“I’ll come to the headquarters myself. When I open the conference room door and walk in, I want all the executives—including you, Vice President Park—to be there.”

“P-please wait. I still need more time…”

“Six o’clock this evening. You still have three hours, so that should be plenty of time. Goodbye.”

Click.

What the hell was that?

I stared dumbfounded at Team Leader Choi as he hung up without hesitation. He spoke as though nothing unusual had happened.

“You heard the conversation, so I assume you have a rough idea of the situation. Let’s go.”

“Right now? Leaving everything else aside, you said there are still three hours.”

“I’m holding a press conference too.”

“…What?”

“It’s going to be a busy day. We’ve waited a long time. Once you draw your sword, you have to swing it like lightning.”

Chapter 601

Repairs were underway at Ares Guild headquarters.

Inside the conference room, the mood was grim.

Some thirty men and women sat around a massive round table, their somber eyes fixed on the man speaking.

"…And that is why I called this emergency meeting."

Vice President Park Daewon had barely finished when objections erupted from all sides.

"Well, well. They must think very little of us. And it's a brat who isn't even thirty."

"His intentions couldn't be more obvious. He means to swallow Ares whole."

"No, hyung[2713]. Why would you call an emergency meeting at the request of an outsider who has no authority? Even if you are the Vice President, this is going too far."

As the complaints came at him, Park wiped his half-bald forehead with a handkerchief.

Nearing sixty, he found the whole situation bewildering.

How on earth did it come to this?

He had distinguished himself in battle, but political infighting had never been his strength. Fortunately, he was the sort of man who made no enemies, and that had allowed him to keep his largely ceremonial position as Vice President.

Then, ten days ago, while taking a vacation ahead of his retirement, he had heard news he could hardly believe.

Ares Guild headquarters had been crushed by a single person, and Go Jun, the Vice Guild Master, had been murdered.

That can't be true.

For the first ten minutes, at least, that was what Park had thought.

But every bit of it had been true. The impregnable fortress they had spent some thirty years building had fallen, and its newly appointed City Lord had lost his head before he had even settled into office.

And the retainers who had narrowly escaped the prosecutors' office were voicing their grievances in unison.

"This is absurd! We don't have to listen to such nonsense."

"We created the name Ares, and we were the ones who protected it. What right does some outsider—some bloody brat who still doesn't know how the world works—have to interfere?"

"Vice President Park, this really isn't right!"

[2713] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

"…"

Park Daewon silently took a long drink from his glass of water.

Everyone gathered here had spent at least ten years with Ares Guild; some had been with it for more than thirty. Most of those who held real power in the Guild had been summoned by the prosecutors' office, but the executives in this room were far from powerless.

…But we can't ignore him, either.

Park Daewon knew all about Choi Minwoo.

No, he couldn't not know. Cheon Taemin's private life and family relationships had been protected with the utmost care, but things were different for the few people classified as his close associates. Park, a founding member of the Guild, was one of them.

I first saw him at his doljabi[2714]. The funeral was the last time…wasn't it?

The child who had slowly faded from his memory had grown up and returned to reclaim what he had lost long ago.

Park had spent his life going along with whatever happened around him, but this troubled him. He knew it was only a shallow sense of guilt for turning away from Choi Minwoo when the boy had been shut out of the Guild entirely.

What should I do?

While Park Daewon was lost in thought, a short, powerful voice rang through the noisy conference room.

"I was going to see how far you'd take this, but it's getting more ridiculous by the minute. I can't listen to any more."

"…!"

"…!"

A chill silence fell over the conference room. Eyes widened, and every gaze turned toward the speaker.

"Managing Director Kim, what kind of outrageous statement was that?"

"Managing Director, my ass. Hey, Kim Gwangpil! What the hell are you talking about?"

The silence broke into angry shouts. Managing Director Kim shrugged his broad shoulders.

"Am I wrong? I called it ridiculous because it is. And Executive Director Baek, watch your language. I may be your junior, but I don't care to be spoken to like that."

"Just you wait, you traitorous bastard…"

Kim's thick eyebrows twitched.

[2714] Doljabi is a Korean first-birthday custom in which a child chooses from objects laid out before them. The choice is traditionally taken as a sign of the child's future.

"What did you call me?"

"A traitor, you bastard! If it weren't for traitors like you, we wouldn't be in this goddamn mess!"

"Wasn't it the people on Executive Director Baek's side who acted like animals? We can figure that out simply by seeing who's in the detention center right now."

"What?"

"You seemed awfully bothered that a few executives and I joined Jin Taekyung. But in the end, what kind of shit was the Vice Guild Master—no, what was that man Go Jun—up to? Or did you have a hand in it too, Executive Director Baek?"

"You—you bastard…!"

"Hey, Managing Director Kim! Watch your mouth!"

"You're the ones who need to watch your mouths!"

"Exactly!"

"How dare you!"

The room split into two factions, furious shouts flying back and forth. Then Park Daewon, who had remained silent, spoke up.

"Strictly speaking, he isn't an outsider."

The executives stopped short.

"What?"

"Vice President Park, what did you just…?"

"I'm talking about Choi Minwoo."

Park slowly looked around at the thirty-odd executives.

"Isn't he Guild Master Cheon Taemin's only maternal grandson?"

"…!"

"…!"

He had touched on the one thing they had all been avoiding, and the room fell silent. Kim Gwangpil's faction brightened at once. The faces of those who had spent the meeting complaining went ashen.

"B-but that's only a rumor, isn't it?"

"Th-that's right, hyung[2715]. No one's confirmed it."

Word of Choi Minwoo's identity had been spreading quietly since the Small Cataclysm. They weren't so much ignorant as pretending to be.

Park, at least, had no need to pretend.

"No. I'm certain. Unless my memory fails me, he is that person's maternal grandson. And…"

Before anyone could object, Park set his smartphone on the table.

"It seems he's decided to tell the world himself."

[2715] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

“What do you mean…?”

“Argue with each other all you like, but you should have checked what was happening outside. Especially since you barred the secretaries you brought from coming in. Wouldn’t you agree?”

Several executives seemed to realize what he meant. They hurriedly pulled out their phones.

Within a minute, startled gasps sounded around the room. A reporter’s urgent voice played from dozens of speakers.

> “M-Mr. Choi Minwoo! Could you tell us your maternal grandfather’s full name once more?”

Another voice followed, filling the conference room.

> “The Cheon character, the Tae character, and the Min character. Cheon Taemin. He is my maternal grandfather.”

> “…!”

> “…!”

The ceaseless camera flashes and the surrounding murmur vanished in an instant, both at the press conference shown in the video and inside the conference room.

Everyone had suspected it. But hearing that suspicion confirmed and announced to the world had an impact none of them had imagined.

All the more so when it concerned the only blood relative of Cheon Taemin, a man about whom everything was shrouded in mystery.

At the same moment, everyone in the room understood.

He’s finally drawn his sword.

After more than twenty years in what had amounted to exile, the royal grandson had returned. At the perfect moment, he had drawn the sharpest blade he possessed to reclaim what he had lost by his own strength.

The question was where he would swing it—and at whom.

Gulp.

No one could bring themselves to speak easily. As time passed in an atmosphere where an invisible thread of tension had been pulled taut, the room filled with faint whispers.

Then—

Beep.

Every head turned at the faint electronic sound. It had come from the clock on the conference room wall.

The current time shone in red LEDs, like a warning.

PM 06:00

Six o'clock.

The time they had gathered for. The time someone was due to arrive.

Step. Step.

Everyone heard shoes crossing the hallway outside the door, and without realizing it, they reflexively rose from their seats.

And then…

Click.

The door opened smoothly, revealing two people.

"You're all here early."

"Oh, they fixed this place already. I think I broke it last time."

The occupying force had arrived: one polite, one rude, and neither to be avoided.

When I was little, my father used to tell me, "Son, once a man draws his sword, he has to cut at least a radish."

By that measure, Team Leader Choi was a man among men. He had come to cut up Ares Guild, not a radish.

"…"

Come to think of it, I had already cut it down once myself. But still.

"Nice to meet you. I'm Choi Minwoo."

Team Leader Choi gave a polite bow, and the Ares Guild executives standing around the table awkwardly returned it.

Some looked as if the world would end in three seconds. Others wore broad smiles. I recognized them: they were the executives from Song Cheonwoo's faction who had sided with me when I attacked headquarters.

One person was harder to read.

The elderly middle-aged man seated at the head of the table was Vice President Park Daewon.

"Welcome, Team Leader Choi Minwoo."

Team Leader Choi studied his conflicted expression, then nodded.

"I hope I'm not late. The press conference ran longer than I expected. I apologize for keeping you waiting."

Judging by their faces, they'd all watched the live broadcast. About half of them didn't seem to think they'd got their money's worth from the license fee.

"Not at all. Before we begin, please have a seat…"

"That won't be necessary."

Team Leader Choi gently stopped Park from offering him a place.

"This won't take long. And since the others still think of me as an outsider, I wouldn't want to make them uncomfortable by drawing it out."

"…Ahem."

Awkward coughs came from around the table. Team Leader Choi paid them no mind as he looked over the room.

"I see five empty seats. Where are the three advisers and the directors of the United States and France branches?"

A middle-aged man with a prickly appearance answered with an uncomfortable expression.

"You seem very interested in our people."

"I have a good memory, Executive Director Baek."

"…"

Baek fell silent. One of the executives who had sided with me ten days ago answered promptly.

"They didn't come."

"Something unavoidable must have kept them away. Is that right?"

"The three advisers cited illness. As I understand it, the two branch directors refused to attend."

"I specifically told them to attend. It seems my wishes weren't conveyed properly."

Team Leader Choi muttered this calmly, and Executive Director Baek spoke again.

"This isn't an official meeting. We gathered at an outsider's request. No one was obliged to attend, even if that outsider…"

After hesitating for a moment, he continued in a distinctly quieter voice.

"…is that person's maternal grandson."

"You're right."

Team Leader Choi nodded in agreement, then took a small note from inside his clothes and handed it over.

"What's this?"

"A prescription for the advisers who are ill. Ah, the other two branch directors will receive something other than a prescription."

I had a feeling the advisers who'd used illness as an excuse would recover the moment they saw that note. It listed the crimes they'd committed that hadn't come to light yet.

Baek read it and swallowed hard.

“Th-this…”

“You don’t look well yourself, Executive Director Baek. Would you like a prescription too?”

“N-no! What are you talking about? I’m fine!”

I stood with my arms crossed, watching the situation, and muttered.

“Wasn’t that ‘I’m fine’ a bit too casual?”

“I—I’m quite well.”

One Hundred and One Ways to Kill Without a Sound, by Jin Taekyung.

“I—I’m perfectly fine, sir.”

Hmm. The man could take a hint. I glanced at him as he stood there swallowing nervously, then turned to Team Leader Choi.

“Can’t we sit down and talk? My legs hurt.”

“Well, there isn’t really a suitable seat…”

I helpfully pointed toward the head of the table before he could finish.

“There. That one’s empty.”

“Oh, I see. But would it be all right for me to sit there?”

“Let’s put it to a vote. Majority rules. Anyone opposed? Hands?”

“…”

No one raised a hand.

Chapter 602

A whip could be an effective way to make someone do what you wanted. It could also make them resent you. Team Leader Choi knew exactly how to use the one in his hand.

“Director Hong.”

From his seat at the head of the table, Team Leader Choi called on one of the youngest executives. Hong answered, his face tense.

“Yes, yes.”

“I’ve heard a great deal about you, Director Hong. They say you’re exceptionally capable.”

“Oh, no. I’ve just been lucky…”

“Luck alone doesn’t make someone an Ares Guild executive. Especially not at your age. Wouldn’t you agree?”

“…”

Team Leader Choi’s tone and voice were gentle, but an unmistakable anxiety appeared on Director Hong’s face. And there was bound to be a reason why Team Leader Choi had singled out one person from among dozens of executives.

“I grew up overseas, so it was hard to fit in at first. But people live there too, after all. One by one, I made friends.”

Exiled or not, he was still the royal grandson. Team Leader Choi had lived a life worlds apart from that of an ordinary guy like me. His connections went further than I could imagine.

“Some of those friends get in touch now and then with news. I’ve heard some interesting things about you too, Director Hong.”

“…Have you?”

“Yes. Nothing but praise. The same goes for the rest of you, of course.”

Each time Team Leader Choi’s calm gaze moved, the executive who met it flinched as if burned. None of them was stupid enough to take his words at face value.

Leave water standing long enough and it rots.

Ares Guild was one of the largest organizations in the world. An executive position there came with astronomical wealth and prestige.

How many people at this table were clean as fresh water? They hadn’t avoided a summons from the prosecutors’ office because they were spotless. They were just clean enough to pass for third-grade water.

The sewage, and those with filth floating in them, were already having a reunion in the detention center.

“Are you feeling unwell? You’re breaking out in a cold sweat.”

Director Hong wiped his forehead. “Oh, no. It’s just a little hot.”

"There must be a problem with the temperature-control Magic. You should have it fixed."

Magic kept the conference room at a comfortable temperature, but half the executives were breathing as if they'd stepped into a steam room. They had all seen the whip tucked up Team Leader Choi's sleeve. He didn't have to swing it. A glimpse was enough to put pressure on them.

There was, of course, an exception.

"I can't listen to any more of this."

The speaker was a middle-aged man with irritable eyes and a sparse white beard. He tapped thick knuckles on the round table.

"Are you seriously threatening us?"

"You're Director Kim, in charge of the Asian region."

Team Leader Choi rubbed his chin. "Is that how it feels?"

"What if it did?"

"I won't deny it. It's true."

"What?"

"I said it's true. I'm threatening you, and I intend to make Ares Guild mine."

He added gently, "With everyone's consent, of course. Legally."

"A lizard thinks it can swallow a dinosaur."

Director Kim looked between Team Leader Choi and me and gave a short laugh.

"You two are young, and it shows. Do you think Ares Guild is a joke?"

I nodded, looking interested. "Hmm. A little?"

"…"

That seemed to leave him at a loss. After a brief silence, he went on.

"Headquarters fell. That doesn't mean the whole of Ares Guild is helpless. No matter how strong you are, do you think you can take on all of us?"

He had a point. Ares Guild had branches all over the world, and the forces at headquarters were only a fraction of its strength. Even I couldn't subdue them all on my own.

But…

"So what?"

At my question, bewilderment flashed across Director Kim's face.

"What?"

"What, asshole?"

"Asshole?"

"You fucking bastard, I ought to—"

"…Huh?"

What the hell is this guy doing? His face said it all.

I raised my fist. Director Kim instinctively edged his chair back and blinked.

"What… what is this?"

"What does it look like? I'm about to fuck you up."

"You're going to use force? Now? Here?"

"Should I use my brains instead? It's depressing enough how little I've got to work with."

"But… that would be illegal."

"Was it legal when I took Go Jun's head off ten days ago?"

"…!"

"Something will work out. I've already sent a few people to the grave. Who's going to complain if I add one more? Right?"

Team Leader Choi smacked his lips. "This is a different matter. Someone might complain."

"Things have been going pretty well for me lately, but even I couldn't stay out of prison, could I?"

"That's right. But given how favorable the public image and public opinion surrounding Mr. Jin Taekyung are at present, if things go well, you might be able to settle for a few years."

"Right. What if I was drunk?"

"Are you a genius? That would cut the sentence considerably."

"Come to think of it, I've been through so much lately that I might have diminished mental capacity."

"Oh, you could even aim for a suspended sentence."

What a wonderful country. Get drunk, claim diminished mental capacity, and they'd throw in a generous sentence reduction.

The man listening to our hopeful discussion had gone ashen.

"You… you lunatics."

"I thought you knew. You didn't know I was a lunatic?"

"…!"

"Then watch yourself. We're trying to do this the nice way. Why are you the only one making trouble?"

It was only talk, of course.

What mattered was how it sounded to him. I was the madman who had gone berserk, smashed up Ares Guild headquarters, and killed people without a thought for the consequences. Right now, even a joke from me would sound like a threat.

If the whip doesn't work, you need one hell of a strong whip.

The one man who had come close to openly dissenting pressed his lips together. Vice President Park Daewon, who had been watching quietly, spoke up.

"I understand what the two of you want. As for Team Leader Choi Minwoo returning to Ares Guild… I support it in my capacity as Vice President."

"V-Vice President."

"Why? Is there a problem?"

"Well, that…"

Startled voices came from around the table. But the tide had turned, and Team Leader Choi offered them the carrot he had prepared.

"If the rest of you accept Vice President Park Daewon's opinion, Ares Guild will stabilize quickly. The vacancies created by this incident will soon be filled as well."

"…What are you saying?"

"Whatever has happened up to now, I have no intention of discounting your abilities. Once things settle down, there will be major personnel changes."

I could practically see the rabbits' ears perk up as they recognized the carrot.

If Ares Guild changed hands, its existing executives had the most to lose. Take away that worry and promise them promotions instead, and things looked very different.

No reason to refuse.

Besides, Team Leader Choi had nothing to disqualify him. Quite the opposite. He was more than qualified, which was why he could speak with such quiet confidence.

"I'll put everything that has happened until now behind me. I'll quickly stabilize the Guild, restore its tarnished image, and use this incident as a stepping stone to make it grow even larger."

No one questioned him now. It wasn't only the carrot. They knew what Team Leader Choi could do.

In barely half a year, he had brought Peace Guild to where it stood today. I'd played a key role in that, sure. But without his eye for people, his ability to run an organization, and his political skill, there would be no Peace Guild as it was now.

And there was something else.

He's Cheon Taemin's only blood descendant.

Dynasties had vanished from this country long ago, but Cheon Taemin's name belonged to the realm of the divine.

The bloodline of the man who saved humanity carried its own power and nobility. No chaebol[2716] group, however wealthy, and no dynasty that had ever existed could claim to stand above Team Leader Choi.

And a title like that was bound to carry tremendous influence, especially within Ares Guild.

"Hmm."

[2716] Chaebol is a Korean term for a large, family-controlled business conglomerate.

Low groans rose from various parts of the conference room. They knew it too. Lee Jungryong and Go Jun had been nothing more than usurpers, while Team Leader Choi—with undeniable legitimacy and ability—was the one suited to become the new City Lord.

Scrape.

The sound of chairs broke the silence. More than ten executives stood. They had been in the same boat since ten days ago, and they bowed respectfully to Team Leader Choi without hesitation, as though they had been waiting for this moment.

"…!"

The tide was with us now. The others had seen the whip and the carrot. It was time to choose.

One by one, the watching executives rose.

Scrape. Scrape.

Amid the sounds of shifting chairs, I sent a Sound Transmission to the last two holdouts.

—Oh, for fuck's sake…

"…!"

"…!"

Executive Director Baek and Director Kim shuddered as though they'd been electrocuted. Then they got to their feet on trembling legs and bowed.

Only one executive remained seated.

Vice President Park Daewon.

Under the gazes of Team Leader Choi and me, he finally rose quietly from his seat. An aged voice slipped through his dry lips.

"Do you know I'll be retiring soon?"

Team Leader Choi calmly nodded, and Vice President Park Daewon muttered softly.

"Then this will be my last task."

"If you wish, I can arrange for you to stay longer."

"No. I'm sorry I failed to look after you all these years… and thank you for coming back."

Of everyone in the room, Park had been with Ares Guild the longest. That also meant he had turned away from Team Leader Choi the longest.

He looked at Team Leader Choi, conflicting emotions plain on his face, then bowed respectfully. His next words brought it all to an end.

"I'll convene an official board meeting, Young Master."

"…!"

A glint passed through Team Leader Choi's eyes.

Surrounded by some thirty retainers, he was already the City Lord in all but name.

Chapter 603

It's over.

Thud.

Baek Hanseong, the occupant of the Phoenix Chair, gave a bitter smile as he set down the report.

Submitted personally by the director of the NIS[2717], it contained a complete account of Choi Minwoo's movements the day before: the press conference held immediately after the national funeral, and the mood inside Ares Guild during its emergency meeting.

I didn't expect him to move this quickly.

Baek had already known the secret of Choi Minwoo's birth. He simply hadn't expected Minwoo to reveal it to everyone at such a perfect moment.

No. More accurately, he hadn't expected Ares Guild's executives to accept a new City Lord so easily.

That's how much Cheon Taemin's bloodline means to them.

Cheon Taemin was a hero who symbolized humanity itself. No matter how much filth the recent incidents had smeared across Ares Guild, the power of his name remained undiminished. No media outlet or celebrity dared touch a man they regarded as sacrosanct.

But that wasn't the only reason Choi Minwoo had been able to build Peace Guild into what it was today and secure the support of Ares Guild's executives.

Jin Taekyung.

Fearless, approachable, devoted. A young hero drawing closer, step by step, to Cheon Taemin's once-unrivaled reputation.

As long as he stood beside Choi Minwoo, nothing could stop the two of them. Not even if the country's most powerful politicians, chaebol[2718] corporations, and major Guilds joined forces.

"Mr. President."

Baek looked up at his chief secretary's voice.

"What is it?"

"The Guild Association is asking to see you."

Just what he least wanted to hear.

Representing the country's ten largest Guilds, the association had been watching Ares Guild for an opening ever since the Go Jun incident. They had cooperated so readily with the government not out of any desire for justice or a cleaner society, but to pick through the fallen castle's ruins for treasure.

[2717] NIS is South Korea's National Intelligence Service.

[2718] A chaebol is a large, family-controlled South Korean business conglomerate.

And they would have, if not for Choi Minwoo.

Minwoo was young, capable, and had legitimacy on his side. If he became Vice Guild Master, Ares Guild would rebuild. His and Jin Taekyung's good reputations could wash the filth from its name.

Opposition from the Guild Association was only to be expected. The problem was that they wanted Baek to reward their contributions and repay their favors.

Baek Hanseong muttered bitterly, "Not one of them knows how to behave."

"Excuse me?"

"Nothing. Put the matter of the Guild Association on hold for now."

"Mr. President, I'm sorry to say this, but their requests have been coming in without pause…"

"I said put it on hold."

The chief secretary flinched at his quiet voice, bowed, and left.

Once the door closed, Baek rubbed his tired eyes. One problem after another had worn him down, body and mind. He even found himself craving the cigarettes he had given up after his election.

But nicotine and tar weren't what he needed. He needed a solution—a way to untangle the problems knotted together like the Gordian knot of myth.

And the quickest, surest place to find one wasn't the Blue House.[2719]

Is this really the only way?

With a heavy heart, Baek pressed the button beneath his chair. Barely ten seconds later, the security officers waiting in the next room hurried in and bowed.

"I was thinking of getting some fresh air. Would that be all right?"

The head of the Presidential Security Service answered calmly. "Of course, Mr. President. Do you have a destination in mind?"

A destination.

Baek looked out the window.

"Peace Guild. Let's go to Peace Guild."

I'd been wondering why the Guild was so quiet today. The moment I left the training room at Team Leader Choi's summons and stepped inside, I found out.

"You're here, Hunter Jin Taekyung."

"…Why are you here again?"

Baek Hanseong gave my heartfelt question a weary smile.

"I've been asking myself the same thing. Still, it's good to see you again after so long."

[2719] The Blue House was the office and residence of South Korea's president.

"Sure."

I wasn't sure fifteen days counted as so long, but I pulled out a chair and sat down. Baek was turning a cigarette over in his fingers, so I added, "This is a no-smoking area."

"I know. I quit a year ago."

He rubbed at the dark circles beneath his eyes. "But lately… I've been wondering whether I should start again."

He must have had a rough time. He looked ten years older than when I'd last seen him.

I gave him a sympathetic look and patted his shoulder.

"I get that, but I'm telling you, this is a no-smoking area."

"…"

"So what brings you here?"

The question was a formality. The middle-aged man in front of me was the President. He wasn't the guy from the neighborhood bakery, free to drop by whenever he liked. There weren't many reasons for him to come in person, especially now.

Sure enough, Baek gave a humorless little laugh.

"I think you both already know."

Team Leader Choi spoke calmly. "The Guild Association's opposition must be fierce."

"It isn't only the Guild Association. But the politicians and business leaders have chosen to stand back for now."

"They'll move once they see which way the scales tip."

"Exactly. The Guild industry has the most at stake here." Baek sighed. "As you know, they're afraid of another Ares Guild."

Ares Guild was an undisputed predator. In Korea especially, it had wielded overwhelming influence since its founding. Saying it held more power than the Blue House[2720] would hardly have been an exaggeration.

"The Guild Association won't back down easily," Baek continued. "An opportunity like this may never come again. They want to weaken Ares Guild through this incident and take some of its interests as their reward."

"…"

"But then Team Leader Choi held a press conference and met with Ares Guild's leadership…"

"That must put you in a difficult position."

"Frankly, yes. They've been hounding me."

I'd been listening in silence, but I cut in. "You can be more honest than that."

[2720] The Blue House was the office and residence of South Korea's president.

"What do you mean?"

"You're worried too, aren't you, Mr. President? About a second Ares Guild. No—about a second Lee Jungryong."

"…!"

"Our Peace Guild is growing at a terrifying pace even as we speak. And now Ares Guild is going to bow before Team Leader Choi as well? If that happens, the game is completely over."

A corporation's strength came from its size and capital. A Guild's came from its Hunters. By that measure, Peace Guild already had standing and fighting strength far beyond the country's ten largest Guilds.

It had me and my overwhelming power. It had Team Leader Choi, Cheon Taemin's only blood descendant.

And if we add Ares Guild to that?

Team Leader Choi would wield enormous power. He'd go from the only challenger capable of bringing Ares Guild down to a power no one could touch.

"Hmm."

Baek let out a low hum. I snapped my fingers.

Tap. Fwoosh.

A flame of Samadhi True Fire flickered into being. Baek stared at it in surprise. When I nodded, he understood and put the cigarette between his lips.

Sizzle. Hoo.

White smoke poured out with his breath. Perhaps because it had been so long since he had smoked, he leaned back against the sofa and closed his eyes before suddenly removing the cigarette from his lips.

"Hunter Jin Taekyung is right. I'm more worried about a second Lee Jungryong than a second Ares Guild."

Team Leader Choi brushed the smoke aside with one hand.

"That's disappointing. I didn't know you thought of me that way, Mr. President."

"Anyone can change. Politics taught me that."

"But you came here yourself today. You even postponed your meeting with the Guild Association."

"…"

"Why?"

After a moment's silence, Baek answered with difficulty.

"Because I wanted to believe the two of you were different."

His subdued gaze rested on Team Leader Choi and me.

"What matters most isn't how strong or sharp a weapon is. It's who holds it."

He had a point. A cheap box cutter from a stationery store was a weapon in a criminal's hand. A magnificent sword made of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron was a kitchen knife in a master chef's.

And the Team Leader Choi I knew was capable and wise. He wasn't the sort of man to swing a weapon carelessly just because it was in his hand.

"Then I can put your worries to rest," Team Leader Choi said quietly.

Baek's eyes lit up. "You mean…?"

"Trust me. I'll use my influence and power fairly and justly, and I'll hand over a share of the interests—enough to satisfy the Guild Association. If you like, I'll put it in writing."

"!"

"But now that I've given you the answer you wanted, I'd like a promise from you in return."

Baek blinked at the unexpected offer, then leaned forward. "What is it?"

"I don't want any more noise surrounding my actions from now on. Resolve the problem with the Guild Association, and stop the ongoing field investigation at Ares Guild headquarters."

It was an alliance founded on trust, but it was a deal too. Baek was a seasoned politician. He nodded without much hesitation.

"If you keep your word, that won't be difficult."

"Then it's settled. Nice and clean."

As though they had planned it in advance, the two men rose from their seats at the same time and extended their hands.

Just as they were about to shake, Baek turned to me.

"Hunter Jin Taekyung. May I ask one last question?"

"Me? Sure."

"Your request to stop the investigation at Ares Guild headquarters… Is it connected to the visit at the special detention center the other day?"

"Ah."

I'd figured a report would reach him. Sure enough.

My eyes met Team Leader Choi's. I read his assent there and shrugged.

"Yes."

"Huh. The investigators must have missed something."

"Why? Going to send them back in?"

"I am curious what Go Se-won was hiding, but… if I were that stupid, I would never have made it this far."

With that politician's answer, Baek smiled and took Team Leader Choi's hand.

"I hope we continue to get along."

"I look forward to working with you, Mr. President."

The newly formed super-Guild and the government had forged a firm partnership.

And the last obstacle between us and Ares Guild was gone.

“C-could you say that again?”

“Cheon. Tae as in Crown Prince, and Min. Cheon Taemin. That’s my maternal grandfather’s name.”

On the day of the joint national funeral for the victims, the reporters were wrapping up their coverage when a bombshell dropped on them.

They could hardly process it. Neither could anyone else, apart from the handful of people who had known in advance.

Cheon Taemin. The immortal hero shrouded in mystery for more than twenty years.

His only blood descendant, who had remained out of sight even as turmoil engulfed Ares Guild, had appeared before the cameras.

Naturally, media outlets in Korea and around the world erupted at once.

[Peace Guild Team Leader Choi Minwoo: “My Maternal Grandfather Is Cheon Taemin.”]

[Press Conference Stunned. Ten Seconds of Silence.]

[Foreign Media in Uproar: Who Is Choi, Descendant of a Living Legend?]

[Truth or Lie? Debate Erupts over Choi Minwoo’s Shocking Statement.]

[Peace Guild Spokesperson: “Choi Minwoo Confirmed as Peace Guild’s New Guild Master.”]

[Ares Guild Official: “Board Meeting Called Regarding Choi Minwoo. Appointment as New Vice Guild Master Likely.”]

[Peace Guild’s New Captain—and Ares Guild Comes Calling?]

[KakaoPage Web-Novel Reader Ttol*seu Comments on Chapter 599 of a Certain Novel: “Choi Minwoo’s a diehard Baek fan. I’ll go read the fun Gigant Rider instead.” Author’s Response: “?”]

All four of Korea’s major morning papers gave Choi Minwoo extensive coverage, as did the foreign press. Nonsense had even reached web-fiction platforms. That alone showed the scale of the uproar.

For a short while, people argued over whether his claim was true. Then Go Se-won, who knew Ares Guild’s inner workings better than anyone, and Magic Johnson spoke up.

[Former Head of Security Go Se-won: “Choi Minwoo’s Statement Is True. He Lost His Parents as a Child and Was Shut Out of Ares Guild for More Than Twenty Years.”]

[American Grand Mage Magic Johnson: “He Is Definitely Cheon Taemin’s Maternal Grandson. He Is Also a Very Capable and Charming Man Who Built Peace Guild into What It Is Today. By the Way, Where Is Kanghee Lee? Is He in the Shower?”]

[Former U.S. President Joseph Biden: “I Think So, If I Remember Right. Actually, I’m Not Sure.”]

[Prince Felix of the United Kingdom, on Hearing the News: “What The Fu*k…” Royal Household Requests Interview Be Stopped.]

The finishing touch was the Blue House’s[2721] announcement confirming Choi Minwoo’s identity and declaring its support, followed by the results of Ares Guild’s official board meeting the next day.

[Ares Guild Elects Choi Minwoo, Current Peace Guild Master, as New Vice Guild Master. “Board Vote Unanimous.”]

[Choi Minwoo: Young Power Broker Now at the Helm of Two Major Guilds.]

[Guild Association Offers “Sincere Congratulations,” Contrary to Experts’ Predictions of Opposition.]

[Immortal Hero Still Nowhere to Be Seen.]

[Overseas Reaction: “Where Is Slayer?”]

…

“Mr. Jin Taekyung?”

At the voice in my ear, I looked up from my phone. The face I’d seen in countless article photos was right in front of me.

Now Ares Guild’s new captain, welcomed with applause and cheers, Team Leader Choi regarded me calmly.

“What are you looking at?”

“Articles about you. Should I still call you Team Leader Choi? Or Guild Master now? Maybe Vice Guild Master? You’ve got a foot in each Guild. It’s confusing.”

“Whatever you’re comfortable with.”

“Hmm. How about Minwoo?”

“Ah… Guild Master Choi Minwoo would be fine.”

“That feels awkward. I’ll stick with Team Leader.”

Given his position and the people watching, Guild Master would have been the proper title. But he couldn’t refuse my suggestion. It was a hundred times better than Minwoo.

“…All right.”

Still looking uneasy, Team Leader Choi surveyed our surroundings.

The vast, devastated space had deliberately been left unrepaired for the investigation. We were in Area A, inside Ares Guild headquarters.

Though “formerly hidden” would be more accurate now.

[2721] The Blue House was the office and residence of South Korea’s president.

I crossed the familiar hallway. I'd fought the mutated Go Jun here, and wreckage littered everywhere I looked and stepped.

Damn, it's huge.

This wasn't an orchard, but by my rough estimate, the place covered well over a thousand pyeong[2722]—more than thirty-five thousand square feet.

And Team Leader Choi and I had to comb through it.

Well, not just the two of us. Our third member wasn't human.

"Come out, you bastard."

Swoosh.

A human-shaped creature that wasn't human emerged from my Inventory.

"Are my eyes playing tricks on me? I could've sworn you said you'd take me to a club. You promised drinking games with beautiful women."

The Skeleton King looked aggrieved. I answered with complete confidence.

"We're playing treasure hunt here."

"…"

"Find it fast and I'll really take you to a club. I swear on Hyuk Mujin's balls."

"You despicable human. I'll trust you one last time. But who is Hyuk Mujin, and why do you keep wagering his balls?"

I casually ignored the Skeleton King's question and gestured toward Team Leader Choi.

"You take that side. I'll take this one. Bones can handle way over there."

"The area you've assigned me seems rather large."

"Team Leader, you're hurting my feelings. If you don't like it, quit. Is he our grandfather? He's your grandfather."

"That settles it. Understood."

With the work divided, we got moving.

Three hours later, we met up again, all wearing grim expressions.

"Fuuuck… I can't do this shit."

"For some reason, the mana detector isn't working. And it's the genuine luxury model I bought at a Sotheby's auction."

"Human. Treasure hunt is boring as hell."

Knowing how meticulous Lee Jungryong was, I'd expected the secret area to be hard to find. I hadn't expected this.

No wonder the government investigators had come away empty-handed.

There isn't even a reaction in the office. Could the information have been wrong?

But Go Se-won knew more about Ares Guild's secrets than anyone left alive. With Lee Jungryong, Song Cheonwoo, and Go Jun dead, trusting him was our only…

[2722] One pyeong is about 3.31 m^2 (35.6 ft^2).

"Huh?"

A thought flashed through my mind, and my eyes widened.

Team Leader Choi stopped thumping the mana detector with his fist. He and the Skeleton King both looked at me.

"What is it?"

"Oh. Did you remember a club with a great crowd?"

"No, wait. I think I know where to look."

I quickly traced my memories of Area A: the fight with Go Jun, my first victory, and then…

When I came back, he was running away.

By then Go Jun had changed into a horrible mixture of human and monster. He'd definitely been fleeing.

The question was where he'd been going.

That's the place. There's something there I didn't find.

Tap—whoosh!

I launched myself forward without another thought. Team Leader Choi and the Skeleton King hurried after me as I shot ahead like the wind.

We'd searched the place several times already, but this time was different.

Swoosh.

A dead-end hallway. Several rooms.

I slowed and leaned close against the wall, heightening my Qi Sense. A System chime sounded, and a blue circle spread outward from me.

It swept the hallway and every room, but no notification appeared to tell me I'd found anything.

Fwoooooosh.

The System determined the range of my Qi Sense. I could perceive only what lay within it.

But was that really all?

Farther. Wider.

I steadied my breathing. The sounds around me receded, and internal energy rose from my dantian, lending strength to my Qi Sense.

And then, at the moment my Middle Dantian finally responded—

Fwoooooosh!

The blue circle, which had stopped expanding, surged outward. Beyond the space I could see, toward another space hidden from sight.

At the edge of its reach came the notification I'd been waiting for.

Ding.

Chapter 604

Ding.

SYSTEM

- You have gained enlightenment regarding Middle Dantian!
- Middle Dantian is partially activated!
- Middle Dantian activation: 10%
- The efficiency of all martial arts and internal energy has increased slightly, and you may occasionally exert strength beyond your limits!
- You have achieved the rare Achievement Waaah, I'm a Baby Middle Dantian!
- You have gained a large amount of EXP as an Achievement reward!
- Level Up!

Activated?

I hadn't expected that.

It had been more than a month since I opened my Middle Dantian, but I'd had no idea it could do this.

And then, following the System notification announcing an unexpected reward, the news I had been waiting for arrived.

Ding.

SYSTEM

- The range of Qi Sense is expanding!
- The target cannot be identified precisely!
- An unidentified, strange power is being sensed!

I hadn't identified the target, but this wasn't a failure. It was a success.

Something existed beyond this wall. Certain of it, I punched the wall without hesitation.

Boom!

The solid wall burst apart, revealing empty space.

Area A, hidden on the top floor of Ares Guild headquarters, was held in place by barriers, invisibility magic, and gravity magic. The government investigators must have known that too.

The problem was that they'd missed the most important thing.

No. They couldn't have helped missing it.

I reached through the broken wall and ran my hand through the air. I felt nothing. It was empty, just as it appeared to be. The mana detector in Team Leader Choi's hand remained silent.

But I was certain something lay beyond it.

Fwoosh.

Three jiazi[2723] of Scorching Yang Qi transformed into flame. I silently looked down at my hands, bluish-white flames flickering over them, then closed my eyes and reached out.

What you see isn't everything.

It was a matter of perception. I had to see and feel with my instincts, my senses, my heart—not my eyes.

I focused every bit of my attention and poured out internal energy without restraint. My partially opened Middle Dantian responded.

The flickering flames gradually settled, completely enveloping my entire hand.

Compression. True Form.

And then…

Crack.

I gripped the flow of qi in my grasp and tore it apart with all my strength.

Shraaak!

The air split apart amid the bluish-white flames. Force dispelled spells I couldn't begin to understand, revealing an opening into another space.

The Skeleton King and Team Leader Choi stared blankly at the scene unfolding before them and muttered.

"He… tore it."

"How in the world did you…?"

"When your body's no good, your head has to do the work. Let's go."

"…Isn't it usually the other way around?"

"Usually, yes."

But I'm not usual.

At my casual reply, Team Leader Choi tossed the mana detector behind him.

Hmm. Having a good body really was the best.

It was a good thing we'd cleared the top floor in case something happened. Otherwise, we might have broadcast our entry into an unidentified subspace live.

[2723] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle. Three jiazi correspond to 180 years.

Swoosh.

I stepped through the tall, narrow opening into a completely different world.

What the hell is this?

The space was vast and high-ceilinged, filled with a kind of elegance and extravagance I wasn't used to. Team Leader Choi and the Skeleton King followed me in, too busy looking around to speak.

"That's…"

Team Leader Choi walked across the soft carpet, his eyes trembling faintly. He studied a painting hanging in the wide corridor.

"Salvator Mundi."

"Did you just call me Mundi?"

"No. That's the painting's title. Salvator Mundi. It's a masterpiece by Leonardo da Vinci. Have you never heard of it?"

"I've heard it from my mom now and then. She's from Gyeongsang-do."[2724]

"…"

"What's that look for? Are you looking down on Gyeongsang-do? Team Leader Choi, do you have regional prejudice?"

"What? Regional prejudice?"

That hadn't come from Team Leader Choi. The Skeleton King, who'd been looking around, butted in with an offended expression.

"Regional prejudice must be eliminated. As one born in the Demon Realm, I, too, agree with the wicked human."

"Look at this undead bastard trying to bone in on the conversation. Stay out of it."

"What the hell? I'm helping you, and you're giving me shit?"

"The Demon Realm's a different dimension, you bastard. That's dimensional prejudice. You make it sound like it's right next to Mount Jiri."

"The Gate where I operated was in Bucheon. Of course, I'm from Atlanta, Georgia, in the United States."

"Are you actually insane?"

While I argued with the Skeleton King across dimensions and borders, Team Leader Choi had given up on our conversation and started opening doors along the corridor. He called out to us.

"Both of you, stop and come over here."

The Skeleton King drew himself up like a scholar.

"This body is the lord of the undead. I do not listen to the words of a human steeped in regional prejudice."

"Come along if you don't want your ass kicked."

[2724] Mundi sounds like an insult in the Gyeongsang dialect, prompting the misunderstanding about the painting's title.

I grabbed the idiot by the collar and hauled him over. One look through the open doorway told me why Team Leader Choi had called us.

“What is this…?”

Not a single light was on, yet the room was as bright as day. Magic Gems sat neatly arranged on display shelves.

Even the lowest-grade gems were A-grade. By my rough count, there were around five hundred of them.

How much money is all this worth?

I couldn’t even begin to guess. And the five S-grade Magic Gems shining brightest on the top shelf were treasures you’d struggle to obtain no matter how much money you had.

“So all of this…?”

My voice trailed off. Team Leader Choi gave a small nod.

“Lee Jungryong definitely stole them. From what I’ve seen so far, the other rooms are the same.”

“This is fucking insane…”

“Not only Magic Gems, but also gold bars, diamonds, bonds, and other valuable assets. There are even countless works of art believed to have disappeared after the Great Cataclysm.”

He was right. Every door we opened on either side of the corridor revealed treasures of immense value, or treasures you couldn’t put a price on at all.

The calculator in my head had broken down long ago.

I expected him to have plenty stashed away, but… he really took a hell of a lot.

After the Great Cataclysm, Gates and Magic Gems had become a second source of oil money—no, something greater. Major Guilds had gained enough wealth and influence to overshadow powerful corporations.

Everyone, myself included, had assumed Lee Jungryong was immensely wealthy. No one could have guessed he’d hidden away this much on top of what had already been uncovered.

Vault.

The word flashed through my mind.

Right. This was the private vault Lee Jungryong had built and passed on to Go Jun.

But we couldn’t forget that this place was a prison as well as a vault.

A prison meant to hide one person from the world.

Its only two guards were dead. Beside me, the new owner of this space was walking toward the final door.

Step. Step.

At the end of the long corridor, Team Leader Choi approached the firmly shut door. He couldn’t hide the tremor in his steps.

“Hoo.”

He took a quiet breath to steady himself. I stepped ahead of him and brought my hand down like a blade toward the door, where an enormous flow of mana gathered.

A streak of flame cut through the air.

Slice! Boom!

The spells fell away, and the alloy door split to either side. Darkness and bitter cold, as though they’d been crouching beyond it, swept over us.

Whoooosh.

An inexplicable chill ran through me. I had reached the realm of Unaffected by Cold and Heat, yet I shuddered. Even the Skeleton King, a being born of death and cold, trembled.

Only one of us did not.

Step.

Footsteps rang strangely loud in the darkness. Team Leader Choi walked on without a word, all trace of trembling and hesitation gone.

More than twenty years.

A child had become a boy, and a boy had become a young man. He’d lost his parents early and been separated from his maternal grandfather without knowing why. Now, at last, he had returned to his place and stood here.

To meet his only blood relative and learn the truth.

“I missed you. I always have.”

Step.

His footsteps continued forward until, at some point, they suddenly stopped.

Before him stood a large oval mechanical capsule connected to countless wires. It looked like something out of a science-fiction movie, a device made for hibernation. A coffin made for someone still alive.

Hoo.

Team Leader Choi’s breath fogged the dust-covered glass. His long fingers trembled as he wiped it clean.

“I wanted to see you.”

As the dust came away, a face emerged. It looked older and more worn than in the photographs online.

Yet the resemblance to Team Leader Choi was unmistakable. He spoke softly to the old man.

“Grandfather.”

Team Leader Choi kept everything strictly secret. For now, no one besides the Skeleton King and me could know, and I agreed wholeheartedly.

There was one minor complication.

“Keeping a secret is easy enough. But I have two conditions.”

With the resolve of an independence activist, the Skeleton King laid them out.

“First, take me to a club. Second, give me one of the S-grade Magic Gems in there.”

Team Leader Choi readily agreed to the first. The second gave him pause, so I offered him a simple alternative.

“There’s a better way.”

“What is it?”

“How many S-grade Magic Gems do we have right now?”

“There are still five left.”

“Then let’s beat that bastard up and make it six. We can keep the secret and secure an additional S-grade Magic Gem.”

“…!”

“…!”

The Skeleton King, who had demanded his terms with the spirit of an independence activist, became a pro-Japanese collaborator and cooperated, and we reached a dramatic compromise by agreeing to take him to a club.

But for the most important matter—what to do with Cheon Taemin—we had no choice but to ask someone for help.

“We can’t keep my maternal grandfather here forever. We need to move him somewhere else.”

“The problem is moving him without anyone noticing…”

Neither a pocket enchanted with spatial expansion magic nor my Inventory could do it. The Immortal Hero, Cheon Taemin, was very much alive.

After thinking it over, only one answer remained.

“We have to move him using teleportation magic.”

What mattered was who performed it.

Someone we could trust completely. Someone who wouldn’t tell a soul even after learning the truth. Someone sympathetic to the unconscious Cheon Taemin and to us, who could continue helping us…

“Only one person comes to mind.”

“I imagine we’re thinking of the same person, Mr. Jin.”

So I made a call.

“Can you come to Korea for a bit?”

—Hey, Jin. I’m busy too. There’s a mutated Gate right now—

“Team Leader Choi wants to see you. A kiss is totally possible.”

—I’ll come right now.

Chapter 605

“Jacob, how are things over there? You’re not hurt, are you?”

On the holographic TV, an East Asian anchor with heavy eye makeup put the question to a broad-shouldered Black reporter at the scene. He winked at the camera.

“Thanks for worrying about me, Jenny. I’m fine, and so is everyone else.”

“It looks unbelievably peaceful for the site of a Mutated Gate.”

“It is. No one was hurt, and the whole thing was over in no time. Besides, this is Texas. Everyone here is tough, men and women alike.”

“Haha. That’s a relief. But where’s the hero who saved everyone?”

“Jenny, I owe you and our viewers an apology. Magic Johnson, the hero we hoped to have with us today, has already left. I did my best, but I couldn’t persuade him to stay.”

“Oh, dear.”

“He said something urgent had come up and turned down the interview. He looked so desperate to leave, I thought he was off to meet a secret lover.”

“I see. Now, Jacob, about the exact cause of this Mutated Gate…”

Hmm. A secret lover.

I leaned back on the sofa, watching the holographic TV, and found myself humming.

“When Dad goes to work, Ppoppo. Magic Johnson comes to Korea, Ppoppo.”[2725]

Whoosh! Crash!

I ducked at the sound of something cutting through the air. A crystal glass skimmed the back of my neck and smashed into the holographic TV.

Shards flew everywhere, and water pooled across the floor. My eyes met Team Leader Choi’s. He spoke calmly.

“Oh. You dodged it.”

“…”

“In case you’re wondering, that was deliberate.”

“…You’re not even going to pretend it was an accident?”

“Because it wasn’t an accident. Still, it’s a real shame. If that had been just a little faster, it would’ve smashed Mr. Jin Taekyung’s skull…”

“Hey, you don’t call a person’s head a ‘skull.‘ A skull?”

“I can when you won’t stop running that damn mouth of yours. Frankly, even ‘head’ is too good a word for a blockhead like you.”

[2725] Ppoppo is Korean baby talk for a kiss. Taekyung is riffing on a children’s song associated with the Korean TV program Ppoppo Ppoppo.

"Whoa. 'Damn head'? 'Damn mouth'?"

"Don't fall asleep in front of me from now on. If you sleep with your mouth open, I'll pour cyanide down it."

"…"

What the hell was that punchline?

He must have been furious. He practically spat the words, and the venom in them left me speechless for a moment.

I considered taking out the Myriad-Poison Ring, then politely waved a hand.

"Team Leader Choi. Calm down. This was all my fault."

"Do I look like I can calm down?"

"I'm telling you, I had no choice. You saw the news. He was busy with a Mutated Gate. What else could I do? I had to get him here first."

"By offering up my lips without asking me?"

"But I couldn't offer up my own lips, could I?"

"…!"

Whoosh! Crash!

Whoa. That one was actually close.

I narrowly dodged again and shouted, "Stop! Team Leader, stop!"

Team Leader Choi picked up a third crystal glass.

"Shut your mouth and stick your head out. Right there."

"I didn't kiss him! I didn't do it in the end!"

"You almost did!"

Team Leader Choi was just about to swing his arm with a roar that could rival a lion's roar when—

Bang.

The door flew open without a knock. In the doorway stood the Skeleton King, brimming with anticipation, and Magic Johnson, looking dejected.

"The job's done. Are we going to a club now?"

"Choi, I'm a romantic too."

Team Leader Choi stared silently at the club-obsessed parrot and the pure-hearted Grand Mage. Then, with a sigh, he lowered his hand.

Before he was an outstanding War Mage, Magic Johnson was a Grand Mage capable of wielding most forms of magic.

He had come straight to Korea after our call, and we'd told him the truth as soon as he arrived.

"Mr. Johnson. There's something we need to move…"

"Whatever the reason, I want my Ppoppo[2726] first. Ready, Choi?"

"I'm not ready, I won't be ready, and I never will be."

"Then we have a problem. I don't know what you're trying to move in such secrecy, but…"

"Actually, it isn't a thing. It's a person."

"What do you mean, Jin? A person? Are you helping someone escape?"

"I don't know if 'escape' is the right word, but it's something like that."

"Who is it? Some heinous criminal? A secret lover?"

"My maternal grandfather."

"Oh, shit. Sorry, Choi. I didn't mean to—wait. Who did you say?"

Magic Johnson had remained silent for a long time even after hearing the whole story. He didn't speak again until he saw Cheon Taemin's face for himself.

"Damn it. What the hell happened?"

"As you can see, it's a shitty situation."

"There was a reason you couldn't explain everything over the phone. All right, let's take care of the urgent matter first. Choi, where are we moving him from this prison-like place?"

After that, things moved quickly.

Magic Johnson cast Teleport to the coordinates Team Leader Choi gave him, and we all—no, one of us, trapped in a deep sleep he could hardly wake from—returned to the mansion where he had once lived.

To the home he had missed.

It was a return more than twenty long years in the making.

"Space distortion, barriers, defensive magic, of course. I've set up humidity and temperature controls too. And…"

Magic Johnson rattled off spell after spell like a wanderer riding a beat, then finished in a breathless rush.

"In short, I've done everything I can for now. There's still more work to do, though."

The Skeleton King, sulking because he hadn't gotten to go to a club, muttered, "I get that it's impressive. How impressive?"

"The place will hold unless a Grand Mage on my level—or two or three S-rank Hunters—sets out to smash it."

"That's some serious performance."

I agreed with the Skeleton King. Magic Johnson really had done everything he could for now, making it impossible for even most S-rank Hunters to detect Cheon Taemin or find his location.

[2726] Ppoppo is Korean baby talk for a kiss. Taekyung is riffing on a children's song associated with the Korean TV program Ppoppo Ppoppo.

Combat and magic are different disciplines.

There was no end to martial arts training, and the same went for magic. If I hadn't opened my Middle Dantian, I wouldn't have found Cheon Taemin so easily either.

"By the way, does anyone know who created that secret space? The magic in Area A and the spells installed there weren't beneath mine."

"This body has no idea, human."

I gave the Skeleton King's shoulder a courteous pat.

"He asked if anyone knew. Not if a monster knew."

"You really are a fucking bastard."

Hmm. His vocabulary was improving by the day.

Smack!

As a reward for his Vocabulary Improvement Quest, I struck the back of his head, then turned to Magic Johnson.

"I've been wondering about that too. Do you have anyone in mind?"

"Hmm. When you think about it, it would have to be another Grand Mage. Especially with magic at that level."

"Then maybe…"

"You mean the other two?"

I fell silent, uncertain. Magic Johnson shook his head, his expression unusually serious.

"Probably not. Though I do have someone in mind."

"You do?"

"Hmm."

Magic Johnson let out a low hum and seemed to sink into thought before continuing.

"I'd rather not say more yet. It's too early to be sure. But I should visit the other Grand Mages, just in case. It's been a while since I've seen them."

"I'd appreciate that."

It was welcome news. Magic Johnson had the insight of a Grand Mage, and he meant to find out for himself whether his suspicions were right.

There are currently only three Grand Mages in the world.

If one of them had accepted the job knowing full well what Lee Jungryong intended…

We couldn't let that pass. Anyone who had helped imprison the hero who saved humanity from disaster as though he were a criminal would have to answer for it.

For the sake of one person, if nothing else.

"Team Leader Choi."

He didn’t respond. Inside the cold, oval metal hibernation capsule, Team Leader Choi gazed endlessly at his grandfather, who lay in a deep sleep. Then, all at once, he spoke.

“I’ve waited for so long… but you still haven’t woken up.”

A clumsy attempt at comfort would have been worse than silence. We all knew it, and none of us spoke.

The Immortal Hero, Cheon Taemin, still hadn’t regained consciousness.

For more than twenty years.

We knew neither the cause nor the reason. Unfortunately, everything Team Leader Choi had heard from Song Cheonwoo had been true.

Lee Jungryong and Song Cheonwoo, those two ambitious men, had once tried every possible way to wake him, but in the end they’d failed. In this frustrating situation, there was only one thing we could say now.

“There has to be a way.”

“Jin’s right. An effect can’t exist without a cause. Neither can an illness.”

“Cheer up. He certainly isn’t dead yet. Even if he dies, I’ll find a way to bring him back as a Death Knight…”

Magic Johnson and I turned our killing intent on the Skeleton King. He stopped and stammered, “I-I was trying to comfort him.”

“You call that comfort, you fucking asshole?”

“Monster motherfucker…”

I was berating the Skeleton King in a voice no louder than a mosquito’s buzz so Team Leader Choi wouldn’t overhear when Choi spoke with a faint smile.

“It’s all right. We’ll find a way somehow. I’m grateful he’s alive.”

A smile didn’t mean someone was happy.

I could feel what Team Leader Choi was going through. So could Magic Johnson. Even the Skeleton King, who didn’t have a finger bone’s worth of tact, could feel it.

As though by agreement, we all fell silent. Team Leader Choi’s voice, sunk deep with emotion, pierced my ears.

“But… at least for today, I’d like to rest. Thank you all for your hard work. I truly appreciate it.”

He looked at us one by one, then bowed his head sincerely.

I understood the meaning of that gesture and was the first to walk toward the entrance.

This was a reunion that had come after more than twenty years. For a grandfather and grandson who could not even exchange a single greeting right now, it was time for us to leave them alone.

One of the most important things to Koreans was rice.

"Are you eating properly?" "Let's get a meal sometime." "What are you, jotbap?"[2727]

Okay, that last one was a little strange. But even our insults have bap in them. That's Korean culture for you.

Which meant that when Koreans finished a job, they ate together. And the best meal was rice in hot soup.

"Gukbap?[2728] What's this?"

Magic Johnson eyed Mom's homemade blood sausage gukbap[2729] with suspicion and put down his spoon.

"Hey, Jin. Got any toast?"

"Come on. Just try it."

"No, thanks. I'm not hungry."

Grrrrr.

"…You really don't have any toast?"

"Even if there were some, there isn't. If you're that reluctant, just try the broth. The broth alone."

"Damn it. Is this Korean soup? Why does it look so weird?"

Grumbling, Magic Johnson picked up his spoon and clumsily scooped up some broth.

The moment he tasted it, the game was over.

"Kheeeee. Fuck yeah."

He polished off two bowls of blood sausage gukbap[2730], saying "Fuck yeah" over and over, then smiled contentedly.

"There were so many things going wrong today that I was busy all day. I feel like I can finally breathe."

"I saw the news earlier, actually. You subdued the Mutated Gate and came straight here without even doing an interview."

"A Mutated Gate? Didn't you watch to the end?"

I couldn't. Team Leader Choi smashed the TV with a crystal glass.

I shrugged. "Why?"

"Because you wouldn't say that if you had."

Magic Johnson picked up a toothpick.

"Strictly speaking, it wasn't a Mutated Gate."

"What?"

[2727] Jotbap is a vulgar Korean insult for a pushover; it contains bap, the word for cooked rice or a meal.
[2728] Gukbap is rice served in hot soup. This version contains sundae, a Korean blood sausage.
[2729] Gukbap is rice served in hot soup. This version contains sundae, a Korean blood sausage.
[2730] Gukbap is rice served in hot soup. This version contains sundae, a Korean blood sausage.

What the hell was he talking about now?

Chapter 606

It wasn't a Mutated Gate? What the hell was that supposed to mean?

My confusion lasted only a moment. Then Magic Johnson dropped a single word, and my eyes widened.

"Terrorism?"

"Yeah, terrorism. An Arab man was caught trying to enter a Gate with a forged Hunter license. Turns out he was a B-rank Hunter with a terrorist group in the Middle East, and he was carrying an A-grade Magic Gem. One that hadn't been purified, of course."

"Wait. That sounds…"

"It must be a pretty familiar situation to you, Jin. Am I wrong?"

I pressed my lips together instead of answering. Recent memories flashed through my mind.

Go Jun. Song Cheonwoo. And two Monster Waves.

Something that should never have happened again kept happening.

"He was trying to cause a Monster Wave."

"Probably. No, I'm sure of it."

Damn it.

"What about the casualties?" I asked urgently. "Was anyone hurt? Did the news deliberately hide the damage because…"

I couldn't bring myself to finish.

The recent incidents had been one disaster after another. The man might not have been comparable to Go Jun, but if a B-rank Hunter from a terrorist group had absorbed an unpurified A-grade Magic Gem, he could have done considerable damage on his own.

Magic Johnson answered calmly.

"Whoa. Easy, Jin. The news reports were true. Thank God, there wasn't any significant damage."

"Are you sure?"

"Why would I lie to you?"

"But how?"

"After what happened, the whole world's on high alert. Identity checks and Magic Gem inspections have gotten several times stricter. That's how they caught him. He tried to absorb the Magic Gem as a last resort. What do you think happened?"

Magic Johnson took a sip of the instant coffee in his paper cup.

"It's simple. He couldn't withstand the power contained in the Magic Gem. By the way, this coffee is pretty good."

“Forget the coffee. If he couldn’t withstand it, shouldn’t he have mutated like Go Jun?”

Mana and magical power were like oil and water. They could never mix.

Go Jun was proof. Even as a certified S-rank Hunter trained in the modern Mana Cultivation Method, he had never managed to absorb magical power completely.

The real problem was the temporary surge of power—and the mutation waiting afterward.

So how was the result simple?

The lack of significant damage made even less sense now.

Magic Johnson’s answer took me completely by surprise.

“No. He exploded.”

“What?”

“I mean he blew apart. Into pieces. Boom!”

Bang, bang!

Magic Johnson tapped his spoon against the earthenware bowl and shrugged.

“And that was the end of everything. All I did at the scene was protect people from the blast’s aftermath.”

“…”

“In a way, you could certainly call it a suicide attack. But that was all it amounted to.”

At those words, I realized something and muttered inwardly.

It wasn’t that it was like what happened with Go Jun. It was that what happened with Go Jun had only been possible because it was Go Jun.

I’d had it backward from the start.

It came down to the size of the vessel. Not in terms of a person’s character or breadth of mind, but in terms of how much power they could contain without letting it overflow.

By that measure, Go Jun had been a large vessel. He could absorb some magical power and hold on to it, if only briefly.

And even he eventually mutated.

Go Jun had absorbed two S-grade Magic Gems at once. The balance of his vessel broke, and he finally mutated.

Even if I hadn’t intervened personally, there was a very good chance he would have died after holding out for only a little longer.

An ordinary Hunter wouldn’t stand a chance.

The terrorist in today’s news had been a B-rank Hunter, but the power had still blown him apart on the spot. He hadn’t been able to control any of the magical power in that Magic Gem.

“Hey, Jin. Looks like you’re getting it.”

Magic Johnson was grinning. I let out a short, disbelieving laugh.

"That's a huge relief."

"It is. Only a complete idiot would try the same thing after today."

Magic Johnson had put his finger on what mattered. It was fortunate that the terrorist attack had caused no damage, but the greater relief was that it would deter similar incidents in the future.

"The terrorist group must have realized it, too. To put it coldly, this was a terrible trade from their perspective."

A trained Hunter was a valuable asset, and a Magic Gem was an energy source of immense value. I didn't know how the group had gotten hold of an unpurified A-grade Magic Gem, but today they'd failed spectacularly.

They had lost both a valuable operative and a Magic Gem easily worth several billion won[2731].

"They'll change tactics," Magic Johnson said. "Probably go back to targeting defenseless civilians with that damn magic wand of Allah. But it's too early to let our guard down."

He sighed quietly.

"Terrorist organizations have been making some worrying moves lately. I hear they've been experimenting with Gates and Magic Gems, especially in Africa and the Middle East. The information came from the Pentagon, so it's reliable."

The Skeleton King, who had spent the entire conversation fiddling with his smartphone without participating, perked up his ears.

"The Pentagon? Are we going there right now? Is much rub-rub possible?"

"Just so you know, it's not a club."

"Damn it. I thought I was finally going to meet some hot girls."

Don't even dream about it, you bastard…

The Pentagon was the headquarters of the United States Department of Defense. If the Skeleton King's identity came to light, its researchers would party all night.

In a heavily secured laboratory, of course, where they'd try all kinds of rub-rub with every experimental tool they had.

"Hmm. Everyone would certainly be happy if we took him to the Pentagon," Magic Johnson said.

"Not so good for you or me, though."

"True. We'd probably stand trial for violating international law. Though if a terrorist group caused trouble while the trial was going on, the whole thing might fizzle out."

Life was hard. The moment one problem was solved, another popped up.

A terrorist group.

[2731] Several billion won—roughly 2–9 billion won—is about $1.4–6.4 million and €1.3–5.8 million.

Once the series of incidents caused by Go Jun became known to the world, every country had been thrown into shock and heightened alertness.

But terrorist groups had gained another weapon.

If the information Magic Johnson had obtained from the Pentagon was true, they would find a way no matter what it took.

"…Of all times," I muttered.

Magic Johnson looked puzzled.

"Of all times? What do you mean?"

"Hmm."

I hesitated, then shook my head.

"It's nothing. Don't worry about it."

"It sounds like something, and it's bothering me a lot."

"It's just… there's something I've been preparing to do. But after hearing that, I'm hesitating for now."

"Something you've been preparing?"

I gave a small nod.

I hadn't told anyone yet. It was one of the things I'd decided to do when I returned to the modern era this time.

For myself, and for everyone else, I had made a decision after a long period of hesitation and had been preparing for it…

But this changes things.

Humanity had regained peace after the Great Cataclysm. That didn't mean the whole world was peaceful.

Mana had appeared, along with Awakened people. Those who survived and came out strong had remade the world by their own rules, and conflicts everyone thought had ended were still going on.

No. Some people would even say they've only gotten worse.

Magic Gems were more valuable and useful than oil. Gates were mines that kept spitting out those diamonds. Conflict over them was inevitable, whether the people involved called themselves entrepreneurs, Guilds, or rebels.

The terrorist groups in the Middle East were more dangerous still.

They called awakening a blessing from God and held it up as proof that God existed. You might ask what the hell they were talking about when even atheists could Awaken, but looking for logic in people like that was a mistake to begin with.

Warriors chosen by God! Advance!

God wills it!

I had no idea which god or doctrine had told them to do such idiotic things.

But singers sang, blacksmiths worked iron, and idiots kept doing idiotic things. They fought across the world, dying or ending up crippled.

And they were still at it right now.

Bastards.

The Skeleton King was a lot better than them. He might have started out as a monster, but by now he'd shown as much sacrifice and dedication as any Hunter.

Good lad.

At the warmth in my gaze, the Skeleton King glared at me ferociously.

"You just cursed this body in your thoughts."

"…What the hell? That's absurd."

"Tell me the truth. I'll let it slide."

"Johnson, can't we just take this bastard to the Pentagon?"

Magic Johnson grinned.

"Shall we?"

"You hear that? You're finished, you experimental-subject bastard."

"Now that it's come to this, going right away wouldn't be bad."

"Tell them to prepare a cauldron. We'll make some bone broth out of this bastard."

"I don't know about a cauldron, but the laboratory will be ready whenever we are."

For some reason, Magic Johnson and I were on exactly the same wavelength today.

He played along without missing a beat, then drew a staff from inside his clothes.

"Well, now that we've eaten, shall we get going?"

"Sounds good… Wait."

I'd answered on reflex. Then I felt mana circulating through his staff and gave him an uneasy look.

"Uh, there's no need to go that far."

"Don't you have a traditional Korean proverb? Once a gay draws his magic wand, he must pierce even a radish."

"…?"

That sounded like a strange and impressive twist on a proverb I'd never heard in my life. I swallowed.

"Wait. Seriously?"

"Yeah. Seriously."

"You're not joking?"

"The Pentagon sent an official request two days ago. They want your advice and your help, Jin. As soon as possible."

"What?"

I blinked, then let out a hollow laugh.

"Oh, I get it. This is an American joke."

Magic Johnson fixed me with the profound gaze of a gay man.

“How did you know? I don’t remember showing you that memory.”

What the fuck is he talking about?

I stood there blankly for a moment before hurriedly waving my hands.

“…No, I got the pronunciation mixed up. Joke. Joke. A gag.”

“I know. That was a joke, too.”

He flashed a white-toothed grin.

“But the part about the Pentagon wasn’t.”

“…!”

“Let’s go. It looks like someone else is already ready. Isn’t that right?”

I followed his gaze and turned my head. I sensed a familiar presence, and a figure came into view.

Team Leader Choi answered in a subdued voice.

“Of course, Mr. Johnson.”

Chapter 607

The Pentagon.

The massive pentagon-shaped building was practically impregnable.

A security force of some thousand guards, every one of them a high-ranking Hunter. Immense flows of mana surrounded the building inside and out. That alone told you what kind of place the Pentagon was.

“Impressive, isn’t it?”

Magic Johnson had just finished the authentication process. Seeing Team Leader Choi and me looking around wide-eyed, he gave us a knowing grin.

“Since it was first built during World War II, the Pentagon has only been attacked twice. Once on 9/11, and once during the Great Cataclysm. You both know how those turned out.”

Team Leader Choi nodded.

“Even the Demon King Asmodeus and his monster army’s all-out assault couldn’t bring it down.”

“That’s right. It was the second fiercest battle of my life. The first was the Day of Victory, of course. Both times, one person helped me escape with my life.”

Any person on Earth, not just an American, knew that fact.

During the Great Cataclysm and afterward, only one person had been able to stop the demon who descended upon this world: the Demon King Asmodeus.

“Cheon Taemin. If your maternal grandfather—the man Americans call Sky—hadn’t been there, neither I nor this Pentagon would exist today.”

Magic Johnson was gazing at Team Leader Choi with distant eyes, as though remembering something, when a voice came out of nowhere.

“I was thinking the same thing, Johnson.”

It wasn’t Team Leader Choi or me. Naturally, it wasn’t the Skeleton King hiding in my Inventory, either.

Clomp. Clomp.

Heavy footsteps. Wrinkled jeans and a shirt. White hair tangled into a complete mess.

An elderly white man with one side of his face badly distorted strode up to us and thrust out both hands.

“I don’t know which of you two I should shake hands with first, so I’ll do both at once. I’m Chuck Hagel. You can just call me Chuck.”

He didn’t just give off the air of a tough Texan. It practically poured out of him.

His face looked familiar. I stared at it as I took his hand.

“I’m Jin Taekyung. But are you, by any chance…?”

“That Chuck Hagel? Yep. I’m not as famous as you, but I cut down my fair share of monsters back in the day.”

“Oh. Ooooh.”

I’d suspected it when I saw him, but the old man really was the previous generation’s S-rank Hunter known as Uncle Chuck.

I had never imagined I would meet one of the war heroes from the Great Cataclysm whom I had admired as a child. With a cry of delight, I vigorously shook his hand up and down.

“I’m a fan. A real fan. I even collected your Hunter cards in elementary school.”

“Hunter cards? They sold those in South Korea?”

“They probably sold them in North Korea, too. I bought them every time I got my allowance.”

“Huh. So here’s another dumb little kid who handed me a fortune in royalties. Of course, I spent the lot on alimony from five divorces.”

Chuck Hagel smiled contentedly, having demolished a childhood memory in a single sentence.

“If you still have any of my cards, bring them by sometime. I’ll sign them if you want.”

“Ah, I traded them all away.”

“What?”

“I collected ten and traded them for a Cheon Taemin card my friend had. Honestly, Uncle Chuck cards weren’t that rare.”

“…”

The smile vanished from Chuck Hagel’s face. He sighed.

“Damn it. And of all people, it had to be Mr. Sky. Can’t argue with that.”

“There’s no comparing their rarity or value. My friend wanted twenty cards at first, but I kept haggling until…”

“…I get it. I get it. You can stop now.”

Chuck Hagel shook his head repeatedly, then shook hands with Team Leader Choi.

“You’re the spitting image of your maternal grandfather. Good to meet you, Choi.”

“It’s a pleasure, Mr. Hagel.”

“I told you to call me Chuck. If you were one of those other idiots with nothing but shit in their heads, that would be different. But you and the traitor beside you have earned the right.”

Look at him calling me a traitor just because I traded some cards.

As I grumbled to myself, Team Leader Choi replied calmly.

“Please understand, Mr. Hagel. I wouldn’t feel comfortable calling the man in charge of the Pentagon—and the United States Secretary of Defense—by his first name.”

"Hm. Is that so? Come to think of it, I suppose you do have to worry about what people think. You're in charge of two massive Guilds now, after all."

I blinked.

"The man in charge of the Pentagon? The Secretary of Defense?"

"Hm? You didn't know?"

"Obviously not."

"Really? Everyone else seemed to know. I assumed Johnson had at least told you."

Under the Secretary of Defense's gaze, the Grand Mage—widely expected to become the next Secretary of Gukbap[2732]—scratched his chin.

"I figured you knew, too. Jin, you really didn't?"

At this point, I felt like I had somehow become an idiot. I replied with some reluctance.

"I really didn't. Were you appointed a few days ago? Ah, that must be why I hadn't heard."

Chuck Hagel's answer was short and blunt.

"This is my eighth year."

"…Oh."

"Well, you had no particular reason to know. It's hardly important compared to what we're about to discuss. Come on, everyone. Follow me."

Chuck Hagel pulled a cigar from the breast pocket of his dress uniform and put it in his mouth as naturally as could be. He led the way, and we followed.

Each time he puffed on the cigar, acrid smoke rose to the ceiling. An alarm sounded, and a red light began to flash.

Wee-oo! Wee-oo!

> Fire hazard! Fire hazard!

Bang!

Chuck Hagel smashed the warning light without a moment's hesitation.

"Fucking siren."

Forget tough guy. Forget petty bastard. This man was insane.

The Skeleton King, who had made it through the security checkpoint hidden in my Inventory, whispered,

"Is he human? Are you sure he isn't a monster?"

I had my doubts, too. But he matched the description on the Hunter cards I'd collected as a kid.

[2732] Gukbap is rice served in hot soup. Jin replaces bang ("defense") in gukbang-bu-jang-gwan, "Secretary of National Defense," with bap, creating the nonsensical title "Secretary of Gukbap."

Born in Texas. Dreamed of becoming a cowboy. Supposedly tamed a Minotaur with his fists and rode it around. And that was just the beginning.

Clomp. Clomp.

No one was brave enough to stand in Chuck Hagel's way as he marched forward without hesitation.

Researchers, Hunters, and employees who appeared to belong to the Pentagon split to either side as if facing a disaster. Moses, who had a cigar in his mouth instead of a staff, crossed between them while spewing smoke like a chimney.

He didn't forget to talk trash along the way.

"When the hell are they going to widen this damn hallway? Every time I see it, I want to smash it to pieces."

"Hey, Smith. Put that electronic cigarette away while I'm asking nicely. If you waft that shitty strawberry scent in front of me one more time, I'll put you on the list of people who died in the line of duty. Cigars are fine, though."

"Gordon. There's a smashed warning light in Section Three. Go fix it. Who broke it? Listen carefully: your fucking direct superior."

No one could stop Chuck Hagel as he rampaged through the Pentagon like an enraged bull.

In the roughly five minutes it took us to reach our destination, poor Smith was forced to change his e-cigarette liquid, innocent Gordon ran off at full speed to repair the warning light, and seven more lights warning of a fire hazard met the same fate beneath the clouds of cigar smoke.

Gordon would probably have to fix those, too.

"…"

This guy really was out of his mind.

I was wondering who'd had the insane idea of making him Secretary of Defense when Magic Johnson leaned over and whispered,

"Hey, guys. Chuck's been touchy lately because of the terrorist problem. He's a good guy at heart. Cut him some slack."

The moment he finished speaking, Chuck Hagel slammed his fist into the wall.

"This goddamn hallway! Hallway! Hallway! Didn't I tell you to make the hallway wider?"

Bang! Bang! Kraaang!

Team Leader Choi watched the hallway widen, then asked with complete sincerity,

"Is he really a good person?"

"…Probably. Whatever he looks like right now, he's outstanding as Secretary of Defense. Capable, and he gets things done."

Of course he got things done. Get even slightly on Chuck Hagel's nerves, and your life would be over.

As Magic Johnson's answer trailed off with noticeably less confidence, Chuck Hagel passed through a mana-recognition device and pointed to a tightly shut door.

"We're here already. Everyone, this is Building Five."

"Building Five?"

"Also called the E-Ring. And for what it's worth, as far as I know, no foreigner has set foot in here for twenty-five years."

Chuck Hagel looked at Team Leader Choi and grinned.

"Only one outsider on Earth was ever free to come and go as he pleased. Mr. Sky. He was treated the same as the President of the United States."

Even without the rest, the fact that Chuck Hagel unfailingly called him "Mr. Sky" said plenty about Cheon Taemin's standing.

"And now his maternal grandson and a young hero have taken up the baton. Both of you… welcome to Building Five."

The instant Chuck Hagel finished speaking, brilliant light poured from the entire door.

Whoosh!

No. It wasn't light. It was magic.

I let the flow of mana sweep over my whole body without resisting it. Dazzling brightness filled my vision, and the space around us warped.

This is…

The moment I realized that this familiar sensation was Teleport, I blinked and found myself in a completely unfamiliar new space.

As my vision rapidly returned, I saw people seated around a pentagonal table.

"Then the forces being deployed to the Middle East front will be… Oh. It seems our guests have finally arrived."

Beep.

With a mechanical chime, the hologram illuminating the dark conference room disappeared. A neat-looking middle-aged man at the head of the table stopped speaking and rose.

I knew his face at once.

He was a man whose position kept him constantly exposed in every form of media. He looked older than he had on television and radiated even more charisma than he had in the newspapers.

"You're later than I expected, Secretary Hagel. I hope you haven't smashed another innocent warning device."

At the man's amused remark, Chuck Hagel snapped the glowing tip off his cigar with his fingers.

"Take it out of my salary."

“The Treasury Secretary asked me to pass on a message. Your entire salary for this month has already gone toward repairing the damage you’ve done to the Pentagon.”

“Damn it. Again? At this rate, I’ll be too afraid of alimony to get divorced.”

Chuck Hagel let out a sighing mutter, then turned toward us.

“No need for introductions, I assume?”

At least this time, there was no need.

Team Leader Choi knew who the man was. So did I. Even the Skeleton King knew.

“Wicked human. Is that old human perhaps…?”

That was right. I gave a small nod as the middle-aged man approached with measured steps, and murmured his name to myself.

Donald Doramp Jr.

His title was better known than his name: President of the United States.

Chapter 608

I stared at the middle-aged man before me.

Donald Doramp Jr.

A tycoon with a business empire and a fortune worth trillions of won[2733], he had followed his father, a former U.S. president, into office. They were the third father-and-son pair to hold the presidency in United States history.

Neat as a British gentleman, he looked twenty years younger than he was. His smile as he greeted us was genuine.

“Welcome, both of you.”

Unlike his father, President Doramp wore his hair neatly combed back. We shook his hand.

I’d seen the President of the United States on television and in online articles, but I’d never imagined meeting him. Even with him standing right in front of me, I could hardly believe it.

“Haha, there’s no need to look at me like that. If anything, I’m the one who’s amazed. After hearing so much about you both, I finally get to meet you.”

Team Leader Choi answered in fluent English.

“Thank you for welcoming us, Mr. President.”

“I know a joint national funeral was held in Korea. My condolences to the victims who lost their lives so tragically, and to Mr. Kim, the former Guild Master of the Peace Guild. May they rest in peace.”

President Doramp was a gentleman in manner as well as appearance.

He had already done the proper thing by sending the U.S. ambassador to Korea and the Secretary of State to the funeral. Yet he had remembered to offer his condolences in person, too.

“Come to think of it, you’ve already met the Secretary of State, haven’t you? Isn’t that right, Jesse?”

At his call, the middle-aged woman seated at the pentagonal table smiled and greeted us with a glance.

Only then did it hit me: the people in this room were the ones holding up the superpower that was the United States.

The top brass of the U.S. military and government.

Only a few wore suits. The Secretary of State, whom I’d met briefly at the funeral, was among them. The others were probably cabinet members or held positions just as high.

As for the military…

There are a shitload of them.

[2733] For a fortune of roughly ₩2–9 trillion, about $1.4–6.4 billion and €1.3–5.8 billion.

It was a feast of stars, literally.

Middle-aged and elderly generals, their hair either going gray or already white, watched us with curiosity. Insignia and stars gleamed on their dress uniforms.

“Ah, I’m late with the introductions.”

President Doramp noticed where I was looking and continued.

“Everyone, this is Mr. Choi, who leads the Peace Guild and Ares Guild. And this is Mr. Jin, whom you all know. As for the people here…”

Jack. Philip. Joey. Liam. Isabella.

Names and titles I’d heard in Hollywood war movies flew past me.

Team Leader Choi seemed to know every face and name, as usual. I just stared and nodded.

How many departments and titles are there?

The only people who stuck in my mind were the directors of the CIA and FBI. Probably because those organizations showed up in movies so often.

“Now that we’ve made the introductions, I should tell you why we brought you here so suddenly.”

Snap. Fwoosh!

The instant President Doramp snapped his fingers, the holograms that had briefly disappeared filled the room in every direction.

This is…

A map. Not of the whole Earth, but a detailed map of one region.

Coordinates hovered over countless buildings and stretches of terrain. Markers whose meaning I couldn’t guess glittered here and there like stars.

Oh.

The place names. The deserts scattered across the map. And what President Doramp had been saying when we arrived.

I put it together and muttered, “The Middle East?”

“It’s a tactical map showing the locations of the terrorist groups. The sparkling markers are probably Gates or their bases.”

Team Leader Choi had spoken almost at the same time as me. President Doramp nodded to us both.

“You’re both right, though Mr. Choi’s answer is more detailed and closer to the mark. The lights indicate suspected terrorist bases. Hologram, zoom out.”

Whoosh.

The enlarged map shrank into a globe. It turned slowly at President Doramp’s gesture, lights large and small scattered across its surface.

“All of those are terrorist groups?”

"When my late father was president, there were already more than a hundred Islamic terrorist organizations alone. After the Great Cataclysm, of course, they multiplied at a frightening rate."

That was news to me.

More than a hundred Islamic terrorist organizations before the Great Cataclysm. Who knew how many there were now?

Sure, some were probably little groups that operated on the scale of clubs. The problem was, they weren't meeting to talk about comics. They carried out attacks to kill people.

Seriously, why are there so many?

I knew the world had plenty of lunatics. I'd never imagined there were this many.

Team Leader Choi watched the hologram, his gaze dark.

"Does that exclude the rebel forces scattered across Africa?"

"A good question, Mr. Choi. Fortunately, the rebels are included."

"Just as you said, Mr. President, that truly is fortunate. And I think I understand why you went out of your way to invite us."

His voice dropped.

"You're planning to launch an operation to wipe out the terrorist groups, aren't you?"

"That's right."

President Doramp gave a grave nod.

"As both of you know, the United States is still the world's greatest power, but that also means we face an equal amount of opposition. Therefore, we have no choice but to act cautiously, both militarily and diplomatically."

The United States might have a long history as the world's bully, but even it couldn't push around every country on Earth. That was especially true after it had suffered the worst losses in the Great Cataclysm.

"But the terrorist groups and rebels operating around the world must be eliminated as soon as possible. I'm sure you both know why."

Of course I did.

As Magic Johnson had told us, the terrorist groups and African rebels had begun experimenting with Gates and Magic Gems.

I didn't know what those experiments would produce, or whether they would succeed. But the experiments alone were dangerous enough.

Like nuclear tests.

The whole world paid attention whenever North Korea tested a missile.

Koreans, of course, just thought, Those bastards are at it again, and got on with their day. But that was because we knew they weren't going to fire at us.

Terrorist groups were as crazy as North Korea. Crazier, even.

“You must have heard from Mr. Johnson. Today alone, terrorist groups carried out the same kind of attack simultaneously in California, Arizona, and Texas. And this isn’t happening only in the United States.”

President Doramp swept a hand through the hologram.

The globe vanished. Dozens of small windows took its place.

> “Surrender! Put down your weapons now, and…!”
>
> “God is great!”
>
> “R-run!”
>
> “BOOM!”

Dozens of languages, translated for me by the System, mingled in a deafening clamor.

People of different appearances and skin colors fled explosions or screamed as human bone and flesh sprayed over them.

“There have been thirty-two attempted attacks around the world today alone. Fortunately, as with the incident in Texas that made the news, the damage so far has been minor. But if the terrorist groups complete their experiments with the Gates and Magic Gems in their possession…”

Chuck Hagel, fiddling with his cigar, cut in.

“Fuck. Everything goes to shit. Monster Waves will break out at any time, anywhere, just like what happened in South Korea.”

Magic Johnson spoke with a sigh.

“And the rebels won’t stay quiet, either. They’re just as dangerous as the terrorist groups. They kidnap even children, brainwash them, and use them as soldiers. If it meant taking over a country, they wouldn’t bat an eye even if tens or hundreds of thousands of people died.”

Why did that remind me of the saying that human beings were capable of both the greatest good and the greatest evil?

The bodies of the people who had died before my eyes only weeks ago came back to me. So did their screams. A weight settled in my chest.

“Hmm.”

I glanced sideways at Team Leader Choi with a low hum.

His gaze was deeply sunken as he remembered someone who had left his side not long ago.

That can’t happen again.

I didn’t know how cruel people could become, or how many had to die or be hurt before this insane wheel stopped turning.

But at the same time, I felt relieved. I possessed enough power to stop that endlessly turning wheel, even if only for a moment.

And if I couldn't stop it…

I'll break it.

Having already made up my mind, I looked at President Doramp and suddenly spoke.

"When will the operation to wipe them out begin?"

He understood what I meant. A smile spread across his face, and at his signal, someone at the pentagonal table stood.

"Assuming the entire UN Security Council agrees, we estimate that it will take two months at the earliest to complete all preparations. At the longest, it may take more than six months."

"Two months at the earliest?"

Slow. Far slower than I'd expected.

I frowned.

"Considering how dangerous you've said the situation is, doesn't that seem like an awfully long time?"

"International law leaves us little choice. Deploying troops to countries in the Middle East and Africa without their consent would be a clear violation of their sovereignty."

"Funny. My modern history textbooks made it look like you fought in the Middle East just fine. I watched a documentary criticizing the oil money involved, too."

The key government official who had been listening suddenly lost his ability to speak and cleared his throat.

"Ahem… That was because of the 9/11 attacks. Under the new international agreements made after the Great Cataclysm—"

"Never mind. Two months really is the absolute earliest?"

"Ahem. Yes."

I thought for a moment, then leaned close to President Doramp and whispered.

"Can I ask you something?"

"Anything."

"Suppose someone nobody could identify—some mysterious stranger, for example—wiped out the African rebels or the terrorist groups in the Middle East. Would that break international law?"

"Pardon?"

"Batman. Spider-Man. Someone like that. And lower your voice before you answer."

President Doramp stared blankly at me. When he finally caught on, he struggled to get the words out.

“So you’re saying that Mr. Jin would hide his identity and launch an operation against the terrorist groups…?”

“Me? Why would I?”

“But what you just said—”

“I never said that. It was an example.”

“W-wait, Mr. Jin.”

“This man is going to cause a disaster. Why would I do something like that alone? Unless I were some lunatic who stormed into Ares Guild headquarters by himself.”

“…”

A suffocating silence filled the room.

President Doramp stared at me as if I were insane. At last, he spoke.

“It seems I misunderstood. What an absurd thought.”

“Right?”

“Yes. In that case, we’ll end today’s meeting here. I’m going to leave the holographic tactical map behind by accident.”

“Ah. An accident.”

“Yes. It’s top-secret—more secret than any other classified information—so it must never be leaked outside. Especially since it contains the precise locations of rebel forces in the Middle East and Africa.”

“Anything else?”

“Everything necessary is in the materials. Not that you’ll have any opportunity to obtain them, Mr. Jin. You’ll be heading straight back to Korea, won’t you, Mr. Johnson?”

Magic Johnson had caught on. He nodded.

“Of course, Mr. President. Though Jin likes to travel. I wonder if it would be all right for me to take a few days off and spend some time with him.”

“Is that so? Is there anywhere you particularly like to—”

“Africa and the Middle East,” I said without drawing breath. “I go crazy for deserts. My dream is to pee in an oasis and give the Sphinx some Churu[2734].”

Team Leader Choi added calmly, “I was born in summer, so I like hot places.”

“Well. What a coincidence.”

“Ready, Choi?”

“Of course, Johnson… No, that sounds a little strange.”

The conversation was bewildering, yet somehow going remarkably smoothly. Chuck Hagel clamped his cigar between his teeth and put an end to it.

“A lunatic is going to kill lunatics.”

He was right. Lunatics ought to die at the hands of a lunatic.

[2734] Churu is a lickable cat treat.

It was an ordinary day.

Muhammad Saladir ad-Din, leader of an armed Islamic terrorist group, had interrogated a foreign prisoner and killed a subordinate who'd gotten mouthy. Then he returned to his bedroom.

Before he could take off his outer clothes, he found an uninvited guest waiting for him.

"Stand up straight, Hassan."

"…?"

Chapter 609

"Stand up straight, Hassan."

"…?"

Muhammad Saladir ad-Din, leader of a massive Islamic terrorist group, was momentarily taken aback.

Who the hell was Hassan? And whose voice had just spoken in his bedroom, where no one else should have been?

But if something this minor could make him lose his composure, he never would have risen to his current position.

Muhammad answered calmly.

"Sorry, but I'm not Hassan. I don't know who you are, but you seem to have mistaken me for someone else."

"I don't think so."

Step.

The uninvited guest emerged from the darkness, speaking flawless Arabic without a syllable out of place. When Muhammad saw the intruder's face, he narrowed his eyes.

What the hell? Who is this strange bastard?

The man's features were impossible to make out, but the mask covering his face was bizarre enough on its own.

It wasn't a turban or a strip of cloth. It was made of thick red yarn, with gaping holes for his eyes and mouth.

Calling it a mask was strange enough. Muhammad had never seen a lunatic wear anything like it in the scorching desert.

"Who are you?" he asked.

The man, who appeared to be an assassin, answered.

"I'm Mami…"

"Mami?"

"No, I'm a back scratcher."

"…?"

A filial son was one thing, and a hand was another. What the hell was a "filial son's hand"[2735] supposed to be?

One thing was certain: the man hadn't come to practice filial piety.

"Who sent you?"

"Allah."

"Allah?"

[2735] Hyojason, the Korean word for a back scratcher, literally means "a filial son's hand."

"Yeah. That Allah you're always sucking off."

Muhammad saw the corner of the man's mouth lift through the hole in his mask.

"He told me to tell you he never ordered any of that shit, so stop interpreting the scripture however the fuck you want."

"You insane bastard."

"I never thought I'd live to hear a terrorist leader call me an insane bastard. What a shitty life."

Muhammad considered when to draw the scimitar at his waist, then spoke with an air of authority.

"You fool. Do you really think you'll get away with this?"

"Yep. I think I'll be fine."

"You seem eager to die. If you surrender now…"

"Yeah, I think I heard that a minute ago. Hang on."

The man rummaged through his clothes, then pulled something from his sleeve and tossed it.

Thud. Roll…

A round object landed with a heavy thud and rolled to Muhammad's feet.

Healthy bronze skin, like a desert warrior's. Eyes frozen wide open. Not a drop of blood stained the cleanly severed neck.

"K-Kasim?"

"Why are you so surprised? Know him?"

"…!"

Muhammad froze solid.

Kasim was the bodyguard and assassin he trusted more than anyone.

An S-rank Hunter unknown to the world, Kasim was an Awakened assassin whose victims were too numerous to count.

He killed Kasim? So quickly and quietly that no one noticed?

Allah help me. This is real.

Fear gripped Muhammad's entire body, and his voice trembled.

"I-I'll give you one last chance. Leave now, and I'll forget what happened today. There'll be no retaliation."

"N-No, dumbass. Why bother with all that when I can just kill you?"

"T-Then I'll give you as much wealth as you want! Diamonds! What about diamonds?"

His ultimate diamond attack!

"Diamonds? The ones in the safe under your desk? I already took those. They were pretty."

But it had no effect! Muhammad's world went dark!

“Bodyguards! Bodyguarrrds! Omari! Sadat! Nasser! Where are you all?”

Muhammad had lost his composure. As he screamed their names, the intruder called along with him.

“Omari! Sadat! Nasser! Right here!”

Thud. Thud. Thud.

“Woohoo! Bodyguard heads acquired!”

How had all those heads come out of that narrow sleeve?

Muhammad stared in horror at the three heads that had fallen one after another. Then—

Bang!

The door, which had remained firmly shut despite the commotion in the bedroom, flew open. A huge man wearing the same kind of mask walked in.

“Is this terrorist asshole still alive?”

Blood soaked his hands. Muhammad froze like a statue, and the intruder raised a hand in greeting.

“There’s still work to do. Are you finished cleaning up?”

“More or less. The other two are downstairs looking around. By the way, can’t I take off this shitty mask? I’ve been suffocating in it.”

“No.”

“Damn it. Then at least let me smoke a cigar. My face is covered by illusion Magic anyway.”

“Why not hang your ID around your neck? Anyone with half a brain would account for illusion Magic. You’re already huge, and with your skills, smoking a cigar would practically advertise that you’re Chuck Hagel.”

Muhammad’s eyes widened as he realized something.

“C-Chuck Hagel? You bastards! You’re from the United States!”

“Gasp. How did this bastard figure that out? Chuck, there must be a spy among the U.S. leadership.”

As the intruder recoiled in surprise, Chuck Hagel put a cigar between his teeth and muttered,

“…Crazy Korean.”

“No, Chuck. Are you insane? If you say Korean here, he’ll understand us.”

“I think I’m going to lose my mind. I think I’m going to lose my mind. I think I’m going out to eat lunch…”

But Chuck Hagel wasn’t the one on the verge of losing his mind. Muhammad was.

As if the name Chuck Hagel hadn’t been enough, now he’d heard Korean.

He couldn’t help thinking of the most famous Korean in the world right now.

“J-Jin Taekyung?”

“No, I’m a back scratcher.”

“D-Don’t give me that bullshit. Who do you think you’re fooling—”

Whoosh! Slash!

Muhammad’s jeweled turban flew off. Even the few strands of hair left on his head were cut away as if erased.

The strange man—or rather, Jin Taekyung—asked the frozen Muhammad, who had forgotten how to breathe.

“I’ll ask again. Who am I?”

“A-A back scratcher.”

“You said Jin Taekyung a moment ago.”

“I-I was mistaken. I must have mistaken you!”

“Really? Can you swear to God?”

“I-I swear by mighty Allah and the Prophet Muhammad! You’re a back scratcher!”

“How dare you swear by God and lie? I’m Jin Taekyung, you apostate bastard!”

“Gyaaaaaah!”

Muhammad, seized by terror, screamed with all his strength. But the sound vanished without ever leaving the bedroom.

A barrier of qi, formed from powerful internal energy, sealed the space without the slightest gap.

“W-Why the hell are you doing this to me?”

Muhammad was crying now. Chuck Hagel let out a quiet laugh.

“Don’t ask us. Ask the god whose name you’ve been peddling. You’ll meet him soon enough anyway.”

“…!”

“Oh. Of course, there’s something you need to do first.”

Muhammad didn’t hear Chuck Hagel’s last words. What he’d said before filled Muhammad’s mind to bursting.

Meet God? I’m going to die? Me?

Death.

Every human being thought about that word, but not Muhammad. He had always been the one who dealt death, never the one on the receiving end.

A shrill voice slipped between his trembling lips.

“T-That can’t be. It can’t.”

He had joined an armed terrorist organization as a boy. Instead of a pen, he’d held an automatic rifle; after awakening, he’d taken up a sword.

He had risen through the ranks to lead a terrorist organization, kidnapping, imprisoning, and brutally executing countless people.

Muhammad shared a name with the prophet of old. He believed himself a new prophet and leader.

But then… why?

“I-I’m under God’s protection. How could this…”

“It’s simple.”

The corners of Jin Taekyung’s mouth, which had been raised through the holes in his mask, slowly sank.

When Jin Taekyung spoke, his voice had turned cold.

“You’re a fucking lunatic who’s used God’s name to do every kind of insane shit. That’s why you’re dying.”

“…!”

“Attacking civilians. Kidnapping kids and brainwashing them. Strapping bombs to their bodies for suicide attacks… I can’t even list everything. There’s too much.”

Hack. Ptooey.

Chuck Hagel spat, and the phlegm landed thickly on Muhammad’s face. His rough voice followed, cutting into Muhammad’s ears.

“So I’ll give you one last chance. You’re a fucking terrorist bastard who’d have no right to complain if Johnson tormented you all week. But cooperate, and maybe you’ll have something to say for yourself before God.”

“W-What does that mean?”

“It doesn’t mean we’re letting you live. But you might die with a little less pain.”

“W-What the hell do you want?”

“Orders.”

“What?”

“We know you have countless branches under your command. We also know about the other armed terrorist organization at odds with you. The problem is that wiping them out one by one would never end. So give them orders.”

Hoo…

Chuck Hagel exhaled acrid cigar smoke and grinned.

“Start an all-out offensive against your enemies. Right now. Keep fighting until one side crumbles into the desert sand. Got it, you son of a bitch?”

“…!”

Facing Muhammad, whose eyes were wide with terror, Jin Taekyung pressed his hands together as if in prayer and added one more thing.

“From now on, kill each other.”

Muhammad finally understood. He had no choices left.

If he refused this final offer, all that awaited him was an agonizing, brutal death.

If I'd been a reasonably popular webnovel author, I could've gotten at least five episodes out of this.

Power struggles between terrorist groups large and small, political scenes, a few other ingredients thrown in for flavor—I could probably have stretched it to ten.

But I wasn't a webnovel author, and there were plenty of terrorist groups and rebel forces we needed to deal with right away.

In short, we had to run our asses off.

Kaboom!

Boom-boom-boom!

At first, we tried to handle things quietly. But the territory was vast and there were too few of us to cover it. Before long, we started getting a warm welcome.

And the single word enemy included a hail of gunfire and artillery shells, along with Awakened who called themselves "warriors of God."

"Kill them!"

"They're the ones who wiped out the mujahideen!"[2736]

"Thirty million dollars, paid immediately, to whoever captures or kills them!"

Shishshishshishk!

Dodging attacks raining down from every direction, I shouted in amazement.

"Wow, our bounty went up!"

"Shut up and dodge!"

"I think it was ten million yesterday. So this is why Luffy goes pirating!"

"Fucking shut up! Motherfuckeeer!"

"Fifty million! Let's hit fifty million! The Grand Line is just ahead!"

Sometimes we fought pitched battles. Other times, we slipped in like thieves in the night and wiped out a terrorist group or rebel force.

And when we reached the Grand Line—no, the desert—a living treasure was waiting for us.

"Leader of the Sooni faction. Omar al-Hussein, right?"

"It's Sunni, not Sooni."

"What are you talking about, you bastard who looks like Jeomsoon from the land steward's house?"[2737]

"Bastard…!"

"Hey, kid. Spring fists taste best in spring."

Crack!

[2736] Mujahideen is the plural of mujahid, a person who engages in jihad; the term is often used for armed fighters.

[2737] This alludes to Kim Yu-jeong's short story Camellias, which includes a line about spring potatoes. "Spring fists" substitutes fists for potatoes.

We didn’t stop. We fought across dozens of regions every day, capturing the leaders of terrorist groups and rebel forces or controlling them with Magic Johnson’s custom brainwashing Magic.

And just like that… a week passed in the blink of an eye.

Chapter 610

While dealing with armed terrorist groups and rebel forces in the Middle East, I came to realize two things.

First, there was no end to human malice.

Second, this horrific wheel would keep turning.

There were just too many bad people in the world.

They were weeds, plain and simple—viruses found everywhere on Earth. No matter how many you pulled out, more would grow somewhere else and make the world sick.

There was no way to stop this damn wheel forever.

Still, one thing is certain.

Even if I couldn't stop it forever, I could break it and bring it to a halt for a while.

And the old man sitting in front of me was one of the biggest parts keeping that enormous wheel turning.

"Hey there, young man in the strange mask."

The old man spoke calmly, stroking a teacup that gave off a strange scent with his wrinkled hand.

"Finding me was impressive, but… the world doesn't change that easily."

Al Diab Jawahiri—a man with a name as long as any other Arab's—remained calm despite the thunderous noises outside and the uninvited guest who had barged in.

He's clearly nothing more than a powerless old man.

I didn't know whether that remarkable composure came from more than a century of experience, or from the fact that he was the leader of Al-Qaeda, a colossal terrorist organization that divided control of the Middle East with ISIS.

What mattered was that he was wrong.

"It does change. People change, and someday the world will, too."

"Do you know how many Muslims bow before mighty Allah?"

"No. Other than the one sitting in front of me."

"Twenty-five percent, they say. Twenty-five percent of the entire world. That's over a billion people."

Al Diab smiled faintly and continued.

"You're fighting more than a billion Muslims. You've made mighty Allah and His servants your enemies."

The ramblings of a crazy old man weren't going to shake me. I smiled back.

"Not Muslims. Terrorists like you."

“I won’t deny that some of them still do not sympathize with us. It is a truly regrettable thing. But in the end, we are brothers. Bound together in the name of Allah, we will eventually gather beneath a single flag.”

“Is that why your ‘brothers’ split into Shiites and Sunnis[2738] and have spent centuries beating the hell out of each other?”

Al Diab answered without batting an eye.

“There is nothing strange about it. Husbands and wives. Brothers and sisters. Even within one household, people quarrel endlessly.”

“That’s because your family’s a complete mess. Mine isn’t.”

“What can one do? The conflict has been passed down from our ancestors. It is only a small dispute born of trivial misunderstandings and differences of opinion—a step on the way to becoming one.”

Al Diab didn’t understand. No, he didn’t want to understand in the slightest.

He didn’t understand how much suffering innocent people had endured because of those trivial misunderstandings and conflicts, and that hollow word unity.

Or how many countless people would suffer in the future.

Monster.

The old man before me was a monster, too. One consumed by twisted beliefs and stubborn conviction.

Then I saw a broad smile spread across his face, and a chill ran through me.

“What do you say, misguided young man? Why not put an end to this foolishness and join me?”

“…!”

“Your eyes are wavering. Your heart is shaken. Do not suffer while trapped by countless afflictions. Enter the warm embrace of Allah.”

His voice was perfectly serene as his deeply wrinkled hand reached slowly toward me.

I watched him with a faint tremor in my eyes, then let out a small sigh.

“Has living this long driven you out of your mind, old man…? What kind of shit are you trying to pull?”

“…!”

Shock flashed in his eyes.

“If you get caught trying something, you pay in blood. Pick one: neck or wrist.”

The instant our eyes met—

Shk! Bang!

Everything happened in an instant.

[2738] Shia and Sunni are the two main branches of Islam. Their division began over who should succeed the Prophet Muhammad as leader of the Muslim community.

The slender old man's wrist shot into the air, severed by the short sword I swung at the speed of a ray of light. At the same time, a bullet fired from a special firearm hidden deep inside his dark, voluminous sleeve pierced somewhere beyond my shoulder.

In short, I dodged. He didn't.

"Aaaaaaargh!"

Quite a set of lungs on the old man.

The scream was impossibly loud for someone well over a hundred years old. Clutching the stump of his cleanly severed wrist, Al Diab collapsed onto the carpet.

And then… another group moved even faster.

Shishshishshishk!

They emerged like ghosts from the ceiling, the walls, and beneath the carpet-covered floor. Beams of light and gusts of wind swirled from their hands.

Front, back, left, right—they surrounded me from all thirty-six directions[2739] and unleashed a terrifying assault.

But instead of dodging, I chose to attack.

Inventory open. Equip Fire Dragon Armor.

At the same instant—

Kakak! Ting-ting!

Aura tore through the air and struck the reddish armor, only to vanish. Blackened arrowheads bounced off it harmlessly.

Of course they did. Nothing short of the concentrated energy called Force or an Aura Blade could pierce the Fire Dragon Armor.

The men had the air of Murim assassins about them. I had no idea who had trained them, or how, but they realized the same thing immediately.

Whoosh!

No orders. Not even an exchanged glance.

The men in black turbans moved like machines following a programmed command. They abandoned my armored upper body and aimed for the exposed areas, including my lower body.

But the Fire Dragon Armor was a divine weapon capable of changing the course of a fight.

Against someone stronger than me, it could let me hold my own for a while. Against someone my equal, it could give me an overwhelming advantage.

And against people far weaker than me?

Thirty men? Even if ten times as many rushed me, they would be the ones to fall.

"Come on in, you crow bastards."

[2739] "Thirty-six directions" is a traditional martial-arts expression for every direction around a person, not literal compass points.

With that short taunt, I brought down the short sword in my hand.

Whoosh!

One horizontal strike was enough.

Kabooooom!

Superheated air erupted along the blade, melting Magic and weapons alike. The space around me warped.

As the mighty power that had lain dormant stretched and woke, the underground hideout shook from top to bottom.

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

The ground and ceiling weren't the only things shaking.

Several pairs of eyes visible between the black turbans quivered faintly.

Maybe it was because the men caught in my sword's path had died without so much as a final cry. Maybe they had felt the unbelievable gap in our strength.

Maybe it was both.

Either way, it was too late to retreat.

"Not coming? Then I'll come to you."

The word outnumbered had long since lost its meaning for me.

I had occasionally fought dozens of people, sometimes hundreds, and rarely even thousands—and I had survived every time.

The battle about to unfold here was nothing more than an extension of all the battles that had come before.

Shing!

A blade shot up from the ground and grazed my chin.

The patient one had never revealed himself, even while his comrades appeared one after another. But his attack had failed, and the price was death.

Crack!

I unleashed a grappling technique at lightning speed.

Before the man who had performed the bizarre feat of rotating his neck several times could collapse, I thrust out one hand.

Shishshik! Puk!

Five streams of Finger Qi cut through the air. Some of the crows launching themselves off the ceiling and walls fell.

The others who rushed in while leaving behind their comrade, whose neck had been pierced clean through, met much the same fate.

Fwooooooosh! Slash!

Their One Strike carried desperate resolve.

But the gap between will and ability was vast and deep.

My short sword split one man in two along with his sword. His body fell like a kite with its string cut.

Fwoosh! Boom!

I drove a palm strike at the blood spraying through the air. It evaporated in the terrible heat, and another attacker coming at me from beyond it flew backward even faster than he'd approached, slamming into the wall.

Boom!

The impact shook the room.

But even if the whole world had been turned upside down, their attacks wouldn't have stopped.

Whoosh!

Neck. Calf. Hand.

Three attacks whistled through the air at once, each aimed at a different target.

Instead of dodging, I stepped forward and swung the short sword in my hand.

No. I threw it.

Fwooooooosh! Crunch!

No one could survive with a Force-infused sword embedded in their heart.

The hilt slipped from its owner's hand as he died.

I reached for the two blades already closing in on me.

Grab!

Aura was an incredibly sharp and destructive concentration of energy. Cutting through bare hands imbued with Force was another matter.

I tightened my grip on the blades.

Grnk. Crack!

"…!"

"…!"

Two swords broke in half. Two pairs of eyes went wide with shock.

I said goodbye without a trace of emotion.

"Go."

"W-Wait…!"

"Oh, take these with you."

Had they ever given the people they killed time to say even one last word?

Maybe they had. I wasn't going to.

Puk!

"Guh!"

They let out gurgling cries as I drove their own broken blades into their chests.

The light faded from their eyes.

Thud.

The two bodies fell like rotten logs. I looked around.

No one else came at me. There was no more sound of attacks cutting through the air, no more death.

Only one man remained, staring at me in terror.

“Satan. You… you’re Satan.”

“Maybe. At least to people like you.”

Satan. I’d first heard the word from a deacon at church when I was little. By now, it felt almost as familiar as my own name.

I pulled the short sword from a corpse and approached Al Diab, muttering,

“Funny, isn’t it? The people who act more like demons than anyone else keep calling me Satan.”

“Y-You devil! Stay away from me! Evil Satan! Demon! In God’s name, begone!”

“…I’ve heard that a lot on Line 1.[2740] I’m suddenly getting homesick for a place I’ve never even missed.”

I was briefly wondering whether Al Diab had studied in Korea when the iron door leading outside opened. The noise beyond it had died away, and the Skeleton King appeared, covered in dust.

“Vile human. Are you finished?”

“Yeah. You?”

“I finished a little while ago. I’m getting ready to work. There’s no shortage of usable material, and I certainly have no objection, but… are you sure about this?”

“About what?”

“They’re human, like you. Your own kind. Using them for my Skeleton army might bother you…”

“They’re not my kind. Besides, this way I can go back to Korea with peace of mind.”

I answered without hesitation, then introduced the Skeleton King to Al Diab, who had frozen with his eyes wide open.

“Oh. This one’s an actual demon.”

“…!”

Fight barbarians with barbarians.

Barbarians should be dealt with by barbarians. Terrorists should be dealt with by what used to be terrorists.

I jabbed the Skeleton King in the side.

“Hey. Do it.”

“…I don’t want to.”

“Come on, don’t be like that. Do it already.”

[2740] Seoul Subway Line 1 is stereotypically associated with eccentric older passengers and their loud outbursts.

Looking less than pleased, he gave Al Diab a thumbs-up.
“Don’t worry! The undead army will take care of those piece-of-shit terrorists!”
Oh, I couldn’t resist that.

Chapter 611

"Allah[2741]! O great Allah!"

"Deal with him, Satan."

"Goodbye, vile human."

I left Al Diab, who was screaming loud enough to split the heavens, in the Skeleton King's hands and turned away. Whatever happened after that was no longer my concern.

If he had been the leader of some run-of-the-mill terrorist organization, there would have been nothing left to discuss—I would have executed him on the spot. But the leader of Al-Qaeda was another matter entirely. Magic Johnson or the Skeleton King would probably find a way to put him to good use. Whether through Magic or some kind of divine power.

Maybe I should have learned the Soul-Seizing Technique.

I felt a twinge of regret.

The Soul-Seizing Technique bewitched and controlled people. It was classified among the demonic, heterodox arts, but there were people in the orthodox faction who had learned it. The same went for the disguise technique.

I hadn't learned either one. Not because I didn't need them—I'd just been too busy putting on a tearful shitshow trying to stay alive.

Come to think of it, there's a practitioner of demonic, heterodox arts nearby...

I wasn't sure whether that guy had learned the Soul-Seizing Technique. If I got the chance, maybe I could learn a few techniques from him that might prove useful in the future.

While I was thinking about matters in the Murim, the enormous underground hideout, which resembled a giant anthill, finally came to an end. An endless sandy desert filled my field of vision.

Beneath the glittering stars, a man puffing thick clouds of cigar smoke opened his mouth in a rough voice.

"Back already? That was quicker than I expected. Did you catch Al Diab?"

I looked over the bodies of the terrorists scattered around him and answered.

"Yes. I left him with the Skeleton King."

"Allah's faithful servant, in the hands of a monster. Good. Damn old bastard. I'd have liked to see his face."

"He didn't seem to like it very much. He's probably still screaming and calling him Satan."

Chuck Hagel laughed with satisfaction.

[2741] Allah is the Arabic word for God.

He'd learned the Skeleton King's true identity three days ago. In the short conversation that followed, he'd proved that he thought nothing like an ordinary person.

"Undead?"

"Yes."

"Is Undead his last name? Because I could've sworn you called him Stone King earlier."

"No. Undead is his gender. Wait, not gender—species."

"You said he was from Georgia."

"Surprise. He's actually the Skeleton King from the Demon Realm."

"So he's a monster."

"Yes."

"Hey, motherfucker. Are you kidding me? Why is there a monster here—"

"Technically, an undead monster. A named undead monster, to be even more precise."

"…Are you people out of your minds? What the hell are you doing?"

"He's a monster, but he saved my life from an Arch Lich during the Small Cataclysm."

"What?"

"Oh, and he helped suppress more than ten Mutated Gates and three Gate Waves in Korea."

"Holy shit. So he's a war veteran. Welcome, undead warrior."

Black cat or white cat.

People said it didn't matter whether a cat was black or white as long as it caught mice. Even so, Chuck Hagel's way of thinking was truly extraordinary.

My grandfather was a goddamn Indian-killer who even received medals. But I don't give a fuck about that. If someone can deal with fucking terrorists and Gates and has the heart to devote themselves to helping people, what does skin color matter?

"Chuck. He doesn't have skin."

"Don't care what color his bones are, either."

Chuck Hagel's willingness to look past not just race but species was enough to make my heart swell. He even showed an ambition I could hardly believe coming from the Secretary of Defense of the United States.

"I won't tell the President."

"I was hoping you'd say that, Chuck, but… can you really do that?"

"He didn't ask."

"Oh."

"That's how the military works. If you don't get caught, it's fine. Write 'military,' read it as 'sham.'"

Of course, that was complete nonsense. How could a country's Secretary of Defense know something like this and keep quiet just because the President hadn't asked?

But it was also the sort of crazy thing Chuck Hagel could get away with. Uncle Chuck was, along with Magic Johnson, a symbol of the United States. The legendary war heroes born from the Great Cataclysm had been granted tremendous love and affection—along with an unspoken free pass.

Even with that free pass, it's still crazy. Hm.

Fortunately, Chuck Hagel had done crazy things often enough.

I looked at him warmly.

"What's with that look?"

"I just really like you, Chuck."

"Was that why you were so close to Johnson?"

"…That's how you took it? Come to think of it, where are the other two?"

I hadn't seen Team Leader Choi or Magic Johnson anywhere nearby. Chuck Hagel chewed on his cigar as he answered.

"They're investigating the Gate. These bastards even had a secret Magic Gem laboratory."

A secret laboratory. I'd half expected it.

A middling terrorist group might not have had the resources, but Al-Qaeda carried out attacks around the world. It had people and supplies to spare. A Magic Gem laboratory cost an astronomical amount to run, but finding one here wasn't much of a surprise.

"How big?"

"Bigger than we expected. Choi and Johnson think it was built at least ten years ago."

"Ten years?"

"Yes. I don't know whether they conducted other experiments here before this, or whether they were planning terrorist attacks using Magic Gems, as we feared… But it's clear that they've been plotting something for quite a long time."

"Hmm."

Apparently Go Jun hadn't been the first to think of using Magic Gems to kill people. Given that Al-Qaeda was a terrorist organization, that wasn't exactly surprising.

"Did they get anywhere? Have they found something?"

"Who knows? We'll have to squeeze the terrorist researchers for answers. But if they'd achieved anything, I imagine an even bigger incident would already have happened."

"That's true."

“At the very least, the terrorist attacks that took place in Texas and elsewhere this time have little to do with Al-Qaeda. If it had been them, they would have already obtained data through human experimentation. They would have had no reason to put on such a stupid show of suicide.”

He had a point. If the attacks had succeeded, that might have been different. But Al-Qaeda had no reason to throw away valuable Hunters and Magic Gems on a suicide show that only advertised their stupidity. It wasn’t a banzai charge[2742] or a kamikaze attack[2743].

They would just attract a whole lot of attention and get beaten to a pulp.

As I thought that, Chuck Hagel spoke again.

“Lately, I’ve found myself thinking about something. Maybe it’s impossible to completely eradicate these bastards. Maybe that’s something we’ll never be able to do.”

He looked unusually drained today. The cigar he had been holding in his mouth was extended toward me.

“I don’t smoke.”

“I know. The point is, this goddamn American military cigar was in their possession.”

I muttered quietly.

“They have someone on the inside?”

“If it had only been the cigar, I wouldn’t have said anything. But… there was enough to fill a mountain. Food, experimental equipment, medical equipment, advanced missiles, even artifacts. Most of it was the kind of material that couldn’t be taken overseas without approval from the Ministry of National Defense.”

I firmly patted his shoulder as he muttered bitterly.

“Cheer up, Chuck. It’s not the first time, is it? And it’s not as if you didn’t know.”

“Hah. That’s comforting.”

As we had destroyed more than a few dozen terrorist organizations, the only things we had seen weren’t corpses and pools of blood. What we had seen most nakedly was the shameful face of the world.

How did they get all that stuff? Who gave it to them?

Military officials? Senior politicians? Black-market dealers who’d do anything for money? Maybe all of them.

I didn’t know. But one thing was certain: someone was watering the weeds we needed to pull out by the roots.

“Bastards.”

[2742] A banzai charge was a mass infantry assault associated with Japanese forces during World War II.

[2743] Kamikaze refers to Japanese suicide attacks, particularly those carried out by pilots during World War II.

Chuck Hagel hurled his cigar into the distance. Its faint ember vanished in the cold darkness of the desert. He watched it disappear, then spoke on a sigh.

"Crazy Korean. What are you going to do now?"

The sudden question pulled me from my thoughts, but I answered calmly. I had already made up my mind several days ago.

"I'm going back."

"To South Korea? Well, it couldn't be North Korea, so I suppose that's right."

"Hard to say."

Half right, half wrong. I neither confirmed nor denied it, only shrugged.

Chuck Hagel smiled ruefully.

"Right. You can't keep playing masked vigilante in that ridiculous getup forever."

"Hmm. I wouldn't call it particularly ridiculous."

"You serious? Is it a South Korean fashion thing?"

I let out a quiet laugh.

"I didn't mean to us."

"Hm?"

"The rebels and terrorists. How do you think it looks to them?"

"…!"

Chuck Hagel's mouth closed tightly.

I looked up at the night sky, crowded with constellations I couldn't name.

"The Mujahideen. Al-Qaeda. ISIS's Syrian branch…"

I recited the names of the major terrorist groups whose leaders and headquarters we'd destroyed over the past week, then the names of the smaller groups we'd uprooted entirely.

"We haven't dealt with all of them, but we've sent a clear warning."

They didn't know our names or ages, let alone our nationalities or what we looked like.

We wore masks, avoided surveillance with Magic Johnson's Magic, and fought while changing our weapons and combat methods.

And…

"Nothing's scarier than an enemy you can't identify."

In just one week, we'd become something terrorist organizations feared. They couldn't catch us, even with enormous bounties on our heads. Without knowing who we were, they couldn't use their favorite tactic against us: retaliatory attacks.

On top of that, several leaders of some of the world's most notorious international terrorist organizations had already died at our hands or been controlled into starting internal conflicts.

"If they don't want the same thing to happen to them, they'll keep their heads down."

A weak deterrent invited defiance. Overwhelming force inspired fear.

The prisoners we'd freed had already stood before microphones and cameras to tell the world what they'd seen and suffered. Once again, the international community was burning like a furnace—over the horrors unfolding around the world, and over us.

"Given time, things will get a little better."

The weed called malice sprouts first in a person's heart. People who harbor it go on to do evil.

But what could you do? You couldn't pull every weed out of every heart. You could pull out the weeds you could see.

"It's not about how many weeds you pull. It's about how many people pull them together. You and me, Chuck. Like we did."

One person could pull one. Someone else, two. Or three.

If everyone paid attention and did their part, wouldn't the weeds eventually disappear? I'd only recently come to that small but profound realization.

"Well, that's what I think, anyway."

Had I been talking too much? I let the silence settle. Chuck Hagel studied me with an odd expression, then spoke.

"Hey. Can I ask you something?"

"Anything."

"I didn't get an answer earlier… Where exactly are you going back to? Judging by what you just said, it sounds like you should at least be going to the Vatican."

I laughed quietly.

"It's hard to explain. Somewhere like this."

"Where, Afghanistan?"

"Farther than that. Much farther."

"…Much farther?"

Chuck Hagel looked bewildered, and my smile deepened despite myself.

Yes. It was time to go back.

After I took care of the one thing I'd put off until the very end.

Chapter 612

"Come out."

His voice was low and steady, his eyes glinting sharply in the dark.

I watched him without answering. After a brief silence, a click sounded and the living room lit up.

The man took a cautious step forward and spoke again, putting more force into his voice.

"I know you're hiding. Come out. Do you know who I am?"

Of course I did. I knew his name and face, even his age and hometown. I just hadn't expected him to pull this the moment I came home.

"All right, last chance. If you don't come out by the time I count to three, I'm calling a younger buddy of mine. He's a really strong, successful Hunter. One. Two…"

I was curious about what would happen after he counted to three, but after seeing everything there was to see, continuing to watch felt embarrassing.

I spoke with a sigh.

"Don't tell me that close younger friend is me?"

"…!"

"Well, would you look at that. Guess I was right."

Jinho stood frozen like a statue, staring at me with his eyes wide.

"Wh-What? Why are you coming out of there?"

"I knew you were going to call me anyway, so I came early. Happy?"

Jinho fell silent for a moment, then asked with a grave expression, "How much did you see?"

"From 'Come out.'"

"Ah, fuck…"

"You looked cool. Your presence was so overwhelming I almost came out without being asked."

"Are you making fun of me?"

"Yeah."

Jinho stared at me after that shameless answer, then let out a quiet laugh.

"You bastard. You haven't changed at all."

Why did those few words make me so glad to see him? So grateful?

I smiled back. "I'm hungry. Make me some ramyeon.[2744]"

[2744] Ramyeon is Korean instant noodles.

Sitting across from each other with a steaming pot between us felt like going back a year.

Of course, we'd both changed a lot since then.

"First time I've seen you in a suit, hyung.[2745] You used to wear nothing but those ragged tracksuits."

"Hey, they weren't ragged. That's a pretty expensive brand."

"When did you buy them?"

"Hmm. High school?"

How old had Jinho hyung been then? After thinking for a moment, I nodded.

"So they weren't like rags. They were rags. Get me some water. No, wait. Got any soju?[2746]"

"You might as well walk into a barbecue restaurant and ask if they have meat."

"…At this rate, you're going to die young."

"I would've quit ages ago if it weren't for that asshole Section Chief Kim. That fucking bastard isn't even that far from me in age, but he picks fights over every little thing and acts like a complete jackass."

Jinho yanked his tie loose and downed three shots of soju in a row.

Late last year, he'd finally passed the civil service exam he'd spent so long preparing for.

"So you really did become a civil servant. The world's coming to an end."

"Listen to this bastard. You thought I wouldn't?"

"No. Becoming one is beside the point. I thought you'd drop dead in the act while watching porn before you ever got there."

"…Hmm. That's actually a fair point."

The fact that he didn't deny it meant he still had a shred of conscience.

If the government had a Ministry of Porn, he could have risen all the way to minister. With Sora Aoi[2747] as deputy minister and Asuka Kirara[2748] as spokesperson, he'd have ruled Pornhub.

Unfortunately, no such deranged ministry existed. Instead, Jinho had passed a special recruitment exam and been assigned to the Hunter and Gate Management Department, known as a plum posting.

I suspected our friendship had earned him a few invisible bonus points.

Glug, glug, glug.

Jinho filled his glass to the brim, then asked, "What brings you here?"

[2745] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older man with whom he is close.

[2746] Soju is a Korean alcoholic spirit commonly served in small glasses.

[2747] Sora Aoi is a Japanese former adult-film performer.

[2748] Asuka Kirara is a Japanese former adult-film performer.

“In case you’ve forgotten, this is my place. Though lately I can’t tell if it’s an officetel[2749] or a garbage dump.”

“I’m asking because the owner hasn’t shown his face in over two or three months, you punk.”

“Well, I came to see you. And there’s something I need to pick up.”

“Pick up? If it’s clothes, just buy some. You’ve got money coming out of your ears.”

“Money won’t help. Nobody sells it.”

“What is it?”

Jinho looked puzzled, then gave a short exclamation.

“Oh. That old capsule?”

“Yeah. Good thing you didn’t throw it away.”

“You said you’d kill me if I did.”

“That’s why it’s a good thing. I really would’ve had to kill you. Phew.”

“…You’re joking, right? Please tell me you’re joking.”

The game capsule that had first led me to the Murim had sat here unused ever since the System allowed me to Login and Logout freely without it.

But that didn’t make it a piece of junk I could toss aside. That old capsule had done more than anything else to make me who I was. It was priceless.

“I don’t wipe the dining table, but I wipe that capsule down once a week,” Jinho said. “It still doesn’t work, though. Why take it?”

“Just because. For decoration, I guess.”

“Isn’t that thing haunted? Remember when you lived at Hope Goshiwon?[2750] You slept in it and had some weird nightmare…”

Oh. That had happened, hadn’t it?

Jinho was bringing up my first Logout. I hurried to change the subject.

“Did you see the news? Things got pretty crazy in the Middle East and Afghanistan.”

“Huh? Where did that come from?”

“I’m asking if you saw it.”

“Of course I did. Yesterday the Middle Eastern terrorist groups and the Afghan rebels even issued a joint statement. Said they’d refrain from terrorism and keep their men in line from now on. Basically surrendered because they got scared.”

“Don’t let your guard down. It’ll only last a little while.”

“Still, those five weirdos in masks are incredible, aren’t they?”

The change of subject seemed to have worked. I breathed an inward sigh of relief and nodded.

[2749] An officetel is a Korean building type combining office and residential units.

[2750] A goshiwon is a Korean lodging house offering small, usually furnished rooms. The name comes from their use by people studying for civil-service exams.

"They are."

"Well, anyway."

Jinho slurped up his noodles, washed them down with soju, and went on.

"You've had it rough. A Monster Wave right after the new year, humans worse than monsters, and now trips to the desert and Africa."

"What do you mean, rough? It was just something I had to do…"

I suddenly faltered and let the end of the sentence trail off.

Wait. What the hell had he just said?

"Sorry, what?"

"What you heard. I took a shot in the dark, and it looks like I was more or less right."

"…!"

"Come on. How many people in the world could do something like that? Everyone says they wish the terrorists would die and they never want to see those rebel bastards again. But who'd actually put on a mask and do something about it? More to the point, who could?"

Jinho gave a quiet laugh at my wide-eyed stare.

"Some people have probably guessed, too, but they're keeping quiet. There's no evidence, and it's not as if they have any reason to blame you. But one low-ranking civil servant happens to know what kind of person the masked man is—and even shares ramyeon with him—so he can casually sound him out like this."

I rubbed the back of my head, which somehow felt numb.

I had suspected I would be named as a prime suspect, but I hadn't expected to get caught this absurdly easily.

"I-I'm really not him."

"Sure. Let's say you aren't. When did you get back?"

"…"

Damn it. There was no saving this.

I sighed, filled my soju glass, and answered. "Three days ago. No, four."

"Good. Now you're cooperating."

"Don't tell anyone. Never mind that it's classified—you'd be in danger."

Team Leader Choi, my family, and I were always surrounded by protection no one could see. Jinho wasn't.

He understood what I meant immediately and smacked his lips.

"Hmm. I feel like a big shot."

"You might get a bomb delivered before you become one."

"Maybe. But even if they all know, they won't be able to touch me, will they? They won't know what Jin Taekyung might do if he completely loses it. Hah, isn't this what you call Untouchable?"

Jinho laughed without a care, then asked, “Anyway, how busy have you been? You can’t even remember when you got back.”

“Hmm.”

How busy?

I scratched at the beard that had grown thick before I knew it.

“I train day and night. Eat with my family, then train some more.”

“Train? Why does someone at your level need to train?”

“You graduated from a prestigious university and still spent nearly ten more years studying. Same thing.”

“You bastard, going straight for the sore spot. Besides, how are we the same? It’s not just a different field—we’re on completely different levels.”

He had a point. His prestigious university admitted hundreds of students every year, and about as many graduated.

But I still needed training.

There was no end to learning, and gongbu—study—wasn’t limited to academics.

To be precise, I’m not learning something new. I’m slowly going back over what I already know.

In that sense, my training was a kind of review. Study for my own sake, and for the sake of this world.

Unfortunately, I still hadn’t managed to bring it all together.

“Ugh, look at that serious expression. It makes me want to slap you in the cheek.”

“…I’m in the middle of being serious, so could you shut that mouth of yours?”

“Put yourself in my shoes. What would you do?”

“Hmm. Fair enough. Have a drink.”

We clinked glasses. Jinho knocked back his soju, poked at the noodles that had gone cold, and asked, “So? Is the training going well?”

“More or less. I started preparing about a month ago, so I’m nearly done, but… it’s not easy.”

I wasn’t exaggerating.

I was like a child trying to assemble a ten-thousand-piece puzzle. As I checked each piece and fit them together, I felt my own shortcomings and regretted what I lacked. Now, unable to find the final piece, I was groping around in the dark.

And I already knew the name of the darkness obscuring my sight.

The heart demon.

The dark cloud over my heart refused to clear. My worries about the Murim and the modern world… and, more than anything, the last sight of Kim Hwajong kept returning to me.

His voice, which seemed as though it could fade away at any moment.

His eyes slowly closing in the red snowfield covered with blood.

Maybe I hadn't come here for the capsule after all. Maybe I'd come to find some comfort.

Not with the family I loved or the companions at my side, but with a friend living his own life in a completely different world. Maybe I'd just wanted to clink glasses with him like we used to.

Yeah. That was it.

All at once, I felt more at ease.

I hadn't shaken off the heart demon entirely, but acknowledging everything that had happened—and everything that troubled me—lifted some of the weight from my heart.

I also realized that I wasn't where I needed to be.

"I'm leaving."

"The ramyeon's cold. I was going to make tofu kimchi[2751] to go with the drinks… Wait, now?"

"Yeah. I remembered something I have to do. Drink by yourself."

"Are you crazy?"

"No. I'm your landlord. Want to start paying rent this month?"

Jinho hyung, who had been glaring at me fiercely, immediately bent deeply at the waist.

"Get home safely, Boss."

"Will do."

I laughed quietly and headed for the front door. Behind me, Jinho called out in a rush.

"Hey! What about the capsule?"

"Next time. I'll take it next time."

Even as I said it, I knew that next time, I might give him the same answer and leave the capsule where it was. I might come only to clink glasses with him, just as I had today.

"All right. Hang in there, you bastard."

Someone's quiet murmur reached my ears as I walked on.

[2751] Tofu kimchi is a Korean dish of tofu served with kimchi, often as a drinking snack.

Chapter 613

The Training Room was silent again today.

Countless kinds of weapons lay strewn across the floor, and the walls—enchanted with automatic restoration magic—had been reduced to a miserable ruin.

At the center of it all… I sat cross-legged, lost in thought.

More. Just a little more.

I was almost there.

The final piece of this enormous puzzle.

Right after parting ways with Jinho hyung[2752], I had shut myself in the Training Room and begun the last stretch of work to find it.

Even if the stress made all my hair fall out, even if the worst happened and I risked qi deviation, I had to get through it.

No matter what it took, I had to complete this puzzle before I left.

For the future.

I had only started searching for the final piece recently, but I'd decided to put the puzzle together months ago. It was probably after the battle with the Arch Lich—the incident dubbed the Small Cataclysm.

If this keeps up, everyone will be in danger.

The thought had come to me out of nowhere one day. As time passed, my unease turned into certainty.

Magical power levels had risen abnormally. Monsters had grown stronger, and human casualties—which had fallen dramatically after the Great Cataclysm—were once again mounting everywhere.

Humanity needed another kind of power. After a great deal of thought, I made my decision.

I would create martial arts.

I would give them a new sword and shield against the dangers and disasters growing by the day.

Of course, it was anything but easy. What I created had to be safe enough for even the lowest-rank Hunter to learn, yet limited enough in power that evildoers couldn't exploit it.

But… at last, I found the final piece of the puzzle.

Yes. This is it.

After hundreds of attempts, I had found a single path.

The moment I completed the still-unnamed cultivation technique—

Ding. Ding. Ding.

[2752] Hyung is a Korean term used by a man for an older brother or an older male friend.

As if congratulating me, a series of lively alerts rang out.

Team Leader Choi—or rather, Choi Minwoo, now Guild Master of the Peace Guild and Vice Guild Master of Ares Guild—was so busy he barely had time to breathe.

During the week he'd been away, the matters awaiting his attention had multiplied into the hundreds. His temporary personal secretary was sweating bullets as calls from powerful figures poured in.

"G-Guild Master. The Blue House has proposed a luncheon."

"Political figures and the Federation of Korean Industries would like you to attend a social gathering…"

"The Guild Alliance has proposed a partnership on Gate-related business…"

"Regarding the establishment of overseas branches…"

Some invitations couldn't be refused. Others easily could. Choi Minwoo's answer was always the same.

"All right. Schedule it."

He followed a schedule planned down to the minute, spending each day like a machine and barely sleeping. The people around him watched his punishing routine with concern.

"Okay, pick one. Team Leader Choi, Guild Master Choi, or Vice Guild Master Choi. What should we call you?"

"Please call me Team Leader Choi. That's what I was when we met."

"All right, then. Team Leader Choi, I'll be direct… Get some rest. Cut back your schedule and leave the little things to your secretary."

"She's right, Team Leader Choi. You may be young, but you can't keep this up without wearing yourself out."

"I'm fine. Please don't worry, either of you."

"Team Leader Choi."

"No, listen…"

As for me, I'm fine.

His voice was calm, and his answer never changed. Song Song and Im Kkeokjeong, who had tried to talk him out of it, could only fall silent.

The answer that reached their ears was the same as before, but the answer that reached their hearts was different.

As for me, I'm fine.

Choi Minwoo left them with that one phrase, the same and yet different, and continued burying himself in work.

He even dismissed the personal secretary who had been helping him a little, then plunged into days busier than ever.

So it was hardly surprising when the subject came up during a private meeting with President Baek Hanseong.

“You seem very busy these days.”

“That’s why I like it.”

“I hear you don’t even have a secretary anymore. Is there a particular reason?”

“Coffee.”

“Pardon?”

“She couldn’t make coffee. That’s all.”

President Baek Hanseong assumed it was a joke and laughed it off, but every answer Choi Minwoo had given him was sincere.

Choi Minwoo liked being buried in work so completely, and the coffee made by his young secretary had been strangely awful.

More than that, he was grateful to forget, if only for a little while, the longing and grief for someone who kept coming to mind.

“Enough idle talk from me. Let’s move on to the next item.”

One day passed. Then another.

While Jin Taekyung trained in an isolated space, Choi Minwoo isolated himself amid countless people.

Perhaps that was why, one day, a name suddenly came to mind. As he drove himself mercilessly hard, just as he always did, the longing he had buried deep inside rose to the surface.

“Driver Jung, turn the car around.”

“Pardon? I’m sorry, but I believe our next appointment is at…”

“Cancel everything today. There’s somewhere I need to go.”

The driver’s startled eyes met his in the rearview mirror. Choi Minwoo sank back into the limousine seat.

Warm spring air and sunlight came through the half-open window as he headed to meet someone.

Step. Step.

The hill he climbed alone was high and steep, and his footsteps were heavy. Or perhaps it was his heart.

Sorrow and guilt over the one person he could never reach, even if he climbed this high, steep path a hundred or a thousand times, weighed on Choi Minwoo’s heart.

Pluck. Pluck.

Along the way, he picked an armful of early spring flowers. The pure white violets didn’t seem like enough, so he added scarlet moss phlox from the clusters growing beside the path.

The man who was no longer by his side had always said he liked red.

And yet he always wore black suits.

It was only recently that Choi Minwoo had learned what color he liked most, and why he had sold all those motorcycles.

Why he had quit drinking despite once keeping alcohol so close, and why he had trimmed the shaggy beard and long hair he had grown out before neatly parting it.

Why did you do all that? You were enough for me.

He knew everything now, but he had learned it all too late.

With an ache in his chest, Choi Minwoo kept walking.

On the warm, breezy hilltop, a large burial mound awaited him, and the three characters carved into the granite gravestone stood out with unusual clarity.

The late Kim Hwajong.

What could he say?

Choi Minwoo stared at the old butler, laid to rest on this warm hill instead of a cold, snow-covered mountain. At last, he opened his mouth.

"I'm here."

His usually steady eyes trembled. He bit down on his trembling lip and slowly went on.

"…Grandfather."

The word he had held in his heart, but never once said while the old man was alive, finally escaped him.

Whoosh—

A wind swept over him from somewhere. The grass on the hill bent low, and the branches waved.

Choi Minwoo set his bouquet beside the mound. Then he froze.

What's that?

His eyes widened. He was looking at the back of the gravestone.

Words he had never noticed before were carved there.

> You came.
> Thank you, and I love you.
> Be happy.

"…!"

Who had carved them? He should have wondered, but right now, it didn't matter.

Choi Minwoo stood frozen like a stone statue, staring endlessly at the short message.

His heart shook like flowers in the wind. Something rose from deep inside him, closing his throat and making his eyes burn.

"Ah."

Overwhelmed, he let out a choked sigh.

“You came sooner than I expected. I thought I’d have to wait at least a few more days.”

A voice sounded behind him.

Choi Minwoo turned. Someone stood there holding a small box.

It was the Skeleton King.

Why was he here? What did he mean, wait?

The questions vanished as quickly as they came. What Choi Minwoo needed now wasn’t a reason, but warmth. An answer to a question he couldn’t resolve alone.

“May I ask you one thing? Just one?”

Normally, the Skeleton King would have curtly said no. This time, he readily nodded.

“Anything.”

“If it were Mr. Jin Taekyung… what would he do at a time like this?”

The Skeleton King understood the sudden question at once.

“Why do you ask?”

“Because he’s stronger than anyone I know.”

The Skeleton King stared at Choi Minwoo in silence before answering in a low voice.

“He would have cried. Without a doubt.”

“…!”

“And then he would overcome it and go on living, forever remembering the person who left.”

That was enough.

Choi Minwoo let the tears he had held back fall. With them, he let out his grief and regret, his longing and guilt.

The Skeleton King quietly stepped away. It would be better to give him the contents of the box a little later.

He remembered what Jin Taekyung had said when he entrusted him with it about half a day ago.

“Sorry, but I need a favor.”

“No. I refuse. Go away.”

“Give this to Team Leader Choi. No one else.”

“You damnable human. Now you’re not even pretending to listen. Do I look like an errand boy to you?”

“I’m not asking because you’re an errand boy. I’m asking because I trust you.”

“…What exactly am I supposed to give him?”

“Martial arts.”

"What?"

"He'll understand when you tell him. There's a letter in the box, too. Make sure he reads it."

"No. How am I supposed to find someone I haven't even seen lately…?"

"Wait at Butler Kim's grave. Even if you see him before then, don't say a word. He'll probably need time to get through this."

No matter how the Skeleton King looked at it, Jin Taekyung was a strange human.

For one thing, Choi Minwoo had arrived at the grave just as Taekyung had said he would.

And he was even stranger for the fact that once he fell asleep, he would not so much as blink even if someone grabbed him by the collar and shook him awake.

Damn him. He has the nerve to give me a petty errand like this while he sleeps without a care?

Jin Taekyung had repeatedly begged him not to wake him under any circumstances, so he was probably dead asleep by now.

The more the Skeleton King thought about Jin Taekyung, the more infuriating he found him. But honestly, for some strange reason, he did not feel all that bad.

I can entrust it to you because I trust you. Trust, huh? Hmm. Hmmm.

The Skeleton King nodded as he remembered the box in his hands and Jin Taekyung's words, then muttered quietly.

"…Sweet dreams, you devious human."

Whoosh—

The wind blew once more. It swallowed one man's sobs and the voice of a monster who had, before he knew it, grown close to people.

Chapter 614

SYSTEM

Synchronization begins. 10, 9, 8, 7… 1, 0.
Synchronization completed successfully. Updated stats have been applied to the body. The use of certain Titles is restricted.
Login complete.

Ding.

Before the familiar System notifications had even finished, I felt rough straw against my skin and smelled wet grass.

I spat out the piece of rice straw stuck to my lips and muttered inwardly.

I'm back.

Back in the Murim.

I'd spent barely over a month in the modern world, yet my time here felt like the distant past. It wasn't just my imagination.

I've had way too much going on.

The Murim. The modern world.

Everything around me in both worlds was changing fast. One thing kept happening after another. Even two bodies wouldn't have been enough to keep up.

"…"

Come to think of it, I did have two bodies. Having to control them one at a time was what made it so damn exhausting.

Anyway…

Ah. I don't want to get up.

The straw covering me was warmer and softer than I'd expected. I wanted nothing more than to lie there and sleep. I'd barely slept for nearly a week while developing a martial art for widespread use.

I might have drifted off if I hadn't heard voices nearby.

"Hmm. You're asking what kind of person Captain is?"

"Yes. I've been curious for a while. The other two aren't here yet, and I'm bored. You're curious too, aren't you, Escort Song?"

I knew those voices. After Hyuk Mujin and Ju Hwaran, Song Ilseom—the Soul-Chasing Guest—answered gruffly.

"Not particularly."

"Did you hear that? Escort Song is curious too."

"I said I'm not."

"I'll give you two more silver nyang[2753]."

"…I'm a little curious."

Money-grubbing bastard.

Once Song Ilseom had been won over by the big spender's silver donation, Mujin spoke again, sounding hesitant.

"Hmm. This is hard to answer. Captain's definitely still asleep, right?"

"Yes. Yes."

"He is. His breathing is steady."

"Well, once he falls asleep, he wouldn't notice if a ghost carried him away."

Steady, my ass.

I was controlling my breathing. I was curious what Mujin would say, too.

And my loyal right pinky toe didn't let me down.

"Our captain is that famous, really famous… uh, how do I put it…?"

"A handsome, impressive young prodigy?"

At Ju Hwaran's question, delivered in a voice as clear and lovely as a Young Chang piano, Hyuk Mujin answered without a trace of hesitation.

"He was a fucking bastard."

"…Ah."

"…Uh."

"These days, people call him the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon and all that. But a year or two ago, you'd have had a hard time finding a bigger fucking bastard. He went to pleasure houses and got shit-faced every day, stole public funds, and blew them at gambling dens. He was so bad that his sobriquet back then was…"

"Hey."

"That's right. The Night King. In that field, even all Ten Kings together wouldn't have been a match for him. Every night, he'd strap a money pouch to his side and stride off to a pleasure house like he owned the place. My fellow gate guards and I used to say, 'That fucking bastard's using the Heavenly Demon Reign Step again.' I see you've heard of him, Great Hero Song. You really do know a lot."

"What are you talking about?" Song Ilseom asked, sounding uneasy. "I didn't say anything."

"What?"

"I didn't say anything."

"Come on. You said 'hey' just now."

"No, I didn't."

"It was definitely a man's voice. Don't joke around. Then who…?"

His voice cut off.

[2753] A nyang was a traditional Korean unit of currency; here, the amount is specified in silver.

After a short, heavy silence, someone carefully lifted the straw from my face.

Rustle. Ssshh.

The straw blocking my view fell away. In the faint moonlight, my eyes met Mujin's.

I gave him a warm, friendly smile. It had been a while.

"Hey."

"…"

Mujin stared down at me in silence, his gaze growing somber. Then he laid the straw back over my face.

Very carefully, as though nothing had happened.

"Move it."

"The moon must be bright tonight. I'm hearing things…"

"If you don't move it, your life's going to get dark. Move it."

"Yes, sir."

The straw had stopped feeling warm and cozy.

Like a vampire waking after centuries sealed away by an exorcist, I rose from the wagon's cargo bed.

Whoooosh.

A chilly wind blew the bits of straw from my clothes.

Ju Hwaran met my eyes and hastily looked away. By the campfire—when had he even lit that?—Song Ilseom got to his feet, muttering that he needed to feed the horse some hay.

My shadow swelled in the flickering firelight and fell across Mujin.

"Any last words?"

"Captain, please. Hear me out."

"That's why I asked."

"You said they were my last words. It sounds like a will."

"It probably is."

"…Ah."

"You were having a great time. As your captain, I can't tell you how happy it makes me to see my subordinate enjoying himself."

That was half true. I really couldn't contain myself.

I'd busted my ass in the Murim, busted my ass in the modern world, and come back without getting any sleep—only to find my own subordinate talking shit about me behind my back.

And the name of the emotion that followed this situation straight out of a light novel was rage.

"Face, arms, legs, abdomen, back. Pick one."

"Are those my possible causes of death?"

“I’m not going to kill you. I’m just going to beat you within an inch of your life.”

Mujin thought for a moment.

“The abdomen.”

“Why?”

“Wounds on the back are… a martial artist’s shame.”

I let out an exclamation at his spirit.

“What a load of bullshit.”

“I did wrong, so I’ll take my punishment. Come at me.”

“Since you picked your abdomen, I’ll pick the rest.”

“What?”

“What do you mean, ‘what’? It wouldn’t be fair if only you got to choose. I should get a turn too.”

“No, wait. How is that fair—”

Wham!

The blow cracked through the night.

Above the slowly burning campfire, the shadow of a man soaring upward with blood spraying from his nose loomed large.

I’m already using my fists the moment I get back.

We were on Mount Daebyeol, where Anhui and Hubei bordered Henan.

Two figures approached from the distance, with Mujin’s screams providing the background music. They were the final members of the Fire Dragon Pavilion: a pair of rootless unorthodox faction nobodies.

“…Why are they beating him?”

“Taishan! Is here!”

At last, the Fire Dragon Pavilion’s Nanman expedition party had gathered in one place. I left them with a short but powerful lecture, then turned away.

“All right, let’s finish beating this bastard and get going.”

Nobody objected.

Right now, I wasn’t Jin Taekyung the S-rank Hunter. I was the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, the orthodox Murim’s greatest young prodigy, and Jin Taekyung, Fire Dragon Pavilion Master—their direct superior.

Crack!

“Urgh! Aaaagh!”

I really do love the Murim. Except for that damned Dark Heaven.

Not a single ray of light reached that pitch-black place.

In the darkness, where neither sound nor any sign of life could be felt, figures lay facedown and trembled.

Then—

“Heaven above, earth below!”

“All demons bow in submission!”

The cries erupted as one, thunderous. Crimson-black flames surged up from the darkness.

Fwoosh!

A ring of fire blazed fiercely. Yet despite being unmistakable flames, they gave off a chill that seeped into the bones. Beyond them, someone’s shadow wavered.

“It has been a long time.”

Man or woman, young or old—even the pitch of the voice was impossible to tell.

The strange voice resounded from every direction, pressing down on the figures prostrate on the floor.

“My servants.”

Everyone trembled at the overwhelming power in those two words. Some shook with fear of the absolute being before them; others with joy and rapture at seeing the one they served.

Together, they cried out.

“These foolish, lowly servants humbly pay their respects to the great Lord of Heaven!”

Lord of Heaven. Master of the heavens.

No other words could describe him.

An absolute being of unmatched dignity and greatness. The heavens above the clouds were his palace; every lowly creature on the earth below was his servant and subject.

No. They would make it so.

“How much time has passed?”

Every one of them understood the living god’s question. The figures prostrate before him were servants of the Lord of Heaven, loyal and devoted beyond words.

The young man bowing low against the floor was no different.

“Exactly one hundred and thirty-six days since the great Lord of Heaven last awoke!”

The fierce flames wavered at his answer.

“Yes. I remember. Western Heaven. That was the day the child left.”

“We are deeply ashamed!”

Led by the young man, they cried out again. This time, shame and self-reproach filled their voices.

When the Western Heaven Demon Lord and the Dark Heaven forces under his command had been annihilated at the Sichuan Tang Clan, the unexpected defeat had thrown them into confusion. They had been forced to wake their master from his deep sleep.

“Great Lord of Heaven, never again… will such a thing happen.”

The words came through the young man’s clenched teeth. The flames stirred once more.

“No. The mistake was mine, for trusting you despite your shortcomings.”

“…!”

“Blood Lord. You have your own shortcomings, do you not?”

At the most painful reprimand of all, the pupils of the young man—Blood Lord—trembled.

Blood Lord knew better than anyone what the master he worshiped meant.

Henan.

The day the orthodox Murim had named the Shaolin Bloodshed was one of the most painful memories of his life. He had accomplished far less than planned, and suffered the humiliation of leaving an arm behind.

If he hadn’t at least brought back Shaolin’s sacred treasure, the Green Jade Buddha Staff… He didn’t want to think about it.

The Sword Saint. And Jin Taekyung.

Thinking of those two bastards made him want to kill. Even tearing them apart alive wouldn’t satisfy him.

But a loyal servant must not show such thoughts before his master. Blood Lord barely suppressed his murderous intent and spoke.

“P-Please forgive me.”

Whoooong.

A chilly wind swept through the darkness in place of an answer. Blood Lord and the others huddled lower.

Then a quiet voice reached their ears.

“What is lacking can be filled.”

The air grew heavy. The wind stopped, and every living thing held its breath.

In the stillness, the Lord of Heaven continued.

“I shall fill what you lack.”

It was a command, backed by a force none of them could resist.

Fwooooooosh.

Darkness and shadow rippled.

An immense surge of qi flowed from somewhere unseen and settled into Blood Lord’s body. His eyes widened with rapture.

“L-Lord of Heaven!”

Blood Lord and the others understood once more: the master they served was a living god, an absolute being who encompassed heaven and earth.

They understood, too, what the power he had bestowed on them meant.

“Tell Southern Heaven and North Heaven.”

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

The earth trembled. The world shook.

Beyond the overwhelming energy that distorted everything, his voice rang out like thunder.

“Now… we begin the Great War.”

Heaven above, earth below. All demons bow in submission.

As his loyal servants cried out in rapture and madness, the unseen shadow waved a hand.

The crimson-black flames that had colored the pitch-black space disappeared, and darkness descended once more.

Chapter 615

The road to Yunnan Province—the region officially known by that name, though people in the Central Plains commonly called it Nanman—was long and arduous.

Prrrff. Prrf.

The horse's breathing was ragged.

We had ridden without a break for a full four shichen[2754] since leaving Mount Daebyeol. Now, having entered Hubei on the fine horses Ju Hwaran had procured, we eased the reins for a moment in an unfamiliar ravine.

"If we keep traveling like this, it'll take quite a while. You've been to Sichuan before, Pavilion Master, so you know that, don't you?"

"Me?"

Of course I knew. Just thinking about it made my calves cramp even now.

I nodded without thinking as Ju Hwaran looked at me with her clear, sparkling eyes.

"Of course. It was really fucki—"

"Pardon?"

"It was a little… difficult. A little."

I'd barely stopped myself from saying that something had almost fallen off back then.

I, Jin Taekyung, was merciless toward men, but a warm and considerate gentleman toward women.

Of course, despite having lived this long, I had never once been in a relationship.

"Even using a movement technique, it took me nearly half a month."

"Sichuan alone is well over three thousand li[2755] away. And if you traveled without any shortcuts, that's remarkable."

The praise felt good, but she probably hadn't brought this up just to compliment me.

I gave her a questioning look. Ju Hwaran smiled and pulled an old leather scroll from inside her robes.

What's that?

Just as I began to wonder, Song Ilseom, who was sitting in the saddle and inspecting the edge of his willow-leaf saber, spoke with an unexpected look on his face.

"It's made of horsehide. Is that from the horse caravans?"

Ju Hwaran nodded.

"You recognize it. Yes—more precisely, it's a map they used."

[2754] A shichen is a traditional period of about two hours; four shichen is about eight hours.

[2755] A Chinese li is about 500 m (0.311 mi); three thousand li is about 1,500 km (932 mi).

"I heard you couldn't buy one of their maps for ten thousand gold pieces."

"As Young Bureau Head of the Yongbong Escort Bureau, I can tell you there's nothing in this world money can't buy. But my grandfather gained a friendship worth more than gold. He was given this map as a token of it."

Hmm. I see.

...Actually, I didn't understand a damn thing.

Except that Ju Hwaran's grandfather, Escort King Ju Gongsan, had received an amazing map from someone in these horse caravans.

After patiently listening to them, I spoke up.

"Um, Young Lady Ju. Sorry, but what exactly are the horse caravans?"

"They're descendants of the northern mounted tribes."

"For hundreds of years, they traveled the ancient trade routes, carrying goods between the Outer Lands and the Central Plains. There aren't nearly as many of them now."

"..."

Well, all right. Now I knew what the horse caravans were.

But I was pretty sure I had asked Ju Hwaran. Why were the answers coming from two dark-clad men?

Song Ilseom and Sama Pyo, who had spoken almost at the same time, turned to look at each other.

"You're more knowledgeable than you look."

"Than I look? Have you forgotten where the Black Dragon Demon Gate is located? Horse caravans are still active in Gansu, where our sect is based."

"Operate? You mean they're being squeezed dry?"

Song Ilseom gave a short laugh.

"I've heard the rumors. The Black Dragon Demon Gate controls the trade routes and collects enormous tolls."

"I heard you were a wandering martial artist. Do you have some bad blood with our sect?"

"Not particularly. I just want to kill any demonic, heterodox practitioner I see."

"We agree on that point. I can't stand meeting people who draw their weapons before anything else. So, are you finished tending to your weapon?"

"Not yet. But it'll have blood on it soon enough, so I can finish later."

"Then let's move somewhere else for a while."

How the hell had the conversation gotten here?

I stared blankly at the two men as they amicably turned their horses around, then opened my mouth.

"Move where, you lunatics?"

Song Ilseom and Sama Pyo answered at the same time.

"It's personal. Stay out of it."

"The horses need a rest anyway. Have some tea. We'll be back shortly."

"…"

One was an individualist. The other was Guan Yu.[2756]

The Nanman expedition had barely set out, and already it was showing signs of falling apart. As Fire Dragon Pavilion Master, I had to step in.

Whish!

Two sharp blasts cut through the air.

Song Ilseom and Sama Pyo landed on the ground after avoiding the Finger Qi I had fired at them. Just as they reflexively began to draw their weapons, I warned them in a calm voice.

"You'll regret drawing those."

"…!"

"…!"

It wasn't just a warning. They felt the immense qi pressing in from every direction and froze.

Unmistakable astonishment appeared in their trembling eyes.

He's strong.

That was what their gazes said.

And it was an undeniable fact.

Sama Pyo, the Black Dragon Saber, was Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate, the dominant power in Gansu, and the unorthodox faction's foremost young prodigy. Song Ilseom, the Soul-Chasing Guest, had become a legend by cutting down countless enemies on battlefields and in life-and-death duels. Both of them understood exactly what they were facing.

No—because they were anything but mediocre Peak masters, they understood it all the better.

A person standing at a higher place could see farther and grasp the whole picture.

I was already two moves above them before, but the pressure they're feeling now must be much greater.

As always, I had woken up stronger than I'd been when I fell asleep.

While developing a martial art that could be widely taught to modern Hunters, I'd gained a small insight. I hadn't created anything extraordinary, so I couldn't call it a full step forward…but even a quarter of a step was a significant gain.

It was a shame my allies were the first to feel the results instead of Dark Heaven.

[2756] Guan Yu is a legendary warrior of the Three Kingdoms era, famed for defeating an opponent before his wine could cool.

[2757] A Chinese li is about 500 m (0.311 mi); three thousand li is about 1,500 km (932 mi).

"We have thousands of li[2757] left to go. If you still want to fight, do it now and keep going until one of you dies. Otherwise—"

"Pavilion Master."

I was fond of Ju Hwaran, but now wasn't the time to listen to her. I gave her a slight shake of my head at her tense expression and continued.

"Otherwise, team up and come at me. This is your only chance. You won't get another."

"…"

"…"

Song Ilseom and Sama Pyo stared at each other, lips pressed tight. It didn't take them long to decide.

Shrrrk. Click.

With a cold scraping sound, the two blades that had been faintly exposed disappeared from view.

They climbed back into their saddles as though nothing had happened. Ju Hwaran watched them and let out a quiet sigh.

"Whew… I'd hoped this wouldn't happen."

So had I. But I'd thought long and hard about the possibility before accepting those two into the Fire Dragon Pavilion.

Their feelings toward each other probably aren't very good. Especially from Song Ilseom's perspective.

It went back decades, to when the orthodox and demonic factions had divided the world between them and fought their decisive battle.

A bold young escort named Zhu had accepted a woman's commission and made the Ten-Thousand-Mile Escorts a legend. The child that woman bore grew up, had a son, and passed away.

That son was Song Ilseom—the last descendant of the Guangdong Chen Family, which had been wiped out by demonic, heterodox arts.

Unless he was Buddha or Jesus, it was only natural that he would harbor hatred toward the unorthodox faction.

I just didn't think it would come to a head this fast.

Shit, how many shichen[2758] had we even been on the road? Was the whole expedition already about to fall apart? I was starting to understand why college students hated group projects.

And that was true even if I excluded the two men who had become archenemies faster than anyone in Murim history.

"Captain, maybe it's because I got hit in the stomach earlier, but I keep needing to take a shit."

[2758] A shichen is a traditional period of about two hours; four shichen is about eight hours.

“My lord. Don’t fight. Taishan worries when my lord is in danger. And gets hungry.”

“…”

Look at this lineup. For fuck’s sake.

Watching Hyuk Mujin, whose stomach was more active than his body, and Taishan, the Tiger Giant Child, who seemed to have an inventory instead of a stomach, made my vision go dark.

But even here, I had one ray of light.

“Young Lady Ju.”

“Yes?”

“Thank you. I’m really glad you’re here.”

I meant it. Beautiful or not, she was the most normal person in the group.

It was true that her martial arts were slightly weaker than those of the other members, but she had extensive knowledge of Murim and was excellent at finding her way.

The fact that she had found a shortcut known only among the horse caravans proved it.

So why wasn’t she answering?

“Young Lady Ju?”

“…”

“Um, Young Lady Ju?”

I called again, but she said nothing. Still gripping the reins, she turned her head away and stammered.

“I-I think we should go this way.”

“What? No, you’ve done a great job. I meant—”

“I’ll ride ahead and look for the horse caravans’ markers. Hyah!”

“Uh. Wait—what?”

I didn’t get another word out. Ju Hwaran hurried away as though she and her horse were one, leaving me staring blankly after her. Then I felt eyes prickling the back of my head and turned.

…What’s with these guys now?

Song Ilseom. Sama Pyo. Hyuk Mujin. Even Taishan.

Exactly four pairs of eyes were fixed in place, staring holes through me.

Their mysterious gazes were impossible to interpret. I flinched instinctively and asked,

“What? Why are you all looking at me like that?”

“Hmm. It’s nothing.”

“I’ll go on ahead, Pavilion Master.”

Song Ilseom and Sama Pyo slowly rode forward, both wearing complicated expressions. Hyuk Mujin and Taishan answered reluctantly.

“Uh, I was just looking. Because I need to take a dump.”

“If you need to take a dump, why look at me?”

“When I look at you, whatever was about to come out goes right back in.”

“Taishan. Just looking because hungry. Nothing else.”

“What the hell does being hungry have to do with me?”

“Nothing. Just… just… Hmm. Taishan gets it now. Taishan understands a little.”

What kind of bullshit was that?

I could understand Hyuk Mujin, but having that giant glutton look at me with such pity was deeply unsettling.

Before I could press him, Taishan smacked his half-dead horse on the rump and charged off.

“Taishan! Go! Horse go too!”

The horse, already looking half-dead, staggered into a run. Hyuk Mujin hurried after him.

“Hey, wait! Let’s go together!”

“No! Don’t follow! Taishan only runs forward!”

“I have jerky.”

“Taishan! Found friend! Together forever!”

Lunatics…

But why did I feel like I was the one being ignored by those lunatics?

I grabbed my reins, my face twisting as though I’d bitten into something foul.

“Hey. Let’s go too.”

Prrrff.

“…”

Now even the damn horse was giving me a look.

I smacked its head as it snorted, then squeezed its sides hard. With a small whinny, it raced through the ravine.

Chapter 616

Becoming a successful merchant in Murim meant surviving fierce competition.

The map the horse caravans had reportedly made while traveling between the Outer Lands and the Central Plains was proof enough of how they had amassed such wealth.

“This is the place. The marker’s faint, but it’s definitely one of the horse caravans’.”

“Huh. Who would’ve thought there was a road through here?”

Secret shortcuts hidden throughout the Central Plains, swift and accurate despite their concealment.

Some had vanished over the years, and those that remained could be treacherous precisely because they were hidden. But that wasn’t much of a problem for us.

“Captain, isn’t this slope too steep?”

“It is. The road’s narrow, too. But we have to go.”

“Then I’m afraid we’ll have to leave the horses behind.”

“Why would we do that? We can carry them.”

“Pardon?”

Correction. It wasn’t much of a problem for me.

Everyone who heard me stared wide-eyed.

“What did you say?”

“They’re not big warhorses. They came from the grasslands, so they’re fairly light, aren’t they?”

“…Light or not, they’re horses. Can you really carry them?”

As it turned out, I could. More easily than I’d expected, in fact.

My strength had long since surpassed human limits. I slung two horses over my shoulders and strode uphill, while Taishan—who wasn’t as strong as me but was a natural strongman with the build to match—could manage three.

“Pavilion Master. Taishan. Heavy. No choice. Eat one horse here. No, leave one here.”

“…Swallow your spit and try saying that again.”

His appetite was a bigger problem than the weight.

And as the shortcuts cut down our travel time and distance, greater obstacles waited for us.

“According to the map, there should be a road ahead. But…”

“It’s gone. Or rather, blocked.”

“Escort Song is right. I heard there was a landslide nearby a month or two ago. That must have blocked it.”

"Then we'll have to go around. The map says this road runs for at least ten li.[2759] If only a few dozen jang[2760] were buried, perhaps, but clearing a road like this is out of the question… Pavilion Master, what are you doing?"

"Getting ready to clear the road."

"What?"

"It's not like we have to tunnel through the mountain. Clear some dirt, move a few rocks and boulders, and we should be able to get through. You said the landslide was only a month or two ago, right?"

"Well, yes, but…"

"As they say, when the body is weak, the head has to work harder."

"…That sounds wrong. Isn't it usually the other way around?"

"Usually."

For days, we carried horses up mountains, dug through buried roads, and walked and ran until we crossed Hubei and reached Sichuan at a ridiculous pace.

We owed it all to Ju Hwaran. She knew the shortcuts once shared by only a handful of horse caravans, and she remembered everything her maternal grandfather—the Escort King—had left behind.

I can't believe we got here so quickly.

We'd made this kind of time without even taking the waterways.

Granted, I'd played no small part in making the impossible possible. But Hwaran had more than fulfilled the role she'd promised to take on before joining the Fire Dragon Pavilion. She'd exceeded my expectations.

Martial arts really aren't everything.

No matter how much of a Supreme Peak master I became, I couldn't do anything like this. I gave Ju Hwaran a heartfelt exclamation of admiration.

"You're incredible. There's no one like you, Young Lady Ju."

"I-I'll go feed the horses some hay."

"What? Why? They aren't Taishan. How long has it even been since they ate hay… Young Lady Ju? Young Lady Ju?"

What the hell was going on?

At this point, I couldn't tell whether she couldn't hear me or had decided not to listen.

As I watched Ju Hwaran hurry away using a movement technique, I turned my head at the gaze I felt from beside me.

Swish!

The movement was quick as lightning, but not quick enough to escape my notice. I eyed the culprit.

[2759] In this Chinese setting, one li is 500 m (about 0.311 mi). Ten li are about 5 km (3.1 mi).

[2760] One jang is about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

"Hey."

He flinched.

"I saw you. Don't pretend you weren't looking."

Song Ilseom, seated by the water, glanced around awkwardly.

"Hmm. Are you speaking to me?"

"You're the only one here. And you know you look awkward as hell, right?"

"…I have no idea what you mean."

"If you were watching, you were watching. Why hide it? And do you sharpen that willow-leaf saber every chance you get? It'll be a needle by the time we reach Nanman."

Splash.

Song Ilseom poured water over the blade, polished so carefully it gleamed like a mirror. His face hardened.

"Watch what you say. This weapon means something to me."

He wasn't particularly expressive to begin with, but he'd gone so serious that there had to be a story behind it.

Then again, he's been through a lot.

There was no excuse for reopening someone else's wounds. Thinking I'd made a careless mistake, I spoke cautiously.

"Is it a treasured blade passed down through your family?"

"Hardly. I was told they couldn't bring out so much as a single martial arts manual. My grandmother never learned martial arts in her life. The fact that she survived that war was a miracle."

"Right. It did look pretty worn for a treasured blade. Something your father left you, then?"

"No."

A wistful smile touched Song Ilseom's lips, as if he were remembering better days. He ran a hand along the blade.

"I received this willow-leaf saber when I was young, while serving as a sword boy for a Third Rate wandering martial artist. I cut a person with it for the first time in my life. I was probably twelve."

"…Oh. Right."

Wounds, my ass.

My budding guilt melted away like spring snow.

He'd been a martial artist from the start. Watching Song Ilseom fondly recall his first killing, I could only think he was… out of his mind.

Yeah. He's not right in the head either.

Murim had all kinds of people, but lunatics made up a good share of them. Maybe you had to be one to survive here.

You could die over a meal. You could die in a fight. You could survive the fight, only to die when your wounds got worse. You could endure enough hardship to become a master, then die from qi deviation during training.

What was that novel called? I read one where a martial artist retired peacefully with golden-basin handwashing.[2761]

It took coming to Murim to realize that a novel was just a novel.

I'd once asked Jeok Cheongang about golden-basin handwashing.[2762] His answer had gone like this:

"Golden-basin handwashing?[2763] Easy."

"Oh. It is?"

"Of course. First, buy a basin made of gold and invite plenty of close acquaintances."

"It already reeks of social butterflies and capitalism, but all right. What next?"

"Wash your hands without a care. Of course, the moment you take your hand off your weapon, an assassin hidden among your acquaintances will throw a hidden weapon at you."

"Ah…"

"And one more thing. The person you thought was an acquaintance might be an assassin, too. What do you think? Isn't it easy?"

As my dear Fire-Rice Grandpa had so wisely put it, that was fucking Murim for you.

Golden-basin handwashing,[2764] my ass. Most martial artists should be grateful just to wake up in the morning and wash their faces with ice water.

After all, the next day they might have to bathe and purify themselves in the waters of the Sanzu River[2765] instead of ice water.

I supposed that counted as retirement, too. The only difference was whether you were still breathing.

What is this, Murim Escape Number One?[2766]

The old show had been canceled, but a Murim edition would be a smash hit. Assuming television caught on here, it might pull a 107 percent viewership rating, like turnout in a Russian presidential election.

They could hire a master of demonic, heterodox arts as their experiment expert. He'd smile warmly and run the demonstration himself.

"All right, fellow martial artists. What happens if you dodge this form like so?"

[2761] A ceremonial retirement from martial pursuits, marked by washing one's hands in a golden basin.

[2762] A ceremonial retirement from martial pursuits, marked by washing one's hands in a golden basin.

[2763] A ceremonial retirement from martial pursuits, marked by washing one's hands in a golden basin.

[2764] A ceremonial retirement from martial pursuits, marked by washing one's hands in a golden basin.

[2765] In Buddhist tradition, the Sanzu River marks the boundary between life and death.

[2766] A reference to Emergency Escape Number One, a Korean television program about avoiding everyday dangers.

Stab.

“See? Dead. Heh heh.”

They’d run out of experimenters in no time…

It was only my imagination, but Murim was the kind of place where it could become reality as soon as someone brought in a TV.

And in this insane world, I had to travel with lunatics and fight more lunatics.

“…Whew.”

I was staring silently at the river, feeling sorry for myself, when Song Ilseom spoke.

“I was watching.”

“Hm? Watching what?”

“What happened earlier. I never answered you.”

So that was what he meant. I shrugged.

“I knew you were watching. Why were you staring?”

“I heard something, so I looked.”

“Try being honest.”

“Your words and actions looked so stupid that I couldn’t help staring.”

“…Wow. That’s a little too honest.”

“But it’s true. Isn’t that why Young Lady Ju keeps leaving whenever you say things like that?”

For some reason, I felt wronged.

“What did I do? I was impressed, so I gave her an honest compliment.”

“Even a passing dog wouldn’t believe that.”

“It’s true.”

“Enough. It isn’t funny.”

“I haven’t found any of this funny.”

“Fine. Let’s say it’s true.”

Song Ilseom let out a quiet laugh, as though I’d made a joke. Then he saw my expression, and his own turned uncertain.

“Is it true?”

“I keep telling you it is.”

“You’re saying that, in all honesty, you have no idea what your words and actions mean? No idea why Young Lady Ju leaves every time?”

“I swear to heaven. I’ll stake my balls on it.”

“Huh. You’re staking your own balls instead of Hyuk Mujin’s… Then it must be true.”

The verification process seemed odd, but he believed me now, so I let it pass.

Song Ilseom stared at me as if he’d seen a unicorn.

“How can anyone be this clueless?”

"What?"

"Wasn't your old sobriquet the Night King? You'd think you would at least know the basics."

"…"

How long would I have to clean up the shit that promiscuous predecessor had left behind? If they'd called him the Porn King, I could have admitted there was some truth to it. But the Night King?

"…It's a long story."

Song Ilseom nodded at my weary reply.

"Of course. You must have spent many long nights."

"You son of a bitch. Draw your sword. You're fucking dead today."

"Unfortunately, we'll have to put that off until later. Thanks to you, I have to find an employer who still hasn't appeared even after fifteen minutes."

"You seem to have forgotten I'm the Fire Dragon Pavilion Master. Your direct superior."

"But my employer is the one who pays me silver nyang.[2767] Protecting her is my job."

Song Ilseom sheathed his freshly polished willow-leaf saber and rose from the water's edge.

Crunch. Crunch.

He turned away without another word, his feet pressing into sand and gravel. Then he stopped.

"If you don't know why Young Lady Ju acts that way, think about it carefully with that nonexistent sense of tact you have. You have to find the answer yourself."

"What?"

"She may look strong, but she's suffered a great deal. I hope she doesn't get hurt—or die for nothing."

That was all.

I watched him walk on as though nothing had happened, and a thought came to me.

Is silver nyang[2768] really why he's stayed by Ju Hwaran's side all this time?

Before I could find an answer, a sound rang across the surging waters of the Yangtze in Sichuan.

Boom. Ba-boom. Boom!

Drums beat hard. Ship prows cut swiftly and forcefully through the current.

A dozen or so swift ships emerged from the fog, flags of the Water Dragon Stronghold fluttering above them.

[2767] A nyang is a traditional unit of currency; a silver nyang is denominated in silver.

[2768] A nyang is a traditional unit of currency; a silver nyang is denominated in silver.

“Our taxi’s here,” I muttered.

Chapter 617

Splash!

A dozen or so swift ships were approaching the riverbank. Anyone who wasn't blind could see them.

For a martial artist who had reached a realm stage, spotting them was even easier.

"Water Dragon Stronghold…"

Sama Pyo rushed over using his movement technique. He narrowed his eyes at the ships' flags, then turned to me.

"You told me to wait. Was this why?"

"Yep."

"Sichuan is a land filled with treacherous terrain, so if we travel down the Yangtze, we can certainly move faster than we are now. Still, I'm somewhat concerned that our counterparts are the Yangtze River Channel League."

He had reason to distrust them. The Yangtze River Channel League was, at its core, a band of water bandits who made their living by plunder. And the prevailing opinion was that its leader, the Seafaring King Pa Ryun, was a devious man, regardless of his martial prowess.

He didn't attend the formation of the Murim Alliance, either, for some reason.

I didn't know whether illness or distance had kept him away. He had sent an envoy to announce his intention to join, then made it official. The Green Forest Alliance had done the same.

Both groups were closer to the unorthodox faction than the orthodox one. More accurately, they were plunderers who had carved out powerful domains of their own.

"I hear Pa Ryun is impossible to read," Sama Pyo said. "Rumors about him have been circulating quietly even in Henan."

"That he'll side with Dark Heaven when the time comes? That kind of rumor?"

"So you've heard."

"Are my ears just decoration? And since you brought up what people say…"

I looked at him and lowered my voice.

"By that standard, the Yangtze River Channel League and the Black Dragon Demon Gate are two of a kind."

"…"

"Am I wrong?"

After a brief silence, Sama Pyo answered with a sour look.

"Now that I think about it, you may be right."

"Not may be. I am, you bastard. Look closely and the Black Dragon Demon Gate might be worse. At least those guys rob orthodox and unorthodox factions alike. There's no denying which side you're on."

"…I understand. You can stop. Listening to this is making my head spin."

Taishan, who had been prowling around Sama Pyo like an enormous dog, joined in.

"Lord. Taishan hungry too. Head spinning."

"…"

Watching you two is making my head spin.

I rubbed my throbbing temple and opened my mouth.

"And one more thing. You can trust those water bandits, so stop worrying."

"Trustworthy water bandits? You might as well tell me there's a martial artist who's never learned martial arts."

"It's a long story, but we've got a pretty strong bond."

I didn't know what kind of man the Seafaring King Pa Ryun was. Even if everything people said about him was true, though, it wouldn't change my opinion of Ship-Fire Boy Mu Song.

The Mu Song I knew kept his word and held to his principles. A disciple didn't necessarily take after his master.

The fact that they came as soon as I sent word from Sichuan says enough.

While I was thinking that, the swift ships reached the bank and a dozen or so men poured ashore.

Splash!

They moved with the rough energy of bandits who knew the Yangtze inside and out, sending river water spraying in every direction. Bronze-colored muscles showed through their loose robes as they raced over and clasped their hands in salute.

"Great Hero Jin!"

"We came as fast as we could when we got your message."

These were Mu Song's trusted men, all squad leaders or higher in the Water Dragon Stronghold. I'd seen them several times a day on my last visit to Sichuan, but the face I knew best was missing.

"All familiar faces. But I don't see Senior Mu Song."

The Deputy Stronghold Lord answered at once.

"I'm sorry to say he left for headquarters two days ago."

"Headquarters… The Yangtze River Channel League's?"

"Yes, sir. It was on the League Leader's orders, so he couldn't delay even a moment."

"I see."

Within the Yangtze River Channel League, the Seafaring King's orders were absolute. His direct Disciple, Ship-Fire Boy Mu Song, had no choice but to answer a summons.

I looked over the bandits, disappointed that I'd missed him but grateful they had come.

"You still got here quickly, even with Senior Mu Song away."

The Deputy Stronghold Lord waved his hands in alarm.

"Oh, please don't say that. The Stronghold Lord must have seen this coming. Before he left, he gave us strict instructions about you."

"About me?"

"Yes, sir. He said a person ought to repay a favor. And considering what happened with the late Yangtze One Saber, Great Hero Hwang, he told us to do everything we could if the Jin Family of Taiyuan or Great Hero Jin ever needed help."

"Oh. Senior Mu Song understands loyalty. A true hero."

See that, you bastard?

I smiled at Sama Pyo. Just then, a burly bandit beside the deputy leaned in and whispered, looking puzzled.

"Deputy Stronghold Lord."

"Hm?"

"Didn't the Stronghold Lord also say Great Hero Jin would raise hell if we didn't help? That we should give him whatever he wanted instead of letting him wreck perfectly good swift ships?"

"Ah. Uh. Jang Pil, you little—!"

"…"

"…"

Silence fell.

Never mind the water bandits. The gazes of the proud members of our Fire Dragon Pavilion were painfully sharp.

In the hush, Ju Hwaran murmured so quietly I could barely hear her.

"What on earth have you been doing to make even water bandits…"

That went straight through me. I looked out over the endless Yangtze, my chest tightening.

I wanted to make an excuse, but I had thrown tantrums and treated their ships like taxis. I couldn't say a thing.

"In some ways, you're worse than the unorthodox faction," Sama Pyo muttered.

I did my best to ignore his final blow and turned mournful eyes on the deputy.

"Let's just get going."

"Y-yes, sir."

"And come see me later. Bring Jang Pil, too."

"…"

The Deputy Stronghold Lord stared at me in terror for a moment before shouting in a choked voice,

"Raise the anchor! Raise the anchor!"

I must have imagined the tears in his voice.

Whoosh!

The ship's bow cut swiftly and powerfully through the water.

Spring had arrived, and the wind was at our backs. Years of plunder had made the bandits peerless rowers.

Of course, even though these were fairly decent water bandits who had been reformed by Mu Song, their innate instincts remained.

"Five ships to the southeast!"

"Deputy Stronghold Lord, they're sizable merchant ships!"

"Merchant ships? Let's rob them!"

Rob them? Now? You lunatics.

Everyone watched in disbelief, myself included. The Deputy Stronghold Lord's face twisted.

"You idiots! We have honored guests aboard! What do you think you're doing? Do you people have no basic manners?"

"S-sorry."

For a water bandit, he sounded exactly like Judge Bao.[2769]

After sternly rebuking his subordinates, the Deputy Stronghold Lord approached us and bowed politely.

"I apologize for letting you see us behave that way."

"Heh heh. Think nothing of it."

I gave him an amiable smile.

"I understand. Robbing ships is your line of work. I can see how it happened."

"Thank you for understanding. We'll rob them quickly and get back on our way."

"Huh?"

"Half a shichen[2770] at most. We'll take a little off them and let them go…"

"Get down."

There had been a slight incident, but after I made the Deputy Stronghold Lord drop and hold the push-up position a few times, even that impulse disappeared.

[2769] Judge Bao, or Bao Qingtian, is a legendary incorruptible magistrate celebrated in Chinese folklore and popular fiction.

[2770] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

All the while, the swift ship kept moving with the wind at its back.

One day passed. Then two. Then three…

Aboard the ship, the Fire Dragon Pavilion members each settled into their own preparations.

Swish! Whoosh!

After that first day, Sama Pyo and Song Ilseom trained in their respective martial arts without clashing again.

“Taishan likes sashimi.[2771] But no fish caught. Give Taishan one.”

“You’ve got some nerve. I worked hard to catch these few fish, and you want me to hand one over? Captain, he won’t leave me alone. Can you get him off my back?”

“Give me all the fish you’ve caught so far. Slice them into sashimi first, obviously.”

“Taishan impressed. Is Pavilion Master a genius?”

“…”

Hyuk Mujin and Taishan spent most of their time fishing at the bow.

They often caught nothing. When Mujin did catch fish, someone else usually took them. He hardly complained, but I knew it wasn’t because he’d given up.

He wasn’t fishing to catch fish in the first place.

That’s why he doesn’t say anything.

Hyuk Mujin fished to clear his mind, even if only for a while.

Even when the bobber trembled right in front of him, he didn’t bother yanking on the fishing rod. Every night, he locked himself in the cabin to practice martial arts or devote himself to circulating his qi.

Day by day, hour by hour, we drew closer to Yunnan. Everyone was preparing in their own way for a fight that might come.

I was no different.

Open the Quest window.

Ding.

[2771] Sashimi is a Japanese dish of thinly sliced raw fish or seafood.

SYSTEM

Quest
Journey to Nanman
Murim Alliance Leader Mae Jonghak has assigned the Fire Dragon Pavilion its first mission.
You must now head to Nanman and actively respond to any situation that may arise.
There is no way to know what lies ahead for you and the Fire Dragon Pavilion.
Always remain vigilant and act with a flexible mindset.
Grade: Peak
Restriction: Jin Taekyung and Fire Dragon Pavilion members
Mission: Enter Nanman (Incomplete)
Reward: Chain Quest
???
Failure: Obtain Title: Can't Go to Nanman
Fame and trust greatly reduced

In Murim time, I'd received that Quest about half a month ago. Counting my time in the modern world, it had been over a month.

I was studying the Quest Window again for anything I might have missed when a faint floral scent drifted in on the breeze.

"Why are you staring so hard at empty space?"

It was Ju Hwaran.

I closed the holographic window and gazed solemnly at the star-filled sky.

"I was reading the heavenly patterns."

"Oh. Really?"

"Yes, really."

"That's impressive."

She gave a quiet laugh.

"So what did the heavens tell you?"

"They said the weather would be nice today."

"Really?"

"Yes. Young Lady Ju, see the Big Dipper over there?"

Ju Hwaran looked up at the sky along my pointing finger and blinked.

"Uh. Um."

"What?"

"Pavilion Master, I'm sorry, but that isn't the Big Dipper."

"...That can't be right. Did it change shape while I wasn't looking?"

"What?"

What the hell kind of answer was that?

I realized how ridiculous it sounded as soon as I said it. I scratched my chin, flustered, and Ju Hwaran burst out laughing.

"That's an interesting way to read the heavenly patterns."

"Honestly, I don't know how to read them. I just deal with whatever comes up as best I can."

"I know. But now I want to hear more. There's something I've been wondering about. May I ask?"

I smacked my lips.

"I already told you I can't read the heavenly patterns."

"And I already told you I know. I don't want to ask the heavens. I want to ask you."

"In that case, go ahead. I'll answer if I can."

Tap.

Ju Hwaran lightly jumped onto the bow and looked out at the pitch-black river before opening her mouth.

"What do you think will happen from here on? To us?"

Nanman was close now. She had to be anxious.

I thought for a moment about how to reassure her.

"I don't know. There's a strong possibility that Dark Heaven is plotting something, but it's also possible that nothing will happen."

Nanman was remote enough to be counted among the Outer Lands. It was also a vast territory home to the Nanman Beast Palace, the dominant power in Nanman, as well as numerous ethnic groups, including the Miao people.

If my forebodings were right and Dark Heaven was plotting something there, countless dangers awaited the Fire Dragon Pavilion and me.

But…

"Nothing will happen to us. Whatever we face, we'll make it home safely. I can promise you that."

Ju Hwaran didn't answer. Instead, she watched me with an unreadable look for a moment—no, for a long time.

"Young Lady Ju?"

"…I see."

At last she spoke. A faint smile touched her lips, and she shook her head gently. Her glossy hair, which even the human-skin mask couldn't hide, rippled like the river.

"I'll trust you, Pavilion Master."

"…?"

Something felt off. I was wondering whether I’d said the wrong thing when the Deputy Stronghold Lord appeared carrying a torch, his face flushed.

“Great Hero Jin. We’ve arrived.”

“…!”

Chapter 618

The air had grown hot and muggy. In the distance, high mountains and deep valleys came into view.

The Deputy Stronghold Lord of the Water Dragon Stronghold pointed toward the rapidly approaching shore.

“This is as far as we can take you, Great Hero Jin. Once you disembark, head straight on for ten li[2772] and you’ll be in Yunnan. It won’t take long.”

The Yangtze’s tributaries stretched across a vast part of the continent, but they didn’t reach the interior of Yunnan Province.

No, that wasn’t strictly true. The waterways didn’t simply end there.

The problem was that continuing by water to the plateau in northern Yunnan would take us much longer to reach our destination.

Our highest priority is the Nanman Beast Palace, after all.

The Quest I had received required me to reach Nanman, but the Fire Dragon Pavilion’s mission required us to head for the Nanman Beast Palace.

I gave the Deputy Stronghold Lord a small bow.

“Thank you. You must be busy raiding merchant ships, yet you brought us all the way here.”

“Oh, please, don’t say that. You’re no ordinary person. If Great Hero Jin calls for us, we should drop everything and come running at any time. I’m almost sorry to part ways with you, heh heh heh.”

He looked far too happy for someone who was supposedly sorry.

Then again, I’d made him bang his head against the ground and hold a push-up position in front of his men whenever the mood struck me. He probably was happy to say goodbye.

I laughed along with him. “Ha ha. Really?”

“Of course. Heh heh.”

“Then it would be perfect if you stayed nearby, wouldn’t it?”

“Heh heh heh. What?”

“I was worried about how we’d get back after we finished here. But if you’re sorry to part ways, that solves it.”

“…!”

“So wait nearby.”

The smile vanished from the Deputy Stronghold Lord’s face. He stammered, “Ah, no. That might be a little difficult. We have things to do as well…”

“I know. You can send the rest of the ships back and leave just one or two here.”

[2772] In this Chinese setting, one li is about 500 m (0.311 mi).

“G-Great Hero Jin, please. Wouldn’t it be better if you sent word once you’d finished your business in Yunnan?”

“Hmm. But then I’d have to wait too long.”

“…”

There was no trace of happiness left on his face. As he hung his head, I gently rubbed his shoulder.

“I know it’s an unreasonable request, but let’s impose on you a little.”

“No, even so…”

“Come on. Let’s impose on you a little.”

“…”

“Ah, fuck. Answer me already. You’ve got to know how to conduct yourself if you want to survive in Murim.”

“Gasp.”

The Deputy Stronghold Lord’s face went dark. His answer was all but decided.

A short while later, I finally extracted a promise that they would remain anchored nearby until we returned. After I disembarked, the gazes directed at me were far from ordinary.

“I thought I was watching a Third Rate wandering martial artist.”

“I mean no offense by this, but does the Jin Family of Taiyuan have roots in the unorthodox faction?”

“That’s our Captain. You never disappoint.”

“Taishan thought Pavilion Master was a water bandit.”

“I think the Pavilion Master made the right decision. If something happens in Nanman, we can ask them for help. Don’t you agree?”

That last answer was the only correct one.

As expected, Ju Hwaran is the only person who understands me.

I turned to her, moved. “Exactly. You said what I was thinking, down to the last word.”

“Oh! Is that really what you were thinking?”

“Huh?”

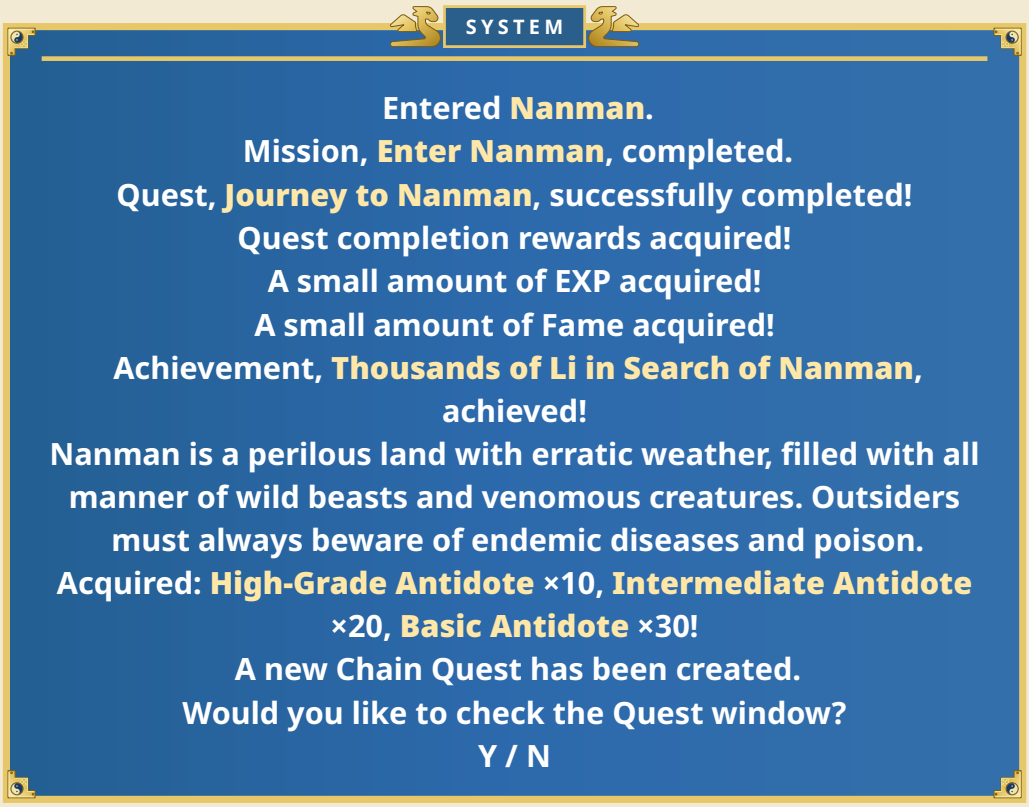
“I only took your side because everyone else was criticizing you. I thought someone should support the Pavilion Master…”

“…”

Is my image really okay as it is?

I was still pondering that as we walked along a crude road nothing like those in the Central Plains. Then a familiar sound rang in my ears.

Ding.



System notifications sounded one after another as holographic windows filled the air.

The Deputy Stronghold Lord had been telling the truth. We hadn't seen a single person nearby, but after walking for a short while, we had apparently stepped into Nanman territory.

Pretending nothing had happened, I answered in my head.

Confirm.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Quest

Seeds Planted in Nanman

You have arrived in Nanman after traveling thousands of li[2773], but Nanman is sparsely populated and outsiders are not welcome.

With your limited knowledge and information, you cannot afford to act rashly. Make contact with the Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent the Murim Alliance planted in Nanman long ago and obtain detailed information.

Grade: Peak

Restriction: Jin Taekyung and Fire Dragon Pavilion members

Mission: Make contact with the Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent (Incomplete)

Reward: Chain Quest

???

Failure: Stats decreased

Hmm.

Make contact with a Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent.

I read the new Chain Quest several times, then recalled a conversation I'd had with Song Ho, the Chief of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion, before leaving Henan.

"After the Great Faction War ended and the first Alliance Leader, the Martial God, disappeared, the Hidden Shadow Pavilion was disbanded. But even now, decades later, enough people remain to keep its intelligence network alive."

"You mean…"

"Didn't I tell you? The Hidden Shadow Pavilion has eyes and ears everywhere."

After the Great War that had shaken the world ended, people had gradually settled into peace. But not everyone had.

The Thousand-Faced Fox Song Ho and the Hidden Shadow Pavilion certainly hadn't.

"They've stayed at their posts all these years with nothing but a sense of duty to a greater cause and the courage to see it through. Find our man as soon as you reach Nanman. He'll be able to give you information and plenty of help besides."

"How am I supposed to find him? You're not just going to give me his name and address, are you?"

"There's a secret code known only to Hidden Shadow Pavilion agents. I'll tell you where to go to verify it. You should be able to meet him there."

[2773] In this Chinese setting, one li is about 500 m (0.311 mi).

It struck me again how remarkable that was. Nearly fifty years had passed since the Great Faction War, yet the Hidden Shadow Pavilion's intelligence network was still alive.

Especially in a backwater like Nanman. They must have wanted to leave.

Thanks to their sacrifice, though, the Fire Dragon Pavilion's mission could become much easier.

After sorting out my thoughts, I spoke to the Fire Dragon Pavilion members as they moved forward while keeping watch over their surroundings.

"We're going to Yeongin."

"Yeongin?"

Hyuk Mujin tilted his head. "Never heard of it. Where is it?"

"It's a county seat about two hundred li[2774] from here. Much less developed than any county seat in the Central Plains, of course."

Ju Hwaran had answered for me. She went on, "Several different ethnic groups live there together. That doesn't mean they never clash, though."

Something about how readily she answered caught my attention. "Have you been there before?"

Ju Hwaran smiled and nodded.

"Didn't I tell you? Three years ago, I finally pestered my father into letting me join an escort journey to Nanman."

"Oh. So that was Yeongin."

"Yes. I wasn't there long, but I still remember it vividly. Captain Song came along too."

Everyone turned to Song Ilseom. He raised an eyebrow.

"I never want to come to Nanman again. It was a horrible place. But Yeongin was relatively tolerable. The ethnic groups there were comparatively mild-tempered."

From Song Ilseom, that was high praise.

Then again, that must have been why he had been able to escort a shipment across this rough and dangerous land of Nanman.

"But why are we going to Yeongin?" Ju Hwaran asked.

Now everyone looked at me. They'd probably wanted to ask from the start and had held back.

There was no reason to hide it. "I'm planning to meet a Murim Alliance informant there."

"Then we certainly need to go. News from Nanman rarely reaches the outside world."

Nanman was about as remote as a place could get.

[2774] In this Chinese setting, one li is about 500 m (0.311 mi).

Dozens of ethnic groups lived deep in its jungles. They were deeply wary of the Han Chinese from the Central Plains, and they had fought countless wars among themselves to defend their territories.

That was why even major Escort Bureaus and merchant companies were reluctant to make the journey. A successful trip could bring back spices, medicinal herbs, and rare gems—but the dangers lurking in the jungle could cost them their lives.

Even without an ethnic group suffering from anger-management issues, countless poisonous creatures, wild beasts, and highly lethal endemic diseases were serious obstacles.

“But Yeongin should be fine,” Ju Hwaran said with a bright smile. “Our Yongbong Escort Bureau has had ties with the people there since the time of its former leaders, and the ethnic groups living there are relatively friendly toward the Han Chinese.”

“Oh. Is that so?”

“Yes. You’ll see when you meet them. They’re good people.”

Hk, ptui.

A glob of sticky phlegm landed by our feet.

Living up to the name Bai, or “White,” a tribesman dressed in white glared menacingly at us before disappearing from sight.

I watched him go, then turned cautiously to Ju Hwaran.

“Um, I’m asking just in case, but does someone like that count as one of the nicer ones among the ethnic groups?”

“…”

“Young Lady Ju?”

After a pause, she said, “Hmm. That man seems a bit rough. Most people aren’t like that.”

“Right?”

“Yes, yes. Of course. I know because I’ve been here myself.”

The moment Ju Hwaran finished speaking, a middle-aged ethnic woman dressed in clothes as colorful as a peacock covered a child’s eyes and muttered,

“My word. Those Han bastards had the nerve to come all the way here. Let’s go inside before the sight of them ruins your eyes.”

“Mom. Mom. I can’t see.”

“It’s okay, sweetheart. Let’s hurry away from those vicious men. Honey! Come out quickly! Han bastards have entered the village!”

“What? Wait there. I’ll get my plow and smash those Han sons of bitches’ heads in!”

"…"

"…"

For an instant, Ju Hwaran's pupils shook violently.

Clinging to one last shred of hope, I asked, "They're just a little rougher than average too, right?"

"…Probably. I think."

But Ju Hwaran's hopes were brutally ignored.

Before long, the ethnic tribesmen filling the roadside began openly displaying their hostility toward us.

"So they really are Han Chinese."

"They've got some nerve. Send word to the chief at once."

"I already sent someone."

"Get the women and children indoors. Gather the men and keep an eye on those Han bastards."

I felt like a criminal.

No. To them, we were already criminals who deserved to be torn apart and killed.

The others could feel it too, even though they couldn't rely on the System to translate for them as I could, or speak the local language as Ju Hwaran did.

"Captain."

"What?"

"I think we're fucked."

Hyuk Mujin swallowed hard and went on in a whisper. "I don't know what they're saying, but the atmosphere is extremely hostile. Wouldn't it be better to get out of here?"

Hmm.

A leader's job included calming his subordinates. I answered sternly.

"It's not like that."

"It isn't?"

"No. They're staring because they're curious about Han Chinese."

"Then why do they have axes?"

"They probably came over after chopping firewood."

"And the swords?"

"They probably came over after slaughtering something."

"…"

Don't look at me like that. I feel guilty enough.

I did my best to ignore Hyuk Mujin's distrustful gaze and crossed through the ethnic tribesmen radiating a menacing aura. I stopped in front of a wooden building.

Poison Flower Pavilion

The sign was so old it looked ready to crumble. This was the meeting place the Thousand-Faced Fox had told me about.

Chapter 619

Poison Flower Pavilion…

A fitting name for a place in Nanman, where venomous beasts were everywhere. The catch was that it looked less like an inn or pleasure house than a mansion ready to collapse.

If the Thousand-Faced Fox's directions were right, this should be the place.

I eyed the decrepit wooden building with suspicion. Around us, the mood grew more hostile by the second.

"You fucking Han bastards!"

"Go back to your own land!"

Whoosh! Crack!

Sama Pyo dodged a rock flying at the back of his head and muttered with a sigh, "Pavilion Master, we'd better go inside. Unless you intend to fight them right now."

"That's out of the question."

For once, he was absolutely right. We couldn't make enemies of every local in Nanman the moment we arrived.

I glanced at the crowd radiating a menacing aura, then opened the door to the Poison Flower Pavilion.

Creeeak.

The old wooden door gave a feeble scrape.

Dim light and a gloomy air filled the inn. A few crude tables stood far apart, like weeds growing here and there. The patrons seated at them turned toward us.

"Never seen those faces before… Han Chinese?"

Hk, ptui.

Were they Hydras?

People around here used phlegm like a passive Skill.

The ethnic patrons spat onto the dusty floor and rose from their seats, their faces flushed red.

"Han bastards dare come here? Do they want to die?"

"They've ruined the taste of my liquor. Let's go. Nothing good will come of staying here with them."

Bang!

Once the door slammed shut behind them, Ju Hwaran spoke with a troubled expression. "Something must have gone badly wrong. It wasn't like this the last time I came."

Song Ilseom nodded. "I agree. The ethnic groups of Nanman are wary of outsiders, but Yeongin was different. It's the place closest to the Central Plains."

“Exactly. Merchant groups and Escort Bureaus from the Central Plains used to pass through here. It wasn’t common, but it happened. So why…”

As Hwaran trailed off, an elderly voice cut in.

“Why? Because of an Escort Bureau. Han bastards just like you.”

We weren’t the only ones left in the Poison Flower Pavilion.

An old man who had been sleeping off his liquor until a moment ago thumped his bent back and went on. “Bad luck all around. For you lot, crawling into Nanman without knowing what’s happened. And for a certain old man whose business is about to dry up because of those fearless Han bastards.”

I realized who he was. “Are you the owner?”

The old man looked at me in surprise when I spoke the local language fluently.

“You can speak our language. Are you perhaps one of the Miao people?”

“No.”

“Then you don’t look like the Bai or Man people either. Judging by your face, you’re definitely Han Chinese… but you speak remarkably well. I’d believe you were born and raised here.”

As expected of the Integrated Language Pack. It certainly did its job.

Even Ju Hwaran looked surprised by my pronunciation. “When did you learn their language?”

“Well…”

I couldn’t exactly explain it, so I let the answer trail off before saying casually, “I picked it up somewhere along the way. Just a little trick.”

Beside me, Hyuk Mujin muttered under his breath, “I thought drinking, women, and gambling were the only tricks our Captain knew…”

“You little shit.”

Bam!

“Urgh!”

Mujin collapsed clutching his solar plexus. The old man clicked his tongue.

“That one sure knows how to get himself hit.”

“He’s always like that, so don’t mind him… Wait. You speak Chinese?”

“To a degree. I served as an interpreter for Han Chinese several times when I was young.”

As though it were nothing, the old man pointed a bony finger at Song Ilseom.

“That dark-looking fellow seems familiar. Were you here about three years ago?”

Ju Hwaran should have stood out most, but perhaps her human-skin mask was why he recognized Song Ilseom first.

Song Ilseom nodded silently. The old man slapped his knee.

“I knew it. Your name was something like Dragon King…”

“Yongbong Escort Bureau. Not Dragon King.”

"Right, Yongbong Escort Bureau. Unlike the other merchant groups and Escort Bureaus from the Central Plains, you Han Chinese came by two or three times a year. I remember you clearly."

For someone who remembers so clearly, you got the name wrong.

I held my tongue and asked what I'd been wanting to ask since he spoke up. "What did you mean earlier?"

"Hm? What about?"

"You said an Escort Bureau was why things had gotten like this. In your words, Han bastards like us."

The old man gave me a blank look. "I said that? When?"

"What? You definitely—"

"Don't remember a thing."

Like hell you don't.

I caught on and sighed. "Food. Can you make us something now?"

"Of course. Pay me, and I'll make you anything."

At the word food, Taishan sprang up from where he'd been lying facedown on the table, looking close to death.

"Taishan wants five-spice pork!"

"So there's one fellow with more energy than he knows what to do with. I'll make chicken."

"Why chicken? Taishan doesn't want chicken! Five-spice pork!"

I had no idea how his request for five-spice pork had turned into chicken, but we needed to keep the old man happy. I called to the one person who could stop Taishan's fit.

"Ma Pyo. What are you doing?"

"It's Sama Pyo."

"Right, Sa-pyo."

"…Taishan. Enough. Sit down."

Sama Pyo glared at me before settling Taishan down. Meanwhile, the old man held out his hand as if it were the most natural thing in the world.

"What?"

"Payment up front."

"Ah."

"Let's see. One chicken per person is the minimum, so that's five chickens. At one silver nyang each… ten silver nyang altogether."

"…Ten silver nyang? Even if it's one nyang per chicken, that should be five silver nyang."

"Is that so? Then make it two nyang each."

"What?"

“I said two nyang per chicken.”

“…”

“If you don’t like it, spit on the floor and leave. There isn’t another village within a hundred li[2775], mind you.”

What a shameless racket. If this man had been born in Yongsan[2776] fifty years ago, he’d have ended up a landlord.

I wondered why we hadn’t met any bandits on the road. Turns out they were in the inn, not the mountains.

It was highway robbery, but now wasn’t the time to save money. I took ten silver nyang from the hefty expense pouch the Murim Alliance had given me and handed them over.

“Here. Ten silver nyang.”

“For a Han, you catch on quickly.”

Rustle.

The old man swept up the gleaming silver with a grin. “Now, what about liquor?”

“No, thank you.”

“Drink.”

“…”

“I said drink.”

I didn’t have the energy to argue. Looking glum, I opened my pouch again.

Our first meal in Nanman was remarkable for all the wrong reasons.

The chicken was so scrawny it looked malnourished. The strong liquor had clearly been opened and partly drunk by someone else.

It was astonishing that the old man charged us dozens of silver nyang for all this. More astonishing still was how much of the food and liquor he consumed himself.

“Burp. That was good.”

“…”

Why are you the one who had a good meal?

The question rose to my throat, but I swallowed it. We had bought information with our money and our meal.

“The Heavenly Demon Escort Bureau?”

“That’s right. As I recall, they definitely said they came from Sichuan. There was one woman, and with the other men, there were nearly thirty of them.”

[2775] In the Chinese setting, one li is approximately 500 m (0.311 mi). A hundred li is about 50 km (31 mi).

[2776] Yongsan is a Seoul district where decades of development drove real-estate values sharply upward.

The old man nodded, his face flushed with drink. “At first, nobody thought much of it. Han Chinese had come to Yeongin before, and their group wasn’t particularly large.”

But they had been wrong. His eyes reddened by drink, the old man slowly recalled what had happened.

“People from a nearby village held a feast to welcome them. By the next morning, every last one of the villagers had been slaughtered.”

“…!”

“Our village was spared, thank goodness. But when we checked later, we found that some two hundred people had died that night. Men, women, children, even the elderly. Not one survived. It was those Han bastards’ doing, of course.”

“Good grief.”

It was a shocking and horrific story. Only now did I fully understand the hostile looks and oppressive atmosphere that had been directed at us.

Two words came to mind.

Dark Heaven. And the Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

It was hardly an overreaction to be troubled by one woman who had been part of the Heavenly Demon Escort Bureau.

I exchanged glances with the Fire Dragon Pavilion members, who had been listening with grim expressions, then took a sheet of paper from my Inventory.

“Sorry to interrupt, but could you look at this?”

“What is it?”

The paper I had taken out was a drawing. More precisely, it was a likeness of Honglan—or rather, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress—created from the testimony and memories of several people, including me.

I showed it to him on the off chance he’d recognize her. His reaction was lukewarm.

“That artist is quite skilled. Who is she?”

“Hmm, no. I was just wondering if you recognized her.”

“Never seen the woman in that drawing. I’d remember a beauty like that. Old as I am, I’m still a man.”

It wasn’t the answer I’d hoped for, but I wasn’t too disappointed. Whatever sort of person the Southern Heaven Demon Empress was, she had a striking appearance. Ju Hwaran had hidden her face with the human-skin mask Song Ilseom made for her. The Demon Empress could have done the same in any number of ways.

It wouldn’t be strange at all for the Southern Heaven Demon Empress to have mastered an extraordinary disguise technique.

I turned back to the old man. “Where are those Central Plains people from the Heavenly Demon Escort Bureau now?”

The Quest required us to meet an agent of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion, but if those people were still nearby, that changed things.

As if reading my thoughts, the old man asked, “Why? Thinking of going after them?”

“If we can.”

“Well, it’s an admirable thought, but it’ll be difficult. More than fifteen days have already passed.”

“If you know which way they went, or have some idea where they were headed, it’s worth a try.”

Every Fire Dragon Pavilion member here was formidable. Even Hyuk Mujin, the least skilled among us, was a Supreme First Rate master who had survived countless battles and brushes with death.

Yet despite my attitude, the old man merely let out a short laugh.

“It’s impossible.”

“Sir, I don’t think you understand—”

“I’m not the one who fails to understand. You are. Every one of those Central Plains people is dead.”

I froze. “What?”

“I mean exactly what I said. There were countless tribal warriors among those who suffered that calamity. Do you think people like that would have stood by and let themselves be slaughtered? The Central Plains people all died too. We found their bodies after they were poisoned with deadly venom and collapsed before they could get very far.”

“…!”

“No matter how skilled you are, you can’t chase them into the afterlife. And that goes for…”

His voice trailed off. A moment later, he sighed.

“…an agent of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion who’s already old as dirt.”

Gulp. Gulp.

The old man drained the last of the strong liquor and smiled at me.

“Good to meet you, Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung.”

Chapter 620

“Good to meet you, Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung.”

“…!”

A low voice burrowed into my ears, and a ripple of agitation spread through the room. But instead of being startled, I stared quietly at the old man.

As we talked, I’d begun to suspect he might be an agent of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion.

He certainly fit the bill.

