I looked around. Just as I'd expected, most people were staring at me like I was crazy.

Naturally. I'd caused a scene at the most important moment, hurled curses at a Senior, and now I was telling an ice cream story nobody had asked for.

Their expressions were so funny that I laughed again.

"Anyway, that's all."

At the same time, I drew up my internal energy and stamped my foot down hard.

"Don't—!"

Crack! Crunch!

Michael Silbert's belated shout vanished beneath the roar.

In the split second when nobody could stop me, I completely crushed the center of the round table, a place set aside for just one man. Then I looked at the faces staring at me in shock.

"After thinking about it, I realized that seat was just like that ice cream. If nobody was greedy, there'd be nothing to get angry about. But the greedy ones always step forward and cause trouble."

Of course, the difference between ice cream and the World Hunter Federation was beyond comparison.

Their importance in this world. And… the scale of what that greed had caused.

People had died because of that greed.

Hundreds of thousands of people had lost their families and friends, their homes and their hopes.

After paying such a high price, all they'd gained was despair and fear.

So what made that seat any different from the ice cream?

It was ridiculous. And it left me feeling hollow.

I spoke to the hundreds of people staring at me in shock.

"Everyone, listen."

No. I was speaking to Michael Silbert.

"The Stone-King is a monster."

That one casually tossed-out line swallowed everyone whole and exploded.

Chapter 779

For a moment, the world seemed to stop.

If not for the camera flashes blinking at regular intervals and the ticking of second hands, people might have thought time really had frozen.

But the silence didn't last long.

"He's crazy."

The words came from somewhere in the room.

Countless others looked back and forth between Jin Taekyung and the Stone-King, laughing in disbelief.

They couldn't help it. Everyone here knew who the Stone-King was.

No—ask anyone on the street, and they'd know, too.

An S-rank Hunter with United States citizenship who had appeared out of nowhere like a comet.

As skilled as he was handsome, he was always at Jin Taekyung's side. That had drawn attention from the start, and he'd distinguished himself in several major incidents.

He'd faced criticism alongside Jin for taking part in the operation against the terrorists in the so-called "vigilante incident." But most agreed that his contributions far outweighed anything held against him.

And now the Stone-King—a young hero of the new generation who had even earned a seat at the round table—was a monster?

Instead of confusion, disbelieving laughter spread through the room.

"Enough with the nonsense."

Speaking up once was hard. After that, it got easier.

Those who had held their tongues out of respect for Jin Taekyung's strength and standing began to raise their voices.

"Young man, we've let you go on long enough. Aren't you taking this too far?"

"Jin, I respect you as a fellow Hunter, but… you owe us a proper explanation for what you've done here today."

"They said he had post-traumatic stress disorder. Looks like it was true."

The fuse was burning down fast.

Even the elders who had looked favorably on Jin from the start murmured uneasily. Those who had already opposed him seized their chance and criticized him outright.

"Everyone, look at what he's done. He caused a disturbance while we were electing the leader of the Federation that will save humanity. He even damaged the round table."

"And now he's spouting nonsense."

“What kind of disrespect is this?”

Criticism poured in from every direction.

But Jin Taekyung, at the center of it all, addressed the room as though he hadn’t heard a word.

Once again.

Without changing a single word.

“The Stone-King is a monster.”

“That’s all you have to say? The same nonsense again?”

“He’s crazy. Completely crazy.”

Jin Taekyung slowly looked around.

Some laughed in disbelief. Some frowned. Others watched with grave, steady eyes.

Their reactions varied, but the words that came from Jin Taekyung’s mouth did not.

“The Stone-King is a monster.”

“What is this—!”

“Strip him of his qualifications at once!”

The criticism had become shouting. Jin paid it no mind and opened his mouth again.

“The Stone-King is…”

As if those were the only words he knew. As if imprinting that one fact on their minds were his sole purpose in life.

Without pause, ignoring every gaze and every accusation pouring toward him.

Calmly, he repeated the truth that might become his greatest weakness, looking straight at Michael Silbert—the one man who had remained silent through the uproar around the enormous round table.

“A monster.”

For the third time.

The mocking smiles faded as people watched him repeat the words like a machine.

The shouts stopped. So did the pointing fingers. No one moved or spoke.

Silence settled over the room.

And in that silence, too complete for even the sound of someone swallowing, a realization came to them.

Jin Taekyung was telling the truth.

His expression. His voice. His eyes. Nothing about him suggested a lie.

And they understood what that meant.

…No way.

The same impossible question crossed everyone’s mind.

At the same time, hundreds of pairs of eyes turned toward one person.

No—toward something that might not be a person at all.

The Stone-King.

The handsome American was still sitting where he had been all along. But they could see it. They could feel it.

The slight trembling of his eyes and the faint fear seeping through them. The certainty that this was the answer to their question.

Then the truth they had finally accepted came with an enormous unseen shock that swept through the room like a wave.

No. Like a hammer.

"…!"

"…!"

Everyone stared, mouths agape.

What was reflected now in roughly three hundred pairs of wide-open eyes was neither a handsome young man nor an S-rank Hunter with outstanding skills and Fame.

There stood a cursed being who could never coexist with humanity, one who had once driven mankind to the brink of disaster.

"…A monster."

Someone's mutter, almost a groan, broke the silence.

Clang, clang, clang!

Hundreds of weapons flashed beneath the lights of the vast hall.

The radiance of Aura—the power God had given humanity—spread in every direction before turning toward a single being.

With it came killing intent so palpable it seemed one could touch it.

Ssssss.

A wind whipped up from somewhere. In the freezing air, countless needle-sharp gazes pierced the Stone-King.

Everyone here had been chosen by God for the sole purpose of fighting monsters, and given the name Hunter by humanity.

From the beginning, they had had only one duty.

Kill monsters.

Whoooosh.

Hundreds of surging powers and killing intent joined, pressing down on the hall and bearing toward their target—

"Stop!"

Bang!

The shout roared like a wild beast. Its deep resonance found a gap in that split second and scattered everything like mist.

The faces of the people who had been ready to swing their weapons went rigid.

What the hell…

A place awash in killing intent and mana was as good as a death trap.

But the voice's owner had broken that flow. At the very last moment, just as an attack was about to be unleashed, he had slipped through an invisible gap.

And he'd done it with ease.

Step. Step.

The low thud of footsteps broke the suffocating silence.

As one young man cut through the mountain of sabers and forest of swords formed by countless weapons and stood in front of everyone, an elder Hunter with a full head of white hair spoke with a stern expression.

"What are you doing?"

Recognizing the elder, Jin Taekyung answered respectfully.

"I'm doing what I have to do, Senior."

"And what you have to do is… protect that monster?"

"I do."

At Jin's unhesitating reply, the elder Hunter asked with an expression of disbelief.

"Why?"

"Because he's my friend."

"…Your friend?"

"He's also a comrade-in-arms who saved my life. I have to protect him, just as he protected me."

Friend? Comrade-in-arms?

No one had imagined hearing those words used for a monster. While they struggled to respond, a voice rose from the encirclement that had formed around Jin.

"If you're going that far, there's no need to hear anything more."

A shining suit of full armor. A massive war hammer in his hand.

The middle-aged man stepped forward, radiating a weighty aura and an oppressive presence. His eyes were on Jin Taekyung, but he addressed the whole room.

"This is treason against humanity. An unforgivable betrayal. You know the punishment, don't you?"

Jin Taekyung nodded.

"Of course."

"Good. Then, as of this moment, your Hunter qualifications are revoked. The traitor will be executed on the spot."

Rumble.

A dense glow gathered in layers around the war hammer.

He was an S-rank Hunter who had fought since the Great Cataclysm, a man who had made the Kronos Guild one of the world's top ten Guilds.

But Jin Taekyung's response went far beyond anything the onlookers expected.

"Fuck, don't be so damn ridiculous."

"What?"

"That speech was so long-winded I couldn't even follow every stupid point. But first, I want to ask you one thing."

Jin Taekyung fixed a cold gaze on the Guild Master of the Kronos Guild.

"If you were going to throw this kind of fit, why did you treat me like a lunatic just now?"

"That's…"

"That's what?"

The Guild Master of the Kronos Guild fell silent.

So did everyone else who had heard the question.

Jin had struck a nerve.

They'd dismissed his words as nonsense from the start. Through all their criticism, he had quietly told them the same thing three times.

Until the smiles vanished. Until they realized it was true.

But why hadn't they believed him, when he'd meant every word?

The answer was simple.

Perhaps it was a truth they had known all along and could only pretend not to see.

"Let's be honest. Now that you know the truth, you don't want to accept it. That the guy sitting over there—a monster, of all things—has fought harder for humanity than some of the assholes here who have no business being at this table."

"…!"

"Though I get it, too. Who'd believe the Stone-King was a monster just because I said so? Right?"

No one answered. Jin Taekyung smiled.

"This is a black comedy if I've ever seen one. There are assholes everywhere who aren't even human, but the guy who nearly worked himself to death trying to save one more person is standing at death's door the moment his identity comes out."

Cold flames flickered in the young man's eyes, visible above his raised smile.

Countless weapons surrounded them. As he looked at that forest of blades, poised to come flying at any moment, the emotion rising inside him had a name: anger and bitterness.

"I didn't want this. I wasn't asking for much. I just… thought you'd give me enough time to explain."

Jin Taekyung's voice sounded hollow.

Of course he understood. Many of them must have lost people close to them to monsters.

He had, too.

But… even so, something churned inside him.

He felt sorry for the Skeleton King, who had fought while sacrificing himself for humanity. He felt bitter watching those people try to kill him without a moment's hesitation, and his anger rose when he realized how many of them still showed outright hostility, even in this situation.

Because he knew their hostility wasn't only about his calling the Skeleton King—a monster—his friend and comrade-in-arms.

He knew where that hostility was aimed, what it was meant to accomplish, and who stood behind those people, using them like puppets.

Step.

Jin Taekyung started forward.

The Guild Master of the Kronos Guild was the first to grasp what the movement meant. He moved to swing his war hammer like a bolt of lightning.

Or he would have, if a voice hadn't reached his ear.

"You'd better stop there, Fabian."

Rumble.

The air trembled.

The Guild Master of the Kronos Guild turned toward the towering Black man who had risen from his seat. His expression hardened.

"Johnson."

"Been a while. Age has made you even more charming."

Magic Johnson winked and gestured with his staff toward the war hammer rippling with Aura.

"Whoa. Don't do anything rash. Take it from a comrade-in-arms who's risked his life fighting beside you."

"Do you know what your actions mean right now?"

"Of course. You don't have to tell me. We know exactly where we're going from here."

"…We?"

Fabian repeated the word without thinking. Then he saw the answer for himself.

Rustle. Thud.

People rose from their seats—some quietly, some noisily, some with an air of dignity.

The Guild Master of the Kronos Guild's gaze darkened as he took in those familiar, distinguished faces.

Magic Johnson. Chuck Hagel. Faye Chen. Prince Felix.

And then Choi Minwoo, whose symbolic significance as Cheon Taemin's only blood relative was unmistakable. Finally, even the Stone-King, who had been watching the weapons aimed at him with a hard expression, stood up.

This is bad. It's already beyond the range Michael predicted.

But the greatest surprise was the young man who had reached him.

"Move."

"I can't—"

"I said move."

"…!"

For the first time in a long while, a chill sank into the Guild Master of the Kronos Guild's bones.

It came from a young man who hadn't lived half as long as he had.

Magic Johnson's warning flashed through his mind. You'd better stop there. Don't do anything rash.

He understood, too, who that warning had been for.

Step.

By the time he came to his senses, it was already too late. The Guild Master of the Kronos Guild instinctively shifted to the side, and Jin Taekyung walked on as if that were only natural.

Half of the roughly three hundred people surrounding them tried to stop him, then found themselves making way without knowing why. Of those who remained, half merely watched; others closed around Jin as if to escort him.

Amid the frozen air and mounting tension, two men faced each other again at the center of the round table.

Jin Taekyung and Michael Silbert.

Michael Silbert and Jin Taekyung.

Their gazes met and flared—cold yet fiery, fiery yet cold.

A voice rang out clearly enough for everyone to hear.

"Do you know what consequences your actions today, and the truth you've revealed, will bring?"

"Hard to say. I guess all kinds of assholes will come after me now."

Jin Taekyung added calmly, "And the worst of them is standing right in front of me."

A muscle twitched in Michael Silbert's cheek.

His composure had begun to falter the moment Jin Taekyung revealed the truth to everyone.

But it was fine. It was fine.

The throne was still there.

Once the vote began, the place where he sat would become the throne.

Jin Taekyung, on the other hand, had no seat left at this round table.

Soon, he would have no place anywhere in the world.

“I can tell you one thing for certain. Now that the Stone-King’s identity has been revealed, I’m afraid the World Hunter Federation’s first vote will be on your permanent expulsion.”

“Really? Why?”

“If he truly was unlike an ordinary monster, and you’d told us immediately, everyone—including me—would have given it careful thought. But it’s too late. You hid a secret this serious. No one can trust you now.”

“Too bad. Go on.”

“Everything will proceed through legal channels. Those involved will be formally charged and put on trial. And if they resist…”

Michael Silbert continued, his voice raised as if to call out to everyone.

“They’ll be executed on the spot.”

A suffocating silence followed.

But the moment he slowly turned his head toward Jin Taekyung, Michael Silbert could hear a thunderous sound echoing through it.

Thump.

His heart dropped.

Thump. Thump-thump.

His heartbeat quickened. Jin Taekyung’s eyes curved like crescents, their gaze piercing the center of his chest like an awl.

What was it? Why was it?

Why was that bastard smiling even in a situation like this?

Why?

“There’s something I want to ask.”

The world seemed to slow.

His pounding heart and trembling pulse filled his ears. Every one of his senses, fixed on Jin Taekyung, caught the words that followed.

“What if you hadn’t colluded with a monster, but…”

Michael Silbert swallowed as Jin’s words trailed off. Then a quiet remark shook his world.

“You were already no different from one? What would happen then?”

“…!”

No—it shook everyone’s world.

With a contemptuous gaze fixed on something neither human nor monster, Jin delivered one final line.

“Has the wound on your neck healed, Michael?”

Chapter 780

The world was full of events and the possibilities that followed them.

The problem was that none of those possibilities was certain.

No matter how far civilization advanced, no matter how deeply cutting-edge science reached into realms once beyond its grasp, there was no such thing as absolute, one-hundred-percent certainty.

Especially where people, rather than machines, were concerned.

But at this moment—

“Has the wound on your neck healed, Michael?”

Looking at his trembling gray eyes, I was certain.

The unbelievable question that had begun with the tiniest clue had finally revealed its dark shape.

At last, I’d driven Michael Silbert to the edge of a cliff.

But I wiped the smile from my lips. My disgust for the man before me outweighed any pleasure I took in turning the tables.

I despised everything about that man steeped in gray.

“You filthy piece of shit.”

My voice broke the silence.

Unlike when I’d revealed the Skeleton King’s identity, not one person in the room laughed at me this time.

No. They hadn’t fully understood what they’d just heard.

Or perhaps they couldn’t bring themselves to accept a truth so far beyond anything they’d imagined.

“What… what the hell does that mean?”

The Guild Master of Kronos. I kept my eyes on Michael Silbert as I answered.

“Ask him yourself.”

In the suffocating silence, hundreds of pairs of eyes turned toward Michael Silbert. Among those watching were his supporters—some I’d identified through my investigation, and some I hadn’t.

“You were all kissing his ass from every angle earlier. Guess nobody bothered telling you what was really going on. Well, I can see why. Can’t you?”

Michael Silbert didn’t answer. He simply stared at me.

His gray eyes were still unsettled, and I could almost read the thoughts racing through his head.

But—

“Don’t strain yourself trying to figure it out. You already know, don’t you?”

Once all the equations lined up, the answer was clear.

"Michael Silbert."

I felt as if I'd finally found my way out of a maze I'd wandered for ages.

Beyond the walls that had hemmed me in on every side, someone waited at the exit.

A gray monster who'd lingered somewhere between light and darkness, then crossed a river from which there was no return.

The last edge of the veil hiding what he really was.

"You…"

I let out the breath I'd been holding.

"You're fucked now."

Michael Silbert found himself wondering when things had started going wrong. How? Where?

But no matter how hard he thought, he couldn't find an answer.

Everything that had led to this moment came down to one person. Even if Michael found an answer, the man before him would surely create another variable.

Jin Taekyung.

Another name for endless variables.

An Eastern young man far too young, reckless, and frivolous to stand in his way.

Yet Michael Silbert could no longer deny it.

That young man wasn't merely an obstacle to be removed. He was another wall Michael should have broken down at all costs.

Such heat.

The heat in those black eyes.

At the same time, the wound on the back of Michael's neck—still there like a brand—burned with pain.

Tap.

Without realizing it, Michael Silbert reached for his neck.

But when his fingertips met the cold armor that covered it all the way up to his throat, hiding the wound, a dry laugh escaped him.

Excuses? Damage control?

Meaningless now. They would only make him look pathetic.

As a single drop of water could split a rock, one palm-sized bottle of potion was enough to bring down the mountain that was Michael Silbert.

Now that my body can no longer accept the mana in a potion, no excuse will do me any good.

But one question remained.

How had Jin Taekyung learned the secret? And what had made him willing to use a double-edged sword fraught with danger and uncertainty against Michael?

So instead of making excuses, Michael Silbert asked.

“I’ll ask you one thing. How did you find out?”

“…!”

The question was brief, but the shock it sent through the room was immense.

“What… what did you just say?”

“G-Guild Master…”

His words were as good as an admission. The people most shaken were those who had supported Michael Silbert most fervently.

He didn’t so much as glance at his allies, frozen like statues. Just as Jin Taekyung had revealed the truth amid their accusations, Michael repeated himself.

“I asked how you found out.”

The answer was shorter than the question.

“Siegfried Bassmann.”

“Siegfried?”

“Yeah. Turns out the man investigated all sorts of things before he died.”

Whoosh!

A sheet of paper shot through the air like an arrow. Michael Silbert caught it between two fingers and murmured the title written at the top.

“…The Compatibility of Mana and Magical Power.”

“They say he was the greatest monster scholar of his age, even before you count his being a Grand Mage. Looks like he researched just about everything.”

“There shouldn’t have been any research material left.”

“Sure. That’s what people knew.”

Michael Silbert looked down at the paper in his hand. His gray eyes darted across it; he read and understood the entire page in an instant.

“Studying whether a human body could take in a monster’s magical power and coexist with it. Sounds like the sort of insane idea only an eccentric like Siegfried Bassmann would pursue. Of course…”

Jin Taekyung’s low voice reached his ears.

“That wouldn’t have been true for you.”

Michael Silbert raised his head. The paper, now badly crumpled in his grip, caught fire.

Fwoosh. Crumble.

Ash drifted through the air. Beyond it, the eyes that had gone cold now held a reddish glow.

“Looks like Siegfried Bassmann wondered about it too. But even he never managed to prove it. Or maybe he stopped because he thought he’d crossed a taboo.”

Jin Taekyung watched the ash drift toward him and continued.

“Maybe he decided material like this shouldn’t be left behind. Or maybe whoever killed him wanted it gone. Either way, almost nothing remained of that research. It took me a while to find this.”

“You think that’s why I killed him?”

“At first.”

“At first?”

“Yeah. But you killed Siegfried Bassmann for another reason.”

“I won’t deny it. But I’d like to know why you think so.”

“Simple. You’re not careless enough to leave research material like this behind.”

Michael Silbert stared at Jin Taekyung for a moment, then laughed aloud.

“I appreciate that. I’d have been disappointed if even you took me for an idiot.”

“Don’t thank me. I took you for a fucking bastard instead.”

“But you still haven’t given me a clear answer. This material alone couldn’t have been enough to make you suspect me.”

“No, it was enough.”

“Why?”

“When a crime happens, it’s only natural to suspect the ex-convict who lives nearby first.”

“…!”

“I was looking over what little research remained when the thought struck me.”

Jin Taekyung turned his head with a contemptuous sneer.

Now that the truth behind the Grand Mage’s death—long a mystery—had come to light, the stunned crowd stood frozen, watching the two men.

“What if Michael Silbert, that fucking bastard, was already as good as half human and half demon? What if he’d made that absurd research a reality?”

In the utter silence, Jin Taekyung recalled the moment the thought had first come to him.

Before hundreds of watching eyes and listening ears, on a stage someone else had planned meticulously from beginning to end, he spoke as though he stood alone in the spotlight.

“And then… every piece finally fell into place.”

That possibility, one no one else had considered, was the last piece of the complicated puzzle.

It explained how Michael Silbert had recognized the Skeleton King for what he was.

How a man who'd been just one hero among hundreds during the Great Cataclysm had risen from the dragon's tail to its head.

Why the Odin Guild's growth had begun when Cheon Taemin disappeared, and why Michael hadn't shown his face even at Lee Jungryong's funeral, where prominent figures from around the world had gathered.

All of it came down to one thing.

"Magical power."

Jin Taekyung slowly turned around. Looking into the gray eyes that no longer wavered, he continued.

"I don't know how it happened or what gave you the chance, but… you were able to grow stronger by absorbing magical power. Just like a monster."

Yet Michael also held mana within himself. He had perfectly controlled and concealed the balance between the two energies, so no one had discovered what he was.

Not even the Skeleton King.

Whenever they spoke of Michael Silbert, the Skeleton King habitually called him an "unpleasant human." Even he, a monster, couldn't quite say what he meant by it.

If there was one person in the world Michael Silbert feared above all others, one person from whom he had to hide his true nature, it was—

"Cheon Taemin. He would've seen right through you."

As Jin Taekyung's low voice reached everyone in the room, a pair of dry lips parted, breaking the long silence.

"Yes. Because of him, I had to keep my head down for many years. Almost as many as you've been alive."

More than thirty years had passed, but Michael Silbert still remembered it vividly.

He had only recently gained his new power. Amid a great gathering of people, that supreme being's gaze had fixed precisely on him. Fear had gripped his entire body.

Back then, he'd possessed such a tiny amount of magical power that the man hadn't looked his way again. But the fear of that day had never truly faded.

Even after time had passed and Cheon Taemin had vanished. Even after Michael had learned the secrets of Zone A from Siegfried Bassmann.

He hadn't even attended Lee Jungryong's funeral.

The information he had might have been wrong. Cheon Taemin—the only person who could see through him—might have been there.

But…

"There's one thing you've got wrong."

Speaking quietly, Michael Silbert awakened the enormous energy dormant deep within him.

That unprecedented, turbulent power in which light and darkness had mingled for years—but which, from a certain day onward, had been stained a deeper and deeper shade by the swelling darkness.

“The only person in this world I fear isn’t here right now.”

Rumble, rumble, rumble.

A vast wave of force rose and pressed down on everything around them.

Chapter 781

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

A roar shook everything around us.

At the same time, murky energy—light and darkness mixed together—poured out, engulfed the room, and hung over everyone's heads.

Dark.

It was far too early for the sun to have set, yet the National Assembly building had already turned the first page of night.

A night without a bright moon or stars scattered across the sky.

And yet, in a haze fainter than moonlight, someone radiated a presence clearer than anything else.

Step. Step.

The air shifted with each slow step he took.

No, the air wasn't the only thing that had changed.

His gray eyes were slowly turning black, like ink spreading through water.

The characteristically pale skin of a white man was covered in a thin membrane like leather, and his entire body—now longer and thicker—seemed to radiate strength and elasticity unlike anything he'd shown before.

As if…

He wasn't human.

And yet, he wasn't a monster, either.

The immense energy pouring from his body clearly held mana within it.

So what should I call that bastard—Michael Silbert?

His slow footsteps finally stopped.

My face, twisted with contempt, was reflected in his eyes, where darkness rippled.

"You monstrous bastard."

I probably wasn't the only one thinking that.

Shock spread across hundreds of faces.

The best fighters from countries all around the world had gathered here, but no one dared to speak or move.

Every one of them had reached a high realm. They could feel just how vast—and terrifyingly powerful—the aura Michael Silbert was giving off.

And with it, they understood the true meaning of what he'd said earlier.

The only person I fear isn't here right now.

Even I had to admit it, at least to myself.

Michael Silbert hadn't been arrogant after all.

No matter how vile and impure the source of his power was, its sheer scale was beyond anything I'd faced before.

If I had to name one person who came close, it would be the Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

But for all their similarities, there was a clear difference between them.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress was constantly supplied with magical power flowing from the rift.

Michael Silbert, on the other hand, had found a way to make magical power coexist with mana—and had made it entirely his own.

Just how much magical power has he absorbed?

I fixed my eyes on Michael Silbert, my gaze sinking deep.

Something that was no longer human, but wasn't a monster, either.

A monster that had spent decades building up its power while evading the notice of an absolute being stood before me.

Now he was revealing every last bit of the strength he'd kept hidden.

With a predator's smile, he looked at me and everyone else before opening his tightly closed lips.

"I told you. As long as he's not here, no one can stop me now."

The air had gone cold. Eyes wavered around the room.

But not everyone here was overwhelmed by Michael Silbert's aura.

"You've gotten a lot better at joking since I last saw you, Michael."

Whoooosh.

A gust of wind suddenly swept through the room.

No—it wasn't wind. It was so much mana that it felt like wind.

Dense smoke rose behind Magic Johnson, who had slung his staff over his shoulder like a steel pipe.

Crackle.

The last stub of his cigar was crushed beneath a military boot. Revived by a fresh dose of nicotine, Chuck Hagel spat out a glob of phlegm.

Flames streamed from his eyes as he glared at Michael Silbert.

"Say that again. Go on, you damned neo-Nazi bastard."

And he wasn't the only one.

Faye Chen had already drawn her bow, and Prince Felix unsheathed an ornate longsword set with brilliant jewels, his bearing full of dignity.

Team Leader Choi, however, did something different.

Shing.

At last, the [Hero's Sword] slid free of its scabbard. He handed it to someone else.

"Please take it. It suits you better than it does me."

The recipient blinked at this unexpected gesture of goodwill, then nodded in thanks.

He silently looked at the sword in his hands before suddenly speaking.

“It’s a little late to say this, but…”

The Skeleton King.

The King of the Dead stared at Michael Silbert and continued.

“From the moment I first saw you, I’ve never liked you.”

Kiiing.

A golden line crossed the Skeleton King’s pure-white forehead, tracing out a crown.

At the same time, a chilling aura at odds with that brilliant light flowed through his body. But this time, no one raised a weapon against him.

Now that the truth was out, it was clear who their enemy was.

Shhhhh.

Weapons and dazzling radiance cut through the murky darkness, all aimed at Michael Silbert.

But the smile on his face remained.

No—it grew broader and more vivid as he spoke.

“Oh, Fabian. You too?”

“…!”

The Guild Master of Kronos, unexpectedly called by name, clenched his jaw.

His eyelids trembled, and the blade in his hand wavered.

Michael Silbert laughed heartily at his obvious agitation, then turned to the others.

“Christopher, Fernando, Joanne, Marcel, Khalid…”

The names of powerful figures spilled from his lips, one after another.

The spark Michael Silbert had struck spread from the Guild Master of Kronos to people throughout the room.

Every one of them was either the head of a major Guild or an S-rank Hunter, yet they froze like statues just from hearing their names.

Race, nationality, gender, age—they differed in every way but one.

Until just a moment ago, they’d all been Michael Silbert’s supporters.

And the ties they’d built over so many years were more tangled and weighty than anyone could imagine.

“Even the shortest of our relationships goes back more than ten years. You all feel like old friends to me. Don’t I to you?”

No one answered. Michael Silbert smiled at those frozen in place.

“If this is what you’ve chosen, I won’t stop you… but think it over once more. Think about the trust and friendship we’ve shared all these years.”

I could feel unease and confusion spreading through the room.

This wasn't simply an appeal to their affection.

Michael Silbert was pressuring the people who'd turned their backs on him.

Behind the words trust and friendship lurked the ugly secrets only those involved knew. He was using them as leverage.

The spark he'd tossed among them blazed up, feeding on the fear and anxiety hidden deep in their hearts.

Then he said something that made them forget even the little conscience they had left.

"If the whole truth came out, do you think you'd be safe?"

"…!"

"But you needn't worry. History is the spoils of the victor, after all."

Michael Silbert slowly turned his head to look at me and added,

"And not just history. The whole world."

That was the finishing blow.

And just as Fabian, the Guild Master of Kronos, led the Hunters who made up nearly half the people present in lowering their weapons—

A voice slipped from my lips, cold and unfamiliar, as if it belonged to someone else.

"Yeah. I should thank you, actually. For showing yourselves like this, at least."

"What?"

The confusion that crossed Michael Silbert's face didn't last long.

No—almost at once, someone's scream swallowed his voice.

"Argh!"

"Urgh!"

Slash! Splatter!

Fountains of blood shot up amid overlapping screams.

The ambush began on all sides the instant the weapons came down. The Guild Master of Kronos realized what was happening a moment too late and shouted,

"You fucking—!"

"I regret it too, Fabian. I'd hoped it wouldn't come to this."

Magic Johnson had already risen into the air. He answered coolly as he gripped his staff.

Vmmmm.

The air trembled.

Fire and ice filled the sky on a massive surge of mana, then plunged toward the ground like streaks of light.

Toward the traitors who had once been his comrades-in-arms.

Whoosh! Thud-thud-thud!

"St—urgh!"

Three or four A-rank Hunters, relatively weaker than the others, dropped to their knees with dying groans.

Meanwhile, the Guild Master of Kronos, who had been about to hurl his weapon at Magic Johnson in midair, found someone else standing in his way.

"You've gone completely off the rails since I last saw you. Why'd you make such a stupid choice, Fabian, you dumb son of a bitch?"

Grimy military boots. The acrid smell of cigar smoke clinging to his whole body.

The Guild Master of Kronos clenched his jaw as he faced the white man, well past middle age and nearing old age.

"Chuck Hagel."

He was no easy opponent.

No—he was dangerous.

Fabian looked back, hoping for help from his allies, but that hope was in vain.

Just a few steps away, the S-rank Hunters who'd turned to Michael Silbert's side with him were struggling against other enemies.

Faye Chen, Prince Felix, the Skeleton King—who was already raising the dead Hunters and sending them charging—and Choi Minwoo.

There wasn't a hint of hesitation in their swift movements.

"You bastards… You planned this from the start?"

"Once you start, you have to pull it up by the roots."

With a ferocious laugh, Chuck Hagel charged at the Guild Master of Kronos.

Bang!

The air burst with their collision.

But the next moment, more crashes and screams surged in from every direction like waves, drowning it out. Red blood sprayed into the air.

Right. The enemies' blood was red.

Human blood, not monster blood.

The red blood I'd never wanted to see in the world where I was born and raised soaked the National Assembly building and the enormous round table.

Maybe that was why my mouth tasted so bitter and my blood was boiling, even though I'd expected this.

Fwoosh.

The fire dragon coiled in my dantian surged up.

I felt heat like molten lava seep through every part of my body, and suddenly I spoke.

"Fucking awful sight, isn't it?"

Michael Silbert had ignored everything happening around him and watched me in silence. Instead of answering, he asked,

“Is everything happening here your doing?”

“What if it is?”

“Then I applaud your bold decision.”

Bold decision.

The words pierced something in my chest like an awl.

But I kept it off my face and answered calmly.

“Then don’t just flap your gums. Clap your hands, you dumbass.”

“Sorry, but I can’t do that.”

“Why not?”

“Because if I give you even the slightest opening, I have a feeling something will happen. Of course…”

Michael Silbert’s smile faded as he continued.

“That won’t happen.”

“Maybe. You sure about that?”

And just as silence fell for a moment—

Whoosh.

All the space between us vanished, and two immense forces shot toward each other.

Kwaaaang!

Chapter 782

Kwaaaang!

The deafening crash left my ears numb.

But before the ringing came, an enormous shock wave traveled through our hands, which had touched for only an instant.

Boom!

It felt as if a giant's palm had struck my entire body.

The irresistible force sent me flying backward. I twisted in midair, and a blade of gray energy came rushing toward my face.

Shhk!

A hair's breadth. That was all.

I snapped my head aside, and the gray energy skimmed past the tip of my nose, cleaving the ground like soft tofu. I landed lightly on the spot it had cut through.

Then I watched a man walk toward me, his entire body wrapped in gray energy.

No—something that had crossed beyond the bounds of humanity.

"Michael Silbert."

He smiled at the sound of my voice. The shadow in his deep-set dimple seemed especially dark. That wasn't just my imagination.

Crack. Crack.

The ground crumbled beneath each step he took.

The energy pouring from Michael Silbert was so overwhelming that even those fighting nearby choked on their breath and retreated as far as they could.

But not me.

I couldn't back down. I had no intention of doing so.

Just as I'd decided before coming here, I would fight.

To stop that monster strolling toward me. To keep him from hurling billions of people into the flames all over again.

I stepped forward, putting my weight into it.

Whoosh.

One step.

Wind brushed past my body, and space folded. At the same time, two keywords formed in my mind and became commands.

Inventory open. Summon.

The spear I'd hidden where no one could see it settled into my grip.

The world had slowed. Blue-white flames surged along the spearhead, painting the gray eyes where darkness rippled as I brought it down.

Michael Silbert.

Straight for the crown of that monster's head.

Fwoosh!

The concentrated heat evaporated every trace of moisture within several meters.[3146]

Through air hot enough to catch fire at a touch, I saw his eyes widen.

The corners of his mouth were still turned up, even in the face of a strike no one here could have expected.

Then—

A sword flashed upward like a streak of light and struck the spearhead of White Flame as it fell toward his crown.

Kwaang!

A deafening crash rang out, as if the sky itself had split open.

Grrrrk.

The spearhead and sword blade locked together in midair, neither giving an inch. Beyond them came a low laugh.

"So that's it. I'd been wondering why I never saw that spear."

"…!"

"Are you done with the surprise magic trick you prepared?"

Grit.

The sword, wrapped in a murky aura, slowly pushed back the flame-wreathed spearhead.

Strength no human should have possessed and a boundless, unprecedented power burst forth all at once.

Kwaaaah!

The moment I faced that immense force head-on, I knew for certain:

Even my physical abilities, pushed far beyond their limits thanks to the System, and my three jiazi[3147] of internal energy—a level no one in Murim could afford to underestimate—weren't enough to fully suppress his power.

If the fallout reaches the people around us…

I didn't need to think hard about what would happen.

At least dozens would die. Half of them would be heroes who should never die in a place like this.

I had only one option left.

Neutralize it.

With that word flashing through my mind, I let go of White Flame, flung upward by the force of the clash, and thrust out both hands without hesitation.

Flicker. Boom!

[3146] One meter is about 3.28 ft; several meters is roughly several yards.

[3147] A jiazi is a sixty-year cycle in the traditional East Asian calendar. Three jiazi equals 180 years.

The Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist with my right hand. The Flame Divine Palm with my left.

One fist and one palm.

Two branches from the same root—the Fire Gate Clan. From their tips, two streams of flame surged into the murky aura.

Grrrrk!

The tremendous recoil sent throbbing pain through my body. The ground turned over beneath my sliding feet, exposing its ugly innards in long furrows.

But I focused only on the energy in front of me, pouring the flames from both hands into the murky aura.

Not swallowing it—gnawing it away.

Not stopping it—throwing it out of balance.

At last, the mass of destructive energy visibly shrank. I twisted it with all my strength and hurled it behind me.

Whoooosh—Kwaang!

A tearing crash and tremor shook the National Assembly building.

The Skeleton King drove his Bone Sword into the chest of a traitor who had staggered off balance, then shouted, “Watch out!”

It was good advice, but half a beat too late.

Michael Silbert was already right in front of me.

Shwack!

An aura filled with murky light grazed the back of my neck.

I dodged the lightning-fast thrust and slipped inside his reach, driving a fist at him without hesitation.

Boom!

Michael Silbert blocked my Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist with a hand wrapped in layer upon layer of aura, then brought his knee up.

No—just as he was about to, he shoved me away and retreated.

Whoosh! Thwack!

A silver streak plunged from the air, piercing the exact spot where he’d stood a moment ago.

He watched me silently pull White Flame free, then smiled.

“Sure. If it were too easy, it wouldn’t be any fun.”

Fun. That was what he called it.

I looked around at the screams and the blood spraying everywhere. A disbelieving laugh escaped me.

“You crazy bastard. No matter how I look at it, you’re never going to be human again.”

“Even if I’m not human, what of it?”

"What?"

"I've experienced imbalances like this several times before. The stronger my magical power grew, the further it fell out of balance with my mana. There were even times I couldn't control the magical power I absorbed from Magic Gems. But do you know what I thought every time it happened?"

Michael Silbert didn't wait for an answer.

Hundreds of Hunters were fighting a horrific civil war in the same space, but he looked utterly at ease as he watched.

"Demon King."

"…!"

"If someone kept getting in my way. If they prevented me from reaching the pinnacle as a human… I thought becoming the new Demon King after Asmodeus wouldn't be so bad."

I stared at Michael Silbert, at a loss for words. Then I realized I needed to correct what I'd said earlier.

"…Now that I look at you again, you're not just a crazy bastard. You're completely out of your fucking mind."

"Call me whatever you like for now. By the time the sun sets, everything will be decided. Whether you and those friends of yours live or die, and the name the world will know as my true one."

The whole world already knew the name Michael Silbert.

But that wasn't what he meant by his "true name."

Depending on how this fight turned out, he could become the Alliance Leader of the World Hunter Federation—or the new Demon King.

Of course, as far as I was concerned, that was all in Michael Silbert's head.

"Idiot. What's a leech like you going to do?"

"A leech?"

"Yeah, you leeching bastard."

His face slowly stiffened. I let out a scornful laugh.

"An imugi from a clear pond ascends to heaven. Ever seen a grub wriggling in a sewer turn into a dragon? No matter how strong you get, your nature stays the same. At best, you're a mosquito or a leech."

"…!"

"A mosquito drunk on power, with a straw stuck in a Magic Gem. A useless leech that does nothing but suck people's blood. That's what you are, you pathetic bastard."

Pathetic bastard.

Those words were for me, too.

There'd been a time when I'd seriously considered giving up on everything and backing away.

If the end of his pathetic ambition was simply taking control of the World Hunter Federation, if his only goal was to stand at the top… I'd thought maybe no more disasters would happen.

It hurt.

I had the power and abilities everyone wished for, yet I couldn't save the cities collapsing into ruins or the countless people dying inside them.

It felt as though these terrible disasters were happening because I'd stood against Michael Silbert.

That was why, for a little while, I couldn't help but wonder.

No. I was afraid.

Fine. I'd admit it.

I was afraid to keep running down a path strewn with countless dead.

The closer I chased Michael Silbert, the more blood and bodies I feared I'd trample underfoot.

I thought that if I simply handed him the world, he'd stop The Prophet and every other disaster, if only to protect what had become his.

But… now I understood.

When I finally came out of that long, dark tunnel I'd walked alone in my heart, where no one else could see, there was the light I'd wanted so badly.

No. There was an answer.

All of it had come from my own weakness. My foolish hope was wrong, and Michael Silbert was a monster who wouldn't stop running even after he crossed the finish line.

That was why I had to kill him, as a human being.

"No matter how I look at it, the answer is to stomp on leeches like you until they burst. Don't you think?"

"…!"

"From now on, shut your mouth. You're wasting oxygen."

I leveled my spear at Michael Silbert.

His eyes had turned so black there was no trace of their original color. At the same time, an immense, seemingly endless power wrapped around his entire body and began to whirl.

Kwaaaah.

Everything the rising strands of power touched broke and split apart.

His voice, once gentle and unhurried, rang out as though it belonged to something from another world.

"Your corpse will be buried here today, along with every truth that will never come to light."

At his words, I looked up at the cameras installed all around us.

Half had been destroyed, but the rest were still doing their job.

The truth, huh?

I had a fair idea why Michael Silbert, who loved attention so much, wasn't broadcasting the brightest moment of his life to the whole world.

And where was that damned pet crow that always followed him like a shadow? Why was everything outside still so quiet despite all this chaos?

But right now, there was only one thing I could say to him.

"I said shut your mouth, you fucking bastard."

"You…!"

Grrrrrrk!

As I charged toward his energy, surging like waves across a boundless sea, I suddenly wondered why that immense power—enough to make even my three jiazi[3148] of internal energy feel hopelessly inadequate—didn't frighten me.

Why Michael Silbert, who'd absorbed a Magic Gem and gained physical abilities comparable to mine and a seemingly inexhaustible supply of magical power, seemed so small.

And as I thrust out the spearhead, I found the answer.

Because I'm a Hunter.

Hunters aren't afraid of their prey.

Whoooosh!

[3148] A jiazi is a sixty-year cycle in the traditional East Asian calendar. Three jiazi equals 180 years.

Chapter 783

Whoooosh!

As I charged, the spearhead flashed forward, cleaving through space. Flames surged up, burning the air and erasing the wind as they pierced the thick darkness.

Boom!

One precise point pierced the invisible flow.

Some of the magical power sweeping toward me like a wave dispersed helplessly. My vision plunged through the gap in the magical power at the same speed as my thrust—and a familiar face came into view.

No. Familiar and strange at once.

Because the Michael Silbert standing there was no longer Michael Silbert.

“Not bad.”

The moment that chilling voice reached my ears—

Shhk.

His figure vanished as if it had been erased.

My target disappeared from sight, but instead of panicking, I twisted around on instinct.

Whoosh!

A sword sprang up behind me, skimmed my side, and stabbed through empty air.

If I hadn’t dodged, it would have pierced my heart. I spun and struck with my palm.

Kwaang!

His body was supposed to be flesh and bone. Yet when our palms met, the impact sounded like an explosion.

And the shock wave hit even harder.

Grrrrk!

The ground tore up beneath my sliding feet. I was driven back several meters[3149] while Michael Silbert stood rooted to the spot. One corner of his mouth curled upward.

“Do you understand now how foolish it was to stand against me?”

Ptoo.

I spat out the blood pooled in my mouth instead of answering. Before it hit the ground, I stepped forward with all my strength.

Kwaang!

The ground shattered beneath my foot.

[3149] Several meters is roughly several yards; 1 m is about 3.28 ft.

Wind swept over me as I crossed more than ten meters[3150] in an instant. My spear and his sword flashed toward each other.

Kaaang!

The sharp clash burst the air around us. His sword had grown so long and massive it hardly looked like a sword anymore, swollen with magical power. It knocked my spearhead far aside.

Crack.

Pain shot through my wrist.

This wasn't just a difference in physical ability. It was a difference in the sheer amount of power we held.

Absorbing the Magic Gem had made Michael Silbert's body much stronger, and the magical power welling up without end reinforced it further. Of course he was pushing me back.

As long as I insisted on fighting him head-on.

Grrrrk!

I turned my spearhead in a smooth arc, and his blade slid along it.

Despite the enormous difference in force, Michael Silbert's sword slipped out of his control. My hunch confirmed, I drove a fist toward him.

Fwoosh, whoom!

Flames burst forth in a flash.

The thick darkness moved like a living creature and hurried to envelop its master, but my Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist, thrown with all my strength, burned through the magical power and slammed into his chest.

Kwaaaang!

A deafening crash rang out, and his body flew away like a cannonball.

Michael Silbert hastily flung out both arms, pouring magical power toward me to keep me back. Then he coughed up blood.

Kh-erk.

I cut down every bolt of magical power flying toward me and watched him stagger. A strange feeling stirred in me.

Not because I'd finally landed a solid hit. Because the blood spilling from his mouth was red.

"So even a monster like you is still human. For now, anyway."

Michael Silbert clenched his teeth at my mutter. His eyes trembled; he hadn't expected that blow.

"What did you do?"

I answered readily.

[3150] 10 m is about 33 ft, so the distance here is slightly greater.

“Four Ounces Deflecting a Thousand Catties.”

“What?”

“You don’t need to understand. There’s a shitload of things in this world you don’t know about anyway.”

“…!”

“So I don’t bother trying to understand, either. You, or those lunatics fighting over there—who knows what kind of fucked-up shit they got up to while working with you to end up in that fight? None of it makes any sense to me.”

I stared straight at Michael Silbert.

“No. The moment I understood it, I’d become the same kind of idiot.”

A new emotion spread across his face, over the traces of pain.

Anger. Or humiliation.

Watching his face twist felt better than I’d expected.

“I told you earlier. A leech is still a leech. It couldn’t become a dragon even if it died and came back to life.”

“You bastard…”

“Yeah. Putting everything else aside, I’ll give you one thing.”

My breath was as hot as a fire dragon’s. I stepped toward him.

“You’re the strongest leech I’ve ever met.”

With that, I hurled White Flame without hesitation, gripping it in reverse.

Bang!

The air burst in layer after layer, as if a sonic boom had gone off.

And at the end of its path stood Michael Silbert.

Kwaang! Grrrrrung!

Flame and magical power erupted together.

The stained glass, which had barely held its shape thanks to dozens of layers of defensive magic, couldn’t withstand the shock wave and shattered. I flashed through the rain of countless shards falling overhead and thrust out both palms.

Boom!

A gale of flame swept through the room.

Amid the haze left by the explosion, the shadow of someone staggering was etched clearly into my eyes.

That’s him.

No doubt about it.

I kicked off the ground and charged, reaching out to grab empty air.

No—two spears appeared as if drawn into existence by the command I shouted in my mind. I caught them and launched them once more.

Shweeeek!

Two streaks of light crossed the space between us.

When Michael Silbert twisted aside and dodged the spears, I tore through the darkness surrounding us again and closed in right in front of him.

“Jin Taekyung!”

Whooom!

Beyond his furious shout came the heavy whistle of a weapon cutting through the air.

Fed an absurd amount of magical power, the enormous blade came down as if to cleave me in two.

Shwaaaak! Shhk!

Space split open, and the sword, having missed its target, cleaved the ground.

Pain stung across my chest. I’d dodged sideways at the last moment, but the pressure behind the sword was stronger—and sharper—than I’d imagined.

His strength and speed made my hair stand on end.

But just as he had a vast store of power I could never possess, I had something he lacked.

Something more important than the amount of internal energy you held when your life was on the line.

Martial arts.

Thump! Grrrrk!

As he raised his sword again, I drew up my internal energy and stamped down.

Using the Thousand-Catty Drop, I pressed the blade beneath a crushing weight.

Michael Silbert’s eyes widened.

“…!”

A natural reaction from someone encountering martial arts for the first time. I’d been astonished every day when I first learned proper martial arts from Jeok Cheongang.

But Michael Silbert was neither my teacher nor my disciple. He was a monster I had to kill.

An enemy, plain and simple. I owed him no friendly explanation.

Fwoosh.

The Flame Divine Palm, now at the eighth stage, poured out a dreadful heat.

It was too late for him to free the hand gripping his sword. As he thrust out his other hand, I gave a command in my mind.

Inventory open. Summon.

Thwack!

Instead of a crash, blood burst out. Michael Silbert clenched his teeth at the sight of the dagger that had pierced his magical power and his palm.

His eyes bulged, pain mingling with some realization I couldn’t read.

"This is…!"

Meticulous as he was, Michael Silbert might already have suspected I had an Inventory.

But I was stronger than he thought—and even better at improvising.

Even if he'd guessed, it wouldn't have changed much.

The amount of internal energy you have is only one factor in deciding who lives and who dies.

The powerful opponents who'd fallen at my hands could serve as witnesses, prosecutors, and judges all at once.

Some called me the greatest young prodigy and the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon. Others called me a lucky man who'd suddenly gained tremendous power through reawakening.

They were all wrong.

I'd been an F-rank Hunter, born in muddy water. I'd struggled and grown through countless brushes with death.

I would keep struggling with all my might until every bit of dirt filling this pit around me was gone. Until it finally became a clear pond.

And yet… I couldn't hand my pond over to some leech. Not a mantis, not a toad—a leech.

Especially one that would fill it with blood instead of muddy water.

Thrust, thrust-thrust!

My hand flashed.

Still clutching Michael Silbert's hand, pierced by the dagger, I summoned another weapon from my Inventory and slashed, stabbed, twisted, and drove it into him wherever I could.

"Graaah!"

Blood sprayed from his wide-open mouth. At the same time, the hand that had belatedly let go of the sword hilt drove into my side like a battering ram.

Whoom!

The air whistled with a weight that made my skin crawl.

He had the magical power of two or three S-rank monsters combined and enough raw strength to tear a large monster apart with his bare hands.

The System had given me a body like steel, but I wouldn't come away unscathed if that blow landed.

At least, if I did nothing.

Inventory open. Summon.

Crack!

The impact jolted my upper body. I heard bones shift, and a little blood welled into my mouth.

But that was all.

Michael Silbert's desperate punch had neither split my skin nor broken my bones.

It had only damaged part of the red-tinged armor that had appeared around my upper body.

Beep.

> System Part of the Fire Dragon Armor has been destroyed!
>
> Current damage: 44%
>
> At 90% damage or higher, it will be recalled to the Inventory and enter automatic repair mode.

As the alert sounded in my ears, I smiled brightly at Michael Silbert, who had frozen in a daze.

"Mm-hmm. I can just repair it~"

"…!"

And in that instant—

Ptoo!

I spat the blood pooled in my mouth into his face.

As he flailed instinctively, his face drenched in blood, I drove my fist into him.

Like hammering a nail farther into the ground.

Kwaang! Grrrrk!

A heavy crash and tremor swept in all directions. The ground around us sank into a vast crater. At its bottom, Michael Silbert lay sprawled, coughing up blood after my Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist struck him squarely in the chest.

"Khk, k-kergh…!"

The blood he coughed up pooled in the crater.

His armor had long since been smashed to pieces. Blood and soot had stained his once-pale skin dark red.

"…You fucking idiot."

I smiled bitterly. When I reached out, White Flame's shaft shot into my grasp.

Without hesitation, I raised the spearhead.

Whoosh!

Chapter 784

Shwoosh!

It was strange.

I'd only raised my spear. So where had that whistle cutting through the air beside my ear come from?

And what the hell gave those idiots the confidence to charge at me?

In that brief instant, split into even smaller fragments, I turned and brought my spearhead down.

Whooom. Kaang!

The pressure bursting along the spearhead knocked away a dozen or so daggers. At the same moment, two swords came slashing in from either side, aiming for my upper and lower body at once.

Shhk, slice!

It burned like I'd been scalded.

An alert sounded to tell me the durability of my Fire Dragon Armor had dropped, and a considerable stream of blood gushed from my thigh.

Still, that was a decent price for fending off a surprise attack by three S-rank Hunters.

Even more so if I'd given as good as I got, instead of being the only one to take a hit.

Pshaaa!

Blood sprayed belatedly, soaking the ground. A middle-aged man and woman stared wide-eyed as they saw their comrade collapse, his chest split wide open.

"When did you—!"

"No, Fernando!"

It had all happened so quickly that I hadn't had time to see who they were. But now that I was facing them, I recognized them all too well.

S-rank Hunters who represented their respective countries and stood as symbols of humanity.

Or rather, who had.

"Well, look who it is. I know all of you."

At my greeting, tinged with a hollow laugh, the middle-aged pair swallowed hard.

Fernando Lucas, Brazil's S-rank Hunter, had made the reckless choice to aim for my chest. Even as he spilled an enormous amount of blood, he was fumbling for a potion with trembling hands.

He looked so desperate that I spoke to him in the warm voice of a romantic lead.

"Drink that, and I'll kill you."

"…!"

"But hold on until this is over and I'll get you treated. I'll even find you a nice prison. All right? Promise."

Fernando Lucas stared at me as though he'd forgotten the pain.

Then he shoved the potion into his mouth with lightning speed.

Bottle and all, without even removing the cap.

Crunch! Thud!

Shattered glass and potion poured into his open mouth.

But even a Top-Grade Potion, capable of restoring torn organs in the blink of an eye, couldn't bring back someone who was already dead.

"I told you not to drink it."

I murmured to Fernando Lucas's corpse, a hole through his forehead where my Finger Qi had struck.

The two middle-aged Hunters who'd survived him—slightly luckier and far more skilled—spoke with rigid faces.

"Did it really have to come to this?"

"It's not too late, Jin. If you stop, we'll withdraw. There's no need for any more sacrifices, is there?"

Stop? No need for more sacrifices?

For a moment, I had no words. I looked around the National Assembly, where the floor was still being stained with blood, then at Michael Silbert, sprawled there and twitching like an insect.

Finally, I looked at the two people standing in front of him and thrust out my spear.

One of the few lessons I'd learned was that I didn't have to answer every stupid thing people said.

Shhk!

They might not know martial arts, but they were S-rank Hunters with plenty of combat behind them.

They gasped and barely dodged the attack, landing in front of and behind me. The spearhead had come without warning, and their eyes had turned grave.

"So that's your answer?"

"Wait. Don't provoke him for no reason. Right now, we need to save Michael first __"

The woman had a much better grasp of the situation than the man, but she made me want to laugh just as much.

What the hell had they been doing all this time? How much had they done for things to come to this?

There'd been a time when I hadn't known anything, either.

Back when I'd gone mechanically from Gates to my goshiwon[3151] and back. I'd fought monsters for money, not out of some sense of duty as a Hunter, yet I'd still felt vaguely offended whenever I heard someone say Hunters had become corrupt.

But… now I knew too much.

There was no going back.

I didn't care what they'd accomplished or how valuable they might be in the war to come.

If we didn't cut out the tumors rooted deep in society, humanity would collapse before it could fight the monsters.

Another Lee Jungryong. Another Go Jun. Another Michael Silbert. They were right in front of me.

The moment they'd turned their weapons against us despite the ugly truth being exposed, they'd become tumors that had to be cut out.

"I already gave you a chance. The choice… was yours."

I charged without hesitation at the people I'd once admired and respected.

Shweeeek!

It was ironic. Pain tormented people, yet as death drew near, they could no longer feel it.

And… that numbness was more frightening than any terrible pain.

Ah.

Michael Silbert blinked blankly.

His lips were slightly parted, but he couldn't even groan. The strength was draining from his arms and legs, from which powerful energy had surged without pause. The blood that had soaked his body and was now sloshing around him felt dull and distant.

Damn it.

If this was how he fell, what had he lived for?

Grrk. Cough.

Instead of a hollow laugh, a bloody bubble welled in his mouth. His head tipped to the side as if he were collapsing, and he saw the corpse of a man frozen with his eyes wide open.

A familiar face.

Fernando Lucas.

[3151] A goshiwon is a Korean boarding house offering small, inexpensive rooms, often with shared facilities.

Fernando had been a gang member since childhood, a delinquent who'd won fervent support among South America's poor. Over the past ten years, Michael Silbert had done him various "favors."

The public and the courts would, of course, call those favors something else.

It started small.

But time dulled everything, and each repetition made it snowball.

He'd eliminated a powerful rival and disguised the killing as an accident. He'd used a politician with the right connections to bury tax-evasion charges. He'd even kidnapped a brave journalist and his family when the man was preparing an article about how the hero of Brazil's poor secretly ran a gang and made a fortune on the side.

The others spilling blood and dying for him throughout the chamber were no different.

No. They aren't doing this for me.

Michael Silbert knew why they fought.

They fought for themselves. They knew there was too much to lose if they admitted and accepted everything now.

In the end, he and they were nothing but filth seething in the same pit.

But thanks to that—thanks to how long he'd indulged their greed and ambition—Michael Silbert had bought himself a little time.

Precious time to cast off the human bonds he'd clung to until the end and become the Demon King.

Slosh. Splash.

The blood that had filled the crater rippled like a wave. Through his blurred vision, he saw a spearhead flash through the air and graze the neck of a middle-aged man.

Slice!

A body fell with a wet thud. A head rolled toward him, its eyes meeting his.

The scent of blood rising from the blackened cut, as though it had been seared, smelled as sweet as chocolate. He doubted he was imagining it.

Heh-heh.

Michael Silbert laughed softly. Now that he could make a sound again, his five senses gradually sharpened.

His quickening heartbeat thundered in his ears.

Thump. Thump-thump. Thump-thump-thump!

As his heart beat faster, the blood pooled in the crater surged toward its owner.

But it was no longer red.

Thick, gleaming green blood that no one could mistake for a human's.

The same blood spilled by the unprecedented monster he'd encountered in Paris more than thirty years ago, when the city had overflowed with blood and corpses, filled Michael Silbert's entire body.

Its endless magical power and Regeneration came with it.

Shhhh!

The blood was sucked deep into his body. Severed muscles rejoined. Broken bones and ruined organs mended.

A short scream rang out, as though to celebrate his return from the brink of death.

"Kh-erk!"

It was a victory cry announcing the resurrection of one life—and a death rattle announcing the end of another.

A middle-aged woman staggered backward with a hole through her chest.

A hero of the Great Cataclysm with an impressive record—and filth from the pit Michael Silbert had chosen—even at the brink of death, she drove a dagger into a gap in Jin Taekyung's damaged armor. Her back arched like a bow.

Crunch. Pshaaa!

The spearhead came free, and blood spurted.

Thump.

In front of the corpse that had crumpled like a rotten log stood a young man, tall as an iron tower. Michael Silbert saw him.

—Jin Taekyung.

Michael Silbert looked at Jin Taekyung. No—Jin Taekyung looked at Michael Silbert.

At his eyes, swallowed by utter darkness, with none of their former gray or even their whites remaining.

And… at the monster spreading enormous wings made of magical power.

Whooosh!

The National Assembly, with a radius of hundreds of meters,[3152] fell silent. So did the fierce battle within it, just as it had been nearing its end.

Everyone was stunned into silence at the sight of Michael Silbert, who had lost all semblance of human form.

Scales covered his body. Two horns jutted from his forehead. At the sight of his vast, dark wings, the name of a monster flashed through their minds.

Someone voiced it in a near-groan.

"…Dragon."

The origin and very embodiment of the dragonkin, born with nightmarish power.

[3152] Hundreds of meters is roughly hundreds to a few thousand feet; 200–900 m is about 660–3,000 ft.

The oldest and worst of monsters, with magical power that never ran dry, strength enough to tear heaven and earth apart, and tremendous Regeneration.

Then people remembered a fact they'd forgotten.

In the Great Battle of Paris more than thirty years ago—the battle that had made Michael Silbert who he was—the creature that had claimed a thousand lives, including four S-rank Hunters, had been a young Dragon. It hadn't even reached full maturity.

And its Dragon Heart had never been found.

—Yes. Now do you understand?

Michael Silbert laughed aloud.

The roar shook the entire National Assembly, and several people seized by Fear turned deathly pale.

But one man did not.

Whoooom.

A dreadful mass of energy gathered around the two horns rising from Michael Silbert's forehead. Jin Taekyung watched the Breath form without a trace of panic.

He merely looked on for a moment before tossing out a single word like a sigh.

"Fucking bastard. I'm already in bad shape…"

And the next moment—

Whooosh!

Immense darkness poured down, staining the whole world, and collided with blue-white flames swirling along the spearhead.

Gooooong.

At the end of it all came a blinding flash.

Chapter 785

It was a reverberation.

More than a roar—a sound that left their ears muffled.

Gooooong.

Darkness and flames collided, then mingled.

Everyone watched as the two immense forces drew in wind, air, and debris, slowly swelling. A red warning light flashed through their minds, along with a single word.

Annihilation.

Before power unlike anything they had ever felt, everything else seemed meaningless.

If it burst, everything within a few hundred meters[3153] would turn to ash.

No—the blast might reach beyond the National Assembly and sweep across the entire city.

At this rate… even the civilians will get hurt.

But not everyone was thinking of the civilians.

They might all have sensed the same danger, but they stood on opposite sides of it. Some fought to protect the world of the people outside. Others had turned their weapons on them to protect only their own.

That difference soon showed in what each side did.

“Get them!”

Shhk-shhk-shhk!

With their backs to the cliff’s edge, the traitors had nowhere left to retreat.

Already outnumbered, those who had chosen Michael Silbert seized on the sudden upheaval and made one last desperate attack.

Their numbers had been cut in half, but their auras flashed with more vicious intent than ever.

Krrrraack!

A massive Tower Shield split apart. The ground opened like a block of tofu under a knife.

Lethal strikes rushed in from every direction. A moment’s carelessness would cost someone their life, yet no one stepped back.

They were Hunters.

Even if the word meant nothing more to those traitors than a faded slogan, they had upheld what it meant to be a Hunter—and they would continue to do so.

That was their duty. The responsibility that came with their strength.

[3153] A few hundred meters is roughly 660–1,640 ft, or 0.12–0.31 mi.

“Mr. Johnson!”

Choi Minwoo shouted as if giving a battle cry and swung his sword with all his might.

Its wielder was drenched in blood, but a dazzling crescent of aura swept through the air, grazed past the towering Black man standing there, and cleaved the dozens of arrows flying toward him.

Shhk!

The severed arrows scattered before Johnson’s eyes.

Even amid the battle raging on every side, Magic Johnson drew a deep breath and gathered his mana, muttering to himself.

I keep telling him to call me Johnson.

When this battle was over—when the blood finally stopped flowing—he would tell Choi Minwoo again that there was no need to be so formal with him.

He wanted to clap Faye Chen on the shoulder as she drew her bowstring with bloodied fingers. Prince Felix, too, fighting drenched in blood despite his noble station. And Chuck Hagel, who had just ripped off the Kronos Guild Master’s arm.

No. He wanted to get drunk, laugh, and talk with every Hunter who survived.

And Jin would surely be there.

Yeah, Jin. You’ll be there.

His unheard words dissolved into the reverberation.

Through the blinding light now filling the National Assembly, Johnson caught a hazy glimpse of a young man.

He saw someone else running toward him without hesitation—toward the heart of the disaster.

Chrrrrrrk!

Something white as snow surged forward like a wave.

It sealed every gap around Jin Taekyung and Michael Silbert, the two figures who stood opposed with neither able to give way.

As it took shape, Magic Johnson smiled faintly and roused every bit of mana in his body. He spread it throughout the National Assembly as if to wrap the whole world in it, then spoke.

“Absolute Shield.”

The spell consumed the Grand Mage’s vast reserves of mana and spread across a radius of several hundred meters[3154].

Whooosh.

Then the light finally burst forth, filling everyone’s vision.

[3154] A few hundred meters is roughly 660–1,640 ft, or 0.12–0.31 mi.

In a sliver of time divided into moments finer still—

Boom! Rumble-rumble-rumble!

The world shook with a roar so vast it hurt. Pitch-black darkness and flashes of light flickered before my eyes. Sensations flooded through my body.

Pain. Heat. Cold. Wetness.

And… weight.

It pressed down on my whole body, almost more than I could bear.

Huff. Huff.

My breathing was ragged. I struggled to clear my blurred vision, then drove the shaft of my spear into the ground to support myself.

Thump.

At times like this, I was glad I'd chosen a spear.

It reminded me of what the red-capped Instructor had said when I first arrived at the Hunter Training Center and he handed out our weapons.

"Just use a spear. Spears are the best."

"Yes, sir. Sorry, but may I ask why?"

"What's your Awakening Grade?"

"F-rank, sir."

"Right. There's your answer. In a fight between weaklings like you, reach is everything. I've used one, so I know. And another important thing…"

"What's that, sir?"

"It looks cool."

"Sorry, I didn't quite catch that…?"

"I said it looks cool. Look. Say you meet an enemy. You fight like hell, one-on-one. You both use every last bit of strength until neither of you can lift a finger. Who falls over first—the guy with the sword or the guy with the spear?"

"The guy with weaker legs, I'd think."

"Wrong. The guy with the sword. Every time."

"Could you tell me why, sir…?"

I still remembered the Instructor's answer, delivered with a solemn expression.

"The guy with the spear can use it as a cane."

"Sir?"

"Jam it into the ground or a wall and you've got something to lean on. The guy with the sword has to fall. Why? His sword's too short. That's what decides it: one man down, one man standing. What do you think? Like a scene from a movie, right?"

"Ah."

"Good. Decided what weapon you want?"

"Yes, sir."

"What is it?"

"A bow."

"Get down."

It was a stupid, dusty old memory.

He'd promptly whacked me on the ass about twenty times with a spear shaft from the armory, then practically forced me to take that spear as my first weapon.

The next day, he turned up for our first training session with a sword at his side. I learned one of life's great truths.

This line of work was crawling with some truly spectacular assholes.

But even that Instructor, who must have stayed at the training center for the pleasure of messing with recruits like me, couldn't have imagined where his stupid joke would lead.

That because of his stupid little joke, I'd be standing here now.

That the F-rank Hunter he'd seen back then would make Michael Silbert kneel just a little over ten years later.

Thump.

I raised my head at the heavy sound that pierced my ears.

Through my blurred vision, I saw him trembling on one knee.

Michael Silbert's wings of magical power were gone. So were his gleaming black scales. He stared at me, panting.

"Y-you bastard…"

Cough.

With a cough, a torrent of bloody fluid mixed with bits of his organs poured out.

He'd exhausted all his magical power, and his body refused to heal as it had before, no matter how badly he wanted it to.

No. It would never heal like that again.

Michael Silbert was going to…

Die today. By my hand.

I had no strength to say it aloud. I spoke the words in my head, gritted my teeth, and used White Flame to push myself upright.

Then I walked toward him.

Thud.

Pain tore through my body with every step, as though I might break apart.

Or perhaps I already had.

Beep. Beep. Beep-beep!

Strange.

My eardrums had burst, and my ears had been ringing for a while, but the System's warning beeps were still loud and annoying.

My body must be pretty thoroughly wrecked.

A hollow laugh escaped me. It didn't matter.

Since when had I ever worried about my condition in a fight?

I was happier that I'd finally brought Michael Silbert down—and that, despite the immense aftermath, all those familiar faces had made it through alive.

Of course, not everyone felt the same joy I did.

"Jin Taekyung!"

The middle-aged giant charging at me—the Kronos Guild Master—certainly didn't.

As proof of how fierce the fighting had been, he'd lost an arm to some powerful fighter I couldn't identify. Unable to accept that his life was over, he charged at me.

Then a fierce rush of air sounded behind me, and he had no choice but to accept it.

Boom!

An absurdly huge War Hammer swept past. The Kronos Guild Master's face vanished.

Behind his corpse, which crumpled like a rotten log, Chuck Hagel stood posed like a shot-putter.

He stared at me for a moment, let out a short laugh, and turned to charge the remaining traitors.

He had a warm little line to thaw their frozen hearts.

"Let's keep playing to the end, you sons of bitches."

Cheers and screams mingled in my muffled ears. Some fell, spraying blood. Others stepped over their bodies and pressed on.

The tide had turned.

Even if the goddess of fate showed up to tip the scales back, all we had to do was take her down, too.

Just as I would take down the monster struggling to rise now that I was right in front of him.

Thud.

When had I gotten this close?

I stopped. Like an old man who had leaned on his cane through a long journey to see a lifelong friend, I greeted him, weary but glad to have arrived.

"Hey. I'm here."

Clang!

His answer was the still-brilliant blue blade of his sword.

But even an edge forged from Dragon Bone, a material beyond compare, couldn't cut through Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron. There was nowhere near enough strength or speed behind the strike.

Even I, barely able to stand, could block it with ease.

And return his rude greeting.

Thud. Crunch.

Michael Silbert's eyes flew wide. Both arms crumpled. Blood and a scream he couldn't force out bubbled in his open mouth.

Grrk. Grrrk.

Blood spurted intermittently, splattering my face.

But why?

If I thought about what he'd done up until now, the scent of blood seeping into my nose should have been sweet. But all I could smell was something revolting.

Maybe that was why I stopped.

Why the face reflected in his eyes, dark with blood and tears, looked twisted into a monster's.

"…So this is the world you wanted so badly?"

I knew he couldn't give me the answer I wanted, no matter what I asked.

No answer could calm this heart and these emotions threatening to burst out of me.

But I still wanted to hear him speak. I had to.

For all the people who had died because of his pathetic ambition.

"Answer me."

Grab.

I seized Michael Silbert's one remaining horn and hauled him upright. Fighting the pain that surged through me, I whispered to him as he slipped closer to death.

"Say something. Anything. Come on."

And then I understood.

I knew where his other horn had gone. Why I hadn't seen it anywhere nearby.

Thud.

The horn shot up from somewhere and pierced a palm with a dull, wet sound.

But there was no blood. No groan from someone enduring the pain.

Only Michael Silbert's trembling gaze, fixed over my shoulder, and his voice.

"How dare… How dare a monster like you…"

"Wrong. I'll tell you once, and only once, so remember it."

I knew that voice. I realized who stood behind me and laughed aloud.

"My name is Stone-King, you hideous monster."

Chapter 786

“My name is Stone King, you hideous monster.”

The moment he spat out those words as if biting them off, the Skeleton King finally understood.

He had found the answer to the question that had tormented him for so long.

All those nights when everyone else slept and he could not. All those days when everyone else went about their lives and he alone remained dead.

And the question that had bound his body and mind like a chain.

Who am I?

No matter how hard he’d thought about it, he’d never found an answer. But the answer had been there all along, within the Skeleton King himself.

So that’s it.

The Skeleton King muttered to himself.

In the black eyes he saw over a man’s shoulder, the radiance cast by his golden crown was reflected.

“What, exactly, did you want to become?”

Michael Silbert’s eyes trembled at the offhand question.

The Skeleton King continued calmly.

“There was a time when I desperately wanted to know. I tried to recover a past I can no longer remember, and I didn’t know what to call the person I am now.”

That was why he had followed a human he’d met one day out of a forest filled with nothing but death and darkness, and into an unfamiliar world.

“I wanted to find the answer in the world you live in. I believed I could.”

But he hadn’t. Even there, amid enormous metal things rolling on wheels and buildings taller than trees, the answer was nowhere to be found.

To the Skeleton King, who had left the forest in search of it, the human world was simply another forest.

“I can’t breathe or sleep. I can’t feel the cool breeze other humans talk about, or the taste of food. I can’t even feel the faintest pain.”

That was when he first learned that being unable to feel pain could itself be painful. And that some kinds of pain lay in the truth itself.

Monster.

It was the first word the Skeleton King had searched online the day he received a smartphone. One of the words he’d heard most often in the human world. A word for beings like him.

His questions gave way to an emotion he’d never felt before.

Anguish.

Anguish at having awakened as a monster through no choice of his own.

Fear that, to the people he had begun to talk with, share his feelings with, and grow close to, he might be nothing more than a monster.

"I wanted to deny that I was one of them. So I fought alongside you, and for you, with everything I had. I believed it was the right thing to do."

He still believed it. Otherwise, he would never have considered sacrificing himself here today.

The Skeleton King didn't want the humans he cared about to fall before the world did.

Humans were more complicated than he'd imagined. Some harbored terrible rage and killing intent, as monsters did—or worse.

But humans also knew restraint and love. They thought and acted according to their own will.

When petty disputes left countless people dead or injured, when children still little more than infants were abandoned in the street, it was humans who took those children into their arms.

That was why the Skeleton King had wanted to become human like them. To be welcomed among them not as a monster, but as a neighbor and a friend.

And why realizing it was impossible had driven him to despair.

But…

"Not anymore."

The Skeleton King murmured calmly and gripped the horn piercing the back of his hand.

Crack.

He caught Michael Silbert's hand around the horn as well. Though it had been bent and broken earlier, it was slowly healing.

A voice seething with fury escaped through Michael's clenched teeth.

"You think… you think doing this will make a mere monster like you human…?"

"It doesn't matter."

"What?"

"I know. I'm a monster, so I can't be called human. And because I live among humans, I can't be called a monster."

The Skeleton King smiled faintly.

"What does that matter? This is enough."

"…!"

"You hideous, pitiful monster. Let me introduce myself once more."

Looking into Michael Silbert's wide eyes, the Skeleton King spoke slowly.

"I am the master of the Black Forest, the ruler of all the undead, and a hero of this world who fought for you humans. Call me the Skeleton King or the Stone King. Whatever name you give me is part of who I am. But…"

Tap.

The Skeleton King raised a hand and rested it on a man's shoulder.

"I won't tell you the first name I was given in this world."

Because that was a name only a friend could use.

"Isn't that right, Jin Taekyung? You conniving human."

I didn't know what to say.

Should I laugh at the bastard for finally coming to his senses? Get angry? Or smack him upside the head as hard as I could, like I usually did?

Like someone who'd forgotten how to speak, I sank into a brief but deep debate before suddenly opening my mouth.

"Golgoli, you stupid son of a bitch."

Bones.

The first name I'd given the undead I'd met in the Black Forest.

Usually he'd have thrown a fit and told me not to call him that. Today, his answer was meek.

"I admit it. I was a stupid son of a bitch."

"…"

"I won't doubt you again."

Damn it.

I was speechless. I had nothing to say. But somehow, I didn't feel frustrated at all.

I just… felt relieved.

As if a stone had lifted from my chest. As if the last bit of distance between us had finally vanished.

Yeah. That was enough.

Feeling lighter, I threw a punch.

Thwack!

Michael Silbert's face snapped back. I still had him by the hair, and he'd been standing there looking half out of it.

I didn't even let him fall.

Thwack, thwack. Crack.

His proud nose caved in. Teeth spilled through his mangled lips.

I hit him until blood or tears ran down his cheeks from eyes veined with burst capillaries. Until his twitching limbs went limp.

Crack. Crunch.

I kept hitting him. Breaking him. Crushing him.

Every time I moved, every time my fists and feet slammed into him, the lingering aftermath of One Annihilation sent excruciating pain through my whole body. But I didn't care.

If someone hadn't grabbed my wrist, I might have beaten Michael Silbert to death right there.

Grab.

"Please stop, Mr. Jin. Not yet."

A familiar voice, worn with exhaustion.

I turned without thinking and blinked. Team Leader Choi stood there, drenched from head to toe in blood.

No. Everyone was there.

"Jin, it's over. It's finally… finally over."

Magic Johnson approached with Chuck Hagel supporting him. He smiled weakly, but there was no joy in it, despite their victory in a battle that had decided their fate.

After killing people who had once been his comrades, the hero's smile was dark and bitter.

Just like the silence that had settled over us, and everyone surrounding me.

"Oh."

A sound escaped me—part gasp, part groan.

Only then did I raise my head and look around. Everything they'd said was true.

Whoooosh.

A wind heavy with the smell of blood swept past.

Abandoned weapons and corpses filled every part of my view.

Pools of blood on the floor soaked our shoes. The enormous Round Table, once a symbol of the heroes who had saved the world, had been shattered, leaving only ruins behind.

Yeah. It was over.

The first battle for humanity's fate.

The battle between duty and self-interest. Between humans and monsters.

It had ended here—and outside, where blood had been spilled beyond our sight.

Creeeeak. Boom.

The entrance door, already half broken, toppled with a heavy crash. Weary footsteps followed as people climbed over it.

Clank. Clank.

Their armor and weapons were soaked in blood.

At the sight of the blood-drenched figures filing in, quite a few of the surviving Hunters reached for their weapons. They stopped when Team Leader Choi spoke.

"How did it go?"

One of the two people at the front—a young man who still had peach fuzz on his face—answered in a soldier's clipped tone.

"We killed or captured them all. We took more casualties than expected because of a man named Huginn, but we joined forces with the Peace and Ares Guilds and subdued him. Then we dispelled the illusion magic around the area and notified the Korean government a little while ago. Oh, and Mr. Shu here played a major part."

"You've both worked hard. It would have been a difficult fight if you hadn't trusted us and helped."

At Team Leader Choi's heartfelt words, the man in his thirties whom the young man had called "Mr. Shu" shook his head.

"I only trusted the Übermensch's judgment and his choice. What I saw of him that day in Munich… He was a true superhuman."

When he looked my way, I gave him a small nod in greeting. I nodded to the young man beside him, too. He was watching me with an expectant look.

Joel Schumacher. Xiao Shen.

They'd owed me, and today they'd paid me back with interest.

The others probably had no idea that Joel Schumacher, who had politely declined to attend the inaugural ceremony because of his injuries in Munich, had secretly entered Korea.

Or that Xiao Shen had brought Hunters from the Public Security Armed Forces Department and joined the elite forces of the Peace and Ares Guilds, who were fully prepared.

I remembered a question Team Leader Choi had asked me a few days ago.

"There's a meticulous man. When do you think he's most vulnerable, Mr. Jin?"

The answer hadn't been hard. I'd seen it happen several times, and I'd made the same mistake myself.

"When he thinks he's succeeded."

I'd been right.

Michael Silbert might have guarded against things going wrong, but part of him had been certain he would win.

If he'd been acting like himself, he would have chosen France—his stronghold—or somewhere else with a firm support base, instead of Seoul, for the inaugural ceremony.

But that small lapse, that petty desire to stamp his name on this historic place, had brought down his vast ambition.

I could hear it clearly.

"We've won."

Along with Team Leader Choi's words, echoing through the silent air, someone's hideous ambition crumbled to pieces.

I knew what I had left to do.

…Yeah.

To end everything, I had to erase the starting line where it all began.

Just as we had executed the traitors here today, the people who would have stood in the way of the great war to come.

I had to pull out the root. Otherwise, new weeds—and offshoots of this thorn tree—would keep growing.

Michael Silbert.

Crack.

I stomped on the chest of the man lying at my feet. Bones shifted beneath my boot.

Michael Silbert came to, blood surging from his mouth. He looked around with bleary eyes.

"So… that's how it ended."

His voice was fading, but his tone was composed.

He had probably realized it instinctively the moment he looked around.

That Huginn, his right-hand man, and the private army he had spent so many years training would never make it here.

"Did you kill them all?"

I answered evenly.

"The ones who were going to die died. The ones who were going to live lived."

"Huginn must be among the latter. You'll have plenty to ask him."

"You know it."

"Then I have a favor to ask."

A favor.

That simple word suddenly made me sick. I kicked him in the face.

Thwack.

His head snapped aside, spraying blood.

But maybe he couldn't feel pain anymore. Without so much as a groan, Michael Silbert spat the blood filling his mouth and stubbornly continued.

"Tell Huginn I'm grateful for everything he's done, and that he no longer needs to be loyal to me. Grant me that favor, and it will be easier for both of you. You can at least spare yourselves a messy, tedious round of torture and interrogation."

"Is that a kindness for a retainer who's been loyal his whole life, or your last words?"

"Both, I suppose. From the look in your eyes, this place will be my grave soon."

I looked down at Michael Silbert as he smiled soundlessly.

And I knew, more certainly than ever, that I couldn't leave him the slightest chance.

The law? A trial?

Those institutions were made for humans, not monsters.

A monster should die like a monster.

So they could never struggle again. So that even the tiniest chance of the tumors he'd planted in this land over the past several decades saving that monster would disappear.

Yet this was also a lawful judgment.

Everyone here had witnessed the truth and fought through the bloodshed. They were witnesses and jurors, prosecutors and judges.

And from this moment on, they and I would finally become us.

Race. Sex. Age. Borders.

Even species would cease to divide us as we stood under one banner.

In the name of the World Hunter Federation.

Michael Silbert.

My voice broke the silence. Though I put no internal energy behind it, it carried through the chamber, clear and steady.

Loudly and clearly. On and on.

"From this moment forward, the World Hunter Federation revokes all your qualifications and summarily executes you as a traitor. Anyone who objects, step forward."

Team Leader Choi answered at once.

"No objections."

Magic Johnson spoke next.

"Everything according to the rules."

Prince Felix bowed with dignity instead of answering. Faye Chen and Chuck Hagel struck their weapons together.

Clang!

The deep note rang out over the ruins.

Others joined in. One weapon became dozens, then hundreds, striking together and throwing blue sparks.

Someone pounded his armor with his one remaining hand. A white-haired elder struck the ground with a bloodied cane.

Boom. Boom. Boom-boom-boom.

The world shook. Pooled blood splashed in every direction.

No one objected. Everyone agreed.

To the World Hunter Federation's first resolution.

To the death of a traitor born human who had become a monster.

Amid the deep resonance that rang on and on, I stared at Michael Silbert and asked,

"Any objections?"

After a moment's silence, he answered.

"None. At first, I fought with all my strength to survive. After that, I fought to get what I wanted."

"Any last words?"

"It's your turn now. Go on—struggle with everything you have. I'll be watching from up above."

I raised my spear as his mocking words reached me. The shaft felt heavier than it ever had before.

Then, in front of hundreds of pairs of eyes, I drove the spearhead down with all my strength.

Thrust!

The spearhead pierced straight through his throat.

A strangled sound failed to make it past his lips. Michael Silbert's body went rigid.

I looked into the monster's eyes as life quickly drained away, then delivered the last words I'd put off until now.

"Just like you said, watch closely. Not from up above—from the very bottom, beneath my feet."

"…!"

Was it anger that made his eyes widen at the end? Or the death he could no longer hold off?

Maybe both.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

Countless chimes and radiance welled up inside me.

Chapter 787

“Ah.”

Jin Taekyung let out a single exclamation.

At that moment, he felt the full blessing of the supernatural power that had come to him.

Clear chimes, audible to him alone, rang without pause, while countless holographic windows rose above the ruins and filled his vision.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

SYSTEM

You have defeated Lv. 175 Michael Silbert!
You have gained a tremendous amount of EXP and Fame!
You have achieved the rare feat Cut the Weeds and Pull Up the Roots!
We offer our unreserved praise for your bold decision to cut down the diseased grass and pull out its roots for the sake of the forest we all share.
But remember: the great fire that could consume the forest is more dangerous than any disease.
You have gained a tremendous amount of EXP and Fame as a reward for your achievement!
You have gained 20 points as a special bonus reward!
Level Up!
Level Up!
Most of your injuries and Stamina have been restored by the stacked effects of leveling up!
The special debuff Broken Body rejects the power of healing!

…

…

…

Countless notifications filled his eyes and ears.

At the same time, a warm radiance no one else could see or feel welled up from deep inside Jin Taekyung.

Whoosh.

Energy washed over him like a downpour—something that deserved to be called purification, not merely healing.

It enveloped the waste that had built up inside him, his damaged blood vessels and organs, his broken bones, and his torn skin.

Shhhhh.

The terrible pain throughout his body rapidly faded.

Beneath the sticky blood covering him from head to toe, wounds no one had noticed healed without a trace.

But none of that mattered to Jin Taekyung.

Not compared to the relief he felt.

It's over.

He let out the breath he'd been holding.

Michael Silbert lay dead, his eyes wide open. Jin could no longer sense any trace of life in him.

There was no doubt.

The bastard was dead.

More cunning than any enemy Jin had ever faced, the scheming man who had shaken him to his core had been born human and left this world a monster.

No. Perhaps by now his soul had tumbled into the abyss reflected in those staring eyes.

Just like Jin's final farewell to him, in the moment the cold spearhead pierced his throat.

"…Go to hell."

Jin spat out the words and gripped the spear shaft. He twisted it hard, cutting through the monster's neck.

Slash. Splash.

A jet of green blood erupted as Michael Silbert's head came free of his body and rolled across a pool of blood.

At the same moment, as if on cue, a tremendous roar erupted. No—it was both a roar and a cheer.

Boom! Boom-boom-boom!

Rumble!

The hundreds of surviving Hunters roared as one.

Their mana-charged shouts burst through the compressed air. Feet and weapons pounded the ground without pause, shaking the National Assembly building.

Some were simply overjoyed. Others trembled with anger that had yet to fade. Still others stared at them blankly and began to cry.

Jin Taekyung let the spear that had ended it all hang limply at his side.

"…Fuck."

What was the big deal? What the hell was so important about this?

He didn't know himself.

Why had the curse suddenly come out? Why was he crying like an idiot while everyone else celebrated?

But a voice at his ear supplied the answer.

“I don’t know what stupid thought is going through your head right now, but I’ll tell you one thing.”

The Skeleton King put a hand on Jin’s shoulder.

“The people who died aren’t your fault. I became a monster against my will, too.”

“…!”

“So stop bawling like an idiot. No one is blaming you or holding you responsible.”

Jin fell silent at those prickly but warm words.

Then, amid the endless cheering and rumbling, he let out a wry chuckle.

“Hey.”

“Hmm? Did you call?”

“Why are you acting all serious, you monster bastard?”

“…!”

“What are you looking at? Keep your eyes nice and polite.”

The Skeleton King had been quietly hoping for a response, though he’d tried not to show it. Now, he muttered with a stunned look on his face.

“Is this truly what human nature is like…?”

“I can hear you.”

“I meant you to.”

“A monster… talking back?”

“Ah, enough already!”

Teasing the Skeleton King—no, teasing his friend—was always fun.

Jin laughed at the Skeleton King’s fit of outrage, wiping his tears with his blood-soaked sleeve.

“And don’t think I missed you wiping your tears. It’s too late to hide it.”

“…You’re spreading lies, you bastard. When did I do that? Got proof?”

“No proof, but I’ve got witnesses. Plenty of people saw you besides me—huh?”

Grab.

Jin suddenly staggered. The Skeleton King caught him by the arm, his eyes widening.

“You…”

“Ah. The floor’s slippery with blood.”

Jin answered with a grin. But he couldn’t hide the tremble at the corners of his mouth or the crushing exhaustion in his half-closed eyes.

It was only natural.

Leveling up twice had healed most of his injuries. But everything that had happened on the way here, and the strain it had left on his mind, was more than a young man barely in his twenties could bear alone.

The sleepless nights and countless battles had begun the day he learned the truth about Michael Silbert's hideous nature and ambitions.

For the past few weeks, Jin had fought day and night.

And Michael Silbert and his countless monster hordes weren't the only enemies he'd faced.

There was the world's condemnation, growing harsher by the day. There were the disasters he'd heard about on the news from every corner of the world, and his own self-loathing at being powerless to stop those deaths.

Jin had fought himself, and he had fought the world.

Now that he'd finally defeated Michael Silbert, even standing still demanded superhuman patience.

But…

I can't.

He forced his drooping eyelids open.

Not yet. He had to hold on a little longer. Just a little longer.

Until he finished what he'd started.

Sirens had begun to mingle with the cheers, drawing closer. He couldn't collapse before he told the world the whole truth about what had happened here today.

No matter what.

Thud.

Using the spear he'd driven into the ground as a cane, Jin Taekyung leaned against it and murmured in a voice that seemed about to fade away.

"Thanks so fucking much, Assistant Hwang[3155], you son of a bitch…"

"Are you really all right…? Wait, what did you just say?"

"Hey, Golgoli."

"Huh?"

"You should use a spear too. Not a sword."

What? Out of nowhere?

The Skeleton King blinked, unable to make sense of it.

"Why?"

"Compared to a sword…"

"Compared to a sword."

"A spear…"

"A spear."

"Looks cooler."

"Looks coo—fuck."

[3155] Jogyo is a Korean term for an assistant instructor, including an assistant drill instructor in military training.

The Skeleton King sighed.

Why had he listened so closely to that inhuman bastard? Half of what Jin said was nonsense, and the other half was abuse directed at him.

I'm the idiot.

But the Skeleton King said nothing more. He only let out a long sigh.

He didn't want to wake his friend, who had fallen into a deep sleep as if he'd passed out, still leaning against the spear planted deep in the ground.

You've worked hard. Rest.

Perhaps everyone felt the same.

As if they'd never cheered at all, the hundreds of Hunters pressed their lips together in silence and simply looked on.

They watched the young man who had been braver and shone brighter than anyone else here today.

The superhuman who had stood against the whole world and kept to his path, even when the truth ahead was too dark to see through.

Could I have done what he did?

Each of them asked themselves the question and arrived at the same answer.

No one there could have.

They would have fallen, been scraped raw, battered and broken, and finally gone down, never to rise again.

But that young man, barely in his twenties—Jin Taekyung—had done it.

However many times he fell, he got back up. However badly he was battered and broken, he refused to stay down.

He alone had become a signpost and a light for those lost in the darkness.

The one who led everyone from the front.

The one who shared the pain of the wounded without ever yielding to weakness, who pressed bravely onward with an indomitable will.

And people had a word for someone like that, a word filled with all the reverence and love in the world.

Hero.

The moment that short word filled their minds, everyone there was overcome by a feeling they couldn't describe.

Hero. They knew the word all too well.

At some point, the whole world had begun calling them heroes. One ordinary day, they'd gained unexpected powers, fought monsters, and become humanity's sword and shield.

But why?

Why did that word, heard so often it had nearly worn grooves in their ears, make their hearts swell like this?

Why did looking back leave them both ashamed and choked with emotion?

One image kept coming back to them: the look in Jin's eyes as he shouted the truth without fear, surrounded by hundreds of weapons.

And the sight of a young man weeping alone, while everyone cheered at the end of the fierce battle.

Perhaps that was why the reinforcements entering the ruined National Assembly stopped without realizing it and held their breath.

And why, in a silence so deep it seemed you could hear a needle drop, someone let out the breath they'd been holding.

"Fuck."

People turned toward the voice and were surprised three times.

First, that anyone could deliver a curse in such a refined tone.

Second, that a curse could sound so awkward.

And finally, that the person who had managed both at once was the last man they'd expected.

Prince Felix paid their stares no mind.

No. He no longer cared.

"Fuck. Fuck. Fuck."

What a relief.

His pronunciation was still clumsy, but with each curse, something knotted in his chest seemed to loosen.

Felix found himself chuckling.

Damn it. What was so important about any of it?

Bloodline. Dignity. Appearances. Etiquette.

Everything he'd taken pride in for more than thirty years suddenly felt empty and burdensome.

He wanted to cast it all off, right then and there.

So he did.

For the first time in his life, he cursed like a dockworker and threw off the armor bearing the royal crest.

He wondered for a moment what expression His Majesty the King—his father—would wear if he saw him like this. But, well…

Did it matter?

Step. Step.

With everyone watching, Felix slowly crossed the ruined chamber and stopped.

Then he spoke without preamble.

"It looks as though you could use another pair of hands. If you don't mind, may I help?"

At Prince Felix's most courteous offer yet, the Skeleton King nodded. He was supporting Jin Taekyung, who had collapsed into sleep against the spear shaft.

"If you wish, then do so, human prince."

Felix's reply astonished everyone nearby.

"Please call me Felix, Mr. King. My friend."

"…!"

He gave the people staring at him a faint smile. As he took Jin by one shoulder, another hand reached out to help.

"You…"

"Watching from over there, it looked as though you still needed another pair of hands."

Choi Minwoo answered calmly, and more hands joined them.

One trembling hand belonged to Chuck Hagel, who was already acting as though he were going through withdrawal. The small hand covered in unusually thick calluses belonged to Faye Chen.

As for Magic Johnson, he stared at the staff in his hand for a moment, then suddenly grinned.

"Sometimes everything I've learned feels useless. Like right now."

He tucked the staff away and strode over to lend a hand.

At first glance, it made no sense.

A Grand Mage who had mastered hundreds of spells, and the finest Hunters, capable of slicing through several metric tons[3156] of concrete in an instant, had all gathered to lift one young man.

But this was how they chose to show him their respect.

Rustle. Rustle.

Only the soft brush of clothing broke the silence. Hands multiplied until there were hundreds of them, passing the sleeping young hero slowly overhead like a gentle ripple across a lake.

As carefully as if they were handling glass.

Careful not to disturb the peace that had finally found him, if only for a little while.

When they laid Jin down on the ground, everyone realized something.

The inaugural ceremony of the New World Hunter Federation, which would be recorded in the history of humanity, was not over yet.

The young man before them would be both the beginning and the end of the Great War to come.

Shing.

[3156] One metric ton is 1,000 kg, or about 2,205 lb (1.10 US tons).

The cold scrape of steel cut through the silence.

A sword slid slowly from its sheath and pointed toward the sky.

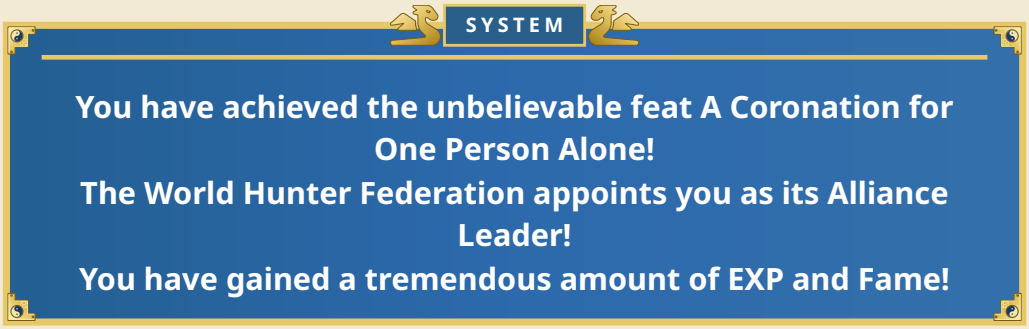
Soon, countless weapons—dozens, then hundreds—glinted in the sunset streaming through the shattered stained glass.

In the ruins, steeped in the reddish warmth of flames, they were turned toward the young man immersed in an unbreakable peace.

No.

Toward their new Alliance Leader.

Ding. Ding. Ding.



...

...

...

The chimes, audible to just one person, rang clearer and louder than ever.

Loud enough to bring a smile to the lips of someone deep in sleep.

Loud enough to melt the guilt still lingering in a corner of his heart.

And so, at the end of a long and fierce day, a new page of history was turning.

Chapter 788

Paris, France. The Élysée Palace.

Despite the French fondness for fine food, President Emmanuel had finished a short, simple breakfast. Now he gazed at a box of cigars he had carefully stored away, overcome by memories.

At last, the day has come to take these out.

President Emmanuel had not smoked in twenty years.

In his youth, he'd been known as a cigar aficionado. But everything had changed after he met one man.

"I hear you like cigars."

"Ah, I enjoy one now and then as a hobby."

"Then that's quite an expensive hobby. Most people can't afford to spend over ten thousand euros a month sitting in their garden and burning grass."

"…!"

"You said you wanted to go into politics, didn't you? Then you'd be wise to cut back on the cigars. They're a monster that devours both your time and your health. And there's no easier target to tear apart than an extravagant politician from a family of businesspeople. Now, off you go."

His first meeting with the powerful man, arranged through his family's connections and enormous lobbying efforts, had ended just like that—with the absurdly simple advice to cut back on cigars.

But Emmanuel, a promising young lawyer, hadn't forgotten it.

As soon as he returned to his mansion, he threw every last one of his cigars—worth hundreds of thousands of euros—into the fireplace and began living a far more modest life.

A few years later, at Easter, he received a card bearing the image of two ravens.

> Congratulations on your rebirth.
> M. S.

That was how Emmanuel was chosen by Michael Silbert. The following year, he made a dazzling debut in French politics under the glare of the spotlight.

And after that?

What more was there to say?

Emmanuel rose faster than anyone.

It took barely a decade for him to become someone no political heavyweight—not even a prime minister or president—could treat lightly. Michael Silbert's shadow covered everything.

"Run in the next presidential election. You won't be the youngest president, but I'll help you make history as the longest-serving."

I'll help you.

At those words from Michael Silbert, Emmanuel—now a senator who embodied Paris and the leader of the largest party in parliament—had a sudden certainty.

The election was over before it had even begun.

He would be the next master of the Élysée Palace.

And at last, on the day that prediction came true, President Emmanuel mustered the courage to ask the benefactor who had come to see him:

"Why did you choose me, of all people?"

The answer was brief.

"You listened well."

"Pardon?"

"I want only one thing. Give me your absolute loyalty, just as you have until now. If I tell you to bark, bark. If I tell you to bite, bite. Don't repeat your predecessor's mistake, and I'll put not only enormous wealth and honor in your hands, but this entire country."

"…!"

"Will you be loyal to me?"

"No. I'll obey you."

Michael Silbert laughed aloud at that perfect answer and handed his new watchdog a box of cigars decorated with gold leaf.

"These are…"

"A gift. When my goal is realized, you'll be as good as a king. Save these cigars for that moment."

The memory of that day was still vivid.

As President Emmanuel gazed at the box and sank into thought, he felt his heart pound.

A king. A king.

A king in the twenty-first century—in this country obsessed with revolution, no less.

It was madness.

But when Michael Silbert said it, that was different. He was a man who had made countless impossibilities and wild imaginings come true.

President Emmanuel suddenly recalled the last words of his father, who had used the chaos of the Great Cataclysm to amass an astronomical fortune almost overnight.

"Everything that happens in this world is an investment and a deal. If someone wants something, give it to them freely. But always get back more than you gave."

People had despised his father, calling him the “Merchant of Death.” But even if he had gone to hell, he probably had no great regrets.

He must have watched his son make a better deal than anyone.

Young lawyer Emmanuel had given one man a loyalty bordering on obedience, and in return had become President Emmanuel.

Soon, he would possess power beyond the presidency—power so absolute that Emmanuel the First would hardly be too grand a name for him.

“Emmanuel the First…”

President Emmanuel murmured dreamily. Then the grandfather clock against the office wall chimed.

Dong. Dooong.

A bird and a dwarf popped out of the clock and spun around. Emmanuel checked where the hour hand pointed and blinked.

“Noon? Already?”

He must have lost track of time while reminiscing. He slowly tapped his desk.

It’s taking longer than I expected.

With the time difference between France and Korea, it was now eight in the evening in Seoul, where the World Hunter Federation’s inaugural ceremony would be underway.

He checked his smartphone just in case, but no word had come from the person he was waiting for.

Well, it would be strange if it ended early.

This wasn’t just any gathering. It was the World Hunter Federation’s first inaugural ceremony.

Given its importance to the future of global security, a meeting as long as a full marathon was hardly surprising.

Still, even with his unwavering faith in Michael Silbert, he couldn’t help feeling a little anxious.

Knock, knock.

President Emmanuel frowned at the sudden knock.

“What is it?”

An attendant’s voice came through the crack in the closed door.

“It’s time for your meal, Mr. President.”

“I don’t need it. And don’t let anyone near my office until I call for them myself. Understood?”

“Yes, I’ll pass that along.”

How could he have an appetite with the most important moment of his life just ahead?

President Emmanuel cursed inwardly at his dim-witted attendant, then stared down at the smartphone in his hand.

After hesitating, he tapped one person's number.

Brr. Brr. Brr.

The call rang on and on.

Emmanuel ran his hand over the cigar box, trying to suppress his anxiety. At last, there was a click, and someone answered.

"The ceremony—how did the inaugural ceremony go?"

The other person was silent for a moment before replying.

"It ended successfully."

The words he'd waited so long to hear.

Joy surged through Emmanuel, and he burst out laughing. He punched the air without realizing he'd clenched his fist and thanked the man who had given him the answer he wanted so badly.

"Thank you! Thank you so much! Huginn, you've worked so hard, too—!"

"Thank me? I'm the one who should be thanking you."

"What?"

At that moment, Emmanuel realized something.

The voice on the other end was deeper and rougher than usual.

And its owner wasn't in Seoul.

He was standing outside the door.

The price of realizing it too late was about to be paid.

Crash!

With a thunderous boom, the centuries-old office door burst into dust.

A massive man with graying hair strode through the opening and gave the frozen president a friendly smile.

"Long time no see, Emmanuel. You little rat—I could tear you apart and kill you, and it still wouldn't be enough."

"You—you're…"

"Funny, isn't it? A moment ago, I thought I could fall asleep in three seconds. But looking at your face has driven the tiredness right out of me. Johnson, who should be in Switzerland right now, probably feels the same way. Don't you think?"

Chuck Hagel laughed heartily.

He shoved Huginn's smartphone into his back pocket, then spoke to Emmanuel, who stood frozen like a statue. His voice was different now, deep and dark as an abyss.

"Michael Silbert is dead. By the hand of the new Alliance Leader we chose ourselves, in the name of the World Hunter Federation."

"…!"

"Now it's your choice. Get dragged out with your arms and legs broken, or walk out on those cotton-swab legs of yours."

It was over. All of it was over.

Everything he'd built, along with every future he could have had, had collapsed.

Faced with a reality he couldn't believe, he trembled, forgetting even to breathe. After turning it over in his mind again and again, he finally managed a word.

"C-cigar."

"What?"

"Could I smoke one cigar before I go?"

Chuck Hagel blinked, then let out a booming laugh.

"A cigar? Now that sounds good."

Then he drove a fist like a lump of iron straight into Emmanuel's face.

Wham! Crash!

Teeth and blood sprayed through the air. Emmanuel flew back like a cannonball, shattered the window, and disappeared from sight.

"Asshole. What kind of question was that?"

Chuck muttered and looked down through the broken window.

Dozens of Ares Guild members waiting below were pouring potions over the president who had fallen from the sky.

"Is he alive?"

"Ah, yes. He'll live."

"Good. Just keep him breathing."

"Understood. But, Mr. Hagel, where are we headed next?"

"Don't worry about that. Our mission is over."

"So we're heading straight back?"

"No. Wait a little. There's still something to do."

Chuck opened the cigar box sitting neatly on the table and smiled with satisfaction.

"Something very important. Mm."

A little while later, people drawn by the unexpected commotion saw their president being carried away, his body crushed, and pale smoke drifting out through the Élysée Palace's broken window.

But that was not the last shock awaiting them.

When they picked up their smartphones to report this unprecedented crime, an enormous bomb no one could have foreseen rocked the world.

> Breaking News: World Hunter Federation's first official announcement: "Two hours ago, we summarily executed Michael Silbert and his followers, who betrayed humanity. The operation is still ongoing."
>
> Unprecedented bloodshed. Choi, descendant of the Savior and interim spokesperson for the World Hunter Federation: "We will reveal the truth, along with all the evidence."
>
> [Live] World Hunter Federation Official Press Conference

The press conference began amid confusion and shock on a scale that "unprecedented" could hardly capture.

And even as Choi Minwoo calmly continued speaking before everyone, captured by hundreds of camera lenses, the key figures of the New World Hunter Federation spread across the globe like dandelion seeds on the wind, uprooting the weeds Michael Silbert had left behind.

One day. Two days. Three…

They were still at it on the day a young man finally woke from his deep sleep.

Chapter 789

It must have started a few years ago.

Before that, I could close my eyes anywhere, anytime, and fall asleep as if I'd passed out. Then the nightmares began.

In a way, it was only natural.

Even someone as thick-skinned as me would start to fall apart after crossing the line between life and death several times a week and watching people close to me die or get hurt.

This nightmare was no different.

But it was far calmer, sadder, and, in a way, even more welcome than the ones I usually had. Because I met people I missed inside it.

"Son. While Dad's at work, play nicely with Hayeon, okay?"

I heard my father's voice.

"Just call me hyung[3157]. Hyung[3158]."

"Whoa, we hit the jackpot with these Magic Gems today. Since we're on a roll, let's keep going till the end of the day, yeah?"

I saw the smiling faces of Cheonsu and the other team members who'd died in the Mutated Gate.

"It wasn't your fault. You did everything you could."

I got to stand beside Butler Kim once more as he struggled for breath and tried to comfort me.

Of course, if it had ended there, I wouldn't have called it a nightmare.

Even in my dream, I fought without stopping.

I cut down people who all looked the same and drove my spearhead into monsters' chests.

Then, amid blood that reached my thighs and corpses piled like mountains, I heard the screams of those I hadn't managed to save.

"Help me! There are people here! Please, at least save my child…"

I looked around. A hellscape stretched out on every side.

No—maybe it was hell itself.

A familiar face came into view, one more at home here than anyone else.

"This is a pleasant place, wouldn't you say?"

"Go fuck yourself."

I swung my spear as I answered.

Slash.

[3157] Hyung is a Korean term a male uses to address an older brother or an older male he is close to.

[3158] Hyung is a Korean term a male uses to address an older brother or an older male he is close to.

Michael Silbert's head flew into the air as he approached at a leisurely pace.

But the smile on his lips and the black gleam in his eyes didn't disappear.

"Take a good look at this scene we made together."

His headless body moved of its own accord.

Clap. Clap. Clap. The slow applause rang out, and I clenched my teeth. Flames erupted from my spear as I slashed diagonally downward, swallowing him whole.

Whoosh!

Michael Silbert's body, moving as though controlled by invisible strings, turned to ash and crumbled away.

But the flames weren't satisfied. They raced over the blood pooled everywhere.

Farther. On and on.

Fwoosh.

A great inferno rose, feeding on the blood and countless corpses like firewood, completing the hellscape.

The screams of those still alive rose higher than ever—then died away without a trace.

Everything was dead. Everything was burning.

The terrible sight before me was something beyond a dream.

I let my spear droop and stared blankly as the whole world went up in flames.

Then I heard a monster who had stubbornly survived even this calamity begin to speak.

"Please, survive until the end. Struggle with everything you have, every moment, until the very end of this world. That way, you can watch it all with your own eyes __"

Pop! Thud-thud.

I stomped down with all my strength, and his head burst like a watermelon.

But the silence I'd finally won wasn't an ending. It was the beginning of something new.

Crack. Crack.

The world shook with a deafening roar.

The sky split apart, and space warped in every direction.

At the same time, a single word flashed through my mind like a bolt of lightning.

Rift.

Rrrumble!

That was when it happened.

As my senses slowly faded, someone's distant shout caught hold of me and pulled me up from the depths of the nightmare.

"…ppa!"

Ppa?

"Oppa[3159]!"

"…!"

At that moment, radiant light filled my vision. I woke from the nightmare and finally saw Hayeon's face, drenched in tears for some reason.

After a brief but difficult deliberation, I greeted her with all sincerity.

"Don't cry. You're ugly enough as it is. If your makeup runs, it'll only get worse…"

Smack!

Ow.

I hurt, therefore I am.

I couldn't tell how the rest of that day passed.

Right after I woke up, Hayeon—having been hit with the hard truth—smacked my arm with a hand that stung just like Mom's.

Then she hugged me for the first time since kindergarten and burst into tears.

Mom had stepped away for a moment. When she came hurrying back… Well, there's no point going on. It'll only make my mouth tired.

She sobbed so bitterly that I thought I'd woken up in a morgue instead of a hospital room.

If the medical staff who'd been waiting nearby hadn't insisted she stop, I might have drowned in their tears. I'm only exaggerating a little.

"Um, could the family calm down for a moment? We need to run some tests first…"

Mom wouldn't have budged even if Demon King Asmodeus had come knocking—but a few words from a renowned doctor and healer were enough to make her step back without a fuss.

Of course, she made sure to clasp their hands and ask them again and again to look after me.

"Please take good care of my son. Check if anything's wrong with him. And there won't be any lasting effects, will there? My younger one said Taekyung started talking nonsense as soon as he woke up…"

"Nonsense?"

"Yes. I'm not sure exactly what he said. I'd stepped out for a moment."

"Understood. Patient, do you remember what you said?"

I answered.

"I told her not to cry because she'd look even uglier if her makeup ran."

"…"

[3159] Oppa is a Korean term a female uses to address an older brother or an older male she is close to.

“And it wasn’t nonsense. I almost closed my eyes again as soon as I opened them.”

“…”

“You may not know this, but once she takes off that makeup, it’s a disaster. You don’t have to go looking far for a Monster Wave.”

Hayeon glared at me as if she wanted to kill me. The medical staff listened with their mouths hanging open, then gathered in a corner of the room and started whispering.

“Is he all right?”

“Does he look all right to you?”

“Hard to say. His younger sister looks pretty, at least. Her makeup’s waterproof, so I don’t think it ran…”

“I can’t believe this. Is that what you’re worried about right now? Are you in your right mind? Who recommended you for this job?”

“I did. Sorry.”

“I’m sorry, Professor. What should we do?”

“Hmm. There doesn’t seem to be anything obviously wrong with his body, but the aftereffects could have affected his brain. Let’s run a full set of tests.”

“Yes. We’ll include a psychiatric evaluation.”

“…”

I’d told the truth, and they were treating me like a lunatic.

It was unfair, but there was nothing I could do. The fastest way to stop Mom from crying was to show her I was healthy.

Like I’d be sick.

But I swallowed that thought and cooperated with the healers and doctors.

Even after they’d put me through every test known to this world, I was forced to rest until the following day.

Two days.

It wasn’t a bad stretch.

Honestly, it was peaceful for once.

I was stuck in bed for two whole days without a smartphone or TV, all in the name of rest. But the people I cared about most were right there with me.

I ate, slept, laughed, and talked with my family. It felt like a dream.

If not for the nightmare I’d had just before waking up, those days would have been so happy I wouldn’t have felt a hint of anxiety.

But I already knew I couldn’t make them last any longer.

If I wanted to quiet the unease growing inside me, it was time to step back out into the world.

Mom and Hayeon. The medical staff. And all the friends who didn’t come to visit because they wanted me to rest.

They might have kept quiet about what was happening outside for my sake, but the System hadn't.

Alliance Leader, huh?

The System notifications I hadn't had a chance to check told me what had happened. Right after I'd finished Michael Silbert off for good, the World Hunter Federation had appointed me its new Alliance Leader while I was unconscious.

Never thought I'd end up as Alliance Leader, of all things.

I was surprised at first, but after thinking it over, I decided to accept.

It was their decision, but it was mine too.

I'd seen more than once what someone's ambition—what a hunger for power—could lead to.

Team Leader Choi or Magic Johnson would make a leader several times better than me. But if I was the one they'd chosen, I was willing to live up to their expectations, even if I still had a lot to learn.

I'll do the best I can.

Before that, though, there was one thing I had to take care of.

"Hayeon."

"Yeah?"

"You know Team Leader Choi's number, right?"

"No. Rest."

Her answer was immediate and firm.

Hayeon continued, her face set.

"Mom would be thrilled to hear that. Right?"

"Call him for me."

"…"

"There's something I need to take care of. Please."

At my earnest request, Hayeon bit her lip.

"Ugh, this is driving me crazy."

"Thanks."

"Are you crazy? Who said I'd call him for you?"

"You always bite your lip before agreeing to do me a favor."

"…"

Hayeon stared at me without a word, then let out a deep sigh.

That meant yes.

"The wind's cold."

That was the first thing Team Leader Choi said when I saw him after several days.

I was sitting alone on a bench. Glad to see him, I broke into a grin.

“How long has it been?”

“Today makes exactly one week since that day.”

“Must’ve been a busy week. In more ways than one.”

Team Leader Choi smiled back and joked, “Yes. While you were lying comfortably in bed, we were running around like mad.”

“You make me feel bad. Should I apologize?”

“No need. It’s one of the boss’s privileges. Though the press is desperate to find out how you’re doing.”

“Fair enough. They made a fuss last time, too. Now I’ve even got the title of Alliance Leader.”

Team Leader Choi paused at my calm response.

“You knew?”

“Yes.”

“That’s not quite the reaction I expected. Did your family tell you?”

“No. They wouldn’t even let me lift a finger.”

“Hmm. I wonder where the news leaked from. I told everyone to keep quiet so you could rest.”

“Who knows? I’ve got sources you don’t know about, too.”

Team Leader Choi studied me for a moment, then nodded without saying anything.

The gesture said he wouldn’t ask any more.

He already suspected I had secrets other people didn’t know about. To him, why I’d contacted him only two days after waking was probably the more important question.

“Things outside are going smoothly, despite what you may think. You could rest a little longer.”

“Is that so?”

“Yes. A week ago, we arrested a number of key figures with close ties to Michael Silbert. Among them…”

He rattled off names: French President Emmanuel, Swiss Interior Minister Werner, who was almost certain to become the next president, and the head of a massive corporation.

Every one of them was a heavyweight who held sway over politics and business around the world.

There were few Hunters among them. The ones who could have been called their leaders had either died alongside Michael Silbert that day or been captured.

“It was a bold and excellent decision. If you’d spared them, a much larger civil war would have broken out.”

Yes. That was exactly why we couldn’t let the bastards live.

The battle at the National Assembly had been a bloody bargain: their lives in exchange for tens, perhaps hundreds, of thousands of others.

But Team Leader Choi still hadn’t mentioned the one being I wanted to know about.

What had happened to the one person I was worried about. The source of this unease.

“Team Leader Choi.”

I looked up at the night sky, thick with stars. No—I looked at the information for the Main Quest, Cataclysm, still hanging there, and continued.

“Where is The Prophet?”

Chapter 790

"Where is The Prophet?"

At that single question, the smile on Team Leader Choi's lips faded.

Not What happened to him? but Where is he?

A man with a keen mind, he immediately grasped the simple but clear distinction.

And I already knew what the brief silence meant.

"You still haven't found him."

Team Leader Choi watched me with a grave expression, then nodded.

"That's right."

"You don't even know where he is?"

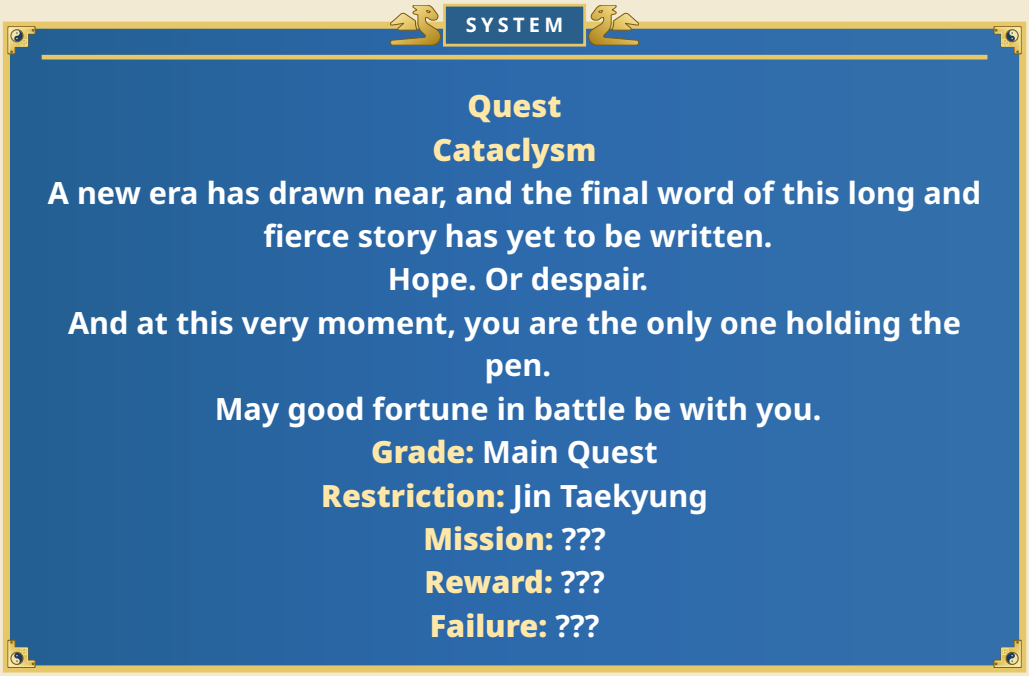
Team Leader Choi didn't answer. Silence was as good as a yes.

Damn it.

I swallowed the curse and looked up at the night sky.

Just because you're in the same place doesn't mean you're all looking in the same direction.

Just like Team Leader Choi and I were looking at different scenery at that very moment.



I stared at the holographic window covered in question marks and muttered to myself.

The Quest still isn't complete...

That could only mean one thing.

The being those question marks stood for had never been Michael Silbert.

Why? Why the hell?

I hadn't seen this coming. I'd been certain that eliminating Michael Silbert was the only way to complete the Quest and stop the coming Cataclysm.

But I'd been wrong. Completely wrong.

The Prophet.

That deranged fanatic who called himself God's messenger and a prophet—the terrorist I'd taken for a lackey following Michael Silbert's orders—was the real key to this Main Quest.

Or…

He was where the coming Cataclysm would begin.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Information for the Main Quest, Cataclysm, has been updated.
The mission has changed in accordance with your realization.
Mission: Eliminate The Prophet within the time limit (Incomplete).

New holographic windows filled my vision. At the same moment, I understood.

The clock on the bomb called Cataclysm, the one that would soon shake the world, was ticking even now.

These days, even "global village" sounded outdated.

More happened across the world in a single day than anyone could keep track of. People had grown used to seeing one shocking story after another on TV and the internet, then promptly forgetting them.

But what had happened a week ago had shaken even them.

Across the world, Hunters had launched armed crackdowns and arrests, sudden as land mines going off. Those caught up in them included high-ranking politicians—even presidents—some of the world's wealthiest people, and Hunters.

Every one of them was a heavyweight with influence over global politics, business, and security—not merely a particular region or country.

People waiting for the new World Hunter Federation's inaugural ceremony were thrown into confusion. Soon, confusion gave way to shock.

"The whole truth is in here."

Choi Minwoo stood before the cameras as interim spokesperson, holding a microchip smaller than a fingernail.

Of all the many cameras installed throughout the National Assembly to capture a moment in history, it was the only one to survive the aftermath of the tremendous battle.

It was also a Pandora's box, containing a truth no one could bear to face.

The footage ran for just over three hours. But once it was uploaded to a streaming site where the whole world could watch, it plunged the world into a pit of silence.

Choi Minwoo had told the truth. Everything was there.

No edits. No lies.

Only facts, plain and undeniable.

Billions of people were confronted with an unbelievable truth—and, within the Pandora's box that had suddenly opened, they discovered something still left inside.

Hope.

> └ One thing's for sure. I'd trust them with my family's lives.
>
> └ Agreed.
>
> └ Real heroes. Real Hunters.
>
> └ Yeah. And Jin's the greatest hero of them all.
>
> └ Damn it. What kind of idiot talked shit about that young savior?
>
> └ Hate to admit it, but I did until recently. I was an idiot. Call me a fucking moron and I couldn't argue.
>
> └ You bald piece of shit.
>
> └ Leave the bald part out before I put a bullet in your head.
>
> └ Fine, you fucking moron.
>
> └ God bless you.

> └ I've decided. I'm naming my unborn child Sibal.[3160] It's a great name, taken from Jin Taekyung's nickname.
>
> └ As a Korean passing by, I'd advise against that.

> └ Wait. Am I the only one who knows about that fucking monster? Why isn't anyone saying anything?
>
> └ If you mean the Stone-King, stop trying to derail the conversation and get lost.
>
> └ Are you insane? He's a monster.
>
> └ Oh. So?

[3160] "Sibal" sounds like ssibal, a common Korean profanity roughly equivalent to "fuck."

> ㄴ Listen. My cousin was shot and killed by a Black man, but I don’t treat my Black friends like murderers.
>
> ㄴ Michael Silbert killed countless people. The Stone-King fought for them. So which one’s the hero, and which one’s the monster?
>
> ㄴ Shit. Morons like you are going to be the end of the world.
>
> ㄴ Great. You done? Now get lost.
>
> ㄴ Goodbye, idiot.

> ㄴ I’m French, and at first I thought there’d been a terrorist attack. I was on social media when a video popped up of the president falling out of a window at the Élysée Palace.
>
> ㄴ Emmanuel? He deserved to die. The bastard was in bed with Michael Silbert.
>
> ㄴ Did you see the video of the Swiss interior minister getting arrested? Magic Johnson was beating him with that big, beautiful staff of his.
>
> ㄴ OMG…
>
> ㄴ Buddy. It’s not what you think. Don’t let your imagination run wild.
>
> ㄴ It was a swift, brilliant operation. The World Hunter Federation organized its forces in just an hour, then rooted out the traitors planted all over the world. They didn’t have time to run or fight back.
>
> ㄴ They kept the operation completely secret until it began, too. If this had been Mexico or Brazil, the information probably would’ve leaked through the gangs.

> ㄴ We support you and love you. May God watch over you all.
>
> ㄴ It’s too soon to relax. Nobody’s forgotten about the fanatical terrorist, right?
>
> ㄴ Of course we remember. But the World Hunter Federation will protect us. That lunatic who calls himself The Prophet is keeping his head down and watching what happens.
>
> ㄴ The attacks stopped two weeks ago. The Prophet will die soon, just like bin Laden, and then we’ll finally have real peace.
>
> ㄴ Jin. Please wake up soon. We’re waiting for our hero.

A week was nowhere near enough time for the world to recover from the shock. Even so, humanity was quickly finding its footing again, sustained by faith in the World Hunter Federation and hope that things would get better.

But somewhere beyond their sight, something new was already stirring.

Or perhaps a fire was starting—one that would swallow the world.

"Concentrate every force we can mobilize in the Middle East. Right now."

Choi Minwoo relayed Jin Taekyung's words straight to the World Hunter Federation's leadership. No one questioned them.

This wasn't a request. It was an order.

The first order from the Alliance Leader they had chosen.

And there had never been any doubt about their answer.

"Yes, boss."

The World Hunter Federation began to move.

"They're coming."

A trembling voice echoed through the cave.

The Prophet silently looked down at the man prostrate at their feet, then spoke.

"What is their estimated strength?"

"Th-that…"

"Answer."

The man hesitated, then pressed his head to the ground.

"We estimate at least a hundred thousand."

"…!"

"…!"

A hundred thousand.

The staggering number, far beyond what they had expected, froze the already chilly air in the cave.

Everyone gathered there knew those hundred thousand weren't ordinary infantry.

The World Hunter Federation.

Hunters were rare, whatever their rank. Only one person in a thousand had the chance to awaken, and even then, they had to undergo specific training before they could be recognized as a Hunter.

But their enemy was the World Hunter Federation.

True to its name, every Hunter in the world belonged to that vast organization. From humanity's billions, millions had beaten the 0.1 percent odds and been chosen by God. Now they were bearing down on the desert.

No—the whole world was coming.

"The entire desert is under surveillance."

"We've lost contact with our informants planted in the Pentagon."

"The residents of nearby villages and small towns are being evacuated."

"We have reports that the United States has moved an aircraft carrier…"

Their growing fear spilled into their voices. For a long while, they poured out everything they had learned. The situation was already hurtling toward the worst possible outcome.

A week ago, Michael Silbert's unexpected death had marked the beginning of their downfall.

The newly formed World Hunter Federation had moved boldly, without hesitation. It had begun by bathing its inaugural ceremony in blood, then set about gathering up the seeds Michael Silbert had sown. By revealing the whole truth without hiding or embellishing a thing, it had won support across the world.

Pure goodwill.

Nothing could stop the hammer the World Hunter Federation had brought down. A nation's president, the head of a corporation powerful enough to sway the world's stock markets—they had all fallen, bleeding.

Half a century ago, after Osama bin Laden's terrorist attack, Pakistan and other Middle Eastern countries had refused to let the United States cross their airspace. Even they would not dare oppose this operation.

They could hardly do something as insane as make enemies of the World Hunter Federation and the entire world. If they did, they would be met with artillery fire and a great many Hunters.

But unlike those who could choose to compromise, the people gathered in this cave had no choice at all.

"Prophet!"

"Please, please show us the way we must go!"

Desperate cries rang out from all sides.

Armed with fanaticism, they all knelt and prostrated themselves before one person alone.

They feared the enemy closing in. But they also held fast to their faith in the path they had walked: offering their lives to God, following the prophet He had sent, and witnessing the astounding miracles the Prophet had shown them.

"Teach these lost servants!"

"Defeat these infidels and proclaim God's will to the whole world!"

Fwoosh. Fwoosh.

The torches lighting the cave flickered in the wind. From beneath the Prophet's deeply drawn hood came a voice whose age and gender no one could place.

"As you wish, I shall carry out God's will and punish them. Inshallah.[3161]"

"O-oh…!"

"God is great!"

[3161] Inshallah is Arabic for "if God wills," commonly said when speaking of a hoped-for future event.

“Inshallah.[3162] Inshallah![3163]”

The anxiety that had threatened to burst gave way to cheers. As they cried out about God’s greatness and bowed again and again, the Prophet watched them and thought:

The long wait would soon bear fruit.

[3162] Inshallah is Arabic for “if God wills,” commonly said when speaking of a hoped-for future event.
[3163] Inshallah is Arabic for “if God wills,” commonly said when speaking of a hoped-for future event.

Chapter 791

As far as I knew, the Middle East mattered more to the world than most people realized.

Depending on how you defined it, it stretched from Western Asia to the countries of North Africa.

And since the Great Cataclysm, active resettlement policies had pushed its population past a staggering three hundred million.

That wasn't all.

The oil fields that had sustained the region were still doing their part, while Gates scattered throughout the area yielded Magic Gems—a resource that had rapidly overtaken oil in importance.

Of course, half the Magic Gems obtained that way probably disappear through back channels.

That was just how things worked around there.

There were no powerful civic groups or government agencies to investigate corruption, so even when resources came in, plenty leaked out the back.

In the Middle East, royal families held virtually unlimited wealth and power. Terrorist groups operated openly, and hypocrites who'd started as revolutionary leaders had evolved into dictators.

To them, the law was gum they could spit out whenever the flavor was gone.

Michael Silbert knew exactly how to exploit that.

Smuggling Magic Gems and leaving them unrefined were grave crimes under international law, but there were plenty of loopholes.

Especially in the Middle East and Africa, where terrorist groups and rebels were everywhere.

But a man who was already dead was no longer the problem.

It's the one who's still alive.

Tap.

I set down the tablet and rubbed my eyes. Staring at text for hours had worn me out.

Or maybe it was those three syllables I couldn't get out of my head.

The Prophet.

Thinking of someone whose face I didn't even know, I gazed out the window.

As the plane's wing cut across the cloud-choked sky and rain poured down, the voice I'd heard on TV seemed to rumble like thunder.

> “Following God’s will, we will not stop. Starting today, we will judge and punish you.”

Who was that bastard?

Even though the voice hadn’t been altered, I couldn’t make out their gender or age. Their face was hidden, too, beneath a hood pulled down low.

Did they cover up so carefully because people would recognize their face?

Probably, but even that wasn’t certain. The Prophet was as hard to make out as the storm clouds outside the window.

“The weather’s bad.”

A voice spoke beside me. Still looking out the window, I answered.

“It sure is. Doesn’t look like good flying weather at all.”

“It’s worse than that. This is about as bad as it gets.”

“Think The Prophet planted a mole at the weather service?”

“What makes you think that?”

“What do you mean? It’s the perfect setup for an assassination.”

Team Leader Choi dropped into the seat beside me.

“I can tell you two things. First, the airport forecast was accurate. This is just a change in the weather caused by magical power. Second, if I were The Prophet, I wouldn’t waste my time.”

“Why not?”

“Even if this plane crashed, you would survive, Mr. Jin Taekyung.”

“…Oh.”

“Wouldn’t you?”

“Who knows? I’ve never been in a plane crash.”

Even that was a ridiculous answer. A crash from this height, in weather like this, should obviously be fatal.

Team Leader Choi seemed to think so too. He shook his head, then glanced at the tablet on the table.

“Have you read it all?”

“Yes. Enough times to be sick of it.”

Some material had been added, but about half of it was already painfully familiar.

Before the World Hunter Federation was founded, I’d spent several nights reading those same documents over and over.

They concerned Michael Silbert, so naturally they covered The Prophet and the Middle East too.

“What do you make of them?”

“Hard to say. I can tell you at least three things.”

I glared at the tablet, crammed with text.

“The Middle East is damn huge, so finding The Prophet quickly will be tough. And that bastard is damn good at hiding.”

“And the third?”

“That fucking bastard has an enormous amount of unrefined Magic Gems.”

Right. That was the problem.

The Prophet had launched indiscriminate terrorist attacks around the world, then gone quiet after Michael Silbert’s death. The public figured they’d gotten scared and was starting to relax.

But that only made me more uneasy.

This mood. This calm before the storm.

They’re planning something bigger. I’m sure of it.

I’d been given a Main Quest unlike any before, one important enough for the System to name it Cataclysm.

That was why I’d mobilized the World Hunter Federation immediately.

Even after setting aside the personnel needed to prevent further terrorist attacks and monster waves, we’d sent a full hundred thousand troops to the Middle East.

Every one of them was a Hunter. That made for an enormous force.

Even Korea, recognized worldwide as a Hunter powerhouse, couldn’t mobilize that many Hunters, regardless of their individual levels.

Some people had murmured that we were deploying far too many troops right from the start, but that nonsense died as quickly as it started.

That was how much authority and power the World Hunter Federation held now.

The UN General Assembly, representing nearly every country on Earth, had given its approval. All of humanity supported us.

If the United States had called itself the world’s police, the World Hunter Federation was recognized as such by everyone—and untouchable.

Even Russia, which had clashed constantly with the Western powers led by the United States, had promised to cooperate fully with the Federation and warned the Middle Eastern countries that objected.

—If you don’t want to die, clear a path.

The diplomatic cable was long, but that was the gist.

Vladimir Furin, Russia’s president for life, was deeply upset that a terrorist attack had destroyed Red Square. He’d also been itching to settle the score with several Middle Eastern countries that had sided with Michael Silbert at the recent UN General Assembly.

So what choice did they have?

The Middle Eastern leaders hadn't been thrilled at the prospect of a hundred thousand Hunters showing up, but within a few hours they'd thrown open their airspace and territorial waters.

International condemnation was one thing. They might also find themselves drinking radioactive tea[3164] one sunny morning.

But the whole world's cooperation wouldn't make The Prophet fall into our hands on its own.

"How far has the search gotten?"

Team Leader Choi answered at once.

"Everyone is doing their best, but so far, no one has found anything unusual. The area is vast, and it's only been a day since the search began."

I knew. That was one of the main reasons I was heading to the Middle East myself.

Even so, I couldn't help asking again, even if it was premature.

"How long do you expect it to take?"

"In the worst case, more than sixty days. That estimate assumes we mobilize every Federation Hunter and all the allied forces that joined afterward."

"…Sixty days."

"Again, that's only the worst case. If we put everything we have into it, we may well finish sooner."

Would we, though?

I said nothing, but unease stirred inside me.

They're not going to be easy to deal with.

The Prophet had evaded surveillance around the world even before the Federation was founded.

The worst terrorist in history, far beyond the South American drug lords or even his much older predecessor, Osama bin Laden.

Some people might have thought it was amazing we could catch someone like that within two months…

I wasn't.

Two months is too late.

If my guess was right, The Prophet had an enormous quantity of Magic Gems. Unrefined, and therefore all the more dangerous—a ticking time bomb.

No one knew when it would go off.

In a month. In two weeks. Or…

It could be tomorrow.

And when that bomb went off, the Cataclysm named in my Main Quest would begin. It wasn't hard to imagine.

[3164] An allusion to the 2006 poisoning of Alexander Litvinenko in London with radioactive polonium-210 administered in tea.

If that happened, a disaster on par with—no, possibly even worse than—the terrorist attacks The Prophet had carried out so far would sweep across the world.

> "It's your turn now. Let's see you struggle with everything you've got. I'll be watching from up there."

A voice suddenly echoed in my ears.

Now I understood what Michael Silbert's last words had really meant.

But just as I'd sent that bastard, who'd seemed impossible to stop, plunging into the depths of hell, I was ready to fight again.

And I had a suspicion that was close to certainty.

The Prophet isn't ready yet, either.

A hungry person wouldn't hold back with a delicious meal right in front of them.

The Prophet probably hadn't finished preparing to set off the bomb. They were lying low, holding their breath so they wouldn't be found before the cooking was done.

I have to find them before that happens. No matter what.

I looked at Team Leader Choi.

"What about the cargo? Is it behaving?"

"The cargo? Oh."

Realizing what I meant, Team Leader Choi gave me a wry smile.

"It's been quiet. Though it does cause trouble now and then."

"Keep a close eye on it. We've got a mountain of things to find out about The Prophet."

"Understood."

I nodded and turned back to the window.

Through the distant, hazy storm clouds, a city shone brightly in the darkness. It was drawing closer.

The desert night was cold.

A young man handsome enough to draw admiring looks from anyone who saw him gazed up at the black sky and murmured.

"…I think something just passed by. Was that him?"

"What?"

"Nothing. Talking to myself. Anyway, where did we lose contact?"

Xiao Shen tilted his head at the Skeleton King's reaction, then answered.

"About thirty kilometers[3165] farther southeast, Mr. S."

"Mr. S… I thought I told you not to call me that."

"Oh. Sorry, Mr. King."

"…It still sounds strange, but I don't entirely mind it."

"Thank you!"

"Don't get excited, you young human brat."

He grumbled, but the Skeleton King was in a pretty good mood as he headed toward their destination—just as he'd said.

Actually, he was rather pleased.

That little kid isn't bothered by me?

Ever since his identity had been revealed, the Skeleton King had felt eyes following him wherever he went.

Some people watched him warily, if not with outright hostility. Others smiled and treated him with kindness.

Sometimes even curiosity, depending on the kind, was a burden.

That was why the Skeleton King had chosen to conduct his search alone. Being alone was easier. It gave him a chance to escape all those eyes, if only for a while.

But this little brat from China had joined him without a second thought and stayed with him ever since.

That devious human said the only good Chink was a dead Chink. Looks like there are exceptions, even if they're rare.

Smiling to himself, the Skeleton King arrived at their destination with Xiao Shen.

It was a patch of sparse woods and desert where a search squad had lost contact an hour earlier.

"This the place?"

"Yes. No doubt about it, Mr. King."

"I don't see anything around here. Are you sure—"

The Skeleton King had been frowning as he surveyed the area, but his eyes suddenly flew open.

"…What's that?"

[3165]Thirty kilometers is about 18.6 mi.

Chapter 792

"…What's that?"

Xiao Shen turned at the words but saw nothing unusual. The Skeleton King did.

Even though Magic Johnson's illusion magic had given him a human appearance, he was fundamentally a monster.

And not just any monster—one of the highest-ranking undead.

The sensation gripping the Skeleton King at that moment was something connected to the very source of his power.

Damn it. This is…

There was no doubt.

The feeling was faint, but unmistakable.

Beneath a dark sky that swallowed even the moonlight, he sensed the energy of death scattering across the endless desert.

There wasn't a single drop of blood or a corpse in sight, but the Skeleton King recognized the energy stirring his instincts from beyond the darkness: death qi.

He knew, too, what had happened to the search squad that had suddenly gone silent about an hour ago.

"Young human brat."

"Yes?"

"Contact the main force. Tell them we found the search squad."

"…!"

The desert was still, without a trace of anyone. But the Skeleton King's words were the opposite of reassuring.

Xiao Shen finally understood what was happening. His face stiffened as he nodded, and the Skeleton King started walking, following his instincts.

Crunch. Crunch.

His feet left prints in the sand, grains crumbling beneath each step.

After about ten paces, he stopped and muttered, "Whoever did this buried them deep."

The next moment—

Fwoosh!

A section of the desert, stretching out like an endless sea, surged into the air.

With a single gesture, the Skeleton King sent out a vast surge of magical power that held the sand aloft. Beneath it lay twenty bodies. At the sight of them, he froze.

"…!"

A recent memory flashed through his mind, bringing an ominous premonition with it.

Wait. Then could it be…

His thoughts went no further. They couldn't.

Whoosh.

A chill wind blew in from somewhere, sweeping sand through the air.

Something else was carried in it.

The Skeleton King stared into a distant stretch of pitch-black desert, then turned to Xiao Shen, who had noticed nothing yet.

"Have you contacted the main force?"

"Yes. They said they're sending the support team stationed nearby right away…"

"How long?"

"Thirty minutes at most."

"Thirty minutes. That's awkward."

He clicked his tongue.

"I'm not sure I can protect anyone."

"…?"

"Hmm."

He looked Xiao Shen up and down. Then, with a sigh, he said, "Listen, young human brat. I'm giving you two missions."

"Ah, yes! I'll do anything you ask, Teacher King."

"Good attitude. First, take out that damned special radio of yours and contact the main force again."

"What should I tell them?"

"Send the most capable humans they have, as fast as they can. Not some weak support team riding in on turtles. Got it?"

Xiao Shen didn't know why recovering the bodies called for such speed or so many capable people, but he nodded without hesitation. The person he respected most in the world was Jin Taekyung, and the Skeleton King was Jin Taekyung's friend.

"Understood. What's the second mission?"

Even Xiao Shen had to ask again when he heard the answer.

"Pick up a weapon."

"What?"

"And protect yourself. If you don't think you can, you can run."

"W-wait a second."

What was that supposed to mean?

Xiao Shen blinked at the baffling order. He understood soon enough.

Rrrumble. Rrrumble.

An unfamiliar tremor traveled through the ground. It grew stronger, sending countless grains of sand bouncing into the air all around them.

Then the Skeleton King spoke, turning Xiao Shen's suspicion into certainty.

"Quite a crowd."

"…!"

Xiao Shen didn't answer. He stood with his mouth open, staring at the distant horizon. In his eyes, the darkness writhed like a living thing.

No. Those were monsters, too many to count.

Monster Wave…!

At the moment the words that had become humanity's nightmare struck Xiao Shen's mind—

Crunch.

The Skeleton King walked toward the rapidly approaching tide of monsters.

There was no fear or hesitation in his steps. Mighty magical power surged from him, reaching farther and farther across the desert.

"In the name of the King, I command you."

His low voice echoed across the desert. It pierced the thick darkness and roused the spirits crushed beneath the weight of ages and countless grains of sand.

"Answer the call."

Rrrumble!

A tremor like an earthquake swept through the desert.

At their king's call, steeped in the energy of death, spirits that had lain in deep slumber burst through the sand and rose to the surface.

Crackle!

Pale sand scattered. White bones gleamed in the darkness.

Grrr.

An Arabian leopard, its beautiful hide lost in death, stretched. Above wolves and hyenas whose eyes shone green, dozens of eagles spread wings stripped down to bone and soared into the air.

Eeeee!

Their sharp cries split the night. With wings spanning several meters,[3166] the eagles glided high overhead.

They flew past the monster army charging across the ground in a storm of sand, then scattered over the vast desert and woods. They had only one mission:

Find a certain being who wasn't here, by the King's command.

"Somewhere in this desert, there's something with the scent of humans on it. Find it. Without fail."

[3166] One meter is about 3.28 ft; several meters is several yards.

The eagles beat their wings vigorously.

They had magical power to carry them on the wind instead of feathers, and though they'd lost the life within them, their vitality would never run dry.

Whoosh!

Far below, the King watched the flock disappear into the distance. He thought of the human bodies he had uncovered moments ago, then walked toward the monster army bearing down on him.

What kind of trace was it?

Whoosh—BOOM!

A vast surge of magical power burst from his outstretched fist and swallowed the monsters at the front. A hundred or so beasts rushed into the gap it left, tearing into the enemy.

Yowww!

Smack!

A swipe of the leopard's forepaw sent an Orc's upper body flying. A pack of hyenas nimbly dodged a club falling toward their heads, then sank their teeth into a Troll's body.

Crunch!

The living monsters outnumbered them beyond comparison.

But as soon as the battle began, the Skeleton King understood. Absorbing part of Michael Silbert's magical power had strengthened his powers enough to let even these spirits, once mere wild animals, crush ordinary monsters in an instant.

Splatter! Crunch!

Graaaah!

Blood and flesh flew. The living screamed.

The enemy formation began to crumble in moments.

With a single strike, the Skeleton King knocked the heads off three ogres. Then he looked toward a dark stretch of desert.

He couldn't see anything, but he knew. Whatever had killed the search squad had already left and vanished somewhere out there.

What the hell are you?

The question he asked himself went unanswered. The Skeleton King stared into the darkness with sunken eyes, then raised an ogre lying like a rotten log from the dead.

No—not just the ogre. Everything around him.

"Answer the call."

Fwoosh.

A dazzling golden radiance spread in every direction, so bright it was hard to believe it was magical power.

The undying army, now twice its former size, fell upon the living.

BOOM!

Grrrrr!

The desert was gradually buried beneath countless screams and death.

Xiao Shen stared blankly at the scene before remembering the mission he'd forgotten.

"Base. Base, respond."

Chhh.

Static hissed from the radio enchanted with communication magic as it sent out a mana-laced signal. The signal pushed through the unstable magical power permeating the air, traveling farther and farther.

And when Xiao Shen's urgent transmission finally reached the main force—

"Company, halt!"

An aircraft carrying someone landed smoothly on the runway, between ranks of soldiers and Hunters standing in flawless formation.

This operation involved a hundred thousand Hunters and a coalition of nations from across the world. It was massive—less an operation than a war.

Plenty of Hunters remained at the main base, and there were so many soldiers you could hardly take a step without running into one. An army of different nations and races.

The World Hunter Federation had to choose its commander at the base carefully, in case the chain of command broke down. Team Leader Choi, an excellent adviser, recommended someone.

A man with extraordinary strength and a distinguished record as a Hunter, along with the strategy and knowledge to command a large army.

A Hunter and a soldier. The only man to have reached the top of both professions.

Chuck Hagel—an S-rank Hunter active since the Great Cataclysm and the former Secretary of Defense of the good ol' U.S. of A.

"Oh. Sleeping Beauty finally showed up. Or were you hibernating?"

Chuck Hagel's idea of a greeting drew quiet laughter from the people lined up on either side of me.

It vanished without a trace the next moment.

"You're laughing? Does this fucked-up wartime situation look like a joke to you?"

"…"

"You lunatics. From now on, anyone who laughs in front of me is getting their ass kicked, rank be damned. I don't care if you're some pasty Yankee dumbass who thinks white skin is your greatest achievement in life, a darkie spouting bullshit about political correctness, or a yellow monkey who can’t stop staring at his smartphone. I’ll beat every last one of you half to death. Understood?”

“Yes, sir!”

“Goddamn it. I can’t hear you!”

“Yes!! Sir!!”

Only after everyone shouted at the top of their lungs did Chuck Hagel nod and take a drag from his cigar.

“Okay, ladies.”

“…”

Holy shit. The man had presence.

He really was a living legend. Even Senior Kim Soodan would have to concede he had a thing or two to learn from Hagel about taking over a stage.

Of course, those thick arms like a bear’s and the violence he was born with had a lot to do with creating this brisk atmosphere.

He’s definitely the right man for the job.

Just as I thought that, a military jeep came tearing across the runway and screeched to a stop in front of us. A soldier in dress uniform hurriedly called out.

“Monster Wave! We’ve received an emergency request for support. It’s a Monster Wave!”

If I’d been an ordinary traveler, I would’ve taken a day to recover from jet lag.

But my life had parted ways with the word ordinary a long time ago, and there was no chance of them ever getting back together.

“Where is it?”

Chapter 793

With the whole world searching high and low, the chances that The Prophet had slipped into a major city full of people were close to zero.

So the tight search net spread across the Middle East, centered on the main force, was focused on monitoring underdeveloped areas. The place we headed to right away was no exception.

Wasteland stretched out on either side of a track so rough it hardly deserved to be called a road.

Beyond it lay a desert as vast as the open sea, dotted with little stands of trees like reefs.

And there, familiar faces were waiting for me.

“You’re with the main force, righ—huh?”

Surprise flashed across a face so young it belonged more to a boy than a man. Xiao Shen stared at me, dumbstruck, then cried out.

“Mr. Jin!”

“Damn it. Why does that Chinese kid have to be so loud?”

Chuck Hagel had come along in Team Leader Choi’s place in case anything happened. He let out a deep sigh.

“Do me a favor. Can’t you do something about that kid? Every time I see him, all he talks about is you. My ears are starting to hurt.”

“Well, he is pretty attached to me.”

“There’s attached, and then there’s that. Wilson wasn’t even that bad.”

“Who’s Wilson?”

“My dog. Whenever I came home after a few days away, he’d charge at me like a maniac. Must’ve thought I was an intruder.”

“Maybe Wilson just had a bad temper?”

“He died three years ago. It was summer.”

“…”

Shit. He’d played two cheat cards at once.

The Talullah[3167] moment and the summertime sentimentality hit me so hard I could barely breathe. By comparison, I was glad to see Xiao Shen, who’d just sprinted over like a track athlete.

“H-how could someone as shabby as Mr. Jin come all the way to a place this precious?”

“You’ve got that backward.”

“Oh.”

[3167] Talullah is a Korean internet meme about awkwardly backpedaling after unwittingly insulting someone’s loved one.

I patted the statue-like Xiao Shen on the shoulder, then looked around.

The place was definitely shabby.

Sticky blood and a foul stench covered everything.

As I gazed at a pool of blood the size of a small lake, a familiar voice reached me.

“You’re slow as hell. What took you so long?”

I turned. A figure was walking out of the darkness, countless pairs of monster eyes gleaming eerily behind him.

Shing.

Dozens of Hunters accompanying us as our supposed entourage reflexively drew their weapons. I stopped them with a casual wave and answered evenly.

“I got here as fast as I could.”

“Already talking nonsense. I’ve been waiting at least a week.”

“Well, I did sleep for a long time.”

“So you dumped this great king in a shithole like this while you rested without a care?”

“More or less.”

“Damn it.”

Scuff. Scuff.

For all his grumbling, he couldn’t hide the pleasure on his face as he drew closer.

I greeted the Skeleton King for the first time in a week.

“You’re still alive.”

“I am. Though I died a long time ago.”

They say even a dog can learn to recite poetry after three years at a village school.

I gave a quiet laugh at the Skeleton King’s practiced retort.

Behind him stood an army of well over a thousand monsters, even by a rough count.

Though, technically, it was an army of the undead.

“Looks like you’ve more or less finished up. What about the rest?”

“There are none. I took care of every last one.”

I nodded. If the Skeleton King said so, then that was that.

Even Michael Silbert, who’d kept his identity completely hidden by controlling the two energies coexisting inside him, had once aroused the Skeleton King’s suspicions. Whether he wanted the role or not, the Skeleton King was a monster—and when it came to magical power, he was the foremost expert.

And his abilities are exceptional.

In Murim, a Supreme Peak master is called a one-man army.

An S-rank Hunter in the modern world might not compare to a Supreme Peak master, of course, but they weren’t treated all that differently.

Each was a superhuman operating on a different level from ordinary people and Hunters.

Even among such people, the Skeleton King's abilities stood out.

Any capable S-rank Hunter could take down an army of monsters alone. Finishing the job in less than thirty minutes without a single casualty was another matter.

"So that's i-mon-je-mon—monsters against monsters.[3168]"

"I-mon-je-mon? What are you talking about?"

"You don't know the four-character idiom? Passed down to us by our wise ancestors…"

"I have no need for it. I'm a citizen of the great United States of America."

"If I remember right, just a few months ago you read 'alligator' as 'arigatou.'[3169]"

"I'm Japanese American."

"…"

"Konnichiwa.[3170]"

Is this guy fucking insane?

I stared at the Skeleton King, who could swap out his family tree at the drop of a hat, with some bemusement. But I didn't have much to say. He'd held off a Monster Wave by himself. The least I could do was praise him instead of cursing him out.

I sighed and started to turn away. Then a question occurred to me.

Why did he call for backup?

The Skeleton King was powerful. As long as his magical power held out, he could create an endless army of the undead, and his own fighting ability was no joke.

So why?

Just to protect Xiao Shen?

Or…

Was there something else?

I turned back. Maybe my thoughts showed on my face, because the Skeleton King was watching me with a subdued look I hadn't seen a moment ago.

"What?"

"Hmm."

"What is it?"

After a brief silence, he answered.

"Even this great king doesn't know."

"What?"

[3168] I-mon-je-mon twists a Korean four-character idiom about using one enemy against another, replacing part of it with "monster."

[3169] Arigatou is Japanese for "thank you."

[3170] Konnichiwa is a Japanese greeting meaning "hello."

“I couldn’t work out what did it, or how it was possible, no matter how much I thought about it. I tried to find it, but it had already vanished without a trace.”

“What do you mean, ‘it’? What the hell are you talking ab—”

“You’ll understand when you see it. You’ll remember, too.”

Remember what?

Before I could make sense of it, the Skeleton King gave an order.

“Bring them here.”

Thud. Thud.

At his gesture, three headless undead ogres approached with heavy steps. Then, with a care that seemed impossible for creatures their size, they set down what they were carrying.

The moment I saw the twenty bodies of people who had once been human, I understood what the Skeleton King meant.

“…Fuck.”

The curse escaped through my clenched teeth like a groan, mingling with the cool desert air.

Chuck Hagel came over to inspect the bodies. The cigar fell from his mouth.

“Holy shit.”

He wasn’t the only one.

“What the hell is this…?”

“Damn it. Henry?”

Shocked cries and curses broke out all around us. Those who made no sound simply stood there, stunned.

Was it because the bodies had been so horribly mutilated?

No.

The other Hunters and I had seen countless horrific sights. On a battlefield reeking of monsters and blood, even a severed limb wouldn’t make us bat an eye.

But even people like us had never seen anyone die like this before.

Almost none. A handful of us, myself included, had.

“Fuck. Jin, is this…?”

“Yes.”

I kept my voice as calm as I could.

Moonlight spilled through gaps in the slowly parting clouds. Beneath it lay twenty bodies drained of all vitality, their skin and bones shriveled like mummies.

I thought of someone who’d died the same way only a month ago, in an unnamed hideout.

“Siegfried Bassmann.”

One of humanity's three great Grand Mages. Or rather, one of the three who had been.

Whatever had killed him was here in this desert.

Ding!

The distance to the site and back was the same, but the return trip felt incomparably shorter.

My head was full of questions.

How?

It wasn't just me. Everyone had been certain Michael Silbert killed Siegfried Bassmann.

The reason was simple.

Bassmann was a Grand Mage, but unlike Magic Johnson, a War Mage who specialized in combat magic, he was a scholar through and through. That was why Johnson had suspected him of designing Area A. Bassmann was a master of barrier magic based on Magic Formations, as well as an expert on monsters.

Would a mage that skilled—and that reclusive—have protected his hideout with nothing but a tarp?

Like Area A, his hideout had been concealed behind all kinds of barriers. Only a handful of people in the world were strong enough to break through those spells.

And of that handful, Michael Silbert was the only one who'd wanted Bassmann dead.

But…

We got it wrong.

I knew it the moment I saw the bodies.

I'd been wrong. We all had.

At least on the day Siegfried Bassmann died, Michael Silbert hadn't been the one to visit the Grand Mage's hideout.

If Michael had killed him, the Quest window still occupying a corner of my vision should have disappeared long ago.

SYSTEM

Quest
An Unknown Death
The reclusive Grand Mage, Siegfried Bassmann, has died for unknown reasons.
But everything has a cause.
Discover how he died and who killed him.
Grade: Supreme Peak
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Mission: Discover the truth behind his death (Incomplete)
Reward: ???
Failure: ???

The System wasn't all-powerful.

It gave me a vague direction to follow, but it never told me how far I was from my destination or what traps lay along the way.

That was probably why I hadn't noticed anything strange about this Quest, even when I checked my System messages and Quest windows right after waking up.

I'd simply assumed it was still open because I hadn't gotten the full truth about Bassmann's death out of Michael Silbert.

To me, the Cataclysm Main Quest was the root I had to pull out right away. Everything else was just a branch.

That had been my crucial mistake.

Branches and roots served different purposes, but they were parts of the same tree. Follow a root upward and you reached a branch. Trace a branch down and you reached the root hidden deep underground.

I just hadn't uncovered it yet. Even if it was hidden now, I could find it someday.

And in that sense, the first person I went to see after returning to the main force was one of the largest branches on the sick tree that was Michael Silbert.

"Someone died about two hours ago. Not just one person—twenty."

A faint smile crossed the gaunt face on the other side of the table as soon as I sat down and said it.

"You're impatient. You've invited a guest here—can't he at least have a cup of coffee?"

Coffee. A smile. A guest.

I licked my parched lips.

Strangely, I wasn't angry. No—maybe I'd reached the limit of my patience the moment we began.

“I’m going to ask you one thing. Listen carefully and answer me, you crow bastard.”

Huginn froze under my killing intent. I put into words the question that hadn’t left my mind the entire way back.

“Did The Prophet kill Siegfried Bassmann?”

Chapter 794

“Did The Prophet kill Siegfried Bassmann?”

Huginn clamped his mouth shut at the killing intent in my voice. Just as he had for the past week. Just as he would forever, it seemed.

But unlike the investigators who’d interrogated him so far, I had no intention of backing down.

No matter what it took.

“What do you think of this room? Nice atmosphere, don’t you think?”

At my sudden question, Huginn’s eyebrow twitched.

I stood and slowly paced around the spacious room, furnished with nothing but a table and chairs.

“No cameras running twenty-four hours a day, no observation window. Must feel like paradise to a prisoner, right? I went through something similar once, so I know how awful it feels to be watched every second.”

“…”

“That’s why I brought you here. I thought it’d be more convenient for both of us. Like I said, no prying eyes, and…”

I dropped back into my seat with a thump. “The soundproofing magic is perfect, too.”

He didn’t answer, but I knew.

The look in his sunken eyes told me he’d understood exactly what I meant.

After a brief silence, a snicker slipped between Huginn’s lips.

Pfft.

The breathy sound grew louder until his laughter rang through the room. His shoulders shook for a long while before he finally spoke.

“Is that all?”

“What?”

“I asked if that’s all you’ve got. Torture, threats—whatever you’re going to do, do it properly. That isn’t even worth laughing at.”

This time it was my turn to keep my mouth shut. Huginn took the baton, his face full of scorn.

“You won’t get the answer you want from me, no matter what you try. Just like those bastards who came before you.”

Those bastards who came before me.

So that was why he’d grown so gaunt since I last saw him. Apparently, I wasn’t the first visitor.

Of course, I’d more or less guessed as much.

A bunch of countries could join forces, form the UN, and draft an international convention against torture. In the end, if no one found out, what did it matter?

And Huginn had been Michael Silbert's right hand, handling missions both big and small.

A traitor to humanity who held a vital secret had locked his lips tight. The American torturers seasoned in the Middle East had probably put their skills to work while the leadership looked the other way.

And every one of them failed.

I studied Huginn after his outburst.

His mana was suppressed and his entire body bound, but he was still an S-rank Hunter. More than that, he was an exceptional fighter chosen to be Michael Silbert's right hand.

Even torture and mental magic would struggle to break his will.

"Just talk and it'll all be over. Like the others who were captured with you, all you have to do is tell the truth."

"Go fuck yourself."

"Michael Silbert left you a final message, didn't he? You've heard it by now."

"I have. But this is entirely my choice. Ever since I was five—"

"Shut up. I don't want to hear it. I don't care if you were a piano prodigy at five or an orphan who grew to hate the world."

Everyone had their sob story.

But I wasn't some late-night radio host, and I had no reason to listen to a villain's tired old backstory.

I did know what he wanted most right now, though.

"If you tell the truth, I'll promise you one thing."

"A promise?"

"Yeah. A promise."

"Then you won't get an answer. I don't need any—"

I cut off his scornful reply with the one line I'd prepared.

"I'll kill you."

"…!"

"As painlessly as possible. Cleanly. I can't promise to let you go—I couldn't keep that promise. But I can do this today."

"You bastard…"

"Don't deny it. You'd rather die than keep living like this, wouldn't you?"

He tried to hide it, but I could see it.

Resignation and spite mingled in his eyes as they began to waver. His tongue, though, still refused to swallow his pride.

"Cut the bullshit. There's no way you can make me talk."

“From what you’ve been saying, you definitely know something.”

“…”

“By the way, how old are you now? Around fifty, if I remember right… Still young. You’ve got a long life ahead of you.”

In Murim, fifty was old enough to be called a grandfather without anyone batting an eye. But in the modern world, fifty was still the prime of life.

Plenty of people with money lived past a hundred thanks to cutting-edge medicine and magical health care.

And Huginn was an S-rank Hunter. Even with his mana suppressed, his vitality was on a completely different level from an ordinary person’s.

“Our crow friend’s going to live a long time. Of course, he’ll spend the rest of it in prison.”

I leaned my chair way back and gazed at the pure white ceiling, my voice calm as I went on.

“A sealed room without a ray of sunlight. Someone watching you around the clock. Interrogations whenever they feel like it. Or should I say torture? After everything you’ve done, they’ll probably be pretty brutal for a long time.”

“…”

“You’ve been tough enough to make it this far, somehow… But what happens when it goes on for fifty years? Well, at least you’ll stay healthy. They’ll shower you with potions after every round of cutting.”

Millions had been killed or injured in the terrorist attacks.

In front of a humanity consumed by grief and rage, the word human rights had already become meaningless.

If an article appeared in the New York Times tomorrow morning saying Huginn had been tortured, people all over the world would be shocked—and start collecting donations.

Not for his legal fees. For potions to prolong his suffering forever.

And as time crawled by, Huginn’s mind would slowly fall apart.

Or maybe it had already begun to crack.

“Team Leader Choi told me something interesting on the way here. Apparently, you caused a bit of a commotion on the plane. Are you sick? Or was it a seizure?”

Probably the latter.

Pain was the same for everyone, even an S-rank Hunter with a strong body and mind. He just knew how to endure it.

Getting used to pain didn’t make it hurt less.

“Why aren’t you answering? You’re making me feel awkward for asking. If you’re already like this, how are you going to get through the rest of your life?”

Just as I straightened from my half-reclined position, a wet crunch sounded and blood poured from Huginn's mouth.

He'd bitten his tongue.

"Ouch. That must hurt."

I clicked my tongue, pulled a potion from my Inventory, and shoved it into Huginn's mouth. The bleeding stopped almost at once, and his half-severed tongue healed.

"Let's not make this harder on each other. I didn't remove your gag so you could bite your tongue. Besides, I'm starting to run out of the potions I brought…"

Crunch. Splurt.

The moment I said I was running out, Huginn bit his tongue again. I sighed.

"I told you not to do that."

Then I rummaged through my Inventory and took out a potion.

Or rather, a box packed full of them.

Thud.

"Please. I'm asking nicely. I've only got about three hundred left. Okay?"

"…!"

"At least this time you only cut off a little bit of your tongue."

"…"

"Open your mouth. Come on. Say 'ah.'"

Huginn stared at me blankly instead of answering, so I slapped him across the face.

Smack!

Teeth flew in every direction.

But I wasn't satisfied with stopping there.

Smack! Crunch.

His jaw joint broke, and his mouth fell open on its own.

"That's it. Good job. You listen so well. But you've got tartar buildup. When was your last cleaning?"

Blood smeared around his mouth, Huginn stammered out an answer.

"Tw-two years ago…"

"That's a while. Potions aren't a cure-all. Tartar isn't an injury, so they won't heal it. You need to brush your teeth. Or go to the dentist. What do you need to do?"

"Brush my teeth, go to the dentist…"

"What are you talking about, dumbass? Just use Clean magic. Is your head for decoration? Have you kept it around since birth so you can use it as a weapon in an emergency? Did you dream of becoming a Dullahan in elementary school?"

"Why are you even—"

“But you little shit. I’ve let you get away with enough. You fucking bastard, you keep dragging this out like you’re the last royal chef of Joseon, carefully tasting everything first. What is this, a royal banquet? You’re not leaving until you’ve used every potion in this box.”

“I’ll tell you! I’ll tell you everything—!”

“Shut up.”

I didn’t know what I was saying. Or why I was acting like this.

All I knew was that the heat that had been creeping up from my gut finally reached my head.

Grab. Wham!

I snatched up a potion bottle and swung it at the top of his head. At the dull impact and surge of pain, his tightly bound body trembled.

“W-wait!”

“This is reinforced glass, you bastard.”

Wham! Wham! Crash!

Even reinforced glass could only take about three hits.

Shards showered over the top of his head, now spurting blood. The potion inside poured down with them.

Splash.

Healing and pain at the same time. A miracle.

But before he’d finished healing, I grabbed another bottle.

Whack! Whack! Whaaack!

Crash!

When I came to my senses, I found myself pawing at an empty box.

“Is… is it over?”

“No.”

I pulled a fresh box from my Inventory.

“Hang in there. There are still two hundred left.”

“…!”

“You can do it. Let’s keep at it together. I can do this all day. I might even be fine doing it every day from now on.”

Huginn stared at me wide-eyed, then spoke in a trembling voice.

“I-I said I’d talk. Why are you…”

“Bullshit. When?”

“I’ve been saying it for ages. Over and over. The whole time…”

“What a ridiculous bastard. Do I look like an idiot to you?”

“I’m telling the truth! I really did!”

“Are you yelling at me right now? Do you—do you feel so wronged you can’t stand it?”

“N-no, that’s not what I—”

“Forget it. You hurt my feelings. I’ve already got this box out, so let’s finish it before we talk again.”

“…!”

I thought I might have vaguely heard him say something like that, but what did it matter?

Thanks to Huginn’s excellent teamwork, we emptied the second box of potions, too. When I took out a third, I heard his tearful voice.

“Stop! Stooop!”

The mouth even veteran torturers hadn’t been able to pry open was now running free.

Maybe the genuine madness I’d shown had moved him, I thought. I closed the box I’d opened halfway.

“You finally understand how sincere I am.”

“…The promise you made earlier?”

“I’ll keep it. If you want to die that badly.”

“How can I trust you?”

“That’s up to you. But I swear on everything I have. That’s all.”

“…”

“So? Your answer?”

Huginn swallowed, then finally spoke.

“He did.”

“Be precise. Again.”

“The one who killed Siegfried Bassmann… was the person they call The Prophet.”

There was no doubt. Huginn was telling the truth.

But just as my suspicion became certainty, another question came to mind.

“The person they call The Prophet?”

“…Ah.”

Maybe it was because his mind was foggy. He looked like he’d said something he didn’t need to, but it was too late to take back words once he’d let them out.

There’s more.

I’d thought Michael Silbert and The Prophet were connected, but I hadn’t been able to pin down exactly how.

I glared at him, my eyes sinking deep, and spoke.

“Tell me what you mean. Tell me everything you know about The Prophet.”

“T-that…”

It was ironic.

He had to struggle not to live, but to die. Yet Huginn had been driven to the edge of a cliff. He had no choices left.

“He’s Muninn.”

“What?”

The moment I blurted out the question, a memory flashed through my mind: the day Huginn first came to Ares Guild.

Two ravens engraved into a corner of his business card.

And… the conversation I’d had with Team Leader Choi.

“Huginn and Muninn. Those two ravens are symbols of a certain god from Norse mythology.”

“Who?”

“Odin.”

“…!”

I blinked.

Odin, the supreme god. And the two ravens who served him: Huginn and Muninn.

There had never been just one crow to begin with.

Chapter 795

SYSTEM

Quest success conditions met!
Mission: Discover the truth behind the death (Complete)
Quest An Unknown Death successfully completed!
You have obtained the special Item Truthful Eye!
You have gained a large amount of EXP!

Ding. Ding. Ding.

The System messages appearing before my eyes and ringing in my ears were the final confirmation that everything Huginn had said was true.

But a Quest was just a Quest. I wanted more.

Everything about Muninn—or the person called The Prophet.

“Spill everything you know about him. Don’t leave out a single thing.”

I leaned in until Huginn’s trembling breath brushed my face.

“This isn’t what we agreed at the start…”

“An agreement? Of course I’ll keep it. Just not now.”

The condition for keeping my promise in the first place was confirming that The Prophet had killed Siegfried Bassmann. But in this relationship, I was the one holding all the cards.

“Talk. Or you’ll rot in prison until the day you die.”

“…!”

“You know what I’m like. If I say I’ll do something, I do it. Quit trying to outthink me and open your mouth. Go ahead and mix in a lie if you think you can get away with it.”

You could learn a lot from a person’s eyes. The resignation that had just taken over Huginn’s told me he’d finally given up.

“…Fuck.”

The curse came out almost like a sigh. Then he began to speak.

“I don’t know much about him, either. Not exactly what the current Muninn is like.”

I’d grabbed a potion bottle at his first words, but what he hurriedly added made me frown.

The current Muninn?

That was too loaded a phrase to brush off.

It sounded as if…

“Like he hasn’t always been the same person.”

"That's right. He's changed several times."

My mind raced. I slowly set down the potion bottle and stared at Huginn.

"Tell me more."

"Since I became an adult and officially began serving the Guild Master, I've met three Muninns. Including the ones before then, the person now called The Prophet is the fifth Muninn."

"Before that?"

"Before the Great Cataclysm ended. There were war orphans everywhere you went. I was one of them, though I wasn't a little kid."

I didn't need the details to picture what had happened.

Good people and bad people saw the world differently. Good people might have pitied the countless orphans left by the Great Cataclysm. Others saw a way to further their ambitions.

Lee Jungryong found Go Jun the same way.

The good fortune of Awakening came equally to everyone in humanity after their twentieth birthday.

In that sense, orphans with no one to rely on were lottery tickets that hadn't been scratched yet. Huginn must have been a diamond Michael Silbert had plucked from the mud.

And…

"That's when you met Muninn."

"More precisely, the first Muninn. That was the first and last time I saw him."

"The last? What happened after that?"

"The Great Cataclysm ended. The Guild Master wanted to keep my existence secret, so after I'd trained in secret for a while, he brought me to his side. That was the day I became Huginn. He introduced me to a man I'd never seen before."

"The new Muninn?"

Huginn nodded.

"What happened to the first Muninn?"

"I don't know. The Guild Master only told me he'd gone missing during the Great Cataclysm. He probably died in the war."

"Gone missing? If he was Michael Silbert's right-hand man, he must have been highly skilled."

Huginn gave a bitter smile at my look.

"If you don't believe me, I can't help that. But it's all I know. I hadn't even Awakened back then. I wasn't Huginn yet."

"When exactly was this?"

"Spring of 2021. The Guild Master was already famous. After the Great Battle of Paris, he was becoming one of the heroes who represented France—no, Europe."

I studied Huginn's expression for a moment, but couldn't find any sign of a lie in his face or eyes.

The important part came next.

"The Prophet… Who's the fifth Muninn?"

"Hmm."

"Think back. Just tell me what you know. Everything you saw and heard."

Huginn frowned in thought, but it didn't take him long to answer.

"A white man. Most of his face was covered, so I didn't get a good look at him. His build didn't seem suited to close combat, though. That was only my impression."

You couldn't judge a Hunter by their build alone—not when you had someone like Jeok Cheongang, with his slight frame, as proof.

But if someone as skilled as Huginn had gotten that impression, it was worth taking seriously.

The problem was that it gave me nowhere near enough to identify The Prophet.

"A white man. Possibly a ranged Hunter. That's all you know?"

Huginn swallowed dryly at my calm but icy voice, then answered.

"That's why I said I didn't know much. I saw him only once, about three years ago. And even then, the Guild Master ordered me to leave right away."

"Then how do you know he's The Prophet? Or that he killed Siegfried Bassmann?"

"The Guild Master told me when the time came. That's how it's always worked with Muninn."

"Always?"

"I stayed by the Guild Master's side and acted as his hands and feet. They were weapons he sent on more dangerous missions. They'd be gone for a year, sometimes several years, then suddenly appear again. I was always brought in afterward."

"For example?"

"Information about Sky—Cheon Taemin. And…"

"And what?"

"That…"

Smack!

My palm whipped across Huginn's cheek. He spat blood and muttered a few words through his pained expression.

"Tokyo. Leviathan. A Magic Gem."

"…!"

"The Muninn from three years ago brought back all that information. That's everything. Damn it."

I stared at Huginn, frozen like a statue.

Anger?

No. Shock.

He knew about Leviathan from the start. He used a Magic Gem to lure it to Tokyo.

And the one who gave that information to Michael Silbert was none other than Muninn—the very man now called The Prophet.

The truth sent a chill down my spine, as if someone had poured ice water over me.

How the hell?

For all the heights modern civilization had reached, the deep sea remained largely unexplored. Yet he'd learned of the calamity lurking in its dark depths.

Perhaps he'd done it all on Michael Silbert's orders. But was that the whole story?

Damn it.

I swallowed the curse rising in my chest.

Now I understood why no one had ever noticed Muninn.

A hidden blade who visited Michael Silbert in secret, sometimes after a year, more often after several. Unlike Huginn, he hadn't stayed at Silbert's side day to day. And since he was sometimes replaced because of his dangerous missions, there'd been no way to notice him.

Even Huginn, who'd handled most of Michael Silbert's affairs as his right hand, barely knew anything about Muninn.

One thing was certain.

He's dangerous. Far more dangerous than I thought.

He'd taken down Siegfried Bassmann, an outstanding Grand Mage, all on his own. He'd also drawn the outlines of the events behind this terrorist attack and supplied the information to Michael Silbert.

Michael Silbert hadn't done it on his own.

Michael Silbert had reached his current position thanks to the loyal Muninns who'd died for him.

I didn't know what the earlier Muninns had accomplished. But the man I now knew as The Prophet was far more than a mere subordinate.

Another root. Or a second Michael Silbert.

Where the hell did he find people like them?

No matter how vast the world was, no matter how many secrets it held, things eventually leaked out somewhere. Just as the great Guilds secretly trained new S-rank Hunters beyond the public eye.

This was beyond anything I'd imagined.

They must have been handling the dirty work for a long time.

Five Muninns. And the fifth Muninn.

They were Michael Silbert's darkest shadows. For years, they'd smuggled unrefined Magic Gems out of the Middle East and Africa without pause and stored them away. They'd been his warehouse keepers, his informants, and the blades he used to eliminate rivals.

At least until Michael Silbert died.

But now the Prophet had all of it.

He wasn't merely a pair of hands and feet like Huginn. The arm called Muninn had broken away from its dead master's body and grown a body of its own.

The Prophet.

An heir who commanded countless fanatics of a religion followed by twenty percent of the world's population, and who'd inherited everything his dead master had hidden.

That madman now held the knife by the handle.

And maybe…

"Fuck."

No. Not that. I couldn't jump to conclusions on information I wasn't even sure of, especially now.

I forced the thought from my mind and sprang to my feet.

I had to tell everyone what I'd learned and call back the search teams scattered across the Middle East, as fast as I could. The Prophet was strong enough to kill a Grand Mage alone. I'd sent those teams into the desert to prevent more deaths, not to throw their lives away.

"W-wait!"

Right. Huginn was still here.

I turned at his desperate cry. Before he could say another word, I snatched a potion bottle from the box and brought it down on the crown of his head with lightning speed.

Crash! Thud.

Huginn lost consciousness in a single blow and toppled over with his chair.

A concussion at the very least. But he'd been drenched in potion, so he'd probably be fine.

"Live a nice, long life, okay?"

I spat phlegm toward him, brushed the glass dust off my hand, and walked outside.

I nodded toward the torture technicians pacing outside the door.

"He talked a fair bit, but there might be more he hasn't told us."

"Oh, then…?"

"Get it out of him. Squeeze out every last thing, even if you have to wring his soul dry."

Their faces lit up.

"Yes, sir."

“I’ll do my best. There are a lot of methods we haven’t tried yet.”

“Oh, look at this, Michael! Santa left us a whole box of potions!”

“We’ll put them to good use, Boss!”

A promise?

You make those with people. Not trash like Huginn.

“Everyone on the leadership team, to the strategy room. Right now.”

I listened to Team Leader Choi answer over the phone as I crossed the hallway.

Then I turned to look out the window.

Tonight, the moon showing through the clouds looked unusually red.

Chapter 796

That night, someone stopped in the middle of a hurried walk to look out the window. The moon seemed redder than usual.

They weren't imagining it.

A blood moon.

The phenomenon sometimes occurred during a total lunar eclipse or when the atmosphere was unstable. With magical power levels rising day by day, not just the atmosphere but the climate itself was changing.

Whoosh.

The scattered raindrops grew heavier.

A downpour that seemed out of place in this barren land, where the annual rainfall was less than 250 millimeters,[3171] soon blanketed the whole area.

Across the endless sand and the few trees scattered through it.

And over the head of someone invisible to the naked eye.

Tap. Patter-patter.

The rain struck an unseen barrier and bounced away without touching him.

The Prophet, crossing the vast desert behind an invisible barrier, abruptly looked up at the sky.

The sky was dark and noisy. Storm clouds that had looked ominous for days were unleashing rain and thunder with furious force, as though enraged by what had happened on this land.

The Prophet paid them no mind. He studied the sky—or rather, opened his senses wide and listened to every sound around him.

Rumble. Rrrumble.

Thunder boomed ceaselessly overhead. The Prophet paused to focus on the sounds around him, then muttered,

"They're gone."

The sharp cries of eagles that had echoed in the distance were gone.

The persistent flying beasts some pursuer must have sent after him had finally given up and turned back.

They were a nuisance. Good riddance.

Avoiding satellite surveillance and unmanned reconnaissance aircraft was easy enough. Magical power mixed into the atmosphere shielded him from tracking, and concealment spells weren't meant for making stew.

But those eagles were different. Even the Familiars kept by the few mages who specialized in mental magic were dirt under their claws by comparison.

[3171] 250 millimeters is about 9.8 in.

They'd followed him for hundreds of kilometers[3172] without slowing down. And their eyes shone so brightly with magical power that he'd almost thought they could see through his spells.

They can't be Familiars… It must be him.

The Skeleton King. Or the Stone King.

The Prophet frowned without realizing it. A mere monster, siding with humans.

The desert was still vast, but the undead army under that creature's command would cover more ground and cut the search time drastically.

I didn't expect this.

Then again, more than one thing had defied his expectations. He hadn't thought Michael Silbert would fall so easily, or that the World Hunter Federation would bring its chaotic ranks under control so quickly and close in on him.

But The Prophet knew what all those surprises had in common. One man.

Jin Taekyung.

Others had shone brightly before, but they'd all been meteors: a brief flash, then gone in the blink of an eye.

Jin Taekyung was different. He was a comet.

From the moment he appeared, he'd been part of the celestial body that was the world. Now he'd become its center.

He was growing so quickly that no one could predict his limits. So quickly that all The Prophet's preparations threatened to come to nothing.

Clink.

His fingers strayed to something, drawing out a faint metallic sound.

Forcing down the impatience welling up inside him, The Prophet murmured,

"Just a little more. Just a little more, and it'll be complete."

Time was the problem.

He still hadn't gathered everything needed for a plan that could not tolerate the slightest error, and his enemies' net was tightening fast.

That left The Prophet only one option.

Hunt.

But time was short. To complete his plan successfully, he had to make it bigger and bolder than before.

For example…

Vroom.

From atop a high sand dune, he spotted transport vehicles moving through a thick cloud of dust. His eyes lit up.

[3172] 100 kilometers is about 62 mi; the distance here is not specified more precisely than "hundreds."

“Chikushō.”[3173]

At Yamamoto Genji’s low curse, the Self-Defense Forces Hunters edged away from Japan’s S-rank Hunter and exchanged glances.

Japan was hardly a Hunter powerhouse, but every Hunter it had dispatched to the Middle East was a veteran among veterans. They’d known one another for years, too. By now, a glance was enough.

What’s his problem?

Isn’t it obvious? Who else could it be?

Eeh? Jin-sama?[3174]

Yeah. That transmission from headquarters really set Yamamoto-san[3175] off.

The story was simple. About thirty minutes earlier, headquarters had ordered an emergency withdrawal. Yamamoto Genji had refused.

A reply had come at once—not in the communications officer’s stiff voice, but in a young man’s unmistakable one.

> “When Leviathan was wrecking Tokyo Bay, you didn’t come even when we called, you son of a bitch. What? You’re not coming now? Give me your coordinates. If you won’t come to me, I’ll come to you.”

Who was Jin Taekyung?

The only person who could fill the void left by the unconscious Cheon Taemin. The Alliance Leader of the World Hunter Federation, with the support of all humanity.

But people shouldn’t forget his temper, either. Sometimes—no, fairly often—he acted without a thought for the consequences. And he had the strength to back it up.

The Self-Defense Forces Hunters, their knees weak at the Supreme One’s reply—practically a murder threat—had desperately tried to talk Yamamoto down. Even after climbing into an evacuation vehicle, Yamamoto Genji still couldn’t contain his anger.

“Konoyarō.[3176] How dare a Chōsenjin[3177]…!”

The others pretended not to hear. At a time like this, they needed to be blind and deaf.

[3173] Chikushō is a Japanese exclamation roughly equivalent to “damn it.”

[3174] -sama is a Japanese honorific expressing a high degree of respect.

[3175] -san is a common Japanese honorific used in polite address.

[3176] Konoyarō is a Japanese insult roughly equivalent to “you bastard.”

[3177] Chōsenjin means “Korean” in Japanese; in this context it is used as an ethnic slur.

They didn't much like Yamamoto's attitude themselves. But if word reached their superiors, they'd get cursed out—and Japan would get dragged into it with them.

More bad press?

No. Absolutely not.

The Defense Minister, who had played a major role in the Leviathan incident—including preparing a kamikaze[3178] operation—was now in a federal prison after his connection to Michael Silbert had come to light. And the kind but stupid Prime Minister couldn't even go a few days without spewing more shit.

> [Japanese Prime Minister Koizumi: "People of Yamato, fight for Jin-sama,[3179] the great shogun[3180] who defeated Susanoo for us!"]
>
> [Asked about the strategy for the Self-Defense Forces' upcoming deployment to the Middle East, Prime Minister Koizumi said, "Combat should be fun, cool, and sexy."]
>
> [Former U.S. President Joseph Biden: "I understand the Japanese Prime Minister. In the early stages of my dementia, I didn't know what I was saying, either."]
>
> [Chuck Hagel: "I think they're both just crazy."]

The Self-Defense Forces Hunters felt sorry for themselves.

The Defense Minister was set to spend his twilight years in federal prison, while the Prime Minister was using the media as a loudspeaker to announce, without a hint of restraint, that Japan's leader was a lunatic.

Even Korean netizens, who'd been holding back because of the tense mood, had started saying things like this:

> ㄴ Top comment: I don't really want to bring this up when things are already tense, but… do those guys have something against Japan?
>
> ㄴ The Japanese Prime Minister and Defense Minister are anti-Japan, lmao. Fuck.
>
> ㄴ If you ask me, they must've had something going on in a past life.
>
> ㄴ One of them was a turtle ship in a past life, and the other was a lunchbox bomb. Seriously, it's not easy to spew that much shit.[3181]

[3178] Kamikaze refers to Japanese suicide attacks, particularly those carried out by pilots during World War II.

[3179] -sama is a Japanese honorific expressing a high degree of respect.

[3180] A shogun was a military ruler of Japan.

[3181] Turtle ships were Korean warships associated with Admiral Yi Sun-sin. The lunchbox bomb refers to one Korean independence activist Yun Bong-gil used against Japanese officials in 1932.

> ㄴ I wonder if this is how the independence fighters felt when they saw Mutaguchi Renya…[3182]
>
> ㄴ Shadow independence army. Agreed.
>
> ㄴ Sushi country: “Uh, what are those guys doing?”

And now Yamamoto Genji, once called the pride of the island nation, had lost face too. People had learned that he’d failed to show up twice in a row: first during the Leviathan incident, then at the launch ceremony.

Why had he skipped the launch ceremony?

The Self-Defense Forces Hunters didn’t know. If they’d known the real reason, they’d have spat in his face, pride of the island nation or not.

Yamamoto Genji had simply been… embarrassed.

Damn it. I should’ve gone.

He’d avoided Leviathan because he was afraid. Then he’d made up a personal excuse to skip the launch ceremony because he didn’t want to face Jin Taekyung.

That might have kept him alive and in one piece. But once it was all over, something worse than death had been waiting for him.

> ㄴ Those guys really are something. That S-rank Hunter hasn’t shown his face once, even now, lmao. What was his name again?
>
> ㄴ Genji.
>
> ㄴ Isn’t it Hanzo?
>
> ㄴ That’s Genji’s older brother.
>
> ㄴ Are you guys insane?
>
> ㄴ Why are you talking about a dead game from ages ago, you fossils?
>
> ㄴ It’s true, though? Look it up if you don’t believe me.
>
> ㄴ ?
>
> ㄴ It’s real; he actually has an older brother named Yamamoto Hanzo.
>
> ㄴ How is this real?
>
> ㄴ So can Genji use Swift Strike?[3183]
>
> ㄴ He’s great at Swift No-Show.
>
> ㄴ LMAO
>
> ㄴ Goddamn, that really hurts my pride.

[3182] Mutaguchi Renya was a Japanese general associated with the disastrous Imphal campaign of World War II.

[3183] Swift Strike is the English name of an ability in the video game Overwatch.

[3184] In Japanese online writing, repeated w represents laughter.

> ㄴ wwwwwww[3184] I was about to get mad, but I laughed without even realizing it?
>
> ㄴ “Don’t laugh at him too much, okay? I thought it was kind of funny, though.” wwwww
>
> ㄴ Even wasabi’s laughing, lmao.
>
> ㄴ Lmao, wasabi showed up, but where’s the black bean sauce?
>
> ㄴ It’s now confirmed that Jin Taekyung is from Shanxi Province, China. After examining old historical records, renowned historians at Peking University discovered the Jin Family of Taiyuan (see more)
>
> ㄴ ;;;; The second they see an opening, these bastards launch straight into their Jin-is-Chinese campaign.[3185]
>
> ㄴ Didn’t the Red Guards destroy their old records?
>
> ㄴ (This comment has been hidden.)
>
> ㄴ So did Genji—or was it Hanzo—actually go to the Middle East this time?
>
> ㄴ Yeah. I heard they accepted him since he’s an S-rank Hunter, at least.
>
> ㄴ Isn’t he just going to sit out the fighting? Doesn’t seem like he’d be much help anyway. They should just send him around to entertain the troops.
>
> ㄴ Captain Wasabi.

How dare they? How dare they insult me—Genji—like that?

Remembering the comments, Yamamoto shuddered.

Swift No-Show. Captain Wasabi.

The more he turned those words over, like awls digging into his lungs, the more his rage made him tremble.

And on top of that…

That rude reply? In front of the Self-Defense Forces?

Jin Taekyung’s warning, which was practically a threat—and the way the Self-Defense Forces Hunters had hurried to hold Yamamoto back instead of getting angry at such rudeness—had stripped away every last bit of Yamamoto Genji’s pride.

If I go back now, what does that make me?

By all accounts, he was an S-rank Hunter. But everyone who’d heard the rumors looked down on him. He’d scoured the desert with everything he had, determined to change how they saw him, and it had looked as if he was about to get results.

And now, an emergency withdrawal order.

Yamamoto had been muttering curses under his breath nonstop when a suspicion struck him.

[3185] The comment alludes to the Northeast Project, a Chinese historical research project criticized in Korea for claiming parts of Korean history as Chinese.

That Chōsenjin… Could it be? No. Of course it is.

That was it. All of this was Jin Taekyung's scheme to stop him from earning credit. The anti-Japanese sentiment that had started long ago had followed him all the way here.

Having reached a conclusion that was practically a delusion, Yamamoto barked,

"Oi, sutoppu!"

At his sudden order to stop, the evacuation vehicle ground to a halt.

Unlike before they'd set out, when they'd strongly objected to disobeying the withdrawal order, the Self-Defense Forces Hunters now meekly followed his command. Yamamoto's face brightened.

That's right. I'm the beacon of the great Yamato people! The one they follow isn't that Korean—it's me…!

The thought broke off.

The Self-Defense Forces Hunters looked bewildered. At the same instant, a realization flashed through Yamamoto's mind.

"Wait. Who's in the driver's seat?"

One of the Self-Defense Forces Hunters blinked and answered,

"No one."

"Eeh?"

"It's an unmanned vehicle."

Silence fell.

They stared at one another, then understood why the vehicle had stopped when it had been driving along just fine.

And why they could no longer hear the rain that had been pouring all around them.

"Ambu—!"

"Ambush!"

And at the same time—

BOOM!

A tremendous roar and impact engulfed them.

Chapter 797

In just a few days, the main force had built a solid command structure and amassed tremendous fighting strength.

The World Hunter Federation had led the way. The major powers of the G20 were among the first to lend their strength, and even the UN peacekeeping forces, forged into elite troops by the Great Cataclysm, had joined them.

The people gathered in the strategy room were the head and limbs that moved this enormous body.

"So…"

Chuck Hagel had listened to my explanation in silence. Now he spoke slowly.

"That fucking terrorist has been covering Michael Silbert's ass from the very beginning?"

I nodded without hesitation.

"Yes."

"You believe him? Huginn, I mean."

"Am I crazy? I wouldn't trust a bastard like that."

"Then what do you believe?"

"His fear."

Chuck Hagel studied me for a moment, then tapped the ash from his cigar.

"Sounds like it's true."

"At least, that's how it felt to me."

"You're sure?"

"Not a hundred percent. Maybe ninety-five. Even Huginn has no reason to lie in a situation like this."

"What about the other five percent?"

"The people visiting him with knives in hand are filling that in. Maybe we're up to ninety-seven by now."

The first confession was the hard part. After that, it got easier. Now that Huginn had started talking, he'd drag out everything he knew—even things he'd forgotten.

Pain wasn't what broke a strong person. It was the fear inside them.

Of course, he'll be tortured plenty before then.

Everyone here probably knew what was happening, but no one said it aloud.

What mattered now wasn't Huginn, who was probably being reduced to a bloody mess. It was what we did next.

We had to make a new plan on the assumption that everything he'd confessed was true. The Prophet wasn't just some lunatic terrorist. He was strong enough to kill a Grand Mage on his own.

"How strong do you think he is?" Team Leader Choi asked cautiously.

Chuck Hagel smacked his lips. "Hard to say. We know next to nothing about him."

"Mr. Hagel, this may be an impolite question, but if you'd been in The Prophet's position and targeted Siegfried Bassmann, how would you have fared?"

"I'd met Siegfried. We weren't close, but I could've taken him out easily. For someone he didn't know, though? Given how reclusive he was, it would've been close to impossible."

"Then could it be…"

"It's one of two things. Either The Prophet was so strong that Siegfried couldn't even defend himself properly, or…" Chuck Hagel paused. "He was someone Siegfried had met before."

"…!"

"…!"

The strategy room went cold.

The weight of what Chuck Hagel had said stunned everyone. We didn't know which possibility applied to The Prophet. Either way, we were dealing with someone far stronger than we'd expected.

"Jin was right to call the search teams back," Hagel said. "If they stayed scattered, they'd be easy to pick off one by one. Of course, if The Prophet is that strong, gathering a few hundred people might not help."

He was right. Even among S-rank Hunters—practically strategic weapons in their own right—there were clear differences in strength.

It was unlikely, but if The Prophet was comparable to Michael Silbert, it would take three average S-rank Hunters attacking together, backed by a supporting force, to bring him down.

The problem is, where the hell did someone that strong come from?

No matter how I looked at it, I couldn't figure it out.

The World Hunter Federation had already cleaned house and accounted for the whereabouts and circumstances of every living S-rank Hunter and every other major Hunter.

He's not an insider. So what is he?

An unknown outsider. And from what Huginn had told me, an outsider who'd appeared no more than five years ago.

Huginn had first seen The Prophet three years ago, but he'd last seen the fourth Muninn five years ago.

Siegfried Bassmann, meanwhile, was a veteran among veterans who'd fought countless battles during the Great Cataclysm. He might have been a scholarly mage, but no one earned the title of Grand Mage through books and research alone.

However talented The Prophet was, there should have been an unbridgeable gap between them. Some kid who'd dropped out of the sky a few years ago couldn't overcome a gap like that.

Except…

I was living proof that it could be done.

"The System…?"

"Hm?"

"Nothing. Just talking to myself."

Chuck Hagel raised an eyebrow. I acted like nothing had happened and changed the subject.

"Anyway, how's the withdrawal going?"

Team Leader Choi answered. "More than seventy percent of the search personnel have returned."

"Faster than I expected."

"We mobilized every means of transport we have. We've also informed Magic Johnson, Faye Chen, and Prince Felix of the situation and made the withdrawal of all search teams their top priority."

This was the operations headquarters, but the others each commanded a force of their own according to their abilities. We'd had to spread out to search this vast region thoroughly. Making every team travel thousands—sometimes tens of thousands—of kilometers[3186] back here whenever it needed to return would have been stupid.

"All of Team A1 has returned."

"Team B2 is still on its way back. We expect them within fifteen minutes and remain in contact."

"We've temporarily lost contact with Team D4. We suspect interference from magical power and have dispatched a support team as a precaution."

Reports poured in from all around the room, starting with Team Leader Choi.

Some search teams under headquarters command hadn't returned yet, and others were out of contact. For now, though, there was no reason to worry. As magical power levels rose, mana communications and radio signals naturally grew less reliable.

And even if something like a Monster Wave happened, that guy could handle it.

Beep.

—Emergency transmission, emergency transmission. This is Team F6. A monster army has appeared ahead. The monsters appear to be undead. Requesting support.

"…"

[3186] 1,000 kilometers is about 620 mi; 10,000 kilometers is about 6,200 mi.

"…"

Team Leader Choi and I met eyes and sighed at the same time.

"Tell them not to attack."

"Uh, they're probably on our side."

Chuck Hagel had sprung to his feet the moment the radio sounded. Now he looked as though he'd bitten into something foul.

"Damn it. Is it the guy I'm thinking of?"

"Yes. Judging by Team F6's current coordinates, it's definitely him. They must've gotten confused."

"Tell him not to scare the troops. Plenty of them haven't seen him in person. We don't need the confusion."

"The Skeleton King will take that into account, so there's no need to worry too much—"

Beep-beep!

—Emergency transmission! Emergency transmission! There are too many monsters! There's a boss, possibly a named monster, and it's laughing like a maniac! It's terrifying! Requesting support!

"…"

Chuck Hagel gave us a flat look.

Team Leader Choi glanced away and muttered as if to himself, "No one will get hurt. Probably…"

"That last word didn't sound very confident. Am I imagining things?"

"Yes."

I let out a long sigh.

I'd sent that bastard to bring the troops back, and now he was scaring them instead.

Judging by the looks on the faces of the commanders seated around us, they were wondering whether we ought to deal with the Skeleton King before The Prophet.

You're dead when you get back.

Just as I muttered to myself, another urgent transmission rang out.

Beep.

—Engagement in progress! Engagement in progress!

"Again?"

He was really dead.

But as I wondered how I could deal with the Skeleton King in a way that would make the story of his getting his ass kicked spread far and wide, an unexpected follow-up crackled in my ear.

—This is Team J1! Multiple dead! Multiple injured! Send support as fast as you can, aaagh!

Crunch. Splaash!

A chill ran down my spine.

The gruesome sound of flesh tearing and that scream came through the radio. Everyone in the strategy room, myself included, sprang to their feet.

“Fuck!”

“Find the transmitter’s coordinates! Now!”

“Sound the alarm! Dispatch the nearest search team to those coordinates immediately!”

“Teams P3 and P4 are moving within thirty-five kilometers[3187]!”

“Get the orders out! Hurry! And request support from the Skeleton King, too!”

Wheeeee!

The alarm blared through the speakers and spread into the darkness.

I threw myself out the open window and shot high into the air. A flash lit up the distance. I drew up my internal energy.

Bang!

The wind rushing past me seemed to carry the metallic scent of blood.

Whoosh. Boom!

Bone and flesh burst apart with a heavy rush of air.

The headless corpse dropped to its knees, and furious shouts erupted from every direction.

“No! Haruka!”

“You bastard! How dare you!”

Shing, shing, shing!

Blades swept through the darkness, cutting through sand thrown up by the force of their swings. They drove toward the enemy who had killed their precious comrade.

They thought they could cut him to pieces.

Then the sand beneath their feet surged upward, became enormous spikes, and pierced their bodies.

Thud! Crunch!

“Ghk.”

“Guh…!”

Their final gasps escaped as dark red blood soaked the sand.

Hundreds dwindled to a hundred, then a hundred to dozens, in little more than ten minutes.

[3187] Thirty-five kilometers is about 22 mi.

Those who watched it happen trembled with fear that reached their bones. S-rank Hunter Yamamoto Genji was no exception.

This… This can't be real.

People could call him Swift No-Show or an S-rank janitor, but he was still a veteran Hunter who'd fought his share of battles.

Even Yamamoto had never seen a fight this brutal or this one-sided.

Overwhelming power. Destruction. Terror.

No word he knew could describe the gulf between them.

He was too frightened to run. Too frightened even to swing the sword he'd drawn.

"What… What the hell are you?"

Slice!

An invisible wind cut down another person in place of an answer.

The tank who'd charged forward with a scream split in two, massive Tower Shield and all. Blood sprayed through the air, vivid even in the dark.

Splaash. Thud-thud!

Deep night. Dim moonlight.

A lone figure stood amid blood falling like a sudden downpour.

Rustle.

The hem of a long robe brushed the blood-soaked sand as the figure turned. Yamamoto Genji suddenly realized who had ambushed them.

"The… The Prophet…!"

Beneath the low-drawn hood, the figure's lips curved gently upward.

The Prophet thrust out both hands and raked them down through the air like claws.

Whoosh! Slice!

Had space itself warped, or had he imagined it?

Yamamoto looked around in a daze. Corpses lay everywhere: faces gone, holes punched through chests, limbs severed.

Before he knew it, he was the only one left alive.

For the moment.

I'm going to die. I know it.

The fear of death was the one thing everyone shared.

Step.

Yamamoto took a step back without realizing it. He didn't notice the sword hilt slipping from his sweat-slick hand.

No. He didn't care.

If only he could survive. If only he could make it back to Japan alive.

But the next moment, someone's unfamiliar voice pierced his ear.

“Where are you going in such a hurry, foolish servant?”
“…!”
Just as Yamamoto Genji froze like a statue—
“Over there!”
“Someone’s there!”
“Get into formation!”
Vrooom.
Transport vehicle engines and people’s shouts sounded from every direction.

Chapter 798

I knew. No matter how extraordinary your abilities were, you couldn't prevent every tragedy in the world.

But every second felt like an hour because the people falling and spilling their blood at this very moment were suffering because of me.

I was the one who'd called them to this distant desert in a foreign land. I was the one who'd led them to their deaths.

Once I took on the title of Alliance Leader, I had to bear that anguish until this war was over. I had to lead from the front and fight harder than anyone else.

Whoosh!

I shot forward, cutting through the fierce wind.

My qinggong[3188] had long since surpassed the realm of Treading Snow Without a Trace. It left no footprints even on fine sand, and each step carried me dozens of meters.[3189]

Faster. Faster. Just a little faster.

I hadn't looked back once, but I knew I'd come so far that headquarters, which had stood like a fortress in the desert, was no longer visible.

I knew, too, that I was getting closer to the faint lights I'd spotted when I'd leapt into the sky.

But why…?

Why was it so quiet?

My heart sank at the thought I couldn't bring myself to finish. I gritted my teeth and stamped down with all my strength.

Rumble.

The internal energy flowing through my toes shook the ground. For an instant, my muscles compressed like a spring, then recoiled with explosive force.

Boom!

I shot forward like a cannonball, the air booming around me. At the same time, faint sounds reached me on the wind.

—…What the hell… that bastard…

—Hans! Hans!

—Fled… survivor… contact headquarters…

Snatches of voices came through the sound of vehicle engines.

As I drew closer, I sensed plenty of people and heard plenty of noise. The casualties couldn't have been too severe.

"Ah."

[3188] Qinggong is a Chinese martial-arts term for skills associated with light, swift movement.

[3189] One meter is about 3.28 ft.

Only then did I let out a sigh of relief and pick up the pace.

A moment later, I saw what lay ahead and understood.

Every person I'd sensed, every voice I'd heard, belonged to those who had arrived before me.

"…!"

I froze, staring at hundreds of bodies dried out like mummies.

The people's eyes turned toward me. Their murmuring felt as distant as an echo.

Only one word filled my mind.

The Prophet.

No doubt about it.

He'd been here.

And maybe…

He's still nearby. He has to be.

Mourning the dead would have to wait. If we didn't catch him here today, the death toll could climb tens or hundreds of times higher.

Where are you?

My heart burned, but my mind was cold as ice. With my senses sharper than ever, I spread my Qi Sense.

Fwoosh.

Invisible qi swept across the sand as I launched myself forward.

Whooosh!

Beyond the sand surging up like a wave, a familiar face flashed into view.

The Skeleton King was shouting something urgently among the reinforcements, but I was already streaking across the desert like a beam of light. Every one of my senses was fixed on a single presence.

The Prophet.

Today, right here, I had to tear out the diseased tree's last root.

If everything had gone the way I wanted, I probably wouldn't be here now. My father wouldn't have died, and my mother wouldn't have gotten sick.

If things had turned out that way, I… I don't know.

My school grades were a disaster, and the only thing I had going for me was a healthy body.

Yeah, fuck.

It was a pointless wish. Bullshit that could never come true anyway.

Things had never gone the way I wanted. This time was no different.

"Hell of a morning, isn't it, Jin?"

I dropped down beside Magic Johnson, who greeted me with an exhausted face.

Neither of us asked the other how it had gone. We already knew six hours of searching had come to nothing.

Still, I spoke up, hoping against hope.

"Johnson."

"I'm sorry."

"…"

"We searched every inch of a 700-kilometer[3190] radius. We practically threatened Syria and Iraq into cooperating, too. But, damn it…"

The Prophet was gone.

No—he'd vanished.

As if he'd never existed in this world at all.

No wonder the elite Hunters who'd joined the search right after me all looked as if they'd seen a ghost.

"We were so close. Where the hell did he run off to?"

The reinforcements had moved quickly. They'd reached the scene less than fifteen minutes after J1, a team of roughly two hundred Japanese Hunters, reported an engagement.

The problem was that The Prophet had left the battlefield just before they arrived, and no one could find him anywhere.

"Jin. As far as I know, there's only one way to explain this."

Our eyes met. I murmured, "Magic."

"Right. The Prophet is a mage. One so skilled that even Grand Mage might not do him justice."

Magic Johnson's magic hadn't found a trace of him. Neither had the Skeleton King's undead army. Neither had I.

That left one possibility.

Magic.

People called things they couldn't explain miracles, or said they were like magic. In The Prophet's case, it had to be the latter.

He couldn't actually be chosen by God, whatever the fanatics brainwashed into following him believed.

A mage, huh.

Huginn's words came back to me. He'd said The Prophet seemed to be a ranged Hunter.

I'd had my doubts, but now the evidence was tipping that way.

[3190] 700 km is about 435 mi.

The Prophet was probably a mage—and one skilled enough to vanish without Magic Johnson detecting him.

Or…

One of his subordinates could be a mage at that level.

If that was true, it'd be the worst of the worst. Fortunately, Magic Johnson immediately shook his head when he heard my thought.

"That's not it."

"I hope you're right, but there's still a chance…"

"The Prophet was definitely alone."

"What?"

That wasn't a guess. I could hear the certainty in his voice, and his next words told me why.

"There's a survivor, Jin."

"…!"

"The only survivor from J1. He woke up not long before you arrived."

The only survivor.

I couldn't just sit there and listen after hearing those words. I sprang to my feet and asked Magic Johnson,

"Where is he now?"

The survivor lay in bed, hooked up to all kinds of medical equipment.

Team Leader Choi and the Skeleton King had been talking beside the bed with serious expressions. They opened their mouths as if to say something when they saw me, but then closed them again.

My face must have told them the search that had lasted until dawn had failed.

"That him?"

The Skeleton King understood immediately and nodded.

"Yeah. The only human who survived there."

"Then when I first got to the scene…"

"By then, every last one of them was dead. Not a single wounded person left. That human was in critical condition, too, but he got lucky. You came in, didn't even listen properly, and left again right away."

Only then did I remember the frantic moments when I'd reached the scene: the word survivor amid the voices I'd heard on my way there, and the Skeleton King trying to tell me something as I left.

"You left before I could say a word. I was about to go after you, but I stopped myself. Something else could've happened with me away from here, too."

The Skeleton King had made the right call. Maybe he'd read the situation more calmly than I had.

Seeing me bite my lip in silence, Team Leader Choi spoke.

"You both made the right decisions. What matters now is that we have a survivor."

More than a hundred people had died. That was tragic, but the fact that someone had survived was a stroke of luck—for the man who'd lived through that horrific scene, and for all of us.

"He woke up a little while ago, six hours after we found him. The healer in charge says he's had enough potions and is in the final stage of recovery. He should be fine."

I studied the survivor. He was staring into space with his mouth hanging open.

He didn't look fine, for one thing. For another, his face seemed familiar. And even without checking his pulse, I could sense the abundant energy inside him.

Wait. Could this guy be…?

I turned toward Team Leader Choi. He nodded as if he'd read my mind, and a quiet Sound Transmission reached my ears alone.

—He's the person you're thinking of, Mr. Jin Taekyung. Japan's S-rank Hunter, Yamamoto Genji, is J1's only survivor.

—…!

—It was a close call. From what we can piece together, reinforcements were about to arrive. The Prophet must have worried they'd hold him up, so he left before he could finish Yamamoto off.

The five hundred Hunters who'd responded as reinforcements had been lucky.

If The Prophet had been a little stupider, or more confident in his own strength, they wouldn't have escaped death either.

But he was clever and cautious. He knew that the longer he stayed in one place, the greater the threat he would face.

That was bad news for humanity, but good luck for those who'd survived.

By that measure, the man before me—Yamamoto Genji, still staring into space with unfocused eyes—had been extraordinarily lucky.

Of course, having gone through something similar myself, I didn't think of it that way.

Damn it.

I hated Yamamoto Genji. More than hated him. What I felt was closer to loathing.

When so many people had risked their lives to stop Leviathan, he'd shown up late with a ridiculous excuse.

The only reason I'd gone out of my way to bring someone like him into the World Hunter Federation was that he was an S-rank Hunter. I'd figured that even a useless bastard might pull his weight at least once.

But whatever I thought of him, I had no right to curse Yamamoto Genji now.

I wasn't going to ask why he alone had come back alive when everyone else was dead.

I was the one who'd sent him—and all of them—into that deathtrap.

Tap.

I took Yamamoto Genji's wrist and sent my internal energy into him.

My Scorching Yang Qi, warm to the touch, flowed through his pulse and into his body. His erratic heartbeat steadied, and a flush of warmth spread across his pale face.

"Yamamoto."

I said his name quietly. His parched lips moved.

"…A-ah."

I kept sending internal energy into him as I watched his mouth open and close, as if he'd forgotten how to speak.

I don't know how long we stayed like that. At last, his eyes came into focus. Yamamoto Genji looked at me and spoke.

"Cho…"

"Cho?"

"Chōsenjin?"[3191]

Wait, this fucking bastard.

[3191] Chōsenjin is a Japanese term for Koreans, used here as an ethnic slur.

Chapter 799

If the N-word is the button that sets Black people off, then Chōsenjin[3192] is the Korean-only special edition.

It's bad enough when Korean weebs who've overdosed on Japanophilia start throwing around Chōsenjin[3193]. But you hear its full ugliness when it comes straight from a Japanese guy.

Like right now.

"Chōsenjin?"[3194]

The moment that magic word reached my ears, the will of Hongik Ingan, passed down from Grandfather Dangun in the distant past, and the vital essence of Joseon's eight provinces surged up from deep within me.[3195]

And if you compressed that long-winded sentence into four syllables, you'd get something completely unrelated: Scorching Yang Qi.

Honestly, I was pissed off and just spouting whatever came to mind.

Whoosh!

"Uh. Uh-oh…"

"Please don't, Mr. Jin!"

The sudden burst of heat made the Skeleton King swallow saliva he didn't even have. Team Leader Choi launched himself at me like a football player and grabbed hold.

"You can't hit him yet! He's a patient!"

"Right. Team Leader Choi is right."

"Yes, yes. So…"

"But so what?"

"Huh?"

"Let go. That bastard's pissing me off."

I pried Team Leader Choi's arms from around my waist and muttered, "Ahn Jung-geun. Yun Bong-gil. Yu Gwan-sun. Ahn Chang-ho. Kim Won-bong…"[3196]

"Gasp."

"Mutaguchi Renya.[3197] Little Boy. Fat Man…"[3198]

[3192] Chōsenjin is a Japanese term for Koreans, used here as an ethnic slur.

[3193] Chōsenjin is a Japanese term for Koreans, used here as an ethnic slur.

[3194] Chōsenjin is a Japanese term for Koreans, used here as an ethnic slur.

[3195] Hongik Ingan, "to broadly benefit humanity," is the founding ideal attributed to Dangun, Korea's legendary first king. "Joseon's eight provinces" is a traditional expression for the whole country.

[3196] The five people named here are figures in the Korean independence movement against Japanese colonial rule.

[3197] Mutaguchi Renya was a Japanese general in World War II, associated with the disastrous Imphal campaign.

[3198] Little Boy and Fat Man were the atomic bombs dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, respectively, in 1945.

"Help! I can't hold him back by myself!"

At Team Leader Choi's cry for backup, the Skeleton King answered calmly.

"Even the two of us couldn't stop him."

"We need to hear his testimony!"

"We do. But who's going to take responsibility for my beautiful skull if it gets smashed trying to stop him?"

"Johnson! Mr. Johnson! Help!"

Bang!

"Who dares bully my Choi—Oh."

Magic Johnson burst through the door like a knight in shining armor, then blinked.

"What on earth is going on?"

"Hmm. A wicked human is trying to kill a monkey human."

"What the fuck? Why?"

"Because the monkey human called the wicked human Chōsenjin."[3199]

"Chōsenjin?"[3200]

Magic Johnson still looked puzzled. The Skeleton King helpfully explained.

"As far as I know, it means about the same thing as 'nigger.'"

"Motherfucking Japs! You goddamn son of a beach! Jin! Kill that bastard right now!"

Even the hulking Grand Mage, well over two meters tall,[3201] had started raging. Team Leader Choi muttered so quietly I could barely hear him.

"Fuck, I really can't do this anymore…"

"Oh."

When I'd first met him, I'd thought, What kind of Young Master is this? But now, even the occasional swear that slipped out of him sounded native.

Was this how a master felt when he saw his Disciple grow?

I looked at Team Leader Choi with pride.

"You've come a long way."

"Quit screwing around and finish what you were doing."

"I'm really going to hit him, you know?"

"You were going to do it even if I stopped you, so why ask? Just one hit. And go easy."

"Okay."

With that settled, I turned around. Yamamoto Genji had become the picture of politeness.

[3199] Chōsenjin is a Japanese term for Koreans, used here as an ethnic slur.

[3200] Chōsenjin is a Japanese term for Koreans, used here as an ethnic slur.

[3201] Two meters is about 6 ft 7 in.

"I'm sorry. I was out of my mind earlier."

"Yeah. I'm sorry in advance, too."

"Mr. Jin…"

"No, just call me Chōsenjin.[3202] That'll make me feel better."

"Jin-sama!"[3203]

After a three-stage transformation in how he addressed me that would've put Frieza[3204] to shame, Yamamoto Genji sprang to his feet, dropped to his knees, and pressed his forehead to the floor.

"I sincerely apologize!"

"…Did you go to a dogeza[3205] academy or something?"

It was a perfect, textbook dogeza.[3206]

At this point, I was starting to wonder whether dogeza[3207] was part of the Japanese S-rank Hunter certification test.

I sighed and shook my head, then stared silently at the back of Yamamoto Genji's head.

Damn it.

Whatever else, he'd come all the way to the Middle East on my orders.

He'd hesitated for a while even after the order to withdraw, and in the end he'd lost every member of his team. But if you looked at it closely, I was more or less responsible for all of it as the one in command.

If Yamamoto Genji was an incompetent defeated general, then I was a pathetic commander who'd entrusted hundreds of lives to a man like that.

"Get up."

"…"

"I said, get up."

"H-hai."

Yamamoto Genji cautiously sat back on his heels.

His potion shower had left his body without a scratch. And judging by his wide-open eyes, his mind seemed to be working properly again, too.

"Tell me everything that happened. From beginning to end. Don't leave anything out."

Yamamoto Genji hesitated, licked his parched lips, and finally began.

[3202] Chōsenjin is a Japanese term for Koreans, used here as an ethnic slur.

[3203] -sama is a Japanese honorific conveying a higher degree of deference than -san.

[3204] Frieza is a Dragon Ball character known for transforming through multiple forms.

[3205] Dogeza is a formal Japanese gesture of apology or supplication performed while kneeling and bowing to the floor.

[3206] Dogeza is a formal Japanese gesture of apology or supplication performed while kneeling and bowing to the floor.

[3207] Dogeza is a formal Japanese gesture of apology or supplication performed while kneeling and bowing to the floor.

“We were traveling in unmanned transport vehicles when he appeared.”

“The Prophet?”

“…Yes.”

At the mention of The Prophet, Yamamoto Genji shuddered and swallowed.

“The vehicles suddenly stopped, and an unfamiliar energy sent a chill through my whole body.”

He was a coward and a fool, but he was still an S-rank Hunter. He must’ve instinctively sensed that something was wrong.

But…

“The vehicles stopped? On their own?”

“Y-yes.”

Magic Johnson met my gaze and spoke.

“It was magic. He must have used mana interference to shut down the Magic Gems powering the unmanned transport vehicles.”

“What are the odds it was an artifact?”

“That’s possible. But I understand J1 had ten vehicles assigned to them. Is that right?”

Yamamoto Genji answered.

“That’s right. They all stopped at once.”

“Magic used through an artifact has clear limitations. He’s definitely a mage.”

“R-right. That’s right.”

Yamamoto Genji nodded spasmodically, like someone being chased, and continued.

“I saw it clearly. The flash of light, the blood, people falling at a single gesture… I’d never seen anything like it. Everyone around me died in the blink of an eye. It was definitely magic.”

As if he were reliving the terror of that moment, his hands and feet began to tremble.

I watched him for a while, then asked, “What about you?”

“Huh?”

“How did you survive?”

“Th-that…”

His pupils, which had just managed to refocus, wavered.

He reflexively avoided my gaze. I saw no grief over the loss of his comrades, no anger at himself.

Fear.

The only things Yamamoto Genji felt now were fear of The Prophet and relief at having survived.

"You ran. No—did you try to run and fail?"

"…!"

You son of a bitch.

He flinched as if I'd hit the mark, and something hot surged up inside me.

If someone hadn't grabbed my shoulder, I would've punched that cowardly face of his, testimony or no testimony.

Damn it.

I chewed on my lip, trying to hold down the bitterness and anger.

I silently glared at Yamamoto Genji, his head bowed. A long time passed before I spoke again.

"What happened after that?"

Yamamoto Genji kept his head down, his eyes darting around, and answered cautiously.

"He heard the reinforcements arriving and left."

"Was the situation so urgent that he had to leave you behind, an S-rank Hunter? The Prophet must have known you'd be a problem if he let you live."

"Th-that…"

Yamamoto Genji hesitated at Team Leader Choi's sharp question, then answered.

"He must have had another reason."

"Another reason…?"

"He sucked everything out of my teammates who'd died before me."

"What?"

Sucked everything out of them?

The rest of us stared at him, unable to make sense of his words. Yamamoto Genji hurriedly continued.

"I-I swear I'm not lying. He sucked up the pools of blood all around us, too. He pulled something like a pale mist out of the dead people's bodies and swallowed it. After that, the corpses dried up like mummies…"

It was like being struck in the back of the head. The words that followed came through only faintly.

And I wasn't the only one stunned.

"No. This… That isn't magic."

Magic Johnson muttered as if he were groaning and rubbed his forehead. Under the lights, his forehead had grown damp with cold sweat.

"Damn it. What the hell is it? As far as I know, there's no magic available to humans that could do something that horrifying…"

His voice trembled. He fell silent, stood frozen like a statue, then slowly turned his head.

No—all of us did.

And there, at the end of our gazes, stood one being.

The Skeleton King.

My friend. A comrade I could trust with my back.

But we'd instinctively looked at him because the answer to The Prophet lay in his very existence.

Someone who used magic unavailable to humans.

A powerful being capable of taking out a Grand Mage single-handedly, whose strength had never once been revealed to the world.

Another secret Michael Silbert had hidden even from Huginn, his right-hand man.

A monster.

Yes.

That was what The Prophet really was.

"H-he left behind a message."

The monster called The Prophet was dangling bait in front of me.

On a high, moundlike hill, an old man in a turban watched a hazy cloud of sand rise not far away.

More precisely, he watched the dozens of vehicles visible through it.

"Shall we eliminate them?"

At his subordinate's voice, which came from empty air, the old man asked calmly, "How many?"

"We estimate more than five hundred."

"Any S-rank Hunters among them?"

"Not that we've been able to determine. Even if there are, I could wipe them all out if I went in."

The old man stroked his coarse beard. He fell silent in thought, and only after a short while did he speak.

"Leave them be."

"But the distance…"

"Hamid, did you not hear me?"

After a moment's silence at the sudden call, the subordinate answered, "I'm sorry, Amir. I was out of line."

"Restrain your hot blood and wait for the time that is soon to come. Did The Prophet not say as much? Everything will unfold according to his will."

The old man reached out and felt around in the air. Something invisible was protecting them from the infidels.

That was why even satellites in orbit couldn't detect them—and why the infidels couldn't find them despite drawing within a few kilometers.[3208]

No, the infidels wouldn't find them even if they came right up to them.

Unless they lifted this veil and stepped out themselves, no one could see or sense them. And if that moment came, it would be the intruder's last moment alive.

This mysterious power could only be thought of as divine protection.

Their god had sent The Prophet down to earth in his place, and The Prophet would lead them to the promised land.

They would punish the wicked infidels and establish God's will across every land and sea.

"Do not be impatient. As long as The Prophet is with us, victory in this great holy war will be ours."

"But where is The Prophet now…?"

"He will come of his own accord soon. Do not doubt it. With the net God has laid, he will gather up every last one of those infidels and send them to God."

"…!"

"Inshallah."

The old man murmured it once more, his reverence swelling.

Inshallah.

God willing.

[3208] A kilometer is about 0.62 mi, so a few kilometers is roughly a few miles.

Chapter 800

Hunters lived close to death.

It made no difference whether they were S-rank Hunters known around the world or F-rank Hunters as common as stones in the street. No one was exempt.

The misfortune of death came equally to everyone, and Hunters were more accustomed to that fact than anyone.

But…

“Holy shit.”

The quiet curse spoke for everyone.

Reflected in dozens of pairs of eyes, trembling slightly in that moment, were around two hundred corpses, shriveled nearly to nothing.

“Damn it. Has anyone here ever seen anything this insane, even once?”

No one answered the Team Leader. More accurately, they’d forgotten how.

What the hell is this?

They might have been assigned to recover the dead in the rear, but they were Hunters all the same. They’d had more than their share of brushes with death and seen more corpses than they cared to remember.

Especially after the series of events that had unfolded one after another over the past few months. How many deaths had they witnessed?

And yet, even they couldn’t help feeling a chill run down their spines at that moment.

“…Didn’t you say they’d been dead for less than two hours?”

The Team Leader bit his lip at the question that broke the long silence.

“It’s hard to believe, but yes. That’s exactly what I was told.”

“Then it’s one of two things. Either you’re deaf, Team Leader, or whoever told you is insane.”

“Could be. But neither is true.”

“Maybe not. But looking at these bodies, I’d say they’ve been dead for at least a couple of centuries. What kind of lunatic told you they’d been dead for less than two hours?”

“What, you planning to go argue with them?”

“We ought to check whether it’s true. And if they were talking nonsense, I’ll punch them right in the face.”

“Fine.”

The Team Leader had taken out a cigarette and put it between his lips. He went on calmly.

"If you really want to, head to the command tent right now. Punch Magic Johnson in the face as soon as you see him. Don't worry about what happens afterward—I'll recover your bodies and take them home to your families."

"What?"

"Still here? You said you were going to find that lunatic and punch him."

"…"

The Hunters were speechless.

It wasn't so much that the lunatic they'd just been cursing was Magic Johnson. The greater shock came from the realization that the order itself wasn't wrong.

So it's all true?

Damn it. What's going on?

Becoming a veteran Hunter meant knowing the smell of blood better than the smell of pancakes cooking. It meant seeing enough horrors to qualify as an undertaker if you ever quit.

Limbs severed, torsos torn apart, heads crushed…

They'd seen it all more times than they could count. Most of the corpses they'd encountered belonged to monsters, but plenty had belonged to comrades they'd shared meals with, too.

Even so, they'd never seen bodies like these.

Around two hundred corpses, dried out without a drop of blood left in them.

If they hadn't known what had happened, every last one of them would have thought they'd been sent to excavate ruins.

These weren't just corpses. They looked like mummies that had been buried deep underground for centuries.

Damn it. Have we been bewitched?

They've been like this for less than two hours? How is that possible?

They weren't gruesome so much as bizarre.

