you smashed everything to pieces before I could stop you.”

The result had been fiery.

[2065] He Shou Wu is a root used in traditional Chinese medicine.

True to his title as the Slaughter Saint, Mungyeong had evaded Jeok Cheongang's attacks with ghostlike movements, while the Flame Divine Palm's searing heat had set the swift ship ablaze.

Jeok Cheongang frowned and muttered,

"I thought that bastard hadn't kicked his old habits."

"Well, they say a habit formed at three lasts until eighty."

"He passed eighty a long time ago, didn't he?"

"Then let's say a habit formed at three lasts until a hundred."

Mungyeong, who had been rushing around checking on everyone who had fallen into the water, whispered as he passed us.

"If you don't want to die, shut your mouth."

Instead of shutting my mouth, I shouted loudly enough for everyone to hear.

"Mungyeong, what did you say?"

"Yes, yes?"

"No. Didn't you just say something to me?"

"That couldn't… possibly be. You must have misheard me."

"Right?"

"Yes, yes."

"Then keep doing your work. Thanks for your hard work."

"Thank… you."

This was what happened when you committed too hard to the bit.

Anyway, it sure was a spectacle immediately after coming back.

This is Murim.

I shook my head as I gazed out over the Yangtze stretching endlessly into the distance.

Chapter 436

The Yangtze.

As its name suggested, the Yangtze was immense. In terms of length especially, few rivers on the continent could compare.

It crossed five provinces in all—Sichuan, Chongqing, Hubei, Anhui, and finally Jiangsu. As a vital hub of waterborne transportation, it would occupy a large portion of our journey.

“Our current plan is to follow one of the Yangtze’s tributaries to Hubei, then disembark and continue overland to Henan.”

After finishing his brief explanation, Jin Wikyung slowly looked over the group, including me.

“Does anyone have any questions?”

Whoosh!

The instant he finished speaking, one hand shot into the air.

Judging by how fast it went up, its owner could have been a model student bursting with academic enthusiasm. In reality, the hand belonged to a Supreme Peak master notorious throughout Murim as a thug on a national scale.

“There’s something this old man has been wondering for a while.”

“I’m all ears, Great Hero Jeok.”

“So what you’re saying is…”

Jeok Cheongang continued with a deeply sour expression.

“It sounds like you’re telling us to grow old and die on this damn Yangtze. Am I mistaken?”

That was the Fire King for you. He really knew how to bring the heat.

Jin Wikyung swallowed hard at Jeok Cheongang’s way of speaking, which came crashing forward like an eight-ton truck[2066] with a broken steering wheel.

“How could that be, Great Hero Jeok? This is simply the itinerary decided upon at the meeting.”

“A meeting? What kind of lunatics came up with this schedule? Even at the fastest pace, it’ll take seven days and nights just to reach Hubei!”

“At the top, we have Great Hero Sword Saint Mae Jonghak, and beneath him, the Nine Sects and One Gang[2067] and the Five Great Families…”

“That’s enough. I don’t need to hear any more.”

“Pardon?”

[2066] The Korean source uses metric tons. Eight metric tons is about 8,000 kg, or 17,600 lb.

[2067] The Nine Sects and One Gang is a grouping of major martial-arts organizations; the “One Gang” is the Beggars’ Sect.

"The Nine Sects and One Gang[2068] and the Five Great Families are all idiots with nothing but shit in their heads, so forget about them. I'll explain things properly to Mae Jonghak myself. Change the itinerary while there's still time. Staring at water all day is going to give me qi deviation."

In short, he was telling them to do their worst.

It was the kind of unreasonable demand only Jeok Cheongang could get away with. Not a single person here dared object to him.

Ah. There was one person who could.

Jeok Cheongang must have had the same thought, because he subtly turned his head.

His gaze met Mungyeong's in midair.

Mungyeong looked back at him with an expression that clearly said pathetic.

Jeok Cheongang stared at him, then tossed out a single remark.

"Hey. What are you looking at me like that for?"

"…"

"You little punk, you're still wet behind the ears. I ought to poke your eyes out and squeeze all the ink from them."

He was openly laying into him now.

Mungyeong's fist trembled.