The old man before me was the owner of the meeting place Thousand-Faced Fox had told us about. And unlike the other non-Han locals, he hadn’t shown us any particular hostility.

Still, if you didn’t want to misstep, you had to knock on even a stone bridge before crossing it.

The System had warned me through the Journey to Nanman Quest, too. To stay alert at all times and act flexibly.

At least this time, I intended to follow that advice faithfully.

Shhhh.

Invisible internal energy spread through the inn, sealing it off from outside sound. Only then did I speak.

“Are you with the Hidden Shadow Pavilion?”

That was probably the question everyone wanted to ask.

With every eye on him, the old man rubbed a thumb over his filthy liquor cup.

“It’s been so long now since I was given my second name: Namho.”

Namho. Literally, “amber from the south.”

The Hidden Shadow Pavilion was an intelligence organization, so it gave its agents codenames to conceal their identities. The name Namho matched the information Thousand-Faced Fox had given us exactly.

“A certain fox said a fierce wind was blowing in Nanman.”

“Even if a typhoon rages, the Poison Flower rooted deep in the ground will not be shaken.”

That was the secret countersign too. Now I was sure.

I filled the old man’s cup—Namho’s cup—and said, “I was suspicious right up to the end. But you really are with the Hidden Shadow Pavilion.”

Namho drained his cup in one gulp and asked,

“Why? Did you never imagine that an agent of the Murim Alliance’s Hidden Shadow Pavilion might be one of the non-Han peoples?”

Just as Namho said, he was indeed not Han Chinese. His skin was dark from Nanman's fierce sun, and his distinctive features were plainly not Han Chinese. Anyone with half an eye could tell.

I gave a small nod and answered,

"To be honest, I can't say I didn't think that. It's just that you're so far from the Central Plains that it was hard to believe you were with the Murim Alliance's Hidden Shadow Pavilion. And from what I could sense, you didn't seem to have learned martial arts, either."

"Everyone has their own story. What matters is that most people think the way you do."

"And because they do, no one suspects you?"

"Who would suspect an old non-Han man who hasn't learned even a single martial arts move? It would be absurd."

Namho emptied the last bottle of liquor. Then he looked up as though something had just occurred to him.

"Oh. Are you blocking sound with your internal energy?"

"Of course. We can't let anyone outside hear us."

"Then lower it for a moment. There's something I absolutely must do."

Something he had to do?

What was it?

I wanted to ask in more detail, but Namho's expression was utterly serious. The moment I withdrew the internal energy sealing off the inn, Namho turned to Hyuk Mujin.

"You there. Is someone standing behind you?"

"Huh?"

Crash!

"Get the hell out of here, you rude Han bastards!"

It happened in an instant.

A liquor bottle struck Hyuk Mujin squarely in the back of the head, cracking his skull. The cheap bottle shattered, spraying fragments everywhere.

And Namho, the obvious culprit, started yelling at the top of his lungs.

"You bastards! Even tearing you apart wouldn't satisfy me! How dare you cause trouble here!"

"…!"

"…!"

Everyone, myself included, stared with our mouths hanging open at the sudden turn of events.

No one was more stunned than Hyuk Mujin. Clutching the back of his head, he gaped at Namho before bursting out, "Has this old man gone insane?"

"Yeah, I'm insane! You motherless, fatherless Han bastard!"

"Whoa. That's crossing a line. You're crossing a line!"

"You Han bastards crossed the line! Murdering people in Nanman wasn't enough, so now you're eating without paying?"

"No, fuck! What did you do with the silver coin I gave you earlier? Boil soup with it?"

"You didn't give me a single penny, so what kind of bullshit are you spouting? I took pity on you and gave you a meal after agonizing over it, and now get the hell out of my sight!"

Whoosh! Crash!

Bottles and bowls flew across the room. Within seconds, the inn was a wreck.

Namho screamed every insult he could think of and threw everything within reach. Then he looked at me, his lips moving just enough for me to read them.

Half a shichen[2777] from now. Meet me by the lakeside ten li[2778] away.

Only then did I understand the meaning behind his actions. I signaled to the members of the Fire Dragon Pavilion.

Ju Hwaran, Song Ilseom, and Sama Pyo caught on at once. They sprang up, overturned the table, and started smashing things. Each contributed a word.

"The food!"

"Dog!"

"Tastes like shit!"

Crash-crash-crash!

Crack! Rumble!

An unfortunate pillar broke apart, and the ceiling tilted.

Poison Flower Pavilion had already been on the verge of collapse. At this rate, it might as well change its name to Crumble Mansion.

I grabbed Hyuk Mujin, who was still shouting at Namho at the top of his lungs, and Taishan, who was shoveling the remaining food into his mouth, by the backs of their necks and ran.

"You crazy old man! Did you get this old by shoving years up your ass—urk!"

"No! Taishan's chicken leg! He was saving it!"

"Quit your bullshit and get out! All of you!"

Crunch!

Screams mingled with clouds of dust. I led the Fire Dragon Pavilion out through the chaos—and found a crowd of a hundred people waiting for us.

"The Han bastards are coming out!"

"They dared attack Elder Chao!"

[2777] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

[2778] Using the Chinese li of approximately 500 meters (0.311 mi), ten li is about 5 kilometers (3.1 mi).

"Kill them!"

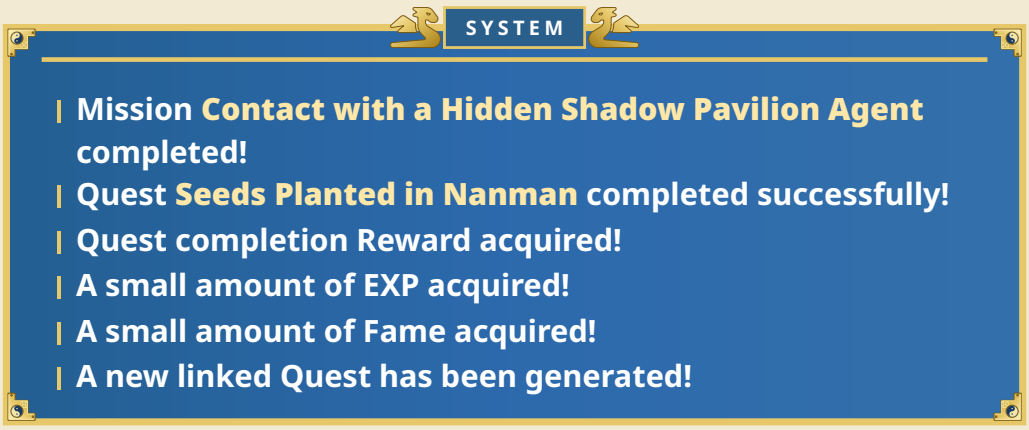
"No, throw them into the snake pit alive!"

Of course, there wasn't a single sane person among us who wanted to be thrown alive into a snake pit.

Swish! Thud!

I sighed and dodged a pickaxe. A belated System notification sounded in my ear.

Ding.



Okay, but where's the lakeside?

Namho appeared exactly half a shichen[2779] later, as promised. He carried a bundle in one hand. The other was wrapped in bandages.

"The pillar. Who broke it?"

"..."

"..."

"The inn I ran for forty years collapsed. I nearly died without leaving a will."

I tried to console him. "We didn't know that would happen. It'll be all right."

"You call that consolation? Does saying it's all right make it all right?"

"We'll compensate you properly later."

"That helps a little."

There was nothing like financial therapy. Namho's condition improved at once, and he turned to the rest of us.

"Try to understand what happened at the inn. I had to keep the villagers from getting suspicious. Things have been tense lately. If I'd defended you, they'd have started watching me too."

Hyuk Mujin replied sourly, "So you had to kill off my parents when they're both alive and well?"

[2779] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

“I apologize for saying you had no mother or father. I had no choice.”

“How would you feel if someone said that to you?”

“I grew up alone. My parents died when I was little. I don’t even remember their faces.”

“Oh.”

You didn’t spend years as a Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent without learning a thing or two. Namho had silenced Hyuk Mujin in a handful of words.

He took something from his bundle and held it out.

“What’s this?”

“A wooden map. For the past fifty-odd years, whenever I had time, I traveled around Nanman recording its terrain and the locations of its tribes in detail.”

Many years had passed since the Great Faction War, but not everyone had settled into peace. Namho had kept working, never forgetting his duty.

“Nanman is full of treacherous terrain, predators, and venomous beasts,” Ju Hwaran said. “That couldn’t have been easy. You must have worked terribly hard.”

Namho looked bitter.

“I only did what needed doing. Truthfully, even as I made this map, I hoped no one would ever need it.”

But peace had ended, despite his hopes.

Dark Heaven had shed the shell of the Demonic Cult and run rampant. Blood had stained every corner of the Central Plains, and that dark shadow was now stretching beyond the Central Plains into Nanman.

“I’ve already heard what’s happened,” Namho said. “The Pavilion Master is deeply concerned. Do you share those concerns?”

“Yes.”

I nodded without hesitation.

After everything that had happened around the Water God Dragon in Hubei, Nanman looked like a powder keg about to explode. It teemed with spiritual creatures, venomous beasts, and predators on a scale the Central Plains couldn’t begin to match.

“I assume you’ve heard about the rift.”

“Nanman is remote. Word hasn’t reached the people here, but I received a missive by messenger eagle. If the Pavilion Master hadn’t sent it, I wouldn’t have believed it.”

Anyone would have felt the same. Even people in the Central Plains who’d heard about the Water God Dragon dismissed it as a ridiculous rumor.

But it wouldn’t be long before these impossible things became reality—just as they had during the time people in the modern world called the Great Cataclysm.

“Dark Heaven is definitely targeting Nanman. Even if nothing has surfaced yet, something will happen before long.”

Namho stared at me with sunken eyes as I spoke with complete certainty.

“Long ago, I left Nanman of my own accord, traveling with a merchant caravan from the Central Plains. For the past fifty-odd years, though, I haven’t left this land once. And except for that recent incident, nothing has happened.”

“Do you mean the incident where the Central Plains people claiming to have come from the Heavenly Demon Escort Bureau attacked a nearby village?”

“Yes. The non-Han locals grew furious, and the atmosphere became dangerous, but that was all. It wasn’t common, but it wasn’t something that had never happened before, either.”

“I don’t know whether that incident had anything to do with Dark Heaven, but…”

I lowered my voice.

“What’s coming will be a tragedy far worse than that.”

“…!”

Namho’s eyes trembled.

This was his homeland, the place where he’d spent his life. After a brief silence, he spoke in a tired, elderly voice.

“Even as I packed my things and left my home, I didn’t want to believe it. But there’s no avoiding it now.”

He slung the bundle over his shoulder and started walking.

“Come. Wherever you’re headed, I’ll guide you.”

Chapter 621

“Come. Wherever you’re headed, I’ll lead the way.”

I looked at Namho, the elderly Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent, with admiration. Even at his age, his resolve was firm.

“You’d lead us even down the road to the afterlife. I don’t know how to thank you for such devotion, Elder Namho.”

“I didn’t say I’d go as far as the afterlife…”

“Your joints must ache these days, and I’m sure your memory isn’t what it used to be. Thank you for stepping forward anyway. You’ll be a great help to us.”

“…How very kind of you. Listening to you, I can feel strength and enthusiasm welling up through this old body of mine.”

“You’re welcome. No need to thank me.”

Namho stared at me sourly, then spoke.

“Where do you intend to go? I may have other ideas, but first I’d like to hear your destination.”

Our destination. Instead of answering, I glanced into the empty air.

There was nothing there, of course. But as had happened countless times before, I could read information in that empty space that no one else here could see.

SYSTEM

Quest
Nanman Beast Palace
The Nanman Beast Palace is one of the great powers of the Outer Lands. It lies in the deepest, most secluded part of Nanman, a land that is itself fiercely closed off.
The Murim of the Central Plains needs its help for the Great War to come. The time has come to awaken the beast that has long slept in the jungle.
Or perhaps… to save it from a danger that has yet to reveal itself.
Grade: Supreme Peak
Restriction: Jin Taekyung and Fire Dragon Pavilion members
Mission: Arrive at the Nanman Beast Palace (Incomplete)
Reward: Chain Quest
???
Failure: ???

The Chain Quest had updated right after we met Namho. It pointed in the same direction as my own thoughts.

“The Nanman Beast Palace. That’s where we’re going.”

At my belated answer, Namho nodded, his gaze deep and somber.

Nanman was vast and rugged beyond belief.

It covered less ground than Sichuan, but traveling through it took far more effort than traveling through the Central Plains.

“The Pavilion Master once told me that ten li[2780] in Nanman is like a hundred li in the Central Plains.”

Anyone who didn’t understand Namho’s words had never set foot in Nanman. In just half a day, the Fire Dragon Pavilion and I had learned exactly how shitty this place was.

Bzzzz. Smack!

“Mujin, what was that?”

“Nothing. Just a mosquito. Something stung the back of my neck, that’s all.”

“Oh, really? Be careful anyway. You never know. Want me to ask Elder Namho about it?”

“Come on, Captain. I’m not a child. Hyuk Mujin, a battle-hardened warrior who has fought countless fierce battles at the right hand of the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon! That’s me.”

Exactly one shichen[2781] later, the battle-hardened warrior Hyuk Mujin collapsed, vomiting.

“Bleeaagh!”

“Gasp, Mujin!”

“What happened?”

“Elder Namho! Mujin’s collapsed!”

“I may be old, but I can see that. Was he bitten by a mosquito?”

“Cough. Yes. About one shichen[2782] ago. It had blue stripes…”

“Blue stripes? And that was a shichen[2783] ago? An antidote! Bring an antidote, quickly!”

Fortunately, getting the battle-hardened warrior back on his feet wasn’t too difficult. I had the Myriad-Poison Ring, a divine artifact of the Sichuan Tang Clan, and fifty antidotes I’d received as Quest rewards.

But that was no reason to relax.

[2780] A Chinese li is 500 meters (0.311 miles). Ten li is about 5 kilometers (3.1 miles); a hundred li is about 50 kilometers (31 miles).

[2781] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

[2782] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

[2783] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

"They usually travel in swarms of dozens and even hunt predators. Another shichen[2784], and he'd be dead."

We set off again with Namho's stern warning in mind, heading deeper into secluded country to avoid the non-Han peoples who would charge at Han Chinese on sight.

Which meant heading somewhere even more dangerous.

"Taishan! Taishan's stomach hurts! Feels like it's tearing apart!"

"Elder Namho!"

"What did you eat this time?"

"Taishan was hungry. Picked red mushrooms off a tree and ate them."

"What kind of dog and pig bastard are you? After all the warnings I gave you, you ate blood-feeding fungus that even a tiger couldn't withstand just because you were hungry? Antidotes won't work on this!"

Namho flew into a rage, but his anger soon gave way to bewilderment. Taishan went into the brush to do his business and came back looking perfectly fine, despite eating a fungus that could kill a tiger.

"Taishan. Feels better after taking a dump. Fine now."

"…Is he even human?"

Sama Pyo considered Namho's earnest question for a moment before answering without much confidence.

"Probably."

"Taishan's stomach is empty again. Taishan is hungry."

"I swear by heaven and earth, if you ever eat another mushroom, you'll never have to worry about being hungry again."

"Oh. Taishan. Tempting."

"…I regret not learning martial arts. If I had, I'd have killed him with a single palm strike by now."

We left the old Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent to his lament and kept walking.

At every turn, dense jungle and humid, sweltering heat awaited us. In the thick brush and swamps, the eyes of lurking predators glowed bright yellow.

Did we come to Nanman, or did we end up in the Amazon?

What a dogshit place.

There were more tigers than stray cats around a university neighborhood full of studio apartments, and crocodiles swarmed like tadpoles in Cheonggyecheon.

Even those were nothing compared to the strange poisonous flowers and plants that could do you in with their scent alone, or the bees with stingers bigger than their own bodies. At least the predators were large enough to spot.

[2784] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

There was a reason Hyuk Mujin had started complaining within a day or two of leaving Yeongin.

“To hell with the Nanman Beast Palace. I think I’ll be dead by the day after tomorrow.”

Maybe not the day after tomorrow, but in four days his life might well be in danger. He’d been poisoned about four times on the first day alone, and over the past two days he’d become skin and bones.

Shanxi Province counted as a borderland by Central Plains standards, but Nanman was far beyond anything we’d expected.

“Can’t we take another route? The roads might be run-down and rough, but compared to this, they’d be a walk down a flower-lined path.”

It wasn’t as if Nanman had no roads at all.

It was badly underdeveloped compared to the Central Plains, but I’d heard that the dozens, perhaps hundreds, of non-Han peoples settled here each had their own territory. Travel between them wasn’t particularly rare, so long as it didn’t cause disputes.

Despite Mujin’s desperate plea, Namho was firm.

“Impossible. You know why.”

“If it’s because the locals are dying to kill us, I’d rather face them head-on. And if we can talk things out, all the better.”

“Talk?”

Namho blinked at Mujin’s hopeful answer.

“Are you serious?”

“Of course.”

“An entire village vanished. Some two hundred people welcomed Han Chinese in good faith and were slaughtered, young and old alike. Do you think they’ll want to talk?”

“…No. I wasn’t actually serious.”

“Now you’re being honest. Good. Then shut up and walk.”

“Yes, sir.”

Look at him change his tune faster than light.

But this time, Namho was right about everything.

Fighting the non-Han peoples who attacked us would amount to declaring war on all of Nanman. They might snarl at one another ordinarily, but when an outsider appeared, they united as if their quarrels had never existed.

No wonder even the Demonic Cult failed to conquer all of Nanman during the Great Faction War.

The Cult's hundred thousand demonic soldiers had once swallowed half the world, yet all they managed here was to plant their flags on Nanman's outskirts before withdrawing.

They knew that going any deeper into a jungle rife with brutal endemic diseases, treacherous terrain, predators, and venomous beasts would cost more than it gained them.

And we can't exactly go around announcing who we are.

I doubted the non-Han peoples' hatred of Han Chinese would ease just because we told them our names. More importantly, Dark Heaven was lurking somewhere in Nanman.

They're definitely targeting Nanman. It's only a matter of time before something happens.

I was almost certain. We hadn't traveled like thieves in the night all the way from Henan, where the Murim Alliance headquarters stood, for nothing.

We'd had to reveal our identities to the bandits of Water Dragon Stronghold on our way here, but we'd made sure they kept quiet. It was also why we hadn't contacted the Emei Sect, the Qingcheng Sect, or the Sichuan Tang Clan, despite the ties we'd made on our last trip to Sichuan.

If we revealed ourselves to the non-Han peoples now, all that effort would go to waste.

Dark Heaven would realize an unseen dagger had come right up to its nose and rush its plans forward. Then the rift would open, and with it the door to disaster.

We can't reveal who we are until we reach the Nanman Beast Palace at the very least.

The Beast Miao King, lord of the Nanman Beast Palace, had fought in the Great Faction War. I'd also heard he was well disposed toward Jeok Cheongang and the Fire Gate Clan.

Given the importance of our business and his standing in Nanman, he was far more likely to listen than the other non-Han peoples, who were beside themselves with anger.

And thanks to those Heavenly Demon Escort Bureau bastards, we're getting shit splashed on us too.

One squid makes the whole fish market look bad, as they say. We'd been bundled together with them in the same Han Chinese package, and the Fire Dragon Pavilion's reputation—mine included—was shot.

I wasn't even Han Chinese.

…Does this make me a fake Han Chinese or what?

It was unfair as hell, but there was nothing I could do. I could tell the locals, "Actually, I'm not Han Chinese. I'm Korean. South, not North," and they wouldn't understand a word.

Besides, when I'd gotten homesick during training at Mount Jiuhua and drawn the Korean flag, Jeok Cheongang had said just one thing.

"Wudang?"

"No."

"It's obviously taiji. What kind of bullshit are you talking? Taiji means Wudang."

"Taiji means Korea."

"What's Korea?"

"That's… Never mind. You don't need to know, Old Master."

"Add two hundred geun[2785] of iron balls."

"…Two hundred geun[2786]? Why?"

"You don't need to know."

Just remembering it brought tears to my eyes.

It felt like only yesterday I'd been suffering in this distant land of another dimension. The miserable part was that the suffering never stopped.

"Whew."

At the sight of me sighing, Namho glared fiercely.

"What? Do you also want to go down there and settle things through conversation right now? Or would you rather throw down with the non-Han peoples?"

"…Where did that come from? I don't want to do either."

"That's a relief."

There had already been plenty of chances to throw down with someone, and there would be plenty more in the future. Even now, several predators were wandering around us, letting out their cries.

I scanned the dense jungle and swampland, then asked Namho, "How much farther?"

"Three days if we're quick. Six if we're not."

"That's a lot farther than I expected."

"Given that we have to stay out of sight, even that's quick."

Namho, whose face had aged noticeably, patted his lower back before starting to walk again.

"Don't slow down for a moment from here on. If we cross Ailao Mountain today, we can reach the Nanman Beast Palace in four days at the latest."

He was right.

Exactly four days later, as we crossed a high mountain peak, we spotted a massive structure in the distance, shrouded in thick clouds and mist.

[2785] A geun is a traditional Korean weight unit of 600 grams (1.32 pounds). Two hundred geun is 120 kilograms (about 264 pounds).

[2786] A geun is a traditional Korean weight unit of 600 grams (1.32 pounds). Two hundred geun is 120 kilograms (about 264 pounds).

“The Nanman Beast Palace…”

The voice that slipped from someone’s lips spread on a wind that had blown in from somewhere.

Chapter 622

Even counting only the time I had spent in Murim, well over a year had passed.

One unexpected incident after another had taken me out of Shanxi Province and sent me wandering from place to place. Along the way, I had met all kinds of people and visited the sects they belonged to.

But I could say this much for certain: none of those sects, however large or powerful, could compare to the sight before me.

"Huh."

"Holy…"

Exclamations broke out all around me.

I'd known the place covered an enormous area when I saw it from the mountain peak. I hadn't expected this.

As the clouds and mist cleared and we drew closer, my jaw dropped farther and farther.

Wait. This is a sect?

It was astonishing for two reasons. The first was its sheer size. The second was…

Nanman Beast Palace

A fence around the vast grounds, and a wooden sign someone had scrawled on in a clumsy hand.

Not a high, sturdy wall or an iron gate. A fence. Just a fence.

…Wait. This is a sect?

The thought was the same. The meaning was different.

The fence wasn't even intact.

I studied a half-collapsed stretch for a moment, then turned to Namho.

"Elder Namho, surely this isn't really…"

"You're asking if it's the Nanman Beast Palace?"

"Ah, yes."

I nodded, and Namho answered calmly.

"Can you read?"

"Of course."

"Then read that sign. No, perhaps I'd better read it for you."

He pointed at the clumsily lettered board.

"Nan. Man. Beast. Palace."

"…"

"That's what it says. The Nanman Beast Palace begins here."

I knew what the sign said. The problem was how far the place was from anything I'd imagined.

From above, I'd thought there must be an enormous building here. But up close, out of the mist, it was practically an empty field.

"Captain, shouldn't we call this the Nanman Ranch instead of the Nanman Beast Palace? All I see are fences."

Ju Hwaran looked around and nodded at Hyuk Mujin's dubious assessment.

"This is my first time here, so I can't say I know much about the Nanman Beast Palace, but… it does seem a little lacking for a palace."

Song Ilseom and Sama Pyo, who had been watching in silence, each weighed in.

"There's certainly something strange about it."

"As Hyuk Mujin said, the lack of people bothers me. I don't see any other pavilions or buildings, either. What do you think, Taishan?"

"My lord. Taishan is hungry. Can Taishan eat that mushroom?"

Sama Pyo shook his head at once.

"No."

"Then the cow? That cow walking over there looks tasty."

"You're the Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate, aren't you? Do me a favor and shut that brute's mouth. If I hear one more word, I think I'll burst a blood vessel and die."

"…I understand."

"One more thing. Every blade of grass and every animal you can see belongs to the Nanman Beast Palace. Please remember that. And remember I'm about to burst a blood vessel."

Looking considerably older than he had a moment ago, Namho gave Sama Pyo that stern warning, then pointed across the vast grounds.

"I understand why you're confused, but I never said this place was the Nanman Beast Palace."

"What? You said exactly that a moment ago."

"No, I didn't."

"Ah. Have you gone senile?"

"…"

His expression darkened so quickly that it seemed certain. I gave him a sympathetic look.

"Oh dear. Still, I'm sure you'll be fine. Someone close to me also suffered from infirmities of old age, but they've almost completely recovered now."

"Three things. First, I do not suffer from the infirmities of old age. Second—and I ask only because you've made me curious—how did this acquaintance of yours recover?"

"Returned to Youth."

"…An excellent method. Apart from the fact that I'm an eighty-year-old man who's never learned martial arts."

"Isn't eighty when life begins?"

"I'd like to end your life here, but I lack the strength."

Namho swallowed his anger and went on.

"Third, what I said before still stands. I never said this place was the Nanman Beast Palace. I said the Nanman Beast Palace begins here."

"Oh."

Similar words, very different meanings. Now that I understood, I asked, "So what is this place?"

"That's right. This is one of the lands under the rule of the Nanman Beast Palace. Unlike the other regions of Nanman, it is directly administered by the Palace Lord. That may make it easier to understand."

"So it's similar to how the Emperor appoints vassal kings or City Lords throughout the realm. This place is like the capital of a country."

"Exactly. Of course, the Palace Lord doesn't have the authority of the Son of Heaven, and Nanman's tribal chiefs have more authority than City Lords."

Ju Hwaran, who had been listening, gave a quiet exclamation.

"Now that you mention it, I remember reading something like that in my grandfather's records. He wrote that Nanman was a single kingdom, and the Nanman Beast Palace was like an enormous ranch spanning five counties."

"As expected of the Escort King's granddaughter. But even Great Hero Ju Gongsan never crossed this fence. People who aren't of Nanman's ethnic groups aren't allowed inside."

"It's that strict?"

"It is."

If Namho was telling the truth, then even the Sichuan Tang Clan, a sect whose isolation was second to none in the world, would have to yield to the Nanman Beast Palace.

I clicked my tongue and stared beyond the endless line of fences and grasslands.

"But we need to get in."

"Yes."

"Is there another way? Since you're one of the local ethnic groups, perhaps you can enter…"

"I said outsiders aren't allowed in. I don't recall saying it was easy for the local peoples, either."

"Oh."

“Here, I’m nothing more than a powerless, ordinary old man of the Miao people. If Dark Heaven hadn’t extended its claws into the world, and if you people hadn’t come looking for me, I would have quietly ended my life… you bastard!”

I flinched at his sudden shout.

“Elder Namho, why are you calling yourself that? What’s wrong with quietly living out your days?”

“Not me! That bastard! Catch that fucking son of a bitch!”

At Namho’s frantic yell, we turned.

A huge backside was crawling over the fence. Beyond it, a yellow calf grazed peacefully.

“Oh. Oh, no.”

“Surely he isn’t…”

“When did that bastard get over there?”

“Young Hero Tae!”

“Taishan!”

Sama Pyo’s cry came last. Taishan flinched.

Moo?

The calf sensed something was wrong and jerked its head up. Taishan had somehow already drawn close. An exclamation mark seemed to pop into the calf’s large, clear eyes, and at the same time, its still-growing hooves struck the grass.

Pat-pat-pat!

A quick decision and an attempt to flee—but Taishan was a step faster.

“Beef! Stop right there!”

With that determined shout, his enormous body flew through the air.

The calf was no tiger or leopard. How was it supposed to evade a Peak master who’d decided to catch it?

Taishan landed with a heavy thud, and the calf pinned beneath him screamed.

Moooooo!

It was a plaintive cry, enough to bring tears to your eyes just hearing it. But after days of forced marches and meager rations, all it did was make Taishan’s mouth water.

“Taishan! Beef!”

“Get that bastard off it!”

Before Namho finished shouting, I’d vaulted the fence and reached Taishan.

Grab.

“Let go! Beef tartare!”

“Stop it, you heartless lunatic. Haven’t you seen The Sound of the Bell?”[2787]

[2787] The Sound of the Bell is a Korean documentary film about an elderly farmer and his ox.

"No!"

"…Ah."

Well, of course he hadn't.

That made sense, but it changed nothing. I seized him by the back of the neck and hauled him away.

His mountain-sized body toppled backward. The beef—no, the calf—scrambled to its feet and ran.

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

Grass flew up beneath its hooves, dust rising in its wake. Taishan watched its rump disappear beyond the pasture and muttered mournfully.

"No. Taishan's rump meat…"

Was this guy born in Majang-dong or something?[2788]

While I questioned his origins, Namho erupted.

"You brute!"

"Elder Namho, calm down. Please."

"How am I supposed to calm down right now? I repeatedly warned you not to touch anything in the Nanman Beast Palace's territory! And this hulking glutton of a bastard ignored every word an elder said and went and caused trouble?"

Sama Pyo hurried between Namho and Taishan.

"I'm sorry, Elder Namho. I looked away for just a moment, and… Taishan, apologize to him at once."

Taishan looked Namho straight in the eye.

"Taishan is hungry."

"That fucking bastard. Let go of my hand. Let go! Are you going to let go or not? Did you think I spent over fifty years getting bitten by mosquitoes in Nanman just to see this?"

Life really did begin at eighty. I only had to look at Namho, who had never learned martial arts yet was giving off an aura fierce enough to make even Jeok Cheongang yield to him for once, to know it.

The old Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent, who had been raging like a live volcano, finally calmed down after fifteen minutes.

"Whew. I'm fine now. Let go of my hand."

"Are you sure?"

"My insides have turned a full circle, but I'm not about to die."

A 180-degree turn would have been a problem. A full 360? That was fine.

I nodded to Hyuk Mujin, and he released Namho's hand. Namho sighed, looking as though he were on his deathbed.

[2788] Majang-dong is a Seoul district known for its livestock and meat markets.

"At least nothing happened in the end. If someone from the Nanman Beast Palace had seen that, we'd have been in trouble before we even began."

At another sect in the Central Plains, someone might have thought, It's only one cow. But cultures and people differed. Just as nomads treasured their horses like their own lives, livestock was a valuable asset here, where the boundaries between tribes were sharply drawn and relations between them often strained.

It's called the Nanman Beast Palace, after all.

Even the name sounded animal-friendly. Namho had warned us from the start not to touch anything for a reason.

"So what do we do now?" Hyuk Mujin asked. "We can't wait here forever for someone to show up."

"Entering the Nanman Beast Palace's territory without permission would cause trouble. We'll have to find another way."

Namho reached into his bundle and took something out.

"What's that?"

"An emergency signal firework. If it goes off, someone should at least come out to investigate."

He smiled confidently and lit the fuse with his fire striker.

Crackle.

The fuse burned rapidly toward the end. Then, with a tremendous noise, the firework shot upward.

Fwoooosh—boom!

The problem was that the firework's burst came down on the pasture instead of exploding in the air.

"…Huh?"

"…Huh?"

Whoooosh—roar!

The pasture was engulfed in flames alongside the stunned voices of the others.

I watched the livestock flee in every direction and muttered, "…Someone will definitely come out now."

"…That wasn't supposed to happen."

Wasn't supposed to happen, my ass. We were fucked.

It was then, as I stared miserably at the burning pasture, that it happened.

Roooar!

A savage roar rang out, and a figure appeared beyond the hill on the far side of the flames.

Chapter 623

The young man's brown skin was handsomely tanned, and fine muscles stood out across his lean frame. At a glance, his features marked him as different from the Han Chinese of the Central Plains.

He looked down the hill and wondered,

…What happened here?

It was a reasonable question. A vast pasture was burning before his eyes.

Even now, the rapidly spreading flames were belching endless clouds of black smoke, while cows, sheep, horses, and other livestock fled frantically through the chaos.

Grrrr.

A low growl and tremor suddenly reached him from below. The young man gently stroked the snow-white mane of the white tiger beneath him.

"It's all right. It's okay."

Grrk.

"You're really angry, aren't you?"

Feelings were not conveyed through words alone.

Though one was human and the other a beast, they had spent enough years together to understand each other from the slightest gesture or change in a growl.

The young man met the white tiger's blue gaze and nodded.

"That's right. We'll put out the fire first. We can punish the intruders afterward."

Left alone, the flames would spread beyond control and reduce the entire pasture to ash.

The land could be restored, of course, but they still had to save the livestock that would otherwise be swallowed by the flames and die.

After that…

How dare they?

It was bad enough that the intruders had entered the Nanman Beast Palace's territory without permission. They had set it on fire, too. They would answer for that.

The young man glared at the indistinct figures beyond the distant, acrid smoke and stroked the white tiger's mane.

The white beast understood and shot forward like the wind.

Kraaaar!

Its thunderous roar carried through the flames.

It happened in the blink of an eye.

A white tiger and a non-Han young man had suddenly appeared on the hill, then began rushing about in every direction as though they had become one body.

Whoosh—roar!

I think I saw this in an educational comic when I was little.

Was this what they called a backfire?

Fire met fire. They devoured each other until one went out. The backfire the young man had skillfully set worked remarkably well.

As the flames quickly died down as if nothing had happened, I stepped forward to lend a hand out of sheer conscience.

Boom!

I threw a short, sharp punch. The flames wavered like a candle in the wind…

…and then grew even larger.

ROOOOAR!

“Good grief.”

What the hell?

Namho shouted at me, his voice rising almost to a scream.

“You lunatic! What did you do?”

“…Are you really one to talk, Old Man Nam? The man who farted is getting angry. You set the fire, and now you’re complaining to me?”

“I didn’t know that would happen!”

“Neither did I.”

“Is that what matters? Put the fire out first… Oh! Oh, oh! Behind you! Behind you!”

ROOOOAR!

“Don’t be so dramatic. It’s still fine.”

The flames had not grown that much stronger, but we did need to put them out quickly.

In my haste, I struck again and again with my palms at the swelling fire, without stopping to think.

A moment later, it came to me.

Oh, right.

The palm technique I had just used was called the Flame Divine Palm.

Fwooooooosh!

A moment ago, I could not have said the flames had grown that much stronger. Now I could say it with confidence.

They had grown a hell of a lot stronger.

In a way, it was almost miraculous. Flames that had been on the verge of dying were now roaring several times larger than before.

To the livestock fleeing in every direction, of course, it must have looked like hell.

"…Uh."

I stared from the near-inferno around me to my palms and back. Then I looked up and met two pairs of eyes glaring at me through the flames.

They belonged to the white tiger from the hill and the young man riding it. Their eyes were different colors, and they were different species, but they had one thing in common.

They were both pissed as hell.

"You bastard! What do you think you're doing?"

Kraaaar!

The kid looked young, yet he was speaking casually to me on our first meeting.

He had crossed a line, certainly. Then again, I had burned the line down. As a civilized man of the twenty-first century, I calmly and politely reassured them.

"I don't know who you are, but don't worry. I'll take care of it."

Of course, there was no guarantee they would feel reassured just because I said so. As demonstrated by the immediate response.

"No! Don't!"

Kraaaar!

I gently reasoned with the man and tiger shouting in unison.

"It's okay. I can do this. More importantly, could you quiet the tiger down a little?"

"No, you bastard!"

Kraaaar!

"Don't do it?"

"Don't do it!"

KRAAAAR!

Hmm. Opposition as fierce as the fire itself. But I shook my head.

"No. I'm doing it. I believe in myself."

"You crazy Han Chinese bas—!"

Kraaaar…!

Before either of them could finish, I struck with both palms at lightning speed.

Whoooosh—boom!

Two streams of mighty palm force shot through the air, splitting apart and bursting through the rolling waves of fire.

But if I stopped there, the flames would only surge higher. I would be repeating the same mistake.

Without hesitation, I fired off one palm force after another.

Boom! Boom!

The reason people had trouble putting out fires was simple.

They either lacked enough water, or they lacked wind strong enough to snuff the flames out like candles.

So all you needed was more water or stronger wind. In this case, I went with the latter.

Boom!

The final palm force I sent out was especially powerful.

A typhoon-like wind swept across the pasture. The fleeing livestock lifted briefly off the ground, and grass and trees alike were flattened.

And then…

Whoosh.

The flames spreading in every direction died down in an instant.

All that remained were small embers burning like a campfire and patches of pasture reduced to black ash.

A young man and a snow-white tiger stared at it all in a daze.

"What… What is this?"

Grrrr?

Two pairs of eyes turned to me in disbelief.

I walked over to the last ember nearby, ground it out beneath my foot, and shrugged.

"I told you. I can do it."

…!

…!

The young man stared at me in pure astonishment. Then he aimed the spear in his hand at me.

"I am Yayul Mok of the Nanman Beast Palace. Who are you?"

So he was from the Nanman Beast Palace. No surprise there.

I nodded and was just about to answer when an elderly voice suddenly rang out from behind me.

"He is Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

I turned. The members of the Fire Dragon Pavilion had come up behind me, with Namho at their head.

"In the Central Plains, they call him the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, the foremost young prodigy of his generation. He is also the Pavilion Master of the Fire Dragon Pavilion, which belongs to the Murim Alliance."

I did not know whether my name and sobriquet had reached Nanman.

But at the very least, the non-Han young man in front of me—Yayul Mok—seemed to understand the words Namho had added perfectly.

"The Murim Alliance…"

He murmured the words and stroked the white tiger's mane. After watching its growls subside, he lowered his spear and turned away.

"Follow me. Since the Murim Alliance has been mentioned, I will let this go for now. But don't do anything as foolish as that again."

Namho shrugged.

"It was an accident. But I'll keep it in mind."

"You had better, unless you want to die a sudden death."

I watched Yayul Mok ride ahead on the white tiger, then gave Namho a sour look.

"That kid's rude. I know setting the fire was wrong, but still."

"Hey, Han Chinese. I can hear you."

Grrrr.

"I meant for you to hear me, punk."

"What?"

"Is that any way to speak to an elder? Don't you have a grandfather?"

For a moment, anger flashed across his face. He glared at me, then turned away again. Walking behind me, Namho gave me a flat, unimpressed look and said,

"Watch your tongue."

"I was taking your side, Old Man Nam. Telling someone who could drop dead any day that he might 'die a sudden death'? Who says that?"

"Since when could I drop dead any day…? Forget it. I should never have expected anything from you. Do you have some illness that'll kill you on the spot if you go even one day without stirring up trouble?"

"Do you have a disease that'll make you senile if you don't set fire to a pasture owned by the Nanman Beast Palace?"

"…"

"Take a good look at yourself before I confiscate your walking stick for three months."

Namho sighed, having come off much worse in that exchange.

"All right. I admit it. This was clearly my mistake. It was something I had kept for more than fifty years, so I should have been more careful handling it."

"Nice to see you admit it so readily. The pasture's still nice and hot, though."

"…My bones ache every time you speak. Still, be a little more careful with that young man."

"Why?"

"Why else? You heard his name. Yayul Mok."

"Yayul Mok, Yayul Mosquito—what am I supposed to…?"

I trailed off. Something I had forgotten was hovering just out of reach.

Yayul Mok. Yayul Mok…

After thinking it over carefully, I turned to Ju Hwaran and asked,

“Excuse me, Young Lady Ju.”

“Yes?”

“What was the name of the lord of the Nanman Beast Palace again?”

“You mean the Beast Miao King?”

“Yes.”

The Beast Miao King, lord of the Nanman Beast Palace, led the Miao people, one of Nanman’s most powerful tribes. Despite his non-Han origins, he also held a place among the Ten Kings, albeit the lowest.

Hwaran smiled and answered kindly.

“Yayul Cheok.”

“Ah. Right.”

“Yes. Yayul is his family name. It’s a rare surname that you don’t often encounter even in Nanman.”

“Then that rude friend of ours must have the surname Ya. And his given name is Yulmok.”

“Forgive me, but are you hoping that’s true?”

“Hmm. What if I am?”

Hwaran was about to answer when the forest blocking Yayul Mok’s path far ahead began to shake.

Rustle. Crackle!

I swear I had not seen so many different animals gathered in one place since I went to the zoo at seven years old.

Jaguars and tigers covered in black fur, leopards, even elephants.

The non-Han men and women riding the beasts spotted Yayul Mok. They hurriedly dismounted and prostrated themselves.

“Young Palace Lord!”

“Are you unharmed?”

“We received an urgent report that a fire had broken out. If Young Palace Lord continues acting so recklessly, the Palace Lord will be terribly worried… But who are these people?”

Dozens of pairs of eyes, human and beast alike, turned toward us.

I quietly considered what they had called him. Then I recalled asking him whether he had a grandfather.

I edged up beside Yayul Mok, draped an arm over his shoulders, and said,

“We’re friends. Right, Mok?”

“…”

“Hey. Smile.”

Chapter 624

Ju Hwaran told me that her grandfather, the Escort King Ju Gongsan, had once said this about the Nanman Beast Palace:

> "Nanman is practically a kingdom, and the Nanman Beast Palace is a vast ranch encompassing five counties."

The Escort King had traveled the Four Seas and Five Lakes and the Nine Provinces and Eight Wastes. He had been right.

The territory directly ruled by the Nanman Beast Palace stretched across five counties. In sheer area, even the Nine Sects and One Gang or the Five Great Families of the Central Plains could not compare.

Direct rule versus indirect rule, I suppose.

The Son of Heaven ruled the Central Plains, but in Nanman, the Nanman Beast Palace held supreme authority. It might not surpass the great orthodox factions in martial power, but its influence here was bound to be far greater.

If there was one thing the Escort King had gotten wrong…

This isn't a ranch. It's a safari.

I had never seen such a jumble of animals, plants, temperatures, and terrain in one place.

We followed Yayul Mok and his subordinates across grasslands, through jungles, and over mountains and rivers. I could only shake my head.

"What the hell is wrong with this weather?"

Ju Hwaran, riding to my right, answered my mutter.

"One mountain holds four seasons, and ten li bring a different sky.[2789] It's a saying that describes Nanman's unpredictable nature quite well."

"Having seen it for myself, I can't argue. Young Lady Ju, what made you take an escort job to a place like this?"

"I didn't know it would be this extreme, either. I've accompanied my father on escort journeys before, but this is my first time going so deep into Nanman."

A thick fur pelt was draped over her shoulders. She smiled, and a cloud of white breath escaped her lips.

Most people associated Nanman with jungles. Like anyone else from the Central Plains, I had thought the same.

But this damned land had somehow packed frigid, temperate, subtropical, and tropical climates together like apartments along a hallway.

"At this point, it's practically cursed land."

[2789] A Chinese li is about 500 meters (0.311 miles); ten li is about 5 kilometers (3.1 miles).

"…Watch your mouth."

If Hwaran was on my right, Namho was on my left.

The elderly Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent was riding a black panther with one of Yayul Mok's subordinates. He hunched low to avoid the branches but still found room to glare at me.

"I'm sure they'd love to hear you say that. Don't you think?"

"So what? It's true. Besides, I'm speaking Han Chinese. They can't understand me."

A few dozen feet ahead, Yayul Mok spoke without warning.

"I'd prefer it if you kept that mouth of yours shut."

"…That was Han Chinese."

"…Han Chinese?"

How the hell did he pull that off?

I felt like a cardsharp caught dealing from the bottom of the deck at a flower-card game.[2790] Yayul Mok's Han Chinese was halting but unmistakable. Namho and I exchanged a look before I asked, "Did you study Han Chinese?"

"A little. I lost interest and quit soon afterward."

"Oh, really? Only a little? And you quit that quickly?"

Yayul Mok answered my hopeful question with a stony face. "I still understand it well enough. Words like 'cursed land,' for example."

"…"

"We'll arrive soon, and then you can leave this cursed land. Until then, I'd appreciate it if you stayed quiet."

There was nothing I could say to that. I shut my mouth, and Namho smiled with the wisdom of a sage.

"Well done. Very well done. Thanks to you, the Nanman Beast Palace and the Murim Alliance should be able to join hands with ease."

"You make that sound like an insult. Still, you heard the good news."

"It's good news for Dark Heaven. The Murim Alliance's foremost young prodigy came to propose an alliance, asked the Young Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace whether he had a grandfather, and called Nanman a cursed land. Come to think of it, are you with Dark Heaven?"

"Do I look like a member of Dark Heaven?"

"No. But I'll admit I'm starting to wonder. Enough nonsense. What's this good news I haven't heard?"

I answered with confidence. "We'll be at the Nanman Beast Palace soon."

"God damn it…"

"Hey, don't swear."

[2790] Flower cards (hwatu) are Korean playing cards used in gambling games such as go-stop. Being caught dealing from the bottom of the deck echoes the Korean gambling film Tazza.

"Do I look like I can help swearing right now? That A-Gwi bastard[2791] they call Taishan—or Geumsugangsan[2792] or whatever his name is—is one problem, but in my opinion, you're no less troublesome, Pavilion Master. You're already acting like this before we arrive. What are you going to do if your particular brand of insanity flares up when you actually come face-to-face with the Beast Miao King?"

"'Insanity' is a bit harsh. I may look reckless, but I know when I can stretch my legs. And Taishan may be lacking in certain areas, but he's a major asset. When the time comes, he'll pull his weight. You don't need to worry so much."

At that moment, a mournful animal cry rose behind us, followed by a frantic shout.

Gwooooooo!

"Y-Young Palace Lord! This huge Han bastard is biting my bear's ear off!"

"Taishan! Bear meat!"

"Captain!"

"Taishan! Stop! Stop eating!"

"Seize that Han bastard!"

I glanced back as we rode, then added, "Of course, his appetite is a problem."

"For fuck's sake. There's appetite, and then there's appetite. Is that thing a beast or a person?"

I couldn't argue. Lately, I'd begun to suspect Taishan might be some unknown creature occupying the space between human and beast.

Fire Dragon Pavilion. Are we going to be all right like this?

Taishan was chewing on the ear of the bear he'd been riding. Sama Pyo was trying to put a stop to his subordinate's animal abuse, while the bear howled in pain and made it abundantly clear that it refused to carry passengers any longer.

I was watching them when Yayul Mok spoke with a sigh.

"We're here. Please stop this and get off already."

He was right. The chill in the air had vanished. Humid, oppressive heat surrounded us now, and a dense tropical rainforest stood ahead.

Beyond it…

Rumble, rumble.

An iron gate covered in vines and tree trunks swung open, revealing countless pavilions and houses.

[2791] A-Gwi is the ruthless gambler villain of the film Tazza. His name, agwi, also means a ravenous "hungry ghost".

[2792] Geumsugangsan literally means "beautiful mountains and rivers," a Korean expression for a scenic landscape.

[2793] A Chinese li is about 500 meters (0.311 miles); ten li is about 5 kilometers (3.1 miles).

This was a glimpse of the Nanman Beast Palace. Tens of thousands of li[2793] from the Central Plains, in the deepest and most secluded part of Nanman, its people had built a kingdom of their own.

Any family or sect of a certain size, including the Jin Family of Taiyuan, generally divided itself into an Outer Hall and an Inner Hall. The division gave it an organizational structure and lines of defense in case enemies attacked.

But the Outer Hall of the Nanman Beast Palace was far larger than that of an ordinary sect.

This is practically a city.

The Escort King had called it a kingdom for good reason.

Unusual houses and countless other buildings, unlike anything commonly seen in the Central Plains, caught my eye. People were haggling at what looked like a market on one side of the street. Nearby, children of six or seven laughed and played with young beasts.

People, buildings, commerce, workshops—there was so much of everything that the place looked like the capital of a small nation. Hyuk Mujin couldn't close his mouth.

"Wow. I thought I'd seen a lot, but this is beyond anything I imagined. Captain, do you see that? It's incredible."

"It is. But there's something even more incredible. Want to know what?"

Hyuk Mujin kept looking around as he asked, "What?"

"Us."

"Ah."

"Now that you get it, close your mouth and stop gawking. We're attracting enough attention already."

Judging by the settlement immediately visible before us and its sheer size, the Outer Hall alone probably contained several thousand households.

Moreover, the Nanman Beast Palace was located in the deepest part of Nanman, and outsiders were strictly forbidden from entering. Naturally, we stood out like a handful of pebbles among them.

Quite a few of them were probably seeing Han Chinese for the first time.

Making a fuss wouldn't help us, especially with the mood like this.

"Are those Han Chinese? They look like us, but a little strange."

"Shh. Don't even make eye contact. Haven't you heard what happened in the north? A bunch of Han Chinese slaughtered an entire Miao village. Those people might be with them."

“Of course I heard about it. But what could those bastards possibly do here? They look like the Young Palace Lord captured them.”

“They don’t look like prisoners to me… Anyway, what brings Han Chinese all the way here?”

Their languages varied as much as their clothing and appearances. Hwaran, Namho, and I could understand what they were saying, and we spoke among ourselves in low voices.

“Looks like word has already spread.”

“I can only understand the Miao and Bai languages, but the mood here seems tense overall.”

“It happened only a few days ago. Tribes clash dozens of times a year, but an incident involving outsiders might happen once in a decade, if that. Of course word spread quickly.”

If we had built up a good reputation, we might have been welcomed wherever we went. But the massacre of the Miao village about a month earlier had produced the exact opposite result.

Hyuk Mujin shrank back, taking the hint, and grumbled.

“Those lunatics. The Heavenly Demon Escort Bureau, or whatever they were called. Why did they have to commit such an atrocious crime in Nanman of all places…?”

“I wonder. Why did they?”

Sama Pyo had cut in. He continued in an amused tone. “And why now, of all times? That’s worth thinking about. I suspect our friend there has been thinking the same thing I have for a while. Am I right?”

Song Ilseom answered evenly. “Yes, but no.”

“…What does ‘yes, but no’ mean?”

“It means that whatever I may think, I don’t want to talk to you. So don’t.”

“You’re pettier than you look. Well, if that’s how it is.”

I gave Sama Pyo a warning look. He raised an eyebrow, then backed off first.

Their feud aside, I had been carrying the same question throughout the journey.

The Heavenly Demon Escort Bureau.

Coincidence or design, the timing of the massacre was suspicious. It was too early to say what the answer was.

Still, have we avoided the worst?

Before meeting Yayul Mok, I’d been a little worried. No, very worried. I’d feared that Dark Heaven’s scheme had already begun and the Nanman Beast Palace had become a hellscape.

Of course, our image as Han Chinese had plummeted to the level of a pro-Japanese corporation, but the mere fact that nothing had happened yet was more than enough.

Even if we have to take some abuse, this is much better.

As I thought that, a strange sense of déjà vu made me lift my head.

This is…

The others might not have noticed, but I could feel it: the flow of air had grown heavier so gradually that the change was easy to miss. Beyond the crowd's noise and the countless signs of life around us, someone's aura was pouring out in rough waves.

I followed it with my eyes.

An old man sat atop a flight of vine-covered steps. His upper body was bare, his frame massive and muscular.

I knew who he was before he opened his mouth.

The Beast Miao King.

It was him.

Chapter 625

People have something called an aura.

Some people's auras are so faint and hazy they can barely be felt. Others are powerful and rough as waves, overwhelming anyone who faces them.

The Beast Miao King, Yayul Cheok, belonged to the latter sort.

Whoosh.

Yayul Cheok slowly rose to his feet, like a mountain beginning to move.

Though he was well over eighty, the muscles covering his body were as solid as armor. He walked without hesitation, his half-gray beard billowing like a lion's mane.

Thud. Thud.

Everyone could see him now as he came down the vine-covered steps, trampling them beneath his bare feet.

Yayul Mok and his guards immediately dismounted and dropped to one knee. It was their way of showing respect to the lord of the Nanman Beast Palace.

"Greetings, Palace Lord."

The Beast Miao King stared intently at Yayul Mok.

"You ran off again without a word."

"There was a fire in the northeastern pasture. I happened to be nearby…"

"Did you put it out?"

"Yes."

"And the culprit?"

The question was clearly for Yayul Mok, but the Beast Miao King was looking at me.

I met the fierce light in his tiger-like eyes and stepped forward.

"'Culprit' would be putting it a bit strongly. There was a little mistake."

"It has been a long time since I've seen Han Chinese. Are you the culprit who started the fire?"

Before I could answer, he went on in a growling voice.

"Think carefully before you answer. Nanman's laws are not merciful."

I thought for a moment. "What's the punishment for something like this?"

"That depends on the damage. In serious cases, the offender is fed to wild beasts. Or thrown into a pit full of venomous beasts."

"What about minor cases?"

"Hanged from a vine."

"That's minor?"

"Of course. The body remains intact."

"Ah."

I nodded, stepped casually aside, and introduced someone.

"Ta-da. He's the culprit, actually."

An ordinary person might have panicked, but a Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent with fifty years of experience was made of sterner stuff. Namho spoke calmly.

"Are you fucking insane?"

"I'm not wrong, am I?"

"You fucking bastard…"

Namho was about to launch into a full stream of abuse when the Beast Miao King cut in, his voice rough.

"So you mean to abandon your companion to save your own skin."

"Hmm. I think you've misunderstood. I never said I was abandoning him."

"A misunderstanding?"

"I'm just getting the facts—no, setting the record straight. We haven't known each other long, but he's a good man. And there's the Murim Alliance's reputation to consider."

I had brought up the Murim Alliance deliberately. He could have let the matter drop there, but the fierce light in his eyes did not dim.

"Once you enter Nanman, you follow Nanman's laws. What if one of you must take responsibility?"

"If you insist…"

I scratched the back of my head.

"Wouldn't we have to stop that somehow?"

At that moment—

Whoom!

The air around us vanished.

Before the short, heavy sound of air splitting could even be heard, a single punch shot toward me. It carried enough force to resemble a battering ram, and I crossed both arms in front of myself.

Boom!

A deafening roar rang out as though the sky itself had split open, and the shock wave from the collision swept in every direction.

The tremendous force drove me back a full ten feet.[2794] I sighed.

"Will that do?"

The Beast Miao King asked, his eyes emitting a glacial light.

"What do you mean?"

"Our first greeting."

[2794] The source uses one jang, a traditional length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

"What?"

"Before coming to Nanman, someone told me something. The Beast Miao King may look ignorant and reckless, but he's actually warmhearted and loves playing pranks. So take him in stride and get along with him."

"…!"

"…!"

The Fire Dragon Pavilion members' reaction—standing there with their mouths hanging open—was nothing compared to what came next.

Yayul Mok, the Young Palace Lord, and his guards stared at me in shock before reaching for their weapons at lightning speed.

But before they could act, the Beast Miao King, whose lips had been twitching at my words, burst into laughter.

"Ha ha ha ha! Old Master Jeok hasn't changed a bit."

I rubbed my stinging forearms. "He's as hale as ever."

"I heard he'd taken a Disciple, but I didn't expect to meet you so soon."

He looked me over with fresh interest, then grinned.

"Good to meet you. This old man is Yayul Cheok."

With anyone else, things might have been different. But before he was lord of the Nanman Beast Palace, he was someone Jeok Cheongang knew.

I clasped my hands respectfully toward the Beast Miao King.

"Jin Taekyung, nineteenth successor of the Fire Gate Clan, pays his respects to Great Hero Yayul Cheok, the Beast Miao King."

"Good! Ha ha ha!"

He laughed again, rough and hearty, then spoke with unmistakable warmth.

"We have much to discuss. Follow me."

Everyone stared after him as he strode away, then turned to me. Their faces all asked the same question.

I shrugged. "He's pretty close with my master."

As expected, life was all about school ties, regional ties, and blood ties.

The Beast Miao King looked happy. No, he definitely was happy.

Jeok Cheongang had told me he was usually cheerful, but as he sat in the Nanman Beast Palace's main hall telling old stories, he looked like an oversized child.

"I remember the day I first met Old Master Jeok. He took one look at me and hit me with a Flame Divine Palm."

"…According to the Old Master—no, according to my master—he didn't actually let it fly. He said he only almost did."

“No, he definitely hit me. It knocked the breath out of me and scared the shit out of me.”

The Sect Leaders and Family Heads of the great factions I’d met so far generally maintained some dignity. The Beast Miao King walked around in nothing but tiger-skin pants and didn’t give a damn about dignity.

As proof, he showed me the mark of the Flame Divine Palm stamped into his side and added casually,

“Quite a first meeting. I shit blood twice, went back to see him, and he poured me a drink to disinfect the wound. What a hearty man.”

“…Ah. Right.”

I wondered whether hearty meant what I thought it did. But if the man who’d been hit was fine with it, what could I say?

Besides, criticizing Jeok Cheongang would be like spitting in my own face.

“I regretted not seeing Old Master Jeok after the Great Faction War ended. Meeting his Disciple like this is a pleasure. Do you drink?”

“Of course I do, but I can’t right now.”

“Why not?”

“Something’s more urgent than a drink.”

If the world had been at peace, I would gladly have made a night of it. I would have toasted the Beast Miao King, shouted, “Yayul Cheok’s favorite—random games!” and gotten all the people of other ethnicities completely wasted on drinking games.

But not now.

“This time, I didn’t come as my master’s Disciple. I came as the Pavilion Master of the Murim Alliance.”

The smile on the Beast Miao King’s lips faded a little.

“Because of Dark Heaven?”

“So you know about them.”

“I received a messenger eagle concerning it. Since we’re tens of thousands of li[2795] from the Central Plains, the message arrived late. But it’s not as though I know nothing about the situation in the Central Plains.”

“If you don’t mind my asking, when did you receive it?”

“Let me think. More than a month ago now, I believe.”

Considering the distance between Henan and Nanman, as well as the timing, the letter must have been sent before the formation of the Murim Alliance, an event called the Mount Song Resolution.

[2795] A Chinese li is about 500 m (0.311 mi).

As many sects as possible had needed to attend the Mount Song Resolution, and Chief of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion Thousand-Faced Fox was not the kind of person who would send a letter without taking even that into account.

Which meant…

"The Nanman Beast Palace refused to join the alliance."

There had been time to send a reply, or to bring some of the people of Nanman to Mount Song. But the fact that the Nanman Beast Palace had sent no response to the Murim Alliance could only be interpreted as a polite refusal.

The Beast Miao King remained silent for a moment before abruptly opening his mouth.

"It was not an outright refusal. We simply haven't reached a decision."

"But surely, Palace Lord, that decision is yours to—"

He raised a hand, cutting me off. Stroking his mane-like beard, he spoke again.

"Old Master Jeok's Disciple. No, Jin Taekyung, was it?"

"Yes."

"I have a question for those you brought with you. Do you know who I am?"

The group hesitated. Hyuk Mujin was the first to meet his gaze, and he swallowed hard before answering.

"You're Great Hero Yayul Cheok, the Beast Miao King. A Supreme Peak master and one of the Ten Kings."

"Correct. The woman beside you. Yes, you."

Ju Hwaran answered at once. "As everyone knows, you're the Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace."

"That is also correct. But it is not the answer I want. This time, you beside her—tell me."

Before anyone could stop him, Taishan blinked his enormous eyes.

"Taishan. Hungry."

You bastard, Taishan. You answering-machine bastard. You fucking bastard…

The answer was so far from anything I'd expected that even the Beast Miao King looked taken aback.

"Who is he?"

I thought for a moment, then answered honestly. "I'm not really sure anymore."

"What a strange fellow. Then let the old man beside him answer."

Namho, who had been firing a rapid stream of profanity at Taishan in a low voice, opened his mouth.

"You are the Great Chieftain who leads the Miao people."

"Yes."

The Beast Miao King nodded.

“I am the Great Chieftain who represents countless Miao people. I gathered them under one banner and became the Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace with the support of the other tribal chiefs. Mok, do you know how many tribes exist in our land?”

Yayul Mok, who had been standing quietly at attention, answered.

“If we include all of Nanman, there are thirty-two tribes, including four great tribes such as the Miao people.”

“Yes. That is the Nanman Beast Palace.”

I understood what the Beast Miao King was getting at. So did everyone else in the hall.

Except Taishan, of course.

“Are you saying…”

“Before I am Palace Lord, I am the Great Chieftain of the Miao people. And the Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace is not a king.”

He couldn’t make every decision alone.

The Nanman Beast Palace was certainly like a separate kingdom, cut off from the Central Plains. But that kingdom was made up of an alliance of large and small tribes.

Why tell us so openly, though?

Are the other tribes opposed, while the Beast Miao King himself is considering agreeing to join the alliance?

I was about to ask when a quiet voice came from beyond the firmly shut doors of the main hall.

“Palace Lord, may I speak with you for a moment?”

Chapter 626

"Palace Lord, may I speak with you for a moment?"

A low, rigid voice came through the crack between the closed doors.

Everyone turned toward the doors behind us. But in that brief instant, I caught a change in two faces.

The Beast Miao King. And Yayul Mok.

We outsiders were stones that had happened to roll in from elsewhere. Those two were rooted so deeply in Nanman that they were more like its indispensable core.

I didn't know who the voice belonged to, but the way their eyes darkened was answer enough.

They're not exactly on smiling terms.

Just as I reached that conclusion, the Beast Miao King met my gaze and gave a quiet laugh.

"What an interesting fellow."

"Pardon?"

"It's nothing. Just something that slipped out."

As if it were nothing. Anyone could see it was something.

But the Beast Miao King gave a small wave of his thick hand, as if telling me not to ask any further, then addressed everyone—including me.

"I'm sorry, but another guest has arrived. Could you give us some privacy? We still have time. Rest from your journey, and we can talk properly afterward."

There was a slight contradiction in the Beast Miao King's words about there still being time. As long as Dark Heaven existed, no one knew what might happen.

Still, I was all for resting a while before we talked.

At least nothing unusual seems to have happened in Nanman yet.

I nodded, and the Beast Miao King looked toward Yayul Mok, standing at attention to his right.

"Mok."

One word was enough. Yayul Mok bowed respectfully, then gestured for us to follow him.

"We'll take our leave."

"Go. I'll prepare a grand welcome for you."

Forget the grand welcome. I just hope the talks about joining the alliance and Dark Heaven go well.

We turned away from the Beast Miao King. As we reached the doors, the slabs of carved stone began to move.

Rumble.

Through the slowly widening gap, I could see two muscular men in bear hides pulling chains attached to the doors.

And then…

“It’s been a long time.”

The man with the rigid voice was there too.

At his unexpected greeting, Yayul Mok bowed his head.

“Yayul Mok of the Miao people pays his respects to Uncle Baeksang.”

The middle-aged man of another ethnicity was dressed entirely in white, from head to toe, including his clothing and accessories. The man Yayul Mok had called Uncle Baeksang opened his mouth.

“I heard you’d returned. There was quite a large fire in the northeastern pasture, I hear.”

“It was a minor problem. We put it out quickly.”

“A minor problem.”

The cold gaze that accompanied his rigid voice swept over us. Baeksang examined Yayul Mok and everyone standing behind him.

Me in particular.

“I hope so.”

“…”

“And the Palace Lord?”

“He’s waiting inside.”

That was all. Baeksang glanced at Yayul Mok, who still had his head bowed, then passed us without another word.

Rumble.

The stone doors closed with another heavy grinding sound. Only then did Yayul Mok raise his head.

He stared at the shut doors, his lips pressed tight. I asked, “Who was that?”

“None of your business.”

“Don’t want to tell me, huh? Fine. Elder Namho?”

Namho, the Hidden Shadow Pavilion’s walking encyclopedia of Nanman, answered without hesitation.

“He’s the Great Chieftain of the Bai people, one of Nanman’s four most powerful tribes.”

“Oh. No wonder he’s dressed all in white. I saw a few Bai people near the entrance to Nanman. Those whiteys, right?”

Namho sounded taken aback. “Whiteys… Well, you’re not wrong. The tribe reveres the color white.”

More than thirty tribes lived throughout Nanman, each with its own villages and customs. Yeongin was something of a meeting place, where several tribes, including the Bai people, lived together by making compromises.

I didn't know they were that powerful.

The Great Chieftain of one of the four tribes that divided up this vast land…

I'd suspected he was important when Yayul Mok called him Uncle, but Baeksang was a bigger figure than I'd imagined.

Now that I had the basics, I caught up with Yayul Mok, who had gotten well ahead of us.

"You two didn't seem very close. Is he really your uncle?"

"…"

"Hey. Hey, can't you hear me?"

"…"

"If someone calls you, you're supposed to answer. Do you want to see the burning pasture? Huh? Want me to start a nice fucking fire on the way back?"

"…"

"Oh, this bastard is ignoring me to the very end. Fine, I get it. You have to see fire, not a coffin, before you'll cry."

As a trash talker, I had a hundred percent win rate. This time was no different.

"…Please stop spouting bullshit I can't understand."

"Oh, then behave yourself. If you answered promptly, none of this would happen."

Yayul Mok glared at me for a moment, then sighed.

"Think before you ask. Would we belong to different tribes if he were my uncle by blood?"

"Fair point. So why call him Uncle?"

"He and my father are sworn brothers. They became close when they were young, and I'm told they always fought together during the Great Faction War."

My eyes widened.

"What? Really?"

"I'd heard you Han Chinese bastards were suspicious, but I didn't expect it to be true. What, don't you believe me?"

"It's not that, but… I was a little surprised."

"Is it so surprising that they're sworn brothers?"

"No, not that."

"…?"

"Great Hero Yayul Cheok was your father? Not your grandfather or great-grandfather?"

"…!"

Yayul Mok's eyes went cold, but I couldn't help being surprised. The guy looked twenty-five at most, and he was the son of the Beast Miao King, who was well past eighty.

Martial artists tended to marry late, but this was impressive in a whole different way.

"Um, Pavilion Master?"

I waved off Ju Hwaran's cautious call.

"Just a second. One last question. You're not the eldest son, are you?"

Tap tap tap.

Yayul Mok suddenly walked faster. He forced the words through his teeth.

"I'm the only son in three generations."

"Wow. Yayul Only Son. Omniscient Nanman Reader's Viewpoint—totally doable."[2796]

"What does that mean? Are you actually insane?"

"I say things people can't understand sometimes. Anyway, that Baeksang fellow seems to be against the Nanman Beast Palace joining the alliance, right? Whatever happened back then, you two aren't on great terms now?"

"That's no concern of an outsider like you—!"

This was why the flow of a conversation mattered.

Yayul Mok had answered with his face flushed in anger, but he caught himself and trailed off. Too late. The water was spilled, and the fire had spread.

Having baited him perfectly, I smiled warmly and patted his shoulder.

"You bastard. Why'd you stop? My guess was right, then?"

"…You."

"That's enough for now. I'll ask again if I need to. Thanks. Oh, this is our lodging, right? Thanks for showing us the way."

I left Yayul Mok glaring at me like he wanted to kill me and turned around. Namho was staring at me like a caveman who had just discovered fire.

"Ever thought of joining the Hidden Shadow Pavilion?"

"The Hidden Shadow Pavilion? Forget it. Anyway, you heard all that, didn't you?"

"Of course. The way you lured him in and hooked him—you're at least as good as Jiang Taigong."[2797]

I answered solemnly.

"A fisherman who catches people. Please call me Jindro."

"Jindro…!"

[2796] In Korean, dokja can mean both "only son" and "reader." The line plays on the title Omniscient Reader's Viewpoint.

[2797] Jiang Taigong is a legendary Chinese fisherman associated with the image of drawing people in like fish.

Ju Hwaran and Hyuk Mujin clenched their fists, their faces alight with excitement.

"Pavilion Master, that was incredible. I really thought you'd lost your mind at first."

"Young Lady Ju is right. I was so frustrated that I wanted to tear Captain's mouth open and kill him."

That felt like a strange sort of praise, but I'd gotten the job done. I smiled with satisfaction.

"Thank you, Young Lady Ju. Mujin, head down."

"Yes, sir."

Thud.

Hyuk Mujin planted his head on the ground as naturally as breathing, and I sat on his back.

Song Ilseom and Sama Pyo watched us in disbelief.

"That was absurd, but… we did learn something important."

"Pavilion Master, what do you intend to do now?"

I shrugged.

We had new information, but the Great Chieftain of the Bai people opposing the Nanman Beast Palace's entry into the Murim Alliance was hardly good news.

What bothered me more was why.

Why? Why?

Why would a man who had fought in the Great Faction War—the Beast Miao King's childhood friend and sworn younger brother—oppose joining the alliance?

And what had that coldness in Baeksang's eyes meant during our brief encounter? Why had he studied me so closely?

I couldn't stop thinking about it.

Grrrrrrk.

"Taishan. Hungry."

"…"

That fucking bastard.

The Beast Miao King sat in a high-backed chair draped with leopard and tiger hides, his chin propped on one hand. He picked up the wine bottle before him.

Trickle.

Cloudy liquor poured from the rough stone bottle he had carved himself, filling a large wooden bowl. He filled a second and offered one to his guest.

"It's the fruit wine you like. Have some, Baeksang."

Baeksang. The name meant white elephant.

But the middle-aged man who caught the slowly flying bowl looked nothing like one. He was lean, unlike the Beast Miao King, with eyes as cold as ice and a mouth held stiff. His answer was just as rigid.

"No, thank you. I'll pass today."

Clack.

Baeksang set the bowl down with a clack. The Beast Miao King smiled bitterly.

"…I see. That's fine."

It wasn't fine. His heart ached.

In memories grown hazy with time, his one sworn brother had laughed and talked with him for days and nights, their cups never still. For decades now, that brother had given him the same answer.

I'll pass today.

It wasn't only today. He had said it the day before yesterday and yesterday. Tomorrow and the day after would be the same.

The Beast Miao King knew the answer so well he could predict it. Knowing he would be right hurt all the more.

"So, what brings you to see your older brother today?"

Baeksang's voice did not waver.

"You know why."

"Because of them."

"I heard they came from the Murim Alliance."

"That's right. Sword Saint Mae Jonghak, the new Alliance Leader, sent them."

The Beast Miao King admitted it readily. There was no reason to hide it, and Baeksang would hear about it regardless. Plenty of Bai people belonged to the Nanman Beast Palace's Inner Hall.

He may even know exactly who they are.

The Baeksang he knew had always been meticulous. This time would be no different.

Baeksang's cold eyes settled on the Beast Miao King as he silently raised his bowl.

"You haven't forgotten the result of the last tribal council, have you?"

Of course not.

As the Beast Miao King answered inwardly, Baeksang's rigid voice pierced his ears.

"We—the Nanman Beast Palace… will never join the alliance."

Chapter 627

The temporary lodging we'd been assigned was decent enough. It wasn't as lavish as the accommodations in the Central Plains, but it was clean and had everything the Fire Dragon Pavilion and I needed for our stay.

That didn't mean we'd been welcomed without reservation.

"Hmm. Does anyone know what's stuck between my chopsticks?"

Hyuk Mujin shot his hand up at the surprise quiz I'd sprung on everyone in the middle of the meal.

"Okay, Mujin. Let's hear it."

"A bug!"

"Correct. A centipede, to be precise. So why is it in our food?"

"Hmm. Perhaps it's a custom of the non-Han people of Nanman?"

Namho, who had eighty years of experience being one of those people, picked out something that looked like a pine caterpillar and muttered, "First I've heard of it…"

I could have understood roasted locusts, more or less. But it looked as though someone had dumped live insects into the food. I couldn't defend that.

Sama Pyo sighed as he watched Taishan, who was still determined to bury his face in his plate.

"So we aren't welcome after all."

There was no way we could eat this. Song Ilseom set down his chopsticks and answered calmly.

"It's probably because of the Heavenly Demon Escort Bureau incident."

I agreed. But I didn't think Yayul Mok had personally ordered it. Someone who was Young Palace Lord wouldn't resort to anything this petty.

So this was the work of other non-Han people within the Nanman Beast Palace.

We'd been hated ever since we entered Nanman. Even the ugly duckling hadn't had it this bad, I thought, just as Ju Hwaran quietly appeared. She'd gone upstairs before the meal to wash up.

"Huh? You're done already?"

How long had she been up there? Not even Recruit Number 54 at the Nonsan training center could wash that fast.

She gave me an uneasy smile. "Ah, yes."

"…"

I had a bad feeling. I kept looking at her, and after a moment's hesitation, she spoke.

"Actually…"

By the time I'd heard the whole story, all I could do was laugh in disbelief.

"They gave you boiling-hot water in this weather? With something like filth mixed into it?"

Hwaran nodded, looking uncomfortable.

"I wasn't going to say anything. It could have been a mistake, and I didn't want it to cause trouble…"

"It wasn't a mistake. And don't worry about causing trouble. We've already got another problem."

Only then did she notice what had happened to our meal. She offered a brief assessment.

"Ugh."

"Just checking—you're not going to eat it, are you?"

"No. Of course not."

I'd never heard Hwaran answer so firmly. I clicked my tongue and stood.

"Captain, where are you going?"

"To make a scene."

Sit still and people take you for a sack; let them get away with enough and they'll take you for wrapping cloth. That was how the world worked.

We were here to persuade the Nanman Beast Palace, so I'd keep it within reason. But I had to raise hell at least once if I didn't want this to happen again.

I was about to fling open the door when I remembered something and stopped.

"Oh. One more thing."

"Yes?"

"Make him stop eating."

No one had to ask who I meant. Only one person was wolfing down his third bowl of colorful insect fried rice.

Sama Pyo looked at Taishan with sorrow in his eyes.

"Taishan. Stop…"

Yeah. Please stop.

It was the largest tree I'd ever seen.

Dozens of grown men would have needed to stretch their arms out to encircle its trunk. It towered at least several dozen jang[2798] above me.

The sight drew a silent gasp from me, but I hadn't come to admire the tree. I'd come to see someone.

"Hey. Get down."

Rustle.

[2798] A jang is a traditional Korean measure of length equal to ten cheok, about 3.03 m or 9.94 ft.

The thick leaves shook. A beast growled low, and Yayul Mok's displeased voice came from above.

"You again. How did you find this place?"

"I asked. Someone told me you come here a lot."

"Who?"

"The guy who manages the pavilion."

"Hwang Gae?"

"Maybe it was Hwang Gae or Ddong Gae. Something like that."

"He's not the sort to tell a Han Chinese where I am."

"Maybe not a Han Chinese. He was pretty forthcoming with my fist."

"…"

"Come down. My neck hurts."

I doubted he'd come down just because my neck hurt, so I kindly added, "Before I break the tree."

"My ancestors' ancestors planted this tree. It took root here a thousand years ago."

"Then, sometime far in the future, your descendants will say, 'There used to be a thousand-year-old tree here, but some Han Chinese bastard came and ripped it out by the roots.' And when the child asks, 'Why, Mom?' she'll say, 'Because our ancestor wouldn't come down from the tree when asked nicely.'"

"…"

"So get down before I destroy the environment."

I wondered if I'd really have to pull it out if he refused again, but Yayul Mok loved nature more than I'd expected.

Rustle. Tap.

The White Tiger stepped from branch to branch and landed smoothly, letting out a low growl at me. Yayul Mok gave its neck a light stroke and glared.

"Madman."

"Come on. You're only noticing now?"

I scratched the back of my head bashfully. Yayul Mok's face reddened, and he snarled like a wild beast.

"What happened to Hwang Gae?"

"Oh, him? All four limbs are fine. He's a little scared, though."

"You're out of your mind. You come here asking for help, then bully the people of Nanman?"

"You've got the wrong idea. I didn't lay a finger on him. I did grab him by the collar, though."

I wasn't some neighborhood thug. I hadn't gone around acting like that even in the Central Plains. I always started by asking nicely and only used my fists when that didn't work. This time, I'd had plenty of reason.

"Insect fried rice. Bathwater mixed with filth."

"What?"

"If that isn't a traditional custom, then the Nanman Beast Palace's treatment of its guests is pretty terrible. Don't you think?"

Yayul Mok frowned. After a moment, he let out a sigh.

"I think I have a general idea of what happened."

"If you had a general idea, you should have warned them beforehand."

"I didn't think they'd show their hostility quite so openly…"

He stopped mid-sentence, then dipped his head toward me.

"I'm sorry. I sincerely apologize."

"…Oh."

"What's that reaction?"

"Nothing."

I was a little surprised. We hadn't known each other long, but Yayul Mok seemed too proud and rough-edged to bow his head so readily.

The type to admit when he's wrong and not hold a grudge?

It was easy to make a mistake, but hard to admit it and apologize sincerely.

In that sense, the young Young Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace had a better personality than I'd expected.

"I'll replace the people responsible as soon as I get back. Hwang Gae and everyone else involved. Nothing like this will happen again."

"Well, if you'll do that…"

"It was my mistake. Again, I apologize. I'd appreciate it if this didn't reach my father's ears."

"Why? Does he hit you when you do something wrong?"

Yayul Mok bristled. "What kind of nonsense is that?"

"If not, never mind. You went so far as to ask me not to tell him, so I thought you might get beaten for three days and three nights."

"My father has never laid a hand on me even once."

Well, if your father was the Beast Miao King, you'd probably grow up fine without him laying a hand on you. At that size and with that martial power, he could probably get his son, grandson, and maybe even his great-grandson through puberty without any trouble.

While I was thinking that, Yayul Mok hesitated, then added quietly, "I'll be fine. The others won't. If my father finds out, he'll come down on them like thunder."

"Ah."

"You're guests my father welcomed. You Han Chinese have every right to protest how you've been treated. But I don't want Hwang Gae or the others punished for it."

"Because they're pissed off about that fucking Dick Demon Escort Bureau?"

"…You've got the name a little wrong, but yes. That's one reason."

"One reason. Sounds like there's another."

Yayul Mok stared at me silently for a while. Then, as he stroked the chin of the now-quiet White Tiger, he opened his mouth.

"The Great Faction War."

"Hmm?"

"We shed far too much blood in the Central Plains. Under my father's leadership, all of Nanman's tribes joined forces, and as many as ten thousand warriors went to the battlefield. But the number of those who returned home alive was less than a quarter of that."

Grrr.

The White Tiger accepted his touch, then looked up at its master with worried eyes.

Yayul Mok went on, his voice heavy with conflicting emotions.

"Someone's parents. Someone's children. Friends and relatives who had grown up together since childhood. Most of them left for the battlefield with smiles on their faces and never returned. Even I, who was born long afterward, wasn't exempt."

"You did?"

"Under ordinary circumstances, I'd never have become Young Palace Lord. That's the real answer to the question you asked earlier."

I thought back to our conversation just after we'd left the Beast Miao King. Then I understood.

"You had older siblings."

"Three. One of them was my elder sister. She was young, and she was a woman, but I heard she was as brave as any warrior. If she hadn't participated in the Great Faction War, she would have married the man she loved. My father and Uncle Baeksang would have become in-laws as well as sworn brothers."

"Wait. Then…"

"What you're thinking is right. In the war between Han Chinese that they called the Great Faction War, my father lost two sons and a daughter. Uncle Baeksang lost the son he treasured more than his own life."

Yayul Mok smiled bitterly and added, "Don't blame Hwang Gae too much. He lost his parents and all his relatives."

I had nothing to say, so I simply closed my mouth.

I'd heard about the Great Faction War so many times my ears practically rang with it, but I hadn't known Nanman had suffered losses like these.

No. If I was honest, I hadn't thought I needed to know. Nanman was in the Outer Lands, tens of thousands of ri[2799] from the Central Plains. I'd thought of it as a separate land, far removed from Murim.

The others who still talked about the war probably thought the same way. Only Jeok Cheongang and a tiny handful of others had even mentioned that Nanman had suffered heavy losses.

So they must have all been carrying old resentment. The Heavenly Demon Escort Bureau incident from recently must have been the flashpoint.

Whatever Reward they'd received after the war, the wound was still there. It had only just begun to heal, barely forming a scab, when this happened.

"Only a few decades ago, we united and risked our lives fighting for the Han Chinese. And now, you killed some of us."

Yayul Mok's voice reached me, cold and seething.

[2799] A Korean ri is a traditional measure of distance equal to about 393 m or 0.244 mi.

Chapter 628

"Only a few decades ago, we stood together and risked our lives fighting for the Han Chinese. And now, you've turned your swords on us."

At that moment, Yayul Mok was genuinely furious.

More than two hundred people had been massacred in the recent tragedy. Most of the victims had been powerless old men, women, and children.

They were Miao people, just as he was. And after doing that to them, the Han Chinese still had the nerve to ask for help.

"We've already shed enough blood. Not for ourselves, but for you Han Chinese."

His voice trembled with anger.

"Nanman will not shed blood in vain again. Stop causing trouble and go home."

The words came out sharp and firm as a blade. Having finally said everything he'd been holding back, Yayul Mok felt a weight lift as he looked at the Han Chinese man before him.

Jin Taekyung, was it?

Half a day ago, Yayul Mok had known almost nothing about him. He'd heard in passing that Jin Taekyung was a renowned young prodigy from the Central Plains, but that was all.

If the absurd rumor that he was a Supreme Peak master was true, though, he might rank among the three greatest warriors even here in Nanman, where Yayul Mok had been born and raised.

He blocked Father's punch. Maybe the rumor is true.

Yayul Mok knew better than anyone how formidable his father, Yayul Cheok, was.

Before turning forty, his father had become Nanman's greatest warrior. He had made the Miao people its strongest tribe and, with the recognition of all, become lord of the Nanman Beast Palace.

Nor was that all. His martial power had won the admiration of even the Han Chinese of the Central Plains, who treated the people of Nanman as barbarians. Yayul Mok had heard that was when his father earned the name Beast Miao King.

I thought Uncle Baeksang was the only one who could exchange blows with Father.

Yet Jin Taekyung's martial arts were astonishing, especially for someone no older than Yayul Mok himself. He had blocked a punch from Yayul Cheok without much difficulty—a punch Yayul Mok could barely see, let alone stop.

True, its force had driven Jin Taekyung back nearly one jang.[2800] That was hardly a reason to underestimate him.

And besides…

[2800] A jang is ten ja, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

He was big. A head or two taller than an ordinary grown man, with broad shoulders and a muscular build his clothes couldn't hide.

Facing him at close range now, Yayul Mok felt as though he were looking at a beast standing on two legs.

Maybe it was his size. Or maybe it was the way the eyes and mouth that always seemed to be smiling had gone still. Either way, Yayul Mok swallowed hard without meaning to.

Then Jin Taekyung spoke.

"Hey."

"…!"

"Why'd you jump? I just called you."

Yayul Mok flinched at the sudden low voice. "Wh-why did you call me?"

"Why are you stuttering?"

Because you're looking at me like that, you bastard.

Until now, Jin Taekyung had always seemed lighter than a feather. With the smile gone from his face, he felt more like a boulder weighing ten thousand geun.[2801]

—Grrr…

The white tiger beside Yayul Mok seemed to feel its master's unease. Pretending to be calm, Yayul Mok stroked his beloved tiger's neck as it shrank back beside him.

"I-I didn't stutter."

"…"

"Why did you call me? If you've got something to say, say it."

"Hmm. Nothing much."

Jin Taekyung gave him an odd look, scratched the back of his head, and said, "Thanks for telling me."

"Huh?"

"Thanks for being honest. There were things I didn't know, and you've cleared up quite a bit for me. I understand what's going on around here a little better, too."

What is he talking about?

This was nothing like the reaction Yayul Mok had expected. He stared at Jin Taekyung for a moment, then asked, "So you mean… you're going back?"

"Hm?"

Jin Taekyung tilted his head. "How did you get that from what I said?"

"No, but you said you understood."

"Yeah. Of course I understand. It's not like I'm incapable of empathy."

"Then?"

[2801] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun is about 6,000 kg (13,200 lb).

"That's a separate matter."

"What?"

"This'll take too long if I explain everything, and my mouth hurts. So let's cut to the chase and ask one thing."

Jin Taekyung leaned back against a tree and lowered his voice.

"Do you honestly think the Great Faction War was fought only for the Han Chinese?"

"…!"

"And since we're on the subject, do you think the Nanman people who died in that war died like dogs for no reason?"

"That's…"

"That's what?"

Yayul Mok found himself at a loss for words. For some reason, the answer wouldn't come. As he searched his muddled thoughts for one, Jin Taekyung's quiet voice reached him again.

"There are two reasons you can't answer. First, you know I'm right, but you don't want to admit it. And second…"

Jin Taekyung held up two fingers.

"Because you're still a brainless brat."

"What is that supposed to—"

"Don't ask me. Think about it yourself. Why did the Nanman Beast Palace take so many warriors tens of thousands of li[2802] to help the Central Plains? Just because an ancestor of the Fire Gate Clan brought order to Nanman ages ago? Even that white tiger beside you would laugh at that."

"…!"

"Most people in Nanman probably oppose joining the alliance for the first reason. They think all that blood was shed for nothing, and they don't want to repeat it."

Jin Taekyung went on with a sigh.

"If you look at it that way, it isn't entirely wrong. Who the fuck wants war? So what if you fight like hell and gain land, gold, and silver treasures? People are dying like ants in every direction. And some of those ants might be my friends, my family, or my lover. They could even be me—or you. By the way, do you have a girlfriend?"

Yayul Mok shook his head before he could think.

"An ex-girlfriend?"

"What exactly do you mean by 'girlfriend'?"

"A lover. A woman you date and have feelings for."

"Uh, no."

[2802] A Chinese li is 500 m (0.311 mi).

“Oh. So you had one?”

“No.”

“Right. So you had one?”

“…I’ve never had one. Not even once.”

“How old are you?”

“Twenty-six.”

“What a guy. A promising candidate for the virgin-boy technique. If you hold out like this for fifty years, you might even become a Martial God. Fine, let’s take lovers off the list of victims.”

Jin Taekyung smiled, looking pleased for some reason. Yayul Mok felt his mood sour as the tension went out of him.

The man was impossible to get a read on. So was this conversation.

“What the hell are you trying to say? Why did you suddenly go off on a tangent about lovers?”

“Who knows? I’m not entirely sure myself. But I do know one thing.”

The faint smile left Jin Taekyung’s face.

“The people of Nanman who left home and died in the Central Plains all those years ago did not die for nothing. And if the same thing happens again, their deaths won’t be for nothing this time, either.”

“…”

“I’m sincerely sorry about what happened with the Heavenly Demon Escort Bureau. But if there were people crazy enough to do something like that… I would have killed them myself.”

“Even though they were Han Chinese, like you?”

“What does that have to do with it?”

Was it his imagination, or had Jin Taekyung left him speechless several times today?

Yayul Mok pressed his lips together and stared at him before saying, “No matter how good your words sound, Nanman won’t help the Central Plains.”

“It’ll be hard to convince you. I still have to try.”

“It’s pointless.”

“What?”

“It’s as good as decided. The first tribal council reached a conclusion fifteen days ago.”

“First? Sounds like there’s going to be a second.”

“Nanman is vast. Gathering all thirty-two tribes in one place takes time, so the four great chieftains, including my father, consider matters first.”

“And they decided against joining the alliance? Go on.”

"In three days, every tribe in Nanman will gather for a council. But the other great chieftains have already made up their minds. I doubt anything will change."

Yayul Mok was telling the truth. The Nanman Beast Palace was a symbol of unity, but that didn't make the tribes equal.

If the three great chieftains led by Baeksang, the Great Chieftain of the Bai people, stood together, even the Beast Miao King—Nanman's greatest warrior and lord of the palace—could not decide on his own to join the alliance.

Those are the rules here.

Yayul Mok watched Jin Taekyung closely. How would this young, powerful Han Chinese from the Central Plains react now that Nanman's joining the alliance was all but impossible?

He'll probably be disappointed. If not, he'll surely exhaust himself trying to persuade us somehow…

"I'll do what I can. If it doesn't work, it doesn't work."

"Huh?"

Yayul Mok couldn't hide his surprise. Jin Taekyung sounded far calmer than he'd expected.

"B-but the result is already decided, isn't it?"

"Yeah. You also said it isn't over yet."

"That's true, but…"

What is with him?

Yayul Mok frowned. "Don't you have to persuade us somehow?"

"That's what I said I'd try to do. If I can't, I'll go home. After I deal with something more important, of course."

"More important?"

"You've got the wrong idea."

Jin Taekyung scratched his chin.

"I didn't come here as a diplomat. I'm more like a firefighter."

"A firefighter? What's that?"

"Someone who puts out fires."

"Didn't you set fire to the pasture as soon as you arrived?"

Jin Taekyung fell silent at the earnest question.

"…It's a metaphor. What I mean is, persuading people isn't exactly my greatest talent."

"That seems true."

"…You fucking bastard. Now I'm getting annoyed for no reason. Anyway, it'd be a shame if Nanman didn't join us, but if trying doesn't work, there's nothing we can do."

"But you're Han Chinese. And you belong to the Murim Alliance."

“So?”

“I don’t know the exact circumstances, but I know well enough that the Central Plains is in danger. At a time like this, when you should be begging us for help no matter what, you came to help us?”

Jin Taekyung let out a quiet laugh at the way Yayul Mok looked at him, as though he were some strange creature.

“What would you do if the pasture caught fire again?”

“Put it out at once.”

“Why?”

“If we don’t put it out, the flames will spread in every direction.”

“Good. There’s your answer.”

“…!”

“Don’t make it complicated. There’s a fire, so I’m trying to put it out. Just like the people of Nanman who left this land for the Central Plains decades ago.”

Yayul Mok was silent for a moment. Then, with a troubled look, he asked, “So you came here just to help us… without expecting anything in return?”

“What if I did?”

“I don’t believe you.”

“Believe what you want. But before any of that…”

Jin Taekyung naturally turned around and began walking. Then he continued with a suddenly hardened expression.

“At least feed me properly, asshole.”

Chapter 629

After parting ways with Yayul Mok, I headed back toward the temporary lodging where the Fire Dragon Pavilion members were waiting.

With my martial prowess, I wasn't in danger of anyone trying to harm me. Still, wandering around alone in this atmosphere wouldn't do me any good.

Somehow, I found myself in the Nanman Beast Palace's Outer Hall.

"Huh. When did I get here?"

I muttered to myself and looked around.

Perhaps because it was hidden among the thick, overgrown grass, I couldn't see a single rat anywhere…

Well, not quite. Two or three monkeys were milling around—Nanman's mascots, much like Gukkeoni was for the Ministry of National Defense.

—Screech?

Why's that Han Chinese bastard crawling around out here instead of staying put in his lodging?

That seemed to be the question in the monkey's curious eyes. But I had nothing to be ashamed of before the heavens.

I got lost. What do you want me to do about it?

Of course, I'd followed the advice of the greatest assassin of all time disguised as the Divine Physician: conceal my breathing and move stealthily so no one would spot me.

But one thing was certain. I was lost.

The lodging was less than fifteen minutes away, and there were only two roads, but that was beside the point. If I said I was lost, I was lost.

Still, I'm here representing the Murim Alliance. I should be able to figure out this much on my own.

Back at the Hunter Training Center, a fellow recruit had once said that a perfect lie was a true story.

In the end, all that mattered was not getting caught. Though in this atmosphere, I did need to make an effort to avoid it.

Rustle.

I steadied my breathing, slipped out of the grass, and blended into the people gathered nearby.

I suppressed my presence, reined in my aura, and bent slightly at the waist to make myself look shorter. Just as Mungyeong had taught me.

Do you know who the most frightening assassin in the world is?

Sure. The person standing right in front of me.

…

I'm sorry. I'm so sorry. I've committed a crime worthy of death. Please put the dagger in your sleeve away and teach this fool.

Mungyeong had glared at me as though deciding whether to kill me, then answered.

An ordinary person.

Ordinary?

Someone more ordinary than anyone else, who blends naturally into any place. That is the most frightening assassin.

What Mungyeong taught me that day wasn't useful only to assassins.

He'd mentioned it in passing, calling it a simple trick that couldn't even be considered martial arts. But I hadn't forgotten it, and it had come in handy more than once.

Just like now.

This really is different from the Central Plains.

I turned my head without drawing attention and looked around the Outer Hall.

Even on a second look, the Nanman Beast Palace was a distinctive place. It was less like a sect than a small city, with all kinds of peoples living together.

Compared to the Central Plains, where the Han Chinese made up the majority, Nanman was practically a melting pot of races.

A Miao woman draped in colorful jewelry strode through the market, enjoying the attention of the people around her, while a Bai merchant in white traditional clothing tried to conduct a trade with a monkey perched on his shoulder.

And an old man was limping straight toward me.

No, sir. Why are you coming this way?

"Excuse me. I'm trying to buy some cloth at the market. Which shop would you recommend? If I were ten years younger, I could have found it with my eyes closed, but perhaps it's because I'm old that I can't remember anything these days."

"Uh…"

Had I blended in too well? I hadn't expected this.

The non-Han old man had blocked my path with his cane and asked me the question. I hesitated for a moment, then answered as shamelessly as possible.

"Go straight ahead, then take the alley on the right."

"The alley on the right? Was there a cloth shop there?"

How would I know, sir?

But contrary to my thoughts, I nodded.

"Yes. Plenty of them. More than the hairs on your head. They're springing up everywhere."

"Really? What's one of them called?"

Why do you need the name, too?

Hesitating now would make him suspicious, so I blurted out the first name that came to mind.

“Hyuk Family Textile Shop. Their cloth is pretty good.”

“Hyuk Family Textile Shop? I don’t think I’ve heard of it…”

I’d underestimated how well a local knew his own market.

It was clearly an unreasonable answer, but in situations like this, the shameless person won. With an expression utterly free of shame, I spoke firmly.

“It’s been there for over ten years.”

“Really? That’s strange. I could’ve sworn…”

“Isn’t your memory getting hazy? That’s why you asked me, right?”

“Well, yes, but…”

“Sir, if you don’t mind my asking, how old are you?”

“Me? Eighty-two.”

“I’m twenty-two. I can still vividly remember moving from my father’s side to my mother’s.”

“You remember that?”

“I’m only twenty-two, so I remember everything. Trust me.”

“Ah. All right, then. Thank you.”

Defeated by sheer force of confidence, the old man turned to leave. I suddenly remembered something and called after him.

“Sir?”

“Hmm? What is it?”

“Where is the place with the biggest crowd right now? I was supposed to meet someone, but that bastard isn’t showing up anywhere, so I’m going to look for him myself.”

“Try over there.” He pointed with his cane. “I caught a glimpse of it on my way here. No idea what’s going on, but it was awfully noisy. Probably something to do with the festival in a few days.”

Then he paused and studied my face with his cloudy eyes.

“By the way, which tribe are you from?”

“What?”

“You don’t look Yao, like me. Yet you speak our language so well. How strange…”

“Oh, I can see it over there. Please be careful on your way.”

“Hey. Wait.”

I left the old man behind and walked away quickly.

No matter how naturally I blended in, anyone who had enough time to study my face would notice. The differences between the Han Chinese and Nanman's other peoples weren't so pronounced that I'd stand out at a glance, but they were there.

Fortunately, there was a solution.

My hands were very fast. And as luck would have it, the market was packed with non-Han people, while the merchant selling traditional animal masks was too busy dealing with customers pouring in from every direction to pay attention to anything else.

In short, slipping one mask away was no trouble at all.

Open Inventory. Store.

Ding.

The hand wasn't faster than the eye. The System was.

I put the mask in my Inventory. By the time I'd passed a couple of people, the tiger mask, painted with crude dye, was on my face.

This should do. It won't stand out around here.

Maybe it was because of the festival the old man had mentioned. Two or three out of every ten people I saw were wearing similar masks.

I headed in the direction he'd pointed and listened to the voices around me.

"Did you hear? The great chieftains of the Yi and Yao peoples are back."

"Really? I heard they went to subdue man-eating beasts about fifteen days ago."

"They mobilized around five hundred warriors, so they must have finished quickly. Unlike the Yao people, it seems the great chieftain of the Yi people didn't achieve any noteworthy results, though."

"Just what I expected. Not that I expected much."

I didn't miss the familiar information exchanged in their conversation.

The Yi and Yao peoples.

Together with the Miao and Bai peoples—led respectively by the Beast Miao King, lord of the Nanman Beast Palace, and Baeksang, whom I had briefly encountered earlier—the Yi and Yao peoples made up Nanman's four most powerful tribes.

I remembered what Namho had told me on our way to the Nanman Beast Palace.

Nanman's four great tribes are the Miao, Bai, Yi, and Yao peoples. The Miao are the strongest, followed by the Bai.

What about the Yi and Yao?

Twenty or thirty years ago, the Yi would have been ahead.

Sounds like they aren't anymore.

Times have changed. Many say the Yi great chieftain, who inherited the position from his late father, lacks resolve. The Yao, on the other hand, have grown considerably. They gained an exceptional leader. I doubt any man they put in her place could have done as much.

Wait. Are you saying…?

You've guessed right. The Yao great chieftain is a woman. Extremely intelligent, and extraordinarily beautiful.

My thoughts broke off. Not because I chose to stop thinking, but because a clear note from a distant instrument reached my ears.

Fwoooosh.

A gentle melody rode Nanman's hot, humid wind across the open space.

The noisy market fell silent in an instant, and a short exclamation escaped someone's lips.

"Ah…"

It was impossible to hold back. The melody was that pure, and the procession revealed as people hurriedly stepped aside was splendid and beautiful.

Thump. Thump. Thump.

Hundreds of men and women marched to the low beat of drums.

The Yi men wore black tops trimmed with floral cloth and wide, pleated trousers. The Yao women, in conical hats, walked slowly in two lines.

"Wow."

"The Yi and Yao have arrived!"

Cheers rose all around me.

But while everyone else admired their beauty and finery, I watched the weapons strapped to their waists and shoulders.

Every one of them is a warrior.

A warrior of Nanman was equivalent to a Murim practitioner in the Central Plains. Since these people belonged to their respective tribes, it would be more accurate to call them members of a martial sect.

And if the Yi and Yao great chieftains are back from subduing those beasts…

This was more than a procession. It was a victory parade, and a victory parade needed the generals who had led the battle.

In this case, those generals were the two great chieftains.

"Oh!"

"Th-there…!"

Cries rang out almost as soon as the thought occurred to me. Gazes and voices turned in one direction, and then the whole crowd erupted into cheers.

"Waaaaah!"

Amid the roar that seemed capable of shaking all of Nanman beyond the Outer Hall, two people finally appeared at the center of the procession and waved their hands.

A man riding an enormous black bear—presumably the Yi great chieftain. And…

“Yohi! Great Chieftain Yohi!”

A woman smiling brightly as the crowd lavished her with far more attention and affection than they had the man.

Even without hearing them call her name, I would have known she was the Yao great chieftain.

The Yao great chieftain is a woman. Extremely intelligent, and extraordinarily beautiful.

Namho had been right. Yohi was beautiful—almost bewitchingly so.

Whenever her deep gaze swept over the crowd, people gasped in admiration.

That was probably why I stood out. Amid all those cheers and admiring faces, I was standing there like a block of wood.

“…!”

Yohi’s eyes lit up when she spotted me.

Chapter 630

I'd let my guard down the moment I covered my face with the mask. That was my mistake.

Should I have stamped my feet and clapped like everyone else?

The thought came too late. Yohi was still looking straight at me.

Still, it shouldn't be a problem. All I'd done was stand there awkwardly without joining in.

The chances of the Yao people's great chieftain—the star of this splendid victory parade—showing any further interest in me were close to zero.

"You there."

"…"

I said close to zero. Not zero.

Damn it. She really is calling me.

Yohi was looking straight at me, so I cautiously turned around, just in case.

"Yes. You who just turned around."

Fortunately, I wasn't the only one who had turned. Yohi's sudden call had the whole marketplace murmuring and swiveling their heads like meerkats.

"The person in the tiger mask."

I swept my eyes over the crowd. There were a dozen or so people in cool-looking tiger masks, including me. Those were reassuring odds.

Good thing I'd bought a tiger mask. Not that I'd paid for it.

"The man standing seven cheok[2803] tall, wearing a tiger mask, who just made eye contact with me. That's enough. Come forward."

The tiger-mask stock crashed as soon as she added gender and height to the description. My odds of winning had shot up so fast I could feel sweat gathering on my forehead.

I ducked my head to avoid Yohi's gaze and swiftly, discreetly crossed my legs. Then I tucked my Black Anaconda neatly between them and looked up.

Yohi's gaze had gone flat.

"…"

"…"

The procession had stopped. The cheers were gone.

In the suffocating silence, with Yohi and countless others staring at me, I straightened my tightly pressed legs and spoke with all the gravity I could muster.

"Um. Did you call me?"

[2803] A cheok is a traditional Korean unit of length, about 30.3 cm (11.9 in). Seven cheok is about 2.12 m (6 ft 11 in).

"…"

"…"

No one answered. They just looked from my masked face to my lower body and back again.

Shit. I should've just stepped forward when she first called me.

A leader needed many qualities. A keen eye was one of them.

"I had a strange feeling the moment I saw you."

Once the procession celebrating the beast subjugation had ended, Yohi had sent an attendant to summon me privately. Now she went on in a languid voice.

"What should I call it? Out of all those people, you were the only one who seemed out of place."

Beside her, the great chieftain of the Yi people, who had been popping fruit into his mouth nonstop, grinned broadly and chimed in.

"She's right. Standing there like a block of wood all by yourself, you were hard to miss."

He was a plump, middle-aged man who hardly looked like a warrior. He waved a hand wet with fruit juice in greeting.

"And you're still wearing that mask. Rude fellow. I don't know who you are, but I expect you already know me. I'm Heugung, leader of the Yi people."

Heugung. The name meant Black Bear.

That explained the bear he'd ridden in the procession. Apparently, keeping a pet beast named after yourself was the thing to do around here.

What am I supposed to say?

Now that it had come to this, I'd planned to remove my mask and reveal who I was. That was why I hadn't slipped away earlier. But Yohi was far more perceptive than I'd expected.

"You can leave it on, Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan."

"Hmm?"

"What?"

I was surprised twice over: first that Yohi, who had only just arrived, knew exactly who I was, and then that Heugung, a fellow great chieftain, was even more shocked than I was.

At the sight of Heugung and me both freezing for a moment, Yohi let out a quiet laugh.

"Why are you so surprised? I already heard the Palace Lord let a group of Han Chinese from the Murim Alliance into the Inner Palace."

Heugung tilted his head.

"Han Chinese from the Murim Alliance? Really? I hadn't heard."

"That's because you're a foolish bear. Of course, I find that charming about you."

Even the Skeleton King could have spotted the lip service in that last remark. Heugung grinned happily.

"Do you mean that?"

"Of course. Don't forget that I've always been in love with you."

Her voice and gaze were alluring. Her pale, flawless fingers—so white and unblemished it was hard to believe she was from Nanman—stroked his pockmarked cheek. Bliss spread across Heugung's face.

"Ahh. My dear."

If someone asked me to describe the sight in three words, I'd have an answer ready.

Ugh. Fucking hell…

A potbellied man in his fifties was melting like butter under the touch of a beautiful woman in her twenties.

People said love knew no age or borders. Watching this, I thought we ought to invent some.

Not that this was real love.

Now I could see why the Yi people's power was falling like a stock headed for delisting—and how the Yao people had grown so strong.

Still… they're different, but there's a resemblance.

I was thinking of someone in particular when Yohi glanced at me and stroked Heugung's shoulder.

"But, oppa[2804]…"

"O-oppa[2805]?"

I'd heard that line a few times in the daily dramas my mother liked to watch.

Don't call me Manager. Call me Oppa[2806].

Yohi knew exactly what a troublesome middle-aged man wanted to hear. As Heugung looked ready to die of happiness, she continued gently.

"Would you step outside for a moment? There's something important I want to ask this Han Chinese man."

"Hmm? Of course. Of course I will! Anything you want!"

"Thank you, oppa[2807]. I'll see you later."

[2804] Oppa is a Korean form of address a woman uses for an older brother or older man; it can also carry flirtatious overtones.

[2805] Oppa is a Korean form of address a woman uses for an older brother or older man; it can also carry flirtatious overtones.

[2806] Oppa is a Korean form of address a woman uses for an older brother or older man; it can also carry flirtatious overtones.

[2807] Oppa is a Korean form of address a woman uses for an older brother or older man; it can also carry flirtatious overtones.

“Ooh. Oooooh!”

Heugung left the tent red-faced and snorting with excitement. Yohi gave a quiet laugh, leaned back against the silk bedding, and muttered, “Moron.”

I’d expected something like that, but not quite this much. I scratched my chin, and she lifted one corner of her mouth.

“What? Too obvious?”

When someone was this direct, it made things easier. After a moment’s thought, I answered honestly.

“Well, you’re not wrong.”

“You don’t seem surprised. I suppose you’d already figured it out. I thought you were only good at martial arts, but you’re quicker to catch on than I expected.”

“People like you are rare, but not unheard of. Murim has plenty who aren’t the same inside as they appear on the outside.”

“Really? I suppose the Central Plains must be very large. A bitch like me is rare in Nanman. Oh, is that girl who came with you the same sort? I think I heard her name was… Ju Hwaran?”

I stared at Yohi instead of answering. Her smile deepened.

“All right. I take it back. From your expression, I’d say I shouldn’t have said that.”

I didn’t know what expression I’d made. Probably not a friendly one. I could just feel it.

An odd feeling stirred in me. I made myself speak evenly.

“Watch what you say next time. She’s a member of the Fire Dragon Pavilion who trusted me enough to follow me all the way to Nanman.”

“Oh? Just a subordinate you care about?”

“I don’t really divide people into superiors and subordinates… but think what you want.”

“I appreciate you putting it that way. I happen to have quite a vivid imagination.”

Yohi let out an enigmatic laugh, apparently imagining something, then continued.

“You were staring at me earlier, so I got the wrong idea. I thought you might have fallen for me at first sight.”

“As if. I don’t go falling for just anyone.”

“Then why were you looking at me like that? Did Heugung, that fucking moron, look pathetic to you?”

“No. You reminded me of someone I’d seen before.”

Interest lit her eyes.

“Who? A woman?”

“A woman, yes. You wouldn’t know her even if I told you.”

In truth, she was closer to a monster than a woman. The person Yohi had reminded me of was the Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

The people of Dark Heaven were monsters for whom distinctions between men and women meant nothing. Fanatics who worshipped the Lord of Heaven.

"Hmm. A woman… Do we look that much alike?"

"A little. But you're fundamentally different."

"How can you be sure? I could be her."

She looked mischievous, but I'd already checked with Qi Sense just in case. There was no mistaking one for the other.

Like I said, the two of them were fundamentally different.

Yohi's looks and manner were bewitching. The Southern Heaven Demon Empress possessed a magical power that could beguile people—and I didn't just mean her looks.

It was the way she carried herself.

There was something distinctive about her: beautiful, yet so natural you never thought to question it. Even I hadn't sensed the danger in her beauty or her manner until after she'd fooled me completely in Hubei Province.

"Either way, you're different."

"Hmm. That's no fun. Whoever she is, she must be important."

"She is. And even more dangerous."

"Dark Heaven. It's Dark Heaven, isn't it?"

Yohi was quick. She already knew why I'd come tens of thousands of li[2808] from the Central Plains to Nanman, and what I was here to do.

"I'm sorry to tell you, but none of the four great chieftains want to join the alliance. No one except the Palace Lord."

"What about you?"

"Me? I don't care either way. Whatever losses the Nanman Beast Palace suffers, I want the Yao people to bring the four great tribes under us."

"That's what you want. The other tribal chiefs…"

"Some of them want something else, of course. But most want their own tribes to grow stronger. On that much, I'm certain. If their people shed blood for nothing in the Central Plains, their power here in Nanman will naturally shrink."

I remembered what the Beast Miao King had told me in the Inner Palace. He was the Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace, and one of the Ten Kings recognized even in the Central Plains. In the end, though, he was also the Miao great chieftain.

If the chiefs who held sway over Nanman's many parts thought like Yohi, then Yayul Mok was right. The Nanman Beast Palace joining the Murim Alliance was all but impossible.

Fuck, these negotiations are a nightmare.

[2808] A Chinese li is a unit of distance equal to about 500 m (0.311 mi).

I hadn’t come to Nanman as a diplomat, but this situation was still as good as a failure before it had even begun.

Yohi looked amused by my reaction.

“I’m sorry, but that’s reality. Ah, of course, there’s at least one person you might have a chance of persuading. He leads a tribe large enough to rank among the four great tribes, and he’s so stupid that it’s hard to believe.”

I knew who she meant. I let out a sigh.

“Heugung?”

Yohi burst out laughing.

“Yes, that fucking moron. He can’t do a thing with me and that old man Baeksang keeping him firmly under our thumbs anyway.”

“…”

He was still the great chieftain of a huge tribe that raised plenty of bears. Did she really have to treat him like that? Just thinking about him made my heart sink.

And if I actually had a chance of persuading him, she wouldn’t be telling me so helpfully.

Heugung was a puppet, grinning away without realizing Baeksang and Yohi were pulling his strings.

Is she messing with me?

I frowned at Yohi. Outside the tent, people began moving about, and a voice reached us.

“Yohi. Are you in there?”

Cold and dry. It was Baeksang.

Chapter 631

Sometimes you can tell just by meeting someone's eyes that they dislike you. That no matter how hard you try, you'll never get along.

My second meeting with Baeksang, great chieftain of the Bai people, felt like that.

"You…"

Baeksang recognized me at once, even though my face was hidden behind a mask. Given his martial prowess, that wasn't surprising.

At least early Supreme Peak.

That was my estimate. A Supreme Peak master was hard to find even in the Central Plains. It would have been stranger if a crude tiger mask had fooled him. Once martial artists reached a certain realm, they could recognize someone by their bearing.

The important part wasn't that Baeksang knew who I was. It was that he wasn't the least bit pleased to see me.

"So we have an unwelcome guest."

Unwelcome, was it? If he'd said that when we first met, he might have scratched my tender heart. After everything I'd heard about him, though, I took it fairly calmly.

I scratched the back of my head. "They say you should speak straight even if your mouth is crooked. So, to set the facts straight, I'm not an unwelcome guest. I was invited."

"Invited?"

His gaze shifted to Yohi. She met his eyes with a sweet smile.

"It's true. I invited him."

A beautiful woman's smile worked wonders in most situations. Baeksang, apparently, wasn't most people.

"Do you intend to collude with the Han Chinese?"

His voice had grown colder. Yohi shrugged theatrically.

"Collude? I was only a little curious. It's not as if we were alone from the start."

"But only you two and the heavens know what you discussed after sending Heugung away."

"Set your worries aside. I haven't forgotten the promise we made that day."

I had no idea what they'd promised each other, but it sounded suspicious enough. Baeksang's gaze darkened.

"You're saying pointless things in front of a Han Chinese man, Yohi."

Fwoosh!

An invisible wave of qi rolled off Baeksang and swept through the tent.

The air grew heavy. Pressure from a Supreme Peak master bore down from every direction, and for the first time, Yohi's smile began to fade.

That was when I spoke up.

"Hey, the Han Chinese bastard is standing right here and can hear you. How about we stop with the 'bastard'?"

Whoosh.

The pressure building around us suddenly broke. Baeksang's eyebrows twitched as my words scattered the waves of qi.

"You bastard."

"Young Hero Jin. Pavilion Head Jin. Blazing Flame Divine Dragon. Or just 'you.' Pick whichever one you like. At this point, I can't tell whether I'm from the Jin Family of Taiyuan or the Bastard Family of Taiyuan."

"…!"

"Good with words, aren't I? I know. But I trust you realize I didn't become a Murim Alliance Pavilion Head by running my mouth. Otherwise, my sobriquet wouldn't be Blazing Flame Divine Dragon. It'd be something like Wind Style: Mouth Dragon."

That should have made two things clear to Baeksang. First, my martial prowess was in no way beneath his. Second, I wasn't merely some young Han Chinese. I held a senior position in the Murim Alliance, formed from the martial world of the Central Plains.

Either one was enough to make me someone he couldn't simply dismiss.

Baeksang studied me in silence for a while.

"Now that I've had another look, you're certainly the successor to the Fire Gate Clan. Speaking and acting without a thought for the consequences… You truly are the Fire King's disciple."

"Old Master—no. Have you met my master?"

"The Palace Lord and I were always together. Including the day we first met the Fire King, whom we'd only heard of until then."

I had a sudden hunch. "Oh. Then were you…?"

"The Palace Lord went down before we could do a thing. I was next. I'd called him a crazy old man, you see."

Baeksang lifted his white robe slightly, revealing a burn scar on his side.

"…"

What was he, a cut of beef with a grade stamped on it?

That's practically a certification mark.

After showing me the mark left by the piping-hot Fire King hand pie he'd received decades ago, Baeksang continued coldly.

"It was a long time ago. But every time I see this scar, I remember it."

Jeok Cheongang had once warned me to be careful of gratitude and grudges in Murim. Now the ones he'd incurred in the past were coming back to me like a boomerang.

Is this Murim-style gratitude-and-grudges payback?

For a moment, I had nothing to say. Baeksang stared at me, his gaze dark and steady.

"I don't care whether you're the Fire King's disciple or a Murim Alliance Pavilion Head. Nanman has already shed enough blood for the Central Plains, and the Palace Lord's judgment is wrong."

"…"

"That is all I have to say. Get out of my sight before I deal with you myself."

Baeksang's manner was downright threatening. Rather than argue, I got to my feet.

Not because I was afraid of him, but because there was more to lose than to gain. This was a time to think calmly.

Step.

I was about to leave the tent when I stopped. There was something I wanted to tell Baeksang, and I didn't know when I'd see him again.

"That blood wasn't shed for the Central Plains."

"What?"

"The blood your people shed wasn't for the Central Plains. It was for the whole world."

I added quietly, "The same goes for someone's son."

Whoosh!

A fierce wave of qi erupted into a gale. Yohi, who had watched our exchange without a word, went pale. The huge tent swayed like a leaf caught in a typhoon.

At the center of it all stood Baeksang, trembling with rage.

"You…!"

Fire blazed in his eyes. His voice seemed to boil. I held his gaze.

Faced with all that fury, I found myself remembering someone who had been buried deep in my memory.

This…

I didn't know whether this suspicion was true or whether it would end as nothing more than a guess.

But before that, I had to show the proper respect for the reverse scale I had touched.[2809]

[2809] The Korean expression invokes a dragon's "reverse scale," a spot that must not be touched because doing so provokes its rage.

I bowed my head slightly to Baeksang and left the tent. All the way back to my quarters, I thought about a man who was unmistakably different from Baeksang, yet somehow resembled him.

…The Head Elder.

The Blade of Flowers, Jin Baekyang.

A hero of the Great Faction War born in Shanxi Province. A man who had nearly become Family Head of the Jin Family of Taiyuan despite being the second son.

And a traitor who had spent decades under Dark Heaven's shadow.

I didn't know why he'd come to mind at that particular moment.

But perhaps… perhaps…

Damn it. I don't know.

I let out a long sigh. Ahead, outside the quarters we'd been temporarily assigned in the Inner Palace, Hyuk Mujin was roasting a whole wild boar. I had no idea where he'd gotten it.

Look at him. What a thoughtful little punk.

I gave him a hard time whenever I got the chance, but we'd been through thick and thin together since our days with the Jin Family of Taiyuan. And as a former gate guard, he knew more about the Head Elder than anyone else in the Fire Dragon Pavilion traveling with me.

Maybe he can offer some decent advice.

Just as I was about to wave at him happily, Hyuk Mujin spotted me approaching and abruptly raised one hand, holding a red-hot iron skewer.

"Who goes there?"

"…"

Advice, my ass.

I took off the tiger mask. "Put your head to the ground."

"Oh. Ha ha. I was joking."

"Good. I'm not. Put your head to the ground."

"…"

Clank.

The skewer slipped from Mujin's limp hand.

Two days passed in the blink of an eye.

Despite telling us at our first meeting to wait because he would summon us soon, the Beast Miao King hadn't sent for us once. Yayul Mok, on the other hand, had been visiting more often than I'd expected.

Thump.

White Tiger dropped the wild boar from his jaws and puffed out his chest proudly. I looked at Yayul Mok, who was stroking the tiger's neck.

"Where'd you catch this one?"

"In the western grass."

He answered without thinking, then hurried to correct himself.

"…I mean, I found it on the way here."

"Why bring something you found here?"

"Hmm. It seemed a shame to throw it away?"

"Funny. For something you found, those bite marks on its neck look exactly like a tiger's."

"My boy is well trained. He doesn't bite just anything, beast or human."

"…"

What kind of bullshit was that?

Was this one of those ideas that there were no bad tigers in the world?

I studied White Tiger's teeth, caked with blood and bits of flesh. "Looks like he'd chew up a beast or a person in one bite. You mean he's not a picky eater?"

"Anyway, he didn't do it. Must've been another tiger."

"Then why's there only one set of bite marks?"

"How should I know? I found it dead by the road and brought it here."

"Ah, right. A big, healthy wild boar died of natural causes by the road, and White Tiger just went chomp to carry it here?"

"Exactly."

"…"

There came a point when someone was so shameless I didn't have the energy to answer. I stared at Yayul Mok, then sighed at the mountain-sized boar.

"Another wild boar, though?"

"It's a wild boar. Is that a problem?"

"The boar again?"

"…Do Han Chinese have no conscience? Think of the trouble I went to catching it and bringing it here. Shut up and eat."

"Thought you found it."

"Ah. I misspoke. I found it."

This bastard was something else.

I only found out later that the meat Mujin had been roasting two days earlier had also come from Yayul Mok. No one had seen him bring it, of course, and he'd stubbornly denied being the one who had.

"Wild boar's fine for a day or two, but it's been days of nothing else. I'm sick of it. Sick of it."

"Then I'll take it back."

"Mujin. Get the meat."

"Yes, sir."

Yayul Mok and White Tiger gave me identical flat looks. I'd been thick-skinned too long for that to bother me.

Yayul Mok clicked his tongue as Mujin bustled about getting ready to cook, then turned back to me.

"How is your work going?"

I shook my head.

"So you haven't found anything."

"Not yet."

It wasn't as though I had spent the past two days doing nothing. The Fire Dragon Pavilion members and I had been investigating both inside and outside the Nanman Beast Palace.

I had Ju Hwaran and Hyuk Mujin investigate what was happening in the Inner Palace, while I led the remaining members in scouting the surrounding area.

We might find traces of Dark Heaven.

But despite our efforts, we had nothing to show for it. If there were no traces of Dark Heaven near the Nanman Beast Palace, that was good news. If we simply hadn't found them, it was another matter.

"For now, we'll keep looking. At least until the Tribal Grand Council."

The council, which would bring together all of Nanman's tribes, was tomorrow. Yayul Mok nodded, then lowered his voice.

"You'd better put it off today."

"Put it off? Why?"

"The Inner Palace has summoned you."

Chapter 632

The Inner Palace.

Our quarters were technically part of the Inner Palace too, but I knew at once that wasn't what Yayul Mok meant.

"Great Hero Yayul is summoning us?"

"Yes. To be precise, he told me to bring only you and that old man."

Good news. After all this time without a word, the Beast Miao King had finally agreed to my request for a private audience.

But why call for Namho and me alone, rather than the whole Fire Dragon Pavilion?

A thought struck me.

"Do we need to keep out of sight?"

Yayul Mok stared at me in surprise, then gave a small nod.

"You're quicker on the uptake than I expected. Try not to draw attention on the way."

"Because the Tribal Grand Council is tomorrow?"

"No. Because most of the tribal chiefs hate you people."

"…"

"It's true."

Was he a guillotine in a past life? He'd cut me off before I even got the words out.

I couldn't deny it, though. I smacked my lips bitterly.

"I get the picture. Great Hero Yayul's getting pressure from all sides, isn't he?"

Yayul Mok's lips moved as if he meant to answer, but his expression hardened and he closed his mouth.

Just as I couldn't deny what he'd said, he couldn't deny what I'd said.

Some things had to be acknowledged. Nanman wasn't the barbaric land people in the Central Plains imagined, and the Beast Miao King wasn't truly a king. He was one of the great chieftains who represented its people.

If I know that much, there's no way Mok doesn't.

Yayul Mok was a decent enough guy, but he was also young and hadn't entirely outgrown his immaturity.

Then, still looking wounded in his pride, he muttered, "You're right. Even my father can't handle all of them alone."

"…?"

"What's that look for?"

"I'm surprised, that's all. Didn't think you'd admit it so readily. Have you grown up a little?"

Did our talk two days ago get through to him?

He still snapped at me like a middle schooler going through puberty, but he was much friendlier than when we'd first met. He even went out of his way to catch wild boar for us.

That's good. The problem is, in this whole enormous land, we've got about a millet grain's worth of people on our side.

I opened my mouth a moment before Yayul Mok could glare at me.

"When and where?"

"Insi. I'll come get you then."

"Good. Oh, and while you're coming…"

"While I'm coming, what?"

"Catch a deer or a roe deer for us. Not another wild boar."

"…!"

A day in Murim was divided into twelve shichen, each about two hours long. Insi was the period from three to five in the morning.

Yayul Mok kept his word. While everyone slept, a White Tiger covered head to tail in snow-white fur cut through the darkness and landed outside our quarters.

Thump.

Alongside it lay a dead animal that looked all too familiar.

"Fuck, another wild boar. You're doing this on purpose, aren't you?"

"Found it on the way."

"You keep finding them. What, do you have a wild-boar farm somewhere? Do you water them, let them grow nice and big, then sneak over and seori[2810] them?"

Namho looked puzzled. "What is seori? I've never heard that word before."

"It's a thing. And don't worry, Old Man Namho. You won't hear it a second time in this lifetime."

"So that's how you Han Chinese talk…"

"Please stop hating Han Chinese people."

Having politely asked Namho to stop grumbling, I saw Yayul Mok jerk his chin toward the space behind him.

"Get on."

"The tiger?"

"…Would you rather ride on my shoulders?"

"He looks bad-tempered."

[2810] Seori is a colloquial Korean term for stealing produce from someone else's field.

"That's prejudice. I've been with him since he was a cub. He's as gentle as can be. Test him if you don't believe me."

"Oh. Really?"

I reached out to stroke the White Tiger's chin—and snatched my hand back like lightning.

Clack!

Its large, sharp teeth snapped shut through empty air. I looked to Yayul Mok for an explanation, and he smacked his lips.

"What a shame."

"You bastard."

"I told you to test him if you didn't believe me. I never said he wouldn't bite."

Having spouted nonsense not even a dog would believe, Yayul Mok gently scratched the White Tiger between the eyes.

"Yaho. Yaho, don't be angry."

For a moment, I thought he was doing an impression of a hiker on Bukhansan.[2811] Then it hit me.

"Wait. Is that his name?"

Yayul Mok nodded proudly.

"Muyaho.[2812] Tiger of the mighty wilds."

"…"

"A magnificent name, isn't it?"

Grrr. Prrr.

Apparently determined to prove it belonged to the cat family, the White Tiger purred. Yayul Mok gazed at it as if he might die from how adorable it was.

"That means he's in a good mood. You can get on now."

"…Uh. Sure."

"Why the look? Is something wrong?"

There is. A little problem only I know about. But I can't say it here.

I swallowed the words on the tip of my tongue and climbed quietly onto the White Tiger's back. Namho followed, his face slightly flushed with excitement.

"To think I'd ride a tiger at my age! They say only warriors are allowed to ride them—and this one's a sacred White Tiger!"

Nothing makes a parent happier than hearing someone praise their child. Yayul Mok, proud mother of Yaho, nodded.

"You know your tigers, old man. Do you like White Tigers?"

[2811] Bukhansan is a mountain near Seoul. Yaho is a shout associated with hikers.

[2812] Muyaho also echoes a Korean meme catchphrase.

"Of course. I've always liked them very much."[2813]

"…"

No. Stop there. Any further and you're pushing it.

Just as I waited for the next line with equal parts anticipation and dread, the White Tiger stretched leisurely, seemingly unaffected by carrying three people, then kicked off the ground and raced away.

Papat!

Under the bright moon, the three of us rode the tiger through the dark jungle like a streak of light. We stopped before an old shrine that was falling to pieces.

The air inside the shrine was hot and humid as a steam sauna.

Dust coated the floor. Insects had eaten into the pillars. An oil lamp wavered as though it might go out at any moment, casting a dim light through the room.

At the center of it all, someone was waiting for us.

"I hadn't been back in so long, I found the place a mess. Then again, it wasn't in very good shape back then either."

The Beast Miao King, Yayul Cheok, turned toward us. Unlike when we'd first met, his expression was as faint as the lamplight, though the weariness in it was plain to see.

Perhaps that was why none of us asked why he'd chosen to meet us in an old shrine rather than the Inner Palace's main hall. Instead, I took up the thread of his wandering thoughts.

"When was that?"

"When I was young. No, younger than young. We were children. Whenever we caused a disaster too big to put right, we hid here from the adults."

"We?"

"You've met him. I imagine you've already guessed."

"Baeksang. Great chieftain of the Bai people."

The Beast Miao King nodded. "That's right. Him."

"I know you've been together a long time."

"Even 'a long time' isn't enough to describe it. We spent our entire lives together. In the grasslands, the swamps, the mountains and fields, and even on the battlefield—we were always together."

He gazed silently at the wavering lamp for a moment, as though looking back on those days, then gave a small nod.

"Yes. We did."

[2813] "White Tiger" can also be Korean slang for a woman with little or no pubic hair, giving the answer an unintended double meaning.

"I heard you were inseparable childhood friends and sworn brothers."

His eyes moved to me. I met his gaze and went on.

"Are you still?"

"Hmm."

"…Jin Taekyung. Watch your mouth."

Grrrr.

The crouching White Tiger let out a low growl. The Beast Miao King waved a hand at his son, who had stepped forward to warn me, and studied my face.

"You think we aren't?"

"It occurred to me that Great Chieftain Baeksang might not see things the way you do, Palace Lord."

"…"

"I don't know how much you've heard, but all sorts of things are happening in the Central Plains. It started in Shanxi Province, where the Jin Family of Taiyuan is."

I remembered it vividly.

The Shaolin Bloodshed and the Sichuan Blood Tragedy had since overshadowed it, but Dark Heaven had first made its appearance in the Central Plains in Shanxi Province. They manipulated the Mount Heng Sword Sect and its Head Elder into starting a war, and some thousand people lost their lives.

If the Hidden Shadow Pavilion has been keeping him informed, he has to know.

As though he'd read my mind, the Beast Miao King nodded.

"I've heard. I'd met the Blade of Flowers, Jin Baekyang, myself."

"No one saw it coming. It might have been different if he'd been an outsider with no ties to the family. But the Head Elder was our blood kin, one of the Jin Family of Taiyuan's most senior members."

That was why Jin Wikyung had trusted the Head Elder to the end despite his suspicions. The Beast Miao King was sharp enough to understand what I was getting at.

"Baeksang… No. It can't be. He's not like the Blade of Flowers."

"No one knows that."

Namho, who had been watching in silence, spoke up.

"Long ago, I had a subordinate I cherished like family. He was the last descendant of a fallen martial family. The Demonic Cult had killed his parents. Later, when a hundred thousand followers of the Demonic Path rose like wildfire in the west, he joined the Murim Alliance. He never feared death on a mission, and the information he brought back won us more than ten small victories."

I'd never heard of this Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent. Neither had the rest of the world.

Namho's face darkened, and so did the story.

“Even after it happened, I couldn’t believe he was a traitor. One day, he sacrificed an arm to bring us information. That information sent more than five thousand Alliance members into the jaws of death.”

“…!”

“When everything was revealed, he fled. And several days later, I saw the head of a man brought back by the assassination squad. He was grinning from ear to ear, as though something had made him terribly happy.”

His voice faded into silence. Namho sighed deeply before he spoke again.

“This old man isn’t saying the Bai great chieftain serves Dark Heaven. But this is Murim. We can’t see an inch ahead of us. Baeksang. Yohi. Heugung. Or one of the thirty-two tribal chiefs gathering here tomorrow. I wouldn’t be surprised if any one of them turned out to be a traitor.”

For a long time, the Beast Miao King said nothing. He watched the oil lamp sway and right itself, over and over, before turning back to me.

“Are you certain?”

“Of one thing, at least.”

“What?”

“The Southern Heaven Demon Empress. That fucking bitch won’t leave Nanman alone.”

The Beast Miao King let out a low groan before opening his mouth.

“Nanman is no easy target.”

“Were the Sichuan Tang Clan, Shaolin Temple, Emei Sect, and Qingcheng Sect easy fucking pushovers, then?”

“…!”

“Oh, sorry. I went too far.”

The Beast Miao King let out a hollow laugh at my sudden outburst before answering.

“You really are Old Master Jeok’s disciple.”

“He’d be offended if he heard you say that.”

“He’d secretly love it.”

“…Oh.”

Okay. He knows Old Man Jeok.

I was giving him a mental thumbs-up when a sudden rush of movement came from outside the shrine.

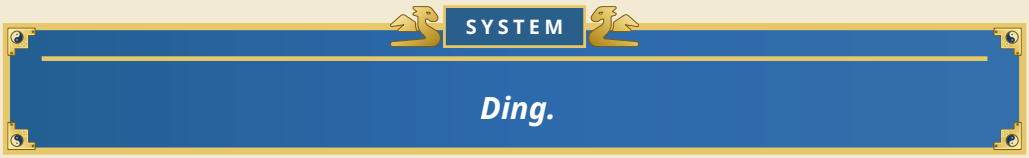
Whoosh, hiss!

A voice followed, held as low as its owner could manage.

“P-Palace Lord!”

At the same moment, a red warning light went off in my head.

And a System alert sounded.



SYSTEM
Ding.

Chapter 633

The voice outside was hushed, but there was no hiding the urgency in it—or the sound of someone approaching.

“P-Palace Lord!”

The Beast Miao King and Yayul Mok snapped their heads up at the call, which seemed to come from one of the guards.

“Something’s happened at Ailao Mountain…!”

Boom!

A powerful wave of qi burst forth and swept through the shrine. The Beast Miao King shattered the decrepit door and glared at his man.

“What do you mean, something’s happened at Ailao Mountain?”

Before his shout reached my ears, a soft chime sounded.

Ding.

SYSTEM

A sudden quest, Unknown Omen, has been generated!

Quest

Unknown Omen

Nanman’s forbidden land, Ailao Mountain, is screaming. Bodies torn to pieces hang from its countless high, treacherous peaks. Blood from something unknown runs down the thousand-fathom cliffs between them. Endless howls pour from the mountain, shrouded in black clouds and mist, filling everyone with fear.

And now, a new path has appeared before you.

Grade: Sudden Quest

Restriction: Jin Taekyung

Mission: Investigate Ailao Mountain within the time limit (Incomplete)

Reward: ???

Failure: ???

Would you like to accept the quest?

Unknown Omen, huh?

The title needed changing. Not Unknown Omen, but Fucking Obvious Omen.

That aside, there was only one answer I could give.

Accept quest.

Ding.

SYSTEM

You have accepted the sudden quest, Unknown Omen!
A time limit has been created!
Time Remaining: 4 hours 59 minutes 59 seconds

The frozen time began to move again. Before even a moment had passed, we set out through the predawn darkness for Ailao Mountain.

The warriors of the Nanman Beast Palace were said to grow up alongside fierce beasts.

From childhood, warrior and beast formed a bond. Once a warrior completed the coming-of-age ceremony and was recognized as a full-fledged warrior, they officially became the beast's owner and companion.

But even a centuries-old tradition had its exceptions.

Whoosh! Rustle!

The Beast Miao King, Yayul Cheok, had no need of a beast's help. He probably never had, even as a child.

He was the greatest warrior Nanman had ever produced—and a beast in his own right.

Leading us through the dark, overgrown jungle, the Beast Miao King let out a mighty roar.

Gwaaaar!

It was a beast's roar in every sense: rougher, more savage, and far more primal than Shaolin Temple's lion's roar, a supreme technique with the power to subdue demons.

His roar tore through the darkness, carrying the warning farther and faster.

Hundreds of torches flared to life here and there below a distant ridge. Looking down at them, the Beast Miao King shouted to the guards running around him.

"Gisan. Dogok. Go to the Outer Palace. Find the tribal chiefs staying there, reassure the people, and mobilize the warriors to prepare for a possible foreign invasion!"

"Yes, sir!"

"Wonhu. Manjeok. You're going to the Inner Palace. Mobilize the Miao warriors and guard the palace!"

"At your command!"

"The remaining three of you, find the other great chieftains and inform them of the situation. Tell each of them to mobilize one hundred elite warriors and head for Ailao Mountain!"

He delivered his orders without missing a beat to the Seven Miao Tigers, his personal guard of the Miao people's finest warriors. Then his gaze moved to his late-born son, running hard behind him.

"Mok."

"…Yes, Father."

The darkness around us wasn't why Yayul Mok looked so grim. He answered faintly, as though he already knew what was coming.

"Go with them," the Beast Miao King said firmly. "Gather the warriors under the Miao people and raise a force in case of trouble."

"But…"

"Have you forgotten? You're the Miao people's Young Chieftain and the Nanman Beast Palace's Young Palace Lord."

It was a reminder of why this man ruled the Nanman Beast Palace. When we'd first met, he'd seemed as easygoing as a well-fed lion. Now he was a beast with prey right in front of him.

And Yayul Mok wasn't childish enough to defy his father's orders at a time like this.

"…I obey, Palace Lord."

Yet he didn't leave us at once. He drew close to me as I ran beside the Beast Miao King and made an unexpected offer.

"Take this one with you."

"Huh?"

Grrr?

He meant White Tiger, which made the offer all the more surprising. Nanman's warriors considered the beasts at their sides their dearest comrades—and family.

Whoosh!

I ducked a branch rushing toward my face and asked cautiously, "Are you giving him away? Putting him up for adoption?"

"Don't be ridiculous!"

Grrrr!

"Whoa. Why are you getting so angry? If it's not, just say no."

"No! If you save even a little strength, you'll be more help to Father!"

Gwaaaar!

So much for man and beast understanding each other without words. They were both throwing the same fucking fit.

Still…

It would definitely be much better to ride him.

My reserves of internal energy were considerable even by Central Plains standards, but they weren't an inexhaustible spring.

If I ended up facing Dark Heaven under the command of the Southern Heaven Demon Empress at Ailao Mountain, then, as Yayul Mok had said, it would be best to conserve as much strength as possible.

Good kid.

I hadn't been in Nanman long, but I knew what it meant for a warrior to lend someone his beast. I gave Yayul Mok an approving look and decided to offer him a gift in return.

"Here. Don't turn it down because you feel bad. Give and take, right?"

Rustle!

For a moment, there was only the wind and the sound of branches brushing past us. Namho, whom I was carrying in both arms like a piece of luggage, spoke with a grave expression.

"Am I an object?"

"If you were, I could at least throw you at someone. I can't even do that with you, Old Man Namho."

"What an insolent thug. You dare suggest attacking an old man…"

"Quit complaining and go. Your retirement plans are looking bright, so don't get dragged into this for no reason. And our kids can't just sit around doing nothing either."

I wasn't dismissing him. I was looking out for him. Namho might be a Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent who'd been through every kind of hardship, but he was still an old man who hadn't learned a single move of martial arts.

He knew it better than anyone. He sighed, his face full of worry.

"I'll tell the Fire Dragon Pavilion that the Pavilion Master is looking for them."

"That's enough. I trust you'll tell them what to watch out for, too."

The fuse that was Nanman had finally been lit. The question was who had lit it: an enemy from outside or one within.

Namho's body had aged, but his mind hadn't dulled in the slightest. He gave a small nod.

"Pavilion Master, one last thing."

"Yes?"

"Don't get hurt."

"Ah."

"And dying is even more out of the question."

I gave him a small smile instead of an answer. Yayul Mok took Namho from me, then, with a glance, kicked off White Tiger's back and sprang away.

Tap. Whoosh!

A shadow swept through the hazy moonlight. Yayul Mok and the Seven Miao Tigers left our group and disappeared into the darkness. The Beast Miao King, racing on all fours like a gigantic brown bear, picked up his pace.

Crack-crack-crack! Smash!

Thick branches snapped, and dense undergrowth was trampled.

I climbed onto White Tiger's back, which Yayul Mok had left behind, and heard the Beast Miao King's voice through the wind rushing violently past my ears.

"Do you think Dark Heaven is behind this?"

"We'll have to get there to know for sure, but the possibility is high. At the very least, it'll be connected somehow."

His face had gone rigid. I spoke again.

"What exactly is Ailao Mountain?"

"Forbidden land. No one enters without permission."

I already knew that much. Namho had told me on the way here, and the System had just said the same thing. The answer didn't tell me what I wanted to know.

"Isn't the Nanman Beast Palace the same way? Actually, that seems true of most of Nanman."

"It's different. Entirely different. The finest warriors of each tribe go in to keep watch over that place."

"Why would they need to…?"

"This began more than three hundred years ago, when my ancestors' ancestors lived in Nanman. For generations, over a hundred tribes had fought and killed one another across this land. Dozens vanished. The descendants who barely survived founded a sect of their own in Nanman's deepest reaches—and began working with something more dangerous than any blade or beast."

A conversation I'd had with Jeok Cheongang in Henan several months earlier flashed through my mind. We'd spoken of the Nanman Beast Palace's history and its connection to the former Sect Leaders of the Fire Gate Clan. That history was also one reason the palace had joined the Great Faction War.

In that case…

There was only one answer.

"Poison," I murmured. "It was poison."

"Yes. That was the beginning of the Five Poisons Sect, which would terrorize Nanman for the next hundred years."

We crossed a towering peak, leaped from a hill, and raced across the tops of the dense trees. The Beast Miao King swept his clawed hand into a thick tree and sent it flying as he continued.

"Countless people died, they say. Dead fish filled the riverbanks. Beasts ate fish that had washed downstream and died too. Poison spread through the wells, and an unknown epidemic broke out. After thousands—tens of thousands—had died, the divided tribes finally gathered beneath one banner and began a new war."

That was how the Nanman Beast Palace was born.

But death bred death, and vengeance brought more vengeance. While the Nanman Beast Palace and the Five Poisons Sect fought their bitter war, trapped in that unending cycle, a stranger arrived from the distant Central Plains.

"He called himself the Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan. My ancestors had probably never heard the name, but I doubt that mattered to them. The moment he entered Nanman, he burned to death the hundred Five Poisons Sect warriors who attacked him."

The Sect Leader of that era hadn't appreciated the Five Poisons Sect's unexpectedly grand welcome. Like most martial artists, he hated poison, too.

So he planted his ass on the scales of power, crushed the balance, and led the Nanman Beast Palace in reducing the Five Poisons Sect to ashes.

"The problem came after he left."

The sect's disciples were reduced to bones, but the venomous beasts and fierce animals they released in their final moments multiplied deep in the mountains where their headquarters had stood.

Slowly. Secretly.

And that former headquarters of the Five Poisons Sect was none other than…

"Right there. Ailao Mountain."

I looked up, following the Beast Miao King's pointing finger.

Far in the distance, a black mountain rose into view, its many peaks shrouded in clouds and mist.

Chapter 634

Papat!

Neither the Beast Miao King nor White Tiger slowed. I narrowed my eyes against the chilly wind sweeping over me.

That's Ailao Mountain.

Its rugged slopes and deep valleys were unmistakable even from a distance. Countless mist-shrouded peaks rose high enough to pierce the sky.

Perhaps it was the predawn darkness that had yet to lift. Or perhaps it was knowing this had once been the headquarters of the Five Poisons Sect, which had terrorized Nanman long ago. Whatever the reason, Ailao Mountain looked dark and ominous as it drew closer.

Maybe that was why the Beast Miao King's voice was so low when he spoke.

"The Five Poisons Sect was destroyed by the Palace. But not everything they left behind disappeared."

If people vanished and left things behind, you could simply burn those things. It was different when they had legs.

"No one knew that whatever the Five Poisons Sect had left behind was still living in the deepest reaches of Ailao Mountain."

For more than a hundred years.

The Five Poisons Sect's dark legacy lived on deep within the mountain. In a territory no one else could enter, they devoured one another, bred, and slowly grew in number.

"But our ancestors eventually found out. In a way no one would have wished for."

Three hundred of Nanman's elite warriors dissolved into a handful of bloody water. Two great chieftains and a dozen or so tribal chiefs were torn limb from limb.

It happened at a Tribal Grand Council held on Ailao Mountain, exactly one hundred years after the Nanman Beast Palace destroyed the Five Poisons Sect.

"According to the records, the Palace was attacked by venomous beasts and strange predators rarely seen in Nanman—or anywhere else in the world."

There were deadly poisons with no known antidote, and hundreds of beasts with claws and teeth harder than steel.

The unexpected attack dealt the Nanman Beast Palace devastating losses. They were horrified to find a trace of the Five Poisons Sect, which they had believed was long gone.

"Once again, all of Nanman joined forces. We mobilized every warrior from every tribe, surrounded Ailao Mountain, and set out to kill them."

But the campaign was only half a success.

They killed hundreds of beasts and burned the venomous creatures, but their own losses were too great. And in the process, divisions began to open among the tribes.

When you think about it, how could they not?

Even if you ordered a single pizza to share, someone would get an extra topping and someone else would get less.

The campaign on Ailao Mountain worked much the same way.

Sensing danger, the venomous creatures and fierce beasts popped up everywhere to attack, as though they'd been possessed by Hong Gil-dong.[2814] The tribal chiefs leading the warriors were afraid of how many of their own people they might lose.

They couldn't exactly say, "Since it's come to this, let's have a few people from each tribe die and split it evenly."

"The tribes grew more divided by the day. As a last resort, we tried fire. It spread beyond the mountain and caused even more damage, but it still wasn't enough to burn all of Ailao Mountain."

And so the Nanman Beast Palace had to withdraw. That did not mean they had nothing to show for their losses.

"The Palace suffered terribly, but we reduced the threat just as much. We hunted countless venomous beasts and fierce predators and burned at least part of the mountain. Perhaps the result was only natural."

"What happened after that?"

"Ailao Mountain went quiet, as if nothing had happened. But this time, no one let down their guard. We declared the entire mountain forbidden land and permanently stationed three hundred elite warriors drawn from the tribes there. Every year, the four great chieftains took turns leading small-scale hunts. That is how we kept the peace for more than a hundred years."

For the tribal chiefs of the Nanman Beast Palace, it was a reasonable compromise. They could guard against the threat on Ailao Mountain without suffering such terrible losses again.

The problem was…

"I think that peace ends today."

My voice sank as I pointed ahead.

At the end of the dark, rugged valley, which looked like the entrance to hell, a lone figure sat against a tree.

Whoosh!

The Beast Miao King shot upward like a beam of light, crossed the air, and landed at the mouth of the valley.

[2814] Hong Gil-dong is a legendary Korean outlaw famed for appearing unpredictably in many places.

I followed close behind. By the time I climbed down from White Tiger's back, the Beast Miao King was standing before the figure, his face set like stone.

"…We're too late. He's already dead."

I nodded quietly. I would have known even if he hadn't said it. An indescribable stench had struck my nose before we got within a few steps.

And there was only one cause of death that could produce a smell like that.

Poison. It's poison.

An incredibly potent poison. The figure slumped against the tree—no, the corpse—gave off a stench, and the ground and grass soaked with the bloody fluid seeping from it had turned black and died.

Unless a martial artist had cultivated Scorching Yang Qi, rooted in the fire qi that countered poison, even an early Peak master would have trouble withstanding the poisonous qi within three zhang[2815] of the body.

Grrr.

I soothed White Tiger, whose brow was deeply furrowed, and spoke.

"Do you recognize him?"

"He looks familiar, though I can't place him. He must be one of the warriors stationed on Ailao Mountain."

"Do you usually post a guard at the entrance?"

"Of course not. We need every warrior on the mountain in case something happens. It covers such a vast area that there are three or four villages nearby, but the villagers know all this well enough."

In other words, the area had been strictly controlled for so long that there was no need for another sentry.

Which meant…

He came down from the mountain. He was running from something.

I looked around.

Beyond the thick darkness, faint but unmistakable footprints remained. They were clearly human. I could see no tracks left by a beast or any venomous creature.

There was something else, too.

"There's a wound. Look at his side."

As the Beast Miao King said, the clothing at the corpse's side was torn as though something had clawed it, and the skin beneath was black.

"It wasn't a weapon. Looks like something rough and powerful barely grazed him, but…"

"That is what makes poison frightening. A small wound can kill in moments."

[2815] A zhang is a traditional Chinese unit of length of about 3.03 meters (9.94 ft); three zhang is about 9.09 meters (29.8 ft).

He had only been scratched, and it had done this much damage. Was it anything like the Formless Ultimate Poison that had once afflicted Jeok Cheongang?

I took my eyes off the corpse and stared into the dark valley. I had not seen what happened, but I could almost picture it.

Until a short while ago, the nameless warrior must have been running through that rugged valley. Poisoned, stumbling and staggering, he had fled in a panic before dying beneath the tree.

It was tragic. But right now, I needed to know what had killed him.

Was it Dark Heaven? One of Ailao Mountain's venomous beasts? Or...

A venomous beast from Ailao Mountain controlled by Dark Heaven.

With that question unanswered, I turned to the Beast Miao King.

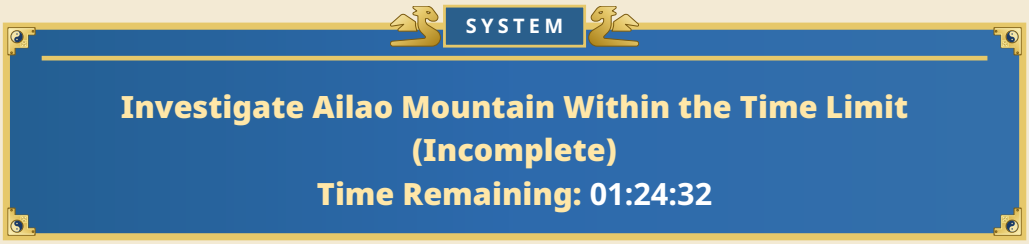
"In the end, it seems there's only one answer."

"Yes."

His voice was the growl of an enraged beast.

"I'll see for myself which bastard did this."

Ding.



It should have been growing light by now, but Ailao Mountain remained steeped in darkness.

And darkness was not the only thing there.

The scent of blood.

The smell had become familiar to me at some point. Now it served as an invisible guide. Following the dead warrior's footprints through the mountain, the Beast Miao King and I caught the scent on the damp wind and changed course without hesitation.

At last, we found them.

Countless bodies lay scattered across the ridges. The stench of deadly poison overwhelmed even the thick smell of blood.

"...!"

"...!"

How many were there? A hundred? More?

The grim possibility that had occurred to me when we found the body in the valley was now before my eyes.

At the horrific sight, the Beast Miao King's eyes blazed.

"What bastard dares…? I'll tear him limb from limb!"

For the ruler of the Nanman Beast Palace, it was only natural to be furious. But instead of joining him, I kept as calm as I could. I drew up my internal energy, formed a qi curtain to keep any sound from escaping, and examined the bodies.

Broken bones. Bruises. Severed limbs. Poisoning.

Unlike the first warrior, these people had died in different ways. Some had been killed with their limbs crushed. More than a few had parts of their bodies—their necks, among other things—torn away by some unknown, tremendous force.

Anyone chosen to guard Ailao Mountain must have been skilled.

Yet they had been slaughtered like this.

From what I had seen, the Beast Miao King, Baeksang, and a handful of others stood out, while most Nanman warriors were less skilled than those of the Central Plains. Even so, these elite warriors would have been First Rate at minimum, with some at Supreme First Rate and perhaps a rare Peak master among them.

And Nanman warriors don't fight alone. With the beasts that accompany them, they should be a match for a major sect of the Central Plains…

I broke off as something felt wrong. Then I saw White Tiger watching our surroundings with a low growl and realized what it was.

The beasts. Where did they go?

The beasts that were always at their warriors' sides, as inseparable as parts of their own bodies, were gone.

I looked around quickly. Among what had to be more than a hundred human corpses, I could see only three or four dead beasts.

"Why?"

The moment I voiced the question—

Hsssss.

"…!"

A chilling presence rode the wind toward us, piercing me like an awl.

The Beast Miao King, who had barely managed to contain his rage, and I both turned our heads like lightning.

We saw it. Heard it.

Rustle.

Far away, grass stirred faintly. Darkness rippled as though it were alive. And then —

Grrr.

A low growl, deep as an abyss, came from something crouched in the dark grass.

Step.

In a world that seemed to slow, the darkness moved, trampling the grass beneath it.

Wrapped head to toe in black, it came toward us. It was larger than any beast I had ever seen, and its blue-white eyes held unmistakable anger and majesty.

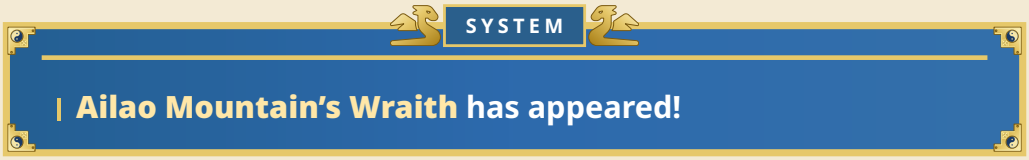
Black Tiger.

The word flashed through my mind like lightning. At that exact moment, White Tiger's body began to tremble.

Gwaaaaaaaaaang!

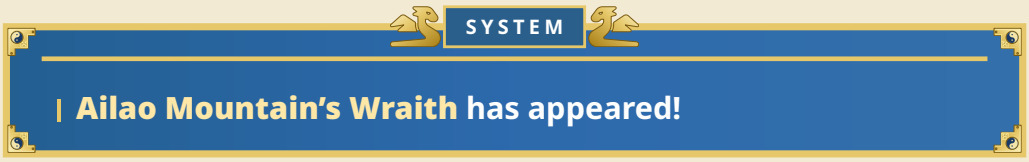
A roar tore through the darkness, shaking heaven and earth. At the same time, a familiar chime rang in my ears.

Ding.



Chapter 635

Ding.



Ailao Mountain's Wraith.

A being and a name I had never seen or heard of before.

Before I could process the new information, the colossal Black Tiger the System had named Ailao Mountain's Wraith let out a thunderous roar.

Gwaaaaaaaaaang!

The roar tore through the darkness and echoed across the entire mountain. The air around us rippled like water, and grass and branches shattered.

This was no ordinary beast's cry.

It was something primal, drawing out the fear hidden deep in the heart and shaking the soul itself.

And I knew the nature of that power better than anyone else in this world.

Fear.

I had known instinctively from the moment I met its blue-white eyes: the enormous creature that had appeared before us could not be fully described as a mere beast.

I knew because, a few months ago in Hubei, I had encountered something like it.

The Water God Dragon.

The master of Dongting Lake, driven mad and stripped of its reason by Dark Heaven. A rare spiritual creature that had entered a new realm after hundreds of years.

I sensed qi like the Water God Dragon's emanating from the Black Tiger towering like Taishan, and I was not the only one who felt it.

Whine…

By any ordinary standard, White Tiger deserved to be called a spiritual creature. But it was no match for that overwhelming Fear.

While White Tiger whimpered like a frightened puppy, someone else stepped forward without the slightest hesitation.

"Was this your doing?"

Boom!

With a furious shout, the Beast Miao King kicked off the ground. In the blink of an eye, he had covered more than ten zhang.[2816]

Radiant light burst from his tightly clenched fist.

Whoooosh!

His fist split the air with a heavy rush. Destructive Force coiled around it like thread, erasing everything in its path.

And at the end of that path…

Slash!

Nothing.

Only empty air.

"…!"

"…!"

It had dodged a punch from a Supreme Peak master counted among the Ten Kings.

It had happened in an instant. The Black Tiger moved through the darkness like mist, evading the Beast Miao King's attack, then swung its enormous front paw, black as night.

Swish!

Unbelievably fast. And powerful.

Boom! Crack-crack-crack!

A deafening impact sent a tremendous shock wave in every direction. Driven back by the force of the blow, the Beast Miao King's eyes widened.

"What the…?"

He had no time to recover from his shock. A hungry predator did not hesitate before its prey.

Gwaaaaaaaaaang!

Another roar shook Ailao Mountain.

In the modern world, Gates and monsters had become part of everyday life. But the martial artists of this world were not accustomed to Fear.

The Beast Miao King had been caught off guard all the more because he had never encountered a creature so far beyond anything he expected.

"Kh!"

He froze for the barest instant. That was probably the best the Beast Miao King could have managed, but a life-and-death duel between masters could be decided by just such an opening.

That held true even when the opponent was a beast rather than a martial artist.

Whoosh!

In a world that seemed to slow, the Black Tiger's hooked claws tore through the air.

[2816] A zhang here is ten Korean ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Ten zhang is about 30.3 m (99.4 ft).

At that moment, a spear left my hand and streaked across the space between us in a flash of light.

Shreeeek! Boom!

A roar split the heavens. Everything within a radius of more than ten zhang[2817] shook.

Qi against qi. Strength against strength.

And I won that brief clash.

Crack!

The Black Tiger flew backward as though it had become one with the spear and vanished beyond the dark forest. In the distance, dozens of towering trees snapped and swayed.

The mountain birds that had long since awakened and must have been watching us in silence took flight all at once, while countless leaves and branches poured down like a rain shower.

Tap. Rustle!

Now was the time to catch it.

But I had barely started after the Black Tiger when I had to stop.

Why can't I sense it…?

I could not feel its presence. Not even a trace.

All it had left behind was wreckage that looked as though a bomb had gone off, and a spear lying on the ground with its blade shattered.

There were no footprints. No bloodstains.

It got beyond the range of my Qi Sense? That quickly?

As I searched the surroundings, the Beast Miao King arrived with White Tiger. Anger and shame mingled on his face.

"Where is it?"

"It seems to have run away. I can't find it."

"…Damn it. You saw me at my worst."

"I understand. I mean that."

Mungyeong and Jeok Cheongang had both been shaken for a moment by the Water God Dragon's Fear.

The Beast Miao King was a formidable master, worthy of his place among the Ten Kings. But comparing him to those two, who had reached a realm beyond humanity, would hardly be fair.

If anything, he had shaken off the Fear faster than I expected.

Maybe growing up in Nanman, surrounded by strange venomous beasts and ferocious animals, had helped. I could not say.

[2817] A zhang here is ten Korean ja, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Ten zhang is about 30.3 m (99.4 ft).

What mattered right now was something else.

"It's still alive. There's no blood, so it doesn't seem to have suffered any significant injury."

The Beast Miao King nodded at my quiet words.

"I thought as much. When it knew it couldn't dodge, it bit down on the spearhead at the last moment. A spearhead wreathed in Force, no less. I've lived in Nanman all my life, but I've never seen or heard of anything like it."

"I don't think that's true."

"What do you mean?"

"The last part."

Before he could reply, I went on.

"You may never have seen one, but you've heard of one. I'm sure of it."

We could not sense the Black Tiger for now, but it might spring out at any moment. The Beast Miao King had put his back to mine as we watched our surroundings. At my words, he stiffened.

"Could it be…?"

"You're probably thinking of the right thing. Something similar happened in Hubei Province."

"…You mean that imugi?"[2818]

The words came out like a groan. He continued, "The Murim Alliance mentioned it in a letter. But I thought the story sounded far-fetched."

"Are you really the Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace? Your only son rides around on a White Tiger, and you couldn't believe that?"

"He rides a White Tiger, not an imugi."[2819]

"…Ah."

Fair enough.

An imugi[2820] belonged in myth. Even coming from the Murim Alliance, the story would have been hard to believe.

His brief, blunt answer left me with nothing to say. The Beast Miao King spoke up abruptly.

"If that is the case, was that creature that just appeared also the work of the Southern Heaven Demon Empress—that witch?"

"I can't be sure. But it's likely."

Too much about this felt wrong for me to rule it out.

Ailao Mountain had been quiet for more than a hundred years, despite once being the Five Poisons Sect's headquarters. Now a massacre had happened here, and a [2818] An imugi is a serpent-like creature in Korean folklore, often associated with dragons.

[2819] An imugi is a serpent-like creature in Korean folklore, often associated with dragons.
[2820] An imugi is a serpent-like creature in Korean folklore, often associated with dragons.

Black Tiger of astonishing power had appeared. It all reminded me of the Water God Dragon.

Ailao Mountain's Wraith.

What was it really?

Where were the two hundred warriors who should still have been here, aside from the people now sprawled around us as cold corpses? And where were the ferocious beasts they commanded?

I was slowly scanning the area with a heavy gaze when—

Grrr.

Having barely recovered from the Fear, White Tiger suddenly crouched low and raised its tail high.

The Beast Miao King and I understood what that meant and turned at once.

Far away, the darkness was rippling.

That's…!

We had both overlooked something while we talked.

An animal's sense of smell was dozens, even hundreds of times keener than a human's. A tiger, which usually hunted at night, had a nose to match.

Which meant…

White Tiger can smell farther than my Qi Sense can reach.

The moment it clicked, the Beast Miao King and I kicked off the ground together.

As we chased it, I learned exactly why people called tigers mountain lords.[2821]

Ah. Look at that fucking bastard.

I swallowed the curse and glared at the black shape racing far ahead.

No matter how far we ran along the winding ridges, no matter how many cloud- and mist-covered peaks we crossed, we could not catch it.

Its strength, inexhaustible Stamina, and elusive movements kept it ahead of the Beast Miao King and me. Even White Tiger—a spiritual creature with white fur to boast of—could not catch up.

If anything, White Tiger was growing more anxious by the moment.

No wonder. That's no ordinary tiger.

A mountain lord was not just the king of a mountain. The term could also refer to a mountain spirit. But that creature was no spirit of Ailao Mountain.

It was its wraith. Perhaps something still more ominous: an evil spirit.

What we saw as we pursued the Black Tiger only strengthened that thought.

[2821] San-gun, literally "mountain lord," is a traditional epithet for a tiger and can also refer to a mountain spirit.

“That damned beast…!”

The Beast Miao King’s voice seemed to boil like lava. His furious gaze had fallen on bodies with their limbs hanging limp.

Deep valleys. The edges of cliffs. Ravines that must once have run clear but had now been stained black by poison…

The corpses of Nanman warriors lay along our route like signposts. The wind carried a sickening mix of blood and foul odors.

“How dare they? How dare they do something like this!”

A savage wave of qi poured from the Beast Miao King as the horrific sights flashed past us.

He was angrier than ever, and his movements grew rougher with it.

“You bastard!”

Tap-tap—shreeeek!

In an instant, his body shot forward at a terrifying speed and streaked toward the Black Tiger without hesitation.

But his opponent was a creature called Ailao Mountain’s Wraith. A head-on fight might be another matter; in natural physique and speed, the Beast Miao King could not match it.

Papat!

Just as I expected.

The Black Tiger, far beyond an ordinary spiritual creature, pulled farther ahead instead of being caught. Soon it vanished into a deep, dark valley.

It gave us a look that seemed to say, Come and get me if you dare.

What?

Only then did I slow down and look around.

Ancient trees and vines filled every direction, while the hot, humid air mixed with mist carried the distinctive stench of poison.

I did not know exactly where we were, but after running mindlessly in pursuit of the creature, I could at least guess that we had reached the heart of Ailao Mountain.

This…

I had a bad feeling. A very bad feeling.

But while I slowed, the Beast Miao King charged straight into the valley without a hint of hesitation.

“Great Hero Yayul, wait—!”

Crack!

There was no time to stop him. Even if there had been, he would not have listened.

A little anger could wake a dulled mind. Too much could put it to sleep.

“Damn it.”

I muttered under my breath and looked at White Tiger, which had gone quiet.

It was pacing anxiously at the valley entrance where the Beast Miao King had disappeared, as though it had already sensed the danger. When it met my eyes, it shook its head like a person.

“Was that supposed to mean it’s dangerous?”

Grrr.

“This guy’s pretty smart. We agreed for the first time. But there’s nothing we can do this time.”

Grrr…

“You don’t have to come. Go back from here, and if you run into your master or anyone else, tell them we’re here.”

White Tiger was clever enough to count as a spiritual creature. I trusted it had understood me.

As Yayul Mok had done, I gently stroked it between the eyes, then stepped toward the valley.

Without a trace of fear.

With my head held high.

“…”

I’ll make it back alive, right?

Chapter 636

The valley was narrow and dark. Trees too old for me to guess their age grew thick enough to block the moonlight, and strange plants and creatures I had never seen before filled the space around me.

Some of them were aggressive, too.

Hiss!

I was moving with my movement technique when I reached out. Something shot from the grass like lightning and writhed in my grip.

Chrit. Chrit!

What is this? A snake?

A closer look told me I was half right.

It was a snake, but no ordinary one. Horns grew from either side of its triangular head.

Wait. Haven't I seen this somewhere before?

I stared at it and muttered, "Mimi… No, a Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake?"

Chrit.

Why was one here? Wasn't the Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake supposed to be rare even across the whole world?

Now that I look again, it does seem a little different.

Maybe it was because this place was basically China. Knockoffs everywhere.

Compared to Mimi, its body was larger, but its sheen and horns were less impressive.

I stared at the snake in disbelief, then threw it into the distance and picked up speed. Whether it was a Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake or not, I had been right about one thing: this valley was not safe.

Is it a trap after all?

I had spent a little time before entering, and the Black Tiger and the Beast Miao King were already far ahead. At least the Beast Miao King had left tracks here and there. The Black Tiger had left none, as though it really were a wraith.

Swish, swish, swish!

After running for about half a gak[2822], I spotted a vast swamp drawing closer in the distance. A familiar figure stood at its center.

"Great Hero Yayul! Stop! Stop charging in headfirst!"

"…I've already stopped."

He had. The Beast Miao King still looked furious, but he stood perfectly still amid the bodies of venomous beasts and ferocious animals.

[2822] A gak is a traditional time interval of about fifteen minutes; half a gak is about seven and a half minutes.

“What happened here?”

“They came at me from every direction like mad things. I lost sight of it because of them.”

Humans and beasts alike knew better than to attack someone stronger without good reason. If anything, beasts were more cautious because their instincts were sharper.

Yet these creatures had blocked the Beast Miao King’s path.

“Were they doing it for the Black Tiger?”

“I don’t know. But whatever their reason, it isn’t strange. This land has always been like this. It was probably the same a hundred years ago. Two hundred, too.”

That was an odd answer. He sounded as though he had known about this place all along.

When I gave him a questioning look, he continued, his expression hard.

“In the past, unlike the other tribes, the Five Poisons Sect focused on raising venomous beasts rather than ferocious animals.”

Poison was scorned everywhere, but it was an efficient weapon. Especially for the Five Poisons Sect. They had made enemies of everyone else in Nanman and faced opponents who outnumbered them dozens of times over.

“The place they created was called the Poisonblood Grounds. The most savage and vicious beasts and venomous creatures in all Nanman—perhaps in the entire world—ran rampant there. It was the deadliest and most secret legacy the Five Poisons Sect left behind.”

“Are you saying this is…”

The Beast Miao King nodded.

“The Poisonblood Grounds.”

“Huh. No wonder there wasn’t a path. But it doesn’t seem as dangerous as you made it sound. I can still breathe.”

Granted, I had met a knockoff Thousand-Year Poison Horned Snake on the way, and poisonous air seeped into me like carbonation with every breath. So far, though, I was doing all right.

Then the Beast Miao King spoke again.

“Of course. We’re on the outskirts of the Poisonblood Grounds. This is only the entrance.”

“The entrance?”

“According to the records, a little over a hundred years ago, each tribe in Nanman selected only its finest warriors to enter the Poisonblood Grounds. They carried hundreds of jars filled with lamp oil and held poison-warding pearls in their mouths. What do you think happened?”

“I’m guessing they didn’t all come home safely and live happily ever after.”

“Not one returned. The whole undertaking came to nothing. It is the chief reason Ailao Mountain remains forbidden to this day.”

I followed his pointing finger to a huge swamp that stretched for hundreds of zhang.[2823] Mist hung over it.

“By the way,” I asked cautiously, “is the fog around here usually green?”

“Of course not. Fog is usually white.”

“That fog is green.”

“Ah. That is because it’s Poison Mist.”

“…”

He said it as casually as a mother announcing that dinner was soybean-paste stew. I took a moment to collect myself.

“…Where exactly have you brought me?”

“The Poisonblood Grounds.”

“…”

For fuck’s sake. He calls that an answer?

The Beast Miao King smacked his lips at my stare.

“I didn’t know until we came in. Even the records didn’t give the Poisonblood Grounds’ exact location.”

This was a goddamn mess. Wondering whether White Tiger could lead the others this far, I asked, “Then what’s deeper inside?”

“How would I know? Everyone died.”

“That’s incredibly reassuring.”

“Baeksang’s grandfather died there, too. He was Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace at the time. I’ve heard he was the strongest warrior in the history of the Bai people.”

The Palace Lord’s position did not pass down through a single family. Yayul Mok was only the nominal Young Palace Lord. If the position became vacant, the Tribal Grand Council would convene, and one of the great chieftains of the four most powerful tribes would be elected Palace Lord.

“Stronger than you, Great Hero Yayul?”

“I cannot say. The measure of strength changes with the times. But had he lived in my era, I would not be surprised if we had a Beast Bai King instead of a Beast Miao King.”

For the Beast Miao King to speak of him like that, Baeksang’s grandfather must have been at least a Supreme Peak master by Central Plains standards—someone who had opened the Middle Dantian, or gone beyond it.

[2823] A zhang is a traditional length of ten chi, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft) using the chapter’s traditional length scale.

And a master like that died in the Poisonblood Grounds alongside Nanman's finest warriors.

And the even bigger problem is that I have to go in there now.

Still…

"We've come this far. We can't turn back now. Let's go."

The Beast Miao King looked surprised by how calmly I said it.

"That is unexpected. I thought you would suggest turning back."

"Someone once said that if a man draws his sword, he should cut through even the Poisonblood Grounds."

"…Who said that?"

"I did."

He gave me a dubious look, then grinned.

"Elder Jeok raised his Disciple well."

"Well, technically, there was a lot of violence and oppression involved… But why get into every little detail? You won't listen to me no matter what I say, Great Hero Yayul."

"Did that even need saying?"

Crack.

Bones ground in his tightly clenched fist. His voice turned cold.

"I am the great chieftain of the Miao people, but I am also Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace. I must make someone pay for their blood."

Perhaps that was why he had become Palace Lord.

I was looking at him in a new light when he spoke again.

"Thank you. For helping me."

"What else could I do? People died. I couldn't leave you here alone and go back."

"Even if Dark Heaven isn't in there?"

"I'm not that much of a coward."

A faint smile touched his lips.

"I hear the Central Plains calls men like you chivalrous heroes."

"People who dislike me usually call me a fucking bastard. I get called a lunatic a lot, too."

It was true, so I wasn't offended. Besides, most of the people who had called me those things had died by my hand. People really ought to watch what they say.

A chivalrous hero.

I still didn't know if I was one. I had done one thing, then another, and somehow ended up here with people calling me that.

A chivalrous hero in the Central Plains. A hero in the modern world. What did it matter? Whatever anyone called me, I had always done what I wanted. Dark Heaven just happened to be something I particularly couldn't stand.

Fine. Let's take on whatever's in there.

Alone, I might have had reason to worry. With the Beast Miao King beside me, we had a chance even if the Southern Heaven Demon Empress was waiting inside.

Step.

I had just finished my thoughts and followed the Beast Miao King into the swamp shrouded in deep green poisonous mist when—

Ding. Ding. Ding.

SYSTEM

Quest condition: Investigate Ailao Mountain Within the Time Limit has been completed!
Unexpected Quest: Unknown Omen has been successfully completed!
Quest completion rewards have been granted!
A small amount of EXP and Fame has been acquired!
High-Grade Antidote ×20 acquired!

The System notifications came without warning. And they did not stop there.

Ding.

SYSTEM

You have entered the hidden location Poisonblood Grounds!
Poisonblood Grounds is the most secret location created by the former Five Poisons Sect. Here, they raised countless venomous beasts and produced deadly poisons that could not be cured.
You have achieved the extremely rare Achievement How'd You Find This?
You have acquired a High-Grade Poison-Warding Pearl as an Achievement reward!
A Chain Quest has been created!
Would you like to accept the Quest My Good Sir, Do Not Cross That Swamp?[2824]

"…"

[2824] The Quest title echoes My Love, Don't Cross That River, the English title of a Korean documentary.

For fuck's sake. Look at that quest title.

The longer I stared at the holographic window, the less I wanted to answer. In the end, I nodded.

SYSTEM

Quest My Good Sir, Do Not Cross That Swamp has been accepted!

Then I instinctively sighed in the deep green Poison Mist, and realized—

Beep.

SYSTEM

The penalty effect of Poison Mist has activated!

"…!"

Something had gone seriously wrong.

Beep! Beep! Beep-beep-beep!

SYSTEM

Poison permeating the air is entering your body through your respiratory tract and skin!

Due to your traits, Myriad-Poison Immunity and Scorching Yang Qi, the penalty from Poisoned has been reduced!

You have been afflicted with the Mildly Poisoned status abnormality!

All stats have decreased by 10!

If Mildly Poisoned persists for a certain length of time, the penalty effect will increase and may even result in death!

"…"

One sigh was enough to poison me?

If the poison entered through my skin, holding my breath wouldn't help, either.

What the fuck kind of bullshit is this?

It was absurd, but I held back. As it happened, I had just the thing for a situation like this.

Open Inventory. Summon.

I took out a ring set with a black jewel that gleamed in the light. It was the Myriad-Poison Ring, a divine artifact of the Sichuan Tang Clan. As soon as I slipped it onto my finger, a System notification told me the status abnormality had been removed. The heaviness that had briefly settled over my body lifted.

Just as I thought.

I smiled contentedly and stroked the Myriad-Poison Ring. Then I noticed someone silently glaring at me and flinched.

“Oh. You startled me. What is it?”

“…Hngh. Poison. Hngh. Don’t talk to me. Hngh.”

Oh, right. He was here too.

I gave the Beast Miao King a flat, chilled stare and tossed him the High-Grade Poison-Warding Pearl I had received as the Achievement completion reward.

Chapter 637

This was a first.

The first time I had crossed a swamp this long and wide.

The first time I had fought things that weren't human while breathing Poison Mist like ordinary air.

Splash!

A sudden sound came from behind me. I pivoted smoothly and brought down my straightened hand like a blade.

Slash!

From what I could see, the thing was easily more than three zhang[2825] long.

But neither its sharp teeth nor its armor-thick hide could stop the qi in my knife-hand.

The enormous crocodile looked like something from a documentary about the Amazon. It split in half and fell onto the blackened water.

Splash!

The fishy smell of blood and an even fouler stench rose from it, but I only felt sick for a moment. I was holding up much better than I'd expected.

Then again, I'd been covered for some time in slime and blood that smelled worse than sewage.

This isn't exactly fighting fire with fire.

Nanman Life Pro Tip: If you're worried about a bad smell, get used to an even worse one.

"…Fuck."

I had a brief moment of clarity, but the Poisonblood Grounds—shittier than working two shifts loading and unloading trucks—wouldn't even allow me that much.

Swish!

A snake hidden in the swamp shot toward my neck like an arrow.

The moment it bared its black, razor-sharp fangs and opened its jaws wide toward my thigh—

Whack!

Fingers as thick as the branches of a great tree blew its triangular head away.

No question it was dead. The Beast Miao King caught its limp tail, slammed it into the swamp, and spoke with a grave expression.

"Dohn' led yer gar' down."

"Don't let my what?"

[2825] A zhang is ten cheok, approximately 3.03 m or 9.94 ft.

"Be gareful."

"...Ah. Right."

Roughly translated: Don't let your guard down. Be careful. Something like that.

Nanman's greatest warrior, now over eighty years old, was speaking less clearly than an eight-year-old because his mouth was stuffed with the poison-warding pearl.

"Almos' dere."

That pronunciation sounded awfully familiar.

I wanted to ask if he was from somewhere around Gyeongsang-do, but I held back. This was hardly the time, and just as the Beast Miao King had said, the swamp really was coming to an end.

That didn't mean things had gotten any better.

Open Quest Window.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Quest

My Good Sir, Do Not Cross That Swamp

You have entered the Poisonblood Grounds.
Deep within Ailao Mountain, once the headquarters of the Five Poisons Sect, lies this most secluded and secret place. It is home to life-forms unknown and undiscovered.
A cursed land filled with poison-laden mist and the spirits of countless dead.
No one can tell you what awaits beyond it. You have no choice but to see for yourself.

Grade: Supreme Peak
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Mission: ???
Reward: ???
Failure: Death

"..."

No matter how many times I looked at it, this was ridiculous.

It had been a while since I'd seen a Quest window this short. The mission and reward were a mystery, but one thing was clear: fail and you die.

Then again, it had always worked like that. In the modern world's Gates and here in Murim alike.

Win and live. Lose and die.

Simple, brutal logic.

Hunters and Murim practitioners alike were people who always lived with one foot in the Sanzu River.[2826]

And just as I had every other time, I had no intention of dying now.

Splash.

When the swamp ended, relatively soft ground appeared. Every time the foul-smelling slime fell to the ground in the wake of my and the Beast Miao King's footsteps, I could see the already blackish earth around us becoming even darker.

"Vile."

The Beast Miao King spat out the poison-warding pearl and continued as he looked around.

"This is only the second time in my life I've seen a place this horrible."

"What was the first?"

"The Great Faction War. Everywhere we went, there was a hellscape."

He was comparing the Poisonblood Grounds to a war in which hundreds of thousands had slaughtered one another. That said enough about this place.

Fwoooosh.

Poison Mist rolled toward us over the blackened earth. The Beast Miao King swallowed a groan at the grim sight.

"Damn it. If I'd known this would happen, I'd have trained in poison arts when I was young."

"You didn't know. Isn't that why you never learned them?"

The Beast Miao King nodded regretfully.

"Yes. I thought my own martial arts were enough. It's why I never learned the beast-taming techniques everyone else studied, either."

"That makes sense. Why learn something you don't need?"

I suddenly felt a strange sense of kinship.

In the modern world, people gave up on math or English. In Nanman, they gave up on poison arts or beast taming. For the record, I'd given up on every subject when I took the college entrance exam.

"Come to think of it, I thought everyone in Nanman learned poison arts."

"If they did, wouldn't this be the Nanman Poison Palace instead of the Nanman Beast Palace?"

"…Oh."

"That is a prejudice held by people from the Central Plains. It is true that the nature of Nanman's land means we encounter poison easily, but most tribes primarily deal with ferocious beasts. After the Five Poisons Sect rose to power, we rejected poison even more strongly. You can tell just by looking at the divine artifact passed down through our Palace for generations."

[2826] The Sanzu River is a Buddhist river associated with the boundary between life and death.

“Oh, I see… Wait.”

What did he just say?

I stopped for a moment and stared at the Beast Miao King. He frowned and looked back at me.

“What?”

“What you just said.”

“That we came to reject poison arts? After the harm this Palace suffered, it was only natural.”

“Not that. The divine artifact. You said there was a divine artifact.”

“Ah. That. I thought you meant something else.”

The Beast Miao King answered as if it were nothing, but from my perspective, it wasn’t something I could simply brush off with an Oh, I see.

“The Nanman Beast Palace had a divine artifact?”

“Any faction with a long history is bound to have one. From what I have seen, that is even truer in the Central Plains.”

He wasn’t wrong. Mid-sized sects and even neighborhood martial arts schools would hang an old iron sword on the wall, call it a divine artifact, and hope it made them look important.

But some objects truly deserved the name.

The Green Jade Buddha Staff was one: the divine artifact of Shaolin Temple, the Mount Tai and Northern Dipper of the Murim, whose lineage stretched back a thousand years.

And for some reason, Dark Heaven was targeting those very divine artifacts.

They had even caused the major incident known as the Shaolin Bloodshed to do so.

And the Nanman Beast Palace had one too?

As far as I knew, the Palace was more than three hundred years old.

An Outer Lands power formed by an alliance of dozens of tribes, it had arisen in the struggle against the Five Poisons Sect and, after a long war, become the dominant force in Nanman.

It wouldn’t be strange for it to have a divine artifact. What mattered was that this was the first I’d heard of it.

“I’ve never heard that the Nanman Beast Palace had a divine artifact.”

I did my best to sound calm. The Beast Miao King nodded.

“Of course not. It disappeared not long after the Palace was founded.”

“What?”

“Then again, it may never have existed. The Beast King Stone has been passed down from Palace Lord to Palace Lord as a legend. No one can even say for certain it was real.”

"The Beast King Stone…"

Its name alone was extraordinary. The Beast Miao King nodded at my quiet murmur and continued.

"As I said, it is a legend. A divine artifact carried by the first Palace Lord, said to make every ferocious beast under heaven obey him. It supposedly vanished after he and the founding Sect Leader of the Five Poisons Sect grievously wounded each other in battle."

A stone with the miraculous power to command every ferocious beast under heaven. That was a legend if I'd ever heard one.

And one passed down by word of mouth for hundreds of years, at that.

If I started working on it right now, then in a few hundred years, I could insist that I had been born from an egg.

Still, I should keep the Beast King Stone in mind…

For now, though, it was far more plausible that the Southern Heaven Demon Empress meant to create a "rift" in Nanman than that she was after a legendary stone no one could even prove existed.

"By the way…"

"Yes?"

The Beast Miao King glanced between me and the Poison Mist, then hesitated.

"That. Do you have another one?"

By that, he meant the Myriad-Poison Ring.

I gave him a firm answer.

"No."

"Then let me borrow it for a moment—"

"Hey, Mr. Yayul. Cut the nonsense and put the poison-warding pearl back in your mouth."

"…What did you just say?"

"Ah. My tongue slipped for a moment. If you don't want to get poisoned, keep the poison-warding pearl in your mouth."

The Beast Miao King shot me a displeased look, but then put the large poison-warding pearl in his mouth without another word.

He might have held the lowest seat among the Ten Kings, but he was still a master worthy of belonging to them.

With martial prowess that had reached such a lofty realm and a vast reserve of internal energy, poison was unlikely to overcome him easily. Even so, a little precaution never hurt.

A High-Grade Poison-Warding Pearl should keep most ordinary poisons from penetrating.

And I had the Myriad-Poison Ring, a divine artifact of the Sichuan Tang Clan.

The Beast Miao King looked at me enviously before stepping into the Poison Mist.

Step.

His footfall sounded unusually loud.

Deep green mist covered everything, so thick I could barely see in front of me. The silence was just as strange.

As if something is watching its prey.

I could feel something watching us through the dense Poison Mist. Why, then, was it quieter here than in the swamp?

I wasn't the only one who noticed.

—A small patch of grass ten or so zhang[2827] away. Northwest. Do you sense it?

A Sound Transmission reached my ear. I gave a small nod.

—The grass beside the rock?

—Yes. Something is there. Could it be…

I thought of Ailao Mountain's Wraith. The ghostlike presence I had felt from it, and its ray-like movements.

—It isn't the wraith. Even if it were, we couldn't catch it from this distance.

—That depends on how we go about it.

The Beast Miao King thrust out a palm like lightning.

Boom!

Compressed air burst outward, scattering the thick mist for an instant.

Through the brief opening, I saw his powerful palm force sweep over the grass like a storm.

And then…

"Guh!"

There was a scream. Not the cry of a beast, but unmistakably the scream of a human.

"…!"

"…!"

The Beast Miao King and I stared at each other, eyes wide, then shot toward the source of the cry like lightning.

Whoooosh!

Countless thoughts flashed through my mind as I cut through the mist.

But the first two words that came to me were Dark Heaven.

It's them.

Who else would be in Ailao Mountain, Nanman's forbidden land—let alone here in the Poisonblood Grounds?

[2827] A zhang is ten cheok, approximately 3.03 m or 9.94 ft.

A jolt ran through my entire body. My heart pounding, I closed the distance of ten or so zhang[2828] in an instant.

Then I saw who had been flung out of the grass, and the words escaped me.

“What the hell…?”

Dark red blood stained the corner of his mouth. His eyes were wide open.

There was no doubt that he was a human corpse, but he was wearing clothing that was painfully familiar to both me and someone else.

“…Why is a Bai warrior here?”

The confusion in the Beast Miao King’s hollow voice matched my own. The man who had been alive only moments ago was a Bai warrior.

His body, dressed in white garments like a burial shroud, was tightly wrapped in something sticky and tough.

Rope. No, thread?

The Beast Miao King and I stared, unable to make sense of it.

That was when—

Rustle. Rustle-rustle.

When had they gotten there? Where had they been hiding?

Along with the countless presences approaching from every direction, I suddenly felt darkness settle over my head. I looked up.

At last, I saw them.

Hissss!

Some beings descended like ghosts from a tree so enormous that it was impossible to guess its age.

They had black bodies, countless legs, and stiff hair covering them. The Beast Miao King discovered them and muttered like he was groaning.

“…Thousand-Year Spider.”

The monster of the Poisonblood Grounds had appeared.

[2828] A zhang is ten cheok, approximately 3.03 m or 9.94 ft.

Chapter 638

Spiders?

I'd seen more than enough of them in my life. Hope Goshiwon[2829] had survived the war-torn Great Cataclysm, and all kinds of bugs had infested the place. Spiders were among its most regular guests.

Jinho hyung[2830] once said, "Could the landlord of this building be Fabre, by any chance?"

There were enough insects in that building to make you believe an entomologist who'd been dead for nearly two hundred years had come back to life.

But someone once said humans were creatures of adaptation.

At first, I couldn't stand the spiders appearing at all hours. Before a year had passed, I'd grown used to them. A few years later, I could even tell one species from another.

"Hyung[2831], say hello. This one's a ghost spider. The one next to it is a Joro spider."

"Forget saying hello. I get it, so move them away from me."

"And this one's a Brazilian wandering spider."

"I said move it—wait, why the hell is a Brazilian wandering spider wandering around Hope Goshiwon[2832]? How does that make any sense?"

"Why wouldn't it? I fought a goblin yesterday."

"Ah."

"And this one's a tarantula. Must be new here."

"Is this a nightmare? Why on earth is there a tarantula…?"

What a mysterious goshiwon[2833] ecosystem. I'd spent the flower of my youth there among countless spiders. Eventually, we'd been practically neighbors.

But I could say one thing for certain: I'd never seen a spider as hideous or enormous as the one that had just appeared before me.

"…Thousand-Year Spider?"

I'd never heard the name the Beast Miao King had just uttered. And the creature itself was on another level from a tarantula or a Brazilian wandering spider.

What the hell is that…?

If someone asked whether I'd ever seen a spider bigger than a bear, I'd nod without hesitation.

[2829] A goshiwon is an inexpensive Korean housing arrangement consisting of very small rooms with shared facilities.

[2830] Hyung is a Korean form of address a man uses for an older brother or an older male friend.

[2831] Hyung is a Korean form of address a man uses for an older brother or an older male friend.

[2832] A goshiwon is an inexpensive Korean housing arrangement consisting of very small rooms with shared facilities.

[2833] A goshiwon is an inexpensive Korean housing arrangement consisting of very small rooms with shared facilities.

I was looking at one with my own two eyes.

Five of them, in fact.

Skritch, skritch!

Their movements were ghostlike. Every time their eight stiff, hair-covered legs moved, their enormous bodies slid along the trunks of the great trees.

The moment our rapidly approaching figures appeared in the monsters' eyes, large and small, the Beast Miao King shouted like a thunderclap.

"They're coming!"

And then—

Shhhhhaaa!

Pale, viscous slime poured down from above, covering a radius of ten or so zhang.[2834]

Thanks to the Beast Miao King's warning, I barely escaped the attack's range. I stared at the sight before me, eyes wide.

Hissss!

The ground, the rocks, the grass—even the unidentified Bai warrior's corpse we'd had to leave behind.

Everything the slime touched was melting with a foul stench, as though someone had poured acid over it.

Acid?

If I hadn't dodged without knowing what it was, or if even a little had touched me, the slime might have melted part of my body on the spot.

Just looking at it sent a chill down my spine. But I couldn't afford to stand there in shock.

Skritch, skritch!

Among the thick grass. Beyond the dense mist. On the great tree that blotted out the sky.

Five venomous spiders, each bigger than a bear and hideous beyond description, were closing in from every direction.

"…Are they surrounding us?"

The Beast Miao King raised his internal energy as he answered my incredulous mutter.

"Among the countless venomous beasts of Nanman, the Thousand-Year Spider is called a king. More than being ferocious, it is a cunning creature. There is even a record of a thousand warriors once trying to exterminate one, only for it to kill half of them over ten days and nights before vanishing."

"All that, from a spider? No, wait. If they've been around for a thousand years, I guess that makes sense."

[2834] In this Chinese setting, one zhang is a traditional unit of length of about 3.33 m (10.9 ft).

“They are called Thousand-Year Spiders because they can live that long. No one knows how old these particular creatures are. This may be the first time several have appeared at once, too.”

Nanman was home to countless venomous beasts, and five of the monsters called kings had appeared at once.

I looked at the slime that was still melting everything around us and muttered inwardly.

Damn it. We walked right into this.

I thought I understood why we hadn’t found the rest of the Nanman warriors’ bodies—or any sign of the beasts they’d commanded.

After filling their bellies to some degree through hunting, they must have carried the corpses deeper into the Poisonblood Grounds to stockpile food.

Wrapped tight in webs, like that Bai warrior.

They were certainly planning to hunt us the same way.

But…

That’s what you think.

As the creatures closed in with a skin-crawling rustle, I stretched my empty hand into the air.

Open Inventory. Summon.

Ding.

At my command, the boundless warehouse opened its doors. Of all the weapons I’d collected for emergencies, one spear radiating pure white light settled into my hand.

“Did I just see something wrong…?”

“You did. It’s a three-section folding spear, so I usually keep it in my sleeve.”

Leaving the Beast Miao King staring in disbelief, I sent internal energy into White Flame’s lowered spearhead.

Fwoooosh.

Flames of tangible qi bloomed over its edge, which radiated a chilling sharpness.

As the blue flames kindled by Scorching Yang Qi flickered, the dense Poison Mist surrounding us and the five Thousand-Year Spiders that had marked out positions around us and were slowly tightening their noose both flinched as though they had been burned.

Hissss.

Their cries and movements had turned wary. Their beetle-black eyes, some large and some small, darted in every direction.

But it was too late to retreat.

For them. For us.

The die had been cast. One side would live, and the other would die.

And today, we wouldn't be the ones getting hunted.

"What are you waiting for?" I leveled the blue-flamed spearhead at them. "Get over here already."

That was the signal.

Shhhhhaaa!

Pale slime came pouring at us from the front, the back, both sides, and overhead. The Beast Miao King and I shot forward to meet it.

Whoooosh!

Wind rushed over my body. The poison that had seeped in through my skin and airways ebbed away, while the flames surging around the silver spearhead burned higher.

Now.

Fwoosh! Kwoooong!

One swing.

I swept the spear around me in a single horizontal strike, and the slime pouring in from every direction evaporated as it met the flames.

And before that, the Beast Miao King's fist had already shot through the air.

Boom! Hissss!

The slime burst outward with a tremendous explosion, raining acid over several dozen zhang.[2835]

But neither of us had lost so much as a hair. We pressed on, leaving everything that was melting behind us.

Whoooosh!

The Beast Miao King went for the Thousand-Year Spider blocking the way ahead. I went for another clinging to the great tree above.

We hadn't made a plan, but one glance in passing was enough to tell us what the other intended.

Grab.

Just as I kicked off into the air, a large palm caught the tip of my foot.

Muscles that belied the Beast Miao King's eighty-plus years rippled through his arm. With a thunderous shout, he drove my foot upward with the force of a shot put.

"Go!"

Whoooosh!

Weightlessness swept through me.

[2835] In this Chinese setting, one zhang is a traditional unit of length of about 3.33 m (10.9 ft).

I hurtled upward, faster and harder than I could have managed with ordinary Stepping on Empty Air. In an instant, I was right in front of the eight-legged monster's face.

—…!

A multitude of emotions could be read in its many eyes, both large and small.

The Thousand-Year Spider looked almost human in its shock as I brought the spearhead down.

Swish! Slash!

A streak of flame cut through the air. Sticky blood sprayed.

The spider sacrificed three of its eight legs, each harder than steel, to survive the blow. It hastily spat slime at me.

Splatter! Hissss!

My quick movements and the Scorching Yang Qi that countered its poison helped me avoid the spray, but I'd been too close. Even what brushed my skin and clothes brought a searing pain.

Rather than groan, I drove my spear into its enormous body as it tried to escape.

Crack! Thrust!

Unlike insects, spiders are arthropods with thin exoskeletons. Their bodies aren't especially hard.

Even a Thousand-Year Spider, king of the venomous beasts, couldn't withstand Force.

"Fuck, you think I've only killed one or two spiders? If you'd lived in Hope Goshiwon[2836], your whole extended family—in-laws and eighth cousins included—would've died by my hand."

—Kiiiiiieet!

Its enormous body writhed as it shrieked.

I dodged another blast of slime, then caught the leg sweeping toward my side and tore it off with my bare hand.

Crack!

—Kieeeet!

Once, maybe. I wasn't getting caught by the same move twice.

The Thousand-Year Spider was convulsing now, not merely struggling. I drove the spearhead into its head.

Thrust!

Its flailing legs went limp. Its enormous body stiffened.

A notification sounded, confirming what I'd suspected.

Ding.

[2836] A goshiwon is an inexpensive Korean housing arrangement consisting of very small rooms with shared facilities.

SYSTEM

- Defeated Lv. 117 Thousand-Year Spider!
- Gained a substantial amount of EXP and Fame!
- The Thousand-Year Spider is a special existence among the countless venomous beasts. An additional Reward will be granted!
- Achieved the rare Achievement Indiscriminate Hunting Bug!
- When facing insect-form enemies in the future, you will gain additional stats!

The System notifications poured in as though they'd been waiting. But I had no time to read every line of the holographic window.

Below the great tree I stood on, the Beast Miao King was fighting for his life against several spiders at once.

Hissss!

"You bastards! Even tearing you to pieces wouldn't be enough! How dare you do this to my hair!"

"…"

His hair. He was worried about his hair at a time like this.

Half his clothes had melted away, exposing patches of skin, and the slime had eaten through almost all of his once-thick hair.

Even so, true to his title as one of the Ten Kings, he had already killed one and was fighting three at once.

Wham!

Correction. Two.

The moment the Beast Miao King's fist, thrown with a savage aura, smashed one of the Thousand-Year Spiders apart, I kicked off the great tree and plunged toward the ground like a bolt of lightning.

Whooosh! Crack!

My spearhead sank into a Thousand-Year Spider's body as though it were tofu. Then the powerful Scorching Yang Qi I'd drawn from my dantian surged inside it.

Fwoosh. Boom!

Its enormous body exploded into pieces. A torrent of bodily fluid sprayed out and evaporated. Only a new System notification remained above the unrecognizable corpse.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Defeated Lv. 109 Thousand-Year Spider!
Gained a substantial amount of EXP and Fame!
You have gained bonus EXP for defeating another extremely rare creature!
Level Up!

Fwoooosh.

Invisible healing light swept through me.

The skin melted by the slime and the internal energy I had expended were restored, while the flames on the spearhead, which had been slowly dying down, suddenly blazed as fiercely as though they had never weakened.

Fwoosh.

—Sssssss…

The last Thousand-Year Spider stared fearfully at the blue flames in the darkness. Then it fled.

Pat-pat-pat!

All eight legs kicked off the ground at once. Its huge body leaped into the air, stepped on something invisible, and settled lightly onto it.

That was when I caught sight of something glinting beyond the flames lighting up the darkness.

A spiderweb?

The thought flashed through my mind as the Beast Miao King and I raced after the fleeing spider.

Chapter 639

When I thought about it, it made sense.

No matter how extraordinary a venomous beast a Thousand-Year Spider was, it was still a spider. Webs covered the Poisonblood Grounds, which might as well have been its home. The last survivor of the five Thousand-Year Spider siblings had lost all will to fight and was fleeing along them.

What I hadn't expected was…

Thump! Shhhhk!

…how fast that enormous spider could run.

…What the hell? How is it that fast?

Maybe it was moving so quickly because it was fleeing for its life. Or maybe it had laid webs everywhere for just such an emergency. Either way, we could barely close the distance. It raced between the great trees and the open air dozens of zhang[2837] above us, with no obvious way for us to catch it.

No wonder Spider-Man's so fast…

I was using my movement technique when an inexplicable chill swept through me. I ducked on instinct.

Slice!

With a sharp cutting sound, a handful of hair drifted through the air. A web had narrowly missed my head. Tough and elastic as steel wire, it had become razor-sharp at that speed.

"Great Hero Yayul!"

I shouted a warning as soon as I realized what had happened, but the Beast Miao King was bigger than me and moved more roughly. He reacted a little too late.

Slice!

What was that, a razor commercial?

The top of his head had been shaved clean instead of his flesh and bone. He answered me with a look of utter misery.

"…Why did you call me?"

"…No reason. Just felt like it."

The thick hair that had streamed behind him like a lion's mane was gone. Between the Thousand-Year Spiders' barrages of acid-laden phlegm and this web, the crown of his head had been stripped bare. It gleamed like an octopus that had just come ashore.

Is this a battle between Doctor Octopus and Spider-Man?

The good and evil sides seemed to be reversed, but still. Watching a superhero movie play out right in front of me made my heart swell.

[2837] A zhang is a traditional Chinese measure of length, approximately 3.03 meters (9.94 ft).

The Octopus Miao King, whose hair was looking considerably less impressive, was not enjoying himself. His fury reached the heavens.

“You bastard! How dare you!”

His hair wasn’t the only reason, of course. The warriors might have belonged to different tribes, but hundreds of them—people who were practically his own—had died overnight. Savage energy spilled from his bloodshot eyes.

Kra-boom!

The Beast Miao King stamped his foot. The ground, sodden with poison and moisture, caved in beneath him like a sinkhole. Using the tremendous force of the rebound, he leaped high and threw a punch.

Whoooom! Bang!

Compressed air burst outward. The wind rippled.

Fist Energy tore through the air, severing webs hidden in the darkness as it shot toward the Thousand-Year Spider.

Shreeeek! Shhk!

But the blow missed. The spider narrowly escaped death and let out a chilling cry.

—Sssssisssss!

It was no ordinary cry. The strange noise burrowed into my ears like Sound Transmission and spread through the air. My sharpened senses picked up movement everywhere.

This is…

Rustle.

Amid the Poison Mist that had turned the Poisonblood Grounds into a land of death, the blackened grass stirred. Things emerged from between ancient trees, and I remembered a phrase I had briefly forgotten.

King of the venomous beasts.

It described the Thousand-Year Spider perfectly.

Venomous beasts had been crouching throughout the Poisonblood Grounds, waiting for orders. Now they answered their king’s call, gathering in a vast army that blocked our way.

Slither. Ssssss!

Snakes and centipedes as long and enormous as whips. Spiders and toads the size of human heads. Hundreds of bees pouring out from somewhere among the leaves of the great trees.

Hideous venomous beasts of kinds I couldn’t identify—and didn’t want to—converged. In the blink of an eye, dozens became hundreds, and hundreds became thousands. Together, they formed a wall.

Kraaaaa!

They blocked the only path through the Poisonblood Grounds, then surged toward us in a massive triangular wave.

Above them, the Thousand-Year Spider stood on a web much lower than before and looked down at us. It had stopped running. Now it gazed down like a king.

“Fucking bastard,” I muttered. “Now you want to look cool?”

This must have been its plan from the start.

Nanman really was a goddamn place. Why were its beasts and spiders so cunning?

I had entered the Poisonblood Grounds following the Black Tiger known as Ailao Mountain’s Wraith. The Thousand-Year Spider we encountered there had finally summoned all its guards once it reached a battlefield favorable to itself.

Judging by everything I had seen firsthand, its intelligence was in no way inferior to an ordinary human’s.

Compared to a certain glutton, it’s Einstein.

Taishan came to mind. I turned to the Beast Miao King.

Even he, after a lifetime in Nanman, seemed never to have seen anything like this. He let out a low groan. When our eyes met, his expression hardened.

“There’s no need to be afraid. Neither of us will die here.”

Afraid?

I gave a quiet laugh instead of answering. I couldn’t think of a word that was at once so close to me and so far away.

I’d always thought of myself as a coward, yet I’d never once backed down when faced with death.

At first, I became a Hunter because I wasn’t afraid. Later, I learned martial arts because I was.

Strange. I fought with everything I had because I was afraid of dying, but I kept walking into battlefields where I could die at any moment.

Still… today, at least, I didn’t think I would die.

Kraaaaaaaaa!

I watched the wave of venomous beasts roll closer, then spoke.

“When those things are gone, kill it immediately. No—just hurt it enough to leave it barely breathing.”

“What?”

“Remember, you can’t hesitate. We have to get it now, while it’s let its guard down and come lower.”

“What are you—”

Now.

Instead of answering, I stepped lightly against the ground. Internal energy was already surging from my dantian toward my toes.

Slither. Boom!

Compression. Then explosion.

The internal energy that burst from a single point—the tip of my toe—gave my entire body the speed of a beam of light. At the same time, a fierce gale wrapped around me and scattered the deep green Poison Mist.

Beyond it waited a colossal wall of thousands of venomous beasts.

Kraaaaaa!

A thick shadow fell over my head. The already dark Poisonblood Grounds plunged into complete darkness.

Then brilliant light burst from the blade of White Flame, the spear in my hand.

Vooooom.

With a hum like a swarm of bees, flames bluer than the sky took hold. Three jiazi's[2838] worth of powerful Scorching Yang Qi drew together, linked and coalesced into a still greater hellfire.

And at the end of it all—

One Annihilation.

Ruuuumble!

A flash tore through the darkness. A roar shook earth and sky.

Since childhood, Beast Miao King Yayul Cheok had thought of himself as a wild man.

He was rough and unrefined, with no use for etiquette or elegant manners. But perhaps it was true that a position shaped the person.

As the years went by, he found himself responsible for leading others. People began following him, though he couldn't see what there was in him worth following. Eventually he became Great Chieftain of the Bai people. Then one day he looked around and found himself Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace.

How did that happen?

He had no idea. All he'd done his entire life was train in martial arts.

But the water had been spilled long ago. There was no turning back and no gathering it up again, so he did his best to fulfill his duties as Palace Lord.

He stopped beating people up. He even cut back on the swearing that had once come as naturally as breathing.

Slapping a tribal chieftain who couldn't understand a damn thing he was told might bring him peace of mind. But if he slapped the man hard enough to deafen him permanently, that chieftain would rebel against the Nanman Beast Palace.

[2838] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; three jiazi are 180 years.

Years as Palace Lord had made the Beast Miao King much tamer. Even so, at the sight before him, his lips began moving of their own accord.

"Uh… what the fuck is that? Uh…"

Ruuuumble!

Everything broke apart and melted.

The wave of thousands of venomous beasts was shattering before his eyes.

The two-headed horn snakes that hunted bears whenever they grew bored. The black frogs whose poison could kill a hundred bulls with a single drop. The golden bees said to strip a tiger to its bones in half a gak.[2839]

Fwoosh! Kraaaaaa!

Thousands of venomous beasts, every bit as powerful as they were hideous, turned to ash in the blue flames and the thunderous roar that lit the darkness.

…This is insane.

Not since the Great Faction War, more than fifty years ago, had he seen anything so astonishing.

Even the final ultimate technique unleashed by the Demonic Cult's Sword Demon just before his death could not compare with the sight before him. And even Fire King Jeok Cheongang, who had easily dodged the Sword Demon's final strike and methodically trampled him until he was on the verge of death, had never displayed this level of destructive power.

Nor, of course, had the man thinking it. Not even Beast Miao King Yayul Cheok himself.

How is this possible?

Unable to hide his shock and confusion, the Beast Miao King stared at the back of the young man standing tall before the blazing hellfire.

Then a single sentence suddenly flashed through his mind.

When those things are gone, kill it immediately. No—just hurt it enough to leave it barely breathing.

"…!"

At first, he had wondered what kind of nonsense the young man was spouting. Now that nonsense had become reality.

The Beast Miao King knew what he had to do.

Boom!

He shot toward the sky with a thunderous roar. He was half a beat late, but so was the Thousand-Year Spider, caught in a situation it could never have predicted.

—S-Siss?

Its many eyes, large and small, darted in different directions. The moment they found the Beast Miao King, they froze.

[2839] A gak is a traditional unit of time, roughly seven and a half minutes.

His few remaining hairs streamed behind him as he flew upward. A cold smile touched his lips.

“I’ve finally caught you. You piece of shit. I’ll tear you apart.”

—…!

The Thousand-Year Spider had made two fatal mistakes.

First, it had underestimated the young human’s strength.

Second, it had killed the old human’s tribespeople and shaved off the thick hair he had always been proud of.

Splaaash!

Its last desperate spray of slime cut through empty air. The Beast Miao King caught one of its legs.

Crack!

—Siiiiiiit!

The leg tore free. Screaming in pain, the Thousand-Year Spider plummeted toward the ground.

Chapter 640

One Annihilation was a technique that didn't merely destroy its target. It erased it.

It drew out all my power in an instant, producing several times my usual strength. The greater my martial attainment, the more powerful One Annihilation became.

But it had one fatal drawback…

Beep. Beep. Beep-beep-beep!

SYSTEM

You have exhausted all your power!
Warning! Warning! The effects of overusing your abilities will rebound on you in full!
Status abnormality Internal Injury applied!
Status abnormality Exhaustion applied!
Status abnormality Anemia applied!
Status abnormality Paralyzed applied!
Due to the stacked status abnormalities, all stats temporarily decrease by 100!

As One Annihilation grew more powerful, its aftereffects grew more severe.

…Ah. Damn it.

My entire body trembled as though I'd been electrocuted. My once-clear vision blurred like a screen full of static.

Turning thousands of venomous beasts to ash had come at a steep price.

Still, I thought I'd at least level up once.

The higher my Level rose, the less EXP I gained.

Back when I had been a low-level nobody who could barely stand up to a single Peak Master, leveling up could cover for that weakness to some extent. But now that my vessel had grown larger, I needed far more EXP to fill it, and even leveling up had become difficult.