Every moment sent goose bumps crawling over their bodies. They couldn't take even one step toward those corpses, with not a trace of life left in them.

And the same question filled every mind.

What did this to them?

Not who. What.

As everyone swallowed hard at the thought of an unknown enemy they couldn't even begin to predict, the Team Leader took a deep drag on his cigarette and shouted,

"Fuck! How long are you going to stand there staring? Stop wasting time thinking about it and get moving! Now!"

The Hunters jolted as if they'd just woken up. At last, they began to move, though their steps were slow.

As he watched his subordinates force themselves toward the corpses, the Team Leader suddenly realized he hadn't lit his cigarette.

...Damn it.

He cursed under his breath and threw it to the ground.

But his hand, now brushing over his parched lips, was trembling slightly.

"Rumors are spreading."

Team Leader Choi's face was grave.

"Everyone's afraid. Word about the fallen Hunters' bodies is circulating quietly."

"..."

"We need to do something before it gets any worse. If this continues..."

His voice trailed off, but I knew what he meant.

I finished the sentence Team Leader Choi couldn't.

We'll fall apart from the inside before we even get moving.

He wasn't talking about another traitor like Michael Silbert emerging.

He meant the force an army depended on to function: morale.

Fear's eating away at them. Fast.

Some things couldn't be stopped, no matter how hard you tried.

Like this.

"There were too many witnesses. We ordered them not to talk, but there's only so much we can do to contain the rumors."

Even an order to keep quiet had its limits.

The J1 team Yamamoto Genji belonged to had been wiped out in a bizarre fashion. Hundreds of people had reached the scene before I did.

Even the authority my name carried couldn't seal every one of their mouths.

People's emotions.

Human emotions—especially fear—were beyond anyone's control.

But the bigger problem was that the rumors frightening even veteran Hunters who'd been through hell and back weren't baseless nonsense.

"And although these stories haven't gained much traction yet..."

Team Leader Choi hesitated, then continued with a sigh.

"Some people have started embellishing what happened. They're spreading all kinds of nonsense."

"Like what?"

"That The Prophet really is God's chosen representative. Or a transcendent being like the Demon King Asmodeus..."

Bang!

“Bullshit!”

Magic Johnson shot to his feet with a shout, his eyes blazing.

“Tell me, Choi. Who the hell is spreading this deranged crap?”

“Like I said, it hasn’t gained much traction. It’s one of several stories going around, so we can’t point to anyone in particular. The problem is that a tiny number of people genuinely believe it.”

“What kind of world do they think we live in, believing superstitious crap like that… Damn it.”

Magic Johnson started to say something, then shut his mouth with a rough curse.

The hulking Grand Mage had clearly remembered something he’d forgotten for a moment.

That Hunters were more obsessed with superstition than anyone else in the world.

In a way, it was only natural. Whatever their reasons for becoming Hunters, they were human. They wanted to survive.

They might gain wealth beyond an ordinary person’s dreams and the honor of being humanity’s sword and shield. But survival came first.

Even athletes kept strange routines no one else understood and clung to childish superstitions. How could Hunters, who fought with their lives on the line, be any different?

Athletes might believe a superstition would save their careers. For Hunters, it was their lives at stake.

Especially when they faced an unknown phenomenon that no one had ever encountered before.

“A Demon King, of all things. What a bunch of idiots.”

I looked at the Skeleton King, who muttered in disbelief.

He’d already gotten a similar look from me several times, so he immediately understood what it meant and furrowed his brow.

“I told you. I don’t know either.”

That wasn’t the answer I’d wanted.

I tried to hide my disappointment. “Right. That’s why I gave you time to think.”

“…Damn it. I’m genuinely curious, too. What the hell is that guy called The Prophet?”

The Skeleton King sighed and went on.

“But what am I supposed to do if I don’t know? I first became conscious in that place you call a Gate. Everything before that is blurry. No, I can’t even call it a memory.”

“Not even fragments?”

“A dark, ominous place. That’s all I can recall. Perhaps it was the Demon Realm. Another world beyond the Gate. Isn’t that right?”

No one could answer him. Not me, not Magic Johnson—not anyone in humanity.

Ever since the Demon King Asmodeus descended into this world, humanity had known of the land of death beyond the dimensions. Yet from the moment we learned it existed, the place itself had remained shrouded in mystery.

No one knew what was there or what calamities lived within it.

Not even the Skeleton King, who had come through a Gate from the Demon Realm.

"What I know is only a tiny fraction. Do you know what surprised me most after I set foot in this world?"

I answered without thinking. "Clubs?"

"…What exactly do you think of me?"

"Illegal immigrant. Dumbass. Eunuch."

The Skeleton King gave me a look that had gone completely cold, then sighed deeply.

"Damn it. Yes, clubs were a hell of a surprise too. But what amazed me most was the Monster Encyclopedia you humans made."

"What?"

"That was when I first realized there were so many different kinds of monsters. Until then, what I knew about monsters amounted to a scrap of flesh on a pile of bones."

"…!"

"But even you humans, who've spent so long researching monsters, haven't uncovered everything. Isn't that right?"

Magic Johnson answered, his face set. "That's true. There were limits to what we could learn by studying monsters."

These days, it was the kind of story you only read in history textbooks.

Even after the Great Cataclysm, humanity wanted more data. In the period immediately after the war ended, Hunters weren't hunting monsters so much as capturing them.

Then came all kinds of experiments, including dissections.

But that wasn't enough. Not every monster in the world was a low-level one like a goblin.

"The more powerful the monsters we tried to capture, the greater our losses. Plenty of S-rank Hunters joined the effort, myself included, but we didn't always succeed."

"Which means…"

"Among the highest-level monsters we most wanted to target, some Named monsters like Leviathan and the Arch Lich had disappeared completely. And there were monsters like Dragons, with very few individuals. We weren't able to learn much about those."

I murmured, “The Prophet could be one of them.”

“Right. If he really is a monster, as we suspect… he must be one of the top-level Named monsters we never identified.”

Magic Johnson’s voice sank.

“And I can say this for certain: from the Great Cataclysm until now, I’ve never seen anything with an ability like his.”

He was a complete unknown.

We knew neither what he was nor what he could do.

And fighting an enemy whose nature you hadn’t uncovered was the stupidest, craziest thing you could do.

Of course, I’d done that crazy thing countless times.

“Then there’s only one option left.”

At my offhand remark, I saw everyone’s expression grow heavy. Before anyone could try to stop me, I continued.

“We set out immediately. I have to see that bastard’s face.”

One message.

I would use those words The Prophet had sent me through Yamamoto Genji as a signpost and track the bastard down.

Before an irreversible catastrophe struck.

Even if… it was a trap.

Chapter 801

“We’re leaving soon. Get ready.”

At that one remark, tossed out when I came back without warning, Yamamoto Genji surprisingly nodded obediently.

“Understood.”

For a guy who’d been going on about Chōsenjin[3209] when he first woke up, he was being about as polite as possible.

If Heo Jun had witnessed this astonishing change, he might have written this on the first line of the Donguibogam[3210]:

> A beating is the best medicine.

Bodily wounds called for potions. A rotten mind called for fists.

Yamamoto Genji scrambled out of bed and snapped to attention like a recruit.

“I’m ready.”

“Already?”

“Yes, sir.”

“You planning to fight in that?”

“Huh?”

Yamamoto Genji blinked. From that innocent look, he clearly hadn’t understood what I meant. Or maybe he hadn’t heard me properly.

So I kindly repeated myself.

“You planning to fight in your hospital gown?”

“…!”

A brief silence.

At last, he realized what I meant by leaving. His voice trembled.

“W-we’re going to the battlefield?”

“Where did you think we were going?”

“I’m still a patient, so I naturally assumed I’d be sent back to the main camp…”

“Sent back?”

“Y-yes, sir.”

“Hmm. Right. You’re still a patient. A patient.”

Good grief. I’d forgotten something important.

Muttering to myself, I kicked open the firmly shut door.

[3209] Chōsenjin is a Japanese term for Koreans that can be used derogatorily.

[3210] The Donguibogam is a seventeenth-century Korean medical encyclopedia compiled by Heo Jun, a royal physician of the Joseon dynasty.

“Hey! Anyone out there?”

A healer from the medical unit came running before the words had left my mouth.

“Yes, sir.”

“Uh, the transport vehicle going back to the main camp hasn’t left yet, right?”

“No, sir. It’s still waiting.”

“Good. Contact the team leader right away and tell him to load one more body. I’ll take care of the cleanup, so all they have to do is come pick him up.”

“I’ll pass that along.”

“…Wait.”

Yamamoto Genji had been listening. Now he looked distinctly uneasy.

“One more body? Cleanup? What does that mean?”

“Nothing. Don’t worry about it.”

“It sounds like something I should worry about. Hey, you. Put down the phone. Who are you calling?”

The healer answered flatly, “Team Leader Jones, as the boss instructed.”

“Who’s Team Leader Jones?”

“He’s in charge of recovering the dead. He transports the fallen back to the main camp.”

“…!”

Yamamoto Genji looked from me to the healer and back. Then his expression turned resolute.

“On my honor as a samurai, I’ll give my life in battle.”

“What honor? I looked you up online. Your nickname’s ‘Swift No-Show.‘”

“…”

“Quit talking bullshit. Gear up and get out here.”

“Yes, sir. But, by any chance…”

“What?”

“I’m still not feeling well. Is there really no way you could send me to the rear…”

Whack!

“Ugh!”

Even now, all he could think about was running away. A bastard like this needed a beating.

I sighed and watched him stagger to his feet.

I’d have loved to beat the hell out of him, but the fact that I needed even a piece of shit like him left a bad taste in my mouth.

“Hey.”

“W-why? What is it?”

“I’m not going to hit you, so relax. I just want to check one more time.”

My voice dropped.

“What you said he told you back then. Are you sure?”

Before Yamamoto Genji could answer, the words I’d already heard several times replayed in my ears.

> “Rub’ al Khali. Come find me in the land where the black jewel sleeps, before it’s too late.”

The trailing hem of The Prophet’s long robe seemed close enough to grab.

The Arabian Desert covers most of the Middle East, stretching from Yemen through Oman and the Persian Gulf to Jordan and Iraq.

More than 2.3 million square kilometers.[3211] Korea’s official area, as submitted to the UN, was just over 200,000 square kilometers.[3212] By comparison, the desert was absurdly vast.

No wonder the estimated search time was so long. We were planning to comb through all this.

But we’d had no other choice.

Mana readings rose by the day, and the concentration had grown so dense that even the most advanced equipment couldn’t function properly. Covering that much ground meant sending a hundred thousand Hunters out on foot.

Then The Prophet, who’d been hiding somewhere in that vast desert, named a place himself. Whether that was good news or bad, I couldn’t say.

The Rub’ al Khali Desert.

If the Arabian Desert was the broad term for the desert regions of the Middle East, the Rub’ al Khali was the vast desert at its center, spread across the southern Arabian Peninsula.

It was the second-largest desert in the world, after the Sahara in Africa. Even so, narrowing down the area The Prophet meant wasn’t difficult.

At least, not for Team Leader Choi.

“The Empty Quarter.”

“What’s that?”

“Rub’ al Khali means ‘Empty Quarter’ in Arabic. A land where no one can live. Nothing but blazing sun and sand. That’s probably how it got such a desolate name.”

“Then the black jewel…”

[3211] More than 2.3 million square kilometers is more than about 890,000 square miles.

[3212] Just over 200,000 square kilometers is just over about 77,000 square miles.

"There are oil fields there. Supposedly, they were once the largest in the world. Judging by his message, that's our likeliest destination."

Searching was the hard part. Getting there wasn't. Once we had a destination, we advanced at astonishing speed.

The thousand Hunters chosen for the expedition were among the best deployed to the Middle East. We took the shortest route across the Arabian Desert and reached the Rub' al Khali.

And we immediately understood why the people of the ancient Middle East had called this place the Empty Quarter.

Desert and wilderness stretched to the horizon like a vast sea, with small villages scattered through it like reefs.

Machinery and abandoned industrial complexes stood among them. The place was so desolate that it was hard to believe the world's largest oil field had once been here.

Even the Skeleton King blinked in confusion.

"What? Humans live here? This isn't a Gate?"

Team Leader Choi had said once for a reason.

This land had been abandoned twice.

Once, long ago, when its inhabitants named it the Rub' al Khali. Then again during the Great Cataclysm.

And a place didn't get abandoned without reason.

"Spectacular."

I wished Magic Johnson, who'd come with us, had said that. Unfortunately, it was the Skeleton King. I could feel what he meant, though.

Maybe we all did.

The concentration of magical power... It's too dense.

At some point, the air had grown heavy. It wasn't just the sun beating down on us.

Clunk. Psssh.

An engine died abruptly. The vehicles carrying our thousand Hunters all ground to a halt, and Magic Johnson murmured, "Here we go."

A simple mechanical failure was out of the question.

Yamamoto Genji had been through something similar before. His face was already deathly pale.

"He's here. He's here. He's here..."

The Skeleton King watched him mutter without pause, then turned to me.

"Can I kill that human?"

"No. Unfortunately, you can't."

"Why not? Didn't we bring him along to put his body to use? If I have to keep looking at him like that, I might as well turn him into an undead."

"Oh."

Was this bastard a genius?

I barely stopped myself from nodding at his surprisingly logical argument. Then I gave Yamamoto Genji a hard kick and got out of the vehicle.

What do you mean, he's here already?

We were still a considerable distance from the oil fields The Prophet had hinted at. Apart from the rising concentration of magical power, I hadn't sensed anything unusual.

This was only a sign.

An ominous but unmistakable sign that something we hadn't encountered yet was out there in the vast desert.

Then the specialist checking the magical-power distribution at regular intervals gave his report, turning my suspicion into certainty.

"We can't get a reading. Our equipment can't determine an accurate value."

Not even with several precious A-rank Magic Gems fitted into the measuring device.

I licked my dry lips.

"He told us to come find him. Guess he wasn't just talking bullshit."

Team Leader Choi stepped quietly up beside me.

"Should we pull back and request reinforcements while we still can?"

A cautious suggestion, just like him. I shook my head without hesitation.

"No. We keep going."

"We don't know what kind of trap may be waiting."

"Of course there could be a trap. We know what that bastard Prophet is like."

"Then why…"

"Trap or not, we have to break through. We don't have time. And…"

I lowered my voice.

"If luring us here is his goal in itself, that's all the more reason not to call for reinforcements."

We didn't know the limits of The Prophet's abilities or One God's fighting strength. Calling S-rank Hunters here—the core of our forces—would put everyone left behind in danger.

In this desert, The Prophet was practically a pope with countless fanatics at his command.

It'd be a problem if we brought in reinforcements only to leave the rear wide open to a raid.

That didn't mean I planned to fight recklessly.

Normally, I would've gone alone. The reason I'd brought a thousand Hunters was that I knew I wasn't invincible, no matter how strong I was. Nothing was more dangerous than an enemy you didn't understand.

And the force we had now was neither too small nor too large.

Even without me, we had two dependable powerhouses in Magic Johnson and the Skeleton King. Add the cowardly Yamamoto Genji and Team Leader Choi, and I was sure we could smash our way through whatever came.

Bring in more forces, though, and he might run.

We held the front, while Chuck Hagel, Faye Chen, Prince Felix, and several other S-rank Hunters guarded the encirclement with a considerable force to our rear.

If we added or removed even a little from either side, the balance of power would shift—and our chance to eliminate The Prophet would slip that much farther away.

"No beast attacks something that looks stronger than itself. Especially not a fox like The Prophet. Right, Jin?"

"That's right."

I nodded at Magic Johnson, watching the heat haze rise over the distant desert.

"Still, that's a relief. Looks like that quick-witted fox hasn't gotten scared and run off."

"What do you mean—!"

His face went rigid in an instant.

Realizing what I meant, Magic Johnson hurriedly swallowed the rest of his words and shouted, pouring his mighty mana into his voice.

"Prepare for battle!"

Right.

They were coming.

Chapter 802

Slide.

Sand slipped slowly down the hillside. The day was sweltering, without a breath of wind. Beneath the blazing sun, the shadows of flying beasts passed over everyone's heads.

Kreeeaaak!

A dozen or so eagles glided through the sky, their cries almost like screams.

Their enormous wings, spanning several meters,[3213] were nothing but bare white bones. The eyes gazing down from far above were not made of flesh and blood. They burned with a vivid blue light.

The gaze of something returned from the edge of death.

Something caught between life and death.

"Undead…"

The word escaped someone's lips like a sigh.

Yet none of the people watching the eagles fly overhead and on toward the horizon looked afraid. They already knew the undead monsters weren't their enemies.

More precisely, they knew the creatures' master was on their side.

And at least one of them thought of him as more than an ally. He was a friend.

"Hey."

"What? Don't talk to me. I'm concentrating."

"How's it going?"

"I said don't talk to me. I'm sharing my vision."

"Still? You're damn slow."

"Fuck it. I'm done."

"Sorry."

"Then shut your mouth, you lunatic. Do you think this is some cheap Familiar like the ones humans use?"

His voice was curt. The human and the monster spoke as casually as old friends while staring into the heat haze shimmering over the desert.

Beneath them, vibrations slowly crumbled the sand dunes.

"Anything yet?"

"No. Actually, I finished a little while ago."

"What? Why didn't you say so?"

"To build suspense."

"You're a nutcase."

[3213] One meter is about 3.28 ft.

“I’m kidding. I didn’t say anything because I wasn’t sure how to tell you.”

“…There are that many?”

“Yes.”

“How many?”

“At least ten thousand. After that, there were too many, so I gave up counting.”

At the Skeleton King’s answer, Jin Taekyung fell silent.

Ten thousand.

An enormous army.

And that was only how many the Skeleton King had confirmed. The true number might be far higher.

“Fuck. They really went all out.”

“They had a reason for drawing us all the way here.”

“What about him?”

The Skeleton King knew who Jin meant by him. He shook his head.

“I still don’t know. From above, there are about three that look like serious threats, but whether one of them is The Prophet… Hmm.”

The Skeleton King let out a low groan. His expression stiffened as he continued.

“There was one in the air, too.”

“All S-rank?”

“Probably. My servants were taken out before they could do a thing.”

Three on the ground. One in the air.

The news that four S-rank monsters had led an army of tens of thousands right to their doorstep shook the nearly one thousand Hunters. However carefully selected and battle-hardened they were, they couldn’t simply stop fearing death.

Thud. Rumble, rumble.

The vibrations grew stronger. The Hunters’ gazes trembled as they watched the sand shift beneath their feet.

They could almost see the countless monsters about to surge toward them like a wave.

And amid the monsters’ roars and the fierce fighting, they could see their comrades—or themselves—dying in sprays of blood.

Then a calm voice reached them.

“So, want to retreat now?”

One by one, those who’d been staring at the ground raised their heads. Jin Taekyung stood on the hill, watching them with a steady, solemn gaze.

“No. I guess we should call it running away, not retreating. Right?”

“…!”

“Honestly, whether you call it a strategic retreat or running away, I can’t blame you. Everyone wants to survive. Everyone has a reason to keep living, even if they have to run like hell to do it.”

That was true of everyone.

People had family bound to them by blood, and friends who were family in all but blood. Even those who had neither still had reasons to go on living.

But…

“I don’t know where it came from, but there’s a saying: There’s no paradise at the end of the road when you run away.”

It was strange.

The sun overhead was hot enough to set them on fire, yet the moment they heard Jin Taekyung’s voice, a chill went through them as though they’d been doused in cold water.

He was right.

There was no paradise at the end of the road when you ran away. They lived in a time like that.

“Run, and run, and keep running… Then one day, after doing everything you can to stay alive, you look around. Will there be anything left for you to protect?”

It had been some thirty years.

Humanity had rebuilt bigger, grander cities on the ruins left by the Great Cataclysm. The disaster’s traces remained only in records and scars.

Those who survived the war, or were born after peace arrived, didn’t know what war was like.

But Jin Taekyung was different.

“Once you start backing down, it’s over.”

A battle was not a war. A Gate was not the real world.

In the Gates they’d faced until now, they could retreat to avoid a fight. But the place where they stood now was the world where they’d been born and raised.

A world with something they had to protect.

A world they had to protect, no matter what.

Jin Taekyung had known that since the day he survived alone, leaving behind someone who’d been like an older brother. He knew it still, now that he’d come to know another world.

“If there’s something you want to protect, put your life on the line and fight. That’s why you’re here, isn’t it?”

Everyone wondered, but no one knew why the cursed monsters had invaded this world—or how humans had come to possess such incredible power.

But they all had some inkling.

The power that had come to them one day like a stroke of luck had been given to them to protect this world from monsters.

"And for that one reason…"

Whoosh.

Sand whipped around Jin Taekyung. A hot wind blew in from somewhere and swept over the people.

It thawed their hands and feet, frozen despite the scorching sun, and set the red blood in their veins boiling—blood unlike that of the monsters now emerging in the distance through a vast sandstorm.

"That's why people—why this world—calls us Hunters."

Fwoosh!

An immense wave of qi jolted everyone alert. Heat haze rose around Jin Taekyung as he slowly turned.

The heat was so intense that the space around him seemed to warp.

His spearhead caught the sunlight and blazed like a blue-white sun.

"Get into formation."

Clang, clang, clang!

Countless weapons came free at once, as if on cue.

Magic Johnson raised his staff, and dozens of transport vehicles, each weighing several metric tons,[3214] moved across their front to form a barricade.

Behind them, nearly a hundred tanks drove tower shields larger than their own bodies deep into the sand.

Boom. Rumble!

A wall of steel took shape amid heavy thuds.

And then…

Rumble…

A wave of monsters raced across the boundless desert, throwing up a vast cloud of sand.

Jin Taekyung watched them come. His next words were so matter-of-fact that they took everyone by surprise.

"Fuck. Hang in there, everyone. Killing all those bastards is going to be a real pain in the ass."

Someone burst out laughing. A Hunter who'd been staring at the comrade beside him as if he'd gone mad let out a short laugh, too. Soon everyone's shoulders were shaking.

Kill them all? Every last one of those monsters?

Ordinarily, they'd have thought it was ridiculous nonsense.

[3214] One metric ton is 1,000 kg, or about 2,205 lb.

If anyone else had said it, no matter how great a Hunter they were, they'd have cursed them under their breath.

But that startlingly young Asian man was Jin Taekyung, the new Alliance Leader of the World Hunter Federation.

A hero who had proven himself.

The only person writing a new legend after Cheon Taemin.

They couldn't help believing in him. Jin Taekyung had always fought at the very front, harder than anyone else.

That alone was reason enough to fight.

Boom. Rumble, rumble!

Graaaar!

Even as the rumbling and roars swelled until their eardrums throbbed, the Hunters couldn't stop laughing.

From the sand dune, where he stood as solid as a mountain, Jin Taekyung swung his spear.

Crunch!

Blood shot up like a fountain and evaporated before it touched the ground. Torn bodies and entrails scattered in every direction.

It was the opening moment of the great battle that would later be called the Desert Storm.

Chuck Hagel stared silently at the cigar in his hand.

The cigar he'd taken—or rather, acquired—from the French President not long ago was still burning down.

He'd since heard it had been a gift from Michael Silbert himself. Given where it came from, it was obviously worth a fortune.

Cuban cigars made before the Great Cataclysm were impossible to find now, no matter how much money you had.

Why?

Simple. Cuba had been destroyed.

The Monster Wave that began in the center of Cuba's capital had grown beyond control. It ended only after sinking three island nations in the Cayman Islands deep beneath the sea.

Perhaps that was when it started.

When a certain middle-aged man who'd never touched tobacco began smoking cigars out of habit.

His mother had been in Cuba.

Crackle.

Ash that had been burning for a long time dropped with a soft tap.

After watching it in silence for a long while, Chuck Hagel abruptly spoke.

“Any request for backup?”

His aide waved away the thick cigar smoke before answering.

“Not yet.”

“Goddamn it.”

“You don’t need to worry so much, boss.”

“Worry? About that punk?”

He’s too strong to call a punk. And he’s your superior, too.

The aide barely kept the words from slipping out. He clicked his tongue instead.

“We’re fully prepared and standing by. We have the rear of the Rub’ al Khali Desert covered.”

“Damn it. That’s all well and good, but that goddamn satellite surveillance still doesn’t work. Why are the drones down? Did some defense contractor take a kickback?”

“Come on, boss. You know why. The concentration of magical power is too high.”

“I don’t know a damn thing about that. What I do know is that if anything happens to the others with that punk who ran off on his own… the bastards who made those fucking paper airplanes will die by my hand.”

“…”

The aide was profoundly grateful that there was no one from a defense contractor around at that moment.

He was grateful, too, that his short-tempered superior was still guarding the main force.

Unfortunately, his relief didn’t last long.

Beep. Beep-beep.

“…Huh?”

An emergency alarm sounded without warning, and red warning lights flashed on. Urgent shouts broke out across the command center.

“Identify the sender and the coordinates!”

“Damn it! Hurry!”

A moment later, Chuck Hagel saw his aide’s face stiffen as he read the report.

“What is it?”

“…We’re under attack. Part of the search party outside has been hit.”

“What?”

“And…”

The aide paused for breath, then let it out.

“The enemy isn’t a monster.”

Chapter 803

Human beings possess almost limitless potential.

With minds more capable than those of any other living thing on Earth, they built systems of their own and developed civilization.

From the primitive prehistoric age to the present, what humans had achieved was dazzling—especially the history and culture they had built over the past several thousand years.

Progress, progress, and more progress.

Humans never stopped discovering new things. With each discovery, they moved forward.

Until gunfire filled battlefields where swords and spears had once clashed. Until car horns replaced the whinny of horses on streets lit by neon signs.

Until they crossed five seas and six continents and finally ventured into space.

“Houston, Tranquility Base here. The Eagle has landed.”

On the day that grand plan, named after an ancient sun god, succeeded, what did the god watching from somewhere think? A human had set foot on the moon for the first time and called that historic moment “one small step, one giant leap for mankind.”

No one could know the will of God. But an old man with the rather long name Abdullah bin Abdulaziz Ali was certain.

God must have been enraged.

Otherwise, He would not have unleashed a great flood called the Great Cataclysm.

Sending the great Prophet down to this land and commanding him to punish them surely meant that he was to punish humanity’s arrogance on God’s behalf.

“Do you not think so too, sinful infidel?”

“…!”

The middle-aged man trembled at the old man’s calm voice.

Drenched in blood, he stood amid his many subordinates. Only moments ago, they had been alive and breathing. Now they lay strewn across the ground.

He had nothing left but the sword in his hand and the mana boiling through his body, his fighting spirit still undiminished.

“Atone through death. Like those who went before you.”

“Go… fuck yourself!”

With a shout like a scream, the middle-aged man drew on every ounce of his strength and charged the old fanatic.

Whoooosh!

A strike that would likely be his last.

His sword flew faster than ever before, its blade blazing with aura.

Shhk!

A flash came out of nowhere, cleaving both the aura-wreathed sword and its wielder in two.

Splatter!

Blood gushed like a fountain.

As the headless corpse crumpled, something glinting fell at the old man's feet.

A necklace. It was a necklace.

The old man stared at the crucifix necklace half-buried in the hot sand, then spoke.

"Any survivors?"

"None. That infidel was the last."

The young man who had cut down the middle-aged A-rank Hunter as easily as breathing continued, "Amir, there are more infidels not far from here. If you let me go…"

"Their main force will have heard from them over the radio this time. We've dealt with them easily so far, but it won't be that simple from now on."

"No matter how strong the infidels' forces are, we can defeat them!"

"You're right, Hamid, son of Hassan. But have you forgotten what the Prophet said?"

Hamid flinched at the old man's piercing gaze. A moment later, he realized what Amir meant, and his eyes widened.

"What the Prophet said… Could it be?"

"Yes. The time has finally come. The time promised by the Prophet and almighty Allah is upon us."

"…!"

Surprise turned to joy. Joy to fervor.

The old man smiled as he watched Hamid's expression change. Then he looked over the warriors of God surrounding them and murmured, "Inshallah.[3215] The Prophet will lead us to the promised land!"

"Inshallah![3216]"

"Allah hu akbar![3217]"

Their voices rose together in a mighty shout. The countless fanatics who had lain dormant deep in the desert for decades began their advance.

Toward the promised land they had awaited for so long.

Toward the place overflowing with God's grace.

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

A vast cloud of sand swept across the desert.

[3215] Inshallah is an Arabic expression meaning "God willing."

[3216] Inshallah is an Arabic expression meaning "God willing."

[3217] Allah hu akbar is an Arabic phrase meaning "God is greatest."

If this world were a chessboard, what would my role be?

A pawn that could only move forward?

A knight that could go farther than a pawn?

A bishop crossing the board diagonally?

Maybe a rook moving in straight lines, a queen with the combined reach of a bishop and a rook, or the king—ironically, the most important piece and yet weaker than the queen.

Honestly, I didn't know.

Even now, as the Alliance Leader of the World Hunter Federation, even with everyone in the world knowing who I was, I still didn't know exactly where I stood.

What I could do on this chessboard, or how far I could go.

But one thing I could say for sure.

If that chessboard was a battlefield rather than the world, I could dominate it.

I could push forward like a pawn, leap over my enemies' heads like a knight, then range across the board like a bishop, rook, or queen and swallow everything in my path.

Just like right now.

Baaang!

Flesh and bone burst apart before the spearhead even touched them. A Troll with its upper half blown away toppled like a rotten log, and someone shouted behind me.

"Damn it! How many times do I have to tell you? Kill them like that and I can barely use them as undead!"

Instead of answering, I twisted my body.

Whoom. Boom!

Three flails flying in from different directions tangled together.

—Kwo?

The ogres blinked stupidly, a beat too late to understand what had happened.

White Flame's spearhead had already swept past their necks.

Shhk!

Three heads flew free of their massive bodies.

I sprang off an ogre's lifeless corpse and plunged toward the monsters packed around me.

Fire Dragon Divine Spear, Form Two.

Heavenly Strike.

Krrrunch!

Blood sprayed. Flesh split.

Ding. Ding, ding.

System alerts rang in my ears without pause as I leaped into the thick cloud of dust.

Open Inventory.

One weapon stored, another summoned at the same instant.

Pop.

White Flame vanished from my hand like an illusion. In its place, two short daggers settled firmly into my hands.

In a fight at this close range, they were faster and more efficient than any divine weapon.

I'd watched someone wield a dagger like this up close. With a single blade, he had earned the name Slaughter Saint.

And I watched him do it from right beside him.

For one brief moment, I steadied my breathing.

I calmed the internal energy pounding as though it would burst out of me. Light on my toes. Shoulders loose.

Remembering the Slaughter Saint's advice, I copied the movements I'd seen him perform right in front of me dozens of times.

Then I took a step.

Ghost Illusory Slaughter Step.

Swish.

The wind that had always struck me head-on now slipped gently past.

I felt as though I were floating through the air in zero gravity.

Of course, I couldn't claim I'd perfectly copied the Slaughter Saint's personal martial art just by doing this much. But for dealing with these bastards right now, this much was enough.

Shhk, shhk, shhk!

The sound of slicing reached my ears only after flesh and bone had been cut.

Sound wasn't slow.

I was fast enough to leave it behind. So were the daggers in my hands.

Thud, thud, thud!

I slipped among the monsters like mist, my daggers stabbing and slashing in flashes. Dozens fell, spraying blood.

No—they fell and rose again at the same moment.

—In the king's name, I command you: answer the call.

Whoooooosh.

A voice seemed to ring inside my head rather than reach my ears, and a chilling cold swept across the battlefield.

It raised the monsters that had fallen moments ago and those falling even now.

—Krr. Grrrk.

Slow, rasping cries.

An eerie light glimmered deep in their eyes.

Reborn as new beings at the edge of death, the undead army obeyed their king's command. Without hesitation, they charged the monsters pouring in from every direction.

—Kraaaaaa!

—Grr. Uh. Uh. Uh!

Thud. Kraaang!

The cries of living and undead monsters tangled together. Weapons swung hard into bodies on both sides.

But the living monsters felt pain. The undead had forgotten it when they died.

—Graaah.

Crunch! Splatter!

Outnumbered? It didn't matter.

Even when weapons took their limbs or pierced their chests, they kept moving to the very end.

The Skeleton King had given them only one goal: before the magical power he had bestowed on them ran out, before they died a second death, they were to create another soldier.

Crack!

—Kyaaaah!

A monster screamed as its throat was torn out.

The undead that had done it, already missing an arm and a leg, was ripped to shreds by enraged monsters. That didn't matter either.

Thanks to that, I—

No, we—had bought a little more time.

"Fire!"

"Fire Wall!"

"Lightning Spear!"

Fwoooosh.

Countless bolts of lightning and tongues of flame streaked through the air.

Behind the enormous transport vehicle blocking the way like a barricade, the monsters packed in so tightly there wasn't a gap—like the first day of an E-Mart[3218]

[3218] E-Mart is a South Korean hypermarket chain.

Black Friday sale—had no choice but to take the sudden barrage of attacks head-on.

Crackle. KRAAAASH!

—Kraaaaaa!

—Kgh! Grrrk!

Screams filled the air.

Lightning seared scales and flesh. Flames slipped through the gaps and burned bone and organs.

Many of the hundreds of monsters writhing in pain unlike anything they had ever felt even swung their weapons at their own allies.

—Kwoooooo!

Seized by their own savage instincts, the monsters charged one another.

But I didn’t let my guard down for a second.

“Hold formation! Don’t move a single step!”

I drove internal energy into the command. The Hunters who had begun advancing, swept up in the heat of battle and the thrill of gaining the upper hand, stopped in their tracks.

Battle was flow. Battle was momentum.

But there was a time to ride that momentum.

Against a force of well over ten thousand, taking out a mere thousand monsters wouldn’t win us the battle all at once.

Slowly. Carefully.

We had to win while keeping our losses to a minimum.

Besides…

I still can’t see him.

The bastard who had yet to show himself.

The Prophet.

And the S-rank monsters waiting for their moment among that sea of beasts—or somewhere in the sky above.

Until we took them down, neither this battle nor the war would end.

This fight… is only just beginning.

And at that moment, just as I muttered those words deep in my heart—

Thud. Thud. Thuuum.

An immense magical power surged from far away, making the desert tremble.

Chapter 804

Even when a thick fog hides the sea, anyone can tell there's an ocean beyond it. They can hear the faint cries of gulls and feel the salt in the wind.

A battlefield is the same.

Screams and blood fly in every direction. Countless blades clash, throwing off sparks. And yet, something with a special power can change the air of a battlefield simply by existing.

Just like now.

Rrrrmmm.

The air trembled.

A deep rumble rolling in from far away shook the desert.

The monsters that had been charging over the bodies of their own kind came to a halt as if on cue. People stiffened with a start.

What were they feeling at that moment?

A chill creeping down their spines? Or fear they'd briefly forgotten?

I didn't know exactly what it was, but I wasn't feeling either one.

What you saw depended on where you stood.

Unlike them, I stood on a peak. From there, I could see farther and sense more.

And I wasn't the only one.

"This is…"

The Skeleton King, who'd come up beside me at some point, murmured as if groaning.

Magic Johnson, who'd been saving his strength by focusing on defense in the rear, looked grim. So did Yamamoto Genji, an S-rank Hunter at least in name, and Team Leader Choi, whose Qi Sense was nearly as sharp as his.

"Fuck."

"Chikushō.[3219] This is insane. I have to get out of here."

"So the leaders are finally making their move."

Whack!

There's always a reason when some bastard gets hit.

I kicked Yamamoto Genji in the shin for spouting nonsense at a time like this. As I turned away, I stirred my internal energy and stamped down with a quake step.

Boom!

The ground shuddered around me, and a wall of sand surged upward.

Through the countless grains falling back down, I saw the Hunters' faces. They looked as if they'd just been doused in cold water.

[3219] Chikushō is a Japanese exclamation of frustration, roughly "damn it."

“What are you all scared of? You that eager to die?”

“B-but this is…”

“However you rank them, they’re still monsters. And we’re all still Hunters. So quit freezing up like you’re about to die and…”

Thud!

I drove a dagger into the head of an ogre still writhing and clinging stubbornly to life, then finished my sentence.

“Fight. Like Hunters.”

Ding.

SYSTEM

Defeated Lv. 95 Ogre!
Gained a tiny amount of EXP!
The effect of the Title One Against a Thousand activates!
Intimidation has greatly increased!
Enemies are rapidly losing confidence due to your Intimidation!
The status effect Fear, which had been applied to numerous allies, has been removed!
Ally morale has greatly increased. Those who follow your leadership will share a strong bond and perform even better!
Certain stats increase when facing numerous enemies!

One Against a Thousand was the Title I’d earned while fighting the Arch Lich’s army in Sichuan Province. For a reward earned through such a rare feat, it certainly delivered.

“GRAAAAAH!”

A few Hunters who’d been swallowing nervously until now roared, their eyes bloodshot. A tremendous cheer followed, heating the air around us.

Of course, there were always exceptions.

“No, even so, that was a bit much…”

I clicked my tongue softly at the sight of Yamamoto Genji rubbing his shin where I’d kicked it, watching me warily. Then I turned my eyes toward the monster army stretching endlessly across the vast desert.

Clack. Clack-clack.

Their movements were orderly now, unlike before.

A force of well over ten thousand marched with measured precision, parting to the left and right. Three paths opened, and at last, the beings radiating an overwhelming presence appeared.

The S-rank monsters.

Some were huge and grotesque. Others were so small compared to the monsters around them that they barely stood out.

But the demonic qi and Fear pouring from them were as overwhelming as all those countless monsters put together.

Enough to frighten even Yamamoto Genji. Cowardly and less capable though he was, he was still an S-rank Hunter.

“So those are the commanders leading this monster army,” the Skeleton King murmured.

“But the most important one is still missing,” I said.

“…The Prophet.”

“Right. The Prophet’s the head. Those guys are the hands and feet.”

“But is he here now? It pains me to admit it, but… I haven’t seen or sensed anyone I’d take to be The Prophet.”

To be honest, neither had I.

But there was one thing I was sure of.

The Prophet was somewhere on this battlefield.

Given how meticulous the bastard was, he was probably watching everything unfold from some distance away.

If he came close, I’d sense him right away.

The enemies were too numerous, and the battlefield too vast, for me to get a clear read with Qi Sense.

On top of that, the monster army’s momentum had changed with the arrival of its S-rank commanders. It was nothing like before.

“Jin.”

Magic Johnson’s low voice reached my ears. His eyes had sunk deep, as if he could already guess what the battle about to begin again would cost us.

He was worried about me, too—the one who would have to bear it all.

“If you’ll let me, I’d like to take command instead.”

I stared silently at Magic Johnson for a moment, then shook my head.

“No. I’m in command.”

Of course, Magic Johnson had the skill and the qualifications. He was a veteran of the Great Cataclysm and a fine commander who’d led his forces to victory in more than ten major battles.

But…

“If there’s something I have to bear, I won’t push it onto someone else.”

“…!”

“That’s one of the reasons I’m here, isn’t it?”

Magic Johnson looked at me with wide eyes, then gave a small nod.

When he spoke, I heard firm trust and the faintest trace of a smile.

“All right, young friend. Give us our orders.”

I took a deep breath and looked around at everyone.

A thousand Hunters in all. I didn’t know every name or every face.

But if someone fell here and never got back up, I’d remember everything about them for the rest of my life.

Yeah. That was enough.

If I died, they’d do the same for me.

“I’m dropping the formalities now, Magic Johnson.”

“Yes, young boss.”

“Keep the enemies in the air in check and focus on protecting our allies. The Hunters under you are to follow your orders until I say otherwise.”

“Yes, sir!”

Magic Johnson shouted his answer and rose into the air.

The Grand Mage’s eyes, alight with a keen edge, followed hundreds of specks slowly crossing the cloudless sky—and the eagle beating its wings at their head.

More precisely, he was watching a monster with enormous wings tens of meters[3220] across and a lion’s lower body: a Griffon.

“Choi Minwoo.”

“Yes.”

“Take a hundred troops and hold the front line. If the tanks break formation, hand in your sword and retire.”

Team Leader Choi raised the Hero’s Sword, its blade shining with transparent light, and answered.

“That won’t happen.”

Team Leader Choi was the great hero Cheon Taemin’s only blood descendant and the master of the Ares Guild, yet he’d never once slacked off.

Sometimes I thought that if a new S-rank Hunter emerged anytime soon, it would be him.

I let out a quiet laugh at his calm confidence, then turned to the others still waiting.

“Skeleton King. Yamamoto Genji. You two…”

“No need to waste time saying it. There are three S-rank monsters on the ground, so we can each take one.”

“M-me too?”

I silenced Yamamoto Genji with a hard stare, then corrected the Skeleton King.

“You and him take one each. I’ll take two.”

“What?”

[3220] Tens of meters is roughly 65–300 ft.

“Huh?”

The two of them questioned me at the same time. I turned away and muttered inwardly.

Open Inventory. Summon.

The two daggers that had served me so well in close combat disappeared. The cool, solid feel of a spear shaft filled my hand, which had been empty for an instant.

A flame warped the space around it.

Fwoosh.

Force formed around the transparent spearhead, wrapping it in a clear sheen.

In an instant too brief to measure, I gripped the spear in reverse and drove it down like a streak of light.

At an unseen enemy that had approached from deep in the desert without anyone noticing.

Shhk. KRAAAAAASH!

The heat-soaked ground split like tofu.

Hard sand and earth beneath my feet shot high into the air. In the ground, gouged out like a vast crater, countless writhing creatures came into view.

Among them was the largest of all, a monster gleaming red.

That’s…

A warning light flashed in my mind.

At the same time, the blue circle of Qi Sense spread out alongside my spearhead and reached the monster’s hard body.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

SYSTEM

Your Qi Sense is currently at the eighth stage.
You have detected targets within range using Qi Sense!
Lv. 87 Soldier Scorpion
Lv. 76 Worker Scorpion
Lv. 99 Elite Scorpion

Countless details reached me through my eyes and ears.

But my attention was fixed on only one of them.

SYSTEM

Lv. 140 Scorpion King

Countless scorpions as large as grown men—and one scorpion larger than dozens of them put together.

The Scorpion King.

That was the enemy I had to take down first.

KRAAAAAASH! Crunch!

Superheated flames scorched the monsters' lair, deep beneath the ground.

Their hard carapaces, sharp pincers, even the venomous stingers on their tails—all of it melted away.

Kiiiiieeet!

The scorpions—or rather, the monsters—screamed in agony. Their dying cries spilled out of the pit and into the world.

Humans and monsters.

Monsters and humans.

Everyone could hear their screams, and everyone reacted.

"Kill. The. Humans!"

The Demon Realm language erupted like a roar from an S-rank monster, and a massive tremor swept in every direction.

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

Their numbers weren't the problem.

Their momentum, and the quantity and quality of the demonic qi they emitted, were beyond comparison with what we'd faced before.

The elite monsters waiting in the rear charged after their S-rank commanders. More than ten thousand monsters surged behind them like a wave.

KRAAAAAH!

On the ground came an enormous force led by three S-rank monsters. Over everyone's heads, hundreds of flying monsters shrieked, led by the Griffon spreading its unusually large wings.

Kiaaaak!

The attack began across both sky and ground.

But I neither feared nor hesitated.

Kiaaaat!

The Scorpion King screamed as it burst out of the pit. I drove one decisive strike into it.

Crunch! Fwooooooosh!

Its acidic blood melted away in the flames.

Ding.

With the System alert I'd been waiting for, I charged like a beast toward the S-rank monsters.

KRAAAAAASH!

Chapter 805

A beast.

That was what Jin Taekyung looked like to everyone watching: fierce as a hungry tiger, majestic as a lion, swift as a leopard.

KRAAAAAASH!

Sand and earth swirled up around him. His figure seemed to ripple out of sight where he stood, then shot forward at terrifying speed.

Flamefire Path.

A single streak of flame crossed the space between them. He was faster than when he'd simply charged in headlong before, his movements incomparably more controlled.

Jin Taekyung felt he was beginning to understand, if only a little, the enlightenment the Fire King and the Slaughter Saint had reached over their lifetimes.

And how to bring down the enemies drawing closer by the second.

As the concentration of magical power had risen, so had these S-rank monsters' levels.

But Level wasn't an absolute measure of strength. An enemy with a lower Level might possess far greater qi, while one with a higher Level could be physically weaker.

Once opponents reached this tier, it ultimately came down to timing and matchup. Jin Taekyung had just turned the Level 140 Scorpion King into a roast with a surprise attack.

And there was only one way to size up an opponent's strength and find out how well you matched up.

Fight them.

Whoosh.

Several dozen meters[3221] vanished in an instant.

As Jin Taekyung charged straight at them, keeping his center of gravity low, three streaks of light fell toward him.

Shraaah!

[3221] One meter is about 3.28 ft.

The Death Knight's sword. The Lycanthrope's axe. And, last of all, the Manticore's claws.

Dark crimson magical power, so dense it seemed to warp space, pierced Jin Taekyung's body.

Or so the three S-rank monsters believed.

BOOM!

The earth flipped over with a deafening crash. Then a dark shadow fell overhead.

—…!

Their instincts awakened alongside the warning lights flashing in their minds.

These S-rank monsters were far too intelligent to dismiss as mere beasts. They understood at once what had happened, even as they struggled to accept what was right in front of them.

Power and qi greater than their own boiled inside that tiny, frail human body.

And then—

Heavenly Strike.

Jin Taekyung plunged toward the ground. Blue-white hellfire poured along White Flame's spearhead and swept out in every direction.

Fwoosh—KRAAAAAASH!

Flames spread as wide as a Grand Mage's Fire Wall spell, but burned hotter. They swallowed the front ranks of the monster army—horribly ravenous to behold, more ferocious than any beast.

—Aaaaaaagh!

—Kieeet!

Ding. Ding. Ding.

System alerts mingled with the dying screams of monsters.

But they weren't all that awaited Jin Taekyung as he rose from the blackened ash.

"How. Dare. You!"

The Lycanthrope Champion.

Trapped beneath the curse of the eternal moon, the strongest of the half-human, half-beast monsters roared and swung its enormous axe.

Whoooom!

Dark crimson magical power stormed through the air, cleaving space and wiping away the wind.

Just as the axe was about to split the human before it in two, White Flame's fire-wreathed spearhead flashed upward.

Clang!

A sharp ring sounded. The impossibly sturdy axe blade burst apart.

Crack—BOOM!

Hundreds of fragments rained down on the monsters rushing to save their commander.

Thud, thud, thud!

Screams rose with sprays of blood. Corpses piled atop corpses.

The Lycanthrope Champion stood frozen, bright yellow eyes wide. Jin Taekyung brought his spearhead down toward it without a moment's hesitation.

Or he would have, if not for the whistling sounds rushing in from both sides.

Whoooosh!

Jin Taekyung bent backward with lightning speed. His hair touched the ground as two fierce gusts swept barely clear of his face.

Pip!

His skin split under the pressure, sending a sharp sting through him. That was nothing. If it was the price of dodging the attacks, he'd gotten off absurdly cheap.

I'll pay them back with interest.

His body moved before the thought was complete. Straightening, he released the spear shaft and thrust out both palms.

Whoom—BOOM!

A shockwave and crash shook the ground.

But the sword and claws, shrouded in immense magical power, canceled out the force of his Flame Divine Palm. They didn't stop there.

Shraaah!

The Death Knight Legion Commander brought its sword down like a streak of light.

—Grrraaaah!

The Lycanthrope charged with a roar. Beside it, the Manticore Lord lashed its iron-hard, spike-covered tail like a whip.

They're working together? Monsters from different species?

Jin Taekyung's eyes widened at the attacks converging from three directions. That brief hesitation left the slightest opening.

Fwoooosh! BOOM!

Three S-rank monsters. Together, they struck with more destructive force than he could withstand even with his Scorching Yang Qi pushed to its limit.

And the Manticore Lord was even stronger and more cunning than he'd expected.

Whoosh. Slice!

Hot. As if someone had seared his thigh with fire.

Before he could fully feel the pain, three more flashes burst into view one after another.

BOOM!

A crash like the sky splitting open sent him flying backward.

Jin Taekyung twisted in midair, regained his balance, and threw a punch the instant he landed.

Poom!

Heat erupted from his fist. The Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist swept forward, setting monsters ablaze. As they shrieked and burned, dark crimson magical power surged from among them.

Whoooosh.

Pressure bore down from every direction, snuffing out the flames in an instant.

The three S-rank monsters had cut down even their writhing subordinates without hesitation. They were about to charge Jin Taekyung again when a voice suddenly rang out.

“Good. That’s far enough.”

At the unmistakable sound of the Demon Realm language, they stopped in their tracks.

The Skeleton King grinned at them, then tossed a remark at Jin Taekyung.

“Madman.”

Jin Taekyung met his unfriendly look with a calm question.

“Why?”

“What am I supposed to do when you charge off alone like that? Weren’t we just saying we’d each take one?”

“I was testing them. Seeing which was strongest and which was weakest.”

The Skeleton King’s gaze dropped to Jin Taekyung’s thigh. It looked as though something had torn a chunk out of it, and blood covered the wound.

The Manticore Lord had struck there with the Fire Dragon Armor around Jin Taekyung’s upper body in mind. It was as clever as it was strong.

“Looks more like it tested your blood.”

“They’re stronger than I expected. One of them, especially, is practically a named monster even among the S-ranks.”

“Which one?”

“The one in the middle.”

“The Manticore? It does stand out, even at a glance.”

The Skeleton King glared at the Manticore Lord, his face hardening. His voice turned cold.

“So that’s the one that wounded you.”

“It’s not that bad. I’d be much better off taking the Manticore—”

“Fine. I’ll take the Death Knight.”

“…?”

“What’s with that unpleasant look?”

“No, I just thought this was where you’d say you were going to avenge your friend or something.”

The Skeleton King’s eyes widened.

“What the hell are you talking about? We’ve got a much better chance if the strongest fight the strongest.”

“…”

“Anyway, it’s settled. You take the Manticore. I’ll take the Death Knight. And that Lycanthrope over there…”

He trailed off, looked around, and blinked.

“Why is it just the two of us?”

Jin Taekyung, who had staunched the bleeding in his thigh, kindly explained.

“One bastard already ran off.”

“Huh?”

“Maybe he had a shred of conscience left, because he didn’t run away entirely. He’s back there in the front ranks.”

Far away, Yamamoto Genji had sidled up beside Choi Minwoo and put on a determined expression. The Skeleton King spotted him and muttered, “I’m going to kill that bastard.”

“Sure. But first, let’s finish this damn fight as quickly as we can.”

Jin Taekyung spat out bloody phlegm and lowered his spear.

Behind him, flying monsters were already shrieking amid bursts of explosions.

Magic Johnson can hold them off.

He could only trust him, just as Johnson and the others had trusted him.

Step. Thud.

The three S-rank monsters stepped forward, and the entire army moved with them.

No matter how many they killed, the wave of monsters never seemed to shrink. And the open desert all around them was the worst possible battlefield for humans.

“You know what I regret most since I became a monster?” the Skeleton King asked.

Jin Taekyung answered without hesitation. “Not getting to go clubbing.”

“Wrong. Getting mixed up with you.”

“Really? I’m the exact opposite.”

“What?”

“One of the best things I’ve ever done was get you out of that Gate.”

“…Damn it. Am I the only piece of trash here?”

“You already know. Why ask?”

The Skeleton King let out a quiet laugh and took a deep breath. Deathly energy flowed out instead of breath, raising the monsters strewn around them.

One thousand in all.

That was the most he could maintain while fighting and commanding them at the same time. Against the vast army drawing nearer and steadily gaining speed, it was a meager force.

“Can we… hold them all back?”

No.

Jin Taekyung swallowed the answer on the tip of his tongue.

Someone is going to die. No matter what.

That was battle. That was war. There was no way to save everyone.

He couldn’t promise they would all make it out alive. He could promise one thing: revenge.

“No matter how many of us die here today…”

Shing.

As his words trailed off, he leveled his gleaming spearhead at the monsters.

“Every last one of them dies by my hand.”

The Skeleton King’s eyes widened.

KRUNCH!

A wave of monsters beyond counting crashed over them.

…!

…!!

My ears rang. The movement of more than ten thousand monsters shook the ground, and their cries seemed to reach the ends of the earth and the sky above.

At the head of that army, right at its center, were the three of them.

Fwoosh. Slice!

Fire Dragon’s Single Tail.

A line of flame traced along the spearhead and cut through the air. Dozens of heads caught in its path, unable to dodge or block, rolled across the ground.

Splatter!

Blood sprayed a moment later. But the monsters that should have charged us with savage cries scattered instead, avoiding me and the Skeleton King.

Was it because of the martial prowess I’d shown? My Intimidation?

No. The monsters avoiding me to charge the Hunters weren’t afraid. They were obeying someone else.

The kind of obedience you saw only in trained elite troops.

“You’ve got to be fucking kidding me…!”

Crunch!

The Skeleton King blew apart an ogre’s head and shouted in anger.

Even with his undead army, the two of us couldn’t block every enemy’s path.

For every ten we killed, a hundred got through. For every hundred, a thousand monsters slipped past.

Our net was tightly woven, but far too small. And that was exactly what they intended.

“So it’s you. The human that person spoke of.”

The voice seemed to come from inside my head. Smooth and composed, like a nobleman’s, its tone betrayed a keen intelligence. Its words confirmed my suspicion.

“The Prophet. Where is he now?”

A mythical monster with the face and body of a tiger, the tusks of a boar, and the horns of a bull.

The Manticore Lord smiled.

“He is everywhere, and nowhere.”

“What the hell does that mean?” the Skeleton King asked.

“It means he’ll tell us if we beat the shit out of him.”

I brought my spearhead down toward the monster.

No—toward them.

Shwoosh!

The wind split apart.

Chapter 806

There's an old saying that's been passed down in the Murim for ages.

A Third Rate swordsman gets beaten to death by street thugs. A Peak master dies fighting a master like himself. But the only things that can kill a Supreme Peak master are his own arrogance and carelessness.

That was how martial artists saw Supreme Peak masters.

Beings to be marveled at and feared.

While everyone else wandered Murim's treacherous mountains, they stood on the highest peaks and looked down on them all.

But there was no such thing as invincible in this world.

Even among those who reach the chosen realm, there are clear differences in strength.

People looking up from below couldn't tell. Those who stood on peaks of their own could see and feel someone else beyond the thick fog—standing higher or lower than they were.

I was no different.

Shwaa!

A sharp gust burst from the spearhead as I slashed down at an angle.

It tore apart the limbs of monsters unlucky enough to cross its path and shot toward its target, only to die away amid a tremendous roar.

—Kyaaaaa!

The shockwave imbued with magical power faded along with the wind.

I stared at the monster that had canceled out my spear strike with a single roar.

Strong.

Magical power boiled all around me, prickling my skin. The air tasted bitter and stale with every breath.

Manticore Lord.

A monster straight out of myth. A leader strong enough to be called a Lord even among its own kind.

Step.

The moment its lion-like forepaw touched the blood-soaked sand, it vanished from where it stood and tore through space.

Boom!

As fast as the wind. Faster, even.

In some ways, it was far more troublesome than Leviathan, the last named monster I'd taken down.

Leviathan had possessed far more magical power. But the strength I'd felt from this thing earlier, together with the speed it was showing now and the size of its body, made it better suited to one-on-one combat than mass slaughter.

And there's the Lycanthrope Champion, too.

I couldn't afford to let my guard down.

I watched the two S-rank monsters and kicked off the ground at just the right moment, sending a Sound Transmission to the Skeleton King.

—Don't lose and embarrass yourself.

No answer came.

The Death Knight Legion Commander had summoned a Nightmare—a ghost horse that was an A-rank monster in its own right—and was leaping high into the air to come crashing down on the Skeleton King.

BOOM!

A thunderous crash erupted behind me, already far off in the distance. The Skeleton King's voice rang across the battlefield.

"A mere legion commander dares challenge me? Kneel before your king!"

It would have been ideal if the Death Knight Legion Commander had knelt and sworn allegiance. But reality wasn't so accommodating.

They already served another master, and right now a tail and claws brimming with magical power were bearing down on me.

BANG!

The spearhead of White Flame shuddered as I held it upright to block the attack.

But unlike our earlier clash, this time they were the ones who had to back off.

Whoosh! Slice!

I brought the spearhead down without hesitation. It sliced through the half-man, half-beast Lycanthrope Champion's huge, hook-like claw as easily as tofu.

Not a difficult opponent.

If it were the only one.

—Grr?

The Lycanthrope Champion let out a startled growl and stumbled backward. I was about to cut it in two when the Manticore Lord's tail—knocked aside by my spear—writhed like a snake and lunged for my face.

Whoom!

The wind pressure brushing past my neck felt as heavy as a block of iron.

But I'd already seen that move once.

If I'd been facing all three of them alone, I would have been in real trouble. Now, things were different.

One at a time.

Fwoosh.

The Lycanthrope Champion saw the flames gathering in my hand and twisted away, but it was half a beat too late.

No. I was faster.

BOOM!

The Flame Divine Palm struck it dead-on and sent it sliding backward. It clutched its blackened arm and let out a roar that sounded almost like a scream.

—GRAAAAAH!

Too bad.

It was the weakest of the three, but an S-rank monster was still an S-rank monster. My strike had missed its intended target—its chest—by a hair.

One strike. One more will finish it.

But the Manticore Lord was every bit as cunning as it was strong.

Just as I moved to swing my spear and finish off the Lycanthrope, it came for my back faster than it had moved at any point so far.

BOOM!

I blocked the claw that crashed down like lightning.

The spear shaft shook under the tremendous pressure, and my legs—usually free to move even in the desert—sank deep into the sand.

That, too, was part of its plan.

Shwaa! Thud!

Its tail slammed into my side with more weight and force than a battering ram.

The stinger on its tip couldn't pierce all the way through my Fire Dragon Armor, but I had to bear the full force of the tremendous impact it delivered.

"Ugh…!"

My vision went hazy. Something hot surged up through my chest.

I swallowed the blood rising in my throat and reached out through the blur.

Open Inventory. Summon.

As one hand left the spear shaft, the pressure on it grew heavier. I drew a dagger from my Inventory and swung it in a flash.

Shhk, slice!

There was only one sound of cutting, but three thin lines appeared across the iron-hard tail.

The Manticore Lord's eyes widened as it tried to crush me beneath its two massive forepaws.

FWOOSH!

Blood belatedly sprayed from the faint lines like a fountain.

Its jaws gaped wide in pain, releasing the stench of countless deaths.

—GRAAAAAAAH!

The lion-like roar it unleashed right in my face left my ears ringing.

No. My eardrums had to have burst.

You son of a bitch.

I clenched my teeth, feeling hot blood run from my ears.

As the force bearing down on me briefly eased, I drove the dagger still in my hand into its ribs.

Thud!

The Force on the dagger came from Scorching Yang Qi.

Its lava-like heat cut through tough hide and flesh, broke bone, and burned through what lay inside.

Sssss!

—GRAAAAH!

—Kyaaaaa!

The Manticore Lord's cry seemed to come twice, the sounds overlapping like audio from broken earbuds. Maybe it was because my eardrums had burst.

But my instincts told me I wasn't imagining it.

This…

They were different cries. I hadn't misheard.

The first was a scream of pain. The second was a roar of rage.

And my bad feelings were never wrong.

Lycanthrope Champion.

As its name came to mind, the half-man, half-beast monster I'd briefly forgotten lunged at me from behind.

Shwaa!

Its speed was dazzling—every bit worthy of an S-rank monster.

One arm swung at its side as though it might crumble to ash at any moment. The other was still sound, and when it swept that arm toward me, its hooked claws flashed.

Too late to pull out the dagger and swing it.

Countless movements and possible futures flashed through my mind in that instant.

In the end, only one choice remained.

As the world seemed to slow around me, I let go of the dagger lodged in the Manticore Lord's ribs and thrust out my palm.

Fwoosh—crack!

The internal energy I'd hurriedly drawn up scattered. Flames burst apart.

Dizzying pain shot through my hand. I stared at the silver claw that had pierced my palm and emerged from the back of it.

...Fuck.

It had stopped just short of my face. I couldn't help swearing.

But that wasn't the end of the pain waiting for me.

Crack. Crunch!

Bones shifted, and a neck stretched out like a turtle's.

With my life hanging in the balance, the Manticore Lord finally used the ability it had cunningly kept hidden. Its neck shot over the spear shaft between us, bringing its jaws straight at me.

—GRAAH!

Its mouth gaped all the way to its ears like a ghost from a horror story, reeking of rotting corpses. At the sight of its huge, saw-toothed teeth, every hair on my body seemed to stand on end.

"...!"

A chill ran down my spine.

If those jaws closed on me, I was dead.

I twisted with all my strength. The teeth that had been about to swallow my head whole brushed my hair and sank into my collarbone.

Or rather, into the red armor covering it.

CRUNCH!

Beep. Beep-beep!

SYSTEM

Part of your Fire Dragon Armor has been damaged!
The durability of your Fire Dragon Armor has dropped significantly!
Danger! Danger! If you are exposed to another attack like that, your Fire Dragon Armor may be automatically returned to your Inventory!
Manticore Lord's Venom has entered through a gap in the damaged armor!
Status abnormality Poisoned has been applied!
Detoxify as soon as possible! If you do not detoxify within the time limit, your condition may worsen!

Damn it. What the hell is this now?

I'd thought my collarbone felt a little prickly. Now, out of nowhere, it was venom?

All I'd been born with was a pair of balls. This bastard was named-monster level, and it had more damn abilities than I could count.

"...Human!"

Even in the middle of his own fight, the Skeleton King had somehow seen what happened. His urgent shout came from far behind me.

But despite his worry, I had no intention of dying here. Not even the slightest.

If anything, I was almost glad that being Poisoned had dulled my senses.

At least now I wouldn't feel much pain from what I was about to do.

"Thanks for the help, you son of a bitch."

At my barely audible whisper, the Manticore Lord's eyes widened.

I dropped White Flame from my free hand and slammed that hand into what I guessed was its throat.

Thwack!

A heavy blow.

The Manticore Lord caught its breath, malice filling its eyes.

Thud!

Its teeth drove in harder than before, prying open the gap in my Fire Dragon Armor and sinking deep into my collarbone.

Beep. Beep-beep. The warnings rang in my ears, but the pain had faded even further. I could move my hand without a care, though its palm was little more than raw flesh caught on a hook.

Crack.

The Lycanthrope Champion's claw was still lodged through my palm. It bared its teeth at me in a sneer.

Pure contempt.

The sneer lasted only an instant.

—Grr?

Its face filled with surprise. No matter how hard it strained, it couldn't make me budge. As it blinked at me, I spoke calmly.

"You think I can't beat you, you little shit, just because I'm in bad shape?"

On Strength stats alone, I had seniority over an ogre's dad.

Even with all my stats drastically reduced by the special debuff, my physical abilities were still comparable to—or better than—those of most S-rank monsters.

And the Lycanthrope Champion was built for Agility, not Strength. I could slam it into the ground with one hand.

"Now, you little punk… Attention!"

Whack! Crunch!

I kicked its knee joint, shattering it in an instant.

As the strongest of the half-man, half-beast warriors let out a mournful cry, I kept a firm grip on its claw and slammed the monster into the ground.

Whoom—BANG!

The impact raised a cloud of dust. At the same time, blood spurted from my palm as the claw tore free.

But only one thing mattered.

At last, I had a free hand.

Open Inventory. Summon.

A sharp dagger flashed. Above it, blazing hellfire surged and flew toward the Manticore Lord's head.

—…!

The Lycanthrope Champion realized my plan and threw itself forward.

Too late.

Thud—KRAAAAAAASH!

The blade cut through hide and shattered flesh and bone. Flames exploded.

Ding.

Just as the clear chime I'd been waiting for rang in my ears, a flash of light suddenly swept in from somewhere and cut through the Lycanthrope Champion's neck as it charged at me.

Slice!

"I'm here, Jin Sama[3222]!"

"…"

This son of a bitch stole my kill.

[3222] Sama is a Japanese honorific expressing a high degree of respect.

Chapter 807

Even a Supreme Peak master will go down if he gets kicked in the balls. No matter how strange or powerful a monster is, its weaknesses are much like a human's.

Blow its head off, or burst its heart.

Of course, there are exceptions to everything.

Some Trolls can put even a shattered head back together. Golems won't fall until you destroy the core hidden somewhere inside them.

A Lich, both undead and a skilled black wizard, might store part of its soul in a Life Force Vessel.

But as far as I knew, there wasn't a Lycanthrope anywhere that could survive having its head cut off.

Not even an S-rank monster that had earned the title of Champion as the strongest warrior of its kind.

"I'm here, Jin Sama[3223]!"

"..."

I looked back and forth between Yamamoto Genji, who was chattering so loudly he was spitting, and the headless body of the EXP... No, the Lycanthrope Champion.

No, fuck...

What kind of bullshit was this?

It had been the perfect time to level up. The meal was already laid out in front of me, and some bastard had swooped in and gobbled it all up.

I was so furious my hands and feet felt ready to shake.

Beep.

SYSTEM

Status abnormality Convulsions has been applied!
Status abnormality Poisoned is worsening!
Manticore Lord's Venom must be removed from your body as soon as possible!

"..."

Right. No wonder my hands were shaking so much.

I was already in bad shape, and the anger made my vision blur for a moment.

If things had gone as I'd calculated, I'd have leveled up by now and recovered completely. Since that hadn't happened, I had no choice but to use another method.

[3223] Sama is a Japanese honorific expressing respect, stronger than san.

“Uh? Jin Sama[3224], is something wrong?”

“Do I look like I’m all right, you fucking idiot?”

“Ah. Oh…”

That shut Yamamoto Genji up. I gave the command in my head.

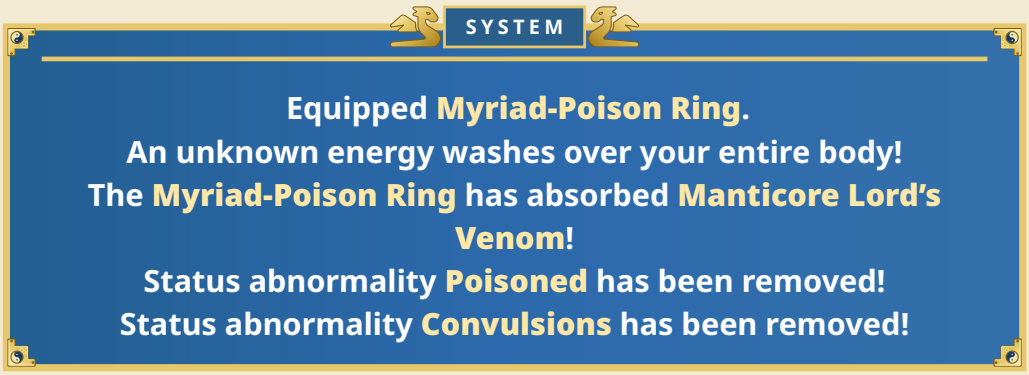
Open Inventory. Summon.

The System manifested in response to the command.

Shk.

The moment my trembling fingers touched something cold, a clear chime rang out, different from the earlier ones.

Ding. Ding. Ding.



As the chimes rang one after another, my vision cleared and the convulsions stopped.

The Myriad-Poison Ring had drawn in the poison spreading from my collarbone through the rest of my body. It gleamed with its familiar black light.

I didn’t level up, but thank God I had the Myriad-Poison Ring.

It was a good thing I’d ended the fight quickly. The venom the Manticore Lord had carried was truly terrifying.

With Scorching Yang Qi, which was the natural enemy of poison, and a top-grade potion, I could have been cured without much difficulty. But a potion ultimately worked by paying in advance with the body’s energy and vitality to maximize its recovery.

With so many enemies still out there, a risk-free level-up would have been a hundred times better.

Of course…

“A-are you all right?”

Some bastard had been hanging back, watching for an opening, then rushed in and stole the last hit from me.

“Forget it. Don’t worry about it.”

But what could I do?

[3224] Sama is a Japanese honorific expressing respect, stronger than san.

The bus had already left, and I didn't have time to stand at an empty bus stop waiting for the next one and slap Yamamoto Genji across the face.

The one bit of good news amid all the bad was that the Skeleton King was the kind of excellent monster who knew how to finish his assigned job on time.

Crack-crunch!

We'd gotten quite far apart while fighting our respective opponents, but I could clearly see—and hear—the Death Knight, well over two meters[3225] tall, crumple along with his armor.

I heard its final scream, too.

—GRAAAAAAH!

Fwoosh!

That was the end.

Black mist flowed out from beneath the helmet pulled low over its face. The Skeleton King absorbed the Death Knight's soul as it escaped just before Erasure, as though sucking it in. Then he grinned at me as I approached using qinggong[3226].

"You monster."

He spotted Yamamoto Genji tucked under my arm like a piece of luggage and added, "That fucking bastard."

I agreed. If that little shit had held up the Lycanthrope Champion for even a moment, everything would've ended much more smoothly.

But kicking Yamamoto Genji in the joints in the middle of a battle involving thousands—tens of thousands—of fighters would be something only a lunatic would do. If I had time for that, I needed to use it to save one more person.

"Let's go."

With that brief word, I shot forward. My limbs creaked, proof of the fierce battle that had just taken place, and my internal energy was considerably depleted.

Even so, I had to go. I had to fight.

Shweee—BOOM!

The spearhead of White Flame, sent flying with tremendous force, swept through the rear of the monster army swarming like ants.

A muffled boom swallowed their screams, and flames burst out, burning the living monsters' limbs.

One more.

I kept running without slowing down.

I pulled another spear from my Inventory, gripped it in a reverse hold, and hurled it.

Boom!

[3225] Two meters is about 6 ft 7 in.

[3226] Qinggong is a martial-arts lightness skill associated with swift movement and leaps.

A thunderous crack split the desert.

The spear didn’t carry as much internal energy as the first, but the sheer force and speed behind its spearhead were enough to pierce dozens of monsters.

Crack-crunch!

—GRAAAH!

Even a glancing blow burst heads like watermelons and sent severed limbs flying.

The monster army, which had seemed as though it would never shrink no matter how many I killed, began to falter.

Boom!

—Grrk, gaaah!

The screams drew closer by the moment. The stench grew stronger.

By the time I hurled a third spear, hundreds had already fallen. I kicked off the air and soared upward, flung Yamamoto Genji from under my arm toward the ground, and reached out.

Come.

Shweee! Snap!

White Flame answered my call through the Middle Dantian and flew into my hand.

Its grip had become so familiar that I could recognize it without looking.

As soon as I reclaimed it, I poured in Scorching Yang Qi. The transparent spearhead took on a reddish glow.

Fwoosh.

Flames. Wind. A world moving slowly.

And… the eyes staring blankly at me as I soared through the air, with the entire battlefield laid out below.

Whoosh.

The wind brushed across my body. Time, which had stopped, gradually returned to its usual pace.

I saw opposite emotions appear in countless wide eyes.

There was joy in some. In others, despair was slowly sinking into reality.

Humans and monsters. Monsters and humans.

No one there needed to be told which side felt which.

Fire Dragon Divine Spear. This form.

I drew in a breath.

My body descended slowly, keeping pace with time as I perceived it, while the flame-filled spearhead rose high, as if to pierce the sky.

Fwoosh.

At that moment, when the space around me warped under the extreme heat, a massive shadow that had been circling over the Hunters surrounded by monsters shot toward me.

—Screee!

A piercing cry rang in my ears.

I didn't have to look to sense its approach. Unlike the other monsters, it flew toward me like a streak of light. The gale raised by a single flap of its wings carried immense magical power.

The leader of the Griffins.

Yeah. It had to be.

As a flying monster that ranged through the sky as if it owned it, it was one of the most troublesome opponents in its own way.

But…

It doesn't matter.

Ignoring the Griffins rushing at me with a gale of magical power, I brought the spearhead down.

Heavenly Strike.

Whoooooom!

Flames poured over the spearhead of White Flame, wiping out the gale of magical power rushing toward me and cleaving through space.

A fierce, razor-sharp slash like a dragon's claw descended on the center of the tightly packed monster army.

Fwoosh!

The heat and flash were so intense they seemed capable of melting everything before they even touched it.

Hellfire engulfed hundreds—perhaps a thousand—monsters and exploded.

BOOM! Rumble-rumble!

A rain of fire poured down. Screams and death flowed like lava.

Neither the hides of the upper-level monsters—unmarked even by bullets—nor the quick-footed lower-level ones who sensed danger and tried to flee could escape it.

Death was equal for all the monsters, and the leader of the Griffins watching the scene let out a roar like a scream.

—Kyaaaah!

Whoom. A heavy pressure pushed against my whole body.

I raised my head. The leader of the Griffins, already overhead, was shooting toward me.

Even within its massive shadow, which blocked the sunlight, the monster's beak shone like the sun, packed with immense magical power.

If I met that attack head-on?

Even I wouldn't come away unscathed.

At the fork in the road I'd faced a moment ago, I'd chosen not to fight it, but to break up the monster army's formation.

But—

"I don't have to be the one to do it. Right?"

—…!

At the Demon Realm language carried through the System, the flying beast's pupils narrowed into vertical slits.

A moment's hesitation at the very end.

And those who had been waiting for that moment didn't let me down.

Shwoop! Clang!

The Griffin leader knocked aside something that flew up from the ground with a sharp crack, then staggered under the force of the blow.

That's…

A spear made of bone.

As it fell to the ground, its job done, I thought of one person—or rather, one monster.

The Skeleton King.

That bastard never got tired, yet he was so much slower than me. He'd finally made it here.

But the person I'd really been counting on was someone else.

Rumble.

The air all around us shuddered. Everyone here, not just me, felt the battlefield's atmosphere grow heavy.

I felt the wind die down in an instant, and the enormous mana rising from somewhere deep below press down on the battlefield.

—Screep?

The leader and around a hundred Griffins looked at one another in confusion.

They were no longer beating their wings.

No. Someone had bound them in midair.

"Rise, then crash back down."

The voice that followed held none of its usual cheer. It was bleak and subdued.

"Reverse Gravity."

And then—

Whoooooom!

Gravity within the area went wild.

Mana seized the remaining flying monsters with measured precision and slammed them into the ground.

—Screee!

As I listened to the Griffin leader cry out, a thought struck me.

What did you call the sight of around a hundred massive Griffins plummeting from hundreds of meters[3227] up like streaks of light?

A spectacular view? Or…

Magic?

At least one thing was certain.

The Grand Mage who'd staged this incredible end to the battle deserved to be called the world's greatest War Mage.

Rumble! Crack-crunch!

The flames spread without end. Chaos took hold. Countless monsters were crushed beneath the Griffins' huge bodies as they rained down like a meteor shower.

I looked over the monster army, its center utterly broken, and shouted with internal energy behind my voice.

"Formation! Change!"

This battle was already won.

"Kill every last one of those bastards!"

A mighty roar shook heaven and earth. A thousand spears and blades, still sharp, surged forward like a wave.

[3227] One hundred meters is about 328 ft; hundreds of meters means hundreds to thousands of feet.

Chapter 808

The Great Cataclysm was a massive event that changed the course of human history.

Naturally, it became the subject of countless studies and analyses. Scholars around the world identified three decisive reasons humanity had won.

First: the existence of Cheon Taemin.

Second, the emergence of the Awakened, who would come to be known as Hunters.

And third:

Human intelligence and will.

They were right.

If Cheon Taemin's existence and the emergence of the Awakened had been unexpected salvation, human intelligence and will were what allowed us to overcome any crisis.

They were the reason humanity had won—and the monsters had lost.

Decades ago.

And… at this very moment.

CRRRRACK!

With a tremendous roar, a thousand Hunters surged forward like a wave.

The healers' blessings rained down on the tanks, who had exhausted every ounce of strength holding back the monsters pouring in from all sides. The towering Grand Mage dispelled the defensive magic that had enveloped the area and revealed his true power.

"Burn as much as you like. Cut straight through."

Mana surged at his boiling command.

A spell on this scale would have taken an ordinary mage several minutes to prepare. Yet Magic Johnson swept his staff through the air, and the Magic Formation that appeared above him activated after only a short incantation.

"Fire Wall."

Fwoosh—WHOOOOSH!

Flames carrying terrible heat raced in every direction. They burned through thick scales, melted flesh and bone, and split the monster army's ranks down the middle.

—Kyaaaaaah!

Cries of pain rang out as an acrid stench rose all around us.

The wide-area spell had torn straight through their packed formation. Amid the chaos, a higher-level monster that seemed fairly intelligent hurried to pull the broken ranks back together.

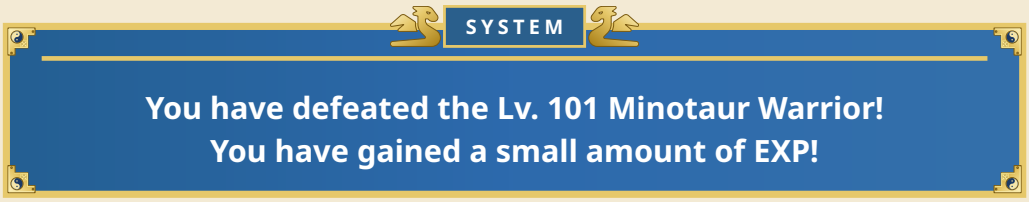
Or tried to.

—Alu. Karsh…!

CRUNCH!

I dropped onto it from above and burst its hard skull with a punch packed with internal energy.

Ding.



Stagger. Thud.

With the System notification, its stumbling body fell like a rotten log.

I spat a wad of phlegm onto the corpse, adjusted my grip on White Flame, and muttered, “You piece of shit. Way to ruin the moment.”

The monsters around me blinked at the sight of me dropping out of the sky like a comet. They had the innocent eyes of herbivores gathered by a stream.

But I knew better.

Those eyes looked gentle only because the creatures behind them were so stupid. The instincts hidden beneath that look were more savage and cruel than those of any other living thing.

—Grrk?

“Nice meeting you. Goodbye.”

With that first and last greeting, I spun and swung my spearhead.

CRRRACK!

Bone separated from flesh, and a haze of blood filled the air. Dozens fell to the first strike. I stepped forward and swung again, clearing the space around me.

Squish.

As I approached, stepping through the blood-soaked sand, the air around me gave a sharp, tingling hum.

Scorching Yang Qi stirred up intense heat, but the monsters’ eyes had gone cold long ago.

One Against a Thousand.

My overwhelming martial prowess and aura radiated outward. Intimidation, so palpable I could almost reach out and touch it, tightened around their bodies. Fear wiped away their ferocity and swallowed their instincts.

The Hunters had waited patiently for this moment. They didn’t miss it.

CRUNCH!

“Charge! Wipe them all out!”

“Die, you bastards!”

Clang-clang! Slice!

With a tremendous roar, a shining wave of steel crashed into the monsters.

The battle had been relatively short, but these elites had held their ground against a force more than ten times their size without taking heavy losses.

After holding back for so long against the endless tide, the Hunters seized their chance. They drove into the ranks Magic Johnson’s spell had broken apart, stabbing and slashing at every monster in their path.

Slice, thud-thud-thud!

“God damn it! Motherfucker!”

—GRAAAAAH!

Curses and screams mingled as aura and magical power, light and darkness, clashed all around us.

And with every passing second, the balance tipped further toward the light.

“Team Three, watch two o’clock! Circle around and break through!”

“Ranged unit, ready! Fire!”

“Fire!”

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh—BOOM!

Arrows whistled through the air in a sudden rain. The mages’ wide-area spells swept across the battlefield.

Each team moved like a living organism, their tactics disciplined and aimed at the enemy’s openings.

The monster army had grown stronger than before as the concentration of magical power rose. But if the superior bodies and magical power they were born with were enough to win every battle, the monsters would have conquered the world already.

“Come on, you bastards.”

My voice came out cold as I shot forward. The moment I chose a target, I was already closing the distance and moving on to my next attack.

Slice, boom!

I cut the throat of a goblin shaman preparing a spell, then smashed the chest of the Orc chieftain beside it.

The Orcs lost their leader in an instant. As they milled about in confusion, a rain of arrows fell on their heads.

Whoosh, thud-thud-thud!

Aura-coated arrowheads pierced their thick hides and passed through their heads and chests.

A particularly huge Troll hurried to retreat as I approached. Just then, two streaks of light curved out from behind it.

Thud, slice!

The first sword pierced its chest. The second cut off its head.

The movements were coordinated, without a hint of hesitation or wasted effort.

The swordsmen chopped the Troll, still twitching despite its fatal wounds, into dozens of pieces. Then they spotted me and smiled faintly.

Xiao Shen. And Team Leader Choi.

There was no need to exchange words amid the chaos of battle. Not when we understood each other without speaking.

They gave me a light nod, then charged toward another target. They were going after the higher-level monsters intelligent enough to control their respective groups.

Good choice.

Most people instinctively resist killing living things, especially other people.

I didn't know whether that reluctance was an instinct ingrained over our long history or something we'd learned as civilized beings. Either way, it was real.

Monsters were different from the start. Born to struggle, they barely had a concept of their own kind.

Take out the monsters giving orders to each group, and that's when the real chaos begins.

No. The chaos had already begun.

Four S-rank monsters, including the strongest of them, the Manticore Lord, had fallen. On my orders, Magic Johnson and the Hunters had stopped concentrating solely on defense. Now they were driving into the heart of the monster army and grinding it down.

The leaders of each group—lower-ranking commanders, in effect—were falling across the battlefield to A-rank Hunters led by Team Leader Choi and Xiao Shen. Yamamoto Genji was making his own conspicuous contribution.

"Hup. Gale Slash!"

The name of the technique, barked in a low voice, was pure Japanese bravado. But the power behind that single sword strike was no bluff.

Shwaa—slice!

A flash streaked across the battlefield, and dozens of monsters fell, spraying blood.

Hunters rushed into the space he'd opened and cut down every monster in their path.

CRUNCH! FWOOSH!

The formation slowly collapsed. The front line gave ground.

But waiting for the monster army as it gave ground, step by step, were the Skeleton King and a thousand Skeletons, blocking off their rear.

"Surround them! If you've got no teeth, hold them with your bones!"

Clack-clack-clack!

—GRAAAAH!

CRUNCH!

A massive monster several meters tall[3228] swung its mace, smashing a dozen Skeletons to pieces.

At the same time, dozens more latched onto it or climbed its body, driving rusty swords and teeth into its enormous frame.

Thud. Crack!

—GRAAAAAH!

Its furious roar became a scream of pain. When the massive monster finally met a gruesome death, a cold blue light appeared in its eyes.

—Grr. Ah. Ah. Ah.

Reborn as an undead, the massive monster charged off, dragging its heavy body along.

The Hunters flinched at the sight. Then they spotted the Skeleton King and went right back to fighting as if nothing had happened.

“Hit them! They’re breaking!”

“Their formation’s falling apart! Don’t back down—keep pushing!”

Less than an hour had passed.

But victory was already tipping toward the humans.

Thousands of monsters had already been wiped out. The force that had initially outnumbered us ten to one was now down to five to one—and the gap was shrinking by the second.

CRACK! THUD!

An Ogre Warrior more than four meters tall[3229] collapsed without a scream.

Its chest blown open, it pitched forward. I planted a foot on its shoulder and leaped into the air, taking in the battlefield below during that brief instant.

It’s over. Push a little longer, and we win.

There was no trace of the momentum the monsters had shown at the start, when they’d surrounded the Hunters and attacked without letup.

They’d lost four S-rank monsters and the lesser leaders commanding their groups. Now they were in utter disarray. The Grand Mage’s wide-area spells from the front and the Skeleton King’s undead soldiers pressing them from behind only deepened the confusion.

And the Hunters are fighting like hell.

The monster army was nothing but a mass of beasts now. Victory was only a matter of time.

[3228] Several meters is roughly 10–20 ft.

[3229] Four meters is about 13 ft.

Not one of those countless monsters could stop us. Could stop me.

Except for the one being that still hadn't shown itself.

Where the hell are you?

Thinking of The Prophet, a mystery from beginning to end, I dropped toward the ground.

BOOM! Slice!

White Flame's spearhead plunged down with me and split open another monster's skull. Its body split cleanly in two and fell to either side. Between the halves, I saw eyes filled with fear.

"Die."

I charged like a beast of prey and rampaged like a predator.

The lower-level monsters froze as though gripped by Fear, staring at the death bearing down on them. The higher-level monsters fought back with the last of their strength.

They fell in different ways, but the result was the same.

Death.

Thud!

I twisted the spearhead lodged between a Lycanthrope's eyes and pulled it free. Brain matter ran down White Flame's transparent blade.

A tingling ache rose through my arms and legs. They hadn't stopped moving.

Damn it.

How long had I been fighting? How many monsters had I killed?

I didn't know. Better not to. The moment my brain registered it, my body would feel even more exhausted.

And if The Prophet was watching me now, all the more reason not to show him any weakness.

Hoo. Hah.

I steadied my breathing and adjusted my grip on White Flame.

As I turned to face the next monsters, I realized the balance of the battle had finally tipped all the way over.

Rumble. Rrrumble!

—GRAAAAAH!

—Krrk. GRAAAAH!

The desert shook. With terrified cries, wave after wave of monsters were retreating.

They're running. All those monsters.

The thought that flashed through my mind was exactly what I was seeing.

Their advantage in numbers?

The monster army had lost its will to fight and was fleeing at full speed. None of them cared about that anymore.

The Hunters stared, blinking, then raised their tired spears and swords. With bloodshot eyes, they raced after the monsters.

“Kill every last one!”

The only thing left on the battlefield was slaughter.

Chapter 809

It was like watching a massive dam collapse.

Boom. Boom. KABOOM!

The most ferocious of the large monsters turned and fled.

Every time their several-meter-tall bodies[3230] took a step, the enormous weight crushed corpses and smaller monsters underfoot like tofu.

Crunch! Crack-crunch!

—Kiiiiie!

—Kyargh!

Painful death cries rang out all around us, but not one of them belonged to a Hunter. At least on this battlefield today, the weak weren't human. They were monsters.

The strong devour the weak.

Monsters followed the instincts stamped into them from birth. But this wasn't the ferocity that had driven them to destroy cities and slaughter humans. What drove them now was something more primal.

Fear.

The S-rank monsters—so powerful the others hadn't dared meet their eyes—were dead. So were most of the leaders who'd commanded the groups behind them.

Their threadbare chain of command had collapsed, and the ten-to-one gap in numbers was closing fast.

Several thousand monsters remained, by a rough count. But a beast that had lost the will to fight was easier prey than a herbivore.

And after the grueling battle they'd fought, the Hunters had no intention of ending the hunt just yet.

"They're running! Wipe them out!"

"Don't let a single one get away!"

"Aaaah!"

Bloodshot eyes. Weapons slick with flesh and blood.

Soaked from head to toe, the Hunters looked like people made of blood as they chased their prey. They bound slipping sword hilts tight with leather straps. Arms trembling from drawing bowstrings again and again reached for quivers at their sides.

They were exhausted. They wanted to collapse on the sticky sand and sleep.

But they couldn't stop.

"Because of you bastards, Benjamin—Benjamin… You motherfuckers!"

[3230] A meter is about 3.28 ft.

Some had lost friends.

“N-no! Emma!”

Some had lost a comrade who was also a lover.

“Motherfucker. Were you in San Francisco a month ago, too? What? Damn it. Quit spewing shit I can’t understand and go to hell.”

Others had a recent wrong to avenge.

They had to kill monsters, again and again, until their anger was spent.

Shhk. Thud!

Monstrous cries rang out as green blood sprayed in every direction. An arrow flew in from somewhere, pierced an Orc’s head, and drove through a Troll’s ankle.

—Krrk.

The Hunters surrounded the staggering Troll. Scraping together the last of their mana, they poured it into their weapons. Dozens of blades hacked the monster to pieces.

Thump! Crack-crack-crack!

We’d fought against overwhelming numbers. The Hunters had suffered heavy losses, and the blood they’d shed had to be repaid in monsters.

“Die! Die!”

Hoarse shouts rang out here and there, voices raw from exhaustion and excitement.

The Hunters spat on the Troll’s corpse, chopped as fine as ground meat, then moved on with bloodshot eyes to find their next prey.

Boom! Boom-boom-boom!

Attack spells rained down.

Even now, thousands of monsters trampled corpses and their own kind as they surged south like a wave. The Hunters stood in their path like an enormous reef.

And I was at its center.

Whoosh!

A single diagonal downward sweep.

A razor-sharp gust shot along the spearhead and swept past the fleeing monsters.

Shraaaak.

Blood burst out instead of a scream, soaking into the sand.

But those lucky enough to escape the attack’s reach put more distance between us and ran faster.

Monsters had never even thought of their own kind as kin. Survival mattered more than fighting now, and they fled for their lives. Countless others were already scattering in every direction, slipping out of the encirclement.

I can’t let them get away. I have to take down as many as I can.

The battle was over. What we'd achieved would be remembered for generations and recorded in history as a great victory.

But more than five thousand monsters remained.

We'd killed so many, yet there were still enough to be called an army. Letting them escape today would leave the seeds of another disaster.

Still, we can't chase them right now.

Everyone was exhausted from a long and brutal battle. Right now, the only things driving the Hunters were their anger and desire for revenge against the monsters. Nothing more, nothing less.

And I wasn't the only one thinking it.

"Human!"

"Jin!"

The Skeleton King, who'd been holding the rear, and Magic Johnson, who'd fought his way through the monsters to reach me, came up on either side.

"We need to regroup as quickly as we can, then pursue them," Magic Johnson said, short of breath. "We should split our forces into separate units."

The Skeleton King cut down an injured ogre that had fallen behind before answering.

"I agree. My magical power is nearly depleted, but we can't let this chance pass. I've already turned several Griffins into undead. They'll give us enough of a view."

I started to answer, then caught my breath. I steadied my ragged breathing and managed only a nod. The Skeleton King frowned.

"Human, are you all right?"

"It's… it's nothing. Don't worry about it."

A lie.

My arms and legs felt as heavy as if they'd been soaked in water. The internal energy that had filled my dantian was running low.

More than anything, the dull ache I'd felt deep inside my body on and off throughout the battle was growing worse.

Damn debuff.

I kept my expression calm by force and recalled a System message I'd seen not long ago. It was among the notifications waiting for me when I'd woken from my long sleep after defeating Michael Silbert.

SYSTEM

All things come with a price. But you have once again ignored repeated warnings and used power that surpasses your limits.
Information for the special debuff Broken Body has been updated.
The special debuff Shattered Body has been newly applied. The existing stat penalties caused by debuffs remain unchanged, and the effects of the new debuff will also apply.
Muscles and Bones have weakened. The chance of injury has increased considerably.
Internal energy is consumed more rapidly. Your control over qi is no longer as free as before.

Shattered Body.

That was the price of ignoring the System's warning.

One Annihilation's unprecedented destructive power had eaten away at my body as well as my enemy's life. It was damage no method could heal—not even leveling up.

Should I have avoided using One Annihilation against Michael Silbert?

The thought left a bitter taste in my mouth, but there was nothing I could do about it. Back then, I hadn't had much choice beyond One Annihilation.

I pushed aside the potion Magic Johnson held out with a worried look.

"That won't do it. If I use a potion now, I'll only end up more exhausted."

"But—"

"Pursuing them comes first. Especially…"

"Yes. The Prophet."

The Skeleton King spoke quietly. He read the meaning in my eyes and clicked his tongue.

"We still haven't found him. I was certain he was watching from somewhere, but it seems we were wrong."

Magic Johnson added, "I haven't found him either. Jin, maybe The Prophet was never here at all."

"Never here? You mean this was a trap aimed at something else from the start?"

"I can't be sure. But it's possible."

I thought for a moment, then shook my head.

Four S-rank monsters and an army of more than fifteen thousand monsters. That was far too much to use as bait for a mere trap.

So why hasn't he shown himself?

The Prophet was an unpredictable powerhouse. He'd killed Siegfried Bassmann, a Grand Mage surrounded by all kinds of barriers, without leaving any obvious signs of a fight. He might be as powerful as Michael Silbert—or more so.

If he'd joined the battle, who knows how it would have turned out?

Even for me, fighting the Manticore Lord and the Lycanthrope Champion at once had been anything but easy. That would have been the perfect moment for The Prophet to show himself.

But he never did.

Even if the battle had been a trap and our main camp was his true target, it still made no sense.

Embarrassing as it was to say, I was the heart and head of the World Hunter Federation.

That left me with one conclusion.

"It's not a trap."

My thoughts had run long, but only a moment had passed. I looked at the Hunters still chasing the monsters like mad.

The Team Leaders—our lower-ranking commanders—were ordering them to stop, but the Hunters pursued their prey as though they couldn't hear a word.

"I don't know what The Prophet really wants, but… he planned for this situation, too."

"What?"

"If we keep pursuing them without rest, the units will fall apart in no time. First, get the worked-up Hunters back under control as quickly as you can."

"Jin."

Magic Johnson fixed me with a grave look.

"I agree we need to regroup. But then why did The Prophet drive all those monsters into this desert?"

"One of two reasons. Either he thought they'd be enough to deal with us…"

I stopped, then forced out the rest.

"Or he's already built a force so powerful he can afford to lose an army this size."

"…!"

"…!"

The air around us went cold.

I looked at their rigid faces and kept one thought to myself.

One thing was certain. My instincts, pushed to their limit, had seized me with the force of a premonition.

The Prophet wants to face me.

The monsters' cries receded into the distance. Only then, among the people collapsing one by one, did a wind begin to blow.

Heavy with the smell of blood, it spread through the cool night air.

One hundred and eighty-five.

That was how many people had fought more bravely than anyone else—and, because of that, had crossed a river they could never come back over.

But the survivors had to keep moving.

We hadn't come here to win a battle. We'd come to kill The Prophet and uproot the disaster.

There's no time.

The idea that the person running is more desperate than the one giving chase is complete bullshit. Especially when the person running has a bomb that could swallow the whole world.

"Everyone has finished regrouping."

I opened my eyes at Team Leader Choi's report.

I'd spent less than an hour circulating my energy, but my body felt much better. My mind had settled, too.

What the hell is The Prophet?

I'd been asking myself that for a long time.

The fifth Muninn. A being thought to be a monster, wielding magic that wasn't human. The desert's pope, leading countless fanatics.

The more I learned about him, the more I felt as if I were sinking into a swamp. What was he really? What did he want? And where was he now?

If the System had a physical form, I wanted to grab it by the collar and demand answers.

I'd take any debuff it gave me. Just give me one tiny clue.

Damn it.

I cursed under my breath and looked up at the darkening sky.

Daylight in the desert was brief, and the sky was gray, perhaps because of the distribution of magical power.

Just like Michael Silbert.

The monster who had been born human and died a monster.

And as my memories of him surfaced, one after another—

"…!"

A question flashed through my mind like a bolt of light.

Chapter 810

Perhaps intuition was another name for wisdom.

The feeling of an instinct etched into every cell suddenly waking. Of countless thoughts tangled in your head coming together as one.

“Michael Silbert. Michael Silbert. Michael…”

The name should have stayed in Jin Taekyung’s mind. Instead, it slipped from his lips without him noticing.

A question filled his mind in an instant. New thoughts followed, one after another. Each time a question came back to him with an answer, he sent it out again carrying another question.

And each time, the same words came first.

What if. Suppose. Maybe…

He questioned and questioned without pause, until the thoughts tangling in his head took on something like a coherent shape.

He had no idea how much time passed.

And…

He was so deeply absorbed that he didn’t notice someone’s footsteps—whose, he couldn’t tell—drawing close.

Crunch.

Sand shifted underfoot. Jin’s senses snapped awake.

The hairs on his body stood on end, and instinct moved him before his brain could give the order.

Whoosh.

He spun, slashing downward with his spear.

He’d made that move thousands—tens of thousands—of times in training and combat. It was etched into him, terrifyingly fast and precise. Fast enough to make the intruder in the darkness think of death.

But the intruder was no pushover.

Vwooom.

A flash of light accompanied an invisible ripple of qi. The space around them brightened, and Jin’s eyes widened as he recognized who stood before him.

“…!”

Recognition brought control. His strike, hurtling forward with tremendous speed and force, stopped as if someone had pressed pause.

The spearhead halted a hair’s breadth from a faintly glowing, translucent barrier. A fierce gust swept through.

Fwoooosh!

Sand that had somehow escaped the blood flew into the air. The intruder spat some of it out of his mouth.

"Do me a favor. If you're going to kill me, tell me first. Give me a little time to prepare."

Jin lowered his spear and hurriedly asked, "Damn it. I'm sorry, Johnson. Are you hurt anywhere?"

"…As you can see."

Magic Johnson dispelled his defensive spell. He barely managed to get the words out. In those few moments, cold sweat had gathered on the back of his neck, glistening in the faint moonlight.

"I'm fine. Though I might've had a little accident."

"What?"

"Before you get the wrong idea, everything about me is big. Just this once, it was only a little."

Jin let out a relieved breath at the joke.

That had been truly dangerous. If he hadn't stopped the spearhead at the last moment, there would definitely have been blood.

"I'm sorry again."

"I said it's fine. More importantly, Jin, what the hell was that?"

"What was what?"

"Why you mistook a wonderful friend and comrade-in-arms like me for an enemy. What were you thinking about just now?"

"Ah, well…"

Jin started to answer, then suddenly shut his mouth.

Johnson studied him for a moment and shrugged. "You don't have to tell me. If our young boss can't talk about it, I'm sure he has his reasons. But there's one thing I do have to say."

"If there's something you have to say…"

"We finished regrouping nearly thirty minutes ago. Whatever's troubling you, if we delay the pursuit any longer, we'll lose them for good. That's why I came."

What? Already?

Only then did Jin belatedly check the time and bite his lip. Everything Magic Johnson had said was true.

When did that much time pass?

It felt like less than a minute had passed since Choi Minwoo stopped by, but the sky had grown darker in the meantime.

I must've had a lot on my mind.

No-self wasn't a state that belonged only to martial arts. Jin had been so absorbed in one question after another that he hadn't noticed time passing. Johnson had no way of guessing why he'd stayed rooted to the spot.

"I know their deaths are weighing on you. That's why I gave you a little time. But Jin, if we lose them now or fail to find The Prophet… remember, the sacrifices made up to this point will have been for nothing."

Pat, pat.

Magic Johnson patted Jin on the shoulder with his large hand, then turned away after leaving him with one last remark.

"Everyone's waiting. We need you, Boss."

That was all.

Jin watched the Grand Mage's back slowly recede and wondered how much truth was in the questions he'd come up with. What, exactly, was a lie, and what was the truth?

He steadied his breathing.

"No. Either way, there's only one path."

He'd barely managed to grasp a single clue. With no other choice, there was no point in thinking it over any longer.

Jin took a heavy step into the darkness surrounding them.

The desert night was cold, dark, and vast.

No one complained. They walked in silence.

One hundred and eighty-five.

We'd fought shoulder to shoulder with them, even if only for a short time, and lost them. Some had been strangers; others must have been close. We'd buried their bodies in the dunes, then had to leave them behind.

In place of gravestones worthy of heroes, we planted their bloodied weapons in the sand. We swore we would return to these coordinates and bring them home to their families.

That promise was why the survivors kept moving. I led the way.

Whoooooosh!

Countless figures sped across the desert.

Sand carried on the wind stung my face. But sand wasn't all the wind carried.

The stench of blood. And a foul odor.

The smell was sickening, but familiar. Sticky liquid coated the plants and rocks we passed.

Blue-green blood. Monster blood.

Where are you?

I spread the energy coiled inside me over a wide area. At the same time, I sensed faint breaths and the traces of an unpleasant magical power.

"Shen."

I stopped. Xiao Shen understood at once, drew his sword in a flash, and drove it deep into the ground beneath his feet.

Squish!

Blood spurted from the sand as it suddenly caved in. At the same time, the ground all around us rippled like waves.

Shhhhh!

Monsters appeared for an instant amid the flying sand. An urgent shout rang through the night.

"Ant Lion!"

Colloquially known as the antlion.

Even the smallest specimen was about the size of a midsize car, and these powerful monsters were classified as at least Grade B.

But the one that had just appeared had larger pincers and more powerful mana than any Ant Lion I'd ever seen.

It's one of the ones that fled the battle earlier.

It was one of more than a hundred Grade A monsters that had saved their lives by retreating from the battlefield.

I moved as soon as I realized it.

Tap.

The twenty meters[3231] between us vanished. As the Ant Lion lunged to swallow the nearest Hunters, I brought my spear down.

Shhk!

One strike. Both pincers, harder than steel, sliced off like tofu.

Before its anguished scream could even ring out, I twisted the spear shaft in midair and slammed it into the monster's body.

Crack!

Blood sprayed out with a nauseating stench. The blow wasn't enough to kill it.

I pressed the spearhead against the spot I guessed was between its eyes and moved my lips.

The language of monsters.

"A few questions. Think carefully before you answer."

"…!"

Scholars who studied the Demon Realm language existed. Humans who could speak it fluently were rarer than Named Monsters.

[3231] Twenty meters is about 66 ft.

The Ant Lion's eyes, clouded with pain, flew open. It clearly hadn't expected this.

"You. Human. How?"

I tightened my grip on White Flame instead of answering.

Shhk.

As the keen spearhead cut smoothly through skin as hard as armor, a panicked voice burst out.

"I answer! Anything! Ask!"

Judging from its clumsy Demon Realm language, it wasn't very intelligent—but it was quick to catch on. I stopped the spearhead.

"Where are the others?"

"Gone. All. Sun falls that way."

"West?"

"Yes! There. Many!"

I had no reason to doubt it. The Ant Lion was stupid enough that everything it said rang true.

West.

Some must have fallen behind or scattered along the way, but most of the monsters that had left the battlefield had undoubtedly headed west.

What I really wanted to know was something else.

"Then what about The Prophet?"

"The Prophet?"

"Yes. The Prophet."

The Ant Lion blinked its round eyes.

"What is that? I don't know."

I clicked my tongue as I realized my mistake. The Prophet had revealed that name to the world himself. Unless the monster army had gathered somewhere in the desert to watch TV, this creature wouldn't know it.

"Let me rephrase. Not The Prophet. Your leader—the commander leading you and the other monsters."

"Commander? Leader? Leads us?"

It repeated my words haltingly, then looked up at me with fear and confusion in its eyes.

"Dead. You. You all killed them."

"What?"

"One. Two. Three. Four. All dead. Me, everyone, scared. So ran."

I looked into its eyes and confirmed once more that it wasn't lying.

"Right. I see."

"Me, me, believe! Didn't lie!"

"I know."

I pushed the spearhead deep between the Ant Lion's eyes and added calmly, "I know how many people died because of you, too."

Crunch. Gurgle.

The monster's enormous body shuddered as blood bubbled from it.

A System notification announced another death. I shook the blood and bodily fluids from my spear.

Johnson came over once he saw the interrogation was finished. "What did it say?"

I answered in a dry voice. "No luck. It didn't even know The Prophet existed."

"…Damn it. Well, it'd be strange for a Grade A monster—not even Grade S—to know all that. Did you find out where the ones that ran off are headed?"

"Yes."

"Where?"

I stared at Magic Johnson without answering. Then I replied as if it were nothing.

"East."

Over his shoulder, the Skeleton King stared at me, eyes wide.

Chapter 811

"East. You mean east."

Magic Johnson turned his head to check the direction. For the Skeleton King, that was unfortunate.

He had to fight to hide the shock on his face. The shock filling his mind was harder to shake.

Why on earth?

To the Skeleton King, a monster, the Demon Realm language was practically his mother tongue.

Unlike Magic Johnson, who had been watching the rear of the formation, he'd stayed beside Jin Taekyung at the front the whole time. He'd heard enough of the conversation to understand it perfectly.

The Ant Lion said most of the monsters went west. I'm sure of it.

His thoughts tangled together. Jin Taekyung's expression hadn't changed in the slightest, and for a moment the Skeleton King wondered if he'd misheard. But no. However many times he went over the exchange, his memory stayed the same.

That vile human… lied.

So what did Jin Taekyung's lie, and this situation now, mean?

After a brief moment of thought, the Skeleton King found the answer himself. It was the answer he'd already suspected and had tried so hard to ignore.

No way.

His pupils trembled as he faced what he could scarcely believe. Just then, Magic Johnson looked away from the darkened east and turned toward him.

"Did you send your minions east to search—hey. Are you listening to me?"

"Hm? Oh. Of course."

"What were you looking at?"

The Skeleton King had looked at Jin Taekyung without realizing it, but he couldn't say so. The instant he heard Magic Johnson's voice, his heart had lurched. He forced himself to settle down, then gestured with his chin toward the dead Ant Lion's corpse.

"That one. I thought it might move well if I brought it back as an undead."

"Hmm, not a bad idea. But it burrows deep into the sand, so humans like us couldn't ride it. And aboveground, its size would make it too conspicuous."

"Then I'll give up on it. Come to think of it, controlling something like that would take a lot of magical power."

Had he answered convincingly? Had Magic Johnson noticed anything strange about his behavior?

As Johnson slowly stroked his chin, the Skeleton King pushed down his anxiety and hurriedly continued.

"But what were you going to ask?"

"Oh, right. I was going to ask if you'd sent your minions to search the east."

"The eagles and griffins?"

"Right. Didn't they already go out and come back? If the monsters fled east, I'd have thought they would've spotted them."

Magic Johnson was right. The Skeleton King had already sent his subordinates east.

While everyone else regrouped and rested, a dozen or so eagles and griffins had taken to the sky after the monster army fleeing frantically across the desert. His magical power had soon run low, ending the undead's pursuit without results. But he knew, at least, that few monsters had gone east.

"Well…"

His voice trailed off. Beside Magic Johnson, Jin Taekyung watched him with a dark, steady gaze.

Damn it.

The Skeleton King didn't know if the choice he was about to make was right.

Then he remembered something Jin Taekyung had once said—words that had calmed not only him, but everyone around him.

If you can't trust yourself, trust me.

He recalled the words and repeated them to himself. In that instant, his hesitation ended.

"I lost sight of them quickly, but there's a good chance most of the monster army fled east."

The Skeleton King trusted Jin Taekyung's judgment—no, his friend's judgment.

Perhaps more than his own.

Even before we met the Ant Lion, I'd put the conflict lingering in the back of my mind aside.

Now all I had to do was tug on the thread I'd barely managed to grasp and find out what lay at the other end.

But I can't do that right away.

I had to be meticulous. I couldn't leave them an opening.

I sorted out my thoughts, then gathered a few of the people in command.

"We'll split up our forces and move out."

My abrupt announcement sent a ripple of unease through the group. Team Leader Choi was the first to object.

"Weren't we all going east together?"

Most of the monsters had headed east. That was what everyone except the Skeleton King and me believed, so his question made sense.

Assuming what they believed was true.

"Team Leader Choi."

"Yes?"

"When did I say that?"

"But…"

"I know what you mean."

My voice came out dry, so unlike my usual voice that it sounded strange even to me. I looked at Team Leader Choi's stiff face and went on.

"But we can't act on the Ant Lion's information as if we know it's true. It's too dangerous."

"You mean it could be a deliberate trap?"

"Yes."

It struck me again: I was pretty good at lying.

I also knew a truth I'd learned in both Murim and the modern world.

Authority.

A lie told by someone with authority is remarkably persuasive. People who trust that person are ready to believe it.

Just like now.

"They lost the battle and ran, but they still outnumber us by more than five to one."

Five thousand.

An army that had numbered well over ten thousand had been cut to a third in a single battle. But we'd taken losses, too.

Even with an overwhelming kill ratio, the two hundred or so people we'd lost amounted to a fifth of our force.

If the monster army was a pie too big to finish in one sitting, we were a muffin someone could swallow whole.

"We need to be careful. We should split up and pursue them."

Xiao Shen nodded.

"I agree with Sir Jin. If we act on false information, we could walk into a trap—or head the wrong way and lose the monsters."

"Exactly. Splitting up would lower the risk."

Team Leader Choi furrowed his brow.

"I understand why you want to split up, but… wouldn't that leave the units vulnerable to being picked off one by one?"

Any commander would worry about that, but the chance of it happening was extremely low.

The monsters fled west, not east.

I swallowed the words on the tip of my tongue and answered without hesitation.

"We'll keep the units close together. Even with communications disrupted by the high concentration of magical power, we should still be able to maintain a reliable connection."

"Hmm. I agree with Jin," Magic Johnson said. "By my rough calculation, a hundred kilometers[3232] or so between units should be close enough."

I looked at him in silence, then answered with a heavy heart.

"That's right. We'll cover more ground, too."

The Rub' al Khali Desert was said to be the second-largest desert in the world. Its size was staggering.

Even Team Leader Choi seemed to realize anew how large it was. He reluctantly nodded.

"If we assign a hundred people to each pursuit unit… we could cover the southeast and northeast as well as the east. Understood. There's no time to waste, so let's move quickly."

He was about to leave, but turned back before he'd taken a step.

"You've left one thing out," I said.

"Mr. Jin Taekyung, what do you mean—"

"West. I'm sending a pursuit unit west, too."

"What?"

"But that's the opposite direction."

"That's right."

I looked around at everyone.

"But if we travel a few more hours west from here, we'll reach the oil fields. The very place the message The Prophet left for me points to."

"…!"

"You heard the message yourself," I said to Yamamoto Genji. "Tell them. Am I right?"

He'd looked miserable ever since I mentioned splitting up. Now everyone was watching him. He glanced around nervously and nodded.

"Uh, well. He said it was a land where black jewels were buried, so I think that's probably right…"

"Good enough. We're going west."

"Wait. We are?"

[3232] A hundred kilometers is about 62 miles.

“Yes. You, me, the Skeleton King, and Magic Johnson.”

Yamamoto Genji’s face went deathly pale.

“Jin Sama[3233]! How can you do this?”

“Right here.”

“That’s ridiculous… Leave me out of it! I want to stay with the others!”

“No. I won’t leave you out. I have no intention of leaving you out. Go back.”

After answering firmly, I continued speaking to the people who were blinking at this unexpected turn of events.

“We didn’t come here for the monster army. We came for The Prophet. We need to follow his message at least as far as the place it points to. We’ll be back soon. Until then, keep pursuing the remaining monsters, but avoid a clash.”

“No!”

Team Leader Choi, who’d been staring at me blankly, shouted in protest.

“If The Prophet was in the west all along, why would the monsters run the exact opposite way?”

“That’s true. But if most of them don’t know The Prophet exists, like the Ant Lion, they have every reason to run east.”

“Mr. Jin Taekyung. Do you really believe The Prophet is there?”

“I don’t know. But even if he isn’t, you and the others will still be pursuing the monsters, so nothing will go wrong. And if he’s in the west… we’ll have enough strength to take him on.”

Three S-rank Hunters.

No, four, if we counted the Skeleton King. And with his abilities, he could bring undead soldiers into the fight.

“But…”

Just as he parted his lips to say something, I delivered the final blow.

“This is an order.”

“…!”

“Hurry. Before the monsters get any farther away.”

I turned away. Then I sent a Sound Transmission, as though in passing, to someone who’d stood there without a word all this time.

—From now on, don’t answer or react to anything I say. Just listen.

For a brief moment, the Skeleton King’s eyes, which had been trembling violently, settled into a deep stillness.

[3233] Sama is a Japanese honorific expressing a high degree of respect.

After that one-sided discussion, I spent a short while circulating my qi, then set out west.

I wasn't alone. The Skeleton King, Magic Johnson, and Yamamoto Genji came with me.

There were only four of us, but we were a powerful force, and we moved at a speed that couldn't compare to when we'd been traveling with the army.

Whoosh!

Amid the scenery flashing past, I spotted pools of thick, sticky blood. I didn't have to stop and examine them to see how much had been shed, or how far the trail spread.

A few dozen monsters couldn't have left all this behind. Everything the Ant Lion had said was true.

Though that's not the important part.

I kept running, muttering to myself. We crossed rolling dunes and passed through an open stretch of wilderness.

After about thirty minutes, we reached a canyon between two facing cliffs. Only then did I begin to slow.

"Hah… Hah. C-could you slow down a little?"

Yamamoto Genji was panting. Magic Johnson wiped his sweat-soaked forehead and spoke to me.

"Jin. How about we rest here for a bit? I don't see any monsters around."

Instead of answering, I came to a complete stop and slowly looked around.

Cliffs stretching into the distance. A narrow passage. Good terrain.

Little room to move. A narrow escape route.

I looked up at the sky. In the distance, I saw a shadow flapping its wings against the faint moonlight over the desert.

An eagle.

Magic Johnson followed my gaze and frowned.

"Still birds out here? With this concentration of magical power, they should hardly be able to live here."

"Not impossible, if they aren't ordinary eagles."

"What?"

Magic Johnson blinked, not understanding. I stepped in front of the canyon entrance and blocked the way.

Chapter 812

Step.

Jin Taekyung felt the earth crumble beneath his foot and wondered why his footsteps sounded so loud. Was it the depth of the night? Or was it because every nerve in his body was on edge?

He didn't know. Maybe it was both.

But one thing was certain. From this moment on, no one would leave this long, narrow canyon without his permission.

"Jin?"

Magic Johnson stared at him, apparently unable to understand why the air had suddenly grown so heavy. Then he turned his head.

Beneath the moonlight spilling down the towering cliffs, a figure stood blocking the exit, its golden eyes gleaming.

The Skeleton King.

Johnson's lips silently formed the name. As he realized the position he was in, the Grand Mage's gaze darkened.

"What does this mean?"

"Nothing in particular. I just have a few things I need to check."

Jin's tone was gentle, but his eyes were cold.

The eagle in the distance was already forgotten. Magic Johnson studied him.

"If it isn't urgent, why not check later?"

"It's urgent. I have to check now."

"Caution is a leader's virtue. But I don't think now is the right time."

"I can see why you'd think that. But isn't judging the right time exactly what a leader does?"

Magic Johnson fell silent for a moment, then gave a quiet laugh.

"You're right, Jin. I didn't know you were so good with words."

"I've noticed this now and then, but test scores and running your mouth are two different things."

Jin smiled faintly along with him, then called out a name.

"Genji."

"Y-yes?"

Yamamoto Genji, who had been watching from beside Magic Johnson, jumped at the sudden call.

He'd already realized something was wrong. As his eyes darted around, Jin jerked his chin at him.

"You look uncomfortable. Come over here. You're getting on my nerves."

"Y-yes, sir!"

Yamamoto glanced at Magic Johnson and took a step forward. When the hulking Grand Mage didn't react, he hurried over to Jin's side.

"U-um. Jin-sama.[3234] What exactly is going on…"

"Shut up."

Jin answered calmly, then looked at Magic Johnson.

Johnson's expression hadn't changed despite the sudden turn of events. He was still sitting on the rough rock.

"Johnson. When did we first meet?"

The question came out of nowhere, but Magic Johnson answered readily.

"During the Arch Lich subjugation. It hasn't even been a year."

"It feels strange. It seems like it's been ten years already."

"A lot has happened. Things we thought would never happen again—things we couldn't even imagine."

"Yeah. I really didn't think things would turn out like this."

Jin smiled bitterly. Two years ago—no, even just a year ago—he'd been nothing more than an unusually talented F-rank Hunter.

He'd never escaped the confines fate had set for him when he awakened. He'd spent his days in a cramped, musty goshiwon room.[3235]

But everything had changed.

Last summer had been unusually hot. One day, without warning, he'd been told he was fired.

And then… there was the beat-up capsule waiting for him on the melting asphalt.

Every moment was still vivid.

That night, the beat-up capsule had tossed the fool who'd been reckless enough to crawl inside it for a nap into a new world. Jin had escaped his confines and changed his fate.

"Things we couldn't even imagine. That's probably the best way to put it. I know because I've lived through them. But you know what's funny?"

Jin didn't wait for an answer.

The faint smile had vanished from his lips. They were now as rough and hard as the rock Magic Johnson sat on.

"After going through so many things I couldn't have imagined, my imagination still barely improves."

A being called the Demon King had descended upon Earth. Countless monsters had burned cities and slaughtered people.

[3234] -sama is a Japanese honorific expressing high respect.

[3235] A goshiwon is a small, inexpensive room-for-rent lodging, often with very little space.

Humanity had won after five years of the Great War, then built an even more brilliant and vast civilization.

Impossible things. And yet, they'd happened to everyone just a few decades ago.

Jin hadn't lived through that era, but he'd crossed dimensions, traveled between two worlds, and gained no shortage of experience.

"Sometimes I think common sense is terrifying. It keeps you thinking inside the same old box, and you end up going nowhere."

Jin tapped his temple with a dagger he'd drawn at some point.

Magic Johnson had watched in silence. Now he spoke.

"So this time, you used your imagination a little more?"

"Yes. I went back over everything that's happened so far. Slowly. From as objective a perspective as I could manage."

"Jin, humans can't be objective."

Magic Johnson was right.

People's judgments were always subjective. Ironically, humanity had become the master of the world because, more than any other creature on Earth, it was made up of thought and emotion.

But…

"I found I could at least try. Set aside what I know and how I feel about someone as much as possible."

"Right. You can try to look at things objectively. That's humanity's greatest strength."

"Hmm."

Jin licked his lips.

"That's a dangerous thing to say."

"Which part?"

"I don't know. You make it sound like you're not human yourself."

Jin's reflection shone in Magic Johnson's clear eyes. A short laugh slipped from Johnson's lips, breaking the silence.

"So, Jin. Did you achieve what you wanted?"

"Probably."

Magic Johnson already knew what Jin had gone to such lengths to work out.

"The Prophet."

Johnson's deep voice carried through the night air. Jin gave a small nod.

"I started with the person most closely connected to him."

"Michael Silbert. Considering their connection, that would be the obvious place to start."

“Huginn called The Prophet Muninn. The fifth Muninn, at that. One of the beings swapped out like spare parts to make Michael Silbert who he is today. And on top of that, The Prophet uses magic that isn’t human.”

“That’s why we suspected he was a monster.”

“Right. But isn’t something strange? Huginn only learned about the fifth Muninn three years ago, yet Michael Silbert had been handling magical power little by little since the Great Cataclysm.”

“What’s strange about that?”

“Of course it’s strange. A human made magical power and mana coexist. That’s insane. Even I can’t do it now. And that guy did it thirty years ago? No way.”

Then Jin added, “Unless a real monster helped him.”

Magic Johnson paused. Jin went on.

“But the timing didn’t add up. Three years ago and thirty years ago. There was too much time in between.”

“…”

“After thinking it over, I came up with one answer.”

Jin scratched his chin with the dagger. A week without shaving had left him with patchy stubble, and the sharp blade scraped it away.

“The Prophet isn’t the fifth Muninn.”

Shhk.

The instant a drop of blood rolled from the tip of his chin, where the blade had nicked him, a chilly voice pierced everyone’s ears.

“For more than thirty years, there has been only one Muninn.”

“…!”

“…!”

The air around them seemed to chill. Jin shook the blood from his dagger and continued.

“Once I thought of it that way, things finally started to add up. What the fuck, this isn’t a claw machine. I couldn’t understand how people that powerful and loyal kept popping up every few years.”

Yamamoto Genji, who had been listening with wide eyes, let his mouth fall open.

“Th-then…”

“Yeah. The Prophet taught Michael Silbert how to handle magical power, and they worked together toward their own goals. He must’ve been incredibly powerful even thirty years ago.”

The scattered pieces began to fall into place, one by one. Jin Taekyung’s voice became an unseen hand, feeling its way over countless pieces.

One. Two. Three. Ten.

Each piece filled a space that matched its shape. As they came together, the outline of someone began to emerge.

It was a portrait. It was also a puzzle.

But…

Not enough. Not nearly enough.

Too many questions remained unanswered for Jin to complete it.

Lose even one piece, and a puzzle could never be whole. This one had gaps everywhere. Filling them was nearly impossible.

At least, it was impossible for Jin to do alone.

“Johnson.”

Jin spoke without warning.

The Grand Mage had risen from the rock. His shadow loomed large, and the staff in his hand gleamed in the moonlight.

“Can I ask you one thing?”

“Anything, Jin.”

“Why have you helped me all this time?”

“Because we’re friends.”

“Like Siegfried Bassmann?”

Magic Johnson raised his staff as he answered.

“Yeah.”

“I hesitated until the end. Honestly, even now I’m not sure. It makes no sense for a monster to use mana and even potions.”

“Anyone would think that if they were human. But there’s nothing in this world that can’t happen.”

Vwooom.

The Magic Gem at the tip of the staff began to vibrate. It was an S-rank Magic Gem, obtained by killing a monster that had slaughtered an entire city on its own during the Great Cataclysm.

Feeling the enormous flow of mana surging with the wind, Jin Taekyung suddenly spoke.

“Do you remember what you said earlier?”

Magic Johnson gave a heavy nod.

“I remember. Humans can’t be objective.”

“You were right. I’m only human, so I couldn’t help thinking subjectively.”

“Everyone does. He’s a bit of an unusual case, but that friend is the same.”

Magic Johnson gestured with his chin behind him.

Beyond the Skeleton King, who wore a golden crown made of magical power, hundreds of pairs of eyes gleamed throughout the canyon.

“Then sending the other forces east was…”

“I didn’t want people who had nothing to do with this getting caught up in it.”

“Excellent. Was that your decision?”

“Yes, but…”

Jin Taekyung raised the dagger in his hand and continued.

“It wasn’t just a subjective judgment.”

And at that moment—

Flash!

A blinding light burst from Jin’s eyes.

Everyone who faced the sudden flash in the darkness froze for an instant.

Everyone but Jin. He was the one who had called forth the light, the one who had wanted it.

Crack! Stab!

The dagger shot forward like a beam of light, smashing through armor and tearing through flesh and bone. Jin watched Yamamoto Genji stagger.

“What the hell are you?”

Yamamoto Genji’s eyes widened in disbelief.

Then he—no, The Prophet—grinned.

Chapter 813

Fwoosh.

Everything sharpened and slowed.

Dirt and sand flew up beneath his staggering feet. His eyes widened. Blood surged from his chest.

And then…

“What the fuck are you?”

As the words left my mouth, time returned to normal.

I could see Yamamoto Genji—or rather, the bastard wearing his face—grinning.

The Prophet.

A moment ago, his eyes had been wide with pain. Now they gleamed with joy and surprise I couldn’t understand.

He’s happy? Now?

I pushed the question aside and swung my dagger again.

The Prophet staggered, clutching his bleeding chest. The moment his hand closed around the hilt at his waist, a slash leaped from my dagger and flashed through the darkness ahead of him.

Shhk.

A faint line appeared across The Prophet’s wrist with a chilling cut.

His right hand, which had half-drawn the sword, lost its strength and fell away from his body.

Thud. Splatter!

Blood sprayed onto the ground. Red blood, no different from any human’s. That only made it harder to believe what I was seeing, even as I charged him.

Whoosh. Crack!

I brought my heel down on his leg with the force of a thousand geun.[3236] The flesh of his calf burst, and the bones beneath it shattered.

The Prophet dropped to one knee, his balance gone. He reached for me with his remaining hand, but this time I didn’t have to move.

“Stop.”

A deep voice rang out. The wind died, and the air trembled.

I couldn’t see the force that caught The Prophet’s wrist before his hand reached me, but I could feel the Grand Mage’s powerful mana surrounding us.

Crack.

[3236] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb). A thousand geun is about 600 kg (1,320 lb).

His hand stopped dead in midair. Bones ground out of place, and his brow twisted. Then his body began to rise, as if an invisible giant had seized him and lifted him off the ground.

Whistle—thud, thud, thud!

Something pure white shot toward him like a beam of light and pierced his limbs.

The long, sharp bone shards sliced through flesh and bone like tofu, pinning his body—which had been floating in the air—deep into the cliff.

Crunch!

The solid rock, which might have stood there for hundreds or even thousands of years, held him fast.

Overpowered in an instant after my surprise attack, The Prophet coughed up a mouthful of blood.

"Cough. Heh heh."

Pain was the same for everyone.

But The Prophet laughed, curling his bloodstained lips as if he couldn't feel a thing.

"Good. First, I'll give you credit. Very well done."

Wham!

A blow to the face snapped his head back. His skull struck the cliff with a boom, and he shook his head.

"It's been a while since I felt my head ring. Having fun is one thing, but let's not overdo it."

"…!"

I stifled a groan.

I'd already cut off his hand and crushed his knee. My first strike had driven straight toward his heart, too. He'd pulled away at the last moment, but the tremendous Scorching Yang Qi carried by my dagger had been enough to ravage his insides.

An ordinary human would be dead by now.

But The Prophet wasn't an ordinary human. That impossible vitality couldn't belong to one.

And unlike Michael Silbert, who had been practically half-human and half-demon, then died in the form of a monster while bleeding monster's blood, The Prophet was still shedding red human blood.

"…Jin."

"What… what the hell is that thing?"

Magic Johnson and the Skeleton King stared at the incomprehensible being, their gazes trembling. The Prophet laughed, his voice thick with blood.

"No one can answer that. That's the kind of being I am."

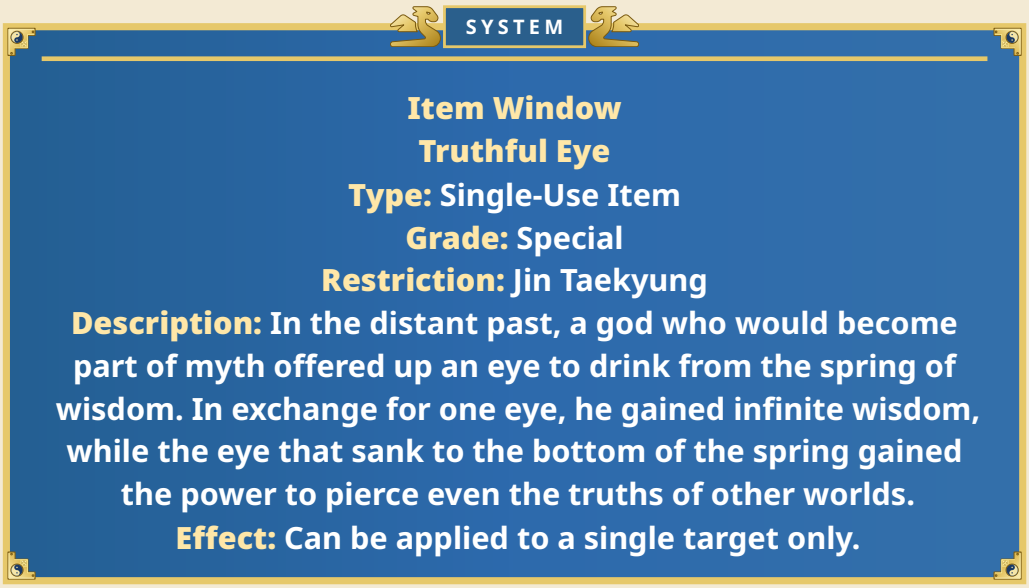
No. He was wrong.

I steadied my ragged breathing. My eyes gave off a faint glow and burned as if they were on fire.

This was the price of briefly taking in a power beyond humanity. It was also a gift the System had given one foolish human—and the only key to this enormous puzzle.

The Truthful Eye.

I'd received the special Item as a Reward for completing Unknown Death, the Quest that began with Siegfried Bassmann's death. I'd only glanced at its details before, but the moment I found a clue, I'd recalled them.



Looking back, the System had always shown me the way.

At first, I hadn't known what the consumable Item called the Truthful Eye was for. I hadn't known what the hologram only I could see was trying to tell me.

But now I did.

A few hours ago, I'd found my one clue. Before that, the System had already handed me the key to understanding it.

A key that could be used on only one target—and therefore had to be used with even greater care.

And now I held the power to see through every truth.

Fwoooosh.

Heat flooded my eyes. My vision turned white.

But the divine power within them pushed through the pain and reached out.

Toward Yamamoto Genji. Toward the pope of the fanatics who had built a temple in this desert.

Toward the unknown being who had spent more than thirty years sowing the seeds of catastrophe in this land under the name Muninn—and now meant to bring them to flower himself.

A thick veil hid him, one even Qi Sense couldn't penetrate. But the eye of the old god called Odin saw through it all.

Pierced it. Revealed what lay beneath.

Flash!

The instant a distant, blinding light flooded my vision, countless bells thrashed inside my mind.

System notifications I'd never heard before and holographic windows I'd never seen raced in every direction, to the ends of the earth and above the clouds.

Ding. Ding. Ding. Diiiiing!

One sound swallowed another. The translucent holographic windows multiplied from one to five, from five to dozens, then to a hundred.

They were a wave. A mountain.

"Ah…!"

A gasp escaped me. Cold ran down my spine at the sight before me.

Hundreds. Perhaps thousands.

More holographic windows than I could count burst forth like fireworks. They all came from one being—the beginning and center of everything.

The Prophet.

I could hardly breathe. These weren't merely pieces of information. They were the countless lives he had devoured, the gravestones they had left behind.

Gravestones bearing nothing but names and levels.

And the Truthful Eye within me saw through the identity of the gravedigger who had built this vast cemetery of the dead. It stripped away the thick veil around him and revealed the truth.

Ding.

One final bell rang in my ears. The last piece of the puzzle fell into place.

This is…

At last, I understood what The Prophet truly was. How this cursed monster had hidden his identity for more than thirty years while doing everything he'd done.

Right. Now I get it.

I stared at The Prophet, still smiling. Then, with the breath I'd been holding, I spat out a single word.

"Doppelganger."

I saw his reaction clearly.

"…!"

The corners of his mouth, which had been curved like a half-moon, stiffened. The holographic window hovering above his head shone with a particularly gloomy light.

SYSTEM

Level 170 “The Final Abyss” Doppelganger

Doppelganger.

A harbinger of ill fortune, a being spoken of like a superstition.

Countless monsters of old myth had torn through the pages of legend and leaped into reality. Yet a doppelganger had never once appeared. Humanity had come to believe there were none among the enemies they had defeated, or those they had yet to face.

Not even in the horrifying Demon Realm. A doppelganger was nothing but an illusion born of fear, a mere superstition.

They were wrong.

The doppelganger had been there from the beginning. Everyone had mistaken its failure to reveal itself for its absence.

At least Jin Taekyung knew that better than anyone. He even knew when this incomprehensible being, which had devoured countless lives, had first slipped into their world.

“Michael Silbert. The Great Battle of Paris.”

His voice came out abruptly, hard as the cliff rock on either side of them. The monster’s smile, frozen for a moment, eased back into place.

“That’s right. On the very day you humans call Christmas, I met him and became part of this world.”

December 25, 2020.

The great battle that made a page in history—and made the name Michael Silbert known to all humanity.

As one layer of that day’s truth peeled away, Jin Taekyung swallowed hard. The Skeleton King clenched his teeth, while Magic Johnson stared at The Prophet—or rather, the doppelganger—in disbelief.

“That can’t be. The one that attacked Paris at the time was definitely…”

“A Dragon. More precisely, a hatchling less than three hundred years old. It was born a Dragon, so arrogance was in its nature. And it let its guard down, as young ones do. Of course, it was unexpected that a human would kill it, even so.”

The doppelganger had cut Johnson off. He went on.

“In the end, they were simply unlucky. The young Dragon, and the humans who miraculously survived their encounter with it.”

The Grand Mage, who had lived through the Great Cataclysm firsthand, couldn’t hold back a groan.

"…It was a lie, then. Michael Silbert made all of it up."

"Well, not all of it. A Dragon did attack Paris. And Michael did survive alone."

The doppelganger grinned.

"I knew the moment I saw him. Unlike the others, Michael was quick to understand his position. Before I'd killed even half of them, he was on his knees, begging me to spare him. He said he'd do anything if I let him live."

"…!"

"An interesting offer. I accepted. Then he killed the remaining humans himself."

Jin Taekyung suddenly remembered a line from the conversation he'd had with Michael Silbert just before the man met his end.

I was struggling to survive, too!

He'd sounded as though he were spitting blood.

He'd been telling the truth. Michael Silbert had struggled to survive. His desire to live was greater than anyone's, and he still had ambitions to fulfill.

And so a human and a monster had joined forces.

But it wasn't a shackle. It was a contract. Two monsters who differed in appearance but shared the same nature had made a deal to achieve their own goals.

But…

"What for?"

"What?"

"I asked what it was for. What was your real reason for wanting to live among people in this world?"

Jin Taekyung ground out the words. After a moment's silence, the doppelganger smiled.

"Well, I don't think now's the time to wait for my answer."

And at that moment—

Rumble.

A tremor swept through the canyon from far away.

Chapter 814

Crack. Rumble.

The ground shook. Clods of dirt and fragments of rock broke away from the towering cliffs and rained down overhead, one after another.

"…Damn it."

Magic Johnson muttered the words like a groan. The Skeleton King and hundreds of undead blocked the canyon's exit, crouching low as they stared into the darkness.

More precisely, at the countless enemies approaching from beyond it.

Fwoooosh.

I steadied my breathing and heightened my Qi Sense, sharpening my senses to take in everything around me.

The depth and force of the tremors traveling through the ground. The wind blowing from the west, and the smell it carried. And the sounds.

They were too far away for me to judge their exact number or strength, but I was certain of one thing.

They're not monsters.

That left only one possibility. The Doppelganger sensed my gaze and bared its bloodstained teeth in a grin.

"Humans are such strange creatures. They'll throw their lives away for a being they've never even seen, calling it a god. All it takes is a few solemn words, and they're weeping buckets."

"Fanatics…"

"I liked this land from the start. It was a good place to make plans and cover them up. Most of all, it was crawling with people willing to give their very souls to religion. It was astonishingly easy to win the faith of fools like that."

Squirm. Crack.

The cleanly severed stump of its wrist twitched. Through the gaps in its shattered armor, I could see fresh, pale flesh already growing over the dagger wound in its chest.

It wasn't a potion. It wasn't magic.

And yet, even now, its broken body was healing.

An unbelievable rate of recovery—obviously not human. The power of Regeneration, enough to make anyone suspicious.

But the fanatics who had been launching terrorist attacks around the world since before the Great Cataclysm would have seen it differently.

Perhaps they'd glimpsed the shadow of a god in the Doppelganger, who used mana and had the same red blood and flesh as they did.

"A miracle."

Its voice rang out, brimming with excitement. The Doppelganger stared at me with blazing eyes and continued.

"To them, I am not a monster but a miracle itself—the Prophet who will lead them to the promised land."

"…!"

"They'll fight until the very last one falls. For their god. And for me."

I didn't argue with the Doppelganger's confident claim.

It was the truth.

No matter what we did, a clash was inevitable.

The Doppelganger had planted its followers in this desert far earlier than I'd expected. The wave of fanatics that began there had already shaken the world through terrorism.

So even if I told them the truth about the Doppelganger, nothing would change.

If a few words were enough to make them see reason, they wouldn't be fanatics.

This was the work of a monster and a bunch of madmen. And right now, I was nothing but a heretic who had to be killed.

A heretic persecuting the great Prophet chosen by God.

"Then there's only one thing left to do."

I muttered evenly, staring at the Doppelganger. It understood what I meant, and the corners of its mouth curled upward.

"I'm looking forward to it."

"Yeah?"

Thud!

As I spoke, I thrust my dagger forward, piercing its heart.

Its limbs were bound, so it couldn't dodge. The Doppelganger merely frowned and sighed.

"Give it a rest. That hurts like hell."

Crack.

The severed muscles and shattered bones returned to their proper places. Bright red blood filled the gaps, and smooth skin, like a child's, grew over it.

It healed at a staggering speed, as if a video were playing in fast-forward.

Even the great shards of bone that had pierced its limbs and pinned it deep into the cliff shifted slightly, pushed by the flesh and bone growing around them.

The countless Level windows I'd seen with the Truthful Eye—and could still see now—meant far more than they appeared to.

Other lives.

They were fuel, but they were also the lives of the victims the Doppelganger had devoured.

Like an arcade game character that came back to life whenever you fed it a coin, the bastard could keep reviving.

But it's not truly immortal.

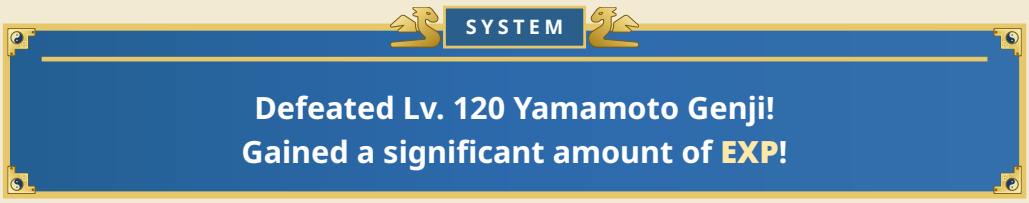
I twisted the dagger still in my hand. Heat surged from my dantian, raced through my acupoints, and flowed into the blade.

Thud—boom!

Scorching Yang Qi poured through the dagger buried deep in its chest and exploded inside the Doppelganger.

Its heart had already been pierced once, yet it had recovered as if nothing could kill it. Now the heart was crushed completely, and the clear bell I'd been waiting for rang in my ear.

Ding.



"…!"

One life faded, and a new one took its place.

The Doppelganger was still grinning. Behind its melting skin, another unfamiliar face was ready to emerge.

"Imagine that. Jin Taekyung killed Genji. Japan's going to lose its mind when they hear about this."

"Shut your mouth."

A low nose bridge. Crooked teeth visible inside its mouth.

Judging by features distinctive even among East Asians, this had to be a Hunter from J1—one of the team thought to have been wiped out apart from Yamamoto Genji.

"Come to think of it, I forgot to introduce myself. Nice to meet you. I'm Hiroshi Inoue. I spent my childhood in Nagasaki, then moved to Tokyo…"

I grabbed it by the throat and twisted hard.

Its neck bones shattered under my grip, and its head bent at a grotesque angle.

Ding. Another bell rang, and the twisted head straightened. The face, smiling coyly, belonged to a woman I'd never seen before.

"Oh, did you know? This woman was the lover of the man you just killed. Looks like they were planning to get married this year."

"…!"

My hand stopped dead, as if someone had hit a pause button. The Doppelganger whistled, clearly enjoying itself.

"Wow. So passionate. Humans really are amazing when it comes to things like this. We could learn a thing or two."

"…You."

"Ah, sorry. I apologize if that made you uncomfortable. But what can I do? It's my ability."

I clenched my teeth.

The Doppelganger hadn't just absorbed its victims' appearances. It could reproduce their abilities exactly as they'd had them in life—and it had their memories, too.

Those memories, spilling from its mouth, dug into my chest like an awl and made me hesitate.

Crack.

Blood seeped between my clenched teeth.

Beyond the canyon, the tremors had grown stronger, and I could feel a fierce killing intent. In front of me, a monster that came back no matter how many times I killed it was smiling faintly.

"Jin!"

Magic Johnson's urgent shout struck my eardrums. The smile on the Doppelganger's face deepened.

"This is your last chance."

"What?"

"Right now is your last chance to run and survive."

"…!"

Whoosh.

The cool desert wind brushed my face. It felt as if I'd been doused in cold water.

The Doppelganger shrugged at me as I stood frozen like a statue.

"I understand. It'd hurt your pride. You'd be embarrassed. But if you die here like the rest of those humans, would that be a pointless death—or a noble sacrifice by a hero?"

"…That's…"

"You have to look at the bigger picture. You're the World Hunter Federation's Alliance Leader. The one and only light and hope who can save this world, like someone from the past. Aren't you?"

Its gentle voice tickled my ear, like a snake coaxing me to steal and eat the forbidden apple.

The Doppelganger's low whisper wound softly around my whole body.

"Run. And survive."

Rumble.

The canyon shook. The footsteps of countless fanatics—and the hooves of the camels they rode—were approaching from the darkness beyond.

"Think of your family and friends. Can you even imagine how much sorrow and pain they'll suffer because of your death?"

"…Sorrow and pain?"

"That's right. You've been through it yourself."

My lips moved without a sound.

Sorrow and pain over someone's death. Yeah, I'd been through it. It had shaken me so badly I'd felt close to falling apart.

"No one will blame you. Even I respect everything you've done. So even now…"

The eyes of the nameless woman—or rather, the Doppelganger—sparkled.

"Run."

"Allahu Akbar!"[3237]

The mighty roar of countless voices merging into one rang across the darkening desert.

Brilliant light shimmered around Magic Johnson, while hundreds of undead stared with dimly glowing eyes at the waves of fanatics surging toward them.

And I…

Let go of the Doppelganger's neck.

Step.

I took a step back and saw it smiling at me. It spoke gently, as if to a child.

"Good. You made the right choice."

I found myself muttering.

"Is this the best option?"

"It has to be."

"Good. Then I'm glad."

I nodded, then murmured under my breath.

"Open. Summon."

"Hm?"

Shhk!

As it asked its empty question, the Doppelganger's head flew into the air.

A new face rose onto its shoulders as if someone had turned a page, and blinked.

The heat blazing around White Flame's spearhead cast a reddish glow in its eyes.

"What the fuck are you, some Ditto from a failed link trade? Quit trying to pull that crap on me."

Only then did the Doppelganger understand what had happened. It sighed.

"You crazy bastard…"

[3237] Allahu Akbar is an Arabic phrase meaning "God is greatest."

"Got anything more original? I've heard that one so many times I'm sick of it."

"Why are you doing this?"

"That's what I want to ask you."

"What?"

"You started spouting nonsense from the get-go, and I wondered what the hell was going on. But the more I listened, the more curious I got. You're the first monster I've ever seen telling a human to run. For a second, I almost called you Mom, you son of a bitch."

"…"

"What the hell are you? You're trying so hard not to get caught, but you keep giving yourself away. So I know you're stupid—but what do you actually want?"

A brief silence followed. The Doppelganger stared at me without a word, then furrowed its brow.

"Damn it. This has gone to shit. Why are you so reckless? You want to be remembered by history as a hero who made a noble sacrifice?"

"Quit talking out of your ass and answer me. My dream is to be the head of a longevity village."

"Then why the hell…!"

Scree!

A cry rang out from the sky, swallowing the Doppelganger's unfinished words.

It naturally looked up at the sky, and its eyes suddenly widened.

"…What's that?"

I already knew what the Doppelganger was seeing.

Before the forces split up, I'd used Sound Transmission to give the Skeleton King direct orders.

"They're a little late, but they made it just in time."

Screee!

Dozens of eagles and griffins glided over the canyon with their wings spread wide.

On the backs of the enormous flying beasts, I could see the Hunters who should have gone east.

Chapter 815

Whoooosh.

Cold night wind swept over Choi Minwoo. He brushed back his windblown hair and looked down at the canyon rushing closer.

There it is.

The spearhead's cold gleam was unmistakable even in the deep darkness.

Choi had collected countless fine weapons and artifacts over the years, but the strength and sharpness of the spear named White Flame still amazed him.

Though not as much as its owner.

He thought of Jin Taekyung.

When they first met, Choi could never have imagined that the young man his age who'd joined a raid as a porter would stand above every Hunter in the world less than a year later.

But Jin Taekyung had made the unimaginable real.

He had prevented countless disasters and grown astonishingly through every ordeal. The boldness and courage he showed in a crisis kept surpassing even Choi's expectations—and Choi had watched him more closely than anyone.

Just like today.

I could tell something was different from usual…but Mr. Jin keeps getting another step ahead of us.

When the Skeleton King's undead relayed what was happening, Choi had felt surprised and a little hurt. Before long, though, those feelings had turned to joy.

Jin had solved a problem no one else could. That was proof he'd grown yet again.

With him, we can win.

Jin Taekyung was the commander in chief leading them all, the general directing the battle, and the vanguard who charged toward the enemy ahead of everyone else.

How could Choi not trust him? How could he not love him?

No matter how many obstacles and dangers lay along Jin's path, that would never change.

There are a lot of them.

Choi gazed down calmly.

Hundreds of meters[3238] below, a black mass of enemies poured into the canyon like a wave.

Too many to count.

Their footsteps shook the earth, and their shouts rang out from every direction.

[3238] Hundreds of meters is roughly hundreds to thousands of feet; 100 m is about 328 ft.

"Allahu Akbar!"[3239]

"Brothers and sisters, charge! To the promised land!"

"God's salvation awaits us!"

The fanatics who'd hidden from the eyes of the world were crying out. Ironically, those calling for God's salvation held weapons that brought blood and death.

They're not people like us. They're just enemies we have to bring down.

Choi repeated the thought to himself like a vow. No—every Hunter looking down at them felt the same way.

They'd already seen it. They'd learned it the hard way.

Humans could be more good—or more evil—than any other living creature. Monsters weren't the only things that threatened this world.

Before Demon King Asmodeus descended, those who had brought about countless wars and deaths had been human, too. Humanity had suffered at their hands and learned a lesson it must never forget.

There are monsters with red blood, too.

And the Hunters gathered here existed for one reason. Their sole duty was to hunt those monsters.

Shing.

Blades appeared here and there, their edges glinting coldly.

The Hunters were visibly more exhausted than usual after their battle against the monster horde, but the determination in their eyes was stronger than ever.

Fwoooosh!

The wind grew fiercer. Hearts pounded faster.

Dozens of eagles and griffins angled their enormous wings and plunged toward the ground.

The fanatics' shouts, distant as an echo a moment ago, now thundered in everyone's ears.

"Fight to the last! Don't fall back!"

Choi swallowed. The wind stung his skin. The fanatics surged into the canyon, radiating a madness that seemed almost tangible.

A towering Grand Mage and the Skeleton King, with hundreds of undead at his command, stood in their way. Not one of the fanatics was afraid.

To them, this was a holy war. Even if they died, they would stand beside God as holy martyrs.

These warriors of God had already experienced the miracle of awakening. They kicked off their camels and shot forward at blinding speed.

Three hundred meters.[3240] One hundred.[3241] Fifty.[3242]

[3239] Allahu Akbar is Arabic for "God is greatest."

[3240] 300 m is about 984 ft.

The distance vanished.

And then…

Impact.

Boom! Kaa-boooom!

“Graaagh!”

Flames devoured the darkness.

The vanguard took a direct hit from Magic Johnson’s attack magic and went up in flames, screaming. Other fanatics instantly filled the gap left by the dead and charged the undead without hesitation.

Crunch, craaack!

The canyon wasn’t absurdly narrow, but it wasn’t wide, either. Yet the fanatics the Doppelganger had cultivated over many years broke through the undead battle line at once.

In their hearts and minds, they might already have been monsters. But they were fundamentally different from actual monsters.

They were as strong and clever as any Hunter. Above all, they had two excellent commanders.

“Fallen demons! Wipe them all out!”

“Inshallah.”[3243]

One man rampaged at the front, shouting roughly. An old man watched the battlefield with a composed expression from the rear.

The two stood out even amid the chaos. The moment Choi spotted them, he instinctively grasped how powerful they were.

S-rank Hunters—or should I call them fanatics?

They were beyond what he could handle now.

Strangely, he wasn’t afraid.

The next moment, the old man looked up, and their eyes met. Choi’s resolve didn’t waver.

Shhk. Slice!

The strike came like a flash of light.

A streak of aura shot from the old man’s waist and cleanly severed the neck of Choi’s griffin. The huge flying monster went limp and tipped to one side.

Fwoosh. Rattle!

The wind turned violent, and Choi was thrown about.

But he didn’t panic. Their dive had become a fall, yet for some reason, he found himself smiling.

[3241] 100 m is about 328 ft.

[3242] 50 m is about 164 ft.

[3243] Inshallah is Arabic for “God willing.”

The screams of the other Hunters clinging to the griffin's spine didn't matter. Neither did the way they stared at him as though he'd lost his mind.

I don't regret any of the choices I've made. I'll just fight as hard as I can.

His mind was calm. The sword in his hand felt as light as a feather. Today, he felt he could do anything.

The ground rushed closer, and the shout of a fanatic he didn't know struck his ears.

"For the great God, for the Prophet!"

Choi laughed aloud. Then he spoke.

"For our Alliance Leader."

His voice was low but powerful. It was the signal.

Papat!

Choi Minwoo—and all the Hunters—kicked off the body of the griffin plummeting straight toward the ground and soared away.

Tap.

Choi landed first. The sword in his hand blurred.

Whoosh! Chaaash!

A sharp wind rose from the blade, slicing through the limbs of fanatics rushing him from every side.

A streak of light shot between the bodies collapsing in sprays of blood.

Whoosh—bang!

Choi raised his sword in time to block it, but that was all he could do.

The force drove him back several steps. A low voice reached his ears.

"I thought I recognized that face. Now I know—you're Sky's blood."

The Arab man approached with a sword wrapped in aura, his eyes full of menace.

Amid the chaos, Choi spoke in his heart to someone he couldn't see.

I don't know how long I—or we—can hold out.

But he knew one thing better than anyone.

He had to fight. He couldn't fall before the enemy did.

Even if that enemy was far stronger than him.

Swish.

Choi pointed his sword at the man. The Hero's Sword, imbued with brilliant aura, shone brightly.

The eight hundred or so Hunters who'd dropped from the sky gathered around its light as it spread through the darkness.

"Damn heretics. I'll send you all to hell."

The man vanished from sight, a vicious smile on his face. A sword strike flashed out at the same instant and grazed Choi's neck as he instinctively ducked.

The Skeleton King, who'd been holding off the fanatics swarming from all sides, shot toward the man.

Boom!

Countless roars and screams swept through the canyon. The ground heaved, and the solid bedrock split apart.

The bloodshed and shock of a battle unlike any the canyon had seen in centuries reached the cliffs on either side—even the canyon's center, dozens of meters[3244] beyond its entrance.

And those tiny cracks helped, if only a little, to free someone who should never have escaped.

Thud-thud. Bang!

A bone shard as long as a spear and thicker than one blasted outward. At the same time, new flesh and blood welled up from the severed ends of countless shattered limbs.

Slide. Crack.

Recovery so fast it was impossible to believe, even seeing it firsthand.

No—Regeneration.

The Doppelganger completed its one hundred and forty-fifth resurrection and grinned, baring bloodstained teeth.

"Oh. We're only getting started, and you're tired already?"

Thwack!

A streak of light pierced the space between its eyes instead of answering. The young man holding the spear moved his dry, cracked lips.

"No. I think I've got a little more in me now."

And at that moment—

Ding.

A bell rang out clearly, audible to one person alone.

Right after reaching the Supreme Peak realm, I'd joined the ranks of the superhuman. No one could deny that.

But even superhumans were still human.

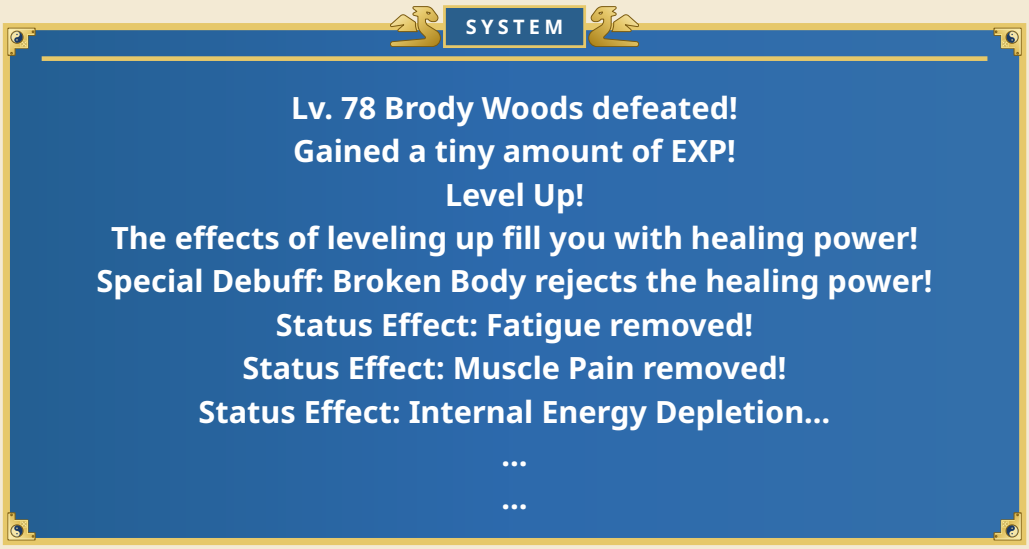
They felt pain when they were hurt, tensed up when they faced someone strong, and eventually grew tired if they kept moving.

I was one of them.

Except for one thing.

Ding.

[3244] One dozen meters is 12 m, about 39 ft.



As System messages appeared one after another, my fading vision cleared.

I felt the fatigue melt away and my internal energy return. I muttered a name.

“Brody Woods. Brody Woods...”

A name I had to remember for the rest of my life. Brody was a hero who’d saved me when I was nearing my limit.

The same went for every one of those victims who’d died twice.

With that in mind...

“Die.”

Slice.

The Doppelganger was staggering to its feet when my spearhead swept through it. Its upper body slid away at an angle.

And at the same time, the sight I’d grown sick of seeing played out before my eyes once again.

Slither.

Blood and flesh welled up at a terrifying speed. The Doppelganger rose whole, looking more relaxed than ever.

“That’s enough. You must be close to your limit by now.”

“Nope. I’m doing fine.”

Thrust!

“You can’t have much left. No need to bluff.”

“I told you, I’m fine.”

Thud, splatter!

“This really is the last—”

“Hey.”

Slice!

Resurrected yet again, the Doppelganger muttered, “What kind of fucking bastard are you...?”

Chapter 816

What the hell was going on?

The Doppelganger couldn't help being baffled. Dying the moment it came back to life was one thing. It had even expected to put up little resistance.

Its limbs had been bound, and Jin Taekyung was stronger than any human it had ever seen.

But there was one thing it couldn't understand.

What is this?

He wasn't getting tired. He just wasn't.

More precisely, whenever he seemed to be tiring, he was suddenly fine again. Even the Doppelganger, sick to death of experiencing death, was starting to curse.

"What kind of fucking bastard is this…?"

Slice!

Before it could finish, a flash of light. A spearhead, driven with precise force and speed, cut across its Adam's apple.

One life faded, and another life and its memories—absorbed long ago—filled the empty space.

What kind of bullshit is this?

The Doppelganger came back to life after a brief moment of pain, its eyelids twitching. A spearhead was already flying toward it.

Whoosh!

A lightning-fast strike.

But this time, the Doppelganger had no intention of going down so easily.

A moment ago, it had been a middling B-rank Hunter. With this resurrection, it was a genuine A-rank Hunter.

One of the top twenty rankers in France, no less.

Jean the Swift.

Recalling the nickname from the memories it had absorbed, the Doppelganger stepped onto the ground with feet that felt unusually light.

Swish.

A breeze skimmed past its chest by a hair's breadth.

Its form wavered like a heat haze, then appeared several meters[3245] back. A relaxed smile spread across its lips. It had dodged without difficulty.

"From here on, things won't be so ea—"

Shwhack! Thunk!

[3245] One meter is about 3.28 ft; several meters is roughly several yards.

A streak of Finger Qi pierced the space between its eyes. Having died without putting up a fight after all, the Doppelganger blinked as it came back to life.

Huh? That's not right.

It hadn't even seen what hit it. At least Jin Taekyung had stopped attacking for a moment, for some reason.

"Huh? What was that just now?"

At the sight of him asking in apparent surprise, the Doppelganger felt sure of itself.

Of course. That last hit must've been pure luck.

From its perspective, the conclusion was only natural.

The Hunter whose life it had just used had ranked among the best in his country. An assassin-type Hunter whose speed had earned him the name Jean the Swift. If he'd decided to dodge from the start, even Michael Silbert would have found him a nuisance.

No matter how special Jin Taekyung is, he can't be that far above Michael Silbert.

But the Doppelganger had no idea what Jin Taekyung's question had really meant.

Jean Pierre? Who's this guy, and why is he worth so much EXP?

He'd never heard the name. The Hunter world might be small, but he couldn't know every foreign Hunter by name unless they were famous worldwide.

Anyway, thank you. Rest in peace.

Jin Taekyung offered his thanks and condolences to the Hunter who'd been absorbed, then raised his lowered spearhead.

That was enough respect for the dead. What he needed to do next was already clear.

Before even more people were sacrificed, he had to copy the EXP—no, completely erase the Doppelganger.

"No time to waste. Let's get one more death in."

Thrust! Crack!

"Gah…!"

With a final cry, another flame of life went out.

The Doppelganger had died more than two hundred times in less than ten minutes. Unease began to show in its eyes.

This can't go on. I underestimated him.

The Doppelganger had greedily devoured countless lives. For more than thirty years, it had absorbed human souls, memories, and powers across the world, becoming something close to immortal.

Its ability was unique even among the countless kinds of monsters in the Demon Realm.

But the Doppelganger knew exactly where its limits lay.

I'm not completely immortal, and I can't combine the powers I've absorbed into one.

A fire dies when it runs out of wood. Thousands of different fragments could be joined together, but they could never become a single whole.

It was an extraordinary ability. But not when measured against the rare few born to wield absolute power.

Like the one who had sent it to this world.

Until every part of the plan is complete, I must never come face-to-face with the target.

Whump!

Its vision went black. Another death—how many now?—cut off the voice echoing in its mind.

Cough.

The Doppelganger came back to life in pain, regret passing over its face.

I should never have gotten close to him.

The reason for its failure was clear.

For more than thirty years, the Doppelganger had enjoyed a freedom it had never known before. After Cheon Taemin disappeared, it had manipulated the world from the shadows.

That freedom and power had gone to its head.

In the Demon Realm, it had been bound to someone else. Here, it was a king in all but name, able to accomplish anything it set its mind to.

The more arrogant the Doppelganger became, the less weight it gave to its orders—and the heavier its own complacency grew.

Michael Silbert?

Even he was only a servant and a tool. His obedience was commendable enough, but when the time came, he would be discarded like any piece that had served its purpose.

The plan had taken a long time to prepare. Now it was only one step from completion.

And yet…

Damn it.

Slice.

Something hot cut across its chest. Pain it still couldn’t get used to seized its whole body.

Hoo.

As death gave way to life again, the Doppelganger let out the breath that had been cut short.

The moment it opened its eyes, someone’s fist filled its vision.

Thwack.

Its vision swam. Only when it came to again did it realize its head had been smashed apart.

It took an involuntary step back and slipped on the brain matter it had spilled moments earlier.

“Internal energy’s wasted on a bastard like you.”

Jin Taekyung’s voice reached its ears. He sounded so calm it was chilling, and the chill stole the Doppelganger’s breath.

A foot slammed down on its chest with tremendous weight and took what little breath remained.

Crack! Crunch! Splatter!

Darkness. Light. Darkness again, without pause.

In fractions of a single second, the Doppelganger died and came back to life several times.

Even freed from its restraints, it fared no better. If anything, a wider variety of deaths and agonies awaited it.

Why? Why the hell?!

It screamed its anger and regret in silence.

Only now did it truly understand its master’s command not to meet the target before the plan was complete.

This man… is different.

He was unlike any human it had absorbed over the years, or any it had watched from afar, licking its lips while taking care not to draw attention.

No. He didn’t seem human at all.

Just like Cheon Taemin.

Whoom! Boom!

With a heavy rush of air, an open palm struck its chest. The force shattered its bones, and the heat within the blow burned its organs.

Cough.

The Doppelganger spat out dead blood and looked at Jin Taekyung through dimming eyes.

Jin’s face blurred as its vision darkened, but the powerful aura pouring from his body was clearer than anything else in the world.

“The C-Chosen One…”

The words slipped out like a groan. Its head drooped limply.

Jin Taekyung’s fist shot toward it like a mace to deliver another death—then touched its forehead as lightly as a blade of grass.

Tap. Fwoosh!

The wind swept around them, unable to keep up with the speed of his punch. Jin Taekyung’s cold gaze settled on the Doppelganger’s new face.

“What did you just say?”

“…!”

The Doppelganger swallowed. It had let the words slip without meaning to. Its consciousness had grown hazy through the endless deaths and resurrections of those few moments.

“I didn’t say anything…”

“Really?”

Grab. Crack!

Before it could finish, its vision went black.

It had lost count of its deaths. Less than half the countless lives that had filled its body remained.

The Doppelganger opened its eyes amid bedrock shattered along with its skull. Regret had given way to fear.

Fear of death itself.

At this rate… I’ll be erased.

Its life was not infinite. To survive, it had absorbed the life force of others and burned it like firewood, just as its kin had once done.

And they, too, were erased forever.

There had been a time when the Doppelgangers held sway over the Demon Realm. But after long years and a brutal purge, it alone had survived out of hundreds of its kind.

That was why “Doppelganger” had become the name of a single being—and why it was called “The Final Abyss.”

I can’t—I can’t be erased. I have to survive!

The Doppelganger gritted its teeth and opened its eyes. New life force and mana filled its body, along with the abilities of the human it had absorbed.

Vrrrrm.

Mana gathered around its fist, coating it in a faint aura. The Doppelganger sprang to its feet and drove a punch toward Jin Taekyung’s face.

Whoosh!

The thunderous rush of air came a moment later. A hard, thick palm blocked its fist.

No—it squeezed it.

Crack.

“…!”

Pain nearly wiped its mind blank.

Its fist had been crushed like tofu. And once again, there was no escaping death.

“Hey, what are you doing?”

Whoom! Boom!

The world turned upside down. Its consciousness returned with a crash loud enough to burst its eardrums.

The Doppelganger revived in the center of a small crater and immediately kicked off the ground.

Away from Jin Taekyung.

I'll survive. Somehow!

It had long since forgotten shame. Jin Taekyung was the "Chosen One" its master had spoken of.

The Doppelganger drew out every bit of power this new life had given it and launched itself away.

Pop!

Its blurred form shot through the air.

Or tried to.

As it took its second step, a streak of light flashed toward it.

Slice!

Its headless body slammed into the ground. Several meters[3246] away, the Doppelganger came back to life, only for a lightning-fast strike to cleave down over its head.

Fwoosh!

A fountain of blood burst from its body, split in two.

Jin Taekyung didn't stop. His heated spearhead cut through the air again and again.

Shh-shh-shhk!

A flash of light cut across its tilting body. Its limbs, chopped into dozens of pieces, hit the ground—and immediately began to grow back at a terrifying speed.

"Gyaaaah!"

The Doppelganger roared as it revived amid that gruesome death. Pain still lingered, gnawing at its senses like insects.

If Jin Taekyung had just used up a considerable amount of internal energy with that last strike, the Doppelganger had to sacrifice a dozen or more lives.

Now it understood. To escape Jin Taekyung, it would have to spend even the lives it had been saving.

Fwooooo.

Vast mana poured over both its hands. Looking at a face he seemed to recognize, Jin Taekyung muttered like a groan:

"Siegfried Bassmann?"

[3246] One meter is about 3.28 ft; several meters is roughly several yards.

Chapter 817

The Doppelganger's new face was all too familiar to Jin Taekyung.

He'd seen it in person only once, shriveled like a mummy. But while investigating Michael Silbert, he'd seen that same face in photographs so many times he was sick of it.

And then there was…

Whoooosh.

That immense magical power, so palpable he could almost reach out and touch it.

He didn't need to check the Level window to know the answer.

"Siegfried Bassmann?"

At Jin Taekyung's muttered question, the Doppelganger snapped its fingers instead of answering.

Crackle.

White light flashed.

The faint current running along its finger became dozens of lightning bolts and came crashing down. It took only an instant.

Zzap!

Blinding light filled Jin Taekyung's vision.

His eyes closed before he knew it, but he could still feel the tremendous current through the rock surrounding him, the air, and the ground. Through everything.

Boom!

The hard rock and earth beneath him split in a spiderweb of cracks.

Jin Taekyung kicked off the ground and shot upward, thrusting out a palm. The heat of Flame Divine Palm burned through the lightning as it surged forward.

KABOOOOOM!

A tremendous blast shook the canyon.

But Jin Taekyung sharpened his sight and caught everything that happened in that brief moment.

The rising flames. The acrid smoke.

And the Doppelganger vanishing like a ghost just before it all erupted.

Blink.

Teleport and Warp were spells for crossing long distances. Blink was short-range movement: disappearing for an instant, just as its name suggested.

Its range was limited. Jin Taekyung's senses and vision, on the other hand, covered the entire canyon.

There.

He couldn't see it. But he could feel it.

Jin Taekyung drew a breath. He trusted his senses and his abilities.

Channeling internal energy through his toes, he stepped on empty air and shot toward the Doppelganger beyond the drifting embers and acrid smoke.

Whoosh! Boom!

The air burst around him, unable to withstand his speed. Smoke and embers scattered as if blown apart, and his vision cleared.

At the end of his path, having become a streak of flame, he found the Doppelganger fleeing toward the followers who could help it.

"…!"

A chill prickled down its back. The Doppelganger turned instinctively, its eyes widening.

In a world that seemed to slow around it, Jin Taekyung was already right in front of it, filling its vision.

How the hell?

Less than a second had passed.

Yet Jin Taekyung had found where Blink had taken it and crossed the dozen or so meters[3247] between them.

You've got to be fucking kidding me…!

The Doppelganger swallowed the curse rising to its lips.

No. It hadn't even had time to curse.

Waste a moment, and it could lose the Grand Mage's power forever—an asset far more precious than all the other lives it had discarded.

Shwaa!

A reddish-hot spearhead tore through the wind. The killing intent that accompanied it was cold enough to freeze the Doppelganger in place.

But the mana and abilities it possessed at that moment belonged to one of only three Grand Mages in the world.

Blin—k!

Fwoosh, boom!

Flames erupted along the spearhead and devoured the empty air.

The Doppelganger appeared a dozen or so meters[3248] away and felt a chill run down its spine.

Because it had barely escaped?

No.

Because a pair of eyes was staring straight at it.

Jin Taekyung.

[3247] A dozen or so meters is approximately 12 m (39 ft).

[3248] A dozen or so meters is approximately 12 m (39 ft).

Their gazes had only met, but its heart sank. An instinct honed over centuries of struggle whispered to it.

Run.

If it didn't want that beast to tear out the back of its neck, it couldn't let its guard down for a moment.

The Doppelganger cast Blink again without pausing. In the next instant, it knew its instinct had been right.

Whoosh! Slice!

It opened its eyes in a new space and let out the breath it had been holding.

The back of its armor, long since stripped of its original shape and purpose, was hot from the heat that had grazed it.

He cut me. He's fast enough to keep up with Blink.

It had escaped by a hair.

A shiver ran through it. Of all the humans it had absorbed or encountered in passing, none had been a monster like this.

Except for the one person it feared—and had deliberately avoided for that reason.

Cheon Taemin.

The savior of humanity.

The only Adversary to face the Demon King Asmodeus with the body and mind of a frail human. A divine man.

The Doppelganger neither denied its fear of Cheon Taemin nor felt ashamed of it.

He was no being it could call "a mere human."

That was why, even after absorbing Siegfried Bassmann years ago and learning of Cheon Taemin's condition, it had never dared to go after him.

But the Doppelganger had never imagined it could feel this much fear of any human other than Cheon Taemin.

Blink, Blink, Blink!

Hesitate, and it might face permanent Erasure.

Desperate, the Doppelganger leaped through space again and again.

Each time its form vanished as if rubbed away by an eraser, it drew closer to the canyon exit, where a fierce battle was underway.

The hunter pursuing it drew closer, too.

Whsssh!

A sharp whistle cut through the air.

A dozen or so daggers flashed toward the Doppelganger's entire body. The attack had been timed and aimed so precisely that it had no chance to cast Blink.

With no other choice, the Doppelganger gritted its teeth and spread both hands.

Vrrrrm, crack!

Its mana shield shattered before it had fully formed. The daggers ricocheted away and buried themselves in the cliffs and ground on either side.

But in the brief time it took to block them, Jin Taekyung had reached it.

“Got you.”

“…!”

Crack!

The Doppelganger had no time to react.

Its mouth fell open as tremendous pain shot through its wrist.

Siegfried Bassmann had been a great Grand Mage in life, but Jin Taekyung’s terrifying strength couldn’t be stopped by any magic in his memories.

Crreeeak!

“Gyaaaah!”

The scream tore from the Doppelganger’s lips.

Jin Taekyung’s grip alone crushed flesh and muscle and splintered bone.

Its vision went white. The sky and ground tilted.

I’m being flipped over. No—I’m going to die.

The Doppelganger knew it instinctively.

After this terrifying feeling of weightlessness would come the impact. Its whole body would be crushed against the ground.

No!

Siegfried Bassmann was the most precious of all the lives it had absorbed.

Hunting a publicly known S-rank Hunter was difficult enough. A Grand Mage was an especially valuable prize, granting it the versatile power of magic.

If I lose magic, I’m finished. I’d rather…!

Fear sent its thoughts racing. Its decision was immediate.

Whoooom!

As it hurtled toward the ground, the Doppelganger drew up mana with all its strength.

Blink!

Flash.

The world slowed.

Space warped by mana swallowed its body. But this time, the amount of mana was different—and so was the spell’s stability.

The Doppelganger fixed its gaze on the battlefield hundreds of meters[3249] away, far beyond Blink’s normal range.

I have to make it.

This crossed a forbidden limit of spatial magic.

[3249] Hundreds of meters is roughly 200–900 m (660–3,000 ft).

But it was better than dying here. The fanatics who worshiped it like a god were there, followers it had spent decades cultivating.

Crreeeak!

Bone and flesh twisted along with space.

The pain felt as though an invisible hand were squeezing its heart until it burst. None of that mattered.

Jin Taekyung.

If it could get out of this monstrous human's grasp…

If it could escape under its followers' protection and carry out the plan it had prepared for so long…

Goodbye. See you next time.

The Doppelganger grinned, baring blood-soaked teeth.

Grrk, whoooosh!

Mana whipped around it like a storm, and warped space swallowed it whole.

Its vision went black. Then new light, noise, and faces washed over it in waves.

Boom! KABOOOOOM!

Shing! Krrrrk!

"Gah!"

"Warriors of God, do not fear death!"

"Go fuck yourselves, you insane fanatics!"

Blasts and screams erupted on every side. Shouts from both sides battered its ruptured eardrums.

But all that mattered to the Doppelganger was that the faces in its blurred vision belonged to its followers.

"W-wait!"

"Prophet!"

Fanatics in turbans spotted it and gathered around. The Doppelganger spat up blood mixed with bits of its entrails, then laughed aloud.

"Cough. Heh-heh…"

Pain?

That was fine. It would recover soon.

Bones throughout its body were shattered, and the left arm Jin Taekyung had grabbed had been torn off at the shoulder. What mattered was that Blink had worked beyond its limits.

An ordinary human would have died.

It had been lucky.

The spell had succeeded because Siegfried Bassmann was a Grand Mage. It had survived the injuries because it was a Doppelganger.

Slide. Crack.

Pale flesh, soft as a child's, slowly grew from the stump of its severed arm. Torn muscles joined, and white bone grew back.

Its recovery was incomparably slower than before. The Doppelganger clicked its tongue bitterly.

Damn it.

The countless lives it had absorbed were running low.

By the time it escaped this place entirely, it might have only a handful left.

But that doesn't matter. I have others willing to die for me.

A sea of fanatics surrounded it.

Smiling to itself, the Doppelganger staggered to its feet.

Fierce fighting raged around the canyon exit, but the rear position it had reached with Blink was peaceful. Plenty of troops remained there.

Including the core force it had taken such care to raise.

"Amir."

At the Doppelganger's low voice, the surrounding fanatics stepped aside.

An old man carrying a staff approached and knelt before it.

"I have been waiting for you, great Prophet."

Wonder filled his face and voice.

The Doppelganger looked down at him with all the authority befitting a prophet.

"God has led me elsewhere, so I must leave ahead of you. Hold back Jin Taekyung and the other heretics with all your strength."

God and Prophet were names that commanded absolute obedience.

But Amir asked again, looking bewildered.

"Jin Taekyung?"

"Why? Are you afraid of him?"

"No. But… hadn't you already subdued him, Prophet?"

The Doppelganger frowned.

"What do you mean? You couldn't have seen what happened."

"Yes. But you personally subdued him and brought him here."

"What?"

The Doppelganger blinked, unable to make sense of it.

Behind it, Jin Taekyung lay facedown as if dead. His eyes slowly opened.

"Uh, fuck. Where the hell am I now?"

"…!"

Chapter 818

“Uh, shit. Where the hell am I now?”

“…!”

The moment Jin Taekyung’s voice reached its ears, the Doppelganger froze like a statue. Two questions sprang to mind.

Why is he here?

Magic manifested according to the caster’s will alone.

And the Doppelganger had, of course, cast Blink on itself alone.

Even a full-blown psychopath with a mind that had spun around thirty-five times wouldn’t do something insane like cast a dangerous movement spell alongside Jin Taekyung—a man who could break the Doppelganger’s neck thirty-six times in the blink of an eye.

There was only one answer.

He interfered with my Blink spell… against my will.

Mana interference.

A theory the scholarly Grand Mage Siegfried Bassmann had developed after years of research surfaced among the memories the Doppelganger had absorbed.

The Doppelganger felt a chill sweep through its entire body. As it watched Jin Taekyung stagger to his feet, a second unanswered question lingered in its eyes.

How? How did he survive?

It could set the mana interference aside. The man was a monster, after all.

Absurd as it was—utterly absurd—perhaps a close-combat Hunter really did possess mana control surpassing even a Grand Mage’s.

But that Blink had been an outrageously dangerous attempt. The Doppelganger itself had nearly been torn apart for breaking the taboo and had sacrificed dozens of lives to heal. What more was there to say?

And yet…

“Ugh, my body’s all numb.”

Hearing Jin Taekyung mumble, the Doppelganger’s mind went hazy for a moment.

Numb? He’s numb?

It was impossible. The Doppelganger felt betrayed. Even if Jin Taekyung were an ogre, shouldn’t he at least have lost an arm or a leg or two, out of basic decency?

His body isn’t made of steel. So how?

The Doppelganger had no idea that Jin Taekyung’s physique—once called the Heavenly Martial Physique in Murim—had long since surpassed its limits, enough to withstand even a Blink spell that broke the taboo.

But it could grasp one truth without knowing why.

Jin Taekyung is weaker now than he's ever been.

The shock set off a long, tangled train of thought. In reality, only a few seconds passed.

And at the end of the suffocating silence pressing down on everything came the Doppelganger's shout, ringing out like a scream.

"Stop him!"

"…!"

"…!"

The silence shattered. At the same time, the world that had momentarily stopped began moving again. The fanatics, who had been staring blankly back and forth between Jin Taekyung and their great Prophet in that slowed-down moment, sprang into action.

"Inshallah!"[3250]

"God is great!"

Whoosh! Fwooooooosh!

Shouts and the whistle of weapons rang out on every side. Looking at the countless flashes hurtling toward him, Jin Taekyung suddenly opened his mouth.

No—he let it all out.

"Ugh. Bwaaaaaagh!"

Vomit sprayed into the air before a drop of blood did.

The price of hitching a ride on Blink was a hellish bout of motion sickness.

I'd tried to hold it in. I'd thought I could.

But life doesn't always go the way you want.

"Bwaaaagh!"

Fuck. I'd been about to say something cool.

Vomit came pouring out instead. Bent over like a grub, I hurriedly rolled across the ground.

Slice! Spurt!

A chill ran through me. I felt a sharp blade cut away a handful of my hair.

As the auras flying in from all sides grazed my body, stinging pain flared across my skin.

After coming all this way, I'm rolling around like a lazy donkey?[3251]

Tears blurred my vision. The one small mercy was that the fanatics hadn't expected this either.

[3250] Inshallah is an Arabic expression meaning "if God wills."

[3251] Narye tagon is an idiom for an undignified evasive roll, likened to a lazy donkey rolling on the ground.

…It’d be weirder if they had.

What kind of lunatic lands in the middle of his enemies and starts vomiting? I fought down the churn in my stomach and swung the thing in my hand.

Thwack!

Flesh and blood flew with a dull impact.

The Prophet’s arm, torn off in the aftermath of the Blink spell, made an excellent club.

“Oh, power attack.”

“You bastard! How dare you profane His sacred flesh—”

“Then let me rephrase. Holy attack.”

Wham! Wham! Wham!

The three nearest fanatics fell like dominoes.

I hurled the ruined arm like an axe, then stamped my foot in the middle of the enemies packed around me.

Thud!

A shock wave rumbled outward. The ground sank for several meters[3252] in every direction, and the fanatics staggered as they lost their footing. Their weapons veered off course with them and swept past my body.

Whoosh! Spurt!

The aura and wind pressure carried by the blades left fine cuts in my skin.

That alone told me how skilled they were.

More than half are B-rank or higher.

And I’d counted hundreds of them. The followers the Doppelganger had raised somewhere in a desolate desert no one could find were a match for the World Hunter Federation’s elite, locked in battle barely a hundred meters[3253] away.

Crazy bastard. No—crazy bastards.

The Doppelganger and its disgusting followers were all shit from the same cesspit.

I swallowed the curses rising in my throat and thrust out both hands.

Fanatics who looked like tanks raised round, enchanted shields across my path. They weren’t enough to stop the ten streaks of Finger Qi I’d fired a step ahead of them.

Fwoosh! Thud-thud-thud!

The wind blew, and ten fanatics fell like reed leaves.

Through the gap that opened for an instant, I caught a glimpse of someone’s back. I’d lost sight of him for a moment.

There you are.

[3252] Several meters is roughly 10–20 ft.

[3253] A hundred meters is about 328 ft.

The glimpse was brief, but I'd seen enough. The bastard was leaving the battlefield.

He was using the countless followers he'd raised as bait, treading across their blood like a carpet as he fled beyond my reach.

Just as he always had. And…

He'll keep doing it.

Too many people had already died.

I still didn't know what plan the bastard had spent more than thirty years building. But I had to bring it down here, today, with my own hands.

If I didn't, my world—and the people in it—would fall apart.

"You won't get past—!"

Crack. Thud-thud!

I broke the neck of the fanatic blocking my way and used his body to shield myself from an arrow flying in from ahead.

Its mana-infused head punched through the corpse, grazed my cheek, then lodged in the eye of another fanatic nearby.

"Gyaaaaaah!"

Blood sprayed as he screamed in pain. Moments later, a cold slicing sound cut the scream short.

Slice.

A red line crossed the fanatic's neck. A heavy voice, announcing his death, rang out.

"Hassan. Brave warrior of God. We shall meet again in the Kingdom of Heaven, far in the future."

Thud.

The screaming stopped. His head fell.

His body crumpled like a scarecrow and never moved again. Only then did faint beads of blood begin to gather on the cut surface of his neck.

This is…

Even after facing countless powerful fighters, I couldn't help being astonished by the skill. I stopped and looked at the speaker, eyes wide.

Among the fanatics surrounding me stood a sturdy old man, tall as an iron tower, looking straight at me.

"This is the first time we've met face to face, Jin Taekyung, king of the wicked heretics."

His turban was wrapped so carefully that not a strand of hair escaped it. His back was straight, his gaze deep and still.

I'd sensed it from the moment I opened my eyes here: the old man was immensely powerful.

Not merely as one of the Awakened known as Hunters in the modern world, but as a martial artist in his own right.

And I knew instinctively that if the Doppelganger was the untouchable symbol the fanatics revered, this old man was their real commander-in-chief and the heart of their fighting force.

"Yahya Muhammad Ahmad Bedouin… Did I get that right? That's one hell of a long name."

As I read aloud the information in the holographic window floating above his head, the old man's eyes widened in surprise.

"How do you know my name?"

"God told me, you crazy old bastard."

"Nonsense. God would never tell such a thing to the king of the wicked heretics."

"You're the one talking nonsense. I'm an atheist, so I'm not a heretic—and I'm definitely not a king."

"Do not deny the existence of the great God with your vile tongue, demon."

"Come on, sir. It's time to take your pills."

Slide. Thump.

His robe slipped from his shoulder and spread over the ground.

Holding a crooked staff in one hand and a scimitar—what Murim would call a curved saber—in the other, the old man stepped forward. The air grew cold, and the ring around me tightened.

Step. Sssssss.

Killing intent from every direction made my whole body prickle.

It wasn't just the old man in front of me. I could see more than thirty men in black, wrapped head to toe in black robes and turbans, scattered among the fanatics.

Those are the real deal.

Every one of them was skilled enough to hold their own anywhere in the world. And unlike Hunters who weren't used to killing other people, they showed no hesitation at all.

Seasoned killers.

Perhaps it wasn't my imagination that I saw the martial artists of Dark Heaven superimposed on them.

They were alike in their blind loyalty and faith in one being, and even more so in their willingness to do any terrible thing for that being.

And…

I've killed countless people like them.

There were too many people in the world who needed killing. That was all.

Deep down, I had a vague sense that an absolute being called God might exist in this world. But I didn't believe in him or pledge my loyalty to him.

In the end, people were the ones who accomplished things through hardship. Like countless others, I'd survived that way.

But if that god was the one who'd slipped a beat-up capsule to someone who'd suddenly lost his job a year ago—to a young man climbing a steep alley, worried about how he'd get through this month… Well, in that case, I might be willing to believe in him a little.

"Then your deaths at my hands will be God's will, too."

I muttered the words and closed my hand around empty air. Where there had been nothing but air and dust, my fingers caught a spear that had been away from my side for a while.

The old man saw something even magic couldn't explain, and a stubborn crease formed between his brows.

"Demon. You truly are a demon."

I wanted to tell the old man in front of me, and the fanatics all around us, that the real demon was running away and leaving them behind. That the monster they called a prophet was racing toward a new catastrophe.

Instead, I stepped forward. The wind burst, space vanished, and I charged.

Whoosh.

A scorching wind swept away the darkness. White Flame's spearhead traced a path no one could block.

Slice—KRRRUNCH!

A thick mist of blood settled over everything.

Chapter 819

Fanatics and Hunters.

The battle between two forces, waged around the canyon, could be summed up in four characters:

Advance and retreat.

The fighting was that fierce, and everyone on both sides had put their lives on the line.

Some fought for a faith they had held all their lives, one they could not even imagine was false. Others fought for convictions just as firm.

And so they fought.

It was a clash of faith and conviction, and at the same time, a holy war.

But amid so much blood and death, whether anyone was religious no longer mattered.

Demons.

They were human beings with the same appearance, but each held a different standard for good and evil. Their eyes met between the blades lunging toward one another, burning with murderous intent.

“Die!”

Clang!

Sword met saber. Blue sparks flew with a sharp screech. Blood spurted amid ragged shouts, impossible to tell who had cried out.

Slice—shaaak!

No scream followed. The fanatic, his throat cut, glared at the Hunter before him with venom in his eyes, then collapsed.

Blue light flashed above the fallen body.

“Watch out!”

Whoosh! Boom!

A warning shout mingled with the roar of impact. A tank stared at the arrowhead protruding halfway through his enormous tower shield, inches from his face, and swallowed.

If he’d raised his shield just a fraction later, he would have died.

But Hunters lived closer to death than anyone. Everyone here had survived countless brushes with it.

The tank grabbed the arrow and snapped it in two, then shouted in a hoarse voice.

“They’re coming! Hold formation!”

Rumble!

Countless flashes rained down. Sharp blades and heavy clubs struck, and even fanatics on the verge of death forced themselves upright and charged.

The impacts hammered the shields so hard that even veteran tanks, hardened by years of combat, thought they might die.

“Arrrgh!”

Grit.

They shouted to wring out the last of their strength and clenched their teeth until they felt ready to break. Their feet slid backward under the pressure, carving deep furrows in the ground.

“Hold the line! If we break, it’s over!”

Even the commanders’ shouts seemed distant.

The enemy had an overwhelming advantage in numbers.

Less than three hours had passed since the battle against the monster army. That fight had drained them in body and mind, and the fanatics were the worst opponents they could have faced now.

Ten thousand of them.

They kept charging even after their chests were cut open or their limbs were severed.

Decades ago, the Doppelganger had raised these fanatics somewhere in this barren desert, hidden from the world, under the name of the Prophet. They were monsters of another kind.

Thrust!

A sword bearing a faint aura pierced a fanatic’s chest and emerged from his back.

It was a grievous wound. Even if he used a potion right away, there was no telling whether he’d live or die. Yet the fanatic whose chest had been pierced bared his blood-soaked teeth and smiled.

“I-Inshallah[3254]…”

“…!”

The madness in that fading voice made the Hunter freeze.

A chill swept over him. By the time he came to his senses, it was too late.

Whoosh!

A sharp whistle cut past his ear. At the same instant, his vision went dark.

Slump. Thud.

“Hans! Hans!”

The Hunter who caught his falling comrade bit his lip.

But the man who had saved his life time and again—and whose life he had saved in turn—did not answer.

[3254] Inshallah is Arabic for “if God wills.”

The dagger lodged squarely between Hans's eyes had taken his voice and his life.

Goddammit.

The Hunter laid down the body, his gaze darkening.

The canyon was an ideal battlefield for facing a larger force, but no matter how efficiently they fought, casualties were unavoidable.

Especially against madmen who saw death as martyrdom.

It was just as their ranks were about to crumble before the wave of fanatics charging without regard for their lives—

Fwoosh.

A fierce heat washed over everyone's heads.

Before anyone could look up, fire came pouring down like a meteor shower with a fierce whistle.

Whooooooosh!

Dozens of fireballs appeared above the Hunters and fell toward the battlefield, toward the fanatics who charged without end.

As everyone stared, mouths open, one name flashed through their minds.

Magic Johnson.

The Grand Mage said to have been blessed by mana. The world's greatest War Mage, whose power had been proven during the Great Cataclysm, was finally showing what he could do.

A powerful area spell that could turn the tide of battle.

That's it. With that…

Every Hunter thought the same thing. No—they were certain.

With Jin Taekyung nowhere to be seen, Magic Johnson was their surest bet to lead them to victory.

At least, they were certain until blue waves surged up from parched land that held nothing but sand and stone in every direction.

"Aqua Storm!"

"Aqua Storm!"

"Aqua Storm!"

Fwooooooosh!

Dozens of voices rang as one. Spheres of water piled upon spheres of water and rose into an enormous tidal wave.

And then…

BOOM!

A roar like the sky splitting apart shook the air.

Water and fire. Fire and water.

The opposing forces met and mingled. Then they collided.

With a shockwave that shook everything within a radius of hundreds of meters[3255], they exploded above the heads of the Hunters and fanatics.

Fwoosh! Boom-boom!

“Gyaaaah!”

“M-My God!”

Someone screamed from beyond the steam that swept through the area on the wind.

The thick steam blinded everyone to what had happened. But Magic Johnson, who had cast the spell, knew better than anyone.

His magic had been canceled out.

Blocked. Almost completely.

Only almost because part of his Fire Storm had engulfed some fanatics. Even so, he could tell the damage was far less than he had expected.

They were ready for it.

Magic Johnson had seen them clearly: thirty mages emerging under heavy guard.

Their turbans were pulled low. Every last one was A-rank and, like him, a War Mage specialized in combat.

The Doppelganger…

Magic Johnson swallowed a groan.

He didn’t need to wonder who had built the force before him.

The Great Cataclysm had been a time of immense chaos. Thirty years was long enough for nature itself to change, and the desert must have been the perfect place to hide something.

How the Doppelganger had gathered and trained them was not what Magic Johnson wanted to know.

His question went to the beginning and end of it all.

What do you want badly enough to have prepared all this?

But his question reached no one. Even if the Doppelganger had known what he was thinking, it would not have answered.

No—it would not even have had time.

At that very moment, the Doppelganger was leaving the battlefield with a small escort.

I have to chase it. I can’t let it get away.

But despite his determination, Magic Johnson couldn’t move easily.

Unlike monsters, the fanatics were thoroughly trained. They knew what mattered most in this battle.

[3255] One meter is about 3.28 ft.

They had more than ten times the Hunters' numbers and used them to attack in rotating waves.

And…

"Stop them! Those two must not get through!"

"Open fire!"

Magic Johnson and the Skeleton King.

The fanatics concentrated their attacks on the two strongest members of the Hunters' force—the two who could also be called its commanders.

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh!

Boom-boom!

Arrows and magic rained down. Even a Grand Mage like Magic Johnson could not afford to ignore the attacks coming without pause from every direction.

He had already spent a great deal of his stamina and mana. The fanatics, by contrast, kept drawing on their strength as they cried out for a holy war.

The Skeleton King was in much the same position.

Slice. Slice. Slice!

His Bone Sword swept in smooth arcs.

But before the bodies crumpling in sprays of blood could hit the ground, dazzling flashes cut through them and shot toward him.

"This is insane…!"

The Skeleton King was aghast. Since coming into this world, he had never encountered people this crazy.

Much less ten thousand of them.

They're insane. Completely insane.

He wielded the power of death, yet the endless wave of fanatics was nearly enough to overwhelm even him.

Every human feared death. Even he, an Undead Monster, feared Erasure. That fear seemed as inevitable as being born.

So why weren't these humans afraid to die?

No—what had made them this way?

They're the real monsters…

Thrust-thrust-thrust!

Swallowing a groan, he swung his Bone Sword and cut through a human body.

When he took one down, three more came. When he took down three, ten came. And when he felled those, fanatics rushed in from every direction, swinging their weapons.

"Die, demon!"

Crunch!

A blade cut through him with a chilling sound. Naturally, he felt no pain.

The Skeleton King sighed at the sword piercing his chest.

“Who are you calling a demon?”

Whoosh—thrust!

He turned his wrist. A bone shard shot out and pierced his attacker’s throat.

With a gurgling sound, the fanatic fell. The Skeleton King kicked him hard, clearing some space. At that moment—

Whoom.

A dark shape came flying toward him with a heavy whistle. He caught it in a hurry.

It coughed up blood. A human, still alive.

And one he knew.

Goddammit. This guy…

There was no mistaking him, even covered head to toe in blood.

The Skeleton King raised an Undead Monster with what little magical power he had left, then tapped the man’s cheek.

“Hey. Human with a fine-looking build. Can you hear me?”

Cough. Choi Minwoo spat up blood again, then answered in a voice on the verge of fading.

“Yes. Very clearly.”

“Good. We’re short on time, so listen carefully. You’re not going to die, so don’t worry. And even if you do, I’ll bring you back as an undead, so don’t—dammit. He passed out.”

The Skeleton King clicked his tongue and stood. Then he added, almost as an afterthought, “Still, he held out remarkably well, all things considered. Don’t you think?”

Whoooosh! Slice!

An aura swept past the Skeleton King’s head in place of an answer.

He watched blond hair flutter through the air, muttered a string of curses, then faced forward. Through the thick steam, he saw a man.

“Not at all. That bastard is trash.”

His hair was disheveled, and a wound crossed his cheek.

The Skeleton King gave a quiet laugh at the fury in the man’s eyes.

“No matter how I look at it, he fought well. When he wakes up, I’ll have to praise him myself.”

“Shut your filthy mouth, cursed demon.”

“When you die, you’ll find out which of us was the demon.”

The Skeleton King pulled the hilt of the sword from Choi Minwoo’s hand. Sacred light spread along the blade of the [Hero’s Sword].

“Get in here, quick. Before someone scarier than me shows up.”

Chapter 820

Everything alive is born into a struggle.

Humans, monsters, animals in the wild or behind fences, even green plants—all of them.

Even when survival itself wasn't the reason to struggle, you had to fight and take what you wanted.

And under this absolute law, I was no exception.

Crunch!

Minimum force. Minimum speed.

That was enough. I twisted aside, leaving behind a fanatic who collapsed with his brains spilling out.

Whoosh!

The air split. A flash dropped from empty space and skimmed past me by half a handspan.[3256]

Between the pitch-black robe and turban that covered him completely, I saw his eyes widen. The White Flame's spearhead was reflected in them.

Thump. Splurt!

His head flew up. More enemies and their auras surged through the spraying blood.

As blades came at me from every direction, I tightened my grip on the blood-slick spear shaft.

Hoo.

I breathed out. The world slowed. My muscles loosened, and the flames coiling around my spearhead flickered.

Like a tail fluttering in the wind.

Fire Dragon's Single Tail.

Flames surged. The enemies' auras flashing from every direction drove away the darkness racing toward the dim dawn.

I turned, my whole body moving in one smooth motion.

Shiiiiing!

Blue-white flames swept across the space between us. They were faster than any aura bearing down on me, their edge too sharp for anyone to stop.

Slice.

With a clean, cold sound, a sword tilted in its wielder's hand.

[3256] A ppyeom, or handspan, is the distance from an outstretched thumb to little finger. It varies by person; half a handspan is roughly 10 cm (4 in).

No—faint lines had already appeared across the bodies of dozens of fanatics, frozen in place.

“Ghk. Ghrk…”

Trembling pupils. A fading voice.

But no words or actions could stop death from bearing down without mercy.

Fwooooooosh!

Flames raced along the faint lines, devouring their lives.

Thick sprays of blood mist blanketed the steam hanging low over the battlefield.

Thud-thud-thud!

Blood rained down on my head.

At the same time, flesh, bones, and organs—torn apart by a single horizontal strike—tumbled across the ground. Hundreds of fanatics had already fallen the same way.

“De…mon…”

Someone’s voice reached my ears. Of course, it belonged to one of the fanatics, someone whose face and name I didn’t know—and an enemy I had to kill.

Pfft!

I thrust out a hand without looking. Finger Qi shot from it, and a familiar bell rang.

Ding.

Another notification of death.

The fanatics surrounding me stopped moving.

Most of them probably couldn’t understand even a quarter of what they’d just seen.

How their comrades had died. Why they couldn’t wound me, even with so many fighters.

They would die with those questions unanswered.

All except one.

Whoom. Boom!

My spearhead struck the crescent curve of a saber.

The impact made my ears ring. I’d blocked the attack before I heard it coming. Now I stared past the white scimitar’s blade at the old man holding it.

“You lousy old bastard. Finally crawled out, did you?”

“I was waiting for my prey to tire.”

The old man with the long name, Yahya Muhammad Ahmad Bedouin, twisted his scimitar as he answered.

Ka-ga-gak!

Auras of different colors collided, sparking like lightning. A small explosion waited at their tips.

Boom!

The impact roared like cannon fire and traveled down my spear.

Its force drove me backward. The old man hadn't moved an inch, and the sight made me realize something.

"Don't tell me…"

"You've finally understood, King of the heathens."

A smile formed on his wrinkled lips.

Two entirely different energies, neither of which he'd revealed until now, coexisted along the scimitar's blade pointed at me.

Mana. And magical power.

As those two words crossed my mind, the old man continued.

"I, Yahya Muhammad Ahmad Bedouin, am a warrior chosen by God."

"Huh."

A hollow laugh escaped me.

The Doppelganger hadn't raised only Michael Silbert. It had chosen its most loyal, most insane fanatic and taught him to wield magical power.

If more fanatics had been capable of accepting those two opposing energies, the Doppelganger would've churned out half-human, half-demon monsters like they were coming off an assembly line.

"I knew you were out of your mind from the start…but you're no ordinary crazy old bastard."

"If that is what you wish to believe, then believe it."

The old man shook his head and looked at me with gray eyes.

"You know nothing. Dozens, hundreds died trying to be chosen by God. But I alone survived."

"So being 'chosen by God' just means mixing a human and a monster half and half? Does that make a half-and-half order of black-bean noodles and spicy seafood noodles a warrior of God too?"

"The great Prophet said that monsters, too, are God's creations—calamities sent to punish the fallen humans of this world."

"Bullshit. Anyone listening would think you lived in some other world, not this one. By your logic, you're one of those fallen humans too, you crazy old bastard."

"Though fallen, I was given a chance at salvation. I inherited two powers that can never coexist. That is who I am: a warrior and a punisher chosen by God."

The madness in his faith came through with every word.

But a madman doesn't know he's talking crazy.

Even if the Doppelganger gathered every fanatic in one place and made a public apology to the entire nation, they wouldn't believe it.

Their faith was their whole life, their reason for living. It was even bound up with what they believed awaited them after death.

In the end, there was only one thing I could say to fanatics like them.

"You fucking lunatics. Talking to you is a waste of time."

"Remember one thing."

Step.

The old man came toward me. The fanatics who had faltered found their fighting spirit again.

"Your steps will never reach the Prophet."

"Fuck off."

Whoosh.

I shot forward like the wind as I answered.

Our brief exchange had given my body time to recover from the strain of battle. It had also given me time to assess the situation.

It's even. Fierce, but we're holding our own.

The Hunters' shouts, which had been distant, were drawing closer.

But to overcome odds of more than ten to one and win, we had to cut off the head.

It was the best thing I could do before chasing the Doppelganger, which was still fleeing.

Thwack! Crunch!

My spear drove through three fanatics and came free.

Without hesitation, the old man threw his subordinates in as bait and swung his scimitar at my neck.

Whoosh! Slice!

I bent at the waist. The slash missed me and cut apart the fanatics charging from behind.

The old man sprang back, ready for my counterattack, and shouted in a cold voice.

"That demon means to harm the great Prophet! Give your lives to stop him!"

Damn old bastard.

He might've been the most fanatical of the fanatics, but the experience he'd gained over the years was no joke.

He knew exactly what his job was, and he kept his head even in the heat of battle.

If this drags on any longer…I'll really lose him for good.

As I cut down the fanatics rushing in from every direction like moths to a flame, I thought. No—I calculated.

How much strength I could muster right now.

How to end this fight as quickly as possible.

And how much I'd have left when I could finally chase the Doppelganger again.

Then, amid the unending blood and screams, I realized I'd been thinking about something stupid.

Fuck. When did I start calculating every little thing?

When had it started? Every moment had become a struggle.

Each time, I'd had to forget the past and put the future out of my mind.

That was how you survived. Only by betting everything on the present could you think about the past and move toward the future.

Slice!

Hot pain ran down my back. My exhausted body felt as heavy as waterlogged cotton. Weapons came at me like gears turning together, large and small, opening wounds all over me.

But because of that, my hesitant body and mind woke up completely.

Grit.

I clenched my teeth against the pain and hurled the spear I held in a reverse grip at the fanatics charging straight at me.

The space was too tight for a proper throw, but one step was all I needed.

Cr-r-runch!

Flesh and blood were crushed. They screamed with pain enough to make them forget their faith.

The old man's command rang out through their cries.

"Now!"

Now? Now what?

Oh. My weapon?

"So what?"

I spat out the blood running between my lips and reached out. The Flame Divine Palm I'd held back for the sake of an efficient fight erupted.

The fanatics packed around me went down in flames.

At the sight of their comrades writhing in agony, the others faltered.

One more.

Fwoosh—BOOM!

Blue-white flames lit the darkness. They burned flesh and turned the blood and bones within it to ash.

"Aaaaaagh!"

"Hng…!"

That was when it happened.

One fanatic, who had unconsciously stepped backward before that cruel, dazzling sight of a mass execution by fire, suddenly had his head fly into the air.

Slice!

The sound of the cut came a moment later. The old man, who had slipped out of my sight, gave a cold command.

“Fire.”

Whoooooosh!

Dozens of arrows whistled through the air, one after another.

By the time I spotted the archers and their dark bows through the thinning ranks of fanatics, it was too late.

Thud-thud-thud!

“Guh!”

“Ghk.”

The arrows rained down without regard for friend or foe.

The fanatics hesitating around me fell like straw. Mana-laden arrows pierced their bodies and kept coming toward me.

Whoosh.

The whistle of their flight seemed to stretch on and on.

Dark arrowheads wrapped in blood and mana.

As the world slowed, one thought came to me with absolute certainty.

I can’t dodge this.

Of course, I could knock aside half of them. Of the rest, I could somehow twist my body to evade half.

But the Fire Dragon Armor hadn’t finished repairing itself. I would still have to take some damage.

But why?

A strange feeling came over me.

My instincts seemed to reject the judgment my mind had made.

A strange sense of déjà vu ran through me, as though every part of me were taking another step into an unknown realm.

I can do this.

A strange certainty, like a conviction, took over my body and mind. An inexplicable tickling sensation began around the center of my chest and spread through my entire body.

Right now.

I reached out as if in a trance, toward the dozens of arrows almost at my face.

No—not just the arrows. Everything around them.

Shhhhaaa.

Time began to move again, but no one spoke.

I stared silently at the arrows stopped in midair, then snapped my fingers.

Swish.

The arrows pointed toward the enemy. And once again, the power of my newly advanced Middle Dantian pressed down on the space around us.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

As the clear chimes pierced my ears, I smiled at the old man, frozen like a statue.

“Whoa. It worked?”

“T-This is—!”

“Refund, you fucking bastard.”

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh-whoosh!

The arrows’ powerful whistle swallowed the words he was about to say.

Chapter 821

The moment dozens of arrows stopped in midair, the old man doubted his own eyes.

Magic?

No. That couldn't be.

Mages and warriors shared the same root—mana—but their trunks and branches grew in entirely different directions.

That was why a Spellblade was considered as impossible as the coexistence of mana and magical power. Perhaps even more so.

But if it isn't magic, how…?

The old man had long since reached the realm of the superhuman.

In his youth, he had ranged across battlefields amid the turbulent politics of the Middle East, protecting his tribe. Then, as the Great Cataclysm began in his middle age, he awakened to a power he had never known existed.

Even without accepting magical power, he would have been strong enough to stand shoulder to shoulder with the heroes of the Great Cataclysm.

That made what he was seeing all the harder to believe.

There was a clear, undeniable limit to what a warrior like him could move using mana.

And those are arrows. Dozens of them, fired from close range.

The unit waiting in the rear was made up of elite troops he had personally trained—swords and shields he had saved for the most crucial moment.

Yet the arrows those very troops had loosed had been stopped.

No—they were under control.

Dozens of arrows, shot with tremendous force and filled with mana, controlled by a single gesture.

Whoooosh.

The air stopped. The wind, thick with the stench of blood, vanished.

In that space where everything else seemed to have disappeared like a desert mirage, the wave of steel pouring toward one man turned.

Swish.

Dozens of arrowheads glinted in the darkness, their mana still intact. They pointed toward the men who had shot them. And…

"Wow. It actually worked."

They were ready to obey the will of their new master.

Jin Taekyung.

The old man stared at the young man smiling beneath a coating of blood and clenched his teeth without meaning to.

A groan slipped through his bloodless lips.

“Th-This is…!”

What is this? What have you done?

He wanted to ask, but the young man did not wait for an old fool blinded by false faith to find his words.

“Refund, you fucking bastard.”

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh!

A fierce whistle of air shattered the silence. Hundreds of fanatics surrounding them watched the unbelievable sight with vacant eyes.

As if an invisible giant had drawn a bowstring, dozens of steel arrows came raining down, faster and harder than before.

All aimed at one man.

The old commander-in-chief who led the fanatics.

“Block—!”

Boom!

The unfinished shout vanished beneath a small explosion.

A sword swung to knock the arrows aside flew into the air, along with its wielder’s arm.

“Gaaah!”

The scream came a moment later. Then dozens of streaks of light swept in, cutting through and smashing everything in their path.

Grit.

The metallic taste of blood filled the old man’s mouth.

He had bitten his lip hard enough to draw blood without noticing. He brought down his scimitar, unleashing a murky force of mingled magical power and mana.

Whoooooom!

The immense wind pressure rushing off the blade pushed back the arrows flying in from the front.

Jin Taekyung had been surrounded, forced to face arrows coming from every direction. The old man, by contrast, had fanatics around him willing to die to stop the arrows.

Perhaps that was why he stepped forward at once, turning to the offensive. Why he trusted the dozens of followers surrounding him like shields.

The next moment, that trust vanished.

Whish.

At the faint whistle of air, the old man’s eyes widened.

Arrows were flying toward him, weaving around the fanatics as though they were alive.

This is impossible…!

A cry like a scream rose to his tongue, then disappeared. No—he wasn't even given time to let it out.

He sucked in a breath and swung his scimitar. As streaks of light filled the air around him, he knew.

Damn it.

Unlike Jin Taekyung, he could not escape this attack.

Crack!

Arrows caught in the scimitar's path bent and broke.

But even the old man, who had reached the superhuman realm, could not deflect or dodge them all.

Thud-thud-thud!

"Guh!"

Blood spilled through his clenched teeth. His vision blurred, and pain struck all through his body.

Ribs. Legs. Chest. Back.

He felt arrowheads pierce armor and flesh and shatter bone. The heat they carried seeped deep into his organs.

"Cough."

His once-sturdy legs trembled. As the old man staggered, more than ten arrows buried deep in his body, the fanatics supporting him shouted like they were screaming in despair.

"No!"

"Amir! Amir! Please, stay with us!"

"What are you waiting for? Get him somewhere safe!"

The fanatics, finally grasping what had happened, were more shaken than ever.

If the Doppelganger, calling itself the Prophet, was their spiritual pillar, the old man was the warrior chief favored by God—the general who led them.

A voice pierced their ears like a spike.

"Who said you could?"

"…!"

"…!"

The shock hit like a bucket of cold water.

Heavy footsteps advanced.

"I asked you. Who said you could move?"

The voice was low. The face above it was worn with fatigue.

But the fanatics stepping backward without realizing it saw none of that. In their wide eyes, there was only one thing:

The flames flickering in his gaze.

“Did all you bastards eat a load of dates together? Not one of you can answer me.”

His blood-crusted lips twitched. Jin Taekyung smiled and reached out, and an immense, invisible force pressed down on the space around them.

No—it ruled it.

Hssssss.

The air stopped. The wind scattered.

Jin Taekyung felt an intangible force welling up from his chest, from his Middle Dantian.

Everything within a radius of dozens of meters[3257] already belonged to him. The hundreds of fanatics staring at him in shock were invaders. Demons defiling not just this land, but the entire world.

No. To you, I’m the demon.

Jin Taekyung looked down at the frozen fanatics with disgust.

He did not want to kill them. He only wanted peace.

He was no Killing Ghost, forever thirsting for blood. Whenever another Hunter who had united with the others under one banner for the sake of the world fell, he felt pain and sorrow.

But…

In the end, this too was a struggle for each side’s purpose.

To gain peace, they had to wage war. And in that war, rivers of blood and death would flow.

There was no other choice.

“It’s too late to turn back now. For me and for you.”

As Jin Taekyung’s quiet voice rang out—

Roooooom.

The still air and wind stirred again.

At that same moment, the old man got back to his feet. Magical power had given him a recovery beyond anything human, but waiting for him was a mass of steel filling the air.

“This is…”

He could not finish. No one could have.

All they could do was stare.

Spears. Sabers. Swords. Axes. Countless arrows and fragments of broken blades.

[3257] Dozens of meters is roughly 20–90 m, or about 66–295 ft.

The wave of steel had left its dead former owners behind and taken a new master. It surged through the air, cold edges glinting as each weapon turned toward its target.

At the center of it all stood Jin Taekyung.

“Any last words?”

The old man sighed at the impossible sight. A murky force, neither monster nor human, overflowed from the scimitar in his hand.

“Inshallah.”

May it be God’s will.

With that prayer ringing in his heart, the old man stepped forward alone.

He left behind his followers, paralyzed with fear and waiting for death. He went forward with the duty and pride of a warrior chosen by God.

And yet, why?

Is this—is this really what God wanted?

For the first time, the old man who had believed in God and the Prophet more than anyone felt doubt.

But even now, as he charged like a streak of light and watched the rain of steel pour from the sky, brimming with lava-hot mana, he couldn’t find an answer.

Answer me. Is this truly the promised land you spoke of?

But the old man’s god did not answer.

It never had, from the distant past until now. And it seemed it never would.

Only a faint voice reached his ears. He could not tell whether it belonged to a god or a demon.

“Die, old man.”

Fwoooosh!

A gale swept through. A wave of steel, falling in place of damp rain, swallowed him.

As his body and power—part monster, part human—were smashed to pieces, the old man heard a terrible scream echoing faintly.

“Gaaah!”

His vision darkened. His consciousness scattered. The warriors of God met their brutal end.

Ah.

At last, he knew the answer to his question.

This was not the promised land. It was the land of death.

Thud.

His lifeless body crumpled to the ground.

Though he had found the answer in his final moment, the old man’s face was twisted with anger and disbelief.

It happened in an instant.

Weapons swinging at one another stopped in midair. Shouts forced from hoarse throats cut off.

Every head turned in the same direction.

Fwaaaash!

It was a roar and a scream at once.

A scream of steel raining through the air. And a scream of terror from people who sensed their own deaths.

Kwaaaang!

Dust billowed upward. Through sand surging like a whirlwind, streams of blood spurted like fountains.

Splash—splat!

Dozens of meters[3258] away, fanatics stared blankly at the sight and blinked.

Blood rained onto their heads and ran down in sticky streams, along with something hard and something soft.

It did not take long to realize what had fallen on them: human bone and flesh.

“Ah… ah…”

Their hands and feet trembled. The clatter of teeth spread among the fanatics like an epidemic.

They all knew that carefully chosen elite troops had been waiting in the far rear with the commander-in-chief, ready to join the fight.

Now that was a fact of the past.

Annihilation.

Everyone on the battlefield understood instinctively.

No one could survive the storm of steel raging there.

No—there was one person who could.

Jin Taekyung.

As the name surfaced in every mind—

Kwaaaaa.

The whirlwind slowly settled. Within it, someone’s silhouette wavered like heat haze.

[3258] Dozens of meters is roughly 20–90 m, or about 66–295 ft.

Chapter 822

In the wake of the Great Cataclysm, the boundary between what humanity considered common sense and nonsense crumbled like a sandcastle.

Awakened people, monsters, magic, Gates.

Things that had existed only in novels and movies became reality.

Calamity became a neighbor, and the word death came cheap.

But humans are adaptable creatures.

They quickly accepted the unbelievable reality before them and made the impossible their new normal.

They thought nothing like it would ever happen again in human history.

No—they hoped it wouldn't. Please.

But at this very moment, in an unnamed canyon in the Rub' al Khali Desert, those who had been piling up blood and bodies without end had no choice but to admit it.

The common sense they had accepted had crumbled once more.

Roooooar.

The rain of steel lashing through the darkness stopped. The whirlwind that had seemed ready to swallow the entire desert slowly died away.

Amid the silence and shock that gripped them all, thousands of eyes settled on the figure who had emerged.

"Oh my God."

"What the hell did I just see?"

The Hunters stared in awe and elation.

"He's a demon. He has to be."

"Inshallah.[3259] God…"

The fanatics trembled with fear and hatred.

And among all the people gathered there, the one being who wasn't human spat out the one word they had all wanted to say.

"Monster."

The Skeleton King's mouth curled as he looked at the man before him.

"I told you, didn't I? Let's finish this before someone scarier than me shows up."

"…!"

The man's eyes widened. His hair was disheveled, and wounds large and small covered his body.

He had already been struggling against the Skeleton King, but now his injuries were the last thing on his mind.

[3259] Inshallah is an Arabic expression meaning "if God wills."

“How… How can anyone do that?”

The man muttered in a dazed voice.

His bulging eyes stared past the whirlwind, at the blood and corpses it had left behind.

A thousand.

There had been a thousand warriors waiting in the rear.

The finest of the elite, held in reserve for the final blow. And with them, Amir—their greatest warrior and commander.

No. He had been with them.

Until that enormous whirlwind of steel swept them away.

They’re all dead? Killed by one man?

It was impossible to believe. Impossible to understand.

The man’s hand trembled around his sword hilt. A groan escaped through his clenched teeth.

“Th-That’s impossi—”

“Possible.”

His wavering voice cut off.

The Skeleton King had severed his words like a guillotine blade. He went on evenly.

“Jin Taekyung can do it.”

“Shut your mouth!”

The man’s furious roar split the desert. He glared at the Skeleton King, his eyes blazing.

Shhhhh.

Immense killing intent and aura rose from him, swallowing the space around him.

An ordinary Hunter would have struggled even to breathe beneath that pressure. The Skeleton King didn’t so much as blink.

To the undead, killing intent was more familiar than anything else.

Simply by existing, he was already in contact with death.

The man’s aura was no different.

Half as strong as that guy, if I’m generous.

Thinking of that guy, shimmering in the distance like a mirage, the Skeleton King let out a quiet snort.

The world called beings like him monsters. But the real monster was someone else.

“Why did you have to do something like this? If you’d stayed quietly tucked away in some corner of the desert, you wouldn’t have made that guy angry.”

"…God, God chose us. The great God Himself sent the Prophet to lead His warriors to the promised land!"

"The promised land?"

The Skeleton King glanced around as he echoed the words.

Corpses lay in every direction.

Blood flowed like a river, rising to their ankles. Limbs and chunks of flesh—no one knew whose—bloomed across the desert like flowers.

"Surely this isn't the promised land you've been blathering on about."

"…!"

"Unless you promised God you'd all die here together. In that case, I'll give you that one."

The man's eyes wavered. So did those of every fanatic around him.

The Skeleton King's voice, infused with magical power, carried far enough to reach Hunter and fanatic alike.

Each word poured cold water on the flames of fanaticism that had seemed as though they would burn forever. And each word made the Hunters take up their weapons again.

"There was a human. No, there were humans. Frail creatures compared to me, born with death as their fate."

The Skeleton King remembered.

Countless faces he had encountered since coming into the world flashed before his eyes.

"They fought countless battles and kept dying. But they didn't fight only for the god they believed in."

They had families and friends. People they loved. Values worth protecting.

"I couldn't understand those stupid humans. I couldn't even accept that there were different kinds of death."

But not anymore.

The Skeleton King had watched humans more closely than any other monster had.

He had stood beside them.

And at last, he understood.

The countless deaths he had witnessed could not all be called simply deaths.

"They were sacrifices."

Some people killed for money and power. They abandoned their parents and children, betrayed their lovers and friends.

But there were others who burned like torches and died away like wildfires.

People who went forward prepared to die.

People who stood their ground and fought for others, for a better world, even in the face of death.

The world called them heroes.

It called their deaths sacrifices.

“But what should I call you? What should I call your deaths?”

“…!”

“If you have a mouth, then answer me. You foolish people who brought calamity upon the world after being deceived by an illusion.”

Kiiiiing.

The man swallowed a breath as the fading golden crown above the Skeleton King’s brow began to shine.

His wandering gaze passed over the countless faces surrounding him.

Hatred and contempt.

Resentment and confusion.

And not just from the Hunters.

Even the fanatics under his command were wavering.

Some of them looked at him with eyes clouded by resentment and confusion, then turned away. The sight struck the man as though something solid inside him had suddenly collapsed.

“I, I… I…”

He wanted to speak.

He wanted to shout at the people wavering before him.

Tell them not to be taken in by a demon’s silver tongue.

Tell them not to dare question the great God and His Prophet.

But his tongue wouldn’t move. The hand gripping his sword seemed to be losing its strength.

In his mind, gone blank, the demon’s words from a moment ago repeated without end.

> But what should I call you? What should I call your deaths?

The man clenched his teeth without realizing it. Pain shot through a broken molar, but even that felt distant, like a dream.

The corpses of his followers filling every direction.

So did the sticky pool of blood at his feet.

Is this really…

Was this the promised land, meant to be green and beautiful?

Was it the heaven Almighty God and His Prophet had prepared for His people?

The question he had barely managed to keep from speaking echoed through his mind.

And through his dreamlike haze, a dazzling shaft of light brightened the darkness.

Whoooooom.

Golden radiance rose along the many-colored blade.

The light felt so warm. So sacred.

The man even forgot that the Skeleton King was holding the sword.

Looking at the demon who stood before him with the Hero's Sword in hand, shining with a brilliance reserved for the chosen, he found himself asking:

"Are you… really a demon?"

It was at that very moment.

Step.

In a world where everything had stopped, a single person's footfall rang out.

At the same time, a calm voice reached the man's ears.