As someone who knew his true identity, I found the sight chilling. To everyone else, however, it looked entirely different.

Hyuk Mujin and Gung Gibang, who had been languishing from the aftereffects of sampling the Yangtze, spoke in faint, faltering voices.

"Why are you picking on the boy? Just look at Mungyeong shaking. He's such a gentle soul…"

"I may eat stray yellow dogs, but Mungyeong couldn't kill an ant."

"…"

He probably killed people during the time it took to kill an ant.

I had heard that more than a thousand people were officially known to have died at the hands of the Slaughter Saint.

Even if he went around smearing Madecassol healing ointment on his sword, he still wasn't the sort of person anyone could call gentle.

"You lot… No. Forget it. Just keep living like that."

Jeok Cheongang looked ready to say something, but let out a deep sigh instead. Then he abruptly turned toward me.

"Why are you saying nothing?"

"About what?"

[2068]The Nine Sects and One Gang is a grouping of major martial-arts organizations; the "One Gang" is the Beggars' Sect.

“What else? Do you really want to keep floating around on this miserable water?”

“Oh, that.”

I scratched my chin and thought for a moment before answering.

“I don’t mind it.”

“What!”

“Little Brother!”

Jeok Cheongang and Jin Wikyung’s reactions were polar opposites. But I hadn’t said it to help Jin Wikyung. I meant it.

“There must be a reason the people in charge decided on this route. Besides, the scenery is nice.”

This was a world without environmental pollution. At dawn, a hazy mist blanketed the river, and the sight of the clear water stretching endlessly into the distance made my chest feel wide open.

When Jeok Cheongang had been unconscious, none of it had moved me at all, but…

In any case, I needed to set aside my impatience for a while and take the time to reflect and collect myself.

And there are things I need to investigate.

The mysterious patterns and symbols discovered in both worlds.

I had to find out whether my suspicions about them were correct. To do that, I had a lot to take care of while going back and forth between Murim and the modern world. If we traveled overland, the time available for that would be drastically reduced.

I tried to gently coax Jeok Cheongang around.

“It’s only a difference of a few days. Old Master—no, Master, you need to think about your health too. It hasn’t been long since you pushed yourself so hard.”

“What do you mean, pushed myself? Do you think this old man is on his deathbed?”

“Then what? Are you sixteen and in the prime of youth? A fresh-faced eighteen-year-old?”

“You little bastard!”

The instant Jeok Cheongang’s eyes flared, I hurriedly spoke.

“Martial arts! I need instruction in martial arts!”

The hand that had risen as though to smack me stopped in midair.

I didn’t miss the opening and continued.

“I’ve gained some insight recently. If we travel overland, there won’t be enough time for you to teach me.”

“Instruction…”

“There are parts I could never understand on my own, no matter how hard I rack my brain—even if I died and came back to life.”

“Is that true?”

“Yes. It’s precious instruction that only one person in all the world can give me—my master.”

Jeok Cheongang narrowed his eyes.

“If we use our movement techniques to the fullest overland, we could reach Henan several days earlier.”

“What does that have to do with receiving instruction?”

“It has everything to do with it. Didn’t you say before that you thought Sword Saint Mae Jonghak might be stronger than this old man? By your logic, shouldn’t you reach Henan as quickly as possible and ask the Sword Saint?”

I had tossed that out to tease him, but he actually remembered it.

I pretended not to know what he was talking about.

“You must have heard me wrong. Was I drunk out of my mind that day?”

“What a load of drunken bullshit.”

“To me, Master, you’re always the best.”

“Is that so?”

Jeok Cheongang glanced sideways at Mungyeong before asking,

“Then how do I compare to the Slaughter Saint?”

“What?”

“The Slaughter Saint. The one among the Three Saints whom no one can match when it comes to killing people. How do I compare to him?”

I could feel the people around me waiting with interest for my answer.

And I could also feel someone discreetly leaking killing intent.

Ah, fuck it. I don’t know.

I swallowed hard and opened my mouth.

“He’s a total fucking pushover.”

“Hm. Perhaps this boy knows what he’s talking about.”

“I know my martial arts, don’t I? I can size someone up at a glance.”