"…Hng."

Internal Injury and Exhaustion weren't enough. I had Anemia and paralysis, too. It was a miracle I hadn't passed out.

I staggered, my vision swimming, and barely managed to drive White Flame into the ground.

Thud!

Leaning on my spear in this sorry state, I wished Jeok Cheongang had taught me the Dance of the Fire God and Demon. Not that there was any point begging him. I knew what he'd say.

The Dance of the Fire God and Demon? Is dying young your life's ambition?

He said it was too dangerous, but really, the difference would be no greater than the one between a pistol and an automatic rifle.

To be honest, at this rate, I felt like I might die far from home using One Annihilation before then.

Not that I had the slightest intention of dying in a horrible place like this.

That's why I took out insurance.

Just as I thought that, the insurance agent noticed his client's accident and dropped out of the sky.

Whoooosh. Boom!

The heavily built old man landed on the Thousand-Year Spider, using its enormous, barely living, convulsing body as a cushion.

The Beast Miao King, his face flushed, spread both arms toward me.

"Uh, that's really crossing the line—"

Grab! Crack!

"What an incredible bastard!"

"Argh! Aaaagh!"

"How did you do that? Was it the Fire Gate Clan's unique martial art? Or the final ultimate technique Old Man Jeok learned?"

Whap! Whap!

"Uuuugh!"

"What a monster! I couldn't believe it even while watching!"

"Aaaaaagh! You crazy bastard!"

"What? Crazy bastard? Yes! That's exactly what you are—a madman born of the Central Plains!"

I nearly died far from home. I wasn't joking.

When the madman born of Nanman finally let go of me, a mournful notification sounded in my ear.

Beep.

SYSTEM

Status abnormality Mild Ligament Tear applied!
Strength decreases by 20 until recovery!
Agility decreases by 20 until recovery!

"…"

This was why Doctor Octopus[2840] was a villain.

[2840] Doctor Octopus is a Marvel Comics villain known for his mechanical tentacle arms.

I didn't have the strength to say anything else. Gasping through the pain, I glared at the Beast Miao King and barely managed to speak.

"Spider. Spider."

"Spider? Oh, the Thousand-Year Spider?"

"Quick. Hurry."

At my pitiful gestures, the Beast Miao King nodded in admiration.

"I wondered if that was what you meant, but are you planning to use the Thousand-Year Spider to figure out the Poisonblood Grounds? You really are something."

"Ah, please."

"Ha, all right. Just as you asked, I brought it here alive and unharmed—"

Before he could spout any more nonsense, I squeezed out what little strength I had left.

"Gnnngh!"

I wrenched White Flame free and drove it straight into the Thousand-Year Spider's head, like a patient collecting a random insurance payout.

Thud!

—Ssssit! Kieeeek!

The monster gave a brief death cry. Then heavenly bells rang from somewhere.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

SYSTEM

You defeated Level 119 Thousand-Year Spider!
Additional EXP has been awarded for defeating a rare entity!
Level Up!
The damaged body has been substantially restored!
All status abnormalities have been removed!
Warning! Your physical condition is not yet perfect! A little treatment and rest are required!

Ah, this was why I took out insurance.

If the EXP from one venomous beast was an ant's tear, the Thousand-Year Spider was a downpour from heaven.

Add its EXP to what I'd earned killing thousands of venomous beasts at once, and life immediately surged back into my dying body.

"Buuuurp."

Last hit. Sweet.

As the ancient sages said, one Level Up made the five loaves and two fish[2841] look like nothing.

I couldn't tell you which sage said it, but someone did. It was true, too.

Whew. I almost died.

Having barely made it back from the nursing home's doorstep, I rubbed my stomach, feeling a satisfying fullness spread through my body.

Then I looked up and met the eyes of someone staring at me with a distinctly unimpressed expression.

"Why?"

"…"

"What is it?"

"…"

After a moment, the Beast Miao King spoke, his expression gone cold.

"Why did you tell me to keep it alive if you were going to do that?"

Why else? To get the EXP, obviously.

But years of working for a shitty small Guild had given me something I had never possessed before: social awareness and people skills.

I answered with a mournful, rigid expression.

"I wanted to take revenge with my own hands."

"What?"

"For the Nanman warriors who died at the hands… no, the slime and webs of those bastards. Tearing them apart wouldn't have been enough."

"…!"

The Beast Miao King's eyes widened, emotion stirring in them. He stared at me, his gaze trembling, then spoke in a choked voice.

"I… don't know what to say."

"Shh. Don't say anything. I already know."

"You… you little bastard!"

What a romantic moment… Like hell. Fuck off. I was going to gag.

But one thing was certain: the Beast Miao King couldn't hide how moved he was.

Well, the result's good. That's what matters, right?

I didn't need to feel guilty. I genuinely mourned the Nanman warriors, and I genuinely needed the EXP to recover.

More importantly, my quick excuse had made things better.

If word of this gets around Nanman, maybe the odds of the Nanman Beast Palace joining the Murim Alliance will go up ten percent.

[2841] The five loaves and two fish refer to a biblical account in which a small amount of food feeds a multitude.

Even so, a weight remained in my chest.

I felt guilty because I hadn't been able to prevent hundreds of people from being massacred less than two shichen[2842] away.

…Damn it.

A bitter taste filled my mouth.

Even now, countless people were probably dying across both the modern world and Murim. Some in traffic accidents. Some at the hands of monsters.

A martial artist might get into a quarrel at an inn, draw a sword, and die on the spot. Somewhere, a nameless hero might lose their life fighting an evildoer.

I knew I couldn't save them all.

But I was human, and I hated seeing other people die.

And I felt regret, too. Regret that if I had been there, perhaps I could have saved innocent people.

Great power comes with great responsibility.

At some point, that line from a superhero movie had become a boulder weighing on my body and mind.

It weighed on me even while I circulated my qi, when I needed to give it my full concentration.

Maybe this is a Heart Demon,[2843] too.

I sighed softly, shook my head, and started walking again, leaving the Thousand-Year Spider's corpse behind.

We headed deeper into the hidden reaches of the Poisonblood Grounds.

Splash. Splash.

The Beast Miao King and I watched our steps more carefully now. Killing five Thousand-Year Spiders and an enormous number of venomous beasts had left the area quiet, but it was too soon to let our guard down.

That bastard is the biggest problem of all.

Ailao Mountain's Wraith.

The Black Tiger fit the name the System had given it perfectly. It was the one thing we had to watch for above all else.

Its enormous body moved like the wind. The powerful, eerie qi I'd sensed from it, however briefly, proved it was far beyond any ordinary spiritual creature or venomous beast.

—Where do you think it is now?

It was useful having someone beside me who was thinking the same thing. I moved my lips in answer to the Beast Miao King's Sound Transmission.

[2842] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours; two shichen are about four hours.

[2843] In martial-arts fiction, a Heart Demon is a psychological obstacle that can hinder a person's cultivation.

—Who knows? But I'm sure it's still in the Poisonblood Grounds.

—That's what I don't understand. Why lure us all this way and then fail to appear? Fifteen minutes ago, we would have been at a clear disadvantage.

He was right.

Despite their reputation, the five Thousand-Year Spiders had been easier to handle than I'd expected, and so had the thousands of venomous beasts. But if Ailao Mountain's Wraith had joined them, things would have been different.

If it had joined the fight from the beginning, we could probably have put up a decent fight. But if it had appeared right after I used One Annihilation…

Even if we'd done everything right, it would have been a brutal fight.

Its teeth could withstand Force. It was unbelievably fast, and, true to its name, its presence was as impossible to sense as a wraith's.

One of us might have died. Or left a limb behind.

At worst, we'd both be dead.

But why? Why didn't it appear even under those circumstances?

I didn't know. Only two remotely plausible explanations came to mind.

First, a classic island-nation plot twist:[2844]

Heh heh. The Thousand-Year Spider is merely the weakest of our Four Great Venomous Beasts.

And second:

Ailao Mountain's Wraith has no intention of hurting us.

I took a few cautious steps and discarded the second theory. However I looked at it, it seemed too unlikely.

Before I could think any further, the Beast Miao King, who had been following behind and watching our flanks and rear, put his broad hand on my shoulder.

Tap.

Oh, shit.

That scared the hell out of me. My heart nearly fell out of my chest.

I steadied myself and turned to look where his finger was pointing.

Beyond the Poison Mist, growing thicker with every step, and the dark jungle crowding in on all sides, a faint, unfamiliar light shone through.

Could it be?

We didn't need to say anything. My instincts had reached the answer before my thoughts had.

Rustle. Crackle.

We pushed through grass that carried a faint trace of poison and came to the source of the light.

[2844] "Island nation" alludes to Japan; the line parodies a villain-reveal trope in Japanese manga and anime.

At last, we saw what lay before us. Both of us stopped, mouths hanging open.

“This is…!”

A vast swamp lay under the faint moonlight.

Waiting there were countless shapes hanging, each bound tight in transparent spiderwebs—and white eggs.

Chapter 641

Sometimes, the mere sight of something sends a chill down your spine and makes your hair stand on end.

Like everything in front of me now.

Fwoosh.

Faint moonlight spilled through the swaying leaves, as mysterious as a scene from a myth. But it wasn't shining on a peaceful blue lake.

What is this…?

A dark, desolate swamp. Hundreds of large shapes hung there, wrapped in layer upon layer of spiderwebs like silkworm cocoons. Around them were white eggs, smaller but several times more numerous.

What the hell are they?

An ominous question weighed on me, one I felt I shouldn't learn the answer to.

Even so, I'd instinctively reached out. My hand was already touching the nearest cocoon.

Tap.

An unpleasant sensation ran through my fingertip. At the same moment, a System notification sounded in my ear.

Beep. Ding.

SYSTEM

You have been Poisoned by the Thousand-Year Spider's Paralysis Poison!

If you are not detoxified quickly, you may enter Full-Body Paralysis and Unconsciousness!

The potential effect of the Myriad-Poison Ring has been activated!

All status abnormalities related to Poison have been removed!

My fingertip went numb for a moment, then felt cool and clear again.

The Myriad-Poison Ring was a divine artifact capable of absorbing even Formless Ultimate Poison. However unusual a venomous beast the Thousand-Year Spider might be, its poison couldn't harm me.

If this is a Thousand-Year Spider's web…

A possibility struck me. I tightened my grip and tore the webbing apart.

Crack. Riiiip.

Hundreds of layers of webbing gave way under my grip. When the shape concealed inside was revealed, the Beast Miao King, who had been watching from beside me, muttered like he was groaning.

“A person?”

He was right.

The man’s face was as white as paper, and his body lay perfectly still. The Beast Miao King checked the unknown man’s faint pulse and breathed a sigh of relief.

“Thank goodness. He’s still alive.”

I had expected as much. According to what the System had told me earlier, the Thousand-Year Spider’s webs did not contain poison powerful enough to kill their victims.

The reason was probably…

To keep them fresh. So the spiders can eat whenever they want.

Now I understood why the sight of this place had made my hair stand on end.

A slaughterhouse.

Before it was the Thousand-Year Spiders’ home, this swamp was a slaughterhouse and an enormous food store.

Only then did I detect the heavy smell of blood beneath the stench coming from all around us.

“Spider bastards. They’ve sure been stuffing their faces for a long time.”

Hundreds. No, perhaps thousands.

If the Nanman Beast Palace’s records were right and the Five Poisons Sect had created the Poisonblood Grounds, there was no telling how many people had died here over the years.

Ironically, the spiders’ habit meant we could save many of their captives today.

It did seem strange. More warriors had disappeared than died.

About three hundred elite warriors had been stationed at Ailao Mountain. The five Thousand-Year Spiders had killed roughly a hundred on the spot, eaten their fill, then dragged the rest into the Poisonblood Grounds. Before long, they would have eaten those warriors one by one.

Instead, we’d found them.

“Would you look at these goddamn bastards! They deserve to die!”

The Beast Miao King’s eyes were red with fury. I tried to calm him down.

“Uh, sorry to interrupt, but you already killed them.”

“Tearing them to pieces wouldn’t be enough!”

“Uh…”

Well, I couldn’t argue with that. But for now, we needed to deal with the situation, not dwell on our anger.

After calming down a little, the Beast Miao King looked around with a devastated expression.

“To think they dared to do something like this.”

“You said there hadn’t been any major losses before now, didn’t you?”

“It’s true. At least during my time as Palace Lord, we’ve had no trouble like this.”

“Strange, then. Five Thousand-Year Spiders suddenly show up and attack your warriors at a time like this.”

He was silent for a moment at my pointed words. Then he said, “Dark Heaven… Do you think this was their doing?”

I nodded without hesitation.

“I don’t know if they were directly involved, but I’d bet they had a hand in it. There’s nothing strange about Thousand-Year Spiders attacking people. The timing, though? Of course I suspect Dark Heaven.”

“But if they are behind this, they could have waited until after you left. Doing it on the final day of the Tribal Grand Council only hurts their cause.”

“Well…”

My voice trailed off. His point was sharper than I’d expected, and I couldn’t easily dismiss it.

He’s right. If I were the Southern Heaven Demon Empress—that bitch—I wouldn’t have bothered.

Even without any interference, it was practically certain that the Nanman Beast Palace’s entry into the Murim Alliance would fall through. Dark Heaven had no reason to stir up Nanman for nothing.

So why?

Nothing about it made sense. Ailao Mountain’s Wraith had appeared out of nowhere and still hadn’t shown itself. Five Thousand-Year Spiders had suddenly begun a massacre. And there was the question of whether they were connected to Dark Heaven.

I was still frowning over it when the Beast Miao King’s voice brought me back.

“Right now, the problem is moving these people. It’s a blessing they’re alive, but getting them out of the Poisonblood Grounds is another matter.”

I set those thoughts aside. “If you ask me, we should leave the others as they are.”

“Leave them? Here?”

“…Do I look insane? Of course we’re taking them back to the Nanman Beast Palace. I told White Tiger to bring people here, so we should wait for them. Assuming he understood me.”

“You mean Muyaho. He’s cleverer than most people. I’m sure he understood.”

“…”

“What’s that look for?”

"Oh. Nothing."

I nearly burst out laughing.

Muyaho. The more I heard that name, the harder it was to get used to. I managed to straighten my face and went on.

"And we should leave the webs intact."

"Because of the poison."

"Yes."

Getting here had been difficult. Getting back would be far worse. We'd have to take some two hundred patients through the Poison Mist after they woke from several shichen[2845] of full-body paralysis and unconsciousness.

I'm not even sure how much the Myriad-Poison Ring can cover.

The Myriad-Poison Ring certainly possessed mysterious power, but I couldn't put two hundred lives through a fifty-fifty gacha[2846] roll just by trusting in this one item.

They were safer staying wrapped in the webs.

"At least the Poison Mist doesn't seem to affect them in there. Otherwise, they'd have died on the way here."

"True. Perhaps the Thousand-Year Spider's poison in the webs keeps other poisons out."

In a sense, it was poison countering poison. The webs had been coffins on the journey here. Now they could serve as cryogenic capsules, keeping the warriors safe from the Poison Mist.

Besides, even if I unwrapped and detoxified them one at a time, there was only so much I could do. Our conversations would probably go something like this:

All right, patient. Slowly open your eyes. Can you see the fingers I'm waving in front of you? If you can, tell me how many there are.

"Uhh… One. One."

Which finger?

"The middle one."

Right. It means fuck you.

"Huh? What are you talking about all of a sudden…?"

It was a simple test. Anyway, good. You can see and hear clearly now. Both your sight and hearing have recovered.

"Thank you. Thank you so much, Han Chinese sir."

Ha ha. Don't mention it. The paralysis should be gone now that you've been detoxified. Can you move your fingers?

"Of course. I can move them just fine."

[2845] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

[2846] Gacha refers to a game mechanic in which a random draw determines the reward.

Good. I have something for you to do with them. First, what's your name?

"Me? Jang Sam."

Excellent. Here's a dagger. Write what I dictate on this wooden tablet.

"Yes, all right."

Write exactly what I say. Jang Sam.

"Jang. Sam."

Lies here.

"Lies here. Wait, what?"

I didn't want to alarm you, but we have to go back the way we came. And we're out of poison-warding pearls. Oh, I'll be fine. I have the Myriad-Poison Ring.

"…!"

I'm 'invincible.' The Myriad-Poison Ring is a 'god.'

Hmm.

That would turn into a two-hundred-against-one battle to the death over the Myriad-Poison Ring.

Or two hundred against two. The Beast Miao King had a big, beautiful top-grade poison-warding pearl of his own.

"…Why are you looking at me like that?" he asked.

"It's nothing."

"Is it Dark Heaven?"

"No. Heaven as in the sky."

His expression hardened. "Are you actually insane…?"

If my department head had been here, he would have laughed. But it seemed the Palace Lord didn't get the joke.

The Beast Miao King looked me over with an expression like he was staring at a Thousand-Year Spider walking on two legs, then began gathering the warriors wrapped in webs into one place.

Slice. Slice.

Every time his straightened palm moved, the people hanging in midair were neatly stacked together.

There were two hundred of them—almost exactly the number of warriors who had gone missing from Ailao Mountain.

Wait. What about the ferocious beasts?

As I helped the Beast Miao King move the survivors, I remembered one of the questions I'd had while searching Ailao Mountain: the missing ferocious beasts were nowhere to be seen.

The Beast Miao King soon noticed it as well and wore a puzzled expression.

"That is strange. There is no sign of the ferocious beasts."

“Are they timid, by any chance? Do they tuck their tails and run when they meet strangers?”

“I’m asking because I’m curious, but do you perhaps not know what ‘ferocious beast’ means?”

Of course I did. Ferocious. Beast.

That was why it was strange. So many of them wouldn’t have abandoned their masters and run away.

And it’s not as if Thousand-Year Spiders are picky eaters.

I knew spiders. Hope Goshiwon, where I’d lived for nearly seven years, had more spiders than hope.[2847] I’d even grown fond enough of them to share my ramen.

Then where the hell did the beasts go?

We’d have to search more of the Poisonblood Grounds to find out, but I doubted Thousand-Year Spiders were meticulous enough to sort their food by type.

Just as the Beast Miao King and I were looking around in confusion—

Rustle.

A small sound came from more than ten zhang[2848] away. With it, I sensed a faint presence.

[2847] A goshiwon is an inexpensive housing arrangement of very small rooms, often with shared facilities.

[2848] A zhang is ten chi, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft). More than ten zhang is over 30.3 m (99.4 ft).

Chapter 642

Rustle.

A faint noise came from the distance, followed by a presence closing in fast. I whipped White Flame toward it.

The Beast Miao King immediately drew up his internal energy. The same thought must have crossed his mind.

The Wraith of Ailao Mountain.

But we were both wrong. I caught a glimpse of white beyond the dark grass and lowered my spearhead with a sigh.

"Muyaho?"

- Grrr!

Rustle, rustle!

White Tiger came running like the wind, gave a short, powerful cry, and bounded happily toward me… only to run straight past and flop onto its back at the Beast Miao King's feet.

- Pant. Pant. Pant.

"Yes, yes. You managed to find your way here. What a clever little fellow."

At this point, maybe we should call it a silver retriever instead of a white tiger. Granted, it was the size of ten retrievers put together.

If he's back, then…

As if he'd read my mind, the Beast Miao King stroked White Tiger's belly while it showed off for him.

"Where are the others?"

- Grrrr.

White Tiger rose with a contented growl, then suddenly let out a mighty roar. It rang through the darkness and Poison Mist. Before long, torches flickered in the distance.

There were dozens of them, perhaps as many as a hundred.

And at their head were familiar faces.

"Palace Lord."

"Father! Are you all right?"

Baeksang and Yayul Mok approached with the Nanman Beast Palace warriors, their faces unusually grim. Behind them, the Fire Dragon Pavilion members came running toward me.

"Captaiiin!"

"Mujin, just in case this needs saying: if you throw yourself into my arms, you won't die a pleasant death."

"...Yes, sir."

That stopped Hyuk Mujin before he could charge into me like the heroine of a tragic romance. I shrugged at the other members as they opened their mouths.

"The story's long if I start from the beginning... Want to hear it here, or outside?"

I didn't need to wait for an answer.

If we'd been in a cozy café with sentimental pop music playing, maybe. But no one wanted a long story in the gloomy Poisonblood Grounds, with Poison Mist drifting around us.

The System, meanwhile, hadn't forgotten the Quest I'd briefly put out of my mind.

Ding.

SYSTEM

- Quest: My Good Sir, Do Not Cross That Swamp has been successfully completed!
- Quest Reward will be granted!
- You have acquired a considerable amount of EXP and Fame!
- You have acquired 5 Top-Grade Poison-Warding Pearls!
- You have earned the very rare Achievement: How'd You Get Back?!
- You have acquired the rare Title: Poisonblood Grounds Pioneer!

That night, the darkness over Nanman seemed unusually deep and long. But everything has a beginning and an end.

Deep in the night, while everyone slept, a hundred elite warriors hurried to Ailao Mountain. They returned to the Nanman Beast Palace near dawn, and plenty of people saw them arrive.

"Did you hear? Something huge happened last night."

"What happened?"

"Well, old man Mong, who lives near the West Gate of the Outer Palace, told me..."

"Gasp!"

"What? I haven't even started."

"He's still alive? I was sure he died last year."

"Ah, fuck."

By morning, the gist of the rumor was spreading fast.

Something major had happened somewhere in Nanman the night before. Baeksang, Great Chieftain of the Bai people, and Young Palace Lord Yayul Mok had led a hundred elite warriors out of the Outer Palace. When they returned a few shichen[2849] later, the Beast Miao King and Jin Taekyung were at the head of the party.

The Nanman Beast Palace did not normally intervene by force in disputes between tribes. For the Palace Lord himself to have gone out meant it was a serious incident.

But the rumor didn't stop there.

"And the trouble was at Ailao Mountain, of all places."

"Ailao Mountain? That Ailao Mountain?"

"Is there another Ailao Mountain in Nanman? Yao merchants from a village a hundred li[2850] from the mountain told us at first light. They happened to see it while working late on their ledgers."

To the people of Nanman, the name Five Poisons Sect was a burden they could never cast off. Their ancestors had fought the sect, and only after countless sacrifices had they established the order and laws they lived by today.

And yet, of all places, the incident had occurred in Ailao Mountain, the Five Poisons Sect's former headquarters.

Ordinarily, it was a forbidden place they didn't even want to mention. Trouble there was another matter.

"What the hell? Go on. Hurry!"

Through markets lined with stalls, back alleys, and busy inns, the story passed from mouth to ear and from one mouth to the next.

The chieftains gathered for that day's Tribal Grand Council knew all about the commotion. They also knew the rumors circulating through the Outer and Inner Palaces were more accurate than anyone might have expected.

"The whole place is in an uproar. Everyone's heard."

"The bigger problem is that it isn't just a rumor. Isn't that right?"

They had gathered for the first time in a year, but there was no time to exchange pleasantries. Seated early in the Inner Palace's vast main hall, the chieftains continued their discussion with grave expressions.

"You all received word in advance, so you know this is no ordinary matter. Nearly a hundred elite warriors have already died at Ailao Mountain because of creatures that should have stayed in the Poisonblood Grounds."

"I heard Thousand-Year Spiders appeared. Frankly, I find that hard to believe. Five of them, no less."

"Hard to believe, but true. Their corpses are still there. Enraged by the deaths of the warriors stationed at Ailao Mountain, the Palace Lord pursued the creatures into the Poisonblood Grounds and hunted them down."

[2849] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

[2850] Using the Chinese li of 500 meters (0.311 miles), a hundred li is about 50 kilometers (31 miles).

The middle-aged chieftain who had answered so readily added in a low voice, "That young Han Chinese man from the Murim Alliance was with him, too. Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung."

Every chieftain in the hall governed some part of Nanman, large or small. Naturally, they knew of the young outsider. Their reactions varied.

"Oh."

"Hmm."

"Ahem."

One nodded with an exclamation of admiration. Another cleared his throat uneasily and stared at nothing.

But the mood had changed since a few days earlier. This time, no one called him a "damned Han Chinese bastard."

Even the chieftains who normally disliked Han Chinese people knew Jin Taekyung had played no small part in resolving the incident.

"Without him, it might not have ended so quickly. The Palace Lord went after those creatures in haste. Perhaps he might even have been hurt—"

Bang!

A sudden boom drowned out the rest.

Some thirty pairs of eyes turned to one chieftain. He had looked displeased ever since Jin Taekyung's name came up, and now he had slammed a hand on the stone table.

"I tried to hold my tongue, but I can't listen to this anymore. Watch what you say, Chief Jang. The Palace Lord is far stronger than you think. The same goes for everyone in Nanman. We don't need help from some weak Han Chinese bastard!"

The middle-aged chieftain frowned.

"What brave and prideful words. Truly moving. But didn't you hear that weak Han Chinese bastard dealt with two Thousand-Year Spiders and thousands of venomous beasts in the Poisonblood Grounds? That he is a renowned warrior of the Central Plains who inherited the Fire King's legacy?"

"Th-that…"

"And five years ago, who invaded our tribe's territory even after the Palace Lord personally mediated the dispute? Wasn't it you? Even if a venomous snake's bitten your mouth, speak straight. Your loyalty isn't to the Palace Lord. It's to Great Chieftain Baeksang. All of Nanman knows you're his loyal dog."

"What? Loyal dog? You son of a bitch!"

"Son of a bitch? You piece of poisonous refuse left behind by the Five Poisons Sect —how dare you…"

Bang!

The two chieftains sprang to their feet, snarling as if they were about to draw their swords on each other.

Rumble…

The enormous stone gate swung open. Three figures stepped into the hall.

Step. Step.

Footsteps echoed through the sudden quiet. The man in front stopped, and his voice came cold as ice.

“Looks like I interrupted your conversation.”

“…!”

“…!”

“Don’t mind me. Carry on.”

No one said a word.

As if nothing had happened, the shouting that had filled the hall only moments ago vanished in an instant, replaced by a heavy silence that pressed down on everyone. At the same time, the expressions of the two opposing chieftains split between joy and sorrow.

“Welcome, Great Chieftain Baeksang.”

Baeksang glanced at the groveling loyal dog, then fixed his eyes on the middle-aged chieftain.

“That was an interesting conversation. I’d like to hear the rest.”

“…”

“You’ve grown quiet since I last saw you, Chief Jang.”

Chief Jang bit his lip and lowered his head.

“I greet Great Chieftain Baeksang.”

Yohi, Great Chieftain of the Yao people, stood to Baeksang’s right. She gave a quiet laugh.

“We must be invisible. Don’t you think, big brother Heugung?”

“Hm? Oh. Yes, that won’t do. Failing to show proper courtesy with our lovely Yohi right here? No, that won’t do.”

Heugung had been grinning foolishly at Yohi. He put on a stern face, but Baeksang’s chilly glance made his plump body shrink back.

“S-sorry, Uncle Baek. But did I do something wrong…?”

“Oh, what could you have done wrong? Our kind, handsome big brother Heugung hasn’t done anything wrong. Has he?”

“R-right. Yohi’s right.”

Baeksang watched them in silence, clicked his tongue, and resumed walking.

The table was large enough to seat several dozen people. It had one head seat, and the three seats nearest it belonged to the great chieftains, second only to the Palace Lord.

Scrape. Clack.

Twenty-eight chieftains had arrived before them. With the three great chieftains now seated, thirty-one places had found their owners.

Baeksang had seen this arrangement year after year. Yet something felt wrong.

“Two seats are empty.”

At first, no one understood what he meant. Then Yohi spoke with laughter in her voice, and the chieftains’ puzzlement gave way.

“You’re right. How strange. Why are two seats empty?”

Only thirty-two seats were ever prepared for the Tribal Grand Council. That had been true a hundred years ago, and it was true now. Anyone who was not a chieftain—even the Young Palace Lord—had to stand in attendance.

There should have been only one empty seat left.

Today, there were two.

“Why would…”

And just as a puzzled murmur escaped someone’s lips—

Rumble…

The enormous stone gate moved again. Two figures appeared beyond it at last.

The moment Baeksang saw them, his eyes darkened.

Chapter 643

Rumble!

The stone gate descended behind me with a heavy rumble.

Inside the spacious main hall, illuminated by spreading lamplight, thirty-one pairs of eyes flew toward my face like arrows and lodged there amid a silence in which no one spoke.

What are you doing coming out of there?

That was the look they gave me. But it held more surprise than hostility toward a Han Chinese man, and several chieftains even looked pleased to see me.

Of course, there was one absolute exception.

“One of two things must be true. Either my eyes deceive me, or the rules of the Tribal Grand Council have changed without anyone—including me—knowing.”

The middle-aged man who broke the silence was Baeksang, the Great Chieftain of the Bai people. He continued in a cold voice.

“Explain why you’ve brought a mere Han Chinese man here. He is neither a chieftain nor a Nanman.”

Baeksang wasn’t asking the Beast Miao King, who had yet to arrive. He wasn’t asking me, either.

Yayul Mok stood to my right. He answered calmly.

“Because he has the right to be here.”

“The right.”

Baeksang repeated the words under his breath.

“That sounds like the rash judgment of a brat who isn’t even thirty.”

“It is also the judgment of someone else who has yet to arrive.”

“…!”

“My father. No—the Palace Lord said he has the right to attend the Tribal Grand Council.”

Baeksang’s eyes darkened. After a moment’s silence, he asked, “Why hasn’t the Palace Lord come?”

“He’ll be here soon. By then, there will be only one empty seat left.”

“Unacceptable.”

Baeksang tapped the table with a finger pierced by a nail.

“The Tribal Grand Council is a solemn gathering where the chieftains representing all of Nanman come together to exchange their views. If one is not a chieftain, no one may take a seat here except the Young Palace Lord. This man’s qualification is merely the will of the Palace Lord alone. We will not permit it.”

I watched for a moment, then muttered, “That’s funny. Isn’t that just your opinion?”

I was clearly talking to myself, but none of the chieftains gathered here were so lacking in martial arts that they couldn't hear me.

That went without saying for Baeksang, whose martial arts were particularly formidable.

He turned a cold gaze on me. "What did you say?"

"Oh, you heard me?"

"Did you think I wouldn't?"

"No. I said it so you would. Glad you caught that."

"…!"

I shrugged at his frozen expression.

"Since the subject has come up, let me say this. We may call ourselves 'we,' but isn't this ultimately just your personal opinion as well? You haven't even asked what the other chieftains think, yet you say you won't permit it. What exactly are we supposed to do with that?"

As my words continued to flow smoothly, I could feel an invisible stir spreading among the seated chieftains.

Baeksang was the Great Chieftain of the Bai people, the most powerful tribe in Nanman after the Miao people, as well as a Supreme Peak master who represented Nanman alongside the Beast Miao King.

I doubted anyone had ever dared speak to him so openly.

Anyone but me.

"When Great Hero Yayul sent me ahead, he told me this: 'Yayul Cheok, Great Chieftain of the Miao people, recognizes your right to attend. But Yayul Cheok, Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace, cannot decide this alone. Gain the other chieftains' consent.'"

Nanman was hardly a welcoming place for outsiders. Even breathing here felt like a privilege. And the Tribal Grand Council, held once a year, was so rigid a needle couldn't slip through its rules.

If the Beast Miao King hadn't done me this favor, they'd have stopped me at the door.

His help had gotten me past those rules. Now I intended to claim a seat—by winning the other chieftains' support.

"So that's what I'd like to ask."

I met their eyes one by one.

"What do the rest of you think?"

Fwoosh.

A breeze from somewhere made the torches flicker. In their reddish light, some faces tightened with discomfort, others looked troubled, and more than I'd expected looked receptive.

Including the middle-aged chieftain who had just opened his mouth.

“Everyone here, including my Zang people, knows what happened at Ailao Mountain last night.”

From what I’d seen and heard in Nanman, the Zang people weren’t one of its four great tribes, but they had enough strength to stand just behind them.

The man who appeared to lead them continued slowly.

“An unexpected disaster cost us much blood. Swift action kept the loss from becoming greater. We owe that to our wise Palace Lord, Great Chieftain Yayul, and to a young Han Chinese man who helped him.”

His strong voice carried through the hall. He watched the other chieftains’ expressions shift, then turned to me with a faint smile.

“It’s late, but I want to thank you here. Because of your help, twenty-two brave, fine warriors of the Zang people are alive. One of them is my own kin.”

“Ah.”

Around two hundred warriors had been dragged into the Poisonblood Grounds. I hadn’t learned all their names or who they were.

I hadn’t known, and couldn’t have known. But what I’d done last night was coming back to me now as goodwill and gratitude.

“On behalf of the Zang people, I welcome Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung to the Tribal Grand Council.”

He finished with a respectful salute—not one from the land where he’d been born and raised, but a cupped-fist salute from the Central Plains.

And that was only the beginning.

Scrape. Scrape.

Unfamiliar chieftains rose one after another. Their faces and clothing differed, but they spoke with the same goodwill.

“We can’t accept a kindness and pretend it never happened. The Hui people support his attendance.”

“The Man people have no objection. I only wish to thank him for saving my good-for-nothing son.”

Each of them ruled a tribe, large or small.

But they were also heads of families. Fathers and mothers with children they loved.

One by one, they offered me their thanks with painfully awkward cupped-fist salutes. The warriors I’d rescued from the Poisonblood Grounds last night were their people. Their families.

Not everyone who supported me was doing it because of last night’s rescue, though.

“The Bouyei people also support him. He is more than qualified.”

At the words of the middle-aged female chieftain, one of the chieftains who still had not risen from his seat frowned.

“Wait. What reason do the Bouyei people have? None of your warriors were stationed at Ailao Mountain, were they?”

“Nanman is my homeland.”

“What does that have to—”

“Even beasts that cannot speak repay a kindness. Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung risked his life fighting for my homeland last night. Isn’t that reason enough to let him attend?”

“…Ahem.”

The chieftain who had questioned her fell silent after an uncomfortable cough. Warm smiles appeared on other faces.

And amid this atmosphere, so clearly different from the one only a few days ago, I felt a tickle in one corner of my chest.

Repaying someone who helped you. It should be the most natural thing in the world.

But sometimes, in this world, it wasn’t.

I hadn’t gone into the Poisonblood Grounds looking for repayment. Yet here the chieftains were, giving me their gratitude and trust.

Some because I’d helped them last night. Others because of something that had happened long ago.

“My late father, who was once a Great Chieftain, often said things like this after returning from the Great Faction War. ‘If it hadn’t been for the Fire King, I would have gone to the Nine Springs[2851] instead of returning to Nanman.‘ I had completely forgotten those words after his death, but they have finally come back to me.”

“My ancestor destroyed the Five Poisons Sect alongside the Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan at the time. If it hadn’t been for him, our tribe would not have survived to this day. I support him as well.”

Still water began to flow.

Chieftains who had sat in silence rose with the current, one after another, and spoke. Soon more of them were standing than seated.

Then the last person—the one who would put an end to this—finally appeared.

Rumble, rumble—boom!

A giant eight cheok[2852] tall lifted the stone gate, heavy as a thousand geun[2853], with one hand.

The Beast Miao King cast a long, enormous shadow across the hall. He spoke in a low voice.

[2851] The Nine Springs is a traditional Chinese euphemism for the realm of the dead.

[2852] Eight cheok is about 2.42 m (7.95 ft); one cheok is 30.3 cm (11.9 in).

[2853] A thousand Korean geun is about 600 kg (1,320 lb); one geun is 600 g (1.32 lb).

“Looks like a conclusion has been reached.”

At the end of his gaze, Baeksang slowly rose and offered him a cool, formal salute.

“I greet you, Palace Lord.”

“Unless my eyes and ears deceive me, he seems more than qualified. Don’t you agree, little brother?”

“It is the wrong choice. You are breaking the rules of a Tribal Grand Council with a long and venerable tradition.”

“More than half the chieftains have agreed to his attendance. Scholars in the Central Plains call that a consensus.”

Baeksang closed his eyes instead of answering. The Beast Miao King did not wait.

“I, Yayul Cheok, Great Chieftain of the Miao people and Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace, permit Jin Taekyung—Fire Dragon Pavilion Master of the Murim Alliance and successor to the Fire Gate Clan—to attend the Tribal Grand Council.”

At that moment, a clear bell sounded in my ears.

Ding.

Somewhere damp and sweltering.

In a darkness that lay somewhere between pitch-black and the abyss, voices no one could hear passed back and forth.

—The grand council has begun in the Inner Palace.

—And him?

—He attended as well. But…

—Go on. Don’t hesitate.

—Th-that is…

A moment’s hesitation.

The man sending the Sound Transmission could never have guessed it would cost him his life.

Swish. Slice.

At the faint sounds, a figure hidden in the darkness collapsed.

When the white fingers that had wiped the blood from their cheek moved, the lifeless corpse flew beyond the darkness and vanished.

—So? What happened?

One life was gone in an instant, but someone else soon took the dead man’s place. A tense Sound Transmission followed.

—Jin Taekyung. Jin Taekyung attended the grand council.

—Who? Jin Taekyung?

—Yes! Apparently he gained permission with the support of the Beast Miao King and the other chieftains.

After a moment’s silence, someone in the darkness clicked their tongue.

—Those barbarian bastards… And you? You just stood there and watched?

—W-what?

—Then again, how could a worm like you be at fault? It was my mistake for keeping a useless worm under my command.

—…!

The person reporting to the entity in the darkness immediately realized the danger, but he could not escape death either.

Swish. Thrust!

Death swept past again. The figure stared down at the corpse swallowed by darkness and murmured,

“Jin Taekyung. It’s been a while.”

Chapter 644

Ding. Ding. Ding.

SYSTEM

A new Quest, Tribal Grand Council, has been created!

Quest

Tribal Grand Council

You have become the first outsider in the history of the Nanman Beast Palace to earn the right to attend the Tribal Grand Council.

This is an achievement that even the Fire Gate Clan's fifth Sect Leader failed to accomplish.

Why? Because he destroyed the Five Poisons Sect and left before the council could even begin!

At this momentous meeting, where the major and minor affairs of Nanman will be decided, you must achieve the best possible result you can right now!

Grade: Supreme Peak

Restriction: Jin Taekyung

Mission: Nanman Beast Palace's entry into the alliance (Incomplete)

Reward: ???

Failure: ???

I stared at the Quest window and sighed inwardly.

Public opinion might have turned in my favor, but getting the Nanman Beast Palace to join the alliance? That was every bit as tough as the Quest's Supreme Peak Grade suggested.

And what was that bit about the fifth Sect Leader…?

That was the Fire Gate Clan for you.

A venerable sect of thugs, passed down from one person to the next for hundreds of years. I'd heard that some of its Sect Leaders had lived long lives in seclusion, while others had gone out into Murim, burned like flames, and died young. But every last one of them had been a monster whose might placed him among the top five in the world.

That's probably one reason I'm allowed to sit here.

It might have been over two hundred years ago, but the Nanman Beast Palace and the Fire Gate Clan had a fairly close connection.

By K-Murim logic, it was basically a sect founded by Grandfather Dangun's best friend.[2854]

The problem was, I had a talent for beating people up and none whatsoever for persuading them.

Still, I have to do my best.

I straightened my back and looked around at the thirty-two chieftains seated at the table.

The Beast Miao King occupied the seat of honor. To his left and right sat the great chieftains Baeksang, Yohi, and Heugung, in that order. The others seemed to have been seated without regard to the strength of their tribes.

There weren't many of them, but each chieftain commanded anywhere from several hundred to tens of thousands of tribespeople. In that sense, this gathering was Nanman itself.

As I studied their faces, the Beast Miao King broke the brief silence.

"Well, then."

His expression was solemn, his gaze dignified. The moment he opened his mouth, the air in the hall drew taut as a bowstring.

Radiating all the authority of the master of the Nanman Beast Palace, the Beast Miao King delivered the historic words that would open the council.

"Did everyone eat before coming here?"

"…?"

"We've had some unpleasant things happen lately, but you still shouldn't skip meals. Chief Jang, you in particular look a little thinner than you did last year."

"…!"

Historic, my ass.

What did I just hear?

I was still doubting my ears when Chief Jang—the first to offer me a cupped-fist salute earlier—answered.

"As expected, nothing gets past the Palace Lord's keen eyes. I have lost a little weight."

No. He's actually going along with this?

"I thought so. But a chieftain can't neglect his health. You have to take care of yourself for your tribespeople's sake. How old are you again?"

"Sixty."

"You're still in the prime of life. Eat more."

"Jonmyeong."[2855]

[2854] Dangun is the legendary founder of Korea's first kingdom; "Grandfather Dangun" jokingly invokes a distant shared ancestor.

[2855] Jonmyeong means "As you command." It differs by one vowel from jonmang, crude slang for being utterly ruined.

Now I was hearing things, too. Jonmyeong sounded like jonmang—"fucked."

Nanman is fucked.

Was this really the Tribal Grand Council I'd imagined?

I stared at the thirty-two chieftains in disbelief.

These people represented all of Nanman. Yet the Beast Miao King's opening words had apparently been their cue to start conversations all over the hall that made my spirit shrink just listening to them.

"Chief Gal, I heard the news. Your sixth child had their coming-of-age ceremony?"

"My seventh."

"I got them mixed up. If only you'd stopped at one or two. I don't care how vigorous you are—fifteen children?"

"Seventeen."

"…You definitely had fifteen at last year's council."

"We had two more. Twins."

"Oh."

On one side, a super-sperm man seemed to be working toward founding a Nanman soccer league.

"Chief Gu. Return the livestock you stole a while ago."

"What livestock?"

"The fifty-two dairy cows that vanished from the pasture. You think I don't know your tribespeople took them?"

"I have never done such a thing."

"Of course you'd say that. Return them while I'm asking nicely."

"Oh, come on! I'm telling you, we didn't take them!"

"I said hand over the cows while I'm asking nicely, you cow-udder bastard!"

On another, a furious argument raged over who had stolen all those cows.

"I remember it as if it were yesterday. The day you bastards trespassed on our tribe's land."

"Oh, this again? Every damn year. You're barely forty. Why do you keep bringing up something that happened eighty years ago?"

"Because I inherited the spirits of my ancestors. So give me the land."

"How does that make sense? Our predecessors settled this!"

"Give me the land."

"No, seriously…"

"Give me the land."

Elsewhere, a land ghost insisting he had been reincarnated continued his back-and-forth struggle.

As I watched it all in disbelief, someone's Sound Transmission reached my ear.

—That's a funny expression.

I turned my head slightly and met Yohi's eyes. She was watching me with an amused smile.

—The Tribal Grand Council is always like this. Everyone's scattered across Nanman and only gets together once a year, so I suppose it's natural.

I thought for a moment, then answered honestly.

—Even so, this is a complete shitshow.

—The Tribal Grand Council handles all of Nanman's affairs, major and minor. Minor means the small ones come up, too.

—…That matter is way too small, though.

—How else are thirty-two tribes supposed to live together in harmony? They settle things one by one when everyone's gathered. It lets them clear up old grudges.

Crash!

"You son of a bitch!"

"Is this bastard out of his mind…?"

"You think your martial arts are that strong? Shut up and come outside."

The two chieftains arguing over the cows had finally grabbed each other by the collars. Yohi looked at them and added:

—Of course, there are exceptions.

—…

—It'll be settled soon. The real grand council starts after that.

"Ah, give me the land. I said give it to me."

"Oh, you Thousand-Year Spider bastard."

"Come to think of it, a thousand years ago, our ancestors…"

"Stop! Stoooop!"

It'll be settled soon, she said.

Hmm. I had my doubts.

Are these people really just a bunch of barbarians…?

I kept that thought to myself. But just as Yohi had said, the chaos began to subside, one dispute at a time, and new matters came up.

"Thirty Man warriors were wounded and twenty-two were killed in this year's ferocious-beast hunt. The beasts seem to have become especially rampant lately, so before the losses grow any larger, we request that the Inner Palace take action…"

"Sudden torrential rain caused a flood. The pasture and around fifty nearby homes were submerged…"

"I report that the dispute between the Huang and Dong tribes has been resolved. Both sides have drawn up an official written agreement and will maintain peace for the next ten years…"

Ferocious-beast hunts. Floods. Tribal disputes.

The appetizers were over. Now the main dishes were coming out.

And among those reports was something that deserved serious attention.

“They say a strange figure has appeared in the northeast.”

A strange figure?

As the question arose in my mind, the Beast Miao King—who until then had merely nodded along with short replies—straightened his posture and spoke.

“A strange figure. This is the first I have heard of it.”

“W-well…”

The chieftain who had raised the matter looked uncertain.

“The information hasn’t been confirmed, so I can’t speak with confidence…”

“Where did it come from?”

“Three days ago, we captured a Han Chinese man who crossed the northeastern border. He told us an unidentified man had appeared out of nowhere and was leaving a trail of blood through Guizhou.”

Guizhou was a border region touching Nanman, along with Sichuan and Guangxi. With a little exaggeration, it was practically close enough to trip and bump your nose against.

But some strange man suddenly appeared in Guizhou?

Something felt off. More than off—it nagged at me. And I wasn’t the only one who sensed there was more to this than the stranger’s unknown identity.

“Tell me more.”

The chieftain swallowed at the sight of the Beast Miao King’s frown.

“Neither his name nor his age is known. They say he’s bald like a monk from the Central Plains and carries a Zen staff. He’s beaten several hundred people to death in Guizhou alone. That’s apparently why they call him the Blood Monk.”

“The Blood Monk?”

“Yes. The Han Chinese man we captured seemed to be a fairly skilled martial artist himself, but he couldn’t hide his fear when he spoke of him.”

The sobriquet was grim enough. Its owner had to possess astonishing martial arts.

Guizhou is orthodox faction territory. The Murim Alliance wouldn’t have just stood by.

Yet the Blood Monk had killed several hundred people and made a name for himself. Without at least Supreme Peak-level martial prowess, that would have been impossible.

It also bothered me that he’d appeared in Guizhou, right beside Nanman.

Could it be…?

An unidentified man appearing at such a strange time. Strong enough to rampage alone through Guizhou, a stronghold of the orthodox faction.

I couldn't help thinking of Dark Heaven. He might not be a major figure on the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's level, but the possibility was there. The Blood Lord and the Western Heaven Demon Lord had commanded Supreme Peak masters like the Yin-Yang Twin Ghosts and the Qilian Three Fiends.

And what if the Blood Monk is headed for Nanman?

For the first time, I spoke to the chieftain.

"Do you know where the Blood Monk is going?"

"I wanted to ask him myself, but there's no way to know now."

"What do you mean?"

The chieftain shook his head with a faint sigh.

"The man died."

"What?"

"He died before I could ask anything else. He was badly injured to begin with, and I don't think he adapted to the sudden change in environment. Then the heavy rain brought a flood, and we couldn't take proper measures."

"…!"

The Blood Monk's appearance. And the death of our only witness.

Silence settled over the hall. Then someone who had said nothing since the council began spoke up.

"Injury, endemic disease, and death. They happen often enough."

Everyone turned toward the voice.

Baeksang.

"The Slaughter Saint appearing in the Central Plains is no different. Han Chinese have always been that way. Though they are one people, they've kept their world going by killing one another. In short…"

His tone and expression remained perfectly calm. His voice was cold.

"There's no reason for Nanman to concern itself with affairs in the Central Plains. None at all."

I did not know whether the thought that came to me then was merely a misunderstanding. But one thing was certain: something about his words felt strange and out of place to me.

Baeksang was the great chieftain of the Bai people, who possessed Nanman's second-largest faction and the second-largest population. And yet he was trying to ignore an event unfolding right beside him.

I watched him for a moment, then spoke.

"What if the Blood Monk is heading south?"

The chieftains who grasped my meaning widened their eyes. Baeksang answered without a trace of hesitation.

“Nanman isn’t the only place bordering Guizhou. Beyond Guangxi lies the open sea. With a favorable wind, one can sail to Hainan in ten days.”

“So you think it’s unlikely the Blood Monk will enter Nanman?”

“Why would he come all the way here? Rather than face venomous beasts, ferocious beasts, and countless Nanman warriors, he could go through Guangxi to the sea…”

“There is a reason. One clear reason. But…”

I forcefully cut him off before he could continue, fixing Baeksang with a grave, steady gaze as I went on.

“Strangely enough, you seem to be the only one who doesn’t know it.”

“What?”

“Or did you agree with someone to pretend you didn’t know from the start?”

At that moment—

Fwoosh. Whoomph.

The wavering torchlight went out.

In the darkness that fell over the vast hall, a pair of eyes radiated a piercing chill.

“You have finally crossed the line.”

Whoosh!

“Well.”

An immense wave of qi bore down on me from every direction, squeezing my entire body. I spoke calmly.

“I think you’re the one crossing it.”

Chapter 645

Who had crossed the line first?

Me? Or Baeksang?

And of the words we'd exchanged, which were true and which were lies?

Questions flashed through my mind, but they no longer mattered. From here on, we would settle the matter as martial artists did: with force.

Whoosh!

A sharp sound cut through the air. Before it reached my ears, I tilted my head aside, dodging the Finger Qi flying toward me. Without hesitation, I planted a hand on the stone table in front of me.

Boom!

The table, carved from a massive boulder, shuddered. Thirty-three wine cups sprang into the air. I reached out and sent several of them toward one person alone.

Tung.

Baeksang.

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh!

They were crude cups, roughly carved from wood. Filled with the internal energy I'd sent into them, they became deadly weapons—faster than arrows, with enough force to shatter stone.

But Baeksang was calm. More importantly, he was strong.

Whoomph! Slash!

He swept his straightened hand blade sideways. Invisible qi cut across the air and split the cups apart.

Before the fragments could hit the floor, Baeksang surged from his seat. His figure blurred.

Papapat!

White robes fluttered like a ghost through the darkness over the hall. In an instant, he had crossed the stone table and closed the five zhang[2856] between us. His fist came down toward the crown of my head.

"You're crossing the line again."

I muttered the words and drove my palm upward.

Fwoosh!

Flame Divine Palm.

Flames consumed the darkness and met Baeksang's fist, which blazed with Force. White and blue energies mingled, bursting into a flash that shook the hall.

[2856] A zhang is a traditional length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft); five zhang is about 15.2 m (49.7 ft).

Boom! Rumble-rumble!

A descending fist and an upward palm. An old man and a young man. A collision of raw strength.

The impact rocked the hall.

Whoooosh!

Beyond the light exploding from the point where our attacks met, I saw Baeksang's eyes widen.

"…!"

Baeksang's eyes, which had always shone with a cool light, held unmistakable surprise.

How?

I knew the look. Most of the people I'd faced had worn it.

Before my name and sobriquet had begun spreading through the Murim, and even afterward, people sometimes seemed to forget that and underestimate me too soon—because I was young, came from an insignificant family, or was an inexperienced brat who had never experienced war.

Whenever that happened, I kindly set them straight.

Not with words, but with force.

Just like now.

Along with the mutter that never escaped my lips, I drew up the energy filling my entire body even more forcefully.

Whoooosh!

The tremendous internal energy of no less than three jiazi[2857] stirred to life and stretched. The terrible heat of my Scorching Yang Qi evaporated the moisture around us, and red heat haze rose into the air.

Tsss-tsss-tsss!

Baeksang's fist began to give way against my open palm. His trembling eyes flicked from his burning white robes to my calm face.

A cool voice emerged from between his heat-cracked lips.

"You bastard…"

Remarkable composure. Usually, people in his position went straight to fucking bastard, son of a bitch, or crazy bastard.

But whether he had been tempered by a hundred battles or because he was the Great Chieftain leading tens of thousands of tribespeople, Baeksang's emotions might have surged, but they never overflowed, and his martial prowess was far greater than I had expected.

Swish!

[2857] A jiazi is a sixty-year cycle; three jiazi equals 180 years.

A blackened collar brushed against my forearm. At some point, the fist he had clenched tightly had spread open like an eagle's talons and shot toward my wrist with lightning speed.

It would have caught me, too, if I hadn't moved faster and hit harder.

Crack!

I caught his wrist instead and squeezed with strength far beyond human limits. Pain made his brow twitch, and a short groan escaped him.

"Hng!"

I seized the opening.

Now.

I twisted his wrist aside, blocking his other hand and throwing him off balance. Then I drove my free palm into his flank.

Bang!

I released his wrist before the heavy report of the strike reached my ears.

In front of dozens of watching chieftains, Baeksang flew backward. He twisted in midair and landed on the stone table.

Swish.

He touched down so lightly he made no sound. His expression was anything but light.

He fixed me with a heavy stare and started to move again.

"Enough."

The voice was not loud, but it held a deep resonance and authority. The Beast Miao King had risen from his seat and opened his mouth with a hard expression.

"Stand down. Both of you."

Baeksang's figure wavered. I shrugged.

"I didn't move."

That was an undeniable fact. I had pulled my chair back a little, but Baeksang had been the one to charge first. I had exchanged moves with him while remaining seated.

And the result? Well, the other chieftains were staring at me as if they'd seen a ghost. Their faces said it all.

"Jin Taekyung."

I did need to show some propriety. This was Nanman, not my home ground, and Baeksang was the Great Chieftain of the Bai people.

At the Beast Miao King's reproachful call, I raised both hands.

"I'm sorry. It was a situation where I couldn't help using my hands. I just acted without thinking."

I still needed to make that clear. Even if I conceded that I'd started the trouble, Baeksang had used an attack that could have killed me.

"…Hoo."

Perhaps he understood. The Beast Miao King sighed softly and turned to the other man.

"Baeksang, do not act rashly."

Conflict flickered through Baeksang's cold eyes. He kept staring at me without answering the Beast Miao King behind him, then looked around the hall.

More than thirty chieftains watched us. Some shifted in their seats as if ready to rush me. Others fought back smiles. Still others looked half dazed by what they'd just seen.

There were factions within the Nanman Beast Palace. And in front of all of them, Baeksang's standing and Fame had taken a blow that would not be easily erased.

At the hands of a Han Chinese brat from the Central Plains, no less.

"…"

Baeksang knew it. He pressed his lips together and bowed his head to the Beast Miao King.

"I apologize for causing a disturbance. I will see you again after I have calmed my mind."

Then he left the hall, his scorched robes fluttering behind him.

Yohi rose and followed as if it were the most natural thing in the world. Heugung hurried after them, and nearly half the chieftains got up as well, watching one another for cues.

"Palace Lord, forgive me, but I…"

"L-let's go together."

They were probably the pro-Baeksang faction. Unlike the ordinary moderates, they were fiercely opposed to Nanman joining the Murim Alliance.

As roughly half of the thirty-two chieftains filed out, Yayul Mok frowned in anger. The Beast Miao King spoke wearily.

"So it's finally come to this."

I glanced at him before speaking.

"I'm sorry. Feels like this happened because of me."

"Hoo. You have nothing to apologize for. It was bound to happen sooner or later."

"Oh, good. That's what I thought, too."

"…"

The remaining chieftains, Yayul Mok, and the Beast Miao King all gave me the same flat look.

—It is because of you, you bastard.

What was that? I must be hearing things. It definitely wasn't Sound Transmission.

I tilted my head at the strange phenomenon, then asked, "The Tribal Grand Council isn't over, is it?"

“The Tribal Grand Council runs for three days, alongside the festival. You were told that before you attended.”

“I was. Just checking.”

The Beast Miao King shook his head at my shameless answer.

“Did you really have to take it that far?”

“It felt too suspicious to let it go. I wanted to see his real reaction, too.”

“That curiosity has made enemies of more than ten thousand Bai people. Add Yohi and Heugung, the two Great Chieftains who follow Baeksang, and the others, and it would be no exaggeration to say that half of Nanman is against you.”

Hmm. Half of Nanman.

“That’s not as bad as I expected.”

“What?”

“Two days ago, all of Nanman was against me. I was about to get thrown out before the Tribal Grand Council even started.”

“…Hah.”

The Beast Miao King gave a hollow laugh and turned to the chieftains who remained.

“Chief Jang. Chief Go.”

“Yes.”

“This time, I will need your help. First, organize a scouting party of fast-moving warriors and have them watch the area toward Guizhou.”

“Because of the Blood Monk?”

The Beast Miao King nodded.

“Both Baeksang and Jin Taekyung have a point. The man has no particular reason to come to Nanman. But if he belongs to Dark Heaven, we should be prepared.”

“We will obey your command, Palace Lord.”

“As you command.”

If the chieftains who had left were Baeksang’s people, most of those still here were loyal to the Beast Miao King or were moderates favorably disposed toward him.

The two chiefs, each the leader of a mid-sized tribe, accepted their orders without protest. The Beast Miao King’s expression eased a little.

“Tonight, we will erect a memorial for those who died and hold a banquet in their honor. The Tribal Grand Council will resume afterward. You may withdraw for now.”

“What happened?”

Namho came rushing over the moment we returned to our quarters.

"You didn't cause another incident, did you?"

His voice brimmed with suspicion. I was about to answer when Hyuk Mujin burst out indignantly.

"Old man Nam! What do you take our Captain for?"

"What else? A lunatic."

"Now, now. Even if our Captain is a lunatic, that's going too far! Do you seriously think he'd cause trouble at a meeting that important?"

"Yes. Easily."

Is it normal to feel guilty right now?

I hesitated, then opened my mouth. Or tried to.

That was when Ju Hwaran joined in.

"Elder Namho, that's too harsh. How can you call our Pavilion Master a lunatic?"

If Taishan was the reason Namho was aging so quickly, Ju Hwaran was his one weakness. The man who had been so sure of himself a moment ago scratched his thinning crown.

"Well, I…"

"Our Pavilion Master came here representing the Murim Alliance. He can be a little rough around the edges, but he knows how important it is to secure Nanman's entry into the alliance. He would never cause a disturbance at the Tribal Grand Council."

"…"

Please kill me.

My conscience had gone past pricking me. It hurt.

Meanwhile, Ju Hwaran was canvassing the others like an enthusiastic campaigner.

"What do you all think? Why isn't anyone answering?"

The usually quiet Song Ilseom smacked his lips.

"Hmm. Young Bureau Head, perhaps we ought to hear from the man himself first…"

"Extra bonus."

"On second thought, you're right. The Pavilion Master would never do such a thing."

Money-crazed bastard—out.

"Why aren't the other two saying anything?"

"Taishan. Hungry…"

"I heard there's a banquet tonight."

"Taishan. Strongly agrees with Young Lady Ju."

"…I agree as well."

Glutton—out. Ex-fiancé I could chew to bits and still not feel satisfied—out.

Her petition gathered signatures with the speed of Quick Attack.[2858] Then Ju Hwaran turned eyes sparkling like the Milky Way on me.

“Pavilion Master, say something. So, have you decided to join the alliance?”

One second felt like an hour.

After a long silence, I spoke.

“Um. Everyone. Well. There was… a minor problem.”

Ju Hwaran froze. Namho nodded as if he’d known all along.

“See? Crazy Pavilion Master.”

“…”

“Did you kill someone?”

“No.”

“Then you hit someone.”

“…”

“Who? Some chieftain who picked a fight without knowing better? Or someone who said something you didn’t like? Surely not the Great Chieftain of the Bai people.”

“Ah.”

“Pavilion Master?”

“…”

“…Pavilion Master?”

As Ju Hwaran’s voice grew faint, I kept my mouth shut and stared toward a distant mountain.

Namho chuckled.

“See? Crazy bastard.”

[2858] Quick Attack is a move in the Pokémon games.

Chapter 646

If this continued, I was liable to be branded a traitor guilty of high treason, so in the end, I had to explain everything that had happened at the Tribal Grand Council from beginning to end.

And answer every question that came up along the way.

“More than half the chieftains accepted you?”

“Yes. They even gave me cupped-fist salutes.[2859] Thanked me for saving their tribespeople and families.”

“My goodness. You were gone so long that I had a feeling something had happened… But an outsider—especially a Han Chinese person—attending the Tribal Grand Council must be a first in Nanman’s history. No, in Murim history.”

At Ju Hwaran’s surprise, Namho, who stood beside her, added with a warm smile.

“Of course it’s a first. An outsider attending the Tribal Grand Council was a first, and that outsider getting into a fight with the Great Chieftain of the Bai people was a first too. Yes, indeed.”

“…”

“…”

“Hoho. I’m laughing because I’m so very proud and happy. Don’t mind me. Go on.”

It was hard not to mind him, but I went on.

“Anyway, the council started, and…”

Ju Hwaran’s eyes widened as she listened.

“The Blood Monk?”

“Yes. Apparently, he’s rampaging through Guizhou right now. I heard he’s already beaten several hundred people to death and is running wild. This was the first time I’d heard that sobriquet, so I was wondering if Young Lady Ju had ever heard of him.”

The Yongbong Escort Bureau was based in Sichuan, which bordered Guizhou to the southeast. And though the bureau’s fortunes had declined for a time, it had once been among the foremost Escort Bureaus in the world. Its intelligence network was considerable.

Young Lady Ju might know something.

But my hopes faded when I told her what little I knew about the Blood Monk and she shook her head.

“I’m sorry. A few sobriquets vaguely come to mind, but none of them belonged to a master of that caliber. Besides, there’s no specific sketch or description of his appearance.”

[2859] A cupped-fist salute places one fist against the opposite open palm as a greeting or sign of respect in Chinese martial culture.

"Hmm. I see."

I was a little disappointed, but I tried not to show it. As she'd said, picking one man out from a handful of characteristics, without even a proper description of his face, was difficult.

All I'd been able to tell her was that he was probably middle-aged, his martial arts were likely at the Supreme Peak level, and his signature weapon was a Zen staff.

Murim's a big place.

Not just in terms of land. There were plenty of people, too. Men with cheap swords made of scrap iron gave themselves names like Soaring Dragon Guest and Sword Demon, then strutted around as if they were somebody.

I might as well search an endless beach for one grain of sand.

I was smacking my lips when Ju Hwaran, who still looked apologetic, seemed to remember something.

"Oh, but Captain Song would know more about this than I would. Wouldn't you, Captain Song?"

Oh. Right.

Every eye in the room, including mine, turned toward Song Ilseom. As usual, he'd been keeping quiet.

"Hmm. I don't know."

Like hell you don't.

I'd figured him out by now. I tossed him a silver nyang.[2860]

"Hey, Soul-Chasing Guest. If you know something, let's hear it."

He might call himself a mere escort these days, but Song Ilseom was a martial arts prodigy of Guangdong Chen Family blood. At a startlingly young age, he'd won more than a hundred life-and-death duels and become a legend among wandering martial artists.

In some ways, there were few professions more sensitive to people and rumors than wandering martial artists. Their lives could depend on it from one day to the next.

Clack.

Song Ilseom snatched the silver out of the air and frowned.

"You think I'm obsessed with money?"

"Yes."

"…"

"So, you don't like it?"

"I don't dislike it."

"What if I give you more?"

[2860] A nyang was a traditional unit of currency. "Silver nyang" refers to silver money, not modern Korean won.

“I’d like that even better.”

“Here. Have some more silver, you money-crazed bastard.”

Whoosh. Clack.

“…Somehow, this feels even worse.”

Having secured a generous bonus, Song Ilseom began, looking vaguely uncomfortable. “Middle-aged, and he uses a Zen staff?”

“Yeah. Steel, from what I heard.”

“What does he look like?”

“I don’t know much beyond the bald head and lack of a beard. The survivor who made it all the way to Nanman died after telling them that much.”

“A complete mess, then. Still, three people come to mind. Not many martial artists use a Zen staff as their signature weapon.”

“Oh, three?”

“There’s just one problem…”

“That’s fine. Tell me.”

With all of us watching him expectantly, Song Ilseom spoke.

“He’s dead.”

“Huh?”

“More precisely, I killed him. Took a commission and happened to meet him on a battlefield.”

“Hmm… Well, that happens. What about the other two?”

“What do you mean, the other two?”

“You just said you killed one.”

“I killed all three.”

“…?”

“Two on battlefields, one in a life-and-death duel. The last was the strongest.”

“…!”

A heavy silence fell. Then Namho muttered what everyone was thinking.

“So there’s another crazy bastard.”

I didn’t know who the other crazy bastard was supposed to be, but I couldn’t agree more.

I glared at Song Ilseom, who stood there blankly. Should I take back the silver first and then beat him up? Or beat him up first and then take back the silver?

That was when I noticed someone else giving him a look of utter contempt.

“Hey, unorthodox grunt.”

“…Unorthodox grunt?”

“Yeah. Know anything?”

Sama Pyo, Young Sect Leader of the Black Dragon Demon Gate—the most powerful unorthodox faction in the world today, and self-proclaimed ruler of Gansu—knitted his brows.

"I have three things to say. First, I am not an unorthodox grunt. Second, Gansu and Guizhou are nearly a thousand li[2861] apart, so travel between them is difficult. And third, why would you think I'd know?"

"Because you're part of the unorthodox faction."

"…?"

"Bad guys all know each other, don't they?"

"…!"

"Well, maybe not."

I waved a hand at Sama Pyo, who had gone stiff as a statue, and turned to the other, enormous unorthodox grunt beside him.

Before I could say a word, I got a booming answer.

Grrrrowl. Grrrrrrrrowl.

"…"

What the fuck?

This wasn't the World Cup final, yet a vuvuzela was blaring in the middle of Nanman. Namho burst out laughing.

"Hoho! That bastard. If only I'd learned martial arts, I'd cut that goddamn belly open. Hahaha!"

Given how much he'd been laughing, he seemed about halfway out of his mind. Hyuk Mujin stared at him in fear, then turned to me.

"Captain."

"Head to the floor."

"What?"

"Ah, sorry. That was just a habit. But if you start talking nonsense like the others in this situation, I'll kill you."

"No, that's not it. This Blood Monk or whatever he's called… Isn't there too little information about him for a martial artist?"

It was the most sensible thing anyone had said since Ju Hwaran spoke. I scratched the back of my head in frustration and smacked my lips.

"That's true. How fucking old is he, anyway? How is there not a single person who knows him?"

Namho, who'd been shooting Taishan a murderous glare, cut in.

"Speaking as someone who's old enough to know, I've never heard of him either. There was a fiend called the Killing Buddha during the Great Faction War, but he doesn't sound much like this Blood Monk. The man was ancient even then. I doubt he's still alive."

[2861] In China, one li is about 500 m (0.311 mi); a thousand li is about 500 km (311 mi).

If Namho had been just some old man from another tribe, that might not have meant much. But he'd held a fairly important post in the Hidden Shadow Pavilion. Chances were he was right.

Then who the hell is this guy? He sounds like some hidden master.

If even Namho, a man from the distant past, and the Fire Dragon Pavilion members of the current generation had never heard of him, then he was truly a freak.

But what mattered most wasn't the Blood Monk's identity. It was who stood behind him—and what he wanted.

Namho tapped his knees, as if he'd read my mind.

"We can't be sure yet, but there's a strong chance Dark Heaven is behind the Blood Monk."

"I agree. I said as much at the Tribal Grand Council."

"What do the Beast Miao King and the other chieftains think?"

"We decided to send some scouts and warriors toward Guizhou first, but before that… Baeksang's reaction bothered me."

"He told you not to concern yourselves with affairs in the Central Plains, I suppose."

"Huh?"

"He's done it often enough. Ever since the Great Faction War, Baeksang has bristled at anything to do with the Central Plains. Even the few trade routes Nanman had were closed after the Bai people and several other tribes opposed them. What I wonder now is…"

Namho sighed quietly before continuing.

"Does his hostility come from the grief of losing his only child in a war between Han Chinese? Or did something that happened then leave him with a grudge against the orthodox faction?"

"Hmm."

"If it's the former, it may end with a bereaved father's resentment. But if it's the latter…"

Ju Hwaran, who had been listening in silence, murmured, "Betrayal. Enough to put all of Nanman in danger."

"Yes. If he's joined hands with Dark Heaven, this could spiral beyond anyone's control."

An enemy within was more dangerous than one outside. Even an impregnable fortress was no better than a sandcastle in the surf if it crumbled from the inside.

And if the traitor was the Great Chieftain who, alongside the Beast Miao King, held sway over half of Nanman—

We're finished.

I had to uncover the plot taking shape inside Nanman and stop it. I also had to find out where the Blood Monk was headed as he made his way onward from distant Guizhou.

But even the System that had brought me from an F-rank Hunter to where I stood now couldn't split me in two.

In that case…

I raised my head and slowly looked over everyone around me.

I recalled their martial arts, characteristics, and personalities one by one as I considered who was best suited for the task. Who could return alive from an unknown danger?

I was deep in thought, with no end to it in sight, when someone spoke.

"I'll go."

"…!"

"Please send me. I will complete the mission and return without fail."

I was startled twice: first that she'd understood what I was thinking without a word from me, and then that the person who'd spoken was Ju Hwaran.

My answer came out as if I'd settled on it from the start.

"No."

"Why? Do you think that old monster, the Blood Monk, will hurt me?"

"That's…"

"My martial arts may be meager compared to yours, Pavilion Master, but I believe I am strong enough to protect myself."

"Young Lady Ju."

"I know what you're worried about. Of course I couldn't take on the Blood Monk. But warriors handpicked by the Nanman Beast Palace will be with us, and some of our members will come, too. Tell me if I'm wrong."

I pressed my lips together instead of answering. She wasn't wrong.

I'd planned to send some Fire Dragon Pavilion members with the scouting party that would soon depart. They would find out who the Blood Monk was and what he wanted, and I'd accounted for the possibility of a fight.

What I hadn't considered was Ju Hwaran volunteering.

"Pavilion Master. No—Benefactor."

Benefactor.

That was what she'd first called me months ago, just after we'd settled the Yongbong Escort Bureau's affairs in Sichuan.

For a moment, I could almost smell the flowers in the Fire Courtyard, where we'd taken our last walk before leaving. The eyes that had been wet beneath the moonlight then now shone with firm resolve.

"Please send me. Send me."

"…!"

"I can do it."

A thought came to me.

I would never be able to refuse a request made with those eyes and that voice. Not now, not ever.

Whew.

The wind was hot. My mouth tasted bitter.

I let out a small sigh and finally nodded.

Ju Hwaran's face lit up. In the distance, music announcing the start of the banquet was already playing.

Chapter 647

The banquet was being held in a large training ground inside the Inner Palace.

The place was large enough to accommodate more than a thousand warriors. Every kind of delicacy had been laid out, and the grounds were packed with people, including the tribal chieftains.

And at the most honored seat in the training ground, someone was waiting for me.

“You’ve arrived.”

The Beast Miao King spotted me from his high-backed chair adorned with tiger skin and beckoned me over.

“Come sit. I had a place prepared for you.”

The seat assigned to me was directly beside the Beast Miao King, on his left.

It was exceptional treatment for an outsider, but given my status and what I’d done the previous night, it wasn’t all that strange.

That didn’t mean every member of the Fire Dragon Pavilion was getting the same treatment, of course.

“I’ve prepared places for all of you at this banquet as well. Eat, drink, and enjoy your—”

“Taishan! Meat!”

Grab! Chomp, chomp, chomp!

Taishan swept up the meat on the table in front of him. The Beast Miao King stared at me, baffled.

“…What in the world is that fellow?”

“…He’s just insane. Don’t pay him too much attention.”

At a glance from me, Taishan’s mom—no, Sama Pyo—let out a long sigh, grabbed Taishan, and dragged him away. Namho, who’d been watching for an opening like an assassin, snatched up a nearby wine bottle and smashed it against the top of Taishan’s head.

Crash!

Water Style without any water…?

He’d really put his back into that one.

But Taishan drank from the fountain of wine bursting over his head and cried out happily.

“Namho! Thank you! Taishan was thirsty!”

“Die. Please, just die…!”

The Beast Miao King watched them, then turned an uneasy look on me.

“Hmm. Your subordinates get along well.”

“They do. So well that one could die and the other wouldn’t notice.”

"Is that why you didn't send them?"

I paused before answering. "You heard about that? News travels fast."

"I don't involve myself in every matter, but I hear about them all. That is the position of Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace."

He had a point. Since outsiders had joined the scouts, it wouldn't have been strange for a report to have already reached him through the great chieftains.

I thought of the three people who should be heading somewhere northeast by now and muttered inwardly.

Will they be all right?

After a great deal of thought, I'd chosen three people: Ju Hwaran, Song Ilseom, and Hyuk Mujin.

Regardless of my concerns, Ju Hwaran possessed exceptional martial prowess and experience compared to other young prodigies. Song Ilseom needed no explanation, and the last member, Hyuk Mujin, was…

Whatever else you could say about him, the man has the survival instincts of a cockroach.

Despite how he looked, Hyuk Mujin had survived countless battlefields alongside me, from Shanxi Province to the present day, escaping death at every turn.

He was so good at wriggling his way out of danger that Jeok Cheongang had once said,

How has someone so weak and cowardly survived this long?

I'd answered:

Because he's weak and cowardly.

It was true that Hyuk Mujin's martial arts fell short of the others'. Calling him cowardly wasn't wrong, either.

But you could also call it caution.

He has an uncanny knack for avoiding the worst danger. And when he can't avoid it, he fights for his life.

No wonder he always came back alive. I might as well change his nickname to Hyukroach.

"They'll do well. No matter what happens."

I muttered that with a personal wish behind it, then glanced over the Beast Miao King's shoulder.

"By the way, there are a lot of empty seats for a banquet that's already started."

"They'll be here soon."

He said it casually, but the Beast Miao King's eyes had grown heavy and dark. This was especially true whenever he looked at the empty seat directly to his right.

Baeksang.

The chieftains who had left the main hall following him were already seated, but Baeksang, Yohi, and Heugung had yet to return.

The Beast Miao King stared at their empty seats for a while before silently tilting the wine bottle.

Drip.

The sun had long since set behind the western mountains, yet the Nanman Beast Palace glowed against the darkness. Festivities were taking place everywhere.

The Tribal Grand Council, held only once a year, was also an occasion for unity, and the countless tribespeople who had poured into the streets were laughing and talking with bright faces as they enjoyed themselves.

Or, at least, they probably were. I couldn't see them from here, but the cheers and firecracker explosions drifting over from the Outer Palace were more than enough to tell me.

Whoosh! Boom!

Waaaaaaah!

If I only listened to the noise, I would have thought it was at least a Samba Festival.

"So, um… Is this really okay?"

"What do you mean?"

"You know. Everyone seems to have amnesia. They all know what happened at Ailao Mountain barely a day ago."

He didn't seem concerned. "They do. That's why the festival is even grander."

"Because of that?"

"Yes. Every one of them was a brave warrior who fought and died for Nanman. So they believe that each of them has returned to the arms of the god their tribe worships. Though they died in this world, they believe they were reborn as warriors of their god."

"…"

I'd heard something like that before.

It brought to mind the Middle Eastern terrorist group I'd beaten up before logging in.

They aren't Crusaders or ancient Vikings.

All kinds of superstitions ran rampant in the Central Plains as well, but Nanman was clearly different. Perhaps it was because so many indigenous faiths existed here.

As someone born and raised in the twenty-first century, though, I couldn't understand it.

"Do you believe that too, Great Hero Yayul?"

At my question, the Beast Miao King, who had been about to raise his wine cup, let out a short laugh.

“Interesting.”

“What is?”

“Isn’t it only natural? You asked that question of an old Miao man born and raised in Nanman—and of the Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace, at that.”

“Oh.”

“But that isn’t why I laughed. It reminded me that someone else asked me the same thing a very long time ago.”

I had a pretty good idea who. “My Old Master—no, my master?”

“Old Jeok? No. He had no interest in whether the local gods existed. He did tell me to call him if those Demonic Cult bastards ever set Nanman on fire. He said he’d gladly come help, at least once.”

“…”

That old man hated leaving home, yet he’d volunteered to travel here for some killing. His grudge over Mount Jiuhua must have gone right down to the bone.

I nodded reflexively. “Then who asked you?”

His answer was simple, clear, and baffling.

“God.”

“Sorry? What?”

As I stood there, momentarily dumbfounded by the incomprehensible answer, the Beast Miao King continued while stroking his full wine cup.

“The Martial God. Someone whose name, age, and even face are not properly known. A divine man who was born human and became something beyond humanity. That person asked me whether I truly believed my god existed.”

“…!”

“So I answered, ‘Honestly, I don’t know. But I think I’m looking at one right now.‘”

The crescent moon reflected in his wine cup rippled. The Beast Miao King downed the wine and moon together, then burst into laughter.

“It was a foolish answer, but what else could I say? That day, the Martial God single-handedly defeated five fiends who had reached the Supreme Peak realm and five hundred members of the Blood Ghost Squad. When I first met him, he had a snow-white beard that fluttered like an immortal’s. At our second and final meeting, he looked like a young boy.”

“…”

“More than fifty years have passed, but I still remember that day as clearly as ever.”

I listened with my mouth hanging open, unable to speak.

The Blood Ghost Squad. I knew the name. It came up whenever Jeok Cheongang launched into one of his “back in my day” stories.

The Blood Ghost Squad had been the Demonic Cult's premier strike force, sweeping across the Central Plains at the head of a hundred thousand demonic troops. Every single member was said to have been a Peak master.

Five hundred Peak masters. And five fiends at the Supreme Peak realm on top of that.

The Martial God had wiped out that entire force alone.

Even coming from the Beast Miao King, I would have dismissed the story as nonsense if not for those two words: Martial God.

…Just how powerful was he?

Jeok Cheongang. Mungyeong. Mae Jonghak. And others.

I had heard stories about the Martial God until my ears bled from people who deserved to be called giants in the long history of the Murim.

And yet I still didn't know. What kind of realm had that master reached? No—was he even human at all?

And why had someone so extraordinary suddenly vanished without a trace? Where was he now, and what was he doing?

One thought led to another. Then, without warning, someone's name came to mind.

…Wait.

The fingers tapping against the table stopped dead.

My eyes flew open, but they were not looking at the banquet hall before me. Nor were they looking at the Murim.

They were looking beyond the hot, heavy air blowing in from far away—beyond some unknown realm that could not be explained in words—to another world and the person who existed there.

Cheon Taemin.

The savior who'd rescued humanity from the Demon King Asmodeus. An immortal legend, called a living god by his followers.

A man who had one day been cut off from the world and fallen into a deep sleep.

I knew exactly why I'd thought of him.

He's like the Martial God.

It could have been a coincidence, but they had too much in common to dismiss it so easily. The Martial God's exploits in the Great Faction War and Cheon Taemin's in the Great Cataclysm—even their actions immediately afterward.

No way. No. No, that's impossible.

I couldn't follow the thought any further. The musicians had stopped playing, the dancers had stopped moving, and every eye was on the man climbing the stairs.

"Welcome, little brother."

Baeksang, flanked by great chieftains as though he were the Palace Lord himself, answered the Beast Miao King's greeting.

“I’m late, Palace Lord.”

I came out of my thoughts and finally met his gaze, cold enough to freeze everything around him.

The banquet has begun.

Security in the Outer Palace has been reinforced.

About two hundred elite warriors from the Inner Palace are moving through the North Gate.

As the Sound Transmissions from her subordinates pierced the darkness one after another, someone buried in the shadows rose from her seat.

Final report. What is the target?

The Blood Monk of Guizhou. The targets are moving for reconnaissance and possible combat. At Jin Taekyung’s order, the group includes Ju Hwaran, the Young Bureau Head of the Yongbong Escort Bureau; Song Ilseom, the Soul-Chasing Guest; and Hyuk Mujin of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

It would have been surprising for anyone to know Song Ilseom’s past, known to only a select few. Not for the shadow and her subordinates.

“Ha.”

After letting out a quiet laugh, the shadow turned around in one smooth motion.

Snap.

Fingers struck together in the darkness. A strand of flame sprang up, casting light around it.

Fwoosh.

The flame was a dark, ominous reddish brown. Watching it flicker, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress smiled.

Chapter 648

It was as though the world had stopped.

The music cut off all at once, as if on cue. People froze in place.

In the sudden silence, the Beast Miao King spoke, breaking Baeksang's cold stare.

"Little brother, take your seat."

Baeksang's gaze slowly left me. Perhaps he had changed in the meantime; his sleeves were now snow-white as he resumed his climb.

"Very well."

Step. Step.

His clothes were neat and his voice calm, just as they had been in the main hall, as though nothing had happened. He climbed the stairs with two great chieftains flanking him, and bitterness seemed to cloud the Beast Miao King's eyes as he watched.

I suppose that's understandable.

One called him little brother. The other answered, "Palace Lord."

They weren't related by blood, but I'd heard they had grown up together as sworn brothers. Yet I had never once heard Baeksang call the Beast Miao King hyung[2862].

A thought occurred to me.

What was the Beast Miao King to Baeksang?

A sworn elder brother he still felt some affection for?

Or merely the Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace, someone above him in the hierarchy?

Or perhaps…

An enemy whose involvement in the Great Faction War had cost him his only son?

I didn't know. But I had a feeling I would find out soon enough, one way or another.

I hoped it would go well. The Beast Miao King seemed to hope so too.

"It's been a long time since this foolish elder brother filled your cup."

Baeksang looked silently at the wine bottle in the Beast Miao King's hand, then answered in a dry voice.

"I've kept away from wine and women for decades. I must respectfully decline."

The Nanman Beast Palace might be a tribal society governed through a kind of divided rule, but the Palace Lord's authority was considerable. Only Baeksang could have refused him like that. Before he was the Great Chieftain of the Bai people, he was the Beast Miao King's sworn younger brother.

[2862] Hyung is a Korean form of address a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

“You liked fruit wine when you were young. Won’t you even accept a drink poured by me now? I made this wine myself for you.”

“…”

“Baeksang.”

At the quiet call, tinged with hurt and bitterness, Baeksang slowly closed his eyes, opened them again, and raised his cup.

“If you insist, I suppose I have no choice.”

“Then…”

“I’ll accept the cup, at least.”

The Beast Miao King’s face brightened. He filled Baeksang’s cup to the brim, then whispered softly enough that only Baeksang and I could hear.

“I hope you’ll both forget what happened in the main hall. You each wronged the other. There’s no use blaming either of you alone.”

Baeksang was still suspicious, and I still didn’t like him. But I wasn’t stupid enough to hit the gas now.

“All right. I did go a little too far.”

“…”

Baeksang gave me an unreadable look, then nodded slightly.

“I apologize for my unseemly behavior, Palace Lord.”

It was a surprisingly compliant answer.

The Beast Miao King smiled with satisfaction. Turning to the crowd, he called out, “Today is a joyous occasion for every tribe of Nanman and our honored guests who have traveled all the way from the Central Plains. Eat and drink to your hearts’ content!”

His voice rang across the quiet training ground. The music started again, and the men and women dancing picked up where they had left off.

At last, the mood began to ease.

Then a Sound Transmission reached my ear, hard as stone.

—Honored guests from the Central Plains, are we? How amusing.

Aha. I knew that had gone too smoothly.

I scratched the bridge of my nose and glanced at the Beast Miao King. He had risen and was encouraging the chieftains around him and the warriors they had brought, unaware of what was happening behind him.

—Leave. There is no place for you in this land.

I drained my cup in one gulp and moved my lips.

—Our great chieftain isn’t very generous, is he? I know you hate the Han Chinese, but how many people did I rescue at Ailao Mountain last night?

—I’ll pay you.

—What?

—What do you want? Gold? Silver? Name it. I'll give you gold and silver treasures heavier than your own body.

—…Hmm.

The sweet fragrance of the fruit wine turned bitter, just like my mood.

Gold and silver treasures.

I'd expected a cold reception, but this felt far worse than I'd imagined. I refilled my cup and sent another Sound Transmission.

—I didn't do it for a reward. Do people in Nanman put a price on human lives?

—Of course not. The life of a tribesman is beyond price. But it's different when the other party is Han Chinese.

—Why?

—Because you people…

The Sound Transmission trailed off. Baeksang stared at his full cup with gloomy gray eyes, then shook his head.

—I've said too much. Stop arguing and leave.

—If you stop there, I won't sleep tonight. Why not tell me what's bothering you, and we can look for a way to settle it?

—A way to settle it?

He gave a short laugh.

It was the first time I'd seen Baeksang laugh, and there was no mistaking the contempt and mockery in it.

Clink—crash!

The sound was nearly lost beneath the banquet, but I saw and heard it clearly. His porcelain cup struck the ground and shattered, sending wine splashing in every direction.

Trickle. Drip.

As the spilled fruit wine soaked the stone steps and dripped from one to the next, Baeksang's Sound Transmission reached me again.

—It is already too late to turn things back. Just like those.

—Hmm.

Too late? Is it really?

I studied the broken cup, then reached out.

Fwoosh!

A thread of internal energy flowed from my fingertips and swept gently across the ground. As though time had turned backward, the pieces that had lost their shape moments ago rose and flew into my open hand.

Sss. Tick, tick!

Dozens of fragments drew together like magnets. I used internal energy to bind their broken edges until they formed a cup again.

"…!"

"…!"

A murmur rippled through the onlookers. I subtly turned my head to look around. The reactions of those who had been watching us from earlier were quite a sight.

Namho and Heugung stood frozen with their mouths hanging open. A strange light flashed through Sama Pyo and Yohi's eyes. Taishan had even forgotten to chew his meat and was staring blankly.

Not bad. My control over internal energy really has gotten finer since I opened my Middle Dantian.

If nothing else, stopping Taishan from eating was an achievement worth celebrating.

"Hmm, good. That's some excellent Seizing an Object Through Empty Space."

Baeksang watched me praise myself and spoke in an even voice.

"Was that meant to show off your martial arts? It's a pitiful cup for all your effort."

"Pitiful?"

"It can't hold anything. The wine will leak out before you can pour it in."

He wasn't entirely wrong. I wasn't a god. Short of turning back time, I couldn't restore the cup perfectly. I must have missed some fragments, because hairline cracks ran all through it. Even I couldn't recover the wine that had already soaked into the ground and the steps.

But…

"You're so damn picky. Just drink it."

I picked up the bottle and poured without hesitation—not merely filling the cup, but letting the wine overflow. Then I wrapped my whole hand around it to cover the places where it leaked and tipped it into my mouth.

Gulp.

My throat burned as if I'd swallowed fire. When I spoke, my voice came out heated, carrying the fragrant scent of fruit wine.

"What's the big deal? Cracked or broken, if you can put something in it and drink from it, it's a cup."

"…!"

Baeksang's gaze darkened.

—And what will you do about the wine spilled on the ground long ago?

Anyone else hearing that might have wondered what on earth he was talking about. But it sounded different to me after our earlier exchange of Sound Transmissions.

The cup is trust. The spilled wine is people.

During the Great Faction War, the Nanman Beast Palace had been forced to lose countless tribespeople. Afterward, because of some matter he did not even want to mention, Baeksang had completely lost his trust in the Central Plains.

By putting the shattered cup back together, I'd tried to show him what I meant.

I don't know whether he'll take this as a plea to trust once more or as a final warning…

Either way, I'd made my meaning clear.

I looked across the training ground, where the banquet was in full swing. At the center of the countless cheering people stood the Beast Miao King, watching me with profound eyes.

Whoa. That man doesn't miss a thing.

I felt like a high school kid caught causing trouble. I gave him a deliberate shrug, rose, and ambled off.

"Where are you going?" Baeksang asked behind me.

I threw back a brief answer in a deep voice.

"To take a piss!"

That fruit wine was surprisingly strong.

"Kh… urk!"

He was a bear of a man. But his towering, eight-cheok[2863] frame and more than a jiazi's[2864] worth of internal energy weren't enough to save him from the death before him.

Crunch!

"Urk… Y-you. Who are you?"

A hand held his throat in an unyielding grip. Blood ran from the crown of his head, and between that and the lack of air, his vision had gone red and blurry.

He drew on every last bit of strength he had to speak.

"P-please… s-save me…"

He wanted to live. Desperately. But the strange man gripping his throat had other ideas.

Crack!

Bone broke, and the whites of the man's eyes showed. When the life left him and his body went limp, the stranger released his grip.

Thud!

[2863] A cheok is a traditional Korean length of about 30.3 cm (11.9 in). Eight cheok is about 2.42 m (7 ft 11 in).

[2864] A jiazi is one complete sixty-year cycle in the traditional Chinese calendar.

The heavy body rolled onto the ground. Without a moment's hesitation over the life he had taken, the stranger thought, Ah. Was that the last one?

Only half a shichen[2865] had passed since enemies suddenly appeared at both ends of the gorge and shouted:

"I'll tear you apart and kill you to avenge my martial brothers and friends!"

"Kill him!"

That was how the one-against-many battle had begun. After killing the men who rushed him from every direction without pause, he'd lost count.

About two hundred, I'd say.

They had gathered quite a force. The outcome had been all but decided from the start, though.

A sea of corpses and blood.

Only those four characters could describe the sight. The stranger, having once again left his mark on an unnamed gorge in Guizhou, picked up the weapon he had left leaning against a rock.

Clang. Clatter.

His Zen staff rattled as it swayed.

Stepping through a pool of blood, he headed somewhere to the south.

[2865] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

Chapter 649

Magic and machines.

Compared to the modern world, with all its technological conveniences, the Murim was a difficult place to live.

Its unpaved roads could wreck your hips and back even if all you did was sit in a carriage.

Smartphones and Wi-Fi were out of the question, and there wasn't any electricity. The only way to get some was to take a direct lightning strike, but trading your life for electricity was terrible value for money.

Still, I'd managed to live without any of it.

No—my life had been so precarious that I'd never had time to worry about it. After that, things had been more or less fine.

They say food, clothing, and shelter are the three essentials of life. By that measure, I'd lived pretty luxuriously as the Third Young Master of the Jin Family of Taiyuan.

Except for one thing.

I fixed a grave stare on the non-Han servant from the Inner Palace. Even being generous, he looked no older than a middle schooler.

"I'm going to ask you one thing. Think carefully before you answer."

"Yes?"

"Are you looking down on me because I'm Han Chinese?"

His eyes went round, and he waved his hands.

"N-no, sir. How could this lowly one dare…"

"Then why did you bring me to this shithole? I'm pretty sure I asked you to take me to the latrine."

"T-this is the latrine, sir."

"I told you to think carefully. Lie to me again, and I'll fill your house with shit. You've heard of the Beggars' Sect in the Central Plains, right?"

"Yes? Yes. Isn't that the sect made up of beggars?"

"Exactly. One word from me, and I can bring several thousand beggars here… Well, maybe not thousands. About a hundred. One of them, Gung Gibang, smells absolutely monstrous. They'll shit-dismember you and all nine generations of your family. So take me to a proper latrine!"

The servant flinched at my roar, his eyes filling with tears.

"I-I'm sorry. I'm truly sorry, but this is the cleanest latrine we have."

Damn it. I'd hoped I was wrong, but this shithole really was the latrine.

The truth I didn't want to face made my vision go dark. Even the Central Plains hadn't been this bad.

“These savages…”

“Sir?”

“Never mind. You can go.”

I sent the innocent servant away, stared into the narrow space full of a hideous stench, and carefully set one foot inside.

Creeeak.

The plank beneath me shrieked. Once I shut the door, I felt like I’d stepped into a chemical-warfare chamber built for one. Grim-faced, I muttered to myself.

Did Baeksang dig this trap for me?

I’d seen it plenty of times in martial-arts novels: some incredible master gets assassinated in a latrine, or something like that.

But after I checked the gaps between the planks, even that suspicion vanished. No matter how dedicated an assassin was, I couldn’t imagine one hiding down there.

Please. God. Buddha. Namu Amitabha, Guanyin, amen…

Every second felt like ten years.

It was just as I had accepted reality and was holding my breath while doing my business.

Whoosh—thud!

It happened in an instant.

I reached out on reflex and caught the object that had punched through the old door with a sharp whistle.

An arrow?

The moment I recognized it, I shot into motion like lightning.

Boom!

The door shattered, and fresh night air greeted me. But that was all.

There was nothing around me. Nothing except the cheers and musical instruments I could hear from somewhere not too far away.

Still…

Southeast.

At my level, working out where the arrow had come from wasn’t difficult. I kicked off the ground without hesitation.

Boom! Whoosh!

Wind swept over me. I sprang off a wall and landed atop the highest pavilion, with the Inner Palace spread out below.

Torches lit the grounds. People enjoyed the banquet at the training ground. Warriors stood guard everywhere.

Who the hell was it?

Even someone in the Supreme Peak realm had limits. The Inner Palace was too vast to search at a glance, and several times more people than usual were moving through it.

Unfortunately for me, the Nanman Beast Palace warriors on alert for trouble took their duties seriously.

“Southwest! On the pavilion!”

“Who goes there?”

Peeeep!

At the sharp blast of a whistle, the warriors patrolling the Inner Palace swarmed toward me like ants.

Something else arrived first.

Whoooosh! Boom!

Hmm. This has gotten a little complicated.

I looked at the arrow and spear embedded near my feet, then checked the arrow in my hand again. It was identical to the new arrivals in size and shape.

But there was one important difference I’d missed.

This is…

A small leather bundle hung from its fletching.

The moment I realized it was there, dozens of torches flared to life beneath the pavilion where I stood.

“You’re surrounded!”

“Identify yourself and surrender immediately!”

Perfect timing.

After a brief moment’s thought, I silently gave a command.

Open Inventory. Store.

Ding.

At the System’s clear chime, the arrow vanished from my hand as if it had never existed.

Unable to make out what had happened in the darkness, the warriors of the Inner Palace shouted again.

“This is your final warning! Disarm yourself and surrender!”

“Put both hands over your head! Otherwise, I’ll put an arrow through your skull!”

“…”

That was a pretty savage script. Was this what they called a local patch?

I smacked my lips at the Nanman version of the NYPD and raised both hands as instructed. Once they knew who I was, the misunderstanding would clear up quickly. A few excuses, and that would be that.

Making more trouble would only make things harder for me…

Why are they looking at me like that?

They look as though they've seen a ghost.

Then I realized.

Fwoosh.

A breeze blew in from somewhere. My lower half felt unusually cool tonight.

Fwoosh.

"A-ah…!"

"Good heavens…!"

Dozens of torches shone on me like spotlights.

As the warriors forgot their duties long enough to gasp, I had one thought.

I'm really fucked.

I'd forgotten to pull up my pants.

"I'm asking because I genuinely want to know."

Namho, whom I met about half a shichen[2866] later, spoke with perfect composure.

"You bastard. Are you Dark Heaven?"

"…"

"You keep doing this because you're Dark Heaven, don't you? Huh?"

"…"

"Of course you are. What else could you be? Why would a Murim Alliance pavilion master come all the way to Nanman, punch a Great Chieftain in the solar plexus, then climb onto a pavilion in the middle of the night with his lower half on display? You came here determined to wreck the alliance admission from the start, didn't you? Am I wrong?"

Taishan, who was sitting at the table chewing something, shot up a hand.

"Namho, what is Dark Heaven? Taishan is curious."

Namho gave Taishan a long, searching look before turning to Sama Pyo.

"I'm asking you from the bottom of my heart. How do I put a padlock on that goddamn bastard's mouth?"

"Hmm."

After a moment's thought, Sama Pyo stood.

"I'll get more food."

"Good idea. But as an agent of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion with a keen eye, let me add this: don't bring the food here. Take him to it. If I hear one more word of his bullshit, I might go insane."

"…"

[2866] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

"…"

Namho was prickly even on a good day. Today, he was all sharp edges. Even oblivious Taishan looked frightened enough to apologize.

"Taishan… was wrong…"

Namho shot him a murderous glare, then steadied his breathing.

I knew my turn was coming and spoke first.

"Well… there's been a bit of a misunderstanding."

"A misunderstanding? What kind of dogshit misunderstanding?"

"Could you not put it like that? Just hear me out…"

"I heard everything! I heard every last bit of it! There are even witnesses! More than two hundred people saw it! Did you send Young Lady Ju here for this? Is that your thing?"

"Wow, come to think of it, it would've been awful if Young Lady Ju had been there. Thank God she wasn't…"

"You little baaastard!"

Boom! Crack!

That old man was over eighty, but he sure was strong. He had smashed apart that sturdy table with one blow.

I barely stopped myself from applauding. One more provocation, and Namho looked liable to die of rage.

"Elder Nam, calm down. Calm down," Sama Pyo said.

"Huff. Hah."

"Deep breath in, then out. Good. Just like that."

After soothing Namho with a look of concern that hardly suited a man of the unorthodox faction, Sama Pyo turned to me.

"Anyway, Pavilion Master, is what you just said true?"

"Yeah, damn it. There was a small misunderstanding I can't exactly tell other people about…"

"Did you really send Young Lady Ju here for this?"

"You fucking bastard."

How had things ended up like this? At this rate, my nickname would change to the Naked Divine Dragon.

I stared at the ceiling in despair, then finally managed to speak.

"That's not it. I was attacked before any of that happened."

"What?"

"Attacked?"

"Oh. Taishan knows what an attack is."

All three of them focused on me at once. Namho's eyes widened.

“When? Where?”

“In the latrine. I was doing my business when an arrow came flying in from outside. I ran out to find whoever shot it, and that’s how I ended up like this. I didn’t even have time to pull up my pants.”

“Then the culprit! Did you catch him?”

“Do you think I did? It was shot from far away, and there were so many people in the Inner Palace that I failed to find him.”

A dagger or poisoned needle would have made things easier. Hidden weapons like those had a much shorter range.

A bow could strike from quite a distance. That made the culprit much harder to find.

“Then why didn’t you say so from the start?” Namho demanded. “If you’d been attacked, you could have reported it to the Palace Lord immediately and had the culprit hunted down.”

He had a point. I’d considered telling them the truth. It would have been better than letting everyone think I was a pervert wandering around at night with his pants off.

But…

“Someone did shoot an arrow at me. I just don’t think it was an attack.”

“What?”

“What’s that supposed to mean?”

“Taishan knows attacks. Taishan does not know attacks that are not attacks. Explain it to Taishan.”

“Die. Please die.”

Having shut Taishan down, Namho frowned at me.

“It wasn’t an attack?”

“Yes.”

“Then there was something hidden. Tell me in more detail.”

“I didn’t notice until later, but there was something strange attached to the arrow.”

As I answered, I spread my Qi Sense over a wide area. Once I was sure no one else was nearby, I silently gave another command.

Open Inventory. Summon.

Ding.

Something settled into my hand. I drew the hand I’d kept tucked inside my robes back out, bringing with it the arrow that had flown into the latrine. Then I untied the small leather pouch hanging from its fletching.

The rolled-up leather unfurled across the table. Smaller than a child’s palm, it bore letters as tiny as sesame seeds.

> Today. Insi[2867]. West Gate.

It was a missive—an invitation from someone whose identity I didn’t know.

[2867] Insi is the traditional time period from three to five in the morning.

Chapter 650

The banquet held in the Inner Palace alongside the Tribal Grand Council that day didn't begin to wind down until nearly the Ox hour.[2868]

For me, that was a relief. Otherwise, I'd have had to endure the stares and whispers coming from every direction all night.

"That Han Chinese fellow—wasn't he up on a pavilion with his pants off?"

"What? What are you talking about?"

"My wife's nephew is with the Inner Palace guard. Apparently, that brief alert a shichen[2869] ago was because of him."

"Now that you mention it, I did hear a whistle… But wasn't that when he said he was going to take a leak?"

"Maybe he didn't go take a leak. Maybe he wanted to show everyone something else. People have all kinds of tastes, you know. Could be a Central Plains custom."

"Good heavens. I had no idea the Central Plains had such a barbaric custom."

"Barbaric as it gets. But separate from that, he does seem pretty impressive."

"What does?"

"You know. That."

"Ah…"

"According to my nephew, they nearly attacked him because they thought he was holding a weapon. Until they shone a torch on him, they thought it was a spear."

"What? How could anyone mistake it for a spear?"

"Come now. Do you think 'dragon' was added to his sobriquet for no reason? A dragon is a dragon."

"Whaaaaaat!"

SYSTEM

Rumors about you are spreading far and wide!
A considerable number of influential figures are reacting to the rumors!
Fame has increased slightly!
Fame has increased slightly!

"…"

Please stop. And why did my Fame have to go up again?

My fucking life…

[2868] The Ox hour is a traditional time period from one to three in the morning.

[2869] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

I did my best to ignore the whispers around me as I tipped back the last of my drink. Seeing me like that, the Beast Miao King laughed heartily and patted me on the shoulder.

"Don't take it so hard. These things happen to a man."

"When you put it like that, it sounds like I did it on purpose. It was an accident. I was in such a hurry to get out that I forgot to fasten my trousers…"

"Hm? Why were you in such a hurry?"

"Ah, well…"

Damn it. That had slipped out.

I still hadn't told even the Beast Miao King about the missive from the unidentified sender. After a brief silence, I gave up.

"Actually, I did do it on purpose."

"Oh my."

"I've been like that since I was young. Still do it now and then."

"Good grief."

"It's my hobby and my special talent. You thought I only used one spear? I actually use two."

"Whaaaaaat…"

If I died in Nanman, it wouldn't matter how it happened. The cause of death would be humiliation.

But I couldn't tell him the truth. Whoever had contacted me this way wanted to meet in secret, which meant I wasn't supposed to tell anyone else.

At the very least, no one in the Nanman Beast Palace can know.

I trusted the Beast Miao King. But nowhere were trust and faith cheaper words than in Murim. No one knew what might happen.

Besides, if the Beast Miao King found out, someone else might notice.

That man, for instance.

I met Baeksang's impassive gaze. The longer I looked at him, the less I could read in his eyes.

He had spent the entire banquet sitting without lifting a finger to touch the food or alcohol. Now, after meeting my gaze, he smoothed his immaculate white robes, rose from his seat, and spoke.

"Palace Lord, it is already late. Let us end the banquet here."

"Hm. Let us."

The Beast Miao King nodded without hesitation. The Tribal Grand Council would continue tomorrow, after all.

Of course, since everyone present was a Peak master who practiced martial arts, none of them would suffer from a hangover. Even so, drinking in an atmosphere like this was bound to dull the mind.

Drip. Drip.

The Beast Miao King expelled the alcohol through his fingertips. His face clear again, he announced the end of the banquet, drawing disappointed murmurs from around the room.

Not any of them, then. The appointed time is nearly here, and they're disappointed the banquet's ending.

After quickly checking the faces of those who looked disappointed, I spoke to the Beast Miao King.

"Sir Yayul, I should head in too."

"Of course. Which pavilion will you be going to this time?"

"…"

Seriously?

He took one look at my face, slapped his knee, and laughed. I sighed and left with Namho and the rest of the unorthodox faction underlings.

By then, the night had deepened, and the time had entered Insi.[2870]

It was time to meet whoever had sent the missive.

"Are you sure you'll be all right going alone? It could be a trap."

On the way to the quarters assigned to the Fire Dragon Pavilion, I reassured the worried-looking Namho.

"I'll be fine. Besides, Elder Nam, you'd only be a burden if you came."

"…"

"Were you thinking of following me?"

"I've lived a fairly long life, but I have no desire to die like a stray dog."

"Then stay in the quarters with the other two deadweights."

Taishan, as usual, gave it little thought. Sama Pyo was less pleased to be called deadweight when he was one of the unorthodox faction's finest young prodigies, but my next words shut him up.

"If you don't like it, reach Supreme Peak."

"…"

"I can somehow survive, but you two can't. Keep watch around the quarters until I return. And swing your swords at least one more time while you're at it."

We went inside together as though nothing were amiss. Fifteen minutes later, I slipped out unnoticed and disappeared into the darkness.

Around Insi.[2871] The West Gate, right?

[2870] Insi is the traditional time period from three to five in the morning.

[2871] Insi is the traditional time period from three to five in the morning.

I had no idea whether the contents of the missive tied to the arrow were a trap or an attempt to make contact in order to share information. I could only go and find out for myself.

Whoosh, whoosh!

I kept out of sight of the patrolling warriors as I moved. Before long, the cheers and clamor that had echoed faintly in the distance grew louder.

Fwoosh! Boom!

"Waaaaaaah!"

The banquet in the Inner Palace was over, but the night's festivities in the Outer Palace were still going strong. They would go on tomorrow and the day after, too.

The ordinary tribespeople—neither the chieftains attending the Tribal Grand Council nor the warriors standing guard—were completely immersed in the festival atmosphere.

So that's why the meeting place is in the Outer Palace. It's more crowded now than at any other time of year.

I slipped into the crowd. The streets were packed with people wearing animal masks, and no one gave me a second look in the tiger mask I'd worn before.

The West Gate… Is that over there?

The Outer Palace was in a festive mood, but its guards hadn't let their vigilance slip. I avoided the warriors stationed along the way and soon reached the West Gate.

Or, more precisely, somewhere near it. The area was just as crowded as the rest of the Outer Palace.

I came where the missive told me to, but…

There were too many people here, and plenty of guards besides. If I stood around like a Great General guardian post,[2872] I was bound to draw attention.

What now?

I was looking around when someone called out.

"Hey, tiger-mask fellow. If you've got nothing better to do, come have a bowl of somyeon[2873] before you go."

I turned toward the voice and met the eyes of a middle-aged man at a nearby food stall. His face and eyes were unremarkable, and he was painfully thin. He grinned and raised the bowl in front of him.

"I don't usually talk to strangers, but the broth here is incredible."

"…Hm."

I wasn't sure the broth was the only incredible thing here.

[2872] "Great General of All Under Heaven" is an inscription on a Korean village guardian post, traditionally erected to stand watch at an entrance.

[2873] Somyeon is a dish of thin wheat noodles served here in broth.

I studied him for the briefest moment, then nodded and sat beside him. At last, I sent a thread of Sound Transmission to the unexpected contact.

—Funny. You've lost a lot of weight in a short time. You seemed to be eating plenty at the banquet.

"…!"

Clatter!

His thin body flinched and trembled. I picked up the chopsticks he had dropped and continued the Sound Transmission.

—So what brings the Great Chieftain of the Yi people here?

Heugung's eyes widened at the Sound Transmission in his ear.

Heugung was clearly shocked that I'd recognized him so quickly, but I was no less surprised.

He sent the missive?

We hadn't met often or spent much time together, but I'd already formed an opinion of him: a pathetic man so besotted with Yohi's beauty that he'd hand over his liver and gallbladder, and a spineless puppet who followed Baeksang's lead.

Perhaps that was why this surprised me so much. Neither his appearance nor his behavior matched the man I thought I knew. And that magnificent spare tire you could have made a pilgrimage around? Gone without a trace.

If not for the System, he'd have fooled me completely.

I marveled inwardly and put the chopsticks back in his hand, adding a casual remark for anyone who might be watching.

"Why'd you drop these all of a sudden? Feeling weak?"

Heugung came to his senses and hurriedly composed himself.

"Ah, thank you."

Only the two of us knew that Sound Transmissions were passing beneath our ordinary conversation.

"Sir, one bowl of somyeon,[2874] please."

I placed my order, then moved my lips.

—You sent the missive tied to the arrow, didn't you?

When the hunched old owner didn't stir, Heugung pounded on the stall.

"Sir! One bowl of somyeon!"[2875]

He grinned at me.

[2874] Somyeon is a dish of thin wheat noodles served here in broth.

[2875] Somyeon is a dish of thin wheat noodles served here in broth.

“You’ll have to excuse him. He’s over ninety, and his hearing isn’t what it used to be.”

—…Yes, I sent it. But I changed my appearance with the Bone-Shrinking Technique. How did you recognize me at a glance?

Ah. The Bone-Shrinking Technique.

That answered one question about his sudden transformation.

Jeok Cheongang had once told me it was a martial art that could stretch and shrink bone and flesh like rubber bands. Learning it was so difficult and painful that almost no one in the Central Plains practiced it.

I doubt it’s common in Nanman either.

I still had plenty of questions. While I waited for the somyeon,[2876] I spoke aloud.

“I was craving some hot broth anyway. This worked out nicely.”

—How I recognized you doesn’t matter. Why send that missive?

Heugung made sure I had chopsticks as he answered.

“If nothing else, the broth is excellent. He’s been running this stall almost as long as he’s been alive.”

—I had information I absolutely needed to tell you.

“Oh, really? Then I’ll look forward to it.”

—Were you trying to kill me or tell me something? I nearly ended up with an arrow through my head.

—I thought you’d dodge it. Even Great Chieftain Baeksang couldn’t get the better of you. Surely you could dodge one arrow.

“…”

Did he have any idea that arrow was how I’d become the Naked Divine Dragon?

I considered smacking him over the head, but generously restrained myself.

—So, what is this information you absolutely had to tell me?

Heugung stared at the bowl steaming in front of him. His lips moved with difficulty.

—Great Chieftain Baeksang… has colluded with Dark Heaven.

“…!”

Crack.

My grip tightened before I knew it, and the chopsticks snapped in my hand.

[2876] Somyeon is a dish of thin wheat noodles served here in broth.

Chapter 651

There are plenty of things in this world that suspicion alone can't settle.

That's true of the twenty-first century I'd lived in all my life, and just as true of Murim, which might as well be lawless by comparison.

Especially when the person in question stands second only to one man and above ten thousand others in the vast land of Nanman.

But…

—Great Chieftain Baeksang has colluded with Dark Heaven.

"…!"

Well, that changed things.

I set down the chopsticks I'd snapped without realizing it. The old stall owner grumbled at the sight, but all my attention was on Heugung.

—Are you certain?

—I am. No… at least, I believe I am.

What?

I barely stopped myself from frowning.

—That sounds like you have no concrete evidence. "I believe I am" isn't enough for this. You have to be certain.

—B-but…

Heugung swallowed hard before continuing his Sound Transmission.

—This is the best I can tell you. Great Chieftain Baeksang keeps that many secrets. I lead one of Nanman's four great tribes myself, but… he never discusses anything important with me in depth.

It lasted only an instant, but I caught the emotion that crossed his face at those last words. It was unmistakably humiliation.

Perhaps it had been piling up inside him for a very long time.

I studied him, then moved my lips.

—Is that why?

—Why? What do you mean?

—Is that why you betrayed the man you followed, sent me a secret missive, and told me all this? Because of how you feel about Baeksang?

—B-betrayed him? That's…

—If this isn't betrayal, then I'm not Han Chinese—I'm from Nanman. Don't bother denying it.

As if I had hit the mark, Heugung bit his lip hard and gave a small nod.

—Fine. I won't deny it. Ever since my father died in the Great Faction War, I've lived under Great Chieftain Baeksang's shadow. I was a runny-nosed child then, and I'm still under it now. No—I should say he's dragged me around on an invisible leash. But that isn't the only reason I decided to meet you.

—Then what is?

—I want to protect Nanman. My people.

—…!

—The Great Chieftain Baeksang I've known has always been coolheaded and capable. That's why he'll never back down. He'll believe the choice he made was right. But if this goes on… Nanman is finished.

I silently stared at Heugung.

How much of this secret conversation at a little stall on a crowded street was I supposed to believe?

Can I trust him?

My doubts weren't limited to what he'd told me. They extended to Heugung himself, who had suddenly arranged this secret meeting.

In some ways, trusting him mattered more than anything else. If I couldn't do that, how could I trust the details he hadn't told me yet?

He's seemed sincere so far. But what if it's all an act?

Murim was a fierce, unpredictable place. Heroes, Third Rate thugs, fiends, hypocrites—every kind of person was mixed together, deceiving and being deceived, drawing hidden blades to stab one another in the back.

Nothing would surprise me here.

As I weighed the situation, the old stall owner broke the silence.

Clack.

Setting down the bowl seemed to take all his strength. His hand trembled, and broth spilled over the rim.

The cheap somyeon,[2877] worth only a few iron coins, lay tangled in the bowl. Rather like the thoughts in my head.

"Finally. Try the broth first. That's the best part."

Heugung tried to sound cheerful, but his eyes darted around the street.

—Be careful. Great Chieftain Baeksang has eyes and ears you won't see. I need to return within half an hour if I'm to avoid suspicion.

—Did you slip away while you were with him?

—No. But there's always someone nearby watching me. A plant put in place long ago to track my movements. Today should be safe, though.

He didn't name the person who'd planted that watcher. He didn't have to.

Baeksang.

[2877] Somyeon is a thin wheat noodle commonly served in broth.

Sitting there staring at steaming somyeon would only attract attention. I started eating and sent another Sound Transmission.

—How long have you been watched?

—I don’t know. I first noticed it around the time I came of age. I’ve been wary of Great Chieftain Baeksang for more than twenty years since. That’s why I secretly learned the Bone-Shrinking Technique. It’s difficult to master, but unlike other martial arts, the training leaves almost no trace.

I had to revise my opinion of him.

Not bad.

It was ridiculous for me to judge a man well past forty like that, but he was nothing like the fool who’d been grinning at everyone a few hours ago.

So he found his own way to survive.

His sudden approach still gave me reason to be suspicious. But the more I heard, the more I believed him. The somyeon tasting far better than I’d expected probably helped, too.

Slurp.

I finished the rich broth, took a few iron coins from my robes, and set them beside the empty bowl. Then I stood and patted Heugung’s shoulder. He looked startled.

“You were right. The broth here is good.”

“I-I’m glad you liked it. But where are you going…?”

“Why? I’ve eaten, so it’s time to get moving. You look like you’ve got somewhere to be, too. Don’t you?”

His eyes widened slightly. He must have heard the Sound Transmission I’d sent along with the words.

—Follow me. Slowly. Keep your distance.

The somyeon had taken care of the appetizer. Now for the main course.

—Tell me everything you’ve seen and heard at Baeksang’s side.

The street was so crowded there was barely room to walk.

Heugung and I slipped into the throng and moved slowly, keeping about ten feet between us. Now and then we watched fireworks burst overhead or turned our heads to look along the street. Our Sound Transmissions, though, stayed fixed on one subject.

—Let me get straight to it. Have you seen anything that points to Baeksang colluding with Dark Heaven?

—I have no concrete evidence. But from what I’ve observed, I’m certain of it.

—Without evidence, that isn’t enough.

—I couldn’t help it. Until now, I’ve lived like livestock inside a fence Great Chieftain Baeksang built around me.

—Then when did you begin to suspect him, and why?

—Being raised inside a fence didn’t mean I could never look outside it. I may lead the Yi people in name only, but I’m still their great chieftain. I was occasionally present when Baeksang met with others. Or perhaps he simply thought I wasn’t worth worrying about. He wouldn’t have been wrong.

His Sound Transmission took on a self-mocking edge.

—Do you know what sort of man Great Chieftain Baeksang is? Or what you know of the Bai people?

—I don’t know much about Nanman, but I’ve heard various things from a reliable source. I’ve also formed a certain judgment of Baeksang myself.

—An opinion. Interesting.

—What’s interesting about it?

—Simple. I’ve known him since I was very young, yet I’ve had to revise my opinion of him again and again. The older I got and the more I understood, the more often it happened.

—…!

—That’s the kind of man he is. Dense forests, deep swamps, every sort of treacherous ground—this land doesn’t let secrets escape. For instance…

He trailed off.

The next moment, I felt someone’s gaze and turned my head. Heugung’s eyes met mine, shining brightly.

—The finest Bai warriors, waiting for the right moment in a secret refuge somewhere in Nanman even now.

My feet stopped before I could help it. I turned toward a nearby stall as naturally as I could and moved my lips.

—Go on.

—Have I told you about my father? He was a respected great chieftain and an outstanding warrior. The loyal men who followed him helped me at the cost of their lives. Their sacrifice is how I learned of that refuge.

—Do you know exactly where it is?

—I did. Twenty years ago.

—…Twenty years ago?

—The only thing that came back that day was a messenger pigeon carrying a missive written in blood. None of my father’s men returned. A few days later, I went to the location in the message, using a hunt for ferocious beasts as my excuse. I saw the mountain engulfed in flames before I even reached its foot.

—…!

—The fire burned for a month and seven days. When it finally died, nothing remained but ashes. Strange, isn't it?

His Sound Transmission turned bitter.

—Every time one of my loyal retainers died, I learned something new. Great Chieftain Baeksang exchanges missives to unknown destinations on the first day of every month, between Insi and the hour of the Rabbit.[2878] He also disappears somewhere alone once every three months… Ah, since last year, that changed to once a month. The person who followed him then was the last subordinate I could trust. I never saw him again after that.

A heavy silence settled between us.

All around us, people chatted and cheered. Heugung and I didn't join them.

Baeksang and Dark Heaven. Dark Heaven and Baeksang. And…

Heugung.

Which parts were true? Which were lies?

My thoughts were hazy, as though I had been swallowed by Poison Mist.

Yet beyond that haze, I could still make out the figure I'd followed with my eyes and thoughts from the beginning.

Baeksang.

And then there was someone else who had yet to appear.

A name came to mind. I sent Heugung another Sound Transmission.

—What about the other person?

—Other person? Who?

—The other great chieftain. Yohi.

—…!

—I've been wondering why you haven't said a word about her.

Through the passing crowd, I saw his gaunt frame jerk. His gaze met mine, trembling faintly.

—She hasn't done anything wrong.

—What?

—She only made the wrong choice. All she wanted was to restore the Yao people…

His voice gradually faded.

I blinked blankly at Heugung, and the back of my head began to tingle.

Fuck. Don't tell me…

—Wait. That wasn't an act? You really like Yohi?

—I don't like her. I love her.

—Sorry, but are you out of your fucking mind?

[2878] Insi is the traditional time period from three to five in the morning; the hour of the Rabbit follows it, from five to seven.

—…

This was driving me crazy.

I had suspected as much, but all those foolish grins whenever Yohi appeared had really been genuine.

He had even put up a soul shield strong enough to make Magic Johnson cry.

I barely managed to restrain myself from pushing through the crowd and marching over to him. Instead, I sent a Sound Transmission that was almost a shout.

—Would you say that in front of Sir Yayul, too? That Yohi did nothing wrong?

—That's why I came to you. First, I didn't think the Palace Lord would trust me over Great Chieftain Baeksang. Second, I thought he wouldn't forgive our Yohi.

—Wow. Listen to this "our Yohi" bullshit.

—…!

—Ah, sorry. But you really are an idiot. Anyway, I understand now. Your Yohi defected to that side.

Heugung's face stiffened at my choice of words. He opened his mouth as if to object, then sighed.

—I made up my mind before coming here. If you and the Palace Lord want me to, I'll testify at tomorrow's Tribal Grand Council. But you must promise to protect both Yohi and me.

The first offer was good. The second sat badly with me.

Neither was mine to accept on the spot. Protecting Heugung was one thing; protecting Yohi would practically mean pardoning a defector. I wasn't Syngman Rhee taking in pro-Japanese collaborators.[2879] How could I decide that alone? At best, I was the U.N. forces.

But if the Beast Miao King agrees…

If Heugung's words were true, we could not only root out Dark Heaven's threat from Nanman, but might even drag the Nanman Beast Palace into the Murim Alliance as one enormous headache.

If he was telling the truth.

—This had better be true. Every word.

Fsssh!

I sent a wave of qi bearing down on Heugung alone. His face went pale under the force of it, and his lips moved.

—My life. I stake my life on it.

I held his gaze a moment longer, then withdrew my aura.

[2879] Syngman Rhee is criticized for allowing many collaborators with Imperial Japan to retain influence in South Korea after liberation.

He stood panting, glanced around, gave a small nod, and disappeared into the crowd. The half hour he'd warned me about had passed.

"…Phew."

Only then did I take a full breath and start walking. Before I told the Beast Miao King, I wanted to stop at our quarters and talk it over with the Fire Dragon Pavilion members.

Those damn men. I'll consider it a success if they haven't caused any trouble.

Sama Pyo had come out to the clearing in front of the quarters to train when a thought occurred to him.

Was he simply born unlucky, or had the karma from that damn Pavilion Master's misdeeds flowed all the way here like a stream?

"So let me ask you."

Shing.

The Black Dragon Saber slid free with a cold ring. Sama Pyo stepped forward, his favored weapon in hand.

"What do you lot think?"

Rustle.

The grass around the clearing shook.

Chapter 652

Rustle.

Sama Pyo knew it wasn't a passing breeze stirring the thick grass.

The killing intent of dozens of enemies pointed at him like invisible blades.

"You show up uninvited, and when I ask a question, you don't answer…"

Unwelcome guests didn't get much worse than this.

He clicked his tongue and let his Black Dragon Saber hang at his side.

"Come out. We can at least talk face-to-face."

A dozen or so throwing blades came in reply.

Whoosh! Clang!

Sama Pyo knocked them aside with a lightning-fast swing of his saber and turned smoothly on his heel. Saber energy wrapped around the dark blade, then swept through the grass like a gale.

Sh-sh-sh-shk! Slash!

Hundreds of leaves flew apart in pieces. A faint line appeared across the trunk of a massive tree.

Sss, crash!

The giant tree slid to the ground. Sama Pyo vaulted over it and stared at the figures approaching the clearing.

East, west, north, south. Roughly thirty enemies moved slowly into position around the pavilion. Every one of them wore a black mask.

"Hard to get a look at your faces. When you come uninvited, the polite thing would be to take off your masks and apologize… but I doubt you're going to do that."

Sama Pyo took stock of the situation calmly.

Masked intruders at this hour of the night, greeting him with throwing blades. Their purpose could hardly have been clearer.

Worse…

Of all times, this had to happen while he was away.

He thought of that Pavilion Master bastard, with a mouth as foul as a Third Rate thug's and a habit of punching someone whenever the chance arose.

Jin Taekyung.

The man was impossible to predict and forever causing trouble. But in a situation like this, there was no one Sama Pyo would trust more. At only twenty-two, he had already left his mark on Murim—a monster of a man.

But whether by coincidence or fate, Jin Taekyung was currently away. Song Ilseom and Ju Hwaran, who would have been a great help if they had remained, were absent as well. Hyuk Mujin was gone, too—although he might not have been able to match them, he was at least worth one person.

That left Sama Pyo, Taishan—who had gone to bed early—and Namho, an ordinary old man against whom Sama Pyo couldn't use his full strength.

Against nearly thirty enemies.

No. Their numbers aren't the problem.

Sama Pyo muttered inwardly and quickly swept his gaze across the surroundings. The killing intent radiating from the enemies slowly tightening around him like a net was not that of some clumsy martial artists.

By Central Plains standards, each of them is somewhere between Supreme First Rate and Peak. Where in Nanman did they come from?

The Central Plains Murim was truly vast, but even among the countless martial artists scattered across it like grains of sand on a beach, Peak masters were not common.

Yet in Nanman, which could not compare to the Central Plains, someone had mobilized thirty warriors of this caliber to launch an attack.

Fortunately, none seemed to be at a particularly high level. Still, their presence was startling—especially because this remote stretch of land belonged to the Inner Palace of the Nanman Beast Palace.

"Who are you?"

Whoosh! Crack!

Instead of an answer, a short spear skimmed past his neck and smashed through the pavilion door.

That was the signal to begin.

Papapat!

Hidden weapons and arrows flew in, blotting out the faint moonlight. Shadows rushed forward like streaks of light.

Sama Pyo's Black Dragon Saber cut through the wind.

Whiiiiing! Slash!

Powerful saber energy swept the projectiles aside. The instant he broke through the barrage, blades lunged for him from left and right.

Whoosh!

Neither attacker hesitated to strike at his vitals. Their movements were timed perfectly together. An ordinary Peak master would have been badly wounded, if not killed.

But Sama Pyo was no ordinary Peak master.

He was not a young prodigy lacking real combat experience, nor was he as rigid as a Peak master from an orthodox faction.

Above all else, demonic, heterodox arts valued survival.

Click, crunch!

The two Peak masters attacking from either side crumpled like rotten trees.

Their eyes stared wide above their masks. A small arrow, a span long, was buried deep between each man's brows.

It worked.

There was a simple reason Sama Pyo wore a thin robe instead of a lighter martial uniform in this heat: its full sleeves gave him room to hide weapons.

Twist his wrist to the right angle, and the mechanism fired a loaded arrow. It was simple, but against an enemy who didn't expect it, few things were deadlier.

"Idiots."

He pulled the falling bodies toward him and held one in front of himself, the other behind.

Thud-thud-thud!

A fresh volley of hidden weapons struck the men who had been the attackers' allies moments before, riddling their corpses. From behind his makeshift shields, Sama Pyo aimed his sleeve past the side of one body.

Click, thud!

This time, the enemy knew what to watch for. The arrow struck a forearm instead of the space between the brows he had aimed for.

He had shown them the trick twice. It wouldn't work again.

Then…

Snap.

Sama Pyo made his decision at once. He released the mechanism hidden in his sleeve and charged, shouting as he went.

"Taishan!"

Sh-sh-sh-shk!

The remaining twenty-seven masked men closed around him like wolves.

Bang!

Namho had finally fallen asleep after a long stretch of tossing and turning. The instant he opened his eyes, one thought came to him.

What fucking bastard is this?

Growing old came with no end of indignities. One of the cruelest was how little sleep he got at night.

And now someone had dared to disturb what sleep this eighty-year-old could manage. His joints creaked as he sat up.

If that gluttonous bastard Taishan woke me up because he was eating a midnight snack… this time, I absolutely will not let it slide.

He had spent fifty years in the Hidden Shadow Pavilion, whatever anyone might think to look at him. After everything he had sacrificed during the Great Faction

War, the Thousand-Faced Fox might overlook it just this once if Namho wrote to Henan and had Taishan declared an enemy of Murim.

Would he believe me if I said the bastard worked for Dark Heaven?

The thought vanished when he heard the commotion outside.

"Taishan!"

Sh-sh-sh-shk! Clang!

Cha-cha-cha-chang!

Namho stared down at the clearing through the window. He rubbed his eyes, wondering if he was seeing things.

He wasn't. An enemy's Sword Energy, dodged by Sama Pyo, swept past Namho's window.

Slash! Crash!

At last, he understood.

An ambush!

A planned one, too. They had struck while that madman—no, while Jin Taekyung—was away.

What the hell is going on? Who would…?

Being woken up no longer bothered him. In a moment, he might lose his head instead of his sleep.

Sama Pyo was fighting better than Namho had expected, but he couldn't hold out against so many enemies forever.

And then—

Papapat!

When Namho spotted several masked men approaching the pavilion while leaving Sama Pyo behind, he no longer had even a moment to hesitate.

"Gah!"

Namho bolted from his room with a speed that belied his eighty years. He raced down the corridor and flung open the door at its end.

Bang!

"Ambush! We're under attack! Your lord is outside—!"

Taishan, the room's occupant, answered with a mighty roar.

"Grrrrrrrk. Hooooooonk!"

"You damn bastard!"

"Guh-hooooooonk!"

Namho couldn't believe it.

He can sleep through this? Is he even human?

Parts of the pavilion were breaking apart. The clash of weapons was loud enough to be heard in Henan. Yet here Taishan lay inside it, snoring.

"You! Wake up this instant!"

Thud! Thud-thud!

With a soul-rending cry, Namho's fist—its strength diminished by the passing years—slammed into Taishan's jaw.

As though heaven had been moved by his efforts, Taishan finally stirred.

"Mmm. Taishan…"

"Yes! Get up! Hurry!"

"Mmmm. Don't like mosquitoes. Go away…"

"You son of a bitch!"

It came out almost as a wail.

Tears were gathering in Namho's eyes when a dark shadow fell across the floor in the moonlight streaming through the open window.

"…"

He froze.

Slowly, he turned his head. Three masked men had slipped into the pavilion.

Those… those bastards.

They moved like ghosts. Their weapons flashed white in the moonlight, and Namho's eighty-odd years rushed before his eyes.

Then he realized there was one way to wake Taishan.

"Taishan! You bastard!"

Sss.

The masked men raised their weapons as Namho shouted. Thinking of death, Namho squeezed his eyes shut and continued yelling.

"They're going to eat all your meat!"

In the next instant—

"No! Taishan's meat!"

Taishan's eyes flew open as if by magic. He thrust a fist toward the masked men.

Wham! Krrrra-boom!

Hoo. Hah.

Sama Pyo fought to steady his breathing.

Blood soaked his upper body. The masked men watching him now had a trace of fear in their eyes.

He had fought more fiercely and brutally than they had imagined, with hidden weapons and poisons concealed all over his body and martial arts honed for one purpose: killing.

More frightening still, he showed no fear of death.

"Come on, any of you. I swear I'll give everything I have to kill you."

He charged them, panting, covered in blood. One by one, masked men fell beneath his hands.

Twenty bodies lay scattered across the ground. Seven of them belonged to Peak masters who would have been recognized anywhere in the Central Plains.

What a monster.

The same thought struck the masked men at once.

"No! Taishan's meat!"

Crack! Krrrra-boom!

A real monster burst out of the collapsing pavilion.

Eight cheok[2880] tall, with an enormous frame. And…

"Taishan's meat! Where's the meat?"

A madness that seemed to belong to another world.

Gulp.

What the hell is that?

As the masked men swallowed hard, a small old man poked his head out from behind the giant and pointed at them.

"See those men?"

"Taishan sees them!"

"I saw everything earlier, and those bastards ate all your meat."

"Taishaaaaaan! Cannot forgive them!"

What meat? What were they supposed to have stolen and eaten?

The bewildered masked men faltered. Sama Pyo bared his bloodstained teeth in a grin.

But he wasn't looking at Taishan. He was looking at the hill above the clearing—or, rather, at someone ambling down it.

"I had a feeling this might happen even while I was away for a little while."

Step. Step.

Jin Taekyung approached at an easy pace and asked Sama Pyo, "Are those your friends?"

Sama Pyo burst out laughing and shook his head.

[2880] A cheok is a traditional Korean unit of length, about 30.3 cm (11.9 in). Eight cheok is about 2.42 m (7.95 ft).

Chapter 653

"Are those your friends?"

Sama Pyo laughed aloud before answering in a weary voice.

"As if."

"Yeah, you do seem to be on pretty bad terms for friends."

I scratched my chin and slowly looked around.

The already ancient pavilion had collapsed. Blood stained the weeds that grew thick across the clearing.

All right. Situation assessed.

What a complete fucking mess.

I'd only been away from our quarters a little while, and now there were some twenty corpses to clean up. We could have used a snail bride to handle that.[2881] Instead, we'd gotten snail assassins in the middle of the night.

I glanced at the assassins who had faltered when I appeared, then shrugged at Sama Pyo.

"Oh, you're better than I thought."

Blood drenched his upper body. He answered between ragged breaths.

"Yeah, I'm not bad. For an unorthodox goon."

Honestly, I was starting to feel bad calling him that. He'd been badly outnumbered by skilled enemies, and fighting this hard against them meant he'd truly put his life on the line.

Impressed, I nodded.

"You've done enough that I can't keep calling you an unorthodox goon… From now on, you're an unorthodox hardcase."

"An unorthodox hardcase. How kind of you."

"Oh, you're grateful? That's a surprise. I thought you'd start cursing me as soon as you heard it."

"Cursing takes energy. I'm about to collapse, so stop talking to me."

His honesty drew a quiet laugh from me.

"Then collapse."

"What?"

"I said collapse. Don't worry about the rest."

"Damn it. You could've said that sooner…"

His words trailed off as his eyes began to close. At the same time, Sama Pyo's body slowly tilted to the side, and I stepped toward him.

Whoosh. Thud.

[2881] A snail bride is a figure from a Korean folktale who secretly does housework.

The three-zhang[2882] gap vanished in an instant.

Just as I caught him before he could pitch face-first into the ground, a sharp whistle split the air and wind whipped up behind me.

Whoosh!

It happened behind me, but I could see it. No—I could sense and read everything through my sharpened instincts.

Now that I'd stepped into this space, it was practically my domain.

Crack!

Without turning, I threw a punch. Something shattered beneath my fist, and a masked man with his head crushed like tofu fell into a pool of blood.

Splash.

Sticky blood sprayed across my back. Ignoring it, I laid Sama Pyo on a relatively clean patch of ground and raised my head.

The masked men stood frozen like stone statues.

"Why are you just standing there? That was pretty much your last chance."

"…"

"…"

"What's so surprising? Were you planning to ding-dong ditch me, you fucking bastards?"

In the suffocating silence, the more than ten pairs of eyes visible above the masks shook violently.

Papap!

Whiiiiing!

A gale far fiercer than the first swept out in every direction.

Every masked man still standing was a Peak Master capable of injuring others with Sword Energy. Swords, sabers, spears, sickles… Destructive qi surged from their weapons, tearing through the air toward the vital points across my body.

I watched it all without the slightest fear.

The flow of qi. The direction of each weapon.

Even the faint fear in their wide eyes.

That settled it. They had already lost. They knew they were no more than wolves, yet they refused to accept it and charged at a tiger anyway.

Then I'd better teach them. Teach them that they should have run somehow.

Dozens of forms flashed through my mind. I chose the cruelest, most destructive one and moved.

Whoosh! Crunch!

[2882] A zhang is ten ja, a traditional length measure. Three zhang is about 9.09 m (29.8 ft).

I twisted smoothly aside. Four weapons missed me by a hair and tangled together as their paths crossed. I brought my straightened hand down through their center.

Slash!

Force cut the weapons apart. I struck one of the masked men in the abdomen as he stood frozen, still gripping what remained of his prized weapon.

Flame Divine Palm.

Boom!

Terrible heat burned away the life force inside his body. I lowered my head as he crumpled behind me, smoke pouring from his seven apertures.[2883]

Shaaak! Whoosh!

A strike had come from behind without warning. The long sickle meant to reap my neck swept through empty air, while my backward-thrust elbow struck its wielder square in the chest.

Crack!

More than a dozen ribs broke. He gave a dying gasp.

But my blow wasn't what killed him. His comrade's spear did.

Thrust!

Look at these bastards. Not a shred of comradeship.

Clicking my tongue, I seized the spearhead jutting from his chest and squeezed.

Crack!

He was a Peak Master who had reached the level of injuring others with Sword Energy. I was a Supreme Peak master who had entered the realm of Sword Energy Becoming Force.

I snapped the spearhead off as easily as a wooden chopstick and returned it to its owner.

Whoosh! Thunk!

The result was instant death. The spearhead lodged between the masked man's brows, and he collapsed without a scream. His comrades swallowed their gasps. Three of them had died in less time than it took to call it a moment.

Seven left.

I counted them calmly and took a step.

Whoosh!

Space vanished with the wind, and another enemy appeared right in front of me. No—I was the one who had reached him.

"…"

His wide eyes seemed to be trying to say something. Too late. I tightened my grip around his neck.

[2883] The seven apertures are the two eyes, two ears, two nostrils, and mouth.

Crack!

Six.

I felt the life leave him as his body went limp. I took the sword from his hand and hurled it at the nearest enemy.

“Hng!”

With a panicked gasp, the man raised his curved moon saber diagonally. My sword flew straight into the saber, which was charged with saber qi.

Boom!

The ground heaved with a deafening roar. A staggering figure emerged from the billowing dust.

The moon saber had shattered against the qi in my sword. Dozens of fragments were embedded across its wielder’s body.

“Grrk. Grrr…”

Thud.

The largest fragment was lodged in his throat. Perhaps that was why he fell without even managing a last word, blood bubbling in his throat.

I pushed aside the corpse with the broken neck and spoke quietly.

“Five left.”

“…”

“…”

I could feel the fear filling the suffocating silence. Five Peak Masters had fallen in mere moments, and I didn’t have a scratch on me as I looked for my next target.

“Who’s next?”

No one answered.

Then the masked men, frozen in place and staring at me with eyes wide as if they had seen a ghost, chose to target someone else instead of me.

Papap!

Of the five, three went for me. The other two went for Namho and Taishan.

I had to admit, it was probably the best choice they could make. That didn’t mean it would end well for them.

“I saw it with my own eyes! Those bastards ate both chicken legs!”

“Legs? Not wings—legs? Both of them?”

Taishan blinked at Namho in disbelief, then drew the two-section staff from his side.

“Both chicken legs! Too far! You’re not human!”

We’d have needed a vote to settle who wasn’t human, but Taishan made voting irrelevant with his enormous two-section staff.

Wham! Crack!

His innate divine strength was enough to make a defense useless. One masked man instinctively raised his sword to block the staff. Both his wrists broke, and before he could scream, Taishan smashed his head along with the other man's.

Crack!

The two bodies hit the ground without so much as a dying cry.

From behind Taishan, Namho clenched a fist and shouted, "That's it! You commendable bastard, I could kill you!"

"Uaaaaaah! Taishan is commendable!"

"Well done, you goddamn bastard! All you ever do is eat, but you've finally earned your keep!"

I gave a quiet laugh at Namho's praise—or abuse; it was hard to tell—then turned to the remaining enemies.

"All right. Three left."

"…"

"…"

"…"

Their eyes twitched. They understood.

Even as their comrades died, they had been backing away, unable to bring themselves to attack me.

"I'm telling you this just in case, but if you run, you'll die. Of course, unlike your friends who went sightseeing at Mount Beimang first, you'll die much more painfully after lingering a long time before your breath finally stops."

At my quiet warning, someone's throat bobbed as he swallowed.

They'd all watched their comrades die. If they ran, they would end up wishing they'd died the same way.

"But surrender here and tell me what I want to know, and I'll keep you alive no matter what it takes. If you don't believe me, I'll stake my life on it."

I didn't want to spare men who had come here to do this. But I had to find out who was behind the ambush.

I named the people who came to mind, one by one.

"Baeksang. Heugung. Yohi. If one of them is your master, tell me now. If someone else sent you, tell me everything you know about them."

Who was it?

I had my suspicions, but I couldn't be certain. Only a handful of people were bold enough to stage an attack inside the Inner Palace, powerful enough to send warriors of this caliber, and well-informed enough to know I was gone.

It has to be one of the three Great Chieftains.

I'd moved so discreetly. How had anyone noticed? I didn't know who had found out, or how. The timing of the ambush was too perfect, too.

I couldn’t even rule out Heugung. We’d parted barely fifteen minutes ago, after he promised to cooperate.

Did he ask to meet me just so he could stab me in the back? Fool me first, then seize the Fire Dragon Pavilion members and use them to threaten me?

Or it could have been Baeksang, who had been watching Heugung, or Yohi.

One thing was certain: whatever name came from these masked attackers’ mouths would belong to a Dark Heaven hound.

“Who is it? Tell me.”

Ssssss.

I pressed down on them with an overwhelming wave of qi. The foreheads visible above their masks creased in pain.

Then, in the next moment, I saw the corners of the masked men’s mouths twitch.

Crunch.

“…!”

A chill swept over me. I hurriedly fired Finger Qi and struck their pressure points, but dark-red blood burst from the mouths of the men who had severed their own heart meridians.

“Grrrk. Cough.”

Fuck.

Chapter 654

If someone asked whether I could kill three Peak masters with a single move, I would nod without much hesitation.

But subduing three Peak masters in a single move was another matter, especially if they had the mindset of assassins.

In that case, persuasion was a better way to bring them under control than force. To stop them from killing themselves, I had to convince them they would survive—not that they would be tortured and die in agony.

But…

Crunch.

Apparently, my promise hadn't convinced them. Or perhaps they feared their master even more.

Ssshhh! Thud!

The Finger Qi I fired a half-beat too late struck their acupoints, but the damage was already done.

Their bodies went rigid as their Paralysis Acupoints were struck. Blood sprayed from their seven apertures, and all three began to collapse.

Papap! Grab.

I crossed several zhang[2884] in an instant, caught them, and laid them on the ground.

Sticky blood welled from their mouths beneath their masks.

"Grrrk, cough…!"

Damn it. This was bad. No, it was the worst possible outcome.

Severing your own heart meridian was like setting off an explosion inside your body.

If the Eight Extraordinary Meridians—the most important meridians in the human body—as well as the hundreds of acupoints throughout the body were severed and blocked, there was no way to survive.

Especially for a Murim practitioner.

High risk, high return, as they say.

Through qi accumulation, a Murim practitioner gained abilities that surpassed those of ordinary people. But if their heart meridian was severed, they also got a bonus one-plus-one event called qi deviation.

Just like now.

"Cough. Kueeegh!"

Splaash!

[2884] Here, a zhang is ten Korean ja, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

Eyes, nose, mouth, ears. Dark-red blood and pale lumps that looked like internal organs poured endlessly from every opening I could see.

Namho and Taishan hurried over, only to stop short at the sight.

“Ugh. Taishan doesn’t want to look. Losing my appetite.”

“W-What is this?”

Namho swallowed hard and asked in a subdued voice, “Can they be saved?”

It was a pointless question. Things had already gone too far.

Before I could answer, the heads of two of the men, whose entire bodies had been twitching and convulsing, fell limply to the side.

Thud.

They were dead. No need to check.

But it was still too early to give up. I grabbed the last masked man’s wrist and poured my internal energy into him with all my strength.

Sssaaaaah.

As the heat of my Scorching Yang Qi flowed through him, I could feel the ruin inside his body.

Not one of his organs was undamaged. Even the qi pathways that should have been broad and sturdy in a Peak master had crumbled like the walls of an abandoned house.

And qi deviation on top of it…

Even Mungyeong, the greatest Divine Physician under Heaven, couldn’t have guaranteed this man would live. I knew he was beyond saving, and I clenched my teeth.

I have to find out. No matter what.

I needed just one name: the person who had ordered today’s attack.

I poured in more internal energy, not to bring the chaos inside him under control—that was impossible now—but to make his last ember flare.

Rumble!

His entire body struggled violently as an even greater flow of internal energy entered him.

Then, like water settling after a violent storm, the masked man at death’s door regained a brief moment of calm and clarity.

A final rally.

This was my last chance. I stared into his newly focused eyes.

“Who was it? Tell me.”

I pulled the mask away from his mouth to hear his answer—and realized that everything I’d just done was pointless.

“Cough. Hhh. Haaah.”

“…!”

“Grrk. Uhh…”

His jaw moved as though he were trying to speak, but no words came out.

No. He couldn’t speak.

I froze. Above me, Namho muttered something that sounded like a groan.

“Vicious bastards. Their tongues…”

He couldn’t finish, and the masked man had almost no time left.

“Grrk.”

A death rattle took the place of his last words. His pupils went vacant, and the shortened tongue that had been moving inside his open mouth fell still.

I stared silently at the man who had finally met his death, then spat out the curse I had been holding back.

“…Fuck.”

I’d known these men were no ordinary attackers. I hadn’t imagined their tongues had been cut.

That was why they hadn’t spoken a word from beginning to end, apart from their screams. Even if they’d wanted to, they couldn’t.

“Hmm. The others are the same. Judging by how the severed ends of their tongues have healed, it looks like this was done a long time ago.”

Namho quickly examined the corpses like the Hidden Shadow Pavilion agent he was, then let out a low groan.

“These men… They’re all Nanman.”

“No Han Chinese?”

“Not one. They’re dressed alike, so I can’t tell which tribes they came from, either.”

The most reliable way to distinguish the Nanman was by their clothing and eating habits. But since every one of them wore black clothes and a mask, it was only natural that they were difficult to identify.

Besides, there was only a subtle difference between the appearances of Han Chinese and Nanman. Trying to identify their tribe at a glance was practically absurd.

“…Damn it.”

As I muttered a curse mixed with a sigh, Namho fixed me with a deeply serious gaze.

“When you tried to persuade them, you named three Great Chieftains as possible culprits. Was it Heugung who sent the missive?”

I stared at him in surprise. That was answer enough.

“I see. So that’s what happened.”

“How did you know, Elder Namho?”

"Baeksang and Yohi were both people who could reasonably be named as culprits. But Heugung was different. Thinking about it, there could only be one reason you would have thought of him in this situation."

His tone was calm and sharp. "Was it him?"

"Yes." I nodded. "He was waiting for me at the place in the missive."

"He chose to hide in the forest instead of behind a rock. But even in a crowd, a man of Heugung's size would stand out. Did he come in person?"

"He had learned the Bone-Shrinking Technique. At first, I didn't even suspect that he was Heugung."

"Hah. The Bone-Shrinking Technique. He had more secrets than he let on. Fooled us all. Then again, if he were the man everyone thought he was, he'd never have sent you that missive."

Namho seemed to be speaking to himself. Then his expression grew heavy.

"Go on."

My account of Heugung was brief, but Namho listened to every word without interrupting. By the time I finished, the furrows between his brows had deepened.

"What a goddamn mess."

I agreed. An attack had taken place, and we were no closer to identifying who had ordered it.

Baeksang, Yohi, Heugung. I couldn't rule out any of them. And behind today's attack lay another name: Dark Heaven.

I can tell just from the fact that they severed their heart meridians instead of taking a poison pill.

A deadly poison would have been easy to find in Nanman. You could go on a picnic in the grass outside the Outer Palace and find venomous beasts crawling everywhere.

But the masked men had chosen to sever their own heart meridians. Compared with a quick death by poison pill, it meant suffering several times more pain.

I had no choice but to assume that they already knew about it.

The Myriad-Poison Ring. Dark Heaven must already know that I have it.

Dark Heaven had sent the Blood Lord to cause the Shaolin Bloodshed. In Sichuan, it had sent the Western Heaven Demon Lord to seize the divine artifacts of the Emei Sect and the Sichuan Tang Clan.

For those artifacts, it had committed Supreme Peak masters who could match the Ten Kings—perhaps even the Three Saints—along with elite troops.

But even immediately after the Sichuan Blood Tragedy ended, nothing happened to the Sichuan Tang Clan.

The Sichuan Tang Clan had staggered after suffering more severe damage than any other sect in Sichuan during its battle with the Western Heaven Demon Lord. But the follow-up attack from Dark Heaven that everyone had feared never came.

I suspected the Myriad-Poison Ring was the reason.

So they made sure these men severed their heart meridians instead of taking poison. They didn't want to leave even the slightest chance.

A drop of cold sweat ran down my spine.

My enemies were watching my every move, while I could not even identify the person hiding in the darkness.

The mere fact that an attack like this had taken place in the Inner Palace of the Nanman Beast Palace—the heart of Nanman—was threatening enough.

"When did the attack start?"

"I don't know exactly. I woke up in the middle of it, but… It seems to have started less than half a shichen[2885] after you left. I went to check because I wondered what was happening, and everything outside was in chaos. That bastard Sama Pyo was fighting while covered in blood."

He pointed to Sama Pyo, lying on the ground, and looked at me with concern.

"But is he all right? He seems to have lost a lot of blood fighting them."

"I've stopped the bleeding. He should be fine. I didn't find any wounds that looked immediately dangerous, and most of the blood on him seems to be theirs."

Taishan returned from dragging the corpses into a pile and blinked his enormous eyes.

"Pavilion Master, true? Taishan's Lord okay?"

"Yeah. He collapsed because he used too much strength."

Tears filmed Taishan's eyes.

"Sniff. Taishan was worried. If Lord died, Taishan wouldn't eat meat for three years. Sniff."

"…"

"…"

I'd heard of mourning for three years. Giving up meat for three years was new to me. Wouldn't that make him the strongest vegan in Murim?

I swallowed the words and patted his Ural-Mountains-sized shoulder.

"Yeah. You worked hard too."

"Sniff. Taishan used lots of strength. Taishan hungry."

"…Yeah. Okay."

Should I just punch him?

[2885] A shichen is a traditional period of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

But as I was deep in thought, countless footsteps began approaching from far away, accompanied by torchlight.

And with them came the familiar roar of a beast.

—Rooar!

Ssshhh! Pap!

A silver figure, unmistakable against the darkness, reached the clearing first.

Yayul Mok sat astride the White Tiger, his face as stiff as a wooden doll.

"…I'm late."

I answered evenly. "Yeah. Late enough that it's hard to believe this happened inside the Inner Palace."

A collapsed pavilion. Pools of blood scattered across the ground. A heap of corpses.

Yayul Mok bit his lip.

"The warriors on patrol were dead. We didn't find out until half a gak[2886] ago. And…"

What he said next made me wonder if I'd heard him right.

"Heugung and Yohi. Both Great Chieftains have disappeared."

…What?

[2886] A gak is a traditional period of about fifteen minutes; half a gak is about seven and a half minutes.

Chapter 655

Nanman was like a small country cut off from the Central Plains, with the Nanman Beast Palace as its royal palace.

Naturally, the Inner Palace was enormous. Nearly a thousand people lived there—warriors, cooks, servants, keepers who tended the beasts, and more. Whenever the Tribal Grand Council convened, that number swelled several times over.

Yet among all those people, four mattered more than the rest: the Great Chieftains.

They led the strongest four of Nanman's thirty-two tribes and had the power to become the next Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace. Their influence was immense, and for generations, the three Great Chieftains other than the Palace Lord had enjoyed special privileges.

Whoosh!

Yayul Mok, running beside me, was explaining one of them now.

"Every chieftain other than Father lives at their tribe's main base and must give advance notice before entering the Inner Palace. The Great Chieftains are exceptions. They're free to come and go, and each has a residence inside."

East, west, south, and north.

The north had traditionally belonged to the Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace. The other Great Chieftains each had a residence in one of the remaining directions.

They were official residences granted to high-ranking figures. In Central Plains terms, it was as though the Son of Heaven had permitted his vassal princes to establish their own princely residences.

But after running there at full speed, what I found waiting for me was blood pooled across the ground, corpses, and the wreckage of a building someone had destroyed.

"What the…"

Namho's groan reached my ears. Feeling as though all the blood in my body had turned cold, I looked up.

A wooden plaque hung crookedly over the shattered gate. Three characters were written on it.

Western Yao Estate.

They told me whose estate this was. The image of a woman smiling with captivating eyes flashed through my mind.

Yohi. Great Chieftain of the Yao people.

"Bewitching" suited her better than "beautiful."

I didn't know whether she was behind tonight's attack, but two things were certain. This splendid estate, so thoroughly shaped by Yohi's tastes, was no longer as beautiful as it had been.

And Yohi herself had vanished without a trace.

Step.

I crossed through the half-destroyed gate. Bodies lay scattered everywhere, among them the carcasses of beasts. Flower beds that must once have bloomed in all different colors were soaked red with blood.

"…Fuck."

I couldn't keep the curse in. Just then, a warrior spotted Yayul Mok walking beside me and approached.

"Young Palace Lord. You've arrived."

Yayul Mok nodded, his face grim.

"You've worked hard. Have you found anything else?"

"No. Only more bodies."

Behind the warrior, corpses lay side by side. A few steps away, three or four warriors were hauling a tiger out of a well, its drenched body hanging limp.

"So far, we've confirmed at least a hundred dead, counting both Yao warriors and the beasts they commanded."

"Any survivors?"

The warrior was silent for a moment before answering.

"…None so far."

So far?

I doubted they'd find any. Keeping that thought to myself, I approached the bodies.

A warrior instinctively moved to block my way, but when our eyes met, he flinched and stepped aside. I examined the wounds, looking for how these people had fought the unknown attacker—and how they had died.

Then, just as I realized something, I heard Yayul Mok's voice.

"Found anything?"

Dozens of pairs of eyes turned toward me. I gave a brief answer.

"Force."

"…!"

"…!"

A ripple of unease passed through the crowd. My voice came out stiff.

"The attacker was undoubtedly a Supreme Peak master. Most of them probably didn't notice the attack until the last moment. The gap in martial arts was that great."

The Supreme Peak realm was open to only a chosen few. After enduring countless hardships and breaking through the barrier, its masters rose to a realm that made them, quite literally, superhuman.

With a single swing of a sword, they could kill dozens of First Rate masters. Even barehanded, they could beat a dozen Peak masters to a bloody pulp.

Whoever had attacked this place tonight was one of them.

Fast, economical, and utterly lethal.

I'd known as soon as I saw the wounds. The attacker was a seasoned killer.

They had slaughtered every living thing in the estate using no more force than necessary, and no less. Everyone in Murim knew that one chi[2887] of depth was enough to take a life. Only a Supreme Peak master could kill a hundred warriors and beasts that way.

The implication was clear.

—Are you saying Baeksang did all this?

Yayul Mok's quiet Sound Transmission reached my ear. I looked at his rigid face amid the shocked crowd.

—Who knows?

—What do you mean, who knows?

—Only two masters in Nanman have reached this level. One is Baeksang, as you know. The other… is someone everyone in Nanman knows well.

Yayul Mok went deathly pale. His mouth opened as though he were about to shout, but he bit down hard on his lip instead.

—Are you saying Father did this?

—Of course not.

—Then why…

—I'm saying that would be too obvious. What's certain is that Dark Heaven was directly involved.

Supreme Peak masters were exceedingly rare even in the Central Plains, and rarer still in Nanman. I might have my suspicions about Baeksang, but I wasn't that much of a blockhead.

Dark Heaven had probably sent one of its own Supreme Peak masters.

They seemed content to watch from a step away. Have they finally decided to act themselves?

But what were they after?

I kept the question to myself and spoke aloud rather than using Sound Transmission.

"There's something I want to check for myself. Shall we step away for a moment?"

Yayul Mok understood and gave the onlookers a glance. Their eyes turned away.

[2887] A chi is a traditional unit of length equal to about 3.03 cm (1.19 in).

The three of us—Yayul Mok, Namho, and I—entered the pavilion at the center of the estate. As we'd expected, the place that must once have been filled with rare furnishings looked as though a storm had torn through it.

"Looks like they put up a real fight," Namho muttered.

Yayul Mok answered, his face still grim. "But it was over in moments. With a Supreme Peak master against them, I suppose that was inevitable."

"How do you know how long it lasted?"

"Because I heard a short but unmistakable boom. By the time I heard the report and arrived, everything was already over. All that remained in the Western Yao Estate was blood, corpses, and…"

Rattle.

Yayul Mok slid open a large door. His voice sank.

"Those."

He meant two things lying in the wrecked room: a scent pouch, and something far more valuable in its use, though it gave off a terrible smell.

"Hmm."

Namho let out a low groan. I walked over without hesitation and touched the second object. It was cold, and sticky blood coated my fingers.

This is…

Anyone with eyes would recognize it.

A wrist. Someone's wrist, cleanly severed.

"Can you tell whose it is?"

How could I not?

I stared at the plump wrist for a moment before answering quietly.

"Probably Heugung's."

"That's right. He came to see Great Chieftain Yohi with four guards. The Eastern Yi Estate confirmed it."

If the Yao people had built the Western Yao Estate in the west, it seemed the Yi people under Heugung had established the Eastern Yi Estate in the east. I set Heugung's wrist down.

"When was that?"

"Less than half a shichen[2888] ago, but at least half an hour."

I worked out the timing. It was just after Heugung and I had parted. He must have gone straight to the Eastern Yi Estate, then come here to see Yohi.

…That lovesick bastard. He couldn't wait even that long.

I struggled to keep the curse from coming out. I needed to stay calm.

[2888] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours.

I still didn't know why Heugung had come to see Yohi. And until his death was confirmed, I had to suspect everyone.

"What happened to the guards he brought?"

"Dead. Along with the Yao warriors."

Of course. Fuck.

I'd asked just in case. I'd gotten exactly the answer I expected.

"Whew."

I let out a deep breath and slowly surveyed the room. Signs of resistance were everywhere. Beyond a wall that had probably collapsed under a powerful palm strike, I could see a rear garden that had kept its splendor.

There were faint footprints there, too.

They subdued the two of them quickly, then escaped through the rear garden.

The prints were too faint to tell me who had left them. But they did establish one thing: this wasn't an attack staged by Heugung or Yohi. A third party had been here.

Less than half an hour ago, at least three people had occupied this room.

And one of them was a Supreme Peak master.

So who had left those footprints? The Southern Heaven Demon Empress? Or one of the Dark Heaven masters under her command?

I thought it over, then shook my head.

I wasn't some old veteran of Murim. These clues could tell me only so much. Namho had encountered a wealth of information as an agent of the Hidden Shadow Pavilion, but his knowledge concerned fiends' faces and other outward features.

In the end, I need someone with both a high level of martial arts and a high level of insight.

Only two names came to mind immediately, and one of them was someone I could never bring myself to trust.

I turned to Yayul Mok.

"When will Great Hero Yayul arrive?"

"I've already sent someone to notify him. By now, he should be on his way with the other chieftains."

That was good news. I made sure Heugung's wrist was where I'd found it, to preserve the scene, then sniffed the pouch Yohi had left behind. The silk had split along one side, and only the faintest trace of scent remained—almost nothing.

I'll find out what happened. No matter what.

Just then, a commotion broke out beyond the pavilion.

"Father must have arrived at last," Yayul Mok said. "He may be able to identify the attacker."

But before I even stepped outside, I knew he was wrong.

The Beast Miao King wasn’t the first to arrive. And the person being named as the culprit was someone I hadn’t expected.

“The guilty party is coming out on his own.”

The moment I heard Baeksang’s flat voice, I understood.

Baeksang and the Beast Miao King weren’t the only Supreme Peak masters in Nanman capable of doing this.

Chapter 656

Silence fell over the Western Yao Estate.

The warriors gathering the corpses stopped. So did the tribal chieftains who had clearly just arrived. Everyone stood motionless, looking this way.

No. They were looking at one person.

Me.

Then a cold voice broke the silence.

“The culprit walks out on his own two feet.”

The instant I met Baeksang’s deeply sunken eyes, a hollow laugh escaped me before I knew it.

“Ha.”

Realization struck in a flash. I didn’t need to think any further about where this was going. Baeksang’s greeting had told me everything.

The culprit.

For a moment, I’d forgotten that I fit every condition myself.

Instead of holding up a lantern to search the distance, I should have looked at the ground beneath my feet.

“Uncle Baek, what do you—”

Yayul Mok had been staring at Baeksang in confusion. Now he seemed to understand and fell silent. Namho, who might have caught on even faster than I had, sighed softly.

“Hah. I must be getting old. To fall for a trick this shallow.”

Namho was only half right.

The trap was shallow, but the pit beneath it would be deep enough that, once I stepped in, I wouldn’t easily climb out.

Damn it.

I felt as though I were sinking into a swamp. My chest tightened, and my mouth felt gritty, as if I’d been chewing sand.

I closed my eyes for a moment. When I opened them, the estate had become a courtroom, and everyone’s place in it was clear.

“Did you hear what Great Chieftain Baeksang said?”

“The culprit? Then could that Han Chinese man really be…?”

The warriors whispered among themselves. They were the spectators.

“I knew this would happen! Didn’t I say over and over that we should drive the Han Chinese out from the start?”

“Hmm. It’s still too early to jump to conclusions.”

“Too early? Even now you’re saying that? Jin Taekyung is the only one capable of doing something like this!”

Unlike the whispering warriors, the chieftains were raising their voices to condemn me. They were the jury.

And then there was Baeksang.

“You stand there so boldly. As if you’ve done nothing wrong.”

He had spoken before them all. He was the judge of this damn trial.

I looked at his impassive face. “Of course I can stand here boldly. I haven’t done anything wrong.”

There was no point worrying about courtesy anymore.

One of the chieftains bristled at my answer. “You bastard! How dare—”

“How dare I what?”

Ssshh!

The wave of qi I released shot toward him. The chieftain who had stepped forward went white as a sheet.

“Ghk.”

I was already at the top of a hundred-foot pole. One wrong step and I’d fall. If I let the momentum of this turn against me, it would be over.

I kept the powerful wave of qi flowing and spoke quietly.

“This isn’t a place where any dog or cow can butt in. Stay out of it.”

“…!”

Someone swallowed hard.

Then a deep voice carried on the wind.

“What a racket.”

Heads turned. A man everyone knew was walking through the gate of the Western Yao Estate.

The Beast Miao King.

His tiger-like eyes were wide, his frame as massive as a mountain ridge. He radiated a pressure like Mount Tai itself, and everyone hurried to one knee.

“We pay our respects to the Palace Lord!”

Their voices rang out as one.

The Beast Miao King advanced slowly, more chieftains following behind him. Then he spoke.

“Am I among the dogs and cattle you mentioned?”

There was no doubt who he meant. I shook my head.

“No.”

“Then I have a question for you.”

His low voice reached my ears.

“Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. What connection do you have to the tragedy here today?”

He wasn’t asking because he suspected me. He was trying to help. I knew that better than anyone, and I answered without hesitation.

“None whatsoever.”

Whispers rose around us.

Baeksang, who had remained kneeling in silent respect, stood.

“Last year, a fire broke out in the western forest. It happened because of the carelessness of drunken Bai warriors, and as a result, more than two hundred livestock and more than thirty houses burned down.”

His voice remained dry.

“A crime demands punishment. I had to execute seven warriors of my own people with this hand. Yet when I asked for their last words, every one of them told me the same thing.”

His unreadable eyes stayed on me, but his words were for the Beast Miao King.

“I am innocent. I did not drink, and I did not start the fire.”

“…!”

“Two Great Chieftains have disappeared from the Inner Palace, and some hundred warriors have been slaughtered. A few flimsy words will not excuse anyone from this.”

The Beast Miao King closed his eyes. I stared at Baeksang.

“Listening to you, I get the strange feeling I’ve already been declared the culprit without knowing it.”

“If you’re truly innocent, prove it.”

“Prove it?”

“Yes. That’s the simplest way. Produce evidence that you aren’t the culprit, and the matter is settled.”

I didn’t get a chance to answer. No sooner had Baeksang finished speaking than he turned to the murmuring crowd and called out:

“I, Baeksang, Great Chieftain of the Bai people, will establish my own innocence before questioning the culprit. Heaven and earth shall bear witness, as will the fifteen chieftains and hundred warriors who were with me!”

“…!”

Damn it. Was this what he’d been after from the start?

I had fully expected Baeksang to have established a sufficient alibi, but the timing and flow with which he revealed it were too perfect.

As though they had been waiting for this very moment, the chieftains following Baeksang raised their voices more loudly than anyone.

“Palace Lord, Great Chieftain Baeksang speaks the truth. He was with us at the Southern Bai Estate from the moment the banquet ended.”

“The Jingpo Chieftain is correct! I, along with the Lahu people, swear it before Heaven!”

“The Wa people vouch for Great Chieftain Baeksang as well! When the tragedy occurred, we were meeting to prepare for tomorrow’s Tribal Grand Council!”

As their voices rose from all sides, Namho groaned behind me. The Beast Miao King’s expression grew grave.

Nearly half the chieftains had openly declared themselves part of a faction. But right now, not even the Beast Miao King could call them on it.

Two Great Chieftains had vanished from the Nanman Beast Palace, and close to a hundred lives had been brutally taken in the Inner Palace itself. Against a disaster like that, a factional struggle—even one that had become an open secret—was a mere ripple.

And then the moment came.

“Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. Now tell me: where were you at the time?”

A question I couldn’t avoid. An answer I couldn’t refuse to give.

Baeksang’s words and the eyes fixed on me felt like an invisible noose tightening around my whole body.

At the same time, someone touched my waist.

Tap.

I didn’t turn around. Namho had been standing behind me all along; I knew it was his hand.

Why?

He had a reason. I sharpened my senses and followed the movement of his finger.

It lasted only a moment, barely brushing my clothes, but I understood what he was trying to tell me.

He was writing two characters.

Silence.

Namho was telling me not to speak. Or perhaps to think again before I said what I was about to say.

The situation was taking an ominous turn.

What if I tell them I met Heugung?

Would they believe me? More likely, Baeksang and his chieftains would turn it against me.

Heugung had said he slipped out of his residence without anyone noticing, and he had even changed his appearance with the Bone-Shrinking Technique.

I can’t prove it.

If Heugung were here, perhaps I could. But unless the wrist he'd left behind could testify, my alibi was worthless.

On the other hand, saying I'd left my quarters for no reason would be digging my own grave. There had only ever been one answer I could give.

"My quarters."

Countless thoughts flashed through my mind, but little time passed. I answered without much delay, then took a deep breath and continued.

"I remained in my quarters immediately after the banquet ended. Then I was attacked."

"Attacked?"

Most of those present hadn't heard about it yet. As the crowd murmured, the Beast Miao King spoke, his face stern.

"Jin Taekyung is telling the truth. I received a report that assassins whose tribes could not be identified attacked them."

Yayul Mok had been shaken by the turn of events, but he made his voice steady.

"That's right. Some of the Inner Palace guards and I reached the scene about half an hour ago. We also confirmed that the warriors patrolling the area had been killed."

After the Beast Miao King, Yayul Mok also came to my aid, and the murmuring around us grew louder.

But I had been watching Baeksang all along, and I realized once again that something was wrong.

"I, too, heard there had been another tragedy in the Inner Palace."

His voice was cold, his eyes impassive. He turned to Yayul Mok.

"But those assassins entered the Inner Palace so easily, killed the warriors on patrol, and carried out their attack. They must have been formidable. Wouldn't you say?"

Before I could stop him, Yayul Mok answered.

"Yes. There were around thirty of them, and every one was as skilled as an elite warrior—"

He never finished. He couldn't.

Because Baeksang's voice pierced everyone's ears in the next moment.

"Strong enough to kill a Supreme Peak master who inherited the Fire King's legacy?"

"…!"

"…!"

"And if this clumsy assassination attempt was meant to keep Jin Taekyung occupied, that makes no sense either. He would have stayed in his quarters if they'd left him alone. Why attack him and draw attention? The more you think about it, the stranger it becomes."

The air shifted. Dozens of wide eyes turned on me, their stares prickling against my face.

Yet I felt calmer.

Not because I thought I could get out of this. I had already half accepted what was happening.

This trap was large and deep—far beyond anything I had imagined.

When did it start? How much of this was planned?

I stared at Baeksang, still searching for answers, and spoke.

"I don't think this is the end."

He nodded at once.

"Good instincts."

"Something else to say?"

"No. Something to show you."

Snap.

With his dry answer, Baeksang snapped his fingers. From the half-destroyed gate of the Western Yao Estate, a faint presence began to draw closer.

Step. Step.

Short, uneven strides. Slow footsteps.

Like someone who was ill. Or…

An old man.

I recognized that oddly familiar presence and closed my eyes. When an elderly voice reached me, I opened them again.

"U-Utu-ri of the Bai people. I came at the Great Chieftain's summons."

The old owner of the noodle shop stood before the gate.

Chapter 657

Something big is coming.

My gut was right. The old owner of the thin-noodle shop where I'd sat with Heugung not long ago had appeared.

Fuck.

Something big really had come.

I stared at the old shopkeeper, cursing inwardly.

I wasn't the only one. As countless eyes turned toward him, a trembling voice came from between his age-spotted lips.

"U-Utu-ri of the Bai people. I came at the Great Chieftain's summons."

The Beast Miao King spoke, his face grim.

"I've never seen him before. Who is he?"

At a glance from Baeksang, the old shopkeeper answered at once.

"I sell thin noodles near the West Gate of the Outer Palace. I've made my living doing that for more than half my life."

His words and actions taught me several new things.

First. The old shopkeeper's name was Utu-ri, and he was one of the Bai people.

Second. Unlike at the noodle shop, Utu-ri could speak clearly and hear perfectly well. In short, he was full of life. Jirisan had its baby hero Utu-ri; Nanman had its noodle-selling Utu-ri.[2889]

Third. This Bai elder, spry enough to put his age to shame, had probably told Baeksang everything he'd seen and heard.

And fourth. I was probably fucked.

You have to understand. The owner here is over ninety, so his hearing is bad.

Heugung, you son of a bitch.

What he'd said at the noodle shop could hardly have been more wrong.

Bad hearing, my ass.

The only thing looking dim was my future.

The shopkeeper, supposedly over ninety, had heard the Beast Miao King from ten paces away.

"Utu-ri, I called you here to confirm one thing. Do you recognize anyone present?"

"Yes."

The old shopkeeper nodded without hesitation, and I realized I had another item to add.

Fifth. Besides excellent hearing, Utu-ri had remarkable eyesight and memory.

[2889] The baby general Utu-ri is a child hero associated with Jirisan in Korean folklore.

That much was easy to tell. From the moment he'd entered the Western Yao Estate, he'd kept stealing glances at my face.

"That young man standing over there. The tallest one, with the broad build."

The hand that had trembled like an aspen tree when he set down the bowls of noodles was, for some reason, perfectly still this time.

Damn it.

His finger pointed directly at me. I shut my mouth, the atmosphere around us began to stir, and the script Baeksang had meticulously prepared raced toward its conclusion.

"Are you certain it was him? You must not tell even the slightest lie."

The old shopkeeper swallowed hard before answering.

"Yes, without a doubt. I may be old and worn-out, but I'm not so blind that I can't recognize a customer standing right in front of me. His build was exceptionally large, and he was wearing a tiger mask, so he stood out in my memory."

"Half the people in the Outer Palace must be wearing masks right now. Did you report him as suspicious for that reason alone?"

"N-No, sir. He lingered nearby before sitting down and ordering noodles. That was when I started to find him suspicious."

"Suspicious? What exactly troubled you?"

"Well, the thing is…"

The old shopkeeper glanced at me, then continued cautiously.

"It was the mask, sir."

"The mask?"

"Yes. He kept it on even while he ate. As though something terrible would happen if anyone saw his face."

"I see. Continue."

"But later, when he drank the broth, the mask must have felt too restrictive, because he raised it slightly. That was the first and only time I saw his face."

So that was when.

If I showed my whole face, they might realize I was Han Chinese. But keeping the mask on would look suspicious too. I'd deliberately raised it only as far as the bottom of my nose while I ate, then lifted it for a moment at the very end…

And the old man who looked ready to die any day saw it and remembered.

At first, my excessive caution had drawn suspicion. Later, overlooking the existence of the old shopkeeper had brought me to this situation.

Baeksang, in his usual even tone, was bringing the matter to a close.

"Was he alone?"

"No. He shared a table with a middle-aged man."

"Another middle-aged man. And afterward?"

“They left at almost the same time, then headed toward the main road by the West Gate.”

“Do you remember the other man’s face?”

“Yes, of course. I’ve lived in the Outer Palace all my life, but I’d never seen him around before, so I remember him clearly. The same goes for that young man.”

“Then they were certainly outsiders who entered during the Tribal Grand Council. If we make likenesses of them and investigate, it should be easy to identify them. When did they leave?”

“Around Insi.[2890] They stayed about as long as it takes to drink a cup of tea. The Outer Palace has been setting off firecrackers at regular intervals, so I remember the time clearly.”

The old shopkeeper answered without faltering. His eyes and voice were full of conviction.

Baeksang had gotten every answer he wanted. He gave a small nod.

“Thank you for your cooperation. You may go. I’ll have someone reward you.”

“Th-Thank you. Thank you, Great Chieftain!”

The old shopkeeper bowed repeatedly as he left.

He’d probably be rewarded handsomely for this. The little stall that filled up with three or four customers would become a large inn, and the wrinkled hands that boiled noodles would count silver nyang[2891] instead.

But the opportunity he’d found in his old age had become the worst crisis of my life.

“How strange. A man who ought to have been in the Inner Palace slipped out in secret, met with someone whose identity is unknown, and immediately afterward, this tragedy occurred.”

“…”

“Your earlier statement has already been exposed as a lie. Still, in light of what happened at Ailao Mountain, I’ll give you one last chance. Do you have anything to say in your defense?”

Countless thoughts flashed through my mind in the brief moment Baeksang’s low voice reached me.

The Western Yao Estate had fallen into suffocating silence. Everyone was looking at me.

Then Namho’s finger brushed my back again.

Sssrk.

Escape.

One character. It was enough to tell me what he meant.

[2890] Insi is a traditional time period from 3 to 5 a.m.

[2891] A silver nyang was a historical Korean unit of silver currency.

Get out of here first. Worry about what comes next later.

If Namho had learned martial arts, that was the Sound Transmission he would have sent me. I'd probably have done the same in his place.

Would it have gone better if I'd told the truth?

I answered my own question. No.

Maybe it would have gone a little better than this. But Baeksang had prepared thoroughly. One way or another, he would have backed me into the same corner.

I could claim the old noodle seller was lying, but… come on. If Baeksang were stupid enough to fall for that, he wouldn't have made it this far.

Besides, a master like Baeksang would realize just by looking at the wounds on the assassins who attacked us that most of them weren't my handiwork.

Without Heugung there to corroborate my statement, telling the truth would only make me a shameless culprit.

Though I suppose that would beat being a culprit caught in a lie.

Either way, I was trapped. There was no getting around it.

And even now, things were hurtling toward the edge.

Sssrk.

A faint sound reached me through the brief silence. Leather shoes crushed blood-soaked grains of sand, while dozens of fluttering hems brushed the flowers in the garden.

In an instant, they had formed a ring around me.

Baeksang stood at its head.

"I'll ask again. Your defense?"

My defense.

After careful consideration, I answered.

"I'm not giving you one. This whole thing's filthy, you fucking bastard."

"…!"

"…!"

Apparently, that wasn't the answer they'd expected. Baeksang studied me with a look of surprise, then nodded.

"Are you admitting your guilt?"

"I admit I lied. That was stupid of me."

"So you intend to deny the rest to the end."

"Would you admit it in my place? There's nothing to admit when I haven't committed a crime. I'm just pissed that I walked into a trap I couldn't avoid."

"If you've been wronged, surrender peacefully. I'll sort out right from wrong."

"Yeah, fucking right. Right and wrong, my ass, you prick."

At my scornful answer, Baeksang's eyes darkened.

“Then I have no choice.”

At the same time—

Shing. Tsststst!

A dazzling radiance surged from the pure-white blade he drew in a flash. Baeksang lowered his treasured sword, infused with Sword Force, and slowly stepped forward.

“Warriors of the Nanman Beast Palace, listen. We will use our full strength to seize the criminal Jin Taekyung. Not a single mistake will be tolerated—”

At that moment, a roar-like shout erupted from somewhere, drowning out the words that were about to leave Baeksang’s mouth.

“Baeksang!”

Only one person in all Nanman could address the Great Chieftain of the Bai people that way.

“All of you, stop!”

Whoosh!

A powerful wave of qi pressed down on us from every direction.

The Beast Miao King had halted the tightening ring with a single command. His eyes blazed as he glared at Baeksang.

“What do you think you’re doing?”

Everyone trembled beneath his fierce aura. Baeksang did not.

“Exactly what you see, Palace Lord. I intend to seize the criminal Jin Taekyung here.”

“Have you forgotten? He is a pavilion master of the Murim Alliance and a member of the Fire Gate Clan, our longtime ally.”

“Are you, the Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace, shielding a culprit for those reasons alone?”

“Nonsense! He is not the culprit. Have you already forgotten what happened at Ailao Mountain? He has no cause or reason to do such a thing!”

“But we have a witness who saw him, and clear evidence pointing to him.”

“That’s—”

“Everyone here remembers what happened at Ailao Mountain, myself included. That is why I’m taking the trouble to capture him. Of course, if he resists, we’ll take him dead or alive.”

“Baeksang!”

“I’m not finished.”

Baeksang’s cold voice continued.

“If Jin Taekyung forces his way out of here, I’ll cast a net over heaven and earth across all Nanman and hunt him down with everything we have. Before that, the other Han Chinese under his command will make fine examples.”

"…!"

The Beast Miao King's eyes widened. Baeksang was saying he would risk war with the Central Plains. Yayul Mok shouted, his face contorted.

"Uncle!"

"This is a conversation between tribal chieftains, not between lord and subject. The Young Palace Lord has no authority here. Stay out of it."

"But how could you! How could you dare make such a unilateral decision on your own!"

"On my own…"

Baeksang muttered the words softly, then suddenly raised his head and looked at the sky.

The thick darkness around us had begun to lift. Light was slowly spreading from the east.

"Do you see? It's already the hour of the Rabbit.[2892] Dawn is breaking."

"What does that have to do with anything?"

"What if we begin the second day of the Tribal Grand Council right here? With a new matter on the agenda, of course…"

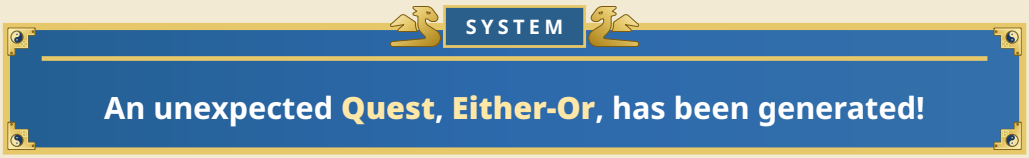
Tsst.

The sword in Baeksang's hand shone more fiercely.

"Whether the Han Chinese Jin Taekyung lives or dies."

At that moment, a bell sounded in my ears—a bell only one person in the world could hear.

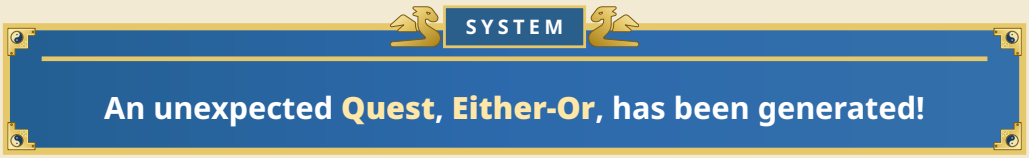
Ding.



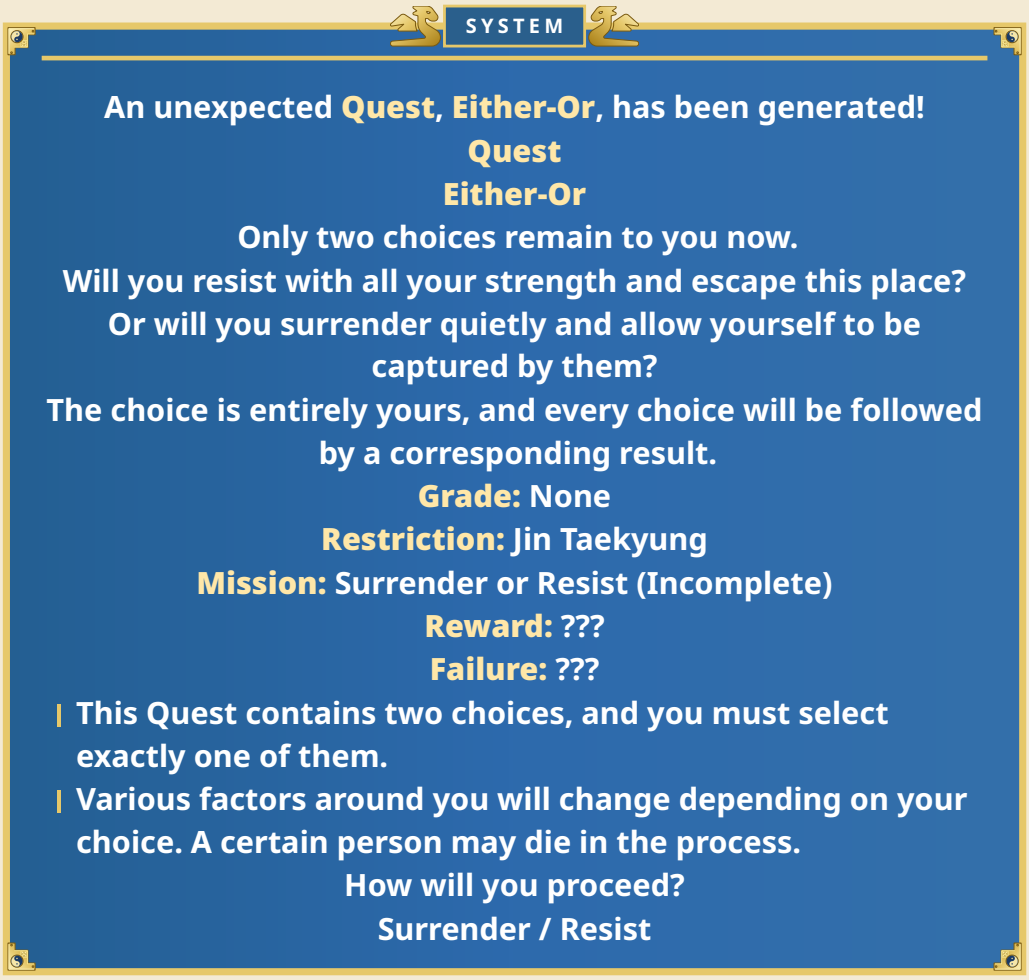
[2892] The hour of the Rabbit is a traditional time period from 5 to 7 a.m.

Chapter 658

Ding.



A System notification rang out. At the same time, a translucent holographic window sprang up in midair.



I had only one thought after reading the System window.

What a shitty situation.

Either-Or.

The sudden Quest was exactly what its title said.

Surrender or resist.

There were only two choices, and I had to make one. The situation—and the voices rising all around me—demanded it.

“I agree with Great Chieftain Baeksang.”

"Exactly! If the Palace Lord thinks this is an arbitrary decision, then let us convene the Tribal Grand Council right here and now!"

"If he is innocent, he should surrender quietly and submit to an investigation. What is the problem?"

A hollow laugh escaped me as I listened to the pro-Baeksang chieftains.

What's the problem?

The biggest problem was that this was Murim, not the modern world.

Judicial corruption happened even in the twenty-first century. I didn't need to see what would happen to me once Baeksang had me locked up.

They'll brand me a criminal from the start and make sure I stay one.

There would be no fairness in the process. My ill-considered lie had already been exposed, and Baeksang had produced a witness and clear circumstantial evidence.

It was a carefully dug trap. Once I'd stepped into it, there was nowhere to go but down.

Still, some people spoke up for me.

"You're all insane. Have you lost your minds? You intend to kill Jin Taekyung? Are you planning to start a war with all of Murim in the Central Plains?"

"We don't even know for certain that he's the culprit. Why would a pavilion master of the Murim Alliance and the Fire King's disciple do such a thing?"

"He rescued no fewer than two hundred warriors from Ailao Mountain. And you claim he is the culprit? Even if you hate the Han Chinese, how can you act like ungrateful beasts?"

This time, it was the chieftains who followed the Beast Miao King shouting.

But of the dozen or so, only a few stepped forward. Many others watched in confusion or kept their mouths firmly shut.

Of course. I'm an outsider in the end.

The Nanman people had never felt particularly well disposed toward the Han Chinese. My actions at Ailao Mountain were the only reason a Han Chinese man like me had been granted the extraordinary privilege of attending the Tribal Grand Council. That was as far as they were willing to go.

I didn't blame them. They could see which way things were turning.

Even if the Tribal Grand Council convened here and now, as Baeksang had suggested, it couldn't turn this around.

Not even for the Beast Miao King.

I think I'm pretty fucked.

The Beast Miao King's brow furrowed as my Sound Transmission reached him.

…You crazy bastard.

Why?

You can still joke at a time like this?

I'm telling you the truth. I can't sit here bawling like a child. It wouldn't make anything better.

At my Sound Transmission, which calmly faced reality, the Beast Miao King bit down hard on his lip.

I'm sorry. If the Tribal Grand Council is held as Baeksang says… there will be nothing I can do.

Still, it's a relief that Great Hero Yayul seems to believe me.

Of course I believe you. That's why I'm all the more sorry.

Then instead of apologizing, could you punch each of those bastards in the mouth? If that's too awkward, I'll do it.

…

Or use Flame Divine Palm.

Hah. At this point, you may as well be Old Master Jeok's flesh and blood rather than his Disciple.

Jeok Cheongang.

At the three syllables of his name, a familiar face suddenly flashed before my eyes, and my mouth turned bitter. If Jeok Cheongang were in this situation, how would he have handled it?

No. If it were Old Master Jeok, things never would have reached this point.

I wasn't nearly as strong as Jeok Cheongang. Despite thinking I'd grown used to Murim, I was still woefully inexperienced. And my enemies were more thorough and cunning than I'd imagined.

If this were Go… my actions would probably count as a bad move.

I didn't know how to play Go. But when I was little, my father sometimes sat at the computer and played online.

His username was Jin Sedol, though his win rate was terrible. Whenever he lost to a user from China, he'd mutter, "That Chink bastard plays Go like shit… Taiwan number one," and Mom would smack him on the back for swearing in front of me.

That was all ancient history.

A few years later, my father died suddenly in a Monster Wave. His Go account, steadily used through defeat after defeat, fell dormant.

But why was it that, all of a sudden, I remembered that day when I had watched my father losing at Go?

"Dad, are you losing again?"

"What do you mean, again? Dad's only losing this game. No, it's not even over yet."

"But you lost yesterday and the day before. And I saw you losing earlier!"

"…My sweet boy. You've grown so big you can drive a nail straight through your father's heart."

But why do you always lose, Dad?

"Hmm. I made a bad move."

"A handshake?"[2893]

"Not that kind of move. I mean a bad play. Like yesterday at the sports festival, when you kicked Minjun's leg instead of the soccer ball by mistake and lost the game. A bad choice. Understand?"

"Uh-huh! So if you make a bad move, you lose at Go?"

"Not necessarily."

Why?

"One bad move doesn't end the game. You lose when you keep making them. Hmm. I shouldn't have done that."

"But I got sent off right away yesterday."

"Son, wasn't that because you fractured Minjun's leg?"

"Ohh."

"What do you mean, 'ohh'? I nearly broke my back apologizing to Minjun's parents. Anyway, what matters is not making bad moves over and over."

"What happens if you do?"

"In Go, you lose your precious stones and eventually lose the game. That's the price of bad choices."

"I know! That's why you always lose, Dad!"

"…Honey! Take Taekyung away! Honey!"

I didn't know why that memory had come back to me now.

No. Maybe I did.

It had helped me make up my mind.

Can you promise me one thing?

Why have you gone quiet all of a sudden… A promise?

Yes. A promise.

I looked straight at the Beast Miao King and sent another Sound Transmission.

No matter what happens from this point on, promise me you'll make sure the others can return safely to the Central Plains.

…!

That's all I need.

You… Surely you aren't…

I'll take that as a promise.

The Beast Miao King stared at me, eyes wide, as though he'd guessed what I intended. Then he nodded, his face troubled.

I promise. I'll use every bit of power I have to protect your subordinates. I'll clear your name, too.

[2893] In Korean, aksu means both a bad move in Go (□□) and a handshake (□□).

Good. That's enough.

I muttered inwardly and began walking toward Baeksang.

Or I would have, if two hands hadn't reached from behind and seized my clothes.

Grab!

"Jin Taekyung. What are you planning to do?"

Yayul Mok's face was rigid. Namho, who had already figured it out, spoke next.

"You foolish bastard. Are you planning to walk into a tiger's mouth on your own?"

"I'm not sure whether it's a tiger's jaws or a fucking mutt's."

I shrugged.

"But things have come to this. What else can I do?"

Namho's gaze grew darker than I'd ever seen it.

"Is it because of me and the others? You're afraid we'll be hurt if you escape?"

"Hmm. I don't know."

"If that's what you're thinking, forget it. None of us would want—"

"I know. I know how you all feel."

I cut him off gently.

"But it would be the same if our positions were reversed. If the other members were in my place, or if Elder Namho were me right now, you wouldn't run away alone either."

…!

"See you later."

His eyes wavered, but he said nothing. I pulled my clothes free, gave them both a look in farewell, and walked on.

Step. Step.

Silence had settled all around us. My footsteps seemed to thunder as I crossed the space alone, while Baeksang watched me, as still as an undisturbed lake.

"Have you finally come to your senses?"

"Someone told me a long time ago that if you make too many bad moves in Go, you lose your precious stones and the game."

If this were an actual game of Go, I'd play however I liked. To hell with bad moves.

So what if I lost? A famous professional player had once said that, in the end, it was only Go. And to me, it really would be only Go.

After losing, I could simply smash Baeksang's head open with the Go board while saying, just like my father had, "That Chink bastard plays Go like shit."

But this wasn't a game. Here, a bad move would cost me my people instead of stones.

Ju Hwaran. Hyuk Mujin. Song Ilseom. Sama Pyo. Taishan. Namho…

Even if I got out of here, breaking through the Nanman Beast Palace's net over heaven and earth with all of them would be nearly impossible.

They'd trusted me and followed me this far. I had to keep them alive.

Whatever it took.

"If you keep making bad moves, you lose your precious stones and eventually the game… Whoever told you that was wise."

"He was a good man. At least he wasn't a piece of shit like you."

Shing! Shing! Shing!

Weapons came free on every side, as though everyone had agreed on a signal. Baeksang glanced at the tightening ring and waved his sleeve.

"For once, I commend you for avoiding a bad move. Even the Fire King's disciple had no other choice."

"I'm not doing this for praise from a piece of shit like you."

"No matter. You're going straight to the underground prison."

"An underground prison. Can't say I'm glad to hear that."

"We'll have iron balls weighing several thousand geun[2894] ready for you as well. You may look forward to them."

"Sure. My balls are trembling with anticipation already."

It was more or less what I'd expected. I answered calmly, then addressed Baeksang as he slowly sheathed his sword.

"But why aren't you looking forward to it?"

"What?"

"Didn't you say earlier that if I ran, you'd kill all my people?"

"Why bring that up now—"

I had no reason to hear the rest of his words. Nor did I need to.

Say that kind of bullshit to me, and you should expect a punch.

Along with a final word he could not hear, I thrust out a single fist like a ray of light.

Crack!

Without waiting to see the result, I shouted as fast as I could.

"Ah, I surrender! I surrenderrr!"

What are you going to do about it, fucker?

[2894] A geun is a traditional Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g, or about 1.32 lb.

Chapter 659

Crack.

A large, fur-covered paw crushed a brittle leaf.

Fangs showed between parted jaws. The sleek body crouched deep in the grass was ready to hunt.

What kind of meat will I eat today?

All it had to do was spot its prey, sprint in, and sink its fangs into the back of its neck.

As long as it watched out for venomous beasts that appeared without warning, finding prey in Nanman was easy enough.

At least, it was for a black leopard near the top of the food chain.

Grrrr…

The leopard scanned its surroundings with bright yellow eyes, then let out a low growl.

It had sensed a great many presences in the distance and caught their scent on the wind.

Sniff, sniff.

Its senses were sharp, as a predator’s should be. It did not take long to identify the prey it had encountered sooner than expected.

Humans.

More precisely, a group of humans. Roughly a hundred of them were approaching.

Grrr.

The leopard gave an involuntary growl of irritation.

Humans were unwelcome. Small as they were, they sometimes hunted predators much larger than themselves. And the more of them there were, the stronger they became.

Just like now.

Swish.

The leopard rose from its crouch.

Hunting humans alone was for fools. It would be smarter to move elsewhere and find different prey.

It was about to do just that when—

“Whew. Whew…”

The leopard stopped and stared beyond the grass.

A human came running up, making strange noises, and squatted among the weeds.

“Ahh. I almost died.”

At the same time, sounds and smells that would have made even predators recoil filled the air. A glint flashed through the black leopard's vertically slit pupils.

There was no doubt about it. This human had left the group to relieve himself.

He had no idea this place would be his grave.

Grrr.

One target. A stupid-looking human at that.

The leopard made its decision in an instant. The muscles in all four legs tightened, and its black body shot forward like an arrow.

Tap—whoosh!

Several dozen feet vanished in an instant. Only then did the human notice something and turn his head toward the leopard.

A beat too late. Fangs flashed inside the leopard's wide-open jaws.

—Raaaar!

Thud! Crunch!

The sound of flesh being torn rang out beneath the beast's thunderous roar. Large and small bodies tangled together and rolled across the ground.

A moment later, the survivor of that short, fierce struggle made himself heard.

"Phew!"

The man who emerged from the black fur had blood all over his face.

The leopard's blood.

At the last moment, he had driven his sword into the head of the predator that ruled this stretch of forest. Now he panted for breath.

"Huff. Hah. Fuck. I nearly died taking a dump."

An ambush while he was doing his business. Thinking back, it had been far too close.

A year or two ago, he would have ended up as the leopard's dinner.

But like a seed putting out shoots, he had grown considerably since then.

"Getting beaten all the time really has improved my reflexes… But how do I get out from under this thing?"

The man—Hyuk Mujin—was still trapped beneath the impossibly heavy carcass of the black leopard, struggling and grunting, when—

"Strange. Was this the business you said you had to take care of?"

A familiar voice reached his ears, and his face lit up.

"Oh! Great Hero Song!"

Song Ilseom sighed.

"I told you not to call me Great Hero."

"Why not? You're helping someone in trouble. Doesn't that make you a Great Hero?"

"You take after your superior. The words flow right out of you."

"I'll take that as a compliment. But don't say it in front of Captain. Even you might find yourself getting beaten as freely as the words flow."

Song Ilseom nodded at Hyuk Mujin's heartfelt warning.

"…I'll bear that in mind."

"Good thinking. Now, could you get this thing off me? I can barely breathe. I keep seeing my father's face."

"Really? When did he die?"

"What are you talking about? He's alive and well."

"…?"

Is he insane?

Song Ilseom gave the question a moment's serious thought, then abandoned it and grabbed the leopard's carcass.

Few people in the Fire Dragon Pavilion he had somehow joined were sane. The Pavilion Master was the worst of them.

Scrape. Thud.

Freed at last from the danger of being crushed to death, Hyuk Mujin brushed the dirt from his clothes.

"Whew. That was close. Where is everyone?"

"Setting up camp. The Young Bureau Head stayed there too. We've been riding nearly ten shichen[2895] without a break, so she seems to have decided we need to rest. A missive arrived while you were away."

"A missive?"

"Yes. It seems the Nanman Beast Palace sent a messenger eagle. They must have further instructions."

"Either way, that's good news. The beasts have been moving so violently that I nearly shattered my rear end."

"They need rest too. Still, the Nanman people must train them well. They have impressive stamina—every bit as much as grassland horses."

About a day earlier, they had left the Outer Palace with the reconnaissance squad and pressed on without respite.

They had no idea when the Blood Monk, an old monster none of them had ever heard of before, might cross Guangxi and head south. A forced march was the obvious choice.

"When are we supposed to arrive?"

"According to the two tribal chieftains, in two days if we're quick. Three at the latest. The Young Bureau Head seems to think the same."

"Why do I get the feeling that means we have to make it in two?"

[2895] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; ten shichen is about twenty hours.

“Because we do. We need to move as quickly as possible to stop the Blood Monk.”

“As quickly as we’ve been moving?”

“Possibly faster.”

“…Faster might be a bit much.”

Hyuk Mujin grimaced, then nodded.

“Damn it. Not much choice, I guess.”

“You accepted that sooner than I expected.”

“Try following Captain around for a couple of years, Great Hero Song. You’ll learn to give up on anything. Your life included.”

“Unfortunately, that won’t happen.”

“Why not?”

“If not for the Young Bureau Head, I would never have come this far. She is the one and only reason I’m in this wretched Nanman.”

Hyuk Mujin shrugged at the curt reply.

“Hmm. Then I guess we’ll be seeing a lot of you.”

“What?”

“You just said it yourself. You came this far because of Young Lady Ju. And Young Lady Ju is going to stay with Captain, isn’t she?”

“…!”

“Great Hero Song, you’re not as bright as I thought.”

Song Ilseom went still for a moment. Then he asked evenly, “Do you want to die?”

“No. Sorry.”

Hyuk Mujin answered at once. Keeping a wary eye on Song Ilseom, he pulled his sword from the leopard’s head.

Spurt.

Blood gushed from the gaping wound. Hyuk Mujin gave the blade a cursory wipe and sheathed it, then looked up at the sky.

“It’s night already.”

They had apparently set out at night, but while moving without a moment to think, the second night had already arrived.

And several more nights would pass before they returned to the Nanman Beast Palace.

“I’d rather not run into the Blood Monk, though. It’s hard not to worry with Captain gone. You feel the same way, don’t you, Great Hero Song?”

No answer came.

After a brief silence, what he heard behind him was not Song Ilseom’s voice, but the cold scrape of a blade leaving its sheath.

Shing.

Hyuk Mujin recognized the sound coming from behind him and swallowed dryly.

"Uh, about calling you dumb. I'm sorry. Are you really angry?"

Song Ilseom's voice came back cold.

"…Shut up and turn around."

"Great Hero Song. Please. I'm begging you."

"I'm begging you. Shut up and turn around. Draw your sword again."

He's really lost it.

Tears in his eyes, Hyuk Mujin turned on trembling legs.

And then he understood why Song Ilseom's voice had gone cold. Why he had told him to draw his sword.

"I thought they were on our side… Was I wrong?"

Rustle.

The dark grass shifted.

The reconnaissance squad—the hundred or so people who had traveled with them until now—stood beyond it. At their head, the two tribal chieftains emerged and regarded them with troubled expressions.

"You weren't the only one who thought so. I regret that it's come to this."

"We received a missive bearing the Palace's seal. It's an order we cannot refuse."

A missive.

At those two words, Song Ilseom had a vague sense that something serious had happened in the Inner Palace they had left behind.

But right now, only one person mattered.

"Where is the Young Bureau Head?"

Killing intent seeped into the question.

Chief Jang, a supporter of the Palace Lord who had favored Jin Taekyung since the Tribal Grand Council, sighed.

"Her sword was fiercer than I expected. She caught on quickly, too."

"I'll ask one last time. Where is she?"

Whoosh!

Killing intent poured from Song Ilseom, so savage that even the beasts with the reconnaissance squad backed away.

Sensing his fury, the other tribal chieftain hurried to answer.

"Sh-she's safe. We only subdued her with a Pressure-Point Strike."

Song Ilseom clenched his teeth without realizing it. Relief and regret surged through him together.

I should have stayed by her side, no matter what.

Given the size of the reconnaissance squad that had turned against them, staying probably would not have changed the outcome.

But he could not stop picturing Ju Hwaran fighting alone.

"…Damn it."

As he spat out the curse, Song Ilseom slowly lowered the cherished weapon in his hand.

Hyuk Mujin, a little slower to grasp the situation, did the same.

Scrape. Thunk.

His carefully forged blade sank into the ground.

Chief Jang watched with a troubled look, then gestured. Warriors from the reconnaissance squad hurried forward, took their weapons, and bound them.

"…Great Hero Song. I think we're fucked."

Song Ilseom did not answer Hyuk Mujin this time either.

He couldn't.

Tap, tap, tap.

Someone's fingers tapped all over his body. As he felt his body stiffen under the Pressure-Point Strike, Song Ilseom muttered inwardly,

What the hell have you done, Jin Taekyung?

Chapter 660

"We've subdued them all. We struck their Sleep Acupoints too, so they won't regain consciousness for at least a day."

"…Good work."

Chief Jang nodded at his warrior's report, his expression troubled. Song Ilseom and Hyuk Mujin lay motionless, and their figures were reflected in his eyes.

"We don't know what might happen. Keep a close watch on them. We'll rest for two shichen[2896] and then move out."

"Does that mean…?"

"Yes. They're coming with us."

"Chief… Forgive me for speaking out of turn, but wouldn't it be better to send a few warriors to escort the prisoners to the Inner Palace separately?"

The warrior regretted asking as soon as the words were out. Chief Jang only stared at him.

"I'll carry out your orders."

He hurried away. Watching him go, Chief Jang sighed as the contents of the letter delivered by messenger eagle came back to him.

Heugung and Yohi, two Great Chieftains, have gone missing. The Western Yao Estate has been wiped out. And they're blaming Jin Taekyung?

He had read it several times, unable to believe his eyes. But the words in the missive had not changed, and he had only one choice.

I'm sorry, all of you.

The apology would never reach them. Soon, though, they would understand that this was the best he could do under the circumstances.

This was a carefully planned plot. Jin Taekyung was caught up in it unexpectedly.

Chief Jang did not believe the missive's accusation.

Everything he had seen of Jin Taekyung fit what the Han Chinese of the Central Plains called a Great Hero. If Jin had not risked his life fighting in the Poisonblood Grounds, more than two hundred warriors would never have returned to their families. Among those who had come home were warriors of Chief Jang's own Zang people, including his blood relatives.

And even setting aside what I owe him, there isn't a sound reason for him to have done it.

Nanman and the Central Plains had fallen out after the Great Faction War, but that was largely one-sided hostility born of the tremendous sacrifices Nanman had suffered. Why would Jin Taekyung, sent here as a representative of the Murim Alliance, cause such a tragedy?

[2896] A shichen is a traditional unit of time equal to about two hours.

Unless he wants to make an enemy of Nanman as well as Dark Heaven…

But Chief Jang could do nothing about the accusation now. Baeksang and his faction had already seized control of the situation.

However, the Palace Lord, the Beast Miao King, had secretly conveyed his intentions through a messenger eagle.

> Detain the Han Chinese in the reconnaissance squad, but do not escort them to the Inner Palace.

Chief Jang understood exactly what the Beast Miao King meant.

If we take them to the Inner Palace, they'll surely end up as hostages.

Fortunately, Chief Go, who was leading the reconnaissance squad alongside him, also followed the Beast Miao King. Since the two men shared the same opinion, they had their warriors subdue the three of them—not to make hostages of them, but to keep them in their own hands and protect them.

The timing helped. They were already on the move to watch for an old monster known as the Blood Monk. With a threat like that looming, Baeksang's faction could hardly use their decision to keep the prisoners with the squad against them.

Just bear with it a little longer. At least until this is settled.

Chief Jang stepped toward the two unconscious men being carried away. He felt bad for them and meant to loosen their bindings a little.

"Stop a moment. Aren't those ropes tied too tightly?"

"Chief! Don't!"

"What do you mean, don't? It'll be fine—"

Squelch.

Ignoring the warriors, Chief Jang reached behind Hyuk Mujin's back and frowned.

What is this?

Something damp and sticky. Then the stench reached him.

"Uh. There was… feces on his back," a warrior said.

"…!"

"That's why we told you not to come any closer…"

His voice trailed off. Chief Jang looked from his hand to Hyuk Mujin and back again, then spoke in a low voice.

"The prisoner might shit again—no, escape. Tie the ropes tighter."

"Yes, Chief."

In the modern world, I'd been a model law-abiding citizen.

Until middle school, whenever the traffic light turned green, I would raise my hand high and cross the street. After becoming a Hunter, I paid all my insurance premiums and taxes on time, without ever delaying a payment or evading a cent.

I barely even complained about the national pension, though I'd get next to nothing from it when I grew old.

In short, prison and I had nothing to do with each other.

So why had I become so familiar with underground prisons in Murim when I hadn't committed a crime?