"You see what you want to believe. Just like you called a monster the Prophet and worshiped it."

The wind held its breath.

Everyone turned in the same direction.

And at the end of all those gazes stood Jin Taekyung.

"Hamid Shah Masoud."

The man stared blankly at Jin Taekyung.

Apart from Amir, no one knew that name. There was no way the man before him could know it.

"How could you know?"

"If I said God told me, would you believe me?"

"…!"

"You're an easy bunch to read. You saw what you wanted to believe, and believed what you wanted to see. All the while telling yourselves this was God's will."

Splash.

He strode forward.

Blood splashed in every direction from a pool with pieces of flesh floating in it. The young man, already drenched in blood, paid it no mind.

"Tens of thousands are dead because of idiots like you. No—hundreds of thousands."

Cities had burned. A massive tidal wave had swept through a harbor.

Countless people had died in sudden disasters. Happy families had vanished, and children who lost their parents had been sent to orphanages.

And none of it had been a natural disaster.

People had caused it.

“There is no God. And even if there is, He wouldn’t be an idiot who watches over trash like you.”

Jin Taekyung spat out each word as he looked across the countless fanatics.

Some staggered in shock. Others wept, belatedly realizing what they had done.

But if a few short words could have changed their hearts, those disasters would never have happened.

“How dare you, you wicked heretic!”

“God is great!”

Papapat!

At those sharp cries, figures rushed him from all sides like streaks of light.

A cold smile touched Jin Taekyung’s lips as he met their hate-filled gazes.

“Yeah. That’s more like it.”

At that moment—

Shwoosh!

Silver flashes shot up from every direction, splitting the wind.

They tore through space, piercing and slicing the blades and bodies hurtling toward him.

Whoooosh! Slice!

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

Only then did the survivors understand.

What the earlier whirlwind had been.

And how those caught within its reach had died.

Krrrunch!

An eerie noise filled the space for more than ten meters[3260] around him.

Blood poured down like rain. Arrows and daggers shot through the air, then flew back the way they had come, taking their owners’ lives.

“Guh…!”

They were lucky if they managed a dying gasp.

Of the hundred or so fanatics who had charged at once, half were torn to pieces beyond recognition.

Thud, thud, thud.

Flesh, blood, and bone fragments filled the empty spaces where screams had been.

Hamid Shah Masoud could only stare, eyes wide, as his sword hilt slipped from his hand.

Clang.

No one spoke.

Not the Hunters. Not the fanatics.

[3260] Ten meters is about 33 ft.

Not the Skeleton King, the Hero’s Sword hanging at his side, or Magic Johnson, standing upright in midair.

At this moment, only one person could speak.

He alone could pass judgment or grant forgiveness.

So Hamid Shah Masoud pleaded for mercy in a trembling voice. To survive, he had no choice but to beg for his one and only life.

He let go of his sword and fell to his knees.

He threw his faith, shattered beyond recognition, into the trash.

“P-Please spare me.”

A desperate plea.

Jin Taekyung looked down at him without a flicker in his eyes. Then he reached out.

A searing heat gathered at the tips of his bloodstained fingers.

Thwip. Thud.

A single blast of hot wind.

That was all. The man fell quietly and never got up again.

At last.

Jin Taekyung let out the breath he had been holding and lifted his head.

Clang. Thud-thud.

Countless still-sharp weapons fell, and knees sank into the blood-soaked sand.

Victory had come in the dim light of dawn. The battle was over.

But Jin Taekyung was looking west, where darkness still held.

Chapter 823

Clang. Clatter.

Countless weapons fell onto the blood-soaked ground. Thousands of fanatics sank to their knees like a wave.

The faint light of dawn from the east shone on the scene.

On the battlefield where victory had finally come.

And on the young man who had brought about that unbelievable victory.

Jin Taekyung.

The defeated did not dare raise their heads before him. The victors gazed at their young Alliance Leader with wonder in their eyes.

They had been outnumbered more than ten to one, facing fanatics who charged without fear of death.

The Hunters had been afraid.

Afraid they would never see their families again. Afraid that if they fell in this nameless canyon, an even greater calamity would swallow those who remained.

But their brief fear had been rendered meaningless. Jin Taekyung had ended this massive battle in an instant.

He had been overwhelming—and, in a way, divine.

Everyone who survived knew it.

Jin Taekyung hadn't just cut through the enemy's flesh and bone. He had broken the fanatics' spirits and made them lay down their weapons of their own accord.

Like a scene from a myth.

If miracles exist… this must be what one looks like.

Magic Johnson suddenly felt something stir in his chest. The Grand Mage's gaze, fixed on Jin Taekyung, trembled like ripples on a pond.

He reminds me of him. Astonishingly so.

Old memories rose like heat haze before his eyes.

Memories from more than thirty years ago. Yet every moment he had spent with him remained vivid.

The miracle Magic Johnson had witnessed with his own eyes—that great achievement—would be remembered as long as humanity endured.

And so would the young hero standing alone at the center of the now-quiet battlefield.

But Magic Johnson knew something else.

To gain anything in this world—even a miracle—one had to pay its price.

Equivalent exchange is the one unchanging law.

His gaze on Jin Taekyung deepened. Then dazzling light streamed from the tip of the staff he slowly raised.

Fwoooosh.

A flash heralding the end of the fierce battle drove back the darkness and lit the dawn.

The Hunters touched by its gentle warmth finally grasped what had seemed impossible to believe.

They had won.

Today, they had written a new line in history.

Clang-clang-clang!

Blades smeared with blood and flesh thrust toward the sky.

“Waaaaaaah!”

A tremendous roar shook the canyon.

It was joy at victory, mourning for fallen comrades, and reverence offered wholly to one man.

But most of them neither knew nor saw it.

The young hero’s eyes twitched as he stood amid the cheers pouring in from every direction. His fingers had turned white, gripping with all their strength the spear shaft that kept slipping from his hand.

…Fuck.

Jin Taekyung swallowed the curse and forced down the hot surge rising from deep in his chest.

His vision kept blurring. In his ringing ears, the Hunters’ cheers and the System notifications crowded together in a jumble.

> System - You have defeated Lv. 140 Hamid Shah Masoud! - You have gained a substantial amount of EXP and Fame! - Level Up! - All status ailments have been removed as a Level Up effect! - Some wounds have been healed as a Level Up effect! - Special debuff Broken Body rejects the healing effect! - Status ailment Mental Strength Depleted rejects the healing effect! - Middle Dantian has reached its limit! Rest as soon as possible to recover your mental strength!

Jin Taekyung’s condition was exactly as the System had described.

His physical wounds and fatigue had recovered, but his Middle Dantian was beyond the System’s power to heal. The catastrophic force he had unleashed earlier could never have come cheaply.

Throb.

He had already wrung himself out to his limit—and beyond it. Even standing was a struggle.

Pain around his heart and mental exhaustion gnawed at him without pause, whispering:

The battle is over.

Your part is done. Rest now.

"Yeah. I've done enough."

The hollow words fell from his lips.

Through his blurred vision, Jin Taekyung looked at the cheering Hunters.

He recognized faces from the battles they had fought together. There were gaps here and there, but he could tell that not many Hunters had died in this one.

If he hadn't pushed his Middle Dantian beyond its limits, more than half the Hunters who had survived would probably be lying across the battlefield by now, growing cold.

That was no exaggeration.

He had brought a grueling battle to a swift victory and stopped more blood from being spilled.

He had brought a battle that would go down in history to an end, all on his own.

But…

It's not over yet.

Jin Taekyung tightened his grip on the spear shaft. He forced his eyes open against their growing weight and looked west, where desert and wilderness stretched into the distance.

There's still something I have to do.

The light had not gone out of his eyes as he stared at the endless horizon.

His gaze was already following someone who had vanished from sight.

The Doppelganger.

Even now, as dawn arrived, the western land where the Doppelganger had disappeared remained shrouded in darkness.

As though its shadow had fallen over it. As though it foretold the great war to come.

I have to go.

The thought was more than resolve. It was almost a duty.

He had to keep moving. He couldn't stop here.

He had to pursue the Doppelganger far to the west and stop the calamity that would strike before long.

Step.

He moved forward as if entranced.

But his mental strength was spent. His body would no longer obey.

He staggered.

Walk forward.

His legs failed to receive that simple command in time and gave way. A wrenching pain gripped his chest, hampering body and mind alike.

Damn it.

He'd hit a wall on his second step.

As his vision slowly tilted, Jin Taekyung stifled a hollow laugh. Then, just as everything seemed to go dark—

Slide. Tap.

His forehead, pitching forward, touched something solid.

A hand reached out from behind and hauled his collapsing body upright. Two voices broke through the ringing in his ears.

"You did good, Jin."

"Pull yourself together, human."

Jin Taekyung blinked.

Now he knew whose hand was holding him up, and what the solid wall in front of him was.

Magic Johnson. And the Skeleton King.

They had come.

A human and a monster. No—his friends had come.

To help him.

Crack.

Through the distant pain, his blurred vision cleared again. Jin Taekyung swallowed the blood on his tongue and raised his head. Two welcome faces were waiting for him.

"Ha."

At the laugh that escaped him, the Skeleton King turned to Magic Johnson with a stiff expression.

"Why's that ugly bastard grinning like that? Has he finally lost his mind?"

"Quit saying stupid things and shut your mouth. Hey, Jin. Can you hear me?"

"Human. How many fingers am I holding up?"

Jin Taekyung answered weakly.

"I can hear you fine. And I can see your finger."

"Tell me how many, you ugly, dim-witted bastard."

"One. But if you don't want me to break it, quit waving it around and lower it."

The Skeleton King, who had been waggling his middle finger in front of Jin's face, nodded.

"Good. You're still sane."

Jin Taekyung snorted, then broke into a cough.

“Team Leader Choi… cough, how is he?”

“He’s fine. A little injured, but fine.”

“Really? You’re sure?”

“Trust me. I’m not lying.”

Jin Taekyung let out a relieved sigh and straightened his back with effort.

He was still short of breath, his senses still dull. But he couldn’t stop here.

“Johnson.”

Sometimes a small gesture or a single word said everything.

Magic Johnson sensed what lay behind that brief call.

“No.”

“I have to go. You know that.”

“I do.”

Magic Johnson’s expression hardened.

“And I know you need to rest.”

The Grand Mage could see Jin Taekyung’s condition clearly. He was already at his limit, staying conscious through sheer force of will.

But recklessness belonged to the young.

It always had with the young man before him.

“Use Teleport magic.”

“Damn it, Jin. Are you crazy?”

“This isn’t a request.”

“Then as of this moment, I’m leaving the World Hunter Federation.”

“Then leave.”

Looking up at Magic Johnson, who was a head taller than him, Jin Taekyung continued:

“But until I accept your resignation, you’ll have to follow my orders.”

“…!”

“Come on, Johnson.”

Magic Johnson found himself at a loss for words.

The talk of resignations and orders was nothing more than a clumsy play on words. But there was nothing false about the resolve in Jin Taekyung’s eyes, or the sense of duty keeping his fading consciousness intact.

Damn it.

He couldn’t bring himself to meet those eyes. He was ashamed of himself for having to make this choice.

He squeezed his eyes shut, then opened them and gritted his teeth.

"…This is insane. Teleporting with the magical power concentration this high is practically suicide."

Jin Taekyung gave a faint smile.

"That takes me back."

"What?"

"Sichuan, China. You said the same thing there. And we pulled it off just fine."

"…!"

"Send me to the place the Prophet—no, the Doppelganger—told us about at the beginning."

Magic Johnson's pupils trembled as he looked at Jin Taekyung.

He had to stop him. He absolutely had to stop him.

But his damned Grand Mage's mind was already calculating, already drawing a reasonable conclusion.

There's a good chance it'll work.

They had tried Teleport magic once before under a magical power concentration like this, during the battle against the Arch Lich.

It had been possible because Magic Johnson was among the finest mages alive—and because the person he was transporting was Jin Taekyung.

If it isn't Teleport magic, if it isn't Jin… no one else can stop the Doppelganger.

Jin Taekyung's proposal was reckless, but the reality behind it could not be ignored.

A considerable amount of time had passed since the Doppelganger fled the battlefield. Catching up to it was almost impossible.

But if they used Teleport magic—

And if there was someone who could endure Teleport magic this dangerous, things would be different.

How cruel.

"Fuck."

Magic Johnson muttered a curse weakly. Jin Taekyung was standing on his own now, without anyone's help, looking straight at him.

And beside Jin stood someone who had volunteered to share the danger.

"I'm going with him. You stay and protect this place."

The Skeleton King. Lord of the undead, who had overcome even death.

The moment Magic Johnson saw him, he knew he had nowhere left to retreat.

"Promise me one thing."

Whummm.

The staff, filled with mana, trembled. Beyond the dazzling flash, his voice rang out faintly.

“Come back alive. No matter what.”

Fwoooosh.

An overwhelming flash of light swallowed the space around them.

Chapter 824

When dawn comes, the darkness retreats.

It was as natural as water flowing downhill. But to those fleeing a pursuer, daylight was hardly welcome.

Especially when that pursuer was a monster they could scarcely believe was human.

Already?

The Doppelganger bit its lip as it watched the sky slowly brighten.

Dawn had come too soon. No—it had taken longer than expected.

Everything should have been over before daybreak at the latest.

The Doppelganger knew that no amount of regret would change what had happened. Its carefully laid plans had gone awry long ago, and at the center of it all, from the very beginning, was that bastard.

Jin Taekyung.

A throb ran through its body. Just thinking of his name brought stabbing pain to one place after another.

The Doppelganger had died at Jin Taekyung's hands hundreds of times. It shuddered at the memory of his terrifying power.

I should never have approached him.

It had been a mistake. Greed.

After absorbing Yamamoto Genji, it should have hurried away—or never revealed itself in the first place.

I only needed a little more. Just a little.

The other humans had been its targets from the start: the many Hunters left in the rear. If it had absorbed their mana and life force, it could have achieved its goal.

Damn it.

But Jin Taekyung hadn't let the Doppelganger go. He had treated it like a slave, never allowing it out of his sight.

That was the Doppelganger's misfortune—and every other Hunter's good fortune.

If it had escaped Jin Taekyung's grasp, put on Yamamoto Genji's skin, and gone to the main force in the rear… it would have led countless monsters and fanatics into the desert and stained it red with blood.

Instead, the opposite had happened.

The monster army had been crushed, and the fanatics it had spent so much effort raising had become a shield for its escape.

I can't believe I got beaten this badly.

A bitter taste filled the Doppelganger's mouth.

It had lost a force tens of thousands strong. Their might aside, what it regretted most was losing a private army that obeyed its every command.

Still, I confirmed he's the Chosen One… Master will be pleased.

The Doppelganger shook its head at the thought of its master, whose intentions and true nature it could never fathom.

For decades, it had manipulated the world in secret from behind an unseen curtain. Yet before its master, even it was nothing more than a lowly servant.

Just like the foolish humans following it now.

"Are we still far?"

At the question, delivered with deliberate gravity, the man in black carrying it answered. Black cloth and a turban covered him from head to toe.

"We will arrive shortly, O great Prophet."

"You're too slow. At this rate, we may be caught. Go faster."

"Caught?"

"Yes. He's more of a monster than I thought. There's no telling what he might do."

At the Doppelganger's words, laced with an unusual mixture of impatience and fear, the dozens of men in black running around it like an escort exchanged glances.

They'd been running at full speed for nearly an hour. And now it wanted them to go even faster?

The man carrying the Doppelganger to conserve its strength glanced back at it before speaking carefully.

"I'm sorry to say this, but… we cannot go any faster."

"What?"

"Forgive our shortcomings, O Prophet."

His feet kept moving even as he spoke.

The Doppelganger stared at the back of the fanatic's head. Then it spoke.

"I see. This is my fault. I urged you on without considering how hard you're already pushing yourselves."

"We are unworthy of such words. Please, take them back."

"No. How could I fail to understand your hearts? It cannot have been easy to leave the battlefield while the brothers and sisters you grew up with remained behind."

"That…"

"And you must have struggled to accept why we had to flee like this, pursued by those evil heretics. Am I right?"

The eyes visible beneath the men's turbans wavered.

Every word struck home, as though the Doppelganger could see straight into their hearts.

Amir, their leader, had raised them to serve as the Prophet's personal guard. But the Promised Land they had all longed for had proved to be a barren canyon. Instead of green life and hope, heretics had awaited them there.

Then came the fierce battle, and their brothers and sisters fell, their blood spraying across the ground.

Even so, they had not faltered. They believed they were fighting a holy war to uphold God's will. They believed their brothers' and sisters' deaths were holy martyrdom.

At least, they had believed it until the Prophet they revered appeared in a wretched state and left the battlefield.

Was this really the right choice?

Escorting him west across desert and wilderness, they had passed oases without stopping. As they ran, a question that had flickered through their minds grew harder to ignore.

God was omniscient and omnipotent. The Prophet was a great seer.

Then why were they running? Why had they abandoned the battlefield like cowards to flee a force of heretics less than a tenth their size?

They tried to suppress their doubts with the faith they had built over a lifetime. But the questions they could not quite bury kept rising.

At last, they became words.

"To be honest, I don't understand."

The Prophet on the man's back gave no answer.

Taking his silence as permission, the man continued cautiously. Their destination had finally come into view in the distance.

"If we stood and fought, we could win. Haven't you always told us God is with us? That victory and glory would always be ours?"

Whoooosh.

Wind roared around the figures racing forward. Other men in black joined in.

"We abandoned our brothers and sisters and ran."

"We're afraid God will abandon us."

"O Prophet, may we ask what the Almighty told you?"

That was when the Prophet—no, the Doppelganger, which had listened in silence—spoke.

"Stop."

The men in black halted for the first time since they had set out.

Its strength restored while it rode on the man's back, the Doppelganger set its feet on the ground and murmured, "We've finally arrived."

The place was desolate.

No trace remained of what had once been said to be the world's second-largest oil field. Bones of unknown origin lay scattered across ground where not a blade of grass grew.

A land of death.

The thought came to the men in black as they took in the sight. One found the courage to ask, "Where are we?"

The others wanted to know just as badly. Mere servants, they had followed orders without daring to guess the great Prophet's purpose.

At his answer, their eyes flew wide.

"During the time of tribulation known as the Great Cataclysm, He stayed upon this land for a while."

"…!"

"…!"

"My master. The master of all creation. He told me, 'Go to the humans. Wait there until the time comes.'"

For a moment, the air seemed to stand still.

The men in black stared around them, dazed. Then they dropped to their knees as one and cried out.

"Ooh, oooooh…!"

"Inshallah!"[3261]

"God is great!"

Their reaction was only natural.

The Prophet served only one person, and this was the land where that person had once descended. It was worthy of being called the Sacred Land.

They prostrated themselves, crying out for God's blessing. Above their heads, the Prophet's voice continued.

"You said you feared God would abandon you."

His tone was gentle, as though soothing a fretful child.

"You wanted to hear what He told me."

His hand brushed the hair of the worshipers bowing upon the Sacred Land. His touch was warm, like a hand tending the painful wound of a groaning patient.

"Then I'll tell you."

But the gaze he turned on them was neither gentle nor warm.

The change was as stark as desert sunlight turning to a freezing northern blizzard. His voice had gone cold.

"How utterly worthless you are."

At that moment—

[3261] Inshallah is an Arabic expression meaning "if God wills."

Boom! Thud-thud.

The men in black blinked, still overcome with emotion.

When they raised their heads from the ground, red blood and pieces of flesh were scattered all around them.

“Huh…?”

A dazed sound escaped someone’s lips.

It was a pure question—and a reality they couldn’t accept.

Before they could find an answer, deep darkness fell over them.

Whoooosh.

A chill ran down their spines. Their hands and feet stiffened like stone, beyond their control.

Bodies honed through a lifetime of training, mana, the swords at their waists—none of it was any use now.

Ah.

A single groan.

Seized by a terror and shock unlike anything they had ever known, the men in black stared at the darkness bearing down on them.

The darkness was as smooth as a mirror, and their faces were reflected in it, clear as day.

This is…

Their voices failed them. Their bodies would not move.

Unable even to scream, they shifted their eyes. Above the darkness enveloping them, they saw a face.

The great Prophet who would lead them all to the Promised Land.

No. The thing they had believed was the Prophet looked down at them and smiled.

It was leading them not to death, or anything else, but into a bottomless pit within a dreadful abyss.

“Listen, you fools. You weak, worthless humans.”

Fwoooosh.

The darkness drained away their living vitality. Dozens of pale souls flowed into it, drawn toward the being within as if entranced.

“There is only one king in this world.”

The darkness swallowed the blood spilling from the seven openings in their faces. Taut skin shriveled. Bones crumbled.

Death drew near. Or perhaps it was the abyss.

As their vision plunged into that bottomless pit, they heard the devil’s final words.

“God…”

Had already abandoned you.

The words echoed faintly.

That was the end.

Where the darkness had fallen, twenty mummified corpses remained, kneeling as though in worship.

And there was only the being that had taken new life, as it had for hundreds of years.

Or so it thought.

Fwoooosh.

That was, until a dazzling beam of light erupted in the air above the ruins.

Until blue-white flames surged and poured forth from within that distant radiance.

Kwaaaaaang!

The mighty flames painted the Doppelganger’s eyes blue.

Chapter 825

A blinding flash erupted with the Teleport spell.

That was how it began.

The space around me warped. A terrible pressure unlike anything I'd ever felt seized my heart, and my joints and muscles screamed as they were pulled into a third void.

Hngh.

I couldn't breathe. It hurt.

Those few seconds felt like days.

But I clung to the thread of consciousness that was about to snap.

Crack.

I had to endure. I had to hold on.

I clenched my teeth around that single thought. Through the dazzling light flooding my vision, the ground and sky flipped past without end.

A vast wilderness. A desert leading toward hills curved like a crescent moon.

Hundreds of kilometers[3262] vanished in an instant, and the violently churning light began to fade.

At last, deep darkness settled over us.

Fwoosh.

Space split open. Through the gap seeped a new light, different from the flash moments ago.

And the light wasn't the only thing that had changed.

This is…

I could see it. Feel it.

Dim light, neither dark nor bright. The damp air of early morning.

Grains of sand carried on the wind. And beneath it all, the sticky, unpleasant sensation that belonged only to magical power.

We did it.

I knew it instinctively.

The dangerous attempt had succeeded. The Grand Mage's Teleport spell had pushed through the interference of magical power and brought us to the chosen coordinates.

And beyond the unfamiliar space we'd finally reached was the being we'd searched for so desperately.

The Doppelganger.

"…!"

[3262] Hundreds of kilometers is roughly 200–900 km, or about 120–560 mi.

Our eyes met in midair. Both of us stared wide-eyed.

I looked at the Doppelganger, and the Doppelganger looked at me.

Time slowed as if the world had stopped.

But my body already knew what it had to do. It moved, defying time and space.

Whoosh.

Wind split around the spearhead and brushed past my ears.

I drew back White Flame's shaft, clenched tight in my hand. Bones shifted out of place with a crack, and unexpected pain surged through me.

Crack.

An aftereffect of the unstable Teleport spell.

The Doppelganger's Blink spell had carried it only a few hundred meters.[3263] This attempt had taken us hundreds of kilometers,[3264] and my body had to pay the price.

Fuck.

My breath caught. My fingertips trembled. The Scorching Yang Qi racing along the spearhead faltered, as if it too sensed something wrong with my body.

But I had nothing to worry about.

I wasn't alone.

Thump.

A firm hand pressed against my back with tremendous force. The Skeleton King's clear voice reached my ear.

"Go."

In that instant—

Whoom!

I shot forward.

I tore through the gap opened by the Teleport spell and plunged down like lightning. The Scorching Yang Qi surged back to life like wildfire, coiling around the spearhead.

Fwoosh.

Heat spread outward. Ten-odd meters[3265] vanished in an instant.

And at the end of it stood the Doppelganger, eyes wide at this unexpected turn of events.

"Y—!"

What had it been trying to say? What had it wanted to say so badly?

No one—not even the Doppelganger itself—would hear the rest.

It couldn't finish.

[3263] A few hundred meters is roughly 200–500 m, or about 660–1,640 ft.

[3264] Hundreds of kilometers is roughly 200–900 km, or about 120–560 mi.

[3265] Ten-odd meters is roughly 10–19 m, or about 33–62 ft.

KWA-BOOM!

Blue-white flames erupted like a wave, swallowing its body and its unfinished cry.

The Doppelganger writhed.

Of all the countless deaths it had suffered, this was among the most agonizing. This was a true inferno.

Shhk. Fwoosh.

The spearhead had slashed diagonally across its upper body. In its wake, a lava-like force seeped into every part of it and raged there.

It kept devouring the life force that replaced each life lost to death.

It vaporized blood and melted flesh and bone.

“GRAAAAH!”

The Doppelganger screamed in agony.

The flames inside its body had already burned through more than ten lives. If its flesh and bones hadn’t kept regenerating to smother them, it would still be dying at that very moment.

“Grrr…”

Burst blood vessels stained its eyes red.

The Doppelganger groaned and straightened up.

Whizz—thunk!

Before it could steady itself, something flew in and pierced its forehead.

It revived before its falling body could hit the ground, then hurled itself to the side.

Thud-thud-thud!

White objects narrowly grazed its body and drove into the ground.

The Doppelganger recognized them as pieces of bone and looked up.

Something was rushing toward it, bearing a power at once utterly familiar and strangely alien.

That thing…!

The Skeleton King.

His sword flashed, imbued with power far beyond what a mere undead monster should possess—and far too great to ignore.

Shhk!

A sharp slicing sound.

Dazzling magical power, utterly at odds with the name Hero’s Sword, cut through the Doppelganger’s wrist.

It recoiled from the pain and snarled.

“How dare an undead like you…!”

Even in the Demon Realm, with its countless monsters, undead occupied the very bottom.

Unless they were like Liches, who chose to become undead only after reaching the highest realms, they were nothing but foot soldiers.

At least, that was how it was supposed to be.

Crack—splash!

Blood sprayed through a blinding flash of sword light.

The Doppelganger died again in an instant and clenched its teeth.

Damn it.

The exchange had been brief, but it could no longer deny the truth. The Skeleton King was no easy opponent.

The aberration before it had broken past the limits of ordinary undead and reached a higher level of existence.

But…

It's still no match for that monster.

The Doppelganger leapt back from the Skeleton King, its gaze shifting quickly.

Its sunken eyes found Jin Taekyung breathing hard, leaning on his spear like a cane.

He's different from the last time I saw him. He must have pushed himself beyond his limits, too.

The Doppelganger was no fool.

It was far more cunning than most humans or monsters. It had manipulated the world for decades from behind its puppet, Michael Silbert.

And when Jin Taekyung had appeared without warning and struck, it had swapped Siegfried Bassmann's soul for another.

Take hold.

KWA-AAH.

A fierce wind whipped around the Doppelganger. Sensing the ominous aura, the Skeleton King kicked off the ground and thrust out his hand.

Whoosh!

Pieces of his arm bone cut through the air with a sharp whistle. The white fragments flew like hidden weapons and lodged throughout the Doppelganger's body.

Or so the Skeleton King thought.

The figure that should have fallen in a spray of blood vanished as though it had never been there.

Pop.

Gone. In the blink of an eye.

That meant one thing.

Magic.

Blink?

Realization struck, and the Skeleton King twisted instinctively.

But the Doppelganger had already slipped from his sight and prepared its next move.

Grrrrk.

Mana surged through the slowing world.

At its center was the monster that had greedily swallowed everything the Grand Mage had possessed in life, absorbing it all for itself.

Air Slash.

And then—

Whoooosh!

Blades of wind rained down on the Skeleton King. Watching them, the Doppelganger was certain that even if the spell could not erase the aberration outright, it would put him out of the fight for a while.

That would be enough to end this wretched battle.

But it was wrong.

Just as the Skeleton King had lost sight of the Doppelganger for an instant, the Doppelganger had forgotten someone else.

Fwoosh.

Floating more than ten meters[3266] above the ground, it suddenly felt heat rising toward it.

Only then did it remember the man who, moments earlier, could barely keep his own body upright.

You've got to be fucking kidding me…!

The Doppelganger sucked in a startled breath and hurriedly drew back its mana.

Whoosh.

The gale descending on the Skeleton King dissolved into a gentle breeze. At the same time, layer upon layer of translucent barriers covered the Doppelganger's body.

Then, just as a dazzling flash shot across the space and finally struck the surface of the shields—

Crack!

The Doppelganger heard it. Saw it.

A single streak of flame bored through dozens of layers of Shield magic, shattering the barriers of mana.

KWA-BOOM!

[3266] Ten-odd meters is roughly 10–19 m, or about 33–62 ft.

Ignition. Shattering. Explosion.

All three happened at once. Blue-white flames filled the air, and a massive shock wave lashed out in every direction.

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

The Skeleton King felt the impact reach the ground. For an instant, he wondered if that strike had cost the Doppelganger one of its most precious souls.

But Jin Taekyung knew better.

Exhausted as he was, he had scraped together every last bit of strength for that strike. He knew better than anyone why the clear, familiar chime had not sounded.

Not yet. Not yet.

The bastard still had the Grand Mage's power and soul.

But his legs, which should already have driven him off the ground, would not move.

His depleted mental strength kept dragging his consciousness toward a bottomless pit. The dozens of movements and attack routes flashing through his mind were no more than things he could imagine doing.

All he had was a friend who could read his intent from a glance.

Bang!

Their eyes met for an instant across the open air.

That was enough. The Skeleton King read the look in Jin Taekyung's eyes and launched himself off the ground without hesitation.

Through the acrid smoke filling the air.

Toward the Doppelganger at the center of the explosion.

Tssssss!

Golden magical power surged along his blade.

The force was less than half of what it would normally have been, thanks to the aftermath of the reckless Teleport spell. But the dazzling sword light cut through the sky without hesitation.

It sliced through the thick smoke and shot toward the enemy beyond.

Shing!

A single streak of light.

At the end of that keen strike—

Shhk!

Crimson blood burst forth like a fountain.

My vision was slowly blurring, but I saw it clearly.

The Skeleton King's strike cutting through the air. And someone's arm shooting up through the blood.

He cut it off.

No doubt about it. That slender white arm belonged to the Doppelganger—or, more precisely, to the Grand Mage it had absorbed three years ago.

But no head fell. No scream came.

If I hadn't spotted where the Doppelganger had gone after vanishing from sight again, I might have shouted in frustration.

Instead, I swallowed my anger.

My voice came out exhausted and unfamiliar, as though it belonged to someone else.

"Are you a fucking lizard or something, you son of a bitch?"

I turned slowly. The Doppelganger stood in the middle of the ruins, blood pouring from its cleanly severed shoulder.

"Let's go for your head this time. Not an arm or a leg—your head. How's that?"

"I'm afraid that won't be possible."

Its face twisted like a Fiend's, the Doppelganger continued.

"I'll need the Grand Mage's soul for what comes next."

What?

Just as I was about to blurt out a question—

Vwoom.

An immense power pulsed around it.

No—the entire ruin shuddered like a living creature.

Chapter 826

That's how humans are.

There are billions of us, and each of us sees the world through our own standards, our own idea of what makes sense. Only when we witness something those standards can't account for do we feel true shock.

I'm no exception.

One day, I suddenly began traveling between two worlds. The unbelievable power of the System brought me this far. None of that changed how I reacted to the impossible.

I'd always been honest about my feelings. Sometimes I got so caught up in them that I forgot what I was supposed to do.

Like right now.

What… is that?

The question brought every thought in my head to a halt.

I stared at the sight unfolding before me, stunned.

And I wasn't alone.

"What the hell…"

Even the Skeleton King, who'd been about to charge the Doppelganger again, muttered in a daze. The golden magical power that had blazed along the Hero's Sword had already faded.

We felt a tremendous force flowing out from the Doppelganger. At the same time, a rumble rose from deep beneath the ruins at our feet.

Rumble. Rumble-rumble.

This is…

The sensation was familiar. But the rumble wasn't merely loud. There was something deeper, more fundamental to it.

If I had to put a word to it…

Resonance.

The thought sounded crazy even to me.

In Murim, a First Rate swordsman could make a sword ring in response to him. But this was earth. A barren wasteland where not a tree or weed grew. A ruin no one visited anymore.

And now this dead land—the ruins in every direction—was trembling as if it were responding to something.

It sounded just as crazy the second time I thought it.

If an idea hadn't flashed through my mind, I might have stood there wrestling with the question for a long time. But as usual, the answer was closer than I'd expected.

"Magic."

The word came out almost as a groan.

Boom!

The ruins, which had been pulsing with a deep, heartbeat-like rumble, rippled. At the same instant, a dazzling mass of light burst forth and washed over everything.

Fwoooosh!

The flash was blinding. The Teleport spell I'd experienced earlier couldn't compare.

I shut my eyes without hesitation and bent sideways. The spear shaft trembled in my tightening grip.

It's coming. It has to be.

An instinct carved into my bones long ago forced my exhausted body to move. I was ready to evade the Doppelganger's attack and counter its ambush.

My body and mind felt as heavy as waterlogged cotton.

But even if I died in the clash, I was certain the Doppelganger wouldn't come out of it unscathed.

One Strike.

Whoever fell, the fight would be decided in a single move.

I couldn't see the Skeleton King, but he was probably waiting for the Doppelganger with the same resolve.

Come on.

I steadied my breathing and sharpened my senses as far as I could.

My eyes stayed shut. I felt the air quiver and smelled the earth of the dead ruins. I could even sense the dazzling light slipping through my eyelids, brushing my retinas—then gradually fading.

The light… is fading?

Of course, my first question was why.

The flash had given the Doppelganger a perfect opening. But there wasn't even a hint of the ambush I'd expected. All that reached me was a voice I'd grown used to hearing.

"You're more timid than you look, Chosen One."

I bit my lip.

Was it trying to lure me into a trap, or had it simply let its guard down?

I had only an instant to wonder. My choice was clear.

I slowly opened my eyes. The Doppelganger stood before me, staring straight at me.

No—it wasn't just the Doppelganger. Everything around it had changed.

"…!"

"…!"

Over its shoulder, I saw the Skeleton King's eyes widen. Mine might have looked the same.

I had never imagined a sight like this.

This is…

"What do you think? Impressive, isn't it?"

The Doppelganger cut off the Skeleton King and swept both arms out with a flourish.

A ball of light floated up in the wake of its fingertips, illuminating the ruins—or rather, the space that had been ruins only moments ago.

"Consider it an honor. You're the first guests in this marvelous temple."

Its words were half truth, half lie.

The place certainly had everything it needed to be called a temple. But grotesque fit it far better than marvelous.

Naturally.

Everything I could see was grand and immense, as though modeled on a temple from mythology. Yet rotten plant roots wrapped around the towering pillars, and the ceiling shut out every last ray of sunlight.

The temple reminded me of the Doppelganger. It had copied the outer trappings of myth convincingly enough, but everything inside was rotten and dead.

The only things that looked as though they belonged in a myth were the enormous stone statues of monsters packed into the vast space, which measured hundreds of meters[3267] across.

"A masterpiece, wouldn't you say?"

I gave the Doppelganger no answer. I just watched it.

Its attitude had changed unmistakably. And the instinct I'd developed through countless fights told me its ease wasn't carelessness.

Composure.

It had regained the composure it had briefly lost.

But that wasn't merely because a new arm had grown from its empty shoulder, or because a temple full of monster statues had risen around us.

It came here for a reason.

I quietly extended my senses.

An unseen force stirred on every side. At the same time, something Magic Johnson had once mentioned in passing about Siegfried Bassmann came back to me.

"Bassmann was an excellent Grand Mage. He wasn't the War Mage I am, but no one was more eager to study, and he was especially good at using Magic Formations."

[3267] Hundreds of meters—roughly 200–900 m—is about 660–3,000 ft.

I already knew that much. I was also certain the Doppelganger, after spending so long absorbing souls and accumulating experience, had grown even stronger than the Grand Mage had been in life.

Three years.

A long time, depending on how you looked at it. Or a short one.

Either way, it was enough time for the Doppelganger to make preparations after taking the Grand Mage's power and soul.

"Hey."

The Doppelganger clicked its tongue as it watched me.

"When someone asks you a question, you should answer."

Vwoom.

A low hum resonated with its forceful words.

I exchanged a quick glance with the Skeleton King, then opened my mouth.

"Are you an idiot? I'm not answering because the thing asking isn't a person."

"Hmm. No respect for your elders. Siegfried Bassmann is quite a respected hero in this world, isn't he?"

"Sure. The Grand Mage I know is. But…"

I lowered my spearhead.

"A monster like you doesn't count, you bastard."

I didn't know what Siegfried Bassmann had been like in life. I'd never seen him or met him. All I knew came from textbooks and what other people had told me.

But listening to a bastard wearing someone else's shell mock me still left me disgusted.

Of course, I had another reason to show my hostility so openly: the Doppelganger would consider it a natural reaction.

Just a little longer. Just a little.

I'd lowered the spearhead I'd aimed at it, but another spear remained pointed at it in my mind.

Slowly, I drew in the qi around me. Quietly. Subtly enough that the Doppelganger wouldn't notice.

It was one of the things I'd learned when I discovered what my Middle Dantian could do.

I spent too much strength before I'd recovered from the Teleport spell. I need a little time.

The Skeleton King did, too. But being already dead put him in better shape than me. He was gradually absorbing the magical power scattered through the air, ready to take the Doppelganger's head the moment I gave the signal.

Meanwhile, the bastard kept talking.

“Monster. Right, that’s what I am. I’ve spent so many decades among humans that I sometimes forget.”

The Doppelganger scratched its chin.

“But there’s one thing I never forgot, no matter what happened. This place. The command my master gave me here.”

I stopped short despite myself.

The Doppelganger’s master.

The being who had planted it in this world, just as the Doppelganger had put Michael Silbert forward as its puppet.

“Don’t tell me…”

My voice trailed off. The question rising in my mind made my stomach churn.

As if it had seen right through me, the Doppelganger smiled gently.

“Shall I guess who you’re thinking of?”

Why did that smile make my heart sink?

I struggled to keep my voice even.

“Shut your mouth.”

“Why? Weren’t you curious?”

“I don’t care who it is. Even if…”

My mouth felt as though I’d swallowed a handful of sand. I steadied my breathing and forced out the rest in a hoarse voice.

“Even if your master is the Demon King Asmodeus.”

“…!”

The air trembled. I could feel the Skeleton King’s agitation from where I stood.

The Demon King.

Ruler of the monsters and master of the Demon Realm, that land of death no human had ever reached.

To humanity, the Demon King Asmodeus was the cause of calamity—and calamity itself. His arrival had changed human history, overturned civilization, and robbed countless people of those they held dear.

People like me.

Father.

A beloved face flashed before my eyes. The misfortune that struck my family had lasted only an instant, but the sorrow and longing lasted forever.

Maybe that was why something hot was boiling deep in my chest when I needed to be calmer than ever.

Why I wanted to rip the mouth off the bastard smiling in front of me—and, at the same time, wanted him to answer.

Crack.

My grip had tightened until my hand turned white.

I glared at the Doppelganger and spoke. No, I muttered the words like a promise to myself.

“He—the Demon King—is already dead.”

And at that moment, I saw it clearly.

The Doppelganger’s smile deepened. Then came the question, carrying a truth I couldn’t accept.

“Do you really think so?”

“…!”

Chapter 827

For a moment, it was as if the world had stopped.

I stared blankly at the Doppelganger's silent smile. In my frozen mind, the voice I'd heard moments ago played over and over.

Do you really think so?

I couldn't breathe.

I already understood what that question meant. But a deep, instinctive refusal surged up from my chest, and before I knew it, I was speaking.

"Don't spout that bullshit."

There was no way.

I knew it. Everyone in the world knew it.

The Demon King—Asmodeus—was already dead.

Near the end of the Great Cataclysm, on what would later be called Victory Day, humanity's hero fought the Demon King and finally brought down the calamity that had turned the whole world into a blazing inferno.

And a few hours later, a small life was born in a country on a peninsula surrounded by the sea on three sides.

That life stood here now.

"The Demon King died the day I was born. On Victory Day."

The hoarse voice escaping my lips sounded like someone else's. I pressed on, putting force into the words as if making a vow to myself.

"He was erased, and we won. That's all there is to it. That's the truth."

I was only standing there. Only moving my lips to speak. Yet I was short of breath, and every breath I let out tasted bitter, as if it carried poison.

Like the voice now burrowing into my ears.

"Yes. That, too, is true, Jin Taekyung. Chosen One."

The abyss-like Doppelganger looked at me and curled its lips. On the Grand Mage's stolen face, the smile was as sly and wicked as a serpent's.

"That is all you know. And to you, it is the truth."

Step.

It took a slow step toward me. Its footfall echoed through the vast, grotesque temple, mingling with its voice.

"But look at me."

Its eyes, dark and deep, swirled like the abyss as they fixed on me.

"Look at me, who merely watched while countless humans died, and while you wept for joy at your victory. I was there among you, carrying out the Great King's command."

"…!"

"Do you still not understand? My existence is proof. Proof that the truth you believe is a lie, and that another truth exists beyond your knowledge."

My vision blurred in an instant.

The massive pillars supporting the temple vanished from sight, along with the grotesque statues and the Skeleton King, whose lips were moving as if he were trying to say something.

There was only one presence.

The Doppelganger filled my vision, its image etched sharply into my eyes.

The Great Battle of Paris.

My mind reeled. Small puzzle pieces surfaced one by one, filling the empty spaces.

Long before the Demon King Asmodeus fell, the Doppelganger had already infiltrated this world.

Michael Silbert hadn't chosen the Doppelganger from the start.

The Doppelganger had chosen him.

The monster from another world had recognized a monster in this one. It had read the immense ambition curled up inside a human body of flesh and bone.

Why had the Doppelganger chosen Michael Silbert, of all people?

I already knew the answer.

Because merely existing in this world wasn't all it wanted.

The Doppelganger possessed a gift unlike any other. It could absorb not only a person's appearance and abilities, but even their memories, making them its own. Living out its life as a single human would have been easy.

But now I understood. Its infiltration of humanity hadn't been an act of betrayal or defection.

It had received an order.

An order from the master it served with its life: the Demon King Asmodeus.

What happened after that must have been just as I knew it.

The Doppelganger put Michael Silbert forward and used him to move the world.

The puppet that had made a name for itself at the Great Battle of Paris quietly grew in the shadow of Cheon Taemin, the sky above it. And the shadow controlling the puppet fed on someone's soul, out of sight.

For more than thirty years, the Doppelganger climbed the stairs, keeping the order it had received in mind.

Until the endless staircase came to an end.

Until the moment it had waited for arrived, and a tightly shut door appeared.

"Judging by your face, you're finally starting to understand."

The Doppelganger laughed and raised a hand.

Whoosh.

A lone sphere of light drifted through the sunless darkness and stopped at the far end of the vast temple.

Its hazy glow lit the enormous space—and the single throne beneath it.

That's…

The moment I saw the empty throne, I knew instinctively who this temple and that seat had been built for.

And what the seventy-two bizarre, hideous stone statues represented.

"The seventy-two commanders of the Demon Realm…"

The Skeleton King's words came out like a groan. The Doppelganger spread both arms toward the throne, its face alight with rapture.

"The Great King will surely return. Before long, He will come with the countless armies that follow Him."

"…!"

Every hair on my body stood on end. A chill crawled up my spine like a snake.

I didn't believe the Doppelganger. It was made of lies, through and through. For now, I couldn't be sure whether what it had told me was true or just another lie meant to shake me.

But…

If every word it said was true.

Then I already knew what I had to do.

Dynamite with a severed fuse won't explode. A locked door won't open without a key.

And in that sense, the Doppelganger was both the fuse and the key: the signal for a vast calamity about to unfold.

This was the only chance to stop the return of a being who would be a nightmare for humanity.

I'll kill it.

The clouds in my mind cleared. With that single thought, as inescapable as a duty, qi surged through my body.

Fwoooosh.

My vision went hazy. My body, still bearing the full strain of the reckless Teleport spell, cried out in pain.

But I didn't hesitate. I drew Scorching Yang Qi from my Lower Dantian and sent it flooding through my limbs and acupoints, dulling the pain, forcing life back into my torn muscles—

Then I unleashed it.

BOOM!

Flamefire Path.

Blue-white flames burst from my toes and devoured the darkness.

In an instant split into ever smaller pieces, I erased the space between us and thrust my spear. It was a motion I'd repeated thousands, tens of thousands of times.

Toward a single being.

SHWAAA!

True to its name, White Flame cut through the darkness, its spearhead dazzling as a white flame.

As if nothing could stop it.

As if it would turn everything to ash.

At least, that was how it looked until the Doppelganger gestured and something invisible barred its path.

BOOM!

A deafening impact left my ears ringing. The force of the collision drove back against me.

Hngh.

I tightened my grip on the vibrating spear shaft.

Only ten paces away, the Doppelganger's smiling face wavered behind a transparent barrier.

"Do you understand now why I came all the way here?"

Shield magic?

No. This wasn't ordinary Shield magic.

Even as a Grand Mage, the Doppelganger could hardly have conjured a shield strong enough to stop my strike so easily in an instant.

Unless—

A Magic Formation.

Siegfried Bassmann.

One of only three Grand Mages in the world, and considered the finest master of Magic Formations among them.

The Doppelganger had absorbed his soul. And it had been given three years.

"You son of a…"

"You humans take out insurance. Think of this as something similar."

Confidence showed in its curled lips. It hadn't smiled like that while fleeing from me, dying again and again.

"Don't waste your effort. I'm the master here."

Vwoom.

An unprecedented force resonated from every direction.

Magic Formations blazed into view all around us, and the enormous statues depicting the seventy-two commanders of the Demon Realm began to tremble.

"As the Great King's representative, I command you: awaken from your slumber."

Crackle.

Stone fragments fell on every side as the Doppelganger's command rang out.

The statues, which had seemed destined to stand motionless forever, began to move.

No—they opened their eyes.

Flash.

Monsters, ranging from a few meters to dozens of meters[3268] tall, gazed down at the distant ground with glowing red eyes.

The Skeleton King, whose earlier attack had been stopped by a translucent barrier just like mine, stared at them.

Then he shouted like a bolt of lightning.

"Dodge!"

At that moment—

WHOOOOM!

Arms, legs, and claws of stone filled my vision as they came crashing down.

The world slowed, and my breath stretched out.

No. I can't dodge.

Not because the statues' attacks were too powerful or too fast.

Because every step I took away from them would take me farther from the Doppelganger.

Now's the time to go.

The statues under its control were powerful. But it had copied only the forms of the Demon Realm's seventy-two commanders. Not one of them had the strength of an S-rank monster.

In that case—

I'll cut them down.

My body moved with the thought.

No. My body wasn't the only thing that moved.

Vwooooooom.

With a powerful hum, my closed Middle Dantian opened.

A space pitifully small beside the vast temple—but large enough for what I needed—fell under my control.

Hngh.

A headache so sharp it nearly blacked out my vision.

I endured it. I had to.

I clenched my teeth until my lips were ragged, then let go of White Flame's shaft.

[3268] A meter is about 3.28 ft. A few meters is roughly 7–16 ft; dozens of meters is roughly 66 ft or more.

Fwoosh.

Hot. Blinding.

The spear blazed blue-white with Scorching Yang Qi drawn from my Lower Dantian. The will of my Middle Dantian moved it.

No—it sent it whirling.

SHWAAAA!

I heard no roar. In a world filled only with the sound of air being torn apart, a streak of light-flames cut through everything around it.

SHWAK!

Through space.

SHHK!

Through the soulless Golems, as if it had only grazed them.

Again and again. Perhaps dozens of times.

At last, after tearing through everything on every side, the spear returned to its master. I caught it.

KWA-AAAA!

Everything came crashing down.

All seventy-two colossal statues. The pillars as thick as the World Tree.

And the countless Magic Formations that had filled every corner of the temple.

KWA-CRASH!

Maybe my body had been pushed past its limit.

My vision turned white. I couldn’t see a thing.

But I could hear. I could feel.

The mana and magical power breaking apart. And beyond them, one presence struck with shock.

“Say that again.”

The words came out in a voice that sounded ready to give out. I drew on the last of my strength and stepped forward.

Step.

“Who exactly is the master here?”

At that moment, instead of an answer, a dazzling radiance filled the temple.

Chapter 828

Fear comes in different kinds and degrees.

Some people spend their whole lives afraid of water because they fell into a valley stream as children. Those who've lived through an earthquake carry trauma like a brand.

But the greatest, deepest fear is fear of the unknown.

A realm no one has ever seen—or even imagined.

That is the unknown.

The universe. The deep sea. Places even humanity, which built a brilliant civilization through science and magic, has yet to fully reach.

And now, in this very moment, a single streak of fire tearing everything around it to shreds.

BOOOOM!

It was like a storm.

A storm of fire, so sharp it made your skin crawl, turning everything it touched to ash.

The Doppelganger stared, stunned.

Blue-white flames poured out suffocating heat, tinting its pupils red.

SHWAAK!

Tear. Cleave. Cut.

The wind shrieked. The Golems it had spent three years painstakingly shaping burst apart like fireworks.

Limbs made of massive, solid rock were no use. Neither were weapons brought down hard enough to split the earth.

Fwoosh. KRRRACK!

They melted. They broke apart.

In an instant, all seventy-two Golems became heaps of rubble—before the Doppelganger could order them to retreat.

No. It hadn't even had time to give the order.

The flames tearing through everything hadn't destroyed only the Golems.

CRASH!

An immense force shook the air.

The magic circles, scattering dazzling halos of light, exploded one after another.

The Doppelganger watched in horror as the translucent barrier around it melted like candle wax.

"What the…"

Before it could finish, something hot surged up from deep inside its body and spilled through its throat into its mouth.

Hack.

The Doppelganger coughed up a clump of dark red blood. Its pupils trembled.

Knowledge from Siegfried Bassmann's memories struck its empty mind.

Mana backlash.

Its connection to countless magic circles had been forcibly severed, sending the energy throughout its body into turmoil.

If it had cast the magic directly instead of preparing the circles through various conduits and spells, the backlash would have been severe enough to kill it several times over.

How? How is this possible?

The Doppelganger raised its head, gasping for breath.

No trace of composure remained in its shocked eyes. Reflected in them was a human who seemed as unknowable as the unknown itself.

Jin Taekyung.

There he stood, gripping a silver spear that shone white as the Golems' remains rained down over his head.

Through the lingering light of the magic circles melted by the flames, the Doppelganger saw him staring back.

A predator.

"Say that again."

His voice sounded ready to give out, yet it seethed like lava as it reached the Doppelganger's ears.

He staggered toward it as if he might collapse at any moment.

Step.

It was strange.

The whole place was filled with thunderous noise. The temple, stripped of its pillars, was slowly collapsing, and the rocks that had once been Golems were scattering in every direction…

Step.

Yet that small human's footsteps sounded like thunder. His next words made every hair on the Doppelganger's body stand on end.

"Who exactly is the master here?"

"…!"

The Doppelganger swallowed a scream before it could escape its lips.

Fear showed plainly in its eyes as it stared at Jin Taekyung.

A monster. That human was a monster.

One who exceeded every expectation, every limit, by an impossible margin.

After dying countless times on the battlefield, the Doppelganger had abandoned its contempt for Jin Taekyung. It had set everything else aside and judged the situation coldly. This time, it had been certain.

Once it reached its destination, everything would go smoothly.

Jin Taekyung would never catch it.

But it had been wrong.

The Doppelganger, which had left the battlefield before anyone else, hadn't known Jin Taekyung had reached an even higher realm in that brief time.

Now that it understood, it was too late.

If I waste even a little more time here… I'm finished.

Erasure. Forever.

Cold fear crawled up its spine. What it did next came from instinct rather than reason.

The Doppelganger burned through the souls it had left without hesitation. It healed the body mangled by mana backlash, then gathered the energy that had once again filled it to the brim into both hands and unleashed it.

At the inhuman monster approaching it.

At Jin Taekyung.

FWOOSH!

The instant a blinding flash burst forth—

"No!"

A step ahead of Jin Taekyung, the Skeleton King had been charging toward the Doppelganger. He twisted sharply and threw himself in front of the flash.

POP!

The Skeleton King in his usual state wouldn't even have snorted at it.

For all his bluster, he acknowledged that Jin Taekyung was stronger than he was.

But…

Right now, I'm the only one who can protect that devious human.

He would protect him, even if it put him in danger.

At some point, that had become the most natural thing in the world to the Skeleton King.

Why?

He'd stopped asking himself. Friends didn't need a reason.

SHWAA!

The Skeleton King brought down the Hero's Sword.

Golden magical power, bright as sunlight and strangely unlike magic, split the flash.

No.

Just as he thought he'd cut through it, the flash passed through the blade like mist and swelled like a balloon.

WHUM.

What the—

Before he could finish the thought, a light far brighter than the first filled his vision.

FWOOSH!

The whole world turned white.

In that blinding flash, which would have instantly robbed an ordinary human of their sight, the Skeleton King belatedly remembered the answer to his question.

Damn it.

There was no doubt.

This was Light magic, a spell even lower- and mid-level mages could cast with ease.

A simple convenience spell. Its light was faint and it had little killing power, so it was almost never used in combat.

At least, that was what the Skeleton King knew. It was accepted as fact among Hunters, too.

If he'd known that Siegfried Bassmann, a scholarly Grand Mage, had shut himself away in his hideout to study countless spells—and had improved Light magic's power and usefulness by several levels—he could have dealt with it.

But it was too late. The mistake made the Skeleton King's heart sink.

I can't see. Anything.

He hadn't lost his sight completely.

The Skeleton King was undead. His vitality far exceeded that of a human made of flesh and blood.

But even a moment without sight was a mistake he couldn't take back when he was fighting an enemy as dangerous as the Doppelganger and trying to protect someone else.

It planned this from the start. It knew I'd step in…

In the blank white world, the Skeleton King raised his sword. With his sight gone, his hearing took in everything around him.

The roar of rubble crashing down a moment later.

An unfamiliar cracking sound from high above.

And then…

A low voice no one else could hear reached his ear.

—Don't let it get away.

"…!"

At Jin Taekyung's Sound Transmission, the Skeleton King understood.

Why no magic had come flying at him, even though this was the perfect chance to knock him down.

And what the energy moving stealthily through the air was.

Teleport!

The Skeleton King's guess was right.

The Doppelganger was pouring all its strength into drawing a Teleport magic circle.

It felt both relief and regret that it had taken the soul of such an accomplished Grand Mage.

You piece of shit…!

The Doppelganger's nature might be that of a monster familiar with magical power, but right now it was in the body of an ordinary human.

If it tried to cast Teleport without a magic circle to get as far as possible from that inhuman monster, Jin Taekyung, it would crumble to dust without even a chance to resurrect.

Fwoosh.

Mana flowed from the Doppelganger's hand as it swept through the air, slowly wrapping around its body.

The magic circle would take a little time to complete, but it would reduce the danger by more than half.

Instead of disintegrating without a trace, it might manage to save its upper body.

That was enough for the Doppelganger to survive. The ancient monster of the abyss had no intention of letting anyone interfere with a matter on which its continued existence depended.

Whoosh. CLANG!

It happened in an instant.

A bone fragment shot in with a sharp whistle and was deflected by the defensive magic the Doppelganger hurriedly cast.

SH-SH-SH-SH! CLANG!

With the magic circle nearly complete, the Doppelganger grimaced at the Skeleton King, who kept firing bone fragments without pause.

What? The effect should last much longer.

According to the Grand Mage's memories, the spell had been perfect. It had struck precisely at a weakness and robbed the Skeleton King of his sight.

Losing your sight in battle was like losing the use of both legs.

That was why the Doppelganger hadn't tried to disable him any further. The Skeleton King was a formidable opponent, and getting far away from Jin Taekyung —who might do anything next—was more urgent.

But right now, the Skeleton King's movements were far beyond anything the Doppelganger had expected.

CRASH!

Fired with great speed and force, and aimed with extraordinary precision, the bone fragments finally shattered its defensive magic.

The Doppelganger escaped through the opening with a Blink spell, confusion filling its eyes.

How the hell…

It could tell from every move the Skeleton King made. Those attacks required certainty.

Even though the Skeleton King had taken the full force of the Light magic, he continued his attacks without the slightest hesitation.

POP.

His hazy form shot across the space. At the same time, the golden magical power coating his sword traced a graceful arc.

As its wielder intended.

And as the voice at his ear directed.

—One step left.

At that moment—

SHWAAK!

The Skeleton King's unhesitating charge wavered.

An ice spear shot past between his streaming golden locks and slammed into a pile of rubble.

BOOM! CRACK-CRACK!

The air turned cold. The Skeleton King moved by his own senses and the Sound Transmissions reaching his ear.

—Three steps right. A horizontal slash.

SHHK!

Binding magic summoned vines to restrain its target. Stems as thick and tough as chains were severed in a single stroke.

—Duck.

Dozens of Magic Missiles tore through empty air.

—Ten steps forward. Run it through.

BOOM-BOOM-BOOM!

As expected of spells cast with a Grand Mage's power, they struck hard and exploded spectacularly.

But not a single spell touched the Skeleton King. The Doppelganger swallowed a startled breath as he closed to within ten steps.

Already…!

It felt as though a ghost had bewitched it.

The Skeleton King kept firing bone fragments to disrupt the magic circle. He dodged or cut through every attack spell it cast.

Was that mutant always this strong?

But the question disappeared without a trace the moment the Doppelganger saw the Skeleton King's unfocused eyes.

A shock like a bucket of cold water took its place.

It was him. From the start.

What had Jin Taekyung done?

How could he be barely standing, as if he were about to collapse at any moment, and still render the Doppelganger this helpless?

Confusion and fear gripped it as it gathered its mana.

Blink magic.

That instant flicker put distance between it and the Skeleton King once more.

Or so it thought.

It would have, if a voice hadn't reached the Skeleton King before the spell took effect—before several meters[3269] of space vanished.

—Five o'clock. Advance and…

Before the Doppelganger's form could blur, the Skeleton King changed direction and charged, lifting his sword.

Fwooooosh.

In a world gone slow, brilliant golden magical power rose like a wave.

The voice came again, and the sword cut through space.

—From the sky to the ends of the earth. Bring it down.

SHWAAK!

A golden flash split the monster of the abyss where, a moment earlier, there had been nothing but empty air.

SHHK. FWOOSH!

A red line ran from the crown of its head to its crotch.

Blood burst out. Then a Sound Transmission reached the Skeleton King's ear, sounding almost like a groan.

—Ah, shit. Right. My EXP.

[3269] Several meters is roughly 3–5 m (10–16 ft).

Chapter 829

The Doppelganger.

The Final Abyss, which had existed for hundreds of years, saw and felt everything as time slowed.

The Skeleton King charging toward it.

Blink magic to put distance between them.

And then…

SHWAK.

A soft rush of air reached its ears, and golden swordlight filled its vision.

It all happened—and ended—in an instant.

So quickly that the monster of the abyss, born in the deepest reaches of the Demon Realm, couldn’t even react.

Slice.

Hot.

The strike it could neither block nor dodge split the crown of its head. It carved through flesh and bone, devoured its organs and mana, and raced down to its crotch.

Like a bolt of lightning.

Ah.

The Doppelganger staggered backward with a silent sigh.

No—at the moment it felt itself take a step, it crumpled, spraying a fountain of blood.

SPURT!

Its blood-red view tilted slowly.

As the Doppelganger realized it had died, the bond that had held a soul tightly captive for three years was torn away.

Siegfried Bassmann.

The Doppelganger could feel it clearly.

The mana, memories, and carefully hoarded vitality of the Grand Mage once hailed as a hero were draining away like the tide.

The ticket for the last flight out of here had just sold out.

Splash.

Its body, split cleanly in two, fell into a pool of blood.

A death no one could deny.

And a resurrection that defied the natural order.

Pop!

Reborn with a new life and a new body, the Doppelganger threw itself forward without hesitation.

It had failed to escape with Teleport magic, but there was still a way out.

Get as far away as possible. Even if it costs every life I have left!

It had lived for hundreds of years.

Throughout that long life, it had survived by prostrating itself at the king's feet. It had been promised certain rewards when the coming day arrived.

The commanders of the Demon Realm's seventy-two legions? Even those arrogant, mighty beings could never hope to share in its glory.

Besides, many of them were already dead.

How it had laughed when it learned that Leviathan, one of those commanders, had been killed by Jin Taekyung.

But it couldn't die like a dog here. Not when it was destined to stand at the Great King's right hand.

I have to survive. I can't die here.

The Doppelganger ran with all its strength.

Toward an exit from the temple it had hidden in case of emergency.

Toward the countless glories waiting for it in the near future.

Only then did it realize.

At this very moment, only its lower half was running for its life.

Slice—

The delayed sound of the cut reached its ears.

The Doppelganger's already-severed upper half tilted in midair.

Its eyes grew distant as it watched its lower half run on, still moving with its original force, unaware that the body had been split apart.

"You son of a—"

SH-SH-SH-SH!

The rush of air swallowed its unfinished words.

As its upper half scattered into dozens of pieces, the Skeleton King's sword moved again.

Thrust!

"Ghk."

A stifled groan.

The Doppelganger writhed, reborn from one of those tiny pieces with a new body. It was hard to believe it had died so gruesomely only moments ago.

Even with its chest pierced, its bloodshot eyes remained fixed on the exit.

Damn it. Damn it!

The Doppelganger cursed soundlessly and regretted what it had done.

How many souls had it stolen from humans over the past thirty years? How many of those humans had been considered strong?

It didn't know. Even the Doppelganger couldn't count them all.

They had been little more than a harvest. Like a farmer gathering the eggs his hens laid each morning, the Doppelganger collected human souls and spent most of them without a second thought.

It hadn't mattered.

No matter how many it used up, it could simply replenish them. Even if it didn't, it had enough.

No—it had had more than enough.

Until today, when it met a monster wearing human skin.

Swish.

A cold breeze brushed its nape. A sharp blade cut through its neck, and death and rebirth arrived together.

No. They came again and again, like a record stuck on repeat.

Slice! Thrust! SH-SH-SH!

It was cut, stabbed, and broken into dozens of pieces that scattered through the air.

Each time, the Doppelganger died and came back as a man, a woman, or an old person. Drawing on the powers and memories it had stolen from them, it edged closer to the exit.

A hundred meters[3270] became dozens.[3271]

Dozens of meters became a few.[3272]

It threw away its lives one by one—lives that were no longer expendable, each one precious now.

I can't… I can't lose any more.

Fear rose with the word Erasure.

The lives that had once numbered around a thousand were gone.

Feeling its vitality dwindle until it could count what remained on both hands, the Doppelganger summoned every ounce of strength and stood up again.

Slide. WHOOSH!

Its body regenerated in an instant, like the beanstalk in an old fairy tale. Reborn in a grotesque way words couldn't explain, the Doppelganger hurriedly rolled aside.

Slash!

Pain like a burn raked down its back.

[3270] One hundred meters is about 328 ft.

[3271] Dozens of meters means tens of meters—roughly tens to hundreds of feet.

[3272] A few meters is roughly 7–16 ft.

But its desire to survive was stronger than the pain that lingered. As the Doppelganger threw itself forward, heedless of its life, the Skeleton King reached out without hesitation.

Thud-thud-thud!

The Doppelganger staggered and swallowed a surge of blood.

Something white jutted from the middle of its chest. Another bone fragment had pierced its calf and lodged deep in the ground.

“Where do you think you’re going?”

The Skeleton King’s low voice came from behind it, followed by a rush of wind.

Feeling him close in, the Doppelganger gritted its teeth. The bone fragment pinning its calf to the ground held as firmly as a stake.

Crack!

Though far weaker than the Skeleton King, its new body was still easily strong enough to belong to an A-rank Hunter.

The Doppelganger tore off its leg below the knee and moved the one leg it had left.

It summoned all its strength and kicked off the ground.

BOOM!

A deafening impact rang out, and a fierce wind swept over its body.

Its eyes burned with longing at the sight of the temple entrance, now right in front of it.

If I can just get out of here.

If I can somehow avoid Erasure…

I swear I’ll turn the world you tried to protect into ashes.

It reached toward the secret door that would open only for it.

SHWEEEE!

From somewhere far away—

CRUNCH!

A streak of light tore through space and swallowed the Doppelganger whole, ripping and smashing its body apart.

As its vision went black, a voice pierced its ears.

“You fucking bastard. You invite a guest over and then try to leave?”

How cold that voice sounded.

And how hot the flames bursting from the spearhead buried in its body.

Fwoosh.

ROOOAR!

The Doppelganger writhed in blue-white flames, its vision dyed blue and white, unable even to scream.

Until the body that had once belonged to someone else, and all the vitality within it, burned to ash.

Until every lie it had built up burned away, leaving a single truth behind.

Step. Step.

Whoosh.

Wind followed unsteady footsteps, scattering the ash.

A black, gray-white shadow stirred amid the thick layer that had settled on the ground.

"…So that's it."

Supported by the Skeleton King, Jin Taekyung stood before it. A faint light shone in his eyes as he looked down at the shadow.

He saw through to the one truth of a being made entirely of lies. To its pathetic essence.

> System Level 10 Doppelganger

"So this is all you were."

"…!"

The shadow—no, the Doppelganger—trembled.

Just standing there left me short of breath.

My senses were fading and my vision was blurring, but my racing heartbeat sounded as loud as thunder.

Thump. Thump-thump.

Was this the price of pouring all my strength into that final strike?

My whole body trembled. If the Skeleton King hadn't been supporting me, I would've collapsed already.

But I didn't fall.

I pushed back the sleep demon pressing in from every direction, pulled away from the Skeleton King, and stood on my own two feet.

Then I looked down.

At a shadow as small as a child, made of an evil purer than any child could ever be.

At the hideous being that was now nothing more than a shadow.

"Yeah. This was all you were."

I repeated the words I'd said earlier, almost to myself.

The Doppelganger trembled as if it were afraid. Looking at it, then at the Level window floating over its head, I nearly let out a hollow laugh.

> System Level 10 Doppelganger

Level 10.

That was all. Nothing more, nothing less.

For a Hunter, that was the very bottom of F-rank. For a Murim martial artist, it was a Third Rate swordsman who'd only just begun to sense internal energy.

That was the Doppelganger's essence, revealed by the Truthful Eye. Its origin. Its one and only truth.

All this, because of a thing like this…

I swallowed the rest and clenched my teeth.

When I closed my eyes, flames flickered in the darkness.

A city in ruins.

Bodies lay scattered among the smoke rising everywhere. The screams of those still alive rang in my ears.

How many people had died because of the Doppelganger's terrorist attacks and the monsters?

How many had lost their homes and had to say goodbye to their precious family and friends?

Hundreds of thousands? Millions?

I didn't know.

More than thirty years had passed since the Doppelganger slipped into this world. I couldn't even begin to guess what it had done behind the scenes.

Grind.

My fists tightened.

Blood seeped from the skin where my nails had dug deep. I opened my eyes, but none of it went away.

Not the ruined city. Not the emptiness in the dead people's eyes or the cries of those still alive.

I remembered it all. It was branded into my eyes and ears, impossible to erase.

And of all those things, only one was here before me.

Crush.

"Ghk. Guhh…"

My foot, charged with internal energy, pressed down on the shadow.

The Doppelganger, writhing and groaning, begged me for mercy. It could feel pain, even in this cursed form.

"S-save me…"

“Save you?”

“Y-yes. Anything. I’ll do anything! I will!”

For a moment, I just stared down at it. Then I gathered the internal energy I had left and sent it surging toward the tip of my foot.

Crack. Crunch!

“AAAGH!”

I watched the Doppelganger scream.

Then the Skeleton King placed a hand on my shoulder.

“Human.”

“What?”

I’d only asked a question, but when the Skeleton King saw my face, his lips moved quietly.

“…Nothing.”

What kind of face was I making? Did I look exhausted? Or was it twisted with a rage he’d never seen before?

Probably the latter.

The Doppelganger had stopped screaming the moment it saw my expression.

It spoke in a voice full of fear.

“I-I didn’t want to do it! Have you forgotten? It was all on the king’s orders!”

The king.

Demon King Asmodeus.

At the name that came to mind with its cry, the anger gripping my body and mind wavered.

Chapter 830

Master of the Demon Realm. Lord of the monsters.

Demon King Asmodeus.

How could I forget that name? The demon who was the beginning and the source of every catastrophe.

“I-I didn’t do it because I wanted to! Have you forgotten? The king ordered all of it!”

I looked down at the Doppelganger as it cried out in desperation. After a brief struggle with myself, I drew back the internal energy I’d been channeling into my foot.

“Cough—hack.”

The pressure on its chest lifted, and it broke into a fit of coughing.

The Doppelganger let out the breath it had been holding, then glared at me with eyes full of pain and fury. But deep inside them, fear lurked—fear it hadn’t quite managed to hide.

It looked so helpless that it was hard to believe it had been a Named Monster at Level 170.

Yet the little shadow before me was the Doppelganger’s essence. Its one and only truth.

It must have stolen countless lives to become so powerful.

It had taken whatever it could, absorbed it, digested it.

Those lives had fed it and served as steps on its climb to power.

But today, the feast it had enjoyed for so long was over.

The fanatics who worshiped it like a god were gone. So was its army of monsters. With no one at its side, only one path remained open to it.

“Spit it all out.”

Crick.

The thousand-geun[3273] pressure I’d lifted a moment ago bore down through the tip of my foot once more. I watched the Doppelganger stifle a groan, then continued quietly.

“What you know. And what’s about to happen.”

Demon King Asmodeus.

Evil itself. The source of it.

What I wanted from the Doppelganger was information about that accursed being—and about the future of this world.

“What you said just now.”

[3273] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb). A thousand geun is 600 kg (about 1,320 lb).

The hoarse voice that came from my mouth sounded like someone else's.

My mouth felt as though I'd swallowed a handful of sand. Exhaustion and thirst weren't the only reasons.

"He—the Demon King…"

Each syllable was a struggle. I didn't dare say it aloud, or even imagine it.

But I knew.

I knew what became of people who turned away from reality. I knew what lurked beyond the reality they tried so hard not to face.

To escape a forest fire, you first have to know it's there.

You have to see the rising smoke and the red flames, feel the heat that threatens to burn you alive.

Just as I was doing now.

"Is he still alive?"

In the suffocating silence, the patter of small stones falling from overhead sounded unusually loud.

I said nothing. Neither did the Skeleton King or the Doppelganger.

For a moment, none of us spoke.

Until I heard the whisper of a shadow, something not of this world.

"Is he still alive?"

Stir.

The darkness rippled. Its pitch-black face, its features barely discernible, split into a long grin.

"You know nothing, Chosen One. Foolish mortal. One day, time will break you, and you will crumble into dust."

The Doppelganger was laughing.

It had forgotten its anger, pain, and fear of me.

Or perhaps it had covered them all with the presence of its absent master.

"Our Great King overcame the curse of the gods. He may waver, but he will not break. Even if he perishes, he will rise again. And at last, he will make all the earth and water in this world his own."

"…!"

"That is the only truth. A truth you cannot stop, even now that you know it. Before long, it will become reality."

I stared blankly at the Doppelganger as it laughed aloud.

The moment I met its eyes, darkness swirling within them, my vision swam.

This is…

No sound came out. The dust and rubble around us vanished. So did the Skeleton King and the Doppelganger.

No. It felt as though my entire consciousness was being pulled somewhere.

At the same time, sights unlike anything I'd ever seen poured before my eyes like a meteor shower.

SHWAAAA…

A brilliant sun rose in the east, painting the world with light. Clouds raced across the blue sky. Sunset came, then the moon rose and darkness fell.

One day. Then another.

Time sped past like a scene from a nature documentary I'd once watched. But there was nothing beautiful about it.

BOOM!

A tremendous blaze erupted with a thunderous roar.

Wild animals scattered across the vast wilderness, all bolting at once as if on cue. Behind them, monsters advanced across the horizon with flames the color of sunset at their backs.

Rumble…

Hundreds of thousands. Millions.

Perhaps even more.

An army of monsters beyond counting poured in from every direction. They shook the earth and blotted out the sky.

Kyaaaaargh!

A terrible roar rang out from above the clouds.

Huge wings swept through them, blocking the sunlight. Then the shadow they cast fell over me.

Whoosh.

My view flipped. Sky and earth turned upside down.

In that inverted landscape, I saw a city burning.

BOOM!

Hundreds of cannons fired at once. Giants as tall as skyscrapers staggered, engulfed in flames, while figures shot like streaks of light through the ruined streets and charged at them.

Their weapons blazed with radiance. They shouted their resolve as if coughing up blood.

"Never retreat! Stand and fight!"

"For humanity!"

They were Hunters.

Humanity's sword and shield against those accursed beings.

Warriors given a sacred mission by someone unseen.

I couldn't move a finger. From high above, I watched their magnificent charge.

They fought monsters that outnumbered them dozens of times over. True to their cries, they never retreated. They shed their blood for humanity and fell.

Until the sun went down and the moon rose.

Until the last of them was gone.

All I could do was watch.

As if someone were controlling me, I saw Niagara Falls turn red with blood. I saw hundreds crushed to death beneath the shattered Leaning Tower of Pisa.

I was a consciousness without a body. Nothing more than a spectator.

There was nothing I could do.

As the scene changed without pause, my only right—and my curse—was to watch civilization burn to ash and hear the screams of the dying.

Death beyond counting. Destruction.

Corpses covered the streets. A broken church cross lay plunged into a pool of blood.

A child, unaware of what had happened to their parents, could no longer bear the hunger and crawled out of a small box. When the child saw a pack of goblins in the alley, the doll in their hand fell to the ground.

Catastrophe.

A word for an unexpected, unfortunate disaster.

But even that word, a symbol of the Great Cataclysm, could not begin to describe the horrors I had seen.

In place of the voice that wouldn’t come, one word suddenly occurred to me.

The end.

Yes. This was the end.

The civilization humanity had built over countless years lay in ruins, and not a scrap of hope remained in anyone’s heart.

More precisely, their hope was already dead.

One person at a time. Slowly.

Torn into hundreds or thousands of pieces, they disappeared into the bellies of hungry monsters.

“To Magic Johnson.”

A quiet voice carried across a vast plaza lit by countless flickering candles.

A face both familiar and unfamiliar.

Team Leader Choi, his face covered in scars and one arm gone, drained his glass.

Xiao Shen lifted a bottle with tearful eyes and filled the empty glass.

“To ‘Uncle Chuck’ Hagel and our friend Stone-King, who became eternal stars one year ago today.”

As I heard the names called out with every glass filled and drained, I understood.

This was a memorial for the fallen.

A send-off before battle, one last remembrance of the heroes who had gone ahead—the people who had been humanity's hope.

And…

"To the bravest man of all."

"To the light of humanity, who stood against the darkness and always lit the way for everyone."

I was nowhere to be seen.

"To Jin Taekyung…"

The trembling voice fell silent. Team Leader Choi drained yet another glass and clenched his fist.

Crack.

Blood ran from his hand, mingling with the shards of the shattered glass and dripping onto the ground. The candles went out all at once, and silence fell over the entire plaza.

At the same time, light swelled at Team Leader Choi's waist.

Fwoosh.

The Hero's Sword.

Cracked and broken though it was, its blade still held a keen edge. Brilliant light welled up along it, spreading across the candleless plaza and faintly illuminating the deep darkness.

Flap.

A powerful wind swept in from afar and whipped dozens of flags, large and small.

A crossed sword and shield. The design was crudely drawn, but I recognized it: the flag of the World Hunter Federation.

"There's nowhere left to retreat."

Thud. Thud-thud.

Thousands—perhaps tens of thousands—of feet stamped the ground. The light gathered on the Hero's Sword picked out their faces one by one.

"And we must not retreat."

Clang! Clang-clang!

Blades clashed in the air, spitting sparks. The tanks slammed and pounded their massive Tower Shields like mad.

They moved with a single purpose, like the pulse of one enormous heart.

For those who had gone before them, and as they waited for the battle ahead, they looked to their new Alliance Leader.

They waited for his final words.

"Today, we fight until the very last person."

Clang-clang-clang!

“WAAAAH!”

Countless auras surged upward at once, as if on cue. Their distant cry rose as one voice and drove back the darkness.

The candles that had lit the plaza were long since out, but humanity’s flame still burned.

At least until they fell here today.

Until the darkness came to extinguish that final flame.

SHWAAAA…

At that moment, the wind stopped.

The air trembled.

The plaza, heated to a fever pitch, went cold. Countless eyes turned in the same direction.

There stood a being cloaked in darkness.

“Ah…”

A moan escaped someone’s lips and reached my ears.

My senses, floating as if submerged in water, came back to me. The hairs all over my body stood on end.

The Demon King.

Instinctive fear and wariness rose in me. Unlike before, I turned my head of my own will. Following everyone’s gaze, I looked at him.

Demon King Asmodeus.

The accursed king who had driven humanity into the flames in the past—and would do so in a future that had yet to begin.

And the moment I stared into the writhing darkness in the distance—

Crack…

The world around me collapsed. Every illusion shattered.

Chapter 831

I could've sworn I heard something like that.

CRASH.

The sound of a window shattering.

It was the signal that it was time to leave the illusion around me and return to reality. An alarm waking my mind from its deep slumber.

Fwoosh.

The scenery around me melted away like ice cream. The shouts that had sounded so clear now seemed distant, like echoes.

"Chaaaarge!"

The last battle of the Great War. Perhaps the final battle, with humanity's fate hanging in the balance.

Team Leader Choi strode forward, the Hero's Sword held high, and countless Hunters followed him like a surging wave.

Toward somewhere the moonlight couldn't reach.

Toward a being standing alone, cloaked in darkness.

No.

Not yet. Not yet.

I reached out with all my strength. Through my blurring vision, I moved the body that had become entirely my own and took a step toward him.

Demon King Asmodeus.

I could see the back of that calamity. He wasn't enormous or grotesque.

Even if all of this was an illusion that would never come to pass, I wanted to see his true form with my own eyes—the form no one had ever told me about.

I wanted to catch even a glimpse of him buried in the deep darkness, to feel the power coiled within him, if only for a moment.

More. Just a little more!

I didn't know.

Maybe my desperate cry had echoed in my heart and reached him. Or maybe everything I was seeing and feeling wasn't an illusion after all, but something else.

There was only one thing I could be sure of: something had reacted to my soundless cry.

Rustle.

A figure slowly turning around. Darkness rippling.

"…!"

My heart lurched. An icy chill ran down my spine.

It made no sense. It was impossible.

But the Demon King was definitely turning toward me—and that was the last thing I saw.

Flash.

Everything around me disappeared. Team Leader Choi and Xiao Shen, the countless Hunters. Even Demon King Asmodeus.

But the darkness did not disappear.

No—an abyss-like presence was closing in, pressing in on me from every direction.

What the hell is this…

I was confused. I couldn't tell what was happening.

Was what I was seeing another illusion? Or had I finally reached my limit, lost consciousness, and started dreaming?

And just as those questions gripped me—

Ding.

> System You are the Chosen One. The Master of the Ark.
> The System automatically activates its firewall.
> The System blocks a newly detected virus.
> Abyssal Swamp has been dispelled.
> Power of the Abyss dissipates.
> Level 10 "The Final Abyss" Doppelganger has been blocked.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

Clear chimes reached my ears and rang out in every direction.

At the same time, the darkness that had writhed toward me like a living snake rapidly scattered.

It shuddered violently, as if it had encountered something it feared.

And then I realized what this abyss was.

I knew what had brought all those illusions crashing down on me, too.

Doppelganger.

A line I'd read somewhere suddenly came to mind.

When you look into the abyss, the abyss looks back at you.

The line meant something else, but it described what had happened to me.

I looked at the Doppelganger, and the Doppelganger looked at me. That was how I'd been dragged into the abyss it had created.

No—that was what had happened.

But now I knew.

This was another illusion within reality. The Doppelganger's power itself.

And I knew what I had to do.

Fwoosh.

Heat surged from my empty hands. Darkness writhed against the dazzling blue-white flames.

As if I'd made up my mind to do this long ago, I reached out with hands blazing with Scorching Yang Qi and seized the darkness.

CRUNCH.

And the instant I tore it apart—

SHRAAAK!

I saw it.

The darkness crumbled away, reduced to ash by the flames. Beyond it, the world I remembered came into view.

Huff.

Dusty air flowed through my nose and mouth.

The chunks of stone that had hung in midair began to fall again. The Skeleton King came into view, staring at me with wide eyes.

It all happened in an instant.

Had even a second passed in reality?

But I'd experienced at least several hours—years' worth of illusions—and returned.

There probably wasn't a single survivor among those who'd gone through what I had. They must all have been absorbed by the Doppelganger.

"What the…"

I couldn't explain it in a few words, and there was no time to try.

Instead of answering the confused Skeleton King, I shook my head.

Then I left him behind and faced the Doppelganger, which was staring up at me in a daze.

"You—you… What are you…?"

Rustle.

Its shadowy body wavered and kept scattering, bit by bit.

What I'd torn apart with my flame-wreathed hands wasn't just an illusion. It was the Doppelganger's body, its very life.

"I got a good look at your last-ditch effort."

"…!"

"Yeah. I figured there had to be some reason that dog barking its head off this whole time was cooperating so easily."

At my offhand remark, the Doppelganger shuddered.

Darkness welled up from it like blood, then scattered like ash. Each time, the shadow that served as its body grew smaller.

“Honestly, it wasn’t a bad attempt. If I’d been in my usual shape, you wouldn’t have stood a chance. But I didn’t expect some fucker to cut in without using his turn signal.”

“This can’t… This can’t be happening.”

“If a bastard like you can exist, why can’t a bastard like me?”

The Doppelganger muttered as if groaning.

“The Chosen One…”

The Chosen One. The Master of the Ark.

I didn’t know why the Doppelganger and the System called me that.

I didn’t know who had chosen me, or what the Ark was. I couldn’t know that right now.

But if those two words referring to me weren’t just nonsense, then I knew at least this much: stopping that fucked-up scene the Doppelganger had shown me must be the mission I’d been given.

“Brace yourself. Everything you saw will soon become the future—and reality.”

“Are you sure? I may be a genius, but I’m not exactly planning to die young.”

The Doppelganger laughed out loud at my reply. Its helplessness and madness were impossible to hide now that it had accepted its complete Erasure.

“If the King returns, will you still be able to say that?”

I thought of the deep darkness I’d seen in the illusion.

I thought of that last glimpse of Demon King Asmodeus, whose appearance I’d never managed to make out clearly. I thought of the overwhelming strength I’d felt from him, even from a distance.

If I fought him, could I really win?

An empty question.

I already knew the answer.

Demon King Asmodeus was strong. No—there was no point even talking about how strong he was.

If that had been reality, and the power I’d felt was real, just meeting his gaze would’ve frozen my hands and feet.

But sometimes a question has more than one answer.

Especially when I’m the one solving it.

“If I fought him as I am now, I’d definitely die. Miserably, without even managing to hurt him properly.”

At my answer, the Doppelganger’s laughter grew louder. It didn’t seem to care that more than half its body had already disappeared.

“Yes. That is the truth. Accepting the death our King has decreed is all you can do…”

“You’re leaving out a premise.”

"What?"

I looked at the Doppelganger as it fell silent and continued slowly.

"If it were me right now. That's the most important premise."

At some point, I'd changed. I'd had no choice but to change in order to survive, in order to protect what mattered.

I'd thrown away the caution I'd held on to as an F-rank Hunter. Sometimes I'd faced my enemies boldly—and with even greater recklessness.

And every time I risked my life in a fight, I'd reaped the rewards of that risk.

That's how it's been so far, and that's how it'll keep being.

The man I am now and the man I'll be in the future are different.

So the future has to change, too. Whatever risks I have to take—even if it costs me my life—I'll change it with my own power.

That's all I can do. And it must be why someone I don't know chose me.

"An illusion is just an illusion. We'll have to wait and see how the future changes… but some bastard who's about to drop dead won't be around to find out, so it's none of his business."

The Middle Dantian is moved by mental strength, and mental strength comes from a steadfast heart.

I won't be shaken by some horrible illusion or a few words from the Doppelganger.

"And you seem to have forgotten something important."

I was tired. I felt like I could collapse at any moment.

But as I looked down at the Doppelganger, which had stiffened, I wanted to make sure I said this.

"The future's already changed."

I pulled at the corner of my mouth, stiff with dried blood. Fighting off the sleep that threatened to overwhelm me, I went on.

"I put an end to your plan. With my own hands."

I didn't know exactly what the Doppelganger had planned to do or what it had hoped to achieve.

I'd wanted to hear it directly from the thing itself, but it would be completely gone in a few seconds. There was no point asking now.

I could find everything out.

Even if I had to scour the whole world, I'd track down every trace of the Doppelganger and pull up the roots it had left behind. Then the illusion would remain an illusion.

Peace would settle over the future that had been filled with calamity.

I can do it.

This wasn't just a wish. I was certain.

At last, the world had come together. I'd sounded the alarm for those who'd grown complacent in times of peace and thrown cold water in the faces of the powerful who'd refused to confront reality.

And I'd brought those known as humanity's sword and shield—the countless Hunters—together under one flag.

The World Hunter Federation.

An organization that transcended gender, race, age, and national borders.

I was the Alliance Leader at the head of that vast federation.

Everyone had chosen me. Everyone trusted and followed me. So there was no room in my heart for the word impossible.

"So…"

My voice trailed off, growing weak.

My vision slowly tilted against my will. Without a word, the Skeleton King suddenly came up beside me and reached out to support me.

He helped me finish what I hadn't yet managed to say.

"Quit your bullshit and go link arms with your friend who went ahead of you. You can watch from there."

Whoosh.

My toe came down hard, with a heavy rush of air.

And in that moment, something inexplicable caught my eye through my hazy vision.

Was it… smiling?

I couldn't possibly know.

Was the smile an illusion brought on by exhaustion? Or was it a reality I couldn't understand?

Before I could even think back over that fleeting question, the toe, still wreathed in a faint flame, had already stamped down on the shadow. It led a monster that had lived through ages beyond imagining to Erasure.

BOOM!

The shadow shattered and scattered with a deafening crash. Through it rang the clear chime announcing the Doppelganger's Erasure.

Ding.

It was over. At last.

At least in that moment, I was sure it was.

Until an unpleasant noise pierced my ears.

Beep.

> System Main Quest Cataclysm has failed!

...What?

Chapter 832

Sometimes, what you've always taken for granted goes wrong.

A moment when something you'd always taken for granted—one is followed by two, and two by three—suddenly takes an unexpected turn.

But I'd never once imagined this outcome.

Beep.

> System Main Quest Cataclysm has failed!

...What?

I froze like a statue and stared blankly at the holographic window floating in the air.

Inside its translucent frame were the same words I'd just heard.

Main Quest. Failed.

The two words drilled into my retinas, tearing through the emptiness in my mind and leaving me reeling.

Why? How could this happen?

My lips moved on instinct, but no sound came out.

With endless questions swirling in my mind, I shook my head. The world spun around me. No matter how I looked at it, I couldn't make sense of what was happening.

Was I dreaming?

Or was I still trapped in an illusion the Doppelganger had created?

I wished I were. Unfortunately, this was real.

"...Human, snap out of it!"

A voice reached me through my blurred vision. If the Skeleton King's hand shaking me was proof that this was all real—

Ding. Ding. Ding.

The chimes kept ringing, and the darkness scattering into the air like ash was proof that one being had been erased.

> System You have defeated Level 10 "The Final Abyss" Doppelganger.
>
> Due to the extreme level difference, you receive no Reward.
>
> With the death of this target, the Doppelganger species has been completely wiped out.
>
> You have completely eradicated a species. The name Doppelganger will now slowly be forgotten as time passes.

> You have achieved the very rare achievement, Where's Your Do Clan From?[3274]
>
> As a Reward for achieving a very rare achievement, you have gained a massive amount of EXP and Fame!
>
> You have acquired the Title Species Slayer!
>
> Level Up!

Another Level Up. Another recovery.

Fwoosh.

My foggy vision cleared. Strength surged through my revitalized body, more powerful than before.

None of that mattered.

Something else was far more important.

I'd failed the most important Quest—the one I'd been certain I would complete.

The Doppelganger was erased. I'm sure of it.

My body was brimming with strength, but my mental reserves had run dry long ago. The shock made me stagger.

Michael Silbert was dead. The Doppelganger was dead. With my own hands, I'd eliminated the beings that threatened this world.

I'd thought it was over. It should have been over.

Even if a new threat came someday and plunged the whole world into fire, I'd believed we could at least buy ourselves some time right now.

But we hadn't.

That smile.

I couldn't breathe. A terrible headache stabbed through my skull like an awl, and I remembered the Doppelganger's final moments. That faint smile I'd dismissed as a trick of my eyes.

I didn't see it wrong…

I'd been wrong. That smile was real—the smile of someone who had finished what they'd set out to do.

Where had things gone wrong? Had I not tried hard enough? Had I not been strong enough?

Or had the calamity I'd tried to stop been in the making for so long that no mere human could have prevented it?

I didn't know. I couldn't tell what had happened.

I was sure of only one thing: something that should never have happened had begun.

[3274] The Korean title is a dialect-flavored pun that sounds like "Where are you from, Mr. Do?" while also evoking a question about one's ancestral clan.

Boom. Ba-boom.

A drumbeat suddenly reached my ears.

Neither a clear chime nor a mechanical warning, it was more ominous than any sound I'd ever heard. A war drum heralding the start of a great war—and a warning from the System.

Ba-boom.

> System Main Quest Cataclysm has failed.
>
> Some details in the Quest window have been updated.
>
> Mission: Stop the Summoning (Failed)
>
> You have failed to complete the mission.
>
> The boundary of the Demon Realm has temporarily opened. Unidentified beings are invading this world.
>
> A page of history is turning, and a new age is right around the corner.
>
> The rift has begun.
>
> Current rift progress: 10%
>
> As the rift progresses, the distribution and concentration of magical power will rise sharply. These changes may vary by location and over time, and may affect the laws and living beings of this world to varying degrees.

"…!"

I stared wide-eyed at the new holographic windows.

The Demon Realm.

A cursed world no one had ever glimpsed, crawling with darkness and monsters. A land of death ruled by Demon King Asmodeus.

It had opened. Only temporarily, but it had opened.

Cursed beings, summoned from another dimension by someone else, had set foot in this world.

A rift. Magical power surging.

So this was the plan the Doppelganger had prepared.

I'd underestimated it.

It had manipulated the whole world from behind Michael Silbert and made itself a divine figure in a vast religion. It was that cunning.

Why had I assumed a creature like that wouldn't have a failsafe for a plan it had spent more than thirty years preparing?

A bomb doesn't care who owns it. Whoever holds the switch, the slightest jolt can set it off.

Just like now.

Dammit.

My mind went blank.

The bomb had already gone off. The rift had begun. A calamity beyond anything Mutated Gates or Monster Waves could compare to would spread like wildfire.

"We have to stop it. Right now."

Grab.

I seized the Skeleton King's wrist. He'd been watching my inexplicable behavior ever since the Doppelganger died, and now he shouted in confusion.

"Get a grip, human! It's already dead."

"No."

"What?"

"This is just the beginning. It's not over."

"What are you talking about—"

"Tell the main force. Tell the World Hunter Federation. Right now."

I struggled for breath. My hand trembled around his wrist.

I was tired. I wanted to rest.

The mental exhaustion that had been eating away at me, combined with the shock I hadn't seen coming, kept dragging me toward darkness. The sleep demon pressed down on my eyelids with the weight of ten thousand geun.[3275]

But—

Crunch.

I bit my tongue and fought off the sleep. Forcing my fading consciousness back, I went on.

"We failed. The Doppelganger's plan worked."

"…!"

"They're coming."

That was all I managed to say.

Slump.

"Human! Human!"

The Skeleton King tried to haul me up with his powerful hands, but my body went limp against my will.

As my consciousness sank after the long fight, I thought of the best thing I could do now.

Murim.

The Main Quest had failed, but regardless of the outcome, the System's restrictions were gone. The wall separating the two worlds had crumbled.

I had to go back.

[3275] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g, or about 1.32 lb. Ten thousand geun is 6,000 kg, or about 13,200 lb.

To the other world that had given me a second life. To the place where time flowed so slowly that I could delay the flames of calamity.

But…

Why was I so sleepy? Why couldn't I think?

Log…

The three syllables I'd always called out so confidently faded inside my mind. Before I could finish that one short word, my thoughts sank beneath the water.

And just as I was about to plunge into complete darkness—

Ding.

A clear chime sounded, followed by a voice that might have been a hallucination.

> System The System is automatically executing a new update.
>
> The System wishes to move the Player under its authority. Do you accept this offer?
>
> The Player has not responded. Proceeding automatically.
>
> Connecting to Murim.
>
> Countdown begins.
>
> 10, 9, 8…
>
> .
>
> .
>
> .
>
> Login successful.
>
> May fortune favor you in battle.

Fwoosh.

A burst of light announced the opening of a new world. I let go of the last thread of consciousness I'd held on to.

Ahomed Jemal Pasha.

His name was long by ordinary standards and short for a man from the Middle East. He trembled with joy alongside the dozens of companions gathered around him.

"Ah… Ahhh…"

"Inshallah!"[3276]

It had been an unbearably long time. It was true for Ahomed, whose family had followed God's will for generations, as it was for the others.

[3276] Inshallah is Arabic for "if God wills."

Though they'd been blessed with a talent for magic that anyone would envy, they'd had to hide from the world and live like criminals. They'd had to keep secret their great plan to change the world's fate.

But…

We did it. At last.

Ahomed felt hot tears running down his face before he even realized it. He had devoted his entire life to following only the Prophet's words.

In the old mage's eyes lay the relief of someone finally free of all his hardship, the joy of fulfilling God's mission, and worry and sorrow for someone who wasn't there.

O Prophet. Our guiding light. Where are you now?

He had an inkling of what it meant that the Prophet had not returned from confronting the infidels' army. But Ahomed kept his feelings to himself.

If the Prophet had died, it was a holy sacrifice in service of God's mission. A martyrdom. He must not grieve.

Perhaps he foresaw a day like this long ago.

No. A great prophet like him would surely have foreseen it all.

That must have been why, before leaving, he had summoned Ahomed, the one in charge, and impressed these instructions upon him.

> "Ahomed. If I haven't returned by dawn three days from now, you and the others who remain must complete the mission."
>
> "P-Prophet, how could you say such a thing?"
>
> "It's only a precaution. If you all don't stay here to protect everyone and carry on the mission, how can we fight the infidels' army without worry?"
>
> "B-but…"
>
> "I trust you, Ahomed. You are my brother and Disciple, bound to me in the name of God."

Neither the Prophet—no, the Doppelganger—nor Ahomed knew that he would never return. That a single human would erase him forever.

Yet that was exactly what had happened. Sensing that something had gone wrong, Ahomed led the mages who had studied under the Prophet alongside him to the Magic Formation they had spent so long preparing.

And now, in this very moment—

They watched the darkness rise, devouring more Magic Gems than they could count.

"O Messenger of God! O God's hammer, come to set this defiled world right! At last, descend upon us!"

His cry rang out, carrying a lifetime of pent-up anguish and a faith that could only be called fanatical.

Fwooooooosh.

Deep within the darkness, red eyes flashed.

Chapter 833

Dazed.

A weightless sensation, as though gravity had ceased to exist, filled Jin Taekyung's body.

Jin Taekyung opened his eyes amid that alien sensation and stared blankly at the unfamiliar sight spread out before him, beyond a field of vision full of static like a broken television screen.

Where am I?

A look around gave him the answer.

Stalactites hung from the ceiling. The floor was wet, the air damp.

He hadn't recognized it at once because it was impossibly vast, but he was in a cave.

And in that cave, marked here and there by human hands, tens of thousands of people had gathered.

"Ooh. Oooooh…"

"Inshallah!"[3277]

Their cries reached him faintly, like echoes.

Someone in a long robe called out, and people sank to their knees in a wave that passed through the crowd like falling dominoes.

An old man with a hunched back, a man and woman clutching each other's hands, children whose eyes had been shining with innocence—none remained standing.

No. They were all there was: ordinary people of the sort you could see anywhere in the Middle East.

Only one group stood out among them: figures in robes covered with unfamiliar patterns.

Swish.

The hem of a long robe brushed the floor. An old man with snowy hair showing beneath a loosely wrapped turban spread his arms wide.

"O Messenger of God! O God's hammer, come to set this defiled world right!"

At his cry, Jin Taekyung noticed something stranger than anything else in that unfamiliar scene.

That's…

It was darkness. And fire.

Countless Magic Gems were piled almost to the ceiling, enough to fill half the enormous cavern. They fed the flames like kindling.

[3277] Inshallah is an Arabic expression meaning "God willing."

Darkness so dense it seemed impossible to have missed until now rippled like fire. An unprecedented power writhed within it, ready to burst forth at any moment.

Fwooooooosh.

Rapture filled the old mage's eyes as he watched. Though his body shook, he raised the staff in his hand and cried out once more. Light poured from it.

"At last, descend upon us!"

At that moment—

Crack.

The space beyond the tightly sealed darkness opened its jaws, like a child forcing its own way out of the womb.

The black flames thrashed like a writhing dragon and swallowed countless Magic Gems. Pure, unrefined magical power coursed along the Magic Formation carved into the ground and flowed into the flames.

On and on. Until the Magic Gems had poured out all their energy and crumbled to ash.

Crackle.

The mountain of Magic Gems began to break apart. It collapsed.

Jin Taekyung watched in shock as those masses of magical power, their purpose served, lost their strength and scattered.

He watched the enormous bomb he'd been searching for with such desperation ignite—the seed of calamity that had slipped away somewhere, hidden from the world's eyes for decades.

And at last, calamity in full bloom stepped through the crack in space.

Step.

A snow-white bare foot touched the ground. Two legs and two arms, no different from a human's. Yet the red gleam in the man's eyes marked him as unlike anyone else.

Haaah.

The black-haired man wore not a thread of clothing. He breathed slowly.

Like a sailor home after a long voyage. Or a predator before a tempting meal.

His eyes, so recently gleaming red, had turned pitch-black. Through them, he took in this new world, seeing and sensing everything around him.

The faint sunlight filtering through the ceiling.

The damp air. The tens of thousands of people pressed flat against the wet floor as though worshiping a god.

And finally, the old mage staggering toward him.

"Ah… Ahhh…"

The mage, Ahomed, stared at the man with tears streaming down his face.

Skin so translucent the veins showed through. A face of unbelievable beauty. And an immense power surging within him.

There could be no doubt.

The man before him was God's messenger, a being who could truly be called a divine man.

"O Prophet, are you watching? At last, your prophecy has come true—!"

The instant Ahomed opened his arms toward the man—

Slice.

His trembling voice cut off. The old mage's body collapsed like a rotten log.

Thump. Thud.

His arms and legs, torn apart. His upper and lower body, severed.

And last of all, his head slid diagonally off his torso and hit the ground.

It rolled like a ball of thread until it reached the man's feet. He looked down at the dead mage's face.

"You did well."

That was all.

The darkness writhing around the man drew in the corpse, now cut into dozens of pieces. It swallowed, broke down, melted, and digested them.

Crunch.

The horrible sound of bone and flesh being crushed rang through the silent cavern.

"…!"

The tens of thousands who had seen it happen froze.

So did the mages who had been celebrating their success moments ago. And so did the one man watching it all through a dreamlike haze.

That's him.

Jin Taekyung knew it instinctively.

The strange man standing alone before them was something that should not exist in this world.

A demon who had crossed through that slowly closing crack in space from a world of death cursed by God.

Rustle.

The darkness, having devoured the corpse without leaving a drop of blood, coiled around the man from head to toe. It became fine black silk, clothing him, then settled across his shoulders as a cloak.

No. At the same time, it rose behind him like enormous wings.

Flash!

Jin Taekyung saw it.

The darkness spread without end. It blotted out the sunlight leaking through the ceiling and cast death over the heads of people frozen like statues.

The living and the dead.

A storm of magical power that swallowed them all.

The cavern shattered. Terrible screams rose. The nightmare surrounding Jin Taekyung broke apart, and he woke.

CRUUUUNCH!

Hah.

I opened my eyes and let out the breath I'd been holding.

An unfamiliar ceiling came into view. Somewhere, hooves clopped, and my body rocked gently to their rhythm.

"Ah."

I blinked with a low groan. One deep breath steadied me, drawing hot, humid air into my lungs.

This is…

I didn't need to look around to know.

I was lying in a carriage. I recognized Nanman's heat and humidity, though I hadn't felt them in a couple of months.

Of course, given the difference in how time passed between here and the modern world, it had probably been only a few shichen,[3278] not two months.

That last System notification wasn't a dream.

Relief hit me so suddenly that all the strength went out of me.

In my final moments in the modern world, my mental strength had been drained so completely I couldn't even attempt Login.

If the System hadn't helped, even by force, I would've stayed collapsed for days without knowing what was happening… No, wait.

System update?

Those words stood out amid my jumbled memories.

If all the System notifications I'd heard were true, then something had changed—something that had never happened before.

I sat up in a hurry and gave the command in my mind.

Open Status Window.

Nothing happened, just as I'd half feared.

However hard I stared at the empty air, no translucent window appeared. Nor did I hear the clear chime that should have accompanied the command.

[3278] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

"…Shit."

The curse slipped out before I could stop it. I was rattled, but I had a fair idea why the System had suddenly stopped working.

System update.

Maybe I can't use it until the update's done?

I'd always preferred using my body to sitting at a computer, even as a kid. But anyone with a smartphone knew what an update was.

What threw me was that I'd never imagined the System would have one.

I guess it's a program too. It makes sense that it could update.

What kind of lunatic made a thing like this, let alone updated it? Still, it had happened.

Then again, maybe an update was nothing special. The System already connected two worlds and let me level up like I was in a game.

Besides…

After what happened.

I remembered the unbelievable things the System had told me right after I erased the Doppelganger.

And I understood all over again that the vast, terrible calamity I'd failed to stop had begun.

Clench.

My hand tightened without me realizing it. My fist had gone white and trembled. At the same time, the scene from the nightmare flashed before my eyes.

The truth was, I still didn't know what I'd seen.

Had the System secretly shown me something real through a dream? Had my confused subconscious made it all up?

Or was it some kind of prophetic dream?

I wanted it to have been nothing more than a nightmare. Instinct told me otherwise.

That wasn't… just a nightmare.

I'd seen it clearly, even through the static. I remembered.

The crack in space opened, if only briefly, using countless Magic Gems and a Magic Formation as its medium. And the man wreathed in a monstrous amount of magical power, slaughtering tens of thousands of fanatics who could offer no resistance.

No—the demon who, for some reason, looked human.

No way.

A name came to mind. I forced it away.

I still didn't know what he was. But judging by the Doppelganger's attitude when we spoke and the way events had unfolded, that man wasn't Asmodeus.

Even if—if he really was a Demon King…

I have enough time.

I could shut myself away and train as I had on Mount Jiuhua. A little over a year could pass for me in Murim while only a few days went by in the modern world.

As long as the System existed, time was on my side.

Dark Heaven might not be, though.

I got up and looked around the carriage.

Was sleeping in carriages the latest fad at the Nanman Beast Palace? Even allowing for exaggeration, the interior was about as roomy as the private wing of a large inn. And I was alone.

Quiet is nice, but where did everyone go?

None of the familiar faces who should have been nearby were there.

The people from the Fire Dragon Pavilion. Hyuk Mujin, who should've been sitting beside me as my guard and nodding off. And Jeok Cheongang, whose jaw had dropped when I told him about the modern world and he mistook it for the realm of immortals.

Where the hell did they… Hm?

I was wandering around the carriage to loosen up when a familiar voice reached my ears.

"The Earth Mother Goddess has already scrapped the Central Plains. So who does the Central Plains martial world revolve around now? Our Captain. That's right, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon of the great Jin Family of Taiyuan."

"Ooh. Oooooh."

What the hell was he talking about?

I listened past the surrounding murmur to the voice carrying over it.

"And who is it that believes in and follows that Blazing Flame Divine Dragon? It's me. Want to know why? Because I've got my place at the Captain's side locked down! I'm his most trusted subordinate—that's why my place is secure."

"A firm grip? How so?"

"Captain, don't move! Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, mess with me and you're dead! That's how close I am to our Captain. Incredibly close."

"Ohhh."

"Who's the Earth Mother Goddess's son? The Blazing Flame Divine Dragon! And who's got a tight hold on the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon?"

Just as his speech reached its climax, I stuck my head out the window.

"Listening to all that has me curious. Who is it?"

Hyuk Mujin laughed heartily and turned.

Then his eyes met mine, and he went stiff.

"Me! Hyuk Mu—uh, fuck."

“Fuck?”
“Ah.”
“Ah?”
Come here, you bastard.

Chapter 834

Everyone has their own way of forgetting their troubles.

Some people soothe their grief with books and music. Others shake off their anger with good food and a drink.

Getting physical works, too. Run until you're gasping for breath, exercise hard enough, and all those half-baked thoughts get wiped clean from your mind.

I'd always preferred that last method. I was born weighing over eleven pounds, after all—a record-breaking baby at the local maternity clinic.

"Nothing beats vigorous exercise. Don't you think so too, Mujin?"

At my voice, soft as a cat's paw, Hyuk Mujin—who'd been listening to my lecture on "overcoming your troubles"—finally opened his tightly shut mouth.

"No."

"No?"

"Yes."

"Why not?"

"Because you're going to hit me."

"Who says? I haven't even said anything yet."

"Your fist, Captain. It's practically howling."

Hyuk Mujin's eyes trembled as he looked at me—or, more precisely, at my clenched fist. I nodded readily.

"Yeah. You're right."

"…You're admitting it that easily?"

"I have to. That's reality."

"Could you spare me just this once?"

"People could misunderstand that question. Anyone listening might think I'm trying to kill you."

"You may not kill me, but you hit me like you're trying to."

"When did I do that?"

Hyuk Mujin stared at me in disbelief, then shouted as if his life depended on it.

"Yesterday! The day before! Since last year! All the time! Rain or snow—"

Wham!

"Urgh!"

There's always a reason someone gets beaten up.

I got into the swing of it, happily beating Hyuk Mujin until my troubles in the modern world began to fade. Then I sensed people approaching, and familiar voices came through the slats of the tightly shut carriage window.

“Why did the carriage stop—wait, why are there only guides here? Where’s Hyuk Mujin?”

“I don’t see Taishan either!”

After the urgent voices of a young man and woman came an old man’s shout.

“What! That Taishan brat has disappeared?”

“Yes. He should be with Hyuk Mujin and the other guides, protecting the Pavilion Master.”

“Oh, thank you, gods of heaven and earth. Ever since I met that bastard, the back of my head’s been throbbing, and I thought I’d kick the bucket any day now. Looks like I’ve got another twenty years in me.”

“Now that’s going too far!”

“Going too far, my ass. What’s going too far is the appetite of that underling of yours—Taishan, Scenic Mountain, whatever his name is. I’ve spent decades in Nanman and seen all kinds of strange beasts, but I never imagined there’d be a man who ate more than an elephant.”

“Now, listen here, Elder Nam!”

“Hey, hang on. This little shit’s been mouthing off at me for a while now… You think you can act like this in front of Senior Jeok? You’re still wet behind the ears—how dare you raise your voice at an elder!”

As that dizzying conversation went on, Hyuk Mujin, sprawled on the floor and twitching, called out.

“I-I’m right here! Help me!”

A short silence followed. Then everyone shouted at once.

“Dark Heaven! It’s an attack by Dark Heaven!”

“Hyuk Mujin will be fine—save the Pavilion Master first!”

“Damn it, were the guides in on it too? Then Taishan must’ve—!”

“By this old man’s keen eye, that Taishan brat’s in on it too! If he shows up, kill him! Please, kill him!”

Clang, clang, clang!

As swords were drawn and the Nanman guides screamed in terror, I found myself thinking:

Ah. I miss Mom.

Murim really wasn’t easy.

The people who saw me step out of the carriage unharmed reacted in all sorts of ways.

“We’re saved!”

“O Apostle of the Earth Mother Goddess!”

“Mother Goddess Heaven! Unbeliever Hell!”

The guides from the Nanman Beast Palace, who’d been branded Dark Heaven’s lackeys and nearly killed without a chance to explain themselves, sank to the ground.

“Huh?”

“Huh?”

Soul-Chasing Guest Song Ilseom and Black Dragon Saber Sama Pyo had been ready to cut someone down first and ask questions later. They both froze at the same instant, like mirror images.

“Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung… was with Dark Heaven all along?”

Namho, a Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent who’d lived in Nanman for decades since the Great Faction War, finally started showing signs of dementia.

“Benefactor!”

Last of all, Ju Hwaran—the Escort King’s granddaughter and the Young Bureau Head of the Yongbong Escort Bureau—ran toward me with a cry that sounded almost like a scream.

She threw her arms around me.

Well, coming to Murim really had been the right call.

But I was a man who kept personal feelings separate from official business, no matter the circumstances. I forced the corners of my mouth to stay down and spoke solemnly.

“What shampoo do you use?”

“I was so worried something had happened to you, I was terrif—what?”

“N-Nothing.”

I must have been a little out of it.

I took a deep breath to collect myself. Ju Hwaran asked, her voice full of concern, “Are you really all right?”

“I’m fine all year round—rain, snow, thunder, hail. But seriously, what shampoo do you use?”

“Oh no. You must have hit your head.”

“…Sorry. I didn’t hit my head. I’m just a little confused.”

That stream-of-consciousness thing is no joke.

I’d only just returned from the modern world, and maybe I was still half asleep. With my tongue doing whatever it wanted, proving I was in my right mind took a little time and effort.

Which meant submitting to a test administered by a certain old, eccentric Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent.

“What is this old man’s name?”

“Why do I have to do this?”

“Answer the question. I’ll ask again. My name?”

“This is driving me nuts.”

“This old man’s name isn’t Mi.”[3279]

“Wow, I’m going to lose my mind.”

“It isn’t Wa, either.”

I was about to say I was going crazy, but gave up and answered.

“Namho.”

“Then what’s my affiliation?”

“Hidden Shadow Pavilion.”

“Wrong.”

“What?”

“This old man isn’t just a Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent. I’m its finest agent.”

“Aren’t you just its oldest agent?”

“…”

Namho glared at me without a word. Hyuk Mujin, who’d finally escaped the Truthful Carriage and was recovering, muttered,

“His memory and judgment seem fine to me.”

“Bah! What do you know, you fool!”

“Whoa. Why are you getting so mad?”

“This old man has a plan, too. What would you do if the fellow in front of you were a Dark Heaven lackey wearing Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung’s face?”

“I suspect infirmities of old age, but no, he isn’t. I’ll stake my neck on it.”

“What’s your evidence?”

“I got hit before everyone came over. That punch felt exactly like the Captain’s.”

“…”

“His fist sticks to my skin like glue. My body remembers it. My soul remembers it. I only get that feeling when the Captain hits me.”

Hyuk Mujin looked at me with a sad smile.

“I’m glad you woke up, Captain. I was really worried these past three days.”

I’d been wondering if I ought to hit him a little less from now on. At that, my brow furrowed.

“What did you just say?”

“Huh? What about?”

“Did you say three days?”

“Oh. You didn’t know? You woke up briefly three days ago, then slept the whole time after that, groaning and sweating.”

[3279] Namho pretends to hear the opening sounds of Taekyung’s exasperated Korean remarks as surnames.

"…Of course I didn't know. How would someone who was asleep know?"

Hyuk Mujin rubbed the bump on his head, looking sheepish.

"Sorry. Anyway, everyone was in an uproar over it. Elder Nam searched everywhere nearby with the others, saying they had to find medicinal herbs. Great Hero Jeok left right away, saying he was heading to Sichuan."

"Old Master—no, my Master went to Sichuan?"

"Yes. I've never seen him in such a hurry."

"But why Sichuan… Oh."

Before I could finish the question, a thought crossed my mind.

The Sichuan Tang Clan.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord had dealt the Sichuan Tang Clan a devastating blow a few months ago. But the strength of a great family didn't disappear overnight.

Besides, the Sichuan Tang Clan, which mainly dealt in hidden weapons and poison, was also one of the most renowned medical families in the world.

And on top of that…

The Divine Physician is in Sichuan.

Strictly speaking, the Divine Physician known to the world was actually the Slaughter Saint. But unlike his master, the Disciple had stayed in Sichuan, and he was a physician every bit as worthy of the title.

Jeok Cheongang had gone ahead to bring that new Divine Physician back.

He didn't have to go that far.

I felt a pang of regret that I wouldn't get to see him right away, and a warmth stirred in one corner of my heart. Then a stabbing pain rose from deep inside my body.

This is…

There was no doubt. Separate from the System update, the effects of Broken Body remained.

That damage, which even leveling up hadn't healed, was needling me around the lower dantian.

Mm.

I swallowed the groan, but I couldn't stop my brow from furrowing a little. The people watching me noticed at once.

"C-Captain. Is something wrong?"

"No. I've just got something on my mind."

That wasn't a lie.

I was thinking about my injuries—and about Jeok Cheongang, who'd noticed them three days ago.

Old Master must have gone to find the Divine Physician because he realized he couldn't treat me himself.

I could say this without a doubt: Fire King Jeok Cheongang was a great martial artist and a good Master.

But my injury, which even the System couldn't heal, must have seemed beyond Jeok Cheongang, too.

Fuck. At first I thought I'd borrowed from a regular bank. Turns out it was a Sunshine Loan.[3280]

I felt like a gambler who'd borrowed from loan sharks to keep playing, only to ruin his life.

But what choice did I have now?

Even if I could go back to that moment, I knew I'd make the same choice. All I could do was give a bitter smile.

It couldn't be helped.

The stakes in those gambles hadn't been gold bars or checks. They'd been my life—and someone else's.

If I hadn't used One Annihilation at each of those moments of crisis, I wouldn't still be alive.

It bought me breathing room. I guess it's time to pay the debt.

The System wasn't someone I could sit down with and talk to, and I had no intention of whining at it. It had already given me more than enough and warned me again and again.

Every path I'd walked until now had been my own choice.

That's enough. It is what it is.

With that, I cleared the jumble of thoughts from my mind.

Thinking about it alone wouldn't make anything better right now. I had to consider how the people around me felt, too.

I'm really a considerate person, aren't I? No, wait a second.

"Then where'd that Taishan bastard go?"

"Huh?"

"Huh?"

Everyone blinked at my sudden question. One of the guides from the Nanman Beast Palace edged over.

"Um… the big fellow went to get something."

Namho looked baffled. "Went to get something?"

"Yes."

"What on earth?"

[3280] Sunshine Loan is a South Korean government-backed loan program for people with limited access to conventional bank credit.

"Well, um…"

The guide was about to answer when—

Rustle, rustle, rustle!

The bushes some fifty jang[3281] away shook, and a huge figure burst out. He was so massive you had to wonder if he was human.

"Taishan! Brought it!"

He raised the dark object in his hand high.

"Taishan's favorite thing in the world—no, a miracle cure for the sick Pavilion Master!"

The people watching stared blankly and murmured.

"That's honey."

"Right. A pot of honey."

"Sorry to interrupt, but isn't that a beehive, not a pot of honey?"

"That's true, too."

Bzzzzzzzz!

It was the first time I'd ever seen it.

Bees that big—and thousands of them all swarming together.

"…Primordial Heavenly Venerable. Gods of heaven and earth."

Leaving Namho's sorrowful voice behind, we all quietly climbed back into the carriage.

Murim really wasn't easy.

[3281] A Korean jang is ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Fifty jang is about 152 m (497 ft).

Chapter 835

Splaaash.

Sudal sat at the bow of the ship as it cut swiftly through the current, lost in thought. He was a river pirate of the Yangtze River Channel League and Deputy Stronghold Lord of the Water Dragon Stronghold, which held sway over Hubei Province.

Looking back, things have gone pretty well so far.

Sudal had made quite a name for himself in his line of work.

He was deputy lord of a major stronghold with more than five hundred river pirates under its command. And though it had taken him a long time, he had finally reached the Peak level of martial arts.

Simply staying active and in one piece as he approached fifty made him a model of a successful river pirate. But Sudal had achieved more than that.

I've saved up a decent amount of money, too.

Few water strongholds had hundreds of fighters.

On top of that, Mu Song, the Ship-Fire Boy who headed the Water Dragon Stronghold, was a shrewd man with powerful backing: he was a direct Disciple of the Alliance Leader of the Yangtze River Channel League. As his deputy, Sudal had made plenty just by picking up the scraps that fell his way.

Of course, a good deal of that wealth had gone to pleasure houses.

Could I buy a decent manor somewhere out in Hubei? Property prices have probably gone up again, though. Fuck. Do they plate the pillars in gold or something?

Sudal stared gloomily at the current, which broke into rough waves around the ship.

I never thought I'd be thinking about stuff like this.

Retirement? Settling down?

A few years ago—not even a few months ago—those soft, mushy words wouldn't have crossed his mind.

Sudal had always prided himself on being a born sailor and river pirate.

But not anymore. His carefree life as a raider, and his life as a bold man of the water, were both slowly coming to an end.

Even at this very moment.

"Um, Deputy Stronghold Lord?"

At the cautious call from behind him, Sudal squeezed his eyes shut.

I'm fucked.

It wasn't a guess. He was certain.

Ever since they'd left the wretched land of Yunnan five days ago, the same nightmare had come around again and again.

I thought we might make it through the whole day for once…

The inevitable had arrived.

But Sudal didn't run. He resolved to face it like a brave river pirate and answered.

"I'm listening. Speak."

"Well, you see, it's just…"

"Talk, or get your ass kicked."

"I'm too old to want a beating, so I'll talk. It's just… do we have any beef?"

Sudal turned slowly toward the familiar face of his subordinate.

"Are you that eager to get your ass kicked?"

"Of course not."

"Then say it again. What meat?"

"I need beef. Specifically, beef marinated in a spicy sauce."

"Beef. Spicy marinade…"

Sudal trailed off and took a deep breath. Recent experience was teaching him to recover the composure he'd forgotten decades ago.

"You know where we are right now, don't you?"

His subordinate nodded enthusiastically.

"Of course. We're aboard the swift ship, the pride of the Water Dragon Stronghold, symbol of the mighty Yangtze River Channel League!"

"And where is that swift ship?"

"We've finally left that godforsaken Yunnan behind and are crossing the Yangtze on our way to Sichuan."

"Then one last question. In the middle of the Yangtze, when it's been well over a month since we set foot on land, can we get our hands on marinated beef?"

"No."

"Correct. You're smarter than you look."

"Thanks, I guess."

The subordinate smiled awkwardly at the rare praise, then suddenly turned serious.

"But we have to bring some back."

"I said we don't have any."

"He said to make some if we don't."

"Could it be… that bastard?"

His subordinate looked around before answering in a voice kept low with great effort.

"Sure enough, it's that bastard."

You could always count on him to be the one.

Neither of them said the name, but they both knew.

At the moment, there was only one lunatic who'd demand spicy marinated beef aboard a ship crossing the Yangtze.

Taishan, the Tiger Giant Child.

Spending thirty years as a river pirate meant seeing all kinds of idiots and morons. But even a seasoned pirate like Sudal had never seen anyone like him.

A build and appetite that barely seemed human. Simple-mindedness that could shock even the most uncultured river pirates.

Actually, Sudal had once met another lunatic of much the same sort, albeit one considerably smaller.

"Shit. I'd almost forgotten him, and now I'm thinking about that bastard too."

"Who're you talking about?"

"That guy."

"Oh. That guy."

They both thought of him at the same time.

The young man who looked perfectly normal but seemed possessed by some kind of ghost, stuffing his face with dumplings and sweets whenever he got the chance.

Sudal gazed wistfully back on those days a few months ago, then let out a sigh.

Before Hubei was stained with blood, he'd been living a peaceful, sensible life as a river pirate.

"Still, things were a lot better when he was around. At least he brought his own food."

"What the hell are you talking about? He'd gobble it all up, then raise hell demanding candied hawthorn skewers.[3282]"

"Oh, really? That's what happened?"

"I'm telling you. The second he made eye contact with you, he'd start whining for those skewers. That horo bastard was something else."[3283]

One lunatic demanded beef with the sauce already on it, and another demanded candied hawthorn skewers.[3284]

Sudal shuddered at their cruelty. But then, as now, there was nothing he could do.

The lunatic who wanted beef was a Peak master from the Black Dragon Demon Gate, one of the foremost factions among the unorthodox. He was also the right-hand man of its Young Sect Leader, who was all but certain to inherit the sect. And that little shit he'd mentioned was a far, far bigger figure than even him.

If it's Cheongpung, the Huashan Divine Dragon, he's a big shot among big shots.

[3282] Candied hawthorn skewers are a traditional Chinese street snack made by coating hawthorn fruit with hardened sugar.

[3283] The Korean name for the snack, bingdanghoro, lets the speaker repeat horo, an insult meaning "bastard."

[3284] Candied hawthorn skewers are a traditional Chinese street snack made by coating hawthorn fruit with hardened sugar.

His backing was insane: the Sword Saint, Mae Jonghak, was his Master, and the Sect Leader of Huashan was his Senior Brother.

In terms of seniority alone, he stood on equal footing with the Sect Leaders of the Nine Sects and One Gang. And according to popular opinion, his talent for martial arts ranked among the top three of all time.

The heavens are cruel. Why give all that to a bastard like him?

As Sudal looked up at the clear sky and lamented his fate—

Crack!

Something broke, followed by a shout like the roar of a beast.

“Beef! Taishan wants beef! Spicy marinade!”

Sudal’s subordinate turned pale.

“This is bad. He’s already at moderate rage.”

“Moderate rage?”

“I’ve watched him for the past five days and worked out the stages. Once he reaches full-blown rage, he’s barely human.”

“Pretty sure he’s been like that from the start…”

“Anyway, give him something, anything! Right now, before he puts a few holes in the swift ship!”

“What?!”

Sudal snapped out of it and told him where he’d hidden his emergency supply of drinking snacks.

“There’s a jar in the corner of my cabin.”

“Beef?”

“No. Salted pork. Top quality.”

“That still won’t be enough, will it?”

“Of course not. With his appetite, I wouldn’t be surprised if he ate the jar too. But what if you went with the Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate?”

“Ah!”

“Go. The fate of this ship is in your hands.”

“That’s our Deputy Stronghold Lord!”

The subordinate gave him a thumbs-up and hurried off. Sudal watched him go with a proud smile and rubbed the bridge of his nose.

“That boy…”

But the smile vanished.

Instead of taking their possessions, he was giving them a ride—and he still had to worry about this.

He’d even felt proud of himself for coming up with a decent solution. The misery suddenly welled up in him, and his eyes grew wet.

Is this why I became a river pirate?

A sudden sense of futility weighed on him, but Sudal forced himself to shake his head.

No. He only had to hang on a little longer.

It had already been five days since they left Yunnan. With heaven's help and a good wind, they might arrive within a day.

Then he could say goodbye to those wretched people…

"Hey, don't block the way. Move over."

"Huh?"

Sudal blinked, shaken from his thoughts. An old man who looked stern as hell stood before him, holding a fishing rod.

"You…"

"You?"

"No, Elder…"

"Elder?"

"…What should I call you, then?"

"Just call me Senior. And get that hideous face of yours away from the bow. The Dragon King would turn tail if he came up for some fresh air and saw your mug."

"Ah, yes. Understood, Senior."

The old man hadn't been with them when they sailed from Sichuan toward Yunnan about two months ago.

Now, five days into their voyage back, Sudal still didn't know exactly who he was. But looking at him, the old man somehow gave off the air of a master.

Especially…

That forehead.

The old man's forehead was black as if it had been painted, and swollen to twice the size of anyone else's. Sudal couldn't take his eyes off it.

I've heard of external arts like that.

Sudal quickly moved away from the bow and studied him before speaking cautiously.

If he could get on the good side of a mysterious old master who'd been living in seclusion in Nanman and obtain the formula for a martial art, what better fortuitous encounter could there be?

"Um, so…"

"Don't talk to me. I'm concentrating."

"Yes, sir."

Silence fell at once.

Just as Sudal was watching for a chance to speak, the old man sitting at the bow with his fishing line cast suddenly shouted.

“Enough! You brat!”

“Me?”

“Do you know what kind of person I hate most in this world?”

“W-what kind?”

“A man who never finishes what he’s saying!”

“But, Senior, you’re the one who—”

“Shut that crafty mouth of yours and finish what you were going to say. I’m going out of my mind wondering.”

Sudal stared at the old man, who already looked like he was out of his mind.

I thought I’d finally escaped the Fire King, and now there’s another crazy old man!

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, had already left for Sichuan ahead of them on another swift ship.

Sudal had foolishly thought he could breathe easy again. Swallowing his misery, he spoke.

“I was wondering if you’d learned Iron Head Technique.”

“Iron Head Technique?”

“Yes. As far as this junior knows, masters who’ve trained Iron Head Technique to its limits have black foreheads and can even break steel…”

“Hm. I don’t know where you heard that, but you know your stuff. That’s right. Iron Head Technique has different levels and forms, but once you reach Great Completion, you can easily block even Sword Energy.”

“Ooh! Then could you be the famous Great Hero Ironblood Elder?”

The old man scoffed.

“Great Hero? What nonsense. That Ironblood Elder is the lowest of the low. One of the scum of the Murim who absolutely must be hunted down and killed. Though he might already be dead. He spent the entire Great Faction War pretending to sit on the sidelines, while he was up to all kinds of dirty business behind the scenes.”

“Oh. So you aren’t Great Hero Ironblood Elder. I mean, that scum.”

“Obviously not. Are you picking a fight with this old man?”

“Absolutely not. Then, if you don’t mind, who are you?”

“Me?”

The old man puffed out his chest.

“My name is Namho.”

“Ah! Namho?”

“That’s right. I’m the Namho.”

Namho smiled fondly as he thought back on his youth. Sudal wondered.

Who the hell is Namho?

Perhaps he was an old master from the previous generation. Sudal couldn't recall ever hearing the name.

Then the old man spoke again, and Sudal, who'd been unsure, couldn't help but jump in shock.

"I killed dozens of fiends during the Great Faction War."

"Dozens!"

"That's not all. A thousand orthodox martial artists owe their lives to me, and twice that many members of the Demonic Cult died because of me."

"Wow! A thousand, then another two thousand! A hero born of the Great Faction War!"

"The Nine Sects and One Gang? The Five Great Families? They're strong, very strong. But charging in and swinging a blade isn't the only thing that matters. What matters is victory in battle!"

"Wow! Victory!"

"When I was young, whenever I sent out a messenger pigeon, the great sects everyone had heard of would move, huh? And sometimes the Three Saints and Ten Kings would rush right out!"

"Wow! The Three Saints! The Ten Kings! You must be the Martial God at the very least!"

"And that man was me, Namho!"

"Wooo! Long live! Long live! Long live our Senior!"

Sudal threw both arms up and shouted along. Then something struck him as odd, and he blinked.

"Um, what did you say just now?"

"What are you talking about?"

"Er, I thought I heard you say you sent out a messenger pigeon."

"Yeah. I did. From the rear."

"…?"

"Is that a problem?"

Sudal stared at Namho, who remained completely unashamed. After a brief silence, he parted his lips.

"Then, Senior, do you have a title?"

"No."

"Your martial arts…?"

"Why would I learn something like that?"

"…?"

"Being a martial artist is dangerous as hell, and hard work. When you're young, you show off and get stabbed to death. When you're old, your body's a wreck."

"…!"

“Look at you. You’re trembling right now. You’re getting old, your martial arts are mediocre, and your body’s starting to give out. Might be a stroke, so if you’re interested, come along. I’m on my way to see a famous physician.”

About half of what Namho said was true.

Sudal had already lost it. But he wasn’t trembling from a stroke—he was trembling with rage.

He held on to his last thread of reason long enough to ask one final question.

“T-then what about that Iron Head Technique you mentioned?”

“I said I knew about it. I never said I’d learned it.”

“But if you haven’t even learned Iron Head Technique, why is your forehead so—”

“I got stung by a bee.”

“…!”

“Some beastly bastard disturbed a Black Gold Bee hive because he wanted the honey, and I nearly died for it. We somehow managed to draw out the venom, but this swelling just won’t go down.”

Namho gently rubbed his black, swollen forehead. Sudal felt dizzy, as though he’d been stung by a bee himself.

What kind of fucked-up situation is this…?

Two months.

A whole two months. He’d left merchant ships laden with wealth and grain behind and, under what was practically a threat, been dragged from his home base in Hubei to Sichuan, then all the way to Yunnan.

And it still wasn’t over.

The waiting had gone on forever. He’d stopped in Guangxi for a chance to make some pocket money, only to be caught by the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang—who was known as the Blood Monk—and dragged along.

It was easy to call it two months, but being trapped on a ship with the ugliest, most uneducated people in the world had made those two months feel like two years.

All I have to do is take them to Sichuan, then I can go back to Hubei. And this is how things are going right to the end.

One beast of a man spent all day shoving whatever he could into his mouth. Now Sudal had been fooled by a powerless old man he’d never met before and insulted for his trouble.

That wasn’t all. The rest of them were just as crazy.

Hyuk Mujin—whom he’d met enough times to recognize—was going around preaching some religion called the Earth Mother Goddess to his subordinates. Song Ilseom and Sama Pyo, who’d looked like they disliked each other from the start, had dueled on deck and half destroyed the mast.

And Ju Hwaran, one of the Ten Dragons and Phoenixes and the most beautiful woman in Sichuan?

Two months ago, when they'd set out for Nanman, she'd looked like a fairy. Now she spent her days coming out onto the deck to watch everyone.

And whenever she heard even the slightest sound somewhere, she'd prick up her ears and mutter as though she wanted everyone to hear.

Oh. The Pavilion Master still needs to rest. Does that barrel really have to be moved right now?

Oh. That rope scraping is so loud. Should I just cut every rope so the Pavilion Master can be comfortable?

Oh. Why's he gulping down water like that? Couldn't he go without drinking and slowly dry up instead?

Oh. The waves are so rough. What if the Pavilion Master suffers qi deviation while circulating his qi because of all the noise? You're river pirates, aren't you? Can't you do something about a single wave?

What was he, the Dragon King? How was he supposed to calm a raging river?

He'd put up with enough. For five days, he'd seen everything he never wanted to see and heard everything he never wanted to hear.

That's it. I've got nowhere left to retreat. I'm settling this today.

Overcome with fury, Sudal drew the broad-bladed saber tucked into his waistband.

Or, he tried to.

Until a familiar voice sounded behind him.

"Whew. I feel so much better after getting a good rest. Hey, mister, how far have we come?"

Sudal turned slowly. Jin Taekyung had shown himself for the first time in five whole days. Sudal raised his eyes to him and answered with a grin.

"Hehe. We'll be there soon."

That night, the swift ship arrived in Sichuan, and Sudal decided to retire.

Chapter 836

Five days. Short, depending on how you looked at it. Long, depending on how you looked at it.

I couldn't say which it felt closer to.

But one thing was certain: it was enough time for the swift ship the Yangtze River Channel League was so proud of to travel from Yunnan to Sichuan along a tributary of the Yangtze.

It's been a while since I was here.

I murmured to myself and looked at the scene spread out before me.

A stretch of the Yangtze so vast it looked like the sea. As the sun went down, the river had turned black, its surface streaked with lights of every color.

"Those are…"

Namho narrowed his eyes. Hyuk Mujin supplied the answer to what those countless distant lights were.

"Pleasure boats."

"Do you think I asked because I didn't know?"

"Oh, you know about those too, Old Man Nam? I thought you'd never seen one, since there's nothing like that in Nanman."

"Hah!"

Namho snorted so hard I wondered if he'd done it through his ass instead of his nose. Then he gave a hollow laugh.

"Have you ever seen such a fool? You've already forgotten what kind of man this old man is."

He was right. Namho wasn't just an ordinary old man from Nanman.

Nanman blood ran through his veins, but he knew the Central Plains' geography and customs better than plenty of old martial-world veterans who'd chewed their share of bok choy[3285] in their youth.

It might all be in the distant past now, but Namho had once been one of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion's finest agents.

"Oh, right. You're around so much, I keep forgetting."

Hyuk Mujin scratched the back of his head sheepishly. Namho nodded at him with a solemn expression.

"I'll forgive you. It's only natural—you find this old man so sociable and approachable."

"You are approachable. You remind me of Grandpa Hong, who lived next door when I was a kid."

[3285] Bok choy is a Chinese leafy cabbage.

"Grandpa Hong? I don't know the man, but if he reminded you of me, he must have been a good person."

"He made a fortune lending money at exorbitant interest. He always took bodyguards with him when he went to the market, probably because he'd given so many people reason to hate him. Anyway, he ended up dead."

"…"

"But if you knew what pleasure boats were, why were you staring at them like that?"

Is this bastard trying to start something with me?

Namho glared at Hyuk Mujin with exactly that look, then let out a deep sigh.

"I wasn't staring because I found them fascinating. It left me feeling hollow."

"Hollow?"

"Yes. It made me think how little the Central Plains have changed."

Namho gazed at the ships gliding along the Yangtze, their lights bright in the distance, and continued slowly.

"Some people risk their lives fighting to set a collapsing world back on its feet. Others float pleasure boats and lose themselves in indulgence. How could I not find it absurd? How could I not feel hollow?"

"Ah."

"I'm not blaming you, young as you are. Nor am I telling you to be angry with them. But there's just one thing I'd like to ask of you."

Hyuk Mujin had fallen silent. Namho looked at him and the others one by one, then added bitterly, "Whatever you see, please don't lose heart. As long as you have the will, you can get back up no matter how many times you fall. But once your will breaks, you can accomplish nothing."

This wasn't the Namho we usually saw.

This was advice from a veteran who'd weathered the storm of the Great Faction War—and from an old man.

And I wasn't imagining the way his gaze lingered on me in particular.

He's worried. Right now, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung is just a kid who's never been through a proper war.

I was young even by modern standards. In Murim, people had all the more reason to worry about me.

I'd only started making a name for myself in Murim less than two years ago. And on top of that, I'd barely passed twenty.

To an old martial-world veteran, Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan was far too young to be expected to have matured mentally.

Of course…

Hunter Jin Taekyung is different.

If someone asked whether I'd grown up, I'd probably say no. I still acted like a kid now and then—or pretty often, honestly—and let my emotions get the better of me.

But at least I wasn't so easily shaken that the people around me needed to worry.

No. I'd been through too much for that.

Someone I'd believed was on my side—someone I'd once even looked up to—had stabbed me in the back. I'd lost someone close to me in the process.

While I risked my life trying to save people, the media tore into me, and people online split into two camps and waged another war.

Even when a country's capital falls and a hundred thousand people are killed or injured, there are bystanders everywhere.

People who click on the news without a hint of feeling, then close the article before they've read half of it.

Why?

It's obvious.

They've got a new game to play, or it's time to head to the club.

Or they're the sort who don't care if tens of thousands die, as long as it happens on the other side of the world instead of next door.

Once, every one of those things hurt.

But as time passed, my heart—scratched raw by countless strangers whose faces I'd never seen—grew calloused and hard. The pain that used to pierce deep into me eventually became familiar.

Yeah. That was enough.

I had too much on my shoulders to let every little thing wound me and make me suffer.

"They're having a good time."

I finished thinking, gave a quiet laugh, and said it aloud. Namho's eyes widened at my words. Then he, too, gave a bitter smile.

"Yes. They are."

I didn't know whether that had reassured him. But given time, he'd see for himself.

The Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung wasn't just some kid overflowing with strength and talent.

"Let's go. The moment we reach the landing, we move out. No dawdling."

At my order, Taishan shot his hand up.

"Taishan wants five-spice pork."

"Five-spice pork?"

"Yes. Taishan's favorite."

"Five-spice pork sounds good. It's delicious."

“Captain. Good. Taishan and Captain agree.”

“But are you sure? By the time we get to an inn, you’ll have swallowed so much river water there won’t be room in your stomach for five-spice pork.”

Taishan looked back and forth between the river, black enough to hide its depth, and me, fully prepared to administer the Yangtze dip-and-taste punishment. He slowly lowered his hand.

“No. Taishan thought again. Taishan doesn’t want five-spice pork.”

“You sure?”

“Mm-hm. Sure…”

His voice drooped. Sama Pyo gave him a sympathetic look. Namho, looking disappointed for an entirely different reason, beckoned to the head of the river pirates.

“Hey, Sea Otter. Come here.”

“It’s Sudal.”

“That’s what I said. Sea Otter.”

“Sudal…”

“Sea Otter.”

“…”

Messing with a man’s name like that.

Watching the river pirate’s face as Namho stubbornly mangled his name until he didn’t even have the energy to argue, I felt sorry for him.

I patted his shoulder sympathetically.

“Come on, we’re almost there. Hang in there a little longer.”

“Th-thank you, Great Hero Jin.”

“I know we’ve been pretty hard on you. When we see Senior Mu Song, I’ll tell him Uncle Heimdall had a rough time.”

“Sorry, but who’s Heimdall…?”

“Your name isn’t important right now. Let’s get to the landing first. Mister, are you sad to see us go? If you are, we could spend a week cruising around the Yangtze together.”

Sudal’s—or Sea Otter’s, or Heimdall’s—unfocused eyes flashed. Whether it was anger or madness, I couldn’t tell. He bellowed at his subordinates until his voice nearly gave out.

“You lazy bastards! Pick up the speed!”

“…”

Judging by his reaction, they really must have had a rough time.

Then again, with the Fire Dragon Pavilion members being impossible to control, it was no wonder.

Even Ju Hwaran, the only woman in our party and the only sane one, was showing signs of something wrong.

"Ah, does he have to shout so loudly? The Captain's already exhausted. What if all that noise gives him qi deviation? What's he thinking?"

"…"

At this point, even hearing it scared me.

Her lips kept moving as she muttered, but she had the diction of a Murim Alliance announcer and the projection of an opera singer. Every word hammered into my ears like a nail.

I'd only been out of the cabin for half a day, and I was already feeling it. The river pirates had endured five whole days. Their faces had gone pale.

They look more likely to suffer qi deviation than I do…

As I seriously considered their condition, their leader hurried over. He'd been directing the swift ship, burning through the last of his energy.

"G-Great Hero Jin. There's a problem."

His face, already as terrifying as a demon's, had gone stiff.

Good thing we were on the Yangtze. If this were the Grand Line,[3286] that face alone would've sent his bounty soaring and made him a government target.

I asked with sincere concern, "I knew this would happen. Have your qi and blood gotten tangled up?"

"What? No. I'm perfectly fine—"

"I'll do whatever I can. Don't hold it in—tell me what's going on. Your complexion's awfully dark. And you're looking off in a completely different direction. You're a wreck."

"My face has looked like this since I was born. And my eyes have been like this ever since my father beat me when I was fifteen."

"Pardon?"

"Please don't misunderstand. He was just startled. He'd been sleeping soundly, then woke up suddenly and saw my face the moment he opened his eyes. I probably would've thrown a punch too."

"Ah. Your father…"

An ordinary person might have been flustered. They'd stammer, struggle for something to say, then offer an apology worse than saying nothing at all.

But with the composure of a Supreme Peak master, I pointed naturally at the fireworks lighting up the sky.

"Whoa, look. Fireworks. Is there a festival?"

"They're fireworks, but it isn't a festival. That's the problem."

"A problem? What's wrong with setting off a few fireworks?"

[3286] An allusion to One Piece, a Japanese pirate manga in which the government posts bounties.

“Look closely. At the ships, not the sky.”

The ships? What about them?

I lowered my eyes without thinking.

The pleasure boats had come much closer. At last, I understood why Sudal had hurried over.

“Those are…”

“They’re not all pleasure boats. No wonder there were so many more lights than usual.”

He was right.

From a distance, those ships had seemed like just a few more lights among the rest. Up close, they looked ten times bigger and sturdier than any pleasure boat I knew.

More like…

“Huh. They look like military vessels.”

“They are military vessels.”

“Oh.”

That stopped me for a moment, but it didn’t really matter.

Military vessels, my ass. What was there to worry about?

The Yangtze River Channel League’s flag was flying from the swift ship I was on, and I knew perfectly well that this huge band of river pirates had long ago greased the officials’ palms and made friends in the right places.

Or at least, I thought I knew.

Bang. Bang. Baaang!

Fireworks burst one after another. The military vessels turned at an angle, presenting their broadsides. Something dark appeared between the sturdy wooden planks.

“Sea Otter, what’s that?”

“Looks like a cannon.”

“I know that. Are you messing with me, Heimdall? Why are they aiming it at us?”

The river pirate leader, by now stripped of his name entirely, gave a hollow laugh.

“Because the fireworks they just set off were the signal to attack.”

“What?”

The moment I asked again, dumbfounded—

BOOOOM!

About a hundred cannon barrels belched fire at once.

Chapter 837

Boom! Boom! Boom!

White smoke billowed up with the flames.

The iron balls hurtled across more than two hundred ja[3287], smashed the swift ship, and crushed everyone aboard into minced fish…

Naturally, none of that happened.

The only thing this world could do far better than the modern twenty-first century was martial arts—not science.

Boom! Splash!

The iron balls struck the water instead of the swift ship, sending waves surging upward.

Taishan snatched a fish out of the air as the blast sent it flying toward the deck. He looked dejected.

“Taishan sad. This not five-spice pork.”

“…”

Since when did five-spice pork come from the Yangtze?

I gave Taishan a frosty look, then tapped the back of the Water Dragon Stronghold’s Deputy Stronghold Lord’s head. Like the other river pirates, he was crouched on the deck like a shrimp.

“Get up. You’re a river pirate. Why are you so scared?”

“Gasp! Am I alive?”

“Did you think we’d all died?”

“But I saw them fire with my own eyes…”

“They fired, all right. Their aim was terrible.”

Even people who pissed at least once or twice a day sometimes missed the target. Was firing an old-fashioned cannon supposed to be easy?

Only about half of the hundred or so iron balls had been fired properly, and more than half of those hadn’t come anywhere near us.

The ones that had miraculously reached the swift ship had merely served as sacrifices to the river’s wave pool.

Well, I suppose they’ve only fired a few shots now and then during training.

It made sense when I thought about it.

The age when warlords rose like wildfires and fought for supremacy had ended long ago.

[3287] A ja is a Korean unit of length equal to about 30.3 cm (11.9 in). Two hundred ja is about 60.6 m (199 ft).

Even modern humanity, after going through the Great Cataclysm, had settled into peace in just over thirty years. Hunter had come to mean a profession, not a calling. Of course the soldiers of this unified dynasty, ruled by the Son of Heaven, had grown lax.

There was just one thing I didn't understand: why were they suddenly firing cannons at us?

"I'll ask them."

"Pardon?"

"I was talking to myself. Don't worry about it. Just steer the ship."

"Pardon?"

"Get moving. Do you want to spend the night here?"

"Pardon?"

If failing to understand something this simple counted as a talent, he had it in spades.

I clicked my tongue at the Deputy Stronghold Lord, who just kept staring blankly and asking me to repeat myself, then called over a nearby river pirate.

"Hey, you there."

"M-me?"

"Yeah. You're the acting captain now, so steer the ship. Oh, and hang a white flag where they can see it, just in case."

I didn't know what had happened in Sichuan while we'd been in Nanman, but I had no intention of attacking government troops just because a few cannonballs had landed nearby.

The government and Murim might have an agreement not to interfere with each other, but martial artists were still subjects of this land. We could end up charged with something as serious as treason.

Did some local river pirates cause trouble recently?

As I thought it over, the swift ship—which had paused for a moment—started toward the landing. One of the river pirates shouted.

"They're reloading!"

Not great news, but not something I was particularly worried about, either.

Even if I didn't step in, we had human shields who could easily stop a few old-fashioned cannonballs.

"Earn your keep."

The moment I tossed out that one line—

Boom!

The second volley thundered, and a faint whistle came from behind me.

Whoosh!

Sama Pyo, Taishan, Song Ilseom—and finally, Ju Hwaran.

In the blink of an eye, they raced across the deck. The brilliant light they unleashed met the iron balls hurtling toward the swift ship.

Slice! Crash!

Thump. Thump. Thump.

Boom! Boom! Boom!

Drums beat an urgent rhythm beneath the unceasing roar of cannons.

On the largest and most splendid of the dozens of pleasure boats, a young man watched a singing courtesan dance and gave a quiet laugh.

“I don’t know what kind of scum they are, but their luck is rotten.”

His voice was thick with drink, his eyes relaxed. The others had been watching him warily, knowing his usual temperament, but now they finally laughed along.

“Ha ha. That’s what happens to the uneducated.”

“If they knew Young Master was here, they’d abandon their boat and run a thousand li[3288].”

“But… that flag concerns me.”

The young man turned to the speaker.

“The flag? What about it?”

“Have you heard of the Yangtze River Channel League?”

“The Yangtze River Channel League…”

Cup in hand, the young man searched his memory for a moment. Then it came to him.

“Oh, those river pirates? Of course. There was a group called the Yangtze River Channel League where I stayed before.”

“Yes, exactly. They’re notorious scoundrels, even in the martial world. And the boat our navy is attacking is flying their flag.”

“And?”

“The government and Murim aren’t supposed to interfere with each other. Besides, the leader of the Yangtze River Channel League is known for his vicious, devious nature. I worry this might cause trouble…”

His voice, so assured a moment ago, gradually trailed off.

The pleasure boat fell quiet. The smile on the young man’s lips faded.

Clack.

He set his cup down roughly, splashing the wine inside.

“Trouble?”

[3288] In this Chinese setting, a li is about 500 m (0.311 mi). A thousand li is about 500 km (311 mi).

Every one of the people around him wore lustrous silk and had the bearing of wealth and status.

Some looked young enough to be his peers; others were old enough to be his father. All held their breath and watched his every move.

“I’m genuinely curious… What sort of trouble are you worried about?”

“Th-that is…”

The merchant who’d spoken first stammered.

He ran a sizable trading company in Sichuan, and he already regretted opening his mouth.

He’d even paid a bribe to attend this gathering, hoping to win the young man’s favor. As a merchant, he’d heard and seen a lot, so he’d spoken without giving it much thought. Now, instead of catching the young man’s eye, he was about to fall out of favor.

“I-I’m sorry, Young Master.”

The apology came too late to calm the young man’s temper.

His eyes, drooping drunkenly a moment ago, had risen into their usual cunning slant.

How dare a lowly merchant…

The young man glared at the back of the merchant’s bowed head.

He valued authority and dignity above all else. Yet this man had stood before him and spouted nonsense about being worried by some martial-world ruffians.

The Yangtze River Channel League?

A grand name, but in the end, it was just a collection of stinking, uneducated river pirates.

No matter how inviolable the boundary between the government and Murim was, to the young man they were nothing but bandits who ought to be beaten down on sight.

What had happened a few months ago had only hardened that belief.

“Those martial-world ruffians are merely subjects of the Great Nation. What is there for any of you to worry about?”

At the chill in his voice, the others hurriedly bowed their heads.

“Y-you are absolutely right!”

“I have no concerns at all. The government troops are as sharp as blades, and with a Young Master as wise as you here, why would we fear a few martial artists?”

The cannons had long since drowned out the music. The courtesans’ garments, which had fluttered like butterflies, had fallen still along with the mood.

The young man stood alone, looking down arrogantly at the bowed figures.

Pathetic. What are a few martial artists, anyway?

The drunken haze that had felt pleasant just fifteen minutes ago now irritated him. Even the courtesans, who'd seemed to have descended from heaven, had lost their appeal.

Perhaps it was the terrible memories from not so long ago. His anger refused to subside. He raised a hand and pointed toward the Yangtze.

"Everyone, raise your heads and look at those river pirates! Watch them shatter before the might of the Great Nation!"

He turned as he shouted—and blinked.

"Huh?"

Did I drink too much?

That was his first thought.

But even after rubbing his eyes hard with his sleeve and looking again, the scene before him remained unchanged.

No, something had changed.

The boat that should have sunk long ago was closing in at tremendous speed.

"Huh?"

"Oh?"

"What the hell is that?"

The courtesans, who'd been watching their employer for cues, and those who'd reluctantly raised their heads at the young man's order, all blinked as they watched the unbelievable sight.

How is it still in one piece?

Didn't they fire the cannons?

They did, though.

Come to think of it, they've been firing this whole time, haven't they?

Huh? They're firing right now, too.

As someone had noticed, more than ten military vessels were still busy firing cannonballs. Their volleys were far more frantic and disordered than before.

"Y-you idiots! Shoot straight!"

"We are shooting straight!"

"Then why aren't you hitting it?"

"We are! We definitely hit it! We heard the sound!"

"Then why is it still in one piece?"

"How the fuck should we know?"

The soldier meant every word of that curse.

They'd fired, and fired, and fired again. By now, the military vessels had launched hundreds of cannonballs between them.

They hadn’t trained enough, and their aim might have been complete shit, but surely one shot should have hit by now. That was just common sense.

And yet… the boat was still in one piece.

The sleek vessel cutting through the black current as it approached from the darkness looked like a ghost.

Why?

Fear crept up alongside the question in every mind.

Every sailor had heard stories of ghost ships that cannonballs couldn’t sink—and whose dead crews wouldn’t stay dead.

I-is it really a ghost ship?

But this is the Yangtze, not the sea.

Then is the Yangtze a sea?

While the soldiers’ absurd thoughts chased one another around, the young man had come right up to the bow of the pleasure boat. He was putting to the test the strange gift he’d received just that day: an instrument called a thousand-li lens.

What he saw horrified him.

“This is insane…”

He muttered the vulgar words without realizing it, then stood there gaping.

Through the thousand-li lens, he could see something he could hardly believe.

Boom! Boom! Craaash!

Cannonballs bounced away amid the thunderous blasts.

No—people were knocking away the cannonballs as they came hurtling toward the ship.

“Y-Young Master. What’s happening?”

At the voice by his ear, the young man hesitated.

How could he explain what he’d seen? Would they think he was mad?

But his concern vanished almost at once.

Through the thousand-li lens, he’d spotted a face he could never forget, however hard he tried.

“Uh, uh, uhhhh!”

Making strange noises as though he’d forgotten how to speak, Ju Wongong shouted toward the military vessels.

“Cease fire! Stop! This is an imperial command—no, an imperial-family command from me, His Majesty the Emperor’s eighth-degree relative!”

Far away, Jin Taekyung recognized Ju Wongong and muttered when he heard the shout.

“I’ve heard of an imperial command, but what the hell is an imperial-family command?”

Namho, who knew a thing or two, answered.

“Imperial-family command, my ass. He’s talking shit. You know him?”
“Yeah. Well…”
Jin Taekyung scratched the back of his head and added:
“I saved his life once when our paths crossed.”

Chapter 838

As you go through life, you meet all sorts of people.

Only a tiny fraction of them become what you'd call meaningful connections.

Most pass through your life by chance, then gradually fade from your memory. Their names. Their faces.

But there are exceptions.

Like the guy sprinting toward me just as I set foot on the landing.

"Young Master Jin! Young Master Jin!"

Was this guy a chance encounter, or a connection that would stick?

I pushed the thought aside and faced the young man, who'd already rushed right up to me.

He was handsome in a refined, aristocratic sort of way, though his upturned eyes made him look sly.

Actually, now that I thought about it, his personality had been a bit like that too.

Right now, though, he looked like a dog reunited with an owner it thought it had lost.

But…

"What was your name again?"

The young man had been panting away as if to prove just how poor his stamina was. At my mutter, he stared at me in shock.

"Y-you mean you don't even remember my name?"

Of course I didn't. Who remembers every extra's name when they watch a movie?

I answered shamelessly anyway.

"Of course I remember."

"Liar! I heard exactly what you just said!"

"You misheard. I talk about you all the time. Don't I, Mujin?"

Unlike the Fire Dragon Pavilion's fresh-faced newbies, Hyuk Mujin was a veteran. Apart from the year he'd spent at Mount Jiuhua, he'd been by my side the whole time.

He caught the signal in my words and answered with a relaxed smile.

"Of course. You've praised Young Master Protagonist so often I've got calluses on my ears."

"See? You heard him, Young Master Protagonist."

I'd shown him some goodwill and found out his name. A perfect bit of banter had me feeling rather pleased with myself—until the young man looked back and forth between Hyuk Mujin and me with a completely flat expression.

"Ju Wongong."

"…?"

"…?"

"Not Protagonist. Ju Wongong."

"…!"

"…!"

After a brief silence, I spoke carefully.

"Did you happen to change your name…?"

"Would I have?"

"Right, no. I just thought…"

"How could you forget? Even now, when I close my eyes, I can still feel the warmth I felt in that cold, dark Dongting Lake!"

At Ju Wongong's deeply wounded cry, everyone around us turned to look at me. I could hear their hushed voices, too.

"What's going on…?"

"Could it be…?"

"No way…"

"Remember that time our captain went from the Night King to a blushing innocent, then turned into a Supreme Peak-level homosexual…?"

I'd wondered which bastard was spouting nonsense like a webnovel title. Turns out it was the very bastard I knew.

I sentenced Hyuk Mujin to death with a glare, then spoke as calmly as I could, keeping a close eye on Ju Hwaran. She'd clapped a hand over her mouth.

"I'll explain everything. It's all a misunderstanding."

And right then—

"Remember that time our captain went from the Night King to a blushing innocent, then became a Supreme Peak-level homosexual? The allegations he denied…?"

For the first time in a while, I lost my temper.

"Hyah!"

The coachman cracked his whip, and the splendid carriage drawn by six fine horses raced down the smooth highway.

A carriage was a symbol of wealth—a luxury anyone with enough money could afford, regardless of status. But a six-horse carriage was different.

Especially when a golden flag fluttered above it.

Clip-clop, clip-clop, clip-clop!

"Clear the road!"

"Make way for Young Master Ju Wongong!"

Dozens of mounted soldiers escorted the enormous carriage, and the golden flag marked it as belonging to the imperial family. The road parted before us like the Red Sea.

"Mom, what's that?"

"Shh!"

Commoners along the road, young and old, hurriedly dropped to the ground. Even the fat, powerful official who'd been lording it over everyone from a sedan chair carried by four men climbed down with a wobble.

Huh. So what I heard before we left was true?

I peered out through the lattice window, then looked at Ju Wongong.

I hadn't seen him in over four months by Murim's reckoning. He looked even more full of life than before.

Well, of course he did. The last time I saw him, he'd looked more like a drowned corpse than a person.

"Everything is thanks to Young Master Jin."

Apparently his face wasn't the only thing that had changed. Had he learned to read minds? Ju Wongong spoke out of nowhere, stroking his neatly trimmed beard.

"After I nearly died at Dongting Lake, I resolved to be reborn. I repented of my old ways, when I did nothing but drink, chase women, and gamble…"

"And yet you were out having a great time on a pleasure boat."

Ju Wongong faltered, then changed his tune.

"I repented, but resolved to cut back gradually. I've also been training my body…"

"You were about to collapse after running just over thirty jang[3289] just now."

"Physical training isn't easy, so I'm taking it one step at a time. Trying to look at the world with an open mind…"

"So you've thought about it, but haven't actually done anything."

My neat summary could've made even Daechi-dong's top cram-school instructor weep.[3290] Ju Wongong fell silent for a moment, then spoke.

"Why are you doing this to me?"

"And why did you do that to me?"

"I only said what came to mind. I never imagined it would cause such a ridiculous misunderstanding."

"You should've known. Before you hurt my feelings."

[3289] A jang is ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Thirty jang is about 91 m (100 yd).

[3290] Daechi-dong, in Seoul, is known for its elite private academies and cram schools.

After spending half an hour explaining the whole “That Time Our Captain Denied Going from the Night King to a Blushing Innocent and Becoming a Supreme Peak-Level Lover of Men” business, I gazed mournfully off to one side and continued.

“One of my subordinates got hurt because of you.”

Ju Wongong followed my gaze and shuddered.

In one corner of the carriage, still racing along without pause, a bloody mess—no, Hyuk Mujin—was sprawled against the luxurious interior.

“But it’s not my fault he ended up like that.”

“You did it. He died because of you.”

“Is he really dead…?”

“He’s alive. For now. But he almost died.”

“B-but that’s because you beat him like you were going to kill him!”

“I don’t remember. When I opened my eyes, he was already like that.”

“Of course you don’t! You’d already gone wild by then!”

“Are you shouting at me right now? Just because you’re part of the imperial family, you think you can go around scaring innocent people?”

“N-no, that’s not what I—”

“That’s it. I’m really hurt. Get out of the carriage. I’m going straight back to my hometown.”

“Why are you telling me to get out of my own carriage? And if you mean your hometown, that’s Shanxi Province. Why would you suddenly go there…?”

“To visit the little—no, His Highness, Prince Shangshan. He must’ve grown quite a bit by now. When I saw him about two years ago, I was even changing his poopy diapers.”

“P-Prince Shangshan! Poopy diapers!”

Even among Celestial Dragons, there were different levels.

Ju Wongong had been horrified at the name of Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao—the Son of Heaven’s only younger brother, the sole Prince, and the chairman of my personal fan club. Then he suddenly furrowed his brow.

“Wait. From what I’ve heard, His Highness Prince Shangshan was already over ten years old a few years ago, and only met you around then. Why would he be wearing diapers?”

Oh, right.

But when a sharp reader catches a sloppy continuity error, there’s no need to panic. I widened my eyes and shot back:

“Are you making fun of His Highness Prince Shangshan for wearing diapers at his age?”

“Huh?”

“This is treason.”

"Wha—?"

"This is treason! Rebellion!"

"You're insane! Shut your mouth!"

"Listen, everyone! Protagonist, a member of the imperial family, has insulted His Highness Prince Shangshan!"

"It's Ju Wongong, not Protagonist! And would you please stop!"

Of course, no matter how loudly I shouted, nobody outside could hear me. I'd sealed off every sound from inside the carriage with my internal energy.

Ju Wongong didn't know that, though. He immediately dropped to his knees.

"I'm begging you! I'll do anything you ask, Young Master Jin, so please stop!"

"I'll have His Highness Prince Shangshan, who brings shame on the imperial family, struck from the imperial genealogy—oh, seriously?"

"I-I mean it. So please, stop. Just let me live."

If you didn't know the situation, you might wonder why he was groveling like this. But the current Son of Heaven had a long and colorful history of purging his own relatives on his way to the throne.

Put simply, he wasn't just an expert at killing his own blood relatives. He was practically the equal of the Primordial Heavenly Venerable.

And if even a hint of the word rebellion reached the Son of Heaven's ears?

Rather than waste time on a long-winded excuse, you'd be better off heading straight for the Sichuan Tang Clan. At least the people there knew dozens of poisons that would kill you less painfully than the poisoned draught sure to arrive soon.

"Why are you crying now? Anyone would think you were actually plotting treason."

I patted Ju Wongong on the shoulder. I felt a little sorry for him, but there was a simple reason I was pushing him this far.

It's easier when you've got someone in your pocket.

Before the carriage left, I'd heard why this guy—who should've been stuck in Hubei Province for taking bribes—had suddenly turned up in Sichuan, merrily sailing a pleasure boat.

"My crime hasn't been completely wiped away. His merciful Majesty merely moved my place of exile to Sichuan for a while, and I'm obeying his command. But if some rumor about treason starts going around… Really, really…"

"Yeah, yeah. I understand. But is what you said earlier true?"

I gazed fondly at Ju Wongong, who was still streaming tears, and continued.

"W-what do you mean?"

I gazed fondly at Ju Wongong, who was still streaming tears, and continued.

"That you're the acting City Lord of Sichuan Province."

Ju Wongong sniffled and nodded.

"That's right. I didn't expect it either, but there's no doubt it was an imperial command."

A lot had happened while I was away from Sichuan.

The City Lord of Sichuan Province had suddenly fallen ill. And the other officials weren't trustworthy enough to be entrusted with such a vast stretch of land and its military forces.

That was probably why Ju Wongong had been chosen.

He was a distant imperial relative with no real claim to the throne. He lacked the nerve, ability, and backing to make such a claim, and his only real talent was drinking, chasing women, and gambling. There couldn't have been a more suitable person to fill the empty seat for a while.

But Ju Wongong could offer me more than I'd expected.

His appointment might only be temporary, but his personal incompetence didn't diminish the authority of the City Lord of Sichuan Province.

At least while I'm in Sichuan, I can make sure they're thoroughly prepared for Dark Heaven.

The government and Murim had long maintained an uneasy coexistence.

But if I could mobilize the government's manpower—which dwarfed Murim's—maybe we could uncover whatever Dark Heaven might be planning in Sichuan.

Of course, before that…

"Hey, let's go to the Sichuan Tang Clan."

I had someone to meet. Someone I'd been separated from for a while.

Chapter 839

Time changes many things.

The living. The dead.

Before the laws of time, all things were equal.

Even an absolute ruler who once commanded the world will one day return to the earth. A seed scattered by the wind and mixed into the soil may, hundreds of years later, become part of a dense thicket of grass.

Murim was no different.

In the distant past, people trained in martial arts and built fences around themselves, each pursuing their own goals.

Countless days and nights passed. Great wars and shining heroes came and went, until at last the present arrived.

The Nine Sects and One Gang.

And the Five Great Families.

Fifteen pillars supporting the Murim of the Central Plains.

Deep-rooted trees that had swayed but never been uprooted in hundreds of years.

The Sichuan Tang Clan was one of them.

“Once we cross that hill up ahead, we’ll be there.”

At the coachman’s words, Ju Wongong nodded, then sneaked a look at me.

“It’s a shame we have to part here. If it were up to me, I’d treat Young Master Jin with the utmost hospitality, but…”

“Then let’s go to the city. I don’t mind being treated.”

“Young Master Jin seems to have a great many important affairs to attend to, so we’ll save that pleasure for another time.”

I’d only said it to tease him, but the guy had gone and gotten scared.

I let out a short laugh as I watched Ju Wongong hastily change his tune.

When you got right down to it, he wasn’t exactly a bad guy. He was just incompetent, fond of pocketing money from anyone and everyone, and used his imperial status to live in luxury.

“…”

Now that I put it that way, he did sound like a bad guy. Some of the bribes Ju Wongong had accepted must have come from squeezing the people dry.

He still hasn’t learned his lesson, even after nearly dying. Should I lay into him some more?

The thought must have shown on my face. Ju Wongong went pale and urged the coachman on.

“Every second counts! Pick up the pace!”

"It's not that urgent. Don't hassle a man who's already doing his job. Worry about yourself."

"Every second does not count! Maintain this speed!"

Controlling an avatar like this was surprisingly fun.

Maybe it was even more fun because he was a distant imperial relative and the acting City Lord of Sichuan Province.

Well, I had saved his life, and he was easy to handle. Keeping up a connection with him could come in handy.

"No need to go any farther. Let's stop here. We're almost there anyway, and neither side will be happy if we show up at the Sichuan Tang Clan like this."

We might not have many, but if we rolled up with dozens of heavily armed cavalrymen and a six-horse carriage bearing the imperial flag, we weren't exactly going to draw a welcoming crowd.

The relationship between the government and Murim was, to put it nicely, one of noninterference. In practice, they tended to keep their distance from each other.

"Oh, that's a very good idea."

Brightening at the thought of parting ways with me, Ju Wongong quickly ordered the procession to stop. Then he kindly climbed out of the carriage and opened the door for me himself.

"I hope you'll forgive me for not seeing you off any farther. And I sincerely wish Young Master Jin a future filled with w-w…"

"Martial fortune?"

"Ah, yes. I sincerely wish you the best of martial fortune."

I had no idea how sincere he was, but kind words deserved kind words in return. I smiled and patted Ju Wongong on the shoulder.

"Right. You take care of yourself until we meet again, Your Highness. And maybe cut back a little on the wine, women, and gambling while you're at it. Got it?"

"I understand. I won't forget your advice, Young Master Jin."

"Good. See you."

"Travel safely."

I nodded and shut the carriage door.

Clack.

Ju Wongong, who'd been staring blankly at me through the lattice window, opened the door again.

"Um… aren't you getting out?"

I blinked and asked him back.

"Why would I get out?"

"Huh?"

"Oh, I haven't told you yet. I'm going to borrow this carriage."

"…?"

"As you know, we've got someone elderly and someone sick in our party. I figured a carriage would make things easier. People will clear the way for us on the streets, too."

"…!"

"You Fire Dragon Pavilion folks. Come on in. You've had a hard time riding all this way."

An ordinary martial artist would've been flustered by what I said.

It's an imperial carriage, can we really do this? No, it's all right, I'm fine. One model answer after another.

But the great Fire Dragon Pavilion members were a different breed.

Actually, whatever fresh-faced promise they'd once had had come back from Nanman dyed yellow.

"Aw, shit. My whole body's aching bad enough to kill me, and these Central Plains bastards are so high and mighty they don't even respect the elderly…"

Namho started, muttering as if he wanted to be heard and patting his waist. The Fire Dragon Pavilion members climbed down from their horses and filed into the carriage.

Of course, they didn't forget to make their own comments.

"They didn't even give us five-spice pork. Taishan angry. Want to smash everything."

"Now, now, Taishan. No matter how poorly they treat us, you mustn't do that."

"It reminds me of when I'd just started life as a wandering martial artist. People didn't treat me like a person back then, either."

"Nice carriage, Pavilion Master. Could we take it back to our Escort Bureau later?"

I told Ju Hwaran she could, then turned to the carriage's owner, who stood there stunned, and politely asked:

"Could you pull off the flag hanging there? We're not imperial family, and it'd be a pain if we went around with that thing still on."

"…"

Ju Wongong looked from us, packed snugly inside the carriage, to the cavalrymen staring awkwardly off at the distant mountains. He let out a deep sigh.

Then he yanked the splendid golden flag free.

"Oh, and close the door for us."

"…"

"Don't want to?"

Clack.

Controlling an avatar like this really was a lot of fun.

The first to greet us when we reached the Sichuan Tang Clan were the gruff voice and wary eyes of a gate guard stationed atop the newly built stone wall.

“Stop! State your affiliation and name. If you’re a martial artist, give your title and reason for coming.”

The gate guard’s wariness vanished without a trace the moment I leaned my head out of the carriage.

“Open the gate! Open the gate!”

“Why? Who’s here?”

“I said open it, you little bastard!”

When I first visited the Sichuan Tang Clan a few months ago, I was pretty sure hidden weapons had come flying at me. This time, the gate opened before I could even open my mouth.

Rrrrumble.

As the massive iron gate swung open, the gate guard smacked the clueless new recruit on the back of the head. He clasped his hands in salute to me several times, then rushed off somewhere in a panic.

“Everyone, come outside! The Fire Dragon Pavilion has arrived!”

“What?! Are we under attack again?”

“What kind of crazy talk is that? The Fire Dragon Pavilion led by Great Hero Jin Taekyung, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, is here!”

“What?!”

Maybe he’d been taking a nap after his shift. A martial artist of the Sichuan Tang Clan, a white trail of drool still at the corner of his mouth, tossed aside the hidden weapon in his hand and came running.

Or, to be precise, it wasn’t just the Sichuan Tang Clan.

“Great Hero Jin! Do you remember me?”

“It’s a pleasure to see you again. Thanks to you, the Disciples of our sect were spared heavy losses.”

“Amitabha.[3291] To think that Benefactor Jin has returned to Sichuan Murim. On behalf of Emei, I offer you my thanks once more.”

“Well, well, who do we have here! Gae-ttong, go get the others!”

The martial artists of the Sichuan Tang Clan, dressed in green uniforms, were joined by Daoists from the Qingcheng Sect, nuns from the Emei Sect, and finally even the beggars of the Beggars’ Sect.

At the sight of that enormous crowd surging in like a sea of people, Namho gaped.

“Hell, what in the world have you been doing?”

[3291] Amitabha is the Buddha of Infinite Light; his name is invoked in East Asian Buddhist practice.

"I more or less told you what happened in Sichuan."

"Even so, this is… It's strange enough that people from other sects are here with the Sichuan Tang Clan, who are famous for their foul tempers. But why are they all coming out like this?"

"I just did a few things here and there."

Namho knew some of what had happened, but I didn't go into detail.

There was nothing more embarrassing than praising myself, and he'd find out naturally anyway.

Still, it looks like everyone's been doing well.

I kept bowing my head as cheers and clasped-hand greetings poured in from every direction. Something tickled at a corner of my heart.

To be honest, I'd been a little worried.

It hadn't even been half a year since the forces of Dark Heaven, led by the Western Heaven Demon Lord, swept across Sichuan.

The Sichuan Tang Clan had been the main target and suffered enormous losses. Qingcheng, Emei, and the Beggars' Sect had all paid in blood, too.

But contrary to my fears, the faces surrounding me now held nothing but joy.

Thank goodness. Thank goodness.

The Outer Court, where dark-red bloodstains had still been visible just before we left, was now full of green grass.

The sky, once blanketed in black smoke from the fires that cremated countless bodies day after day, was clear without a single cloud. Beneath it stood rows of pavilions rebuilt through everyone's help and hard work.

I didn't know whether they had completely moved on from the grief of that day.

But one thing was certain.

The Sichuan Tang Clan—or rather, Sichuan Murim—had risen again.

They had stopped the invisible rift that had persisted all this time, coming together to rise above their grief.

To avenge what they had lost.

And to make sure they never lost something precious again.

Yeah. That's all that matters.

I told myself that firmly, as though making a promise, and climbed down from the carriage.

The crowd had already blocked the road, but more than that, I'd spotted a familiar face approaching in the distance.

Step. Step.

A body so slender it was almost emaciated. A pallid face like that of someone suffering from an illness, and footsteps landing with vigor, as if he were scolding his own frailty.

Step.

Suddenly, he stopped.

The cheers gradually died down, and the crowd parted to either side.

At the end of the path, an old man looked at me with eyes gleaming a soft green.

“It’s been a long time.”

His greeting was not merely stiff—it was cold.

But the next moment, everyone holding their breath as they watched saw it clearly.

The old man, who seemed as if he would never bow to anyone, bent at the waist toward me.

And they heard warmth in his voice—warmth no one there had ever heard from him before.

“I, Tang Sadok, Family Head of the Sichuan Tang Clan and the Myriad-Poison Asura, have the honor of meeting my family’s Benefactor.”

The unexpected courtesy left me at a loss for words. Tang Sadok clasped his hands in a sincere salute, then looked at me and smiled.

At the corners of his mouth, always sharp and hard as a dagger, dimples appeared—dimples I’d never seen before.

“It’s good to see you again, Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung.”

At that one line, filled with the old man’s joy, the suppressed cheers rang out thunderously.

At the same time, another voice slipped through the noise and into my ear—one only I could hear.

I have plenty I want to say, but we’ll have to save it for later. Don’t you agree?

I belatedly smiled back and nodded. Tang Sadok’s Sound Transmission continued.

Come with me. I’ll take you to the Old Master.

Chapter 840

In the Sichuan Tang Clan, a family built around its bloodline, the Family Head's authority was absolute. No—even if Tang Sadok hadn't been the Family Head, that probably wouldn't have changed much.

The title Myriad-Poison Asura was enough to inspire both awe and fear.

"Our family's Benefactor must be tired after his long journey."

At Tang Sadok's words, the crowd around me naturally began to disperse.

The Sichuan Tang Clan's martial artists, along with the visitors from Emei, Qingcheng, and the Beggars' Sect, saluted Tang Sadok and me before returning to their places. Not without urging us to visit their sects, too.

"So these are the pillars of the Fire Dragon Pavilion I've heard so much about."

Tang Sadok had been taking a good look at the members of the Fire Dragon Pavilion while I exchanged greetings with the others. Then he suddenly paused.

"As I understand it, every member of the Fire Dragon Pavilion is young. Have you been struck by some deadly poison?"

Namho, the old young man he'd singled out, answered with a face like he'd bitten into something foul.

"Nothing of the sort."

"If not poison, then qi deviation?"

"You trying to start something with me?"

"Ah, I only asked because I couldn't sense any internal energy. In that case, perhaps your age is…"

"Seventy-five. I'm traveling with these fellows for a while, for reasons of my own."

"My apologies. That was rude of me."

"I understand. We're both getting old. It happens."

Though Namho practiced no martial arts, Tang Sadok regarded his confidence with interest. He showed kindness to Ju Hwaran, granddaughter of the Escort King, and to Song Ilseom, who'd reached an impressive realm at a young age. As for Sama Pyo and Taishan, who strictly speaking belonged to the demonic, heterodox arts, he simply gave them a silent nod.

And then…

"What happened to that fellow?"

"Uh, well. Something happened on the way here."

"It must have been quite something, for his face to swell up that much. Was it Dark Heaven?"

"No. Actually, I hit him a few times."

A brief silence settled over us.

Tang Sadok looked back and forth between me and Hyuk Mujin, who was slung over Taishan's shoulder like a sack of luggage, then sighed.

"I'll have someone look after your subordinates. For now, unpack and visit the Medical Hall in the Outer Court. They'll treat him well."

At Tang Sadok's gesture, a guard waiting nearby came forward. Taishan spoke in his usual flat voice.

"Taishan. And us. Not moving. No—we are not moving. Until Pavilion Master gives the order."

"Ah, of course. There should be food ready for you, too."

"I'll go, then, Pavilion Master. See you later."

"…"

He really was a lunatic.

I mean, if he was going to do that, why say anything in the first place?

I stopped Ju Hwaran with a glance as she started to smack Taishan upside the head, then followed Tang Sadok toward the Inner Court.

"You earn people's trust wherever you go. Here in Sichuan, and even among subordinates who've only recently joined you."

I answered with a quiet laugh. Watching the others slowly disappear from sight, I said, "Seems the same goes for you, Great Hero Tang. I didn't expect them to still be at the Sichuan Tang Clan."

"It's something I'm truly grateful for. I felt ashamed to keep relying on them, so I told them more than once that they were free to go… Yet they've stayed with our family all this time. They're treating the sick who haven't yet recovered and continuing to help rebuild the clan."

"I may not have seen everything, but the Outer Court already looks much as it used to."

"Rebuilding is only an excuse. They're stationed here in case Dark Heaven attacks again. I know that, so I can't bring myself to tell them to leave."

"What?"

"I have to face the truth. If what happened last time happens again while they're gone, I'll have two choices as Family Head: abandon the home our family has built over generations and flee, or make one last stand and see the clan wiped out."

My eyes widened before I could stop them. I hadn't expected the Family Head of the Sichuan Tang Clan—one of the Central Plains' most renowned great clans, famous for its pride—to say such a thing.

Knowing Tang Sadok as I did made it all the more surprising.

"What? Was that more honesty than you expected?"

"Mm. I suppose it was."

“I understand. Especially since you knew what I was like before all this happened.”

“Of course. Back then, you really…had quite a temper.”

“Hah. I was.”

Tang Sadok let out a hearty laugh, and I gaped at him.

“Are you sure you’re feeling all right?”

“I’m perfectly fine. I’ve simply decided to change.”

“Still, be careful. They say when someone changes too suddenly, it means they’re about to die.”

“Hahaha. You’re still honest to a fault. Though that is your greatest charm.”

“Um, sorry, but I have my own preferences.”

“And jokes like that aren’t bad, either.”

“I’m serious.”

“…I take back what I said. You do have a talent for getting under people’s skin.”

Tang Sadok shook his head as we walked on.

We crossed the Outer Court, then the Inner Court, and entered the Rear Court. At some point, the presences that had been following us unseen vanished altogether.

“Is the old—no, is my Master staying in the Rear Court?”

“He is. He arrived two days ago.”

That timing made sense.

I’d woken briefly, then spent three more days asleep. Once Jeok Cheongang understood what had happened, he’d headed for Sichuan without delay. The rest of the party had stayed behind to watch over me while I slept, so naturally they’d traveled more slowly.

“I’m glad he’s still at the Tang Clan. I was worried something might have happened to him.”

“Worried? Have you forgotten what kind of man your Master is?”

“His title sounds terrifying, but once you get to know him, he’s full of holes. He has a surprisingly soft side, too.”

“Huh.”

Tang Sadok let out a disbelieving chuckle.

“You may be the only person in the world who could talk about the Fire King that way. Then again, he cares for you so much that nothing serious has happened even under these circumstances.”

“These circumstances? Did something happen?”

“Well… Never mind. It’ll be quicker if you see for yourself.”

What on earth was going on?

A few things had been bothering me. Jeok Cheongang had come on ahead long ago, yet he was still at the Sichuan Tang Clan. And Tang Sadok had seemed intent on leaving the Fire Dragon Pavilion members behind.

No way…

Unpleasant possibilities flashed through my mind.

Had Dark Heaven attacked Jeok Cheongang while he was traveling alone?

Or had the condition I thought had fully healed worsened after his fight with the Southern Heaven Demon Empress?

Or maybe…

My thoughts were still chasing one another when I spotted a small thatched cottage among the plants and trees of the Rear Court, deep within the Sichuan Tang Clan's grounds.

Then a voice boomed like thunder, reaching my ears from more than a hundred jang[3292] away.

"Get up this instant!"

"I'm not getting up! I can't get up!"

"That boy is in danger!"

"There are still patients here who need treatment!"

"He's my Disciple!"

"They're my patients!"

"How many times have I told you that boy's life is in danger if you don't go now?"

"If it were that bad, would I still be here? I heard about his condition and was sure he'd be all right—that's why I said we should wait here! I've told you hundreds of times!"

"No, but you—! I'm telling you, I don't think that's what's going on!"

"A physician makes that judgment, and I'm the physician!"

"One martial artist knows another martial artist's condition best. And I am Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King!"

"My Master is both the Divine Physician and the Slaughter Saint! I inherited his teachings in full, so I know better than you do, Elder!"

"Hey, are you talking back to this old man because you're counting on that man's backing?"

"Oh, so you're going to insult my Master to my face?"

"You insolent brat!"

"You know what? Do your worst! Strike my pressure points, kidnap me—I don't care! But if you drag me away by force, I'll refuse to treat him!"

[3292] A jang is a traditional length of ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). A hundred jang is about 303 m (994 ft).

"Would you look at this quack! Fine! I'll count to three! If you don't get up with that damned travel bag by then, you'd better be ready! One!"

"Two, three! Happy?"

"You dare—!"

"Do whatever you like! I'm going to gather herbs!"

Bang!

With that last shout, the cottage door flew open.

An old man came charging out, looking as though he'd kicked the door open himself. He straightened his wildly mussed white hair, fuming.

"As if I don't have enough to do already. Once or twice would be bad enough. I'm so sick of this, I ought to quit!"

Even allowing for the help of internal energy, his voice was loud enough to carry an impressive distance. Naturally, it set off the person who'd been shouting inside.

"Hey! Stop right there! You're barely seventy, you little infant! How dare you! Is that how your Master taught—"

The thunderous voice cut off.

A middle-aged man had rushed out of the cottage, only to freeze when his eyes met mine. A breeze stirred his red hair, making it flicker like flames.

Rustle.

The air grew heavy. The old man, about to snap back, sensed that something was wrong and turned around.

He stared at Tang Sadok and me in silence, then finally spoke.

"Welcome, both of you."

His voice was gentle, his smile as serene as a Daoist immortal's. As if nothing had happened. But I'd seen and heard everything, so I wasn't fooled.

Now I understood what Tang Sadok had meant. I understood why he'd left the Fire Dragon Pavilion members and even the guards behind.

How ugly…!

There was no other word for it. This was too ugly.

Listening to a seventy-year-old Divine Physician and a Fire King over a hundred years old squabble so fiercely made my own heart feel smaller.

If anyone else in Murim had witnessed it, I'd have bet both of Hyuk Mujin's balls that Jeok Cheongang would earn a new title to go with Fire King.

The Disgrace King, Jeok Cheongang…!

It had been so long since I'd seen him. I ought to have been glad. He'd come all this way for me and was roasting the Divine Physician like a peanut; I ought to have been moved. But that wasn't easy.

"Ah, what lovely weather."

Tang Sadok was already gazing at a distant mountain, as though he'd known exactly what was coming. His mutter sounded strangely hollow.

Jeok Cheongang looked at me with somber eyes and spoke in a heavy voice.

"Your body…?"

"I'm fine…"

"How much…did you hear?"

I answered sadly.

"Nothing… I didn't hear anything."

Jeok Cheongang looked up at the clear sky and sighed.

"Fuck. You heard everything…"

The Master and Disciple, reunited after so long, couldn't look each other in the face for a while.

It was summer.

Chapter 841

Tang Sadok led Jeok Cheongang and me to a pavilion deep in the Inner Court and told us to let him know if we needed anything or found anything uncomfortable.

“Then I’ll be going…”

“Wait.”

At Jeok Cheongang’s quiet call, Tang Sadok froze like a statue. Though he still hadn’t recovered, he’d been hurrying to leave the pavilion.

He slowly turned around and struggled to squeeze out a voice that wouldn’t come.

“May I ask why you called me…?”

Jeok Cheongang stared at him in silence, his gaze deep and still. Then he spoke.

“Forget it.”

“Pardon?”

“I said forget it. Everything you’ve seen and heard up to now.”

Myriad-Poison Asura, my ass. The man standing before Tang Sadok was Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King.

The current Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan—a long-established sect of utter thugs who popped up just when people had nearly forgotten them and turned Murim upside down.

For over three hundred years, the sect had gone around setting fires across the land. Yet when his own residence caught fire, Jeok Cheongang had wiped out more than a thousand Demonic Cult members. He was hypocrisy incarnate.

A bead of cold sweat he hadn’t even noticed forming rolled down Tang Sadok’s neck. He swallowed hard and answered.

“O-of course. This junior will forget everything he saw and heard.”

“Forget? You didn’t see or hear anything in the first place. What’s there to forget?”

“Ah.”

“Be careful, all right? Read the room.”

As Jeok Cheongang whispered, he gently massaged Tang Sadok’s neck. Something about the sight was oddly familiar. Then I remembered the high school bullies who used to hang around the alleys when I was in elementary school. They’d acted exactly like that.

The problem was, those bullies had been about seventeen. Jeok Cheongang was at least a hundred and seventeen.

Did he just knock a hundred years off his age?

He clearly wasn’t new to this.

The low voice. The half-lidded eyes. Even his choice of words was perfect for the situation.

"This old man's been in a bit of a bad mood lately. Now, suppose a certain kind of story starts making the rounds in Murim. How do you think I'd feel?"

"I-I think you'd be displeased."

"Not just displeased. It'd ruin my whole day. I'd lose my damn mind."

"I-I'm sorry, Old Master."

"Your late father, the Poison King, and I knew each other reasonably well. I wouldn't say we were close friends, but he was a man I could trust to watch my back."

The Poison King had died a few months earlier at the hands of the Western Heaven Demon Lord, who had been after the Myriad-Poison Ring. He'd been the Grand Family Head of the Sichuan Tang Clan and Tang Sadok's father. Before that, he'd been one of the Ten Kings, a hero who had helped bring the Great Faction War to a victorious close alongside Jeok Cheongang.

"He had a gloomy streak, but he was smart and quick on the uptake. One day, he poisoned the liquor I was about to drink. Then he saw the Thunderbolt Saber King getting the hell beaten out of him and casually knocked over my cup. Do you know what happened after that?"

Tang Sadok answered hoarsely.

"Yes. You said you'd let it go that once, then suddenly beat my father up three months later…"

"Do you know why I did that?"

"N-no. My father was still wondering about it until a few years ago."

"I was in a foul mood that day, and there was no one else around to hit. So I hit him."

"…!"

"That's the kind of man I am. Starting to get the picture?"

Tang Sadok's jaw dropped. After more than fifty years, he'd finally learned why his father had been beaten up. I opened my mouth on instinct.

"Isn't that just a madman?"

"…"

"…"

"Ah."

A suffocating silence fell. Jeok Cheongang stared at me without a word, then slowly parted his lips.

"Get out."

"What?"

"Get out!"

"Y-yes!"

At Jeok Cheongang's thunderous shout, Tang Sadok looked at me with the relieved expression of a man whose fifty-year-old indigestion had finally cleared up, then shot out of the pavilion like a streak of light.

No—he ran away.

Leaving me behind.

Is he a lizard?

But I could hardly blame him when I'd just made such a huge, spectacular mess all by myself. I steadied my breathing and spoke calmly.

"Old Master, it's a misunderstanding."

"What is?"

"All of it. From beginning to end."

"Our sect's rules say anyone who spouts bullshit from beginning to end gets beaten twice as much."

"…Is that really one of the sect's rules?"

"It is."

"What lunatic—no, what esteemed person came up with that rule?"

"I did. Just now."

Well, I'm fucked.

If excuses weren't going to work, it was time to adapt. I dropped to my knees so fast you'd think Hyuk Mujin had possessed me.

"I'm sorry."

"You're admitting it faster than I expected."

"I've still got a lot of life ahead of me. I can't get beaten to death here."

"Unlike you, this old man doesn't think he has much life left."

"Why not?"

"The brat who's supposed to be my Disciple called me a madman. I ought to go off and die, don't you think?"

I cautiously raised my bowed head. Jeok Cheongang's massive pecs looked like they were at least an E-cup.

He'd regained his youth and sharp mind through Bone Transformation.

Rather than going off somewhere to die, a man built like that could tell everyone except me to drop dead.

"No, Old Master. You'll live a long life. Though you already have."

"I see. But you look like you'll die young."

"Please don't say that. It hurts my feelings."

"I'm the one whose feelings are hurt. I shaved off a perfectly good head of hair and went all the way to Nanman pretending to be a monk, and you dare stab me in the back like this?"

I cautiously raised my head.

Then sunlight poured through the window and flashed off Jeok Cheongang's forehead in a surprise Solar Fist attack. I reflexively squinted.

"Whoa. That's bright."

"…"

"Ah, sorry. And I've always been grateful for how much you care about me, Old Master."

"Too late."

"Someone once said the best time to start is when you think it's too late."

"When you think it's too late, it really is too late. Whoever said that nonsense must've died ages ago."

"Then I'm sorry again."

"Before I do anything, let me ask you one thing."

Jeok Cheongang looked down at me calmly.

"To this old man, you seem closer to a Little Immortal than a human. So if you die, can you come back to life?"

"Why would you ask such a terrifying question…?"

"I'm simply curious."

"But why are you curious about that…?"

"You said you came from the realm of immortals. Surely you must be different in some way."

"I die. I really die."

"Even the you in the realm of immortals?"

"I die there too. I've only got one coin. This was my one and only last life from the start."

"You're saying strange things again."

Come on. Why was he asking me that?

My knees went weak. I sprang to my feet and bowed deeply to Jeok Cheongang. Once didn't seem like enough, so I did it twice.

And as soon as I knelt again, I remembered something I'd briefly forgotten.

"Are you holding a memorial service?"

"Ah."

"Clench your teeth. Let's get this over with."

Whoom.

Before he'd even finished speaking, the air split with a tremendous roar.

I squeezed my eyes shut on instinct and suddenly thought of Hyuk Mujin. If I made it out alive, I resolved to treat him much better than before. Then I gritted my teeth and swallowed a breath.

Hngh…!

And in that instant—

Tap.

Whoosh!

A faint touch brushed my forehead as a fierce gust of hot wind whipped my hair around.

Huh?

As the hot wind died down, I opened my eyes in confusion and saw Jeok Cheongang pressing a finger to my forehead, sighing heavily with an irritated look on his face.

But his eyes held affection, and the joy of seeing me again.

“You little monster. Stop making such a fuss and get up already.”

“What?”

“If you’re going to do it, do it properly. Like…bowing, for instance.”

I blinked dumbly. Jeok Cheongang glanced toward the window, where sunlight streamed in, and muttered:

“Sure is a nice day.”

I didn’t know why I suddenly laughed.

No—that wasn’t true. I already knew.

Today. The day before yesterday. Maybe for a long time now.

“Haha.”

“You little brat. What are you laughing at?”

“Nothing. Let me give you my bow. I’ll make it a proper nine-bow ritual.”

Jeok Cheongang flinched at the mention of the nine-bow ritual, then scoffed.

“We’ve never formally established a Master-Disciple bond. What’s the point of that empty ceremony? Just behave yourself from now on.”

He was right. Jeok Cheongang and I had never formally become Master and Disciple.

An old man who had come out into the world to eliminate the Disciple who had once been like family to him needed a new successor to carry on his sect’s teachings. And a young man struggling to stay alive needed greater strength.

They had come together because each needed what the other had. The nine-bow ritual meant nothing to them. It was an empty ceremony.

Yes. That was how it had been.

But…

It stings a little, hearing him say it.

At some point, what had once felt natural began to sting, and what had stung began to feel natural.

And I wasn’t the only one whose feelings had changed.

“Later.”

A single word reached me.

Jeok Cheongang kept his gaze on the sunlit window. His eyes seemed fixed on something far away.

“When the time comes, if everything returns to its proper place…”

His voice faded and scattered into the breeze.

But I heard him clearly.

The rest of what he’d left unsaid—not with my ears, but with my heart.

And that was enough.

At least for today.

“Old Master.”

“Why are you calling me?”

Jeok Cheongang answered without turning his head. Maybe he couldn’t bring himself to face me.

“Old Master.”

“What? Why?”

His reaction was exactly what I’d expected, and it made me laugh out loud. Then I said the words I’d kept in my heart for a long time.

“It’s good to see you again. And to have you still here, close by.”

“…!”

“I’m back.”

The tension went out of Jeok Cheongang’s rigid shoulders.

He slowly turned to look at me, his expression impossible to read.

As if he’d never once had to decide what face to make at a moment like this, he forced a frown and twisted his lips awkwardly.

But everyone learns through experience.

No matter how much a person denies it, no matter how unfamiliar it feels, they can’t hide what’s in their heart.

That was true even of the man who had lived for more than a century with a hot, hard mask over his face—the face Murim had named the Fire King.

“Wel…”

His voice faltered. His expression was a strange tangle of feelings he still didn’t know what to do with.

But the next moment, his stubborn eyes curved into a gentle arc.

His voice reached me like a soft breeze, as warm as the sunlight.

“Welcome back.”

We smiled at each other.

Chapter 842

The young man woke with a start and blinked.

An unfamiliar ceiling. A strange smell lingering at his nose. And before he could make sense of either, something loomed into view.

“Ugh!”

Wham!

It happened in an instant.

He sat up on instinct, collided with something hard, and fell straight back down.

What was that?

He had no idea.

Not that he cared. It hurt too damn much.

“Urrgh…”

Was this what it felt like to have your face smashed with a rock?

As the young man curled up and groaned, something big and thick flew through his vision, bleached white with pain, and slapped him across the cheek.

Smack.

“Hyukmu. Wake up.”

Smack. Smack.

“Hyukmu. Hyukmu.”

The voice reached him as though from a dream. The young man—Hyuk Mujin—realized who it belonged to.

He also realized that the hard thing he’d struck when he sat up had been that person’s face.

Taishan, you son of a bitch…

No doubt about it. That familiar voice. That inhumanly solid body.

There were plenty of monsters around Hyuk Mujin, but only one who was a monster in the purest sense of the word.

Smack. Smack. Smack.

“Hyukmu, are you all right?”

I’m not all right because of you, you bastard.

Mujin wanted to cry. He’d only blacked out for a moment after the collision, but the lunatic kept slapping him so relentlessly that he couldn’t get up.

“P-please stop…”

“Hyukmuu! Open your eyes!”

Whack!

That one landed squarely. Mujin had barely managed to open his mouth when the blow made him bite his tongue. His body went limp.

As his vision faded, his life flashed before his eyes.

Mother, Father. I'm sorry. You were right.

He should've just taken over the family business like a good son from the start.

By now, he could have been the heir to the Hyuk Family Textile Shop, addressed as Young Master and scattering silver nyang[3293] in the streets. Instead, mouthing off to Jin Taekyung whenever he got the chance and getting punched until his nose bled had become his daily routine.

And now that bastard Taishan is going to beat me to death.

As his vision dimmed, Mujin wondered whether dying like this would count as an accident or a death in battle.

Just as he thought it was all over, he heard a voice like a bell ringing out his salvation.

"Good heavens, Young Hero Taishan! Stop right now!"

The clear voice rang out suddenly. The hand slapping his cheek stopped at once.

"Huh? Uh…"

Taishan blinked his calf-like eyes at Ju Hwaran, who had appeared out of nowhere.

"Taishan waking Hyukmu. Not doing anything bad."

"Not Hyukmu. Hyuk. Hyuk is his surname. And what you were doing looked more like putting him to sleep than waking him."

"That's unfair. Taishan only wanted to help Hyukmu."

"I'm sure you did. If Hyuk Mujin regretted his life and asked you to kill him."

Hwaran sighed quietly and checked Mujin's condition.

Jin Taekyung had once beaten his face until it swelled to twice its size. Now it was three times its size.

"Young Hero Hyuk. Young Hero Hyuk. Can you hear me… Are you crying?"

Realizing he was going to live, Mujin answered through streaming tears.

"No, Young Lady Ju. A real man doesn't cry. Sniff…"

"Should I call you Young Lady Hyuk from now on, then?"

"No, I'd rather you didn't."

"You sound fine, at least. The physician the Tang Family sent earlier must have treated you well."

Song Ilseom, standing beside Hwaran as usual, watched them and muttered, "We may need to call that physician back."

"It's all right. The ointment he left should be enough. He'll recover soon."

Mujin wiped at his tears. "Young Lady Ju, I'm sorry to say this, but I'm not all right."

[3293] A nyang was a traditional Korean unit of weight also used to reckon silver money.

“Finish wiping your tears first. Now, where’s that ointment? Young Hero Taishan, did you see the jar beside the bed?”

“Taishan knows. The one in the little porcelain jar?”

“That’s right. Where is it?”

“Taishan ate it. It was pretty tasty.”

“Oh…”

“Young Lady Ju, please call the physician. I think I’m going to die.”

Hwaran tried to decide who was worse: the man who’d eaten the ointment or the man sniveling and making a fuss. Unable to settle on an answer, she opted to get more ointment.

“Captain Song, I’m sorry, but could you bring me some?”

“No need to apologize. It’s just that this falls outside my duties, so there’ll be an additional fee…”

Song Ilseom noticed Ju Hwaran fiddling with the scabbard at her waist. His face stiffened as he continued.

“…but this doesn’t seem like the time for jokes.”

“Was that a joke?”

“Probably. No, definitely.”

“You’re still here.”

“I’ll be right back.”

Song hurried out. He returned with the ointment before more than a few moments had passed, accompanied by two people who hadn’t been there earlier.

“I brought extra in case that idiot eats it again. Is this enough?”

“I heard Taishan caused more trouble while I was gone. I apologize.”

After Song Ilseom, who was judging the amount of ointment, came Sama Pyo, apologizing. Then Namho asked with an expectant look:

“Just asking, but does the Fire Dragon Pavilion have a rule for offenses like this? Dismemberment into five pieces, perhaps…”

As all three said whatever was on their minds, Hwaran reached for her scabbard again. It had become a habit.

It had started after the Chief Escort she’d trusted like family nearly let the Zhongnan Sect take the Yongbong Escort Bureau, and after everything she’d endured in Nanman.

Hold it together, Hwaran. Just a little longer.

She wanted to draw her sword and go on a mad rampage. Instead, she took a deep breath, gathered the last of her patience, and answered them in turn.

“That’s plenty of ointment. Young Hero Sama, don’t leave in the first place. Taishan would probably cause some other trouble even with you here, but at least he wouldn't eat the ointment or knock Hyuk Mujin unconscious again. And Old Master Namho."

"Yes?"

"If you want to deal with Taishan so badly, do it yourself. We're at the Sichuan Tang Clan. See if you can find some poison."

"…"

"…"

"…"

"What? Does anyone else have something to say?"

Her icy voice made everyone in the room shut their mouths and shake their heads.

Even Taishan, one of the most oblivious men alive, and Mujin, who had been moaning in pain, fell silent. They traded glances with the others.

Young Lady Ju has changed a lot. She's had a hard time lately, but I didn't think it was this bad. That man's supposed to be her escort. Doesn't he know anything?

Why is that unorthodox bastard staring at me? Does he want a real fight this time?

Good heavens. I thought I'd gained a sweet little granddaughter in my old age. How did she turn out like this? Then again, dismemberment was a bit much. I should look for poison, as she suggested.

Taishan wants more ointment. It was a nice little treat.

These damn people don't care that I'm hurt at all. And what does she mean, the Sichuan Tang Clan? What the hell happened?

Not a single thought got through to anyone else, but everyone except Hwaran reached the same unspoken agreement: they would keep their mouths shut until she calmed down.

It wasn't until Ju Hwaran's stiff face softened that Hyuk Mujin, who'd been furtively checking the others' expressions while applying ointment himself, was able to hear what had happened.

"What? It's been two days?"

Hwaran nodded. "Exactly two days."

"Then this really is…"

"As I told you, we're at the Sichuan Tang Clan. More precisely, in the Medical Hall of its Outer Court."

Mujin could only blink.

He'd closed his eyes for what felt like a short, deep sleep. Now two days had passed, and he'd woken in the Sichuan Tang Clan's Medical Hall.

"What on earth happened?"

"Young Hero Hyuk, you don't remember?"

"No. I only remember what the Captain and the Huang tribe member were saying at the river landing. After that, there was a flash before my eyes."

Song Ilseom, leaning against the wall with his arms crossed, muttered, “You remember it exactly.”

“What? That’s it?”

“Yes. None of us got a clear look at what happened.”

Sama Pyo nodded without thinking, then added, “The punch was unbelievably fast. I’ve never seen one like it. Something blurred, there was a sound like a drum bursting, and you fell. That was all.”

“Lord is wrong. That’s not all. Taishan saw everything. From start to finish.”

Taishan cut in, shuddering.

“Pavilion Master beat Hyukmu. Beat him a lot. Beat the fucking hell out of him.”

“…”

“Hyukmu was already down. Pavilion Master stomped on him. Stomped and stomped, like mincing meat. Ah, Taishan wants meat.”

“…”

“Oh, Pavilion Master tried to stomp on his pepper too, but people stopped him. Taishan helped stop him. No one should do that. Ah, Taishan wants Sichuan-style five-spice pork with lots of pepper.”

From a corner of the Medical Hall, where he sat puffing on his long-stemmed tobacco pipe, Namho groaned.

“Fuck’s sake. I told you we should dismember him into five pieces.”

“Taishan doesn’t know what that means. Namho know?”

“Of course I do. You tie bastards like a certain someone to oxen or horses, then pull their arms and legs right off—”

“Oh! Taishan gets the leg meat!”

Crack.

Namho snapped his pipe and charged at Taishan with a roar like a wild beast. Sama Pyo caught him and held him back as he struggled.

Hwaran sighed. “Anyway, that’s what happened. That part of you is safe, so you don’t need to check it now.”

Mujin had seized on the commotion to make a frantic check of his most important parts. He answered weakly, “That’s a relief. Where’s the Captain?”

“With Great Hero Jeok.”

“What? For the whole two days?”

“Yes. They seem to have a lot to talk about. I don’t know exactly what.”

“But they were together not long ago. What could take two days to talk about?”

“They haven’t told us, so we can only guess. I heard the Divine Physician is making a pill for the Pavilion Master. Perhaps it isn’t just talk. They may be preparing to help him recover.”

Hwaran’s guess sounded reasonable enough. Mujin nodded.

“True. It’s not as if he’s come back from some faraway land. How much could they possibly have to talk about? Don’t you all agree?”

When you come back from a faraway land, you have plenty to talk about.

Especially when all sorts of unimaginable things have been happening there.

After I’d told Jeok Cheongang my endless story, he stayed silent for a long while.

Then he summed up his thoughts in a single, short, blunt remark.

“We’re fucked.”

Chapter 843

Jeok Cheongang was a giant who had left his footprints in the vast sandpit of Murim.

He might not admit it himself, but everyone who had ever set foot in Murim thought so.

He was the Fire King, a great martial artist who had survived countless wars and crises over more than a hundred years.

The strong inspired awe. Old veterans earned respect. Jeok Cheongang was one of the few who commanded both.

His martial prowess placed him among the ten strongest people in the world, and no one could guess the depths of his experience and knowledge.

But even Jeok Cheongang didn't know everything about the world he'd lived in for more than a hundred years.

Much less a world that wasn't this one.

"We're fucked."

After a long silence, Jeok Cheongang spat out those words, certain that if everything he'd heard was true, there was no better way to put it.

The young man sitting across from him nodded.

"Yes. You've got it exactly right, Old Master."

Jin Taekyung clicked his tongue bitterly.

We're fucked. Nothing else quite captured how bad things were in the modern world.

One disaster after another had erupted without pause.

Looking back, Lee Jungryong seemed like a fairy. Michael Silbert and the Doppelganger had spent more than thirty years working together to bring the whole world to the brink of chaos.

No—the chaos had already begun in earnest.

"So, what was it called?"

"Monsters."

"Right. Mosu-tuh. Those Demonic Cult-like bastards are coming in force to the realm of immortals where you live, is that it?"

"Yes. Just like they did thirty years ago."

This wasn't the first time Jeok Cheongang had heard about it.

Taekyung had told him once, right after they left the Nanman Beast Palace, and again over the past two days.

But even with a far more detailed explanation this time, Jeok Cheongang struggled to understand what he'd heard. Another twenty explanations wouldn't have helped.

How could such a place exist?

A distant world no one could reach, no matter how many decades or centuries they walked. An unknown land they would never see, even after crossing mountains and seas.

And that wasn't all.

People there could talk face-to-face from tens of thousands of li[3294] apart, while enormous birds made of steel flew above the clouds.

Jeok Cheongang had spent his life walking through a mountain of sabers and a forest of swords. No wonder every new detail filled him with amazement and disbelief.

If anyone else had told him all this, he'd have slapped them across the face and burned them to a crisp with Flame Divine Palm.

Even if it had been the Martial God or the Son of Heaven.

But…

That brat's the one telling me. I have to believe him.

Believe him. Jin Taekyung.

At some point, that had become the most natural thing in the world. The old man trusted the young man, and the young man trusted the old man.

Jeok Cheongang didn't know when it had happened, but they had become the kind of people who would take even the most unbelievable nonsense from each other as fact.

"If the Dharma King, that damned monk, were alive and here with us, he'd have fainted dead away. He spent every day staring up at the stars, but do you think he ever imagined anything like this?"

Thinking of his departed friend, Jeok Cheongang looked at Taekyung.

"The more I hear, the less I understand that world. And yet, in a way, it's much like this one. Don't you think?"

Taekyung nodded.

At first, everything around him had felt unfamiliar and different. But not anymore.

The modern world and Murim. Murim and the modern world.

The two worlds were astonishingly alike—not in their civilizations, but in the currents of change running through them.

"If Murim has Dark Heaven, then the world I lived in has monsters. And both are headed in a bad direction."

"Not so long ago, each world went through its own Great Faction War, too."

"That's right."

"Then you…"

[3294] A Chinese li is 500 m (0.311 mi).

Jeok Cheongang trailed off. When he continued, his voice was grave.

Do you think all of this is just a coincidence?

A short silence fell.

As Jin Taekyung gazed at the oil lamp flickering in the darkness, his eyes began to glow red.

It was late enough that even the stars had fallen asleep.

I left Jeok Cheongang behind, stepped out of the pavilion, and wandered alone through the Inner Court. I had no destination in mind. All I carried was the question he'd just asked.

Do you think all of this is just a coincidence?

If Jeok Cheongang had asked me anything more specific, I would've hesitated to answer.

There was so much even I still didn't know. So many secrets remained hidden in both worlds.

But I was certain of my answer to that question.

Not at all.

It wasn't a coincidence.

That was what I'd told him after a short silence. It had taken me a long time to become sure of it.

I'd been thinking about it ever since I first opened my eyes in Murim. And after all that time, I'd reached one conclusion.

There's a connection. A definite connection.

At first, everything that happened to me had felt like a terrible run of bad luck.

All I'd done was fall asleep in a damn old capsule. Then I'd had to fight one danger after another in a world where I couldn't even tell whether it was a game or reality.

But as my circumstances changed, so did my thinking.

I'd gone from an F-rank Hunter who lost his job overnight to a celebrity, gripping power and wealth in both hands that I never could've imagined before.

And I'd gained them in both worlds—the modern world and Murim.

My bad luck turned into good luck.

The days when I'd lamented, How can I be this unlucky? quickly faded into the past.

What I'd thought was bad luck turned out to be good fortune sent down from the heavens. Maybe it was even more than that—a stroke of heavenly fortune.

Until, one day, I began to feel a strange sense of déjà vu.

From Shanxi Province to Henan. Across Sichuan and all the way to Hubei.

Beneath the dark clouds of Dark Heaven, blood-soaked flames had risen.

The Head Elder of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, who had long harbored a desire for revenge, drew the sword he'd kept hidden for years. A revered monk, respected for his extraordinary martial prowess and wisdom, met his death. And the flames that swept through Shaolin Temple spread to Sichuan and Hubei.

And finally, they reached distant Nanman.

The one saving grace was that those flames hadn't reduced everything in their path to ash.

Though countless people had died, even more had escaped the fire. And I'd found many traces left behind where that terrible disaster had swept through.

The Water God Dragon, driven mad and stripped of reason.

Fishermen and fish transformed into grotesque creatures that looked like monsters.

Dark Heaven's Moving Formation, so much like modern Teleport Magic that I couldn't dismiss it as mere dark arts or a formation.

And finally…

The rift that opened in Nanman.

I remembered it clearly. No—I couldn't forget it.

That darkness writhing like a living creature. The familiarity I'd sensed time and again in what Murim's martial artists called demonic qi.

It was magical power. I'm sure of it.

At first, I couldn't accept that.

It shouldn't exist. It couldn't exist.

But as time passed, the picture grew clearer, forcing me to face reality.

It isn't just a difference in names.

Mana and internal energy were identical at their core. Both were qi.

Something everywhere and nowhere at once. An intangible force present in blue seas and forests, and in smog-filled canyons of skyscrapers, though most people couldn't sense it.

Magical power was different.

That evil energy, steeped in death, had flowed in from another world.

If mana and internal energy were natives, present from the beginning, then magical power was a stranger—an invader that had crossed over from beyond along with the monsters.

And now that very magical power had appeared.

Not in the modern world, but here in Murim.

How am I supposed to make sense of that?

Ha.

A hollow laugh escaped me.

How was I supposed to make sense of it? I could try to deny it all I wanted, but I couldn't ignore what was right in front of me. I already knew the answer.

Dark Heaven.

There was no doubt.

Dark Heaven was the true link between the modern world and Murim.

Everything I'd personally witnessed since becoming entangled with them was evidence—and served as both prosecutor and judge.

But how?

How had they set foot in this world—in Murim?

The Great Faction War had been a major event, but in the end, it was a war over supremacy in Murim.

If anything like the Great Cataclysm had happened, I would've known. Or at least Jeok Cheongang and the others who'd lived through that time would have.

Rumors of hideous monsters sweeping across the land would've reached even the most remote villages.

But all anyone knows is that Dark Heaven succeeded the Demonic Cult and uses strange dark arts.

The implication was clear.

Something that shouldn't exist appeared in Murim during the chaos of the Great Faction War—or shortly afterward.

If so, the timing lined up exactly. That was when Dark Heaven first approached the Head Elder.

But I still didn't know the underlying cause. The biggest question remained unanswered.

The Lord of Heaven.

Dark Heaven's master.

No, an absolute being they might as well worship as a god.

How he could exist in Murim wasn't what puzzled me. The Great Cataclysm thirty-odd years ago had begun much the same way.

The problem was…

Who the Lord of Heaven really is.

Step.

I stopped walking.

Darkness lay heavy over the world, and torches burned red throughout the Inner Court.

As I stared blankly into their flames, lost in thought, I suddenly felt a shock as if something had pierced through the top of my head.

"Could it be…?"

The words escaped me like a groan and faded into the darkness.

Just then—

Swish.

The shadow cast by a wavering torch touched the tips of my feet.

Like that cursed being who no longer existed. Like the one who had smiled even as he met his eternal Erasure.

And at the same time, a conversation buried in the depths of my memories rang in my ears like an illusion.

The great king has overcome a god's curse. He may waver, but he will not break. Even if he falls, he will rise again. And at last, he will make all the earth and water in this world his own.

What?

That alone is the truth. A truth you cannot stop even knowing it—a truth that will become reality before long.

"…!"

I froze like a statue, as though I were back in that moment when I'd faced the Doppelganger.

Chapter 844

“Is that it?”

The man who spoke looked to be around thirty at most. His face was ordinary—the kind you might see several times in a day at the marketplace.

Yet no one would dare look at him and think he was ordinary.

He wasn’t standing in a marketplace. He was standing in a pool of dark-red blood.

“It’s certainly improved, but it’s still nowhere near what I expected…”

Crunch.

He stepped on an arm half-submerged in the blood and continued.

“Did you call me here just to show me this?”

The owner of the arm? He didn’t know. He had no need to know.

It belonged to one of countless test subjects, one of the dozens he had killed here today.

The problem was that he wasn’t particularly pleased with the experiment’s results.

“You’ve all got mouths. Say something, will you?”

The black-robed men lined up before him swallowed dryly in the icy silence.

They knew the man all too well. Whenever his temper soured, blood was sure to follow. Some of their own comrades had died that way.

After witnessing it countless times, who would dare open their mouth?

Their silence was a lesson learned through repetition. But for all the man’s brutality, he wasn’t stupid.

“Hah. Look at you lot. I call you sorcerers and treat you like people, and this is what I get…”

He gave a short laugh. The next instant, his figure blurred.

Thud.

Flesh and brain matter flew in every direction. One of the black-robed men—or rather, one of the sorcerers—crumpled like a rotten tree, his head smashed to pieces.

Boom.

The thunderous sound told the sorcerers what they had to do.

Thump.

They dropped to their knees without hesitation.

Silence wasn’t the only lesson they’d learned. They also knew that however cruel the man was, he preferred not to spill more of their blood than necessary.

“P-please, calm your anger.”

“Blood Lord…!”

The man—the Blood Lord—looked down at the sorcerers as they cried out and knocked their heads against the stone floor. A faint bloody light glowed in his eyes.

Vermin.

He wanted to tear their limbs off right then and there, but he forced down the urge to kill them.

Western Heaven is dead, and now Southern Heaven too. We need to preserve every bit of strength we can if we're to accomplish the great cause.

Sorcerers were precious. Few in Dark Heaven could wield supernatural powers, and the research they'd pursued for years was bearing considerable fruit.

Today's results simply hadn't pleased him.

Once they produced something close to a finished result, its impact would be more than enough to swallow the world.

"Not enough. Still not enough."

At the words he seemed to have spoken to himself, the sorcerers bowed their heads even lower.

If it wasn't enough, they would have to make up the difference somehow. They didn't want to end up like their comrades who had died before them.

"Blood Lord, if you could tell us which part you found lacking…"

"Every part of it."

The Blood Lord turned slowly and gestured toward the bodies scattered around them.

"They were all too weak. And the duration still hasn't improved."

"We're looking for ways to improve them, but we're nowhere near able to increase the potency of both effects at once. Obtaining enough Peak masters is just as difficult."

The Blood Lord frowned at what sounded like an excuse, but this time he had to accept it.

Peak masters couldn't be made overnight.

Even at the great sects of the Central Plains, which accepted only exceptional talent, reaching the Peak realm took more than ten years of grueling training.

The time varied with talent and effort, but that was all. Even demonic, heterodox martial arts, which could be mastered far faster than those of the orthodox faction, were no exception.

Nothing came easily. Those martial arts lacked purity and depth, and countless practitioners faltered before the wall of the Peak realm.

Those two were the exceptions.

The Blood Lord bit his lip. He couldn't bring himself to say it aloud.

As he recalled the not-so-distant past, a bloody gleam flickered in his eyes.

Jin Taekyung. Cheongpung.

At first, he'd thought they were earthworms. Creatures that would pop with a little pressure from his foot.

But at some point, those two earth dragons had become heavenly dragons. They'd risen from a mud pit full of filth and flown into the blue sky.

No. At least one of them was never an earthworm to begin with.

Even the Blood Lord had to admit that comparing Cheongpung to an earthworm might have been too harsh.

The youngest Disciple Sword Saint Mae Jonghak had accepted in his later years. A martial talent bestowed by the heavens.

Cheongpung was a genius whose equal was hard to find in Murim's history, born with the destiny of a dragon.

But…

What the hell is Jin Taekyung?

The Blood Lord had been the power behind Jin Yangbaek, Head Elder of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. He remembered all too clearly the day he'd first received a report on Jin Taekyung, long ago.

He remembered the first thing he'd said to the subordinate who delivered it, too.

"Investigate him again."

"Pardon?"

"How can anyone be that fucking useless? There must be something he's hiding."

It was only natural.

Jin Taekyung's martial arts were worse than a Third Rate street thug's, and he even made a schedule for his rounds of the pleasure houses.

If the eldest son, struggling to restore the family's fortunes, and the second, training day and night, were the pillars of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, Jin Taekyung was gnawing at what remained of them from the roots up.

An earthworm.

No. A bug.

But one day, Jin Taekyung changed.

Unlike Cheongpung, Jin Taekyung had been born a bug. Then he became an earthworm, then a venomous centipede, then an imugi,[3295] and finally a dragon.

When the Blood Lord pieced together the entire transformation, he was stunned.

That bastard has gone far beyond anything that makes sense.

Cheongpung was born with the destiny of a dragon. There was nothing strange about calling him one now.

Jin Taekyung had been granted no such destiny by the heavens.

[3295] In Korean folklore, an imugi is a serpentine being associated with becoming a dragon.

He was nothing but a bug, an earthworm. All he could do when stepped on was writhe.

That should have been all.

Throb.

A sudden pain made the Blood Lord clench his teeth.

He looked down at his arms. Both were whole and attached. Someone's purplish Force had once severed them, but they had grown back stronger than before. Now they trembled faintly.

From fear? No. This was anger.

And pain and humiliation etched into his soul.

If Jin Taekyung hadn't gotten in my way…

The Blood Lord ground his teeth as he recalled that day: Jin Taekyung, drenched in blood, clinging to his ankle and refusing to let go—and the Sword Saint Mae Jonghak's Force sweeping across his arm.

Worse than the pain had been the ridicule of the others.

Though two of them were lonely spirits now.

Western Heaven. Southern Heaven. Watch closely from wherever you are. I'll accomplish what you two failed to do.

The Western Heaven Demon Lord and the Southern Heaven Demon Empress had been too powerful for even the prideful Blood Lord to dismiss.

Their deaths were an enormous loss to Dark Heaven, but they had taught him two lessons.

First, he must never let his guard down against Jin Taekyung.

Second, helping the Lord of Heaven accomplish the great cause would require greater strength and effort than ever before.

"Spread them."

"What?"

The Blood Lord looked at the sorcerers who had questioned him without thinking. The bloody gleam that had been in his eyes moments ago had settled into a cold stare.

"Now that the Great War has begun, we need to gather every bit of strength we can. We can't keep using Peak masters in experiments like these forever."

"You mean…"

"You've already planted seeds throughout the Central Plains. Am I wrong?"

The head of the sorcerers bowed deeply.

"No. Some of the seeds have already blossomed."

It was true.

With vast wealth and years of research, Dark Heaven had created the "seeds" and scattered some of them throughout the land long ago.

Some had gone to Henan and Shaanxi, at the heart of orthodox Murim. Others had gone to border regions such as Guangxi and Guangdong.