“Ahem. Did you grease your tongue? You’re showering me with flattery when you never do anything of the sort. Do you think this old man will fall for such a shallow trick?”

“…Then why are you smiling?”

Was he Murim’s Joker?

Jeok Cheongang’s grin had stretched all the way to his ears, but he immediately schooled his expression. He couldn’t quite hide the corners of his mouth twitching as he fought back a smile.

“When did I smile?”

“You didn’t. Anyway, let’s just keep going like this.”

Jeok Cheongang already knew that I had opened my Middle Dantian. He considered it for a moment, then smacked his lips.

“Damn it. Even so, I hate water. Looks like this old man will be suffering in his twilight years.”

“…”

Had he been a Fire Pokémon in his previous life?

At this point, maybe he should change his sobriquet from the Fire King to Charizard.

“What’s with that disrespectful look?”

“Me? When?”

“Forget it. It isn’t the first or second time, anyway. It was my mistake for expecting manners from an uncouth little brat like you.”

Jeok Cheongang clicked his tongue and turned toward Jin Wikyung.

“You heard everything, didn’t you?”

“Yes. We will see to it that you suffer no inconvenience.”

“So what are you planning to do after taking this miserable Yangtze to Hubei? There must be a reason worth enduring all this trouble.”

“We have an important matter to attend to.”

“An important matter?”

“Would it be all right if I told you later?”

Jeok Cheongang narrowed his eyes, but that was all.

If Jin Wikyung was speaking that way, it meant the matter was confidential—something better discussed with fewer ears around.

Jeok Cheongang might not care what other people thought, but that didn’t mean he was oblivious.

“Understood. Then are we finished here?”

Jin Wikyung politely clasped his hands.

“Thank you for your hard work.”

But one person was dissatisfied with the outcome of this brief meeting.

“W-wait a moment. Are you saying you intend to take our Water Dragon Stronghold’s swift ship all the way to Hubei?”

Jin Wikyung was about to answer the ship’s owner, Mu Song, when Jeok Cheongang stepped between them.

“Is there a problem?”

“G-Great Hero Jeok, Hubei is much too far. Even with a favorable wind, it will take more than seven days and nights…”

“You can’t leave the stronghold empty for that long?”

“Yes, yes! Exactly!”

“A body is no good if the torso and limbs are intact but the head is missing. That would be a problem.”

“Does that mean…?”

“Go as far as Sichuan.”

Mu Song’s face brightened.

“Thank you!”

“Leave the ship behind.”

“What?”

“Do you expect this old man to continue in a skiff? We can find sailors along the way. Leave this swift ship or whatever it’s called, then go back.”

Mu Song fell silent for a moment before managing to speak.

“Well…”

“What?”

“Now that I think about it, it would be better for my subordinates and me to escort you and see to your every need.”

“Good heavens, there’s really no need. I already feel bad about burning one of your ships. I’m not sure whether I should impose upon you like this.”

“…Please don’t set anything else on fire.”

“That depends on how you behave.”

Was this the tyranny of a major corporation?

In all my life, this was the first time I had ever felt sorry for a river bandit.

Mu Song clasped his hands and withdrew with a sorrowful expression.

Cheongpung quietly approached him and held out the dumpling in his hand.

Just how much had he stuffed down his throat in the meantime? Both cheeks were already on the verge of bursting.

“‘Ave one.”

“…Are you telling me to eat it? Are you giving it to me?”

“Yeah!”

Feeling the warmth of human kindness for the first time in ages, Mu Song’s eyes grew misty.

“Thank you, Young Hero Cheongpung.”

Then he stuffed the cold dumpling into his mouth in one bite.

Cheongpung swallowed what he had been chewing and smiled brightly.

“Tasty, right?”

“It truly is. It’s the best dumpling I’ve had lately. I’ll have to get some from you now and then.”

“That was the last one.”

“What? You gave me the last dumpling? Young Hero Cheongpung, you…”

“My grandpa told me that when you have something good, you should share it with other people.”

Considering how much he had eaten by himself until now, it sounded like complete bullshit. But Mu Song didn’t know that, and he was deeply moved.

“Thank you, Young Hero Cheongpung. We’ve barely even spoken, yet you’ve gone out of your way to do this for me. I didn’t know that… Sniff.”