I'd spent time in one at the Jin Family of Taiyuan, back when I was still a budding martial artist. At the Sichuan Tang Clan, I'd stayed in one for days to remain at Jeok Cheongang's side.

This was my third visit, and it was nothing like the other two.

At the Jin Family of Taiyuan, it was practically a training hall. At the Sichuan Tang Clan, I was there for Jeok Cheongang's treatment.

Not only was I imprisoned against my will, but anyone would have thought as I did if iron balls weighing more than a thousand geun[2897] each were hanging all over their body like accessories.

Clank.

"…Fuck, these are heavy."

I muttered the curse under my breath. The enormous chains binding my limbs and the iron balls attached to them weighed so much that even I could barely move—and my Strength was far beyond human limits.

If I could use my internal energy, I might be able to figure something out…

Maybe I shouldn't have punched Baeksang at the end.

I regretted it for a moment. But if he'd been that easy to deal with, I'd be in my quarters instead of an underground prison.

Besides, even after I'd punched him hard enough to break his nose, he hadn't so much as batted an eye. He'd personally bound me while I stood there without resisting, then ordered his tribal chieftains:

"Lock the Han Chinese Jin Taekyung in the underground prison and bind him with ten thousand geun[2898] of weight."

And this was the result.

They'd put me in the deepest part of the Nanman Beast Palace's underground prison and given me a special pill that would keep me from using my internal energy for several days.

At least I should be grateful they didn't use a Pressure-Point Strike on me.

[2897] A Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb). A thousand geun is about 600 kg (1,320 lb); ten thousand geun is about 6,000 kg (13,200 lb).

[2898] A Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb). A thousand geun is about 600 kg (1,320 lb); ten thousand geun is about 6,000 kg (13,200 lb).

The reason was simple.

My acupoints kept coming undone.

My perfect body, which had been recognized as a Heavenly Martial Physique by countless powerful masters, had simply performed its function to the fullest.

That didn't mean I'd had any luck getting my internal energy to flow again.

"Ungh."

I tensed my whole body, took a deep breath, and focused on my lower dantian, just as I'd done hundreds, if not thousands, of times before.

The next moment, the System alert I'd been hearing over and over for the past half day sounded in my ears again.

Beep.

SYSTEM

The energy of the Force-Sealing Pill is blocking your dantian!
You cannot use internal energy!

"Ah."

I'd lost track of how many attempts I'd made. I'd given up counting after fifty.

"...Damn it."

I let myself sag with a sigh and a curse. Then footsteps approached from somewhere in the distance.

Step. Step.

They echoed through the damp darkness. The pill kept me from using my internal energy, but my senses were as sharp as ever. I raised my head and peered beyond the bars.

Splash.

The footsteps stopped in front of my cell, sending filthy water from a puddle splashing against my knees. There wasn't a single light down here, but my eyesight —good enough to rival a Mongolian's—was more than enough to make out the visitor.

"What, are you a new jailer?"

"..."

"No manners, huh? You splash dirty water on me the moment you get here, then don't even answer."

Baeksang looked down at me in silence before replying quietly.

"You complain a great deal for a criminal."

"Well, this is pretty mild, really."

I tried to shrug, flinched under the weight of the iron balls, and went on.

“Someone else had his nose broken and took it pretty well. Didn’t he?”

I could see Baeksang’s brow furrow in the darkness. The bandage wrapped around his straight, prominent nose was visible as well.

“That must’ve hurt. You held up better than I expected. Be honest—you shed a tear after sending me down here, didn’t you?”

His reaction lasted only a moment. His voice was calm when he answered.

“It tickled. Perhaps because I sensed the fear in your punch.”

“What?”

“There was no internal energy behind it, and you didn’t put your full strength into it either. It was only a child venting his frustration.”

“…”

“I understand. You must have been afraid. If you had given it everything you had, neither you nor your subordinates would have remained unharmed.”

Shit. I lost that exchange badly.

He’d hit the mark. I shut my mouth before I could come up with a reply.

Baeksang watched me, his gaze as steady as ever.

“Why didn’t you leave? If you’d fled alone, you might at least have saved your life.”

I answered with an incredulous expression.

“You said you’d cast a net over heaven and earth, you bastard.”

“And I would have. But you still had a fair chance. At the very least, the Palace Lord wouldn’t have pursued you. He might even have hindered the pursuit.”

Baeksang wasn’t making a wild guess. From what I’d seen of the Beast Miao King, and what Jeok Cheongang had told me, he was exactly the sort of man who might throw me a lifeline when things were at their worst.

But I wasn’t foolish enough to nod along. It might already have been too late, but if I readily admitted that fact in front of Baeksang, his wariness toward the Beast Miao King would only grow stronger.

“I don’t know about that. We’re not even particularly close.”

“You’re thinking, at least. But you still have a long way to go.”

“Believe what you want. Be glad Old Master isn’t here. In two or three months, your head will be rolling around this place.”

“And you’re still a child who hasn’t outgrown his rashness.”

I let out a short laugh.

“Your mouth reeks of shit. Stop sucking Dark Heaven’s asshole. At least I’m here to protect my people.”

“…”

“No one else is around, so let’s be honest. You know too, don’t you? You know what you’re doing right now.”

This time, Baeksang fell silent.

Of course he did. By working with Dark Heaven, he was handing all of Nanman over to the Lord of Heaven.

“You betrayed a sworn brother you’ve known for decades. You deceived more than thirty tribal chieftains and countless people of Nanman. There’s no excuse that could justify any of it.”

At that moment, Baeksang, who had been watching me with a deep, unreadable gaze, suddenly spoke.

“Two days.”

“What?”

“Two days. At noon, two days from now, you’ll be executed in front of everyone.”

Chapter 661

Two days from now, at noon.

And then, execution.

The two short words that slipped between Baeksang's lips shot through my mind like bullets.

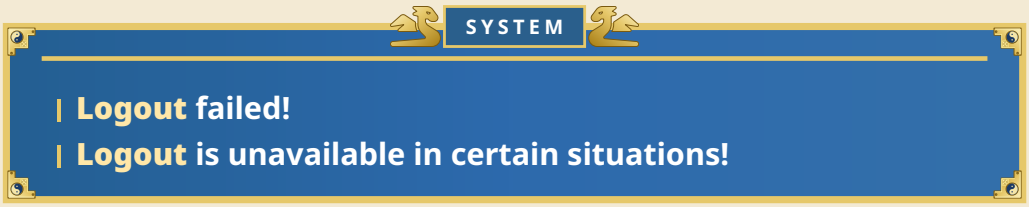
Execution in two days? Mine?

I swallowed the question rising in my throat. I couldn't let Baeksang see me shaken. Not here.

Instead of giving in to despair, I tried the escape route that had already shut me out several times.

Logout.

Beep!



Fuck. Still doesn't work.

I made myself speak calmly.

"Two days. Sooner than I expected."

"My late father always said that once you've made up your mind, you should draw your sword without hesitation."

"You're not drawing that sword alone, are you?"

"I was the first to grasp its hilt, but I won't be alone when it swings for your neck. Not even the Palace Lord can stop it."

He won't be swinging that sword alone…

I considered what he meant, then muttered almost to myself, "You must have been busy, reaching out to people all over the place in such a short time."

"Twenty tribal chieftains, including me, have already joined together," Baeksang said dryly. "And the matter on the agenda for the final day of the Tribal Grand Council will be…"

"Jin Taekyung of the Jin Family of Taiyuan. No—my execution, now that I'm a criminal whose sins outrage heaven and humanity."

"You understand quickly."

"I'd have to be a fucking idiot not to, with things already this far along. Anyway, is that why you threw me into the underground prison first?"

“Of course. It was the easiest way. Though I didn’t expect you to surrender so readily.”

Baeksang did not deny it. Like a hunter looking down at captured prey, he gazed at me, bound by iron balls weighing nearly ten thousand geun[2899], and continued in a low voice.

“To catch a tiger, you have to venture into the mountains and take the risk. But a tiger locked inside a cage is a different matter, wouldn’t you say?”

“I suppose so. Especially when there are twenty hunters instead of one.”

Baeksang had always had plenty of tribal chieftains behind him. But twenty?

That was more than half the thirty who remained after Heugung and Yohi disappeared. Some of the chieftains who had stood with the Beast Miao King had switched sides.

“What exactly did you promise them?”

“Revival for their tribes. Greater influence and enormous wealth.”

“Well. I figured it was something like that, but it’s damn simple.”

“But more than anything, it is effective.”

Maybe he was so candid because he knew we were alone. Whatever the reason, Baeksang was more honest today than I’d ever heard him. Worse, I couldn’t deny what he said.

The Nanman Beast Palace was an alliance of tribes. Each chieftain had sized up the situation and bet on the side most likely to win.

For the future of the tribe he ruled. For the wealth and glory he stood to gain.

And…

“The one who stands to gain the most is right in front of me. You’re going to take all of Nanman, aren’t you?”

Baeksang said nothing. I let out a hollow laugh.

“Interesting. It’s rotten right down to the roots.”

Baeksang had been watching me as though he could read my mind. Now he spoke without warning.

“Have you ever lived through a war?”

“What?”

“I asked if you have ever lived through a war.”

Why bring this up now?

I had no idea what he was after, but as the tiger in the cage, I didn’t have much choice except to listen.

“I lived through all of it. More than fifty years ago, I arrived in the Central Plains with the Palace Lord and ten thousand warriors. The first thing I saw was hell on earth.”

[2899] A Korean unit of weight. One geun is 600 g (1.32 lb); ten thousand geun is about 6,000 kg (13,200 lb).

He went on, slowly and evenly.

“Fields were trampled flat. Blue rivers filled with blood and corpses. Every day—every moment, it seemed—people died across the land. Children who had lost their parents to the war were so hungry they tore bark from trees and ate it without even noticing their teeth being pulled out.”

War was always horrific. Someone might win in the end, but the road to victory was strewn with screams and death. Neither side could avoid it.

“It was a hellscape unlike anything I—or even the Palace Lord—had ever seen before. But we had a reason to fight, so none of us retreated. If the Demonic Cult took control of the Central Plains, Nanman would be next. We were there to protect the homeland where my family and friends lived.”

Baeksang’s voice echoed through the dark underground prison.

“More lives were lost than I could count. Some died fighting the enemy. Others sat staring at the sky after a battle and took their own lives. Sometimes we had to strike a lethal acupoint for a comrade writhing in pain.”

“…”

“Battle after battle, some died and the rest grew weary. But as the war turned in our favor, the hope we carried grew stronger. Soon we could go home. See the women we loved, our aging parents, or the children who must have grown so much while we were away.”

I hadn’t lived through it, but I could feel it. I hadn’t seen it, but I could picture it.

Ten thousand warriors making their way through jungles, across the Yangtze, over plains and mountains, until they finally reached the distant Central Plains. Then fighting the Demonic Cult’s Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples as they surged in from every direction, day after day.

“When I stopped to count, fewer than one-tenth of the ten thousand warriors were still alive. Even the tide of battle, which had been slowly turning in our favor, eventually fell into a stalemate. The Palace Lord and I began to wonder why we had to remain there.”

Time was a law no one could oppose. Before that absolute law, which could move mountains and dry up rivers, even a master who had reached the Supreme Peak realm could do nothing.

It must have worn them down. Slowly, until they couldn’t bear any more.

As I thought it, Baeksang continued.

“Then, more than a decade into the war, the Martial God defeated the Heavenly Demon.”

The result of that life-and-death duel that shook heaven and earth was the Martial God’s victory. Once the Demonic Cult—which had devoured half the world—lost its central figure, the Heavenly Demon, it collapsed like a sandcastle.

“The remnants of the Demonic Cult retreated west. The Murim Alliance intended to pursue them to the end and wipe them out. With the Martial God—whom no one could stop now—at the fore, the Three Saints, the Ten Kings, and countless orthodox martial artists of the Murim Alliance advanced from every direction. We went with them.”

The balance had already been shifting toward the orthodox factions. With the Heavenly Demon dead, there was hardly a contest left. All they had to do was pursue the Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples, now a defeated army, and root them out of the Central Plains.

“The war was as good as over. No. It should have been.”

Baeksang fell silent and stared into empty space.

Water seeped through a hairline crack in the ceiling and struck the cold floor.

Drip. Drip-drip.

I waited, but he said nothing. At last, I spoke.

“Baekhwi. Wasn’t that his name?”

“…!”

Baeksang went rigid, his eyes trembling. I’d never seen him so shaken. I gave a small nod.

“So it was. I thought I might have remembered the name wrong.”

Crunch.

Something cracked between his clenched teeth. He looked at me, his eyes cold.

“Who told you that name?”

It had been Yayul Mok, but Baeksang didn’t need to know that.

I answered calmly.

“Does that really matter? What matters is that there’s still someone who remembers the name Baekhwi.”

“Someone like you has no right to speak that name.”

Whoosh!

Blade-sharp killing intent surged from Baeksang and shot through the gaps in the iron bars.

But why?

Strangely, I wasn’t afraid.

Maybe I felt a little compassion for a father who had lost his young child long ago. Whatever else Baeksang was, that was how I felt toward him now.

Baekhwi.

Baek, white. Hwi, shining.

A person’s name. Baeksang’s only child, whom he had cherished so dearly. Someone who would have become the Beast Miao King’s son-in-law if he had lived.

If he had lived.

I muttered the words inwardly, then ignored the killing intent pouring from Baeksang and asked,

“Did he lose his life while pursuing the Demonic Cult? Or…”

Boom! Rumble!

The rest of my question vanished beneath a roar. A tremendous shock wave shook the prison.

Baeksang had pulverized a section of wall with a single punch. He stared at me with eyes like frost.

“Do you want to die here and now?”

Considering my current situation, it was a fairly threatening statement. If Hyuk Mujin had been in my place, he probably would have pissed himself and begun practicing silent meditation.

But there were exceptions. Cheongpung might be a little excited because dying would be a first for him.

And then there was me, whose liver had probably enlarged from being knocked around everywhere.

“That wouldn’t be so bad. Though you can’t kill me right now anyway.”

“What?”

“There must be a reason you put off my execution for two days. Of course, that wasn’t a decision you made alone, either. Was it an order from the Southern Heaven Demon Empress? I heard you exchange missives on the first day of every month.”

“…!”

“So stop posturing and tell me the story. Being locked alone in an underground prison gets lonely and boring. The Sichuan Tang Clan at least had other prisoners, so it wasn’t so bad.”

“You bastard!”

His shout rang through the prison. Trembling with rage, Baeksang reached out and seized the iron bars.

Creeeak!

Steel as thick as an adult’s forearm bent like taffy. Baeksang stepped through the gap, his eyes cold enough to sting.

“Hwi. Is that child’s death so amusing to you? Are you that curious?”

His aura was so vicious that it seemed he might draw his sword and cut me down at any moment.

But I did not care.

He feared the Southern Heaven Demon Empress too much to kill me here, and there was something I needed to know.

“I don’t find it amusing. But I am curious about one thing.”

“You truly—”

“Tell me.”

I cut him off in a flat voice, then continued slowly.

“Not how your only child died. I want to know what kind of lunatics turned you into one.”

“…!”

“Tell me that.”

A heavy silence followed. Every second felt like fifteen minutes before Baeksang finally opened his mouth.

“Gansu. Great Snow Mountain.”

Haa…

His breath trembled. White vapor spilled into the freezing air of the underground prison, like the heavy snow that must have fallen that day.

“Back then, we were leading the Southern Army alongside the Zhongnan Sect.”

I swallowed the words that tried to burst out of me.

Oh, fuck. The Zhongnan Sect.

Chapter 662

Was it about ten years ago? Back when I was devouring martial-arts novels, I sometimes found myself wondering.

No, more than sometimes.

What would I do if I were the protagonist of this novel?

It's a little embarrassing to think about now, but I couldn't help it. Anyone who's read enough web novels comes with that feature built in.

I'd wonder whenever some idiot protagonist had a System window but never raised his Intelligence. Or whenever a female character appeared and he made an ass of himself.

If it were me…

That was how the fantasies always began.

But once I became a martial artist in the Murim, I learned that fantasy was fantasy and reality was reality.

All those masterpieces of martial fiction I'd read were nothing more than brilliantly arranged words on a page. The protagonists I'd thought were so cool didn't exist in this world.

Old Master.

What.

There's something I've been wondering about the Heavenly Demon. His surname wouldn't happen to be Muk, would it?

…What the hell are you talking about all of a sudden? Not long ago, you were spouting off about things like the Wudang Demon Sword and the Huashan Gale Sword—titles I've never heard of in my life.

At first, I was sorry I'd never get to meet the protagonists from those novels, but I wasn't disappointed. The martial artists of this world were pretty damn cool in their own right.

If anything had thoroughly shattered my fantasies, though, it was…

"We were leading the Southern Army alongside the Zhongnan Sect at the time."

Right. Those three words that had just come out of Baeksang's mouth.

The Zhongnan Sect.

A towering pillar of the orthodox Murim. One of the Nine Sects and One Gang. A prestigious sect that had endured for hundreds of years and shared Shaanxi Province with its eternal rival, Huashan.

No—I should probably say they used to share it.

The Sword Saint, Mae Jonghak, who had remained hidden from the world for so many years, was now the Alliance Leader. The Disciple he had taken in during his later years had gained tremendous fame, and as a result, the influence of their sect, Huashan, had grown to an extent that could not be compared to the past.

And the Zhongnan Sect?

Two of its three Supreme Peak masters are laid up and wheezing.

Jeok Cheongang had crushed the Roaring Fury Swordsman, and I'd crushed the Taeeul Merciless Sword.

At least Hyuk Sopyung, the young prodigy around my age known as the Zhongnan One Dragon, was a fairly decent guy. But so far, my impression of the Zhongnan Sect had been anything but good.

No. At least among the orthodox factions, it was the worst.

With higher-ups like that, they can forget about The Reign.

At this point, calling it the Fucknam Sect—or the Zhong-fucking-na Sect—would hardly be an exaggeration.

Well, the current Sect Leader, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord, might be different. But from everything I'd seen and heard in the Murim, my opinion of the Zhongnan Sect didn't seem far from everyone else's.

And now the Zhongnan Sect comes up in this story…

I could feel it. I could feel something coming.

Just as I unconsciously furrowed my brow, Baeksang continued speaking.

"The Sect Leader of the Zhongnan Sect at the time, Venerable Wusang, was righteous and wise. He stayed calm no matter what happened and treated everyone fairly, regardless of their background. That was why the Palace Lord and I agreed that he should command the Southern Army."

"Venerable Wusang…"

"Yes. He was the master of the Zhongnan Sect's current Sect Leader, the Wind-and-Cloud Sword Lord."

I'd heard Jeok Cheongang mention the title a few times.

Granted, Jeok Cheongang usually called the Zhongnan Sect "a bunch of ill-mannered sons of bitches." But even he'd described Venerable Wusang as "soft, but a fine man."

"The trouble began soon after we entered Gansu. Defeated soldiers from the surrounding areas, who had been retreating in disarray, gathered at Great Snow Mountain. There were no fewer than two thousand of them."

"…How the hell did two thousand defeated soldiers turn up in the surrounding area?"

"Do you think they were called the Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples for nothing? They had lost the Heavenly Demon, but their numbers were still nothing to dismiss."

"So what happened? Was there a battle at Great Snow Mountain?"

Baeksang slowly nodded.

“It was a battle we had every reason to win. At the time, the Western Army we belonged to had Venerable Wusang, a Supreme Peak master, as well as the Palace Lord, who had only just begun to be called the Beast Miao King. We were not inferior in either the number or the quality of our troops. If anything, we had a considerable advantage.”

“Sounds like the Western Army was pretty large.”

“Over four thousand in all. The enemy had no Supreme Peak master of note, so we had no reason to avoid the fight.”

“Hmm.”

Two Supreme Peak masters the enemy didn’t have. More than twice as many troops. And they were facing a defeated force already worn down by exhaustion and despair.

Anyone could see how that fight ought to end.

But if it had been that easy, Baeksang wouldn’t have lost his only son.

“There was a trap?”

Baeksang answered my sudden question in a voice as dry as sand.

“Yes. We split into three groups and advanced into Great Snow Mountain. What awaited us wasn’t a band of defeated soldiers, but an elite strike force of the Demonic Cult.”

“…!”

“It was chaos from beginning to end. Arrows poured down like rain from above the gorge, while rocks weighing hundreds or thousands of geun[2900] crushed people and blocked the narrow paths.”

“…”

“By the time we knew it was a trap, it was too late. We fought desperately. Then I looked up and realized someone who should always have been at my side was gone.”

He didn’t say the name, but I knew he wasn’t talking about the Beast Miao King.

Baekhwi.

Baeksang’s only child. The heir who would inherit everything he had.

To set an example as a great chieftain, he had taken his young child with him to the battlefield. But he had probably cherished his son more than his own life.

And then, on a battlefield painted with corpses and blood, the fine young man he had raised had vanished without a trace during the final battle.

“For the first time, I was afraid. Hwi… That child was everything to me. No, more than that.”

Baeksang’s voice was hollow.

[2900] A Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb).

“But I had to regain my composure, if only for the warriors under my command. First, I requested support from the Zhongnan Sect and the other orthodox martial artists who had entered the area not far away. Then I helped the Palace Lord fight the enemy.”

The ambush had caught them by surprise. The fighting had been fierce, but the Beast Miao King, Baeksang, and the Nanman warriors had refused to retreat.

They fought harder than ever and finally won, though it cost them countless lives.

“Only after the battle in the gorge ended did I learn where he had gone. He and dozens of warriors had pursued some of the enemy down a side path. I was relieved.”

“Why?” I asked.

“The path connected to territory that definitely belonged to our allies. I believed that the people who had received my request for support would have saved Hwi—that child.”

“…”

I closed my mouth.

It wasn’t anger or grief that broke a person. It was trust.

And when that trust was betrayed, despair followed. I could see it in Baeksang now.

“What do you think happened?”

I didn’t answer. He probably hadn’t expected me to. After a moment, he went on.

“He… didn’t even leave a body behind. The corpses of the warriors who went with him lay scattered everywhere, hacked apart by an enemy we couldn’t identify. Only later did I learn it was the Great Snow Fiend, the fiend who ruled Great Snow Mountain.”

“…!”

“Reinforcements? There were no such things. They said the messenger who had set out to request support had been killed by the enemy while on his way to the other allied forces. I was overwhelmed by grief and despair, unable to do anything. And it was only later that I learned the truth.”

At that moment, Baeksang’s entire body trembled.

And I saw an emotion rise in eyes that had always been cold and still.

“The messenger wasn’t killed by the enemy. He was killed by our allies.”

Anger. Hatred.

“They weren’t unable to help us. They chose not to.”

It was the quiet, desperate scream of a man whose trust had been betrayed.

“If they had come, he could have lived. But they did not come. They killed the messenger, ignored my desperate request, and chose to pursue the retreating enemy instead. Do you know why?”

What pools up will eventually overflow. Baeksang had spent decades letting it out, yet the hatred and betrayal kept filling him until they spilled over again.

As they did now.

“Because we were nothing but savages from the Outer Lands!”

“…!”

“Because we weren’t Han Chinese like them, could never become Han Chinese, and they couldn’t sacrifice themselves for savages like us!”

Boom! Crash!

A powerful, violent wave of energy whipped through the air.

The floor and walls, made from solid rock, crumbled. Streams of tangible internal energy poured from his fist and grazed my face.

Ssst!

A sharp pain stung my forehead. I felt hot blood run down it.

But I didn’t move. I only watched, waiting until Baeksang’s eyes, flashing with killing intent, turned toward me.

“The Central Plains—the Han Chinese—betrayed us. We reached out to them when they were most desperate, and after we’d fought for them at the risk of our lives for ten years, they betrayed us!”

Decades of hatred were aimed squarely at me.

Only then did I open my mouth.

“Why didn’t you tell Venerable Wusang? He would’ve brought everything to light.”

“Venerable Wusang?”

Baeksang laughed. It was the first time I’d heard him laugh, and the sound was so empty it hardly counted.

“Yes. He would have. If he’d been alive.”

“You mean…”

“His Internal Injury had flared up before the battle. He fought anyway, and the Great Snow Fiend killed him. Enraged by his death, the Zhongnan Sect killed the messenger we sent, ignored our request for help, and pursued the enemy. The dozens of other sects, large and small, assigned to the Western Army did the same.”

“What?”

“You find it hard to believe? So did I. Only one person—the Palace Lord—tried to uncover the truth of it all. But when the Great Faction War ended, every pretense and every ugly stain was buried with it.”

“…!”

“Then, while everyone but us basked in victory and peace, the messenger’s body disappeared from where it had been kept. The last piece of evidence, bearing traces of the Zhongnan Sect’s martial arts, was gone.”

These fucking lunatics.

I swallowed a groan.

I could barely breathe. If Baeksang was telling the truth, no one—not even me—could condemn his anger.

He'd fought with his life on the line, and betrayal was all he got in return.

The most fucked-up part of all this was the instinctive certainty that this long-ago incident, which had left behind not even a shred of evidence, had probably really happened.

Damn it.

When I first came to the Murim, I'd been counted among the Han Chinese. I knew how people from the Central Plains looked at the people of Nanman.

I knew how shallow human feelings could be, and how easily greed took hold.

Baeksang had kept fighting for victory even after his son disappeared. The allies he trusted hadn't done the same.

Enraged by Venerable Wusang's death, the Zhongnan Sect had ignored the Nanman Beast Palace's plea and chased the enemy. The other sects of the Western Army had been blinded by fear of losing their own men and greed for credit.

And the result of everything they'd done was standing right in front of me.

"You said earlier that this land—Nanman—was rotten."

Drip. Trickle.

In the aftermath of what had just happened, foul-smelling water poured from the cracked ceiling.

Beyond the falling water, Baeksang's eyes gleamed coldly.

"That day, you people showed me what I had to do."

Chapter 663

"That day, you people showed me which path I should take."

With those words spat out in a bitter voice, his story—neither short nor long—came to an end. I silently stared into Baeksang's coldly gleaming eyes.

What did I want to say to him?

I wasn't sure.

The man standing before me in dazzling white robes had lived through a darkness I couldn't begin to imagine. He had fought for a righteous cause, only to be betrayed. He had lost the child he cherished more than his own life.

There could only be one reason he had kept living.

Revenge.

Baeksang wasn't wrong. After he lost his only child, the betrayal of the Central Plains people had lit a torch in the darkness where he wandered. By its light, he'd found the only path he could see.

The path of revenge.

He had followed that thorny road of pain and fury all the way here. Looking at him, I suddenly remembered someone else.

"…The Head Elder."

Confusion flickered in Baeksang's eyes at my involuntary mutter. I clicked my tongue bitterly.

"It's nothing. You just reminded me of someone I used to know."

"How so?"

"He was a fucking idiot, too. Just like you. A puppet controlled by Dark Heaven."

"What?"

"But I could understand him. He had his reasons."

"…He was betrayed."

"Yeah. By his own flesh and blood."

Baeksang looked down at me in silence. Then he asked, "What happened to him?"

"I killed him. With my own hands."

"…!"

"He was an elder of my family, but I had no choice. Things had already gone too far."

"Do you wish to condemn me?"

I let out a short laugh.

Condemn him? What would that change now?

"Condemning someone with words alone doesn't do a damn thing. It wouldn't stop you. That was the main reason I had to kill the Head Elder."

That was how an avenger met his end.

They stepped onto a path they had never wanted to take, then lost their way forever. They were like moths rushing toward a single torch—the torch of revenge.

“After I killed him, I wondered something. If the Jin Family of Taiyuan and I had lost that battle… would getting his revenge have finally made him happy?”

“That…”

“Probably not. He lived only for revenge, but at some point, his anger must have dulled, and watching innocent people be sacrificed must have left him feeling guilty.”

I didn’t wait for Baeksang to answer.

“Just like you do now.”

“…!”

I calmly looked into Baeksang’s twisted face.

“I definitely don’t understand you. I’ve never gone through what you did, and I’ve never burned with revenge for decades. But at the same time, I admit it. At least as far as I’m concerned, your anger toward the Central Plains people and the Han Chinese is justified.”

“Justified?” Baeksang repeated, his face rigid.

He clearly hadn’t expected that answer, but I meant every word. I meant what I said next, too.

“Yeah. I would’ve done the same thing if I were you. No—if I had been in your place, perhaps the entire Central Plains would already have been my enemy.”

I remembered the day I’d gone to the Ares Guild.

I had been alone then, but there hadn’t been the slightest hesitation in my steps.

It wasn’t because I had possessed enough strength to make that choice. It was because I had been genuinely furious over Kim Hwajong’s death.

And I had brought down the Ares Guild.

If I’d been Baeksang instead of Jin Taekyung, I would have fought to bring down the Central Plains.

But…

“Is that anger of yours justified toward the people of Nanman, too?”

“…!”

“Some of them might understand you. But what did the people killed because you joined forces with Dark Heaven do wrong? What about their families? Their lovers and friends?”

Baeksang jerked. I kept my voice steady.

“When I first set foot in Nanman, I heard some news. A Miao village had been massacred by a group of Han Chinese. Those Han Chinese had slaughtered a hundred people, men, women, and children alike, but in the end, both sides had been destroyed by poison."

Being locked alone in an underground prison gave me plenty of time to think. I'd gone over everything that had happened since I arrived, and I was certain of one thing.

"No matter how I look at it, it's strange. Even if there was a fight, how did not one person survive?"

It had been planned from the beginning. Wipe out a Miao village, and hostility toward the Han Chinese would boil over across all of Nanman.

"And that's not all. There were the Thousand-Year Spiders suddenly leaving the Poisonblood Grounds, and what happened at the Western Yao Estate. Add the Miao village, and the dead number well over three hundred."

All that had happened in just seven days and nights since I came to the Nanman Beast Palace. Compared with the decades Baeksang had spent consumed by revenge, it was barely any time at all.

What frightened me more was what lay ahead. If Baeksang was to have his revenge in full, war with the Central Plains wasn't merely possible. It was inevitable.

"Just how…"

I looked at him, torn between pity and anger.

How much more blood are you going to spill, Baeksang?

Splash. Splash.

With each step, foul water long pooled on the prison floor splashed in every direction. The man walking through it paid no attention to his snow-white robes getting dirty.

No—his mind was so full that he hadn't noticed.

Splash…

His already-soaked leather shoes came to an abrupt stop.

While crossing the underground prison alone, the middle-aged man, Baeksang, suddenly looked back over his shoulder.

Dark. Cold. Silent.

Like the path he had walked. Like the path the man imprisoned behind him would have to walk.

But Jin Taekyung would never walk as far as he had. Only two days remained until his public execution. Baeksang's path had stretched across decades; Jin Taekyung's was short, with its end in plain sight.

It's as good as over. He won't escape.

Baeksang already knew roughly how skilled Jin Taekyung was. A Supreme Peak master who stood out even in the Central Plains, where countless prestigious sects had taken root.

Baeksang hadn't used his full strength when they briefly exchanged moves a few days ago. Still, he had known instinctively.

Half a move above me. No… perhaps a full move.

Jin Taekyung was a monster beyond anything Baeksang had imagined. But with his internal energy sealed and iron balls of enormous weight restraining him, he couldn't survive even if his master, the Fire King, came for him.

Besides, something bound him more tightly than the iron balls.

The Han Chinese under his command.

Jin Taekyung cared about his people. That was why he had surrendered and allowed himself to be imprisoned instead of escaping.

What a fool.

In Baeksang's eyes, compassion was the monstrous young man's greatest weakness. Nothing made a martial artist less like a martial artist.

And yet nothing made a person more human.

On the day blood stained the snow of Great Snow Mountain, that was what Baeksang had so desperately wanted from his allies.

Come to think of it, Hwi was about his age then.

Baeksang stared blankly into the empty air. In the darkness where nothing existed, a face briefly passed through his mind.

An infant becoming a boy. A boy becoming a young man.

His only child, more upright than anyone, who had shone as brightly as his name, Hwi.[2901]

The smiling face of the child he would never see again.

Crunch.

Without realizing it, Baeksang clenched his fist tightly. His neatly trimmed nails dug into his flesh, and blood began to flow.

Drip. Drip-drip.

He looked down. Red drops spread through the stagnant water around his feet. Each small ripple traced the outline of a face.

How much more blood are you going to spill, Baeksang?

Jin Taekyung's last words kept ringing in his ears. But Baeksang's answer was the same now as it had been then.

I crossed that river long ago. I can never go back.

He had crossed that river a long time ago.

[2901] Hwi (□) means "shining."

Half-mad with despair and rage, Baeksang had met a beautiful woman whose identity he did not know. She had offered him something more alluring than her looks.

No. Something he could not refuse.

Choose. Do so, and it will surely come to pass.

He hadn't hesitated. With a purpose to live for, he had gladly taken her outstretched hand. He had never once regretted that decision.

No. He must not regret it.

But why…?

With the fruit of all those decades almost within his grasp, why was he wavering now?

Baeksang swallowed the sound rising in his throat and gritted his teeth. He looked at his filthy leather shoes and the hems of robes that could no longer be called white.

In two days. Everything ends. Everything.

At his feet, drops of blood spread through the pooled water. Dirty long before his blood touched it, the water slowly turned red.

Like the path he had walked. Like the path still ahead of him.

Splash.

Baeksang stamped through the puddle and started walking again, Jin Taekyung's voice still echoing in his ears through the silence.

Baeksang left, and I was alone again.

The chains pulled taut around me, and the iron balls weighing ten thousand geun[2902] held me fast. My whole body was growing stiff.

Damn.

Now that he was gone, I kind of wished he'd stayed. Maybe I should have begged him to spare me.

Still, I didn't regret it. I'd said everything I needed to say, and groveling for my life wouldn't have gotten me anywhere. Baeksang had lived for revenge alone. He wasn't going to tear up like an auntie watching a human-interest documentary just because I begged him.

That didn't mean I planned to let them drag me out in two days and quietly put me to death.

Are you crazy? I have to survive somehow.

[2902] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun is 6,000 kg (about 13,200 lb).

I'd meant it when I said his anger was justified. That didn't mean I deserved to die at his hands. As far as I was concerned, the Head Elder and Baeksang were both idiots with tragic stories.

And I intended to stop this new idiot I had met after traveling all the way to a foreign land, no matter what it took.

But how do I get out?

All that talking and thinking had left my throat dry. I was swallowing what little spit I had when something cold touched the top of my head.

Tap.

"Huh?"

It was water. It might have been stale and tasteless, but the important thing was that it was water. The ceiling had probably opened up farther when Baeksang smashed the surrounding walls.

Well, that helps.

I muttered inwardly and tilted my head back toward the ceiling.

The next moment, through the crack in the ceiling, I found myself looking into a pair of eyes I hadn't expected to see.

Huge, clear eyes like a calf's.

"…Why are you up there?"

Their owner answered.

"Taishan. Hungry. Got locked in underground prison because they said Taishan eats too much."

"Ah."

Fair enough.

Chapter 664

Unlike modern prisons, where human rights have been mixed in just enough to make them palatable, underground prisons in the Murim served their purpose exceptionally well.

The concept of human rights didn't exist here in the first place.

The underground prison of the Sichuan Tang Clan, for example, had been closer to a torture chamber than a place meant to hold prisoners.

Even the old guard who had died during Dark Heaven's attack had been a torture expert with decades of experience. He would often reminisce about his prime with a pleased smile.

"Those days right after the Great Faction War were wonderful. We had three or four head of notorious fiends brought in every day."

"…Head? Not people?"

"Yes. When we lined up fifteen or so of the beasts and got to work, the response was incredible. They were so happy they nearly passed out."

He even counted people the way you counted animals.

I had never bothered to ask for details, but it was hard to imagine prisoners screaming with delight because he'd given them pretty irezumi tattoos with the small knife he kept tucked so carefully into his belt.

Like hell they were tattoos.

It was obvious.

Bones and flesh splitting apart, blood spraying everywhere—something like that.

I'd gone a little off track. Anyway, most underground prisons in the Murim were more or less the same.

Cold, damp, and nine times out of ten, buried deep underground.

Just like the underground prison of the Nanman Beast Palace where I was locked up. And…

"Pavilion Master. Taishan hungry. Got locked in underground prison because Taishan eats too much."

"Ah."

The difference between me and that accursed bastard was only one floor.

The third and fourth underground floors, for example.

So this is how it turned out.

In a way, it was a coincidence born of an aging, poorly built prison taking a considerable blow.

I stared blankly at the ceiling, then gave a quiet laugh at Taishan, who was blinking his enormous eyes through the small hole above me.

"Pavilion Master, why laugh?"

“Because I’m happy to see you.”

“Happy? Pavilion Master happy to see Taishan?”

“Yeah, you bastard. I’m so happy I could die.”

“Oh. Then Taishan happy to see Pavilion Master too.”

It was a conversation that made no sense out of context, but every time I saw his eyes peering through the gap, I couldn’t help laughing.

Seeing a familiar face was one thing. If things went well, I might be able to get out of here sooner than expected.

Besides, Taishan was the only person who could answer the question worrying me most.

“What about everyone else? They’re all doing okay, right?”

At my question, his enormous calf-like eyes filled with tears.

“Are you… crying?”

“Sniff. Pavilion Master.”

No way.

Dread hit me. I hurried to ask, “Stop sniveling and tell me what happened.”

“Taishan… sniff. Couldn’t help it. It’s so unfair.”

“…!”

Damn it. My vision went dark. I could already picture the members of the Fire Dragon Pavilion lying there as cold corpses.

Or were they tortured? But how could they do that?

It had only been half a day since I’d surrendered on the condition that the Fire Dragon Pavilion members would be kept safe.

The Beast Miao King himself had promised me. No matter how powerful Baeksang’s faction had become, they couldn’t do this.

If they were harmed, then what the hell did I surrender for…?

Just as the thought ran hollowly through my head, Taishan spoke through his tears.

“I still can’t believe it. By now, everyone must be eating without Taishan.”

“…?”

“Taishan hates Lord. Hates Namho too. It’s so unfair.”

“…!”

“Pavilion Master. Speaking of which, do you have anything to eat?”

What the hell was going on?

I fell silent for a moment, then answered from the bottom of my heart.

“No, you fucking bastard.”

“Aw. Taishan hungry.”

“…Come down. Come down right now.”

That son of a bitch. He really wanted to die.

My blood pressure shot up, and rage took over my entire body. I thrashed harder than I had at any point since being locked in the underground prison.

Clatter! Clank!

If not for these goddamn heavy iron balls, I would have started by punching that bastard in the mouth.

Taishan watched me panting with interest before speaking.

“Namho and Lord are doing well. They’re being held in different places, so Taishan doesn’t know much, but White Tiger’s master told Taishan.”

“White Tiger’s master? Yayul Mok?”

“Oh. Taishan remembers. Right. Yayul Mok.”

It seemed the Beast Miao King had stepped in after all. I stopped thrashing and let out a sigh of relief.

“You should’ve said that first, you lunatic. You nearly gave me a heart attack.”

“Taishan hasn’t eaten for two whole shichen.[2903] Taishan’s mind is hazy.”

“…People don’t usually call it hunger after two shichen.[2904] More importantly, how did you end up locked in here? Great Hero Yayul would’ve stopped it before it got this far. There’s no way you were locked up just for eating too much.”

“Taishan was treated unfairly. A Nanman man was going to leave after giving Taishan a mouse-dropping-sized portion of food. Taishan grabbed his wrist to ask for more, and the bone broke.”

“…”

“Taishan was surprised and grabbed his other wrist. That one broke too. It was obviously a trap.”

Clatter! Clank! Clank!

“Pavilion Master, calm down. Taishan was angry too, but Taishan held it in and surrendered, just like Pavilion Master.”

“…Come down. This time, really come down.”

I was already trying to keep a low profile, and this bastard had broken both arms of the man who came to feed him?

At this rate, I was going to die of rage before noon two days from now.

I walked into the tiger’s den to save a bastard like that?

I barely managed to calm my anger before asking, “Then what about the others? Not Namho or Sama Pyo. Everyone else?”

“Hmm. Ah.”

Taishan rolled his enormous eyes around as he thought, then answered.

“I heard they were captured.”

[2903] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours; two shichen are about four hours.

[2904] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours; two shichen are about four hours.

"Captured?"

"Yeah. But they said they weren't coming here. Taishan doesn't know why, but White Tiger's master said it was safer that way."

Ju Hwaran, Song Ilseom, and Hyuk Mujin.

For a moment, my heart sank at the news that all three had been captured. But I agreed with Yayul Mok that it was much safer that way.

Baeksang's influence can't reach that far right now.

The two tribal chieftains leading the squad were loyal to the Beast Miao King. Some of the Nanman people I'd rescued from the Poisonblood Grounds were their kinsmen, too. Unlike the other chieftains who had gone over to Baeksang, they wouldn't switch sides easily.

The three of them are more likely to be in danger than they are now if the reconnaissance squad runs into the Blood Monk.

The Blood Monk was an unidentified old monster who had stained Guizhou with blood single-handedly, wielding Supreme Peak martial prowess.

Almost nothing was known about him. But if he really was a subordinate of the Southern Heaven Demon Empress, as I suspected, things could take the worst possible turn.

He would certainly head south on the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's orders. And if he encountered the reconnaissance squad, the three people among them would fall into his hands as well.

"...Damn it."

But for now, I had no time to worry about that.

They were on the move even now, while I was trapped deep underground, unable to move an inch.

All I can do is hope I'm wrong about the Blood Monk.

So there were only two things I could do.

The first was prayer.

The second was...

Escape.

Ding.

SYSTEM

A new Quest has been generated!
Would you like to check the linked Quest, Escape from Namshank?[2905]
Y / N

[2905] "Namshank" plays on The Shawshank Redemption and Nanman.

I nodded and thought, I don't know who developed the System, but that's one shitty Quest title.

"So, Pavilion Master. Do you have anything to eat?"

...Correction. That bastard was the shittiest of all.

Among the countless martial artists on the continent, river pirates were an especially rough and free-spirited bunch.

They didn't want laws restricting them or the authorities arresting them. They didn't want to live decent lives, either.

Sudal, the Deputy Stronghold Lord of the Water Dragon Stronghold, had become a river pirate for exactly those reasons.

Unlike his father, who had lived and died a good fisherman, Sudal had boldly resolved to live and die as an adventurer.

He'd done fairly well as a river pirate. Only recently had he begun to wonder what he was doing with his life.

What the hell am I doing?

Nothing. Every day, he sat at the bow and stared at the calm river. When the sun got too hot, he went swimming. That was all.

His immediate superior, who ruled the Yangtze in Sichuan, had been summoned to League headquarters by the revered Alliance Leader. Meanwhile, Sudal and his men had come down the tributaries to backwater Yunnan and were wasting their days.

By now, merchant ships loaded with all kinds of valuable goods must be traveling through Sichuan.

The Yangtze was a gold mine right now. With war approaching, all sorts of supplies were moving along it.

Sudal knew that and desperately wanted to return immediately. But every time he did, one man's presence kept flashing before his eyes.

"I'll come running whenever you call!"

That was the boast he'd made seven days and nights ago. Naturally, he hadn't meant a word of it.

But the much younger man had smiled warmly and answered,

"Oh, good. Then stay nearby."

"Excuse me?"

"Heh heh. Did someone stick a marlin in your ear? I said stay nearby. I'll need another favor when we head back."

"Great Hero Jin, forgive me, but we have a living to make..."

"A living. That's nice. But you have to be alive to make one, don't you?"

"…!"

"Come on, I'm asking a favor! Just a favor!"

"Gasp."

"For fuck's sake. I might just snap every mast and burn the whole lot down. Want to swim to Sichuan?"

He called it a favor, but it was a threat.

What could Sudal do? In the Murim, whoever had the stronger martial arts was king.

Worse, that monstrous young man's Master was a crazy old monster who really was called a king.

Jin Taekyung, you bastard…

Swallowing his tears, Sudal had nodded. For more than seven days and nights, he and his men had stayed on a tributary at the edge of Yunnan where they couldn't even spot a small boat, doing nothing but catching fish.

Until an idea occurred to him yesterday.

Wait. Why am I doing this? It'll be a while before that Jin Taekyung bastard comes back.

Sudal had only ever operated on the Yangtze, but even he knew what a godforsaken dump Nanman was.

He didn't know exactly what Jin Taekyung's mission was. Still, if it had brought him all the way here, it couldn't be simple.

But did he really need to worry about someone who wasn't even here and whine like a dog that needed to shit?

He gave his adventurous life some serious thought, then ordered his men,

"Hey, boys. Let's go get some fresh air."

"Excuse me?"

"Where?"

"Guizhou's right next door. Let's make a sweep through it, raid the place, and come back."

His ambitious plan didn't go over well.

"Deputy Stronghold Lord, have you lost your mind?"

"Fuck. If you want to die, die alone. Why should the rest of us get cremated when you're not even the Stronghold Lord?"

But Sudal had a plan for that, too.

"Dunk that bastard. The Yangtze… the Yangtze…"

"The Yangtze dip?"

"Yeah. That thing Jin Taekyung does all the time."

After sending two of them into the water one after another, the complaints disappeared. Under Sudal's spirited command, three swift ships traveled along the western tributary toward Guizhou.

At last, after all this time, they found a target.

Just like now.

"There's a ship roughly two hundred zhang[2906] ahead!"

"Seize it! Don't let it get away!"

How long had it been since their last raid? Sudal stood tall at the stern like a Great General, smiling with satisfaction as the ship drew rapidly closer.

Then, before fifteen minutes had passed, he realized something was wrong.

Whoosh!

The ship was almost upon them now. There was no crew and no captain.

Only one person waited for them.

"A swift ship of the Yangtze River Channel League. What fortunate timing."

"…!"

The bald, middle-aged man holding a blood-soaked Zen staff smiled broadly at the frozen Sudal.

"Does this ship go to Nanman too?"

[2906] A zhang is a traditional Chinese length of about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Two hundred zhang are about 606 m (1,990 ft).

Chapter 665

Tap. Drip-drip.

Water dripped through the silence. I shifted away from the liquid falling through a crack in the underground prison's ceiling and looked into the air before me.

SYSTEM

Quest
Escape from Namshank[2907]
You have ended up imprisoned in the underground prison of the Nanman Beast Palace after all. Dark, damp, and silent, this place resembles the future that awaits you. But it is still too soon to give up on life.
Time remaining until execution: Two days
You must escape the underground prison within the allotted time.
Whether you survive alone or together is entirely up to you. If you fail, only death awaits.
But remember: with a strong Will and even a single thread of goodwill, a path to life will open.
Grade: Supreme Peak
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Mission: Escape the underground prison before the execution (Incomplete)
Reward: Linked Quest
???
Failure: Death

I had already checked the Quest window countless times.

I stared at the translucent holographic window as if I could bore a hole through it, but no miracle occurred that changed the words written on the final line.

Failure: Death.

It wasn't the first time.

From the moment I first set foot in the Murim until now, I had received this kind of goddamn Quest several times. Of course, in the beginning, I had been utterly dumbfounded.

Back then, I really thought I was going to die a dog's death.

I'd fought countless battles as a Hunter, but death had always frightened me. Or rather, what frightened me was everything I'd have to leave behind.

[2907] "Namshank" is a play on the title of The Shawshank Redemption.

At least if I died in a Gate, my family would get a death benefit. If I died in Murim, they'd get nothing.

Still, there was no comparing who I'd been then to who I was now. Every crisis had given my guts a forced Botox injection. They'd grown bigger by the day, and my body and mind had toughened along with them.

But…

I've never been in a situation like this.

There was a simple reason I'd survived every brush with death. I'd either had someone beside me to fight with, or, when I had to face an enemy alone, I'd been ready to put my life on the line.

I'd fought and struggled to the bitter end. And I'd survived.

Clatter.

But never with enormous iron balls hanging all over my body and my internal energy sealed.

"…Damn it."

I muttered under my breath and closed my eyes. The words from the Quest description seemed to appear against the darkness.

With a strong Will and even a single thread of goodwill, a path to life will open.

The System sometimes sent me messages I couldn't tell apart from hints or complete nonsense. Was this just encouragement? Or was it the clue I needed to escape?

As I sat there thinking with my eyes closed, liquid fell from above, struck the floor, and splashed onto the back of my hand.

Tap. Splatter.

It was too sticky to be groundwater, and its temperature was warm enough to make me feel grimy.

I opened my eyes at once, but without even looking at the ceiling, I spoke.

"…You crazy bastard. I told you to quit drooling."

I heard a slurp as Taishan swallowed.

"Sorry. Taishan was too hungry."

"If you're hungry, why are you putting your mouth against a hole in the floor? Just sit still."

"But if Taishan keeps licking, it's surprisingly salty."

"Licking? What?"

"Rock. This place is a rock restaurant."

"Oh, for crying out loud."

"Crying out loud? Is that some kind of sauce?"

This crazy bastard…

I swallowed the curse rising in my throat. Getting angry at him would only waste what little energy I had. It wouldn't change anything.

Besides, Taishan wasn't in much better shape than I was. I had no idea what sort of creature he was made of—his vital points were so thick that the Pressure-Point Strike hadn't worked—but his internal energy had been sealed, and his whole body was bound. Even Taishan's natural strength couldn't get him out of that.

"Pavilion Master. Taishan hungry. Taishan wants to get out soon."

Listening to his quiet whining, I suddenly felt something that could only be called guilt.

This is all my fault.

"…Hey, Taishan."

"Pavilion Master. Why did you call Taishan?"

"I'm sorry."

"Huh?"

"I'm sorry. I mean it."

I looked up as I spoke. Through a hole the size of a child's fist, I could see one enormous, clear eye, like a calf's.

It held a look of complete bewilderment.

I'd always thought Taishan had a heart far more innocent than his age or size suggested. He was like a clean sheet of paper.

I sighed.

"I should've made a better call. I didn't. I made a mistake."

A painful misjudgment. In baduk[2908] terms, a terrible move.

I had locked myself inside the underground prison to clean up the consequences of that mistake, but… damn it. I still had doubts about whether it had really been the right choice.

Taishan studied me as if I'd said something strange.

"Taishan is okay."

"You're okay?"

"Mm-hmm. Taishan is really okay."

"…"

I lowered my head. He probably didn't even understand what was happening. Right now, the most important thing to him was that he was hungry. The second most important was that he had no way to do anything about it.

Maybe that's better for him.

Then he spoke again, and I realized he was far sharper than I'd given him credit for.

[2908] Baduk is the Korean name for Go, a strategy board game.

"Pavilion Master doesn't need to feel sorry for Taishan."

"…?"

I looked up in surprise. Taishan met my eyes and spoke clearly.

"Taishan knows. Taishan is stupid."

"What?"

"Ever since Taishan was little, people called him stupid and made fun of him. They came and hit him whenever they were bored. If Taishan hadn't met Lord… maybe someone would still hit Taishan every day, and Taishan would cry. It was hard."

This wasn't the Taishan I was used to. His whole manner had changed, and his words flowed without a pause as I stared up at him.

"But Lord was different. Even when Taishan said something wrong, Lord understood. When Taishan ate a lot, Lord patted him on the back and told him to eat slowly. So Taishan decided to give his life to Lord."

"You…"

"Then, a little while ago, Lord told Taishan we should trust Pavilion Master. He said Pavilion Master seemed different from the other people in the orthodox faction. Thinking about it now, Lord was right. A few days ago, when stupid Taishan couldn't save Lord, Pavilion Master did."

"…!"

"Taishan likes the Fire Dragon Pavilion now. Taishan likes little, cute Namho, and Hyuk Mujin, even if he's annoying sometimes. Taishan likes fierce Song Ilseom and Ju Hwaran, who's pretty as a flower. And after Lord, Taishan likes Pavilion Master best."

I was speechless. Beyond the hole, his eye curved gently.

"Taishan trusts Lord, and Lord trusts the Pavilion Master. So Pavilion Master, trust yourself. The Pavilion Master will definitely find a way. Just like always."

Taishan gave a little giggle. For a while, all I could do was stare.

It felt as if someone had hit me in the back of the head with a club. I'd never expected Taishan, of all people, to say those things.

And I'd never expected his words to give me more strength than anything else could right now.

Yeah. Come to think of it, there's always been a way.

In the Murim, I seemed to have lived a life rather close to death.

Jopil. The Head Elder. The Roaring Fury Swordsman and the Blood Lord. The Western Heaven Demon Lord…

Danger had waited wherever I went. Each time, I'd taken the word death from where I kept it buried in my heart, turned it over, and made myself a promise.

I would never die. I could never die here.

A strong Will.

Was that what the Quest meant? Or…

Something else connected to a strong Will.

A certain thing the Slaughter Saint had said to me in Hubei just a few months ago flashed through my mind like lightning.

“Huh. You monstrous bastard. You finally opened your Middle Dantian, so now you can handle qi properly.”

I’d asked him, “I already know how to handle it. Don’t you know how much internal energy I have?”

The Slaughter Saint had merely let out a short laugh without answering. Then he had shaken his head and disappeared, saying I wouldn’t understand even if he told me now.

But now I thought I was beginning to understand why he’d said it. How ridiculous I must have looked to him: a young fool boasting that he could handle qi because he had several jiazi[2909] of internal energy.

The Three Dantians.

The three greatest and most important passages in the human body.

But the Lower Dantian was only a vessel, filled and emptied of internal energy again and again. I hadn’t grasped even a quarter of what the Middle Dantian could do or how it worked.

Now, though, things were different.

No. I understood a little.

It wasn’t internal energy that moved the Middle Dantian.

It was Will.

Strong, unwavering Will.

The Middle Dantian had belonged to the realm of enlightenment from the start, not internal energy.

It lay somewhere in an unknown domain, half a step beyond even those chosen masters whose limits were no longer decided by how much internal energy they possessed. A sacred realm one had to pass through to rise from human birth toward the realm of gods.

Since martial arts had first appeared in this world, countless masters must have met success or failure along this path. Some had crumbled like dry leaves. Others had become giants who left their footprints on the long history of martial arts.

And today, I took half a step closer to those giants.

Whoosh.

As if entranced, I reached out. Hidden among the air around me, the qi of the world rippled toward my fingertips.

[2909] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

Just as Baeksang was about to enter his quarters, he sensed that an uninvited guest had arrived before him.

This is…

The qi was faint but unmistakably familiar. It would have been stranger if Baeksang hadn't recognized it.

Perhaps the guest waiting inside had wanted him to.

"You may all go."

The guards who were about to open the door stopped. The graying Captain of the Guards, who had served at Baeksang's side for more than thirty years, spoke up.

"My lord, even so…"

"That's enough. Guard the grounds."

After staring at Baeksang for a moment at his cold words, the captain scattered throughout the manor with his subordinates.

Baeksang glanced at them, then gripped the door handle firmly and pushed.

The door slid open.

Night had fallen outside, but his quarters were brightly lit. The residence was spacious, as befitted a Great Chieftain, yet furnished with almost nothing.

One person waited inside.

"You're late. Where have you been?"

Baeksang answered calmly.

"You already know, don't you, Palace Lord?"

A bitter smile touched the lips of his uninvited guest, the Beast Miao King.

Chapter 666

Baeksang's voice remained calm despite the Beast Miao King's sudden, uninvited arrival.

"You already know, don't you, Palace Lord?"

The Beast Miao King smiled bitterly.

Baeksang was right. A considerable number of tribal chieftains had turned against him, but he was still the master of the Nanman Beast Palace. Within the Inner Palace, at least, he knew Baeksang's every move.

"You spent quite a while in the underground prison. What did you and that boy have to talk about for so long?"

"…"

Baeksang faltered as he remembered his conversation with Jin Taekyung. Only for a moment.

"I told him he would be executed at noon two days from now, in front of everyone."

"And?"

"I told him no one could stop it."

The remark was aimed squarely at him. The Beast Miao King's eyes darkened.

"Do you truly believe that?"

"Of course."

"And if I refuse to let it happen?"

"The Palace Lord stands at the forefront, nothing more. The authority to decide Nanman's great affairs belongs solely to the Tribal Grand Council."

Baeksang spoke quietly, then went on.

"Have you forgotten the oath our ancestors made hundreds of years ago, when they gathered beneath a single banner on this land?"

"…!"

"The outcome will not change. Tomorrow, the final Tribal Grand Council will take up the execution of the Han Chinese Jin Taekyung."

The Beast Miao King regarded Baeksang with a grave expression. He knew the balance of power had already tipped. But if he had given up on Jin Taekyung, he would never have come here.

"Is that all?"

"Twenty tribal chieftains, myself included, have already agreed. If you defy the will of the Tribal Grand Council and choose another course…"

"That is not what I'm asking."

The Beast Miao King cut off Baeksang's words and continued with a sigh.

“Did you tell Jin Taekyung about Hwi?”

“…!”

A crack appeared in Baeksang’s impassive expression. It had been true in the past, and it remained true now: after decades of wearing an iron mask, only the child he could no longer keep by his side could shake him.

The Beast Miao King knew that better than anyone.

“I haven’t planted anyone in the underground prison. I only suspected it. Seeing how shaken you were, so unlike yourself, confirmed it.”

“How…”

“How could I not know? We’ve spent our whole lives together.”

Baeksang fell silent. We. The word struck him with unexpected force. Once, it had come naturally to them both. Now it felt strange.

And yet…

Grind.

“That was when you and I stood on the same path, Palace Lord.”

The Beast Miao King shook his head.

“We still do. We have never once parted ways.”

“It’s too late.”

“It isn’t. We’re still sworn brothers, bound together in our hearts. Even now, we can put right what went wrong.”

“To me, those bonds belong to a distant past.”

“And you’ve been trapped in that past all this time, little brother.”

“…!”

“I remember that day too. How could I forget the day a child more upright and radiant than anyone vanished from this land?”

Baeksang clenched his teeth. The memory was painful even to summon.

Yet he knew something else, too. When the truth of that day had come to light, someone had been just as furious and grief-stricken as he was.

None of it had done any good.

“Neither of us could do anything. The evidence of their crimes was gone, and everything was buried beneath the peace that followed.”

Countless footprints left on a sandy shore vanished when the next wave rolled in.

But Baeksang remembered. He had etched the faces of those who turned away from his child in danger into his flesh and bones, and turned them over in his heart ever since.

He had believed they were all walking side by side across the vast sandy shore called the Central Plains. In truth, his people had been sent ahead simply because they were foreigners.

“I can’t forget any of it, and I can’t undo it. So why do you…!”

Baeksang stopped as his voice began to rise. Sorrow had settled over the Beast Miao King's face.

"Do you think I've forgotten? I'm a sorry excuse for a father who had no choice but to outlive his children."

More than fifty years ago, the Beast Miao King's children had been among the ten thousand warriors who went to the Central Plains. They never set foot on Nanman soil alive again.

"I still regret it. What if I hadn't become Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace? What if I hadn't gone to the battlefield? What if I'd at least refused when they asked to fight alongside their father?"

"…"

"You're right, little brother. We were powerless. We burned with anger and howled with grief, but there was nothing we could do. We had to return to Nanman. Everyone was too exhausted to turn away the peace that had finally come after ten years and begin another war."

The Beast Miao King let out a hollow laugh. At the time, Nanman had been only one power among the Outer Lands, and the gap between it and the Central Plains was vast.

Even against the Zhongnan Sect alone, Nanman had been at a disadvantage.

Venerable Wusang, the Sect Leader of the time, had earned the respect of many through his bearing as a Great Hero. When he died in the final battle at Great Snow Mountain, countless sects and martial artists came to Mount Zhongnan.

"I merely made a choice. Between the dead and the living, between revenge and the greater cause."

What followed was known to everyone.

The Beast Miao King led the survivors home to Nanman and faced a flood of accusations from those who had lost family.

"My life was filled with regrets. But I never regretted that choice—not even once. Because we united as one, grew stronger and more prosperous than before, and gained the power to hold the criminals of the past to account."

Baeksang's face hardened at this story he had never heard before. Yet as he looked at the Beast Miao King, something he could not understand stirred in his eyes.

"But you'll side with the Central Plains again."

"Yes," the Beast Miao King answered without hesitation. "I will."

"Why in the world…"

"Because burning down an entire forest over one diseased tree would be foolish."

"…!"

"We need to uproot what made the tree sick. If we set fire to the forest instead, those flames will reach us next."

The Beast Miao King went on with a sigh.

“Once it was the Demonic Cult. Now it’s Dark Heaven. We fought to protect the forest. This land is part of it too.”

Neither the people of the Central Plains nor the people of Nanman would acknowledge it, but the Beast Miao King knew. Though they lived far apart, they shared the forest called the world.

And…

“You know it too, Baeksang.”

The man who understood it best was his sworn younger brother, looking back at him now with wavering eyes.

“I know. I know that no matter what this foolish older brother says, none of it will reach your ears. You will say that it is an old affair you no longer even remember, and that the Baeksang of that time died a long time ago.”

The Beast Miao King’s children had been killed by the Demonic Cult, but Baeksang’s only child had been sacrificed because people he had believed were allies turned their backs on him.

His anger toward the Central Plains was bound to run deeper and wider.

But the Beast Miao King had watched Baeksang for a long time. He had already guessed.

“If you don’t stop now… you’ll regret it. You regretted the past, you regret the present, and you’ll regret what comes next.”

Baeksang wanted to tell him he would have no regrets.

For Hwi, the child who had been his whole world, he could do anything.

Let them call him a vengeance fiend while he lived. Let them call him a Fiend after he died. He would smile and walk this path all the same.

Then why…

Why? Why in the world?

Why would the thought he had repeated hundreds and thousands of times in his heart over the years refuse to pass through his lips at this very moment?

He had already gone too far to turn back. So why?

Why are you doing this, Baeksang?

As Baeksang put that question to his hollow heart and found no answer, the Beast Miao King’s quiet voice reached his ears.

“I could step down as Palace Lord.”

Baeksang’s pupils shook at the unexpected words. But the Beast Miao King continued in a calmer voice than ever.

“You heard me. If you want me to, I’ll give up the position right now.”

Baeksang struggled to make sense of it. If the position became vacant, one of the remaining Great Chieftains would be appointed the new Palace Lord through the Tribal Grand Council.

But with Heugung and Yohi both gone, the meaning of the Beast Miao King's offer was clear.

"You would make me, of all people, the new Palace Lord?"

"Yes. That's what I said."

"Palace Lord. Have you gone mad?"

"Of course not."

The thirty-two tribal chieftains held the real power in the Nanman Beast Palace, but the authority of the Palace Lord's title could not be ignored. To offer it now, of all times, was absurd.

"What in the world is this…"

Baeksang stared at him, unable to understand. Then he fell silent.

Something about the Beast Miao King's manner—so calm, so unlike him—had brought a realization.

No. Surely not.

The thought flashed through Baeksang's mind. At the same moment, the Beast Miao King slowly spoke.

"Half a shichen[2910]. Half a shichen[2911] is enough. Open the way for them."

Half a shichen[2912]. Them.

That was all Baeksang needed to turn suspicion into certainty. He asked, his voice seething, "Why? Why would you go this far?"

The Beast Miao King's answer came without the slightest tremor or hesitation.

"Because they came to help us. Just as we once did."

"…!"

"And I'll help you. As I always have."

It's too late for that.

Baeksang spat the words inwardly and moved to summon the Captain of the Guards waiting outside.

Or tried to.

For some reason, he could neither take a step nor part his lips.

Baeksang closed his eyes. A voice he should have let go long ago still echoed in his ears.

How much more blood do you intend to spill, Baeksang?

[2910] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.
[2911] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.
[2912] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

The figures moved through the darkness in silence, keeping out of sight.

Whoosh, whoosh, whoosh!

They shot in the same direction, so fast that the wind split around them and leaves trembled in their wake.

By the time anyone noticed, it was already too late.

Swish. Thud.

A body stiffened and fell. One of the figures caught the torch from his hand and moved his lips.

“Open the underground prison.”

Fwoosh.

The wavering torchlight revealed Yayul Mok’s face.

Chapter 667

Infiltration. Assault. Finish.

The sequence of events could only be described as a Quick Attack. It lasted no more than a few moments, and the twenty warriors guarding the area around the underground prison collapsed helplessly before the unexpected ambush.

“I-intrud—!”

Sssht—thud!

The urgent voice that burst from someone’s lips died out before it could become a shout.

Moving like a streak of light, Yayul Mok struck the Bai warrior’s Mute Acupoint, then his Dizziness Acupoint. He caught the man as he collapsed and lowered him quietly to the ground.

Sss.

That had been close. A moment later, and the whole operation might have gone wrong.

“Whew.”

Yayul Mok let out the breath he had been holding and swept his gaze around the area.

Some twenty figures dressed in black, each wearing a different mask, watched every direction as they hid the subdued warriors in the grass.

—Report.

—All of them subdued.

The answer came through Sound Transmission from a man in a monkey mask.

The fact that he and six of the other men in black were the Seven Miao Tigers, the most outstanding warriors among the Miao people, was a secret known only to them and the Beast Miao King.

—One seemed to be missing, but I counted again. The man you just subdued was the last of them, Young Palace Lord. He probably stepped away to relieve himself.

—Any casualties on our side?

—None.

—Good. We nearly ruined everything before we even began.

—That would have been a problem.

Given what they were doing, a problem was putting it mildly.

On the surface, Jin Taekyung was a criminal imprisoned for an unforgivable offense. If word got out that Yayul Mok had tried to free him, even his position as Young Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace would not protect him.

But we have to do it.

Yayul Mok wiped the cold sweat from his forehead.

Young though he was, he understood how bold and dangerous this was. He also believed it was right.

Jin Taekyung is our ally. He came to help us. He even saved our warriors when they were in danger on Ailao Mountain.

Like most people of Nanman, Yayul Mok had grown up with little love for the Han Chinese. That had remained true until he met Jin Taekyung and the members of the Fire Dragon Pavilion.

Thinking well of Jin Taekyung did not mean he trusted all Han Chinese. An individual was an individual; a group was a group.

But he knew what was right and wrong here.

Just as his father, the Beast Miao King, did. The man he respected more than anyone.

—Do you have the keys to the underground prison?

—Of course.

The man in the monkey mask nodded and handed over the bundle of keys in his hand.

Opening the prison required five keys to be inserted in precisely the right order to activate the mechanism. They already knew how.

Click. Rumble.

The massive iron door began to move. As soon as the stairs leading underground came into view, everyone—including Yayul Mok and the Seven Miao Tigers—turned their clothes inside out.

Sssht. Flutter.

The wind stirred the torchlight across their white garments. In an instant, they looked like Bai warriors. They took up positions around the prison as though nothing had happened.

They would hold the post until the next shift arrived, half an hour from now.

We can only hope nothing happens before then.

They had mapped out the routes and guard positions beforehand, but no one could know how the operation would unfold.

Yayul Mok descended with the Seven Miao Tigers, his white clothes feeling especially strange today.

Jin Taekyung is on the fourth floor.

He knew where the cell was. He also knew wardens and guards were posted inside the prison.

They muffled even their footsteps as they went. Before long, faint voices reached them from somewhere ahead.

“Damn it. You didn’t cheat, did you?”

“Don’t be ridiculous. Just admit you lost.”

"Shit. I can't make sense of it. Five games in a row? I've lost two nyang[2913] already."

Wardens often gambled to pass the time. Their carelessness was a welcome sight to the intruders.

"Damn it. Turn your hand over."

"Oh, give it a rest. Stop whining and keep your voice down. The higher-ups are already on edge over that Han Chinese bastard. If they catch us slacking off…"

Sssht—thud!

The voices in the dimness cut off.

The Seven Miao Tigers were among the finest warriors of the Miao people—Peak masters whose skill was recognized even in the Central Plains. The wardens never sensed them approaching. In an instant, their pressure points had been struck, their keys taken, and they themselves locked in an empty cell.

—Gisan. Dogok. Stay here.

—As you command.

—Not even an ant will get past us.

Leaving the post empty would invite suspicion.

Yayul Mok left two of the Seven Miao Tigers behind and increased his pace. Faster than an ordinary walk, but not so fast as to invite suspicion.

Step. Step.

Six figures made their way through the underground prison's maze of corridors.

But things did not go as Yayul Mok had hoped.

"Hmm? Who are those men?"

Security on the fourth floor, where Jin Taekyung was held, was far tighter than usual. Besides the wardens, plenty of warriors guarded the prison's interior.

"You there. Stop."

Yayul Mok stopped without protest. As he steadied his breathing, he counted the men blocking their path.

Twenty.

Five of them were Peak masters.

These were elite Bai warriors. Yayul Mok kept his voice calm as he answered.

He had already removed his mask, and the few torches did little to light the prison. The darkness would help hide his face.

"We're here on the Great Chieftain's orders."

"The Great Chieftain?"

The Bai warrior who appeared to be their captain deliberately furrowed his brow.

"He only just left. What does he want?"

[2913] Nyang was a traditional unit of money, historically tied to a weight of silver. Its value varied by time and place.

“Nothing urgent. He said to give the prisoner another Force-Sealing Pill, just in case.”

“Hmm. Did he?”

“He must be worried about an escape. I’ve only heard the rumors myself, but the man sounds like a monster.”

The Bai warrior gave a short laugh.

“So I’ve heard. Now he’s just waiting to die.”

“I think so too, but you never know what might happen.”

“True enough. You sound young. Unless you’re here to relieve us, get on with it. You’ve got seven or eight minutes.”

“We won’t be long.”

Yayul Mok shrugged and walked toward them, his head lowered slightly to keep his face out of view.

Then he noticed one warrior’s hand gripping his scabbard tight.

They’ve already figured it out—!

Shing! Slice!

A flash grazed his shoulder. A few drops of blood flew with a faint sting as Yayul Mok twisted aside, evading two swords.

A shout like a thunderclap shook the prison.

“Intruders! Intruders!”

Peeeeep!

A shrill whistle sounded with the cry. Hurried footsteps broke the silence as warriors rushed from their posts throughout the prison.

Sensing them converging, Yayul Mok bit down hard and shouted, “Attack!”

At once, brilliant sword light flashed behind him.

Sssshh-shing!

Blades met in the dim torchlight.

Clang! Clang-clang!

Slice!

“Gah!”

A dozen weapons clashed in an instant. Blood flew, and men screamed.

The two men left at the wardens’ post realized what was happening and joined the fight. Within moments, half of the twenty Bai warriors had fallen wounded.

But…

Peep! Peeeeep!

“Stop them, whatever it takes! They’re after Jin Taekyung!”

“There aren’t many of them! Capture them if you can!”

The security was far tighter than their information had suggested. For every man they brought down, five more appeared. Bring down five, and ten took their place.

Worse, Yayul Mok and his men had sworn not to kill their fellow Nanman people while rescuing Jin Taekyung. It was one obstacle piled on another.

Sssshh-shing!

“Keep pushing!”

Bai warriors charged from every direction, their blades honed to sharp edges.

Surrounded by more than fifty enemies in the blink of an eye, Yayul Mok and the Seven Miao Tigers gritted their teeth and fought back.

Clang-clang-clang!

Slice!

Their hopes were one thing. The reality was another.

The enemy kept coming, too many for their small party to overcome. Worse still, Peak masters were scattered among them, each attack dangerous in its own right.

Sssht—thunk!

“Ugh!”

Small wounds multiplied. The bleeding did not stop.

Yayul Mok and the Seven Miao Tigers had brought down plenty of Bai warriors, yet the enemy’s numbers kept growing. Guards from the other floors had joined the fight.

Damn it.

Cold sweat soaked Yayul Mok’s back.

He had known this would not be easy. But they had been discovered too soon, and the prison was far more heavily guarded than he had been told.

If they capture us here…

Everything would end in the worst possible way.

As the Young Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace, Yayul Mok would not lose his life. But his father, the Beast Miao King, would lose his political standing, while Jin Taekyung and the Fire Dragon Pavilion members—the original targets of the rescue—would be executed.

And then war will begin.

Not the Great Faction War they had once fought against the Demonic Cult. A war against the Murim of the Central Plains.

If Jin Taekyung died, nothing could be undone. That was one of the greatest reasons the father and son were risking their lives to rescue him.

There’s no other choice.

Yayul Mok bit his lip until it bled. His lips moved.

—Wonhu. I’m counting on you.

The Sound Transmission was brief, but it was enough.

Wonhu, the middle-aged man in the monkey mask and eldest of the Seven Miao Tigers, sent his sword flashing out and shouted, “Open a path!”

There was only one way forward now: break through, regardless of the cost, and rescue Jin Taekyung.

It was why they had all come here despite the danger. Yayul Mok could see no other way out.

If Jin Taekyung gets out of this prison, he can resolve everything.

Yayul Mok felt the hard wooden case inside his robes.

What he had told the guards before the fight—that he had come to give Jin Taekyung a Force-Sealing Pill—had not been entirely false.

Only it was not a Force-Sealing Pill, but an antidote that would lift the seal on his internal energy.

Clang-clang-clang!

Thrust! Slice!

“Gah!”

With defeat looming, the narrow prison corridor was their one advantage.

Yayul Mok and the Seven Miao Tigers drove toward a single point, ignoring the attacks coming from all sides. At last, a dark corridor opened before them.

“Go! Hurry!”

Yayul Mok left his loyal guard’s urgent cry behind and gathered all his strength to launch himself forward.

Or he would have.

Sssshh-shing! Grab!

A hand reached out of the darkness and caught his shoulder.

“Where are you going? Got somewhere to be?”

“…!”

For a brief moment, Yayul Mok fell silent, oblivious to the battle raging around him. Then he spoke.

“…Why are you coming out of there?”

Chapter 668

Sometimes, things happen in life that you just can't explain.

Like right now.

"Where are you going? Got somewhere to be?"

"…!"

For a brief moment, time seemed to stop in the middle of its headlong rush.

The Seven Miao Tigers, who had been rampaging like beasts despite wounds all over their bodies; the Bai warriors, who now filled the underground prison's corridors; and Yayul Mok—all stood frozen like statues, staring blankly at the person who had emerged from beyond the thick darkness.

How?

It was the question on everyone's mind. He couldn't be here. He wasn't supposed to be here.

But while everyone inside the underground prison wore the expression of someone who had seen a ghost, only Yayul Mok, whose shoulder was caught in his powerful grip, realized that this unbelievable situation was real.

He had to ask.

"…Why are you coming out of there?"

Yayul Mok's eyes were vacant, his voice dazed. The answer he got was remarkably short.

"I just came out."

"…?"

"I was locked up in there, right? So that's where I came out of."

"…!"

What the fuck is he talking about?

Yayul Mok and everyone else were thinking the same thing.

So what the hell? We're asking how the bastard who was supposed to be locked in the underground prison crawled out.

He hadn't simply been locked in a cell, either. They'd heard he had iron balls weighing more than ten thousand geun[2914] hanging off him like jewelry, and that his internal energy had been sealed.

And the bars on every side of his cell had meteorite iron mixed into them. The prison had been built for that one monster alone.

So how?

It made no sense.

[2914] A Korean unit of weight. One geun is 600 g (1.32 lb); ten thousand geun is 6,000 kg (about 13,000 lb).

The Bai warriors instinctively suspected a traitor on the inside. Yayul Mok and the Seven Miao Tigers wondered if their information had been wrong. And he took a casual step forward.

Step.

His footfall broke the silence.

The man emerged from the dark corridor into the flickering torchlight. Jin Taekyung frowned.

“Ugh, that’s bright. Hey, you.”

At Jin Taekyung’s pointed finger, the Bai warrior holding his torch high asked with a vacant expression,

“Me?”

“Yeah, you.”

“Wh-why?”

“Why do you think, you clueless bastard? My eyes hurt. Put your arm down. What are you doing, giving a presentation? Crossing the street without your parents?”

“No, sir.”

The Bai warrior answered blankly, though he had no idea what Jin Taekyung meant. Somehow, answering felt like the thing to do. So did addressing him politely.

“Look at this bastard, still crossing on green. I’ll give you three seconds to lower your arm. If the light turns red before you do, you’re dead. Three.”

“Ah, I’m sorry.”

“To hell with sorry. Put your arm down. Two.”

“Yes, sir.”

Whoosh!

The Bai warrior hastily lowered his arm. The already faint torchlight dimmed further, and Jin Taekyung nodded in satisfaction.

“Hmm. Much better. Good job.”

“It was nothing…”

The Bai warrior felt an odd swell of pride at the praise. Then he stopped.

Huh?

Wait. This wasn’t right.

As realization struck, an unfamiliar sound whipped past his ear.

Thwack! Thud.

Sizzle.

He crumpled, and his torch fell into a puddle. The Bai captain who had struck his foolish subordinate across the jaw without hesitation growled.

“You idiot.”

His icy voice snapped the Bai warriors out of their daze. They had watched the whole exchange unfold as if it were the most natural thing in the world.

What the hell?

It was like waking from a deep sleep. All at once, they understood: impossible as it seemed, this was real, and the battle wasn't over.

And…

"Now he's even putting out the fire for us. How thoughtful."

They had to subdue the monster who had escaped his restraints.

The realization came like a bolt of lightning. The shout that followed was thunder.

"Attack!"

The shout, filled with powerful internal energy, shook the underground prison.

At the same time as he ordered the attack, the captain of the Bai warriors was the first to leap forward. He kicked off the wall and shot toward Jin Taekyung.

Tap-tap—whoosh!

He was fast enough to rival a Peak master from a major sect.

The Seven Miao Tigers recovered half a beat too late. They tried to intercept him, but weapons came at them from every direction.

Swish-swish-swish—clang!

Wonhu, the eldest of the Seven Miao Tigers, blocked the attacks and shouted, "Hurry! Give him the antidote—!"

Clang!

The clash cut off his cry. Seeing Yayul Mok reach hurriedly inside his robes, the Bai captain knew.

Just as I thought. Not yet.

Jin Taekyung.

He did not know how that young monster from the Central Plains had escaped the underground prison, but there was no doubt that the boy had not yet released the seal on his internal energy.

Then I can do this.

Even a Supreme Peak master was little more than an unusually capable ordinary man without his internal energy. The martial arts Jin Taekyung had learned and the principles he had mastered hadn't vanished, of course. But unarmed, he could hardly hope to face a swordsman who had reached the Peak realm long ago.

I'll capture him myself.

The prospect of earning a feat no one else could match, together with his certainty of victory, made the captain feel lighter than ever. The sword in his hand blazed with dazzling light.

Ssssss!

Sword Energy surged along the sharp blade. Yayul Mok glanced back instinctively, and the captain saw his eyes tremble.

This would be the sharpest, most powerful strike of his life. He was sure of it.

Now!

Ssshhhiiing!

The motion was flawless. A perfect draw.

Sword Energy burst from the blade, cutting through the darkness toward both men. The captain cried out in triumph.

“Got—!”

Slice!

His Sword Energy cut through empty air.

What?

The captain blinked.

They were gone. Nothing remained where his Sword Energy had passed—not Yayul Mok, not Jin Taekyung. Both had vanished like apparitions.

How?

The next moment, an answer came to the question he had asked only in his mind.

“Oh. You were just thinking how, weren’t you?”

“…!”

The voice came from behind him.

Goose bumps climbed the captain’s spine as he spun, his sword following through a motion ingrained by years of practice.

Whoosh!

Once again, his sword cut through the air.

No. It almost did.

Grgrgrk.

The tip trembled faintly. Another question surfaced in his suddenly empty mind.

What… is this?

The blade, brimming with Sword Energy, had stopped before an unarmed palm.

No. He hasn’t even blocked it with his hand.

Barely one chi[2915] separated the trembling blade from the palm. In that gap, an invisible force pushed his sword back.

Slowly, but powerfully.

Grgrgrk.

With eyes trembling as fiercely as his sword, the captain squeezed out his voice.

“S-Seizing an Object Through Empty Space?”

[2915] A traditional unit of length. One chi is 3.03 cm (1.19 in).

The carefully polished blade glinted in the darkness. Beyond it, white teeth showed in a slight grin.

“Seizing an Object Through Empty Space? Well, it’s similar.”

“H-how? Your internal energy was sealed—”

“I said similar. I didn’t say it was the same thing.”

What?

“Don’t try to understand. You couldn’t even if you tried.”

It was a cruel truth. Even if the captain devoted the rest of his life to martial arts, he would never reach the threshold of the Middle Dantian.

“Wh-what is this…?”

That was a realm the captain, who had devoted his entire life to martial arts, could not understand. Unfortunately, Jin Taekyung was not the sort of kind person who would patiently tutor a dunce.

“Get lost.”

“…!”

At the moment the captain’s wide eyes reflected Jin Taekyung’s fist, wrapped tightly in chains—

Bam!

Pain unlike anything he had ever known exploded through his abdomen and swept over his body.

“Guh-heok!”

It was a punch so powerful that Jin Taekyung had to have recovered his internal energy.

But the captain was only human—a little more capable than most. He had no hope of withstanding a blow driven by strength and speed far beyond human limits.

Whoosh!

He could feel his body hurtling backward, hear the air shriek around it. His consciousness faded beneath the pain.

That insane… monster.

That was his final thought.

The captain’s already unconscious body grazed past the Seven Miao Tigers, who were still fighting desperately, then crashed like a cannonball into the Bai warriors filling the underground prison’s corridor.

Boom! Crack!

“Argh!”

“Wh-what was that?”

The underground prison descended into chaos. The Bai warriors realized what had struck them and stared, openmouthed.

“C-Captain?”

“But how…?”

The murmurs died almost as quickly as they had begun. There was only one person here who could have defeated the captain—a high-ranking Bai warrior, a Peak master, and the strongest among them.

“J-Jin Taekyung.”

The name slipped from someone’s lips. Every eye turned in the same direction.

Splash. Clatter.

A man walked through a puddle of filthy water, the chains severed from his iron balls dangling from both hands.

“Yeah, that’s me. Someone call?”

In complete contrast to the dark atmosphere of the underground prison, the smile around Jin Taekyung’s lips was as bright as sunlight.

Like a predator spotting prey.

No. Like a Fiend.

“Anyone want the shit beaten out of them with a chain? Hands?”

“…!”

“…!”

The Bai warriors froze as a chill ran through them. But not all of them stayed frozen.

“Attack him!”

“We outnumber them! Push forward!”

Swish-swish-swish!

A dozen or so figures sprang off the walls and charged. They were squad captains, each a Peak master. Though none was as strong as their fallen captain, the Bai warriors felt their courage return.

Or almost did.

Whoooosh!

A chain hurtled toward the charging men with a heavy rush of air.

Bam-bam-bam-bam-bam!

The chain swept through the dozen or so squad captains charging forward, knocking them away all at once.

Boom! Crash-crash-crash!

The underground prison shook. Everyone swallowed as they watched a thick cloud of dust rise. Then a low voice reached them.

“Is it summer already? Why are there so many damn flies…”

“…!”

“…!”

“Anyway. Who’s next? Hands?”

No one stepped forward this time.

The Bai warriors stared at the man standing before them like the Grim Reaper, then retreated as though by agreement.

But…

Boom. Boom.

An ominous sound rose from the stairs behind them, snuffing out even the faintest hope of escape.

“Oh, right. Forgot to tell you.”

Jin Taekyung grinned and pointed toward the stairs.

“Something big’s coming.”

The next moment, the Bai warriors heard a chilling roar.

“Taishan. Hungryyyyyyyyy!”

It was the roar of a starving beast.

No—of Taishan.

Chapter 669

The time it takes to drink a cup of tea.

No, perhaps mere moments.

It took less than the time needed to drink a cup of tea to settle everything in the underground prison.

Taishan, half-crazed with hunger, blocked the stairs. I advanced at the front with Yayul Mok and the Seven Miao Tigers behind me, and the Bai warriors lost their will to fight.

That was fortunate for me.

We needed to escape the underground prison as quickly as possible, but I was also beginning to feel my limits. I still had not completely grasped the full utility of the Middle Dantian.

Breaking my restraints had already consumed an enormous amount of mental strength. After one brief fight on top of that, my stomach was churning and my chest had begun to hurt. Taishan's arrival was like getting an entire army as reinforcements.

"Gwooooooh!"

Hmm. Actually, he was closer to the Hulk.

And it wasn't just the presence of a Supreme Peak master that made the enemy surrender so quickly. Taishan's eerie muttering had a lot to do with it.

"%#!"

"Gasp!"

His eyes gleamed with hunger.

To the Bai warriors, the sight of Taishan approaching while spitting out incomprehensible words at machine-gun speed must have been terrifying. But I knew exactly what his incantation meant.

"Roast duck! Maechae Guyuk[2916]! Fish-Fragrant Shredded Pork! Beijing Sauce Shredded Pork! Garlic Pork! Twice-Cooked Pork! Sweet and Sour Pork! Soy-Braised Beef! Dongpo Pork! Mapo Tofu!"

"…"

"Kung Pao Chicken! Stir-Fried Mushrooms and Vegetables! King-Size Dumplings! Beggar's Chicken! Sweet-and-Sour Carp! Aaaaaaah!"

Hmm.

Good thing they couldn't understand Han Chinese. Then again, a man slowly approaching while chanting food names like he was possessed might have been even scarier.

[2916] Maechae Guyuk is pork belly with preserved mustard greens; the Korean name shortens the Chinese dish name.

“Hungryyyyyyyyy!”

“Eek! Dark arts! That monster’s about to use dark arts!”

“I surrender! I surrender!”

That bastard was a Saiyan[2917], at least by Nanman standards.

Judging by their reactions, you’d think he’d shouted “Kamehameha!”[2918] instead of “I’m hungry!”

Whatever I thought of it, his cry of hunger worked. Even the few brave men who stepped forward despite it got smashed by Taishan, and that settled the matter.

“Don’t be afraid! Charge!”

“We can do this! Strike him!”

The men who came forward were skilled enough to be considered decent Supreme First Rate masters even in the Central Plains.

Their only problem was who they’d chosen to fight.

Thud! Craaack!

Crack-crack!

Taishan swung his log-thick arms and legs, sending bodies flying in every direction.

The Bai warriors swallowed hard and lowered their weapons. Yayul Mok and the Seven Miao Tigers stared at me in disbelief.

“What? What are you looking at?”

“No, it’s just… wasn’t your internal energy sealed?”

“Yeah. It was. I still can’t use it.”

“…Then how?”

“Mine’s a long story. That guy was born like that.”

The human body had limits. I’d surpassed them by an absurd margin thanks to the System, but Taishan was a naturally occurring monster. Even without internal energy, he could beat down a First Rate master as easily as a rat.

Was he exposed to gamma radiation as a kid or something?

A reasonable suspicion, but it didn’t matter right now.

I looked at the Bai warriors who had lost their will to fight and disarmed themselves, then muttered quietly.

“All right. Let’s deal with this lot first.”

The short version is that the Bai warriors who surrendered survived. More precisely, Yayul Mok spared them.

[2917] A Saiyan is a member of a warrior race in the Japanese manga and anime series Dragon Ball.

[2918] Kamehameha is the name of an energy-wave attack in Dragon Ball.

Thud. Slump.

A warrior struck by a Pressure-Point Strike lost consciousness and fell. The Seven Miao Tigers, whom I'd gotten to know a few days earlier on the way to Ailao Mountain, gathered the unconscious warriors in one place and locked them in the underground prison. Then we headed straight for the stairs to the surface.

Squelch.

"I told you before… you're going to regret this."

I said it as we walked. Yayul Mok understood what I meant and shook his head.

"No, I won't."

"Our faces are out in the open. Once they wake up, whose name do you think they'll give first?"

Yayul Mok was the Young Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace. That alone said enough. The Seven Miao Tigers were also well-known warriors who represented the Miao people. Their tribes might be different, but some of the prisoners had probably recognized them already.

"It's only a matter of time before this comes out. We should've silenced them."

"It doesn't matter."

"Like hell it doesn't. You said we weren't going to flee along this path, so why wouldn't it matter? If we remain here…"

"Our identities will be revealed. Our lives won't be in immediate danger, but we'll pay dearly for defying the Tribal Grand Council's decision."

"I hate to ask, but do you enjoy getting fucked over? Is being locked in the underground prison on your bucket list?"

"Bucki… I can hardly pronounce it. I don't know what that is, but I knew the risk when I did this."

Yayul Mok continued quietly.

"Our tribes are different, but we're all Nanman people. We've lived together on this land for a long time. If we kill our own people, we become monsters too."

His words brought someone to mind. A man who had become a monster for the sake of revenge.

Baeksang.

Maybe that was the difference between a human being and a monster: refusing to sacrifice lives for your own ends.

Even so, I spoke with a heavy heart.

"We should've killed them all."

"You do like killing. Are all Han Chinese like you?"

"You crazy bastard. Do you think I'm some kind of fiend? It's just…"

"That's enough. I already know."

"What?"

I turned to find Yayul Mok smiling silently.

“You’re worried about us. You feel guilty because we got ourselves into trouble trying to save you.”

“…”

“The Central Plains and Nanman have different languages, but we have a word for friend too. Perhaps that’s what you and I have become without realizing it. Unless I’m the only one who thinks so.”

“…!”

Damn it. I had no idea what to say.

While I stood there speechless, the seemingly endless stairs finally came to an end. The entrance to the underground prison was before us.

“Wonhu.”

At Yayul Mok’s call, the middle-aged man nodded and stepped forward. He looked like a monkey. He tried the keys on a large ring one after another, and the enormous iron door began to open with a heavy rumble.

Grooooan.

Faint moonlight slipped through the widening gap. Yayul Mok took two small wooden cases from inside his robes.

“An antidote to lift the seal on your internal energy. It’s made with a secret Bai technique, so I could only get two. Once your internal energy is restored, you should be able to lead the others out of Nanman.”

“The others?”

“I don’t know if it was because they’re old and injured, but security around them was remarkably lax. Uncle Baeksang isn’t usually so careless.”

As Yayul Mok spoke, I saw them beyond the fully opened door: two unconscious people lying across a White Tiger’s back.

“Lord! Namho!”

Seeing the familiar faces, Taishan hurriedly ran out of the underground prison. I stared at Yayul Mok with complicated emotions.

“You…”

“Go. We’ll buy you as much time as we can. They’ll discover what happened within half a shichen[2919] at most, but even that should help.”

I didn’t know what to say.

What would have happened without their help?

Taishan and I might have escaped the underground prison on our own, but we could never have gotten out of the Nanman Beast Palace this quickly. As long as Namho and Sama Pyo were being held somewhere in the Inner Palace, I was [2919] A shichen is a traditional Chinese period of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

bound more tightly than I'd been by ten thousand geun[2920] of iron balls.

I might've been captured again trying to get them out.

But these people had given everything they had to help me, knowing the danger it put them in.

Thanks to them, I had a second chance to undo my bad move.

"...Thank you."

At the thanks I had not managed to offer until now, Yayul Mok and the Seven Miao Tigers—as well as the men disguised as Bai warriors outside the underground prison—smiled faintly and shook their heads.

"No need to thank us."

"That's right. We're only repaying a debt Nanman owes you."

"My hyung[2921] was on Ailao Mountain. Thanks to you, I'll get to see him again."

People whose faces and names I didn't know had helped me. One even called me his benefactor.

I looked at each of them, committing their faces to memory. Then I took the wooden cases from Yayul Mok and stepped into the faint moonlight.

Soft crunch.

The moment my foot landed on the damp earth—

Ding!

SYSTEM

Escape from the underground prison before the execution (Complete)
You have fulfilled the Quest success conditions!
You have successfully completed the Quest, Escape from Namshank[2922]!
Issuing the Quest completion Reward!
You obtained a massive amount of EXP!
Level Up!
Some injuries and Status Effects have been removed!

As the Quest notifications rang in my ears, a cool breeze that only I could feel swept through my body.

Whoooosh!

[2920] A geun is a Korean unit of weight equal to 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun is about 6,000 kg (13,200 lb).

[2921] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older male friend.

[2922] "Namshank" echoes The Shawshank Redemption, a film about a prison escape.

My muscles, stiff for more than a full day, loosened. The fatigue that had built up as I forced out the still woefully insufficient power of the Middle Dantian faded. Finally, the force constricting my Lower Dantian melted away.

Hoo.

Heat from the Scorching Yang Qi mingled with my long exhale.

Yayul Mok and the Seven Miao Tigers widened their eyes, as if they had sensed something from my appearance.

Of course they're surprised. I haven't even taken the antidote yet.

But I had neither the time nor the intention to explain every little detail.

I tossed Taishan a pill from one of the wooden cases, telling him it was a snack, then fed the other to the unconscious Sama Pyo.

Fwoosh. Sssslip.

The Scorching Yang Qi melted the pill like water. As the liquid ran down Sama Pyo's throat, color returned to his slightly pale face.

He's in better shape than I expected, but he shouldn't push himself for a while.

Namho aside, losing Sama Pyo's full strength as a fighter was a serious disadvantage. But it didn't mean we couldn't escape.

If anything, we were in a better position than before I'd surrendered.

We've got everyone except the reconnaissance squad, and I've gained a little insight too.

Then Yayul Mok offered one more kindness I hadn't expected.

"Take him with you."

Grrrr.

A familiar growl.

The White Tiger, looking at its lifelong friend and master with sad eyes, held out its back toward me.

"Muyaho is called a spiritual creature even among Nanman's White Tigers. He's like a brother to me. I trust you'll take good care of him."

As if it understood Yayul Mok's low voice, the White Tiger licked my hand, then pressed its nose against me and sniffed.

Yayul Mok smiled faintly as he watched it, then pointed in one direction.

"Go. Run straight northeast from where we first met, and you'll find the reconnaissance squad."

That was when it happened.

Thud.

At the sound of a blow, Yayul Mok's body jerked. Wonhu caught him as he collapsed, then grinned at me.

"I trust you understand without us saying it."

"You people…"

“Please look after the Young Palace Lord.”

Chapter 670

It was a short time, and a long one.

Long enough for a moment to feel like seven days and nights. Long enough to walk through the past several decades, year by year, and watch the newborn who had cried in the arms of his mother, dead from childbirth, grow into a fine young man.

Baeksang's deliberation was short and long, long and short.

When his tightly closed lips finally parted, he already had his answer.

"You'll regret this."

The Beast Miao King asked calmly, "What will I regret? Coming to find you? Or rescuing Jin Taekyung and the other Han Chinese?"

"Everything that has happened until now."

"Like you, Baeksang?"

"It's different."

Baeksang's expression hardened.

"Unlike me, you still have a chance, Palace Lord. One last chance to undo your mistake."

"One last chance…"

"If you leave quietly now, I'll forget everything I saw and heard here. As though none of it happened."

"How can I cover the sky with the palm of my hand? I knew what I was risking when I told you to spare the men guarding the underground prison."

"If I order them to keep silent, they will. The Bai people are no less loyal to me than the Seven Miao Tigers are to you."

"Is that… the last kindness you can offer me as my sworn brother?"

Baeksang nodded without a word.

The Beast Miao King gave him a sorrowful smile.

"Then let me ask you one more time, on the strength of that last kindness. Half a shichen.[2923] Open a path for them, even if only for half a shichen.[2924]"

"Palace Lord!"

"Even if I could turn back, I wouldn't. That's the one difference between us, after a lifetime together."

"…!"

The corners of Baeksang's eyes trembled.

[2923] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

[2924] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

More than anything, he wanted to tell the Beast Miao King he was wrong. That unlike him, Baeksang had seen only one path ahead and had had no choice but to walk it.

But his lips stayed shut. His hand had already found his sword hilt.

Click. Shing.

The cold scrape of metal cut through the brief silence. The Beast Miao King's gaze deepened as he looked at Baeksang, sword lowered at his side.

"So that's your choice?"

"I can't help it, Palace Lord. Right now… it's the best I can do."

"It's much better not to hear that awkward formal speech. It feels as though we've gone back to the old days."

"You know as well as I do, Palace Lord. We can never go back to those days."

"Do you think so?"

"Of course."

The Beast Miao King smiled faintly at his firm answer.

Baeksang had made his decision. He did not hesitate.

Tssssss!

Dazzling light flooded the space around them. A vast concentration of qi known as Sword Force descended toward its target.

Slice!

Three tigers ran like the wind, led by the snow-white White Tiger.

Wonhu, the eldest of the Seven Miao Tigers, watched their backs disappear into the darkness and muttered,

"Damn, they're fast."

That was the entirety of his impression.

Those who were leaving had left. Those who remained had stayed. He and the others had chosen to stay.

"Heh heh."

Wonhu laughed, feeling strangely relieved, and pulled a gourd from his robes.

Pop.

The scent of liquor spread the instant he pulled the stopper. The eyes of the nearby Miao warriors lit up.

"Oh-ho."

"That smells incredible. Did you brew it yourself, Big Brother?"

"Hell, did they round up nothing but a pack of fucking mutts? Why are all your noses so sharp?"

He grumbled, but his eyes were smiling. With a look of helpless resignation, Wonhu passed the gourd to the men crowding around him.

"There isn't much. Take turns and have a little each."

"I swear, not a drop will make it back to your mouth, Big Brother."

"Now this I can't pass up."

The Miao warriors roared with laughter and took turns tipping back the gourd.

Nanman people were famous for their love of liquor. With twenty grown men sharing it, their boast that they would leave nothing behind sounded entirely plausible.

But…

"Ahh, that's good. Your turn, Big Brother. I left you a few drops out of courtesy."

Wonhu took the gourd at last and let out a short laugh.

Slosh.

One light shake told him enough. It was not even half empty.

The men stood there shamelessly praising the liquor, and he couldn't help laughing again.

"Turns out you're not mutts. You're just a pack of blowhards."

"Hm? What's that supposed to mean?"

"Has senility caught up with you already? You're only in your fifties."

"Enough nonsense. Drink."

At their urging, Wonhu tipped the gourd—not toward his mouth, but toward the weed-covered ground.

Trickle.

"Don't begrudge a single drop. If we survive, we'll sit together and drink all night. If we fall here, we can get drunk after we're dead."

"…!"

"…!"

The men watched him with solemn faces. Then their mouths curled into smiles.

"Yeah. I like that."

"Big Brother knows what he's talking about."

"You've always been crazier about liquor than martial arts, haven't you?"

Wonhu laughed. So did the Seven Miao Tigers, who had spent their lives alongside him, and the Miao warriors who had volunteered for this dangerous mission.

Regrets? Not one.

Even if every one of them died here, their only hope would make it out of danger alive.

That was why Wonhu could laugh. He thought of the man who had always led from the front, who had sent even his only heir here to set an example.

I'll gladly accept punishment for disobeying your order… in the afterlife, my lord.

Neither the Beast Miao King nor Yayul Mok feared death. They never put their subordinates in front of them as shields, and they never backed away in terror.

The Beast Miao King loved the only child he had had late in life more than anything. But if he knew what Wonhu had done, he would scold him. No life was worth more than another.

That's enough of a reason to give mine.

Wonhu shook the now-empty gourd, trying to get out the last drops. He watched the liquor fall like the tears of an ant, smacked his lips, and suddenly spoke toward somewhere in the darkness that had settled all around them.

"Hey, got any liquor?"

A low voice answered.

"I thought you were on duty."

"We both know better. Go peel yourself a tiger's dick and eat it."

Wonhu grinned.

Their scheduled shift change was long past, and the waves of energy reaching him from the darkness were strong enough to raise goose bumps.

"So? Are you going to share or not?"

"I've heard there's a monkey among the Miao people who likes liquor. Catch."

Whoosh.

Wonhu snatched the object out of the air. The moment he saw the rough, familiar gourd, a groan escaped him.

"This…"

There was no mistaking it. His lord, the Beast Miao King, had made this gourd himself and always carried it.

"Recognize it?"

The voice reached his ears again. Wonhu slowly raised his head, and a man came into view.

His white robes were stained with blood and filth from unknown owners. His skin was so starkly white that pallid was the only word for it.

"…Baeksang."

Baeksang answered in a dry voice.

"How dare a mere warrior casually speak the name of the Great Chieftain?"

"What happened to my lord?"

"You'll find out soon enough."

Swish. Papapat!

Baeksang flicked his blood-soaked sleeve. In an instant, more than a hundred Bai warriors emerged from the darkness and surrounded them.

Damn it.

Wonhu cursed inwardly and drew the broad-bladed saber tucked into his waist.

He glanced up. Clouds covered the moon tonight, of all nights. It was a poor night to die, but the darkness was a blessing in one respect.

The fugitives would have the advantage if anyone gave chase.

Please be alive. Both of you.

There was only one thing left to do.

Wonhu—or rather, all of them—raised their weapons and charged toward the enemy without hesitation.

Their roar was too great for fear to find a place among them.

Whooooooosh!

Cold wind swept over me as the landscape raced past. No people. None of the houses with their unusual shapes. Only thickets.

We had left the Outer Palace behind.

But we're still in the Nanman Beast Palace's territory. We can't slow down.

We might have to run without stopping until we rescued the Fire Dragon Pavilion members in the reconnaissance squad. The Nanman Beast Palace's reach covered this entire unfamiliar land of forests, plains, jungles, and swamps.

"Sorry, but I need you to keep going a little longer."

Grrr.

Yayul Mok was right: the White Tiger really was a spiritual creature. It seemed to understand me even over the rushing wind. With a low growl, it picked up speed.

Papapapat!

Its master, tied to its back, was probably another reason it listened to me so well.

I watched Yayul Mok sway gently with each bound and sighed.

Yayul Mok.

We had made it out of the Outer Palace, but I hadn't woken him. More accurately, I hadn't been able to bring myself to try.

If he wakes up, he'll find some way to go back.

If he did, everything would be for nothing. Abandoning the one escape route they had risked their lives to open would mean nothing but pointless deaths.

Given his position, they probably wouldn't try to execute him on the spot the way they intended to execute me… but if he wanted to go back, I would stop him.

For Yayul Mok. For the Miao warriors fighting for him. And for the Fire Dragon Pavilion members.

They could call me selfish. They could curse me and point fingers, say I cared only about my own life.

But as fucked up as it was, this was the best choice I had.

Damn it.

I bit down hard on my lip.

Within a day at most—perhaps half a day—a net over heaven and earth would be cast across Nanman. We had to get as far away as we could and find the reconnaissance squad before then.

The two tribal chieftains leading the squad are effectively loyal to the Beast Miao King. We might be able to rescue the three of them without much of a fight.

That was the best outcome I could imagine.

With Dark Heaven's intervention and Baeksang's betrayal now certain, and with me having become the star of a massacre that had never been in the cards for me, no one could predict what variables might arise.

First, get every Fire Dragon Pavilion member out. After that…

My thoughts broke off.

Rustle.

The White Tiger stopped dead. It had been running at the front without a moment's hesitation, but now it would not take another step.

"What? What's wrong?"

Grrr.

"Your master said to keep going northwest, so…"

Grrrr. Sniff, sniff.

What?

It looked in two directions, one after the other. Then it buried its nose in my hand and sniffed, just as it had before we set out.

Wait. Could it be?

At that moment—

Ding!

As the Quest notification rang in my ears, I remembered the scent pouch I had found at Yohi's Western Yao Estate.

Chapter 671

The place where I currently found myself—the Murim—had neither the dazzling scientific civilization nor the mechanical engineering of the modern world. Nor did it have magic.

But extraordinary things were woven into this world—things no less remarkable than magic.

Murim people accumulated internal energy and wielded power beyond that of Hunters. There were countless martial arts unknown to the modern world, along with mysterious, bizarre spiritual creatures and elixirs.

And… tracking scent was one of those things.

Ding.

SYSTEM

A Sudden Quest, Yohi's Tracking Scent, has been generated!
Would you like to open the Quest window and check its contents?
Y / N

The System notification caught me off guard. Almost entranced, I nodded.

Ding.

SYSTEM

Quest
Yohi's Tracking Scent
A new path has appeared before you as you flee from pursuit. Now you must choose once again.
You cannot know what awaits at the end of either path. There will only be the consequences of your choice—and the responsibility that comes with it.
Grade: Supreme Peak
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Mission: Choose a direction to travel (Incomplete)
Reward: Linked Quest
???
Failure: ???

Goddamn it. What is this now?

A holographic window filled the air before me. At the same time, a memory from barely a day ago flashed through my mind.

"Looks like they really went at it."

"By the time I received the report, everything was already over. All that remained at the Western Yao Estate was blood and corpses. And… those things."

I remembered everything from that day clearly. It was the only clue left behind by Heugung and Yohi, the two Great Chieftains who had vanished without a trace.

Heugung left a severed wrist, and Yohi…

That was right. She had left a scent pouch.

But I had only just arrived at the Western Yao Estate, and I'd focused on Heugung's wrist instead. The marks on the severed end might tell me something about his opponent's martial arts and how skilled they were.

Yohi's scent pouch didn't seem nearly as important.

It wasn't even intact. The silk had a long tear in it, and the scent seemed to have escaped, leaving the pouch almost odorless.

I hadn't known. With everything that happened afterward, none of us had time to give it another thought.

It was the most important clue at the Western Yao Estate: tracking scent Yohi had left so someone could find her.

The scent hadn't escaped. It was like that from the start.

As far as I knew, tracking scent was an unusual object made for following someone's trail, just as its name suggested.

It wasn't something you came across often, but that didn't mean no one used it. Among the orthodox faction, there were the Lower District Sect and the Beggars' Sect, for example.

And the fact that I had spent quite a lot of time with the Successor Beggar of the Beggars' Sect—a man from an organization of truly enormous scale—and exchanged all kinds of stories with him had been an unexpected stroke of luck.

"Tracking scent, huh? It works, but it's incredibly rare. The method of making it is a closely guarded secret, and only a handful of people in Murim can produce it."

"Like the Ten-Thousand-Li[2925] Tracking Scent?"

"The Ten-Thousand-Li[2926] Tracking Scent? Hm. I suppose even you've picked up a thing or two."

"About five of your teeth are going to fall out in a minute. Want me to pick those up for you, too?"

"Ah. Well…"

"Go on. Run your mouth some more."

[2925] A Chinese li is a traditional unit of distance, about 500 m (0.311 mi).

[2926] A Chinese li is a traditional unit of distance, about 500 m (0.311 mi).

“Ahem. The truth is, I’ve never seen the Ten-Thousand-Li[2927] Tracking Scent myself. Ten thousand li[2928] sounds impressive, but would any scent really last over a journey that long?”

“What? So it was a scam after all?”

“Not necessarily. The Ten-Thousand-Li[2929] Tracking Scent you’ve heard rumors about aside, Murim uses quite a few kinds of tracking scent. The finest is commonly called the Thousand-Li[2930] Tracking Scent.”

“The Thousand-Li[2931] Tracking Scent?”

“It has several distinguishing features. First, the manufacturing process is disgustingly difficult. Second, the manufacturing cost is disgustingly high. Third, acquiring the Thousand-Li[2932] Tracking Scent made that way requires a disgustingly large amount of gold.”

“No mistaking you for a fucking beggar. You can’t get through a sentence without working ‘filthy’ in somewhere.”

“However filthy I am, your character is… Sorry. That was out of line. Anyway, tracking scent of that quality is worth dozens of times its weight in gold. Of course, it works just as well as you’d expect.”

“For example?”

“Unlike the unverified Ten-Thousand-Li[2933] Tracking Scent, its scent really does last for about a thousand li[2934]. And it’s almost odorless—so faint that even some beasts with extraordinarily keen noses can’t detect it. Humans certainly can’t.”

“Then couldn’t you just put tracking scent on someone and call it a day?”

“The trade-off is that tracking scent lasts for seven days and nights at most. If the target burns their clothes or fully immerses themselves in water, for example, the duration will be shortened even if the scent doesn’t disappear entirely.”

“Even so, you’d have to know you’d been marked with tracking scent before you could try any of that. You said that even most beasts can’t smell it properly.”

“True. But spiritual creatures are different.”

“Ah.”

“So there are only two ways to follow a target marked with tracking scent. You need either someone trained in advanced tracking arts or a spiritual creature with a nose keen enough to smell it.”

Remembering that conversation with Gung Gibang, I had to admit he’d been right about all of it.

[2927] A Chinese li is a traditional unit of distance, about 500 m (0.311 mi).
[2928] A Chinese li is a traditional unit of distance, about 500 m (0.311 mi).
[2929] A Chinese li is a traditional unit of distance, about 500 m (0.311 mi).
[2930] A Chinese li is a traditional unit of distance, about 500 m (0.311 mi).
[2931] A Chinese li is a traditional unit of distance, about 500 m (0.311 mi).
[2932] A Chinese li is a traditional unit of distance, about 500 m (0.311 mi).
[2933] A Chinese li is a traditional unit of distance, about 500 m (0.311 mi).
[2934] A Chinese li is a traditional unit of distance, about 500 m (0.311 mi).

Grrr. Sniff, sniff.

A damp nose pressed against my palm, twitching with every sniff. I looked down at the White Tiger licking my fingers. Its rough tongue stung a little.

"…Right. You're here."

A spiritual creature capable of smelling tracking scent. Just as Gung Gibang had said.

This White Tiger—Muyaho—was even a spiritual creature intelligent enough to understand and communicate with humans from a young age.

The intelligence of a spiritual creature, and senses sharper than any ordinary beast's.

Looking back, the nearly odorless scent pouch had probably contained Thousand-Li[2935] Tracking Scent: the finest kind, said to last seven days and nights as long as the target stayed within a thousand li[2936], barring unusual circumstances.

The two other tigers, standing there waiting blankly while Muyaho sniffed my hand, made the difference plain enough.

Grrr. Grrr.

Muyaho gave a low growl, as if asking me which way to go. His great snow-white head kept turning between two directions.

One was northwest, where the reconnaissance squad had gone.

The other—

…Southeast.

Crack.

I'd clenched my fist without realizing it. It trembled. Taishan watched me, blinking his huge eyes.

"Pavilion Master. What's wrong?"

It's nothing. Nothing's wrong, so let's just keep going.

My lips parted, but no words came out.

Fuck.

The curse I couldn't bring myself to say hung in my mouth.

There was no reason to hesitate. Our route was already set, and the beasts were faster than I'd expected. Even if the net over heaven and earth went up right after dawn, in my current condition I thought I could find a way out of Nanman.

So why was I hesitating?

What happens if I leave Nanman with them now? What comes after that?

I already knew the answer. Maybe I'd known since the moment I climbed onto the White Tiger's back.

Even if I come back… I'll be too late.

[2935] A Chinese li is a traditional unit of distance, about 500 m (0.311 mi).

[2936] A Chinese li is a traditional unit of distance, about 500 m (0.311 mi).

Shaking off our pursuers and breaking through Baeksang's net over heaven and earth would take days, even if we went as fast as we could. Add the journey back, and it would be seven days and nights.

Would the people who had set out to rescue us still be alive by then?

No. If this incident had even put the Beast Miao King in danger, would Dark Heaven have any reason to hesitate before carrying out its sinister scheme?

They'll die. Dozens. Hundreds. Maybe even thousands of people.

I blinked slowly. Eyes closed or open, the world was still dark. There was no sign of dawn.

Fuck. It was like this when I first got to boot camp.

The sudden thought made me let out a hollow laugh.

Thinking back, boot camp might have been the easiest time of all. Back then, I could fuck up as badly as I liked and still be forgiven. Things had changed.

I'd come close to death more times than I could count. I'd survived after leaving dying comrades behind. I'd shut myself in my room for days and bawled like an idiot, swearing I'd never lose my people again.

Then one day, I gained the System. When I came to my senses and looked around, I found myself with a great deal to be responsible for.

Everything happening in the world felt like it was my fault, and I pitied the innocent people losing their lives in the process.

Each time, I thought the same thing.

What if I'd been there?

Now all I could do was laugh at myself. Those thoughts felt like a sham—like I'd been playing dress-up, trying to look like a hero.

That was right.

I wasn't a heroic martial artist. I wasn't the hero of some superhero movie.

But today, the people who had watched me flee until the very end were true heroic martial artists—true heroes.

"No need to thank us."

Of course. Nanman was only repaying the debt it owed you.

"My hyung[2937] was on Ailao Mountain. Thanks to you, I'll get to see him again."

"Please look after the Young Palace Lord."

Dozens of faces brushed through the darkness. Some belonged to young men, others to graying middle-aged men.

How skilled were they? If I set my mind to it, I could bring every one of them down within moments.

That only made what they'd done more remarkable. They hadn't stayed to win. They'd stayed to die.

[2937] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for his older brother or a close older male.

Even if it was an egg striking a stone, they wouldn't retreat. They would hurl their bodies against the solid rock, even if they were ultimately smashed to pieces.

Maybe that's happening right now.

And I… had left them behind. I'd sensed what awaited them, yet I'd gone anyway, clinging to an empty promise that I would return.

Haa.

The air had been muggy a moment ago. Now a deep breath sent a white cloud from my mouth.

Nanman really was a fucking awful place. Just like my mood.

I stared silently at the holographic window. Then I spoke.

"Taishan."

"Hm?"

"From now on…"

At what I said next, Taishan's eyes widened.

The old man opened his eyes without warning.

How long had he been unconscious? His joints ached, and he was tied to the back of a huge beast that bounced beneath him without pause.

A tiger?

His gaze darted around. Namho realized Yayul Mok's plan had succeeded. Then he noticed something strange.

"…Why? Why isn't that bastard here?"

At the old man's voice, filled with confusion, Taishan turned his head.

"Namho. You awake?"

Namho didn't answer. A terrible feeling pressed against his chest.

"Where is he?"

"…Namho."

"Where is he? Where's Jin Taekyung, that bastard?"

The eastern sky was beginning to brighten, but Taishan's expression darkened.

Namho knew then that his fear hadn't been unfounded.

Chapter 672

Whoosh, whoosh, whoosh!

The fierce wind rippled the White Tiger's snowy fur. Gripping Muyaho by the scruff of his neck, I watched the scenery race past.

Thick undergrowth filled the forest, and trees towered over it like giants. A snake hiding between moss-covered rocks glared at us with bright yellow eyes, while a leopard lying flat in the grass and searching for prey spotted the White Tiger and slowly began backing away.

Above it all, the sky was growing brighter.

Already?

I muttered to myself, then realized how much time had passed. We'd escaped the underground prison just after midnight. By my rough calculation, we'd been running nonstop for at least three shichen.[2938]

Grrr.

Perhaps that was why the breathing of the White Tiger carrying me—Muyaho—was much rougher than before, and fatigue could be felt in every step he took.

Can't blame him.

After all my time in Murim, I could say this with confidence: even a Peak Master who knew a movement technique would get varicose veins from running full speed through this godforsaken place for three shichen.[2939]

And Muyaho was enormous, even for a tiger. Crossing terrain so rugged that Kim Jeong-ho[2940] would have given up on mapmaking must have drained his stamina and worn down his muscles. On top of that, he had me to carry, and I was hardly small.

I wasn't a veterinarian, but I could tell what condition he was in with my eyes closed.

Only a spiritual creature like him could have lasted this long.

His physical abilities were exceptional, even by the standards of Nanman's renowned spiritual creatures. But if we kept going like this, he wouldn't have any strength left when it mattered.

I stroked his neck and whispered, "Let's stop and rest somewhere nearby."

—Grrr.

He understood and gave a small nod.

[2938] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; three shichen is about six hours.
[2939] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; three shichen is about six hours.
[2940] Kim Jeong-ho was a nineteenth-century Korean cartographer known for his detailed maps of Korea.

As luck would have it, I could hear running water not far away. We slowed down and soon found a small stream, along with a few animals that had come out early to drink.

Squeal?

Wild boars. Excellent.

I acted on the thought the moment it occurred to me.

Open Inventory. Summon.

I'd stuffed so many things into my Inventory while trying to survive that I was practically a walking armory. I pulled out a cheap iron spear I couldn't even remember storing and hurled it.

Two large boars dropped before they could make a sound.

Whoosh—thunk!

Squeeeeeal!

They must have been the piglets' parents. Watching the little ones flee, squealing as they ran, made my heart sink.

"Hoo."

—Grrr.

Muyaho nodded solemnly. I went on, looking mournful.

"The young ones have more tender meat. I should've caught them first."

—…Grr?

What, you little punk?

Ignoring the look he gave me, as if he couldn't believe I was human, I skinned the boars and skewered them on the spear.

Fwoosh. Crackle.

I used Scorching Yang Qi to start a campfire. As smoke curled upward and the meat began to cook, a short laugh escaped me.

There was no particular reason. Even I had to admit that what I was doing was absurd.

I've made an enemy of all Nanman, and here I am throwing a barbecue party.

I knew it was insane. Turning back along the southeastern route toward the heart of Nanman had been insane to begin with.

But every time I thought it through, I came to the same conclusion. Once I'd decided to follow Yohi's tracking scent, this was the best thing I could do. It was why I'd gone so far as to light a fire barely a hundred li[2941] from the Outer Palace.

The more attention I draw here, the better the others' chances of surviving.

[2941] This uses the Chinese li, approximately 500 m (0.311 mi); a hundred li is about 50 km (31 mi).

Before leaving, I'd urged Taishan again and again: run without looking back. Persuade the chieftains of the reconnaissance squad's tribes through Yayul Mok, then use the swift ships of the Water Dragon Stronghold to escape Nanman.

Unlike his usual self, Taishan had fallen silent for a long while. Then he'd spoken.

"Pavilion Master."

"What?"

"Taishan will go too. Taishan can't let Pavilion Master go alone."

Maybe it was because it had been dawn, or maybe because his words had been so unexpected. For that moment, at least, I think I had been rather sentimental too.

But moved as I was, I knew the truth: if even one of them came with me, neither group would be safe.

"Wait with the others. I'll be back soon."

"When? How many nights does Taishan have to wait?"

"Who knows? Ten nights or so?"

"Taishan doesn't like that. Ten nights is too long."

"Then five."

"Good. Promise?"

"Yeah. Promise."

And I'd left them with a promise I wasn't sure I could keep.

Five nights.

Could I make it back by then? No—could I make it back at all? I honestly didn't know.

The Logout function was still blocked, even after my escape from the underground prison. By now, countless Nanman people who had become my enemies were probably closing in from every direction.

Maybe…

Rustle.

Yes. Even now.

—Grrr.

Muyaho had been drooling over the browning meat, but now a low growl rose from his throat. I calmed him as he bristled at the intruders and sharpened my senses.

New information flowed in through my heightened five senses.

About fifty. I can't tell which tribe they're from yet, but they're all warriors… and they have no beasts with them. Did they leave the beasts behind so they wouldn't be spotted?

A truckload of beasts wouldn't have changed the outcome, but their absence did make things easier.

Once I had the lay of things, I slowly turned the spear over the fire.

Sizzle.

Beyond the appetizing sound of roasting meat, the intruders' hushed conversation reached my ears.

"That's him. He has the White Tiger Yayul Mok prized so much. It has to be."

"I'm not sure. I can only see his back from here. Shouldn't we turn around and ask for reinforcements?"

"Pathetic. Heaven has handed us an opportunity, and you want to give the glory to another tribe? We've come this far, and you're still talking like a coward?"

"B-but, hyung.[2942] Even if that man really is the Han Chinese we know about, how are we supposed to deal with a monster like him?"

"Even so, he's still just a human made of flesh and blood. Judging by the fact that he's cooking meat here dressed like a beggar, he must have been separated from the others and lost his mind. If we capture him here, we'll gain not only ten thousand gold, but our father might even become the new Great Chieftain."

Hm. So that's it.

I listened a moment longer, brushed off my backside, and stood. As I turned, I asked, "Really? Do I look that bad?"

"…!"

"…!"

Even from more than thirty zhang[2943] away, I could feel it: the trembling air and the many emotions wrapping around the enemies who had been approaching as stealthily as possible.

Shock. Astonishment. And…

"Attack!"

A rash decision born of stupidity and a vain thirst for glory.

They didn't know that my clothes were the only thing worse for wear. My body was in peak condition, and I was already hurtling toward them.

Whoooosh!

My body surged forward like a streak of light. Wind whipped up like a gale, and the thick grass burst apart.

Through the leaves shattering and scattering in every direction, I saw eyes filled with terror.

"What's everyone doing? Aren't you going to finish drawing your weapons?"

Despite my helpful advice, their hands froze around weapons that weren't even halfway out. The man in front of them was no different.

"Y-you…"

[2942] Hyung is a Korean term a male speaker uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

[2943] A zhang is a traditional Chinese length of approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft); thirty zhang is about 91 m (300 ft).

I feel like I've seen this face somewhere.

It didn't matter right now.

"Why aren't you attacking?"

"W-what?"

"You said to attack. You came all the way here, and you're not going to?"

"Th-that's…"

"You won't? Then I will."

I tossed out a single, quiet word.

"Attack."

A huge shadow fell across the ground.

—Raaaaar!

With a roar, Muyaho leaped over my head and crashed down on the man.

Crack. Craaack!

Someone once said force and oppression were no way to communicate. If you wanted someone to open their mouth, you needed a gentle expression and a kind tone.

They weren't entirely wrong. Ordinary force and oppression wouldn't do it. You needed fucking merciless force and oppression.

And, as I was reminded yet again, I had a real talent for that.

"What's going on inside the Nanman Beast Palace?"

"You bastard! Just kill me!"

"Fine. Muyaho?"

Crunch!

"Gyaaaah!"

"Good boy. Now spit it out."

Ptooey.

"Urgh. Hic… hiiic."

"Why are you bawling so pathetically? You're a grown-ass man."

"Hic."

"That was your leg this time, but if you keep crying, I'll go for your balls next. Do you understand, you fucking bastard?"

"Ghk. Gnnng…!"

"Good. I'll ask again. What's going on inside the Nanman Beast Palace?"

The interrogation went quickly and smoothly. Of course, my preparations for it had been thorough.

I broke both arms of the men who came at me late, and the legs of those who tried to run away.

After crippling about twenty of them, I gave Muyaho his one-bite chance. They all became as docile as golden retrievers.

Is that about it?

They might have lied about some things, but what they'd told me had enough supporting detail to treat it as true for now. Besides, people tended to get honest when death was staring them in the face.

Especially when their balls were at stake.

Once the questioning was done, I glanced at the man Muyaho had pounced on first. His body was crushed, and he was barely breathing. When he caught me looking at him, he groaned.

So that's where I'd seen him.

He was the spitting image of his father, the tribal chieftain. Not that his father was particularly important to me. On the first day of the Tribal Grand Council and on the day of the tragedy at the Western Yao Estate, he'd been nothing more than a sycophant desperate to get behind Baeksang.

But that was also why I was letting him and the others live.

"Go back and tell them."

At my quiet words, the man's lips moved. His eyes were full of fear.

"T-tell them what?"

"That I'm here. That I'm watching you from somewhere nearby."

"…!"

"Remember everything you heard today. I will."

The man—and the other Nanman people nearby, who had been watching my every move with all their senses alert—shuddered.

They would probably remember this day for the rest of their lives. My expression, my tone, my voice, my actions—and the warning I'd given them during the interrogation, when I learned that the Miao warriors who'd attacked the underground prison the previous night were still alive.

If you touch them, I'll kill every one of you. Maybe not today, but tomorrow. Or next year. Perhaps at the very moment you think everything is over and finally let your guard down.

A threat frightened people when they believed it might come true. And in their eyes, I was more than capable of carrying mine out.

The inheritor of the Fire Gate Clan's legacy. The successor of Jeok Cheongang, the Fire King. An unprecedented monster who had shaken the entire world at only around twenty years of age.

That was enough.

Today I'd carved a fear into their bones that they would never forget. Now it would spread among the Nanman people on Baeksang's side.

Quickly. Farther and farther.

Until no tribe dared harm the Miao warriors.

With Baeksang still there, I couldn't guarantee their safety. But this was the best I could do for them right now.

"Leave at once. Unless you want to die here."

"…!"

"…!"

A little later, from the branch of a giant tree, I watched some fifty pale-faced figures leave the forest. They fled in a panic, as though they'd seen a ghost. I watched until the last of them was gone, then slowly drew up three jiazi[2944] of Scorching Yang Qi.

Fwoosh.

Flames gathered in both my hands.

It was time to light a beacon that would draw the net over heaven and earth toward me. A bright beacon with an entire forest for kindling.

Fwoosh. Whooom!

As I watched the horrifying heat and flames spread in every direction and devour the forest, a thought suddenly occurred to me.

Old Master would curse me out if he saw this.

I let out a quiet laugh and turned away from the blazing forest.

Ahead of me, Muyaho was already running energetically with a half-charred piece of wild boar meat clenched in his mouth.

[2944] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

Chapter 673

For the first time since the Great Faction War, the world had entered a period of upheaval.

It reached the Central Plains, the so-called center of the world, and distant Nanman, thousands of li[2945] away.

“Gasp, pant… Did everyone hear the news?”

“Catch your breath first. What happened this time?”

New rumors spread every day, and the people of Nanman no longer reacted with the shock they had at first.

Or rather, they thought nothing could surprise them anymore.

They had reason to think so. In the past month or so, they had endured one shock after another—more than every incident in Nanman since the end of the Great Faction War combined.

A Miao village massacred by Han Chinese.

The sudden attack of a Thousand-Year Spider from Ailao Mountain, which had been quiet for decades.

And a young Han Chinese man who had not only entered the Inner Palace—a first in the history of the Nanman Beast Palace—but had attended the Tribal Grand Council, where only thirty-two tribal chieftains were permitted to sit.

If it had ended there, perhaps things would have been bearable.

But just three days ago, more than a hundred Yao warriors had been brutally killed at the Western Yao Estate, and two Great Chieftains of immense symbolic importance had gone missing. After that, events began to move with the force of a torrent.

The culprit! The culprit behind the Western Yao Estate incident has been revealed! It was that young Han Chinese man! Jin Taekyung!

Wait. Have you forgotten that Jin Taekyung saved the warriors at Ailao Mountain the day before? Nothing’s been proven yet. We shouldn’t rush to judgment…

Too soon? Ever since those Han Chinese bastards came here, nothing but bad things have happened. There’s no reason to wait any longer!

He’s right!

Only reason could overcome anger, but the voices of those few people were helplessly buried beneath the shouts of many Nanman people whose reason had already gone numb.

Drag the Han Chinese into the street and tear them limb from limb!

Great Chieftain Baeksang! Make sure those bastards are punished!

[2945] A Chinese li is approximately 500 meters (0.311 miles); ten li is about 5 kilometers (3.1 miles).

The music and laughter that filled the streets whenever the Tribal Grand Council convened were gone.

Angry shouts rang out on every side, and two names came up again and again.

Jin Taekyung. And Baeksang.

Their standing differed as much as their origins, ages, and names. To the people of Nanman, that was only natural.

One was an outsider from the distant Central Plains—a criminal who had committed a tragedy that could never be forgiven. The other was the Great Chieftain who led the Bai people, the strongest tribe in this land after the Miao people.

The Nanman people still respected and loved their Palace Lord. His martial prowess was renowned throughout the world, and he was an unpretentious man. But after what had happened at the Western Yao Estate, their trust in him could not help but falter.

After all, it was none other than the Palace Lord, Yayul Cheok, who had brought the Han Chinese responsible for every recent misfortune into the Inner Palace.

Yet even those who had cheered for Great Chieftain Baeksang could not help but become flustered when they heard the new rumors that emerged at daybreak.

“W-What did you say?”

“Did I… Did I hear that wrong?”

Their pupils trembled, and their faces were filled with bewilderment.

Everyone who heard the news could only keep repeating the unbelievable story in their minds, wearing the same expression and the same look in their eyes.

The Palace Lord… tried to harm Great Chieftain Baeksang last night, failed, and then fled?

At first, they all thought it was a ridiculous false rumor. The Palace Lord they knew—the Great Chieftain of the Miao people, Yayul Cheok—was not that kind of person.

Before he was a fine Palace Lord, he was a good man, born in this land and more devoted to Nanman than anyone.

But the news that followed was enough to plunge the beliefs and questions of the Nanman people into an abyss.

“Baeksang is taking over as temporary Palace Lord? What does that mean?”

“I-I don’t know. But the Inner Palace put up a notice. It says just what we heard.”

“That’s absurd! How could it be true?”

“That’s not all. Apparently, the Palace Lord even mobilized the Young Palace Lord and dozens of elite warriors under his command to raid the underground prison and release the culprit, Jin Taekyung, along with the other Han Chinese.”

“…!”

“I can hardly believe it either, but the circumstances are remarkably clear. It’s an undeniable fact that the Palace Lord has been friendly toward the Han Chinese for a long time. And the whereabouts of Jin Taekyung, the Young Palace Lord, and the other Han Chinese are unknown. The Tribal Grand Council was convened last night, and they apparently declared this a betrayal against all of Nanman and issued a general mobilization order.”

“What? A general mobilization order?”

“That’s right. I heard it was decided along with the matter of the temporary Palace Lord. They must intend to hunt down and execute the rebels who have thrown Nanman into chaos. Naturally, the highest-priority targets are the Han Chinese Jin Taekyung and the Palace Lord. No—the former Palace Lord.”

“Former Palace Lord? What are you saying?”

“I don’t know. I’m still trying to make sense of it. But how would ordinary tribespeople like us know what really happened? All we can do is follow the Tribal Grand Council’s decision.”

The notice, bearing the unmistakable seal of the Inner Palace, spread through Nanman in no time. Its people split into three groups.

Those who believed the Beast Miao King had betrayed them. Those who refused to believe it.

And those who made no effort to question it or seek the truth, accepting the new reality as it was presented to them.

Amid the confusion, some fifty warriors returned through the West Gate to the Outer Palace. Every one of them was injured, some worse than others.

They trembled like aspens, terror etched into their faces. In their unsteady eyes lingered the image of the enormous fire they had seen from ten li[2946] away.

“Mon… monster…”

The voice that escaped someone’s lips sounded frozen despite the fierce sunlight pouring down overhead.

It was around noon.

Baeksang studied his reflection in a large mirror.

He was handsome and youthful, with a balanced build that belied his more than seventy years. His clothes were made of pure white fox fur. A stranger might have admired his bearing and taken him for the ruler of a kingdom.

But Baeksang’s gaze remained fixed on his own coldly hardened face.

Have I looked like this all along? For so many years?

[2946] A Chinese li is approximately 500 meters (0.311 miles); ten li is about 5 kilometers (3.1 miles).

He searched the past several decades and could not remember the last time he had laughed from the heart.

All he could do was draw out a memory long covered in dust and look at it once more.

Yes. That was the last time.

The chill in his eyes softened as a particular day came back to him.

They had won a hard-fought battle and been given a few precious days of rest.

The bold boy who had set out after his father, determined to defeat the Demonic Cult, had already grown into a handsome young man. And the girl who had been lively since childhood—and therefore always covered in scrapes and bruises—had grown into a beautiful woman.

The young man was Hwi. The woman was Hyang.[2947]

The two of them were as radiant and fragrant as their names. They were a pair of flowers that had bloomed amid a battlefield overflowing with blood and death. Though they called each other dog-and-monkey enemies despite having grown up together, they would sometimes walk together while avoiding the eyes of others.

They probably never knew that someone had been watching on the night they quietly left the others, who were drunk on victory and wine, to walk together along a hill under faint moonlight.

…You're here again?

…Why are you here again, hyung?[2948]

Why do you think? I'm keeping an eye on Hwi. That wolf might try something with my delicate, beautiful Hyang.

I have to ask—do you honestly believe that?

Of course I'm serious.

Then you know Little Tide Demon died in the battle three days ago.

Little Tide Demon? That bastard who could slap the Heavenly Demon across the face if lust were martial arts?

That's the one.

As a father with a daughter, I'd been meaning to deal with him myself someday. Good riddance. But why bring him up?

That bastard. Hyang killed him.

…

Hwi was fighting him and took a sword wound. Hyang came out of nowhere with a pair of axes—heaven knows where she found them—and split Little Tide Demon's head open.

…

[2947] Hwi (□) means "radiance," and Hyang (□) means "fragrance."

[2948] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

And apparently, that still didn't satisfy her. She crushed the dead bastard's balls, hurled every curse imaginable at him, and hacked his corpse to pieces. In Hwi's words, it looked like an imperial palace chef mincing meat with uncanny skill.

…You're lying. My Hyang would never do that.

Five people saw it besides Hwi. Three of them still can't speak from the shock.

Good. Tell them to keep their mouths shut. Otherwise, I might have to shut them myself… Oh. No.

You sound like a fiend… Gasp.

That day, the sworn brothers crouching far away in the darkness had unintentionally witnessed it.

The sight of the two children they cherished more dearly than their own lives slowly tilting their heads toward each other.

Turn your head. Quick!

Lower your voice, hyung! I've already turned!

Oh, heavens. What did I just see?

What else? Did you leave your eyes in Nanman? They were kissing—mmph. Mmph!

Baeksang, you conniving bastard. You put that wolf of a son up to this, didn't you? Do you want to be Palace Lord that badly?

Mmph! Hah! Me, Palace Lord? What kind of insane nonsense is that? Maybe after you or I die, but not now.

Ah, I see. You'll fulfill your dream through your son. Hyang could be the next Palace Lord, so you'll snatch her up and make her do nothing but housework. Is that it?

You're driving me mad.

Last chance. Admit it.

No! I said no!

Really? Swear to the heavens.

I swear to the heavens!

Fine. I believe you. Then prepare for them to hold their wedding this year.

How many times must I tell you I don't— What? What did you just say?

"Don't 'what' me. Just get ready to marry off those two love-struck youngsters."

…

Why are you just staring at me with that blank expression? You had already figured it out too. Unless you dislike it?

O-Of course I don't. You're right, I'd guessed. But… how do I put it? Huh.

"Then that settles it. No need for a long discussion. If the Western Front stabilizes before winter, let's have them marry and send them back to Nanman. And although the thought makes me feel strange… if they have a child, those two will give up their stubbornness and return willingly, won't they?"

A child. Ha… Haha. Has that much time passed already?

You're younger than I am. Stop acting like an old man. Promise me one thing.

What is it?

That girl Hyang. To me, she is more precious and pitiful than anyone. Because of her worthless father, she lost two older brothers and suffered terribly.

Hyung…

Damn it. What I mean is… Shit.

You can stop. I know what you mean. She's precious to you, and you want us to treat her that way.

…

You have nothing to worry about. Hwi will certainly do that. He'll grow old with her not merely as a woman, but as a companion—and sometimes as a friend.

I suppose I can trust Hwi.

And if you can't trust Hwi, trust Hyang.

What?

You know her temper. If Hwi disappoints her in the slightest, he'll end up like Little Tide Demon. I'd bet—!

Baeksang, you bastard! How dare you think of my Hyang as—!

That last shout had been a mistake.

Hwi and Hyang broke apart in the middle of their shy first kiss, and the two sworn brothers fled as fast as their legs could carry them.

Then, when they reached a quiet stream and were about to hurl a word at each other…

Yes. We laughed. Loud enough to shake the world.

Baeksang could no longer remember what had made them laugh so hard. It could not have been only the sight of each other's panic-stricken faces.

Perhaps they had been happy that the two children who had grown up together would be joined at last—and that they, sworn brothers who had spent their lives side by side, would finally become one family.

Hyang… If she hadn't gone like that. If only…

Everything might have been different.

But Baeksang knew that the thought was nothing more than a futile wish.

That winter, as they waited for a wedding all Nanman would have celebrated, the Western Front failed to stabilize. Ten thousand Demonic Cult troops swept in with the cold wind.

And then… the flower withered.

After Yayul Hyang—the woman who had been as beautiful as a flower and as strong as steel—withered on the battlefield, the light vanished from Baekhwi's face.

That must have been why, during the final battle at the Great Snow Mountain, he had cut down enemy after enemy as though possessed, stepping into ever greater danger.

In the years that followed, Baeksang sometimes wondered whether the boy had seen a single flower blooming somewhere in that narrow ravine.

Was that really what happened?

As always, there was no answer.

Baeksang looked at the mirror, now blurred before him.

No. The whole world looked that way.

Drip. Drip.

Not a cloud marked the clear sky. Yet raindrops fell from somewhere.

And then, in the next moment, someone's voice pierced Baeksang's ears.

"Oh my. Should I come back later?"

Baeksang turned slowly. In his bloodshot eyes, he saw a woman who had appeared like a ghost.

"…Southern Heaven Demon Empress."

At Baeksang's words, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress smiled broadly. It was a smile as radiant as a flower and as wicked as a viper.

Chapter 674

Things happened in this world that defied common sense.

The woman reflected in Baeksang's bloodshot eyes at this very moment was one of them.

"…Southern Heaven Demon Empress."

His voice rang softly through the room. They were alone.

The woman—the Southern Heaven Demon Empress—smiled broadly.

"It's been a while, Great Chieftain Baeksang."

Her smile was impossibly beautiful—and more bewitching still. Baeksang's heart sank.

How?

Getting past the tight security was no great surprise. But he had reached the Supreme Peak realm, and he hadn't sensed her approach at all.

He had first learned of the Southern Heaven Demon Empress more than thirty years ago. Much had changed since the days when grief over his child's death had driven him half-mad. Yet the gulf between him and that demoness had not narrowed in the slightest. The realization weighed on him.

"…What brings you here?"

At his stiff question, she put on a sulky face.

"Why? Aren't you happy to see me?"

There was plenty of mischief in her voice, but Baeksang could not afford to lower his guard around her for an instant. He forced himself to remain calm.

"I simply didn't expect you to come in person. Normally, you would have sent a messenger or left me a secret message."

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress—or rather, Dark Heaven—had always done things that way. Baeksang was used to meeting black-clad figures whose names and faces were concealed, or finding messages they had left in unexpected places.

And he had never been able to refuse them.

"We agreed to meet again in four days. I would have come to you then. There was no need for you to make the trip."

He had followed that arrangement for decades. On the first day of every month, he exchanged missives with Dark Heaven between Insi[2949] and the hour of the Rabbit.[2950] Once every three months, he went to them alone, without telling anyone.

"Three days from now? Oh my, has it been that long already?"

[2949] Insi is a traditional time period from 3 to 5 a.m.

[2950] The hour of the Rabbit is a traditional time period from 5 to 7 a.m.

She widened her eyes as if she had completely forgotten. Baeksang felt his fist clench.

“You…”

“I’m joking. You’re getting worked up? That’s not like you. Our Great Chieftain has a surprisingly cute side.”

“…!”

“I came for a few reasons. So much has happened lately, and now that you’re finally the ruler of Nanman, I wanted to congratulate you in person. But…”

She covered her mouth and laughed.

“Who would have thought I’d see the cold, calculating Great Chieftain Baeksang in tears? Or should I say, the new Palace Lord?”

The corners of her mouth were lifted, but her gaze had sunk deep. Baeksang felt a chill in his heart before he spoke.

“It was nothing. The mirror brought back an old memory, that’s all.”

“Oh, because you thought of the son who looked exactly like you in the mirror?”

“…I’d rather leave that subject alone. What matters now is the future, not the past.”

“Well, if that’s what our Palace Lord wants. A good attitude.”

She smiled and went on.

“Though I am a little disappointed. I thought my gift had moved you to tears.”

“I’m grateful for the mirror,” Baeksang said stiffly. “I’ve been putting it to good use.”

“Never mind. I went to some trouble to find it as a gift for your appointment as Palace Lord, and now you’re thanking me only because I brought it up.”

She shot him a sidelong glance, then walked slowly to the window. From the Palace Lord’s Hall atop the highest hill in the Inner Palace, she could see countless pavilions and houses below.

“Wow. What a view. I suppose the Palace Lord’s residence ought to be special. You’ll get to see this every day now, won’t you?”

“I’m only the temporary Palace Lord.”

“Temporary… You don’t really believe that, do you?”

“…”

“My dear Palace Lord. Why pretend when you know perfectly well?”

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress gave the silent Baeksang a smile with her eyes before turning her gaze toward the view outside.

Sunlight streamed down. A cool breeze blew in from somewhere, and not a cloud marred the blue sky. The first fine day she had seen in some time lifted her spirits.

How could it not? Soon she could stain that clear sky with a darkness that would leave not a single ray of light.

Whoooosh.

Wind poured through the open window, setting her silky hair rippling. She closed her eyes and smiled. Moments later, she spoke.

“You know the great undertaking is entering its final stage, don’t you?”

“…!”

Her quiet voice made Baeksang’s eyelids tremble. Decades of memories flashed before him, along with one person’s face.

“Of course… I do.”

“Everything is going smoothly. Apart from a few minor problems.”

Baeksang could guess what she meant. The two names she spoke next confirmed it.

“The Beast Miao King. And Jin Taekyung.”

Resting her chin on one hand, she watched the Nanman warriors filing in below.

“Honestly, they’re more than minor problems. One is a Supreme Peak master powerful enough to stand among the Ten Kings. And the other is—yes—that Jin Taekyung.”

Baeksang watched her back. What he had dreaded was finally here. It was probably why she had shown herself after staying out of sight for so long.

“I’m sorry.”

“Sorry? For what?”

“How could I not be? It was clearly my mistake.”

“Hmm.”

She hummed softly, then said, “Yes. But it was our mistake too. I never expected the Beast Miao King to make a move like that. And…”

She glanced over her shoulder at Baeksang’s left arm. Beneath his robe of snow-white fox fur, the sleeve was empty now. It had not been the night before.

“I know our new Palace Lord did make an effort.”

The bleeding had stopped, but the pain from where Force had severed his arm would not fade so quickly. Baeksang bore a fresh throb of it as he answered.

“I couldn’t defeat him. I brought in every soldier waiting nearby, but he broke through the encirclement.”

“He may be the least of the Ten Kings, but he’s still one of them. Then again, perhaps what saved him was… that last bit of affection you still feel for your sworn brother.”

“That…”

“Wasn’t it? Can you deny it outright?”

Baeksang was silent for a moment.

“Perhaps. Yes, perhaps it was. At the very least, I might have been able to buy enough time to pursue him.”

"Do you understand what you're admitting?"

"Of course. But I can say one thing with certainty: it will never happen again."

She studied his dark eyes, then let out a light sigh.

"Phew. What a relief."

"What is?"

"That you told me the truth. If you'd refused to admit it, I was going to tear you limb from limb and kill you before long."

"…!"

"I truly am relieved. We haven't seen each other often, but I've grown rather fond of you, Palace Lord."

She gave him a shy smile, like a young girl.

"You know how, when you see a little ant fall into the water and struggle to stay alive, you find yourself rooting for it? Oh, I don't mean that you're an ant. I'm just not very good with words."

Baeksang felt the blood in his body turn cold. The fear pressing down on him swallowed even his shame and humiliation.

It reminded him how dangerous this woman truly was. To Dark Heaven, he was an easily controlled puppet, an animal on a leash—or something less.

But…

This is the path I chose.

That was the cold truth. Long ago, he had taken the hand the Southern Heaven Demon Empress—Dark Heaven—offered him. In return, he had received hope.

That hope had lifted him from the grief of losing his child and given him a reason to go on living. He could not bring this path to an end himself.

He had climbed onto a tiger's back. All he could do was ride it onward with all his strength.

Thud.

No one in Nanman would have believed the sight, but it was happening in the Palace Lord's Hall. The new Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace, ruler of all that vast land, had dropped to one knee before a woman who seemed more beautiful than anything in the world.

"Please give me your orders, Demon Empress."

She looked down at him and smiled languidly in the sunlight from the window.

"This is why I like you."

She reached toward the open window, as though she meant to seize the Nanman warriors still pouring in under the new Palace Lord's general mobilization order—and the blue sky above them.

"Three days. Find the Beast Miao King and eliminate him within three days. As for Jin Taekyung…"

Or perhaps she meant to turn it all to darkness at a stroke.

"We'll deal with him."

With the great undertaking already nearing its end, she had no doubt: the path opened through Nanman would become a bridgehead into the Central Plains. And at the end of that path awaited the return of the omnipotent Lord of Heaven, ruler of all creation.

I'll stake Hyuk Mujin's balls on it.

That was probably a signal fire unlike any in Nanman's history. Maybe even Murim's.

Fwoosh. WHOOOM!

Two days had passed since I left the others in Taishan's care and headed south. I was setting my seventh mountain on fire.

Oh, the pasture too, of course.

"Wait. Is this the seventh or the eighth?"

Grrrr.

"Right. That's not important."

I ignored the White Tiger's annoyed look. Blood and soot had dirtied its once-white fur.

The blood wasn't its own. After we'd driven off pursuit squads half a dozen times, a little mess was unavoidable.

Soon, though, I wouldn't hear Muyaho complaining anymore. No—neither of us would have the attention to spare for anything like that.

Step.

The White Tiger planted a huge forepaw in the mud. It had been running like the wind until now, so when it stared into the black forest and let out a low cry, that could mean only one thing.

Yes.

"It's here."

I muttered while gazing at the mountain shrouded in darkness.

Chapter 675

I'd thought of this place from the beginning, but I still hadn't believed it would be here. Nanman was vast, and I was a Korean who didn't even know the geography of the Central Plains properly.

In fact, of all the martial artists in the world, there probably wasn't another hybrid quite like me.

An outsider in the Central Plains, for all intents and purposes. And undeniably an outsider in Nanman.

How was someone like me supposed to know exactly where we were headed, or where we would stop?

Besides, Muyaho was a spiritual creature that understood human speech, not one that could speak it.

So when the White Tiger's pace finally slowed, I realized where we were.

Looks like "no way" really is going to get someone killed. Fuck.

The mountain looked ominous even from a distance.

Ailao Mountain was just as it had been when I left it a few days ago: dark and chilly, with a smell of blood that seemed to drift from beyond the thick fog.

In short, it was the kind of place that made me feel fucking awful every time I came here.

As far as Ailao Mountain was concerned, they ought to invent a character for "dick" and write its name with that instead of the character for "mountain."

"…Is it really here?"

- Grrr.

"You know I'll chop your leg off if you're lying, right?"

- Grrrr!

"Ah. Okay."

Damn. Guess it really was.

I gently scratched between the White Tiger's brows to soothe its irritation and looked around.

A wolf howled now and then. Each time, mountain birds took flight with a flutter. Those were the only sounds I heard.

Yeah. At least as far as sound goes.

I checked the Quest window.

The linked Quest that had begun automatically when Muyaho and I split off from the group was short and simple for a Quest with a Grade as high as Supreme Peak.

SYSTEM

Quest
I Can See Your Tracking Scent
You chose to follow the tracking scent.
At the end of the road you are traveling now, may you find what you seek.
Grade: Supreme Peak
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Mission: Find Yohi (Incomplete)
Reward: ???
Failure: ???

Find Yohi, huh? Of course I had to succeed.

Honestly, though, it didn't matter to me whether I found Yohi or Heugung.

Quest or no Quest, I had to do this. Those two were among my best chances of thwarting the Southern Heaven Demon Empress and Baeksang's plans.

From what I've learned, no one knows where the Beast Miao King is, and the friendly forces inside the Nanman Beast Palace have effectively lost their power. With so little time left, the best move is to rescue the two Great Chieftains and take them to the Inner Palace.

Did you think I'd made Muyaho run like hell while I sat comfortably on its back enjoying the scenery? I'd thought this through on the way here.

After what happened at the Western Yao Estate, the Nanman Beast Palace considered me the greatest fucking bastard under heaven. If I charged in alone, all that awaited me were spears and blades.

But what if Heugung and Yohi—the very people who'd been abducted—came back alive with me?

That would turn the whole board around. No question.

Words carried different weight depending on who spoke them.

If Great Chieftains from the four tribes came forward to prove my innocence and reveal the truth behind the tragedy, everything happening in Nanman would take a new turn.

That was why I had to complete this Quest, one way or another. It was a brilliant move that could overturn the situation in a single stroke.

Of course…

"Can't make a brilliant move without a Go stone to play. And getting one won't be easy."

I muttered the words like a sigh. Then, sensing people closing in around me from every direction, I added, "So I think I'll catch a few of you instead of Go stones to start with… Who wants to die first?"

"…!"

As expected, no one answered. I launched myself forward without hesitation.

Whoosh. Fwoooosh!

Flamefire Path.

Flames rose with my footsteps and became a meteor's tail, cleaving the darkness.

There were more enemies here than I'd encountered at any point since I began following the tracking scent.

I could see roughly three hundred of them, and there were probably just as many —or more—lying in wait behind the dense grass.

But…

That's all?

I stood among the predators at the top of Murim's vast food chain. The enemies surrounding me were nothing more than a helpless flock of sheep.

I could subdue them without sinking my teeth into their necks.

Whoosh, fwoooosh!

I shot forward amid flames that devoured the darkness. Screams erupted from the enemies who realized what was happening half a beat too late.

"H-He's spotted us!"

"Stop him! He's com—!"

Kwaaaang!

The shout vanished beneath a thunderous blast.

The ground overturned, and enormous trees tore free by their roots. Dozens of enemies flew in every direction at once, as if they'd agreed to do it together.

"Guh!"

"Aaargh!"

Their tightly packed formation had collapsed. Screams filled the gaps.

As I walked out, brushing dirt from my shoulder, someone shouted, "Put the beasts in front! Attack him from the rear!"

"Oh, you animal-abusing bastard."

That aside, it wasn't a bad choice.

Nanman's way of fighting with beasts had earned its reputation. It was one reason Nanman warriors, despite being individually less skilled than martial artists from the Central Plains, had distinguished themselves in the Great Faction War.

Of course, that only worked when the situation called for it.

Grrrrrrr!

The moment a creature far larger than an ordinary brown bear charged at me with a roar—

Shh-shh-shhik!

A pale blur accompanied by a sharp whistle of displaced air flashed past my side and struck the alpha brown bear in the mouth.

Crack! Crunch!

Drops of blood scattered through the air, and the bear toppled forward.

With a single kitty-paw punch, Muyaho had subdued a beast that might have ranked among the three strongest here. Its eyes gleamed.

Whooosh!

I couldn't see it, but I could feel it: a chill spreading in every direction.

This is…

Fear.

The White Tiger had been born beyond the bounds of an ordinary beast. As its overwhelming presence bore down on the area, the beasts' growls vanished, and their bristling tails drooped toward the ground.

Another strange gleam passed through Muyaho's moonlit blue-white eyes.

- GRAAAAAAWR!

The explosive roar made the air tremble.

The wind surged. Grass and flowers bent low. Pupils dilating, the beasts huddled down and backed away.

And they weren't the only ones affected.

"Gasp."

"M-My body…"

Muyaho's aura fell short of the Water God Dragon's, or that of some of the monsters I'd encountered. But it was enough to freeze some of the less accomplished martial artists among our enemies.

Which meant, of course, that others could still move.

"You idiots! What are you doing?!"

I heard panic and fury in the shout.

I spotted a middle-aged man wearing a leopard hide well behind the others and shot toward him like a spear.

Shaaak! Crack!

"Aaargh!"

"M-Monster!"

That was right. Here and now, I was the only monster.

Someone they couldn't stop. Someone they'd imagined in their heads but never once thought they would have to face as an enemy.

Even if every person here stood in my way, I had the strength to keep going.

“Protect the Chieftain!”

“Stop him by any means necessary—guh!”

I tapped an opponent’s chest with my palm.

Scorching Yang Qi seeped into his body and disrupted the flow of his qi. Blood burst from his mouth like a fountain, and he crumpled.

“You bastard! How dare—!”

Whoosh! Tap.

Was the man I’d just taken down a friend of his?

He had plenty of momentum, but not enough skill.

I caught his sword between two fingers, putting Empty-Hand Seizes the Blade into practice, then shrugged at the face beyond its trembling blade.

“He’s not dead. He’ll spend about a month in bed shitting blood, though.”

“…!”

“Since you’re at it, you can shit beside him.”

Boom!

His body shot backward, sweeping more than a dozen people along with it.

I walked down the path that had opened before me and spread both hands. The fire dragon coiled in my lower dantian surged through my acupoints and settled in my hands.

Whoosh. Ssssss.

Terrible heat spread in every direction.

Water evaporated from the mud before my feet could touch it. Blue-white flames shone in the eyes of the elite warriors about to charge me.

“W-Wait…!”

I answered with both palms.

Like the former Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan who had once destroyed the Five Poisons Sect, I unleashed Flame Divine Palm in every direction.

Kwaaaang!

Rumble!

Flames shot through the air, swept over the undergrowth, and set the densely packed trees ablaze.

Beneath that enormous blaze, hundreds of enemies fled screaming through the darkness.

Among them, thankfully, was a middle-aged man in a leopard hide flashy enough to recognize at a glance.

“Move! Get out of my way!”

From the way he was running, he clearly wanted to live.

But no matter how hard he and his guards tried to get out of here, there was a reason the word impossible existed.

"Yeah. I'm afraid I can't get out of your way."

"J-Jin Taekyung!"

"They called you a tribal chieftain, but I wasn't sure at first. I definitely saw you at the Tribal Grand Council, though. So, how've you been?"

Shaaak!

This was why people called sword-carrying bastards ill-mannered. I greeted him warmly, and the first thing he did was swing a weapon at me.

Whoosh, crack!

"Aaargh!"

I dodged the sword with ease and broke his wrist, drawing a scream of pain.

Then I fired Finger Qi at the five guards charging me. Muyaho appeared like the wind a moment later, and the beasts turned tail.

Whoosh. Rumble!

Flames and ash drifted overhead. Huge trees toppled one after another like dominoes. The tribal chieftain's face went deathly pale.

"P-Please, spare me…"

"You're a tribal chieftain. Of course I'll spare you—if you answer my questions properly."

"I-I'll tell you anything you want to know!"

The chieftain I'd captured was my favorite kind of enemy. He valued his own life enough to spill things I hadn't even asked about.

Some of it was useful, too.

"…A general mobilization order?"

The chieftain nodded frantically.

"G-Great Chieftain Baeksang has become temporary Palace Lord, and an army of nearly ten thousand is already stationed in the Inner Palace."

"Go on."

"The Miao people are under strict surveillance and couldn't answer the call, but all of Nanman is on the move, led by the three tribes under Baeksang."

Damn it.

I swallowed the curse.

With the Beast Miao King having fled, it had been inevitable that Baeksang would become the temporary Palace Lord.

But this wasn't a net over heaven and earth cast to catch me. It was a general mobilization order.

No way.

Dread seized me.

Perhaps Dark Heaven's plan was far bigger than any of us had imagined—and far closer to completion.

If I waste even a moment here…

I watched the flames spread rapidly across Ailao Mountain, then launched myself forward.

Into the darkness crouched over Ailao Mountain. Into the flames.

Chapter 676

The fire I'd started with Flame Divine Palm spread from the entrance to Ailao Mountain in the blink of an eye.

Fwoosh. Roooar!

If the Scorching Hell described in Buddhism existed, I imagined it would look something like this.

Ash drifted endlessly through the air, mixing with acrid smoke. A fire demon rolled like a wave, devouring everything in its path.

Crack. Rumble!

The earth shook as massive trees toppled one after another, and mountain birds took flight all at once.

It was the sort of sight that would have made Jeok Cheongang, honorary chairman of the Forest Protection Association, roll his eyes back in horror. Fortunately, there were no beasts in sight, so it looked like the Animal Protection Association wouldn't be getting involved too.

Wild animals must be quick on the uptake. Have they all run away already?

Not that it mattered now.

I didn't want to take the home and lives of some poor family of muntjacs, but stopping Dark Heaven's scheme and saving everyone else's lives mattered more.

If that sense of dread is right…

I had no time to hesitate.

Running at full speed, I spotted a wall of flame blocking the path a little over thirty yards ahead and reached into the air.

Open Inventory. Summon.

Not taking White Flame out when I surrendered at the Western Yao Estate had been the right choice. If they'd confiscated it, I wouldn't have had it when I needed it most.

Shing.

Cool metal filled my hand. Flames flickering all around me reflected off the spearhead, so white it looked almost transparent.

Now.

With the entire area already turning into a sea of fire, I didn't do something stupid like send out Scorching Yang Qi.

What I needed was power and speed—and a single clean, perfect motion.

Whoosh!

The spearhead slashed diagonally down. A violent gust burst from its tip with a short whistle and tore the flames apart.

Fwoosh! Boom!

The explosion opened a path.

I flattened myself against Muyaho's white fur and whispered into the ear of the tiger that had hesitated before the flames.

"Let's go."

• Grrr.

The White Tiger answered with a low growl and shot forward like a beam of light.

The flames rolled after us like waves, close on our heels, but even amid the chaos, Muyaho knew exactly where it was going.

Papat!

The scenery flashed past. Clouds hid the moon high overhead. As we raced on with the fire at our backs, something about the path struck me as familiar.

"Don't tell me…"

A thought flashed through my mind, and I fell silent.

No. Maybe there was no don't tell me about it. This path and the scenery around it should have been unfamiliar. If I recognized them, it could mean only one thing.

The Poisonblood Grounds.

After the Five Poisons Sect, which had once terrorized all of Nanman, was destroyed, Ailao Mountain became known as one of Nanman's forbidden lands.

And the Poisonblood Grounds lay in its deepest, most secluded reaches.

If my guess was right, that was exactly where we were headed. To what might be the most dangerous place in Nanman.

But there should be plenty of troops guarding it by now.

The Nanman Beast Palace wasn't some backwater sect full of riffraff.

When five Thousand-Year Spiders—venomous beasts so rare they were almost unheard of—appeared, and the Poisonblood Grounds emerged after going undiscovered for so long, the Palace had sent a sizable force to root out any surviving remnants of the Five Poisons Sect and whatever dangers remained.

Even if they were trying to hide right under the Palace's nose, they went in there?

I didn't have to wait long for an answer.

• Grrrr…

Muyaho gradually slowed. It bared its teeth at something I couldn't see, and I knew at once that something had happened. Then I caught the smell seeping through the acrid smoke.

Human blood.

I see. So that's how it is.

I looked toward the entrance to the Poisonblood Grounds. It gaped like the maw of a gigantic monster, full of the same unknown dangers I'd sensed on my first visit.

No. Perhaps it was worse now.

Well, if it were easy, it wouldn't be a Supreme Peak-grade Quest.

I'd started to think things were going more smoothly than expected. But like Baeksang—though for a very different reason—I'd come too far to turn back.

If I avoided the danger in front of me, something worse would come rushing up behind me. Just like the flames sweeping through the forest at my back.

Rustle.

I climbed down from Muyaho's back and gently scratched under its chin, where it liked it.

"Looks like this is where we part ways. Unlike last time, you don't have to come back for me."

- Grrr?

"Go back before it gets any later. You can break through the flames and escape. I know you can."

- Grrrr…

Muyaho gave a soft growl and gazed into my eyes.

I could see conflict and fear in the intelligent White Tiger's blue-white eyes. With instincts like its, it must have guessed already.

Getting in would be easy. Getting out would be hard.

It might never see Yayul Mok again.

Yet it couldn't turn away as easily as it had last time. I supposed we'd grown attached to each other along the way.

"I'm not going in there to die. Don't worry about me. Go on—your master's waiting."

I stroked the back of its neck. At last, Muyaho gave a slow nod and sprang forward.

- GRAAAWR!

Whoosh!

Not toward the hill the flames had yet to reach, but straight for the entrance to the Poisonblood Grounds.

"Hey! Hey, you idiot!"

I shouted in surprise, but it was already too late to catch it.

I froze at the unexpected turn of events. With a mighty roar, the White Tiger charged headlong into the pale Poison Mist—then staggered back out.

- Krrk. Cough.

"…Want a poison-warding pearl?"

Muyaho paused, avoided my eyes, and gave a furtive nod.

Muyaho adapted to the Poisonblood Grounds much faster than I'd expected.

As if biting down on the poison-warding pearl weren't enough, it gulped the thing down whole. With nimble reflexes, it dealt with the venomous beasts surging in from every direction and cleared a swamp so wide that even Peak masters who had learned a movement technique would have hesitated to cross it in a single leap.

But the deeper we went, the more cautious its movements and breathing became.

Whooosh…

Poison Mist filled the grounds, making it hard to see. Something brushed through the grass. Water dripped somewhere out of sight. Apart from those occasional sounds, everything was quiet enough to make my skin crawl.

It wasn't this bad even when I came here with the Beast Miao King last time.

I had sensed it from the moment I smelled blood at the entrance, but this was definitely not a good sign.

A thought crossed my mind. Perhaps… No, there was a good chance the Palace warriors sent here a few days ago were already dead.

If they are, that bastard probably did it.

A Supreme Peak master whose name, sobriquet, and face remained unknown. Someone who had drenched the Western Yao Estate in blood and abducted Heugung and Yohi in mere moments was more than capable of it.

It was also highly possible that it wasn't just one bastard, but them.

Dark Heaven.

Even what they'd revealed of their strength so far was terrifying. They had emerged in the wake of the Demonic Cult, and I'd personally faced the Blood Lord and the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

Their martial prowess was such that even now, after growing rapidly through the System, relentless training, and countless life-or-death battles, I couldn't count on beating them.

I haven't fought the Southern Heaven Demon Empress, but I doubt she's any weaker.

No wonder I was tense, heading into enemy territory alone.

When I'd encountered the Blood Lord, Sword Saint Mae Jonghak had been there. And when I'd come closer to death than ever before in my battle with the Western Heaven Demon Lord, Jeok Cheongang had helped me.

But if the Southern Heaven Demon Empress is here…

Would I live to see my companions and family again?

Drip.

A bead of cold sweat I hadn't noticed forming slid down the back of my neck.

Lick.

Something rough enough to sting swept over my skin.

The White Tiger had licked the back of my neck. Now it was pretending nothing had happened. I let out a quiet laugh.

"Telling me not to be nervous?"

• Grrrr.

It was such a small thing, but somehow it put me at ease.

I'd faced death more times than I could count. After coming this far, what was I doing breaking into a cold sweat? If I let myself tense up, I'd be too stiff to fight properly.

Yeah, fuck it. It's not like this is my first time.

I called to mind the no-brakes mentality essential to the successor of the Fire Gate Clan and the heir of the Fire King, then thrust a palm toward the Poison Mist.

Boom!

The sharp sound of displaced air shattered the silence.

Scorching Yang Qi was poison's natural enemy. The fierce heat of Flame Divine Palm surged forward, breaking the thick mist apart and staining the dark Poisonblood Grounds red.

Hssssss!

Strangely shaped venomous beasts scurried away from the light and heat.

The tangled, maze-like paths finally lay exposed. I glared into them, put internal energy behind my voice, and roared.

"Come out, you fucking bastards!"

• GRAAAAAAWR!

How had this happened?

Yohi came to her senses and blinked into darkness so deep she couldn't see an inch in front of her.

"Ah."

Her usually alluring voice was half-hoarse. Her body ached all over, perhaps from lying still for so long.

Then fragments of memory began to return.

"…!"

Her heart lurched. Her body, relaxed for a moment, went rigid as stone.

In Yohi's trembling eyes, memories she couldn't believe were flashing past.

Screams. Corpses. Blood.

And the face of the one person responsible for it all.

She was about to scream when a voice, carefully hushed, came from the darkness.

"Calm yourself, Yohi."

“Gasp…!”

“Don’t be frightened. It’s me.”

Yohi barely managed to swallow her scream and calm her pounding heart.

As her eyes adjusted to the dark, a familiar figure came into view.

“Heugung? Is it really you, big brother Heugung?”

“That’s right. Don’t you remember?”

It took her a moment to piece her memories back together. She recalled Heugung resisting him to the very end.

“I forgot for a moment. But why are you speaking so differently…?”

Heugung had been waiting not far away in the darkness for her to wake. He gave her a bitter smile.

“There were various circumstances. Circumstances I couldn’t easily tell even you.”

His tone was so courteous. Yohi was used to seeing Heugung grin foolishly and call her “little sister”; this side of him felt strange. But it wasn’t what mattered now.

“Where are we? Wh-where is that man?”

“I don’t know either. I woke up here.”

Iron chains bound her body, and her internal energy wouldn’t budge.

Yohi searched the darkness around her in despair. Then came a heavy noise, and faint light poured in.

Chapter 677

Click. Rumble.

The stone gate swung open, spilling light into the darkness.

Heugung and Yohi, whose eyes had grown accustomed to the darkness, instinctively shrank back and groaned. Then a voice bored into their ears.

“Oh-ho. Now that’s a sight worth seeing.”

“…!”

“…!”

“Of course. This is how the barbarians of Nanman ought to look.”

The voice slurred and swayed as though its owner were drunk. Both of them trembled.

Was it because they felt humiliated by the mockery and ridicule in his words?

No. It was because of fear. Because of terror.

That voice…

Yohi recognized it, and her blood seemed to turn cold.

How could she forget the voice of the Fiend who had appeared like a ghost, slaughtered her warriors, and left Heugung with one arm after a single move?

Her mind went blank. Beside her, Heugung whispered as quietly as he could.

“Remember this. You must never open your eyes—”

Boom!

A sharp blast of displaced air sounded, followed by a scream.

Yohi squeezed her eyes shut as he had told her. She could not see him, but it was easy enough to imagine Heugung coughing up dark-red blood from his internal injuries.

“Stop! Please, stop!”

“Cough, cough. Yohi, stay still—”

Boom! Thud.

Another blast of displaced air rang out, and Yohi could no longer endure it. She opened her eyes.

Heugung lay on the floor, his whole body bound. He had vomited what looked like a full doe[2951] of blood. The Fiend stood over him.

“You…”

“I heard you were a clever woman. Seems that was just a rumor.”

The Fiend revealed yellow teeth in a grin as Yohi’s voice slipped between her trembling lips.

[2951] A doe is a traditional Korean unit of volume, roughly 1.8 liters (about 0.48 US gal).

His white hair was nearly as disheveled as a bird's nest, and his eyes were narrow slits. He had hidden his face behind a mask in the Western Yao Estate, but there was no doubt that the old man before her was the same Fiend.

"Why didn't you listen to that fellow? If you hadn't seen this old man's face, you might have lived for another fifteen minutes."

"…!"

"Well, too late now. I'll just have to send you both to the afterlife together."

He shrugged and reached toward her. His arm was unnaturally long for such a small man.

His palm was covered in spots Yohi could not identify. As it drew closer, so did the smell of death.

Yohi knew this was the end. She was about to struggle when—

"That's enough, Black Hand."

The words came through the gap in the half-open stone gate. The old man called Black Hand withdrew his hand and sighed.

"Now I can't even have a little fun without watching myself."

Someone beyond the gate answered.

"Was that directed at me?"

The voice was as cold as eternal snow. Black Hand smacked his lips.

"Of course not. I was talking to myself. Just talking to myself."

"Stop acting like a reckless brat. You haven't forgotten the order given by Her Majesty the Demon Empress, have you?"

Black Hand's face twisted.

"Reckless? I never thought I'd hear that at my age."

"Then act your age. If you do anything rash with the great undertaking so close at hand, I will not forgive you."

"…"

"I'll take your silence as an answer."

Yohi had sensed no one outside the gate, nor could she sense anyone leaving. But when Black Hand muttered a moment later, she knew the speaker was gone.

"Damn old monster."

To Black Hand, it might have been a passing complaint. Yohi had to fight to keep her shock and fear off her face.

There's someone else.

She did not know who had spoken from beyond the gate. But their exchange had told her enough.

That person possesses enough seniority and martial prowess to make even the Fiend before me obey him.

And there was something more.

The Demon Empress. He definitely said the Demon Empress.

Two words that had appeared in the middle of their short conversation.

The Demon Empress.

Yohi knew whom he meant.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

One of Dark Heaven's core figures, said to be unnaturally beautiful and more dangerous still.

Everything concerning the Southern Heaven Demon Empress was treated as top-secret information. But Yohi was one of Nanman's four Great Chieftains, so she was an exception.

More importantly, she had a great tree named Baeksang whom she could trust and rely on.

> "Stand by my side, and I'll give you what you want."

He had said it when they first met, shortly after Yohi became a Great Chieftain. She had asked him:

> "What do you intend to give me?"

> "Vast wealth and influence. And the restoration of the Yao people."

> "Interesting. But I'll refuse."

> "Why?"

> "Even if I accept your offer, Great Chieftain Baeksang, I won't get as much as I want. I'm more ambitious than I look. And I'm not naive enough to make Palace Lord Yayul my enemy over a promise you might not keep."

> "You inherited the Western Yao Estate when you took the position of Great Chieftain. Do you have any trustworthy subordinates there?"

> "Of course. But why are you suddenly asking about that…?"

> “I thought I might send a belated gift to congratulate you. Five carts of gold should be enough to start with.”

> “…!”

> “Go home for now. If you wish to accept my offer, meet me here at this time tomorrow.”

Five carts of gold.

At first, Yohi had hardly believed him. She had never imagined a sum like that. Then she saw the gleaming piles of gold waiting for her, and doubt became impossible.

Baeksang kept his promises. If she stood by him, she might receive more than she had asked for.

Yohi spent a sleepless night and went straight to Baeksang the next day. She thought her judgment had been sound.

No. She had believed it was sound.

Until the Fiend came for her.

“Oh-ho. Look at this little bitch.”

As if his irritation had vanished, Black Hand gave her a hazy, drunken smile.

“Those eyes have gone so wide. You’re starting to understand, aren’t you?”

“I—I…”

“I’ve heard the gist of it. They said things went smoothly for us thanks to you. I’ll give Baeksang that much—for a barbarian, he handled his part rather well.”

Yohi’s pupils shook violently.

She could not believe the situation she was in: not only had she served as a pawn of Dark Heaven, she was now in danger of dying.

“That can’t be. It can’t. I didn’t know…”

“Didn’t know? Or pretended not to?”

“…!”

“I don’t even need to ask. After all, you followed that bastard Baeksang for more than ten years. A woman who had risen to become a Great Chieftain would naturally have had her doubts.”

Yohi could only stare blankly at Black Hand as he chuckled.

Everything he said was true.

It had started small. At the annual Tribal Grand Council, she supported Baeksang’s proposals. She followed a few minor instructions from him. In return, gold and influence came pouring in.

As the years passed, her doubts deepened. A few months ago, she began hearing the name Dark Heaven more and more often, and unease took hold.

But she did nothing. She pushed down her suspicions and refused to look at them.

She had gained too much to expose everything and try to put it right.

The Yao people looked up to the woman who had restored their weakening tribe. Chieftains who had once treated her like a little girl now bowed their heads first.

Even the mighty Beast Miao King and Baeksang would eventually return to the earth as a handful of soil. When that time came, she might even be able to reach for the vacant throne.

She would rise to the position of Palace Lord as a woman and rewrite the history of the Nanman Beast Palace.

That was the ambition Yohi had dwelt on every night. Now it was collapsing around her.

“Even so, you should be grateful to this old man. If the previous Great Chieftain of the Yao people hadn’t died suddenly, how could a stupid woman like you have lived in luxury until now?”

“Th-that can’t mean…”

“He was troublesome. His martial arts were pathetic, but he noticed things. A plague happened to strike the Yao people at just the right time, so he was easy to deal with.”

Black Hand grinned.

“Strange, isn’t it? The Great Chieftain was old, so his death was one thing. But then his three sons, the ones meant to succeed him, died too. The position passed all the way down to a daughter born to him by a concubine in his old age.”

“…!”

“Baeksang’s expression back then was truly something to see. He dragged things out to the bitter end, insisting he would somehow persuade the old man… Still, perhaps the bastard had a strong survival instinct, because he never came charging in. What a shame.”

Yohi stared at him, hollow-eyed. She thought nothing could surprise her now. She thought she had no strength left for it.

She was wrong.

“You did rather well for a woman, though. Setting out a tracking scent with your life at stake—that caution must come from your old father.”

Tracking scent.

At the three words that slipped from Black Hand’s dark lips, Yohi’s delicate body suddenly went rigid.

Black Hand saw the last of her hope break, and his delight spilled over.

“What? Did you think this old man wouldn’t know?”

He chuckled at the despair in her trembling eyes. He had seen it countless times, but the thrill of such moments had never faded.

“Oh, you poor, green little girl. You foolish child.”

A palm mottled with black spots, true to his name, stroked her pale cheek.

“You’re truly beautiful. Beautiful enough for Her Majesty the Demon Empress to covet.”

He opened his mouth like a predator over its prey. The stench from his teeth was foul; every one of them was rotten or grotesquely twisted.

“I’d like to kill you both with one palm strike, but… I’ll restrain myself this time. I have something to do first.”

He left Yohi frozen like an insect caught in a web and stood. After a glance at Heugung, who lay unconscious on the floor, he approached the stone gate.

Then—

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

A tremendous crash shook the area. From far away came a shout.

—Come out, you fucking bastards!

GRAAAAAWR!

It was time to welcome the guest who had come such a long way.

My method of calling out enemies was simple.

I broke things, wrecked things, and smashed them to pieces.

Poison Mist? Venomous beasts? Enemies hiding somewhere, waiting for their chance?

I didn’t care. I rampaged like an eight-ton[2952] truck with a broken steering wheel, smashing everything in the Poisonblood Grounds.

They’d have no choice but to come out.

Before long, it worked.

“What a vigorous young man.”

“I expected the Beast Miao King if someone came looking for us… So you’re Jin Taekyung?”

I followed the voices and slowly turned around.

A short, squat old man swaying as though he were drugged, and a tall old man radiating such cold that I wondered if his hometown was King Sejong Station in Antarctica.

They could hardly have looked less alike. But they had two things in common.

First, they were both Supreme Peak masters.

[2952] Eight metric tons is 8,000 kg (about 17,600 lb).

Second, both were giving off enough killing intent to make it clear they had no intention of letting me leave alive.

I considered the two of them for a moment, then spoke sternly.

“One of you step aside. By the customs of the martial world, I’ll take you on one at a time.”

The answer came immediately.

Whoosh—KWA-BOOM!

Yeah, fuck. I knew that wouldn’t work.

Chapter 678

It was a relief that the Southern Heaven Demon Empress was nowhere in sight. But there were two Supreme Peak masters here.

Damn it. I don't know.

Was I lucky, or was I screwed?

Whoosh—KWA-BOOM!

I dodged a black Fist Force by a hair as it shot toward me like a beam of light. I steadied myself and sighed.

"Ah, the code of the martial world lies in ruins. Whatever happened to the noble custom of yielding three forms to a junior?"

"What?"

The squat old man with disheveled hair blinked at me.

What I'd said must have struck him as so absurd that the fist he'd been about to throw after his opening attack lowered instead.

"The code of the martial world? Yielding three forms to a junior?"

I dropped my voice.

"Indeed."

"Why are you suddenly talking like an old-fashioned gentleman and spouting nonsense? A moment ago, you told one of us bastards to stay out of it while you fought the other."

"'Bastards'? Did I say that?"

"Now you're being polite again. Either talk like you did at first or stick to that formal way of speaking. I can't keep up."

"Forgive me. I'm a junior from a much later generation. I failed to recognize my Seniors and was terribly rude."

I straightened up and even gave them a clasped-fist salute. Confusion filled the disheveled old man's eyes.

"Now you're confusing me. Aren't you Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung, the Fire King's heir?"

"I am."

"Then that means you're one of those orthodox-faction types. Hearing you go on about juniors is enough to make me sick."

"What a hurtful thing to say. Aren't all those who dwell in the martial world fellow martial artists and members of one family? Besides, the Fire Gate Clan has always been a faction between the orthodox and unorthodox sides. We don't discriminate between the orthodox, demonic, or anything else. We all get along."

"And yet you're a pavilion master in the Murim Alliance?"

His eyes had already gone completely off the rails, but at least his brain still seemed to possess a minimum level of function.

A true master, however, kept his composure in any situation. I answered his sharp question without a change of expression.

“I’m actually a double agent.”

“A double agent?”

“Yes.”

“Bullshit.”

“Woof.”

“This is driving me insane.”

“I understand how you feel. But I swear to heaven, every word is true.”

“You little…”

“Did you call for me, Senior?”

The disheveled old man stared blankly at my polite demeanor before opening his mouth with a look of admiration.

“You put your heart into every stitch of that nonsense. In all my years, I’ve never met an orthodox-faction brat like you.”

I scratched the back of my head sheepishly.

“You fucking bastard. Then at least pretend to fall for it out of respect for the effort.”

“You deranged child. I might, if any of it were believable.”

“I’m embarrassed enough already. Shut up, you idiot.”

“…That tongue of yours got awfully rude, awfully fast. I could’ve sworn I was ‘Senior’ just a moment ago.”

“Going senile, old man? You’re a piece of demonic, heterodox trash who should’ve died in the Great Faction War. Who the hell do you think you are, asking to be called Senior?”

The disheveled old man stared at me for a moment as the insults poured out, then chuckled.

“You really are insane. A Disciple worthy of the Fire King.”

“Funny how everyone I meet says that when none of them have ever even seen the Fire King’s face.”

He paused, then let out a short laugh.

“How amusing. Truly amusing. You’ve barely passed twenty, and you dare talk about those days?”

“I don’t think I need to have lived through them to know.”

I shrugged.

“If a bastard like you had met him, you’d be dead. In other words, you were lucky enough to survive by avoiding the Fire King.”

"…!"

"But I think your luck runs out today."

Swish.

I raised White Flame and pointed it at him—no, at both of them. Heat shimmered above the pure-white spearhead, filled with Scorching Yang Qi.

"The Western Yao Estate. Was that your doing?"

Crack.

The smile vanished from the disheveled old man's face. He clenched his fist and stepped forward.

"Yes. This old man did it."

"I thought so. Only a lunatic would kill people that way. What about Heugung and Yohi?"

"We've kept them safe for now. Once Her Majesty the Demon Empress returns, though, those two won't have long to live."

Relief washed over me. He'd confirmed two things himself.

"Thanks for the fucking useful intel. So the Southern Heaven Demon Empress—that fucking bitch—isn't here. And those two are still in one piece."

Only then did he realize he'd said more than he needed to. His face stiffened.

"…That changes nothing. Even if Her Majesty the Demon Empress is absent, you will die by this old man's hand."

"Then why did you both come? Afraid a kid might kick your ass, so you brought your hyung[2953]?"

"You fucking brat…"

Step.

He couldn't contain his anger and took a step forward. It wouldn't have meant much to anyone watching, but that single step was exactly what I needed.

Now.

In the next instant, though, I had to stop the spear I'd been about to swing with all my strength.

Thud.

A long, withered hand as thin as a branch had caught the disheveled old man's shoulder just as he stepped forward.

"It's a provocation tactic. Don't let that bastard's three-inch tongue fool you."

So he finally stepped in.

A cold voice. A cold expression.

[2953] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

Baeksang was about as chilly as a man could get, but the slender old man who'd remained silent until now was something else. No—their temperaments might be similar, but the depth was different.

His composure was as hard and cold as a glacier. So was the martial power within him.

I can't see an opening.

My instincts were telling me something clear: he was at least my equal, perhaps stronger.

Though I'd been talking to the disheveled old man, my attention had been on this one from the start.

And it seemed my opponent felt the same way.

"Impressive. No, that hardly does you justice."

The slender old man stepped forward, his admiration difficult to read.

"You unsettled your opponent with a few words, then looked for an opening to exploit. Now I understand why Her Majesty the Demon Empress warned us about you. You have martial prowess beyond your years and a calculating mind besides. You'll become a great obstacle in time."

"Am I taking a compliment the wrong way? Because it sounds like you're saying you'll kill me."

"You understood both the compliment and my intention correctly."

"Since you've already complimented me, why not let me pass? Do you really need to pull up a stone?"

"A stone lodged in the middle of the road must be removed if the path ahead is to be smooth."

"And are the two of you really skilled enough to do that?"

"You bastard! Shut your mouth!"

The disheveled old man's face twisted at the casual taunt. The slender one answered calmly.

"We'll have to do our best."

Damn it.

I suddenly had a feeling—no, the certainty—that this would be an extremely difficult fight.

When a mad dog runs wild, you can beat it down with a club. But an enemy who stays calm in any situation and doesn't underestimate you is another matter.

Even more so if that enemy possessed martial prowess that was in no way inferior to my own.

One-on-one, in a life-and-death duel, I'd have even odds against him. But he won't fight me one-on-one.

When the slightest difference can decide who lives and who dies, even a cat's paw helps. And from what I could tell, the disheveled old man was stronger than Baeksang.

Can I do this? Can I?

The instinctive doubt had barely crossed my mind when—

"Grrrr…"

Muyaho bared his teeth and growled warily. He crouched low, ready to spring at any moment, without the slightest sign of backing away.

Yeah, fuck it. If an animal that can't even talk is willing to fight, how can I back down?

Only one thing troubled me. I had a feeling I might not be able to protect him this time.

I'm sorry.

"Grrr."

I couldn't tell whether the clever White Tiger had read my eyes or understood that I wanted him, at least, to run far away.

But I was certain of one thing.

Either I would die here, or I would kill them.

Whatever happened, I wouldn't back down.

Step.

"I've never heard your names, so go peel those dicks of yours that don't even get hard anymore and eat them. Then spit out your sobriquets."

With White Flame lowered at my side, I faced them. The disheveled old man smiled with killing intent.

"Black Hand Fist Demon."

"Right, Black Hand. Never heard that one before. Guess you really are a nobody."

"I had my reasons for staying unknown. But now the whole world will hear it—the sobriquet of the man who killed the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon."

"They'll hear it without you doing that. Everyone who dies by my hand gets famous."

I answered calmly, ignored Black Hand Fist Demon as he started to flare up, and turned to the other old man.

But contrary to my wishes, the slender old man met my eyes and gave a small shake of his head.

"An enemy whose sobriquet is known is easy to assess. Isn't that right, Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung?"

"…!"

"I know you, and you know nothing of me. One of us will fall here. Come when you're ready."

Damn it. This really won't be easy.

But the die was cast. It was time to see how it landed.

I awakened the fire dragon curled in my lower dantian.

Rumble-rumble-rumble—!

An aura erupted from my entire body like a volcano exploding, shaking the area in every direction. Blue-white flames layered themselves over the transparent spearhead made of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron, completely enveloping the spear.

Fwoosh. Sizzle-sizzle-sizzle!

The terrible heat burned away poison and evaporated moisture.

As my aura surged, Black Hand Fist Demon's drunken, unfocused gaze sharpened. A strange light flashed in the other old man's eyes, which had been frozen like eternal snow.

"Indeed…!"

Swish.

An edged weapon slid from beneath his loose sleeve, gleaming blue. Then—

SHWAAAAAAK!

The twin wheels flew from the old man's hand, tearing through the air.

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh!

They ran without stopping.

Three tigers had become two, and five people had become four. Still, they ran. If anything, they had to move faster.

They had come too far to turn back. Doing so now would make his choice and sacrifice meaningless.

And perhaps thanks to him—no, thanks to Jin Taekyung—nothing stood in their way.

The tigers carried the four of them north, then farther north, before the messenger pigeon sent from the Nanman Beast Palace could arrive. The warriors of each tribe were too busy pursuing Jin Taekyung to stop them.

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh!

They crossed the plains, climbed over mountains, and passed through swamps and rivers.

And at last, the first goal of this short yet urgent journey began to appear.

"There!"

Namho's shout was directed below the hill.

Far ahead, several hundred Nanman warriors followed one another toward the northern border.

They had finally caught up with the reconnaissance squad. Relief hit them—and with it came the thought of one man.

Jin Taekyung.

Their Pavilion Master, though they had no idea where he was or what he might be doing now.

Chapter 679

The reconnaissance squad was made up of swift-footed elites, and it showed. More than two hundred strong, they reached the northeastern border in barely three days, even with breaks along the way.

But none of them—not even the two tribal chieftains leading the squad—had expected another group of unwelcome visitors to arrive before they encountered the mysterious monster known as the Blood Monk.

And this unexpected situation was nothing compared to the news those visitors had brought.

“What… did you just say?”

“What are you talking about?”

Chief Jang and Chief Go stared wide-eyed in disbelief.

It was shocking news none of them had expected. Had it come from anyone other than the Young Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace, they would have dismissed it as nonsense. In fact, they wished they could.

But despite their desperate wish, Yayul Mok’s answer did not change.

“It is all true.”

The truth was there in his trembling eyes. The two chieftains could only sigh as they realized it had all happened.

“What in the world…”

“Why would the Palace Lord make that choice? Why?”

Yayul Mok clenched his fists so tightly that blood ran from his palms before opening his mouth.

“My father had already guessed that he would be unable to resist the tide of events once so many chieftains had joined hands with Uncle Baek—no, with Baeksang.”

“Even so, did he bring this danger upon himself just to save a few Han Chinese?”

“He did not bring it upon himself.”

“What?”

“My father said this when he sent me and the others to the underground prison. He said that repaying a righteous act with righteousness was keeping faith, and that turning away from someone who had helped us was injustice. So today, I intend to stake my fate on keeping faith. On those two people—Jin Taekyung and Baeksang.”

“…!”

“…!”

The two chieftains closed their eyes with low groans.

Having served at the Beast Miao King’s side for a long time, they had vaguely guessed what kind of person he was and what choices he would make.

But…

“This time, the Palace Lord was wrong. He should have gathered all the strength of the tribes that followed him and the Miao people, then executed the traitors in the Inner Palace.”

“Even if we give Jin Taekyung every benefit of the doubt, trusting him may have been the right choice. If the Young Palace Lord’s story is true, Jin Taekyung ultimately left alone in order to keep faith. But Baeksang is different.”

As the two chieftains spoke with such certainty, Yayul Mok, who had been looking at them with a trace of hope, opened his mouth.

“It is too early to judge. If Baeksang granted my father’s request…”

“Young Palace Lord.”

Chief Jang cut him off, his voice hollow.

“‘Subdue the Han Chinese in the reconnaissance squad and escort them to the Inner Palace.‘ That is the first and last missive we received. Do you understand what it means?”

Yayul Mok faltered. Behind him, Namho, who had been watching quietly, suddenly understood. He spoke almost in a groan.

“He kept them in the dark on purpose.”

“Elder Namho, you mean…”

“There is no need to say more. The two chieftains here and the warriors in the reconnaissance squad are all people who follow the Palace Lord. If they were told about the trouble in the Inner Palace, they would surely interfere somehow. He probably intended to call them back after everything was finished. Or…”

Namho’s gaze darkened.

“Or… the Blood Monk. He may have planned to let that old monster deal with them.”

“…!”

“A borrowed knife to kill others. Baeksang and Dark Heaven chose a useful blade. No, in this situation, it isn’t even someone else’s blade. There is a strong possibility that the Blood Monk is in league with them as well.”

A cold silence settled over the group. Namho saw their shaken faces and felt his heart sink.

This is bad. The worst.

Behind them lay the Nanman Beast Palace, likely in Baeksang and Dark Heaven’s hands by now. Ahead stood a mysterious Supreme Peak master they could not face alone.

And Jin Taekyung, the one person they could count on most, was not here.

What are we supposed to do?

Even after a lifetime in the Hidden Shadow Pavilion, Namho had no easy answer. But he had to decide before it was too late.

Amid the suffocating feeling that invisible chains were wrapped around his entire body, Namho finally forced his lips apart.

“Where are the others?”

Chief Jang understood.

“If you mean the Han Chinese, we detained them as a precaution. We did them no harm—only struck their Sleep Acupoints.”

“…”

“You intend to send them back to the Central Plains?”

The question caught Namho squarely off guard. After a brief silence, Namho nodded heavily.

“I’m sorry. But for now, this is the best option. If they cross the Yangtze and report what is happening in Nanman, the Murim Alliance will never stand by and do nothing.”

“…The Murim Alliance.”

“I was born in Nanman and spent half my life in the Central Plains. Though I am nothing more than a powerless old man, I am someone who understands the circumstances of both Nanman and the Central Plains better than anyone. If it is the Murim Alliance I know, they will find a way to help Nanman.”

His voice was calm, but his resolve was unmistakable.

Beyond the dense grass where they were lying in ambush, the two chieftains gazed at the broad, endless waters of the Yangtze before opening their mouths with sighs.

“Damn it.”

“What should we do?”

Namho had already made up his mind.

“There are two ways. First, release the Han Chinese, leave this place at once, avoid Baeksang’s eyes, and wait for the right moment. Second, head to the Central Plains together with the Han Chinese.”

“Head to the Central Plains together? There is no ship of sufficient size anywhere around here. How are we supposed to—”

“There is. A ship that can take everyone.”

They turned toward the sudden voice. Sama Pyo was staggering to his feet, supported by Taishan.

“Is that true?” Chief Jang asked.

At Chief Jang’s question, Sama Pyo answered with a pale face.

“How do you think we got all the way to Nanman?”

“Do you mean…”

"The swift ship of the Yangtze River Channel League is not far from here. It's half a day to the west. If we travel for even half that time, we might be able to rendezvous with it."

Hope lit the two chieftains' faces.

If they followed a tributary of the Yangtze as far as Sichuan, they would be within the reach of the Central Plains Murim. Even if Baeksang and Dark Heaven held the Nanman Beast Palace, reinforcements from the Murim Alliance—with the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families at their head—could turn the situation around.

There are already three prestigious great sects in Sichuan alone. Even if the Murim Alliance's official reinforcements are delayed, those three will be different.

Namho calmly considered their prospects.

The Emei Sect. The Qingcheng Sect. The Sichuan Tang Clan.

Even though they had shed much blood and weakened during the Sichuan Bloodbath, their roots ran deep and firm enough that even Dark Heaven could not tear them out in a single stroke.

Moreover, all three sects considered Jin Taekyung their Benefactor. If they answered the call, gathered the strength of Sichuan Murim, and headed for Nanman…

Seven days and nights to return, if we're fast. Ten days at most.

Namho was neither a hot-blooded youth nor a martial artist who trusted in his own martial arts. That was why his judgment was colder and more accurate than anyone else's in this place.

Lead them back the way we came, and we'll surely die. Bring the Central Plains to our aid, and we have a real chance. Until then, Jin Taekyung and the Beast Miao King will have to…

He could only trust that they would hold out. That they would still be alive when the others returned.

Even Namho himself could not quite believe in that hope. Then, as he held on to it —

Boom. Boom. Booooom!

Namho heard it. No—everyone hidden in the forest above the endless river could see and hear it.

A low drumbeat. A sleek hull approaching on the currents of the Yangtze.

"What is that…?"

"The Yangtze River Channel League! It's their swift ship!"

But the next moment, the two chieftains, who had been celebrating with brightened faces, sensed something strange and fell silent.

The swift ship should have been at least half a day to the west. Why was it here?

They saw the rigid expressions on Namho's and Sama Pyo's faces, and their puzzlement turned to dread. Namho spoke through a groan.

"Prepare for battle."

"…!"

Fear swept through the group. Namho thought of the one person who was not at his side—the one he needed now more than ever.

Damn it. I'm sorry.

They might die before they could save him.

Crash. Boom.

The hull cut through the water without slowing and drove hard onto the sandy shore.

And then…

Step.

Where a wave had swept over the sand, one person's footstep was etched into it.

Whoosh!

Two streaks of light cut through the air.

Despite their strange movements, the twin wheels came at me like flashes of light. I swung White Flame diagonally downward to meet them.

KWA-BOOM! Rumble-rumble!

A tremendous roar erupted as a shockwave tore through the area and shook the air. But it was not over yet.

My five senses, sharp as blades, caught every movement of the twin wheels behind me.

They're coming again.

As Muyaho slid backward, I caught him by the nape and twisted my body.

Whoosh—shhk!

A blue flash skimmed past me. I heard a sharp slicing sound and saw the White Tiger's snow-white fur scatter through the air.

In my tilted field of vision, another sight came into view: a wild-haired freak charging at me like a mad bison.

"You bastard—!"

The Black Hand Fist Demon.

Black Force layered itself over his dark fist, and then he shot it straight toward my chest.

Whoom!

I felt the air ripple. Felt the terrifying power behind that punch. But…

That won't be enough.

With a brief mutter, I straightened the body I had twisted as far as it would go. By then, the black Force had already reached point-blank range and was giving off an ominous light.

Beyond it, the Black Hand Fist Demon's eyes gleamed with madness. They seemed to say, You're dead now.

I had seen that certainty in the eyes of many enemies before.

From Third Rate swordsmen to Supreme Peak masters. Regardless of their level of martial arts, they had always worn that expression.

And when everything was over, I was always the one still standing on two feet.

Swish.

In the slowed-down world, the cool feel of the spear shaft slipped away from my hand.

The Black Hand Fist Demon had closed in so deftly that my spear had lost its advantage. Without a moment's hesitation, I let go and struck with my palm.

KWA-BOOM!

Two differently colored Forces collided with a roar. Everything within a radius of ten-odd jang[2954] melted beneath the horrific heat, and the Black Hand Fist Demon's eyes flew wide open.

"You…"

One clash was enough for each of us to measure the other's strength.

Even though the twin wheels had made me react half a beat late, I had easily blocked the Black Hand Fist Demon's punch. Looking into his wavering eyes, I spoke calmly.

"A nobody. Right?"

"…!"

He knew something had gone wrong. Too late.

I clenched my other, empty hand.

Fwoosh.

Blue-white flames surged around my fist.

Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

KWA-AAANG!

[2954] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length, about 3.03 meters (9.94 ft). Ten-odd jang is roughly 30 meters (100 ft).

Chapter 680

The world crept by.

Blue-white flames surged around my fist, feeding on every sight that flashed past in that fraction of a second.

The punch I drove like a cannonball toward the Black Hand Fist Demon's heart.

His bulging eyes and the hand he thrust out in haste.

The black Force giving way despite his efforts, and his Body-Protecting Qi shattering the instant it touched the flames.

Even the dazzling flash that came slicing through the space beyond them.

KWA-AAANG!

A tremendous roar. A violent tremor.

Everything happened in an instant, and ended just as quickly. Then a blast of hot air swept across the place.

No—the blast swept across everything within several dozen jang.[2955]

Mist born from the heat and steam of Scorching Yang Qi spread everywhere, blocking my view.

Whoosh…

I stood still, staring into the pale mist, until a voice drifted out of it.

"Truly astonishing. More than I expected."

There was a faint note of genuine admiration in his voice. I drew White Flame back with Seizing an Object Through Empty Space and answered calmly.

"I'm pretty good for my age. I doubt even the Heavenly Demon or Martial God was this good."

"How arrogant. Still, I'll grant you that. You've earned the right to say it."

"Listen to you talking about what I've earned. You got scared and interfered, and now you're saying that?"

My voice sounded calm, but I was bitter inside.

Damn it.

That flash I'd seen at the last moment. If it hadn't been for the twin wheels the slender old man had thrown, the Black Hand Fist Demon might have suffered a severe internal injury—or died on the spot.

I expected him to interfere, but his timing was too damn good.

I'd had only two choices: finish off the Black Hand Fist Demon and let the twin wheels take my head, making me a Dullahan candidate, or let him go and save my own life.

Naturally, I'd chosen the latter.

[2955] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length, approximately 3.03 meters (9.94 ft).

I changed the direction of my punch in midair and struck the twin wheels aside. The Black Hand Fist Demon did not even dare try to take advantage of the opening. He hurriedly pulled back.

The clash had started and ended in the blink of an eye. It might have looked like a draw, but I'd lost far more.

Having learned what I could do to him, the Black Hand Fist Demon would fight me with a caution he'd never shown before. An opponent's carelessness was a weakness greater than any other, but you only got one chance to exploit it.

At this rate…

This wouldn't be easy. No, it had become an incredibly difficult fight.

I searched for the figure hidden beyond the mist and called out.

"Black Hand? My dear Black Hand, who's had fifty more years than me to learn martial arts and apparently learned them through his asshole instead. Where are you hiding?"

I thought he might ignore me. But the Black Hand Fist Demon was considerate enough to give my question his full attention.

"…Shut your damn mouth."

"Is it just me, or are you talking a lot quieter than before? Did a taste of fire shrink your balls too?"

"…You bastard. You caught me off guard once, and now you're full of yourself. Do you think you'll get another chance?"

I let out a short laugh.

Given his martial prowess, he wasn't entirely wrong to say I'd caught him off guard. But that was the kind of excuse a young prodigy made, not an old monster who'd lived as long as he had.

"You sound like a fucking idiot, and you know it. Right?"

"You—tearing you apart wouldn't be enough…!"

"Enough."

A cold voice cut off the Black Hand Fist Demon's shout. A slender figure emerged from the mist still blanketing the area.

Step.

Mud baked hard by the terrible heat crumbled like sand beneath the old man's foot.

He held a wheel in each hand, blades jutting from them like the teeth of gears. He gave his sleeves a light shake.

Whoosh…

A cold wind settled over the heat and swept away the mist, revealing what had become of the poisonous marshland around us.

It looked like a desert.

“So this is the Fire Gate Divine Technique I’ve heard so much about. Impressive. What stage have you reached?”

His admiration sounded genuine. I lowered my spearhead and answered.

“Three thousand twenty-five.”

“Is it just me, or is that a ridiculous number?”

“The realm of martial arts has no end.”

“A foolish question met with a wise answer. The Fire King raised his Disciple well.”

“He did, didn’t he? So why did your parents raise their kid like this?”

A parent insult, thrown hard and tight on the inside. The old man didn’t flinch.

“I suppose I’ll ask them if I ever find myself in the afterlife.”

Step.

He walked forward as if out for a stroll. I measured the distance between us.

“Since you brought it up, why not visit them today?”

“Unfortunately, I don’t expect to go anywhere near there for some time.”

“You shouldn’t put that off. Think how angry your parents must be in the Nine Springs. They worked their asses off raising you, and you won’t even visit.”

“You’ve guessed wrong this time. I’m an orphan, with no family in this world. No one cared for me growing up, so I can hardly be accused of being an unfilial son.”

Step.

His third step.

Muyaho had gone from a majestic White Tiger to Poppy after a disastrous grooming job with the twin wheels. He gave a low growl. I watched the wheels begin to turn slowly in the old man’s hands and muttered,

“Then you won’t be able to ask why they raised you this way when you get to the Nine Springs. You don’t know what they look like.”

“Now that you mention it, you’re right. Thank you for the advice.”

“What about the idiot creeping along behind you?”

The Black Hand Fist Demon spat out a brief curse. The old man answered calmly.

“Black Hand? He’s in a similar position.”

“I’m genuinely curious. Is that a requirement for joining Dark Heaven, or is it just a trend?”

The old man took another step instead of answering.

Step.

The sound rang unusually clear in my ears. At that moment, I saw blue light blaze from the twin wheels in his hands.

Hiss! Whoosh!

Two streaks of light flew toward me with faint sounds of splitting air. The twin wheels twisted through the air like living snakes. Beneath them, the Black Hand Fist Demon charged, madness gleaming in his eyes.

SHWAAAAAAK!

An attack from two directions. No—from three at once.

“GRAAAH!”

As the White Tiger roared behind me, I brought White Flame’s spearhead down with all my strength.

KWAANG!

The impact sent a violent jolt through my arms. I knocked one wheel aside, felt wind from my blind spot, and turned my head.

Whoosh—shhk!

It missed by a hair. Strands of hair severed by Force scattered through the air as the Black Hand Fist Demon closed to within three jang of me and snapped his tattered sleeves.

“Youuu!”

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

Palm Force burst from his outstretched hands, shaking the space around us. I eased my spearhead into the black Force rolling toward me like a wave.

Fire Dragon Divine Spear. First form.

Fire Dragon’s Single Tail.

Fwoosh—shaaaa!

Blue-white flames surged. The fire dragon’s tail split the black Palm Force and shot straight toward him. The Black Hand Fist Demon cried out in alarm and twisted aside.

Shhk!

A sharp cutting sound.

Unlike me, he hadn’t escaped with a few lost hairs. Blood dripped from the blunt end of his nose, whose tip had been sliced off before he knew it.

“You—you dare…”

I knew it now. Even if we fought ten more times, the Black Hand Fist Demon could never defeat me.

That old monster’s towering pride and the anger buried in his heart clouded his judgment. The smallest crack in it was an opening for me.

Now.

Flash!

One step.

The several jang between us vanished. More than a dozen possible moves flashed through my mind, and choosing one was easy.

Whoosh!

From sky to earth, my spearhead came down with a faint hiss. Blue-white flames rose along its edge.

Fire Dragon Divine Spear. Second form.

Heavenly Strike.

Fwoosh—KWA-AAANG!

A snowball grows as it rolls. A current swells into a wave when more water joins it.

The Black Hand Fist Demon looked up at the streak of flame crossing the air. His eyes flew wide.

“Guh…!”

With a startled cry, he thrust up both palms. The Palm Force he hastily summoned met the flames and faded away. In that brief instant, blue flashes came from my left and right.

SHWIIIIING!

My neck. My chest.

I couldn’t dodge both by moving. I made my decision in a split second and twisted the spearhead away from the Black Hand Fist Demon, swinging it at the wheels.

KWAANG!

Even someone like me couldn’t overcome the verdict contained in those four characters: force majeure.

SHRAAAK!

The tremendous rebound threw me off balance and sent me sliding helplessly backward. A pale figure rushed in like a ghost.

Shrik!

Not a word. Not even a breath.

Until now, the old man had stayed back and thrown his twin wheels. Now he entered the fight himself—calm and cold, each movement timed and placed with precision.

Just as he did now.

SHWAAK! THUD!

Hot and cold.

Though I twisted aside at the last moment, it made little difference.

Finger Qi erupted from the tips of fingers long and withered as tree branches and pierced my shoulder. White Flame’s spearhead, which had been driving toward the old man, wavered off course.

Dodging the weakened spearhead was easy for him.

Whoosh!

My spearhead cut uselessly through empty air. Gritting my teeth, I steadied myself and opened my free hand. Flames roiled around it as I drove my palm toward the old man's chest.

Fwoosh—whoooom!

The Flame Divine Palm surged forward, burning everything in its path. I saw its flames reflected in his eyes, their heat beyond description, burning without pause.

Yet his eyes remained cold. A chill I couldn't explain ran through me.

This is…

And the ominous instinct that seized my entire body soon revealed itself as reality.

Sss…

In a moment divided into fractions of a fraction, the old man slowly extended his hand.