And some… to the northern plateau bordering Shanxi Province.

The seeds were both an experiment and a means of sowing chaos across Central Plains Murim. Barely a month ago, one had nearly shaken an entire city.

Nearly.

"You failed spectacularly in Guangxi Province."

"That was…"

"I know. If the Fire King—that old man—hadn't happened to show up pretending to be a monk, it might have worked."

The unorthodox faction's uprising in Guangxi Province had been no coincidence.

A man carrying a "seed" had gathered followers and seized control of half of Guangxi.

At least until Jeok Cheongang, hiding his identity under the sobriquet Blood Monk, had smashed his head.

"But those were failures made before we improved the effects. If the ones we have now fall into the wrong hands…"

"It doesn't matter."

The Blood Lord cut off the sorcerer's warning that the blade might turn against them.

"Select men fit to become seeds and bury them deep. Make sure they can be spread whenever the time comes."

The sorcerers could see that further objections were useless.

They had two choices: obey or die.

And the Blood Lord wasn't wrong. They chose to obey.

"As you command."

The Blood Lord's eyes flashed as he looked down at their bowed heads.

He could still recall every word of his conversation with the Lord of Heaven, who had awakened without warning from his long slumber just ten days ago.

"The time has come."

"Lord of Heaven, what do you mean?"

"The world is twisting. Now… bring down the heavens."

The Blood Lord drew a long breath.

After issuing that one command, the Lord of Heaven had fallen asleep again. He had given his faithful servant an unbelievable opportunity: the chance to draw the bowstring in his name.

And now the Blood Lord knew by instinct.

It was time to release it.

"Send out missives."

That day, dozens of black-feathered hawks took to the sky.

Chapter 845

“Chew it thoroughly before you swallow.”

“Chew it?”

“Yes. Don’t swallow it whole, and don’t spit it out halfway through. Understood?”

The Divine Physician had arrived at first light with that stern warning. I gave a faint laugh and accepted the pill he held out.

“Of course. I’m not a child, and you made it for my sake.”

The pill was dark and about the size of a marble.

The Appraisal System was still inaccessible, so I couldn’t tell exactly what was in it or what it would do. But the Divine Physician must have spent several sleepless nights making it. The exhaustion around his eyes was proof enough.

He must have had plenty of other patients to care for, too.

The best physician in the world had sacrificed his own time and health to make this pill for me. Even if it was hard as a rock, I planned to chew it until the sweetness came out. It was the least I could do.

And the moment I chewed the pill with heartfelt gratitude—

Crunch.

I realized that being a decent human being could go to hell. This wasn’t something a human being could eat.

Ptooey.

The pill I spat out on instinct stuck fast to the Divine Physician’s pristine white robe.

He gazed mournfully at the pill he’d spent days making. “I told you not to spit it out…”

Still retching and struggling to keep my senses, I spoke from the heart.

“Sorry, but are you out of your mind?”

“I am, and I understand exactly how you feel.”

“Have you tried eating it yourself?”

“I haven’t.”

“Then you have no idea how I feel. None.”

“Medicine that’s good for you is supposed to taste bitter. It always is.”

“This wasn’t just bitter. Did you put poison in it or something?”

“Enough!”

Jeok Cheongang, who’d watched the whole thing, bellowed and glared at me.

“He may not be particularly trustworthy and may seem a bit of a quack, but he made that medicine with care for your sake. Poison? Where did you get the nerve to say such blasphemous nonsense?”

"Sorry."

"Don't apologize to me. Apologize to that quack!"

"Sorry, elder. I misspoke."

The Divine Physician, who was apparently neither particularly trustworthy nor entirely unlike a quack, looked silently between us.

I could almost feel how badly he wanted to stab one of us with a large acupuncture needle. Fortunately, his martial arts weren't up to the task. His sobriquet was Divine Physician, not Divine Needle.

He drew a deep breath, as if suppressing the urge to kill, and spoke calmly.

"It's all right. I've devoted the rest of my life to medicine. A physician must put up with unfair and filthy treatment while caring for a patient, mustn't he?"

"…"

"…"

"Sometimes I do wonder what my Master would think if he were here, but it's all right. I'm a physician, after all. I should expect a pill I spent several sleepless nights making to be chewed up and spat out. Ha ha ha."

He did not look all right.

His words didn't merely have a barb in them. They had an acupuncture needle the size of an awl hidden inside.

Jeok Cheongang and I watched his face and quietly exchanged Sound Transmission.

—This is all your fault.

—If you hadn't butted in, it wouldn't have come to this.

—You asked a physician who'd brought you medicine whether he put poison in it. Is that any way for a human being to talk?

—Is calling him a quack any better?

—Why wouldn't it be?

—He's the Divine Physician. He might take offense.

—I'm the Fire King.

—I'm the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon.

—How dare a little fucking nobody like you compare yourself to me?

—…

—Anyway, shut up and eat it. It's all for your sake.

A little fucking nobody? That hurt.

Jeok Cheongang shot me a fierce glare, then made an effort to soften his voice as he addressed the Divine Physician.

"Don't take it to heart. I'll give the boy a proper scolding."

"Then who's going to scold Sir Jeok…?"

"Hm? What was that?"

"Nothing. I misspoke."

Lying through his teeth, the Divine Physician peeled the pill off his robe. He stared mournfully at the clear tooth marks I'd left in it and sighed.

"Some of its medicinal properties have leaked out, but it's not too late. This time, chew it well and swallow it."

One thing was certain: its medicinal properties weren't the only thing leaking out.

Jeok Cheongang caught a whiff of the hideous stench escaping from the crushed pill and instinctively stepped back.

"Could this be Formless Ultimate Poison…!"

"I'm done treating him. I'll throw this pill in the latrine. Find another physician."

"W-wait!"

The Fire King caught the Divine Physician's robe as he turned away and spoke through his nose. His other hand had already flashed up to pinch it shut.

"Ah, I didn't mean to do that. Sorry. But this stench… What in the world did you put in this pill?"

"If I told you, would you understand?"

"…"

"It's a secret method my Master taught me. Stop asking and let it go. And don't worry—it isn't poison."

The Jeok Cheongang I knew would have answered with a spectacular string of curses and a blazing Flame Divine Palm. But for now, the Divine Physician held all the cards.

As patient and guardian, we kept our mouths shut and nodded. Jeok Cheongang urged me on, looking equal parts worried and curious.

"Do as he says. I'm here, so don't worry about what happens afterward."

"…"

Put like that, it really did sound as if I was about to swallow Formless Ultimate Poison.

I gave him a resentful look, then squeezed my eyes shut. Blocking out my senses as best I could, I tossed the pill into my mouth.

Crunch, crunch, crunch.

My jaw worked without pause. I curled my tongue as tightly as I could to avoid tasting anything. Then I added a spoonful of desperate effort to keep from retching.

Hnnngh.

I felt like I was going to die. No, I wouldn't have been surprised if I was already dead.

A hideous stench burst through my mouth with every chew. As some unidentified, thick juice trickled down my throat, my esophagus started doing the Zero Two[3296] and my guts launched into the cocaine dance.[3297]

Urgh, shit…!

I swear, I'd never encountered a stench or anything so revolting in my life.

Not even when I was a rookie Hunter and fell nose-first into a goblin's armpit inside a Gate. Not even when I screamed and flailed so wildly that I accidentally burst the creature's balls with my bare hand.

"Urk! Uuugh!"

Reason deserted me. My body moved on instinct.

Bent over like a shrimp, I tried to vomit up something hot surging from deep in my stomach.

Tried to.

If someone hadn't clamped a hand over my mouth and nose at that very moment —

Crack.

My breath caught. I struggled on reflex, but the grip holding me fast stuck like glue.

And there was only one person here who could restrain me so completely.

Old Master?

I forced open the eyes I'd squeezed shut and saw Jeok Cheongang's eyes glowing red with Scorching Yang Qi.

Then a powerful blow struck my Adam's apple.

Thwack!

With his hand sealed over my mouth and nose, I couldn't even scream.

As my newly brightened vision went black, I thought, At this point, that's closer to poison than medicine.

That was it.

I felt the finely crushed pill mix with my saliva and flow deep into my body. Then I lost consciousness.

Whoosh.

Along with a heat I knew better than anything.

Jeok Cheongang neither panicked nor hesitated.

[3296] The Zero Two dance is an internet dance meme associated with the anime Darling in the Franxx.

[3297] The cocaine dance is a South Korean internet dance meme.

He had lived for a hundred and several dozen years. The age of fifty, when a man came to understand Heaven's will and the natural order, lay far behind him. He knew better than anyone what he had to do.

Now.

Scorching Yang Qi seethed through his body, but his mind was as cold as year-round snow.

All trace of his earlier banter gone, he reached toward the unconscious Jin Taekyung, his face grave.

Swish. Tap. Dudududuk!

His movements were as swift as a flash of light, his hands terrifyingly calm.

Every time they blurred, Jin Taekyung's body jerked. Scorching Yang Qi seeped in with each Pressure-Point Strike, melting the pill and spreading its medicinal effects throughout Jin's body.

Don't rush. Stay calm.

Jeok Cheongang repeated the words to himself as if making a vow.

He couldn't afford the slightest mistake. Humans weren't so easy to kill, but their bodies were astonishingly sensitive. All the more so when that body held several jiazi[3298] of internal energy.

Rumble.

Tremendous heat surged around them. The solid wooden floor of the pavilion charred black, and the two men were surrounded by a shimmer like a desert mirage.

Hssssss.

An ordinary physician witnessing the scene would have rubbed his eyes or screamed and fled.

But the Divine Physician was the one physician who did neither.

He had spent decades following his Master and treating countless patients, and his Master's excellent teaching had given him experience beyond even that. It mattered, too, that the Master in question was the Slaughter Saint.

It's going as smoothly as it possibly could. Hard to believe, considering the treatment he's performing.

The Divine Physician watched Jeok Cheongang in wonder.

Working the channels and pressure points was no easy undertaking. The practitioner had to sweep, strike, press, and tap hundreds of points across the body, opening blocked flows of qi and blood and loosening knotted muscles.

That alone consumed enormous concentration and internal energy. A single mistake could seriously injure the practitioner, too.

And this time, he has to spread the pill's energy to every corner of the body.

[3298] A jiazi is a sixty-year cycle in the traditional East Asian calendar.

It wasn't merely difficult. It was extraordinarily difficult.

Under normal circumstances, even the Divine Physician wouldn't have dared treat someone this way.

With the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, it was different. Of the ten Supreme Peak masters known as kings throughout the world, he alone could be compared to the Three Saints. He was also a Master willing to risk anything for his only Disciple.

Just like the Divine Physician's own Master.

You're doing well somewhere, aren't you? Aren't you?

The Divine Physician had just thought of the Master he'd parted from four months earlier, almost as if he'd been forced to leave, and smiled faintly when—

Whoosh.

The heat and haze slowly dispersed. Through them, Jeok Cheongang came into view, rising to his feet, his face a little pale.

"Sir Jeok. Are you all right?"

"Don't make a fuss. This much won't hurt me."

"Even so, you should at least—"

"I'm fine. See to that reckless brat first."

From what the Divine Physician had witnessed, the treatment had been flawless. Yet even after pouring so much into it, Jeok Cheongang still worried.

His insistence that the Divine Physician check Jin again seemed driven less by trust in the physician than by boundless affection for his Disciple.

And the Divine Physician understood Jeok Cheongang's feelings.

"Understood. I'll examine him again."

He went to Jin Taekyung, who lay unconscious, and took his pulse. He was so thorough that half an hour had passed by the time he looked up.

"It's done. The pill's medicinal effects have been fully absorbed."

Only then did life return to Jeok Cheongang's tired eyes.

"Does that mean…?"

"I'm sorry. He's still a long way from a full recovery. In fact, I can't promise he'll ever recover completely."

"What?"

"You already know, Sir Jeok. His vital essence has been damaged."

"…!"

"Even steel bends when it's heated. In the end, it becomes a lump of molten metal. What chance does a body made of flesh and blood have?"

The Divine Physician looked at Jeok Cheongang gravely. It was hard to meet his trembling gaze, but a physician who lied about a patient's condition was no physician at all.

“Making this pill made me realize it once again. A full recovery is impossible, but improvement is possible.”

Grind.

Jeok Cheongang clenched his teeth.

He had suspected as much since Nanman. But it was a truth he couldn’t bear to face.

You foolish… foolish boy.

What in the world had happened? How fiercely had Jin fought, again and again, in that place as it became a hellscape?

Jeok Cheongang’s eyes trembled as he watched Jin Taekyung, now sleeping peacefully.

Then—

Crash!

The door flew open, and the rough beat of horses’ hooves sounded beyond the window.

Chapter 846

Dudududududu!

Some twenty horsemen galloped without slowing. The faces beneath their low-pulled helmets were tense, and white foam had dried around the mouths of their panting horses. Not one rider eased the reins.

Not until they reached their destination, enclosed by stone walls like a fortress.

The first thing to greet them was a wary shout.

“Stop!”

It happened in an instant. At the shout from atop the stone wall, a dozen or so arrows flashed through the air and pierced the plumes on the horsemen’s helmets.

Shaaak! Thunk, thunk, thunk!

The accuracy was almost supernatural, the force tremendous. The horsemen stared at the arrows quivering where they’d struck the ground.

A mistake?

No. A warning.

If they ignored the warning and came any closer, the next arrows would pierce their throats instead of their helmet plumes.

“Gasp…!”

Sighs erupted from all around.

The more than twenty horsemen stopped where they stood as if on cue. They couldn’t hide their fear, but the man at their center was different.

As expected. The reputation is well deserved.

He looked up at the wall, admiration and tension mingling in his eyes. A group of archers stood there with bows drawn, backlit by the early morning sun.

Above their green martial robes fluttered a banner bearing four characters written in a single flowing stroke.

Sichuan Tang Clan.

The Nine Sects and One Gang. The Five Great Families. Fifteen pillars supporting Murim as it stood today.

And among them, none had a reputation for being more closed-off or cunning.

But…

He’s here. Right here.

The man steeled himself and stepped forward alone. Rather than a sturdy shield against the arrows that might fly at any moment, he held high a silver token drawn from his robes.

“Don’t attack! I’ve come from Seongju Prefecture!”

“Who did you say you were?”

“Huang. I’m the City Lord’s Captain of the Guards.”

“The City Lord? Ah, that fellow who’s been wasting away?”

“…I don’t know who you are, but you’d do well to watch your tongue.”

“If you don’t know who I am, you’re the one who should watch his tongue. You look like you’ve spent a fair bit of time in Murim. How have you not figured out something that simple?”

The Captain of the Guards swallowed before he realized he was doing it.

The man had plainly been picking a fight, yet somehow the captain didn’t feel offended. No—the man’s bearing made it seem only natural that he should speak that way.

Who is he?

For a moment, the Captain of the Guards forgot his mission and studied the man in front of him.

He wasn’t quite a giant, but he had a sturdy, well-proportioned build and a face that looked around forty. So far, he could have been any martial artist in Murim.

But his gaze was so piercing it bordered on menacing. Even the Captain of the Guards, who’d seen all sorts of people since his days as a wandering martial artist, flinched.

And he’s bald.

The Captain of the Guards saw the middle-aged man’s scalp gleaming in the sunlight and sensed danger.

In his experience, most martial artists were missing something important. Why would anyone who was carefree and happy throw himself into the brutal, turbulent martial world?

The bald ones he remembered were especially unpredictable. They were missing something inside, just like the others—but, unfairly, they were missing their hair as well.

“Hey.”

“Yes?”

The captain jumped and answered on reflex. He’d slipped from polite speech into outright deference so naturally that he hadn’t noticed it himself.

“You know me?”

“N-no.”

“Then why are you staring at my head like that? It’s making me uncomfortable.”

It was hard to say which was ruder: calling someone “you” and “that bastard” the moment you met, or staring at his head. But for the Captain of the Guards, who’d already sensed danger, there was only one option left.

“I-I’m sorry.”

“Some stray mutt barges in out of nowhere, raising hell… At least you know when to back down.”

The captain felt wronged. He didn’t know who this middle-aged man was. He’d ridden hard since early morning to meet someone else.

How did things end up like this? Was the information wrong from the start?

Tang Sadok, Family Head of the Sichuan Tang Clan, had approved the meeting. Yet the person the captain had come to see was nowhere in sight. Instead, a menacing bald man stood across from him, staring as if he meant to eat him alive.

That last part, however, was all in the captain’s head.

The middle-aged man—Jeok Cheongang—snorted. His gaze settled on the captain as he sank into thought.

Uninvited guests, barging in during broad daylight. Ordinarily, he’d have kicked them out on their asses. Officials were another matter, especially the Captain of the Guards, one of the City Lord’s closest men.

I can guess why they’re here.

Jeok Cheongang had eyes and ears. However little interest he took in the world around him, rumors still reached him. He’d heard that the City Lord had been confined to his sickbed for a couple of months.

“You came to see the Divine Physician?”

The captain, already on edge, stared at him. Two things startled him: the Divine Physician, whom even the imperial court had failed to find, really was staying with the Sichuan Tang Clan—and Jeok Cheongang had mentioned the renowned physician as casually as if he were Jang Sam from next door.

“I wasn’t sure whether to believe it. Is he really here?”

“What an ill-mannered bastard. Answer what I asked.”

“Y-yes.”

“Because the City Lord is ill?”

“Yes. I don’t know if you’ve already heard, but… We’re here to treat the City Lord’s illness.”

“Surely you have plenty of physicians.”

“That…”

The Captain of the Guards hesitated for a moment, but not for long.

He didn’t know who the man before him was, but he was clearly someone of considerable standing in Murim. He’d inserted himself into a meeting arranged by the Family Head of the Sichuan Tang Clan as though it were nothing. However badly the clan had been struck, challenging the authority of Tang Sadok, the Myriad-Poison Asura, took more than nerve. It took madness.

And then Jeok Cheongang spoke one sentence, enough to make the Captain of the Guards the most honest man in the world.

“You don’t have to force yourself to talk. Once you’ve been beaten senseless, you’ll start remembering things you’d forgotten.”

“…!”

“I must be seeing things. Your mouth still looks shut.”

Deeply grateful that his subordinates weren’t here, the Captain of the Guards hurriedly opened his mouth.

“The City Lord’s condition is that serious.”

“Five.”

“Pardon?”

“That answer was worth five hits. I’ll take one off for every proper answer you give from now on.”

Is he insane?

Jeok Cheongang hadn’t so much as blinked while making the threat. The captain’s knees went weak. He’d been a master of some renown among wandering martial artists, yet he felt he wouldn’t stand a chance against this man, who looked about his age.

“Go on, then. Spit it out properly.”

Jeok Cheongang spread the fingers of one hand. The captain forced out his answer.

“It’s quite different from what people say. Even the renowned physicians nearby have given up.”

“So you need the Divine Physician?”

“Yes. After everything we’ve tried, there should have been at least some improvement. Instead, his condition keeps getting worse.”

“Then it must be a race against time.”

“It is. But…”

The captain licked his dry lips before continuing.

“The City Lord’s illness is a little—no, very strange.”

“Strange…”

Jeok Cheongang murmured and folded one finger.

“Four. Go on.”

“Sometimes he’s conscious and can move about, but at other times he thrashes around like someone who’s gone mad.”

“Rather than like a madman, hasn’t he simply gone mad?”

“I thought so at first. The unmistakable symptoms started right after he returned from the Imperial Capital.”

“The Imperial Capital?”

“Yes. He was summoned to court over the Blood Tragedy that happened four months ago.”

The Sichuan Blood Tragedy had caused an enormous upheaval, even to an outsider with no ties to Murim. The authorities and Murim might have kept out of each other's affairs, but an event of that scale was bound to have repercussions.

More than ten thousand martial artists had fought in Sichuan, territory of the Great Nation. Countless people died or were wounded, and smoke from the cremation of the dead lingered for more than three days.

"Word spread quickly. It happened not far from Chengdu, and there were too many witnesses for it not to. But the biggest problem was…"

Jeok Cheongang, who'd been listening quietly, tossed out a single word.

"Dark Heaven."

"Yes. The court learned that members of Dark Heaven had disguised themselves as government soldiers."

"The higher-ups must have been furious."

"I spent years in Murim myself, but authority and saving face matter everywhere, don't they?"

Whether a man made his living by the sword or by the pen, he was still human. And the dignity and authority of the unified dynasty—founded after an age of warring powers—were not to be challenged.

Dark Heaven had done just that. Disguised as government soldiers, they'd walked the streets in broad daylight and gone on to carry out a horrific massacre.

Which means…

Jeok Cheongang sorted through his tangled thoughts and spoke.

"This is more interesting than I expected. Fine. Three. Keep going."

"After returning from the Imperial Capital, the City Lord took to his bed. Strictly speaking, it began on his way back to Sichuan."

"The higher-ups must have given him a thorough dressing-down."

"The court's reprimand was part of it, but he also fell ill because he lost what he cherished most in the Imperial Capital."

"What he cherished most?"

"Yes."

The captain gave that brief answer, then fixed his gaze on Jeok Cheongang's three raised fingers.

"…You crafty bastard."

"The City Lord doesn't favor me for nothing."

"Fine. Two."

"Be a little more generous. One."

"Do you want to spend the rest of your life with one eye?"

"…"

"Fine. One."

The Captain of the Guards stared at the last finger still raised and swallowed hard before speaking.

“His favored concubine.”

“His favored concubine?”

“Yes. Her name was Aehyang. He couldn’t live without her.”

“If he took her all the way to the Imperial Capital in the middle of that mess, I get the idea. So what, did he lose her in the street?”

“No. To be precise, a high-ranking person in the Imperial Capital took her from him.”

“Important enough to take the City Lord’s concubine. Who?”

“Well…”

Jeok Cheongang folded his last finger at the captain’s hesitation. Then he heard the answer and his eyes widened.

“The Son of Heaven.[3299]”

[3299] “Son of Heaven” is a traditional Chinese imperial title associated with the Mandate of Heaven.

Chapter 847

The world was vast.

Yet just as the two characters for □□—“all under Heaven”—suggested, Heaven stood above it all.

The wide earth and the seas. The living and the dead.

Nothing could hide from Heaven.

Even birds flying with the clouds across the distant sky looked up to it. So did humans, who rose and fell without end and turned their blades on one another.

All wondered what magnificent being might dwell up there.

That was what Heaven meant to people.

An unknown realm they could only gaze at, never reach. Something they feared and revered in equal measure.

So perhaps it was only natural that the one who possessed all under Heaven came to be called the Son of Heaven.

The blue sky looking down on everything was the ultimate symbol of authority, after all.

But even the Son of Heaven is just a man. He steals another man’s favored concubine like anyone else.

Jeok Cheongang’s surprise vanished, replaced by a quiet laugh.

The Captain of the Guards looked uncomfortable at the sound. “It wasn’t exactly a funny story.”

“No? From where I’m sitting, it’s plenty funny. A man they call the Son of Heaven steals his subject’s favored concubine, and that subject gets so lovesick he’s at death’s door.”

“…!”

The Captain of the Guards was so shocked he forgot to breathe.

He’d already guessed the man was crazy, but to speak so disrespectfully of the Son of Heaven—

He hurriedly checked for anyone nearby, then managed to force the words out. “A-are you insane? I don’t know who you are, but how dare you say that about His Majesty the Emperor…!”

“What, are you scared?”

“Do you even have to ask? Good heavens, if anyone else had heard you, you’d be accused of treason on the spot.”

“Hm. Treason.”

Jeok Cheongang scratched his chin as he considered it.

Things might have been different in the past, but now he was a Master with a Disciple and a member of the Murim Alliance.

"That could be a little troublesome."

"A little troublesome? Do you think treason is some petty offense?"

"It's hardly grave enough to warrant exterminating a man's nine degrees of kin.[3300] The Son of Heaven is made of flesh and blood like anyone else. What does it matter if someone insults him?"

"…!"

"Look at your face. Heh heh."

The Captain of the Guards stood frozen with his mouth agape. Jeok Cheongang slapped his knee and laughed.

He had lived for a hundred and several dozen years. He'd seen the age of warring heroes, when the blood never dried, and the birth of a new unified dynasty with his own eyes.

Awe and reverence for the Son of Heaven?

What a joke.

For a very long time, the title had meant little to Jeok Cheongang.

Just someone a little more extraordinary than most, with far greater ambition and cruelty.

That had always been his assessment. After hearing what his one and only Disciple had to say, he was more certain of it than ever.

He'd been right.

The Son of Heaven isn't granted by Heaven; he is born amid bloodshed and countless corpses.

Jeok Cheongang suddenly remembered the stories Jin Taekyung had told him: astonishing tales of a giant iron bird taking to the sky and traveling among countless stars.

As he thought of them and watched the Captain of the Guards still standing frozen, he couldn't help letting out another laugh.

"I understand. There are mountains of things even this old man knows nothing about. How could a youngster like you begin to imagine them?"

"Th-this old man? A youngster?"

"The world is vast, and time keeps moving. Perhaps Dongfang Shuo, who lived three thousand jiazi, could watch it all change."[3301]

The Captain of the Guards stared at him blankly.

The man looked about his age, yet spoke like someone from another era. Worse, the captain couldn't make sense of a word he was saying.

"What on earth does that—"

[3300] The "nine degrees of kin" refers to an extended family circle that could be subjected to collective punishment for treason.

[3301] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

The Captain of the Guards trailed off.

“You needn’t try to understand. Anyone listening to that would have the same question.”

“…!”

The sudden voice at his ear made the captain gasp. Instinctively, he reached for the sword at his waist to draw and swing it.

Or tried to.

Until a terrifyingly immense energy erupted from somewhere and pressed down on his entire body.

Whoosh!

A wave of qi, hot as flames and heavy as a massive boulder.

The Captain of the Guards froze, not daring even to breathe.

His head had bowed beneath the force pressing down on it. His eyes trembled with agitation as he stared at his hand, still short of the sword hilt.

H-how?

Only the unanswered question drifted through the Captain of the Guards’ mind, bleached white with shock.

How could this be?

He’d left Murim for a comfortable life in government service, but he was still a Peak master.

Nor was he some hothouse flower raised in the shelter of a prestigious sect. He’d come up as a wandering martial artist, a Peak master hardened by real combat.

He’d spent more than twenty years as a wanderer. He’d gone to war when he was barely old enough to grow peach fuzz and survived like a stubborn weed.

He might not have learned the fine martial arts taught to the disciples of great sects, but he was proud that his experience on the brink of death more than made up for it.

And yet…

If I move, I die.

He could see it clearly. Feel it.

Death’s shadow had drawn close. Before him stood a wall he could never overcome, no matter how many times he was reborn.

Drip.

At that very moment, a bead of cold sweat that had formed without his noticing ran down from the Captain of the Guards’ chin.

“It’s a hot day. That’s a bit much to put a guest through.”

Ssshhh.

At the calm voice, the heat scattered as though it had never been there.

The Captain of the Guards let out the breath he'd been holding and took several ragged breaths. In his ears, the sound of a conversation reached him.

"A guest? He's some nobody here to make a request hardly worth calling one."

"He's my guest, to be precise. He came to see me."

"What kind of guest tries to draw a sword the moment he arrives?"

"I can understand it. He was already shaken, and then someone startled him."

"Quiet. You're only safe thanks to this old man."

"I wouldn't dare compare myself to you, Sir Jeok, but my Master did teach me a thing or two. You needn't worry."

"No, but this brat who doesn't even have the blood dried on his head has been talking back to me all this time—"

"As a physician, I should point out that if the blood in your head dries up, you die."

"You—!"

The Captain of the Guards, listening to them, lifted his head in confusion.

The man Jeok Cheongang had called a wet-behind-the-ears brat had snow-white hair. He looked at the captain with kind eyes.

"Are you all right?"

"…!"

In that instant, the Captain of the Guards recognized the old man by instinct.

The old man had the bearing of an immortal, and their conversation had supplied the rest.

"D-Divine Physician?"

The old man—the Divine Physician—smiled wryly and nodded.

"Yes. I arrived late and caused you trouble without meaning to."

"N-no! Not at all!"

The Captain of the Guards hurriedly waved his hands, then glanced nervously at Jeok Cheongang.

Meeting the Divine Physician at last was wonderful. But it was nothing beside the question of who that terrifying bald, middle-aged man might be.

Could it be…?

The scattered pieces in his mind seemed to fall into place all at once.

Jeok treated the Divine Physician, who looked well past seventy, like a child. Merely releasing his qi had been enough to bind the captain's entire body.

No—more precisely, it was Scorching Yang Qi.

And then there was what the Divine Physician had called him.

He said "Sir Jeok." He definitely did.

The Captain of the Guards swallowed hard.

It was absurd. A crazy thought.

But he couldn't help it. As far as he knew, there was only one person in all the world who fit all those details.

"Th-that man… Could he be F-F-Fire—"

The Captain of the Guards stammered, unable to finish. Jeok Cheongang frowned.

"That's right. I'm the Fire King. Not the F-F-Fire King."

"Eek!"

"…Why does that reaction rub me the wrong way? You'd think I was the Grim Reaper."

At Jeok Cheongang's baffled look, the Divine Physician remembered something his Master had once told him.

> "As a rule, it's best to keep your distance from martial artists."
>
> "Why?"
>
> "Of all the kinds of people in the world, they're the most vile, violent, and—on top of that—stupid."
>
> "Ah, I suppose that's true to some extent."
>
> "…What do you mean by that?"
>
> "Nothing. But I thought not all martial artists were like that."
>
> "True. But steer clear of those who follow the demonic, heterodox arts. Ninety-nine out of a hundred are idiots."
>
> "I've heard there are righteous heroes among the orthodox faction. Should I avoid them, too?"
>
> "If you can, yes. They talk about benevolence and righteousness, but half of them are idiots."
>
> "Then what about martial artists who belong to neither the orthodox faction nor the ranks of those who follow the demonic, heterodox arts?"
>
> "They're so unruly, and so many of them are unknown, that it's hard to judge. But based on my experience, you only need to remember two things."
>
> "What are they?"
>
> "The Fire King. The Fire Gate Clan. Repeat them and burn them into your mind."
>
> "The Fire King. The Fire Gate Clan."
>
> "Once isn't enough. This time, say them and engrave them on your heart."
>
> "The Fire King. The Fire Gate Clan."
>
> "Good. Remember those two."
>
> "I think I've heard the title Fire King before, but why do I need to remember it so well?"
>
> "Avoid him."

> “Pardon?”
>
> “Never meet him, no matter what. If you hear a rumor that the Fire King has appeared somewhere while I’m away, leave the entire province.”
>
> “What? What kind of person is he that I’d have to go that far?”
>
> “A lunatic.”
>
> “…?”
>
> “The Fire King—or rather, the Fire Gate Clan—are lunatics who’ve spent generations fighting orthodox martial artists and followers of the demonic, heterodox arts alike. They beat people when they’re in a bad mood, when they’re in a good mood, and some days when they’re neither happy nor upset.”
>
> “…How can people like that exist?”
>
> “They do. There’s a mad sect that’s spent more than three hundred years breeding—no, producing—one generation of insanely strong lunatics after another.”

The Divine Physician remembered that day clearly. His Master, renowned as the greatest assassin of all time and unfailingly composed, had used the word mad three times to impress the danger upon him.

Then why does Sir Jeok look so offended? It all sounds right to me.

He kept that thought to himself. Stopping Jeok Cheongang, who had seized the captain by the collar and begun shouting at him, came first.

“Do I look that vicious to you? Huh?”

“Eek! N-no!”

“Then why is your voice shaking? Are you mocking me for being bald?”

“Eek! I-I didn’t! Please spare me!”

“If your voice shakes one more time, every last hair on your body is going to…!”

“Sir Jeok, please. Calm down.”

The Divine Physician sighed as he stopped Jeok Cheongang, then spoke to the trembling Captain of the Guards.

“I happened to hear the gist of the situation. To get straight to the point, I can’t leave.”

“Y-yes? Why not?”

“From what you’ve told me, the City Lord is suffering from an unusual case of lovesickness. As a physician, I must tend to those who are sicker and in greater pain.”

“B-but he’s behaving nothing like himself!”

“That’s only natural. He’s had the person he loves taken from him. How could he not be suffering? If my patients improve later on, I’ll come by then, even if it’s only once…”

The Divine Physician trailed off and looked toward the slightly open door.

Hurried footsteps and ragged breathing drew closer, loud enough for everyone to hear. With them came the distinctive clank of armor, a sound seldom heard from a martial artist.

Tap-tap-tap! Clank!

Sure enough, a figure in gleaming armor soon ran up and stopped at the door, nearly collapsing.

“You…”

The Captain of the Guards’ eyes widened when he recognized a subordinate who should have been back at the City Lord’s residence. The man dragged in a ragged breath and cried out, “Th-the City Lord…!”

Chapter 848

Every now and then, I found myself wondering.

Just how often did I pass out? How many times had it happened?

If the System window summarized my life, how much of it would be time I'd lost while unconscious?

Damn it. I had no idea.

All that mattered right now was that I'd just woken up—and found myself face-to-face with an ugly bastard who looked like a monster.

"Whoa, shit! You scared me. Who are you?"

The monster answered in a mumble.

"It's me."

"Me who?"

An unusual name I'd never heard before, attached to a face I wouldn't want to see even in my dreams.

Baffled, I asked again.

"Are you from the Sichuan Tang Clan, by any chance?"

"…"

"Tang Me?"

"Captain, that joke's a bit much."

Captain. The word from the monster's mouth left my jaw hanging open.

There was only one person who called me that these days.

"Mujin? Hyuk Mujin?"

"Yes."

"Good heavens, what happened to your face?"

"Someone beat me up."

When you're busy, it's easy to forget the little things.

Only then did I remember beating Hyuk Mujin black and blue a few days ago. I smiled warmly.

"Ah, I almost didn't recognize you. You got so handsome."

"Should I thank you?"

"If you do, I'll gladly accept. But your face wasn't this fu—this handsome when I last saw you."

"Some lunatic tried to put me to sleep forever. I couldn't do a thing."

"A lunatic? Who?"

"Some guy whose only goal in life is to stuff himself until he bursts."

Of the people I knew, only two lunatics came to mind.

Cheongpung. And Taishan.

Of course, Cheongpung was probably traveling all over the land with the Slaughter Saint, searching for traces of Dark Heaven. There was no way he'd just pop up at the Sichuan Tang Clan.

That left one lunatic.

"Can you see my face right now? That lunatic Taishan hit me before the swelling had even gone down. It swelled up three times as much."

"I get it, you're three times more handsome. Now get your face out of mine. Or help me sit up."

"Sorry, but I can't. If I get any closer, I'll smell your breath too. It's hard enough standing here as it is."

"What?"

At first, I didn't understand what he meant.

Then the terrible stench hit my nose.

"Ugh."

I barely held back a gag and pushed myself upright.

As if he'd expected that, Hyuk Mujin nodded and handed me a waterskin and a scrap of cloth.

"It really stinks, doesn't it? Plug your nose with this, like I did, and rinse your mouth out. And try to cover your mouth when you talk…"

"If you don't want to get even more handsome, shut up. My stomach's already turning."

"Sorry. But your breath really is awful, Captain. What on earth did you eat?"

"Shit."

"Good heavens, why would you eat that?"

"…"

Was that idiot Hyuk Mujin actually taking me seriously? Or was he just trying to mess with me?

After a moment's thought, I let out a deep sigh. I stuffed the scrap of cloth he'd given me up my nostrils and rinsed my mouth out several times. Only then did it feel like I could breathe again.

Anyway, what exactly happened?

My last memory was Jeok Cheongang forcing me to swallow that awful pill.

No—to be precise, I'd felt heat seep into my body just before I lost consciousness.

It had been as familiar as coming home. Warm, rather than hot.

It was Old Master's Scorching Yang Qi. I'm sure of it.

Just as the world held more colors than the seven in a rainbow, qi came in more than one kind.

I didn’t know how many sects in the world used Scorching Yang Qi, but the Fire Gate Clan was its root. The qi I’d felt had unquestionably belonged to Jeok Cheongang.

Which means…

I slowly looked around.

The room was as clean and tidy as when I’d first arrived. But the stench lingering in the air and the dark marks on the floor were still there.

“It took ages to clean that up. It was sticky and smelled so bad I thought I was going to die.”

Hyuk Mujin had caught my gaze and was quick to complain.

“The Divine Physician said impurities came out of your body as a kind of mucus. Um, what did he call it? I knew the term, but it’s slipped my mind. Pushing… pushing…”

“Pushing the meridians and passing through the acupoints.”

At my offhand reply, Hyuk Mujin nodded.

“Oh, right. That thing I’d only ever heard about.”

No wonder he’d only heard of it. Pushing the meridians and passing through the acupoints required considerable preparation and sacrifice. It wasn’t something people attempted lightly.

Not even masters who’d reached Supreme Peak were exceptions.

It took a tremendous amount of mental strength, and the practitioner had to infuse part of their own internal energy evenly throughout the other person’s body.

And if it failed, the damage was severe.

But Jeok Cheongang had performed the treatment while I was unconscious, accepting the risk and the loss of internal energy.

It wasn’t the first time he’d treated me that way, but I couldn’t help feeling grateful —and guilty.

…He didn’t have to go this far.

If I’d been hovering between life and death, I might have asked him to. But until now, I’d been getting by well enough.

And we were in a situation where anything could happen at any moment. For everyone’s sake, it was better to preserve even a little more of the Fire King Jeok Cheongang’s strength than the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung’s.

Of course, if I said that in front of Old Master, he’d tear into me.

I let out a quiet laugh and drew up the Scorching Yang Qi. The increase in my internal energy wasn’t enough to show, but I could feel it at once.

Slowly. Carefully.

I sent the Scorching Yang Qi—now a little over three jiazi[3302]—flowing like lava through every limb and acupoint in my body. At the same time, I quietly examined everything deep within me.

My acupoints were wider and sturdier. My blood had cleared now that the impurities were gone, and my organs were working normally.

I drew in a long breath and sent the Scorching Yang Qi flowing faster.

It didn't take long for the slow-moving lava to become a blaze sweeping across a plain.

Sssshhhh.

Once around. Twice. Three times.

The circulation of qi that had begun as a Small Circulation became a Great Circulation. The fire dragon swept through hundreds of major and minor acupoints, putting my insides in order once more, then finally returned to my lower dantian and coiled up.

And just when everything seemed perfect—

Throb.

A sudden pain struck my lower dantian. I finished circulating my qi and clicked my tongue bitterly.

So this still isn't enough.

That horrible pill the Divine Physician had made and Jeok Cheongang's treatment must have been the best they could do for me right now.

But even with all their efforts, they hadn't been able to heal me completely.

The price of using power my body couldn't handle was bitter. Wishing otherwise wouldn't change the reality.

A vessel faced with more water than it could hold had only two choices.

It could hold what it was able to—or break under the weight of the water pouring in.

I was in the latter situation.

"…It's only a crack for now, though."

At my involuntary mutter, Hyuk Mujin, who'd been standing guard, asked, "Huh? What is?"

"You don't need to know. It's just something."

"Wow, that's cold. Where are you going to find a right-hand man as loyal as me?"

"As I've told you time and again, you're barely my pinky toe."

"Now that I think about it, that's not so bad."

"What?"

"Your pinky toe. It hurts the most when you stub it on a doorframe."

[3302] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle. Three jiazi are 180 years.

"…"

Was it just me, or was that guy becoming a formidable opponent?

Briefly at a loss for words, I shook my head.

"Cut the nonsense. Go fetch some water. I need to wash up. I feel disgusting."

"Now?"

"Yeah. I can't stand this smell."

I wrinkled my brow at the stench clinging to my clothes. Hyuk Mujin scratched the back of his head.

"Um, Captain. That might be a little difficult."

"What did you say?"

I blinked and asked in a serious voice, "Are you talking back to me? Is your face itching because you want to be the most handsome man of all time?"

"Please stop hitting me. I'm begging you."

"Then why are you talking nonsense?"

"I'm not talking back. I mean we don't have time. Everyone's ready and waiting for you to wake up."

"…Ready? Waiting for me to wake up?"

"Yes. We'll put up with the smell somehow, so let's just leave."

What the hell was he talking about?

As I stared at him, bewildered, Hyuk Mujin hurriedly rummaged through his robes and pulled out a sheet of yellow paper.

"What's that…?"

"It's a letter Sir Jeok and the Divine Physician left before they departed. They told us to get everything ready and bring you as soon as you woke up, without wasting any time."

Jeok Cheongang and the Divine Physician had left ahead of us. And they'd left a letter.

Trying to make sense of the questions that still wouldn't go away, I unfolded the rough-textured yellow paper. At that moment, a single line written in a strikingly vigorous hand—presumably the Divine Physician's—seared itself into my eyes.

> City Lord of Sichuan Province. Deceased.

"…!"

The Divine Physician suddenly remembered a lesson his Master had once taught him.

His Master had taken a fearsome number of lives, yet rescued countless others from the brink of death.

“What do you think is the most frightening illness in the world?”

“Cancer, I think.”

“Why do you think so?”

“Tumors too small to see with the naked eye grow deep inside the body. You’re fortunate if you notice the signs early, but without a physician of exceptional skill, people often die without ever receiving proper treatment.”

“You’re not wrong. But if you find the right physician in time, it can be cured without help from Heaven.”

“Isn’t that because you’re the Divine Physician, and a martial arts master who’s reached the stature of a grandmaster?”

“No. Any physician whose skill I would recognize could do it. You included.”

“You flatter me, Master. But I still don’t know what answer you’re looking for.”

“Flesh that’s been gouged or torn can be stitched together. Twisted or broken bones can be set. Even if an organ is injured, you can open the body and examine it.”

“Ah, I understand now.”

“What is it?”

“An illness of the mind.”

“That’s right. A sickness of the mind can’t be seen, stitched up, or set. It kills patients more stealthily than an assassin and more cruelly than a fiend.”

“Then how should we treat people like that?”

“First, meet them as one person to another, not as physician and patient. Second, listen without a word. Third, become their friend.”

“And if even that doesn’t help, and the patient chooses to die…”

“Carefully prepare their body for burial, and see them off on their final journey. But whoever the patient may be, always remember one thing.”

“What is it?”

“No one dies without a cause. Find the cause first.”

“…!”

The Divine Physician came back to himself and opened his eyes.

On the broad, lavish bed lay a corpse, as if in a deep sleep.

City Lord of Sichuan Province. Why did you die?

Was it grief over having his beloved concubine taken from him? Or anger at himself for being powerless to stop it?

Or perhaps…

Was it never lovesickness at all, but something else?

The Divine Physician gazed calmly down at the City Lord’s corpse.

A renowned physician from Sichuan had already concluded that the high-ranking man had died suddenly. But after examining the body for more than three shichen,[3303] the Divine Physician disagreed.

What grudge did you incur?

Puk.

He drew a long needle from an acupoint with a question the dead man would never hear. Then he studied the tiny thing writhing on its sharp tip and murmured,

"…Gu poison."[3304]

[3303] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; three shichen are approximately six hours.

[3304] Gu is a traditional Chinese term for poison or harmful magic associated with venomous creatures, often insects.

Chapter 849

One shichen.[3305]

That was how long it took us to reach the City Lord's Hall, which served as both his residence and his government offices.

Thudududud!

Stealing Ju Wongong's carriage—no, borrowing it—had been a stroke of genius.

The six-horse carriage was lavish enough to turn heads at a glance, and it had a kind of magic that made horrific traffic jams disappear.

"Stop! Stop! Halt at once!"

"State your identity and business… Wait, I've seen this carriage somewhere before."

We'd turned a crowded main road into an autobahn in the blink of an eye. Of course we stood out even from a distance.

The guards' eyes went wide when they saw the carriage hurtling toward them. Then someone shouted, giving them no time to do anything else.

"Open it!"

"Y-yes?"

"I said open the gate, you idiots!"

"Y-yes, sir! Open the gate!"

Rrrrmmmble!

Had someone given them orders beforehand?

We didn't stop the carriage or go through any of the checks we should have.

The enormous iron gates swung open to match the carriage's rapidly approaching speed. Hyuk Mujin, seated on the driver's bench, didn't ease up on the reins until we'd passed through no fewer than five gates.

Pffft. Pffft.

The six fine horses snorted after their nonstop gallop. As the Fire Dragon Pavilion members and I climbed down from the carriage, a group of strangers approached us.

"Young Hero Jin Taekyung, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon?"

The man at their head got straight to the question, as if he couldn't spare a moment.

But there was something subtly different about him from the usual government official. Even military officers in government service tended to avoid addressing someone directly by a Murim sobriquet.

A martial artist?

[3305] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

I studied the man, who wore lighter armor than the others. Song Ilseom's Sound Transmission reached my ear.

— I know him. He won't recognize me, though.

— You know him? Who is he?

— He was fairly well-known as a wandering martial artist. I heard he retired later on…but I didn't know he'd left Murim altogether to join the government.

— Really?

— Yes. My memory is accurate.

— Then why are you slipping into casual speech again? Are you older than me?

— I'm fairly sure I'm much older.

Oh, right.

I'd briefly forgotten that Song Ilseom was a few years older than me, even by modern standards.

But if I let that slide, discipline in the Fire Dragon Pavilion would fall apart. I put the full authority of the Pavilion Master into my Sound Transmission.

— So what if you're older? Want to end up like Hyuk Mujin?

— …

— If you don't like it, you can be Pavilion Master.

Song Ilseom gave me a cold, flat stare, then sighed and shook his head.

The former wandering martial artist spoke again, looking straight at me this time.

"Are you Young Hero Jin Taekyung?"

"That's me."

"Those who arrived before you told me to expect you. This way, please."

He briefly introduced himself as the Captain of the Guards for the City Lord of Sichuan Province, then led us deep into the City Lord's Hall.

"I presume you've already heard what happened."

I nodded as I walked behind him.

"To some extent."

"You must have been quite taken aback."

"At first, a little. I thought it was someone I knew."

"Ah, do you mean the Acting City Lord?"

"Yes."

There were currently two City Lords in this land.

No—there had been two.

Ju Wongong, a distant imperial relative with whom I'd had some history.

And the original City Lord of Sichuan Province, who'd been bedridden for the past few months.

What was the name of the guy who just died? Won Gyun?

A name like that was unusually memorable for an extra. He sounded like the sort of guy who'd be a complete disaster at sea, even if he did fine on land.[3306] Then again, maybe I remembered him because of that enormous belly. He'd looked twenty months pregnant, not merely about to give birth.

"I don't know if you remember, but I once saw you up close," the Captain said.

"You saw me?"

"It was just before the Sichuan Blood Tragedy. You came to see the City Lord with His Highness Prince Shangshan's token and asked for support."

"Oh. Right. So you were there, too?"

"Yes. As the Captain of the Guards, I was at the City Lord's side. I never imagined this would happen back then."

He answered with a bitter expression and kept walking.

As befitted a place that was both the City Lord's residence and his government offices, people in fine official robes were everywhere.

"The atmosphere isn't as tense as I expected," Ju Hwaran murmured behind me. "I thought there'd already been an uproar."

The Captain nodded. "Those who work here knew something of the City Lord's illness."

The calm atmosphere on the grounds suggested that his death hadn't come as a sudden shock.

But I didn't take the situation at face value. If it were as natural and ordinary as it seemed, Jeok Cheongang and the Divine Physician would have had no reason to come here.

Besides…

If they knew only part of it, there must be something that still hasn't gotten out.

Lost in thought, I kept walking. The farther we went, the fewer people we encountered. Even the guards who'd been everywhere before disappeared.

At last, the Captain stopped in front of a magnificent stone building, more like an estate than a pavilion.

"This is where the City Lord was staying. I'd like to escort you farther, but I have orders to follow."

"Orders?"

"From the Acting City Lord. He said only two people, including Young Hero Jin, are to be allowed inside."

Two people?

I could understand if it were just me, but I had no idea who the other person was supposed to be.

[3306] The line alludes to the historical Won Gyun, a Korean naval commander remembered for a disastrous defeat at sea.

I frowned. Then an unexpected name slipped from the Captain's lips.

"Is there someone among your companions named Namho?"

"Huh?"

"Mm?"

Everyone's eyes widened as we looked in the same direction.

The Captain spotted Taishan, who stood there looking blank, and nodded as though he'd figured it out.

"Ah, that must be Great Hero Nam. A tiger-like bearing, just as his name suggests…"

Thwack! Thwack!

Namho emerged from behind Taishan's huge frame, huffing as he hammered the giant's thigh with two fists that looked unusually tiny today.

"Move! I said get out of the way! You useless freeloader!"

"Heehee. Stop it, Namho. Taishan's ticklish. Heeheehee."

"Fucking hell…!"

If Taishan had been an actual rock, maybe. But what could an egg do against Mount Taishan?

Taishan giggled at the tickling. Namho was about to let loose a torrent of curses when he noticed the Captain watching him. Instead, he gave the man a hearty laugh.

"I'm Namho. The tiger from the south. Namho."

"…"

"What's with that look?"

"N-no, it's nothing."

"No, explain yourself."

The Captain looked Namho up and down as if he were staring at an ant from the south. Without saying anything more, he gestured to one of his subordinates.

Creeeak.

The doors swung open to either side with an irritating squeal, as if the new intruder wasn't welcome.

Namho came right up beside me as I headed inside and whispered, "What's with his reaction? Is a tiger that funny? Huh?"

"…"

Out of respect for my elders, I couldn't bring myself to tell him the truth.

Maybe it was because of the City Lord's lofty station, or maybe because the dead man had been corrupt. Whatever the reason, the inside of the pavilion was spacious and lavish.

Step. Step.

Our footsteps echoed along the corridor paved with expensive bluestone.

A dozen or so men and women approaching from the other end bowed to Namho and me, then passed by.

"Physicians and female physicians. Looks like they came to examine the body."

Namho sounded calm again, as though nothing had happened. From the moment we entered the pavilion, he'd been taking in everything around him.

"Heh. They even embedded night-shining pearls in the ceiling. I can only imagine how much they squeezed the people dry."

"I don't know much about it, but even when I was in Sichuan, people didn't have much good to say about the dead City Lord."

"If the bastard who used those expensive pearls was the one who just died, good riddance."

"Maybe he bought them with his own money."

"What does that mean?"

"He paid for them himself."

Namho snorted. "Sometimes, you really are a sheltered young master who knows nothing about the world. Let this old man teach you something. Those with money and power always…"

"Use other people's wealth to fill their own bellies instead of spending what they have."

"Huh? You know? Is that how it is in Shanxi Province, too?"

"Not always, but…it's the same everywhere people live."

Namho furrowed his brow at my answer.

"That's odd."

"What is?"

"Well, you said it yourself—it's not something you experienced in Shanxi Province. You sound like someone whose hometown is somewhere else."

The sharp instincts of a Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent.

Whenever Namho let this side of himself show, I could tell how much experience he had.

But he'll never guess the truth.

Martial arts skill wasn't the only thing I'd gained from everything I'd been through. I smiled as if his observation meant nothing.

"Do you have to taste shit to tell it from black bean sauce?"

"Someone around twenty would do exactly that. It's a phase everyone goes through."

"Everyone does, but not everyone earns the sobriquet Blazing Flame Divine Dragon around that age. Ah, this way."

I answered without missing a beat and turned down another corridor.

Namho looked at me with narrowed eyes for a moment, but then followed without another word. Meanwhile, I kept an ear out for the voices slowly drawing nearer.

"So, according to the Divine Physician's examination, it was a natural death?"

"It would be more accurate to say he died suddenly from emotional distress. His rapid weight loss was also one of the main causes."

"I see. That's why I kept telling him to lose some weight."

"…In any case, I agree with the other physicians' diagnoses. There's nothing particularly suspicious about the City Lord's—or rather, the former City Lord's—death."

"Ah, thank you. That Captain of the Guards has been making such a fuss that even I, this Young Master, was getting a little flustered. Now that the renowned Divine Physician of the realm has stepped in, it feels like I've gained a thousand troops."

"You flatter me. I've only done my duty as a physician."

"Come now, there's such a thing as too much modesty. Since you've handled this so well, I, this Young Master—or rather, this City Lord—will reward you handsomely. Someone, come here!"

I rounded the bend in the corridor and answered.

"I'm here."

"Summon the treasurer at once and have him give the Divine Physician wealth and grain…"

His voice trailed off.

Ju Wongong stared at me, his face darkening rapidly. After a long silence, he spoke.

"When…did you arrive?"

"Just now. Got anything left to do?"

"…A little."

"Then go. I have something to talk about."

"…But I do have something left to do."

"Put it off. You're obviously just going to spout nonsense."

At my firm reply, Ju Wongong lowered his head sadly. Jeok Cheongang watched him walk away, his back limp, then spoke in a serious voice.

"If you'd arrived fifteen minutes later, I might have had the rare experience of tearing open an imperial family member's mouth for the first time in my life."

"I'm only going to say this once: please don't ever do that."

"This old man isn't that crazy."

"…"

The problem was, he seemed exactly that crazy.

I let out a long sigh and turned to the Divine Physician, pretending not to hear Jeok Cheongang ask how I was feeling.

"So what is it, exactly?"

"What do you mean?"

"You wouldn't have told that idiot everything, would you? And seeing both of you here tells me enough."

The Divine Physician smiled ruefully at my flat reply.

"As expected of Sir Jeok's Disciple."

What was that supposed to mean?

I was still deciding whether to feel pleased or offended when the Divine Physician drew something from his sleeve. Namho's eyes widened.

"That's…"

"What is it?"

"Gu poison. A very rare kind found deep in Nanman. It's called Blood Soul Gu."

Jeok Cheongang nodded as he looked at it.

"Bringing that fellow here was worthwhile."

Chapter 850

Blood Soul Gu.

Namho had identified the gu poison for us, and the name alone sounded ominous.

Then again, I'd never seen a gu poison with my own eyes before.

I studied the tiny creature writhing on the Divine Physician's gloved palm.

It was much smaller than a grain of millet, with a thread-thin body the color of blood. It looked too small for an ordinary person to make out with the naked eye, yet it kept struggling to burrow into his skin.

As though that were its sole reason for existing.

"If I hadn't been careful from the start, it would have gotten me. It's incredibly strong for something so small."

Sssk. Ssssk!

As if it understood him, Blood Soul Gu thrashed harder, trying to escape. The Divine Physician carefully enclosed it in his hand, slipped it into a tiny gourd, and sealed the stopper tight.

Only after checking for gaps several times did he take off his thick leather gloves.

"Blood Soul Gu… My Master taught me countless things over the years, but honestly, I've never encountered a gu poison like this."

Namho nodded.

"That's only natural. Blood Soul Gu is scarcely known even in Nanman. More precisely, there can't be many people left who still remember the name."

"You mean…"

"This was a very long time ago. Nanman was divided into three powers, like a three-legged cauldron, and they were locked in a terrible war. That was when Blood Soul Gu first came to light."

I knew the story. I'd heard it several times during my stay in Nanman, and if you went back far enough, it involved my own sect, the Fire Gate Clan.

It had been passed down like a legend, by word of mouth and through the few records that remained. And one sect always stood at its center.

"…The Five Poisons Sect."

The name came out like a groan. I looked at Namho.

"Are you saying Blood Soul Gu came from the Five Poisons Sect?"

"It was so long ago that I can't say for certain. But if everything I saw and heard in Nanman is true, Blood Soul Gu was one of the venomous creatures the Five Poisons Sect created after countless attempts."

"But I never saw anything like it in the Poisonblood Grounds."

“Gu poisons favor deep, hidden places. Even after combing through the Poisonblood Grounds like you were stirring up a hornet’s nest, would you expect to spot something like that?”

He had a point.

The Poisonblood Grounds had crawled with bizarre monsters, including the Thousand-Year Spider. In all that chaos, I couldn’t have kept track of every creature—especially one as hard to see as Blood Soul Gu.

“I’ve heard of the Five Poisons Sect, too. One of our sect’s Four Founders left a brief account of Nanman.”

Jeok Cheongang had spoken up without warning. His somber gaze rested on the gourd holding Blood Soul Gu.

“But that thing is nothing like an ordinary gu poison. It’s hardy enough to survive having its body pierced by a large needle, yet it doesn’t carry enough deadly poison to kill its host outright.”

“That only makes it more likely to be Blood Soul Gu. Senior Jeok, the gu poisons you’re thinking of cause no trouble as long as the host takes the antidote at regular intervals.”

“That’s what everyone knows.”

“But Blood Soul Gu is different. Ordinary gu poisons are used to threaten and control their hosts. The Five Poisons Sect created that dreadful creature for one purpose alone.”

Everyone looked at Namho. He let out the breath he’d been holding.

“To kill its host. In a way, it’s a near-perfect means of assassination.”

“…!”

“I spent a long time in Nanman collecting information. I searched through every scrap of what little remained in the records and sought out the oldest and wisest people from each tribe. I had to feel my way toward the truth in their stories, then sift out whatever might be false.”

One day, after the Great Faction War had ended, the Martial God vanished without a trace.

Hundreds, even thousands, of sects bound together by every kind of interest and emotion had lost their focal point. Perhaps it was only natural that they began to collapse.

The Murim Alliance dissolved.

But the roots of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion remained throughout the world. In crumbling old inns. Along crowded streets.

And in the remote reaches of Nanman, where venomous creatures and fierce beasts ran rampant.

Namho was one of its deepest, oldest roots.

“The war between the Five Poisons Sect and the Nanman Beast Palace was fierce. Sometimes they were evenly matched; at other times, one side had the advantage.”

The war had lasted a hundred years, he said. Poison was poured into wells and rivers. The Nanman Beast Palace’s warriors and beasts cut down and tore apart the Five Poisons Sect’s Poison Men.

“All of Nanman was engulfed in poison and flames. Had it gone on, there would have been neither victor nor vanquished. Both sides would have perished.”

Namho looked from Jeok Cheongang to me.

“Until an outsider appeared.”

The leader of the Fire Gate Clan, who was traveling the world at the time, received a grand welcome the moment he arrived in Nanman.

A hundred Five Poisons Sect warriors greeted the stranger who dared enter their territory with poison and hidden weapons. The stranger promptly burned everything to the ground and joined forces with the Nanman Beast Palace.

“With the Fire Gate Sect Leader’s arrival, the tide turned sharply. The Five Poisons Sect must have realized they had nowhere left to retreat. As time passed, they began unleashing things more and more dreadful and vicious.”

When people have almost nothing left to lose, all that remains is spite.

The Five Poisons Sect prepared its final counterattack deep in Ailao Mountain, in its most secret and dangerous place: the Poisonblood Grounds.

“Near the end of the war, the Nanman Beast Palace’s finest warriors began dying one by one. Neither physicians versed in poisons and medicines nor spiritually gifted priests could tell why.”

The Divine Physician, who’d been listening to Namho in silence, spoke with a grim expression.

“They wouldn’t have had any visible injuries.”

“That’s right. It wasn’t poisoning or a plague. By the time the Nanman Beast Palace learned the cause, more than a hundred warriors had died.”

“Blood Soul Gu may move stealthily and be hard to see, but with so many victims, surely they could have found it sooner.”

“I thought so too. But there was a reason they didn’t.”

Namho shook his head slightly.

“Everyone was exhausted by a war that had lasted a hundred years. Peace had long since become a faded word, and death was seen as rest. In those circumstances, it must have seemed only natural for some warriors to succumb to madness.”

“Madness…?”

“That’s right. They said most of them would act like they’d lost their minds one day, then fight more bravely than anyone the next.”

The Divine Physician let out a faint sigh.

“The City Lord. Those were his symptoms. When I first heard about them, I thought he was suffering from an illness of the mind after losing his beloved concubine.”

“Blood Soul Gu grows stronger in a host whose mental strength has weakened. The two may well be connected.”

“Then how did the Nanman Beast Palace learn what was happening?”

“They said the information came from interrogating an Elder of the Five Poisons Sect after capturing him. At first, it wandered through the duodenum and the acupoints, using mild poison to cause auditory and visual hallucinations. In the end, it gradually ate away at the brain and drove its host to death.”

“…!”

“The warriors didn’t all die at the same time. Some lasted only six months; others held out for years.”

“So it only begins to act once its host is weak in body and mind.”

“That’s right. But its killing power fell far short of what the Five Poisons Sect had wanted, and it took far too long. Perhaps that’s why they managed to improve so few specimens before the sect was destroyed. That’s everything I found out.”

A heavy silence followed Namho’s last words.

No one spoke, but it wasn’t hard to guess what the others were thinking.

A great war that had drenched Nanman in blood for more than a hundred years.

And now, long after that war, Blood Soul Gu had appeared again—in a Great Nation official who wasn’t even a martial artist.

I closed my eyes. Two characters had been circling in my mind ever since I learned Blood Soul Gu came from Nanman. Instead of keeping them to myself, I said them aloud.

“Dark Heaven.”

The darkness before my eyes cleared. When I opened them, three faces looked back at me beneath the soft light of the night-shining pearls.

“Blood Soul Gu was almost forgotten even in Nanman. There’s only one way it could have reached the Central Plains. Dark Heaven brought it here.”

Jeok Cheongang spoke in a low voice.

“The Southern Heaven Demon Empress.”

“Dark Heaven has been in Nanman for decades, waiting for its moment in the Poisonblood Grounds. That was more than enough time to find Blood Soul Gu.”

“Enough time? They had time to spare.”

Jeok Cheongang gave a small nod, then asked, “But why would they harm this man?”

“That…”

My voice trailed off as I looked down at the City Lord of Sichuan Province's corpse.

His arms and legs had gone cold. His face was white as paper, without a trace of pain.

Jeok Cheongang had put his finger on the question.

Why kill this man? And why do it so secretly?

He had held the high office of City Lord, but that was all. He was a moderately greedy, corrupt official of the sort you could find anywhere.

If Dark Heaven wanted him dead, they could take his life as easily as pulling a coin from a pocket.

So why go to all this trouble?

Was it because he had sent government troops to help us during the Sichuan Blood Tragedy?

The thought crossed my mind, but I shook my head.

No. If it was retaliation, a far more horrific death would have served them a hundred times better. They could have shown the whole world what happened to anyone who opposed Dark Heaven—even a high-ranking official. Then even those who thought Murim had nothing to do with them would have been too afraid to defy it again.

But if they chose this method anyway…

There was something else. Some goal Dark Heaven wanted to achieve that we hadn't discovered yet.

And just as my thoughts led me there—

Step.

A faint footstep broke my concentration. I turned toward it on instinct and saw a small maid standing there, fear on her face.

"Um, well…"

Her hands were clasped tightly together. She looked at us anxiously and spoke in a voice barely louder than a whisper.

"I-I'm sorry, but the new City Lord asked me to find out when you'd be finished talking…"

Damn it. How had something so trivial broken my concentration?

I frowned without meaning to. Then a flash of insight shot through my mind.

The new City Lord. Ju Wongong. One of the few remaining members of the imperial family.

And the reason Dark Heaven had needed to dispose of the City Lord of Sichuan so secretly. No—not the reason. A suspicion.

If I was right, this was only the beginning.

The City Lord's death was the first sign of Dark Heaven's scheme, and it gave me reason to suspect they had one target in mind.

The Great Nation.

A chill ran up my spine.

Eyes wide, I watched the maid hurry away and managed to force out the words.

“We need to send people out. Now. Find out everything about the City Lord of Sichuan and Ju Wongong. No—the Emperor and all his relatives, too.”

At the same moment, a name surfaced in my memory.

Someone closer to the title of Son of Heaven than Ju Wongong, a distant member of the imperial family—or anyone else of imperial blood still alive.

Someone who might be the most important key of all.

“…Zhu Bao.”

“What?”

“Prince Shangshan. Zhu Bao.”

Inside my firmly shut Inventory, the token that little boy had given me seemed to tremble.

Chapter 851

It was an especially beautiful day.

Warm sunshine, a cool breeze, and wisps of pure white cloud.

The people working up a sweat wore smiles, and the well-kept main road bustled with crowds.

Perhaps that was why someone who always seemed pressed for time suddenly spoke to his coachman just as the man was about to set off in a hurry.

“Could we take it a little slower today? There’s no particular rush.”

“Pardon?”

“I’d like to take my time on the way back. Look around outside, too.”

The coachman wondered at his employer’s uncharacteristic mood, but put the question aside and eased the reins.

All he had to do was follow orders, after all. And he much preferred guiding the horses slowly and safely to shouting at people to get out of the way.

Still, he’s acting strange today. Did something happen inside?

The coachman glanced sideways. A sturdy wall, built up in two and three layers like a fortress, filled his view.

At their usual pace, it was one thing. At this rate, it would take a full fifteen minutes to reach the end of that wall.

Good grief. It’s impressive no matter how many times I see it.

The enormous estate stood not on the outskirts, but right in the heart of the city. The land was as valuable as it came.

Owning so much of it was proof enough of the family’s tremendous power, but that wasn’t what amazed the coachman most.

It was nothing like this when I first saw it.

A fallen great family.

There had been no better way to describe it. That was the cold reality, as the coachman and everyone else nearby had seen it.

Yet no one could have guessed that a family slowly declining, its past glory behind it, would rise in barely more than two years to rule an entire city.

Just goes to show, you never know what’ll happen.

The coachman looked up at the flag flying high above the stone wall. A breeze caught the silk, and four characters written in a bold, flowing hand caught his eye.

Jin Family of Taiyuan.

The owners of that enormous estate had become a symbol of Shanxi Province.

The changes to the Jin Family of Taiyuan had been swift and unmistakable. The pavilions and walls, shabby and crumbling when the coachman first saw them, had been repaired until they looked as solid as a fortress. Supplied with fine weapons and elixirs, the family's martial artists now had a righteous light in their eyes that hadn't been there before.

And that wasn't all.

The entrance, once crowded with debt collectors demanding payment for the reckless Third Young Master's unpaid bills, was now so packed you could hardly set foot there—but for entirely different reasons.

Merchants from other regions came to entrust their business to the Jin Family Escort Bureau. At the end of each month, shopkeepers of every kind lined up to pay tribute, along with the martial arts sects and Branch Leaders under the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

So many of Shanxi Province's most important people came and went that they nearly wore out the threshold. Some people with nothing better to do even loitered nearby, spreading whatever they'd seen and heard.

Just like the two men squatting beside the roadside wall now.

"Didn't she come today, either?"

"Didn't who come?"

"Oh, come on. You know perfectly well who I'm waiting for. Why do you keep asking?"

"Don't tell me you're at it again…"

"What do you mean, 'again'? I've been devoted to her from the start."

"Cut the nonsense. If your wife catches you, she'll beat you to death—and I'll get killed, too."

"It's fine. You only die once, don't you?"

"I'm telling you, it's not fine. Your wife's arm is thicker than my calf."

"Good grief. You call yourself a man, getting scared like that? Just answer my question. Didn't she come today, either?"

"She was here just four days ago. Of course she didn't come today. Do you think she's an unemployed layabout like us, with nothing but time on her hands?"

"Damn it. I thought maybe this time I'd get to see her up close."

"Just give it up already. What would you do if you saw her up close?"

"Do I need another reason to see Shanxi's foremost beauty? I saw her from far away once, half a year ago, and my blurry old eyes cleared right up."

"Have you considered that one good whack from your wife might make everything go dark? And calling her Shanxi's foremost beauty hardly does her justice. She leads the Mount Heng Sword Sect despite being a woman—and she's formidable. If you cross her the wrong way, you won't walk away in one piece."

The man gazed dreamily into space, then swallowed.

"…Well, I heard she's got some old man following her around like a shadow, and he's got one hell of a temper."

“If temper were all he had, would they have called him the Tiger of Mount Heng? Quit acting up and go home while both your legs still work. Take care of your kid.”

“Take care of him? He’s all grown up.”

“Already? Time flies. I remember him being born just about this time last year.”

“Yeah. That’s right.”

“…Are you insane?”

The two men’s voices gradually faded.

Listening from his seat, the coachman gave a quiet laugh and gathered up the reins he’d let slacken for a moment.

Clip-clop. Clip-clop.

Drawn by four fine horses, the carriage made its slow way down the main road, just as his employer had asked.

In the past, a single four-horse carriage would have taken up half the street. But now the road was several times wider, and the crowds packed into it simply moved aside a little and carried on talking.

Most of what they said was idle chatter, but some of it was worth the coachman’s attention.

“Have you heard? The Jin Family of Taiyuan’s blacksmith shop has been making nothing but weapons lately.”

“I thought you were about to say something important. That’s been going on for a while, hasn’t it? The Jin Family of Taiyuan is a Murim sect. It’s hardly strange.”

“True. But for the past six months, they’ve dealt exclusively in weapons. If you want farming tools, you’ll have to go at least as far as Gohyeon.”

“Well, now. Gohyeon’s a good three or four days on foot. Luckily, the tools we bought earlier are so sturdy we won’t need more.”

“That’s because the craftsmen Old Man Jang brought with him know their trade.”

“Hey, don’t call him Old Man Jang. The Jin Family of Taiyuan trusts him with important work. You ought to call him Elder Jang Taebo now.”

“Ah, it’s a habit. Anyway, the more I think about it, the more worried I get. They say things in the martial world are tense these days. Do you think something big is about to happen…?”

“Put your worries aside and finish your game of Go.[3307] Dark Heaven or whatever can make all the trouble it wants; in the end, it’s a Murim affair. We have the Great Nation farther afield and the Jin Family of Taiyuan standing firm right here. What’s there to worry about?”

“I only brought it up because the rumors coming from all over don’t sound good. And things up on the northern plateau have changed after being quiet for the past year or two. Something isn’t right in the martial world.”

[3307] Go, called baduk in Korean, is a strategy board game in which players place stones to claim territory.

"What's going on up north now? I thought the Jin Family of Taiyuan had wiped out the mounted bandits."

"Do mounted bandits disappear just because you uproot them once? They're like weeds. They keep coming back. And a few merchant caravans that headed north last month…"

Even with his employer's instructions, there was only so long the coachman could keep the horses moving slowly.

Come on, get to the point.

He was still trying to catch the rest of the story as the carriage left the main road when his employer, who had spent the ride silently watching the scenery, suddenly spoke.

"Everyone has a lot to worry about. Then again, it's happening around them. How could they not notice?"

"Y-yes?"

"I mean those people. You've had your ears pricked up this whole time. Why are you so surprised?"

"Uh, well. It's just…"

The coachman swallowed and stammered on.

"You've never spoken to me first while we were traveling, so it caught me off guard."

"Ah. Well, I suppose it would."

The coachman glanced over his shoulder. Through the pearl-bead curtain, he caught a glimpse of his employer nodding as though it were nothing.

He also glimpsed skin powdered white and lips red as cherries.

He's definitely acting differently today.

What had gotten into him?

The coachman had served him for nearly a year, but his employer remained a mystery. He was always smiling, yet somehow it never seemed genuine. And there was only one occasion when he ever spoke to the coachman first.

When they reached their destination.

A brief "Thank you for your hard work" was both the beginning and the end of their conversations.

But today he spoke first, and he hasn't even looked at his bamboo slips on the road.

His high-ranking employer was always busy. He had a mountain of work to handle and people to meet everywhere.

After nearly a year of seeing him like that, perhaps it was only natural that today's change felt so strange. Perhaps that was why the coachman let a pointless curiosity he would normally have kept to himself slip out.

"Um, has something happened?"

“Hm?”

“Ah, well…”

The coachman regretted the question the moment he asked it. Nothing good could come of upsetting his employer, especially one so high-ranking.

But his employer was more forgiving than he’d expected.

“Hm. Something happened? Yes, I suppose it did. I heard some bad news not long ago.”

“I-I’m sorry.”

“No, why apologize over that? When you bow and scrape too much, it makes me uncomfortable, too. Brings back old memories.”

“Pardon?”

“Memories I never want to go back to. For example…”

His employer trailed off and gazed out the window.

Beyond the wooden lattice, children were laughing in a clean, orderly street.

“Going three whole days without food, then standing in the street singing to please people dressed in silk. Memories like that.”

“…!”

“Oh, don’t get the wrong idea. I’m not saying it to make you feel bad. It’s just something that happened.”

The coachman’s mouth fell open at the thought that someone of such high standing had lived through that. His employer watched the people passing slowly by and smiled faintly.

“It’s nice to see everyone looking so happy.”

It had happened a very long time ago.

But in someone’s memory, it remained a brand that would never fade.

Poverty. Death. Sorrow. Anger.

The days he had spent doing everything he could to escape the shackles that had gripped his throat since birth flashed past.

“I managed it somehow back then…but can I do it this time, too?”

The quiet mutter scattered on the wind.

The coachman didn’t dare say another word. He kept guiding the horses while his employer took in everything passing slowly around him.

As they drew nearer to their destination, hoofprints in the dirt came into clearer view. At last, his employer knew the time had come.

“Could I ask you a favor?”

“A favor…sir?”

His employer nodded at the coachman’s question.

“Yes, a favor. Consider it an apology, too, for not being very warm toward you until now.”

“Th-there’s no need to say that, sir. If you need anything, please give me an order, Deputy Military Commissioner.”

His employer—or rather, Hong Jin, Deputy Military Commissioner of Shanxi Province—parted his red lips.

“I’ll get off here. Go to Honghwaru right away and tell them. Or should I say the Lower District Sect’s Shanxi branch?”

“…!”

“You thought I wouldn’t know, didn’t you? But they’ve probably figured it out to some extent already. No matter how secretly the Embroidered Uniform Guard operates, they can’t avoid that many eyes.”

The fact that Hong Jin knew his identity, and the existence of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, said to act only on the Emperor’s orders.

The coachman couldn’t decide which shocked him more. Then he realized what he needed to ask.

“What would you have me do, Deputy Military Commissioner?”

“Tell them everything that’s happening. Then have them use every bit of the Lower District Sect’s information network to find one person.”

“One person?”

“Someone who can protect us in any situation—or rather, His Highness Prince Shangshan. The most trustworthy person in all Murim.”

Hong Jin spoke slowly, emphasizing every word.

“The Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung.”

“…!”

“Go. Hurry.”

That was all.

The carriage sped away like the wind. Hong Jin watched it until it vanished, then turned.

A group of riders descended on him amid the thunder of hooves.

“By imperial decree, you must come with us, Deputy Military Commissioner.”

“And His Highness Prince Shangshan?”

“Rest assured. He is unharmed—for now.”

“For now… All right, then.”

Hong Jin smiled.

Then he walked toward his young lord.

Chapter 852

The ways a Murim martial artist could get information were extremely limited.

The easiest places to start were inns and pleasure houses.

They were full of people from every walk of life. Listen for a while and you could hear all kinds of stories.

The downside was that none of the important information was there. Most of it was unverified rumor.

So martial artists whose heads weren't just for decoration, and who'd spent some time earning their keep with a sword, went to information merchants instead.

These professionals bought and sold information in every region. Their prices were steep, but their information was reliable.

The problem was that there were clear limits to what they could gather.

They could provide high-quality information about the region where they were based, but that was as far as it went.

For people with money, a respectable sect behind them, and a few useful connections, that left two natural choices.

The Lower District Sect.

And the Beggars' Sect.

They had taken root throughout the land. The weeds of this world had gathered one by one and grown a vast forest of their own.

The Beggars' Sect was one of the Nine Sects and One Gang, so its importance went without saying. But the Lower District Sect couldn't be dismissed, either.

Waiters and courtesans, coachmen and pickpockets. Back-alley gamblers and merchants running shops of every size.

Like the beggars of the Beggars' Sect, they were everywhere.

Their vast networks let them cast a net across the land and haul in a wealth of information. Even the Sect Leaders of the most prestigious Murim sects couldn't treat them carelessly.

Of course, there were exceptions to every rule.

"Gather everyone."

"Pardon?"

"Gather everyone. You have half a day. At the Sichuan Tang Clan."

At least for today, Jeok Cheongang was a Grand Mage.

In precisely half a day, he'd summoned the Lower District Sect and the Beggars' Sect, along with the Qingcheng and Emei Sects, and seated them all in one place.

"Um, may I ask why you've called us here so suddenly…?"

"Plant yourself quietly in a corner. You need to hear this, too."

Of course, Tang Sadok, the Family Head of the Sichuan Tang Clan, was there as well.

But what surprised everyone except Jeok Cheongang was that the Sect Leaders of Qingcheng and Emei had come in person.

“I, Bicheonja of the Qingcheng Sect, a junior of the Murim, pay my respects to you, Senior.”

Sect Leader of the Qingcheng Sect or not, in front of Jeok Cheongang, he was a junior of the Murim.

Bicheonja looked as though he’d run hard enough to sweat through his soles. Jeok Cheongang nodded at his cupped-fist greeting. Bicheonja—or Cheongpung the Ancient Sword, as he was better known in Murim.

“So, is your master still doing well these days?”

“…He passed away twenty years ago.”

After a brief silence, Jeok Cheongang spoke without batting an eye.

“I was asking whether you’ve been tending his grave. No matter how busy you are, visit often and pull the weeds.”

“…Yes. I’ll remember that.”

Anyone could see Jeok Cheongang had forgotten, but Cheongpung the Ancient Sword showed the patience of a Daoist and took his seat.

No, it was probably more accurate to say he let it slide because this was the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

No one in Murim could match Jeok Cheongang’s seniority, and his age and martial arts were overwhelming.

But Extinction Divine Nun, who’d taken the vacant post of Emei Sect Leader after the Sichuan Blood Tragedy, was someone even Jeok Cheongang couldn’t treat carelessly, given her age.

“You’re here, old hag.”

“…”

“…”

I take it back. I must’ve been mistaken.

He’s treating her however the fuck he wants. Seriously.

I pressed a hand to my forehead. Everyone else’s mouths fell open.

At least there was one saving grace: Extinction Divine Nun, famous for rampaging like a madwoman on the battlefield, was usually an exceptionally gentle person.

“Benefactor Jeok, you’re the same whenever I see you. In more ways than one.”

“Old hag, you’ve gotten older since I last saw you. It feels like forty years, not four months. I mean that literally.”

[3308] Amitabha is a Buddha whose name is invoked in East Asian Buddhist practice.

"Amitabha[3308]. At your age, you should've grown up long ago. When are you going to start acting your age?"

"I've grown about a hundred years younger, so I plan to live like this for another hundred. Though by then, Venerable Nun, you'll no longer be of this world."

"…Amitabha[3309]. That was too harsh."

"If you're that offended, you should Return to Youth yourself."

"Amitabhaaaaa[3310]!"

I sensed we were in deep shit and hurriedly stepped between them. It was the best move I could've made.

If they'd traded one more line, Extinction Divine Nun's wooden prayer block would've come down on Jeok Cheongang's skull.

Of course, Jeok Cheongang wouldn't have just let her hit him. The important thing was that Extinction Divine Nun's anger quickly subsided when I appeared.

"Oh, Benefactor Jin."

"Have you been well, Venerable Nun? No—I mean, Sect Leader."

"You needn't be so formal. Call me whatever feels comfortable. In any case, you've become even more striking since I last saw you. And such a full head of hair."

Extinction Divine Nun added that last part while looking at Jeok Cheongang, then patted my shoulder with her deeply wrinkled hand.

Perhaps because she thought so highly of the way I'd rushed around trying to minimize the damage during the Sichuan Blood Tragedy, both she and Cheongpung the Ancient Sword looked at me so fondly their eyes might as well have been dripping honey.

"Before we begin, I must say you've been through a great deal. I hear you distinguished yourself against Dark Heaven's fiends in Nanman and even brought the Nanman Beast Palace into the alliance?"

"Fellow Daoist Jin's chivalrous spirit is truly remarkable. I, too, can't help but admire you."

Words could travel a thousand li[3311] without legs.

The story had already begun making the rounds among people with decent information networks. And that certainly included everyone gathered here.

Two Sect Leaders from the Nine Sects and One Gang, not to mention leaders of the land's foremost information organizations.

"Congratulations, though belated, Great Hero Jin Taekyung. Our Shaanxi Branch Leader was delighted when she heard the news."

"I only wish that brat Gung Gibang—or rather, the Successor Beggar—could measure up to you even halfway. Anyway, what you did was incredible."

[3309] Amitabha is a Buddha whose name is invoked in East Asian Buddhist practice.

[3310] Amitabha is a Buddha whose name is invoked in East Asian Buddhist practice.

[3311] In this Chinese setting, one li is 500 m (0.311 mi); a thousand li is about 500 km (311 mi).

The Lower District Sect's Sichuan Branch Leader politely offered his congratulations, mentioning Wolhwa, who was in Shaanxi. An Elder of the Beggars' Sect chuckled and jabbed me in the side, but at a single remark from Jeok Cheongang, his laughter stopped dead.

"Where's your Sect Leader? Why's some mere Elder hanging around?"

"…Sir Jeok, how could we bring the Sect Leader here from Henan in half a day?"

"Henan? That bastard's in Henan right now?"

"Yes."

Getting from Henan to Sichuan in half a day would've been impossible without a jet.

Jeok Cheongang seemed to accept that the Elder had a point and looked for another target.

"Hey. Lower District Sect."

"Yes, sir."

"Where's your Sect Leader?"

"I'd dearly love to bring him here, but even I don't know where he is. Our sect is organized into cells, so his location is a closely guarded secret…"

"So a nobody who doesn't even know where his own Sect Leader is showed up?"

For a Lower District Sect with countless members, a Branch Leader was on the same level as a Beggars' Sect Elder. The Sichuan Branch Leader swallowed hard under Jeok Cheongang's pressure.

"Of course not. Whatever information you want, we'll find it by any means necessary and bring it to you as quickly as we can!"

"Whatever you want. By any means necessary. As quickly as you can?"

"Yes, sir."

"That sounds good. I'll remember it clearly, so you remember this one thing, too. Understand?"

"I'm not sure what you mean…"

The Lower District Sect Branch Leader's eyes wavered. Then Jeok Cheongang's voice sounded, low and heavy.

"If even a single word of what's said here today gets out…"

Whoooosh.

He didn't finish the sentence, but he didn't need to.

The terrifying wave of qi that rolled out from Jeok Cheongang was a wordless warning against the slightest chance of a leak.

And there wasn't a single person here too slow to understand what he meant.

They understood, too, that something important was about to be discussed.

"Around noon today, the City Lord of Sichuan Province died."

With Jeok Cheongang's first words, the curtain rose. Every eye turned toward the Divine Physician and Namho as they stepped forward.

"The late City Lord died of illness. His physical and mental strength had declined sharply over the past few months, and that led to his death."

"The renowned physicians in the area have already examined the body at the City Lord's Residence and reached the same conclusion. The Divine Physician here has as well."

I added quietly, "A death by illness, beyond all suspicion. That's how it will be reported. Officially, at least."

I could feel the air around us shift.

Officially.

Anyone could hear the implication. That one word told them there was a secret the outside world didn't know.

At my quiet glance, the Divine Physician nodded, took a small wooden case from his robe, and carefully opened it.

"This is known as Blood Soul Gu."

The people who saw it stared wide-eyed. It was smaller than any insect I'd ever seen, and red as blood.

By the time everyone had left, evening had fallen.

Jeok Cheongang and I were the only ones left. We talked as we looked out at the pitch-black darkness that had settled all around us.

"How long do you think it'll take?"

"Who can say? All we can do now is trust them and wait."

"If we wait, we'll be too late. We need to move."

"One wrong turn, and it'll take even longer to find our way back. Besides, haven't we already learned something from their information?"

I nodded without a word.

Just as Jeok Cheongang said, we'd already received information from the Lower District Sect and the Beggars' Sect.

The Embroidered Uniform Guard.

No one living in this land could fail to know that name.

One of the Great Nation's most powerful and secretive forces, acting only on the orders of a single person.

They'd shown themselves—and well before we arrived in Sichuan.

In Anhui Province, not Zhejiang Province, where the Great Nation's capital and the Emperor's residence were located.

And they'd been disguised, unlike usual.

Why had the Embroidered Uniform Guard—an agency directly under the Emperor—appeared in Anhui Province in disguise, unlike usual?

We had no way to learn more. The informants who'd caught their scent and followed them had been found dead. But I couldn't help imagining the worst.

If they hadn't stopped in Anhui and had kept heading northwest…

That would take them to Shanxi Province. And he was in Shanxi Province.

Prince Shangshan, Zhu Bao.

The only direct member of the imperial family the current Son of Heaven had spared after winning the horrific power struggle over the throne.

The only vassal king in the land and, with the Son of Heaven having no heir, the current successor to the Great Nation's throne.

But the Emperor, who'd been quiet until now, has set the Embroidered Uniform Guard in motion. And so secretly, too.

If their destination was Shanxi Province… I could only foresee the worst.

The shadow of Dark Heaven had reached the Great Nation's imperial family.

The Captain of the Guards said the City Lord of Sichuan Province had started showing signs of madness right after the Son of Heaven took his favorite concubine. And the Blood Soul Gu found in his body was so rare that I'd never even seen one in the Poisonblood Grounds in Nanman.

There was enough evidence. I silently stared up at the night sky, lit only by hazy moonlight.

A question that would reach no one.

What the hell are you after?

And then—

A faint sound came from somewhere in the sky and reached my ears.

No. It reached both our ears.

Flutter.

"Old Master."

"This is…"

It wasn't the wind. It was the beating of wings as something flew through it toward us.

A messenger pigeon!

The moment I realized it, Jeok Cheongang and I looked toward the distant sky. Our eyes widened.

Whooosh!

The shadows of more than ten birds raced toward us, cutting through the wind.

Chapter 853

Information is a puzzle. One piece alone can never give you the whole picture.

Unless you gather the pieces and fit them together, they're not information at all—just questions with no value.

The Embroidered Uniform Guard appearing in Anhui about fifteen days ago had been just such a piece.

At least, until the City Lord of Sichuan Province died suddenly and the Blood Soul Gu was discovered.

Things are different now.

Emei and Qingcheng belonged to the Nine Sects and One Gang. Then there were the Sichuan Tang Clan and the Beggars' Sect. Even the Lower District Sect, whose members were largely commoners, was a Murim organization.

With a full-scale war against Dark Heaven underway, information about the government had naturally fallen down their list of priorities.

If your own neighborhood was on fire, you'd have to be crazy to go looking around the one next door.

But if the fire spread there, that changed everything.

We needed to dig up every piece that, for one reason or another, had never been reported—or had been set aside as mere suspicion.

And the dozen or so messenger pigeons that had just arrived at the Sichuan Tang Clan were carrying those very pieces.

"Old Master. You're here. And you too."

Important matters went to the Family Head first, of course.

Tang Sadok greeted Jeok Cheongang and me briefly. In front of him lay a scattering of tightly sealed missives.

"Are those all… about this?"

"Probably."

At Tang Sadok's brief reply and glance, the old man beside him—who had been carefully inspecting the messenger pigeons and their missives—spoke up.

"From what I've seen, there's no sign the messenger pigeons were attacked, and none of the missives have been damaged."

"Are you certain? This is important."

"I stake my life on it."

"That's enough for me. I'll send for you when the time comes. Until then, don't let anyone in."

"Yes, Family Head. I won't let so much as a rat near."

The old man bowed politely and left the room. His presence quickly faded into the distance.

Tang Sadok caught the meaning in Jeok Cheongang's eyes and spoke first.

"He's a household retainer absolutely loyal to me. He's handled messenger pigeons here for more than half his life, so I had him check them as a precaution."

The place Tang Sadok called "here" looked less like a pavilion than a huge aviary.

Even standing still, the sharp, musty smell of birds stung my nose. Iron cages of all sizes filled the space, and feathers of every color fluttered through the air.

It was clear that this place had been used for years solely to train messenger pigeons and send and receive their messages. Dozens of unopened missives were piled up inside.

"There are more than I expected. A lot more missives than pigeons we saw on the way here."

Tang Sadok gave a small nod.

"I'm surprised, too. Usually, they send only the bare minimum of information to keep the messenger pigeons from attracting attention. But sending several pages on each one means…"

"They had that much information to send, even if this was the only way to do it."

Jeok Cheongang spoke up, then added quietly,

"And it was that urgent."

I opened the first missive and read it. What they'd said was no exaggeration.

"What does it say?"

I was silent for a moment before answering Jeok Cheongang.

"After Anhui, people suspected of being members of the Embroidered Uniform Guard appeared in Hubei."

"Hubei? When did the information come in?"

"About twenty days ago."

"Twenty days. Damn, that's late."

"By then, their trail in Anhui had already gone cold, and it seems neither the Beggars' Sect nor the Lower District Sect in Hubei guessed they were the Embroidered Uniform Guard."

Tang Sadok frowned.

"Isn't it possible they weren't the Embroidered Uniform Guard at all? If your guess is right and their target is Prince Shangshan, they'd have no reason to detour through Hubei to reach Shanxi. They could go straight from Anhui to Henan."

He was right. Anhui was closest to Henan, and they could enter Shanxi by heading just a little farther north.

But Tang Sadok had forgotten one important thing.

"If they are the Embroidered Uniform Guard, and they disguised themselves to hide their identities from the start, of course they'd avoid Henan."

"What does that mean…? Ah."

Tang Sadok let out a small exclamation.

"The Murim Alliance."

"Exactly. Their trail was nearly picked up even in Anhui. Henan is practically an impregnable fortress right now."

The vast storm of war was reaching its peak, and the full-scale war with Dark Heaven had begun.

With everyone in the Central Plains Murim on high alert, crossing Henan—the home of the Murim Alliance's headquarters—to reach Shanxi would be no different from giving away their identities.

The Murim Alliance wasn't made up of fools.

Dark Heaven's agents or the Embroidered Uniform Guard—it didn't matter. Anyone suspicious would be identified in no time.

Even if the Sword Saint, Mae Jonghak, leader of the Murim Alliance, merely stood by with a gentle smile and watched, one old fox beside him would be different.

Song Ho, the Thousand-Faced Fox.

He had another title: Chief of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion.

At that very moment, as I pictured the Thousand-Faced Fox's face, always marked by a faint smile—

Rustle.

A faint sound came from the crack beneath the firmly shut door. But no one in the room, myself included, was surprised or flustered.

We'd already sensed someone approaching and had a fair idea who it was.

Creeeak.

At Jeok Cheongang's glance, I reached out. A gentle current of qi pushed the door open, revealing a person.

No—more accurately, two people who looked like one.

The Tang Family retainer who had left earlier had Namho pinned in an embrace from behind, a blade pressed to his Adam's apple.

"…?"

"…?"

"…?"

What the hell was going on?

My brain stalled for a moment, but the answer came quickly.

The Tang Family retainer who would do anything Tang Sadok said had been guarding the place so faithfully that not even a rat could get near. Then he'd found Namho.

The minor problem was that Namho had nearly died for it.

"You're still young at heart. It's not easy to get fired up at your age."

Namho, restrained with the retainer pressed up against his back, replied with a face like he'd bitten into a turd.

"What's that supposed to mean?"

"Nothing. Anyway, stay still. Your Adam's apple moves when you talk, and the blade will cut you."

"There's a limit to how far you can take a threat—"

Slice.

"Fuck, it really does."

"I told you not to talk."

"That's why I'm using ventriloquism now."

"Oh, ventriloquism. Teach me sometime."

"Maybe, if I get the chance… Damn it. Cut the crap and get this man to stand down. I've explained, but he won't listen to a word."

Jeok Cheongang stroked his chin, looking amused by Namho's predicament.

"You were right about him being loyal. If he were just a little more reliable, he'd have killed an innocent man."

"…Sometimes his loyalty goes too far. Let him go. He's one of ours."

At Tang Sadok's sighing words, the retainer blinked, finally withdrew his dagger, and stepped back.

Namho watched him leave without so much as an apology and muttered,

"I've seen all kinds of lunatics, but this is something else. No wonder the Sichuan Tang Clan is—"

"Is what?"

Namho met Tang Sadok's pointed gaze and changed course at the speed of light.

"That of one of the Five Great Families under Heaven."

An impressive drift. Then again, however long you'd already lived, you wouldn't want to spend the rest of your life worrying about being poisoned.

"Anyway, why did you take so long? It's been ages since I sent for you."

"I was trying to remember something. Maybe I'm getting old, but my memory isn't what it used to be."

"Your memory?"

"Yes. My memory."

Before I could ask what he meant, Namho nodded toward the missive in my hand.

"That information you're reading—where did it come from?"

"The Hubei branches of the Beggars' Sect and the Lower District Sect."

"No, the one beside it."

I opened another of the dozens of missives scattered across the table and checked it.

"It says Hoyeon Trading Company. I've never heard of it. The contents say…"

"It's a trading company under the Qingcheng Sect. More precisely, Hoyeon Sword, a lay disciple of the Qingcheng Sect, has been running it for twenty years. He's a Peak master, but he's much better at running a trading company than at martial arts. Hoyeon Trading Company is one of the five largest in Shandong."

"What?"

"Oh, and you don't need to tell me what it says. I'm looking for a different name. Just check the source of each message and tell me."

"…"

I didn't know what to ask first.

As far as I knew, he hadn't set foot in the Central Plains since the Great Faction War. How did he know so much about something from twenty years ago?

And if he didn't care what the missives said, what source was he looking for?

Jeok Cheongang and Tang Sadok stared at him with wide eyes. I could only look at him, dumbfounded and silent. Namho clicked his tongue, displeased.

"I'm no Jiang Taigong. Did you think I spent all those years in Nanman just sitting around fishing? I kept up with news from the Central Plains through the Hidden Shadow Pavilion's Hidden Thread while I was there. There's nothing to be so surprised about."

"This seems like more than just keeping up with the news. Even if I heard some of that, I wouldn't remember it."

"Call it an old man's pastime. Anything else?"

It was probably closer to an occupational habit, but my curiosity about that didn't matter right now.

I kept quiet and hurriedly began opening and reading the remaining missives.

They'd all come through the Sichuan Branch, but each had a different source. And since I had to read them to find what Namho wanted, I began piecing together their contents as I went.

What emerged was shocking.

It wasn't just Anhui and Hubei.

Anhui, Hubei, Hunan, Jiangsu, Shandong.

If the missives were accurate, people suspected of being members of the Embroidered Uniform Guard had appeared in all five provinces, then vanished.

This is…

They were traveling in separate groups.

It looked less like an attempt to cause confusion than a way to move without attracting attention.

They had split into groups of between ten and thirty, scattered across the provinces, then disappeared upon reaching Shaanxi or Shandong.

Shanxi. They gathered in Shanxi.

There was no doubt. Avoiding Henan and drawing as little attention as possible, they'd gone around it, slipping into Shanxi through Shaanxi and Shandong—the provinces that lay along the continent's flank.

And in Shanxi…

Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao.

My heart sank. I picked up another missive almost mechanically, and my teeth clenched as I read it.

Grind.

"What is it?"

"What does it say?"

Instead of answering, I unfolded the missive and held it out. Tiny characters covered the yellowed animal hide.

> 1. Sender: Shanxi Branch of the Lower District Sect.
> 2. Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao. Accompanied by the Embroidered Uniform Guard.
> 3. Hong Jin, Deputy Military Commissioner of Shanxi Province, second rank. Requested assistance from the Lower District Sect and joined Prince Shangshan.
> 4. Tracking commenced. Intervention by the authorities is a concern.
> 5. Operation suspended after the tracking team was wiped out.
> 6. This document is Heaven-grade. Deliver this information to the person designated by the client as quickly as possible.
> 7. Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung. Urgent search requested.

One missive had turned suspicion into certainty.

Tang Sadok and Jeok Cheongang read it and let out quiet exclamations.

"…This is…"

"It was already five days ago. Given the distance, the Sichuan Branch must have received the information and forwarded it only today."

That was probably right. If I'd obtained this missive before we gathered at the Sichuan Tang Clan, I would've known about it already.

But we were a step too late. Prince Shangshan was already in the Embroidered Uniform Guard's hands. Behind the Guard stood the Son of Heaven. Or Dark Heaven.

No—maybe Dark Heaven is controlling the Son of Heaven.

It might have been a leap, but the Blood Soul Gu was reason enough to suspect it.

Baeksang, Great Chieftain of the Bai people and second-in-command of the Nanman Beast Palace, had been the same.

And if my suspicion was right…

We're finished. What happened in Nanman won't even compare.

The Nanman Beast Palace was a sect and a small kingdom.

But the Great Nation was exactly that: a great nation.

The size of the bomb, and how far the blast would reach when it went off, were on another scale entirely.

Just imagining it sent chills down my spine.

Before I knew it, I was walking toward Prince Shangshan, though I had no idea where he was.

Step.

"Where are you going in such a hurry?"

The voice belonged to neither Jeok Cheongang nor Tang Sadok.

I slowly turned. Namho was calmly reading a missive without so much as looking at me.

"We have to go. We need to protect Prince Shangshan."

"Fine. But where? East, toward the Imperial Capital? North, toward Shanxi? Surely you don't mean south or west."

Even through my confusion, I did my best to answer calmly.

"We'll head northeast for now. We can use the Beggars' Sect and the Lower District Sect to track them."

"Wrong."

"What? What do you mean…?"

I was baffled by his utterly firm tone. Namho said nothing, only holding out the missive in his hand.

> 1. Sender: Nakjo Escort Bureau.
> 2. Prince Shangshan and fifty members of the Embroidered Uniform Guard departed Shanxi Province.
> 3. Expected to travel through Shandong and Jiangsu toward Zhejiang.
> 4. At their current speed, they are expected to enter Jiangsu Province on the first day of next month.
> 5. Escort order issued. Person to be escorted: Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao. Assigned: Fire King Jeok Cheongang, Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung, and all members of the Fire Dragon Pavilion.

The moment I saw the words escort order issued on the last line, I knew where the missive had really come from.

Only one place in the world could give an order to me—or rather, to Jeok Cheongang.

“The Murim Alliance…!”

“The Hidden Shadow Pavilion, to be precise. Though it would have had the Alliance Leader’s approval.”

“The Nakjo Escort Bureau? What is this? I already checked every missive, so where did this even—”

My voice trailed off. The smell of blood reached me, and I turned toward it.

When had that happened? One of the messenger pigeons in a cage lay dead, its belly slit open.

“The Hidden Shadow Pavilion uses this method often. It’s unfair to the poor pigeon, but hiding a message in its belly is more secure for us.”

All of us stared at him, speechless. Namho smiled calmly and went on.

“Do we still have time to hesitate? There’s less than a fortnight until the first of the month. If we leave right now, we can catch up with Prince Shangshan in Jiangsu, at least.”

He was right. There was no more time to hesitate.

I shot off into the darkness.

We had a little over fifteen days left. We had to hurry, even if it was only by a single hour.

Chapter 854

Jang Il, a junior military officer in Hubei Province, knew how to be satisfied with his life.

Some people who knew him would click their tongues and say he had no ambition, despite being born a man. But Jang Il himself was proud of who he was.

I've done well enough. Damn right I have.

He'd been born into a commoner family with next to nothing, yet he'd risen to become an officer.

His low rank meant the government paid him a pittance, but what mattered was that he was one of the seven gate commanders in Yichang, a major city in western Hubei Province.

And what kind of place was Yichang?

A port city on the Yangtze, which ran across Hubei Province. Poets and scholars flocked there to admire its splendid scenery.

Countless people and goods passed through every day, and naturally, each gate collected hefty tolls.

There were also the little extras called bribes, which never found their way into reports to the higher-ups.

Wonder what big shots will come through today.

Jang Il rose early, eager to get ready for work.

He put on a silk robe with a lustrous sheen and belted on his finely decorated sword.

It stung a little that he couldn't see himself in a mirror—they were far too expensive for him to buy—but his elderly servant offered some comfort.

"You truly have the bearing of a hero, my lord."

"Ahem. You think so, too?"

"Yes, my lord. Whoever passes through the gate, none of them will dare raise their heads properly in the face of your authority."

"Now, now. What a silly thing to say."

For all his protests, the corners of Jang Il's mouth twitched upward. The elderly servant laughed and waved a hand.

"When have you ever known me to flatter you? But you're wearing your best silk robe and even carrying your sword today. Something important must be happening."

"You're always quick to catch on. Some real big shots might be coming through. A trading caravan that left for Chongqing about two months ago is due back around now."

"Goodness. But haven't things been getting strange around Chongqing lately?"

"Who told you that?"

"A traveling merchant I know. He said there's been a bloodbath among martial artists, not just around Chongqing, but in Guangxi as well…"

"It's all nonsense, so ignore it. I've heard a little about Guangxi myself, but Chongqing only has a few disorganized bandits and river pirates. This caravan is bound to bring in a fortune."

Jang Il straightened his clothes and smiled with satisfaction.

Chongqing lay between Sichuan Province and Hubei Province. It wasn't quite a province in its own right, but its abundant resources and local specialties had countless trading companies eager to do business there.

The profits were high, and so was the competition. The trading companies that won out were enormous.

Especially this caravan.

Three trading companies had joined forces. Between their guards and caravan porters, they'd brought a staggering five hundred people.

They'd loaded more than a hundred carts onto ten merchant ships and set out about two months ago. Jang Il couldn't help looking forward to the little extras coming his way.

After everything it took to get this post, I ought to get something out of it.

The old saying "you reap what you sow" meant something entirely different to Jang Il.

He'd scattered a fortune in bribes to become a gate commander in Yichang. In less than two years, he'd collected more than he'd spent, but he had no intention of stopping there.

As long as I keep collecting like this, that's plenty. No need to get greedy. Just enough to buy a respectable estate.

One greed was soon forgotten in pursuit of another.

Proud to be a conscientious official who was only moderately corrupt and moderately lazy, Jang Il left home.

The moment he arrived at his post at the West Gate, he realized something was wrong.

What is this?

The air felt taut.

The soldiers who would usually be standing around yawning with their arms folded were drenched in sweat and running in every direction. Bloodied stretchers and charred debris lay scattered about.

So did the three flags that had flown proudly when the caravan left for Chongqing two months ago.

"What on earth…"

“My lord! Officer Jang!”

The sudden call snapped Jang Il out of his daze.

A familiar subordinate stood before him, pale as a sheet.

“What—what happened here?”

“Th-that is…”

“Tell me the truth, now!”

The subordinate flinched at his superior’s sharp shout, then stammered out an answer.

As Jang Il listened to his rambling account, his mouth fell open.

“A-an attack?”

“Yes, my lord. They say the caravan was attacked by bandits on its way back.”

“That’s impossible! They had five hundred guards and caravan porters! What bandits would be mad enough to attack them?”

Just as his horrified shout rang out—

“The world’s gone mad. Why should bandits be any different?”

A weary voice cut in. Jang Il turned toward it and blinked.

“M-Master of the Trading Company?”

There was no mistaking him. Even drenched in blood, with his clothes reduced to rags, Jang Il recognized him at once.

He was one of the three trading company masters who had joined the caravan—the big shot Jang Il had been waiting for these past two months.

“Glad I survived to see you again, Officer Jang.”

“W-what on earth happened? Where are the other two?”

“They came with us. But we’ll never have the chance to speak again.”

Jang Il followed the man’s pointing finger and felt the world go dark.

Several dozen bodies lay wrapped in straw mats. Two had been set apart from the rest. It was all too clear who they were.

“…Surely not.”

“Just what you think. They fought bravely to the end, but there was nothing we could do. We were simply outnumbered.”

“Outnumbered? There were that many bandits?”

“Bandits and river pirates, to be precise. Even in the confusion of the ambush, I could tell. Men with harpoons were swarming everywhere.”

“R-river pirates? How could they…?”

“Whether they’re in the mountains or on the Yangtze, thieves make their living by thieving, don’t they?”

The trading company master muttered wearily and leaned against a shattered cart.

“Everything went smoothly when we left Yichang two months ago. But as soon as we reached Chongqing, I had a feeling something was wrong. Sure enough, we’d barely set foot on Yuhua Mountain when they appeared.”

Despite its beautiful scenery, Yuhua Mountain was known as one of Chongqing’s rugged mountains.

The trading company master remembered the moment they’d first encountered their enemies, hemmed in by narrow paths and dense brush. He shuddered before he could stop himself.

“We thought nothing could stand in our way. Each company had brought only its best men, and we’d hired dozens of renowned wandering martial artists in case of trouble. But the moment the attackers appeared, I knew none of that mattered.”

“How many were there?”

“A thousand.”

“Pardon?”

“I said a thousand. That was only what I could count at a glance. There must have been more.”

“…!”

For a moment, Jang Il thought he’d misheard.

A band of more than a thousand bandits? In the north, nomads or mounted bandits based on the grasslands sometimes joined forces and invaded with a large army. But not in Chongqing.

Something unprecedented had happened. Something that should never have happened.

“But haven’t things been getting strange around Chongqing lately?”

“Who told you that?”

“A traveling merchant I know. He said there’s been a bloodbath among martial artists, not just around Chongqing, but in Guangxi as well…”

Remembering the conversation he’d had with his elderly servant before leaving home, Jang Il felt his heart sink.

His cherished silk robe was damp with cold sweat, though he had no idea when he’d started sweating.

No way.

Chongqing was right next to Hubei. From Yichang, where he commanded a gate, it was three days by boat or five by land.

If—if all of this is true…

His hands and feet trembled. His breathing quickened.

He should’ve been on his feet, directing the soldiers and sounding the alarm, but his body wouldn’t move.

Whether he noticed Jang Il's condition or not, the trading company master continued.

"We told them we'd pay the toll. Their answer was a volley of arrows."

Someone died, and a fierce battle began.

The fighters trained by the trading companies and the hired wandering martial artists fought back. Even the caravan porters who had been hauling the carts joined in. But the river pirates and bandits, who'd spent their whole lives as raiders, cut them down without hesitation.

"It was less a battle than a slaughter. We had plenty of people, but half were caravan porters. The rest could only do so much."

"But how? Weren't most of those men slash-and-burn farmers or fishermen to begin with?"

"Probably. But there was something different about them. They kept charging at us like they were possessed."

The trading company master had been speaking as calmly as he could, but now his voice began to shake.

"Even with their legs slashed or an arm gone, they kept coming. Knock one down, and three more came. Knock three down, and five more appeared. If we swallowed our fear and brought them down too, ten more were waiting. Again and again…"

The trading company master still remembered it clearly.

No—he would remember them until his dying breath.

They had charged like fiends bursting out of a hellscape.

"The battle ended decisively in just half a shichen—roughly an hour—and our side broke. Men started running in every direction. Surrounded by screams and death, I led my subordinates away, too. The caravan had failed, but we had to get out alive somehow."

Nothing was more precious than life.

He had retreated with the other two trading company masters and the men they had left. By the time they emerged from Yuhua Mountain, their number had fallen from five hundred to half that.

"We kept running along the mountain foothills. For three whole days."

"Th-three days?"

"We wanted to go down and ask the imperial troops or another Murim sect for help, but with those men watching, it was nearly impossible. Staying on the move was our best option."

The enemy had been watching the main routes closely. The survivors, barely clinging to life, had made a break for Hubei along the shortest route and finally escaped Chongqing.

Or so they thought.

Then they came out of Yuhua Mountain and saw the ten merchant ships they'd left at the nearest dock burning.

"I was sure it was over. I couldn't even bring myself to think about running anymore."

The three-day pursuit had been brutal. From five hundred, they had fallen to half that. From that half, to fewer than a hundred. They thought of death as they watched their last hope—the merchant ships—sink amid dark red flames.

Behind them, the enemy shouted.

And just as their final battle was about to begin, people no one could have expected appeared.

"A middle-aged man. He had about ten people with him."

"A middle-aged man…?"

"Yes. He walked toward us as if out for a stroll, pointed at the burning ships, and asked us this out of the blue."

The trading company master steadied his breathing and continued.

"Which son of a bitch set those on fire?"

Chapter 855

“Which son of a bitch set the fire?”

A low, weighty voice.

Hyuk Mujin swept the area with a gaze sharp as a blade, then shuddered with a gasp.

“Damn. Just thinking about that moment makes me feel like I’m going to piss myself! As expected of Great Hero Je—”

“Shut your mouth and sit down before I beat you so badly you piss and shit yourself.”

“Yes, sir.”

“That mouth of his never takes a break. Was he like this in Nanman, too?”

At Jeok Cheongang’s weary question, Ju Hwaran answered cautiously.

“Yes. Hyuk Mujin has always been like that.”

“I wish I had a muzzle for him. It’s enough to drive me mad that I can’t get one out here.”

Jeok Cheongang clicked his tongue and looked around, but no solution presented itself. They were traveling along a forest path surrounded by grass and trees.

They did encounter the occasional person, but what kind of lunatic would carry a muzzle fit for a human up a mountain?

“I have one. Would you like it?”

“…?”

There was such a lunatic.

And he was right beside him.

“Why on earth are you carrying something like that?”

At Jeok Cheongang’s bewildered question, Namho lowered his voice.

“Doesn’t everyone have at least one person they’d like to put a muzzle on?”

“…You’re quite something yourself.”

“Anyway, if you need it, just say the word. I won’t give it to you outright, of course. I’ll lend it to you for a little while. I need to use it myself as soon as I get the chance.”

Namho glanced meaningfully over his shoulder. Not far away, by a stream, Taishan was staring into the water, looking close to tears.

“Taishan can’t find it. Taishan needs old, smart Namho’s help.”

“Hm.”

No matter how much you disliked someone, you couldn’t spit in the face of a smile.

Namho had been ready to scold him the moment their eyes met, but his voice softened a little.

“I’m not sure I like that first part… Fine. What do you need help with?”

“Taishan is looking for meat, but can’t see any. Namho is smart, unlike Taishan.”

“You’ve said nothing but true things today. But what were you sitting there waiting to catch? Carp? Crucian carp?”

“Neither.”

“Then what?”

“Five-spice pork.”

“Fuck…!”

Namho snatched up a rock and charged at Taishan like a mad bison, but he didn’t get far.

At a glance from Jeok Cheongang, Sama Pyo and Song Ilseom appeared like streaks of light and seized his arms from either side.

“Let go! Let go of me! You brats are still wet behind the ears!”

“Calm down, Elder Namho.”

“We don’t want to do this either.”

“I’m going to count to three. It would be in your best interest to release this old man before something irreversible happens. Now. One, two, two and a half. Two and three-quarters…”

Namho never made it to three. As he was dragged into the undergrowth, Hyuk Mujin watched him go and murmured sadly,

“That’s a shame. I’d grown quite attached to him.”

“What are you talking about? Anyone listening would think we were actually going to kill him.”

“Wait, we aren’t? I thought Great Hero Jeok had already given the order.”

“…”

What kind of man did this idiot take him for?

Flustered by Jeok Cheongang’s blazing stare, Hyuk Mujin began to ramble.

“I mean, a few days ago, you cut down all those bandits. Every last one of them.”

“What am I, a butcher? ‘Cut them down’? And they weren’t all bandits. There were river pirates, too.”

“Isn’t that the same thing?”

“They’re entirely different. Though that doesn’t change the fact that every one of them deserved to die.”

“Because they set the fire?”

“Of course… No. Because they harmed innocent people.”

Jeok Cheongang hurriedly corrected himself, but that only confirmed Hyuk Mujin’s suspicion.

It was because they set the fire. That’s why he killed them.

Strangely, of all the sins in the world, Jeok Cheongang considered arson the worst.

Perhaps that made sense. During the Great Faction War, he'd refused even Sword Saint Mae Jonghak's request to join the orthodox faction. It was the Demonic Cult setting fires that had finally brought him out into the world.

The battle three days ago had been for exactly that reason.

Actually, it's embarrassing to even call that a battle.

Hyuk Mujin revised his thought.

It hadn't been a battle. It had been a massacre.

It was that one-sided, and that brutal.

Some three hundred bandits and river pirates had been wiped out in less than an hour.

Afterward, Hyuk Mujin and the others had left, barely listening to the trading company masters from Hubei thank them.

They'd taken the only merchant ship that had somehow survived the flames as payment for saving their lives.

Of course, they hadn't asked for the other party's consent. But anyway, that was what happened.

"Oh, come to think of it, those people must have reached Hubei by now, right?"

"Why are you suddenly changing the subject?"

"Those people. The ones we saved."

"…Is that something a man who barely swung his sword a couple of times should say?"

"But I did swing it."

The nerve of him.

Jeok Cheongang glared at Hyuk Mujin in disbelief, then shook his head.

From what he'd seen, every last member of the Fire Dragon Pavilion was out of his mind. If he thought too hard about them, the infirmities of old age he'd barely managed to cure might come back.

I suppose I should be grateful there's at least one normal person among them.

Jeok Cheongang glanced to the side. There stood Ju Hwaran, the only person he could call sane in this madhouse.

The more I see her, the more I like her.

It had been seven days and nights since they'd left the Sichuan Tang Clan as though something were chasing them.

They'd traveled day and night, sticking to remote, rugged terrain to avoid attracting attention. Yet Ju Hwaran hadn't complained once. She'd stayed cheerful throughout.

As the only woman in the group, she must have faced any number of difficulties.

She's clearly kept up with her martial arts training, and her character is upright, too. The Escort King has himself one fine granddaughter.

Plenty of young people mistook recklessness for a virtue.

And not just street thugs. Even among the disciples of great sects hailed as young prodigies, fools were everywhere.

They relied on their natural talent instead of working hard, then strutted around trading on their sects' prestige.

Jeok Cheongang had seen so many of them that he was sick of the type. It only made Ju Hwaran more admirable in his eyes.

Though he couldn't claim he was entirely without an ulterior motive.

Even the ones swaggering around as Elders and Sect Leaders of the Nine Sects and One Gang now were a whole basket of no-good brats when they were young. Compared to them, Hwaran is more than Jin Taekyung deserves… No. What's he lacking? He's handsome, well-built, and there's no need to mention his martial arts.

A fierce battle raged in his head.

He was already slurping noodle broth before anyone had even thought of offering him a rice cake[3312] when a voice startled him out of it.

"Great Hero Jeok, are you all right?"

"Hm? What?"

"You looked troubled, so I was wondering…"

"Ah. Ahem."

Jeok Cheongang had nearly answered without thinking. He hurriedly cleared his throat instead.

The girl wasn't merely young enough to be his granddaughter. She was young enough to be his great-granddaughter. He didn't want her catching him indulging an old man's foolish notions.

"It's nothing. I was just thinking about how far we have left to Jiangsu."

"Oh. At our current pace, we'll arrive within five days. Even if something delays us, I'd expect it to take about seven days."

"How can you be so sure?"

"I came through this area on an escort mission two years ago. I brought a map that's been passed down from my grandfather's time, too."

"Ho. Impressive. Very impressive."

"Thank you. But I'm not worthy of such high praise from you, Great Hero Jeok."

They said she'd led the Escort Bureau for several years in place of her father, who had been bedridden until recently. Her answer was every bit as crisp as he'd expect.

[3312] This adapts a Korean saying about drinking kimchi soup before being offered rice cakes—assuming an outcome before it is settled.

Ju Hwaran seemed unsure what to do with the sudden praise, and Jeok Cheongang smiled fondly.

"You've thought everything through. So capable, unlike that brat."

"Pardon? What do you mean…?"

"I was just talking to myself. Still, the more I hear you address me that way, the more stiff it sounds. From now on, you can just call me Grandpa—"

Jeok Cheongang glanced at Ju Hwaran and changed course.

Even he had to admit that Grandfather was too soon. Relationships had to begin slowly, one step at a time.

If he got ahead of himself and made Ju Hwaran wary, it would surely affect her relationship with his one and only Disciple, too.

"…No. Call me Old Master."

"Really?"

The only people who called Jeok Cheongang that were those who had known his predecessors, or the heads of the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families.

Ju Hwaran's eyes widened at the unexpected offer. Hyuk Mujin, who'd been listening, broke into a broad smile and chimed in.

"Thank you, Old Master. I thought the same thing—that the way I address you is too stiff…"

"Would you rather be hit by this old man's fist, which is harder than a rock, or keep your mouth shut?"

"…"

"You may not call me that. Don't even dream of it."

Jeok Cheongang fixed Hyuk Mujin with a fierce glare. He had never been more emphatic.

"Come on. Why are you picking on the poor kid?"

The voice came from far away, yet sounded as clear as if the speaker stood right before them.

But Jeok Cheongang had known who it was before he heard a word.

A faint footstep and the sound of breathing—too subtle for even a Peak master with deep internal energy to hear. That alone had told him.

It wouldn't have mattered if he weren't known as the Fire King, or if he weren't a Supreme Peak master.

A master always knew his one and only disciple.

"Hmph. Look at that slowpoke."

Jeok Cheongang frowned out of habit, hiding his delight as best he could. He made sure his voice was gruff, too—a far cry from how he'd spoken to Ju Hwaran.

“What took you so long? Why are you only crawling back now? I’ve been waiting half a day because of you.”

“Half a day?”

Hyuk Mujin rushed toward Jin Taekyung shouting, “Captain!” Taekyung kicked him hard in the shin and gave a disbelieving laugh.

“That’s a bit much. Half a day? It’s been half an hour at most. Right?”

The Divine Physician followed behind him, carrying a bundle stuffed with needles and medicinal herbs. He answered with composure.

“I’ll refrain from commenting, Young Hero Jin.”

“Why?”

“Isn’t it obvious? There’s no point answering when there’s no reasoning with him anyway…”

“Wow. So you’re not called the Divine Physician just for your medical skills. You’ve got insight, too.”

“You’re too kind. It’s simply something anyone would learn from experience.”

“…What the fuck is wrong with you two?”

Jeok Cheongang eyed them both. Instead of laying into them, he clicked his tongue.

One way or another, that rude young brat was his one and only Disciple, whom he couldn’t bring himself to hate. And the old man right beside him was a physician who’d agreed to travel a long way to treat that young brat.

What more could he say?

All he could do was pretend nothing was wrong, hide his worry, and ask this:

How are you feeling?

Jin Taekyung heard Jeok Cheongang’s Sound Transmission and gave a quiet laugh as he nodded.

Jeok Cheongang couldn’t tell whether Taekyung truly felt all right or was only pretending. But if what the Divine Physician had said earlier was true, there had to have been at least some improvement.

He’s all right for now. I don’t know when he’ll hit a wall, but… I’ll do everything I can to find a way.

Noticing Jeok Cheongang had fallen silent, Jin Taekyung gave a faint, rueful smile. He stretched his stiff body and spoke.

“How much farther? Three days? Four?”

Ju Hwaran answered as though she’d been waiting for him to ask.

“About three days.”

“Three days… There’s still time before the first of the month, but it’s going to be close.”

Jin Taekyung looked somewhere to the east.

“Let’s cut that down to two days.”

Chapter 856

Seven days and nights passed in the blink of an eye after we left the Sichuan Tang Clan.

The scenery and the people around us changed with every step.

But it was too soon to relax.

Despite my boast that we'd cut the remaining time down to two days, reality was less accommodating. The deeper we went to avoid drawing attention, the more time we lost.

"We'll have to pick up the pace."

"Even faster than this?"

"Yes. Faster than I thought we'd have to."

"If we keep up this pace, we can arrive by the first of the month. We're already pushing ourselves too hard."

"I know. But do you think the Embroidered Uniform Guard is any different from us?"

"…!"

"We're not the only ones on the move. We have to push ourselves and get in their way before they reach their destination."

Jeok Cheongang already knew I was right, so he said nothing.

Information was important. But perfect information didn't exist.

If we'd picked up some information, then so had our opponents.

That was true even in the modern world, where information could be relayed by the minute or even the second. How much more so in Murim?

Wherever we went, we were still within the Great Nation's territory. With eyes and ears everywhere, there had been countless variables from the start. There was only one way to minimize them.

Move as fast as possible. Run ourselves into the ground.

Of course, that meant enduring tremendous hardship.

We were trying to cross half the continent in a little over half a month. It was insane.

"Captain, we're actually going to die at this rate."

"Then we should rest."

"Really?"

"Sure. In Jiangsu."

"No, I'm not joking. I mean we're going to die!"

"Mujin. Hyuk Mujin."

"Yes?"

“If we don’t go, what do you think will happen?”

“…”

“If you want to rest, rest. I’m not being sarcastic or hinting at anything. If you think you can’t go on, drop out. It’ll be better for all of us.”

Hyuk Mujin said nothing after that.

No—neither did anyone else.

Instead of complaining, they held their tongues and kept moving.

We crossed rugged mountain ranges and forded winding rivers.

The vast continent’s climate and terrain varied a little from one region to the next.

The midday heat in Hubei was like a blast furnace, while the night wind in Anhui cut like a cold blade.

One day, after wind and rain had swept through, some of the party collapsed from exhaustion.

“Young Hero Jin, I understand how important this matter is, but… we can’t go on any longer.”

The Divine Physician had watched the others wear themselves down. I gave him a short answer.

“We’ll rest for fifteen minutes, then set out again.”

I carried Hyuk Mujin on my back, and Jeok Cheongang carried Ju Hwaran.

Both refused at first, but this time I wouldn’t budge. One look told me they were in no condition to say they were fine, even as a joke.

Of course they’re exhausted. We’ve been moving until their internal energy and stamina were spent.

And though his title was the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang was a man of cold disposition. For some reason, he felt sorry for Ju Hwaran, who was burning up from head to toe despite the Divine Physician’s treatment.

“Is this really necessary? We could—”

“If you’re about to suggest the two of us travel separately, I’ll refuse right now.”

“Why?”

“Because we have to make it through this together. If we can’t endure even this much, we’ll die before long anyway.”

This wasn’t for my sake. It was for all of us.

The war had already begun, and upheaval lurked on every side.

Catastrophes more terrible and vast than anything anyone had ever faced.

To survive the war against Dark Heaven, all of us had to grow stronger—not just me. A blade hammered and tempered countless times won’t break even when it strikes a rock.

Jeok Cheongang was one of the very few people who understood what I meant better than anyone.

He, too, had been remade through bone-deep effort and hardship. In the end, he'd become a peerless blade that cut through countless rocks blocking his way.

"We have to make it through this together…"

Jeok Cheongang slowly repeated my words, then gave a dry chuckle.

"You've grown up."

"I've always been taller than you, Old Master. Then and now."

Jeok Cheongang shook his head at my answer.

"You're still an arrogant brat. Then and now."

"Isn't that part of my charm?"

"But no matter how I look at it, this is too much. You heartless little bastard."

"Miss Ju wanted it. I respected her wishes. If she were in enough pain to actually die, I'd have stopped her myself."

"Cut the crap. Anyway, your idea might be right, but I can be sure of one thing."

"Yes? What?"

"This old man guarantees you'll never find a partner as long as you live."

"Where did that come from?"

"Enough. If you have the energy to flap your gums, take one more step."

Jeok Cheongang dealt that brutal blow out of nowhere and darted away like the wind. As I watched him go, I noticed the world growing brighter and raised my head.

This is…

I gathered my internal energy and pushed off the ground. Stepping onto a branch of the nearest great tree, I sprang up above it. At last, I saw the light spreading in the distance.

It was the dawn light.

The eleventh dawn I'd seen since we'd left the Sichuan Tang Clan.

But what made the light of this new morning so welcome was something coming into view beyond the grass and streams that surrounded us.

"Ah."

A faint exclamation rang in my ears.

Hyuk Mujin, still on my back, asked in a half-dead voice, "C-Captain. Where are we? What's that?"

I laughed out loud.

Then I answered loudly enough for everyone below the tree to hear.

"Jiangsu."

Empires are majestic and great.

But they can never last forever.

Not so long ago, by the continent's standards, the empire founded by the nomads of the grasslands had been no different.

Each was a fine warrior and herdsman. They worshiped heaven and earth and were close companions to hawks and horses, but they were not good rulers.

A little over a hundred years.

That was all it took for the vast empire founded by the invaders from the grasslands to fall.

There had been a great conqueror who was both hero and devil, destined to remain a legend to the very end. There had also been a wise ruler who strengthened the empire from within and cared for his subjects and people.

But at the end of that age, all that remained were terrible famine, corruption, and countless red flags fluttering in the wind.

"You who hunger, rise up!"

An age of war began. People with blood-red flags and headscarves rose like wildfire on every side and swept across the continent.

The world called them the Red Turbans—bandits. They wanted to be called the Red Turban Army, but the world's judgment was closer to the truth.

They were bandits.

Bandits who stole grain and valuables to fill their empty stomachs.

Bandits who wanted to steal this nation's mountains and rivers, too.

"How can the blood of kings, nobles, generals, and ministers be any different from anyone else's?"

They might have been shabby on the outside, but did that mean there was nothing great within them?

Steal a handful of millet and you're a bandit. Steal a continent and you become the Son of Heaven.

Just as one hero had done at the end of that long age of war, when he finally seized all under heaven.

"My king, please ascend the imperial throne!"

And so a new heaven opened.

Born the son of a poor farmer, he had wandered the land as a mendicant monk. Now he held all under heaven in his hands and stood above everyone, with countless officials and commoners beneath him.

But even after many years had passed and one of his children inherited the throne, nothing changed.

At least, not for one boy living in Jiangsu.

"Hey, you beggar brat!"

Beggar brat.

It was one of the things he'd heard most often in his life. Even now, decades later, that moment was etched clearly into his mind.

It appeared without fail whenever he had a nightmare like this one.

"…Ah."

Hong Jin woke with a start and blinked. Then he respectfully bowed his head to the boy who had been watching him in silence.

"I dared to dream in Your Highness's presence. Please forgive your unfaithful servant."

The boy, Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao, replied.

"Forgive you? Don't be absurd."

His composure and dignified voice were hard to believe in someone not yet in his midteens.

The young prince, much taller and more solidly built than most boys his age, continued speaking to his servant.

"If anyone should apologize, it's me, not you. I've put a loyal subject through so much hardship."

"Hardship? I beg Your Highness to take back those words."

"No. This is all because of my own shortcomings."

"Your Highness…"

"But set aside your worries. What you fear will never happen."

Hong Jin answered by bringing his hands together and bowing deeply.

But as he stared at the floor of the slowly moving carriage, his gaze held both pride in the young prince and a hint of bitterness.

I earnestly pray it will be so as well, Your Highness… But your elder brother will not see it that way.

Hong Jin forced down the voice rising deep in his heart.

His master, Prince Shangshan, had been an intelligent, mature boy from a young age. But he was far too young to understand the cruelty of the world.

Even now, surrounded by the Embroidered Uniform Guard and bound for the Imperial Capital as though he were a prisoner under escort, he still had unwavering faith in his only blood relative.

Hong Jin did not.

You already have all under heaven. What more could you possibly want, Emperor?

With that question, which would reach no one, Hong Jin closed his eyes.

In the pitch-darkness, memories surfaced. Sounds returned.

The days when the blood never dried. The days of purges, when hundreds died with their limbs torn from their bodies and thousands were beheaded, their heads put on display.

And the late Emperor's final words.

"Bao. I entrust that child to you."

Thump.

A small jolt ran through the carriage. Hong Jin opened his eyes, turned, and saw someone's profile through a gap in the window.

"What's going on?"

At Hong Jin's low question, the man beside the carriage replied. He wore shabby martial robes that hardly suited the name Embroidered Uniform Guard.

"None of your business."

His voice was blunt, devoid of emotion. But Hong Jin sensed a cold blade beneath it.

A feeling both strange and familiar.

Hong Jin had once served as the late Emperor's hands and feet, just as the Embroidered Uniform Guard did now. The man's voice brought back a sensation he hadn't felt in over a decade.

Along with a hint of puzzlement.

Why have we stopped?

This covert procession had already entered Jiangsu, and the Embroidered Uniform Guard had no reason to stop. They were people who would gladly give their lives to carry out the Emperor's orders.

Something's going on.

Hong Jin quietly sharpened his senses. He might not have mastered martial arts to the point of founding his own school, but he had learned them.

Fortunately, the guards seemed to decide the matter didn't warrant Sound Transmission. Their conversation drifted through the gap in the window.

"According to the scouts, there's an unidentified corpse about three hundred zhang[3313] ahead…"

"They didn't get close in case it was a trap, but they couldn't see any obvious wounds…"

"It could be an attempt to split up our forces. We'll keep moving. Stay close to the carriage."

The murmuring conversation abruptly stopped. After a brief pause, the carriage started moving again.

Clip-clop. Clip-clop.

As he listened to the quiet sound of hooves, Hong Jin thought,

An unidentified corpse.

It wasn't so strange. The continent was vast, and people wandered its roads begging for food. Even Jiangsu, so close to the Imperial Capital, was no exception.

[3313] A zhang is a traditional Chinese unit of length, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Three hundred zhang is about 909 m (0.56 mi).

Why did one man’s name suddenly come to mind at this very moment?

And why did an inexplicable hope well up in one corner of his heart?

Could it be…

Hong Jin had just lifted his head when—

“Didn’t you say it was a corpse…?”

One of the Embroidered Uniform Guard had muttered the words. Then a voice Hong Jin recognized reached his ears.

“Captain. I swear I wasn’t dozing off. I was just lying down for a second… Huh? Who are you?”

At that moment, Hong Jin burst out laughing, briefly forgetting that the young prince was right in front of him.

Chapter 857

"What? Where'd everyone go? Hey, mister. Have you seen anyone around here?"

His hair was matted with grease, and his face was streaked with grime.

As the young man got to his feet and babbled, the man he'd called "mister" spoke.

"What happened? He doesn't look dead to me."

"I-I'm sorry. He was sleeping so soundly he looked dead, and I mistook him for—"

"That's enough. We'll discuss it when we return to the palace."

The Embroidered Uniform Guard martial artist who had reported the scouts' findings went rigid.

He knew what kind of man his superior was. He'd served under him for nearly three years. He also knew how seriously the man took this mission.

If he was lucky, he'd be demoted. If things went badly, he could be stripped of his position altogether.

Damn it.

He bit down on his lip and struggled to suppress his anger. He couldn't deny that he felt wronged, but a mistake was still a mistake.

He couldn't put spilled water back where it came from, but he could at least wipe it up.

No—he had to. If only to lessen the punishment coming his way.

"…I'll take care of it."

He spoke in a subdued voice and stepped toward the young man, who still looked half asleep.

The fellow was some beggar who could've wandered in from anywhere. If he resisted, one stroke of the sword would be enough.

At least, that was what the martial artist thought.

"What are you doing?"

Thud.

At his superior's sudden call, he stopped dead. The man looked down at him with calm, cold eyes, and he stammered out a reply.

"I—it can't be left like this, so I thought I'd handle it myself…"

"Handle it?"

"Y-Yes."

"How?"

Pardon?

"I asked how you intend to handle it."

"Well… given the situation, shouldn't we use force if necessary to eliminate the threat?"

The man was silent for a moment.

“How many years have you served?”

“I’ve served you for almost three years, Commander Jeong. And…”

The martial artist hesitated, watching his superior’s expression, then added, “As my father advised me, I believe I’ve always done my best to follow your orders.”

There was a little unease in his voice, and far more resentment.

His superior had barely given him a second look in nearly three years. Worse, he treated him as though being the son of a prestigious family meant nothing.

How much did my family spend to get me into the Embroidered Uniform Guard?

Gold, silver, and influence could reach anywhere—even the Embroidered Uniform Guard, which answered directly to the Emperor.

A rigorous screening meant that even a fortune could buy him no more than a low-ranking position. Still, plenty of people would have given anything to get that far.

He had no intention of backing down. Mentioning his father had been a warning: a reminder to his difficult, strict superior of the family standing behind him.

Which made the man’s next words all the harder to believe.

“Three years. That’s long enough.”

Pardon?

“Hand over your badge right now and go where you belong. This will conclude your punishment for the mistake you made earlier.”

“…!”

“What? Do you still have something to say?”

The martial artist stared at him, eyes wide, then burst out, “What? How can you do something so outrageous? Have you forgotten who I am—”

“I remember perfectly. Otherwise, I wouldn’t have kept you under me for three years.”

The man cut him off and continued in the same calm voice.

“But what people remember isn’t you. It’s the prestige of the family behind you. If you don’t want to make the same mistake again, take that to heart.”

“Are you done?”

“No, but there’s no point saying the rest. Especially to someone who can’t even tell whom he’s dealing with.”

“What the hell are you—”

He was about to shout when a voice reached his ear.

“Excuse me. Sorry to interrupt, but could I have some water first? I’ve been thirsty for a while.”

“…!”

The voice hadn’t come from a distance.

It was right behind him—close enough for him to catch the sweetish scent on the speaker's breath.

How did he—?!

Every hair on his body stood on end. He spun around like lightning and drew the sword at his waist.

Shing—whoosh!

The treasured sword passed down through his family for generations flashed with five-colored light as it split the figure behind him clean in half.

Or so he thought.

Just as the blade was about to bite into the top of the young man's head, two hands filthy with streaming grime moved in a flash.

Clang!

The young man brought his palms together with a deafening crash. A gasp escaped the martial artist.

"Empty-Hand Seizes the Blade…?"

It was a technique a master might show someone a level or two beneath him.

The martial artist had reached the Supreme First Rate realm thanks to his family's unstinting support. He understood at once what it meant and stared in shock at the man he'd taken for a mere beggar.

"A Peak master!"

At that horrified cry, the mysterious Peak master answered, "What the fuck are you talking about? I get shit all the time for being the guy who can't even use Sword Energy."

"Y-You! Who are you? State your identity!"

"Fuck off. Give me water, not a sword."

Whoosh—thud!

It happened in an instant.

The young man swept aside the sword caught between his palms and drove his hard knee into the martial artist's face. As the man crumpled like a rotten log, the young man found a small flask in his robes and drank it down in one go.

Gulp, gulp.

"Ahhh. Now I feel alive."

He looked as though he hadn't had a drop of water in days.

Commander Jeong watched him empty the flask and shake it for the last drops before speaking.

"I suspected as much when I first saw you. You're quite skilled."

The young man stared into the empty flask as though liquor might appear if he waited long enough. Then he asked, "Do you mean that?"

“Of course. You don’t seem to have reached the level of injuring others with Sword Energy, but the movement you just showed was extremely efficient and impressive.”

“Thanks. Hearing that from someone way more skilled than me almost brings a tear to my eye. Though I could do without you talking down to me.”

“You misunderstand. I wasn’t mocking you.”

“I know. I didn’t misunderstand. I really do feel like I’m about to cry.”

“…?”

“I’ve been through so much fucking shit, taken every insult anyone could throw at me. I train my ass off, and all I ever hear is, ‘Why can’t you use Sword Energy?‘ and ‘How can you call yourself a proper person if you can’t even do that?‘ And now they’ve gone and left me on the side of the road, too… Ahem. Hic!”

Commander Jeong fell silent.

The young man’s complaints had poured out as though he’d been waiting for the chance, and now tears were streaming down his face. Everyone there had the same question.

What the hell is that guy?

He looked exactly like a beggar. Apparently, he was a lunatic.

The problem was that the lunatic was skilled. He was only Supreme First Rate, yet he moved like a Peak master.

And they were in the middle of an operation.

The Embroidered Uniform Guard martial artists lined up behind Commander Jeong exchanged bewildered looks.

What are we supposed to do in a situation like this?

I don’t know. Captain Hong might know.

I don’t know, either.

How can you not know, Captain Hong? You’re our Captain.

Does a Captain have to be some kind of god? Still, Senior Officer Gal should know. He’s been around much longer than I have.

No. I don’t know, either…

Pardon?

Their gazes wandered, and their mouths went dry.

When had the famed Embroidered Uniform Guard ever dealt with anything like this? The lunatic had sat down in the road and was sobbing at the top of his lungs. None of them knew what to do with him.

None of them except one.

Clip-clop. Clip-clop.

Commander Jeong slowly rode forward and looked down at the young man with his usual calm gaze.

“Are you done crying?”

The young man answered in a tear-choked voice.

“I’ve still got a little left.”

“That doesn’t matter. You’re delaying us. Move aside.”

“Mm.”

The young man sniffled.

“That might be difficult.”

“Why?”

“Moving aside would be easy enough, but the person I serve would be furious.”

“I thought you said you’d been abandoned.”

“Sometimes I get left behind when I’m with that person. Anyway, I don’t know why I ended up here, but they’ll be back soon.”

Brush, brush.

The young man stood and dusted off his backside.

“Believe it or not, I’m his right-hand man. Though I might just be his little toe.”

“I see.”

Commander Jeong gave a slight nod.

“Do you have an identity tag?”

“An identity tag? Is that something you boil in soup?”

“So you’re a rogue of the martial world. You treat the strict laws established by the Son of Heaven as nonsense.”

“Something like that. Why ask all of a sudden?”

“It’s merely a check. I can’t harm a citizen of the Great Nation who carries an identity tag because I judged him wrongly.”

“Hm. You talk like you belong to the authorities.”

“Something like that, but not quite.”

“That’s vague. Care to give me an example?”

“You don’t need to know.”

“Oh.”

At the calm, cold answer, the young man shrugged and dropped something he’d been holding.

Tap.

A faint sound, and a copper badge flashed as it caught the light. Three characters were engraved on its dirt-streaked surface.

Embroidered Uniform Guard.

“Whoops. Dropped it by accident. I was going to keep it as a souvenir.”

His voice was exaggerated, but his gaze, fixed on Commander Jeong, had settled into a deep stillness.

“I was only looking for the flask, but this weird thing came out with it.”

“You’ve got sticky fingers for a rogue of the martial world.”

“Let’s call it self-defense. If it had been the person I serve, this wouldn’t have ended with just that.”

Commander Jeong raised a hand instead of answering.

The Embroidered Uniform Guard drew their weapons and surrounded the young man in a wave of steel.

“Before I kill you, I’ll ask one thing.”

“If you have time, ask as many as you like. I’d like to live a little longer, if possible.”

Something flickered in Commander Jeong’s eyes.

This unexpected encounter was as good as over. At his signal, the young man would die in an instant, and they would continue on their way as though nothing had happened.

And yet…

He has no intention of backing down.

The young man feared death, but he would not retreat. Commander Jeong saw the spirit of a martial artist in him.

“What is your name?”

“Hyuk Mujin.”

Commander Jeong nodded to Hyuk Mujin.

“Who’s behind this?”

None of this was a coincidence.

Someone whose identity they didn’t know had been waiting for them from the start. They had surely placed people at every chokepoint the procession had to pass through.

Commander Jeong needed to learn who it was. The answer came from somewhere he never expected.

“Being called the one behind it sounds a little grand, but now that I hear it, I kind of like it. Makes me feel like a Constellation.[3314]”

There had been no sound. No trace of a presence.

Yet the shadow of a young man had appeared among them, stretching down from a tree above.

“We finally meet. How’ve you been?”

“Do you… know me?”

At Commander Jeong’s stiff question, the young man laughed.

“How the fuck would I know you, you son of a bitch?”

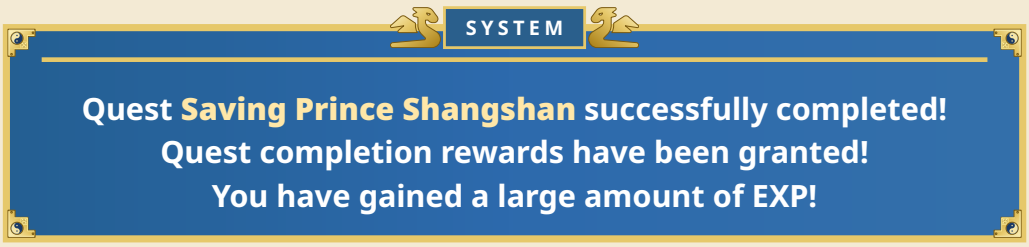
[3314] In Korean fantasy web fiction, a Constellation is often a powerful being who watches over or sponsors others.

Chapter 858

Times like this, I really missed the System.

If it weren't for that damn update, a holographic window would've appeared by now with its signature clear chime.

Ding.



Something like that.

But unlike the scene I'd just imagined, reality was quiet. The cold killing intent pouring from dozens of Embroidered Uniform Guard members pricked my entire body like needles.

"That's enough. Rein it in and put it away. Keep this up and you'll put me in a bad mood."

I tossed out a few words, then pushed off a branch and dropped toward the ground.

No—I walked down through empty air, stepping on it as if it were a staircase.

"Stepping on Empty Air…!"

Someone's gasp reached my ears. I could almost feel the Embroidered Uniform Guard's blade-sharp aura waver.

It burns through internal energy like crazy, but nothing beats it for this.

No matter how hostile someone was, after seeing something like that, they wouldn't dare bare their teeth at me.

Stepping on Empty Air was a technique exclusive to Supreme Peak masters.

Tap.

I landed lightly on the ground. Waiting for me there was a beast howling miserably.

"Waaah, Captain!"

"Stop. Don't come over here. Shut up."

"Where have you been all this time?! I was so scared!"

"…"

I'd gone to all that trouble to set the mood, and this bastard—

I let out a deep sigh and pushed Hyuk Mujin away as he kept trying to hug me.

"Ah, quit whining. I didn't leave you behind."

“What?”

“I just took a nap up there. I was tired.”

We’d been on a forced march for over ten days.

Even with three jiazi[3315] of internal energy and a body beyond human limits, I couldn’t beat the need for sleep. The fact that I’d held out this long was practically a miracle.

Scouting and standing night watch in case something happened. Checking on the others and looking after them. And on top of that, the mental strain.

If the Divine Physician hadn’t tried to stop me and Jeok Cheongang hadn’t helped, I might have collapsed before we ever reached Jiangsu.

I wasn’t exactly in good shape, either. I’d been sleeping for half a shichen[3316] every three days.

After going through all that hell, it was only natural that sleep hit me the moment we reached our destination and I was sure we’d arrived ahead of the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

“…So you slept? In a tree?”

“Yeah. If I slept on the road, my mouth would get crooked. And I might get attacked while I was out cold.”

“What about me?”

“You? What about you?”

“I’m asking why you threw me down in the middle of the road while you went somewhere safe to sleep by yourself.”

“Someone had to keep watch on the road. And I didn’t throw you.”

“Then what did you do?”

“I set you down. Carefully.”

I’d actually more or less tossed him down. I was that tired.

Hyuk Mujin’s mouth fell open at my slightly dishonest answer.

“So it doesn’t matter if my mouth goes crooked?”

“You’re the kind of man who speaks the truth even with a crooked mouth. That’s Hyuk Mujin.”

“You said we could be attacked!”

“And I’d wake up when I heard it. Like I did just now.”

“I almost died! If you’d woken up moments later, I’d have been a dead man!”

“But I woke up moments earlier. You’re alive.”

“My God. Captain, are you even human?”

I wasn’t sure what gave the bastard who’d been snoring on my back the right to say that, but I decided to show him a little mercy and let it slide.

[3315] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; three jiazi equal 180 years.

[3316] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

We'd been pushing ourselves hard, and besides…

The way he'd looked a little while ago had been pretty impressive.

"Good job."

At my sudden praise, Hyuk Mujin furrowed his brow.

"What?"

"I said you did a good job. Holding on even in a situation like that."

"…!"

"But don't do that again. If you think you can't win, take a step back and think of another way."

I patted Hyuk Mujin on the shoulder, then slowly turned around and added,

"Right, Your Excellency from the Embroidered Uniform Guard?"

Our eyes met in midair.

His eyes were impassive, showing no particular emotion. Unlike the others, the man at the head of the procession hadn't so much as blinked at my appearance. He spoke.

"You know that, and yet you blocked our way. Reckless, to say the least."

"Mister, watch your mouth. I've still got plenty of hair."

"I don't know what nonsense you're talking about, but you are standing against the Embroidered Uniform Guard, who are carrying out the Emperor's command. Do you understand that?"

"Of course I do."

"I see. So you admit to treason."

Treason?

Could it really be called that?

After a moment's thought, I decided I ought to take back what I'd said.

"Uh. Then I retract what I said earlier."

"…?"

"I was walking along, got tired, and took a nap. And then, by coincidence, you happened to pass by. How's that?"

Hyuk Mujin, who'd been looking at me as though my earlier praise had touched him a little, answered quickly.

"Sounds fine to me."

"Right?"

"Yes. It's convincing. Plenty of people sleep rough while traveling."

"You know what you're talking about. What can they do if it was a coincidence?"

"Exactly. Jiangsu isn't their land."

"Wait. Isn't it, though? Jiangsu or anywhere else, it's all part of the Great Nation."

"Huh. Does it work like that?"

“Doesn’t it? That’s what I understand.”

“Captain, since when do you know things like that?”

“You little shit.”

“Sorry. Anyway, I’ll remember that and ask Old Man Nam later… Hey, where is everybody?”

Just as I was about to answer, the man spoke first.

“What is the meaning of this?”

“Oh, sorry. We got sidetracked for a second. Anyway, now that you mention it, Jiangsu belongs to you lot too, right?”

“All the mountains and rivers under heaven are ruled by His Imperial Majesty, whose authority is—no, why am I even answering this?”

“It’s nice to help each other out.”

“Enough!”

Our frantic conversation seemed to have rattled him.

I narrowed my eyes at the man, whose aura had grown as cold as frost.

“You there, Your Excellency from the Embroidered Uniform Guard. You said you were Thousand Captain Jeong, right? Why be so stiff about this? Frankly, neither of us stands to gain anything by fighting here.”

Shing.

A cold blade appeared in place of an answer. Thousand Captain Jeong drew the enormous saber from his back and spoke in a rigid voice.

“It makes no difference who you are. The Embroidered Uniform Guard obeys His Imperial Majesty. If you oppose his command and stand in our way, you will die.”

Fwooooooosh.

An invisible force spread out from him. I licked my dry lips as I felt his aura—pure and heavy.

Well, look at that…

I’d suspected it from the moment I first saw him, but the man called Thousand Captain Jeong was a formidable master.

No—by ordinary standards, even “formidable” was an understatement. His skill was enough to shatter a prejudice I’d held deep inside.

He doesn’t seem to have crossed the Supreme Peak threshold yet, but he’s at least at the very top of Peak.

The authorities and Murim were always close and yet far apart.

Murim was one forest within the Great Nation’s borders, but that forest was full of beasts like dragons and tigers.

And yet, even among those serving the authorities, I’d rarely seen a proper master.

Common soldiers were Third Rate or Second Rate, while martial officers were First Rate at best. Peak masters were rare among those in the military.

And most of those had belonged to Murim before.

The former Captain of the Guards to the City Lord of Sichuan Province had been a famous wandering martial artist, practically a personal bodyguard. Li Feng, Assistant Military Commissioner of Shanxi Province, was a former lay disciple of Huashan who'd joined the military after passing the military examination.

But…

Where'd a master of his caliber come from?

My experience might not have been all that broad, but as a Supreme Peak master, I could get a rough measure of someone's ability at a glance.

And Thousand Captain Jeong bore not the slightest trace of a Murim martial artist. From head to toe, he looked every inch a general.

Even his internal energy is pure.

What was more surprising was that the other Embroidered Uniform Guard members were no exception.

They ranged from young men who looked to be in their twenties to middle-aged men around forty. They varied in skill, but it wasn't hard to tell that most of them were Peak masters.

Dozens of Peak masters…

A force to match a mid-sized sect—or surpass one.

Whether they lived up to their reputation as the Son of Heaven's hands and feet, or had been trained by someone other than the Son of Heaven, was a question for later.

I had no intention of letting this standoff continue when neither side stood to gain anything.

"Impressive aura, but you'd better put away those ugly weapons before someone gets hurt."

The instant I stepped forward after warning them—

Whoosh!

A shaft of light shot straight at my face with a powerful crack of air. I caught it as gently as if I were cradling it, then sent it flying back the way it had come.

Thud! Boom!

Instead of a final scream, a tremor rolled through the ground.

The archer, who'd leapt from the saddle of his fallen steed, stared at me in disbelief. An arrow was lodged in the center of the horse's forehead.

"I told you to put away what you were holding."

"…!"

"You're the reason it died, you animal-abusing bastard."

Hyuk Mujin, scratching his grime-covered body as if he'd known this was coming, said, "Why is it his fault? You're the one who killed it, Captain."

“If we’re getting technical, sure. But Mujin.”

“Yes?”

“I can kill you too.”

“I’m sorry. I spoke out of turn.”

“All right, got it.”

It was a peaceful conversation, as usual. But the tension around us had already grown so taut it felt ready to burst.

Snort. Snort.

Dozens of horses breathed heavily. The hands gripping their reins with all their strength had gone white, and the aura pouring from their riders wavered but didn’t subside.

At their head stood Thousand Captain Jeong.

“You’re crossing a river that should never be crossed.”

“I haven’t crossed it yet. But setting that aside, you all seem pretty confident. No matter how good you are, you won’t come out of a fight with me looking pretty.”

“What I and these men place our faith in is not our personal martial skill. It is our loyalty as subjects who carry out His Imperial Majesty’s command.”

“What’s your name?”

“Jeong Hogun.”

Thousand Captain Jeong—Jeong Hogun—had given me his name much more readily than I expected. Then he asked in return,

“And yours?”

“Jin Taekyung.”

I wasn’t the one who gave that answer.

Jeong Hogun and I both turned our heads. Then we both dropped to one knee and bowed.

Step.

Beneath my lowered gaze, someone’s foot came into view—much larger than it had been in the last glimpse I remembered.

With it came a voice that had grown more mature, too. No longer the voice of a little child.

“It’s been a long time, Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.”

Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao.

The bloodline of a dragon, grown so much taller, helped me to my feet.

And before I could even answer, he handed me something he’d been holding.

This is…

A secret letter.

The moment that secretive word pierced my mind, Prince Shangshan leaned close to my ear and whispered,

“Please give me your autograph.”

“…”

No, Your Highness. What the fuck.

Chapter 859

“Pardon me, but may I say something?”

Jeong Hogun answered calmly as one of his subordinates rode beside him.

“If you think what you have to say is out of line, don’t say it in the first place.”

“Thousand Captain!”

The subordinate’s gaze was deeply troubled, his expression stiff.

He’d shared hardship with Jeong Hogun for more than ten years. Jeong Hogun already knew what he was going to say without hearing it.

“I can guess well enough how you feel. You’re unhappy with this situation.”

“Unhappy doesn’t begin to cover it. Are you really going to stand by and let those rogues carry on like this?”

The subordinate glared over his shoulder at the slowly moving carriage.

Laughter and conversation streamed through a window left slightly ajar. His expression hardened, as did those of the Embroidered Uniform Guard around him.

“It’s not too late. If you’ll just give the order…”

He let his voice trail off, but Jeong Hogun understood exactly what he meant.

“You want to start a bloodbath?”

“I understand your concerns, Thousand Captain. But we can’t just let a band of traitors who defy the Emperor’s supreme command go free.”

“And if we don’t leave them alone, are you confident you can bring that man down?”

“Well…”

The subordinate was suddenly at a loss for words.

Though he served in the military, he was a martial artist who had trained in martial arts himself. The thought of the man laughing and chatting inside the carriage right now made it hard to answer.

Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

No—Jin Taekyung, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon.

I’d heard he was still young, but I never imagined he’d be that strong.

The Embroidered Uniform Guard received reports from every corner of the land. But stories about the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon were so well known that the subordinate had heard plenty even without relying on their far-flung spies.

A descendant of a fallen martial family.

The heir to the Fire Gate Clan, passed down through a single successor for more than three hundred years.

The troublemaker nobody in Shanxi had failed to hear of had become a Divine Dragon in barely two years. Now he stood at the heart of the turbulent currents shaking Murim.

But there was only one reason Jin Taekyung had become so exceptional.

His martial might.

Everything had its limits, martial arts included. But Jin Taekyung had already soared far beyond them. It was no wonder he was called one of the Two Dragons alongside Cheongpung, the Huashan Divine Dragon, and hailed as a talent unseen in a thousand years.

Nor was it surprising that, after a long silence, Jeong Hogun's subordinate answered:

"Much as I hate to admit it… as things stand, we'd have a hard time facing him."

"If you know that, that's enough."

Jeong Hogun replied evenly. For the Embroidered Uniform Guard, who served the Emperor's solemn command, it was a humiliating conclusion. But as a soldier, it was the right one.

A soldier had to be clear-eyed about victory and defeat. Let pride lead him to the wrong decision, and he would never win the battle.

Even so, there was one thing the Embroidered Uniform Guard could never do: submit or retreat before an opponent, no matter how powerful.

"I know how you feel. All of you."

Jeong Hogun continued in a low voice.

"But the Emperor's command was to escort His Highness Prince Shangshan to the Imperial Capital. As discreetly as possible, without causing the slightest disturbance."

"…"

"If His Highness Prince Shangshan hadn't ordered us to lower our swords, I would have fought them myself."

Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao's actions, however, had stunned every member of the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

This young prince of noble imperial blood had personally helped a rogue of the martial world to his feet. As if that weren't enough, he'd asked the rogue to sign the silver token he carried.

"What's done is done. This matter isn't ours to decide. Don't speak of it again."

His voice allowed no argument. The subordinate pressed his lips together.

Jeong Hogun was right. Their duty was to escort Prince Shangshan to the Imperial Capital. Loyalty to the Son of Heaven was one thing; authority was another.

Jeong Hogun spoke again to the subordinate struggling to contain his displeasure. This time, he used Sound Transmission so that only the man could hear him.

—I have something for you to do.

The subordinate stared at him with wide eyes, then moved his lips.

—Give me your orders.

—Go to the Commander-in-Chief in the Imperial Capital. You, personally.

—To the Commander-in-Chief?

The Commander-in-Chief was the head of the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

Among the high-ranking officials packed into the Imperial Capital, where all manner of powerful figures gathered, the Commander-in-Chief of the Embroidered Uniform Guard held exceptional influence and authority. And his immense power came from one person alone.

—You mean…

The subordinate didn't finish his sentence, but both men knew whose rank his words implied.

The Son of Heaven.

Ruler of this vast continent.

A giant seated on the throne, looking down upon countless officials and subjects.

The reason the Embroidered Uniform Guard existed, and the one to whom they pledged absolute loyalty.

So Jeong Hogun's order to inform the Commander-in-Chief was no different from telling him to report directly to the Son of Heaven.

—Thousand Captain… what would you have me do?

—Leave at once. Go straight to the Commander-in-Chief and tell him this.

Jeong Hogun continued his Sound Transmission slowly.

—Just as you predicted, uninvited guests have interfered.

—…!

—Go. I won't be going far.

The subordinate stared at Jeong Hogun, eyes wide with disbelief. Then a faint smile crossed his lips.

A prediction. He'd definitely called it a prediction.

Those two words were enough. His displeasure with his superior, who had seemed so unlike himself, and the Embroidered Uniform Guard's wounded pride both vanished completely.

—Loyalty!

The subordinate gave a vigorous military salute he could not accompany with a shout, then rode off like the wind, moving as one with his horse.

Jeong Hogun watched him disappear and thought to himself:

Everything was in the palm of the Embroidered Uniform Guard—or rather, of His Imperial Majesty, the Son of Heaven.

Just as it always had been.

Senses were like vision.

Just as looking at what was in front of you didn't erase the scenery around you, I took in every bit of information from all directions with my keen senses, even as I talked.

The small movements of birds bounding through the thick undergrowth.

The chill surrounding the Embroidered Uniform Guard as they encircled the carriage—as though escorting it. Or besieging it.

And…

The sound of a horse's hooves rapidly fading into the distance.

"I've continued to hear news of you. Every time I hear another of those unbelievable tales of your exploits, my heart swells."

"If you're hyperventilating, that's a little concerning. I happen to know a good physician. Why don't you get a checkup while you're at it, Your Highness?"

"I'm glad you're concerned for me. But entrusting my health to a physician I don't even know would go against imperial etiquette. Once we reach the Imperial Capital, there will be an Imperial Physician, so…"

"Then I guess there's no choice. The Divine Physician is exhausted, too, so that's probably for the best."

"Wait. Who did you say?"

"The Divine Physician."

"I'll see him! I absolutely will!"

"What about imperial etiquette?"

"Rules are there to be broken."

No matter how noble his blood, he was still a child.

I humored Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao as he chattered away, his face flushed, and sent a Sound Transmission to Hong Jin, whom I could see over the prince's shoulder.

—They've sent someone off. But I really don't think he's a scout.

Hong Jin had learned martial arts, but hadn't reached the Peak realm. Instead of answering with Sound Transmission, he nodded quietly, mindful of the Embroidered Uniform Guard surrounding the carriage.

—He must've gone to deliver a message. Any idea where?

Maybe he'd been reading fan wikis or something; while Zhu Bao rambled on about the Divine Physician, Hong Jin used a finger as a brush and wrote in the air.

The Imperial Capital.

It wasn't good news, but I'd expected as much.

The Embroidered Uniform Guard had been created by the Great Nation's Emperor to serve as his own hands and feet. Anything concerning Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao was certain to reach the Emperor's ears.

The Imperial Capital, huh…

I liked peaches.[3317]

But in Murim, the Imperial Capital was the center of the world.

Or rather, that was what the Emperor's position made it.

He ruled the people of this vast land. Wherever the Son of Heaven resided was the center of the world, the dragon's den.

Though in this case, it's a tiger's den.

I'd never been to the Imperial Capital, but I'd heard about it often enough.

Enormous buildings that seemed to pierce the sky. Beautiful historic sites that made visitors gasp in awe. Wealth pouring in along its canals.

Add fertile land and abundant supplies, and it was a paradise on earth, second to none.

Except for one thing.

The million Imperial Guards protecting the Son of Heaven and the Imperial Capital.

Not ten thousand. Not a hundred thousand.

A million.

Even if I allowed for the usual exaggeration from the people of this continent and cut that figure in half, there'd still be an army of more than five hundred thousand lurking around Zhejiang Province, where the Imperial Capital stood.

That many… Fuck, I can't even picture it.

I licked my parched lips without realizing it.

I really didn't want to be acting like this, but I couldn't shake the ominous feeling that had haunted me ever since Sichuan.

What if my suspicion is right, and the Emperor has some sort of relationship with Dark Heaven?

I didn't need to think about the answer.

We'd be fucked. Simple as that.

The moment we entered the Imperial Capital, surrounded by layers upon layers of a million Imperial Guards, it would all be over.

If the Son of Heaven, who was as good as a living god, gave the order, countless blades would come flying at us from every direction. He wouldn't even have to say much. He'd just point at us and say one thing:

"They're dangerous traitors."

"…"

[3317] In Korean, hwangdo means both "Imperial Capital" and "yellow peach."

Just imagining it made my knees go weak.

I'd fallen silent. Hyuk Mujin, huddled in a corner of the carriage, asked cautiously, "Why do you look like you've got a mouthful of shit?"

"…Mujin."

"Yes, Captain."

"You're always so careful with your tone. Why is what you actually say so damn bold?"

"Because I'm the manliest of men. Hyuk Mujin, the Tenfold Man—man enough for ten men! That's me."

"…"

Is this guy actually insane?

I was silently cursing Hyuk Mujin with my eyes when Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao, who had stopped talking to listen to us, let out a quiet gasp.

"The Tenfold Man? An extraordinary title. Just what I'd expect from your subordinate."

"…?"

"…?"

"It must be fate that we've met. You said your name was Hyuk Mujin, the Tenfold Man?"

Hyuk Mujin blinked, then hurriedly bowed his head.

"Y-Yes, Your Highness Prince Shangshan. But I'm sorry to say my title isn't the Tenfold Man…"

"Here. Sign this."

"Pardon?"

"No need to refuse, Hyuk Mujin, the Tenfold Man. This shall be an honor passed down through your family for generations."

"…"

"…"

Hyuk Mujin took the bronze token Zhu Bao handed him and inscribed his new title on it.

Watching him, I thought:

What a fucking mess. Seriously.

Chapter 860

Murim martial artists were like weeds.

You found them in dark back alleys and on bright main streets. They survived in the depths of the mountains and even out on the vast Yangtze.

Perhaps that was why the world they lived in came to be called Murim—the forest of martial arts.

Ruffians who ignored common sense and the law.

But even among the Murim martial artists who had carved out a forest of their own with sharply honed spears and blades, not all of them could grow into towering trees.

In the vast forest of Murim, only the Nine Sects and One Gang, the Five Great Families, and a few other forces that had established themselves as rulers of a province could claim that distinction. And those few hadn't yet reached the heights of the great sects and families.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan is one of them, too.

I thought to myself as I looked out the window.

Merchants hawking their wares. A woodcutter passing by, sweating buckets under a full load of firewood. Ordinary commoners and dignitaries dressed in silk.

All sorts of people were out there, making up a society. But one particular sort I'd seen almost everywhere until now was hard to spot.

"You can't find any, can you?"

"Pardon?"

"Murim martial artists. Ones like Young Master Jin."

Hong Jin had read my thoughts exactly. A smile spread across his powder-white face.

"I thought I'd tell you before you waste your energy looking. They're hard to find in Jiangsu Province. That's just the kind of place this is."

"I've heard something to that effect… Is it because we're so close to the imperial capital?"

"That must be part of it. They can't let those ruffians run wild near the imperial capital, where the Son of Heaven resides."

Hong Jin glanced at Hyuk Mujin and me, then added, "Just so you don't misunderstand, that's how the people at the top see it. The higher up they are, the more they care about appearances."

It sounded like he was saying that to keep me from taking offense, but he didn't need to. I could see the reasoning.

Well, to be precise, there were plenty of Murim martial artists who went too far.

But proximity to the imperial capital couldn't explain everything. Hyuk Mujin's next question was along the same lines.

"Then what about the Namgung Family, sitting right there in Anhui? They're not all that far from the imperial capital, either."

"Before I answer that, let me ask you the reverse. What's left among the provinces next to the imperial capital, apart from the Namgung Family in Anhui?"

"Apart from the Namgung Family… Well, there's…"

Hyuk Mujin struggled to finish, and Hong Jin let out a quiet chuckle.

"Nothing. Jiangxi, Fujian, Jiangsu, and Anhui. Of the four provinces surrounding Zhejiang, where the imperial capital stands, the Namgung Family is the only famous Murim sect. There are exceptions, of course."

"Exceptions?"

"Yeah. How should I put it? Judging by its history, it sounds like it ought to be dangerous, but the imperial court would feel uneasy about going out of its way to provoke it. Can you think of a sect like that, Martial artist Hyuk?"

Hyuk Mujin frowned in thought.

"If I went looking, I could probably find a few sects. But is there really one like that? Compared to the Namgung Family in Anhui, they'd be worth less than a horse's balls."

"Martial artist Hyuk, I don't have any balls."

"Ah! I'm sorry."

"No, you don't need to apologize that much. It just felt strange hearing it. Anyway, you really can't think of one?"

"No. Of course not."

Just then, I smacked Hyuk Mujin on the back of the head, the idiot who'd answered so confidently.

Whack!

"The Fire Gate Clan, you asshole! The Fire Gate Clan!"

"Ugh! Ow!"

"Mount Jiuhua in Anhui Province! Three hundred years of history! You saying the Fire Gate Clan's worth less than a horse's balls? You think the Fire Gate Clan's a bunch of fucking pushovers?"

For the record, I was in my second year with the Fire Gate Clan and diligently working my way through the heir-apparent training program.

As I beat Hyuk Mujin with my burning love for the company as fuel, Hong Jin spoke quietly.

"Um, Young Master Jin, sorry, but…"

"Oh, sorry. You don't have those either."

"That's not what I meant. I was worried His Highness would wake up. And being a eunuch doesn't mean both are gone. I think I told you that before."

"My apologies again. I forgot you were only missing one."

"…All right. Just be careful, please. And keep your voice down so His Highness doesn't wake."

Looking half resigned, Hong Jin glanced at Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao, who was sleeping peacefully, and went on.

"Anyway, Murim martial artists haven't been able to run wild in the provinces bordering the imperial capital, not just Zhejiang. That goes for followers of demonic, heterodox arts, of course. Even the Namgung Family—a towering tree of the orthodox faction and one of the Five Great Families—had to call on every connection it had among high-ranking officials."

"It was that bad?"

"Yes. It started right after the Great Nation was founded, so we're talking about a long time ago. But things have stayed that way ever since. No matter how rough Murim martial artists are, I doubt they want to meet the same fate as the Maoshan Sect."

"The Maoshan Sect?"

The name sounded familiar. It had come up now and then in the wuxia[3318] novels I'd loved reading back in school.

It wasn't a major sect like the Nine Sects and One Gang, which appeared in practically every novel. More of a minor one. Still, I could remember a few things about it.

Come to think of it…

"You mean the Maoshan Sect famous for sorcery rather than martial arts?"

"Hm? You didn't know? It used to be right here in Jiangsu Province."

It wasn't as if I were some old master like the Fire King, who'd lived for over a hundred years. How was I supposed to know everything that had happened when the Great Nation was founded?

But I'd caught something in what Hong Jin said.

Used to be in Jiangsu Province…

Past tense, not present. He'd also mentioned the Maoshan Sect's fate, and I'd never once heard its name during my time in Murim. The pieces fell into place.

"It disappeared. A long time ago."

"Correct."

Hong Jin snapped his fingers cheerfully.

[3318] Wuxia is Chinese fiction about martial heroes, commonly set in a historical martial world.

“When Taizu founded the Great Nation, he chose this region for his capital. Nanjing, in Jiangsu Province, had been the seat of six dynasties. It became the imperial family’s first home.”

“So what happened?”

“With a new unified dynasty on the rise, could they really let the ruffians of the martial world run wild? Once the imperial edict went out, everything moved at lightning speed. Most of the sects in Jiangsu Province moved elsewhere. You’re starting to see where this is going, aren’t you?”

Most of the sects, not all of them.

Guessing what came next, I murmured, “The Maoshan Sect didn’t.”

“Right. A small number of Murim sects, including the Maoshan Sect, refused the imperial order to leave Jiangsu and held on to their headquarters. They say the Maoshan Sect was big enough to rival the Nine Sects and One Gang back then, so it could afford to be stubborn. But…”

The Great Nation’s first emperor had risen from the dirt and opened a new era—but he hadn’t been as magnanimous as the Maoshan Sect had thought.

“According to the surviving records, a hundred thousand Imperial Guards were dispatched. They killed and burned everything. They didn’t leave behind a single blade of grass or even an ant.”

“…!”

“…!”

“That was how the Maoshan Sect was wiped out. Afterward, no Murim sect established itself in Jiangsu again. Not even after the current Son of Heaven moved the capital to Zhejiang.”

Jiangsu wasn’t merely the site of the old imperial capital.

It was a Murim-free zone the Imperial Guards had already swept clean, the imperial family’s front yard, still steeped in the first emperor’s legacy.

And what that meant for us was clear.

We can forget about asking for help.

Until now, we’d been able to find help almost anywhere. Every province had a sect or two that had put down roots there, and most of them were friendly toward Jeok Cheongang or the Murim Alliance.

That had held true even in Nanman, practically the middle of nowhere, and on our recent journey, when we’d had no choice but to charge straight ahead.

The Nanman Beast Palace had old ties with the Fire Gate Clan. The Beggars’ Sect and the Lower District Sect, both under the Murim Alliance, had prepared food or fine horses at stops along our route to Jiangsu.

But not from here on out.

If Jiangsu, the old imperial capital, was like this, what would Zhejiang, home to the current capital, be like?

Completely Murim-free. Maybe the odd neighborhood martial arts school.

If the worst happened, what we'd need most was fighting strength. And there wouldn't be a group with the strength I wanted anywhere nearby.

Forget the Nine Sects and One Gang or the Five Great Families. We were down to a neighborhood Taekwondo[3319] school.

No, I guess it would be a tai chi[3320] school here.

Just picturing a crowd in colorful matching uniforms rushing to our aid made me dizzy.

"We've come to help!"

"What sect are you from?"

"Kyunghee Tai Chi!"

"Oh, I see… If you don't mind me asking, how far along are you in your martial arts?"

"I'm a black belt!"

"Ah…"

"The Zhejiang Kendo[3321] Association is here, too!"

"Ahhh…"

I could only hope they weren't from the kids' class.

It was bad enough to fall for that bait-and-switch pitch: sign up for the martial arts school and get three million mesos[3322]—no, three taels[3323] in iron coins. If those kids wound up facing the Imperial Guards too, how could I ever look their parents in the eye?

"At least let it be the adult class. The afternoon adult class…"

"Young Master Jin. Young Master Jin?"

I'd been muttering in a daze, but Hong Jin's call snapped me back to my senses.

"Ah."

"Are you all right?"

"Yes. I'm fine."

"Really? You're sweating like it's pouring rain."

"I had a bad thought for a moment."

Hong Jin's face darkened.

"I'm starting to feel bad for calling you here. But I couldn't help it. You were the only person I could think of."

"No. I understand."

[3319] Taekwondo is a Korean martial art known especially for its kicks.

[3320] Tai chi is a Chinese martial art often practiced through slow, flowing movements.

[3321] Kendo is a Japanese martial art of swordsmanship.

[3322] Mesos are the in-game currency of MapleStory.

[3323] A tael is a traditional East Asian unit of weight also used to reckon money; its value varied by place and era.

If Hong Jin had only needed someone he could trust, he could have asked the nearby Jin Family of Taiyuan for support.

But, to be blunt, there was no one in the family as strong as me.

No—someone who met all his requirements would be hard to find anywhere under heaven.

Hong Jin didn't just want someone he trusted. He wanted someone strong enough to save Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao from any threat.

There's the Murim Alliance, but moving another Supreme Peak master Hong Jin could trust on such short notice would've been too risky.

Even moving a rock on the beach left a mark.

The Alliance had probably already stationed forces across the land in preparation for a battle with Dark Heaven. Pulling out a Supreme Peak master would leave an enormous gap.

Given the stakes and the timing, Jeok Cheongang and I, having just finished our mission in Nanman, were probably the most dependable people Hong Jin could have called on.

This could eat away at the very foundations of the nation.

I kept that thought to myself. Then a voice I still couldn't get used to, no matter how often I heard it, came from outside the window.

"We'll reach Suzhou soon."

The voice was as hard as stone. Jeong Hogun, a Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, looked at me through the gap in the window.

"Inform His Highness Prince Shangshan. He will have an audience with His Imperial Majesty before the day is out."

Chapter 861

Jeong Hogun hadn’t been lying when he said they would reach the imperial capital that day.

The procession passed through Nanjing, the capital of Jiangsu Province and the former imperial capital, and finally arrived in Suzhou. At the border with Zhejiang Province, they encountered a force of soldiers.

“We’ve been waiting for you, Thousand Captain.”

Eyes gleamed beneath helmets and suits of iron armor that covered every inch of their bodies.

Each man radiated a heavy aura. There were nearly a thousand of them, and on the golden banners fluttering in the wind, the dragon that symbolized the imperial family writhed as if alive.

The Embroidered Uniform Guard.

These loyal hounds, who answered to only one person in the world—the Son of Heaven—saluted their superior, Jeong Hogun, then faced the young prince who carried the noble blood of the imperial family.

“His Highness Prince Shangshan is here. Pay your respects.”

“Long live the prince! Long live the prince! Long, long live the prince!”

Watching the Embroidered Uniform Guard shout in unison without even dismounting, Hong Jin found himself wondering:

How many of them truly meant it?

No—was there even one?

Hong Jin already knew the answer. He swallowed a bitter smile.

They and I are nothing more than beasts. What matters is the will of the master who raises those beasts.

The Son of Heaven stood above all others. He could decide who lived and who died.

Nothing could stand in the way of his will.

Not even the blade that had narrowly missed the young prince amid that terrible purge more than a decade ago.

Nor this carriage, now heading toward the Son of Heaven’s returning blade.

“Pick up the pace. The imperial capital is just ahead.”

As the sun began to sink, the carriage raced like the wind.

Jeong Hogun and the Embroidered Uniform Guard under his command had hidden their identities in worn martial clothes for thousands of li.[3324] Now they wore dazzling brocade and armor befitting their name, advancing like a wave beneath imperial banners held high.

[3324] A Chinese li is a unit of distance equal to 500 meters, or about 0.311 miles.

Like victors returning with an enemy general in chains.

“Make way!”

Nothing could stand in the way of a thousand members of the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

The commoners prostrated themselves, fear and awe mingling in their eyes, as the procession with the young prince at its head passed through the gates flung wide before them.

In just half a day, they traveled along roads and waterways cleared for them alone. At last, Hong Jin saw it.

The massive wall he’d thought he would never see again in his lifetime. The wall he had sworn never to return to, if only for the sake of the young prince he served.

The imperial capital…!

Hong Jin forced down the sigh that nearly escaped him.

He could see what lay out of sight. He could hear what no longer made a sound.

The dragon’s lair crouched behind those towering walls. The countless screams that had echoed endlessly around a single throne.

They were horrific fragments of the past, lodged deep in Hong Jin’s mind—and the history that had made one man the ruler of the continent.

“I’ll spare you. Just this once.”

At the sudden memory of someone’s cold voice ringing in his ears, Hong Jin clenched his teeth without realizing it.

It won’t go as Your Majesty wishes. Not this time.

The sunset spreading from the distant west stained the walls of the imperial capital.

Hangzhou made a fine first impression.

It had an abundance of goods carried by canal throughout Zhejiang Province, and its scenery was beautiful.

The broad plains we’d passed on the way were covered in all kinds of grain, rippling like golden waves. Smiles never left the people’s faces.

They say it’s the most beautiful city under heaven.

I’d heard that once in passing. It was absolutely true.

Maybe that was why they’d abandoned a great city with Nanjing’s long history and moved the capital to Hangzhou.

There was just one problem: this beautiful city felt a lot more ominous than I’d expected.

Clank. Clank.

The cold scrape of blades.

Whichever way I turned, I saw soldiers. Not the half-trained grunts I was used to, either—these were fully armed elite troops.

Even the easygoing Hyuk Mujin had lost his smile.

"Captain. This is a bit… much, isn't it?"

Normally, I'd have shot back at him out of habit. This time, even I had to agree.

Why are there so many?

There weren't just a lot of them. There were a downright disgusting number.

I was starting to wonder if Zhejiang Province's specialty wasn't Longjing tea but Imperial Guards.

"Is security always this tight?"

Hyuk Mujin wasn't the only one who'd lost his smile after we entered Hangzhou.

Hong Jin answered in a voice so stiff it hardly sounded like him.

"As the imperial capital, it's always well guarded. But it's never been like this before."

"Then…"

"They must have received some sort of order. And it's probably… connected to us somehow."

Hong Jin licked his red-painted lips and murmured,

"I'd expected something, but this is more of a welcome than I bargained for."

For a moment, I pictured a hundred thousand soldiers pointing their spears and blades at us. Then I shook my head.

That's unlikely.

If they'd wanted to kill Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao that easily, he wouldn't have made it out of Shanxi Province.

I didn't know exactly why the Son of Heaven had sent the Embroidered Uniform Guard to bring his younger brother here. But one thing was certain: whatever he did with Prince Shangshan, it would be something he could publicly justify.

That was the nature of an emperor.

Besides, his public image is already bad.

There was a reason people said the people's will was the will of Heaven.

The nomadic people of the steppe, who had ruled the continent before the Great Nation, had fallen as the people's support crumbled.

The emperor ruled the people, but without the people, there could be no emperor.

And the public's view of the current Son of Heaven was far from favorable.

A capable but ruthless emperor.

I'd heard that description now and then in Murim. Quiet conversations with Hong Jin on the way here had filled in the details.

From a young age, the current emperor had built an impressive military record putting down rebellions and uprisings by foreign peoples. He was also praised for governing every region placed under his charge without the slightest lapse.

Hong Jin said that if he'd been born the late Emperor's eldest son—or if his eldest brother, the Crown Prince, had been even a little less capable—he would naturally have inherited the throne.

But things hadn't worked out that way.

Before becoming emperor, he'd been nowhere near the line of succession.

He had three older brothers. The eldest had naturally become Crown Prince under the principle of primogeniture, and he was every bit as outstanding as his younger brother—perhaps even more so, depending on whom you asked.

He treated people with benevolence and integrity regardless of their status, and had shown every quality needed to lead the Great Nation.

Hong Jin had described the Crown Prince of that time as:

A Son of Heaven prepared for the throne.

The long wars had ended long ago.

The seeds of rebellion scattered across the land had been uprooted, as had the foreign peoples who had constantly eyed the Great Nation.

The Great Nation had been established on firm foundations. What it needed now wasn't conquest, but stability. With his perfect orthodox lineage and all the qualities a ruler could need, the Crown Prince was a successor prepared in every respect.

Until the imperial family's fourth son, already pushed far from the line of succession, drew his sword from the shadows.

Clip-clop.

The unusually clear sound of hooves snapped me out of my thoughts. I looked around.

Where are we?

The answer came quickly.

The carriage had stopped. Beyond the Embroidered Uniform Guard packed tightly around us stood enormous buildings unlike any I'd seen in Murim.

They were tall enough to remind me of modern skyscrapers, but decorated with an elegance and splendor no skyscraper could match. They could only mean one place.

The imperial palace.

The dragon's lair, and the center that kept the enormous gears of the world turning.

I stared silently at the palace entrance. Even through the narrow gap in the window, the sight was overwhelming. Hong Jin leaned close and whispered, barely above a breath.

"Young Master Jin, I've held off asking until now, but… isn't it time you told me?"

The moment he said it, I knew what he meant.

The others besides Hyuk Mujin and me.

Hong Jin wanted to know where our other helpers were—the ones who still hadn't shown themselves. I already had my answer.

"Don't worry. You'll find out soon enough."

It wasn't the answer he'd hoped for. Hong Jin furrowed his brow slightly, but didn't complain.

I'd traveled all this way without stopping to help them. If we couldn't trust one another in a situation like this, the anxiety and danger would only grow.

And with that in mind, I had a question of my own.

"How do you know so much?"

It was something I'd been wondering for quite some time.

Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao might have been a prince in name only, but he was the only direct member of the imperial family to survive the horrific struggle over the throne—and a prince who ruled a fief.

I'd long suspected that Hong Jin, his trusted aide, couldn't be an ordinary eunuch. But how much he knew—and how calmly he dealt with the Embroidered Uniform Guard, feared wherever they went—exceeded even my expectations.

I had to ask him directly, even if it meant doing it like this.

"Since I've risked my life, I deserve an answer to this question. Right now."

Clunk.

Hong Jin stared at me in silence after that firm Sound Transmission. Then, without warning, he flung open the carriage door.

He looked toward a group descending the towering staircase that led from the imperial palace and spoke.

"Young Master Jin, I've told you why I decided to become a eunuch, haven't I?"

I nodded.

Back when Hong Jin and I first met in Shanxi Province, he'd briefly told me about his past.

"I hated being poor, and I wanted to save my family. But I didn't have many options. No—at the time, I only had one."

Hong Jin continued slowly.

To get what you wanted, you had to sacrifice something else.

So the poor boy, unable to bear his hunger, became a eunuch and chose a new name for himself.

“Hong Jin. I wanted to go out into the great waters. To leave that stinking sewer behind for the wide, clear sea.”

It hadn’t taken long for that wish to come true.

The young eunuch had escaped poverty and developed ambitions he’d never had before. He also had the ability to fulfill them.

His unfailing thoroughness and cool judgment soon caught the eye of the late Emperor.

“One day, the late Emperor summoned me. He said there was a place where my abilities could be put to good use.”

Hong Jin’s voice was clear.

“Young Master Jin. Have you ever heard of the East Depot?[3325]”

“…!”

[3325]The East Depot was an imperial secret-police agency in Ming China.

Chapter 862

The East Depot.

Anyone who'd read a few martial arts novels knew that name.

If the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families showed up like clockwork in those stories, then the imperial court had the East Depot, which stood alongside the Embroidered Uniform Guard as its other great power.

And Hong Jin had been a member of that very East Depot.

My mouth fell open before I even realized it.

"The East Depot? The one I'm thinking of?"

"There's only one East Depot in the world, Young Master Jin."

"No, I mean, it actually exists?"

"…Is there a fake East Depot, then?"

"Ah. That's not what I meant."

I hadn't known the East Depot really existed.

It hadn't been that long since I'd learned the Embroidered Uniform Guard was real, either.

The endless incidents and disasters in Murim kept me busy enough. Who would've expected to get tangled up with the imperial court like this?

Still, if Hong Jin came from the East Depot, that would explain a lot about him.

I looked at Hong Jin with fresh astonishment.

I didn't know the details, but the East Depot's influence couldn't be far behind the Embroidered Uniform Guard's.

At first, I'd thought he was just a eunuch who'd been a bit of a tough guy in his youth. Now that I'd heard his story, I could almost picture him hawking up phlegm in the palace corridors.

Hyuk Mujin must have had a similar thought. He glanced sideways at Hong Jin and whispered in a voice barely above a breath.

"Captain. This is no ordinary eunuch."

"…Please, just shut your mouth."

"It's fine. He can't hear me."

"Sorry, but I can hear you just fine."

At Hong Jin's sudden reply, I answered quickly.

"I didn't say anything. That bastard did."

"Gasp. Captain!"

This was no time to go soft. I shook off Hyuk Mujin's hand as he grabbed my sleeve and snapped at him.

“Apologize this instant, you bastard. You’ve got nothing but a pair of balls to your name, and you dare say that?”

“I’m sorry. I’m truly sorry.”

“Beta-male behavior: runs his mouth without thinking, then gets dragged off by the East Depot.”

“I’m sorry! I’ve committed a crime worthy of death!”

“Beta-male behavior: commits a crime worthy of death, then actually dies.”

“No! Please spare me, Comrade Hong! I have tiger-like parents and a rabbit-like younger sibling!”

Whoa, that startled me. For a second, I thought we were in North Korea.

Hyuk Mujin was facedown, wailing like a Communist Party member caught in an ideological purge and dragged off to the Aoji coal mines. Comrade Hong—or rather, Hong Jin, Deputy Military Commissioner of Shanxi Province—watched him with a thoroughly unimpressed look and heaved a sigh that seemed to come from the depths of the earth.

“Anyone would think I was the Grim Reaper. Stop making a spectacle of yourself in front of His Highness Prince Shangshan and get up. There are already plenty of eyes on us. At this rate, I’ll die of embarrassment.”

Sadly enough, Hong Jin was right.

The Embroidered Uniform Guards were staring at us as if they couldn’t believe what a bunch of idiots we were. Prince Shangshan, who’d just woken up and was still groggy, opened his eyes wide and asked me,

“Is that man truly known by the sobriquet Tenfold Man?”

I hesitated for a moment, then answered,

“Something like that.”

It wasn’t wrong.

Tenfold Man and Tenfold Beta Man were only one character apart, after all.

Though their meanings are complete opposites.

I held my tongue to protect the young prince’s innocence. Just then, a group came down the endless staircase—long enough to make me wonder if it had been built to torture subjects—and stopped in front of us.

Or, more precisely, they knelt before Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao.

“We pay our respects to His Highness Prince Shangshan.”

“A thousand years! A thousand years! A thousand thousand years!”

They wore official robes of black silk, but ranged in age from young men who looked barely twenty to old men with deeply wrinkled faces.

Their robes weren’t the only thing they had in common. I realized at once.

Eunuchs.

No doubt about it.

Every one of them had a face powdered white and lips painted red. Their voices sounded neither like women's nor men's, and even their loose robes couldn't hide their small frames.

And yet—

They're strong.

Martial power wasn't decided by the size of your body.

What you saw wasn't everything.

I could feel the immense qi coiled inside their small frames. At the same time, I recalled the name of the organization I'd just heard.

No—I found myself muttering it aloud.

"The East Depot?"

Rustle.

A long hem brushed the ground.

At the head of the eunuchs, an old man who'd bowed deeply to Prince Shangshan raised his head and looked at me.

His strange gaze gave nothing away.

The old eunuch stared at me for a brief moment, as if he could see right through me, then spoke to Hong Jin beside him.

"It's been a long time, Hong Cheophyeong. Or should I call you Deputy Military Commissioner now?"

Hong Jin answered calmly.

"Call me whatever you like. But you've gotten even older since I last saw you."

Despite the considerable age difference between them, Hong Jin spoke to him without a hint of deference.

That meant Hong Jin's position back then must have been quite high. The old eunuch's wrinkles deepened further.

"You'd be wise to watch your words. The landscape isn't the only thing that's changed in the last ten years."

"Things can only change so much. And your brain must have gone stiff with age. It's been eleven years and nine days, to be precise."

"You remember that exactly?"

"There are some things you can't forget, even if you try."

"And yet you seem to have forgotten rather a lot."

The old eunuch continued in a chilly voice.

"How dare you bring an outsider into the imperial palace without permission—one of those ruffians from the martial world, no less. Just because you left the imperial court, have you forgotten its rules as well?"

"Times really have changed. Someone like you dares to question something His Highness Prince Shangshan permitted? And…"

Hong Jin's voice rang clear.

"If everything had gone according to the rules, things wouldn't have come to this."

"…!"

"…!"

Hong Jin's words had a hard edge beneath them, and the air around us froze.

Just as he said, if everything had followed the rules, the current Son of Heaven wouldn't be sitting on the throne, and Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao's situation would be very different.

Hong Jin had alluded to that fact, and the reaction of the Embroidered Uniform Guards and the East Depot eunuchs—the Son of Heaven's own hands and feet—had been inevitable from the start.

Shing.

The cold scrape of a blade reached my ears.

I moved without the slightest hesitation.

Whoosh.

One step.

Space disappeared. The wind fell silent.

In time that seemed to pass slowly, I reached out and pressed down on the hand of someone gripping a sword hilt tightly.

To send the blade, not even halfway drawn, back where it belonged.

Click.

At the soft sound, time—which had slowed for a moment—returned to normal. The wide eyes of an Embroidered Uniform Guard I didn't know seemed to whisper:

How?

But I didn't bother answering, nor did I knock down the man who'd already gone rigid as a statue.

Then again, even if I had answered, he might not have heard me.

The wind, catching up with me after I'd moved like a flash of light, whipped in every direction.

Fwoosh!

Clothes billowed in the burst of air.

Dust that had lain in layers between the bluestones, fitted neatly into the ground like a work of art, rose and scattered on the wind.

Like sleet.

In that breathless silence, without a single cough, I spoke calmly.

"Who the hell told you to draw your weapon? With a child—no, with His Highness Prince Shangshan watching, no less."

"…!"

"…!"

"Let's not make this any bigger than it has to be. That's best for everyone, isn't it?"

I meant every word.

Taking care of the men in front of me wouldn't be difficult, but doing that at the entrance to the imperial palace could send things spiraling into the worst possible situation.

And my sincere words reached someone I hadn't expected.

"Your manner is disrespectful, but you're not wrong."

"…!"

When did he get there?

I turned around, feeling as if someone had dumped a bucket of cold water over my head.

About thirty jang[3326] away, halfway down the endless staircase leading up to the imperial palace, stood a middle-aged man.

I didn't sense him at all.

I'd been constantly honing my Qi Sense so I wouldn't have to rely on the System as much as possible.

There was no denying the distance between us was considerable. But the fact that I hadn't sensed him proved the middle-aged man's martial prowess was no less than mine.

No. It might even be greater.

My thoughts turned cold as I watched him.

Instead of using lightness skill, he came slowly down the stairs with the leisurely gait of a man out for a stroll. He smiled at me and spoke.

"You're reckless, like the other ruffians of the martial world, but not as ignorant. Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

It wasn't especially surprising that the middle-aged man already knew who I was.

I'd expected as much the moment I stepped in front of the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

And just as he knew who I was, I had a vague idea of who he was, too.

Even if he hadn't been wearing gleaming golden armor, the shout that rang out the next moment would've told me.

"Loyalty!"

"We pay our respects to the Commander!"

Led by Jeong Hogun, the Embroidered Uniform Guards under his command struck their chests and shouted their military salute as one. It was quite a sight.

So was the middle-aged man approaching through that sea of flashing gold.

[3326] A jang is ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Thirty jang is about 91 m (300 ft).

Step. Step.

His soft footsteps broke the silence that followed the shouts.

He was neither large nor small, but somehow seemed like a giant. He stopped only when he reached the young prince.

“I, Baek Yeon, Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, pay my respects to His Highness Prince Shangshan. I serve only the Emperor with my utmost loyalty, so I ask you to forgive me, with a heart as vast as the sea, for not kneeling.”

His words were respectful, but his voice was light. He didn’t even show the proper deference due to a direct member of the imperial family—a prince.

And then there was that faint smile on his lips.

Still, the post of Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard carried that kind of power. He was the Son of Heaven’s most trusted military officer and the head of a force even the highest-ranking officials feared.

“Furthermore, I humbly ask that Your Highness hold me responsible for the crimes of my subordinates, who dared to show disrespect in your presence.”

That wasn’t an apology or a request. It was a notification.

He was telling us to end the matter here and now.

Even I, who was only watching for the moment, couldn’t help frowning. But Hong Jin, Prince Shangshan’s loyal servant, reacted differently from before.

Crack.

He clenched his fist so tightly that his skin turned white.

The rings on his ten fingers scraped against one another with an unpleasant sound.

Hong Jin stared at the middle-aged man—or rather, Baek Yeon, Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard—with a deeply restrained gaze, then leaned toward Prince Shangshan and whispered,

“Your Highness.”

It was a quiet call, but the meaning in his suppressed voice was clear.

Hong Jin was worried about confronting Baek Yeon right now.

Whether that was because Baek Yeon held the immense power of the Embroidered Uniform Guard’s command, or for some other reason, I couldn’t say.

And looking at it coldly, I had no place in this decision.

Intervening when an Embroidered Uniform Guard drew his sword had been proper for me as the prince’s guard in name. But from here on, it was best to follow Hong Jin’s lead.

This was the imperial court, not Murim.

But the next words out of Prince Shangshan’s mouth were something no one there could have anticipated.

“If you were in my place, what would you do?”

Countless eyes turned toward me from every direction.

As I stood there, briefly at a loss for words, Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao spoke again.

To me, and no one else.

“Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung. I asked what you would do in my place.”

His eyes shone brightly.

The little boy who’d been delighted to get a new autograph was nowhere to be seen. I realized that the child in my memory had grown into a young man.

I knew what answer he wanted now, too.

“Uh, may I speak honestly?”

“That is precisely what I want. This is an order from your king.”

At the prince’s bold command, I laughed aloud.

Then I looked at everyone and spoke.

“As you said, if I were in your place…”

Let’s not forget.

This was the imperial palace. I had to keep things under control.

“I’d have already beaten the shit out of every last one of them.”

“…!”

“…!”

Okay. So much for keeping it under control.

Chapter 863

Hundreds of members of the Embroidered Uniform Guard and eunuchs from the East Depot gathered in one place would have been quite a sight on its own.

But not as much as the expressions on their faces right now.

Shock. Astonishment. Confusion. Anger.

Those emotions swept across the countless faces surrounding us. Every last one of them stared wide-eyed, gaped in disbelief, wondered if they'd heard right, and then, once reality sank in, used every muscle in their faces to express their fury.

Except for two people.

"…Young Master Jin?"

Hong Jin looked at me with dazed eyes.

"Ha. Fuck. I'm screwed again…"

Hyuk Mujin dragged a hand down his face with a deep sigh.

Hmm.

Hong Jin was one thing, but Hyuk Mujin had suffered because of me more than once or twice. I did feel a little bad for him.

Still…

So what?

He could be squad leader, then.

Besides, this was a royal decree from His Highness Prince Shangshan himself. As a citizen of Korea—no, of the Great Nation—I had no choice but to follow it wholeheartedly.

Of course, I'd never even seen an identity tag bearing my name, and I had no intention of getting one. But anyway, that was the idea.

In short, this was a legally sanctioned rampage.

"I answered honestly, just as you ordered. I'm not sure whether my answer pleased you, Your Highness."

At my casual remark, Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao, who'd been staring at me with round eyes, flashed a mischievous grin.

"No. That was exactly the honest answer I wanted. Though I was a little surprised."

A little? He'd looked pretty damn surprised.

Even that young prince, who'd shown such unexpected boldness, seemed taken aback by just how far I'd gone.

But I didn't particularly regret it.

Whether we were in Murim or the imperial palace, this was a world where showing weakness meant getting devoured.

A rat cornered in an alley and cowering wouldn't survive long. A cat would bat it around like a toy until it finally stopped breathing.

If we have to stand up to them anyway, showing our teeth might buy us more time.

I hadn't charged in without thinking, either.

The Son of Heaven had brought Prince Shangshan all the way to the Imperial Capital. That meant he intended to get rid of him only after establishing some kind of pretext.

And that meant the hunting dogs snarling at us from every direction would stay docile until their master gave the order.

Even the pack leader with the sharpest teeth.

"Well. I hardly know what to say."

Was Baek Yeon so composed because he commanded so many members of the Embroidered Uniform Guard? Or because he was a master who'd already reached the realm of the superhuman?

Whatever the reason, his reaction was different. He didn't show the near-killing-intent fury of the others, or toy with his weapon as though killing me were his lifelong wish.

He merely stroked his beard and said, "A word of advice: watch your tongue next time. This is the imperial court of the Great Nation, not Murim."

I scratched my chin.

"I did what His Highness told me to, and now I'm getting scolded for it. How's a powerless commoner like me supposed to live with that?"

I shot a sidelong glance at the prince. He caught the signal and spoke up.

"Baek Yeon, Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard. This man merely followed my orders. You will say no more about it."

Baek Yeon didn't answer. As he looked down at the prince with an inscrutable gaze, Zhu Bao's voice grew firmer.

"I am asking you. Why do you not answer?"

Ah.

I couldn't let that go.

"That's right! How dare you ignore His Highness? You insolent bastard!"

Good projection. Good timing.

Fwoooosh.

And what an atmosphere.

My stern rebuke landed with a satisfying three-quarter beat. Energy seethed all around us.

Hong Jin let out a quiet groan. Hyuk Mujin grabbed my sleeve and whispered frantically, "Captain. Captain. Please, stop."

“His Highness Prince Shangshan, the younger brother of His Majesty the Emperor, is asking you a question! If you don’t answer, that’s an insult to the imperial family! You’re a traitor!”

“Have you actually lost your mind? Have you been dragging me around all this time just to get me killed in a place like this?”

“Let go of me, you pathetic fool who can’t even use Sword Energy! Are you on their side, too?”

“No, fuck. Please…”

Just as Hyuk Mujin was starting to sound half in tears, Baek Yeon, who’d been staring silently at Prince Shangshan the whole time, raised one hand.

Swish.

The oppressive air scattered in an instant.

The members of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, furious at the insult to their superior, withdrew their auras as one. Baek Yeon opened his firmly shut lips.

“Please forgive me, Your Highness. I am slow-witted, and hesitated because I did not know how to answer.”

Not a single person here would be fool enough to take that at face value. Not even a young prince who knew nothing of the world.

“I forgive you. But having hesitated, you had better give the right answer.”

Watching Zhu Bao respond with such dignity, I realized something anew.

Regardless of his age, he was a member of the imperial family, born to noble blood. Someone destined to become a dragon if only he could obtain the dragon pearl.

Perhaps even Hong Jin, who’d stood by Prince Shangshan for so many years, had underestimated him.

Perhaps so had the all-powerful man who remembered only the child who’d barely survived countless purges and been forced to leave for Shanxi Province with the one eunuch still at his side.

“I, Baek Yeon, Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, will engrave Your Highness’s command deep in my heart.”

Clank.

At the scrape of golden armor, I saw Prince Shangshan’s shoulders twitch.

He had a boldness and dignity beyond his years, but he was still a child. Facing one of the most powerful men in the Imperial Capital must have taken more courage than I’d imagined.

In that case…

A little help wouldn’t hurt.

Swish.

I murmured inwardly and, with all due insolence, brushed a hand against Prince Shangshan's back.

The young prince looked up at me, eyes wide at the sudden warmth flowing into him. Then he gave a faint smile and continued.

"These people are citizens of Shanxi Province, which I govern, and guests whom I personally invited. There must be no neglect or mishap of any kind. Is that understood?"

Baek Yeon glanced at me when he heard the prince's newly clear voice, then replied with an odd expression.

"This is the imperial palace, where His Majesty the Emperor resides. Who would dare harm Your Highness's guests?"

I muttered as if to myself, "Who knows? Someone's already drawn a sword in front of His Highness. What wouldn't they do?"

"…!"

"Good grief. The world's a frightening place these days, isn't it, Your Highness?"

At my show of distress, Prince Shangshan looked at Baek Yeon once more.

"I believe he is right. What do you think?"

A top tip for dealing with the imperial palace:

Get on good terms with a prince, and even the Emperor's right-hand man can't easily touch you—for now.

Just as I'd expected, Baek Yeon fell silent for a moment before giving the answer that had practically been decided already.

"I, too, agree with Your Highness."

"Then I have nothing more to say."

"…You honor me beyond measure."

It had been a tense exchange, with no clear victor or loser. But if I had to call it, we'd definitely come out ahead.

We'd secured a promise of safety in the Commander's name and confirmed that Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao's authority wasn't so easy to disregard.

The problem was…

Who knows how long that safety will last.

Was this what it felt like to lie on an operating table?

My companions and I were patients. Instead of kind nurses, the place was crawling with members of the Embroidered Uniform Guard and eunuchs armed with blades and spears. And the surgeon would be none other than the Son of Heaven himself.

This was the imperial palace. One word from the Emperor, who still hadn't shown his face, could change our fates.

To have your fate decided by someone you've never even seen…

This felt a lot shittier than I'd expected.

Of course, even if the Son of Heaven held the power of life and death, I had no intention of taking it lying down.

The one saving grace was that we hadn't been given a firm diagnosis yet.

Maybe it would end with a few stitches. Or maybe terrifying nurses wielding blades and spears instead of anesthetic and surgical instruments would put us to sleep for good. What happened next would depend on what we did.

No. I hoped it would.

If the surgeon had already declared us terminal, we'd have to fight for our lives with everything we had.

And Baek Yeon—the head nurse who served closest to the surgeon—had come bearing new information about that.

"By His Majesty the Emperor's command, Your Highness's audience has been postponed until tomorrow."

"Postponed? Is that what my elder brother said?"

"Yes, Your Highness."

Zhu Bao wasn't the only one whose eyes widened at the unexpected news. Hong Jin's did, too.

"But before we arrived, I was told…"

"How dare a mere eunuch interrupt, Hong Cheophyeong. No—Deputy Military Commissioner now, is it?"

They appeared to have met before. Baek Yeon cut Hong Jin off firmly and continued.

"You will attend to His Highness until you receive word."

"…Can't you at least tell us why?"

"I said it was His Majesty's command. Do you need another reason?"

Hong Jin had been about to say something, but closed his mouth.

It was the Emperor's command. There was no questioning or arguing with that. I turned the sudden postponement over in my mind.

Why? Is there a reason?

An audience that had already been arranged had been postponed. The whims of the powerful were nothing new, but given the situation, I couldn't help thinking hard about it.

Of course, with everything shrouded in fog, I couldn't get very far.

"Thousand Captain Jeong."

"Your orders?"

"Escort His Highness Prince Shangshan inside. And…"

The moment Baek Yeon's gray eyes, marked by many years despite his appearance, turned toward me—

Rumble.

I felt his aura tighten around my whole body.

That immense force had been aimed at me alone.

As soon as I realized it, I roused the internal energy sleeping deep in my lower dantian.

Whoosh.

Two invisible forces met across the empty air. They collided and mingled countless times in the blink of an eye, then finally dispersed like mist.

A voice reached me that no one else could hear.

—Not bad, young man.

Half my strength.

No—not even half of that had gone into that contest of auras.

I'd learned nothing from the exchange. Instead of answering, I licked my lips. Baek Yeon gazed at me for a moment, then finished what he'd been saying.

"The others will come as well."

"Loyalty!"

Jeong Hogun gave a vigorous military salute, then nodded to his subordinates. A wave of gold surrounded us once more, and we began to move.

Or rather, we were about to.

"Ah, I nearly forgot something."

Baek Yeon's quiet voice stopped everyone in their tracks. He walked up to one of the members of the Embroidered Uniform Guard and spoke.

"You dared to draw your sword in front of His Highness."

Shhk.

Instead of an answer came a cold slicing sound, and a head shot into the air.

Baek Yeon had cut down his subordinate with a hand blade that flashed through the air. Then he turned to Prince Shangshan and smiled.

"A subordinate's crime is my own fault. Please forgive me, Your Highness."

Chapter 864

“My subordinate’s crime is my own failing. Please forgive me, Your Highness.”

Baek Yeon smiled warmly as he looked at the young prince before him.

Prince Shangshan’s eyes shone with unusual clarity. Reflected in them was Baek Yeon, spattered with his subordinate’s blood.

He looked like a beast facing its prey.

The response came at once.

“Baek Yeon, how dare you—!”

Hong Jin sprang in front of his young lord, his voice boiling with fury. But Baek Yeon paid him no mind.

No—more precisely, he couldn’t afford to.

Someone far more dangerous than any eunuch was staring straight at him.

“This guy. I thought we were going to settle this nicely, but you’ve really crossed the line.”

At the young man’s offhand remark, Baek Yeon’s smile deepened.

“Is there a problem, Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan?”

“There is. A big one. Are you really allowed to do this?”

Jin Taekyung scratched his chin and pointed at the severed head on the ground.

Blood poured without pause from the neck, cut so cleanly it sent a shiver down his spine.

“You commit murder in front of His Highness? Is a Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard allowed to run wild like this?”

“Of course.”

“What?”

“I said I’m allowed. No matter how much power a high official wields—even if he’s a member of the imperial family—I and the Embroidered Uniform Guard serve only one person and obey his will.”

Baek Yeon raised one hand toward the dark sky, then spread both arms toward the vast buildings stretching endlessly behind him.

“The Son of Heaven. Aside from His Majesty the Emperor, who rules this world on Heaven’s behalf, who would dare punish the Embroidered Uniform Guard on a private whim?”

“…!”

“The only reason I—or rather, the Embroidered Uniform Guard—exist is to serve His Majesty. If anyone tries to undermine his authority or defy him…”

His mouth was still smiling, but his eyes weren’t.

Baek Yeon swept a cold gaze over those around him: the East Depot eunuchs, their faces stiff; Hong Jin and Hyuk Mujin, tense; and finally Jin Taekyung, standing between him and Prince Shangshan. Only then did he continue.

“Whoever they are, they won’t escape death.”

Thud.

Baek Yeon kicked the head. It rolled to a stop at someone’s feet. Jin Taekyung stared down at his leather shoe as blood soaked into it, then spoke.

“So, are you going to claim we’ve committed treason now?”

“Prince Shangshan, committing treason? Ha! That’s a frightening thing to say, my friend.”

Baek Yeon laughed aloud and waved a hand.

“No, no. I merely punished him myself.”

“Punished him?”

“He dared draw his sword in front of His Highness Prince Shangshan. That’s a capital crime. As someone said earlier, shouldn’t he be thoroughly fucked up for it?”

“I appreciate you taking my opinion into account, but it looks like there’s one more person who needs to be fucked up.”

Jin Taekyung laughed along with him.

“The man who drew his sword in front of royalty is dead. What happens to the man who spilled blood?”

“I summarily executed someone who might have become a traitor. I expect I’ll receive due praise and a reward.”

“Who says?”

“You may not know this, but incidents within the Embroidered Uniform Guard are generally resolved quickly. There are only two people who get to decide.”

Jin Taekyung let out a dry laugh.

He could already guess who they were.

One was the Son of Heaven, the very reason the Embroidered Uniform Guard existed. The other…

“The Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard?”

“Correct. You’re sharper than I expected, Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.”

“Damn it.”

“There’s another way, so don’t be disheartened just yet. If you want me punished, you can submit a formal petition to His Majesty the Emperor. Every citizen of the Great Nation has that right. Ah, of course…”

Baek Yeon continued as if something had just occurred to him.

“That might be difficult for a martial-world ruffian without even an identity tablet.[3327]”

“…Hah.”

“There is one more way. Want to hear it?”

Jin Taekyung thought for a moment, then shook his head.

“That would be difficult.”

“Why?”

“I want to kill you, but I don’t want to die.”

“The first is absurd nonsense, but the second is a fairly sensible reason. And that answer just saved your life.”

Clank. Clank.

An unpleasant scrape sounded with every step Baek Yeon took.

Clad in golden armor that gleamed even in the dark, he stopped in front of Jin Taekyung. He looked up at the young man, who stood a head taller than he did, then turned his gaze to the young prince visible past Taekyung’s side.

“Your Highness Prince Shangshan. Do you also believe my conduct was disrespectful?”

“…”

“Your Highness. I am asking you.”

The prince’s breath trembled. But Baek Yeon’s armor wasn’t the only thing that still shone in the darkness.

“You are… truly arrogant and discourteous.”

Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao trembled, but kept his eyes fixed on Baek Yeon as he continued.

“Even so, I will not blame you. Nor will I ask my elder brother, His Majesty, to punish you.”

Baek Yeon bent at the waist in an exaggerated bow.

“I am most grateful to hear that, but may I ask why?”

“You are my elder brother’s subject, not mine.”

“…!”

“Both you and I are ultimately His Majesty’s subjects. But if you were my subject, you would not escape death here today. A sovereign must not forgive a disloyal subject.”

At those words, an unreadable emotion passed over Baek Yeon’s face.

It vanished almost at once. Without a word, he turned and gestured to his subordinates with his chin.

“His Highness appears weary from the long journey. Take him inside at once.”

[3327] A hopae was a personal identification tablet bearing its holder’s registered identity in premodern Korea.

“Loyalty!”

“Oh, and Thousand Captain Jeong, stay behind a moment.”

The Embroidered Uniform Guard soldiers, who’d paused where they stood, closed in around the party once more.

It was impossible to tell whether they were escorting the party or surrounding them. As they moved, Baek Yeon sent a quiet Sound Transmission.

—You’ll regret coming here.

Jin Taekyung’s reply came flying back amid the golden tide flowing toward the Inner City, as though he’d been waiting for it.

—My whole life’s a regret already. Mind your own business and go suck a dick.

Who else would dare say that to the Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard?

Baek Yeon let out a dry laugh at the young ruffian’s reply, which defied his expectations yet again. Leaving the East Depot eunuchs behind, he walked away.

Jeong Hogun, who had stayed at Baek Yeon’s order, followed him as a matter of course.

“Is there something you wish to command me?”

“There is. But before hearing an order, an Embroidered Uniform Guard should think for himself.”

“I will watch Prince Shangshan and his party without the slightest lapse.”

“That’s close to the answer I wanted, but not quite.”

“Then…”

“Make it look as though you’re watching them without a lapse, but leave gaps all the same. Make sure someone can slip through and approach them.”

“…!”

Clank. Clank.

Baek Yeon climbed the stairs that stretched upward without end. Hundreds, even thousands of them. They symbolized the Son of Heaven’s authority.

No matter how high an official’s rank, every time they went to court, they had to climb those stairs drenched in sweat.

Leaving behind their power and their gold and silver treasures.

Reminded of the Son of Heaven’s majesty, which reached all the way to Heaven.

“Watch whom they meet and who comes to see them. Find out everything.”

To catch fish in a net, you first had to spread it wide.

Only then did you draw it tight and haul it in.

Of course, you also had to consider the possibility that something bulky or sharp-toothed might tear through it.

“How is ‘that matter’ I entrusted to you some time ago?”

No answer came. Jeong Hogun lowered his head in silence, and Baek Yeon clicked his tongue softly.

“Cunning bastards.”

“I have nothing to say. I did my best, but…”

“It doesn’t matter. Not yet. But there must not be a second mistake.”

“Of course. Give me the order, and I will carry it out without fail.”

“Without fail? Whatever the order?”

“Yes.”

Baek Yeon suddenly stopped and turned to look at Jeong Hogun. A silent whisper slipped through his slightly parted lips.

—If I ordered you to assassinate His Highness Prince Shangshan, would you do it?

“…!”

Jeong Hogun’s eyes widened, his pupils wavering. Baek Yeon looked down at his subordinate without a word, then chuckled.

“No need to be so shocked. It was only a joke.”

“A joke…?”

“Yes. But I really am curious about your answer.”

A bead of cold sweat ran down Jeong Hogun’s forehead. He hadn’t even noticed it forming.

His silence did not last long.

“I will follow your orders with my life. If they are the Emperor’s command.”

The smile slowly faded from Baek Yeon’s lips. He studied his subordinate with an odd expression, then smiled faintly again.

“You’re right. That is an answer worthy of the Embroidered Uniform Guard.”

“…I apologize.”

“What are you apologizing for? The Embroidered Uniform Guard lives and dies by the Emperor’s command. Of course we act only according to His Majesty’s will.”

Baek Yeon turned his head.

Far in the distance, he could see a procession of torches and golden armor stretching out one after another.

And though he could not see him now, the prince with dragon’s blood was somewhere within that ironclad escort.

Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao.

The young prince might not remember, but the old officer remembered clearly.

The Son of Heaven’s only younger brother. The sole direct member of the imperial family to survive the most brutal power struggle in history.

The child he had last seen more than a decade ago had grown considerably. In body and in mind.

"…Which makes him all the more dangerous."

Jeong Hogun lifted his head at Baek Yeon's whispered words.

Baek Yeon waved a hand as if nothing had happened, then spoke again. Not a trace of a smile remained on his stern face.

"Remember one thing."

"Give me your command."

"Once they've set foot in this imperial palace, no one is to be allowed to leave."

Jeong Hogun understood at once.

Baek Yeon wasn't speaking only of Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao.

The Embroidered Uniform Guard had to watch more than the prince with dragon's blood. There was also the martial-world ruffian who dared bear the title of Divine Dragon.

Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung.

The dragon was a mythical spiritual creature that symbolized the Son of Heaven alone.

Yet the young prince had brought an uninvited Divine Dragon into the imperial palace where the Son of Heaven resided.

He had made that ruffian, who disregarded the laws of the Great Nation, his guard. He had defended him and taken him under his protection.

No one could be certain what that choice would bring.

Not Jeong Hogun. Not even Baek Yeon, who had anticipated the situation and let it happen.

The Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung they knew had always been like that.

He always overturned everyone's expectations, bringing storms and flames that swept in from every direction.

Fwoosh.

In the darkness, a fierce wind blew from somewhere, setting the torches flickering.

Chapter 865

A person’s body and mind are like a bowstring.

Drawn taut, then released all at once.

Once the tension lets up, exhaustion catches up with you.

That was true even for me, after weathering countless crises. For a child barely twelve or thirteen, it went without saying.

Click.

Careful not to wake his young lord, Hong Jin closed the door with the utmost care and whispered to me,

“He must have been exhausted. He fell asleep in no time.”

Soft, even breathing came through the crack in the closed door.

Once I was sure Prince Shangshan was fast asleep, I glanced out the window.

Down below, amid the swaying torchlight, members of the Embroidered Uniform Guard stood like iron towers in their golden armor.

You bastards. It’s dark enough already. Why don’t you clock out on time for once?

Of course, that wasn’t going to happen.

From what I’d seen, those guys would risk not just overtime but their lives to carry out an order.

Murim martial artists were all crazy in their own way, but the Embroidered Uniform Guard were hunting dogs, blindly loyal to the Son of Heaven.

“Watching us like that won’t change anything. They won’t leave their posts for even a moment.”

Hong Jin surveyed the torches and guards surrounding the pavilion as if they were laying siege to it, then added, “That’s how the Changwei operate.”

“Changwei?”

“Oh, it’s a collective name for the East Depot and the Embroidered Uniform Guard. As I told you, Young Master Jin, I was once part of one of them.”

I knew Hong Jin had belonged to the East Depot, but there was still plenty I wanted to ask him.

As if he’d read my mind, Hong Jin spoke first.

“Now that it’s finally just the two of us, shall we talk for a bit?”

I’d be grateful if he did.

I nodded, and Hong Jin and I walked downstairs together.

We’d already sent away the Embroidered Uniform Guard, along with the palace attendants who were more or less there to keep an eye on us for them.

Even though I could see everything happening inside the pavilion as clearly as if it were in the palm of my hand, Hong Jin was still deeply uneasy about leaving Prince Shangshan alone.

“Young Master Jin, do you think it’s all right?”

“There’s no need to worry. I’m nearby, and more importantly, I left that rascal Mujin with His Highness as a precaution.”

“Right. That makes me even more worried.”

“…”

Thank goodness Hyuk Mujin hadn’t heard that. I stepped into an empty room.

As befitted a pavilion belonging to the imperial palace, it was spacious, with a faint fragrance drifting among the antique furnishings.

Best of all, there’s no chance anyone’s bugging us.

Back in the modern world, I’d worried about being overheard whenever I had an important conversation. Murim was old-fashioned enough that I could talk without a care.

“Finally, I can breathe a little. Don’t you think?”

Hong Jin seemed to feel much the same way. He brought a lit candelabra over to the window to brighten the dark room, then sat down and spoke, looking tired.

“I’m sure you have a lot you want to ask me, Young Master Jin, but could I speak first?”

“Go ahead.”

“Don’t provoke him more than necessary. Whatever you do.”

He hadn’t said who he meant, but I knew at once.

“Baek Yeon?”

“That’s right. Baek Yeon, Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard. Keep as much distance between you and him as you can.”

I didn’t ask why. There was no need.

He commanded the Embroidered Uniform Guard, was an exceptionally skilled Supreme Peak master, and was the military officer the Son of Heaven trusted most.

Any one of those would have been reason enough for caution. All three together left nothing to discuss.

But…

“I think we’ve already gotten a little too close for that.”

Hong Jin sighed.

“I know. I saw everything with my own two eyes. I’m just asking you to be careful from now on.”

His worry showed in his expression, his voice, even the way he spoke.

The Hong Jin I knew had plenty of nerve. The East Depot, made up of eunuchs, was a ruthless organization that served as the Emperor's human-cleanup crew alongside the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

He seemed to have held a fairly high position there, so he must have been through all sorts of hell. He'd even sneered while dealing with Jeong Hogun and the other guards, and with the East Depot eunuchs.

Until Baek Yeon appeared.

"Is there another reason I don't know about?"

Hong Jin's answer made his concern clear.

"Thirty thousand. That's how many people Baek Yeon captured and killed in the last coup."

"…!"

"How did the fourth prince, already sidelined in the struggle for succession, manage to seize the throne of the Great Nation? Because he was exceptionally capable? No. That wasn't enough. He needed a cause, and he needed people. No one becomes the Son of Heaven by their own strength alone."

Hong Jin rushed through the words, then took a long-stemmed tobacco pipe from inside his clothes and put it to his mouth.

Before long, pungent smoke rose around him. His face looked especially dark through the haze as he continued.

"Baek Yeon was already head of the Embroidered Uniform Guard long before I entered the imperial palace. He had the late Emperor's full trust from a young age, and for a time, he even taught the Crown Prince martial arts."

"The Crown Prince—you mean the one…?"

"That's right. So when Baek Yeon helped the fourth prince stage a coup, everyone was stunned. No one thought he, of all people, would betray the late Emperor and the Crown Prince."

Hoooo.

Smoke curled up from Hong Jin's lips. Through the pale haze, it was almost as if the past he remembered were passing before him.

"It began in an instant and was over just as quickly. They moved so secretly that even the East Depot couldn't do a thing. No—perhaps it's more accurate to say we were caught off guard because we never saw it coming."

The coup began in the dead of night and was over around dawn.

The pounding of hooves echoed across the Imperial Capital until daybreak, and the screams never stopped.

"The coup was… perfect enough to make your skin crawl. Every civil and military official had gathered to celebrate His Majesty the Emperor's birthday, along with members of the imperial family from every corner of the land. Security was tighter than ever against any possible threat. Except for one thing."

This wasn't some village headman's birthday. It was the birthday of the Emperor, ruler of an entire continent.

I could almost see it all before me: the packed crowds that day, and the dazzling golden armor of the guards who had sealed off the imperial palace.

"…The Embroidered Uniform Guard. They were in charge of the palace defenses."

Hong Jin gave a bitter smile and nodded.