Mu Song’s gratitude did not last long.

“My grandpa told me something else too. Whoever eats the last dumpling has to buy the next batch!”

“…”

“…”

“If we travel for one more day, we’ll reach a place called Guang’an. The dumplings sold in the market there are really good. When I traveled around the world for a year, I stayed there for a whole month because of those dumplings. Ah, no, that’s not what I meant. Grandpa said we absolutely had to stop there! He said whoever ate the last dumpling had to buy a whole bunch more!”

“…”

“…”

What a terrifying little bastard.

Now he was even selling out his grandfather to get more dumplings.

Gung Gibang, who had been watching the scene, muttered that Cheongpung would make an excellent Beggars’ Sect disciple.

Mu Song, now doomed to stop at the famous dumpling shop in Guang’an, answered with every last scrap of trust in humanity drained from his face.

“Understood.”

“Yay! Grandpa will be happy!”

Was that even human?

I was still horrified by the bottomless depths of his character when—

“You don’t look well. May I examine you for a moment?”

Fucking pushover—no, Mungyeong was looking at me with concern.

He had a large acupuncture needle hidden in one hand, pressed right against my waist.

“Uh, no. No, I’m fine. I’m not feeling—”

“You don’t look well. May I examine you for a moment?”

“I’m really fi—”

“You don’t look well. May I examine you for a moment?”

“…”

It was humiliating, but I think I just pissed myself a little.

Chapter 437

As its name suggested, a swift ship was built with speed as its top priority.

If an ordinary warship was a heavyweight, then a swift ship was closer to a welterweight.

Naturally, its hull wasn't particularly large, which meant there weren't many places aboard where you could avoid everyone else's eyes.

"Oh, dear."

"Great Hero Jin. What brings you here?"

Two river bandits who had been slacking off at the stern under the pretense of standing guard recognized me and bowed obsequiously.

I nodded gravely and opened my mouth.

"Save me…"

At that moment, something sharp poked me right in the Mingmen acupoint at the small of my back.

"Save—stay alert as you go."

"What?"

"I said, stay alert as you go. I need to discuss something with this fellow for a moment."

"Oh, I see."

No. Don't agree. Please be suspicious.

I continued speaking while shooting an urgent sidelong glance at Mungyeong, who was pressed against my side.

"Be sure to take care on your way! If anyone asks about me, tell them I'm with Mungyeong!"

"Uh, understood."

"No, not 'understood.' Oh, right! My master! If my master comes looking for me…"

"I don't think that's likely."

Mungyeong cut me off with an innocent smile.

"It seems there's something urgent to discuss with Great Hero Jin Wikyung. In any case, we've only come to see a patient for a moment, so please don't concern yourself with us. Go on and rest in the cabin. I'll let you know afterward."

"Works for us."

Nothing was sweeter than authorized slacking in the middle of a boring guard shift.

[2069] Sound Transmission is a martial-arts technique for sending words privately to a chosen listener.

The river bandits smiled and left, delighted to lounge in the cool shade. As for the Sound Transmission[2069] I was preparing to send as a last resort, a single sentence from Mungyeong stopped me cold.

"You seem to have three or four lives."

"…"

"You have two choices. Answer every question this old man asks from now on, or, if you'd rather not, quietly keep your mouth shut."

I asked, just in case.

"What happens if I choose the second option?"

"You'll go to Hubei."

"That doesn't sound too ba—"

Mungyeong calmly continued before I could finish.

"You'll drift all the way to Hubei while sunk at the bottom of the Yangtze. Quietly."

"…I thought you said you'd stopped killing."

"That depends on this old man's will. It's none of your concern."

What the fuck? It isn't like he's trying to quit smoking…

Dumbfounded, I protested again.

"You're the Divine Physician. Are you really threatening to kill me?"

"I'm the former Divine Physician. I passed that name on to my Disciple long ago. So? What's your answer?"

I glared at Mungyeong.

"Do you really think I'll give in to a threat like this?"

"Of course."

"You read me perfectly. I'll answer every question with the utmost sincerity."

"…"

Mungyeong seemed momentarily at a loss for words. After a long silence, he finally spoke.