No. He wasn't the only one moving slowly.

My palm advanced toward his chest just as slowly. Behind each of us, the Black Hand Fist Demon and the White Tiger were charging toward the other.

Then cold flowed from the old man's wrinkled hand, and time began moving again.

KRAK! SHHHHTZZZ!

Our palms met at last. Blue-white flames collided and mingled with pure-white cold.

KRRRUMBLE!

Everything was hot and cold at once.

Two lights of different colors flashed without cease before my eyes.
Unprecedented internal energy shattered and shook everything around us.

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

A roar like heaven and earth splitting apart.

And I saw it. At the same time, I heard it.

"I'm late introducing myself."

Powerful Yin-Cold Qi pressed down on the flames as they slowly died away.

"I am called the Great Snow Fiend."

The cold voice drifted through a cloud of pure-white breath.

KRAAASH!

Chapter 681

For an instant, I wondered.

What if the Black Hand Fist Demon hadn't been there? What if I'd dodged the Finger Qi?

What if the pain hadn't risen from the shoulder pierced by the Finger Qi at the exact moment our palms met?

What if I had known that my opponent's martial arts were based on Yin-Cold Qi?

If—if any of that had been different…

Who would be standing now?

But I had no time to find the answer.

KRAK!

The frozen flames died away. The Yin-Cold Qi that had swallowed even the fire swelled as though it might burst.

Beyond the unprecedented internal energy that shook the surrounding space, someone's hand, engulfed in pure-white light, pressed against my chest.

Tap.

One thought filled my mind.

Cold.

KRAAANG!

A storm of cold swept out in every direction.

At its center, a fierce wind battered my entire body. The world flashed past, and an immense force slammed through my back.

KRRRUNCH!

Trees. Rocks. Grass. Even unknown creatures unlucky enough to be caught in my path.

Alive or dead, it made no difference.

Everything I struck as I flew backward like a misfired shell bent, shattered, or burst apart.

The thick stone wall standing across my path—a path I had no control over—was both a curse and a blessing.

KWAANG! RRRUMBLE!

Even through the haze, I could feel the excruciating pain.

The scenery finally stopped whipping past. So did I, after flying several dozen jang[2956] and burying myself deep in the stone wall.

Goddamn it.

I strained to speak, but no sound made it past my lips.

[2956] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length, about 3.03 meters (9.94 ft).

The world was red and blurry. A constant ringing filled my ears.

BEEP! BEEP! BEEP!

That was a little unusual, even for ringing ears.

"…Fuck."

I raised my head with a hollow mutter.

More than a dozen holographic windows floated in the air. Instead of their usual clear chimes, they came with warning beeps.

That got me good.

I let out a bitter laugh. Pain rose without pause from injury after injury. The Yin-Cold Qi that had invaded my body left my hands and feet trembling, making a mockery of my Unaffected by Cold and Heat realm.

I have to get up. I have to fight again…

But my body wouldn't listen. It felt as though every screw in it had come loose.

I was cold and tired.

If I closed my eyes, I felt like I could get a good night's sleep for the first time in ages.

Yes. No dreams, no one waking me. I'd sleep until my back hurt, and everything would be better.

When I woke, the pain wracking my body would be gone. This goddamn body would work again. I'd curl up under a warm microfiber blanket and look at my smartphone, and Mom's voice would come through the crack in the door.

"Jin Taekyung, Jin Hayeon. I've got dinner ready, so hurry up and come out."

Then I'd shuffle into the kitchen and, despite what she'd just said, find the table empty. I'd set out the spoons and side dishes while Mom stood with her back to me, the savory smell of soybean-paste stew wafting over her shoulder.

Ah. This is nice.

Just thinking about it put me at ease.

The corners of my mouth rose, and my eyelids sank lower.

Sss…

Something rough and damp brushed across my face.

I slowly opened my eyes. The first things I saw were sharp teeth and clear blue-white eyes.

—Whine.

The White Tiger whined like a puppy as soon as our eyes met. I gave a quiet laugh.

"…Was that you?"

—Whine. Whiiine.

I couldn't understand him, but I could tell what his cries meant. What he wanted to say.

"Phew."

Breathing hurt.

It felt as though I'd woken from a long dream. So many thoughts had passed through my mind, but only a short time had gone by.

Crumbled stone rained down on my body, still lodged deep in a wall so thick I couldn't judge its depth.

Only a few seconds had passed since I'd taken the blow. There was still time.

Thud.

I braced a hand trembling from the cold against the ground and muttered, "Stop crying. I'm not dead yet."

I was answering him, but I was telling myself, too.

That was right. I was not dead yet, and even if my flame had briefly gone cold, it could flare up again and again.

Just like now.

Fwoooosh.

Internal energy surged from my lower dantian, heating hundreds of acupoints before spreading through my limbs and bones.

As I temporarily sealed the damage inside me, fiery pain swept through my body. Something surged up my throat.

Cough!

Dark red blood spilled from my lips. I paid it no mind. It was dead blood.

And the substance that had been gnawing away at my body and interfering with the flow of my internal energy was covered in pure-white frost the instant it touched the ground.

Fsssh.

Yin-Cold Qi. An extreme form of it unlike anything I had ever seen.

During the Shaolin Bloodshed, the Yin Freak—one of the Yin-Yang Twin Freaks who had led Dark Heaven's martial artists in a surprise attack on Shaolin Temple—had not possessed anything like this.

"…So that's how it is."

After muttering under my breath, I rose without hesitation.

Tududduk.

Leaves and stone dust fell from my body at the sudden movement. A dull ache followed, but fresh warmth now filled me from within. My hand had stopped trembling, and my vision cleared enough to make out the two figures drawing near.

Step.

Footsteps slowly crossed the Poisonblood Grounds, which had changed from a swamp into a desert, and from a desert into frost-covered land.

The Black Hand Fist Demon followed several paces behind with a triumphant look on his face. I had eyes only for the man ahead of him.

That damn old man.

He walked at his leisure, as though admiring a landscape he had painted himself. I raised White Flame at an angle and watched him.

"Unexpected," he said. "I was certain you wouldn't be able to move after that."

I knew his sobriquet now. Or perhaps it was more accurate to say I'd remembered it.

"That might be true for old men like you, Great Snow Fiend."

"Youth is a fine thing. Yet you fail to understand that, in a situation like this, it will only bring you more pain."

As he had until now, the Great Snow Fiend answered without the slightest wavering and continued.

"The fight is over. Surrender now, and I will spare your life. This is my first and last offer."

"Senior! What are you saying?"

That wasn't me. The Black Hand Fist Demon's face twisted as he protested, but the Great Snow Fiend shook his head.

"The Demon Empress gave me the order herself. She said that letting him live would invite great trouble in the future, but that I was to capture him alive if possible. And we already have the upper hand."

"Even so…!"

"Shut your mouth."

"…"

"I know how you feel, but this is Heaven's business. Question me again, and I will not forgive you."

His tone and aura were icy. Even the half-mad Black Hand Fist Demon knew better than to keep arguing.

"This fucking…"

The Great Snow Fiend ignored the mutter slipping through the other man's clenched teeth and held out a hand to me.

"It is foolish to continue a fight whose outcome is clear. Surrender and live to fight another day. Do that, and the Fire Gate Clan and the Jin Family of Taiyuan may preserve their lineages."

I stared at him and answered.

Not with words, but with action.

Whoosh!

A sharp sound of air splitting rang through the air.

The Great Snow Fiend moved exactly half a step to avoid my spear strike.

“I believe I made myself clear. My first and last offer.”

“So?”

“I thought you were fairly clever, but you’ve chosen the foolish path after all. Can you not feel which way the battle has turned?”

“Which way it’s turned.”

I muttered the words and continued.

“Honestly, I do want to live. But I’m not the kind of bastard who surrenders or runs just because things have tilted a little. Unlike some people.”

The Great Snow Fiend paused. Then, as though he’d realized something, he gave a small nod.

“You know me.”

“I’ve heard of a sobriquet or two. White Rice Cake, Great Snow Fiend, something like that.”[2957]

“A child like you would hardly have heard that name… Fire King Jeok Cheongang. Did your master tell you?”

“Then do you think the fucking Heavenly Demon told me?”

I shrugged.

“He said if I ever met a son of a bitch who used twin wheels and Yin-Cold Qi, it would be the Great Snow Fiend or his successor. He said he wished he’d killed you himself, but after you killed the former Sect Leader of the Zhongnan Sect, you disappeared without a trace.”

“I feel the same regret. If this old man had met your master during the Great Faction War, I could have killed the Fire King and made my name resound throughout the world.”

“At best, you’d have been the Ice God instead of the Great Snow Fiend, you fucking idiot.”[2958]

“…”

For the first time, he reacted. It was slight, but his brow furrowed. I gave a quiet laugh.

“So you do have some pride. Then again, you ran away back then. Maybe you don’t.”

“I merely withdrew to fight another day. This old man is not foolish enough to stake his life on a fight when outnumbered.”

In truth, from what I’d heard, his decision had been cold and sound. He’d killed the former Sect Leader of the Zhongnan Sect, thrown their chain of command into chaos, then slipped away from Great Snow Mountain and vanished.

But…

[2957] Baekseolgi is a white Korean steamed rice cake; its name sounds similar to daeseolgwi.

[2958] Bingsin (“Ice God”) sounds like byeongsin, a harsh Korean insult meaning “idiot.”

“So what?”

“What?”

“You were scared, so you ran. You didn’t want to die. You were afraid of dying. That’s why you stayed hidden for so long.”

“You bastard…”

“It’s not like I’m criticizing you. I don’t want to die either. But once you’ve lived that many years, you should be honest every now and then—even about the things you don’t want to admit. Don’t you think?”

Deep lines creased the Great Snow Fiend’s brow. Powerful Yin-Cold Qi rose around him and pressed down on everything nearby.

“I heard you. When I next meet your master, I shall pass on your last words.”

Last words.

Maybe that’s how it will be.

I took a deep breath. This was no ordinary opponent. Facing two Supreme Peak masters while suffering from internal injuries was all but suicide.

Was I afraid of dying? Of course.

I’d feared death ever since I became a Hunter. Coming to Murim hadn’t changed that.

Now that I had taken one step toward accepting the word death in my heart, I was different from before.

I can do anything. Anything.

This wasn’t a fight to survive. It was a fight to kill.

And that meant I could charge in without holding my life back.

SHWAAAAAK!

Chapter 682

SHWAAAAK!

As Jin Taekyung charged straight toward him, the Great Snow Fiend thought, Yes. Come.

The boy's sharp tongue had unsettled him for the first time in years, but it changed nothing. He had long since put aside the fact that his opponent was barely twenty, still a boy by any ordinary measure.

How could he afford to think of him that way? By the Great Snow Fiend's reckoning, Jin Taekyung was a monster almost without precedent in history.

Even the Three Saints and Ten Kings—giants who had left their mark on Murim history—had not reached Supreme Peak until they were at least thirty. Jin Taekyung had done it at an absurdly young age.

Terrifying talent. And an absurdly young age.

Alongside Cheongpung of Huashan, the other genius who had inherited Sword Saint Mae Jonghak's teachings, he was certain to become one of their most dangerous obstacles.

At the very least, within the next fifty years, he will grow into a monster capable of matching the Martial God and Heavenly Demon. He must be dealt with now.

The Great Snow Fiend did not know exactly why his direct superior, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress, had ordered Jin Taekyung captured alive. At this moment, though, he trusted his own judgment.

Demon Empress, you are wrong this time. He… must never be allowed to live.

As he addressed her in thoughts she would never hear, the twin wheels within his sleeves let out a harsh howl.

WOOOOONG!

His martial arts and identity had already been exposed. There was nothing to gain by holding back.

The Great Snow Fiend focused every sense on Jin Taekyung's rapidly approaching figure. His eyes flashed.

Now!

SHWING!

The rapidly spinning twin wheels left his wrinkled hand.

SHWAAAAK!

Filled with extreme Yin-Cold Qi, the twin wheels froze the space around them as they shot forward. The two blades traced grotesque paths according to the Great Snow Fiend's will. At the point where they descended, Jin Taekyung had already closed to within three jang.[2959]

KWAANG!

Blue and white flashes mingled with a tremendous roar. Fire met ice.

With a single swing, Jin Taekyung knocked the twin wheels away, then burst through the mistlike steam that had settled over the ground.

SHWAAK!

He looked as swift as ever, but the Great Snow Fiend's sharp eyes caught the difference.

He's suppressing it for now. His internal injuries are still affecting him.

It was slight, but unmistakable. His movements had lost some of their precision, and his momentum had grown rougher.

To the Great Snow Fiend, Jin Taekyung looked like a wounded beast: claws still sharp, but tiring fast.

And the Great Snow Fiend was a seasoned hunter who knew better than anyone how to hunt such a beast.

At this rate, bringing him down is only a matter of time.

He even had a hunting dog beside him—the Black Hand Fist Demon. Not strong enough to sink its teeth into the beast's neck, perhaps, but savage enough to charge in on the hunter's behalf.

PAT-PAT!

"Black Hand!"

The hunter moved back. The hunting dog moved forward.

The Great Snow Fiend sprang back exactly as far as Jin Taekyung had advanced. At his shout, the Black Hand Fist Demon charged.

"Youuu!"

With a furious roar, he unleashed dozens of palm strikes packed with powerful internal energy.

KRAAAAA!

Black Force surged toward Jin Taekyung like a wave. At the same moment, the spear in his hand blurred.

SHWAAAAK!

Supreme Peak—a realm only the chosen could enter.

The young monster who had reached it at barely twenty thrust out his spear without hesitation. Blue-white flames coiled around the spearhead as it drove into the center of the black wave.

BOOM!

One strike, aimed precisely at one point.

[2959] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Three jang are about 9.09 m (29.8 ft); twenty jang are about 60.6 m (199 ft).

Jin Taekyung split the wave of Force and burst through it. The Great Snow Fiend swept both hands downward, and the wheels Jin Taekyung had knocked away plunged from where they circled overhead.

SHWIIIIING!

They moved like living creatures.

Some might have called it Seizing an Object Through Empty Space, or Snake Sword, a technique performed with cords or threads. Both would have been wrong.

The Great Snow Fiend's will alone moved the wheels. Powered solely by his Middle Dantian, they carried a single purpose.

Die.

Killing intent as cold as ice, directed at one man.

The two wheels bent in different directions and descended like flashes of light. At the same time, the Black Hand Fist Demon's figure shot forward, trailing a savage momentum.

SHWING! SHWAAAAK!

Three flashes converged from three directions.

The Great Snow Fiend looked at Jin Taekyung, standing at the intersection of death, and felt certain.

If he clashes with Black Hand now, he won't come away unharmed. He'll retreat, and I'll use that opening to…

Jin Taekyung rendered the rest of the plan useless.

PAT!

He advanced. Not an inch of retreat, not a moment of hesitation.

His spear flashed toward the wheels above his head. Then he drove out a fist like the forepaw of a tiger charging from the edge of a cliff.

KWAANG! KRRRUNCH!

The Great Snow Fiend saw it clearly.

THOOM!

Within the tremendous roar that sounded as if the sky were splitting apart and the flash of light that followed, a spear rose over Jin Taekyung's shoulder.

SHWIIIIK! SHRAK!

He had lost his grip on his treasured weapon. As he clashed with the Black Hand Fist Demon, the twin wheels slashed across his shoulder like lightning.

SHRAK! FWOOSH!

Bright-red blood sprayed like a fountain. Jin Taekyung staggered.

At this wholly unexpected development that had unfolded in an instant, even the normally cold Great Snow Fiend faltered. He could not retrieve the twin wheels buried deep in the stone wall.

Why would he choose that?

He could not understand it. In Jin Taekyung's place, he would have dodged without a second thought.

But his thoughts could go no further.

RRRRUMBLE!

A shock wave burst from Jin Taekyung and the Black Hand Fist Demon, shaking the space around them. Their fists had met in midair and now trembled, neither advancing nor giving way.

An even match.

The thought flashed through the Great Snow Fiend's mind, and his figure blurred.

SHWIK!

Jin Taekyung was exhausted from his successive injuries. The fact that the Black Hand Fist Demon—despite being a Supreme Peak master like him, clearly a level below—had managed to match him for even a brief moment was proof.

The chance had come sooner than expected. The Great Snow Fiend was too practiced a hunter to miss it.

Now is the perfect time.

Even if it was wounded and bleeding, a beast was still a beast. The hunting dog called the Black Hand Fist Demon could never handle that young beast on its own.

Unless the hunter—the only one capable of tearing out the beast's throat—stepped forward.

I must kill him. Right now.

His decision took an instant. His body shot forward like lightning.

FSSSH. At every step, Yin-Cold Qi flowed from him and froze the air.

In three steps, he crossed more than twenty jang. Over the Black Hand Fist Demon's shoulder, he caught sight of his prey.

Jin Taekyung.

He could see him. Sense him.

Haa. Hah.

Ragged breaths. A pale face. The upper body the wheels had grazed was soaked in bright-red blood. As Jin Taekyung spotted the hunter bearing down on him, his eyes began to tremble.

I was right.

Certainty settled into the Great Snow Fiend's cold gaze.

Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung. Heir to the Fire Gate Clan and successor to the Fire King Jeok Cheongang.

The Divine Dragon of the Central Plains, who would one day become a new Martial God and look down upon the world, would die before he ever rose above the clouds.

Today. Here.

The time for the hunt had finally arrived.

Ssssss.

Wind blew across the ground, bringing cold to air and earth that had briefly grown hot. It would cover mountains, rivers, trees, and grasses with frost.

For one man, that snow wind brought despair. For another, hope.

He's here. He came!

The Black Hand Fist Demon barely held back a cheer.

He did not like the Great Snow Fiend. Given how the man usually treated him, even that was putting it mildly. The Great Snow Fiend always spoke to him as though he were a servant and looked at him as though he were far beneath him. If his martial arts had been strong enough, he might have killed the man long ago without alerting the Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

But right now, the Great Snow Fiend was worth an army.

Watching Jin Taekyung hurriedly try to pull away, the Black Hand Fist Demon smiled with mad delight.

You bastard disciple of the Fire Gate Clan. Even tearing you apart limb by limb wouldn't be enough. You will never escape.

KRRUNCH!

His hooked fingers closed around Jin Taekyung's fist just as it was about to fall. It was a grappling technique he had practiced for as long as his fist technique.

ZZZT. Heat like lava seared his hands, threatening to set them alight, but he did not care.

He needed only a moment. Then both the pain and Jin Taekyung's life would end.

The Black Hand Fist Demon looked into Jin Taekyung's wide-open eyes and shouted as though cheering.

"Senior!"

The Great Snow Fiend answered before the shout had ended.

He drove an ice sword created solely from extreme Yin-Cold Qi into the Black Hand Fist Demon's back.

SQUELCH!

"…!"

In the slowed world, flesh tore and the Black Hand Fist Demon's body went rigid.

The Great Snow Fiend cared nothing for the reaction of a hunting dog that had served its purpose. His cold gaze remained fixed ahead, on Jin Taekyung's eyes, wide with pain and shock.

Or so it should have.

The former Sect Leader of the Zhongnan Sect had worn that look when they met long ago on Great Snow Mountain. So had the Black Hand Fist Demon in the instant before his death.

Jin Taekyung should have been pierced and killed by the ice sword filled with powerful Yin-Cold Qi.

But…

What is this?

The Great Snow Fiend's gaze, frozen as though it could not move, trembled.

His eyes slowly lowered.

There, he saw someone's hand pressed against his chest.

At the same moment he had thrust his ice sword—no, a fraction of a moment before—this hand had pierced through the Black Hand Fist Demon's chest. It was red and blue, blue and dazzling.

FWOOSH.

The heat was enough to burn flesh and bone. Even the soul within.

As he stared at the blood-soaked blue-white hellfire, the Great Snow Fiend spoke in a voice that seemed to boil.

"How? How did you…?"

Jin Taekyung's calm voice reached his ear.

"You should've stabbed a little higher. Unless you were trying to give me EXP."

What?

The Great Snow Fiend wanted to ask again. Jin Taekyung gave him no chance.

BOOM!

Through the terrible heat burning across his body, the Great Snow Fiend saw it.

That's…

The Black Hand Fist Demon's collapsing body.

And an unidentified red armor draped across Jin Taekyung's upper body.

KRRRUNCH!

Chapter 683

BOOM!

Scorching heat tore through the Great Snow Fiend's chest.

KRRRUNCH!

An immense impact swept through his entire body like a wave.

He coughed, and dark-red blood burst between his parted lips. His vision, clear a moment ago, grew hazy. It had been a long time since he had felt pain like this.

But as he crashed through a massive ten-thousand-geun[2960] boulder, what tormented him most was neither the pain nor his internal injuries.

He saw through my move? That brat?

He had defeated countless powerful enemies to reach this point. Now a young man barely twenty had outmaneuvered him. The thought made his head spin.

My judgment should have been correct.

He muttered the words blankly inside his mind, then shook his head.

No. It had been correct.

His formidable martial arts were not the only reason he had survived this insane Murim and its countless brushes with death.

Hide yourself. Know your opponent.

If his Supreme Peak martial arts were a sharp sword, his unwavering composure and cold judgment were both shield and hidden weapon.

But this was a first.

An opponent who did not fall to his sword, could not be stopped by his shield, and was untouched even by his hidden weapon. Someone who defied every judgment he had made.

How?

The Great Snow Fiend lifted his trembling eyelids and looked ahead.

FWOOSH.

The fierce snow wind subsided. Frost melted from the ground, and bitter heat mingled with the white breath spilling into the air.

At the center of it all stood one man.

Step.

Footsteps sounded in the silence. A figure emerged through the hazy steam, and the Great Snow Fiend saw a young man drenched in blood from head to toe.

In stark contrast, his eyes were clear and bright.

[2960] Ten thousand Korean geun is 6,000 kg, or about 13,200 lb. One geun is 600 g.

As the young man approached, the Great Snow Fiend pushed himself upright. Stone fragments pattered from his body, each one bringing a fresh stab of pain. He clenched his teeth, suppressed his internal injuries, and spat out a name.

"…Jin Taekyung."

His voice was as cold as his thoughts were muddled. Jin Taekyung's reply was perfectly calm.

"I'm surprised. I thought you wouldn't be able to move after that."

"What?"

"You've still got plenty of energy for an old man. But that's no good in a situation like this. It'll only make things more painful."

The Great Snow Fiend's eyebrow twitched as he realized something.

"…You."

"Oh, I don't mean anything by it. I think someone said something like that to me earlier, so I repeated it. Couldn't have been more than… fifteen minutes ago. Can't remember which fucking idiot was running his mouth, though."

"Early-onset dementia?" Jin muttered. He glanced over his shoulder and sighed. "Ah, this is going to keep me up tonight. That old man lying over there might know. Mind if I go ask him?"

"…!"

"I'll be right back, okay?"

It was utter nonsense. There was no asking a corpse with a crushed heart a question, much less getting an answer.

Blatant mockery, not worth listening to.

Yet the Great Snow Fiend bit his lip before he knew it. Normally, such drivel would not have drawn the slightest reaction from him. Now he could not help being shaken.

"Just what… are you?"

He genuinely wanted to know. How was Jin Taekyung still standing on his own two feet? Why had he not fallen with the Black Hand Fist Demon?

"I saw it with my own eyes. It was no illusion, no clumsy act. How… how did you do it?"

Every word was true.

Powerful Yin-Cold Qi had thrown Jin Taekyung's qi and blood into chaos, and the Force-wreathed twin wheels had cut him. That was why the Great Snow Fiend had remained certain until the final moment that his ice sword would kill both the wounded beast and the hunting dog.

Even his decision to kill the Black Hand Fist Demon had come from an experienced hunter's caution. There was no telling what a beast driven to the edge of a cliff might do.

But he had been wrong. No—everything had been turned upside down.

The hunter had failed to kill the beast. The beast had sunk its teeth into the hunting dog's neck and clawed the hunter's chest.

Something that could not happen, should not happen, had happened.

Jin Taekyung watched the Great Snow Fiend's uncomprehending face and murmured as if to himself.

"Yeah. Maybe it was."

The Great Snow Fiend could not know what he meant. It was a gamble only one person in this world could have made.

Level Up.

One move that could overturn an overwhelmingly unfavorable battle.

Jin Taekyung had staked everything on it. He had willingly offered up his flesh to make his enemies lower their guard, and at last he had taken their bones.

If the EXP from the Black Hand Fist Demon hadn't leveled me up… I'd be the one lying there.

But his gamble had paid off.

On the way to Ailao Mountain, he had fought more than ten battles. Breaking through the Poisonblood Grounds, he had killed hundreds of venomous beasts. Little by little, the EXP had accumulated.

Then he had added the Black Hand Fist Demon to it.

And I still had the ten points I got escaping the underground prison, plus the Fire Dragon Armor.

The Great Snow Fiend's unexpected move had left him with internal injuries first, but that had meant he could bring those advantages out at the moment they mattered most.

It had been close. The result was what counted.

The punch Jin Taekyung had thrown with every ounce of his strength had taken the Black Hand Fist Demon's life faster than the ice sword could, while the Great Snow Fiend's ice sword had failed to pierce the Fire Dragon Armor completely.

Jin Taekyung suddenly remembered something he had heard long ago from a man who loved Go. Every time the man lost a game, he would shout, "Japs out! Chinks out!"

"Son, there's a saying in Go: a large group doesn't die easily."

"Dad. Is that Buddhist?"

"No, no. A large group—a big formation of stones—is hard to kill."

"Oh, I see. But Dad, why did you lose this game?"

"Because the large group died… Honey! Please take Taekyung away! Honey!"

A quiet laugh escaped him.

His father had been right. A large group did not die easily.

After a run of bad moves, one brilliant move could make it larger than any other stone and give it command of the board.

Just like now.

“Black Hand’s already gone ahead. Time for our Santa Claus to go see his parents, too. Just so you know, I don’t offer people a chance to surrender.”

SHING.

In his blood-soaked hand, White Flame’s spearhead leveled at the Great Snow Fiend.

The old man stared back through bloodshot eyes.

“Do not spout nonsense. You have gained a slight advantage, nothing more. This is not over.”

Jin Taekyung did not bother arguing. At least the damned old man was right about one thing: it was not over.

Sacrifice flesh to break bone.

The flesh he had given up had served its purpose, but a single level-up had not been enough to heal his earlier internal injuries and the wounds left by the twin wheels.

And just as he had risen again after taking the first attack, the Great Snow Fiend still had plenty of strength left.

“You will die, and this old man will live. That is the natural order, the mandate granted by Heaven.”

FSSSSSH.

Cold spread around them with his icy voice.

Even a full-strength blow from the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist had not put the old monster down. Jin Taekyung roused the fire dragon filling his lower dantian once more.

“Well, I can understand an old man becoming senile…”

FWOOSH.

Blue-white flames spread over the transparent spearhead, driving back the cold. Fire rose in his faintly warm eyes.

“But if some bastard from Dark Heaven starts talking about Heaven’s mandate, you won’t even get to see your parents after you die.”

At that moment—

POP!

The space between them vanished. Flame and cold collided.

KWAANG!

The world shook. The fire spear and ice sword met with a tremendous roar.

A shock wave that seemed to shake earth and sky swept outward. The explosion hurled both figures back, but neither yielded an inch before stepping toward the other again.

SHWIK!

One step. That was all the Great Snow Fiend needed. He shot forward in an instant and flicked his blood-soaked sleeve.

BOOM!

Cold fierce enough to freeze the air swept over a thousand-geun[2961] boulder embedded deep in the ground.

A rock?

The Great Snow Fiend looked up the moment he understood.

Half a beat ahead of him, Jin Taekyung had stepped on empty air as though climbing an invisible stair. Now he was falling, body and spear as one.

Fire Dragon Divine Spear.

Second Form.

Heavenly Strike.

KRAAAAA!

There was no time to think. The Great Snow Fiend swung his ice sword upward on instinct.

A streak of flame descended like a meteor and struck the blade.

KWAANG!

Fifteen minutes earlier, he could have blocked it without difficulty. Not now.

With his internal energy fully restored, Jin Taekyung's attack was heavier and sharper than before. The Great Snow Fiend's own internal injuries were no small matter, either.

Hngh.

Blood surged into his mouth. He swallowed it with a groan and turned his ice sword, sending the flames sliding into the ground, where they exploded.

The deafening blast flung him backward. Through his spinning vision, he sent the ice sword shooting toward the figure ahead of him as though he had thrown it.

SHWAAK! KWAANG!

Jin Taekyung knocked aside the ice sword hurtling at him faster than sound. Without hesitating, he drove his foot against the rock frozen by Yin-Cold Qi.

FSSSH. KRRRUNCH.

The ice melted. Web-like cracks spread across the hard stone.

Then a streak of flame rose.

KRAAAAA!

[2961] A thousand Korean geun is 600 kg, or about 1,320 lb.

Flamefire Path.

Wrapped in blue-white fire, Jin Taekyung charged at the Great Snow Fiend—the old monster who dared defy the natural order while invoking Heaven's mandate.

I can do this.

It was neither certainty nor complacency. He simply trusted himself.

Holding his breath, he cut through the space between them, took the spear shaft in a reverse grip, and sent it forward.

SHWAAAAAAK!

The flame-wreathed spearhead grazed past in an instant. It split the wind. It burned the air.

And at the end of its path stood a man.

"Ha!"

Too fast.

With a roar, the Great Snow Fiend gathered Yin-Cold Qi in both hands. White Force that seemed capable of freezing the world itself shot toward the spearhead.

No. It should have.

SHWIK! SLASH!

Pain struck his back.

Something trailing white fur and leaving a burning sting flashed across his vision. It raced onward without slowing, while the old monster's judgment faltered.

Damn it. Baek…

The Great Snow Fiend swallowed the curse rising in his throat and thrust both palms with all his strength toward the blue-white hellfire filling his vision.

KWAAAAANG!

RRRRUMBLE!

A roar like the sky splitting apart shook the world.

Chapter 684

RRRUMBLE!

The earth shook with a thunderous roar.

Ancient trees whose roots had held for longer than anyone could guess. Boulders weighing ten thousand geun.[2962] Even the strange creatures of the Poisonblood Grounds that had been hiding somewhere, watching the battle with bated breath.

All were buried as the earth heaved and overturned like a wave.

KRRRUNCH!

It was hot.

At the center of the shock wave, I felt a scorching wind whip around me. There was not a trace of coolness in the muggy air, and the thick dust cloud covering dozens of jang[2963] left me unable to see a thing.

But I remembered clearly how the old man had driven both palms, packed with immense Yin-Cold Qi, toward the spearhead bearing down on him. I remembered the red blood gushing from his body, too, and the White Tiger's figure disappearing into the distance in a flurry of white fur.

That bastard…

Muyaho's sudden ambush on the Great Snow Fiend had not been planned. I had told him the opposite: stay out of the fight and find Yohi, who was probably being held captive somewhere in the Poisonblood Grounds.

Even if I died here today, I wanted that clever beast to get out alive. If he went to the Nanman Beast Palace with the two Great Chieftains, there would still be hope of preventing the disaster to come.

But Muyaho had ignored me, and his reckless, dangerous ambush had worked.

It was a tiny difference, but it was there. The unexpected attack slowed the Great Snow Fiend's reaction.

Sending White Flame flying—practically an extension of myself—had been worth it.

A wounded hunter who had lost his composure was no longer a hunter. He was prey.

Where are you?

POP!

I muttered the question and shot forward.

Thick dust swirled around me. Soil and stones rained down on every side. They blocked my sight and masked every presence, so I drove a fist through them.

[2962] A Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun is about 6,000 kg (13,200 lb); a thousand geun is about 600 kg (1,320 lb).

[2963] A jang is ten cheok, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

BOOM!

I did not even need to put internal energy into it. My fist broke the sound barrier, and compressed air burst outward under the force of the blow.

The enormous dust cloud split in two, revealing what lay beyond.

FWOOSH!

Hot wind swept past me. The instant I glimpsed someone's blood-soaked clothes through the dust, I reached out without hesitation.

I had fought hard for this opening. Now that the balance was beginning to tip my way, I could not let it slip—even if it meant revealing abilities I had yet to show the Great Snow Fiend.

Inventory Open. Summon.

With the command in my mind, I hurled the spear that appeared in my hand with all my strength.

SHWAAAAK! BOOM!

It split the air and struck with a thunderous roar. Before the sounds had faded, another spear was in my hand.

SHWIK!

Again.

KWAANG!

And again.

More. More. More, more.

My body moved as fast as I could think. I twisted my waist, drew back my shoulder, and put my full weight behind each throw. The spears devastated everything around me like a bombardment.

RRRUMBLE!

I ignored the dust cloud as it began to rise again after briefly scattering.

I was pouring out attacks even more powerful than that.

Every spear was cheap iron, nothing compared to White Flame. But once I sent one flashing from my hand, no one it struck would come away unharmed.

Even a Supreme Peak master. No…

Not even the Great Snow Fiend.

BOOM! KWAANG! KRAAA-BOOM!

Explosions roared without pause. In a matter of moments, I drove more than ten spears into the earth like bolts of lightning.

Then I saw it.

KRRK! SPLAAASH!

Beyond the thick dust, bright-red blood scattered into the air to the grisly sound of torn flesh.

There you are.

Certain now, I stepped forward. The tip of my foot, bearing the weight of a thousand geun,[2964] dug deeply into the overturned earth.

KRRRUNCH. BOOM!

An explosion occurred at the same time as I compressed my internal energy. I surged forward, erasing more than ten jang[2965] of space in an instant, and plunged into the dust cloud.

The noise and falling debris had made it nearly impossible to tell front from back. But I did not hesitate.

I've already seen him.

My sharp senses detected the metallic scent of blood, and my keen eyesight once again found someone's back through the dust cloud.

The Great Snow Fiend had been injured blocking White Flame. He could not be faster than me now.

I summoned a spear from my Inventory and slashed it down diagonally.

SHIIING.

With a low sound of splitting air, blue-white flames rose around the spearhead and slowly cut through the wind.

But the spearhead was not the only thing that had slowed. Extreme concentration paralyzed my brain and brought the world to a standstill.

In that frozen moment, the flames parted the dust and touched the edge of the man's clothes. Certainty flashed through me.

It's over—!

Then why did I feel this inexplicable chill? This strange sense of déjà vu?

One more chi[2966] would end everything. Why was my body trying to retreat against my mind's command?

I understood at once. It was reason, but it was instinct too—instinct that had acted before reason could.

The Great Snow Fiend.

An old monster who had crawled out of the depths of a distant past. But what made him dangerous was not that he was a Supreme Peak master who had opened his Middle Dantian.

He possessed something the overwhelmingly powerful Blood Lord and Western Heaven Demon Lord had lacked—or had never felt any need for.

Caution. Thoroughness. Those were the old monster's sharpest weapons.

The Great Snow Fiend, this easy?

No. Not the Great Snow Fiend I had fought.

[2964] A Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb). Ten thousand geun is about 6,000 kg (13,200 lb); a thousand geun is about 600 kg (1,320 lb).

[2965] A jang is ten cheok, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[2966] A chi is approximately 3.03 cm (1.19 in).

In a fraction of an instant, I twisted with all my strength. My body stopped short, and the internal energy surging through me like a raging sea reversed course.

Hot blood welled up in my throat. My spearhead veered in midair and sliced through the clothes.

Then I saw it clearly.

SHNK.

In the slow-moving world, flesh and bone parted beneath the spearhead like tofu. Blood drifted upward as though weightless. Beyond it, disheveled hair fluttered, and over the shoulder of a corpse already dead, a pair of cold eyes gleamed.

I'll return it to you. Exactly the way you did.

I felt those words from a voice I could not hear.

Then a bitterly cold flash erupted from the gaping hole in the Black Hand Fist Demon's chest.

SHWAAASH!

I knew at once. I could not dodge this attack.

But I could avoid a fatal wound. Covering my upper body was Fire Dragon Armor, the extraordinary divine weapon I had gained by killing the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

But…

KRRUNCH! THUD!

Cold—and hot at the same time.

The Yin-Cold Qi seeping into my body. And the spearhead of another divine weapon, White Flame, which had broken through Fire Dragon Armor and lodged in my chest.

BEEP. BEEP. BEEEEP!

SYSTEM

- Part of Fire Dragon Armor has been destroyed by powerful energy!
- Time remaining until Fire Dragon Armor is automatically repaired: 3 days
- Yin-Cold Qi is violently shaking your insides!
- Status abnormality: Bleeding
- Status abnormality: Massive Internal Injury
- There is a risk of qi deviation! Calm your energy as soon as possible!
- Your body has suffered severe internal and external damage!

…

…

…

My vision grew hazy from the horrible pain. As warning sounds continued to pierce my ears without pause, I thought:

This was truly turning out to be one hell of a day.

Jin Taekyung was not the only one who felt the world stop in that instant.

Hidden in the dust, waiting for his final chance, the Great Snow Fiend felt it too. After the longest, hardest wait of his nearly century-long life, he could finally let out the breath he had been holding.

KRRUNCH. THUD!

A spearhead buried in a man's chest. A body trembling. Eyes filled with pain and despair.

"Gueeek!"

SPLASH!

Dark-red blood mixed with bits of organs splattered across the Great Snow Fiend's face.

The foul, bloody stench filled his nose, but it did not bother him. No, what stunned him was the sight of that young bastard still alive.

What a lunatic.

The Great Snow Fiend's plan would have been perfect if Jin Taekyung had not twisted away at the last moment. The spearhead meant for his heart had struck his chest instead.

And if this old man hadn't adjusted the thrust to follow him… it would only have caught his side.

A chill ran down the Great Snow Fiend's spine.

He had revised his assessment of Jin Taekyung long ago.

Not fifty years. Thirty. No—perhaps in twenty, he'll rival the Martial God and the Heavenly Demon.

A monstrous talent. A determination fiercer than fire.

It went beyond martial arts. It was strength that came from the man himself, an aura that inspired not merely wariness but fear.

In the Great Snow Fiend's eyes, Jin Taekyung was already strong enough to stand beside the leaders of the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families. Even beside the Ten Kings, he would not fall short.

But this is as far as you go.

GRIND.

The Great Snow Fiend gritted his teeth and tightened his grip on the spear shaft.

His right sleeve hung empty, as though something had torn the arm from it. He had lost it to the White Tiger's ambush and the spear that had come crashing down immediately afterward. He had no regrets.

An arm was nearly as precious as his life, but Dark Heaven's uncanny sorcerers would surely find a solution without much difficulty.

What mattered now was that he could finish Jin Taekyung—that terrifyingly tenacious monster.

Did I not tell you? You will die, and this old man will live. That is the natural order. Heaven's mandate.

Fear and joy mingled on the Great Snow Fiend's face as he gathered the little strength he had left.

The cool shaft of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron drove deeper into Jin Taekyung's chest.

KRRUNCH!

The spearhead, wreathed in cold instead of flame, dug into its owner's chest. Flesh split, bone cracked, and Jin Taekyung's body jerked.

PFFT. SPLAAASH!

Blood spurted like a fountain. His eyes slowly dimmed.

The Great Snow Fiend had watched countless people die. He had never been more certain.

No one can save him now. Not the Divine Physician. Not even the Great Firmament Immortal.

But he had forgotten something.

The young man dying right before his eyes was an existence akin to supernatural powers—something that could not be predicted by his judgment.

GRAB. THRUST!

He had neither time nor strength to respond.

In his eyes, coldness gave way to shock. Reflected there was Jin Taekyung, gripping the spear shaft with all his strength and pushing himself forward, driving it deeper into his own chest.

And in his blood-soaked hand, the last flame burned.

"…!"

Blue-white light-flames spread across the Great Snow Fiend's widened eyes.

FWOOSH—KWAANG!

Chapter 685

FWOOSH. KWAANG!

Blue-white light-flames filled the Great Snow Fiend's vision.

An explosion sounded as though announcing the end of everything. His aged body flew through the air in an arc and slammed into a massive boulder, shattering it.

KRRRUNCH.

His blood-red vision grew hazy. The sounds reaching his ears seemed to come from hundreds of li away.[2967]

And yet his mind remained startlingly clear.

Like a candle burning brightest just before it went out.

A final rally.

The four characters flashed through the Great Snow Fiend's mind. At the same time, something hot rose in his throat.

COUGH.

Dark-red blood soaked his lower body. Bits of organs were mixed in with it. He stared blankly at the mess, then realized something.

No. He was certain.

This time, there could be no mistake.

It's over. All of it.

Strange as it was, pain was how people knew they were alive.

Yet even with the meridians throughout his body torn apart by Scorching Yang Qi, his flesh and bones crushed, the Great Snow Fiend felt no pain.

Only fear.

Fear of the death finally looming before him, and of the figure approaching through his blood-red vision.

"Jin… Taekyung."

The name escaped his trembling lips in something like a moan.

No answer came to the dying old man.

No—Jin Taekyung could not answer.

DRIP. DRIP.

Blood fell with every step he took. He staggered as though he might collapse, his eyes unfocused.

But he was alive.

With his beloved spear lodged near his ribs, Jin Taekyung was coming toward the Great Snow Fiend, fighting off even the death closing in on him.

How can this be…?

[2967] In this Chinese setting, one li is about 500 m (0.311 mi).

It was not just death or the cold that made the Great Snow Fiend tremble.

He was afraid. And he wanted to know.

They were made of the same flesh and blood. How was that young monster still standing? What had brought the two of them to this?

Where did it begin? What went wrong?

Nearly half a century had passed since he had left his family, subordinates, and friends behind and departed his homeland alone.

To overcome his limits, he had created new martial arts. He had risked death countless times and devoted his life to perfecting them.

The righteous path? He had never cared for that shallow phrase hypocrites liked to spout.

He had to survive, whatever it took. And if he was ever to return home, he had to become strong enough that no one could ignore him.

Without that single-minded purpose, he would never have taken the hand Dark Heaven offered him decades ago.

The day the Lord of Heaven descends upon this land, everything you desire will come true.

Everything…?

Yes. If that is what you want.

The Great Snow Fiend had believed those words. He had pledged himself to Dark Heaven. At the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's command, he had even taken on a successor—something he had never imagined doing—and taught him the martial arts he had created.

All while waiting for that day.

So why?

"Why should this old man—why should I die by your hand? Why!"

The Great Snow Fiend raised his head with that strangled cry and saw a pair of eyes still holding a flame that had not gone out.

A faint voice reached him.

"Because I have a reason."

What?

"A reason I have to survive, no matter what. A reason I sometimes have to risk dying."

"…!"

"That's the biggest difference between us."

Jin Taekyung reached out with a trembling hand. His blood-soaked fingers closed around the spear lodged in his chest.

SPLASH. DRIP, DRIP.

He drew the spearhead out slowly. Blood came with it, spattering across the Great Snow Fiend's face.

Jin Taekyung convulsed in agony, and the Great Snow Fiend laughed as though he had lost his mind.

"Follow me soon. I'll be waiting in the afterlife."

SWISH.

The wavering spearhead touched his throat. Jin Taekyung muttered, his voice worn thin.

"Idiot. Go find your parents."

And that was the end.

SHNK.

The cold blade pierced his throat.

In a moment that seemed to stretch on while everything else stood still, the Great Snow Fiend watched the world darken. It was nowhere near enough time to look back over the century he had lived.

Damn it.

The curse never left his lips. The old monster who had dominated an era fell into deep darkness.

No one survives a spearhead through the throat.

Not a Supreme Peak master with several jiazi[2968] of Yin-Cold Qi. Not a fiend who has lived nearly a century.

Just as it was now.

SHNK.

The transparent spearhead pierced his throat, and that was it.

The Supreme Peak master once known as the Great Snow Fiend was gone.

I stared blankly down at the corpse, its eyes wide open and its body frozen in place, then let out a short groan.

"…Ah."

It was over. Finally.

The moment I recognized reality along with the thought filling my mind, the world tilted.

SLIP.

No. I was tilting.

I tried to stay on my feet, but there was nothing I could do. The last scrap of strength left my hand, and the spear shaft slipped from my grip.

[2968] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

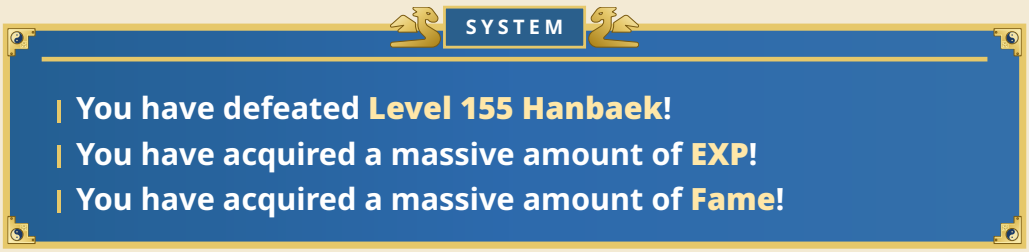
THUD.

My vision blurred. Pain, exhaustion, and relief—everything I had managed to forget for a moment—came crashing over me.

I collapsed where I stood and lay gasping, staring into the air.



That was all.

There were three numbers in the holographic window visible through my blurred vision. None of them announced a level-up, and the System remained silent.

And I…

This would be pretty lame if it were a hidden-camera prank.

I laughed at the stupid thought. There was no particular reason. The corners of my blood-crusted mouth lifted, and a hollow chuckle escaped.

Fuck. Hidden-camera prank, my ass.

Right. So that's how it is.

How long could I last like this?

Fifteen minutes? Seven and a half?

Should I just be glad Muyaho got away alive?

It was strange. My last hope had fallen apart, but I felt calm enough to surprise myself.

Maybe I had seen it coming, somewhere deep down.

Luck doesn't come twice in a row.

The level-up I had gained from killing the Black Hand Fist Demon had been a gamble in the first place. Without a way to see my exact EXP, I could only guess.

That should be enough to level up.

Or:

No. That won't do it.

Unfortunately, this time it was the latter.

The Great Snow Fiend had left behind a massive amount of EXP, just as the System said. But it was less than what I had earned on the way to the Poisonblood Grounds and from the Black Hand Fist Demon combined.

Or maybe my earlier stroke of luck had raised the amount I needed for the next level.

Either way, the conclusion was simple. My first gamble had paid off. My second hadn't.

As if Heaven had decided my fate from the start.

Damn fate.

Fate. I had hated that word for a long time.

It could mean something good, sure. But it was also two little characters you could use to lump together every fucked-up thing that happened in the world.

Some things in life were too cruel and hopeless to shrug off as fate.

Like the memory of a certain day I kept hidden in one corner of my heart.

"Um, Mr. Kim?"

"Oh! Yes, Vice Principal. What brings you here all of a sudden…?"

"Sorry to interrupt your class, but could we talk outside for a moment?"

Even now, I remembered it like a scene from a cheap black-and-white movie.

Scene one: The bald vice principal appeared, cleared his throat, and left with my homeroom teacher.

Scene two: Through the glass window in the classroom's front door, I watched my homeroom teacher's bewildered face slowly harden.

And scene three: After returning to the classroom, my homeroom teacher called out a student's name after a brief silence.

"Taekyung. Could you come outside for a moment?"

That was how I went from Extra Number One to the star of the movie.

No. I had never wanted to be the star. I wished it really had been a movie. Then I could have half-killed the screenwriter and director behind that shitty story until they called for another take.

But life is one take.

With every moment and every choice, the story flows with me at its center.

I had never given life a serious thought until I saw my father beneath a white sheet.

Cause: a Monster Wave. Cause of death: crushing.

That was when I understood. My father's story had ended because of that damn word, fate, and mine had begun.

"…COUGH."

SPLASH. DRIP, DRIP.

But I didn't want the last scene of my story to be me bleeding from my seven apertures[2969] on the cold ground.

No soft music over ending credits listing my family, friends, and comrades, either.

[2969]The seven apertures are the eyes, ears, nostrils, and mouth.

I still had a chance to defy this damn fate. A third chance to put my life down as the stake before it burned to ash and scattered.

I want to live.

That single thought filled my head.

It was as simple as that. I didn't want to die here. There was too much I still had to do, too many people I had left behind.

CRUNCH.

I mustered what little strength remained and bit my tongue. The sharp pain brought my fading sight and mind back into focus, if only a little.

Now.

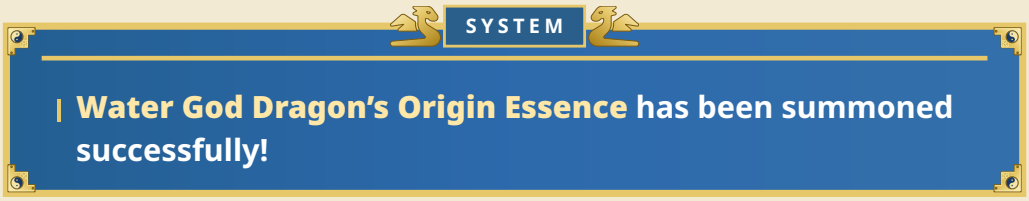
I opened my trembling hand and gave the command in my mind.

Inventory Open. Summon.

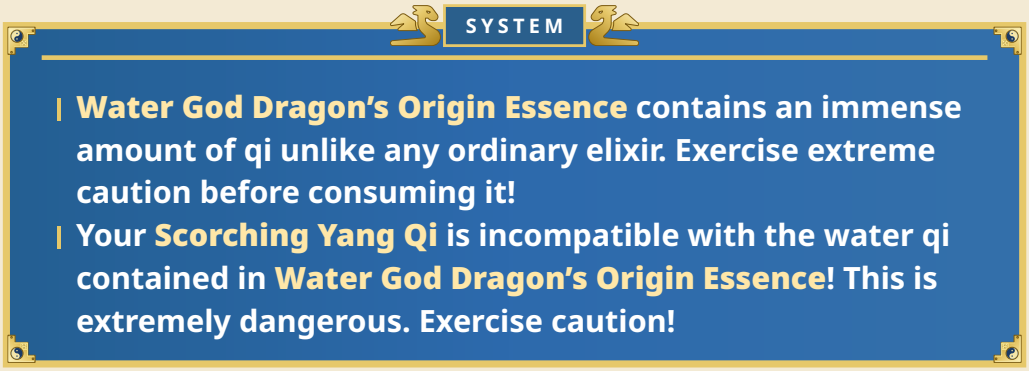
SWISH.

Something cool and smooth settled against my palm. At the same time, two very different System alerts sounded in my ear.

DING.



BEEP!



I knew. I knew this was insane.

What I was about to do went against the principles of Yin and Yang[2970] and the Five Elements[2971]—the foundation of most internal energy cultivation techniques.

Pouring water on fire. It was like trying to evolve Charmeleon into Blastoise.[2972]

But…

[2970] Yin and Yang are complementary forces in traditional Chinese thought.
[2971] The Five Elements are wood, fire, earth, metal, and water in traditional Chinese thought.
[2972] Charmeleon and Blastoise are Pokémon from different evolution lines.

There's no time.

To hell with incompatibility. Whether I bled to death in fifteen minutes or exploded because I couldn't contain the Origin Essence's power, I'd be dead either way.

At least the second option gave me a sliver of a chance.

GURK.

I spat up another surge of blood, squeezed out what little strength I had left, and pushed myself upright. Fighting through pain that made my body feel as though it were crumbling, I sat cross-legged and looked up at the sky.

Fuck, look at those storm clouds. Even the sky has to be dark as hell.

It was partly because it was nighttime, but no matter how I looked at it, this was a perfect day to hate dying.

No one was watching, and there wasn't even anyone to stick a cigarette in my mouth. Not that I'd smoke it if there were.

HAAH.

My trembling breath drifted away instead of cigarette smoke.

Night wasn't the only reason my briefly clear vision was darkening again.

I was dying. Quickly.

The moment for my final gamble was almost here.

Now.

I lifted my convulsing hand to my mouth and swallowed the blue pearl, filled with impossibly pure and dangerously vast qi.

Or I tried to.

Until cool qi suddenly swept in from somewhere and engulfed me.

FWOOSH!

What?

Every hair on my body seemed to stand on end. I froze like a statue, and one word flashed through my mind.

Enemy!

But it wasn't. Something had brushed past me, yet I was still alive. Then a thunderous roar in the distance drove the question from my mind.

"GRAAAAH!"

"…!"

I had been sure he'd escaped. I'd told myself to be glad at least he had survived.

You came back after all.

My sight was blurred, but the snow-white body shone bright enough to recognize even in the dark.

Nor was it difficult to make out the figures of two people sitting on the back of the White Tiger as it raced toward me like the wind.

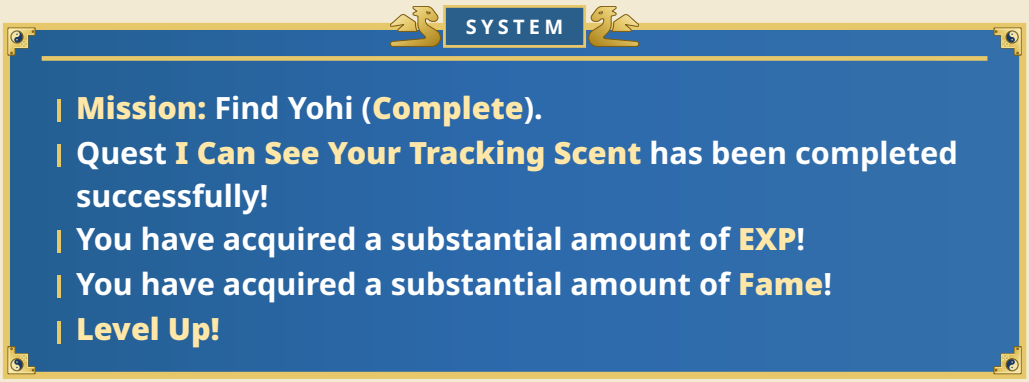
Heugung. And Yohi.

As their faces came into view, I remembered the Quest I had forgotten for a moment.

Then I stared blankly up at the sky and muttered:

“Just as I thought. It’s a perfect day to hate dying.”

DING.



I could feel it.

Death falling away from me. A gentle warmth wrapping around my wounded, exhausted body.

DING. DING. DING.

Clear bells rang beneath the storm-clouded sky. I slowly closed my eyes.

SLIP.

With no moonlight to be seen, the sleep demon came pouring down instead.

It was stronger than any enemy I had ever faced.

Chapter 686

Jin Taekyung fell into a sleep so deep it was almost unconsciousness. At nearly the same moment, Muyaho, who had been racing like the wind, stopped in his tracks.

THUMP.

Leaning against a shattered boulder, Jin's head drooped.

Yohi caught her breath. Heugung had climbed down from Muyaho's back a step ahead of her and was checking Jin's pulse. He let out a sigh.

"Whew. Fortunately, he's still alive."

It was good news, but Yohi's face did not brighten.

"Still?"

Only then did Heugung realize how his words had sounded.

"I misspoke in my haste. He's not at death's door. I don't think you need to worry too much."

"Not at death's door? Looking like that?"

Yohi had every reason to doubt him.

Jin Taekyung was drenched in blood from head to toe. His clothes were torn and slashed all over, and the unidentified armor covering his upper body was shattered at the chest, as though something had pierced it.

It was hard to believe he was alive at all.

Yet Heugung was telling the truth.

"I've examined him. His injuries aren't as serious as we might think. But these wounds… I can hardly believe what I'm seeing."

Although their internal energy had been sealed for the time being, both of them were martial artists who had reached the Peak realm.

The two Great Chieftains could not reconcile the wounds they saw with Jin's condition, but they breathed a sigh of relief when they realized his life was not in immediate danger.

That relief had barely settled when they noticed someone lodged in the massive boulder Jin was leaning against.

Yohi stifled a cry.

The unidentified old man was frozen there with his eyes wide open. He was already dead. Blood still flowed from his throat, pierced by a snow-white spearhead.

THUD. DRIP, DRIP.

Yohi stared at the old man, every bit as blood-soaked as Jin, and murmured, "That's him."

"Who?"

"The one who spoke to Black Hand as if that old man were his subordinate."

"Ah."

"And if I'm right…"

Yohi swept her gaze across the area. It stopped on the corpse of the Black Hand Fist Demon.

He had slaughtered the warriors of the Western Yao Estate with the prowess of a fiend. Now he lay dead with a gaping hole in his chest.

This is impossible.

Yohi's eyebrows trembled. She had begun to suspect it when she found the unidentified old man, but what had happened here went far beyond anything she had imagined.

She was not alone.

"How did he…"

Heugung swallowed the rest. It made no sense, but the scene before them was real.

The surroundings had been devastated by a force unlike anything they had seen. Two old men lay dead. One young man slept alone.

The conclusion was plain.

Jin Taekyung had fought and won—against two Supreme Peak masters who had devoted several times as many years to martial arts as he had been alive.

"…Blazing Flame Divine Dragon."

The sobriquet slipped from Yohi's red lips like a groan. Awe filled her eyes as she looked at Jin.

Whether it should have been possible no longer mattered. He had made it possible, willingly risking his life to save them, though they were only southern tribespeople to him.

Now it was their turn to act for him.

It may already be too late. But I have to act now.

Some of Nanman's venomous beasts shed their skins at certain times. They molted.

A new body did not come easily. Succeed, and the creature emerged more beautiful and stronger. Fail, and it slowly died in its old, ailing body.

Yohi chose the first path.

If I wait any longer, it'll all be over. I have to tell everyone what happened.

They had to expose Baeksang's conspiracy and stop Dark Heaven. Her own wrongdoing would come to light along with it, but she had made up her mind. She would bear the full cost of the path she had chosen.

I never should have done it.

Looking back, she felt nothing but regret.

Baeksang had laid a broad, beautiful road of silk before her. Yohi had walked it all the way here, turning a blind eye to everything happening around her.

But when she reached the end and happened to look down, she saw that her feet had long since become covered in blood.

Not her own. The blood of other Nanman people.

Now she wanted to wipe it away. If she could not, she would cut off her feet.

One person, more than any other, had brought her to that decision.

Jin Taekyung.

A stranger from a foreign land. Yet he had fought for Nanman more than anyone—just as the former Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan had done centuries ago, before he passed into legend.

I may be a Great Chieftain, but I can't be worse than a Han Chinese person.

If a bitch like me can even call herself a Great Chieftain…

Yohi swallowed the self-mocking words and immediately sprang into action.

RRRIP.

Without a moment's hesitation, her slender white hands tore at her ornate gown. She removed her gold and silver jewelry as well, baring her arms and legs.

Heugung's eyes widened.

"Yohi."

"There's no time to talk. We need to move now."

Heugung studied her in silence for a moment, then nodded.

"You're right. More enemies could arrive at any time."

"Considering how quiet it's been around us until now, it's safe to assume there aren't any others. No, they probably decided Dark Heaven didn't need to send more support after arranging for two Supreme Peak masters to come here."

"Probably. They knew about the tracking scent you carried. They must have meant to use us as bait to draw in Palace Lord Yayul. He would be Dark Heaven's greatest obstacle right now."

But Jin Taekyung, not the Beast Miao King, had taken the bait. The hunters had become the hunted.

No one, not even Dark Heaven, could have predicted that.

The longer they talked, though, the heavier Yohi's heart grew.

"What if Jin Taekyung didn't come in the Palace Lord's place? What if the Palace Lord couldn't come?"

"That…"

"My tribespeople were massacred. The Western Yao Estate. Nothing like this has ever happened before. The Inner Palace must be in an uproar by now."

"Then shouldn't we go to the Inner Palace as quickly as possible?"

Yohi shook her head. She had shut her eyes and ears for the sake of her ambitions, but she was no fool.

Dark Heaven had won over Baeksang, the Beast Miao King's sworn younger brother, then waited decades for the right moment.

She remembered what the unidentified old man now buried in the boulder had said.

> "If you act rashly when the grand plan is so close, I will not forgive you."

The grand plan.

Yohi sensed indescribable danger and anxiety in those two words. She also realized that their abduction had been a carefully calculated act.

The Western Yao Estate, massacred. The Inner Palace, surely in chaos. Baeksang, with a base of support equal to—or greater than—the Palace Lord's.

And Dark Heaven had planned it all.

The answer was not hard to find.

"Yohi?"

Heugung's voice snapped her out of her thoughts. She bit her lip.

If the thought that just crossed my mind is correct…

The Inner Palace would be a demon-slaying battleground now, full of fiends and sinister schemes.

"We shouldn't go to the Inner Palace. We have to go west."

"West? Do you mean…"

"Yes. Boshan."

The tribes lived throughout Nanman, but each had a home base. Several thousand Yao people had settled in Boshan alone.

"Baeksang and Dark Heaven will have taken control of the Inner Palace by now. If the tribal chieftains and the Tribal Grand Council have made their decision, even the Palace Lord may be powerless to stop them."

"Hmm."

"Believe me. If we head to the Inner Palace now, we'll be eliminated before we even manage to enter it."

Heugung looked at her, his eyes grave.

"And if we go to Boshan?"

"I'm the Great Chieftain of the Yao people. Do I need to say more?"

"How many warriors can you muster?"

"A thousand, if I gather everyone I can. Nowhere near enough to face Baeksang with Dark Heaven behind him. But will his people still follow him once they know what's happened?"

"Public support will waver. His warriors will desert him."

“I’ll send messenger pigeons and messengers to every tribe and village. Seven days at most. Within that time, all of Nanman will know about Baeksang’s atrocities.”

Heugung let out a quiet exclamation as Yohi continued speaking without hesitation.

“You’re clever indeed. More so than the woman I thought I knew.”

For a moment, Yohi forgot their situation and gave a short laugh.

“That sounds strange coming from you. You’ve become a completely different person.”

“I had no choice. To escape Baeksang’s notice, I first had to hide who I was.”

Heugung answered calmly and held something out to her: a round pill wrapped in yellow paper.

“Take it.”

“What is it?”

“An antidote the Black Hand Fist Demon was carrying. I found it when I searched him a little while ago. With our internal energy sealed, Baeksang’s warriors will hunt us down before we reach Boshan.”

He was right. No matter how skilled a warrior might be, without training in external arts they could not shake off a pursuit party. Yohi’s martial prowess was not especially great to begin with.

RUSTLE.

She took the pill without protest, chewed it, and swallowed. The bitter taste made her wince, but it was a hundred times better than dying without even putting up a fight.

“How long will it take to reach Boshan?”

“We’re in Ailao Mountain, so… three or four days should be enough. First we have to get out of the Poisonblood Grounds.”

On the way in, they had seen venomous beasts unlike any they knew and a swamp of deadly poison. They knew where they were.

“Jin should be awake by then.”

“Yes. If he wakes, he’ll be worth an army.”

Heugung slung Jin over his back. Muyaho, who had been pissing on the dead Black Hand Fist Demon’s face, ran over and offered his back.

“Grrr.”

Heugung gazed at the White Tiger’s blue-white eyes.

“Don’t you find him strange?”

“What?”

“This one the Young Palace Lord keeps. Whenever I saw him in the Inner Palace, he bared his teeth at me. But with Jin Taekyung here, he’s gentle as a lamb.”

“He must have taken a liking to Jin. They say spiritual creatures know what sort of person they’re dealing with.”

Yohi answered without thinking. Then something struck her as odd.

Heugung gave a quiet laugh.

“Yes. I think you’re right.”

CRUNCH! THUD.

Blood sprayed, and the enormous silver body tipped sideways.

As Yohi stared blankly at the sight, Heugung’s voice reached her ears.

“Didn’t I tell you? I had to hide myself first.”

Chapter 687

SLICE. THUD!

For a moment, the world seemed to stop.

“Grrrk.”

The massive White Tiger lay panting where it had fallen, like a rotten log. Jin Taekyung was completely unconscious.

In Yohi’s eyes, one man held him in his arms and went on speaking calmly.

“I told you. I should have hidden myself first.”

“…!”

Enlightenment and shock flashed through Yohi’s mind like lightning. Her eyes, usually calm and deep, widened.

“Heugung, you—”

“You don’t call me big brother anymore. I rather liked hearing it.”

She had called him that until just a few shichen[2973] ago. But she could never call him that again.

The kindly, heavyset middle-aged man before her was not the Heugung she knew.

“Why?”

Heugung shrugged at the question in her voice. “It’s simple. Just as you used me, I used you.”

“…So you were working with Baeksang after all. You too.”

“That’s a strange way to put it. Weren’t we all working together?”

“…!”

Yohi went rigid. Heugung gave a short laugh.

“Don’t deny it. No one watched you and Baeksang more closely than I did.”

“Then your sudden visit to the Western Yao Estate…”

“All part of the plan. You, Jin Taekyung, the Beast Miao King—even Baeksang. Of course, none of you knew who I really was… Come to think of it, saying we were all working together is rather funny.”

Yohi swallowed a groan. She could understand why she had not known. Though she had sided with Baeksang, her part in it had gone no further than looking the other way.

But the fact that he had hidden his identity even from Baeksang meant…

“You’ve been watching us all this time. Baeksang and me.”

“Congratulations. One step closer to the answer. Two more to go.”

“On the Demon Empress’s orders?”

“Good. One last step.”

[2973] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours.

“You were the knife she kept hidden up her sleeve in case something went wrong.”

Clap. Clap.

Heugung slowly clapped his hands and smiled.

“Clever. That’s right. Though even I never dreamed things would go this far.”

Heugung slowly looked around. The entire area had been reduced to ruins. His gaze passed over the two dead old monsters before finally coming to rest on one person.

“Jin Taekyung, the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon. The Third Young Master of the Jin Family of Taiyuan, and the heir of the Fire King who will one day inherit the orthodox lineage of the Fire Gate Clan.”

His voice was low. A strange glint crossed his eyes as he stared at Jin, who lay unconscious in his arms.

“When I found him here, I knew something had gone wrong. If everything had gone according to plan, he’d have been locked in the underground prison, or the Demon Empress would already have taken him. But…”

Jin Taekyung had followed the tracking scent to the Poisonblood Grounds. There, he had killed the two Supreme Peak masters the Demon Empress had stationed to await the Beast Miao King—and survived.

“Fools. She told them to be careful.”

Heugung muttered under his breath and spat out a wad of phlegm. Then he turned back to Yohi with his usual friendly smile, as if nothing had happened.

“I don’t know if capturing him alive is still the right choice, given how things have turned out… Still, I’m glad I can set things right. Ah, but first I should tell you our destination has changed.”

“…The Inner Palace. You’re taking us to the Inner Palace.”

Heugung nodded at her strained whisper.

“If I return, things should get interesting. The testimony of a Great Chieftain who survived a Han Chinese plot will throw Nanman into turmoil. Every warrior and beast in this land will gather at the Inner Palace, ready to fight the Central Plains.”

“But people aren’t fools. They’ll wonder how a man who’s only at the Peak realm escaped a deadly place like this on his own.”

“Not bad. But what if I were a Supreme Peak master?”

“What are you talking about…?”

“A Supreme Peak master believed to be strong enough to subdue Jin Taekyung. A man with the goodwill and standing to win over even those who would never side with Baeksang. Wouldn’t everyone believe him?”

Yohi froze.

“You… Don’t tell me—”

“That’s right.”

Heugung smiled and summoned his internal energy. From the Western Yao Estate until now, it had never once been sealed. It shifted his bones and flesh and twisted his muscles.

CRACK. CRACK.

The eerie sounds of flesh being torn apart pierced Yohi's ears.

Faint moonlight broke through the clouds. Beneath it, Heugung's shadow changed, growing taller and more powerfully built.

"Ghk."

With one last pained groan, the changes ended. A short title slipped from Yohi's frozen lips.

"…Palace Lord?"

She stared at the man before her in disbelief.

He was Heugung, yet he was the Beast Miao King. The Beast Miao King, yet unmistakably Heugung. He studied his enlarged shadow with a satisfied smile.

"People think the Bone-Shrinking Technique can only make a person smaller. But master it to Great Completion, and you can become someone else entirely."

"…!"

"Now, here's what we'll do. I—or rather, the Beast Miao King—came here and subdued Jin Taekyung. You survived his wicked plot and returned to the Inner Palace to tell everyone this."

He went on slowly as Yohi stared at him, stunned.

"That everything that has happened recently was a conspiracy by Jin Taekyung and the Murim Alliance to swallow Nanman whole. That we must mobilize every human and beast in this land, regardless of age or sex, and invade the Central Plains. What do you think?"

Yohi did not answer. She could not. Fear and rage seemed to squeeze the breath from her body, and the world swam before her eyes.

"H-How could you…"

"Ah. I forgot to mention one thing. Refuse, and Boshan will run red with blood. The four great tribes that rule Nanman will become three."

CRUNCH.

A thin line of blood trickled between Yohi's red lips as she struggled to contain her rage. She glared at Heugung, her eyes blazing, and spat out the words.

"You son of a bitch."

"You wound me. Is that any way to speak to your future husband?"

"Shut your mouth. Who said I was going to marry you?"

"You probably will, once you've watched more than five thousand Yao people lose their heads, one after another, before your eyes."

"…!"

“You’re a stubborn woman, and I’m a patient man. So I’ll wait until all five thousand heads have hit the ground.”

Heugung spoke without a hint of hurry. Then he beamed at Yohi as brightly as he always had, as though nothing had happened.

“I love you, Yohi.”

A chill swept through her, making every hair stand on end. She squeezed her eyes shut.

She could scarcely believe it: a plan that had been unfolding for who knew how long, and the true face of the wastrel everyone had dismissed.

The dark shadow of Dark Heaven hanging over her head.

Haa.

She breathed out, thoughts racing through her mind. Then she opened her eyes, drew the flexible sword at her waist, and spoke.

“You filthy traitor.”

“Filthy traitor? Please don’t be so hard on yourself.”

“I won’t deny it. I became a traitor too. But do you think Dark Heaven—the Southern Heaven Demon Empress—will let you live? What about the Yi people you lead?”

Her words rang out sharp and clear. Heugung blinked, then burst into hearty laughter.

“That has nothing to do with me.”

“What?”

“Some forty years ago, the former chieftain of the Yi people died in the Great Faction War. His only legitimate son left in Nanman was six years old. The able-bodied men and women had gone to war. His mother died before she ever saw his face. All he had beside him was an old nurse whose sight and hearing were failing.”

“…!”

“Yohi.”

Heugung—or rather, the man who had become Heugung—continued with a faint smile.

“I was never a traitor. Not for a single moment.”

CLANG.

The flexible sword slipped from Yohi’s grasp and struck the ground with a clatter.

Breathing hard, she tried to pick it up, but her body would not obey.

What is this?

Her eyelids trembled. Was the shock of everything she had learned making her freeze?

No. She could not move because a sinister, clinging qi had already spread through her entire body.

"Y-You…"

Her voice weakened, and her vision began to fade. Heugung's approaching figure wavered like a heat haze. His voice seemed to come from far away.

"This is why I can't help loving you. So breathtakingly beautiful, and so innocent too."

"That… wasn't an antidote…"

"Unfortunately, I'm not the Beast Miao King. Even crossing swords with you would be more than I could manage. Please forgive this sorry husband of yours, my dear wife. When you wake, I hope you'll make the choice that's best for everyone."

Yohi wanted to scream for someone to come and kill this horrible man. To pull them out of this dark pit and stop the vast scheme that threatened to swallow Nanman.

But the scream that rose in her throat never escaped her lips. And Jin Taekyung, seized by the monster known as the sleep demon, did not open his eyes until the very end.

Then—

SWISH. THUD.

Yohi collapsed like a puppet with its strings cut. Heugung caught her gently in his arms.

A smile appeared at the corner of his mouth, which now wore the face of the Beast Miao King.

"Even asleep, you're beautiful."

Heugung truly loved Yohi. It did not matter that she did not want him.

She would make the right choice eventually. In time, she would come to love him.

Dark Heaven—the Southern Heaven Demon Empress—would keep her promise. After all the years he had spent hiding who he was, his reward would be tenfold, twentyfold.

But first…

I need to finish this.

He kissed Yohi on the forehead and slowly turned.

He walked toward the culprit who had dared to jeopardize the grand plan.

Jin Taekyung.

No one had anticipated him. His appearance had dealt a severe blow to a plan on the verge of success. Two Supreme Peak masters, either of whom could turn the tide of a battle, had been lost.

But nothing had changed.

The grand plan will succeed. There are still others to take their place.

Jin Taekyung would not wake for at least several days. Once Heugung brought him and Yohi back to the Inner Palace, it would all be over.

Yes. Over.

He smiled in satisfaction, passed the panting White Tiger, and grabbed Jin Taekyung by the nape to lift him up.

He was about to lift him when—

Whoooooosh.

A chill wind blew in from somewhere. Heugung looked up.

In the pale moonlight, he saw the shape of something.

“What is that…?”

Before he could finish the question—

SHWAAAASH!

The bleak wind turned into a blade and engulfed his entire body.

Chapter 688

Baeksang stood alone before a mirror.

The mirror Southern Heaven Demon Empress had given him was large enough to reflect his entire body, unlike an ordinary one. Its surface was smooth, without a single scratch. Even in the Central Plains, let alone Nanman, a mirror of such quality would be hard to find.

But Baeksang looked into it for one reason alone: in his reflection, he could see the face of the son who looked just like him.

This has never happened before.

For more than forty years, he had steadied himself whenever he wavered. He had done it countless times to reach this position. Yet now he was more shaken than ever.

That must mean the grand plan I've spent decades carrying out is nearing its end.

A door opened behind him, and a familiar face appeared. Baeksang met the Captain of the Guards' eyes in the mirror.

"Have you brought him?"

The Captain hesitated at the sight of his lord standing lost in thought, then answered.

"He's on his way."

"Then why are you here?"

"An urgent report."

"An urgent report…"

Baeksang let the words trail off and crooked a finger. The Captain approached and lowered his voice.

"Last night, a massive wildfire was spotted three hundred li[2974] to the north."

"Ailao Mountain."

"Yes."

"Jin Taekyung must have started it."

"We need to confirm that, but given everything that's happened, he's the most likely culprit."

"It was Jin Taekyung. Once again, it seems glory-blinded moths have rushed toward the flames."

"The small and midsized tribes near Ailao Mountain joined forces, or so we're told. They attacked him with five hundred warriors and a hundred beasts, but…"

Baeksang waved him silent. He had heard enough. Five hundred stragglers hastily gathered together could do nothing to Jin Taekyung.

[2974] A Chinese li is 500 m (0.311 mi). Three hundred li are about 150 km (93 mi); a hundred li are about 50 km (31 mi).

The saying the few cannot overcome the many meant different things depending on who the opponent was. Jin Taekyung clearly lay outside the equation.

"I can guess how that ended. What happened to Jin Taekyung afterward?"

"They say he routed the warriors, then headed toward Ailao Mountain alone."

"He must have a purpose. The Poisonblood Grounds, perhaps?"

"The fire was too fierce for anyone to confirm where he went. It started at the mountain's entrance and has already spread halfway up."

"He means to see this through."

Ailao Mountain was among the most forbidding mountains in Nanman. Its slopes were treacherous, its valleys deep. Winding ridges stretched for a hundred li[2975] beneath a seemingly endless cover of ancient trees.

Now that a wildfire had settled over Ailao Mountain, it would take at least three full days and nights before there was even a sign of the flames dying down.

The whole mountain might burn.

If it was a coincidence, it was a remarkable one. Fire had not swept through Ailao Mountain in over two hundred years. The last time it had, someone from the Fire Gate Clan had used the entire mountain for kindling to destroy the Five Poisons Sect.

That was how Nanman found peace again.

But would it happen that way this time?

Baeksang studied his reflection in silence, then spoke.

"Evacuate every tribesperson living nearby. Choose three thousand capable warriors and blockade Ailao Mountain."

The Captain of the Guards had continued his report impassively, but a flicker of agitation crossed his face.

"Three thousand? When we've already ordered a general mobilization across Nanman?"

"We need to hold Jin Taekyung there, if only as a precaution."

"But my lord, even with that many men, we can't surround the entire mountain…"

"For all its size, Ailao Mountain has few passable entrances. Deploy them accordingly."

After a moment's thought, the Captain bowed his head.

"As you command."

"What of the other chieftains?"

"As I reported, five chieftains have disappeared. So have the warriors under the two chieftains who set out earlier with the scouting party."

"So it comes to this. They refuse to accept reality."

[2975] A Chinese li is 500 m (0.311 mi). Three hundred li are about 150 km (93 mi); a hundred li are about 50 km (31 mi).

Baeksang's voice was calm.

The missing chieftains were the ones who had never switched sides. Their loyalty to the Beast Miao King had held firm. Some had even spat at Baeksang when he tried to win them over.

"My lord, they've undoubtedly betrayed us. It isn't too late to send men after them __"

Baeksang shook his head.

"Someone told me not long ago that one diseased tree does not make an entire forest sick. We need only thin out the afflicted trees."

"You mean…"

"Thirty-two tribes have shared this land for centuries. I've often wondered how much longer that arrangement ought to last."

The Captain's eyes widened as he grasped his meaning.

"Thirty-two is too many to bring together behind one purpose," Baeksang continued, his voice low. "It's time to thin out the diseased trees and put the forest in order."

Expulsion. Or elimination.

The will of the man who had driven out this land's longtime ruler and taken his throne was unmistakable.

The Captain stared at his lord, mouth open, before asking, "What should we do?"

"If they leave, let them. Should they return home and rally their warriors, we'll have both a justification and the strength to act."

The Captain knew the balance of power had tipped long ago. But one man still worried him.

"If the Palace Lord—no, if Yayul Cheok joins them, it won't be so simple."

Baeksang regarded him for a moment.

"Long ago, while I was staying in the Central Plains, I heard an interesting story."

"My lord?"

"A monkey was born from stone. Its nature was so fierce, and its strength so great, that Shakyamuni, whom the monks of the Central Plains revere, offered it a wager: could it escape the palm of his hand?"

His calm voice held the Captain's attention.

"The monkey snorted and accepted. It rode a cloud to the edge of the world and even scribbled on five pillars it found there. Only when it returned did it learn that those pillars had been Shakyamuni's fingers."

Baeksang slowly opened his hand toward the mirror.

The enormous Palace Lord's Hall seemed to fit in his palm. Sky and river, earth and mountain—even if the mirror had shown all of Nanman, it would have fit there too.

“Yayul Cheok is no different. Now that I hold this position, he can never escape.”

“Then…”

“We have word that he went east. Take a thousand Bai warriors and pursue him yourself.”

“As you command.”

The Captain bowed, then moved his lips again.

“I beg your pardon, but we’re dealing with the Beast Miao King. As a precaution, perhaps you should deploy the Baekcheon Unit.”

Baeksang silently shook his head. The Baekcheon Unit was the blade he had secretly honed for decades.

He had to draw and wield it when it was most needed.

“That will be all. Our guest has arrived. You may go.”

He was speaking to the Captain, but his gaze—fixed on the mirror throughout their conversation—had found the old man standing in the open doorway.

“Then I’ll take my leave.”

After confirming that the Captain of the Guards had left the Palace Lord’s Hall, Baeksang slowly turned around.

“You’ve come, Head Elder.”

The greeting was matter-of-fact. The answer was not.

“Shut that filthy mouth of yours.”

THUD.

An old man approached, leaning on a cane. Age spots covered his face, and every patch of exposed skin was wrinkled. Anger burned in the corners of his eyes, where fluid had gathered.

“You wretched bastard.”

“I see you overheard us.”

“Do you think this old man doesn’t know what’s in your black heart? You meant for me to hear, didn’t you?”

“If you mean what I said about Yayul Cheok—the villain who defied the Tribal Grand Council to save a murderer, then betrayed the Nanman Beast Palace—yes.”

“You bastard!”

WHOOSH! CLACK.

The old man swung his cane with all his strength. Baeksang caught it in one hand.

There was little force behind the blow, and no internal energy to speak of.

Baeksang took the cane from him with ease, then flicked his sleeve. Invisible qi forced the old man down into a seat.

“You’ve aged since I last saw you. Your temper hasn’t changed, though.”

The old man trembled.

"If I'd known you would do this, I'd have beaten you to death with my own hands long ago."

"But far too much time has passed for that. Yayul Cheok has betrayed the Palace and fled. The fate of the Miao people now rests with a boy you once caught stealing fruit wine and scolded soundly."

"…!"

"It's time to leave the distant past behind and think about what comes next. With the Chieftain and Lesser Chieftain gone, everything depends on the choice you make as Great Chieftain of the Miao people."

The old man—the Miao Head Elder—glared at Baeksang for a long moment.

"So you've seized Nanman after all. Such ugly greed."

"Call it what you like. There's nothing I won't do to obtain what I so desperately want."

"You're Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace now. What more could you want? Do you mean to get your hands on the Beast King Stone and become a god?"

Baeksang shook his head.

"I have no interest in some ancient sacred treasure passed down only by word of mouth. What I want now is the future—and your wise choice, Head Elder."

"The boy I remember wasn't like this."

"I changed. Everything does."

"The Palace Lord trusted you. Even though I told him to be so wary, he trusted his one and only sworn brother."

"Not every act of trust needs to be repaid."

"It isn't too late. Even now—"

"I crossed that river long ago. Once you're on a tiger's back, you can't climb down. Now it's your turn to get on, Head Elder."

CRACK.

Bones shifted in the old man's tightly clenched fist.

"So that's what you want from this old man. You want me to betray the Palace Lord?"

"Of course not."

Baeksang picked up his teacup.

"I want all the Miao people to betray him. You included."

"…!"

"Read the situation carefully, if you want to save more than ten thousand of your people."

"You bastard!"

"Remember: this is my first and last offer."

Baeksang tilted the teacup.

The Head Elder squeezed his eyes shut.

After a short silence, his hoarse voice broke through.

“Impossible.”

CLACK.

Baeksang set down the teacup and stared at the Head Elder with deeply sunken eyes.

“Won’t you regret that answer?”

“Kill me instead. Ask any Miao person, and you’ll hear the same answer.”

“You haven’t disappointed me.”

Baeksang snapped his fingers. The closed door opened, revealing Bai warriors.

“Lock up the entire Miao leadership in the underground prison, including the Head Elder.”

The warriors bowed, took the Head Elder by either arm, and pulled him to his feet.

The old man, whose day of death was approaching, cried out in a ringing voice.

“Baeksang! You bastard! Aren’t you afraid of Heaven?”

By the time his scream had gradually faded into the distance, Baeksang was looking down at the empty teacup and muttering.

“What more is there to fear? Heaven’s will brought me this far.”

There had been a time when he resented Heaven.

After the Great Faction War ended and he returned to Nanman, Baeksang spent every day drunk. He drank as though each day were his last, then despaired when the next morning’s sunlight woke him.

Why did you let me live? Why?

Those days had been more painful than death.

But he could not spend forever writhing in grief. There was something he had to do.

Something he had to do.

Baeksang looked through the window at the blue sky.

Is this truly your will? No… Have you ever watched over me even once?

As always, he waited in vain for an answer.

Except for the unfamiliar voice that pierced his ears the next moment.

“Um… Shall I refill your tea?”

Baeksang turned toward it.

A pretty maid stood at the half-open door, looking at him.

“No need.”

“But your cup is empty.”

“I said there’s no—”

He stopped. After studying the maid for a moment, he said, “Come in.”

At his quiet command, the warriors who had moved to stop her stepped back. The door closed firmly behind her.

She hurried over in small steps and slowly tilted the teapot above his cup.

Trickle.

Steam rose, carrying the scent of tea. Yet Baeksang felt a throb of pain, as though he had inhaled Poison Mist.

Baeksang silently watched the teacup fill before suddenly speaking.

“Whose face is that, Demon Empress?”

The maid—Southern Heaven Demon Empress—smiled.

“A girl who worked in the Inner Palace. So young and fresh. She was too cute to resist.”

“Did you kill her?”

“Oh my. Does that matter so much?”

“That…”

“How interesting. Hundreds of people have already died, and you are worried about the life of one maid.”

Baeksang fell silent, then answered evenly.

“I only asked because it might disrupt the plan. Anything that happens in the Inner Palace is quickly discovered.”

“Ah, I see. Well, if that’s your concern…”

Southern Heaven Demon Empress gave him a coy smile and picked up the teacup.

“You needn’t worry about that. If there’s a problem, it’s at Ailao Mountain, not the Inner Palace.”

“Ailao Mountain? Do you mean…?”

“Yes. Jin Taekyung. That child has done something. We still haven’t heard from them, so I’m sure of it.”

Baeksang thought for a moment.

“It was a trap?”

“That’s right. A trap laid to catch the old tiger who had left the Palace. I never expected the young tiger to get caught in it instead.”

CLICK.

She set down her cup, amusement in her voice.

“Of course, I didn’t expect the young tiger to be strong enough to break it, either.”

“It must have been a thorough trap, for you to be so confident in it.”

“Two Supreme Peak masters. One was the Black Hand Fist Demon. The other…”

She paused and smiled at Baeksang.

“At any rate, he was strong. Far stronger than the Black Hand Fist Demon.”

“…!”

“It is astonishing. I thought those two would be able to deal with the Beast Miao King. It seems the Lord of Heaven was not interested in that child for no reason.”

For Baeksang, each revelation was more startling than the last. Jin Taekyung had not only killed two Supreme Peak masters single-handedly—the Lord of Heaven himself was also interested in him.

Baeksang also realized his own judgment had been sound.

Jin Taekyung.

The young man’s face came to mind. Baeksang had never been able to get a firm measure of him.

He looked at the smiling Demon Empress.

“You’ll take action yourself now.”

A Supreme Peak master was a formidable asset. With two of them dead, Baeksang thought her intervention inevitable.

At least, that was what he thought until he heard her answer the next moment.

“No? Why would I?”

She let out a short laugh.

“I do not have time to worry about that. Even if one of the major pieces has died, the current situation will not be overturned. What matters is the grand plan.”

“You mean…?”

“The Beast Miao King and Jin Taekyung no longer matter. Secure the Inner Palace and Outer Palace. Gather every force you have.”

Southern Heaven Demon Empress rose and crossed the room almost as though she were dancing. Her voice rang with delight.

“Three days. No more than three days.”

“…!”

“Be ready. That day, everything will begin—and end.”

THUD.

The door opened and closed.

Long afterward, Baeksang remained where he was, frozen.

That day was coming.

The day he had longed for more than anyone in the world—and feared more than anyone.

Chapter 689

Drip. Drip.

Cold.

That was Yohi's first thought when she opened her eyes.

She stared blankly at the drops falling onto her forehead. Then memories she had briefly forgotten began to return, one by one.

This is…

She remembered who she was. The life she had lived. What had happened at the Western Yao Estate, and what she had seen in the Poisonblood Grounds.

And…

I love you, Yohi.

The face and voice of that man made her shudder even now. Behind him lay a massive White Tiger and a young man.

All of it—

"Gasp…!"

Yohi shot upright, barely swallowing the scream about to burst from her lips.

With everything that had happened before she collapsed rushing back to her, she looked around in fear.

Where am I?

She did not recognize the place. Darkness blurred its outlines, and silence lay all around her. There was too little light to make anything out clearly, but she could tell she was enclosed on every side.

As though someone had prepared a prison for her.

Heugung.

No. The man who had stolen Heugung's name.

At the thought of the man whose entire life had been a lie, Yohi instinctively reached for her waist. She always wore her flexible sword wrapped around it like a sash, ready for an emergency. But her hand found only silk soaked with blood and dirt.

Ah. That's right.

She remembered losing her flexible sword after being drugged by an unidentified substance.

She had never taken the antidote, so naturally, her internal energy would still be sealed…

"Huh?"

The sound slipped out before she could stop it. Yohi clapped a hand over her mouth, though her wide eyes gave away her surprise.

How?

She forced herself to calm down and checked her body again. Then a third time.

There was no mistaking it.

The seal on my internal energy… It's gone.

She could feel the internal energy she had built up through countless elixirs filling her lower dantian.

But why? And how?

Heugung should have captured all of us.

She could make no sense of it. Why was she alone in this enclosed space? Why had the seal been lifted?

At the end, no one had been able to stop Heugung. Jin Taekyung was badly injured and would not wake for at least several days. The White Tiger, a spiritual creature capable of holding its own against a Peak master, had been left on the brink of death by a surprise attack.

And Yohi herself had collapsed under the pill's effects without so much as swinging her sword.

So how can the seal be gone?

She was not even tied up with rope or chains. Her martial arts might not be especially formidable, but she had reached the early Peak realm.

For Dark Heaven, this would have been a strangely careless way to hold her.

Could it be…?

Yohi swallowed, keeping the rest of the thought to herself. She rose carefully and took a closer look around.

Her eyes had adjusted to the dark. With internal energy sharpening her vision, she could now see farther into it.

This is…

The moment she understood the shape of the place, her breath caught.

It was enormous—far too large to have been made to imprison one person.

The size alone was not what unsettled her. It seemed to extend for hundreds of zhang[2976] in every direction, but that hardly mattered beside the cold, damp stone surrounding her. It covered the floor, the walls, even the ceiling.

An impregnable fortress with no way in or out.

What in the world is this place?

Yohi was staring at the stone and the thick vines spread across it when a wind blew from somewhere.

Swoooosh.

[2976] A zhang is a traditional Chinese unit of length equal to ten chi, about 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

The vines swayed. Yohi stood with her mouth open, letting the cool air wash over her. Something fell from above, and she reached out.

Rustle. Tap.

She caught it between her fingers.

It was a leaf from one of the vines, fallen past her silky hair. Unlike the leaves she had seen in the Poisonblood Grounds, it was green and full of life.

Then a realization struck her.

Wait. Wind?

Wind could not blow through a sealed space. There had to be an opening—and one large enough to let in a gust that could shake those thick vines.

Yet search as she might, Yohi could find no gap.

That can't be right.

She felt along the stone surrounding her, then struck it with internal energy. She even tried imitating the Wall Lizard Technique, which she had never learned, and climbed the vines in case there was an opening overhead.

Every attempt came to nothing.

She had stopped despairing over being captured by Dark Heaven. Now she was simply at a loss in a place she could not understand.

There has to be an exit, at least.

More than two shichen[2977] had passed since she woke, and she had spent that time searching. She had found nothing resembling an exit, let alone a gap.

Then who had put her here? And how?

Yohi sank to the ground and leaned against the stone wall. Warmth and softness met her back, making her feel a little better.

"Hm?"

Something was wrong.

She blinked, then slowly tipped her head back without moving away.

A pair of blue-white eyes looked down at her through the dimness.

"Ah."

—Grrr.

A suffocating silence fell.

Yohi rose slowly, looking from the cliff-like wall behind her to the massive White Tiger protruding from it. Only its upper body showed, as though the rest had been cut away.

What is this?

She tried to take stock of the situation.

First, she was in an enormous place she knew nothing about.

[2977] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of approximately two hours.

Second, stone blocked even the sky, as though she were trapped inside a cliff. There was no visible exit.

Third, a White Tiger with half its body missing had appeared from the wall. No—it had suddenly sprung out of it.

Fourth, there were only two possible explanations.

A dream. Or the afterlife.

Yohi did not hesitate. She slammed her head against the rock wall.

Thud.

Her skull rang, but she did not wake up. The afterlife it was.

Besides, that White Tiger floating there with only its upper body showing looked familiar.

That's the one.

Snow-white fur that could almost be called silver. Blue-white eyes.

It was the White Tiger that Young Palace Lord Yayul Mok treasured.

Muyaho should have been dead. Yet here it was without a scratch, calmly tilting its head at her. Yohi was certain now: she was in the afterlife.

No wonder there's no exit.

How was she supposed to know? She had never been here before.

It felt as though a hopelessly tangled thread had finally come loose. With that moment of enlightenment, Yohi's shoulders began to shake.

"Sniff… You fucking bastard, Heugung…"

The crisis facing Nanman? Her dignity as Great Chieftain of the Yao people?

What did any of that matter? She was dead.

The only one watching her was a half-severed tiger ghost. Then she thought of her mother, who had died twenty years ago, and tears poured down her face.

"Waaah! Waaaaah!"

At her cries, which sounded almost like a wild beast's roar, Muyaho approached with a look that seemed to ask if she was one of its own kind. It licked away her tears.

—Grrr.

A rough tongue swept across her whole face.

Her senses did seem awfully vivid for a ghost. Then again, anyone who claimed the dead could not feel anything had probably never been to the afterlife either.

Yohi buried her face in Muyaho's soft fur and wept.

At least, that was what she did until her hand grasped something soft and swishing.

Grab.

—Hiss!

At first, she was too busy crying to notice. Then she wondered what she had caught.

At Muyaho's sharp cry, she raised her head and saw the long, snow-white tail in her hand.

What? It's a tail. I thought it was something else.

Yohi buried her face in the fur again. A moment later, she lifted her head.

One fact had hit her like a blow to the back of the head.

Wait. Why does it have a tail?

Ordinarily, that would not have been strange. Tigers had tails. Even the rats infesting the Western Yao Estate's storerooms had tails.

But moments ago, this White Tiger ghost had been floating there with only its upper body visible. Now it was whole.

Could it be?

Yohi sprang up and reached for the wall where Muyaho had first appeared.

Tap.

It was cold and hard, just as before. She could not guess its thickness, and she saw no gap.

Still, she was not ready to give up.

There's something I don't understand. There has to be.

With her composure returning, reason told her this was neither a dream nor the afterlife. It was something strange—something the human mind could not easily make sense of.

As though it had read her thoughts, Muyaho stopped circling her and moved.

—Grrrr.

The massive White Tiger bent its hind legs to one side. Yohi caught a hint of meaning in its clear blue-white eyes.

"You want me to ride you? On your back?"

—Grrr.

"Hah."

She had heard it was intelligent. She had not realized just how intelligent.

Yohi studied Muyaho with fresh amazement, then carefully climbed onto its back. When she gripped its white fur, it stretched a huge forepaw toward the wall.

Clomp.

It was so enormous that a single step brought the rock wall right in front of them. Yohi squeezed her eyes shut.

Please.

The plea had barely formed when—

Swoooosh!

A strange sensation swept through her, as though she were being pulled somewhere. Yohi slowly opened her eyes.

“Ah.”

It was bright. Warm.

Light instead of darkness. Trees overflowing with life instead of cold rock walls. A place filled with every kind of flower instead of vines.

An entirely new world lay before her. For a moment, its peace and beauty made her forget everything else.

“W-What is this place…?”

Her question trailed off. This time, Muyaho gave no answer.

The white tiger shot down a path lined with plants and flowers without a moment’s hesitation.

Tap-tap. Swoooosh!

A refreshing wind scattered around them, wrapping around their entire bodies. At the same time, beyond the scenery rushing past them, countless animals of every shape and color watched them with curious eyes.

Mountain birds nested in impossibly tall trees. A roe deer and a wild boar basked together amid the thick grass. There was even a bear letting the mismatched pair lean against its body.

What in the world did I just see?

The thought vanished almost as soon as it came.

Why did none of the animals seem to care about the food chain? She did not know. It did not matter.

Here, simply by being in this place, everything felt natural.

This is… This is impossible.

The words dark arts flashed through her mind.

Then the path that had seemed to go on forever ended at a small pond.

Someone was there.

“Jin Taekyung!”

It was him.

His well-balanced, muscular body and red armor covering his upper body stood out clearly even from a distance. He was collapsed, half-submerged in the clear water.

Only a little over ten zhang remained between them. But contrary to Yohi’s desperate urgency, the White Tiger’s paws, which had moved forward without pause until now, were fixed in place as though nailed to the ground.

—Grrrr.

Its low growl sounded as though it were calling to someone.

Yohi sensed something and turned to follow its blue-white gaze.

She saw it.

No—she felt it before she saw it.

Swoooosh.

A cool wind carrying an unfamiliar energy stirred the leaves of a tree larger than any she had ever seen. Green leaves rained down.

And then—

Rustle.

Beneath the vast shade of the great tree, a Black Tiger as dark as the shadows rose to its feet.

Chapter 690

The Nanman people revered martial prowess.

Like the Han Chinese of the Central Plains, they farmed, raised livestock, and mined gold and silver from the rivers and mountains. But in the end, what mattered most to them was strength.

What good was wealth? A plentiful harvest and a pen full of livestock still had to be defended.

Warriors. And ferocious beasts capable of fighting alongside them.

They were swords to drive into an enemy's chest and shields to protect this land.

After a long history of struggle, the Nanman people knew this well. Even after the Five Poisons Sect was destroyed and the Nanman Beast Palace was established, they devoted considerable effort to raising warriors and beasts alike.

Great tribes and small tribes were no different. Without strength, they would be pushed aside and brought to ruin.

Yohi, Great Chieftain of the Yao people and one of the leaders of Nanman's four great tribes, thought much the same way. If anything, her ambition made her more zealous than the other tribal chieftains.

She invested the gold and silver she had received for turning a blind eye to Baeksang's actions in her tribe's fighting strength. She recruited talented young people and trained them as warriors. She studied the strengths and weaknesses of different beasts and even improved them through selective breeding.

But…

Rustle.

The moment that thing rose from the shade, Yohi felt her heart sink. She had faced countless ferocious beasts, yet this one struck her like a bolt of lightning through the crown of her head.

"…!"

In sheer size and strength, no beast could match an elephant. As large as a small hill, it had a long, thick trunk strong enough to snap trees and sharp tusks that could pierce armor.

But that thing—that Black Tiger—was different.

Yohi felt the tremendous, overwhelming aura emanating from the black tiger, unlike anything she had seen before.

Th-This is…

It was not simply a matter of size or appearance. If an elephant was a small hill, the Black Tiger was Taishan.

It had neither an elephant's long, thick trunk nor its sharp tusks. Yet simply standing there, it seemed powerful enough to cut through and crush anything.

Beast was not the word for it. A spiritual creature? No, that would not do either.

The Black Tiger reflected in her eyes now radiated an aura far deeper and more overwhelming than that of any spiritual creature.

What in the world is that…?

As Yohi swallowed a low groan, a cool wind flowed outward from the Black Tiger and swept over the clearing.

Swoooosh.

Grass and flowers bent in every direction, and the clear water in the small pond rippled. As the wind passed over her, a memory flashed through Yohi's mind.

I've felt this wind before. Twice.

She had thought nothing of it at the time. Now she remembered: a wind like this had blown just before she lost consciousness from the pill Heugung gave her, and again when she first woke in that vast, unfamiliar space.

Then was it the Black Tiger that saved us from Heugung…?

Yohi's eyelids trembled. But before she could speak, the Black Tiger turned away. It had been watching the unfamiliar intruder in silence, its blue-white eyes much like Muyaho's. Now it disappeared behind the enormous tree.

Swoooosh.

The wind slowly died down.

Yohi approached the tree cautiously, but the Black Tiger was nowhere to be seen beneath its broad shade.

It had vanished like a ghost, without a trace or the faintest sign of its presence.

"…!"

How?

She felt bewitched. If Muyaho had not called out just then, she might have stood there in a daze for a long time.

—Grrr.

Tap.

A damp nose touched her elbow. Yohi jerked her head up as though waking from sleep and remembered someone she had forgotten for a moment.

Jin Taekyung.

Her mind was still tangled with unanswered questions, but something more important needed her attention. She hurried to the pond and checked his condition.

A faint breath escaped his nose and mouth. Fortunately, he had only fallen into a deep sleep from accumulated fatigue. His condition was not bad.

In fact, he seemed much better than when she had last seen him.

Is it my imagination?

Yohi tilted her head and took hold of both his arms. No matter how clear the water was, his wounds would struggle to heal if it seeped into them. She meant to pull him out of the pond, where he lay half-submerged.

But just as she started to lift him—

Tap.

A snow-white forepaw came down over the back of her hand. Yohi thought she understood the gesture.

“You want me to leave him there?”

—Grrr.

“I’m sorry, but I can’t do th—”

—Grrrr!

Slash. Splash!

It happened in an instant. A sudden pain sent Yohi tumbling into the pond. She stared at the White Tiger in shock.

The back of her hand stung. Blood from the skin grazed by its sharp claws spread red across the water’s surface.

Why?

Her confusion lasted only a moment. Soon she understood why the remarkably intelligent White Tiger had done it.

Sss.

“The wound… Is it healing?”

It was. Yohi stared wide-eyed at the back of her hand beneath the clear water.

The cut flesh slowly knitted together, and the bleeding stopped. Slowly, but unmistakably. The sight was so astonishing that she forgot the pain of the wound closing.

She lifted her hand for a closer look. The flesh stopped healing, and a faint trickle of blood appeared again.

The pond. It stopped because I took my hand out.

She dipped her hand back into the water. At once, the wound began to close.

“…A pond that heals wounds.”

It sounded even more far-fetched than the legendary gongcheong seokyu, an elixir said to grant a jiazi’s[2978] worth of internal energy with a single drop. Yet Yohi was no longer surprised. She had seen it with her own eyes and felt it for herself.

This strange space could not be explained by the four words Mystic Gate Formation. Then there was the unknown Black Tiger—and the wound on her hand, already healed without a trace.

At last, she thought she understood how Muyaho had survived a sword wound to the nape of its neck.

[2978] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle.

"So that's why you stopped me. He'll recover faster if he stays in the pond."

—Grrr.

Muyaho gave a faint growl and slowly licked the back of her hand.

"Then did that Black Tiger that vanished a moment ago save us? Was it the one that treated you and Jin Taekyung too?"

Muyaho nodded emphatically.

"Why? Do you know what the Black Tiger is? Who its master is? Do you know where we are?"

Muyaho hesitated, then shook its head.

Only seven days and nights ago, Muyaho had followed the Beast Miao King and Jin Taekyung to Ailao Mountain and already encountered the Black Tiger once. Yet even to an innate spiritual creature like Muyaho, the Black Tiger's existence was an incomprehensible mystery.

"Haah. You don't know either."

—Whiiine.

"It's all right."

Yohi stroked the dejected Muyaho's neck, though her own thoughts remained tangled. She knew too little to make sense of anything.

Where were they? How much time had passed? And when would Jin Taekyung regain consciousness?

At least one thing was certain: the unknown Black Tiger had shown them goodwill.

It has nothing to do with Dark Heaven, at least. If it did, we'd all be dead.

Her gaze settled on Jin Taekyung. He lay half-submerged, motionless as a corpse. Whether he knew anything of what was happening around him, he slept on with a perfectly peaceful expression.

If I had been the one who collapsed instead of him… If Jin Taekyung had been awake, every problem would have been solved.

Perhaps it was only a foolish thought born of desperation. Yet somewhere along the way, Yohi had come to trust him from the bottom of her heart.

He had the martial prowess to defeat two Supreme Peak masters alone, and he had compassion and a sense of what was right. She merely wore the hide of a Great Chieftain while being little better than a traitor. He had done more than anyone to save Nanman from danger.

If she could not trust him, whom could she trust?

If Baeksang and Dark Heaven have begun moving in earnest, Palace Lord Yayul won't be able to oppose them with his strength alone. There's not enough time.

Most of what Yohi feared was already coming to pass.

While she had no way to mark the passing time, the Beast Miao King had been branded a traitor. He had escaped the Nanman Beast Palace, now enemy territory, and vanished. All of Nanman was boiling like an iron cauldron over hot coals.

No—perhaps it was lava that would melt even the cauldron.

Warriors from every tribe that had answered the general mobilization order marched toward the Outer Palace. With their entire leadership imprisoned, the Miao people held their breath amid the chaos. And in a secret refuge known to no one, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress smiled brightly on the verge of completing her grand plan.

Yohi knew none of this. She could not have known. Trapped in this strange, unknown space, all she could do was pray.

If Heaven exists, please…

Please wake him as soon as possible. Even if I have to die, please wake at least one person from this deep sleep.

But with her eyes squeezed shut around that desperate wish, Yohi missed the tiny, unmistakable change right in front of her.

Tap.

A finger moved ever so slightly. Concentric ripples spread across the water, traveling farther and farther outward.

I dreamed.

I knew it was a dream for a simple reason. The moment I opened my eyes, I saw a face that was endlessly familiar. I heard a voice, too, one that time had slowly begun to erase from my memory.

“Oh, what got you up at this hour? Why aren’t you sleeping more?”

My throat tightened. My chest ached.

Holding back the tears that surged into my eyes, I greeted him.

It’s been a long time, Dad.

But my lips moved of their own accord, and the voice that came out was thick with sleep.

Dunno. I just woke up.

Only then did I realize I had no part to play in this dream. I could only watch an old memory unfold.

My father, who had no way of knowing that, grinned.

“You little punk, I’m touched. How did this sleepyhead know Dad was leaving for work and wake up all on his own? Huh?”

His rough fingers poked my cheek. The younger me grumbled at the teasing.

“Ah, stop it. I’m going back to sleep.”

"You punk. Why go back to sleep? The sun's already high in the sky."

"What time is it?"

"Six o'clock. Perfect time to start the day, isn't it?"

"Yeah. I really don't think so."

The younger me buried his face in the pillow. My father laughed and got to his feet.

"Sleep, son. Dad's off to work."

"Huh? Already? It's only six."

"I have to head out of town early. Might be home late today."

I repeated the words desperately in my head.

I can't let him go. Dad, please don't go. Please.

But the younger me was different. He was young and thoughtless. He had no idea that this moment would become his last memory with his father.

"Yeees. Have a good day."

The words came out thick with sleep. My father grinned at me and ruffled my hair affectionately.

"Okay. See you later."

That was all. My father would turn away. The door would close. A few hours later, my homeroom teacher would call me in.

That was how I remembered it.

But…

"By the way, son."

"…!"

At the sudden sound of his voice, I shot upright.

This time it was my own will—not the younger me's, but mine, now in my late twenties.

My father tapped the watch on his wrist and spoke with a laugh in his voice.

"Shouldn't you be getting up soon?"

At that moment—

Crack.

Everything around me shattered and fell away. The familiar ceiling. The room. My father's face.

Something cold washed over my whole body.

Splash!

Through the spray of water scattering in every direction, I saw a woman's wide-open eyes.

A trembling voice soon pierced my ears.

"…How?"

Who knows.
I muttered inwardly, like the young boy in the dream that still felt so vivid.
Dunno. I just woke up.

Chapter 691

Sometimes a dream is so wonderful, so hard to leave behind, that you don't want to wake up. Even after you do, you keep your eyes closed a while longer, going over everything that happened in it.

But as always, things didn't go the way I wanted.

"Jin Taekyung!"

—Grrr!

Two figures, one large and one small, rushed at me with cries that sounded almost like screams. It wasn't hard to guess what was about to happen.

Or to prevent it.

Thwack. Splash!

I tripped Yohi and shoved away Muyaho's drooling muzzle. Then I closed my eyes again.

"Three seconds. Just leave me alone for three seconds."

I counted to three in my head. Very slowly. I recalled everything I'd seen in the dream, held it in my mind, and opened my eyes again.

Above me was an unfamiliar sky. I couldn't even tell whether it was day or night.

An unfamiliar sky, huh?

That was a new one. How could the sky I saw whenever I looked up feel unfamiliar? But there it was, right in front of my eyes.

I pushed myself upright, my body throbbing.

"First, a question. You're not about to tell me Dark Heaven took over Nanman while I was unconscious, are you?"

Soaked from her fall into the pond, Yohi stared at me in disbelief.

"That's what you say after tripping me the moment you wake up?"

"You rushed at me the moment I opened my eyes. And look at the sky. I'd believe you if you told me this was hell."

"What would you do if it was?"

"Who knows?"

I looked around.

A pond full of clear water. Lush trees and plants. Mountain birds chirped in the thickets surrounding us, where wild animals watched with curious eyes.

The scenery's a little too nice for hell.

I shrugged.

"I'd already be dead. Might as well go back to sleep."

"…Sleep? Are you out of your mind?"

"No. In fact, everything is still spinning in front of my eyes."

It was true. Just sitting up made my whole body ache and left me dizzy.

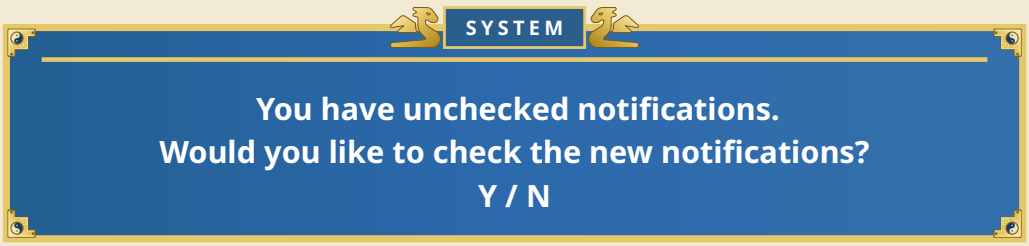
Still…

“I do seem to be alive. Definitely.”

Yes. I’d survived again.

The pain washing over me and the System notifications ringing in my ears were proof enough.

Ding.



I was about to open the System window when I remembered something and turned my head.

Blue-white eyes shone as they watched me warily. Behind them, a tail spun like a propeller. I let out a quiet laugh.

“Yeah. I’m alive thanks to you.”

—Kraaang!

With a whoosh!

Muyaho hurled his enormous body at me as though he’d been waiting for those words.

My not-quite-healed body screamed beneath his weight, but that was all right. It was a good kind of pain. It reminded me I was alive.

Crunch.

“…Ah.”

It was starting to feel less good.

Fortunately, Muyaho’s assassination attempt—which had made me suspect he might actually be Dark Heaven—ended in failure. After confirming that my ribs were still in place, I asked what I was most curious about.

“Where’s Heugung? Why don’t I see him?”

Yohi’s face stiffened the instant I said his name.

“Don’t even mention that bastard.”

“Wait. Don’t tell me…”

“Yes. It’s what you’re thinking.”

“Heugung proposed to you?”

"…!"

"What a lunatic. No matter how much he likes you, how could he propose then?"

Yohi stared at me as though I were the lunatic.

"He wasn't the Heugung we knew. He fooled all of us."

"I'll say. Once he used the Bone-Shrinking Technique, he turned out to be a pretty good-looking guy."

"…The Bone-Shrinking Technique? You knew?"

"Of course. He sent me a secret letter, and we met."

"Then you knew Dark Heaven had planted him as a spy?"

"Of course I knew th—what?"

What had I just heard?

I thought for a moment before asking, "Is that true?"

"Do I look like I'm lying?"

Fuck. It's true.

Only then did I remember the Quest to follow the tracking scent. Now I understood why the System had singled out Yohi by name.

"Okay. I take back what I said about Heugung being good-looking. My apologies."

I shouldn't have said it at all. To hell with his looks—the mood had gone cold long ago. Yohi answered with a sigh.

"It doesn't matter. I survived thanks to you."

"Oh, and I'm sorry about the proposal thing."

"That's fine. He did propose."

"What?"

"He did. Though it was less a proposal than a threat from someone who had my life in his hands."

"Did you… accept?"

"I've been meaning to ask. Are you actually fucking insane?"

"Uh, sorry. My head's a mess. I keep saying stupid things."

The back of my head still tingled. It was true that I had once suspected Heugung, but after running into the two old monsters in the Poisonblood Grounds, I had erased even that slight suspicion.

But Heugung, that bastard, was Dark Heaven's lackey?

He'd been the knife in the sleeve. One last move the Southern Heaven Demon Empress had kept in reserve.

And the question that came to me again at this point was how Yohi and Muyaho had managed to avoid that move. From what Yohi had said earlier, they must have been in serious trouble.

"What happened to Heugung?"

"He's dead."

After a moment, she added, "Probably."

"Probably?"

"We don't know exactly what happened. That White Tiger was at death's door, and I passed out because of the pill he gave me. When I woke up, I was here."

The rest of her account was brief. They didn't know where they were or how much time had passed outside. Muyaho had been moments from death, and I'd been severely injured. Both of us had survived thanks to this mysterious pond.

"I know. It must sound impossible. But really…"

"I get it."

"What?"

"I get it. All of it."

What was so hard to believe about a pond that healed wounds?

Only people of this world would be unable to understand such a phenomenon.

I had come from the modern world, where potions, Magic, monsters, and Gates existed. Even if a few Orcs crawled out from those bushes right now, I was confident I wouldn't bat an eye.

"…"

On second thought, I might raise an eyebrow. Orcs appearing in Murim wouldn't exactly be normal.

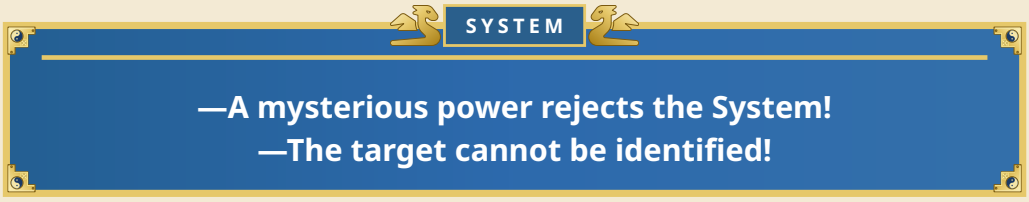
Unless an actual Gate opened here, like back home.

I reached out and skimmed the still surface of the pond.

Its effects were much like a potion's. My father making an entrance like General Kim Jwa-jin[2979] couldn't have been the only reason I'd shaken off the exhaustion in my mind and body so quickly.

Item Appraisal.

Beep.



There it was.

I'd expected as much. Everything about this place was a mystery, from one thing to the next.

And Yohi was about to give me one more.

[2979] Kim Jwa-jin (1889–1930) was a Korean independence activist and military commander.

“I saw a Black Tiger. A black tiger that felt stronger and more extraordinary than any beast I’ve ever encountered.”

“…!”

Splash.

My trembling fingertips disturbed the surface of the water, which had been slowly settling. I swallowed a groan as I watched the ripples spread into the distance.

Ailao Mountain’s Wraith…

The enormous Black Tiger flashed through my mind. I’d seen it only once, but I could never forget it.

It had appeared like a ghost, true to its name, then vanished the same way. I could still see it clearly.

And that was the first and last time.

That night, the Beast Miao King and I had discovered the Poisonblood Grounds while pursuing it, but the tiger itself had been nowhere to be found. The Nanman Beast Palace investigators sent out after the fight with the Thousand-Year Spider had found no trace of it either. Then one crisis after another had pushed it to the back of my mind.

Now it had appeared here.

And from the looks of it, it saved us.

I didn’t know what it was or why it had done that. Frowning, I gave the System a command in my head.

Check notifications.

Ding.

With a clear bell only I could hear, holographic windows that had been held back burst into the air.

SYSTEM

—Level Up!
—Some injuries have recovered due to the effects of Level Up!
—Some Status effects have been removed due to the effects of Level Up!
—You have achieved the exceptional achievement The Legend of One Against Two!
—The achievement Reward has been granted!
—You acquired bonus points!
—You acquired a large amount of EXP and Fame!
—A sudden Quest, The Knife in the Sleeve, has been created!
—The sudden Quest has been forcibly canceled!
—You discovered ???!
—A sudden Quest, ???, is pending. It will proceed once all activation conditions have been met!

I was only seeing them now. The System had kept doing its job while I was unconscious.

The problem was that even a System as all-knowing as a god couldn't give me a straight answer.

Those question marks are supposed to bother the hell out of me, right?

As I stared intently at the last two notifications—the ones that bothered me most—Muyaho, who had been circling me for a while, thrust his enormous head at me.

—Nnngh. Ngh.

"Need to poop? Go over there. Hyung's[2980] busy."

—Whiiine.

"I said I'm bu—"

I stopped and looked up.

Something was looking down at this place from atop the cliffs encircling the pond, without giving off the slightest hint of its presence.

That's...

Before I could finish the thought, an unexpected voice rang out inside my head.

—You're awake, human.

"...!"

—Come up. We need to talk.

[2980] Hyung is a Korean term a male speaker uses for an older brother or an older male he is close to. Here it is used playfully as a way of referring to himself.

At that moment, I remembered something from a few months ago: the time when an imugi[2981] that had failed to become a dragon sent a thought into my mind from within a broad, deep river.

I climbed the cliff alone, leaving Yohi and Muyaho behind.

My body was still in poor shape, but I made it to the moss-covered top. There, at last, I faced a massive Black Tiger dark as the shadows.

Ailao Mountain's Wraith. It was the same one.

"What… are you?"

At my first words, the Black Tiger stared at me with eyes of unfathomable depth.

—I don't know.

"What?"

—Even I don't know what I am. Too many years have passed for me to remember everything, and I've been called by many names.

"…Ailao Mountain's Wraith."

—I haven't heard that name in a long time. Was it around two hundred years ago?

It sent the thought calmly and took a step. It clearly had a physical body, yet it moved like a ghost. I heard nothing and sensed no movement at all.

Just as I was seized by the sensation that every hair on my body was standing on end, the thought continued.

—But you know what kind of being I am, human.

"…"

—There's no use denying it. I've already confirmed his existence through you.

The Black Tiger slowly turned and opened its mouth. Between its jaws lay something brilliantly blue and clear.

The Water God Dragon's Origin Essence.

"When the hell did you steal this, you bastard?"

[2981] An imugi is a serpent-like creature in Korean folklore associated with the prospect of becoming a dragon.

Chapter 692

Sometimes instinct beats reason.

Like the moment I saw the Water God Dragon's Origin Essence nestled so prettily in the Black Tiger's mouth.

"You bastard. When did you steal that?"

—…

The words slipped out before I could stop them.

The Black Tiger gave me a cold look, then sent a thought my way.

—"Steal" is a strong word.

It was a little strong.

Even if he really had stolen the Water God Dragon's Origin Essence, he could swallow it whenever he wanted. Under the circumstances, I was the one who had to apologize.

"Fine. I'm sorry."

I held out both hands politely.

"Now spit it out. You can see my palm, right? Spit it out here. Ptooey. Come on."

—It was astonishing.

"Yeah, I'm pretty shocked too. I get it, so first, could you just…"

—I felt the power within it. Then I saw a vast stretch of time.

I stopped. "Time?"

—Yes. It was several hundred years of time and memory, visible only to beings of the same kind. Everything belonging to an imugi[2982] who had failed to become a dragon was contained within it.

"…!"

—At the end of those ancient memories, there was a human. Young, rough, and endlessly reckless.

The Black Tiger's blue-white eyes, so much like Muyaho's, rested on me. Then another thought echoed through my mind in what sounded like a man's calm voice.

—Be grateful to that imugi[2983]. If I had not seen his memories, you would all have met the same end as that unpleasant human.

The world was full of unpleasant humans. Turn the whole place upside down and shake them out, and there'd be enough to fill the Yangtze and then some. But I had a pretty good idea who the Black Tiger meant.

"Don't tell me… Heugung?"

[2982] In Korean folklore, an imugi is a serpent-like creature associated with becoming a dragon.

[2983] In Korean folklore, an imugi is a serpent-like creature associated with becoming a dragon.

—I do not know his name. Unlike you, though, he had only one forepaw.

Technically, it was a hand. That wasn't important right now.

I looked at the Black Tiger with fresh eyes.

"Should I start by thanking you for saving me?"

—It does not matter. It was my choice.

"Then I'll thank you anyway. I mean it."

The Black Tiger glanced at me, turned, and began to walk. I fell into step behind him.

"I have a few questions."

—How tiresome.

"What? You'll answer them all sincerely even though it's a bother?"

—No.

"Oh. Thanks for agreeing so readily."

—…Human communication is truly strange. Have too many years passed?

I ignored that and asked the most important question first.

"How much time has passed?"

His tail hung stiffly, plainly showing his displeasure. Still, the answer came.

—You have been here for one day, by human reckoning.

"One day?"

Ordinarily, that would be no time at all.

But under the circumstances, it was a different story.

The Great Snow Fiend and the Black Hand Fist Demon had warned of the bloodbath about to sweep Nanman. With even the Beast Miao King's whereabouts unknown, no one was left to stop the Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

Damn it.

The situation had been unavoidable, but it wouldn't have been strange if thousands—or tens of thousands—had died during the one day I was unconscious.

I clenched my teeth, swallowed a curse, and forced out the words.

"An exit. Tell me how to get out of here."

—You intend to leave?

"Yeah. I'm grateful you saved me, but I can't waste any more time."

—You intend to save your own kind from danger. Recklessly, as you did before.

"You…?"

—Do not worry. I cannot read human memories. I saw you in the imugi's[2984] memories and made a guess. I imagine you fought so fiercely for much the same reason.

"…You were watching?"

[2984] In Korean folklore, an imugi is a serpent-like creature associated with becoming a dragon.

—Yes. From beginning to end. As always, I watched everything that happened here.

The Black Tiger turned his head toward me, his thoughts as calm as ever.

—But I saw no reason to involve myself in human affairs. Not until you brought out that.

"…!"

My eyes widened. Not because I knew he meant the Water God Dragon's Origin Essence.

I remembered reaching for the Origin Essence in one last desperate attempt to stay alive—only to hesitate when a chill wind blew in from somewhere. At the same time, I sensed something strange and let go of the Origin Essence. Muyaho arrived immediately afterward and saved my life.

"Then that wind…"

My voice trailed off. The Black Tiger's answer sounded in my head.

—You were about to do something foolish. If you defy what is ordained, that is defying Heaven. Had I done nothing, you would have died, unable to overcome the power left behind by the imugi[2985].

I watched him walk along the endless cliff.

"Not once, but twice."

—What do you mean?

"You saved me twice."

The Black Tiger gave a small snort.

—I merely felt sorry for someone who had handed everything they possessed to a foolish human. Without that reason, you deserved to die.

"That's a little unfair. I don't know why you hate humans, but I've never done anything bad enough to deserve that."

—Even after you tried to take innocent lives and set fire to their peaceful home?

"What?"

Instead of answering, the Black Tiger nodded toward the foot of the cliff.

Countless beasts, their bodies blackened in places, drank from an unfamiliar stream. There were thousands of them by my rough estimate. With all the others that might be sheltering somewhere in this seemingly boundless place, I couldn't begin to guess the total.

What the hell…?

I stood on the cliff, staring down at them.

—The inferno you unleashed is still devouring the entire mountain. If the flames had spread unchecked, everything would have burned away long ago.

"…"

[2985] In Korean folklore, an imugi is a serpent-like creature associated with becoming a dragon.

—Yes, I led them here. Just as I did seven days and nights ago.

Seven days and nights ago.

That had been the very day the Beast Miao King and I received the emergency report and headed for Ailao Mountain.

I searched my memory, and realization struck.

The beasts.

I remembered clearly. Of the three hundred or so warriors stationed at Ailao Mountain, about two hundred had returned alive.

The beasts hadn't.

I hadn't seen them anywhere—not on Ailao Mountain, not in the Poisonblood Grounds.

"You were the one who did that too. You saved the wild beasts."

—Monsters that should never have been there were set loose. I had not interfered in human affairs for hundreds of years, but that time I could not stand aside.

Ordinarily, I might have let that pass. But I was listening closely to the Black Tiger's thoughts, and I caught the oddity at once.

"Set loose?"

—You did not know?

Faint contempt entered his blue-white eyes.

—Humans did all of it. Your kind has done such things since long ago, and I have remained here and watched.

Damn it.

I'd only been able to guess what had happened at Ailao Mountain. Now the Black Tiger had confirmed it.

Dark Heaven had been behind that, too.

If only we'd found out a little sooner.

With belated regret, I looked at the Black Tiger. I thought I was beginning to understand why he had acted that way that day. I remembered his back as he repeatedly appeared and disappeared, even though he could have escaped at any time.

"You weren't attacking us that day."

—Yes. That was not my mission.

"You were trying to show us where the Thousand-Year Spider was."

—I could not simply watch while a foul monster disturbed this mountain. Humans planted the seed, so humans should reap it. That is the natural order.

He walked on. The path along the cliff grew narrower and steeper, and birds nesting on rugged peaks above the clouds watched us with curious eyes.

How long had we been walking? Clouds and mist surrounded us, and the ground below seemed impossibly far away.

I'm sure this place wasn't this big.

When I first woke, I'd thought it was a forest around a small pond. Now I could see vast mountain ranges, valleys, and green pastures.

What the hell is this place?

I could no longer begin to guess. Staring at the impossible landscape, I finally asked, "Where are we?"

—A land filled with life. A place where all things live in harmony.

What kind of nonsense was that?

For some reason, I remembered the church deacon who used to give me spicy rice cakes when I was little while shouting, "Jesus, heaven! Unbelievers, hell!"

"Even so, this can't be heaven."

—The kingdom of heaven? A fitting description, in its way. But this place lies deep within the land, where no one can enter without my permission. It is very close to where you were.

"Then… are we in the Poisonblood Grounds?"

A few paces ahead, the Black Tiger gave a small nod.

—It is.

"But this place…"

The words stuck in my throat. The Poisonblood Grounds?

I wouldn't have believed we were anywhere on Ailao Mountain. There were no raging flames here, none of the eerie feeling that hung over the mountain.

—Enough. This is a place that you humans can neither invade nor understand.

He was right. Murim had all manner of strange things, Mystic Gate Formations among them, but what lay before me went far beyond anything they could do.

"Ha. The Poisonblood Grounds. This is the Poisonblood Grounds."

Laughing hollowly, I followed him up the peak.

As we neared the summit, his thought reached me again.

—Poisonblood Grounds is its current name. As I did, humans changed many things over the passage of time.

"What was it called before?"

—The Sacred Land.

"What?"

—That was in a past as distant as the imugi's[2986] memories. Beasts, not humans, ruled this land then. The few humans lived in groups within their own territories and worshiped us.

"Huh."

I had no words.

[2986] In Korean folklore, an imugi is a serpent-like creature associated with becoming a dragon.

This forbidden place, where no one could set foot, had once been called the Sacred Land. And if there had been so few people in Nanman back then… how long ago was that?

Five hundred years? A thousand?

This is driving me crazy.

Even if I'd put every point into Intelligence from the start, I'd have felt like an idiot right now.

I shook my head and opened my mouth toward the Black Tiger, who had stopped walking before I noticed.

"Then you. What exactly are you?"

—Did you not call me an apparition yourself?

"I'm asking what they called you when this place was the Sacred Land."

The Black Tiger was silent for a moment before moving his massive body. Something wistful passed through his blue-white eyes.

—A guardian spirit.

"What?"

—Long ago, that was what people called me. The mountain lord[2987] who guarded Ailao Mountain. A guardian spirit born alongside the sacred stone.

[2987] "Mountain lord" is a traditional epithet for a tiger.

Chapter 693

The Beast King Stone.

The name felt familiar. A memory from not so long ago surfaced with it.

About seven days and nights earlier, on our way to Ailao Mountain, the Beast Miao King had told me a story from the distant past. Why Ailao Mountain had become a forbidden land. How the Five Poisons Sect had given rise to the Nanman Beast Palace as it existed today. The Great War that had stained all of Nanman with blood.

And… a vanished divine artifact.

It's a legend passed down only by word of mouth. The Beast King Stone is our Palace's divine artifact, said to have been carried by the first Palace Lord. Supposedly, it could make every wild beast under Heaven obey.

I remembered the Beast Miao King's offhand remark.

—Look.

At the quiet thought echoing in my head, the apparition—no, the being I should now call a guardian spirit—slowly stepped aside.

Only then could I see it.

Ssshhh.

The Black Tiger's massive body had been blocking my view. Beyond him, at the summit of a peak shrouded in thick mist, stood a colossal boulder.

No way.

I knew at once why the Black Tiger had brought me here. I knew what that boulder was.

Step.

I walked forward as if entranced, passed the Black Tiger, and stopped before the stone. It stood nearly thirty feet[2988] tall.

Ssshhh.

I could feel an unknown energy wrapped around it like an embrace.

Here, at the highest point of this impossible land, the boulder shed a faint, ink-dark glow. It looked mysterious and dangerous—like a divine artifact from some legend buried by the ages.

"…The Beast King Stone."

The three words escaped with the breath I'd been holding. The Black Tiger appeared beside me like a ghost and gave a small nod.

—Yes. Long ago, a human gave it that name.

"The human you mean wouldn't happen to be…"

[2988] The Korean measures the stone at nearly three jang. Three jang equal thirty cheok, or about 9.09 m (29.8 ft).

—He was refreshing as the wind, clear as water, and steadfast as a tree. He was also the only human who could enter and leave this place freely without my permission.

"Without your permission? Was that possible?"

This place had remained hidden for hundreds of years, perhaps nearly a thousand. We had entered only because the Black Tiger had opened the way for us.

—It was. I did not know it myself, but the sacred stone that guards this land accepted him before I ever gave my permission.

The sacred stone, I realized, was the Beast King Stone's original name. And I had a fair idea who the human was.

Since people had first settled in Nanman, dozens of tribes had fought one another without end. He was the only leader who had ever united them under a single banner.

And that wasn't all.

The man who had etched the five characters Nanman Beast Palace into this land had also been the first and last owner of the Beast King Stone during its brief appearance.

No. Maybe owner wasn't the right word.

What the Black Tiger told me next turned that suspicion into certainty.

—Then, one day, a great war broke out. Mountains and grasslands burned. The rivers filled with more human and animal corpses than anyone could count. As the years passed, the land grew more tainted, and the sacred stone slowly lost its power.

"Lost its power?"

—Commanding a hundred beasts was only one of its powers. We call it the sacred stone because it protected this land's abundance for ages beyond memory.

I looked away from the Black Tiger and back at the boulder. Its faint, ink-dark glow hadn't changed. Cracks ran through it, and pieces had broken away.

"Abundance is about the last thing that comes to mind."

How far was it from looking abundant? About as far as I'd traveled from Henan to Nanman.

Its grimy black color was one thing. The ominous energy seeping from it made even me uneasy.

This really isn't what I expected.

Divine artifacts didn't come with factory specifications, but I'd still had a picture in my head: a small, gleaming white stone. Not something that made Seoraksan's Rocking Stone look modest and practically blasted ominous pressure in every direction.

"…I don't know about abundance, but I think I understand why it was called the Beast King Stone. If you smashed something's head with this, what beast wouldn't obey? You could probably rule humans with it too."

And the first Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace had supposedly owned this thing, if only for a while. How hard had he trained? Had he hung an elephant from a pull-up bar and put up a five-thousand total on the big three?[2989]

While I wondered how a legendary figure had measured his total, the Black Tiger fixed me with a somber gaze.

—Because of your kind.

"What?"

—Once, this land was filled with peace and abundance. All things followed the natural order. The sacred stone did not look as it does now.

I realized what he was getting at.

"…It started losing power when humans settled here."

—More precisely, when they began killing one another.

I was beginning to understand. The stone the people of Nanman called the Beast King Stone was practically one with this land. The more death and destruction spread across it, the more power the stone lost.

"So that's why you helped the first Palace Lord? Three hundred years ago, as the Five Poisons Sect stained Nanman with blood, the sacred stone's power would have weakened too?"

—I… No, we…

Something crossed the Black Tiger's eyes. Longing, perhaps. Or regret.

—We did not help him.

"…!"

I stopped short. His calm thought continued.

—My mission was to guard the sacred stone. Its duty was simply to exist alongside this land. All we could do was watch.

"You just… watched?"

—Yes. Like a certain being you know.

I thought of the Water God Dragon I'd met several months ago. The imugi had spent hundreds of years guarding its river and pursuing enlightenment. For all its strange, tremendous power, it had kept to its territory rather than actively intervening in human affairs.

But if that was true…

"Then what was the legend of the Beast King Stone? The story passed down to the people here…"

[2989] The "big three" are the squat, bench press, and deadlift. In Korean gym talk, their combined lifting total is given in kilograms; five thousand kilograms is about 11,000 lb.

—A legend. Yes, it was exactly that—a legend. Something that clearly existed, but could only be fabricated as fiction.

Bitterness flickered through his blue-white eyes.

—He was the only human who could understand our mission, and he wanted peace more than anyone. So, to end this war, he created the Beast King Stone himself.

"…!"

—I watched from where no one could see. I watched him name a powerless stone the Beast King Stone, become a chosen hero, unite the tribes, and fight other humans. I watched until the day he fell.

My breath caught in my throat. It was as though a book densely filled with the legend of a distant past had opened before my eyes.

—That was how he died. The thing humans had revered as the Beast King Stone vanished as though it had never existed. The war continued for another hundred years. And I…

Grrrr.

His growl trembled. He stared at the sacred stone as if he were searching the distance for something he could never reach. Then his blue-white eyes turned to me.

—For two hundred years, I regretted it.

A brief silence followed.

Wind blew from somewhere. I stood facing the Black Tiger and asked, "Why?"

I didn't wait for an answer. I hadn't expected one.

"Because the land grew barren as the war continued, causing the sacred stone to lose its power? Because you thought that even the tiny bit of power it had left would soon disappear when what is about to happen arrives? Is that why you regretted it? Because you should have helped him back then—a pointless regret?"

His reply weighed heavily in my head.

—Are you condemning me?

"No. Honestly, I don't care much about that. I'm grateful you helped us, whether you believe it or not."

I didn't care about the sacred stone or the guardian spirit. I didn't think I had any business caring about either.

It had already happened hundreds of years ago, and whatever their mission might have been, the fact remained that they had saved my life and the lives of my companions.

The thought had just come to me.

"For a guardian spirit, you're pretty petty and cowardly. This much should be okay, right?"

—…!

“Not okay? If I offended you, I’ll take it back.”

The Black Tiger stared at me without a word. His body looked endlessly ominous, but his blue-white eyes were large and clear.

And then.

—For two hundred years, I regretted it every day, every moment. I should have saved that human, even if it meant defying the natural order.

“…!”

—Reckless, young human. You were not wrong. I let a single mission bind me for far too long, and it led me to a mistaken judgment. Will you give me a chance?

“A chance…?”

—I want to restore whatever power I can to the sacred stone. And this time, I want to put right the choice I made in the past.

Ssssh.

The enormous tiger slowly opened his jaws. A crystal of clear blue energy came into view.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

SYSTEM

—Conditions met! New information has been updated!
—Apparition of Ailao Mountain has changed to guardian spirit!
—Hidden text has been revealed!
—You have discovered the Hidden Sacred Land!
—You have met the activation conditions for a hidden Quest!
—A hidden Quest has been created!
—The hidden Quest Last Chance has been created!

Bells and System notifications rang out without warning. One final holographic window appeared before my eyes.

SYSTEM

Would you like to enhance the Ancient Sacred Stone with the Water God Dragon’s Origin Essence?
Y / N

A tooth for a tooth. An eye for an eye.

And…

Spiritual energy for spiritual energy, huh?

Muttering inwardly, I suddenly looked up at the sky.

It was blue. Just like the eyes of the Black Tiger watching me.

No—the guardian spirit.

“I…”

Some had gone. Others had stayed behind.

Yohi and Muyaho.

They were waiting by the pond for the one person who had yet to return when something else arrived first.

Rrrrrumble!

The earth shook. Water surged across the pond in waves.

Hundreds, perhaps thousands, of birds took flight at once. Even more beasts rose from the grass.

Yohi reflexively jerked her head up. A faint gasp of shock escaped her lips.

“Th-that’s…”

Kwaaaang!

A pillar of light shot up as if to pierce the sky, enveloping the mysterious space.

Chapter 694

The moon was hidden on a night so dark that only faint flames marked the mountain valley.

One torch, then two, then three. Soon there were hundreds, and the ground began to shake.

Rrrrrumble!

Tremors ran through the earth. Beneath the torches swaying in the wind, shadows large and small pressed forward, their rough breathing unbroken.

Grrrr.

Huff. Huff.

An army.

Humans and beasts, moving as one.

Armed with swords, spears, and bows, the Nanman warriors searched the darkness from their saddles. Beside them, beasts with sharp teeth and claws kept running.

There were three thousand of them. They had left the Outer Palace around noon at one man's command, their destination set from the start.

Ailao Mountain.

The name came to the Captain of the Guards as he rode at the front. At that moment, someone behind him shouted.

"I see it!"

So did everyone else.

Far ahead, an enormous inferno blazed with a force that made their hundreds of torches seem like nothing.

Crack! Whoosh!

Ancient trees toppled one after another. The flames swallowed everything they touched and grew larger still.

The warriors groaned at the sight of a fire unlike any in the past hundred years—and perhaps any in the next hundred.

"H-how can this be?"

"So it really was true…"

Hearing about it was one thing. Seeing it was another.

Shock and fear passed through the warriors' eyes as they stared at Ailao Mountain in flames.

Jin Taekyung.

The rumors about him were all true.

He shook off all those pursuit parties and made it here. What kind of monster is he?

Most of the warriors had never faced Jin Taekyung. More precisely, they had never seen what he was capable of.

Until now, he had been merely an outsider from the Central Plains: a young man with features that looked a little strange to the people of Nanman.

Now they had to fight him.

Their orders were to surround Ailao Mountain so tightly that nothing could slip through, then kill Jin Taekyung whenever he emerged.

But…

Can we stop that monster?

The same question troubled them all.

They had grown up hearing stories of Ailao Mountain, the forbidden land whose history stretched back to the founding of the Nanman Beast Palace. One name always came up in those stories.

The Fire Gate Clan.

An unknown clan said to exist somewhere in the distant Central Plains.

Long ago, its Sect Leader had come to Nanman and ended the Great War against the Five Poisons Sect—a war that had continued for more than a century after the Nanman Beast Palace was founded.

The Five Poisons Sect's deadly poison, which had taken countless lives, and the venomous beasts it commanded had melted like candle wax before the flames he summoned.

It was even said that the Sect Leader of the Five Poisons Sect at the time—who had reduced one hundred of the Nanman Beast Palace's finest warriors to a mere handful of poisonous water—could not withstand his power and fell to his knees.

No. The story said he burned alive.

That old legend, so entertaining when they were children, had stepped out of the past and into the present.

Right before their eyes.

Gulp.

Someone swallowed, the sound strangely loud. Hands tightened around reins that had been held loosely moments before. Anxious glances spread through the ranks.

Then the Captain of the Guards spoke.

"What are you so afraid of?"

"…!"

His voice, carrying internal energy, reached every warrior. He went on, firm and clear.

"He is one man. We are three thousand."

Shoulders that had hunched without their owners noticing began to straighten. One by one, the warriors steadied their gazes.

That's right. No matter how strong he is, he's made of flesh and blood.

Even if every rumor is true, he can't stand against all of us.

Three thousand.

For the killing of one man, it was an absurd number.

The Fire Gate Clan's Sect Leader had supposedly destroyed the Five Poisons Sect through sheer martial prowess. The stories they had grown up with still frightened them, but a legend was a legend.

No—even if he came back to life, it was impossible for him to face three thousand Nanman warriors and beasts of prey alone.

It had to be impossible.

"Have you forgotten? Jin Taekyung is a traitor who put Nanman in danger. He's a Han Chinese man worse than a beast, one who has forgotten the debt of the Great Faction War."

As the inferno drew closer, the Captain's voice grew stronger.

Shing.

"Warriors of Nanman! My proud brothers!"

He drew his sword. Its edge gleamed as moonlight and wavering torchlight broke across the white blade.

"Hunt him down!"

"Waaaaaah!"

Clang! Clang! Clang!

Hundreds, then thousands of weapons came free. Torches flared, and the army urged its mounts toward Ailao Mountain with a roar.

At that instant—

Whoosh!

The Captain of the Guards saw it. Every human and beast there saw it.

A pillar of light rose through the blood-red flames. Against the fire stood the silhouette of a black hill.

No. It wasn't a hill.

Rrrrrumble!

"What is that…?"

The world shook as the dark shape drew nearer. The Captain stared, eyes wide.

He did not notice that he could no longer feel the wind.

He did not know that the three thousand beasts charging relentlessly toward Ailao Mountain had stopped in place as though by prior agreement.

Grrrr.

The tiger that had spent its life at his side gave a low growl and bowed its head.

It was not alone.

Leopards, bears, wolves—every beast, large and small, did the same.

Rustle.

They curled their tails and lowered their massive bodies to the ground.

It was an instinct etched into them at birth: reverence for a king returned after long ages, and a command they could not resist.

—Kraaaaaar!

Along with a roar that devoured the world, blue-white eyes shone in the darkness.

Step. Step.

Quiet footsteps echoed down the silent corridor.

The guards' sharp gazes swept over the maids and servants. Every guard had reached the Peak, and the servants dropped facedown as trembling cries followed.

"W-we pay our respects to the Palace Lord!"

Their fear was meant for one man.

Surrounded by guards, Baeksang walked through the Inner Palace and glanced at the people prostrate before him.

They came from different tribes and were of every age: children still round-cheeked with baby fat, middle-aged men and women, and an old woman whose hair had gone entirely white.

She moved so slowly that she was still struggling in the middle of the corridor. The guards frowned.

Baeksang was the master of the Nanman Beast Palace, the king of this land. Or rather, he had to be. An old woman with little life left could not stand in his way.

Step.

Two guards moved toward her as though they had agreed on it.

"Stop."

They froze at Baeksang's quiet command. He looked at the old woman and greeted her without speaking.

It's been a long time.

He knew her face despite the years. When he and Yayul Cheok had run wild through the Inner Palace as boys, she had been a young woman who sighed whenever she saw them coming.

You've grown old.

Of course she had. His martial prowess at the Supreme Peak had slowed his aging. She had lived under the ordinary passage of time.

"I-I'm sorry, Palace Lord. I'm not as strong as I used to be…"

She bowed and groveled, unable even to raise her head. Baeksang found himself wondering why he had stopped his guards.

Because she was one of the few who remembered him as he had been?

Or because he wanted to delay that moment, drawing closer even now?

I don't know. I truly don't.

It left a bitter taste. After coming this far, he still had regrets. And the woman who had once scolded him without a second thought was now too afraid to meet his eyes.

And this is the path I have walked all this time, I suppose.

Empty sentiment. Nothing more.

The days of fighting back-to-back with his only sworn elder brother were long gone. So were the days when they had sat on their enemies' corpses and shared fruit wine, or secretly watched a man and woman meet beneath the dim moonlight.

"…My lord?"

At a guard's cautious call, Baeksang's eyes settled into their usual coldness.

"Clear the way."

"Yes, my lord."

The guards stepped forward at once and shoved the old woman aside.

Baeksang looked down at the others, who pressed themselves even lower to the floor in fear.

"And as of this moment, expel every palace attendant living in the Inner Palace."

"I-I beg your pardon, my lord. Every attendant?"

"Yes. Every one."

The palace attendants lived there and did the work that kept the Inner Palace running. They cooked every meal, cleaned, washed clothes, and handled countless other tasks. Without them, the place would soon cease to function properly.

The guards wanted to ask why. None dared.

Baeksang's word was law.

He was Nanman's only Great Chieftain and the only Palace Lord to have received an oath of absolute loyalty from every tribal chieftain. The five tribes that had left the Outer Palace rather than accept him had been stripped of all authority. Even the Miao leadership was locked in the underground prison.

There was nothing Baeksang could not command.

"…Yes, my lord."

Baeksang watched as the palace attendants, beginning with the old woman, were dragged out in a line, their faces drained of color. Then he muttered inwardly.

Perhaps leaving will be a mercy to you.

Soon everything would begin—and end.

Even Baeksang did not know how much blood would flow before it was over.

No. I can guess. I just don't want to believe it.

Perhaps that was why the past month had shaken him more than any other, though he had lived like a man of iron for more than forty years in pursuit of a single goal.

A whim. Useless in the end.

Yayul Cheok. Jin Taekyung.

Their names crossed his mind as he resumed walking.

Step. Step.

With every step came another thought.

What had become of those two since they disappeared? Where were they now? Did the Southern Heaven Demon Empress know what he had done without anyone else finding out—his final whim?

Too late. No one can undo it now.

Baeksang stopped. Only one door remained before him.

Beyond it lay the highest dais in the Inner Palace. Below it would be the ten thousand warriors gathered in response to the general mobilization order.

Noon. Tomorrow at noon. Gather every warrior in the palace.

There was no doubt. The grand plan was already complete.

Remembering the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's message delivered the previous night, Baeksang suddenly opened his mouth.

"The sun is hot."

"…My lord?"

The door was still shut, yet he could feel a heat that seemed ready to burn him.

What he was about to do was a terrible sin. It could not be forgiven, and it should not be.

But…

There's no other way now, Hwi.

Thinking of the son he missed, Baeksang threw open the door.

The sky opened before him. Below stood the assembled warriors. But his gaze—every one of his senses—was fixed elsewhere.

Beyond the heads of ten thousand warriors, beyond the wall around the Inner Palace and the fortifications of the Outer Palace, lay a green hill.

That's…

It was far away, but Baeksang could see a massive White Tiger standing atop it. Its silver mane shone in the noon sun, and someone sat on its back.

"…You came. After all."

Behind the White Tiger, beasts began to appear.

Thousands of them. Tens of thousands.

Chapter 695

At first, no one paid any attention.

No—no one had time to pay attention to anything else.

Major incidents had followed one after another, and the general mobilization order had swelled their forces by the day. Even ordinary tribespeople in the Outer Palace held their breath, while nearly ten thousand warriors and beasts waited in the Inner Palace for their new Palace Lord.

Yet amid all this, some still stood watch.

“I’m dying out here. It’s hot, everyone’s on edge, and I’m stuck at the North Gate. Should’ve asked for the East or West Gate. They’ve got it easy.”

The young warrior had just returned from patrol. His senior, a graying middle-aged man seated in the shade against the North Gate wall, clicked his tongue.

“Tsk, tsk. Listen to you. Young man with his whole life ahead of him, already looking for a chance to slack off.”

“You’ve been sitting in the shade the whole time I was on patrol.”

“I’m old. If I can’t rest now, when can I?”

“Well, you’ve got me there.”

The Nanman Beast Palace had three gates in total: the East, the West, and the North Gate where they were stationed.

There had never been a South Gate. The sheer cliff behind the Inner Palace was stronger than any gate.

“How was your patrol? What’s the Outer Palace like?”

“Not a rat in the marketplace.”

“…Of course. Everyone’s worried.”

The older warrior sighed.

Nearly ten thousand warriors had gathered in the Inner Palace alone—an army large enough to belong to a small country. Not since the Great Faction War some fifty years ago had so many assembled in one place.

History repeated itself.

Those old enough to remember the past fell silent. Parents pulled their children close and barred their doors. Everywhere, people feared that a vast war was about to begin.

“But… are we really going to war with the Central Plains?”

The older warrior answered his junior’s cautious question in a low voice.

“Who knows? One thing’s certain, though.”

“What’s that?”

“Before we fight in the Central Plains, we’ll shed blood right here in Nanman.”

"…!"

"You know the former Palace Lord is still alive. The five tribal chieftains who support him have left the Outer Palace. The higher-ups will want to settle that before they march on the Central Plains."

The older warrior was hardly the only one to see it coming. Anyone with a little sense and experience could guess what awaited them.

Civil war. Their first in some three hundred years.

To pass through the road leading to the Central Plains, they would have to walk over the corpses and blood of comrades with whom they had shared hardship until only a few days ago.

"…"

A shadow fell across the young warrior's usually carefree face. Among the tribespeople who had left the Outer Palace were close friends he had known since childhood.

The older warrior watched him for a moment, then quietly got to his feet.

"Where are you going?"

"I've slacked off enough. I'll take a look around the wall. My body aches from sitting still."

"Why not keep resting? The other squad's covering the wall anyway—"

"You think those fools are keeping watch? They've probably sneaked down to sit in the shade, same as us. If the higher-ups catch them, I'm the gate captain. I'll be the one getting my ass chewed out."

He had a point. Outsiders almost never came through, so security had never been especially tight. Since nearly ten thousand warriors had taken up position, it had grown laxer still.

Anyone mad enough to attack the Nanman Beast Palace now might as well kill himself.

Besides…

They're all troubled.

Far fewer warriors were eager for a fight than one might expect. Yayul Cheok, now branded a traitor to Nanman, had been a Palace Lord everyone respected. And after three hundred years together beneath the Nanman Beast Palace's banner, the tribes had grown close. They dreaded the civil war and Great War looming before them.

But what could they do? When the people above gave an order, you obeyed.

"Whew."

The older warrior sighed and climbed onto the wall. Just as he had expected, it was quiet up there.

Well, there was at least one man left behind. The problem was that he was asleep and snoring loudly.

…Fine. Rest while you can.

This was the calm before the storm. Today might be the last chance his sorry subordinates had to rest.

Shaking his head, the older warrior stood atop the wall and gazed into the distance.

It was noon.

The sun blazed high overhead. Beyond the North Gate, the broad pasture and the tall hill overlooking the Outer Palace shimmered in the heat haze—

Wait.

What was that? Had he seen it wrong?

His eyes widened. He blinked several times, then rubbed them hard with his sleeve. The sight before him did not change.

“What…?”

The dazed word escaped him before he knew he had spoken.

Far off in the direction he was staring, a massive White Tiger took a step forward.

Step.

Its pure white fur gleamed almost silver. An enormous forepaw brushed the grass, and a wind swept through the forest behind the hill.

Whoosh!

Tangled branches swayed. Countless leaves trembled. Beneath the shade of the dense forest, another forest began to move.

Rumble.

The ground shook. The air shuddered. The wind scattered. Countless eyes with long, slit pupils gleamed in the dark.

“…!”

The older warrior’s mouth slowly fell open.

Beasts. More beasts than he could begin to count.

He was only an ordinary warrior. He had no way to guess how many lurked behind the trees, or where all those predators with their sharp teeth and claws had come from.

But he could guess one thing.

The one leading that chilling host of beasts might be a person, just like him.

Whoosh!

Two silver figures, one large and one small, raced across the pasture on the cool wind.

By then, the number of White Tigers had increased to two. They stopped before the enormous iron gate, along with the man and woman riding on their backs.

Th-that's…

The older warrior's pupils trembled.

Someone else might not have recognized the pair at once. But he had been responsible for the North Gate for ten years, and the moment he saw their faces, it felt as if someone had struck the back of his head with an iron club.

How could he fail to know them?

The woman was one of Nanman's only four Great Chieftains, while the other young man was…

Jin Taekyung.

Merely thinking his name made it hard to breathe.

It was him. The first outsider to come to this land in the centuries since the Five Poisons Sect's destruction. The eye of the vast storm hanging over Nanman.

Jin Taekyung had come to the Nanman Beast Palace of his own accord—with countless beasts and Yohi, the Great Chieftain of the Yao people whom he had supposedly abducted.

Wh-what is going on…?

Before he could finish the thought, the young man who had kept his lips shut until now spoke.

"A word of advice. Take your hand off that."

"…!"

The middle-aged warrior froze just as he instinctively began to sound the alarm. Watching him, Jin Taekyung inwardly let out a sigh of relief.

Thank God. I'm not too late.

One look at the warrior's face had told him Dark Heaven's scheme had not yet begun. If the rift had opened, this place would already be a hellscape where no one could live.

And yet, within this stillness—a stillness so quiet that it felt ominous—he sensed a bomb with its fuse burning down.

"Right, Whitey?"

The enormous body beneath his backside flinched.

The guardian spirit of the sacred stone had regained its former appearance, a White Tiger befitting its title. It sent him a thought.

—…How dare you call this body a name like that?

"You'd have been Blackie before. Not that I'm a racist."

—I have no idea what you're babbling about. Mad human.

A madman, huh? Yeah, I've heard that a fair few times.

Muttering inwardly, Jin Taekyung gave a quiet laugh and lowered the spearhead in his hand.

Was he afraid of what lay ahead? Of course he was.

But he had survived countless brushes with death to reach this place, and he had done everything he could with what he'd been given.

Baeksang. The Southern Heaven Demon Empress. Dark Heaven.

It no longer mattered who stood in his way. He would simply stake his life and fight back.

That's right. Stake my life.

Tens of thousands of lives hung on this battle. Hundreds of thousands. Perhaps more.

Blood might flow like rivers, and corpses might pile up into mountains.

But…

I have to do it.

Someone had once said:

Do everything in your power, then leave the result to Heaven and wait.

But Jin Taekyung thought differently. Only when a person could even change the will of Heaven could it truly be called Will.

Isn't that right?

He looked up at the sky. Scorching, dazzling sunlight answered him.

He couldn't die on a day like this.

Then again, he didn't want to die in any weather. He had no intention of it.

Even if the Lord of Heaven was waiting behind the iron gate.

Swish! Slash!

In an instant, a blue-white Force tore through the air like a flash of light and split the enormous iron gate in two.

The guardian spirit, reborn as a dazzling silver White Tiger, let out a roar that shook Heaven and Earth.

—GRAAAAAAAWR!

Its jaws opened wide enough to swallow the world. But teeth harder than steel and a red tongue were not all that lay hidden inside.

Fwoosh!

Brilliant light burst forth, bathing the world in its radiance.

From the sacred stone held in the guardian spirit's mouth, a pillar of light surged over the walls and pierced the sky.

BOOOOM!

It could be seen from a hundred li[2990] away. Perhaps even a thousand.

Everyone saw that strange power, that wondrous sight: the ten thousand warriors gathered in the Inner Palace, and the innumerable beasts filling the hill.

[2990] A Chinese li is 500 m (0.311 mi). A hundred li is about 50 km (31 mi); a thousand li is about 500 km (311 mi).

—Kyaaaaaaau!

—GRAAAWR!

Their roars broke an invisible dam. The beasts that had waited for their master’s command surged like a wave across the vast grassland.

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

Thud, thud, thud!

Beneath the blazing sun, the earth shook and the wind scattered.

At the head of them all was one man.

“Let’s go.”

The quiet words slipped from his lips. At the same time, the guardian spirit powerfully kicked off the ground.

Whooosh!

The Great War that would decide Nanman’s fate had begun.

Chapter 696

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

Buildings shook. The earth trembled.

The silence surrounding the Nanman Beast Palace had long since shattered.

In the Outer Palace, tribespeople hiding behind locked doors pulled their young children close. Warriors idling away their shifts atop watchtowers turned their heads—and stared.

“W-what is that…?”

GRAAAAAAAWR!

A tremendous roar that shook Heaven and Earth swallowed the dazed voice that had slipped between someone’s lips.

One warrior finally came to his senses and shouted at the top of his lungs.

“Th-the enemy!”

Most of the others did not move. They could not.

How could they? All they could do was stand with their mouths open and watch an army of beasts race along the dozen or so broad roads through the Outer Palace.

Th-this can’t be.

The sight was as terrifying as it was wondrous.

Thousands—tens of thousands—of beasts ran as one.

No one there had ever seen anything like it. Not even the oldest person in the land. Probably not even his grandfather.

A calamity. Or a miracle.

Faced with something beyond their understanding, the ordinary warriors stood frozen like statues. Even their superior’s shout, the first to break through the shock, reached them like an echo from far away.

“The alarm bell! Ring the alarm bell! Tell the Inner Palace, now!”

“Ah… ah…”

“You idiots!”

The enraged superior shoved aside his dazed subordinate. Then, just as he reached for the rope connected to the alarm bell, he realized that the sunlight that had been beating down fiercely only moments ago had vanished.

Whoooooosh.

Dark clouds?

No. The dark clouds he knew did not move this fast or hang so low.

A strange sound reached him. As the darkness drew nearer, he finally saw what it was.

“…Goddamn it.”

The dark cloud—or rather, countless flying beasts that had flown in and dyed a section of the vast sky black—descended upon him.

Whoooooosh!

Flap, flap, flap!

He could tell neither how many there were nor what kinds. Sharp cries, flashing beaks, and flying feathers filled the air.

The flying beasts, transformed into one enormous monster, swept through five watchtowers like a storm.

No. They smashed them apart.

CRACK! CRUNCH!

“The watchtower’s coming down!”

“AAAAARGH!”

Charging together, the birds were a living battering ram.

The world tilted. For an instant, the warriors felt themselves floating. Then they fell with the shattered watchtowers.

Rumble, rumble, rumble! Daaang!

An alarm bell nearly as large as a grown man hit the ground first and rolled. The warriors twisted in midair and landed after it, stumbling but upright.

Panting, they raised their heads. A vast shadow fell over them.

“Where is Baeksang?”

“…!”

The quiet voice bored into their ears. Yet everyone there felt a chill that seemed to freeze their hearts.

Was it the enormous White Tiger, so large that looking at it made their knees weak? Or the countless beasts behind it?

No. The White Tiger felt strangely warm and mysterious, and the beasts facing them up close had gentle eyes.

What froze the warriors was the gaze of the man on the White Tiger’s back, looking down at them.

He was tall and perfectly proportioned, with carelessly tousled hair and striking features unlike those of the Nanman people.

And in his hand was a pure-white spear.

“Jin Taekyung!”

At someone’s shriek, the warriors instinctively reached for the weapons at their waists.

They tried to draw them.

At least, they did until Jin Taekyung opened his mouth.

“If you pull those out, you won’t like what happens.”

“…!”

“And if you’ve got eyes, look around. Who else is here besides me?”

Jin Taekyung was the monster blamed for throwing all of Nanman into an uproar. Since he had appeared with an enormous number of beasts, they had thought there could be nothing left to surprise them.

Then they recognized another face.

Step.

A second, smaller White Tiger approached. On its back rode a beautiful woman whose exhaustion did nothing to hide her looks.

“Su-surely not…”

“Great Chieftain Yohi?”

Yohi spoke, her voice clear.

“Do you recognize me?”

How could they not? Every year, when she appeared before the public for the Tribal Grand Council, people packed the streets for a glimpse of her.

But what confused them most was seeing her beside Jin Taekyung, neither afraid nor bound. After the incident at the Western Yao Estate a few days earlier, rumors of her death had spread quietly through Nanman.

And now she was at the head of an immense host of beasts.

“G-Great Chieftain. Why are you with a monster like him…?”

“A monster…”

Yohi muttered quietly and turned her head to look at Jin Taekyung, but Jin Taekyung was not looking at her.

His eyes were fixed on the enormous iron gate separating the Outer Palace from the Inner Palace, at the far end of the road. Something about it felt ominous.

“There comes the monster,” he said.

The next moment, the gate began to open with a heavy grinding sound.

Rumble, rumble, rumble.

Countless arrowheads appeared along the high stone walls of the Inner Palace.

Click, click, click!

Sunlight flashed on their tips. Nearly a thousand archers aimed from the walls, bowstrings drawn taut, their breathing tight with tension.

Then the figure hidden behind the iron gate came into view.

Step.

His footsteps rang out with unusual clarity.

The hem of his spotless white robe brushed the ground. His calm gaze crossed the distance and met one man’s eyes.

“You came. In the end, you did.”

Baeksang.

His voice carried powerful internal energy. Jin Taekyung lowered his spearhead and answered.

“Yes. I came.”

You fucking bastard.

Baeksang.

The moment I saw his face, I felt the internal energy throughout my body boil like lava.

I wanted to charge out immediately.

I wanted to kick off the guardian spirit’s back, race toward him like the wind, and kill him with the fastest, strongest strike I could deliver.

But…

Slick.

A slender finger caught hold of my sleeve. Yohi’s trembling voice reached my ears.

“No. Not yet.”

Yes. I knew that too.

If I cut Baeksang’s head off right now, it would be like lighting the fuse of a bomb with no time left on it.

Baeksang—he could not die like that. He had to die not as the Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace, but as the traitor and usurper who had deceived all the Nanman people and joined forces with Dark Heaven.

The Palace Lord’s death would bring a brutal battle. But no warrior would fight for a traitor.

It was the only way to spare even a few needless deaths. And Yohi, beside me, was the one person who could expose the truth and stop the battle bearing down on us.

“Let’s go.”

The guardian spirit and Muyaho nodded at my whisper and started forward.

We moved at a steady pace. A thousand arrowheads tracked us, ready to loose a rain of arrows at a single command.

But as we drew closer, their flashing tips began to waver. Taut bowstrings slackened. Unease spread along the Inner Palace walls as the archers recognized Yohi.

There was one exception.

Baeksang.

I stared at his unshaken face.

“The Great Chieftain you used to eat with has come back alive. You could at least ask how she is. Don’t you think?”

Charged with internal energy, my voice carried in every direction.

The unease swelled. Baeksang parted his lips.

“What affection is there between us that I should greet her? We were bound together only by our separate aims.”

“…!”

“…!”

My face stiffened. Yohi’s probably had too.

We were thinking the same thing.

Why?

This was not the Baeksang I knew. He was sly and cunning. His scheming, more frightening than his martial arts, was one of the chief reasons Nanman had fallen into chaos.

Yet he had acknowledged Yohi. In front of everyone who followed him.

My grip tightened around the spear shaft. I clenched my teeth and glared at him.

“What the hell is this…? What kind of bullshit are you pulling?”

“Did you think I would deny it?”

Baeksang turned to look behind him.

Beyond the wide-open gate, countless Nanman warriors stood amid a mountain of sabers and a forest of swords. They and the archers on the walls stared at him, eyes wide.

“What more is there to say? Everything you know—and everything they will soon realize—is true.”

“…!”

“Yes. That is correct.”

Baeksang looked away from his warriors and up at the sky.

Not a cloud marred it. Hot sunlight fell across his face.

“I betrayed everyone.”

His quiet voice, charged with internal energy, broke the suffocating silence that had settled over the area.

It traveled on the air, pierced through the wind, crossed the broad road running through the Outer Palace, passed over the stone walls of the Inner Palace, and reached everyone.

“I lived each day as though it were ten years. To achieve one goal, I became an unforgivable turncoat. And at last, I came this far.”

My breath caught.

This was not a confession in which he admitted the sins he had committed and begged for forgiveness.

No. It was…

Relief that it was over. And despair.

Something altogether different from giving up.

Baeksang was letting out what he had held down every day for decades. He made no attempt to hide his despair, even though he had achieved the goal he had wanted for so long.

No way.

A thought flashed through my mind like lightning. Every hair on my body stood on end.

Then a scream burst from my lips.

“Everyone, fall back—!”

And the next moment—

Rumble, rumble, rumble! Flash!

Thunder shook Heaven and Earth. Dark clouds spread over everyone’s heads.

In a world where not even a single ray of sunlight could be found, someone’s voice bored into my ears.

“What a shame. It’s already too late.”

Chapter 697

“What a shame. It’s already too late.”

A languid voice reached my ears. No—not just mine. Everyone here could hear it.

It heralded the arrival of someone fatally alluring, and more dangerous still.

“The Southern Heaven Demon Empress!”

I whipped my head around at the thunderous shout. Above the heads of everyone frozen by her sudden appearance, billowing robes fluttered atop a pavilion that rose high into the sky.

The catlike eyes looking down at us curved into half-moons.

“Oh my. Who could this be?”

The woman’s face was unfamiliar. Her voice and the feeling she gave me were not.

I knew it was her. I forced the words out through clenched teeth.

“It’s me, you fucking bitch.”

Heat churned in my gut as if I’d swallowed lava. My fingers trembled around the spear shaft, and my heart hammered against my ribs.

A tidal wave of emotion raged through me—far more fiercely than when I had faced Baeksang.

But simple hostility and anger were not the only things that had seized me.

She’s strong.

Was she always this strong?

Just meeting her eyes made my heart sink.

Several months had passed since the incident in Hubei Province. The insights I’d gained since then let me glimpse a little more of my opponent’s true nature. The Southern Heaven Demon Empress standing before me was a greater monster than I had imagined.

No one else here could even guess at her realm. Yet my eyes and sharpened senses could trace the power she concealed: the ferocity behind her gently curved eyes, the immense darkness coiled within her slender frame.

“You fucking bitch.”

“Ahaha! Just as I expected. Just as I expected!”

Whatever amused her so much, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress clutched her stomach and laughed despite the insult. Then she smiled at me.

“You’re so refreshingly straightforward. That’s why I like you, Benefactor.”

“What?”

“Have you forgotten already? Who saved me that day, on cold Dongting Lake, with corpses floating in the water?”

“…!”

As if I could forget. I'd thought back on that moment and regretted it countless times.

Was it because I'd saved the Southern Heaven Demon Empress with my own hands?

No. The person I'd saved that day was Honglan.

In Hubei, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress had been nothing more than a beautiful singing courtesan favored by some idiot from the Huang tribe. She had approached me deliberately from the start, and she would have survived even if I hadn't come.

The one thing I regretted was being too stupid to recognize the culprit standing right in front of me.

My anger at myself for failing to realize I had been toyed with for someone else's amusement.

And my guilt at failing to prevent an even greater sacrifice.

Rustle.

"Now I can finally greet you properly."

Honglan—no, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress—lifted her billowing robes and dipped her head.

"This lowly woman, Honglan, greets her Benefactor."

I thrust out a palm as fast as lightning.

Fwoosh!

Moisture evaporated in an instant. The force of the Flame Divine Palm, carrying terrible heat, reached her in a heartbeat.

But—

Slice!

In even less time, the powerful palm force—one Baeksang himself would have struggled to stop—was split in two like tofu.

Boom!

Beneath the dark clouds that now covered the sky, the two halves flew off course and exploded in midair.

Cries of shock rose around us.

"W-what was that?"

"D-did you see what I just saw? That woman…"

"The Southern Heaven Demon Empress. Someone definitely called her the Southern Heaven Demon Empress."

Some here knew that title. Others didn't. It hardly mattered. Soon they would all know who she was—and how much viciousness and terrifying power that monster had kept hidden.

I stared coldly at the edge of the pavilion. Standing there, straightening her disheveled court robes, was a woman far too beautiful to be called a monster.

“Hmm. I went to the trouble of being polite, but I don’t much like the way you answered my greeting. Still, I’ll be generous and let it pass. I do owe you my life. I can’t gouge out my Benefactor’s eyes just yet.”

I could feel the killing intent beneath her innocent tone. If anything, it made me calmer.

“Shut your fucking maw.”

“What rough language. A maw is something a beast has. For example…”

Her voice trailed off as her gaze shifted slightly downward, toward the enormous White Tiger baring its teeth.

“Yes. That word suits that hideous beast perfectly.”

Grrrrr.

The guardian spirit growled low and glared at the Southern Heaven Demon Empress. I could feel its muscles tense as it prepared itself.

“A hideous beast, you say. Then what should a human like you be called?”

Until now, its thoughts had been much like Sound Transmission. This time, its voice reached everyone.

The warriors surrounding the Inner Palace, inside and out, caught their breath. The Southern Heaven Demon Empress widened her eyes, then gave a quiet laugh and looked at me.

“I stand corrected. It’s not merely hideous. It’s an interesting beast, too.”

“I don’t know about that.”

I tightened my grip on the spear. Dozens of movements and forms flashed through my mind—ways to end her life with the fastest, deadliest strike I could deliver.

“You’ll find it even more interesting in a moment. This one’s going to bite through the back of your neck.”

“A beast is still a beast. The same was true of a certain foolish imugi that waited for Heaven’s call.”

“He was not foolish. He was kind. Kind enough to sacrifice his life and the cultivation he had built over hundreds of years.”

The guardian spirit fixed its blue-white eyes on her as though it could see straight through her.

“I know you.”

A faint smile touched her lips.

“That’s hardly welcome news. I have no interest in a beast that reeks like you do.”

“I saw you in the imugi’s memories. A human, endlessly dark and filled with malice.”

“Memories?”

“Everything that makes up the world possesses an essence and traces. And in that sense, you in its memories were…”

“Beautiful, I suppose. Dazzlingly so.”

“Old and hideous. So much so that it was hard to believe you were human.”

“…!”

“That is your essence. You have denied and hated your true form, clinging to life through the long years. You are no different from a Fiend.”

Silence followed the guardian spirit’s words. The people who had been murmuring in shock fell quiet. The countless growling beasts held their breath and lowered themselves to the ground.

And at the center of it all stood one person.

Fwoosh!

The sleeves of her court robes swelled as though they might burst. A terrifying surge of qi pressed down in every direction with the weight of a mountain, freezing every living thing in place.

Crack. Crack.

The wind stopped. The pavilion roof began to collapse under the pressure.

“…Is that so?”

Her smile was gone. Her darkened eyes looked down on the world below.

“Old and hideous. Yes. So that’s what I am.”

She spoke calmly, then turned to stare at me.

“I’ll give you credit for making it this far. If you’d arrived a day earlier—no, even half a day—I couldn’t have guaranteed the outcome myself.”

Her tone had changed. So had the air around her.

Yet I felt calmer. People were most frightening when they kept their true nature hidden. Once they lost the smile and composure they’d held on to until the end, an opening appeared.

Besides…

I still had a card up my sleeve. A move I could make even if the worst happened, as long as I had the strength to use it.

That was why I could speak.

“Hmm. I’m genuinely curious about something.”

Just like this.

“How ugly is your face, really, for someone to say something like that to you?”

“…!”

“Were you a mortar in your past life?”

The next moment—

“I’ll make you regret that.”

Her cold voice broke the brief silence. Dark clouds swallowed the sky.

And then…

Fwoosh!

A mass of pitch-black light poured from the enormous cliff behind the Inner Palace.

That's…

The sight alone made it hard to breathe.

It was a rift.

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

The earth shook. The world shook. With a deafening roar, the enormous cliff that had stood there for hundreds—no, thousands—of years began to split apart.

"Ah. Ahhh…"

Someone groaned in shock at the strange, terrifying sight.

So it has come to this. At long last.

Someone else spat out a despairing mutter in the depths of their heart.

"It's over. All of it."

And someone who had been consumed by anger watched what they had brought about with rapture in their eyes.

At last. At last!

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress trembled, already forgetting the anger she had felt moments before.

How could she not? This was the fruit of long years of endurance.

That rift, far larger and more powerful than the one in Hubei Province, was her creation. It marked the moment the omnipotent Lord of Heaven's will descended upon this land.

Kraaaaaaash!

A blade-sharp gale swept in every direction. Through the widening gap in the cliff, an intensely dark and viscous energy began to crawl out, gnawing away at the world.

Demonic qi that would corrupt life and conquer this land!

—Krrk, krrrk!

—Kyaaaaa!

"Ghk. Guhk!"

"W-what's happening all of a sudden—krrk!"

The rift had not even opened completely, yet its power was already spreading in every direction.

Look at that surging darkness. At the countless beasts and humans writhing with the whites of their eyes showing, awaiting the change to come.

And soon, the change caused by the rift would begin.

No. That's not right.

This was not change. It was evolution.

They would be reborn as stronger, more beautiful beings. It was a blessing the omnipotent Lord of Heaven bestowed upon lowly creatures.

A lingering smile spread across the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's lips. Then her gaze fell on one person.

Jin Taekyung.

A young man stood tall, staring at the unbelievable, overwhelming spectacle unfolding before him.

To the Southern Heaven Demon Empress, he looked absurd—and pitiful. Enough to make her want to rip his throat out in one go.

You… should never have come here.

She was about to launch herself toward Jin Taekyung when—

Fwoosh!

A tremendous radiance burst forth from somewhere and swallowed the darkness.

Chapter 698

What is that?

The question filled the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's mind. Her eyes widened.

Light.

Bigger and brighter than any light she had ever seen.

A tremendous radiance that had erupted without warning swelled as though it might burst, swallowing the approaching darkness as it seeped into the world.

Kwooooooo!

A pillar of light shot toward the distant sky and pierced the heavens. Sunlight poured through a gap in the dark clouds.

The darkness that had surged over the stone walls like a wave faltered the moment it touched the radiance, as though its path had been blocked.

Blocked? Even the demonic qi summoned from the rift?

It was impossible to believe.

The rift's demonic qi was immensely powerful, a force of pure darkness. Even the imugi[2991], after hundreds of years of cultivation, had been unable to withstand its full power and had fallen to corruption.

Yet the scene before her was real.

The dark clouds were slowly scattering.

The wave of darkness could advance no farther against the radiance.

And then—

"Wow. This really works."

"…!"

Jin Taekyung stood at the center of the radiance, grinning at her.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress clenched her teeth.

"How… How in the world?"

Before she could finish, Jin Taekyung shrugged.

"No big deal. Everyone's got a divine artifact stashed away somewhere, right?"

"…!"

Divine artifact.

The words struck her like a hammer to the back of the head.

Only then did her gaze slide away from Jin Taekyung and settle on another being.

That beast.

[2991] An imugi is a serpent-like creature in Korean folklore, often associated with the prospect of becoming a dragon.

The enormous White Tiger had its jaws open as if roaring. Like the imugi[2992] she had corrupted, it was clearly more than a spiritual creature.

Through the dazzling radiance, she could faintly make out something shining with a clear, luminous glow.

At the same time, an ancient legend of this land flashed through her mind.

"…The Beast King Stone."

The words slipped between her pomegranate-red lips. Jin Taekyung gave a quiet laugh.

"Oh. You know it?"

How could she not?

The symbol of the king before whom every beast in the world bowed. Nanman's divine artifact, lost for hundreds of years.

No, she could hardly have failed to recognize it. She was the one who had combed every inch of Nanman's rugged terrain for the Beast King Stone.

For more than ten years.

Yet even after enough time had passed for mountains and rivers to change, she had failed to find so much as the slightest trace of the Beast King Stone itself. In the end, she had left the ancient legend behind and begun her grand plan.

But why? Why now?

"You bastaaaaards!"

Whoooooosh! Crack!

A terrifyingly immense surge of qi rose and pressed down on everything around it.

The countless beasts that had been baring their teeth and growling tucked their tails between their legs. Pavilions throughout the area began to collapse as though a giant had stepped on them.

Tribespeople fleeing the Outer Palace in terror spotted the figure suspended in the air and gaped.

"A-Ah…!"

Darkness.

A woman wrapped from head to toe in surging darkness looked down upon the ground.

Like a god—or a Fiend out of legend—she seemed to be weighing how much life they had left.

Yet while everyone else stared at her in fear, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress had eyes for only one thing.

"Hand it over."

[2992] An imugi is a serpent-like creature in Korean folklore, often associated with the prospect of becoming a dragon.

Rumble.

The dark clouds filling the sky gave a great roar.

Her chilling voice rang through the world of light and darkness, reaching every ear.

“It is something the Lord of Heaven must rightfully take. It is not an object that insignificant beings like you are fit to possess.”

Beasts and humans alike froze before her overwhelming power. They forgot to scream, forgot to run, and stared blankly up at her.

All except two people.

No—two beings.

“Bullshit, you crazy bitch.”

—How dare a mere human covet the sacred stone?

Jin Taekyung and the guardian spirit stared at the Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

They could feel it: the unprecedented power coiled inside that small body.

The qi pressing down around them was greater than any the guardian spirit had encountered in a human over the past several hundred years. It surpassed even that of the Western Heaven Demon Lord, whom Jin Taekyung had fought while narrowly escaping death time and again.

Strong.

And frightening.

Fear was something every living creature knew. But feeling it and surrendering to it were different things.

They knew that even now, they had to endure the fear pressing down on their entire bodies and advance. Only then could they win.

—Much blood will flow, human.

“Fuck. If I survive this, I won’t even take a piss toward Nanman again.”

Jin Taekyung muttered through clenched teeth and tightened his grip on White Flame’s shaft.

Then he spoke quietly to Yohi, who stood frozen behind him.

“You know what to do, right?”

“…!”

“Get the people out of here. Now. Run like hell, and take them as far away as you can.”

Countless tribespeople lived in the Outer Palace, beyond those he could see.

Jin Taekyung did not want them caught in the horrific hellscape about to unfold here.

It was enough for those with power to bleed. The tribespeople, with neither weapons nor sharp teeth, had to survive.

Even if everyone who remained here died at the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's hands.

But… I'll stop her. We'll stop her.

For now, the sacred stone's power was holding back the demonic qi pouring from the rift.

He did not know how long this tense standoff would last, but before the situation grew any worse, they had to defeat the Southern Heaven Demon Empress and close the rift.

No matter what it takes.

Whoosh.

Jin Taekyung drew a deep breath and glared at the figure high above the wreckage of the pavilions.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress. The beginning and end of everything that had happened in this land.

Someone had to fall before this cruel story could end.

"Let's go."

The low voice had just slipped between his lips when—

—Kraaaaaaang!

A fierce roar tore through the wind.

The radiance that had been fading against the darkness swelled once more, rousing the terrified beasts and people.

Fwoosh! Kwooooooosh!

Light burst forth with the roar. Flames blazed around the silver spearhead.

The outsider who had come to this land after hundreds of years soared upward as one with the enormous White Tiger.

Bang!

He kicked off the ground.

Pop!

He stepped on the invisible air and wind.

Whooooooosh!

Toward the darkness spread across the distant sky.

No.

Toward the being made still stronger by that darkness.

"Southern Heaven Demon Empress!"

His flame-wreathed azure dragon's roar flew with the spearhead, cleaving through space.

A chilling look crossed the woman's face, now twisted like a Fiend's, with not a trace of beauty left.

"The Lord of Heaven desires it."

At that moment—

Flash!

Light and darkness mingled in a blinding flash that washed over the Nanman Beast Palace.

Rrrrrumble.

A roar like the sky splitting apart accompanied a tremendous surge of qi that swept in every direction.

Baeksang instinctively shut his eyes against the blinding flash. A gale struck his entire body, and he swallowed a groan.

Hngh.

What kind of overwhelming power was this?

Even as a Supreme Peak master, he could barely keep his balance against the aftershock.

When he finally opened his eyes, the area around him had already been reduced to ruins. The tribespeople who had barely survived thanks to the protection of the beasts were fleeing while screaming.

"Kyaaaaaa!"

"Hoya! Hoya! Where are you?"

"M-Mother!"

Pavilions and houses built over many years collapsed one after another. A grown son cried out at the sight of his elderly mother pinned beneath a fallen stone wall.

Screams and death. Blood and bodies.

Only days ago, these streets had been full of laughter and music. Now there was no trace of either—only an endless din of roars and screams.

Bang! Kwoooooang!

Light and darkness shot toward each other and tangled together, again and again, in the space of an instant.

Baeksang stared hollowly at the hellscape beneath the murky flashes and sky-splitting roars. Then he reached out in one direction.

Boom!

The force of his palm crossed the distance and knocked a large boulder away.

A half-gray-haired middle-aged man who had been struggling to save an old woman trapped beneath the stone wall widened his eyes.

"Y-You…"

Something about the man's face was familiar. Perhaps they had met somewhere.

Baeksang watched him help the old woman up, anger and gratitude mingling on his face. Then he saw her face and understood.

He looks like her. So much.

It was the old palace attendant he had personally ordered expelled from the Inner Palace before any of this began.

One of the few people left who remembered the man he had once been was bleeding and groaning before him.

"Cough. Mmm…"

"M-Mother!"

She had a child?

Baeksang watched the man hurriedly check on his mother, then found himself walking toward them.

He did not know why. He simply felt that he should.

"D-Don't come any closer!"

The cry was full of hostility.

People could shut their doors and lock them, but they could not close their ears.

By now, everyone in the Nanman Beast Palace knew their Palace Lord, the Great Chieftain of the Bai people, had betrayed them. They knew Baeksang was responsible for the screams and deaths that continued even now.

The man before him knew it too. He stood between Baeksang and his mother, clutching a sharp piece of stone he had picked up somewhere.

"If you take one more step…"

Swish! Crack!

Finger Qi pierced the stone, and it crumbled in his hand.

Baeksang passed the frozen man and reached toward the old woman.

Tap. Tap!

The blurred hand moved like lightning, touching the old woman's acupoints. At the same moment, her furrowed brow smoothed.

"Cough."

She spat out stagnant blood, and her face relaxed.

The man hastily checked his mother, then looked up at Baeksang, unable to understand.

"W-Why?"

Why?

Baeksang could not answer even that simple question. Perhaps he would not be able to answer it in ten years, or a hundred.

He did not know the answer himself.

When he finally broke the brief silence, he gave no answer.

“Leave with the others. Get as far away as you can.”

“S-Sir!”

“Do you intend to let your mother die like this? Or…”

Baeksang’s gaze darkened.

“Will you make her watch you die?”

“…!”

“Go. If you head for the East Gate, a way out will open.”

Baeksang turned away. Behind him, the man’s hoarse voice rang out.

“Do you think this will… Do you think this will make the sins you committed forgivable!”

Baeksang answered the angry shout only in his heart.

No. I never once thought I would be forgiven.

Rumble, rumble!

A deafening roar rolled behind him as he headed toward the Inner Palace.

He sped onward without a trace of hesitation.

It was time to face the moment he had pictured for decades.

Chapter 699

Rumble! Crash!

Unable to withstand the fierce vibrations, the stone walls of the Inner Palace crumbled helplessly, and the iron gate that had broken free slammed into the ground with a heavy roar.

It was like watching a small hill collapse.

Baeksang slipped past the debris and shot forward.

Whoooosh!

Wind brushed across his entire body. His sharpened senses caught the metallic scent of blood and the screams echoing from every direction.

He felt the internal energy churning inside him and took a deep breath.

I must not let it overwhelm me.

A massive cliff rose behind the Inner Palace like a folding screen. Demonic qi flowed from a gap in it—a gap that could only be called a rift now. Even Baeksang could not take it lightly.

Only because he was a Supreme Peak master could he move through the Inner Palace like this. Unless one walked the Demonic Path, even a fairly skilled internal-energy master would have had his internal energy thrown into disarray and lost his composure the moment he entered the demonic qi's domain.

Just like the middle-aged man now staggering into his path to block him.

"P-Palace Lord? Is that you, Palace Lord?"

Baeksang knew his face. Greedy like his father, the man had inherited his position as tribal chieftain without any particular ability and lived in luxury. He had been one of Baeksang's most ardent supporters.

But the man who used to greet Baeksang with an oily, flattering smile was now crying out with blood running from his seven apertures.[2993]

"Please, please save me! I don't want to die ye—!"

His flailing hand brushed Baeksang's white collar. Baeksang quietly looked down at the fallen tribal chieftain, who had lost his balance, and opened his mouth.

"Why should I?"

"P-Palace Lord?"

"You must have known already. That what I intended to do would bring great harm to Nanman."

"…!"

"We each got what we wanted and paid a fair price for it. So don't think you've been wronged."

[2993] The "seven apertures" are the two eyes, two ears, two nostrils, and mouth.

I won't, either.

The last words never left his lips. Finger Qi shot from his fingertips.

Puhk!

The attack pierced the crown of the chieftain's skull, and he collapsed. His eyes remained wide with disbelief. Even in death, they seemed to ask Baeksang a question.

Why? How? How can you still stand so proudly even in the face of this hellscape?

And Baeksang answered the dead man's question in his heart.

Because I had already made up my mind.

Even so, his breath trembled.

If that man had begged him to save the tribespeople instead of his own life, would Baeksang have saved them?

No. Perhaps meeting such a peaceful death was actually an act of mercy for a man with such poor martial arts.

Ten thousand.

A full ten thousand warriors and beasts were bleeding and writhing in the grip of the demonic qi. Their screams seemed to squeeze his heart and rake through his mind like blades.

Baeksang did not stop.

Whoooosh!

He sped across the vast training ground, where screams filled the air. The stable where he and Yayul Cheok had hidden whenever they got into trouble as children flashed past, then the storehouse they used to sneak into for fruit wine.

Vengeance. Anger. Regret.

The emotions that had piled up layer after layer with every step whipped around him.

If only I hadn't taken my only son to the battlefield. If only I'd drawn my sword instead of clasping hands with the Southern Heaven Demon Empress the day she came.

If only I'd told my one sworn elder brother the whole truth. He'd trusted me more than anyone—even more than I trusted myself.

Or…

If only I'd carried it all alone and taken my own life.

Step.

His feet stopped before a tightly closed door. His eyes had long since gone bloodshot.

In his mind, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's voice echoed from the night before.

"Noon. Tomorrow at noon. Gather every warrior in the palace at the Inner Palace."

“Tomorrow… at noon?”

“Yes. That’s the end of your part. After that, we’ll take care of—”

“Our promise.”

“Hmm?”

“Please keep the promise you made me long ago.”

“You’re rather impudent, aren’t you? Interrupting an adult while she’s speaking.”

She had laughed. Baeksang had dropped to his knees without hesitation.

Only after watching the new lord of the Nanman Beast Palace repeatedly strike his head against the floor for quite some time did she finally give him the answer he had so desperately wanted.

“A polite child deserves a reward. Fine. Once the grand plan begins, return to your office.”

“My… office?”

“Yes. This very place. That’s when I’ll fulfill my promise.”

Her amused voice faded from his ears. Baeksang’s only hand trembled as he reached toward the door, slowly, so slowly.

He had never wondered how. If the Southern Heaven Demon Empress and Dark Heaven said it was so, then it was so. All the things they had done—things that seemed to defy nature—made it easier still to believe.

However many eyes watched the Inner Palace, the promise would be kept.

At last.

He had made it here.

Baeksang closed his eyes. A wave of distant memories rose and swallowed him.

Long years of suffering.

But even this lonely story had a final chapter. He opened his eyes as though waking from sleep and pushed the door wide.

Creak.

His spacious office came into view.

Simple, crude furnishings that still held the warmth of their former owner. A table that had preserved the traces of many long years.

And, out of place among them, a large mirror.

And then. And then…

That was all.

Nothing. There’s nothing here.

The impossible truth bore down on him like a massive boulder. Baeksang stared at the office with hollow, empty eyes, then suddenly let out a hollow laugh.

“Heh. Heh heh. Heh heh heh.”

He laughed because he could not cry. Because he could do nothing else.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress had not kept her promise. Decades of his life, everything he had done—all of it turned to ash and blew away.

So this was how it ended.

“Ha-ha-ha-ha-ha!”

Baeksang laughed as though he were a boy again. He clutched his stomach and rolled across the floor, tears streaming down his face.

No. He was crying.

“Ha—ha-ha! Aaaaaah!”

The laughter broke into a scream. Baeksang struck the floor and walls with a fist that held not a trace of internal energy.

Bang! Bang! Krrr-boom!

He kept punching. The office was not the only thing that broke.

The callused back of his hand split open, and white bone showed faintly through the blood covering his fist.

It hurts.

More than it ever had.

Drip. Drip-drip.

Blood pooled in the spiderweb cracks across the floor. Baeksang staggered to his feet and approached the window.

He had thought the world had stopped. Beyond the open window, everything was still moving at a furious pace.

“Graaah!”

“P-Please, just kill me…!”

—Grrk, grrrk!

Humans and beasts struggled as they resisted the demonic qi devouring their bodies and minds. Shapes large and small raced toward them as they screamed.

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

Countless beasts thundered across the ground, climbed over the collapsed stone walls, and descended upon them—not to kill, but to rescue them.

—Graaaar!

With the roar of a familiar White Tiger at the head of the group, the beasts moved in perfect formation. They bit the arms, legs, or scruffs of the nearest people and beasts, then raced toward the Outer Palace.

Away from the demonic qi. One step farther toward the light.

Baeksang clenched his fist. His nails dug into his palm, and blood welled around them.

He looked into the distance, where light and darkness clashed without pause.

Rumble!

He could feel waves of unimaginable power. With every clash, the light faded a little more, and one figure fell again.

Boom! Crack!

The figure hurtled toward the ground like a meteor. Two pavilions collapsed, and the earth shook.

But only for a moment. Blue flames stepped on empty air and shot toward the thick darkness.

Without a moment's rest. As though it could burn away even the death waiting for it.

Jin Taekyung.

Why go so far? Why?

The question remained trapped in Baeksang's mouth. Another question, heard not long ago in a corner of a dark underground prison, echoed in his ears.

"How much more blood do you mean to spill, Baeksang?"

Baeksang stared blankly out the window and finally gave his answer.

"I don't know. I don't know either."

It was a secret he had been unable to tell anyone.

After losing his son, he had dreamed of revenge. Meeting the Southern Heaven Demon Empress had given him hope. Then one day he had realized he'd crossed a river he could never cross back, and despair had followed.

And now, at the end of the thorny path he had walked, he found nothing at all.

Step.

Baeksang staggered back from the window. He could no longer bear to watch the hellscape he had made with his own hands, or the young outsider risking his life to stop it from becoming complete.

What was any of it for?

He turned away from the window with a question he would never answer—and froze.

"…!"

Someone covered in blood and dust was looking back at him.

A man who had lost everything and become an empty shell. An old man who had held the years at bay through sheer martial power, surviving as a monster.

The large mirror occupying one corner of the office reflected his figure.

But Baeksang saw something else, too.

"Ah."

Hwi.

He reached toward him with a call that could never reach him. Or tried to.

The mirror's clear, smooth surface rippled like water.

Ssssrrrk.

Only then did Baeksang understand who had given him the mirror, and why the Southern Heaven Demon Empress had said her promise would be fulfilled here.

She hadn't lied.

In his cold heart, an ember of hope he had thought extinguished began to burn again.

The mirror clouded with darkness. Before Baeksang's trembling eyes, it spat out a black-clad figure—and a cold sword blade imbued with Force.

Puhk!

Flash.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress thrust out a foot smaller than a boy's palm.

The moment it met the side of my spearhead, a force greater than a giant's surged through me.

Crack—bang!

"Human!"

I heard the guardian spirit's cry as I fell. The impact drove me deep into the ground and jolted through my back, forcing my mouth open.

Cough.

Blood ran from the corner of my mouth. I'd already suffered serious Internal Injury, and my cracked bones creaked and ached whenever I moved.

Monster.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress was a bitch for the ages, and a monster to match. Her martial arts surpassed anyone I'd faced—even the Western Heaven Demon Lord.

But…

Get up. As many times as it takes.

A few times. A few dozen. It didn't matter.

There was nowhere left to retreat. If I took even one step back, that place would become hell.

Not only me, but every living thing in Nanman—and even the Central Plains—would inevitably be swallowed by the flames.

I have to stop her.

I wiped the blood from the corner of my mouth with my sleeve and stood.

Before I could summon my internal energy again, I realized things could still get worse.

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

I turned my head on instinct.

“…Fuck.”

Darkness descending thickly over the collapsing Inner Palace.

Chapter 700

Me, the guardian spirit, and the Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

Less than fifteen minutes had passed since the battle began, but if I was being generous, we'd been evenly matched.

Until now.

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

"…Fuck."

The curse slipped out before I could stop it.

Not just because the Inner Palace was collapsing. It might have been the symbol and pride of the Nanman Beast Palace, but in the end, it was only a building.

The problem was that as the largest structure in the Nanman Beast Palace crumbled like a sandcastle, the darkness pouring from the rift grew thicker.

Kraaaaaash!

Demonic qi. Also known as magical power.

That pure, dangerous energy surged outward in a wave. It swallowed the enormous dust cloud, crossed the open space, and reached the living beings who had yet to escape the Inner Palace.

"Grrk, keugh!"

—Kyaaaaaa!

Humans and beasts screamed.

The eyes that had begun to regain focus turned white. Their trembling bodies contorted with a sickening sound of tearing flesh.

Crack. Crrrunch.

Death flashed through my mind, but that wasn't it.

What awaited them was pain worse than death, and the changes that would soon come over them would make them forget even the pain.

No. I should call it a mutation, not a change.

I knew what I was seeing. I'd seen it once before—and experienced it myself.

The magical power from the rift had been strong enough to corrupt a five-hundred-year-old imugi. The Water God Dragon had borne it alone, so its case was different. Even so, ordinary beasts and most martial artists had no hope of shaking off its influence by themselves.

Not unless someone helped them.

And apparently, that someone is me.

Fuck.

I hesitated at the thought of leaving the guardian spirit to fight alone, but only for a moment.

Several thousand humans and beasts were still inside the Inner Palace. Their lives were reason enough. But if the magical power consumed them completely and turned them into mutants, the hellscape the Southern Heaven Demon Empress had envisioned would be complete.

Whatever else happened, a horrific slaughter would begin as they killed one another.

In a moment too short to call an instant, I wasn't the only one to realize it.

—Go! Hurry!

The thought rang through my head almost at the same time I kicked off the ground.

Boom!

Compression. Then explosion.

A violent wind struck my body, and the scenery changed around me.

I shot forward like a cannonball, leaving a small crater behind and clearing more than sixty yards in a single bound. As my toes touched down lightly, flames of manifested qi flickered beneath them.

Flamefire Path.

Kraaaaaash!

In a world gone slow, blue-white light-flames burst forth.

The guardian spirit vanished from my sight as it charged the Southern Heaven Demon Empress with a roar that shook the sky. So did Muyaho, racing out of the Outer Palace with all his strength at the very rear of the survivors.

Whoooosh.

Wind carrying the scent of blood brushed across my entire body. By then, beneath the feet I had planted in midair, I could see countless beasts and humans writhing as darkness engulfed them.

And…

I can feel it.

After reaching the Supreme Peak realm, each new insight had taught me the same thing: everything in the world had a flow. Just because I couldn't see it didn't mean I couldn't feel it.

The formless wind. Rock hard enough to turn aside steel. Still water. Each had its flow, or a faint gap within it.

Its grain.

Now!

Fwoooosh!

Certain of my aim, I slashed downward with my spear.

[2994] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle. Three jiazi represent 180 years of internal energy.

Three jiazi[2994] of Scorching Yang Qi coiled around its transparent blade, burning through the darkness as it cut through the air.

I aimed for the grain in the pitch-black darkness wrapped around thousands of lives. For that fine, invisible flow I could sever in a single stroke.

And then—

Whoooosh—boom!

A roar like the sky splitting apart rang out as flames streaming from White Flame's blade exploded in a brilliant burst.

"…!"

My eyes widened.

The battles had left me exhausted and injured, but that strike had been nearly everything I had. I'd been sure I could scatter at least some of the demonic qi, if not all of it.

And he knocked it away?

I'd seen it clearly, brief as it was: Force flying out of the darkness like a ray of light. Though it was far too dark and ominous to deserve the name.

Tap.

I landed softly and glared into the darkness.

No—at the hazy figure walking slowly out of the Inner Palace ruins, half-hidden by the dust.

"…A mask? Who the fuck are you?"

The answer to my question was a single flash of light that glinted from more than thirty yards away.

Shwaaaak! Slash!

I missed it by a hair.

I twisted my head like lightning and glanced over my shoulder. A pavilion that had somehow retained its shape until now had been crushed and split in half.

Crack. Rumble!

Watching the pavilion collapse half a beat late, I muttered inwardly.

Fast.

The power behind that attack was savage and unrefined. Rough, yes—but devastating. If I failed to dodge even once, there wouldn't be enough of my body left to find.

But the same was true of me.

Puhk. Whoooosh!

I didn't need to summon anything from my Inventory. Weapons lay scattered everywhere. I pulled an iron spear from the ground, took it in a reverse grip, and hurled it with all my strength.

Boom!

Force stopped the spear and sent it bouncing away. Just as I'd expected.

I'd launched myself forward the instant I threw it. Now I drove White Flame at the masked man.

Shu-whoom! Boom!

Compressed air burst from the spearpoint. The masked man twisted aside by no more than a sheet of paper's width, seized the shaft, and stepped in.

At the same time, dark sword-light flashed from his fingertips.

Slash!

A faint sting.

I'd dodged, but not quite enough. Wind from the powerful sword strike grazed the bridge of my nose, drawing blood.

A few drops were cheap. I was about to get far more in return.

If you think I'm like other martial artists, you've got it wrong.

Martial artists valued their weapons as much as their lives. Most trained in arts that used them, knowing a few clumsy fist, palm, finger, or kicking techniques wouldn't see them through a life-and-death duel.

I was different.

I had physical abilities beyond human limits and the Fire Gate Clan's fist, palm, finger, and kicking techniques—arts worthy of being called divine. I also had an Inventory with nearly limitless capacity, full of weapons.

Crack!

Even a divine weapon was useless if it couldn't reach its target.

I let go of the spear shaft, caught the wrist of his sword hand, and shot out my free hand. At the same time, I gave a command only I could understand.

Inventory open. Summon.

Whoosh!

I missed his heart, but the rusty dagger, glowing red with Scorching Yang Qi, pierced Body-Protecting Qi harder than armor and sank into his chest.

Puhk!

"…!"

He went rigid without so much as a groan.

I wasn't stopping there.

Finish him.

I didn't know his name or sobriquet. I did know he served the Southern Heaven Demon Empress. If I held back and let him live, I'd pay for it.

He had to die here. Now.

Crack! Crunch!

Still gripping his wrist, I drove my knee up like lightning and felt his bones shatter. The arm with the crushed elbow went limp, and his sword began to slip from his fingers.

Srrk.

One of those fingers twitched.

From a blind spot I couldn't see came the sound of something slicing through the air.

Whoooosh!

Everything had a grain and a flow. So did the sounds weapons made.

What is that?

I'd heard it somewhere before. The recognition was almost there, along with a sharp sense that something was wrong, but I had no time to follow it.

Only an instant to choose.

Trust my instincts and the Fire Dragon Armor, and finish him? Or leave him with the grievous wounds he'd already taken and protect myself?

I made my choice. Turning, I thrust out my hand.

No—both palms.

One toward the masked man. The other toward the two streaks of light already upon me.

Boom! Crash!

The Flame Divine Palm struck his chest and sent him flying like a cannonball into the ruins of the Inner Palace.

But…

Crrrunch!

Had I been too greedy, trying to catch two birds at once?

The impact drove me backward. I carved a deep furrow into the ground for ten steps before the burning pain reached me.

Tap. Drip-drip.

Blood ran down my fingers and struck the ground. I staunched the bleeding from my left hand, its flesh and muscle torn half to shreds, then bit my lip.

Because it hurt? No. I'd taken injuries like this often enough as a Hunter.

An injured hand was bad news when I needed to conserve every bit of strength I could, but I could still use it.

It was the tremendous rebound force I had felt when my Flame Divine Palm struck the masked man's chest—and the identity of the flash whose sound alone had caused that sense of incongruity.

This is…

The shape and size were different, but I knew what I was holding.

I stared at the twin wheels caught in my left hand and slowly turned, thinking of the old fiend whose last words had been a promise to wait for me in the afterlife.

"What's your connection to the Great Snow Fiend?"

I hoped he wouldn't answer. I hoped the force I'd felt at the end had been my imagination.

But my ominous suspicion had already become reality.

Rumble. Rustle.

Within the cloud of dust that had yet to settle, heavy rebar and timber shifted, and a pale figure rose to its feet.

Then a flashing streak of light crossed more than sixty yards and hurtled at me.

Whoosh! Crrrunch!

It came with ferocious force. I caught it in a hand filled with internal energy and fell silent.

A dagger.

The same dagger I'd driven into his chest moments ago.

Blood that wasn't mine stained its heavily rusted, handspan-long blade. My attack had landed.

If so, he should have suffered a fatal wound… How the hell?

I knew all too well that humans—Supreme Peak masters in particular—didn't die as easily as one might think.

They were monsters capable of fighting a hundred men alone even with a dagger buried in their chest.

But not when the one who put it there was a Supreme Peak master of equal or greater skill.

This isn't a fight between street thugs.

In a life-and-death duel between masters, the greatest danger wasn't the blade. It was the internal energy carried on it—energy that entered through the wound and tore apart the blood vessels within.

Even a Supreme Peak master couldn't escape Internal Injury from a hit like that. The Great Snow Fiend himself, with all his martial arts and profound internal energy, hadn't been an exception.

And yet…

He got up like nothing happened, pulled the dagger out of his chest, and threw it? With this much internal energy behind it, when suppressing the Internal Injury alone should have been a struggle?

The dagger wound wasn't even all he'd taken. One arm was crippled at the very least, and I'd struck him square in the chest with the Flame Divine Palm.

Even a master at the level of the Ten Kings could not be that unharmed.

"…What the fuck are you?"

That wrongness had spread through my whole body, bringing a cold wariness with it.

But before the masked man could answer my question, a tremendous roar rang out.

Kraaa-boom!

A silver figure struck the ground like a meteor.

The guardian spirit lay there, its body covered in wounds, panting for breath.
Above its head in midair, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress stood with a smile.

“My hunting dog. I took great care training him.”

Chapter 701

“My hunting dog. I took great care training him.”

The Southern Heaven Demon Emress’s voice rang out softly. At the same time, the Masked Man took a step forward.

Step.

His stride never faltered as he emerged from the settling cloud of dust.

As the Masked Man’s form gradually came into focus, I muttered like a groan.

“…Fuck. What the hell is that?”

I wasn’t looking for an answer. I already knew.

Regeneration.

That one word explained the bizarre sight unfolding before my eyes.

Crack. Slither.

Shattered bones joined together. Flesh and blood filled the wounds.

Darkness writhed like a living snake across the Masked Man’s body, healing his injuries and pouring new strength into him wherever it passed.

—The power of defying heaven…

Defying heaven.

What I was seeing seemed to run against the will of heaven and the natural order itself.

As the guardian spirit’s lament reached me, the Masked Man finished healing and bent his strangely twisted elbow.

Crunch.

He broke the elbow that had already fused back together, then aligned it and healed it again.

The pain must have been tremendous, yet he didn’t so much as twitch an eyebrow. At last, I understood what had felt wrong about him during our fight.

That bastard can’t feel pain.

Even someone with a dulled sense of pain would feel something.

But the Masked Man hadn’t groaned or screamed once. Not when a dagger lodged in his chest or his elbow was crushed. Not even when the terrible heat of the Flame Divine Palm had struck him.

What the hell did they do to him?

Had he gone somewhere for a painkilling shot?

As I stared at the emotionless eyes visible above his mask and swallowed a low groan, someone’s small, snow-white foot stepped onto the damp earth.

Scuff.

From the sky to the ground. The Southern Heaven Demon Empress landed lightly and smiled.

“You look like you’ve seen a ghost. Then again, I suppose you weren’t all that surprised? You saw it once in Henan.”

Grrr.

With a low growl, the guardian spirit raised its enormous, bloodstained body on weary limbs.

Its breathing was much rougher than it had been at the start. If it fought her now, it would lose. No question.

I stepped in front of the guardian spirit and opened my mouth.

“Yeah. The Blood Lord. That crazy bastard was the same.”

“What a shame. If you hadn’t met the Blood Lord, I could’ve seen you scared out of your wits.”

“If I scared that easily, I’d have died ages ago.”

“Maybe it’s because you’re young. You can’t help the bluffing.”

A bluff.