"Yes. That's right."

Everything had been prepared down to the last detail.

Baek Yeon and the guards who followed him took control of the imperial palace in an instant. As everyone looked on in shock, the fourth prince alone rose to his feet and stepped onto the stage prepared for him, his expression calm.

It was the moment the history of the Great Nation changed.

"And then… the purge began."

The unexpected spectacle was over, but no one left their seats. No—no one could leave.

The people who had arrived as nothing more than spectators were forced to become actors in the next performance.

"Those who submitted at once survived. Those who resisted were dragged off to the prisons controlled by the Embroidered Uniform Guard. The imperial family had it a little better, at least. At first, they were only confined."

The Emperor—no, the late Emperor—was already old. He was locked inside his residence. The Crown Prince and his wife, and the rest of the imperial family, were no exception.

They endured day after day under relentless watch, trembling at the screams that rang out day and night beyond the high walls surrounding them.

Waiting for their turn to come.

"Countless people died in the process. More families than anyone could count were wiped out. And…"

Hong Jin let his voice trail off before adding, "The man who led the purge was the Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard. No—the Blood Envoy, Baek Yeon."

"The Blood Envoy…"

"Every time I hear it, I think how well that sobriquet suits him. Don't you?"

Hong Jin's lips curled into a smile, but it was feeble and vanished almost immediately.

"Young Master Jin. Back then, I couldn't do anything. I failed to detect the treason, so I was incompetent as a subject. And all I could do was watch it happen, so I was powerless. But one thing hasn't changed, then or now."

Tap.

Hong Jin knocked the ash from his pipe. He looked up as if he could see through the ceiling to where the young prince lay sleeping, then continued.

"I must protect His Highness Prince Shangshan. That was the late Emperor's final wish. It's also the last act of loyalty I can offer as a servant who was both incompetent and powerless."

His voice fell silent.

In the heavy silence, I turned over what he'd told me, then spoke abruptly.

"I'm not sure that's really loyalty."

"Hmm?"

"A subject wanting to protect his lord and a parent worrying about a child are two different things. And from what I've seen of you, Deputy Military Commissioner, it's more like the latter."

"What are you trying to say?"

"It's simple. His Highness Prince Shangshan isn't just a child who needs someone to protect him."

Hong Jin sighed.

"Young Master Jin, I'm sorry, but he's still young. He's only thirteen."

"That's right. Only thirteen—and already able to make the Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, a man whose influence could knock birds from the sky, bow his head. Already able to keep his composure while people die right in front of him."

"…!"

Sometimes. Maybe even fairly often.

People caught up in their personal feelings make the wrong call.

Even if that person is a eunuch from the East Depot who's been through hell and back.

I held Hong Jin's frozen gaze and continued.

"His Highness Prince Shangshan isn't a child who needs someone else to protect him. He's been a king for a long time already. He just hasn't fully come into his own yet."

"Young Master Jin, you…"

"If all he wanted was to survive, he could throw himself at the Emperor's feet tomorrow and beg for his life. He could plead that he had no idea what crime he'd committed and ask to be spared just this once. Assuming, of course, that his desperate plea stirs the Emperor's tender heart."

"…!"

"But you have something else in mind, don't you, Deputy Military Commissioner?"

Hong Jin stared at me, his face set, then asked in a dry voice, "What makes you think that?"

“At a time when you should be bending over backward to please the Emperor, you dared to bring martial-world ruffians into the imperial palace. You dared to speak provocatively in front of the East Depot and the Embroidered Uniform Guard. And…”

I suddenly turned around and continued slowly.

“Late tonight, you brought an uninvited guest all the way here without the Embroidered Uniform Guard noticing.”

At that moment—

Fwoosh. Whoosh.

The three candles Hong Jin had lit when he entered the room went out at once.

I looked from Hong Jin to the black figure that had appeared out of thin air, then back again.

“So, when are you going to introduce us?”

Chapter 866

An uninvited guest turning up at night was never welcome.

Especially when he was a Supreme Peak master with extraordinary concealment techniques.

“Young Master Jin, I know it’s late, but let me introduce you. This is…”

“No need. I barged in without permission, so the least I can do is introduce myself.”

Slide.

The stranger interrupted Hong Jin and pulled down his mask, revealing a smooth, clean-shaven face.

His build was so androgynous it was hard to guess his gender, and he looked a good ten years younger than Hong Jin.

Then there was his martial prowess. He had reached Supreme Peak.

Put all those clues together, and it wasn’t hard to guess who the uninvited guest was.

“The East Depot?”

The stranger nodded.

“You’ve got a sharp eye.”

As if turning up uninvited weren’t enough, he was talking down to me, too.

I didn’t like it, but in a way, that made things easier.

I could do the same.

“Well, if I couldn’t figure out that much, I might as well go die.”

“And you don’t hold back when you speak.”

“Think my mouth’s the only thing I don’t hold back?”

“Good. Very good.”

The stranger smiled soundlessly and clasped his hands in a formal salute.

“Let me introduce myself properly. I’m Ma Sanbao, Brush-Holding Eunuch of the East Depot.”

Brush-Holding Eunuch of the East Depot? Ma Sanbao?

The title sounded important enough, but his name was on the level of Gaettong from next door.

Hong Jin saw the question in my eyes and spoke up.

“The Brush-Holding Eunuch is the East Depot’s second-in-command. In terms of rank, he comes right after the Chief Eunuch.”

I stared at the stranger—or rather, Ma Sanbao.

His position was more impressive than I'd imagined, but I was even more curious why a big shot like the East Depot's second-in-command had come here in secret at this late hour.

Especially after I'd seen how that old eunuch treated Hong Jin earlier.

"Hadn't you already fallen out with the East Depot? Judging by what happened earlier, things didn't look good between you."

Ma Sanbao laughed again, though I'd asked Hong Jin.

"You're certainly no ordinary young man. To bring that up so casually right in front of me…"

"I wasn't asking you."

"Doesn't matter. I'm glad it looked that way. If even someone on our side was fooled, the Embroidered Uniform Guard won't suspect a thing."

Fooled?

I stopped short and looked at Hong Jin.

"…That was an act? All of it?"

"To be precise, it was planned from the start. But I wouldn't call it an act. He's disliked me for a long time."

Ma Sanbao nodded at Hong Jin's answer.

"Mm. A long time. More than thirty years, if I remember right."

"You chose your man well, Ma Constable. Or should I call you Eunuch Ma now?"

"My, you've grown even more mischievous since I last saw you. A man like me would never have dared dream of taking your place. I've only been keeping it for you."

"Not at all."

Hong Jin's answer was firm.

"You're more than qualified for that position. You were then, and you are now."

"…Good grief. Come to think of it, I forgot to greet you."

Shaking his head, Ma Sanbao patted Hong Jin's shoulder. His face held equal parts bitterness and joy.

"Even if the timing couldn't be worse, I'm glad to see you again, even like this."

"Likewise."

Watching two men without balls have an emotional reunion, I felt hot tears begin to run down my face—

No, I didn't.

An emotional reunion, my ass.

They hadn't even told me what was going on. Why the hell would I cry?

Still, even I had to admit there was something heartwarming about the sight of them gripping each other's shoulders.

And beyond the sentiment, Ma Sanbao was the East Depot's second-in-command.

Nothing in their conversation so far had sounded like bad news.

A secret pact.

They must have arranged this beforehand. I just didn't know where it had begun or how far it went.

I didn't have to wait long for an explanation. The two finished their brief reunion and took turns speaking.

"Eunuch Ma and I are from the same cohort. We first set foot in the imperial palace on the same day."

"And got cut on the same day, too. Remember? You were right ahead of me in line."

"Was I?"

"I remember it clearly. You didn't let out a single scream. I thought you were one tough bastard."

I listened for a moment, then asked, feeling queasy. My tone was a little more polite than before.

"Um, when you say you both got cut on the same day…"

"What else would it be? That."

"That's right. That."

"…Oh."

I'd suspected as much, but was this for real?

Ball buddies.

So this was the amazing imperial palace.

Childhood buddies? Coworkers who'd started on the same day? Neither could hold a candle to these two.

They'd been cut together before entering the palace. Their bond had to be on a whole other level.

"We joined the East Depot around the same time and rose through the ranks together."

"That sounds about right. Except you were always one step ahead of me."

"At times, perhaps. But Cang Gong always trusted you most, Eunuch Ma. And when it came to martial arts talent, no one in the East Depot could match you. Certainly not me."

I didn't know how much of their conversation was true, but it suddenly struck me that Hong Jin's assessment of Ma Sanbao's martial arts was probably not exaggerated in the slightest.

The qi I'd sensed from Ma Sanbao the moment I saw him was in no way inferior to mine or Baek Yeon's.

Of course, internal energy isn't everything.

I muttered to myself and looked Ma Sanbao over from head to toe.

His height. The length of his arms and legs. Which muscles were especially developed, and what weapon he might use.

At this point, it was practically an occupational hazard bordering on a mental disorder. But sizing up someone I'd just met was an important habit.

Provided I didn't needlessly offend him.

"Young man, you've got a remarkably keen eye."

At Ma Sanbao's sudden remark, I clicked my tongue inwardly.

"I was about to say the same about you."

"What, surprised I noticed so quickly?"

"Mm. A little."

"An old habit. I may not be a Murim martial artist like you, but I have to stay alert wherever I go."

I'd examined him as discreetly as possible, in a fraction of a second—too quickly for him to have noticed.

Yet Ma Sanbao had caught me while talking with Hong Jin. His Qi Sense was better than that of most Supreme Peak masters.

So this is the East Depot.

The East Depot and the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

I'd already heard what these two organizations, collectively known as the Changwei, did.

Assassination of important figures. Surveillance, intelligence gathering, and more.

They were intelligence agents trained to the limit, skilled assassins, and soldiers.

And with the Son of Heaven's dazzling authority behind them, I'd heard they also served as a law enforcement agency.

Their influence and military strength had to be immense.

Even the low-ranking Embroidered Uniform Guard and East Depot eunuchs I've seen were no ordinary people.

"No ordinary people" didn't begin to cover it.

Even the weakest were Supreme First Rate, and more than half were Peak masters.

On the way to the imperial palace, I'd seen hundreds of Peak masters with my own eyes.

If those were only a fraction of their forces, what they had yet to reveal was terrifying.

And if the imperial palace joined hands with Dark Heaven—if, by some chance, it really came to that…

A cold shiver ran up my spine. My face, reflected in Ma Sanbao's eyes, had stiffened without me noticing.

"You're wary of me."

"Let's call it questions rather than wariness. For now."

"For now?"

"I don't need you to tell me you two are close. What I want to know is that there still seem to be a lot of facts I haven't heard."

"Yes, I suppose there is."

Ma Sanbao dropped into an empty chair and continued.

"How much do I need to tell you to answer your questions?"

"Everything. From beginning to end."

"Everything would take too long to tell tonight. But there's one thing I should tell you first."

"Let's hear it, then."

"About a month ago, I sent someone a secret letter. It said that some members of the Embroidered Uniform Guard were heading north under concealed identities. I also included my own suspicion that they were bound for Shanxi Province."

Hong Jin picked up the story quietly.

"Thanks to the information Eunuch Ma sent me, I had time to prepare, even if it wasn't much. Asking Young Master Jin for help was a decision I made after careful thought."

"…!"

This was news to me.

I'd assumed Hong Jin had chosen me because he was desperate and had no one else to turn to.

But I was wrong.

Hong Jin had thought it through carefully and asked me for help.

And through it all, someone had been helping him from behind the scenes.

No matter how capable Hong Jin was, he couldn't keep track of everything happening in the imperial capital from over ten thousand li[3328] away.

But the East Depot's second-in-command could.

The East Depot had spies planted throughout the land, watching for any movement. There was no question they'd know what was happening in the imperial capital—their own front yard.

That still didn't answer everything.

"I understand that you helped save His Highness Prince Shangshan. But…"

"I think I know what you're going to say. Yes, you're right. I've sworn loyalty to His Majesty."

Ma Sanbao spoke before I could continue. Then, in a low voice, he added:

"Not the traitor sitting on the throne now. The late Emperor."

[3328] A Chinese li is approximately 500 m (0.311 mi); ten thousand li is about 5,000 km (3,100 mi).

"…!"

"Do you know why I've remained in the imperial palace all this time? How I've managed it?"

Tap. Tap.

Drops of blood fell through the gaps in his white-knuckled fist. The East Depot's second-in-command went on in a sharp voice unlike any I'd heard from him before.

"Because there was something I had to do. Because I had to endure whatever hardships came and wait for my moment…!"

He couldn't shout the words aloud. The cry struck the internal energy I'd spread around us and faded away.

Ma Sanbao's lips trembled as he let emotions hidden for more than a decade show on his face.

He looked at his longtime friend and spoke in a voice seething with feeling.

"Hong Jin. Hong Constable. My friend and comrade. The time has finally come. We can't put it off any longer."

"Eunuch Ma. You don't mean…"

"I do."

Rumble.

A thunderous boom rang out without warning, and the dark sky blazed with light. Rain poured and lightning flashed beyond the window behind Ma Sanbao as he ground out the words.

"Let's set right, with our own hands, the sky that traitor has thrown into chaos."

Chapter 867

Rumble.

Thunder rolled across the sky. As dazzling lightning flashed and torrential rain came pouring down, the palace attendants hurried about.

Eunuchs and palace maids scurried toward the quarters of the consorts they served, worried that rainwater might be leaking in. The Embroidered Uniform Guards stationed throughout the imperial palace stood their ground beneath their broad-brimmed hats.

Everyone who worked in the imperial palace had a role to play.

Do your job well, and you were rewarded. Fail to, and you were punished.

Yet one man strolled through the relentless downpour at his leisure. He was one of the few people in this vast palace who needn't concern himself with rewards or punishments.

No—in fact, it was closer to the opposite.

He wielded such immense authority that he could reward or punish others without the Son of Heaven's approval.

And yet no palace attendant dared try to catch his eye or get close to him.

Not even the rain pouring ceaselessly down at that very moment.

Whoosh.

Though he walked through the downpour, not a drop of water touched him.

His half-white hair, tousled as it pleased, was bone-dry. His golden armor, polished with oil-treated cloth, still gleamed brilliantly.

It was a strange, almost unreal sight, but then, he was no ordinary man.

Immense authority wasn't all he possessed.

Raw power.

Martial prowess far beyond the limits of human ability.

He had the power to make the unreal real. With an important meeting ahead of him, he simply didn't want to get wet.

Vwoom.

The air trembled with his profound internal energy. Rain struck an invisible barrier and scattered in every direction, unable to touch him.

"It's been quiet lately, but now it's really coming down…"

Muttering as he looked up at the sky flashing with lightning, the man resumed his steps. No one dared stand in his way.

No one had in the past. No one did now. And no one would in the future.

Clank. Rumble.

The mere sight of him approaching from afar was enough.

The Embroidered Uniform Guards peered out from beneath their deeply lowered hats. Without a moment's hesitation, they opened the firmly shut gates and kept their heads bowed until he had passed.

The same was true of those quietly performing their duties out of sight.

"Open the way."

At his sudden command, the vast garden, filled with all manner of rare flowers and plants, shimmered like a heat haze.

Whoosh.

Even the foreign trees and flowers that had stood tall against the fierce wind and rain lowered their heads.

Thick leaves and branches slid aside, revealing a hidden path where only those granted permission could set foot.

Beautiful flowers have thorns.

The imperial palace's gardens were no different. An unwelcome guest fooled by their beauty into stepping inside would find himself surrounded by countless mechanisms and formations and riddled with holes.

And it wasn't just the gardens.

The imperial palace itself was a den of dangers, a demon-slaying battleground—a mountain of sabers and a forest of swords in the truest sense.

Anyone without permission would die.

Even someone whose martial prowess reached the heavens could not be sure of surviving.

As the man passed through five gates and dozens of pavilions, he was reminded of that once more. At last, he reached his destination and stopped.

Qianqing Palace.

Beneath a signboard inscribed in a bold, soaring hand, two middle-aged men stood like iron towers. They lowered their heads in greeting.

"You've arrived."

"You've arrived."

Their voices and expressions were as alike as if they were one person.

Their faces, too, made it plain they had been born of the same womb on the same day.

The twins continued politely.

"Please wait a moment."

"Please wait a moment."

The man frowned. Not because they were speaking in unison again, despite how many times he had told them not to, but because of the strong smell of blood coming from them.

"Looks like you had a guest."

“Yes.”

“Yes.”

“Did you kill him? Who was behind it?”

“He took his own life just before we could capture him.”

“He took his own life just before—”

“Enough. How many times have I told you once is enough? So you failed to take the intruder alive?”

The twins blinked at him, looking unsure what to do, then mumbled under their breath.

“He had a potent poison hidden beneath one of his molars.”

“He had a potent poison hidden—no, we did everything we could, but we couldn’t stop him. We beg your forgiveness.”

The man clicked his tongue softly.

The fact that the intruder had made it this far was proof of his extraordinary martial prowess.

Failing to capture him and learn who was behind him was a painful mistake, but something mattered more than reprimanding the twins right now.

“Don’t tell me he got inside the palace.”

“Of course not.”

“Of course not.”

At least that’s a relief. The man asked another question.

“Is he inside?”

“He’s waiting.”

“He’s waiting.”

The man nodded, glanced up at the signboard, then stepped forward.

Qianqing Palace. Qianqing—“clear sky.” Those two characters seemed a poor fit for today.

Step. Step.

The palace interior was quiet.

Not a person—or even a rat—could be seen. Only the countless paintings and works of art hanging on the walls glimmered in the faint light.

But what he could see wasn’t everything.

With every step, the man felt eyes following him. Shadows ready to rush out and cut him to pieces if he posed even the slightest threat, whoever he might be.

At last, he stopped. Before him was a vast space prepared for one person alone, and there its master waited.

No—the master of all under heaven.

“I, Baek Yeon, Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, have come at the summons of Your Majesty, the august Emperor.”

At that moment—

Rustle.

The colorful silk curtains draped around the room stirred.

Through the thin silk, amid wisps of faintly fragrant smoke, he glimpsed the back of someone dressed in dazzling white.

“You’ve come.”

A quiet voice echoed through the room. At first, it sounded calm, almost languid.

The Son of Heaven of the Great Nation continued slowly, as if speaking to himself.

“I had a bad dream. A dream that someone was trying to harm me.”

“…!”

“I fought for a long time, covered in blood. They came at me from somewhere, without end, and I cut them down without end. Only when I finally woke did I realize it hadn’t been a mere dream.”

Baek Yeon raised his head in silence. Pale smoke drifted from between the Son of Heaven’s lips.

“So you’ve turned to poppy again.”

“Does this look like poppy to you?”

“Forgive me, but that is exactly what it looks like to me.”

“You’re wrong. This isn’t poppy. It’s medicine—the only thing that can heal me.”

Baek Yeon’s brow twitched.

“Your Majesty, may I speak with you about something important?”

The Son of Heaven didn’t answer. Instead, he flicked his long, wide sleeve.

Swish.

With a faint rustle, the presences surrounding them withdrew like the tide. Baek Yeon straightened from his bow, his voice cold.

“Your Majesty, with the great undertaking nearly complete, why would you disgrace yourself like this?”

If anyone else had been there, they would have covered their eyes and ears.

Baek Yeon’s tone was far too sharp for a subject speaking to his ruler. It was more than insolent—it was defiant.

Yet the Son of Heaven didn’t answer this time, either. The ruler of the world gave a low laugh instead. Only after a long while did he speak.

“The great undertaking. Yes. There was a great undertaking.”

“Please don’t forget the promise we made that day.”

“Forget?”

The Son of Heaven muttered with a short, incredulous laugh.

“I haven’t forgotten. Not for a single moment since that day.”

His voice was as weak as a sick man’s.

But Baek Yeon’s eyes, fixed on the Son of Heaven, didn’t waver. They were sunk deep and steady.

“They’ve already begun to move. Before everything falls apart, remember that you must put things back where they belong.”

After a brief silence, the Son of Heaven nodded quietly.

He had come too far to turn back. Once no more than the fourth prince, he now ruled all under heaven. And he had become a man who could no longer get by without poppy.

Wasn’t it said that a horse racing across the wilderness never looked back?

Even the Son of Heaven, who stood above all people, was no exception.

He was a horse that could no longer stop of its own will. Even if it collapsed coughing up blood, it had to keep running toward its destination.

Crack.

His hand clenched instinctively, snapping the ornate long-stemmed tobacco pipe. The Son of Heaven stared at the broken pieces in his palm, then closed his fist tightly around them.

Thump.

The rough pieces dug into his palm. Pain flared like a burn, and little by little, his mind began to clear.

“Ah.”

As if worshiping the heavens, the Son of Heaven tilted his head back toward the ceiling and groaned with his eyes closed.

Baek Yeon watched impassively.

“Shall I call for the imperial physician?”

“No need. Not for an imperial physician.”

The Son of Heaven opened his eyes and continued, his voice clearer now.

“Tomorrow, I’ll meet that child in the audience hall.”

“That child would be…”

“Zhu Bao. I wonder how much my… only younger brother has grown.”

Baek Yeon nodded.

“You can look forward to it. He’s grown even more than Your Majesty expects.”

“Which means he’s become even more dangerous.”

“…”

Baek Yeon pressed his lips together, but the Son of Heaven understood.

All sorts of bugs gather around a tempting meal.

Now that Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao had appeared in the Imperial Capital, the enemies who resented him would surely draw the blades they had kept hidden beneath their sleeves.

Just like the nameless assassin who had come here before Baek Yeon today.

“Baek Yeon, this must never happen again. Remember that.”

His voice was different now, cold as ice. Baek Yeon faltered, then answered with a faint smile.

“I will engrave Your Majesty’s words into my bones. Please forgive my disloyalty until now.”

Flutter.

In response, the Son of Heaven merely waved his sleeve. Baek Yeon turned and began walking away.

After only a few steps, he stopped.

“And what of that man?”

“If you mean…”

“Zhu Bao. The Murim martial artist who came with him.”

The Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung.

Baek Yeon thought carefully about the man who had suddenly come to mind. A long while passed before he spoke.

“I don’t know.”

He had interrogated and killed tens of thousands on the battlefield, and tens of thousands more in the imperial palace.

But that was the best answer Baek Yeon could give.

Chapter 868

The night Ma Sanbao came to see me, I couldn't sleep.

It wasn't just the rain, pouring down as if the heavens had decided to empty themselves, or the lightning crashing all around us.

My last conversation with Ma Sanbao kept replaying in my head. He'd vanished as suddenly as he'd appeared.

I need your help.

When he first said it, I couldn't bring myself to answer.

This was a plot against the throne. There was no denying it.

If I agreed and things went wrong, no one could say what would happen afterward. With the imperial family involved, they wouldn't treat it as one man's wrongdoing.

I wouldn't pay the price for failure as the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung. I'd pay it as Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. That weighed heavily on me.

What happens if this fails?

You already know, don't you?

…

Fail, and you're a traitor. Succeed, and you're the Son of Heaven. In the latter case, wealth and glory beyond anyone else's reach await you. In the former, you'll suffer worse than you would in hell.

I'd fought countless battles and brought down more enemies than I could count.

Some had been weak enough to handle with one finger. Others had frightened me so badly I couldn't move a finger.

But… this was different.

The Great Nation ruled the world, and the Son of Heaven ruled the Great Nation. To rebel against the Son of Heaven meant fighting the world itself.

Not just me. Everyone around me.

Think carefully. Of course, since you set foot in the imperial palace to protect His Highness Prince Shangshan, it may already be too late.

Are you threatening me?

No. I'm telling you the truth.

Ma Sanbao, the East Depot's second-in-command. I could still see the cold, piercing look in his eyes and hear the low voice in which he'd spoken.

How many people do you think died in the last coup? Tens of thousands were made to drink poison, died for unknown reasons on the road to exile, were torn limb from limb in the marketplace, or had their heads put on display. And those are only the deaths the world knows about. How many were never brought to light? How many of those people had nothing to do with it, just like you?

…!

"They call it 'calling a deer a horse.' In the end, everything depends on the Emperor's will. Just as a perfectly ordinary deer can become a horse, you can be made a traitor. Remember that."

History had proven how fickle and suspicious those in power could be.

And the current Son of Heaven was undeniably a tyrant. A usurper who had defied the natural order and climbed to the throne through blood, a ruler who wielded absolute power.

Hearing Ma Sanbao say it, I began to realize what that meant.

Whether I became a traitor might already be out of my hands.

Of course, I won't deny that I had a hand in their deaths. No—I led the way. I had to survive, whatever it took. I had to stay here and wait for the right moment.

Some had left the imperial palace to serve their young master. Others had remained to welcome him back one day.

Hong Jin was one of the former. Ma Sanbao was one of the latter.

He became the fourth prince's—no, the new Emperor's—hunting dog.

He was one of the cruelest of them, sinking his teeth into his targets' necks without mercy. He survived that brutal purge and rose to become the East Depot's second-in-command, its Brush-Holding Eunuch.

And Ma Sanbao wasn't the only one who had survived that way.

The night we all gathered, Cang Gong said that if the East Depot had been a flower blooming in the dark until then, we had to become weeds from that day on.

Flowers were bright and beautiful whether there was light or not.

Weeds weren't. No one spared a glance for plain, nameless grass. And because of that, it survived longer.

Cang Gong, the East Depot's head and its Seal-Holding Eunuch, had urged his like-minded comrades to survive as weeds. He kept urging them until the illness brought on by his long years finally laid him low.

Five years ago, after Cang Gong took to his sickbed, I began leading everyone. That was when I started drawing up the pledge.

The pledge.

Clear proof that the traitors had signed their names in their own blood—and perhaps a record of the names of the meritorious officials who would one day enthrone a new Son of Heaven.

Ma Sanbao had mentioned the pledge before he left. Then he'd said something that was bound to keep me awake all night.

Dark Heaven. I know about the people throwing Murim into turmoil. Probably far more about them than you imagine, and in far greater detail.

…!

Even if you leave now, I won't try to stop you. But if you help us enthrone His Highness Prince Shangshan and put a new order in place… we'll have to give you a fitting reward.

Ma Sanbao left, Hong Jin returned to the young prince's side, and I stayed where I was, lost in thought.

Until the first light of dawn reached the window. Until the rain began to let up and day broke in the distance.

And right up to this moment.

"Fuck."

At my sudden curse, Hyuk Mujin jolted awake from where he'd been nodding off in a corner. He sprang to his feet and fumbled for the sword in his arms, eyes still half shut.

"Are we under attack? An attack? You bastards! Who the hell dares—"

"Mujin."

"Yes?"

"Go to sleep."

"Yes."

Hyuk Mujin flopped back down as if nothing had happened and was asleep again in no time.

The trip to the imperial capital must have been exhausting, but sleeping in that position for four whole shichen[3329] was a talent in itself.

Snore.

…

Still, snoring crossed the line.

Whack!

"Ugh! You bastards! No one lays a finger on the Captain!"

"Mujin."

"Yes?"

"If you're supposed to be standing guard and you sleep that soundly, they could lay hands on every part of me except one hair."

"Gasp! Someone's already laid a hand on you, Captain? No, you don't have to tell me. It was Hong Jin, wasn't it? I knew it. The way he's always looked at you was lecherous…"

"Mujin. You little shit…!"

[3329] A traditional time division of about two hours. Four shichen is about eight hours.

I groaned from the depths of my soul.

Of all people, this idiot was my right-hand man—or rather, my pinky toe.

Things were serious enough as it was, and with him like this, I'd hit a proper moment of clarity. At this point, I was starting to wonder if Dark Heaven had sent him as an ascension-to-immortality hitman to make sure I left this world early.

No System. No one I can rely on right now, either.

Thinking about it, I'd been pretty lucky until now.

The System had always pointed me toward where I needed to go, even if it did so vaguely through Quests. And whenever I wavered, Jeok Cheongang had been a sturdy pillar I could trust and lean on.

Now I had neither.

Everything that happened from here on would depend on the choice I made.

Fail, and you're a traitor. Succeed, and you're the Son of Heaven.

Ma Sanbao's words echoed in my ears. So did what he'd said at the end.

Dark Heaven. I know about the people throwing Murim into turmoil. Probably far more about them than you imagine, and in far greater detail.

What exactly did he know? How had he learned so much? What connection was there between the information he'd uncovered about Dark Heaven and the Son of Heaven, and how dangerous was it?

I'd wanted to stop Ma Sanbao, who seemed determined to leave, and press him for more answers. But I held back, imagining the Embroidered Uniform Guard receiving a Buster Call[3330] and rushing over the moment I caused a commotion.

Or maybe I'd let him go because I was still trying to grasp the weight of what he'd said afterward.

Reward. A reward…

I turned the word over in my mind.

Ma Sanbao had been clear. If I helped them enthrone Prince Shangshan as the new Son of Heaven, they would give me a fitting reward.

And since he'd mentioned Dark Heaven first, it wasn't hard to guess what he meant.

The imperial family—the Great Nation—helps the Murim Alliance wipe out Dark Heaven.

People didn't say the government and Murim must not interfere with each other for nothing. The Great Nation had never involved itself deeply in Murim's affairs.

No, looking at things now, the reason was obvious.

It never had a reason to.

[3330] A reference to One Piece, in which a Buster Call summons a large-scale military attack.

There was no need to count the forces across the entire world. A million elite troops were stationed near the imperial capital alone, and I'd seen hundreds of Peak masters with my own eyes.

And if you included the forces that hadn't yet come to light—especially the Supreme Peak masters…

The imperial capital alone is already far stronger than the Murim Alliance.

Of course, most of the Great Nation's strength was concentrated there.

All the wars, including invasions by foreign peoples, had ended long ago. The emperors of a unified dynasty had no reason to give the City Lords and vassal princes scattered across the land more military power than they needed.

They had simply watched from atop those enormous, solid walls.

Watched the fierce struggle for power inside another enclosure, the one people called Murim, which stood within the Great Nation's own borders.

Even during the Great Faction War, they had watched.

But if that Great Nation took the Murim Alliance's side…

The scales of victory would tip in an instant.

Until now, the fight had been between the Central Plains' Murim and Dark Heaven. If the Great Nation joined in, Dark Heaven would become an external enemy hated by all under heaven.

I still couldn't gauge Dark Heaven's full strength. But the weight carried by the words "Great Nation" was immense and undeniable.

There was, of course, one fatal problem.

What if we failed?

High risk. High reward.

Fail, and you're a traitor. Succeed, and you're the Son of Heaven.

I felt as though I were standing at the edge of a cliff.

I could gain the Son of Heaven's wings and soar above the clouds. Or the Son of Heaven could break both my legs and send me tumbling over the edge.

Not just me. Everyone.

Snore.

…

Right. Including this idiot.

"…Mujin. You little shit."

Hyuk Mujin opened his eyes naturally and spoke.

"I wasn't asleep."

"Is that so?"

"Yes."

"Then why were you snoring so damn loud? The Embroidered Uniform Guard will be up here to haul you away soon. Your snoring woke the Emperor."

“I’m serious.”

“How are you going to prove it?”

Hyuk Mujin’s eyes darted around before he answered.

“I’ll stake Hong Jin’s balls on it.”

…

This idiot was trying to stake something that didn’t exist.

Before I could think of a reply, a familiar metallic sound came from outside the window.

Clack. Clack.

Orderly movement. A sharp aura.

The Embroidered Uniform Guard.

Hyuk Mujin stared at the golden-armored guards entering the pavilion and asked, wide-eyed,

“Did the Emperor really wake up because of me?”

…

Should I really kill him?

I let out a deep sigh.

“Go bring His Highness Prince Shangshan.”

It looked like the time had come.

Chapter 869

After hurrying Hyuk Mujin upstairs, I blocked the Embroidered Uniform Guards who had come to the pavilion at the crack of dawn.

Then I flashed a broad smile at the first familiar face I spotted.

“Oh, fancy seeing you again.”

So much for the old saying that nobody spits in a smiling face.

Jeong Hogun didn’t so much as twitch an eyebrow, even when I waved at him like an old friend.

“Where is His Highness Prince Shangshan?”

I shrugged. “He was asleep until just now. Before a bunch of rude bastards barged in at the crack of dawn.”

“It is already the hour of the Rabbit. That is by no means early in the imperial palace.”

The hour of the Rabbit meant five to seven in the morning.

I was itching to explain children’s rights to this man, who was built like a Stone Golem, but when in Rome, you did as the Romans did.

Though, of course, it was the Son of Heaven’s will—above every law in the Great Nation—that had set the Embroidered Uniform Guard in motion so early.

“What brings you here?”

“I have no obligation to tell you.”

“Then let me guess. Is it finally time for the brothers to reunite?”

At that, Jeong Hogun reacted. His eyebrow twitched so sharply I could see it from where I stood.

“His Highness Prince Shangshan is to have an audience with His Majesty the Emperor.”

“Right. In four characters: a reunion of brothers.”

“You’re a lawless thug from the martial world, so it seems you can’t understand. This is not merely a reunion between brothers. It’s…”

“Oh, I get it.”

I nodded with a solemn expression.

“A somewhat complicated reunion of brothers. Right?”

“…”

“Not quite? Too long? How about a chaotic reunion of brothers? One character shorter, but pretty much the same thing.”

Jeong Hogun took a deep breath, as if trying to calm himself, then spoke in a stiff voice.

"…You'd be wise to watch that insolent mouth of yours before you bring down trouble you can't handle."

"Whoa, are you warning me? Didn't you hear your commander promise our prince yesterday that nothing like that would happen?"

"That was…"

"Judging by your face, you just remembered. If you understand, then let's do better from now on. Don't go making trouble for no reason. Okay?"

I smiled and patted Jeong Hogun's armor. Behind him, killing intent rose like a heat haze from the Embroidered Uniform Guards standing like iron towers.

Whoosh.

Now, that was some atmosphere.

Maybe I'd gotten under their skin more than I needed to. But in my experience, people like him only showed even a hint of what they were thinking when you provoked them like this.

Just like now.

"You don't want to cause trouble either, do you? Especially when you're this tired. Isn't that right, Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan?"

What?

"You look rather tired. As if you didn't get much sleep last night."

Anyone with half a brain could tell Jeong Hogun hadn't tossed out that remark without a reason.

I looked into his calmly lowered eyes and the blade hidden in them, thinking to myself:

Well, look at this guy…

From the start, he'd given me the strong impression that he knew something.

But the deeper you thought, the longer you stayed silent—and that only gave your opponent more reason to suspect you.

Knowing that, I made a show of furrowing my brow.

"You need to feel comfortable to get any sleep. Could you sleep soundly with a bunch of menacing men surrounding you on every side?"

"They are not surrounding you. They are guarding His Highness Prince Shangshan."

"Does the imperial palace write 'guard' but pronounce it 'surround'?"

"That isn't worth answering."

"Then don't answer. Oh, while we're on the subject, let me ask you something else…"

I scratched the back of my head and went on.

"In this imperial palace ruled by His August Majesty the Emperor, what exactly are you guarding His Highness from?"

"…!"

"No, the more I think about it, the stranger it gets. If you're guarding him, there are already soldiers everywhere. I don't see why the Embroidered Uniform Guard needs to keep watch this closely, too. And if you're surrounding him, that makes no sense either."

Checkmate. A perfect one, too.

Either answer would leave him in an awkward position.

If he said they were guarding the prince, then as I'd said, there was no reason for all this. If he said they were surrounding him, that would be as good as admitting that the Embroidered Uniform Guard was monitoring Prince Shangshan on the Son of Heaven's orders.

Faced with an essay question that led to a dead end either way, Jeong Hogun chose silence.

Getting under the skin of someone who'd run out of things to say was my specialty.

"I asked you something, but you've gone quiet."

"…"

"If it were Baek Yeon, I bet he'd give me a straight answer. Are you keeping your mouth shut because you haven't made the rank yet?"

"…"

"People really have to get ahead in life. When's your next promotion? Do you get annual leave or sick days? If I cause trouble, does that mess up your performance review?"

"…"

"Honestly, you were surprised when your commander suddenly killed one of his subordinates yesterday, weren't you? Is he always that reckless? I won't tell anyone, so just whisper it to me. My earlobes are sensitive, though, so whispering's a little awkward. Just use Sound Transmission once."

Thrilling. Always fresh. Getting under someone's skin was the best.

I had no idea who'd won this year's Ballon d'Or,[3331] but I wasn't about to miss out on the Mouth d'Or.

I let my tongue run wild, trying to pry out as much information as I could, and needled Jeong Hogun relentlessly.

I started with gossip about his superior, Baek Yeon, then moved on to promotion woes, a working person's headache. I asked about the Embroidered Uniform Guard's average salary and overtime pay, then about what kind of hazing culture they had.

In short, I went after everyone but the Emperor.

[3331] The Ballon d'Or is an annual award recognizing leading football players.

Jeong Hogun held out far longer than I'd expected. He finally opened his mouth after I asked whether the Embroidered Uniform Guard's chow was any good—and started digging into his family tree.

"That's enough… Give it a rest."

I could feel his superhuman patience in the one breath he took between words. I nodded with a touch of respect, then replied,

"So you're still an unmarried bachelor, then?"

"…!"

"Don't get me wrong. I'm not criticizing you for being unmarried at your age. I mean, I'm not your parents. And staying single isn't so bad—you won't ruin someone else's life. So don't let it get you down. Keep your pecker—no, your shoulders—up…"

"You son of a bitch!"

To be precise, the shout I heard just then didn't come from Jeong Hogun.

One of the Embroidered Uniform Guards under him, whose face had been changing colors like a seven-hued rainbow for a while now, had finally lost his temper and charged at me.

Or, more accurately, he took one step forward before someone stopped him.

Thud.

"Enough. I won't say it twice."

A calloused palm stopped the guard's golden armor in its tracks. The voice that followed was low and heavy.

The guard recognized the hand as belonging to the very superior I'd just insulted.

"Thousand Captain! How can you let that bastard—"

Whack!

One punch, delivered with a heavy yet swift movement—brief, precise, and ruthlessly efficient.

Jeong Hogun's fist caught the Embroidered Uniform Guard squarely on the jaw. The man crumpled without even a groan, and I let out a quiet sound of admiration.

Not for Jeong Hogun's impressive technique, though.

"Wow. You really didn't say it twice."

"Obeying those above you—that is the law of the military that sustains the Great Nation, and the rule of the Embroidered Uniform Guard."

Jeong Hogun handed the subordinate he'd knocked out to the other guards, wiped the blood from his hand, and continued.

"The Commander promised no harm would come to you. For this once, I will follow that order as well."

"For this once?"

"Any order can be withdrawn depending on the circumstances. There are no exceptions."

His voice was as blunt as ever, but the gaze he fixed on me was bleak and wild, like the storm that had raged through the night.

It was a side of him I hadn't seen on the way to the Imperial Capital or after we'd arrived.

His composure had slipped. My guess had been right.

"Well, the situation hasn't changed yet, so I don't think that order's been withdrawn."

"Is that what you think?"

"Of course."

At my casual reply, Jeong Hogun closed the distance and leaned in to whisper.

"I'm warning you in all seriousness… If you try anything foolish in this imperial palace, where His Majesty the Emperor resides, you will not escape the consequences."

"Anyone listening would think I'd already pulled something."

"From the hour of the Ox[3332] to Insi.[3333] Three red lanterns were lit."

What?

"From what I've heard, the East Depot used secret signals like that. Probably."

My heart gave a hard thump.

From the hour of the Ox to Insi. Exactly when Ma Sanbao had come to see me.

And red lanterns as a signal, too.

It was lucky Jeong Hogun wasn't looking me in the eye while whispering in my ear.

Otherwise, I might have betrayed myself with the tiniest movement.

But I'd been through a lot by now. I'd learned how to keep my emotions in check.

I steadied my breathing and pulse quietly, in an instant, without anyone noticing. Then I gave a short laugh.

"Hong Jin's crazy about the color red. You can tell by how he paints his lips that color every day, right?"

"Yeah, I can tell. He used to belong to the East Depot, after all. He must have needed to call in someone who could help, even if it meant using such an outdated secret signal."

Was it suspicion, or certainty?

After countless thoughts flashed through my mind like streaks of lightning, I reached a single conclusion.

A trap.

Neither Hong Jin nor Ma Sanbao was careless.

[3332] The hour of the Ox is the traditional two-hour period from 1 to 3 a.m.

[3333] Insi is the traditional two-hour period from 3 to 5 a.m.

No—in terms of thoroughness, they were easily in the top five of everyone I'd ever met.

The imperial palace, the East Depot—only people like that could survive in places like these.

And if the secret signal was obvious enough for Jeong Hogun to figure out, there was no way they'd risk meeting while using it.

I can't take the bait.

I reached all those conclusions in an instant.

My next move followed just as quickly.

Tap.

I pushed Jeong Hogun away from where he stood right up against me, then curled my lips into a smile as naturally as I could.

"Fuck, you're writing a whole damn novel."

"…"

"To hell with the East Depot. I don't know anything about that. I got tangled up in something complicated and spent a while thinking it over. If you really don't believe me, go ahead and try to frame me."

No physical evidence. No witnesses.

It was a trap.

Jeong Hogun stared into my eyes, which didn't waver in the slightest. His answer was practically decided already.

"The night was unusually noisy. A fierce storm and thunder kept roaring without letup."

"So?"

"It means nothing. That's all."

Was the look in those black eyes suspicion he still couldn't let go of?

Or disappointment because his attempt to sound me out had failed?

For once, I couldn't tell for sure, and I wasn't given time to try.

"Have you been waiting long?"

Step. Step.

Three people came down the stairs, their footsteps accompanied by a familiar, androgynous voice.

Jeong Hogun and the Embroidered Uniform Guards immediately straightened and saluted the young prince, who had just appeared.

"I, Jeong Hogun, Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, have come to escort His Highness Prince Shangshan."

Hong Jin, standing behind Prince Shangshan, who wore a tense expression, gave a wry smile.

“You’re still as impatient as ever. No, perhaps I should say you’ve waited longer than expected, since you did manage to hold out for an entire day.”

“Mind your words, Deputy Military Commissioner.”

“How frightening. Then I’ll…”

“You cannot come with us.”

Jeong Hogun cut Hong Jin off coldly, then added something I hadn’t expected.

“His Majesty the Emperor summoned only His Highness Prince Shangshan and Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. Those two alone.”

What?

Chapter 870

For a moment, I doubted my own ears.

What did I just hear?

To be honest, even after arriving at the imperial palace, I hadn't really thought I'd get to meet the Son of Heaven.

It was only natural.

He ruled this vast continent, a man above all others.

Compared to him, I was a lawless thug from the martial world without so much as an identification plaque, and merely a son of the unimpressive Jin Family of Taiyuan.

Whatever standing I held in Murim, however much the Jin Family of Taiyuan had grown, none of it meant anything before those two words: Son of Heaven.

This was the imperial palace, and he was the Emperor, with civil and military officials and countless subjects under him.

And yet the Emperor, born of the dragon's blood and having seized the realm through rebellion, had summoned me to an audience even Hong Jin wasn't allowed to attend.

Could this be the world's lamest hidden-camera prank?

I swallowed hard, then checked that I was still in working order.

I picked at my ear with my pinky, slapped my cheek two or three times with my palm, and steadied my breathing before I finally spoke again.

"Say that again."

"What?"

"Say it again. Every last word."

Jeong Hogun looked at me in silence, then answered without complaint.

"I said that only His Highness Prince Shangshan and Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan had been summoned by His Majesty the Emperor."

Judging by his stony expression, this definitely wasn't a hidden-camera prank. I fell silent for a moment, faced with this unexpected reality, then asked again.

"Is this a dream or something?"

Jeong Hogun replied calmly.

"You slapped yourself just now. Pretty hard, too."

"I did."

"Did it hurt?"

"It did."

"Then it isn't a dream."

"I see."

The second silence lasted a little longer. The first to break it wasn't me, but Hong Jin.

"Why?"

"I don't know."

Jeong Hogun gave a brief answer, then added, "We of the Embroidered Uniform Guard merely follow His Majesty the Emperor's orders. We need no reasons, and we ask no questions."

Of course, that was easy for the Embroidered Uniform Guard to say. They were government officials. My situation was a lot more complicated.

Why is he summoning me all of a sudden?

I had a bad feeling about this. No—I could already feel a chill at the back of my neck.

Why was I thinking of Jeong Hogun's manner, which suggested he had some idea what had happened last night, and Ma Sanbao's face as he spoke of rebellion?

I felt a chill run down my spine and parted my lips.

"What if…I refused the invitation?"

Contrary to what I expected, Jeong Hogun answered as though it were no great matter.

"Do you have a reason to?"

"I haven't been feeling well lately. Besides, like I said, I didn't get much sleep last night."

"If you're ill, then there's no helping it."

"Oh. Really?"

"Of course. We'd best move you to a different residence while we're at it."

"No, I appreciate the thought, but I'm fine. There's no need to go that far…"

"Guards. Contact the Ministry of Punishments at once. Tell them to prepare the most spacious accommodations."

"Huh?"

I blinked at Jeong Hogun.

Then I thought about it for a moment.

Was that hyeongbu the kind of brother-in-law a younger sister called her older sister's husband?[3334] If so, was Jeong Hogun the continent's first transgender Imperial Guard? If not…

"Um. That Ministry of Punishments…"

"It's nothing to worry about. Merely an institution for carrying out punishments, administered by the Embroidered Uniform Guard."

"…"

[3334] Hyeongbu is pronounced the same as the Korean term for the Ministry of Punishments and a woman's term for her older sister's husband.

That's a pretty fucking big thing to worry about. Shit.

I glared at Jeong Hogun, who didn't so much as twitch an eyebrow, then held out my hand toward Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao.

"Shall we go, Your Highness? I'll escort you."

As I followed the Embroidered Uniform Guard out of the pavilion, I heard Hyuk Mujin mutter with relief.

"Phew. Glad it wasn't me. I really thought I was getting hauled off."

You little shit.

The imperial palace was far bigger than I'd imagined.

Several times larger than the Forbidden City I'd toured with a VR headset on a school field trip.

The one saving grace was that the Embroidered Uniform Guard had the decency to prepare a palanquin.

"Please get in, Your Highness."

"Huh? What about mine?"

"I'll have to contact the Ministry of Punishments again."

"…"

Of course, there was no palanquin for me. Only Prince Shangshan, a member of the imperial family, got to enjoy the luxury of riding in a four-man sedan chair carried by four Embroidered Uniform Guards.

"We're moving."

Whoosh, whoosh, whoosh!

At Jeong Hogun's order, a golden current surged forward at tremendous speed.

I stayed close beside Prince Shangshan's sedan chair, ready for anything, and took in every corner of the imperial palace.

Couldn't hurt to know the layout.

Thinking about the worst-case scenario was one of my old habits.

Where each building stood, how many soldiers guarded it, and how strong they were.

If what awaited me wasn't the Son of Heaven but a forest of spears and blades, I needed to find the fastest, most efficient escape route.

Especially if I had someone else with me.

—Your Highness.

At the Sound Transmission I sent discreetly, Prince Shangshan gave a small jerk.

But it lasted only an instant. I sent another Sound Transmission to the young prince, who had quickly regained his composure.

—It's unlikely, but…if the worst should happen, you must leave everything to me. Do you understand?

Prince Shangshan was just about to give a small nod when I noticed Jeong Hogun, running at the head of the procession with his eyes fixed ahead, starting to turn his upper body.

I spoke a beat before he could.

"What are those people?"

Fortunately, my timing was perfect.

Half a beat later, Jeong Hogun glanced toward Prince Shangshan, then followed the direction of my finger.

Splash. Splash.

With every step, blood mixed with rainwater that had yet to dry.

Surrounded by another group of Embroidered Uniform Guards, dozens of bloodied men were being dragged somewhere. Jeong Hogun saw them and answered.

"You can see for yourself. Prisoners."

"Anyone can see that. I asked what they did."

"Those men belong to the Imperial Astronomical Bureau. Or rather, they used to."

"The Imperial Astronomical Bureau?"

"It's the institution that observes and analyzes the heavens. They'll be punished for failing to predict last night's lightning and torrential rain."

"…!"

"Don't waste any more time on something so irrelevant. His Majesty is waiting."

I answered with a silent nod, but the sight of the prisoners' backs, already receding into the distance, wouldn't leave my mind.

These people are seriously insane.

They'd beaten men half to death just because they hadn't predicted the weather.

That seemed far too brutal to write off as the way things were in this era.

No. Even for this era, that's not normal.

Once I started looking at things differently, I noticed more.

Even as I hurried along behind the Embroidered Uniform Guard, I studied the expressions of the palace attendants, whose faces I hadn't paid much attention to before.

Their faces and movements were stiff as wooden dolls. Whenever their eyes flicked toward the soldiers stationed all around them, I could see a tremor they hadn't managed to hide.

Everyone is afraid.

By the Emperor's will—or even by a single word from him—someone could be tortured or killed.

No matter how brave they were, they wouldn't dare refuse or show their displeasure.

This was the imperial palace, where not even the smallest mistake could be tolerated. The Emperor had taken the throne by killing countless high officials and even his own blood relatives. His power must be absolute.

The cold, oppressive atmosphere I could feel against my skin wasn't something I could explain away as merely the product of an age ruled by absolute monarchs.

Rule by terror.

A wise and benevolent ruler embraced people with kindness as vast as the sea.

A tyrant drove them with spears and fear into a thorny enclosure of his own making.

I'd heard plenty of stories about such rulers, though I'd never encountered one myself. Even so, I had a good idea what kind of person the current Son of Heaven was.

And the biggest problem was…

I'm going to meet that tyrant of my own free will.

Out of habit, I felt inside my clothes and found the small bundle of pills made by the Divine Physician.

Oddly enough, remembering their unbelievably foul stench made me feel a little better.

If—if I had to fight here, what would happen?

Whether I should call it reassuring or not, based on what I'd seen so far, the Embroidered Uniform Guard stationed in the imperial palace numbered in the thousands, perhaps as many as ten thousand.

That alone was enough to make a great army. Still, compared to the combined forces in the Imperial Capital and its surrounding areas, they might as well have been fairies.

The real issue is the Supreme Peak masters loyal to the Emperor. And the System is unavailable because of the update.

Not being able to use the System was an enormous penalty.

With the System down, I couldn't gain EXP, let alone recover by leveling up.

On top of that, my Inventory—which had served me so well whenever I caught enemies off guard with an unexpected attack—was firmly shut.

If I'd known this would happen, I should've taken White Flame out of my Inventory the last time I logged out in Murim. Or at least the Fire Dragon Armor.

I'd only been able to fight as recklessly as I had because I could level up. And I'd beaten masters in higher realms than mine thanks in large part to my Inventory and divine weapons.

But…right now, I had nothing.

No System to save my life in a dangerous moment. No divine weapons.

All I had was a bundle of pills that even the neighborhood mongrel would spit out, and a body that would get worse unless I forced those rotten-smelling things down.

Oh, and I had a few other things, too.

A young prince and a eunuch I had to protect. And some damn idiot with a bad snoring problem.

Perfect.

At this point, I was almost tempted to ask Prince Shangshan to assassinate the Son of Heaven. I called out to Jeong Hogun, who was walking silently ahead of us, just in case.

"Hey, can I ask you something? Ever heard of chokbeop sonyeon[3335]?"

"Chokbeop what?"

"Chokbeop sonyeon[3336]."

"What's that? Never heard of it."

"…Never mind."

Now that I thought about it, people were being implicated by association and killed one after another. What good would being too young for criminal prosecution do here?

I pictured a sweet little fantasy that could never come true.

The Emperor, collapsed in a pool of blood. Embroidered Uniform Guards rushing in from every direction at the sound of a scream. And Prince Shangshan, grinning triumphantly with a dagger in his hand.

"Your Majesty! Your Majesty!"

"Yep. Killed my imperial brother, didn't I?"

"Your Highness Prince Shangshan! What have you done?"

"The Embroidered Uniform Guard can't do a thing, can you? Now I'm the Emperor, right?"

"His Majesty has been assassinated! Apprehend the traitor Zhu Bao at once!"

"Yep. I'm still too young to be prosecuted!"

"…"

It was a sweet fantasy, but now that I thought about it, it seemed pretty serious in its own way.

Becoming Emperor because he was too young to be prosecuted.

If this were a Western fantasy setting, wouldn't they call him Brat the First?

"Jin Taekyung. Why are you looking at me like that?"

"Ah, it's nothing."

[3335] Chokbeop sonyeon is a Korean legal term for a child too young to be criminally prosecuted.

[3336] Chokbeop sonyeon is a Korean legal term for a child too young to be criminally prosecuted.

I couldn’t exactly tell Prince Shangshan what I’d been thinking. I was trying to dodge his question when it happened.

Vrrrrmm.

The air shook violently.

With an oppressive weight like ten thousand geun[3337], two middle-aged men who looked exactly alike appeared and blocked our procession.

“Stop.”

“Stop.”

The twins, identical in face and build, spoke in unison. It looked a little ridiculous—but I didn’t laugh.

Supreme Peak masters.

No doubt about it. This place was a demon-slaying battleground.

[3337] A Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb); ten thousand geun is about 6,000 kg (13,200 lb).

Chapter 871

Even the Embroidered Uniform Guard, called the Emperor's hands and feet alongside the East Depot, apparently had its limits.

Jeong Hogun led Prince Shangshan and me over to the middle-aged twins, whose names I didn't know, and sent us a brief Sound Transmission.

"From now on, be careful with every word and every move. Otherwise, you won't leave here alive."

Who the fuck did that bastard think he was kidding?

I could already feel the danger on my skin. Not just from the twin Supreme Peak masters who'd appeared out of nowhere, but from all the people inside Qianqing Palace whose presence I could sense before we'd even entered.

This place is guarded like hell.

My mouth felt as gritty as if I'd swallowed sand. I drew on my internal energy slowly enough that no one would notice, then moved my lips.

"Just answer me one thing. Why was I summoned?"

"I told you I don't know."

"Do you really not know, or do you know but refuse to tell me?"

"Both."

Damn it. I was an idiot for asking.

I glared at Jeong Hogun, who stood there with his usual impassive face, then passed beneath the plaque reading Qianqing Palace alongside Prince Shangshan, who had climbed down from his palanquin.

Step. Step.

Our footsteps rang out unusually loudly.

I quietly sized up the twins' backs as they walked in perfect sync, their movements identical down to the smallest detail.

They've definitely trained in a combined attack technique…but what martial art, exactly?

No matter how I looked at it, the situation was bad.

Not being able to guess what martial arts they'd learned was one thing. Just imagining two fully accomplished Supreme Peak masters using a combined attack technique made my stomach hurt.

And on top of that…

Why the hell are there so many bats?

Shadows hidden even in the faint light.

The people watching our every move from the darkness had to be guards raised by the imperial family—and assassins.

If the worst happened, those assassins, nearly a hundred of them, would carve me up with the one-strike killing techniques they'd spent their lives honing. And the twin Supreme Peak masters would be right there with them, wielding a combined technique they looked as if they'd learned in the womb.

Unless you're one of the Ten Kings—or maybe a master on par with the Three Saints—you'll almost certainly be buried here.

People say the martial world is a mountain of sabers and a forest of swords.

But they're wrong.

This was the real mountain of sabers and forest of swords. A place where the Emperor alone decided who lived and who died.

How many masters does he have under his command?

Even the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families had two Supreme Peak masters at most. Usually, they had only one. And here the Emperor had two of them working as gatekeepers.

I felt as though I were walking along a blade's edge.

A bead of cold sweat slid down the back of my neck. Then I noticed a small hand tugging at my sleeve.

Squeeze.

The hand gripped hard enough to crumple the fabric. Only then did I notice the young prince's ragged breathing.

He's trembling.

Before he was a member of the imperial family or a prince, he was a child.

He'd been one when I first met him, and he still was now.

He'd said he left the imperial palace when he was too young to remember. Of course he wouldn't remember the Son of Heaven, either.

And now his only family, his one and only older brother, is threatening his life.

A thought occurred to me.

Maybe the cheerful side Prince Shangshan had shown on the way to the Imperial Capital was his way of hiding his fear and disappointment.

When Hong Jin warned him that the Son of Heaven was a threat and he shook his head, saying that couldn't be true…maybe that was the only choice a child could make when faced with a reality too hard to believe.

He shouldn't have to understand any of this…but he's had to grow up far too soon.

My feelings grew complicated.

I thought of the boy from that winter in Shanxi Province, when icy winds howled through the mountains. He'd lost his parents and climbed a hill with his tiny, fern-like hands clinging tight to his little sister.

And I remembered young Hayeon patting our mother's back as she lay facedown, sobbing at our father's funeral.

Damn it.

I bit my lip hard to hold back a sigh.

Murim and the modern world had nothing in common. They were completely different worlds.

But there was one thing that never changed.

People.

That was why I, who'd once thought all of this was a game, had started accepting Murim as another reality.

They were people, after all. They got angry, felt joy, and grieved.

There were evil people who deserved to die, and good people with eyes as clear as glass.

I'd killed the former without a moment's hesitation. When it came to the latter, I'd even risked my life to help them.

And now I felt sorry for this young prince.

His trembling breaths reminded me of the young siblings who'd lost everything and fled after Jopil's attack. His small hand clutching my sleeve made me think of my own little sister, Hayeon.

I need to think about this coldly. I have to. I can't afford not to…

But no matter how much I thought about it, I wasn't sure I could.

If I had to choose between treason and submission, could I really leave this child behind?

Could I look back on it years later as if it meant nothing?

Man, he really knows how to make things difficult.

I smiled bitterly and looked down at Prince Shangshan, who didn't even reach my chest.

Then, almost on impulse, I raised a hand and gave his head a couple of gentle pats.

"…!"

His eyes flew wide, and his lips parted as if he were about to shout that I'd overstepped my bounds. But Prince Shangshan only stared up at me in surprise, his mouth working soundlessly.

Instead, his grip on my sleeve loosened, as though he felt relieved.

Who had ever dared to pat this child on the head?

Even something as simple as that—something other children his age took for granted—was probably unfamiliar to Prince Shangshan, Zhu Bao.

And right now, this little bit is the best I can do for him.

Just then, the twins, who had been striding forward without hesitation, stopped before a massive door.

Click. Rumble.

An iron door swung open with a heavy rumble. A dragon was carved into its surface so vividly it almost seemed alive. The twins, who hadn't said a word since we entered the palace, broke their silence.

"Please enter."

"Please enter."

It wasn't as though we had any choice left. Still, hearing that we'd be separated from those Supreme Peak masters was welcome news.

I nodded, then stepped through the iron door ahead of Prince Shangshan, shielding him as I went.

Rrrr. Thud.

The heavy door shut behind us with another rumble. Beneath the faint light of countless night-shining pearls glowing on the ceiling, a man stepped forward.

Step.

His build was as slight as his footsteps were light.

He looked about fifty and wore a long robe with sleeves that dragged along the floor. Prince Shangshan spoke first when he saw him.

"Who goes there?"

Who goes there? Who goes there? Who goes there…

His tense voice echoed again and again through the empty corridor. Not another person in sight—not even an ant.

The middle-aged man gazed at the tense-faced Prince Shangshan and at me, standing slightly in front of him to shield him. Only when the echoes had faded did he speak.

"To see His Highness Prince Shangshan grown so tall, and from so close, fills me with deep emotion after all these years."

After a moment's hesitation, Prince Shangshan asked, "Do you…know me?"

"Of course. Though Your Highness does not remember me."

A faint smile touched his wrinkled lips. He turned his gaze from Prince Shangshan to me.

"You and I have never met."

I said nothing. The moment I saw him, I'd had to fight to keep a string of curses from spilling out.

Why? Simple.

The middle-aged man in front of me—no, this middle-aged man too—was a Supreme Peak master.

Oh, for fuck's sake… I can't do this anymore.

This was only my second day at the imperial palace.

And even that was being generous. I hadn't actually been here for twelve shichen,[3338] a full day.

Yet this was already the fifth Supreme Peak master I'd come face-to-face with.

I'm so screwed.

I was seriously wondering if I should start wearing a condom instead of clothes when the man spoke again.

"You needn't tell me who you are. I already know. Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

Damn it. There was no way around it now.

I let out a deep sigh and answered.

"Does everyone around here recognize me wherever I go?"

"The imperial family's eyes and ears are everywhere. And you do stand out."

"Because I'm handsome?"

"No. Because you look like a thug at first glance."

Listen to this guy.

"Then what are you around here? The eyes? Or the ears?"

"Hmm. Which do you think I'm closer to?"

"The cleaning crew."

"What?"

"Your sleeves are dragging on the floor, so I figure you must be great at mopping."

The middle-aged man stared at me blankly for a moment, then laughed aloud.

"Ha ha. Just as I'd heard."

"Heard what? Are the rumors already spreading?"

"I told you—there are eyes and ears everywhere. Everyone who needs to know already does. They've heard that some audacious martial artist dared to set foot in the imperial palace and has a knack for making people laugh."

"That's strange. I usually get under people's skin more than I make them laugh."

"I forgot to mention that 'making people laugh' was a considerably toned-down version of what I'd heard."

"…"

"Of course, the accounts were all over the place, so I was curious myself. Now, this way."

Before I could answer, he turned and took the lead as if it were only natural, without so much as a glance back.

"Where are we going?"

"Interesting question. Have you forgotten why you came here?"

I'd had my suspicions, and I'd been right.

[3338] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of about two hours.

Apparently, this old guy was the third transfer point on our way to the Emperor—and the final guide who would take us to our destination.

Obviously, he isn't a cleaner.

Who the hell was he? His clothes offered no clue.

East Depot? Or Embroidered Uniform Guard?

His gaunt frame made him look more like a eunuch, but his voice was so weighty it could knock even an Embroidered Uniform Guard off his feet.

And he moved around as naturally as if this were his own home.

Even the twins didn't come this far. So he must be one of the Emperor's closest, most trusted confidants…

According to Ma Sanbao last night, the young Emperor was hot-tempered and suspicious. Only a handful of high-ranking officials and trusted servants who'd proven their loyalty were allowed into his residence, Qianqing Palace.

And that wasn't all.

There were the guards, of course, along with the eunuchs and palace attendants who stayed inside to see to his every need.

This place existed for the Emperor, by the Emperor, and in service of the Emperor.

Could just anyone come and go in Qianqing Palace—let alone somewhere this deep inside?

I didn't know for sure, but he'd probably need to be close in standing to Baek Yeon, Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

Then could this guy be the East Depot's leader, Cang Gong? No. I heard he was much older, and that he'd been bedridden with illness for years.

I racked my brain, but no one came to mind.

Ma Sanbao had mentioned far too many people, and this man didn't match the distinctive features of any of the few he'd described.

If only I could use my Qi Sense Skill right now…

But there was nothing I could do about that.

If you're thirsty, you dig a well.

I'd just have to pry the information out of him somehow.

I followed the man as he strolled along at an unhurried pace and tossed out a question.

"When do I get to meet the Emperor?"

"Soon."

"At this rate, we'll get there tomorrow."

The man gave a short laugh without looking back.

"You're as impatient as you look. Wait a little. His Majesty is enjoying a diversion he hasn't had in some time."

"A diversion? After summoning us?"

“And what, do you intend to complain?”

“…!”

“Everyone has their place. To ascend the throne is to be able to look down upon them all. A simple enough truth of the world, isn’t it?”

My expression hardened.

Not because I objected to the Emperor’s behavior, or because the man’s answer had struck a nerve.

It was the casual look on his face, his tone, the effortless authority in every small movement. And on top of that, his appearance didn’t match any of the Emperor’s confidants Ma Sanbao had mentioned.

No way.

The thought sent a groan through me.

Step.

The man came to an abrupt stop. Without a moment’s hesitation, he threw open the door before him, decorated with gold, silver, and jewels.

“Your Majesty. In accordance with your solemn imperial command, I have brought the two people you requested.”

But there was no answer.

In fact, there wasn’t a hint of anyone else’s presence.

Only one person stood inside the enormous bedchamber.

The middle-aged man.

He turned slowly toward us and smiled, showing his white teeth.

“It was a brief diversion, but I enjoyed it.”

“…!”

“…!”

A bolt of lightning shot down my spine.

Chapter 872

"It was a brief diversion, but I enjoyed it."

A shiver ran down my spine. At last, I knew who the middle-aged man was—the answer I hadn't been able to find no matter how hard I thought.

The Son of Heaven…!

The ruler of the continent, who governed all under heaven.

The man who'd seized the throne in a coup after bathing the Imperial Capital in blood a little over ten years ago.

I stared wide-eyed at the middle-aged man before me—no, at the Emperor.

How?

Everything that had happened proved who he was. The question came from what I already knew.

He should still be around forty.

When the young, ambitious fourth prince of the Great Nation launched his coup, he'd been no older than his late twenties.

A little over ten years had passed since then. At most, he should have just turned forty.

And yet…

Even being generous, he looks over fifty.

I couldn't write it off as a face that had aged prematurely. He was the Emperor, a man above all others, not some country bumpkin who had spent his life farming under the blazing sun. More than that, he was a Supreme Peak master. How could he look so old?

By comparison, the fact that the Emperor of the Great Nation was a Supreme Peak master wasn't all that shocking. As the fourth prince, he'd distinguished himself in battle time and again thanks to his exceptional martial talent.

Still, I hadn't expected it.

One person suddenly came to mind.

Ma Sanbao. The East Depot's second-in-command, who'd spent the past decade and more serving as the Emperor's right hand while hiding his own rebellious ambitions.

Did he know about this?

If Ma Sanbao had known, he would have told me long ago.

That left only one conclusion.

Even Ma Sanbao didn't know. No—that's not quite right. The Emperor must have deliberately kept it hidden.

A chill ran down my spine. Part of my conversation with Ma Sanbao the night before flashed through my mind.

“The Emperor is a sinister man who keeps his schemes close. You can see it in how he still uses the Embroidered Uniform Guard to keep the East Depot in check, even after all these years.”

“But isn’t the East Depot also the Emperor’s right hand?”

“Yes. More precisely, it was the late Emperor’s right hand.”

“…!”

“Do you know what all powerful people have in common? They suspect everyone, then suspect them again. I still haven’t learned how the current Emperor and Baek Yeon joined forces, but after the Embroidered Uniform Guard’s coup succeeded, the East Depot became something the Emperor had little use for but couldn’t simply discard. He handles all his affairs from Qianqing Palace and has kept himself shut away there for years.”

“Qianqing Palace?”

“The Emperor’s residence. It’s highly unlikely, but… if you ever meet him, mind your conduct. Think carefully before giving even the shortest answer.”

The Emperor had hidden the truth even from Ma Sanbao, who was the East Depot’s second-in-command in name and its leader in practice.

So why? Why show me this side of himself?

I couldn’t be certain of anything just yet, but at least some of what Ma Sanbao had told me that day was right.

The Emperor was sinister, and he kept his schemes close. The look in his eyes now, as though he could see straight into my heart, told me that much.

“Ha ha. You look rather surprised.”

His mouth smiled. His eyes didn’t.

After laughing at the sight of me standing there frozen, the Emperor spoke again, his voice low.

“Why? Do I look so different from what someone told you to expect?”

“…!”

For a moment, I couldn’t breathe. Through the air that had suddenly grown heavy around us, I could sense the Emperor’s intentions all too clearly.

He suspects me…

All the more reason to stay calm. I tried not to show what I was thinking.

“Yes.”

“What?”

“I’ve already heard a few things from Hong Jin—or rather, the Deputy Military Commissioner of Shanxi Province.”

“Hong Jin, Hong Jin. It’s been a long time since I heard that name.”

The Emperor gazed into the distance for a moment, as though recalling an old memory. Then his sharp eyes turned back to me.

"What did he say?"

"That Your Majesty distinguished yourself in martial arts early on and gained the throne before you turned thirty."

"And?"

"That was all."

"That can't be all."

Of course it wasn't all.

But how was I supposed to tell a man who had killed his own blood relatives to take the throne, "He said you were a fucking bastard"?

I couldn't simply insist that was all, either. Hong Jin was a loyal retainer the late Emperor had cherished enough to entrust with Prince Shangshan's care. The Emperor must have known long ago that someone like him wouldn't have warm feelings toward him.

I needed an answer that would allay the Emperor's suspicions without getting Hong Jin dragged off by the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

The question was whether any answer could do both.

Fuck, I don't know.

Sometimes you just had to close your eyes and take the plunge. I swallowed and opened my mouth.

"Actually, he did tell me more."

"Speak."

"Well, I can't say it myself."

"What?"

"If Your Majesty is curious, perhaps you could summon him later and ask him directly…"

The instant my voice trailed off—

Whoosh! Whoosh! Whoosh!

Sharp winds swept in from every direction. Dozens of black-clad figures dropped out of empty air and surrounded me, thrusting their weapons toward me.

Shhk.

Had they meant to do this from the start? Or had loyalty to the Emperor driven them to anger?

Blood welled where the keen blades had cut my skin, then rolled down my neck.

These bastards… They're serious.

The men left no gap in the circle around me. They had the blank indifference of butchers slaughtering livestock—and the deadly resolve to kill me the instant the order came.

At the same time, a hand gripped my sleeve tightly.

Squeeze.

Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao.

The young prince had been frozen since the moment he learned the middle-aged man was the Emperor. I gave him a smile, hoping to reassure him.

The Emperor had been watching us in silence. Suddenly, he shook out his voluminous sleeve.

Flap.

As the fabric billowed, the black-clad men withdrew their weapons and sprang into the air. They vanished into the Emperor's quarters as though melting into them, leaving only the faintest trace of their presence. Their concealment technique was almost a divine skill.

"Your Majesty's men are certainly loyal."

This time, I wasn't being sarcastic.

At my genuine admiration, the Emperor answered dryly.

"Loyalty isn't all they have. They're no match for the Slaughter Saint you're close to, of course."

"…!"

"What? Did you think I wouldn't know even that much?"

I fell silent. This time, I really was surprised.

Everyone under heaven knew the title Slaughter Saint, but only a tiny handful knew that he'd reappeared after vanishing long ago.

Yet the Emperor knew not only that he was back, but that he and I were connected. He must have learned it through the vast intelligence network he had spread across the continent.

"Did the Embroidered Uniform Guard tell you?"

Displeasure and interest mingled on the Emperor's face at the question that slipped out of me.

"You have remarkable nerve, asking me that."

I had somehow survived the last exchange. There was no sense in provoking him further. Sensing the line I'd crossed, I lowered my head.

"I'm sorry."

"I stand in fear and awe, Your Majesty."

"Pardon?"

"Not sorry. You should stand in fear and awe, as everyone does before me."

Both characters in hwanggong, the phrase he demanded, meant fear. It was the highest expression of deference to an Emperor whose authority knew no bounds.

He kept staring at me after he finished speaking. I tried again.

"I stand in fear and awe, Your Majesty."

"Better. You're a lawless thug from the martial world, so I can't expect much. But from now on, you can learn one thing at a time."

A faint smile spread across his wrinkled lips. My stomach twisted.

But…

First, I have to survive.

I wasn't the only one in danger. Everyone's lives depended on what I said and did.

That included the young prince whose trembling hand still clutched my sleeve.

Just then, the Emperor's gaze, indifferent until now, finally settled on his only younger brother.

"Come here."

The trembling against my sleeve stopped at once.

Prince Shangshan hadn't regained his composure. He had gone rigid as a statue.

"Do you intend to make me say it twice?" the Emperor asked quietly.

"…!"

Prince Shangshan looked at him with trembling eyes, then raised his head to look up at me. He drew a ragged breath, released my sleeve, and stepped toward the Emperor.

No—he threw himself down in a full prostration and bowed.

"I-I, your subject, Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao, pay my respects to Your Majesty, my imperial brother."

A heavy silence settled over the room. It lasted a moment, or perhaps much longer.

The Emperor looked down at Prince Shangshan, his eyes too deep to read. His face was so cold that it was hard to believe he was looking at his much younger brother.

Then he spoke.

"How old are you this year?"

"T-Twelve, Your Majesty."

"You have good Muscles and Bones. Have you trained in martial arts?"

"Yes."

"We brothers devoted ourselves to martial arts from childhood. Only our eldest brother took more after a civil official."

Prince Shangshan drew a small breath. As he grew older, Hong Jin must have told him bits and pieces about his family. But hearing it from his only brother carried a different weight.

Especially when that brother was the Emperor of the Great Nation—a man he could never treat like an ordinary sibling, and the enemy who had sent their family to their deaths.

"I… see."

"Taizu, our grandfather, founded the Great Nation through martial force, too. It's part of the imperial family's tradition. Looking at you, it seems blood really does tell."

The Emperor added in a dry voice, “Whether that proves a poison or a boon, I cannot say.”

“…!”

“…!”

I barely held back a groan.

Even before we reached the Imperial Capital, I’d guessed that the Emperor’s intentions toward Prince Shangshan were anything but friendly. Still, his reaction to the prince was alarmingly blatant.

Is he really that wary of a brother so much younger than him?

Power was ruthless.

People fought like beasts over the little wealth they had, even with their own parents and siblings. What would it be like over a vast continent, an entire empire?

Even so, the Emperor’s suspicion of his youngest brother, a boy of twelve, was terrifyingly thorough.

And, in a way, well-founded. People led by Ma Sanbao were already dreaming of rebellion.

The Emperor’s next words were proof that his wariness had passed the point of no return.

“From now on, I’ll look after you.”

“…!”

Chapter 873

The same words can mean different things depending on who says them and the circumstances.

The Emperor's words were no exception.

"From now on, I'll take care of you."

"…!"

At the unexpected words, Prince Shangshan jerked his head up from his prostration. I couldn't stop a groan from slipping through my lips.

"Mm."

That was probably why the Emperor's gaze shifted from the prince at his feet to me.

"Do you have something to say?"

Plenty.

But the man before me ruled the continent. I lowered myself onto one knee and answered as politely as I could.

"If I may be so bold, Your Majesty."

"If you think it's bold, you'd be wise to keep it to yourself. Assuming you want to keep your head attached."

"…!"

"Still, very well. Go on. It might be interesting to see how much my patience has grown over the past ten-odd years."

Those in power often dressed their whims up as patience.

Just like now.

He's really enjoying this.

I lowered my head slightly as I watched the Emperor's eyes gleam like a child who'd found an amusing new toy. I was trying to hide the way I'd clenched my teeth without realizing it.

Just how far did that arrogant Emperor's patience extend? If I crossed some invisible line he'd drawn, could I bear the consequences?

Questions like those suddenly flashed through my mind, but right now I had to do whatever I could to fend off the Emperor's grasping hand reaching for Prince Shangshan.

Stay calm.

I took a small breath and slowly spoke.

"Your Majesty's offer is truly gracious, but His Highness Prince Shangshan is already well cared for by his loyal subjects. In fact, he may not need anyone to care for him anymore."

“Your manners have improved all of a sudden. You’re still far from skilled at hiding the barbs in your words, though.”

The Emperor gave me a mocking look and continued.

“Tell me, who are these loyal subjects you spoke of? That devious eunuch? Or that martial-world ruffian who flouts the Great Nation’s rules of propriety and roams the land?”

Even a stray dog would know the first meant Hong Jin and the second meant me.

But I didn’t so much as flinch. I bowed deeply and answered.

“Your Majesty is right that I belong to the martial world. I have roots in my family and my martial school.”

“So you are not my younger brother’s subject. Then what gives you the right to wag that tongue of yours in front of me?”

“Though I am not his subject, I was summoned as His Highness’s guest, and Your Majesty gave me permission to speak.”

“This is getting more interesting by the moment. But dress a beast in clothes, and does that make it a person? Don’t waste my precious time on pointless formalities that don’t suit you. Get to the point. Briefly and simply.”

Briefly and simply.

That was music to my ears.

But now was the time to bow once more, just in case. I looked down at the soft carpet and said,

“How could I do that?”

“Fifteen minutes should be enough.”

“Pardon?”

“For those fifteen minutes, I’ll forgive whatever rudeness you commit. Speak freely. That is my imperial command.”

Good.

With that safety net in place, I finally raised my head and looked at him. Then I said what had been on the tip of my tongue all along.

“You already know, don’t you?”

“What?”

“His Highness Prince Shangshan has grown up well without Your Majesty’s care. He has managed without it until now, and he’ll continue to.”

“…!”

The instant the Emperor’s eyes flashed—

Whoosh!

Killing intent like invisible blades shot in from all sides and wrapped around me.

It was the killing intent of dozens of imperial guards—or rather, assassins—who had already revealed themselves once before. They'd all sent it at me at the same time.

Their martial skill was at Peak, but their abilities as assassins had reached Supreme Peak.

If they unleashed the one-strike killing techniques they'd spent their whole lives honing, staking their lives on them, even I wouldn't get away unscathed.

But what I feared never happened.

Before their sword light could fall on me, the Emperor raised a hand and stopped them.

Shff.

The darkness on all sides rippled.

Holding back the assassins who seemed ready to drop from the air and carve me to pieces, the Emperor gazed at me through narrowed eyes.

"Prince Shangshan doesn't need my care?"

"Yes."

"Do you not know he's only twelve years old?"

"I do."

"Then how can you say that?"

"Because that twelve-year-old boy shouted at the Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard—a man whose authority could bring down even birds in flight."

"…!"

"If someone had told him to do it, then His Highness would still be a child in need of care. But no one there advised him to do so."

Prince Shangshan had decided for himself and acted without hesitation.

I didn't know whether he'd been born with that resolve or his circumstances had gradually taught it to him, but it was a mark of adulthood.

At thirteen, he'd already shown he could do something even adults who'd merely grown older with the years they'd been given could not.

"Deputy Military Commissioner Hong Jin, who has been with him for so long, treats His Highness like a child, just as Your Majesty does. But I see it differently. When I was a child, I couldn't even have dreamed of doing something like that."

"Of course not. You weren't a member of the imperial family, or a prince."

I shrugged.

"I happened to meet one member of the imperial family. I can say with confidence that His Highness Prince Shangshan is ten times more mature than that person."

"An imperial relative? You mean Ju Wongong?"

"You know about him, too."

The Emperor even knew about the Slaughter Saint.

I didn't know how deeply he'd dug into my affairs, but the fact that I was involved with one of the few members of the imperial family probably didn't even count as noteworthy information to him.

The mention of Ju Wongong made him frown.

"Everything ultimately comes from status and authority, not age. If this boy were no more than a distant imperial relative like Ju Wongong, do you think he could have shouted at Baek Yeon so boldly?"

"I've heard there's nothing more pointless than arguing about something that never happened. Besides, making the most of what you've been given isn't something a child can do, either."

The Emperor clicked his tongue at my ready answer.

"That tongue of yours is quite slick."

"It's one of my signature skills."

"But can that signature skill defeat an imperial command?"

"Pardon?"

"What if I issued an imperial command right here and now to revoke Prince Shangshan's assigned territory in Shanxi Province, grant him the title Marquis Within the Passes, and keep him by my side?"

"…!"

This son of a bitch fights dirty even in an argument.

An imperial command isn't some fucking Spirit Bomb.[3339]

I swallowed the curses threatening to burst out and asked, "If you did that, what would become of His Highness?"

It might have crossed a line. A ruffian from the martial world had no business asking about that, and the Emperor could have shouted me down with that very argument.

But the Emperor answered readily, like a judge watching to see how far I'd cross the line.

"He'll return to where he belongs. He'll live in the imperial palace, study under excellent teachers, and be served by loyal palace attendants in surroundings far better than barren Shanxi Province."

"Would Hong Jin be among them?"

"I said loyal palace attendants. Not a devious eunuch like him."

The Emperor was right about one thing and wrong about everything else.

The imperial palace was where Prince Shangshan belonged. But his teachers and attendants would all be the Emperor's people.

And…

They'll watch his every move for the Emperor and do whatever he orders.

[3339] The Spirit Bomb, or Genki Dama, is an attack in Dragon Ball that gathers energy from others.

Even if that order were to assassinate him.

The thought left my mind cold.

“If I may ask, Your Majesty, why are you going this far?”

The Emperor’s lips curled with amusement.

“Because it’s only natural.”

“Natural?”

“I’m his older brother. Do I need another reason to look after my one and only younger brother?”

“Of course not. I just find it a little strange.”

“What do you find strange?”

“Why Your Majesty, who hasn’t cared for that one and only younger brother in over ten years, would suddenly decide to act like an older brother now.”

Clang! Clang! Clang!

In an instant, before any order had been given, the assassins appeared again and packed themselves around me.

A growling voice came from behind one pitch-black mask.

“Do you truly want to die?”

I didn’t answer. I looked at the Emperor, whose expression I couldn’t read, and spoke evenly.

“The fifteen minutes aren’t up yet.”

“You bastard!”

“Your Majesty made the promise yourself. You said you’d forgive any rudeness for fifteen minutes. I’ve only followed your imperial command and spoken honestly.”

“Shut that foul mouth of yours! How dare you—”

Slice.

Cold and burning pain struck at once. Blood ran down my neck from a wound deeper than the one already there.

“Your Majesty!”

Prince Shangshan had been frozen like a statue until now. Seeing the assassins surround me, he cried out to his one and only older brother.

“Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan is my guest and my friend! Spare him! Please forgive his rudeness!”

Thud! Thud! Thud!

I had no time to stop him. Still prostrated, the young prince struck his forehead against the ground again and again. I bit my lip. The Emperor looked down at him with cool arrogance, then suddenly spoke.

“Enough.”

Everything stopped at that one word.

The dagger inching into my neck stopped. So did Prince Shangshan, who had been begging for my life.

His forehead red, the prince lifted his head to look at his brother. The Emperor spoke slowly.

“That man dared to insult me. Even if I made a promise earlier, he crossed the line by a wide margin.”

“Y-Your Majesty…”

“But the fact remains that I made that promise myself. An Emperor cannot go back on his word. Isn’t that right, Third Shadow?”

The assassin called Third Shadow had been pressing his dagger against my throat as though ready to cut it at any moment. He fell silent.

“You’re slow to answer.”

“…I am humbled, Your Majesty.”

“I clearly made a promise. Yet you disobeyed my command and tried to harm him.”

“Your Majesty, that was—”

“First Shadow. Carry it out.”

Slice. Shhk!

With a sharp cutting sound, the dagger pressing into my neck slid away.

Another masked man dropped from the air and, without the slightest hesitation, cut Third Shadow’s throat. Then he prostrated himself before the Emperor.

“I have executed him.”

“…!”

“…!”

The air in the vast chamber froze.

I wiped Third Shadow’s blood from my face and stepped in front of Prince Shangshan, who was breathing in short, shallow gasps. This time, no one stopped me.

No—they couldn’t.

The master who held their lives in his hands had given no order.

You fucking bastard.

I glared at the Emperor, my eyes blazing.

“Your Majesty.”

“This time, you’d better choose your words carefully. The fifteen minutes I promised you are already up.”

“…!”

“And I’ll give you one last chance.”

“A chance?”

“Yes. A chance. I hear you’re Prince Shangshan’s friend.”

The Emperor laughed softly.

“You’ll never meet again after this, so say your final farewells. That is the last act of kindness I’ll grant you.”

Shff.

The moment he finished speaking, the assassins began closing in from all sides. I looked at them and understood.

There was no longer any way to protect Prince Shangshan here.

The Emperor had won.

Chapter 874

Perhaps the outcome had been decided long ago.

The imperial palace, a perfect enemy stronghold. A guard so tight that even “ironclad” didn’t do it justice. And the Emperor, ruler of all under heaven.

He had taken charge of the stage, the actors, and the direction himself. Even if a character like me stepped into the scene, it probably wouldn’t change much.

A thought struck me.

Perhaps all of this was a kind of amusement to the Emperor.

Why else summon me along with Prince Shangshan when he had no need to see me? Why brush aside words that could have gotten me branded a traitor on the spot?

And why look at my rigid face now and sneer?

Crack.

A bone shifted with a sound from my tightly clenched fist. I scanned the impassive eyes visible above the assassins’ pitch-black masks, weighing my options.

What do I do?

The Emperor’s little game was daring—and supremely confident.

Naturally, everyone in our party had been forced to surrender their weapons on entering the palace. But beyond that, no restrictions had been placed on me.

Perhaps he was confident that no one under heaven could harm him.

If so, he’d made a clear mistake.

Even barehanded, I was a superhuman who had opened my Middle Dantian, an heir to the Fire Gate Clan who had inherited the Fire King Jeok Cheongang’s fearsome fist and palm techniques.

All I have to do is take their weapons.

With every shift of my gaze, a path invisible to anyone else took shape in my mind.

A path to kill the assassins as quickly and efficiently as possible, then escape with Prince Shangshan.

The fact that the Emperor was a master who had entered the realm of Supreme Peak was unexpected, but that was all.

He’s only just entered Supreme Peak. What if I’m willing to sacrifice an arm to capture him first?

If I took the Emperor hostage, it would all be over. The Great Nation was one enormous mechanism, and the Emperor was both its master and its most important part.

With him in my hands, I could neutralize not only the assassins in here but also the twin masters waiting outside.

Perhaps even Baek Yeon, Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

But… what then? What happens after that?

Once I started, there would be no going back. That would be the beginning of a true rebellion.

If I took the Emperor hostage and fled Qianqing Palace, would the East Depot, led by Ma Sanbao, help us? Were the people who had signed the collective pledge he'd mentioned the night before fully prepared?

As thoughts tangled through my mind—

"Your servant, Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao, will obey the will of my most august elder brother, Your Majesty."

Prince Shangshan bowed deeply before his one and only elder brother—the Emperor, who stood above all others—and cried out at the top of his voice.

"Long live the Emperor! Long live the Emperor! Long, long live the Emperor!"

"…!"

My heart lurched.

Was it because Prince Shangshan's sudden action had broken the tension gripping my whole body?

No.

It was because I could read the desperate plea in that young prince, so small he didn't even reach my chest.

Don't step in any further.

It was as if a voice I couldn't hear, a voice that couldn't be heard, had sounded in my ear.

Prince Shangshan was trying to stop me. He had stepped forward before I could make a choice that couldn't be undone.

The Emperor looked down at him with an arrogant gaze.

"…You've certainly grown."

He murmured it with an unreadable expression, then swept his sleeve. Prince Shangshan, who had been crying "Long live" and bowing again and again, understood the gesture and rose.

"Do you truly intend to obey my will?"

"Of course, Your Majesty."

"That sounds as though it isn't your own will. You may refuse if you don't want to."

That was what he said, but his narrowed eyes suggested otherwise.

Prince Shangshan lowered his head without a word. Unlike before, his answer was perfectly calm.

"It is my will, too."

"I'm overjoyed that we brothers are of one mind."

"I am deeply honored."

Prince Shangshan seemed to have accepted what was happening. At the sight of his calm face, the tension drained out of me. I steadied my breathing.

It's no good.

Prince Shangshan had made the right choice.

The answer was clear. We had to retreat when we weren't prepared.

At least for today.

The Emperor watched me and smacked his lips, then suddenly spoke.

"Now that you've decided, there's no need for further discussion. This audience is over. Everyone, withdraw."

"As Your Majesty commands."

The assassins hoisted Third Shadow's body onto their backs and melted into the darkness. Then the Emperor added,

"No Shadow. You too."

Shff.

The air rippled in answer. I barely held back a groan.

This is insane.

A Supreme Peak master whose presence even I hadn't sensed.

No—a Supreme Peak assassin.

That was probably why the Emperor had been so untroubled about letting me into his chambers without imposing any serious restrictions.

He'd been testing me to the very end.

I revised my judgment of the Emperor at once.

He wasn't merely arrogant and daring. He was more meticulous and suspicious than anyone.

If you succeed, you're the Emperor. If you fail, you're a traitor.

I hadn't thought far enough ahead. When he was still known as the Fourth Prince, he had drawn his sword, swung it once, and overturned the Imperial Capital to seize the Great Nation.

Such boldness and decisiveness were beyond anything an ordinary person could dream of.

The thought suddenly crossed my mind: if I'd made a move, I would never have left Qianqing Palace alive.

Damn it.

Was this the power of the Emperor? The power of the Great Nation?

Was my best option really to withdraw so helplessly, unable even to protect a young prince?

"Let's go."

At Prince Shangshan's quiet murmur, I turned away to hide my gritted teeth.

The Emperor had finished his game and vanished behind the fluttering silks.

Rumble.

A massive iron door, out of place in such a splendid chamber, slowly opened. Beyond it stood dozens of palace attendants I hadn't seen on the way in.

"We greet His Highness Prince Shangshan."

"We greet His Highness Prince Shangshan."

They bowed to Prince Shangshan with utmost deference. Every one of them was a striking beauty.

Each had the kind of looks said to topple kingdoms.

But one woman standing a step ahead of the rest caught my eye at once.

"Please call me So Gyo."

So Gyo. That was her name.

Her voice was calm, and her eyes shone like the morning star. Even apart from her beautiful features, there was something unusual about her.

"By His Majesty's solemn command, we have been assigned to serve His Highness Prince Shangshan. We humble women will attend to you from now on, so please do not worry."

It was simple enough to understand why none of the people assigned to accompany the prince were heavily armed Embroidered Uniform Guards.

They've trained in martial arts. And to a considerable level, too.

Every one of them had the internal energy of a First Rate master.

I also recognized the thin belts at their waists for what they were: flexible swords.

And I couldn't help guessing that if the Emperor gave the order, they'd be ready to drive those blades into Prince Shangshan's neck at any moment.

There's no time.

I was getting anxious. I had to meet Hong Jin as soon as possible and make a plan. I had to see through the Emperor's hidden intentions, to discern his scheme.

"Your Highness."

Prince Shangshan lifted his head at my call. He looked at me with calm eyes. Whether that calm came from composure or resignation, I couldn't tell. Then he turned to So Gyo.

"I'd like you to give us a moment."

Working as a palace attendant in Qianqing Palace meant that they, too, were among the Emperor's many loyal servants.

But after a moment's thought, So Gyo quietly led the others away through the maze of corridors.

Only then did Prince Shangshan manage a smile.

"Speak. Though we may not meet again for some time, understand that the circumstances aren't right for a long farewell."

There was something about a child who had grown up too soon that brought a lump to your throat.

But I couldn't let my emotions take over.

I swallowed the words rising to my throat and held out my hand.

"First, take this."

"…?"

"Come on. There's no time."

Prince Shangshan hesitated, then took what I offered. When he saw the small, glimmering object in his palm, his eyes widened.

"This is…"

"A gift from me."

He examined it curiously.

"It's the ring you always wear."

Prince Shangshan couldn't know or even guess its proper name: the Myriad-Poison Ring.

A divine artifact of the Sichuan Tang Clan, and one of the divine weapons Dark Heaven had targeted.

Unlike White Flame and Fire Dragon Armor, which I usually kept in my Inventory, this was a ring I always wore, just in case.

"Why would you suddenly give this to me?"

"I thought you might need it, Your Highness. You looked at it with interest several times on the way to the Imperial Capital."

It was true. We'd spent a long time in the carriage, and Prince Shangshan had taken an interest in everything I owned.

Even this ring, too clunky for the women of this era and awkward for a man to wear.

A few days ago, he'd even pestered me to give it to him.

"About that ring."

"Hm? Oh, this one?"

"Yes. The one you're wearing. Would you give it to me?"

"Um, sorry, but that's a little difficult. Have you always been interested in accessories?"

"No. I just want something of yours."

"Oh, collecting keepsakes…"

"What was that?"

"Nothing. Just talking to myself."

"At any rate, I'd like to have it. Of course, I'll pay you handsomely."

“I’m sorry. I can’t give this to anyone, and I couldn’t sell it for any amount of money.”

“Why not? Is it so precious that you’d refuse even my request?”

“Well, you see… Right. It was my father’s keepsake.”

“Oh.”

“It means a lot not just to me, but to the whole family. My eldest brother still cries whenever he sees this ring.”

“I believe your father is still alive.”

“…Now that you mention it, I think it was my mother’s keepsake. I was mistaken.”

The Myriad-Poison Ring was never supposed to end up in anyone else’s hands.

In the end, Prince Shangshan had been disappointed, and I’d promised to sign about five thousand autographs when we returned to Shanxi Province.

Back then, I hadn’t had the faintest idea what awaited us in the Imperial Capital.

“Are you really giving this to me?”

“Not for good. You have to return it later.”

“Didn’t you say it was your mother’s keepsake?”

“Uh. Well, you see…”

Just as I ran out of things to say, Prince Shangshan let out a quiet laugh.

“I already know you were lying.”

“Ah.”

“I’m a little disappointed that you’d lie even to me, but it’s all right. You must have had your reasons. It must be that precious.”

I smiled along with him.

“That’s right. It’s very precious, so always keep it where no one else can see it…and make sure you return it.”

He was an old soul in a child’s body. He understood what I meant.

Prince Shangshan hesitated as though he didn’t know what to say, then nodded firmly.

“Mm. I understand. I promise.”

Only then did I feel a little more at ease.

The Emperor had seized the throne through a coup more than a decade ago, earning countless enemies in the shadows and no shortage of condemnation.

The Emperor cared enough about having a legitimate pretext to summon Prince Shangshan to the Imperial Capital before bringing him under his control. If he meant to kill his one and only younger brother, the most likely method was poison.

As long as Prince Shangshan keeps the Myriad-Poison Ring on him, poisoning him won’t be an option.

That would buy me time to find another way.

As I thought it over, I sensed the palace attendants slowly returning from farther down the corridor.

Our brief farewell was almost over.

“It’s time for me to go,” Prince Shangshan murmured, his voice subdued.

I bent down to meet his eyes.

“We’ll meet again soon.”

“I hope so. Then I’ll be able to repay the debt I owe you.”

“Your Highness.”

“Yes?”

“Don’t you know? Friends don’t owe each other anything.”

“…!”

“Still, if you insist on giving me something, I’ll accept it gratefully.”

I grinned and ruffled Prince Shangshan’s hair.

The young prince stared blankly at me with wide eyes, then smiled, too.

Chapter 875

The farewell was brief.

Before long, the palace attendants returned. They surrounded Prince Shangshan and led him away through Qianqing Palace's vast, maze-like corridors.

For now, this is the best I can do.

I thought to myself as I watched the young prince's back, glimpsed now and then between the attendants.

How much time did that child have left?

I didn't know.

If I'd gained anything from this audience, it was confirmation that the Emperor wasn't a complete madman who would stop at nothing.

His coup has already made him plenty of enemies. He can't get rid of his youngest brother the same way.

Everything needs at least some pretext.

Even in an era of absolute monarchy, with the Emperor ruling over all, that was no exception. And the Emperor, who'd brought a bloody storm to the imperial palace more than a decade ago, had dangers lurking out of sight.

Old retainers who longed for the late Emperor.

And common people who pitied the young prince.

If Prince Shangshan died under unnatural circumstances now, it would give someone a pretext for another rebellion.

Poisoning would look the most natural…but it won't be easy.

No one knew exactly how far the Myriad-Poison Ring's power extended.

But it was a rare treasure that had even absorbed the Formless Ultimate Poison that once spread through Jeok Cheongang's body. Even the Emperor wouldn't have an easy time obtaining poison of that caliber.

Unless he eventually discovered the Myriad-Poison Ring and took it by force.

But I've bought us some time, at least.

Did I regret leaving the Myriad-Poison Ring with Prince Shangshan?

No.

From everything I'd seen so far, the Emperor and Dark Heaven were definitely connected somehow, and if the imperial family fell into their hands, it was all over.

I had to protect Prince Shangshan, even at the risk of losing the ring.

He was the anti-Emperor faction's only hope, the one person who could hold it together.

And he was one of the friends I'd made here.

Though there's a bit of an age gap for me to call him a friend.

I smiled bitterly and watched until Prince Shangshan and his party disappeared from sight.

When I turned away, heavy-hearted, a woman stood quietly watching me. I still wasn't used to seeing her, but her face was the sort I'd remember for a long time after a single meeting.

"Have you been waiting long?"

So Gyo answered calmly. "No. This humble woman is carrying out His Majesty the Emperor's orders. What does it matter whether the wait is long or short?"

Can't fault her loyalty.

I gave an awkward nod. "Then let's go."

The Emperor's order So Gyo had mentioned was to guide me out of Qianqing Palace.

Of course, "guide" was a polite way of saying she was watching me and kicking me out. But what did it matter?

"I'll lead the way. Please follow me."

I'd barely taken a few steps after her when I frowned.

"Wait. I don't think this is the right way."

"It is. You remember the way we came."

Of course I did. I'd made a point of checking my escape route in case the worst happened.

"Don't just say it is. I'm telling you we're going the wrong way."

"The way into Qianqing Palace is different from the way out."

"What?"

"The life gate can become the death gate, and the death gate can become the life gate. Since you're a martial artist who travels the martial world, Young Master Jin, I thought you would understand what that means."

"…!"

I fell silent. A word flashed through my mind like a bolt of lightning.

"Don't tell me…mechanisms and formations?"

So Gyo gave a slight nod and started walking again. I stared after her for a moment before hurrying to follow, still reeling from what she'd told me.

Damn it. Even for an Emperor, this is ridiculous. This isn't a residence. It's an impregnable fortress.

There were no fewer than three Supreme Peak masters stationed in Qianqing Palace, not counting the Emperor.

One was a master of the concealment technique who guarded him at close range. And even by a conservative estimate, more than a hundred elite assassins were stationed throughout the palace.

On top of all that, mechanisms and formations?

He's definitely not normal.

Naturally, an Emperor needed tight security. But there were limits.

The defenses here were abnormal, as though they reflected the Emperor I'd met just moments ago.

Maybe he was afraid, too. He made so many enemies.

They said thirty thousand people had been dismembered or beheaded during his coup.

Among them were his own blood relatives in the imperial family, founding heroes who had laid the foundations of the Great Nation, upright officials, and renowned scholars.

All of them had died.

Killed in a coup that defied the natural order, on the command of a single man.

It would have been absurd if an Emperor like that didn't have enemies.

Then could it be…?

As I followed So Gyo, I thought of him not as the Emperor who stood above all others, but as a Supreme Peak master.

His formidable martial prowess. His face, which looked ten years older than it should have—no, a good twenty years older for a man so young and so skilled.

Was that why?

Supreme Peak was a lofty realm no one could enter through innate talent alone.

And yet the ruler of the continent, who had everything anyone could want, had sweated blood to learn martial arts.

He must have swung weapons without pause, like the martial artists of the martial world he called ruffians. At times, he must have groaned under pain that racked his whole body.

Even so, it seemed he had never entirely shaken his fear of assassination or his nightmares.

It's only a guess, but it's certainly possible.

I'd taken countless lives with these hands. I thought I could understand a little of what he felt.

There was no such thing as a justifiable killing. Only a killing with a pretext.

I'd comforted myself by saying I'd had no choice, that they were people I had to defeat. But that didn't change the truth.

The countless dead would come to torment me from time to time—maybe even quite often—and I'd wake up drenched in cold sweat.

So what must it be like for an Emperor who'd killed tens of thousands in a coup with no pretext at all?

His nights must be a real inferno.

I smiled bitterly and kept walking. So Gyo led me onward without a word, deeper into passages I couldn't make sense of.

I was starting to get a bad feeling.

"Um, can I ask you something?"

So Gyo stopped and turned around. At the same time, she spoke without hesitation.

"It's all right."

"What?"

"I mean that nothing unfortunate will happen to you, Young Master Jin. Please follow me."

I was quiet for a moment, then clicked my tongue.

"Right to the heart of it. Did you learn to read minds?"

"No. I noticed that your breathing had become slightly uneven."

"Oh. I gave it away, huh? You're perceptive."

"I've learned martial arts as well. Few things matter more to a martial artist than controlling one's breathing."

She was right. The higher a master's realm, the more likely a fight was to be decided in less than a breath.

But that didn't change how pointed she sounded. As I watched her turn away, I thought, Is she picking a fight with me?

Probably. No, almost certainly.

It was absurd for So Gyo, who was First Rate at best, to lecture me. I let it pass with a silent chuckle.

She was one of the Emperor's loyal servants, and I was in enemy territory. What else could I expect?

I should be grateful she isn't attacking me.

There was no point arguing. I shook my head and was about to start walking again when—

Crash.

"…!"

The sound was faint, but I heard it clearly. It came from somewhere in a dark corridor beyond one of the paths branching off like a crossroads.

Then I heard an irritated voice.

"You lowly wretches! How dare you…!"

"Please follow me."

So Gyo hurried over and blocked my path. Ignoring her, I drew up my internal energy and sharpened my senses.

A woman. That was definitely a woman's voice.

Something was going on. Something I didn't know about yet.

And if I wanted to accomplish what I'd come to do in this damn imperial palace, I needed every clue I could get.

Step.

"Young Master Jin!"

Her low shout reached me the moment I stepped toward the darkness. She glared at me, her cold eyes carrying an unmistakable warning.

That only made me more certain. If she was this determined to stop me, there was something outsiders must never see.

But this was the Emperor's residence. I put on an innocent smile and pretended not to understand.

"It sounded like something happened. Shouldn't we go take a look?"

"I told you to follow me."

"Come on. The imperial palace isn't very friendly, is it? Who was that just now? Sounded like a woman to me."

"That's enough. I've warned you."

"One warning means I'm still fine for now, right? But seriously, who was it? I'm so curious I might not sleep tonight."

"Better that than sleeping forever."

Her face set, So Gyo suddenly cried out, "Come out!"

Shhk-shhk-shhk!

In an instant, a dozen or so blades dropped from the high ceiling and surrounded me.

Black masks as dark as the shadows, with the eyes of killers visible above them.

Surrounded in a flash by the assassins of Qianqing Palace, I spoke in a low, heavy voice.

"You said nothing unfortunate would happen."

So Gyo put a hand on the flexible sword at her waist. "It won't. As long as you turn around and leave quietly."

"I just looked because I heard a strange noise. Why are you so touchy?"

"Should I take this to mean you intend to defy His Majesty's will?"

"That would be a problem."

"Then turn around and follow me. Quietly."

"And if I don't?"

Ssshhh.

I silently drew up my internal energy.

Perhaps it was the weight of my aura bearing down around them, or perhaps they expected a bloody fight. Either way, So Gyo and the assassins' faces went cold as ice. I looked them over one by one, then quietly raised both hands.

"Fine. I surrender."

"…!"

"Just finish showing me the way. I need to get back and eat."

So Gyo let out a small sigh and dismissed the assassins. I watched them withdraw and smiled to myself.

There was no need to invite any more danger here.

Though I'd been stopped in no time, I'd already accomplished what I'd set out to do.

I'd heard that woman's sharp cry clearly.

And it reminded me of someone's voice I'd heard a few months ago at the residence of the City Lord of Sichuan Province.

It had been so sweet and dripping with seduction that I couldn't have forgotten it.

What was her name…?

Right. Aehyang.

The beloved concubine the Emperor had taken from the City Lord of Sichuan Province.

Chapter 876

Hong Jin stared hard at the golden armor blocking his way.

His voice, usually as high and gentle as a woman's, had sunk lower than anyone had ever heard it.

"Move."

"Impossible. You cannot take a single step beyond this place."

"I said move."

"Sir! Deputy Military Commissioner!"

"Do you really think you can stop me? You lot dare?"

"…!"

The several dozen Embroidered Uniform Guards looked at one another, their faces stiff.

They already knew the eunuch standing before them was no pushover.

They said no matter how high you climbed, power never lasted ten years, and no flower stayed red for ten days. But things were different when you were talking about the East Depot's former Investigating Eunuch, who had once enjoyed the late Emperor's favor.

Besides, plenty of old officials still remained at court, and Hong Jin surely had ties with them.

Whether those ties were friendships forged as fellow servants of the late Emperor or secrets he'd seized while holding sway over the East Depot, no one could say. But one thing was certain.

His influence was not to be underestimated.

"Even after more than ten years away from the palace, a few letters are enough to send a low-ranking Embroidered Uniform Guard to the borderlands. So get the hell out of my way, if you want to keep wearing that shiny armor."

A cold flame flickered in Hong Jin's eyes.

It had been two shichen[3340] since his young lord left to meet the Emperor.

The eunuch, renowned even within the East Depot for his cool head, was already at the end of his patience.

If I'd known it would come to this, I should've done whatever it took to go with him.

Something had clearly happened.

He tried to suppress the unease that kept rising inside him, but even that was getting harder to do.

Just as Hong Jin bit down hard on his lip without realizing it—

"Everyone, calm down. Take it easy."

[3340] A shichen is a traditional time unit lasting approximately two hours. Two shichen are about four hours.

A breezy voice cut in out of nowhere. Hyuk Mujin stepped in front of Hong Jin and waved the Embroidered Uniform Guards down.

“Try to be understanding. It’s taking a while, so he’s worried.”

“Martial artist Hyuk!”

“Come now, Comrade Hong, you should calm down too. What did these people do wrong? We underlings do what we’re told, whether they say ‘get down’ or ‘bark.‘ Right?”

The Embroidered Uniform Guards frowned, unsure whether he was taking their side or calling them sons of bitches to their faces. Hyuk Mujin didn’t give them time to think it over.

“Still, could you at least find out what’s going on? We’re tired enough as it is. If you make this difficult, nobody’s going to have a good time. Right?”

“Wait. That’s…”

“Oh, you’ll check? Wow! The Embroidered Uniform Guard! The pride of the Great Nation! The guardians of the imperial family! Thanks a fucking lot! If you get the time, drop by the Hyuk Family Textile Shop in the center of the Imperial Capital. Give them my name and you can get a discount.”

There was no chance to reply. Without waiting for the guards’ answer, Hyuk Mujin turned, grabbed Hong Jin, and hurried him away.

He spoke in a low whisper.

“There’s nothing to gain by provoking them right now. You know better than most, so why are you doing this? Get a grip.”

Those words didn’t make Hong Jin’s unease disappear, but they were enough to remind him of the reality he’d briefly forgotten.

Hyuk Mujin was right.

If he used his remaining influence at court to move a few powerful figures, all he’d manage to do was get rid of a few hunting dogs.

He wouldn’t touch the body, let alone the head. Reaching the owner holding the hunting dogs’ leashes was out of the question.

Now was the time to hide his claws and sheath his fangs.

Of course, though his head had cooled, his heart was still pounding wildly.

“Aren’t you worried, Martial artist Hyuk?”

At Hong Jin’s sudden question, Hyuk Mujin tilted his head.

“Sorry? About what?”

“You don’t feel any particular loyalty toward His Highness Prince Shangshan. I know that. It’s the nature of martial artists, so I have no intention of criticizing you for it. But…”

“Oh, you mean I’m not worried about what happened to the Captain who went with him?”

Hong Jin nodded weakly, and Hyuk Mujin answered at once.

“Of course I’m worried. I am.”

“Then how can you be so calm?”

“This is the best I can do.”

“What?”

“I’ve followed the Captain through all kinds of trouble. Whenever he’s stepped in to handle something himself, he’s found a way to settle it.”

“…!”

“No matter how badly things got tangled, in the end, the Captain swept it all away. All those bastards who strutted around claiming to be masters or secret masterminds went off to interview with Yama.[3341]”

Hyuk Mujin looked at Hong Jin’s wide eyes and continued in an unruffled voice.

“To be perfectly honest, I’ve never met anyone as strong as the Captain. He’s insanely strong.”

“Martial artist Hyuk, I’m sorry, but I’ll be blunt. The imperial palace is practically a living monster. No matter how skilled a Supreme Peak master Young Master Jin is…”

“I wasn’t just talking about martial arts.”

“…?”

“Not his martial arts. The man himself. He’s just a strong person, period. That’s the kind of person the Captain is.”

“…!”

“Even if the palace is crawling with masters a level or two above him, they still won’t be able to handle the Captain. It makes no sense, but that’s how the Captain I know has always been.”

“Does that make any sense?”

“It shouldn’t, but somehow it does. Isn’t that why you asked our Captain to look after His Highness Prince Shangshan?”

Hong Jin was struck speechless. Then he understood.

When he’d first received Ma Sanbao’s secret letter saying the Embroidered Uniform Guard was on the move, why had Jin Taekyung been the first person to come to mind?

Trust between them?

Of course that mattered. But if trust alone had been the deciding factor, he would have brought Li Feng, a lay disciple of Huashan and the Assistant Military Commissioner of Shanxi Province.

[3341] Yama is a Buddhist lord of the underworld associated with judgment of the dead.

Though Li Feng and Hong Jin had briefly been at odds, Li Feng had remained unwaveringly loyal to Prince Shangshan for years, even when the prince had been all but cast adrift.

Compared to that, calling Hong Jin's relationship with Jin Taekyung one of mutual trust was a little embarrassing.

It was true that he had a fairly close business relationship with the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

But why?

Why had he asked for Jin Taekyung when he could have brought a proven loyalist or another master from the martial world?

Hong Jin already knew the answer.

"You're right, Martial artist Hyuk. I'd foolishly forgotten for a moment. I let my emotions get the better of me."

Seeing Hong Jin regain his composure as if nothing had happened, Hyuk Mujin grinned.

"I understand. It happens."

"Young Master Jin… yes, he really is an unfathomable person. Most of what I've heard about him is hard to believe. Of course, some of the information I went to great trouble to obtain must be nonsense."

"Nonsense? What information?"

"Oh, that?"

Hong Jin gave a small laugh.

"You'd laugh your head off if you heard it, too, Martial artist Hyuk. Apparently, Young Master Jin caught a dragon in Dongting Lake."

"That's definitely a rumor. It was more of an imugi than a dragon."

"Thought so. I paid a thousand gold pieces for that information, and this is the kind of ridiculous…"

Hong Jin stopped mid-sentence.

After a breathless silence, he finally managed to squeeze out a few words.

"What did you just say?"

"Huh? What do you mean?"

"No, just now. You said it wasn't a dragon…"

"Oh. An imugi. That's right. I was there, too. At first I thought I was dreaming, but after a while I realized I wasn't. Well, it didn't fly through the sky, so it definitely wasn't a dragon. It was an imugi."

"…?"

"By the way, what piece of shit leaked that information? That was supposed to have been handled quietly, under the strictest secrecy."

"…!"

Still reeling as if time had stopped, Hong Jin realized that everything Hyuk Mujin had said earlier had been true. Every last word.

Choosing Jin Taekyung really had been a stroke of genius.

An imugi? He caught an imugi? A person caught an imugi? Wait, those things actually exist?

The shock was so great that, for a moment, he even forgot to worry about the young prince.

Just as Hong Jin stood frozen with his mouth hanging open, Hyuk Mujin, who'd been cursing the rumor-monger for some time, cautiously spoke up.

"Um, would you be willing to spend another thousand gold pieces? I saw a talking tiger when I went to Nanman recently…"

"Move!"

A shout rang out, carried on internal energy. It was a voice Hong Jin knew all too well.

Hong Jin whipped his head around. His eyes widened like saucers when he saw who it was, while Hyuk Mujin, who'd been trying to strike a quiet deal, cried out on instinct.

"I'm sorry! Please spare me! I didn't say anything! May the Captain protect me—long live the Jin Family of Taiyuan!"

"I'm back. I have something to tell you, so let's get inside… Hyuk Mujin, you little shit, what's wrong with you? Why is he acting like that?"

Hong Jin had been about to tell him about the talking tiger, but his heart sank.

Where is His Highness…?

No matter how many times he looked around, he couldn't see him.

His young lord. The Great Nation's last hope.

Hong Jin rubbed his eyes with his sleeve again and again, but only one person was coming toward him.

Jin Taekyung, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon.

So it's come to this.

Something had definitely happened. That cruel Emperor's hand had finally reached his lord.

But Hong Jin fought back the haze gathering before his eyes.

It wasn't over yet. Surely that young martial artist had found some way out.

And as if to answer Hong Jin's hopes, Jin Taekyung—who'd nearly knocked the Embroidered Uniform Guards, standing firm as iron towers, flying with a shoulder-check—moved his lips.

"Get inside the pavilion. Right now!"

Of course, he didn't forget to smack his one loyal subordinate on the back of the head in the moment he had to spare.

“Glad you returned safely…”

Whack!

“Ow!”

“Yeah, I’m back safe and sound, you little shit.”

Back at the pavilion, I used my internal energy to soundproof the place, then quickly laid out what had happened.

As briefly as possible. Just the essentials.

First. The Emperor had locked Prince Shangshan inside Qianqing Palace under the pretext of protecting him.

Second. That Emperor was shameless as hell. Like the rabbit in the old folktale[3342] who left his liver behind, he seemed to keep his conscience hidden somewhere else. Oh, and he was a Supreme Peak master who looked way older than he was.

Third. It seemed like the beloved concubine the Emperor had taken from the City Lord of Sichuan Province a few months ago was in Qianqing Palace.

That wrapped up my summary. Even the twenty-first-century summary junkies who treated their eyes and scroll wheels as mere decorations would’ve given it a passing grade. Hong Jin’s expression had changed with every point; now all that remained was unconcealable shock.

“The City Lord of Sichuan Province’s concubine… is staying in Qianqing Palace?”

“Yes. Almost certainly. But before I draw my own conclusions, there’s something I need to ask you.”

I took a deep breath and asked again.

“Is it normal for the Empress or the imperial consorts to stay in Qianqing Palace?”

“Not at all.”

“Even a consort the Emperor favors?”

“Not at all. The rules of the imperial family are strict.”

“Then…”

“That’s right. There’s only one explanation.”

Hong Jin and I met eyes. The next moment, we spoke at the same time.

“Pregnant.”

“With child.”

Fuck.

The Emperor seemed to have found a new heir for the Great Nation to replace Prince Shangshan.

[3342] In the Korean tale Byeoljubujeon, a rabbit escapes after claiming it left its liver elsewhere and must go back to retrieve it.

Chapter 877

It hadn’t made sense from the start.

These were members of the imperial family, not Chunshik’s family next door. Why would they all gather in Qianqing Palace and live together like one big happy family?

Besides, I’d been there. The place was closer to a fortress or a labyrinth than the Emperor’s living quarters.

Its passages twisted around like the Yeonsan Rotary in Busan. I wouldn’t have been particularly surprised to turn a corner and run into a Minotaur.

And that wasn’t all.

Assassins swarmed everywhere like Chinese cockroaches, and mechanisms and formations had been installed to deal with unwelcome visitors.

At that point, even the dungeon beneath the dormitory of some British school of magic would’ve looked like a five-star hotel.

But the Emperor couldn’t have created such a hopeless place simply because he was crazy.

He had a clear purpose.

Ironclad security.

That was why he’d stationed enough force there to stop any assassin from breaking through and filled Qianqing Palace with loyal servants he could trust.

And that security had held perfectly—until today, when some young ruffian fresh from Murim realized Aehyang was there.

Until he guessed one of the secrets the Emperor had tried hardest to keep.

Pregnant?

I felt as if someone had hit me in the back of the head with a sledgehammer. Across the table, Hong Jin and Hyuk Mujin looked just as stunned.

“Pregnant…? Is that true?”

“I can’t be certain yet, but it’s highly likely.”

Hong Jin answered Hyuk Mujin’s dazed question, then added quietly, “It would be best if all of this were utter nonsense.”

I nodded heavily.

To hell with family ties—the Emperor had seized the throne after practically bathing in his relatives’ blood.

If a child of his own blood were born under these circumstances, it was obvious what would soon happen to Prince Shangshan.

Pulling up the weeds by the roots.

The child who'd once had to leave the imperial palace in a rush, wrapped in swaddling cloth, had now grown into a proper young boy. And the seed of a towering tree, sprung from the same root, had taken hold and flourished.

That was more than enough reason for a suspicious Emperor to eliminate Prince Shangshan.

Clearing the line of succession.

Just as there couldn't be two suns in the sky, there couldn't be two Sons of Heaven.

The current Emperor ruled over the court and the people by suppressing their discontent, but he remained a tyrant and a traitor.

No, that legacy would pass to his new heir as surely as the blood in his veins.

Along with the label of a traitor's child.

The powerful men holding back their resentment toward the Emperor wouldn't welcome that. Those who'd drawn up the pledge—basically a rolling paper for signatures—already had an excellent alternative in Prince Shangshan.

And if Prince Shangshan disappeared, the Emperor couldn't ask for a better outcome.

The air in the pavilion was heavy and cold, as if everyone were thinking the same thing I was.

Hong Jin had been staring into space, his gaze sunk deep, and a long silence had passed before he suddenly spoke.

"How did you guess?"

"What do you mean?"

"I know a fair amount about the imperial palace, but Young Master Jin couldn't have made that guess just from knowing that a woman named Aehyang was staying in Qianqing Palace."

I thought back to what had happened.

"I couldn't have guessed from the sound alone. There was one other thing."

"What was it?"

"The smell."

"The smell?"

"Yes. It was faint, but I could clearly smell medicinal herbs. More precisely, a decoction."

"A decoction…"

"To be honest, I do have people around me who know a lot about that sort of thing, but I don't know exactly which herbs were used or what went into it. Still, when I thought about it, I could work out the general answer."

I went on slowly.

"People take decoctions when they're sick or need to build up their strength. So why would the Emperor be giving Aehyang one now? Was she simply ill, and he was worried about her? Or was there another reason?"

Fit all the circumstances and clues together, and a picture emerged.

This time was no different.

From what I'd seen, the Emperor was no lovesick romantic, and Qianqing Palace was no ordinary place.

"I could hardly believe it myself. That's why I came back as quickly as I could."

Hong Jin let out a low groan.

"How likely do you think it is, Young Master Jin?"

"Do you want the cold, hard answer?"

"Yes. The cold, hard answer."

"At least ninety percent."

"…!"

"I'm sorry. But everything fits together too perfectly, as far as I can tell."

It was a damnable reality, but I had to acknowledge it.

Why had the Emperor, after leaving Prince Shangshan alone for over a decade, suddenly summoned him to the imperial capital? Why had he all but forced him to stay in Qianqing Palace?

And… why might he want to harm him?

One answer resolved every question.

A new heir.

Hong Jin couldn't have missed it, either.

No, he was probably more certain than anyone.

Even Ma Sanbao, who'd visited the night before, hadn't said a word about something this important. The Emperor had kept Aehyang's condition secret even from the East Depot.

Hong Jin, who'd held a fairly high position within the East Depot, couldn't fail to understand what that meant.

Call it a guess, but read it as certainty.

The Emperor's seed was growing inside Aehyang. It was all but a foregone conclusion.

He just doesn't want to believe it.

I muttered to myself and watched Hong Jin in silence. Then I brought up one of the questions that still hadn't been answered.

"I know this isn't the best time, but may I ask you something?"

Hong Jin's voice was subdued. "Anything."

"Why didn't the Emperor eliminate Prince Shangshan sooner? I mean…"

“Why didn’t he kill him?”

I nodded silently, and Hong Jin continued.

“I can’t know exactly what was in the Emperor’s heart, but one thing is certain. He was probably afraid of the backlash if he killed even a young prince who hadn’t been weaned yet.”

“Hadn’t he already killed countless people?”

“The purge didn’t happen overnight. Especially not the purge of the imperial family.”

“Tell me more.”

“Right after the Fourth Prince’s rebellion succeeded, the late Emperor and the other members of the direct imperial family were confined under strict surveillance. Then, over the course of a year, they died one after another, as if they’d arranged it among themselves. Strange, isn’t it?”

His voice was calm, but he couldn’t hide the shock and fear that lingered beneath it.

With a trembling hand, Hong Jin drew a long-stemmed tobacco pipe from inside his robe and lit it.

Hoo.

He took a deep breath and exhaled a pale plume of smoke.

For a moment, I thought I’d smelled it somewhere before. Then I turned my attention back to his story.

“I mobilized the East Depot’s full strength to rescue the late Emperor and the other royals, but every attempt failed. Everything I did was already being watched. It wouldn’t have surprised me if they’d thrown me in prison the very next day.”

“But the Emperor didn’t kill you.”

“That’s right. Maybe it was our old ties, or maybe it was a whim. Either way, the Fourth Prince let me live.”

“Old ties?”

“I spent decades in the imperial palace. I served the late Emperor closely, so I crossed paths with the Fourth Prince often enough. He was a talented, sharp-minded boy in many ways. At least back then.”

Hong Jin watched the smoke drift toward the ceiling, his gaze empty.

“In any case, I survived. I was finally allowed to see the late Emperor shortly before he passed away. His mind was clouded, almost as if he’d gone mad, but he still entrusted Prince Shangshan to me.”

“Wait. Gone mad?”

“Yes. But why would that—oh.”

Hong Jin realized what I was getting at. Confusion crossed his face.

“Surely not?”

"It's possible. What exactly were his symptoms?"

"I saw him for less than fifteen minutes, so it's hard to say. He'd been healthy enough to father a child at his age, but he was old."

"I know. The rebellion and confinement must have been a terrible shock. But I need you to tell me exactly what you saw. That's the only way…"

"We can see whether it was like what happened to the City Lord of Sichuan Province?"

"…!"

Hyuk Mujin, who'd been listening with a dry swallow, widened his eyes. I nodded quietly.

Two words came to mind—Dark Heaven—along with the cursed creature I'd seen only about two weeks ago.

Blood Soul Gu.

A venomous creature that even Sichuan's most renowned physicians had failed to detect.

It left almost no trace as it drove its host to death. Created centuries ago by the Five Poisons Sect of Nanman, it had been found in the corpse of the City Lord of Sichuan Province.

And the City Lord of Sichuan Province started showing strange symptoms months ago, on his way back from the imperial capital.

Could it really be a coincidence?

Hong Jin's face had gone so rigid that I thought I could find the answer there.

"How likely do you think it is?"

After a silence, Hong Jin answered.

"Ten percent. No… twenty."

"Do you know how the other royals confined back then died?"

"It was never made public. They were simply forgotten."

"Then…"

"I'm going to contact Eunuch Ma tonight at the latest. His Highness's life… may be in immediate danger."

Right.

If the Emperor had planted Blood Soul Gu in the City Lord of Sichuan Province a few months ago and in the late Emperor more than a decade ago—or if Dark Heaven had done it with his help—Prince Shangshan was as good as dead.

But…

"I entrusted His Highness with a precious artifact I'd been carrying. We don't need to worry too much right away."

The Myriad-Poison Ring.

The Sichuan Tang Clan's divine artifact had detoxified the Formless Ultimate Poison that had brought down even Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King, though he'd suffered a serious injury.

Blood Soul Gu was, in the end, a venomous creature created by the Five Poisons Sect. It couldn't be beyond the Myriad-Poison Ring's power.

No. It had to work.

"And one more thing. There's something I'd like to ask Eunuch Ma to do for me personally."

Hong Jin's eyes widened at what I said next.

Hangzhou, in Zhejiang Province, had been one of the finest cities in the world for pleasure-seekers even before the imperial court moved there.

It had countless historic sights and beautiful views. Vast quantities of goods and wealth moved along its canals, and its brightly lit streets bustled with people late into the night.

A city that never slept, in every sense.

So there was nothing unusual about a customer arriving late at one of the many shops lining the imperial capital's main road.

The employee's attitude toward him was a little unusual, though.

"Go on, take a look around. If you like anything, ask me then."

The middle-aged employee looked bored to death, his manner dripping with brusqueness. The customer studied him for a moment, then parted his lips.

"I've brought a message from the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon."

"…!"

Beneath a sign that read Hyuk Family Textile Shop, the middle-aged employee—no, Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King—opened his eyes wide.

Chapter 878

The moment he heard the Sound Transmission, Jeok Cheongang moved with remarkable speed—and made it look perfectly natural.

“Oh, you’re looking for the finest Shu brocade[3343]? You should’ve said so earlier. Come on in.”

“No, wait. I was only…”

The man disguised as a customer tried to protest, but the terrifying qi flowing through Jeok Cheongang’s grip on his wrist left him gaping.

“Gah.”

The pressure felt as though it would crush his entire body.

He instinctively summoned his internal energy to protect his wrist. It did no good.

No—when he saw the flames pouring from Jeok Cheongang’s eyes, even the last scrap of his will crumbled to ash.

What the hell is with that look…

This wasn’t a man. He was a born beast of prey. A predator.

Frozen stiff against his will, the man was dragged deep into the textile shop.

Between towering stacks of cotton cloth and silk, two figures emerged like ghosts from a shadowy corner.

Thud.

In the faint lamplight, the faces of two young men, both around thirty, came into view.

One wore an expression as dry as if he’d been chewing sand. The other was handsome, but his sharply upturned eyes made him look almost sly.

Neither had the sort of face that made dealing with people easy.

The especially grim-looking young man spoke first, in a painfully awkward tone.

“Hey, Mr. Jeok. What’s going on?”

Jeok Cheongang answered, “Hey, Mr. Jeok? Are you that eager to shit blood?”

“…Oh. Not right now?”

“Can’t you tell by looking? How did you survive as a wandering martial artist with that little sense?”

“I’m sorry.”

The grim-looking young man bowed his head. Song Ilseom spoke again, more carefully this time.

“May I ask who that man is?”

“A customer.”

[3343] Shu is a historical name for Sichuan. Shu brocade is a silk textile traditionally woven there.

Jeok Cheongang gave the brief reply, then added, “But he used Sound Transmission. Mentioned a sobriquet that starts with ‘Blazing’ and ends with ‘Dragon.‘”

Song Ilseom replied at once. “I’ll close up for today.”

“Make sure the shop is secured. Oh, first, circle the area. If you see anyone suspicious, grab the bastard and bring him here too.”

“Yes. But if I have no choice…?”

“What the hell are you asking me for? In that situation, slit his throat first.”

“Understood.”

“Just clean up after yourself. Make sure no one notices.”

“Leave it to me.”

Song Ilseom bowed politely and left at once. The man who’d heard their conversation felt his knees go weak.

Is this a textile shop or a slaughterhouse?

Could they be… an assassin organization?

Nothing in his orders had mentioned anything like this.

As his mouth went dry, the other young man spoke up.

“What should I do?”

“Bring the rest here. Every last one of them.”

“It’ll be difficult to bring everyone right away. One of them is out.”

“Damn it, what kind of goddamn idiot can’t sit still for a minute?”

“Well, it’s Young Lady Ju.”

“She’s allowed to go out for a while. Right. Of course. She must’ve gone to check on the situation nearby. How thoughtful of her.”

“…”

“Quit looking at me like that and go fetch the other freeloaders.”

“Yes.”

“Hey.”

“Yes?”

Jeok Cheongang stopped the young man as he was turning away and frowned.

“I told you not to look at me like that. Do my words sound like bullshit to you?”

“My eyes have looked this way since I was a child, so there’s nothing I can do about—no. I’m sorry. If I get the chance someday, I’ll be reborn.”

“Good. That way you can reincarnate. Maybe you’ll have kinder-looking eyes next time.”

“Yes…”

Sama Pyo, the young man cursed with sorrowfully upturned eyes, left with a feeble reply. Jeok Cheongang suddenly reached toward something.

Swish.

Qi stretched out, invisible, and the air around them trembled.

So did the man's pupils as he watched a wooden chest float through the air toward them.

Seizing an Object Through Empty Space!

The man belonged to a rather extraordinary organization himself, so this wasn't the first time he'd seen the technique. But he knew even a skilled internal-energy master would have to concentrate to pull in a chest that heavy.

Yet the middle-aged man before him had done it with ease.

With one casual wave of his hand.

Could it be…?

A possibility occurred to him, and he spoke cautiously.

"Could your sobriquet be the Fire King?"

Instead of answering, Jeok Cheongang blinked at him as if he were some curious creature. Then he kicked the man in the shin as fast as a flash.

Crack!

"Gah!"

"You little shit! You're still wet behind the ears, and half your tongue seems to be missing. What was that—'you'?"

"W-wait! Wait! Hear me out! I…"

"Stay right where you are. Move and you'll get hurt worse."

Thwack! Thwack! Thwack!

The grappling technique he'd practiced until his arms were bruised and the footwork technique he'd drilled until his leg muscles screamed were useless now.

After blows to the shin, stomach, chest, and finally the bridge of his nose, the man collapsed like a kite with its string cut.

Thump.

Of course, he wasn't even allowed to pass out.

"Up."

He sprang to his feet far faster than he'd fallen. His voice trembled as he spoke.

"Are you Great Hero Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King?"

His tone could not have been more respectful.

Jeok Cheongang had perched on the chest he'd drawn over with Seizing an Object Through Empty Space. He looked as satisfied as a surgeon who'd just completed a difficult operation.

"Your severed tongue has finally grown back in the right place. Yes, this old man is Jeok Cheongang. And who are you?"

"This humble servant…"

“I don’t need to know a nobody like you’s name. Just tell me who you work for. I can tell at a glance you’re an eunuch, anyway.”

“…!”

“What? Was that such a big secret?”

The man—or rather, the eunuch—was momentarily speechless. Jeok Cheongang gave a short laugh and continued.

“I’ll admit, you’ve put together a convincing disguise. That human-skin mask, even the beard—they look like they’re yours. But that’s not enough to fool this old man.”

“Then how did you…?”

“I felt your pulse earlier. You didn’t have nearly enough yang qi for a man. Now, tell me—which is more likely in the imperial palace courtyard: running into a eunuch, or running into a martial artist without balls? I don’t need to spell it out, do I?”

The eunuch swallowed hard. Jeok Cheongang’s judgment was sharp, but what unsettled him more was that knowing he was a eunuch hadn’t changed the man’s attitude at all.

“Then you must know where I came from, too.”

“Of course. The only place in the world with the perverse hobby of ripping the balls off perfectly healthy men is the imperial palace.”

“…”

“Stop rambling and answer what I asked. Exactly where in the imperial palace do you serve? Are you under that eunuch who’s Prince Shangshan’s right hand? The East Depot? Or are you one of the ones licking the Emperor’s…”

“The East Depot.”

“The East Depot, eh? The place where they gather the most stubborn and vicious eunuchs under heaven. So why has one of you come all the way here?”

“The Blazing Flame Divine Dragon—no, your Disciple asked me to pass on several messages.”

“And the Emperor isn’t laying a trap?”

“Absolutely not. Your Disciple was the one who told us you were staying here.”

“That sounds plausible. But with the East Depot’s intelligence network, it wouldn’t be strange if you’d found out some other way. How will you prove it?”

As Jeok Cheongang’s eyes narrowed, the eunuch hurried to answer.

“M-Mong-su-ta.”

“What?”

“Your Disciple told me to say it. I have no idea what it means, but he said if I passed it on, I’d at least avoid shitting blood…”

The eunuch waited in dread. Fortunately, Jeok Cheongang knew exactly what the clumsily pronounced word meant.

Monster.

The monsters from the other world that had stained the realm of immortals with blood.

And only two people under heaven knew about them: Jin Taekyung and himself.

“Hmm. He definitely sent you.”

“Y-yes.”

“If you’d said that sooner, I wouldn’t have had to hit you. Forgive this old man’s rudeness, my good castrate.”

The eunuch wanted to say that calling a eunuch a castrate was about as rude as it got, but he held his tongue.

If he ran his mouth again, he might really end up shitting blood.

His best course was to leave as quickly as possible.

Swish.

He reached deep into his robes, took out a small tube, and handed it over. Jeok Cheongang’s eyes grew serious.

“Is this the missive Jin Taekyung told you to deliver?”

“Yes.”

“And the other one?”

As Jeok Cheongang had said, there were two tightly sealed tubes. The eunuch spoke in a low voice.

“The person I serve ordered me to deliver this one.”

“The person you serve?”

“You seem to know the Deputy Military Commissioner of Shanxi Province.”

“Hong Jin? I’ve never met him, but I heard about him on the way here. A fairly decent eunuch, apparently.”

“…Yes. The person I serve is close to him. He said the contents would help with what you’re going to do.”

“Is that all? Nothing else to tell me?”

“That’s all. I’m only a messenger.”

That was the extent of the eunuch’s orders.

He hurried out of the vast slaughterhouse—or rather, the textile shop—using a footwork technique. Left alone, Jeok Cheongang broke the seals and drew out two rolled-up missives.

Rustle.

The smell of oil-treated paper mingled with the stale air inside the shop.

Jin Taekyung’s missive opened with the immortal line “Looks like we’re screwed.” Jeok Cheongang read it, then quickly went through the information prepared with the East Depot’s help. He let out a quiet sigh.

“What a goddamn mess.”

And then—

Fwoosh.

Flames from Samadhi[3344] True Fire swallowed both missives, writhing in the darkness.

As Jeok Cheongang silently watched the missives turn to ash and vanish with a soft rustle in the blink of an eye—

“I brought everyone.”

Sama Pyo, who’d left only moments ago, approached with some familiar faces, then stopped short.

“Where is that man?”

“I sent him away a little while ago. Fortunately, he wasn’t suspicious.”

“Did you find out who he was?”

“An eunuch. One Jin Taekyung sent.”

“…What?”

Jeok Cheongang ignored Sama Pyo’s confusion at that painfully brief explanation.

“Where the hell were those people? What took you so long to bring them?”

Yaaawn.

Sama Pyo nudged Taishan in the side as he yawned, his eyes still sleepy, then hesitated.

“Well, you see…”

“Holed up in a corner sleeping, were they?”

“I think they dozed off for a bit.”

“Tell him next time he’ll sleep forever.”

“Yes.”

“What about Namho?”

Sama Pyo glanced at the old man, Namho, who was panting in rumpled clothes, and answered.

“He was choking Taishan.”

“Why?”

“Taishan drank all the liquor Elder Namho had hidden away.”

For a brief, tempting moment, Jeok Cheongang imagined choking Taishan and Namho at the same time. Then he sighed deeply.

“Quit screwing around and get ready, all of you.”

“Pardon me, but what should we…”

“We’re going to the imperial palace soon.”

“What? How?”

Jeok Cheongang’s eyes gleamed as he answered.

[3344] Samadhi is a Sanskrit term for a state of deep meditative absorption.

“Don’t worry. We’ve been formally invited.”

Chapter 879

Where there are people, there are rumors.

Hangzhou, Zhejiang Province—the heart of the world and the new imperial capital of the Great Nation—was no exception.

If anything, it was one of the worst places for them.

Wherever you went in Hangzhou, you found people repeating rumors they'd heard from someone else as if they were facts, spittle flying as they talked.

They discussed the beauty of a high official's new concubine—the sort of official said to be powerful enough to knock a bird from the sky. They grew furious over the story that he'd squeezed the people dry to buy her expensive jewelry. And when they heard the Embroidered Uniform Guard had begun investigating, they raised their cups again and again.

"Times like this, there's no one more dependable than the Embroidered Uniform Guard. He may have committed crimes against his own family to take the throne, but at least he knows how to get things done…"

"Shh. Shut that reckless mouth of yours. Didn't you say one of that old official's sons was in the Embroidered Uniform Guard?"

"I did."

"And he still got caught? Even with connections in the Guard?"

"Oh, that one. Apparently, he was dismissed not long ago."

"Really? Why?"

"Don't know. Maybe he was on some secret assignment. He disappeared about a month ago, then came back a few days ago with his face all swollen."

"Swollen?"

"Yeah. Looks like he got a real beating for something he did wrong."

The story drifted away as quickly as it had come.

Poets and scholars seeking inspiration among scenic landmarks. Idlers who'd traveled a thousand li[3345] to visit Hangzhou, the city of pleasure.

Poor scholars quietly sipping cheap strong liquor over a plate of dumplings, and wealthy merchants patting their bulging bellies.

Hangzhou was full of all kinds of people, and they talked freely about what they'd seen and heard.

"I've finally seen West Lake. I could die right now without a single regret. If I had my way, I'd stay in Hangzhou for another year."

"You've still got more than a month before you have to go home. What's the rush? Let's take our time looking around, then visit the Zhoushan Archipelago before we leave."

[3345]The Chinese li is a unit of distance equal to 500 m (0.311 mi); a thousand li is about 500 km (311 mi).

“The Zhoushan Archipelago? Are you thinking of going to Mount Putuo?”

“That’s right. I don’t believe in Buddha, but if a famous mountain like that is nearby, I might as well visit while I’m here.”

“But I heard the nuns there are practically martial artists…”

“If you mean the Buddhist nuns at Putuo Temple, there’s no need to worry. They disappeared more than ten years ago, when the imperial capital moved here and Hangzhou’s martial artists were driven out.”

The poets and scholars who’d come to see Hangzhou’s famous sights were in fairly high spirits. The merchants seated nearby, on the other hand, kept pouring down liquor with sour expressions.

“Things are looking bad in Sichuan these days. Prices are swinging so wildly they’re impossible to predict. I’ve taken quite a hit.”

“Then is that rumor true? That foreign forces are about to pour in from Qinghai? They say even the Kunlun Sect, based in Qinghai, is on the brink.”

“Foreign forces? They’re nothing but lawless thugs from the martial world—fanatics thoroughly bewitched by demons, at that. They’ve given themselves a fancy new name, but they’ll still get smashed by the Central Plains sects, just like the Demonic Cult did in the past. The Imperial Guards won’t even need to get involved this time.”

“You’ve been in Hangzhou too long these past few years. You don’t know the first thing about what’s happening in the world.”

“Oh? Have you heard something?”

“A martial artist I’ve known for a long time is with the Murim Alliance now… He says this is far worse than when the Demonic Cult invaded.”

“What? That bad?”

“Just look at what happened in Sichuan a few months ago. Nearly ten thousand troops gathered and fought a bloody battle. At that scale, you can hardly call it an internal dispute within the martial world. It’s practically a war between small nations.”

“…!”

“And that’s not all. Nothing’s been confirmed yet, but there are signs of some kind of movement in Yunnan, too.”

“Yunnan? You don’t mean those Nanman barbarians?”

“That’s right. They say the Nanman Beast Palace is mobilizing all its forces and marching north into the Central Plains. If the rumor’s true, they may have already reached Sichuan or Guangxi.”

“Hah. The fanatics weren’t enough, and now the barbarians are eyeing the Central Plains too?”

“No, it’s the complete opposite. They’re joining the Murim Alliance to fight Dark Heaven. But something about it is strange.”

“If that’s true, shouldn’t we be glad? What’s strange about it?”

“Well… I heard those barbarians are fanatics too.”

“What?”

“Apparently they spend all day spouting weird nonsense about how fighting Dark Heaven is a holy war, and how the Earth Mother Goddess watches over them.”

“What kind of fucking nonsense is that?”

“How should I know? I only heard it through my connections, several people down the line. Anyway, it’s clear something much bigger is happening than anyone thinks.”

The continent was vast. But merchants, whose line of work forced them to keep their ears open, heard all kinds of information through all kinds of channels.

Whether a rumor was true or not, it was worth remembering. Someday, it might make them a fortune.

Just as the inn had grown noisy with conversation and clinking cups, someone tossed out a slurred remark.

“Oh, have you heard? They say His Highness, Prince Shangshan, is staying in the imperial palace.”

“…!”

“…!”

In an instant, the air that had been warm with drink went cold.

Silence fell over the inn. Every gaze turned toward the same place.

“Huh?”

Startled by all the eyes suddenly fixed on him, the thoroughly drunk middle-aged man stammered.

“W-Why is everyone looking at me?”

Then a few people in the now-quiet inn spoke up.

“What did you just say?”

“His Highness, Prince Shangshan, is staying in the imperial palace? Not in Shanxi Province, his fief?”

“Are you sure about what you just said?”

Disaster always came from liquor and loose tongues.

As the questions came flying at him, the middle-aged man realized something was wrong. He sobered up all at once.

“I-I don’t know if it’s true. I only heard it somewhere. It’s probably just a rumor.”

“Even if it’s a rumor, tell us. Everything you know.”

“No, no. I must’ve said something foolish because I’m drunk. I need to leave now, so please let me through…”

His flushed face had long since turned pale.

Though he managed to stagger to his feet, he couldn’t take a single step. Something dropped from above and stopped him in his tracks.

Thud.

It landed right in front of his feet with a solid thump. The leather cord around its opening came loose, spilling the contents.

Clatter.

Silver nyang spilled from the money pouch, glinting in the dim light.

At a glance, there were more than thirty.

As people gaped at the enormous sum, a quiet voice reached their ears.

“That was quite an interesting story.”

Everyone turned again. No—looked up.

On the second floor, a young scholar sat alone at a table, watching the middle-aged man.

“Fifty silver nyang. I’d say that’s enough for the story. What do you think?”

“…!”

The middle-aged man’s eyelid twitched.

He was stunned by the sum of fifty silver nyang—and by the young scholar who’d tossed it down so casually.

Enough?

It was more than enough. Far more.

Fifty silver nyang.

As a day laborer on Hangzhou’s canals, he’d never even dreamed of touching so much money. Just looking at it made his heart pound.

But the possible consequences of the words he’d tossed out so carelessly weighed on him as heavily as that pouch.

“W-Who are you, sir? You look like you come from a good family. Did I say something I shouldn’t have…?”

“There’s no need to worry. I’m simply curious.”

Fifty silver nyang just to satisfy his curiosity?

That was ridiculous.

Even a rich young master wouldn’t throw away that kind of money for no reason.

The young scholar’s answer made the middle-aged man even more uneasy, but he couldn’t let a chance to change his life slip away.

Even this vast imperial capital, the center of the world, had its share of poor people. For one of them, fifty silver nyang meant a whole new life.

Clatter.

Having made up his mind, he hurriedly gathered the spilled silver and stuffed it back into the pouch before anyone could steal it. He swallowed, then spoke to the young scholar.

“Near dawn, I was hanging around a gambling den when I heard the story. They said several hundred members of the Embroidered Uniform Guard had entered through the North Gate a few days ago. Even for the imperial capital, the guards along the main road and the atmosphere were unusual that day.”

“Go on.”

“A few sharp-eyed fellows thought something was off, so they risked a scolding and snuck a look. Would you believe it? Those terrifying guards had surrounded a single carriage so tightly you could barely see it.”

“A carriage?”

“Yes. Not particularly grand, not especially small, either. The sort of thing you’d use to transport goods.”

“And His Highness, Prince Shangshan, was inside?”

“They said they saw him with their own eyes. A boy’s face appeared at the window—he looked extraordinary at a glance. They said he was definitely the Prince Shangshan everyone’s heard about…”

“That alone doesn’t seem like enough.”

“Pardon?”

The young scholar cut him off and continued.

“It’s been more than ten years since His Highness, Prince Shangshan, left the capital. He was very young even then, and even now he isn’t fifteen. How could someone who spends his nights hanging around a gambling den recognize His Highness’s face?”

“I-I suppose he guessed after seeing hundreds of guards make such a fuss.”

“Perhaps. But there must have been another reason for that guess. I’ve already paid you well. Tell me everything you saw and heard, without leaving anything out.”

The inn had been bustling with noise only moments ago. Now it was as quiet as a grave.

That was what Prince Shangshan meant to ordinary people.

Noble, yet pitiable.

An unfortunate member of the imperial family, exiled in all but name to far-off Shanxi Province after losing his entire family to an older brother who’d defied the bonds of kinship.

And now they said His Highness, Prince Shangshan, had returned to the capital.

After more than ten years—and secretly, surrounded by the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

Under the weight of all those questioning looks, the middle-aged man hunched his shoulders and struggled to speak.

“At first, I thought the same thing as you, Young Master. How could it be true? How could the likes of him recognize His Highness, Prince Shangshan? Why would someone who’d spent more than ten years in the provinces suddenly come to the capital? That sort of thing. But…”

“But?”

“When I heard the rest, it sounded pretty convincing.”

The middle-aged man paused to catch his breath. Then, in a silence so deep not even breathing could be heard, he continued.

“That fellow jumped up and said, ‘The Emperor—no, His Majesty the Emperor—is expecting an heir. Of course his younger brother, His Highness Prince Shangshan, would come. He was surely invited to the celebration that’s about to be held.’”

“…!”

“…!”

For an instant, an invisible shockwave swept through the inn.

Sharp intakes of breath broke the silence, and the dim lamplight fell on people frozen in place.

The young scholar’s face had gone rigid, too.

“An… heir?”

“Yes. He didn’t know whether it was the Empress or one of the concubines, but he said she was definitely pregnant.”

The young scholar’s gaze darkened.

Some of the more than a hundred customers in the inn reacted the same way.

The ones biting their lips to hide their shock were poets, scholars, and merchants. Unlike the middle-aged man and a few other simpletons, they understood exactly what those words might mean.

If all of that is true…

The thought alone frightened them.

A new heir for an Emperor who’d long had none. And the return of Prince Shangshan, the only direct member of the imperial family to survive the bloodshed more than a decade ago.

What could that possibly mean?

A purge…!

A silent scream rang in their heads. Their backs were already slick with cold sweat as they sensed the danger.

They should have left long ago.

Whether the rumor was true or not, this was a story they should never have heard.

At that moment, they felt as if they were standing at the edge of a thousand-zhang[3346] cliff, one misstep from a fall they could never climb back from.

The middle-aged man, meanwhile, was happily counting his silver. He and a few others hadn't grasped the danger at all.

"So His Majesty is finally expecting an heir. What a blessing for the whole country."

"What blessing? The child will inherit the blood of a man who broke the bonds of kinship to take the throne—"

"Please, just shut your mouth. Do you have three or four lives to spare? Do you want to get me killed too? If someone reports us, we're all finished."

"If you're so afraid of people overhearing, go hide at home. People have always cursed the ruler where he can't hear them. The Embroidered Uniform Guard aren't ghosts. What are the chances we'll run into them? Honestly."

"But what will happen to His Highness, Prince Shangshan?"

"What would a nobody like me know? I just hope he stays in the capital from now on. He suffered such terrible things as a child. Who knows what that's done to him? It's about time he could live somewhere in peace."

Stories always grew in the telling, and people believed what they wanted to believe.

The incredible rumor the middle-aged man had passed on had already become, in the minds of the crowd, a fact backed by solid evidence. A few of those who'd sensed the danger from the start forced their trembling legs to carry them across the noisy inn.

Some meant to escape before they were caught in a fire they couldn't survive.

Others meant to confirm the information and use it.

But when they reached the entrance, they realized they'd stepped into a mire they could no longer escape.

"Where are you all hurrying off to?"

At the low voice, a dozen or so shadows blocking the old doorway stepped forward together.

Step.

For a moment, it was as if the world had stopped.

Those hurrying to leave saw ten men with bamboo hats pulled low—and golden armor flashing beneath their wind-cloaks.

"The Embroidered Uniform Guard…!"

The words escaped someone's lips like a scream, and the inn froze.

Then the young scholar, who'd been sitting silently in thought, spoke.

"That was a truly interesting story. Well worth fifty silver nyang."

The middle-aged man, clutching the pouch full of silver, stared blankly.

[3346] A zhang is a traditional Chinese unit of length equal to about 3.03 m (9.94 ft); a thousand zhang is about 3.03 km (1.88 mi).

“Young Master, what on earth is going on…?”

“I’m no young master. But I still want to hear more of your story.”

“Y-Young Master! You can’t do this! You can’t…!”

The young scholar paid no attention to his shouts.

The young scholar—no, the hundred-household officer of the Embroidered Uniform Guard—addressed his subordinates at the entrance in a mild voice.

“What are you waiting for? Arrest every one of them.”

“Loyalty!”

With a sharp salute, ten golden figures raced in every direction.

Every one of them was a master whose martial arts had reached Supreme First Rate or Peak.

Shouts and tearful pleas burst out across the inn. An instant later, the screams of those trying to flee or fight back drowned them out.

Bang! Crash!

Amid the crashes ringing through the inn, the Embroidered Uniform Guard captain leaped from the second-floor railing and landed lightly on the ground. He patted the trembling middle-aged man on the shoulder.

“Now, it’s noisy here. Let’s go somewhere else and talk. You can tell me what else you know, who fed you that bullshit, and who else has heard it.”

He didn’t bother to tell the man what would pay for his story this time.

It wouldn’t be silver. But it would shine just as brightly—and be far sharper.

After hearing the report, the Emperor remained silent for a long time, even after the messenger withdrew. Only when one other person remained did he finally speak.

“What do you think?”

From between the dense strings of pearls and the silks drifting around them, someone answered.

“Someone must have spread the rumor deliberately.”

“Who?”

“Isn’t it obvious? The East Depot, Jin Taekyung—the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon—or… both.”

“They’ve joined forces?”

“That’s the only possibility for now.”

“I’m beginning to regret it. Perhaps I shouldn’t have listened to you and let Jin Taekyung into the imperial palace.”

The Emperor clicked his tongue and murmured, almost to himself.

“Did the person who sent you to me foresee this, too?”

Someone beyond the silks answered.

“That person is greater and wiser than anyone I know. But Jin Taekyung is unpredictable. He cannot be easily judged.”

Without realizing it, the Emperor nodded.

Jin Taekyung’s audacity was impossible to fathom. So were his martial prowess and his convictions.

Whatever their respective positions, the Jin Taekyung he’d seen the day before had been enough to make even the Emperor let out an incredulous laugh.

“We’d better rein him in before he jeopardizes the great undertaking. And what of the target?”

“It won’t be easy. Not at present.”

“Of course. If it were easy, he wouldn’t have been a thorn in our side for more than ten years. But the Great Nation cannot be set right until he’s gone. You must see it done.”

Rustle.

In place of an answer, a faint breeze stirred the silks.

The Emperor realized that the person who’d been there only moments ago had vanished. He gave a bitter smile and muttered,

“The rumor’s already out. There’s no point trying to hide it now. We’ll have to make it true.”

It was the moment that heralded a grand celebration of the birth of a new heir to inherit the Great Nation.

Chapter 880

A fire rising from a dense bed of reeds was not easily stopped, even by fierce wind and rain.

Neither were the rumors that had suddenly begun sweeping through the Imperial Capital.

“Have you heard? His Highness, Prince Shangshan, is in the imperial palace right now…”

“They say the Emperor finally has an heir.”

“I heard they’ll hold a great banquet soon. That must be why His Highness, Prince Shangshan, returned after more than ten years.”

“But an heir? Does that mean Her Majesty the Empress is pregnant?”

“Who knows for sure? Jang next door told me it’s a new concubine the Emperor recently took…”

“Jang next door? The butcher?”

“That’s the one. You know him too?”

“Of course. That man knows how to slaughter livestock. But where on earth did he hear it?”

“From someone… what was his name? Oh, right. Wu, who runs the shop across the street.”

“Then who did Wu hear it from?”

“Li the woodcutter.”

Even the Embroidered Uniform Guard, said to be capable of catching a bird in flight and dragging it off to prison, could scarcely silence so many mouths.

The rumors spread so quickly that the imperial palace’s towering walls might as well not have been there. In a single night, the Embroidered Uniform Guard dragged away hundreds of people.

“If you want to live, tell us everything. Which bastard has been spreading this nonsense?”

“Eek! I’ll tell you! I’ll tell you everything!”

Everyone knew what happened when the Embroidered Uniform Guard took someone away. You were as good as dead. Even the highest officials could be cut down like weeds.

The prisoners knew that reputation well. Before the guards even brought out the instruments of torture, they told them everything they knew. Yet for all the ease of the interrogations, the Guard learned nothing useful.

“What did they say?”

“All of them say the same thing. They heard it from ordinary neighbors with no ties to the imperial palace, street vendors, or strangers they met at inns and pleasure houses.”

“Damn it.”

Countless names had come up during the interrogations, but every lead was an empty shell. The people the prisoners named were utterly ordinary, and the source of the rumors spreading across the capital remained a mystery.

It was like being ordered to find a vein of gold in an exhausted mine.

But they were the Embroidered Uniform Guard. In this vast realm, they owed absolute loyalty to one person alone: the Emperor. Whatever the circumstances, they had to produce results.

“Begin the interrogation in earnest.”

“Pardon?”

“Use whatever methods you need. Find the culprits as quickly as possible.”

“B-but those people…”

“They’ve thrown the Great Nation into turmoil with baseless rumors and sullied His Majesty’s name. Are they subjects of this country, or traitors?”

The officers fell silent at their superior’s command. They knew the prisoners trembling in their cells were nothing more than ignorant commoners.

Just as no storeroom was so clean that shaking it wouldn’t stir up dust, countless high officials had passed through the Guard’s prison, each with a crime or two to their name, great or small.

But these people were ordinary subjects. When the wind blew, they bent; when it rained, they got wet.

And now the officers were to torture them. They had to send their superiors results, even if it meant killing those people horribly or leaving them half-crippled.

The officers took pride in punishing corrupt and disloyal people in power to set the Great Nation in order. This left them uneasy.

But…

“Answer me!”

At their superior’s renewed roar, they realized they had nowhere left to retreat. Military discipline was strict, especially in an institution as powerful as the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

“We obey the Thousand Captain’s orders.”

They answered reluctantly and were about to return to the cells when a quiet voice stopped them.

“Everyone, halt.”

A middle-aged man appeared and swept his gaze over them. His golden armor was spotless, his bearing imposing. The Thousand Captain recognized him at once, his eyes widening.

“Thousand Captain Jeong?”

Jeong Hogun gave a curt nod.

“It’s been a while, Thousand Captain Hong. How are the interrogations of last night’s prisoners going?”

“We’ll have proper results soon. But what do you mean, halt?”

“Just what I said. Stop. There’s nothing more to uncover.”

The Thousand Captain, who had been roaring at his subordinates moments ago, frowned at Jeong Hogun’s firm reply.

“You’re interfering more than usual today. Are you planning to overstep your authority?”

“Of course not.”

“Then what is this? No matter how much the Guard Commander favors you, this is clearly—”

“An imperial order.”

“What?”

“I said it’s an imperial order. The moment you receive it, you are to stop interrogating or torturing the prisoners brought in last night and release every one of them within half an hour. His Majesty commands it.”

“…!”

“What are you all waiting for? Obey the imperial order.”

Jeong Hogun’s sudden arrival settled the matter in an instant.

The Embroidered Uniform Guard officers knelt and formally received the imperial command, then streamed away like the tide to release the hundreds of prisoners. Their superior, the Thousand Captain, asked Jeong Hogun with a stony expression,

“What’s going on? And what about our report?”

“Forget the whole matter. That is His Majesty’s will.”

Jeong Hogun’s voice was as flat and unreadable as ever.

“I’ll get straight to the point. The rumors are true.”

“What?”

“I said they’re all true. The imperial court will make an official announcement soon. The Embroidered Uniform Guard will be responsible for the task.”

“…!”

“His Majesty has a good idea where the rumors came from, but he says there’s no point trying to establish the exact facts. Whoever planned and spread them so thoroughly will have left almost no evidence.”

“T-then…”

"A banquet will soon be held at the imperial palace to celebrate. His Highness, Prince Shangshan, will attend, as will every civil and military official. Until you receive further orders, see to security inside and outside the palace."

The matter of the Emperor's heir had been a closely guarded secret known to only a handful of people. The Thousand Captain had known of Prince Shangshan's return, but nothing of this. His face hardened like stone.

"You mean to confirm all of it—and announce it to the people? Now?"

"Exactly."

"Do you understand what that means, Thousand Captain Jeong? Or are you pretending you don't?"

"I understand well enough. Including something else you're overlooking."

"Something I'm overlooking? What are you—"

"What a mere military officer like me can guess, surely His Majesty the Emperor knows."

"…!"

"Follow the order."

Jeong Hogun left the speechless Thousand Captain behind. As he passed the dark cells and the people emerging from them one by one, he thought:

This is where it begins.

He could feel it: a great storm that would soon sweep through this splendid city called the Imperial Capital—no, through the whole realm.

The imperial court's formal announcement would be the first arrow, signaling everything to come.

Many people will gather. Many words will be exchanged.

The people drawn into this now would not be ordinary folk like those filling the cells. The so-called educated classes would take notice. Those with power, who could grasp what was happening and act on it, would begin to move.

And in the process…

At last, we'll know friend from foe.

Until war began, there was no telling who was an enemy and who was an ally. But when everyone drew their weapons and the fighting began in earnest, with no retreat possible, the truth would finally show itself.

Whatever form it took.

What choice will that bastard make in this war?

Jeong Hogun thought of a young man he could never quite figure out.

A reckless young ruffian of the martial world who had thrown himself into the eye of the storm.

"As daring as ever. Just like a little over ten years ago."

Hong Jin broke a long silence with those words, and I nodded quietly. I felt the same way.

This is more than I expected.

As soon as Ma Sanbao received the information I'd given him after my visit to Qianqing Palace, he acted. He sent trusted subordinates across the Imperial Capital to spread rumors about Prince Shangshan's whereabouts and everything concerning the Emperor's heir—which we still hadn't confirmed for certain.

But what the Emperor did next caught me completely off guard.

I can't believe he admitted it right away.

Even celebrities caught red-handed by Daspatch usually spend a day or two keeping quiet and denying the dating rumors. The Emperor had gone beyond admitting the rumors and announced them outright.

All in less than a day.

He sure is quick to act, but what on earth is he up to?

The more widely this became known, the worse it was for the Emperor. Unless the thing on his shoulders was purely decorative, anyone with a drop of ink on their hands and a working brain would come to roughly the same conclusion.

—Huh? The Emperor secretly brought Prince Shangshan into the palace?

—Huh? There's an Emperor Junior, and he hid that until he got caught?

—Huh? Now I'm pissed.

Those thoughts led to one conclusion:

—The Emperor might get rid of Prince Shangshan!

It would be one thing if he had a good reputation to begin with. But wasn't the current Son of Heaven the one who'd come to the throne after unleashing a river of blood?

A first-time offender might get probation for a minor crime. Nobody was going to trust a murderer with a record.

They might pretend not to notice because they're afraid of him, though.

In Go terms,[3347] the Emperor had made a terrible move. For us, though, it meant we could breathe a little easier. We'd tried to buy time so he couldn't recklessly threaten Prince Shangshan, and now that protection seemed firmer.

"Isn't this a decent situation? Whatever else, the imperial court has acknowledged everything in its own name. For now, the threats surrounding His Highness, Prince Shangshan, will disappear."

Hyuk Mujin had spoken cautiously, watching for their reactions. Hong Jin nodded.

"You're not wrong. But we always have to consider the worst."

"The worst…?"

[3347] Go is an East Asian strategy board game in which players compete to control territory.

“Young Master Jin, you can probably guess. You’ve experienced for yourself what the current Emperor is like.”

At their gaze, I smacked my lips and slowly began.

“Personally, I see two possibilities. One good, one bad. Which do you want first?”

“Hmm. I think I’d rather hear the bad one first.”

“Mujin.”

“Yes?”

“Read the room.”

“Yes.”

Hong Jin looked sympathetically at Hyuk Mujin, who had quietly shut his mouth, then spoke.

“The good one first.”

The good possibility.

I sorted through my thoughts once more, then slowly parted my lips.

“First: now that he’s made it public, the Emperor will find it hard to lay a hand on his only younger brother, and he’ll send him back safely after the banquet.”

“I like that one, but… what’s the bad one?”

“Second, now that things have come to this, he decides he can take being cursed out one more time and kills off every remaining dissident.”

Hong Jin fell silent. After a long while, he murmured, his expression dark.

“This banquet… could become a Hongmen Banquet.[3348]”

[3348] At the historical Feast at Hong Gate, a banquet became the setting for an attempt on Liu Bang’s life.

Chapter 881

They say rats hear what you say at night, and birds hear what you say by day.

But the guests who had gathered in a secret room early that morning at someone's invitation weren't the least bit troubled by such an old, tired saying.

Rats could be trampled to death. Birds could be shot down.

The only ones they worried about were the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

Little more than the Emperor's watchdogs, the Guard wore golden armor as yellow as a mongrel's coat. Their specialty was combing every corner as if hunting for lice.

They sniffed out a target, tracked it down, sank their foul-smelling teeth into its neck, then ran back to their master, wagging their tails.

With so many eyes and ears throughout the Imperial Capital, though, even moving in the strictest secrecy left them uneasy, like a fish bone caught in the throat.

Perhaps that was why.

Though a dozen or so people had gathered in one place, an uncomfortable silence lingered in the secret room for some time.

Then, with a faint noise, the last person they were waiting for appeared.

Creeeak.

The old hatch overhead opened, and dim light spilled in. Their eyes, accustomed to the darkness, narrowed reflexively, but they didn't let down their guard.

They weren't sure the unfamiliar man who had just stepped into the room was the ally they knew so well.

The newcomer immediately understood what their looks meant.

"Ah, my apologies. I was in such a hurry to get here that I forgot for a moment."

Krrk. Crack.

"Hmm."

A low groan rose from them all at once. The dozen or so guests watched the changes around the man with grave expressions.

Shhhk.

His features rippled like a wave.

His long philtrum shortened, his unusually prominent bulbous nose grew sharp, and an odd light appeared in his once-dull, unfocused eyes.

That alone was astonishing enough, but the changes didn't stop there.

Crack.

With the sound of hundreds of bones shifting out of place, his body shrank and stretched, again and again.

The transformation happened in an instant. A moment later, not a trace of the man they'd just seen remained.

In his place stood a handsome, lean man in his thirties or forties.

At last, the guests recognized the face before them and relaxed.

"Your skill is as wondrous as ever."

"We ought to be used to it by now, but we still tense up every time. Brush-Holding Eunuch Ma, your talent truly is remarkable."

At the admiring remarks from all around, Ma Sanbao, the East Depot's Brush-Holding Eunuch, smiled faintly.

"It's just a parlor trick I happened to pick up."

Having modestly brushed off his astonishing disguise technique and Bone-Shrinking Technique, Ma Sanbao continued.

"More importantly, it seems everyone arrived at the appointed time. I hope the journey here wasn't too inconvenient."

The guests answered in more relaxed voices.

"It wasn't as bad as I expected. Your loyal subordinates helped us, and we took far greater care with our disguises."

"Of course, this ghastly thing is unpleasant and stifling, but what wouldn't we endure to evade those Embroidered Uniform Guard bastards?"

Someone pointed to the human-skin mask stretched over his face. The others nodded in agreement.

That was right.

What mattered wasn't whether this skin belonged to a person or an animal.

Their only goal was to overthrow the man sitting on the throne now—the Emperor who had brutally slaughtered countless longtime friends and comrades who shared their cause, then turned that fearsome blade on them.

"We can't let ourselves be crushed so easily again. Not if I want to save my family and my people."

"What can we do? There's no taking back water once it's spilled. We were all at fault for underestimating the Emperor—or rather, the Fourth Prince."

"Indeed. But that doesn't mean we have to scoop up water that's already dirty."

"Couldn't agree more. We can refill the vessel as it empties, and replace the cracked one that reeks of blood with a new one."

For a while, they spoke in measured voices.

They had ridden the tiger and were now clinging to its back. Only two choices remained: let fear drive them to climb down and be eaten alive, or hold on with all their might until the tiger exhausted itself—and plunge a dagger into the back of its neck.

Everyone gathered here had chosen the latter.

For survival, in the narrowest sense. And for a great and glorious future, in the broadest.

Thus, their fervent hopes and wishes came together, and at last they drew up a pledge bearing all their signatures.

They would wait for the time to defy heaven.

Fortunately, they didn't have long to wait.

More than a decade had passed since the day the Imperial Capital ran red with blood.

White frost had settled on the heads of the old ministers who had barely survived, but the faction they'd secretly built with painstaking effort had grown stronger and larger. The child who had left for the frontier bundled in swaddling clothes had returned as a boy. And an ominous air was slowly gathering over the Imperial Capital.

"Now everyone is watching the Emperor. The civil and military officials, and even the ignorant common folk."

"We only meant to buy ourselves a little time by spreading the rumors, but instead of denying them, he announced them to the whole world."

"For once, that cunning Emperor has made a blunder. Now that he's made the announcement, the flames will grow beyond anyone's control."

"Scandalous stories about the Emperor keep surfacing everywhere. It's hard to guess what he's planning."

"Ten years can change even mountains and rivers, but people don't change easily. Just look at me. I was already past seventy back then, and I'm still going strong."

"What do you mean…?"

"The Emperor is the same. This is one of his schemes. Perhaps he means to unleash another storm of blood."

At the aged voice of a man whose finely made human-skin mask made him look middle-aged, the others let out low groans.

Was it because they hadn't expected it at all?

No. His words had laid bare the truth they were all trying to ignore.

They too had stumbled and rolled through the filth of politics and lived to tell the tale.

They knew firsthand just how ruthless and daring the Emperor was.

Still, it was hard to shake the question: would he really go that far?

"Isn't that an overstatement? If the Emperor really intends to do that, rebellions might break out throughout the realm. No—they certainly will."

At that, the old minister disguised as a middle-aged man burst into a hearty laugh.

"Your own home, with all its furnishings and storehouses, is about to go up in flames. Why worry about a fire approaching from a thousand li[3349] away?"

"…!"

"Stop saying foolish things and face reality. Like Brush-Holding Eunuch Ma."

Every head turned toward him at once. Ma Sanbao, who had been listening quietly to the conversation, broke his long silence.

"It's just as I'd expect from the man who nurtured the pillars of the Hanlin Academy. Your mind is as sharp as ever, even past eighty."

"Brush-Holding Eunuch Ma. Then…"

"I agree with His Excellency the Grand Academician."

"…!"

"This is not merely my personal judgment. It is my judgment as the East Depot's Brush-Holding Eunuch."

The others fell silent for a moment. Ma Sanbao had invoked his title as Brush-Holding Eunuch, and that could mean only one thing.

"Then a storm of blood will sweep through the court."

"It will."

Even as someone groaned, Ma Sanbao continued in an unwavering voice.

"But it's already clear whose blood will be caught up in that storm. It's almost upon us, and both sides will have to throw everything they have into the clash."

"Brush-Holding Eunuch Ma. Forgive me for asking, but can we really stand against the Emperor? From what we've learned so far, their forces are far greater than we expected…"

The man regretted speaking almost at once.

Ma Sanbao's gaze had shot toward him, cold and keen as a blade, making his heart sink.

"I—no, forgive me. I misspoke."

He forced out the apology in a voice that would barely come. Ma Sanbao withdrew his gaze as if nothing had happened and replied calmly.

"That was unusually careless of you."

"…"

"We've trusted one another and boarded the same boat. We all have to row together if we're going to get anywhere. Isn't that right?"

"Let me apologize once more. I'm truly sorry."

For a moment, Ma Sanbao's response had chilled the air in the room. But he was also the one who warmed it again.

"Don't worry. We have the justification and the strength to bring the Emperor down."

[3349] A thousand Chinese li is about 500 km (310 mi).

“What do you mean…?”

“I can’t tell you everything, but we’ve made ample preparations for this great undertaking. Please understand that I can’t say more than that.”

When Ma Sanbao put it that way, the others quietly folded away the questions lingering on their tongues and tucked them into a corner of their hearts.

The fewer people who knew a secret, the better.

Besides, though each of them had contributed some measure of influence and power, Ma Sanbao was one of the key figures in this plan.

Much like a certain old minister: the Grand Academician of the Hanlin Academy, the cradle of the realm’s talent, who still held sway over the court even after retiring from office.

“By the way, how is that person doing?”

Ma Sanbao immediately understood the meaning behind the sudden question and answered.

“That person is still safe.”

“I’m worried. The Emperor must be watching for an opportunity every chance he gets.”

“But he won’t get what he wants. I’ll say this with confidence: for now, even the Emperor won’t find it easy to lay a hand on that person.”

“The whole Imperial Capital is boiling like a pot left over a fire. Before long, it’ll spill over in every direction.”

“When do you think that will happen, Your Excellency?”

The old minister answered without the slightest hesitation.

“The banquet. The one where the Emperor acknowledged the rumors and made his announcement.”

“I think so too.”

“It’ll be a Hongmen Banquet.[3350] Blades will cross, and lives will hang in the balance.”

“It won’t be the same as Hongmen. Xiang Yu was foolish enough to let Liu Bang live, but the Emperor won’t do that.”

The old minister quietly nodded, lost in thought. Then he suddenly spoke.

“What about that young martial artist? What do you think he’ll do?”

“He’ll help us. Just as we expected.”

“I’ve heard he possesses martial arts far beyond what you’d expect for his age. But there are several masters around the Emperor who are just as strong. Do you think he’ll be much help?”

“Who knows?”

Ma Sanbao continued with a faint smile.

[3350] At the historical Feast at Hong Gate, a banquet became the setting for an attempt on Liu Bang’s life.

“But if his master is there, that changes things.”

Chapter 882

From the day the imperial proclamation went up in the streets, the area around the palace was busier than ever.

People came for all sorts of reasons.

Commoners lingered outside the palace, hoping to catch even a glimpse of the ill-fated young prince they'd heard about only in rumors. Confucian scholars who fancied themselves men of loyalty and righteousness shouted at the top of their lungs, demanding to know why Prince Shangshan had been summoned in secret at a time like this. And poets and writers hoping to land themselves a position took the opportunity to compose and recite poems for the Emperor, who had finally secured an heir.

"How long are we supposed to wait? We can't see a damn thing from here, Prince Shangshan or no Prince Shangshan."

"You fool. Did you think His Highness would come out and say, 'Oh, you're here,' just because we're waiting? We're only here on the off chance he might."

"Fair enough. But why are those high-and-mighty people so desperate to tear each other apart?"

"Perhaps they disagree."

The commoners murmured as they watched two groups of scholars argue, their faces flushed red.

"What? The Emperor having an heir is the Great Nation's good fortune and a joy to all its people? It's toadies like you who are ruining this country!"

"Shut your mouth! How dare you speak like that before His Majesty… Right outside the imperial palace!"

"How is it nonsense? You vermin can see perfectly well what's happening, yet you pretend you can't!"

"What did you say? Vermin? I've heard enough from you, you backwater scholar!"

"You bootlicking son of a bitch! Which academy are you from?"

"So what if you know? What are you going to do about it?"

"You son of a—Everyone! Words won't settle this! Let's drive those toadies out of the Imperial Capital!"

"Yeah!"

Hundreds of scholars hurling fists and inkstones at one another made quite a spectacle.

"Hit them! Hit them!"

"Grab that one first!"

Shouts and screams rang out from every direction. Someone watched the scene with their mouth hanging open, then muttered, “The greatest contest since the founding of the nation.”

But the fierce brawl ended as suddenly as it had begun.

And it wasn’t the imperial guards watching the fight from up close with keen interest who stopped them.

Thud.

Amid the chaos, a scholar backing away with a brush gripped like a dagger felt something touch his back.

Have I already been driven up against a wall?

That couldn’t be right.

The main road in front of the imperial palace was so wide that a hundred grown men could walk abreast without their shoulders touching. Besides, there was nothing nearby that could be called a wall.

And it doesn’t even feel completely hard.

So what was it?

The scholar started to turn around cautiously. At that very moment—

“You rat!”

“Gah!”

“I’ve finally got you—!”

One of the poets and writers, a pair of inkstones in his hands as he raced through the battlefield, charged toward the scholar—and suddenly froze. His mouth slowly fell open as he lifted his head.

Not toward the scholar’s face, only a few paces away, but far above it.

“Uh… uh…”

A dazed voice escaped his lips. At the same time, a huge shadow fell over him.

Step.

A particularly heavy footstep sounded, and something pushed the scholar forward. He gulped, turned around, and finally understood.

What stood behind him had never been a wall.

It was a monstrous man, tall as a wall and hard as a boulder.

“…!”

“…!”

The air, hot with the brawl only moments ago, froze. Everyone gathered along the road outside the imperial palace stared, mouths agape, at the giant who had appeared among them.

What kind of monster is that…?

A shock flashed through everyone’s minds like a bolt of lightning.

The fierce disagreement of moments before was forgotten. They could only stare at a giant unlike any they had seen before—or would ever see again.

Even at a glance, he stood well over nine feet tall.

His limbs were like pillars; a single swing looked as if it could raise a gale. Muscles covered his body like armor, enough to make their knees go weak just looking at him.

And what about the head perched on his thick neck like a great boulder?

Never mind that it was as big as a well-grown pumpkin. Every time those enormous eyes blinked, people felt as though it took years off their lives.

The scholars who, only moments ago, had dared to demand an explanation from the Emperor were especially beside themselves.

Could he be an Embroidered Uniform Guard?

No. The Guard recruits from among ordinary people. That thing isn't human.

A secret weapon! The Emperor raised him to wipe out his opposition!

To hell with loyalty and righteousness. At the sight of that terrifying giant, their hands and feet trembled and their heads went numb.

If they were formally sentenced to drink poison or be beheaded, at least people would call it an honorable death. But if they took even one slap from that hand larger than a pot lid, they'd die like dogs.

And yet…

"Y-You think we'll back down just because of that?!"

The scholar who would go down as the first person to discover the giant—and probably the first person to die at his hands—in the annals of the Great Nation's scholarly world, barely managed to force out a voice that wouldn't come.

"J-Justice still lives! Even if you kill everyone here, the whole world will learn of your wicked plot!"

He was speaking to the giant before him and to the Emperor.

How many years had he spent committing the words of ancient sages to heart, beginning with the Four Books and Three Classics?

There was right and wrong in all things, and a nation could stand only if it upheld the Three Bonds and Five Relationships.[3351] The scholar bit his lip until it bled.

I'd rather die here than spend the rest of my life cowering beneath the Emperor's power!

If he died protecting Prince Shangshan and the world for a great cause, it would be worth it.

His body trembled like an aspen, but his resolve was like bamboo: it would break before it bent. He forced down his fear and looked up at the giant.

[3351] The Three Bonds and Five Relationships are Confucian principles governing social duties. The bonds concern ruler and subject, father and son, and husband and wife; the five relationships also include elder and younger siblings, and friends.

Then he noticed that hundreds of Imperial Guards had surrounded them and knew death was coming.

Until the guards' commander shouted in a trembling voice.

"W-Who are you?!"

"…?"

"…?"

"Id-Identify yourself at once!"

The scholar and everyone else watching blinked.

What the hell?

Weren't they on the same side?

Then what's that monster?

And then—

The giant, who had stood there like an iron wall without saying a word, finally spoke.

His voice was as innocent as a child's.

"I am Taishan—no, Geosan. I don't want to get in trouble. I don't know what I did wrong, but I'm sorry."

"…!"

"…!"

"I just heard a noise and came to watch. Can I go on my way?"

In an instant, the atmosphere, drawn taut as a bowstring, collapsed.

He came to watch? Just to watch?

He's sorry? He doesn't want to get in trouble? He apologizes that easily?

And what's with the way he talks?

Everyone was at a loss for words as the giant blinked slowly, like a young calf.

"Y-You little bastard, I finally found you! Hey! Stand right there! You're built like a damn mountain, so why the hell do you vanish like a squirrel the moment I look away?"

The voice rang through the hushed crowd. A dark-skinned old man who barely reached five feet shoved his way through and ran over. He gave the giant's thigh a sharp smack, then noticed all the eyes fixed on him and froze like a statue.

"…"

"…"

In the awkward silence, the commander of the guards looked back and forth between the young giant and the old dwarf, his eyes gone cold.

"Who exactly are you, old man?"

After a brief silence, the old dwarf answered, "An ordinary traveler passing by. Nothing more."

“You look awfully suspicious. Do you two know each other?”

“Sadly, yes.”

“Then what’s your relationship?”

“I’ve no idea what that idiot thinks of me, but whenever he falls asleep, I try to strangle him. Unfortunately, I’ve failed every time.”

The commander of the Imperial Guards looked at the giant’s neck, thicker than a bull’s, and murmured in understanding.

“You sound even more suspicious now.”

“I hear that a lot. It’s because of the big fellow next to me.”

“Have you ever been arrested by the local authorities because of him?”

“Not once.”

“Then let’s make this your first time. Guards!”

Clang!

Sharp spears and swords flashed in the tightly clenched hands of the guards. The old man let out a deep sigh at their menacing show of force, then spoke.

“Could you wait just a moment?”

The commander’s expression and voice hardened.

“Not a chance. Hand over your identity tag before blood is spilled.”

“My companion has it, so that’s a bit difficult.”

“Then you’ll learn what a truly difficult situation is. And what companion? Is there another accomplice?”

“He’s not an accomplice… Hey, don’t just stand there. Hurry up and call your wet nurse.”

“Wait! Don’t try anything!”

The guards nearby sensed trouble and hurried to stop him, but they were too late to prevent the giant’s shout.

“Fiiive-spiiice poooork!”

The people filling the road outside the imperial palace were startled once by the tremendous shout that battered their ears, then again by the strange words it contained.

Why is he suddenly asking for five-spice pork?

Is he actually crazy?

Even the commander of the Imperial Guards was momentarily confused.

Why was he shouting about five-spice pork out of nowhere? Was the name of those suspicious men’s accomplice Five-Spice Pork? Or had something gone wrong with his ears?

It was none of those things.

The giant had shouted because he wanted five-spice pork right then and there. And his companions had been through this sort of thing so often they were sick of it.

Put simply, they knew better than anyone that there was only one man in the world crazy enough to call for five-spice pork that loudly and desperately outside the imperial palace.

They also knew he was their companion, who had vanished the moment they looked away.

"Tai… no, Geosan!"

At the urgent shout, the crowd parted like a receding tide.

The people who had thought nothing could surprise them anymore found themselves rubbing their eyes again.

A carriage pulled by two horses was racing toward them at a mad pace.

"Whoa! Whoaaaa!"

"Move! Get out of the way!"

The street erupted into chaos. The carriage barely managed to stop when it reached the tense Imperial Guards.

A young man jumped lightly down from it and hurriedly felt over the giant's body.

"Are you all right? Are you hurt anywhere?"

"Hehe, I'm fine. Everything's good except I'm hungry."

The giant answered with a broad grin like a five-year-old's. The onlookers shuddered again, but the commander did not.

He watched people spill out of the little carriage.

What kind of group is this?

There were seven of them in all.

A pretty girl with noticeable freckles, and a young man beside her whose face was as stiff as a log.

A giant who looked like a walking natural disaster, and a young man who handled that mountain of muscle as if it were a delicate piece of porcelain. An old man smiling placidly like an immortal amid all the chaos, and a short, dark-skinned old man beside him muttering curses.

And finally…

Is that a monk?

For some reason, even his eyebrows had been shaved clean off. He was a mean-looking, disreputable monk.

What the hell is going on?

The commander guarded one of the imperial palace's twelve gates and had seen all kinds of things, but he swore he had never seen anything like this.

As he hesitated in confusion, the mean-looking monk, who had been the last to climb down from the carriage, approached and held something out.

“What is this?” the commander asked.

“What is this? You son of a—”

“…?”

“Ah. That slipped out.”

As if trying to hold back his anger, the disreputable monk took a deep breath and continued.

“We’re the circus troupe performing at the banquet. That’s our official letter of introduction.”

“A circus troupe?”

“That’s right. To liven things up, some bigwig or other invited us.”

The commander hurriedly unfolded the letter in his hand. His eyes widened when he saw the seal of a high official—someone far beyond his station to question.

“This is…”

“You’ve seen it, so you know. Open the gate already.”

He might only be a junior officer, but he was a hundred-man commander in the imperial guard, responsible for protecting the capital. To be spoken to like that by a troupe of traveling performers—

But whoever backed the troupe was beyond his ability to deal with. He swallowed his anger and ordered his men to open the gate, committing the troupe’s name on the letter to memory.

The Blazing Flame Troupe? Even the name sounds tacky.

Of course, it never crossed his mind that the monk would have beaten him half to death if he’d said that aloud.

Chapter 883

It was only natural for the imperial palace to be heavily guarded.

But since the current Son of Heaven had taken the throne, its defenses had grown into an impregnable fortress beyond anything the past could compare to.

Ten times as many guards. Security that shut outsiders out completely.

Even a well-known court official couldn't enter or leave without an authorized pass.

Some gossips had dared to call the palace the largest, most splendid prison in the world.

But today, even that derisive nickname aimed at the Emperor seemed out of place.

"Affiliation and name."

"I'm Hong, from Seok Family Manor. Here are the identity tags and inventory of the belongings of the people who came with me."

"Ah, forgive me. You're the steward of Seok Family Manor! Is your Family Head keeping well?"

"Thanks to Your Excellency's concern, he's as hale as ever."

"Ha ha, I'm glad to hear it. We'll have to continue our conversation later. All right, next!"

"Good day. I'm from the Continental Escort Bureau…"

A grand banquet on this scale required a great many supplies and people.

The Outer Palace, the palace's outermost section, was bustling with outsiders—a sight rarely seen there over the past decade. Officials drafted from various departments to prepare for the banquet sorted the arrivals into groups.

Naturally, people were treated differently according to their status and importance.

The wealthy merchants, whose contributions would help fund the imperial treasury and the banquet, received the warmest welcome. Next came those who had brought rare tribute gifts, hoping to make an impression. Far below them were the performers who had come to enliven the festivities.

Circus troupes, for instance, whose livelihoods depended on performing all sorts of feats.

"Damn it. A circus troupe at my age…"

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, muttered as though lamenting his fate.

If the proud ancestors of the Fire Gate Clan had seen him now, they would have wept beneath the earth… or perhaps not.

Unlike those inflexible bastards from the Nine Sects and One Gang, they might be gathered in the heavens right now, peering down through the clouds and snickering.

“Hey, isn’t that Jeok Cheongang fellow over a hundred?”

“He passed a hundred ages ago. He’s probably lived longer than anyone in our sect’s history. Isn’t dying young practically a Fire Gate Clan tradition?”

“That’s what happens when a one-disciple lineage keeps picking the most hotheaded bastards in the land to teach. Anyway, the imperial palace. That ought to be interesting. Who was his master?”

“Me.”

“Me? You still haven’t learned your lesson? When an ancestor as exalted as I am calls on you, how are you supposed to answer?”

“I-I’m sorry.”

“Again.”

“Seventeenth Sect Leader, Hong. Wi. Ryang!”

Something like that, probably.

Imagining his master standing stiffly at attention, Jeok Cheongang felt a lump rise in his throat.

“I’m sorry. I raised my disciple so poorly that even you, Master…”

At the sorrowful sound of his voice, Taishan, standing beside him, spoke with a solemn expression.

“I want five-spice pork.”

“Namho, kill that bastard right now. I’ll allow it.”

“Really? You mean it? I can really do that?”

“No, you can’t!”

Namho eagerly reached for Taishan’s throat, but Sama Pyo hurriedly stopped him.

A few steps away, the Divine Physician watched the scene and chuckled.

“There’s no danger of our identities being exposed. Anyone can see we’re a fine circus troupe.”

Jeok Cheongang gave him a disgruntled look.

“To hell with that. Does it make any sense for me to be in a circus troupe at my age?”

“And what about at my age? At least you look young, Old Master. There’s no mistaking me for anything but an old man.”

“…”

“We’re already here, so what else can we do? Taishan—no, Geosan—is enormous. A circus troupe is about the only cover that won’t raise suspicion.”

For all his complaints, Jeok Cheongang couldn’t disagree.

“That… is true.”

The East Depot might not wield the power it once had, but it could still arrange a wide variety of thoroughly prepared false identities.

Half a day before they entered the palace, however, the East Depot specialist who came to deliver the human-skin masks and identity tags they needed had taken one look at Taishan. After a long silence, he'd asked:

"D-Does this man have to come too?"

"I'd love to leave him behind, but we have no choice. I swear he'd cause trouble if we did. If the Embroidered Uniform Guard caught him, he'd spill everything for one plate of five-spice pork."

"Taishan not that kind of traitor! Taishan wouldn't sell out his friends for just one plate!"

"Fine. Ten plates, then. Extra meat and spices."

"Hmm. Hmmmmm. Taishan needs a little time to think."

"See? That's the bastard we're dealing with."

"Ah…"

"What can we do?"

"We'll have to change your cover. With a man that size, merchants are out of the question. A circus troupe would be best."

"A circus troupe? You want to turn this old man into a street clown?"

"I-I'm sorry, but there's no other way. You're all highly skilled masters. A few feats should be enough to make you look the part."

"Feats? You mean holding oil in your mouth and breathing fire?"

"That's right."

"But that won't be enough for a grand banquet at the imperial palace."

"We've already made arrangements, so you only need to look convincing. That large fellow will draw particular attention, though. To be safe, he should practice a few feats beforehand."

"Feats. Such as?"

"As you said, holding oil in his mouth and…"

"That bastard doesn't keep anything in his mouth. Whatever goes in, he chews up and swallows without mercy."

"Then… tearing firewood apart with his bare hands…"

"That won't be a problem. He tears people apart with his hands."

"…Please never say things like that inside the imperial palace. You absolutely must promise me."

After the specialist's desperate, repeated warnings, Jeok Cheongang, the Divine Physician, and the Fire Dragon Pavilion members had received new names and faces and been allowed into the imperial palace.

Of course, there was no doubt the East Depot's immense power had made it possible.

“So everything in the letter was true. I can’t believe we got into that magnificent imperial palace so easily.”

At Jeok Cheongang’s mutter, the pretty, freckled girl beside him—who had been looking around carefully—answered.

“It was probably easier because this is the Outer Palace. Security at the Inner Palace is on another level. The Imperial Guards protecting the Outer Palace are elite soldiers, but the Inner Palace is guarded by the Embroidered Uniform Guard, the Emperor’s personal guard.”

“How do you know so much?”

“My grandfather told me. The imperial family entrusted him with several important jobs a long time ago.”

“Huh. I suppose that makes sense, given that he’s the Escort King. And you remember stories you heard as a child remarkably well.”

Jeok Cheongang looked at Ju Hwaran with an affection he never showed anyone else. A faint smile touched her face, tense until now.

That was when someone called out.

“Is everyone here?”

A court official swept an arrogant gaze over the gathering. His loose robes did nothing to hide his bulk or the belly that bulged like a well-fed pig’s.

“As the official in charge of the music for this grand banquet, I will inspect and sort you all before the festivities begin.”

Clank. Clank.

A heavy metallic sound rang out the moment he finished speaking.

The newcomers wore gleaming golden armor and carried an aura far more imposing than that of any Imperial Guards the group had seen so far. The other circus troupes who had come to perform at the banquet, along with the courtesans and musicians, swallowed nervously.

“The Embroidered Uniform Guard…”

There was no mistaking them.

Permitted to wear gold, one of the Son of Heaven’s symbols, they were the Great Nation’s finest troops. Alongside the East Depot, they were its most powerful watchers.

Unlike the Imperial Guards, who could be seen throughout the Imperial Capital, the Embroidered Uniform Guard rarely appeared. When they did, their authority was unmistakable.

As formidable as the man who now stepped forward, his eyes gleaming.

“I am Jeong Hogun, a Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard.”

His voice was calm, but a heavy aura pressed down in every direction.

Jeok Cheongang sensed his intent well before that wave of energy reached the crowd and swiftly sent a Sound Transmission.

—Everyone, be on your guard.

The inspection and sorting the fat official had mentioned would be neither ordinary nor easy.

They're using the Embroidered Uniform Guard to weed out possible assassins.

Flies always gathered around a well-laid feast.

It would be one thing if they were merely a nuisance. Flies armed with swords and spears and aiming for the Emperor's life were another matter entirely.

Fortunately, Jeok Cheongang's group and the East Depot had anticipated this.

I knew it.

Know your enemy and know yourself, and you can fight a hundred battles without peril.

To prepare for just such a situation, the Divine Physician had personally made Energy-Dispersing Poison, which disrupted internal energy, and given it to the group. Jeok Cheongang had already reached the realm of Returning to Simplicity and could conceal his qi at will without it.

The only problem is that bastard Taishan…

But contrary to his fears, Jeong Hogun's gaze rested on Taishan only briefly before moving away.

Or rather, trouble broke out elsewhere before he could examine Taishan closely.

"You there. Step forward."

"M-Me, sir?"

The sparrow-mustached man, who looked like the steward of a pleasure house, asked in a trembling voice. Jeong Hogun shook his head.

"No. The courtesan behind you."

"W-Whatever could be the reason…?"

"She knows better than I do. Don't you?"

The courtesan, who looked barely twenty, had a pure, lovely face. She blinked in surprise, then threw herself face-first onto the ground.

"T-This girl has done nothing wrong!"

Jeong Hogun replied flatly.

"I think so too."

"Th-Then why…?"

"But the sachet at your waist smells of bitter poison."

"…!"

"Will you explain yourself?"

The courtesan raised her head and stared up at Jeong Hogun in bewilderment.

Then she yanked the hairpin from her hair and swung it in a flash.

Whoosh! Thunk!

A faint sound of air being cut, followed by a spray of blood.

Jeong Hogun watched with a lowered gaze as the courtesan plunged the hairpin into her own neck.

“Why?”

“T-Twelve years ago. Grrk. My father and mother, my younger sibling… Cough.”

“Revenge. Yes, I suppose so.”

“The Emperor… I have to k-kill…”

Thump.

Still coughing up blood, the courtesan went limp and collapsed.

Jeong Hogun stared down at the corpse in silence for a while, then spoke abruptly.

“Remove the body. Take everyone who came with her to the prison.”

“Yes, sir!”

“W-Wait! We didn’t know anything about this! We really don’t know a thing…”

Clang-clang!

The cold sound of drawn blades drowned out their desperate excuses.

Realizing they had no choice, they disappeared somewhere under the Embroidered Uniform Guard’s escort, faces filled with despair.

Jeong Hogun watched until they were gone, then turned to the person he had put off questioning.

“You there.”

“Huh?”

“You said you belonged to a circus troupe.”

“Yeah.”

Taishan looked around blankly. Jeok Cheongang lowered his head, weighing whether to wait a little longer or step in himself.

Just as he cautiously curled his hand into a fist, a voice from far away reached his ears.

“Oh, Hogun. What are you doing here?”

At the familiar voice, Jeok Cheongang reflexively raised his head.

A young man was walking toward them with a wide grin.

Chapter 884

The moment I saw what was happening, I thought:

I knew this would happen.

It wasn't as if I were some gifted shaman who'd come rushing over because a divine spirit told me to. I'd decided I should see for myself as soon as Hong Jin gave me the news.

"People from Young Master Jin's group entered the palace a little while ago. Disguised as a circus troupe. But…"

"Did something go wrong?"

"I think so. They seem to have attracted more attention than we expected. You know that huge man in the group?"

"Ah, fuck. I told them not to do that."

"…I haven't even said anything yet."

"What's the point? I know what they're usually like. I'd better go take a look."

Wait. Eunuch Ma must have made arrangements. Let's give it a little longer.

"I know my companions better than anyone. Even if it's only to be safe, I should see for myself."

"Captain, you're absolutely right. I'll escort you and have you back in no time, so Comrade Hong can relax."

"Mujin."

"Yes, Captain."

"Quit showing off and stay here."

"…"

"That bastard would only go and cause another mess."

I'd left the pavilion without a moment's hesitation half an hour ago.

For some reason, ever since I'd met the Emperor two days earlier, the Embroidered Uniform Guard surrounding the pavilion had only watched from a distance. They hadn't tried to stop me. And the place Hong Jin had told me about was much closer than I'd expected.

I'd had to take a roundabout route to avoid looking suspicious, but fortunately, I'd arrived just in time.

Right now.

"Oh, Hogun. What are you doing here?"

At my casual greeting, the air around us, taut as a bowstring, eased.

Then every eye turned to me. Among the faces were a few that looked unfamiliar and familiar at the same time.

I don't know if those are human-skin masks or what, but they've done a hell of a job with the disguise technique.

The smallest change to someone's features could give them a completely different look.

Pretending to sweep my gaze over the crowd, I spotted my companions huddled in one corner. Then I waved to Jeong Hogun.

"There's an old saying that you can't spit in a smiling face, but looking at you, Hogun, I guess that isn't always true. Could you at least answer when someone speaks to you?"

Jeong Hogun opened his mouth, his expression subdued.

"Who are you calling 'our Hogun'?"

"Fine, then. Your Hogun."

"As always, it's impossible to have a sensible conversation with you."

"What's the point of a bunch of smelly, black balls understanding each other? Are you interested in me, by any chance?"

"Not at all. But I am interested in why you've suddenly appeared here."

That was the Embroidered Uniform Guard for you.

His tone was blunt, but the meaning behind it was sharp as a needle. Still, I hadn't spent all my time stumbling around Murim training only my martial skills.

And the half hour I'd spent getting here had given me plenty of time to think about how to avoid the enemy's suspicion—and what to do if I drew it anyway.

"What the hell do you mean, why? I was bored and taking a walk nearby. Things looked tense, so I came over."

I pointed to the blood splattered across the ground. It had to have come from someone.

"Thought I might find something, and sure enough."

"…"

"On my way here, I saw about fifteen people being dragged off in a line. What did they do, commit treason?"

Jeong Hogun stared at me for a long while without answering, then abruptly spoke.

"They were trying to attend the banquet disguised as courtesans."

I wasn't lying about seeing people dragged away.

I remembered the corpse one of the Embroidered Uniform Guard had hauled off, rolled up in a straw mat. That was probably the courtesan Jeong Hogun meant.

I wonder why she did it.

I had no way of knowing. She might have survived the destruction of her family at the Emperor's hands, or she might have been an assassin sent by someone who considered themselves a champion of loyalty and righteousness.

There were plenty of possibilities. The problem was that the incident had put Jeong Hogun even more on edge. He might start suspecting my companions.

This can't be how things go from the start.

I spoke as naturally as I could, with the same hint of contempt in my eyes and voice I'd used until now.

"You brought down a traitor who dared raise a blade against His Majesty the Emperor. You're definitely getting promoted this time, Thousand Captain Jeong."

"I didn't kill her. She took her own life."

"It's basically the same thing. Why do you think she killed herself? Because being dragged off and tortured to death would've been worse. She'd failed anyway, so dying cleanly was a hundred, a thousand times better. You know that too, don't you?"

Jeong Hogun was silent for a moment, then answered evenly.

"Yes. You're right."

What?

He'd always been like that, but there was something strange about how little my sharp words seemed to affect him. I wondered to myself,

Has he noticed something?

His instincts seemed sharper than those of the other Embroidered Uniform Guards. I couldn't rule it out, and if he had noticed something, I couldn't leave things as they were.

I smiled broadly and stepped forward.

"Nice to see you admit I'm right for once. How about I lend you a hand while I'm here?"

"You want to help?"

"It's easy enough. Who knows? If I catch a traitor even the Embroidered Uniform Guard couldn't weed out, maybe His Majesty the Emperor will grant me a wish."

"What are you up to?"

"There you go again. That's an occupational disease, you know. At this stage, even the Divine Physician couldn't cure you."

Thank goodness every eye was on me.

I pretended not to notice the Divine Physician flinching on reflex among the crowd, then shrugged at Jeong Hogun.

"Anyway, say the word if you don't want my help. Otherwise, I'll take a quick look around. I'm better at that sort of thing than you are. You know that."

I wasn't just saying that.

Jeong Hogun was far better at surveillance and interrogation, but when it came to judging someone's martial skill, I was a step ahead of him. I'd crossed the threshold of Supreme Peak, after all.

No—if I could use Qi Sense, which I couldn't right now, to get precise information, I'd be the perfect person for the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

Of course, my offer probably sounded strange to everyone else.

—Is this madman serious…?

—What are you plotting?

Two Sound Transmissions reached me in succession. The first came from Jeok Cheongang. The second came from Jeong Hogun.

I gave a quiet laugh and replied in kind, addressing only the man staring at me as though determined not to miss the slightest opening.

—Why bother with Sound Transmission? It's not that big a deal.

—Answer me properly. Why are you doing this?

—Why? Isn't it obvious?

I looked Jeong Hogun straight in the eye and moved my lips.

—What if some lunatic starts swinging a sword at the banquet? And what if that stern Emperor you love so much gets hurt? Who do you think's going to take the blame for it all?

—…!

—I'm not doing this for the master you serve. I'm doing it to protect His Highness Prince Shangshan, you idiot.

It was an explanation that made perfect sense from start to finish. I'd come up with it in a hurry on the way here, but it worked.

The muscles in Jeong Hogun's rigid face relaxed, if only a little.

Success.

But I wasn't finished.

I swallowed the sigh of relief that was about to escape me, clicked my tongue, and turned away.

—From what I can see, there's no one particularly suspicious right now. Just do your job properly from here on out. Both of us have someone to protect, don't we?

That was it.

I walked back the way I'd come, at an easy pace, crossing through the now-quiet crowd. I didn't forget to pause and react when I reached Taishan, whose face had changed but whose massive build hadn't.

"Whoa, damn. Look at the size of you. What on earth do you eat to get that big?"

Taishan answered haltingly.

"I like… I like five-spice pork."

"Liar."

"…Huh?"

"You look like you'd eat anything."

"Oh. Uh, yeah. I do."

"Those muscles and bones of yours are ridiculous. You've trained in external arts, haven't you?"

"Geosan. Sold to circus troupe when young. Had to learn to survive."

Circus troupes traveled the land putting on shows. You could find one in just about any sizable city, and there was nothing strange about performers who pushed their bodies so hard learning external arts.

What's strange is how huge he is to begin with.

I thought to myself, then ran my hands over Taishan's arms and legs, which were packed with muscle.

"With a build like this, you could beat most First Rate masters with your fists… Where are you from?"

Namho, an old man with dark skin standing beside us, promptly bowed and answered.

"We're based north of the Yangtze, sir. We mostly perform in Hebei and Liaoning Province."

"Oh, that's close. If you're interested, stop by the Jin Family of Taiyuan in Shanxi Province sometime. He may have missed his chance, but if he has enough internal energy to back it up, he could still become a great martial artist."

"We're grateful for the offer, but we'd rather not. As you can see, he's not as bright as most, but he's the treasure of our circus troupe…"

His time in the Hidden Shadow Pavilion had certainly made Namho a hell of an improviser.

Namho was showing the kind of acting that could kick one of Chungmuro's[3352] rising stars in the shins. After exchanging a few more words with him, I left with an exaggeratedly disappointed look.

Inside, I was certain.

That did it.

Anyone who'd heard us would now know that the giant had learned enough external arts to defeat a First Rate master, that his troupe performed north of the Yangtze, far from the Imperial Capital, and that there wasn't much reason to suspect them.

And the potbellied official turned out to be an ally I hadn't even known about.

"If there's nothing more to investigate, let them through. They've already been thoroughly vetted several times, and I have a mountain of work to do."

Hong Jin's words flashed through my mind.

Wait. Eunuch Ma must have made arrangements. Let's give it a little longer.

Those words hadn't been a lie.

[3352] Chungmuro is a district of Seoul whose name is used as a shorthand for the South Korean film industry.

Rather than draw attention by mobilizing the East Depot, Ma Sanbao must have planted an ally where no one would notice.

Luckily, my arrival fit right in.

After I'd walked a little over ten jang,[3353] my keen hearing picked up Jeong Hogun's blunt voice.

"Let them through."

I cheered inwardly, then found myself at a loss for words when a Sound Transmission came from Jeok Cheongang.

—As expected, you had a plan all along. This old man never doubted you.

—…

No, Old Master.

A moment ago, you called me a madman.

[3353] A jang is ten cheok, approximately 3.03 meters or 9.94 feet; a little over ten jang is a little over 30.3 meters or 99.4 feet.

Chapter 885

Naturally, there was no moving reunion beyond that.

We'd only been apart for a few days, and we couldn't exactly acknowledge each other here.

There'll be a chance soon enough.

I crossed the vast grounds of the imperial palace, taking in the layout of the buildings, the Imperial Guards posted everywhere, and the outsiders brought in to prepare for the banquet.

That was when I noticed something unexpected.

What's that?

I stopped and narrowed my eyes at a group carrying boxes about ten paces ahead.

"Hold on. Take that this way."

"One, two. Hup!"

"Those are offerings from Grandee Guanglu.[3354] They're worth more than all your lives put together, so handle them carefully."

"Yes, sir. Of course."

Their clothes were clean but old and mended in places. Hardship had etched lines into their faces.

Sweat poured off them as they bowed and smiled at a man who looked like a low-ranking official, then went straight back to hauling the mountains of goods. They looked like ordinary laborers living from one day's wages to the next.

But…

They're different.

I could feel a faint wrongness about them. It was an instinct honed through countless real battles and brushes with death—so subtle that I wouldn't have noticed it if I hadn't reached my current realm.

They're not ordinary laborers.

I couldn't sense any internal energy from them, but one thing gave them away.

The stench of blood.

It was like a brand no amount of washing could remove. The sour smell of sweat and the mustiness of old clothes couldn't quite cover it.

Martial artists?

Were they martial artists who'd voluntarily taken Energy-Dispersing Poison to hide their internal energy? Or was it just my imagination, brought on by the fact that I had to be sensitive to everything happening around me right now?

I'll know if I check.

[3354] Guanglu dafu was an honorific rank for senior officials in imperial China.

I started toward them for a closer look—or tried to.

A cart, unable to bear its load, tipped toward me.

Crack. Crash!

Wooden splinters flew. Silver yuanbao[3355] and all kinds of ornaments spilled from the boxes, and the official clutched his head.

“What the hell do you think you’re doing?”

“I-I’m sorry. I loaded the cart wrong, and…”

“You stupid old fool! Forget apologizing and pick it all up! If even one thing is damaged, you’ll pay dearly!”

“Yes, sir. Right away.”

An old man bowed so low he looked ready to snap as the official stormed off. Small and gaunt as a tree that had lost all its life, he limped over and looked up at me with frightened eyes.

“Are you all right, sir? This old man’s mistake didn’t hurt you, did it…?”

A mistake. Sure.

“I’m fine. Not a scratch.”

“Phew. Thank goodness.”

“It gave me a fright, though. That cart looked perfectly sound before it suddenly fell over.”

He saw my smile and bowed again, flustered.

“I apologize once more, sir.”

“Don’t worry about it. Want some help? Looks like there’s a lot to pick up.”

“Oh, how could I ask that of you? It’s more than I deserve that someone of your standing would speak so politely to me…”

“I’m not someone of high standing. You know that already, don’t you?”

For an instant, something shifted among the laborers coming over to clear the mess. In a pause too brief for anyone else to notice, the old man slowly opened his mouth.

“If you’d help us, we’d be very grateful.”

“Then that’s settled.”

I nodded, crouched down, and began gathering the scattered goods. I worked in silence as though picking them up had been my only intention, but I kept my eyes on the old man.

He broke the silence first.

“How did you know?”

I let out a quiet laugh at the admission.

“You gave that up fast.”

[3355] A yuanbao was a silver or gold ingot used as currency in imperial China; its value depended on its weight.

“I hate wasting time. Especially when I’m an old man without much of it left.”

“Are you a martial artist? Who do you belong to?”

“Answering a question with a question is rude. Remember that.”

“What does that—oh.”

“How did you know? I was sure no one would notice.”

His eyes gleamed now, the frightened laborer gone as if he’d never existed.

“The stench of blood,” I said.

He didn’t look surprised. He frowned, sniffed at various parts of himself, and smacked his lips.

“My nose must be failing with age. All I smell is old-man stink.”

“That’s there too. Since you brought it up, could we put a little distance between us? I’m having trouble breathing.”

“I thought you were just skilled in martial arts, but you’ve got a hell of a nose, too.”

“You know me?”

“Of course. Information is essential in this line of work. But even without being told about you, I’d have known right away.”

“How?”

The stench of blood.

That shut me up. The old man went on.

“Didn’t you know? You reek of it yourself. Enough that no one would blink if they called you a Killing Ghost instead of a Divine Dragon.”

“…!”

“No need to look at me like that. I mean it as a compliment. You know what they say.”

He grinned, releasing a terrible stench from between his blackened, yellow teeth.

“Kill a hundred and you’re a Killing Ghost. Kill a thousand and they call you a hero. Kill ten thousand and you become… a king.”

My mouth felt gritty, like I’d been chewing sand. I stared at the old man, whose breath stank right in my face.

What the hell is this?

Something about him felt wrong. Just facing him sent a chill down my spine. Even in Murim, with every sort of person roaming it, you rarely came across someone like this.

“Who are you? No—who are all of you?”

“You address a Senior of Murim as ‘you’? Does your master know his Disciple has such poor manners?”

“Someone I met recently told me it was rude to answer a question with a question.”

The old man stared at me, eyes wide, then burst out laughing.

"Well, you got me there."

"Finished laughing? Then answer me."

"Why ask when you already know? Those children and I are martial artists. Not so different from you."

"I'd say you're very different. Am I imagining it?"

"There's no need to worry. We may not belong to the Murim Alliance, but we're in the same boat."

"What does that…"

I trailed off as a thought struck me.

"No way…"

"Eunuch Ma. Is that answer enough?"

"…!"

"Everyone has their own place and role. Go back and wait for the right moment. Any more attention will only make things troublesome."

The old man rose and bowed to me.

"We can manage the rest, sir. You needn't trouble yourself any longer."

It was a clear dismissal—and a performance for whoever might be watching us. No, calling it a performance almost did him a disservice. He was an old laborer, every movement perfectly in character.

"Please get back safely, sir. Then this old servant will be off…"

Step. Step.

I watched him limp away carrying a box, and at last I thought I knew what the people disguised as laborers were.

Even in all of Murim, only a few sorts of people could hide themselves and move about so completely. Add that stubborn stench of blood, and only one word came to mind.

Assassins.

Even martial artists, surrounded as they were by lunatics and people with no sense of self-preservation, had certain sorts they preferred to avoid. The same few always made the list.

Killing Ghosts. Fiends. Mysterious old men. Beautiful women in veils.

Like Japan's legendary first-string team, they weren't easy to find. But martial artists with a shred of sense and dreams of retiring to a village for the elderly someday knew to steer clear.

Why? Simple.

Even messing with them—and sometimes just being near them—made a sense of doom creep over you.

And right up there with Killing Ghosts and fiends, among the three most avoided professions, were assassins.

The three kings of utter bastards.

Nobody argued with the list. Plenty of people even put assassins at the top. Someone close to me had once given me much the same advice.

His sobriquet was the Slaughter Saint, which made it a little ironic.

Actually, that's well past ironic. It's practically black comedy.

I kept walking as I muttered to myself. It suddenly occurred to me that I didn't know where this road led. But that thought was quickly buried by the conversation with the Slaughter Saint that came to mind.

"A Killing Ghost or a fiend would be better. But whatever you do, stay away from assassins."

"Why? Aren't they all the same kind of lunatic?"

"Your head is a solid lump of rock, so let me give you a simple example. Say you're eating at an inn and a Killing Ghost or fiend suddenly walks in. What do you do?"

"That'd be fucking awful. I'm trying to eat."

"Well… you're not wrong. But think a little harder before answering."

"You just called me a blockhead. I don't want to think. Can't you tell me?"

"In case you've forgotten, I can break rocks with my fist. A head made of stone is no exception."

"I spoke too soon. May I have a moment to think?"

"You've gotten a little smarter."

"Thank you. Hmm. First, I'd watch the Killing Ghost or fiend, then carefully…"

"Yes. Your first priority is to carefully get out of there."

"No. I'd hit them first."

"…What the hell did the Fire King teach you?"

The Slaughter Saint had looked up at the sky and sighed. Then he'd hit me on the head a couple of times with that rock-breaking fist before continuing.

"To put it more simply, Killing Ghosts and fiends are no different from madmen who don't think about the consequences."

"Ow, my head. Doesn't that make them more dangerous? Like you said, if I met one at an inn, the whole place could turn into a sea of blood."

"But you'd still have a good chance of surviving."

"Well, sure, if your martial skill is high enough…"

"It has nothing to do with skill. You can never predict people like that. They kill or spare people on a whim."

"They really are crazy."

"But what about an assassin?"

"An assassin… Oh."

“Now you’re beginning to understand. They aren’t merely madmen. They’ll do anything to kill their target. That’s how an assassin can kill a master a level or two above them.”

“They’ll do anything to assassinate their target…”

“That’s why you must be most wary of assassins and keep your distance. Understood?”

“Yes. Understood.”

“They’ve lost their place in the world, so you won’t find many these days. Still… what are you doing?”

“Packing my things.”

“Why?”

“You told me to stay away from assassins.”

“…!”

“Oh. Does that not include former assassins?”

Man, I got beaten up a lot that day.

Then again, that was why I remembered the advice so clearly. And now I’d run into those very assassins in the middle of the imperial palace.

If Ma Sanbao was going to bring in martial artists, why bring assassins into the imperial palace?

Just as a question I couldn’t answer right away rose in my mind—

“Stop.”

A clear, bright voice pierced my ears.

Chapter 886

“Stop.”

The clear, bright voice was the last thing I expected to hear. Instinct surged ahead of thought and took over my body.

Whoosh.

I blurred into motion, closing the three-zhang[3356] gap in an instant. My hand shot out, obeying instinct.

Toward the owner of that voice.

Toward her snow-white neck.

Whoom.

The wind, unable to keep up with my speed, arrived a beat late. With a heavy whoosh, her hair fluttered.

At the last moment, I fought down my instincts and stopped my hand in midair. I stared at the familiar face before me.

“What is it?”

“That’s what I’d like to ask you.”

So Gyo glanced at my hand, halted just in front of her throat.

“Striking out of nowhere like that. You’re as rash as you look.”

“I think you mean more rash than I look.”

“No, I think I had it right. Now, when do you plan to move that menacing hand?”

“When I’m sure.”

“Sure of what?”

Instead of answering, I sent the internal energy I’d drawn up spreading in every direction.

The System update had sealed my Skills, but that didn’t mean I’d lost the Qi Sense that was part of me as a martial artist.

Whoooosh.

The air rippled like water. I swept a radius of thirty or so zhang[3357] in an instant. Finding no one else nearby, I slowly lowered my hand.

Only then did my heartbeat begin to settle.

If this had been a trap…

Shit.

I’d let my guard down. Lost in thought, I hadn’t even noticed someone nearby. If I’d walked into a trap, I’d have had no excuse.

[3356] A zhang is a traditional Chinese unit of length, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Three zhang are about 9.09 m (29.8 ft); thirty zhang are about 90.9 m (298 ft).

[3357] A zhang is a traditional Chinese unit of length, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Three zhang are about 9.09 m (29.8 ft); thirty zhang are about 90.9 m (298 ft).

More importantly… why is she here?

As far as I knew, So Gyo was one of the Emperor's people and stayed in Qianqing Palace.

For a moment, I wondered if I'd wandered deep into the Inner Palace without realizing it. I shook my head.

Impossible.

The boundary between the Outer Palace and Inner Palace was like the difference between heaven and earth. No matter how much freedom I'd been given to move around, I couldn't have entered the Inner Palace unless every member of the Embroidered Uniform Guard protecting it had taken a group nap like golden retrievers at doggy daycare.

And even lost in thought, I couldn't have passed all those people in the Inner Palace without noticing them.

Then I'm still in the Outer Palace. Was there a place like this inside the imperial palace?

I looked around.

Exotic flowers and rare plants crowded the grounds. Beside them lay a moss-covered pond, and at the center of it all stood a huge pavilion, rising like a mountain.

For all its size, the place felt desolate. There wasn't another soul in sight besides So Gyo.

"Where are we?"

I hadn't expected her to answer, but she proved me wrong.

"Forbidden ground."

"Forbidden?"

"A place in the imperial palace no one wants to enter, and everyone keeps quiet about."

"Two people have entered it already."

"Do you not know the difference between won't and can't?"

"Oh."

"This place was abandoned long ago. No one tries to come near it, so there's no one to guard it."

"Not even against outsiders like me?"

"Only thoroughly vetted people can enter the imperial palace. Even an outsider who doesn't know this place exists wouldn't stray this far if he had the slightest bit of common sense."

"So you're saying I'm an idiot with no common sense?"

"Thank you for saying it yourself."

She got me there.

But thanks to what she'd said earlier, I thought I could guess where I'd wandered by chance.

"Does the reason no one comes here have something to do with what happened a little over ten years ago?"

"…!"

"Your face tells me I'm right."

So Gyo's expression, composed until now, shifted ever so slightly. She regarded me with surprise, then gave a small nod.

"You're more perceptive than you look."

"This time, I think you meant as perceptive as I look."

"I said it right. Just like a moment ago."

Rather than snap back, I took another look at the desolate grounds.

So this is the place.

Something had seemed wrong from the moment I saw it. There was no one around, and the grounds had been neglected to an almost shocking degree.

But now I understood, at least somewhat.

If this was where the late Emperor and his direct descendants had been confined after the rebellion more than ten years ago, no one in the imperial palace would dare come near it.

But…

"Why are you here?"

That part made no sense. Why would So Gyo, one of the Emperor's loyal followers, come to a place that was practically his sorest point? And why had she answered my questions so readily when I was all but her enemy?

"Don't tell me…"

"I didn't follow you. I thought we'd meet again soon, but I never expected it to be here."

"Then why are you here?"

"Why should I tell you?"

"Well…"

I was at a loss for words and could only smack my lips. Then So Gyo, who had been watching me with composed eyes, suddenly spoke.

"Answer one question honestly, and I might tell you."

"What?"

"I promise."

What the hell was this woman after?

I thought it over for a moment, but I didn't hesitate long. There was something I really wanted to know.

"In exchange, can I ask you something else?"

"Of course."

I still couldn't read what lay behind her calm expression. I frowned at her, then let out a small sigh.

"Let's hear your question first. What do you want to know?"

"It's simple."

Her next words left me even more confused than before.

"How long have you been learning martial arts?"

"What…?"

"I mean exactly what I said. I asked when you started learning martial arts."

For a moment, all I could do was blink.

Her question was so far from anything I'd expected that I'd been keeping my expression in check for nothing. I'd been prepared for something like How deep are you in with Ma Sanbao? Instead, the tension drained out of me, leaving only bewilderment.

"No, why would you suddenly ask that…?"

"Have you already forgotten our conversation a moment ago? You only need to answer honestly."

She had a point.

I could tell her the truth. I had no idea why she wanted to know, but the answer couldn't hurt me or any of my allies.

The problem was…

Who'd believe me?

I'd spent my time going back and forth between Murim and the modern world. Even adding the time I'd spent in both worlds together, it came to barely two years.

Who would believe I'd reached my current realm in just two years?

Even the handful of people who knew the truth hadn't fully believed it. They'd simply let it pass, thinking there must be some circumstances behind it.

Even Jeok Cheongang, who'd watched me more closely and for longer than anyone else.

He didn't fully accept it until he learned about the System and the modern world.

The idea that a Third Rate punk steeped in pleasure had become a Supreme Peak master who shook the Central Plains in only two years was simply beyond the bounds of what anyone could accept.

That was why rumors nowhere near the truth had become accepted as fact.

—Jin Taekyung is a secret weapon the Jin Family of Taiyuan raised at the cost of the family's survival.

—They had him pretend to be a layabout from an early age so he wouldn't catch the eye of the Mount Heng Sword Sect or the Head Elder.

—They funneled money to him under the pretense of paying a pleasure house. God knows how many elixirs they bought him with it. Jin Taekyung has three legs, they say.

That last one was a little strange, but anyway.

Rumors like that hadn't sprung up for no reason. Becoming a Supreme Peak master in two years was impossible even if the heavens split in two, so the wild stories had quickly hardened into accepted fact. That suited me.

If I told the truth outright, I could be branded an irredeemable practitioner of demonic, heterodox arts—or worse, an enemy of all Murim who'd mastered terrifying demonic martial arts.

And if I tell So Gyo the truth, she won't believe me anyway.

As far as I could tell, she was a First Rate martial artist herself.

Sometimes what looks true matters more than the whole truth.

Like now.

"Fifteen years."

I met So Gyo's eyes without a flicker of change in my expression.

"The story going around is that I caught a tiger with a pinecone when I was one, and learned the art of shrinking space when I was two… but that's a load of bullshit only idiots believe. Going by the memories I still have, it's been about fifteen years."

So Gyo murmured, "Fifteen years."

"You might not know this, but I have a brother just a few years older than me. I trained hard while he knocked me around. I had talent, too, of course."

"Like Cheongpung, the Huashan Divine Dragon?"

"Right. Cheongpung—wait. You know him? Even his title?"