What the Blood Lord had done during the Shaolin Bloodshed had certainly surprised me. It hadn’t scared me out of my wits.

I’d seen and been through too much in the modern world where I was born and raised.

“Think whatever you want.”

Something in my calm reply made the Southern Heaven Demon Empress draw her brows together. She looked me up and down through narrowed eyes, then licked her red lips.

“I can’t tell if you’re simply brave or if you have something no one else knows about… But there’s something strange about you. I’m beginning to see why the Lord of Heaven takes an interest in you.”

“An interest?”

I began circulating my internal energy, slowly enough that she wouldn’t notice.

She was more than enough of a monster to deal with alone. Now I had a drugged-up bastard who might as well have had a painkilling shot to worry about too. I needed to buy time and heal as much of my Internal Injury as I could.

“The Great Snow Fiend, that old man, spouted the same nonsense.”

“Oh? Do you still think it’s nonsense?”

She smiled and took a step toward me. I tightened my grip on my spear.

“I wish it were.”

“Why?”

“Because I don’t want some deranged old man’s attention, Lord of Heaven or not. Same goes for the crazy bitch standing in front of me.”

Whoosh—pfft!

Pain stung my cheek, and heat spread across it. I'd dodged the Finger Qi by a hair.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress sighed in relief.

"Phew. I nearly killed you. Good dodge. You're better than I thought."

Praise from an enemy, at a time like this.

It pissed me off. It also told me two things.

First, even if that monster went all out, I could handle her attacks if I kept the damage as slight as I had just now.

Second, she had more to lose than gain by killing me.

Blood ran down my cheek. Instead of wiping it away, I tightened my grip on the spear.

"The Lord of Heaven must be more interested in me than I thought. Even a crazy bitch like you is worried about killing me."

"…!"

"I think I'm starting to understand why you only watched me in Hubei Province."

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress was staggeringly powerful. Of everyone I'd ever encountered, very few could stand against her.

At least on the level of the Ten Kings. Maybe higher.

I could feel the sheer force of her power just standing here.

Apart from Jeok Cheongang, who was an exception even among the Ten Kings, she had to be one of the ten strongest people alive.

And yet she did nothing. She had dozens—hundreds—of chances to make a move in Hubei Province.

The question had stayed with me ever since I learned who she was.

Why had she left me alive?

Was I not worth killing? Was it all just a game to her?

I didn't know the full story, but I was certain neither answer was right. I was Fire King Jeok Cheongang's only Disciple and a successor of the Fire Gate Clan.

If she got me into her hands, she could lure in Jeok Cheongang, who would become a major obstacle to Dark Heaven's future movements, and kill him. Even if that attempt came to nothing, she could still obtain the Fire Gate Clan's supreme arts.

There were plenty of ways to make a man talk.

Torture. Torture. And endless torture.

But she hadn't killed me when I was completely taken in by her. She hadn't abducted me either.

She had merely watched me right before my eyes, then vanished without a trace. Like an observer sent on someone else's orders.

My dry lips parted.

“Why is the Lord of Heaven so interested in me? Why go this far when there are people far more worth his attention?”

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress’s lips had pressed shut at some point. My question did nothing to open them.

After a brief silence, she gave only a short answer.

“What could an insignificant creature like you know of that omnipotent, exalted one’s will?”

Insignificant.

I studied her tense face, the way her gaze had dropped and how she pressed her teeth lightly against her lip.

A thought flashed through my mind. I spoke it aloud.

“You don’t know, do you?”

“…!”

I saw her eyes waver. A derisive laugh slipped out of me.

“Fucking idiot.”

“…What?”

“I said you’re a fucking idiot. You worthless fucking idiot of an old hag.”

That was enough to light the Southern Heaven Demon Emress’s fuse.

Rooooar!

A storm of qi swept out in every direction. Layer upon layer of pitch-black darkness wrapped around her.

Beside me, the guardian spirit steadied its ragged breathing and sent me a thought.

—If you were going to provoke her, couldn’t you have stalled a little longer?

I regretted it a little myself. But there was no other way.

We had to finish this before the humans and beasts still in the Inner Palace completed their mutation. Which of us fell and which remained standing came after that.

I sent a Sound Transmission to the guardian spirit. It was still grumbling, though it was hardly in fighting shape itself.

—Are you really a guardian spirit? Stop acting like you’re about to keel over and fight with everything you’ve got.

—How dare you insult me. Three hundred years ago, I would never have endured such humiliation from a mere human.

—Sure. That crazy bitch wouldn’t have been born yet, either.

—…Damn it.

Cursing in a manner hardly befitting a guardian spirit, it bristled from head to tail. Its gaze flicked over the two figures approaching us from front and back.

—This has become more difficult.

—Wow. I had absolutely no idea. Good thing you're a guardian spirit. Thanks for telling me.

—We'll take one each. The human male or the human female. Choose.

—Then I'll take the male.

—…

Does this bastard have no conscience?

That seemed to be what its pale blue eyes were asking me. Even in this godforsaken mess, I let out a short laugh and started walking.

Toward the Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

Step.

Maybe it was nerves, but my footstep sounded unusually loud. Her eyes had turned blood red, and a chill ran through me.

"You mean to fight me? You?"

Her voice was cold and eerie. I let out a deep sigh before answering.

"That hurts. We insignificant creatures ought to look out for each other. Don't you think?"

"…!"

"Choose. Kill me and get your ass kicked by the Lord of Heaven, or die nicely right here."

Hack—ptoo.

I spat out a mouthful of phlegm mixed with stale blood and raised my spearhead.

When I spoke again, my voice sounded unfamiliar. Cold.

"For the record… I'll fight until I die."

Fwoosh—boom!

Flamefire Path.

A single line of flame shot forward, consuming the air in its path.

And at the end of that path stood a monster wrapped in deep darkness.

Whoooosh—boom!

Bang!

An immense shockwave shook the world.

The ground split beneath Jin Taekyung's descending spearhead, and searing heat burst from the fissure.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress dodged the strike by a hair and thrust out her hand.

Kraaaaaash!

A palm strike carrying unprecedented qi collided with the spearhead slicing through space like a ray of light.

Qi collided with qi. The difference in strength was unmistakable.

Boom!

Compressed air exploded, and one figure was hurled backward.

Delight shone in the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's eyes.

That wretch is nothing.

Jin Taekyung's martial power had clearly advanced at an unbelievable pace. He had changed so much that she found herself wondering whether he was truly the same boy she had met in Hubei.

Perhaps the greatest obstacle to their grand plan was no longer the Beast Miao King, but Jin Taekyung.

But…

I've grown stronger still.

She could feel power unlike anything she had known boiling through her body.

The denser the demonic qi flowing from the rift grew, the stronger she became.

Even now.

Pop!

One step.

She vanished like a ghost and reappeared in midair.

As she plunged toward him like a meteor, Jin Taekyung opened his eyes wide. He was still buried deep in the ground.

Crunch.

Solid earth crumbled like mud beneath her strike. Jin Taekyung escaped it by a hair and flicked his sleeve.

A dagger flew at her from somewhere, as though he had conjured it from thin air. She avoided it easily and thrust out her hand with lightning speed.

Slash!

Her fingers only grazed him.

But curled like hooks, they tore through his martial uniform and cut into his thigh.

Blood spurted. Jin Taekyung staggered.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress beamed as she brought the edge of her hand down toward him.

Shu-whaack!

Chapter 702

Shwaaak!

A straightened hand-blade sliced through the air and came crashing down.

Slender and snow-white, it looked as though it had never been dipped in water. But Jin Taekyung knew how much blood had flowed from that hand. He knew what darkness lurked behind the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's dazzling smile.

Monster.

Those two words surfaced in his mind once more.

As the blood-red Force fell like a meteor toward the crown of his head, his legs, frozen as though nailed to the ground, moved at last.

Shhk!

The earth split like tofu. Jin Taekyung slipped past the Force by a hair and drove his spear forward like lightning.

Shwaaak!

The spearhead flew toward a single point with terrifying speed, power, and precision. Even a fistfighter who had spent a lifetime honing his techniques and reached the Supreme Peak realm would not have dared meet that strike head-on.

But the Southern Heaven Demon Empress was different.

No. Today, at least, she had the power to do exactly that.

Krrrkkk!

Empty-Hand Seizes the Blade.

She caught the spearhead between her palms as though bringing her hands together in prayer. Hellfire flickered around the blade as it trembled between them. Enough power was concentrated in those snow-white hands to keep them from being reduced to ash.

The corners of her unlined mouth lifted.

"With only this much…"

The instant her voice, filled with mockery, emerged—

Plop. Plip.

Drops of blood fell. The Southern Heaven Demon Empress noticed them and fell silent.

The pain reached her half a beat later. Jin Taekyung gave her a sheepish smile.

"Oh, I forgot to mention. This is Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron."

"…!"

"What were you saying?"

Her delicate brow furrowed. Jin Taekyung let go of the spear shaft and thrust out both arms.

Palm Force?

She was wrong.

Shhk! Shhk!

Two daggers shot toward her throat and chest. They were already too close to dodge, so she released the spearhead and snapped her sleeves.

Whoooosh!

Wind burst from the billowing fabric and sent the daggers flying. At that instant, Jin Taekyung's foot caught the end of White Flame's slowly tilting shaft.

No—he kicked it.

…What?

He kicked it? The divine weapon that would have helped him most in this fight?

A flash of light hurtled toward her face.

Shwaaack! Slash!

It happened in an instant. The attack was so unexpected that avoiding it completely was all but impossible. She turned her head on instinct, felt pain flare in her earlobe, and stared.

"How dare you!"

If it had only been her earring, she would not have been so furious. She had liked it, but she could always find another.

Her earlobe had been torn. Worse, her hair had been cut. Half of the thick, glossy hair she had always taken such pride in was gone.

"Die!"

Kraaaaaash!

The unprecedented energy that had faltered for a moment surged through her slender body. The pressure seemed capable of crushing a massive boulder in an instant.

But the Southern Heaven Demon Empress did not know that the young—almost absurdly young—enemy before her had once climbed a cliff with iron balls weighing well over a thousand geun[2995] strapped to his body.

Crack. Crrrunch!

The earth sank beneath the pressure crushing everything within a radius of over ten jang[2996], while the limbs of the humans and beasts struggling in the area twisted and snapped.

—Krrk, krrrk!

"Aaaaaagh!"

[2995] A Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb); a thousand geun is 600 kg (about 1,300 lb).

[2996] A jang is ten Korean ja, or 3.03 m (9.94 ft). Ten jang is 30.3 m (about 99 ft).

Amid the blood and dying screams, Jin Taekyung endured the pressure and stamped his foot.

Boom!

A line of flame rose from his toe as he shot forward. At the same time, a spear he had somehow taken hold of swept fiercely from his fingertips and split the air like lightning.

Shwaaaargh! Boom!

The impact sent out a shockwave that shook the world. The Southern Heaven Demon Empress had caught the side of the spearhead with perfect precision. Power surged through her hand.

Crack!

The Scorching Yang Qi surrounding the spearhead, along with the steel that a skilled blacksmith had folded and tempered more than a hundred times, crumbled like tofu.

A smile full of killing intent touched her lips.

Foolish boy.

Jin Taekyung had made the mistake of giving up his peerless divine weapon of Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron. Now she would make him pay for wounding her beautiful body—and for cutting her precious hair.

I meant to bring him back as unharmed as possible. That won't do anymore.

At first, after hearing that the exalted Lord of Heaven had taken an interest in Jin Taekyung, she had intended to act as the Lord's faithful servant and capture the young man to offer him up.

Now she had changed her mind.

He was no longer a feisty cat in her eyes, but a proud beast. Young though he was, he had teeth and claws as sharp as a great tiger's. If she was careless, he might leave even worse wounds on her beautiful body.

Jin Taekyung rushed toward her, reflected in her blood-red eyes.

You should be prepared to lose a limb or two. I'll reattach them later anyway.

She snapped both sleeves.

Papapapap!

The shattered spearhead broke into dozens, then hundreds, of fragments that filled the air. Each one carried Force. Jin Taekyung drove his clenched fist into the wave of hidden weapons without hesitation.

Kraaaaaash!

The Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

A fire dragon burst from his callused fist and swallowed the fragments. Heated red-hot, they melted into liquid iron and spattered across the ground.

Hisssssssss.

But beneath the molten iron raining down like a shower, what awaited Jin Taekyung as he shot through the air was the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's slender, jade-like hand.

Whoosh!

Five fingers came at him, sweeping the air aside. They hooked like a rake toward his right arm.

Jin Taekyung twisted as though he had expected it all along.

He was not trying to save the arm she would otherwise tear away. He was putting his own neck in her path.

But at the same time, it was also a lethal move that struck at an opening the opponent had never expected.

This lunatic…!

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress screamed inwardly.

The Lord of Heaven had taken an interest in Jin Taekyung. He absolutely could not die. She had wanted to take him alive as a show of loyalty; the Lord had not even given her a specific order. If Jin Taekyung died by her hand, she might have to face the Lord's fury alone.

No!

She hurriedly dragged back her surging internal energy. The muscles and flow of qi-blood throughout her body, already committed to the strike, twisted against the sudden reversal. A wave of backflow swept through her.

Urk!

"Kwaaaagh!"

Blood shot up from deep within her and sprayed between her lips. At the last moment, she managed to turn her hand. The Force at her fingertips missed Jin Taekyung's throat.

Shhk! Spit!

The blade-sharp wind sliced his skin.

Jin Taekyung did not waver. He had never had any reason to.

This is the moment I've been waiting for.

His mind had gone cold. He had already made his calculations.

By his reckoning, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress was at least on the level of the Ten Kings. She might even rival the Three Saints. Her martial arts could be no better than the Western Heaven Demon Lord's—perhaps worse—but her overwhelming internal energy more than made up for any gap.

And when facing a master of this level, there was only one possible method.

One opening.

He had wagered his life to create it. He would not get another chance.

And now…

I'll wager my life again.

Inventory Open. Summon.

Along with the commands ringing through his mind, he thrust out his hand like a flash of lightning.

Shhk!

A slender wrist, impossible to believe belonged to such a powerful monster, was cleanly severed.

"Aaaaaaaagh!"

Her scream was louder and more agonized than any Jin Taekyung had heard from the creatures of the Nanman Beast Palace writhing under the demonic qi. No, it was the worst scream he had ever heard.

In a way, that was only natural. People were born to forget, and the powerful, accustomed to causing pain, tended to forget their own.

Even so, she was the Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

"Jin Taekyung—!"

Shhk!

She lunged with a shriek that seemed to tear through the air. Jin Taekyung met her blood-red gaze, now clouded with darkness, and knew instinctively that this time he could neither dodge nor block her attack completely.

The immense Internal Injury had thrown off her stance. The internal energy she had forced up while vomiting blood was wildly unstable. That made her all the more dangerous.

No. The real danger was the killing intent pouring from her.

"How dare you! How dare someone like you!"

His luck had only worked once.

Consumed by pain and fury, forgetting even her loyalty to her master, the monster thrust out a palm packed with power.

The world slowed. Darkness and blood-red Force churned together in the palm strike as it rushed toward him, erasing the space in its path.

Kraaaaaash!

The force was overwhelming, as though the sea and a great mountain had risen to engulf him.

Fear that made every hair on his body stand on end seized Jin Taekyung.

But he knew that if he took even one step back, everything would be over.

He had to go forward, even if it cost him his life.

Come.

He did not know what he was calling to. His foot came down on the blood-soaked earth.

Crush.

The ground sank beneath a step weighted with internal energy as heavy as his life, then burst with heat.

Boom!

Crouched low enough to skim the ground, he shot forward like a cannonball. A snow-white palm filled his vision, carrying power no human should have possessed. Beyond the blood-red flash was a face twisted like a fiend's.

"Die!"

At that instant—

Inventory Open. Summon.

Jin Taekyung's hand, spread wide as though ready to unleash a palm strike, closed. A cold spear shaft filled his empty palm, and its spearhead erased the distance between them.

Shwaaaargh! Shhk!

The spearhead tore past the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's neck by a hair. Faint delight lit her eyes.

I read him. Perfectly.

His technique was astonishing, and dangerous. But amid the chaos of the fight, she had predicted it.

Or so she believed—until, just as she was about to take off his head, a cold draft touched her back.

Shhk.

"…!"

A faint hiss reached her ear. She spun on instinct, but something icy and razor-sharp raked across her side.

Shhk!

Blood burst out like a fountain. She felt muscle and veins sever, her qi-blood tangling inside her.

Th-this is…

Backflow.

A second backflow had struck before she could even settle the Internal Injury she had suffered earlier—and it was more fatal than any wound she had received until now.

This was what he was after… from the start.

The realization flashed through her whitening vision. She swallowed the blood rising in her throat and turned.

At last, she saw it.

Goooooong.

Blue-white flames whirled at the tip of a transparent spearhead that had answered its master's call.

Beneath Jin Taekyung's deeply shadowed eyes, his lips moved silently, forming two words.

One Annihilation.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress's eyes flew wide.

—Human!

An urgent thought suddenly rang out. With it, a vast vortex unlike anything anyone in Nanman had ever seen erupted.

Kraaaaaash!

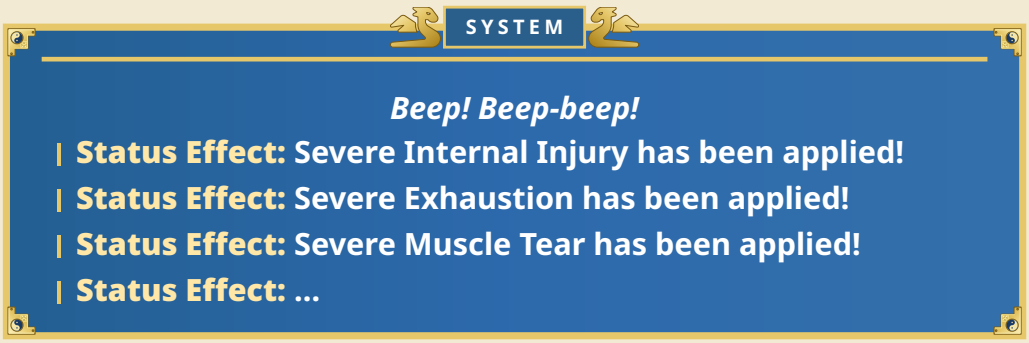
Chapter 703

Kwooooooong…!

I couldn’t breathe.

The roar still hadn’t faded. Its endless reverberations sounded impossibly distant.

And yet the System notifications rang clearly in my ears.



The notifications—or rather, the warning sounds—kept coming, itemizing just how bad my condition was.

If the System were a doctor, it would probably look at me with a grave expression and say:

Patient, I hate to tell you this, but… you’re really fucked this time. Why the hell do you keep using One Annihilation? Is dying young on your bucket list?

How considerate.

Just imagining it should have made me feel like shit. Strangely, it didn’t change my mood much. The reason was simple: reality was even shittier than anything I could imagine.

“Cough.”

Splatter. Drip, drip.

Blood burst from my mouth and scattered across the ground. I’d felt a few chunks in it, too. Pieces of my organs, no doubt. One Annihilation really gave you your money’s worth—

Fuck. It’s not a convenience-store lunchbox.

Damn it.

My vision blurred. Senses that had been sharp enough to rival a divine weapon moments ago were now as dull as an ax abandoned in a ruined cabin. White Flame, which I’d always swung around like a pinwheel, had become the heaviest thing in the world.

But one thing still worked well enough: I could feel the pain in my forearm.

Crunch. Crunch.

I stared at it through my blurred vision.

It kept chewing my flesh with teeth that jutted out like an animal's, swallowing the blood. Its eyes held nothing but greed and madness.

It was hard to believe it had once been human, like me.

"Good?"

Crunch.

"Yeah. Guess it is."

I didn't know why I was talking to it when I knew it couldn't understand me anymore. Or why I was letting the bastard livestream an eating show with my wrist.

Maybe I selfishly wanted someone else to do what had to be done. Or maybe I still felt a last shred of pity for something that had once been human.

Shwaaak! Slash!

Crunch…

Something sliced through the air, and the teeth that had been chewing so fiercely went slack.

I was staring at the young man, frozen with his red eyes wide, when a silver mane caked in blood and dust swept across my vision.

—Human. You don't look all right.

The guardian spirit. The moment I recognized it, my legs gave out. I caught hold of its mane and answered weakly.

"Don't people usually ask if someone's all right first?"

—I'm not human. You clearly weren't all right, so there was no need to ask.

"I like that about you. What about that pitch-black bastard?"

—I killed him. For the fourth time.

"What?"

—He kept getting back up. Each time, he recovered faster and grew stronger. This time may be no different.

The rift. More precisely, the demonic qi flowing from it.

And as the Masked Man grew stronger under its influence, the guardian spirit must have been growing weaker. Just like the sacred stone in its mouth, which could no longer give off the great radiance it had before.

The guardian spirit shares its power with the sacred stone.

Only now did I notice the deep wounds all over its body, its heaving shoulders and ragged breaths.

It must have caught me looking. It turned its massive body to hide the wounds.

"I'm sorry."

The guardian spirit studied me with its blue-white eyes, then shook its head.

—You did all you could.

"At the end…"

—I know. If those things hadn’t interfered, you would have succeeded.

I looked around weakly. Torn corpses lay everywhere.

They were the mutants that had finished transforming first and rushed me at the guardian spirit’s warning, just as I was about to unleash One Annihilation.

I didn’t see them coming.

No. I hadn’t had the chance to watch for them. I’d been too hard-pressed even to look around, and the mutants had charged straight at me.

And died.

What awaited roughly one hundred of them was the immense vortex created by One Annihilation.

But in that brief instant, split into smaller and smaller fractions of time, the mutants had instinctively stopped me and fulfilled their mission.

They’d bitten my forearm and turned my attack aside, blocked my view, and thrown themselves in front of a force they couldn’t stop.

And that was how one person survived.

“Southern Heaven Demon Empress.”

My voice came out almost as a groan. A figure standing amid the hazy dust took a step forward.

Scuff.

Everything in that section of the palace had been erased by the aftermath of One Annihilation. From its very center emerged the only monster to survive, her red eyes glowing.

Red. Everything was red.

The sky. The ground. Everything between them.

At the same time, things that should never have been visible came into view.

Ah.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress stared blankly at her hand.

The smooth, snow-white hand she had gained by taking several jiazi[2997] worth of internal energy and countless measures of vital essence was gone. In its place was a hand covered in fine wrinkles and age spots, as dry and thin as the branch of a dying tree.

“Ah. Aah…”

Tears welled in her eyes, red with burst blood vessels.

This couldn’t be happening. It couldn’t.

[2997] A jiazi is a sixty-year cycle in the traditional Chinese calendar.

She had been more beautiful than anyone in the world. She was supposed to be beautiful.

But the great art she had cultivated for nearly a century had been broken, and her old, ugly appearance had returned like a curse.

Trembling with shock and rage, she realized that the aging she had kept at bay was not the only curse to come upon her.

It hurts.

Only when sudden agony made her look down at herself did she understand.

Flesh had been torn from her side as though an invisible beast had bitten it away. One arm was gone entirely. And half her face had melted in the tremendous heat.

"…!"

Her eyes flew wide. It was impossible. It should never have happened.

The wound in her side could heal. A skilled enough practitioner could even reattach her arm without leaving a scar.

But not her face. Unless she followed the same path as the Blood Lord she so despised, those terrible burns would leave their mark.

"No. This… this can't…"

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress stopped short. Someone had appeared in her blood-red eyes, now wet with tears.

Jin Taekyung.

She could see him. And feel him.

After the dazzling flash that had erased everything, he was left with no strength, little more than an empty shell. That insignificant creature had stolen her youth and beauty.

A single thought seized her.

Kill him.

At that moment, her mind, muddled by countless emotions, turned cold.

The monster who had lived for an age wrapped herself in darkness and moved forward without hesitation.

Scuff. Scuff.

Crack.

With every step, the energy pouring from her body crushed everything around her.

She had lost her youth, but she still had the strength to kill him. The bleeding from her side and arm had stopped, and her battered insides were slowly settling.

If the sudden return of age was a curse, then the demonic qi pouring from the rift, growing denser by the moment, was a blessing.

It would let her tear apart Jin Taekyung, who could barely stand, and the reeking old beast in front of him.

—Stop.

Ssssss.

Light spread from the guardian spirit as its thought rang out. The thousand mutants packed around it crouched low, but the Southern Heaven Demon Empress kept walking.

Bang!

A palm strike shot forward without the slightest hesitation. Darkness mixed with blood-red Force pressed down on the sacred stone's light and engulfed Jin Taekyung.

Boom!

The ground burst apart with a deafening crash. In that instant, the guardian spirit bit Jin Taekyung by the nape and darted away like lightning, releasing a low growl.

—The sacred stone…

It left the thought unfinished, but the truth was cruelly clear.

Rumble…

A faint trembling came from inside its mouth. Like an old man facing a young man in his prime, the sacred stone was losing strength even now.

So was the White Tiger that had guarded it for so many years.

Even the spiritual energy left by the imugi wasn't enough?

The guardian spirit hadn't expected that energy to restore all its former strength. The Water God Dragon's earlier mutation had left it with little energy to give.

The demonic qi is too strong. Strong enough to suppress even the sacred stone's power.

The demonic qi had already spread beyond the Inner Palace and was encroaching on the Outer Palace.

The guardian spirit had brought the beasts of the Sacred Land with it. But if they, too, fell under the demonic qi's influence while the sacred stone weakened, the situation would spiral out of control.

No. It was already as bad as it could get.

Nearly a thousand mutants, wholly under the demonic qi's influence, surrounded them without leaving a gap. And the Southern Heaven Demon Empress had survived to come after them.

At this rate…

The guardian spirit's expression darkened. Then Jin Taekyung spoke, his voice weak.

"Go."

—What?

"You've worked hard. You've been through enough."

—…!

Jin Taekyung met its wide blue-white eyes and struggled to his feet, using White Flame as a cane.

“That’s enough. Get out and save the people. Get them as far away from this goddamn place as you can, as fast as you can.”

—How can you say that now…?

“I guarantee it. No matter how fast you are, I won’t last long if you take me with you. I’ll probably start whining for you to put me down in less than half a shichen[2998]. I’ll die if I don’t circulate my qi.”

The words were playful, but the judgment behind them wasn’t. The guardian spirit fell silent.

Jin Taekyung grinned.

“So go. Before it’s too late.”

He turned to face the Southern Heaven Demon Empress. His eyes looked ready to go dark at any moment; hers burned blood-red with fury.

“All right. I’ll come quietly, so let’s stop this. Lord of Heaven or some dogshit lord, let’s go see him.”

Instead of answering, she raised her hand.

Swish, spit!

Finger Qi shot toward him like a beam of light and tore the back of his neck. Jin Taekyung shrugged as if it were nothing.

“If you’re angry, just say so. I’ve lost enough blood already. What if I die on the way?”

“That would be troublesome,” she said coldly.

“Now we’re finally talking—”

“You mustn’t die that easily. I’m going to tear you apart slowly with my own hands.”

“…I guess we’re not exactly communicating. What are you planning to do about the fallout?”

“It’ll be fine. The Lord of Heaven will be pleased if I bring him the divine artifact. The White Tiger’s pelt will be a bonus.”

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress smiled brightly and opened her hand.

Kwoooong—!

A tremendous rumble swept across the Nanman Beast Palace.

[2998] A shichen is a traditional Chinese time unit of about two hours; half a shichen is about one hour.

Chapter 704

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress was certain.

Give her the time it took to drink a cup of tea, and she could end this tiresome battle. That was all the time the brat she wanted to tear apart and his beast had left to live.

But as she raised her hand to strike, that certainty cracked.

Kwoooong—!

A vast rumble rose from somewhere. At the same time, the air rippled and the wind stopped. Sensing the powerful wave of qi coming from beyond the thick darkness, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress clenched her teeth.

This is…!

A master. One strong enough to resist the demonic qi's influence.

The thought and her response came in the same instant. Realizing something had gone wrong, she released the internal energy gathered in her remaining hand and shouted—not toward the approaching master, but toward the person she had to kill before it was too late.

"Kill him!"

Kwooooooosh!

A vast palm force tinged with murky light tore through the air. It was not the only thing hurtling toward Jin Taekyung.

Nearly a thousand humans and beasts—mutants made more vicious and powerful by the demonic qi—lunged together with a chorus of shrieks.

Pap-pap. Shhhhhk!

—Krrk, kraaaah!

Teeth harder and sharper than steel glinted in the darkness. The mutants charged with strength and speed far beyond what their bodies had once possessed, while the palm force streaked above their heads like a meteor.

All of it bore down on the two figures standing in the dark beneath a faint glow.

No. It was meant to tear apart the one human who had dealt the Southern Heaven Demon Empress an insult she could never wash away.

Jin Taekyung watched it come. The corner of his weary mouth twisted.

"Too bad. You're already too late."

"…!"

Only a shichen[2999] ago, those words had come from her lips. Now they came back to her, thick with mockery.

Boom! Fwoosh!

[2999] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is approximately one hour.

The darkness on either side burst apart as though the demonic qi itself had exploded. Green Force, the color of forest and leaves, surged through the opening and smashed everything in its path.

No—it tore into them and devoured them.

Like a wild beast.

Krrrunch!

The earth shook. Compressed air burst outward, sweeping away the wind laced with bitter demonic qi. The green Force ripped the limbs from the mutants rushing in on every side, then opened its jaws toward the immense palm force.

Kwaaang! Rumble!

Light mingled where the attacks collided. After a deafening roar that made it seem as though the sky itself had split apart, a terrifying shock wave shook the surrounding space.

Beyond it, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress stared wide-eyed at her palm force as it faded away helplessly.

They canceled each other out?

Who was she?

One of the Lord of Heaven's most loyal servants. A master he trusted enough to place Southern Heaven in her hands. In her own eyes, she was among the greatest and most exalted beings beneath heaven and earth.

Jin Taekyung had cost her a considerable amount of strength, but she could still tear an ordinary Supreme Peak master apart in moments.

And yet their attacks had canceled each other out.

She did not want to believe it. But she was not stupid enough to deny what had happened before her eyes, nor did it take long to guess who had arrived.

It has to be him.

Fist Force of that magnitude. The massive figure taking shape through the settling dust.

Her voice came out cold.

"…Yayul Cheok. The Beast Miao King."

Boom!

She swept her sleeve aside. The wind from it cleared the dust, revealing a giant of a man whose half-gray beard hung like an old tiger's mane.

Behind his towering frame, a young man leaned against the massive body of the White Tiger.

"You're late. Very late."

Jin Taekyung's voice was faint. The Beast Miao King answered calmly.

"I'm sorry. I came too late."

"I almost died out here."

“That won’t happen.”

He thrust out a hand as fast as lightning.

Bang.

The sound was like a drum bursting. Jin Taekyung’s body jerked, and the guardian spirit hurriedly caught him as he started to collapse. It bared its teeth on instinct, but Jin shook his head and opened his mouth.

“Urk. Ueeecch!”

Shwaaaaaak!

Dark red blood poured from him, soaking the guardian spirit’s broad back. Feeling the hot, dead blood run through its fur like vomit, it muttered.

“What a wonderful feeling.”

“…!”

“Don’t look at me like that, large human. I am—”

The guardian spirit was about to continue addressing the wide-eyed Beast Miao King when Jin Taekyung pushed himself upright. Having spat out the dead blood, he sounded much more alive.

“Not exactly the best time for introductions, but say hello. This is Whitey. I just adopted him.”

“Adopted? How dare you!”

“Oh. So Whitey’s fine?”

“You bastard!”

Jin grinned as the guardian spirit bristled, forgetting the danger around them. Then the Beast Miao King suddenly swept both hands outward.

Boom!

Green Fist Force struck a murky palm force in midair. At the same instant, the transparent spearhead that had hung limp moved.

Slash!

A dozen or so mutants trying to exploit the opening were cut apart before they could scream.

Another group rushed at Jin’s back as he briefly staggered. They saw the enormous forepaw waiting for them.

Whoosh! Crunch!

Blood spurted like a fountain. Severed limbs tumbled across the ground.

The guardian spirit let out a low growl. Jin stood back-to-back with it, raised White Flame, and pointed its spearhead in one direction.

“And the fucking bitch who interrupted while someone else was talking… You know her, right?”

The Beast Miao King nodded. An ugly old woman was reflected in his dark eyes.

“Yes. The Southern Heaven Demon Empress.”

His voice seemed to boil with anger that could not be hidden.

Countless mutants still surrounded them. The demonic qi had taken their original forms from them, but they were the tribespeople of this land—the people he had cherished more than anyone.

No. Had cherished was wrong. He still did.

The ache that had started in his chest the moment he saw them was proof enough.

I hoped I wouldn't be too late.

He had run until he could hardly breathe, wringing every last measure of strength from himself to get here. Then he had seen the Nanman Beast Palace in the distance, engulfed in darkness and flame, and known.

He was already too late.

To reach this place, he had passed more than mountains and plains, rivers and valleys.

He had seen a hellscape.

It brought back fragments of the Great Faction War, that horror from decades ago, and cut his heart to pieces. The bodies of tribespeople who had failed to escape lay crushed beneath fallen buildings. Streets that had rung with music and laughter not long ago belonged to surging darkness and fire.

And now the one most responsible for that hellscape stood before him.

"I swear this as the Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace."

Fire blazed in his reddened eyes. There was no trace of the man who loved a drink and good company, who laughed heartily when he had had his fill.

Decades ago, he had led ten thousand warriors north against the Demonic Cult's Hundred Thousand Demonic Disciples and earned his place among the Ten Kings. Now that giant spoke in a voice cold as steel.

"I will tear your limbs apart piece by piece."

Jin poked his head out from behind the Beast Miao King's broad back.

"Thought I'd save you some trouble. I've already cut off one of her arms."

He was still pale, but color was returning to his face. The hand around his spear no longer trembled. He drew a deep breath and stepped forward.

Scuff.

Just one step.

The mutants crowding every side flinched, but none dared charge. Their reason had been paralyzed, yet the mutation had sharpened their instincts. They sensed the change in the air.

They sensed, too, that the master who should have ordered them forward had fallen silent.

Their instincts were right. For the second time since coming to Nanman, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress felt threatened.

This isn't good…

Ordinarily, she would have snorted at the thought. The Beast Miao King might be one of the Ten Kings, but he could not have closed the gap between them.

Now things were different.

Jin Taekyung's One Strike had been powerful enough to freeze her with fear for an instant. It had cost her an arm and much of her strength. With her in this condition, the Beast Miao King was a threat.

Jin had recovered a little strength with his help, and the guardian spirit still held considerable qi. The mutants were no match for either of them.

But they were not the only reason her unease kept growing.

Why? Why haven't they appeared?

Like the Western Heaven Demon Lord, who had died in Sichuan a few months ago, she commanded a sizable force: roughly five hundred subordinates. Perhaps not enough to be called an army, but they were handpicked fighters, hidden from Nanman's people and held ready for precisely such a situation.

Yet—

They still haven't come.

More than half a shichen[3000] had passed since the rift opened. Only the Masked Man had appeared on time.

By now, over half her force should have crossed through the Moving Formation engraved on the mirror she had given Baeksang. The rest should have sealed the Outer Palace gates from outside.

Even if something went wrong with the Moving Formation, they should have shown up somehow by now.

She pressed her lips together. Then the ground beneath her feet began to tremble.

Creak. Creak-creak.

A faint smile touched her face. Her subordinates had finally arrived.

She had selected every one of those five hundred fighters herself. They practiced demonic martial arts, and the demonic qi would make them stronger still. No matter how many beasts remained in the Outer Palace, they could not block their way.

"Tear my limbs off? You?"

She let out a short laugh. Seeing Jin Taekyung's and the Beast Miao King's faces stiffen, she could not help laughing again.

"I'll admit it. You fought better than I expected. No—no one could have imagined it would come to this."

She kept the rest to herself.

[3000] A shichen is a traditional time unit of approximately two hours; half a shichen is approximately one hour.

But now it's over.

As though nothing had happened, she began to walk lightly forward. The taut air seemed to ease. Then the Beast Miao King spoke.

"Someone did."

"What?"

"Someone foresaw this. He walked a path he couldn't turn back from and tormented himself with guilt, but he never gave up hope. Not until the very end."

She blinked, unable to make sense of it.

The Beast Miao King spun like lightning and drove out a fist.

Kwooooooosh!

Green Force punched through the darkness, carving a path.

Along it came the reinforcements who would decide the battle's outcome.

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

A company clad in white garments and armor emerged. The man at their head bowed to the Beast Miao King.

"Wang Ho, Commander of the Baekcheon Unit… pays his respects to the Palace Lord."

Chapter 705

"Wang Ho, Commander of the Baekcheon Unit, pays his respects to the Palace Lord."

The moment the Southern Heaven Demon Empress heard those words, she thought the world had stopped.

Time slowed. Everything around her surged forward like a wave and filled her vision.

Clothing and armor as white as snow, instead of the pitch-black martial uniforms that were practically Dark Heaven's symbol.

Three hundred warriors whose dress and features marked them unmistakably as Bai people. Beasts beside them, growling low.

And then…

Flap.

A flag stirred in a breeze from somewhere. Three characters had been scrawled across it in a bold, soaring hand.

Baekcheon Unit.

…!

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress's pupils trembled.

She couldn't understand why those characters beneath the endless dark sky unsettled her so deeply. Why a piece of old silk, yellowed by the years and fluttering in the wind, should make her uneasy at all.

Or why a memory she had once dismissed was returning now.

Demon Empress. Baeksang is secretly training warriors and beasts. They're all Bai people, and after a thorough investigation, we found that most of them…

Are orphans who lost their parents in the Great Faction War or the plague. They disappeared after the great fire several years ago.

Y-you knew?

For a long time. He's set up a refuge somewhere called Wenshan, hasn't he?

Th-then, may this lowly servant dare ask the Demon Empress just one thing?

You want to know why I'm watching when I know what he's doing.

Forgive my impertinence, but yes. Even now, a considerable portion of the vast supplies flowing to Baeksang is being used to train warriors. If he should ever harbor different intentions…

So what? It's amusing.

Pardon?

Think about it. What could possibly change just because he feeds elixirs to orphans who have nowhere to go and teaches them a few forms of martial arts?

Th-that…

Scrap iron is scrap iron, however many times you hammer it. You'll never make a divine weapon that way. But I rather enjoy watching Baeksang struggle over his scrap iron, dreaming of what it might become. And imagining the look on his face when hope turns to despair.

…!

Besides, Baeksang will never turn against me. Even if he does, that will only give me something else to enjoy.

That conversation had taken place more than a dozen years ago.

The spy, who had become a Great Chieftain at a young age, had struck his forehead against the floor until it bled, then left. In time, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress forgot about him.

No—she erased him from her mind.

What happened in a remote mountain valley where no one set foot gradually ceased to interest her, too.

It was too insignificant to keep watching.

It was only natural. She held Baeksang's leash, and even if he cut it himself and charged at her, she possessed more than enough power to crush him to death in an instant.

Such arrogance, such ease, belonged only to those with overwhelming strength.

Only now did the Southern Heaven Demon Empress realize that Baeksang, the hunting dog she had believed incapable of betraying her, had torn off his leash.

Her own arrogance had brought them here.

"…Baekcheon. The Baekcheon Unit."

She spoke the words like a groan.

While she dreamed of the dark sky to come, someone else had looked toward a sky strewn with white clouds.

No. He had carried that sky in his heart.

Even as he followed another's orders like a hunting dog forced into a leash he had never wanted, he must have written those characters with guilt and anger at knowing his path was wrong and being unable to leave it.

On that yellowed, worn silk that had once been dazzlingly white, he must have drawn the sky he had wanted to see.

And the wish he could not fulfill with his own hands had been passed on to one person.

"Leave. I have already cleared the East Gate. The guards at the underground prison will be more lax than usual, so the Han Chinese should be able to escape this place without much difficulty."

…!

At the low voice echoing through the air, Jin Taekyung looked between the Baekcheon Unit and the Beast Miao King, his eyes wide. A groan escaped him.

"No way."

It was as though scattered pieces were slowly falling into place.

His eyes bloodshot and fixed on the Southern Heaven Demon Empress, the Beast Miao King continued reciting what someone had told him a few days earlier.

"Go straight to Wenshan, northeast of here. Show this to the people on its highest peak."

Whoosh. Clatter.

Something flew from the Beast Miao King's hand, arced through the air, and landed at the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's feet.

It was half of a jade identification token. The only proof of authority that could move the Baekcheon Unit.

"I've gone down a path I can't turn back from. I can't stop of my own will, and even if I did, it wouldn't be enough to stop the grand scheme."

The Beast Miao King's voice trembled.

He could almost see his sworn brother's face in that dimly lit room. Baeksang had cut through his own wrist—a wrist as precious to a swordsman as his life.

And he could hear Baeksang's last words.

"I won't stop. So… you mustn't stop either, Palace Lord. Go all the way with that boy, Jin Taekyung. Take a different path from mine."

That was all. The sworn elder brother had left, and the sworn younger brother had remained.

Three days later, the Baekcheon Unit knelt before the token in the Beast Miao King's hand. They remembered the charge given to them by the man who had become their father and teacher after they lost their homes and families.

If someone other than me brings you this token one day… he is the lord you must serve.

And so the three hundred warriors who had lain hidden in a remote mountain valley for decades descended with the Beast Miao King.

Rumors of warriors racing across the wilderness spread quietly, but swiftly.

The Palace Lord has returned!

Our Dai people will join the Palace Lord! Protect this land from the traitors who colluded with Dark Heaven, usurped the Palace Lord's position, and betrayed Nanman!

Mobilize every warrior. Send out messengers, now!

As many as ten thousand warriors headed for the Nanman Beast Palace, leaving behind a vacuum of equal size.

The tribal chieftains who had rebelled against Baeksang and left the Nanman Beast Palace led their warriors to join their true Palace Lord.

You…

We'll follow you to the death, Palace Lord.

One day passed. Then another.

By then, they had become a vast army. They were racing toward the Nanman Beast Palace when they encountered an unexpected enemy.

Or so they thought.

The force numbered roughly three thousand. Then the Bai man at its head stepped forward alone and knelt.

We surrender.

The Beast Miao King asked why. The Bai man answered with a dazed look.

The being who guards the divine artifact opened our eyes—all of us. It showed us which path was right and which choice we had to make.

The Beast King Stone was a legend. A miracle.

And that day, the Bai man—no, the Captain of the Guards—was not the only one who witnessed the wondrous sight on Ailao Mountain.

That Han Chinese bastard… No. Great Hero Jin Taekyung told us to find you at once, Palace Lord. He said everything would be lost if we were any later.

Once the three thousand warriors who had surrounded Ailao Mountain joined them, nothing could stop them. Not rugged mountains, deep swamps, or jungles thick with undergrowth.

Nor could the group that had realized something was wrong and hurried toward the Nanman Beast Palace.

"I had to rush to the Inner Palace and didn't see it through to the end. How did the battle turn out?"

The Beast Miao King asked without taking his eyes off the Southern Heaven Demon Empress. Wang Ho, Commander of the Baekcheon Unit, wiped blood from his cheek. The heat of battle still burned in his eyes.

"Two hundred casualties on our side."

"And theirs?"

"Annihilated. We killed or captured every last one."

Jin Taekyung, who had watched it all unfold, gave a short laugh. He didn't know every detail, but he had a good idea how things had gone.

"Old hag. You're fucked, huh?"

…!

Crunch.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress clenched her teeth before she could stop herself. The metallic tang of blood filled her mouth.

Dead. All of them.

Five hundred elite fighters, wiped out.

The thousands who had arrived with the Beast Miao King had crushed her last move—the one that could have turned this dangerous situation around in an instant.

No. This can't be happening…!

Fury boiled up inside her. Worse than the fury was the unease, the cold creeping through her chest.

The two characters filling the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's mind now were death.

…Die? I'm going to die? Me?

She couldn't believe it.

She had lived for more than a hundred and thirty years. Since her youth, she had stopped at nothing to become beautiful and stay young. She had cast aside every human scruple countless times, building formidable martial prowess along the way.

She had never imagined that, if her life ended, it would end at someone else's hands.

Now that absurd possibility was becoming real. Drawing closer before her eyes.

With killing intent as sharp as the point of an awl.

Thoom.

Hundreds of feet stepped forward at once, their combined impact spreading as a tremendous echo.

Grrrr.

The beasts carrying warriors on their backs growled low.

Light flowed from the largest White Tiger at their center, enveloping them all and shielding them from the darkness.

Fwoooosh.

Faint but unmistakable light. The mutants sensed the power of the sacred stone that had shared this land's fate for ages, and instinctively backed away.

Or perhaps they sensed something else, too.

They could not win against these people. Their bodies had grown fiercer and stronger, but it would make no difference. Not even if the Southern Heaven Demon Empress, who led them, joined the fight.

—Krrk.

—Kk.

Their cries sounded almost like groans. Nearly a thousand monsters stood there, as hideous as the sounds they made.

The Baekcheon Unit did not waver. They leveled weapons still wet with their previous enemies' blood at the mutants.

Shing.

Hundreds of spears and blades flashed in the dim light.

Decades ago, someone had called these warriors scrap iron and treated them as a diversion. She had been wrong.

No. Perhaps she had been right back then.

But the scrap iron had been hammered, cooled, and heated again and again until it became something new.

Hard steel. Then keen blades capable of cutting even steel.

And only one man in all the world could wield the blade called the Baekcheon Unit.

"Give the order, Palace Lord. No…"

A middle-aged man whose black hair had turned half gray with the passage of time—the Commander of the Baekcheon Unit, Wang Ho—spoke in a weighty voice.

"My lord."

His gaze turned, and every member of the Baekcheon Unit looked the same way.

The giant standing before them like an iron tower—the Beast Miao King, Yayul Cheok—opened his mouth.

"I'm going forward. Follow me."

"As you command."

That was all.

In the next instant, they moved as one. Like a wave rolling in from the open sea. Like an arrow loosed from its bow. Like a bolt of lightning.

At their head, an enormous White Tiger shot forward beside the Beast Miao King.

—Kraaaaaaang!

Krrrunch!

Its roar shook heaven and earth. Its forepaw swept through everything in its way, tearing and crushing.

Gripping the guardian spirit's mane, white enough to match his own pallor, Jin Taekyung muttered,

"No, fuck. I'm exhausted enough to die, so why am I—"

His dismay at the sudden acceleration—and his suspicion that the guardian spirit might be a Korean-made tiger—vanished the next moment.

To be precise, they had no choice but to vanish.

Gooooong.

The air froze. At the center of a whirlwind rising as it drew in the surrounding darkness, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress lifted her head.

Jin yanked the guardian spirit's mane backward at lightning speed.

His ace in the hole: reverse gear.
The guardian spirit understood his intention perfectly and launched itself.
Forward.
Whoosh!
—Hold on tight, human!
“…”
No, fuck.

Chapter 706

A thought occurred to me.

Can't I sit this one out now?

The greater good. A spirit of self-sacrifice. Laying down your life for others. All that stuff.

All good things. Heartwarming, if a little embarrassing to say out loud. But…

Haven't I done enough of that already?

I had come all the way to this cursed continent-sized greenbelt for the greater good, and I had fought while wearing my spirit of self-sacrifice over my entire body—so thoroughly that it might as well have been tattooed onto me.

Actually, considering how many battles I'd fought in Nanman, just saying I'd fought didn't do it justice.

I'd fought a fucking lot.

In forests. In fields. In swamps and jungles.

I'd driven my spear into spiders the size of houses. I'd answered the Nanman warriors who kept coming for glory with fire and fists.

If only it had ended there.

At the Poisonblood Grounds, I'd faced two Supreme Peak masters at once. Before I'd even recovered from that, I'd had to fight the monster known as the Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

And then there was One Annihilation.

One Annihilation. Killing everything in a single strike—that was what the name meant. Lately, though, I'd begun to wonder if everything included me.

What the fuck was I pouring into that one blow? My internal energy or my lifespan?

Still, things had not turned out too badly. Just when I had been wondering whether that was the day I would see the ending of my life, the Beast Miao King and the Baekcheon Unit had appeared. With the Beast Miao King's help, I had partially recovered from my Internal Injury, and I had also learned that allies were already swarming outside the Inner Palace.

With the battle finally turning in our favor, I could breathe a little easier.

Until one insane tiger suddenly hit the gas.

Whoosh!

No, fuck. Did this bastard live on Frosted Flakes?[3001]

I'd noticed it when we first met on Ailao Mountain: the guardian spirit was faster than the three hundred warriors of the Baekcheon Unit. Faster even than the Beast Miao King.

[3001] Frosted Flakes is a breakfast cereal advertised with a tiger mascot.

Across the vast Inner Palace, now reduced to ruins, a thousand mutants stood in our way like an iron wall.

The guardian spirit's silver body shot toward the Southern Heaven Demon Empress beyond them. Its thought rang through my head.

—Hold on tight, human!

Is he trying to kill me…?

At that instant, a massive, murky light erupted above the mutants' heads.

Kraaaaaaash!

—Duck.

Along with the brief thought, the guardian spirit tilted its body. Its powerful forepaw struck the ground, and its enormous body changed direction at an angle.

Whoosh!

Those instincts, those movements—spiritual creature hardly covered it. Divine beast seemed closer.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress's palm strike, packed with tremendous internal energy, missed its target and slammed into the ground.

Boom! Rumble, rumble!

Dust billowed up. Countless fragments came hurtling through it toward us, and I brought White Flame's spearhead down.

Whoosh!

The spearhead whistled through the air. Debris flung up by the impact crumbled to powder and scattered.

Then—

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

Hundreds of figures riding enormous beasts burst through the darkness and pale dust.

They charged in a triangular wedge, carrying tremendous weight and momentum. At its tip, a half-gray-haired middle-aged man drove out a fist.

The Beast Miao King.

Fwoom! Boom!

No furious shout. No command.

In place of his voice, green Fist Force erupted, crushing dozens of mutants in an instant and opening a gap. Three hundred charging spears drove into it like sharp awls.

Kra-crack!

Blood burst forth. Severed limbs flew high into the air.

One thousand against three hundred. Humans and beasts against monsters.

Slice! Slice!

Whoosh! Stab-stab-stab!

"Guh!"

—Kraaaaaaang!

Screams and the sounds of blades cutting flesh rang out on every side.

The Baekcheon Unit's charge crushed hundreds of mutants, but a fierce close-quarters battle awaited them. The Beast Miao King shot past it toward the true enemy waiting for him.

"Southern Heaven Demon Empress!"

His body surged forward like a streak of light alongside his roar. A moment later, the aftermath of their collision, carrying a distant flash of light, shook the foundations of the earth.

Boom! Rumble!

Figures and sharpened weapons clashed in a blur. Above them, the darkness slowly gave way before the green Force.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress is already exhausted. The Beast Miao King has the advantage.

But the close-quarters battle wasn't going nearly as well.

The beasts, made bigger and stronger by mutation, were a match for First Rate masters. The warriors had retained all the martial arts they'd known as humans, and now they moved faster than ever as they went after the Baekcheon Unit.

Like this one.

Whoosh! Slice!

A mutant's head flew up with a sharp cutting sound.

The Baekcheon warrior who had failed to notice it behind him stared at me, eyes wide.

"No matter how busy you are, you've got to watch your back."

"Thank you. But who are you…?"

The Beast Miao King or the Baekcheon Unit. After a moment's hesitation between the two, I answered.

"An ally. I'll take the lead. Follow me."

I didn't have much choice.

The Baekcheon Unit could stand against such overwhelming numbers because every single one of its members had reached at least the realm of a Supreme First Rate master. The mutants, whose bodies had been completely consumed by demonic qi, were powerful.

With the Beast Miao King gone from their midst, the guardian spirit and I had to lead the charge.

"…Shit. Now that I think about it, why am I—"

—Is it my imagination, or are you fighting just fine while you complain?

"Be honest. You've got a grudge against me, don't you?"

Crack!

Maybe demonic qi drove the mutant's ferocity. Maybe it was loyalty to the commander it wanted to protect. Either way, it charged out of the dust and filled my vision—until the guardian spirit crushed it in a single blow.

—A grudge?

"Don't play dumb, you bastard. You accelerated like your life depended on it because I set fire to Ailao Mountain."

Kra-crack!

A single sweep of its forepaw tore the heads off four or five mutants. The guardian spirit clicked its tongue—despite being a tiger.

—Ridiculous.

"Are you sure?"

—No.

"Then is this revenge for the Thousand-Year Spider that lived upstairs?"

—What nonsense is that?

"I've thought it over, and it's suspicious as hell. You know what they say. Our friendly neighborhood Thousand-Year Spider… up!"

Stab!

With that shout, I thrust White Flame straight through the head of a tiger that had leaped at us, casting a shadow over the guardian spirit.

Grrrk…

Its cry died away. With the dead tiger still impaled on my spear, I swung it hard.

Fwoom! Crack!

The carcass, weighing well over several hundred geun,[3002] flew into other mutants and crushed them.

"If you weren't holding a grudge, you wouldn't throw a patient who needs bed rest into a mess like this. That's my conclusion."

Whoosh! Slice!

I swept my spear sideways in one fluid motion. Five heads flew along its path.

The headless corpses collapsed at the same speed they had charged. The guardian spirit stared blankly at the sight and muttered,

—I think your idea of a patient differs from mine.

"Are you insane? Can't you see what shape I'm in?"

—I can. That is why I said it.

"You just don't understand. My bones ache when I breathe."

Stab!

[3002] A Korean geun is 600 g (1.32 lb).

—You seem perfectly capable of stabbing everything around you. That hardly makes a convincing argument.

"Damn it. I'm only doing this to stay alive…"

—Do you know something?

"What?"

—For a human, you are remarkably bad at lying.

"What's that supposed to—"

I didn't have time to finish.

Crack! Whoosh!

A silver mane wet with blood scattered through the air. The guardian spirit leaped upward after bursting a mutant's head, then swung its forepaw as it descended.

Its hooklike claws carried blade-sharp wind and an energy that could only be called Force.

Boom! Rumble!

One strike.

Amid the thunderous sound and the vibrations, dozens of mutants were sent flying as bloody pulp, and even more mutants rushed forward to fill the empty space.

Whoosh!

—Kweeeek!

Their movements were swift and fierce, at odds with their grotesque cries. Streams of Sword Energy poured from some of their weapons—proof they had once been renowned warriors even in Nanman.

But—

—Kraaaaaaang!

The guardian spirit existed solely to protect the sacred stone. At the roar of that enormous White Tiger, unlike any anyone had ever seen, the mutants froze.

As though we'd planned it, I brought White Flame down at an angle.

Cut them. All at once.

The three jiazi[3003] of Scorching Yang Qi were gone. So were the blue-white flames that had once burned around the transparent spearhead.

All I had left now was a body as heavy as waterlogged cotton, along with a small amount of internal energy—so little that I wondered whether it could fill even one handful—and the only divine weapon I could still trust: White Flame.

That was all. Yet I couldn't explain—

Slice!

Why I kept cutting without pause.

[3003] A jiazi is a sixty-year cycle in the traditional Chinese calendar; three jiazi are 180 years.

Stab!

And stabbing.

Crack!

And swinging my spear at the mutants.

Why I forced my aching legs to hold on so I wouldn't fall from the guardian spirit's back.

No. Perhaps I dimly understood.

Even the meaning behind what the guardian spirit had said to me moments earlier.

"…Damn it."

The curse escaped me before I could stop it. The guardian spirit laughed softly.

—I told you. You are bad at lying.

"…"

—If staying alive were all you wanted, you would never have come here. Yet exhausted as you are, you will not stop fighting.

"Enough. Shut up."

—Why? Do you pity those who were human like you before they became monsters? Or do you want to kill the vile human who turned them into monsters?

"…"

Its thought whispered inside my head. My breath caught, and something hot rose in my chest.

But the hand I thrust forward was still driving my spear toward another mutant's throat.

Thrust!

The transparent spearhead cut through flesh and bone. Darkness slowly receded from eyes that had been black from edge to edge.

Death took its place.

Thud.

The body collapsed. I stared at the nameless warrior's grotesquely twisted face and murmured, "Did he feel pain?"

—Yes. Probably.

Crack!

The guardian spirit swung its massive forepaw, killing the mutant leopard that had charged at me and sending it flying like a cannonball, then continued, calm as ever.

—But after that brief pain, a great, warm rest would have been waiting for him. Simply being alive must be agony for them now.

"…"

—They do not resent you. So stop blaming yourself, human.

Damn it.

I knew. I'd done my best. I'd risked my life again and again to stop this disaster and come all the way here.

But doing my best didn't always bring the best result.

I should have stopped it.

In the end, I had failed to stop it. I had saved many people, but I had also failed to save many others.

Ultimately, the only thing I could do was end their lives with everything I had.

Just like now.

Fwooooooosh!

I swung with all my strength. The spearhead tore through the wind and split the air, and my whole body screamed from the toll One Annihilation had taken.

Pain so fierce my vision went white.

But I gritted my teeth and endured it. I sent a single spear packed with terrifying strength and speed toward the people who had once been human like me.

Kra-crack!

The spearhead carved an enormous arc. In its wake, a raging gale filled with dark red blood.

Severed heads and limbs rose into the air. Countless deaths followed. Countless moments of rest.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

The first time I had wanted to cover my ears at the clear ringing of the chimes announcing EXP gained. The first time the sight of my enemies collapsing while spraying blood had felt so unbearably sorrowful.

But I didn't stop.

Slice. Slice. Slice!

I cut. Cut again. And kept cutting.

Until nothing stood in my way. Until my spearhead passed through empty air.

Fwoom!

The world tilted.

No—the body that could not withstand the force carried by the spearhead tilted.

As I began to roll off the guardian spirit's back, a rough hand caught me.

"It's over. Please stop."

Wang Ho, Commander of the Baekcheon Unit.

Shock rang in his voice. Breathing hard, I looked around.

The Baekcheon Unit had lost more than half its number. Countless bodies lay in pools of blood all around us.

But…

No.

He was wrong.

This fight—today's disaster—wasn't over.

Not until one particular person was dead for good.

"Let's go."

—…Human.

"We have to finish it."

At my voice, which slipped through cracked lips, the guardian spirit seemed about to answer. Instead, it pushed its heavy body forward.

Whoosh!

Wind swept over me.

At the end of the road we were traveling, one person was struggling to live despite vomiting blood.

No.

There was a monster.

Chapter 707

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress could not understand.

How had the grand plan she'd been so sure was perfect fallen apart? And why had she been reduced to the humiliation of fighting a mere member of the Ten Kings on equal terms?

But she had no time to dwell on it.

Whoosh!

A fierce rush of air drowned out the wind.

A massive figure surged forward, erasing the space around it. Green Fist Force erupted from the Beast Miao King's fist, illuminating the world.

Kraaaaaaash!

Not long ago—just two shichen[3004] ago—the Southern Heaven Demon Empress would have snorted and knocked that Fist Force aside.

The Beast Miao King was one of the Ten Kings. He might even have been underestimated because he was from Nanman. But he was still unmistakably a step below her.

He had been.

Until someone's strike took one of her arms and tore away part of her side.

Jin Taekyung.

Merely thinking the name filled her with rage.

Gritting her teeth, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress stepped forward and vanished. The Beast Miao King realized his attack had missed and reacted at once.

Whoosh!

He stood over eight cheok[3005] tall, yet he moved like the wind. His tiger eyes, streaming with flame, were already fixed on the Southern Heaven Demon Empress as she rushed toward his side.

Shwaaak!

His hand, as large as a tiger's forepaw, raked across the air.

Slice!

Blade-sharp wind cut the hem of her robe. In the same instant, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress leaped in close and drove a palm toward him with all her strength.

Whoosh!

The blow should have crushed flesh and burst bones and organs.

Instead, her small, blood-drenched hand met the Beast Miao King's palm—several times larger than her own.

[3004] A shichen is a traditional time unit of about two hours; two shichen are about four hours.

[3005] A cheok is about 30.3 cm (11.9 in); eight cheok are about 2.42 m (7.95 ft).

Boom!

The world shook. Murky internal energy, as though laced with deadly poison, flowed through the point where their palms met and churned the Beast Miao King's insides.

He swallowed the blood rising in his throat and grinned.

"So this is all you've got?"

"…!"

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress's eyes widened.

It was unbelievable. That the Beast Miao King could smile even in a situation like this.

And that her full-strength palm strike had become so pathetically weak.

Blood slipped between her clenched teeth. Then her figure blurred.

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh—boom!

Compressed air burst outward with each sharp report.

In an instant, her hands and feet struck all over the Beast Miao King's body like flashes of lightning, jolting his massive frame.

But that was all.

Long years of training in the external arts had made his body as tough as steel. Her blows should long since have left him vomiting blood on his knees, yet they no longer carried their former weight.

No. They were growing weaker.

The demonic qi from the rift was strengthening her, but it could not undo the terrible injuries Jin Taekyung had inflicted. Nor could it steady the mental strength those injuries had shaken.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress realized it before anyone else.

…Tired? Me?

Everything had a limit. At some point, she had forgotten hers. How could she not have? For so many years, no one had pushed her far enough to feel it.

Until now.

Whoosh—crack!

The relentless rush of her attacks stopped. Pain shot through her hand.

Crack.

Bones shifted in the small fist that should have smashed into his chest and burst his heart. The Beast Miao King had caught it in his enormous palm.

He bared his bloodstained teeth.

"I told you. I'd tear off your limbs and kill you."

"…!"

His cold voice cut into her ears. Blood vessels burst in her eyes as she stared at him.

She instinctively reached out with her other hand to seize the Beast Miao King by the throat. But then she saw the green Fist Force filling her vision and realized—

Ah.

Someone else had already taken that arm.

Boom!

The world turned upside down. Flung away like a cannonball, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress felt her vision dim.

In the slowed-down world, light and darkness flashed endlessly before her eyes. The sky and the earth traded places, twisting together.

Then came an impact that threatened to grind her entire body to powder.

Kraaaaaaang!

She tore through the mound of Inner Palace ruins and crashed deep into its center, vomiting blood.

“Kweh-heeeeeck!”

Splash!

Dark. Red.

Dark-red blood mixed with pieces of internal organs sprayed across the countless large and small fragments scattered in every direction.

She felt her body trembling along with the horrible pain.

This… This can’t be happening. It can’t.

As that single thought filled her mind, something came into her blurred view.

Thud. Thud.

The rubble shifted. Someone staggered upright beneath it.

Hope glimmered in her unsteady eyes.

That was it. Hope.

“M-Me. Hurry, take me…”

Her voice was barely more than a breath. She reached out a trembling hand toward the figure slowly rising on two legs bent at unnatural angles.

Toward her loyal subordinate, his torn-open neck hanging limp as he awaited a recovery that defied even the words supernatural powers.

“Hurry. Take me as far away from here as you can…”

At this moment, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress was more desperate than anyone else in the world.

Her grand plan had achieved only half its aim. Death, which she had never once imagined for herself, loomed before her.

She had to escape. She wanted to live, even if fleeing was the only way. As long as she survived, she could plan what came next.

She could return and carry on her grand plan—her revenge—somewhere else.

But her last hope died as a shadow fell over the Masked Man's head.

Whoosh. Crack!

It was not the Beast Miao King, Jin Taekyung, or anyone else.

It was simply a massive boulder.

It had probably been dislodged by the force of the impact.

Somewhere in the ruins piled up like a mountain—perhaps even the foundation stone of the Nanman Beast Palace—a massive stone weighing a thousand geun[3006] crashed down over the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's final hope.

The Masked Man, who had lost his reason long ago and now did nothing but obey his master's commands, was crushed beneath the boulder. His limbs twitched.

She stared blankly at him. Then footsteps like thunder reached her ears.

Thud. Thud.

A footfall approached over blood-soaked ground, treading on sand and rubble.

No. Footsteps.

No strange cries or clashing weapons accompanied those unusually loud steps.

Ah.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress raised her head and finally understood.

The fierce battle for the fate of this land—for Nanman—was over.

And along with it, the fate she had carried forward for so many years was also nearing its end.

At the head of the approaching group was the person who had created this entire situation.

Thud.

A blood-soaked beast's forepaw stepped over the rubble.

The enormous White Tiger stopped three jang[3007] away. On its back sat a man whose face she never wanted to see again, not even in a dream.

"Feels like I haven't seen you in a while… You've gotten a lot prettier."

Whoosh! Thud!

The Finger Qi she fired on instinct grazed Jin Taekyung's shoulder and pierced the rubble behind him.

He casually rubbed the blood flowing from the cut, then licked his palm, wet with blood.

"Thanks. I was thirsty anyway. Is this what they mean by a grandmother's love?"

"…!"

Blood welled up between her clenched teeth.

[3006] A Korean geun is about 600 g (1.32 lb); a thousand geun are about 600 kg (1,320 lb).

[3007] A jang is ten cheok, or about 3.03 m (9.94 ft); three jang are about 9.09 m (29.8 ft).

She gathered every scrap of strength and tried to rise. A dozen or so assault spears flew over Jin Taekyung's head.

Whiiiiiiish—boom!

She knocked aside the Baekcheon Unit's spears with a single sweep of her hand, then glared at him, the blood vessels in her eyes bursting.

"How dare you!"

Fwooooooosh!

Her voice, charged with internal energy, shook the air around them. She had lost an arm and suffered severe Internal Injury, but the demonic qi flowing from the rift still lent her power.

But…

Not enough.

Even so, she could not overturn the current situation.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress understood that better than anyone. She knew the desperate reality that had befallen her.

When she saw the Beast Miao King beside Jin Taekyung, she was certain.

I'm going to die.

With her body in ruins, there was nothing she could do. Even if she somehow escaped, thousands of Nanman warriors waited outside.

Certain death.

The words closed around her with a weight she had never imagined. Every thought vanished; the turmoil in her mind fell still.

Then a low hiss of air broke the silence.

Whoosh!

The Beast Miao King. The guardian spirit. Jin Taekyung.

As though they had planned it, all three surged forward like a single gust of wind. They would give her no opening, not even a moment for final words.

They had only one resolve: to cut off the breath of the Fiend known as the Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

Kraaaaaaaash!

Green Fist Force bore down on the air. Bloodstained teeth tore through the wind. A transparent spearhead, carrying one last handful of internal energy, burned with blue-white hellfire.

She saw it all.

A faint light entered the empty eyes of the old woman who had lost the beauty once called the greatest in the world, as she watched death rush toward her.

Lord of Heaven.

The noblest, most exalted being in the world.

Long ago, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress had loved him from the moment she first saw him. She had prostrated herself at his feet and sworn her loyalty.

She would offer her insignificant life for him.

Even if her youth and beauty faded someday, she had promised to remain by his side forever, even if only from a distance.

She had not known then that the day she would give her life would come so soon. Or that a day would come when she could no longer remain near the Lord of Heaven she revered.

But…

Please remember that this lowly woman stood beside you.

If the Lord of Heaven remembered her as a servant who had loved him more than anyone, that would be enough.

If he did, she could gladly burn through the life she had left with a smile.

Just as she was doing at this very moment.

Crack.

In the slowed world, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress heard the rift—a sound only she could hear.

Innate qi.

The purest, most powerful force she had carried since birth awakened. An immense energy surged through her body and gathered in her hand.

Gooooooooong.

Space twisted as though invisible hands were tearing it apart. At the shock on the three faces before her, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress smiled.

No. She tried to.

Thud!

Until a sword thrust out from the heap of ruins behind her and buried itself in her back, emerging from the deep, dark gap between the fallen stones.

Chapter 708

Thrust!

The unmistakable sound of a blade piercing flesh reached the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's ears, and the world around her stopped.

All she could feel was the cold blade driven deep into her back.

Why? Who? How?

Questions crowded her mind through the distant pain.

Instinct moved her before reason could. She spun at lightning speed and thrust out a palm.

Whoosh!

Innate qi. A portion of the immense internal energy gathered in her hand struck the collapsed ruins.

Kraaaaaaash!

Thousands upon thousands of geun[3008] of rubble exploded outward with a tremendous roar.

Among the flying fragments was the answer to her questions.

"Kugh!"

A figure was flung helplessly away by the blast.

One sleeve of his blood- and dust-stained white robe hung empty. Blood gushed from the wound in his chest, an injury beyond recovery.

But his cold, steady gaze remained fixed on the Southern Heaven Demon Empress until the very end.

His eyes, filled with rage and regret beyond measure, seemed to tell her he had waited a very long time for this moment.

"Baeksang…!"

His name burst from her lips like a scream. At the same instant, she felt wind rushing at her from behind, and her eyes widened.

Shwaaaaaak!

Baeksang's unexpected strike had cost her no more than a moment.

But that single blink had given someone else an advantage—and dealt her a terrible blow.

Crack.

Swallowing the thick blood in her mouth, she wrenched the sword from her back and turned at lightning speed.

Three figures swept toward her like a gale.

The Beast Miao King. The guardian spirit. Jin Taekyung.

[3008] A Korean geun is 600 g, or about 1.32 lb.

At the sight of them, the qi and blood Baeksang's strike had thrown into turmoil convulsed inside her.

She felt the flame of mutual destruction, kindled with her own life as fuel, flicker like a candle in the wind.

Pain surged through her again. Her vision blurred.

She could not stop. She must not stop.

Kill.

Clinging to that single thought, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress gritted her teeth and extended her hand.

Toward the three figures already upon her. Toward the enemies who dared obstruct the great work the exalted Lord of Heaven sought to accomplish.

Goooooooooong.

In the slowed world, immense energy flowed through her blood-soaked hand and into the blade. The sword, now in its new master's grasp, swept down at an angle.

Shwaaaaaak!

Through the warping space, she saw three pairs of eyes slowly widen. Green Force surged up like an iron wall to shield them all.

But…

It's over.

With that thought, unheard by anyone else, a blinding flash swallowed everything.

Fwooooooosh!

No one in that land had ever seen an explosion like it.

Fwoom! Ruuuuumble!

Yohi and Muyaho saw it as they evacuated the survivors alongside countless wild beasts.

The thousands of warriors surrounding the darkened Inner Palace saw it, their blood-soaked weapons held ready.

So did the tribespeople running toward the hills beyond the Outer Palace, gasping for breath.

One word came to them all.

A cataclysm.

Nothing else could describe it. The blinding flash and violent tremors reached far beyond the Inner Palace. Everyone who felt their force froze.

No—they trembled with a fear that seemed to bind their very souls.

"A-Aah…!"

The groans rising from every direction all turned toward one place: the Nanman Beast Palace they had left behind.

Boom. Rumble.

It was collapsing.

The pavilions and homes their ancestors had spent long years building with blood and sweat—the place where they had been born and raised—were on the verge of collapsing before their eyes.

What more was there to say?

Thousands upon thousands stared at the Nanman Beast Palace, trying to take in one last sight of their beloved home before it was lost to them forever.

But soon, their despair gave way to hope.

Ruuuuumble…

The tremors gradually subsided. The ground stopped collapsing before it could swallow the Nanman Beast Palace whole. The houses and pavilions that had swayed on the brink of falling remained standing, though they leaned.

An unimaginable disaster. Then a miracle.

The people who witnessed it were overcome with relief and joy. But the person who had unleashed that disaster with nothing more than a human body shook with pain and rage.

“T-This can’t… Kueeegh!”

Drip. Drip.

Dark-red blood spilled down from the corner of her mouth.

Everything within a radius of fifty jang[3009] had been shattered and hurled away. Standing in the empty space left behind, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress looked around with blood-red eyes.

One strike. One sure chance.

She had not cared if it killed her. There was no returning alive now, and even if she lived, she would have to spend the rest of her days in this old, hideous body.

And yet she had survived.

She should have been blown apart and killed in the explosion, after swallowing everything in its path. Instead, she had survived. The humiliation burned.

“Baeksang! You bastard. How dare you!”

Rumble!

A wave of qi burst from her with the roar, shaking the space around her.

Baeksang’s unexpected strike. That single thrust of his sword, made with what must have been the last of his strength, had changed everything.

The turmoil it caused within her had kept her from pouring all her innate qi into the attack. She had escaped death in the explosion because of it.

[3009] A jang is about 3.03 m, or 9.94 ft. Fifty jang is about 152 m, or 497 ft.

So had they.

"Cough."

Thud.

Several dozen jang[3010] away, a graying giant dropped to one knee and vomited blood mixed with pieces of his organs.

Countless fragments studded his body. Behind his broad back, she saw the enormous White Tiger and a young man lying drenched in blood.

"Yayul Cheok, you bastard…!"

Blood and phlegm rattled in her throat. The Beast Miao King's actions in the final instant flashed through her mind.

He had stepped in front of Jin Taekyung without the slightest hesitation.

Why?

She could not understand why Yayul Cheok, who had earned a place among the Ten Kings in the distant Central Plains, would make that choice.

And that stinking beast had done the same.

Risk their only lives? For a mere brat?

The question brought her one certainty.

Jin Taekyung. I have to kill him, whatever it takes.

The Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace, a man little different from the king of a nation, and the White Tiger that bore a divine artifact had risked their lives for him. That made him the one person here with the most dangerous potential.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress still had innate qi she had not spent.

The last strength bought by burning her life.

Lord of Heaven. Please forgive this disloyal servant for daring to defy your will.

Step.

She took a heavy step, and a sharp sound of splitting air rang out.

Shk! Crack!

A spear that had flown from somewhere trembled in her grasp. She crushed its steel spearhead in her bare hand, her eyes glowing blood-red.

"Do you all want to die?"

A middle-aged man stood where her cold words were directed, his armor torn almost to shreds.

And he was not alone.

Drip. Thud.

Across the devastated ground, more than a hundred warriors staggered to their feet and gathered behind him, gripping swords and spears.

[3010] A jang is about 3.03 m, or 9.94 ft. Fifty jang is about 152 m, or 497 ft.

Though they had been farther from the center of the blast, every one of them bore wounds. They stood in her way to fulfill the mission entrusted to them.

Splash.

The middle-aged man lifted something from a pool of blood and bound it tightly around his forehead. His gaze remained steady on the Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

Three characters were written on the old silk, still legible beneath the blood.

Baekcheon Unit.

That was his answer to her question. It was Wang Ho's answer as Commander of the Baekcheon Unit, and the resolve of every surviving member.

The next moment—

Screeeeeech! Boom!

The Fiend known as the Southern Heaven Demon Empress charged at them.

A flash of light. An explosion.

Those were the last things I remembered. I'd thought that when I opened my eyes again, everything would be over.

I'd be alive. Or I'd be dead.

A battle could only end one of those two ways.

But when I opened my eyes after a brief spell of darkness, I realized I'd been only half right.

I was alive. The battle wasn't over.

Kraaaaaack!

"Gaaaaah!"

"Stop her—!"

Slice!

"Noooo!"

My senses returned, and I saw blood spraying into the sky. Severed limbs flew after it. Someone's body, crushed into a bloody pulp by overwhelming force, hurtled away.

Whoom! Boom!

Drip.

Blood splashed across my face from only a few steps away.

I stared blankly at a warrior lying dead with a hole through the center of his chest. Then a weak voice reached me.

No. It was someone's thought.

—Human.

Only then did I realize what was supporting my back, and whose warmth I felt.

The thick smell of blood filled my nose. I turned my head and lost my words.

"…!"

A massive body trembled now and then in a deep pool of blood.

The silver fur I'd once thought almost mystical was soaked through. Pale blue eyes blinked at me with visible effort.

—You've slept a long time.

"…What is this?"

—I have no regrets. Neither does he.

At the moment that distant flash had filled my vision, there had been green Force and a silver mane blocking my eyes.

No way.

As usual, my worst suspicion was right.

I turned and saw a broad back. The man kneeling there, so drenched in blood he scarcely looked human, was the Beast Miao King, Yayul Cheok.

He was unconscious. Fragments of the sword were embedded all over his body. He must have taken them while shielding someone else.

"This is insane. Why the hell…?"

—Go.

"What?"

—Leave. Hurry. There's no time.

The guardian spirit turned its head with difficulty and spat something out.

Fwooooooosh.

The sacred stone, now no larger than a child's fist, gave off a faint light.

I understood what it meant and gritted my teeth.

"Don't give me that bullshit."

—If they fall too, you are next. But if you run, you can survive.

Kraaaaaack!

"Gaaaaaaaah!"

The ground shook, and another scream followed. The Southern Heaven Demon Empress entered my field of vision, her veins standing out across her entire body as she burned through the last of her life and tore apart more than a hundred members of the Baekcheon Unit.

"…!"

A chill swept over me at the sight of that overwhelming power. As I froze in place, the guardian spirit whispered with all its strength.

—Go. Now!

I knew it was right. The Southern Heaven Demon Empress didn’t have much time left. If I ran alone, I could survive.

But…

I’d regret it for the rest of my life.

I muttered dazedly and grabbed the sacred stone.

Then I rose and ran.

Not toward the Outer Palace.

Toward the Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

Chapter 709

Screeeeeech!

Jin Taekyung wavered slightly as he shot forward at breakneck speed.

His limbs, usually as light as down, hung heavy and ached. Every step felt incomparably heavier than before.

One Annihilation had taken a terrible toll. Without the Beast Miao King's help, Jin would not have been able to stand, much less run. And even if he had somehow stayed on his feet, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's devastating attack would have killed him.

And yet… he had survived.

The Beast Miao King and the guardian spirit had risked their lives to save him when he had the least strength left to spare. Now the Baekcheon Unit was carrying on their resolve, staking their lives at this very moment.

Charging into the darkness. Toward a Fiend they had no power to stop.

Crack!

One strike.

The Fiend's blood-soaked hand crushed bone and flesh, then punched through a chest.

An unnamed life went out. Someone else stepped forward to fill the gap.

Why?

Jin Taekyung did not know them. They did not know him.

Yet every one of them was willing to throw away their life. They filled the places left by comrades dying one after another and charged toward a death they could not stop.

The sight of the Baekcheon Unit overlapped with that of someone who had forced a smile in a dark cave.

Go on ahead, Taekyung.

Jin had survived because he ran. Because he had survived, he had regretted it countless times. If he could return to that moment, he would say—

"I'm not going. Never."

At the words forced through his clenched teeth, Wang Ho, Commander of the Baekcheon Unit, turned his head.

Drenched in blood that might not have been his own, Wang Ho stared at the figure rapidly closing in.

Jin Taekyung should not be here.

The Beast Miao King, Wang Ho, and the hundred warriors of the Baekcheon Unit had risked their lives to buy him this precious time. Surely his one task was to survive, whatever it took.

Instead, he had come running straight back into danger.

“What the hell is going on…!”

As Wang Ho cried out and moved to block Jin Taekyung, a hand planted firmly on his shoulder. A low voice sounded beside his ear.

“Let’s get out of this alive together.”

“…!”

“Fuck. I said let’s survive together!”

Wang Ho went rigid.

He could find no words for that cry—not let’s die together, but let’s survive together—or for Jin’s eyes, burning like fire and wet with tears.

He could not stop the young man from leaving him behind and running toward death.

And then he understood why the Beast Miao King, his lord, who had nearly a hundred thousand tribespeople to lead, had made his choice.

Was this why? Was it because of this very sight that you wanted to protect that young man more than your own safety?

If Jin had returned so they could die together, it would have been nothing more than foolhardy courage.

But Jin Taekyung had come back to fight beside them. To save as many people as they could—even one more—and for all of them to survive.

Tsstsst!

The Sword Energy that had seemed about to gutter out blazed stronger. Wang Ho raised his blade, sheathed in blue qi, and charged.

He shouted to his subordinates, fewer than half of whom remained.

“Kill that Fiend!”

It was a small difference in resolve, and an enormous one.

Hold her back? Or kill her?

Until now, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress had been someone they could not kill with the strength they had. No—they had believed they could not kill her and accepted their deaths.

Not anymore.

Now they were fighting to kill the Southern Heaven Demon Empress. Fighting to survive.

At the center of it all was the young man who had made them see the difference.

“Southern Heaven Demon Empress!”

Jin Taekyung roared in fury. A faint flame sprang from his toes.

Boom!

A small explosion cratered the ground, cracks spreading through it like a spiderweb. The recoil hurled him forward even faster.

Ahead of him stood the Fiend, steeped in blood and darkness.

Slice! Shraaaaaak!

A hand blade wreathed in murky darkness split someone in two.

Beyond the blood spraying in every direction, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress saw Jin Taekyung tearing through space as he charged toward her—and smiled delightedly.

Foolish child. Your recklessness has given me one last chance.

Until a moment ago, she had been furious. The innate qi bought with her life was dwindling by the moment, and the hundred Baekcheon Unit warriors blocking her path had worn away her remaining strength even as they died.

But now she could smile. Her most important prey had come searching for the place where he would die, foolishly walking there on his own two feet.

"Now, you small fry… get out of my way."

Roooooar!

Murky palm Force swept through the warriors blocking her path. They flew in every direction, coughing blood.

A sound split the air across the space they left behind.

Screeeeeech! Boom!

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress knocked away an iron spear that shot toward her like a flash of light with her bare hand, then swung down with her hand blade.

Whoooosh!

Space split, and a blade-sharp wind tore through it.

But Jin Taekyung was nowhere to be seen.

Above!

As she realized it, her figure blurred. A transparent spearhead slashed down from overhead and cut through her afterimage.

Slice!

No—not only her afterimage.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress felt a drop of blood roll down her forehead. Her expression tightened slightly.

Fast.

In a way, it was only natural. A martial artist who had reached the Supreme Peak was more than worthy of being called superhuman.

But martial insight alone did not make them superhuman. They also possessed vast reserves of internal energy, which heightened the physical abilities they had honed over years of training.

Then how…?

Jin Taekyung had used up most of his internal energy. How could he still move with such speed and strength?

Shk-shk-shk-shk!

The spear tip trembled. Dozens of spear shadows spread out and rained down on her entire body.

Their speed and force far exceeded anything she had expected. But she did not retreat.

“How dare you, you little brat…!”

Her voice seethed as her one remaining hand shot through the air. Her palm strike, stained with the blood of countless warriors, swallowed the spear shadows bearing down on her.

Roooooar!

No matter how many falsehoods there were, in the end, only one truth would emerge.

The shadows vanished in the palm Force. Her hand, shrouded in murky darkness, closed around the transparent spearhead.

Slice!

Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron, said to be harder and sharper than anything under heaven, tore through her Force and cut into her flesh.

Pain struck. The Southern Heaven Demon Empress smiled anyway.

I’ve got it.

At that moment—

Shwaaaaaaak!

Her qi flowed along the spearhead and swept through Jin Taekyung’s insides.

Boom!

“…!”

His body jerked. The injuries within him, briefly calmed by the Beast Miao King’s help, were thrown into turmoil again.

Jin swallowed the blood rising in his throat and tightened his grip on the spear shaft.

Crack!

The White Flame’s spearhead twisted in her grasp and drove farther forward. Her hand was shredded in an instant. Her eyes widened at the pain.

“You…”

Before she could finish, a sharp sound cut through the air.

Shiiiiing!

A sword flew through the wind. Its owner, wrapped in blue Sword Energy, was none other than Wang Ho, Commander of the Baekcheon Unit.

Slice!

She twisted away, but too late. Her Body-Protecting Qi, far weaker than before, could not stop the Sword Energy. Pain shot through her slashed flank, and she kicked upward.

Screeeeeech—crack!

Her foot struck Wang Ho's abdomen like a whip. He flew more than ten jang[3011], hurtling away like a cannonball.

Boom!

Dust billowed from the impact.

But Wang Ho was not the only one charging her.

Pat-pat-pat!

Figures rushed in from front and back, left and right, surrounding the Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

Fewer than twenty warriors of the Baekcheon Unit remained. They gathered the last of their strength and charged—to end this fight, to drive their spears and blades into the Fiend even if it cost them their lives.

Shk-shk-shk-shk!

At that moment, when the fierce sounds of weapons tearing through the air mingled with the wind—

Kraaaaaash!

Energy burst outward like a storm, sweeping away everything coming at her from every side.

And from between the lips of the person standing tall at its center, blood that could no longer be held back began to flow.

Cough.

Through dimming vision, she looked with trembling eyes at the young man kneeling before her.

His gaze was faint, as though its light might go out at any moment. But his hands did not shake. They gripped the spear shaft and held it thrust forward, its transparent head driven into her chest.

"Guh…!"

She coughed up dark-red blood and gasped for air.

She had needed to stop him. She had thought she could.

She had failed.

How? How could he still move?

Just before she unleashed her palm Force at the warriors, she had sent internal energy into Jin Taekyung again—to ensure that this time he would never rise, that his breath would stop for good.

[3011] A jang is a traditional Korean unit of length equal to ten ja, about 3.03 meters (9.94 ft). More than ten jang is more than about 30 meters (100 ft).

But he had not fallen. He had not died.

Even though his heart meridian had undoubtedly been torn to shreds, he had driven the spear he had held until the very end into the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's chest.

"Jin Tae…kyung."

Her broken voice had barely left her lips when—

Slide. Thud.

Jin Taekyung's blood-soaked hands slipped from the shaft. His head fell back, and his eyes grew hazy.

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress felt it then. She could hear it, too: death approaching Jin Taekyung, slowly but surely.

And his voice, impossibly bright for a man so close to death.

"Finally got you, you… fucking bitch."

"…!"

Every hair on her body seemed to stand on end.

It was fear. Terror of a human being whose resolve would not waver, no matter what happened.

…Afraid? I'm afraid? Me? Of that bastard?

Impossible. She could not fear anyone but the Lord of Heaven—least of all a mere brat on the brink of death.

I have to kill him. I have to stop his breath with my own hand.

She raised her hand slowly, the thought repeating in a daze.

She would likely die too. But unless she killed Jin Taekyung herself, she felt she would never rest in peace, even in death.

Die.

You monster.

With those words she did not have the chance to spit out, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress swung down her hand blade with the last of her strength.

Shk!

And at the moment the murky darkness was about to bore into the crown of Jin Taekyung's head—

Screeeeeech! Crack!

A streak of light flew in from somewhere and swallowed her only remaining arm.

A cold voice reached her as she froze.

"Just whose body do you think you're laying a hand on, you fucking bitch?"

Chapter 710

He could feel it. Death was right before his eyes.

His blurred vision could barely make out shapes. His once-sharp senses seemed ready to leave his body.

In the darkness of his fading consciousness, Jin Taekyung thought:

No doubt about it.

This is a dream. Or maybe I'm hearing things because I'm about to die.

How else could he explain the voice behind him?

"Just whose body do you think you're laying a hand on, you fucking bitch?"

And yet… it sounded so much like him.

That sharp voice, almost shrill with irritation. Those foul-mouthed curses. Both brought one person to mind. Taekyung knew that person could not possibly be here, and he scolded himself for even thinking it. Still, he couldn't help hoping.

I really must be dying.

The hollow thought echoed through his mind.

"So… how long are you going to sit there in a daze?"

"…!"

Jin Taekyung's eyelids, which had been slowly closing, stopped abruptly.

The shock jolted him awake, and his distant senses rushed back.

No way.

No. It can't be.

It was impossible. He was supposed to be somewhere far away in the Central Plains.

But someone had once said that hope could break a person—and raise them up again. Taekyung clung to that invisible thread and opened his eyes.

"Ah. Aah…"

He saw the Southern Heaven Demon Empress staggering, both arms gone.

And a single Zen staff planted at an angle beside her as she stood gripped by shock and confusion.

Clatter.

The rings hanging from it rattled loudly. The staff glowed red, and Taekyung could feel the Scorching Yang Qi flowing from it. A faint smile touched his lips.

"You… could've come a little sooner."

He spoke so softly that anyone else would have needed to stand right beside him to hear.

But the owner of the staff was different. He could have heard Taekyung from hundreds of jang[3012] away—hundreds of li,[3013] even.

Not with his ears.

With his heart. With the heart he held for his one and only Disciple.

“I’m allowed to be a little late. No need to give me grief, you brat.”

His gruff answer betrayed none of what he felt. Blood Monk—no, Fire King Jeok Cheongang—took a step forward.

Thud.

And the next moment—

Whoosh!

In the blackout that followed the end of the performance, a flame rose, larger and fiercer than anything else on the stage.

Kraaaaaash!

Flame Divine Palm.

A wave of fire surged through the darkness, devouring it with terrible heat. It rushed on without slowing, with only one purpose: to burn the Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

Ah.

She watched it approach with empty eyes.

No groan or scream escaped her. Her feet might as well have been nailed to the ground, and the pain where her arms had been felt strangely distant.

I have to dodge. Somehow, I have to dodge…

Her body would not obey the cry in her head.

Perhaps it had all ended the moment she lost her one remaining arm. The Zen staff had flown so fast it could have been mistaken for a flash of light, carrying enough heat to turn more than her arm to ash.

Her innate qi.

It had stripped away the last handful of strength she had saved to bring one person’s life to an end. Indifferently. Mercilessly.

Watching herself stand there without the strength to take even one step, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress finally understood.

It’s over.

Her life had been long indeed. She no longer knew exactly where it had begun, but here, today, it would end.

If she had one regret, it was that she had failed to stop Jin Taekyung’s breath with her own hand.

But… that’s all right.

[3012] A jang is ten cheok, approximately 3.03 m (9.94 ft).

[3013] A Chinese li is approximately 500 m (0.311 mi).

She did not know why Fire King Jeok Cheongang had come here, or what trick of fate had brought him.

But just as she would die here, Jin Taekyung could not escape death either. Not even the Great Firmament Immortal could change that.

The certainty comforted her as she accepted the flames.

Lord of Heaven.

The invocation sounded softly within her heart.

Her thoughts had been long, but only an instant had passed. The flames shot over Taekyung's kneeling head and opened their maw toward her.

Whoooosh!

As the light-flames poured down, melting the darkness, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress closed her eyes.

No—she tried to.

She would have succeeded if, just as everything turned white, someone had not thrown himself onto her body, which no longer had the strength to move a finger.

Whump!

In that split instant, she saw him clearly.

"…!"

Jin Taekyung's face was deathly pale. In a world moving impossibly slowly, his lips parted.

And then—

Crack!

Sharp pain shot through her throat, and her vision went dark.

The realization struck like a flash of light. It was an inescapable fact.

If the Southern Heaven Demon Empress dies now, I die too.

The main reason I'd survived fights against people stronger than me was the recovery I got when I leveled up.

Even with outstanding Muscles and Bones and all the stats I'd raised, I couldn't survive certain death. Not with my acupoints wrecked and my duodenum on leave from its post like a soldier who'd wandered outside his assigned area.

If someone else killed the Southern Heaven Demon Empress now, I was fucked.

That left me one choice.

Tank it.

Fuck.

I swallowed the curse and squeezed out every last bit of strength to throw myself forward.

No—it would be more accurate to say that I barely managed to raise my body and throw myself over the Southern Heaven Demon Empress.

Whump!

"…!"

Her eyes, closing in resignation, snapped wide open. Shock and confusion swirled in them, asking the question she could not voice.

Why?

I had no reason to answer, and no time.

If I'd had the strength, I would have picked up White Flame from where it had fallen a few steps away. Or pulled another weapon from my Inventory and driven it into her heart.

But damn it, I could barely hold on to consciousness. This was the best attack I had left.

Crack!

Wrinkled skin mottled with age spots tore away. The taste of blood filled my mouth and wet my parched lips.

Of all the attacks I'd made in all the battles I'd fought, this was the most primitive. And I had never needed one to work more badly.

I tore a mouthful from the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's throat.

Then I felt tremendous heat at my back and heard someone scream.

"No—!"

Whoosh! Boom!

A massive impact slammed into me. A roar swallowed the rest of the cry, and terrible heat swept out in every direction. I felt weightless for an instant before it hurled me away.

Ah.

Who was it who said that the worst pain a person could feel was being burned?

They were right.

Pain too awful to scream through seized my entire body. My vision went white. I couldn't see an inch in front of me as I hurtled through the air.

Screeeeeech—boom!

The rushing wind seemed to go on forever. Then something rough and hard struck my whole body.

No. My body had shot through the rubble like a beam of light and buried itself there.

Cough.

With a cough, what little blood I had left trickled from the corner of my mouth.

My eardrums had burst, yet I heard a swarm of bees buzzing in my ears. Through my blurred vision, I could make out the Southern Heaven Demon Empress sprawled on the ground and someone's figure wavering like a heat haze.

"No!"

At that scream—

Ding.

A clear bell rang in my ear, and warmth enveloped me.

Screeeeeech!

Jeok Cheongang raced forward with all his strength, his heart full of despair.

No. No, this can't happen.

Every step felt heavy.

His heart, aged by more than a century, pounded harder than it ever had. His eyes trembled, fixed on the person rapidly drawing closer.

Jin Taekyung.

The second Disciple he had taken in his lifetime, and the only one he had left.

The one ember that had appeared in the life of a man who had wished only for death and shown him a reason to keep living.

But why? Why the hell would he do that?

He felt as though he might cough up blood.

What he had unleashed at the Southern Heaven Demon Empress was the Flame Divine Palm, driven to a staggering twelve-tenths of its normal limit.

And Jin Taekyung had suddenly blocked that horrifying heat, powerful enough to melt steel.

You crazy bastard. You stupid bastard!

Jeok Cheongang did not know why. The reason did not matter. The curses he could not bring himself to shout were meant for himself.

His one and only Disciple had always had a reason for his choices. He had always been right.

It was the grief and guilt of knowing his own hasty judgment had cost Taekyung his life that tore Jeok Cheongang's heart apart.

"No!"

The old master's desperate cry rang out as he finally stopped before his Disciple.

"Taekyung! You bastard!"

There was no answer.

Taekyung lay with his eyes closed, his breathing so faint it could stop at any moment. Jeok Cheongang's heart sank.

Ah.

His vision swam.

Taekyung's armor was shattered beyond recognition. His limbs lay twisted at unnatural angles. Beneath the heat of the Flame Divine Palm, flesh had melted and bone had broken.

Perhaps the armor had saved him. Somehow, he was still breathing.

But only just. He had mere moments left.

Even if Jeok Cheongang poured all his internal energy into him, it would not change that. It would only prolong the pain.

Tap.

His hand stopped in midair, trembling as he reached for Taekyung's wrist to take his pulse.

…Dying? He's dying? That boy?

Unable to watch Taekyung die before his eyes, Jeok Cheongang squeezed his eyes shut.

He had seen countless deaths. Some he had witnessed from afar. Others he had caused with his own hands.

But… Jin Taekyung's death was different.

The boy had barely passed twenty. Unlike Jeok Cheongang, he had so many years left to live, so much happiness still to enjoy.

"What… what could be so urgent that you have to leave already? Why!"

Jeok Cheongang cried out as though the words were tearing blood from him.

He held Jin Taekyung's hand, which had been half melted by his own martial arts. Holding that hand, still bearing the marks of those horrific injuries, he wept his heart out…

Huh?

Something felt strange beneath his fingers. He opened his eyes.

Through his tears, he saw Taekyung's hand.

The back of it was pale and smooth as a newborn baby's. Its veins stood out in thick ridges.

"…?"

That was strange. A moment ago, the flesh had been melted together. He was almost sure he had seen bone.

What the hell?

There were only two possibilities. Either those damned infirmities of old age had returned, or…

Gulp.

Jeok Cheongang swallowed and slowly raised his head.

A pair of eyes was watching him with interest.

“…?”
“…?”
“…!”
“…!”
They stared at each other. Jeok Cheongang froze.
Facing him, Jin Taekyung wiggled his fingers sheepishly.
“Um, could you let go of my hand first? Then we can talk.”

Chapter 711

Sometimes, a certain kind of silence can take the place of countless emotions and words.

Like right now.

“Um, could you let go of my hand first? Then we can talk.”

“…”

Jeok Cheongang did not let go. He did not answer, either. He only stared, his gaze roaming over my face and the rest of me as if he were in a daze.

What the hell? Is this all a dream?

That was what his eyes seemed to say, and I understood completely.

How else could he react?

The guy who had been dying right in front of him was suddenly alive and whole.

Even that prophet from the neighborhood over had wounds on his palms after rising from the dead three days after being nailed to a cross. Five level-ups had left me with the unblemished skin of a baby.

And Jeok Cheongang had watched it happen.

Smack!

A sharp sound rang out.

Jeok Cheongang had slapped himself across the face with all his strength. He blinked at me, then spoke with a grave expression.

“Let me ask you one thing. Am I dreaming?”

I answered carefully. “No.”

“No matter how I think about it, this feels like a dream.”

“Then slap yourself again.”

Smack!

No hesitation, as usual.

He must have hit himself pretty damn hard. Jeok Cheongang spat out a thick mouthful of blood, then took a deep breath.

“…Damn it. Not a dream. Then is this an illusion cast by a Mystic Gate Formation?”

“Uh, I don’t think so. If I were an illusion, whose hand would the Old Master be holding right now?”

“A Dark Heaven sorcerer wearing your likeness. Or the Southern Heaven Demon Empress, if she isn’t dead after all. Whoever it is, they’ll be preparing a One Strike while I’m distracted by the illusion.”

“Quite an imagination you’ve got. Are you going senile?”

“The way you speak certainly sounds like you. Hah. This is driving me mad.”

“It’s driving me mad too.”

I meant it. I had kept the System hidden all this time, and now I had been caught with no way to explain it away.

I sighed and looked at Jeok Cheongang, who still seemed stunned. No matter how many times I looked, I could not get used to his roughly shaved head and worn monk's robe.

"Anyway, what's with that getup?"

"Can't you tell? It's a disguise. I look enough like a monk, don't I?"

"You look like a monk who broke his vows, set fire to a temple, and ran away."

"…You little bastard. Do you think I wanted to dress up as some fake monk? I had to stay out of Dark Heaven's sight. My hair stood out too much, so I shaved it off."

Fair enough. No matter how vast the world was, red hair was rare. He would stand out wherever he went, and word would spread.

But that did not explain everything.

The Blood Monk I had heard about was a terrifying fiend who had single-handedly drenched Guangxi in blood.

"So, to avoid Dark Heaven, you disguised yourself as a monk and beat hundreds of innocent Murim practitioners to death?"

"What those bastards were doing was—what?"

Jeok Cheongang's brow furrowed as he tried to continue.

"Innocent Murim practitioners? What nonsense is that?"

"…?"

"I did draw attention in Guangxi, though I never meant to. Some unorthodox faction scum were taking advantage of the chaos to get up to all sorts of vile things, so I dealt with them."

"Unorthodox faction? Did you just say unorthodox faction?"

"Yes. They were committing atrocities and making them look like Dark Heaven's work. I went after them and smashed about six of their sects. The rest of the small fry scattered."

"…!"

I listened with my mouth open. At last, the pieces fell into place.

That Murim practitioner who fled Guangxi.

The man who had supposedly caught an endemic disease and died as soon as he entered Nanman had actually been unorthodox faction small fry fleeing Jeok Cheongang's fiery fists.

Crayfish side with crabs, and people know how to read the room.

Nanman already shunned outsiders. There was no way those people could admit that they were bad guys, and in the process, the unorthodox practitioners killed by Jeok Cheongang had been transformed into righteous heroes who loved justice and peace.

A story like that could take hold because Nanman was so isolated from the outside world.

How the fuck did that happen?

I stared at Jeok Cheongang. Then another thought struck me, and I spoke up quickly.

"Then on your way here, did you happen to—"

"I don't know who you're asking about, but I met them all. The river bandits diving around in the Yangtze. The Nanman people who greeted me with spears and swords. Even your subordinates."

"Oh."

"The Escort King's granddaughter told me you were in danger the moment she saw me. That Hyuk fellow grabbed my trouser leg and sobbed so hard I nearly broke his wrist."

I could picture them from his words alone—how desperate they must have been.

And I could picture Jeok Cheongang racing here the moment he heard I was in danger, without a question or a moment's hesitation.

"But why are we talking about them? I'm the one owed an explanation."

He made a show of scowling. I found myself laughing.

"…You're laughing?"

The disbelief on his face only made me smile wider.

"Of course I am. We're both alive, and we've found each other again."

"…!"

"I'm sorry. And thank you. I know you have a lot of questions. I'll explain everything later. I promise."

Jeok Cheongang looked as though he had plenty to say, but when he answered, his voice was subdued.

"You damn brat."

There was so much in those three words. For a moment, it almost sounded as though he were thanking me for staying alive. Between us, that was enough.

"Stop smiling. I'll get attached."

"For someone who supposedly isn't attached, you were crying pretty bitterly. Of course, I'm not talking about you, Old Master."

"…Shut that mouth of yours."

He must have remembered what he had been doing a moment ago. Still huffing, he took my hand and pulled me to my feet.

Pat, pat.

The dust and stone grit covering my entire body fell away. The pain had been gone for a long time, but my vision blurred for a moment.

Hmm.

I held back a groan. Five level-ups had healed my body, and it moved exactly as I wanted. My mind was another matter. Battle after battle without a moment's rest had left me exhausted.

Ah, I want to sleep.

I wanted to collapse where I stood. To sleep until my body and mind felt refreshed, then wake to a clear sky and spend the day slowly shaking off the drowsiness.

But… not yet.

Dark clouds still filled the sky. All around us, people lay groaning, some lightly wounded, others gravely hurt.

If we left them there, they would fall asleep and never wake again.

Jeok Cheongang finally looked around. His expression darkened.

"…I should have been faster."

It was pointless regret and needless self-reproach. If Jeok Cheongang hadn't come, all of us—including me—might have been buried here.

"Let's hurry. Before it gets any later."

I nodded and chose the quickest, most accurate way to find the survivors.

Activate Skill: Qi Sense.

Ding.

Along with the clear ringing of a bell announcing that the System had activated, a blue circle spread outward from me and enclosed a set area. At the same time, Level display windows rose here and there, and my chest tightened.

Too few.

I could see only about thirty Level display windows.

That meant the Nanman warriors, once nearly a thousand strong, and the three hundred members of the Baekcheon Unit had fallen here.

There was one small mercy: those still breathing did not seem to be in critical condition.

By the end, even the Southern Heaven Demon Empress must have been conserving every scrap of strength.

The thought weighed on me as I rushed to the nearest fallen man.

Wang Ho, Commander of the Baekcheon Unit.

I grasped the wrist of the man who had charged at the Southern Heaven Demon Empress until the final moment, then sent internal energy through his back and along his spine with my other hand.

Ssshhhhhh.

"C-cough."

Wang Ho spat out a mouthful of dark blood. Color began to return to his pale face.

He had been struck particularly hard because he had fought the fiercest battle among the Baekcheon Unit, but this should let us breathe a little easier.

Others were plainly in far worse shape.

Hhh… hhh…

A thin breath escaped through the nose of a giant who had collapsed on his knees. Jeok Cheongang recognized him and let out a low groan.

"…He took a hell of a hit. He wasn't wounded this badly even during the Great Faction War."

The Southern Heaven Demon Empress's One Strike, launched at the cost of her own life, had been that devastating.

Countless sword fragments and pieces of debris were lodged deep throughout his body. The Beast Miao King had also suffered massive internal injuries while protecting me, leaving him unconscious. The sight of him was awful.

"Old Master, do you think—"

Jeok Cheongang heard the worry in my voice and shook his head before I could finish.

"The Beast Miao King is as tough as iron, so don't worry. If this old man does his best, he should be able to survive. But…"

His words trailed off. The certainty in his voice faded as he looked toward the enormous White Tiger lying a few steps away.

"I don't know about that beast. It seems extraordinary, even for an animal, but must it be saved?"

Yes. No matter what it takes.

Before I could say it aloud, a quiet thought reached us.

—If that is how it ends, then that too is my fate.

"…!"

—You have lived a long time, old human. Your face is different from the one I saw in the imugi's[3014] memories, but what you are has not changed.

Jeok Cheongang's eyes widened. The guardian spirit turned its gaze from him to me.

—Come closer.

I bit my lip and went to it. I sat beside its head and stroked the back of its neck, soaked with blood. A low growl escaped it.

—How insolent. How dare you lay a hand on this body?

What could I say?

As I silently stroked only its neck, the guardian spirit sent another thought to me.

—Though I cannot say I dislike it. There was an impudent human much like you, long ago.

I thought I knew who it meant.

[3014] In Korean folklore, an imugi is a serpent-like being associated with dragons.

The first Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace. The only human the guardian spirit had ever opened its heart to in all its long life.

—Strange, isn't it? Everything about you is different, yet you remind me of him. He returned to the earth hundreds of years ago.

"…!"

—Perhaps that is why I saved you without thinking. Why I entrusted the sacred stone to a mere human.

The White Tiger's enormous body heaved beneath my hand. Breathing raggedly, the guardian spirit lifted its blue-white eyes to mine.

At that moment, I understood instinctively.

Why it needed the sacred stone. What it meant to do with it.

The rift.

The guardian spirit was trying to close that dense darkness—the rift—all by itself.

Just as an imugi[3015] had done several months ago.

[3015] In Korean folklore, an imugi is a serpent-like being associated with dragons.

Chapter 712

I hoped I was wrong.

I wanted the thought that had just occurred to me—my suspicion—to be completely unfounded.

But the guardian spirit's thoughts reached me the next moment, and I knew it was true.

—Someone has to do it. Perhaps this is the fate I was given.

Just as I had understood what the guardian spirit intended, it had understood me.

My face was reflected in its clear blue-white eyes. They seemed to see through everything.

—Until that darkness… that thing you call a rift is gone, this will not end. No, it will be the beginning of another catastrophe.

I couldn't deny it. After a desperate struggle, we had defeated the Southern Heaven Demon Empress and her subordinates. But the rift they had opened remained, consuming the space around it.

Even now.

Ssshhhhhh.

The darkness had already passed beyond the Inner Palace and was advancing toward the Outer Palace.

The demonic qi within it would corrupt living things, transform them into beings that had lost their reason, and bring about another disaster.

Basically, an army of monsters.

The rift reminded me of a Gate, but I had no way of knowing how far its power would reach.

If the demonic qi flowing from it could swallow Nanman—or more—then the darkness would keep spreading.

Beyond Nanman, until it consumed all under heaven.

—Human. You have likely guessed that only the sacred stone's power can withstand that darkness. Someone must enter the center of the rift with the stone and endure it.

I knew that, too. Only a few months ago, the Water God Dragon had sacrificed itself to seal the rift.

And I knew the price it had paid.

"What if you become something different from what you've been until now?"

I couldn't bring myself to say a mutant. The guardian spirit gave me a faint smile.

—Kill me. Without the slightest hesitation.

"…!"

—With your strength and that old human's, it shouldn't be too difficult, even if I become a corrupted being.

I stared at the guardian spirit, then forced myself to speak. I had been holding on to this thought since the moment I understood its intentions. After turning it over for so long, I finally asked.

"What if I seal the rift myself?"

The answer came from someone else.

"Don't be ridiculous!"

It was Jeok Cheongang's shout. He had been tending to the Beast Miao King's Internal Injury.

"Out of the question. Say whatever you like. This old man will not allow it."

"But, Old Master—"

"I don't want to hear it. I don't care how much you've accomplished. We have no idea what might happen in there. How could I let you go?"

"I'll come back safe and sound without so much as a hair out of place. I promise."

"Without so much as a hair out of place?"

"Yes."

I nodded. Jeok Cheongang watched me in silence, then spoke.

"If that's what you want, fine."

"Then—"

"You stay here. This old man will go."

"…!"

"If you can return without a scratch, then it would be even more certain if I went instead. Am I wrong?"

That hit the heart of it. I had no answer.

The guardian spirit's thoughts rang out.

—Old human. If the darkness changes that young human into something else, what will you do?

"I'll kill the boy. So he can find peace."

Jeok Cheongang answered without hesitation. His voice dropped.

"And then this old man will choose death as well."

—Young human. What would you do if it were the other way around?

I said nothing. The guardian spirit understood my silence and smiled.

—Yes. That is why I must go.

"…"

—The humans of this land have already shed enough blood. There is no reason for you and that old human to sacrifice yourselves in my place. You still have many fates ahead of you, while I have already passed through many fates.

The guardian spirit raised its blue-white eyes to Jeok Cheongang.

—Even if the situation becomes irreversible, do not hesitate to kill me.

Jeok Cheongang gave a small nod.

“I’ll give it everything I have.”

—Thank you.

Grrr. The guardian spirit drew a labored breath and opened its mouth toward me.

—Jin Taekyung. It is time.

What more could I say?

I slipped a hand inside my robes and murmured inwardly.

Inventory open. Summon.

The next moment, something giving off a faint, warm light rested on my palm. I held it out to the guardian spirit.

Jeok Cheongang felt its mysterious energy and murmured, almost groaning.

“Could that be…?”

—This sacred stone, which you humans call the Beast King Stone, was the one mission I had left. The reason I existed. And now we will be together until the end.

Ssshhhh.

The sacred stone rose slowly into the air and was drawn into the guardian spirit’s mouth.

Warmth spread outward with its faint radiance.

At the same time, the guardian spirit’s ragged breathing steadied. Strength began to return to its fallen body.

Rustle. Thud.

At last, the enormous White Tiger rose and set a blood-soaked forepaw on the ground.

Thud. Thud.

One step. Then another.

Each step was heavier than ever, yet nothing could stop it.

Not even the darkness, now incomparably denser and stickier than at first, could stop them.

Kraaaash!

Pools of blood lay everywhere, with countless corpses scattered among them. The darkness surged over them like a wave, only to strike the light surrounding the guardian spirit and fall back.

If the darkness flowing from the rift corrupted everything, then the light contained within the sacred stone possessed the power of purification.

—Kraaaaang!

A fierce roar shook heaven and earth. Its silver mane, stained red, whipped violently in the wind.

Before I knew it, the guardian spirit had become a gust of wind and was racing forward.

Shweeeek!

I watched its back as it shot through the darkness.

I watched that faint but unmistakable streak of light cross countless corpses and piles of rubble.

I watched it race across the vast expanse until it reached the cliff swallowed by pitch-black darkness.

And then I realized something.

At the very end, the guardian spirit had called me by name for the first time.

The guardian spirit was out of breath. Its blood-drenched body felt heavy, and the darkness all around constricted it from head to toe.

Imugi. Did you feel this way, too?

With that unheard question, the guardian spirit took a step with all its strength into the gaping fissure in the cliff.

It had to keep going, however hard it was.

It had not known before. Now it did.

This had been its one mission from the beginning. The guardian spirit was meant to protect not the sacred stone, but everything in this land.

Crunch.

Its paw sank deep into the ground beneath the weight of its next step. The closer it came to the center of the rift, the harder the darkness and demonic qi pressed down on its body.

As its consciousness dimmed, memories of the distant past flashed before its blue-white eyes.

Come to think of it, I was always alone.

It had no father, mother, or siblings.

No. At first, it had not even known such things existed.

To one small, pure-white White Tiger, this space it had seen from the moment it first opened its eyes was the world itself. And it had a friend who had always been there with it.

A friend it could neither play with nor speak to, but who had never left its side.

Tap.

Something touched its soft white forepaw, which was like a ball of cotton.

It was a stone so clear that crystal would have been a better name for it. As always, it was warm and comforting.

Grrr.

The young White Tiger let out a contented growl and soon fell asleep, breathing softly.

And at the feet of the sleeping White Tiger, on a hill drenched in warm light that was neither sunlight nor moonlight, a green sprout suddenly pushed its head above the ground.

Rustle. Tap.

The sprout, no larger than a fingernail, began to straighten its bent stem. Colorful buds appeared, and branches grew.

Before long, a giant tree stood where the sprout had been, its roots sunk deep into the earth. Leaves hung from its countless branches, casting a broad, cool shade.

Ssshhhh.

A wind blew from somewhere, stirring the tree's full crown.

A leaf that had clung stubbornly to its branch finally broke free and fell into the shade.

At the soft tap of its landing, the creature napping beneath the tree opened its eyes.

—Grrr.

It rose with a low growl.

It was a White Tiger.

Far too enormous and powerful to be called a cub—or even an ordinary tiger—it looked around with blue-white eyes.

No one knew exactly how much time had passed.

Only that it had been a long time. The place where it had been born and raised was always peaceful, and it was always day.

But things had changed.

Change as certain as the sprout growing into a giant tree, or the small, soft White Tiger cub becoming a huge and powerful being.

Yes. Him.

It had first met him three hundred years ago. He was a tribal chieftain who led humans and possessed a mysterious power that drew beasts to him. For someone built like a bear, he smiled an awful lot.

That power was probably why the beasts of the Sacred Land had accepted him without the guardian spirit's permission.

"Oh. I've never seen a White Tiger this big before. What's your name?"

At first, the guardian spirit had been surprised that a human had entered the Sacred Land without its permission. Then the human bastard had stroked the back of its neck without a trace of fear, leaving it dumbfounded.

So it asked him a question.

“And what is your name?”

It could still picture the insolent human bastard’s face. He had gaped at the guardian spirit, then answered in a dazed voice.

“Yayul Cheon…”

“I do not know how you entered this place, but if I see you here again, I will tear you limb from limb and kill you. Do you understand?”

The next day, the guardian spirit realized something.

That young human bastard named Yayul Cheon had less fear than any living creature it had ever seen.

“I believe I told you not to let yourself be seen.”

“That’s why I hid.”

“…Are you joking with me right now?”

“You found me by smell. You didn’t see me. I’m lying facedown in the grass.”

“No, is that supposed to be an answer? …Wait. What is that smell?”

“Grilled meat. I brought some in case you were hungry. Want some?”

“Meat? Did you hunt the beasts?”

“…”

The guardian spirit could not say how they had grown close. Like getting soaked in a light rain without noticing, they came to know each other little by little. The years passed quickly.

Ten years. Twenty years. And then, the day they last faced each other.

“It’s been a long time.”

Yayul Cheon had not visited for several years. He was no longer a young man.

His once-black hair was half gray, and his eyes were worn with fatigue.

“I need your help. Only with your power and the sacred stone’s can we win this war and restore peace to Nanman.”

The guardian spirit knew what kind of war he was fighting. It knew how evil their enemies were.

But it refused.

The sacred stone—and the guardian spirit itself—were merely observers. That was what it believed then.

At least, it had believed it then.

And regret always came too late.

If I had helped you then, would the fate of this land have changed?

The guardian spirit’s blue-white eyes cleared as it came back from its memories.

Turbulent darkness churned before it, writhing strangely and spewing demonic qi as though it would swallow everything.

Ssssss!

Within the warped space, the guardian spirit struggled through one final step and stared into the center of the rift.

Then it hurled its faintly glowing body forward with all the strength it had left.

—Kraaaaang!

A single roar rang out, and an enormous wave of force burst outward.

Chapter 713

The wait was short.

I had gathered the survivors in one place, and with Jeok Cheongang's help, the Beast Miao King had just managed to open his eyes.

Crack. Crack-crack.

The change began.

I felt it. So did Jeok Cheongang. Even the Baekcheon Unit warriors, still far from recovered, and the Beast Miao King, who had only just regained consciousness, felt the tremor.

Whoooosh.

Space twisted. The darkness that had writhed as though it were alive went still, and the wind began to flow in one direction.

Toward the gap in the cliff, its enormous jaws open like some primordial beast, beyond the thick darkness that had swallowed the guardian spirit.

At the same time, I could clearly see and hear it.

—Kraaaaang!

A roar echoed outward, and a single streak of light grew brighter within the darkness.

This is…

I stared at it in disbelief. So did everyone else.

The injured survivors forgot even to groan. The Beast Miao King, barely conscious, reached toward the distant light with a dazed look on his face.

It carried qi warmer than sunlight and as clear as water.

Silence fell, as though the world had stopped. Then Jeok Cheongang's low voice reached my ears.

"It's coming."

"…!"

With those words, time began to move again.

Rumble. Boom!

An enormous explosion.

Everything drew together, then burst outward at once. A deafening roar filled my ears as an invisible shock wave swept toward us, broad as a road.

I heard Jeok Cheongang shout through the gale.

"Watch out—!"

Kuwaaaang!

The wind—no, the storm—swallowed his voice.

A distant flash of darkness and light mixed together, blocking my vision, while the enormous shock wave battered and flung away everything within its range.

But—

Now.

I brought White Flame down in a diagonal slash.

Hellfire surged along its transparent spearhead and burned through the wind. The flames found their way into the invisible grain of the shock wave and struck it.

No. They canceled it out.

Kuwaaaang! Crack!

The earth shook with a deafening roar. The impact was powerful enough to push back both of my firmly rooted legs.

Jeok Cheongang had stepped forward to protect the survivors too. He flicked both sleeves.

Fwoosh. Boom!

The Blazing Flame Divine Palm, brought to perfection.

Unlike mine, his two fully formed fire dragons rampaged through the air, tearing into the storm. Flames rose across a radius of dozens of jang[3016], consuming the wind and reducing to ash the countless fragments of debris hurled at us like hidden weapons.

Ssszzzzzt!

Smoke and steam filled every direction. In a world dyed entirely pale white, I exhaled the breath I had been holding and reached out.

Boom!

Compressed air burst outward, driving the smoke and steam away.

And beyond the vision that slowly cleared, the darkness was dispersing, while a collapse that had only just begun awaited us all.

Rumble. Rumble-rumble!

The cliff was coming down. All two hundred jang[3017] of it.

Jagged rocks, great and small, poured from above and filled the sky. It was a terrifying sight, but sunlight had begun to break through above them.

That could mean only one thing.

The rift… closed.

It was over.

The long, fierce battle had finally ended. We had stopped a catastrophe that might have claimed hundreds of thousands of lives. Perhaps millions.

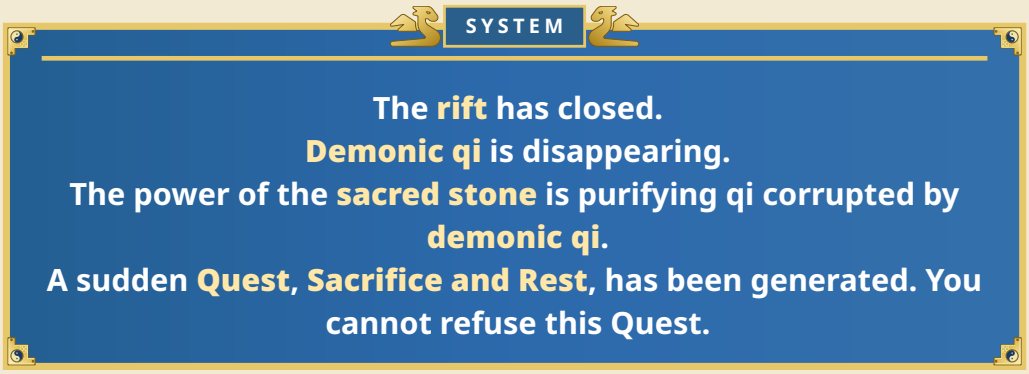
Why was the emptiness greater than the joy?

Perhaps because I knew better than anyone that something remained unfinished.

[3016] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten ja, approximately 3.03 meters or 9.94 feet.

[3017] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten ja, approximately 3.03 meters or 9.94 feet.

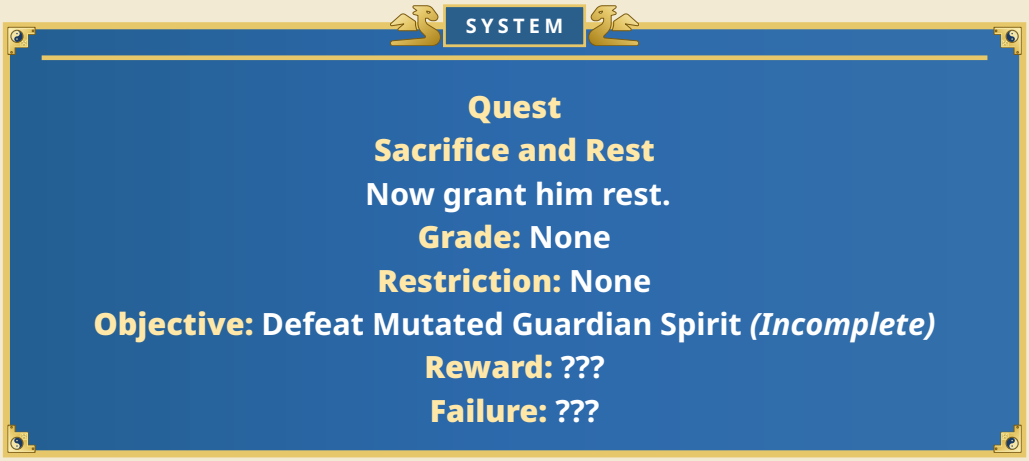
Ding.



As the System notification reached my ears, I suddenly reached out.

The darkness that had writhed painfully in the air like a living creature scattered between my fingers.

The sunlight shining through the slowly dispersing storm clouds was warm. Floating above it was a translucent holographic window displaying only a few short lines.



This was a first.

Never had a Quest description been so short. Nor had its restriction, which usually bore the three characters of my name, been open to anyone at all.

Perhaps even the System knew what he had sacrificed.

A being worthy of the name divine beast had given himself up and become a corrupted guardian spirit.

Step.

I walked through the darkness as it broke apart and blew away with the ash. Jeok Cheongang followed quietly. Among the countless rocks still crashing down, I sensed someone's presence.

I saw it.

SYSTEM

Lv. 155 Mutated Guardian Spirit

The fur that had shone silver even in darkness was black now. So were the blue-white eyes that had once been as clear as the pond in the Sacred Land.

Fangs twice their former length gleamed at us.

—Grrrrr.

A low, savage growl. Then he moved like a flash of light.

Whoosh!

His form blurred, and the ten-odd jang[3018] between us vanished. His blood-soaked forepaw struck the ground, launching his enormous body into the air.

Pop.

A shadow fell over our heads. Jeok Cheongang and I struck with all our strength, remembering what the guardian spirit had asked of us before he left.

Kill me. Without the slightest hesitation.

We kept our promise.

Whoosh. Slash!

It was somewhere deep and cold. No light reached it. Not even the faintest warmth.

He lay curled up there, sensing death approaching—or perhaps it had already come.

Then he felt warmth and opened his eyes.

No. It was not warmth. It was heat.

Through his blurred vision, he made out a familiar face.

“Jin Tae… kyung.”

His voice came out cracked.

The young man watching Baeksang open his eyes answered evenly.

“Yes.”

That one word told Baeksang it was all over. Or perhaps it was the sunlight falling over Jin Taekyung’s shoulder.

So this is how it ended.

Baeksang looked up at the blue sky, clear of storm clouds.

How strange. He had lost everything he had wanted, yet he felt no despair. Only emptiness.

[3018] A jang is a traditional unit of length equal to ten ja, approximately 3.03 meters or 9.94 feet.

“What happened to the Southern Heaven Demon Empress?”

“She’s dead.”

“The rift must have disappeared as well.”

“…Yes.”

There was a hesitation in Jin Taekyung’s voice. He turned his head, his gaze resting briefly on the enormous tiger lying nearby.

But Baeksang saw the countless bodies of beasts and humans scattered all around them.

“Let me ask you one thing,” Jin Taekyung said, his voice low. “Did you know from the beginning that it would come to this?”

Baeksang stared at the bodies with empty eyes.

“Yes. I knew.”

“…!”

Jin Taekyung clenched his teeth and glared at Baeksang. Baeksang did not avoid the gaze, where flames seemed to pour down in streams.

“To be precise, I learned a few months ago, when a letter arrived from the Central Plains.”

It had come from Henan. Along with an invitation to join the soon-to-be-established Murim Alliance, it contained a detailed account of the events in Hubei.

“That was when I understood why Dark Heaven had reached into Nanman, in the Outer Lands, instead of the Central Plains. I understood what the Southern Heaven Demon Empress meant by her grand plan.”

“And knowing that, you still…”

“Followed orders. I was already a monster, not a man.”

People said ten years could change the mountains and rivers. Sometimes an earthquake brought a mountain down, or a flood forced a river into a new course.

Baeksang had spent more than forty years amid earthquakes and floods of his own, losing his heart little by little. He had lost his only child, and he wanted revenge on the people of the Central Plains who had caused that loss.

But there was more to it.

“After the Great Faction War, I hated the Demonic Path more than anyone. If the Central Plains saw me as a turncoat they could never forgive, then those bastards were enemies I had to kill.”

Jin Taekyung gave a hollow laugh.

Dark Heaven and the Demonic Cult were branches of the same tree, growing from one root. If Baeksang hated the Demonic Path, how could he have joined forces with the Dark Heaven that had killed his child?

Yet he had joined hands with the Southern Heaven Demon Empress and brought about this catastrophe. He had let Dark Heaven open the rift. Knowing how many would die, he had still ordered a general mobilization and brought nearly ten thousand warriors and beasts into the Inner Palace.

To offer them up as living sacrifices.

“You stupid fuck. How can you even say—”

For some reason, Jin Taekyung’s words suddenly trailed off.

Baeksang moved his bloodstained lips.

“Yes. There was something more important to me than hatred. More important than anything.”

At that moment, someone’s face flashed through Jin Taekyung’s mind. He understood why the eyes above that mask had seemed so familiar.

“…Baekhwi.”

It was not Jin Taekyung who had spoken.

Baeksang raised his unfocused eyes toward a figure approaching from the distance. A huge man stumbled closer. Despite Jeok Cheongang’s attempts to stop him, the Beast Miao King came to stand before Baeksang.

“That child,” he asked, the words almost a groan. “Was he alive?”

Baeksang nodded weakly.

That was answer enough. The Beast Miao King knew what the child meant to Baeksang. He knew what his sworn younger brother would do for his only child.

It made him grieve—and it made him furious.

“Why? Why didn’t you tell me? Why?”

“I didn’t want the Palace Lord… I didn’t want you to die, hyung[3019].”

“…!”

“And Hwi… that child. I would have lost him all over again.”

Old memories passed through Baeksang’s eyes.

The day he first faced the darkness, he had rejected the Southern Heaven Demon Empress’s offer outright. Then she told him that the child he believed the Great Snow Fiend had killed was alive.

“I accepted her offer. I believed her promise that she would let Hwi live once the grand plan was complete.”

He had believed her. No—he had been forced to push down his distrust. It was the only way he could see his child again.

Whenever his resolve wavered after that, he went to the Southern Heaven Demon Empress to look upon his child’s face. Dark Heaven’s sorcerers had kept Hwi alive, sunk in a deep sleep.

“But I knew what I was doing. I knew how many people my choice would kill.”

That was why he had created the Baekcheon Unit.

[3019] Hyung is a Korean form of address a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he has a close bond.

Not for himself, but for someone else—for the hope that he would stop this catastrophe.

"I couldn't do that myself."

A child might kill a parent, but no parent could kill their child.

Baeksang was a father. Even if he went back to that moment dozens of times—hundreds—he would make the same choice.

Cough.

Baeksang spat up blood and lifted his blurred eyes toward the Beast Miao King.

A memory passed through them: the saddest and happiest day of his life.

Yes. That day.

Baeksang had wept on the day he lost his beloved wife and gained the child he would come to love more than anyone. He had sat across from his only sworn elder brother and drunk fruit wine as though it were his last day alive.

Just as he had decades later, on the day the Southern Heaven Demon Empress came to him.

"I have one last request."

Baeksang gave a faint smile.

"Please kill me, hyung[3020]."

[3020] Hyung is a Korean form of address a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he has a close bond.

Chapter 714

"Please kill me, hyung[3021]."

The moment he heard those words, the Beast Miao King closed his eyes without realizing it.

His chest ached. He could barely breathe. The request his only sworn younger brother had made after so many years cut deep, like a sharp blade.

Hyung[3022]. He called me hyung[3023].

He had wanted to hear that word for so long. Now he wanted to cover his ears.

He would rather be a fool who had seen and heard none of this. Even an incompetent Palace Lord, if it meant he could escape this moment.

If only he could.

"This brings back old memories."

The Beast Miao King opened his eyes at the quiet voice. Baeksang's face, wearing a faint smile, was reflected in his eyes.

"We were young back then. I wanted to become Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace someday, and I was desperate to beat you."

"…Yes. You were."

They had been little more than boys.

Baeksang had seen the Beast Miao King, several years his senior, as a rival. To the Beast Miao King, Baeksang had simply been adorable. Born an only child, he had never had a sibling.

"But I never caught up to you. Whenever I thought I was getting close, you were already far ahead again."

"That was because you were younger than me. If we had been the same age…"

"It wouldn't have changed anything. We were born with different potential."

But Baeksang had not given up. Every day, he challenged the Beast Miao King to a duel. Every day, he lost. And the next day, he came back as though nothing had happened.

"Then one day, I realized that idiot who stood two heads taller than me wasn't so bad after all."

Baeksang could still picture the big boy pulling him to his feet and brushing the dust from his clothes after a fall.

[3021] Hyung is a Korean form of address used by a younger man for an older brother or a close older male.

[3022] Hyung is a Korean form of address used by a younger man for an older brother or a close older male.

[3023] Hyung is a Korean form of address used by a younger man for an older brother or a close older male.

And the shadow of someone quietly leaving medicinal herbs outside his quarters whenever he was sick.

“So I challenged you to one last duel.”

The result was no different that day.

Baeksang fought harder than he ever had—and lost.

If that had been the end of it, the day would have been like any other. But this time, he did not push away the hand that helped him up. He did not stalk back to his quarters, huffing in anger.

Instead, he produced two bottles of fruit wine he had stolen from somewhere and muttered as though to himself.

“I’ve got wine, but no one to drink it with. Come along if you want.”

At the Beast Miao King’s quiet voice, Baeksang’s eyes widened for a moment. Then he coughed up blood and laughed.

“Cough. You still remember that?”

“How could I forget? You’re the only twelve-year-old brat I’ve ever known who’d say something so cheeky.”

“Then you must remember how I emptied both bottles myself.”

“Both bottles?”

The Beast Miao King could not help laughing. Moisture had gathered at the corners of his crescent-shaped eyes.

“Well, I vividly remember the little brat who collapsed before he had even finished a single cup. I also remember what you said while looking at me with those unfocused eyes.”

Baeksang nodded weakly, his unfocused gaze reaching back into the past.

“I said I’d be content to become Great Chieftain, so you should become a great Palace Lord. I couldn’t have said that to you sober. That’s why I drank.”

“And what you said after that? Did you need to be drunk for that too?”

“Of course not.”

Baeksang continued in a quiet voice.

“You were… simply my hyung[3024]. Perhaps you had been since the day we met.”

The two boys had tasted alcohol for the first time, then collapsed and fallen asleep. When they opened their eyes the next morning in an old shrine, they had become sworn brothers closer than anyone else.

In the mountains. In the fields. By rivers and in marshes.

They were together on the battlefield too.

Until a terrible fate tore them apart.

[3024] Hyung is a Korean form of address used by a younger man for an older brother or a close older male.

"Hyung[3025]."

"…"

"The day we became sworn brothers, you made me a vow. You said you'd become a better Palace Lord than anyone. That you'd put Nanman above all else and fight for the people of this land."

"Enough. Stop."

The Beast Miao King already knew why Baeksang had brought up these memories. He knew what Baeksang meant to say.

"Do I truly have to… kill you with my own hands?"

Baeksang gave a small nod.

"Far too much blood has already been spilled. Everything happened because of my misguided choices."

The traitor who had betrayed Nanman and its countless tribespeople had to be executed. That was a duty the Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace had to carry out himself—the only way to keep the vow he had made in the old shrine.

"You vowed to become a better Palace Lord than anyone."

With effort, Baeksang raised a hand and pointed behind the Beast Miao King, who stood as rigid as a statue.

His trembling finger indicated the countless tribespeople and warriors making their way over the rubble into the Inner Palace.

"Everyone is watching. You and me. All of us."

It was true.

The people constantly pouring into the Inner Palace had learned that the catastrophe was over and cheered. Then they were horrified by the sight that unfolded before their eyes. Finally, they fell silent at the sight of their returning Palace Lord and the traitor collapsed before him.

No. Not silent.

Furious.

"I can feel their anger. It's aimed at me."

This was the moment Baeksang had feared most—and wanted more than anything.

If this moment had come, someone had stopped him. Dark Heaven and the Southern Heaven Demon Empress's grand plan had failed.

That was why he could laugh aloud. Why he could haul his dying body upright, wring out the last of his strength, and shout.

"Remember this!"

[3025] Hyung is a Korean form of address used by a younger man for an older brother or a close older male.

His eyes were dim, as though their light might go out at any moment. But his voice rang through the Inner Palace, clear enough for everyone to hear.

“Though the grand plan has failed, the day will surely come when Dark Heaven’s sky devours Nanman!”

“…!”

The cry carried over heaps of rubble and corpses to reach every ear.

Blood burst between Baeksang’s teeth with each syllable. Strength drained from his body. Still, he did not stop. He could not.

He was the traitor who had betrayed them all and brought about this catastrophe.

A man guilty of an unforgivable crime had to die a criminal, without sympathy or an explanation for what he had done.

That was… the last thing Baeksang could do.

“That day, which will come before long…!”

He swallowed the blood rising in his throat, clenched his teeth, and shouted on.

“Those contemptible Han Chinese bastards of the Central Plains, and you utterly primitive people of Nanman, will all kneel and submit at the feet of the great Lord of Heaven!”

Baeksang’s bloodstained lips spread into a bright smile.

At that moment, no one was a more loyal servant of the Lord of Heaven, a more faithful dog of Dark Heaven.

And his sworn elder brother had only one choice.

Crack!

A fist shot through the air, crushing flesh and shattering bone.

The single punch buried deep in Baeksang’s chest carried green Force, like the broad fields where they had rolled around together as children.

Thank you, hyung[3026].

You became a truly great Palace Lord, just as you promised.

Along with a murmur no one could hear, Baeksang stared at the face of one person visible beyond his fading field of vision.

But why…?

Why are you crying?

The great Palace Lord who had executed a traitor and stopped a catastrophe was weeping bitterly, like a child who had lost something precious.

Then he shouted, almost howling.

“I have executed Baeksang, the traitor who joined forces with Dark Heaven!”

The people’s cheers reached Baeksang faintly. His head fell back, and he looked up at the sky.

[3026] Hyung is a Korean form of address used by a younger man for an older brother or a close older male.

Clear and blue.

The world was no longer dark.

Isn't that right, Hwi?

He thought of the son who had lost his reason and driven a sword into his father's chest, and of the child already waiting for him in another world, smiling brightly.

Baeksang smiled in peace.

Thud.

His strength left him, and his body collapsed.

The world remained bright. The people went on cheering.

And in place of his sworn elder brother, who was not even allowed to wail, someone closed Baeksang's eyes.

"…Fuck. What the hell are you smiling about? It's not like you did anything right."

Jin Taekyung muttered to himself, then suddenly looked down at the old thing clenched in his hand.

He didn't know. Baeksang deserved to die. He was a bad man who had done terrible things. So why did Jin feel so damn awful? Why had he brought this?

Damn it.

Along with the curses that never left his mouth, Jin Taekyung covered Baeksang's face with the object in his hand.

Baekcheon.

The old silk, bearing someone's years and hopes, fluttered in a cool breeze from somewhere.

Through the endless cheers came voices, faint as echoes.

"Captain!"

"Pavilion Master—no, Young Master Jin!"

"Taishan is here! Taishan is sorry he's late!"

"Hey, you bastard! Are you alive?"

Am I hearing things?

Jin Taekyung turned. He stared blankly at the familiar faces drawing closer, then finally let out a quiet laugh.

And collapsed.

I had a very long dream.

A terrible nightmare.

Even in my sleep, I was fighting for my life. In the modern world, I fought monsters. In Murim, I fought Dark Heaven.

Then, after I defeated the Southern Heaven Demon Empress in a brutal fight—just as I had in real life—some masked bastard appeared and said:

"You defeated the Western Heaven Demon Lord and even the Southern Heaven Demon Empress. Not bad."

I was wondering what hole this bastard had crawled out of when he went on.

"But the Western Heaven Demon Lord and the Southern Heaven Demon Empress were merely the weakest of our Eight Great Heavenly Kings."

"…?"

"I am the Eastern Heaven Demon Lord, who commands the east. Directly beneath me in rank is the East-West Heaven Demon Empress, who commands the east and west."

No, fuck this. Four directions were plenty. What the hell is an East-West Heaven Demon Empress?

He'd taken the bit so far I had nothing to say.

At this rate, I feared that even if I returned to the modern world, I might find the Dongducheon Demon Lord or the Incheon Demon Empress waiting for me.

But what else could I do? I didn't know I was dreaming, so I fought like hell.

With every step I took toward him, people I had killed—or failed to save—appeared and blocked my path.

"Just a little more. Just a little farther…"

"If you'd moved faster, we could have lived."

"We could have gone home to our families."

"Why do you get to live when we had to die?"

"Why? Why? Why?"

I had no answer. I stopped moving, and they sank their teeth into my torso.

Slowly. Relentlessly.

I could only stand there, frozen like a statue, because I recognized a face among the mutants.

"I cared for you more than anyone, but in the end, you couldn't save me."

A face that couldn't be among them. That mustn't be.

Jeok Cheongang.

He came toward me with both arms gone and a gaping hole in the middle of his chest. Then he sank his teeth into the back of my neck.

As he greedily swallowed flesh and blood, he whispered in my ear.

"But when is this infuriating bastard supposed to wake up?"

And at that moment, my eyes flew open.

"…!"

A strong, unfamiliar smell hung in the air. Above me was a ceiling I didn't recognize.

I blinked blankly, slowly becoming aware of reality. Then a familiar voice pierced my ears.

“Come clean now, and I’ll let you off with a little singeing. You’re a quack, aren’t you?”

“N-no, sir.”

“The child hasn’t woken up for seven days and nights. Does that make any sense? Go get the Beast Miao King.”

“Gasp. Th-that’s…”

“I said bring Yayul Cheok here!”

I turned toward the booming voice. Jeok Cheongang had a physician by the collar and was shaking him violently.

Chapter 715

The room smelled of medicinal herbs. A middle-aged man stood trembling with a long acupuncture needle in his hand while Jeok Cheongang held him by the collar.

I can see where this is going. Oh, I can see it.

I had only just woken up, but the situation was easy enough to grasp. The man, who looked like a physician, spotted me blinking over Jeok Cheongang's shoulder and shouted.

"Ah! Ahhh! He's awake! He's awake!"

"…"

Even my mother wouldn't have been that happy to see me wake up.

I guarantee it. That wasn't the joy of a physician whose patient had recovered. It was the relief of a victim spotting the police while facing a serial killer.

Jeok Cheongang let go of the physician's collar without a fuss and turned to look at me.

He said nothing, even after the physician hurried out. For a long while, he just looked at me.

Then he spoke.

"You took your time waking up."

At his gruff tone, I shrugged.

I couldn't exactly tell him I'd had a fucking nightmare in which Old Master tore into my neck with his teeth.

Did you sleep well?

More or less.

"How do you feel?"

"Light. My head's clear, too."

That was no exaggeration. My body felt as light as a feather, and the long sleep had cleared the fatigue from my head. I felt sharper than ever.

They said I was unconscious for seven days and nights, didn't they?

I must have been more exhausted than I realized.

Not to brag, but it was rare for a master who had reached the Supreme Peak realm like me to remain unconscious for an entire week.

Then, without meaning to, I blurted out, "That's a relief."

"What is?"

"That this isn't a dream."

"…"

"It really is a relief."

I looked around, overcome with emotion.

Sunlight slipped through the half-open window, and birdsong tickled my ears. Far off, I could sense people passing by and talking quietly among themselves.

I'm alive.

It was ironic.

I was breathing. I could feel the world around me. Yet I still found it hard to believe I was alive.

At the same time, a hollow emptiness took hold of me.

For an instant, the darkness that had wrapped around the Inner Palace seemed to pass over the sunlight settling on the window. So did the sight of countless corpses collapsed with their faces buried in pools of blood.

So… none of it was a dream.

The joy and relief of surviving faded, leaving guilt and bitterness in their place.

I stared blankly at the window until a low voice reached me.

"In the end, some survive, and some die."

Tap.

A hand came to rest on my shoulder. I felt its warmth as Jeok Cheongang gazed into the distance and continued.

"That is the natural order no one can defy. That is Murim."

"…"

"Be grateful you survived, and mourn those who died. For now, that is enough."

Jeok Cheongang walked to the window and threw it open. Sunlight poured in, bathing him in its glow. I watched him in silence.

Thoughts flashed through my mind, and I opened my mouth.

"Old Master."

At my call, Jeok Cheongang smiled warmly and shook his head.

"Enough. You needn't say anything now."

"Ah, that's not what I meant."

"Enough, I said. There's much I want to ask you, but first you need time to gather your thoughts—"

"No, it's just… you're dazzling me."

"Hm?"

I cautiously pointed at his head. Gleaming in the sunlight, his bald scalp was using Solar Fist as a passive Skill.

"Either close the window or move your head a little."

"…!"

"By the way, did you use Force? You shaved it really clean. I get that it's a disguise, but you should've left some hair. What if it doesn't grow back?"

The warm smile vanished from Jeok Cheongang's face.

In an instant, the kindly old man next door became the Blood Monk. He gave me a cold stare.

"You goddamn—"

"I was only asking. Why are you swearing at a patient who just woke up?"

"Would you like to go back to sleep? I could put you out for another three months and fifteen days."

Crack.

Bones shifted in his tightly clenched fist. Sensing I'd made a terrible mistake, I spoke quickly.

"I've slept plenty already."

"This old man thinks you'd like some more."

"I'm really fine. The work here is almost done, so we should hurry back to the Central Plains—"

"That's fine. By the time you wake up, we'll be in Henan at the very least."

I swallowed hard.

"That sounds… really bad."

"Why? The journey will only bore you."

"It won't be boring at all. I like admiring natural scenery."

"How about returning to nature for good?"

"…You're joking, right?"

"Does it sound like a joke?"

"No."

"That part was a joke. Waking up in Henan wasn't."

Whoosh.

Flames curled around Jeok Cheongang's fist. I instinctively looked around, but of course there was no fire extinguisher.

I'm fucked. Shit.

Resigned to my fate, I made a polite request.

"Please go easy on me."

"If you take it without a fuss, I can do that. Which would you prefer, Flame Divine Palm or Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist?"

"…Would either of those not hurt if you used them gently?"

"Would you rather I hit you hard?"

"…Is there anything besides Flame Divine Palm and Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist?"

"There is."

"Oh? What?"

"Dance of the Fire God and Demon."

I asked with complete sincerity.

“Have you actually gone senile?”

Whack!

My vision flashed white.

I writhed with my mouth hanging open, pain shooting through my forehead. Jeok Cheongang’s impossibly gruff voice reached me.

“I thought it was about time you woke up, so I came by for the first time in a while. And here you are, perfectly fine. Stop spouting nonsense and get your strength back. I’m leaving.”

Click.

I opened my eyes just as the door shut firmly behind him. Rubbing my forehead with tears in my eyes, I looked at the space he’d left behind and muttered, “You could’ve stayed a little longer…”

Before my faint voice had faded, a tremor swept through the pavilion.

Boom. Boom. Rumble!

Amazingly, those were someone’s footsteps. Alongside the vibrations of what sounded like a charging elephant, I sensed several others approaching with uncanny lightness.

They were headed toward the firmly closed door Jeok Cheongang had just passed through.

“Hey, wait—!”

But my desperate shout never reached the end.

Crash!

The wooden door burst apart, sending dust billowing into the air.

As I stood there blankly frozen in the quarters that had become a ruin in an instant, I saw several familiar faces through the dust cloud and let out a helpless laugh.

Yeah. Well, this isn’t so bad either.

“How’s everyone been?”

As if on cue, several figures leaped toward me at once.

No—one enormous figure soared nearly to the ceiling and came down on all of us, myself included.

Whoooosh!

“Taishan missed the Pavilion Master!”

“…Ah.”

I hadn’t counted on you.

Bang!

Hearing the crash behind him, Jeok Cheongang let out a quiet laugh.

“Well, what a commotion.”

It had to be that huge fellow—Taishan, or was it Geosan?

The physician who had left the quarters first must already have spread the news. The members of the Fire Dragon Pavilion had rushed over faster than anyone else, barely sparing Jeok Cheongang a glance as they headed toward the pavilion. That had happened only moments ago.

The youngsters want to be together. This old man should give them space.

Granted, there was another old man among them. But Jeok Cheongang had passed ninety-nine long ago. To him, anyone under eighty was in the prime of youth.

It was his firm belief that anyone eighty or younger could chew Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron.

…Perhaps that’s going a bit far.

After muttering inwardly, Jeok Cheongang began to walk slowly.

He looked up at the sky, which had cleared as though nothing had happened, and watched the Nanman people begin gathering in groups of three or five after hearing the news of Jin Taekyung.

The cool breeze brushed against him, and a thought came to him.

No—a question for someone who wasn’t there to hear it.

Do you really believe that?

After seven days and nights, Jin Taekyung had woken and said he was glad this wasn’t a dream. Truly glad.

But his voice, his eyes, everything Jeok Cheongang had seen told a different story.

He blames himself for surviving. For failing to save them.

No one knew what became of the dead. Jeok Cheongang had, however, seen countless people survive hell. He knew how they went on living with regret and guilt.

The Great Faction War.

He had lived through that seeming eternity of blood and death himself.

But overcoming it makes you stronger.

That was why he had said as little as he could. He had pretended not to notice Jin Taekyung groaning and thrashing in pain while unconscious, then made himself ask:

Did you sleep well?

More or less.

It must have been a terrible nightmare. Jin Taekyung had lied through his teeth without batting an eye.

Cheeky brat.

Jeok Cheongang wasn't angry. He was proud to see Jin Taekyung doing his best to endure it, though it saddened him, too.

That was all.

So why did something in his chest still ache? Why did Jin Taekyung's figure keep wavering before his eyes even as he looked at the world around him?

Damn it. I really am getting old.

Strangely, he didn't much mind.

He had witnessed that mysterious recovery with his own eyes, but it was Jin Taekyung—not anything else—who filled his heart.

Well, this isn't so bad either.

With a faint smile, Jeok Cheongang headed somewhere quiet. Sunlight filtered through the leaves onto his bare scalp.

"Captain."

"What?"

"Captain."

"Ah, what?"

"Captaiiin!"

"Stop calling me, you bastard. I'm not dead yet."

Despite my shouting, Hyuk Mujin's voice still trembled with tears. He gripped my sleeve in both hands and looked up at me with wet eyes.

"Then when are you going to pass away?"

"…Are you insane? You sound like you're praying for me to die."

"You were unconscious for seven whole days and nights. I really thought you were going to die."

Taishan, who was on his hands and knees mopping the floor at my express command, promptly nodded.

"That's right. Taishan thought the Pavilion Master would never wake up and looked forward to it."

I was just beginning to feel touched when I noticed that something was wrong and blinked.

"Looked forward to it? Why?"

Namho, who had claimed the only chair on account of his age, muttered, "Why ask? The son of a bitch was looking forward to the funeral feast."

"No! Taishan worried so much about the Pavilion Master that he drooled whenever he thought of him!"

"…"

"…"

That bastard really had been looking forward to it.

Sama Pyo, who was practically Taishan's mother, met my eyes and lowered his head weakly.

"Pretend you didn't hear that. Even with ten mouths, I'd have nothing to say."

"Ten mouths? If Taishan had ten mouths—!"

"You'd eat ten times as much. Please, can someone muzzle him?"

Just as Assemblyman Namho of the Nanman Party formally introduced the Taishan Muzzle Bill, something whistled through the air.

Whoosh—crash!

The table—the one piece of furniture in the ruined quarters that had more or less kept its shape—splintered in a single blow.

Then came a cold voice.

"What… are you all doing in front of a patient?"

Everyone fell silent at Ju Hwaran's question. She had just smashed a table in front of that same patient.

Chapter 716

They say it's scarier when someone who's usually quiet gets angry.

Ju Hwaran was proving the point.

Clatter.

Wooden splinters rained from the hand of the Yongbong Escort Bureau's precious jewel. She was the human air purifier who had kept this jalapeño pepper party—reeking of old men and getting downright spicy—bearable.

Her usually gentle eyes and voice had turned sharp as thorns.

"Young Hero Taishan."

Taishan, her first target, flinched.

"Do you have any idea how much the Pavilion Master—how much Young Master Jin has gone through for us? How could you say something like that?"

"Ta-Taishan was wrong."

"I know you have an enormous appetite, but if you say anything ominous like that again, I really will muzzle you, just as Elder Namho suggested."

At Ju Hwaran's stern warning, Sama Pyo narrowed his brows and opened his mouth.

"Young Lady Ju, Taishan isn't a beast."

"Then should I muzzle you instead of Taishan?"

"…"

"Well?"

Sama Pyo considered this for a moment, then answered with a solemn expression.

"Come to think of it, an occasional muzzle might help him manage his diet."

"Be more careful from now on. I know you meant no harm, but that was too much."

"…Understood. I'll have a word with him."

With his proposed muzzle bill narrowly defeated, Namho muttered mournfully, "I'd hoped to see that bastard muzzled before I died…"

But he couldn't escape Ju Hwaran's attention either.

"Elder Namho."

"H-huh?"

"You're an elder. You should act like one. Swearing like that in front of a patient who hasn't even recovered isn't a good look."

"What? A patient?"

Namho eyed my face, positively glowing after all those level-ups and days of rest. He looked unconvinced.

“Never mind that. Where would you find a worse foulmouth than Jin Taekyung? Why are you coming after me all of a sudden—”

Tap.

I saw it clearly. Just as Namho was about to continue his protest, Hyuk Mujin discreetly jabbed him in the ribs with an elbow.

Translated into modern terms, that little gesture said:

Don’t kill the mood. Just say “for real, lol.”

Namho had decades of spy work behind him. His eyes darted around before he bowed his head in resignation.

“Understood. I’ll be careful.”

“Good. Next, Young Hero Hyuk—what are you doing?”

“I’m massaging the Captain’s shoulders to help him recover from all his hard work.”

Right. They didn’t call him Hyukroach for nothing.

Ju Hwaran smiled approvingly at the sight of Mujin deftly massaging me, then turned to the last person in the room.

“Captain Song.”

A tremor ran through Song Ilseom’s pupils. He had remained silent from beginning to end.

“I haven’t said anything.”

“I know. Keep it that way.”

“…Understood.”

With her final target dealt with, Ju Hwaran looked at me.

The moment our eyes met, my mouth opened on reflex.

“I’m sorry. I apologize. I was wrong.”

“What?”

“Yes?”

“What are you apologizing for?”

“Oh. Nothing. I just…”

I felt like I had to. Survival instinct, maybe.

I shot a look at Hyuk Mujin, who was now diligently massaging my legs.

What happened? Why is Young Lady Ju like this?

He answered with a look of his own.

She was worried sick about you, Captain. Just let it go.

Even so. The air feels different. The air.

If you can’t read the room, at least keep your mou—

“What are you two doing?” Ju Hwaran asked suddenly.

“…!”

"…!"

Mujin's hands flew twice as fast.

"What do you mean? I'm massaging the Captain's legs. Oh, these muscles are really knotted up. Should I press harder?"

Something felt wrong. I cautiously caught his arm.

"That's enough. Stop."

"Huh? Why?"

"No, it's… fine now."

"Our Captain is doing it again. You like it because it feels good, don't you?"

"No. I said it's fine. You must be tired too, so stop."

"Don't be shy. I, Hyuk Mujin, can do anything for my Captain as his right-hand man. You saw that, didn't you, Young Lady Ju? That's how well our Captain takes care of his people."

As Mujin turned to Ju Hwaran and laughed heartily, I sent him a Sound Transmission in despair.

—That wasn't my leg just now…

"…!"

—So get your hand off me right now, you bastard. Before I break your wrist.

After a brief silence, Mujin slowly withdrew his hand.

I wanted desperately to smack the back of his head as he stared at me with a gaze filled with a mixture of awe and fear, but I barely managed to hold myself back in front of everyone else.

Then again, maybe…

No. That's going too far.

I let the thought go and looked around at each of their faces.

Only a few days ago, I'd thought I might never see them again. Our situation had been that bad. Everything ahead of us had been lost in fog.

But now that we were all gathered together like this, alive, I was overcome with emotion all over again.

The fact that not one of them had died filled me with joy.

"I'm glad. Really."

At my single sentence, which broke the brief silence, everyone's eyes widened. Then they smiled faintly.

That was enough.

We'd grown close enough to understand what the others felt.

It took a while to hear the whole story.

We'd lived through the same stretch of time, but in different places, facing different things. Their story also covered the seven days and nights I'd spent unconscious.

"I really thought we were going to die. You weren't there, Captain, and we were tied up. Then that Blood Monk we'd only heard stories about stepped right off the swift ship. I mean… wow."

"If we hadn't recognized Great Hero Jeok, there would have been a fight. The Nanman warriors with us were itching for one."

"I thought it was all over. We were supposed to be bringing reinforcements to save you, and instead a fiend called the Blood Monk appeared."

They gave me more detail than Jeok Cheongang had.

The Nanman warriors hadn't believed the Blood Monk's identity at first. Then the bandits from the Water Dragon Stronghold—all of them sporting bruises around their eyes—stepped forward to confirm that he was the Fire King. The fight ended before it began.

Jeok Cheongang rushed to the Nanman Beast Palace with all his strength. By the time the Fire Dragon Pavilion members and Nanman scouts arrived a step behind him, everything was over.

"When we saw you collapse, Captain, I really thought you'd died. You were covered in blood, and there was nothing around you but blood and corpses…"

I was about to interrupt Mujin. If the state of my perfectly healthy body came up, how could anyone not be suspicious?

But before I could speak, Ju Hwaran went on.

"Great Hero Jeok reassured everyone. He said you'd only collapsed from exhaustion."

I asked, feeling uneasy.

"…What exactly did the Old Master—no, my master—say?"

"Hmm. I'm not sure. Everyone was in such a panic. But I remember him saying you hadn't been seriously injured because he'd arrived in time. Palace Lord Yayul agreed."

Namho nodded and chimed in.

"It was heavenly luck. Heavenly luck. No matter how powerful that bastard is, how could he have survived that hellscape? Two of the Ten Kings had stepped in. Even the Southern Heaven Demon Empress wouldn't have been able to do anything."

That wasn't quite what had happened.

I nodded anyway.

This was unmistakable protection. Jeok Cheongang and the Beast Miao King had taken action to conceal my secret and keep people from becoming suspicious.

The Baekcheon Unit survivors will keep quiet too. Their loyalty is to the Beast Miao King.

The dead couldn't talk. Most of the fighting that day had taken place in the Inner Palace, and most of the people there had died.

As long as the survivors said nothing, the secret would hold.

Even though I've grown close to them, I can't tell them.

In the modern world, people called things they couldn't explain Magic or miracles.

Here in Murim, they would use another word.

Demon.

Supernatural powers beyond anyone's understanding were bound to inspire fear. I wanted as few people as possible to know about the System—about this ability of mine.

Though what was done was done.

I had no idea what consequences my unavoidable choice that day would bring. Still, I was glad the person who'd seen it up close was Jeok Cheongang. I knew what kind of man the Beast Miao King was, too, and that put me at ease.

"Captain?"

"Huh?"

"What are you thinking about so hard?"

I must have been lost in thought for a while. Mujin was watching me suspiciously, so I waved a hand.

"Nothing. My mind wandered for a second. Go on."

"Oh, right. Where was I?"

"…Did you hit your head?"

"No. Maybe it's from someone smacking me in the back of it so often."

He glanced at me, leaving no doubt who he meant.

"I think I told you we gathered the dead and cremated them. You know all the chieftains who sided with Baeksang and then ran away were thrown into the underground prison, right?"

"More or less."

"Oh, and I heard Great Chieftain Yohi asked to be punished herself."

"Yohi did?"

"Yes. Great Hero Yayul seemed willing to forgive her, but she voluntarily entered the underground prison."

I hadn't expected Yohi to go that far. In a way, though, it made sense.

She'd repented too late, but she had joined Baeksang for wealth and power. Nearly dying must have taught her something.

She chose it herself. She must have thought it was the right thing to do.

I listened as they went on.

More Nanman people than ever were staying at the Nanman Beast Palace, working to restore the ruined Inner Palace and repair the considerable damage to the Outer Palace. Young Palace Lord Yayul Mok was so busy he barely had a moment to breathe.

“We sent word to him, but I don’t know if he can come right away,” Mujin said. “Lately, we can barely catch a glimpse of him.”

“I can imagine. The Beast Miao King must be just as busy.”

“Great Hero Yayul… You probably won’t see him either—not just us, but anyone else.”

“What?”

“He disappeared two days ago. I hear the leadership is already in an uproar.”

“…!”

Chapter 717

Seven days and nights could feel long or short, depending on the person.

But for the Nanman Beast Palace, it was nowhere near enough time to repair all the damage.

The demonic qi that had poured from the rift was gone, but its aftermath remained. Countless people had died. Some had lost their families and homes. Others must have been afraid the disaster could return at any moment.

And the Beast Miao King disappeared in the middle of all that?

I frowned, thought it over, then asked, “Tell me exactly what you know.”

Hyuk Mujin scratched the back of his head. “Uh, sorry, but it isn’t much. Like I said, the Nanman leadership is in an uproar. They even discussed casting a net over heaven and earth to find Great Hero Yayul.”

I could hardly blame them. The Palace Lord, the one person they needed to rally around in a crisis, had vanished.

They were probably worried Dark Heaven had made another move, too.

An assassination. Or a kidnapping.

Maybe I was getting ahead of myself, but neither was impossible. The Beast Miao King had been badly injured in his fight with the Southern Heaven Demon Empress. His martial prowess was extraordinary, and Jeok Cheongang had reached him in time to help, but he couldn’t have recovered in just a few days.

“So what did the search turn up?”

Mujin tilted his head. “What search?”

“…Did you actually hurt your head? You’ve forgotten what you said a moment ago?”

“Oh. The net over heaven and earth.” He slapped his forehead. “I only said they discussed it.”

“Huh?”

“They called it off.”

Called it off? Over something this serious?

I blinked, then asked, “Did Dark Heaven take over the Nanman Beast Palace while I was asleep?”

“The leadership? I don’t think so.”

“Then they’re searching in secret so they won’t alarm the tribespeople?”

“I don’t think so either.”

“Then why the hell aren’t they looking for their Palace Lord?”

“Why are you asking me? He isn’t my Palace Lord.”

Whack!

Mujin finally earned himself another point toward his back-of-the-head mileage. He crumpled with a silent scream.

Namho clicked his tongue at the sight of him writhing on the floor, then turned to me.

"Ordinarily, the leadership would have done something. Cast a net over heaven and earth, sent warriors to search in secret—anything."

I lowered my fist. "But they did nothing?"

"They had no choice. Someone stopped them."

"Someone?"

"What choice did they have? This wasn't some nobody who'd crawled in off the street. The great Fire King himself told them to drop everything."

"…!"

"He reportedly told them that if the Palace Lord didn't appear by midnight two days later, he would step in personally, so they should shut their mouths and focus on calming the people. The Young Palace Lord agonized over it, but in the end, he listened to the Fire King. The other chieftains had no choice either."

Jeok Cheongang—and Yayul Mok, too?

My surprise didn't last long. I thought for a moment, then nodded.

"Midnight two days later. That's tonight, isn't it?"

"That's right."

"I see."

"I see? That's all?"

"What else is there to say? If Ol—no, if Master said to drop it, then we should drop it."

Namho stared at me, then smacked his lips. "That's quite a bond of trust between master and disciple."

"His personality is terrible, but he has his reasons for doing things."

"Would that bond hold if I told him what you said about his personality?"

"…Things would get heated. Do you want to see me wake up in Henan?"

"Why even ask? Of course—"

His answer had come without a moment's hesitation. Then he glanced toward someone and continued in a mournful voice.

"Of course I'll keep it a secret. Naturally."

"…?"

What was that? Had Ju Hwaran just given him an axe-eyed glare?

But her eyes were curved into a smile when I looked. I must have imagined it. I probably wasn't fully awake yet.

Smack.

I patted my cheeks and stretched. My stiff bones cracked, and I felt lighter than ever.

I'm in perfect shape.

Between leveling up and resting for seven days and nights, my body couldn't have been better. The nightmare had left me in a foul mood, but that would pass.

Someone else is probably feeling the same way.

I put on a sleepy face for the others.

"Ah, I'm tired after talking so much for the first time in a while. Could you all give me a moment alone?"

Being a patient had its advantages. People accepted whatever I said without question.

Once they were gone, I slipped out of the pavilion through the window.

It was only a guess.

If he isn't there, no big deal. If he is, then great.

But the moment I entered a remote patch of grass that no one ever visited, my guess became certainty.

"Oh, there you are."

Rustle.

The grass stirred faintly at my greeting. At the same instant, a streak of light shot toward me.

Whoosh—crack!

The dagger flew straight toward the space between my brows. I caught it without even looking, and the blade began to glow red, unable to withstand the heat of the Scorching Yang Qi in my hand.

Drip. Hissss.

Molten metal fell to the ground. Only then did I remember I was still wearing my mask. I threw both hands up.

"It's me. Jin Taekyung."

A moment later, faint sounds of air splitting came from above. Several figures landed among the thick grass.

One, two, three… seven.

Exactly as many as I'd sensed. And I knew who they were.

"The Seven Miao Tigers, right?"

Step.

"Please forgive our rudeness."

The man in front stepped forward and removed his mask, revealing a good-natured face I recognized from the underground prison.

"We never did exchange names. I'm Wonhu of the Seven Miao Tigers. It's an honor to meet you, Great Hero Jin, Benefactor of Nanman."

"It's an honor to meet you, Great Hero Jin."

The others followed him in awkward but respectful fist-palm salutes.

I let out a quiet laugh. "Benefactor? I should be thanking you. You helped me a great deal that day."

At the mention of the underground prison, Wonhu smiled too.

"Think nothing of it. Without you, we would all have been as good as dead. Or… become mindless monsters."

His smile faded on those bitter words. He sighed, then looked at me with some uncertainty.

"But how did you know to come here?"

"I've been here once before. I came to see Great Hero Yayul."

Wonhu nodded as though that explained it. "That must have been the day he vanished without a word, even to us, his personal guards. We were quite alarmed."

"Yes. Yayul Mok—or rather, the Young Palace Lord—brought me here."

"No one comes here anymore. It's an ideal place for a private conversation."

"I can see that now."

The Outer Palace alone was enormous, large enough to pass for the capital of a small country. No one had any reason to wander into a secluded patch of grass where even the path had disappeared.

"Then, Great Hero Jin, are you perhaps…"

"Yes. I came to see Great Hero Yayul. I had a feeling he'd be here."

"Hmm."

Wonhu let out a low hum and stared at me. Then, instead of the answer I had expected, a quiet command slipped from his lips.

"Make way."

The Seven Miao Tigers standing behind him flinched in unison.

"Big Brother."

"But our lord ordered us not to let anyone in…"

"I won't say it twice."

At Wonhu's firm voice, the Seven Miao Tigers hesitated for a moment before sighing heavily and splitting apart to either side.

"I trust you know where to find him. I'll take my leave."

Wonhu gave me another awkward fist-palm salute and started to turn away. Then he stopped and looked back.

"I swear by heaven and earth, every person in Nanman, myself included, will remember what you did for us."

I felt the same way. I'd remember their help until I died, and I was grateful they were still alive.

I gave the Seven Miao Tigers a nod and made my way through the thick grass.

A few moments later, a crumbling old shrine came into view.

Step.

I made no attempt to hide my approach. Through the holes in its door and the gaps where the corners had worn away with age, I could see someone's back.

"May I come in?"

No answer came. I went inside.

Screeech.

The old floor shrieked as soon as I stepped on it.

"Whoa. You might want to oil this thing."

I glanced around as I spoke. A low voice came from the broad-backed man sitting cross-legged before me.

"It's fine. It's been like that for a long time."

"True. Great Hero Yayul would know better. You said you always hid here whenever you caused some major incident as a child."

"…Did I?"

"Have you forgotten already? You told me last time."

"I must have told you all sorts of things."

It wasn't that he didn't remember. He was grieving for someone who was no longer in this world.

Someone who had always hidden in this old shrine with him.

I watched the Beast Miao King's back for a moment, then asked, "Why did you disappear? You could have said something before you left."

"I felt like it."

"Everyone's worried. They keep asking where our Palace Lord went."

"So you came looking for me?"

"I was out for a walk. You should get back before 'our Palace Lord' becomes 'your Palace Lord.'"

"Palace Lord."

The Beast Miao King let out a quiet, humorless laugh and muttered in an empty voice,

"Do you think… I have the qualifications to be a Palace Lord?"

"Hmm. That depends on why you came here."

"Why?"

“If you’re going to brush me off with ‘I felt like it’ again, then you might as well quit being Palace Lord. Not that I’m qualified to tell you what to do.”

A brief silence passed before he spoke.

“It hurt. More than I could bear.”

“Because of what?”

“Because I failed to protect them. The countless tribespeople who followed me—and my one and only sworn brother, suffering right beside me.”

“…”

“Do you know which of those hurt me most?”

I didn’t answer. The Beast Miao King went on.

Chapter 718

“Despite all those deaths, the person I grieved for most was Baeksang.”

The Beast Miao King’s low voice reached me. I stayed silent for a moment before asking, “Is that why you left? Because you thought it was wrong to feel that way?”

“To become the Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace means putting this land and its tribespeople before anything else. But I became trapped by my personal feelings.”

I could see his enormous back, like a thousand-year-old megalith. Yet the back of the giant who had supported Nanman for so many years looked pitifully small at that moment, like a child’s.

“Do you know what I was thinking when I faced Baeksang for the last time?”

I could guess, but I said nothing. The person who knew Baeksang best—and who had suffered most because of him—was right in front of me.

“I wanted to save him somehow.”

“…”

“Even in that horrific scene, I wanted to save that bastard Baeksang, who had betrayed everyone in this land, myself included, and help him run far away.”

They weren’t related by blood, but they were sworn brothers, as close as family. The Beast Miao King must have wanted to save Baeksang however he could. He must have wanted to absolve the man who had served as Dark Heaven’s hunting dog while the child he’d believed dead was held hostage.

But Baeksang himself had refused.

“He probably knew, too. That I was hesitating. That must be why he made that choice.”

The Beast Miao King’s murmur faded into the silence. The emotion in his voice was grief over being forced to end the life of his sworn younger brother—the man he had cherished more than his own life—with his own hands. It was also self-reproach for abandoning his duty as Palace Lord because of his personal feelings.

“One diseased tree caused the forest to die. Yet the forest keeper is now pacing in front of the diseased tree that has already fallen. Could you call such a person a forest keeper?”

I had been listening quietly to the Beast Miao King’s story. Then I broke the long silence.

“Great Hero Yayul, I’m asking you this in all seriousness…”

My voice trailed off. Even now, I wasn’t sure I should say it. But I had to get that devastated forest keeper back on his feet, even if it meant crossing the line a little. Or a lot.

“Are you fucking stupid?”

"…!"

I could sense his agitation even from behind. I'd already started, though, so I pressed on.

"What, is the Palace Lord some kind of god of heaven and earth? Don't you have human emotions?"

"You…"

"Let's be honest. Someone who spent their entire life with you, someone like family, just died. Who in this world could be fine after that? Are you supposed to be sadder just because other people died, too?"

The Beast Miao King took a moment to answer my barrage of blunt questions.

"Jin Taekyung, you as well?"

I nodded.

"Of course I would. What's so special about a bastard like me?"

"…"

"People around me can praise me as a chivalrous hero or a Great Hero, but I'm still a person in the end. Why would a Palace Lord be any different?"

I answered without hesitation. His broad back shifted.

Rustle.

He slowly turned his head. For the first time since I'd entered the old shrine, I saw his face. He looked utterly haggard.

"They were also Nanman people I had to protect."

"And you protected them. Even after being branded a traitor, you came back despite the danger. It was thanks to you that countless others could be saved."

I continued quietly.

"The diseased trees have fallen, but the forest hasn't died. It needs its forest keeper more than ever."

Many people had been sacrificed in this incident. But ironically, Nanman would grow even stronger.

Because Baeksang had not been the only diseased tree in the vast forest called Nanman.

The other chieftains. No—the traitors.

Baeksang had joined forces with Dark Heaven for his child. They had followed him for nothing but their own safety and power.

Those were the trees that should have been cut down long ago, trees sick with greed. More than twenty chieftains had shaken their branches, and countless leaves had fallen into bloody water. But the forest had survived.

Under the single banner of the Nanman Beast Palace, its people would come together and flourish. And only one person could raise that banner before all of Nanman.

"Let's go back. Then that father and son can rest easier too."

I was speaking to the Beast Miao King, but my eyes were elsewhere. He followed my gaze.

"You knew?"

"I noticed them as soon as I came in. Everything else in here is covered in dust. Those aren't."

I walked forward. Between the faded murals and dozens of stone statues I couldn't identify stood two memorial tablets that hadn't been there on my last visit.

Neither bore a name. I knew who they were for.

Baeksang. Baekhwi.

I said their names silently—the names even the person who had made the tablets by hand couldn't bring himself to carve. Then I lowered myself and bowed.

Once. Then again.

When I turned after the second bow, the Beast Miao King was staring at me, his face stiff.

"Why are you looking at me like that?"

"…I didn't expect it."

"What, did you think I'd knock the tablets over?"

"You might have. Especially Baeksang's, after what he did."

Damn it. Fair enough.

After everything that had happened, I could have split Baeksang's tablet in half and spat on it and called it self-defense.

But…

"I just wanted to do this. That's all."

What was this filthy, bitter feeling?

I looked back at the tablets and thought I might finally have a name for it. Perhaps it was sympathy. Perhaps empathy.

It's too late. I've gone down a road I can't turn back from, and I won't stop.

For an instant, I seemed to hear Baeksang's voice again, as I had in the dark underground prison. I looked at the blank tablet and asked a question he would never hear.

If I'd been you, what road would I have taken?

No answer came. Not from the tablet, and not from anywhere deep inside me.

If there really is such a thing as an afterlife, I hope that bastard—someone I could tear to pieces without feeling satisfied—gets to live an ordinary life unlike this one.

I hope he can spend a peaceful life without losing anyone or sacrificing anyone, together with the child he missed so terribly.

Damn it. How many people died because of him?

I knew every villain had a story. That wasn't what made this feel so rotten.

It was the thought that I might have walked the same road as Baeksang. I could imagine how desperately he'd struggled against the circumstances he'd been given.

In the end, this was all I could say.

"…Don't commit any sins over there, you goddamn bastard."

As I muttered the words, reddish light slipped through a gap in the shrine door and fell across the two tablets. As though that were their answer.

Then, the next moment, a deep voice pierced my ears.

"The sun's already setting."

Creeeak.

The old floorboards screamed. At last, the giant unfolded his crossed legs and rose from his seat, staring at me with calm eyes.

"If we head straight to the Inner Palace, we should still make it back in time for dinner."

"…!"

"Come. We should return before it gets any later."

I looked at him, let out a quiet laugh, and nodded.

Nanman's forest keeper had returned.

Two days passed.

When the Palace Lord, who had disappeared without a word, returned, the leadership—which had been thrown into confusion—quickly regained its stability. After taking a short rest at everyone's urging, the Beast Miao King summoned me the following day.

Or rather, he summoned Jeok Cheongang and me.

Jeok Cheongang arrived at the meeting room hastily thrown together over seven days and nights. The moment he saw the Beast Miao King sitting there, he said,

"Look how you've grown, our little Miao King. Sitting in the seat of honor and everything."

"…Oh. My apologies. Force of habit."

"No, I understand. So you'll understand this old man's habit of using the Flame Divine Palm on anyone who forgets his manners."

Whoosh!

The Beast Miao King had experienced that habit during the Great Faction War. Bandages and all, he swiftly vacated the seat of honor and gestured toward it.

"Please sit, Old Master Jeok."

"Oh, it's fine. You're injured. No need to go that far."

"…"

"Enough. Sit down. I don't care for some wet-behind-the-ears brat summoning me, but I'll let you say your piece."

The Beast Miao King seemed confused by the gangster-like way of speaking he hadn't heard in a long time, so I opened my mouth politely.

"Just tell him what you need to. That means he's listening."

"…Then, Old Master Jeok, may this junior speak?"

"He really hates being asked questions in return. You're still not fully recovered, so if you don't want to suffer something nasty, speak right away."

"…Understood."

Unlike the Jeok Cheongang in his memories, the one sitting before him looked much younger. The Beast Miao King glanced at him before carefully opening his mouth.

"I asked you to join us, Old Master Jeok, because I wished to consult you about a grave matter."

"A grave matter?"

"Yes."

"I hear the cleanup has been going well. Have you found a trail leading to Dark Heaven?"

"I wish we had, but no. In a way, this problem is even more troublesome…"

"Enough preamble. Get to the point before I shorten your life."

This man really hasn't changed.

The Beast Miao King looked at Jeok Cheongang with exactly that thought in his eyes, then took something from inside his robes and placed it on the table.

Thud.

It was something wrapped in thick cloth. But everyone in the room, myself included, could sense the ominous energy seeping out from within.

As the air suddenly grew heavy, Jeok Cheongang muttered as though groaning.

"…Demonic qi?"

The Beast Miao King nodded grimly.

"Yes. Extremely pure and powerful demonic qi. I couldn't entrust it to anyone else in Nanman, so I've kept it with me."

Their voices seemed to recede, as distant as echoes.

I thought I knew where that demonic qi had come from and what lay beneath the cloth. From the deep darkness, the guardian spirit's final roar rang in my ears once more.

"It's the sacred stone. The one the guardian spirit carried."

"As you guessed. Though it is no longer a sacred stone."

Rustle.

The Beast Miao King answered in a troubled voice and peeled back the cloth. Instead of warm, dazzling radiance, a stone filled with murky darkness was revealed.

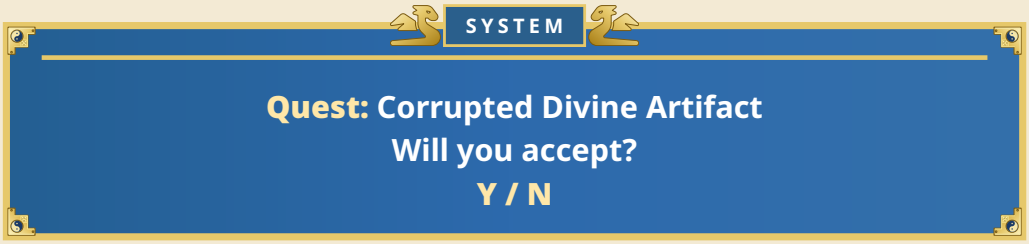
It had absorbed all the demonic qi flowing from the rift. Now, it was something that ought to be called a demonic stone, and the Beast Miao King's gaze sank deeply as he looked at it.

"I'm suppressing its demonic qi for now, but we can't leave it like this forever. That's why I asked you and Old Master Jeok here—to decide what to do with it."

At that moment—

Ding.

A clear chime rang out, utterly at odds with the murky darkness before me, and a holographic window appeared in midair.



Chapter 719

SYSTEM

Quest: Corrupted Divine Artifact
Will you accept?
Y / N

That wasn't the only holographic window to appear before me. I quickly scanned the information for the new Quest.

SYSTEM

Quest
Corrupted Divine Artifact
The sacred stone that once protected this land has lost its original form.
Consumed by demonic qi, it is a spark that could ignite another calamity. You must dispose of this Corrupted Divine Artifact by any means.
Grade: Supreme Peak
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Mission: Dispose of Corrupted Divine Artifact (Incomplete)
Reward: Varies according to how the mission is carried out
Failure: Increase in the Corrupted Divine Artifact's demonic qi

After reading the Quest information window to the end, I muttered quietly to myself.

Accept.

SYSTEM

You have accepted the Quest Corrupted Divine Artifact!

Unlike some of the Quests I'd been more or less forced into, this one gave me a choice. But as far as I was concerned, refusing wasn't an option.

I can't keep suppressing the demonic qi forever.

The sacred stone—no, the Corrupted Divine Artifact—was a bomb that could go off at any moment. We were lucky the Beast Miao King had been keeping it. An ordinary Peak master couldn't have withstood the demonic qi inside it.

Like the Quest says, we have to deal with it somehow.

How many people had we lost closing the rift? For the sake of the guardian spirit that had thrown itself into it at the very end, I couldn't let that bomb go off.

I wasn't the only one who thought so.

"Demonic qi of this magnitude… This won't do."

Jeok Cheongang muttered with a frown, then gestured toward the Beast Miao King and me.

"Stand aside. This old man will handle it."

As if he had guessed what Jeok Cheongang meant, the Beast Miao King's eyes widened.

"Old Master Jeok, surely you don't mean…"

"Exactly what you think. If it might cause trouble, we pull it out by the roots."

"But this… won't be easy to destroy."

Jeok Cheongang's answer was short.

"For you, maybe."

"…"

"I can do it."

That was some fucking macho-man talk.

One sentence had silenced even the Beast Miao King, the beastliest man in Nanman. Jeok Cheongang slowly reached out.

Whoosh.

Scorching Yang Qi gathered around his hand, giving off such terrible heat that the haze rising on every side made the air seem to warp.

But—

"Old Master."

The words slipped out after a moment's thought. Jeok Cheongang stopped just as he was about to strike.

"What?"

"I don't think you should do that."

"Why?"

"I gave it some thought, and I have a feeling things could get ugly if we mess with it carelessly."

"What?"

His eyes widened at my serious tone.

"You mean you actually thought?"

"…"

Jeok Cheongang looked at my thoroughly deflated expression, cleared his throat, and opened his mouth.

“If we leave it like this, it will become a source of trouble sooner or later. We need to deal with it as quickly as possible.”

“I know.”

“Then why stop me? Don’t you trust this old man?”

“Oh, come on. Why would you say that? If I can’t trust you, Old Master, who can I trust?”

That was my answer. In truth, about half of me did have doubts.

Not because I distrusted Jeok Cheongang. I was worried about what might happen.

What if he doesn’t destroy it completely?

The Corrupted Divine Artifact was like the teacup in front of me. While the cup stayed intact, the tea stayed inside. Break the cup, and it would spill everywhere.

If we lose control of the demonic qi, we’ll have another goddamn disaster on our hands.

One mad tiger, however wildly it rampaged, could be beaten down. Demonic qi spreading through the area was another matter. If that happened, we’d be lucky if it was merely troublesome.

I had to stop Jeok Cheongang. No matter how much I trusted him, I couldn’t stake other people’s lives on this gamble.

Even if the chance is one in a thousand—or one in ten thousand—not now.

Too much blood had been spilled already.

People had died fighting to the bitter end. Others had lost their minds, become monsters, and died that way. Even people who had never held a sword had died in considerable numbers trying to escape that hellscape.

If the guardian spirit hadn’t sacrificed itself to close the rift, the casualties would have multiplied like a snowball by now…

Wait.

The guardian spirit?

A sudden sense of déjà vu came over me. Those words kept circling in my mind.

The memories from the day I first met it until now brushed past my eyes and ears one after another, racing toward a single thread of enlightenment.

And then—

“Ah.”

The sound escaped before I knew it.

Jeok Cheongang and the Beast Miao King stared at me as if wondering what the hell was wrong with me. Jeok Cheongang spoke first.

“Yeah, why the fuck are you suddenly throwing a fit all by yourself again? Let this old man in on it.”

“Have you perhaps thought of some brilliant strategy?”

Maybe. I didn't know whether it deserved to be called a plan. Not yet. But if I was right, it was worth trying.

At least we won't lose anything by trying.

I looked from the still-open Quest window to the two men waiting for an answer, then shrugged.

"Why don't you both come get some air with me?"

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

Our little group raced through the wind. With only three tigers and three people, group might have been too grand a word.

Then again, it depended on who those people were. The two riding on either side of me made all the difference.

"I wondered how fast a beast could be, but this isn't bad. Comfortable saddle, too."

Jeok Cheongang inspected the tiger running beneath him with interest. The Beast Miao King, riding to my left, answered at once.

"He's one of the bravest and fastest tigers in the Nanman Beast Palace. He's descended from the one that fought alongside me in the Great Faction War."

"Oh-ho. That huge one crouching in front of the barracks? I remember him. I thought he looked familiar."

Yeah. Who needed an Azure Dragon on the left and a White Tiger on the right?

I had the Fire King on my left and the Miao King on my right. My chest swelled at the thought of that insane lineup. If the Southern Heaven Demon Empress came back to life, these two could take her apart.

The feeling of security was more comforting than a bowl of gukbap could have been.[3027] The quiet conversation between the two men reached my ears.

"The more I look at him, the more I like him. Good stamina, quick feet. Looks clever, too."

The Beast Miao King smiled with pride.

"I raised him with particular care. He was such a picky eater as a cub that I had quite a time of it. Whenever that happened, I even fed him milk myself."

"What? You fed him?"

"…It's a figure of speech. Not what you're thinking, Old Master Jeok."

Jeok Cheongang studied the Beast Miao King's massive pecs before nodding.

"If you say so."

"No, when you say it like that, it sounds as though—"

"Never mind. I'll take this one with me."

[3027] Gukbap is rice served in hot soup, a common comfort food in Korea.

The smile vanished from the Beast Miao King's face.

"Pardon?"

"Why are you asking again? Were you planning to make him run his legs off all the way back to the Central Plains?"

"O-of course not. But I raised the one you're riding like a son in my old age…"

"Give him to me."

"But—"

"Go on."

"…"

"If you don't want to, I'll take that one instead. He looks like a spiritual creature."

The Beast Miao King looked at the tiger Jeok Cheongang had pointed out and shook his head in alarm.

"Gasp. Anyone but him. I only borrowed him for a while in the first place."

"What if this old man were to take him?"

"I-I didn't raise him myself. And how could I, as a father, give away someone my son thinks of as a brother?"

"The sky's clear today. Your tongue's awfully long."

After a moment's silence, the Beast Miao King answered glumly.

"…Understood. You may have the one you're riding."

"Well, if you insist. I'll accept your generosity."

"…"

So much for my chest swelling with pride.

Was this really the senile Fire King I knew? The Fire King truly was a legend…

As I tried to steady my suddenly shrunken chest, the creature carrying me let out a low growl.

Grrr.

He glanced back at me. He seemed to know he'd narrowly escaped the clutches of the Fire King, that dog trader. I felt sorry for him and gently stroked his trembling white fur.

"It's okay, buddy. You survived."

Whine.

Muyaho let out a forlorn little cry, like a puppy that had lost its mother, and slowed down. He must have realized that showing off in front of Jeok Cheongang would only make it more likely he'd be dragged all the way to the Central Plains.

Fortunately, Jeok Cheongang's attention had already shifted.

"What's that…?"

His voice trailed off. Ahead of us stood a bare mountain, almost completely burned.

No, even that sorry-looking mountain had a name: Ailao Mountain. Everyone who lived in this land knew it.

Just as I was about to explain that to him, Jeok Cheongang's eyes flew open and he shouted,

"What shameless son of a bitch burned down these precious mountains, trees, and grass?"

"…"

"…"

For an instant, the Beast Miao King and I exchanged a heated glance. Then I answered with all the outrage I could muster.

"Dark Heaven."

Some truths are beautiful when left unknown.

Once Jeok Cheongang realized the sorry-looking mountain was our destination, he frowned.

"Did we come all this way to plant trees?"

"…I'm asking because I genuinely want to know. Just how crazy do you think I am?"

What a ridiculous question.

Today wasn't Arbor Day, and even if it had been, I wouldn't have planted any trees. I had come with these two to Ailao Mountain, which had been reduced to a bare mountain, for a purpose that had been decided from the beginning.

"This way."

The Beast Miao King soon realized where I was going.

"The Poisonblood Grounds. Or should I call it the Sacred Land now?"

It would have been stranger if he hadn't known. Yohi must have told him roughly what had happened, even if she'd left out the details.

I shook my head.

"They're different. The Poisonblood Grounds are the Poisonblood Grounds. The Sacred Land is the Sacred Land."

The two places were separate. The Poisonblood Grounds were a land of death made by human hands. The Sacred Land was Nanman's heart—a land of life.

Life itself.

I set the Corrupted Divine Artifact on the ground. Demonic qi drifted from it like mist, and Muyaho growled softly.

But though darkness had consumed it, its essence had not changed.

Whoosh…

The ground pulsed like a beating heart. A veil lifted from another world that had been hidden for countless ages.

Then I saw it: a space filled with warm radiance, and at its center, a small pond shining more brilliantly than anything else.

“Ah.”

“That’s…”

Jeok Cheongang’s and the Beast Miao King’s exclamations faded without either man finishing his thought.

But I knew what they had felt. And I knew what I had to do.

Purification.

Today, a new sacred stone would be born.

Chapter 720

Whew.

A cool breeze brushed past me. I took a small, deep breath and looked around.

The Sacred Land.

Could there be another place where those two words fit so perfectly?

But where I stood was only its body.

Even this Sacred Land has a heart of its own.

A place filled with the energy of life and Purification. The place that had brought my dying body back to life.

I walked slowly toward the distant pond.

There was no sun, yet the light falling from above was warm. Flowers and grass bloomed lushly in every direction.

Jeok Cheongang and the Beast Miao King stared at the bizarre space with stunned expressions. Their lips moved as though they were about to say something, but before long, they firmly shut their mouths and followed behind me.

Their patience didn't last long.

Splash.

I waded straight into the pond. Cold water soon rose to my waist, and Jeok Cheongang cried out in alarm.

"Th-that bastard…!"

Apparently he thought I meant to kill myself.

He looked ready to grab me by the collar and drag me out. Instead of explaining, I bit my pinky.

Crunch.

A faint sting. The skin split, and blood flowed.

But after giving the wide-eyed Jeok Cheongang a crooked grin, I plunged my hand into the clear water without hesitation.

One. Two. Three…

I counted slowly in my head before pulling it out. In barely thirty seconds, my pinky had healed completely.

Jeok Cheongang, who had looked ready to jump in after me, and the Beast Miao King, who had been trying to stop him, muttered in disbelief.

"What in the world…"

"…Everything Yohi said was true. All of it."

There was a reason people came up with the saying that seeing once was better than hearing a hundred times. I could talk until my mouth went dry, but showing them was faster.

It was a kind of performance.

It worked. And I'd confirmed something for myself, too.

The pond still works.

I'd been a little worried. Like a Golem collapsing when its core was destroyed, the Sacred Land might have vanished once demonic qi consumed the sacred stone.

But that concern vanished as cleanly as the wound on my pinky, replaced by a suspicion bordering on certainty.

This is it. The answer.

The System had never lied to me. It presented the facts as they were; finding a new path in its maddeningly plain text was up to me.

Just like now.

The Quest information said "by any means." I'm sure of it.

That was right. From the beginning, the mission I had been given was to dispose of the Corrupted Divine Artifact, not to destroy it.

I'd caught on rather late, but my memories of the guardian spirit had led me back to this place. To the pond that had healed me when I was near death and cleansed the impurities from my body.

Healing and Purification.

I didn't know where its mysterious power came from. I only knew I had no better option.

I walked toward the center of the pond.

Swish.

Gentle ripples spread outward from me. The pond wasn't very deep, and on its surface—clear enough to see through—I could see the face of a man stiff with tension wavering in the water.

Gulp.

I swallowed and looked at my clenched fist. I felt the hard surface of the Corrupted Divine Artifact—and the powerful demonic qi pulsing up between my fingers.

…If this backfires, we're in for a real shitshow.

I wasn't joking. That much demonic qi could ruin not just the pond, but the entire Sacred Land.

Then this place would become the real, true Poisonblood Grounds, and the guardian spirit—who had only just finished filing his move-in registration in the afterlife—would show up in my dreams every night and hiss at me.

But still…

What else am I supposed to do? There's no other option.

Fuck it. I don't know.

I squeezed my eyes shut and plunged the Corrupted Sacred Stone into the water.

Splash! Fwoooosh!

The calm surface broke. Spray shot up and soaked me from head to toe.

And then…everything went quiet.

"…?"

What the hell? Why was it so quiet?

I hesitated through a moment that felt like an eternity, then opened my eyes.

A little. Just a little.

And at the moment I cautiously peered through narrowed eyes—

Blub blub.

Bubbles rose to the surface.

Whooooooosh.

From the center of the pond, water mixed with murky darkness began to whirl into a vortex.

Which meant…

Fuck. I'm standing right on it.

The realization had barely struck when an enormous pillar of water surged up beneath my feet.

Kwaaaaaaah!

I had no time to react. Water and darkness filled everything around me.

Caught in the chaos that had rushed upon me without warning, I thrashed about with all my strength. No, I tried to. I would have, if I hadn't realized the truth a moment later.

"…!"

I could see it. Feel it.

Water and darkness spun fiercely around me. But so did fresh air and wind—things I couldn't have felt underwater.

Air? Wind?

I blinked and looked around.

I wasn't floating beneath the surface. The water that had risen to my chest was gone. Solid ground lay beneath my feet, while water and darkness swirled endlessly on every side.

It…wrapped around me?

There was no doubt. Instead of sweeping across my entire body, the enormous pillar of water had enclosed me. Beyond the darkness and waves blocking me in on every side, impossible and unbelievable scenes flashed past my eyes.

Fwoooosh!

This is…

I understood at once. What I was seeing wasn't a hallucination caused by extreme confusion or anything of the sort. It was simply the history of some place contained within this pond.

Or perhaps the memories of the divine artifact that had shared this land's fate since its birth.

"…The sacred stone."

I muttered the words like a groan and gazed with stunned eyes at the column of water walling me in on every side.

Time flowed through its ceaseless waves.

A sprout pushed up from barren ground and grew into a towering tree. Grass and flowers spread, and animals appeared one by one.

So fast.

The scenes reflected in the water changed in less than an instant. Day and night traded places dozens of times in the blink of an eye. On one day, thunder and lightning filled the world. On another, a mountain collapsed and erased a river.

Hundreds of years. Perhaps thousands.

Through it all, the sacred stone remained where it was. And others stayed beside it.

Horses. Monkeys. Leopards. Bears…

They differed in species and appearance, but I could hardly call them mere beasts.

Countless among them shone like stars in the night sky before fading away, and eventually, a snow-white White Tiger began guarding the sacred stone.

The guardian spirit.

Then darkness came. A darkness dreadful enough to make me shudder. Sticky, wicked qi surged through the waves.

After all those years, the memories had reached that day.

But the final guardian spirit charged forward, its white mane streaming behind it. With a roar, it bit and clawed at the darkness.

Until demonic qi seeped into the wounds across its body. Until the moment its blue-white eyes turned black.

And then every memory contained within the sacred stone ended as well.

No. Perhaps this was a new beginning.

Swish.

The water rippled again. The darkness vanished, and a face appeared in the pillar surrounding me.

The figure of a young man with his eyes squeezed shut as he immersed something in his hand deep into the pond was unmistakably familiar.

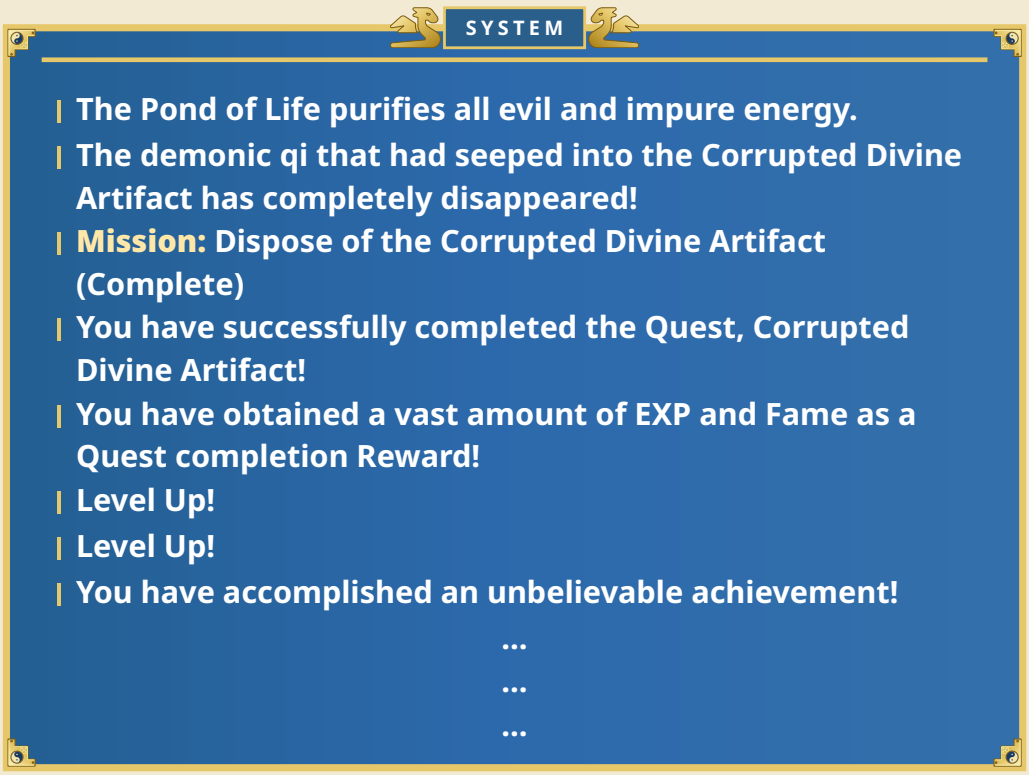
The sacred stone's newest memory began with me.

And that could mean only one thing.

Ding.

A clear chime rang in my ears. The darkness writhing in the pillar of water faded without a trace.

As I stared blankly at the sight, a translucent holographic window appeared before me.



Ding. Ding. Ding.

System notifications rang without pause, and holographic windows filled the air. But all of it felt distant. Through the slowly dispersing pillar of water, a single object shone.

Swish.

As if entranced, I reached out. The water parted before my hand.

It was smaller and lighter than a child's fist, yet impossibly warm. The moment my fingertips touched it—

Fwooooooosh!

Dazzling light swelled. At the same time, the column of water walling me in on every side shot into the sky and burst apart like an explosion.

Fwooooooosh!

The power of life spread endlessly beyond the hidden Sacred Land, toward some faraway place.

With the new sacred stone in my hand, I tipped my head back and looked up. Another clear chime rang out among the falling droplets.

Ding.

SYSTEM

The energy held within the Pond of Life becomes rain and seeps into every part of this land.
The earth will grow more fertile, the plants will stay green, and the wounded will be healed.
The Pond of Life has lost all its energy and dried up. But do not worry. Time has the power to change many things.
The sacred stone will remain in this land, as it always has. Together with a new guardian spirit.

A new guardian spirit?

Before I could grasp what that meant, I heard footsteps.

Thud.

A large forepaw came down on the dry ground where the pond had been.

Snow-white fur fluttered in a breeze that had come from somewhere, and the blue-white eyes, now clearer and more distinct, looked exactly like those of someone from my memories.

"...So it's you."

Grrrr.

Muyaho—no, the new guardian spirit—approached and rubbed its head against me.

Without saying a word, I stroked the back of its neck. Jeok Cheongang, who had watched the entire scene with a dazed expression, barely managed to part his lips.

"...Can't this old man take him with me?"

The Beast Miao King's face went stern.

"Would that be possible?"

Neither of them noticed the green leaf that had just poked up beneath the rain falling around them.

Nor did they know that the rain would soak all of Nanman for three days.

Chapter 721

Even now, nearly ten days after that day, restoration work was still underway at the Nanman Beast Palace.

The Inner Palace, its very heart, had been completely devastated. The Outer Palace had also suffered considerable damage in the aftermath of the battle.

Fortunately, by mobilizing all the warriors and beasts, they had managed to clear away most of the rubble in a short time. But considering all the houses and pavilions that still had to be built for the tribespeople who had suddenly lost their homes, the road ahead seemed endless.

“Right, we lift together on three. One, two.”

“Hngh!”

Grrrrind!

They combined their strength to lift a huge boulder, then hoisted thick timber onto bruised shoulders.

Despite the unending hard labor, no one complained. This was work for everyone’s sake.

The Nanman Beast Palace was a symbol to all who lived in this land, a home of the heart passed down from their ancestors. It no longer mattered which tribe the people beside them belonged to, what they wore or ate, or which local god they worshiped.

Everyone here had come for one purpose: to rebuild the Nanman Beast Palace.

That was why one middle-aged man had walked three hundred li[3028] to get here, too.

Whack!

The ax blade bounced off the thick timber, sending a sharp pain through his palm. He groaned before he could stop himself, and a young man came over.

“That’s not how you swing it. Let me see your hand.”

The middle-aged man held it out without thinking. He had inherited his family’s business and spent his life as a merchant. Now his palms were covered in blisters and blood.

“Ouch. That must hurt. You haven’t done much of this before, have you?”

“N-no, I haven’t.”

“You can’t do it with strength alone. Put your weight behind the ax and follow the grain. One clean whack. Want me to show you?”

The middle-aged man stared blankly at the young man speaking to him so affably.

Something about him felt unfamiliar. Not simply because they had never met. It was his appearance, and the halting way he spoke, almost like a child.

[3028] In this Chinese setting, one li is about 500 m (0.311 mi); three hundred li is about 150 km (93 mi).

Then a thought struck him.

“Could you be…?”

“Han Chinese? Yes.”

“Ah, then you’re the one I’ve only heard about through rumors…”

“That’s right. I’m the one.”

“Oh! Ohhh!”

The young man gave him a warm smile.

“My name is Hyuk Mujin.”

“The Blazing Flame Divine Dragon, Jin Tae… Wait. Mujin who?”

“Hyuk Mujin. The famous Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung’s right-hand man! The pillar of the great Jin Family of Taiyuan! The proud Vice Pavilion Master of the Murim Alliance’s Fire Dragon Pavilion!”

What the hell was wrong with this guy?

Hyuk…what?

Did Han Chinese people have names like that?

The middle-aged man stared at Hyuk Mujin with an uncertain expression, but just as he was about to pick up his ax again—

Tap. Tap-tap.

Raindrops suddenly began to fall.

At the same time, sighs escaped from the people working nearby. There was a mountain of work left to do, and rain would naturally slow them down.

“Damn it. Now it’s raining out of a clear sky.”

“What can we do? We’ll just have to think of it as a passing shower.”

“Come on! Let’s keep at it a little longer!”

The middle-aged man glanced up. There wasn’t a cloud in sight. Even for Nanman’s unpredictable climate, this was unusual.

Still, a little shower won’t hurt.

Perhaps it was because he was already soaked in sweat, but the sudden rain didn’t feel entirely unpleasant. The drops struck his palms and seemed to wash his wounds clean.

That feels good.

He closed his eyes without realizing it.

A hand clamped around his wrist.

Startled, he opened his eyes.

“What…is this?”

Hyuk Mujin’s face had gone rigid. He was staring at the middle-aged man’s palm.

Slowly.

The wounds were disappearing. No—healing.

The blisters that had filled both palms, the skin crushed and torn by swinging the ax…

The rain washed away the abundant blood, revealing new muscle and flesh beneath—paler and firmer than before.

“…!”

“…!”

They looked up at the sky at the same instant, eyes wide.

Boom. Boom. Booooom!

Through the sunlit rain came the sound of drums, announcing someone’s return.

A miracle.

Those two words explained everything. There was no other way to describe it.

Tap. Ssshhhh.

Rain had begun to fall. Warm rain that soaked buildings and earth, coaxed flowers and sprouts into bloom, and fell on the heads of every living thing.

It washed away their wounds and fatigue.

“My wound! It’s healed!”

“My body feels so light!”

“W-what in the world…?”

Grrr?

The people stood dazed until a lion’s roar rang out from somewhere.

“By order of the Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace, everyone outside!”

The shout, charged with powerful internal energy, reached every corner of the Outer Palace. Drawn by the command, people came out to find a massive White Tiger and three men standing before them.

Jeok Cheongang. The Beast Miao King. And Jin Taekyung.

“I’ve called them all out, just as you asked,” Jeok Cheongang whispered. “Now what?”

“Wouldn’t it be enough to tell them to come outside and get rained on? They’ll understand once they experience it themselves.”

At the Beast Miao King and Jeok Cheongang’s whispers, Jin Taekyung shook his head without hesitation.

Unlike those two martial artists to the bone, he had been born and raised in the modern world. He knew what marketing could do.

“We can’t just let them get wet and call it a day. We have to dress this up and sell it first.”

“Dress it up? Sell it?”

"What in the world are you talking about?"

"It's complicated. Think of it as a bit of political maneuvering."

Martial artists could reach the end of their lives without learning a thing about politics. Anyone born in twenty-first-century Korea knew better.

It was a ruthless world. Being bad at a game was enough to make people wish you dead.

Jin Taekyung, who had been called an orphan dozens of times in games he had logged into just for fun, knew the importance of politics better than anyone.[3029]

Make the guy who did well look like he failed, and the guy who failed look like he did well. And…

Make the guy who did well look even better. That was politics. Modern marketing.

He wasn't about to waste this opportunity.

It'd be a shame if everyone just went, "Wow, a miracle!" and left it at that.

He muttered inwardly, then took a deep breath. He shouted toward the people, filling his voice with internal energy.

"Listen, everyone! This holy rain was bestowed by the Earth Mother Goddess!"

The Earth Mother Goddess?

People blinked at the unfamiliar name. Beside him, the Beast Miao King frowned.

"What's that?"

"A god."

"We don't have a god like that here."

"We do now."

"…?"

What the hell is wrong with this bastard?

While the Beast Miao King stood speechless, Jin Taekyung went on.

"The Earth Mother Goddess is the mother of this land, and she is the One God!"