"I know far more than you think. I've kept up with news from Murim."

"No, I mean, why would you need to?"

"There's someone I need to find. Someone I absolutely must find."

So Gyo answered calmly and turned away.

Or rather, she was about to when I shot out an arm as fast as lightning.

"I answered, so you need to keep your promise—"

And then—

Swish. Rustle.

A breeze passed between us.

"Huh?"

I stood frozen like a statue, staring dumbly at the hem of her robe as it brushed past my fingertips.

What was that?

I hadn't used my full strength, but I'd moved more than fast enough to catch a First Rate martial artist.

Yet So Gyo had slipped past my hand with a movement technique so smooth she seemed to glide. As though it were the most natural thing in the world.

Was that just my imagination? Or...

A thought took shape in my mind, and the blood in my body seemed to turn cold. I glared at So Gyo, my eyes sinking deep.

"I didn't know you could do that."

"I can do quite a few things. Just as you can see."

"Your movement technique is definitely beyond First Rate... Are you good at lying, getting under people's skin, and running off, too?"

"Lying? I don't think you're in a position to accuse me of that."

"What?"

"You said you've been learning martial arts for fifteen years. Every word of it was a lie."

"...!"

"Don't underestimate the imperial family's intelligence network. That's why I'm staying here, too."

A chill ran down my spine.

Her calm eyes seemed to pierce straight through me. And I had a feeling So Gyo wasn't merely one of the Emperor's loyal followers.

"You... what are you, exactly?"

Ssshhh.

Three jiazi[3358] of Scorching Yang Qi heated the air around me.

[3358] A jiazi is a sixty-year cycle; three jiazi equal 180 years.

Chapter 887

Sssshhh.

Heat like molten lava surged through countless acupoints, setting them ablaze.

I glared at So Gyo with burning eyes. My voice came out dry as ash.

“You… what the hell are you?”

“That’s quite a reaction. You should calm down and settle your internal energy before you overdo it.”

So Gyo—or rather, the woman whose identity I no longer knew—answered with her usual composure. But she’d dropped the polite speech and courteous manner she’d used to keep up appearances.

Then her next words hit me like a surging tide.

“Especially considering the state you’re in right now. Don’t you think?”

“…!”

Was this what it felt like to have lightning strike through the top of your head?

My voice trembled before I could stop it.

“H-How?”

“Your internal energy isn’t flowing steadily.”

Her answer was short, simple, and impossible to argue with.

But that wasn’t why I’d lost my words. For her to give such an obvious answer, one thing had to be true.

Qi Sense.

Exceptionally keen Qi Sense, sharp as a blade.

Every fight began with gauging your opponent. A master could see how much internal energy a lesser martial artist possessed and what condition it was in, but the lesser martial artist couldn’t accurately gauge the master’s level.

And right now, I was unmistakably the latter.

A master!

There was no doubt. So Gyo was an incredible master.

A Supreme Peak master who’d reached the realm of Returning to Simplicity—able to hide herself so perfectly that even I couldn’t see through her.

So that movement earlier wasn’t a fluke.

I suppressed the sigh threatening to escape and quietly clenched my fists.

I had no weapon worth mentioning, and my body was in rough shape. No matter how optimistically I looked at it, I was in no condition to face a master a level above me.

Still, I lowered my stance at an angle and drew up my internal energy again.

“Who are you?”

So Gyo answered calmly.

“I have no obligation to tell you. You were the one who broke your promise and lied first, Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung.”

“Shut the fuck up and answer me. Whose orders are you following? The Emperor’s? Or…”

I glared at her and spat out two words.

“Lord of Heaven?”

“Who knows.”

A brief silence followed. So Gyo studied me with an expression I couldn’t read, then spoke again.

“If you knew who I was, what would that change?”

“It would change things. Lives are at stake.”

“Lives…”

“Yeah. Depending on your answer, someone here is definitely going to die.”

“If it comes to that, we already know who it’ll be. Don’t we?”

At that moment—

Sssshhh.

The air trembled. Her aura stirred the grass and flowers like a north wind, while her cold gaze and voice wrapped around me like winter frost.

But I didn’t waver.

I’d been through too many bloodbaths to fear someone just because she was strong—as a Hunter and as a martial artist of Murim.

“Yeah, maybe it’s already been decided to some extent. But who says only one of us has to die?”

“What?”

“I’ll kill you. No matter what.”

“…!”

“I swear on everything I have. No—I guarantee it.”

My voice was so calm it surprised even me.

This wasn’t a desperate bluff from a weaker fighter backed into a corner. So Gyo could tell I meant every word.

“You… you’re serious?”

“Of course.”

“So you’re willing to die taking me with you. Ha.”

She gave a short, disbelieving laugh and looked me up and down like some strange animal.

“So the reports were true after all. I suppose you must have something up your sleeve to have survived this long.”

"The Blood Lord, the Western Heaven Demon Lord, and most recently, even the Southern Heaven Demon Empress. The Sword Saint and the Fire King helped you through those crises, of course, but coming through encounters with all of them unharmed is nearly impossible."

"…!"

I stared at her, my gaze turning cold.

I had a feeling I no longer needed to hear the answer to my question.

She knows about the Western Heaven Demon Lord and the Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

She didn't sound as though she merely knew their names from reports. She spoke as if she knew what kind of people they were and how powerful they were—as if she'd met them before.

At last, I could see who stood behind the name and identity of So Gyo.

…Dark Heaven.

Yeah. What else could it be?

Hadn't she said herself that one of the main reasons she stayed in the imperial palace was its vast intelligence network? She wasn't a loyal servant of the Emperor. She had another purpose.

She meant to get the imperial palace—or rather, the Emperor—in her grip and pull the strings.

The scattered pieces of the puzzle fell into place.

The Fourth Prince's sudden rebellion. The deaths of the late Emperor and the direct imperial family, and everything that had happened since.

But in the end, it had only been a partial success.

The Emperor had been replaced overnight, and countless people had gone to their deaths on the execution grounds. Even so, they'd failed to root out all opposition and take control of the entire Great Nation.

Then could it be…

Just as the last pieces were about to fall into place, So Gyo broke her silence.

"Let me ask you one thing. Why go this far?"

"Why?"

"Why fight me when your body's in such poor shape? You're even prepared to die taking me down."

I was quiet for a moment. Not because I needed to think about my answer, but because it was so obvious to me.

"Because fewer of my people will die if I do."

"What?"

"Even if we both die here, that's better than letting a bitch like you live."

"What if I said I had no intention of harming you?"

“That’s obviously bullshit, but sure.”

“Why?”

“Because a viper like you only does more harm the longer she lives.”

How many people had died already?

Every time Dark Heaven made a move, hundreds died. Then thousands. Eventually, tens of thousands vanished as lonely ghosts.

If my life was enough to put an end to that, I’d count myself lucky. Of course, the best outcome would be for me to live and So Gyo to die…

“But I don’t care either way. I won’t feel right until I’ve pulled out those damn fangs and stripped your skin off.”

This time, So Gyo fell silent. She kept her lips pressed together for a long while before tossing out a single remark.

“You’re even crazier than I thought.”

“What the hell are you talking about, you crazy bitch?”

“And I think I understand a little why Prince Shangshan, that child, looks up to you so much. Yes. I really do.”

“Are you threatening me because you’ve got a kid hostage?”

“Who knows?”

“What do you mean, ‘who knows’? Fuck. You’ve just given me one more reason to kill you, whatever it takes.”

“I like the enthusiasm. But things don’t always go the way you want.”

So Gyo shook her head slightly.

“To have reached this realm at your age… Your talent and what you’ve achieved are so remarkable they seem like a trick of heaven. No one could deny that. But…”

She went on slowly.

“Everything has its time. Being born with heavenly patterns won’t let you escape death.”

Swish.

I heard a faint sound against her collar.

The belt around So Gyo’s slender waist unfurled—no, it was a flexible sword. Filled with powerful internal energy, its blade pointed straight at me.

Beyond it, her eyes were cold.

“Shall we put it to the test? See whether heaven saves you or leaves you to die here?”

Whoooom.

A low, clear sword hum rang out.

Fwoosh.

Then I felt it unmistakably: an enormous, terrifying aura spreading from So Gyo, one I hadn’t sensed until now.

It closed around my whole body, pressing down on every part of me.

I drew in a breath without meaning to. The air had grown heavy in an instant, choking me. Every hair on my body stood on end, and cold sweat beaded on my skin.

But—

“Fuck off.”

I spat the words through my teeth and pushed against the invisible chains of internal energy. They bound my arms and legs tight, but I withstood them and moved toward So Gyo.

Crack. Thud.

One step.

Just one, and the solid bluestone beneath my foot shattered. The layers of earth below it caved in.

Was I that heavy? Had this place grown so decrepit after being abandoned for so long?

Neither.

I’d taken that step under the full pressure of internal energy weighing a thousand geun—ten thousand geun.[3359] And I’d withstood it not by countering her internal energy with my own, but with physical strength that had long since surpassed human limits.

Crunch. Craaack.

I put more force into my next step, trampling soil and flowers underfoot. Beneath them, I felt the bluestone fragments break again into dozens, then hundreds of pieces.

The closer I got, the stronger the pressure grew.

But…

I can take it.

A well-honed blade was a fine weapon on its own. So was the body I’d built by surviving countless brushes with death.

Strength. Stamina. Agility.

I excelled in all three. I’d surpassed my limits.

One of the main reasons I’d survived against enemies a level—or even two levels—above me was this body, which could wield superhuman strength without internal energy.

It could tear steel apart with bare hands, run for two days and nights without collapsing, and surge forward like the wind with a single push off the ground.

[3359] A Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb). A thousand to ten thousand geun is about 600–6,000 kg (1,320–13,200 lb).

So even if several jiazi[3360] of internal energy closed around me, I could withstand it.

No. I could break it.

“Hah!”

With a short shout, I threw both arms out with all my strength.

Boom!

With so much power and speed behind it, the compressed air burst apart. I felt the internal energy that had surrounded and pressed down on me from every direction scatter.

Now!

My heavy body suddenly felt as light as a dandelion seed. I seized the opening and launched myself toward the one person staring at me with eyes now wide open.

So Gyo.

Fwoosh—boom!

Flamefire Path.

One step was all it took.

Scorching Yang Qi surged up from deep within my dantian and exploded from my foot. I crossed the five jang[3361] between us in an instant, blazing heat trailing behind me, and drove my fist forward like a cannon shot.

BANG!

The world shook.

Beyond the surging blue-white flames, a slender figure flew backward at tremendous speed to a roar that seemed to split the sky. Then she turned smoothly in midair.

Tap.

Her toes touched the blossom of a nameless flower, opened wide beneath the year’s strongest sunlight.

So Gyo landed on that single flower as lightly as a passing breeze. I almost gasped.

Ah.

Elusive, yet graceful.

Her movement technique was extraordinary. For an instant, I forgot she was my enemy. I even forgot I ought to press the attack while I had the chance.

So Gyo’s eyes flashed with something I couldn’t read.

“I couldn’t feel any internal energy from you at all… How did you do that?”

I wanted to ask her the same thing.

[3360] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

[3361] A jang is ten ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Five jang is about 15.15 m (49.7 ft).

How had she blocked the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist I'd thrown with all my strength so easily? How had she met that blinding speed and force head-on without even looking strained?

You damn bitch. Have some conscience and at least pretend you're struggling.

I grumbled to myself and gave a wry smile.

Why was I laughing now? I didn't know. Maybe I really had gone crazy. Or maybe it was because I'd prepared myself to die before this fight began.

Yeah. That was it.

I'd been prepared for a long time.

"You die, I live."

Laughing like a man half out of his mind, I took a step forward.

My condition?

Of course I wasn't fine.

After unleashing so much power at once, my dantian was already lurching like an overworked engine. My internal energy no longer moved as freely as my hands and feet.

But this wasn't a sport played in a ring. There was no referee to stop the match, no second to throw in the towel for a fighter in danger.

That was what a life-and-death duel meant. I'd known it all along.

I'd already made my choice.

My body might be failing, but my resolve didn't waver.

Holding fast to that single thought, I charged So Gyo again.

Fwoosh!

The world slowed. The scenery around me shifted.

And at the moment I surrendered my whole body to the heat, the wind, and the fighting spirit bubbling like lava—

Screeeech!

With a violent whistle, a streak of light hurtled toward me like lightning.

Chapter 888

It all began and ended in the blink of an eye.

Whoosh!

A streak of light came hurtling in faster than the sound of it tearing through the air. And then…

KABOOM!

A deafening blast. A tremendous shock wave shoved my whole body backward.

“Hngh!”

Crack. I swallowed a breath and dug my feet in. The ground flipped up beneath them.

The gale whipped up by the impact sent pond water surging high into the air and swept through the rare flowers and plants covering the grounds.

Whooosh.

Anyone watching might have been overwhelmed for a moment and gasped in awe.

Countless petals swirling on the wind really were a spectacular sight.

But even the most carefree, clueless person would have groaned instead if they’d seen what had caused it.

Just like I was doing now.

“This is…”

My voice trailed off as I stared at it.

Amid the rain of pond water and petals, it stood embedded deep in the ground, radiating a chilling sharpness. I knew that weapon’s shape well.

“A crescent blade?”

The words slipped out before I could stop them. Then a low, resonant voice pierced my ear.

“Calling it just a crescent blade is a bit of an insult.”

I turned toward the voice. There was the face I’d half expected—and had very much hoped not to see here.

Baek Yeon, Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

I calmly addressed the man people called the Blood Envoy in fear.

“Then what is it?”

“Golden Dragon. That’s its name. It’s been my trusted weapon for over thirty years.”

“Golden Dragon, Goldie—doesn’t really matter to me either way. Still, I’m surprised.”

“Surprised by what?”

"Nothing. It just seems like if it's your trusted weapon, Blood Dragon would suit it better than Golden Dragon."

Baek Yeon had been approaching without hesitation, but at my pointed question, he stopped.

"Seems you've heard a few things about me."

"Plenty. Sounds like Goldie had quite a feast about ten years ago. You killed a lot of people with it."

"It's Golden Dragon, not Goldie. And it was necessary."

"Sure. I'm sure it was necessary."

I glanced between So Gyo and Baek Yeon, speaking sarcastically.

"For reasons the rest of us haven't been told."

"Perhaps. I won't bother defending myself, but even if only half of what you know or suspect is true, shouldn't you be more careful about what you say and do?"

"Careful about what I say and do?"

I let out a hollow laugh.

"In a fucked-up situation like this, I'd cuss out the Emperor himself—or his grandpa. Don't you think?"

I forced up the corners of my mouth, but I couldn't do anything about the tightness in my chest.

I'd already been preparing to face So Gyo alone, ready to fight to the death. And now Baek Yeon had shown up, too.

I didn't expect him to get here this fast. Was killing me already part of the plan?

Even calling this the worst possible situation didn't do it justice. Heavy-hearted, I stepped forward and gripped the crescent blade a few paces away.

Shing.

It slid free, cutting through solid ground as easily as a knife through tofu. The blade gleamed silver, so clear it was almost transparent.

It felt strange in my hand because it belonged to someone else. Yet the sharpness was familiar, and the anger that had briefly settled in me surged back up.

"Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron. Guess the Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard gets a hell of a weapon. I'm borrowing Goldie."

Baek Yeon stroked his chin beard.

"That's a troubling offer."

Why?

"Because you'll try to cut her and me down with it."

"Then you shouldn't have thrown it over."

"I was in a hurry. What else could I do?"

Baek Yeon shrugged.

"It has a deeper meaning to me, too. The late Emperor personally bestowed it on me the day I was appointed Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard."

"Then all the more reason I don't care. The late Emperor would rather I used it anyway. If I said I was going to beat the traitorous bastards with it, he'd jump out of that pond and throw me Silverie, too."

"…!"

"And this isn't an offer. I'm telling you."

At that moment, I saw it.

I saw Baek Yeon's thick eyebrows twitch, if only for a moment.

A brief silence fell. Then he spoke, his voice low and subdued.

"Must you really make such a fuss?"

"Will it end with just a fuss?"

I quietly went over the plan I'd revised while we talked.

If I fight them here, I'll die for nothing. I need to draw as many eyes here as I can.

What would happen if I had to fight two masters who were both above me?

I didn't need to think hard about it. I'd lose. No question.

I do have One Annihilation as a last resort, but I can't even be sure that would work.

One Annihilation wasn't invincible, and my body was already at its limit.

Even with the recovery I got from Level Ups, I'd ended up like this. What would happen now, without the System?

It really would be my last move.

The problem was, even if I burned my life away to use it, I might not take a single person with me. It could turn into a suicide mission that got me killed after missing my target.

That's a little too far over the line.

I had no interest in becoming some dumbass who missed, exhausted himself, and died—or an SSS-rank suicide Hunter.

Now that things had come to this, I had no choice but to turn it into an all-out battle.

They had their own plans, and so did the anti-Emperor faction led by Ma Sanbao. But none of that mattered to me now.

No—the truth was, I didn't have the luxury of thinking about their plans with those two monsters in front of me.

Since we're here, I'll pull every damn stunt I can.

Luckily, I had allies inside the imperial palace.

I didn't know the details, but there were Murim assassins Ma Sanbao had brought in. And above all, the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, was there.

Not to mention the people already plotting against the Emperor.

We had a decent chance of winning that fight.

Now that I'd worked it out, there was no point hesitating. I angled the crescent blade in my hand, ready to get out of here at once.

Whooom.

They said a weapon that spent a long time with one owner could take on a soul of its own. As the blade trembled, seeming to reject its unfamiliar wielder and unfamiliar qi, I remembered something Jang Taebo had once said. The former Guild Leader of the Ironcraft Guild was now a retainer of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

But…

Settle down.

Fwoosh.

Its brief resistance vanished as blue-white flames flared up, and I launched myself forward with all my strength.

Or I would have.

Just as the flames of Flamefire Path were about to burst from my feet, So Gyo spoke.

"You'd better stop before you regret it."

"What?"

"Prince Shangshan. Zhu Bao."

"…!"

Just five syllables, but they were enough to stop me in my tracks.

In all the confusion, I'd overlooked one thing.

Right.

They still had that child.

As long as Prince Shangshan was in Qianqing Palace, the Emperor held his life in his hands.

Qianqing Palace was a demon-slaying battleground. Just from what I'd seen with my own eyes, there were no fewer than four Supreme Peak masters there, including the Emperor.

It wouldn't matter if it were me or the Fire King. Even if the Martial God himself returned, he couldn't do anything about the blade at the young prince's throat.

"Choose which path to take. And think about what awaits you at the end of it."

Her tone was calm. The air around us was cold, and I had to force my voice through clenched teeth.

"What the hell are you trying to get out of this?"

"You don't need to know. What matters is that you'll survive here today."

Survive? Me?

The lackeys of Dark Heaven would just let me go, now that they had leverage over me?

I could only blink at her unexpected words. Then So Gyo added,

“And I hope you do.”

“You do?”

“Yes.”

“…Why?”

“Because there’s still a reason to keep you alive. That’s my mission, too.”

My eyes widened before I knew it.

I’d heard something like that only a few months ago.

From none other than the Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

That was why I couldn’t help seeing the Southern Heaven Demon Empress as she’d been then, overlaid with the So Gyo standing before me now.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress had held back from killing me as much as she could, even right up until she was about to turn into a monster. Just like So Gyo is now.

If so, the meaning could only be one thing.

Just like the Southern Heaven Demon Empress, So Gyo—or rather, the Lord of Heaven—still wanted me.

Not my cold corpse, my soul already gone.

Me.

Jin Taekyung, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon.

Why?

None of it made any sense. I’d thwarted Dark Heaven’s plans at every turn, even cutting off two of their limbs in the process: the Western Heaven Demon Lord and the Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

The Lord of Heaven had begun a war with the Murim of the Central Plains. As far as he was concerned, I was one of the obstacles he ought to chew to pieces.

So why?

A memory flashed through my mind.

The underground prison beneath the Sichuan Tang Clan. The whispers of that deep darkness I’d briefly encountered when it borrowed the body of the Western Heaven Demon Lord, who had unmistakably died.

How interesting. How very interesting.

And the eerie laughter that had seeped through that darkness.

We’ll meet again.

“…!”

Had it started then?

Had those words been the beginning?

Crack.

Without my noticing, I'd clenched my fist so tight it had gone white, the veins standing out across it. Every hair on my body stood on end as I tried to steady myself. So Gyo watched me calmly.

"So, what's your answer?"

I closed my eyes, forgetting for a moment that I had an enemy right in front of me.

Then, the next instant—

Swish.

I reversed my grip on the crescent blade and hurled it like a beam of light.

Whoosh! Kaboom!

The blade tore through the air. A thunderous boom followed.

Baek Yeon recovered his weapon from where it had buried itself deep in the ground one step ahead of him and clicked his tongue.

"You have quite a dramatic way of returning it."

If this had happened just fifteen minutes ago, I'd have fired back with a sarcastic quip. But not now.

I gritted my teeth and spoke to the two of them.

"Don't… touch Prince Shangshan."

"Rest assured. Nothing like what you're worried about will happen."

I had no way of knowing whether that answer was true or false.

All I could do was look for another way.

Still, I learned one thing. As long as the Lord of Heaven's orders stand, they can't move against me lightly.

Suppressing the killing intent I felt toward So Gyo and Baek Yeon, I started walking. To borrow a saying from Murim, from this moment on, fifteen minutes would feel like three autumns.

The grand banquet would soon be held in the imperial palace.

That celebration would become the battlefield where our fates were decided.

The Hongmen Banquet[3362]. So who's Xiang Yu, and who's Liu Bang?

I turned and walked away without hesitation. Before I'd completely disappeared from their sight, with my back to them, So Gyo's voice suddenly reached me.

"Why did you give up fighting, Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung? Do you want Prince Shangshan to become Emperor, too?"

A laugh escaped me.

The question hardly deserved an answer.

Still, I kept walking without turning around.

"Yeah. Since we're going this far, of course I want him to become Emperor. But that's not the only reason."

[3362] The Hongmen Banquet was a historical feast at which Xiang Yu considered killing his rival Liu Bang. The name evokes a banquet that may be a deadly trap.

“Then what is?”
“He’s a kid.”
I kept going, with no idea where I was headed, and muttered,
“He’s still a kid, you crazy bastards.”

Chapter 889

Those who were going to leave left. Those who were going to stay stayed.

So Gyo watched Jin Taekyung until he vanished in the distance, turning over the faint words the wind had carried to her moments ago.

He's still a kid, you crazy bastards.

She wondered what expression Jin Taekyung had worn then, and how much of the anger and bitterness in his departing figure had been genuine.

There was no way for her to know.

You can plumb ten fathoms of water, but never one fathom of a person's heart.

As So Gyo repeated the saying to herself, Baek Yeon spoke.

"How much of this did you intend?"

"Intend?"

"Did you intend for Jin Taekyung to come here?"

So Gyo shook her head slightly.

"Not particularly. What happened just now was a coincidence."

"A coincidence. Then why did you ask His Majesty to let him move about freely?"

"I needed to watch him more closely. You already know some of the reasons I've been staying in the imperial palace, don't you?"

"Could it be…?"

Baek Yeon's eyes widened. So Gyo answered in an even voice.

"I can't be certain yet…but I think he's the one. The person I've been looking for. The person that person foretold."

The beautiful woman in her thirties spoke to the graying veteran without the slightest formality, but Baek Yeon paid it no mind.

The woman calling herself So Gyo had the standing and the strength to speak that way. Besides, her answer was more astonishing than he'd expected.

"So that's why you had him stay in the imperial palace?"

"I had to see for myself whether the rumors about the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung, were true. Whether he really was the one that person spoke of. And…"

So Gyo turned her head. Her gaze swept over the place where someone had been moments ago, though that person was already gone. For an instant, her eyes gleamed sharply.

"What kind of person he is."

The chance encounter had turned out well. Perhaps not for Jin Taekyung, who had left in anger, but So Gyo had seen enough to sort out her thoughts and gain a measure of certainty.

The Huashan Divine Dragon, Cheongpung. The Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung.

She placed the names of the two rising martial artists she'd been watching on the scales in her mind. Unlike when she'd first learned of them, the scales now tipped toward one.

The Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung.

As she'd told Baek Yeon, it was too soon to be certain. But given Jin Taekyung's past actions and what she'd seen and sensed herself, there was a good chance he was the person she sought.

That must be why that person entrusted this task to me.

So Gyo slowly crossed the flower garden.

Their brief clash had left it looking as though a storm had swept through. At its center, something that had been hidden beneath the flowers and grass poked up through the dirt.

"It's been a long time."

How deep had it been buried? How long had it lain there?

So Gyo greeted the familiar object as if speaking to herself, then reached out.

Whoooom—thunk!

An enormous, unseen surge of qi shook the air. Two objects buried deep in the ground shot up into So Gyo's hands.

They were identical in length and width, as if measured with a ruler. Each curved gently toward its tip, much like a saber.

So Gyo hung one at each hip, then spoke to Baek Yeon, who was watching her.

"It'll be a fierce battle. Maybe fiercer than the one over a decade ago."

Baek Yeon nodded.

"I'm prepared."

"Enough to stake your life on it?"

"Do you know something?"

His expression remained calm as he went on.

"I've always staked my life on getting what I wanted. That's how I made it this far."

"I hope you do the same this time."

"I must. I will."

Baek Yeon's eyes grew as grave as his voice.

"May I ask you one thing?"

So Gyo nodded.

"Anything, if it's something I can answer."

"Why are you leaving the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung, alone?"

"Why?"

“That’s right.”

“You must have guessed already.”

“Of course I have. But before we wipe them all out in one place, we should go after Jin Taekyung right now—”

“Impossible.”

So Gyo cut him off firmly.

“There’s still more I need to confirm. Until then, it’s better to let things proceed as they are.”

“What if he becomes an obstacle to the great undertaking?”

“An obstacle? How?”

“As you know, Jin Taekyung’s master is the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang. And, as it happens, he vanished without a trace after reaching the Imperial Capital. The other Murim martial artists following Jin Taekyung won’t make much difference, but…if they draw the Fire King in as well, things could become complicated.”

Baek Yeon was genuinely worried.

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

The government and Murim might be meant to stay out of each other’s affairs, but after more than a hundred years, there was no one in the land who hadn’t heard of him.

And Baek Yeon, who had led the Embroidered Uniform Guard since the late Emperor’s reign, knew better than most which of the countless rumors about the Fire King were true.

A hero born of the Great Faction War. A demon awakened by the Demonic Cult.

A man whose martial prowess towered above even those powerful enough to be called kings.

He could not reach someone born in a human body and called a god, but he stood shoulder to shoulder with the Three Stars. If he took the other side, they would have to be prepared for tremendous losses.

Even with So Gyo, Baek Yeon himself, the Emperor, and several other Supreme Peak masters on their side.

“Their forces are already formidable. And that’s only what we’ve managed to learn so far. If the Fire King joins them after Jin Taekyung…”

“The Fire King? That wouldn’t be bad.”

For a moment, Baek Yeon doubted his ears.

Then So Gyo continued, a faint smile on her lips, and he realized she meant it.

“No. That might be even better.”

“…!”

Leaving Baek Yeon frozen like a statue, unable to understand her at all, So Gyo turned away with a quiet laugh.

The words she hadn’t told him drifted through her mind.

Wait. You’ll know soon enough.

Baek Yeon thought he knew everything, but he was wrong.

The story So Gyo had kept from him was something only she and the Emperor knew. Secrets were better off unknown.

At least until the banquet both allies and enemies were so eagerly awaiting.

“Only three days left until then.”

So Gyo looked up at the sky, now dark, and murmured. Cold raindrops began to fall, as if confirming her sense that the calm before the storm was already upon them.

Shaaah.

Heavy rain hammered everything around us.

It swallowed even the shouts of palace attendants running here and there in woven bamboo hats and rain cloaks.

I’d spent a good while in Murim, but I’d never seen a downpour like this. The unexpected rain and thunder were more than enough to obscure the watchers’ view.

“You’re really going?”

Hyuk Mujin’s face was tense.

“I have to.”

“What if they catch you…?”

“They won’t. Not in this situation. You were there and heard it too, so you know.”

“I know. I know it’s urgent. But still…”

“It’ll be all right if it’s Young Master Jin.”

Hong Jin spoke up, his voice subdued.

“Even if they spot him, there’s a good chance they’ll pretend they didn’t.”

“Huh? What do you mean?”

“If what Young Master Jin told us is true, they want to wipe us all out at once. They intend to uproot us in one fell swoop…and that leaves us no choice.”

I nodded silently.

Would So Gyo and Baek Yeon have let me go without thinking it through?

Even knowing full well I’d tell their enemies what had happened?

No way.

This was both a warning and a declaration: don’t try to avoid the all-or-nothing battle ahead. And we couldn’t refuse.

With Prince Shangshan in their grasp, there's no way out of it, no matter what we do.

Our enemies had engineered this situation because they were confident they'd win. But however thoroughly they'd prepared, whatever traps they'd set, we couldn't back down.

We have to fight. Right now, before we worry about winning or losing, we have to make a decision.

The stage was set. So were the actors.

Our enemies had built the stage intending to star in the show. But sometimes a supporting actor defies everyone's expectations and outshines the lead.

That was my job.

To change who took center stage—and how this story ended.

Fortunately, there was one important cameo in the imperial palace that our enemies didn't know about.

Old Master.

I stared out the window at the sheets of rain.

The downpour obscured my view, and the sky was already pitch-black. Below the pavilion, members of the Embroidered Uniform Guard stood watch in shifts.

There were about twenty of them, every one a Peak master.

But even Supreme Peak masters couldn't predict a sudden lightning strike.

Flash! Kaboom!

Now.

At the instant white light flashed and a thunderous boom rang out, I pushed off the railing and sprang into the air.

Whoosh!

The Ghost Illusory Slaughter Step, a signature martial art created by the greatest assassin of all time, unfolded beneath my feet.

I hadn't been taught it formally; I'd only worked a little of it into my movements. But that was enough to slip past the watchers in the brief confusion.

Tap. Swish!

I landed on the roof of a pavilion whose name I didn't know, one said to house the palace attendants, and shot forward—quietly but swiftly.

The layout of the imperial palace was already etched deep in my mind. I didn't hesitate.

From here, along the east-west axis.

The grounds were vast, with pavilions scattered across them.

My black clothes blended into the darkness, and the guards posted throughout the grounds never caught sight of me.

"Damn, it's really coming down."

“The grand banquet’s right around the corner, and now the weather’s like this…”

The Imperial Guards grumbled as they looked up at the sky from beneath the eaves. They had no idea an uninvited guest had just passed two steps behind them and entered the Outer Palace.

But not everything went smoothly.

“What are you doing here?”

“Y-Yes, sir!”

“If I remember the regulations correctly, your assigned post isn’t beneath the eaves.”

The Imperial Guards weren’t the only ones startled by that voice, hard as rock. I was about to move on when I saw the familiar face that had suddenly appeared and swallowed a groan.

Fuck, what’s that bastard doing here?

Jeong Hogun.

A high-ranking Thousand Captain in the Embroidered Uniform Guard, he was walking toward the Imperial Guards.

And at the same time, he was heading toward me, concealed not far away in the darkness.

Chapter 890

Clank. Clank.

Heavy footsteps drew closer, accompanied by the metallic clatter of heavy armor.

Hidden in the darkness just thirty feet away, I felt my heart seize up at Jeong Hogun's sudden appearance.

What the hell are you doing here…?

I didn't know why a Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, which was responsible for the Inner Palace, had wandered all the way out here. But one thing was certain: at this distance, one clumsy move could give me away to Commander Jeong.

Damn it. If I'd known this would happen, I should've learned the concealment technique properly.

Regret washed over me, but it was far, far too late for that.

I'd struggled tooth and nail to survive in Murim, and that was how I'd met Jeok Cheongang. After inheriting the Fire Gate Clan's legacy, a good old-fashioned brawl had become both my only major and my general-education requirement.

What kind of sect was the Fire Gate Clan?

Just look at the records of its past Sect Leaders. Every last one of them was a no-holds-barred tough guy. The kind of lunatic who looked like he'd take a shit standing up.

For three hundred years, this hipster sect with a pedigree had picked fights with the orthodox, unorthodox, and demonic paths alike. To the Fire Gate Clan, the concealment technique was practically a symbol of weakness.

One of its Sect Leaders, said to have been the greatest master in the world some two hundred years ago, had even left behind this record:

> Want to learn the concealment technique?
> Then you're a homosexual.

Behold the audacity of treating one of Murim's essential survival skills as a martial art for fags.

If he'd said that in the twenty-first century, a mob would've beaten him with rainbow-colored clubs. But for better or worse, this was Murim, a world steeped in barbarism, and the Fire Gate Clan's lineage had carried on.

The problem was that, thanks to those fine ancestors and their policies, I was about to get screwed.

Seriously, shit. In three hundred years, couldn't one Sect Leader have learned the concealment technique?

My mouth went dry. Maybe it was nerves, but I was starting to need to piss.

Jeong Hogun had come within ten feet of me. His face was hard as he questioned the Imperial Guards who'd neglected their post.

"Answer me. Why did you leave your assigned post?"

"S-Sorry, sir. The rain was so heavy, we started shivering…"

"Would you say the same thing if traitors slipped into the imperial palace undetected?"

"Of course not. We're truly sorry, but…"

"Enough excuses. Who is your immediate superior?"

"W-Well, that is…"

"You don't want to say? No, judging by how you've neglected your duty, perhaps you don't want to serve in the Imperial Guard at all."

"N-No, sir!"

"Then is this inside or outside?"

"…?"

"…?"

What was this? It reminded me of the Hunter Training Center.

Is this bastard a System user…?

I kept my presence hidden as best I could and watched, entertaining that reasonable suspicion about Jeong Hogun. Then he said something that made me doubt my ears.

"As of today, you are no longer members of the Imperial Guard. Go to your superior immediately, report what happened here, and turn in your badges, uniforms, weapons, and other equipment. I'll guard this post myself until your replacements arrive."

"…!"

"…!"

It was a bolt from the blue.

For the guards who'd only taken shelter from the rain beneath the eaves—and for me, waiting desperately for Jeong Hogun to leave.

"G-General!"

"Military law is strict. This is an order from me as a Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard."

No. Don't listen to him.

You're civilians now anyway. Just punch him.

I fervently cheered on the middle-aged reservists—I mean, the Imperial Guard soldiers—but the two men who'd just been sent through the process of discharge still had a shred of reason left.

In the military, when they tell you to jump, you ask how high. And the Embroidered Uniform Guard was the place that could even cut off the heads of the highest officials—the sort who could make a flying bird drop from the sky.

Only two kinds of people could tell Jeong Hogun to go to hell right now:

Lunatics. Or people hoping to join the Fire Gate Clan.

Unfortunately, the two men in front of him were neither. They were perfectly normal.

“We’ll… obey your order.”

Their voices weak, they pulled their rain hats low and trudged away.

Or they tried to.

Just as Jeong Hogun had a moment ago, someone entirely unexpected appeared.

“How strange. Since when could the Embroidered Uniform Guard dismiss Imperial Guards on a whim?”

Swish.

The hem of a long robe brushed a puddle. A figure emerged through the endless rain. Jeong Hogun was silent for a moment before speaking.

“Eunuch Ma, what brings you here?”

“Nothing in particular. I was taking care of something outside and am on my way back. But…”

Ma Sanbao—the East Depot’s second-in-command and its de facto leader—smiled faintly.

“Could I have an answer to my question, Commander Jeong?”

“…I was only enforcing military law.”

“Of course you were. I know what a fine and capable man you are. But…”

At that moment, Ma Sanbao’s voice, which had always seemed to hover somewhere between a man’s and a woman’s, dropped low.

“Follow procedure. Follow procedure.”

“That’s…”

“The Imperial Guard may be under the Embroidered Uniform Guard, but there’s still a process to follow, isn’t there? The authority to impose a final punishment clearly belongs to their superior. That’s the military law you mentioned.”

“…!”

“That’s all I have to say. Is there anything else?”

Jeong Hogun stared at Ma Sanbao in silence, then spoke.

“No.”

“Good. Since we’ve run into each other, why don’t we walk together for a while?”

“Walk together?”

“Yes. It’s been quite some time, and I’m glad to see you. Besides, there’s something important I’d like to discuss. You’re heading back to the Inner Palace anyway, aren’t you?”

Jeong Hogun probably meant to answer, “No,” or “Now isn’t a good time.”

His expression didn’t change, but for an instant I could see his wariness and reluctance in his profile.

Ma Sanbao was half a beat faster.

“Oh, you don’t mind? Good. I knew you’d say that.”

The East Depot’s authority had been curtailed after the rebellion more than a decade ago, while the Embroidered Uniform Guard had risen to prominence. Even so, Ma Sanbao had long since become the East Depot’s de facto leader in place of the bedridden Cang Gong.

Before Jeong Hogun could get a word in, Ma Sanbao seized the initiative with an easy smile and patted him on the shoulder.

“Come along. There’s plenty to tell the Embroidered Uniform Guard—and plenty I need to hear.”

Ma Sanbao was both a Supreme Peak master and a skilled politician. For Jeong Hogun, a martial artist through and through, he was the worst possible opponent.

Having lost control of the conversation in an instant, Jeong Hogun could only leave with him, his face rigid as a rock. He did remember to leave a stern warning for the two Imperial Guards who’d escaped their surprise firing.

“As soon as your shift ends, report what happened here to your superior. Understood?”

“Y-Yes, sir.”

“Understood!”

Of course they’d say yes now.

The guards snapped to attention and gave a hearty salute. Jeong Hogun turned away, and I was breathing an inward sigh of relief when a Sound Transmission reached my ear.

—I don’t know exactly why you’ve come all the way here, but there are many eyes watching. Be careful and use your wits. I’ll send word to you myself later.

“…!”

I whipped my head around. Ma Sanbao was looking my way and winking.

He knew. From the beginning.

I was a little startled, but it made sense when I thought about it.

Ma Sanbao was a master of the concealment technique who’d reached the Supreme Peak realm. He might not be as skilled as the Slaughter Saint, hailed as the greatest assassin of all time, but he was more than capable of spotting my amateurish attempt.

Did he expect me and come looking? Or was it just a coincidence?

I had no idea.

I didn't know why he'd appeared here, or how he'd brought the assassins of Murim into this.

What mattered right now was that the Imperial Guards still nearby weren't skilled enough to detect me.

Swish.

I moved like a shadow through the darkness, helped by the unrelenting rain and crashing thunder.

After leaping over several pavilions and walls, I picked up a timely hint from a conversation between some other Imperial Guard soldiers.

"Have you seen 'that guy'?"

"Who? Oh, I think I know who you mean. He's a monster."

"I thought he was just big, but damn, can he eat. Especially five-spice pork. It hasn't even been half a shichen[3363], and he's already put away more than twenty plates. The cooks are up in arms."

"Good grief. I'd heard about him, but that much?"

"He's a lunatic, I'm telling you. At this rate, they say he'll eat every pig in Zhejiang Province with that mouth of his within a month. He looks like he's got a pigsty in his stomach."

"Impressive. But wouldn't it be better to kick him out?"

"The imperial family has its reputation to consider. They can't treat people brought here for the grand banquet poorly just because they eat a little pork. Orders have already been given to provide them with whatever they need for lodging and meals."

"Good grief…"

They hadn't even said his name. Just that guy.

Why was I embarrassed on his behalf?

Taishan, you bastard…

I looked to the heavens and sighed. Then I noticed a group hurrying somewhere.

There were a dozen or so of them, each carrying a large plate.

And then there was the rich smell of five-spice pork, strong enough to clear the nose of someone with sinusitis.

"…!"

I'd known my companions were staying somewhere in the Outer Palace, but not where their rooms were. I hadn't expected to find them this way.

Is this for real?

[3363] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

I followed the group like Hansel and Gretel, quiet enough that no one noticed me.

All the while, a middle-aged man who looked like a cook fired off curses in a steady stream.

“Please, just stop fucking eating. If you’re human, please…”

That was when I saw it.

The large kitchen knife in his other hand was trembling.

“Food’s here.”

Creak—BANG!

The door to the pavilion flew open with a rough shove, and the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, was surprised twice.

First, the middle-aged cook, who clearly hadn’t learned martial arts, was giving off genuine killing intent.

Second, behind the exhausted cook and the others carrying stacks of food, a familiar face was peeking out of the darkness.

“Y-You…!”

“What is it?”

“N-Nothing.”

“If it’s nothing, take some of this food. My arms are about to break.”

The cook’s reply was sharp. He had the palace attendants set down the plates, then left—after warning them that if they ordered five-spice pork one more time today, he’d poison it.

No sooner were they gone than a breeze blew open the door they’d just shut.

At least, that was how it would have looked to anyone else.

“What are you waiting for? Get in here.”

At the Fire King’s abrupt command, a young man appeared from the darkness and grinned.

“I’m here.”

Chapter 891

It had only been a few days—not long enough to call this a reunion—but it was still good to see everyone again.

And “a few days” was only on paper. It had felt more like a few months.

So much had happened.

Still, how should I put it? Seeing familiar faces made this strange place feel, for a moment, like home. I liked that.

I smiled and waved at the group that had rushed over to me.

“Wow, it feels like ages since I’ve seen you all. How’ve you been?”

The reactions came at once.

Jeok Cheongang snorted, pretending it was nothing. Why was I making such a fuss when he’d seen me just a few shichen[3364] ago? Sama Pyo and Song Ilseom silently nodded. Ju Hwaran, who’d frozen like a statue when I appeared, suddenly flew down the stairs like a streak of light. Her voice unsteady, she said,

“B-Benefactor. No, Pavilion Master. Is there anywhere you aren’t hurt?”

“Huh?”

“N-No, that came out wrong. What I mean is…”

“You’re asking if I’m hurt anywhere?”

“Ah. Yes!”

The Divine Physician had come closer without my noticing. He chuckled warmly.

“I’m glad you don’t seem to have suffered too much. Young Lady Ju here can finally breathe a little easier, too.”

Ju Hwaran flinched.

“Me?”

“Is that not so? You seemed more worried than I was, and I’m the physician.”

“Th-That’s… As a member of the Fire Dragon Pavilion, isn’t it only natural that I’d worry about the Pavilion Master’s safety?”

“Ah, of course it is. Quite right.”

The Divine Physician nodded like a grandfather agreeing with his granddaughter, then winked at me.

“So she says.”

“Uh…”

What on earth was I supposed to say to that?

I felt strangely awkward and was scrambling for an answer when a shadow fell over my head. Something damp touched my scalp.

Plop. Plop.

[3364] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

For an instant, I thought rain was leaking through the ceiling. Then I heard the rough breathing behind me and felt the sticky saliva.

Oh. You bastard.

I didn't need to look to know who it was. I glanced up, and there he was, drooling exactly as I'd expected.

"Taishan is very very happy and glad to see the Pavilion Master again."

Was this lunatic for real? Listen to how fast he was talking.

"Pavilion Master doing well Taishan doing well Taishan ate five-spice pork and ate five-spice pork and ate five-spice pork."

So all he'd done was stuff his face.

Even now, he wasn't looking at me. He was staring at the mountain of plates piled in one corner.

"Taishan has finished preparing everything to help the Pavilion Master just give the order."

"…"

He was clearly ready to eat five-spice pork, so I gave the order in a voice drained of all hope.

"Fine. Eat it before it gets cold."

"Taishan will obey the Pavilion Master's command!"

With an answer more enthusiastic than ever, Taishan hurled his massive body forward and began slaughtering the five-spice pork.

I watched the horrific scene with glazed eyes, then remembered someone I'd forgotten.

"Wait. Where's Elder Namho?"

"I'm here."

Namho came shuffling down the stairs, one hand on his lower back, his face gloomy.

"I was resting for a moment. Maybe it's because I'm old, but my body's not what it used to be."

"What happened? Did you hurt yourself?"

"I went to the privy, and then…"

"Oh no. Did you slip?"

"It's the imperial palace, so I suppose they keep even the privies well greased. I was hanging on to a ceiling beam when my strength gave out."

"A ceiling beam? Not the floor?"

As I stared at him in confusion, the Divine Physician whispered to me.

"I believe he hid in the privy to ambush Taishan."

"…"

"He'll be fine soon. He may be old, but he's in excellent shape."

This was a complete shitshow. Seriously.

I let out a deep sigh and looked around at the people gathered in a circle around me.

Some were normal, some weren't, but they'd all followed me into the imperial palace—a tiger's den—for my sake.

They knew how dangerous this mission was, and they'd risked their one and only lives. I couldn't hide anything from them or lie to them while we discussed what to do.

"I can't stay away for as long as I'd like, so I'll keep this quick."

I took a quiet, deep breath and began to speak.

Or tried to.

Chomp. Chomp. Pah-ooh.[3365]

"…"

Please, stop eating.

As soon as I finished pouring out everything that had happened over the past few days, a hushed silence settled over the pavilion.

It made sense.

They'd already learned about some of it through the East Depot, but there were things they were hearing for the first time here.

Jeok Cheongang was the first to break the silence.

"What a goddamn mess."

He muttered under his breath, his gaze darkening.

"Six Supreme Peak masters, and Embroidered Uniform Guards of that caliber… Is this what they mean when they call it a Great Nation?"

I corrected him with a heavy heart.

"That's only what I saw for myself. They could have other masters hidden away."

"Hah."

Murim and the government might look as though they were kept completely separate, but the truth was different.

A Great Nation meant a continent. The forces hunkered down in the imperial capital were so powerful that even Jeok Cheongang had to groan.

And there was an unexpected wild card among them.

"First, tell us more about that woman called So Gyo. Her appearance, her way of speaking. What weapon she uses and how she moves."

[3365] Pah-ooh renders a Korean comic sound associated with heavy breathing while eating.

Jeok Cheongang seemed more wary of So Gyo than anyone else. I told them everything I'd seen and felt, describing even her movements during our brief clash in detail.

Yet even Jeok Cheongang, who was among the three oldest in the martial world, and Namho, whose knowledge was second to none, couldn't offer a clear answer.

"Her manner of speaking doesn't give us much to go on. But I've never heard of a master with that appearance who uses a flexible sword."

"I agree with Senior Jeok. If she's serving Dark Heaven, she must be one of the demonic or heterodox martial artists. But even among the fiends the Hidden Shadow Pavilion identified during the Great Faction War, women of that caliber were very rare."

Namho turned to me, worry in his voice.

"Did you notice anything strange? We can't rule out the possibility that she was using a finely crafted human-skin mask or a disguise technique."

I thought back for a moment, then shook my head.

The deeper one's martial arts realm, the sharper one's eye became.

No matter how well made a human-skin mask was, it had its limits. And maintaining a disguise technique took a constant supply of internal energy. From what I'd seen, I hadn't felt the slightest trace of anything like that.

"No. At least, from what I felt, it didn't seem like she was using either of those methods."

"But there's still a chance—"

"Enough. If that boy says so, then that's how it is."

Jeok Cheongang had walked the same path I had, and gone farther down it. His understanding was beyond anything Namho, who hadn't learned martial arts, could match.

After cutting Namho off firmly, Jeok Cheongang slowly stroked his chin.

"She has a supreme footwork technique and has reached Returning to Simplicity. How old did you say she was?"

"Maybe thirty? She looked no older than her mid-thirties at most."

"To possess that kind of martial prowess at thirty[3366] is impossi—"

Jeok Cheongang met my eyes and trailed off.

"—not impossible, but about as close to it as you can get."

"Why are you looking at me like that while we're talking?"

"When did this old man do that?"

"Just now."

"Do you want to get your ass kicked?"

[3366] The source uses irip, a Confucian expression for the age of thirty, drawn from the saying "At thirty, I stood firm."

"No."

"Then shut up."

"Yes, sir."

So this was how Hyuk Mujin felt.

Sorry. I'll treat you better when we get back.

I kept quiet, chastened. Jeok Cheongang downed a cup of cold water in one go and clicked his tongue.

"Damn it. It's one of two things. Either the Lord of Heaven took a prodigy for the ages as his Disciple and raised her all this time, or she's an old monster who's gone beyond Returning to Simplicity and Returned to Youth."

"Personally, I think it's the latter. The Southern Heaven Demon Empress was the same."

"That's probably more likely. Even when the world was shaken by the Great Faction War, there were people living in seclusion in remote mountains and valleys. This old man was one of them. There's no guarantee that the woman called So Gyo wasn't, too."

It was a perfectly plausible explanation.

Nearly half a century had passed since the old sky of the Demonic Cult closed and a new one, Dark Heaven, opened.

Many of the people who'd emerged under Dark Heaven's command in the present day were old masters from a previous generation, the kind known as fiends. But key figures like the Blood Lord, the Western Heaven Demon Lord, and the Southern Heaven Demon Empress were people the world hadn't known about at all.

So Gyo probably belongs in the same category.

But something mattered more than discovering So Gyo's identity.

Why had she let me go when she could have subdued me?

No matter how much I thought about it, I couldn't find an easy answer.

"I don't get it. Why did So Gyo go out of her way to make that choice?"

Ju Hwaran, who'd been listening without a word, suddenly spoke up.

"I haven't been able to understand it either. This may be rude to you, Pavilion Master, but… why let a fish that's already been caught in the net go free?"

"Perhaps they intend to catch us all at once at the grand banquet that's coming up."

Song Ilseom, seated beside her, answered. Ju Hwaran shook her head.

"If word gets out, that only makes things harder for them. Now that they've done this, won't we fight the decisive battle with everything we have?"

She was right.

It would've made sense if the people gathered here were the entirety of our side's forces. But the restoration army that had spent more than a decade preparing under Ma Sanbao's leadership was no joke either.

If they didn't have a chance of winning with their forces, they never would've dreamed of staging a coup in the first place.

So did the enemy know nothing about this?

Of course not.

The current Emperor had gradually reduced the East Depot's authority as soon as the rebellion succeeded. That was practically proof that he'd kept it in check because he'd been worried about a situation like this.

The Embroidered Uniform Guard is no weaker than the East Depot in either force or intelligence. They must have been keeping a close watch, too.

At least, that was the impression I'd gotten of the Emperor.

Thorough, calculating, and someone who would always uproot a future source of trouble.

A cold, ruthless ruler. The master of a continent, with the power to match.

It was hard to explain why someone like that had stood by and let all this happen.

Unless there was only one possibility.

He's certain. No matter what we try, no matter how desperately we fight, the outcome won't change.

You could trample weeds again and again, and they still wouldn't wither.

But pull out every root in one go, and the weeds would finally be gone.

Damn it.

The air around us grew heavy.

Chapter 892

I'd faced countless formidable enemies and fought more battles than I could count, but this was a first.

For me—and for everyone else.

"They're planning to raise the stakes even further… If that guess is right, they've got to be completely insane."

At Jeok Cheongang's mutter, Namho nodded.

"It's hard to believe, but for our enemies, that's the fastest shortcut to taking control of the entire Great Nation."

He was right.

Nothing settled things quite like a character-deletion match.[3367] Once a single battle with everything on the line was over, the winner would survive and the loser would disappear.

The problem was that we had no idea what lay behind our enemies' confidence.

Where the hell are they getting that confidence?

It was easy to call it a single decisive battle, but this wasn't just another life-and-death duel of the kind that happened all the time between martial artists.

It would be an enormous battle with the fate of the Great Nation at stake—and, without a doubt, a bloodbath that would paint the Imperial Capital red.

If we lose this battle, the restoration army will be wiped out in an instant, and Dark Heaven and the Emperor will take complete control of the Great Nation. But is that really all?

Namho had said it was the fastest shortcut for the enemy.

But a shortcut wasn't always the best choice. There was a reason people took the established road.

A main road was wide and straight. Even if it took a little longer, you could reach your destination easily and comfortably.

A shortcut, though, was narrow and complicated. The ground was uneven and unpaved, and sometimes you had to pass through shadowy alleys where danger—and foul smells—lurked.

And yet the enemy chose the shortcut. They even used me as bait to do it.

Even if it was all part of a larger plan, those choices seemed almost reckless.

They hadn't stopped me, even though I'd repeatedly gotten in Dark Heaven's way. They'd deliberately made a battle they absolutely had to win that much harder.

And I wasn't the only one thinking about it.

"Why?"

[3367] Korean gaming slang for a match in which the loser must delete their game character.

Jeok Cheongang rose and paced, muttering as if to himself.

"Even if they don't know this old man is in the imperial palace, they should have considered the possibility if they know what happened in Nanman."

Dark Heaven's intelligence network was vast. There was no way So Gyo or the Emperor hadn't heard what even Ma Sanbao knew.

They must have received the same information: Fire King Jeok Cheongang had intervened in the process of defeating the Southern Heaven Demon Empress, and had left Nanman with me.

And still, they'd let me go.

As if they hadn't even considered the existence of a predator called the Fire King. As if that predator joining the battle wouldn't make the slightest difference to the outcome.

This… really is strange.

No, more than strange. Suspicious.

I could understand why they might discount me. I was already in rough shape, and they might have been acting on some kind of instruction from the Lord of Heaven.

But Jeok Cheongang?

He'd already stood at the top of the Ten Kings during the Great Faction War. They said that if he'd joined the war a little earlier, he could have stood shoulder to shoulder with the Three Saints. He was a monster among monsters.

Without the Blood Lord's impossible ability to recover, he would've died instantly several times over. And during the Sichuan Blood Tragedy, he fought the Western Heaven Demon Lord with a body that had only just recovered from being poisoned.

Of course, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress, the most recent opponent he'd faced, was an exception.

The magical power flowing from the rift had turned her halfway into a monster. And after burning her innate qi, she'd displayed martial prowess beyond human limits.

But they weren't even taking Jeok Cheongang into account?

Bullshit.

I stared into the air, my gaze sinking as I thought.

The more I considered it, the more things didn't add up.

There was definitely something going on. Something I didn't know yet. An undisclosed secret.

And I knew one person who might answer at least some of my questions.

"Ma Sanbao."

At the name that slipped from my lips, Namho nodded as if he'd caught on.

"You're going to see him?"

"Yes. I think he'd know more about what's going on."

"Right. The East Depot's Brush-Holding Eunuch is famous for his resourcefulness. I suppose that's why he's been in charge of the East Depot for the past decade or so, acting as its de facto head."

Mentioning Ma Sanbao brought something else to mind.

I brought up a question I'd set aside for later.

"Has the Hidden Shadow Pavilion ever gathered information on the East Depot? Or on anything else concerning the imperial household?"

"I spent all my time holed up in Nanman, so I don't know the details. But I've heard they did quite a bit of that in the past."

"How far back?"

"Quite a while ago. Around the time of the Great Faction War… That was nearly fifty years ago now. Time really flies."

Fifty years.

Half a century.

As the years went by, the land and its people grew old.

Namho, one of the countless people carried along by those years, patted his lower back and continued.

"When the Demonic Cult swept down into the Central Plains, the Murim Alliance was formed. The Hidden Shadow Pavilion was established in the process. Where do you think we reached out first?"

"You mean…"

Namho grinned as he watched me hesitate.

"That's right. The place you're thinking of. The imperial household."

"…"

"Put simply, the Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples amounted to an army of a hundred thousand invading from a foreign land. What's more, unlike the Central Plains, they had a single, unquestioned leader."

"They did. The Heavenly Demon, that son of a bitch."

Jeok Cheongang cut in, and Namho nodded.

"The problem was, that son of a bitch was effectively their king—or rather, practically a god."

That was why the Great Faction War had been so fierce, and why it had ended so quickly.

Unlike the orthodox faction, whose martial world was made up of people loyal to their own schools and leaders, those who followed the Demonic Path obeyed only one person: their Cult Leader, the Heavenly Demon.

It wasn't for nothing that people still said the world would have belonged to the Demonic Path if the orthodox faction hadn't had a new center of command in the Martial God, and if its symbolic masters—including the Three Saints and the Ten Kings—hadn't fought so fiercely.

And to drive out the Heavenly Demon and his hundred thousand disciples, the Murim Alliance must have needed a powerful ally.

"So the Alliance reached out to the imperial household? To drive out the Heavenly Demon together?"

"That's right. If the Great Nation had helped us, everything would've been much easier."

Namho added bitterly, "Of course, the imperial household tested the waters for a while, then spat the idea out."

By this point, I was so curious that I couldn't help asking more.

It was a little removed from what I'd originally wanted to discuss, but I wanted to know why the imperial household hadn't intervened in the enormous battles that had erupted across the land during the Great Faction War.

"Why did they refuse? If a hundred thousand members of the Demonic Cult had invaded the Central Plains, surely the imperial household could've stepped in."

"I heard the late Emperor, who was the Son of Heaven at the time, opposed it personally."

"The late Emperor?"

"That's right. Several high ministers submitted memorials, but the young Emperor, who had only just ascended the throne, firmly shut his ears. The Great Nation had been founded less than twenty years earlier, so he said he needed to take care of the people."

At Namho's words, Jeok Cheongang snorted.

"Convincing-sounding bullshit, of course."

"Senior is right. They didn't want to risk the people's displeasure by mobilizing troops again, and they couldn't bear the cost of the damage. They trusted the orthodox Murim to act as a shield, then sat back to enjoy the show."

"It was foolish and indecisive. If the Demonic Cult had won the Great Faction War, the imperial household would've been next."

"The Hidden Shadow Pavilion came to the same conclusion. The Heavenly Demon was strong and ambitious. In the end, he would have brought down the Great Nation and established a theocracy. But as always, history is determined by its outcome, isn't it?"

Namho nodded and turned to me.

"After that, things went as everyone knows. The Heavenly Demon didn't want the imperial household involved either, so his forces advanced deep into the Central Plains while avoiding harm to ordinary people as much as possible. After more than a decade of fierce battles, the orthodox faction won by a miracle."

"That's it?"

"What else would there be? Oh, if I had to add anything, there are a few things people don't know. The indecisive young Son of Heaven, who'd only been afraid of war, became a sage king who'd protected the people through yet another conflict. And he ordered the East Depot and the Embroidered Uniform Guard to keep an even closer watch on martial artists."

"…"

"That's all. The imperial household had nearly been burned by an incident in the martial world, so in a way, it was only natural. After that, the Hidden Shadow Pavilion couldn't send agents into the imperial capital anymore. If the imperial household spotted and exposed them, we'd have to fight the Great Nation instead of the Demonic Cult."

After hearing about a past unknown to the world, I—and the other members of the Fire Dragon Pavilion—fell silent for a moment.

Even Taishan, who'd been quietly slaughtering the five-spice pork, was blinking. There was no denying it was a shocking story.

"Why are you only telling us this now?"

"Because it's in the past. We're busy enough dealing with the present without digging up ancient history."

Namho shrugged, then suddenly furrowed his brow.

"Wait, how did we end up talking about this? What was it you asked me at first?"

"I asked whether the Hidden Shadow Pavilion had ever gathered information on the East Depot. It didn't have to be the East Depot specifically—anything about the imperial household."

"Oh, right. Why did you ask?"

"Because I learned something a little unsettling a few shichen[3368] ago."

"Something unsettling? Is it connected to the East Depot?"

"Yes. More specifically, to Ma Sanbao. Eunuch Ma."

"If your ass feels dirty, you wipe it—even if you have to use your bare hand. Now tell me."

Jeok Cheongang delivered this filthy advice with needless solemnity, his eyes gleaming. With everyone looking at me, I slowly began to speak.

"Is there anyone Ma Sanbao might personally bring in from the martial world?"

"People from the martial world? Which sect?"

"I don't know what sect they belong to. And they're not exactly ordinary martial artists, either."

"What on earth are you talking about?"

"They're assassins."

"…"

[3368] A traditional Chinese time unit of about two hours.

At that moment, the gazes fixed on me swung in two directions.

Some toward Sama Pyo.

The rest toward the Divine Physician.

After a brief silence, the two of them spoke in turn, one young and one old.

“Wh-Why are you looking at me like that? I’m one of the good practitioners of demonic, heterodox arts.”

“I left that line of work a long time ago. N-No, I mean my Master…”

Was this what people meant when they said a guilty conscience needs no accuser?

Chapter 893

The reason everyone's eyes had turned to Sama Pyo and the Divine Physician—including mine—was simple.

They were both closely connected to the assassin business.

"Wh-Why are you looking at me like that? I'm one of the good practitioners of demonic, heterodox arts."

"I left that line of work a long time ago. I—No, I mean my Master…"

Of course, the two of them protested that it was unfair. Even so, there was no denying they had considerable ties to the world of assassins.

Especially in the case of someone whose Master had once been known as the terrifying Slaughter Saint.

"Now, now. I'm only asking, so calm down. Do you know anything? For example… an assassin group skilled and bold enough to sneak into the imperial palace?"

The Divine Physician looked around at us with darting eyes, then spoke as if he had no choice.

"How would I know something like that? It's true my Master was involved with that world once, but…"

"Involved? He was swimming in it."

At Jeok Cheongang's mutter, I nodded without thinking.

"Whew. He was practically flying around back then."

"Right. He flew around so much he eventually became a star."

"You make it sound like he's dead. He's still a living legend in that world."

"Of course. He rewrote history—with blood."

"Still, he didn't kill people for no reason."

"That came later. When he was young, he was probably no different from the rest of those bastards. And when you're young, you do what you're told."

The Divine Physician, who'd been listening to Jeok Cheongang and me go back and forth, gave us a look as cold as brine.

"If you're going to talk like that, I won't say another word."

"Come on, don't be like that. I'm only speaking loosely. You know how much I respect him."

"You're old enough to know better, yet here you are sulking. Say something. Surely you heard a thing or two from your Master."

After I tried to coax him, the Divine Physician hesitated for a moment, then let out a deep sigh.

"My Master was always reluctant to speak about his past."

I could understand that. The Slaughter Saint I knew regretted his bloodstained past.

That was why, right after the Great Faction War ended, he'd put everything behind him and started down the path of a physician.

Because he didn't want to kill anyone anymore.

He wanted to wash away the stench of blood that no amount of scrubbing could remove—not by killing, but by saving lives.

And so the greatest assassin of all time became the Divine Physician.

"However…"

The Divine Physician trailed off, then let out the breath he'd been holding.

"There were times when even my Master spoke of his past. Very rarely. Most of it was regretful rambling, but he did tell me about other assassins."

"Then, could it be…?"

"If they were assassins active in my Master's time, I've probably heard of them at least once. Of course, given what assassins are like, it's unlikely any of them are still active—"

"I'm glad we asked you first, sir."

"Pardon? What do you mean?"

"The assassin I saw today seems to fit those conditions perfectly."

"…!"

The Divine Physician's eyes widened. I told him—and everyone else waiting for me to continue—everything I'd seen and sensed, from beginning to end.

Even allowing for a human-skin mask or a disguise technique, the man had looked well over seventy. I told them about his martial prowess, too, and how he'd revealed his connection to Ma Sanbao himself.

When I finished, Ju Hwaran spoke, her eyes wide.

"That old man was a Supreme Peak master?"

"Yes. I'm sure of it."

"But how could an assassin… Ah, I'm sorry. I didn't mean it that way."

The Divine Physician waved a hand at her apology.

"No, it's all right. Though I've lived far removed from Murim, I know very well what it means for an assassin to reach the Supreme Peak realm."

It was common knowledge in Murim, and easy enough to understand, that assassins didn't reach the higher realms.

Even if you devoted yourself to a single path with a pure body and mind, setting foot in the Supreme Peak realm was like trying to pluck a star from the sky. What chance did assassins have when they had to learn all kinds of techniques just to survive and kill?

It's like trying to master your major while having to take dozens of extra electives.

That was why, judged purely by their martial arts, assassins were considered the weakest among those who practiced demonic, heterodox arts.

The Slaughter Saint's title as the greatest assassin of all time came from the same principle.

But the old man I'd met today had unquestionably been a Supreme Peak master.

He did have a slight physical disability, though.

"You said he walked with a limp?"

I nodded at the Divine Physician's question.

"Yes. I took a close look just in case, but it didn't seem faked. Besides, if he was disguising himself as a laborer carrying supplies, there'd be no reason to fake a limp."

"If Young Hero Jin says so, I believe you. Your reasoning makes sense, too. Still… a limp."

"Does anyone come to mind?"

The Divine Physician thought for a moment, then answered with a doubtful look.

"I can't say for certain, but my Master did tell me about someone like that. An assassin who once dominated Qinghai. His epithet was, if I remember right…"

"The One-Legged Ghost Killer?"

Someone cut in, and we all turned.

Sama Pyo flinched as everyone's gaze swung toward him, then spoke.

"I've heard of him. Though he was an assassin, his martial arts were so formidable that he sometimes killed his targets in life-and-death duels rather than through ambush."

"How do you know that?"

"How do you think? I heard about it."

"From who—Ah."

That was a pointless question.

Who was Sama Pyo? He might be getting worked like a dog under me, but he was the foremost young prodigy of the unorthodox factions and the Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate, which held sway over Qinghai alongside the Kunlun Sect.

And his father was none other than the Black Night King, Sima Gong.

The Black Night King Sima Gong was one of the Supreme Peak masters representing the demonic, heterodox arts. Despite his epithet, he wasn't one of the Ten Kings. But he'd fought on the Murim Alliance's side during the Great Faction War and built the Black Dragon Demon Gate into the formidable power it was today.

And since the Black Dragon Demon Gate's stronghold was in Qinghai, it would've been stranger if its Young Sect Leader hadn't heard a thing or two.

So, the One-Legged Ghost Killer.

“His epithet’s incredible. Just hearing it, he doesn’t sound like a good guy, does he?”

Sama Pyo nodded.

“He’s an assassin.”

“Why do you keep looking down on assassins? You practice demonic, heterodox arts yourself.”

“Even if you are the Pavilion Master, that’s harsh. I’m still one of the good, decent practitioners of demonic, heterodox arts.”

“What the fuck? Since when is there such a thing as a decent practitioner of demonic, heterodox arts? What are you, bright Dark Heaven?”

“…You really are too much.”

“Fine, I get it. You’re a decent guy. Whatever. Keep talking.”

Sama Pyo glared at Song Ilseom, who’d kept quiet until now but had started grinning like a lunatic the moment I laid into Sama Pyo, then spoke.

“They say the One-Legged Ghost Killer had a fearsome reputation throughout Qinghai even before the Great Faction War. His martial prowess was impressive, but his skill as an assassin was greater still. He was said to have killed an Elder of the Kunlun Sect who was a Supreme Peak master at the time.”

“He was that good?”

“At least, that’s what I’ve heard.”

“I see. All right. So?”

“So what?”

“Keep going.”

“That’s all. After the Great Faction War, I heard… his whereabouts became unknown.”

“…”

It felt like a fight had been going well until something came up and forced it to stop halfway through.

Fortunately, I had a walking encyclopedia of Murim beside me.

“Are you certain the old man you saw was the One-Legged Ghost Killer?”

Namho spoke up, rubbing his lower back.

“According to the information the Hidden Shadow Pavilion obtained, the One-Legged Ghost Killer is missing a leg. Of course, he usually wore a finely crafted prosthetic, so you’d need a keen eye to spot it.”

“You mean…”

“It means there’s a good chance you mistook him for someone else. Even if the man you saw really was the One-Legged Ghost Killer… for now, he’s an ally whether we like it or not.”

Namho’s last words rang louder than the rest.

An ally. An ally.

Just those two words left a bad taste in my mouth.

At the same time, I finally understood why the old assassin's presence had felt like a thorn in my throat.

I must be repulsed by the thought of getting mixed up with people like him.

If someone asked whether I thought I was a good person, I wouldn't be able to answer easily.

I'd taken countless lives myself.

Not monsters. Real people.

If I thought someone was an enemy, I killed them without hesitation. The faster I grew stronger, the easier killing became. I could have crippled them by destroying their dantian and severing the Sinews and Meridians in their limbs, but I couldn't find a reason to bother.

No. I didn't look for one.

I didn't want to leave even the slightest chance of future trouble.

And I'd learned that the more I thought about it—the more I looked back at how I'd slowly changed—the more it hurt.

There were no truly good people in Murim.

Only people who took others' lives and put their own on the line according to their goals and values.

That was why I couldn't call myself a good person, either.

I was only trying to become a little better.

Yesterday, today, and tomorrow.

And that was what repulsed me most about the old assassin.

Killing without a reason. Without even an excuse.

An assassin had only one reason to take a job, one purpose: money.

The old assassin wouldn't have tried to become a better person like the Slaughter Saint. He had killed, was killing, and would keep killing people for the numbers written on a bank draft.

Yesterday, today, and tomorrow.

And now, today, he'd become our dependable ally—a comrade who would fight back-to-back with us in the not-too-distant future.

Is this… right?

I found myself confused.

The two words Ma Sanbao had used—the great undertaking—weighed heavily on my heart. So did the image of the young king held captive in Qianqing Palace, dressed in splendid but cold clothes.

Just as I quietly smacked my lips at the bitter taste in my mouth, someone spoke in a calm voice.

“I once asked my Master why he’d ended the line of Salcheonmun, the sect where he was born and raised.”

The Divine Physician. It was him.

The old doctor, whose hair was snow-white unlike his Master’s, continued slowly.

“My Master said those who felt neither regret nor remorse for what they’d done deserved to die. And so he stained his hands with blood.”

“…!”

“Everyone has their own values, after all. My Master does. And so does Jin Taekyung.”

I couldn’t listen any longer.

I stood and headed outside.

I needed to see Ma Sanbao. I needed to settle this question: why had he brought them in?

Chapter 894

“Benefactor. No, Pavilion Master.”

At the sight of Jin Taekyung rising to his feet with a hardened expression, Ju Hwaran hurried to stop him.

Or tried to.

“Let him go.”

A quiet voice slipped into her ear.

The hand reaching toward Jin Taekyung froze in midair. Ju Hwaran looked at the door, firmly shut once more after a gust of wind and rain, then turned away.

“Was it really all right to let him go like that…?”

Jeok Cheongang, who had stopped her at the last moment, answered calmly.

“Who knows? How should this old man know?”

“Old Master!”

At Ju Hwaran’s reproachful cry, Jeok Cheongang gave a faint smile.

For a century and several decades, he had roamed Murim. He had seen all kinds of people over those years, and the enemies he had brought down were too many to count.

The name Fire King Jeok Cheongang belonged to history, past and present.

Even the leaders of the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families wouldn’t dare raise their voices in front of him.

So what had made that child so angry in front of the Fire King himself?

Jeok Cheongang knew the answer.

He also knew why his one and only Disciple had stormed out.

“I knew a monk for quite a long time. Night after night, he’d sneak off somewhere secluded to drink liquor and eat meat. A sham monk if ever there was one.”

Ju Hwaran paused at the abrupt story, then spoke carefully.

“Could you be talking about…?”

“That’s right. That sham monk was Hong Dao, the Dharma King.”

Their friendship was widely known.

Fire King Jeok Cheongang had a temper as fiery as his title, and hundreds—no, thousands—more enemies than friends. Of the few friends he did have, Hong Dao was the only one who could calm him with a few words.

Jeok Cheongang didn’t know it, but apart from his martial arts, Hong Dao’s ability to keep Jeok Cheongang’s foul temper in check had played a large part in earning him the title Dharma King.

Of course, the most decisive reasons Hong Dao was respected by all the Murim were his gentle nature—worthy of a great and virtuous monk—and his mysterious prophetic ability.

“Sometimes he’d read the heavenly patterns and learn the will of Heaven. It was a wondrous thing to watch.”

By now, everyone—including Ju Hwaran—was quietly listening to the story that had begun so suddenly.

The Dharma King was that symbolic a figure in the Central Plains Murim. Even if he hadn’t been the Abbot of Shaolin Temple, the very Mount Tai and Northern Dipper[3369] of the Murim, that wouldn’t have changed.

“But one year before that sham monk entered Nirvana,[3370] he told me something.”

Jeok Cheongang drew out a memory etched deep in his mind.

It was the memory of a night he could never return to, one that came back whenever he thought of the friend who had died before him.

“He said the heavenly patterns were becoming distorted. They had been for decades already. Before long, clouds of an unknown calamity would gather and cover the sun, the moon, and even the stars.”

“Dark Heaven…!”

A single cry slipped from someone’s lips.

Jeok Cheongang nodded and continued in a low voice.

“That was when I began to take the existence of Dark Heaven seriously.”

But that wasn’t all.

Four months before that conversation, Hong Dao had looked up at the sky and seen something shining amid the turbulent darkness.

“The Morning Star.”

Jeok Cheongang let out the breath he’d been holding.

A morning star was supposed to shine brilliantly for a moment, then fade.

But the one that had begun to shine clearly in the north never faded.

If anything, its light grew larger with each passing day.

It kept shining as Jeok Cheongang and Jin Taekyung—an old man and a young man who had met by chance as though by fate—left Shanxi and reached Henan.

It kept shining through the year they spent together on Mount Jiuhua, until the venerable monk who had first discovered it became a handful of relics.

And perhaps it was still shining now.

“Do you know what the Dharma King said when he told me about the Morning Star?”

[3369] “Mount Tai and Northern Dipper” is a Chinese honorific for a preeminent authority in a field.

[3370] In Buddhism, nirvana is liberation from the cycle of rebirth. “Entered Nirvana” can also be a respectful way to say that a monk has died.

No one answered, and Jeok Cheongang didn’t wait for them to.

“He said that one insolent brat I’d kept by my side was the master of that Morning Star.”

“…!”

“He said that even if the whole world were plunged into darkness one day, that Morning Star would never lose its light.”

Everyone stared, mouths agape.

The subject of this astonishing secret from the past, unknown until now, was someone they all knew well.

Jin Taekyung.

The same name struck every one of them.

The shock was greater than any of them could have imagined.

Hong Dao himself, the Dharma King, had named him the master of the Morning Star that would light the world. A star that would never lose its light, even at the end.

But the Morning Star pointed neither to the Martial God, now a legend of the past, nor to the Sword Saint, who was writing a legend of his own as the new Murim Alliance Leader.

It pointed to Jin Taekyung.

A young man barely past twenty who had nevertheless shone brighter than anyone amid the calamity sweeping the land.

Clunk. Whoosh.

In the silence that had settled over the pavilion, a fierce gust of wind and rain flung open the firmly shut door.

Rain and wind swept among them, no weaker than before, but no one spoke.

As if by agreement, they turned their heads and gazed into the darkness outside, their eyes still wide with shock.

At the place where the star had been.

Toward the master of the Morning Star, somewhere out there.

“I once heard someone say this.”

Jeok Cheongang murmured calmly.

“Where a star shines, darkness gathers. But the star never disappears.”

At first, Jeok Cheongang himself had been skeptical.

A calamity that would dwarf the Great Faction War?

Jin Taekyung, so young he was practically an infant, the light amid that calamity?

But as time passed, and the longer Jeok Cheongang watched Jin Taekyung at his side, the more he came to understand.

This brat is the light. A new star to guide us through the darkness that will one day cover the land.

And…

The only light Heaven has granted this old man.

Just as a star shone brighter in the darkness, darkness always seemed to gather wherever Jin Taekyung went.

Yet none of it had dared touch him. None had extinguished the light he gave off.

And even if such a day came, it would not be this time.

Complete darkness had not yet fallen over the land. Only then would the Morning Star that was Jin Taekyung shine its biggest and brightest.

Until then… find your own path. Shine your light wherever you wish.

Jeok Cheongang smiled faintly.

He had long since passed the age of weighing the rights and wrongs of the world.

There was no justice in the Murim he had known—or in this world at all.

Only monsters consumed by their own causes, pointing spears and swords at one another.

Just like the incomprehensible series of events unfolding right here, in the imperial palace.

This old man is no different.

Growing old also meant growing numb.

Death had become cheap, and the people he had struggled to let into his heart had begun to leave, one by one.

His first Disciple, Jangcheon. The Dharma King.

The justice Jeok Cheongang had chosen, his great cause, was to protect what he had left.

He only hoped to make even a slightly good choice along the way, as his one and only Disciple—who had suddenly come into his life late in the old man's years—was doing.

To Jeok Cheongang, that was the only difference between the orthodox faction and practitioners of demonic, heterodox arts.

Even if you write it clumsily, all crooked and awkward, does that make its meaning fade?

Even if the handwriting was terrible, the meaning contained in the character for upright remained unchanged. It was simply as awkward as a child's writing.

And his Disciple, Jin Taekyung, despised the assassins who didn't even make that effort. He suspected Ma Sanbao's motives for suddenly bringing martial artists into the cause.

Whatever you decide, it doesn't matter. This old man will always be at your side.

Jeok Cheongang gazed into the darkness through the door the wind had thrown wide open.

The imperial palace was unknown territory, full of secrets.

Whatever happened next, it wouldn't surprise him.

No—a storm was already raging, so vast it was impossible to tell friend from foe.

If we can't avoid it, we'll have to face it.

Jeok Cheongang muttered inwardly, then smacked Taishan on the back of the head. Taishan had been licking a bare plate clean.

Smack!

"Quit doing the dishes and close the door, you unorthodox bastard."

It didn't take long for me to come face-to-face with Ma Sanbao.

He found me before I found him.

"He's waiting for you."

I was heading toward the pavilion assigned to the East Depot, picturing the layout I'd already learned, when a eunuch in a close-fitting martial uniform approached and spoke. My eyes narrowed.

How did he know?

I'd made sure to stay hidden using the darkness and the terrain, and I'd kept my movements to a minimum.

No matter how skilled the East Depot eunuchs were with concealment techniques, it was hard to believe they could detect someone of my caliber so easily.

But…

Damn it.

Right now, I had to set the question aside and keep going. I stepped quietly out of the darkness, and the eunuch led me to a small pavilion.

"He's waiting inside."

I quickly surveyed the area.

The imperial palace was divided into countless pavilions and sections for its various departments.

But this wasn't the East Depot's section, according to the palace map I'd obtained from Ma Sanbao beforehand.

"Wait. This place…"

"It isn't a building assigned to the East Depot. Officially, that is."

"…"

"Then I'll take my leave."

A secret refuge in the imperial palace, used to avoid people's eyes. Something like that?

The eunuch vanished before I could ask anything else. I went inside.

Creak.

For once, the foul weather was useful.

The old wooden door's groan was swallowed by the pounding rain.

Ma Sanbao is… upstairs.

There was only one presence on the floor above. I climbed the stairs, which creaked almost as badly as the door, and saw a lone figure standing in the pitch-black room.

"You came?"

In the darkness, I caught a glimpse of teeth far whiter than those of an ordinary person of this era.

Ma Sanbao glanced around the room, empty of so much as a candle or a piece of furniture, and shrugged.

"Forgive the humble setting. Too many eyes are watching."

"This is fine. I can put up with this much."

"This much? Sounds like there's something else you can't put up with."

"Since you already know, we should be able to finish this conversation quickly."

The voice coming out of my mouth sounded like a stranger's. My expression was probably just as stiff.

"As expected. You're astonishingly honest."

"I hear that a lot."

How often did anyone speak that way to Ma Sanbao, the East Depot's de facto leader?

But he didn't react as I'd expected.

"So, what do you want to hear about?"

His face was calm, as if he'd known this was coming. Then he spoke again, his voice just as composed.

"The assassins I hired? Or… that woman, So Gyo?"

"…!"

Chapter 895

The pavilion's interior was as dark as a cave.

I listened to the heavy rain outside the window and quietly turned over what Ma Sanbao had just said. I thought, too, of the eunuch who'd led me here as if he'd been waiting for me all along.

"You already knew?"

Ma Sanbao nodded.

"About two shichen[3371] ago, the assassins reported that you'd discovered who they were. They were concerned it might interfere with the job."

You'd have to be remarkably oblivious not to realize that concerned was putting it mildly.

Especially when the people involved were assassins.

"So the assassins you hired wanted to kill me."

"Not exactly. But you know what kind of people assassins are."

"I've never dealt with them firsthand, but I have a general idea. And you brought people like that into this."

"I had no choice. Pay them a fair price, and they're more loyal than anyone."

"So what did you tell them to do about me?"

"…My friend."

Ma Sanbao studied me with a furrowed brow, then went on with a sigh.

"Don't mistake me for a madman like the Son of Heaven. You came all this way, a thousand li,[3372] to help His Highness Prince Shangshan. They're merely assassins carrying out a job they were promised payment for. Which of you is the more trustworthy ally?"

"Well…"

"You, of course. Is that enough of an answer?"

Not yet.

I barely managed to keep the words from coming out.

Right. Not yet.

Was it everything I'd experienced up to now? Or had my head simply grown as cold as the rain outside?

Instinct told me it would be a bad idea to lay all my thoughts bare. Instead, I nodded as if I accepted his answer and brought up the question I'd set aside.

"Then did you know about So Gyo, too?"

[3371] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours; two shichen are about four hours.

[3372] This uses the Korean ri, approximately 393 m (0.244 mi). A thousand ri are about 393 km (244 mi).

“No. I deliberately withheld information about the assassins because I knew how people like you in Murim would see them, but… she’s different.”

The shadow I thought I saw fall over Ma Sanbao’s face wasn’t just a trick of the darkness.

“We didn’t tell you about that woman who goes by So Gyo because we didn’t know much about her ourselves.”

“You didn’t know? The East Depot, of all people?”

The Embroidered Uniform Guard and the East Depot were vast intelligence organizations with roots all across the land. Even after the East Depot’s power had diminished in the wake of the coup, it was hard to believe it could have missed what was happening in the imperial palace—practically its own stronghold.

“Tell me more.”

“All right. Perhaps it’ll give you a little more reason to trust me.”

Reading the distrust in my eyes, Ma Sanbao smiled bitterly.

“It was more than ten years ago that So Gyo—or rather, an unidentified master—first appeared.”

His voice carried through the rain as it slowly began to ease.

He finished his story.

Ma Sanbao had spoken without pause for about fifteen minutes. He took a flask from his belt, while I stared at him, bewildered.

“Why are you only telling me all this now? If I’d known sooner…”

“I was afraid.”

Ma Sanbao had just raised the flask to his lips. He went on.

“It may sound like an excuse, but I couldn’t help it. I didn’t think the forces I’ve gathered so far would be able to handle her.”

The sharp smell of liquor drifted from the mouth of the flask. Noticing my gaze, Ma Sanbao tossed it to me.

“Want a drink? You look like you could use one.”

I caught it on reflex. After a moment’s hesitation, I brought it to my lips.

After a story like that, I needed a drink. I could have drunk a whole jar without getting particularly drunk anyway, so I took several long gulps.

It burned on the way down, its sharp aroma filling my mouth. Strong liquor—the cheap kind sold at any inn in the land.

“Maybe it’s because you’re from the north, but you certainly know how to drink.”

I grimaced and swallowed what was still in my mouth.

“I’m surprised. I thought you’d drink something better.”

“What, you thought the East Depot’s Brush-Holding Eunuch was too good for cheap strong liquor?”

Ma Sanbao gave a quiet laugh and shook his head.

“No matter how high I’ve risen, strong liquor is what I am at heart. I came from the bottom, just like this liquor you can find anywhere. And like it, I don’t readily reveal what I keep inside. To survive in the imperial palace, you have to hide your feelings behind a sharp smell like this one. In that sense, perhaps So Gyo and I are alike.”

So Gyo.

I turned the name over in my mind, along with the unbelievable story I’d just heard.

“Is it all true?”

“What do you think? Does it sound like a lie?”

“I want an answer.”

“If you want my word, then yes. Every bit of it is true. I’ll stake my life on it.”

Ma Sanbao’s face was grave as he answered. Then he turned toward the window.

Beyond it, the rain had grown much lighter. His eyes, fixed on the thinning rain, had sunk deep.

“I can say this much for certain: without So Gyo, the coup that day would never have succeeded. Cang Gong wouldn’t be bedridden as he is now, either.”

So Gyo had first appeared more than ten years ago, on the day the imperial palace was engulfed in war.

“Hong Jin may not have known, since he stayed by the late Emperor’s side throughout, but as I said, the East Depot did everything it could to stop the coup.”

If Ma Sanbao’s story was true, Cang Gong—now laid low by illness—had been a remarkable man.

He had served the late Emperor even before Baek Yeon, and Ma Sanbao said his martial arts were on a level comparable to Baek Yeon’s, despite Baek being hailed as the strongest warrior in the imperial family.

“Lord Cang Gong was the first to sense something was wrong. He summoned the Imperial Guards from the outskirts of the Imperial Capital and moved to repel the rebels with the East Depot forces inside the palace.”

Ma Sanbao had served under Cang Gong at the time. He’d believed they stood a good chance if they could defeat the Embroidered Uniform Guard in the palace and take back the late Emperor.

Until one person appeared.

“The life-and-death duel between Baek Yeon and Lord Cang Gong was evenly matched. If it had stayed that way, we could have put down the coup. Once the Imperial Guards joined us, even the Embroidered Uniform Guard couldn’t have held out. But…”

Ma Sanbao's voice hardened.

"Things don't always go the way you want."

An unidentified master dressed entirely in black appeared, and the tide turned sharply against them.

Cang Gong couldn't withstand the combined assault of the two Supreme Peak masters. He collapsed with severe Internal Injuries, and the balance of the battle fell apart.

"Our forces were by no means weaker than the Embroidered Uniform Guard. The only reason we lost was that figure in black… No, that unidentified master we now call So Gyo."

Ma Sanbao reached for the flask I'd handed back to him, as though his throat had gone dry. But his fingers had begun to tremble, and it slipped from his hand.

It struck the floor with a hollow thud and rolled away. Liquor spilled from the half-full flask.

Ma Sanbao stared at the spreading puddle, his eyes heavy, and murmured as if to himself.

"What I saw her do that day was… chilling. In the face of that overwhelming aura, I couldn't do a thing."

I suddenly remembered So Gyo's energy, calm as a spring breeze from beginning to end. And the terrifying wave of power that surged from her in that brief instant.

"She surely wasn't even going all out."

Was this what it felt like to face a wall you could never climb?

I'd met countless powerful people, allies and enemies alike. Fewer than ten had ever made me feel that kind of pressure.

And every one of them belonged to the Three Saints or was a master who could stand as their equal.

They had gone beyond Supreme Peak, the realm every martial artist dreamed of, and stepped into something higher.

Jeok Cheongang had finally reached the realm of Returned to Youth after casting off the Heart Demon that had worn away at his mind and body for years. So Gyo, too, was a master for whom even a match for ten thousand men was no exaggeration.

"So that's why you chose me. No—me and my Master."

"That's right. Just as I told you before."

With the truth laid bare, Ma Sanbao continued grimly.

"Someone who would come a thousand li[3373] to help Prince Shangshan. Someone who would put human decency ahead of any reward. And…"

[3373] This uses the Korean ri, approximately 393 m (0.244 mi). A thousand ri are about 393 km (244 mi).

“Another master capable of facing the unidentified expert at the Emperor’s side. The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang. Am I right?”

Ma Sanbao was silent for a moment, then nodded weakly.

“Exactly. That’s why I put your name in the secret letter to Hong Jin. If Jeok Cheongang’s only Disciple risked going to the imperial palace, it wasn’t hard to guess his Master would come too.”

“Then you knew everything that happened in Nanman?”

“I’d been watching for some time. Not Nanman—you.”

“Why didn’t you formally ask the Murim Alliance for help? Wouldn’t that have been much better?”

“I know quite a bit about its current Alliance Leader, Sword Saint Mae Jonghak. Cang Gong once called him one of the few true chivalrous heroes left in this age.”

“Then why choose me or my Master?”

“The fewer people who know a secret, the better. Especially when the secret is a coup.”

“Ah.”

At my low murmur, Ma Sanbao smiled bitterly.

“We call ourselves a restoration army, but to the rest of the world, we’re traitors. And if our ties to Murim came to light, nothing good would come of it.”

Murim was a forest within the borders of the Great Nation, but its people also openly defied the laws of the land.

If the Murim Alliance intervened, it would be like bringing a foreign force into this crucial fight for the throne. A pack of beasts beyond the fence, without even leashes to restrain them.

“Of course, the current Alliance Leader likely wants to help us. The secret order he gave you to guard Prince Shangshan tells me as much.”

“That’s true. We also have to keep a close eye on every move the imperial family makes.”

“But that’s as far as he can go. If he asked the Alliance to formally join the restoration army, how many of its leaders would agree?”

“Well…”

My voice trailed off.

A coup.

Just thinking of the word sent a chill down my spine.

The Heavenly Demon, who supposedly ruled the Demonic Cult like a king, might have been able to make that decision alone. An elected Alliance Leader could not.

The Nine Sects and One Gang. The Five Great Families. And all the other sects beneath the Murim Alliance’s banner.

Winning the support of most of them would be next to impossible. Right or wrong, a coup was a gamble that could ruin entire families in an instant.

“And so, Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung, I ask you formally.”

The rain that had poured down without letup had stopped as if by magic. Ma Sanbao’s eyes flashed in the darkness.

“Will you join forces with me—no, with us?”

His voice rang clear, full of force.

“Will you help us set this troubled land to rights and put His Highness Prince Shangshan on the throne?”

“…!”

My body trembled before I could stop it.

A bolt of lightning struck through the tangled mess in my head.

For a moment I said nothing, staring at Ma Sanbao. The silence was brief, yet it felt longer than any I’d known. Then I spoke.

“Do you still have that joint pledge you showed me last time?”

At the meaning behind my words, a bright smile spread across Ma Sanbao’s face.

Chapter 896

The pledge Ma Sanbao pulled from his robe was worn with age.

The paper had yellowed, and stains marked it here and there. But the names and positions, crowded onto it in each signer's own hand, were still clear. At the center stood one name in larger, bolder script than all the rest.

Wei Zhong, Seal-Holding Eunuch of the East Depot.

"Lord Cang Gong," Ma Sanbao said, noticing where I was looking. "He was the first to draw up the pledge and sign it. He made us promise, again and again, that even if he died, we would see the coup through."

"He must have thought he might die."

"His Internal Injury was so severe it would have been no surprise if he'd died on the spot. Thankfully, he survived…"

Ma Sanbao sighed, regret on his face.

"But it's not good. He still hasn't recovered completely. Of course, if he hadn't been injured that badly, he wouldn't still be alive."

"What do you mean?"

"Why else would the Emperor have spared Lord Cang Gong? He was the foremost of the old retainers who served the late Emperor. The Emperor couldn't execute him outright without facing the consequences."

I'd wondered about that myself.

That meticulous Emperor had spared Lord Cang Gong, the man who stood in his way—and the head of the East Depot, the most threatening force of all.

"Is there something else I don't know?"

Ma Sanbao nodded quietly.

"There was a bargain. The fate of the Great Nation hung on it."

"What kind of bargain?"

"The life of a child who hadn't even learned to walk. Traded for the lives of countless loyal officials."

"…!"

"Yes, exactly what you're thinking. Nearly a hundred senior officials were sacrificed to save His Highness Prince Shangshan. Not just the officials themselves, but their entire families."

The air around us seemed to grow heavy. A fire flickered in Ma Sanbao's eyes.

"With the late Emperor, His Highness the Crown Prince, and the other princes all gravely ill, we had to protect His Highness Prince Shangshan, our last hope, even at that cost. It was the only way."

"What did the Emperor get out of the bargain?"

“Legitimacy and time. The late Emperor, after securing a promise about His Highness Prince Shangshan’s future, formally abdicated the throne. Lord Cang Gong calmed the opposition forces that had wanted to fight the new Emperor.”

The Imperial Capital might be the center of the realm, but it wasn’t the whole realm.

The Great Nation’s vast territories were held together by countless officials and armies. Even with the legitimacy of a formal transfer of power, the new Emperor would have needed time to quell the unrest simmering across the land.

Cang Gong was the most respected of the late Emperor’s old retainers. Cang Gong’s safety, along with Prince Shangshan’s, must have been what kept those forces in check.

“The bargain dealt us a terrible blow, but it let us achieve what we had to. The Emperor wasn’t the only one who needed time to recover.”

The Emperor had probably expected Cang Gong to die before long.

Instead, Cang Gong had miraculously survived his terrible Internal Injury. The East Depot he led had endured, too.

And so had the restoration army, which dreamed of rebellion under his leadership.

“So the two sides split apart and faced off against each other. And they’ve been doing that for more than a decade.”

“That’s right. This clash has been inevitable for a long time. We’ve had our blades pointed at each other, but neither side could make the first move. Not openly, at least.”

I frowned at that last part.

“Not openly?”

“There have been several assassination attempts. The Emperor went after Lord Cang Gong, and we went after the Emperor.”

I didn’t need to ask how those attempts had turned out. Both men were still alive.

The Emperor lived under heavy guard in Qianqing Palace, though. Cang Gong’s survival was the surprising part.

“When I went to Qianqing Palace, I saw that the Emperor had one hell of an assassin working for him. How did you stop them?”

“The Emperor has several Supreme Peak masters under his command, of course. But our forces are no weaker. Have you heard of the Twelve Palaces of the Zodiac?”

“I’ve heard the name a few times. Aren’t those constellations?”

“Usually. But it’s also a title for the twelve Supreme Peak masters who protect the Imperial Capital.”

What?

My eyes widened. Twelve Supreme Peak masters, all here in the Imperial Capital? They were rare even in Murim.

I knew much of the Great Nation's strength was concentrated here, but that was still astonishing. What Ma Sanbao said next surprised me even more.

"Half of those twelve Supreme Peak masters belong to our side. Some of them are staying with Lord Cang Gong."

"…!"

"And that's not all."

Ma Sanbao pointed to the names and positions on the pledge, one after another.

Among them was an old scholar who enjoyed the overwhelming support of the realm's Confucian scholars, along with senior court officials of the highest rank, such as the Three Dukes. But the most important names belonged to military officers.

Commanders guarding the Imperial Capital and the borders beyond it. One was even a governor-general who commanded tens of thousands of troops.

"Do you understand why this standoff has lasted so long?"

I nodded gravely.

The names on that pledge represented no less than half the Great Nation. If either side struck first, the result would be a sea of corpses and blood.

"The Emperor is the one who drew his sword first. We had no intention of upsetting the balance. We wanted to wait, at least until His Highness Prince Shangshan was older."

Children of this era generally grew up faster than children in the modern world. But Prince Shangshan was still too young to shoulder the burden of an empire this vast.

"His Highness the Crown Prince was so gifted. The two princes and the other members of the imperial family were worthy of their station, too. Yet they all fell ill, wasted away, and died. Just like someone you know."

"…The City Lord of Sichuan Province."

"Yes. He, too, supposedly fell ill that way just after meeting the Emperor. Do you think that's a coincidence?"

Ma Sanbao's voice was grave, but there was no doubt in it.

"The Emperor must have joined forces with that sinister group called Dark Heaven. Baek Yeon, who suddenly betrayed the late Emperor, and that woman So Gyo must be closely tied to them as well."

"…!"

"You and I have come too far to turn back. It's time to end this long, terrible turmoil. The grand banquet…"

His eyes gleamed.

"It will be the grand enthronement of a new Son of Heaven. The rightful one."

I closed my eyes without realizing it.

Darkness.

The rain had spent itself in one furious downpour, and I could no longer hear it.

The silence was suffocating.

In it, I turned my thoughts and doubts over once more.

What was right? What was wrong?

What waited at the end of this choice?

The die had already been cast.

I'd made my decision the moment I asked Ma Sanbao for the pledge. This was only the last fork in the road to where I was going.

Rustle.

I opened my eyes to Ma Sanbao's rigid face. After watching him in silence for a while, I brought my hand to my mouth.

Crack. Tap.

A dull pain, and drops of blood began to fall. With my pinky finger wet with blood, I filled in the pledge's empty space.

Jin Taekyung.

Three characters. Nothing more.

Unlike the others who had crowded the pledge with their names, I added no sobriquet, family, or affiliation.

Ma Sanbao understood at once.

"You mean to shoulder the burden alone. In case the coup fails."

"Does that make me a coward?"

"No. I can't blame you. You don't want to suffer the same fate as the Maoshan Sect, annihilated for opposing the Great Nation in the past. Besides…"

He tucked the pledge, now bearing my name, into his robe.

"If you and your Master join us, the coup won't fail."

He looked and sounded certain. I watched him for a moment, then spoke.

"That's not enough."

What?

"Not 'it won't fail.' It has to succeed, doesn't it?"

"What are you—"

Before Ma Sanbao could finish, I went to the bookcase in the corner of the pavilion and pulled out a book. I tore out a page without hesitation, scrawled a short message on it with my still-bleeding finger, and handed it to him.

"What is this…?"

He frowned at the writing.

“I have no idea what it means. I can barely read it.”

“That’s because it’s in code.”

“Code?”

“A cipher only a handful of people can understand.”

“Then why are you—wait. You don’t mean…”

“I do.”

I nodded at Ma Sanbao, whose eyes had widened, and continued slowly.

“Send one of your men to the place I’m about to tell you and have him deliver that message. Reinforcements from the Murim Alliance will arrive in time for the grand banquet. A powerful force that might even include the Slaughter Saint or one of the Ten Kings.”

“…!”

“You told me last time: succeed, and we’re kings. Fail, and we’re traitors.”

I met Ma Sanbao’s face, colored with shock and amazement, and muttered,

“In that case, shouldn’t we make sure this coup succeeds?”

Yes.

The die had already been cast.

The downpour was almost without precedent.

Rain had battered the Imperial Capital overnight, flooding parts of the city. Hundreds of homes were submerged, and many people were killed or injured.

In its wake, ominous rumors began to spread.

They said they’d found a venomous serpent in a well on the outskirts of the capital—one bigger than several grown men put together.

They said it was Heaven’s warning to the current Son of Heaven, who had defied the natural order—and a prophecy that an even greater disaster was about to begin.

They said the rain had stopped so soon thanks to His Highness Prince Shangshan, who had carried on the late Emperor’s will.

Rumors like these, steeped in superstition, spread like wildfire. Within two days, they had crossed the city’s towering walls and reached the imperial palace.

They reached even its deepest, most secluded place: Qianqing Palace.

When the Emperor heard them, he gave an irritable laugh.

“Looks like the time has come.”

It was the first sign of a storm.

It was also the beginning of the grand banquet—and the wind, rain, and sea of corpses and blood it would bring.

Chapter 897

That day, everything was different from usual.

The streets, usually filled with laughter and music, were quiet. Clouds that had yet to clear cast shadows over the people below, and the canal, swollen by unprecedented rainfall, churned uneasily, as if reflecting the mood of the city.

At the end of it all, and at its center, stood the imperial palace.

Rumble.

It was the dim hour before dawn. Even when the massive iron gates began to open with a heavy metallic groan, no one thought anything strange was happening.

The palace gates always closed at the hour of the Rat[3374] and opened at the hour of the Rabbit.[3375]

Before long, dawn would break. Ministers from the various courts would make their way to the palace, while the people of this beautiful, dangerous metropolis—high and low alike—began another day in their own places.

Like precisely meshing gears.

As if that were simply the natural order of things.

But the dazzling light that appeared between the slowly opening gates was proof that this day would not begin like any other.

“H-Hey. Is that…?”

“Hm?”

A vendor who had set up his stall along the main road in front of the palace, as usual, turned at the call of a fellow merchant. His narrow eyes swelled wide.

“T-The Embroidered Uniform Guard?”

The words had barely escaped his lips when—

“Ha!”

With a short battle cry shouted in unison, a thousand Embroidered Uniform Guards mounted on their fine steeds poured through the wide-open gates.

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

Hooves thundered, waking the dawn.

The ground shook. Dust, settled by the cool morning air and rainwater that had yet to dry, rose into the air.

The thousand riders shot forward like a single arrow, crossing the main road before the palace in the blink of an eye. At a hand signal from their commander, they scattered in every direction.

From a thousand to hundreds. Hundreds to a hundred. A hundred to dozens.

They split up, then split again, exactly as planned.

[3374] The hour of the Rat is the traditional two-hour period from 11 p.m. to 1 a.m.

[3375] The hour of the Rabbit is the traditional two-hour period from 5 a.m. to 7 a.m.

The people who had started their day early watched in a daze. But when they saw the notices left behind by the golden tide that had swept through the Imperial Capital, they understood.

Tomorrow. The hour of the Goat.[3376]

The grand banquet for the imperial prince's birthday. Begins.

That was how the first line of the hundreds of proclamations began, each written by the imperial court calligrapher whose elegant handwriting was renowned throughout the realm. The faces of the people already suffering from the untimely flood twisted with anger.

"Three days? He's holding that damn banquet for three whole days in a situation like this?"

"Shh. Keep your voice down. Want to get arrested for treason?"

"Treason, my ass. I worked like an ox my whole life to buy my house, and now I've lost it and every last thing in it. What have I got left to be afraid of?"

"Exactly!"

"Fuck, so to hell with what the people think? His own kid's birthday comes first, is that it?"

Some had lost their property. Others, their families.

And they were all neighbors who had been closer than family.

So the people trying to calm those furious at the proclamation didn't look happy, either.

The Son of Heaven. Or the Emperor.

How could the supreme ruler, descended from the dragon appointed by Heaven and charged with caring for all his subjects, do such a thing?

Those who had lost what they treasured in the flood were furious. And the people watching them suddenly realized that they too might one day be standing there, furious over their own losses.

Something's wrong with this country…

At first, they had done nothing but look up to the Son of Heaven. He was so far above them that they couldn't dream of seeing him, no different from the sun overhead.

But the current Emperor had violated the bonds of kinship.

He was a monster in human skin who had seized the throne by slaughtering his parents, his siblings, and countless loyal officials and their families.

And so Heaven's favor must have turned away from him.

At the Shaolin Temple, known to everyone under Heaven, eminent monks had been dying. In Sichuan, thousands of martial artists had turned the broad daylight into a sea of corpses and blood.

[3376] The hour of the Goat is the traditional two-hour period from 1 p.m. to 3 p.m.

And that wasn’t all.

Unbelievable rumors had come from Hubei of an imugi gone on a rampage. Sinister tales said that the barbarians of the harsh lands of Nanman had formed a vast army and marched north.

The northern tribes, quiet as mice for a hundred years, were showing signs of unrest. And now an unprecedented downpour had struck the Imperial Capital.

What could this string of disasters mean?

Heaven has forsaken this country. No—the heavens are trying to punish the Emperor.

If these had been peaceful, prosperous times, no one would have given such rumors and superstitions a second thought.

A house earned through hard work, a beloved family, plenty of grain and money—that would have been enough.

For more than a decade, the realm had been as calm as the waters of West Lake. The people hadn’t complained about their new Son of Heaven as much as one might have expected.

They could condemn the Son of Heaven for defying the natural order, but their lives and livelihoods hadn’t changed all that much.

Some had even cheered when corrupt officials who’d run rampant during the late Emperor’s peaceful reign were caught up in the purge for treason. Good riddance, they’d said.

But things were different now.

In barely two years, strange phenomena that could only be called supernatural powers had appeared throughout the realm. A young king beloved by the people had been summoned to the capital. And the Son of Heaven, ignoring his suffering subjects, had poured a fortune into a banquet celebrating his heir.

“Is this… is this truly the right thing to do?”

A man in a worn bamboo hat pulled low over his face muttered the question on everyone’s mind.

“The people’s will is Heaven’s will, and Heaven’s will is the people’s. Why, then, has the Emperor turned his back on Heaven and his people?”

His voice rang clearly through the crowd, which had fallen silent.

The invisible air pressed down on them, heavy and still.

In the suffocating silence, people clenched their teeth and their eyes shone. For some reason, they strained to hear every word of the man’s voice, which sounded unusually clear.

“The azure heaven’s power is waning, and dark clouds gather. The storm that will soon descend will soon swallow the realm whole.”

It was strange.

Hundreds of people had gathered there, yet not one of them spoke. They all listened to the man.

The rough laborer who had never learned to read. The street vendor who lived from day to day. Even the elderly Confucian scholar, whose learning was likely as extensive as his years.

There was something mysterious in the man's words and voice, a profound insight and conviction that drew them all in.

And left them with a question they couldn't help asking.

"Um, sir. Forgive me for interrupting, but could I ask you one thing?"

At the laborer's cautious approach, rough as he looked, the man in the bamboo hat nodded.

"Go ahead."

"If it's not too much trouble, what should a poor man like me do to escape the storm you mentioned?"

"Head for the mountain."

"What?"

The laborer's eyes widened at the answer, given without a moment's hesitation. The man in the bamboo hat continued slowly.

"Find the highest mountain in the realm and take shelter there. It has a stream that never runs dry, fruit growing ripe, and animals roaming free. Its forests will provide timber for homes and firewood. It could shelter all the people under Heaven and still have room to spare."

The laborer was dumbfounded.

So was most of the crowd.

The highest mountain in the realm?

Where was there a mountain vast enough to shelter everyone, with food and resources to spare?

While the laborer searched for words, another man, more impatient, blurted out,

"I don't know who you are, but you seem to be a master of profound cultivation. Do you mean the Five Sacred Mountains of the Central Plains?"

A few people gave soft cries of recognition and nodded.

The five famous mountains, said to be the highest in the realm and filled with sacred energy—yes, that would make sense, they murmured.

"Which of the Five Sacred Mountains do you mean? Mount Song in Henan? Taishan in Shandong? Huashan in Shaanxi? Or…"

"You're all wrong. I didn't mean the Five Sacred Mountains of the Central Plains."

"What? What do you mean? If not the Five Sacred Mountains, then what—"

The man's calm, firm reply left the crowd speechless. Just then, an elderly voice came from somewhere among them.

"There's one place left. No, it was the only place from the beginning."

Every head turned.

An elderly Confucian scholar in faded but neat clothes gazed at the gloomy sky and murmured, almost to himself,

"Shangshan."

"…!"

A few people understood what those words meant, and their eyes widened. Most remained confused.

Until the old scholar continued.

"Yes. That place could shelter all the people under Heaven. No matter how fiercely the storm swallowed the Five Sacred Mountains of the Central Plains, it would never dare reach Shangshan. The mountain's master is under Heaven's protection, a descendant of the dragon who commands rain and lightning."

For a moment, the world seemed to stop.

Everyone stood frozen like statues, looking at one another. Then they realized they had all reached the same conclusion.

Shangshan.

Higher and wider than the Five Sacred Mountains of the Central Plains, a mountain capable of sheltering all the people under Heaven.

And its master—a descendant of the dragon, protected by Heaven.

How had they failed to see it? How could they have been so foolish?

The man had never been talking about a mountain. Every word had pointed to one person who could shelter this troubled realm.

Prince Shangshan…!

Was this what it felt like to have a bolt of lightning strike through the crown of your head?

Everyone's whole body trembled as if they'd been electrocuted.

Mouths agape. Teeth clenched. Fists balled, as they fought to cool their heads, burning hot with excitement.

And at the same time, they pictured a future they had never imagined before.

What if… what if His Highness Prince Shangshan took the throne?

Heaven's favor had already departed. The people's hearts were wavering.

And a child who had survived the vast, brutal purge years ago had returned to the capital, to the very place where he had first cried out at birth.

Was it fate, or coincidence? Another sinister plot by an Emperor who had already violated the bonds of kinship once?

Or…

Was it the Mandate of Heaven?

No one dared speak. Slowly, they turned their heads.

They wanted an answer.

They wanted to face the man who had put this startling possibility before them.

But in the next moment, their anticipation and excitement came crashing down.

The place where the man in the bamboo hat had stood only moments ago was empty.

Chapter 898

Someone once said humans are creatures of adaptation.

But everyone has at least one thing they can never get used to, no matter how many times they experience it.

For me, one was being responsible for other people's lives. Another was waking up to someone's ugly face.

"What are you doing?"

Hyuk Mujin answered, "Checking on you, Captain."

"Why?"

"You barred everyone from coming in and spent two whole days shut up in your room circulating your qi. I thought you might've suffered qi deviation, so I slipped in to check."

"Two days?"

"Yes. You didn't know?"

"No, I knew."

That was a lie. I'd thought half a day had passed at most. Two whole days?

I looked toward the sunlit window and sighed inwardly.

"I appreciate you worrying about me, but next time, just leave me alone."

"Why?"

"Because seeing your face first thing when I woke up nearly gave me qi deviation."

"Isn't that a bit harsh?"

"Your face is harsh."

"Then I'll just stay nearby. You need someone to stand guard, don't you?"

"Don't stand guard, either."

"Why not?"

"Your snoring will give me qi deviation."

"…At this point, I'd be better off not being here at all. Keep this up and I might get fed up and head back to our family on my own."

I had just uncrossed my legs and was about to get up. Instead, I stared at Hyuk Mujin and his halfhearted attempt to threaten me.

"W-Why are you looking at me like that? Is there some rule that says I have to follow you around, Captain?"

Despite his words, he was watching me nervously. A laugh escaped me.

Hyuk Mujin had been hunching his shoulders, ready to dodge a punch that might come at any moment—or at least make it hurt less. Now he looked baffled.

"What's going on? Am I seeing things? Why are you acting like this all of a sudden, Captain?"

“Like what?”

“You’d normally have hit me at least twelve times by now, but you’re just smiling like some virtuous gentleman.”

I barely held back the laugh bubbling up inside me.

Then I kicked off the floor and shot forward like a flash of light.

Whoosh!

Hyuk Mujin instinctively tried to defend himself. In that split second, he moved with a speed and composure that made it hard to believe he was still only a First Rate martial artist.

Of course, against me, his defense had failed before it began.

“Hup.”

Realizing it was hopeless, Hyuk Mujin let out a strangled breath and squeezed his eyes shut. He was probably bracing for the hard blow that usually followed.

But for all his preparation, it never came.

Tap.

Instead of smacking him as I usually did, I lightly tapped the back of his head and clicked my tongue.

“You’ve been learning martial arts wrong all this time. Who told you to close your eyes?”

“…Huh?”

“Even if you’re getting hit, keep your eyes wide open. Even just keeping your eyes on your opponent puts you halfway there.”

Hyuk Mujin rubbed the back of his head, looking dazed, then blurted out, “Why are you acting like this all of a sudden?”

“Like what?”

“It’s strange. Normally…”

“So you want me to hit you like I usually do?”

Hyuk Mujin answered at once. “No. Not that.”

“Then shut up. I’m keeping you fit to fight.”

“Fit to fight?”

“Yeah. We’ll be fighting like hell soon. What good would hitting you on the back of the head do? If you caught a stray blade because of it, I’d end up having bad dreams for nothing.”

Hyuk Mujin grinned.

“Ohhh. So that’s what it is. You could be a little more honest, you know.”

“What?”

“I know all about it. When I said I might leave, it bothered you, didn’t it, Captain? Right?”

I started to answer, then just let out a quiet laugh.

“Yeah, you little shit. Must be nice to be so perceptive.”

“I knew it. I thought so. Even you need someone like me, your right-hand man, stuck to your side if you want to get anything done.”

“Right-hand man, my ass. You’re a little toe.”

“Come on, now. Calling myself your right-hand man is already a big concession on my part.”

“A concession?”

“Yes. Where else are you going to find a subordinate as loyal as me? I’m not your right hand—I’m your heart. Your heart.”

“Not a chance. You’ve got balls. How dare you call yourself my heart?”

“Then if I get them removed, do I qualify?”

Whack!

This time I put some force into it. For some reason, Hyuk Mujin groaned and clutched the back of his head, but his face lit up.

“Now that’s more like it.”

“…Huh?”

“It’s still a little weak, though. Hit me harder.”

What was with that creepy reaction?

Just as I began to question Hyuk Mujin’s tastes, he grinned and went on.

“It’s nothing, really. You’ve been so different from usual that I couldn’t help worrying.”

“…!”

“I know you’ve had a lot on your mind lately, but it’ll all work out. So do what you always do. Just like you always have.”

For a moment, I couldn’t speak.

At the same time, the truth I’d kept buried in my heart welled up and tickled the back of my throat.

But…

I can’t.

I couldn’t let a passing rush of emotion make me speak. To survive and win this enormous gamble, surrounded by monsters, I had to choose my words carefully.

In the end, after thinking it over, I managed only one question.

“Aren’t you scared?”

“Hm? Of what?”

“The situation we’re in. And whatever it is we’re about to face.”

Hyuk Mujin blinked at me for a long while, then answered, “What kind of question is that? Of course I’m scared.”

“You don’t act like it.”

“I’m used to being scared.”

“You’re used to it?”

“Yes. How do I put it? I’ve always been kind of a coward.”

Hyuk Mujin scratched the back of his head, looking embarrassed.

“When I was little, I was afraid my younger sibling would take all my parents’ love, so I cried every day. Then, when I got older and decided to become a martial artist, just holding a sword made me tremble. I thought I’d gotten better after joining the Jin Family of Taiyuan, but once I started following you around, Captain… I felt like I was going to piss myself every single day.”

That was the first I’d heard of it.

Thinking back, I’d never really asked Hyuk Mujin about his past.

I’d learned by chance that he was the eldest son of a large textile shop that had been in his family for three generations. It wasn’t as if I’d tried to find out.

Maybe that was why, instead of cutting off his long-winded story with a flick to the forehead as I normally would have, I found myself wanting to hear more.

“…Anyway, somehow I wound up stuck to your side.”

Hyuk Mujin finished with a shrug, then suddenly looked at me.

“This is all your fault, Captain.”

“Mine?”

“Yes. You’re like a ghost, always finding your way to places where people go to die. I got so much practice along the way that now I’m scared, but I’m not. You know what I mean?”

“So it was hard on you?”

“Hard? I thought I was going to die. But I never actually did. Or, to be precise, whenever I thought I was going to die, you saved me.”

Maybe not this time.

I swallowed the words that had been circling in my mouth.

Unaware of what I was thinking, Hyuk Mujin went on as if nothing were wrong.

“Maybe that’s why I’m not all that scared this time, either. Even when I heard what you told Comrade Hong and me recently, I felt pretty calm.”

“Because you figure I’ll save you again?”

“No.”

“No?”

“No. I just had a thought.”

For a moment, Hyuk Mujin looked straight at me and spoke.

“Oh, I thought, maybe this time I can be the one to save you, Captain.”

“…!”

“You said it was dangerous. That even you and Great Hero Jeok would have to risk your lives. That it was basically a gamble. Then couldn’t even someone as weak as me be useful this time?”

Hyuk Mujin added with a bright smile, “I’m still a First Rate nobody with a long way to go, but they say when you’re in trouble, even a cat’s paw is worth borrowing. Right?”

I didn’t answer.

No, I couldn’t.

It felt as if an invisible hand had closed around my throat, cutting off my breath. If I opened my mouth, I was afraid the truth might slip out before I could stop it.

So I looked at his smiling face in silence, then smiled back.

“Yeah. Now you’re finally going to be useful.”

“Ahem. This time, just trust me. I, Hyuk Mujin, am your right hand and your heart. I’m the Tenfold Man of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, aren’t I?”

Watching Hyuk Mujin thump his chest with exaggerated force, I let go of every worry still weighing on my mind.

And I was certain.

Every choice I made from here on out would be the right one.

“Remember what I told you two days ago?”

Hyuk Mujin’s smile faded, and he nodded.

“Which part…?”

“The Murim Alliance reinforcements.”

“Oh, of course. But when did you manage to get in touch with the Murim Alliance, Captain?”

“That’s not important, so forget it. I have a mission for you.”

“Just me?”

“No, everyone in the Fire Dragon Pavilion.”

“The entire pavilion means… you’re coming with us, Captain?”

“I’m not going. And neither is my Master. You’ll lead the rest of the group to the place I tell you and wait there.”

“Are we meeting the Murim Alliance reinforcements there?”

“Yeah. They’ll arrive within half a day at the earliest, and by tomorrow at the latest.”

Hyuk Mujin nodded as if he understood, then suddenly furrowed his brow.

“That’s longer than I expected. Leaving you here at a time like this is a bit… You’re not in your usual condition, either.”

“I’m not. So, are you afraid a Supreme Peak master who isn’t in his usual condition will keel over coughing blood at any moment?”

Hyuk Mujin grinned.

“Right. I was a crow-tit worrying about a Heavenly Eagle.”

“Usually, it’d be a stork you were worried about, not a Heavenly Eagle.”

“For the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, even a Heavenly Eagle isn’t enough. Anyway, is that the whole mission?”

“Yeah. Right now.”

I answered and took a neatly folded note from inside my robe, then handed it to him.

I’d prepared it two days ago, but until the last moment, I’d wavered over whether to take it out at all.

“Anyone besides me and my Master should be able to leave the imperial palace without much trouble. Once you’re sure no one’s following you, check the destination written there.”

“This is starting to feel less like the Fire Dragon Pavilion and more like the Hidden Shadow Pavilion.”

Hyuk Mujin carefully took the note and tucked it away. Then he clasped his hands in a salute.

“I’ll get going, then.”

“One last thing.”

“Yes?”

“Be careful. You and everyone else.”

Hyuk Mujin looked puzzled, then gave me a playful grin. He turned and disappeared.

Once his presence had faded completely, I slowly left the room and came face to face with the one person still there.

Whoosh.

A slow exhalation. Hong Jin looked at me through the cloudy smoke from his long-stemmed tobacco pipe, then murmured as if to himself, “Martial artist Hyuk seemed pretty busy.”

“He is. I gave him a mission.”

“It must be important, to send him off at a time like this.”

“Yes. It is.”

“I understand how you feel.”

Creak.

The old wooden chair groaned. Hong Jin rose with elegant poise and spoke through the haze of smoke.

“In a dangerous gamble where no one knows what will happen, you must want to save even one more person.”

“…!”

“So, Young Master Jin, are you ready?”

I nodded with a bitter smile.

“I’ve always been ready.”

A little while later, golden-armored guards lined up in front of the pavilion to escort us to the Grand Banquet Hall.

Chapter 899

Maybe it was because everything around me gleamed gold, but for a moment, I felt like the richest man in the world.

Sadly, reality was a long way from that.

Clank. Clank.

I might've been able to enjoy the feeling a little longer if not for those ominous metallic sounds.

But the Embroidered Uniform Guards surrounding Hong Jin and me as they marched along showed no sign of offering that kind of consideration.

To be fair, I'd be crazy to expect it.

A laugh slipped out before I could stop it. I felt a heated gaze from beside me. Hong Jin was staring at me in disbelief.

"What is it?"

"…You do know why I'm looking at you, right? I'm asking just in case."

"Hmm. Because I suddenly laughed at a time like this?"

"Thank goodness. I thought Young Master Jin had completely lost his mind."

"Don't worry. I'm holding on to my sanity."

It wasn't as if I could stand there grinning like a lunatic with my life hanging by a thread.

When you're backed up against a cliff, your mind actually grows calmer.

Everything else falls away, leaving only one word: survival.

Just like right now.

"I'll take your word for it. I have no choice."

Hong Jin muttered as if to himself, then slowly drew on his still-lit long-stemmed tobacco pipe.

The ember glowed red. He exhaled a plume of white smoke that drifted among the guards.

Smoking so boldly as he walked through the imperial palace, when his head might roll at any moment. I was privately impressed by Hong Jin's nerve when I noticed his eyelashes trembling and his face growing languid.

Then the smoke's distinctive scent reached me.

Now that I think about it, I always smell that when I'm near Hong Jin.

Normally, I'd thought nothing of it.

I wasn't some anti-smoking spokesperson. There was nothing strange about Hong Jin smoking a pipe, and no reason for me to stop him.

I'd simply assumed he was making up for what he lacked as a man by filling himself with nicotine.

But even so, I'd occasionally felt a strange sense of déjà vu.

Something about the smell was familiar, and I had no trouble remembering when I'd felt that way before.

Right. Immediately after I returned from my audience with the Emperor. That very day.

An idea flashed through my mind.

I watched Hong Jin slowly exhale smoke, then spoke up.

"It seems to taste better than I expected. The smell didn't appeal to me."

"What are you talking about? Oh, this?"

I gave a quiet nod. Hong Jin lightly waved the pipe in his hand.

"I wouldn't say it tastes good. It's just… a habit. A very bad one."

Of course smoking was bad for your health.

At least by modern standards.

But in this era, it wasn't exactly frowned upon.

This world had no place in any history passed down to the twenty-first century, but it was remarkably similar in many ways. The names of its regions, the clothes and food, even people's attitudes.

And by those standards, smoking wasn't considered a bad habit. If anything, the powerful, who indulged in every sort of pleasure, encouraged it. Tobacco leaves were expensive, though, so it was a luxury most commoners could hardly afford.

But Hong Jin is one of those powerful people, and even he calls it a bad habit?

Something clicked.

There was more to this. Something I hadn't figured out yet.

I held out my hand to Hong Jin.

"Can I try it?"

"Hmm? You want to smoke? This?"

"Yes. I thought I'd give it a try while I had the chance."

Our eyes met for an instant. Hong Jin's eyebrow twitched so slightly no one else could have noticed.

A sign that he'd understood exactly what I meant.

"How curious. The martial artists I know drink readily enough, but they rarely touch poppy."

"Poppy…?"

"It's the dried sap of the poppy. If you smoke it when your mind is troubled, sometimes it calms you down and makes you feel drowsy. It's often used to relieve pain, but it's highly addictive, so—"

Hong Jin's voice faded to a distant echo.

Only one word floated through my mind.

Opium!

I might've treated school lessons as a chance to catch up on sleep, but at least a little basic knowledge had stuck.

Especially since my world history teacher had a booming voice so passionate it could chase away the sleep that had already claimed me.

"Hey! Jin Taekyung!"

"Hrk. Huh?"

"You punk. What did the teacher just say? Don't roll your eyes around—tell me."

"Uh, well…"

"Right. You don't know. Of course you don't. You've slept through the entire third period back there. Is this a hotel or a school?"

"Oh, I remember now."

"What? You remember? Fine, let's hear what kind of creative bullshit you heard in your dream. What was it?"

"Hey, Jin Taekyung."

"…"

"No…?"

"No, that's right. It is. But… you really are a nutcase. The Opium War! I was talking about the Opium War. I swear, you're driving me crazy. Repeat after me. The Opium War!"

"What? The Youth Protection War?[3377]"

"Youth Protection… Hey, class president! Kim Minjeong!"

"Yes?"

"Call the cops right now. I'm going to beat this punk and get arrested for assaulting a student."

Fortunately, the police never came. After my teacher finished shouting at me, I was sentenced to copy out an entire section on the Opium War by hand.

That was how I'd managed to cram all sorts of trivial details into my thick skull—including the fact that the white-skinned island chinks had invaded the genuine mainland chinks.

And that opium came from a plant called the poppy.

So that's useful now.

I silently thanked my world history teacher, who'd been more passionate than anyone.

Thanks to him, I'd just learned something new.

Opium. No, that distinctive scent of poppy… I've smelled it before. Stronger than Hong Jin's.

[3377] Taekyung mishears apyeon (opium) as acheong, shorthand associated with Korea's law protecting children and youth from sexual crimes.

Just a few days ago.

I'd definitely felt that déjà vu. And only now did I realize what I'd overlooked at the time.

Listen carefully. Don't react.

Hong Jin kept walking as though nothing had happened. Barely moving my lips, I sent him a Sound Transmission.

If the Emperor smokes opium, why do you think he does it?

That day. That time. That moment.

The first person who'd stirred that sense of déjà vu was the man above all others—the one I'd met in Qianqing Palace.

"Hah."

With a ragged exhale, the man suddenly opened his eyes.

Faint torchlight flickered beyond the darkness. Long lengths of thin, colorful silk hung around him.

Where am I…

There was no mistaking the place. It was his bedchamber and his fortress, where he'd spent most of the past decade or so.

He lay there for a while, soaked in cold sweat as he caught his breath. Then he spoke.

"Is anyone there?"

The dry sound of his voice had barely faded when—

Rustle.

A breeze from somewhere stirred the silk curtains. A thread of Sound Transmission slipped between them and reached his ear.

—At your command.

The man said nothing for a while. He ran a hand over his face.

The deep furrows, too pronounced for his age, showed the marks of fatigue.

Though some time had passed since he'd awoken, his heart still pounded fiercely.

"It seems the sun has already set."

—It will soon be the hour of the Dog.[3378]

"The hour of the Dog.[3379] And the grand banquet?"

—The appointed hour of the Goat[3380] has long since passed. The civil and military officials have all gathered.

[3378] The hour of the Dog is a traditional two-hour period, approximately 7–9 p.m.
[3379] The hour of the Dog is a traditional two-hour period, approximately 7–9 p.m.
[3380] The hour of the Goat is a traditional two-hour period, approximately 1–3 p.m.

"Then is he there, too?"

He.

Hardly enough to identify one person among the many gathered for the grand banquet. Yet the shadow in the darkness answered without hesitation.

—Yes.

"…Unexpected. Martial artists may rush headlong into danger, but this is absurdly reckless."

The Emperor seemed to be speaking to himself, but he went on.

"Then again, someone had already foreseen it. His Master must have stayed, too."

—He has also attended. However…

"Go on."

—The other martial artists, apart from those two, have left the imperial palace.

"Left?"

—Yes. They appeared to be moving with some purpose, but we could not follow them any farther.

"You couldn't follow them?"

The man frowned, but the shadow's next words silenced him.

—Yes. 'She' personally intervened and stopped us.

"…I see."

—If you command it, we can act at once.

"No. No."

He shook his head and slowly rose from his bed.

The room was far too vast to be one person's bedchamber. Clad in sleeping robes embroidered with golden thread, he stood before a large mirror.

Rustle. Thud.

The soft silk slid over his skin and fell to the floor.

An ordinary person would have shivered at the sudden chill. But the man stood firm as an iron tower.

As he had when he led a great army to crush the rebels.

As he had that day, more than a decade ago.

But for all his enduring spirit, the figure reflected in the mirror bore little resemblance to the man he'd once been.

I've aged. Beyond recognition.

He felt no regret.

The path he'd walked was one someone had to take.

He'd simply been the one chosen.

He'd put on a dragon robe so dazzling no one dared raise their head to look at him, and been granted the title Son of Heaven.

He had no regrets.

Only the path ahead remained. Just one step left to take.

“It’s time for me to leave Qianqing Palace.”

At his words, the darkness where the shadow had melted stirred, and Qianqing Palace, silent as a grave, sprang to life.

No. They had been ready from the beginning.

Ready to kill and to die at the Emperor’s command.

And on the roof of Qianqing Palace, its pulse throbbing like a volcano on the verge of eruption, a woman gazed up at the cloudy sky.

“Will it rain again today?”

So Gyo stroked the weapons hanging at either side of her waist.

She had them back after a long time. They were cold as ice, while the qi within them boiled hot as fire.

The Grand Banquet Hall was unbelievably vast and impossibly quiet. Countless officials, high and low, had gathered, yet not one of them spoke.

For that moment, they were all blind, unable to see, and mute, unable to speak.

Those who already knew what was happening quietly reflected on the lives they’d led up to then. Those who didn’t know were frozen in place by the suffocating presence that had swallowed the Grand Banquet Hall.

Who would speak first?

Who would be the first to… draw a sword?

As the same thought passed through every mind—

“There he is.”

A voice broke the silence.

“Five hours late. Are you kidding me?”

Jin Taekyung’s gaze pierced the darkness beyond the flickering torches.

More precisely, it pierced the enormous golden procession approaching from beyond, like a dragon.

Chapter 900

Thud. Thud-thud.

The earth trembled. Blazing torches roused the night.

A thousand Embroidered Uniform Guards marched in formation beneath fluttering imperial banners. Behind them came countless eunuchs and palace maids.

At the center of the procession was an enormous, magnificent imperial carriage built for one person alone.

Boom!

At last, the thousand Embroidered Uniform Guards entered the Grand Banquet Hall and stamped their feet in unison.

The powerful wave of qi they unleashed shook the air and washed over everyone's skin.

"At last…"

Those who heard the voice slip from someone's lips suddenly wondered:

Who had said that?

Which side were they on, and what outcome were they waiting for?

But there was no time to think of an answer.

From the enormous procession that had come to a halt, someone slowly rode forward on a fine steed and let out a thunderous cry.

"The sovereign of the Great Nation, master of Heaven and Earth and all things beneath them, has deigned to appear in person! All civil and military officials, great and small, kneel and pay your respects to His Majesty the Emperor!"

Whoosh!

Not even the golden armor encasing his body or the helmet pulled low over his head could hide his truly overwhelming presence.

At the shout, infused with internal energy, from Baek Yeon—the Emperor's right hand in name and deed, and Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard—everyone in the Grand Banquet Hall rose and knelt.

Clatter.

There were hundreds of civil and military officials, and thousands of soldiers already standing guard all around them.

They moved as one, bowing their heads to the ruler of this vast continent.

Even if, for some of them, it was nothing more than an empty show of respect, the fuse that would bring this banquet to an end had not yet burned all the way down.

"Long live His Majesty the Emperor."

At Ma Sanbao's quiet murmur, everyone joined in.

"Long live His Majesty the Emperor! Long live! Long, long live!"

At the very end of that resounding cheer, the Emperor stepped down from his sedan chair and walked slowly through the human curtain of guards.

Step. Step.

His footsteps rang out with unusual clarity.

But with their heads bowed, they couldn't see the Emperor as he passed. Only after he had taken his place on the throne atop the lofty stairs could they straighten up and face him.

The ruler of all under Heaven, who had shut himself away in Qianqing Palace for years on end while attending to the affairs of state.

The Great Nation's fourth prince turned rebel, then rebel turned Emperor: a notorious unfilial wretch and butcher who had finally seized the throne.

And a man of tempestuous fortune, standing at the highest place beneath Heaven.

They were stunned.

"…!"

"…!"

In an instant, shock and disquiet swept across the Grand Banquet Hall like an invisible wave.

There was no trace of the Emperor's once-youthful, handsome appearance in the man who had emerged after his long seclusion.

But the Emperor paid it no mind.

He looked down haughtily at the countless gazes fixed on him.

Though he had aged beyond recognition, his eyes shone brighter than anyone else's in the hall as he surveyed the gathered officials, great and small, one by one.

The pillars that held up this vast empire. Its very heart.

Among them were generals who commanded armies, and old scholars whose backs were bent but whose eyes remained unbowed.

Ma Sanbao, the East Depot's de facto leader and the Emperor's greatest adversary, was there as well.

But the last place the Emperor's gaze fell was far off at the end of the hall, where a young man watched him in silence.

Jin Taekyung.

Their eyes met across the hall.

The Emperor looked at Jin Taekyung. Jin Taekyung looked at the Emperor.

They stared at each other for a while without saying a word. At last, the Emperor's firmly closed lips parted.

"Begin."

Perhaps it wasn't just a few people who imagined it.

Boom. Boom. Bwoom!

The drums heralding the start of the grand banquet sounded like war drums announcing the opening of a battle.

The atmosphere, frozen like a glacier, began to thaw little by little when musicians and dancers entered with an astonishing spread of delicacies and began to perform.

The melody stirred the heart, and sleeves fluttered in time with the music.

On top of that, the imperial chefs had displayed all their skill, and the finest wines were served without limit.

Perhaps it was only natural that those who'd had a drink to settle their nerves began to relax a little.

"Whew. I can finally breathe."

"Indeed. I really thought something was about to happen…"

"Shut your mouth. You want to say the wrong thing and invite needless suspicion?"

"M-My apologies, sir."

"If I hear you say something that disrespectful again, I won't let it pass."

The middle-aged man reprimanded the young official beside him in a carefully lowered voice, then swept a sharp gaze around them.

He seemed worried someone might have overheard.

I casually picked up a bite of food from the appetizer in front of me.

The next moment, I felt the middle-aged man across from me fixing me with an unusually persistent stare.

The young official's voice reached my ears, too.

"S-Sir. I did misspeak, but no one could've heard me. The Embroidered Uniform Guards are far away, too."

He wasn't wrong.

The hall being used for today's grand banquet was large enough to train thousands of soldiers at once. The officials, seated at regular intervals, were quite far apart.

And though every Embroidered Uniform Guard was an exceptional master, only a few, including their commander, Baek Yeon, remained by the Emperor's side.

The rest were far away, holding their assigned positions.

But even after hearing the young official, the middle-aged man kept watching me closely for a while before asking,

"Do you know anything about that man?"

"Pardon? W-Well, I've heard in passing that he's a ruffian from the martial world."

"Is that all?"

“I’m not sure what you mean…”

“Tsk. You really don’t think, do you? Be grateful that your father and I have a connection. Otherwise, you wouldn’t have made it this far.”

The middle-aged man clicked his tongue and continued in the same low whisper.

“How could some ruffian attend a banquet like this? He’s Prince Shangshan’s bodyguard and guest, brought here by His Highness. He’s also the third son of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, whose influence has recently spread all the way south of the Yangtze.”

“The Jin Family of Taiyuan. The Jin Family of Taiyuan… Do you mean the family that runs the Jin Family Trading Company and the Jin Family Escort Bureau?”

“That’s right. And that Jin Family of Taiyuan is based in Shanxi, Prince Shangshan’s fief.”

“Ah.”

The young official let out a faint exclamation.

“A family of that standing must wield considerable influence in Shanxi Province.”

“With Prince Shangshan’s protection, how could it be otherwise? Martial artists who defy the Great Nation’s solemn laws have no business wielding that kind of power… but apparently they rule as de facto overlords across Shanxi Province.”

“Is that why you’re paying attention to him, sir? Because he’s the son of a martial arts family?”

“It’s more than that.”

“Then…”

“Blazing Flame Divine Dragon. That’s his sobriquet. A tremendous master, barely in his twenties, who’s already accomplished countless feats of arms. There’s no one in the martial world who hasn’t heard of him.”

“You’ve done your homework.”

“There was no need to look into it in detail. Even among the people of the Imperial Capital, there are countless who know of Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung…”

The middle-aged man, who hadn’t taken his eyes off me as he spoke, suddenly frowned.

“Did you just speak casually to me?”

But the young official didn’t answer.

Normally, he would’ve scrambled to make excuses. Now his face had gone white as he stared at someone standing behind him and the middle-aged man.

One second.

Two seconds.

Three.

After a silence in which the world seemed to stop, the middle-aged man slowly turned to follow the young official's gaze.

Then he froze like a statue.

"Y-Your Majesty…!"

It wasn't just my imagination: the words, forced from deep in his lungs, sounded like a scream.

The Emperor.

The absolute ruler called the Son of Heaven, a descendant of Heaven, looked down at the two men without a word.

As if considering how to kill them.

Perhaps he seemed all the more likely to do just that because Baek Yeon stood tall behind him—the very man who had led the purge of tens of thousands of "traitors" more than a decade ago.

"Y-Your Majesty. Please…"

Flap.

The Emperor made a small gesture, and the man's voice cut off.

That was right. This arrogant and cruel absolute ruler still hadn't spoken.

And he would allow no one to speak before him.

By now, the Grand Banquet Hall had fallen into deathly silence. The Emperor abruptly turned his head and looked at me.

"Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

"…!"

"…!"

I could feel it.

The air trembling.

Countless gazes piercing me from head to toe.

The Emperor had spoken first to me, the only outsider among the high officials who supported the empire and the gathered civil and military officials.

And he'd walked all the way to my lowly seat at the far end of the hall, well away from his throne, to do it.

"I ask you: what should I do with these people?"

If this had happened a few days ago, I would've been shocked.

Why the fuck is this crazy bastard pulling this shit out of nowhere? I probably would've thought something like that—and started to feel like I needed to piss.

But not today.

Yeah. No.

I'd already stepped into a gamble where everyone had staked their lives.

Perhaps all of this had been inevitable from the moment I entered the tiger's den that was the imperial palace.

The time had come.

The die had been cast. Now it was time to see how it landed.

"Well, before I answer, would it be all right if I had a drink?"

Whoosh.

The air trembled again.

No, trembled might not be quite the word.

If the earlier disturbance had been a ripple from a stone dropped into a lake, this was a triangular wave—a disaster.

Everyone in the Grand Banquet Hall gaped as that wave swept over them in an instant. I looked at the Emperor, who gave a small nod, and spoke.

"Then I'll take that as permission."

Glug.

Instead of answering, I tossed back the wine already poured into my cup. Cries of shock and angry shouts erupted from every direction.

The wave that hadn't seemed real even when they'd seen and heard it for themselves had finally hit them.

"What a lunatic!"

"H-How dare that man…!"

"How can there be such a lawless man in this world?"

"Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, what are you doing? Why haven't you cut down that high traitor yet?"

"Your Majesty! Punish that outrageous ruffian at once for insulting Your Majesty and the imperial household!"

"Please punish him!"

Listen to that decibel level.

They say the more people curse you, the longer you live. If this raucous enthusiasm had lasted another fifteen minutes, my sobriquet might've become Three Thousand Jiazi[3381] instead of Blazing Flame Divine Dragon.

Beheading was the basic option, and they kept piling on extras: cut off my balls, torture me slowly, then tear me limb from limb by quartering.

…No, I mean, the balls are a bit much.

Was that guy from the Sichuan Tang Clan or something?

I took a good look at the face of the man who'd proposed castrating me, then put down my cup.

Then I looked at the Emperor and spoke.

[3381] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year calendrical cycle. Three thousand jiazi would be 180,000 years.

“Kill them if you want, or spare them if you want. Isn’t that what Your Majesty does best?”

Well.

I was starting to feel like I needed to piss.

Chapter 901

Silence.

Perfect silence settled over the Grand Banquet Hall. Not even the faintest breath could be heard.

Along with it came countless eyes, wide with shock, all fixed on one person.

What… did he just say?

What on earth did I just hear?

Everyone wondered the same thing. As they stared at the young man, they recalled the words that had just rung through the hall.

> “Kill them if you want, or spare them if you want. Isn’t that what Your Majesty does best?”

Everyone had heard him clearly.

They doubted their memories once, twice, ten times, but reality refused to change. Forgetting all about decorum, people gaped at him, barely managing to swallow the curses on the tips of their tongues.

That crazy bastard.

Even crazy bastard fell far short of describing what Jin Taekyung had done.

He had provoked the Emperor to his face.

Mocked him.

The Emperor, of all people.

The usurper who had cut down tens of thousands of political enemies like a farmer reaping a harvest, then built the strongest centralized regime since Taizu, founder of the Great Nation.

He’s insane. Completely insane.

The officials in the lowest seats, their ranks too low to sit anywhere else, and even the high-ranking ministers at the heart of the political world all turned deathly pale and pressed their lips together.

Something had happened that could never be allowed to happen.

Calling it treason would hardly be a stretch. What came next was obvious.

They would die. Die, and die again.

Jin Taekyung and his entire family, along with everyone connected to them, would vanish like dew on the execution ground.

And there was every chance the Embroidered Uniform Guard’s death list would include several people with no connection to any of it.

The late Emperor’s loyal subjects.

It wasn't hard to predict that some of those who considered Prince Shangshan the rightful heir would become targets.

Evidence? Justification?

Neither mattered.

Both could be manufactured.

Once the torture instruments tore through their flesh and muscle, even the most loyal subject would writhe in pain and beg for death.

The imperial torturers knew how to turn lies into truth and truth into lies. That work had once belonged to the East Depot, but it had long since passed to the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

In other words, the sword was in one man's hands alone.

The Emperor's.

One order from him, and it would all be over.

Jin Taekyung had already given him grounds for punishment. No one could say whom the Emperor's blade might cut down.

Even if the final target were Prince Shangshan.

How could he do something this absurd? What on earth is he thinking…?

Grit.

Some of the assembled officials clenched their teeth to hold back groans.

Each of them either supported Prince Shangshan in secret or had signed the pledge and dreamed of a restoration. To them, the whole situation felt like a terrible calamity.

Jin Taekyung had entered the imperial court as Prince Shangshan's guest. The prince wouldn't be able to escape responsibility, either.

Heh… So Heaven's Mandate is leaving the Great Nation.

Those who knew nothing of the restoration lamented the heavens.

The plan's gone off course, but we have no choice. We may have to act right now…

Those who had signed the pledge steeled themselves and watched Ma Sanbao, their faces rigid. The moment he gave the order, they would move.

But then—

"Yes. You are right."

The Emperor broke the long silence, plunging everyone into shock once more.

"And a man who wishes to become a sage king does not punish those who speak the truth."

"…!"

"…!"

"Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

Standing at the center of the silence, the Emperor continued evenly.

“In the name of the Son of Heaven, I forgive the disrespect you have shown me.”

Forgive.

He’d said he forgave him.

The very man who had ruthlessly slaughtered tens of thousands.

The cruel Emperor who had launched a rebellion and a great purge.

Everyone who had been at a loss for words stared blankly at the back of the absolute ruler—everyone except one person.

Reading the sliver of emotion the Emperor hadn’t quite managed to hide from his face, Jin Taekyung muttered to himself.

So that’s how you’re playing it.

Provoking the Emperor had been a gamble with his life. If it failed, it could throw every plan the restoration army had made into disarray.

That’s why it had to be now.

And the gamble had paid off.

He had gained a crucial key. The Emperor’s answer had also settled a question he’d hardly dared ask himself.

Forgiveness, after that? It makes no sense.

Except in one case.

Jin Taekyung quietly swallowed the rest of his thought.

The scattered pieces of the puzzle began to fall into place. His head, which had felt ready to burst moments ago, gradually cleared. As his mind settled, a new path came into view.

But he still didn’t have every answer.

But why on earth…?

He started to send the Emperor a Sound Transmission.

Or rather, he would have, if someone hadn’t arrived just then.

“How heartening to hear that Your Majesty wishes to become such a merciful sage king.”

“…!”

Jin Taekyung reacted a little faster than the Emperor. Baek Yeon reacted faster than Taekyung.

Somewhere only five jang[3382] away, an old man with pale skin appeared without a sound. In a hoarse, aged voice, he continued, cupping his hands toward the Emperor.

“The late Emperor would be pleased as well. Would he not?”

Rustle.

The old man slowly raised his head, setting his long white hair swaying.

[3382] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Five jang is about 15.2 m (49.7 ft).

The Emperor's stiff face was reflected in gray eyes that held the weight of many years. A dry voice emerged between cracked lips.

"Your servant Wei Zhong, Seal-Holding Eunuch of the East Depot, pays his respects to Your Majesty."

The moment I saw Wei Zhong, I reflexively thought of an old fantasy movie I'd watched as a kid.

A vast fantasy world. A party of heroes from different races setting out to destroy a certain necklace that was the source of the Demon King's power.

And one of its central characters: an old mage.

"…Gandalf?"

The white hair that looked long enough to reach his knees. The gray eyes.

Strictly speaking, he looked more like a very sick Gandalf, but I couldn't deny the resemblance.

The slight problem was that I'd said it aloud without realizing.

Ah.

I shut my mouth as soon as I caught myself, but it was too late. Everyone who'd briefly looked elsewhere had turned back to me, including the Emperor.

And the very sick Gandalf. Wei Zhong.

"You must be the very man I've heard so much about."

What was I supposed to say to that?

I thought it over for a moment, then gave a small nod instead. Wei Zhong let out a snort and turned back toward the Emperor.

"A truly rude man. Wouldn't you agree, Your Majesty?"

The Emperor didn't answer.

He gazed at Wei Zhong with eyes sunk deep in thought, and only spoke once the air around them had grown so cold it seemed frozen.

"I was about to send someone for you, since you were nowhere to be seen… It's been a long time, Cang Gong. Have you been well?"

"After a rather long period of recuperation, I've finally recovered enough to move about. I owe it all to Your Majesty's grace."

"My grace? Are you certain?"

"Even the finest physicians couldn't guarantee I would live. Seeing how much I've recovered, surely it must be Heaven's will. And so I owe it all to Your Majesty, the Son of Heaven."

"That's unfortunate. If you'd had the decoction made as the imperial physician I sent advised, you might have overcome your illness sooner."

"I beg your forgiveness. However, I feared my old body couldn't withstand the medicine prepared by the imperial physicians, so I had no choice but to recuperate instead. But…"

Concern suddenly clouded Wei Zhong's face as he studied the Emperor.

"Perhaps it has simply been too long since I last saw you, but Your Majesty does not look well. Has illness taken hold of your august person?"

"…!"

A chill passed through the Emperor's eyes, already hard with displeasure.

"There's no need to worry. It isn't as bad as you fear."

"Then I'm greatly relieved. Now that you've become a sage king who shows such mercy, you must rule the realm for ten thousand years—ten thousand times ten thousand years."

I could feel it.

The invisible blades the Emperor and Cang Gong kept trading.

And the immense qi now pouring from the Emperor.

Rrrrmmm.

The air around us churned. Several nearby officials went pale and trembled as though seized by a chill.

His title overshadowed it, but the Emperor was a Supreme Peak master who had entered the realm of the superhuman.

But…

Cang Gong is different. That man is something else.

I'd known it from the moment he appeared.

That pale old man who looked like Gandalf was a greater master than anyone else here.

Even Baek Yeon.

In a fight between Supreme Peak masters, life and death could be decided in an instant.

The fact that Cang Gong had come within five jang[3383] of us without me sensing him meant he'd all but seized the initiative.

Now I see why Ma Sanbao was so confident.

From what I could sense, Cang Gong and So Gyo were evenly matched. If Jeok Cheongang and the other fighters who hadn't yet reached the Grand Banquet Hall joined the restoration army, they could bring down So Gyo with ease.

Though So Gyo herself had yet to appear.

She's probably guarding Prince Shangshan somewhere else.

[3383] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Five jang is about 15.2 m (49.7 ft).

The prince was a crucial key. Neither the restoration army nor the Emperor could afford to let him fall into the enemy's hands.

Apparently, I wasn't the only one thinking about him.

"Your Majesty. Perhaps the recent storms have made the weather unusually chilly today. Might Your Majesty show some mercy for the sake of those poor officials, who are trembling over there?"

Cang Gong indicated the shivering officials. His manner was respectful and relaxed, but there was a barb in his words. Then he spoke again, as though a thought had just occurred to him.

"By the way, why are Prince Shangshan and the pregnant Consort nowhere to be seen? As members of the imperial family, surely they ought to grace this occasion alongside Your Majesty—"

"Shut your mouth, Wei Zhong."

Baek Yeon cut him off, his voice hard. He was about to step forward when—

"Enough."

The Emperor raised a hand to stop him and fixed Wei Zhong with a cold stare.

"You needn't concern yourself, Cang Gong. Both of them are already on their way."

"I'm deeply grateful for Your Majesty's grace. At last, I'll meet the heir who will one day rule this vast Great Nation."

"Yes. You will."

Neither man said anything more.

Nor did either bother to ask the other which heir he truly had in mind, or whom the other considered the heir.

They would wait for the banquet to reach its height. For the fuse to burn all the way down.

And so would I.

"Excuse me. It looks like you two are about done talking. Could I say something, if you don't mind?"

The Emperor answered.

"What is it?"

"Nothing much. It looks like you're heading up to the seats of honor, so I was hoping I could move too. Preferably next to Cang Gong."

"…You want to change seats?"

The officials, who had been frozen in place, all turned to glare at me as though they wanted to tear me apart. While the Emperor searched for words, Cang Gong spoke instead.

"Is there… some particular reason?"

I gave him my most confident, dashing look.

"The seats up there seem to get more side dishes."

Of course, I didn’t look particularly dashing.

Chapter 902

This might have been a first in the history of the Great Nation.

A ruffian from the martial world who held no official post and didn't even carry an identity token, seated among the court's high officials at a grand banquet presided over by the Emperor himself.

The first, and probably the last.

Even considering the short history of the Great Nation, which had only lasted three generations so far, it was a feat unlikely ever to be repeated.

Yet almost no one spoke up against this insult to the imperial family's dignity.

Not unless they were among the handful of ministers with unwavering convictions and courage.

"Your Majesty! Forgive my boldness, but seating that man so close to you—"

"It is the imperial decree."

"…A wise decision indeed!"

As it turned out, even conviction and courage crumbled like a sandcastle struck by a wave when faced with the Emperor.

Especially when that Emperor's hobby—and specialty—was purging people.

Thanks to him, I took my seat before an even more lavish spread without further trouble.

Smack. Smack-smack. Slurp.

As I inhaled one dish after another, the people around me stared, their eyes twitching at every sound.

When I showed off the godlike noodle-slurping technique I'd honed on ramen, groans broke out all around.

"Good heavens."

"Have you ever seen such a low-class bastard…?"

"That's enough to kill what little appetite I had. Look—even Cang Gong hasn't touched his food."

At that last remark, I glanced over. Cang Gong was watching me steadily with his gray eyes.

Hmm. Was that too much?

"Pay no mind to them. Keep eating. Is it really that good?"

At Cang Gong's calm question, I answered.

"Definithely delishious."

"I see. But perhaps you should finish what's in your mouth first."

"Oh."

I swallowed the mouthful crammed into my cheeks, then spoke again.

“It’s definitely good. There are plenty of side dishes, too.”

Cang Gong nodded.

“I understood you the first time. My hearing isn’t that bad. Besides, the imperial chefs have long been renowned for their cooking.”

“Then why aren’t you eating?”

“I don’t have much of an appetite. It’s been that way for some time.”

“Hmm. Well, that’s a relief. I thought I’d put you off your food.”

“Don’t worry about that. I’ve been this way since I was young. Though it is a little disappointing that even the finest, rarest delicacies feel like grains of sand in my mouth now.”

Cang Gong looked away from me and down at the table before him, his face expressionless.

It held enough food to make its legs bow under the weight, yet his hands rested neatly on his knees and never moved toward it.

Hands with no color in them—white, or rather, pale as a corpse’s.

I studied him. Despite sitting right beside me, he barely gave off any sense of presence. Then I quietly moved my lips.

“When are we going to start?”

At that moment—

Vrrrm.

A subtle, chilling qi sealed off the space around us. Anyone who wasn’t paying close attention would never have noticed it.

Remarkable.

Cang Gong had shut out sound with a flawless barrier of internal energy. He spoke.

“I’ll give the signal.”

“I think now would be the perfect time.”

“As long as that woman called So Gyo remains by Prince Shangshan’s side, we can’t act rashly. Even if we take the Emperor’s head, everything will be for nothing if we can’t secure His Highness.”

“That’s true.”

“Besides, your master is still waiting outside the banquet hall. The Fire King is essential if we’re to defeat So Gyo.”

“I don’t know about that. I’d say you’re every bit as formidable a master as my teacher.”

“This old man was able to overcome a grave Internal Injury and attend today thanks to the good fortune of gaining insight during my recovery. The more important the matter, the more carefully it must be handled, don’t you think?”

Yeah, that made sense.

I nodded naturally and resumed moving the chopsticks I’d set down for a moment.

Cang Gong watched me as if I were some strange creature, then spoke.

“You look like you haven’t eaten in days.”

“You’ve got that right. I’ve barely eaten anything for two days.”

“A master of your caliber should be able to endure a little hunger.”

“Why should I have to? I believe in eating a hearty meal before a fight.”

“Are you nervous?”

“I am. My stomach is.”

“You really do take after your master. It takes quite a nerve to sit here eating like this, just as I’d heard.”

“Did you hear anything else about me?”

“That your martial arts are unparalleled for someone your age, and that you’re resourceful and tenacious enough to survive any crisis.”

“Sounds about right.”

“That was the abbreviated version. The East Depot has eyes and ears throughout the land, and their reports never fail to surprise me. One of the most recent was particularly unexpected.”

“May I ask what it was? What could surprise even Cang Gong?”

“The Murim Alliance reinforcements.”

“Ah.”

“I truly didn’t expect that. I thought the Murim Alliance had already deployed most of its forces throughout the land to deal with sudden attacks by Dark Heaven, which could appear anywhere at any time.”

Instead of answering, I lifted my cup and took a drink. The fragrant aroma of a truly fine liquor filled my mouth, and it went down smoothly.

Any intoxication that should have followed vanished without a trace when it met my Scorching Yang Qi.

“I hear Dark Heaven uses the strangest supernatural powers. Did the Alliance really have enough strength left to form a reserve force?”

“If they didn’t, the reinforcements wouldn’t be coming.”

“They’re coming because the Alliance had the strength to spare… Yes, I suppose so.”

Cang Gong was gazing steadily at me with his gray eyes when—

“Enough.”

The Emperor’s resonant voice rang out, and in the same instant, the beautiful music that had filled the grand banquet hall vanished as if it had been washed away.

Those who had been whispering to one another, those who had been drinking with solemn faces—even the musicians and dancers forcing themselves to perform in that atmosphere—all fell silent.

Everyone stopped moving and turned toward the Emperor, following his voice and gaze.

"My heir approaches. He shall inherit this continent and the Great Nation that will endure for the next thousand years. Receive him with all due ceremony."

"…!"

"…!"

An unmistakable declaration of his heir.

Everyone had expected it, yet some part of them had thought it couldn't possibly happen. Now that the moment had arrived, shock swept through the banquet hall.

But while their minds raced, their bodies were already bending in the prescribed bows toward a newly arrived eight-horse carriage.

Boom. Boom-boom. Boom-boom-boom!

The drummer's vigorous beat made the air shudder. As anticipation quietly built, the carriage door opened and someone stepped out.

Swish.

The hem of a splendid red palace gown brushed the ground. The woman stepped lightly onto the back of a palace attendant prostrated before the carriage and descended. Her alluring beauty drew a low gasp from somewhere in the hall.

"Good heavens."

"It can't be…"

It was tactless, but I understood.

The woman was beautiful enough to topple a kingdom.

No wonder the City Lord of Sichuan Province fell so hard for her.

I thought to myself as I looked at the woman—or rather, Aehyang.

Until only a few months ago, she had been the City Lord of Sichuan Province's favored concubine. Now she walked beneath the Embroidered Uniform Guard's close protection, stroking her belly with an uneasy look on her face.

And while everyone's eyes followed her, I saw someone else emerge from the still-open carriage door.

A face that still belonged to a child.

Yet his expression and stride were bolder than those of any young man.

Prince Shangshan, Zhu Bao.

As I watched Prince Shangshan stride up the long staircase, I wondered what to say.

How should I greet the young prince after several days apart?

I didn't have to think for long.

“Have you been well?”

My Sound Transmission crossed the space between us, and Prince Shangshan stopped in his tracks. I let out a quiet laugh to myself and moved my lips again.

“Are you still keeping the item I entrusted to you safe?”

After a brief pause, he started walking again. Prince Shangshan didn’t look my way. Instead, he flicked the sleeve covering the back of his hand.

For a moment, I caught sight of a dark, dull ring.

I nodded at the sight of the Myriad-Poison Ring, and Cang Gong suddenly spoke.

“Good. It seems His Highness is still keeping it safe.”

I wasn’t surprised. Cang Gong had reached a level even I couldn’t fathom. I’d figured he could listen in on a Sound Transmission.

“He does. I was worried he might lose it, so that’s a relief.”

I answered calmly without even turning my head. I could feel Cang Gong watching me, but his gaze soon shifted to someone else.

So Gyo.

I saw her.

There she was, following quietly behind Prince Shangshan.

In place of her flexible sword, she wore two weapons at her waist, each curving like a saber. So Gyo looked straight at me and gave me a faint smile.

“Did you see that?” Cang Gong asked.

At Cang Gong’s question, I answered calmly.

“I did.”

“She was smiling at you.”

“Did she? I thought she was smiling at you.”

“You’re mistaken. That look just now… it was directed straight at you.”

“As Eunuch Ma probably told you, we’ve met before.”

“Is that the only reason?”

“What other reason could there be?”

“A thousand years! A thousand years! A thousand thousand years!”[3384]

The civil and military officials of the court, along with nearly two thousand Embroidered Uniform Guards, roared their cheers toward the heir of the Great Nation, shaking the whole place.

Whether they were merely going along with the occasion or were genuinely celebrating it, they all chanted with one voice. At the center of that immense cheer stood the Emperor, Aehyang, and finally, Prince Shangshan.

Beside me sat the only person who wasn’t joining in.

[3384] Cheonse, “a thousand years,” is a traditional court acclamation wishing a royal figure long life. Cheoncheonse, “a thousand thousand years,” intensifies the wish.

“I find myself wondering what you think,” Cang Gong said.

He continued without waiting for an answer.

“Why did the Emperor forgive you, despite your unforgivable disrespect? It was the perfect chance to remove Prince Shangshan while gaining both a pretext and a practical advantage.”

“I don’t know. I’m a pretty simple guy.”

“Simple? Then was that stunt you pulled, suddenly and without any plan, just a result of your personality?”

“Maybe it was. Maybe it wasn’t.”

“Tell me more.”

“To hell with the grand plan. A lot of lives were at stake, and there was one thing I had to make sure of.”

Cang Gong was no longer looking toward the throne where the Emperor stood. Nor was he bowing to it. He sat upright and fixed his gray eyes on me.

“So, have you finished checking?”

“Yes.”

“What did you conclude?”

“No matter how I looked at it, there was only one answer.”

I held Cang Gong’s gaze, my eyes burning, and spoke quietly.

“The Emperor doesn’t want Prince Shangshan put in danger.”

“…!”

Chapter 903

Some mysteries have no answer, no matter how long you think about them. When that happens, there's only one thing left to try.

Turn everything upside down.

Forget all the circumstances and clues you've gathered so far, and start over from the beginning. That's the last resort.

Like retracing your steps to find something precious you don't remember dropping, I went back to the starting point and reconsidered every detail, large and small.

At last, I arrived at a hypothesis.

"The Emperor doesn't want Prince Shangshan put in danger."

"…!"

A faint ripple passed through Cang Gong's gray eyes.

It appeared and vanished in less time than it took to blink, but I'd been watching his every tiny movement too closely to miss it.

So it was true.

The realization struck me, sending a jolt down my spine.

The crowd's tremendous cheering still hadn't died down when Cang Gong, who had been gazing steadily at me, spoke.

"When did it start?"

Anyone else might have struggled to understand the question without context. I knew at once what he meant.

When had I started suspecting them?

"So Gyo."

Yes. That was exactly when.

The day she let me go, despite having every advantage. She couldn't possibly have failed to stop me.

Nothing I knew, no clue I could find, fully explained her strange behavior. It had stayed with me like a fishbone caught in my throat.

"So Gyo…"

Cang Gong gave a small nod at my brief answer.

"Yes, I suppose it would be. She was the only flaw in this grand scheme. Had I known it would come to this, I should have eliminated that mysterious woman long ago. Even if it meant an all-out war with the Emperor."

What?

I swallowed the question before it could burst out, but I couldn't hide my momentary shock.

Even Cang Gong doesn't know who So Gyo is?

Cang Gong caught the confusion that had appeared on my face and gave a low laugh.

"From the looks of it, you don't know who she is either. You don't even know whether she's an ally or an enemy."

"…!"

"Strange. Very strange. Until just now, I suspected she might be a Murim Alliance spy, but… now I haven't the faintest idea. Even if she were a master secretly trained by the imperial family, she couldn't have escaped my notice."

This time, setting aside the situation I was in, I couldn't help sharing Cang Gong's bewilderment.

Then who is So Gyo?

If she'd belonged to the Murim Alliance, she would have told me the whole truth before things got to this point. And if she were a master of Dark Heaven or the imperial family, Cang Gong would have known.

But So Gyo was different.

From what I'd been able to determine, she was a third party. Someone who belonged to neither side.

Who the hell is she?

Who was So Gyo? What expression was she wearing as she watched us right now? What was she thinking?

And…

Is she an enemy or an ally?

I fought the urge to look toward So Gyo, who should have been standing at the top of the stairs in the distance.

Cang Gong and I were only a few steps apart. Taking my eyes off him for even a moment would be suicide.

Of course, the only reason I could afford to stand here provoking him was that I was certain he couldn't kill me yet.

"You have a fine look in your eyes. Fighting spirit spilling over. But why would that person take an interest in you?"

That person.

There was no mistaking the fear and reverence in Cang Gong's voice as he spoke of someone who wasn't here.

The Blood Lord, the Western Heaven Demon Lord, and the Southern Heaven Demon Empress had all felt the same way.

Dark Heaven existed because it had a heaven of its own: the Lord of Heaven.

"Tell me. As the person concerned, you might know why that person is searching for you so relentlessly. Is it because you've achieved something unprecedented at such a young age? Or is it because of some other worth only that person can recognize?”

His gray eyes, so like a dead man’s, glimmered faintly.

A chill came with that gaze, subtle and terrifying, unlike anything I’d ever felt.

Hissss.

I’d stake my life on it: even the Yin-Cold Qi of the Great Snow Fiend, who’d cornered me in Nanman, hadn’t been this intense.

No. This is different from Yin-Cold Qi.

Something more primal and pure.

A different kind of power, one I’d never heard of or experienced.

But I overcame my instinctive fear. Enduring the chill seeping into my bones, I answered.

“Why the hell are you asking me, you ball-less bastard?”

“…!”

Cang Gong stared at me, eyes wide, then smiled faintly.

“Yes, of course you wouldn’t know. How could someone like you presume to fathom that person’s intentions—”

“Yeah. I can look all I want, but I still can’t find your balls.”

“Choose your words carefully. No matter how generously that person has blessed me…”

“Yeah. I could search the whole ocean and still not find your testicles.”

“…”

“I chose my words carefully. What’s the problem?”

His faint smile was long gone. Amid the people’s continued cheering, Cang Gong’s tightly shut, pale lips parted.

“What do you think? Surely that person would understand if I merely pulled out your tongue.”

“Sure. The Lord of Heaven might. You’re the one among his followers he worries about most, seeing as you haven’t got any balls. His sore ball—no, his sore finger.”

I nodded in agreement and pointed over Cang Gong’s shoulder.

“But that guy won’t understand.”

In the slowed-down flow of time, everything happened at once.

Cang Gong turned his head to look behind him. I thrust a fist wreathed in flame at him. And a solid palm shot forward like a flash of light, as if reversing time all by itself, intercepting my fist before it could reach anyone.

BOOM!

A roar like the sky splitting open brought time rushing back to normal. At the same instant, a powerful shock wave shook the grand banquet hall.

Crack! Rrrrmm!

The ground shuddered as though an earthquake had struck.

Screams and shouts erupted on all sides.

Amid the sudden chaos, a pair of gleaming white eyes fixed on me.

“Was that all?”

Crack.

His voice was calm, but the immense force squeezing my fist was anything but.

An unknown, ice-cold energy filled his palm, suppressing the flames in mine and snuffing them out.

“Such a shallow trick. I’m disappointed.”

Crunch. Crunch.

Agonizing pain shot through my captured fist.

If my muscles and bones hadn’t surpassed the limits of an ordinary human, they would already have been ground to dust.

But I’d endured this much pain more times than I cared to count. And I’d never expected that surprise attack to bring him down.

I’d only needed a signal flare to let everyone know what was happening.

“I’m a little hurt that you think it was just a shallow trick.”

What?

“I don’t know if you’ve heard of magic, but I’m about to show you some. Watch closely.”

“What are you—”

The moment Cang Gong frowned—

BOOOOM!

Blinding flames swallowed the darkness, and the rock walls that ringed the grand banquet hall like towering ramparts burst apart.

From the place Cang Gong had glanced toward moments earlier, a figure strode out.

“I’ll give you my first and last warning.”

The flames dancing in that damn monk’s eyes looked anything but Buddhist. He swept his gaze across the hall and went on.

“Only step forward if you want your flesh and bones to melt.”

“…!”

Recognition darkened Cang Gong’s eyes. I smiled.

“Accio,[3385] Fire King.”

At the same time, I thrust out my still-free hand toward his chest. He faltered for an instant.

The Flame Divine Palm, at nine-tenths mastery.

[3385] Accio is a summoning spell in the Harry Potter series.

BOOOOM!

"Huh?"

The young man stopped abruptly and looked back.

Seeing him stare down the road they'd traveled, his brow furrowed, the burly man ahead of him asked, "Hyukmu. What's wrong?"

"No, it's just…"

Hyuk Mujin trailed off and clicked his tongue.

"I thought I heard something."

Taishan raised an eyebrow. "A sound? An enemy?"

"I don't know. Maybe I imagined it."

"Then no. That sound Hyukmu heard—Taishan didn't hear it."

"But I'm telling you, I'm sure I heard something."

"Hyukmu. Your martial arts are weak. Taishan could turn you into finely minced five-spice pork if he wanted."

"…Hey, what the hell? Are you looking down on me?"

"Mm. Honestly, a little."

"…"

"Hyukmu. We can't stop. We have to go. Everyone's waiting."

Hyuk Mujin swallowed his flare of anger and let out a long sigh.

"Yeah, I'm going. I'm going."

But despite his answer, his steps didn't come as easily as before.

The road behind him and the walls of the Imperial Capital, growing more distant by the moment, kept appearing before his eyes.

Damn it. Am I hearing things now, too?

Annoying as it was, Taishan was probably right that there hadn't been a sound. If a Peak master a step above him hadn't heard it, then there was nothing to hear.

Even if Mujin had heard something, it must have been the faint noise of an insect or an animal moving.

Then why do I feel like this?

Hyuk Mujin frowned harder and thumped his chest.

His heart kept pounding when it hadn't before, as though an invisible hand were squeezing it tight.

Something feels wrong.

Along with the inexplicable unease, the face of someone he'd parted with a few shichen[3386] ago suddenly flashed through his mind.

[3386] A shichen is a traditional Chinese unit of time lasting about two hours.

Just one mission.

The last voice he'd heard before leaving still echoed in his ears.

Oh, one more thing.

Yes?

Be careful. You and everyone else.

Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung.

Hyuk Mujin had answered the warning with a grin. Then he and the rest of the Fire Dragon Pavilion had left the Imperial Capital, bound for the border between Jiangsu and Zhejiang Provinces.

For the very place written on the note Jin Taekyung had given him.

The mission's going fine… so what's wrong with me?

Everything was going smoothly, yet his chest felt unbearably tight.

The Captain—Jin Taekyung—had acted so strangely that the memory pricked at him like a fishbone caught in his throat.

Taekyung usually laughed with him over nothing, hit him for getting cheeky, and cursed him without holding back. Today, Mujin had seen none of that.

"Hyukmu!"

"…Ah."

Snapping out of his thoughts, Hyuk Mujin realized he'd stopped walking again.

Then he saw his companions waiting a short distance ahead, and his heart sank.

Grave eyes. Troubled faces.

Everyone except Taishan was looking at him the same way.

"Everyone…"

Hyuk Mujin barely swallowed a groan. At last, he thought he understood the unease that had been squeezing his chest.

"Did you all know?"

Namho answered his halting question in a heavy voice.

"Yes. More or less."

"The Captain told you?"

"No. Senior Jeok gave us a warning beforehand. He knew what choice his Disciple would make."

"Then why was I the only one—"

"If he'd told you to leave because you'd be a burden, would you have obeyed without a fuss?"

"…!"

"I don't like this situation either. No—none of us do."

For a moment, Hyuk Mujin had nothing to say.

He understood perfectly well how they felt about being burdens instead of help. He understood why Jin Taekyung had lied to send him away.

And it was the truth.

But… but…

Still, it shouldn't be like this.

Hyuk Mujin bit down on his lip until it bled and turned his head. Then, for an instant, he forgot the entire situation and muttered in a dazed voice.

"Huh…?"

Far away, countless figures moved through the darkness, shaking the forest as they passed.

Too many to count, yet he couldn't sense a single presence among them.

What are those?

The same question arose in everyone's mind. So did a fear none of them could explain.

This time, instinct rather than reason moved Hyuk Mujin.

No—it moved them all.

Whoosh!

Chapter 904

The situation in the Grand Banquet Hall had already spiraled beyond anyone's control.

The festive music had long since fallen silent. The threefold cheers of "A thousand years!" celebrating the birth of an heir had given way to screams and shouts.

At last, the fuse had been lit.

The banquet was over.

But another banquet had yet to end.

A Hongmen Banquet,[3387] where weapons would replace smiles, and blood would spill instead of wine.

A tremendous roar announced the start of that horrific feast, shaking the hall in every direction.

BOOOOM!

The ground shuddered, and a terrible wave of heat erupted. At that moment, a figure shot out from beyond the blazing flames and clouds of dust like a flash of light.

Whooosh!

Crunch!

The ground crumbled like tofu beneath the foot he barely managed to plant.

Jin Taekyung, the young man who'd just managed to steady himself after being hurled through the air with a sharp blast, spat the blood pooling in his mouth and muttered,

"So you're a cut above me…"

Speed, strength, a perfectly timed surprise attack—he'd made full use of them all, yet the gap between them was unmistakable.

His hand still tingled as he remembered thrusting out his palm.

Just as his full-power Flame Divine Palm was about to strike Cang Gong's chest, an icy energy had effortlessly suppressed his Scorching Yang Qi and shaken his entire body.

What the hell was that?

Despite all Jin Taekyung had seen—enough to rival many veterans of the martial world—he'd never felt energy like it.

Something more primal. Something he couldn't describe as merely Yin-Cold Qi.

But he had nowhere near enough to solve that mystery.

Not enough information or experience.

Not enough time, either.

[3387] A Hongmen Banquet is a treacherous feast, named for a historical banquet at which an assassination was attempted.

Step. Step.

Footsteps rang out clearly, even amid the chaos consuming the Grand Banquet Hall.

Cang Gong strolled across ground left horribly melted by the surge of Scorching Yang Qi. Then he stopped.

Right where he'd stood moments earlier.

"Five steps. Five whole steps."

There was admiration in his quiet voice.

At an absurdly young age, that martial artist had reached an astonishing level of skill.

To make this old man retreat five steps, in that battered condition.

Now that he'd experienced it firsthand, Cang Gong thought he understood why that person had taken such an interest in Jin Taekyung.

Why that person had ordered them to keep that young brat alive, even after losing two loyal servants—the Western Heaven Demon Lord and the Southern Heaven Demon Empress—in the process.

As an enemy, he'd be the greatest obstacle. As an ally, he'd soon become a monster who could surpass even the Three Saints.

Cang Gong had no doubt they could win him over once they captured him.

If Jin Taekyung met the Lord of Heaven—if he felt that irresistible being's power even once—he would have no choice but to kneel before him.

Just as Cang Gong himself had.

"I must take him to the Lord of Heaven. No matter what."

The moment he said it, a dry voice cut in.

"Take who to whom?"

Fwoosh.

The air for hundreds of feet around them grew scorching hot.

Cang Gong saw a bald, middle-aged man approaching through the heat haze rising from the ground. His pale lips parted.

"Fire King Jeok Cheongang."

"How dare you toss this old man's name around, you ball-less bastard?"

"You two really are alike in speech and behavior. I can't tell whether the disciple learned from the master or the master from the disciple."

Jeok Cheongang answered flatly. "Usually, the disciple learns from the master. Though a rootless bastard like you wouldn't know that."

"Roots, huh? I had those once. A master and fellow disciples who were like family."

"I see. So did your master teach you to cut off your own balls, too?"

"No."

A murderous smile spread across Cang Gong's lips.

“He taught me never to forget my roots, no matter what happened. I haven’t forgotten his words for a single moment.”

“I don’t know what long-winded story you’ve got, but to hell with his teachings. You won’t need to remember them anymore.”

Jeok Cheongang raised his fist and grinned.

“Everyone who’s taken a hit from this old man ended up that way.”

He glanced around and added, “Though it looks like plenty of others would love to tear you apart, too.”

He wasn’t exaggerating.

Nearly two thousand members of the Embroidered Uniform Guard surrounded them in a circle. Every one of them was among the Great Nation’s finest troops, martial artists ranging from Supreme First Rate to Peak.

And that wasn’t all.

The Imperial Guards were considered a cut below the Embroidered Uniform Guard, who protected the Emperor and the imperial family, but they were elite troops in their own right. They’d arrived late, taken positions on the outer walls of the Grand Banquet Hall, and drawn their bows.

Five thousand men in all.

More than enough to call an army—and in quality, they could rival a force of a hundred thousand.

Yet Cang Gong merely looked at the countless spears, swords, and arrowheads surrounding him.

Or rather, he looked past them to the one man watching him from the high platform.

“The hunting dogs have slipped their leashes and are running wild without even knowing where they’ll die, while their cunning master sits back and watches.”

Just as he always had.

Cang Gong laughed aloud.

Then his laughter stopped dead, and a thunderous command burst from his pale lips.

“Attack!”

BOOOOM!

The immense internal energy carried in his voice shook the Grand Banquet Hall. At that instant—

Thrust! Slash!

A gleaming sword blade burst from an Embroidered Uniform Guard’s chest. Too stunned even to feel the pain, he stared at the steel piercing his golden armor.

“W-Why…?”

Shock and disbelief filled his wide eyes.

Even as death rushed toward him, he wanted to know.

Why was he dying like this? Why had a comrade he'd called hyung[3388] for more than ten years stabbed him in the back?

"Ghk. D-Dong hyung[3389]?"

Why?

They weren't related by blood, but they'd promised to treat each other as sworn brothers.

Dozens—hundreds—of times, they'd raised their cups together, encouraging each other, pledging their brotherhood and swearing loyalty to their country and His Majesty the Emperor.

But when he forced out that one call through the blood rising in his throat, the answer came in a flat voice he'd never heard in all their ten years together.

"Heaven above, earth below. All demons bow in reverence."

"…!"

Those were the last words he heard.

Crunch.

The sword twisted and pulled free. His lifeless body toppled to the ground.

Everywhere.

Thrust!

All around—

Slash!

Again and again—

Shhhk!

Severed heads rolled across the ground. Limbs and blood flew through the air.

In the blink of an eye, hundreds of the two thousand Embroidered Uniform Guards were dead.

Killed by their own comrades. By superiors, subordinates, and men they'd cherished like brothers.

"…!"

"…!"

Muffled shouts burst out from every direction. The traitors and the betrayed, those who fought to protect and those who fought to take, clashed with one another.

Clang-clang-clang!

Slash! Thrust!

"Aaagh!"

[3388] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

[3389] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

Screams echoed as swordlight flashed ceaselessly through the darkness.

Someone's hand, still clutching a torch, twitched in a pool of blood.

Then another darkness spread over the horrific melee that had erupted beneath the night sky.

Fwooooooosh.

Some who heard the sound thought it was rain. Another man, panting as he waited for death, remembered the broad plains of his hometown.

A strong wind sweeping in from far away had made just such a sound across those fields.

The ripe grain and grasses would bow, and the great tree where the village held its festivals would shake its abundant branches and leaves.

But the nameless man realized he'd never return to the hometown he missed.

Ah.

The darkness spreading across the sky was no darkness at all. Countless arrows were raining down.

They spread across the sky as they rushed toward the people below—or toward the Emperor they'd sworn their loyalty to.

Cough.

He spat blood mixed with fragments of his innards.

This wasn't how it was supposed to be.

He hadn't left his family and his hometown to die so pointlessly.

Damn it.

He stared at the darkness rushing toward him and waited for death to end his pain and despair.

Then he saw it.

Fwoosh—BOOOOM!

A great blaze swallowed the darkness.

Countless arrows burned away without a trace. Through that overwhelming heat, a young man plunged toward the ground like a hawk diving for prey.

BOOM!

Why did a roar that should have sounded like thunder reach him so faintly, as though it had come from hundreds of yards away?

As his vision dimmed, he tried to remember the young man's name.

Why couldn't he say it? Why couldn't he ask him to save him, to send him home?

With darkness closing over his eyes, all he could do was watch. Flames consumed the unending rain of arrows, and traitors fell like bundles of straw wherever the young man moved.

Two beings began a battle that shook heaven and earth. He could hardly believe they were made of flesh and blood like him.

Bang! Bang! BOOOOM!

Scorching heat. Shuddering cold.

Flames and white flashes swept the hall without pause, setting the night ablaze and freezing it over.

The countless bodies still piling up amid sprays of blood served as firewood.

And the life of one unfortunate man, made to suffer a little longer than the rest, as a sacrifice.

But at the end of that horrific wait, the nameless member of the Embroidered Uniform Guard managed to remember the young man's name—the one he'd almost forgotten.

Jin Taekyung. Right. It was Jin Taekyung.

Strange.

He lay dying in a pool of blood, in the middle of a sea of corpses and blood, yet he didn't feel cold at all.

It's warm.

He watched the flames surging between flashing spears and swords. Then, unable to fight the sleep overtaking him, he closed his eyes.

He thought of the hometown he would never return to.

People who love to talk say only two things can kill a Supreme Peak master: time and his own carelessness.

Right now, I wanted to tell those people one thing.

Then why don't you try fighting them?

A Supreme Peak master is still made of flesh and blood.

To someone who doesn't know any better, he might look like a superhuman who can take down hundreds or thousands of enemies. But he has limits.

Especially when at least half of those hundreds or thousands are Peak masters.

Swish! Slice!

The tip of a spear someone thrust out skimmed past my cheek by a hair. Getting my skin sliced open by the internal energy packed into its blade was just the standard package. My fist returning the favor was a bonus.

Wham!

My Flame Divine Palm struck the Embroidered Uniform Guard—no, the traitor planted by Dark Heaven—in the chest. He flew backward like a puppet with its strings cut.

Dead on the spot.

But someone else filled the gap. The others moved more cautiously now, and faster.

Damn it.

If they'd only been martial artists, they would've been much easier to deal with. But they were soldiers, too—a force with both powerful martial arts and an army's discipline.

Slash! Thrust!

I snatched a spear from someone's hands and swung it wildly, glaring past the shoulders of the enemies surrounding me.

Why the hell?!

I wanted to shout it.

Why weren't they helping? How could they stand there and watch, even now?

The Emperor stood where I was looking. Baek Yeon and So Gyo remained beside him, guarding him like stone statues.

And now there was someone else in my line of sight.

An unwelcome guest.

Whoosh!

A sharp sound cut through the air. A dozen or so Embroidered Uniform Guards who'd been fighting nearby stopped moving.

Their eyes widened in disbelief.

Then, as if to reveal the cold truth, faint lines of blood appeared on their necks, growing darker by the second.

Gurgle—SHHHK!

Blood beaded along the cuts, then sprayed like fountains. The man who'd swept past them watched their bodies fall like rotten trees. He looked at me and sighed.

"Why did you do it? If you'd simply trusted me and followed along, everything could have gone smoothly."

Instead of answering Ma Sanbao's bullshit—the kind even the mutt next door could understand—I brought my spearhead down.

Whoosh!

Chapter 905

The torches wavered. Blood dark enough to see even in the gloom burst out on every side.

Clang-clang-clang!

Thrust!

Well-honed blades met in flashes of swordlight. Cries of pain followed.

“Gyaaaagh!”

“Ghk, gah!”

With a dying cry that announced the end, someone nameless met their death, and someone else stepped into the empty space they left behind.

Again and again.

A cycle of death that would not end until one side was wiped out.

The Emperor sat on his throne without so much as a tremor, as though to prove the weight of those two words—Son of Heaven. He watched the Grand Banquet Hall turn into a battlefield.

It’s been a long time since I’ve seen a sight like this.

He wore a brilliantly embroidered dragon robe now, but little more than a decade ago, he had been a general who crossed battlefields in armor.

The fourth prince of the Great Nation, with neither the prospect nor the desire to inherit the throne.

No one had expected the man who led an army against border warlords and nomads to ascend the throne.

Not even the man himself.

“Strange how things turn out. Truly strange. Wouldn’t you agree?”

At the Emperor’s sudden murmur, Baek Yeon, Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, replied in a heavy voice. He stood beside the throne like an iron tower.

“This subordinate failed in his duty.”

A full third of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, whose duty was to protect the imperial family, had turned their blades against it. The Imperial Guards responsible for the Outer Palace were raining arrows down without pause.

The Emperor had not been entirely unprepared for the existence of traitors, but Cang Gong’s shadow had fallen far darker than he’d expected.

Across the imperial family. No—across the entire Great Nation.

Shhh-shhh-shh—clang!

Hundreds of arrows fired straight at the Emperor bounced off harmlessly.

The Emperor moved his lips toward the Embroidered Uniform Guard who had blocked the attack by forming a wall with their massive iron shields.

“Advance.”

One short command was enough.

A hundred martial artists, handpicked from among the finest of the Great Nation’s greatest force, launched themselves forward without hesitation.

Away from the Emperor’s side and into the battlefield stained with death and screams.

Whoooosh!

Dozens of yards vanished in an instant.

A hundred spears and swords swung together, flashing as they bore down on the traitors.

Whiiing!

Slice! Thrust!

“Gyaaaagh!”

Screams and blood erupted without pause.

The martial prowess of warriors at the very brink of the Peak realm—overwhelming, and horribly powerful.

But even that could not turn the tide of battle. At its center, true monsters beyond human limits were running wild.

BOOOOM!

Rrrumble!

A tremendous roar and tremor shook the area. Beyond a pillar of fire that surged high into the air, piercing the darkness, a painfully white light blazed.

Shhk!

Space split open.

Everyone who felt that chill, like frost in the depths of winter, shuddered as if on cue. Then, as their vision slowly tilted, they understood.

Ah.

The cold they had just felt was death.

Rrrumble!

Dozens of bodies toppled like rotten old trees. Their blood-soaked armor no longer shone gold, and the gray eyes looking down at them were cold.

“Is that all you have?”

Whump!

A casual palm strike crushed a man’s whole body.

“The Emperor’s hunting dogs. The might of the imperial family.”

Craack!

A light stomp sent the ground rippling for dozens of yards around him.

“I asked if that’s all you have!”

BWOOOM!

The shout, charged with immense internal energy, burst through the compressed air. It shook bodies and minds hardened by grueling training and tore at eardrums.

“Ghk.”

Groans rose all around. The Embroidered Uniform Guards staggered, clutching their bleeding ears, as another white flash hurtled toward them.

No—it was just about to.

Fwoosh.

Somewhere, flames flickered.

In an instant, the air, cold as ice a moment ago, boiled like lava. Fire swallowed even the darkness.

BOOM!

Would a volcano sound like that if it erupted?

The thought flashed through everyone’s mind as the flames poured toward one man alone.

An old man with pale skin.

Cang Gong’s gray eyes filled with terrible heat.

BOOOOM!

Impact. An explosion.

The dreadful shock wave that followed hurled friend and foe alike through the air. Cang Gong was no exception.

Shhhhh. Thud.

Driven back by the immense force, he barely managed to stop himself. He straightened his bent back and fixed his gaze on one man.

“When the situation demands you fight with everything you have, you waste your strength showing off against children. You must’ve eaten your age through your ass.”

Fire King Jeok Cheongang.

As Jeok approached through the heat haze rising around him, Cang Gong’s lips twisted.

“And you’re no different. In the end, didn’t you earn the title of Fire King by killing countless weaklings?”

“Even without balls, you should get your facts straight. The Demonic Cultists I killed weren’t mere weaklings. They were arsonists. Burning them alive wouldn’t have been punishment enough.”

“Then why did you kill the other Demonic Cultists? They had done nothing to you.”

“One day, I woke up to find my ancestral home in flames. How do you think that felt?”

Jeok Cheongang did not wait for an answer.

“Awful. Fucking awful. So I kicked every last one of them in the ass and sent them to the afterlife. That way, even if they were reborn, they’d never set fire to someone else’s home again.”

“In other words, it was personal revenge.”

“That’s right. I didn’t much like what those bastards were doing anyway.”

Jeok Cheongang raised a fist wreathed in rolling flames and added,

“Just like you.”

Swish—BOOM!

Thousands of soldiers filled the Grand Banquet Hall, but not one of them saw how Jeok Cheongang moved—or how Cang Gong evaded that terrifying attack.

A tiny handful of people were the exception. They were more than worthy of being called superhuman.

“If I were in his place, how long could I last?”

The Emperor had watched it all. Baek Yeon answered his question.

“A hundred moves.”

“You don’t hesitate to be cruel. I put no small effort into reaching this realm.”

The Emperor gave a bitter smile. Baek Yeon replied evenly.

“It would be the same for anyone. The only question is how long they could last. The outcome would not change.”

“Even if you went out there, Baek Yeon?”

“As Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, I would certainly win. As a lone martial artist, I would lose by a hair.”

“Then which are you now—a martial artist, or the Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard?”

“This subordinate has always been the Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard. I obey only Your Majesty’s commands. And…”

Baek Yeon’s voice fell to a murmur.

“The late Emperor’s final order was for me to plan for the future alongside the fourth prince.”

“…!”

The Emperor’s eyes trembled.

How could he forget that day? The voice he had heard for the last time?

More than ten years had passed since then.

Frost had settled early on the head of the young man burdened with more than he could bear. The infant who had once been swaddled in blankets had grown into a boy, now sharing this very moment with him.

“What on earth—”

The boy struggled as though he might shake off the palace attendants holding him and rush onto the battlefield.

“What on earth are you thinking?”

His eyes blazed with confusion and anger as he glared at the Emperor.

“Why? Why won’t you help them? They’re risking their lives for Your Majesty…!”

BOOOOM!

The rest of his words were swallowed by the roar that burst out with the flames.

The next moment, Prince Shangshan saw a familiar face amid another fierce battle across the hall. The man was rising to his feet, using a spear shaft broken in half as a cane.

Shangshan let out a quiet groan.

“Jin Taekyung.”

He could recognize him at a glance, even from far away.

No. How could he fail to recognize him?

It was Jin Taekyung.

The first person to bring life to the young prince’s dull, unchanging days. The only one who had treated him as someone other than a prince.

Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao clearly remembered the day they had first met.

“Could I become like you?”

After much thought, he had asked Jin Taekyung that question. Jin had answered without hesitation.

“Of course. You can.”

Shangshan had meant it. He wanted to be like Jin Taekyung.

Not simply because Jin was a formidable martial artist. A man once dismissed as his family’s unwanted child had defeated powerful enemies and won everyone’s affection. Shangshan found it astonishing—and enviable.

Though he was a royal more honored than anyone in the world, the young prince had always been lonely. In that young martial artist, he had seen something of himself.

A few days ago, Jin had dared to stroke his hair. Shangshan could still feel the warmth of his hand.

“I hope we meet again. Then I can repay the debt I owe you.”

“Your Highness.”

“Yes?”

“Don’t you know? Friends don’t owe each other anything.”

It had been the first time anyone had called him a friend. The first time anyone had stroked his hair as though he were an ordinary child.

That made him want all the more to keep his promise—to repay what he owed Jin Taekyung and return his kindness.

Jin was his one and only friend.

“Please, please save him.”

Shangshan did not know what was happening or what lay behind it. Still, he bowed his head and fell to his knees without hesitation.

Before his only blood relative.

He pleaded with the ruler of the continent, who could move several Supreme Peak masters with a single word.

“I will do anything you ask of me. If you order your younger brother to leave the Great Nation, I will obey. But please, do not refuse the first and last request this brother of yours will ever make.”

“…!”

“Save him. Save Jin Taekyung, Your Majesty!”

As the Emperor watched Shangshan prostrate himself and cry out, an indescribable emotion crossed his face.

Relief. Pride. Perhaps even sorrow. Amid that swirl of feelings was something he could not bring himself to say.

Not ‘Your Majesty’… Wouldn’t you call me ‘older brother’?

His lips parted, but no words came out. Nor did he nod at Shangshan’s plea.

No—he could not.

Everything that happened on this battlefield today had been entrusted to one person more than a decade ago.

No matter how I think about it, I can’t understand why you’re doing nothing, even in a situation like this.

So Gyo answered the Emperor’s quiet Sound Transmission in her ear.

I’m not standing by. I’m watching.

Her gaze remained fixed on Jin Taekyung, unwavering as it had been from the start.

Until he shows his true self.

Chapter 906

I didn’t know what to call this.

A melee?

A bloodbath?

Maybe both. Everywhere I stepped, I was trampling the corpse of someone I didn’t know, while enemy spears, swords, and arrowheads came hurtling in without pause, from the ground and the sky alike.

Even now.

“Look out!”

One of the Embroidered Uniform Guards heard my shout and jolted, twisting at the waist.

Fffft!

His armor split with a sharp whistle.

The traitor who’d tried to ambush him amid the chaos missed by a hair. Without hesitation, I kicked a crescent blade lying on the ground.

Whoooosh! Thud!

There wasn’t even the usual dying cry.

The blade shot out like a flash of light, piercing its target and then skewering a couple of nearby enemies like meat on a spit. The Embroidered Uniform Guard, who’d barely escaped with his life, gave me a slight nod.

“Thank y—”

He never raised his head again.

Thwack!

An arrow pierced his throat, straight through his Adam’s apple.

He collapsed with blood gurgling in his throat. Enemies trampled his body as they rushed in, swinging their weapons at anyone in reach.

All accompanied by a calm voice that had no place in a situation like this—which made it all the more chilling.

“Heaven above, earth below.”

“All demons bow in reverence.”

Why did they remind me of the deranged fanatics I’d fought right before coming to Murim?

“Fucking lunatics…”

Short cries of dismay rang out here and there. The Embroidered Uniform Guards had continued fighting calmly despite the sudden betrayal of their allies, as if to prove the weight of the golden armor they wore. But even they looked afraid as they watched the traitors, who had become entirely different people.

Or maybe they feared the martial prowess of someone they couldn't hope to face.

Splash.

A leather shoe sank into a pool of blood as its owner stepped forward.

One of the Embroidered Uniform Guards had backed away without realizing it. A groan slipped through his lips.

"Ma Sanbao…"

That's right. It was him.

Ma Sanbao, the East Depot's Brush-Holding Eunuch.

Its second-in-command and de facto leader.

Or rather, that was the identity he'd used to deceive the world. Now he moved toward me.

So fast that "approaching" hardly did it justice—he moved like a flash of light.

Whoosh! BOOM!

His blows rained down like lightning from above. Every time I blocked one, my hands went numb.

My breathing had grown rougher than before, throwing off movements that should have flowed like water.

Huff. Huff.

As I panted, I wondered whether I was struggling this badly because of my condition—or because my opponent was simply that formidable.

I didn't have long to wonder.

Shhk!

The flexible sword curved like a living snake and grazed the bridge of my nose.

Hot blood ran from the cut. I retreated through the burning pain, and a low laugh reached my ear.

"What happened to all that momentum you had at the start, hmm?"

Instead of answering, I turned my head. A dagger sprang from Ma Sanbao's voluminous sleeve and pierced the empty space beside me like a streak of light.

Thwack!

Another life ended with a sickening sound.

Ma Sanbao went on as if nothing had happened.

"That's a shame. If you hadn't dodged, that young Embroidered Uniform Guard would still be breathing."

I looked at Ma Sanbao, who was taunting me, and wondered:

If I hadn't dodged, would the guard have survived?

Could he have made it through this battle and returned to his family someday?

I didn't know. I didn't know anything.

The pointless guilt made me feel like shit, even though someone else was the one who owed the dead guard an apology.

Why…?

I wanted to turn around. I wanted to look the Emperor and So Gyo in the eye—the two who had thrown me, Jeok Cheongang, and even their own subordinates into this battlefield, only to stand by and watch. I wanted to ask them why they'd held this damn banquet. Why they weren't stepping in when they had the power to turn the tide.

"Why the hell?!"

I couldn't hold back the shout any longer. But it wasn't the Emperor or So Gyo who answered.

It was Ma Sanbao.

"Do you still not understand why they're standing by and doing nothing?"

He let out a derisive laugh and continued.

"Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung. The Emperor used you too, in the end. Just as we tried to use you and the Fire King to get rid of So Gyo."

"…!"

"Borrow another's blade to kill. There's no better way to keep blood off your hands. Especially when the blades are as fine as the Fire King and the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon."

I wanted to tell him to shut his damn mouth.

But no matter how badly I wanted to deny it, I couldn't speak.

It was all too plausible.

If the Emperor was anything like the man I'd experienced firsthand…

And with that woman, So Gyo, still a complete mystery…

"You and your master have only one role left. Fight for your lives until, in the end, you die."

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh!

The flexible sword became dozens of blades, whistling toward me from every direction.

A sword technique of extreme speed, pushed to its very limit.

But however densely the afterimages surrounded me, only one blade was real.

Clang!

A clash far too loud to have come from two weapons meeting sent me sliding back.

Ma Sanbao kept swinging the flexible sword, giving me no pause. His voice came from beyond it.

"The Great Nation, the Emperor—it's always been like this. To the rulers who hold this vast land, people like you and me, people of Murim, aren't subjects to govern."

Whoosh-whoosh! Slice!

The pressure behind his sword cut through my skin. Thin sprays of blood scattered into the air.

"That's why I followed my master and pledged my loyalty to that person. It's why you'll die here today. The Emperor only wants to protect Prince Shangshan. He won't play the cards he's kept hidden just to save a pack of martial-world ruffians."

"What?"

A realization flashed through my mind, and my eyes widened.

Even though there was considerable distance between us, I suddenly thought of someone fighting a thunderous battle alongside Jeok Cheongang far away.

Could it be?

No. There was no could about it.

Ma Sanbao had said it himself. This wasn't a guess. It was a certainty.

Krrrrang!

Their different Forces collided, spitting sparks.

My spear had once been a single weapon. Ma Sanbao's fierce assault had broken it into two short spears. I crossed them to block his flexible sword and felt a chill coming off the blade, stopped inches from my face.

"Cang Gong. Were you his disciple?"

"Cang Gong? How dare you call him a servant of that sinister, weak Emperor?"

Ma Sanbao's lips twisted.

"Eastern Heaven Demon Lord. That is the new name the great and all-powerful Lord of Heaven bestowed on his loyal servant."

"…!"

"And that Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's disciple will bring you to your knees."

At that moment—

Whirr.

The springy blade of the flexible sword bent.

It slipped over the spear shaft blocking its way like a living snake and flashed toward me. I swung my crossed short spears upward with all my strength.

Clang!

The flexible sword veered away from my chest.

But I'd only survived a dangerous moment. The attack wasn't over.

Wham!

Hk!

My breath caught, and my vision flashed.

A fist struck my exposed chest. I staggered back more than ten steps, giving Ma Sanbao an opening he couldn't afford to miss.

Tap.

One step.

At the same time, Ma Sanbao's figure vanished like an illusion.

But even with my battered body and dulled senses, I reacted in time.

Left!

The instant I was sure, I flung out one hand.

Broken in two, the spear had lost the advantage of its long reach. But the shortened shaft was the perfect length and speed for a throw. I sent it flying with all my strength.

Whoooosh!

A single fierce whistle ripped through the air.

Then came a tremendous impact.

BOOM!

Dust billowed from the ground.

And then—

Shhhhk!

Space split open.

The flexible sword had knocked my short spear aside. Now it came through the dust, blazing with Force and cutting the cloud apart.

Ma Sanbao's taunting Sound Transmission reached me with it.

—Don't worry. I'll only cut you enough to leave you barely alive.

That was his mistake.

The world slowed. I could see every one of the dozens of sword-images raining down through the air.

Cut me? And only enough to leave me alive?

What a joke.

He was talking like that while his opponent was still standing on two perfectly good legs.

Win a life-and-death duel, and you could spit on your opponent. Boast about your strength. Laugh in his face.

But…

You do that after it's over.

My body was heavy as waterlogged cotton, and the internal energy that usually surged through me like a wave was coming in broken strands.

It didn't matter.

My eyes hadn't wavered. Neither had the hand gripping my one remaining short spear.

I see it.

Shwoosh!

The spear tip pierced a single precise point. Dozens of sword-images vanished as it struck the real blade.

BOOM!

The impact sent the figure flying, unable to withstand the force of the collision.

Not me.

Ma Sanbao.

Crunch.

He planted a foot hard enough to tear up the ground and barely managed to steady himself. His eyes widened as he stared at me.

Tap.

I was already right in front of him.

“You bastard!”

Ma Sanbao cried out, his flexible sword cutting through the air at a speed worthy of being called extreme. It scattered Force like a glacier—colder and more merciless still.

Shwoooosh!

Facing that force, which seemed capable of freezing everything it touched, I drew up every last bit of internal energy in my body.

Fwoosh.

Wet firewood caught flame.

I poured the Scorching Yang Qi that surged like fire through my acupoints, as unstable as twisted railway tracks, into my hand and grabbed the blade just as it began to pierce my side.

Krrk, KRAAAASH!

Power collided with power.

Agony shot through both hands.

This wasn’t Empty-Hand Seizes the Blade, catching a weapon between bare fingers with precise timing and speed.

This was just a brute-force grab.

“You crazy—!”

No martial artist could blame Ma Sanbao for saying that.

This really was insane.

You might get away with it against someone at least a level below you. Against a master of similar skill—especially one with greater internal energy—you’d lose both arms in an instant.

But…

It’s different when the lunatic grabbing the blade has been busting his ass to raise his Muscles and Bones through the System.

If my other stats were blue-chip stocks, Muscles and Bones were a savings account I'd kept adding to with every level and every training session.

So what about now, more than a year after I'd gotten the System?

What level am I again?

I smiled.

I endured the horrible pain as my palm turned into a shredded mess, and looked into Ma Sanbao's eyes, bulging as if they were about to burst.

Then I gave his words back to him, changing just a few.

"Don't worry. I'll stab you just enough to kill you."

"…!"

Ma Sanbao tried to shout, but no sound came out.

Krrk!

The short spear in my hand pierced his throat just as his lips began to part.

"Ghk. Kgh."

Blood gurgled in his throat. The light faded from his eyes as he stared at me.

Chapter 907

I won’t say the fight with Ma Sanbao was fiercer or harder than any I’d ever fought.

There had been plenty of stronger opponents in the hellish battlefields I’d fought my way through. Even now, I could name several who’d been far worse than him.

But one thing was certain: today, Ma Sanbao had been stronger than me.

No. More precisely, I was weaker than usual.

The System was practically sealed, and my body, wrecked by the aftereffects of One Annihilation, wouldn’t move the way I wanted it to.

Even so, I was the one still standing.

In this merciless world ruled by the law of the jungle, Ma Sanbao had made a small but fatal mistake.

He’d mistaken himself for someone a step above me.

“If you wanted to take me alive… you should’ve come at me ready to kill me from the start.”

I looked into Ma Sanbao’s empty eyes as I whispered, then drove the short spear deeper through his throat.

Crunch. Crack.

Bone fragments burst through his skin with a sickening sound.

I didn’t let go until the spear had severed his carotid artery and followed his collarbone down toward his heart. Freed from my grip at last, Ma Sanbao’s body slowly toppled.

The spear remained buried deep inside him like a tree root.

Thud. Splash.

There was no System message telling me I’d defeated an enemy. No clear, familiar chime.

But this was enough.

Finally. One down.

Panting, I stared at the corpse lying motionless in a pool of blood, then let out a shout charged with internal energy.

“Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan has killed Ma Sanbao, Brush-Holding Eunuch of the East Depot!”

Before anyone could grasp what that meant, I plunged back into the battlefield, where swords and spears were flying.

Whoosh! Crunch!

Short, simple movements. The bare minimum of internal energy.

I dodged, struck, and smashed.

Crack!

I crushed the face of a man muttering those eight words like a mantra—“Heaven above, earth below. All demons bow in reverence.” I was sick of hearing them.

Whsssh!

As his body crumpled, its features mangled beyond recognition, blades flew at me from either side. I jerked my head out of their path.

Clang!

The two blades missed me by a hand’s breadth and struck each other. Ignoring the vibration ringing in my ears, I thrust out my torn hand.

Boom!

Hot, compressed air burst outward.

I’d put only three-tenths of my internal energy into the Flame Divine Palm. Even so, the force and heat of that strike were enough to kill most Peak masters on the spot.

“Gah…!”

The man flew backward, spraying dark red blood.

Whether that nameless enemy lived or died was no longer my concern. What he’d left behind was another matter.

Tap.

His sword had already slipped from his hand. I caught the hilt and swung it in one smooth motion.

Shhhh!

Space split open. Flames wrapped around the blade, heating the air and burning flesh and bone.

Simple and swift. Too powerful to stop.

And at the end of it came my enemies’ blood and screams.

Fwoosh!

“Gaaah!”

I pushed forward, drenched in blood spraying like a fountain. I dodged the countless blades crashing in from every direction, knocked them aside, then sent them flying right back where they came from.

When the sword broke, I used a spear. When the spear snapped, an ax or a dagger.

And if I had none of those, I used arms and legs harder than steel.

Crunch!

Boom!

I broke the bones and crushed the flesh of every enemy in my way.

There was no need to invoke some grand concept like all streams returning to the sea.

Every weapon in the world had been made to fight more efficiently. Martial arts existed for the same reason.

Stab. Slash. Strike.

To me, martial arts were connections between countless points and lines.

When your life was on the line, you couldn't afford to rule out any means.

If a weapon could kill an enemy as quickly and surely as possible, its shape didn't matter.

Just like now.

Cr-rack!

A corpse collapsed, its neck bent at an unnatural angle.

The enemies kept blocking my way, no matter how many I killed. Their lips never stopped murmuring those mantra-like words, but I could see the emotion in their eyes.

Fear.

Huff. Huff.

I fought to keep my ragged breathing quiet. Every muscle in my body throbbed as if I'd been electrocuted, and the hand that had grabbed Ma Sanbao's sword could barely feel pain anymore.

After pulling something that crazy, I was probably in terrible shape.

But I couldn't show even the slightest weakness.

Wolves hunted in packs, but no matter how hungry they were, they couldn't bare their teeth at a lion that roared and charged them.

They only tried to sink their teeth into a lion's nape when it started backing away.

Splash.

My heavy step sent the blood pooled around my ankles rippling.

Like the blood still seeping from the countless wounds carved into my body, the blood reflecting the night sky was dark red.

Can I do this?

A wave of exhaustion hit me.

I'd killed over a hundred of them by my rough count, yet enemies still filled my view.

The Great Nation's—no, Dark Heaven's—elite. They ranged from Supreme First Rate to the upper reaches of Peak.

Their individual prowess aside, I had to defeat every last one of those fanatics who worshiped the Lord of Heaven before I could reach Jeok Cheongang, who was still fighting a thunderous battle that seemed like it would never end.

Goddammit.

I didn't know.

We were gaining the upper hand without the Emperor's help, so why did unease still gnaw at me?

Why did that cloud-choked night sky look so ominous?

No. I knew.

This isn't all of it.

I couldn't see them anywhere, no matter how I looked: the assassins who were supposed to protect the Emperor, or the twin Supreme Peak masters who had guarded Qianqing Palace.

Even the number of Embroidered Uniform Guards in the Grand Banquet Hall was only half what I knew it should be.

And the same goes for Cang Gong.

The Emperor and Cang Gong.

The two men had crossed a point of no return, yet neither had revealed all his forces. They had to be concealing their moves, waiting for the other to show his hand first.

I wouldn't have been surprised if the entire Imperial Capital had split in two by now and was fighting a bloody battle.

Fuck.

What a shitty mess.

Even so, I had to fight.

I had to survive.

The Dark Heaven dogs charging beneath that rain of arrows weren't the only ones I had to survive. There were also the Emperor and So Gyo, and I didn't even know whether they were enemies or allies.

What the hell are you planning?

I turned toward the high platform in the distance.

Baek Yeon and So Gyo stood on either side of the Emperor. With those two Supreme Peak masters, either of whom could turn the battle around in an instant, he watched the fighting.

I could also see Aehyang surrounded by a handful of palace attendants, and the young king kneeling for some reason.

My gaze lingered on them for a moment. Only then did the countless whistles crossing the sky reach my ears.

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh-whoosh!

A deep shadow fell over my head.

Hundreds of arrowheads flashed as they fell, all aimed at me alone. At the same moment, a red alarm bell rang violently inside my head.

Shit.

I knew before I moved.

Dodging them all would be next to impossible.

I was exhausted. My body and senses had grown sluggish, and I stood isolated in an open space with nowhere to evade the countless arrows fired by First Rate masters using internal energy.

Use as little strength as I can. Avoid anything fatal.

I gritted my teeth and pulled an abandoned spear from the ground. With my other hand, I reached toward the sky.

Whummm.

The air around me trembled.

I'd avoided using my Middle Dantian during the fight unless the danger was extreme, conserving my stamina. Now wasn't the time to weigh whether it would be bitter or sweet.

Bitter or not, I had to swallow it.

I had to bear it myself.

There was no way in hell I was going to fall here, of all places.

Just as I clenched my fist, ready to meet the arrows hurtling toward me with a ferocious whistle that seemed to tear through my ears—

"Turtle Shell! Defend!"

At a shout from someone whose voice sounded familiar, a group swept in with blinding speed and surrounded me.

They held up massive shields.

Bam-bam-bam!

Sparks lit up the darkness. Broken arrow fragments scattered in every direction. Moments later, a second rain of arrows came, and dozens of crescent-bladed polearms flashed toward it.

"Slash!"

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh! Slice!

Blade Force swept across the sky in brilliant half-moons.

The powerful energy formed a kind of barrier, slicing apart every arrow that flew toward them. The scattered fragments couldn't pierce the gaps in their golden armor.

Clatter. Thud-thud-thud!

Countless fragments fell, their force spent.

I watched in silence, then spoke to the familiar face beneath a helmet pulled low.

"Should I thank you for that?"

Jeong Hogun, Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, answered evenly.

"I didn't know you knew how to say thank you."

"I don't say it very often."

"I thought not. I wasn't expecting it."

"What about you?"

"When I owe someone, I thank them. Like now."

Clank.

Jeong Hogun struck his golden armor in a military salute. When he spoke again, his tone had changed.

"Thank you for helping His Majesty. And us."

"…Huh."

"I'm sure you have plenty to ask me, and plenty you want to say. But I'd like you to save it until after this is over."

Goddammit.

If he came out with something like that before I could even open my mouth, there was nothing left to say.

I clicked my tongue and watched the enemies pressing in from all sides.

"Hey. One question."

"Anything."

"That guy over there playing peeping Tom—is he on our side?"

Jeong Hogun flinched at "peeping Tom," then nodded.

"At least His Majesty is. We're on your side."

At least?

I understood immediately why he'd added those words.

So not So Gyo. No—more precisely, he doesn't know, either.

It had to be that. Ma Sanbao hadn't seemed to know, and neither had Cang Gong.

Who that mysterious woman was, or what she had in mind.

An unknown like that meant danger.

…Shit. Good thing I left the kids behind.

I muttered to myself and raised the ownerless spear I'd picked up moments ago, aiming it at the enemies surging toward us.

I thought of the Fire Dragon Pavilion members, who should be somewhere safe, waiting for Murim Alliance reinforcements that weren't coming.

They'd probably kick up a fuss later, repeating "Captain" like parrots. But if they'd stayed here, it wouldn't have been surprising if they were already dead—

"Captaiiin!"

"…?"

"Captaaaain!"

What the fuck?

I turned around, feeling as though I'd been possessed by a ghost, and spotted familiar faces appearing in the distance.

“Captaaaaaain!”

More precisely, I saw Hyuk Mujin at the head of the Fire Dragon Pavilion members, hollering at the top of his lungs.

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

And countless black figures trailing behind him like a tail.

Chapter 908

For a moment, every thought in my head stopped.

What the hell is this?

I stared, mouth open, at the scene in the distance.

The Fire Dragon Pavilion members were running toward me, panic written all over their faces. A group of black-clad figures was racing after them.

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

The ground shook. Even the figures I could see numbered well over a thousand, all dressed in black from head to toe. As they drew closer, their chilling aura grew clearer. It could mean only one thing.

Enemies!

The instant I reached that conclusion, a red warning light flashed in my mind.

Shit.

I had no idea what had happened, but what I needed to do was clear.

The unknown figures had brought the battlefield to a momentary lull. I shouted at the Embroidered Uniform Guards.

“Quit standing there and pick up your weapons!”

I didn’t expect them to obey me just because I’d given an order. But beside me stood a man of considerable rank—a Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard.

“Rally! Rally immediately!”

As Jeong Hogun’s shout roused the battlefield, I channeled my internal energy and kicked off the ground.

Boom!

Flamefire Path.

Flames burst from my toes, scorching the air. Riding the shock wave, I took one step, then another. The twenty-odd jang[3390] between me and the stone wall vanished, and the figures atop it came into view.

The Imperial Guards.

Along with the Embroidered Uniform Guard, they were one of the Great Nation’s elite forces, charged with protecting the Imperial Capital. They were also traitors who’d betrayed the Emperor and taken refuge in the shadow of the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, who had lived behind the guise of Cang Gong.

From behind the high stone wall, they had been firing arrows without pause. Their bows were now aimed at the Fire Dragon Pavilion members who had appeared behind them alongside the black-clad figures.

[3390] A jang is a traditional length unit equal to ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

At least, they were until I arrived.

“General, your orders!”

At the urgent call of someone who looked like a junior officer, a middle-aged man in ornate armor swung the baton in his hand without hesitation.

He swung it at me as I closed the dozens of jang[3391] between us in an instant.

“Loose!”

Thwang-thwang-thwang! Fwoooosh!

Nearly a thousand archers turned and released their taut bowstrings. Countless silver arrowheads, imbued with internal energy, blanketed the sky as they rained down on me.

It was a near-perfect volley, powerful enough that even a Supreme Peak master couldn’t ignore it.

But…

Not if they can’t hit me.

Boom!

Another burst of Flamefire Path exploded from my toes, and I shot forward like a cannonball.

A sudden burst of speed. A swerve.

Thup-thup-thup-thup!

Arrows whistled past behind me with a sound that made my skin crawl. I didn’t need to look back to know that the spot where I’d stood a moment ago was bristling with them.

Nor did I think the Imperial Guards, one of the Great Nation’s elite forces, would stop there.

“What the—!”

“Don’t lose your nerve! Loose!”

Their surprise at my speed lasted only a moment. Thoroughly trained, the Imperial Guards nocked new arrows and fired in one swift, fluid motion.

Fwoooosh!

Once.

Thup-thup-thup!

Then again.

“Fire! I said fire!”

“Begin staggered fire!”

Thwang-thwang!

I narrowly evaded the fourth rain of arrows, loosed in two successive waves.

Bang!

[3391] A jang is a traditional length unit equal to ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Then I kicked off the ground and shot into the air. The Imperial Guards were nocking their fifth volley—the last they would get to fire—when they cried out.

“H-He’s coming!”

“Loose! Loose!”

It all happened in an instant: four volleys, and my passage through that dense storm of arrows to the top of the stone wall.

In the world that had slowed around me, a few of the quickest Imperial Guards obeyed the order. Their arrows cut through the air toward me.

Slowly. So slowly that I could hear the wind flowing along each advancing arrowhead.

Whoosh.

I reached toward the dozens of arrows flashing in the darkness, each imbued with internal energy. At the same time, I awakened the pulse I alone could feel at the center of my chest, at the point called the Jade Hall.

Stop.

At that instant—

Whoooosh!

An invisible power, utterly unlike internal energy, spread in every direction at my will. It erased the wind, stilled the air, and caught the dozens of arrows moving through it.

Rrrrrumble.

The air trembled. Time returned to its normal pace.

But the Imperial Guards looking up at me, standing in midair, remained frozen in shock.

“Th-This is insane…”

Someone’s groan broke the heavy silence. Reflected in their wide, staring eyes were dozens of arrows suspended as though caught by an invisible hand, with me at their center.

“A m-monster.”

“How… How is this possible?”

Shock. Fear. The questions of men who had seen something they couldn’t comprehend.

And then came the desperate resistance of the few who hadn’t given up.

“What are you waiting for? Shoot him!”

“B-But…”

“All Imperial Guards! Follow the General’s orders and take down that heinous—!”

I shot my hand out like a bolt of lightning toward the few officers screaming at their men.

Or, to be exact, I scattered the arrows I'd been holding with the power of my Middle Dantian.

Whoosh! Thup-thup-thup!

"G-Gah!"

"Gaaah!"

Screams followed the arrows' fierce whistle.

True to their reputation as Imperial Guards, each of them was a master of no small skill. But they couldn't dodge the arrows I sent flying as if I were controlling them.

Except one.

Clang-clang!

Arrows flew aside in a flash of swordlight.

The middle-aged man cut down the attacks converging on him from every direction in a single sweep. His Force shone as brilliantly as the armor that set him apart from the other Imperial Guards. A thought crossed my mind, and I said it aloud.

"One of the Twelve Palaces of the Zodiac?"

The Twelve Palaces of the Zodiac: the collective title for the twelve Supreme Peak masters who represented the imperial court.

"Have you ever heard of the Twelve Palaces of the Zodiac?"

"Sure. Aren't they the names of constellations?"

"It's also what they call the twelve Supreme Peak masters who represent the Imperial Capital. And half of them are on our side."

Ma Sanbao had told me that himself.

The middle-aged man fixed me with a grave look and tightened his grip on his great saber.

"Do you know me?"

"I know you well."

I nodded and went on.

"You're the treacherous piece of shit who betrayed the Emperor and sided with Dark Heaven. The asshole who wanted to turn me and my people into pincushions. And the asshole who's about to die."

"…!"

"That about covers it. If you need to add anything, spit it out yourself."

"…No. That's enough. Except for one thing."

His eyes gleamed as he added quietly, "I'm not the one who's going to die."

At that moment—

Whoosh!

His figure blurred.

Shifting Form and Position: a supreme movement technique available only to those who had reached the highest realms.

He kicked off the stone wall and sprang into the air. His great saber, longer and larger than most grown men, flashed across the space between us.

Its speed and power were worthy of a superhuman. Terrifying energy poured from the Force wrapped around the blade.

Strong.

I could tell at a glance how powerful this nameless man was. I could imagine the grueling training it had taken to reach his realm and become commander of the Imperial Guards.

But that was precisely why his saber would never touch me.

If you could take in an entire mountain range at a glance, you had to be looking down from higher up.

Whoooosh!

One step was enough.

The great saber tore through distorted space, but it couldn't match my speed as I moved through the air as if it were solid ground. Only the strands of Force it sent flying barely grazed me.

Sizzle.

Pain like a burn.

The pressure split the skin exposed beneath my tattered clothes. Drops of my blood scattered through the air and mingled with someone else's.

Grrk. Cough.

The middle-aged man's body shuddered with a wet, rattling sound. Something that hadn't been there a moment ago protruded from his thick, bull-like neck.

Something that glinted coldly in the dark.

"Grrk. Wh-What is this?"

He could barely maintain Stepping on Empty Air. Still, he felt for the arrowhead, as though he couldn't believe it was there. I watched him calmly.

"I've received so many unexpected gifts that I was starting to feel bad. Here, you can have one back."

"Seizing an Object Through Empty Space?"

"Similar, but different."

Tap.

I touched the center of his swaying chest with a finger.

"Much harder, though. And more certain."

"…The Middle Dantian. It's the Middle Dantian."

Cough.

He spat out a mouthful of blood and looked at me, his eyes trembling. Then, with his last strength, he struggled to raise the great saber he still held.

His voice faded as he spoke.

“I… I am the Golden Ox Palace of the Twelve Palaces of the Zodiac, the Chief Commander of the Imperial Guards, and one who devotes his life to the great and almighty Lord of Heaven…”

He never finished.

Slip.

Did the saber slide from his hand first? Or did his body tip as death closed in?

I didn’t know which struck the ground first. I didn’t care.

Man and weapon fell together. As a dull thud rose from below, I stepped onto the stone wall.

Right into the middle of the Imperial Guards, who stood frozen like statues.

Hff.

Someone drew a sharp breath. I could feel countless emotions swirling among the guards who filled the stone wall.

Fear and anger, shock. And, last of all, confusion at not knowing what to do.

That confusion could mean only one thing.

Not all of them are Dark Heaven’s lackeys.

There were thousands of traitors on this battlefield alone. No matter how long the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord had lived in the imperial court as Cang Gong, they couldn’t all have been raised as Dark Heaven’s dogs from the start.

The Great Nation’s imperial court wasn’t so easily fooled.

They were won over. Coerced. Or given orders they couldn’t refuse.

That was probably how Dark Heaven had brought them into line. Now I had their carrots and sticks in my hands.

“There’s one thing I can promise you, at least.”

I spoke up abruptly, then addressed all the Imperial Guards.

“If you side with the imperial court now, I’ll make sure you don’t end up as traitors, one way or another.”

As soon as I finished speaking, I reached out toward an Imperial Guard officer approaching from a blind spot, his killing intent unmistakable.

Whoosh. Thud.

A whistle cut through the air. One more corpse was added to the count.

I pointed at the body lying there, a Finger Qi hole through its brow, and added calmly,

“Anyone who doesn’t like my offer, raise your hand.”

“…!”

“…!”

No one raised a hand. I jumped down from the stone wall.

Of course, I didn’t forget one last thing I absolutely had to say.

“Oh, and if there’s someone you know is a real bastard, cut him down right now.”

“E-Excuse me?”

“Kill him. Do it yourselves.”

“…!”

That’s right.

From here on out, kill each other.

I left the Imperial Guards glancing at one another and ran toward the Fire Dragon Pavilion members fleeing the unknown black-clad figures.

To meet them.

To save them.

Whoooosh!

Chapter 909

“Hah… Hah…”

Hyuk Mujin was gasping for breath. His arms and legs, moving nonstop while he was on edge, creaked like they belonged to someone else. His heart felt ready to burst at any second.

How did it come to this?

Even as he ran for his life, Hyuk Mujin wondered when and where everything had started going wrong.

But as always, one question led to another, with no end in sight. At the end of it all, only one self-mocking thought remained.

Fuck. Was being born the mistake?

Hyuk Mujin felt so wronged and miserable he could have cried.

Why the hell had a textile-shop owner’s son insisted on becoming a martial artist? He could’ve quietly taken over the family business.

If he hadn’t read all those trashy books starring extraordinary martial artists as heroes, he might be like everyone else by now, with a family and two or three kids he adored.

At the very least, he wouldn’t be getting chased by a bunch of weirdos who’d appeared out of nowhere.

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

The pursuers’ heavy footsteps rang out behind him. A chill ran down Mujin’s spine.

Shit. If they catch me, I’m done for.

He didn’t know who they were or where they’d been hiding before they suddenly appeared, but one thing was certain.

Those bastards are like monsters. No—they’re monsters.

It wasn’t just a judgment of their martial arts.

The chill, the primal fear he’d felt from the moment he first spotted the black-clad figures, had only grown stronger with time.

What the hell… are they?

His mind was full of questions he couldn’t answer.

And his body, already pushed to its limit, was slipping out of his control a little at a time without him even realizing it.

Slip.

“…!”

His legs suddenly gave out.

Still moving too fast to catch himself, Mujin pitched forward. His eyes flew wide—

“Hyuuuuuk!”

Grab!

A thunderous shout rang out as a powerful hand seized his collar. Mujin, who had nearly slammed face-first into the ground, tried to calm his pounding heart and looked up.

Thump. Thump!

He saw the face of the giant—no, Taishan—running with Mujin tucked under his arm like a piece of luggage.

“Hyuk. You okay?”

Mujin barely managed to squeeze out a reply.

“No. Not even a little.”

“Yeah. You look that way.”

“…If you know, why ask? Are you messing with me?”

“Hyuk. Is that how you treat the person who saved your life?”

“No. Thanks, then.”

“If you’re thankful, pay me back with a hundred bowls of five-spice pork later.”

“I’ll buy you two hundred bowls, not just a hundred. For now, let’s stay alive. Alive.”

“Two hundred bowls?”

Taishan furrowed his brow and slowed down, muttering to himself.

“How much is two hundred bowls?”

Namho and the Divine Physician, perched on Taishan’s broad shoulders, and Mujin, now tucked under his arm, all screamed at once.

“What kind of lunatic does that? Why the hell are you slowing down all of a sudden?”

“Young Hero Taishan! This is no time for that!”

“What are you doing, you crazy bastard?”

But even amid their frantic protests, Taishan’s brow remained furrowed as he wrestled with the problem.

“I don’t understand. How much is the number two hundred?”

“Goddamn it…”

Namho groaned toward the heavens, then turned to look behind them.

The others bringing up the rear—and the black-clad figures right on their heels—were rapidly drawing closer.

“Just answer him! Looks like he’ll need an answer even if his head gets smashed in! Hurry!”

At the Divine Physician’s desperate plea, Namho shouted, his face pale.

“A hundred bowls! If you have a hundred bowls twice, how many is that?”

“Hmm. A hundred bowls twice is… Ah. Taishan understands now.”

At last, Taishan found his answer. He spoke with a triumphant look.

“A hundred and two.”

“You fucking bastard!”

“You goddamn idiot!”

“Ah, Master…”

Wails erupted all around them.

Namho, driven to the edge of his patience, brought his elbow down on Taishan’s thick skull. Mujin let out a sobbing scream. The Divine Physician thought of his absent master and fingered the large acupuncture needle inside his sleeve, wanting, for the first time, to kill someone.

But unlike the others, Taishan’s face shone like the midday sun. He’d worked out for himself how much two hundred bowls was.

“Two hundred bowls. A lot. Anyway, it’s a whole lot!”

Even a hundred bowls would be enough to eat until his stomach burst. And two hundred bowls!

Truthfully, he didn’t know the exact difference between two hundred and a hundred and two. But Taishan decided not to worry about such trivial details.

Then, grinning broadly, he waved both hands at someone who hadn’t heard the good news yet.

“Pavilion Master! Pavilion Master! Taishan gets to eat five-spice pork! Hyuk said he’ll feed me till I burst—a hundred and two? Two hundred? Anyway, till I burst!”

“Don’t worry about your stomach bursting. Before that, I swear to Heaven I’ll burst your head myself—Wait, what did you just say?”

Namho, who’d been hammering away at Taishan’s crown with all the persistence of the Foolish Old Man moving mountains, widened his eyes and looked up.

And saw him.

Namho saw him. So did the Divine Physician, Hyuk Mujin, and every Fire Dragon Pavilion member following behind.

Whoooosh!

Someone was rushing toward them with a fierce whistle of air. Familiar flames burst from his toes.

“Captaiiin!”

Mujin finally let out the tears he’d been holding back.

Life has a way of throwing things at you that make no sense.

For people who'd lived before the Great Cataclysm, it must have been the monsters and Hunters that seemed to drop out of the sky one day. For me, it was the world I'd come to know through the capsule.

The situation in front of me wasn't quite on that level, but it was still plenty confusing.

"Five-spice pork! A hundred and two! Two hundred!"

Taishan, his face alight with near-maniacal joy.

"Kill this bastard right now! You're more than capable of cracking this fucking idiot's head open!"

Namho, radiating so much rage that mania didn't begin to cover it.

"Waaah! Captain! Why'd you take so long?"

Hyuk Mujin, sobbing with the relief of someone who'd died and come back to life.

"Ah, Master… This unworthy Disciple had a wicked thought."

And finally, the Divine Physician, muttering with such a serene, transcendent expression that he looked ready to send even the Buddha flying with a Palm Strike of the Tathagata.

"…"

What the fuck?

I had no idea what was going on.

I stared at them, speechless for a moment, then gave up trying to understand.

Though it would be more accurate to say I didn't have time to make sense of it.

Pat-pat!

"Pavilion Master! No, Young Master Jin! No, Benefactor!"

Ju Hwaran came running toward me, somehow managing to address me by three different titles in the space of a breath. Her clothes were a mess.

Behind her, Song Ilseom and Sama Pyo swung their weapons like mad to keep their pursuers at bay.

Clang!

Slice!

Sword Energy flashed in the darkness, and what looked like blood sprayed through the air.

The wind carried an unbearable stench with it.

What's that smell?

Even from this distance, it made me frown and turned my stomach.

But I had no time to work out what it was. As the three drew closer, narrowly staying ahead of their pursuers, I moved my lips.

—When I give the signal, everyone get down.

I sent the Sound Transmission to each of them and gathered every last bit of internal energy in my body.

Shhhh…

I drew heat from deep within myself and sent it through every limb and acupoint.

My acupoints, still not fully healed, screamed. I felt the wounds I'd sustained in the fight, large and small, tearing wider. But there was no other way.

I have to do it.

Whummm.

The iron spear I'd taken from some nameless Imperial Guard just before jumping down from the stone wall trembled, filled with Scorching Yang Qi.

The spearhead glowed red. Blue-white flames spread over it, nothing like they once had been, but still too powerful to ignore.

And at last—

Fwoosh.

Hellfire surged around the spearhead, burning the air and devouring the darkness. It swelled toward the figures approaching in silence, without a scream or a shout.

Like a beast poised to charge a flock of sheep.

Hotter and more ferocious than anything else in the world.

—Now.

I sent the signal to the three and swung the spear with all my strength, as though to cut the world in two.

Like a dragon's tail stretching out without end.

The first form of the Blazing Flame Divine Spear.

Fire Dragon's Single Tail.

Fwoooosh!

In that moment, all around us lit up as brightly as day.

Blue-white flames leaped from the spearhead and surged forward, burning and melting the ornaments scattered throughout the imperial palace.

They passed over the heads of the three, who'd heard my Sound Transmission and dropped down half a beat before the final moment.

Then they engulfed the vision of the black-clad figures close on their heels.

Kwaaaaaa!

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

A tremendous explosion and roar. Then the earth shook.

Light flashed, and the swelling flames fell like rain, covering a radius of several dozen jang.[3392]

It was a sight worthy of the name fire demon.

[3392] One jang is a traditional unit of length equal to about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

And through the acrid smoke of that blazing inferno, where not even a scream could be heard, three people came running.

Pat-pat!

Ju Hwaran. Song Ilseom. Sama Pyo.

I spotted their familiar faces and gave a faint smile.

Or maybe it was my vision that was growing faint, tilting a little more with every passing moment.

Thump.

Making it look as natural as possible, and without anyone noticing, I straightened the spear and used it to support myself. Then I suppressed my labored breathing.

…Damn it.

Weakness crawled up my body like a living snake.

My internal energy, abundant despite its instability, had run dry. My body, which should've been resting, cried out in pain from the strain I'd put it through.

And on top of that came mental exhaustion I could barely bear.

I should've held back with the Middle Dantian as much as possible…

I knew well enough there was no point regretting it now.

If I'd held back more, I wouldn't be in this state. But there was no guarantee things would've gone any better.

For now, I could only be satisfied that I'd saved the Fire Dragon Pavilion members, who'd come back here for some reason, from the danger right in front of them.

"Benefactor!"

Ju Hwaran, now right in front of me, shouted with alarm written across her face.

Song Ilseom and Sama Pyo came up on either side of her and spoke, their expressions strained.

"We all have to run."

"Right now!"

Their reaction was only natural.

My all-out strike had swept through the front ranks, but at a glance, more than a thousand enemies remained. I couldn't judge their individual strength precisely, but none of them would be easy to deal with.

Then the smoke began to clear. As the scene behind it slowly came into view, I finally understood.

Why they were so desperate.

And why Ma Sanbao had been so confident the rebellion would succeed.

"That's…"

A faint groan escaped my parted lips.

Chapter 910

They say even a dog at a village school can recite poetry after three years. Spend a few years working as a Hunter, and you stop batting an eye at most things.

The awful stench coming off a monster's body? That's nothing.

If you see blood spraying like a fountain and someone's limbs getting chopped off —not in a game or a movie, but in real life—

And if that someone is you or one of your companions… well, there's no need to say more.

First comes the fear of death, before you even set foot on a battlefield. Then you watch brutal scenes day in and day out until every nerve and sense begins to go numb. Only then do you become a Hunter in the truest sense.

That was how it happened for me.

But even I, with a fair amount of hard-earned experience under my belt, couldn't hold back the nausea rising from the pit of my stomach right now.

"That's…"

What the hell is that?

I couldn't bring myself to say the rest aloud. I had to clamp my mouth shut just to settle my churning stomach.

And I wasn't the only one.

"Ugh."

Ju Hwaran was the first to bend over, her face pale as she covered her mouth.

As heir to the Yongbong Escort Bureau, she'd had far more experience than other young prodigies her age. But compared to the rest of us, she still lacked real combat experience. Her reaction was only natural.

No, the fact that she hadn't thrown up was impressive.

Everyone here—including me, who'd fought my way through all kinds of hellish situations—was barely holding back a gag, our faces twisted.

"What… What is this?"

The Divine Physician muttered in a strained voice.

The old physician's eyes trembled with undisguised shock and the fear of someone who'd glimpsed something beyond comprehension.

Along with a sight before us that was impossible to believe.

Sizzle. Hissss.

Less than a dozen jang[3393] away, flesh burned with a sound we could hear. A horrible stench filled my nose.

[3393] A jang is a traditional Korean measure of length equal to ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Amid the remnants of the flames and the blackened ashes, shapes staggered to their feet.

“Grrr… Gaaah.”

Their voices were neither screams nor words.

The black-clad figures—no, the things—let out strange, unrecognizable cries through melted lips and stumbled forward.

As though they couldn’t feel the slightest pain.

As though they didn’t even know what state their bodies were in.

Crack. Crumble.

Arms, legs, and other parts blackened by the Scorching Yang Qi that had swept through them broke apart and scattered as ash.

One of the things that lost its balance and fell tilted its head.

“Grr…?”

It looked as though it were asking why its body wouldn’t move. A shiver ran down my spine.

They’re moving? Even after taking a blow like that?

Of course, not all of them had been caught in my attack.

But the hundred or so black-clad figures at the very front had taken the flames pouring from my spearhead full on.

That terrible heat. That devastating strike made of Scorching Yang Qi.

I’d seen it with my own eyes, and everyone here knew what they’d seen.

That was why it was so hard to believe.

That should’ve killed them outright. No—there’s no way they should’ve survived.

My body might not have been in good shape, but I’d given it everything I had.

I’d poured most of my remaining internal energy into the strike. I’d been certain it would kill at least one in ten of them.

But I’d been wrong.

Before my eyes, nearly half of the hundred figures at the front were getting back up, trampling the ashes of what had once been their comrades.

And they looked nothing like creatures with any life left in them.

“…This is insane. What am I looking at?”

Namho had lived through the horrors of the Great Faction War. His groan spoke for everyone here—except me.

Or, to be more precise, at that moment I was seeing something else the others didn’t know.

How is this possible?

Death was fair to everyone.

A Supreme Peak master could be cut down by a weapon just like a Third Rate knife-fighter. Once your skin melted and your insides burned like theirs, you didn't get back up.

But they had survived.

They showed no sign of screaming, no agitation—not even the pain they should have felt.

This is…

That was when a word I desperately didn't want to believe came to me. It struck like lightning, then slipped through my parted lips.

"Undead…"

Not dead, but not alive either.

Supernatural beings who went on existing past death instead of finding rest. Monsters that should never have appeared in this world.

There was only one answer, and I knew what I had to do.

"Eom Dae-du? What does that mea—"

"Run."

"What?"

I looked at Hyuk Mujin, whose eyes had gone wide, and spoke to him and everyone else in a low, tight voice.

"If you want to live, run. Right now."

"…!"

"…!"

The next moment—

Rumble!

Through the ringing air, the smoke still hanging thick around us, and the blazing piles of ash, an army of the dead walked out and began to advance as one.

"Grrraaaaa!"

Their cries carried the chill of death.

For as long as anyone could remember, the Murim had fascinated the continent's gossips.

And why wouldn't it?

Another world, with borders and laws of its own—or rather, none at all.

A place where outlaws lived beyond the bounds of nation and citizen.

It teemed with righteous heroes, fiends, and people who, depending on the moment, might be neither. A mountain of sabers and a forest of swords, where even the greatest master could meet his death at any time.

So those who belonged to the Murim were scorned and admired in equal measure. And the gossips, who loved nothing more than a story, gathered everything they saw and heard and ranked its people.

That was how a book with the ridiculous title Murim Ranking Record came into being.

But no matter how many connections those gossips had or how keenly they listened, there was a limit to what they could know.

Who was stronger than whom?

Everyone named in the Murim Ranking Record was a formidable master. The closer you got to its last page, the more often you encountered those called superhuman.

Supreme Peak masters of the orthodox faction, the unorthodox faction, the Demonic Cult, or somewhere between orthodox and unorthodox.

Among them were wandering martial artists who roamed the Murim alone like lone wolves, heirs to mysterious and little-known sects, leaders of great powers, and people called Cult Leaders. Most of them shared one thing in common.

Nonaggression. A ban on fighting.

They didn't confront one another lightly, much less come to blows.

That was only natural when every one of them was a giant capable of moving the Murim. For the gossips, though, it was a disappointment.

If a life-and-death duel broke out between Supreme Peak masters, they'd learn for certain who outranked whom—and gain a rare story they could dine out on for the rest of their lives.

But conflict in the Murim didn't erupt so easily. For a long time, the last page of the Murim Ranking Record, where the greatest warriors' names were written, went unchanged.

Until the storm of the Great Faction War swept through some fifty years ago.

As if to mock those long years of peace, things no one could have imagined began to change.

One revered master died, then another, and another.

News arrived with every sunrise and sunset. The gossips nearly wore their brushes down recording it all.

But just as surely as the sun rose and set, new names appeared.

"Have a look at this. I think we've been given bad information."

"Bad information? That can't be right."

"Read it. It says a thousand Demonic Cult members were wiped out in Anhui. I can't see how it could be true."

"A thousand? That's quite a force. But why doubt it? Looks like the Murim Alliance finally dealt them a proper blow."

“It wasn’t the Murim Alliance.”

“What?”

“It says it was all done by one person. He wiped out a thousand Demonic Cult members alone, without anyone’s help. Not a single one was spared.”

“…What?”

The name Jeok Cheongang was first made known that way. A few years later, he acquired the title Fire King. By the end of the Great Faction War, which had shaken the world of the Murim, his name had made it to the last page of the Murim Ranking Record.

The Martial God and the Three Saints.

And among the ten Supreme Peak masters who followed them, he was the fiercest and strongest of the kings: the King of Kings.

Fire King Jeok Cheongang.

The man himself wasn’t proud of it in the slightest.

“Murim Ranking Record? The world’s gone mad. Do they give firewood grand names like that these days?”

The monk who’d brought him the news smiled at Jeok Cheongang’s indifference and sipped his suspiciously warm grain tea.

“Is that so? When I looked it over, I found it surprisingly accurate for firewood.”

“That’s just fools talking nonsense. Are orthodox martial artists the only ones in the world? There are plenty of strong fighters among those who practice demonic and heterodox arts.”

“Even so, in the orthodox Murim, you’re fourth. After the Martial God and the Three Saints. Quite impressive.”

“Enough of that nonsense. Pour this old man a drink. What did you brew it with this time?”

“Amitabha[3394]. You mustn’t say such things. This is grain tea, not alcohol.”

“Grain tea, my ass. You sound like you’re kicking the Buddha in the ribs.”

“Watch your mouth. Do you want to suffer in tongue-pulling hell[3395] someday?”

“Fine, fine. Give me a cup before I break that Green Jade Buddha Staff you’re holding. I don’t want to set fire to the Shaolin Temple at my age.”

“Ha ha! What a joke. Still, I’d wager that within ten years, you’ll overturn the order of this Murim Ranking Record.”

“Hmm. I probably will. I’m old enough that I could be dead within ten years.”

“…Amitabha[3396]. You say the most ill-omened things without a second thought.”

[3394] Amitabha is the Buddha of Infinite Light; invoking his name is a Buddhist devotional practice.

[3395] A Buddhist hell associated with punishment for liars and slanderers.

[3396] Amitabha is the Buddha of Infinite Light; invoking his name is a Buddhist devotional practice.

"I've lived long enough. I don't know when we'll meet again, but if you haven't heard from me in ten years, come to Mount Jiuhua and cremate my body. Scatter my ashes from the highest peak, if you would."

"Hm. You're more extravagant than you look. Asking the Abbot of Shaolin to come chant sutras for you."

"I don't need sutras or a fortunate rebirth in paradise. That's how I've lived."

"Then shall we make a wager?"

"A wager? On what?"

"Whether you'll surpass even the Three Saints in ten years, or die as you say. I'm betting on the former."

"…"

"Trust me. And in ten years, let's meet here and have another drink."

That had been a long time ago.

The ten years they'd spoken of had passed three times over. Jeok Cheongang had seen off an unworthy Disciple he'd taken in by mistake, and even the friend who'd sat across from him sharing drinks had returned to the earth.

Yet now, a memory he'd long forgotten came back to him.

The words Hong Dao, the Dharma King, had spoken with a serious face, though he was usually so quick to smile.

You'll surpass the Three Saints.

Boom!

His departed friend's faint voice didn't fade beneath the blast of air from a powerful Palm Force.

If anything, Jeok Cheongang heard it more clearly.

Trust me.

Shh-shh-shh-shing!

Wind sharp as blades whipped around him. But the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's fierce attack—the pale-skinned old man's—didn't touch a single part of Jeok Cheongang's body.

To him, that felt entirely natural.

Ah.

Elation welled up from deep in his chest.

He had lived a hundred and several decades. All his life, he'd inflicted pain, suffered pain, and, for the first time, shared that pain with someone.

His advanced age. The Heart Demon that had filled his mind.

I thought this realm, which I reached by a stroke of fortune, was the furthest I could go.

Now he knew.

He had been wrong. His departed friend had been right.

Though I haven’t surpassed them yet…

“I’ll try.”

As the words scattered from the tip of his tongue, a faint smile formed on Jeok Cheongang’s lips.

At that moment—

Fwoosh.

A massive blaze unlike anything seen before struck the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord in the chest.

Chapter 911

He could feel it.

His body and mind were light enough to take flight.

Power welled up from deep within him, and the joy of having taken even a small step into a higher realm swept through Jeok Cheongang.

That sudden, modest insight was blooming into a greater, fiercer blaze.

Just as it was now.

Fwoosh.

A dazzling white flame flashed through the darkness, devouring and tearing its way forward.

Toward the enemy before him. Its heat filled the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's gray eyes.

"…!"

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's eyes widened as a fist came crashing toward him, erasing the space between them.

What is this?

He knew instinctively.

The power in that fist was unlike anything in the countless attacks he had clashed with or evaded until now.

The great martial artist known as the Fire King had taken another step forward.

And for the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, that meant only one thing.

I can't dodge it.

At that moment—

Kwaaaang!

The earth shook beneath a roar that seemed to split the sky.

A terrifying tremor and the force of the impact swept outward. Through smoke and steam heavy with dreadful heat, a figure was hurled away.

Whooosh!

As the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's view spun amid the fierce rush of air, Jeok Cheongang stepped toward him. The impact had sent the Demon Lord flying like a cannonball.

Crack—boom!

He moved faster than sound.

Shooting forward like a streak of flame, Jeok Cheongang reached out.

The Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist, brought to full mastery—or perhaps now beyond it—washed the space in white.

Bang!

The first strike broke the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's sword.

Boom!

The second barely grazed him and melted the ground.

Kaaa-bang!

The final, third strike slammed into the staggering Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's chest once more.

It shattered even the formidable Body-Protecting Qi that enveloped him.

Krrrunch!

The hard bluestone paving the grand banquet hall crumbled like tofu.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord hurtled away, his body smashing through more than ten jang[3397] of ground. Those who grasped what had happened in that instant moved at once.

"Kill him! Kill him!"

"The Demon Lord is in danger!"

"Stop him!"

Shouts rang out from every direction. Blades flashed.

But nothing could stop Jeok Cheongang now.

"Who dares—"

Crack!

"—stand in this old man's way?"

Boom!

No one reached Jeok Cheongang. No one could.

Blades gleaming with Sword Energy melted in the flames of the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist, while the Flame Divine Palm shot across the distance and swept through the approaching enemies.

"Urk—cough!"

"Aaargh!"

Those who mustered the courage to charge him head-on were the lucky ones.

Anyone who so much as touched the flames howled as they felt their own body burn alive.

Their screams became their last words.

Rustle. Thud.

After a brief but horrific agony, the dead sprawled like rotting trees.

Above the traitors' bodies, fused to their melted golden armor, flashed armor that had yet to lose its shine.

"Execute the traitors!"

[3397] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). More than ten jang is more than 30.3 m (99.4 ft).

“Long live His Majesty the Emperor!”

Shh-shh-shing! Slash!

Jeong Hogun cut down an enemy frozen by the unbelievable display of Jeok Cheongang’s power. Behind him, the Embroidered Uniform Guard charged over the traitors like a wave.

Clang-clang!

Thwack!

Weapons met, spitting sparks, and blood sprayed in every direction.

At the center of it all, the giant known as the Fire King pressed forward as he always had, smashing and burning everything in his path.

To end this fight.

To reach the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, who was staggering to his feet behind the countless moths still rushing at Jeok Cheongang.

Boom!

Scorching Yang Qi, hot as lava, swallowed dozens of enemies.

The bluestone had lost its smooth sheen and melted into a ruin. Corpses burned like firewood amid the embers that remained.

As Jeok Cheongang approached, forging a path of fire no one dared block, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord spoke in a voice mixed with a sigh and admiration.

“You attained… cough. You attained enlightenment?”

Jeok Cheongang stopped a few steps away and stared at him without a word.

The Demon Lord was in a terrible state.

His beard, once white as an immortal’s, was soaked with blood. One arm and one leg were broken. His clothes had already turned to ash, leaving his chest exposed and blackened with burns.

Not even Hua Tuo[3398]—or a Great Firmament Immortal—could have guaranteed his survival.

Yet the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord kept giving short, dry coughs and speaking, as though it might ease the terrible pain for even a moment.

“The Three Saints are a thing of the past now. A fourth star has risen right here, today.”

Jeok Cheongang answered in a low voice.

“Call it whatever you want. I don’t care about things like that. But…”

Step.

He began walking again. White hellfire rippled over his body, ready to bring this brief, ill-fated encounter to an end.

“You know one thing, at least. The third Demon Lord is about to die.”

[3398] Hua Tuo was a physician of ancient China renowned for his medical skill.

Jeok Cheongang's gaze on the unsteady Eastern Heaven Demon Lord was cold and clear, unlike the energy he wielded.

He would take no chances. He would make certain of the man's death.

The members of Dark Heaven had demonstrated unbelievable abilities time and again, defying the laws of the world Jeok Cheongang had believed in for more than a hundred years.

But those encounters had been trial and error, not failure.

They had been steps toward something broader and higher.

Each time Jeok Cheongang survived an unpredictable turn of events, he gained experience and insight. Little by little, he grew stronger.

The old monster of Mount Jiuhua was still growing.

Just as his Disciple was.

Just as his close friend, now dead, had once promised he would.

"A certain bald monk said long ago that this old man would surpass the Three Saints before long."

Step.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord watched Jeok Cheongang approach with careful steps and smiled faintly.

"That monk was right."

"Yes, he was. Thinking back on it now, I wonder if that monk had some trick for reading the heavenly patterns… but I'll never be able to find out. Do you know why?"

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord didn't answer. At the mention of reading the heavenly patterns, he had realized which bald monk Jeok Cheongang meant.

And Jeok Cheongang expected no answer.

"He's dead. Killed by you people of Dark Heaven."

"…Hong Dao, the Dharma King."

"If I'd been at Mount Jiuhua, I wouldn't have been this angry. There would've been nothing I could do about it."

But he hadn't been at Mount Jiuhua.

Hong Dao, the Dharma King and Jeok Cheongang's friend, had died at the Blood Lord's hands within the grounds of Shaolin Temple.

A place Jeok Cheongang could have reached in mere moments.

"That's how the monk died. By the time I got there, it was too late."

Jeok Cheongang had once been afraid.

Afraid that the damned infirmities of old age would return one day and erase even the last image of his dying friend. That they would make him forget the vow he had made while biting his lip until it bled.

"That day, I made a vow."

Step.

He took another step and went on.

“I swore I’d kill every last bastard bearing the name of Dark Heaven.”

Rumble, rumble.

The ground shook. The air boiled.

Energy hot enough to erase the very air—worthy of being called Extreme Yang, no, Extreme Flame—flowed from Jeok Cheongang’s entire body like lava.

It looked ready to swallow the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord at any moment.

“And today, I’ll send one more to the afterlife with my own hands.”

Five steps.

That was the distance between them, far too little to stand between either man and death.

“Save your last words for Yama[3399].”

At that moment—

Fap.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord pushed off with his foot. His body vanished. Nothing in his speed or movement suggested the man who, moments ago, had seemed to be waiting for death.

Shh-shing!

Jeok Cheongang reacted to the sound cutting past his ears.

Two rushes of air overlapped. No—three.

“Hah!”

Paaang!

The azure dragon’s roar shook the battlefield, the internal energy carried in Jeok Cheongang’s shout bursting the compressed air.

At the same time, two streaks of light shot toward Jeok Cheongang’s back as if guided by an invisible hand—then were knocked away.

They were the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord’s two swords, pulled toward him by the power of his Middle Dantian. Jeok Cheongang drew up energy from throughout his body, gathered it in both hands, and swung upward as though scooping from below.

Toward the sky above him. Toward the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, falling like a meteor.

Whoom.

Two currents of white energy, unmistakably alike yet astonishingly different, rushed toward each other.

[3399] Yama is the lord who judges the dead in Buddhist tradition.

To the two men, they moved slower than an ant. To everyone else, they moved too fast to see.

And the moment the two monsters struck with both palms, each using all his strength—

Kaaaang!

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

A blinding flash filled everyone's vision. A vast, terrifying force unlike anything before it burst outward, spreading in every direction. It swelled until it swallowed the sprawling grand banquet hall, already turned into a battlefield.

Whooosh.

The darkness disappeared. So did the unsteady torchlight, the people driving blue blades into their enemies, and the angry shouts they had been roaring.

No—more precisely, the flash and roar had blinded and deafened everyone for an instant.

…!

…!!

A white world where nothing could be seen or heard.

Those trapped within it forgot friend and foe alike, frozen in confusion. Only a tiny handful were exceptions.

Papapat!

Jeok Cheongang and the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord charged at each other without pause.

Moving faster than sound, they deflected each other's attacks, countered, and charged again.

To the rest of the world, it all lasted but an instant. To these superhumans, who had cast off the limits of humanity, it was different.

In time that seemed to have stopped, they fought hundreds of exchanges and faced dozens of close calls, until at last they reached the end of their seemingly endless life-and-death duel.

Thwack!

Bone and flesh crushed, and one figure staggered.

But the fist piercing his chest and protruding from his back, wreathed in white flame, would not even let him fall.

"Truly… truly remarkable…"

His voice trailed off, drained of strength.

In Jeok Cheongang's deeply sunken eyes, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's shattered arms hung limp.

"If Yama[3400] asks why you died…"

[3400] Yama is the lord who judges the dead in Buddhist tradition.

Shunk.

Jeok Cheongang slowly pulled his fist free. Only then did the Demon Lord's body begin to crumple.

"…Tell him a friend of that bald monk sent you."

Thud.

Jeok Cheongang silently looked down at the fallen Eastern Heaven Demon Lord. Not a trace of life remained in the corpse.

Then, just as he let out the breath he'd been holding and turned away—

Crack.

A cold pain that should not have been there, a pain he could not begin to understand, swept through his entire body.

Chapter 912

Everything happened in a flash.

Jeok Cheongang sensed the sinister energy flying at him from behind. Alarm bells rang in his mind, and he twisted away.

But even instinct, faster than reason, couldn't help him fully evade the strike.

Crunch.

Hot. And cold at the same time.

The two opposing pains began in his side and spread through his body like wildfire, bringing with them a question he could not answer.

"…!"

Jeok Cheongang looked down, his eyes trembling, at something buried halfway in his side.

It had crushed flesh and bone, severing the vital points and internal energy within him strand by strand. It was a white hand.

Pale as a corpse's—or rather, the hand of someone who should have been lying dead.

"How could you… how could you…"

Jeok Cheongang lifted his head, forcing the words out. Before him was a face he should never have seen again.

"You were clearly… dead."

The owner of the hand, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, replied.

"Yes, I was."

Then he added, his voice calm as if nothing had happened, his expression showing not a trace of pain:

"But who in this world can lose his one and only life twice?"

"…What?"

Jeok Cheongang stared at him, eyes wide, unable to make sense of it. Instead of an answer, icy energy burrowed into his body.

Danger!

It happened almost at the same time.

Powerful Palm Force drove deep inside him, and Jeok Cheongang twisted away in a flash.

But caught off guard by the first blow, he couldn't evade this one completely.

Boom!

Jeok Cheongang bit his lip as his vision dimmed for an instant.

Kh.

The pain was intense.

He felt the Body-Protecting Qi around him scatter like smoke, and his body shot backward.

Whoooosh!

His vision blurred. The sky and earth flipped over and over.

Someone screamed. Fragments of whatever his hurtling body had struck flew in every direction.

A blow like that would have taken even a Supreme Peak master out of the fight.

But he was the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

Crack! Bang!

He twisted in midair, righted himself, and landed on his feet.

Jeok Cheongang carved a deep furrow several jang[3401] long into the ground, absorbing the remaining force. Then his body suddenly staggered.

Hack.

Dark red blood spilled from between his lips.

Unable to hold back the congested blood that had risen with his internal injuries, Jeok Cheongang spat it out. That was when a faint whistle reached his ears.

Whoosh.

He couldn’t see it. But he could feel it.

A strike plunging toward his head. The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord reaching out with a hand that shone an icy, glacial white.

Picturing the scene half a beat before it happened, Jeok Cheongang pushed off the ground.

Shwaaack! Boom!

In that sliver of an instant, the strike narrowly missed him. It cleaved through the ground like tofu, then exploded, leaving a huge crater.

A few Embroidered Uniform Guards nearby were unlucky enough to be swallowed up by it.

But the predator’s pursuit didn’t end when it missed its prey.

Swish.

The movement was as smooth as a snake’s.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord rose from the crater and stepped toward the retreating Jeok Cheongang.

Papap!

In an instant, he closed the distance between them. A dazzling, icy white light burst from his fingertips.

Fwoosh.

[3401] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Jeok Cheongang watched that brilliant, dreadful light swell and swallow the darkness. He gritted his teeth.

Crack.

A faint pain, then the taste of blood in his mouth.

At last his blurred vision came into focus. His dulled senses returned, making the pain from his internal injuries sharper, but he paid it no mind. He drew up the internal energy throughout his body.

Wooooong.

The air, chilled moments ago, grew hot. His torn meridians screamed.

The fire dragon inside him writhed violently, barely under his control.

As if it would burn even its master's body.

As if it would devour everything and reduce it to ashes.

And yet—

"I don't know what strange power brought you back to life."

Jeok Cheongang met the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's gaze without a flicker of hesitation. His voice burned like lava as he went on.

"But I'll put an end to that stubborn life of yours."

Even if he had to do it dozens, hundreds of times.

His closed lips held back the words he left unsaid. They could not hold back the several jiazi[3402] of Scorching Yang Qi surging through his body, setting every limb and meridian ablaze.

KWAOOOOO!

Amid a roar like a dragon's, light-flames and white light shot toward each other. At last, they collided.

At the center of that space, warped by an energy beyond anything seen before, they swallowed even Jeong Hogun's scream-like order to retreat.

Fwoosh.

And in the blinding flash that filled his vision, Jeok Cheongang heard a voice.

"Old Master!"

The next moment—

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

The entire world—the sky and the earth—shook.

There are moments when it feels as if the world has stopped.

When the shock and roar shaking everything around you numb every sense.

That was how it felt to me right then.

[3402] A jiazi is a sixty-year cycle in the traditional East Asian calendar.

"…!"

If the sun fell from the sky and landed right in front of you, would it feel like this?

Blinded and deafened by the flash and roar, all I could do was protect the people nearby as best I could from the enormous force about to hit us.

"Get down, ri—!"

I had no idea whether my frantic shout reached the Fire Dragon Pavilion members, or whether they'd dropped to the ground when they heard it.

I knew only one thing for certain: if they'd hesitated for even a moment, not one of them would still be on their feet.

KWAaaaaa!

Rrrrcrack!

The raging gale shoved me back. The ground heaved like a volcanic field, and bluestone broke into dozens, hundreds of fragments that flew in every direction like hidden weapons.

The corpses of those already dead went with them, along with the countless weapons that had lain scattered around like their gravestones.

Sh-sh-sh-shik! Thud!

"Aaargh!"

Someone's blood and screams scattered on the wind.

But I drove both feet deep into the ground and took the shock wave with my whole body.

Squeezing out what little internal energy I had left, I knocked aside or cut down everything flying toward us.

Pit-pit!

Even when small, thin fragments of blades and bluestone swept in with the gale and grazed me all over, I didn't care.

If I dodge, the others will get hurt.

If someone had to be hurt, it was a hundred, a thousand times better for that someone to be me.

Old Master must have felt the same way.

I'd seen him clearly at the last moment.

He'd heard my shout and suddenly shifted to block the direction we were heading.

KWAaaaaa…

How much time passed?

After what felt like an eternity, the roar and the shock began to fade.

One by one, the things the wind had hurled into the air fell back down. Sounds that had gone muffled for a moment began to reach my ears again.

"Ungh…"

"P-please. Save me…"

The groans of people from both sides, fallen in a tangled heap. Someone begging for their life.

And finally, familiar voices behind me.

“Is everyone—everyone all right?”

“Cough. I’m fine.”

“Taishan gritted his teeth and held on by thinking about two hundred plates of five-spice pork.”

“I’m really sorry to ask at a time like this, but can someone break that bastard’s teeth?”

I wanted to answer Namho, but my strength had given out. Even that was difficult.

I staggered, and two people hurried over to grab my arms.

“Benefactor—no, Young Master Jin—no, Pavilion Master.”

“Captain, are you all right?”

I told Ju Hwaran to pick one form of address and stick to it. Then I gave Hyuk Mujin a long look that meant, Do I look all right to you?

Only then did I see the undead army climbing over the stone wall several dozen jang[3403] away.

The Imperial Guards, who had changed sides to avoid being branded traitors, were now falling in droves as the monsters that had appeared out of nowhere tore into them.

Damn it. Maybe I should’ve lured them here after all.

I couldn’t help wondering whether we might have done some damage to them if I had. But there was no telling how it would have turned out.

Those things were undead, plain and simple.

Monsters that got back up even with their arms and legs torn off or their chests pierced.

But the word monster wasn’t reserved for things with grotesque appearances or strange powers.

People used it for anything that defied common sense.

And the man known as the Fire King belonged in that category, too.

Papap!

I pushed Hyuk Mujin aside when he tried to stop me and hurried toward Jeok Cheongang as fast as I could.

No—I tried to.

If not for the one thing Jeok Cheongang said next.

“Stand back.”

His voice was deeper than usual.

[3403] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten ja, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

His entire body was covered in blood and soot, but he kept his eyes fixed ahead without even glancing at me, though I stood a few steps behind him.

At the lone figure standing beyond the slowly settling dust cloud.

And right then—

Fwoosh.

A breeze blew from somewhere, sweeping away the dust cloud. Beyond it, the figure came into view, walking slowly over countless corpses and pools of blood.

"…!"

I caught my breath without meaning to. Only then did I understand.

Why Jeok Cheongang had told me to stand back.

And why I hadn't sensed even the slightest sign of life from someone who, for a moment, had been right beside us.

"Impressive, Fire King Jeok Cheongang. Truly impressive."

Squish.

With each step, blood that had pooled to his ankles sprayed in every direction.

Arms and legs that had belonged to someone unknown bobbed in the blood as it pushed them along.

Yet none of it was as chilling as that thing.

"I very nearly died, you know."

Crackle. Sizzle.

The flames were still burning his face. Beneath it, the only part that had kept its shape—his lips—curved into a gentle smile.

Cang Gong—the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord—or rather, the man who could no longer be called human, was smiling.

Melted skin left the bones beneath it plainly exposed.

In a state that would have killed anyone made of flesh and blood several times over, he looked at Jeok Cheongang, then at me, frozen behind Jeok Cheongang's shoulder.

And then he spoke.

"You two seem very close, master and disciple. Don't you think?"

At that moment, a voice I'd thought I would never hear again reached my ears.

"Yes, Master."

"You're late."

"Forgive me. Your unworthy Disciple's training wasn't sufficient."

Another figure staggered to his feet as he answered.

Ma Sanbao pulled out the short spear I'd driven deep into his body and came toward us. Jeok Cheongang muttered:

"Master?"

“Why? Is that strange?”

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord stepped forward and continued:

“I once had a sect, too. A Master who became a parent to me, and countless Senior and Junior Brothers who became my family.”

“…You bastard. Don’t tell me…”

“But they all died. They bled and fell defending their sect’s home against an oppression that made no sense.”

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord slowly turned his head. At the end of his empty gaze sat the Emperor, on a tall, ornate throne.

No—what lay there was a past long gone.

“Under the pretext of moving the capital, I had to lose them all.”

“…!”

“…!”

At that moment, I realized who he really was. Before he became the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord of Dark Heaven, before he became Cang Gong of the East Depot, where had he belonged?

Jeok Cheongang realized it, too.

“…The Maoshan Sect.”

The words slipped from his lips like a groan.

Crick. Crrrick.

At last, the army of the dead breached the stone wall and poured into the grand banquet hall.

Chapter 913

A sea of corpses and blood.

There was no other way to describe it.

Everywhere the eye could see, corpses lay strewn about and blood ran in overflowing streams.

This vast space had been built for imperial celebrations. Today, it was a battlefield where countless people killed and died. The Embroidered Uniform Guard under Jeong Hogun had finally put down most of the traitors, but they had no chance to savor their victory.

Instead, they stood back-to-back, afraid.

Their battle wasn't over.

Now they faced monsters far beyond the bounds of common sense.

Grrk. Grrrr.

A terrible stench smothered even the thick smell of blood.

Jeok Cheongang stood back-to-back with Jin Taekyung, watching the creatures surround them and let out cries no one could understand. Then he spoke.

"Let me ask you one thing."

"You can ask me as many things as you want for three days straight."

Jin Taekyung spat out the blood pooling in his mouth, picked up a spear and sword lying on the ground, and added:

"If those bastards are willing to wait that long, of course."

Of course, Jin Taekyung knew there was no chance of that happening.

Everyone's thinking the same thing.

The faces of the Fire Dragon Pavilion members and the Embroidered Uniform Guards, now standing back-to-back in a circle, showed the same feelings swirling inside him. And then Jeok Cheongang's subdued voice came from behind him, tense in a way he couldn't hide.

"The realm of immortals… Your homeland. Does it have things like those?"

Jin Taekyung answered without hesitation.

"Of course. Tons of them."

"Tons? Just how many?"

"Uh, Old Master, how many meals do you think Taishan's eaten in his life?"

"An awful lot, I'd imagine. Too many to count."

"I think so, too. Now imagine at least dozens—no, hundreds of times that many."

Understanding dawned, and Jeok Cheongang sighed.

"Fuck, that's a lot."

"Yeah. A fucking lot. Some lunatic must've accounted for different tastes, too, because there are all kinds."

"Damn it. That's no realm of immortals. It's the Demon Realm."

"Oh, that's a separate place. I think I told you about it before."

"…For fuck's sake. What kind of world is that?"

"What kind? A shitty one. But you know what?"

"What?"

"This place seems to be getting just as shitty as my homeland."

Jeok Cheongang was silent for a moment after Jin Taekyung answered. Then he spoke.

"Yes," he said at last. "I think so, too. I suppose I've lived too long, to see a miserable sight like this."

"Why say you've lived too long? Don't jinx it."

"Enough with the pointless worrying. I plan to live another fifty years."

"That's much better. Yeah. You'd better."

Jin Taekyung tried to sound cheerful, but a great weight had settled in his chest.

Damn it.

He silently surveyed the area. Familiar and unfamiliar faces alike filled his vision.

On every face, the whirlpool of complicated emotions they were feeling showed plainly.

Tension. Shock. Fear.

And a handful of courage, drawn with difficulty from beneath it all.

How many of them will make it out alive?

Jin Taekyung forced himself to erase the ominous question that had suddenly crossed his mind. Right now, keeping his attention on the enemy was all he could manage.

"I have waited a very long time for this day."

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord stood tall at the head and center of the army of the dead encircling the battlefield. He spoke slowly.

To everyone there.

No—to the Emperor.

"Today, in this very place, the Great Nation will cease to exist."

At that moment—

Shhhhh.

An inexplicable chill spread through the air.

Pale energy flowed from the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's entire body, seeping like smoke across the battlefield.

No. It was swallowing the battlefield whole.

A bell in his hand rang, and the energy moved to its rhythm.

Jingle.

The eerie chime rang clear, yet it reached the mind rather than the ears. It was more like a wave of energy than an ordinary sound.

Most people lacked the martial arts realm to make sense of it.

But that same wave was raising those who no longer lived.

By the time Jin Taekyung realized what was happening, he was already too late.

Thump.

“Old Master!”

“Stop.”

Jeok Cheongang grabbed Jin Taekyung by the shoulder as he was about to shoot toward the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, and continued in a sunken voice:

“It’s already too late.”

“…!”

Jin Taekyung’s eyes widened. The change that followed showed him what Jeok Cheongang meant.

Crick. Crrick.

The ground trembled. As the vibrations grew stronger, the pools of blood rippled and the air turned cold.

No. That’s not it.

Jin Taekyung swallowed a gasp. His trembling gaze fixed on the nameless corpse at his feet, which had begun to stir.

It isn’t the ground… It’s the corpses.

The thousands of corpses covering the battlefield were waking.

Returning to the world of the living, where they no longer belonged. Becoming something other than human.

“Hh…!”

“W-what is this?”

“Strike before they—before those monsters get up! Hurry!”

Thwack! Slice!

The air grew colder, and fear spread with it.

Spears and swords struck the corpses in a frenzy, but they would not stay down.

Amid the chaos, Jeok Cheongang remembered the legends of the Maoshan Sect, erased from Murim long ago. He looked at his Disciple.

“What do you call things like this where you live?”

Crunch!

Jin Taekyung stamped on the corpse beneath his foot and answered through gritted teeth.

"Undead."

Grrr…

A corpse with its throat split open lifted its head from a pool of blood. Jin Taekyung had crushed its spine, yet it still struggled to rise.

"They're monsters that aren't dead, but aren't alive, either."

Jeok Cheongang nodded.

The pronunciation was unfamiliar, but the meaning was similar.

Among all the sects and martial families under Heaven, only the Maoshan Sect had preserved tales of such monsters. Undead described them perfectly.

Monsters that aren't dead, but aren't alive, either.

When Jeok Cheongang had first heard those tales, he had dismissed them as nonsense invented by idle gossips.

It was simply impossible.

It defied the natural order ordained by Heaven—an utterly bizarre legend.

But now, that was no longer the case.

The unbelievable legend was before his eyes.

"…Jiangshi."

Jeok Cheongang murmured the word like a groan and reached toward the corpse twitching as it rose.

Fwoosh. Boom!

Despite his serious Internal Injury, his light-flames burst forth without dimming in the slightest. They ate through the flesh of the thing that had returned from beyond the river of death, burning its bones and organs.

Psssh. Splash.

Jeok Cheongang stamped on the remains as they crumbled to ash and dissolved into the pool of blood. Then he turned to his Disciple.

"What under Heaven could survive the Fire Gate Clan's flames?"

"…!"

"Burn them without end. If they won't die, burn them to ash until they do. Just as our sect's ancestors did."

Jin Taekyung stared at Jeok Cheongang with wide eyes, then replied with a deliberately serious expression:

"How did you know? That's exactly what I'm best at."

Master and Disciple smiled at each other at the same time.

Then they charged the corpses surging in from every direction.

One streak of flame. No—two.

The eerie bell kept ringing.

Jingle. Jingle.

KWAAAAH!

It was a clash between the dead and the living, like watching a boulder fall toward an egg.

GRAAAH!

Undead. Jiangshi.

Or perhaps something else entirely. The corpses shot toward the surviving humans from every direction, sharp and fast as spikes.

They weren't stiff or slow like jiangshi, nor were they weak like undead.

That was what made them so formidable.

Crunch!

"Hold the line!"

"For His Majesty the Emperor—!"

Clang! Slice!

Their cries of loyalty vanished beneath the din.

Thousands of corpses crashed into the humans' shieldlike circle. They moved as nimbly as they had in life, and their souls, caught by the sound of the bell, no longer feared injury or death.

Crunch!

"Aaagh!"

Crimson blood spurted like a fountain. Every scream wrenched from someone's lungs belonged to the living.

Sword Energy severed arms, cut through legs, and pierced chests. Still the dead rose and advanced, breaking down the human formation little by little.

They followed the bell as it rang faster and sharper, carrying out their master's command.

Jingle, jingle.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord walked forward slowly. Hundreds of the dead followed him, Ma Sanbao among them. At the end of their path rose a high dais.

No—the Emperor stood there.

"When the long and fierce age of warring heroes was drawing to a close, I was only thirteen."

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord spoke in a singsong voice. His gray gaze drifted to the young king trembling beside the Emperor.

A boy barely in his early teens.

Even he, an old man and a monster who had ceased to be human, had once been called a boy.

“I was a sinner from the moment I was born. A sinner guilty of being born in an age of chaos—a sin that could never be washed away.”

The day his father, an ordinary farmer, and his two older brothers, both still in their teens, were dragged off to the battlefield, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord learned something for the first time.

Misfortune did not come only to those who had sinned.

Having no wealth, no strength, and no spear or sword with which to fight back was itself a crime.

“And yet the rulers who sent innocent people before spears and swords were not sinners. They were Heaven itself. Thousands, tens of thousands, died on battlefields of their making while they filled their bellies with rice and meat.”

The last blaze of that age of chaos was spectacular. Men who proclaimed themselves kings and Sons of Heaven fought hardest at the edge of the precipice.

Among the countless lives reduced to ash in that blaze were the young Eastern Heaven Demon Lord’s father and two older brothers.

And his mother, raped and killed after she resisted the soldiers who came to conscript her thirteen-year-old son.

From that day on, the boy did not cry.

Even a year later, after the final victor—who had ended the age of chaos with the sharpest and strongest spears and swords—ascended the throne.

Not when a Daoist recognized the wandering boy’s aptitude, took him as a Disciple, and brought him into his sect.

There, he met his Master and came to know his Senior and Junior Brothers.

At the Maoshan Sect, he found laughter instead of tears. Happiness.

And within a few years, that happiness ended.

“Did you know?”

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord stopped walking. Then he asked his enemy’s descendant, who was looking down at him from hundreds of steps above:

“What your grandfather, Taizu, did to us?”

Jingle.

Chapter 914

Jingle.

At the clear chime, which seemed to ring inside his head, the Emperor was suddenly seized by a splitting headache.

The Maoshan Sect.

The name remained in his memory, however faintly.

He and every other prince had studied the art of ruling. They were expected to know the history of the Great Nation and the imperial family inside and out.

That history included the Maoshan Sect—or, more precisely, the event known as the “Maoshan Rebellion.”

> Third year of Pyeongjeong.
>
> When His Majesty Taizu declared Nanjing in Jiangsu the Imperial Capital, the treasonous Maoshan rebels opposed the decision, rallied their forces, and rose against him.

The court historians had given the event only a brief mention, but its repercussions had been considerable.

It was an open revolt against the first Emperor, who had emerged from the long, fierce age of warring heroes as the continent’s final victor and established himself as an absolute ruler with boundless power.

That was why he’d been more merciless than ever.

Taizu, founder of the unified dynasty, was as cruel as he was great.

The day the imperial court received word that the Maoshan Sect, facing the loss of its ancestral home after generations of inhabiting it, had gathered its forces to oppose the relocation of the capital, Taizu immediately ordered his troops to march.

Three days later, it had disappeared from the world.

The mountain they had risked their lives to protect was engulfed in flames. Everything connected to the three characters that spelled Maoshan Sect was hacked apart by wave after wave of soldiers and thrown onto the pyres.

Humans and livestock alike.

The living and the dead alike.

But…

The records were wrong. Someone survived.

The Emperor endured the pain stabbing through his skull and looked down the seemingly endless flight of stairs.

There stood the Maoshan Sect's last surviving root, gazing back at him. He had endured through the ages for this day alone, his eyes burning with the hatred of a man who had never once forgotten his grudge.

"I've always wondered why you wanted to destroy the imperial family and the Great Nation."

The Emperor slowly rose from his throne. The hem of his long, ornate dragon robe brushed the ground.

Swish.

He walked forward at an unhurried pace. Baek Yeon, standing beside him, blocked his path with a rigid expression, but the Emperor did not stop.

Step. Step.

One step. Then another.

The Emperor descended the stairs carpeted in crimson silk. The two men who had once been bound as ruler and subject drew closer to each other.

Then the Emperor stopped halfway down, and a quiet voice slipped through his cracked lips.

"So you betrayed the late Emperor—my father?"

"Betrayed?"

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord laughed aloud at the abrupt question, though his monstrous face was twisted into anything but a smile.

"Who betrayed whom? I never gave you bastards my loyalty for even a single moment."

He had waited a very long time for this day.

How many nights had he lain awake, reliving his sense of betrayal and his thirst for revenge?

How many buckets of blood had he spilled mastering the martial arts manuals his Master had entrusted to him as the sect faced destruction?

The boy had chosen to become a eunuch as the surest way to bring down the impregnable fortress of the Great Nation. Then, one day after he had grown into a young man, an unwelcome visitor appeared with an offer.

"I bring you the words of the almighty and great Lord of Heaven."

And that day, the young man joined the demonic army.

"Do you still not understand?"

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord stared at the Emperor with cold, gray eyes.

"You're not the ones who were betrayed."

His father had often said that an age of peace and prosperity would come someday. His two older brothers had been dragged off to the battlefield as though they were captives, yet they had promised to return alive.

And their mother, who had lost her husband and two sons, had believed that at least her youngest boy—far too young to be on his own—would survive.

But she had been wrong.

Every last one of their hopes had been betrayed.

The boy had lost his entire family and barely survived a battlefield he'd been forced onto. Then the second happiness that had found him, almost like a miracle, was stolen away as well.

"You betrayed me first."

All of them.

"No—the whole world."

Jingle.

"You betrayed it."

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's voice and gaze, both cold until now, seethed like molten lava.

As he saw it, he was the one who had been betrayed first. The common people had been betrayed. The whole world had been betrayed.

He had lost his family to the struggles of men dreaming of becoming kings and ministers. His Master and fellow disciples, who had become another family to him, had been hacked apart by countless spears and swords.

And there had been only one reason.

They had tried to protect the home passed down to them through generations, defying Taizu's decree that no martial artists could live near the Imperial Capital.

That was all.

"That is why you must die."

In the most miserable, most horrific way possible.

"For that one wish alone, I have endured and waited all this time."

It had taken many years for the boy to become a young man, the young man to become middle-aged, and finally for his hair to turn white. But those years had not been wasted.

The mask of Cang Gong that the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord wore was magnificent and powerful.

The East Depot's intelligence network stretched across the world, and few among the civil and military officials who upheld the Great Nation had no connection to him.

As both the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord and Cang Gong, he was second in power only to the Emperor.

He might not have worn a dragon robe, but he was another absolute ruler—second to one, above all others. Most of the court lay in his grasp.

Even the imperial family.

"I—or rather, we are…"

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's voice boiled as he spoke to the Emperor looking down at him.

"The Great Nation."

"…!"

"…!"

The air around them froze. At the same time, the worn bell in the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's hand began to tremble wildly.

Jingle. Jingle. Jingle.

Sound like the wailing of ghosts spread in every direction.

Louder. Farther.

It crossed the vast banquet hall and reached the stone walls covered in the bodies of the Imperial Guards.

It was loud enough to raise those who already lay there in a pitiful state from the dead.

GRAAAH!

A roar that chilled the spine alone shook the night air. The monsters, now more ferocious and powerful, advanced in response to the sound waves ringing through their minds.

Toward the towering stairs. Toward the Emperor standing at their center.

And at the head of that surging wave of the dead was the man who had waited for this day alone.

"Now, let's see it through to the end."

He muttered the words as though making a vow to himself, then took a step.

No—he was about to shoot forward and tear the Emperor to pieces.

Then a voice pierced his ear.

"Stop."

"…!"

"I know what you're trying to do, but you'd better leave it at that."

Hummm.

The air shuddered.

There was clearly only one speaker, yet the voice came from several directions.

Six-Harmonies Voice Transmission—a technique even a Supreme Peak master would scarcely dare attempt.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord felt the terrifying internal energy behind it and bit down on his lip.

He remembered his bitter defeat more than a decade ago and fixed his gaze on the woman looking down at him from just behind the Emperor's shoulder.

So Gyo.

On the surface, she looked like nothing more than a beautiful, graceful woman. But he had suffered a crushing defeat once before because of her intervention. He knew exactly how much power was contained in that slender body.

He knew how much he himself had grown in the years since, too.

But there was one thing he still had no way of knowing.

“Who the hell are you, woman?”

So Gyo’s image was reflected in his darkened eyes.

An unknown superhuman whose identity had eluded even the intelligence networks of Dark Heaven and the East Depot.

The greatest enemy of his life, who had appeared without warning one day and left wounds on his body and soul that would never heal.

The grave Internal Injury she had inflicted on him had never healed, forcing him to turn himself into a jiangshi. Even now, he could not be sure who So Gyo was.

“Answer me. Who are you?”

If she were an agent of the orthodox faction, she would not have stood by while matters reached this point. If she were a master secretly raised by the imperial family, she should have appeared to stop him long ago.

But So Gyo was neither.

Gripping a weapon resembling a curved saber in each hand, she looked straight at him, her gaze untroubled.

She had cast off the black clothing that had once covered her from head to toe and freely released the immense power she had kept confined within her body.

Fwoooosh.

It was unmistakable. Overwhelming.

An unprecedented energy took visible form, rising in fine strands from all over So Gyo’s body. Her calm voice, at odds with the situation, rang out from all six directions.

“Well, I have my own circumstances, just like you do. I’m not sure I should tell you for free…”

Step.

She walked forward slowly, and her gaze turned cold.

“If you bite down on a sword and kill yourself right now, I might think about telling you.”

“…!”

“Oh. Would that not kill you anymore?”

Crack.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord clenched his teeth without realizing it. But having stopped, he found it difficult to take another step.

Why?

By now, he had achieved Great Completion in all of his sect's supreme techniques.

The Maoshan Sect's arts might have focused on sorcery, including the art of controlling jiangshi, but he had made even death his own and become a superhuman in a different sense.

And yet…

She's dangerous.

He knew it instinctively. If he moved carelessly now, So Gyo would get the better of him.

Even though he could no longer die or feel pain, his Qi Sense kept sending him warning after warning.

"Master."

His Disciple Ma Sanbao's low voice reached his ear, but the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord did not move. He stared at So Gyo without a word.

The aura he felt from her now was on a level with the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

Considering the full strength at his disposal, he still had a good chance of winning, even with the Emperor, Baek Yeon, and the Emperor's hidden guards against him.

Strictly speaking, he judged his own martial prowess to be half a step below the Fire King's or So Gyo's. But he and every soldier under his command possessed such horrifying tenacity that they could keep attacking as though each strike were meant to take their own lives along with the enemy's.

Even if their arms and legs were cut off, even if their chests were pierced, they would not stop.

Not until every living person had fallen.

Not until their enemies' bodies and the blood flowing through them had gone cold as ice.

If I capture the Emperor and Prince Shangshan—or kill that woman—this will all be over.

The battle to the death was not taking place in this hall alone. By now, the armies of the Great Nation, divided into two, would be fighting a bloody battle around the imperial capital, and his side would win.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord opened his tightly shut mouth.

"Go."

Jingle.

The worn bell, a divine artifact of the Maoshan Sect, gave a strange chime.

Rumble!

More than a thousand of the dead—the Great Nation's elite soldiers, once known as the Imperial Guards—charged across the banquet hall.

GRAAAAH!

As the shrieking army surged forward like a wave, two streaks of light burst toward it.

Shwaaah!

Brilliant light flashed.

At the same time, the overwhelming Force unleashed by Baek Yeon and So Gyo, the two superhumans who had stepped in front of the Emperor, crushed and smashed the flesh and bones of the dead.

CRUNCH!

The vanguard was pulverized in an instant. But the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord knew what the two of them could do and was not the least bit surprised.

I expected this.

Humans were made of flesh and blood, and all were fated to die.

Even those called superhuman had limits. Their limits might be far beyond those of ordinary people, but they were human limits all the same.

I'll wait for an opening and kill them in one strike.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord moved forward, his gaze dark. With his Disciple Ma Sanbao on one side and a master of the Twelve Palaces of the Zodiac, returned from the dead, on the other, he climbed the stairs now covered in rotten blood and shattered corpses.

Splash.

And at that very moment—

"Are you busy right now?"

The voice came from some distance behind him.

Only then did he realize that the howls of his followers, which had been ringing out far away, were beginning to die down.

Perhaps the limits he had assigned to superhumans were higher than he thought.

Swish.

He turned, his face rigid, and saw two men he had not expected to meet again so soon.

"Hey, ugly-ass big bro. If you're not too busy, make some time for me."

"Indeed. This old man will take very good care of you."

Jeok Cheongang and Jin Taekyung stood there looking like men drenched in blood. They bared their white teeth and grinned.

They looked so much alike.

Chapter 915

"You got here fast. Much faster than I expected."

After a brief silence, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord spoke again, his gaze dark.

"Which means you'll die all the sooner."

His cold gray eyes moved between Jeok Cheongang and me—or, more precisely, over the wounds covering us from head to toe.

Damn. He's sharp as hell.

The smile I'd forced onto my face faded. I tried to ignore the pain coming from every part of my body and lowered my stance.

Jiangshi.[3404] Or undead.

I couldn't even decide what to call those things, let alone remember how many I'd taken down. I'd fought the monsters pouring in without end, then fought some more.

I swung anything I could get my hands on. When there was nothing to swing, I smashed them with my fists and feet.

If they'd been ordinary humans, it wouldn't have been this hard.

But they weren't.

Attacks that should have killed a person in one blow had to be delivered at least three or four times before one of these things could no longer fight.

It would've been a lot easier if I'd had enough internal energy…

Jeok Cheongang and I had both used up a considerable amount in the fighting. The Extreme Yang Scorching Yang Qi accumulated through the Fire Gate Clan's secret cultivation technique was the natural opposite of the death energy within the corpses, but we couldn't draw on it without limit.

Especially with an enemy as powerful as the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord still ahead of us.

"You both look exhausted. Why don't you turn back now, while you still can?"

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord glanced over our shoulders.

"Before everyone you left behind is dead."

Clench.

My grip tightened around the spear before I realized it. He'd struck a nerve because he was right.

Jeok Cheongang and I had broken through one section of the encirclement to reach him, but plenty of monsters remained behind us. The Embroidered Uniform Guard led by Jeong Hogun and the Fire Dragon Pavilion members were fighting with everything they had.

[3404] A jiangshi is a reanimated corpse in Chinese folklore, often depicted moving by hopping.

They numbered far less than half the enemy. And the enemy were genuine monsters that neither tired nor died easily.

Even so, we'd had to leave them behind. We'd judged this our only chance.

This battle won't end unless we take out the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord.

He'd raised the dead twice already. Nothing said he couldn't do it a third or fourth time.

And if that happened…

We'd die. All of us.

As time passed, our allies would die and the enemy would multiply. Reinforcements wouldn't change that, even if they arrived—and I didn't know when they might come, or whether the Emperor had prepared any at all.

But if we take out their leader, that changes things.

I'd lived as a Hunter before I ever became a Murim martial artist. I knew the fastest, most effective way to bring down an undead army was to eliminate the Lich who'd raised it.

The problem was time.

Fifteen minutes at most.

We had to take him down within that time. Any longer, and the gap Jeok Cheongang and I had left would be filled with our allies' corpses.

The result would be the same if the other front, where So Gyo and Baek Yeon were holding the line, collapsed. Defeating the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord before the balance between those two fronts tipped was the only way out.

But…

Can we do it? In that little time?

I couldn't shake the sudden doubt. I didn't know if we'd made the right choice.

Maybe the best we could do was save Prince Shangshan and the Fire Dragon Pavilion members and escape this damn imperial palace. Maybe surviving—even if that was all we managed—was the right answer. The thought pierced me like an awl.

GRAAAH!

Clang! Cough!

The roars behind me that I'd tried to ignore came through clearly now, along with people's screams and the clash of blades. The sounds kept tearing through my thoughts.

Damn it.

I swallowed the curse rising to my lips and gripped the spear shaft until my hand felt ready to burst.

—You can do it.

"…!"

—Trust me.

Jeok Cheongang's Sound Transmission came as if he'd seen straight through my thoughts. To my surprise, my wavering heart grew calm.

That's right.

I can do this. No—I have to.

With the Old Master, with Jeok Cheongang, it's possible. Because I'm not alone. It's us.

Even if we're facing three Supreme Peak masters. Even if every one of them is a monster who's left humanity far behind.

I have to fight.

I have to take them down.

—Now!

At his forceful command, Jeok Cheongang and I stepped forward together.

Whoosh.

The distance vanished in an instant. As though we'd agreed on it long ago, we thrust out our palms.

Fwoosh! KABOOM!

A raging blaze devoured the air.

KABOOM!

It was unbearably hot. And terrifying.

As the fighting became a three-way battle, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord leaped clear of the flames. The situation brought a three-legged cauldron to mind.

Break even one leg, and the whole thing loses its balance.

The battle as a whole was certainly going his way.

So Gyo, the one he had to be most wary of, was tied down fighting well over a thousand monsters alongside Baek Yeon. The best the Embroidered Uniform Guard led by Jeong Hogun and the Fire Dragon Pavilion members could do was hold on.

But even among the three legs of a cauldron that would topple if any one of them broke, there was a most important leg.

That leg was the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord himself.

That's why they pushed themselves so hard to break through the encirclement.

Boom!

The first blow missed him. He evaded the second just as easily, calmly watching the two men charge.

They'd grasped the heart of the matter at once. Amid the chaos of fallen enemies and comrades rising again, they'd found his weakness.

But which of them had made the call—the Master or the Disciple?

Jeok Cheongang?

Or Jin Taekyung?

If it was the former, I'd expect nothing less of the Fire King. But if it was the latter... I see why that person wants him so badly.

Martial prowess far beyond his years. Composure that held in any situation, and the bold judgment to see straight to the heart of a battle.

The Great Nation's military, nearly a million strong, had plenty of fierce generals. Truly great commanders were rare.

Jin Taekyung had both qualities, though he was barely past twenty.

Does that person mean to have the boy fill the places left by the departed?

In the past few months, the Western Heaven Demon Lord and the Southern Heaven Demon Empress had died. Other powerful figures remained, himself among them, but the strength lost with those two had to be replaced somehow.

For his revenge. For the great undertaking still ahead.

And to the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, Jin Taekyung looked more than capable of filling the gap they'd left.

His Master, of course, could not be allowed to live.

Jingle.

The bell rang as the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord flowed away from another attack.

Golden Ox Palace responded at once. He had been commander-in-chief of the Imperial Guards and a Supreme Peak master of the Twelve Palaces of the Zodiac.

Whoosh!

A greatsword larger than most grown men cut through the air.

Jeok Cheongang, who had been pressing the retreating Eastern Heaven Demon Lord without pause, roared:

"How dare a bastard like you!"

At that moment—

Fwoosh! KABOOM!

The Force coating the greatsword, stronger than it had been in life, met the heat of the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

No. The flames swallowed it.

Crack. KABOOM!

A faint sound, like something splitting apart.

Unable to withstand the tremendous power, the Force shattered along with the greatsword. The flames melted the dozens of fragments even as they hurled them back at the wielder who had dared challenge the Fire King.

Papat! Thud!

More than ten blood-streaked shards drove into him like flashes of light, shattering flesh and bone as they lodged inside.

The impact shook Golden Ox Palace's body. The blood left within him gushed out like a fountain.

Splaaat!

Any physician in the land would have taken one look at his wounds and pronounced him dead on the spot.

But Golden Ox Palace was no longer human. He had a cursed tenacity that kept him moving, and a mission he had to carry out no matter how many times he died.

—Kill the Fire King.

His master's command had been driven deep into his emptied mind. Engraved there by the bell, that single mission lent strength to his staggering corpse and sent him charging forward, heedless of pain he could no longer remember.

Just as it did now.

GRAAAH!

With his whites showing and a roar that made anyone who heard it feel fear, the commander of the Imperial Guards, once called Golden Ox Palace, shot forward. His broken golden armor gleamed, proof of the fame he'd earned in life.

Whoosh!

The wind buckled. The space between them vanished.

Even when the flames in his path melted his armor and flesh together, he didn't stop. Like an enraged bull, true to the name Golden Ox Palace, he charged with all his might.

Toward one man.

The giant known as the Fire King.

He would serve as his master's shield and carry out the order to bring that giant down.

Tssss!

Force surged over the handspan of blade that remained of his greatsword.

But Jeok Cheongang's keen senses detected another attack closing in from an angle.

"…!"

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord.

As powerful as he was cunning, he had turned himself into a living monster to avenge his sect. Now he changed course and came at Jeok Cheongang like a flash of light, alongside the other monster charging heedlessly through the flames of the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

Damn it.

In the slowed world, conflict flickered across Jeok Cheongang's eyes.

Less than one jang[3405] separated them. It was too late to retreat.

Dodge?

If he succeeded, that would be best. But if he failed and suffered an even more serious injury…

I'll die. No question.

It wasn't his own life Jeok Cheongang was worried about.

His Disciple was fighting not far away. Exhausted as the boy was, he was still driving Ma Sanbao back. Jeok Cheongang could not have been prouder of him.

If this old man falls here, it's all over.

That was why he couldn't avoid the attack bearing down on him. He had no choice but to meet it.

Even if he suffered an injury he would never recover from, even if he died, he had to win this clash. He had to give those monsters a certain death they could never overcome.

Yes. Only then…

The boy would live.

Fwoosh.

In the slow-moving world, a single flame blossomed beautifully.

I'll kill you. I'll kill you until you die.

The Fire King Jeok Cheongang thrust out both arms, unleashing flames fiercer than ever before.

KABOOM!

A deafening blast and a flash that filled his vision set time moving again. Through that shuddering moment came a streak of swordlight and a familiar cry.

"Old Master!"

Thud!

Hot blood fell.

[3405] One jang is a traditional Korean measure of length equal to about 3.03 meters, or 9.94 ft.

Chapter 916

It happened in an instant.

In a sliver of time split and split again, it all began and ended like a passing flash of light.

Thnk!

Jeok Cheongang heard it clearly. He saw it, too.

A chilling sound of something being pierced reached his ears. At the same moment, something sticky splashed across his vision, staining it red.

Drip. Splaaash.

The world before him stopped.

Everything was red. The blood covering his face was hot.

And… it hurt.

More than anything ever had.

Why?

The hollow question that rose in his mind faded away.

No—perhaps it was Jeok Cheongang's consciousness that was fading.

His mind struggled to grasp a sight that should never have happened. Pain and emotion boiled up from his chest, driving him into a confusion and rage unlike anything he had ever known.

Slide.

He was falling. Tilting.

In the slowed world, a familiar figure was slowly flung away, his back to Jeok Cheongang as scarlet blood sprayed from him. The sight burned itself into Jeok Cheongang's wide-open eyes like a brand.

"…!"

The Fire King Jeok Cheongang understood. He accepted it.

Everything unbelievable unfolding before his eyes was real.

He understood what the second Disciple he had taken in late in life meant to him.

And that he was not the only one who felt this way.

Thump.

His hand reached out through time as it flowed slowly, supporting that familiar back.

It was firm and warm.

Like the heart of the Disciple who had thrown himself forward with all his might to save his Master. Like the blood spilling from his torn-open chest.

You foolish, foolish boy.

Jeok Cheongang had lived for well over a hundred years. Across the vast land, he had seen countless kinds of people, watched them rise and fall, and found the path he meant to walk among them.

He had walked it one step at a time, always decisive, never hesitant.

But even he did not know what to say now.

What could he say to the fearless fool who had thrown himself into Force in his Master's place? To the unfilial Disciple who dared to leave before his Master?

There was only one thing he knew he had to do.

He could not let the moment his Disciple had bought with his life go to waste. And he had to trust in the boy's stubborn vitality—the boy who had survived every kind of hell as if by miracle.

You have to survive. No matter what.

With that plea the boy could not hear, the old Master made the flames still burning in both hands flare fiercer.

Tssss.

The air burned. Moisture evaporated.

And within it, time began to move again.

At the end of that moment—

Fwoooosh!

A vast blaze swallowed even death.

Hummm.

Everyone saw it.

No—they took it in with all five senses.

They watched space warp in the terrible heat. Pain filled their muffled ears, and they trembled at the sudden terror borne on the scorching air and wind.

There was not a single exception.

The living and the dead alike.

Even the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, who had watched wide-eyed as So Gyo tirelessly cut down the charging monsters and Jin Taekyung fell spraying blood, felt a chill seize his spine.

No. It was heat, as though his insides were melting.

This…

He understood instinctively. This strike held something that internal energy alone could not explain.

The old Master's grief and rage had drawn out a power even he had not known lay dormant within him.

I'll die.

The fear of death awoke—a fear the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord had forgotten, one he had believed he would never feel again.

Killing intent, deeper and more terrible than what he had felt facing So Gyo over a decade ago, surged toward him.

Toward him and everyone else.

"Ru—"

And in that instant—

KABOOOOOM!

A tremendous roar swallowed his cry, and a pillar of white-hot fire shot forth.

CRACK! RRRRUMBLE!

The fire dragon thrashed, melting the ground and burning everything in its path.

Surging forward like a wave, it filled their vision and greedily devoured everything its enormous body touched. It burned and vaporized it all, as if determined not to leave a single drop of moisture behind.

Blades lying where their owners had dropped them. Impossibly hard bluestone. Even the soil and rock beneath it.

Even bodies that had once transcended death.

KABOOOOOM!

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord saw it clearly. He heard it without a doubt.

Golden Ox Palace, reborn as one of his followers—a Supreme Peak master formidable enough in life to be counted among the Twelve Palaces of the Zodiac—was engulfed in white flames.

And he heard his dying scream.

GRAAAAH!

Impossible. How could someone who no longer felt pain scream like that?

How could he writhe so desperately?

How…?

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord stared in shock. At the same time, he felt the Extreme Yang heat, fierce enough to burn away even his soul.

At its center, he saw one man's eyes glowing red.

"You shouldn't have touched my Disciple."

The Fire King Jeok Cheongang.

ROOOOAR!

The fire dragon roared loudly enough to shake the entire Imperial Capital. Hearing it, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord prepared to die and drew up every last scrap of strength he had.

He blamed the subordinate who had been so damned faithful to his orders that he couldn't stop, and blamed himself for bringing about the touch upon the reverse scale[3406] of the dragon called the Fire King.

But…

It isn't over yet.

Not his life. Not the revenge he had pursued for more than half a century.

Fwoooosh.

The deathly energy of the dead closed around the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's body. The flames breathed out by an old, weary dragon crashed over it.

KABOOOOOM!

I don't know.

How much time had passed. How much time I had left if I was going to die here.

My senses had dulled and my vision was blurred. Neither told me much.

The ground shook as if there'd been an earthquake. A roar kept pounding against my muffled ears.

And then there was the heat.

It was hot. My body lay sprawled beyond my control, but I could feel that heat more clearly than anything else.

Old Master's really pissed.

I wanted to cackle, but what slipped between my trembling lips was sticky, and it wasn't laughter.

Cough.

Blood. Dark red blood with little clots in it.

I felt around my mouth, touched something soft and squishy, and paused to wonder.

Was that my lip? Or a piece of my insides?

…Damn it. I know which.

I let out a small sigh.

It was sad that I could even say this, but it wasn't the first time.

One strange, almost galling thing was that I'd never been this badly injured back when I was an F-rank Hunter.

Of course, getting stronger is the only reason I'm still alive.

I scraped together enough strength to lift my head. Dust and ash filled the air. With the aftermath still hanging over everything, all I could see was my own body.

[3406] In Chinese lore, a dragon's reverse scale grows against the others. Touching it provokes the dragon's wrath.

Wounds covered me from head to toe.

And my chest… Force had torn through it, leaving flesh and bone horribly exposed.

Cough. Cough.

I coughed up blood again. This time it was darker still.

Proof that the sword strike I'd taken earlier had reached more than my flesh and bones. It had hit my internal organs, too.

That was insane.

Yeah. It had definitely been insane.

Something I wouldn't have done if I'd been thinking straight. No—even a reasonably crazy bastard wouldn't have dared try it.

But I did.

I had to.

How was I supposed to just watch?

If I hadn't thrown myself in at the last moment, even turning my back on Ma Sanbao, Jeok Cheongang would be lying here instead of me.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord wasn't just a sorcerer who commanded the dead. He was an incredibly skilled fighter, and even Jeok Cheongang couldn't have taken him and another Supreme Peak master at the same time.

Part of me had hoped it might work, though.

To the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, I wasn't just an enemy he had to bring down. I was someone the Lord of Heaven wanted.

So much for taking me alive. He just went and stabbed me.

I laughed, coughing up bloody foam.

I'd gambled my life and lost spectacularly.

Now here I was, sprawled like a corpse, feeling my senses slip away one by one as I waited to die.

But I could laugh because I was the only one who'd lost this gamble.

My life alone wouldn't decide the outcome of the much bigger gamble playing out on this battlefield.

Some would lose and pay with their lives. Others would win and survive.

I was one of the former. That was all.

Regrets?

I'd be lying if I said I had none.

But I knew the state of my body better than anyone. No—maybe what I felt was just human instinct.

Death.

I could see it.

The thing that had already taken a father from my family—the unwelcome visitor I'd narrowly avoided through every danger I'd faced—had finally come for me.

Even now, through my fading vision, a black shape seemed to waver amid the falling ash and dust.

Don't come.

I tried to squeeze out a voice with all my strength, but all that came from between my lips was a little blood and a ragged breath.

I didn't give up.

Clinging to a consciousness that seemed ready to go out at any moment, I swallowed the blood pooling in my mouth and forced myself to stay alert.

I was afraid. Of death.

Afraid of leaving everyone like this.

There was still so much I had to do. So many things I wanted to do with the people I loved and who loved me.

But, but why?

Why was that shadow coming closer to me?

Why wouldn't it stop walking, even now?

I wasn't ready yet. I didn't want to die like this.

Just a little longer. Even for the briefest moment.

Gasping for breath, I begged it to wait.

Even if it took me after that, I wanted time to say goodbye. I prayed desperately to see, just once more, the faces of the people whose lives had become bound to mine. My family.

I prayed to a god I had never seen.

No.

To the System.

"Please…"

And in the moment those words escaped me, wrung from the last of my strength—

Ding.

A clear chime that only I could hear rang out across the whole world.

Chapter 917

Fwoosh.

A fierce gale roared through the air. Layers of black ash that had piled up across the ground, along with embers that still hadn't gone out, rode the wind and scattered in every direction.

From within the pale haze that blocked everyone's view, a flame-wreathed fist cleaved through the air.

BOOM! KABOOOOOM!

Compressed air burst apart. White flames surged beyond the superheated air.

Nothing could stop that fire.

It was a dragon's breath, its roar, its rage beyond measure.

The old dragon's flames poured over the enemies who had dared touch his reverse scale, burning more fiercely than ever before.

Fiercely enough that someone who had become nearly immortal found himself thinking of death without realizing it.

Ah.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord let out a quiet groan.

His gray eyes, filled now with fear and awe, remained fixed on the man advancing through the flames he ceaselessly unleashed.

Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King.

Him.

Only him.

Of the ten Kings who had never reached that lofty heaven, the foremost—the Emperor of Fire—was finally spreading the wings he had kept hidden and soaring upward.

Toward the three stars adorning the heaven called the Martial God.

All while pouring out his rage at the enemies who had touched what they should never have touched.

Rumble.

A tremendous impact hammered the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's entire body.

The death energy surrounding him without a single gap shuddered beneath a palm strike of unprecedented power. His legs, driven into the ground with ten thousand geun[3407] of force, carved deep furrows as they slid backward.

BAM! BAM! KABOOM!

One advanced.

[3407] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (about 1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun is about 6,000 kg (13,000 lb).

The other could only retreat.

Jeok Cheongang was the former. The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord was the latter.

Like a sinner huddled beneath divine punishment, he dodged the thunderbolts that fell without pause.

How? How in the world…?

How could that exhausted body, already covered in wounds great and small, wield such strength?

How could he feel such rage?

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord swallowed the sigh rising to his lips.

Jeok Cheongang approached with an overwhelming aura, his anger so fierce the Demon Lord felt he could reach out and touch it. And he found that he understood.

He had felt the same.

BAM!

He had lost his family.

BAM!

He had lost his sect.

BAM!

When he thought he had lost everything, he discovered something still remained in a corner of his emptied heart.

Rage.

They said humans were human because they could feel joy, anger, sorrow, and pleasure.

They said living beings could laugh, rage, grieve, and take pleasure in life.

But the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord had lost three of those things.

With only rage remaining, he had finally given up being human and become a monster.

A monster called a vengeful spirit.

That was why, in one respect, he understood Jeok Cheongang—the heart of an old Master who had seen his Disciple on the brink of death.

He understood, too, the rage held within that mighty flame, which was trying to burn even the death energy he had summoned with all his might.

KABOOOOOM!

In that instant, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord felt it.

The death energy encircling him had finally reached its limit.

For this moment, Jeok Cheongang's rage had surpassed his own.

Crack.

The sound announcing a rift reached the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's ears. The energy that had poured ceaselessly from deep within his body was scattering.

At the starting point of that rift was a fist wreathed in pure white flames—and a pair of eyes pouring out stream after stream of fire and an even greater heat, flames that would bring down his last line of defense.

"Understand this clearly."

Jeok Cheongang's gaze seemed hot enough to turn anyone it met to ash.

"Understand what you've touched."

Yet his voice was as cold as the glaciers of the North Sea. It froze the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's spine and seeped into his soul.

It awakened the fear he had forgotten long ago, on the day he rose from death.

Hah.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord trembled despite himself. A hollow laugh escaped him.

And suddenly, he understood.

Perhaps the Three Saints… or even beyond.

At least for this moment, nothing could stop the old dragon's rage.

Nothing.

CRASH!

At last, the barrier split and shattered.

As everything surrounding him broke to pieces, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord thrust his fist toward the white flames flooding his vision.

Whoosh!

A movement faster than sound.

The dead clashed with the living.

In a world turned pure white, the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist advanced as if in slow motion and met the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's fist.

No.

It swept right through it.

BAM!

An instant of contact. A tremendous boom.

But the time their fists met was far too brief, and the balance of power had already tipped.

Crack.

Heat swallowed the scattered death energy and mangled his skin. It melted his acupoints and sinews, then shattered his bones.

The stronger body and regenerative powers the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord had gained by giving up his human life were useless.

KABOOOOOM!

Jeok Cheongang's fist was lava and lightning at once.

True to the name Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist, the flames he unleashed shot forward, reducing everything in their path to ash.

They swallowed the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's fist, then his entire arm.

Fwoosh. BOOM!

The flames erupted at their peak.

But no blood burst forth. There were no scraps of flesh, not even fragments of bone.

All of it had vaporized or turned to ash. It was gone beyond recovery unless time itself could be turned back.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord knew it better than anyone.

So did Jeok Cheongang.

Step.

Jeok Cheongang took a single stride, and the space between them folded.

Thrown backward like a misfired cannonball, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord gritted his teeth and twisted his body.

Crack. BAM!

A fist grazed his side—if pulverizing a handspan of flesh and bone could be called a graze—and slammed into the ground.

At the same time, a tremendous boom split the sky, and a massive crater opened in the earth.

A chill ran through the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord. He felt as though every hair on his body stood on end.

If he could feel pain like an ordinary human, if he had fought Jeok Cheongang as he was now, how long would he have lasted?

How many times would he have died?

This is…

He had thought himself immortal. Unless the Martial God, who had vanished long ago, returned, he had been confident no one who came for him could bring him down.

He had been wrong.

If I can't dodge, I'll die.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord wanted to live.

Even if he had died once already, he wanted this life to continue.

At the very least, he had to bring down the Imperial House, heir to that loathsome bloodline, and the Great Nation that was Taizu's achievement and legacy.

He could not fall before his revenge was complete.

For his family and the members of his sect, who had met such horrific deaths.

And for himself—the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, who had chosen to become a monster for the sake of this day.

I. I…

Grind.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord clenched his teeth. With no blood left to spill, bits of flesh fell away instead.

I cannot fall. Not ever.

Even the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord himself couldn't tell what it was.

Was it the rage that had carried him this far? His obsession with revenge?

Or the last surge of fighting spirit from a martial artist facing the greatest enemy of his life?

Only one thing was certain.

Just as Jeok Cheongang had before him, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord had surpassed his former limits.

Whoosh!

In the blink of an eye, Finger Qi streaked across the space between them like lightning and pierced Jeok Cheongang's neck.

No—it only looked as though it had pierced him.

Jeok Cheongang had been charging at him like a streak of flame. For an instant, it seemed he would fall with blood spraying from his pierced neck—then his figure dissolved like a heat haze.

"…!"

Shifting Form and Position.

At the instant those four characters flashed through the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's mind, he spun around and swung the bell clutched in his only remaining arm.

Whoosh!

The bell slashed downward with a fierce whistle, gleaming with death energy.

A single blow. If even one strike landed cleanly, no one could come away unscathed.

That was how battles between Supreme Peak masters called superhuman were fought.

And the Fire King and the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord were monsters whose martial prowess could not be fully expressed even by the words Supreme Peak.

But—

Crack.

That strike was not enough against someone who, for this moment at least, had reached a new realm. One he might never reach again, even if he lived past today.

Was that all you had?

Jeok Cheongang had neither spoken aloud nor used Sound Transmission.

But the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord heard it clearly. He saw it, too: the unspoken words in Jeok Cheongang's blazing gaze and tightly closed mouth as he stared at him, one flame-wreathed hand gripping the bell.

At the same time, he saw his own arm engulfed in flames in the next instant.

Fwoosh! KABOOOOOM!

A wildfire on a mountainside might burn for days. The Scorching Yang Qi summoned by its master's will did not.

Its dreadful heat flared in an instant and faded just as quickly, melting away the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's last arm without a trace.

But the enraged Master's punishment did not end there.

CRACK!

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's vision shook.

As his arm vanished, a fist smashed into his side. It crushed flesh and bone, then poured flames into his organs, long since rotted away.

No!

Each blow Jeok Cheongang landed brought death another step closer.

SHWAAAA!

Half the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's upper body had been scorched black by the previous attack. He didn't resist the force throwing him backward.

Instead, he poured every bit of energy remaining into his still-intact legs.

He had lost both arms and the bell. He had to put as much distance between them as he could.

But as he kicked off the ground with all his strength, he felt a force of ten thousand geun[3408] seize his ankle.

Crack.

Flesh was crushed. Bone shattered.

And at the same time—

Whoooosh!

The world turned upside down. Through the rushing wind, the ground surged up to meet him.

KABOOOOOM!

A thunderous roar drowned out his ears, and the earth's crust surged upward.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord lay buried deep amid shattered dirt and rock, in earth that had hardened like granite. His eyelids trembled.

This is…

[3408] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (about 1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun is about 6,000 kg (13,000 lb).

For well over half a century, he had worked in the shadows of the Imperial Palace and seen countless Supreme Peak masters.

So he knew.

This wasn't a matter of speed or strength.

Jeok Cheongang now stood in a realm beyond his.

Rumble.

He felt not the slightest pain. That made the sensation all the clearer.

One of his two remaining legs had just been torn off.

And that meant only one thing.

There's nowhere left to retreat.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord gave a hollow laugh.

Was that the smile of a man finally accepting the death before him?

No.

It was the bitter laugh of someone who had waited so long for revenge, but had been forced to choose between that and his life—and who had decided to reveal the hidden sword he had meant to draw at the very end.

"—Come out, Heaven's Slaughter."

And just as a faint line of Sound Transmission, its meaning unclear, slipped between his moving lips—

Shiver.

The empty air wavered.

An assassin dropped through the drifting ash and embers. The old man, whose limp gave no hint of his speed, shot forward like a flash of light and slashed a dagger down at the crown of Jeok Cheongang's head.

Whoosh!

The ambush was nearly perfect. No—it was perfect beyond dispute.

Just as it was about to succeed—

SHWAAAA!

A spear cut through space like a streak of flame.

Chapter 918

Whoosh!

In the slowed world, the old man plunged down like a flash of light, dagger in hand. The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord knew instinctively.

It's over.

The ambush was that perfect.

Even the Fire King Jeok Cheongang as he was now could not evade it. No—he was angrier than ever, his composure gone, which made evasion even less likely.

Even if he somehow blocked or dodged the strike and escaped death, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord judged that he could not escape severe injury.

The limping old man he had called Heaven's Slaughter was one of the finest assassins in the Central Plains, comparable even to the Slaughter Saint.

I kept that sword hidden for the Emperor.

It was bitter, but there was nothing to be done.

The grand plan was already on the verge of falling apart. Survival came first now.

No matter how long it took or what means he had to use, he had to finish his revenge with his own hands. He could not die until he had watched with his own two eyes as the imperial family, heirs to that cursed bloodline, was wiped out—and offered a memorial rite for his Master and fellow disciples, who had met untimely deaths.

But if he was ever to resume that revenge, he first had to bring down the monster before him.

The Fire King Jeok Cheongang.

That monster rampaging like a fire demon sweeping across a boundless plain.

Die.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord was certain Jeok Cheongang would die. At the same time, he desperately hoped he was right.

Just as the old man's dagger—its blade dulled by a coating of ash and charged with Force—was about to cut Jeok Cheongang in two—

SHWAAAAK! BOOM!

A sound of something piercing the air rang out from somewhere and reached the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's ears. It drowned out every other sound as it tore furiously through the air.

His eyes flew wide. A blue-white flash had reached its destination before its sound did, filling his vision.

What is that…?

A spear of a common, unremarkable design—the sort one could find anywhere.

But the light upon it shone as brightly as the sun overhead, and its heat, hotter than the sun itself, burned even the air as it raced onward.

Toward Jeok Cheongang.

No—to be exact, toward the old man falling above his head.

"…!"

"…!"

"…!"

At that moment, everyone's movements stopped. The world they saw stopped with them.

Jeok Cheongang, who had only just noticed the assassin. The old man plunging down at him like a bolt of lightning. And the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, watching it all unfold.

Shwoosh!

They all watched the spearhead cut slowly through the air toward them. They felt the power within the blue-white flames coiling around it.

And at the same time, they understood.

Who owned that spear.

Where that horrifyingly intense Scorching Yang Qi came from.

Before the three-syllable name that had suddenly surfaced could even take shape in their minds, the spearhead had raced forward, erasing the space between them, and reached its destination in an instant.

At the last possible moment, the old man frantically turned his dagger to block the spearhead bearing down on him.

Whoom—KABOOOOOM!

Blue-white flames swelled as they met the Force surging from the dagger. A thunderous boom shook heaven and earth, and the shockwave lashed out in every direction.

KRRRACK!

The earth shuddered as if struck by an earthquake. Wind whipped about madly.

In that muffled world filled with nothing but ash, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord finally pieced together one man's name and screamed it like a wail.

"Jin Taekyung!"

At that moment—

Fwoooosh.

The hazy world split apart.

A man drenched in blood from head to toe approached, moving more lightly and swiftly than ever. He bared his white teeth in a grin.

"Don't say my name. I might get attached."

Then he shrugged toward one man standing dazed and motionless at the feet of the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, who was sprawled there, stiff as a statue.

"Looks like this bastard still hasn't come to his senses. Should I pull out his tongue while I'm at it?"

"…"

"Old Master?"

The Fire King Jeok Cheongang, his old Master, didn't answer.

No—he couldn't answer.

He gazed in silence at his Disciple, who had come back as he always did. Then he burst out laughing, so delighted that tears ran down his face.

At the same time, he felt all the anger and sorrow that had held his whole body in its grip come crashing down, and he grasped his Disciple's arm tightly.

"Thank you."

Grip.

"For coming back. For coming back like this."

"…!"

The corner of Jin Taekyung's eye, caked with dried blood, trembled.

Thank you. For coming back.

A few words, but they were enough.

He felt the warmth of his Master's hand on his arm and the sincerity in every syllable.

That feeling was more than enough.

There was no need for them to say anything more.

This brief reunion between the two men who carried on the Fire Gate Clan's lineage would soon mean death for their enemies.

That was how the Fire Gate Clan had survived for three hundred years. It was also the way of these two, bound as Master and Disciple by an inexplicable connection.

Smash and burn everything in our way.

Whatever it is.

Without fail. No matter what.

Step.

Master and Disciple moved forward together. Beyond the unsettled dust and ash, sticky killing intent crept toward them and wrapped around them.

Whoooosh!

The limping old man, Heaven's Slaughter, blended into the darkness and quietly waited for his moment.

Even as he watched his subordinates die less than a dozen jang[3409] away, there wasn't a trace of agitation in his cold, sunken eyes.

Whoosh. Slice!

Before the blade dulled by ash could even reach its target, a head sprang into the air.

Anyone who saw those men crumpling like straw dummies would find it hard to believe that each was an elite assassin he had spent at least thirty years training.

I thought I could take down even the Three Saints with those children.

No—perhaps he really could have.

His ambush moments earlier had been that perfect. He could have erased the giant known as the Fire King Jeok Cheongang from this world himself.

If not for the unwelcome visitor who had appeared out of nowhere.

Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung.

Heaven's Slaughter swallowed the groan that threatened to escape him.

It wasn't only because his broken wrist throbbed. It had snapped when he deflected that spear, so full of power, at the last moment before his ambush succeeded.

So the real monster wasn't the Master…

He had seen it clearly from the darkness.

Jin Taekyung falling with an injury beyond recovery. Coughing up blood mixed with pieces of his organs, with the shadow of death stirring at the edge of his life.

And yet, how could he possibly…?

Those who roam the martial world with death for a companion are martial artists. And among them, assassins stand closest to death.

Heaven's Slaughter knew that better than anyone.

Since early childhood, when he had been trained as an assassin, he had killed people with his own hands in every way he could. The weight of those deeds had brought him to death's threshold, too.

If Dark Heaven hadn't helped me, this old man would have turned to a handful of dirt long ago.

Heaven's Slaughter's survival had been a miracle. But even that seemed insignificant beside what Jin Taekyung had just done.

There was no doubt. Force had pierced straight through Jin Taekyung's chest.

It had split flesh and bone, destroyed his acupoints, and seeped into his organs, tearing them to shreds from within.

[3409] A jang is a traditional Korean length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[3410] Yama is the ruler and judge of the dead in Buddhist tradition.

No one could recover from such an injury—not even under the care of a Great Firmament Immortal, or if Yama[3410] himself erased their name from the book of the dead.

And yet Jin Taekyung had come back alive.

Though he looked like a man drenched in blood, his exposed skin was smooth, and his perfectly formed Muscles and Bones—the reason he was known as having a Heavenly Martial Physique—were plain to see.

And that wasn't all.

His formidable internal energy—several jiazi[3411]'s worth, an impossible amount for someone barely past twenty—had filled back up as if nothing had happened.

As if someone had filled an empty teacup with water.

As if it were only natural.

This is… something I can't explain.

An ability beyond reason.

Heaven's Slaughter's sunken eyes trembled faintly.

Now, his composure—barely held together until this moment—had finally crumbled. He was truly torn between two choices.

Flight and duty.

And he wondered who would kill him: Dark Heaven or Jin Taekyung.

Several decades ago, when he had been gasping at death's door, Dark Heaven had made him an offer he could not refuse. It had never been out of kindness.

A blade forged by Dark Heaven.

A human butcher who moved only at Dark Heaven's command.

That was the new identity Heaven's Slaughter had accepted in exchange for his life. A shackle he could never break, no matter how far he ran.

If he abandoned his mission and fled, punishment was all that awaited him.

Pain and death so terrible that even he, after a lifetime of killing, could not imagine them.

He could not hide. He could not escape.

That was Dark Heaven—or rather, the Lord of Heaven.

Heh. Heheheh.

Heaven's Slaughter laughed without a sound.

What a fool he was, agonizing over a question whose answer had been decided from the start.

There had never been a choice to make. Only one path lay before him.

Kill or be killed.

Heaven's Slaughter moved quietly through the darkness.

[3411] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; here it measures accumulated internal energy.

He silenced his breathing and erased his presence. Watching the elite assassins he had painstakingly raised with Dark Heaven's help get slaughtered, he slowly approached Jeok Cheongang and Jin Taekyung.

Just one. If I can take down either of them, I can survive—even if I fail the mission and flee.

The grand plan had already gone awry.

But if he brought back something of equal value—if he brought back the Fire King Jeok Cheongang's head—he might be given another chance.

A chance to pursue his own unfulfilled revenge. A chance to keep this stubborn life going.

And, to his great fortune, even the heavens, usually so indifferent, seemed to be on Heaven's Slaughter's side today.

Whoosh! Whoosh! Slice!

Another life vanished with a piercing sound. But unlike Jin Taekyung, who was rampaging as if possessed, Jeok Cheongang looked utterly exhausted to Heaven's Slaughter.

Patapat. Splurt!

Hidden weapons came flying from every direction, grazing Jeok Cheongang's body. Then, after killing with a single palm strike the assassin who had dropped down from above, the old dragon exhaled raggedly through his lips.

Huff. Huff.

His lips were dry and tinged pale blue. His body trembled faintly, even as he continued to unleash attacks of terrifying power.

At the sight of Jeok Cheongang, who seemed to have forgotten the fearsome martial prowess he had displayed only moments ago, Heaven's Slaughter muttered to himself.

He's reached his limit.

In a way, it was only natural.

Jeok Cheongang had already surpassed his limits against the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, and even before that, his body had been covered in wounds large and small.

That opening was Heaven's Slaughter's only chance.

This strike will end it. No matter what.

Heaven's Slaughter calmed his mind. He erased even his killing intent—the energy anyone about to kill would carry.

No one harbors killing intent when slaughtering livestock instead of a human being.

He had spent his life as a butcher called an assassin. Now he shot straight forward with all his might.

And at that same moment, he understood.

Though he himself was still cloaked by his concealment technique, he saw Jin Taekyung staring straight at him. He felt that gaze pierce his entire body.

He knew from the beginning…

Puhk.

A blazing flame pierced his chest.

Chapter 919

There are two main ways a predator hunts its prey.

It can chase its prey down—or make the prey come to it.

The first is simple. The second is difficult.

But for all its difficulty, the second is more likely to succeed. Luring prey right up to you means you've made it lower its guard.

Or…

You've made the prey mistake itself for the predator.

One thing was certain.

The man struck by my spearhead as it flashed through the air belonged squarely in the latter category.

Puhk!

The gruesome sound of pierced flesh announced a successful hunt, and the air rippled.

Where only ash and dust had been swirling, an old man quivered like a fish skewered on a harpoon. I hadn't even seen him appear.

"Wha—how…? Cough!"

Drip. Drip.

Blood spilled from his mouth, running down his chin before he could finish speaking.

I looked at his face, twisted with pain like a fiend's, and answered calmly.

"I saw you. Clear as day."

"That's impossible. It can't be."

The old man gasped for breath. The assassins—now barely a dozen—rushed in from every direction to save their leader.

Like moths throwing themselves into a flame, knowing they would burn.

But the ending of this short story had already been decided.

From the moment I opened my eyes to the sound of a clear bell.

And from the moment Jeok Cheongang showed weakness to lure in prey that might flee at any moment.

Boom!

The heat of the Flame Divine Palm warped the air.

When the predator known as the Fire King swung his flame-cloaked claws, the moths fell without even a dying cry.

Rustle. Thud.

The last assassin, his upper body charred black, dropped to his knees.

There was no need to check. He was dead.

With his last hope extinguished right before his eyes, the old man's voice sank into an oddly calm murmur.

"So you showed an opening to lure in your target. You have more of an assassin's nature than I expected."

I made a show of frowning.

"That sounds like a compliment, but somehow it feels like an insult. Every assassin I've ever met has been trash, except for one."

"I suppose so."

The old man gave a tiny, spasmodic nod and continued.

"Mungyeong. Is that bastard still the same?"

"What?"

My brow furrowed before I could stop it.

Mungyeong was the Slaughter Saint's real name.

Fewer than five people in the entire world knew that.

Maybe even fewer.

Even counting me.

"How do you…"

"You're asking how I know that name?"

The old man coughed up blood again. "How could I not? He told me himself."

At that moment, I thought I knew who the old man was.

A few months ago, while I was in Sichuan, the Slaughter Saint had mentioned Salcheonmun in passing. It was one of the few things he'd revealed about his otherwise shrouded past.

"Salcheonmun."

Once, it had been the most feared assassin sect in the world.

Then the dagger it had forged—the Slaughter Saint—brought about its destruction. Now it was a remnant of the past, forgotten by most.

At the name, the old man nodded and smiled faintly.

"Make sure you tell Mungyeong this."

A fierce light flashed in the dying man's eyes. Blood poured from his lips, and his voice was thick with killing intent.

"Tell him we—Salcheonmun—will come for him. No matter the sacrifice, no matter how many years pass. We will come."

Hmm…

Judging by that, it definitely wasn't a reunion for Salcheonmun's twelfth class.

The kind of reasonable, beautiful ending where they meet up, polish off a few bottles of Jiannan Chun, call a designated driver, and ride home in a carriage wasn't something the assassin world did.

Especially if the Slaughter Saint himself had brought about Salcheonmun's destruction.

First the Maoshan Sect, and now Salcheonmun.

I'd thought something was off from the moment I first saw him.

The chain of gratitude and grudges went on and on, no matter how far I dug. I let out a small sigh.

"How thoughtful of you to give me advance notice. Don't worry. I'll pass on what you said word for word."

I looked the old man straight in the eye and added, "I'll tell him Gye Yabu of Salcheonmun said it."

"…!"

The old man's eyes, which had seemed ready to close, flew open.

His calm acceptance of death vanished. His voice burst out with a spray of blood, full of undisguised shock.

"How—how do you know that?"

"I told you. I can see."

"…What?"

Instead of answering, I jerked my chin toward the space above his head.

Floating in the empty air was a translucent roster that no one but me in this world could see.

> Lv. 140 Gye Yabu

The difference was simple.

The old man—no, Gye Yabu—possessed concealment techniques bordering on the miraculous. I had the System, which was a miracle in its own right.

And that difference had made Gye Yabu the prey.

"Goodbye."

With that farewell to end our brief encounter, I twisted the spear shaft in my grip.

Crunch.

White Flame, the weapon I had finally reclaimed, cut through bone and flesh like tofu and reached his heart.

The flames clinging to its transparent blade seeped inside.

Boom.

A small explosion made Gye Yabu stagger.

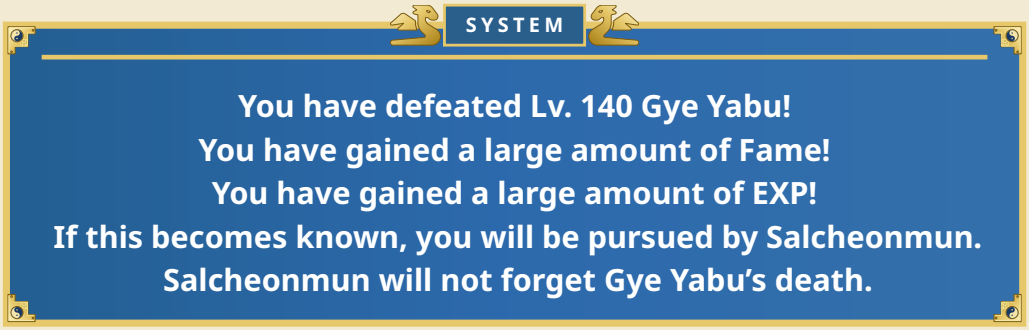
Dark-red blood poured from his seven apertures.[3412] He looked like a candle caught in a typhoon.

[3412] In traditional East Asian usage, the seven apertures are the eyes, ears, nostrils, and mouth.

Puhk! Splurt!

I pulled out the spear and turned away. As I walked off, leaving his crumpling body behind, the bell I'd been waiting for rang in my ears.

Ding.



The System notification told me two things.

First, that Gye Yabu hadn't been lying when he spoke before he died.

Second, I'd grown strong enough that killing a Level 140 enemy wasn't enough to level me up—and that a warning about becoming Salcheonmun's target didn't bother me.

Though it does feel a little ominous.

I could just kill them coming or going.

I didn't know how skilled Salcheonmun's human butchers were, but I already had the Lord of Heaven's undivided attention.

How much hotter could a jalapeño really get if you added a Cheongyang chili?

I'd just have to drink a nice, cold glass of milk first.

Living milk packed with EXP instead of calcium. Enough to put an end to this damnable fight.

"Sorry I'm a little late. Get bored waiting?"

Step.

I stepped into the path of someone crawling away, scrabbling with the only leg he had left intact.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord confirmed it was me, then smiled through his twisted face.

"Yeah, you monster."

Those who failed despaired.

They wept and sank into misery.

But the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord did not.

He neither despaired nor wept. He did not give up.

His revenge wasn't over yet. Hope remained.

His grand plan had failed, but he was still alive.

Even if a branch breaks, the tree doesn't die.

As long as its roots remained, the tree would not fall. Someday, it could grow thick branches and fresh leaves again.

Just as everything from the Maoshan Sect, destroyed by Taizu long ago, had passed down to him.

That was why he struggled.

With just one leg, his undying body squirmed as he tried to escape.

Not yet. It's not over yet.

Golden Ox Palace was dead. Ma Sanbao had disappeared, and the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord didn't know whether he was alive or dead.

And there was more.

He had lost the means to control the jiangshi, and the Salcheonmun assassins, including Gye Yabu, were dead.

But if that was all he had prepared for today, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord would never have begun this grand plan.

I need time. Time.

It had been half a century since he infiltrated the imperial court as a eunuch.

The shadow of Dark Heaven that the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord had cast over the Great Nation was deeper and larger than anyone imagined.

There were commanders leading armies of tens of thousands, admirals commanding fleets, and political heavyweights who could wield enormous influence with a few words or a handful of hastily written lines.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord had more than satisfied their greed. In return, they had sworn loyalty and willingly climbed aboard the same ship, bringing everything they possessed: strength, influence, authority.

The great rebellion meant to overturn the Great Nation was not confined to the grand banquet hall.

That was why the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord could still smile.

Why he could smile even as he faced a monster greater than himself.

"Sorry I'm a little late. Get bored waiting?"

Step.

The voice was light, as though greeting an old friend. But the footstep blocking his way was heavy and firm.

Jin Taekyung.

The face of one man crossed his mind, then appeared in the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's vision.

"Yeah, you monster."

And at that moment—

Crack!

With a gruesome sound of crushed flesh, his only remaining leg was smashed to pieces.

Now deprived of all four limbs, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord calmly addressed another opponent through pain he could no longer feel.

“The world would be astonished to learn that the Fire King, famed for his rough ways, cares so deeply for his Disciple…”

CRUNCH!

A thunderous impact drowned out the rest of his words.

Then, as the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord was driven deep into the ground, a voice reached his ears, growling like a beast.

“Shut your mouth. Before I rip out your tongue.”

“My tongue? You’d rip out my tongue?”

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord gave a short laugh.

“That’s not a bad idea. It would be a new experience for me, too.”

“You bastard!”

“My ears are ringing. Stop shouting and try it. Right now.”

“…!”

“What are you waiting for? I said, rip out my tongue.”

But no answer came, no matter how often he urged him. The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord’s smile deepened.

“Right. You can’t. You won’t. If you rip out my tongue here and now, you’ll never get the answers you want.”

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord already knew.

In a desperate fight for their lives, they might have killed him. But now that they had won, they could not.

He knew a great deal about Dark Heaven and the Lord of Heaven. One word from the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord could change the course of a Great War that would decide the future of the world.

A war that would put hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of lives at stake.

That was the last hope he clung to.

“Listen, Fire King.”

Rumble. Rumble.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord felt faint vibrations through the ground, growing stronger by the moment, and burst into hearty laughter.

“It seems Heaven hasn’t abandoned me after all.”

At that moment—

CRAAASH!

With a roar that shook the earth, thousands of soldiers poured over the shattered outer wall.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord laughed aloud.

No—he was about to.

Gooooong.

Until an enormous beam of light shot from somewhere, wrapped around them, and burst.

KABOOM!

Faced with that unbelievable power, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord’s eyes flew wide.

At the same time, he screamed one person’s name.

“So Gyo…!”

Chapter 920

It all happened in an instant.

At least, that was how it felt to the East Depot masters charging at the vanguard as they scrambled over the rubble of the collapsed outer wall.

Fwoosh.

What in the world was this?

How could anything be so fast—and so destructive?

A dazzling flash filled their vision. For a moment, they could only stare. It was the last thing they ever saw.

KABOOM!

A tremendous roar battered their ears. An irresistible force swept over their bodies, frozen like stone statues.

Crunch! Fwoosh!

The flash vanished as quickly as it had come. One of the East Depot eunuchs charging behind his comrades blinked.

When his vision finally cleared, he understood.

That flash had been Force fired by someone.

That terrifying energy had swept away dozens of his comrades—and taken one of his arms, too.

“A-ah. Ahh. Aaaaaah…”

His jaw trembled. A dazed moan slipped between his teeth as they clattered without pause.

They were dead. No—they’d been butchered.

His eyes took in what remained of the men who had once been his comrades: chunks of meat so mangled he could no longer tell who was who. His mind struggled to accept the sight.

Only then did pain reach him from his shoulder, left in shreds as though a beast had torn into it.

“GRAAAAH!”

A scream of agony poured from his gaping mouth.

But he wasn’t the only one caught in shock and pain.

“Ugh… Uuugh.”

“P-please, save…”

“Ugh—bleurgh!”

Some groaned as they clutched the stumps of their severed legs. Some pleaded desperately for help on the brink of death. Others bent over and vomited at the carnage before their eyes.

They trembled, terrified by the gruesome deaths they'd witnessed and helpless to do anything.

Those who realized what had happened a moment later were little better off.

"W-what is this…?"

Some of the Imperial Guards, long since recruited by the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord and drawn into the rebellion, and the East Depot eunuchs who had led them into the grand banquet hall were struck speechless.

One strike.

A single strike had killed or incapacitated more than fifty soldiers.

Each had charged at the vanguard without hesitation, and each was a formidable fighter, ranging from Supreme First Rate to Peak.

Compared to the full force of some three thousand, it wasn't a major loss. But everyone had stopped because that one attack had swallowed dozens of Peak masters in its terrifying power.

No—it was the master behind that attack, whose might seemed almost demonic, who had stopped them.

Who…?

Who was it?

The question pierced everyone's mind.

The three thousand rebels who had surged into the grand banquet hall.

The Embroidered Uniform Guard and Fire Dragon Pavilion members fighting the dead, who refused to fall no matter how many times they were killed.

Even the dead, driven still further out of their minds when the bell was destroyed, stopped at some instinctive warning.

Then they turned their heads.

Toward the source of the flash.

At the end of countless gazes stood someone, trampling the twitching limbs of the dead.

Whoosh.

A breeze stirred the woman's thick hair.

"So Gyo…!"

In the silence that had fallen over the hall, a cry like a scream rang out belatedly.

The woman—no, So Gyo—lifted her head and looked toward the voice.

More precisely, toward the person standing there.

Jin Taekyung.

Her lips moved without a sound, and her dark blue eyes grew solemn.

The hundreds of steps leading up to the dais were already buried beneath countless bodies.

The thousand or so dead had been torn to shreds and finally died—or lay there writhing with their limbs severed.

As if hoping someone would put an end to their stubborn lives.

Slice.

A streak of light cut through the air.

The man who had split in two a dead man crawling up the steps on his one remaining arm lowered his sword and breathed hard.

Huff. Huff.

His entire body, soaked in blood and sweat, heaved.

His golden armor and sword, as intricate and splendid as works of art, felt heavier than ever.

No—perhaps it was the weight of the responsibility and guilt he had carried all this time.

And yet… he had no regrets.

He must not.

The Embroidered Uniform Guard who had turned to ash here today had also been prepared to die.

To pity them for a sacrifice they had chosen would be an insult worse than death.

Even if he was the most exalted man beneath the heavens, the one who stood above all others.

“Baek Yeon.”

The man—the Emperor—spoke, his voice rough with a metallic rasp.

He turned to the imperial court’s foremost military commander. Baek Yeon had done more than anyone to protect the late Emperor and the imperial family, and whenever the Emperor faltered, Baek Yeon’s harsh rebukes had lifted him back to his feet. He was more a comrade than a subject.

So the Emperor gave him a request, not an order.

“Sound the drum. The war drum.”

“…!”

Baek Yeon’s eyes trembled.

Taking in the Emperor’s exhaustion, his fatigue more visible than ever, he bowed deeply and extended a palm toward the great drum that had announced the start of the banquet.

Boom!

The drumbeat, charged with profound internal energy, rang out without end.

It carried the heart of a warrior who had waited so long for this day. It carried the Emperor’s will.

Once.

Then once again.

The sound was immense enough for everyone in the grand banquet hall to hear. No—it rolled like a wave that might sweep across the entire Imperial Capital.

Booooom!

Even when the third drumbeat rang out, the three thousand rebels didn't know what to do. They hesitated.

It had all unfolded so naturally.

So Gyo's overwhelming display of martial power had abruptly swept through the vanguard, and the drumbeat resounded with a grandeur they couldn't explain. For a moment, they had been overwhelmed before they even knew it.

Even the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord—the instigator and center of the rebellion, who should have been leading them from the front—lay in a horrific state at Jin Taekyung and Jeok Cheongang's feet.

What is this? What in the world is happening?

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord had been captured. Ma Sanbao was nowhere to be seen.

The Imperial Guards and East Depot leaders who had betrayed the imperial court and the Great Nation to join Dark Heaven looked at one another in confusion.

When they took the Outer Palace, they had thought it was all over.

Even when they had seized every gate leading into the imperial palace and defeated the remaining defenders, taking advantage of another allied force sweeping through the capital, they had been certain a new age was about to begin.

But the reality they had so eagerly come to meet was different. The battle should have been theirs already.

The flags that had flown so proudly when they first stormed into the grand banquet hall now fluttered as uneasily as their hearts.

And at that very moment—

Boom. Boom.

Another drumbeat reached their ears.

Every hair on their bodies stood on end. A chill ran down their spines.

The fourth drumbeat was no louder than the ones before it, nor did it have a deeper, more resonant ring.

Yet it made the rebels' hearts sink for one reason alone.

Behind them.

The sound came not from Baek Yeon, visible in the distance, but from somewhere behind them.

And then it spread in every direction.

Boom. Boom-boom.

The countless drumbeats spread like flames across a wide plain. They were not echoes bouncing back from somewhere. They were not a trick of the ears.

They were the signal that this long and gruesome banquet was coming to an end—the footsteps of hunters closing in on prey caught at last in a trap.

Rumble.

How long had this been going on?

Where had such a vast army been hiding, and why had it waited until now?

A trap!

The realization struck like lightning through their skulls. At the same time, the rebels felt immense tremors drawing closer.

Then they saw them.

Hundreds of flags rising high on every side.

Following the fluttering flags, a dragon embroidered in golden thread writhed as though alive.

"…!"

"…!"

Shock, joy, and despair swept across the grand banquet hall.

Some were seized by an elation so intense their hearts felt ready to burst. Others clenched their teeth until they bled.

The three thousand rebels were the latter.

Thousands. Or tens of thousands.

No one could guess the exact number of their enemies, but one thing was certain: the forces tightening the encirclement would overwhelm them.

The rebels felt the killing intent bearing down on them.

They saw their faces reflected in the rippling pools of blood and imagined what was about to happen.

But they also thought of the only way out of this hopeless situation, surrounded on all sides.

The center of everything. Its beginning and its end.

The ruler who stood at the highest peak in all the vast world.

"The Emperor…"

The faint voice that slipped from someone's lips swelled into a shout born of the desperate will to live.

"Capture the Emperor!"

The victor was king; the loser, a rebel.

Already driven to the edge of a cliff, they had no other choice.

A body without a head could not move.

Capturing the Emperor and his family to make the rebellion succeed was the only way forward.

"Whoever captures the Emperor and his family will become a marquis and enjoy wealth and glory for generations to come!"

At that moment—

Rumble!

Thousands of men and horses surged forward like a wave.

Toward the Emperor looking down at them from the high steps, his face worn with age.

They tried to drown out their fear of the woman standing before him with furious shouts.

"GRAAAAAH!"

"Charge! Don't stop!"

Their cries, almost screams, mingled with countless footsteps and pounding hooves. The sound woke the deep night and spread through the thick darkness hanging on every side like a curtain.

Far away. Farther still.

Loud and clear.

Yet their desperate advance and shouts seemed unbearably slow and distant.

At least, they did to the young man and woman looking at each other in that moment.

He looked at her. She looked at him.

The hundred or so jang[3413] between them meant nothing now.

They both knew.

They knew they were looking at each other. They knew whose gaze had met theirs across the distance.

But only So Gyo had realized the other person's true identity.

So it was you.

Swallowing a cryptic murmur, So Gyo silently looked down at the battlefield spread out beneath her.

It was vast. And it was horrific.

The grand banquet hall, stretching for hundreds of jang[3414] in either direction, was awash with blood. Ownerless weapons and severed limbs lay scattered across the ground. The wide-open eyes of the dead held no trace of life.

The music that had sounded for a brief while was gone. Only death remained in its place, and more people were surging in to pile death upon death.

Whoosh.

[3413] A jang is a traditional Korean length of ten cheok, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[3414] A jang is a traditional Korean length of ten cheok, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Amid the enemies' thunderous shouts, a cold wind billowed her silky hair. It carried the smell of blood deep into her nose, thick as the crimson pools all around her.

Thick enough to draw fragments of the past up from where time had buried them.

Thick enough to revive the horrific memories she'd wanted to forget but never could.

Perhaps that was why she felt not the slightest joy, though she had found the answer—the key—she had sought for so long.

Perhaps that was why she knew it was time to end this long and gruesome banquet.

Shhk.

In the silence, So Gyo moved both hands. The two curved swords gripped in her blood-caked hands pointed toward sky and earth. Then she brought them together.

Shrring. Clack.

Steel forged by a craftsman's countless rounds of quenching and hammering rang coldly. A hidden groove and the metal set within it joined the two weapons.

As if they had been one from the beginning.

As if they had once been something other than curved swords.

Wooooong.

Restored to its original form after long years, the weapon trembled in its owner's hands. It resonated with the familiar energy flowing deep into it and shed tears of light.

Zing.

The air quivered.

A pure-white flash joined the two angled ends that had made the pieces look like curved swords.

Just as it had in the distant past.

Still bearing the splendor of an age when it had been divine punishment to some, salvation to others.

"It's been a long time."

So Gyo lifted her beloved weapon, her voice tender.

Then, as she had done tens of thousands of times before, she gripped the flash joining its ends and pulled hard.

Fwoosh.

A brilliant shaft of light took shape in midair, nocked against the shining bowstring.

The unbelievable sight stirred the old memories of someone watching from afar. It raised someone's figure from a past buried in dust.

An old woman who had ruled the battlefield with a bow larger than any other, unleashing Force like lightning.

“The Bow Saint…!”

At that very moment—

SHWAAAAAK!

The shaft of light flew from So Gyo’s—or rather, the Bow Saint’s—fingertips and streaked across the grand banquet hall.

Chapter 921

Fwoosh!

The moment they saw the streak of light hurtling toward them, the three thousand rebels charging as one instinctively understood.

Unavoidable death awaited them on the only path they had thought could save them.

“Dodge—!”

KABOOOM!

Someone’s scream was swallowed by the deafening roar. Amid the dust cloud that billowed up with the explosion, headless corpses and men and horses torn limb from limb shot into the air, spraying fountains of blood.

“GRAAAH!”

“S-spread out! Spread out at once and keep charging!”

“Don’t stop! If you stop, you die!”

Urgent commands rang out over countless screams.

Overcome by fear and confusion, the rebels forced strength into their trembling legs at the orders of their surviving leaders.

That was right.

If they stopped here, it was all over.

They had climbed onto the back of a rampaging tiger. Their fate was already sealed.

“AAAAAAH!”

“Charge! Chaaaarge!”

Bloodshot eyes wide in faces white as paper, the surviving rebels screamed in desperation and pressed forward.

Praying that the Force arrows liable to come flying from anywhere at any moment would spare them, at least.

Using the unlucky men at the front as shields.

Please, please!

They charged on with that desperate plea running endlessly through their clenched teeth. Then a dazzling streak of light appeared before them and blocked their path.

No. It swept them away.

BOOM! CRUNCH!

The earth shook. Rising dust soaked up blood and turned red.

Yet the gaze watching that horrific scene—and the hand that kept drawing the bowstring—remained terrifyingly calm.

Four hundred paces.

Ziiing.

The great bow shuddered. Its string and arrow, shining with their owner's internal energy, unleashed speed and force no other archer could match.

Just as they did now.

Thrum. Fwoosh!

Another gale of light swept over the enemy, bringing the death—and the screams—that awaited them. Each arrow made of Force snuffed out dozens of lives like candles in the wind.

Three hundred paces.

Again.

Two hundred paces.

Again.

KABOOM! KABOOM!

The closer they came, the more corpses piled up. The men at the front had been replaced several times over, and those charging now howled like madmen.

Toward their only way out, which was also where they would die.

They pressed on as pawns on a vast game board until they met the dazzling light that would be the last thing they ever saw.

Crunch!

How many had died by the time they covered half the four hundred paces?

How many more would die crossing the two hundred that remained?

No one could answer the question that suddenly occurred to them.

Not those collapsing as they felt the life drain away. Not those forced to leave their fallen comrades behind and keep going.

Not even the leaders, who sent their men ahead while shouting for the charge.

"We're almost there! Whoever captures the Emperor will be made a marquis and—!"

Poom!

A sharp crack cut off the shout.

In the blink of an eye, the commander flew from his saddle and landed in a pool of blood.

Splash.

"Ugh!"

"G-General of the Swift Cavalry!"

No one heard the rest of what he said, but looking at the General of the Swift Cavalry lying motionless in the blood, no one could help thinking of death.

He was unmistakably dead.

The powerful commander who had held military authority for so many years had died just like that.

Suddenly, miserably, and leaving one question behind.

How?

The leaders nearby were bewildered. The streak of light, far too powerful to seem like an arrow, had been nowhere in sight a moment ago.

Then who…?

As they turned to look for the unseen attacker, a low voice reached their ears.

“There’s something this old man wants to know. What do you call the bastards who started this goddamn mess?”

Someone else answered.

“What else? They’re fucking assholes.”

“Then what about the ones hanging back even now?”

“Hmm. Shitheads?”

“And if they’re both?”

“In a four-character idiom? Fucking dog-shitheads.”

“Fucking dog-shitheads, is it? That rolls right off the tongue.”

Not in front. Not behind. Not to either side.

The leaders, frozen like statues, slowly looked up.

Two people stood in midair above their heads.

A dreadful thought came to them: perhaps the sight before them and those voices would be the last things they ever saw and heard.

“W-wait. If you help us now, we can give you whatever you want…”

Whoosh.

A breeze blew. That was all.

It should have been all.

Then why were their minds growing hazy? There had been two people standing above them. Where had one gone?

“You fucking…”

A voice squeezed out between someone’s lips.

Shhk.

Deep within their bodies, death woke late and stretched. Faint red lines appeared where a spearhead had passed too quickly to see.

Slip. Fwoooosh!

Blood welled in small beads, then burst out. Heads, arms, and legs separated; bone and flesh came apart and slid away, defying their owners’ will.

The collapsing bodies fell behind the young man holding a spear untouched by blood—and poured down over his head.

Thud-thud-thud!

The young man standing beneath that red rain in the dark was Jin Taekyung. He finally gave them his answer.

“Help you? The best help you bastards can offer is to just fucking die. You fucking dog-shitheads.”

“…!”

“…!”

Those who had witnessed the horrific, unbelievable sight before their eyes were struck with shock—and despair, as they realized it was all over.

Every one of them wore splendid clothes. They were powerful figures who had pledged loyalty to Dark Heaven and the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, committing their families for generations to come. They had crossed a river they could never return from.

It’s over. Completely.

Jin Taekyung stood with his spearhead lowered and a calm expression, despite the hundreds of guards surrounding him. Jeok Cheongang still stood in the air.

Only then did the onlookers understand that their dreadful premonition had come true.

This vast rebellion was finished. So were the wealth and glory they had enjoyed for so long.

Their only consolation was that, instead of enduring brutal torture before being torn limb from limb by carts, they might receive a quick death from that martial-world ruffian.

Or so they thought.

Until Jeok Cheongang spoke.

“Leave the ones who look like the top dogs alive. I don’t know if they’re gold mines or spent ones, but we won’t know what’s in there unless we dig. Might as well take a few swings with the pickaxe.”

“…!”

“…!”

Their shock and resignation turned to fear in an instant. Before that instant was over, Jin Taekyung sent ten sharp cracks through the air toward them.

Fwish-fwish-fwish!

They weren’t given time to take out the poison pills they had kept hidden, just in case—or even a moment to draw the daggers at their waists and slash their own throats.

Thud-thud-thud!

They felt it.

Finger Qi crossing the distance in an instant and stiffening their entire bodies. The world slowly tilting as despair weighed down on their minds and bodies.

Slip. Thump!

They fell like waterlogged logs. Golden flags fluttering on every side filled their vision. Above the dragons writhing on the flags, countless arrowheads rained down across the dark sky.

Shhhhhhh.

A thousand repeating crossbowmen poured steel over the remaining rebels.

Thud-thud-thud!

The sounds of flesh being pierced announced the end of the blood-soaked banquet. Screams of pain joined them, mingling with the powerful, unceasing beat of drums.

Thick and sticky as blood.

Boom. Boom. Booooom.

Fifteen minutes.

That was how long it took for all three thousand rebels to be wiped out.

The Imperial Army swept into the grand banquet hall beneath a rain of arrows, bringing more than enough force to put an end to the long, horrific feast.

“Rebels, listen!”

“Rebels, listen!”

“Disarm and surrender at once!”

“Disarm and surrender at once!”

Shouts charged with powerful internal energy rang out one after another.

The twin officers urging them to surrender sounded so alike in voice and tone that they could have been one man. At the sight of them, the surviving rebels seemed to lose their last hope.

Clunk. Clunk.

Clang.

They loosened the joints of their bloodstained armor and dropped their cracked and broken weapons as if throwing them away.

No one knew who surrendered first, but the wave soon became a tide sweeping through the grand banquet hall.

“I surrender. I’ll surrender.”

“Please, just spare my life…”

Their eyes were vacant, their faces empty.

Some clutched the stump of a missing arm and begged for their lives. Others, backed to a cliff's edge with nowhere left to retreat, made a choice they could never take back.

Stab.

"Kh… Urgh!"

A body pitched forward with a muffled death rattle.

The nameless rebel crumpled. His face held the despair of knowing it was over, and a trace of the peace he had found in escaping this hell.

"It's over."

At the faint words Jeok Cheongang murmured as if to himself, I forced myself to nod calmly.

Yeah. It was over.

The vast battle that had swallowed countless lives, both in plain sight and out of it, had finally ended.

But not everything was over.

The dead had gone somewhere far away, never to return. But the monster who was neither dead nor alive still remained here.

And we still had to deal with the living.

Squish.

A footstep landed in a pool of blood.

I watched her approach, my gaze cold and steady. Each light, graceful step left a sticky imprint of blood behind.

So Gyo.

No—the Bow Saint.

The woman who had kept everything about herself hidden.

At our first meeting, she had pretended to be the Emperor's loyal servant. At our second, she had worn the mask of Dark Heaven. Only at our third had she finally revealed herself.

Now she was coming toward me.

With catlike steps that suited the name So Gyo, she crossed ground strewn with countless bodies. People who might still be alive if she had revealed her identity a little sooner.

Fwoooosh.

Blade-sharp qi rose from every part of my body. The Bow Saint stopped a few steps away and looked at me in silence, then suddenly spoke.

"So it was you."

What did she mean?

I hesitated, unable to understand the meaning behind her words. A low voice sounded in my ear.

—The one the Martial God spoke of. The chosen one.

…What?

Chapter 922

What made humans seem so special in a world teeming with life was their ability to think deeply and broadly.

Every human could do it.

They took in their current situation through their eyes and ears, thought about what to do or say to the person in front of them, and put together the right words.

At the same time, they predicted what those words and actions would bring about.

But their predictions weren't always right.

When things took an unexpected turn, or the person they were talking to reacted in a way they hadn't anticipated, they were thrown off.

Their racing thoughts came to a halt. They lost their words.

Just like me, right now.

"So it was you."

So Gyo—no, the Bow Saint—stared at me. Her lips moved, and a voice only I could hear slipped between them.

—The one the Martial God spoke of. The chosen one.

…What?

The shock of learning that So Gyo was the giant known as the Bow Saint had completely disappeared.

That brief Sound Transmission hit me like a sledgehammer to the back of the head. I could only blink.

I'd expected an excuse, at least.

With me making no effort to hide my anger, I thought she'd say she hadn't expected things to turn out this way. That she'd had no choice.

But she didn't.

The Martial God.

And the chosen one.

I stood frozen like a statue, unable to make sense of those words or what they meant. Then the Bow Saint's Sound Transmission continued.

—Yes, you must be confused. I was, too, a long time ago.

A long time ago? Just when was she talking about?

What had the Martial God, who had vanished into the distant past, told her?

But the question that flashed through my mind was cut short before it could even take shape.

—It's a long story I've kept to myself. But talking here and now wouldn't be wise.

I desperately wanted to press her for answers, but the Bow Saint's Sound Transmission was enough to remind me of the situation I'd momentarily forgotten.

Right.

The bloodbath that had unfolded here today was over, but not everything was finished.

The curtain had fallen, but the curtain call remained.

The actors on this blood-soaked stage still had parts to play.

I'll get my answers after that.

I nodded. The Bow Saint understood and quietly turned away, flicking a glance at the one person who'd stood beside us all along, watching in silence.

"That old hag hasn't changed. No, she looks younger, but the look in her eyes is even more unpleasant."

Jeok Cheongang muttered under his breath, then added, "Playing games through Sound Transmission with some young punk right in front of this old man, too."

"…"

"What? You think I wouldn't notice?"

I peeled a crust of dried blood off my cheek. "I figured you would. And even if you hadn't, I would've told you myself."

"You sure know how to talk."

"So, did you hear everything?"

"Do you think the title Bow Saint belongs to Gaettong next door?"

"Then I'll tell you. Every last word. I won't leave out a single syllable."

Jeok Cheongang studied me for a moment, then clicked his tongue.

"Forget it. There's no rush, and she must have had her reasons. Anyway…"

Pat. Pat.

His solid palm tapped my shoulder. He turned his head sharply away, speaking in a gruff voice.

"Uh, well. What I'm trying to say is… hmm."

"Yes?"

"No, what this old man means to say is… Hey, look at you. Are you laughing?"

A laugh must have slipped out without my realizing it.

But I didn't rush to wipe the smile from my face like I used to.

I knew how he felt. And he'd understand how I felt, too.

Thank you. For coming back to me.

That was what Jeok Cheongang had said just a little while ago, when I'd been hovering between life and death, after I finally clawed my way back from death and recovered.

Now it was my turn to say it to him.

“Thank you. For always being by my side.”

I murmured it barely loud enough to hear, then looked up at the empty air as if something there had caught my attention.

It was a little embarrassing, and I wasn’t sure I could face his reaction.

But… well. Sometimes you want to say these things.

Even when you know each other so well that long explanations aren’t needed, sometimes you just want to tell someone how you feel.

And for all his immense martial prowess, Jeok Cheongang was remarkably bad at that.

“Ahem. What’s a hairy bastard like you doing saying something so revolting…”

He hesitated behind another unnecessary cough, then let out a quiet laugh. In the direction he pointed, a group was hurrying toward us.

“This old man’s a given. Save your thanks for them. They threw themselves into a deathtrap just to save you. They deserve at least that much praise, don’t they?”

I turned. Familiar faces were rushing toward me, drenched in blood from head to toe.

One, two, three… six.

They’d all survived. Not one of them was missing.

That was enough. More than enough.

Ah.

Was it the overwhelming relief? Or the exhaustion I’d forgotten?

All the strength went out of me at once. I staggered and began to fall.

No—I nearly fell.

Hands reached out from every side and caught me before I could.

Grab.

Jeok Cheongang, Hyuk Mujin, Ju Hwaran, Song Ilseom, Sama Pyo, Taishan, and the Divine Physician caught my arms and legs. They held me up as I started to topple.

They weren’t a burden to bear. They were pillars holding me steady.

Each of them had returned to this deathtrap hoping to help, even a little. Each had become my greatest reason to win this horrific battle.

“Damn it. I should be lending a hand at a moment like this, but this guy’s so tall I can’t reach him.”

At the mournful complaint from the old Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent perched on Taishan’s shoulder, everyone let out a quiet laugh.

Even me, though I’d been about to close my eyes and give in to the sleep demon.

No. Not yet.

I clenched my teeth and forced strength back into my failing body. Then I left their worried looks behind and started walking.

To bring this hellish night to an end.

To finish off the monster who had created a hellscape no painter could ever depict.

Step. Step.

I walked, and kept walking.

Past the dead and the rebels, bound tight in thick iron chains and struggling to break free.

Past dozens of flags rising high above me.

Until, at last, I saw the monster writhing alone at the Bow Saint's feet. Across that vast space, there were no more cries of protest or screams.

"Eastern Heaven Demon Lord."

At my call, the monster stopped moving.

The moment Jin Taekyung's low voice reached his ears, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord felt all the strength leave his body.

Why?

He didn't know.

Maybe it was because the man before him was Jin Taekyung—the one who had stood in his way at every turning point, every moment when the course of events might have changed.

Or maybe he'd been waiting for someone other than the Bow Saint, who had watched in silence all this time, to stop him.

To stop this meaningless struggle.

This hollow sense of defeat and fury, now that he could no longer achieve his goal.

"Yes, it's you."

A volcano cooled soon after spewing its lava. Now the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord had cooled, too.

"You're late. It's rude to keep someone waiting this long."

Jin Taekyung looked down at him in silence, then spoke.

"Well, I don't think that applies to a monster like you who can't even die."

"A monster, is it? So that's how you see me?"

"Yeah. And to be precise, I'm not exactly polite to people, either."

"Ah. So you were born rude."

"If you'd said that in front of my mom, she would've beaten you to death."

"Didn't you just say I couldn't die?"

"Mom's Divine Palm hits your soul. Not your body."

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord let out a hearty laugh before he could stop himself.

“I think I know what you mean. You have a point.”

Once, he’d had a mother, too.

She was gentle most of the time, but when he did something wrong, she’d scold him harshly and smack him on the back.

Even after all these years, he could faintly remember how it had hurt.

“Yes, I remember. I had times like that, too. My Master was usually gentle, but sometimes he’d take out the switch.”

Yet the more he recalled those happy memories, the more the smile on his lips faded.

“But… now I can’t remember.”

Once, those days had been the present.

They had been today, and yesterday.

But now, the only faces left in his memory were twisted hideously with pain. All he could see was them dead or dying.

“You bastards! Heaven will punish you!”

“Go! Hurry!”

It made no sense.

His mother’s piercing scream as the soldiers brutalized her while she fought to protect her only surviving child, and his Master’s final words—those memories were so vivid. So why were their smiling faces so faint?

Why were they blurred as if lost in fog?

Crack.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord clenched his teeth so hard that his molars shattered.

But the pain that should have followed never came.

Only the result remained: they were broken.

Just as the people around him had died screaming.

Just as he had chosen to become a monster instead of a human being.

“Do you know something?”

His lips, wet with blood, moved. His eyes, fixed on Jin Taekyung, the Bow Saint, and the countless people who had gathered around him, flickered with cold flames.

“This is only the beginning.”

He spat out each syllable, filling it with anger.

He swallowed his resentment toward the world and his grief at knowing he could never be happy again.

“Even if you’ve protected the Imperial Capital, you can’t stop the fires spreading throughout the land.”

He had spent more than half a century in the imperial court. No one had gone without sheltering for a time beneath his vast shadow, and no one had escaped Dark Heaven's reach.

Those frogs had left the great well of the Imperial Capital, each taking up an official post somewhere in the land. There they had put down new roots, grown branches, and borne fruit.

That was why the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord could smile.

He thought of the Great Nation soon to be engulfed by civil war and a raging fire. He thought of Dark Heaven's forces advancing into the Central Plains with those flames before them.

"On that day, the Great Nation will fall."

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord threw his head back and laughed, looking at the Emperor standing before him and mocking the helplessness he would feel.

Chapter 923

How many people feel no fear in the face of death?

Very few.

No—none.

Of course, if you turned the whole world upside down and shook it out, you might find a few. But even among Murim warriors, whose guts are in a league of their own compared to ordinary people, I'd swear there wasn't a madman like that.

After all, it's only natural to fear death when you've lived a life of your own.

A battle-hardened veteran who's survived countless brushes with death and a green kid who hasn't even lost the down on his face are equals before it. Both are afraid.

All the more so if death comes with a full course of unspeakably horrific torture first.

But there are exceptions to everything.

Like the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, laughing at the top of his lungs before the Emperor.

"Ha! Hahahahaha!"

Sprawled on the ground without his limbs, he was a wretched sight.

Yet his laughter rang out like a victor's.

The final death he'd put off once—perhaps dozens of times—was at last upon him. Still, I couldn't find a trace of fear in him.

Was it simply because his body couldn't feel pain?

No.

Even if he'd been an ordinary human instead of a monster, he would have laughed just the same.

He would have cursed the imperial family and the Great Nation that had taken everything from him, and gladly accepted torture and death.

After all those years, the only thing the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord had left was his grievance.

Self-reproach and regret that he hadn't completed his revenge with his own hands.

That was all.

The only truth, the only outcome. Nothing more, nothing less.

"It's over. Completely."

Jeok Cheongang's mutter was clear enough.

No sweet words or kind gestures would get information out of the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord now.

Like a horse galloping across a wilderness without looking back, his path had been set long ago.

"I've seen eyes like that before. Don't waste time. Kill him now, before he can cause any more trouble."

He wasn't speaking only to me. Jeok Cheongang was speaking to everyone here.

It was the greatest respect he could show the people who had fought beside him on the same battlefield—and a proposal addressed to one man.

The ruler of this vast continent.

The Emperor.

"Your Majesty."

Jeong Hogun, a Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, stepped forward with a sword broken in half. Blood covered him from head to toe.

"Please, give your command."

But the Emperor didn't answer.

He stood with his lips pressed shut, gazing down at the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, exhaustion on his face. Some time passed before he spoke.

"What do you think?"

At first, I didn't know who he was asking.

But as the Emperor's gaze settled squarely on me, and the people around us erupted as if a dam had burst, I understood.

The Emperor was asking me, of all people, what should be done with the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord.

"Y-Your Majesty!"

"You mustn't!"

"How could Your Majesty, the sovereign of all under Heaven, ask a mere subject—not even a minister of the court, but a lawless ruffian from the martial world—"

"Lawless ruffians from the martial world, you say."

The Emperor repeated the words quietly and looked around. Officials in court robes had gathered on every side of him.

He studied their faces one by one. Many had survived because he and the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord had been focused solely on each other.

"How strange," the Emperor said at last. "The ruffian you speak of fought so hard he's covered in blood. Yet you ministers of the court have come through this fierce battle looking remarkably untouched."

"…"

"…"

Silence fell in an instant.

Having shut everyone up with a few words, the Emperor turned back to me.

"Now answer me. I want to hear what you think."

I didn’t know.

I didn’t know why he’d singled me out, or what answer he wanted.

But I didn’t dwell on it. As always, I could just say what I had to say.

“If I opposed killing him, would you let him live?”

A single, explosive question that no one had expected. I heard people around us catch their breath.

Even the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord stopped laughing and opened his eyes wide.

The Emperor’s gaze didn’t waver.

No.

“Why not?”

I wasn’t asking because I didn’t know.

Everyone here needed to hear the answer, even if the people beyond the palace walls never did.

I trusted the Emperor to understand what I was doing.

“He is a traitor without equal in history. For years, he kept My Father blind and deaf to what was happening. He used poison to slowly drive most of the imperial family to their deaths, including My Eldest Brother, the Crown Prince.”

Shock rippled through the crowd.

Everyone held their breath as the Emperor revealed a history that had remained hidden. Until now, the world had believed that he himself was the root of all the evil.

“By the time I learned the truth, it was too late. Traitors bent on destroying the Great Nation had seized control of the imperial family and held most of the real power.”

Everyone here could imagine what had followed.

An Emperor reduced to a puppet. Princes already poisoned.

Those heirs to a noble bloodline had neither time nor people left to turn to.

Except for one old general who had protected the Embroidered Uniform Guard with unwavering loyalty, and the Great Nation’s fourth prince, who was far from the throne and had been wandering the provinces.

“There was only one way left.”

And so a restoration took place under the guise of a rebellion.

More than a decade ago, right here in this grand banquet hall.

In a single night, several hundred high-ranking court officials died. Before long, tens of thousands more were exiled or executed.

The fourth prince wielded the blade of the purge without hesitation.

He climbed the bodies of the traitors who had tried to destroy the Great Nation, with the unseen glares and curses of its people at his back.

All the while, he promised himself he would soon reveal the truth and wash away his disgrace.

“Then the late Emperor and the other members of the imperial family were confined because…”

“I tried everything to cure them, but even the Imperial Physicians couldn’t determine what was wrong. They spoke of a great physician who wandered the world like a cloud and could drive away even the Grim Reaper. If we found him, they said, there might be a way.”

“The Divine Physician.”

“Yes.” The Emperor’s expression turned bitter. “But in the end, I could never find him.”

I’d heard the story from the Slaughter Saint himself.

He and the Divine Physician had wandered the land treating its people. Those who remembered their kindness had hidden them from the imperial family’s search.

If the imperial court had found them then…

History would have changed.

Even if the poison that cast its long shadow of death over the imperial family had been the Blood Soul Gu, the Slaughter Saint and the Divine Physician I knew might have found some way to deal with it.

Instead, that twist of fate ended with the deaths of the late Emperor, the crown princes, and several other members of the imperial family. The fourth prince, once so far from the throne, became a usurper and an unfilial son in the eyes of the world.

“Why didn’t you tell anyone? Why keep the truth hidden?”

“It wasn’t that I wouldn’t. I couldn’t. At some point, anything I said or did sounded like a usurper making excuses. It was only when My Father regained his senses at the very end and told Me he would pass the throne to Me that I understood.”

It was a stain he could never erase.

Though the fourth prince had formally received the throne and become the ruler of all under Heaven, people turned their backs on a truth they couldn’t believe.

To them, he was a usurper blinded by ambition, a son who had dragged his father from the throne.

As if that weren’t enough, a murderer and parricide who had led countless families and members of the imperial clan to their deaths.

The traitors who had brought the Great Nation to the brink of ruin became loyal patriots. Those who had tried to protect it were left covered in filth.

And yet…

He had no choice but to go on. He had to pull out the enormous weed that had spread its shadow across the Great Nation, roots and all.

“I took the Imperial Capital and purged countless traitors, but the main stem survived. That restoration was only half a success.”

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord hadn’t been the monster he was now.

He’d fought the Bow Saint and Baek Yeon, suffering injuries so severe he could never recover. Then he’d proposed a deal.

His life in exchange for the fate of the Great Nation.

“For Me… it was an offer I couldn’t refuse.”

The Emperor was the realm, and the Imperial Capital its center.

But the Emperor and the capital were not the whole realm.

If the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord had been killed that day, the Great Nation would have split in two and plunged into a massive war.

With the country hanging by a thread, the only path the fourth prince could choose would have given those who had conspired with the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord long ago, and had waited for the right moment, another excuse to rebel.

“I had to prevent that. No more blood could be spilled.”

The fourth prince had taken up a sword as soon as he could walk.

By the time the calluses on his hands felt natural and the reins were familiar to his touch, he was marching off to war.

Time and again, he’d led armies with outstanding martial skill and strategy, earning great victories. But whenever he went to the battlefield, he would murmur to himself:

This will be the last war.

It has to be the last.

The throne? Glory as a general?

He needed neither. He’d let go of any desire for them long ago.

His brilliant, kind eldest brother would make a sage king. The fourth prince had fought in dozens of wars, great and small, for one reason alone: he wanted the realm his brother would rule to be at peace.

That was all.

But. But…

“So this is what it came to.”

Shing.

The fourth prince—the Emperor—drew his sword.

He looked at me over its shimmering blade, still spotless despite the countless dead it had cut down.

“Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. I ask you again. Do I need another reason to kill him?”

“What you’ve told us is enough,” I said.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord wasn't the only one who had waited for his chance at revenge.

"Then that settles it."

The Emperor's voice was calm, though something fierce burned beneath it. He brought his sword down.

Toward his family's enemy.

Against the traitor of all time, who had plunged his country and its people into misery.

Or he would have.

The Emperor's treasured sword was moving with enough force to split the man in two when a clear young voice rang out.

"One thing is still missing."

Whoosh!

The blade hissed through the air.

The Emperor stopped it a hair's breadth from the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's throat. He turned. So did I, and everyone else.

We saw a boy in clothes spotted with blood, his eyes calm and sad.

Prince Shangshan. Zhu Bao.

Everyone was looking at the young prince. He looked only at one person, and his small, still-growing feet carried him toward that man.

"Your Highness! Your Highness!"

Hong Jin, nowhere to be seen until now, called out in alarm. He must have gone to his master's side as soon as the battle began.

Prince Shangshan didn't stop.

Step.

One step.

Step.

Another.

No one could stand in his way.

At that moment, the boy they saw was a man.

Not a young prince, but another ruler.

And that man, that ruler, slowly bowed his head.

To someone who could not let go of his anger even before death.

Toward the enemy who had killed his parents and siblings.

Swish.

The hem of Prince Shangshan's robe brushed a pool of blood. He bent deeply toward the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord and spoke.

“I’m sorry. I know no words can comfort you, but… I sincerely apologize for what my grandfather did.”

“…!”

“…!”

Everyone was speechless.

The Emperor, the Bow Saint, the Fire King, and me.

Even the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord.

“Ah.”

A quiet groan slipped between his parted lips.

He looked at Prince Shangshan with trembling eyes, then smiled faintly.

“What a damnable thing.”

Thrust!

The blade resting against his skin sank into his throat.

Chapter 924

Thuk.

There was no resistance. Nothing to stop it.

The imperial family's treasured sword cut through the flesh and bone against its edge like tofu, doing its job regardless of its master's wishes.

"…!"

"…!"

Silence fell.

No one there had expected this.

Who could have imagined that a vengeful ghost who had devoted his entire life to bringing down the accursed imperial court and the Great Nation would choose this path?

That he would thrust his own neck onto the blade held out by his enemy's descendant?

And yet, fate, once twisted, would not grant him death so easily.

Grrk. Cough.

Blood and phlegm bubbled through the gaping wound in his throat. Gasping for breath, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord felt his body slowly, little by little, beginning to recover. A rasping laugh escaped him.

What a farce.

He had made himself a monster to survive. Now he was struggling to die.

The power he had once considered a blessing had become a curse that held him captive.

What kind of farce is this?

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord stared up at the sky and laughed emptily.

He resented this body that would not die, however much he wanted it to.

He did not want to meet the inscrutable eyes of Jin Taekyung and the Emperor as they looked down at him.

And…

He could not bring himself to face the child still bowing deeply to him. The boy was barely more than a baby.

No. He was ashamed to face him.

"Twelve years. It was twelve years ago."

Cough.

He spat out the bloody froth rising in his throat and slowly went on.

"I watched from a distance as a child, still young enough to be nursing, left the imperial palace in a eunuch's arms."

The eunuch was Hong Jin. The child was Zhu Bao.

“I wanted to kill him. More than once, even after that.”

But he had not done it.

It was not only because Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao would make the perfect puppet to depose the Emperor and take his place one day.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord had dimly suspected that the Emperor’s decision to make his youngest brother Prince Shangshan and send him far away was a ruse. Even so, he could never bring himself to order the assassination.

He hadn’t even known why he agonized over it so much.

No. He had known and pretended otherwise.

“That child… reminded me of myself.”

In the little boy who had lost his parents and siblings, in that small child being carried out of the palace as if in flight, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord had seen his own past.

Messenger pigeons arrived at regular intervals with news of the boy. In those few written lines, he could read his loneliness.

“They said that far away, more than ten thousand li[3415] from here, the five-year-old cried every night. His sobs were so loud they could be heard over the walls.”

For better or worse, the child was precocious. At five, he had learned the truth.

He was far more special than other children, and perhaps just as much more unfortunate.

Other children did not call their mothers their wet nurses.

“Time passed quickly. By seven, they said, he no longer cried. He’d grown lively instead, practicing martial arts day and night.”

But the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord knew better.

In those few lines of the missive, he could still see the child crying.

“He had only learned to hold back his tears. Just as I once did.”

Something he didn’t want to get used to.

Something he had no choice but to grow used to.

So the child held back his tears. Night after night, he hid from the eunuch and wet nurse who cared for him so devotedly, buried his face in his blanket, and cried without a sound.

If they heard him, they would be sad.

If his sobs carried beyond the walls, he would lose his dignity as a ruler.

Seven years old.

The child had grown up and faced reality.

Far sooner than anyone would have wished.

[3415] In this Chinese setting, one li is 500 m (0.311 mi). Ten thousand li is about 5,000 km (3,110 mi).

“That was when I finally understood. I could no longer kill him.”

Time flowed on like a river.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, unable to recover from the injuries he had suffered at the hands of the Bow Saint, performed his sect’s forbidden ritual and turned himself into a jiangshi. Meanwhile, the child, whose days had always been much the same, met a young man.

Jin Taekyung.

The Third Young Master of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

A wastrel who had only just taken his first step toward turning his life around.

And that third young master of an unremarkable martial family gave the boy something his life had never held before.

A dream.

“‘Dreams come true.‘ That was what it said.”

When the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord read those words in the missive, he laughed despite himself.

The nerve of that young punk, spouting such nonsense to a prince—even if he was only a child. Funnier still was the boy turning that nonsense into a plaque and hanging it in his residence.

But it left a bitter taste, too.

He had once had a clear, shining dream of his own.

And as long as he lived, the child’s dream could never come true.

“Even then, I found myself wondering what dream he held deep in his heart. What he hoped to achieve.”

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord slowly turned his head.

The boy was still bowed low, trembling faintly. At some point, his eyes had filled with tears, and he could not bring himself to straighten up and show them.

“Now I want to hear his answer. He must be thirteen by now.”

Twelve years had passed.

The child had become a boy. The old man had become a monster.

And now, Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao struggled to steady himself.

“My dream…”

He slowly straightened his back and gave voice to the dream he had kept in his heart.

“Is to make certain no one else suffers the misfortune you and I endured.”

“…!”

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord’s eyes trembled.

So did everyone else’s.

“That… will be impossible.”

"That is why it is a dream."

"Do you mean to wish for it, knowing you cannot achieve it?"

"It is a dream because I will not give up. Because I will keep trying, with all my might, to make it come true."

"Do you know what it is you're speaking of?"

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord could no longer hide how shaken he was. Prince Shangshan answered quietly.

"An age of peace and prosperity."

Four characters that had been the wish of all the people since ancient times, and had always betrayed them.

Yet here was a boy of thirteen speaking them aloud.

He was saying that he, at least, would not betray the people. That he would usher in another age like the reigns of Yao and Shun,[3416] when all had lived in peace and happiness.

Every word was sincere.

"I will punish the wicked and reward the good, regardless of their station."

Uprightness.

"I will always watch over and cherish the people, and heed the counsel of those around me."

Humanity and righteousness.

"I will respect every one of my people. I will look beyond their birth and accept their good hearts and wisdom."

Propriety and wisdom.

"And I will sow no seeds of misfortune. Whatever consequences come of that, I will bear them and take responsibility for them."

"Ah."

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord groaned.

The meaning behind the young prince's final words—forbearance—cut into his heart like a blade.

"I… I could forgive nothing. At some point, I began to curse everything."

At the end of a brutal age of turmoil, the warlords who had caused him to lose his family had turned to dust and disappeared.

Taizu, who had burned his sect and slaughtered his Master and fellow disciples, was dead as well.

But the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord remained. So did his thirst for revenge.

No, it burned more fiercely than ever.

Against those who were left. Against people who had done nothing wrong.

[3416] Yao and Shun are legendary ancient Chinese rulers whose reigns are traditionally held up as examples of virtuous government.

“But how… how can you…!”

Unable to bring himself to look straight at the boy, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord closed his eyes and cried out, his voice boiling over.

It was not the anger he had felt before.

He was simply more anguished than ever.

Even now, he could not let go of everything.

And he was ashamed.

The boy before him was holding out, in his small hands, the forgiveness the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord had failed to find in a lifetime.

“Do you know something?”

At the sudden question, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord opened his eyes.

Prince Shangshan was looking at him, his gaze trembling.

“When I learned the whole truth today, I wanted to kill you more than anyone.”

“Then why…?”

“Because my heart ached for you. I realized what made us different: the good fortune I was given, and you were not.”

Prince Shangshan slowly turned his head. A man stood beside him, looking haggard but entirely at ease, as if there were nowhere else he could be. The young prince’s gaze fell on him.

“I had a subject closer to me than family.”

His name was Hong Jin. He had been at the prince’s side from his earliest memories until this very moment.

“And I had an elder brother and loyal subjects who endured countless humiliations for this country.”

The Emperor closed his eyes with a low groan.

The loyal old general and the Embroidered Uniform Guards, who had been forced to seize the throne to confront a greater injustice, clenched their teeth, trying to suppress their agitation.

“When I could not see even a glimmer of light, there were people who reached out to me without asking for anything in return.”

The martial artists of Murim.

People who had stepped outside the Great Nation’s laws and built a world apart.

Yet they had willingly torn down that boundary and rushed into a place where danger waited on every side.

Prince Shangshan’s gaze passed from one to the next. One awkwardly scratched his bald head. Another gave him a gentle nod. One was rubbing his stomach as if he were hungry.

And at the end of his gaze stood a young man.

He was neither the strongest nor the wisest among them. Even so, he stood at the center of them all as naturally as if he belonged there.

He had planted a dream in someone's heart and promised to be his friend. Now he smiled at the boy who had grown so much.

His smile was so bright and warm that, for an instant, even the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord thought the world before his eyes had grown brighter.

Chivalry.

He had forgotten that single word for so long it felt strange to him. The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord turned it over in his empty heart.

Then he saw himself reflected in the young prince's tear-filled eyes: warped and blurred, like a monster.

"The man I saw in you was not only a sinner of the ages, burdened with unforgivable karma. You were also an unfortunate person who had no choice but to walk a different path from mine."

Unfortunate, he had chosen revenge instead of forgiveness.

Inhuman, he had become a monster.

He had thought revenge was the only path. It was the reason he had lived on, first as a human being and then as a monster.

But he had been wrong.

About his purpose. About his reason.

"Now… you can stop."

The quiet words reached him, and the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord went rigid.

You can stop now.

It's all right to stop.

Those simple words melted a heart that had spent so many years burning to ash and freezing over, again and again.

At last, they brought him peace.

So that was it.

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord looked silently up at the sky.

He had resented it without end.

The sky. The whole world.

But when the last veil of anger fell away from his heart, he saw a new world.

Countless stars shone in the sky that had seemed filled with nothing but darkness. A breeze from somewhere carried the scent of grass.

It mingled with the thick stench of blood rising from the hellscape he had made.

Too late. I realized far too late.

Thousands upon thousands of people had already been killed or wounded.

And how many more would be sacrificed because of his choices?

He couldn’t even begin to guess.

Nor could he measure the weight of the crime he would bear for the countless lives swallowed up in the great war he had set in motion.

Yet here, at the end, a new fork in the road lay before him. It whispered insistently that he should make the better choice, even if only by a little.

As if that choice could make his whole black-stained life pale beside it.

—Listen carefully to what I’m about to say.

Whoosh.

The Sound Transmission slipped between his moving lips and mingled with the wind.

It passed the young prince and the Emperor, crossed the ring of Embroidered Uniform Guards and the assembled civil and military officials, and reached one man.

Jin Taekyung.

“…!”

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord smiled bitterly at the sight of Jin staring down at him, eyes wide.

It was far too late. But at the very end, he had made a slightly better choice.

That was all.

—I’ve told you my story. Now it’s time to collect my fortune-telling fee.

Jin Taekyung watched the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord in silence, his gaze sunk deep. Then he nodded and stepped forward.

Splash.

Ripples spread across a pool of thick, sticky blood.

Everyone watching knew what Jin Taekyung was about to do. Not one of the civil or military officials tried to stop him.

They did not dare.

The Emperor and Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao had stepped aside themselves to clear his path.

At this moment, Jin Taekyung was the Emperor’s appointed proxy, granted the authority to execute this great traitor on the Son of Heaven’s behalf.

Shing.

A cool breeze brushed the spearhead he held in a reverse grip. As the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord watched blue-white flames gather slowly at its tip, he spoke.

“Do you think someone like me will have a next life?”

“Probably. You’ll have to spend about three thousand jiazi[3417] as a cockroach or a mosquito first, though.”

[3417] A jiazi is a sixty-year cycle in the traditional Chinese calendar. Three thousand jiazi is 180,000 years.

I see. I suppose so.

At Jin Taekyung's matter-of-fact answer, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord let out a dry laugh. Jin Taekyung continued in an even voice.

"But in your next life, make sure you're born human again."

"What do you mean…?"

"You never know. Maybe someone will help you then, unlike in this life."

"…!"

"If we get the chance, let's meet again. Just don't be too late."

The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord—no, Wei Zhong—fell silent. Then he smiled faintly.

Without another word, he watched the dazzling flames fill his vision.

Whoosh.

Their warmth, strange as it was, wrapped around his entire body.

Chapter 925

Flames surged upward.

They burned with a fierce, terrible heat—and yet, somehow, they felt strangely warm.

Fwoosh.

The blue-white flames that had pierced his body along with the spearhead burned everything, melted everything, and, at the same time, embraced it all.

A man's unhappy life.

A monster who had realized his mistake only at the very end.

Goodbye, Wei Zhong.

I murmured the name I'd seen on the pledge the day before.

And at that moment, the chains of immortality shattered—the imperfect blessing and curse that had bound him.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

As I listened to the clear chimes announcing the arrival of eternal rest, I drew back the Scorching Yang Qi I'd been pouring through White Flame's spearhead.

Less than a handful of ash remained on the blackened ground.

Whoosh.

Was it a chance gust of wind, or a kindness from someone above who had watched it all?

I watched the ash drift far, far away.

Then a man's voice broke the brief silence.

"He was a traitor who tried to bring down the imperial family for his own ends, and a criminal who colluded with foreign enemies to plunge the Great Nation into ruin."

Without taking my eyes off the ash, I asked, "Do you think that was too peaceful an end for a man like that?"

"I do."

"I think so, too."

No matter how much he'd reflected and repented, the crimes he'd committed would not disappear. Everything he had done as the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, not Wei Zhong, was a burden he would have to carry even in Hell.

"Then why did you do it?"

"Why didn't you stop me, Your Majesty?"

The Emperor answered.

"Because I didn't want to."

A short answer, but it said everything. I let out a dry laugh.

"I see."

"Now it's your turn to answer."

"I…"

I paused and bit my lip.

"…Some people came to mind, that's all."

"People like Wei Zhong, then. Sinners who committed wrongs they could never wash away."

"Yes. And like him, they regretted the choices they'd made."

The Head Elder of the Jin Family of Taiyuan had been one of them. So had Baeksang of the Nanman Beast Palace.

They'd followed the guiding light of Dark Heaven down the wrong path and could never retrace their steps.

Sometimes they looked back and regretted the road they'd taken. But they'd gone too far to turn around.

Even as I poured my anger out on them, I couldn't help feeling sorry for them.

They could have made a better choice.

If they had, innocent people wouldn't have had to die.

But it was always too late.

That wasn't self-reproach or regret. What was done was done.

I could condemn the consequences of their choices. But I couldn't presume to condemn the choices themselves.

Revenge is easy. Forgiveness is hard.

That's what people are like.

"I will erect memorials."

The Emperor spoke again into the silence.

"One for those who fell here today. Another for the people sacrificed in the vicious struggles among the heroes of the realm. And the last…"

He paused, turning his gaze west, toward the place where the wind had gone.

"The Maoshan Sect. Yes, the Maoshan Sect would be fitting."

Gasp.

The officials around us sucked in their breath.

Erecting a memorial at the Maoshan Sect would tarnish the reputation of Taizu, the founder of the Great Nation, and the imperial family itself.

But before any of them could speak up, an even greater shock swept over them.

No—it struck them.

"And all of this shall be done in the name of the Crown Prince, not Mine."

"…!"

"…!"

The air seemed to tremble. Everyone’s eyes flew wide.

The Crown Prince.

The new ruler who would one day inherit this vast continent.

I’d completely forgotten why this gathering had been arranged. What awaited us at the end of this blood-soaked banquet.

The seat of Crown Prince had stood vacant for more than a decade. Now, at this very moment, it was about to welcome its new occupant.

“Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao, receive the imperial command!”

The Emperor no longer looked exhausted.

His voice, filled with the majesty only the sovereign of a nation could possess, pierced the air. Riding the wind, it enveloped the entire grand banquet hall.

Clang! Clang! Clang!

Beginning with Baek Yeon, Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, thousands of guards drew their swords and pointed them at the sky.

Their golden armor flashed, as did their blood-soaked blades.

That brilliant tide of steel shone for one boy alone.

For the young prince who had chosen forgiveness over revenge even before his enemy. For the boy who dreamed of an age of peace no ruler in the past thousand years had achieved.

“Ah. Ah…”

The Emperor calmly addressed his younger brother, who stood at a loss before this sudden turn of events.

“Do you intend to defy the imperial command?”

“Y-Your Majesty.”

“Come closer.”

“But, but Your Majesty already…”

No one failed to understand what Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao meant to say, or where he was looking.

A woman stood surrounded by palace attendants, clutching her swollen belly.

I knew her name. She had gone from the favored concubine of the City Lord of Sichuan Province to a consort of the Emperor.

Aehyang.

She watched us through clenched teeth, anger plain in her eyes.

But the Emperor’s expression held not a trace of emotion as he looked at her.

It was as though she were a tool he had kept at his side because he needed it.

Wait. Could it be?

The thought had barely crossed my mind when the Emperor spoke.

“That child, when it comes into this world, will bear the blood of the late City Lord of Sichuan Province.”

“…!”

“Therefore, neither that woman nor the child in her womb has anything to do with Me. No one is to raise questions about this.”

The court officials looked stunned by his declaration. But a few of us, myself included, were certain of one thing.

The Emperor hadn’t spoken a single lie.

I suspected it, but it’s actually true.

The Emperor had an Empress and consorts, yet had produced no heir in more than ten years.

Looking back, though, it wasn’t that he couldn’t have an heir. He had chosen not to.

For the sake of his one and only younger brother, Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao.

He must have wanted to protect him from every threat. The throne—and his younger brother.

The sole direct heir of the orthodox imperial lineage.

And, at the same time, a perfect puppet for Dark Heaven—a figure who gave them every justification they needed to overthrow the Emperor.

On the surface, it had seemed that the Emperor couldn’t bear to kill his little brother and had sent him into exile instead. But Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao had survived this long because of the Emperor’s plan.

“Do you still not understand?”

He had given up having an heir for his brother’s sake. For that same brother, he had had to become a coldhearted older brother. He went on slowly.

“I kept that seat empty for you from the beginning. Only you could take it.”

Though he had ascended the most exalted throne under Heaven, he had been branded a traitor and an unfilial son.

Though he tended to affairs of state day and night, that brand had made people call him a tyrant.

“I wanted you to survive. I didn’t want you to become My one weakness.”

Perhaps, when the child who had not yet been weaned was sent away from the imperial palace, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord hadn’t been the only one watching him go from afar.

“I had to send you away to protect you. And to root out the traitors I couldn’t eradicate before, I had to bring you back into this deadly place.”

More than a decade was no short stretch of time.

It had been long enough for the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord to shore up his weakened foundations. Long enough for the Emperor to prepare the decisive battle that would end everything.

And the Emperor had secretly brought his only younger brother back with the help of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, then protected him by keeping him confined.

He had even made an invincible master known as the Bow Saint serve as a mere bodyguard.

"Bao'er."[3418]

The voice that passed between the Emperor's dry lips was astonishingly warm.

Warm enough to make even Baek Yeon, who had stood beside him longer than anyone as comrade and subject, widen his eyes.

Warm enough to make the body and heart of a boy who had longed for his family for so long suddenly go rigid.

"It's time."

"…!"

At those quiet words, the boy's clear, river-bright eyes trembled.

But there was no hesitation in them. Only resolve, and the will of someone moving toward his dream.

"I, Prince Shangshan Zhu Bao…"

Swish.

The long hem of his robe brushed a pool of blood. Yet even on a battlefield stained red in every direction, the young prince's light had not dimmed in the slightest.

"…humbly accept the command of His Majesty the Emperor."

A smile unlike any anyone had ever seen spread across the Emperor's wrinkled lips.

"Granted."

"Waaaaah!"

Amid the earth-shaking roar, the two who had finally found each other after such a long, wandering road embraced.

Not as ruler and subject, but as brothers.

When the Emperor and the Great Nation's new Crown Prince embraced, those watching trembled, unable to contain the emotion rising within them.

"Ah…"

[3418] In Chinese, -er is an affectionate suffix added to a name.

How desperately they had wished, for more than a decade, that it had all been a lie.

That the natural order, twisted and blackened like a monster, would one day be set right.

And yet.

And yet, it had.

What they had yearned for in silence was unfolding before their eyes.

They had witnessed the end of one era and the beginning of another. Emotions they could not name surged through them, then spilled out in a tremendous roar.

“Long live His Majesty the Emperor!”

“May His Highness the Crown Prince live a thousand years!”

“Please, please put this servant to death!”

Cheers and cries rang out on every side.

Some who had known the truth laughed and wept like children. Others, deceived by lies into condemning the Emperor, staggered with guilt and regret.

But some belonged to neither group.

“Long live! Long live! Long, long live!”

Dry lips called endlessly for the Emperor’s long life. Tears drenched wrinkled cheeks.

Yet the shrewd gray eyes taking in the scene remained dark and still.

I never thought things would go this wrong.

The old man swallowed the words he must never let escape his lips and considered the chance that remained to him.

But it isn’t over yet.

He had known the truth from the beginning and joined hands with the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord solely for wealth and glory. He had no intention of being exposed as a traitor and seeing his entire clan slaughtered.

The pledge. I only need to get rid of the few people who know about the pledge and who I really am.

The saying “Succeed and you’re a king; fail and you’re a traitor” was wrong.

Even if you actually plotted treason, it wasn’t a crime as long as you weren’t caught.

The old man had once tutored the former Crown Prince. Revered by Confucian scholars throughout the realm, he had risen to the rank of Grand Academician. And in matters like this, he was meticulous.

I’ll survive. Just as I always have.

Repeating that resolve to himself, the old man cried out “Long live!” amid the confusion of the crowd, inching backward.

He needed to reach the subordinates waiting outside the imperial palace as quickly as possible.

If he eliminated the handful of key figures who knew his identity and took possession of the pledge, he could keep his current position. And even if things became difficult, he could take his family's wealth and flee.

Or so he believed.

Until someone's voice, strangely clear amid the deafening roar, pierced his ears.

"Where are you off to in such a hurry? A time like this calls for sharing the joy."

"…!"

The old man went rigid.

He slowly turned his head and saw a young man approaching at an unhurried pace.

"Jin… Taekyung."

"Come on. Just 'Jin Taekyung'? That's cold."

Jin Taekyung gave him a small smile and added, "You should call me Comrade Jin Taekyung."

"What, what are you…"

"You didn't know? I signed the pledge, too."

"…!"

"Oh. Have I got the wrong person?"

Jin Taekyung tilted his head. At that moment, a cold voice sounded behind the old man.

"It's been a while, Grand Academician."

Thwack!

A blow struck the back of his neck. As his vision went black, one name came to mind.

Hong Jin.

It was over. All of it.

Chapter 926

Everyone makes the wrong choice sometimes.

At least a few times in life.

No—count the little choices we make every day, and the number might run into the thousands.

But a wrong choice doesn't mean your life is over.

You can regret it, learn from it, and choose a better path next time.

Of course, that only works if you get a next time.

"I—I've done nothing wrong! This is a misunderstanding!"

"Your Majesty! Your Majesty!"

"You scoundrels! How dare you lay hands on me!"

Fear. Desperation. Anger.

Dozens of people shouted, each caught up in their own emotions.

Their silk robes had lost none of their sheen, and their plump bodies spoke to just how high their station had been—even in a place death had just torn through. But all the wealth and glory they had enjoyed until now were over, effective this very moment.

Such was the fate of those guilty of high treason.

"Arrest every last one of them!"

"Loyalty!"

Swish, swish!

No sooner had Baek Yeon given the order than the Embroidered Uniform Guards surrounding the area swung their binding ropes and scabbards into action.

One civil official, already resigned to his fate, let himself be bound without a word. An old general in dazzling armor resisted, showing off a fair amount of skill in martial arts.

Then he got his skull cracked.

Whack!

"You bastards, how dare you—Guh!"

"Let's not wear ourselves out already. Come quietly. You'll have plenty of chances to scream later."

"W-what are you going to do with me?"

"You already know, don't you, old Assistant Military Commissioner?"

"…!"

At the Embroidered Uniform Guard's cold smile, the old general sank to the ground, his face blank.

He had realized that the warm blood running from the crown of his head was nothing compared to what he would be made to shed later.

And one man was weaving his way through the chaos.

“It’s been a while. Last time we met, I think you called me a ball-less eunuch bastard.”

One man.

“You haven’t forgotten me, have you? Oh, we’ve never met? Cut the crap. I remember everything.”

Two men.

“Oh, look who it is. You’ve gotten so fat I almost didn’t recognize you. Don’t worry. I’ll slim you down this time.”

“…”

Every line out of his mouth sounded like a death threat.

Each time Hong Jin greeted someone as warmly as a man at his first school reunion in ten years, gold-armored diet supplements marched over and dragged that person away.

Their faces were flushed at the tantalizing prospect of a fresh batch of prisoners to fill the Embroidered Uniform Guard’s jails, which had stood empty for some time.

“W-wait! Torturer Hong!”

“I’m not a torturer anymore. It’s been ages since I was appointed Deputy Military Commissioner of Shanxi Province. Stop making a racket calling for me and go on ahead. Oh, and give your balls a good wash.”

The man who had once committed defamation by stating a fact[3419]—calling Hong Jin a ball-less eunuch—was dragged away. Watching him go, the second man—the one who had claimed they had never met—swallowed hard.

“Um, Comrade Hong. I think there’s been some misunderstanding…”

“Who’s your comrade?”

“Pardon?”

“Do you know me? And what misunderstanding? Drag this traitorous bastard to the jail and throw him in.”

Watching everything unfold at lightning speed right before my eyes, I murmured to myself.

There’s going to be a bloodbath.

I couldn’t even guess how many would die. Hundreds? Thousands?

Or tens of thousands, like last time?

And once the traitors who weren’t here today and their families were counted, the purge would be massive.

“Do you pity them?”

[3419] Under South Korean law, stating a true fact can still constitute criminal defamation.

At the Emperor's sudden question, I gave a small shake of my head.

"Those bastards committed crimes worthy of death. Of course they should pay for it. It's just…"

"You're worried that people with nothing to do with the treason will be sacrificed."

"…"

"It cannot be helped. The law of the land must be upheld, especially where treason is concerned."

"I know. I understand."

Revenge begets revenge.

If someone survived the purge with a grudge and plotted for the future, they could become the seed of another disaster.

Just as the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord had.

"But there may be exceptions."

My eyes widened at the unexpected declaration.

"You mean…"

"Make every cause and connection crystal clear, and spare at least those who are innocent. That was what Bao'er[3420] asked of Me just now."

The Emperor added with a faint smile, "It was also his first request of Me as Imperial Younger Brother and as My brother."

"…!"

"That boy will become a sage king who brings about an age of peace. He will care for his people more than anyone, and they will love him in return."

Had this man always smiled so much?

The Emperor, whose face had always been cold and gloomy, looked much brighter now.

His eyes rested on Prince Shangshan—or rather, Zhu Bao, now the Imperial Younger Brother—as the boy met his gaze and awkwardly bowed his head. The warmth in the Emperor's eyes was impossible to hide.

Even the Emperor is still just an older brother, in the end.

I gave a quiet snort and said, "That's right. He'll definitely be a sage king."

"He is also highly skilled in martial arts. One day he will cross the Great Wall and conquer the vast grasslands, the lost lands of the Northern Sea, and the deserts as well."

"Huh?"

"What is it?"

"Um. Nothing. It's possible."

I wanted to ask what martial arts had to do with any of that, but I held back.

[3420] The suffix -er is an affectionate diminutive in Chinese names.

Why was I starting to think of Jin Wikyung?

“Indeed. Entirely possible.”

“Of course.”

“And that is not all. He will build cities of gold and establish a great empire that will endure for a thousand years.”

“…A thousand years is a bit…”

“Do you think that’s impossible right now?”

No, even if I thought about it as hard as I could, that seemed a bit much.

But the Emperor’s eyes narrowed. I swallowed the words on the tip of my tongue and showed off my dazzling reflexes.

“I just thought you were aiming a little low. I was thinking ten thousand years.”

“Ten thousand years is impossible.”

“…”

“Perhaps it’s because you’re a Murim practitioner, but you do have a rather fanciful streak. You should try to develop a more realistic outlook.”

This son of a bitch.

I’d tried to play along, and he’d gone all serious on me. I was left speechless. Just then, a hand discreetly poked me in the side.

Poke.

I didn’t need to turn to know who it was.

I tamped down my anger at the Emperor and moved my lips.

—Don’t worry. Even if I am a Madman, do you really think I’d beat up the Emperor?

Jeok Cheongang replied through Sound Transmission.

—You’re certainly capable of it, but that’s not what I meant.

—If that’s not it, then… don’t tell me—

I turned, eyes wide, and Jeok Cheongang nodded gravely.

—You’re going to hit him yourself, Old Master?

—…

—Good heavens, have you gone senile again? You can’t. If you lay a hand on the Emperor, it’s over for all of us. If he gets pissed off at us and cozies up to Dark Heaven, we won’t have a Great Nation anymore. We’ll have a Dark Heaven Nation. With Hell thrown in.

I was still desperately trying to talk him out of it, like a missionary at Yeongdeungpo Station shouting that believers go to Heaven and unbelievers go to Hell, when Jeok Cheongang gave me a withering look and jerked his chin over my shoulder.

—Before I pluck those dog eyes out, look who’s waiting behind you.

I turned. In the distance stood someone watching us with calm, still eyes.

The Bow Saint.

The instant our gazes met, the relief and joy that had surrounded me seemed to wash away.

An inexplicable chill seeped deep into my lungs.

—So it was you.

The question I had yet to answer—and that voice—lingered faintly in my ears like a breeze at dawn.

—The chosen one the Martial God spoke of.

What had she meant? What truth lay behind those words?

My gaze wavered despite myself.

The Bow Saint gave me a slight nod, then quietly turned and began walking.

Toward somewhere out of sight of the crowd.

Toward a secluded place where she could reveal the secret she had kept until now.

I followed the Bow Saint without a word.

As if to prove that the battle in the grand banquet hall had not been the whole of it, bodies and blood that no one had yet cleared away lay throughout the once-clean, spacious imperial palace.

Still, no one stopped me and the Bow Saint as we crossed the palace at an unhurried pace.

If anything, people hesitated, then bowed and stepped aside.

They recognized us.

They knew who we were, and which side we had fought on—the Emperor's or the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's.

But unlike them, I still didn't know.

I didn't know what the Bow Saint's cryptic words meant, or much of anything about the figure shrouded almost entirely in mystery.

The Martial God.

A peerless hero born of the Great Faction War, who had appeared out of nowhere one day and vanished just as suddenly.

No—he had become the very sky looking down upon all of Murim.

People said there had never been anyone like the Martial God, and there never would be again.

There were mighty figures known as the Three Saints and the Ten Kings, but the Martial God stood in a realm none of them could reach.

That was why they called him the sky. A god.

But…the Martial God was gone now.

The symbol and center of Murim had vanished like a phantom just after disbanding the Murim Alliance.

As though he had never existed.

As though he'd been waiting for this to happen from the beginning.

As the years passed after his sudden disappearance, rumors sprang up like weeds.

Some said he had died after failing to recover from the internal injury he sustained in his final life-and-death duel with the Heavenly Demon. Others said he was spending the rest of his life in some remote mountain valley.

And that wasn't all.

Some claimed that, having attained enlightenment, he had finally become an immortal.

There were plenty of wilder rumors, too: that the Martial God had always been something like a divine beast protecting the Central Plains, and would never appear in human form again.

With so many mysteries surrounding him, the Martial God had always been a fascinating subject.

The tales of his deeds sounded like myths and legends.

Even to those who had seen him up close. And to me.

And yet…

For that Martial God to come up so suddenly.

I hadn't seen so much as the Martial God's little finger, but the mere mention of his title made every hair on my body stand on end.

Now that we had reached our destination and stopped, the feeling was stronger than ever.

Rustle.

The deep night was giving way to dawn.

Even the sound of wet grass brushing against us had a chill to it. The Bow Saint slowly looked around, then spoke without turning.

"You've been here before, haven't you?"

She looked like a young woman barely into her thirties, but the Bow Saint was an old master who had lived through ages beyond my imagining.

I answered with the respect she was due.

"Yes."

"I remember you charging at me as though you meant to kill me. It left quite an impression."

The Bow Saint reached out and lightly tapped a flower bud that had yet to bloom.

Countless rare and beautiful plants filled this place. It was the same abandoned space where she and I had met a few days ago.

“Whenever I felt troubled, I would come here for a walk. People treated it as forbidden ground, so there wasn’t so much as an ant around.”

“Then that day, too…”

“That’s right. Something was troubling me. No matter how much I thought about it, I couldn’t reach a conclusion, so I came here to walk and think.”

The Bow Saint turned. Her eyes curved like crescents, but the gaze within them was grave and still.

“You were the chosen one the Martial God spoke of, someone who was supposed to possess the supernatural powers to escape even death…so why are you in an irrecoverable state?”

“…!”

Chapter 927

An inexplicable shiver ran down my spine.

A supernatural power that could even evade death.

I knew better than anyone what it was. There was no other way to describe it than as something uncanny, like the work of ghosts.

The System.

A stroke of luck that had come into my life when it was sinking like a boat with a hole in its hull.

A power that had brought me both my greatest crisis and my greatest opportunity.

Yet in this world called Murim, only one person besides me knew the System existed.

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

No one else could know the true nature of the power I possessed.

Not the Bow Saint, and not even the handful of people who had stayed closest to me.

They might have some vague sense that there's something there, but that's as far as it goes.

I'd crossed the line between life and death more times than I could count.

I'd survived situations that would have killed an ordinary person several times over, and I'd grown at a pace without precedent in Murim's history.

Even so, no one knew exactly what my power was.

No—not unless I told them the truth myself.

That was the kind of power the System was.

An ability beyond anything a human could imagine, one that even the four characters meaning supernatural powers couldn't fully capture.

Even the Bow Saint is no exception.

The shock I'd felt a moment ago had already settled. But one question remained, and I couldn't answer it on my own: how had they learned there was something special about me when only a handful of people knew?

The Bow Saint. And…

The Martial God.

The shadows of two giants who had vanished from the world long ago fell over me now.

Not like shade that offered relief from the heat, but like darkness.

It made my skin crawl.

I licked my dry lips. My mouth felt as rough as if I'd chewed and swallowed a fistful of sand.

What on earth do they know? How much?

Just as I sent the unspoken question drifting through my mind, the Bow Saint—who had been watching me in silence with deeply shadowed eyes—suddenly spoke.

“You’re calmer than I expected. I thought you’d ramble on with excuses. Or pretend you didn’t know.”

I forced myself to answer evenly. “Would that change anything?”

“No. Nothing at all. You know that, too, don’t you?”

That answer made one thing certain.

The woman before me—the Bow Saint—had been watching me all along.

And she knew more than I’d imagined.

Then could it be…? No. That can’t be.

I pushed away the question that had flashed through my mind and asked sharply, “Since when?”

“That short question seems to hold several meanings. Let’s see… I’m not sure how to answer it. Why don’t I start with what happened today?”

The Bow Saint gently brushed the flowers lining either side of the path as she continued.

“Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung. When I saw you rise even though you should have died, I finally knew who the chosen one the Martial God spoke of was.”

“How could that man—no, how could he…”

“How does he know about you?”

I nodded, keeping my agitation in check.

Every nerve in my body felt drawn taut.

Depending on her answer, everything could change. What happened next could take a turn even I couldn’t predict.

Then the Bow Saint gave a short reply that stopped my thoughts cold.

“How would I know?”

“What does that—”

“Neither I nor he could have known. Of course not. I found the letter before you were even born.”

“…A letter? Before I was born?”

“Yes. I first found it after many years had passed since the Great Faction War ended—long enough for the mountains and rivers to change more than once.”

Her calm voice mingled with the dawn air and drifted to my ears.

“At first, I thought it was simply a trace left by some unknown person from long ago. But I was wrong. The Martial God had left that letter for me.”

“Then what exactly did it say?”

“An arrangement he had made. No—perhaps a kind of prophecy.”

“…!”

“And there was one term that appeared throughout it.”

My chest felt tight, as though a great stone had settled inside it. I forced the words out.

“The chosen one.”

“That’s right. And ‘the chosen one’ didn’t necessarily refer to any one particular person.”

Step. Step.

Her careful footsteps carried her past the blades of grass. Faint moonlight fell over her as she walked through the garden.

“I couldn’t believe it, but I had no choice.”

Because he was the Martial God.

Awe she couldn’t conceal filled those words. Her voice as faint as the moonlight, the Bow Saint continued at the pace of her steps.

“So, after several decades, I went out into the world and traveled the land. I spent most of my time in the Central Plains, but once I went as far as the endless desert in the west. Another time, I crossed the grasslands and reached the Northern Sea, where moss and ice covered everything.”

Searching for the “chosen one” mentioned in the Martial God’s letter was like searching a field of sand for one special grain. The Bow Saint had to shoulder the entire burden alone.

“I couldn’t ask anyone for help. The letter said not a single detail about the mission could be revealed until I’d succeeded.”

But the Bow Saint hadn’t given up.

The Martial God’s arrangement, almost a prophecy, required someone called the chosen one.

“When the whole world is covered in darkness, that person will become a lamp and light the way. The only one who will open a new sky and bring the morning.”

The Bow Saint murmured the words, then turned her face toward the sky.

“But no matter how long I searched for someone whose age, face, name, and even gender I didn’t know, the chosen one never appeared.”

Of course not.

Finding one person in this vast land—someone who might not even have been born yet—was nearly impossible.

“But not entirely. If what he wrote in the letter was true, the chosen one would stand out with astonishing speed.”

A needle in a bag.

Sooner or later, the needle was bound to poke through. No matter where it was, or how deeply it was buried in a crowd.

“I followed rumors and sought out people I thought might be the chosen one. But even at Heaven’s Gate Temple, where the brightest talents in the land gather, I found no reason to be certain.”

Heaven’s Gate Temple was where Jin Mukyung, my second older brother and the Second Young Master of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, had spent some time.

It was a cradle of talent, crowded with the heirs of prominent sects and gifted people of every kind.

But even its cadets, remarkable as each of them was, fell far short of what the Bow Saint expected of the chosen one.

“They were all outstanding, but that was all. Every one of them had a clear limit. As did I.”

I’d listened in silence until then. At last, I understood why she, like the other Three Saints, had disappeared from public view—though her disappearance had been overshadowed by the Martial God’s.

And why she had been staying in the Imperial Palace.

“You used the imperial information network.”

“‘Cooperating with’ would be more accurate than ‘using.‘ That was before the current Emperor, then the Fourth Prince, staged his coup.”

“Then does the Emperor know…?”

“No. He suspects something, vaguely, but he knows nothing. That was one of my conditions. What matters is that after he took the throne, I gained access to information from every corner of the land.”

The Bow Saint was a weight on the scales, powerful enough to tip the balance in an instant.

Disguised as a palace attendant, she stayed by the Emperor’s side and learned what was happening across the land, from the smallest incident to the largest. The presence of an unidentified Supreme Peak master also restrained the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord’s movements.

“In many ways, it was the right choice. Staying in the Imperial Palace let me learn things I’d never seen or heard before.”

One was Dark Heaven, which had sunk its roots deep into the imperial court. The other was…

“Someone who was growing beyond my sight.”

The Bow Saint looked away from the sky and toward me. Our eyes met, and I quietly swallowed.

“The Jin Family of Taiyuan. Jin Taekyung. At first, the names were unfamiliar, and I had no interest in them. Not until the second piece of news came from Shanxi.”

“What second report?”

“The unbelievable story that the Fire King, Jeok Cheongang, had taken on a Disciple.”

The Bow Saint smiled faintly.

“Of course, the reports that came in quite some time after that were far more surprising.”

A year after the Jin Family of Taiyuan took control of Shanxi Province, I finished my secluded training on Mount Jiuhua and descended the mountain.

I was nothing like the person I’d been before.

In my martial prowess. In my state of mind.

And there were major events waiting for me, too.

“Each time I heard news of you, I grew more interested. No—it was more than interest.”

The chosen one.

The lamp that would light the night. The one who would open a new sky and bring the morning.

The unknown person the Bow Saint had searched for so long was slowly emerging from behind the curtain.

“That was why I had to see for myself. I needed to know which of the two people I was weighing in my mind was the chosen one.”

Two people.

The word cut through my ears with unusual clarity. A name flashed through my mind like lightning.

“…Cheongpung.”

At the name that escaped me, the Bow Saint gave a small nod.

“Yes. Cheongpung, the Huashan Divine Dragon. He had every chance of being the chosen one, too. If I hadn’t seen you in the grand banquet hall, I would have believed the Sword Saint’s Disciple was the one.”

But from her point of view, there had been no need to bring both of us here.

She was already fairly certain one of us was the chosen one.

And I had enough ties to draw me into what had happened.

“I already knew of your connection with Prince Shangshan—no, the Imperial Younger Brother. When Dark Heaven reached out to Hong Jin first, pretending to be on our side, I thought it might work in our favor. But I needed something more definite.”

Then I remembered.

Ma Sanbao had been the one who first contacted Hong Jin.

And saving Zhu Bao wasn’t the only reason I’d thrown myself into the death trap of the Imperial Palace.

“Blood Soul Gu…”

Was this what it felt like to be struck in the back of the head with a sledgehammer?

I spoke through a groan.

“Were you the one who planted the Blood Soul Gu in the City Lord of Sichuan Province?”

The Bow Saint’s bitter smile burned itself into my eyes.

Chapter 928

Blood Soul Gu.

A cursed venomous creature created by the Five Poisons Sect, which had once drenched Nanman in blood.

When I realized what had driven the City Lord of Sichuan Province to his death, everyone—including me—had been certain it was Dark Heaven's doing, and that it had deep ties to the Emperor.

But now I wasn't so sure.

What was true, and what was false? How much of what I knew could I believe?

And was the woman standing before me, watching me with a bitter smile, really on our side?

And…

If the Bow Saint was the one who planted the Blood Soul Gu, then what kind of being is the Martial God behind her—the one who foresaw my appearance?

The Martial God was shrouded in mystery, and my questions about him seemed endless.

Grind.

I ground my teeth and glared at the Bow Saint.

"I asked you who planted the Blood Soul Gu in the City Lord of Sichuan Province."

The Bow Saint watched me in silence, then abruptly spoke.

"What would you do if I said it was me?"

"…!"

A jolt ran down my spine. I forced myself to keep my voice steady.

"You'd have to explain yourself. Well enough to convince all of us, including me."

"And if it still doesn't convince you?"

"Then…"

I swallowed. Almost by instinct, I lowered my stance a fraction, ready to strike at any moment.

There was no absolute good or evil in this world. But Dark Heaven—and the Lord of Heaven—came close enough to absolute evil.

If the Bow Saint had used the Blood Soul Gu, which was deeply connected to Dark Heaven, and it had close ties to Dark Heaven, there was only one thing I could do.

"I wouldn't keep speaking to you this politely."

At that moment, a fierce wind swirled around us.

Whoosh.

No. It wasn't swirling. The winds were colliding.

The waves of qi pressing against each other were about to surge when the Bow Saint's narrowed eyes curved like a full moon.

"Good. That's how it should be."

"What…?"

"You've exceeded my expectations. In every way."

It didn't take long to understand what her smile and those few words meant.

A test.

The thought flashed through my mind, and the tension gripping my whole body snapped loose.

Damn it.

The Bow Saint frowned in mock disapproval.

"Hm. Still wet behind the ears, and you talk to your elders like that?"

"If you were really an elder, you wouldn't mess with someone who's still wet behind the ears."

"I've spent decades looking for you. What's a little teasing after all that?"

The Bow Saint smiled faintly. As she looked at me, there was a hint of approval in her eyes.

"So you had nothing to do with the City Lord's death or the Blood Soul Gu after all?"

"I had something to do with it."

The Bow Saint tossed out the bombshell as if it were nothing. She stroked a flower and continued.

"I sent him back into danger, knowing full well he would die soon. I thought that if he died in Sichuan, someone close to you there would notice what had happened."

"You knew he was going to die?"

"The City Lord of Sichuan Province was already infected with the Blood Soul Gu while he was staying in the Imperial Capital. Naturally, it was Dark Heaven's doing—or, more precisely, the doing of the City Lord's favorite concubine."

"Wait. Aehyang?"

"Yes."

My eyes widened. The Bow Saint went on in the same even tone.

"Don't be surprised. If you need to control someone and that someone is a man, there's no surer method than using a beautiful woman."

"But how did you know she was working for Dark Heaven just from that?"

"I investigated her discreetly myself and found that she was highly skilled in Soul Bewitchment. I'd heard he was neglecting his duties because he was besotted with women. I was keeping an eye on him when I had him summoned to the Imperial Capital."

A memory from not so long ago came back to me: the first time I'd met the City Lord, before the incident that came to be known as the Sichuan Blood Tragedy. He'd been half naked even then.

So even back then…?

A chill ran down my spine.

Not because I'd failed to notice that Aehyang, a Dark Heaven agent, was right beside him. Because I couldn't begin to guess how far Dark Heaven's shadow—its dark hand—had reached.

"Then does that mean…?"

"Yes."

The Bow Saint nodded before I could finish.

"Dark Heaven has reached the roots of the Great Nation. It has worked its way into every corner, so thoroughly that we don't know where its reach ends."

"…!"

"The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's death didn't end this. There are likely still quite a few local officials with real power, great and small, working with Dark Heaven. Generals who command armies, too. And that would include some of the City Lords who govern the provinces."

I swallowed.

A province might sound like a simple administrative division, but the land and population within one were enormous.

Why else had dozens of warlords proclaimed themselves kings and fought for supremacy in the chaotic age of the past? Just to claim legitimacy by calling themselves kings?

Half right, half wrong.

If you conquered a region and absorbed all the strength of its land, you could build enough power to claim the title of king of an entire nation.

These days, the City Lords were officials who answered to a powerful central government. But if they set their minds on rebellion, they could do tremendous damage to the Great Nation.

He wasn't exaggerating. He wasn't lying.

Before the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord had accepted everything and let go, he'd poured out a curse in his rage.

This is only the beginning. Even if you protected the Imperial Capital, the flames will sweep across the land.

But they hadn't been empty words spat out in anger. There was truth in them. A time bomb that might go off before long.

Damn it.

My head felt hot. My breath came ragged though I hadn't moved, and my heart pounded.

I could almost see flames flickering before my eyes, ready to swallow both the modern world and Murim. And behind them stood the shadow of a giant who had swept aside the curtain and appeared when no one expected him.

"Then what do we do now? What do we do from here?"

I asked the Bow Saint, struggling to catch my breath.

No. The question was really for the person who had left a letter long ago and, through it, guided her to this moment.

The Martial God.

Born a man, yet called a god. He had saved the world once and left behind a plan to save it again.

I was asking him.

I wanted another prophecy from his letter to the Bow Saint. One ray of light to show me the way down this pitch-black road.

"What am I—fuck—what am I supposed to do?!"

I was practically shouting. The Bow Saint's answer held no light at all.

"I don't know. Neither does he."

"…!"

All the strength went out of me. My vision blurred, and my head sank.

I'd been sure there was something more. Something more to it.

I thought he would be different, if anyone could. He was the one who had been certain that a person like me would appear someday.

I'd even found myself thinking something impossible.

What if the Martial God—the greatest of all time, with his dazzling achievements and divine authority—

Maybe…

I clenched my teeth and was about to follow that unbelievable thought to its conclusion when a quiet voice reached my lowered head.

"But there is one thing."

I slowly raised my head as if under a spell.

The Bow Saint was there, gazing at me with eyes sunk deep.

"He left a message for the chosen one."

"What…what message?"

"Divine strength."

Why did those two words make me freeze? An inexplicable chill crept down my spine.

The Bow Saint spoke calmly and quietly, but her voice rang in my ears like thunder.

“He said the chosen one must forge a path with the divine strength and Will only the chosen one can possess. Just as…”

Her voice trailed off. In that instant, the world slowed.

An invisible curtain seemed to fall over my eyes and ears. I could see only the Bow Saint—her lips moving slowly. I could hear only the words passing between them.

Just as you yourself did.

“…!”

Time began to move again.

I didn’t. I stared at her, frozen as if I were trapped in ice.

I…what did I just…

What had I heard?

My mind felt as though it had emptied completely. A few words floated there, bright against the blankness.

Just as you yourself did.

Just as you, the Martial God, did.

That could mean only one thing.

The Martial God had been a chosen one like me.

No. More precisely…

A System user.

Player.

The word rushed in to fill my empty mind, swelling until it felt ready to burst. A clear chime rang out.

Ding.

And at that moment—

Slip.

I felt the sky and ground slowly turn over as I fell into pitch-black darkness.

Everything happened at once.

Jin Taekyung’s trembling form crumpled like a puppet with its strings cut. The Bow Saint’s hand shot out and seized his collar. And finally, the cold dawn air that had drifted through the abandoned garden suddenly grew hot.

Grab. Fwoosh!

The Bow Saint steadied Jin Taekyung, then spoke to the uninvited guest who had suddenly appeared.

“How strange. I don’t remember inviting you, too.”

The guest answered in a low voice.

“I do call him my Disciple. How could I leave him alone with some nasty old hag and not worry?”

The Fire King, Jeok Cheongang.

His voice was calm, but flames flickered in his eyes.

“Fine. Let’s hear what kind of nonsense you’ve been up to.”

The Bow Saint gave a short laugh and shook her head.

“All these years, and you haven’t changed. Still charging in without thinking.”

“Do I have to say it twice?”

“You were hiding like a rat and listening. You already know. That was all I said. The boy was simply exhausted beyond his limits.”

She looked down at the unconscious Taekyung. Dried blood marked his face in several places, and the strain of his fierce struggle still showed there.

They were traces of how brilliantly—and nobly—he had fought.

“Take him with you. Let him get a little more rest.”

Jeok Cheongang didn’t hesitate for long. He carried Jin Taekyung on his back as if he’d been waiting for the chance, then used his movement technique to hurry away. The Bow Saint watched him until he was gone.

Then, suddenly, she saw a flower bud slowly opening in the light.

It was the first light of dawn.

Chapter 929

That night was unusually dark and long.

For the soldiers on both sides, who clashed again and again with blazing torches and sharpened weapons.

For the people, who trembled in fear and waited for the sudden upheaval to end.

Clang! Clang! Clang!

“Gah!”

The fighting was not confined to the Imperial Palace. The chilling clash of blades and the screams covered the entire Imperial Capital for several shichen[3421]. Countless people who heard them remembered the fourth prince’s coup just over a decade earlier, which had overturned the Great Nation’s order and changed the course of its history.

Amid the chaos, some were gripped by more anger and fear than anyone else.

“Those bastards! I could chew them to death and it still wouldn’t be enough…!”

“I-it’s over. The Embroidered Uniform Guard must have discovered us!”

Dozens of people faced one another across a table inside an abandoned shrine thick with dust and cobwebs. Shadows from a dim oil lamp flickered over them. They were of different ages and dressed in all manner of clothes.

An old man listened to their cries, then spoke.

“Enough noise.”

His voice was low but firm. As if on cue, everyone fell silent and turned toward him.

His slight frame and deeply wrinkled skin showed his age. Yet his eyes were clear and shrewd, and though his clothes showed wear here and there, not a fold was out of place. His bearing, like his dress, spoke of the life he had led.

“Don’t let yourselves be swept up in this. The path before us was decided long ago.”

The old man lifted his lukewarm teacup, seemingly unconcerned by the trail of torches drawing closer beyond the window or the great roar that came with them.

“I don’t know what’s happening out there, but it may be for the best. Now that chaos has broken out, it’s time for us to act.”

The time had come.

At his brief words, some eyes lit up. Others trembled, unable to suppress their fear.

Restoration.

It was why they had gathered here today, and the cause they had taken up to save one person.

[3421] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours.

“Now…we must put everything back where it belongs.”

The old man’s eyes flashed with a strength hard to believe in a man of ninety, and a resolve firmer than anyone’s.

“Let us drive those cruel traitors—who have abandoned what is right and overturned the natural order—out of the Imperial Palace. Let us raise His Highness Prince Shangshan to the throne by the strength of the people.”

“…!”

“…!”

An unseen surge swept through the shrine like a wave.

They had come of their own resolve, yet amid their rising excitement and fear, they had briefly forgotten what their undertaking meant.

By the strength of the people. Raise a ruler of the people.

They looked at one another.

They differed in age, status, and gender. But now they were comrades in the same boat.

Each had lived a separate life. They had come together to steer the great ship that was the Great Nation onto the right course.

A few days earlier, the words of someone whose identity they did not know had lit a fuse hidden deep in their hearts.

“The azure heaven that once shone blue is fading, and dark clouds are rolling in.”

As the tune slipped from someone’s lips, a young Confucian scholar joined in as though entranced.

“The storm soon to come will swallow the world.”

“But, people, do not tremble. Do not be afraid.”

An old laborer, his skin darkened by the sun, muttered in a rough voice. In his hand was an axe with a keen, blue-steel edge. Once, he had led an army.

“For there is a mountain, the highest in all the world.”

“There is a stream that never runs dry.”

“Fruit ripens there, and animals run free.”

“And a home to keep out the storms, and a forest to provide firewood.”

It was no longer any one person’s voice.

Reciting the song that had spread through the Imperial Capital’s marketplaces over the past few days, they rose to their feet.

“It can shelter all the people, and still have room for more.”

Step. Creak.

The old shrine groaned as they filed out. The song continued, louder and stronger than before.

“So, people, do not tremble. Do not be afraid.”

The old man led the way, his white robes fluttering as he stepped onto the damp earth.

As he made his way along the rugged mountain path, shadows crouched in the darkness rose and followed him.

From dozens to hundreds.

From hundreds to thousands.

Before long, they had become an army. They carried sickles still caked with dirt, and spears, swords, and axes red with rust.

Step. Step.

They marched toward the faint dawn light in the east and the trail of torches creeping up the mountain like a living dragon.

The song on their lips became a fervent plea, then a mighty roar.

“Go to Mount Shangshan, go to Mount Shangshan.”

Thousands of pairs of solemn eyes shone in the dark.

“Though the raging storm swallow the Five Sacred Mountains of the Central Plains, it will never dare reach Mount Shangshan.”

Thud-thud-thud-thud.

The low mountain trembled. Those torches drawing closer by the moment were likely the punitive force sent by the Emperor, who had realized a restoration was underway.

But…

“The lord of Mount Shangshan has Heaven’s protection!”

They raised their voices higher.

Highborn and lowborn alike strained their throats, fighting to suppress the fear still welling up inside them.

Only a few days ago, on a day like any other, an unknown man in a bamboo hat had cast those words into their hearts. Now they shouted them with all their strength.

“He is descended from the dragon that commands rain and lightning, and fit to be a just and benevolent ruler!”

And just as their great shout shook the land around them—

Whoosh.

An unusually sharp gust cut through the gray dawn mist. A man appeared from within it and spoke.

“That’s quite a fine song.”

“…!”

“…!”

Everyone’s eyes widened.

Dried blood marked the golden armor he wore, but could not hide it. That armor meant only one thing.

“The Embroidered Uniform Guard…!”

At the words, forced out like a groan, trembling eyes turned to the torches rippling a few hundred jang[3422] below.

Suspicion became certainty.

The Emperor had sent the Embroidered Uniform Guard to put down their restoration.

And perhaps Prince Shangshan had already…

“You monsters! Aren’t you afraid of Heaven?”

Some of the restoration army, consumed by rage, were about to rush at the man who was clearly an Embroidered Uniform Guard when the old man, who had led them all despite his age, suddenly spoke.

“Whose blood is on your armor?”

They stopped. The man answered evenly.

“The blood of traitors who endangered the ancestral temples and the state.”

“Then who are the traitors you speak of?”

“On the smaller scale, Wei Zhong, the East Depot’s Seal-Holding Eunuch, and those in league with him. On the larger scale, the foreign enemy called Dark Heaven.”

“…Dark Heaven. Dark Heaven, is it?”

The old man murmured the name. He knew of the force that had recently been drenching the martial world in blood.

And the voice of the man in bloodstained golden armor was familiar, too.

“Was it you?”

But unlike the restoration army, who could make no sense of this strange exchange, the Embroidered Uniform Guard understood what the old man’s brief question meant.

“It was.”

“Then what you said and did in the marketplace that day…”

“It was all done at His Majesty’s command—the imperial decree.”

“Ah.”

The old man let out a sigh. Some in the restoration army recognized the man at last, and their eyes widened.

“Could it be…?”

“Y-yes. That was his voice.”

[3422] A jang is a traditional length of approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

They remembered it clearly: a voice that had carried over a crowd of hundreds, and a man in a bamboo hat who had dropped a great stone into their hearts before vanishing.

“My surname is Lee. I once served the late Emperor as Grand Preceptor. What is your name?”

The man, now wearing a golden helmet in place of his bamboo hat, answered with the respect due to an elder official. Decades ago, Lee had repeatedly urged the Emperor to keep eunuchs at a distance, only to be falsely accused and driven from office.

“Jeong Hogun, Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard. I have come to deliver His Majesty the Emperor’s command.”

His voice, charged with internal energy, pierced the dawn air and reached every ear.

“I was unworthy and failed to bring about an age of peace. I was unfilial and lost the late Emperor and the elders of the imperial family. But I have never once been disloyal. Now, at last, I seek to set the natural order right. Take up the banner of Imperial Younger Brother Zhu Bao and, with those who follow you, eliminate the traitors.”

“…!”

“…!”

The air seemed to stop. Shock swept through the restoration army like a great wave.

Imperial Younger Brother Zhu Bao.

Everyone understood what it meant.

Jeong Hogun walked slowly toward them with a banner in his hand. Beside a dragon embroidered in gold thread was Zhu Bao’s name. The sight erased their last shred of doubt.

“Ah…”

Cries of wonder rose all around him. The old man swallowed and fought back the tears gathering in his wrinkled eyes.

Then he dropped to both knees and accepted the Imperial Younger Brother’s banner in trembling hands.

“I receive and obey His Majesty’s solemn command.”

As the light of dawn grew clearer in the far west, the roar of thousands who had joined the Embroidered Uniform Guard broke the early-morning stillness.

They roused the people who had been paralyzed with fear and the loyal men who had already given up hope. Then they fell upon the traitors still locked in bloody fighting throughout the Imperial Capital.

They became a wave of people numbering tens of thousands—no, hundreds of thousands.

“Waaah!”

“Long live His Highness Prince Shangshan!”

“Long live His Majesty the Emperor!”

Crack!

“Gah!”

“Retreat! Retreat!”

Dawn was stained with countless screams and blood.

When that unusually dark, long night ended and daylight came, there were no more battles. Only the shouts of those pursuing the rebels, who had lost the will to fight and scattered in every direction, and their overflowing joy remained.

One day. Two.

Then three days passed in the blink of an eye, and someone opened their eyes.

Chapter 930

Strange.

The unfamiliar ceiling that should have been waiting for me, just like always, somehow felt familiar.

What is this?

As my vision slowly sharpened, I looked around.

The space was far too large to call a mere bedroom. Thick pillars stood between the curtains surrounding it, while braziers placed here and there and night-shining pearls set into the ceiling like stars bathed the room in a soft glow.

Wait. Night-shining pearls?

Then I realized where the déjà vu was coming from—and why the place felt familiar.

This is…

That's right.

This was a vast pavilion built to serve as both living quarters and a place to handle state affairs—and a fortress filled with an ironclad guard.

Qianqing Palace.

No wonder it felt familiar.

Without the night-shining pearls, it might have taken me longer to figure it out. Only an emperor could plaster his ceiling with pearls big enough to fetch hundreds of silver nyang[3423] on Bok Choy Market as if they were glitter stickers.

But…why am I here?

The question surfaced in my strangely empty head.

Whoosh.

A faint breeze stirred the curtains around the bedroom. At the same moment, a man in black appeared like a ghost and bowed his head slightly.

"Have you awakened?"

His voice was muffled, almost a mumble.

I stared blankly at the unexpected intruder, then calmly assessed the situation.

The Emperor's quarters. The Emperor's blanket. The Emperor's bed. The Emperor's pillow.

My clothes were golden from head to toe, and when I lifted my pants for a peek, even my underwear was gleaming golden silk.

The full King-God-Emperor package.

[3423] A nyang was a traditional Korean monetary unit. Silver nyang denotes silver currency, not Korean won.

And on top of that, No Shadow—the Emperor's hidden guard, an assassin and Supreme Peak master—was speaking to me with such courtesy.

Then could this be…

Through clear-headed reasoning, I reached a conclusion. A shudder ran through me.

"Possession…!"

It had to be. There was no other explanation.

I'd gotten a good night's sleep, woken up, and my life had changed genres from fusion Murim to a possession story. Just as I was reeling from the shock, No Shadow spoke in his usual muffled voice.

"Are you all right?"

Would you be all right? nearly burst out of me, but figuring out what had happened came first.

"What time is it? No, how many days have passed since the grand banquet?"

"…?"

Apparently, that was a strange question from an emperor who'd just woken up. No Shadow stared at me before answering.

"Three days."

"Three days?"

"Yes."

"…Then how long was I asleep?"

"Three days as well."

I squeezed my eyes shut.

Three days. In just three days, everything had gone to shit.

To hell with being an emperor. I'd gone from a handsome guy in his early twenties with his whole life ahead of him to a middle-aged man who looked ancient, and everything I'd achieved had gone up in smoke.

System window…open.

I silently tried the command, just in case.

But it scattered into the void.

There was no clear chime, no translucent holographic window.

What the hell is going on? How did things get like this?

I couldn't breathe.

The levels I'd busted my ass to gain, my stats—I couldn't even access the System window now. I might never make it back to the real world.

Wait. Then what happened to the original me?

The thought suddenly struck me, and my eyes flew open. I shouted at No Shadow in a panicked voice.

"Then what happened to me…? No, what happened to Jin Taekyung!"

No Shadow blinked above his pitch-black mask.

"You mean Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan?"

"Yes, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Taekyung! The guy who's handsome, tall, and perfectly muscled, and I have no idea why women aren't all over him!"

His answer brought my thoughts to a halt.

"He has yet to awaken."

"What?"

"For reasons unknown, he has not regained consciousness. I regret to report that, according to the examination of the one called the Divine Physician, he is as good as dead."

"…!"

"As a result, His Highness the Imperial Younger Brother has refused food and drink for three days. He said there was something he must return to a friend with whom he shared a bond…"

No Shadow trailed off and carefully held something out. I accepted it in a daze.

Rough, cold metal.

Gleaming like obsidian, it was the divine artifact of the Sichuan Tang Clan—the one I'd given Zhu Bao in case the worst happened.

The Myriad-Poison Ring.

I could see the boy who'd promised to survive and return it to me before long.

But…

Damn it.

I didn't know how it had happened, but that shitty fate had twisted my life into knots once again.

Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan was gone.

And perhaps Jin Taekyung the Hunter's life in Korea had ended here too.

Crack.

At some point, I'd clenched my fist so hard my knuckles had gone white. Then I saw the wrinkles covering the back of my hand, and the strength left me.

Slide.

My fingers loosened. The Myriad-Poison Ring rolled over my rough skin and fell onto the bluestone floor.

Clang. Clang.

The cold sound echoed alone through the vast room.

With hope drained from my eyes, I watched the Myriad-Poison Ring spin rapidly.

Each time the black gem caught the light of the night-shining pearls and flashed, faces I would never see again crossed my mind.

My family, more precious to me than my life. Team Leader Choi and so many other comrades.

All the people I trusted, and who trusted me.

And someone else I'd only just learned had been born to the same fate.

The Martial God.

Another System user. Another Player.

Someone chosen by this cruel fate long before I was.

Where was he now?

Had he gone through the same thing?

Or had the System chosen me as a new Player because he really was dead?

I didn't know.

Not right now. Perhaps not ever.

I was no longer the chosen one or a Player. The System knew the truth, but it wouldn't answer my questions.

No. I wouldn't be able to hear its answer.

That was the kind of power the System was.

A power meant for one person alone.

And so…another Player will appear.

The hollow thought hovered on the tip of my tongue without becoming words.

With my eyes sunk deep, I kept watching the Myriad-Poison Ring spinning.

It was still turning and turning on the blue bluestone floor, without end.

"…?"

Wait.

Something was wrong.

"H-how long is that thing going to keep spinning?"

No Shadow answered my cautious question.

"This is why I hate people who catch on too fast."

What?

Quietly. Very quietly, I opened my eyes to slits as narrow as a flounder's.

An unfamiliar ceiling came into view. Unlike the one from a moment ago, it was moderately luxurious and moderately Murim-like.

Good. First check passed.

I lifted a hand, moving so little I made no sound.

The glittering golden sleeve made my heart sink.

Second check, pending.

I ignored the cold sweat beading on my forehead and carefully lifted my pants.

I didn't know which son of a bitch had put this on me and called it underwear, but sure enough, it was dazzlingly golden.

Third check. This is getting shitty.

Afraid to confirm what was real, I closed my barely open eyes again.

A bad sign. But it wasn't over yet.

In the awful silence, I slipped a hand inside my pants and felt over my underwear.

The familiar weight—the one I'd have recognized anywhere, and was so glad to feel I could have cried—made my whole body shudder.

"Ah, ah…"

An indescribable electric thrill coursed through my whole body.

I was alive.

I was still alive.

This wasn't that shitty dream from a moment ago. This was vivid reality, the present in which I was alive and breathing.

I was Jin Taekyung the Hunter and Jin Taekyung the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon.

Damn it. What a thing to be grateful for.

Just being alive as myself felt overwhelming. I wiped a few tears away with my sleeve.

Then I opened my eyes to face the world with more gratitude than ever.

Ah.

I met the eyes of several familiar people who'd been watching me without making a sound.

"…"

"…"

"…"

"…"

The suffocating silence seemed as though it would last forever. The Divine Physician broke it first, his voice grave.

"That is perfectly understandable."

Beside him, Jeok Cheongang avoided my gaze.

"Yes. It's the Scorching Yang Qi. He's done nothing wrong."

The Bow Saint nodded and murmured, "Truly the chosen one…"

I took a quiet, deep breath.

It felt as though the world had stopped.

No—more accurately, I wished it would stop.

But even after I shut my eyes tight, made a fervent wish, and opened them again, the dreadful reality was still waiting for me right there.

The Divine Physician. Jeok Cheongang. The Bow Saint.

Fine. I could understand them. They were old enough to have been through every kind of trouble and seen every kind of thing they'd rather not have seen.

But they weren't alone in the room.

The Fire Dragon Pavilion.

Fuck. The Fire Dragon Pavilion.

I was looking at them. They were looking at me.

More precisely, they were staring at me with their eyes wide, as though they couldn't believe what they were seeing—at the sight of my hand inside the front of my pants.

Ah.

I barely swallowed the sigh that was about to burst out.

Then, as calmly as I could, I spoke.

"I know. It looks like there's plenty of room for misunderstanding."

"I don't think it's really a misunderstanding, mm."

Song Ilseom cut himself off when he saw my expression.

Beside him, Sama Pyo looked distinctly surprised. He silently gave me a thumbs-up.

…You bastard.

Somehow feeling a little pleased and utterly humiliated at the same time, I tried again.

"But there were…circumstances."

"Taishan knows! Taishan knows the circumstances! Taishan knows what that is!"

"Shut your mouth, you bastard!"

Ah.

Taishan had been bouncing with excitement, but shrank back at my thunderous shout. For some reason, Namho was still perched on his shoulders, riding him like a human throne. He spoke with a serious expression.

"But when are you going to take that hand out?"

Straight to the heart of it.

I kept my cool.

"I was just waiting for the right moment."

"Mm. In a situation like this, it can't be easy to pull it out."

"Thank you for understanding."

"Still, there are a lot of eyes on you. You should take it out now. Quickly, not slowly."

"May I ask why?"

“The slower you move, the longer they’ll watch. I’ll count to three. Take it out exactly on three.”

“That’s a good idea, except I think saying it has drawn even more attention.”

Namho glanced around, then nodded as if I’d made a good point.

“That’s true.”

“Please don’t say anything else. Just for a moment. A very short moment.”

“All right.”

Namho fell silent. I took a small breath, then cautiously addressed the one person standing beside Hyuk Mujin and looking the other way.

“Young Lady Ju.”

The next moment—

Whoosh. Bam!

Ju Hwaran bolted out of the room faster than I’d ever seen her move. Hyuk Mujin came over and patted my shoulder.

“I understand exactly how you feel, Captain.”

“…Shut it.”

“Yes, sir.”

I wished it had just been a dream.

Chapter 931

Everyone needs time alone.

Say, when you need to check the System messages piled up until they're ready to burst, like emails in a portal account you haven't opened in years.

Especially if you've just groped your own private parts in front of a dozen people, then shuddered all over.

But even after that incomprehensible nightmare—and a situation worse than the nightmare itself—people seemed determined not to leave me alone.

"Now, raise your arm and follow my movements."

"Very good. This time, turn it a little farther…"

"How many fingers am I holding up?"

My first visitors were the imperial physicians, who came charging in the moment word spread that I'd regained consciousness.

They'd apparently been standing by for three days under the Emperor's strict orders. Reeking of herbal medicine, they had me do one thing after another, then huddled together with grave expressions and whispered.

Of course, I could hear every word perfectly.

"His condition is normal—no, perfect."

"I heard there was an enormous battle, but he's strangely unharmed. Not a single wound."

"That's not all. If you look more closely, the front of his robe is suspiciously bulging."

"What? You don't mean that's…? No. Impossible."

"To be honest, I'm not certain either. I'll give you a signal when the opportunity arises. You can press it once, pretending it was an accident."