"…!"

"…!"

The One God.

The crowd gaped.

Nanman was home to thirty-two tribes and more than a hundred local gods—far more gods than tribes. And Jin Taekyung was telling them there was only one?

Nanman might have suffered a disaster and the Nanman Beast Palace might have gone to shit, but the faith they had held all their lives remained.

"What nonsense!"

"I've never even heard of an Earth Mother Goddess!"

[3029] Calling someone an orphan is a way of insulting their mother in online games.

"I know you have worked hard for Nanman, but how dare you utter such blasphemy! The Wood God I worship is the One God!"

"Don't bring the Wood God into this! The Fire God is the true god!"

"You little bastard!"

Yet Jin Taekyung looked pleased as he watched the believers grabbing one another by the collars and fighting.

Idiots.

Nanman's religious landscape was as chaotic as the era of the Five Barbarians and Sixteen Kingdoms.[3030] That would make things easier. Unlike them, he had evidence to back his claim.

"You fools! Can you stand in this holy rain and still not feel the Earth Mother Goddess's grace?"

His stern reprimand rang across the courtyard, and the noise vanished as if it had been washed away.

One tribesman, his fist drawn back for an uppercut, looked at the sky in confusion.

Ssshhhhhh.

Rain fell from a cloudless sky. It healed the sick and brought new shoots out of the earth. The sight gave him pause.

"B-but the Wood God…"

"So what did your Wood God do ten days ago? Even when I was setting fire to the mountain, it didn't do much."

"W-well…"

Jin Taekyung cut him off with another shout.

"Everyone gathered here must have seen it! The dazzling radiance of that day! The warmth!"

"…!"

"The miracle then and the miracle today were both blessings from the Earth Mother Goddess, who took pity on you!"

Uncertainty flickered across the people's faces.

They had seen and felt it all. And the rain falling on them now was another miracle.

"The Earth Mother Goddess…"

Even the name sounded warm and familiar. Saying it brought a mother's embrace to mind.

And she was the One God, too. The one and only One God.

"Th-then what are the other gods we've worshiped until now?"

Jin Taekyung answered without a moment's hesitation.

[3030] The Five Barbarians and Sixteen Kingdoms refers to a period of upheaval and competing states in Chinese history.

“You can’t compare the great Earth Mother Goddess to a bunch of lesser gods.”

“L-lesser gods…!”

“The Earth Mother Goddess bestowed this miracle and gave me a divine message: ‘Useless gods. The kind that aren’t worth knowing.‘ She told me to protect you from them.”

“Oh! Ohhh!”

“A miracle, and a divine message too!”

Excitement swept through the crowd. They were all shouting together now.

Jin Taekyung seized the moment and threw both hands into the air.

“Shout together! Earth Mother Goddess!”

“Earth Mother Goddess! Earth Mother Goddess!”

“Louder!”

“Earth Mother Goddess! Earth Mother Goddess!”

“Repeat after me. Mother Goddess Heaven! Unbeliever Hell!”

“Mother Goddess Heaven! Unbeliever Hell!”

“Those in Nanman who believe in the Earth Mother Goddess will be saved even after death, while those who do not believe will fall into a pit of fire when they die!”

“Wooooooah! O Mother Goddess!”

“Save us! Save this land!”

The tribespeople had become the Earth Mother Goddess’s sons and daughters before the Beast Miao King’s eyes. He stared at Jin Taekyung, stunned.

What the hell are you doing, you lunatic?

He wanted to stop him. He had to stop him.

He didn’t know what political maneuvering or dressing things up had to do with this, but the look in everyone’s eyes had already gone frighteningly wild. They screamed to the Earth Mother Goddess as though their throats might tear, their voices shaking heaven and earth.

“Mother Goddess Heaven! Unbeliever Hell!”

“Where’s that guy who said he believed in the Wood God?”

“There! That’s him! Throw him in the fire!”

“Gasp! No! I-I’ve already converted!”

“Prove it!”

“M-Mother Goddess Heaven! Unbeliever Hell!”

“He’s one of us! Stop tying him up! Now find the one who worshiped the Fire God!”

A wave of conversions overflowed in every direction.

The oppressive force radiating from thousands—tens of thousands—of people was so great that even Jeok Cheongang, who had privately wondered whether he should try believing in the Fire God, fell silent.

The Beast Miao King desperately wanted to put an end to this madness.

“E-enough now…”

He had barely managed to speak when Jin Taekyung’s voice rang out.

“Everyone, quiet! The Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace—the priest chosen by the Earth Mother Goddess—is about to speak!”

“Enough… What?”

“Please speak, Priest.”

“What kind of boss?”

Priest? Me?

Before the Beast Miao King could make sense of the word, countless eyes turned toward him.

A suffocating silence settled over the crowd. He was a well-liked Palace Lord, but he had never seen his people look at him with so much love and trust.

“…!”

He stood frozen as a statue. Then his lips parted.

“Mother Goddess Heaven. Unbeliever Hell.”

“Waaaaaaaaah!”

And so, under the care of the great Earth Mother Goddess, Nanman achieved true unity at last.

Chapter 722

The Earth Mother Goddess.

Warmth seemed to radiate from the name alone, and this One God turned all of Nanman upside down the moment she appeared.

It was a spectacular debut that swept away Nanman's religious scene—once every bit as fiercely competitive as Korea's idol market.

And then came the wave of faith.

No, the tide of fanaticism.

"Earth Mother Goddess! Earth Mother Goddess!"

"Mother Goddess Heaven! Unbeliever Hell!"

Those who believed in the Earth Mother Goddess would be saved even after death, while those who denied her would die and be thrown into a pit of fire.

Within half a day, her new sons and daughters were marching through the streets, shouting slogans. Before long, they began proselytizing.

"Hey, you. Wait a moment."

"Why, why do you ask?"

"Do you believe in any god?"

"Well, um… Ah, yes! I believe in the Earth Mother Goddess!"

"Mother Goddess Heaven."

"Pardon?"

"You don't know the slogan? You're a heretic! Unbeliever Heeell!"

"Eek! I'll convert! I'll convert!"

Jeok Cheongang watched the spectacle and summed up his thoughts in one short sentence.

"What a fucking shitshow."

Jeok Cheongang was an outsider, so his reaction ended there. But the Beast Miao King, who had somehow become the Earth Mother Goddess's priest, was half out of his mind.

"This… This isn't right. Our traditions… Our native faith…"

It didn't take him long, though, to realize what was happening.

"Wait. This…"

The Beast Miao King fell deep into thought, then murmured, "Not bad. No, this is actually great."

"You get it now? Nothing brings people together like religion."

Nanman was rebuilding, and for now everyone was pulling together. Even so, there was no denying that the Nanman Beast Palace was divided.

"You've been wondering what to do with the tribal chieftains we threw into the underground prison, haven't you?"

"…Yes. No matter what crimes they committed, each of them led a tribe."

He hadn't spared them out of some misplaced sympathy.

At its core, the Nanman Beast Palace was an alliance of thirty-two tribes, and more than twenty of their chieftains had taken part in the betrayal.

If he executed them all as traitors, some people were bound to resent it. People took their own side.

"For now, the people want them executed. But given time, problems will arise. They simply haven't surfaced yet."

Memories had a way of becoming kinder with time.

Once the chaos settled, people would probably begin to whisper.

Our chieftain was a decent man, though.

That's right. Baeksang tricked him. He couldn't help it.

Come to think of it, isn't it strange that so many chieftains were involved?

I could picture it all too easily.

Those cautious conversations would begin in small groups, spread throughout the Nanman Beast Palace, and eventually cause another rift.

"On top of that, the tribes whose chieftains were traitors involved in this affair will be subjected to the other tribes' silent contempt. That will lead to resentment between the tribes."

"But we can't just let them all go."

"They were blinded by wealth and glory and betrayed Nanman once already. Would a second betrayal be so difficult?"

No wonder the Beast Miao King had agonized over what to do with them. He needed a way to punish the traitors without tearing Nanman apart.

At least, that had been the case until the One God known as the Earth Mother Goddess appeared and performed an unprecedented miracle.

"Now is the perfect time. We can expose their crimes under the law, execute them, and root every weed out of this land!"

The law? Executions?

I clicked my tongue at the sight of his clenched fist.

He still doesn't get it.

"What?"

"The law is fine, but this is judgment. Divine judgment."

"Divine… judgment?"

"The men in the underground prison are traitors who joined forces with the Fiend known as Dark Heaven to corrupt this land. And you, Great Hero Yayul, are the one and only priest. You received a divine revelation from the Earth Mother Goddess: kill every last one of those bastards and purify Nanman."

"…!"

"…!"

The Beast Miao King stared at me, wide-eyed. So did Jeok Cheongang, who had been listening beside us.

I could read the thoughts in their eyes.

Wait, he's spinning it like that?

Wow. Is this guy seriously insane?

What a pair of naïve old men.

Ten Kings be damned. Maybe spending their entire lives focused on martial arts had left them ignorant of how the world worked.

Even after leading the Nanman Beast Palace for so long, the Beast Miao King wasn't much more politically savvy than Jeok Cheongang.

No wonder Baeksang's faction ran rampant.

But who was I?

A proud citizen of Korea.

I had spent my whole life in a country with more churches than fried-chicken restaurants, where you could spot twenty-first-century martyrs carrying crosses near any subway station.

I decided to show the Beast Miao King, who still didn't understand what it meant to be a priest, the power he held.

"Now, repeat after me."

The Beast Miao King stared blankly at me, then echoed my words.

"Now, repeat after me."

"No, not that. We're starting now."

"Ah. Right."

"I am a priest."

"I am a priest."

"The Earth Mother Goddess is a god."

"The Earth Mother Goddess is a god."

"Good job. Now continue."

"I am a priest. The Earth Mother Goddess is a god."

"Excellent. Repeat it."

"I am a priest. The Earth Mother Goddess is a god. I am a priest. The Earth Mother Goddess is a god. I am… invincible!"

"…?"

That last part wasn't quite what I'd taught him.

Regardless, the Beast Miao King trembled with excitement, awakened to his role as the Earth Mother Goddess's priest. Then he took the first great step toward reforming Nanman.

"In the name of the benevolent Earth Mother Goddess, I convene the Tribal Grand Council!"

"…"

"…"

He really was a priest now.

The Tribal Grand Council began in the blink of an eye.

Partly because so few tribal chieftains were able to attend, but sending messengers probably hadn't been necessary anyway. The chieftains were already waiting for the Beast Miao King in a hastily prepared meeting room.

"Palace Lord!"

"It's just a rumor, isn't it? Tell us it's a rumor!"

"What is this about an Earth Mother Goddess all of a sudden?"

"Fuck, the tribespeople have gone completely insane. They're like Demonic Cultists during the Great Faction War!"

"This is absurd! Are you telling us to abandon the Wood God we've worshiped all our lives?"

They rushed at the Beast Miao King, their faces a mixture of disbelief and shock. But as soon as they heard what kind of effect launching the Earth Mother Goddess as a new brand could have on the market, they made their declarations in solemn tones.

"As tribal chieftain, I must set an example. I shall convert."

"The Tribal Grand Council supports you, Palace Lord."

"Wow, a united Nanman!"

"The Wood God? When it comes to gods, the Earth Mother Goddess is the one."

They were in charge for a reason. They caught on fast.

Of course, some people weren't so quick and came to confront the Beast Miao King.

"Palace Lord! How can this make any sense?"

"What exactly is the Earth Mother Goddess? And where did this nonsense about Mother Goddess Heaven and Unbeliever Hell come from?"

"It's poison! The Palace Lord has spread poison throughout Nanman!"

"Do you think we priests will stand by and watch? We would rather die than let this pass!"

Dozens of priests, every one of them very old.

They had spent their lives serving the local gods, but they confronted the Beast Miao King with voices that rang out loud and clear despite their age.

Until Jeok Cheongang opened his mouth.

“If you won’t let it pass, what are you going to do about it?”

“What did you say?”

“Well, listen to the way this young bastard talks to his elders.”

“Palace Lord! Punish that insolent man at once! Some nobody we’ve never even heard of, running his mouth like—”

“Fire King.”

“…?”

“…?”

“That’s my sobriquet. Fire King Jeok Cheongang.”

“…!”

“…!”

“I’ll let anyone a hundred or older off. The rest of you, heads to the floor.”

The fame of the Fire King Jeok Cheongang—or rather, his temper—was well known not only in the Central Plains but also throughout Nanman.

“Um, Palace Lord?”

“Ah, what a lovely downpour.”

“…”

When even the Beast Miao King, their final lifeline, looked off toward a distant mountain, the priests immediately got down with their heads to the floor and swore that from then on, they would keep their mouths shut about the Earth Mother Goddess no matter what.

“Honestly, we call ourselves priests, but we’ve never even seen the gods we serve. Isn’t that right?”

“Hahaha. True, true. But the Earth Mother Goddess has shown us a miracle herself. How extraordinary!”

“Um, Palace Lord. Might there be any positions left on the Earth Mother Goddess’s side? You would remain the priest, of course, but perhaps another role…”

“Ahem. Since you mention it, the gods we serve are all closely tied to this land, aren’t they? Perhaps we could join forces…”

“Exactly! The Earth Mother Goddess is the mother of this land. In a sense, she gave birth to all the gods!”

A fantastic collaboration: priests who didn’t want to lose their livelihoods and the Beast Miao King, who wanted to unite Nanman completely.

After a serious discussion, the Earth Mother Goddess emerged as a god with dozens of lesser gods under her. I had no desire for a religious war, so I lent a little help too.

“This is getting complicated. Why don’t we just make one?”

“Make what?”

“Well… I guess we could call it a Bible for now?”

“A Bible?”

“What’s that?”

“The history of this land. The word of God. Think of it along those lines.”

“Oh! Ohhh!”

“Truly, a talent sent by the gods!”

After that, I tossed out a few hints and watched from the sidelines.

They started racking their brains for lore like webnovel authors with a deadline breathing down their necks.

Then the traitors who had spent the past ten days locked in the underground prison were finally dragged before everyone.

“P-please spare me!”

“Baeksang tricked me! I never joined forces with Dark Heaven!”

But there was no forgiveness. No mercy.

Ssshhhhhh.

The benevolent Earth Mother Goddess’s blessing fell upon the land.

Beneath the rain—by then known as the Sacred Rain—the people cried out for judgment, and the executioner’s blade flashed.

Slash!

That was the end of it. The bodies of the traitors who had once led this land were thrown to the beasts.

The rain fell without end, washing away the blood they had spilled.

And only then did the people suddenly realize.

They had finally become one.

They had overcome a catastrophe together, witnessed and experienced an unbelievable miracle, and at last become one family within the warm embrace of the Earth Mother Goddess.

That was the true miracle.

A miracle that had finally united the people of thirty-two tribes.

And the forest keeper who had cut down every diseased tree and weed in the forest shouted before them all.

“From this moment on, we are the people of Nanman—wholly united as one!”

“Waaaaaah!”

Their voices rose together, echoing in every direction.

It sounded like the roar of warriors heralding the Great War soon to come.

Chapter 723

One day. Two days. Then three.

The rain that had come to be called the Sacred Rain still fell across Nanman. Beneath the benevolent grace of the Earth Mother Goddess, nothing could stop its newly united people.

Thud! Craaack!

With a single swing of an ax from an older man, a massive tree snapped, while a thin woman casually hoisted a mountain of firewood.

Watching from the window, I muttered, “Wow. They got one hell of a buff.”

“A b-buff?”

The question came from behind me. I already knew I had a visitor, so I turned to answer.

“Nothing. What brings you here? Shouldn’t you be swamped right now?”

“I was passing by. Besides, I’m not as busy as I was. Everything is being put right in the blink of an eye.”

“Really?”

For an uninvited guest, Yayul Mok was a welcome sight. I looked at the Young Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace and went on.

“That’s good news. Who do they have to thank?”

Yayul Mok shrugged.

“Father says it’s thanks to some Han Chinese man. He must be mistaken.”

“I don’t think he is.”

“He must be. A despicable Han Chinese man would never help us.”

“True. You can’t trust anyone from the Central Plains.”

“Now you’re speaking sense.”

A brief silence passed. Then, as if on cue, we both let out a quiet laugh.

“It’s all thanks to you, Jin Taekyung.”

“We all worked hard, but that’s true. I did contribute quite a lot.”

The smile on Yayul Mok’s face deepened at my shameless reply.

“Are all Han Chinese as lacking in humility as you?”

“No. Just me.”

“That’s a relief.”

“Why?”

“Because I think I could grow to like Han Chinese more than I do now.”

“Oh…”

I looked at him with fresh eyes.

I never thought I'd hear him say that. I'd noticed the change little by little, but the hostility toward the Central Plains that once filled him was gone.

"Don't like them too much. Go there and you'll find plenty of madmen."

"You take me for a child. I know people are much the same wherever you go. In Nanman and the Central Plains alike."

"Really? You didn't seem to know that when we first met."

"…That was because you turned the fields into a sea of fire."

Looking a little embarrassed by the memory, Yayul Mok came over to the window. He gazed out through its half-open shutters, then spoke.

"It still doesn't feel real. That all this could happen in the place where I was born and raised."

"The disaster? Or the miracle?"

"Both." After a moment, he added, "But this, too, must be a god's will."

"…You believe in the Earth Mother Goddess too?"

"I don't know about that. But I believe a god exists. I've seen things I can't explain any other way."

Anyone who encounters something beyond understanding is bound to think of a god. You might not know who's up there in that impossibly distant sky, but you'd figure they must be someone impressive.

I'm no different.

I kept that last thought to myself and changed the subject.

"So, how's the cleanup going?"

"If you mean the restoration, we're already in the final stages. We should see the finished results within a few days at the latest."

Considering that the Inner Palace had been reduced to a wasteland and more than several hundred houses and pavilions in the Outer Palace had collapsed, it was a truly astonishing pace.

But instead of being surprised, I gave a small nod.

Well, that buff is incredible.

The rain falling even now carried the powers of life and purification. It was an area-wide buff that kept people full of energy and enhanced their physical abilities.

It'll wear off when the rain stops, of course. But a few days is plenty.

They say even a sheet of paper is easier to lift when two people do it together. Here, tens of thousands of Nanman people were working day and night to rebuild their homes, to make a new start in the place where they belonged.

And their efforts were bearing fruit at an incredible pace.

"What about the other matter?"

Yayul Mok understood what I meant.

“We abolished the Great Chieftain system to remove the hierarchy and divisions that remained between the tribes. The Miao people and all four of the other major tribes agreed.”

“Good. Oh, what about Yohi?”

He nodded.

“She was the first to propose abolishing it.”

The tribal chieftains who had joined hands with Baeksang had been executed in front of countless witnesses, but Yohi alone had received a full pardon.

She had repented of her wrongdoing, however late. More importantly, she had led the beasts in helping the tribespeople escape the Outer Palace. No one had raised any real objection to her pardon.

“She said that she couldn’t leave behind the same precedent as Baeksang, Heugung, and herself.”

“She’s right. The Great Chieftains had too much power.”

“Father and the other tribal chieftains agreed. From now on, the Nanman Beast Palace will answer to the Palace Lord alone. The Tribal Grand Council will remain in case of an emergency. And…”

As I listened to the rest of Yayul Mok’s explanation, I realized once again that the Nanman Beast Palace had been reborn.

The Beast Miao King was now both Palace Lord and priest, with authority far greater than before. The appearance of the Earth Mother Goddess had calmed the people, and they had come together regardless of tribe or faith.

For hundreds of years, since the founding of the Nanman Beast Palace, this land had been divided into thirty-two pieces. At last, it was united.

You really could call it a small kingdom now.

Its tribespeople numbered in the tens of thousands, and its warriors nearly ten thousand. With the beasts they commanded as well, calling it a kingdom was no exaggeration.

Even allowing for the fact that the Nanman warriors were inferior to the martial arts of the Central Plains, they still represented an immense military force.

I looked at Yayul Mok with fresh interest.

“…Why are you looking at me like that?”

“Now that I think about it, you do look kind of noble. Turns out you’re a prince, or something.”

“…A prince?”

He repeated the word doubtfully, then let out a quiet laugh.

“What’s so funny? It’s not that far off.”

“I was just thinking what an honor it is.”

“What?”

“To be called a prince by the Apostle of the great Earth Mother Goddess. What else would you call it?”

“…?”

What was he talking about?

While I blinked at him, Yayul Mok took something from inside his robe and held it out.

“Take it.”

This is…

“We decided to call it the Mother Goddess Scripture. Father asked me to give it to you.”

I took the bundle of bamboo strips, still bewildered.

Ding.

SYSTEM

— You have acquired Mother Goddess Scripture.
— Mother Goddess Scripture is a scripture containing records of the Earth Mother Goddess.
— A god can exist only when someone believes in it.
— The Earth Mother Goddess has become known as the One God of Nanman!
— Countless believers who follow the Earth Mother Goddess are ecstatic!
— According to the records in Mother Goddess Scripture, your name has become known anew!
— You have achieved Religious Reformation, an achievement that makes one wonder whether anyone would actually go this far!
— You have acquired the Title Apostle of the Earth Mother Goddess!

Holographic windows filled the air along with the System notifications.

I stared at them for a moment, then hurriedly unrolled the bamboo strips. After reading the tiny writing on them, I burst out laughing in disbelief.

“What is this?”

Seeing my reaction, Yayul Mok shrugged.

“It says exactly what it means. The Earth Mother Goddess has been with this land since ancient times as its mother goddess, and whenever Nanman fell into crisis, she personally sent her apostle to save the people…”

“And that’s me?”

"Of course. Three hundred years ago, it was my ancestor, the first Palace Lord. And two hundred years ago, it was the Sect Leader of the Fire Gate Clan at the time—the clan you belong to."

They'd managed to fit it all together.

Sure, I'd given them a few hints. I just hadn't expected to find my name written out in full.

No, not just my name. Our names.

Rustle.

I skimmed the rest and found plenty I recognized. Jeok Cheongang, of course. The Fire Dragon Pavilion members. Even Namho.

This was supposed to be something like a Bible. Could they really put us all in it?

"I know it was thrown together in a hurry, but this is ridiculous. Who the hell came up with this setting?"

"My father."

"No wonder it's so impressive. How did he manage to make the setting this detailed?"

"…"

I avoided Yayul Mok's gaze and tucked the bamboo strips into my robe.

The Apostle of the Earth Mother Goddess.

I'd somehow become an apostle of a god, a role that certainly hadn't been written in my fate. But I didn't feel bad about it. In fact, right now it was a major gain.

It should ease some of the resentment Nanman's people hold toward the Central Plains.

Yayul Mok suddenly spoke, interrupting my thoughts.

"So, are you ready?"

"Hm?"

"To leave Nanman."

"…!"

After a moment's silence, I smacked my lips.

"You're sharp."

"It would be strange if I hadn't noticed."

"How did you find out?"

"Even if I ignored everyone else, that huge fellow has been frantically gathering food since yesterday. As if he's preparing for a long journey."

There was no need to ask who he meant by "that huge fellow." Guessing the culprit, I sighed.

"Taishan, you crazy bastard. I told you to move quietly."

"Your master, Fire King Jeok Cheongang, made off with five jars of fruit wine."

"…"

Oh, come on, Old Master.

I squeezed my eyes shut. Yayul Mok's voice reached me anyway.

"You should at least say goodbye before you go. Everyone's waiting."

It wasn't until we neared the North Gate that I realized Yayul Mok hadn't been exaggerating when he said everyone.

This is…

Thousands of people. Maybe tens of thousands.

Among the countless people filling the field outside the North Gate, where fresh grass and flowers had spread thanks to the life-giving downpour, I saw several familiar faces.

Jeok Cheongang stood in front of a cart loaded with jars of fruit wine, pretending nothing was out of the ordinary.

Taishan held meat in both hands, looking solemn. Beside him were the Fire Dragon Pavilion members, each mounted on a beast.

And then…

"You've finally arrived."

Yayul Cheok, the Beast Miao King and master of the Nanman Beast Palace, spoke with a stern face. He stood here on behalf of everyone in this land.

"Why were you going to leave without a word?"

I scratched the back of my head.

"I was going to tell you."

"You were?"

"Well… in a letter."

"Just a letter?"

"You looked so busy…"

"Do you think that makes sense?"

"…"

Was this what they called a question-mark murderer?

I couldn't find an answer. The Beast Miao King, a full head taller than me, gazed down at me.

"Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung."

It was a quiet summons. The Beast Miao King continued in a solemn voice.

"You came to our homeland for a reason. You had a purpose here, did you not?"

"…"

“And now you mean to leave without a word, though you have not achieved that purpose. You faced death countless times in an unfamiliar land and saved countless lives. Yet not once did you ask for the reward you were owed.”

His gaze and voice were fixed on me, but everyone gathered there could hear him. Everyone was watching.

“Why?”

I found myself answering.

“I was just one person trying to save other people.”

“…!”

“I didn’t do it for a reward. And I couldn’t ask anyone to make another sacrifice. That’s why I was going to leave.”

Silence fell.

Tens of thousands of people stood together, yet I couldn’t hear a single breath. Against that silence, the rain falling on our heads sounded louder than ever. Beyond it, the Beast Miao King’s towering figure moved.

Rustle.

His back was as firm as a pillar—the back of the Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace, a man who should never have had to bow to anyone. Now it bent toward me.

Before all his people, he offered me a deeply respectful clasped-fist bow.

“I, Yayul Cheok, the Beast Miao King, on behalf of everyone who lives on this land, formally petition Great Hero Jin Taekyung, Fire Dragon Pavilion Master, for our admission into the Murim Alliance.”

It happened on a day when the rain was slowly easing.

Chapter 724

Some people left. Others stayed behind.

As the Beast Miao King watched the travelers disappear into the distance, he knew they would meet again before the ache of this farewell had faded.

And when they did, it would be on a battlefield, fighting back-to-back.

“In the end, we’re going to the Central Plains once again.”

The Beast Miao King gave a small nod at the voice beside him.

“Yes. So it has come to this.”

“A great deal of blood will be spilled.”

“Do you think your father made the wrong decision?”

“No.”

Yayul Mok continued calmly.

“If my father—no, if the Palace Lord hadn’t wanted to go to the Central Plains, I would have gone with them on my own.”

“…!”

His gaze followed the figures receding in the distance.

Strangers from a foreign land. Yet it was because those strangers had come that they had been able to protect their homeland.

“Now it’s our turn to help them.”

There had been a time when Yayul Mok, too, had been hostile to the Central Plains and rejected the Han Chinese.

But things were different now. The still-unseasoned Young Palace Lord of the Nanman Beast Palace had learned what it meant to act with humanity from one stranger. He would never forget the conversation they had shared.

“What would you do if the pasture caught fire?”

“Put it out right away.”

“Why?”

“Because if we don’t, the flames will spread everywhere.”

“Good. There’s your answer.”

“…!”

“Don’t overthink why we came. There’s a fire, so we’re trying to put it out. Just like the Nanman people who left this land for the Central Plains decades ago.”

At first, he hadn’t believed it. He couldn’t.

The Han Chinese he knew were despicable people who had betrayed Nanman’s trust and driven countless of its people to their deaths.

[3031] Using the Chinese li, ten thousand li is about 5,000 km (3,110 mi).

There was no way they had traveled more than ten thousand li[3031] to help without asking for anything in return.

That was what he had thought then.

But now I understand what you meant.

The pasture called the world was already on fire, and the vast inferno known as Dark Heaven would devour everything.

Where people were born and raised, how they dressed, what they looked like—none of it mattered now.

Just as Nanman had finally become one, everyone would have to join forces to put out the fire.

“We’ll fight with our lives on the line. For everyone who lives on this land. And for them.”

At the sight of his son’s resolve, the Beast Miao King smiled faintly.

When did he grow up so much?

Just as Nanman had finally become one, his only son had grown as well.

So why did the Beast Miao King’s heart feel as hollow as an empty jar?

You hopeless fool.

He swallowed the bitter thought and tilted a flask he had taken from his robes.

Fragrant fruit wine fell with the dwindling rain and soaked into the earth—the soil of the homeland where two sworn brothers had been born and raised together.

“Good wine, this. Wouldn’t you agree?”

The Beast Miao King had not tasted a drop, yet at his mumble the people around him looked puzzled. He merely laughed with relief.

This was enough.

One distant day, they would meet again and raise their cups together.

Yes. Someday, without fail.

The Beast Miao King lifted his head. Through the thinning rain, azure heaven spread above the countless people of Nanman.

Or perhaps it was the gaze of an unseen absolute being.

“Sound the war drums.”

His low voice broke the suffocating silence. He drew a deep breath, gathered his internal energy, and shouted.

“God wills it!”

His azure dragon’s roar rang in every direction. Somewhere high on a hill, the snow-white White Tiger that had been watching them let out a roar of its own.

Kraaaaaaang!

Clang-clang-clang!

“Waaaaaaah!”

Thousands—tens of thousands—of beasts and humans stamped their feet and cried out. Sunlight flashed from countless blades, scattering in every direction.

At long last, the prelude to the Great War had begun.

A melancholy look in his eyes, Hyuk Mujin waited until everyone was watching before slowly opening his mouth.

“I was just one person trying to save other people.”

“Stop.”

“I didn’t do it for a reward. And I couldn’t ask anyone to make another sacrifice. That’s why I was going to leave.”

“I said stop.”

“Come on, why are you like this? I never get tired of doing this, no matter how many times I repeat it. Honestly, you all agree, don’t you?”

Taishan, who was tearing into a wild boar’s hind leg atop a bear running at full speed, nodded vigorously.

“Taishan agrees!”

“See? Even he agrees. I was just one person trying to save—”

I quietly cut Hyuk Mujin off.

“Mujin.”

“Yes.”

“Do you want to become a eunuch?”

The grin vanished from his face.

“No.”

“Is your life too boring, then?”

“Not at all. I’m worried it’s already more exciting than I can handle.”

“Want me to make it peaceful?”

“You don’t mean that you’re going to kill me, do you?”

“What if I do?”

“Wow, look over there. Beautiful scenery.”

“Good. Let’s travel quietly.”

“…Yes, sir.”

Hyuk Mujin shut his mouth, but Taishan looked disappointed and called for an encore.

“Pavilion Master! Taishan wants to hear more!”

So I called in his designated bully.

“Old Man Nam, I think it’s time to shut that bastard’s mouth.”

“Oh, finally!”

Namho cheered like an independence fighter at liberation[3032] and pulled a muzzle from his robes as though he'd been waiting for the signal.

Made of sturdy black iron and leather straps, it looked bizarre—and strangely familiar.

"Wait. Where did you get that?"

"From a Nanman animal trainer. He said they mostly use it to tame wild bears."

"…"

"Why are you looking at me like that? Is there a problem?"

"Well, not exactly."

Something about it bothered me. I had the uneasy feeling that if Namho put it on him, I'd have to stop calling him Taishan and start calling him product number TAESAN-317.

I hesitated, then gave in and sighed.

"Don't put it on him. Actually, just throw it away."

"No! Why?"

Why? Because I felt like it would dirty my eyes.

I snatched the muzzle from the practically wailing Namho and hurled it into the distance. Jeok Cheongang, who had watched the whole thing, spoke with an uneasy look on his face.

"What on earth happened in Nanman?"

For a moment, I didn't understand what he meant.

"Pardon?"

"I'm asking what happened to make every last one of you lose your mind."

"A lot happened in Nanman, sure, but they were all like this to begin with."

"What?"

"Surprising, but true."

"You brat! Don't talk nonsense. With things this much of a goddamn mess, how did none of you get killed?"

"…"

Yeah. Fuck.

Looking back on what had happened in Nanman, I had a reasonable suspicion that the Earth Mother Goddess really had blessed us.

I came close to death several times. Making it back in one piece is a miracle.

Of course, I was the only one who had come close to death that many times. The others had suffered injuries, major and minor, but the Sacred Rain had worked so well that every one of them had recovered completely.

And we somehow stopped Dark Heaven's plot.

[3032] "Liberation" refers to Korea's liberation from Japanese colonial rule in 1945.

A great many people had died in the process. Still, stopping the Southern Heaven Demon Empress—practically the Fire Dragon Pavilion's top priority, and mine—was more than half a success.

The Nanman Beast Palace officially joined the Murim Alliance, too.

Truthfully, that had been all but certain once we stopped the Southern Heaven Demon Empress. Even without the Earth Mother Goddess's value as a new brand, the outcome probably wouldn't have changed much.

Stamp out a fire halfheartedly and it only burns hotter. Anger can draw scattered people together.

All I had done was give them another point to rally around: a One God who could erase boundaries between tribes that had stood for centuries and help them become a more united, more powerful force.

And that made the Murim Alliance stronger, too.

On this, I had no doubts. The Nanman Beast Palace was firmly on our side now.

According to what the Beast Miao King had promised before we left, they would send more troops than they had during the Great Faction War and do everything in their power to hold back Dark Heaven.

So why?

Why do I still feel uneasy?

We'd accomplished a great deal, yet I couldn't shake the feeling that something was wrong.

Perhaps it was because one question remained unanswered.

The new Murim Alliance has been formed. The forces of the Central Plains are gathering around the Nine Sects and One Gang and the Five Great Families. Yet Dark Heaven still hasn't shown its full strength.

Their first intervention in Shanxi Province, the Shaolin Bloodshed that followed, and every incident since—none of them had been minor. But each had involved only a fragment of Dark Heaven, not the organization as a whole.

They should be past the point of testing the waters.

What the hell were they—or rather, what was the Lord of Heaven—trying to do?

And why did the Lord of Heaven…

"Why would the Lord of Heaven take this much interest in me, of all people?"

I hadn't meant to say it aloud. Everyone looked at me at once, and before I could explain, Hyuk Mujin perked up like a meerkat.

"Gasp, Captain. Did someone confess to you? Oh my God. A Nanman?"

"…"

I wanted to gouge out his eyes, sparkling like the morning star. I fought the urge.

"It's not like that, you crazy bastard."

"Then she's Han Chinese?"

“How many times do I have to tell you—wait. Come to think of it, that part’s right.”

“Wow. When did this happen? Who confessed?”

“The Lord of Heaven.”

“Now there’s an impressive name for a young lady. Sounds like a daughter from a respectable family…”

Hyuk Mujin stopped. He blinked, thought for a moment, then spoke again.

“Who?”

“The Lord of Heaven.”

“The one I know? I mean, the one everyone knows?”

“Who else?”

“Fuck. That respectable household was in Xinjiang…”

Beyond Qinghai, where the Kunlun Sect stood, lay Xinjiang. For a thousand years, Xinjiang had been the domain of the Demonic Path.

Once everyone realized that the supposed young lady interested in me belonged to Dark Heaven’s household, they stared at one another, momentarily lost for words. Then the questions came all at once.

“Why would the Lord of Heaven be interested in you?” Hyuk Mujin asked.

Namho cut in. “Isn’t it obvious? He keeps getting in the Lord of Heaven’s way.”

“Sure, but the Captain isn’t one of the Three Saints or the Ten Kings. He’s just a scrap who’s only just made a name for himself.”

“Now that you mention it, you’re not wrong.”

“Taishan can eat scraps.”

“You son of a bitch. I knew this might happen, so I brought another muzzle. Come here. Open your mouth.”

“Why are you all talking about him like that? Our Pavilion Master is a scrap? Song Escort, Sama Pyo! Say something!”

“Young Lady Ju, I’m sorry, but I think I have to leave. I managed to make it all the way to Nanman, but if the Lord of Heaven has taken an interest in that man…”

“Taishan! That’s not meat! Don’t bite it! Old Man Nam, put that muzzle down!”

“…”

Fuck. I had never seen such a complete mess.

I stared blankly at the disaster unfolding before me. Then a quiet Sound Transmission reached my ears.

—Let’s talk.

It was Jeok Cheongang.

Chapter 725

“Let’s talk.”

I gave a small nod at the Sound Transmission in my ear and loosened my grip on the reins.

The beast understood and gradually slowed. Jeok Cheongang drew alongside me, then spoke.

“Is it true the Lord of Heaven has taken a particular interest in you?”

“Yes.”

“Huh. Strange. This old man is hearing about it for the first time.”

“I suppose so. It’s the first time I’ve mentioned it, too.”

“Why didn’t you tell me?”

“You never asked.”

Honestly, I expected to get hit for that. I even snapped into a defensive stance.

But Jeok Cheongang only stared at me for a moment before muttering, almost to himself, “You didn’t tell me because I didn’t ask… Well, I can’t say you’re wrong.”

What had gotten into him?

“Um, Old Master?”

“What.”

“Are you… sulking?”

“What? Sulking? Me?”

“Yes.”

Jeok Cheongang laughed as though I’d told him a marvelous joke.

“Why would I sulk? I’m not five years old. Of course, we had plenty of time to discuss it over the past three days, and I held back from asking out of consideration for you. But that doesn’t matter in the slightest, so don’t give it another thought. The fool is the one who didn’t ask, isn’t he? Hahaha.”

“…”

“People in the martial world say a master and disciple should keep no secrets from each other. But that hardly applies to us, so pay it no mind. If you think about it, I needed someone to carry on the Fire Gate Clan’s lineage, and you needed martial arts. We both got what we wanted. That’s enough. Talking about the bond between master and disciple in this day and age is laughable anyway.”

“…”

“I ran my balls off getting to Nanman because I was worried something might happen to you. Even plucked out every hair on my perfectly good head to hide my identity. But I’m fine. My balls didn’t fall off, and my hair will grow back soon enough. Of course it will.”

“…”

"Why would this old man sulk just because he didn't hear some goddamn story? A thirsty man should dig his own well. If I waited for you to tell me when the time was right, wouldn't I end up dried out and dead just like this old man? Hahahaha."

Watching Jeok Cheongang laugh like an immortal, I thought, He's really fucking sulking.

Could a person even sulk this much?

Forbes could name him the World's Most Sulky Person, and no one would object.

"I remember the day I first met you. I wasn't in my right mind then, what with the infirmities of old age. I suppose that's why they say old people ought to die…"

The pressure was suffocating.

I finally managed to interrupt Jeok Cheongang's runaway train of a speech.

"What I said earlier was a joke. I had too much on my mind to tell you. I needed time to sort through it myself."

"Hm."

Jeok Cheongang narrowed his eyes. Sounding a little more like himself, he asked gruffly, "So was the part about the Lord of Heaven a joke too?"

"Unfortunately, that part's true."

"What proof do you have?"

I told him what had happened. He'd already heard a brief version while we were at the Nanman Beast Palace, but this time I went into far more detail.

By the time I finished, his brow was furrowed.

"Those bastards tried to capture you?"

"Yes. But when that didn't work, they tried to kill me. The Great Snow Fiend and Black Hand Fist Demon at the Poisonblood Grounds, and the Southern Heaven Demon Empress too."

"Did they try to capture you on the Lord of Heaven's orders?"

"That…"

I thought back for a moment, then shook my head.

"I don't think so."

"Why not?"

"If the Lord of Heaven had ordered her to capture me, the Southern Heaven Demon Empress wouldn't have tried to kill me. Not even if she had to face her own death alone."

"Loyalty that outweighs her life… Hard to believe."

"It wasn't just loyalty."

I answered quietly as I recalled everything about the Southern Heaven Demon Empress. The look in her eyes. Her expression. The rapture in her voice, and all she had said and done.

What I'd sensed from her that day couldn't be described as mere loyalty.

It was…

“Fanaticism. To the Southern Heaven Demon Empress—no, to Dark Heaven—the Lord of Heaven is a living god.”

“…!”

“Everyone in Dark Heaven fears and reveres him. If he ordered them to capture me at any cost, that would be a divine command no one could defy.”

The Blood Lord, for all his power. The Western Heaven Demon Lord. Even the Southern Heaven Demon Empress, who had now met her end.

All of them had bowed before the Lord of Heaven and called themselves his servants.

Each was a monster capable of tearing an ordinary Supreme Peak master apart with their bare hands. And the Lord of Heaven was the king—the god—those monsters worshiped.

“I can’t be certain, but I think the Southern Heaven Demon Empress tried to capture me simply because the Lord of Heaven had shown an interest in me.”

“To win his favor?”

I nodded. Jeok Cheongang let out a low groan.

“Fanatics…”

The word faded into the wind.

Seated on the tiger’s back, he watched the scenery rush past in silence. Then he spoke again.

“Have you ever seen a member of the Demonic Cult?”

“Do I look sixty to you?”

“Yes. At your age, it would be natural that you hadn’t seen one. You were born long after the Great Faction War ended.”

“Then why ask?”

“A thought occurred to me. We might be better off fighting the Demonic Cult of those days all over again.”

“…!”

“They were fanatics too, of course. But their leader, the Heavenly Demon, was still a man. The hundred thousand followers of the Demonic Path beneath him knew it. To them, he was the Cult Leader who led them. He was not a god.”

I understood what Jeok Cheongang meant.

To the Demonic Cult, the Heavenly Demon had been flesh and blood. To Dark Heaven, the Lord of Heaven was a god.

They would fight for that god without fear of death. They would die smiling, even with countless spears and blades buried in their bodies.

“This will be a more terrible war than any we’ve known.”

Jeok Cheongang fixed me with a grave look.

"Especially for you."

"Because the Lord of Heaven is watching me?"

"Whether you wanted it or not, you've drawn more attention than you should have. Somewhere in the world, even now, people are speaking your name."

"…"

"The Three Saints and Ten Kings are old names. But you are different. You possess a talent without precedent throughout history, and no one in the world can deny that you became a master despite having only just passed the age of twenty."

His gaze held unmistakable pride—and worry.

"That is why the Lord of Heaven is watching you, too. And more importantly, he has already seen you once—your true nature and the infinite potential hidden within you."

"…The Sichuan Tang Clan's underground prison."

"Yes. He used some unknown supernatural power to look at you through the Western Heaven Demon Lord's eyes."

How could I forget?

Stone dust raining onto my head. Blood spattered across the stone wall.

And the words of the Western Heaven Demon Lord, standing there as he looked at me.

No. The words of the Lord of Heaven, who had borrowed his servant's body for a moment.

Interesting. Very interesting.

He had been smiling then. Even as his entire body turned into a handful of ashes and scattered away, he had not forgotten to offer me one final greeting.

I'll see you again.

The memory still made my heart sink.

Jeok Cheongang watched me draw a slow breath, then said, "Perhaps… the Lord of Heaven has some inkling of the secrets you've never told anyone."

"…!"

"That's why I can no longer avoid asking."

The world seemed to stop, as though someone had pressed pause. Jeok Cheongang spoke slowly.

"Can you tell this old man everything you've been hiding?"

Jeok Cheongang raised his head to the sky.

After three days of unbroken rain, it was blue and clear—nothing like the turmoil in his mind.

The realm of immortals…

The words he could not bring himself to say faded within him. What else was there to say? How was he supposed to make sense of it?

He had lived a long life. Suddenly, all those years felt of no use at all.

If you were here, I could have steadied this confused heart in no time.

He thought of the friend who had died several months ago. A monk who loved drink and meat and scarcely behaved like a monk at all, yet had been called the Dharma King because he cared more deeply for people than anyone.

Then Jeok Cheongang shook his head.

The Dharma King was gone. And even if he were alive, he could no longer look up at that blue sky and read its heavenly patterns.

You said the heavenly patterns had already gone awry. That the sky no longer gave anyone any answers. You definitely said that.

The Dharma King had also foretold a great war. A force that would throw even the heavens into turmoil would spread across the world, then sweep through it like fire.

But his prediction had not ended there.

The Master of the Morning Star.

A new star rising to light the troubled heavens.

The Dharma King had identified a young man as the Master of that Morning Star, and afterward Jeok Cheongang had gone to Mount Jiuhua and made that young man the successor to the Fire Gate Clan's lineage.

"…Hah. And I thought you were just a monk who liked talking nonsense."

His hollow chuckle vanished into the air. He let the cool wind wash over him, then glanced to his side.

A beast raced onward. Strapped securely to its saddle with sturdy leather, a young man lay facedown, fast asleep.

No. Not just any young man.

His one and only Disciple.

What an infuriating brat. He caused all this trouble, and now he's sleeping like a baby.

It was absurd. But after hearing Jin Taekyung's account, Jeok Cheongang had no strength left to be surprised.

Another world, wholly separate from Murim. And a young man who traveled between Murim and that place, which sounded so much like the realm of immortals.

What an infuriating brat. He caused all this trouble, and now he's sleeping like a baby.

It was absurd. But after hearing Jin Taekyung's account, Jeok Cheongang had no strength left to be surprised.

Another world, wholly separate from Murim. And a young man who traveled between Murim and that place, which sounded so much like the realm of immortals.

He could not understand it all. Still, he had accepted that every word of the unbelievable story was true.

Could this brat be a Little Immortal?

Just then, a long strand of drool hanging from Jin Taekyung's mouth landed squarely on his cheek.

Splat.

"…"

Jeok Cheongang's fist tightened on its own.

But instead of rapping his sleeping Disciple on the forehead, he sighed and straightened the young man's posture.

Yes. Sleep soundly. You've been through a lot.

No. That wasn't quite right.

In a voice soft enough for only one person to hear, Jeok Cheongang murmured, "Go on. Come back safely."

Chapter 726

> System - Synchronization begins. - 10, 9, 8, 7, 6… - Logout complete.

I opened my eyes to a familiar chime. The first thing I saw was a ceiling impossibly far above me.

Not the wooden ceiling that smelled of old, dry grass, but a pristine white one made of solid alloy.

I still wasn't used to the jarring shift between worlds. As I lay there, I recalled my last memory of the modern world.

The training room.

Right. This was the Peace Guild's training room. Only a handful of people, myself included, were allowed inside. Protected by formidable security and surveillance systems, it was where I had left for Murim—right after finally taking care of an important matter I had put off for a long time.

That's right.

I stared at the ceiling in silence.

My memories of my time in Murim had returned, along with all my senses, but I had no desire whatsoever to get up.

Murim to the modern world. The modern world to Murim.

A spell of listlessness after crossing between the two wasn't unusual for me. This time, though, it hit especially hard.

…I really went and did it.

I'd imagined telling someone my secret dozens of times. Of course, I'd never actually done it. I couldn't have.

It was too dangerous.

But… it was also true that, somewhere in the back of my mind, I had thought that a day like this would come eventually. I just hadn't expected that day, which had seemed so far away, to be today.

What did you say?

I could still see Jeok Cheongang's reaction when he first heard my confession. He hadn't looked shocked or incredulous. No, he simply hadn't understood what I was saying.

"What did you just say?"

"Exactly what I said. I came from farther away than you think, Old Master."

"Shanxi Province is some distance from the Central Plains, yes. But what does that have to do with your secret…?"

"Farther than that. Farther than Nanman, even."

"Farther than Nanman?"

“Yes. So far you couldn’t reach it if you walked your entire life.”

“You mean you have to take a boat?”

“No. That’s not it. I mean… it’s a completely different world.”

A completely different world.

Jeok Cheongang listened to what came next, then fell silent for a long time, trying to make sense of it in his own way.

“So you’re saying you came from the realm of immortals.”

“…Uh. I guess you could put it that way.”

“Are you a Little Immortal?”

“I’m an ordinary citizen.”

If Jeok Cheongang had been from the modern world, we might have understood each other a little better. In a world that already had monsters and magic, one man from Murim wouldn’t have been impossible to comprehend.

Whether that man wound up in a psychiatric hospital or got dragged off to a laboratory afterward was another question.

But Jeok Cheongang had spent over a hundred years in Murim, a world without even the internet. Everything I told him was bound to sound bewildering.

“When you fall asleep here, you go to the realm of immortals?”

“Not every time, but unless something unusual happens, yes.”

“And when you wish to leave the realm of immortals and return here…”

“It works the same way. Each time, time in the other world moves very slowly.”

“…Goddamn it.”

After a desperate struggle to hold on to his common sense and reason, Jeok Cheongang finally reached a conclusion.

“Damn it. I don’t understand.”

“What?”

“I’m telling you, I still don’t understand.”

Some truths couldn’t be understood even if you saw them with your own eyes and heard them with your own ears. Everything I’d told Jeok Cheongang was like that for him.

Yet amid all his confusion, one thing remained unchanged.

“But the idiot standing before this old man is named Jin Taekyung. Not a Little Immortal descended from the realm of immortals. Blazing Flame Divine Dragon Jin Taekyung.”

“…!”

“That alone is enough.”

I hadn’t understood then why those words left me speechless. Why I had to clench my teeth against the heat rising in my chest.

But… yes. As Jeok Cheongang had said, that alone was enough for me, too.

And now I thought I understood why.

I'd been afraid. Afraid that the other world, now such a large part of my life, might deny that I belonged there.

What am I, a little kid?

A rueful laugh slipped out. At the same time, the weight pressing on my heart lifted, and I felt relieved.

Right. This is enough. For now, at least.

Since when had I ever lived with my eyes fixed on the future? I'd chosen where to go one day, one moment at a time, and that had brought me here.

The path I'd chosen today was as wide and warm as a beach in summer.

I'd seen on TV that athletes all had their own routines.

One soccer player always stepped onto the field with his left foot first. A star Major League batter spat out a sunflower seed every time he swung his bat.

To an ordinary person, that might seem like an awful lot of fuss over nothing. But everyone had little superstitions for peace of mind and good luck.

No profession took them more seriously than Hunters.

Lose a soccer game, and the sky doesn't fall. Strike out on three pitches with the bases loaded and a chance to take the lead, and the ground doesn't open beneath you.

A Hunter, though, could be dead the moment luck turned bad.

There was no next game. No next at-bat. Just their life and their family's faces flashing through their mind as they drew their final breath, and one sudden thought:

Fuck, I should've worn my blue underwear today.

It sounded like a joke, but it was true. Those had been the last words of an A-rank Hunter who'd died in a Gate a few years ago, at the height of his popularity.

Or was it red underwear?

I'd been working nonstop back then, so the details were hazy. Anyway.

The point was, I had a routine of my own. I'd followed it without fail until now, and it had just been broken.

Bang!

The door flew open as if something had exploded.

The lock I had installed as a precaution was destroyed. Fortunately, I had finished all my preparations one step ahead of time, so I did my best to remain calm as I welcomed the unwelcome guest.

"Well, well. You don't even knock anymore before barging in."

"Huff. Hah."

He was breathing hard, sweat beading on his forehead, his suit in disarray. I looked at him and added, “Team Leader Choi.”

Normally, I’d have been glad to see him. Right now, I wanted to punch that handsome face.

But Team Leader Choi—who, by all rights, should now be called the Guild Master—didn’t notice my mood. Or rather, he had no attention to spare for it.

“Huff. Hoo.”

What, was the Demon King chasing him?

These days, Team Leader Choi could hold his own against any Peak Master in the Central Plains. He finally caught his breath, thrust out what he was holding, and shouted, “What is this? What on earth is this?”

“If you don’t have anything important to say, come back a little later… Ah. That?”

“That? Is this something you can dismiss with ‘that’?”

Rage button: ON.

The way he nearly lost his mind over my casual answer told me two things. First, I was going to have to break the essential routine I’d followed every day since finishing Hunter training. Second, there was no getting out of explaining that thing right now.

“Calm down. Calm down. I’ll tell you everything, so put that down first. Oh, and what would you like to drink?”

“Mr. Jin Taekyung. What you drink isn’t important right n—”

“I’ll just make you coffee. What was it again? That tiger-poop coffee you gave me last time to celebrate the opening of the office.”

“Hah.”

“That okay?”

Team Leader Choi stared at me, shock and disbelief mingling in his eyes, then sank onto the sofa.

In his trembling hand was a sheaf of papers covered in my own handwriting.

[The Smiling Mana Cultivation Method]

Looking at it again, my penmanship was a work of art.

Team Leader Choi really was a rich kid.

A moment ago, he’d been snorting like a Minotaur with its horns ripped out. One whiff of rich coffee, though, and he had his composure back. I couldn’t help sniffing the air myself.

“Does tiger-poop coffee calm you down or something? Or is this one of your routines?”

Team Leader Choi answered coolly. “It isn’t a tiger. It’s a cat. A civet cat.”

"Tiger, cat. Whatever."

"And rather than poop, please say feces. The word 'secretion' is also available."

"Poop."

"Feces. Or secretion."

"Right. So, poop."

"Unless you've forgotten, it will be dinnertime soon. If you keep saying 'poop' to someone's face like that…"

"Poop."

"…"

As the atmosphere grew increasingly shitty, Team Leader Choi was the first to back down.

"Fine. That isn't what matters right now."

"Mm."

On second thought, I was being an idiot. I took a breath and let go of my irritation. Team Leader Choi had broken a routine I absolutely needed to keep, but I was the one who'd given him the reason.

[The Smiling Mana Cultivation Method]

Anyone who saw this would have come running. Even the President of the United States.

"Given what's at stake, I'll ask you directly."

His voice trembled slightly. He looked me in the eye and went on.

"This… no, this mana cultivation method. Where did it come from?"

I answered without hesitation.

"Who do you think? The person sitting across from you."

"…!"

"I made it myself. From beginning to end."

A suffocating silence fell. Team Leader Choi stared at me, eyes wavering, before letting out the breath he'd been holding.

"Hoo."

"Why are you so surprised? Didn't the errand boy I sent explain?"

Of course, he wasn't just an errand boy. The Skeleton King might be a little unhinged, but he was a powerful Named Monster—and secretly operated as an S-rank Hunter for the Peace Guild.

More importantly, I could trust him.

Team Leader Choi knew that better than anyone. He gave a quiet laugh.

"That was quite an errand boy."

"That's why I entrusted it to him. I was originally going to give it to you myself, but you happened not to be there."

"…I had somewhere to stop by."

He left it at that, and I didn't ask where he'd been.

The person who had suddenly left us all two months ago had left a space that still held a lingering warmth, like the coffee cup before us that Team Leader Choi had not taken a single sip from.

"I heard what you told Skeleton King. No—Mr. King. But I'm sorry…"

"You had to check for yourself. I get it."

"Yes. But the moment I saw what was inside, even before hearing an explanation, I knew. Jin Taekyung is the only person in the entire world who could have created a mana cultivation method like this."

At his praise, I scratched the back of my head.

"Come on, it's not that impressive. I did put a lot of thought and effort into making it something even beginners could learn, but…"

"There can't be many S-rank Hunters with handwriting this bad. Or people with a sense for names like yours."

"What?"

"And someone who has both? I didn't need to think twice."

"…"

"That's how I knew this mana cultivation method could only have come from one person: Jin Taekyung."

"…"

I looked from Team Leader Choi's utterly certain face to [The Smiling Mana Cultivation Method] on the table, then back again.

What the fuck.

Mana cultivation method or not, maybe I should just tear the whole thing to shreds.

Chapter 727

Should I tear it up or not?

Looking at Jin Taekyung, whose thoughts were written plainly across his face, Choi Minwoo let out a faint, incredulous laugh inwardly.

I really can't figure him out.

Most of the time, his words, actions, and thoughts were as simple as could be. But every so often, Jin Taekyung showed a side of himself that went beyond surprising.

You'd think I'd be used to it by now. But this…

Choi Minwoo looked down at the table.

[The Smiling Mana Cultivation Method]

The crooked handwriting looked like a child's, and the title was ridiculous. But there was nothing ridiculous about what filled those ten or so sheets of A4 paper.

He created an entirely new Mana Cultivation Method.

There was a reason Choi Minwoo had gone so far as to criticize Jin Taekyung's handwriting earlier. It was a small act of revenge for suddenly handing over something this absurd without saying a word.

The shock he had felt a few hours ago had been that great.

How is this possible?

He had never seen explanations or instructions so simple and clear. The method was exceptionally stable, with a firm grounding in the fundamentals.

Choi Minwoo had grown skilled enough to hold his own against a Peak Master of Murim. He had recognized the value of this new method immediately. He had also understood what the recent events that had drawn the world's attention meant to Jin Taekyung.

"The Week of Judgment."

Choi Minwoo broke the brief silence and looked at Jin Taekyung.

"Just as God created heaven and earth over the course of a week, terrorists around the world endured a Week of Judgment. President Doramp Jr. said that at a White House press conference a few days ago."

The President of the United States had said it in public. Naturally, his provocative remarks had spread around the world in less than an hour. By now, everyone in Korea had heard about them.

Everyone but one person, perhaps.

"He said that?"

Jin Taekyung had been holed up in the training room the whole time. Choi Minwoo nodded.

“It was a fairly aggressive thing for any president to say, especially the American president. Some people criticized him for deliberately provoking the terrorists.”

“Hm. Why bring up something as grand as creating heaven and earth? What about retaliatory terrorism?”

“None. Not a single one.”

“Not one?”

“Yes. If anything, they’ve even been keeping their mouths shut.”

The sullen look on Jin Taekyung’s face eased a little.

“Guess beating the crap out of them paid off.”

It was at that exact moment that Choi Minwoo, who had been gazing pensively at Jin Taekyung, suddenly spoke.

“So that was why.”

“Why what?”

“I thought about two things. Why you suddenly suppressed the terrorists. And what it meant that you gave me this new Mana Cultivation Method.”

Now he had his answer.

[The Smiling Mana Cultivation Method]

Choi Minwoo lifted the papers, held together with a single careless staple.

“You’re planning to make this Mana Cultivation Method available to everyone.”

Jin Taekyung grinned.

“Our Team Leader Choi really is sharp.”

The look Team Leader Choi gave me was hard to read. Part of it seemed like admiration. The rest looked like he had a lot to think about.

“Why? Is there a problem?”

“Well…”

He ran a hand through his disheveled hair.

“There are so many problems, I don’t know where to start.”

“There’s nothing wrong with the Mana Cultivation Method itself, so you mean practical problems.”

“…Yes. Unfortunately.”

“What’s the biggest one?”

He thought for a moment.

“For starters, making the method public is a problem in its own right.”

“Go on.”

“You know that only a tiny fraction of high-ranking Hunters possess Mana Cultivation Methods. They’re closely guarded knowledge—secret arts, essentially.

You also know how closed-off those Hunters are, and how different their world is from the one other Hunters live in."

"I know. I've been in this business for years. Though back when I was an F-rank Hunter, I'd never even heard of a Mana Cultivation Method."

No profession divided its members more sharply than the Hunter business.

Ordinary people judged one another by education, family background, and looks. Hunters were sorted into high and low by Grade alone.

How much mana you'd been granted. How agile you were. How strong. Those crude measures determined your place, and you were graded like cattle headed for slaughter.

There's a reason they call F-rank Hunters slaves.

High-ranking Hunters, meanwhile, practically lived above the clouds. They earned more from a single raid than most Hunters could make in a lifetime and spent their days under spotlights and envious stares.

Maybe that was why they'd built walls around themselves, like nobles of old living inside their castles. No one but another high-ranking Hunter could cross those walls. Even if someone was lucky enough to receive a high Grade, the gate opened only with their permission.

Those high-ranking Hunters were connected by invisible ties across the world, each protected by the giant Guild they belonged to.

"This isn't limited to Korea," Team Leader Choi said. "If you make this method public, the backlash will be greater than you expect."

"Because they'll think releasing a Mana Cultivation Method makes what they have less valuable?"

"That's part of it. There's another reason."

"What?"

"The problem is that it's us."

"…!"

It was a short answer, but I immediately understood what he meant.

Have we stood out too much?

I suddenly remembered my conversation with Jeok Cheongang just before I logged out. Whether I had wanted it or not, he'd said, I had already drawn far more attention than necessary.

The spotlight was bright. But everything around it was dark.

I'd read that line in a novel I liked back in school. It was true. The brighter I became, the deeper the darkness around me grew.

In Murim and in the modern world.

"Team Leader Choi, by any chance…?"

He understood the question and shook his head.

“There’s been no major problem yet, but we’re facing pressure behind the scenes. We’ve put plans for more overseas branches on hold for now.”

“It’s that serious?”

“Every major Guild in the world is watching us. They don’t need to make a show of force to cause us trouble. If they decide to act, things won’t be easy for us.”

“Why didn’t you tell me?”

He gave me a flat look.

“Did you give me a chance?”

“…Fair.”

Still, this place was a complete mess too.

People with plenty to lose didn’t like the world changing. The handful of Hunters with Mana Cultivation Methods of their own were no exception.

At this point, calling them power brokers would be more accurate than calling them Hunters.

Some of them might have enough influence to bend an entire country to their will. With their wealth, fame, and overwhelming strength, they could turn common sense on its head. They didn’t want change, and they certainly didn’t want anyone new rising to their level.

Anyone like me or Team Leader Choi.

Even so, these bastards might be worse than Murim sects.

Leak a sect’s unique martial arts in Murim, and they’d hunt you down with murder in their eyes and smash your skull. But at least they wouldn’t throw a fit over a merchant selling the Three Calamities Sword Technique at a market.

These guys already had more than enough, and they were ready to raise hell because we wanted to share one little Mana Cultivation Method?

Huh. Now I’m pissed.

“If we release it, they’ll go nuts, right?”

“Yes. And we’ll have a mess on our hands.”

“What if I go after them?”

“What?”

“Now that I think about it, this is fucking ridiculous. We release the method without overthinking it, then I go after whichever assholes start trouble. That ought to shut them—”

“No! Don’t! Absolutely not!”

For Team Leader Choi’s normally low, composed voice to reach that volume, he might as well have said, Over my dead body, you lunatic.

This time, though, I couldn’t just give in.

“I know what you’re saying, Team Leader Choi, but we have to make it public. I didn’t create it to keep it to myself like a diary.”

Magical power had already increased throughout the world. No—it was still increasing, even now. Mutated Gates were appearing one after another, and Monster Waves had begun.

"Monsters are growing stronger as magical power increases. You know that too, Team Leader. But if people learn about this Mana Cultivation Method under the current circumstances…"

"Hunters' abilities will improve across the board. It's stable enough for even the lowest-ranked Hunters to learn without difficulty."

Team Leader Choi's expression hardened.

"I understand what you're thinking, Mr. Jin. Wasn't that why you suppressed the various rebel groups and terrorists in the first place—to reduce the possibility of the Mana Cultivation Method being misused as much as possible?"

"Yes. Before I worried about how sharp the weapon I'd made was, I had to think about whose hands it might end up in."

About two weeks ago in modern-world time, an incident in Texas had driven that point home: an attempted terrorist attack using a Magic Gem.

Fortunately, the terrorist's attempt had ended in failure, and there had been no casualties. But that incident had made me realize something for certain.

"When I said I wanted to share it with everyone, that included every kind of criminal and lunatic."

Afterward, I followed Magic Johnson to the Pentagon and obtained information about them with the tacit approval of the President of the United States. Alongside the people who had come with me, I dyed the desert red with blood and cut away every element that might become a threat.

Rebel groups that trained kidnapped children to shoot. Fanatical terrorists willing to carry out suicide attacks…

I killed anyone who stood in the way, and the dead were bound to the Skeleton King's undead army, which chased after those who fled.

For the ones farther away, we used captured leaders to send false orders: rebel groups were told to attack terrorist organizations, and terrorist organizations were told to attack rebel groups.

It was a war between bastards and motherfuckers. Tricked into launching all-out attacks on one another, both sides suffered massive losses.

"As you know, we couldn't wipe them out completely, and we won't be able to in the future. But we've achieved what we needed to for now. Even if those bastards learn this method, they won't be as dangerous as they were before."

They wouldn't be the only ones growing stronger from it. Hunters everywhere would improve enough to fight monsters strengthened by the rise in magical power. That should help keep the balance.

And if things get much worse…

Then I'd release the Jin Family's Cultivation Technique, too. So far, I'd taught it to only a handful of people, including Team Leader Choi.

The low-ranking Hunters who knew absolutely nothing about Mana Cultivation Methods would not be able to apply the Jin Family's Cultivation Technique even if I handed it to them right now. But once they had learned the method, they would be able to cultivate it on their own.

I met Team Leader Choi's eyes.

"We have to make it public. One way or another."

"…"

"Luckily, it isn't too late. The public still thinks pretty highly of both of us."

"Pretty highly" was an understatement. People were going wild over us.

I was being hailed as a young hero of a new age. After Butler Kim's death, Team Leader Choi had become Guild Master of the Peace Guild—and before the paint on his new nameplate had dried, he'd taken over the Ares Guild too.

Then there was the glow of his family name. His maternal grandfather was Cheon Taemin, the savior who had saved humanity from the Demon King Asmodeus. Team Leader Choi was his only blood relative and heir.

I grabbed his hand.

"Team Leader Choi."

I gripped it tight. When he met my fervent gaze, he flinched as though he'd been burned.

"W-Why are you doing this all of a sudden?"

He looked as though he'd run into Magic Johnson in a dark alley at night. I held on and pressed ahead.

"If you're that worried, let's try another way. Hm?"

"What way…?"

"Put your maternal grandfather's name to work for us just this once."

"What?"

"Come on. Let's cash in on the savior's name."

"…!"

Chapter 728

People are all the same.

Success after success makes them more confident, and before long, they start closing the eyes and ears they once kept wide open.

But Team Leader Choi was a decent person before he was an excellent Hunter or manager. Even though the decision was his to make, he always sought everyone's understanding.

"…So I'd like to hear what you all think."

When Team Leader Choi finished speaking in a low voice, the people sitting on the sofa fell silent for a moment.

No, people wasn't quite right. At some point, a monster had made himself at home among them.

And that monster looked more serious than ever.

"This body objects."

Every gaze turned toward him at the firm refusal, delivered without a hint of hesitation.

But the Skeleton King continued without a care.

"You all know why. Expand your influence too far, and people grow wary. Human envy and jealousy invite danger. Am I wrong?"

I'd thought this before, but the bastard really had become almost human.

When I awkwardly shook my head, the Skeleton King's voice gained even more force.

"This body would prefer to avoid any more attention, too. If other humans discover my true identity, it will cause trouble for all of you. So put an end to this foolish talk."

He ended his speech with a stern rebuke. The rest of us looked at one another as though we'd rehearsed it.

He had a point.

He definitely had a point, but…

"If you're so desperate to avoid attention, why'd you make an SNS account the second you got a phone?"

Team Leader Choi, Im Kkeokjeong, and Song Song nodded in turn.

"I agree with Mr. Jin Taekyung."

"Come to think of it, yeah. I don't use that stuff, so I hadn't realized, but he seems pretty famous."

"More than pretty famous. He hasn't even had the account long, and he's already got over a hundred thousand followers."

The Skeleton King, who had faltered after being struck in the heart of the matter, thrust out his chest at Song Song's words.

"As of today, a hundred and twenty thousand."

"Really?"

"Of course. Advertising offers are pouring in from all sides."

I watched him preen and let out a dry laugh.

"Look at this fucking bastard. Want me to split you into a hundred and twenty thousand bone fragments?"

"…"

"Delete the account. Now. That's your last warning."

After hesitating for a moment at my threat, the Skeleton King answered in a depressed voice.

"…Understood."

"At least you're obedient. But you didn't post any strange nonsense on SNS, did you?"

The internet's reach was staggering. In Murim, people sent messenger pigeons. Here, a few taps of a finger could send something around the world.

If that bastard posted some shit, we're in trouble.

Song Song broke in, sounding unconcerned.

"Fortunately, there's nothing much. I looked through everything just in case, and he's only posted a ton of pictures of his own face."

"Really?"

"Yeah. Most of his followers are overseas, too. And the overwhelming majority are men."

"That's a relief, but why would so many men… Ah."

It hit me.

I remembered whose hands had created the Skeleton King's handsome face.

Magic Johnson.

The Grand Mage of the century. And the century's gayest man.

Magic Johnson—the man said to work unbelievable magic with two staffs—had put plenty of his own taste into the Skeleton King's current appearance. The guy was handsome by any standard, but his face and build were perfectly suited to the tastes of a certain crowd.

A crowd of a hundred and twenty thousand.

That was enough people to kick the asses of a hundred thousand followers of the Demonic Path if they came swarming back. Whether they'd stop at kicking was another question.

This guy's kind of impressive.

He'd gathered that many followers in no time without a name anyone knew or a face anyone recognized. Even the Murim Alliance Leader couldn't pull that off.

Oblivious to my newfound regard, the Skeleton King fiddled with his phone and spoke with a stricken look.

"I cannot bring myself to delete it. You are the most wicked, cruel human in the world."

"What crime did I commit in my previous life to deserve being called cruel by a monster bastard?"

"Ah, to part so suddenly. Somewhere, an unknown woman who can no longer gaze upon this body's dazzling face will weep without end."

"…"

"Why are you looking at me like that?"

"Nothing. You're better off not knowing."

Some truths were better left hidden.

I exchanged a glance with Song Song. With our silent agreement settled, I looked around.

"Anyway. Everyone's on board?"

Im Kkeokjeong nodded as if the answer were obvious.

"Well, if you and Team Leader Choi have decided, I'm with you."

"Song-i, what about you?"

"Hmm."

Song Song crossed her legs at an angle and continued.

"From what I've heard, we're doing this for everyone. If I say no, I'll be the only bitch here, won't I?"

"No."

"Really?"

"Yeah. You weren't all that nice to begin with."

"Oh, listen to this bastard."

Song Song smiled sweetly and raised her middle finger before suddenly sighing.

"What a ride. When Team Leader Choi offered me a transfer and I left the Ares Guild, I never imagined we'd end up here."

"You should've just stayed there."

"Hey, I couldn't. That Branch Leader was too much of a pervert. I figured I'd be better off working for someone young, handsome, and rich. But I got a bad feeling on the very first day."

"The first day?"

"Yeah. I'd come to get away from one pervert, and there was some other weird bastard waiting for me. I was starving, and he burned all the meat. Then, out of nowhere, he told me his star sign was Taurus. What kind of lunatic does that?"

"Ah-ha."

I gave a quiet laugh and looked at her without another word.

Truthfully, I felt bad for Song Song and Im Kkeokjeong. Ever since the Peace Guild was founded, they'd been dragged through one crisis after another. None of it was what they'd signed up for.

"Hmm."

"What's that look for?"

"Nothing. I just wanted to tell you that it isn't too late yet."

"What?"

"This could be a lot more dangerous than you or Uncle Kkeokjeong realize."

There was no laughter in my voice this time. Song Song's gaze turned serious.

"How dangerous are we talking?"

"We're past the point where this is just a domestic matter."

"You seem to have a tendency to underestimate yourself. You and Team Leader Choi left Korea behind a long time ago."

She wasn't exaggerating.

Ever since I took down the Arch Lich in China, my name had become known throughout the world. Meanwhile, Team Leader Choi had appeared in the media as the new City Lord of the Ares Guild and the successor to the living Savior.

But this was different. If anything, everything we'd achieved was what had created the problem.

I shrugged.

"Someone once said that the bigger you get, the more there is to take a bite out of."

"So how much are you planning to let them take?"

"I'm not. And I don't intend to start."

Song Song stared at me for a moment before suddenly speaking.

"You know something?"

"What?"

"It's way too late for us to back out. Both Uncle Kkeokjeong and me."

Im Kkeokjeong quietly added to her words.

"I wasn't planning to back out anyway."

"Uncle."

"Whether it's too late or not doesn't matter. Once you start something, you have to see it through to the end. At least for the sake of the one who left us first."

"…!"

"Right, Team Leader Choi?"

At Im Kkeokjeong's quiet question, everyone's gazes turned in one direction.

Team Leader Choi had gone quiet at some point. He was looking at the empty place someone had left behind. Until recently, it had still held that person's warmth. Now nothing could fill it.

He spoke.

"I visited the grave today. Someone had carved words beside the gravestone. 'Thank you for coming. I love you. Please come again.'"

No one said anything. Team Leader Choi continued calmly.

"So next time, I'd like all of us to go visit that person together. Next year, the year after that…and even decades from now."

It was the resolve of a man who had been forced to send someone precious on ahead.

The words all of us together carried his determination not to let the same thing happen again.

Decades from now.

Yeah. That was enough.

I didn't know what we'd look like then. For now, knowing we'd go forward together was enough.

"Team Leader Choi."

At my quiet call, he gave a heavy nod.

"Understood. Let's begin."

We'd already discussed the broad strokes. Team Leader Choi took out his phone and called the first person.

Beep. Beep. Click.

The call connected before it could ring a third time. A deep voice, practiced by a hectic life in politics, came from the other end.

"Speaking. Baek Hanseong here."

There were plenty of people named Baek Hanseong in Korea. But only one Team Leader Choi would call first in a situation like this.

"Yes, Mr. President. I'm calling about something important."

"Ha-ha. Well, putting it that way already makes me feel a little strange. I'm looking forward to it, but at the same time, I'm starting to feel uneasy."

At the appearance of a major figure who moved an entire country, Im Kkeokjeong and Song Song fell silent. The Skeleton King's eyes widened as he whispered to me.

"President Baek Hanseong? Is he—"

"That's right. Our country's pres—"

"I know. Isn't he the popular celebrity with more than ten million followers?"

"…"

"Damn it. A human has a hundred times this body's following."

As I watched the Skeleton King vent his frustration, I thought:

Please just fucking die already…

Come to think of it, he already had.

The corridor was dazzlingly bright. An A-rank Magic Gem filled with immense energy supplied power throughout the building, and every floor was crowded with people busy at work.

Until darkness fell without warning.

Crackle. Whoooosh.

The lights faded. Every machine stopped.

Confused shouts erupted from all around, shattering the momentary silence.

“What the hell?”

“Uh, looks like a power outage.”

“You call that an answer? Fuck… I told them to replace the Magic Gem before this happened. They’ve had a straw stuck in it for over twenty years, sucking it dry. It’s probably begging us to put it out of its misery.”

“Right? Though the experts said an A-rank Magic Gem would last at least thirty years.”

“So what, does it matter why the Magic Gem ran out ten years early? Are you so curious you’re about to go insane?”

“N-No, sir.”

“Enough. Everyone, focus! The Security Team and Technical Team will be here within two minutes, so don’t move a finger—stay exactly where you are! Anyone with spare mana lanterns, go get them right now.”

But despite the department head’s shout, the entire building lit up again before even a minute had passed. The power had returned.

“Damn it. Running around for nothing…”

The department head grumbled before waving away the Security Team, who had arrived a step too late.

“As you can see, everything’s fine. Any idea why the power went out?”

“I asked our team leader, too, and apparently it happens once every few years, although it’s rare. The Technical Team will have to investigate to find the exact cause.”

“Right. That’s their job.”

The Security Team Hunter gave an awkward smile and went through the checks. Had anything gone missing during the blackout? Was anyone hurt? Had anyone noticed anything suspicious?

But it was little more than a simple procedure, and there were mountains of work waiting to be handled. No one had the time or energy to devote to a blackout that had lasted barely a minute.

“Sorry, but could you come back if you have any more questions? We’re a little busy right now.”

The Security Team employee nodded at the department head’s words.

“Of course. You do look a lot busier than usual. Something going on?”

“A notice came down from above. Apparently, something big is going to happen sometime today.”

“Something big?”

“Yeah. We don’t know the details, but it looks like it came from the Blue House. Everyone’s on edge. At this rate, we can forget leaving on time.”

“Sorry. I’ve taken up your time.”

“Don’t worry about it. We’re all working for the country. Take care. See you later.”

“You too.”

But as they returned to their respective positions, none of them knew.

During that short span of less than a minute, some ghostlike entity had moved through every part of the building, riding the thick darkness.

And that one item had disappeared from the evidence storage room deep underground.

The hundreds of employees going about their work, the highly skilled Hunters of the Security Team, and even the alarm magic had failed to notice. The entity that had completed everything with ease leisurely slipped out of the building.

Step. Step.

Along with someone’s footsteps.

“Sehwan, did you check the third floor?”

“Yes, Team Leader. Nothing out of the ordinary. Any word from Technical?”

“It hasn’t even been ten minutes. You think they’ve found the cause already?”

“Fair point. By the way, isn’t the weather great today?”

Sssrk.

Behind the Security Team employee as he chatted with his superior, a dark shadow stirred faintly.

Chapter 729

I'd never gone fishing in my life, and I didn't know how.

But I did know how to catch more fish.

Bait.

That was what we needed. Scatter hints about a major announcement far and wide, then draw as much attention as possible from as many fish—or rather, people—as we could.

Of course, we'd need to do a little persuading along the way.

Team Leader Choi and I weren't trying to fill a bucket. We wanted a boat so full the catch spilled over the sides. And for that, we needed a good crew. The first person Team Leader Choi called was President Baek Hanseong.

"Pardon?"

He had gone through every kind of hardship before entering the Blue House at the age of just over forty. His eyes widened at the words Mana Cultivation Method, and when the name of one particular person followed, he spilled his coffee.

"I-Is that true? Did he really…?"

"Yes. My maternal grandfather created it himself. He wanted to share this Mana Cultivation Method with everyone."

"I-I can't believe it."

Who was Cheon Taemin?

A living savior. A hero who had accomplished something no one else in human history ever had.

He was the Slayer who had defeated the Demon King Asmodeus and brought the Great Cataclysm to an end. Everyone respected his name.

"But why is the Mana Cultivation Method called Smiling…?"

"…I took out the wrong one. Please forget what you just saw."

Honestly, if people knew I'd created it, I wouldn't care whether it was called The Smiling Mana Cultivation Method or As-Salamu Alaykum[3033].

But with Cheon Taemin's name attached, Team Leader Choi and I agreed that The Smiling Mana Cultivation Method was a problem.

"This is the Mana Cultivation Method my maternal grandfather created."

Team Leader Choi placed a neatly bound booklet on the table. A new name was printed on the cover.

"Heaven and Earth Cultivation Technique…"

"The Heaven and Earth Cultivation Technique is versatile enough for even the lowest-ranking Hunter to learn, and exceptionally safe. It won't produce

[3033] As-salamu alaykum is an Arabic greeting meaning "Peace be upon you."

tremendous results the moment someone learns it, but it will undoubtedly be a great help to Hunters.”

Of course it would. That was what I’d made it for.

The name had changed for grown-up reasons, but I’d come up with the new one too. Feeling a little proud, I added, “In short, it’s a fucking incredible Mana Cultivation Method.”

Team Leader Choi gave me a pointed cough, but President Baek Hanseong didn’t pay any attention. He didn’t seem to have any attention to spare.

He stared as though possessed at the booklet containing the principles of the Heaven and Earth Cultivation Technique. Only after a long while did he finally come to his senses.

“But why bring something this important to me…?”

“We need an ally.”

President Baek hadn’t bought the presidential chair secondhand on Oi Market. He understood at once why Team Leader Choi and I had come.

“You want a breakwater.”

“We hope we can support each other.”

“But no matter how large a Guild steps forward, it will be difficult as long as he is still here.”

A sound assessment.

If it were true.

Unfortunately, it isn’t.

We needed to avoid outside opposition as much as possible. That was why we were planning to reveal the Smiling—or rather, the Heaven and Earth Cultivation Technique while borrowing the name of the unconscious Cheon Taemin. Team Leader Choi had no intention of telling the truth even to President Baek Hanseong, who had always shown us a very favorable attitude.

He was a politician, after all.

“Neither I nor my maternal grandfather want any conflict or controversy. To prevent that, we need the government’s cooperation.”

“Does that mean the Blue House can announce the existence of this Mana Cultivation Method itself?”

Team Leader Choi shook his head.

“It should be enough to say we’ve been working together and that there’ll be a major announcement in two days. That alone will get the public’s attention.”

“So you want me to drum up interest…”

“This Mana Cultivation Method’s release will be announced as a sort of national project. If that happens, Korea’s standing will rise as well.”

“Hmm.”

The first public release of a Mana Cultivation Method in history. Korea's name would forever be tied to it—and so would the President's achievement.

A faint smile appeared around President Baek Hanseong's lips.

"The Korean flag looks especially fine today."

Someone once said the most powerful drug in the world was a patriotic high.

Flap—

Cheon Taemin. The public release of the Mana Cultivation Method. A national project.

Those three phrases brought everything to a boil like a cauldron over charcoal. The fire was lit in Korea.

> "My beloved and respected fellow citizens. I stand before you today to make an important announcement…"

President Baek made good on his promise to cooperate by calling an emergency press conference at the Blue House.

He spoke passionately before a crowd of reporters and cameras, including the foreign press. The conference went out live on television, spread across the world, and caused an uproar.

> Mana Cultivation Method to Be Made Public—A Historic First!
> Savior of Humanity Saves the World Once Again!
> Will the Living Legend Finally Show Himself?

Cheon Taemin's name alone was newsworthy after he'd stayed out of sight for so long. Now the Mana Cultivation Method he'd created was going to be released to the entire world.

The response was explosive.

No—the media had already exploded.

"Hey! Reporter Park! The Peace Guild! Call the Peace Guild!"

"I-I already did. I can't get a thing out of them."

"What about Ares? Don't you have a contact there? We've gotten tips from them before!"

"That person is in the detention center right now. You know, because he got caught up in the Go Jun incident a while back…"

"You're killing me. What about Choi Minwoo?"

“Oh, don’t even ask. Getting a line into them is practically impossible, and you couldn’t get a single drop of blood out of them even if you poked them.”

“Then Jin Taekyung?”

“…I’m the one who’d bleed if I tried him, Chief. Do you want to watch me get beaten to death?”

Sources of unknown origin were leaking out everywhere, but unless they made contact first, there was no way to learn more.

The media, at their wits’ end, could only churn out clickbait. Online, things were even worse.

> Three-Line Summary of the Current Situation
>
> 1. Cheon Taemin made a Mana Cultivation Method.
> 2. His grandson and a fucking awesome junior are pushing to make it public. The government’s jumping on the bandwagon.
> 3. Some Hunters probably didn’t even know what a Mana Cultivation Method was, but the one Cheon Taemin made is so versatile even the lowest-ranking Hunters can learn it.
>
> Wow! Let’s all level up!
>
> 4. That wasn’t three lines.
>
> └ Author: What the fuck are you talking about? I laid it out neatly.
> └ It’s not three lines in the KakaoPage[3034] viewer.
> └ Author: You crazy bastard.

> The Mana Cultivation Method is going public?!
> └ Written by Cheon Taemin?!
> └ Compiled by Jin Taekyung?!?!
> └ Wasn’t it compiled by Kim Gyeongsik?
> └ ? Who’s Kim Gyeongsik?
> └ Earthquake over here too, lol.
> └ An earthquake is totally justified this time. Everyone in our Guild lost their shit watching the official Blue House press conference.

[3034] KakaoPage is a Korean platform for digital fiction and comics.

> I'm a civilian, so I don't really know, but what exactly is a Mana Cultivation Method?
>
> └ To put it simply, it's a secret technique that only a tiny number of people can learn. Like the Zaha Divine Technique or the Fire Gate Divine Technique from wuxia[3035] novels. Those things are normally kept within their own circles, but this guy is saying screw that and making it available to everyone, yeah.
>
> └ I don't read wuxia[3036] novels, so I don't know.
>
> └ Okay, then think of it like a food recipe. Restaurants with Michelin stars all have their own recipes for the food they sell, right?
>
> └ What's Michelin?
>
> └ LOL… Then think of it as the sort of cooking secret every mother has.
>
> └ My mom is a terrible cook. I think she only knows the secret to making food taste bad.
>
> └ Hey. How old are you?
>
> └ Nine.
>
> └ Fuck, now I can't even properly swear at you.
>
> └ Fact: Curses very refreshingly at a nine-year-old.
>
> └ Fuck off.
>
> └ I'm an avid wuxia[3037] reader, but what's the Fire Gate Divine Technique? I know the Zaha Divine Technique.
>
> └ ? You don't read Login Murim?
>
> └ Zerobic, welcome.
>
> └ He took a break over the harvest festival last year. Not Zerobic—Bastardbic.

Netizens could usually find two sides to anything and argue about it without end. But beneath articles about the Mana Cultivation Method's release, they were united in praise.

Someone was giving away a secret technique of the kind others fought to keep hidden, with no restrictions at all.

Simply because they wanted to help everyone.

And the release wouldn't benefit only Hunters. Stronger Hunters could deal more quickly with the disturbing incidents that had been occurring one after another. Ordinary people would be safer too.

Of course, some people were disappointed for an entirely different reason.

[3035] Wuxia is a genre of Chinese fiction about martial artists and their adventures.
[3036] Wuxia is a genre of Chinese fiction about martial artists and their adventures.
[3037] Wuxia is a genre of Chinese fiction about martial artists and their adventures.

"Hmm."

"It would have been nice if you had given us some advance notice."

Ares Guild.

Choi Minwoo dipped his head at the cautious complaints from executives who had survived the upheaval within the Guild.

"I'm sorry I couldn't tell you beforehand. But I thought it best to act quickly, before the information leaked."

The executives exchanged glances at the young, capable new Vice Guild Master's apology.

He'd admitted fault first. That gave them grounds to press him—just enough to make sure he never acted on his own again.

But the problem was the terrifying legitimacy possessed by that Vice Guild Master who was young—no, barely more than a boy.

He stepped forward personally.

I've never even seen his face.

Does he care about his grandson that much?

Cheon Taemin hadn't appeared before them in a very long time.

Some executives recruited from outside had never even encountered their Guild Master after joining Ares Guild, while even executives with considerable seniority had begun harboring vague suspicions after Lee Jungryong's funeral.

Something's happened to the Guild Master.

It was a reasonable suspicion.

Cheon Taemin hadn't appeared at the funeral of Lee Jungryong, a man who had been practically his sworn brother. Nor had he intervened when Lee Jungryong sent his grandson from one overseas branch to another, all but exiling him.

But…things were different now.

Even if doubts still lingered, showing them would be incredibly foolish. Cheon Taemin's name still commanded their deepest respect. And his grandfather wasn't the young Vice Guild Master's only winning card.

"You're all awfully quiet."

A low voice broke the silence. Jin Taekyung, who had been watching a webtoon on his smartphone, continued:

"When someone apologizes to you, aren't you supposed to say something in response?"

"…!"

"Isn't that right?"

Dozens of pairs of eyes trembled, and throats bobbed nervously.

The executives exchanged glances, then bowed their heads with forced smiles.

That was when it happened.

Chapter 730

Knock. Knock.

Every eye turned toward the door.

Even the janitors at Ares Guild knew the entire leadership was in the conference room discussing important business. For someone to knock now, there were only two possibilities: the matter was just as important, or they'd already written their resignation letter.

Go Jun would have started swearing. Their new City Lord, though, didn't so much as twitch an eyebrow, even with the meeting finally going his way.

"Come in."

Click.

A middle-aged man appeared in the half-open doorway. The Chief Secretary approached Choi Minwoo and bowed.

"I'm sorry to interrupt the meeting, Vice Guild Master."

"That's all right," Choi said calmly. "If you have a good reason."

The Chief Secretary swallowed. He hadn't worked for Choi long, but he already knew his employer was quick to reward good work and punish mistakes. He also knew the report sent up from the lobby's Security Team a minute ago was beyond his authority to handle.

"An important guest has arrived."

He held out a trembling hand.

Choi's expression grew grave as he looked at what the secretary had brought him.

This is…

Recognition brought a rush of thoughts, but he didn't hesitate for long.

"Where is the guest?"

"Still in the lobby…"

"Show them to my private office. I'll be there shortly."

"Yes, sir."

The Chief Secretary answered as if he'd been waiting for exactly that instruction, then left. Choi turned back to the seated executives.

"I think we've covered the urgent matters. What do you all think?"

"Pardon?"

"Vice Guild Master, are you saying…?"

"If you'll excuse me, I think we should end today's meeting here."

Several executives stared at him in disbelief.

This was too much. However important the guest might be, how could he end a meeting attended by every overseas Branch Leader just like that?

Scrape.

“Vice Guild Master!”

One executive found the courage to leap to his feet.

Bang!

The sudden crash swallowed his voice.

Jin Taekyung lifted his hand from the alloy table, leaving a palm print in it.

“What, did they lay eggs? Why do these damn bugs keep flying around? Do we need to gut this conference room again?”

“…!”

“Oh, sorry. Go on with what you were saying. Vice Guild Master, where were you?”

The lone standing executive looked at Choi, his face stiff.

“Since things have turned out this way, I’d like to say something.”

His voice carried the determination not to back down this time. Several executives’ eyes gleamed, and Choi Minwoo calmly nodded.

“Yes, go ahead.”

“Then may I leave early?”

“…”

“It’s my wedding anniversary today…”

The others gave their colleague flat looks.

He’d been divorced for three years.

The Team Leader Choi I knew was a reasonable man.

Even when he had the power to crush someone, he knew when to ease off. He preferred to settle things as calmly and amicably as possible.

Which meant he wouldn’t dismiss dozens of executives with a few words over just anything.

That made me even more curious about the guest who had shown up so suddenly.

Ding.

“It was because of them, right? This important guest?”

I asked as soon as the private elevator doors closed.

“Half and half. I called the executives together to reassure them. There was never any room for trouble to begin with.”

“True. Most of the ones still around are on your side.”

“Even if someone had complaints, there was no reason for the Guild to oppose the publicization plan.”

“Because it also suggests that Cheon Tae… no, that your maternal grandfather is still going strong, Team Leader Choi. Right?”

“Yes. The reason Ares Guild hasn’t enjoyed its former standing is my maternal grandfather’s absence. In that sense, Mr. Jin’s proposal to use his fame was the best option for all of us.”

Cheon Taemin’s very existence was practically a cheat code in this world.

His name alone could command the attention of the entire world and send the hyenas lurking in the shadows, waiting for an opening, backing away.

Just like…

Yeah. Like the Martial God.

The thought came to me and hovered on the tip of my tongue, then faded. Team Leader Choi spoke again, his voice low.

“But unlike the Ares Guild executives, someone else can’t have been pleased by the news.”

“Someone else?”

He handed me something.

“The owner of this business card.”

Ding.

The elevator doors opened. We kept talking as we crossed a corridor that had been cleared on his orders.

“A business card? This?”

I frowned at the thing in my hand.

It was the size and shape of a business card, but could you really call it one? The platinum-colored surface gleamed, yet it bore no name, no title—not even a phone number.

The only thing I could guess was that its owner was an unimaginably wealthy magnate.

“This is heavier than I expected. Feels like it might actually be platinum. Are we meeting Middle Eastern royalty?”

“If that were the case, I would have finished the meeting and come.”

“Then who?”

“Look closely at the edge.”

I examined the card again. Only then did I notice the two birds engraved into it, one on each side.

This is…

“Do you know what kind of birds they are?”

“No idea.”

“Ravens.”

“Ravens?”

“Huginn and Muninn, to be precise.”

“What, the ravens have names? Aren’t they just ravens?”

"Someone without an interest in the subject might not know. They're creatures from mythology."

"Mythology?"

"Ancient Norse mythology."

Step. Step.

Our footsteps sounded unusually loud. As the office door drew nearer, Team Leader Choi continued.

"Huginn and Muninn are the two ravens associated with a god from those myths."

"Which god?"

"Odin."

"…!"

"You've heard that name plenty of times, haven't you?"

After a moment, I nodded.

Huginn and Muninn were new to me. Odin was another matter.

Oh, yeah. Another matter entirely.

Not just because he was a god everyone had heard of, or a character from the superhero movies I'd enjoyed as a kid.

Odin was a name known the world over.

Because Odin was the Guild everyone recognized as the best in the world.

Step.

We came to a stop. Beyond the door, I sensed a vast, carefully contained qi.

Team Leader Choi's calm voice crossed the quiet corridor.

"Let's go."

Click.

The door opened at last.

Someone standing before the fireplace slowly turned to face us.

At first, everyone thought it was a minor mishap.

They were busy and preoccupied with problems that needed immediate attention. And it had begun and ended in the blink of an eye.

But it was no minor mishap. The first to realize that was the youngest employee assigned to the evidence storage room.

"Um, Manager? I think we're missing a piece of evidence."

"What? What are you talking about?"

"I just checked the inventory, and we seem to be one item short…"

"Quit talking nonsense and check again, you idiot. Nothing's been taken out of storage in over a week."

The manager frowned, crossed his legs, and went back to watching his stocks.

Thirty minutes later, the youngest employee returned, scratching the back of his head.

“Manager, I really think it’s missing. One of the items connected to Go Jun is gone.”

“Hey, I told you. The storage room’s been locked for a week. My stock’s already hit its daily limit down,[3038] so stop pissing me off with this non—”

The manager broke off.

“What did you just say?”

“I told you. It really is gone,” the employee said, shrinking back.

“No, not that. What did you say right before that?”

“Huh? Oh—the items connected to Go Jun?”

“…!”

At the name that once again slipped from the youngest employee’s mouth, the manager felt a chill run down his spine.

Go Jun. Of all the things to go missing, it had to be evidence from the Go Jun case.

“Hey, the door. The door! Open the storage room right now! Get the others too—no, wait. Don’t call them yet!”

He jumped up and hurried to the evidence storage room. After he and the youngest employee spent hours searching every corner, he finally had to admit it.

Fuck…

It was gone. It really was gone.

The clueless junior hadn’t been talking nonsense. And the stock he’d bought the day before yesterday hitting its daily limit down was the least of his worries.

If word got out, his whole life would hit limit down.

What the hell is this?

Half dazed, he stared around the storage room. It made no sense.

They’d last checked the inventory only a week ago. Since then, no one had entered the room, yet an item had vanished without a trace.

Neither the anti-theft Magic placed on each piece of evidence nor the alarm Magic covering the entire room had gone off.

And it had to be evidence connected to Go Jun.

The mere disappearance of evidence was already enough to require him to write an incident report, but if evidence related to Go Jun had disappeared, this would not end with ordinary disciplinary action. The higher-ups had already collected the important pieces, but it had been an enormous case.

“…Seriously, this is driving me crazy.”

[3038] A daily limit down is the lowest price a stock is permitted to reach in a trading day under the exchange’s price-limit rules.

The manager felt the future go dark before his eyes. A civil servant's lifeline might be long, but it wasn't a steel cable. It could still be cut.

He pictured his tiger-like wife and rabbit-like children waiting at home. He couldn't bring himself to report it.

Right. Bury it. Just for now, and see what happens.

If he could talk the clueless junior around, he might find a way out later.

Decision made, he called to the youngest employee somewhere in the vast storage room, using the kindest voice he could muster.

"Are you there?"

"Ah, yes. I just got here."

"You went somewhere. Come over here for a moment. I have something important to discuss with you…"

He turned around and saw the youngest employee, eyes shining brightly.

Behind him stood the Security Team Leader, as imposing as an iron tower.

"What's going on?" the Security Team Leader asked. "I heard there was a problem."

"…?"

"Manager Kim?"

Fuck. I'm screwed.

The manager barely held back the curse. He opened his mouth, despair in his voice.

"It's gone."

"Pardon?"

"The necklace that came in among Go Jun's personal effects. It's gone."

Chapter 731

Step.

A glossy dress shoe pressed into the carpet.

The man had finally turned to face us, and one thought came to mind.

He looks like a crow.

Dressed in black from head to toe, he looked like a European gentleman who had wandered in from the nineteenth century. His suit didn't have a wrinkle in it, his coat collar stood high, and he wore a silk hat that had gone out of fashion a hundred years ago.

He was unmistakably Black, but his eyes, visible through a clear monocle, were a mysterious gold.

He studied us for a moment, then touched the brim of his hat in greeting.

"Pleased to meet you both."

His Korean came through smoothly, courtesy of translation Magic.

He was an uninvited guest who had appeared without an appointment, but we couldn't openly snub a messenger from Odin Guild. Besides, anyone carrying this much mana…

He's no ordinary messenger.

I gave the stranger a small nod, and Team Leader Choi offered him a seat.

"Please, sit down."

The three of us sat facing one another across a solid wood table. An odd silence settled over us before our guest broke it.

"I should introduce myself. I am Huginn of Odin Guild."

"The crow?"

I hadn't meant to say it aloud. Huginn gave a faint smile.

"Ah. I do have a real name, of course, but I have been called Huginn since I entered the Guild Master's service. You may call me that as well."

Once a Hunter made a name for himself, people often used an epithet based on his abilities more than his actual name. But no matter how hard I searched my memory, I couldn't place Huginn.

One of Odin's Guild Master's hidden right-hand men, maybe?

Even Korea's major Guilds kept plenty of secrets. I worked on the front lines; I could hardly expect to know the inner workings of a foreign Guild.

Especially Odin Guild.

There had been a time when Ares Guild was considered the best in the world. But a little over twenty years ago, Cheon Taemin vanished from the public eye without a trace.

People wondered what had happened. Lee Jungryong became Ares Guild's new captain, but no amount of skill could fill the void Cheon Taemin had left.

One year passed. Then five. Then ten.

Countless devoted followers of Cheon Taemin still called Ares Guild the best. Those who knew the reality—Hunters in particular—saw things differently.

To put it bluntly, Ares Guild had been a setting sun for the past ten years.

Odin Guild, meanwhile, was the rising sun.

Based in Europe, they had rapidly expanded their influence while Ares Guild was faltering. Along the way, they acquired and merged with several major Guilds, rising into a giant that no one could deny.

A giant powerful enough to send a mere messenger to Ares Guild's new master.

"I've come today to convey the Guild Master's congratulations."

At Huginn's words, Team Leader Choi calmly opened his mouth.

"Is that so?"

"Yes. He is delighted to see a capable young man with all the right qualifications take charge of Ares Guild."

It sounded like praise. It wasn't.

I ran my tongue over my lips.

Well, look at these bastards…

Some things showed through no matter how much wrapping you piled on. Huginn's courteous tone and manner couldn't hide what lay beneath them.

Looking down on us from the start.

I felt as if we were receiving an envoy from an overlord state. Team Leader Choi wasn't too stupid to notice, or rash enough to show his displeasure openly.

"That is rather high praise while my maternal grandfather is still with us, but I'm grateful nonetheless. Grateful enough to want to thank him in person."

Huginn kept smiling despite the barb.

"Ah, he was very sorry he could not come himself."

"The Guild Master must be busy. I'd heard he had withdrawn from public life several years ago… but it seems you can't trust rumors."

The higher someone rose, the harder it became to get them out of their seat. That was an eternal truth. Cheon Taemin, who had reportedly vanished altogether, was simply an extreme case.

Most major Guild Masters limited their contact with the outside world. Odin's Guild Master was no different.

"Even so, he is someone I have always respected, so I would like to visit him and pay my respects. What do you think?"

"Haha. Well…"

Huginn laughed aloud and laced his fingers together.

"I'm sorry, but he has been so busy lately that I doubt it would be possible."

"It sounds as though something has happened."

"Yes. A minor matter, though quite troublesome in its way. He seems to be giving a great deal of thought to how he should handle it. The others are, too."

"The others?"

"Acquaintances he has known for many years. The person he is meeting today is from Kronos… Ah, my apologies. I shouldn't have said that."

The name of another major Guild—one of the world's Ten Great Guilds alongside Ares—had slipped out.

Team Leader Choi spoke quietly. "Kronos Guild."

"I would appreciate it if you could forget you heard that. I make mistakes like this from time to time, and the Guild Master calls me in for a reprimand."

The troubled look on Huginn's face made me let out a short laugh.

"What mistake?"

"Pardon?"

"Mr. Crow, drop the half-assed acting. Let's talk honestly."

Hmm. Maybe I should have just kept watching.

But listening to him felt like choking down a hundred sweet potatoes without a drop of dongchimi broth to wash them down.[3039] I couldn't take it anymore.

I leaned back into the plush sofa.

"To put it bluntly, you came because of the Mana Cultivation Method that's about to be released, right? Stop at a reasonable point. If you go any further, this won't be fun. We can join hands with another major Guild like Kronos and bury you, so don't get cocky. That's what you wanted to say, isn't it?"

"…"

"Fuck's sake. We all know what this is about, so why give ourselves headaches talking in circles? We're not recording you. Say what you came to say and go. Right?"

Huginn listened to the whole torrent without a word, then turned to Team Leader Choi.

"I hesitated to mention this for fear of being discourteous, but must Mr. Jin be present?"

"Of course."

Team Leader Choi's reply was calm.

"Mr. Jin is that important. And if you wanted to speak with me alone, you should have said so at the outset."

"Then may I ask to speak with you alone now?"

[3039] Dongchimi is a watery radish kimchi commonly served chilled with its broth.

"I refuse."

There wasn't a moment's hesitation in Team Leader Choi's answer. Huginn blinked his golden eyes.

"Well… this is awkward."

"We feel the same. Had you made an appointment, we could have arranged any number of things beforehand."

"Hm."

Huginn adjusted his monocle.

"Since I was the first to be rude, I owe you both a formal apology."

Would you look at him.

I'd thought the crow getup was just a gimmick, but apparently he hadn't dressed like a gentleman for nothing. Since Huginn was being so courteous, I answered like a gentleman myself.

"You were rude first, so I'm not apologizing."

"…"

"I already understand how you feel, so don't stare at me like that. As I said earlier, let's just have an honest conversation. Okay?"

Huginn sighed and nodded.

"Very well. Since you insist, I shall be direct."

"Keep it short. Get to the point."

Huginn's monocle flashed beneath the office's lighting Magic. The brief silence ended as he looked from me to Team Leader Choi and spoke.

"Stop the release of the Mana Cultivation Method. If you refuse, there will be consequences."

It was a single sentence that fulfilled my request to get straight to the point one hundred percent—and made us feel even worse than I had expected.

"Well, I figured that was coming, but… fuck, it's unpleasant to hear. Don't you think?"

Team Leader Choi shrugged.

"Isn't it better than listening to him talk in circles again?"

"That's true. If he'd done that one more time, I really would've…"

"You must control yourself."

"I was going to, even without you telling me. I don't want to make this a bigger problem. Though I probably would've told him to take off the monocle first."

Team Leader Choi let out a short laugh. Huginn's eyes narrowed.

"You are every bit as rude as I was told."

"You're being pretty damn unpleasant too. I'd never heard of you, much less seen you."

"Do you intend to make a show of force here?"

“If I have to. Once you take off that monocle.”

“Listen, Mr. Jin.”

“Yes, hello? Go ahead.”

“Do not lose your temper. This is merely a proposal.”

“Your mouth may be crooked, but you should still speak straight. To my ears, that sounds like a threat, not a proposal.”

“If you choose to hear it as a threat, it may well become one. But your opinion is not what matters to me.”

Huginn answered firmly, then turned toward Team Leader Choi.

“What will you do, Mr. Choi?”

His golden eyes gleamed coldly. A voice filled with force slipped between Huginn’s lips.

“Make the choice yourself.”

Huginn was certain.

He can’t refuse this.

It was an ultimatum in all but name. Anyone with the slightest sense would back down.

Jin Taekyung was unpredictable to the point of being half-mad. But the young Asian man before Huginn, Choi Minwoo, would make a different choice.

Besides…

The Slayer won’t intervene. Master said so. That makes it a fact.

The assurance had come from the one man to whom Huginn gave his absolute loyalty. His Master had never been wrong. Choi Minwoo’s answer was as good as decided.

Perhaps that was why his response, when it came, sounded only natural.

“Since things have come to this, I suppose I have no choice. All right.”

“As expected. You are a wise man, Mr. Choi.”

Huginn felt his composure returning after his exchange with Jin Taekyung. He recovered his smile.

“Then I may take it that tomorrow evening’s release of the Mana Cultivation Method has been canceled entirely?”

“Of course. I’ve changed my mind.”

“Excellent. He will be pleased to hear it.”

Huginn rose and added, “As will the others.”

“I hope so,” Choi Minwoo said.

“They are reasonable people. From now on, we should be able to establish a good relationship in a more amicable atmosphere.”

With that pointed remark, Huginn looked at Jin Taekyung.

Only moments ago, Jin had been spouting vulgarities to his face. Now he was practically lying back on the sofa, fiddling with his smartphone.

Rude to the very end.

But satisfaction outweighed Huginn’s annoyance. He had won.

Before leaving, he adjusted his silk hat like the cultured gentleman he was and offered Jin his hand.

“Mr. Jin, I was discourteous today, though I did not intend to be. I hope we can meet with smiles next time.”

Only a winner had the privilege of mocking the loser with kind words. When Jin refused his hand and gave a curt reply instead, Huginn felt better still.

“You’re in a hurry. It hasn’t even finished uploading.”

“I have an urgent matter to attend to. Good day.”

His business here was done. Huginn gave Choi Minwoo a polite nod, turned, and headed for the door.

Step. Step.

His light footsteps crossed the carpet. But Huginn was forced to stop in front of the door.

He couldn’t ignore what Jin had just said.

“Did you say…?”

Huginn turned back, his words trailing off. He stared at Jin as if he couldn’t believe it.

Jin blinked.

“Hm? Oh, uploading?”

“Uploading…?”

“Yeah. It’s nothing important. You should get going—you look busy.”

Uploading. Uploading. Uploading.

The word throbbed in Huginn’s ears in time with his heartbeat.

“What. Exactly. Did you. Upload?”

And the answer to his clipped question came not from Jin Taekyung, but from Choi Minwoo.

“Didn’t I tell you? I changed my mind.”

“Surely not.”

“The Mana Cultivation Method. We’ve decided to release it today.”

“…!”

Chapter 732

Civilization sure is convenient.

You can store enormous amounts of data on a smartphone smaller than your palm, then share whatever you want with everyone else by moving a finger a few times.

Granted, all that technology had restricted what I could do until now. This time, though, it worked in my favor.

Mr. Jin Taekyung. Do you have the file with you?

Remembering the Sound Transmission Team Leader Choi had sent me just a few minutes ago, I let out a quiet laugh.

I waved my smartphone at Huginn, who stood frozen like a statue.

“See this?”

The screen’s light flickered in Huginn’s golden eyes.

At Team Leader Choi’s request, I had uploaded the file to a personal social media account I’d created months ago and never used. The words Post published were displayed on the screen.

“Guess that’s what you get in the Vice Guild Master’s office. Even the Wi-Fi’s on another level. The file’s pretty big, too, though it might not look like much.”

“…Mr. Jin.”

His voice sounded ready to boil over. I blinked my deer-like eyes at him.

“Hm? What?”

“What, exactly, have you done?”

“A good deed.”

Huginn’s skin flushed dark red. He took a deep breath before speaking again, his voice controlled.

“Delete it now. It is not too late.”

I put on a serious face.

“Should I? Honestly, I’m a little scared too.”

“A poor decision can still be corrected.”

“Easier said than done. You know how scary the world is these days. It’s probably spreading everywhere already.”

Buzz. Buzz. Bzzzz.

Before I’d finished speaking, my phone began vibrating nonstop.

Huginn realized the vibrations were notifications that people were sharing the post, and anxiety settled over his face.

“It has only been a few dozen seconds. We can still contain this.”

“Oh? Really?”

"You have my word."

"But people are going to curse me out. They'll say I baited everyone and then deleted the post and ran. I already scattered so much bait everywhere that this won't end with just a moderate amount of abuse."

"For now, you could announce that the Mana Cultivation Method needs further improvement… No. Rather than waste time discussing it, why not delete the post immediately?"

At Huginn's urging, I let out a soft sigh.

"I'd like to, but there's one thing I can't stop thinking about."

"Tell me. I will take care of it."

"What should I have for dinner tonight?"

"…?"

"Dinner. What could I eat that would make people say I'd had a great meal? What do you think, Team Leader Choi?"

Beside the motionless Huginn, Team Leader Choi answered thoughtfully.

"Kimchi stew."[3040]

"Kimchi stew?"

"Yes. Kimchi stew boiled with plenty of pork. And white rice."

"Oh, you know your food."

The moment I exclaimed in admiration—

Crack.

Bones shifted inside someone's tightly clenched fist. Huginn trembled for several seconds, then spoke in a low voice.

"So you insist… on making a foolish choice."

I shrugged.

"Why? Not a fan of Korean food?"

"I promise you, you will regret this."

"If you feel that strongly, I guess I have no choice. We'll have soybean paste stew instead of kimchi stew tonight. What do you think, Team Leader Choi?"

Team Leader Choi nodded.

"Either is fine with me. I'm hungry, as it happens."

"That's because we've been listening to bullshit since early evening. A dog barking once or twice can be cute, but it gets tiring when it won't stop."

I looked at Huginn and added, "Especially when it isn't my dog, but a mutt raised in the neighborhood next door."

"…!"

[3040] Kimchi is a Korean dish of fermented vegetables, commonly napa cabbage.

“Don’t know who owns it, but what’s the world coming to? Who lets a dog run loose without a leash or a muzzle these days?”

Muttering as if to myself, I glanced at my phone.

Five in the afternoon.

Dinner wouldn’t be too early, but oddly enough, I wasn’t hungry today.

The reason was probably…

Buzz. Buzz. Bzzzz.

The share notifications still coming in without a break.

“Team Leader Choi, how many followers did my account have? I made it and hardly ever checked.”

“More than five hundred million, as far as I know.”

“Five hundred million? That many?”

“It’s a popular social media platform worldwide, across countries and races. Of course, nearly half your followers are Chinese.”

“Wow. I should thank the Arch Lich.”

Huginn had been listening to us. Now he spoke coldly.

“I once heard a Korean proverb. ‘After losing the cow, repair the pasture.‘”

“Guess you didn’t hear it from a Korean. It’s a barn, not a pasture.”

“Pasture, stable—what does it matter? What matters is that the two of you have made the worst possible choice today.”

“We’ll see about that.”

“I assure you, before long you will lose everything. And then you will have nothing left to repair.”

At Huginn’s vicious words, I snorted quietly.

“The longer I look at you, the harder it is to tell whether you’re a crow or a bastard dog.”

“…Mr. Jin.”

“You’re a servant sent to deliver a message. You talk too much. If you’ve got more to say, bring your master here. Tell him to stop acting so important, like he really is a god.”

The moment I finished speaking, wind gusted from somewhere.

The vast mana pouring from Huginn’s body writhed. His aura was easily powerful enough for an S-rank Hunter—everything I’d expected, and more.

But the power that seemed ready to overflow in every direction stopped dead at Team Leader Choi’s quiet words.

“I cannot take responsibility for what happens next.”

“…”

“If you are prepared for that, do as you wish, Mr. Huginn.”

A brief silence passed.

The surging mana slowly subsided. The icy chill faded from Huginn's golden eyes, and the hand that had twitched toward something inside his clothes returned to its place.

Pat. Pat.

He straightened his clothes, which had briefly fallen out of order, and spoke with a stiff expression.

"I have been discourteous. I apologize."

I clicked my tongue at how readily he admitted it.

Too bad I wouldn't get to smash that neat monocle. But it couldn't be helped. The trouble we'd stirred up here today was enough for now.

No need to provoke him any further.

Odin Guild was undeniably a giant, and it cast a shadow to match.

Huginn himself was unknown to the outside world. There was no telling how many other S-rank Hunters Odin Guild had hidden away.

And the other major Guilds will probably side with Odin.

Half-crushing Huginn's face now would cost us more than we'd gain. Team Leader Choi knew it, and so did Huginn, despite his momentary loss of composure.

"I should be going. I expect we will meet again soon."

Still playing the gentleman, Huginn headed for the door with that pointed farewell. Team Leader Choi made sure to give him one last reply.

Or rather, one last bluff.

"I will remember Odin Guild's intentions. So will Mr. Jin Taekyung. And so will my maternal grandfather."

"…I understand."

Something appeared in Huginn's eyes as he answered—surprise, perhaps, or doubt. Then he was gone.

Click.

Team Leader Choi stared silently at the firmly closed door and muttered:

"So it begins."

"Well, we knew they'd try to stop us. With the release announced for tomorrow, they had no reason to hold back."

"They were more blatant than I expected. And…"

His voice trailed off. Team Leader Choi glanced briefly at the empty space Huginn had left behind before continuing.

"I doubt they sent a messenger only because of the Mana Cultivation Method."

"You mean?"

“I had the feeling he came to confirm someone’s absence. Someone as important to them as the Mana Cultivation Method the world will see tomorrow. Perhaps more important.”

I closed my mouth and quietly repeated one person’s name.

Cheon Taemin.

The living savior. A Hunter unlike any who had come before, or would ever come again.

The whole world revered him, and his strength was said to be beyond anyone’s reach. If the enemies hiding in the shadows learned he could not step forward, they would not hesitate to attack.

“But his condition is our most closely guarded secret.”

Only six people knew that Cheon Taemin was in a vegetative state.

Team Leader Choi and me. Song Song and Im Kkeokjeong. The Skeleton King and Magic Johnson.

Everyone who had known the truth before them was already dead.

Lee Jungryong. Song Cheonwoo. And finally, Go Jun.

In the past and even now, the truth about Cheon Taemin was something that could never be revealed to the outside world. And Magic Johnson, whom we had been forced to ask for help, was someone Team Leader Choi had more than enough reason to trust.

He was the one who had moved Cheon Taemin out of the secret area and cast several protective spells over him.

Wait. Magic?

My expression stiffened as a thought struck me. Team Leader Choi nodded.

“Do you remember what Mr. Johnson said in Ares Guild’s Area A?”

“…A mage.”

“Yes. Lee Jungryong had help. Mr. Johnson said Area A had been constructed by a mage on the level of a Grand Mage.”

“Then, could it be…”

“The secret could have been leaked from the very beginning.”

“…!”

“And if they already know…”

Team Leader Choi took a breath.

“This could be a difficult fight. Far more difficult than we expected.”

So why did he look so calm? Despite the gravity of his words, both his voice and his expression were composed.

“Why are you looking at me like that?” he asked.

I scratched my chin. “Maybe it’s just me, but you seem pretty relaxed for someone saying all that.”

"Pardon?"

"No, it feels like your words and actions don't match. You've always been the kind of person who put safety first, but just now, you didn't even blink before using your grandfather's name to make a bluff."

Team Leader Choi blinked, then gave a quiet laugh.

"Isn't it obvious?"

"What is?"

"You're here, Mr. Jin Taekyung."

"…Huh?"

"No matter how powerful a card our enemies play, I have a Joker card named Jin Taekyung. Naturally, that makes me bolder."

For a moment, I couldn't think of a reply. I stood there stammering like Mute Samryong,[3041] and Team Leader Choi's smile deepened.

"Oh, and…"

"And? What else?"

"I'm hungry. Let's have kimchi stew tonight, as we first decided."

Pat, pat.

Team Leader Choi tapped me on the shoulder, picked up his coat, and left the office. I stood there dazed for a moment, watching his back with an incredulous expression.

Team Leader Choi had changed. He hadn't used to be like this.

But, well…

I don't mind it.

I muttered inwardly and followed him.

Even now, the smartphone in my pocket continued to buzz without end.

[3041] Mute Samryong is a Korean short story by Na Do-hyang.

Chapter 733

At some point, I'd become the kind of person who could go three days and nights without sleep and still be fine. Even so, getting a good night's rest was a wonderful thing.

Especially when I woke up refreshed in a place where I was staying with my precious family.

"Home really is the best."

I sat down at the enormous dining table, and Team Leader Choi gave me a sour look from across it.

"This is my home, technically."

"Is that important right now?"

"I would say so. It is a matter of legal ownership."

"I'm starting to wonder if homeless people can even bear to live."

"Anyone listening would think you really had no house and no money."

As if.

I had a house in my own name now, and more money than I knew what to do with.

But even with trillions of won[3042] sitting in my bank account, I'd be hard-pressed to find a safer place for my family and me to stay.

No. At least not anywhere in Korea.

From the outside, it looked like an enormous mansion. In reality, it was an impregnable fortress wrapped in layer upon layer of protective Magic.

And since the public still knew it as Cheon Taemin's mansion, it would not be an exaggeration to say that it carried more symbolic weight than even the Blue House.

With everyone watching, breaking in is practically impossible. Even if an S-rank Hunter attacked, we could buy more than enough time.

For someone like me, who put my family's safety above all else in every situation, it was the perfect place.

Of course, Team Leader Choi might feel differently about suddenly having us as housemates.

"Now that I think about it, I'm being pretty shameless. Should I start paying rent this month?"

"If you offer, I will accept it. At ten million won[3043] per person, forty million[3044] a month should do."

[3042] Trillions of won—roughly two to nine trillion—are about $1.4–6.4 billion or €1.3–5.8 billion.

[3043] Ten million won is about $7,100 or €6,500.

[3044] Forty million won is about $29,000 or €26,000.

I gazed out the window at the sunlight pouring down and muttered:

“Ah, nice weather.”

“…”

“Anyway, why’s the rent so high? You even got the math wrong.”

“My calculations are always accurate.”

“What are you talking about? Ten million each makes thirty million[3045], not forty. My father died ages ago.”

“There is one more person.”

No sooner had Team Leader Choi said it than a blond foreigner came ambling down the hall and dropped into a chair.

“Feed me.”

Speak of the fucking devil.

Putting everything else aside, the very first thing he said after getting up and seeing our faces made it clear he was a first-rate lout.

“You gonna get your own damn food, or eat after I smack you?”

The Skeleton King considered his options carefully.

“I shall get my own food.”

“Good choice. Bring mine while you’re at it.”

“…?”

“Oh, and don’t forget the soup. Forget it and you’re dead.”

One of the mansion’s best features was the artificial intelligence in the kitchen, which always had hot food ready.

A little later, the Skeleton King brought me a meal, grumbling all the while. Team Leader Choi watched as I polished off my yukgaejang.[3046]

“Mr. Jin Taekyung, you always eat well.”

“People aren’t machines. You have to eat to live.”

“Did you sleep well?”

“Yes. It’s been a while. I probably collapsed almost the moment I lay down.”

Team Leader Choi nodded as if he had expected that answer.

“So that is why you could not answer your phone.”

“My phone?”

“You received calls from several places during the night. Have you still not checked?”

“Huh?”

[3045] Thirty million won is about $21,000 or €19,000.

[3046] Yukgaejang is a spicy Korean soup made with shredded beef, vegetables, and red pepper seasoning.

Only then did I check my smartphone. It had vibrated so much that I had switched it to silent, but there were now more than a hundred missed calls and messages that had piled up since last night.

What the hell?

The names scattered through the list were too familiar—and too illustrious—to write off as ads or spam.

Prince Felix of the United Kingdom, whom I had met during the operation to suppress the Arch Lich. Faye Chen, an S-rank Hunter.

Chuck Hagel of the United States, with whom I had destroyed a terrorist organization only two weeks ago by modern reckoning, and Magic Johnson, a name that had become impossible to leave out.

That wasn't all.

President Baek Hanseong was on the list, of course. So were President Doramp Jr. of the United States, whom I had met during my visit to the Pentagon, and Chairman Xiao Yang of China.

"It was a long night," Team Leader Choi said, raising his coffee cup with a tired look. "Longer than I expected. Though I did hear quite a bit of news."

"News?"

"Yes. Chairman Xiao Yang, in particular, passed along something interesting."

Tap, tap.

Team Leader Choi tapped the tablet PC in front of him with one long finger. A hologram rose above the screen and projected dozens of images.

Flash.

"…What is this?"

Once the images had formed, I frowned and put down my spoon.

I had a strong stomach and was used to gruesome sights, but I couldn't keep eating while I looked at these.

"Why are there so many corpses?"

"They were prisoners who were alive and well and incarcerated at Beijing Special Detention Center as recently as last night. And among them are some faces you know, Mr. Jin Taekyung."

"I do?"

Swish.

Team Leader Choi waved a hand instead of answering. The images scattered and vanished, all but one, which expanded before me.

"Do you recognize him now?"

I studied it in silence.

The middle-aged man lay there peacefully, as though deep in sleep. His face was familiar, but the Skeleton King recalled his name before I did.

"That human. His name was, ah… Wu Xueming? Some peculiar name like that."

He smiled smugly when Team Leader Choi and I looked at him.

"Ha-ha. You underestimate the information-gathering abilities of this body. Unlike lazy creatures such as yourselves, I devoted myself to my smartphone even at the expense of my sleeping hours."

"You just couldn't sleep. You're dead, after all."

"…"

The Skeleton King grew dejected and began picking at his yukgaejang. Team Leader Choi nodded before speaking.

"Former Premier of the State Council of the People's Republic of China, and a member of the Politburo Standing Committee. And…"

I finally remembered everything about Wu Xueming and cut in.

"Wu Heixing's father. His son was the bastard who teamed up with Lee Jungryong to kill me."

"Correct. Wu Xueming was effectively China's second most powerful man, and the leader of the Crown Prince Party—Chairman Xiao Yang's strongest political rival."

I knew all that. After the operation against the Arch Lich, Wu Xueming had raised questions about his son's death, and I'd learned plenty about him.

One of the main reasons Wu Heixing had been able to cause so much trouble and get away with it was his father's family. The Wu clan was among China's most distinguished.

But…

"Didn't all that corruption come out and knock Wu Xueming out of power? Last I heard, he was waiting for trial."

"That is correct. Chairman Xiao Yang seized the opportunity, and most of the Crown Prince Party, including Wu Xueming, was imprisoned."

"And now Wu Xueming is suddenly dead?"

"Wu Xueming was still middle-aged, and he had spent decades drinking potions like water for the sake of his health. His cause of death was sudden cardiac arrest, but there is no way he and some fifty of his relatives could all die the same way at the exact same time."

"Relatives? Then those pictures…"

"According to Chairman Xiao Yang, every one of them belonged to the Wu family. Some were children."

"…!"

The annihilation of an entire household.

Those words sounded like something out of Murim. A chill ran down my spine, and an almost unbelievable thought struck me.

"Team Leader Choi. You don't think…"

But before I could finish, Team Leader Choi shook his head.

"Chairman Xiao Yang did not do this. If anything, he wanted to win Wu Xueming over more than anyone."

Win him over.

Wu Xueming had been Xiao Yang's greatest political rival. Now that he had no hope of a comeback, Xiao Yang had no particular need to kill him. Then again, he had no reason to keep him alive, either.

So what did he hope to gain by winning him over? What did Wu Xueming have?

The Crown Prince Party's collapsed influence? His vast fortune, which was all but certain to be seized?

I silently rolled the word persuade around in my mind. Before long, I realized the answer.

"…The Mana Cultivation Method."

At the single word that escaped like a groan, the Skeleton King blinked, and Team Leader Choi answered in a low voice.

"Yes. Chairman Xiao Yang was trying to win Wu Xueming over in order to obtain the very Mana Cultivation Method that had turned Wu Heixing into an S-rank Hunter."

An S-rank Hunter with that level of power would naturally discover a unique training method of his own at some point.

But Wu Heixing had been different. He had already learned a Mana Cultivation Method passed down through his family, and after his death and Wu Xueming's downfall, I had stopped paying much attention to the matter.

But the fact that Wu Xueming and all his relatives suddenly died last night means…

I didn't care what Xiao Yang planned to do with the method. What mattered was that the destruction of the Wu family had ended his attempt to get it—and who had done that.

I already knew the answer.

"Odin Guild."

A dry voice, unfamiliar even to me, slipped between my lips. Team Leader Choi ran his fingers over his coffee cup, which had gone cold.

"That seems most likely."

"…"

"According to Chairman Xiao Yang, Wu Xueming appeared willing to cooperate. He had little choice. If he refused to hand over the Mana Cultivation Method, he faced life imprisonment at the least, and possibly execution. But…"

Team Leader Choi trailed off and bit his lip.

"Someone else would not have wanted that."

It felt as though the blood throughout my body had frozen.

They had made their move. Faster than I'd expected, and with far more cruelty.

But even so, to wipe out an entire household…

I looked at the hologram, still hovering above the table. Women, children, old people. All of them lay in a sleep from which they would never wake.

Simply because they had been born into the Wu family.

Did they go this far to stop the Mana Cultivation Method from getting out? Or…

Was this a reply to what happened last night?

The thoughts hovered on the tip of my tongue, then scattered. I stared at the faces of the dead for a while before speaking.

"Team Leader Choi."

"Yes. Please, go ahead."

"If you've got time, want to go out for coffee?"

"I do not mind. But where would we go all of a sudden?"

"Let's see. Was it Paris?"

"What?"

Team Leader Choi looked at me, puzzled. I went on calmly.

"Odin Guild. I feel like going to see the boss's ugly mug."

"…!"

Chapter 734

Team Leader Choi rarely showed a change in expression.

He kept his feelings to himself, and in interviews he stuck to the essentials. Even veteran reporters—the kind who claimed they'd grabbed a microphone at their first-birthday celebration—struggled to get a word out of him.[3047]

But Team Leader Choi was flesh and blood. Sometimes he showed plenty of emotion, especially when he was talking to me. Then he let out everything he usually kept hidden.

Like now.

"Odin Guild. I feel like going to see the boss's ugly mug."

"…!"

The instant I finished speaking, his mouth fell open in a daze. Beneath his trembling eyelids, his pupils were already shaking like an earthquake.

This bastard's planning to cause trouble again.

Team Leader Choi stared at me with exactly that look in his eyes. After a long silence, he finally managed to force out his voice.

"Are you serious?"

"Hm."

I thought for a moment.

"Maybe fifty-fifty?"

"So you're half-insane."

"Is that how it works?"

"I am genuinely curious. Where did this insane idea of going to see the Odin Guild Master right now come from? Your heart or your head?"

"My heart."

Team Leader Choi sighed.

"That is a relief, at least. You have not gone completely insane."

"You're calling a perfectly sane person crazy? I'm just planning to look the man in the face and have a cup of coffee with him. Ares Guild has branches in France anyway, so I can use that as an excuse and kill two birds with one stone…"

"It is a Guild branch, not a chain store. And you expect me to believe that? Are you joking?"

At Team Leader Choi's utterly serious question, I smacked my lips.

"Well, if the conversation doesn't go smoothly, there might be a little trouble."

"I will take that to mean an enormous amount of trouble."

[3047] Doljabi is a Korean first-birthday ceremony in which a child chooses an object thought to hint at their future.

I almost asked what he was making such a big deal about, but stopped myself.

I couldn't honestly say his concern was exaggerated. It had only been a few weeks in the modern world since I'd stormed into Ares Guild alone and cracked Go Jun's skull.

Can't exactly argue after pulling a stunt like that.

Besides, I wasn't an idiot. I knew perfectly well that following my heart right now would probably end badly.

"All right."

"The Eiffel Tower collapses, the Guild collapses, public opinion turns into a wasteland… What?"

"I said all right."

Team Leader Choi, already a step ahead of me in his hallucinations, blinked.

"Really?"

I gave a small nod.

"We don't have a pretext."

Even in Murim, where human lives were worth no more than livestock, you needed at least some justification. If I flew to Paris and picked a fight with Odin Guild now, all I'd get was an Interpol wanted notice.

At least I had public support when I dealt with Go Jun.

That incident had caused an international stir, but it had happened in Korea. Unlike this time, there had been clear testimony and evidence. The public had also been furious over Go Jun's many crimes against humanity.

Those were the reasons I'd been able to step outside the law without becoming a criminal.

Paris would be different.

My heart was screaming at me to storm into Paris and raise hell, but the part of my reason that was still alive was facing reality.

Team Leader Choi's eyes widened at my decision. The Skeleton King, who had been staring at his smartphone while shoveling down yukgaejang,[3048] dropped his spoon.

"This cannot be. Did you just say 'pretext'?"

"Impossible. You bastard, you're a monster! What have you done with the treacherous human?"

"…"

"Mr. Jin Taekyung, this is a simple verification procedure. Please do not take offense. Where did we first meet?"

"Doppelganger! Get out of the treacherous human's body!"

These two were acting like fucking idiots.

[3048] Yukgaejang is a spicy Korean beef soup, usually made with shredded beef and vegetables.

Instead of answering, I picked up the spoon on the table and smacked the Skeleton King on top of his head.

Crack!

“My skull! My beautiful skull!”

Team Leader Choi watched the Skeleton King howl and nodded.

“What a relief. You are Jin Taekyung.”

“…”

After completing that strangely unpleasant verification procedure, Team Leader Choi let out a sigh of relief.

“In any case, I am glad you changed your mind.”

“If this were something I could settle that way, I’d have bought a ticket to Paris already. To hell with international crime.”

“That is true. If Odin Guild disappeared, another Odin Guild would take its place.”

It was the same as when Ares Guild had been our enemy.

The world was vast, and another enemy would fill the space left by the one we defeated. We’d taken Ares Guild by siege; others could do the same to us. Now the City Lord’s duty was to defend the castle from the competitors swarming around it and expand his territory as far as he could.

And Odin Guild wasn’t some stray wolf that had wandered in from who knew where.

It was a beast with a massive body and sharp claws.

A greedy one, too, judging by what was written on the tablet Team Leader Choi had just put in front of me.

“What is this…?”

“The proposal the Chinese government sent Odin Guild during the Monster Wave in Sichuan Province, inviting them to participate. It was unofficial, of course, and had no legal force.”

An unofficial proposal.

I wondered how Team Leader Choi had obtained something that should have been nearly impossible to leak. Then the answer came to me.

“Grandpa Jongseok gave it to you?”

“Not Grandpa Jongseok. Chairman Xiao Yang.”

“Right. Grandpa Jongseok.”

“…”

“What? It sounds friendly. Besides, the old guy likes me a lot.”

Team Leader Choi looked at me as though he’d half given up.

“As you know, Mr. Jin Taekyung, during the early stages of the crisis, China’s State Council and Politburo Standing Committee were reluctant to request help from abroad. They were especially vehemently opposed to support from the West.”

The Skeleton King, still tenderly stroking his skull, interrupted with a puzzled look.

“They opposed it? Why?”

Well, why indeed?

There were any number of reasons, but they all came down to one answer. I kindly gave it to him.

“Because it’s China.”

“What does that mean? Humans are dying either way!”

“Because it’s China.”

“No, treacherous human. You seem not to have understood my question…”

“Yeah. China.”

“…?”

“That’s just how it is. You might not get it yet.”

I left the Skeleton King looking thoroughly confused and turned back to Team Leader Choi.

“But China did ask the West for help eventually, didn’t it? Prince Felix of the United Kingdom and Magic Johnson came, too.”

“Yes. Once the damage from the Arch Lich reached astronomical proportions, China’s leaders had no choice but to accept Chairman Xiao Yang’s argument. They would have to pay a suitable diplomatic and material price when it was over, though, so they had to consider that when assembling their forces.”

That was how four S-rank Hunters had gathered, not counting me.

An incredible force in its own right. But what mattered now was that Odin Guild had backed out when it should have been a central part of that force alongside Lee Jungryong’s Ares Guild.

“Then why did Odin Guild turn down the offer? That looks like enough money to make them accept. More than enough.”

The fee listed on the tablet was staggering—nearly twice what I’d heard Ares Guild had been paid, with several other perks attached. China had offered top-tier treatment befitting the name Odin.

Team Leader Choi’s next words answered my question.

“The Chinese government was the one that ultimately turned it down.”

“What?”

“Odin Guild added a condition when the negotiations were almost complete.”

“What condition…?”

Team Leader Choi took a sip of lukewarm coffee, then spoke quietly.

“They wanted China to lease ten cities—including Chengdu, Meishan, Ziyang, and Suining, the representative administrative districts of Sichuan Province—to Odin Guild for the next ninety-nine years, as well as authorize the establishment of an official branch in Beijing.”

"…!"

"They were effectively asking China to cede Sichuan Province. Permission to set up an official branch, which the Chinese government prohibits, was an added bonus."

Good God. What did I just hear?

I stared at him and muttered, "Wow. Those bastards are insane. They're worse than Chinks."

"According to Chairman Xiao Yang, Odin Guild had contacted the French government shortly before the negotiations."

"Even so, how could they make an offer that crazy?"

"It is France."

"No, there's such a thing as common sense."

"France."

"…Team Leader Choi?"

"France."

"…"

Why did this feel oddly familiar? Was it just me?

As I stared at him with a sour expression, Team Leader Choi spoke to me in a gentle voice.

"Mr. Jin Taekyung, did you know Koreans have another name for the French?"

"Oh."

With a sudden flash of insight, I let out an exclamation.

"European Chinks…!"

Team Leader Choi nodded.

"Their skin color and culture are different, but they are the same sort. The President can have an affair or do whatever else he likes, and the French do not care. Odin Guild did not put its headquarters in Paris by accident. Scandals there cause little commotion."

"But wasn't that just an internet meme?"

"I remember my school days in Paris. When a photograph of my maternal grandfather appeared in our history textbook, everyone in the classroom looked at me and pulled their eyes into slits."

"Oh."

"The teacher did it, too."

"Ah! Ah…"

"It is all right. It was a long time ago."

Team Leader Choi set aside the painful childhood memory that had surfaced and continued.

"What matters most is that even with the French government behind it, Odin Guild cannot move against us openly. As with their assassination of Wu Xueming's family, they can only send a warning rather than threaten us directly."

He was right.

Cheon Taemin's flag flew over the walls of Ares Guild, and the world couldn't simply ignore what it had seen me do. That held true even for Odin Guild, the greatest Guild in the world, or any other major Guild.

And above all…

"People around the world are cheering us on. The media may not be able to openly criticize the major Guilds, but plenty of people are condemning them."

Public sentiment.

The strongest weapon—and shield—we had gained by releasing the Mana Cultivation Method.

We needed to make full use of it. Make sure even Odin Guild couldn't come near us…

"Um, sorry to ruin the mood."

The Skeleton King suddenly held out his smartphone.

"Is this the cheering you mean?"

On the screen of the smartphone he offered me was a breaking-news alert that had been posted only a few dozen seconds earlier.

> Odin Guild Announces Support for Ares
> Odin Guild Unveils New Mana Cultivation Method
> Senior Official: "A Project We've Been Preparing for Years"
> "Though We're a Step Behind, We Want to Change the World with Them." The World's Greatest Guild Shows Its Class

Fuck. What the hell is this now?

Chapter 735

A middle-aged man in a thin silk robe gazed out the window.

Clouds carrying January's chill swept past, so close he could almost touch them. Far below, he could make out buildings and plazas laid out in separate districts.

A great city steeped in history. Countless people moved through it, reduced to tiny dots.

The gloomy gray sky and mist-shrouded streets hardly suited Paris's name, the City of Light. But the middle-aged man didn't care.

He loved everything about this city—about Paris.

From a skyscraper too high for even the mist to reach, the world was always beautiful.

Especially on a day like today.

Ding. Deeeeng—

Bells rang out across the plaza, announcing seven in the morning. The middle-aged man turned slowly from the wall of windows.

Behind him lay a vast study.

At the round table in its center, over ten figures waited for him, appearing amid the green glow unique to holograms.

"It's been a long time since we all gathered like this. Our last meeting was, what… three years ago?"

The corners of the people's mouths, visible beneath their masks, curled slightly at the joke the middle-aged man made as soon as he took the seat of honor.

Three years?

They had held a secret meeting just two nights ago.

"If I remember correctly, it was ten years ago."

"Ten years? Already?"

"Wasn't it closer to thirty?"

"Damn it. Thirty years ago was the Great Cataclysm. I don't even want to remember the hell we went through, so drop it."

Quiet laughter mingled with their conversation.

The middle-aged man watched them with a gentle smile.

"You all seem to be in good spirits. Yes, it's nice to indulge in idle chatter now and then."

"…!"

"…!"

Silence fell at his quiet words.

They all closed their mouths at once, as though on cue. Still smiling, the middle-aged man went on.

“I did not call this meeting to listen to pointless nonsense or trashy small talk like this… What does everyone think?”

Their eyes wavered at each breath he took, each slight movement of his fingertips.

Even through a hologram, his overwhelming presence—and his aura—reached them.

Everyone at the meeting was a major figure. None could hope to rival him.

The reason was simple.

The man before them was the master of Odin Guild, known as the greatest Guild in the world, and one of the absolute beings capable of controlling the world.

“I-I apologize, Michael. I was pleased that everything was proceeding without a hitch, and…”

“I wasn’t asking for excuses.”

Michael cut him off.

“I simply found it pathetic to see you all relaxing as though everything were over.”

“…”

“Our opponent is more daring than we expected. How else could they have done something so insane?”

No one at the table needed to ask what he meant. By now, the whole world knew.

The public release of the Mana Cultivation Method.

To a tiny number of people, it was an act of madness that threatened to overturn the established order. Their opponent had made it happen anyway.

“I sent Huginn, and they still didn’t get the message. Reckless beyond belief… but I suppose that means they’re confident.”

One of them spoke cautiously.

“If, hypothetically, they’re counting on Sky…”

“I believe I already told you not to concern yourselves with him.”

“…Understood.”

The reply lacked conviction.

Until now, Michael’s word had been law to all of them.

Once he had spoken with such certainty, they had no choice but to dig a hole for any lingering doubts deep in their hearts and bury them there.

But this time, none of them could stop turning the question over.

Because the person in question was none other than Cheon Taemin.

Even so, how can he tell us not to worry about something this serious?

What happens if Sky gets involved?

Where did he get his information…?

The questions kept circling through their minds.

Michael's information had always been reliable. No one knew who provided it or what methods he used to obtain it, but as long as they trusted and acted on the information he brought them, they profited.

Immense wealth and fame. Lofty social status.

Yet even the highest, strongest wall could fall in an instant.

And the name Cheon Taemin was not something they could simply bury through faith. The sense of crisis they felt was conveyed in its entirety to one person.

Tap. Tap.

A finger drummed slowly on the round table. Waves of powerful mana rolled over them, pulling them from their thoughts.

"You seem uneasy."

They hurried to answer his gentle voice.

"Not at all."

"How could we be?"

"Our alliance is powerful. We won't lose to brats like them."

They kept the qualification to themselves: As long as Cheon Taemin stays out of it.

For now, they could only trust Michael. Judging by the power and ability he had shown them all this time, those mere fledglings would not be opponents at all, just as one of them had said.

"Choi, that young man, is resourceful, but his limitations are equally clear."

"The same goes for Jin Taekyung. However strong he is, he can't get past the walls we've built."

There had certainly been a time when such a thing was possible.

A time so cruel and chaotic that it could only be called the Great Cataclysm.

Humans slaughtered monsters. Monsters slaughtered humans. And humans slaughtered other humans like livestock.

It was a turbulent period when nothing seemed strange, no matter what happened.

But the Great Cataclysm was over.

On a sea lashed by storms, nothing that happened would seem strange. But in a peaceful world like this one, a mere ripple could not bring about change.

The Mana Cultivation Method they had released was no different.

"Their decision to make the Mana Cultivation Method public has cost us dearly. But we've dealt with the immediate crisis. There's no reason to worry."

"Exactly. The media didn't dare criticize us, and above all, you acted quickly, Guild Master."

Michael nodded without a word.

News of the Mana Cultivation Method Odin Guild had unveiled at sunrise was even now spreading across the world through every kind of media.

Public criticism of the established major Guilds would gradually die down. And the fledglings who had ignored his generous offer would soon regret it.

This time, he would not settle for words. He would show them directly through his actions.

How foolish.

Michael muttered inwardly.

In today's world, a Mana Cultivation Method was a treasure beyond price. A Guild's standing and a nation's influence depended on the strength of their Hunters, yet those fools had given one away to the entire world.

They should have asked themselves why no one had ever done it before.

Others had stepped forward in the past, armed with nothing but morality and a sense of justice. Powerful people recognized around the world, they had wanted to share their special abilities with everyone.

That was why they had died.

And this time will end the same way.

History repeated itself.

Although the Mana Cultivation Method had been made public because of their opponent's unexpected and impulsive act, they would have to pay the price for their foolishness.

That was how the world worked.

There was only one thing that continued to bother him: the young man who had caused the greatest change in recent times.

Jin Taekyung.

Unlike Choi Minwoo, whom Michael still considered a fledgling, that bastard was a powerful figure no one could deny.

In less than a year, he had amassed countless achievements and considerable fame. Recently, he had brought down Ares Guild's headquarters single-handedly, despite the hundreds of Hunters waiting there, Go Jun among them.

And that was not all.

The world didn't know it yet, but Michael knew Jin Taekyung had recently wiped out terrorist organizations and rebel groups.

Power that ranks among the best even among S-rank Hunters. And daring.

Not one of the people chattering before him could match that.

An S-rank Hunter who led a major Guild known around the world. A politician who could sway a powerful nation. A tycoon who owned hundreds of Gates and oil fields…

Every one of them deserved to be called a major figure. To Michael, they were all greedy idiots.

Of course, they're the reason I was able to make Odin Guild the greatest in the world.

Michael muttered inwardly and clicked his tongue softly.

Tsk.

The chatter stopped. Every eye turned to him.

He looked over them one by one. Then he sensed someone approaching from a distance.

"It seems we have a guest."

"Ah, then…"

"I will notify you separately about the next meeting."

Bzzzt.

That was all.

The instant Michael spoke, the holograms melted away and disappeared. At the same time, the study's tightly closed doors swung wide open at a gesture from him.

"So, did you enjoy your trip?"

The man in old-fashioned clothes answered Michael's waiting question.

"I was merely following orders."

"You're always so stiff. Come in, Huginn."

"Thank you."

Thud.

Huginn took off his hat, gave it a few taps, and stepped into the study.

Michael saw grains of sand scattered near the door and smiled calmly.

"You've been getting around."

"The schedule was rather tight."

"You went a long way. It must have been difficult. Did you encounter any problems?"

"There were some, but I took care of them."

His answer was curt, but the heat in Huginn's eyes still held traces of battle.

Michael nodded without showing any particular reaction.

He had personally selected and trained Huginn. As a fixer, the man was without equal, and he carried out every assignment perfectly.

This one included.

"Did you bring your friends?"

"Yes. When they heard why I'd come, they volunteered to help. Unlike the reception I got in Korea, everyone treated me kindly."

"How good of them to come all that way. Where are they now?"

"They should all be on their way to their destinations."

“And the gifts?”

“I made certain they were handed over.”

Huginn drew a pocket watch from his coat and checked it.

“There is about an hour left until the first gift is delivered.”

“An hour. Good. Coffee while we wait?”

“If possible, I would prefer black tea.”

Michael smiled and made them a cup of each.

Exactly one hour later, he confirmed with his own eyes that his orders had been carried out without fail.

BOOOOM!

Beneath the pale clouds, red flames surged upward with a deafening roar. And then…

Whooosh!

The air slowly began to warp. Michael watched it and murmured lightly,

“As expected, it is a beautiful city.”

A building was engulfed in flames.

With Ares Guild’s Paris branch at its center, space began to tear apart.

Chapter 736

It started with barely a tremor. Nothing more, nothing less.

But that was only the first sign.

Rumble…

The ground shook.

Visitors lined up outside the Louvre ducked instinctively. In Paris's 10th arrondissement, people who had been fighting with fistfuls of each other's collars broke apart and scattered, swearing as they ran.

And in the 6th arrondissement…

"Ah…"

People forgot to scream. They could only stare, dazed, at the sight before them.

Gooooom.

Crimson-black darkness coiled around a skyscraper that rose to a dizzying height, then surged upward.

Everyone held their breath at the vast, ominous energy, unlike anything they had ever felt.

BOOOOOM!

The skyscraper that had housed Ares Guild's Paris branch exploded.

The layers of defensive Magic around its exterior. The sturdy frame built to withstand a missile strike. All of it shattered and burst outward.

Fragments large and small, once part of a building some fifty stories tall, rained down in flames.

Fwoosh. Whooooooosh!

"…!"

It was impossible to believe. Impossible to deny.

As countless fragments blotted out the sky, a thought came to the people below.

Maybe today is the day of the apocalypse described in the Bible.

Then they saw the air twisting out of shape, and suspicion hardened into despairing certainty.

Fwooooooosh!

None of them had ever seen it happen. But as people living amid the brightest civilization in history, they knew what the phenomenon was called.

"Monster Wave…"

The words escaped someone like a groan.

Yet even with debris falling toward them and monsters emerging from the warped space, no one ran.

Not the Sorbonne students cycling to class. Not the young couple walking through the Luxembourg Gardens with a stroller. Not the police rushing to calm the public.

Everyone who had been going about their morning—the entire 6th arrondissement—froze where they stood, gripped by fear and a chill that sank into their bones.

And then—

BOOM! BOOM! BOOM!

A rain of fire engulfed everything within a radius of over a hundred meters,[3049] and the gates of hell opened.

Thud. Thud.

Huge monsters with arms and legs as thick as temple pillars, each with two heads on a single body, beat their chests and roared.

—Gwooooooar!

Crash!

Glass shattered all around them, unable to withstand the force of their roars.

Fear, which only powerful monsters could emit, shot out like invisible ropes and bound thousands of people in place.

—Grrrr.

A growl rich with satisfaction.

The hunt was about to begin.

Or so it should have been.

Whooooooosh! Boom!

A flash struck the monster at the front, sending it staggering. Everything above its shoulders was gone.

Thud!

The ground shook. The hundred or so monsters raised their heads as one.

Among the thousands of people rooted to the spot, predators hidden in the flock of sheep were revealing themselves.

They came with dazzling flashes too fast for the eye to follow.

Whooooooosh! Crack!

Rattle, rattle.

Flesh and bone crumpled. Blue blood sprayed in every direction.

A Twin Head Ogre that had survived at the cost of one of its heads stepped backward without realizing it.

It had no idea what waited behind it.

Crunch!

A gigantic fist burst its remaining head like a watermelon.

[3049] A hundred meters is about 330 ft.

The giant possessed strength and a physique far beyond those of the other ogres. It licked its subordinate's brain matter from its fist, and a golden-eyed human was reflected in its enormous pupils.

—Karsh. Marto.

The words were in the Demon Realm language. They sounded almost like a curse.

Huginn paid them no attention. He turned and bowed politely to someone behind him.

"It is a Named Monster—a Giant Ogre. What would you like to do?"

A calm voice answered.

"Not bad. This should do for a demonstration."

"Then…?"

"I'll take it. Clear out the rest."

That was all.

At the order, Huginn and a hundred Hunters swept forward as one, like the storm and lightning painted on their armor.

Like the ancient god whose name they bore: Odin.

Whooooooosh! Slash!

A clash. Then a slaughter.

Limbs as thick as logs flew through the air, and dazzling aura cut through the magical power surging around the monsters.

It was a scene out of myth.

And even in a myth crowded with figures, there was always one hero who shone above the rest.

—Gwooooooar!

Crack!

One Strike.

The roar that had seemed ready to swallow the city fell silent.

Ruuuuumble!

The Giant Ogre, dozens of meters[3050] tall, dropped to its knees before a human who looked tiny beside its mountain of a body.

But to the people who had seen it all, that human was anything but small.

A hero had protected them. A true giant stood before them.

Brought back from the brink of death, the crowd cried out the hero's name—or the heroes' names—as one.

"Michael! Michael!"

"Odin Guild!"

[3050] Dozens of meters means roughly 20–90 m, or about 66–300 ft.

As the cheers spread like wildfire, Michael declared in a ringing voice, “Rest assured. As long as Odin Guild and I are here to protect you, no danger will come to you.”

Then he looked toward the ruins beneath the heaps of concrete and added, too quietly for anyone to hear, “At least not today.”

With a faint smile, he stepped toward the remaining monsters, trampling the fallen name Ares beneath his foot. The letters had lost their shine when they tore free of the building and fell among the rubble.

Odin Guild Declares Support for Ares

Odin Guild Master Michael Silbert: “We Offer Our Heartfelt Applause for Ares Guild’s Actions in the Public Interest and Will Walk Forward Alongside Them”

Odin Guild Makes Surprise Release of New Mana Cultivation Method!

Senior Odin Guild Official Dismisses Pre-Release Controversy: “A Major Project Years in the Making. If You Think We Released It Because of Public Opinion, That Is Regrettable, but We Will Endure It…”

The breaking news I’d learned from the Skeleton King early that morning had been startling enough.

Before the shock could fade, another wave hit us.

A far bigger, more terrifying one.

Bzzzt. Bzzzt.

Team Leader Choi’s smartphone vibrated on the table.

A few seconds later, another breaking report came over the holographic TV. It was hard to believe.

—A Monster Wave has occurred in Paris, France. The site is a skyscraper in the city’s 6th arrondissement, now identified as Ares Guild’s Paris branch, in a shocking development…

—The French government has begun sealing off the 6th arrondissement under international emergency law. The casualty count and details of the operation to suppress the monsters remain unknown…

—Local witnesses say Odin Guild, based nearby, was the first to head to the scene…

Reports poured from the TVs around the restaurant.

But among the countless words spilling from the lips of people with different skin colors and speaking different languages, only three terms pierced my ears.

Monster Wave.

Ares Guild’s Paris branch.

And…

Odin.

Ding.

SYSTEM

A sudden Quest, The Darkness Over Paris, has been generated!
You cannot choose whether to accept this Quest. By the authority of the System, the Quest will proceed by force!
Quest
The Darkness Over Paris
Every choice has consequences.
Your enemies have brought down Ares Guild's Paris branch, and the city once full of life is now shrouded in darkness and the roars of monsters.
Rescue them as quickly as possible and repel the monster army to prevent innocent casualties!
Grade: Supreme Peak
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Mission:
Rescue the survivors of the Paris branch (Incomplete)
Suppress the Monster Wave (Incomplete)
Reward: Determined by the outcome
Failure: Determined by the outcome

"…!"

Everything came at once: the System notification ringing in my ears, the holographic windows appearing before my eyes.

But by the time I saw and heard them, I was already moving on instinct.

No. We all were.

"Gather around me. Quickly!"

Team Leader Choi shouted, pulled a Magic Scroll from his coat, and tore it.

Fwoosh!

A blinding flash burst out and enveloped us.

If I can't come help and you need to get somewhere fast, use this. As long as you know the exact coordinates, you'll arrive safely.

Magic Johnson had said that when he gave me the Magic Scrolls several weeks ago, near the end of the Middle East cleanup operation.

Now we were burning through the several dozen Teleport scrolls he'd given me, one every few seconds.

Rip!

The tough, specially treated parchment tore. The mana dormant inside it awakened, and another brilliant flash enveloped us and carried us toward the chosen coordinates.

Flash!

Light flared again and again.

We leaped through space without pause—sometimes tens of kilometers,[3051] sometimes hundreds.[3052] Before long, my body began to ache, and exhaustion weighed on my mind.

Hup.

The rapid succession of spatial-transit spells was taking its toll.

But no one stopped. Not even Team Leader Choi, who was probably bearing the worst of it.

Grind.

He clenched his teeth and pulled out another scroll.

Ignoring the foreign airport Hunters thrown into confusion by our unauthorized spatial movement, he tore one scroll, then another before the aftereffects of the first had even faded.

Scroll after scroll ripped apart.

With every flash, the scenery changed. So did the skin colors and languages of the people around us.

At last, after a flash I had long since lost count of, we saw it.

The ruins of what had been Ares Guild’s Paris branch.

Huge monster corpses lay scattered everywhere. Amid the concrete and rebar, I could not sense so much as a trace of life.

Then a sound only I could hear cut through the air.

Beep.

[3051] Tens of kilometers means roughly 20–90 km, or about 12–56 mi.

[3052] Hundreds of kilometers means roughly 100–900 km, or about 62–560 mi.

SYSTEM

You have not completed a single mission.
The sudden Quest, The Darkness Over Paris, has failed.
Every event brings both reward and cost. You will receive penalties for failing the Quest.
EXP decreases drastically.
Fame decreases drastically.
The special Title Idle Bystander will apply for the next 30 days.
Due to the penalty effect of the special Title Idle Bystander, all stats decrease by 10%.

"…Ah."

A small sound escaped me.

Quest failure? A massive penalty?

None of that mattered.

Neither did the murmurs of the people who had belatedly noticed us, or the group making its way across the ruins.

Of all the holographic windows floating before me, my senses fixed on one line.

SYSTEM

You have not completed a single mission.

That was all.

The cold, rigid sentence bored through my eyes and into my mind. I already knew what it meant.

They're dead. All of them.

That was the reality before me.

Ares Guild's Paris branch no longer existed. Neither did the people who had begun their day peacefully nearby.

The skyscraper that had once reached the clouds had become a ruin blanketed in death, and the people who had been laughing and talking here only a few dozen minutes ago had crossed a river from which they could never return.

Like the unidentified body buried beneath the wreckage in front of me.

What was I thinking?

I stared down at it, then reached out and grabbed an arm. Only when I pulled did I realize the arm belonged to another body.

That wasn't the end.

When I dragged one body free, I found three more. When I pulled those out, severed limbs emerged beneath them.

“H-how…”

“Wicked human. This… this is truly…”

Team Leader Choi and the Skeleton King sounded impossibly far away. I looked around without a word.

The streets around the former branch had been devastated. Acrid smoke rose, carrying the smell of burning flesh. Bodies not yet recovered lay everywhere.

How many more lay beneath the rubble under my feet?

And why?

Why did they have to die?

My stomach burned as though I’d swallowed a ball of fire.

I clenched my teeth until they felt ready to break. Swallowing the blood from my split lips, I struggled to calm the three jiazi[3053] of Scorching Yang Qi raging in my dantian.

I could not get any more agitated. I had to remain calm and composed—more than ever.

Otherwise, I wouldn’t be able to face the owner of the immense energy approaching behind me in my right mind.

Michael Silbert.

With his name in my thoughts, I slowly turned around.

[3053] A jiazi is one sixty-year cycle in the traditional Chinese calendar; three jiazi equal 180 years.

Chapter 737

Michael Silbert.

Anyone living in the modern world knew his name.

He was the Guild Master of Odin Guild, called the greatest in the world, and an extraordinary figure even among the countless heroes born from the Great Cataclysm.

People loved Michael Silbert for risking his life to save them. I had admired him too.

No. I used to admire him.

Step.

Footsteps stopped behind me.

I turned slowly. A man stood amid the heat-soaked ash and ruins, gazing at me.

“So, it’s you.”

A few words broke the silence, but they were enough. We had recognized each other. Even without the photographs of him plastered across every kind of media, we would have known.

This is…

I could feel it: the immense power compressed inside that neither-large-nor-small body. It was more powerful than Lee Jungryong’s—or rather, more powerful than any S-rank Hunter I had ever faced.

And that was not all I realized.

“…So it was you?”

Michael Silbert.

The moment I met his gray eyes, I knew whose work the ruins beneath my feet were. I knew who had started this terrible disaster.

My question echoed his first words, but it meant something very different. Michael answered calmly.

“What a pointless question. If it wasn’t me, who else could it be?”

“What?”

“It’s an obvious and trite story anyway. There’s no point in asking or answering anything more.”

What was this?

What the hell was this bastard talking about?

For a moment, I forgot my anger and stood frozen. Michael blinked at me, looking genuinely puzzled.

“I don’t understand why you look so surprised. We already understand each other’s intentions, and now that negotiations have broken down, this is merely the inevitable next step.”

"You son of a—"

"Didn't I warn you through Huginn? Refuse my proposal, and there would be a price to pay."

He cut me off as though none of this mattered. Then Michael Silbert—the hero of the Great Cataclysm, beloved the world over—reached out and caught a handful of ash drifting through the air.

"I hear you've been rather busy these past few weeks. Were you wandering that vast desert looking for an oasis?"

"…!"

"A word of advice. There's no such thing as a perfect secret. Not even at the Pentagon."

He opened his fist. Ash mixed with monster blood lay in his palm, calling up a sight I had witnessed countless times a few weeks ago.

Fanatics dying in droves all around me. Their screams. Grains of desert sand made sticky with blood flowing like a river…

Through those memories, his low voice reached me.

"If you wanted a peaceful, better world, you should have uprooted them completely from the start."

"…You don't mean—"

"Considering they were deranged fanatics, it was a perfectly reasonable deal. I wanted a price paid for ignoring my warning. They wanted weapons for revenge."

Now I understood.

The real cause of this sudden Monster Wave. Why the madman in front of me could admit to it so openly.

Borrow another's knife to kill.

The instant it all fell into place—

Fwoosh.

My vision burned hot. Three jiazi[3054] of Scorching Yang Qi surged from my dantian, transformed into lava, and flowed through my limbs and bones.

I was ready. From the moment I had first faced him, my mind had been searching without pause for the best way to move.

One step.

That was all it would take. The instant I planted my foot, the distance between us would vanish. Then I could shut that bullshit-spouting mouth with my Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

No. I had to.

For the innocent people killed by another human being, not a monster. And to remove the cause of an even greater disaster before it struck.

[3054] A jiazi is a traditional sixty-year cycle; three jiazi are 180 years.

But—

Grab.

Two hands seized my shoulders, and a familiar voice struck my ears.

“Mr. Jin Taekyung!”

“People are watching. Not now.”

Team Leader Choi and the Skeleton King.

They had to be holding back their own anger. As I thought of them, the fury boiling inside me began to settle.

I knew they were right. Attacking the bastard in front of me would be easy. Dealing with what came afterward would be difficult, even for me.

I have no evidence. Nothing that would convince the public I’m justified.

To the rest of the world, Michael Silbert was a hero of the Great Cataclysm who had defeated a terrorist bent on revenge. Whether or not I could kill him, attacking him here would get me branded a public enemy—even if this were Murim rather than the modern world.

And that was probably…

Exactly what he wants.

Cheon Taemin, the beginning and end of Ares Guild, had been unconscious for some time. What would happen if I fell now?

Even if I killed him here, I couldn’t take responsibility for what followed.

Our greatest enemy stood before me, but there were others who had yet to show themselves.

By the time I reached that thought, both my head and my heart had gone cold.

Hssss.

The aura I had built up, ready to burst, subsided. Michael Silbert sighed softly.

“What a shame. You looked much better when you were full of youthful fire.”

“Shut up before I tear your mouth apart.”

“If it were that easy to tear my mouth apart, someone would have done it hundreds of times by now. But do you know something?”

A faint smile touched his lips.

“One day, I noticed that everyone who had said something like that to me had vanished without a trace. I know a more certain way of dealing with them than tearing their mouths apart.”

“…!”

“So be grateful you have good friends today. You’re lucky they’re so capable, too. Wouldn’t you agree?”

He was speaking to me, but he was looking past my shoulder.

That strange look brought my dulled sense of danger snapping back.

The Skeleton King.

Magic Johnson had given him a clean new identity, and he was working as a Hunter with Peace Guild. Even so, it would be a problem if he drew the wrong kind of attention.

Michael Silbert was that difficult an opponent. The moment a weakness appeared, he would pounce without mercy and tear into it.

Should I have left him behind?

The thought had barely crossed my mind when Michael's attention shifted.

"So you're the young Vice Guild Master of Ares Guild I've heard about. How is your maternal grandfather?"

Team Leader Choi answered in an icy voice.

"He's well. I can't say how he'll react when I tell him what happened to the Paris branch."

"I regret how things turned out myself. I have great respect for your grandfather. I hope you'll put in a good word for me."

"I certainly intend to tell him exactly what I saw and heard."

There was not a trace of hesitation in his answer. Michael Silbert was gazing at Team Leader Choi when—

Whoosh! Whoosh!

A group raced across the ruins, cutting through the air. At their head was Huginn, the messenger who had visited Ares Guild not long ago.

He spared us a glance, then hurried to Michael and bowed.

"Guild Master, everything is ready."

"The casualty count first."

"Approximately three hundred. We've rescued forty-five survivors."

"That's enough for now. Have people gathered?"

"Not only the nearby citizens. Every reporter in Paris is waiting for you."

"Faster than I expected."

"We were fortunate. The foreign press was already on alert because of the release of the new Mana Cultivation Method."

"And the CCTV footage?"

"We secured it immediately. It captured everything from beginning to end: the terrorist carrying out a suicide attack with bombs and unrefined Magic Gems, and Odin Guild suppressing the Monster Wave."

At first, I hadn't understood what Huginn meant by ready. As I listened, my mind went cold.

This is…

Meticulous.

The unveiling of a new Mana Cultivation Method. The attack on the Paris branch and the Monster Wave, carried out by a Middle Eastern terrorist seeking revenge. Now a press conference with the world's attention on it.

Dozens of gears, large and small, meshing without a fraction of an inch out of place. Every part of their plan was moving as intended.

That was why they could discuss it openly in front of us. They knew we had no way to stop the gears once they were turning.

Even if we shouted the truth for three days and three nights in front of the countless cameras camped out in the distance, no one would believe us anyway.

The worst part was that those madmen were right. Force alone could not change that reality.

"I'm sorry, but I must be going. A great many people are waiting for me."

Michael Silbert acknowledged me, Team Leader Choi, and finally the Skeleton King with a glance before slowly turning away.

Then he stopped and added, "You'll be busy from now on. Far busier than you expect."

Grind.

I watched him walk away, clenching my fist with all my strength. But I could not bring myself to strike.

Not long afterward, I understood what he meant.

Ding.

SYSTEM

A sudden Quest, Chain of Terror Attacks, has been generated!
You cannot choose whether to accept this Quest. The System will force it to proceed!

It was January. The joy of the New Year had not yet faded.

Winter turned red.

"It has begun."

At Huginn's low voice beside his ear, Michael Silbert calmly asked:

"Where this time?"

"London."

"The old king will be furious."

"Buckingham Palace should be fine. London Bridge will collapse instead."

Michael gave a soft laugh at his subordinate's dry joke.

“Once London is done… eight to go.”

“Yes.”

Huginn had brought ten people back from the desert. Every one of them was a deranged fanatic and a seasoned Hunter. They would carry out their missions without a hitch.

Their bombs would bring down buildings. Their unrefined Magic Gems would be enough to shatter people’s hopes.

And our Odin Guild will piece that shattered hope back together.

Everything was ready.

He had reached this position through countless sacrifices and effort.

He could tolerate neither a single mistake nor failure.

As the reporters drew closer and the citizens’ cheers reached him, Michael hid his smile behind a grief-stricken expression.

Chapter 738

There was a strange magic in the words New Year.

The excitement of beginning another year. The vague hope that things would be better than they had been the year before.

But one day in January, before people had even turned the first page of their new calendars, that excitement and hope collapsed in an instant.

“Breaking news. Just one hour after our report from Paris, a second Monster Wave has struck London, United Kingdom. Central London is in chaos, and King Philip II of the United Kingdom has…”

“More breaking news! Another Monster Wave has struck Mumbai, India! This is the third Monster Wave in a single day, something unprecedented since the Great Cataclysm…”

“Oh my God. Can you see this? Rio de Janeiro’s landmark, Christ the Redeemer—Cristo Redentor—is falling!”

It was the beginning of a catastrophe.

First, France’s Luxembourg Gardens were stained with blood. Then London Bridge, which had stood through a long and storied history, collapsed. And Brazil’s colossal statue of Jesus, weighing over six hundred tons[3055], toppled over, crushing buildings and people beneath it.

Rumble, rumble, rumble!

The ground shook with a deafening roar.

Beyond the flames that surged up from the explosion, those who could barely keep their feet heard something growl.

—Grrr…

Monster Waves.

The name had become synonymous with disaster. Legions of monsters tore through space and swept in every direction like a wave.

—Kraaaargh!

“M-Monsters!”

“Get away!”

“Aaaah!”

Screams filled the forest of skyscrapers that civilization had raised.

Some people fled. Some were seized by monsters, torn apart, and killed. Others raised shining weapons and fought against creatures that did not belong to this world.

“Formation! Don’t retreat!”

[3055]The source uses metric tons. Six hundred metric tons is 600,000 kg, or about 1.32 million lb (about 661 US tons).

“Ranged units, fire!”

Boom! Boom! KABOOM!

Humans and monsters. Monsters and humans.

The two species, incapable of coexisting from the start, charged at one another. The flames that had begun in Paris spread across the world.

[Red Square in Moscow stained with blood by monsters]

[Disaster strikes China once again—the Forbidden City engulfed in flames]

[Five Monster Waves in a single day. Upon hearing the news, Pope Urban VIII says, “O God.”]

[The sixth Monster Wave strikes New York. Wall Street in shock.]

[Tokyo Tower seized by flying monsters. Crashed Air Self-Defense Force aircraft cause secondary damage.]

[Odin Guild Master Michael Silbert, who swiftly suppressed the first Monster Wave, releases CCTV footage obtained in Paris: “This is not merely a disaster. It is clearly a terrorist attack with a purpose.”]

Major cities home to millions—some to more than ten million—were thrown into chaos.

People watched one shocking report after another on their televisions and smartphones, too stunned to speak.

Disaster.

It was the only word for what was happening.

At the same time, the fear spreading like a plague paralyzed people’s reason.

“Hello? You saw the news, right? I’m coming to pick you up from school right now, so…”

“Hey, what are you doing?”

“Can’t you see? Packing my things.”

“What are you talking about? You’ve still got hours before you can leave work.”

“Fuck, does that matter right now? I’m going to make sure my family’s safe.”

“Hey, hey! Manager Kim!”

No one could predict a Monster Wave any more than they could predict a natural disaster. People dropped what they were doing and moved as if in a daze.

Toward the homes where their families waited. Or toward emergency shelters where they might have a slightly better chance of surviving.

Offices emptied, most work and road traffic ground to a halt, and people crowding onto the subways could not put down their phones.

What weighed them down now was an extreme fear and anxiety they could not see.

A Monster Wave might strike right where they stood. They—or someone they loved—might die because of it.

Wheeeeeeeen.

"Temporary state of emergency. This is a temporary state of emergency. Residents living nearby are advised to prepare for any eventuality and proceed to an emergency shelter…"

Countries around the world declared states of emergency at the same time.

Sirens sounded without pause in the streets. Soldiers armed with heavy weapons and Hunters called up on short notice waited tensely for instructions from their governments.

They waited until the sun—or the moon—disappeared from the sky above them, according to each country's time zone.

At last, their governments made another announcement.

"The temporary state of emergency has been lifted."

Only twenty-four hours had passed since the first Monster Wave struck Paris. The disaster that had seemed as if it might last until the end of the world finally ended in Cairo, Egypt.

It left behind a horrifying, unprecedented record: ten Monster Waves in a single day.

Then the hero who had successfully stopped five of them stepped before countless cameras.

"Odin Guild will continue to do its duty as your sword and shield."

Michael Silbert.

As people watched him shed hot tears while mourning the souls of the fallen, they cried along with him.

They cheered for the hero who had saved so many lives, and for Odin Guild.

No—not everyone.

Bang!

More than a dozen holographic televisions crumbled to dust with a deafening crash.

I stared at the empty air where a man's face had appeared only moments ago. Then I suddenly opened my mouth.

"Should I apologize?"

Team Leader Choi shook his head from the nearby sofa.

"It's fine. If you hadn't stepped in, I would have smashed them myself."

He wasn't exaggerating or being polite.

I looked at his clenched fist, white with the force of his grip. Drops of blood fell from it, along with the green monster blood he had not yet wiped away.

Drip. Drip.

The white wool carpet was gradually becoming stained red and green, but no one in the room cared.

Everything around me felt cold and empty.

They got us. Completely.

Ten.

Ten Monster Waves, and we hadn't stopped a single one. No—perhaps it was more accurate to say we couldn't have stopped them.

They planned it that way from the start.

It was impossible to stop Monster Waves in major cities thousands, even tens of thousands, of kilometers[3056] apart.

Even if Magic Johnson had been with us, it would have made no difference.

The Monster Waves that occurred today had been planned terrorist attacks from beginning to end—bombs detonating without regard for either time or place.

By the time we heard the news and arrived, all that awaited us were more ruins and more bodies.

There was one slight difference between the Monster Wave in Paris and those that followed: where they struck.

They weren't targeting Ares Guild's overseas branches.

The terrorists working with Michael Silbert had gone to all kinds of places. Tourist attractions packed with crowds. The headquarters of major corporations everyone knew by name.

But more often than anything else, they had targeted branches of major Guilds like Ares.

"Why?"

Team Leader Choi looked up at my abrupt question. I added one word.

"The targets."

That was explanation enough. Team Leader Choi stared into empty space with hollow eyes, then suddenly opened his mouth.

"Isolation."

"Isolation?"

"Yes. Isolating Ares Guild. That must be what Michael Silbert wants."

"But why do it like the Paris branch…?"

I stopped.

Thoughts raced through my tangled mind. Somewhere among them was an answer I had missed.

The Middle Eastern terrorist group.

The men working with Michael Silbert had not finished their mission.

[3056] 1,000 km is about 621 mi; 10,000 km is about 6,214 mi.

The final strike that would bring this horrific day to a close—the keen, ice-cold blade that would isolate Ares Guild from the entire world—was rushing toward us.

Perhaps even now.

Step. Step.

Footsteps echoed unusually loudly through the darkness.

Perhaps it was because there were several dozen people. Perhaps it was because they were crossing a dark cave. One thing, at least, was certain.

No one knew this place existed, and no one could find their way here.

Step.

The footsteps, which had seemed as though they would go on forever, stopped together.

Something stirred in the pitch-black darkness.

“Inshallah.”

The word sounded as though it had been whispered into their ears. Several dozen people dropped to their knees and prostrated themselves.

Then they opened their mouths and answered in unison.

“Inshallah.”

God willing.

It was an invocation that bound them together and a prayer that reminded them of God’s greatness. The figure stirring beyond the darkness finally emerged.

Swish.

A long robe brushed the ground. The people bowed their heads lower and murmured as one.

“This lowly servant of Allah humbly greets the great Prophet.”

The Prophet.

To them, even the title of a being whose face they dared not look upon was sacred and untouchable.

“Raise your heads.”

The voice gave no hint of age or gender. The people trembled.

Then they pressed their faces to the ground and answered.

“How could these lowly servants dare look upon the great Prophet?”

“Please withdraw your command.”

Whoosh.

A gust of wind came from somewhere and enveloped them.

Then the Prophet’s voice, mingled with the wind, reached their ears.

“What became of them?”

Everyone knew whom the Prophet meant.

The old man prostrated at the very front opened his mouth.

“They completed the missions entrusted to them and returned to God’s embrace.”

The Prophet gave a slight nod.

“Inshallah. As was only right.”

“Inshallah.”

Ten warriors had crossed the desert and scattered across the five oceans and six continents. As warriors of God, they had completed their missions and returned to the embrace of God.

Now it was time to claim the blood price.

The Prophet spoke in a mysterious voice.

“Let the whole world know what brought about all this disaster.”

Chapter 739

Ten Monster Waves in a single day were enough to plunge the world into shock and terror.

Worse, they had struck capitals and major cities whose names were known around the world. Several major Guilds, led by Odin Guild, had swiftly suppressed the Monster Waves, but the damage was immense. The confirmed death toll alone had reached several thousand.

People kept their senses on high alert in their homes or emergency shelters, and Michael Silbert did not miss the opportunity to seize the attention of the entire world.

“This is footage Odin Guild obtained during the first Monster Wave in Paris.”

When the CCTV footage was released, it sent another shock through the world.

> Odin Guild Master Michael Silbert: “Before it became a Monster Wave, this was a meticulously planned terrorist attack.”

> Not a natural disaster, but a man-made one

> A calamity born of malice

> Ten killers armed with bombs and Magic Gems. Who are the suicide terrorists in the released CCTV footage?

> Experts analyzing the CCTV footage: “Each carried several unrefined A-grade Magic Gems and targeted areas near Gates with high concentrations of magical power.”

> The world shudders at a horrifying déjà vu: “Remember what happened in South Korea.”

> Bringing in bombs and unrefined A-grade Magic Gems: a clear violation of international law

> Bombs and Magic Gems traced to Africa and the Middle East

News reports poured in from every direction.

Once it became clear that the Monster Waves had not been unstoppable natural disasters but tragedies caused by terrorism, people were consumed by anger and emptiness, and the internet reached saturation point.

> ㄴ I’ve got no words. These people are seriously insane. ㄴ Are they out of their fucking minds?

> ㄴ The truth must be brought to light. Every last one of them must be hanged.

> ㄴ I saw a foreign article mentioning South Korea. Is that about the Go Jun incident a little while ago? ㄴ Yeah. And now the people who hate Korea are foaming at the mouth, saying Korea’s the root of all evil. ㄴ What the fuck? They wouldn’t even be alive if it weren’t for Cheon Taemin. ㄴ What countries are these people from? ㄴ Jjajang. Wasabi.[3057] ㄴ Oh. ㄴ Japan’s always been like that, but what’s with those Chinese bastards? Have they already forgotten Lord Fuck helped them? ㄴ “China.” ㄴ That one word says it all. ㄴ To be fair, maybe because he helped them before, it’s nowhere near as bad in China as it is in Japan. Some people are even tracing the IQs of commenters insulting Lord Fuck so they can teach them a lesson. ㄴ My IQ’s 110. Can they track my location from that? ㄴ I’ve seen people bashing Korea on foreign forums too. Cheon Taemin and Jin Taekyung worked hard to raise Korea’s standing, and that bastard Go Jun[3058] went and ruined it all. ㄴ Jin Taekyung raised Korea’s standing? You sure? Funny, I haven’t seen him once today wwwwwww. ㄴ Haven’t seen your Air Self-Defense Force since a Wyvern beat the shit out of it, either. I did get a good look at Tokyo Tower collapsing, though. ㄴ Welcome, wasabi. ㄴ Does Lord Fuck have ten bodies, you Japanese bastard? Watch some TV. Taekyung ran himself ragged today. He was a step late, but seeing him try to save even one person somehow really moved me. ㄴ So criticizing Korea automatically makes someone Japanese now, lol? Unfortunately, I’m Korean. ㄴ If you want to keep pretending you’re Korean, take the W key off your keyboard.

> ㄴ There was no point paying attention to trolls. The most important thing now was finding out who the terrorists belonged to and why they had committed such acts. ㄴ The terrorists are all from the Arab world, so it’s [3057] Jjajang and wasabi are food-based shorthand used here to refer disparagingly to Chinese and Japanese people.

[3058] The character □, inserted into the Korean spelling of the name, means “the late.”

> obvious. It has to be either Al-Qaeda or IS. ㄴIf it's so obvious, why haven't the countries that were hit issued a joint statement or an official announcement? They need to verify it first. Al-Qaeda and IS have both taken serious losses lately. ㄴI agree with the comment above. A few weeks ago, their main bases were completely wrecked and their leader was killed and replaced.

Everyone knew about the bloodbath that had swept through the Middle East and Africa.

A mysterious group of vigilantes had appeared. No one knew their faces, their names, or even their genders. They had beheaded the leaders of the terrorist and rebel groups. With their leadership gone in an instant, the two factions had torn themselves apart in fierce internal struggles, suffered enormous losses, and finally raised the white flag.

> ㄴDoesn't that make it even more obvious? They may have been weakened, but if they lost their leader, they could easily have carried out terrorist attacks around the world in the name of revenge. ㄴThere are probably a lot of elementary school kids here who don't know this, but when the United States got seriously pissed off during the 9/11 attacks, Hussein got scared and denied that it was them. A little while ago, they practically surrendered and begged people to stop, saying they wouldn't commit any more terrorist attacks. But this terrorist attack involved ten countries, including the United States. Do you really think that makes sense? ㄴNo matter how crazy they are, that's impossible. Besides, I heard the current leaders of the Middle Eastern terrorist groups belong to the moderate faction. ㄴWhat the hell is going on?

Korean netizens were hardly the only ones asking. News sites and online communities around the world lit up with arguments.

Before long, the answer was broadcast worldwide in a video.

"I declare in the name of the Prophet."

In the dim light stood an unidentified figure with a robe pulled low over their face.

In the grainy footage, the figure called themself the Prophet and pointed to the two heads placed in front of them before continuing.

"I will wipe from this sacred land the apostates who abandoned their convictions for their own safety. I will bring rightful vengeance and justice to the world."

It was not hard to recognize whose heads they were. They had led the world's most dangerous terrorist organizations, and only recently had announced a humiliating surrender.

IS. And Al-Qaeda.

Before the horribly beheaded former leaders, the Prophet slowly parted their lips.

“As long as God is with us, we will not stop. Beginning today, we will judge and punish you.”

“…!”

“…!”

The people watching the video caught their breath without realizing it.

Judgment? Today’s horrific tragedy was only the beginning?

Yet even those staring at the screen in disbelief understood it instinctively. The unidentified figure calling themself the Prophet was not making an empty threat. They could set off a bomb anywhere in the world right now and bring about another disaster.

Then the Prophet’s final words reached the stunned audience.

“Inshallah.[3059] Know that all of this began with you.”

Crackle.

The short video ended in a burst of harsh static.

No—just when everyone thought it had ended, another screen began transmitting.

It was a dark night, with even the moonlight faint.

A lone figure standing in a desert filled with blood and corpses suddenly raised their head. The face glimpsed through the mask resembled someone everyone knew.

The Skeleton King crossed an empty corridor.

He held a silver tray in one hand, his eyes fixed on the smartphone in the other.

> Seven Days Stained with Blood

> Monster Wave in Madrid, Spain. Another Terrorist Attack?

> The Prophet: Notorious Terrorist Vanishes Like a Ghost

> Video Analysis Finds a 99.99% Match: Young Hero’s Other Identity

[3059] Inshallah is Arabic for “if God wills it.”

> Joguk Ilbo Chief Editorial Writer Lee Kanghee: “A Tragedy Born of Pointless Heroism”

> Public Opinion Divided: A Criminal Drunk on Heroism, or a Vigilante in the Shadows?

“…Damn humans.”

The Skeleton King muttered the curse before he knew it.

Even a brief glance showed him what a mess the online news had become. The front page was filled with nothing but openly condemnatory articles and sensational headlines, while fierce battles between netizens raged beneath them.

> ㄴLol, look at the level of these garbage reporters’ headlines. ㄴSeriously. They’re desperate for clicks. Nothing in the articles, either—just bits and pieces stitched together. ㄴBut if you only look at the headline, it isn’t entirely wrong, is it? ㄴHonestly, I like Lord Fuck too, but I think he acted too hastily this time.

> ㄴThis deserves criticism. There’s nothing he can say for himself. ㄴWhat do you mean? A few weeks ago, when he wrecked Al-Qaeda and the others, you were all cheering. You didn’t know who did it, but you said it felt great to see those bastards wiped out. ㄴThat doesn’t mean it was right. ㄴIt was fine then but not now? You’re fucking nuts, lol. ㄴThe situation has changed. Seriously, how many people are dead now? Nationalist hype and personal fandom are all well and good, but look at how serious the situation has become because of what Jin Taekyung did.

> ㄴI knew that bastard Jin Taekyung would cause trouble. I couldn’t stand watching him get full of himself when everyone started calling him a young hero and the next Cheon Taemin. ㄴWhat a load of shit. When was he ever full of himself? Even when the media was hyping him up, hyung[3060] was still walking around in a tracksuit.

> ㄴI’m trying to stay neutral here, but honestly, it’s just sad. Do you really think Jin Taekyung did it because he’s some bloodthirsty killer? ㄴThen why did he do it? ㄴLook at the timing. It was right before the Mana Cultivation Method was released. Seriously, do you think there are only one or two [3060] Hyung is a Korean term used by a male speaker for an older brother or an older male acquaintance.

> Awakened among the Middle Eastern terrorists and African rebel groups? Who was supposed to deal with them if they learned the Mana Cultivation Method and started committing every kind of crime, including terrorism? ㄴ That still doesn't justify murder. ㄴ You're right. But let's be clear: everyone justified it back then. Now one unbelievably insane bastard has shown up, and everyone's changed their tune at the speed of light. ㄴ People at home and abroad were all praising the vigilantes at the time. "Whoever they are, great job. Let's not ask too many questions." That was the mood. Now it's flipped.

> ㄴ Lot of Jin Taekyung fanboys here, lol. He's still being condemned worldwide. ㄴ Polls show more people support Lord Fuck. It only looks otherwise because the news sites keep churning out sensational headlines.

> ㄴ What I don't get is Cheon Taemin. Even now, he hasn't shown his face once. Jin Taekyung's been missing for days too. ㄴ He caused trouble and is pretending it has nothing to do with him. Seriously disgusting, lol. Just look at Odin Guild. King-God Michael is the past and the future.

Reading the comments, the Skeleton King found himself wondering:

What faces would those humans make if they knew the truth?

But he knew the thought was futile.

At least for now, there was no way to reveal the truth. On the contrary, they might be completely sunk by the backlash.

Human society, as he had come to know it, was far more complicated—and far more frustrating—than he had expected.

Stupid humans.

The Skeleton King shook his head and stopped before a massive door.

When he discovered that the silver tray he had brought yesterday was still sitting there, he let out a deep sigh and carefully pulled on the doorknob.

Click.

As the door slowly opened, he saw someone sitting cross-legged with their back to him.

Chapter 740

Circulating qi did more than increase internal energy.

It cleared away the waste that naturally built up in the body and calmed the mind. And in a state of such deep concentration, all five senses were heightened to their limits.

What's that…?

Step. Step.

Someone's footsteps sounded like thunder.

Before long, I realized who the uninvited guest pacing outside the door was and brought my internal energy under control.

Chime.

The System notification announcing the end of my qi circulation had barely sounded when the doorknob turned behind me.

Click.

A rich scent drifted through the gap as the door eased open. I let out a long breath, bringing everything to a close, and spoke.

"I thought I told everyone to stay out until I came out on my own… Is it because you're a monster that you can't understand human speech? Or do you just not want to?"

The uninvited guest hesitated, then cleared his throat. It was the Skeleton King.

"Ahem. How did you know it was this body?"

"Your presence."

"My presence?"

"Yeah. You don't breathe. Probably because you're already dead."

"…That makes a strange amount of sense, but I don't like it."

"I'm not trying to make you happy."

I pulled on the tracksuit I had tossed aside nearby and turned around. The Skeleton King stood there like a butler, holding a gleaming silver tray.

"So why are you here?"

Normally, he would have been sulking by now, his lips sticking out a good five feet.

But today was different. He kept stealing glances at me as he lowered the tray to the floor.

"Eat. This body brought it here personally for you."

"I told you not to bring me food."

"But you haven't eaten in over three days."

Over three days?

I looked around. The room was sealed on all sides, without so much as a window. I had come in without my smartphone, and whether it was that or the fact that I'd had no mind to care, I'd lost track of time.

Has it been that long already?

Humans were strange. The moment I realized how many days had passed, hunger caught up with me.

But…

Did I even have the right to feel hungry?

Thousands had died. Tens of thousands had been injured. I didn't know what kind of lives they'd led, but most of them must have done nothing wrong.

Those people had suffered because of what I'd done. They'd died, been hurt, lost family and friends they loved.

People who had hailed me as a hero only a short while ago had begun turning against me, one by one. Their condemnation had reached the people around me, too.

All because they were close to me.

What went wrong? Where did it start?

I'd shut myself in this room to answer the question that wouldn't leave my mind. I'd spent each day without food or sleep, circulating qi and turning it over in my thoughts.

At last, I'd found an answer.

Not one that would put everything right. Just an insight that let me forget for a little while.

"Smells good."

"Huh?"

"Not you. The food."

The Skeleton King seemed to buffer for a moment before answering.

"Uh, yeah. It's doenjang jjigae[3061] and braised short ribs."

I could tell who had made it just from the smell. Picturing my mother anxiously preparing meals for me these past few days, I lifted the lid from the tray.

Click.

I stared blankly at the food as steam rose from it. Then I scooped up a spoonful of doenjang jjigae[3062], something I had not seen in a long time.

The moment I put it in my mouth, I spat it right back out.

Ptooey.

"Wh—what? Why?"

What the hell was this?

[3061] Doenjang jjigae is a Korean stew made with fermented soybean paste.

[3062] Doenjang jjigae is a Korean stew made with fermented soybean paste.

I looked back and forth between the flustered Skeleton King and the doenjang jjigae[3063] before opening my mouth hesitantly.

“Who made this?”

“Your younger sister.”

“…Ah. Right.”

“Is something wrong?”

Was something wrong? Yes. Seriously wrong.

But instead of answering, I let out a quiet laugh. I didn’t know why. I just did.

“I’ll eat before I go.”

“What?”

“I said I’ll eat this, then go. I need a shower, too.”

The Skeleton King blinked at me for a while, as if he hadn’t understood. Then he nodded hurriedly.

“Oh? Oh, all right. Then this body will…”

“Yeah. See you later.”

He eased the door shut and slipped away like a thief. Another inexplicable laugh escaped me.

I set down my spoon, picked up a piece of braised short rib, and took a big bite.

Thankfully, my mother had made the ribs.

“There were vicious dogs going around biting people, so I beat them senseless. Now two mad dogs have shown up.”

Those were my first words to Team Leader Choi in days. His lips moved as though he had been about to say something, but he nodded instead.

“That’s right. And those two mad dogs bit even more people.”

“Do you think it’s my fault too, Team Leader Choi?”

“Mad dogs are mad dogs. The timing and the excuse may change, but they would have bared their teeth at people sooner or later.”

“But I’m the one who gave them the opportunity.”

“If you insist on blaming yourself, say we. You didn’t do it alone.”

“That’s right. This body also achieved a great feat in the desert.”

At the Skeleton King’s sudden interruption, Team Leader Choi shrugged.

“So he says.”

“I’m not blaming myself. I just think I need to be clear about that much.”

Every incident had a cause and an effect. With so many people dead or injured, I couldn’t pretend I had no part in the cause.

[3063] Doenjang jjigae is a Korean stew made with fermented soybean paste.

I had no intention of trying.

“I understand why people condemn me. And I’m grateful to the ones who support me.”

“Is that all?”

“No. The most important part is still left.”

I went on calmly.

“No matter what the world says, I’m going to catch those mad dogs.”

The Skeleton King’s eyes gleamed. A faint smile appeared on Team Leader Choi’s face.

“You found your own answer.”

“It’s not a complete answer. But it’s enough of a reason to keep going, isn’t it?”

“It is. Then I can give you a few pieces of news with a lighter heart.”

“A few pieces of news…?”

“I’d been gathering information on Michael Silbert and Odin Guild since before this happened. I received the results recently.”

Team Leader Choi had been watching the other major Guilds since before the Mana Cultivation Method was released. Given how thorough he was, of course he had.

“What did you find? Good news, I hope.”

“Unfortunately, some of it is bad. Which would you like first?”

“How much worse could things get? Give me the bad news.”

Team Leader Choi gave a short laugh and took a thick stack of documents from a drawer.

“I did my best to organize it, but there’s still an enormous amount.”

“What’s this?”

“Information on Odin Guild’s assets and businesses. Much of it isn’t publicly known.”

“They’re held under other names?”

“Yes. On paper, they have no connection to Odin Guild. In practice, they’re run much like its subsidiaries. Other major Guilds and corporations do the same thing, but Odin’s scale is in another league.”

I knew next to nothing about this sort of thing, but the thickness of the stack told me plenty. I skimmed pages full of words and sentences I could barely understand, searching for a comparison.

“Bigger than Ares Guild?”

“You would have to combine Ares Guild and Peace Guild, then add three or four major Guilds on top of that.”

“Holy shit.”

"Count just the Gates Odin Guild controls this way, and there are more than two hundred worldwide. They hold permanent leases, so they effectively own them. Those Gates produce an enormous quantity of Magic Gems."

Even if a considerable number of those holdings were controlled through unofficial channels, having control of around two hundred Gates put Odin Guild on the level of a small country.

No. Given the strength of its Hunters, it might be more powerful than one.

I wish he were just a mad dog.

Michael Silbert wasn't merely a mad dog. He was a Tosa mastiff among fighting dogs, and he was clever to boot.

But he was also a bastard I absolutely had to beat to death.

That thought brought another to mind.

"Then is it possible that the Magic Gems from those Gates were used in this terrorist attack without being refined?"

"No. At least, not according to the documents."

"According to the documents?"

"As you know, Michael Silbert is an extremely thorough person. He had no reason to take the risk of smuggling Magic Gems, and even if he had, he would not have left any gaps in the records. The Magic Gems used in the terrorist attacks most likely came out of the Middle East or Africa."

That made sense.

The Middle East and Africa had been hotbeds of terrorism and civil war since before the Great Cataclysm. Even now, there were people somewhere in those regions fighting bloody battles.

No one knew exactly how many Magic Gems came out of Gates held by terrorists and rebels, or how many of those Gems remained unrefined.

Besides, Michael Silbert wasn't alone. He had a reliable accomplice who was every bit as much a mad dog.

"The Prophet."

At the name that slipped from my mouth, Team Leader Choi nodded with a grim expression.

"I searched thoroughly for information on the Prophet as well."

"What kind of bastard is the Prophet?"

I genuinely wanted to know who this madman was—the one who had beheaded the leaders of two major terrorist organizations, united their scattered followers, and shaken the world.

Team Leader Choi's answer was nothing like what I'd hoped to hear.

"We don't know."

"You don't know?"

“No. Even allowing for the circumstances, there’s no information about the Prophet at all. He vanished completely after that declaration.”

“Wait. Even the United States doesn’t know?”

“Not just the United States. Even with the entire world searching, the situation is still the same.”

I blinked and thought.

How is that possible?

The madman calling himself the Prophet had thrown the United States and the rest of the world into turmoil. How could he vanish right under everyone’s noses?

“You’re not hiding what you know to protect classified information, are you?”

“I spoke with Chuck Hagel recently. He swore to God he didn’t know where the Prophet was.”

Chuck Hagel had been with us in the desert. He was also the United States Secretary of Defense, not just an S-rank Hunter.

Unless he was lying, if even the Secretary of Defense did not know, then the Prophet really must have shot straight up into the sky.

Who the hell is he?

I frowned. Team Leader Choi went on.

“And there’s one more thing. Mr. Johnson contacted us. He said he had found someone among the other Grand Mages who was likely to have been in contact with Michael Silbert. He said we would probably be able to learn more vital information through that person.”

This, at least, was good news.

I hadn’t heard the Grand Mage’s name yet, but he must know something about Michael Silbert’s true nature. He had personally created Ares Guild’s Area A and knew about Cheon Taemin’s condition.

One of only three Grand Mages in the world. He would give us a new lead.

Or so I thought.

Then, not long afterward, Team Leader Choi’s phone rang. I heard Magic Johnson’s voice.

“Damn it. He’s dead.”

Chapter 741

“Damn it. He’s dead.”

I’d hoped I was wrong.

But the unease I’d felt at those few words over the phone had been right on the mark.

“Sorry, but you need to come right away. We have to find as many clues as we can before this case slips out of our hands…”

“Where are you?”

There was no time to hesitate.

We headed for the coordinates Magic Johnson had given us as fast as we could. After several long-distance Teleports in succession, we arrived on a mountain blanketed in white.

Crunch.

The snow that had lain there for ages crumbled beneath my feet.

The breathtaking scenery of the Alps, something I had only ever seen on the internet, unfolded before my eyes. But I had no time to admire the view.

And neither did—

“Intruders spotted!”

—the group guarding the area nearby.

“Stop! Stop!”

“Shooters, ready!”

Chk-chk-chk!

At the urgent shouts, gun barrels and blades were pointed at us.

The soldiers and Hunters were heavily armed. I stopped, and a familiar voice came from among them.

“If you insist on attacking, I won’t stop you. But it would be in your best interest to check the intruders’ faces first.”

“One more step and we shoot… Mr. Johnson?”

“Don’t act rashly, Colonel. They’re my guests.”

A huge Black man walked past the middle-aged commander in a beret and stopped before us.

Fatigue and sorrow weighed on his face.

Magic Johnson, whom I had not seen for several weeks—no, several months—gave us a faint smile and greeted us.

“Long time no see, friends. How have you been?”

I smacked my lips bitterly and firmly grasped the hand he held out.

“Not well at all.”

“Who are the people outside? It looked like an even split between soldiers and Hunters.”

“Swiss Federal Police. This area’s under their jurisdiction, and I didn’t want to become a murder suspect just because I found the body first. Come on.”

Team Leader Choi, the Skeleton King, and I followed Magic Johnson.

We passed between the soldiers and Hunters watching us with equal parts wariness and curiosity, then entered a forest deep in snow. A faint sense of déjà vu stirred.

This is…

I closed my eyes and focused. As I slowly reached out, I felt an invisible ripple through the fierce snowstorm.

“Mana?”

Magic Johnson nodded.

“A barrier. Concealed well enough that even most S-rank Hunters wouldn’t notice it, and just as flawless as it is discreet.”

He wasn’t exaggerating.

Even the Skeleton King had barely noticed the barrier until Johnson pointed it out.

“Impressive work for a human. But not enough to fool this body’s keen gaze. After all, I am no ordinary S-rank Hunter. I am an exceptionally gifted—”

“Monster.”

“…”

The Skeleton King fell silent, crestfallen.

Having shut him up with one word, I studied the barrier and recalled something from not long ago.

It’s similar.

Just as a particular martial art left behind a specific trace, magic worked the same way.

The flow of mana was as distinctive as a fingerprint. I was sure of it.

No doubt about it. It feels like Area A.

Magic Johnson met my eyes, as if he’d read my mind.

“I’d been looking for people connected to Area A at your request, even before all this happened. But of everyone I know, only one person came to mind.”

I now knew who the Grand Mage who designed Area A was. I also knew he’d announced his retirement more than a decade ago and disappeared from public view.

“I didn’t expect him to be staying in a place like this. But had you been in contact with that person separately?”

“Not at all. He was quite eccentric and reclusive.”

“But we were friends. We were close enough that he could at least give me a hint about the hideout where he planned to stay someday.”

Whoosh.

Mana mingled with mana, and the snowstorm came to a stop amid a flash of pure white light.

No—the scenery had changed.

The vast snowfield was gone. We stood inside an enormous cave, its long passages winding like a maze.

“Follow me. Magic, including spatial movement, can’t be cast inside.”

We talked as we followed him through the cave.

Unsurprisingly, things hadn’t been going smoothly for Magic Johnson either.

“You’ve seen the news, so you know our L.A. branch was hit. It’s on the outskirts of the city, but there’s so much foot traffic around it that we couldn’t prevent casualties.”

Magic Johnson was a Grand Mage and the owner of the vast Wizard Guild.

Although it had been pushed out of the rankings several years ago, the Wizard Guild had once been one of the world’s top ten Guilds, even if only in last place.

Yet neither the Wizard Guild, with its many mages, nor Magic Johnson had been able to stop the planned terrorist attacks that unfolded with lightning speed.

“By the time I got there, it was too late. Afterward, I was swamped dealing with everything else.”

I didn’t ask what had kept him so busy. Everyone here knew.

The so-called “vigilante incident”—our campaign against the Middle Eastern terrorists and African rebel groups.

That campaign had become both the justification for these attacks and the means of carrying them out. Much of the public now blamed us for it. Magic Johnson had been one of the vigilantes, and he couldn’t escape the criticism.

None of us could. I’d simply taken the hardest hit from the media.

“I’m sorry.”

“What?”

“I felt I owed you an apology. If I hadn’t proposed it, the whole world wouldn’t be cursing us out right now…”

“Damn it. Is that what you’re talking about?”

Johnson stopped and shook his head.

“Listen, Jin. This isn’t your fault. You don’t need to apologize to me, either. Understand?”

“Of course, but—”

“Let me ask you something. If you could go back, what would you do? Leave those bastards alone?”

I didn’t need long to think. I’d turned that question over and over in a room where no light could reach me.

“No.”

“What about you two?”

Team Leader Choi and the Skeleton King looked at each other, then answered almost at the same time.

“Nothing would change. If anything, I’d make even more certain they were dealt with.”

“This body will kill that bastard called the Prophet without fail.”

“Good. Clear answers.”

Johnson shrugged at their different answers, which amounted to the same thing.

“And I’m saying this just in case, but no matter what people say about that incident, I don’t regret it in the slightest. Chuck Hagel feels the same way, even though he isn’t here right now.”

Chuck Hagel.

I could still picture him beating down terrorists while suffering through cigar withdrawal.

Team Leader Choi had mentioned on the way here that Chuck was facing plenty of trouble himself.

“How’s Chuck doing?”

“Not well.”

“That was quick.”

“Because it’s true. The external and internal pressure coming down on him is tremendous. At this rate, it wouldn’t be strange if he were dismissed from his position as Secretary of Defense before long.”

Team Leader Choi joined in, his voice calm.

“The pressure must be too much for even the President to shield him.”

“Chuck’s situation is different from yours. He’s a high-ranking official—the United States Secretary of Defense. The President may have tacitly approved what we did, but that only protected him while it stayed secret.”

“But the entire world found out. And it was revealed directly by a terrorist of historic proportions called the Prophet.”

“…Yeah. Thanks to some damn traitor.”

The operation had gone ahead with the President’s tacit approval. Our mission as “vigilantes” was never supposed to become public.

That was why I'd dared to act so boldly in the modern world, with all its restrictions. I'd trusted that the satellite surveillance system would be disrupted and every related record destroyed.

But information about us had leaked out in plain sight, and I vividly remembered what Michael Silbert had said amid the ruins of Paris.

I'll give you one piece of advice. There are no perfect secrets in this world. Not even in the Pentagon.

The United States was still the world's most powerful nation, and the Pentagon was its Department of Defense headquarters, reputed to have the tightest security in the country.

Yet information that should have been kept secret even within the Pentagon had made its way out.

So easily.

But…

With him involved, it's no surprise.

I was taking it with a calm that surprised even me.

Because the opponent was Michael Silbert. He was stronger than any Hunter I had ever encountered—and even more insane than he was strong.

And then there was the unidentified madman called the Prophet.

No ordinary person could do this. No person could even try.

Even evil had its degrees.

In that sense, the path those bastards had taken had already crossed the line by an absurd distance.

Thousands were already dead, and more than ten times that number injured.

Not every crime committed throughout the world over the course of the week—including the day the Paris branch collapsed—could have been their doing, but it was obvious that they had exerted a considerable influence.

Fear paralyzed reason and gave rise to another kind of madness.

Along with the ten terrorist attacks accompanied by Monster Waves, the distribution of magical power continued to rise at an even steeper rate, and Mutated Gate phenomena were now occurring dozens of times a day.

Some terrified people were already speaking of the end of the world. With crosses hanging at their waists and microphones in their hands, they shouted about God's mercy at the top of their lungs in the streets.

Just as their parents had done long ago.

But I wasn't looking for God.

Those bastards were only human, not devils, and I was ready to bring them down.

There was only one problem…

The thread leading to one of them had been severed just like that.

As I muttered inwardly, I stopped walking. At some point, the long, winding passage of the cave had come to an end.

And waiting for us at the end was a corpse.

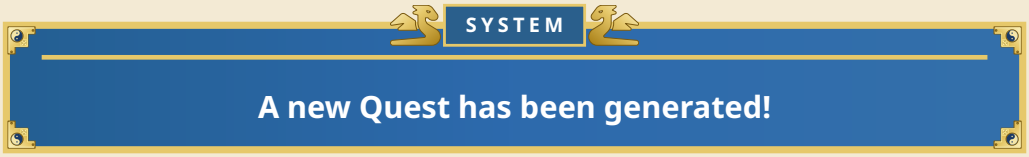
Every bone and scrap of skin on its body had dried up and shriveled tight, like a mummy.

"...What is this?"

Team Leader Choi's voice came out like a groan.

At that moment—

Chime.



The clear chime rang out more ominously than ever.

Chapter 742

SYSTEM

A new Quest has been generated!
An Unexpected Quest, Unknown Death, has been forcibly accepted!
Quest
Unknown Death
The reclusive Grand Mage Siegfried Bassmann has died for an unknown reason.
Yet everything has a cause.
Discover how he died and who killed him.
Grade: Supreme Peak
Restriction: Jin Taekyung
Mission: Reveal the truth behind his death (Incomplete)
Reward: ???
Failure: ???

I stared at the Quest window floating in midair.

The name of the deceased in the first line of the description told me that this corpse, which had met such a gruesome end, belonged to one of only three Grand Mages in the entire world.

Siegfried Bassmann.

Siegfried, also known as the “Hero.” The greatest Hunter ever produced by Switzerland, a permanently neutral country, and a Grand Mage with exceptional talent for summoning and barrier magic.

If Magic Johnson was a War Mage who specialized in combat and killing, Siegfried was one of the few scholars who had devoted himself to the study of magic itself.

At least until today, when he was found dead in his own hideout.

“Was he like this when you arrived?”

Magic Johnson nodded, his expression grim.

“Yes. I could hardly believe it myself. I checked several times before I accepted that the body was Siegfried’s.”

“How often did you keep in touch?”

“Once or twice a year after he went into hiding. Even then, I’d have to contact him ten times or so before he answered, and it took him ages. This is my first time here. He was intensely private and hated visits like this.”

“Then the last time you heard from him was…”

“Hmm. About three years ago, I think.”

“Three years. I heard he went into hiding nearly ten years ago.”

"The last time we met, just before he retired, he gave me a communication artifact he'd made himself. Told me to use it if anything was truly urgent."

I took the artifact Magic Johnson pulled from inside his clothes. It was a crystal ball about the size of an adult's fist, and it held a considerable amount of mana—as if to prove a Grand Mage had made it.

Of course. Normal radio signals and communications would have been impossible inside a space surrounded by layers upon layers of barriers. He probably intended it that way.

I'd never met Siegfried Bassmann, but by all accounts he was a shut-in. He avoided attention of any kind, and once a subject caught his interest, he'd dig into it until he'd dissected every last part of it.

"I contacted him every Thanksgiving and Christmas, but he stopped answering three years ago. I knew what he was like, so I let it go. Being called a hero made him uncomfortable, and he hated attention from the press. Even after the Great Cataclysm ended, he'd sometimes disappear into his research for long stretches."

I couldn't make sense of it.

A Grand Mage who had gone into hiding to escape the public eye had died like this in his own refuge.

One thing, though, was certain.

"This wasn't an ordinary natural death. Whatever killed him, a body couldn't end up like this in just three years."

Maybe not even in three hundred.

Would a shut-in Grand Mage whose hobby was magic research and whose specialty was staying home run his hideout on gas and electricity?

This enormous cavern, which could only be entered by breaking through its barriers, was filled with all kinds of magic. Everything, from the temperature to the humidity, was controlled perfectly.

And Siegfried's body showed none of the rot or stench of ordinary decay.

It's just… dried out. As if something sucked every bit of life from it.

I'd never seen a death this strange, even in Murim.

Which left me with more questions. How had he died in his own hideout? And how deeply was his death connected to my enemies?

"Michael Silbert. And The Prophet."