"Hmm. Understood."

Their discussion over, the physicians turned back to me with gentle smiles and suggested one more examination, just in case.

I answered without hesitation.

"Get out. Now."

But even after they left, visitors kept coming to the pavilion where I was staying.

"Um, Captain. You have a visitor."

"Who?"

"Just a moment. They say they were appointed Guanglu Dafu the day before yesterday."

"What exactly does a Guanglu Dafu do?"

"If I knew that, I wouldn't have become a martial artist."

"Sounds like a scammer just from the title. Tell him I'm not taking out a loan."

"Yes, I'll pass that along."

I only learned that the Guanglu Dafu was an official whose rank came just below the Three Excellencies after turning away dozens of officials. Then, at last, I welcomed a new visitor.

"I hope I'm not too late. Judging by the crowds at your door, you're already quite popular."

The voice was warm and familiar. Hong Jin came in joking, and I couldn't help smiling.

"Comrade Hong.[3424]"

"Comrade, hm? Have I ever told you? Even though it was an official title, I always felt I could count on you whenever you called me that, Young Master Jin."

His expression was playful, but his eyes and voice held feelings I couldn't put into words.

"Thank you. Truly. His Highness, the Imperial Younger Brother, couldn't come with me today, but I hope you know he feels the same way."

Swish.

Hong Jin straightened his ornately embroidered navy-blue robe and bowed with the utmost respect. Then he lifted his head and smiled as though nothing had happened.

"Oh, and I got promoted. From now on, everyone's to call me Eunuch Hong, not Comrade Hong."

"Eunuch? You don't mean…?"

"Exactly what you're thinking, Young Master Jin. I felt so guilty and ashamed for suspecting His Majesty all those years without knowing the truth that I turned the position down several times. I even tried to retire to the countryside, but…"

Hong Jin, now dressed in the East Depot uniform I'd grown fairly used to seeing, continued with a faint smile.

"His Majesty said, 'There's so much to take care of. Where do you think you're going, running off on your own? I won't let you go, if only for having the nerve to try.'"

"That's good. Truly."

It was good news, and the right outcome.

Hong Jin could hardly be blamed for the hostility he'd felt toward the Emperor for the past decade or so. The Emperor had deliberately hidden the truth. Besides, keeping Hong Jin at Zhu Bao's side showed just how much he trusted Hong Jin's loyalty.

"So, Comrade Hong—no, Eunuch Hong—are you the East Depot's new Cang Gong?"

[3424] Dongji is an official title meaning deputy; it is pronounced like the Korean word for "comrade."

“I’m in charge of the East Depot, yes. But the position of Cang Gong—the Seal-Holding Eunuch—will likely remain vacant forever. The Great Nation leaves no trace of a traitor behind. Besides…”

For a moment, Hong Jin’s eyes turned cold.

“There are still roots we haven’t pulled up.”

I thought I knew what he meant. Broadly, he could mean the entire East Depot, where the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord’s shadow had fallen most heavily. More narrowly, he could mean the one man whose death was still unconfirmed when I lost consciousness.

“Ma Sanbao.”

Hong Jin gave a small nod at the name.

“We’ve searched the Imperial Capital and hundreds of li[3425] around it for three days, but there’s no trace of him. It’s as if he rose straight into the sky.”

Honestly, I couldn’t help admiring Ma Sanbao a little. Escaping that desperate situation was one thing. Evading the Imperial Army’s pursuit for three days afterward was another.

He must have been badly wounded already. How did he disappear?

Of course, it was possible. Ma Sanbao fell far short of his master, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, but he’d still reached the Supreme Peak realm and had monstrous powers of recovery. His disguise technique could change both his face and his build so thoroughly that even I had to marvel at it.

Lastly, he could’ve used a Moving Formation Dark Heaven had hidden somewhere nearby.

Ma Sanbao had to die if we wanted to prevent future trouble. But if he’d already fled beyond our reach, there wasn’t much we could do.

For now, the best we could do was prepare for the prey that hadn’t escaped the net—and the predators approaching from far away with their presence concealed.

“Comrade Hong… no, Eunuch Hong.”

Hong Jin smiled.

“Call me whatever you like. You can, Young Master Jin.”

“Hey, Hong.”

“…You really do make yourself at home. What is it?”

“Can I ask you a favor?”

“Do you even need to ask? I’d do anything for you, Young Master Jin—anything short of treason. Name it.”

“Then…”

He’d answered readily enough, but when he heard my request, his eyes widened.

“Hm?”

[3425] In the Chinese setting, one li is about 500 m (0.311 mi).

“Can’t you do it?”

“No, it’s easy enough. I’m just wondering what it means.”

“It’s important. I’ll explain once I’ve checked it myself.”

“Of course you will. You can’t just expect me to do it for nothing. You’re making use of an East Depot eunuch, after all.”

Hong Jin rose with a joking smile and left. Hyuk Mujin, who’d been watching for an opening, sidled over.

“Um, Captain.”

“You want to know what I asked him to do?”

“Ha! You really are a mind reader.”

He even gave me a thumbs-up, trying to butter me up. I let out a short laugh and shook my head.

“There is something.”

“Wait, you’re keeping it secret from me too?”

“It’s not exactly that…”

“Not exactly?”

“I don’t know either.”

“…?”

Hyuk Mujin stared at me, thoroughly unimpressed.

“If you don’t want to tell me, just say so. Don’t make me feel even more pathetic.”

“I’m serious, you idiot.”

“Forget it. Don’t talk to me for a while. I won’t talk to you either.”

He made a show of his hurt feelings as he headed for the door. I called after him apologetically.

“Back to your spot before I count to three. One.”

Whoosh.

Hyuk Mujin returned to his spot before I could count to two, then asked while pretending to look elsewhere,

“So, what is it?”

“I told you. I don’t know exactly what it is either.”

“…Really?”

“Yeah. Someone told me about it, but only in broad strokes.”

“Who?”

“Someone you know, too.”

Hyuk Mujin cocked his head, then thumped his chest confidently.

“Tell me who it is, and I’ll bring them here right away. Then you can hear all about it in greater detail…”

“That won’t work.”

I cut him off.

“That person’s already dead.”

“What?”

“Dead. I killed him myself.”

Hyuk Mujin stared at me with his mouth hanging open. Then his eyes went wide.

“Y-you don’t mean…? No, right?”

“I told you. Now go and leave me alone.”

“Wait. Why would that bastard tell you—?”

“Get out before I count to three. Whatever happens after that is your problem. One.”

Whoosh.

Works like a charm.

I gave a hollow laugh at the empty spot where he’d been. He’d vanished before I could count to two.

Then I sank into the soft silk bedding and gazed out the window. It was bright enough outside to make it hard to believe it was night.

Bright. Noisy, too.

Even from this pavilion deep inside the Inner Palace, I could hear distant cheers and songs carried on the wind.

Fireworks shot up here and there, painting the night sky in brilliant colors. The people, welcoming a new era, would have forgotten sleep and poured into the streets, laughing, talking, and drinking all night.

Leaving tomorrow’s worries behind to enjoy today’s happiness to the fullest.

You wanted a world like this once, too.

I thought of someone no longer in this world.

A man who had let go of all the anger left in his heart at the very end and died as a human being. The Eastern Heaven Demon Lord.

And the Sound Transmission that had been all but his last words.

Remember every word I say from this moment on.

What followed was short and simple.

Find one thing in a certain place.

That was all.

And I’d find out what that thing was soon enough.

I didn’t know either. I had no idea what that thing was, the one the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord had mentioned at the very end, or what it contained or meant.

But I’d decided to stop thinking about it until I saw it with my own eyes. I had other things to deal with right now.

“Open System window.”

The quiet words had barely left my lips when—
Ding. Ding. D-d-ding!
Chimes rang out like mad, and countless holographic windows filled my vision.
For a very long time.
As if they'd been waiting for this moment all along.

Chapter 932

"Open System window."

At that brief command, the dam holding everything back gave way.

Ding. Ding. D-d-ding!

Chimes rang out, one over another. At the same time, countless holographic windows surged toward me like a giant wave. My mouth fell open.

Holy shit. Why are there so many?

It felt like facing all the homework I'd put off over an entire summer vacation in elementary school. No—this was worse.

Even at a glance, well over a hundred holographic windows filled the air.

It'd be nice if they were all Level-up notifications.

Wishful thinking, of course. There was no way they'd all piled up in just the past three days.

I started with the first System message to appear and read them in order.

> System Congratulations! The Update is complete!
> We sincerely regret any minor inconvenience caused by the Update.

"…"

Minor inconvenience. Sincere regret.

What a way to piss me off right from the start.

I vividly remembered nearly dying because of that "minor inconvenience." But the next message quickly cooled my anger.

> System Therefore, as an apology, we would like to provide you with an appropriate Reward.

"Oh."

Right. That's more like it.

This System was fundamentally different from those garbage games that wielded the Four Great Swords—scheduled maintenance, unscheduled maintenance, extended maintenance, and emergency maintenance—like an heirloom blade.

Giving users fitting Rewards for all their hard work and doing everything it could to make their experience enjoyable—that was what a kingly, god-tier System was for.

> System Update Reward has been delivered to your Inventory.

> Would you like to check your new Item?
> Y / N

Reward. New Item.

Those two little words awakened the childlike wonder I'd long forgotten.

I was more excited than I'd been opening my Christmas present at seven years old. With excitement and joy mingling inside me, I answered.

"Open."

Ding.

> System Item Window
> Pocket Watch of Unknown Make > Type: Item
> Grade: None
> Restriction: None
> Description: A pocket watch made by someone unknown. Very sturdy. At a glance, it looks like an old, broken watch. On closer inspection, it still looks like an old, broken watch.

"…?"

What the hell is this?

My brain stalled. I stared blankly at the pocket watch in my hand.

It was exactly as the Item description said. At a glance, it looked broken. On closer inspection, it still looked broken. I could've written a poem about it on the spot.

Title: Pocket Watch.

Old, even on closer inspection.

Broken, no matter how long I look.

Fucking sucks.

"…"

I felt like I was going insane.

It was on par with the betrayal I'd felt when Santa Claus—the old man who'd brought my Christmas present when I was seven—had punched in the front door's passcode and strolled in like he owned the place, then kissed my mom right in front of me.

This is my… Update Reward?

My head still reeling, I tried to pull myself out of the shock.

No, no. This can't be right.

There were only two possibilities. Either the System had prepared a surprise hidden-camera prank for me after everything I'd been through, or there was something special about the watch that I hadn't found yet.

There was only one notification, so it's not a prank. Which means…

I gathered my wits and examined the watch carefully. Before long, I noticed something I'd missed on its back, worn shiny by someone's hands.

Wait.

It was a faint mark, almost completely rubbed away—probably too faint for an ordinary person to see. I stirred up my internal energy and channeled it into my eyes. With my enhanced vision, I made out a dim inscription.

"N-no way…"

> Even a broken clock is right twice a day.

"That doesn't mean a damn thing, you bastards!"

BANG!

I hurled the pocket watch with all my strength. It flew like a cannonball and struck the wall.

Or, to be precise, it smashed through the wall.

Rumble!

The wall crumbled. Beyond it stood Hyuk Mujin, staring at me with his mouth hanging open.

"What the—Gasp! Was that an assassination attempt?!"

In a way, it was.

I'd taken a hit to the back of the head without warning, and now my insides ached as if I'd been stabbed.

"Mujin. I'm dizzy. Mujin."

"Captain! Stay still! I'll protect you!"

"You? Protect me?"

Hyuk Mujin hesitated, then cautiously offered, "Should I bring Great Hero Jeok over?"

"…If you call him, we're the ones who'll get put through the wringer. Don't."

"Oh, come on. You scared me. It wasn't an assassination attempt, right?"

"Yeah, idiot. So quit making a scene and pick that thing up."

Coughing in the cloud of dust, Hyuk Mujin cautiously retrieved the pocket watch.

"C-Captain. You don't mean this piece of iron junk, do you?"

"…"

"Sorry. I guess you do. And, just in case, I take back the 'junk' part."

Like an unlucky member of the Ten Attendants,[3426] Hyuk Mujin sensed my foul mood and hurried over to hand me the watch.

"But what exactly is it?"

"A broken watch."

"A watch? This little thing?"

Hyuk Mujin eyed the pocket watch's unfamiliar shape. I answered mournfully.

"It's still junk. Very sturdy, completely useless junk."

"Why would you keep something like this? It's even broken."

"…I got it somehow, okay? Watch your mouth."

Every word was a blade digging into my heart. Having confirmed the watch's durability by accident, I swallowed back my tears.

The Item description was telling the truth after all.

Some truths were unbearably cruel. Right now, this pocket watch was one of them.

But why would the System give me something like this?

This wasn't some ordinary Quest. It was the Reward I'd received for completing an entire Update, and it was garbage like this.

Clinging to one last sliver of hope, I examined the watch again. All I found was more reason to despair.

This thing really is broken.

For starters, the time was completely wrong. It was already nearing midnight, but the hour hand pointed somewhere around five. Even that was only a guess—the numbers that ought to have been there were missing.

And where the hell did the minute hand go?

At this point, I wasn't sure I could even call it a pocket watch. Pocket time? Pocket piece? Even those seemed too generous.

I can't adjust the time, either. And it doesn't seem to keep moving. What the hell is this thing?

I shook it this way and that, then held it close to my ear. There wasn't so much as a tick—not even the faint noise of parts moving inside.

It had exactly one advantage. I couldn't crush it no matter how hard I squeezed, or even leave a scratch.

Did they give it to me as a weapon? Or a shield for emergencies?

A familiar scene from a war movie flashed through my mind.

A sharp gunshot rang out. Private Johnson collapsed.

Certain their comrade was dead, his squadmates rushed over. But what they found was a bullet lodged in the little Bible that the devout Private Johnson always carried over his heart…

[3426] The Ten Attendants were powerful eunuch officials in imperial China.

"Wow. It's already driving me insane."

Hyuk Mujin, who'd been watching me warily for a while, cautiously spoke up.

"Um, Captain?"

"Don't call me in that sly, eunuch-like voice. I'll kill you. Seriously."

"Yes, sir. May I ask you something?"

"Spit it out."

"Um… are you going to throw that away?"

Hyuk Mujin pointed discreetly at the pocket watch in my palm, then went on as though he were making casual conversation.

"If you are, I'd like to humbly suggest giving it to someone who's your right arm, your heart, and unwaveringly loyal to you."

"Was that supposed to be humble? You sound pretty confident."

"Well, I'm just saying. If you're not going to use it, there's no reason to keep it."

"Why the hell do you want this thing?"

"It's a watch, isn't it? And judging by the look of it, it's a rare item from the Western Regions. Even if it's broken, wouldn't it look good to carry around?"

Hyuk Mujin made a surprisingly coherent argument. I smacked my lips.

I guess it wouldn't really matter if I gave it to him…

But something about it bothered me, like a fish bone stuck in my throat. If I handed this godforsaken pocket watch to Hyuk Mujin right now, I'd feel even less satisfied than I would eating fried rice at a Chinese restaurant without a bowl of spicy jjambbong[3427] broth.

There might be something I don't know about it yet. I can wait and see. If it really is junk, I can give it to him then.

It wasn't as if the System always gave out incredible Rewards. I didn't know exactly how it decided what to hand out, but I'd received plenty of useless junk Items from the countless Quests I'd completed. Little by little, enough had piled up in my Inventory to fill a truck.

The one thing I couldn't get past was that the broken pocket watch in my hand was a Reward for completing an Update.

"Hmm."

I nodded without saying anything. Then Hyuk Mujin's sly voice reached my ear again.

"Um, Captain?"

"What?"

"Could you say something…?"

"Not yet. Wait a little. A month—no, fifteen days."

[3427] Jjambbong is a Korean-Chinese spicy noodle soup, often made with seafood.

Fifteen days. Half a month.

That was the final trial period I'd settled on. Hyuk Mujin's face lit up.

"So you'll give it to me in fifteen days?"

"Yeah. Assuming I've confirmed it's useless to me."

"Come on. It came from the Western Regions. There probably isn't a craftsman around here who can fix it. At most, you could carry it because it looks pretty."

Hyuk Mujin grinned unpleasantly as he went on.

"But what do you call it?"

"Pocket-watch, shi—pocket watch."

"Wow. Even the name's pretty. Thread a leather cord through that ring and wear it around your neck. You'd draw eyes wherever you went."

"Yeah?"

"Yes. Shiny silk would look even better than leather."

"Oh, yeah?"

It was a suggestion worthy of the eldest grandson of a wealthy textile-merchant family. It was a good one, too. Without hesitation, I tore a strip from the gold silk robe I was wearing, threaded it through the ring, and hung the watch around my neck.

"How do I look? Pretty?"

"Whew. Is your name Mr. Golden Sun? You're practically glowing."

"They'd like it if I gave it to them like this, wouldn't they?"

"Captain, you'd go that far for me…"

Hyuk Mujin's eyes trembled with emotion. I gazed fondly at the pocket watch hanging around my neck.

"Not you. Young Lady Ju."

"…"

"Maybe Young Lady Ju would be less upset if she got a gift like this. Don't you think?"

"…"

"Answer me."

"…I'm sure she'd love it. Yes."

His eyes went cold in an instant.

As Hyuk Mujin silently berated me with his gaze, I sensed dozens of people approaching the pavilion. I leaned out the window.

"Stop! Stop! Stop! Move and I'll cut you down. Pocket!"

At the head of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, their torches flickering, Jeong Hogun fell silent for a moment before replying.

"What nonsense are you talking about?"

“You stupid, useless Embroidered Uniform Guard bastard! You showed up without even learning the password!”

“No, I mean, what is this all of a sudden…?”

“Shut up! Say ‘watch’! Hurry!”

“…Watch.”

“I said shut up!”

“…”

His eyes were full of venom, like an angry pufferfish. I supposed I’d better stop messing with him.

Generously letting him off the hook, I asked Jeong Hogun, who’d clamped his mouth shut, “So, why are you here?”

“You need to come with me for a moment.”

“Am I someone who comes and goes just because you tell me to? Besides, I’m really busy. I’ve got a lot to do.”

“His Majesty has summoned you.”

“Oh.”

Then I’d better go.

Chapter 933

I followed Jeong Hogun, taking a careful look around as we went.

I'd expected some dramatic change, but the Imperial Palace looked much the same as it had on my first visit.

Palace attendants in neat uniforms hurried back and forth, while heavily armed Embroidered Uniform Guards stood watch at their posts like iron towers.

If anything had changed, it was me.

Swish.

When a group of palace attendants approaching from the other direction bowed deeply as they passed, I thought it was a coincidence.

Clank.

Even when the Embroidered Uniform Guards struck their armor and saluted, I didn't think much of it. Jeong Hogun had considerable pull among the Guard, so it seemed only natural that they'd salute him.

"Guess being a Thousand Captain means you can throw your weight around, huh?"

Jeong Hogun's reply to my joking remark was utterly calm.

"You're less observant than you look."

"Hm?"

"They aren't paying their respects because I'm here."

Only then did it hit me. Only then did I see it.

The people passing us were looking at me. The gratitude and respect in their eyes were meant for me alone.

"Uh…"

What was I supposed to say?

I was still at a loss for words when Jeong Hogun came to an abrupt halt.

No—not just him. Everyone who'd come with him stopped at the same time.

Step.

They moved as one, with a heavy ring of metal.

Jeong Hogun glanced at the plaque reading Qianqing Palace a dozen or so jang[3428] ahead, then turned to me.

"I don't know when we'll see each other again, so I should say this now."

The sharp eyes beneath his low-pulled helmet softened, curving like a crescent moon.

"It was an honor to fight alongside you, Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung."

[3428] A jang is a traditional length of ten ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

"…!"

I stared at him, eyes wide.

Jeong Hogun had never bowed to anyone but the Emperor. Now his rigid back and neck inclined toward me as he offered a deeply respectful fist-and-palm salute.

"Until we meet again, I wish you good fortune in battle."

"We wish you good fortune!"

Shing! Shing! Shing!

Dozens of Embroidered Uniform Guards echoed him and drew their swords, gripping them in reverse.

They stood in two neat rows on either side of the path to Qianqing Palace. I couldn't help laughing.

"Come on, you're making me blush."

But I stopped laughing almost at once and returned their salute, bringing my hands together.

"We'll meet again. We will."

I meant it. That was enough.

No one knew when we'd meet again. I'd leave everything else until then. Every meeting and every bond came with a parting, after all.

Step. Step.

I walked slowly down the path Jeong Hogun and the guards had made for me.

Beneath the high eaves of Qianqing Palace, the twin armed guards were waiting. Thanks to a new scar, I could finally tell their faces apart.

As I climbed the stairs, they quietly stepped aside, as though there were no formalities to observe.

The enormous iron door they guarded stood wide open, unlike the last time I'd visited.

Qianqing Palace stood in the deepest part of the Imperial Palace.

And in the innermost chamber of Qianqing Palace, the Emperor was waiting for me.

"Oh, you're here."

His voice was gentler than before, warm with welcome. His eyes were smiling too.

But even faced with such a welcome from the Emperor—a man called Iron Blood for the countless purges and ruthless decisions he'd made since before taking the throne—I didn't smile.

No. I couldn't.

Why?

I hadn’t said it aloud, but my bewilderment must have shown. The Emperor watched me struggle for words, then gave a quiet laugh and spoke first.

“You seem rather taken aback. Understandable, I suppose, when the Son of Heaven looks like this.”

He tapped the bandages wrapped around his upper body. The faint smile on his lips made his sunken cheeks stand out even more.

“A piece of advice: at times like this, lower your head first.”

He was impossibly gaunt compared to just three days ago. I was still shaken, but I forced myself to reply calmly.

“Is there a reason for that?”

“Two. You can hide your expression, and you buy yourself a moment to think.”

“I see. I might as well try it.”

I lowered my head, then lifted it again less than ten seconds later.

“You’ve already seen my expression, so it’s too late to hide that. But the time to think does help.”

“May I ask what you thought about?”

“Why Your Majesty looks like this. What caused it.”

“A waste of thought. I simply overexerted myself in that battle.”

The Emperor smiled and waved a hand. The smile vanished when he heard my next words.

“So you’ve been smoking poppy again?”

“…!”

“I was slow to notice. The sight of you caught me off guard, and I didn’t pay attention to the smell.”

I drew a slow breath as I watched his face go rigid. The strong, peculiar scent that reached me was unmistakably the one I remembered.

“How long… have you known?”

His voice had dropped. I thought back to the first time I’d entered Qianqing Palace: the strangely familiar scent I’d noticed when I finally met the Emperor, and the moment someone who occasionally smoked poppy had helped me place it.

“I didn’t know at first.”

“I can’t imagine how you figured it out. It isn’t easy to obtain, and I’ve heard Murim practitioners avoid anything that harms the mind and spirit.”

“You heard right. Murim practitioners generally do.”

I added calmly, “But I hear eunuchs sometimes use it.”

“…Hong Jin, then.”

A wound, once inflicted, has a long shelf life.

Whether it's psychological or physical, the mind and body remember. Old wounds can still ache decades later, even after the scars have faded. How much worse must it be for eunuchs, who've had their private parts cut off?

Hong Jin was no exception. When the pain came without warning and he couldn't bear it, he turned to poppy. Thanks to him, I'd stumbled onto one of the Emperor's secrets.

"How long have you been using it? And why?"

"I don't see why you need to know."

Before I could respond, the Emperor gave a bitter smile and pointed to his head.

"Besides, nothing I say will change much."

"…No way."

He seemed to have already given up. And that gesture had meaning, too.

I stared at him, eyes wide, as he parted his dry lips.

"That's right. It's what you're thinking."

"…!"

"The Blood Soul Gu. That cursed poison has reached my very marrow."

My suspicion hardened into certainty, and a curse escaped me like a groan.

"Damn it."

"Impertinent. Such vulgar language before the father of all the people? If Commander Baek were here, he'd have you dragged to prison at once."

Someone else might have trembled and begged forgiveness. I only sighed at the Emperor, who was making a show of frowning.

"Is this really the time for jokes?"

"Have I ever told you I'm good at them?"

"This is the first I've heard of it. You're so bad it gives me goose bumps."

"That's because you're a dull fellow. Back when I was campaigning, I'd drink and laugh with my men every night. Those were good times."

"I hate to say this to a critically ill man, but you were probably the only one having fun."

"That can't be. Every time I said something, they'd laugh until they doubled over."

"…I see."

I didn't know who those men had been, but they must have worked hard to laugh along.

Not that it mattered right now.

I shook my head at the clueless division commander—no, Emperor—and asked what I most wanted to know.

"When did it start?"

"More than ten years ago. Just after the coup, to be exact."

As though there was nothing left to hide, the Emperor continued calmly.

"A loyal servant I trusted did it. By the time I realized, it was too late."

"Who among Your Majesty's closest people knows?"

"Only two. Baek Yeon and So Gyo. Though perhaps I should call her the Bow Saint now."

He looked at me and added, "And today, one more person has learned a truth that must never be known."

I caught his meaning at once and clicked my tongue.

"Are you going to kill me to keep me quiet?"

"If I tried, would you let me?"

"Not a chance. I'm going to live until I'm so old I'm smearing shit on the walls."

"Then I'm better off than you. As Emperor, I can't make such a disgrace of myself."

He gave a soft chuckle. Then, without warning, he coughed.

Cough.

His golden sleeve stained red. I looked around, my face hardening at the sudden spitting of blood, but the Emperor shook his head before I could move.

"Don't bother."

"Bother with what?"

"If you're thinking of calling an imperial physician, don't."

"…"

"If they could cure this, I'd have done something about it long ago. Why do you think I hid it even from them?"

The Emperor gazed at his blood-soaked sleeve and murmured as if to himself.

"My father and mother. My three elder brothers. The senior members of the imperial family who worked so faithfully to uphold the ancestral shrines and the state… Not one was spared. None escaped death."

He was right. No one had escaped the Blood Soul Gu's grasp.

That was why his attempt to set everything right after the coup had failed. The late Emperor, the Empress, and several direct members of the imperial family, including the Crown Prince, had died one after another. The Fourth Prince who'd started the coup had been branded an unforgivable, unfilial son and a usurper.

"I have no regrets left. I took every elixir I could to stay alive and trained in martial arts at a bone-grinding pace to withstand the Blood Soul Gu's poison. I held on like that for ten years."

At last, I understood why he—the man who held the greatest territory in the world and commanded countless troops—had reached his current realm.

"After enduring a winter of more than ten years, spring has finally come. That's enough for me."

At that moment, a clear smile rested on the Emperor's lips.

Chapter 934

Winter comes for everyone.

But the winter one man—an emperor, or rather a man named Zhu Di—had to endure was exceptionally harsh.

More than ten long years.

For all that time, long enough for the world to change beyond recognition, he fought illness. He had to learn martial arts just to stay alive, and with the blades of rebellion lurking on every side, not a single day passed when he could sleep easy.

Spring, regained after such a long wait.

The Emperor smiled bitterly.

At last, the long winter had ended and warm spring had come. Yet he still shivered with cold.

“I was prepared for this. Have been for a long time. So…”

The Emperor murmured the words calmly, then fixed his gaze on the young man before him.

“You don’t need to look at me like that.”

Someone had once said there was beauty in the sight of a person who had given their all.

But there was nothing beautiful about someone wasting away after giving everything they had.

The sight stirred only a bitter feeling that was hard to name.

That was the look in the eyes of the young man staring at the Emperor now: Jin Taekyung.

“How much time do you have left?”

“That’s a question for the heavens.”

“This isn’t the time for jokes.”

“Did it sound like a joke?”

“…!”

“Even making it this far is a miracle. If I hadn’t learned martial arts, and if I hadn’t had the help of Baek Yeon and the Bow Saint, I’d already be dead.”

The vitality and physical strength of a Supreme Peak master were beyond comparison with those of ordinary people.

That was why the Emperor had learned martial arts—not to become stronger for its own sake, but solely to survive.

He had to grow stronger to resist the Blood Soul Gu’s poison.

But even the precious time he had bought himself was now drawing to a close.

“Not long ago, I found myself wondering something. If I’d been born with martial talent like yours, perhaps I could’ve completely suppressed the Blood Soul Gu.”

“Don’t talk like you’re helpless. Making it this far is already incredible. If you don’t give up and keep working at it…”

“Do you really believe that? Honestly, without the slightest bit of pity or a single lie?”

Jin Taekyung was at a loss for words. The Emperor continued, his voice calm.

“I don’t need half-hearted comfort. I know reality better than anyone.”

Despite having been taught by two peerless masters—the Bow Saint and Baek Yeon—and having absorbed all manner of elixirs, he had only reached the early stage of Supreme Peak.

Of course, the Blood Soul Gu’s poison had made learning martial arts no easy task. But the fact that even bone-deep effort and the finest possible conditions hadn’t brought him any further meant one thing.

A limit.

This was as far as he could go.

The Emperor had neither the talent to break through the enormous wall in front of him nor the time to do it.

Ka-koff. Koff.

The Emperor’s complexion was pale as he let out a series of small coughs. That was when Jin Taekyung’s quiet voice reached him.

“What if there’s still… a chance?”

“A chance.”

It was a word he hadn’t heard in a long time.

And the Emperor already knew what Taekyung meant by it.

“It’s too soon to give up.”

“Yes, I suppose you could think that. You trust the Divine Physician that much.”

“…!”

“Now that I think about it, there were three of you, not two. Three people who knew about my condition.”

At the sight of Jin Taekyung frozen with wide eyes, the Emperor gave a quiet laugh.

“He came to see me three days ago.”

Taekyung fell silent.

There was no need to ask how the examination had gone. Everything the Emperor had said and done until now was proof enough.

“He said it was too late. He shook his head and said there was nothing he could do for me right now.”

It was the judgment of the Divine Physician, whose medical skill was the greatest under heaven.

Unless the Great Firmament Immortal himself intervened, it was as good as confirmation that no human being could overcome this illness.

“And yet, all of a sudden, I felt ridiculous.”

The Emperor continued with a bitter smile.

“I thought I’d prepared myself and accepted everything long ago. But when the Divine Physician confirmed it, I felt as though a part of my chest had gone hollow.”

At last, spring had come.

No—he had reclaimed spring.

He had lived fiercely, and he wanted to keep doing so.

But he didn’t have much time left.

“Earlier, I told you I had no regrets left. That I was content.”

Taekyung finally spoke.

“I know. I knew you didn’t mean it.”

“Yes. You’re right. It was all a complete lie.”

The Emperor breathed heavily.

The crushing pressure on his chest, as if an enormous boulder were weighing it down, wasn’t caused only by the Blood Soul Gu that had eaten away at his body and mind over the years.

“There’s… so much I have to take care of before I die.”

The Emperor knew.

The spring he’d fought so hard to reclaim, its warmth, was only a passing spring breeze—a brief respite.

Before long, a cold frost would fall over the land and cover it all.

“There will be a war. One more brutal and vast than any before it.”

The calm before the storm.

Four characters that described the present situation more accurately than anything else.

And the weight of that coming storm would fall on whoever stood as ruler of the continent after the Emperor.

“Bao’er.”

One name slipped from the Emperor’s dry lips.

Prince Shangshan. No—the Imperial Younger Brother, Zhu Bao.

His last lingering attachment, the one who made him look back again and again as he neared the end of his life. His own flesh and blood, so precious he could never bear to see him hurt.

The little boy who wasn’t here had become a great boulder pressing down on the Emperor’s chest.

"He'll surely become a sage king. He'll be loved and praised by all the people, and bring peace and prosperity to this land."

But peace had already been broken.

To survive the flames of war that would sweep across the continent, the boy would have to become a conqueror, not a sage king.

"That burden will be too much for him."

The Emperor knew better than anyone how heavy and overwhelming the title Son of Heaven could be.

Perhaps by the heavens' grace, his youngest brother had been born with the qualities of a sage king. But he was still far too young.

Too young to rule a nation.

And too young to weather a war.

I want to live. I still have things to do for that boy, for this country and its people.

The Emperor said it only in his heart.

He knew reality wouldn't change no matter how desperately he wished it would, so he swallowed the words. As the ruler, who must never waver, he couldn't say them aloud.

What's the point of lamenting? It's all futile anyway.

The Emperor gave a bitter laugh. That was when—

"Did you know?"

Jin Taekyung spoke up without warning, fixing his gaze on the Emperor as he continued.

"There are two main ways to piss someone off. The first is to start saying something and then stop, and the second is…"

His voice trailed off, and silence followed.

The Emperor waited patiently for the rest. Then he couldn't hold back any longer.

"The second is what?"

"Hm?"

"I asked what the second one is."

"Oh, that."

Taekyung blinked as though he'd just remembered something he'd forgotten long ago, then scratched his chin.

"I just won't tell you. Let's move on."

"…What?"

"What does it matter? You didn't finish what you were saying, either."

"What are you talking about—"

The Emperor was so dumbfounded he was about to continue, but Taekyung spoke first.

“Just be honest. Say you want to live.”

“…!”

“Is that so hard?”

The Emperor’s pupils trembled.

It wasn’t because of Taekyung’s outrageous disrespect.

It was the embarrassment of having the truth he’d kept so tightly hidden laid bare, as if he’d been stripped naked.

“I am… the Son of Heaven.”

“So what? The Son of Heaven isn’t a person?”

“That’s enough!”

The Emperor’s low shout didn’t faze Taekyung. His words came in a rush.

“When someone says something hurtful, it hurts. When you get cut by a blade, you bleed. When you’re facing a hard reality, you lose heart. It’s the same for everyone. What’s different about wearing golden silk embroidered with dragons and looking down on all the civil and military officials?”

“…”

“You said you didn’t need half-hearted comfort. Fine. I won’t give you any. But you need to be more honest, too. Forget being the Emperor or anything else—just act like a person for a little while.”

The Emperor, his face clouded with confusion, wondered to himself:

Why had he summoned Jin Taekyung here today? Why had he let out thoughts he’d never shared with anyone?

And why, after such insolence, did he feel no anger?

Then he let out a quiet laugh.

“Do you know something?”

“I don’t. Except that you’re feeling better than I expected.”

“But I haven’t even said anything yet.”

“That’s why I said I don’t know. I’d have to hear it to know. How could I know if I haven’t heard it?”

“Ha! Ha-ha-ha!”

The Emperor suddenly burst into loud laughter. Before long, he coughed up blood and muttered,

“Damn it.”

“I didn’t know you knew how to swear.”

“You said the Son of Heaven was a person, didn’t you?”

“Oh. Yeah, I did.”

“…Still, don’t drop the formalities.”

“I was talking to myself.”

“What do you think would happen if I muttered to myself that you’d just tried to assassinate me?”

“That wouldn’t work. That’d be spreading false information.”

“You made me cough up blood, so it wouldn’t be entirely false.”

“You’ve got a real talent for twisting things.”

“This is getting more and more absurd. Is that any way to speak to the father of all the people and the Emperor of the Great Nation?”

“Dad.”

“What?”

“You said you were a father. If you don’t like me calling you Dad, I’ll call you Mom.”

“What kind of madman are you?”

The Emperor laughed so hard he could barely breathe. Still grinning, he spoke again.

“Do you know what I was about to say a moment ago?”

“You mean the thing I said I didn’t know?”

“That’s right.”

“Not really.”

“We—no, I…”

The Emperor stared at Taekyung, who was still playing coy, then slowly parted his lips.

“I want to live. More desperately than anyone.”

Jin Taekyung grinned.

“Now you sound like a person.”

“But reality hasn’t changed. I didn’t want to make a pitiful spectacle of myself.”

“So, are you crying now?”

“Where did that come from all of a sudden—”

“I cried. Three days ago.”

Despite what he was saying, Taekyung’s voice held a hint of laughter.

“I’m not exaggerating one bit. I bawled my eyes out, with snot running everywhere. I writhed around like a grub and begged the heavens to save me. I told them I still had so much left to do. That there were precious people I absolutely had to see one more time.”

“…!”

“I must’ve looked too pathetic to bear watching. But I wasn’t ashamed of myself.”

He’d fought to stay alive, and survived.

That was how he’d been given a second chance. How he’d ended up here.

“You don’t need to be ashamed, and you don’t need to despair.”

Jin Taekyung held out his hand to the Emperor.
“I’ll save you, one way or another.”

Chapter 935

"I heard Jin Taekyung came by."

The Emperor sat alone in his vast bedchamber, lost in thought. The man's sudden voice didn't startle him.

Baek Yeon was one of the very few—perhaps the only person—who could come and go anywhere in Qianqing Palace without asking permission.

"You're a step too late, Baek Yeon. He left half a shichen[3429] ago."

"That doesn't matter. I came to see Your Majesty."

At Commander Baek Yeon's calm reply, the Emperor affected a frown.

"I'd rather you hadn't. I've seen enough of your face already."

"Then have you been well these past three days?"

"What kind of question is that? It's been a relief not having a nag around."

"I'm hurt."

"Don't sulk. Someone who used to watch me day and night is in much the same position as you."

"No Shadow would be even more hurt if he heard that."

"That's why I'm saying it while he's away. He's no longer my bodyguard, so I can talk behind his back now and then."

"Well. There's no winning against Your Majesty."

Baek Yeon shook his head in defeat, and the Emperor gave a quiet laugh.

"So, is Bao'er doing well?"

"Of course. He couldn't be better."

But the worry didn't leave the Emperor's face.

"He's been through so much at such a young age. His mind and body must still be unsettled. Stay by his side."

Baek Yeon heard the concern in his voice. He understood it, too.

The Emperor's own flesh and blood had returned after more than a decade. Though it had been for the boy's safety, his youngest brother had, in effect, been left on his own. No amount of love or worry could feel like enough now.

Why else would the Emperor have assigned both No Shadow, his hidden bodyguard, and Baek Yeon, his closest confidant, directly to the Imperial Younger Brother?

Look after the boy. I can trust you two with him.

Remembering the request the Emperor had made three days ago—a request, not an order—Baek Yeon spoke.

[3429] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

“His Highness isn’t even fifteen yet, but of everyone I’ve met, only one person has a stronger, more upright spirit. It’s hard to believe he’s so young.”

“Only one?”

“Your Majesty.”

The answer came without hesitation. For a moment, the Emperor was at a loss for words. Then he raised both hands.

“I concede. Flattery from you, of all people. You’ve changed, Baek Yeon.”

“That’s true. Much like how Your Majesty has started making jokes.”

“Come now. I said I conceded. Enough nonsense.”

“Did what I just said sound like flattery or nonsense?”

Baek Yeon smiled faintly.

“I meant it. I’ve always admired and respected Your Majesty. Others would have given up on that thorn-covered road many times over, but you kept going, even with your feet covered in blood.”

The sincerity in his words left the Emperor silent.

Something welled up and caught in his throat. For the moment, he could barely speak. He fought the feeling down and forced out a reply.

“If I’d had to walk that road alone, I would have given up along the way. I couldn’t have done it without you all.”

“I don’t believe that.”

Baek Yeon shook his head and continued slowly.

“We could trust and follow you because you were who you are. This day was only possible because Your Majesty bore the greatest responsibility and the greatest pain.”

“…!”

“Even while watching for traitors hiding their blades, did you ever neglect the affairs of state? I watched you sacrifice sleep to practice martial arts, handle petitions, and fight your illness—all at once.”

A jumble of emotions crossed the Emperor’s face.

Yes. That was how it had been. There had been days when it could be no other way.

“It was only natural. Sleep was a luxury.”

For more than ten years, he had never slept more than one shichen[3430] a day.

No—even that sleep had never been peaceful. He had to keep his mind alert while he felt his body slowly dying.

That was what it meant to be the Son of Heaven. From the highest position under heaven, he had to face the fiercest storms before anyone else, while watching over and caring for all that lay beneath him.

[3430] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

That was how the Emperor saw his duty. And it was why Baek Yeon respected him so deeply.

“Deciding to do something is as easy as turning over your hand. Following through is as hard as moving a mountain.”

At first, Baek Yeon hadn’t been certain either.

Could the Great Nation’s fourth prince, their last remaining choice, join them in their great undertaking? Was he fit to hold the Son of Heaven’s absolute power?

But he had proved himself. Better than anyone.

Though the Imperial treasury was piled high with mountains of gold and silver, he had always lived frugally. Though peerlessly beautiful women had been presented before him, he had never indulged in women. He had even chosen not to produce an heir, for fear of putting his youngest brother in danger.

That way, Dark Heaven couldn’t harm Zhu Bao. They couldn’t recklessly kill a child with the legitimacy to replace the Emperor, nor could they inject him with Blood Soul Gu, which would swiftly kill its host.

“Every one of the things Your Majesty considered only natural was anything but.”

“…!”

The Emperor’s eyelids trembled at Baek Yeon’s quiet words.

He hadn’t known. He hadn’t known Baek Yeon thought of him that way.

Looking back over the road he’d traveled, the Emperor realized he wasn’t the only one who had kept his true feelings hidden. Baek Yeon had, too.

“I… don’t know what to say.”

At the strain in the Emperor’s voice, Baek Yeon let out a hearty laugh.

“You don’t have to say anything.”

“Shouldn’t I say something?”

“I’m not sure. It might only make things more awkward.”

The Emperor shook his head, then clicked his tongue.

“Baek Yeon, are you really the man I’ve always known?”

“What on earth do you mean?”

“Do you have to ask? You’ve always been merciless.”

“Are you talking about when you were learning martial arts?”

“I am. You said, ‘Please forgive me for laying hands on Your Majesty’s precious body,‘ then proceeded to beat me all over.”

“Why bring that up all of a sudden?”

Baek Yeon frowned at the unexpected reminder.

“And as I told you then, you improve at martial arts by getting hit. So Gyo… I mean, the Bow Saint agreed with me, didn’t she?”

“She did. The two of you even teamed up to beat me later. It hurt so much I spent ages wondering whether to quit on the spot.”

“Did I threaten you with a sword? You were the one who asked me to teach you.”

“And there’s the way you speak to me. Whenever I struggled, you’d come by and lay into me without fail. You’d even use the familiar hao form, as if you’d forgotten how one addresses the Son of Heaven.”

“That was…”

Baek Yeon trailed off and glanced away at the empty air.

He could excuse laying hands on the Emperor during martial arts training as part of teaching him. This was different. Even if he had meant to encourage the Emperor, some of the things he’d said and done had been anything but proper conduct for a subject.

“Your Majesty, I—”

“Don’t pretend you’ve forgotten. You were doing it until quite recently. Only a few days after Bao’er entered the palace, you came to me and gave me a thorough tongue-lashing.”

“You were taking poppy with our great undertaking so close at hand. I was afraid it would ruin your mind and body.”

“What does that have to do with using the familiar form of address? I’d been bedridden and suffering for days, and had only just recovered some strength. I had to take poppy to ease the pain, even a little.”

“I know. I knew then, too, but I was worried about you, Your Majesty.”

Baek Yeon kept speaking while his eyes wandered over the empty space ahead of him. Then he fell silent.

At the edge of his vision, he’d caught the Emperor smiling.

“…Ah.”

“Do you concede defeat?”

Baek Yeon realized the Emperor had been teasing him all along and sighed.

“I do.”

“That makes one victory for you and two for me.”

“Are you keeping score?”

“I was once a general like you. What matters more to a general than victory or defeat?”

At the sight of the Emperor laughing with evident delight, Baek Yeon couldn’t help joining in with a hearty laugh.

What else mattered? If the Emperor was happy, that was enough.

Three days ago, his face had been shadowed by approaching death. Now it shone as brightly as the full moon. That was what mattered to Baek Yeon.

And yet part of him felt bitter.

The Emperor looked as though he had already accepted, deep down, the death awaiting him. Baek Yeon could do nothing but look at him and laugh along.

I know why you sent No Shadow and me to His Highness.

It wasn't only to guard against some unforeseen danger and protect the Emperor's only brother and heir.

The Emperor was preparing for what would come after his death. Before it was too late, he was handing his loyal retainers and his power base over to Imperial Younger Brother Zhu Bao.

Yet in the past three days, he hadn't shown his face once to the brother he loved so dearly.

You don't want him to see you like this.

For brothers reunited after more than a decade, the coming death would not be a parting for the Emperor alone.

Zhu Bao, the Great Nation's new heir, would have to endure it too. Just when he had finally come to know the love and sincerity of family, he would have to let go of his only blood relative.

The Emperor must have known. He needed to tell his brother to prepare for their parting, but he was afraid to face the boy's grief. So he stayed away.

…I see.

Baek Yeon forced the corners of his mouth back up. Not wanting to spoil the Emperor's brief happiness, he spoke as brightly as he could.

"By the way, something good must have happened today. Did Jin Taekyung bring you some amusing news?"

"Amusing news? He did."

"I'd like to hear it."

"It's nothing much."

The Emperor smiled as he added the next words. Baek Yeon's smile vanished.

"He said he'd save me. One way or another."

"…!"

"It was amusing. He knows nothing about medicine, yet he made such a bold promise. But Baek Yeon, do you know what's even more amusing?"

The Emperor didn't wait for an answer.

"Those few absurd words made me feel hopeful."

It was strange. How could Jin Taekyung promise such a thing with such certainty on his face, such a gleam in his eyes?

The Emperor had enjoyed seeing him like that. He was grateful, too. That irreverent martial artist was determined to save a life the Emperor himself had given up on.

But the reality as the Emperor knew it remained cold.

It's probably impossible.

How cruel hope could be to someone facing a death already foretold.

He had folded that brief hope away and tucked it deep in his heart. For now, he simply wanted to speak to his loyal subject with a lighter heart.

“You look troubled. I’m fine, Baek Yeon. Don’t worry about me.”

“But if word of this gets out…”

The Emperor smiled at Baek Yeon’s worried look and waved a hand.

“He promised me he wouldn’t tell anyone else. Jin Taekyung is a man I can trust.”

“So…”

Jeok Cheongang’s voice was heavy when I finished telling him everything.

“The Emperor’s been poisoned with Blood Soul Gu?”

I nodded without hesitation.

“Yes.”

Promises are made to be broken.

Chapter 936

Jeok Cheongang's reaction to the truly grave news that the Emperor had been poisoned with Blood Soul Gu was short and to the point.

"That must hurt."

"…?"

"What? Am I wrong?"

"Well, no, but it's a little more serious than hurting."

Anyone listening would think the Emperor had a cold instead of Blood Soul Gu.

Jeok Cheongang shrugged at my baffled look.

"Same difference. He's in so much pain he's at death's door, isn't he? Even that needlessly tight-lipped quack can't cure him."

At the sudden jab, the Divine Physician—who'd looked uncomfortable throughout my account—spoke up.

"The patient told me not to inform anyone until he spoke of it himself. I merely respected his wishes. And why am I a quack?"

"If a physician can't cure an illness, he's a quack. Take that Divine Physician name tag off today."

"I never put one on. It wasn't mine to begin with."

"Since we're on the subject, let me ask you something. What if…"

"I know what you're thinking, but even if my master came, it wouldn't change anything."

I'd wanted to ask the same thing. The Divine Physician had answered a beat before I could, calmly and firmly.

"Blood Soul Gu… is unlike any of the deadly poisons known to us. It's almost as if it was created solely to kill its host."

Jeok Cheongang gave a low groan.

"You mean there's no antidote?"

"Poison and medicine come from much the same root. There must be a way to treat it. The problem is time."

He was right. The Emperor was dying even now.

Three days ago, just after the battle in the grand banquet hall, he'd looked unusually exhausted. I hadn't imagined it.

"From what I've seen, his vitality is already at its limit. I can't even guarantee he'll last another couple of months."

For the Divine Physician to say that meant the poison had advanced beyond anything elixirs or internal energy could hold back.

Like a jar full of holes that wouldn't fill no matter how much water you poured into it, the Emperor's life force was draining away fast.

At this rate, he'll die before long. If the Emperor dies suddenly, the Great Nation will be thrown into chaos.

Personal feelings aside, the Emperor couldn't die.

He'd borne every kind of disgrace and ruled the Great Nation for over ten years without any serious unrest.

And he'd held on to the throne despite the powerful opposition led by the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord. That alone showed what an exceptional ruler he was.

I have to save him. For what's coming, if nothing else.

I'd heard that outside the palace, things were already boiling like a cauldron over hot coals.

Two days before I woke up, the Emperor had carried out another large-scale purge, then posted hundreds of proclamations across the Imperial Capital.

The huge sheets, clearly stamped with the Imperial Seal, laid out the whole truth in detail.

They also carried the Emperor's declaration that he would crush the vile traitors known as Dark Heaven.

The war is about to begin.

No—it had already begun.

The Emperor's resolve was clear, and the people's anger toward Dark Heaven was spreading like wildfire.

To them, Dark Heaven was an outside enemy threatening their homes and their lives. No one wanted war, but they had to fight to protect the peace.

And this war needed someone to lead them all.

A powerful leader, cool-headed and thorough, with the authority to push through bold decisions when necessary.

Experience on many battlefields would make that leader all the better.

"What do you intend to do, Young Master Jin?"

I answered the Divine Physician's grave question calmly.

"We have to save him somehow."

"But we have no way to do that. As I said, there isn't enough time."

"That's all right. The method I'm going to try probably won't take long."

"You sound quite certain… Do you have a plan I don't know about?"

"I do. A brilliant one."

Jeok Cheongang, who'd been listening in silence, suddenly widened his eyes.

"Wait. This plan of yours…"

"It's what you're thinking."

"I'd forgotten all about it. Yes, that treasure changes everything."

Jeok Cheongang tapped his forehead. Only then did the Divine Physician blink in apparent surprise.

“Don’t tell me you have the Myriad-Poison Ring in mind?”

“Of course. What else?”

“Huh…”

At his low sigh, I gave a short laugh and continued.

“Even against Blood Soul Gu, the Myriad-Poison Ring gives us a good chance. No—it can definitely cure him.”

The ring had absorbed even the Formless Ultimate Poison that had once threatened Jeok Cheongang, and without much difficulty.

The Divine Physician had treated Jeok Cheongang alongside the Slaughter Saint back then. He knew better than anyone what the ring could do, so it was strange that he hadn’t thought of it until now.

“I guess you’ve had a lot on your mind, given the circumstances. I understand. It happens.”

“Y-Young Master Jin.”

“It’s fine. As you know, I left it with Prince Shangshan—or rather, the Imperial Younger Brother. I’ll go get it now. It’ll only take a moment, so you can prepare the treatment while I’m gone.”

“Young Master Jin?”

“Oh, come on. Anyone can forget something now and then. Why are you making such a big deal of it? I’ll be off, then.”

I gave him a friendly smile and turned.

Or I tried to—until I noticed what he was holding.

“…?”

Wait. What’s that?

I stared at the all-too-familiar ring for a moment before breaking the silence.

“That’s strange. It looks a lot like something I know.”

The Divine Physician gave me a flat look.

“It would.”

“I guess they make incredible knockoffs on this continent. Where’d you buy it?”

“I didn’t buy it.”

“Oh, someone gave it to you as a gift?”

“It wasn’t a gift, either. I borrowed it for a while.”

“From whom?”

“I explained the general situation to His Highness the Imperial Younger Brother. When I said I needed it for something important and had come on your behalf, he handed it over without asking for details.”

My vision swam.

I steadied my breathing and managed to ask, “And that important thing was…?”

“What else? I’ve been to Qianqing Palace twice today.”
“I didn’t hear anything about that from His Majesty…”
“Did he need to?”
“Then the result was…?”
“Just what I told you earlier.”
Silence fell again, heavier and more suffocating than before.
No one ventured to speak. Then Jeok Cheongang’s low voice rang out.
“That plan was so brilliant it plugged up your nose, too.”
“…”
“…”
Yeah.
What now?

SYSTEM

Quest
Dr. Choi Taekyung
You made a profound impression on the Emperor, who suffers from illness, by promising to treat him.
But for someone facing death, nothing is crueler than premature hope.
A man’s word is worth a thousand gold. Keep your promise.
Remove the Blood Soul Gu lodged in the Emperor’s head and free him from the pain that has tormented him for so many years.
If you fail to treat the Emperor…
Grade: Supreme Peak
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Mission: Successful treatment (Incomplete)
Reward: ???
Failure: ???

I stared at the empty air, then quietly closed the holographic window.
Only one thought filled my head.
I’m screwed.
Really screwed.
Who could’ve guessed even the Myriad-Poison Ring wouldn’t work?
No matter how much I pressed him, unable to accept it, the Divine Physician’s answer never changed.

"It failed."

"But it looked like it was going to work, right?"

"No. It failed."

"So it almost worked? Missed by a hair?"

"It failed completely. It simply doesn't work. In fact, the Blood Soul Gu sensed the ring's energy, felt threatened, and struggled even harder. I still break into a cold sweat thinking about it."

"Liar. Playing such a nasty prank on me, you little scamp."

"…Young Master Jin. Would you come over there and speak with me for a moment?"

Something had glinted inside the Divine Physician's sleeve. When I looked, I saw an acupuncture needle big enough to pierce the sole of an elephant's foot.

A chill ran down my spine, and I made my way back to my quarters as if fleeing. That had been barely fifteen minutes ago.

Damn it.

What had made me bold enough to promise the Emperor he'd be discharged safe and sound?

I'd put all my faith in that overpowered item, the Myriad-Poison Ring. It had dealt with the Formless Ultimate Poison easily enough. Surely it could kill one lousy bug.

And yet.

I'm screwed.

Yeah. Screwed.

Worse than screwed.

Forget the quest—the Emperor's death had to be prevented. But with my last hope, the Myriad-Poison Ring, gone, my vision had gone yellow.

"What the hell… am I supposed to do?"

I stared blankly at the ceiling I'd grown accustomed to, muttering to myself. Then Hyuk Mujin—who seemed to have claimed one corner of the room as his own—came over and patted my shoulder, as if this were only natural.

"It's all right, Captain. Everything's all right."

"Mujin."

"Yes?"

"Do you even know what the hell you're talking about?"

"I do."

Mujin nodded confidently.

"You got dumped by Young Lady Ju, didn't you?"

"…"

"Ah. Guess not. I'm sorry for overstepping."

When it came to apologizing, he was a Supreme Peak master.

He bowed at the speed of light, then looked wistfully at the pocket watch hanging from my neck.

“But seriously, what happened?”

“Mujin. When you’re talking to someone, look them in the eye. Not at their watch.”

“It gleams so beautifully that I couldn’t help myself.”

I badly wanted to whack him on the back of the head, but I didn’t have the energy.

I let out a long sigh and explained the situation in broad strokes, taking care not to reveal that the Emperor was the person at the center of the story.

“So someone promised to treat a seriously ill person.”

“Yeah.”

“But after making all those grand claims, they have no plan or way to do it.”

Every word hurt.

I flinched and added cautiously, “That’s true, but to be precise, they had a way. Then it was gone.”

“Either way, there’s no way to treat the person now, right?”

“Right.”

“Hmm. Got it.”

Mujin nodded and delivered his judgment in a stern voice.

“What a total piece of shit.”

“…!”

“Don’t you think so too, Captain? How could someone give that kind of hope to a person who’d only just made peace with dying? With nothing certain to back it up. I don’t know what kind of bastard would…”

He saw me trembling. His voice dropped at once.

“I think he’s a very handsome, dignified, upstanding young man who always gives others hope.”

“…”

“…”

“…Are you done?”

“…Should I say more?”

“…No.”

Stop. You’re making me feel worse, you bastard.

I gave him a sad look, silently telling him to stop, then lowered my head, unable to face Hyuk Mujin.

Tap-tap-tap.

Someone approached at a run. The door opened, and a familiar face appeared.

“I heard it was important, so I took care of it as quickly as I could… Oh my, why’s the mood so grim?”

It was Hong Jin.

Chapter 937

"I heard it was important, so I took care of it as quickly as I could… Oh my, why's the mood so grim?"

Hong Jin sensed the tension as soon as he entered the room. I answered with a troubled expression.

"It's nothing."

"Nothing? It sure looks like something happened."

Hong Jin glanced between Hyuk Mujin and me, then murmured, his expression suddenly serious.

"Oh, that's what it is? Hmm. But there's nothing you can do about that."

"…?"

"It's all right, so don't take it too hard. These things happen sometimes. It's part of life."

Could Hong Jin know, too?

He was now the East Depot eunuch, so it was entirely possible he knew about the Emperor's illness.

Maybe he'd heard something while enthusiastically torturing rebels for the last three days.

Having reached what seemed like a reasonable conclusion, I cautiously asked, "You already knew?"

Hong Jin hesitated for a moment, then nodded.

"Yeah. I happened to hear."

"It's supposed to be top secret… More people know than I expected."

"Eyes and ears are everywhere. No matter how tightly you try to keep something under wraps, word gets out eventually."

Fair enough. The Emperor keeping quiet couldn't protect every secret.

Every incident had victims and perpetrators, and perpetrators had mouths, too.

The rebels who were already dead—or waiting for death.

Some of those who'd passed through Hong Jin's and the Embroidered Uniform Guard's hands must have been close aides to the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, and known the Emperor had been poisoned with Blood Soul Gu.

"You must've found out while interrogating the prisoners. Which ones knew?"

"What?"

"The prisoners who knew about it. They must have been closely connected to the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord."

"Uh, well…"

Maybe it was a sensitive subject.

I realized my mistake too late and was about to wave it off when Hong Jin, who'd been blinking quietly, continued.

"I heard it from Taishan."

"Ah. I see… Wait. Who?"

"Taishan. That huge guy."

"…?"

No, something wasn't right here.

Hyuk Mujin spoke up in my place.

"You mean the Taishan I know?"

"Yeah."

"Built like a mountain, just like his name?"

"That's right."

"Usually an idiot, but smart whenever food comes up?"

"I don't know about that part."

"Obsessed with five-spice pork?"

"That part's definitely true. Actually, some intelligence came in yesterday. According to my men, the imperial cooks tried to poison his food."

If he was the imperial cooks' number one assassination target, then it had to be the Taishan I knew.

Utterly confused, I asked, "How would he know about that?"

"How else? He saw it."

"That can't be right. He couldn't have seen it."

"He said he saw it clearly."

"…What are you even talking about?"

"…That's what I'd like to ask you. What's all this about prisoners and interrogations?"

Hong Jin frowned at me, then went on.

"Weren't you talking about 'that thing' that happened right after Young Master Jin woke up?"

"W-what?"

"You look really unsettled. Is that why? I told you it's fine, so why are you still worrying? You just have a little more energy than other people."

"…!"

Oh, shit.

My vision went dark in an instant, and my whole body trembled.

"How… how did you know?"

"It's all over the palace. Didn't you know?"

"It's all over…?"

"I was away for a while, so I'm one of the last to hear. Less than two shichen[3431] after you woke up, half the people in the Inner Palace probably knew."

I couldn't breathe. My hands and feet shook, and I felt like I was about to cry.

It was like turning on the TV one day out of boredom and finding a national broadcast channel throwing a wet-dream party for me.

Twitching like I was sick, I barely managed to force the words out.

"Taishan. Bring that bastard here right now."

Hyuk Mujin, who'd frozen with his mouth hanging open, answered.

"I'm really sorry to say this, but Taishan's stronger than I am."

"Bring him here, no matter what!"

"Come on, Captain. You know he tears people apart with both hands."

"I can tear you apart with one."

"Ah. Aah."

Hyuk Mujin let out a brief yelp and dashed out. Sensing the mood turn heavy, Hong Jin spoke with a troubled expression.

"Young Master Jin. Don't take it so hard."

For the moment, even my worries about treating the Blood Soul Gu had been driven from my mind.

I groaned at his attempt to comfort me. "Easy for you to say when it's not happening to you."

"I told you it's fine."

"What's fine? Have you ever been in a situation like mine?"

At my sharp question, Hong Jin answered with a sad smile.

"Of course not. I had it cut off a long time ago."

"…"

"Just look on the bright side. I'm actually jealous of you, Young Master Jin. Especially during the rainy season, it aches so much down there that sometimes I can barely walk without poppy…"

"Okay, I get it. I get it, so please stop."

Using his eunuch trump card—one he pulled out whenever he was bored—to shut me up, Hong Jin held out something he'd been carrying and continued.

"I was going to do that anyway. I'm a busy man, too. I only came to hand over the item I was asked to deliver."

My badly backfired question had snapped me to my senses. Only then did I notice the small iron chest in Hong Jin's hand and remember why he'd come back.

The mysterious place the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord had told me about in his final moments.

[3431] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; two shichen are about four hours.

The item he'd said to find there.

This is…

"It's an iron chest, as you can see. I don't know what's inside or who left it there, though."

"You didn't open it?"

"Of course not. I promised you I wouldn't."

Hong Jin shrugged and added with a smile, "Besides, I wasn't sure I could open it."

He'd said it like a joke, but the moment I took the chest from him, I realized it wasn't entirely one.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Very Sturdy Iron Chest acquired.
New Item acquired. Would you like to appraise the Item and view its information?

I gave a slight nod, and a translucent holographic window opened between Hong Jin and me.

SYSTEM

Item Window
Very Sturdy Iron Chest
Grade: Peak
Restriction: None
Description: An iron chest made by mixing in a small amount of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron. As you'd expect, it's incredibly durable—perfect for use as a shield or for storing precious belongings.
However, it has no fewer than five locks, so using it often may be a bit of a hassle.

I read the text quickly and swallowed a dry laugh.

Seriously? Even if it's only a little, why use Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron in an iron chest…?

Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron was incredibly rare—and filthy expensive to match.

If a reasonably well-known smith used even four nyang[3432] of it to forge a weapon, people would call it a fine sword. Use any more than that, and foul-tempered masters with a habit of spitting would descend on it like A-Gwi.

[3432] A nyang is a traditional Korean unit of weight of about 37.5 g (1.32 oz); four nyang are about 150 g (5.29 oz).

In short, it wasn't something you could easily get just because you had money. And no matter how rich you were, any sane person would use it to forge a weapon.

There weren't many people crazy and rich enough to mix Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron into an iron chest that was nothing more than a storage box.

Of course…

I can think of one right away.

I gave a bitter smile and ran my hand over the chest.

As if to prove it had been buried deep underground, its surface was damp, and patches of soil that hadn't been brushed off gave off a strong earthy smell.

What could it be? What did you want to hide so badly?

I was thinking of the chest's former owner, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, when Hong Jin rose to his feet with a wink.

"I'll get going. I'd only be in your way if I stayed."

He didn't wait for my answer before leaving the room. Before closing the door, he passed along one more message.

"Oh, His Highness the Imperial Younger Brother asked me to tell you something."

"What…?"

"He misses his one and only friend. He can't come see you right now because of the circumstances, but he wants to make sure he sees you before he leaves."

His one and only friend.

Remembering what he'd said when he gave me the Myriad-Poison Ring at Qianqing Palace, I couldn't help laughing softly.

"Tell him I feel the same way."

Hong Jin answered with a slight smile of his own, then left. Once I'd confirmed that all signs of life around me had disappeared, I set the iron chest on the floor and abruptly held out my hand.

Inventory open. Summon.

Ding.

With the brief command recited in my mind, familiar, cold metal settled into my grip.

White Flame.

My personal weapon, a divine weapon forged by the world's greatest smith after a year of arduous work.

And the key—the physical kind—to that tightly locked iron chest and its five padlocks.

"Let's see what you were so determined to keep hidden."

I murmured, then brought the spearhead down without hesitation.

Slice.

A flash of light, and the metal split apart.

The blade passed cleanly through all five padlocks in a single stroke. I looked inside the chest.

This is…

I'd known from the moment I first picked up the iron chest, but its contents were as spare as its weight was light.

A dozen or so bamboo slips, so old they were practically rotting away.

Alongside them lay bundles of relatively recent-looking paper, still white and clean, and a small silk pouch.

What is this?

The moment I saw them, an inexplicable shiver ran down my spine.

These were the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord's—or, to put it another way, what he'd left behind.

They had to be worth more than gold and more dangerous than gunpowder, in ways that couldn't be measured by their weight or shape alone.

It didn't take long for me to realize my instinct was right.

No—it took only moments.

Rustle.

The moment I untied the string around the bundle of papers on top, still pristine white, a bolt of lightning shot through the crown of my head.

"…!"

My entire body went rigid.

As I read the writing covering the pages, my eyes trembling, Hyuk Mujin's voice reached me. I hadn't heard him come back.

"Um, Captain. I don't think I can bring him…"

His voice echoed as if from far away.

I struggled to contain the turmoil inside me and spoke.

"…Bring them."

"What?"

"Bring everyone here. Now!"

"…!"

Hyuk Mujin's face went rigid. He'd sensed something was wrong.

Chapter 938

“Has it been about fifty years?”

Jeok Cheongang murmured as he looked out over the garden, filled with rare flowers and plants of every color.

“Back then, Mount Li in Shaanxi looked just like this. It was the height of spring, and everything was in bloom.”

This wasn’t merely an old man reminiscing aloud. He was speaking to someone seated against a moss-covered wall.

“Mount Small Hua.”

“Hmm?”

“It was Mount Small Hua, not Mount Li.”

Her voice was calm and clear.

Jeok Cheongang shook his head at the Bow Saint’s correction.

“That can’t be right. I remember soaking in hot spring water. Mount Li’s been famous for its hot springs since ancient times.”

“It wasn’t a hot spring. It was a small pond—until someone said he couldn’t stand cold water and heated it with Scorching Yang Qi.”

“Did he?”

“You’ve completely forgotten how the Thunderbolt Saber King flew into a rage and nearly started a fight.”

“That Peng bastard?”

The Bow Saint nodded. Jeok Cheongang frowned.

“I don’t remember it, but he was an idiot then and he’s an idiot now. All that fuss over a little warm water.”

“He had good reason. The Thunderbolt Saber King was already in the pond.”

“He’s a big fellow. I must’ve mistaken him for a bear.”

The Bow Saint gave a small sigh at his shameless reply.

“You haven’t changed.”

“People aren’t so different from those flowers. Wind and rain batter them day and night, and a sudden change in their surroundings can kill them. If you want to live even one day longer, you have to stay the same—like this old man.”

“So you came to tell me the secret to a long life?”

“Does this old man look like he has that much time on his hands?”

“You showed up out of nowhere and started telling stories I’d rather not remember. You don’t look that busy.”

Jeok Cheongang smiled bitterly at her dry reply.

This time, he couldn’t disagree. No matter how he looked at it, those weren’t happy memories.

They’d gathered there one spring more than fifty years ago—not simply to laugh and talk. He couldn’t even remember the exact year now.

“Three thousand members of the death squad climbed that mountain together. Before a day had passed, half of them had been buried there.”

Mount Small Hua, green beneath the bright spring sky, had become a mountain of fire, dyed red from end to end.

He could still see it clearly: flames surging up the mountainside, blood mingling with the water in the valleys, and more corpses than he could count strewn everywhere.

The Zhongnan Sect. The Huashan Sect. The Hebei Peng Family.

And alongside them, smaller orthodox factions whose names had faded from people’s memories long ago.

The Blade of Flowers, Jin Baekyang—then the Second Young Master of the Jin Family of Taiyuan—had been there too.

The three thousand elite members of the death squad surged like a wave toward ten thousand Demonic Cult followers led by five great fiends. They broke against them, scattering blood instead of white foam.

At dawn, when the survivors stood atop a mountain of Demonic Cult corpses and shouted in victory, two kings and one star stood at their center.

“One thousand three hundred and nineteen.”

“…!”

“That’s how many people died that day.”

Her quiet voice cut through the night air.

Jeok Cheongang stopped short, then slowly turned.

“You remember? All of them?”

Though his body had grown young again, the years remained in his eyes. And in those eyes, the woman’s gaze looked much like his own.

“I’ve never forgotten. Not for a moment.”

“…I didn’t know you were that kind of person.”

“Knowing changes nothing. All I do is remember them.”

The Bow Saint fell silent for a moment before adding, “That was simply the kind of time it was.”

Jeok Cheongang gave a faint nod.

“Yes. It was.”

The Demonic Cult’s momentum had been terrifying back then.

No—overwhelming.

The Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples swept in like a wave, crushing the Kunlun Sect as they crossed Qinghai. Then they split into three forces and advanced unchecked.

Toward Sichuan. Toward Gansu. And beyond Shaanxi, into the heart of the continent known as the Central Plains.

Not even the Nine Sects and One Gang or the Five Great Families could stop that wave. The orthodox factions, still divided and guarding their own territories, crumbled almost at once.

The Demonic Cult's long-cherished dream of a world ruled by the Demonic Path no longer seemed far-fetched.

Until one man appeared.

"Do you know what I was thinking the day I came down from Mount Jiuhua, after killing every last bastard who'd dared set it on fire?"

Jeok Cheongang didn't wait for an answer.

"I swore to myself that until my dying breath, I'd kill as many Demonic Cult followers as I could."

With the war already turning against them, taking on the Demonic Cult alone was madness.

The kind of madness only Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King, could attempt.

"But it turned out someone was even crazier than this old man."

Jeok Cheongang laughed. He remembered preparing to charge straight at the Demonic Cult forces that had occupied Anhui after driving out even the Namgung Family.

"I just couldn't believe it. Three thousand Demonic Cult followers defeated by one man."

Those three thousand weren't a rabble who'd barely risen above Third Rate. They were elites forged by the Demonic Cult's brutal training, fanatics who had sworn absolute loyalty to the Heavenly Demon.

Among them were two great fiends who had reached the Supreme Peak realm.

"Of course, eventually I had no choice but to believe it."

The story was too incredible to accept, so he'd caught several Demonic Cult followers as they fled and interrogated them. He confirmed that their two leading great fiends and nearly half their forces had vanished.

All because of someone no one could identify.

"That was when I remembered what my late Master used to say. The world is vast and there are many masters, so I must never stop striving."

Before long, though, he understood.

Jeok Cheongang wasn't lacking. That unknown man was exceptional.

No—beside him, anyone would have seemed ordinary.

"The Martial God."

No one knew where he came from, what his name was, or how old he might be. Hardly anyone even knew his face.

He could wield every kind of martial art at will, and the disguise technique was no exception.

Yet everyone believed in him and followed him.

That was the kind of person he was. The only lamp lighting a world sunk in darkness. The sun, alone in the sky.

But precisely because of that, they could only circle him, instinctively unable to draw near.

They feared that the wind from a cautious outstretched hand might snuff out their only light.

Afraid that one step closer to the sun would leave them burning in its heat.

"So the Martial God's identity remained a mystery to the very end. No—no one could even dare imagine it. Not even the Thousand-Faced Fox, who served him more closely than anyone."

But now Jeok Cheongang knew the secret the world had never learned. At last, he understood why that man could be called the Martial God.

"Was it divine strength? That incomprehensible power."

At his near-whisper, the Bow Saint slowly rose.

"Why? Are you planning to spread the word?"

"This old man's only just started living like a proper person again. I won't have people calling me senile."

Jeok Cheongang gave a quiet laugh.

"So that's why you kept talking when you knew I could hear you? Just because I'm that brat's Master?"

"I simply saw no reason to hide it."

The Bow Saint met his gaze.

"I saw you on the battlefield. A Master and Disciple willing to throw away their lives to save each other."

"…!"

"That was when I understood how much you trust each other. Hiding the truth would have been pointless."

Where nothing was hidden, there could be no secret.

The Bow Saint had seen the bond between Master and Disciple clearly. And as the unbelievable story unfolded, she sensed Jeok Cheongang's qi remain steady while he silently watched, confirming what she had understood.

"When did you realize your Disciple was different from everyone else?"

Jeok Cheongang answered calmly.

“From the beginning until now. Always.”

“I think you misunderstand. I mean, when did you learn the truth about that boy…?”

“Does it matter?”

Jeok Cheongang cut her off. Her reflection appeared in his eyes, now dark and solemn.

“Nothing changes. From the day I took that brat as my Disciple, we’ve shared everything and faced it together.”

At that moment, the Bow Saint frowned.

Not because she hadn’t gotten the answer she wanted, but because she felt the air around them slowly heating up.

Rumble.

The wind stopped. The air trembled.

And at the center of it all stood Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King.

“But…”

He slowly turned his head away from the garden. His eyes glowed red, flickering in the darkness like ghost fires.

“Did you put my Disciple in danger just to make that trivial confirmation?”

Jeok Cheongang had not forgotten the rage and despair that seized him when Jin Taekyung collapsed, spraying blood.

His Disciple might have grown strong enough to stand shoulder to shoulder with the Elders of great sects—perhaps even their Sect Leaders.

He might no longer be a rash young man like others his age, but someone with the stature to call himself a grandmaster.

Jin Taekyung was still his one and only Disciple.

Whoosh!

White hellfire spiraled upward.

Through the heat haze rising from its terrible warmth, the Bow Saint spoke calmly.

“Two thousand five hundred and sixty-two.”

Jeok Cheongang stopped in his tracks. He had been moving toward her, but he thought he knew what that unexpected number meant.

“That’s how many of our people died in the grand banquet hall three days ago.”

“You know the number well. But…”

His voice came out cold, utterly unlike the power blazing around him.

“If someone had stepped forward sooner, fewer than half of them would have died.”

“Yes. I’m sure you’re right.”

“What!”

Whoosh.

The flames around Jeok Cheongang burned hotter. The Bow Saint went on, unruffled.

“Even so, I had to see it with my own eyes. Whether that boy truly was the chosen one. What power he possessed, and what kind of person he was.”

“How dare you…!”

“After every battle, I counted the dead. It was one way I could remember them.”

“Shut your mouth!”

“But if ten times as many died as they did three days ago—one hundred times… No, more than a thousand times as many—could you still be angry as you are now?”

“…!”

“To you, it may have been a trivial test that put your precious Disciple in danger. To me, it wasn’t.”

The Bow Saint looked into Jeok Cheongang’s trembling eyes.

“I made that decision for far more people than that. Perhaps for everyone in this world.”

“That was also why that person—the Martial God—chose me.”

Her soft murmur drifted through the cold night air.

Step.

Far away in the darkness came the faint sound of someone approaching.

They turned at the same time. Hyuk Mujin was running toward them with all his might.

Chapter 939

That guy…

Jeok Cheongang recognized the familiar face hurrying toward them through the darkness and drew in the aura surging through his body.

Was it because the unexpected, unwelcome visitor was Hyuk Mujin?

No. Something about Mujin's appearance was wrong.

Huff, huff.

His legs kept moving as he struggled for breath. Who knew how far he'd run? Sweat beaded on his face, and he looked desperate.

…Something must have happened.

Hoping his sudden sense of foreboding was mistaken, Jeok Cheongang called to Mujin, who had lost his bearings for a moment in the dark.

"What are you dawdling for?"

"Ah! Great Hero Jeok!"

Mujin rushed over, then stopped short when he spotted the Bow Saint.

"Th-this junior of Murim, Hyuk Mujin…"

The Bow Saint cut off his introduction with a small wave of her hand.

"Save the formalities. Tell us why you're here."

"It's… Captain. I mean, my lord ordered me to bring the two of you to him at once."

"The two of us?"

"Yes. I searched everywhere and couldn't find either of you. When I asked my lord, he told me where to look…"

The Bow Saint's brow furrowed.

But it wasn't because a junior so far below her—Jin Taekyung, who was practically still a child—had dared to summon her as if he could order her around.

"He said he'd explain everything in person. Everyone else is already gathered."

At that, the Bow Saint clicked her tongue softly.

"Something more serious than I thought must have happened. Serious enough for him to summon you and me."

Jeok Cheongang nodded gravely.

Taekyung could be reckless, but within the bounds he observed, the brat was scrupulous about courtesy. If he had sent a subordinate to fetch even the Bow Saint, who was an outsider to him, Jeok Cheongang couldn't begin to guess how serious the matter was.

—Unfortunately, I think we'll have to end our conversation here.

The Bow Saint's Sound Transmission reached his ear. Jeok Cheongang studied her calm face with a heavy gaze. She didn't look the least bit disappointed.

—So it seems. For tonight.

He meant to continue the conversation another time. There were things he still hadn't said and questions he hadn't dared to ask. He had no intention of leaving it at this.

—I hope our next conversation will be more meaningful than this one.

Despite his pointed words, the Bow Saint remained composed.

—I'm sure it will be. Even if it isn't next time, we'll have plenty of chances.

—What do you mean by…

Jeok Cheongang faltered at the many possible meanings in her answer. He was just about to continue when—

Flap, flap.

The sound of powerful wings suddenly rang overhead.

Those are…

Jeok Cheongang looked up. The Bow Saint turned at the same moment, and Mujin followed their gazes.

Whoosh!

Dozens of birds crossed the distant night sky. They flew in separate groups, each bound in a different direction, moving with the precision of creatures thoroughly trained.

"Messenger eagles…!"

Jeok Cheongang spoke almost in a groan. A weight settled in his chest.

Sending out so many precious messenger eagles—not ordinary messenger pigeons—meant the Great Nation's imperial court was on the move.

Probably because of the news his Disciple had brought.

What could have happened?

At least one thing was certain: there was no time left to hesitate.

"Lead the way. Hurry."

The night was still far too deep for dawn. Yet unseen unrest was already sweeping through the Imperial Palace.

"What happened?"

Those were Jeok Cheongang's first words as he swept in like the wind. Instead of answering, I held out what was in my hand.

Swish.

His gaze darkened at the sight of several sheets of paper, still slick with oil.

"A missive?"

A veteran martial artist whose experience was second to none in the world, he had immediately recognized the papers. He took the stack from me and skimmed through it quickly.

Before even a few moments had passed, he looked up, his face as hard as stone.

“Is everything written here… true?”

If it had been half an hour ago, I might not even have heard Jeok Cheongang’s voice.

But I’d since explained the situation to the Fire Dragon Pavilion members and passed the gist of it to Hong Jin and Qianqing Palace. I managed to answer calmly, though my answer was far from definite.

“I don’t know.”

“What do you mean!”

“To be precise, none of it has been confirmed yet. But…”

I looked from Jeok Cheongang’s rigid face to the Bow Saint, who was now reading the missive, and then to the Fire Dragon Pavilion members gathered inside the hall.

“The information is highly credible.”

“On what grounds?”

The Bow Saint set down the missive. Her gaze was graver than I’d ever seen it.

“No, before that—who sent it?”

“I don’t know that, either. Only that it was someone fairly high up in Dark Heaven.”

“How could someone like that send it to you…”

Her voice trailed off. Then she gave a low murmur.

“It wasn’t sent to you.”

Exactly. Whoever had written this missive had intended to pass the information to someone else.

“Could it be…?”

Jeok Cheongang spoke under his breath. I nodded.

“That’s right. It was among the things the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord kept.”

“…!”

“…!”

Their eyes widened. Even the Fire Dragon Pavilion members, who had heard the broad outline before Jeok Cheongang and the Bow Saint arrived, couldn’t hide their agitation.

Anyone who had read even one of those missives would react that way. The four or five sheets, still slick with oil, held information on which tens of thousands of lives depended. Maybe hundreds of thousands.

And one of them lay at my feet.

Tap.

I picked up the sheet with trembling fingers. Four characters caught my eye at once.

Shanxi Annihilation Plan.

At some unknown point in the past, someone had written to the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord: before the Double Ninth Festival[3433], Dark Heaven's main force would cross the vast northern grasslands and invade Shanxi Province.

Crack.

I clenched my teeth, swallowed a groan, and closed my eyes.

If—if this information was true…

Just half a month.

That was all the time left until the Double Ninth Festival[3434].

All the time Shanxi Province had left. No—the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

Peace and turmoil went hand in hand.

Even in times of peace, disturbances great and small broke out somewhere in the world. And even amid the chaos of war, someone enjoyed peace.

That hadn't changed when the long, fierce age of rival warlords ended and the Great Nation unified the land. It had always been true, was true now, and would remain true.

And nowhere in this vast world saw more constant strife than the northern grasslands.

A land of grass, earth, and horses. By day, birds rode the blue skies. By night, wild beasts huddled in the darkness and roamed in search of corpses.

Before the age of rival warlords, a nomadic people had conquered vast territories and called themselves rulers of the world. Their descendants still lived on those grasslands, in gers[3435] made of cloth and grass rather than splendid palaces or behind towering walls, alongside the horses that had been their constant companions since they first learned to walk.

Yet the glory their great ancestors had won was slowly fading from memory.

"Hmm. Not bad. No—excellent."

The man spoke with satisfaction and took another drink.

Like other nomads, he had shaved the crown of his head and braided his remaining hair into a long queue. His imposing build and the golden crown on his

[3433] The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month in the traditional Chinese calendar.

[3434] The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month in the traditional Chinese calendar.

[3435] A ger is a portable, round dwelling traditionally used by nomadic peoples of the Mongolian steppe.

forehead would have made him stand out above everyone else—if not for the man seated beside him in the place of honor.

“Temur, my brother. Have you forgotten that too much of anything can become poison?”

The other man had deep eyes and a lean build. He clicked his tongue softly at the hulking Temur. On his forehead sat another golden crown, this one engraved with two horses.

“You’re right, Chinggen. You always are.”

Temur nodded at Chinggen, who looked displeased, then grinned, baring yellow teeth.

“But remember one thing. Alcohol is medicine in itself. It can never be poison.”

“Oh, Temur.”

“Don’t be like that on a fine day. Have a drink with me, hmm?”

Chinggen shook his head. Temur jabbed him in the waist, raised his cup high, and called out, “What do you say, proud brothers of the grasslands?”

“Waaah!”

Hundreds of warriors cheered inside the vast ger[3436]. Temur roared with laughter.

“That’s more like it!”

He was happy. Two years ago, he had led fewer tribespeople than there were warriors in this ger[3437]. But look at him now.

He wore a golden crown. Instead of drinking mare’s-milk wine, made by milking horses and boiling the milk with his followers, he drank his fill of fine liquor brought from the distant Central Plains.

And all around him, the cheers poured in.

“Long live Khan Temur! Long live Khan Chinggen!”

“May you live to a ripe old age!”

Khan.

Ruler of the vast grasslands. King over tens of thousands of horses and warriors.

How good it sounded. The title that had once been only a dream was his now.

The two brothers, who had shared life and death, joy and sorrow since childhood, had brought peace and prosperity to the endlessly turbulent grasslands—and at last earned the title of Khan.

“Can you hear them? Hm? I said, are you listening?”

Temur, who had been mingling with his warriors, filled Chinggen’s empty cup.

It was silver, imported from the Central Plains rather than carved from wood or animal bone. Its gleaming surface reflected both their faces: Temur’s broad grin and Chinggen’s unmistakable discomfort.

[3436] A ger is a portable, round dwelling traditionally used by nomadic peoples of the Mongolian steppe.

[3437] A ger is a portable, round dwelling traditionally used by nomadic peoples of the Mongolian steppe.

“Of course I hear them. But this isn’t the time to laugh and drink, Temur.”

“Good grief, there you go again. Since when does laughing and drinking need a special occasion?”

“My brother, didn’t I send a messenger with news?”

“Ah, that? I heard.”

Temur chewed noisily on a piece of meat as he continued.

“But don’t worry so much. We may be Khans now, but the grasslands are vast. We can’t do anything about what happens beyond our reach.”

Of course Temur knew. A few scouts had gone missing from time to time, and there had been several disturbances on the westernmost grasslands.

Not enough to make him forget the indulgence of the moment.

“Come, my ever-worried brother. Let’s empty our cups first, then talk.”

Temur laughed heartily and was about to offer Chinggen another drink when—

Flap.

A cold wind laden with sandy dust pushed open the entrance to the ger[3438].

[3438] A ger is a portable, round dwelling traditionally used by nomadic peoples of the Mongolian steppe.

Chapter 940

While a ger[3439] on the grasslands shivered in the cool night wind, heavy with sand, people behind a massive wall ten thousand li[3440] away were greeting the morning.

The sun was still a long way from rising. Darkness surrounded them on every side.

Thudthudthudthud!

Rough hoofbeats shattered the silence of the night.

More than a hundred messengers passed through the Seven Gates without a single formality. Like the dozens of messenger eagles sent ahead of them, they vanished into the wind, each bound for a different destination.

The man who had given all these orders listened, pale-faced, as reports came in one after another.

“All the messengers have just passed through the Seven Gates!”

“The Imperial Decree has been delivered to the high ministers of the Six Ministries!”

“The Censorate awaits Your Majesty’s command!”

“The officials of the Hanlin Academy and the Transmission Office are preparing the edict!”

“A report from the Five Tiger Commandery! In accordance with Your Majesty’s command, we are immediately mobilizing three hundred warships, one hundred thousand naval troops, and the Imperial Guards—”

“Enough.”

At the Emperor’s sudden command, every sound around him vanished as if washed away.

The Son of Heaven’s authority was absolute.

Though the Great Nation was only in its third generation, the power wielded by its current Emperor equaled—or perhaps surpassed—that of Taizu, who had unified the realm.

“How noisy.”

At the Emperor’s quiet murmur, everyone prostrated themselves, barely daring to breathe.

“We beg Your Majesty’s forgiveness!”

“Please execute us!”

Rustle.

The Emperor gave a small shake of his head and silently waved his long sleeve.

[3439] A ger is a portable, round dwelling traditionally used by nomadic peoples of the Central Asian grasslands.

[3440] In this Chinese setting, one li is 500 m (about 0.311 mi). Ten thousand li is about 5,000 km (3,100 mi).

Those who understood the unspoken command backed away and disappeared with careful steps. Before long, only two people remained in the vast main hall.

“Every time I say anything, they start begging me to kill them. If I’d had to listen to that for another fifteen minutes, I might’ve bitten through my own tongue.”

At the Emperor’s bitter smile, Baek Yeon, Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, spoke with a stern expression.

“Even as a joke, please don’t say such things.”

“It’s only a joke. What does it matter? Besides…”

The Emperor leaned at an angle against the throne and continued.

“I have not the slightest intention of dying in a situation like this.”

His face was still pale, but as he faced a new crisis, his eyes gleamed like luminous pearls.

“I expected as much, but it’s worse than I thought. I didn’t think they’d move so quickly.”

Baek Yeon wholeheartedly agreed.

Dark Heaven.

That rebellious faction, whose very name was ominous, was larger than expected —and more methodical, too.

Even more so than a religious movement that had once erupted like a grass fire from a distant western land, back when Baek Yeon had served the late Emperor.

“It was more than fifty years ago that those called the Demonic Cult headed for the Central Plains.”

“The Great Faction War.”

The Emperor murmured to himself and stroked his graying beard.

Though it had happened long before he was born, everyone knew of the momentous event when no fewer than a hundred thousand cultists set foot in the Central Plains.

Especially because they weren’t merely country bumpkins lured in by sweet words. They were an army armed with unwavering faith and spears and swords.

“When the Demonic Cult’s momentum reached the heavens, the martial artists of the orthodox factions petitioned the late Emperor. They said the Demonic Cult was a foreign enemy disrupting the Great Nation’s order, and asked him to raise the Imperial Army and order a campaign against them.”

“I know.”

The Emperor looked at Baek Yeon and added,

“And I know you opposed joining the war more strongly than anyone.”

Baek Yeon gave a small nod in acknowledgment.

It was true.

Here, in this very place, the high ministers of the court had argued fiercely for days. The late Emperor had seriously considered ordering a campaign, but Baek Yeon had pleaded with him more earnestly than ever before, and the Emperor had finally given up the idea.

“Can Your Majesty guess why I opposed it so strongly?”

“I think there were two main reasons. First, the Demonic Cult feared the Great Nation’s power and wasn’t harming the people. And second… Cang Gong.”

“That’s right. Unlike me, Cang Gong was the first to insist that we drive out the foreign enemy.”

“You made the right choice. If Father had sided with Cang Gong back then, the Great Nation would have shed a great deal of blood.”

“It was clear he intended to weaken the imperial house. That was all the more reason I had to oppose it.”

There had never been a victory without wounds, not in all of history.

Baek Yeon knew that as a commander who led an army, not merely as a martial artist. He had done everything in his power to keep the Great Nation out of the war.

Cang Gong—or rather, the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord—had already been someone to watch back then.

Of course, countless orthodox martial artists had died because of Baek Yeon’s opposition. But he didn’t regret it in the least.

He had simply made the choice that was best for the Emperor and the Great Nation—and, by extension, the people.

It wouldn’t have been too late to intervene after watching the two great powers, the Murim Alliance and the Demonic Cult, crash violently into each other.

And the result of that wait had been an orthodox victory that came close to mutual destruction.

“Back then, I actually hoped the Demonic Cult would win.”

The Emperor clicked his tongue at Baek Yeon’s words.

“You’re unusually honest today.”

“It can’t be helped. Many martial artists of the orthodox factions have the people’s trust, so we’d have no grounds to launch a campaign against them. But it would’ve been different if the Demonic Cult had survived.”

A massive boulder was too heavy even to move.

But what about a pebble left behind after being smashed and battered again and again?

And if that pebble had jagged edges sharp enough to harm the people, Baek Yeon would have taken up his hammer without the slightest hesitation.

He would have torn down the lawless fence that was Murim once and for all.

“But if things had gone as you hoped, we wouldn’t have made it to the present day.”

The Emperor’s low voice echoed through the vast hall.

He was right. It was deeply ironic, but they had relied on those very martial artists to put down the traitors and accomplish their great undertaking.

And now… it was time to set that contradiction right.

“I intend to help with everything I have. For their sake—and for all of us.”

Thump.

Baek Yeon lowered his head and went down on one knee.

A storm of bloodshed would soon descend, one that would dwarf the Great Faction War.

Dark Heaven was more powerful than the Demonic Cult, and incomparably more dangerous.

A war was beginning that would not be confined to Murim. It would overturn the world.

“Your Majesty, ruler of all beneath the heavens, I humbly ask that you give me your orders.”

The information Jin Taekyung had delivered in the dead of night was an unexpected misfortune. Fortunately, they had already made thorough preparations to accomplish their great undertaking.

Hundreds of warships and thousands of officers.

Hundreds of thousands of troops, the imperial banners flying above them, were waiting for their command.

“I command Baek Yeon, Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard.”

Speaking in a solemn voice, the Emperor slowly rose despite his ailing body.

Instead of his white sleeping robe embroidered with a golden dragon, he wore heavy armor. He strode across the hall without hesitation.

Clank. Clank.

One step. Then another.

The Emperor descended from the throne and personally raised Baek Yeon to his feet.

“Tell the entire army that I will lead the campaign in person.”

“…!”

Baek Yeon’s eyes trembled for an instant, unable to hide his shock.

It wasn’t only the impact of the Emperor taking command in person. He could feel the resolve of a man who had little time left to live.

“Your Majesty.”

But the words Baek Yeon struggled to force out never came.

Seeing the Emperor silently shake his head, the loyal subject could only clench his teeth, his heart heavy.

"I, Baek Yeon, Commander of the Embroidered Uniform Guard… will obey Your Majesty's solemn command."

The Emperor gave him a faint smile instead of an answer, then walked past him.

The world beyond the wide-open iron gates was still shrouded in darkness.

Like his own future, with so little of it left.

Still, this isn't so bad.

His body might be dying, but his mind was clearer than ever.

The first campaign he would lead in person—and the last.

To meet his end on a battlefield instead of in bed would be a blessing, not a tragedy.

And so was the fact that someone had brought back his will to live, if only for a while.

"Come, Baek Yeon."

The Emperor smiled brightly—so brightly it was hard to believe he was a dying man—and continued,

"We should see off a certain insolent rogue who's leaving before me without keeping his promise to me."

One shichen.[3441]

That was how much time had passed since I'd first gotten my hands on the iron chest left behind by the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord.

"Everything's ready."

At Hyuk Mujin's report in my ear, I opened my eyes, which I'd kept tightly shut.

His gaze and expression were unusually grave. That alone said how urgent things had become.

"Let's go."

What else was there to say?

I gave a brief reply and stepped out of the pavilion, moving as if in a daze.

Even after circulating my qi once, my mind was still a mess.

Half a month.

Only half a month.

That was all the time left until the Double Ninth Festival.[3442] Or maybe even less.

[3441] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours.

[3442] The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month.

The missive the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord had kept said Dark Heaven's main force would invade Shanxi Province through the northern grasslands before the festival.

It could be ten days. No—even tomorrow.

I swallowed the groan rising in my throat.

This wasn't just urgent. It was an emergency.

The distance from here, Zhejiang Province, where the Imperial Capital stood, to Shanxi Province was a full ten thousand li.[3443]

No matter how quickly the Imperial Court's messenger eagles flew, the trip would take at least ten days.

Can I get there in time?

Even as I left the imperial palace with everyone else, doubt weighed heavily on my heart.

Then Jeok Cheongang, who had been watching me in silence the whole time, suddenly spoke.

"Was it about fifty years ago? I got into some petty dispute with that Thunderbolt Saber King bastard and ended up in a real fight."

As though he were talking to himself, Jeok Cheongang glanced away from me and continued.

"I'd always looked down on him as someone far beneath me, so I didn't think much of him. But when we actually traded blows, he was pretty strong. I didn't show it, but I was surprised."

The Bow Saint, who had been riding quietly with the reins in hand, replied.

"He's a strong man. If it hadn't been for you, he probably would've been the greatest of the Ten Kings."

"Hmm. I suppose so."

Jeok Cheongang nodded, then glanced at me and added,

"Still, the Hebei Peng Family didn't become one of the Five Great Families for no reason. With that kind of strength, they could beat just about anyone. And they have enough intelligence-gathering power to keep a clear eye on what's happening not only in Hebei but in Shanxi, too."

Only then did I think I understood.

This completely random conversation was meant to put me at ease.

Heh.

What was I supposed to say? I was just grateful.

And just as I swallowed the laugh threatening to slip out, someone spoke.

"So, were you planning to leave just like this without saying goodbye?"

[3443] In this Chinese setting, one li is 500 m (about 0.311 mi). Ten thousand li is about 5,000 km (3,100 mi).

The breezy voice didn’t suit him at all. The Emperor, who had been waiting for me in front of the enormous iron gates, laughed aloud.

Chapter 941

An endless stretch of city wall. A massive iron gate controlling passage to the north.

And at the head of a thousand Embroidered Uniform Guards and several court ministers standing in formation on either side, imperial banners embroidered with dragons held high, stood one man.

“So, were you planning to leave just like this without saying goodbye?”

The Emperor’s sudden appearance caught me off guard. Then I returned his smile with a faint one of my own.

“Your Majesty.”

“I hope I’m not taking up your precious time.”

“My time is precious, but I can spare a little of it for a meeting worth having. As it happens, there’s something I need to tell you in person, too.”

The Emperor tilted his head, not quite grasping what I meant, then smacked his lips.

“You sound as if you knew I’d be waiting.”

“Honestly, I didn’t expect that. But I’m glad to see you, even like this.”

“Enough of that empty flattery. It doesn’t suit you.”

The Emperor feigned a frown, then jerked his chin over his shoulder.

“Why not answer honestly, like you usually do? It isn’t me you’re glad to see. It’s them.”

He was right.

The Emperor wasn’t the only one waiting for me in front of the Imperial Capital’s North Gate.

That’s…

Familiar faces came into view.

The Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard, Jeong Hogun—the first face I’d seen at the imperial court, and the one I’d seen most often since—was only the beginning.

Baek Yeon and Hong Jin, who should have been busier than anyone else right now, were there too. And I spotted someone I hadn’t seen in days.

Prince Shangshan. No—the Imperial Younger Brother.

Warmth spread through a corner of my heart. That boy, whose life had once hung by a thread, was now with his only family.

And I’d get to say goodbye before I left.

I gave Zhu Bao, who sat in his saddle looking ready to burst into tears, a faint smile. Then I turned back to the Emperor.

“May I answer honestly, as you said?”

“No, never mind. I’ve changed my mind.”

“I’ve changed mine too. You’re right—I’m happier to see them than I am to see Your Majesty.”

“How dare you…!”

His suppressed voice was accompanied by an air that instantly turned cold.

But after glaring at me for a moment, the Emperor burst into the laughter he’d been holding back.

“You never cease to amaze me. No—it’s downright bizarre. How can you be so arrogant and rude to the father of all the people and the supreme ruler?”

“As I’ve already told you, I’m just a rogue. I don’t even have an identity plaque, and I have parents of my own.”

Gasps sounded here and there.

Most of the people—especially the court ministers who had no idea why they were even here—looked at one another as if to ask whether this was really happening.

The Emperor, of course, was still smiling.

“I see. You are neither my subject nor a citizen of the Great Nation.”

Without waiting for my reply, he continued.

“But you think and act according to justice, righteousness, and chivalry. You are truly a hero of your age, worthy of the admiration of all.”

Clip-clop. Clip-clop.

The Emperor rode slowly toward me until he was right in front of me. He gazed at me for a moment, then suddenly raised a hand to his shoulder.

Slip. Thump.

The tightly tied cord came loose. Without hesitation, the Emperor removed his cloak and held it out to me with a faint smile.

“What are you waiting for? Take it.”

“…!”

“…!”

An unseen shockwave swept through everyone.

The court ministers trembled as if they’d suffered strokes, staring aghast at the cloak embroidered with a golden dragon that looked ready to come alive.

“Y-Your Majesty!”

“T-That is…!”

Shouts came from every direction.

But their desperate voices were swallowed by the wind at the Emperor’s curt command.

“Enough.”

In the heavy silence pressing down on those around us, the Emperor turned his gaze to me and spoke.

"Go on. It's just a little gift from me."

I looked from the Emperor, who was urging me on, to the cloak in his hand. All I could do was blink.

Even without everyone's reaction, I knew this was no ordinary gift.

"This is… a lot more than a little gift."

It was no ordinary cloak.

The Emperor himself had worn it. That alone would have made it extraordinary. But something else mattered even more.

A dragon.

A single dragon embroidered on the cloak in golden thread.

Even a three-year-old knew it was the emblem of the Son of Heaven and the imperial house's authority.

"You seem to know what it means."

I answered in disbelief.

"How could I not?"

"Good. Then you'll be all the more eager to accept this precious gift before my hand falls off."

"Wait, wait a moment."

The sudden turn of events had me hesitating, but the Emperor was firm.

"Please don't refuse. If you do, something will happen that you'll deeply regret."

"What?"

I stared at him blankly. The Emperor continued in a deliberately stern voice.

"If you refuse even this, I'll be very hurt."

"What does that—"

"No one can say what might happen. But rest assured. Surely I wouldn't make the imperial house's Benefactor uncomfortable over something so trivial?"

"Is it just me, or was none of that reassuring?"

"Exactly. It's just you."

The Emperor and I stared at each other in silence for a while.

Then, as if we'd agreed to it, we both let out a dry chuckle.

We hadn't known each other long, but we already understood.

Maybe, just a little…

We were alike.

I had fought to protect what was precious to me. He, too, had made sacrifices for someone else.

He'd wagered his life without hesitation, and he didn't regret it.

The only difference was where we stood and what we saw. Just like me, the Emperor was only human.

Someone who knew how to be grateful for help, who liked jokes, who feared death.

One person who had fought as best he could from the place where he stood.

Swish.

I reached out, took the cloak the Emperor offered, and draped it over my shoulders. Then I respectfully clasped my hands in a salute.

"I gratefully accept this precious gift."

"It suits you. But there's one thing missing."

The Emperor looked at me in the cloak with satisfaction, then took a gleaming silver plaque from between the plates of his armor and held it out.

The next words made me doubt my ears.

"By the authority of the Son of Heaven, I name Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan Marquis of Shangshan!"

His voice, strengthened with internal energy, broke the deep-night silence.

As his declaration rang out, commoners who had watched the imperial procession from afar, not daring to approach, began gathering around the torches held by the Embroidered Uniform Guards.

The Emperor continued in a solemn voice.

"I grant you as your fief more than ten counties in Shanxi Province, including Taiyuan, Honju, Yangcheon, Jeongyang, Jinzhong, Taigu, and Jiaocheng, along with the revenues of ten thousand households and a hundred thousand taels[3444] of gold and silver. In addition…"

Shing.

A flash of light suddenly leapt from his waist. The Emperor drew the imperial sword, his eyes gleaming as he shouted,

"From this moment, I also grant you the post of Thousand Captain of the Embroidered Uniform Guard. Lead a thousand guards and, by imperial command, swiftly put down the foreign bandits who disturb the order of the realm!"

"…!"

"…!"

I could hardly breathe. My chest thudded.

Thump. Thump. Thump!

That wasn't my heartbeat.

The thousand Embroidered Uniform Guards standing in formation on either side stamped their feet with all their might. They clashed their weapons together and struck their armor.

For the Emperor.

No—for me.

[3444] A tael is a traditional unit of weight used for precious metals; its weight varied by place and period.

Ah.

I swallowed the groan rising in my throat.

Only now did I understand.

The Emperor hadn't brought a thousand Embroidered Uniform Guards here to wait for me merely as an escort.

They were a force assembled by imperial command to punish the enemy.

And they were reinforcements he'd prepared for me.

A shield and a sword to defend Shanxi Province and the Jin Family of Taiyuan against Dark Heaven.

"Waaaah!"

Ding. Ding-ding.

My ears rang with the ceaseless chiming of bells and the shouts and cheers erupting all around me.

And there, at the center of it all, the Emperor smiled at me.

"Success makes you a king; failure makes you a traitor."

Two had plotted a revolution, but only one had survived.

The Emperor had uprooted the traitors and put everything back in its place. Now he was rewarding those about to depart.

"Every deed has its due. What do you think of the gift I prepared?"

What more could I say?

I let out the breath I'd been holding.

"It's incredible."

"As a marquis, you should rightfully be my subject, but I don't care about that."

Tap.

The Emperor's hand came to rest on my shoulder. The spark of life within him was slowly going out, yet I could feel the warmth of his fingertips.

"Go on as you have until now."

"Keep your eyes on what is right. Let your intentions and actions follow righteousness and chivalry."

His voice flowed on, and he added quietly,

"Be neither my subject nor my citizen… Just be someone who shines a light upon this world."

His words, low and heavy, rang in my ears like a final testament.

Meeting and parting are inseparable.

Where there's a meeting, there's a parting; and after a parting, another meeting awaits.

Even so, the moment of parting is always bitter and full of regret.

Especially for a child saying goodbye to someone he had relied on so deeply.

Tap. Drip.

Moisture fell onto the saddle.

Rather than look at his youngest brother's silently weeping face, the Emperor gazed at the empty places left by those who had departed and spoke calmly.

"Are you that sad?"

"N-no, I'm not."

Zhu Bao hurriedly wiped his eyes with his sleeve.

A child was allowed to cry, but the Imperial Younger Brother was different.

As heir to the Great Nation, Zhu Bao would have to face the coming war. He had become someone who must never cry.

"I'm not sad at all."

"That's very strange."

"Pardon?"

"I'm sorry to see them go. How can you, not even fifteen yet, feel no sadness?"

Zhu Bao looked up in surprise. The Emperor's smiling face was reflected clearly in his eyes.

"Bao'er."

Zhu Bao stared at him, too stunned to answer. The Emperor spoke gently.

"You needn't start swallowing your feelings already."

"…!"

"They say endurance is bitter and its fruit sweet. But endurance that piles up like that will turn to poison one day."

"H-hyung.[3445] I mean, Your Majesty."

"When you want to cry, cry as much as you like."

Tap.

With an awkward hand, the Emperor stroked Zhu Bao's head. Then he turned his horse around and rode away.

He repeated something someone had once told him.

"You and I are both human, in the end."

As sobs rose behind him, the Emperor hoped that Zhu Bao—his youngest brother, at least—would not follow in his footsteps.

I… realized far too late.

A faint smile touched the Emperor's lips. Just then, a fine horse came galloping through the enormous iron gate as it slowly closed.

[3445] Hyung is a Korean term a younger male uses to address an older brother or an older male he is close to.

Wait. That man…

Amid a situation he couldn’t understand, the Emperor saw the man who had returned and asked,

“Did you leave something behind, Divine Physician?”

“Yes.”

The Divine Physician smiled and continued,

“I left a patient behind.”

Chapter 942

“I left a patient behind.”

At the Divine Physician’s answer, the Emperor’s eyes trembled.

Could it be…?

Suddenly, he found it hard to breathe. Without realizing it, he clenched both fists.

A spark of hope kindled in a heart he’d thought he’d emptied completely. He could feel his resolve wavering—the resolve to die on a battlefield, not in his bedchamber.

No. It can’t be.

But deep down, the Emperor could only shake his head. A crisis could drive a person to the edge of a cliff. Hope was what finally sent them plunging into the abyss.

And so he forced himself to look away from the Divine Physician, who still watched him with a gentle smile.

“If you intend to join the army, I won’t stop you. Before long, there will be countless casualties. Your medical skills will be put to good use.”

“Your Majesty.”

Leaving the Divine Physician to finish whatever he’d meant to say, the Emperor quietly turned away.

Jin Taekyung, who had left to protect the Jin Family of Taiyuan, wasn’t the only one with no time to spare.

The Emperor’s life was truly drawing to a close. In the brief time he had left—a few months at most—he meant to do everything he could.

For a better future.

For the precious people who would remain in this world after he was gone.

That is my sole duty.

The moment he steeled his resolve again, a quiet voice sounded behind him.

“I understand, Your Majesty. I know how you feel.”

Thud.

The Emperor stopped as if his feet had been nailed to the ground.

The Divine Physician’s voice continued in his ear.

“A fleeting hope must frighten you. Nothing is more painful than false hope.”

After a brief silence, the Emperor slowly turned. The Divine Physician was still smiling at him.

“You understand well.”

“Through no choice of my own.”

“You must have met countless people standing between life and death in your work as a physician.”

“That’s not the only reason.”

“Then what is?”

The Divine Physician’s smile faded.

“A very long time ago, there was a young carpenter.”

“A carpenter? Did he come to you because he had a fatal illness, too?”

“More precisely, he came to save his wife and children from an epidemic.”

“…His wife and children.”

“He carried his feverish wife and two children on his back in a wooden carrying frame. For three days and nights, he climbed the mountain without sleep, looking for a skilled physician said to be staying in a nearby slash-and-burn farming village.”

The Emperor pictured the carpenter, drenched in sweat as he climbed the mountain, and muttered,

“That must have been hard. Very hard.”

“As you say, it surely was.”

“But I doubt he even felt how exhausted he was. He had hope he could save his family.”

The Divine Physician nodded.

“Yes. He didn’t set down the frame and collapse until he reached his destination. Then he lay sick for a day and a half.”

“So, did you treat his family?”

“Unfortunately, I couldn’t.”

The Emperor gave a small sigh. The Divine Physician added bitterly,

“By the time I regained consciousness, it was too late.”

“…!”

“That’s why I know how cruel hope can be. What kind of despair waits at the bottom of that cliff.”

The Emperor fell silent.

He looked at the old physician before him, seeing the young carpenter who had lost his wife and children to an epidemic long ago and chosen a new path. After a long while, he spoke.

“Then… then have you truly…?”

His voice shook with emotion he could not hide. He forced out the question he’d wanted to ask from the start.

“Have you found a way to treat Us?”

Light returned to his eyes, and hope crept into his voice.

The Divine Physician bowed deeply.

“Yes. With the help of Heaven—or rather, Young Master Jin—I was able to find the one and only path to survival.”

“…!”

Jin Taekyung.

The unexpected name made the Emperor close his eyes. In the darkness, he pictured Jin Taekyung’s face and offered him thanks he would never hear.

You didn’t forget your promise to Us.

He had not resented Jin Taekyung for leaving. Even when he’d watched him walk away without a word about their promise, he’d felt only gratitude for all Jin Taekyung had done for the imperial house.

He’d believed that was his duty—as ruler of this nation, as an older brother, and as a human being.

But Jin Taekyung had kept his promise after all. He had given the finest physician beneath Heaven a hope brighter than ever before and sent him back.

What more can I do for him to repay this debt?

It didn’t matter. Whatever Jin Taekyung wanted, the Emperor would gladly give him.

With a quiet chuckle, the Emperor opened his eyes and slowly spoke.

“Tell Us. What must We do to live?”

For some reason, the Divine Physician’s smile turned awkward.

“What is it?”

“Well, you see… That is…”

“There’s no need to hesitate. We’ll trust your word and follow your instructions without the slightest doubt.”

“Forgive me, but even so, there may be a slight misunderstanding…”

The Emperor thought he knew what made the Divine Physician hesitate.

It happened all the time. He was the Emperor, ruler of all beneath Heaven. If anything went wrong with his health, the imperial physicians might have to answer for it with their lives. Even the finest physician beneath Heaven would worry about the consequences.

“Whatever concerns you, We assure you that nothing of the sort will happen. We swear by Our name… No, We swear upon the tombs of the late Emperors.”

The Divine Physician had been silently working his lips for some time. At the Emperor’s gentle reassurance, he finally spoke.

“Are those words truly sincere? Without the slightest falsehood?”

“Of course. From this moment on, We are a patient in need of your treatment before We are the Son of Heaven. We’ll trust you and follow your instructions, whatever they may be.”

“Very well. Since Your Majesty has said as much, I’ll speak frankly.”

In the next instant, the Emperor understood why the Divine Physician had hesitated—and how much he'd understated matters with a slight misunderstanding.

"The truth is, there's no way to save Your Majesty."

"…?"

"To treat you, you must first die once. That's where it begins—Your Majesty?"

The Emperor blinked. Somehow, his treasured sword was in his hand.

"Now, why would this suddenly—"

"Your Majesty? Your Majesty!"

"I'm sorry, Divine Physician. But We didn't draw it of Our own will. The sword is moving by itself."

"Your Majesty!"

The Emperor approached with his sword, offering an excuse even a passing traitor wouldn't believe. The Divine Physician let out a shrill scream.

At the same time, he held out the thing he'd taken out earlier, just in case—the thing Jin Taekyung had given him a few shichen[3446] ago.

Or rather, he threw it at the Emperor.

Clack.

The Emperor reached out on instinct and caught it.

Rattle!

The cord binding it came loose, and bamboo slips unfurled, so old they had half rotted away.

"…What is this?"

His puzzlement lasted only a moment. As he made out the faint characters that remained, his eyes widened.

Maoshan Sect.

White Illusion Jiangshi Art.

It was the ancient root of a sect belonging to someone who no longer existed in this world, and who had treasured it dearly.

Dududududu!

The thunder of hooves rang out through the darkness.

The fine horses, said to carry the blood of sweat-blood horses, lived up to their reputation. Not one stopped for even a moment, and none of us—including me—slackened our reins.

"Deokcheong County is just beyond that hill!"

[3446] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours.

Ju Hwaran's shout cut through the wind rushing past us.

We'd reached a second county just one shichen[3447] after leaving the Imperial Capital. It was good news, but I couldn't smile.

Not yet. At this speed, I can't even be sure we'll reach Anhui Province by noon.

Neither our speed nor our time was nearly enough.

Even the imperial messenger eagles and couriers, who had left the capital about half a shichen[3448] ahead of us, might not arrive before the fighting began.

We had to hurry.

"Jeong Hogun!"

At my call, carried by internal energy, Jeong Hogun rode forward, his helmet pulled low.

"Speak."

"How much longer until we reach Shanxi Province?"

Jeong Hogun thought for a moment as his horse raced onward.

"Ten days at the least. Fifteen at most."

A difference of five whole days. And I knew fifteen wasn't some leisurely estimate.

"Be more specific."

"Fifteen days if we change horses on time at counties with relay stations ready and take only the bare minimum of rest."

"Damn it. And ten days?"

"That means taking the shortest possible route in a straight line. We'll have to cross rugged mountains and rivers. Depending on the terrain, we may have to abandon our horses…"

Jeong Hogun trailed off. He glanced at the thousand Embroidered Uniform Guards racing ahead as one with their horses, then at the Fire Dragon Pavilion members following them.

"And we can forget about rest."

His expression and tone were as impassive as ever, but I could hear the concern beneath them.

No, I couldn't miss it, either.

Reaching Shanxi Province won't mean it's over.

We didn't know exactly when Dark Heaven would invade. If Heaven was on our side, we'd arrive before the fighting began and have time to rest. But there was every chance we wouldn't.

If Dark Heaven has already taken Shanxi, or we arrive just as the battle begins…

No need to finish that thought.

I spat out the curse that had been on the tip of my tongue for a while.

[3447] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours.

[3448] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours.

“Goddamn it.”

Shhk!

Jeong Hogun cut off a branch hanging over the road, spat out a leaf that had landed in his mouth, and replied,

“I understand how you feel, but I doubt you called me over just to say that.”

His tone was so cold it made me dislike him on the spot. I felt my overheated thoughts cool down.

“Shit. This sucks.”

“Good. Are you done feeling sorry for yourself?”

“You cold bastard.”

“…”

“You can’t even show a little sympathy. No wonder you don’t have a single friend.”

“…That doesn’t sound like feeling sorry for yourself.”

“Of course it does. Just me feeling sorry for myself.”

At my firm reply, Jeong Hogun pressed his lips together.

The eyes visible through his helmet looked a little sad. That had to be my imagination.

Anyway, if that’s how it is…

Ignoring his reaction, I made my decision.

“We split up as soon as we pass through Deokcheong County. There are too many of us.”

“You mean divide the troops…?”

“All of you. And three people.”

“What?”

I pointed past him toward two figures racing ahead in the distance.

“Three of us are enough to get there first.”

Maybe you’ve heard of it.

Fire King on the left, Bow Saint on the right.

Chapter 943

“You can’t be serious!”

The moment my brief explanation ended, Hyuk Mujin cried out, his face stiff with shock. Then he sighed.

“But… damn it.”

He said no more, but everyone here could tell he’d accepted reality.

“If you rush ahead with your eyes fixed on what’s in front of you, you’ll trip over a rock. I know how hard this is for everyone, but for now, this is our best course.”

Namho addressed everyone with a serious expression.

He might have sounded like a seasoned elder, too—if he hadn’t been tucked into Taishan’s arms like a baby kangaroo.

“…I’ve been meaning to ask. Why are you riding like that?”

“Because it’s the most comfortable.”

Namho answered with unnecessary firmness, then added, “If I ride behind him, my ass feels like it’s going to get crushed. If I sit on his shoulder, a branch smacks me in the face every fifteen minutes. An old man like me would die before we reached Shanxi Province.”

Taishan, whose thighs were softer than a genuine leather sofa, nodded.

“Taishan save Namho.”

Since when had those two gotten so close?

I was still wondering why Taishan looked downright solemn when Namho smiled with satisfaction and pulled something from his pack.

“Good lad. Open wide. Here comes the five-spice pork.”

“Oh! Five! Spice! Pork!”

“…”

Right. I’d thought something was off.

I shook my head and eased my horse’s pace for a moment before speaking.

“Elder Namho, please make contact with the Murim Alliance as soon as you leave Zhejiang Province. They’ll be making preparations of their own.”

“I intended to do that anyway. As things stand, I’d only be a burden. I’ll try to lead the reinforcements and follow behind you.”

There wasn’t a single martial artist to be found in Zhejiang Province, where the Imperial Capital stood—let alone a sect.

But Anhui and Henan, which lay along our route to Shanxi Province, were another matter.

Henan was home to the Murim Alliance headquarters, of course. And closest to our current position stood a great power: the Namgung Family.

“Ilseom. Ma Pyo.”

At my call, Song Ilseom and Sama Pyo rode over and answered in turn.

“I’m listening, Pavilion Master.”

“I’ve lost count of how many times I’ve said this, but Sama is my surname, not my given name. Next time you call me…”

“I know. I’m doing it on purpose.”

At my firm reply, Sama Pyo muttered to himself, “Yeah, I thought so.”

“Enough. I trust you both know what you have to do.”

Song Ilseom and Sama Pyo were formidable martial artists despite their youth. Both nodded solemnly.

“Of course.”

“Trust us. Even if something goes wrong along the way, we’ll get everyone to Shanxi Province without a problem.”

I answered their determined assurances with, “Don’t fight each other.”

“…!”

“…!”

“Don’t start bickering in front of the Embroidered Uniform Guards. It’s embarrassing. Got it?”

“…”

“…”

“Answer me.”

The two of them stared at me with flat expressions, then let out quiet laughs. They both knew better than anyone that I was only joking.

“Understood.”

“I’ll try.”

“Did you hear that, Mujin?”

Hyuk Mujin, who’d been watching me in silence, nodded without a word.

He understood the situation and didn’t say anything more, but there was no hiding the emotions in his troubled expression.

He was hurt that I was leaving him behind without hesitation, and angry at himself for being nothing but a burden right now.

“Quit looking so miserable. Your face is ugly enough already—you’re making it worse.”

I let out a short laugh. Hyuk Mujin’s expression darkened further.

“Is that all?”

“Hm?”

“Why… haven’t you asked me to do anything?”

The smile I’d been forcing onto my face faltered.

His question caught me by surprise. I hadn't expected him to think of it that way, and for a moment I didn't know what to say.

After looking at him in silence for a moment, I answered calmly.

"Because you'll do just fine without me asking."

"…!"

"Shanxi Province is where you've lived your whole life, and the Jin Family of Taiyuan is your second home. I know how you must feel right now."

Hyuk Mujin's eyes trembled as he looked at me.

Crack.

Both his fists were turning white.

He glared at the reins clenched so tightly in his hands they looked ready to tear and muttered, "Captain, you wouldn't understand. What it feels like to have something you have to protect, but not the strength to step in. To be left helpless, doing nothing but watch."

"…What?"

"No, forget it. I said something stupid. You're the one who has it hardest right now… I sincerely apologize."

I silently watched him bow his head, his face red.

I wanted to tell him I understood that feeling, too. That I'd felt it all too clearly, down to my soul shattering and my bones breaking.

But I couldn't bring myself to say it.

Sometimes, comfort from the strong can make the weak feel even more powerless and wretched.

And the cruel truth that there are things you can't protect even when you have strength was something Hyuk Mujin couldn't understand yet.

So all I could do for the man who couldn't lift his head, weighed down by shame and guilt, was say one thing.

"I trust you. More than anyone."

"…Captain."

"I'll see you in Shanxi. No—at the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

Pat.

I patted his trembling shoulder in farewell, then spurred my horse forward.

The wind felt colder than before. As I tightened my grip on the reins, hoofbeats approached and a quiet voice reached my ears.

"Hyuk Mujin didn't mean what he said."

It wasn't just the hoofbeats drawing closer. I caught the scent of flowers and managed a smile.

"I know."

"Do you know something?"

"What?"

I turned, puzzled, and saw Ju Hwaran beside me, her expression calm.

"Some smiles can look almost precarious."

"…!"

"I want more than anything to go with you, too, but I know I'd only be a burden, so I won't complain. Still…"

Ju Hwaran smiled like moonlight spilling from the sky.

"When we meet again, let's smile for real. Both of us."

I watched her in silence, then spoke.

"We will. I promise."

And in the next instant, I sprang from the saddle without a moment's hesitation.

Whoosh!

Cold. The fierce wind whipped my hair around.

A weightless feeling swept through me as I leapt high into the air. Behind me, two pale figures cut through the dim moonlight in pursuit.

"Come on. Let's hurry."

At Jeok Cheongang's low voice, the Bow Saint quietly nodded.

I—or rather, we—shot toward the rugged mountain range where no horse could travel.

Whoooosh!

"Well, that's strange."

At his companion's sudden mutter, the bandit dozing against a tree opened his eyes to slits.

"What is?"

He'd just woken from a light sleep, so he was hardly going to sound friendly.

At the brusque voice of a senior bandit more than ten years his elder, his companion swallowed nervously.

"It's nothing, sir. It's just… the longer I sit here, the more something feels off."

"Something's off? I don't see anything."

The bandit tilted his head. His companion pointed at the sky.

"There aren't any birds around today. It's quiet as the grave. Doesn't it feel a little unsettling?"

"Huh?"

The bandit's eyes widened. Only then did he take a careful look around.

Now that he thought about it, it was true.

The sky was empty, and there wasn't a single birdsong from the dense forest stretching in every direction, though the calls should have been constant.

What's going on?

The question flashed through his mind, but his face soon settled into indifference.

What difference did a few missing birds make?

They might call themselves bandits, but they were only low-ranking lackeys. Their sole job was to watch their assigned stretch of mountain road until their eyes popped and contact the stronghold when travelers appeared.

"Maybe a hawk came around. Those birds don't want to get snatched up and eaten in the blink of an eye, so they're keeping their beaks shut."

"Oh, come to think of it, I did see a few hawks fly by earlier."

"Earlier? When?"

"About two hours ago, I think. Four or five of them, flying like arrows."

The bandit must have missed them while he was asleep.

He stroked his shaggy beard and muttered, "That is a little strange. Hawks do whatever they please. I've hardly ever seen them travel in a flock."

"Should I report it to the stronghold?"

"Report it? To the stronghold?"

"Yes. The deputy chief said to report anything unusual right away."

"Not a bad idea. If you want to be chopped up alive."

"…"

"The deputy chief's probably fast asleep by now. Wake him, and you won't like what happens. Disturb him over something like that and he might throw an axe at you."

The bandit let out a long yawn and sprawled in the deep shade, stretching his arms and legs.

He still had a hangover from last night, and dozing against a tree had left his body stiff. This time, he meant to sleep until his back hurt.

He left everything to his younger companion, who still had plenty of enthusiasm.

"Quit trying so hard. Just watch for people. People."

With the Double Ninth Festival[3449] not far off, merchants weren't the only ones hoping for a big score.

The bigger the rice cake, the more crumbs there were to collect.

If they picked the right procession—a sizable merchant group or Escort Bureau—the tolls alone would fill the stronghold's storehouse.

Just like now.

"They're—they're coming!"

[3449] The Double Ninth Festival is observed on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month. It is traditionally associated with climbing to high places and chrysanthemums.

"What? What?"

Wham!

At his companion's hushed cry, barely a moment later, the bandit sprang up as if something had launched him and grabbed his axe in a panic.

Any trace of sleep was gone. His eyes shone like a hawk's as he stared down the shadowed mountain road.

"Contact the stronghold. Hurry!"

"Y-Yes, sir!"

The bandit glanced after his companion as he ran off, then narrowed his eyes at the road.

He could see them. Clearly.

A few flags, swaying slowly.

And he could sense dozens of people.

That idiot finally got one right.

The bandit studied the flags passing between the branches.

Then he read the helpful lettering on the dark blue silk and learned the identity of these mouthwatering guests.

The Great Namgung Family.

"…!"

Chapter 944

The Great Namgung Family.

The moment the bandit made out the five characters embroidered on the fluttering flag, only one thought came to mind.

Wait. What's the Namgung Family doing here?

Of course, it wasn't impossible.

This mountain range lay at the southeastern edge of Anhui Province, and the Namgung Family was the undisputed ruler of Anhui.

Still, in more than ten years at the mountain stronghold, the bandit had never once seen the Namgung Family's flag nearby.

Why would they come all the way out to a backwater like this…?

Even if a tiger stays in its cave, every beast knows who their king is, who owns this mountain.

The Namgung Family was that tiger.

Rather than hiding in a dark cave, it held Hefei, the heart of Anhui, and commanded dozens of sects.

One roar was enough to rally countless martial artists beneath its flag. That was the power and influence of one of the Five Great Families.

There's no reason for them to come into these rugged mountains.

The range stretched from west to the distant eastern edge for hundreds of li[3450]. Why would the mighty Namgung Family leave the well-maintained main road and come here with only a few dozen people?

The bandit couldn't make sense of it. But his fear, so fierce his heart felt ready to burst, was greater than his confusion.

Goddamn it. What the hell are they hoping to scrounge up out here?

Cursing inwardly, he steadied himself and carefully backed away.

Fortunately, he was several dozen jang[3451] away, on a hill thick with brush. Retreating without drawing attention wouldn't be too difficult.

Rustle, rustle.

For a little over fifteen minutes, he edged backward, avoiding the leaves and branches on the ground.

Once he was sure he was clear of the danger of being spotted, he finally let out the breath he'd been holding.

"Hah… hah."

His back was damp with cold sweat, and both legs trembled as if he'd suffered a stroke.

[3450] In this Chinese setting, one li is approximately 500 m (0.311 mi).

[3451] One jang is approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Only fifteen minutes or so had passed, but to a bandit who'd just escaped death, it felt longer than half a day.

"I-I'm alive. I'm alive."

He gripped a nearby tree and sighed with relief. Then he suddenly felt sorry for himself.

You pathetic fool. Just look at yourself.

He didn't regret becoming a bandit.

What could he do about it? He'd somehow been born, somehow lived, and somehow ended up here.

Still, if he was going to make his living this way, he should at least have joined a sizable mountain stronghold.

If he belonged to one of the Seventy-Two Strongholds under the Green Forest Alliance, merely seeing the Namgung Family's flag wouldn't make him fear for his life.

If you're going to be a servant, you might as well serve in a lord's house.

Had anything his drunkard father said ever hit so close to home?

The bandit wiped his eyes with his ragged sleeve and started back down the rugged mountain path.

Lord's house or doghouse, either way, it was a house for a servant. He needed to get back to the stronghold and warn his brothers, who should be on their way here by now after receiving the signal.

If they ran into the Namgung Family when they weren't even members of the Green Forest Alliance, they were as good as dead.

Thank Heaven they're still some distance away. If I head back now, we can all escape in time.

Perhaps Heaven was moved by this noble display of camaraderie, because before another fifteen minutes had passed, the bandit encountered the fifty or so brothers led by their imposing chief.

More precisely, he found their chief sprawled out, while his brothers were, for some reason, lying with their heads pressed to the ground.

"I never meant to block your way, sir. So please, just…"

An unfamiliar back. An ominous feeling he couldn't explain.

The deputy chief was earnestly explaining something to a bald man and a woman standing before everyone when he spotted the bandit watching blankly from some forty yards away. His eyes widened.

"Huh?"

Something was wrong. Very wrong.

The bandit sensed the danger and spun around. That was when—

Poke.

A finger prodded his cheek. An uninvited guest had appeared right in front of him and was studying him.

“Who are you?”

“…!”

The bandit shuddered as if struck by lightning.

First, because he hadn’t sensed a trace of the man’s presence.

And second, because the stranger was much younger than he’d expected.

A master…!

A chill ran down his spine.

With his life hanging in the balance, the bandit barely managed to force out an answer.

“I-I’m Jang Il. My name is Jang Il.”

The world was definitely unfair.

The man was absurdly young, stronger than he’d imagined, and even looked like a courtesan’s pretty-boy brother. He asked again.

“Good. Jang Il. What do you do?”

“Trees. Trees.”

“I asked what you do. What the fuck do trees have to do with it? Are you a forest spirit? Jangquines, King of the Spirits?[3452]”

“N-No. I meant to say I’m a woodcutter, but…”

“Right, Jang Il. A woodcutter.”

The young man gave a small nod and glanced at the axe hanging from the bandit’s waist.

“You’ve got an axe, too. Because you’re a woodcutter, I suppose?”

“Y-Yes!”

“Then where’s your carrier frame?”

“…What?”

“Your carrier frame. You planning to haul all that firewood by hand after chopping it?”

“Well, I…”

The bandit hesitated, then hurriedly added, “Down below! I left it down below.”

“You left it down below. Sure, that happens.”

The young man muttered to himself and shrugged.

“Then let’s ask.”

“…?”

[3452] “Jangquines” combines Jang’s name with Elquines, the spirit king from the Korean fantasy novel The Spirit King Elquines.

The bandit didn’t have to ask who he meant. Before he could open his mouth, the young man called toward the thick brush.

“This woodcutter says he left his carrier frame down below. Did you happen to see it on your way up?”

At that moment—

Whoosh.

A gust swept through the bushes, and a half-gray-haired man appeared as if from nowhere. He shook his head.

“I saw nothing. Aside from one bandit fleeing in a panic, that is.”

“Oh, dear.”

The young man glanced at the bandit, who looked ready to faint, and clicked his tongue. Then he respectfully clasped his hands toward the middle-aged man.

“Thank you for letting me know, Great Hero Namgung.”

The Family Head of the Namgung Family, the Heavenly Thunder Sword, Namgung Ryong, clasped his hands in return.

“It’s good to see you again, Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung.”

No matter how vast the world, people whose paths had crossed were bound to meet again.

Of course, this meeting wasn’t entirely a matter of chance.

“We received word from the Anhui Provincial Office. We happened to be nearby, so we were able to get here quickly.”

I nodded at Namgung Ryong’s brief explanation.

“So the messenger eagle reached the provincial office.”

“About two hours ago. They were in quite a state over there, saying the Son of Heaven had issued the order himself.”

Well, Namgung Ryong wasn’t Namgung Gil-dong[3453]. He couldn’t just pop up in the east one moment and the west the next.

The imperial messenger eagle had entered Anhui two hours ahead of us and gone straight to the provincial office. After receiving the news, Namgung Ryong had immediately led his family members here. That was how it had happened.

“But how did you know where we were? Especially in a mountain range this damn huge.”

“No matter how vast it is, there are only so many paths. The terrain is rugged, but this is the quickest way through.”

[3453] A play on Hong Gil-dong, a legendary Korean outlaw known for appearing in one place and then another.

An answer befitting the head of the Namgung Family, who knew Anhui Province like the palm of his hand.

Even so, a dark shadow hung over Namgung Ryong's face as he looked at me.

"Is it all… true?"

There was no need to ask what he meant.

The air grew heavy. Then Jeok Cheongang spoke up.

"What, you don't believe him?"

"Of course I do. I only wanted to make sure, because it's a truth I can hardly bring myself to believe."

Everyone felt the same way.

Bloodshed had already swept through Henan, Sichuan, and Yunnan, and even reached the Imperial Capital.

And before the stench of blood had faded, an even more terrible, far greater storm cloud was bearing down on us.

As the head of a family, Namgung Ryong had all the more reason to think of the many people who followed him.

"The Double Ninth Festival[3454]. The Double Ninth Festival…"

He muttered in a low voice, then looked at me with troubled eyes.

"My condolences. I never imagined they'd cross the northern grasslands and set their sights on Shanxi Province."

After a brief silence, I spoke.

"They'll be able to hold them off. They're strong enough."

Even as I said it, I knew the truth.

This was a lie meant to hide what I really thought—something closer to an attempt to comfort myself.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan can't manage it alone.

Even Shaolin Temple, called the Mount Tai and Northern Dipper of the Murim[3455], and the Sichuan Tang Clan, with its terrifying poisons, had suffered heavy losses.

Fortunately, Qingcheng, Emei, and the Nanman Beast Palace had kept their losses to a minimum and preserved their forces. But there was no denying that they'd faced a tremendous crisis.

And this time, it was Dark Heaven's main force.

This wasn't an attack to steal a divine artifact or destroy a single prestigious sect. It was a true invasion, meant to establish a foothold for an advance into the Central Plains.

At least ten thousand. Maybe more.

Even ten thousand—a staggering force—was only the minimum I was hoping for.

[3454] A traditional festival held on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month.

[3455] Mount Tai and the Northern Dipper form a Chinese expression for a revered authority in a field.

If everything so far had been a Mutated Gate, this was a Monster Wave.

Just as the Demonic Cult had swept through the Murim half a century ago with the Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples.

Damn it.

My chest felt tight. I couldn't stop thinking that if I'd found the missive left by the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord even a little sooner—or if I'd logged out before then—we might have gained some time.

Of course, it was already too late.

I'd lost three full days unconscious, and the Quest that appeared the moment I checked the missive in the iron chest had locked the door connecting me to reality.

It had taken away my last refuge, my place of rest, and forced me to move forward.

As if this were the only path I'd been given.

Then… I'll have to run. With everything I've got.

I quietly clenched my fist and turned to Namgung Ryong, who seemed at a loss for words.

Holding on to a sliver of hope, I asked, "Where is the Azure Sky Sword King?"

Namgung Cheon, the Azure Sky Sword King.

A Supreme Peak master counted among the top three of the Ten Kings, and the Grand Family Head of the Namgung Family.

If he joined us and traveled to Shanxi, we could hold off even more enemies than I'd imagined. I already had two fighters at my side who could each take on ten thousand men: the Fire King and the Bow Saint.

But that brief hope vanished when Namgung Ryong answered with a quiet sigh.

"My father has been away from the family estate for a couple of months now."

"Ah."

"I'm afraid we don't even know where he is. All we know is that he took on a mission at the request of Great Hero Mae Jonghak, the Alliance Leader."

I hadn't expected things to work out so easily. Still, I couldn't help feeling disappointed.

"I see."

"Still, as Family Head of the Namgung Family, I'll help you and the Jin Family of Taiyuan. I've had fine horses, enough food, and a family member to guide you along the fastest route made ready, so you can set off at once…"

Just as Namgung Ryong was about to continue—

Grrk. Krrk.

With a muffled, strangled growl, a figure rose from the shadows.

Chapter 945

Grrk. Krrk.

What should I call that?

A groan? Or a roar?

Whatever it was, one thing was certain.

The burly man slowly rising to his feet was moving farther and farther away from the word ordinary.

“Who is that…?”

Namgung Ryong studied him with a questioning look.

He had no way of knowing. Before Namgung Ryong arrived, the man had happened upon Jeok Cheongang, attacked him without knowing what he was getting into, and been knocked unconscious with a single punch.

“He’s a bandit.”

“A bandit?”

“Yes. And he’s the head of the bunch.”

I tapped the top of my head. Namgung Ryong caught my meaning at once and nodded.

“I can see why that man was acting like their leader.”

His gaze grew more intent as he studied the man.

“Though I don’t know if an ordinary bandit chief could look like that.”

Ssshhh.

Hot breath spread through the air.

The man exhaled vapor through his clenched teeth. I stared at him—or, more precisely, at the translucent holographic window that had just appeared above his head.

> System Lv. 60 Jang Sam

A painfully common name. A face that looked like a bandit at a glance.

But the change that had come over him in those few moments was unmistakable.

It wasn’t just the whites of his eyes or the hot breath pouring from his mouth. The number before his name proved it.

His Level… went up.

Of course, this wasn’t the first time I’d seen someone’s Level change.

Masters who had reached the realm of Returning to Simplicity, or something close to it, could control their qi freely. Even Qi Sense couldn’t accurately read their Level.

But this bandit chief was different.

He wasn't a master of Returning to Simplicity, nor had he gained enlightenment and raised his Level that way.

And people don't jump twenty Levels all at once.

A backwater bandit chief who'd been only Level 40 had suddenly leaped up twenty steps.

How was I supposed to make sense of that?

"This is way beyond anything I know. Care to explain?"

The moment I asked—

Whoosh.

A huge fist came down over my head with a heavy whistle.

Crash!

One step. I'd barely shifted to the side when the ground caved in, sending grass and dirt flying.

He could never have struck with that kind of force before he passed out.

I narrowed my eyes at him. Somehow, he'd acquired a considerable amount of internal energy, too.

He's completely lost it.

I'd suspected as much from the whites of his eyes, but he'd all but lost his reason. Maybe he hadn't even woken up of his own accord.

A man in his right mind wouldn't attack me here unless he had a death wish.

"Raaaagh!"

"…Well, then."

There was no helping it.

As he charged at me like a wild beast again, I slipped in close and gently extended my hand.

Tap.

My palm touched his chest.

At the same time, a faint heat—one I'd worked hard to suppress, over and over—burst out through my palm.

Boom!

With a sound like compressed air exploding, his eight-cheok[3456] frame shot away like a cannonball and slammed into a tree.

Kraaaash!

Beyond the thick cloud of dust, I grabbed his motionless body with one hand and dragged him back. The bandits' eyes widened.

"We're short on time, so I'll keep this brief."

[3456] Eight cheok is about 2.42 meters (7.95 ft); one cheok is 30.3 cm (11.9 in).

As they stared in shock and fear, I went on in a low voice.

“Tell me everything you know. If you want to live.”

Every man lives with some dream tucked away in a corner of his heart.

It might be a red sports car with a price tag of a hundred million won,[3457] or a study that practically reeks of professional success.

I was no different.

As a teenager, I dreamed of owning a motorcycle. I wanted to put my girlfriend on the back and open it up.

Of course, I didn’t know then that ten years later, I’d still have no girlfriend.

Or that instead of straddling a sleek motorcycle or a red convertible, I’d be riding an eco-friendly, four-wheel-drive thoroughbred and saying this to a man:

“Hold my waist tight, you bastard. You want to fall off the saddle?”

“Y-Yes!”

“But don’t grab too hard. If you pinch me, you’ll die.”

“Eek! I’m sorry, I’m sorry!”

Thud-thud-thud!

The thunder of hooves mingled with a tearful voice.

Maybe Namgung Ryong and the authorities had already made arrangements, because nothing got in the way of us as we rode nonstop at full speed.

Only one thing bothered me: the guy behind me wouldn’t stop sniffling.

“So, Jangquines.”[3458]

“…Yes.”

Jang Il answered, sounding half resigned. He was the bandit who’d pretended to be a woodcutter who’d lost his carrying frame until I’d caught him at his real trade.

He’d been a bandit for more than ten years. He was at the bottom of the pecking order, but there was one thing that set him apart from the others.

“You’ve known that guy for ten years?”

“Yes. I’ve known him since I first got into this line of work. For a while, we were like blood brothers.”

“Brothers, my ass. You’re a bandit. What a load of bullshit.”

Jeok Cheongang had been listening as he rode beside us. At his candid opinion, the Bow Saint frowned and clicked her tongue softly.

“Stay out of it and let him finish.”

[3457] One hundred million won is about $71,000 or €65,000.

[3458] “Jangquines” blends the surname Jang with Guinness, as in Guinness World Records.

“What? Am I not allowed to talk to myself anymore?”

“You really haven’t changed. Apart from losing your hair, you’re just like you were back then…”

“Have you quite finished?”

Jeok Cheongang’s gaze turned icy. Lately, his hair had been slowly sprouting like shoots in spring, and he’d been tending to it with loving care. He made no attempt to hide his anger.

“That’s enough, you two. You, keep talking.”

Even as the two Supreme Peak masters exchanged cold looks, the horses kept running. Jang Il swallowed hard and continued.

“A-Anyway, I followed the chief from then until now. When he said we were moving the stronghold to Anhui Province, everyone called him crazy and left, but I followed him on nothing but faith and loyalty.”

“You moved the stronghold to Anhui Province?”

“Yes. We were near Hubei before, but one day the chief suddenly decided we were moving. Everyone was dead set against it.”

Jang Il smacked his lips, as if remembering the day, then went on.

“Truth be told, I didn’t say anything, but I was thinking of quitting this life and leaving before it was too late.”

“Why? Was moving the stronghold that big a deal?”

“Oh, you don’t understand. Packing up and going is only a bit of work. The problem is, Anhui has the Namgung Family.”

I frowned. Even at a glance, what Jang Il was saying didn’t quite make sense.

“That’s no reason. Wudang and the Zhuge Clan were in Hubei, where you were before.”

Jang Il immediately shook his head.

“It’s not about how many great sects there are. It’s about which ones are nearby.”

“Oh.”

“Wudang and the Zhuge Clan are relatively mild. Most of the time, they settle things without bloodshed. But the Namgung Family…”

Jang Il trailed off and shuddered.

“Maybe that’s why the martial artists of Anhui don’t show any mercy, either. If things go wrong, you’d better be ready to lose your head.”

It was so ridiculous I could hardly believe it.

Bandits, carefully weighing up which martial artists might come after them.

But there was something strange about the chief’s choice all the same. As if the Namgung Family weren’t enough, he’d set up his stronghold on the border between Anhui and Zhejiang, close to the Imperial Capital.

“When did you move the stronghold?”

“Probably… three months ago? Around then.”

“What about the other bandits? It sounds like everyone from your old stronghold ran off.”

“They say a pine caterpillar should stick to pine needles, but when we got here, we found some bold bastards playing bandit in Anhui without even belonging to the Green Forest Alliance.”

“So your chief brought them under his command?”

“That’s right. One day, he left me behind and went off alone. He came back having absorbed two small strongholds.”

Jang Il added sadly, “And here I am, still at the bottom of the pecking order.”

I had no interest in an aging bandit’s complaints. As the wind brushed through my hair, I thought, Even if they were small, he took over two strongholds all by himself?

Of course that was bullshit.

Before his Level went up, the man had been no more than a middling Second Rate fighter, relying on some tiny amount of internal energy—who knew how he’d built it up—and his natural strength.

At best, he was on the threshold of First Rate. That wouldn’t be nearly enough.

You had to be somewhere around Supreme First Rate before you could even talk about having a chance against dozens of people at once. And that was assuming your opponents were at least a notch below you.

“So he had something to fall back on after all.”

“Pardon?”

“The man you followed as chief. He wasn’t that strong, was he? What gave him the confidence to move to Anhui and bring two strongholds together?”

“Well…”

Jang Il hesitated, then nodded.

“I found it strange myself. He was strong by my standards, but his martial arts weren’t anything special…”

Anywhere under Heaven, a bandit who made a name for himself in his region eventually had two choices.

He could trust in his decent martial arts and swagger around until disciples of a great sect came to wipe him out, or he could join the Green Forest Alliance.

For river bandits, it was the Yangtze River Channel League.

No neighborhood shop could beat a corporation.

Become an officially recognized franchisee of the Green Forest Alliance, and you’d have to pay substantial taxes. But as long as you didn’t openly commit atrocities, you could avoid being hunted down by the great sects.

You went from being a mere bandit to part of a symbiotic system that at least followed a few basic rules.

But that man fit neither category.

After ten years without making a name for himself, he'd set up a stronghold within spitting distance of Zhejiang Province, where the Imperial Capital stood.

Even if he hoped to make a killing around the Double Ninth Festival,[3459] it made no sense.

Neither did the way he'd suddenly grown so much stronger.

You couldn't even call this a fortuitous encounter.

Together, those strange events brought back a memory from more than a year ago.

Pung Yang. Pung Yang, the Red Wind Band Leader.

The leader of the mounted bandits who'd set his sights on the Mount Heng Sword Sect—no, on Shanxi Province.

And the one item that had given him such grand ambitions.

The Temporary Strength Pill…!

[3459] The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month.

Chapter 946

Time is impartial.

To the living, the dead, and even things without form.

And so, the name that suddenly came to mind had begun to fade with time. If not for the fierce battle that day and the item I'd happened to get my hands on after winning, I might have forgotten it soon enough.

The Temporary Strength Pill…!

Was this what it felt like to be struck by lightning on the crown of your head?

The shock rattled my mind, and my body went rigid before I knew it.

No way.

My first reaction was denial. But I knew better than anyone why I wanted to reject the thought that had just crossed my mind: I didn't want to believe it.

"What did that bastard—your leader—have?"

"Pardon?"

"Some secret that didn't sit right. A strange item he didn't have before. Whatever it was, remember."

"G-Great Hero, what on earth do you mean…?"

Jang Il, who'd been clinging to my back like a leech, asked in a trembling voice.

Instead of answering, I fought to keep my grip from tightening around the reins.

We couldn't stop here. We had to keep riding, if only for another moment.

Stopping the horse now wouldn't change anything.

"There must have been something strange. I'm sure of it."

"P-Please, wait. Please calm down, Great Hero."

Jang Il looked completely flustered. I was beginning to regret not bringing his unconscious leader instead when—

"…Huh?"

A dazed voice reached my ears. I whipped my head around to find Jang Il staring back at me, eyes wide.

"Come to think of it, at some point he started carrying a silk pouch everywhere."

"A silk pouch?"

"Yes. I remember it clearly. A few months ago, an unlucky traveler passed through our stronghold in Hubei, and the chief took it from him instead of a toll. After that, he kept it close like it was some kind of sacred relic. I thought it might be precious musk or something."

A traveler in Hubei.

A mysterious silk pouch the leader had kept close.

And his inexplicable behavior afterward.

"Um, was there something wrong with the pouch? I did wonder about it a little, since it didn't have the distinctive smell of musk."

I didn't answer Jang Il's question.

No—I couldn't.

My ominous suspicion had just become a certainty. And I knew there was nothing more Jang Il could tell me. What had been inside the silk pouch, and who the traveler who'd owned it was—he wouldn't know even decades from now.

There's no doubt. It was the Temporary Strength Pill.

The Temporary Strength Pill did just what its name suggested: it drew out all the strength latent within the body. Having experienced its dangers firsthand when I fought Pung Yang, I could only grit my teeth.

Crunch.

"What is it?"

Jang Il wasn't the only one who'd noticed something was wrong. I looked at Jeok Cheongang, whose face had gone rigid, and steadied my breathing.

"Do you remember what happened in Shanxi Province?"

"When do you mean?"

"I mean the mounted bandits who attacked the Mount Heng Sword Sect. I told you about them once before."

Strictly speaking, Jeok Cheongang had arrived in Shanxi Province just after the Mount Heng Sword Sect affair had ended. But he was one of the few people who knew all about Pung Yang and the Temporary Strength Pill.

"…Then could it be?"

His eyes widened as he realized what I was getting at.

"Yes," I said quietly. "It's likely. No—given the circumstances, there's no doubt."

"Goddamn it."

Jeok Cheongang let out the curse like a sigh. The Bow Saint, who'd been listening to us with a grave expression, spoke up.

"This is about that bizarre pill, isn't it?"

"…!"

"Don't look so surprised. It may have been in the past, but it was only a year or two ago. I already knew about the Mount Heng Sword Sect and the Red Wind Band."

Unfazed by my reaction, she continued.

"I know you were careful to keep it quiet, but unless you silence the witnesses, the truth has a way of getting out."

The shock of remembering the Temporary Strength Pill had made me forget why the Bow Saint had chosen to stay by the Emperor's side—and just how many eyes and ears the imperial court had scattered across this vast land.

"If you already know, there's no need for a long explanation."

A faint, inscrutable smile touched the Bow Saint's lips as I regained my composure. It vanished as quickly as it had appeared.

"What happened at the Mount Heng Sword Sect raised questions for me, too. Especially after I learned more about Pung Yang, the leader of the Red Wind Band."

Setting everything else aside, any martial artist would have had questions.

That day, in front of a fair number of onlookers, Pung Yang had displayed power approaching the Supreme Peak realm. He'd already become an accomplished Peak master, making him a formidable fighter in his own right. But manifesting Force, even imperfectly, defied common sense.

Especially when the Head Elder, who'd reached the very limits of the Peak realm, could only show power like that after drawing on his innate qi.

Learning martial arts was like climbing an endless flight of stairs. A beginner might skip several steps at once, but at the Peak realm, you had to give everything you had just to reach the next one.

Even Cheongpung, born with heaven-sent martial talent and strengthened at a dazzling pace, wouldn't have skipped the steps laid out before him.

But the Temporary Strength Pill makes that possible.

Its effects were tremendous, its side effects terrible, and its power short-lived. Still, it could twist the natural order. There was no way the Bow Saint could have missed that after learning more about Pung Yang.

"At the time, a thought did cross my mind," she murmured. "I wondered if Pung Yang—the man who died because of his greed—might be the one I'd been searching for."

A question occurred to me.

If Pung Yang, not I, had survived that battle—and if he really had been the chosen one—what choice would she have made?

But I swallowed the question. What we were facing now was far too serious.

"It seems… someone is secretly distributing the pill Pung Yang used."

Jeok Cheongang and the Bow Saint already knew who I meant by someone.

Dark Heaven.

The ones who had made the Temporary Strength Pill.

I didn't know exactly when they'd begun preparing for this. But the fact that one had reached the hands of an ordinary bandit was no small matter.

"Are you sure?" Jeok Cheongang asked, his voice low. "From what this old man heard, its effects seem far too weak."

The Bow Saint shook her head before I could answer.

"The bandit who stood in your way hadn't even reached First Rate. Considering the change in him afterward, there are two possibilities."

"What two?"

"Either its power varies according to the user's level. Or…"

Her voice trailed off as she looked toward me.

"Or they reduced its effects," I said, "and reduced the side effects along with them."

"…!"

A brief silence fell. Jeok Cheongang looked between us, his expression heavy, then muttered, "It must be the latter."

"We can't be sure of that yet."

"No. Whatever explanation you come up with, it's only wordplay to avoid facing reality."

He shook his head and continued firmly.

"Everyone in this world wants power. Wealth, fame, strength—whatever form it takes, they want to stand above others. But everything has its price."

Great power came at a great price.

And most people, however fiercely they wished for something, couldn't bring themselves to put in the work to get it. They knew how hard that would be. To gain what they wanted in the future, they'd have to give up the comforts and pleasures they had now.

"But what if the price of a moment's power were one they could bear?"

Then I understood why Jeok Cheongang was so certain—and what he was really trying to say.

"They didn't make it just to bolster their own fighting strength."

"…!"

"How else could Pung Yang, who led a mere band of mounted bandits, or some petty mountain bandit get their hands on it? No—why would Dark Heaven reach out to the likes of them at all?"

No one would touch a bomb. It might go off at the slightest jolt, and its blast could tear you apart just for standing too close.

But what if it wasn't a bomb? What if it was a campfire?

On a cold winter day, people wandering through the snow in search of something would reach toward it for warmth. Even if they got too close, they'd suffer only a small burn. They knew that much wouldn't kill them.

A campfire anyone could reach toward. A trivial price for its warmth.

That was probably exactly what Dark Heaven wanted. This vast land was full of madmen eager to taste power, even at that small cost. And those called the orthodox faction would be no exception.

Power anyone can obtain…!

That was the true danger of the new Temporary Strength Pill.

Its alluring power would tempt people who'd spent ten years, even decades, stuck in the same place. In the blink of an eye, it would addict them and ruin them.

And at the same time, the Lord of Heaven could give greater vitality to his countless followers—or rather, to the people who were little more than disposable meat shields.

To the innumerable hordes of Dark Heaven surging like a wave toward Shanxi Province even now.

Chapter 947

I'd known for a long time that danger was coming—danger we might not be able to contain.

I'd watched the enormous blaze called Dark Heaven draw closer with my own eyes.

But there was one thing I hadn't known.

Another blaze was approaching from behind.

Its heat had begun spreading who knew when, burning through us from deep within, consuming our very organs.

If the newly improved Temporary Strength Pill spreads throughout Murim…

It won't be a simple blaze anymore.

It'll be a bomb.

A time bomb that'll suddenly go off with a bang when the moment comes.

Just as drug addicts in the modern world keep using even when they know it's destroying their minds and bodies, martial artists won't be able to stop.

No. They'll be worse.

Martial artists are lunatics who'll do anything to get stronger.

Their desire to master martial arts is pure and primal—and that makes it more dangerous than anything else.

All the more so because that desire transcends the values of the orthodox, unorthodox, and demonic paths.

"They've… poisoned Murim."

Jeok Cheongang's grim murmur cut straight to the heart of our situation.

Poison.

He was right. This was poison.

The deadly poison of desire, which even the Myriad-Poison Ring couldn't cure.

And among those present, only one person had yet to grasp that: a bumpkin mountain bandit.

"P-Poison? What do you mean by that, sir?"

Jang Il looked thoroughly confused.

But no one answered him.

"You there. Your ears working?"

At Jeok Cheongang's abrupt question, the Namgung Family martial artists guiding us stiffened and replied.

"Of course, Great Hero Jeok."

"The Family Head told us to treat you as we would him. Give us your orders whenever you like."

"Orders, you say? Glad to hear it."

Jeok Cheongang nodded, then gave me a look.

There was a reason I'd spoken about something so important out loud even with Jang Il here.

It was because of them.

We need to get the word out as soon as possible.

The unconscious bandit chief, who should be bound and on his way to the Namgung Family by now, was the key to this whole affair.

He'd already lost half his mind, so there was little chance he'd be sane when he woke. But an interrogation might still yield something important.

"Effective immediately, I'm changing part of your assignment."

Namgung Cheon had sent four guides with us.

I looked at three of them in turn and gave them their new orders.

"One of you, go to the Namgung Family right now. Another, return to Great Hero Namgung and tell him what we've learned. And the last one…"

"To the Anhui provincial government?"

Quick to understand. That made this easier.

I nodded and continued.

"Tell the City Lord directly. He's to mobilize every soldier he can, tighten security, and investigate everything connected to this."

Dark Heaven's improved Temporary Strength Pill had begun circulating months ago. No matter how discreet they'd been, a thorough investigation would turn up traces.

And if the City Lord himself, with at least ten thousand troops under his command, got involved, he could search even the remote places beyond the Namgung Family's reach.

"I'll relay your orders. But I'm not sure the City Lord will go that far for us…"

The Namgung Family martial artist let his words trail off. I thought I knew what he was getting at.

The government and Murim had stayed out of each other's affairs since time immemorial.

The Emperor had declared war on Dark Heaven, but he'd done so by backing the Murim Alliance. This was a cooperative arrangement.

The City Lord, a servant of the Great Nation to his very bones, wouldn't be pleased to hear this before he even understood what was really going on.

Especially when it came from martial artists. Officials and martial artists had spent years barely acknowledging each other, and this was an order in all but name.

"That's true. He might not."

The Namgung Family martial artist hesitated at my mutter, then shook his head.

“No. Don’t worry. Even if the City Lord objects, the Family Head can make a strong request in the Namgung Family’s name—”

“Well, there’s no need to go that far.”

“Pardon?”

“Do you have any paper? Oh, never mind. This’ll do.”

Riiip.

Leaving the Namgung Family martial artist blinking in confusion, I spread the strip of cloth I’d just torn off against the horse’s head.

At the same time, I gave a silent command.

Open Inventory. Summon.

Ding.

Along with a clear chime, a cool sensation reached the hand I’d been feeling around inside my robe with, just to keep up appearances.

“What’s that…?”

“Just a moment.”

The Namgung Family martial artist stared at the object in my hand. I ignored his questioning look and poured Scorching Yang Qi into it.

Hummm.

With a faint tremor, the ornately decorated silver plaque grew red-hot. So did the characters painstakingly engraved into it, no doubt by a renowned imperial artisan.

Ssssss.

The heated silver plaque met the dark blue silk.

After a few seconds of breathing in acrid smoke, I lifted it away. A blackened design and characters marked the torn strip of cloth.

Great Marquis of Shangshan.

“It’s a little messy, but they’ll be able to make it out, right?”

“…!”

“…!”

Silence fell.

The sound of hooves filled the space where no one answered. Before I knew it, everyone except Jeok Cheongang and the Bow Saint was staring at me, eyes wide.

“W-What on earth is this?”

“You didn’t know? It’d take too long to explain. Just take this to the City Lord for now, and make sure he knows it’s an order, not a request.”

The Namgung Family martial artists were still gaping at me.

“If he acts offended even after seeing it, tell him this. Word for word.”

"W-What should we tell him?"

I answered the trembling question without hesitation.

It was a rule that held true in Murim, the modern world, and even a fantasy world crawling with nest-building dragons.

"If I say do it, you do it."

"…!"

What rank did a City Lord hold in the official hierarchy?

The question briefly crossed my mind, but I knew one thing for certain. Now that I'd formally joined the ranks of the marquises, he was several rungs below me.

"Oh, one more thing. The reinforcements will arrive within a day or two at the latest."

The mouths that had hung open moments ago clamped shut.

One of the silent Namgung Family martial artists forced out his voice.

"R-Reinforcements?"

"People from the Murim Alliance's Fire Dragon Pavilion. And a thousand Embroidered Uniform Guards."

"…!"

"Stick close to the City Lord and keep an eye on him. If he seems really suspicious, tell them they can take his head."

Anhui was close enough to the imperial capital that you could almost get there in a hop, skip, and a jump. The City Lord would have to be insane to harbor any other intentions. But that wasn't proof Dark Heaven hadn't gotten its claws into him.

"Is… is that really allowed?"

I answered the dazed question calmly.

"It is. I can."

We were at war. Besides holding the exalted title of marquis, I was a Thousand Captain in the Embroidered Uniform Guard, which answered directly to the imperial household.

Unless he belonged to the imperial family—no, even if he did—I had more than enough authority to punish him.

And all of that authority and prestige came from the Emperor.

The Son of Heaven put a sword in my hand himself. I'd better swing it without hesitation.

I hadn't accepted this sword to enjoy riches and glory or to look impressive.

I'd been given a sword and a title to cut down the enemies in my path and protect my people.

If reaching that goal meant dancing with a sword until I collapsed, I could do that.

"Now, let's split up."

At my abrupt words, the Namgung Family martial artists finally came to their senses. They'd been staring at me blankly even as their saddles jolted beneath them.

"We obey!"

Thud-thud-thud!

With a fervent shout that sounded like they'd forgotten who they worked for, three of them wheeled their horses around and galloped toward their respective destinations.

That left one guide to lead us to the border between Anhui and Henan—and someone we'd all forgotten about for a moment.

"I-I obey!"

"…?"

The belated reply came from behind me.

I turned and met Jang Il's eyes. The bandit wore a look of entirely unnecessary determination.

"For the sake of the realm, I'll do everything in my power to help—"

"Get off. Unless you want to die."

"Yes, sir."

Anyone who'd lived through war even once knew.

The air around them. The wind. The sunlight. The people.

Everything was different from usual.

An inexplicably heavy, ominous darkness rippled through the world.

Perhaps that was why the old man couldn't relax, even after waking from his first long, deep sleep in ages.

"Damn, the weather's shitty today."

Anyone who heard him mutter that would have scoffed and called the old man senile.

The sky beyond the lattice window was blue, and strong sunlight poured through the few scattered clouds.

But if that person were a martial artist—or simply lived in Hebei—they wouldn't dare meet his eyes.

The old man scowling out the window was as renowned throughout the realm as he was enormous: a towering figure, and a living legend.

"Is nobody there?"

Even a beast's quietest roar could make its surroundings tremble. The old man's voice rattled the pavilion, and those nearby responded in an instant.

“Have you woken, sir?”

At the deep voice outside the door, the old man gulped down cold water and wiped his mouth.

“Where’s Cheolyeong, that bastard?”

“The Family Head is in the Inner Hall, attending a meeting.”

“A meeting?”

“Yes. It began two shichen[3460] ago.”

“Have they all gone mad? And nobody woke me?”

At the old man’s growl, the person outside the door caught their breath, then answered carefully.

“W-Well…”

“Got an excuse?”

“You said you’d rearrange our five viscera and six bowels[3461] if we woke you while you were sleeping soundly.”

“Oh.”

The old man scratched the back of his head.

Now that he thought about it, he had said that.

He hadn’t been sleeping well lately, and it had put him on edge. Then he’d finally fallen into a deep sleep and forgotten all about it.

“Damn it. I finally got a good long sleep, so I guess something must’ve happened.”

Clicking his tongue softly, the old man got up.

He knew what kind of men his eldest son, the current head of the family, and the senior members under him were.

If men with nothing but muscle between their ears had been sitting on their asses for two shichen[3462], it had to be serious.

“Go to the Inner Hall. Tell them this old man is coming.”

The eyes of the towering old man—Peng Cheolhu, the Thunderbolt Saber King—grew deep and grave.

[3460] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; two shichen are about four hours.
[3461] “Five viscera and six bowels” refers to the organ groupings used in traditional East Asian medicine.
[3462] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; two shichen are about four hours.

Chapter 948

Servants and maids hurried to clear away furniture broken and smashed in every direction.

Amid the wreckage, as though a typhoon had swept through the room, hulking men stood glaring at one another and breathing hard.

That was what Peng Cheolhu, the Thunderbolt Saber King, saw when he entered the Inner Hall's grand conference room. He took in the scene, looked around, and said, "I'll count to three. No more, no less. If you're not back in your places by then…"

Whoosh!

Before he'd even finished speaking, dozens of hulking men scattered like the wind, returning to their original places.

All but one.

"You're here, Father."

The Thunderbolt Saber King frowned at the greeting from his eldest son, who was nearing seventy.

"You're awfully late with your morning greeting."

"I heard you were sleeping soundly…"

"Cut the nonsense. I thought you were finally ready to act like a proper person, so I handed over the Family Head position—and now you're fighting with your own blood relatives? In this sacred conference room, no less, where we're discussing matters of vital importance to the family!"

Peng Cheolyeong, the Iron Blood Saber and current Family Head of the Hebei Peng Family, silently took the booming rebuke before speaking.

"That reminds me of when you broke Third Uncle's left arm. Here, in this sacred conference room where we discuss matters vital to the family."

The Thunderbolt Saber King faltered, then replied sternly, "I was young and hot-blooded then."

"That was last year."

"…That can't be right."

"And that's not all. The year before, Second Uncle dozed off for a moment during a meeting, so you punched him in the jaw—"

"Now, Family Head!"

Second Uncle rebuked Peng Cheolyeong for daring to talk back to his father, the Grand Family Head. Then he added, "It was my shin. I don't know whose jaw you're thinking of."

"I'm sorry. I mixed them up. That was probably Fifth Uncle."

Fifth Uncle, who had shrunk into a corner the moment the Thunderbolt Saber King appeared, muttered with mournful eyes, “Yes. Three years ago. When I woke up, two days had passed…”

“That’s enough. I get it. Let’s move on.”

Having failed to come out of the exchange with any dignity, the Thunderbolt Saber King shook his head and took the seat of honor.

Fortunately, the sturdy iron chair had survived intact. It had been made to withstand the Hebei Peng Family’s time-honored habit of throwing punches whenever the mood struck.

“Enough nonsense. Everyone, sit down. Tell me what you spent two shichen[3463] shouting and beating each other over.”

Peng Cheolyeong sat beside him and got straight to the point.

“Something’s wrong in the north.”

“The north? Why would the Murong Family suddenly be acting strange?”

The Thunderbolt Saber King’s assumption was only natural. To the Hebei Peng Family, the north had always meant the Murong Family.

At the far edge of this vast realm, the descendants of the Xianbei ruled Liaoning Province, a true frontier. Centuries ago, their ancestors had proclaimed themselves kings of a nation; now the family had long held its place among the Five Great Families.

“There’s no way the Murong Family is up to anything. You must have been given bad information.”

The Thunderbolt Saber King waved the matter away as though it wasn’t worth hearing. But Peng Cheolyeong’s next words made his expression harden.

“I wasn’t talking about the Murong Family.”

“What?”

If not the Murong Family, that left only one place.

The true north. A land of outlaws more lawless even than Murim, with schemes and blades lurking everywhere.

“Don’t tell me… you mean those barbarian bastards on the grasslands?”

“Yes.”

Peng Cheolyeong, considered the mildest of the Hebei Peng Family by blood, continued in a calm voice.

“The rumors coming from there are troubling.”

“They’re a vicious lot to the bone, but they’ve been quiet these past few years, haven’t they?”

The Thunderbolt Saber King was right. More precisely, peace and prosperity had begun to settle over the long-troubled grasslands about two years ago.

[3463] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of about two hours; two shichen are about four hours.

At the center of that change stood the Jin Family of Taiyuan, newly risen to power in the north.

“I heard there’s been no trouble since the Jin Family of Taiyuan formed that Seven-Route Army of theirs and swept through the place. Am I mistaken?”

“You’re exactly right. They went on a single campaign and pulled out the tooth that had been aching for ages.”

After taking control of the Shanxi Murim, the Jin Family of Taiyuan had moved with a speed and boldness that astonished even the Five Great Families and the Nine Sects and One Gang.

They absorbed sects that had once bared their teeth at them, along with Escort Bureaus and merchant houses. With that strength, they formed seven armed forces and swept across the grasslands.

The mounted bandits who regularly crossed the border to pillage and kill could not stand against the Seven-Route Army. Neither could the horse-riding tribes.

In fact, some of them had even rallied beneath the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s banner and reaped a handsome reward for their victories.

“Temur. Chinggen.”

At the foreign names that slipped from his son’s lips, the Thunderbolt Saber King narrowed his eyes.

He had devoted himself to martial arts since stepping back from the front lines, but he remained the Grand Family Head of the Hebei Peng Family in more than name. He remembered nearly everything discussed at the meetings he occasionally attended—even the names of barbarians whose faces he had never seen.

“Those two who sided with the Jin Family of Taiyuan and became Great Chieftains. Am I right?”

“Yes. I hear they’re called khans on the grasslands.”

“Khan or can, I don’t care. What matters is what those bastards are doing.”

The Thunderbolt Saber King tapped the table with fingers like iron rods, lost in thought.

Temur and Chinggen had risen to power on the grasslands thanks to their alliance with the Jin Family of Taiyuan. If they were behaving suspiciously, there were two possible reasons.

They had grown dissatisfied with what they possessed and wanted more.

Or…

“What are the chances they’ve joined hands with Dark Heaven? I could tear those bastards to pieces and still not be satisfied.”

“We don’t know for certain yet,” Peng Cheolyeong said quietly. “But the evidence suggests they’ve conspired with Dark Heaven.”

The Thunderbolt Saber King let out a low groan to himself.

Those bastards wouldn't suddenly try this unless they'd lost their minds. Not when they know Fire King—that crazy old man—is standing right behind the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

Everyone knew of Jeok Cheongang's ties to the Jin Family of Taiyuan. Rumor held that fear of the Fire King was why Temur and Chinggen had allied with the family, even betraying some of their own people to build the power they now held.

And now they're going to stab him in the back like this? It makes no sense.

Jeok Cheongang was hellfire itself: a blaze that died down only after reducing everything to ash.

The Thunderbolt Saber King was prouder than anyone, but he hated even the thought of becoming the Fire King's enemy in earnest.

Someone's backing them. There has to be.

He studied his eldest son.

"You have a reason for thinking this. What's your evidence?"

"About two years ago, we placed people we could trust on the grasslands."

"Informants… You used your head."

"The situation there was still unstable. We made our move when the new trade routes opened."

Opening a route meant letting people in.

After the Seven-Route Army's campaign, led by the Jin Family of Taiyuan, more than fine ceramics and jewelry passed along the grassland trade routes.

People.

New kinds of people the lawless grasslands had not seen for a long time.

Some of those who filled the vacuum there included informants from the Hebei Peng Family.

"Recently, a few of them sent word that the barbarians on the grasslands are gathering."

"How many?"

"At least ten thousand."

"…What? Ten thousand?"

"Father."

Peng Cheolyeong struggled to speak at the sight of the Thunderbolt Saber King staring at him, eyes wide.

"That's only the number of troops confirmed so far."

"…!"

For a moment, the Thunderbolt Saber King doubted his ears.

Ten thousand. A full ten thousand.

Not a rabble, either, but warriors of a horse-riding people who had once thundered across the continent. Men born on the open plain who died in the saddle.

And that may not even be all of them…

He looked down at his fist. He had clenched it so tightly that his knuckles had gone white.

He could almost see the countless riders charging as one, reins in one hand, bows and lances in the other.

Then fury surged from deep in his chest and blotted out the vision.

"Enough!"

Whoom! Crash!

A powerful wave of qi swept through the room with a thunderous boom. The Thunderbolt Saber King smashed the huge iron table with one punch and rose, glaring at Peng Cheolyeong—no, at everyone in the conference room.

"Were you going to decide a matter this grave without me? Have you all lost your minds?"

Crrrreak.

The giant's power pressed down from every side. The old Grand Family Head's anger shook the conference room as though a typhoon had struck it.

Then Peng Cheolyeong spoke.

"I had to hear everyone's opinions before I told you."

"You fool! The family's survival is at stake!"

His eldest son remained calm—the son he had trusted enough to make Family Head—but the Thunderbolt Saber King's anger would not subside.

Ten thousand already confirmed. If the barbarian force grew to tens of thousands and entered Hebei in fifteen days—or even in a few days—there would be no containing it.

"How dare you…"

Betrayal and disappointment burned through him.

Then Peng Cheolyeong's subdued voice reached his ears.

"Please forgive me. I couldn't risk Hebei Peng Family blood being spilled over a hasty decision. That's all."

"What does that—"

His trembling body went still.

Only then did the Thunderbolt Saber King sense something was wrong. He slowly scanned the faces around him and realized what had struck him as familiar about Peng Cheolyeong's words.

They aren't after our family!

The realization flashed through him like lightning.

Of course. If the grassland forces were already marching south toward Hebei, no one would still be sitting in this conference room. They would be mobilizing the family's forces and the entire Hebei Murim, preparing for battle as fast as they could.

Then… surely not?

His face went rigid.

"Shanxi. It's Shanxi Province."

He had spoken almost to himself, but Peng Cheolyeong quietly nodded.

"When will those goddamn bastards set foot in Shanxi Province?"

Someone answered in a grave voice.

"We expect them within seven days at the latest."

"Do they—the Jin Family of Taiyuan—know?"

"Yes," Peng Cheolyeong said quietly. "They're already preparing for battle."

The Thunderbolt Saber King groaned and raised his head. Beyond the window, dark clouds now filled what had been a blue sky.

Fewer than ten days remained until the Double Ninth Festival.[3464]

[3464] The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month.

Chapter 949

Everything has a warning sign.

As an earthquake approaches, the ground rumbles and countless birds take flight all at once. Before a typhoon strikes, featherlike clouds fill the sky.

If even natural disasters—calamities that might as well be divine punishment—give warning, what more need be said of something done by human hands?

Just a few days ago, some people had sensed ominous signs coming from the grasslands.

They were unmistakable.

The nomads. No—the entire grasslands are on the move.

In a vast hall veiled in dimness, an imposing man silently studied the map before him.

It was as large as three or four grown men laid together and crowded with the terrain and place names of the entire continent. Yet his gaze was fixed on one place alone.

Shanxi.

The land where he had been born and raised. The land his ancestors had protected.

A little over three hundred years ago, near the end of the war that had drenched the world in blood, a man had arrived here.

His family name was Jin; his given name, Muryang.

He had been an unwelcome outsider. But in Taiyuan, he laid a foundation stone and raised his banner, and the Jin Family of Taiyuan began.

Even he couldn't have known our family would endure for so long.

A little over three hundred years.

An almost unimaginable span of time.

Flowers beautiful enough to draw gasps and towering trees grand enough to awe all who saw them had fallen to the passing winters and the years.

But the weeds on the frontier—the Jin Family of Taiyuan—still protected this land.

Blooming in profusion, then broken, shattered, and rising again.

"Rise and fall. Flourishing and decline."

Jin Wikyung murmured the words, then slowly continued.

"Our family rose long ago, and we only narrowly escaped ruin. So I thought surely all that remained was for us to flourish…"

He smiled bitterly.

"I had that badly wrong. Don't you think?"

It wasn't a lament to no one, nor was he talking to himself.

Wipeng stood at his post, solid as an iron tower and still as a lake. He spoke.

“Looking at you now, my lord, I’m reminded of the past.”

“The past?”

“It wasn’t so long ago. Only two years.”

“The Mount Heng Sword Sect…”

“That’s right. You looked like this then, too.”

Wipeng’s voice was as cold as the epithet Ghost Sword suggested.

“The fight hasn’t even begun. Are you thinking of laying down your sword before you’ve drawn it?”

“Is that how it looks?”

“To me, yes.”

At his closest retainer’s firm answer, Jin Wikyung bit his lip.

He was ashamed that he couldn’t deny it at once. And the reality that kept him from making a decision even in a moment of stubborn defiance was bleak.

“I’m…the Lesser Family Head of our family. Countless lives depend on a few words or some small action of mine.”

Not only those of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

All of Shanxi Murim moved according to Jin Wikyung’s will. The Jin Family of Taiyuan was unquestionably the foremost power in Shanxi Province, and he was, for all intents and purposes, its Family Head.

Even now, a wave of tens of thousands of men and horses was bearing down on their land.

“I’ve already sent a letter through the Shanxi Provincial Office ordering the evacuation of the people around Datong and Saneum. We have to prevent as many needless casualties as we can.”

Datong and Saneum were the districts closest to the grasslands. They would be the first places trampled when the grassland army crossed the border.

“The Mount Heng Sword Sect must withdraw as well. There’s still time. It’s the only way to save the sect from destruction.”

“Do you think Sect Leader Lee will agree?”

“It isn’t a proposal. It’s an order.”

Jin Wikyung’s voice was subdued.

“She has no other choice. By now, she must have accepted that.”

Over the past two years, the Mount Heng Sword Sect had grown remarkably under the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s banner.

Lee Seowol, its new Sect Leader, had proven far more capable than anyone had expected of a woman in that position.

Her father, the former Sect Leader Lee Cheonbaek—the Blood Wolf Sword—had built the Mount Heng Sword Sect through fear and force. With her intelligence and leadership, she had rebuilt it when it stood on the brink of collapse.

The whole world had taken notice.

But no matter how much the sect had grown, it could not withstand the crisis now on its doorstep.

“Thirty thousand.”

Jin Wikyung met Wipeng’s eyes.

“By the time they reach Shanxi Province, their numbers will have swelled to thirty thousand.”

The past few days had passed with merciless speed.

One day, urgent word had arrived that nomads scattered across the grasslands were gathering. Then several Escort Bureaus and merchant houses along the grassland trade routes had disappeared.

Their fate was obvious. So were the culprits.

“Their aim is clear. So is who’s behind them.”

Jin Wikyung knew Temur and Chinggen well. Support from the Jin Family of Taiyuan had been one of the chief reasons the two men had risen so quickly to power on the grasslands.

“Temur is strong, but utterly simple. Chinggen is calculating and cautious, but his ambitions are limited. Neither would ever attempt something like this. They don’t have the strength for it, either.”

The age when grassland nomads had thundered across the continent with bows and lances was long gone.

The empire they had built had vanished without a trace. Driven onto vast but desolate plains, the nomads had feuded among themselves and dwindled.

“Their strength has been proven. But it still isn’t enough to threaten the Central Plains.”

Temur and Chinggen, now called khans, were still just two among the many Great Chieftains of the grasslands.

And the Central Plains?

Every province had thousands—sometimes more than ten thousand—soldiers of the Great Nation, along with powerful Murim sects.

The divided grasslands. The united Central Plains.

The gulf between them was too deep and wide.

The nomads would never again follow their ancestors’ path to rule the world.

Not unless another great power intervened.

“It isn’t thirty thousand nomads I’m afraid of.”

Jin Wikyung glared at the enormous map, as though waiting for something hidden among its dense lines and characters to spring out.

“Dark Heaven. I’m afraid of the strength they haven’t shown us yet.”

For the past two years, the Jin Family of Taiyuan had gone from strength to strength.

But through all the celebrations and cheers, Jin Wikyung had suffered a terrible nightmare every night.

A nightmare filled with the dead.

“Kill them!”

“Don’t retreat a single step!”

Clang! Clang! Clang!

Eight Spring Gorge.

Every night, Jin Wikyung wandered that bloody gorge, where enemies, allies, and traitors had charged at one another like beasts.

“Lesser Family Head, are you all right—? Cough!”

He watched a family retainer who had always greeted him with a smile collapse in a spray of blood.

“P-Please, spare me. I beg you. I beg you.”

He passed a dying Mount Heng Sword Sect martial artist, eyes wide open, on his way to face another enemy.

“Do you know what you—you, the Jin Family of Taiyuan—did to us?!”

He faced the traitors who had finally drawn the blades they had kept hidden for decades.

He crossed swords with them without pause until, at last, he brought them down and stood before one man.

“Look around you. What do you think as you watch them die so horribly?”

A beard stained red with blood.

A dry gaze. A dry voice.

The Head Elder, who had surely died long ago, spoke to his own blood kin, his breath cold.

“If you had been a little more careful. A little wiser…could you have prevented a tragedy like this?”

Jin Wikyung had no memory of those words.

Of course he didn’t.

They were questions he asked himself.

He knew the Head Elder in his nightmare—and every word the man spoke—came from within him.

Even knowing that, he dreamed it again and again.

Even now.

“My lord.”

Wipeng’s voice suddenly reached him. Jin Wikyung blinked slowly, like a man waking from sleep, and realized his body was damp with cold sweat.

“…Damn it. Look at the state of me.”

Jin Wikyung let out a short curse, then gave a bitter chuckle.

It was ridiculous. He was trembling like a drenched rat.

And the fate of Shanxi Murim—no, of all Shanxi Province—rested in the hands of this pathetic man, who could barely breathe under the pressure closing in from every direction.

His one small comfort was that someone who had stood beside him for so long was still there.

“May I say something, my lord?”

Wipeng’s voice broke the brief silence. He continued without waiting for an answer.

“The enemy is strong. If Dark Heaven’s hidden forces join thirty thousand nomads…you may be right. What happens then may be beyond undoing.”

“Even with the government’s help, we can’t be sure we’d win. Without reinforcements, we couldn’t hold them off with every force Shanxi Province can muster.”

Jin Wikyung added bitterly, “Even if we’re lucky enough to get reinforcements in time, there won’t be nearly enough. Of course there won’t. In their place, I couldn’t leave my family unprotected either.”

A feint to the east, a strike in the west.

The vast grasslands bordered not only Shanxi Province, but Liaoning, Hebei, and Shaanxi as well. The moment the army marching south toward Shanxi turned its horses elsewhere, the sects and families that had sent reinforcements would become its new targets.

And while Dark Heaven possessed the strange dark art known as the Moving Formation, no one could easily leave their sect or family undefended.

They had things to protect, too.

“I intend to abandon Shanxi and head for Henan. As long as our people survive, our family won’t disappear.”

This was neither the best choice nor the second-best.

It was the lesser evil, chosen to avert the worst.

Wipeng understood Jin Wikyung’s desire to prevent so many deaths.

“If that is your command, my lord, I will obey.”

“Wipeng, you…”

“But my lord, do you remember?”

Wipeng spoke calmly.

"Two years ago, someone said that once you start retreating, you'll keep backing away until you trip over a rock and fall."

"…!"

"I know how strong the enemy is. And I know why you've made this decision. But…"

Wipeng drew a deep breath and clasped his hands in salute to the lord he trusted and followed.

"Our Jin Family of Taiyuan has grown stronger. No—Shanxi Murim has grown stronger."

He turned without hesitation and opened the tightly shut door.

Swish.

Jin Wikyung saw them then.

Beyond the slowly opening door, countless people waited, armed and ready.

Familiar faces stood at their head.

"Lee Seowol of the Mount Heng Sword Sect. I've come to fight the foreign enemy."

Clang! Clang! Clang!

Lee Seowol stood in martial attire. Behind her, three hundred Mount Heng Sword Sect martial artists drew their weapons and drove them deep into the ground.

"Sect Leader Lee. What is all this…?"

Jin Wikyung couldn't finish.

He had spotted the dozens of Sect Leaders and Family Heads who had sworn allegiance beneath the Jin Family of Taiyuan's banner two years ago. Each stood armed, eyes cold.

And among them was someone who had just appeared.

"What's got you so worried?"

The young man's voice was rough and awkward, as if he'd forgotten how to speak for a long time.

He smiled at Jin Wikyung, his hollow cheeks standing out.

"Hyung.[3465]"

"…!"

His younger brother had finally emerged into the world after a long seclusion. At the sight of him, Jin Wikyung closed his eyes, unable to contain the emotion rising within him.

And in the instant of darkness, he recalled the voice of his youngest brother, who wasn't there, speaking through Wipeng just moments ago.

Once you start retreating, you'll keep backing away until you trip over a rock and fall.

[3465] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man close to him.

He couldn’t be sure which choice was right or wrong.

But the road ahead was decided.

Step.

He walked toward the people waiting for the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

Toward the dark future from which the smell of blood was already drifting.

Chapter 950

For everyone, that summer felt unusually short and chaotic.

The strangely unpredictable weather was only one of many reasons.

Floods no longer even counted as surprising.

One midsummer day, hail fell instead of monsoon rain. On another, the worst heat wave in recorded history was followed by a layer of white frost.

People whose crops were ruined overnight sank to the ground and wept. As grain prices soared, they were left wondering where their next meal would come from.

The government released rice for famine relief, but a sack passed through a few hands and dwindled to a single hop.[3466]

In the end, those who could no longer bear their hunger headed for the mountains.

There they stripped bark from trees to eat, or took up rusted farm tools and became bandits.

But even that wouldn't last long.

What could people who had spent their whole lives dutifully working the fields possibly do? All that awaited these clumsy bandits was death.

Whether by government troops or martial artists, they would eventually be hunted down. And only when cold blades cut through their bodies would a question suddenly occur to them:

How did I end up like this?

But no one knew the answer.

Events across this vast land were often too tangled for anyone to understand.

All the more so when one looked back on the past two years.

"Have you heard? Just a couple of months ago, in Nanman…"

"That's not all. Guangxi has run red with blood."

"This is driving me mad. What's happening to the world?"

Stories circulated wherever people gathered. That was nothing new.

But compared to a few years ago, the mood had changed. No—the very air had changed.

The voices of the people filling the inn hung low as morning fog. Worry showed plainly in their eyes and on their faces.

Rumors about the Murim, once no more than talk to go with a drink, had become real blades, slowly cutting into their skin.

They could no longer laugh and sing.

[3466] A hop is a traditional Korean measure of volume, approximately 180 mL or 6.1 US fl oz.

They watched government troops patrol the streets in groups of dozens, and glanced anxiously at the occasional passing martial artist. Before nightfall, they hurried home.

By now, everyone knew it instinctively.

A new war had already begun.

A catastrophe beyond anything the hundred thousand Demonic Cultists who had trampled the Central Plains decades ago could have brought was looming over them.

And those within the world of the Murim felt the reality of it more keenly than anyone.

“I hear they’ve reached all the way into the Imperial Court. They’ve been at it for decades, since around the Great Faction War.”

“I heard the same from the Beggars’ Sect.”

“Dark Heaven is stronger than we thought. It’s a good thing their plan fell through. If it had succeeded…”

It was no longer unusual for dozens of martial artists to gather, especially Sect Leaders and Family Heads.

They discussed the situation in grave voices and tried to predict what would come next.

And one name came up every time.

“The Blazing Flame Divine Dragon distinguished himself again. I hear this earned him the Imperial Court’s active support and the Son of Heaven’s favor.”

“Then is that rumor true?”

“What rumor?”

“You haven’t heard? A few days ago, when the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon left the Imperial Capital, the Son of Heaven himself came out to see him off and made him a marquis.”

“What? The Son of Heaven gave a martial artist an official title—and made him a marquis, no less? Is that even possible?”

“There were plenty of witnesses. It happened in the Imperial Capital, so it took the Lower District Sect and the Beggars’ Sect a little time to get word of it, but it seems to be true.”

News travels a thousand li[3467] without feet.

The Imperial Court’s proclamation declaring Dark Heaven a foreign enemy and announcing war, together with word of Jin Taekyung’s achievements and the unprecedented honor of his elevation to marquis, spread from mouth to mouth in no time.

[3467] In this Chinese setting, one li is approximately 500 m or 0.311 mi; three hundred li is about 150 km or 93 mi.

Now even the Imperial Court had stepped in.

The Great Nation, which had sat back and watched even during the Great Faction War, possessed more troops and supplies than anyone could count. If it joined the fight, Dark Heaven would be little more than a candle in the wind.

Or rather, that was what everyone expected.

Everyone except the handful of people who knew the full situation.

Flap, flap!

The old man watched a messenger eagle disappear into the distance, its wings beating hard, then unfolded the tiny scrap of paper in his hand.

As his eyes moved over the minuscule writing, the sword scar on his face twisted little by little.

“So that’s how it is.”

The quiet mutter slipped between his dry lips.

He stood there for a while, deep in thought, then tossed the paper into a brazier in one corner.

He watched until the oil-treated missive, prepared to keep it dry, had burned away. Then he set off for his destination.

Thud. Tap.

A dull sound echoed with each limping step.

Whenever the old man passed, those who looked like Confucian scholars lowered their heads slightly.

“Welcome, Chief of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion.”

“I have a brief report on what happened in Guangxi.”

“We’ve received an urgent message from the Namgung Family.”

“And from Hebei, Liaoning, and Shaanxi…”

Some passed with their arms full of bamboo slips; others offered only a brief greeting before moving on. Most, however, brought the old man new information. With each report, he sorted and refined his thoughts.

At last, he stopped before a firmly shut door.

Click.

The door opened as though someone had been waiting for him.

But the old man wasn’t surprised.

Just as he knew the details of events thousands, even tens of thousands, of li[3468] away, the master of this room knew what happened around him.

There was a resemblance, though the scale of their abilities was entirely different.

The old man had countless eyes and ears. The man inside could sense everything happening within a radius of over a hundred zhang[3469] by his own power alone.

[3468] In this Chinese setting, one li is approximately 500 m or 0.311 mi; three hundred li is about 150 km or 93 mi.

“Were you practicing martial arts?”

At the old man’s first words as he entered the exceedingly plain room, the man sitting cross-legged opened his eyes.

“I was. Until just now.”

“I’m sorry. It seems I interrupted you without meaning to.”

“Don’t worry about it. I’m sure you had good reason.”

The man smiled gently. He was young.

He looked barely thirty, and the compact muscles of his bare upper body were perfectly balanced.

Of course, once he put on his clothes, he looked like any ordinary young man.

“So, what is it?”

He continued to speak to the old man with the easy familiarity of a senior.

But he had more than enough standing and years behind him to do so.

Sword Saint Mae Jonghak was one of the greatest pillars supporting the Murim.

“I’ve come because there’s something I must report to the Alliance Leader at once.”

“Something you must report immediately.”

The smile faded from Mae Jonghak’s lips. He took his seat and tilted a teapot as he went on.

“Is it about Shanxi?”

Trickle.

Before the cold tea had even filled the cup, steam rose from it. The old man sat down across from Mae Jonghak and ran a hand over the teacup, heated by Samadhi True Fire.

“Yes.”

The cup was warm. The news to come would be cold and dark.

Mae Jonghak could see it in the old man’s face.

“Tell me, Chief of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion.”

The old man—Song Ho, the Thousand-Faced Fox—answered.

“The Jin Family of Taiyuan has called off its retreat.”

“Go on.”

“All of Shanxi Murim is mobilizing. Some thirty sects and families have gathered around the Jin Family of Taiyuan, and the Shanxi Provincial Office is mobilizing every available troop.”

“Hmm.”

Mae Jonghak let out a low hum.

He hardly needed to hear more.

[3469] A Chinese zhang is approximately 3.33 m or 10.9 ft.

This was an all-out war. Not just Shanxi Murim, but all of Shanxi Province would live or die by the coming battle.

“What forces does Shanxi have?”

“First, more than five thousand martial artists are standing by, led by the Jin Family of Taiyuan. In addition, the government has ten thousand troops, including a thousand cavalry.”

Fifteen thousand in all.

They had scraped together every last man.

They wouldn’t even have managed to gather five thousand martial artists if the Jin Family of Taiyuan hadn’t accomplished an extraordinary resurgence over the past two years.

But the greatest problem was…

“Not even half the enemy’s numbers.”

At Mae Jonghak’s mutter, the Thousand-Faced Fox nodded grimly.

According to the Hidden Shadow Pavilion’s intelligence, the grassland army marching south would swell to at least thirty thousand, perhaps as many as forty thousand.

Because it bordered the grasslands, the government troops stationed in Shanxi Province were highly capable. But the wave of cavalry, more than twice their total strength, was a nightmare in itself.

“They seem to intend to evacuate the north first and fight in the central region to minimize casualties.”

“The central region. Taiyuan, their stronghold?”

“More precisely, they appear to be planning a decisive battle at Jeongyang, about three hundred li[3470] from Taiyuan.”

“Jeongyang. Jeongyang…”

Mae Jonghak murmured the name, then suddenly realized why it sounded familiar.

“That’s where Eight Spring Gorge is.”

“Yes.”

The Thousand-Faced Fox continued calmly.

“Eight Spring Gorge is a natural fortress. During the Great Faction War, the Demonic Cult’s great army was successfully repelled there. Two years ago, it also played a decisive part in the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s victory.”

Eight Spring Gorge lay on the boundary between central and northern Shanxi Province. It was shaped like a jar.

[3470] In this Chinese setting, one li is approximately 500 m or 0.311 mi; three hundred li is about 150 km or 93 mi.

The path was steep and the entrance narrow, making it an ideal battlefield for a small force facing a larger one.

And considering that most of the enemy forces were cavalry, it would be hard to find a better location.

The problem was that those cavalry numbered in the tens of thousands—and the true enemy had yet to show its face.

“If the decisive battle is fought at Eight Spring Gorge, what chance do you give the Jin Family of Taiyuan?”

“Even at the most generous estimate, twenty percent. No matter how much the battle turns in the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s favor, anything higher than that would be difficult.”

The Thousand-Faced Fox’s answer was firm, his gaze darkening.

“If the enemy army consisted only of nomads, I’d put their chances above fifty percent. But…”

“Right. We can’t forget them.”

Dark Heaven.

Pitch-black clouds had swallowed even the blue skies over the grasslands. Their presence alone held everyone fast, like a trap around their ankles.

“As things stand, we can’t expect to send the Jin Family of Taiyuan any support.”

The Thousand-Faced Fox’s face was dark as he said it.

As the Murim Alliance Leader’s right hand and the head of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion, he was one of the people who understood the current state of the world better than anyone.

“Everyone knows what could happen if we move rashly. We could be caught in their dark arts and suffer a terrible blow.”

It defied common sense, but Dark Heaven had already used the dark art known as the Moving Formation several times.

Shaolin, the Mount Tai and Northern Dipper of the Murim, had suffered devastating losses because of it. The Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families were no less vulnerable.

Not even here in Henan, where the Murim Alliance’s headquarters was located.

“Then the forces we can mobilize right now…”

“None.”

“None?”

Mae Jonghak gazed steadily at the Thousand-Faced Fox, who had answered without a moment’s hesitation.

“I want to ask you one thing. Think carefully before you answer.”

“Ask.”

“When you say we have no troops to send to Shanxi, is that the absolute truth?”

"…"

The Thousand-Faced Fox chose silence.

He had lived a life worthy of his epithet.

Hiding his identity and telling brazen lies as though they were the truth came as naturally to him as breathing.

But even he could not bring himself to lie under the clear gaze of Sword Saint Mae Jonghak.

"You know as well, Alliance Leader…"

The Thousand-Faced Fox spoke at last, his voice heavy.

"The balance of power has tipped too far. Helping Shanxi now would be a poor decision. You should formally order the Jin Family of Taiyuan to retreat at once."

"I think it's too late."

"It isn't. Time is short, but if we pull the front line back to Henan without delay, we can preserve our remaining forces and plan for what comes next."

"No. It's definitely too late."

Mae Jonghak shook his head slightly.

"Too late to change their minds."

"…!"

"The Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan is an astute man. He takes a broad view of every situation and is exceedingly careful before making a decision. Isn't that why you recommended him to the Murim Alliance's strategy division?"

The Thousand-Faced Fox let out a quiet hum before he could stop himself.

If a man that cautious had staked his family's fate on a decision, he would never take it back.

Not even on the Murim Alliance Leader's orders.

"But if this continues, we could lose Shanxi. We could lose them all."

"I know. If they retreat now, the innocent commoners who haven't managed to flee will be massacred by the enemy."

"…!"

"Don't turn your eyes away. They aren't fighting only to protect the homes where they grew up."

At a loss for words, the Thousand-Faced Fox closed his eyes, unable to meet Mae Jonghak's gaze.

Yes.

He knew. He had only pretended not to.

This was not a battle. It was a war.

To win it, a few thousand martial artists mattered more than a hundred thousand people.

"Was my judgment…wrong?"

"No. It was excellent. You're a better strategist than anyone I know."

At the unexpected answer, the Thousand-Faced Fox opened his eyes.

Mae Jonghak was looking at him with a gentle smile.

"You simply forgot one thing."

"What was it?"

"You were so busy looking at the whole forest that you missed a small branch within it."

At that very moment—

Srrk.

With a motion of Mae Jonghak's hand, a surge of qi reached out and flung open the firmly shut door.

Then, with the faint stir of a hidden presence, a figure swept in like the wind.

"What news have you brought?"

At Mae Jonghak's question, as if he had been expecting the arrival, a messenger from the Alliance Leader's Office bowed low and answered.

"Urgent news! The Hebei Peng Family, the Murong Family, Huashan, and the Zhongnan Sect are each sending two thousand reinforcements to save Shanxi Province—"

The Thousand-Faced Fox froze. He heard nothing more.

They were sending that many reinforcements when their own strongholds might be in danger?

It went against every principle of warfare he had learned. Against plain common sense.

But…

So that's what it was.

The Thousand-Faced Fox smiled bitterly.

Only after the messenger, bearing news he could hardly believe, had left did he break the long silence.

"I understand now. I know the name of the branch I failed to see."

"What is it?"

"Chivalry."

Mae Jonghak smiled gently.

He remembered his younger self, who had sworn to build chivalry through martial arts.

"Never forget again. We're all martial artists."

That day, with the Double Ninth Festival[3471] four days away, two thousand martial artists left the Murim Alliance headquarters and headed north.

[3471] The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month.

Chapter 951

Whoosh…

The sudden downpour sent everything into a flurry of activity.

Birds folded their wings and hurried into the grass. Beasts that had been prowling for food settled inside caves far from human footsteps.

Anything to keep warm beneath the heavy rain that fell without pause.

But the animals that inhabited this vast stretch of grassland would soon realize something: for once, the rain they had never welcomed had saved them from an unseen danger.

Rumble. Rrrumble.

A sudden vibration.

The earth shook. No—it felt as though the entire grassland was trembling.

Hidden in their shelters, the animals instinctively bristled. With the senses they had been born with—their noses, their ears, their eyes—they detected what was coming.

Beyond the rain, so dense they could barely see an inch ahead, countless riders crossed their land.

Splash! Thududududu!

Mud sprayed in every direction. Hooves trampled through puddles of standing water as the horses charged forcefully onward.

At the head of the enormous, seemingly endless column, two men stood out.

“It doesn’t look like it’s going to let up.”

The lean man muttered as he gazed at the sky, then turned to the hulking man riding beside him.

“Temur.”

At the sudden call, Temur flinched.

“Y-yes?”

“We should pick up the pace. If we delay, the whole area will turn into a quagmire.”

“Yes. I suppose so.”

Temur nodded, his voice hoarse. The lean man frowned.

“And?”

“Hm?”

“Is that all?”

“Oh.”

Temur blinked, then realized his mistake. He beckoned, and dozens of cavalrymen armed with bows and lances came galloping over. They bowed their heads.

“What is it, Khan Temur?”

“Tell every commander of a thousand under me: no rest until the rain stops. We move at full speed.”

Temur did his best to sound stern. With a sidelong glance at the lean man, he added, “Anyone who neglects this order will be severely punished in my name and that of Khan Chinggen here.”

“Yes, sir!”

The cavalrymen saluted and scattered in every direction.

Only then did the furrow between Chinggen’s brows ease.

“Good. That’s how it should be. Well done.”

Temur swallowed dryly and nodded.

“Thanks for the praise.”

“Now it’s time for you to do your part as a khan. I can’t stand beside you and give you every little piece of advice forever, can I? Right, my proud brother?”

Tap.

Chinggen patted his armor. Temur gave a start.

“You must be cold. Are you all right?”

“…Of course. Nothing’s wrong.”

“No. I know what’s in your heart better than anyone, brother.”

Chinggen let out a quiet sigh, then suddenly clenched his teeth.

“Those filthy, despicable bastards. Every one I capture, I’ll tear to pieces and throw to the eagles.”

Chinggen’s voice rang through the rain. The nomads racing silently around them, their eyes fixed ahead, flashed killing intent in their eyes beneath their helmets.

Everyone on the grasslands knew of the massacre that had taken place that day.

Temur and Chinggen.

The two young khans had seized the eastern grasslands in a single stroke, bringing peace and prosperity. Each had brought a hundred trusted retainers to their meeting.

Neither had dreamed that the ger[3472] filled with laughter would soon be stained with blood.

“Who could have known those damned Han Chinese were plotting something so terrible?”

The uninvited guests, several hundred strong, had been Han Chinese from the Central Plains—people known as Murim martial artists.

They had burst in at the height of the feast and swung their weapons at anyone in reach.

[3472] A ger is a portable, round dwelling traditionally used by nomadic peoples of the Eurasian steppe.

By the grace of heaven, the two khans had survived. But after a fierce battle, most of their retainers lay in pools of blood.

“My dear brother. If Tengri hadn’t watched over us, the eastern grasslands would have been torn apart in an instant and fallen into the hands of those Han Chinese.”

Chinggen gripped his reins until his knuckles turned white.

“It’s obvious what they were after. They must have judged that we’d become a threat, with each of us commanding a powerful force. At last, they’ve shown the ambition they’d kept hidden.”

At the cold look in Chinggen’s eyes, Temur answered in a voice rough as iron.

“I—I think so too.”

“It wasn’t just us. Everyone on this land was being used by them from the very beginning. Those despicable bastards were planning to seize the entire grassland all along.”

The nomads listening to Chinggen’s seething voice nodded as one.

He was right. The Han Chinese had always been like that.

Since time immemorial, they had called the nomads barbarians, scorned them, and considered them worth less than beasts.

Even after their great ancestors had trampled the Central Plains beneath countless hooves and built a vast empire, that had not changed.

No—their contempt had become hatred.

All because a mere band of barbarians had sullied the history of the continent.

But human beings were creatures of forgetfulness.

As the years passed and their ancestors’ achievements faded from memory, the nomads began to want something new.

Peace instead of conquest.

Gold and silver instead of horse manure.

Perhaps that was why everyone had welcomed Temur and Chinggen with open arms when the two promising young men of the Golden Clan joined forces with the Han Chinese.

“It was my mistake.”

Chinggen lamented as the rain poured down on him.

“I should have thought more deeply about what kind of people they were and why they’d agreed to work with us. Noble warriors of the grasslands died because their leader was ignorant and foolish.”

At the sight of his grief and regret, everyone lowered their heads.

Then a calm, powerful voice spoke.

“If you correct that mistake, the warriors of the grasslands will be welcomed into Tengri’s embrace.”

Chinggen's eyes widened at the sight of a middle-aged man with the distinctive braided hairstyle of the nomads.

"Why is Khan Jamukha here? You should be in the rear…"

"Greetings, Khan Jamukha!"

Cries rose all around them, beginning with Chinggen.

The middle-aged man, Jamukha, swept his gaze over the riders. There was a force in his eyes that none of them could resist.

"It was dull staying in the rear. I thought this old man might be of some help, so I came to see."

His sideburns were as black as night, and his imposing build was sturdier than that of a young man in his prime.

But that was only how he looked. Jamukha was well over eighty years old.

He was the greatest warrior on the grasslands, another khan who had ruled the western grasslands for many years. He had joined the army with more than twenty thousand tribespeople, and in practice, he led this immense force.

"Old man? Who would dare think that of you? Isn't that right, Temur?"

Temur gazed at Jamukha with trembling eyes, then hurriedly nodded.

"Y-yes."

"Khan Jamukha is our elder in the Golden Clan, a great warrior and a khan. We're grateful that you entrusted us with the vanguard."

Chinggen raised his voice so everyone around them could hear.

"Those foolish Han Chinese probably never knew how strong Khan Jamukha was—not even as they were dying."

Chinggen needn't have said a word. The eyes fixed on Jamukha were already full of admiration and reverence.

Jamukha, the greatest warrior on the grasslands.

According to the story, several hundred Han Chinese had attacked him before they attacked Temur and Chinggen.

He had only a dozen or so personal guards with him.

But the outcome had been staggering.

Jamukha had proved his prowess beyond doubt.

With a mere handful of guards—barely a match for the enemy numbers—he had fought a battle against the Han Chinese that was little short of a massacre.

In the end, the Han Chinese plot against the western grasslands had failed. Enraged, Jamukha had led his tribes toward the Central Plains.

Just as he was doing now.

"It was nothing. My men were simply skilled."

Jamukha answered calmly and jerked his chin over his shoulder. His personal guards, clad in dark armor, galloped after him with expressionless faces.

They were the elite warriors created by the great conqueror who had laid the foundations of the nomadic empire in the distant past.

Known as the Keshik, they still followed Jamukha as remnants of the Golden Clan.

Each was as strong as a warrior who represented an entire tribe.

And there were a thousand of them.

The grassland army numbered tens of thousands. Its confidence in victory was not based on hope alone.

“From here on, some of my personal guards will take the vanguard.”

“The Keshik…?”

“Yes. Is there a problem?”

Chinggen fell silent for a moment at Jamukha’s unexpected words, then shook his head.

“Of course not. We would have asked you ourselves. Isn’t that right, Temur?”

“…That’s right. I agree.”

The strongest warriors would lead the charge.

It was a natural decision, and everyone accepted it.

Everyone but one person.

Are you sure that’s wise?

At the sudden Sound Transmission in his ear, Jamukha’s lips moved.

Didn’t you just say you would have asked me yourself?

That was…

I won’t change my mind. We’ll put those children in the vanguard and cross the border in the shortest time possible.

There could be a trap. The place is crawling with fodder to take arrows for us. Why waste precious forces?

What trap? Fire King and Jin Taekyung, who won’t reach Shanxi Province for several days? Or those insignificant Shanxi fools?

Jamukha answered bluntly and stared straight at the source of the Sound Transmission.

Keep that idiot beside you under control. I’m beginning to regret not killing him back then.

I told you we should have kept the smarter one alive instead.

Chinggen—or someone wearing his face—let out a chuckle too faint for anyone to notice and ran a hand over his features.

He was impressive in his own way. Even while his men were dying all around him, he tried to negotiate.

He remembered it clearly.

Beside Temur, who had yielded to the overwhelming difference in strength and even wet himself, Chinggen had stood firm and told them to name what they wanted.

Compared to that dead man, this idiot…

I kept him alive because he's an idiot. Someone who's surrendered deep in his heart is that much easier to handle.

I'll grant you that. Thanks to his cooperation, far more barbarians gathered than I expected.

His amused gaze swept across the vast army filling the grasslands.

Only a little more than a day's travel remained.

When the rain stopped, they would cross the grasslands and go over the walls.

Chapter 952

The Double Ninth Festival[3473] was one of the continent's biggest holidays.

It came when swallows flew south to warmer lands and snakes and frogs burrowed underground to prepare for winter.

At this time of year, people climbed mountains, drank chrysanthemum wine, recited poetry, and enjoyed the scenery.

Commoners who lived from one day's wages to the next did it. So did high officials who wanted for nothing, and martial artists who lived in the turbulent martial world.

"Do you remember?"

A voice sounded suddenly behind him.

The young man gazing at the field of bright yellow chrysanthemums showed no surprise. He had known who was there for some time.

"Remember what?"

Jin Mukyung asked without taking his eyes off the flowers. A familiar presence came to stand beside him.

"Five years ago, when the three of us climbed the hill behind the house and spent the Double Ninth Festival[3474] together. We had such a wonderful time."

"…You mean the Double Ninth Festival[3475] ten years ago?"

Jin Wikyung looked hurt at his younger brother's doubtful response.

"Goodness. You don't even remember anymore?"

"I remember. I asked because your version sounds quite different from mine."

"Different?"

"Taekyung, that reckless fool, got completely drunk and caused a scene. It wasn't exactly a pleasant time."

Jin Wikyung tilted his head.

"Really? You looked like you were enjoying yourself when you beat him with your scabbard."

"I wasn't smiling. I was disciplining my own flesh and blood to set him on the right path."

"Then why were you grinning from ear to ear?"

Jin Mukyung fell silent.

Come to think of it, perhaps he had been smiling.

[3473] The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month.
[3474] The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month.
[3475] The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month.

His youngest brother was always causing trouble, and their eldest brother doted on him. When an excuse to punish Taekyung finally presented itself, how could Mukyung not smile?

Of course, that was long ago. Only a small fragment of the day remained in his memory.

“The youngest bawled like the sky had fallen, and you didn’t touch your food. You just started training. You went off into the woods, away from everyone, and swung your sword until sunset. I can still picture you as clearly as if it were yesterday.”

“I don’t remember that, but I’m sure I did.”

Jin Mukyung’s reply was matter-of-fact.

Training was a matter of course for him. He had held a sword since childhood and practiced wherever he was, whenever he could.

Five years ago, the last time the three brothers of the Jin Family of Taiyuan had spent the Double Ninth Festival[3476] together, Mukyung had already reached the Peak realm, though he was barely twenty.

“I still remember the day you left home.”

“Ah.”

Jin Mukyung smacked his lips. He remembered Wikyung coming to see him off with a swollen face, as though he had spent the previous night crying.

“Do you… do you really have to go?”

“Yes. I really do.”

“Even if your older brother begs you to stay?”

“Not a chance.”

“What’s so special about Heaven’s Gate Temple that you’d abandon your family and go all the way to a distant land?”

“Even disciples of the great sects wait years to get into that Heaven’s Gate Temple you’re dismissing.”

“All right. If that’s what you want, I’ll escort you to Henan myself.”

“…You’re serious?”

“There’s something I need to tell the Hall Master in person.”

“What on earth would you tell him?”

“Just a few important precautions he absolutely needs to know. Some foods you hate, your habits… Mukyung! Where are you going, Mukyung!”

He had run. With every last bit of strength he had.

It was the first time in his life he had put so much effort into his movement technique.

[3476] The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month.

Jin Mukyung had only wanted to grow stronger at Heaven's Gate Temple. He'd never had the slightest intention of earning the distinction of being its shortest-lived expelled cadet.

"I still remember your back as you left, covering your eyes with your sleeve to hide your sobs."

"…"

Jin Mukyung quietly closed his mouth.

Some truths were more beautiful left untold. That he had raised his sleeve to shield his eyes from the dust, for instance. Or that he had run to escape his overzealous brother.

Before he knew it, a quiet laugh escaped him.

"Why are you laughing?"

"It's nothing. Just…"

Jin Mukyung managed to stop laughing and turned his head.

There was the face he remembered from about two years ago, when he had left once more to enter seclusion with no end in sight. Wikyung had watched him go with worry in his eyes.

Just as he was looking at him now.

"I laughed because I'm glad to see you. You haven't changed at all, older brother."

"Mukyung, you…"

"I'm glad everything is still the same."

He had spent a little over two years in pitch-black darkness.

He had kept hunger at bay with bitter, astringent fasting pills and quenched his thirst with dew and rainwater collected in the training hall deep inside the cave.

And whenever he swung his sword until he collapsed from exhaustion, sprawled on the cold ground, a thought would come to him.

Where was this place? Who was he?

If he ever left that darkness, what would be waiting for him?

"Part of me was afraid, too. Afraid that the world I knew, the people I knew, would have changed beyond recognition."

He had been half right and half wrong.

Everything around him had changed. The people he knew had not.

Surely that included his troublemaking youngest brother, wherever he was now.

"The day that brat left the family, he came to see me and said something."

Mukyung had turned their conversation over in his mind thousands of times. No, tens of thousands. Taekyung's voice, unusually calm that day, still lingered in his ears.

"See you later."

It had not been a simple farewell.

The Star-Array Grand Banquet.

Taekyung had challenged him to meet there, among the countless stars from the Nine Provinces and Eight Wastes[3477] and the Four Seas and Five Lakes[3478], and test their skills alongside Cheongpung.

As brothers born of the same mother. As martial artists.

After Taekyung left, Mukyung had stood staring at the empty space he had occupied and murmured the answer he had failed to give him.

Yeah. See you later. I promise.

But that promise had never been kept.

In that place, where he could not even feel time passing, Jin Mukyung swung his sword without rest. He slashed, stabbed, and tore through what lay beyond the pitch-black darkness.

Whenever he opened his eyes to something new, another wall rose before him.

He had to get over it. Break through it.

With the unkept promise tucked away in a corner of his heart, Jin Mukyung pressed on.

Until he found a faint light in the darkness.

Until that light grew as clear as the sun.

At last, he came back into the world.

He left behind the darkness that had enveloped him for two years and emerged into a world filled with another kind.

"Hyung."[3479]

Jin Mukyung called softly and looked his own flesh and blood straight in the eyes.

There was light in his gaze, and a directness that made it impossible to lie to him.

"Now tell me what I must do."

"…!"

"No. Give me an order, as the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

For a moment, Jin Wikyung's eyes trembled.

"You knew…?"

Jin Mukyung nodded.

The Jin Family of Taiyuan now stood at the head of Shanxi Murim. With the Family Head missing, Jin Wikyung led them all as its Alliance Leader.

Shanxi Province was already at war.

Li Feng, a lay disciple of Huashan and Shanxi Province's Assistant Military Commissioner, had mobilized every force at the Shanxi Provincial Office to [3477] The Nine Provinces and Eight Wastes is a literary expression for the whole world, from its settled regions to its farthest reaches.

[3478] The Four Seas and Five Lakes is a traditional expression for lands far and wide.

[3479] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

evacuate the people in the north. Some five thousand martial artists had gathered in the central region.

Every moment mattered.

Wikyung had not come looking for him solely to reunite with the brother who had emerged from seclusion after two years.

“Just as you know me well, hyung,[3480] I know you.”

“This will be a dangerous mission.”

“I don’t mind.”

Jin Mukyung went on calmly.

“I learned martial arts because I loved the sword. But I wanted to grow stronger for our family.”

Only great strength could restore a fallen martial family.

His sword had carried more than a passion for martial arts all these years.

“Jin Mukyung, Second Young Master of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. I will devote myself to carrying out the Lesser Family Head’s orders.”

His younger brother cupped his hands in a salute, his voice unwavering. Jin Wikyung slowly closed his eyes.

After a brief hesitation, he opened them again. He was no longer speaking as Mukyung’s older brother, but as the Alliance Leader of Shanxi Murim and the Lesser Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

“From this moment on, you are neither the Second Young Master of the Jin Family of Taiyuan nor the Lesser Family Head’s younger brother.”

He released the breath he had been holding.

Then Wikyung looked calmly at his brother—no, his retainer—and continued.

“I command Jin Mukyung, Commander of the Heaven Shaking Squad.”

Jin Mukyung, the Heaven Shaking Sword.

About five years ago, a young prodigy from the frontier had reached the Peak realm at barely twenty and earned a new epithet. His only older brother had named a fighting force after it.

He had hoped Mukyung would one day return to this place.

And with the wish that, just like the two characters in Heaven Shaking, his name would one day resound beyond the world and reach the heavens.

“The enemy vanguard that invaded the north has split off some of its troops and is taking a detour to avoid Jeongyang. Take two hundred men from the Heaven Shaking Squad and blunt their vanguard.”

Jin Mukyung smiled.

“As you command.”

[3480] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

The next day.

The vast steppe army entered the north without resistance. What awaited it was not chrysanthemums but dark-red blood covering the mountain slopes—and one terrified survivor of its vanguard.

“K-Khan…”

Jamukha stared silently at the man trembling like a leaf.

He knew at once that the thousand-man vanguard sent into Shanxi Province half a day ahead of the main force had been wiped out. The lone surviving fool had been sent back with a warning for the invaders.

“H-he told me to give you this, Khan…”

Slide. Thump.

The cloth slipped from his trembling fingers. The head of a Keshik centurion rolled out of the blood-soaked bundle.

Jamukha looked down at it in silence.

“Is that all?”

“He left a message. A message…”

His queue[3481] had come loose, and terror filled his face.

“He said, ‘Even five years from now, my brothers and I will climb the mountain together and spend the Double Ninth Festival[3482]—‘”

“Bullshit.”

Shhk.

Jamukha struck without a moment’s hesitation. The man’s severed head rolled into the chrysanthemum field.

As Jamukha gazed at the flowers, now so red their original color was gone, Chinggen smacked his lips.

“Why not hear the rest? We don’t even know who he was.”

“Does that matter?”

The thousand-man vanguard had been annihilated.

No. What mattered was that all hundred Keshik among them had died in a single battle.

“Either way… we’ll meet soon enough.”

Jamukha stared south, his voice low.

At that moment, a thought suddenly crossed his mind.

This war was supposed to be overwhelming and one-sided. It might not be as easy as he had imagined.

[3481] A queue is a hairstyle in which the hair is gathered into a long braid.

[3482] The Double Ninth Festival falls on the ninth day of the ninth lunar month.

Chapter 953

When dozens or hundreds of people fought tangled together, it was a battle.

But when the numbers grew to thousands, tens of thousands, it could no longer be called a battle.

It was war.

A war in which both sides threw everything they had into the fight.

And Jin Wikyung had no intention of staking everything he had on a single gamble.

“Jin Mukyung, Commander of the Heaven Shaking Squad, reporting to the Lesser Family Head.”

His voice was calm, though his whole body was soaked in blood.

Mukyung had left at noon and returned only around midnight. He looked like a blood demon.

So did his men, whose squad took its name from his epithet, the Heaven Shaking Sword.

But their proud strides and bright, fierce eyes were proof of the Jin Family of Taiyuan’s first victory.

“By your command, we broke the enemy’s vanguard and returned.”

Mukyung went on with his report.

Of the slightly more than two hundred men in the Heaven Shaking Squad, twenty-three had died and thirty-seven had suffered injuries, serious or minor.

Several of the senior leaders grew somber at the news. In a single battle, the Jin Family of Taiyuan had lost sixty men from an elite force it had devoted itself to raising alongside the Jin Dragon Squad. But the rest of Mukyung’s report swept even that brief sorrow away.

A thousand.

They had annihilated an enemy vanguard five times their number.

And among them had been a hundred of the enemy’s elite troops.

“Waaaah!”

Everyone who had been listening in tense silence cheered at once.

Their first victory against the enemy.

An overwhelming victory, beyond any dispute.

Yet even as excitement surged around him, Jin Wikyung kept his composure.

This is only the beginning.

He knew it.

War was like building a sandcastle. You had to scoop up sand and pile it on, again and again, before it was complete.

And even a sandcastle built with such care could collapse from a single hard kick.

But if we build it solidly enough to withstand that kick, it's another story.

Fortunately, the Jin Family of Taiyuan's preparations had been thorough despite the little time they'd had.

By now, the grassland army—likely crossing the Great Wall and passing through northern Shanxi Province—must have been bewildered.

First, by the news that its vanguard, which included its finest troops, had been wiped out.

And then by finding the north truly empty.

You won't find a thing to take there.

It wasn't only the people who had left the north.

Wikyung had withdrawn all the troops and commoners and ordered every field, though harvest was near, burned.

A scorched-earth strategy.

Against an army of tens of thousands, it was an excellent tactic. Even so, Wikyung had agonized over the decision dozens of times—until Assistant Military Commissioner Li Feng of Shanxi Province and several hundred others came to him of their own accord.

"We have several tens of thousands of seok[3483] of provisions in reserve. We can more than handle their food supply."

With Zhu Bao and Hong Jin absent, Li Feng was effectively the highest-ranking official at the Shanxi Provincial Office. He promised his full cooperation.

"Just burn the whole damn lot."

The people of the north who had been forced to leave their homes overnight—or rather, their village headmen—were already half blind with rage.

"Those damn bastards. They come raiding and raising hell all the time, and now they want to take what's growing in our fields, too?"

"Everyone in our village has already agreed. If even one grain of rice gets into those barbarian bastards' mouths, I'll be torn to pieces."

"I'd sooner feed rice to the cows and pigs. I won't stand for those bastards eating it, even when I'm dead!"

"Shit. If anyone objects, step forward now. I don't care who you are—open your mouth and I'll take you for a barbarian, shave your head, and give you a queue.[3484]"

"Hey, Mr. Song! Why aren't you saying anything? You got honey spread over your fields?"

[3483] A seok is a traditional Korean measure of grain, roughly 180 L (48 US gal), though its size varied by period.

[3484] A queue is a hairstyle with the front of the head shaved and the remaining hair braided, associated with Manchu rule in China.

Mr. Song, the village headman who had said nothing at all, earned everyone's applause with a single suggestion.

"Don't just set fires. Let's poison the wells."

"…!"

"It'd be even better if we took a dump and pissed in the stream before we left."

"What's the shit and piss for?"

"It'll dirty the water. You think those bastards will be fine after gulping down water mixed with shit and piss?"

"Good heavens! How did you come up with a plan like that…?"

"I tried it once. Drank about half a gallon. Thought I was going to die."