The two likeliest suspects.

Magic Johnson understood what I meant. "If I had to choose one of them, I'd pick the first without hesitation."

"Why?"

“Because we know there’s a connection between Michael and Siegfried. From everything we’ve seen, Michael Silbert must know Sky is unconscious. Otherwise, he’d never have joined forces with terrorists to pull off something this insane.”

It was a plausible theory. Siegfried had built Area A inside Ares Guild’s headquarters, and he could well have learned the truth about Cheon Taemin’s condition while doing it.

But…

“I’m asking because I don’t know, but was Siegfried close to Michael Silbert when he was alive?”

“That…”

“Then how likely is it that he told Michael a secret that big?”

Magic Johnson paused and let out a low groan.

“Unlikely. No, you might as well call it impossible. Very few people had any relationship with Siegfried, myself included. And there was only one person he ever said he truly respected.”

I had a feeling I knew the answer.

“Cheon Taemin.”

Magic Johnson nodded. “That’s right. Siegfried genuinely respected Sky. From what he told me, it was practically worship. He even spoke about Sky in an interview once.”

“Oh. I think I remember that.”

I had a vague memory of seeing the interview. There were online profiles full of information about well-known Hunters, Siegfried Bassmann among them. I’d heard the interview caused a stir at the time: it was unusual enough for him to speak to the press, let alone express such strong feelings about anyone.

“Perhaps… that’s why Lee Jungryong commissioned Siegfried to build Area A.”

Team Leader Choi spoke up suddenly, then continued slowly.

“Siegfried Bassmann was a master in that field, and he had very few personal relationships. On top of that, he deeply respected my maternal grandfather. He would have kept the secret.”

Magic Johnson gave a small nod.

“That’s true. Even I knew nothing about Area A, and I was one of the people closest to him. Hell, I never thought he’d accept a commission from anyone.”

“At least when it came to maintaining secrecy, Lee Jungryong’s judgment was accurate. But if the information wasn’t leaked, the question that remains is…”

“How did Michael Silbert find out?”

I muttered the question as I examined the body again, searching every inch for signs of torture. Even with every sense sharpened, I found nothing new.

If this wasn't simply a lizard shedding its tail, then there had to be a reason he needed to be killed.

I couldn't prove it yet, but Michael Silbert was still our likeliest suspect. Finding out what had happened here could be the first step toward bringing him down.

There's something. There has to be…

I kept searching the body, repeating those words to myself. At last, frustrated, I looked up and saw someone standing nearby.

Or rather, a monster shaped like a person.

"Why are you standing there trying to look cool? You've been quiet this whole time."

The Skeleton King stood with his arms crossed, deep in thought. He frowned.

"Silence, foolish human. This body was engaged in profound contemplation."

"What kind of bullshit were you contemplating now?"

"Can you not feel it?"

I stopped. "Feel what?"

"This space. The concentration of magical power is higher here than elsewhere."

If he'd said mana, I would have argued immediately. My Qi Sense was better than anyone else's here, and I hadn't noticed anything unusual.

But magical power was another matter. The Skeleton King was an S-rank monster. When it came to sensing magical power, even I couldn't match him.

"Large human. Did you not feel it?"

Magic Johnson scratched the back of his head.

"I did, though not as clearly as you. I just didn't think it was strange."

"You are infinitely more foolish than this body. Why?"

"This isn't just a house. It's also a laboratory equipped with everything Siegfried could want. You could rummage through a single storage room and find mountains of monster corpses and Magic Gems."

"…Huh?"

Oh. He had a point.

Just as filtering shit water wouldn't make it perfectly clear, the same was true of Magic Gems and monster corpses. No matter how thoroughly they were purified, some magical power would remain.

Siegfried's hideout was full of things that held magical power. No wonder the concentration was high.

"I see what you're thinking," Johnson went on, "but even if monsters are the reason there's so much magical power here, that doesn't tell us anything. If a monster killed Siegfried, there should at least be signs of a fight."

"…H-huh?"

I was an idiot for getting my hopes up.

The Skeleton King could only blink at Johnson's perfectly reasonable objection. I muttered, "Fucking moron."

"How dare this treacherous human insult whom!"

"Shut up before I pull your jawbone off. I'll let it slide since you actually tried thinking for once."

"…"

"Don't go confusing the investigation. My head's about to explode as it is."

The Demon Realm was far away. My fist was close.

The Skeleton King closed his mouth, looking thoroughly displeased. Team Leader Choi, who had continued examining the body, clicked his tongue.

"If this was an assassination, there should be at least a small wound. But there isn't one. The body is clean."

"Then…"

"Magic is the only explanation I can think of."

Yet even Magic Johnson, a Grand Mage himself, looked troubled.

"I specialize in offensive magic, but I've never seen or heard of anything like this. It's far more complex and sinister than the magic we use. Closer to that fellow's work, if anything."

"That fellow," who had been keeping his mouth firmly shut, frowned.

"This body merely places vengeful spirits into dead flesh. This body knows nothing of such wicked magic."

"…"

"…"

"…"

Isn't that already fucking wicked magic?

But since he said he did not know, what could I say? Besides, he was quite unlike an ordinary monster, so he had no reason to lie.

Damn it. It has to be him.

Michael Silbert.

That name alone kept circling through my mind.

Chapter 743

A space reserved for one person alone.

In the light that faintly illuminated the darkness, an eerie sound of flesh tearing echoed through the air.

Crack. Crack-crack.

Bones and muscles twisted. A tremendous force surged in time with the beating of a heart, bringing about a transformation.

What was weak grew strong.

What was strong grew stronger still.

The man's veins stood out across his body, and cold sweat had soaked him through. A thin line of blood slipped between his tightly pressed lips and ran down his chin.

Drip.

Drops of blood fell one by one.

Yet despite the agony wringing every part of his body, there was no trace of fear or pain in his gray eyes.

To some, it would have been worse than death. To him, it was familiar.

And the reward for enduring it was always sweet.

Just like now.

Hssssss.

The sickening cracks fell silent. At the same time, the energy that had been thrashing inside him rapidly settled. The veins bulging so grotesquely across his body slowly receded, and his muscles stopped convulsing.

Once again, the man received his "Reward."

Whoosh—boom!

In an instant, a tremendous wave of qi burst from him and swept in every direction. The light that had faintly illuminated the space vanished, and everything within some ten meters[3064] crumbled to dust.

It was power.

Overwhelming power.

Michael Silbert felt the change within himself and smiled.

Vrrrrr.

A faint vibration reached him from somewhere.

Michael knew exactly what it meant. He rose without hesitation and silently extended a hand. A hidden door opened, spilling light from the other side.

Step. Step.

[3064] Ten meters is about 33 ft.

His footsteps were strong and steady, as though the ordeal moments earlier had never happened. He crossed his study—vast was a better word for it—and stopped before a large mirror.

The full-length mirror glowed and faintly vibrated. Michael studied his reflection in its flawless surface, then laid a hand against the glass.

Tap.

In the next moment—

Flash!

A brief flare of light transformed the view in the mirror. Michael and his study vanished, replaced by an endless horizon, buildings moving slowly past, and a lone figure.

Dark skin, golden eyes, a silk top hat, and a monocle—the last two rarely seen these days.

Michael greeted the loyal retainer who had served him for years.

“You’ve been working hard, Huginn.”

Huginn tipped his hat to his superior.

“Not at all, Guild Master.”

That was greeting enough. As though by agreement, they went straight to business.

“The Swiss Federal Police recovered Siegfried Bassmann’s body an hour ago.”

“And those bastards?”

The question was brief. Huginn needed no clarification.

“They were questioned briefly as witnesses and released. If we push as hard as we can, we might drag them before the International Court of Justice, but I doubt we can take it any further.”

“I assume that isn’t just your own assessment. Who’s your source?”

“In Switzerland, Minister Berse.”

“Berse?”

Michael nodded calmly at the name of the Minister of the Interior, whose election as Switzerland’s president next year was considered all but certain.

“Then I’ve heard enough. We should let the matter end there.”

“I agree, Guild Master. Still, given what’s at stake, pursuing them to the end might be worth considering.”

“You want to throw them into a pit of filth, one way or another?”

“Shouldn’t we drag them in by the collar if we have to? The whole world will be watching as soon as this gets out. Siegfried Bassmann’s cause of death is unknown, and people will have questions. Then…”

“Conspiracy theories will spread. And those bastards will be their first targets.”

“Yes. Under the circumstances, wouldn’t that be effective?”

Michael shook his head without hesitation.

"Conspiracy theories are nonsense. Only fools obsessed with gossip and their own fantasies would suspect them."

Siegfried Bassmann had been a figure of tremendous stature, not just in Switzerland but around the world. Michael could easily use his death to spread theories about his enemies. It would just as easily backfire.

If he forcibly dragged his enemies into a pit of filth, some of that filth would splash onto him as well.

"Most people won't give those theories a second thought. Worse, some will start wondering whether everything that's happened around those bastards was staged. People who curse them today will take their side tomorrow."

As far as Michael knew, that was human nature. They were quick to condemn someone after being deceived by one tiny false aspect, then quickly changed their attitude once the whole truth came to light, gently embracing the person they had cursed.

As though nothing had happened.

As though the rest of the world had cursed him, but they never had.

Michael had no desire to see that happen. The plan's uncertain outcome was reason enough, but more importantly, its central figure was missing.

Jin Taekyung.

The name hovered on the tip of his tongue.

At most, Siegfried Bassmann's death might put pressure on Magic Johnson. Even that was unlikely. Unless Michael brought down Jin Taekyung—the man at the center of it all—he would only be wasting his strength.

"Leave the Swiss matter alone. There's nothing to gain from it."

Huginn answered the calm, firm order at once.

"Understood. I'll relay that to Minister Berse as well."

"Good. How are things with the media outlets?"

"Going well. We fed them firewood, and the flames took off. There is one matter I need to raise, though…"

"Money?"

"Yes. They've demanded much more than we expected."

"Greedy, aren't they? What they've already received should be more than enough."

"That's why I consider it fortunate. We only need to give them what they want."

Michael let out a quiet laugh. Huginn was right. Satisfy a person's greed at the right moment—better yet, give them more than they had imagined wanting—and they would never betray you.

"I'll give you access to some of my secret accounts. Take whatever you need."

"Should I take that to mean I can give them enough to astonish them?"

"Exactly. You've become quite the villain."

"I learned from a certain someone."

"There's an interesting saying among Easterners: 'When three people gather, they can make a tiger.'[3065] Keep the media under our control until this is over. Just as you have been."

"I'll keep that in mind."

Michael knew the power of the media. He knew, too, how shallow and frightening a crowd's judgment could be.

Part of him found it ridiculous that he had to go this far.

I was certain no one alive could stop me now, apart from Cheon Taemin.

Not the Ares Guild, once called the best in the world. Not Lee Jungryong, who had filled the void Cheon Taemin left behind. Not even the heroes of the Great Cataclysm, Magic Johnson among them.

None of them had been his match.

Then Jin Taekyung appeared.

How is that possible?

Michael could hardly believe it. He had been a young man from the slums with nothing but poverty to his name. Reaching his current position had taken years upon years of patience.

Jin Taekyung was different.

He had appeared out of nowhere and, in barely more than a year, amassed extraordinary achievements and Fame. The whole world had come to love him.

Just as it had loved someone from Michael's past, still vivid in his memory.

Sky.

One week ago, Michael had sensed a trace of Cheon Taemin in the young Asian man he met for the first time in the ruins.

He looked different. He felt different. But Michael's instincts had warned him.

He's dangerous.

He'll be the greatest obstacle in my way.

Those instincts had been right. Even with countless media outlets pouring out malicious stories, people had not stopped voicing their support for Jin Taekyung.

Those swept up in the terror of the attacks and the crowd mentality the media had cultivated were simply louder. Jin Taekyung still stood firm.

But if my guess is right… it's only a matter of time before he falls.

Michael thought to himself as he recalled Jin Taekyung's eyes, blazing with rage.

And someone who had stood beside him.

One step. Only one step remained between Michael and the summit he had longed to reach. He already held the flag that would proclaim his conquest.

[3065] The proverb refers to a false rumor becoming believable when several people repeat it.

"Huginn."

Huginn had waited in silence while his superior was lost in thought.

"Yes, Guild Master."

"There must be no mistakes or unexpected complications with this mission."

"Don't worry. I handled everything exactly as you ordered. Nothing was overlooked."

Michael smiled at the ready answer from the loyal retainer who had shared so many years—and so many secrets—with him.

"Good. That's all I need to hear."

"I won't disappoint you."

The man who had given the order and the man who had carried it out both knew what their actions would bring. They knew countless people would die or be injured.

To Michael, that was a minor detail.

It was an unavoidable sacrifice on the way to the goal he had long sought. If he could obtain what he wanted, then the sacrifice of those who would die somewhere in this vast world was an absurdly cheap price.

Crash!

The magically treated glass shattered at once. A moment ago, it had been a communications crystal ball. Now a wave swept its countless fragments away.

Whooosh.

Wind swept over Huginn as he stood at the stern, gazing at the rolling sea.

Three days at the latest. It'll probably begin before then.

The crystal ball's fragments were not the only things he had cast into the deep. Before long, the whole world would see the result.

The calculations were perfect. The mission was a success.

He felt no guilt. Only the satisfaction of having carried out his orders perfectly, and one small question he had yet to answer.

Will this be enough to bring Jin Taekyung down completely?

Huginn shook his head. The superior he served was always thorough, and the path he chose had always been the right one.

"We're heading back. Get ready."

At his brief command, the ship turned.

Behind it, growing slowly more distant, Tokyo's forest of buildings rose against the sky.

Chapter 744

A thought occurred to me.

I wished that everything tormenting me right now was merely a scene from some movie or novel. Something like that.

Then at least some evidence would pop up somewhere.

Of course, contrary to the hope I had secretly been holding on to, nothing of the sort happened.

Everyone, myself included, searched every inch of Siegfried Bassmann's hideout, but what popped out wasn't evidence concerning his death. It was a person.

More precisely, over a hundred Hunters from the Swiss Federal Police, who had followed us and arrived late.

"Everyone, please stop."

"We're taking control of the scene under legal procedure. Put down whatever you're holding immediately and…"

Well, what else could we do?

If they had abruptly pointed swords at us, I would have answered with my spear. But they were carrying out official duties, and instead of swords, they had thrust forward the invincible cheat code known as legal procedure.

Even unorthodox swordsmen who drew their weapons at the slightest provocation hesitated in front of government soldiers.

And as a twenty-first-century modern man with a logical mindset, my answer had been decided from the start.

"Are you going to put us in handcuffs too?"

"…Excuse me?"

"Yeah, that'd be a bit much. So what do we do now?"

With countless media outlets wishing me a long and healthy life while cursing me to hell, causing another incident would've been insane.

My companions and I cooperated so obediently that even the Swiss Hunters were surprised. After undergoing a thorough body search and brief questioning, we were released.

The high-ranking official who introduced himself as the lead investigator had just one thing to say.

"Additional investigations related to this case will be conducted, so we ask for your continued cooperation in the future."

That was all.

We hadn't given them anything to hold against us, but their matter-of-fact response still surprised me.

According to Team Leader Choi, Michael Silbert's influence reached the leaders of countries across the world. Switzerland, in particular, was where he sheltered his astronomical wealth from taxes.

I was sure that bastard would use Switzerland to pressure us somehow.

Team Leader Choi had a straightforward answer.

"They deliberately let us go. Since it was clear that neither the evidence nor the circumstances had anything to do with us, they must have judged that pursuing the matter any further would be difficult."

"That bastard Michael let us go on purpose? Just getting dragged into this case would already hurt us."

"The public is fickle. Right now, quite a few people are cursing us because they're being controlled by the media and mob psychology. But that's because The Prophet and terrorism provide a plausible justification at first glance."

"And if the reason doesn't hold up, people won't buy it?"

"People have acted on what they consider justified for thousands of years. If that justification falls apart, a good number of those condemning us will change sides."

"Oh."

Come to think of it, that was a pattern people displayed often—no, quite frequently.

You only had to look at the entertainment news on any online portal. The moment a celebrity got caught up in a scandal, netizens swarmed like bees to the honey the media had put out.

There were the genius prophets who claimed they had known it would happen ever since the celebrity's debut, and even twenty-first-century physiognomists insisting that face-reading was a science.

And around the time the winner of that world's greatest malicious-comment contest was crowned by upvotes, a new fact would emerge and turn the situation around, and the swarm would change its tune in an instant.

Why?

Simple.

They had no excuse to keep cursing them.

Siegfried Bassmann's mysterious death was that kind of case. Michael Silbert understood how people worked, and he knew exactly when to press on and when to stop.

"Michael is, in a word, a madman."

Magic Johnson broke the silence, his voice subdued.

"But the biggest reason we need to be wary of him is that this mad bastard is more meticulous and stronger than anyone."

Even the Skeleton King wore an uncharacteristically grave expression.

"I agree. When I first saw that bastard in Paris, I felt something so eerie that it was difficult to believe he was human."

Most madmen ended up in prison or a psychiatric hospital.

But when a madman like Michael had everything, the world had another name for him.

One of the powerful.

Of the people I'd met in the modern world, Lee Jungryong qualified. So did Go Jun, though he fell short of his Master in plenty of ways.

But that bastard…

He had already gone beyond that category.

You'd have to add those two together, then multiply the result, to get a madman like him.

Michael Silbert was a monster who'd given up being human.

Why? What could he possibly want to go this far?

I looked up. The sky was clear as hell, and the surrounding landscape had kept its northern European beauty. It couldn't have been more at odds with what was happening.

Fuck.

I muttered a quiet curse inwardly, then pulled a small pouch from inside my clothes and handed it to Magic Johnson.

"Here."

"This is… a subspace pocket."

"Don't open it yet. Take it with you and look through it properly. Team Leader Choi and I are hopeless when it comes to magic. We wouldn't know what we were looking at."

"Magic? Jin, what are you suddenly talking about?"

He looked bewildered. Then his eyes widened.

"Don't tell me…"

"Yeah. I swiped it earlier. I'm sure the deceased would understand."

"…"

"…"

"…"

All three stood there with their mouths open. Well, two people and one monster. I made a show of sighing.

"Not the reaction I was hoping for. Should I return it?"

Magic Johnson snatched the pocket.

"N-no, that's not what I meant. But how did you…?"

"The Hunters assigned to me were pretty lax with their body search."

Team Leader Choi blinked at me. “Lax?”

“Yeah.”

A blatant lie, of course.

A Grand Mage’s magical research materials were an immense treasure in their own right.

The Swiss Hunters had thoroughly searched the subspace pockets we carried, worried that even one of the materials might be smuggled out.

They hadn’t searched my Inventory.

More precisely, they couldn’t have.

As soon as I gave up looking for evidence on the body, I’d started scooping up materials. Anything that looked even remotely promising. Whatever I could lay my hands on.

The result of that theft was now in Magic Johnson’s hands.

“We didn’t notice a thing,” he said. “When did you manage all this?”

“I told you. They weren’t watching closely, so I slipped it out.”

“You secretly slipped it out?”

He opened the pocket and looked inside.

“…Jin. You didn’t steal the entire laboratory, did you?”

“…”

“…Jin?”

Well. I had picked up this and that, so I had brought quite a lot.

Everyone had been distracted, though, and there were mountains of documents left behind. It probably wasn’t that obvious.

Probably.

“Anyway, is it enough to work with?”

“Enough? Are you serious? There’s more than enough.”

“Then please investigate it based on those materials for the time being.”

“But with everything happening, I can’t focus entirely on—no. I’ll do my best. If I find even the smallest clue in here, Michael won’t be able to carry on like this.”

I nodded.

“Please do.”

The distribution of magical power had intensified again, and the damage was mounting. Magic Johnson would be a tremendous help with the aftermath, but we needed to deal with the root of the problem first.

“We’ll gather information from other angles,” Team Leader Choi said. “If we can locate one person, we may be able to prevent the worst.”

Magic Johnson answered with something like a sigh.

“The Prophet.”

"Yes. If either of the two heads is removed, things should improve considerably."

"If we could eliminate The Prophet, all the better. We have Jin. Find out where the man is, and he's dead. The problem is…"

"I know. Even the Pentagon hasn't located him yet. But we have to try."

Michael Silbert and The Prophet.

The Prophet and Michael Silbert.

The two madmen moved as though they were one, but The Prophet was by far the easier one for me to eliminate.

Kill the master of the world's greatest Guild, and I'd be a fucking bastard on par with Demon King Asmodeus. Bring back the head of a fanatical terrorist, and the whole world would cheer.

"We'll find him," I said, calm despite the anger in my voice. "Even if we have to turn over the entire desert."

The civilization humanity had built was magnificent.

The sight of people cheering after discovering fire for the first time in the distant past could no longer be found anywhere.

Those wandering groups had become farming societies. Factories rose where fields and rice paddies had once stood, and humanity forged the modern world from steel and blood.

Humanity, once the weakest of all, had thus become the master of this blue planet.

They flew across the sky faster than light, ventured into space, and used weapons born of that progress to kill one another.

Humanity was the ruler of this land, its people, and an explorer forever moving forward.

But even humanity could not do everything.

Some unknown realms remained beyond its reach after hundreds of millions of years, impossible to explore even with magic.

One was the infinite expanse of space. The other lay deep beneath the sea, where light could not reach.

The deep sea.

Even adventurers who had discovered the five oceans and six continents and reached into the domain of outer space had never set foot there. It was still filled with countless speculations and secrets.

No—perhaps it was a secret that should never have been pried into.

Shhrrk.

Something enormous moved. Hundreds of deep-sea fish had mistaken it for part of the terrain and strayed close. They could not withstand the power within it and were torn in half.

Crunch.

The lightless depths swallowed their red blood.

Hssss.

A faint light spread beyond the darkness.

Each time the scales covering something enormous, several meters[3066] in radius, shifted, the surrounding space alternately brightened and darkened.

At last, the center of the glow shone clearly.

It was no luminous organ like those found on some deep-sea fish. The power it held was beyond comparison.

It was an eye.

The eye of a creature so enormous that it was difficult to believe.

A monster everyone thought had vanished long ago had awakened after an unfathomable span of time.

[3066] One meter is about 3.28 ft.

Chapter 745

The desert night was bitterly cold.

The scorching sun and heat haze were gone. In their place remained subzero temperatures and an unusually large moon.

A temperature swing of sixty degrees[3067] in a single day.

But even the bitter cold could not stop the figure climbing a crescent-shaped dune.

Sssrrk.

Despite the steep slope, the figure moved as though gliding across the sand. The hem of a thin silk robe brushed the grains, then came to a stop.

"This is the place."

The moment that flat voice sounded, the empty air rippled.

Ffft.

With a faint sound, a dozen or so figures descended onto the dune. Their faces hidden behind black masks and turbans, they each dropped respectfully to one knee and whispered,

"Inshallah.[3068] We pay our respects to the great Prophet who has returned to this land."

Standing alone before them, the Prophet's robe fluttered lightly.

"Inshallah.[3069] I wondered when you would reveal yourselves."

Those words made it clear that the Prophet had seen through everything from the beginning. The dozen pairs of eyes visible above the masks trembled.

"Prophet…"

"I know. You followed me because you care for me, even though it meant defying my orders."

"If you would punish us for our disobedience, we would gladly pay for it with our lives. But we, the Hasasin, will never leave your side, no matter the circumstances."

The Hasasin. Or the Assassins.

Their stronghold had fallen to their enemies around the thirteenth century. For centuries afterward, the ancient order of assassins had survived as little more than a religious sect, until the Great Cataclysm brought it back to life.

Its members would not be dissuaded.

"The Western heretics are cunning, and they wield great power. If they were to discover you…"

"Al-Nizar. Loyal beyond any other, yet foolish and full of worry."

[3067] A temperature change of 60 degrees Celsius is equivalent to a change of 108 degrees Fahrenheit.

[3068] Inshallah is Arabic for "God willing."

[3069] Inshallah is Arabic for "God willing."

"…!"

"Look at me."

The leader of the Hasasin flinched and cautiously raised his head.

His great Prophet gazed down at him, silhouetted against a sky strewn with stars. Within the strangely dark folds of the robe, a pair of eyes shone with a mysterious light.

"Do you still not understand?"

The Prophet raised both arms toward the sky.

Vwoooom.

An immense force swelled beneath the robe, pushing its folds outward. The wind died. The air vibrated.

The Hasasin swallowed without realizing it. Their eyes followed the Prophet's hands, and in the next moment—

Shhhhhhhk.

They saw it: a transparent membrane that began in the sky and curved around them, enclosing an area several hundred meters[3070] in radius.

It was both a protective barrier that no product of science—not even Magic—could detect and a screen that concealed them from their enemies' eyes.

"As long as I protect you, they will not find so much as our shadows."

"…!"

"…!"

Even the Hasasin, who had endured extreme training, could not hide their surging emotions at that moment.

Their Prophet possessed such astonishing power. And the Prophet had called lowly servants like them us.

"Inshallah[3071]…!"

"Prophet!"

Their cries of joy and emotion echoed through the quiet desert.

But the Prophet had another miracle to show them.

Sssrrk.

The long, loose sleeve of the robe fluttered. The crescent-shaped dune beneath their feet shook.

No—it split apart.

Crk-crk-crk!

It was a wondrous sight.

[3070] Several hundred meters is roughly 1,000–3,000 ft.

[3071] Inshallah is Arabic for "God willing."

In the distant past, Moses had parted the Red Sea and led the Hebrews across it. Now, more than a thousand years later, a new Prophet had divided part of a vast sea of sand in two.

What lay hidden beneath those countless grains glittered in the moonlight like a gift from God.

“My God…”

“Prophet, what are those?”

Instead of answering, the Prophet silently extended a hand.

Clank. Clank. Clank!

Locks burst apart under an invisible force. The leader of the Hasasin stared wide-eyed at the contents of the dozens of iron chests.

“T-this is…”

Even the darkness could not hide their brilliance.

Gold and silver bars in quantities he had never seen, and weapons imbued with various kinds of Magic, dazzled him. But something else shocked him most of all.

“Magic Gems…!”

The cry that escaped him like a groan was the truth.

Magic Gems.

Hundreds of them, unmistakably high-grade to top-grade. Some were exceptionally large and radiated immense power.

Fwoooosh.

Even he, a leader of the Hasasin who had reached the realm of an S-rank Hunter, could not easily approach that powerful energy.

“Hk.”

He drew a sharp breath before he could stop himself. The Prophet’s familiar, toneless voice reached him.

“S-rank Magic Gems. Their original power remains intact.”

“P-Prophet…”

“Stand back. That power is beyond you.”

With that quiet warning, the unrefined S-rank Magic Gems floated into the air. They moved like living things and disappeared into the Prophet’s robe.

Ten of them.

The leader of the Hasasin watched, his gaze trembling.

How did the Prophet get hold of those…?

He already knew the Prophet’s abilities defied common sense.

But from the Great Cataclysm until now, only a little over a hundred S-rank monsters had officially appeared in human history.

On extremely rare occasions, a tiny number of A-rank monsters had possessed S-rank Magic Gems. But those instances were exactly what they were—exceptional cases. Even in the Middle East, where countless Gates existed, S-rank Magic Gems had appeared only once or twice.

Yet here were ten of them, their original magical power intact.

That's an incredible amount. It's impossible to believe.

His faith in the Prophet was boundless, but this time he could not help wanting to ask.

He turned his head—and met the faintly glowing eyes within the robe.

"Tell me. Who do you think stands before you?"

"…!"

The gaze seemed to see through him. Shock struck the leader of the Hasasin like lightning, and he dropped to his knees.

How dare someone like him question the Prophet's actions?

It was something that could not happen—and must never happen.

"Great Prophet, please forgive this sinful servant!"

The air froze.

The other Hasasin touched their weapons and waited for the Prophet to speak. If the order came, they were ready to kill their own leader without a moment's hesitation.

The Prophet spoke God's word and led them all.

Since the death of the Prophet Muhammad, the Islamic world had spent more than a thousand years feuding and fighting. Blood had stained the desert sands.

Over time, a tiny few had gained immense wealth and power. But in the great cities built on oil, the word of Allah had given way to the capitalism of apostates.

It was time to bring Allah's children, who had turned their blades on one another, back to a single root—and to save their fellow believers persecuted even in the Western world.

In the name of the great God.

In the name of the Prophet who had come to them decades ago in God's stead.

And just as an invisible blade slowly cut through the silence, one tightly closed mouth finally opened.

"Al-Nizar."

The voice revealed neither age nor even gender.

The leader of the Hasasin swallowed. Cold sweat had soaked him from head to toe.

"Prophet."

"One last piece of advice, my son of God. You are still immature—and that is precisely why I care for you all the more."

"…!"

"Inshallah.[3072] All of this is the result of the long patience and providence God has granted me. You must never doubt it. Do you understand?"

"I'll remember. I'll remember."

Drip.

Cold sweat and tears fell together onto the sand.

The Prophet gazed kindly at the leader as he trembled with relief and emotion, then continued.

"The time has come again. Tell your brothers who have been preparing."

Everyone's eyes widened.

Nearly ten days had passed since the day they called "Allah's Judgment." All who followed the Prophet had been waiting impatiently for the next day of judgment.

"Prophet. Do you mean…?"

"God wills it. Bring down His hammer upon the apostates eating away at us from within and the Western heretics."

The eyes visible above the masks gleamed with fanaticism and exultation.

The Prophet looked up at the star-strewn sky and murmured,

"There is not much time left until the end."

Some wanted catastrophe. Some struggled to prevent it. Still others wanted something beyond it.

Even now, each was racing toward a different goal.

Sugihara Gyoiku was a laborer who had worked in cargo shipping for a long time.

He was a lifelong Tokyo native and, at the same time, a seasoned laborer who had entered the maritime transport industry when he was young.

People sometimes looked down on him for doing manual labor, but he did not care much. Not everyone could be a Hunter, lawyer, or doctor, and the world needed people like him, too.

Lately, though, he had been in a foul mood.

How could he not be?

Chikushō.[3073] Damn monsters.

Just ten days earlier, a Monster Wave in Tokyo had killed and injured many people.

Tokyo Tower, which he had secretly been proud of as a Tokyo native, had collapsed horribly. The chicken restaurant he had frequented for thirty years had also vanished in the aftermath.

[3072] Inshallah is Arabic for "God willing."

[3073] Chikushō is a Japanese exclamation meaning "damn it."

I didn't like that the owner was a Chosenjin,[3074] but the chicken was incredible.

Gyoiku was sad that he could no longer stop in for Korean-style chicken and beer after work. Still, he went to work today as usual.

"Gyoiku-san.[3075] You're here?"

"Yo."

He exchanged brief greetings with the other dockworkers and headed straight to the work site. Cargo ships already crowded Tokyo Bay.

"Where should we start?"

"We've already started. Come on."

As Gyoiku loaded cargo onto a ship, he chatted with his coworkers. Tokyo's magical-power levels had been rising particularly fast lately. The prime minister, scion of a prominent political family, had said something insane again.

Then someone mentioned a tsunami.

"A tsunami?"

"Yeah. Apparently it's getting closer to Tokyo. They say it's huge."

"Hmm."

"Don't worry. The government said it would die down soon."

"Guess it will."

Gyoiku felt a little uneasy, but only a little. Even if there was a tsunami, it would never make it all the way to Tokyo. Tokyo Bay was sheltered by the land around it, and its magical defense systems were firmly in place.

Maybe I'll look for a new Korean chicken place after work.

Gyoiku straightened his back, thinking about something pointless—and froze like a statue.

"Huh?"

What is that?

The question flashed through his mind. A moment later, he remembered what he had just heard.

The tsunami.

Gyoiku stared blankly, mouth open, toward the sea beyond the harbor.

A wave larger than any he had ever seen was racing toward him. It rose so high it looked ready to blot out the sun.

Gooooooong.

Along with the cry of some unknown thing—a sound that froze him merely by hearing it.

[3074] Chosenjin is a Japanese ethnic slur for Koreans.

[3075] -san is a Japanese honorific suffix used as a polite form of address.

Chapter 746

Returning to everyday life usually means things have settled down.

But immediately after the mysterious death of Siegfried Bassmann, we returned to our respective positions only to face a frantic stretch of time.

“The magical-power reading at the C-rank Gate in Sokcho, Gangwon Province, is rising rapidly. It’s at Stage Two… entering Stage Three! We have a mutation Gate!”

“How many people can we deploy?”

“Four teams are on standby at the Gangwon Province branch. The Teleport Magic Formation linked to Sokcho City Hall can get them to the site within five minutes.”

“Send them now. This could turn into a monster wave. Make rescuing survivors and containing the situation your top priorities.”

The situation after our return was about as bad as it could get.

Until a few years ago, mutation Gates had appeared no more than once a month. Now we were seeing three or four a day—and that was just in Korea.

While stock prices rose and fell, magical-power readings climbed every single day.

Broadcasters cut back on entertainment shows. On newly launched disaster-news channels, experts from every field argued fiercely.

“Many people overlook the fact that magical-power readings have risen steadily every year. Compared to the period immediately after the Great Cataclysm, today’s readings are actually quite low. Once this situation is resolved, things will settle down quickly, so the public needn’t worry—”

“Settle down quickly? What kind of nonsense is that? And how can you compare today with the period right after the Great Cataclysm? After we killed the Demon King on the ‘Day of Victory,‘ did humanity put down its weapons and dance Ganggangsullae together?[3076] Back then, you could go to Han River Park and find Lizardmen. It took nearly a year just to finish off the monster armies that were still out there. Have you forgotten?”

“I live in Ilsan, and I never saw any Lizardmen in Han River Park. I’m right.”

“What a fucking idiot…”

“Now, now. You’re a year younger than me. No need to swear.”

“A year younger, my ass, you fucking bastard. My parents registered my birth late. Happy?”

“Mr. Host, are you going to let him talk to me like that?”

The sight of white-haired academic authorities turning red in the face on TV and fighting over whose argument would win was no longer particularly surprising.

While they grabbed each other by the collars, the next channel was reporting breaking news of a mutation Gate or monster wave somewhere in the world.

[3076] Ganggangsullae is a traditional Korean circle dance and folk song.

And at those horrific scenes, I fought as hard as I could.

Shhk!

White Flame's spearhead sliced cleanly through hide and bone harder than armor.

The enormous monster—I had no idea how many I'd killed by then—stopped dead in its tracks. Then it slowly turned around and split in two from top to bottom.

Shff. Thud!

As its three-meter[3077] body fell in two equal halves, I met the eyes of a man sprawled a few steps away.

He had escaped death by a hair. In his hand was a plastic protest sign painted with red letters.

ARREST INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL JIN TAEKYUNG!!!

Hmm.

I wondered how I was supposed to react, then gave him a rueful smile.

Even if he hated me, three exclamation marks seemed a bit much.

"Are you okay?"

"…Ah."

"You look all right apart from a few scratches, but stay seated just in case. It's over now. The rescue team will be here soon."

I left the man moving his lips without a word and turned away.

In barely thirty minutes, the street had been devastated. Monster carcasses lay among human bodies.

I sharpened my senses and searched the area, but felt no other signs of life.

The damage never should have been this bad.

It was tragic enough that a monster wave had struck this peaceful little city.

And that the hundreds of protesters gathered to condemn me had chosen this street for their rally.

Splash. Splash.

I crossed the street through puddles of mingled red and blue blood.

The hyenas had already caught the scent. They rushed me with cameras and microphones.

"What do you think of this monster wave?"

"You arrived before anyone else and stopped the monster wave! First, as a fellow human being, I'd like to express my deepest gratitude—"

"These people were here to condemn you. Could someone who supports you have caused this monster wave deliberately—"

"Why hasn't Mr. Sky appeared yet? What connection do you have to the recent death of Siegfried Bassmann?"

[3077] Three meters is about 9.8 ft.

“Jin, give us a statement!”

It felt as though filth were raining down on me from every direction.

A few defended me, but far more reporters were desperate for sensational headlines.

And I suspected many of them were being paid handsomely to ask those questions.

By someone like…

Odin Guild.

I’d already suspected as much. I hadn’t been particularly surprised when Team Leader Choi first told me.

Turn the media against us, and public opinion would follow.

Dragging me and Ares Guild through the mud so openly, when we had overwhelming public support, wasn’t something just anyone could attempt.

Michael Silbert had both the power and the justification to try.

The problem was that, in the media at least, it was working far better than I’d imagined.

“The Prophet still hasn’t shown himself. What would you say to him, knowing he’s watching you from somewhere?”

“Statistics show that Ares Guild handles an average of 3.6 incidents a day, while Odin Guild handles 6.5. Any comment?”

“Mr. Jin Taekyung! Mr. Jin Taekyung!”

“Hey, you! What kind of question is that? You call yourselves reporters?”

“Everyone, step back. Now!”

It was chaos.

Reporters pushed forward for more stories and more payoffs. Police officers and Hunters struggled to hold them back.

I slipped between them, my stomach churning, while a voice seemed to echo inside my head.

You humans… really are a shitshow.

I never thought I’d hear that from a monster.

But I had no answer.

Maybe seeing that sign had taken the fight out of me.

“Shut up. You’re loud.”

I hadn’t used much internal energy, but I was mentally exhausted. After giving the Skeleton King a curt reply inside my Inventory, I pulled out the Magic Scroll I’d brought and tore it.

Riiip. Fwoosh!

The familiar sensation of Teleport Magic swept through me.

The scenery changed in an instant. As my vision cleared, I saw a familiar face.

"You're back early. I only just heard you were on your way."

Exhaustion weighed on Song Song's voice, and she had dark circles under her eyes that hadn't been there before. She promptly held out a handkerchief.

"Wipe your face. You've got blood on it."

I looked from the handkerchief to her and smacked my lips.

"Just curious. Are you saving your Clean Magic to make soup with?"

"Do you think Magic works by putting coins into it? You can chug potions to replenish mana, but you can't replenish mental energy that's already been spent. I'm already not getting enough sleep these days, so shut up and use the handkerchief."

I knew who was chiefly responsible for her lack of sleep, so I couldn't argue.

I wiped off the blood and handed it back. Song Song took the dirty handkerchief and quietly cast a spell.

"Clean."

"…?"

Whoosh.

Dust and blood vanished, leaving the handkerchief spotless.

I stared at her. She blinked innocently.

"What? It's designer."

At that shameless answer—and the realization that she'd set me up for it—I couldn't help snorting.

"Ha."

"There. You're smiling. You looked miserable on TV."

"You were watching?"

"I saw it live. Heard those fucking reporters talking bullshit, too."

"…Well, I guess I have to take it. When you get down to it, I bear some responsibility for this mess."

Song Song frowned.

"Are you going to start talking bullshit too?"

"…"

"I thought you were getting back to normal. What's with you? If you want to blame yourself that badly, kill those bastards first. Then you can beat yourself up all you like."

That was exactly what I wanted to do.

But it wasn't that easy. Three days had passed since our trip to Switzerland, and little had changed.

Magic Johnson's investigation had produced no results. Neither magic nor satellite surveillance could find a trace of The Prophet. And Michael Silbert's Odin Guild kept rising higher by the day.

“Don’t blame yourself so much, and don’t worry so much. You’re not the only one working hard. Uncle Kkeokjeong was raising hell yesterday, saying he’d go straight to Paris and cut Michael’s head off.”

“That… It’s reassuring to have an entire army on our side, but if he did that, Uncle Kkeokjeong would be the one losing his head.”

“Yeah. That’s exactly what I told him.”

“You told him that?”

“Of course. It’s true. He was a bit dejected, but he came around pretty quickly.”

Well, I was grateful for that much.

Song Song and I talked as we walked. By the time she’d finished telling me about my mother and Hayeon, who were staying at the mansion under tight security, we had reached Team Leader Choi’s office.

“You’re here.”

He looked even more exhausted than Song Song. His usually immaculate office was a mess, and empty coffee cups covered the desk.

“Thank you for making the long trip. But…”

Team Leader Choi looked back and forth between Song Song and me, then lowered his voice.

“Where’s the other one?”

“Don’t worry. He came with me.”

I’m here.

Had I kept him shut away too long? He sounded furious.

I took the Skeleton King out of my Inventory, pretending to rummage through the subspace pouch at my waist as I recited the command.

Inventory open. Summon.

A sturdy young white man popped into view. Song Song muttered, “Wow. Easy birth.”

“Shut your mouth, beautiful but ill-mannered human female. How dare you compare this body to such a thing…”

“Thanks. I feel so much better now.”

“Damn it.”

The Skeleton King’s face was full of displeasure as he muttered a curse, but there was nothing we could do about it.

Even if his identity is partly out in the open, we need to keep him hidden as much as we can.

We’d given him a new past and identity, but nothing in this world was perfect. Even the Pentagon, supposedly the most secure place on earth, had been breached the same way.

Given the circumstances, we had no choice but to limit his exposure as much as possible.

But Team Leader Choi’s next words made me realize we would have to play the Skeleton King card.

“Three minutes ago, Tokyo Bay collapsed.”

Chapter 747

Beneath a sky shrouded in dark clouds, Sugihara Gyoiku stared blankly ahead.

What the hell just happened?

He was an ordinary civilian. His mind could not make sense of what had happened to him.

His arms and legs shook beyond his control. His stomach, full of salty seawater, could not bear the rescue helicopter's rough movements.

No—perhaps what Gyoiku truly could not endure was the horrifying reality that had suddenly come crashing down on him.

"Ugh—bwaaaargh!"

Vomit sprayed everywhere.

Some of it hit the other people in the rescue net with him, but no one complained. No one even seemed to notice.

They only stared at the scene below with vacant eyes.

Craaaack!

Things broke, collapsed, and were swept away.

A wave dozens of meters[3078] high. Perhaps even hundreds of meters.[3079]

Even as they watched it happen, they could scarcely believe the disaster swallowing everything in its path.

The port of Tokyo Bay, where hundreds of ships came and went every day, had vanished without a trace. Cargo ships weighing tens of thousands of metric tons[3080] apiece broke apart like Styrofoam and rode the waves into a nearby industrial complex.

Rumble—BOOM!

Flames surged upward with a deafening roar, swallowing people's screams.

Alarms wailed without pause. Far below, cars and crowds that looked as small as swarms of ants scattered in every direction.

Fleeing the disaster.

Unable to accept the fate that had befallen them.

And behind those struggling desperately to survive, an enormous shadow fell across the ground.

Whooooooosh!

"Ah… Ahhh…"

The survivors watching from above let out hollow moans.

[3078] Dozens of meters is roughly 20–90 m, or about 66–300 ft.

[3079] Hundreds of meters is roughly 100–900 m, or about 330–3,000 ft.

[3080] Tens of thousands of metric tons is roughly 20,000–90,000 metric tons, or about 22,000–99,000 US short tons.

The land they had painstakingly rebuilt through decades of sweat and blood after the Great Cataclysm was collapsing. A magnificent civilization was falling apart.

The white foam that had always scattered against the breakwaters and the blue seawater had both turned red.

Nothing could stop that enormous wave as it smashed through and swept away everything in its path.

No. Even if the wave subsided, it would make no difference.

This was not merely a natural disaster.

Something worse lurked beneath the deep waters that had swallowed the port and industrial complex.

The survivors who had miraculously lived through it knew the truth. That was why, upon spotting dozens of fighter jets flying toward them from the opposite direction, they could only scream as though coughing up blood.

“N-No!”

“Don’t come!”

But their desperate cries reached no one.

Not the squadron of fighter jets streaking across the sky with sonic booms. Not the elite Japanese Hunters aboard them, sent to deal with the disaster.

And not the deep-sea monster awakened from its long sleep.

Gooooooong.

A low, immense call raised the waves just as they had begun to subside.

The strengthening wind whipped into a storm. Thunder rumbled among the countless dark clouds that now covered the sky.

Rumble, rumble…

Every living thing nearby froze like a statue and stared blankly upward.

It was fear engraved deep in their bones, an instinct they felt simply because they were alive.

Power.

The power of nature—and yet something beyond nature.

“What the hell is that…?”

The pilot was about to order the waiting Hunters to descend when the words escaped him in a groan.

At that moment—

Fwoosh!

Hundreds—thousands—of bolts of lightning plunged from the sky, turning the whole world white.

The Japanese Ministry of Defense's operations control room, hastily called into session, was silent.

Suffocating silence. Throats working soundlessly. Unfocused eyes.

Dozens of high-ranking officials and generals were present, but no one spoke. They could only stare at the holographic screen with vacant eyes.

What… What just happened?

The same thought occupied every mind.

The flash had filled the screen with light so fierce that they had closed their eyes without realizing it. When they opened them again, all they saw were dozens of aircraft falling toward the ground—and the waves swallowing them.

"Th-They've all been wiped out."

Someone's thoughtless report broke the silence. It confirmed the truth none of them wanted to face.

Everything was gone. No—everyone was dead.

The hundreds, thousands of lightning bolts had turned everything within their range to ash.

The rescue helicopters carrying the miraculous survivors. The Air Self-Defense Force's prized fighter squadron. The hundreds of Hunters mobilized for the emergency.

All gone.

But it was not only the tsunami—already engulfing ten cities and threatening the capital—that had plunged the control room into deathly silence.

The monster.

They had seen a monster that had vanished decades ago, one they had believed would never return.

"…Susanoo."

The nickname came from its supposed command of the sea and storms.

The general who muttered it hurriedly shut his mouth when he felt the Defense Minister's glare.

"Th-That was…"

"Shut your trap, Yoshimura."

The Japanese Defense Minister cut off the general's attempted excuse and looked around.

Half the people who should have been devising a response were still floundering in shock. The rest waited for him to speak again.

Like baby birds waiting to be fed.

Or people looking for the one scapegoat willing to take responsibility in their place.

Grind.

The elderly Defense Minister clenched his teeth.

For all the generals and officials in this room, he could not find a single suitable person.

The foolish, cowardly Prime Minister had retreated to a bunker long ago. The few capable, responsible commanders lacked the powerful backers needed to get into the Ministry of Defense's control room.

That left only one person to shoulder the burden.

Incompetent bastards!

He cursed them inwardly, forgetting that he owed his own rise to an ancestor who had been a daimyo.[3081] But he was not so foolish that he could deny the reality before him.

"Stop that thing with everything we have! Self-Defense Forces, Hunters—I don't care. Use every means at our disposal!"

"Y-Yes, sir!"

"And…"

Bang!

The Defense Minister slammed his wrinkled hand on the table, then squeezed his eyes shut. He could not bring himself to finish.

Do we really… do we really have to go this far?

The hesitation lasted only a moment.

The situation had already spiraled out of control. If anyone could keep it from becoming an even greater disaster, it was that man.

"Ask the world for help. And that man in particular—we must bring him here, no matter what diplomatic price we have to pay."

"What?"

"If it's him…"

His lips trembled like a child faced with a plate of broccoli.

Then, facing the people staring back at him with no idea what he meant, the Defense Minister shouted until it seemed as though he were coughing up blood.

"That man! I said call that Chōsenjin![3082] Jin Taekyuuung!"

His pride as a subject of the Great Japanese Empire rebelled at the thought, but he had no choice.

That monster—Leviathan—was a demon sent down from heaven.

We can't let that nightmare happen again!

Before long, news reports playing on holographic televisions throughout the control room confirmed that he had been right to choose Jin Taekyung.

[3081] A daimyo was a Japanese feudal lord who governed a domain.

[3082] A derogatory Japanese term for a Korean.

> —The world has once again been engulfed in flames. In a video, the figure known as “The Prophet,” who carried out an unprecedented series of terrorist attacks ten days ago, has announced a second series of attacks…

> —Breaking news. A Monster Wave has occurred in Manhattan, United States. The United States and countries around the world are entering a state of emergency…

> —Entry and exit bans are now in effect for countries experiencing Monster Waves. As a result, part of the emergency mobilization of Hunters to assist Tokyo has fallen through. Among nearby Asian countries, Korea is believed to be the only one able to provide support…

“Japan’s Ministry of Defense has officially requested emergency assistance through the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.”

The news President Baek Hanseong passed on to us was the starting gun. Everything had begun.

“Ares Guild and Peace Guild are heading out as the advance team. Five teams are already standing by, all volunteers of B-rank or higher.”

Team Leader Choi had acted faster than anyone.

The moment he first heard what had happened in Tokyo, he had already issued the mobilization order. President Baek Hanseong had prepared the Air Force so that we could reach our destination as quickly and safely as possible.

“What about a Teleport Magic Formation?” I asked as I gathered the equipment we needed.

Team Leader Choi shook his head.

“We could try it, but the probability of failure is far too high right now. The magical-power distribution around Tokyo rose sharply because of the Monster Wave ten days ago, and it’s already measuring more than three times the previous level.”

“Damn it. Reminds me of China.”

“Yes. It’s the same situation.”

Mana and magical power were opposed to each other.

Attempt spatial travel while magical-power levels were climbing this fast and fluctuating this wildly, and even a body made of solid iron could come apart like a thousand-piece puzzle.

“Then how long will it take?”

“Allowing for the worsening weather nearby, about thirty minutes.”

“Thirty minutes…”

Of course, we would not be landing safely on a wide airport runway.

There was at least a ninety-percent chance that Tokyo International Airport, once the pride of Japan, had already been blown to absolute shit.

And the other ten percent is the chance it’ll be blown to shit before we get there.

I took a deep breath.

The footage Japan’s Ministry of Defense had sent us replayed in my mind.

The Maritime Self-Defense Force swept away by a gigantic triangular wave. Land disappearing beneath the water.

It had broken through the extensive defensive Magic along Japan’s coastline as though it were nothing, swallowed tens of thousands of people, and reduced what little hope remained to ash beneath countless bolts of lightning.

As though proving the power attributed to it in myths passed down from time immemorial.

Leviathan.

The devil of the sea that had ruled the waters during the Great Cataclysm.

One of the most powerful S-rank monsters under the Demon King Asmodeus. A calamity that had vanished when Asmodeus died.

Some said Leviathan had died with the Demon King. Others insisted it had survived and was merely biding its time. With no evidence either way, the years had passed.

And today, more than thirty years later, the nightmare called Leviathan had returned.

Was its appearance a coincidence, or…

Had someone intended it?

Muttering the unresolved question inwardly, I finished my preparations and began walking toward the Hunters and aircraft waiting for me.

The wind blowing from far away seemed to carry a faint smell of blood.

Chapter 748

"Jin Taekyung has accepted Japan's request for assistance."

Michael Silbert listened to Huginn's report and answered calmly.

"And?"

"Ares Guild and Peace Guild have assembled five teams of handpicked Hunters, and the Korean government has mobilized the Air Force to take them to Tokyo. I've prepared the Hunters' profiles, just in case."

Huginn handed him a tablet containing detailed information on every Hunter in the relief force. Michael glanced at it, and a faint smile crossed his lips.

"Well done. Any assistance from outside Korea?"

"None at present. China would be a great help if it joined in, but it lost its core forces in the war against the Arch Lich, and its relations with Japan are poor. It won't answer the request."

China had already suffered enormous losses fighting the Arch Lich and in the terrorist attack on Beijing ten days earlier.

Even with its vast number of Hunters, taking on a top-tier monster capable of causing a disaster by itself would be a heavy burden. All the more so when the request came from Japan, a country with which China had appalling diplomatic relations.

"There's no need to worry about China. Even if the old Chairman wants to help Jin Taekyung, circumstances at home won't allow it."

Huginn realized there was something he had not yet been told.

"Are you planning to strike China again?"

"Someone might get the wrong idea if they heard you say that. A terrorist attack is an unfortunate event no one can predict before it happens. Don't you agree?"

Michael held his gaze. Huginn lowered his head.

"My apologies. I misspoke."

"Don't worry about it. Everyone makes mistakes."

"…"

"And this is only my personal opinion, but I suspect Shanghai may be the next target."

His tone was casual, but Huginn could smell the thick blood embedded in those words.

Shanghai was China's most populous metropolis. After Beijing, which had been struck ten days ago, another staggering loss of life was all but certain.

China is paying dearly for siding with Jin Taekyung.

And China was hardly alone.

Most people saw the series of attacks as indiscriminate terrorism. But the countries and Guilds that had shown Jin Taekyung a friendly face were being punished.

And it'll end one of two ways.

Huginn muttered inwardly as he looked at his superior.

There stood a conqueror with greater ambitions than anyone else in the world, pressing toward his grand objective.

So why did Huginn feel this way?

I have a bad feeling about this.

The situation was perfect. Leviathan was a monster as powerful as the Arch Lich. And unlike the battle against the Arch Lich, in which no fewer than six S-rank Hunters had taken part, Jin Taekyung could expect no outside help this time beyond the forces already at his disposal, including Japan's.

But…

If Jin Taekyung manages to overcome even this…

The thought came to him ominously.

What if, just this once, his superior had made the wrong choice? What if this trap became the sturdy rope that pulled Jin Taekyung out of the mire?

A vibration soon buried Huginn's doubts.

Rrrrrumble.

"Entry into the operation area complete. Preparing to descend in ten seconds."

The pilot's report came through the speakers as the aircraft shook. Then Huginn heard his superior's quiet voice.

"It's begun."

Michael, now clad in dazzling silver armor, was looking out the window.

A city engulfed in the cries of monsters and towering flames. The battlefield where the name Michael Silbert would once again be etched into the minds of the world.

"Prepare yourself, Huginn."

He pressed a crown-engraved helmet onto his head. Looking like a god of old, he spoke to his crow once more.

"Prepare to become the best—beyond anyone's doubt."

The wait had been long. The pain had been deep.

Now he wanted to paint his name across this many-colored world. Not Cheon Taemin's. Not Jin Taekyung's.

Michael Silbert's.

Humanity ruled five oceans and six continents. It had named every living thing it knew, past and present.

Rabbits. Dogs. Cats. Horses. Dinosaurs…

But there were exceptions.

Some beings passed down from the distant past possessed forms beyond humanity's ability to comprehend and overwhelming power. It was difficult to explain them as anything else.

One such being was now bringing disaster upon humanity.

Goooooong.

A low cry reverberated in every direction.

Beneath deep waters filled with countless pieces of wreckage and mixed with blood, a gigantic mythical beast advanced with the waves, smashing and sweeping away everything that stood in its path.

Craaaack!

Some called it a crocodile. Others compared it to a whale.

In the end, humanity could find no way to define it. It was too enormous to be treated as a mere animal, and it possessed a mysterious power no one could explain.

So they called it a monster beyond explanation. Over the centuries, it acquired a name that meant this creature and no other.

Far away, amid human screams, that name rang out.

"Le—Leviathan!"

"This is an order! All B-rank Hunters and below, leave the battlefield immedia—"

WHOOOOOOM!

The shouts and screams vanished. A wave of overwhelming force swallowed and shattered everything in its path.

People. Buildings. Even the pitiful defensive Magic.

Grrrrr.

Leviathan let out a satisfied growl as waves dozens of meters[3083] high swept through the surrounding area.

It had been so long since it had awakened from that tiresome sleep. So long since it had rampaged to its heart's content.

Yes. That was the last time.

Leviathan remembered its master.

The Demon King Asmodeus.

The absolute ruler who had united the chaotic Demon Realm and brought every monster to heel.

[3083] Dozens of meters is roughly 20–90 m, or about 66–300 ft.

Yet even Asmodeus had fallen to human hands. Leviathan had retreated into the deep sea and gone to sleep.

With its master gone, it could no longer obtain the vast quantities of magical power and food it once had. To survive until the day he returned, it had needed to conserve its strength.

And the wait had not been in vain.

It's changed. Nothing like it was when the Demon King was here, but it has changed.

Leviathan had still been uncertain when it awoke and crossed the ocean. The closer it came to this place, though, the more clearly it sensed the abundant magical power permeating the water, the land, the air.

And what, exactly, had awakened it.

…!

Leviathan's enormous eyes flashed.

In the deep waters that had become part of the sea, a powerful energy reached it from among countless pieces of wreckage and human corpses.

That's…

There was no mistaking it. The appetizing scent of a Magic Gem—the source of a monster's power.

One untouched by human hands, still holding all its original energy. A mass of pure magical power.

An excellent source of food, more than enough to replenish the strength it had expended, had been waiting for Leviathan in the human settlement.

So that's why.

Leviathan understood what had awakened it. The magical power now permeating the world, combined with something containing energy of that magnitude, had been enough.

Leviathan was the calamity and ruler of the sea. Starved by its long sleep, its body had responded to the pulse of power carried through the seawater.

If I can make that magical power mine…

Greed filled Leviathan's eyes. A feast lay before it. Why refuse?

Whoooooosh.

Leviathan surged forward.

The water grew shallower as it advanced toward its prey, exposing part of its back. The beast did not hesitate.

It had already assessed the situation. The humans in its path were weak, and all around it surged seawater that obeyed its will.

"It's coming!"

"Lightning mages, prepare!"

"Ranged units, fire!"

Fwish-fwish-fwish! Crackle!

Countless arrows and lightning spells streaked through the air. The hastily assembled Hunters poured every ounce of strength into their volley.

The result was dismal.

BOOM-BOOM-BOOM!

The explosions cleared. The Hunters stared.

“What the…?”

A little scorching. Dozens of wounds.

No. Scratches.

That was the full extent of the damage they had inflicted on the monster before them. And the price that returned moments later was harsh.

Whoooosh—BOOM!

An enormous tail broke the surface and struck the water.

The tanks at the front clenched their teeth as a wave rose with a thunderous roar. They planted their half-submerged legs and layered their Tower Shields into a wall.

Clack-clack-clack!

Their movements were vigorous and as fast as lightning.

Fewer than a hundred Hunters remained, but every one of them was at least B-rank. They were seasoned fighters. They knew their duty.

“Formaaaaation!”

“Don’t fall back! Hold!”

“Protect us from the enemy, Great Shield!”

The tanks’ desperate shouts mingled with the mages’ incantations.

Then Leviathan spoke in a Demon Realm language none of them understood.

“Get lost.”

The enormous wave rising around it surged forward and split.

Splaash!

One wave became dozens. Dozens became hundreds of streams. Charged with powerful magical power, they took the shape of spears and fell upon the Hunters.

KABOOOOOM!

A shock wave arrived with a thunderous roar and shook everything around them.

Hundreds of spears made of water and magical power tore through the layered defensive Magic and crushed the Tower Shields standing before them like an iron wall.

Crack! Thunk-thunk-thunk!

“Urgh…!”

The water spears swallowed even the screams as they smashed armor and cut through flesh and bone.

The streams ran red with blood. As Hunters crumpled beneath them, a fierce wind swept overhead.

Tat-tat-tat-tat-tat!

Propellers churned.

Dozens of unmanned fighter jets broke through the storm and immediately opened fire with their guns and missiles.

Destroy Leviathan?

No one dreamed of it.

Their only goal was to hold the monster up, however briefly, until the main force capable of fighting it arrived.

But contrary to the hopes of those watching the scene from the operations control room, Leviathan's power and authority were simply too overwhelming.

Gooooooong.

The ancient beast that commanded tidal waves and storms roared. Lightning fell from the cloud-choked sky and swept through the unmanned jets.

Rrrrrumble—BOOM!

They crashed. Exploded. Sank.

At the center of the calamity, Leviathan drove its enormous body onward.

Its long sleep and the considerable magical power it had spent had left it slightly tired. None of that mattered.

That mass of magical power was drawing closer by the moment. Its scent was so appetizing it nearly overwhelmed Leviathan's reason.

With it, Leviathan could regain its former strength. Cover this land with a tidal wave and claim it for its own.

Grrrrraaaah.

At last, with its prey before it, Leviathan opened its jaws wide.

Its crocodile-like maw swept toward the corpses and wreckage submerged in the deep water—and the mass of magical power hidden somewhere among them—to swallow everything in one bite.

It would have.

If not for a streak of light that descended onto the rippling surface of the water.

Fwooooooosh! Craaaack!

Blue-white light-flames, burning with tremendous heat, consumed the wave.

Chapter 749

Leviathan was both the calamity and the king of the sea.

That was true in the Demon Realm and on Earth alike.

The sea was Leviathan's birthplace, a battlefield where it had never known defeat. Within that vast territory, granted to it at birth, nothing could escape the king's watch.

Or so it should have been.

Fwooooooosh!

In an instant, the monster stopped, its prey before it and greed filling its thoughts. At the same time, Leviathan's senses, numbed by its long starvation, awakened.

What is this?

When had it begun?

As realization struck, the world seemed to slow. Leviathan could see and feel it clearly now.

A mighty force, swift as lightning and carrying the heat of the sun.

The flames plunging down and swallowing the blue surface were headed straight for it.

Splaaash!

There was no time to hesitate.

The enormous maw it had opened to swallow its prey turned sharply underwater. An instant later, Leviathan bit down on the flames with hundreds of teeth imbued with magical power.

It had no doubt it would crush them.

Krrrk!

Then flame met teeth, and an impact strong enough to rattle its skull struck.

Krrrrrrk!

"…!"

What?

Leviathan's enormous eyes widened in pain and shock.

The teeth that had sunk dozens of aircraft carriers during the Great Cataclysm—those sharp, destructive weapons—had shattered in a single blow.

How? How is this possible?

Leviathan froze, unable to make sense of it.

Then the countless bubbles stirred up by the collision scattered, revealing the cause.

A spear.

Gooooong.

The silver spear trembled, wreathed in flames that refused to go out even amid the water and waves.

As though it were alive. As though it liked the touch of the hand holding it.

And through the owner of that spear flowed the blood of a species Leviathan had killed countless times.

“How can a mere human…!”

At the cry of the mythical beast, filled with undisguised astonishment, the small and insignificant human answered by merely moving his lips.

One Annihilation.

A distant flash of light dyed the sea.

People often say that life comes down to one big shot.

I agree. Especially since going for that one shot can be exactly how you throw your life away.

Rrrrrumble!

A thunderous roar, as if the sky—or rather, the sea—were splitting apart.

A tremendous shock wave sent my spent body flying. Swept up in a swirling current, I heard warnings sound again and again as my vision faded.

Beep. Beep-beep!

SYSTEM

You have exhausted all your internal energy and stamina!
Your body cannot withstand the recoil of One Annihilation!
Status abnormality, Internal Energy Depletion, has been applied!
Status abnormality, Exhaustion, has been applied!
Status abnormality, Anemia, has been applied!
Status abnormality, Muscle Tear, has been applied!
Status abnormality, Internal Injury, has been applied!
Warning! Warning! Remember that every action comes with a price!
Excessive use of power may turn into a blade against you.
Special debuff, Broken Body, has been applied!
All combat-related attributes decrease by 50 until recovery! Depending on how recovery goes, you may permanently lose some attributes!
Strength temporarily decreases by 50!
Agility...

.

.

.

High risk, high return.

That was exactly it.

As I grew stronger, the power of One Annihilation had risen exponentially—until even this nearly perfect body, one that people in Murim might mistake for a Heavenly Martial Physique, could no longer withstand it.

Damn it.

I was dizzy. My breathing was ragged.

My body had gone beyond exhaustion and was screaming in agony. My dantian, dry as a desert, begged me to stop.

The backlash was so severe I could not move a finger.

But if I had not anticipated a situation like this, I would never have attempted something as insane as firing One Annihilation in the first place.

Open Inventory. Summon.

The System responded to my thought. A silhouette appeared in my blurred vision, and someone's curt voice rang inside my head.

"You look awful. It suits you perfectly."

I never thought I would be so glad to hear that rude tone.

Seeing me grin despite the pain, the Skeleton King clicked his tongue and shoved a small crystal bottle into my mouth.

A solution available only in this world.

A treasure known as a Top-Grade Potion.

Gulp.

The moment I managed to swallow it, a refreshing energy spread through every part of my body.

Ding!

SYSTEM

You have used Top-Grade Potion!
All status abnormalities have been removed!

My empty dantian filled to the brim. My torn muscles knitted back together, and my hazy vision became clear and sharp.

Healing power on par with a Level Up.

But the warning that followed caught even me off guard.

Beep!

SYSTEM

The special debuff, Broken Body, rejects the effect!
This debuff cannot be removed by artificial means!
The effects of Broken Body remain active!

...What the hell?

For a moment, I was thrown by something I had never experienced before. But I had no time to work out what the warning meant.

The fight was not over.

Grrrrrrrrrrr!

A roar rang out, clear even underwater.

Leviathan's enormous body writhed in pain. Not even the countless wrecks and corpses sunk deep beneath the sea could conceal it.

KABOOOOOM!

It was some distance away, but I could see how badly it had been hurt.

The maw said to have once torn an aircraft carrier apart in a single bite had been ripped halfway off, along with one eye. Green blood poured from its flank, where hide and bone had been stripped away, staining the water for hundreds of meters[3084] around it.

Even so, the monster had been incredibly lucky.

If it had not instinctively turned its head at the last moment—and if this had been land instead of underwater—it would have met its end long ago.

I should have finished it with one strike.

A shame, but there was nothing I could do about it.

My opponent was Leviathan, the calamity of the sea.

They say even a mutt has the advantage in its own yard. Fighting a creature born in the sea, one that had ruled it ever since, was several times harder underwater than fighting the Arch Lich.

But…

I'll kill it. I have to.

Splaaaaash!

The Skeleton King and I shot forward together. The powerful current in our path did nothing to slow us.

I tightened my webbed hand around the spear shaft. The transparent webbing was an effect of the Water Rescue Worker Title I had earned by completing a Quest at Dongting Lake a few months ago.

It lasted only twenty-four hours each time I activated it. Worse, its clash with the Scorching Yang Qi I had learned reduced all my power by a full twenty percent. But the effect was worth the cost.

Fwooooooosh!

I moved as quickly as though I were using a movement technique on land.

Still howling in pain, Leviathan spotted us closing in and roared.

"GRAAAAAAAH!"

The instant it opened its half-torn maw as wide as it could—

Krrrk. Krrrrrk!

The flow of the water changed. Though there was not a breath of wind underwater, everything around us was sucked toward its maw as if caught in a tornado.

It was a scene worthy of a disaster.

But I did not stop. I planted a foot on a nearby piece of wreckage and kicked off, picking up speed.

Toward the mythical monster. Toward the immense magical power stirring within it.

Then—

[3084] Hundreds of meters is roughly hundreds to a few thousand feet; 200–900 m is about 660–3,000 ft.

Gooooong.

The water and wreckage gathering around Leviathan burst outward in a massive wave.

KRAAAAAAAASH!

Was this what the Breath of the Dragons that once existed felt like?

The wave, charged with tremendous magical power, shot forward and erased everything in its path.

“You treacherous human!”

The Skeleton King shouted urgently behind me.

I did not answer. Instead, I drew on the internal energy filling my lower dantian and set an undying flame in the blade of White Flame.

Sssssss!

Heat spread in every direction. The raging current and pressure seemed to melt away. An energy like molten lava took the place of the sea’s chill.

For this moment, at least, this space belonged to me alone.

Nothing else could intrude.

Cut.

With that single thought, I brought the spearhead down.

Blue-white flames stretched out like a snake and struck the enormous wave just before it hit me.

No. They cut it.

Shhk!

The wave split cleanly in half and scattered to either side.

In that instant, I saw Leviathan’s eye widen in shock.

Then I saw its enormous body swimming at unbelievable speed toward something in the distance—something giving off a chilling energy.

The Magic Gem!

Now I understood why the monster had suddenly reappeared after decades in hiding. What had drawn it to these islands.

“Stop it!”

The Skeleton King reached out a hand with a shout that sounded almost like a scream. Bones rose upward like a growing tree and forcefully pushed against the tips of my feet.

Bang!

A dull boom sounded as I shot forward, cutting through the current toward Leviathan.

GRAAAAAH! KRRRUNCH!

Its crocodile-like maw swallowed a massive tangle of wreckage: steel beams from what had once been a cargo ship, concrete from a collapsed building, and something tiny by comparison that held an energy more dangerous than any of it.

Crunch.

Leviathan chewed and swallowed everything in one bite, then turned its head.

Fear and mockery mingled in its eye as it watched me approach. Then it swam away faster than I had ever seen it move.

Not toward me or the Skeleton King. Toward the open sea it had come from.

"It'll take time to absorb the energy! Kill it before then!"

I heard the Skeleton King's shout and gripped White Flame in reverse.

Barely a hundred meters[3085] separated us. But no matter how effective the Water Rescue Worker Title was, I could not match Leviathan's speed.

Once. Just once.

I gathered every bit of internal energy I had left and poured it into the spearhead.

This time… I'll finish it.

I focused. I felt the flow of the water and steadied my breathing. Every nerve and muscle seemed to come alive, the force of them gathering in my fingertips and shoulder.

Krrrrrk.

The veins across my body stood out.

Then, like releasing a bowstring drawn taut, I hurled the spear with all my strength.

KRAAAAAAAASH!

A single line of flame streaked through the deep water.

But no scream from the monster followed.

[3085] A hundred meters is about 330 ft.

Chapter 750

Deep beneath the sea.

Countless wrecks and corpses darkened the water until it was impossible to see an inch ahead. Then blue-white flames erupted.

Fwoosh! KRAAAAAASH!

The current split, and the water vaporized.

The flames carried an energy that defied the laws of nature. No—a spear shot forward like a ray of light.

Toward the enormous shadow moving at an unbelievable speed.

Toward a calamity that could never be allowed to live.

But the mythical monster defied the laws of nature just as surely as the energy in the spear did.

KRRRRRUMBLE!

The sea shook.

At the same time, large and small whirlpools of water surged up from the depths and blocked the spearhead as it raced forward.

KOOOOONG!

The collision sent waves of force spreading outward, one after another.

By the time the shock and thunderous roar that had shaken the world had subsided, the flames that had pulverized every obstacle in their path were also fading away, having exhausted their strength.

The spear had failed to reach the monster before its body vanished into the darkness far ahead.

Swish. Clack.

The sea had already grown quiet.

Someone caught the spear as it drifted helplessly with the current.

The man stood with his back to me, staring silently in the direction the monster had gone. He seemed ready to erupt like an active volcano.

No. Let me correct that.

He didn’t merely seem ready to erupt. One touch, and he would explode.

He’d been that way when the monster he could never allow to live had escaped.

And he was that way now.

“Enough.”

The instant the sharp voice slipped from my lips without my realizing it—

Flash.

A vivid green light spread through the water, and everything around me melted away.

The sea, dark as night. The enormous wreckage of high-rise buildings. Even the nameless corpses that had died with their eyes wide open.

In place of the vanished hologram, several dozen unfamiliar faces came into view.

Men in military uniforms and expensive-looking tailored suits.

The old man seated opposite me, at the head of the table, spoke with a grave expression.

“Good heavens. To think Leviathan got away.”

It was the first time I had seen his face, but according to Team Leader Choi, that old man was one of the three most powerful people in Japan.

No—if you counted the authority he actually wielded, he might be number one.

The position of Defense Minister was an immensely powerful one even in peacetime. In a situation like this, with the country at war, he possessed more power than anyone.

But looking at the old Defense Minister put me in a foul mood.

To be honest, I wanted to deal with that damned old man before Leviathan, who wasn’t even here.

Why? Simple.

An hour ago, he’d eliminated our last chance to catch it.

Now that I knew what had happened, I wasn’t about to be polite.

“Yeah. Shame it got away. If someone had helped at the end, we might have caught it.”

“…!”

The conference room went still. While the other Japanese men glanced nervously at one another, the Defense Minister fixed me with an offended stare.

“That sounds as though you’re blaming Japan. Or have my old ears misheard you?”

“I heard you were over eighty, but you’re still in good shape. Your hearing’s pretty sharp for an old man.”

“What?”

“Have your ears actually gotten worse? You already heard me, so why do you keep asking?”

“How dare—!”

Bang!

The Defense Minister slammed the table and turned to Team Leader Choi.

“Are you going to stand there and allow this insolence?”

Normally, Team Leader Choi would have given me a warning look by now.

Normally.

“By ‘insolence,‘ Defense Minister, do you mean striking the table during a meeting like this?”

"What?"

"Japan formally requested assistance through the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. We answered that request and risked our lives to come here. And yet…"

Team Leader Choi's words cut off, and his gaze turned cold.

"Why did you not deploy additional forces?"

"…"

"As I understand it, at the exact moment Jin Taekyung attacked Leviathan, at least two thousand Hunters had been mobilized. The Ground and Air Self-Defense Forces were also standing by."

"That was…"

"I know most of them would not have been much help in a fight. But if you had deployed Japan's Hunters, even then, they could have slowed Leviathan's escape for a little while."

Team Leader Choi's words were clear and precise. They were also entirely true.

That little while was exactly what I'd needed.

A bit of support—and sacrifice—to distract the wounded monster and delay it as it dragged itself away.

Instead, after risking my life to go down into that deep water, I'd had to watch its back grow smaller in the distance.

Team Leader Choi and the roughly two hundred Hunters who'd disembarked from the aircraft and were preparing to enter had been forced to watch it escape, too.

"I could no longer stand by, so I tried to lead the Hunters in myself. Your side stopped us. You even invoked your authority over field operations."

"…!"

"If you wanted to keep your own losses down and claim the credit, you should have done the job properly. Then we wouldn't be in this situation."

The Defense Minister clenched his lips tightly before speaking.

"The encirclement… The encirclement was perfect."

The Skeleton King looked at me with genuine curiosity.

"If it was perfect, shouldn't Leviathan have failed to break through?"

"Yeah. It should have."

"But it broke through?"

"Yep."

"And you lost track of it because of the magical power it released?"

"Yep."

Having listened to all my helpful answers, the Skeleton King muttered, "What? Are they fucking idiots…?"

"…!"

"…!"

With that single statement striking the truth with perfect accuracy, the temperature inside the conference room dropped below freezing.

But watching everyone fall silent and glance nervously around gave me no satisfaction at all.

Fucking lunatics.

Those bugs were worse than monsters, and they were sitting there calling themselves the operation's command staff. I couldn't even laugh.

It's not like I can say "fuck this" and quit.

The number of casualties confirmed so far was roughly one hundred thousand.

It was only that low because, by some stroke of luck, the tsunami Leviathan had caused had stopped around the outskirts of Tokyo.

If it returned after I left, Tokyo would be renamed Atlantis.

And if it gives up on Japan and goes after somewhere else…

That would be a problem too.

Of course, the idiots here—including that old monkey chief—would probably dance for joy because they'd survived.

"…"

The worst part was, they really would.

After letting out a hundred-percent pure, deep sigh, I spoke to the Defense Minister, who had become completely silent.

"Enough. Get me someone else in charge."

"S-someone else?"

"The Prime Minister. Or the King of Japan. Whoever it is, they'll be better than you."

"The King of Japan? How dare you speak of His Majesty the Emperor of the Great Japanese Empire—"

"Oh, give me a break. How long are you going to keep up the empire crap? Your empire got flattened by two atomic bombs. You should've given up the title of Emperor while you were at it."

"That was a savage and barbaric act of destruction by those American Yankees!"

I plugged my ears as the Defense Minister shrieked.

"I think I'm going to get radiation poisoning. I think I'm going to get radiation poisoning. I think I'm going to get radiation poisoning. I think I'm going to get radiation poisoning."

"Chikshō!"[3086]

Maybe he'd lived long enough not to care. Or maybe radiation contamination had robbed him of all fear.

[3086] Japanese chikushō is an exclamation meaning "damn it."

Just as the Defense Minister was rampaging and charging at me with his old body, the Skeleton King reached out and seized him by the back of the neck.

“Stop, you old and insignificant hu—no, Yellow Monkey.”

“You wretch! Release me at once! How dare a fur-covered Yankee lay a hand on the Defense Minister of the Great Japanese Empire!”

“You dare insult the great United States in front of me?”

“I have not forgotten the terrible things you bastards did to this land and its innocent subjects of the Imperial State!”

Vengeful spirits of Pearl Harbor, descend upon me!

These fucking lunatics…

A Japanese imperialist from the ‘70s-and-’80s generation arguing with an American monster from the Demon Realm.

Watching those horrifying hybrids with my own two eyes made my chest swell with emotion despite itself, but it was not over yet.

Fwooooooosh.

“…?”

What the hell?

A chill ran through me, and the fluorescent lights began to dim.

Even the people struggling to separate the Defense Minister and the Skeleton King shuddered in the cold.

What the hell is happening all of a sudden?

I turned my head. My eyes met Team Leader Choi’s across the room.

That was when I realized it. My mouth fell open.

A shout from moments earlier rang through my ears again.

Vengeful spirits of Pearl Harbor, descend upon me!

No. Fuck. Don’t tell me…

Whooooooosh! KRAAASH!

The eerie energy became a gale, shattering the fluorescent lights overhead.

I was already running through the sudden darkness toward someone.

“Look closely, and feel their resentment—!”

“Hey, you crazy bastard!”

Crack!

Thank goodness.

Thanks to a time-honored promotion system that still valued family and connections over ability in the twenty-first century, most of the high-ranking officials and generals in the conference room were ordinary people. They were too frightened even to hear the Skeleton King's shout.

And apparently my demand for someone in charge had gotten through. Before long, the manager—no, the Prime Minister—arrived.

"You came all this way to help our country! I am most grateful, Jinsang!"[3087]

"Ah, yes. Nice to meet you, Prime Minister Koizumi."

I had never imagined I would live to see the day I met this man in person.

I'd only ever seen collections of his quotes online. Seeing him now gave me a brief jolt of excitement, like I'd met a celebrity.

Of course, this wasn't the time to show it. We needed to deal with Leviathan.

At least, that was what I wanted to do.

I did.

"I'll get straight to the point. To track Leviathan—"

"I hear the Defense Minister was rude to you, Jinsang.[3088] Once this is over, I shall reprimand him severely, if only to ease your hurt feelings!"

"Uh. Thanks. I appreciate it."

"Why the look, Jinsang?"[3089]

"No, it's just… We also need to discuss Leviathan. And the way you keep addressing me is a little…"

"The way I address you, Jinsang?"[3090]

"…"

"Ah, I see. It must sound like something else in Korean. Then shall I call you Gyeongsang,[3091] using the last syllable of your name?"

There was no way that would work.

I'd dodged a pile of shit only to get pissed on.

Is he wishing me a minor injury next time I fight Leviathan…?

I weighed Jinsang[3092] against Gyeongsang,[3093] then sighed.

Well, at least it isn't Severe Injury.

[3087] Japanese Jin-san combines a name with the polite honorific -san. It sounds like Korean jinsang, meaning an obnoxious or troublesome person.

[3088] Japanese Jin-san combines a name with the polite honorific -san. It sounds like Korean jinsang, meaning an obnoxious or troublesome person.

[3089] Japanese Jin-san combines a name with the polite honorific -san. It sounds like Korean jinsang, meaning an obnoxious or troublesome person.

[3090] Japanese Jin-san combines a name with the polite honorific -san. It sounds like Korean jinsang, meaning an obnoxious or troublesome person.

[3091] Korean gyeongsang means "minor injury"; jungsang means "severe injury."

[3092] Japanese Jin-san combines a name with the polite honorific -san. It sounds like Korean jinsang, meaning an obnoxious or troublesome person.

[3093] Korean gyeongsang means "minor injury"; jungsang means "severe injury."

Chapter 751

Unlike the lunatic imperialist serving as Defense Minister, Japan's prime minister proved surprisingly easy to reason with.

"I cannot remove the Defense Minister immediately, but I will grant you and the other Koreans independent operational authority, Jinsang[3094]."

"Please also guarantee us supplies and military support through the Defense Ministry," Team Leader Choi said, polite but firm. "We came at your country's request to cooperate, not to be sacrificed."

The prime minister nodded. "Agreed. I shall do everything within my power."

If it were up to me, I'd dunk the idiots at the Defense Ministry in a radioactive hot spring. Even that wouldn't be enough.

But what could we do? The damage was done. We had to make the best of what we had.

"How, though, do you intend to deal with a monster that has already escaped?" the prime minister asked.

"I have a way."

The answer came out of nowhere. The Skeleton King was staring at the prime minister with his usual arrogant glare. I made a throat-cutting gesture at him, and he flinched.

"I have a way, yo," he corrected himself.

That was a form of polite speech found in no family tree, but the prime minister—already famous for his collection of memorable quotes—didn't seem to mind. If anything, he looked pleased.

"Ah, Stomu-King. I have heard much about you."

"Me? I mean… me, sir?"

"Of course. I knew of you even before this incident, when you helped suppress several mutation Gates in Korea."

The Skeleton King had been known here and there among the public even before the vigilante incident came to light. The appearance of a previously unknown top-tier Hunter had briefly drawn attention, but the story was soon buried.

Magic Johnson had done a thorough job of laundering his identity. Besides, the truth was so ridiculous that no one had suspected he might be a monster.

…Actually, I just took so much shit that nobody paid attention to him.

"It is a pleasure to meet you at last, Stomu-King."

The Skeleton King had been looking rather proud that a country's prime minister knew who he was. Now his brow furrowed.

[3094] Japanese -san is a polite honorific. Korean jinsang means an obnoxious or difficult person; the similar sounds allow the address to become an insult.

“The pleasure is mine. But I am—no, my name is Stone King.”

“Yes, that is what I am calling you. Stomu-King.”

“I said Stone King. Here, repeat after me slowly. S. Tone. King.”

“S. Tone. King.”

“Now a little longer. Stone. King.”

“Stone. King.”

“Excellent! Now put it together.”

“Stomu-King.”

“Good heavens. I’m going to lose my mind. I can’t believe this! What is wrong with your tongue?”

The cursed archipelago’s pronunciation system had met Demon Realm mangled-speech in a collaboration for the ages.

Team Leader Choi squeezed his eyes shut. Unable to watch any more, I stepped in.

“Enough. Stone King, Stomu-King, stalking—what difference does it make?”

“It makes a tremendous difference, you Jinsang[3095] bastard!”

“More difference than the crack I’m about to put in your skull?”

“Hmm. On second thought, perhaps not.”

“See?”

“Of course. Call me whatever you like. That can be my name.”

“Good attitude, Fucking. Now tell us how to track Leviathan.”

The Skeleton King muttered a curse at his new name, then spoke.

“First, your premise is wrong. We shouldn’t track Leviathan. We need to lure it as close to land as we can.”

“Lure it?”

“Yes. The sea is entirely its territory. Try to follow it with some half-baked scheme, and we may lose it for good.”

“You mean…”

“It was too badly wounded to flee far. Leviathan can’t have gone far yet.”

Team Leader Choi raised a question. “Although Leviathan suffered a heavy blow thanks to Mr. Jin Taekyung, I understand that it obtained an unrefined S-rank Magic Gem. Wouldn’t that be enough for it to recover from its wounds and then some?”

“Heal?”

The Skeleton King gave a quiet snort.

[3095] Japanese -san is a polite honorific. Korean jinsang means an obnoxious or difficult person; the similar sounds allow the address to become an insult.

“Leviathan could absorb all the magical power in that gem, however much it holds. But even once it makes that power its own, completely healing its injuries is another matter.”

“Hmm.”

“It would need more magical power to heal wounds like those. By now, it must have realized that too.”

The assessment from an actual monster was persuasive.

On top of that, One Annihilation was a killing blow powerful enough to wreck even its caster’s body.

True to its name, Leviathan had twisted its body at the last moment, but those were not wounds that could heal in a short time.

Lure it. Lure it, huh.

I turned the word over in my mind. “It sized up the situation, took exactly what it wanted, and ran. Would something that cunning fall for a trap?”

The answer was simple.

“It will, if the conditions are right.”

“So we set a trap it has no choice but to enter, even knowing it’s a trap?”

“Think of Leviathan as a hungry, wounded beast. Hunger brought it here in the first place.”

Team Leader Choi spoke almost with a groan. “We’ll need one hell of a lure.”

“Yes. We need bait so delicious that Leviathan will risk its life to charge at it.”

And at this point, there was only one thing that could lure Leviathan in.

“Excuse me, Prime Minister?”

Koizumi had been following the conversation with glazed eyes. He looked up at my gentle tone.

“Ah, yes. Go ahead.”

“Does Japan happen to have a few of those?”

“A few of what?”

“Don’t play dumb. S-rank Magic Gems.”

“…Eh?”

“Let us borrow them for a bit.”

“…Ehhh?”

“Why so surprised? We’ll catch Leviathan and give them back. Promise.”

I held out my pinkie to the wide-eyed prime minister.

We’ll win one and pay it back. Win it.

In the modern world, S-rank Magic Gems were treasures of tremendous value.

Before even considering that they were the finest energy source capable of powering an entire metropolis, there were only around a hundred of them in the entire world. Their rarity alone was astonishing.

Perhaps that was why the Japanese prime minister, despite promising his full cooperation, had initially been horrified. Of course, in the end, he had no choice but to hand them over, even if it was against his will.

"Here they are."

Click.

The security Magic disengaged, and a soft velvet box opened. Inside lay two Magic Gems, shedding brilliant light.

"Hmm. Only two?"

The prime minister saw my expression and answered in a rush. "These are all the S-rank Magic Gems the Japanese government owns."

"Really?"

"Not a word of a lie! Do you know how hard I had to work to persuade the cabinet and His Majesty the Emperor?"

"If I search the place and find more, that's one S-rank Magic Gem for every—"

"…Mr. Jin Taekyung?" Team Leader Choi said.

"Oh. Sorry. Force of habit."

Habits are scary.

At Team Leader Choi's intervention, I scratched the back of my head. The Japanese prime minister, who had been edging backward for a while now, hurriedly slipped out of the room, repeatedly begging us to return the Magic Gems safely.

But once he was gone, the mood in the room was rather lukewarm.

"Hmm. Two…"

"Not quite enough."

"I agree," the Skeleton King said. "They still hold a considerable amount of magical power, but not enough to lure Leviathan."

The number of S-rank Magic Gems didn't matter. What mattered was the amount and quality of the magical power left in them.

Normally, they should obviously have been refined… but this time, we have a different use for them.

We had two S-rank Magic Gems in front of us. What we needed was bait—something Leviathan would rush for even if it knew there was a trap.

A massive mass of pure magical power, like the one it had taken.

Even if we use both of these together as bait, they still won't come close to an unrefined Magic Gem.

I wasn't alone in thinking it. As we exchanged looks, the Skeleton King spoke up.

“No matter how I think about it, these will not be enough. What about bringing more?”

“Bring more from where…? Oh.”

I remembered Area A, hidden inside Ares Guild headquarters. The place had held staggering amounts of cash, artwork, and Magic Gems—including five S-rank Magic Gems.

“But those were refined too.”

“That… is true.”

The Skeleton King smacked his lips. “Still, better than nothing. Is there no way to get them?”

They were better than nothing, but adding five more wouldn’t change much. The more thoroughly a Magic Gem was refined, the more valuable it became, and the S-rank gems Lee Jungryong and Go Jun had stashed in Area A were top of the line.

There was another problem: the owner had the final say.

“They were probably acquired through illegal channels to begin with,” Team Leader Choi said. “If word gets out, the media will have a field day.”

Especially now. It’d turn into a fucking shitshow. Camera-toting hyenas were everywhere, ready to pounce at the first opening.

The Skeleton King thought for a moment. “Then what about gathering unrefined Magic Gems? If we collect everything coming out of the nearby Gates and bring it here—”

I beamed and patted his shoulder.

“Congratulations. You’ve been sentenced to life in prison for violating international law.”

“Goddamn it!”

“Welcome to the bright and cheerful twenty-first century. It’s surprisingly fucking hard to live here.”

Crack.

The Skeleton King ground his teeth. “Then we have no choice. We use those gems as bait, or we assemble a raid team from our strongest fighters, track Leviathan down, and kill it ourselves.”

“Wow, what a time to be alive. A monster suggesting a raid against another monster.”

“What else can we do?”

What else, huh?

I exchanged a covert glance with Team Leader Choi. Then, watching the Skeleton King’s temper, I spoke carefully.

“I didn’t say there was no other way.”

“What?”

“There is one.”

His face lit up. “What is it?”

“Before I tell you, you need to know something. If we form a raid team… you’re sitting this one out.”

“Leaving me out? What are you talking about?”

It must have been more unexpected than he could have imagined. I continued as he stared at me with perfectly round eyes.

“I can’t help it. Too many people are watching us right now.”

He wasn’t stupid. His face hardened as he caught my meaning.

“You’re leaving me out of the fight with Leviathan because my power might give me away?”

“You got it.”

“Have you lost your mind? How can you say that now?”

Bang! Crunch!

His fist came down, shattering the table. Suddenly he was right in front of me, his eyes full of anger and disappointment.

“You treacherous human. I was wrong about you. How could you say such a thing at a time like this?”

“What does it matter? You’re a monster.”

“…What?”

“Even if we catch Leviathan, once your identity is revealed, you’re finished. I’m only trying to avoid that.”

Wood crackle.

Bones shifted in his clenched fist. He stared at me in disbelief, then cried out as if the words were blood he had to spit up.

“I don’t care! If I can save them, I’ll do anything! Leviathan caused this disaster, and—”

“Anything?”

“Huh?”

Got you. Hooked.

I looked at the Skeleton King with a satisfied smile.

“You said you’d do anything. Right?”

Chapter 752

Leviathan.

The nightmare of the sea had slowly faded from memory. News of its return drew more attention worldwide than any of the other Monster Waves that day.

[Breaking News: Leviathan Appears—Disaster Descends on Japan]

[The Star of Asia, Jin Taekyung, Saves Japan Despite the Suspicions Surrounding Him; Wounded Leviathan Disappears]

[Anonymous Senior Japanese Official: “We Had a Real Chance to Kill Leviathan—If the Defense Minister Hadn’t Suddenly Shit Himself.” Complacency at Japan’s Defense Ministry?]

[Casualties Confirmed So Far Reach 100,000. The Archipelago in Crisis.]

[Japanese Defense Minister Fujiwara: “I Will Risk My Life to Protect the Imperial Subjects—No, the Citizens.” The True Feelings of an Imperialist Who Can’t Keep Up with the Times?]

[Japanese Defense Minister Fujiwara Leaves the Press Conference as Though Fleeing (Photo)]

[Japanese Prime Minister Vows: “We Will Kill That Monster Within Three Days and Show the Archipelago’s Strength.” Asked How by a Foreign Reporter, He Smiles Faintly: “We Will Succeed. That Is My Promise.”]

[Japanese Netizens Speak as One: “Please, Someone Shut the Prime Minister’s Mouth.”]

[The Young Hero from the Peninsula Who Saved the Archipelago. But Light and Shadow Surround Him.]

[Chinese Chairman Xiao Yang: “Mr. Jin Is a True Hero. Only Cowardly, Narrow-Minded Petty Men Would Insult Him.”]

[Operator of China’s Biggest Anti–Jin Taekyung Website Arrested by Public Security. The Charge? Being a Petty Man.]

[Leviathan Disappears Once Again. Terrorist Attacks and Monster Waves Continue.]

[Michael Silbert and Odin Guild Suppress a Third Monster Wave in a Single Day. Praise Pours in from Around the World, Along with Questions About Sky: “Why Hasn’t He Appeared?”]

.

.

.

Tap.

Huginn set down his tablet.

Just as I thought. This isn’t good.

Public opinion was slowly shifting. Japan's Defense Ministry was taking the blame for letting Leviathan escape, and even the outlets that had rushed to attack Jin Taekyung were quietly changing their tune.

What if Jin Taekyung actually kills Leviathan now?

The damage their media campaign had done to his image could vanish in an instant. That would disrupt the plan they had prepared down to the last detail.

Huginn turned toward his superior. Michael Silbert, his back to him as he made coffee, spoke without looking around.

"The back of my head suddenly feels prickly. Is that just my imagination?"

"…Probably not."

"If you have something to say, say it. Unless it's about Jin Taekyung. Keep that to yourself."

Normally, Huginn would have obeyed. But the battle that had ended only thirty minutes ago still had his blood up, and he couldn't ignore how badly things seemed to be turning in Japan.

"Have you not heard the news?"

Michael gave a quiet laugh at the frustration in Huginn's voice and lifted his coffee cup.

"Huginn, my friend. Do you think you know something I don't?"

"Then why—"

"The coffee smells especially good today. Shall I make you a cup?"

"…Guild Master, if Jin Taekyung kills Leviathan, we'll have trouble afterward."

Click.

Michael set down his cup and leaned back against the leather sofa.

The inside of the tent, enchanted with spatial expansion, was as luxurious as a suite in a seven-star hotel. Michael seemed so relaxed that it was hard to believe he had defeated an S-rank monster only moments earlier.

"Huginn, I'll say this once. Listen carefully."

"Yes."

"There's nothing to worry about. All the conditions are in place, and Leviathan won't be so easily killed."

"But…"

"I want Jin Taekyung and Leviathan to give it everything they have. To struggle with all their might to kill each other and stay alive. That's all I want."

"…!"

"Of course, if Jin Taekyung dies in the process, so much the better."

Michael winked at the bewildered Huginn and reached for the cup he had set down.

Click. Splash.

Coffee spilled across the table, steam rising from it.

Huginn, lost in thought, looked up in surprise.

“Are you all right?”

“…”

“Guild Master?”

“Ah.”

Michael’s face had gone rigid as stone. Now it relaxed, and his usual calm expression returned.

“I’m fine. I suppose several hard battles have left me a little tired.”

But Huginn had served at his side for too many years to take that at face value. He glanced at Michael’s trembling fingers.

“You’ve been training too hard these past few months.”

“Have I?”

“Yes. Especially since you learned about Jin Taekyung, you’ve been…”

Huginn trailed off. Michael was watching him. He lowered his head.

“I spoke out of turn.”

A heavy silence fell between them. Michael broke it.

“Is the press conference ready?”

“Yes. They’ve been waiting for an hour.”

“We’ll begin in thirty minutes. We leave as soon as it’s over, so have everything ready by then.”

“Understood, Guild Master.”

Huginn answered without hesitation. He didn’t ask why they were leaving already, or where they were going. He would find out once the preparations were complete.

Another terrorist attack. Another Monster Wave. And somewhere, more glory and fame would be waiting for them.

In this cruelly well-crafted script, Odin Guild was always a step ahead, building a reputation that would never die.

“I’ll return to escort you shortly.”

Huginn bowed and left. Alone, Michael Silbert murmured, “You’re right, Huginn. Perhaps that’s exactly what it is.”

Jin Taekyung.

From the moment Michael had first learned of him, a feeling he couldn’t explain had filled his chest. Hazy as fog, it was impatience.

And anxiety.

An old memory surfaced: himself with nothing but ambition to his name, forced to lie low and stay out of Cheon Taemin’s sight. The humiliation of those days.

But…

“In the end, I’ll be the only one who wins.”

The words slipped from his lips in a low murmur.

Feeling the mighty energy coursing through his body, Michael Silbert was certain the day of his victory was near.

Whooooooosh.

The wind blowing from far away was thick with the smell of salt.

Near the Philippine Sea, close to the Japanese archipelago, a whale surfaced through the rolling water and blinked its enormous eyes.

The sea was strangely quiet today, even to a creature as vast as this one. It had roamed for hours without seeing a whaling ship—or even an ordinary fishing boat.

Pfooout.

The whale sent a spout of water into the air and dove deep again. Hundreds of schooling fish followed it.

Splash.

The creatures that had fallen in together swam on without rest.

Not farther away, but deeper, following a call from somewhere in the dark depths.

Goooong.

Hundreds became thousands, drawn from more and more species. Yet none of the sea creatures following that call sensed anything wrong.

Not even when a vast darkness unlike anything they had seen closed around them like a net.

GRAAAAAH. CRUNCH!

That was the end.

Teeth harder than steel tore the whale and sharks apart. Thousands of fish were sucked in. The monster opened its enormous jaws, chewed and swallowed everything, then savored the taste for a moment.

No. It absorbed every trace of energy and every memory they held.

Whooooooosh.

A dim light rose in the place known as the deep sea. But even after taking in that new energy, the monster’s eyes were full of hunger.

That’s all?

It hadn’t been like this when it roamed the five oceans at its master’s command. From the moment the Demon King Asmodeus descended, the whole world—land and sea alike—had been full of delectable magical power. Even the smallest fish had carried a little of it.

Now everything was different.

Its once-great master was gone. The monster that had ruled every sea in the world had been forced to hide from human eyes in the deep sea once more, gravely wounded.

Hisssss.

Green blood seeped from its unhealed wounds and mingled with the seawater. Leviathan's enormous body shuddered with rage.

How dare… How dare a mere human…

But rage wasn't all it felt.

Fear.

That loathsome feeling, born of an impossibly small human, held the mighty monster captive in the deep sea.

What are you? How can a lowly human possess such power?

Leviathan couldn't understand it.

Over the course of roughly a day, Leviathan had completely absorbed the masses of magical power that humans called S-rank Magic Gems.

It had been certain that the healing power of water, combined with the new magical power, would make any injury vanish without a trace. Yet everything had gone as badly as it could.

The moment I leave the deep sea, the humans will target me. Better to gather as much strength as I can here before I go…

Then its enormous eye stopped roving.

Unfamiliar memories, memories that weren't its own, had flashed through its mind.

What's this?

The question lasted only an instant. The memories of the countless sea creatures it had just swallowed surged into its mind like waves.

Blue sky. A calm sea without a single fishing boat.

And…

What is that?

A small boat bobbed on waters that, only hours ago, had been full of human warships and submarines. The image came from a school of fish that had seen it an hour earlier, near an uninhabited island a few hundred kilometers[3096] away.

Too close. And the sea has gone too quiet.

Leviathan knew at once that the humans had set a trap, and scoffed.

Fools. Do they think they can deceive me—

[3096] A few hundred kilometers is roughly 120–310 mi.

The thought broke off. Leviathan turned its head toward the surface above. All five of its senses sharpened at an alluring scent carried down through the water.

Magical power. An enormous amount of it.

A fierce craving seized its entire body.

If I had that… If I could take that power, greater even than what I absorbed before, these wounds would be nothing.

I could kill the human who humiliated me in an instant.

Muttering as if entranced, Leviathan ground its teeth.

I mustn't be swayed. It's clearly a human trap.

But its resolve soon crumbled.

The memories showed no humans anywhere. Nor did the information reaching it through the water now.

I can't sense the life force unique to humans. In that case…

Leviathan made its decision. It would go willingly into the trap they had prepared.

Splash!

Its enormous body surged upward, cutting through the currents of the deep sea.

Chapter 753

The man looked around.

What wonderful weather. Only a little over twenty hours ago, the sea had been bucking like mad. Now it was calm, and gulls flew in flocks across the clear sky.

Beautiful. Is this nature?

The place where the man had lived was nothing like this. That distant, distant place was always dim and dark as night, with a terrible stench hanging in the air. Of course, for personal reasons, he had never smelled a stench in his life, but there was no doubt the place had reeked.

In any case, the man liked this world.

He could see beautiful scenery he had never seen before. Better yet, he was with some pretty decent people.

"…"

On second thought, he should probably exclude one of them.

No, two.

The man—the Skeleton King—remembered a conversation from a few hours earlier.

"Anything?"

"Huh?"

"You said you'd do anything, right?"

"Huh?"

"My goodness. Such a noble spirit of sacrifice. As battalion commander, I am genuinely moved."

"Spirit of sacrifice? What are you talking about?"

"Shh. Enough. I know. I know how you feel, so stop pretending."

Holy shit…?

Something felt off.

Things were taking a strange turn.

He looked desperately to the other human for help, but the one he had thought was at least somewhat sane turned out to be in on it too.

"Hey, handsome and intelligent human…"

"Please don't speak to me. I'm too overcome to answer right now."

"You son of a bitch…"

"I see you in a new light, Mr. King. Sacrificing yourself for the greater good…"

"I never said I'd sacrifice myself, so why do you keep saying that…?"

"We will never forget your sacrifice. You are a true hero."

"Stop! Why are you coming closer?"

By the time he realized this was more than strange—that he was in danger—it was too late.

Jin Taekyung had blocked the door and was creeping toward him with a bundle of rope.

“I’ll talk to you carefully. I’ll try to find my courage.”

“Don’t sing some weird song! Put down the rope!”

“Starting today, I want to make you my bait.”

“What song has lyrics like that? Don’t rewrite it!”

“Team Leader Choi, why aren’t you grabbing him? Am I the only bad guy here?”

“Ah, my apologies. I was wiping away my tears.”

“Get the hell away from me!”

Splash! Rattle!

A wave rolled in from far away and struck the stern of the little motorboat.

The seawater splashed refreshingly across his face, jolting the Skeleton King out of his thoughts. He muttered,

“…Damn it.”

Naturally, resisting had been pointless.

The humans he had trusted had boxed him in from the front and rear, while Jin Taekyung—the root of all evil—made a solemn declaration like a judge delivering a verdict.

“Don’t make a fuss. Become bait quietly, and there won’t be a boneshed.”

“Isn’t it supposed to be bloodshed?”

“He doesn’t have any blood.”

“Oh.”

“So, what’ll it be?”

What else could he do?

The die had already been cast, and the hustlers had loaded it.

Realizing that he had fallen into the trap before Leviathan, the Skeleton King chose to avoid a boneshed and obediently boarded the little boat.

Along with the two S-rank Magic Gems the Japanese government had provided.

“Get rid of these cumbersome things. The monster will drool over me even without them.”

“No, no. Do you eat samgyeopsal[3097] without ssamjang[3098] and scallion salad?”

“…Is it already decided that Leviathan’s going to eat me?”

“Don’t worry. We’ll save you when it’s time to dip you in the ssamjang[3099].”

“What if it swallows me in one bite?”

[3097] Samgyeopsal is grilled pork belly.

[3098] Ssamjang is a savory Korean dipping paste commonly served with grilled meat.

[3099] Ssamjang is a savory Korean dipping paste commonly served with grilled meat.

"Wow. That would be delicious."

"…You are going to save me, right?"

"I suddenly feel like having some soju.[3100] Don't you, Team Leader Choi?"

"I prefer wine, but soju[3101] definitely goes with samgyeopsal.[3102]"

"You're definitely going to save me… right?"

That was the last thing he heard.

The little boat, carrying one S-rank monster and two S-rank Magic Gems, set off before he received an answer. Following GPS coordinates entered beforehand, it began circling near an uninhabited island several hundred kilometers[3103] away.

It had been circling for an hour now, waiting for the big one hiding somewhere in the deep sea to take the bait.

"You damn humans."

The Skeleton King gazed up at the blue sky and felt his nonexistent heart pounding.

What if the monster really shows up?

He knew exactly how great the difference in strength was between him and Leviathan.

Unlike his former self, who had not even possessed reason, Leviathan had been born a predator, endowed with immense magical power from the start. They were fundamentally different.

Among the S-rank monsters known in the Demon Realm as the "Seventy-Two Legion Commanders," Leviathan had ranked in the top ten.

Though its strength had waned since those days, the fear lodged in the Skeleton King's heart would not go away so easily.

Don't come. Don't come. Please don't come…

The Skeleton King liked this world.

Unlike him, already dead, nature was full of life. Cities were filled with dazzling, wondrous things, and there were human women of breathtaking beauty.

The way certain humans behaved occasionally disgusted him, but most were decent enough. He was even growing used to the word friend, which had seemed so strange at first.

But he had no desire to become nourishment for Leviathan.

He nearly cried at the thought of himself turned into a hearty samgyeopsal[3104] set meal.

You damn humans, please let me live too!

[3100] Soju is a Korean distilled alcoholic drink.
[3101] Soju is a Korean distilled alcoholic drink.
[3102] Samgyeopsal is grilled pork belly.
[3103] Each 100 kilometers is about 62 miles.
[3104] Samgyeopsal is grilled pork belly.

The fact that he could not even shout for fear of attracting Leviathan made him more miserable still. But it was far too late to turn back.

The Skeleton King touched the ssamjang[3105] and scallion salad hanging around his neck.

No—the two S-rank Magic Gems.

He glared at the sea.

Right. You only die once, not twice.

Repeating that phrase humans liked to use, he felt courage well up from somewhere inside him.

Besides, unlike humans, he really had died before. He had nothing left but bones, so perhaps he could survive being chewed a few times. Getting stuck between Leviathan's teeth would be even better.

"Come on, you monster! I'll take you on!"

And at the very moment the Skeleton King let out that brave shout—

Zzzzt. Splat.

Something fell from the sky onto his head and shoulder.

The Skeleton King rubbed the sticky, stark-white stuff with a bewildered look, then scowled.

Shit.

Warm bird shit.

"I ought to pluck every last feather off those bastards."

Growling under his breath, the Skeleton King looked up.

As expected, a flock of gulls had been circling above him for some time. They had apparently decided that humans were free cafeterias and had been following the little boat.

More precisely, they were scattering shit and piss as they flew away toward some distant point.

"They've got a damn good sense for—"

The Skeleton King broke off. His pupils trembled.

His eyes widened at the sight of birds flying in from the opposite direction, blackening the sky.

Birds? All of those?

While he stared with his mouth hanging open, thousands—perhaps tens of thousands—of birds, so many species mixed together that even an ornithologist would have struggled to tell them apart, flew over his head, following the gulls into the distance.

No.

[3105] Ssamjang is a savory Korean dipping paste commonly served with grilled meat.

That wasn’t it.

They were…

Fleeing.

As the word flashed through his mind, the calm sea began to heave.

Rrrrrumble!

A vibration rose from deep beneath the sea.

And then—

Whoooosh!

A triangular wave surged upward as if to swallow the world, a massive shadow undulating within it.

“GRAAAAAAAH!”

A savage roar shook the Philippine Sea.

The moment the mythical monster, more than three hundred meters[3106] long, opened its jaws toward the feast laid out on the tiny boat—

“It’s been twenty-three hours, you motherfucker.”

Along with the unexpected voice of one man, a fierce flame shot forward, evaporating the moisture in its path.

Crunch!

There is a martial art in Murim called the Turtle Breath Technique.

Strictly speaking, it is more of a method than a martial art. It suppresses breathing and heartbeat as much as possible, and even lowers body temperature.

In other words, it is a strange way of hiding all signs of life for a while. It also requires considerable internal energy and martial prowess, so few people in Murim learn it.

If you knew anything about the strange creatures called martial artists, that was hardly surprising.

Murim was full of show-offs who shouted the names of their forms even while fighting for their lives. You expected them to play dead?

Roll on the ground in that world, and people would humiliate you by claiming you had achieved Great Completion in Narye tagon.[3107] Naturally, the people willing to learn the Turtle Breath Technique were few.

Members of the unorthodox faction.

Wandering martial artists.

And…

[3106] Three hundred meters is about 980 feet.

[3107] Narye tagon is a martial-arts expression comparing an evasive roll to a lazy donkey rolling on the ground.

Assassins.

Unlike those first two groups, assassins were so rare you could go your whole life without seeing one.

An assassin could brush right past you without your realizing what they were. And if you did realize the person in front of you was an assassin, you were already pretty damn screwed.

Still, meeting one could sometimes be useful.

Especially when that assassin was known as the Slaughter Saint.

"I'm not sure what to teach you. But I can't exactly teach the Fire King's successor something like the Turtle Breath Technique…"

"Wow, the Turtle Breath Technique!"

"…?"

"Teach me! I want to live!"

"…Aren't you from the orthodox faction?"

"Do orthodox martial artists not die even when they get stabbed?"

"No, but you should be developing your martial arts—"

"Turtle Breath Technique! Turtle Breath Technique! Survival! Taekyung Grylls!"[3108]

"All right, just calm down. And stop spouting that strange nonsense."

In short, I was lucky.

The living legend of the assassin world had teaching skills that could put even Daechi-dong's top cram-school instructor to shame, and I was good at anything that involved using my body, so I absorbed his teachings like a sponge.

I had never dreamed I would use the Turtle Breath Technique in the modern world before using it in Murim. But it certainly worked.

Crunch!

A spear wreathed in blue-white flames was sucked into the dark monster's maw.

No—it shattered the teeth that had already grown back and buried itself in the roof of its mouth.

"GRAAAAAAAH!"

Crack-crack-crack!

The monster thrashed with a roar, crushing the little motorboat like a dried stalk.

I grabbed the wide-eyed Skeleton King by the back of his neck, kicked off the boat as it began to sink, and shot upward.

Boom!

Fragments burst behind me and grazed my shoulder. A fierce wind whipped over me.

[3108] "Taekyung Grylls" alludes to Bear Grylls, a television presenter known for survival programs.

I stepped onto an invisible staircase and stopped in midair.

Grrrrr.

Ragged breathing. The pupils of Leviathan's huge, crocodile-like eyes narrowed into long vertical slits.

"You. How could you…"

"Ah, that? It's a long story."

I grinned.

"And I'm not telling you."

Inventory open. Summon.

Along with the thought that accompanied the words, I hurled the spear in my hand.

Whoooooom!

Chapter 754

Whooooooosh!

Intense heat scorched the air and evaporated the moisture in its path.

A single streak of flame fell like a meteor. Leviathan's eyes widened as it twisted its body, forgetting even the pain that had come before.

Shhk!

Hot.

The spearhead sliced through scales that could shrug off missiles. A mere graze carved dozens of kilograms[3109] of flesh from its body.

No—it burned the flesh away.

Hissssss!

Leviathan screamed without a sound as searing pain swept through it.

From the day it first opened its eyes, the mythical monster had reigned as a calamity of the sea. Pain from fire was still foreign to it.

So was the human coming at it as fast as a beam of light.

Shh-shh-shh-shhk!

Leviathan had no idea when or how the spears had been launched.

It only heard the sharp whistle of something tearing through the air and saw five streaks of flame flying toward it. A red warning light flashed in its mind.

Danger!

Its massive body, rigid with pain, twisted desperately. Leviathan narrowly avoided the flame-wreathed spears and summoned its magical power.

Ruuumble!

A tremendous force pressed down from every direction.

Its wounds had not healed, but the quality and quantity of its magical power were far beyond what they had been a day ago.

A wave surged upward, brimming with magical power. At Leviathan's will, it advanced without a breath of wind to drive it.

Toward the human who had dared challenge the ruler of the sea.

And toward the traitor who wore the skin of a worthless human and attacked its own kind.

Whooooooosh!

A vast shadow covered a radius of several hundred meters.[3110] Magical power churned inside the pitch-black wave, where not even the faintest light could penetrate.

[3109] Dozens of kilograms is roughly 45–200 lb, depending on the amount.

[3110] Several hundred meters is roughly 1,000–3,000 ft.

“Damn it, I told you I don’t taste good…”

The Skeleton King muttered blankly.

At that very moment—

“Get lost.”

The low words came through clenched teeth. At the same moment, the human—Jin Taekyung—thrust out a fist wreathed in flame.

Boom!

Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

Blue-white flames burst through the air and tore open the center of the wave.

A small human figure shot through the collapsing spray. Leviathan roared in fury.

“You bastard!”

Whooooooosh!

Streams of water surged up from every direction and shot toward Jin Taekyung’s entire body.

Each carried enough force to pierce an aircraft carrier. An ordinary human wouldn’t stand a chance.

If his opponent were an ordinary human.

Shhk.

The air vanished. The wind split apart.

Flames bloomed at the tip of a silver spearhead, unmistakably different from the ones Jin had hurled at Leviathan earlier.

Fwoosh. Shhk!

A blue line swept across the black sea.

The blue-white flame flowed like a dragon’s tail, burning away the jets of water that came at him like awls.

Jin Taekyung stepped on empty air again and accelerated. In the slowed world around him, he steadied his breathing.

My body…

It wasn’t like usual.

His hands and feet felt heavy. He wasn’t as fast as he used to be, and he was burning through internal energy much faster than he had expected.

That damn debuff.

Broken Body was taking an enormous toll in combat.

It might have been different if he had never possessed those capabilities in the first place. But with every attribute except Intelligence drastically reduced, the resulting void left his body unable to properly carry out the commands from his mind.

Just like now.

Thud!

The dull impact sent his body swaying. Jin swallowed his groan and evaded the attack that came immediately after.

Boom! Boom! Boom!

Hundreds of spheres of water rushed at him, filling his vision.

They looked like the attack spell mages called Water Ball. Jin knew better than anyone that they were far more powerful.

He also knew that if he backed off now, he might lose the monster in front of him again.

Whoooom.

The nearly translucent white shaft of his spear trembled. Flames that had seemed about to die surged up fiercely.

Jin Taekyung drew the divine weapon far back and slashed down at an angle.

Fire Dragon Divine Spear, second form.

Heavenly Strike.

Fwooooooosh!

A dazzling flash lit the darkness that had swallowed the surrounding sea.

Hellfire fell, evaporating the spheres of water on every side. Its glow stained the monster's enormous eye red.

"How dare you! How dare a mere human…!"

With a cry that was almost a scream, Leviathan drew up all its magical power.

Ruuuuumble.

The sea heaved, and the dark clouds overhead groaned.

The moment the spearhead met the barrier of magical power shielding Leviathan's body, a brilliant flash split the blackened sky.

It struck toward the human who had dared defy a myth.

Fwoosh!

In the slowed world, dozens of lightning bolts plunged from high above.

They emerged as dozens, but by the time they reached their destination, they had merged into one. That destructive force of nature was sucked toward a single point as though drawn there by something.

Crackle, crackle, crackle!

"Gyaaaaaaaah!"

Countless flashes lit the sea, accompanied by a scream of terrible pain.

Leviathan, holding the spearhead at bay with all its magical power, felt a surge of joy.

I knew it!

The voltage was in the billions of volts. No matter how strong the human was, he couldn't take a direct hit from that column of lightning and remain unharmed—

What?

Leviathan blinked its enormous eye.

Beyond the slowly fading flash, the human who should have been standing there with his flesh burned and his bones shattered by the lightning was staring back at Leviathan completely unharmed.

He even spoke, looking a little embarrassed.

"Uh, he's always been a scaredy-cat."

"…?"

"Hey, cut it out. That won't kill you."

What?

Leviathan tilted its head without realizing it. Beyond Jin Taekyung's shoulder, someone was letting out a terrible scream. Leviathan could see him clearly.

"Gyaaaaaaaah…"

The scream gradually faded.

The Skeleton King glanced down at his smoking body, then awkwardly lowered the sword in his hand.

"Ah, right. I'm a skeleton."

"Great timing. Good lightning-rod strategy."

"I only drew this to help you… No, as expected, you saw through my strategy perfectly. Not bad."

"…!"

What the hell were these bastards?

For a moment, Leviathan couldn't make sense of any of it.

That instant of distraction was enough to disrupt the flow of magical power that had been as solid as a wall with no gaps.

Crack!

The fissure was tiny compared to the whole barrier.

But it was exactly the opening Jin Taekyung had been desperately waiting for, and the flame dwelling in the spearhead smashed through the wavering magical power and plunged toward its target.

Thrust!

Scales shattered beneath the spearhead. Leviathan thrashed on instinct as its flesh and bone caught fire.

"GRAAAAAAAH!"

Rumble! Whooooooosh!

Its enormous body bucked wildly.

Jin Taekyung wasn't satisfied. He grabbed the small horns jutting from the monster's skin and drove more strength into the spear gripped in his hand.

Shhhhuuuk!

The spear's two-meter[3111] shaft plunged into the center of Leviathan's brow.

Its enormous head saved it from death, but the pain was beyond anything the mythical monster had ever suffered or imagined. It let out a terrible roar.

"You bastard!"

Whooooooosh!

Terrifyingly powerful Fear spread outward from Leviathan.

Marine creatures crouching in the deep sea rolled their eyes back and floated upward, while countless birds fleeing far away after sensing the danger that was about to arrive suddenly fell from the sky.

At this moment, Leviathan was angrier than it had ever been.

I'll kill them. I must!

It would tear them apart until no one could recognize them. The human who had inflicted this pain and the traitor who had turned on its own kind would die the most gruesome deaths it could give them.

But amid the pain and fury that consumed Leviathan, fear raised its head.

How?

The enemies had not only inflicted such a massive wound upon it the day before—they had deceived its senses and lured it into a trap.

Especially the human. That tiny creature had driven a weapon into its head and wielded a power Leviathan couldn't begin to understand.

He's strong. Stronger than any human I've ever seen.

During the Great Cataclysm, such a thing would have been unimaginable.

Leviathan had roamed the five oceans and sent countless lives to watery graves. Even the humans considered the strongest had failed each time they tried to hunt it.

Leviathan had always been the one doing the hunting.

It had been born a ruler and lived as a predator. In the vast sea, humans had always been prey—not even enough for a mouthful.

Looking back over its long life, Leviathan could think of only one being who had ever forced it to submit.

The master to whom it had sworn loyalty.

The Demon King Asmodeus.

"…!"

In that instant, Leviathan's eyes, stained with pain and anger, opened wide.

[3111] Two meters is about 6.6 ft.

Could this bastard be…?

It had heard of a human who had stood against its mighty master.

Leviathan had never met that human, but he had proved his strength by defeating countless monsters. The last had been the Demon King Asmodeus.

Then could this human really be…?

It had to be. There couldn't be two humans this strong.

Leviathan's mistaken conclusion swelled into terror. Its anger vanished, leaving only one thought.

I have to run. As far away as possible. I have to get away from him!

Anger? Fighting spirit?

None of that mattered. If this human had defeated the Demon King Asmodeus, whom Leviathan had served as its master, then its own fate was practically decided.

"GROOOOOOAR!"

Leviathan roared and shook its body.

It thrashed harder than ever, no longer from pain but in a struggle to survive. Yet it did nothing to dislodge the man already settled on its enormous body.

"Shut up. Shut up. Will you shut up?"

Bam! Bam! Bam!

Blood sprayed and flesh crumpled. Jin's tremendous grip tore out scales as tough as they came, pulling them free like cabbages. Flames around his fists crushed flesh and bone.

Thud. Crack!

"Kuhk. Khk."

The relentless pain nearly made Leviathan black out.

No human should have possessed such strength. In the end, only one way out remained.

The deep sea.

The place where Leviathan had first opened its eyes. An unknown domain deep beneath the ocean that no enemy had ever been able to invade.

If it reached that place, even this tenacious and terrifying human would be shaken off.

Whoosh!

Spray burst upward. Leviathan left the shallows for the open sea and dove deep.

Then it saw the human smiling and realized it had been wrong.

"Now we can finally fight together."

What?

The question flashed through Leviathan's mind.

And then—

Whooooooosh!

Deep in the dark water below, countless things gathered into one and blocked its path.

Bones.

They were bones.

Chapter 755

The Skeleton King was like a demonic sword.

A blade sharp enough to cut through anything, with killing power to match—yet one that had to remain sheathed.

A demonic sword that had to be drawn and wielded only when absolutely necessary, and only where no one was watching.

In that sense, the deep sea, swallowed by darkness on every side, was the perfect place.

Shwooooooosh!

A wave of bones surged and churned through the water.

The remains of sea creatures that had accumulated over hundreds, perhaps thousands, of years awoke at a single being's call.

The moment they opened their eyes, countless bones raced toward one another, obeying commands that bound their souls like chains.

Crack. Clatter-clatter!

They joined, gathered, and at last took shape: a massive gateway of bones blocking the entrance to the deep sea. A sturdy shield of wraiths that would let nothing living pass.

At the center of it all stood the king who had roused the wraiths sleeping deep beneath the seabed.

—Stop.

Fwooooooosh.

A tremendous force swelled.

Brilliant blond hair swayed with the current. Above his bare forehead, a faint silver light appeared and took shape.

A crown.

It was the mark of one who had claimed a throne for himself, and the power shining from it was far too brilliant to be called mere magical power.

—This is a royal command.

His voice held authority; his gaze, arrogance.

As those shining golden eyes fixed on Leviathan, it realized the true identity of the traitor who had dared turn against his own kind.

The Skeleton King…!

The king of wraiths.

One of the lords of the seventy-two legions sworn to the Demon King Asmodeus. He had led an immortal legion that rose again and again to fight humanity, until he himself met Erasure.

But the crowned traitor blocking Leviathan's path was not the Skeleton King it remembered.

How?

Where there was Erasure, there could also be birth. Someone else taking a vacant throne was only natural.

But this new king of wraiths was different. Far too different.

—How can you possess so much magical power and still side with mere humans?!

Leviathan's cry rang with bewilderment and rage. Its enormous body, hundreds of meters[3112] across, shot forward like a beam of light.

Kwaaaaaa!

Violent whirlpools spun in every direction.

Leviathan rushed toward the wall of white bones without a moment's hesitation.

No—it had no other choice.

It had to break through. If it could pass that wall and reach deeper water, it would survive.

Leviathan had first opened its eyes in the deep sea. In those pitch-black depths, where no one could intrude, it was certain it could win.

At least, that was what it believed until a quiet voice came with a fresh stab of agony.

"Where are you off to in such a hurry? We haven't even settled the bill yet."

Crunch!

—GRAAAAAAAH!

Leviathan's massive body, which had been shooting forward like a ray of light, writhed violently.

Jin Taekyung gripped the spear shaft buried deep in the monster's brow with one hand. With the other, he drove a sword—drawn from who knew where—into its enormous eye.

He spoke almost in a whisper.

"At one hit per person, we'd be here for three days and four nights. Let's round it off at a thousand."

Less than a day had passed, and the confirmed casualties already exceeded a hundred thousand.

They were strangers whose faces and names Jin did not know, but as he stared into the writhing Leviathan's eyes, his own gaze burned with cold fury.

"We have to collect the blood debt, don't we?"

Monsters and humans. Humans and monsters.

[3112] Several hundred meters is roughly 660–3,000 ft for a range of 200–900 m.

Their fate had been set the moment the Demon King Asmodeus first stepped onto this land more than thirty years ago.

Jin, once a boy whose father had gone away one day and never returned, remembered him clearly. He knew the pain of those this disaster had left in the same position.

Inventory open. Summon.

Spears, swords, axes.

It didn't matter.

Countless weapons he had shoved deep into his Inventory whenever he had the chance flashed into his hands one after another, then plunged toward their targets in the blink of an eye.

Thrust-thrust-thrust! Crunch!

Scales shattered. Bone and flesh crumpled.

The precise circulation of internal energy he usually employed was nowhere to be seen, but even that was enough.

The mythical monster that had reigned as a calamity of the sea all its life writhed in agony unlike anything it had ever known.

—GRAAAAAAAH!

Ruuuuumble!

Magical power erupted from Leviathan, shaking the sea.

Marine creatures swept in by the waves succumbed to its overwhelming Fear. Their eyes rolled back—and then a quiet voice breathed new souls into their dead bodies.

—Rise.

The fin of a blue whale that had been slowly sinking twitched. Dozens of sturgeon, torn apart for the monster's meal only hours earlier, bared their sawlike teeth.

—Grrrrrrr.

—Grk. Grk.

Dead, yet not dead.

The countless marine creatures that had finally become a single legion moved as one body. And at their head stood the king of wraiths who had awakened them.

—My legion!

Craaaaaack!

At the Skeleton King's cry, the wall of bones collapsed.

No. It became a single enormous monster of bones and charged at Leviathan.

Kwaaaaaa!

Through a haze of green blood, Leviathan saw the Skeleton Legion rushing at it as one and roared.

—How dare you, you worthless things!

Gooooong. Boom!

Compressed seawater fired through the depths like cannonballs. Hundreds of blasts smashed countless bones apart.

But even Leviathan, calamity of the sea, could not control everything.

This vast ocean belonged entirely to it, but the countless deaths and wraiths flowing within the waves followed only the owner of the crown.

—Open your eyes.

Magical power surged around the Skeleton King. Amid the churning currents, wraiths on the verge of Erasure raised their heads.

—Raise Skeleton.

Clatter-clatter-clatter!

Leviathan opened wide the eye Jin Taekyung had half-crushed.

—…!

Bones scattered by the blasts gathered again. Broken pieces reassembled into new shapes and clung to Leviathan's enormous body.

They seeped through the cracks in its strength and clung to the monster's magical power, which still had not run dry, draining it like leeches.

Shhhhhhh!

What the hell…?

Leviathan was stunned. Even the Skeleton King of the past could not have rebuilt his legion so quickly and easily.

Where had this wealth of magical power come from? How could he command his legion to attack Leviathan, a monster plainly above them?

And there was something else.

My magical power has no effect on him.

Among monsters, power governed everything.

Yet this Skeleton King—the traitor newly seated on the throne of wraiths—was different. He might fear Leviathan, but its magical power did not control him. If anything, the deeper they went, the more freely he fought.

How?

Had Leviathan fully regained its former strength, or simply kept its composure, it might have understood.

The Skeleton King's power was different in nature from ordinary magical power. And after defeating the Arch Lich and Behemoth, both named S-rank monsters, and absorbing so much magical power, his standing was not far below Leviathan's.

But Leviathan had awoken from its long sleep only days ago. Now it was gravely wounded and exhausted. Everything happening around it seemed impossibly confusing.

Confusing enough to make it forget reality for one brief moment.

Then a terrible burning pain jolted it back to its senses.

Fwoosh. Sizzle-sizzle!

Leviathan clenched what remained of its teeth. Half were already gone.

It had fought countless humans called Hunters during the Great Cataclysm, but it had never felt pain like this. Blades wreathed in aura had barely stung, and even its worst injuries had soon healed after it absorbed another monster's magical power and rested.

But the flames tearing through its enormous head even now, turning flesh and bone to ash, were different.

That tiny human was different.

"Fifty. Fifty-one. Fifty-two. Fifty-three…"

Thrust-thrust-thrust!

He was nothing like the humans Leviathan had fought before. He was on another level.

He kept muttering without pause as he drove weapons of unknown origin into various parts of Leviathan's body and twisted them around. There was even a madness in his muttering that not even monsters could approach.

"We're halfway there already. Come on, let's keep it up a little longer."

"Sir, just one more set."

"Hold still. You'll break a bone."

"Of course, it'll break even if you don't. Go ahead and fuck around if you want to die in even more pain."

—GRAAAAAAAAAH!

Leviathan let out a horrible cry.

It was no roar. It was a scream.

The Fear that had once made the shores beyond the five oceans tremble had become fear in the plainest sense, binding Leviathan itself.

All because of one human, impossibly small beside it.

Die? I'm going to die? Me?

An instinct for survival, forgotten over a lifetime as a predator, awoke.

One eye was so badly mangled that Leviathan could no longer make out its surroundings. Its body drew closer to death by the moment.

As its pain slowly dulled, Leviathan assessed its situation.

One chance. I need one opening to shake them off and flee as far as I can.

There was still hope.

Its tenacious vitality. The half of its magical power it had yet to spend. And its enemies were no longer as they had been when it first met them.

Especially that human who had dealt it such devastating damage with a single attack the day before.

If he could use that power again, I'd already be dead. Something must have happened to him.

Leviathan was a highly intelligent monster. Its assessment was shrewd, and it made its life-or-death decision at once.

—Kwoooooo!

Its massive body, hundreds of meters[3113] in diameter, writhed with all its strength and released its magical power. A tremendous force surged outward like something inflating, pushing away everything around it.

Kwaaaaaa!

Dozens of whirlpools formed under the tremendous water pressure.

Leviathan shook off the Skeletons draining its magical power like leeches and charged in one direction.

Whooooooosh!

The water flowing over its enormous body became violent whirlpools and churned wildly.

The Skeleton King missed it by a hair and shouted, his voice close to a scream.

—Human! Get out of the way!

Too late.

Leviathan kept that thought to itself and drove forward with all its strength—toward a cliff rooted deep in the seabed for thousands of years.

It would scrape that wretched human off.

And then—

Ruuuuumble!

The collision sent a tremendous shock through the sea.

I tried to get out of the way. I could have made it.

I'd just forgotten one important thing in the heat of battle.

Some of my powers had an expiration date.

Beep.

[3113] Several hundred meters is roughly 660–3,000 ft for a range of 200–900 m.

SYSTEM

The duration of the Water Rescue Worker Title has ended!
The effects of the Water Rescue Worker Title have disappeared!
The Water Rescue Worker's Webbing has disappeared!
The Water Rescue Worker's Gills have disappeared!
Reactivation will be possible in 6 days 23 hours 59 seconds!

Damn it.

Before I could even spit out that single curse, a massive boulder covered in green moss and seaweed had come up right behind me.

Crack!

"Guh!"

A powerful impact. Then pain squeezed my entire body.

Through the momentarily whitened field of vision, I saw Leviathan's back as it staggered toward the surface, fleeing despite being unable to fully absorb the force of the collision.

I also saw the Skeleton King chasing after it while riding a half-dismembered shark.

Clatter-clatter-clatter!

Bone Binding.

A net of bones shot across the current and blocked the enormous body, but it could not restrain the monster thrashing with a desperate will to survive.

Crunch!

The bones shattered and scattered in every direction.

But it wasn't over.

I fought the water pressure bearing down on me and tightened my grip on the spear shaft.

Craaaaack.

Cold, dark seawater crept toward my mouth and nose. That was fine.

My sharpened senses were still fixed on the target. So was the blue-white hellfire gathered along the transparent spearhead. So were my muscles, every fiber drawn taut toward the enormous monster fleeing in the distance.

Shhhhhhh.

Every nerve in my body came alive.

It was the same situation as yesterday. But this time would be different. I knew it with my whole body.

There won’t be a second time.

Trusting myself, intent on killing it, I hurled the spear with all my strength.

Shhwaaaak!

A single streak of flame crossed the sea. At its end came the scream I had been waiting for.

—GRAAAAAAAAAH!

The hunt was over.

Chapter 756

The desire to live isn't granted to humans alone.

Any creature that can breathe and think will struggle until its final breath. All the more so a born predator that has never once imagined its own death.

Shwoosh! Splurch!

"GRAAAAAAAAAH!"

A spear shot in from behind and burrowed into Leviathan's lava-like bulk.

Its vision flashed white. Screaming in pain, Leviathan clenched its broken teeth.

I won't die. This body won't die. Never!

It swam with all its might.

But for all the ferocity of its will to survive, its fins and tail—once swift enough to cut through the vast ocean like rays of light—barely moved. Its whole body, once brimming with strength, was growing heavier.

Why the hell…?

Leviathan gasped for breath. It couldn't stop now.

It had finally managed to shake them off. The way to survival was open. All it had to do was flee as far as it could and hide.

Whether it took decades or centuries, it could have its revenge someday—so long as it survived today. Unlike humans, fated to die after barely a hundred years, Leviathan could live for something close to eternity as long as it had water and magical power.

In the end, I'm the one who will survive. Not you bastards. This Leviathan!

It forced up the body that kept trying to sink. Riding the waves left by the battle, carried by the current, it headed for the refuge waiting somewhere far away.

Or so it believed, until something cold and hard blocked its path.

Boom.

A dull impact sent a jolt back through its body.

A reef?

Leviathan raised its head. In its half-crushed eye, it saw a steel ship gleaming in the sunlight—and a human standing above it, looking down.

"Operation complete. We'll capture the target now."

The quiet voice reached Leviathan's ears. It couldn't tell whom the human was addressing, and it couldn't understand the words. Their meaning was easy enough to guess.

"…Not yet. Not yet."

Leviathan gathered every last scrap of strength. It raised the tail that had once smashed dozens of aircraft carriers apart in a single blow and lashed out at him.

Then—

Splash.

Water scattered feebly where its tail, once dozens of meters[3114] long, should have been.

Only then did the monster of myth understand. Its magnificent tail was gone. The streak of flame fired from behind had melted away half its body.

"Ah."

Leviathan groaned.

Choi Minwoo, the human who had crushed its last hope, watched two figures approaching in the distance and smiled faintly.

"Thank you for your hard work."

"Waaaaaaaaah!"

"Uhyooooo! Leviathan getto da ze![3115]"

At Team Leader Choi's words, the sailors of the Japan Maritime Self-Defense Force aboard the aircraft carrier let out a tremendous cheer.

I had vomited up enough seawater to fill a kettle before barely managing to open my mouth.

"Tell them to keep it down. My head's ringing."

The Skeleton King, so drenched he looked pickled in seawater, chimed in.

"Tell them to stop making a fuss now that it's over and just steer the ship. If they keep this up, I'll summon the vengeful spirits of Pearl Harbor.[3116] You know what happens then, don't you?"

Team Leader Choi nodded.

"Yes. We'd run another raid right here."

"…Are you serious?"

"I'm joking."

I left the wounded-looking Skeleton King behind and headed to the rear of the aircraft carrier.

The enormous monster lay bound tight in a magic-infused net, struggling to breathe.

"You…"

Even with its crushed eye, it somehow recognized me and muttered like a groan. I brushed back my wet hair and waved.

"Yeah, it's me, you son of a bitch."

[3114] Dozens of meters is roughly 20–90 m, or about 65–300 ft.

[3115] Getto da ze is a colloquial Japanese exclamation meaning "Got it!"

[3116] Pearl Harbor is the US naval base in Hawaii attacked by Japan in 1941.

"K-kill me. I have not the slightest intention of suffering humiliation at the hands of a mere human."

I blinked silently. Then I asked Team Leader Choi,

"Did anyone say we were keeping this thing alive?"

"Certainly not me."

"Not me either. You?"

The Skeleton King had followed me over. He answered flatly.

"Are you insane?"

"Right? I was wondering what the hell that bullshit was about."

I shrugged and drove White Flame, which I'd recovered on the way here, into Leviathan's body.

Splurch!

A faint groan escaped it. It seemed as if death, which had drawn close once again, flickered in Leviathan's eyes.

Half its body was already gone. Tenacious as it was, there was no coming back from a wound like that.

But first, I needed an answer.

"You should've stayed asleep. What made you crawl all the way out here?"

"…Kill me."

"Oh, you don't need to worry about that."

Splurch! Crack.

I slowly twisted the spearhead embedded in its torso. Leviathan convulsed as the blade ground against its bones, then answered in a rush.

"F-food! I smelled food!"

"An S-rank Magic Gem."

I'd expected as much. Still twisting the spearhead, I asked my next question.

"Who woke you up?"

"Woke me up?"

"We wouldn't know. You would."

I tightened my grip on the spear shaft. Its answer came through a groan, but it didn't change.

"Ghk. Ghk. I-I don't know. I'd been starving for so long, and then I sensed magical power coming from the sea. That's all."

Was it telling the truth?

I didn't have to think long. Everyone got honest when death was staring them in the face, and I couldn't see the slightest trace of a lie in Leviathan. It had already lost the will to live.

Damn it.

I swallowed my disappointment.

It was obvious who had lured it here with an unrefined S-rank Magic Gem.

Michael Silbert.

The problem was proving it. Without evidence that he'd caused this disaster, no one would believe me.

That was how much standing Odin Guild—and Michael Silbert—had in the world. He was more than a hero of the Great Cataclysm. He was in a position to reach for the place only one person in human history had ever occupied.

Normally, it would be impossible even if I died and came back to life… But things are different now.

Cheon Taemin.

If Prometheus had given humanity fire, Cheon Taemin had defeated the Demon King Asmodeus and given humanity peace. He'd done it not in some myth embroidered with fiction, but in the real world, only a few decades ago. No one had done anything like it before or since.

Yet he, too, had become part of the past.

To people living in the present, Cheon Taemin was great but impossibly distant. They were still grateful to him, yet they resented him more than anyone.

The world now cheered for a hero who acted before everyone's eyes, not one who had withdrawn from it.

For Michael Silbert—one of the countless people who had lived in Cheon Taemin's shadow.

…Damn it.

The strength drained out of me. I pulled the spear shaft from deep inside Leviathan's body and aimed it at its neck.

The hunt was over. It was time to put this damn monster down.

"Goodbye. Try not to find peace in the next life."

I raised the spear. Blue-white flames already burned along its transparent blade.

One Strike.

That was all it would take. With its strength completely spent, Leviathan's body would split like tofu beneath the Force.

I didn't hesitate.

Whoom.

The flames burned through the wind as the spear fell.

Leviathan stared blankly up at it. Then it spoke.

The time has come.

What?

I twisted the spearhead as the question flashed through my mind. But fatigue lay on me as heavy as the salt in the seawater, and my body reacted half a beat too late.

Shhk! Shwaaaaaak!

The thick neck, several meters[3117] across, was sliced in half.

Beyond the green blood surging up like a wave, my eyes met the monster's eyes, already overshadowed by irreversible death.

Its final thought sounded in my mind, not my ears.

Magical power stirred my hunger. But it was you humans—and this world—that woke me from my deep sleep.

"…!"

The time has come, human. Please survive. Survive to the very end. Survive until the end of this world, and see with your own eyes the day I never got to see…

Splash.

The thought faded, then ended like an echo. At the same time, the enormous maw that had been trembling violently slammed into the surface of the water.

And as I stared at the light fading from its eyes, confused, a clear ringing filled my ears.

Ding. Ding. Ding.

SYSTEM

You have defeated Lv. 170 Leviathan!
You have successfully completed Quest: Calamity of the Sea!
You have acquired a massive amount of EXP and Fame!
Level Up!
Special Debuff: Broken Body rejects the power of healing!
Leviathan is a powerful S-rank monster and the only Named Monster. Since you have accumulated remarkable achievements, an additional Reward will be granted!
The effects of Title: Water Rescue Worker have been enhanced!
The name of Title: Water Rescue Worker will be changed!
You have acquired Title: Hope of the Sea!
…
…
…

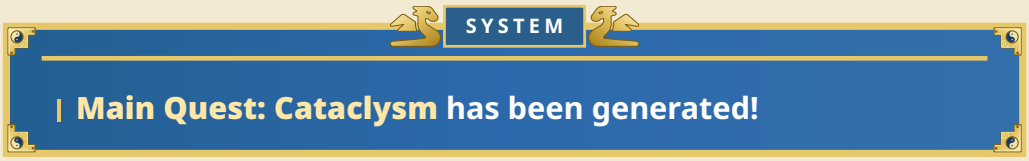
[3117] Several meters is roughly 3–9 m, or about 10–30 ft.

The bells rang without pause like a victory salute. I couldn't move. An inexplicable sense of foreboding had taken hold of me.

The time has come.

Leviathan's final words ran through my mind again, and suddenly I understood.

Ding.



A change too vast to measure was already drawing close to this world.

Leviathan was dead.

The news was brief but electrifying. It reached Japan's Ministry of Defense first, then spread across Japan and out into the world.

[Jin Taekyung succeeds in Leviathan raid!]

[The Calamity of the Sea finally meets its death!]

[The miracle of twenty-four hours. Asia's star takes flight after falling to rock bottom!]

People who had held back their fear and prayed desperately for the raid's success erupted in cheers. News outlets around the world, which had watched Japan with bated breath, poured out articles as though they'd been waiting for their cue.

[The dazzling rise of a young hero.]

[Japanese Prime Minister boldly declares at a press conference, defying everyone's expectations: "I kept it. Because it was a promise."]

[Japanese Defense Minister abruptly dismissed. Senior Ministry of Defense official laments: "The Defense Minister was considering a kamikaze[3118] operation."]

[A great achievement accomplished by only two S-rank Hunters!]

[Japanese netizens condemn the government and praise the hero. "What on earth was Japan's S-rank Hunter Yamamoto doing?" "Let's make Jin Taekyung our shogun![3119]"]

[Korean netizens mock Japan: "Yamamoto must have been cleaning."]

Countless articles and news reports swept across the internet like waves. At the center of them all was one name.

Jin Taekyung.

[3118] Kamikaze refers to Japanese suicide attacks during World War II.

[3119] A shogun was a military ruler of Japan.

Asia’s star.
A bird that had taken flight once more after an endless fall.
But amid the praise and cheers of the entire world, he couldn’t smile.

Chapter 757

Twenty-eight hours.

That was all the time we spent in Japan.

If we'd answered every request for an interview or press conference, twenty-eight days wouldn't have been enough.

At first, I hadn't planned to stand in front of the cameras at all. Then Team Leader Choi said something that changed my mind.

"The survivors need courage and hope."

Prime Minister Koizumi welcomed my decision with open arms. He'd been such an attention seeker since his youth that people had treated him like a madman.

When I entered the press conference hall, I was greeted by cheers and a barrage of camera flashes.

"Waaaaaaaah!"

Pop-pop-pop-pop!

It was strange. Less than a month had passed since all this began, yet it felt like ages since I'd last stood before reporters of my own free will. Ages since the media had looked on me favorably, too.

That didn't mean I wanted to waste time. I still had a problem I couldn't tell anyone about, and somewhere in the world, another fire was probably breaking out even now.

"Let's make this quick."

But the Japanese press made up more than half the room, and they weren't easy to handle. In more ways than one.

"Jin-sama[3120]! Please become Japan's shogun[3121]! You're the only one who can save these islands!"

I answered the first reporter's question—or rather, his shout.

"Get him out."

The Self-Defense Forces personnel guarding the hall took him by both arms. As they dragged him away, the microphone dropped from his hand. Another Japanese reporter snatched it up.

"Leviathan was so feared by the people of Japan that we called it Susanoo. Yet Jin Taekyung-sama[3122] defeated it without much difficulty."

What the hell is he talking about? It was fucking hard.

But I didn't let it show and answered calmly.

[3120] -sama is a Japanese honorific expressing a high degree of respect.

[3121] A shogun was a hereditary military ruler of Japan.

[3122] -sama is a Japanese honorific expressing a high degree of respect.

“It wasn’t an easy fight, but I did my best while thinking of those who lost their lives to Leviathan.”

“Ah…!”

“I’d also like to offer my heartfelt condolences to their families.”

I bowed my head. Tears glimmered in many of the reporters’ eyes. The Japanese reporter wiped his eyes with his sleeve before continuing.

“Thank you for saying that.”

“I only did what had to be done.”

“I’m sorry, but may I ask one more question?”

Normally, no. The rule was one question per reporter, and I had no intention of letting this drag on. But he’d asked a good question, so I nodded.

“Go ahead.”

“Do you know Amaterasu, the sun goddess?”

“What? Which terrace?”

“I’m asking seriously. Jin Taekyung-sama[3123], who defeated Susanoo—are you perhaps the reincarnation of Amaterasu, the sun goddess?”

“No, for fuck’s sake…”

The Self-Defense Forces waiting nearby rushed in, covered the reporter’s mouth, and snatched away his microphone.

Not that the remaining Japanese reporters asked normal questions.

“If you could name just three Japanese anime you like… Mmph!”

Patriotism was one thing, but these people were fucking nuts.

Once I realized how much time it took to restrain each reporter and drag them out, I decided to break through head-on.

“What have you generally thought of Japan?”

“An island. Next.”

“Japan has long been a nation that values peace and courtesy—”

“Wakō pirates, the Imjin War, the second Japanese invasion of Korea, the Japanese colonial period, World War II. Next.”[3124]

“Our S-rank Hunter Yamamoto Genji has expressed some personal regret. He claims the raid on Leviathan would have been far easier if you’d conducted a joint operation with him. What do you think?”

“Then he should’ve shown up on time. Next.”

“No, please wait a moment! Yamamoto-san[3125] had circumstances that prevented him from coming!”

[3123] -sama is a Japanese honorific expressing a high degree of respect.

[3124] The wakō were Japanese pirates who raided the coasts of Korea and China; the Imjin War and second Japanese invasion of Korea refer to Japan’s invasions of Korea in 1592 and 1597.

[3125] -san is a common Japanese honorific used as a polite form of address.

"A reporter… talking back?"

"…!"

I swept through the press conference like Zhao Zilong[3126] through an army of a hundred thousand.

Plenty of idiots asked questions that barely qualified as questions. But there were plenty of sharp ones, too—about the Skeleton King, for instance, rather than me.

They wanted to know how the raid had succeeded, what had happened to Leviathan's corpse after it vanished in the explosion, and where the two S-rank Magic Gems supplied by the Japanese government had gone.

I might have stumbled if Team Leader Choi hadn't seen those questions coming.

"Skel—no, Stone-King is an excellent Hunter who played a decisive role in this raid. Please understand that exhaustion prevented him from joining us today."

"The details of the raid are classified. I can't disclose them."

"Unfortunately, the corpse disappeared. The S-rank Magic Gem used as bait to lure Leviathan was also lost in the process. We offer our deepest apologies for this."

"Ah…"

"What a loss…"

A high-level monster's corpse was a treasure in its own right. Losing Leviathan's was bad enough; losing the Japanese government's S-rank Magic Gems drew sighs from the reporters.

Of course, if they found out it was all a lie, those sighs would turn to fury.

Team Leader Choi could take up acting.

I muttered as I watched him finish speaking without even twitching an eyebrow.

Leviathan's corpse? The Magic Gems?

Of course we'd taken them all. They were in the safest, most discreet place I knew: my Inventory.

The sudden explosion of magical power while Leviathan's corpse was being transferred to the aircraft carrier had been the Skeleton King's work. I'd used the opening to stuff everything into my Inventory. The Maritime Self-Defense Force sailors had watched it all vanish before their eyes and stood there in a daze.

I do feel a little bad…

But what else was I supposed to do? Leviathan's corpse was mine to begin with, and I'd just have to consider the Japanese government's S-rank Magic Gems a long-term loan.

Even the finest sword in the world becomes nothing more than a kitchen knife in a cook's hands. This was a time when I had to move like this, even if it meant selling my conscience.

[3126] Zhao Zilong was a general of China's Three Kingdoms period, celebrated in accounts of his charge through enemy forces.

…Cataclysm.

If I was going to solve that Quest—one question mark after another, weighing on my mind—I had to.

Even during the Great Cataclysm, Leviathan had been a monster of tremendous significance. Decades after the war's end, it still was.

Disasters large and small were unfolding across the world, yet its death drew every eye to Japan. It also etched the name of a young hero whose star had begun to fade into everyone's minds once more.

[Grand Mage Magic Johnson: "I'm a mage, but Jin is magic itself."]

[Prince Felix: "His nobility lies not in the blood flowing through his veins, but in his very being."]

[S-rank Hunter Faye Chen, speaking to reporters after suppressing a Monster Wave in downtown Hong Kong: "Free Hong Kong, Great Jin."]

[He has returned.]

[The star of Asia who never lost his light despite countless condemnations. No—the star of the world.]

[A life-or-death struggle at sea. Hope triumphs over calamity.]

[The world's worst terrorist twisted a hero's goodwill into evil. A public gripped by fear lost its judgment.]

[Head of North America's largest media association finally speaks amid mounting criticism: "We have always reported only the facts. The claim that we targeted Jin Taekyung is nothing more than a malicious rumor."]

The world's major news outlets were the first to change their stance.

Journalists who had remained neutral from the start, or had supported Jin Taekyung, paid Leviathan's death all the respect they could. Those who had already joined forces with Odin Guild couldn't change course so easily.

The fickle public had reversed its opinion overnight, and that was cause for caution. Michael Silbert, however, was more than a cause for caution. He was someone to fear.

But while those journalists fretted, the public was slowly waking from the media's incitement and its fear of terrorism.

"Simon. Why are you still in the office? Weren't you supposed to cover the anti–Jin Taekyung protest in the square today?"

"Uh, it was canceled."

"What?"

"Most of the participants dropped out. They were expecting thirty thousand, but once the number fell below five hundred, everyone dispersed."

“How does a protest that big fall apart so easily… Damn it. Fine. What about the organizer? The guy who acted like he was about to drop a bomb on Korea. Daniel, was it?”

“Oh, Daisuke?”

“Yeah, him. Tell him we’ll give him extensive coverage, so he needs to gather some people right away—”

The news director stopped badgering Simon and frowned.

“Wait. Who’s Daisuke? We’re talking about Daniel.”

“Yes. Daniel Daisuke. That’s the organizer’s full name.”

“…Don’t tell me.”

“I regret being the one to say it, Boss, but it’s exactly what you think.”

The reporter let out a put-upon sigh and explained everything to his superior point by point.

First, as the name Daisuke suggested, the protest organizer was of Japanese descent.

Second, Japanese and Koreans disliking one another was as natural as universal gravitation. That was why Daniel Daisuke had taken the lead in organizing the protest.

Third. Jin Taekyung had saved Japan, and Daniel Daisuke was a devoted son, and his mother was a Japanese woman from Tokyo.

“He’s the hero who saved his mother’s hometown. That’s basically what happened.”

It was a clean, no-frills explanation made entirely of facts. The news director, who had listened in silence, answered with one word.

“Fuck.”

His head throbbed. The protest’s cancellation wasn’t their fault, but would the “anonymous sponsor” who had promised a massive investment in return for a little biased coverage see it that way?

Damn it. Management’s going to raise hell.

As he sighed with a complicated expression, his eyes fell on the television screen playing silently in the background.

[Breaking News: Magical-power readings surge in Berlin. Monster Wave likely.]

[German government issues a Class 2 disaster warning.]

[German Prime Minister Markus makes an emergency announcement. A formal request for assistance has been sent to Korea.]

Another Monster Wave.

The news director shook his head, then turned to Simon, who was still watching him for a reaction.

“What are you waiting for? Why aren’t you rushing to Berlin right now?”

“Mr. Jin Taekyung. The German government has requested assistance.”

I answered Team Leader Choi without hesitation.

“I’ll go.”

The battle had left me exhausted, and the Broken Body debuff was still active. But this was what I had to do.

“I’ll get ready right away.”

And just as I rose from my seat, Team Leader Choi’s voice pierced my ears.

“At the same time… we also requested assistance from Michael Silbert.”

I slowly turned around.

Chapter 758

“At the same time… we also requested assistance from Michael Silbert.”

The name that Team Leader Choi suddenly blurted out.

Michael Silbert.

I paused, but I wasn’t particularly surprised. A drowning person would reach for any hand they could find.

The German government had sensed the disaster closing in and called for the two people most likely to save them.

Me and Michael Silbert.

“That gloomy, unpleasant human bastard?”

The Skeleton King looked uneasy.

“I’d rather not run into him.”

“No one here wants to.”

He clicked his tongue. “True, but something about him felt wrong from the moment I first saw him… Never mind. We need to get there before his lot.”

This wasn’t a sport where we competed to save the most lives, but I agreed with him on that.

If this keeps up, no one will be able to stop him.

The greatest beneficiary of these meticulously engineered disasters was Michael Silbert. Since the first terrorist attack, Odin Guild had suppressed more than ten Monster Waves around the world. Michael had killed S-rank monsters in most of those battles, earning acclaim for his extraordinary feats.

For a while, he had even made people forget Cheon Taemin’s name.

I have to stop him now, while there’s still time. Somehow.

I didn’t know what Michael Silbert ultimately wanted. But if a monster like him gained unchecked fame and power—if he became as untouchable as Cheon Taemin—I was certain a disaster worse than anything we’d seen would follow.

“Team Leader Choi.”

He understood what I meant and nodded. “The pilots are already waiting.”

Team Leader Choi, the Skeleton King, and I hurried toward the aircraft that had already been prepared, exchanging words as we went.

“What’s happening in Germany?”

“A Class 2 disaster warning has been issued, centered around Munich. According to the information provided by the German government, a Monster Wave will occur within five hours at the latest.”

“If five hours is the government’s upper limit…”

Team Leader Choi nodded. “It could happen at any moment.”

Running on wishful thinking in the face of disaster was a universal human trait. Or at least governments responsible for evacuating people had no choice but to do so.

The moment the German government officially admitted, “We’re fucked,” a major city like Munich would descend into chaos in an instant.

“Damn it.”

“Fortunately, their response so far has been excellent. Every country in the world has been on high alert since the terrorist attack on the Paris branch, and more than three thousand Hunters have gathered in Munich since the Class 2 disaster warning was issued. Our Ares Guild is one of them.”

“That’s something, at least. What about Odin? No—that man?” the Skeleton King asked.

“Of course, Hunters from the Odin Guild branch in Munich are standing by as well, but… the core forces led by Michael Silbert are currently in Africa.”

“Africa?”

“Yes. From what we’ve learned, they’re suppressing a Monster Wave in South Africa. They’ll head straight to Munich once they’re finished.”

“How nice for him. Starts trouble all over the place, then cleans it up one at a time?”

The Skeleton King sneered, but I shook my head.

“That’s not it.”

“Hm?”

“If it had been part of his calculations from the beginning, he would have left for Munich by now. So at least the incident in Munich wasn’t a terrorist attack he had a hand in.”

“Exactly,” Team Leader Choi said. “That makes it even more dangerous.”

“Why? If he didn’t intend for it to happen, wouldn’t that mean—”

The Skeleton King fell silent. His puzzled expression hardened.

“Ah.”

He’d realized it too. What this meant, and how much danger lay behind it.

Monster Waves can happen on their own now. No terrorist attack required.

They had still occurred after peace returned, of course. The problem was their frequency. A disaster that had once happened very rarely was becoming something that happened sometimes, perhaps even often.

Often enough to remind humanity of the days when corpses piled up like mountains and rivers ran with blood.

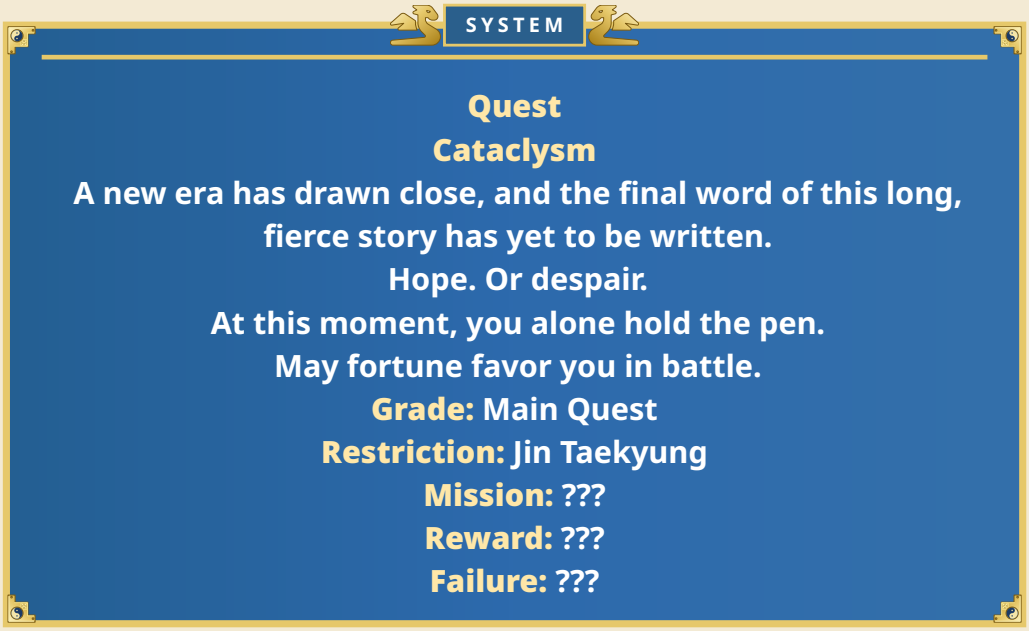
The Great Cataclysm.

Humanity had given that horrific past a name. But what would people call the new age of disaster that was about to begin—or perhaps already had?

And what was the System, which had brought me both happiness and pain, trying to tell me?

Open Quest Window.

Ding.



The quest description offered no clear answer, and its mission was nothing but question marks.

More than anything, though, one short line under Grade weighed on my chest. Those five characters burned into my eyes.

Main Quest.

I'd received more quests than I could count, from easy Third Rate quests to Supreme Peak ones that put my life on the line. Their grades varied with the difficulty, and there were different types, too, like sudden quests.

But a Main Quest was a first.

More precisely, this was the first since I'd opened my eyes in the unfamiliar world of Murim. Since the day it had all begun.

What the hell does this mean?

I didn't know what the mission was or what this approaching era would bring.

No. Deep down, I had an idea. I was trying hard to convince myself I was wrong.

Because I was afraid.

Just as the System had said, I was the only one holding the pen now.

The days when I could laugh over web novels full of satisfying victories were long gone. Now I had to write the story myself.

With a pen. With a spear.

With blood and death that might belong to anyone.

"...man. Human?"

A voice that had seemed far away pulled me out of my thoughts.

I blinked and looked around. Unfamiliar faces. Noise. A propeller spinning with a roar, and beyond the fighter jet's windows, the tense faces of the pilots.

Two people were watching me with concern.

No. One person and one monster.

"Mr. Jin Taekyung, are you all right?"

"Wicked human. Look closely. How many fingers am I holding up?"

The Skeleton King was slowly waving a hand in front of my face.

"I don't see any."

"Wrong. One. Your condition is worse than I thought—"

"I deliberately didn't count the finger you're waving because I'm going to pull it out soon."

"…"

"You're still waving it. Fold that finger while I'm asking nicely."

As the Skeleton King quietly folded the middle finger he had been enthusiastically waving, Team Leader Choi spoke in a subdued voice.

"If something's wrong, we can wait until you've rested. We don't know what kind of S-rank monster will appear, but there are forces on-site capable of responding to it, so…"

"No. I'm fine."

I cut him off. Mental exhaustion and the Broken Body debuff had left me far from my best, but every moment we delayed would mean more damage. That much was obvious.

My mission now is to stop the disaster. The disaster in Munich—and, beyond that, the disaster that would swallow this world.

"Let's go. Before we lose any more time."

I climbed aboard the fighter jet, thinking of the man at the center of it all. The enemy I would soon face again.

Michael Silbert.

Come to Munich.

The words lingered on my tongue, then faded without ever reaching him.

South Africa.

Commonly known in Korea by the abbreviation Nam-agong, this country was Africa's most highly developed industrial nation. Because it had few Gates, it was also one of the countries that had suffered the least damage from monsters, from the Great Cataclysm until now.

At least until half a day ago.

Rumble!

Smoke and flames blotted out the clear sky.

Cape Town, the capital of South Africa, welcomed wealthy visitors and countless tourists from around the world. Now it was filled with screams, death, and the roars of monsters.

Crunch! Crash!

“Graaaah!”

“Ghk!”

A pack of Trolls took over the road, swinging their clubs at anything in reach. Their steel clubs struck with the immense strength of large monsters, cutting down people fleeing in every direction. Each fell with a final cry.

Crack!

“Kwoooaar!”

The leader stomped a fallen corpse’s head apart and let out a savage roar. Its followers, tasting human blood for the first time in ages, gave in to instinct.

Craaaack!

They seized a moving car and slammed it into the ground. Dozens rushed at buildings large and small, smashing them until they collapsed. Explosions erupted everywhere, but the Trolls’ tough skin and tremendous Regeneration kept them standing.

Boom!

Flames surged from another explosion. The leader smiled in satisfaction as its damaged hide healed in an instant, as though it would tolerate no wound at all.

At its broad, heavy feet lay the bodies of Hunters, their limbs twisted or their torsos split in two.

“Grrrk.”

Easy. Far too easy.

If this had happened not long ago, it would not have been able to deal with the humans who crossed through the Gate and invaded its territory so effortlessly.

“Ha. Ha. Ha!”

The world was changing. The monsters’ bodies held purer, stronger magical power than ever before, and humans could not stop them.

Everything was returning to its rightful place.

Over the past several decades, humans had gone from prey to hunters.

Now they were prey again.

“I. WILL. KILL. EVERY. LAST. ONE!!”

Years of oppression. Years of humans invading their territory and hunting them. The leader’s fury erupted in a roar.

Whoosh! Boom!

Its vision went black.

No—its head was gone.

The leader wasn't alarmed. A Troll could survive losing its head. Unless its body was pulverized, its tremendous Regeneration would keep it alive—

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh! Boom-boom-boom!

Along with the sound of air splitting, the leader's consciousness snapped off.

For all its Regeneration and steel-hard flesh, the leader was helpless. Its body dropped to its knees before it could even wonder what had happened.

Silence followed its death.

"Kwo?"

The other Trolls looked around in confusion. A calm voice reached them.

"Let's finish this quickly."

Step.

With the footstep moving forward, a colossal force bore down on everything around them.

"My friend is waiting for me."

Chapter 759

The command center felt hot and muggy, like a steam sauna.

It wasn't. The oppressive heat was an illusion born of the anxiety weighing on everyone inside.

The temperature was kept perfect around the clock by Magic, yet cold sweat streamed down German Prime Minister Markus's forehead.

"Magical power levels are surging!"

"Class 1 disaster level expected within thirty minutes!"

"The area of increased magical power is expanding!"

"Intelligence has revised the enemy estimate! At least ten thousand!"

"A report from Commander Scholz! He's requesting authorization to use 'Uran' as a precaution!"

Markus bit his lip at the final report.

Uran.

The closely guarded code word meant uranium. In other words, nuclear weapons.

As a nation defeated in the Second World War, Germany was not supposed to possess nuclear weapons. But some truths could never be made public.

He wants to use Uran?

Commander Scholz, who was overseeing the blockade of Munich, was no fool who spoke without thinking. He was one of the few commanders with military successes to his name from the Great Cataclysm, and a man known for his cool judgment.

"Your Excellency."

At his aide's call, Markus squeezed his eyes shut. Then he forced out the words.

"Prepare Uran."

"B-but…"

"It's a precaution against the worst-case scenario. I'm giving you this order as the head of this country's government."

The generals and aides stared at him, wide-eyed. Then they nodded.

They knew as well as he did: against high-level monsters that might as well be demons, nuclear weapons were almost the only modern arms capable of dealing meaningful damage.

And…

If the worst does happen, even nuclear weapons might be useless.

A nuclear weapon was a double-edged sword.

If the enemy included a monster comparable to a high-ranking mage, it could use spatial teleportation to drop their nuclear missile over a major city.

If the attack succeeded, Munich—Germany's third-largest city—would be wiped out. If it failed… Markus didn't want to imagine what would follow.

"What about the citizens?"

"The evacuation is still underway. About ten percent of Munich's population remains in the danger zone."

"Move faster. Once this begins, there's no turning back."

"Yes, sir."

The capital, Berlin, had already taken a direct hit in the earlier terrorist attack. Markus couldn't stand by and let Munich suffer the same fate. The human and material losses from Monster Waves so far were astronomical.

We have to stop this one.

Even if it meant blowing the entire city away with nuclear weapons, the people had to survive.

A nation could exist because there were people living within its borders.

And to do that, they needed reinforcements. Hunters who were one-person armies, each capable of doing the work of a thousand—or ten thousand.

"What happened to them?"

No names were needed. Everyone in the command center knew whom he meant, and reports came from all sides.

"Michael Silbert is engaged in combat in Cape Town!"

"The battle is heavily in his favor! Estimated to end within thirty minutes!"

"Damn it. Why did it have to be Africa?"

Someone's frustrated mutter had barely faded when another aide spoke up.

"Jin Taekyung is on his way to Munich. Estimated time until he reaches the site is about one hour."

"What? A whole hour?"

"Didn't you say we only had thirty minutes until Class 1?"

"I-I'm sorry. He's traveling as fast as he can by fighter jet, but it's more than eight thousand kilometers[3127]…"

"Goddamn it!"

While those around him lost all semblance of composure, Markus wiped his forehead with a handkerchief already soaked through.

"Everyone, stay calm. The estimated number of monsters has increased, but we're not outmatched. Evacuate every remaining civilian while there's still time, and deploy every force we have."

Five thousand Hunters made up the main force surrounding the danger zone. With all the reserves waiting in the rear, they would have an army of ten thousand.

[3127] Eight thousand kilometers is about 5,000 miles.

And at its head stood Germany's own S-rank Hunter, Schumacher.

Thud.

Prime Minister Markus sprang to his feet and spoke in a resolute voice.

"We have every chance of winning. Thirty minutes. If we can hold out for just thirty minutes, we can minimize the damage and bring this to an end—"

"Emergency report from Commander Scholz!"

Along with the scream-like cry that swallowed the rest of the prime minister's words, a massive shock swept through the command center.

"M-magical power! It's passed the critical threshold!"

The critical threshold.

That could mean only one thing.

A Monster Wave.

At last, the solid dam—the barrier that had kept humans and monsters apart—had collapsed.

Rumble!

A tremendous tremor swept through Munich.

The concrete-covered ground split open. High-rises designed to withstand earthquakes toppled like dominoes.

Crash! Boom!

And beyond the thunderous noise, people could finally hear it. See it.

Shhhh!

The air split as though sliced by a sword, and the cries of countless monsters came from the opening.

—Grrrk.

Hissss.

Mist darker than gray, almost black, spilled out and seeped through the area.

Monsters with human arms and legs and the heads of bulls.

The Minotaurs emerged without end, breathing hard as they looked around.

This strange world was filled with noises they had never heard. Yet the magical power permeating it was sweeter than anything, and the countless humans in the distance stirred the ferocity they had been born with.

—Krrk, kaaaaa!

Kill them. Kill the humans and conquer this world.

Roaring as one, the Minotaurs charged toward the humans who had raised a wall of steel with their enormous shields.

Toward more blood and magical power.

Rumble!

As countless hooves pounded the ground, streaks shot across the sky with a heavy rush of air and plunged down upon the monsters.

Boom! Boom! Boom!

Missiles poured in from the German Armed Forces waiting in the rear.

Massive explosions accompanied by flames swallowed everything around them. Everything left behind in the area, where most of the citizens had already been evacuated, was reduced to ash and melted beneath the horrific firepower.

At least, that was what the humans hoped—even knowing that weapons born of science could not stop these monsters.

Kaaaaa…

The bombardment, which had seemed endless, finally ceased.

Silence settled over the city. One of the Hunters staring into the mist that still lingered muttered, “They’re coming.”

Everyone had been thinking it. A moment later, it came true.

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

A fierce tremor shook the earth. Beyond the dark mist, more horns than anyone could count flashed into view.

Then came the roar of a monster whose presence dwarfed every other Minotaur’s.

—Kraaaaaa!

The Fear of the S-rank Minotaur Lord spread in every direction.

At the head of its army, the leader swept away everything blocking the broad road and kicked off the ground with all its might.

Boom! Whoosh!

The ground sank beneath it like a sinkhole.

As the monster’s massive body charged forward with a tremendous roar, a figure shot toward it at the speed of a beam of light.

“How dare you!”

The fury in his voice was unmistakable.

Once a gold medalist who had represented Germany in fencing, he had become a symbol of the country itself: S-rank Hunter Joel Schumacher.

His hand moved, and his sabre followed.

Swish!

A silver line cut through the air. The Minotaur Lord swung its enormous halberd to meet it.

Boom!

A muffled blast and a shock wave shook everything around them.

It was the signal for the battle to begin. The two species, bound to a fate neither could escape, charged at each other.

“Formation!”

“Don’t fall back! Kill them all!”

—Kaaaaa!

Rumble!

Swish-swish-swish! Crunch!

Roars and screams rose from every side, with death close behind.

It was the beginning of a horrific bloodbath that could end only after they had killed and been killed by one another.

Joel Schumacher fought as if possessed.

He lost track of time. He had no idea who was dying around him, or how many.

He couldn’t afford to look. If he took his eyes off the Minotaur Lord for even a moment, its enormous halberd would smash his body to pieces.

Whoosh! Crunch!

The halberd’s blade passed right in front of him with a heavy roar of air, making the fine hairs on his body stand on end.

Yet his body, trained through countless repetitions and battles, moved with effortless fluidity.

Swish! Bang!

He stepped and thrust his sabre. Compressed air burst from its tip.

The Minotaur Lord retreated a step with agility that belied its massive size, its face twisting.

—Krrk?

Confusion and pain mingled in its cry. A hole the size of a child’s fist had opened in its shoulder.

That worked.

A thrill ran down Schumacher’s spine.

His movement had been so fast and natural that he hadn’t even been aware of it, as though invisible strings had guided his body.

What was that? Have I lost too much blood?

The fight had not been easy. Honestly, it had been grueling.

The rusty spearhead of the halberd tore away chunks of flesh with even a glancing hit. Every clash of their weapons sent enough force through him to drain his Stamina.

Strength: overwhelmingly inferior.

Speed: slightly superior.

That was the balance so far, and exhaustion and blood loss were beginning to blur his vision.

But for some reason, he felt as though he could do anything now.

As if he could bring down that terrifying monster and become the superhuman who saved this land.

Yes. The Übermensch.

Friedrich Nietzsche, the father of German philosophy, had spoken of the Übermensch: a superhuman who rose even in tragedy, a great overcomer who strove to realize his fullest potential.

And at this moment, Joel Schumacher was rising to a new level through martial force, not merely as an idea.

He drew on everything he had built through training and experience, from his years as the world's greatest fencer until now. And on his will to survive.

Swish! Swish-swish-swish!

Streaks of light crossed the air.

Every time the sabre danced, swung with the least movement and the greatest speed, the Minotaur staggered backward, spraying blood.

Thrust! Slash!

He stabbed and cut.

To Schumacher's hazy eyes, the monster's body was riddled with openings. Every one of his heightened senses was fixed on a single target.

The Minotaur Lord.

Now!

Slash! Fwoosh!

A fountain of blood shot into the air. Schumacher blinked.

Huh?

Something was wrong.

The monster's blood should have been green or blue. The blood falling over his head was red as a rose.

Like human blood.

"…Cough."

Blood spilled between his dry lips.

The dreamlike haze vanished, and reality rushed in.

I've been cut.

He hadn't cut the monster. He had been cut.

Fiery pain spread from his back, and Schumacher staggered.

At the last moment, while all his senses had been focused on the leader, another Minotaur had slashed his back with a rusty sword. His comrades cut off its head and caught him.

“Schumacher!”

“Damn it! Get him out of—”

Whoosh! Crunch!

The hands supporting him vanished. So did his comrade’s breathing.

Schumacher lost his balance and fell. Gasping, he lifted his head.

The Minotaur Lord stood over him, leader of the monsters that had come to Munich, an enormous double-bladed axe raised high.

…Goddamn it.

This was the end.

For Munich. For the Hunters here.

And for the Übermensch his homeland, Germany, had wanted so desperately.

Schumacher gave a hollow laugh and closed his eyes.

No—he was about to close them when a stranger’s voice reached him.

“You’re going to die like this?”

His fading mind stirred. Schumacher blinked slowly through his blurred vision and saw someone standing between him and the Minotaur Lord.

The man’s back seemed broader than the monster’s. His presence was calm, yet overwhelming.

A spear rested in his hand.

And Schumacher understood.

“Jin… Taekyung.”

Asia’s Übermensch had arrived on the battlefield.

Chapter 760

"Über, what?"

He had definitely called my name before muttering something, but when I glanced back, Joel Schumacher was already collapsed against a pile of concrete with his head resting on it.

He really gave it everything he had.

I could see why. From what I'd seen, he'd been fighting in a Trance.

That dreamlike moment when enlightenment carried you into a greater realm.

Unfortunately, Schumacher had been ambushed before he could see it through. But when he opened his eyes again, he would probably be stronger.

"Should I wake him?"

"He couldn't get up even if you did. Leave him be, and make sure he doesn't die."

"You heard him, right? Handsome hu—no, Team Leader Choi?"

"…Understood."

That bastard had gotten so good at dumping work on other people, he was practically human now.

Still, the Skeleton King would be far more useful in the fight. Instead of giving him a hard time, I quietly sent him a Sound Transmission.

You know what to do, right?

You treat this body like a child.

Say it back to me.

His reply came back curt.

There are human eyes watching, so suppress your magical power as much as possible. And when using your power is unavoidable, make absolutely certain that no one notices.

Good.

Satisfied now?

This is enough to make you about middle-school age, not a child.

…How dare you. You're not even thirty. This body is an elder who has lived for over a hundred years.

Technically, haven't you been dead for over a hundred years?

"What!"

The Skeleton King's indignant shout came out loud enough for everyone to hear. I laughed quietly and let my spearhead hang at an angle.

"I've said what I needed to. Go on."

My voice sounded strange to me, as if it belonged to someone else. Dry as sand.

The hint of a smile that had touched my lips was already gone.

I crooked a finger at the enormous monster watching me warily.

“You. Come here.”

—Grrr…

The Minotaur Lord.

A low growl and a foul stench spilled from its maw. Its blood-red eyes were already full of caution.

—Who. Are. You.

“Me?”

At the center of a battlefield that had fallen into a lull when I appeared, I took a slow step forward.

“The Majang-dong Spearman.”

—…Strong. Hu. Man.

Most Minotaurs were cow-headed idiots who couldn’t even count, but a monster’s intelligence grew with its grade, whatever its species. S-rank monsters in particular had been granted exceptional power.

That was why the Minotaur Lord had stood rooted to the spot from the moment I appeared.

Instinct had already told it the truth.

It couldn’t beat me on its own.

“You caught on fast. You haven’t tried charging me.”

—…!

Step. Boom.

Our footsteps sounded together. The Minotaur Lord retreated exactly as far as I advanced, then suddenly roared like a wild beast.

—Kaaaaaa!

Fwoosh!

Magical power swelled around its massive body and spread to every corner of the battlefield.

At the same time, the thousands of Minotaurs that had sensed something wrong and begun to stop their attacks charged, their eyes gleaming with bloodlust.

Not at the Hunters they’d been fighting.

At us.

—Kwooooo!

Rumble-rumble-rumble!

Their cries shook the earth. Watching the countless bulls surge toward us from every direction, the Skeleton King muttered, “But we haven’t left yet…”

“That’s why you should’ve gone sooner.”

“Can I use a little of my power, then? I think we need an army.”

“If you want to announce that you’re a monster, why not start an internet broadcast? You could rake in virtual gifts with a ‘Skeleton Army Creation’ stream.”

“Damn it. Too late to ask them to let us through, I suppose?”

Team Leader Choi answered the Skeleton King’s nonsense.

“Spend less time worrying about that and more time drawing your weapon.”

Shing.

A silver blade slid free as he spoke. The Hero’s Sword pointed toward the monsters, its aura dazzling.

Then Team Leader Choi’s calm voice reached every ear.

“Formation. Now.”

Clack-clack-clack!

The three of us weren’t the only ones who had come to save Munich.

Around two hundred Hunters from the Ares Guild and Peace Guild had come with us. They hadn’t had much chance to contribute against Leviathan, but they were the elite of the elite. Without a hint of hesitation, they readied themselves to meet the enemy.

“Please give us our orders.”

Team Leader Choi. The Skeleton King. Even the Hunters who had barely survived the crisis in the middle of their grueling fight.

Everyone was looking at my mouth.

Waiting for my command alone.

And right now, there was only one thing I could tell them.

“Kill every last one.”

Whooooooosh.

The fire dragon coiled in my lower dantian woke and spread through every part of my body.

Taking the crowd’s thunderous roar as my signal, I kicked off the ground with all my strength.

Boom!

Wind whipped past me. Dozens of meters[3128] vanished in an instant, bringing the charging Minotaur army right up to my face.

No. They hadn’t come to me.

I’d come to them.

Whoosh.

I exhaled, held my breath, and raised the spear I’d been holding at an angle. Powerful Scorching Yang Qi turned to flame along its transparent blade.

And then… I let it loose.

[3128] Dozens of meters is roughly tens to hundreds of feet; 1 m is about 3.28 ft.

Now.

Fire Dragon Divine Spear, first form.

Fire Dragon's Single Tail.

Whoom—fwoooosh!

A line of flame swept through the air with a blast of superheated wind.

Curving smoothly like a dragon's tail, the qi scythed across everything ahead of me. It melted horns that could pierce alloy with ease and burned through the monsters' bones and hides.

Kaaaaaaboom!

One strike.

The wave of flame swallowed dozens of Minotaurs. Not one screamed.

They burned black without so much as a final cry. Even the ones charging behind them stopped and faltered at the sight.

—Kwooooo!

Their leader roared at their backs, urging them on. But instinctive terror drowned out its command, and they paid dearly for that brief hesitation.

Slash!

Heads and limbs rose into the air.

I plunged into their midst and went wild.

One Minotaur finally came to its senses and swung a mace. I cleaved through it and the monster holding it, then struck another across its thickly hide-covered chest with the back of my hand.

Crack!

Bone shattered. Its massive body flew backward and smashed through the formation.

The Minotaurs shoved their dead comrade aside and scrambled to their feet. Countless spells and arrows came flying over their heads.

Whish, thud-thud-thud!

Boom! Bzzzzzt!

Those struck through the head or eye by aura-coated arrows had the easier deaths. Fire made from mana burned through hides, while lightning split into dozens of streams and lit up the battlefield.

—Krrk, krrrk!

Boom! Thud.

Monsters convulsed and fell one after another. A familiar face was the first to burst through the acrid smoke left by fire and lightning.

"Aaaah! You goddamn monsters!"

Whoooosh—crack!

Leaving aside how naturally he'd taken to slaughtering his fellow monsters, where the hell had he found that?

The Skeleton King gripped an enormous halberd. With one swing, he split three or four Minotaurs in half.

He was about to swing at the next ones charging him when blue aura shot through the smoke.

Slash!

A clean movement. Not a bit of force wasted.

Team Leader Choi cut neatly through a neck and spoke.

"Charge."

His voice was low but firm. Mana carried that one word across the battlefield, turning it into a rallying cry.

"Waaaaaah!"

"You fucking bastards!"

"Kill them all! Defend our home!"

Thud-thud-thud-thud!

Countless Hunters surged forward with a roar, their ranks rolling in like a wave.

They weren't as tall or vast as the waves Leviathan had raised. But something stronger burned in their eyes.

The will not to surrender this land.

Grief for the comrades who had died here today, and vengeance reserved for the monsters before them.

And I was at their head.

Whoom—boom!

Compressed air burst from the end of a punch I drove forward like a beam of light.

A monster dropped like a rotten log, its head gone without a trace. I rained spear strikes on the enemies revealed behind it.

Whish-whish-whish!

Cut. Stab. Twist and crush.

Nothing could stop Ten-Thousand-Year Cold Iron wreathed in Force.

My spearhead sliced through sturdy weapons like tofu and split the monsters behind them. Even under the effects of a special debuff, my body had long since surpassed its limits—and those of the monsters.

As it did now.

—Kwooooo!

Whoooom!

A heavy rush of air bore down on my side along with the monster's cry. With three Minotaurs skewered on my spear, I reached out with my free hand the instant I sensed it.

Thud.

A fist the size of a manhole cover stopped against my much smaller palm.

Ridiculously easily.

—Kwo?

The Minotaur blinked with the innocent look of the yellow ox at Scholar Kim's house[3129].

I gave a quiet laugh at the sight and gently guided the force of its trembling fist upward.

Whoom!

The fist struck empty air a handspan above me.

The monster had lost its target. My foot hadn't. It shot forward like lightning and struck its chest with precisely the force and timing I wanted.

Crack!

Something broke with a sickening sound, and its body hurtled away. Far away, sweeping up every comrade in its path.

Straight toward the leader that had watched it all from behind.

And then…

Slash! Fwoooosh!

The lifeless body split in two. Through the fountain of blood, the Minotaur Lord glared at me.

Blood-red eyes. A double-bladed axe stained with its subordinate's blood.

But I knew what lay deep in those eyes.

Wariness had turned to fear, and that fear kept driving it backward.

"Want to run?"

—…!

"Sure. I can see why you would. But…"

Whoooom! Crack!

Dozens of Minotaurs that had rushed in from every direction to protect their leader were flung away. At last, after the monsters had been reduced to gruesome heaps of blood and flesh, the path ahead lay wide open.

I shook the blood from my spearhead and slowly continued.

"You came here however the fuck you pleased. You don't get to leave that way."

—You…!

Boom!

The belated cry was swallowed by the thunderous sound exploding from my toes.

[3129] The nureongso, the yellowish-brown native Korean ox, was a docile farm animal; a country scholar's ox is an image of placid, simple innocence.

I shot toward it like a beam of light, the distance vanishing between us. The Minotaur Lord gritted its teeth and hurled its double-bladed axe.

Whoooooosh!

Darkness rushed at me with a roar of displaced air.

No. Magical power.

Still flying low from that single push off the ground, I twisted my body.

Whoom.

A fierce wind thick with the smell of blood brushed the tip of my nose. I thrust my spear.

“Die.”

Crack!

This time, too, there was no final cry.

Chapter 761

No matter how powerful a monster was, unless it possessed regenerative abilities equal to or greater than a Troll's, it was bound to die if its neck or heart was pierced.

Just like now.

Whoosh!

The Minotaur Lord jerked its neck back. Too late to avoid the spearhead driving toward it.

No—my strike was too fast and precise to let it escape.

Crunch!

The spearhead pierced its throat, cut through flesh and bone, and burst out the other side.

Its eyes went wide with pain. Blood and phlegm rattled in its slightly open mouth.

Grrk. Grrrk…

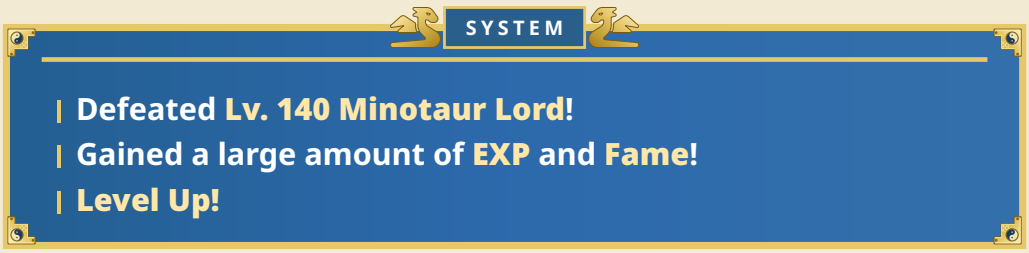
What tenacious vitality.

But it was time to put a period to it.

"Goodbye."

Boom!

The flame carried by my spearhead exploded. Its tree-thick neck snapped in an instant, sending its head flying.



As the System notification rang in my ears, I slowly turned around.

The battlefield had fallen silent. Humans and monsters who had been fighting fiercely moments ago were all staring at me.

At me, standing before the monster's crumpled corpse.

At me, who looked like hope to some and nothing short of disaster to others.

They had stopped as if by agreement. I kicked the Minotaur Lord's head where it lay on the ground.

Whoooosh—clang!

The severed head soared high into the sky and landed at the center of the battlefield.

Kickoff for the second half. No, for the final period of overtime.

But the stunned players needed a word from the referee to get moving.

“What are you waiting for? Wipe them all out.”

“…!”

—…!

Human and monster eyes widened at the same time, though for different reasons.

Joy for the humans.

Fear for the monsters.

And at the moment countless gazes filled with those different emotions left me and met one another—

“Waaaaaaaah!”

A roar loud enough to leave my ears ringing rose as a wave of humans certain of victory swept over the monsters.

Shreeeek! Crunch!

“All of you, come at me! You fucking monsters!”

“…”

Why was that bastard always out in front?

The monster world’s Yi Wan-yong, or something.[3130]

I shook my head at the sight of the Skeleton King hacking through monsters left and right with his halberd, then charged into their already half-broken ranks.

Whoosh-whoosh-whoosh! Slash!

Right.

The battle wasn’t over. All that remained was the slaughter.

The slaughter began around sunset and ended deep into the night.

With their leader dead, the fear-stricken Minotaur army fell apart in an instant and scattered in every direction. Somewhere along the way, I had become the field commander. I settled their fate with one simple order.

“Chase them. Turn the whole city upside down if you have to.”

After that, it was a hunt.

True to their name, the Hunters ground the already shattered Minotaur army into dust.

“You bastards!”

“This is revenge for Jonas! Kill every last one of them!”

Whoooosh! Crunch!

—Kaaaaaah!

[3130] Yi Wan-yong was a Korean official who collaborated with Japan during its colonization of Korea.

A Hunter could die from a single stroke of bad luck. But how many people could accept a comrade's death as just part of the job?

All the grief they had felt today turned to rage. Victory became another word for revenge.

"Minotaurs spotted! They're headed toward the international airport!"

"What should we do?"

"Excuse me?"

"Your orders, please!"

"…?"

That caught me off guard.

Never mind the military commander handling the rear guard—these Hunters had their own team leaders. Why ask an outsider like me? Still, the answer was simple enough.

"What are you waiting for? Instead of wasting time asking me this, go kill them."

"Thank you! Team Three, follow me!"

"Waaaaaah!"

"Übermensch has ordered us to slaughter every last monster!"

"Follow Übermensch! Crush their flesh and bones, and drink their blood!"

"Übermensch! Übermensch!"

"Flesh and bone! Bone and flesh!"

"…"

What the fuck. That was scary.

Judging by the shouts echoing from every direction, this wasn't Germany anymore. It was the Aztec Empire at minimum.

Granted, they were hunting invading monsters rather than people. That was a pretty big difference.

"Still, it would probably be better not to drink the blood…"

"What was that?"

"Nothing."

Team Leader Choi gave me a strange look, wiped the blood from his face, and spoke.

"It seems most of them have been dealt with. The German Armed Forces deployed the rear guard they had held back, and I hear they're right on the verge of annihilating the rest."

"Quite a few escaped."

"They're tracking them all with drones. They won't get away."

I nodded and asked what mattered most.

"What about casualties?"

"About fifteen hundred reported so far. Nearly a thousand dead. The rest are seriously injured, but their lives aren't in danger."

Science and magic had come together in this world.

Most injuries could be treated with surgery, and with healing magic and potions added to the mix, even someone who had lost a limb could recover enough to move around without difficulty within a month.

But the number of dead weighed on me.

"A thousand…"

Far too many people had died.

I had arrived as fast as I could and fought with everything I had. I still hadn't been able to save them.

"Mr. Jin."

At Team Leader Choi's quiet call, I shook my head.

"I'm fine. I know what you're going to say."

Objectively, today's battle had been a decisive victory. We had crushed an army of nearly ten thousand Minotaurs, killed the S-rank monster leading them, and kept our losses to a minimum.

But a wound didn't stop hurting just because it was smaller than it could have been.

The exhausted Hunters still chasing monsters for revenge were proof of that. We had won a great victory, and we were in pain.

We had been for a long time. We still were.

That was war.

A wheel of suffering with no real winners or losers, where the outcome depended on who inflicted the greater wounds.

Knowing that didn't change my duty to fight. Or to stop the person reaching out from unseen darkness, setting that wheel spinning faster after its brief pause.

—What about him? Michael Silbert?

Team Leader Choi heard my Sound Transmission. Without so much as twitching an eyebrow, he moved his lips.

—He's on his way to Munich now that he's wrapped things up in South Africa, or so I heard.

—He was a step too late this time.

—This was never part of the plan.

Odin Guild was enormous. With branches all over the world, it could respond quickly—but even then, it couldn't have accomplished what we had today.

Michael had used the Prophet as a tool to bring about this disaster.

To everyone else, it might look like the indiscriminate terror attack of a mad fanatic. But Michael Silbert, who had manipulated everything from behind the scenes, knew exactly when and where the terror would occur.

The Monster Wave in South Africa was probably one of them.

But there were exceptions.

I had intervened in the Munich Monster Wave, something Michael Silbert had failed to predict, and stopped the disaster before he could.

No.

And in doing so, I had gained the power to stand in his way: the public's renewed support and trust.

"…"

"What is it?"

"Nothing."

I looked around. A ruined city. Bodies and pools of blood in every street.

I felt sick. As though I had used the deaths of more than a thousand people to further my own ends. As though I, too, had become a monster no different from Michael Silbert or the Prophet.

But…

I had done everything I could. Call it self-justification. Call it telling myself I'd won. I didn't care.

I had tried to save as many lives as possible and fought through gritted teeth to prevent a greater disaster.

And as a result, I had become the only—and greatest—obstacle in this world capable of standing against Michael Silbert.

Open Quest window.

Ding.

A familiar chime sounded, and a holographic window unfolded before me. The same Main Quest, unchanged since I had first seen it.

Cataclysm.

I repeated the word reflected in my eyes.

I had killed the Minotaur Lord, the greatest cause of this Monster Wave, and wiped out nearly ten thousand monsters. Still, the System had said nothing.

As if there was still a long way to go.

As if it would only finish the mission assigned to me after I had shattered all of Michael Silbert's plans and brought him to complete ruin—or ended his life.

I was staring silently at the window when—

Whoooooom.

"…!"

I turned my head. Far off in the dark sky, beyond what an ordinary person could see, a faint light was approaching.

What is that?

A question. A guess. Then certainty.

My tangled thoughts worked through all three before reaching an answer.

Team Leader Choi noticed something was wrong a moment after I did and spoke in a subdued voice.

“He’s arrived.”

“Yes.”

Crrk.

My grip tightened on the spear shaft until my knuckles went white. I watched the light draw closer and muttered,

“He’s here.”

Simon, a reporter nearing his tenth year on the job, was bursting with excitement and nerves.

This is a scoop. A scoop.

His smartphone was full of notes and draft headlines he had been typing for hours.

An army of monsters led by the S-rank monster Minotaur Lord.

Estimated number: ten thousand. A massive force.

Central Munich. Urban battle breaks out.

The battle turns against humanity. And then Jin Taekyung finally appears.

S-rank Hunter Joel Schumacher in crisis, saved by a true transcendent being. Is Jin Taekyung Übermensch?

A great victory! A scoop! Are you seeing this, News Director? You bastard, you’re worse than a pig’s asshole. Why the fu— am I getting blamed because Daniel Daisuke got the rally canceled?

Tap. Tap-tap.

Simon stopped typing and deleted the last note.

The news director had shouted at him half a day ago over the cancellation of the rally against Jin Taekyung. But the man had also sent him here, and remembering that took some of the edge off his irritation.

Yeah, all right. Upper management’s been riding him hard lately.

Covering for your superior was also part of a subordinate’s duty. Simon nodded and entered a new note.

The meeting of two heroes.

Jin Taekyung and Michael Silbert meet again in Munich!

And just as Simon typed the final exclamation point, a powerful wind blew toward him and the countless other reporters.

Whoooosh.

“They’re here!”

“Is that Odin Guild?”

“Definitely! That’s the Guild Master’s private aircraft!”

Shouts broke out all around him. Simon watched in awe as the massive aircraft slowly descended toward a nearby open lot, then hurried after the reporters surging forward like a wave.

He had no idea what was about to happen there.

Chapter 762

Damn.

Huginn clicked his tongue softly.

Through the windows, specially treated to keep anyone from seeing inside, he could see the ground drawing closer and an astonishing number of reporters waiting below.

They've come out in force.

Not that reporters gathering for Michael Silbert was unusual. His name attracted them even in ordinary times. Since the terrorist attacks began, the mere sight of the Guild Master's private aircraft was enough to send them rushing over.

But Huginn couldn't remember seeing a crowd this large in years.

The problem is, those cameras aren't pointed at us.

The media wielded tremendous power. The easily swayed public treated cameras as its eyes and speakers as its ears.

And if every spotlight here fell on Jin Taekyung?

Troublesome. Very troublesome.

Huginn took his smartphone from his pocket.

"Leave them be."

"…!"

A voice suddenly slipped into his ear, and Huginn's heart lurched.

How?

He knew the voice. He had served its owner for years. What startled him was that he hadn't sensed Michael Silbert's presence at all—not even the faintest trace of it.

And Huginn was an exceptionally skilled S-rank Hunter himself.

"…You've arrived, sir."

Michael caught the agitation Huginn couldn't quite suppress.

"Was I that unexpected?"

Huginn considered his answer. "No."

"You looked surprised."

"For a moment, I was. Not anymore."

"Why is that?"

"Because you're the Guild Master."

"You really are a born flatterer."

"I mean it. I'd stake my life on it."

"Don't go staking such a precious life so easily."

"It's all right. I gave it to you long ago."

Michael let out a quiet laugh at the ready answer and looked out the window.

"It's rather noisy outside."

"I was just about to have them sent away."

"I thought you might. Knowing you."

Then he added, "Leave them be."

Huginn ran his fingers over the smartphone in his hand. A single phone call would be enough to send all the reporters gathered outside away.

Even if they used force, not a line about it would appear in the papers. That was Odin Guild. That was the world they lived in.

But his superior's wishes mattered more to Huginn than anything else. Even so, he couldn't understand this order.

"May I ask why?"

"Why?"

"Why you came all the way to Munich when there's nothing to gain here. Why you intend to meet Jin Taekyung in front of all those reporters."

The question had been with Huginn since they left South Africa. They hadn't foreseen the Munich Monster Wave, and by the time their aircraft took off, Jin Taekyung was already several steps ahead of them, bringing the whole crisis to an end.

In short, today's stage belonged to Jin Taekyung.

"Public opinion toward him has taken a sharp turn. The demonstrations against him that broke out around the world after the Leviathan incident have been disbanding one after another. Even the media outlets working with us are being cautious now."

"So?"

"Today, at least, he's drawing more attention than you are, Guild Master. Must you meet him here and draw even more eyes?"

"You make it sound as though I'd be nothing but part of his supporting cast. A spotlight to make him shine brighter."

"…I'm sorry, but yes."

Huginn lowered his head. He had spoken out of loyalty, but he couldn't bring himself to face the anger he expected.

But this is reality.

The tide had already turned.

Michael's Odin Guild had built an impressive record during the terrorist crisis by suppressing more than ten Monster Waves. Yet Jin Taekyung had restored his steadily declining reputation in only two battles.

Leviathan's infamy from the Great Cataclysm, when it had all but ruled the seas, had played a part. So had Jin's overwhelming victory over the Munich Monster

Wave, whose scale had surpassed all expectations. But Huginn believed there was a deeper reason public opinion had changed so quickly.

Jin Taekyung.

People who already had plenty tended to inspire envy and resentment before admiration. Jin Taekyung, though, was familiar to them. A hero who gave everything he had.

He had grown up in a family that struggled to make ends meet. From the moment he Awakened, he had supported them, going from Gate to Gate without a day off. As recently as a year ago, he'd lived on ramen in a shabby goshiwon[3131] room of barely five pyeong.[3132]

Young, poor, and among the lowest-ranked Hunters, he had been someone people could find anywhere in the world. Even after he gained tremendous wealth and Fame, the Jin Taekyung from those days remained etched in their hearts.

When he stormed a massive Guild alone in pursuit of revenge. When he stained a desert red with blood to achieve his goal. Even when he broke countless laws and procedures along the way, he faced no more than condemnation.

Huginn was certain that was why.

The world… the public loves Jin Taekyung.

The media offensive hadn't shaken his core supporters. Those who had condemned him out of fear of terrorism crumbled like sandcastles after just one or two displays of what he could do.

Of course. It's Jin Taekyung, after all.

They accepted him again—and blamed themselves for ever wavering.

It's a kind of pardon. An invisible pardon the public has given him.

No one but Cheon Taemin had ever possessed it. Michael had worked so hard to obtain it. Jin Taekyung already had it.

Which is exactly why we can't make him stand out any more than he does.

A slight vibration ran through the aircraft, and the pilot's voice came over the speakers.

"Landing successful. The door will open shortly. Please let me know when you're ready."

"Not yet. Keep the door closed and wait—"

"Open it."

"…!"

Huginn jerked his head up. Michael saw his bewilderment and gave a hearty laugh.

"Huginn, my cautious friend."

[3131] A goshiwon is a small, inexpensive rented room, often with shared facilities.

[3132] Pyeong is a Korean unit of area. Five pyeong is about 16.6 m^2, or 178 ft^2.

“Guild Master!”

“Don’t worry. I have no intention of becoming anyone’s spotlight.”

“What do you—”

“I’m opening the door. Please stand clear of the entrance.”

Psssh.

Huginn’s unfinished voice was swallowed by the noise that erupted the instant the door opened, like a dam collapsing.

Click, click-click-click!

“Michael! Michael! Please look this way!”

“TBC Broadcasting! Could we have a word?”

“I understand this is your second meeting. What kind of relationship do you normally have with Mr. Jin?”

“Nearly every crisis has been resolved. Why come to Munich now?”

“What do you think of Mr. Jin’s performance?”

“According to the German government, the Munich Monster Wave was nearly ten times the size of the one in Cape Town! Don’t you think it took far too long to suppress?”

Flashes fired without pause. Reporters shouted questions over one another, and Huginn’s face hardened.

Most of the questions being thrown at them revolved around Jin Taekyung. One audacious reporter had even gone so far as to compare them.

“…Whatever you have in mind, Guild Master, it would be best to postpone the interview.”

Michael calmly shook his head and strode toward the exit.

With a single remark that seemed to have nothing to do with the current situation.

“I watched the video you obtained in Japan. Very interesting.”

“Pardon?”

“Come along. We can’t keep him waiting any longer.”

Step.

Michael descended the aircraft stairs without hesitation and stood before the cameras and flashing lights.

Beyond the reporters clamoring for a scoop, and the German Armed Forces soldiers holding them back, he spotted someone approaching. He broke into a broad smile.

“At last, the young hero has arrived.”

Flash!

The night was illuminated by the most dazzling burst of flashes yet.

Reporters gasped and hurriedly parted. The two heroes walked slowly through the opening until they stood face-to-face.

“We meet again, Jin.”

Slide.

Michael greeted him warmly and held out a hand. Jin Taekyung stared in silence at his smiling enemy, then took it.

His voice was low and hoarse, almost as though it were boiling.

“…Michael Silbert.”

Crack.

Their tightly clasped hands went white.

Everyone lives behind a mask.

To get along with others. To earn a living. Or to avoid a fight they don’t want.

But Michael Silbert’s mask was harder and thicker than any I’d ever encountered. I couldn’t begin to guess what lay behind it.

Crack.

The bones in our clasped hands shifted with a grinding sound. Feeling the force transmitted through his grip, I widened my eyes.

What the hell…?

The force was unbelievable. With everyone watching, I wasn’t using my full strength either. But his grip was far stronger than I’d expected, and I couldn’t hide my surprise.

How?

The physical abilities I’d developed through the System were, quite literally, superhuman.

That was why neither a Supreme Peak master nor an S-rank Hunter could approach me in pure physical ability.

That was what I’d thought until I took his hand.

—That seems like enough of a greeting, don’t you think?

“…!”

—We’re in front of the cameras. We should both be a little more careful.

I came to my senses and looked around. We’d been holding hands for nearly half a minute, and a few reporters were watching us with suspicion.

“Ah.”

“My friend here must be glad to see me. I feel the same way.”

Pat, pat.

Michael smiled and gave my shoulder a friendly tap. A few reporters smiled too.

But he and I were having a conversation their cameras and microphones couldn’t capture.

—What the fuck are you playing at?

—Who can say? I do not understand what you mean. Is coming to congratulate a young junior on his victory some kind of trick?

—A passing dog would laugh at that, you son of a bitch.

—You really won’t believe me.

—Sorry, but I’m not that much of an idiot. You’re already a step too late.

Michael let out a quiet laugh and moved his lips.

—Actually, you’re right. I came to make a very important announcement.

—An important announcement?

—One that will turn the whole world upside down.

—…What?

What the hell was he talking about?

I stared at him, stunned. Then Michael’s smile vanished. He looked straight into the cameras.

And he dropped a bombshell no one there had seen coming.

Chapter 763

A thought is only a thought until it becomes reality. But the moment it forms a complete sentence and flows out as a voice, it gains influence.

Just like now.

“I have witnessed countless deaths.”

A sorrowful voice rang out. Standing tall before countless cameras and microphones, Michael Silbert slowly continued.

“In the slums of Paris, teeming with flies and gangs. On the countless battlefields of the Great Cataclysm. And ever since the day of victory when the Demon King Asmodeus fell. I have continued to witness them.”

Bzzzz.

The faint hum of the cameras sounded unusually loud.

No one so much as swallowed. The reporters watched Michael with an anticipation they couldn’t quite explain.

This is…

Something’s coming!

At first, they’d wondered why he had suddenly started spouting nonsense. All they’d wanted was a friendly shot of the two heroes—one old enough to be the other’s father—with their arms around each other’s shoulders, and perhaps a few warm words.

Jin Taekyung was supposed to be the star today. Michael was merely the spotlight that would make him shine all the brighter.

Until he opened his mouth.

“Yet through all those deaths, I held on to one hope. One dream. With the Demon King Asmodeus and his monster army gone, I believed that someday every conflict would end and true peace would come.”

His tone rose and fell distinctly, and his expression was filled with appeal.

Michael Silbert’s appearance, compelling everyone who saw and heard him to focus, was reflected in the camera lenses.

Around the world, people watching live leaned closer to their living-room televisions, their computer monitors, the smartphones in their hands.

“Mom. Dad. I need to watch my cartoon…”

“Shh, Peter. Be quiet for a moment.”

> ㄴWhat the fuck is No Jaehun doing? I called for a gank, and the bastard went AFK. ㄴWhat’s up with Jaehun? Fight with his girlfriend? Are we surrendering this match?

“It’s not that. I was watching an iTube live stream. Never mind—I’ll put the link in the group chat. Take a look.”

> ㄴ What girlfriend? That bastard doesn’t have one. It’s just not his promotion match, so he doesn’t give a shi—Munich live? What’s this?

Dozens of television channels and streaming sites carrying the broadcast lit up with activity. Their audiences multiplied, and the viewers watched with bated breath.

On-screen, Jin Taekyung stood grim-faced while Michael spoke one step ahead of him. Michael’s voice carried to them all.

“I have waited a long time. I have hesitated. But I stand here today to tell you one thing—for our faith in peace, and for a better future.”

Michael drew a breath. So did everyone watching him.

Then his voice emerged, dry as sand.

“A second war is nearly upon us.”

“…!”

“…!”

Invisible agitation and shock waves swept through every direction.

An office worker flipping through channels after work. A couple passing beneath a huge billboard. A teenager who had paused his game and opened the stream to kill time. The reporters standing right in front of Michael.

At that moment, they doubted their own eyes and ears before falling into extreme confusion.

A second war.

Everyone knew what those few words meant. Someone gave voice to it in something like a groan.

“The Great Cataclysm…?”

How could they not know? It was humanity’s clearest nightmare, a memory seared into them by fear: the worst Great War in history, which had covered the Five Oceans and Six Continents in blood and corpses.

And now Michael Silbert was saying that very Great Cataclysm would begin again. He was declaring that a second war had arrived.

Before them. No, before the entire world.

That’s… impossible.

It can’t happen. It can’t.

Yet no one could bring themselves to say it. Denial had come with another, paralyzing thought.

What if he’s telling the truth?

A second Great Cataclysm could not happen. It must not happen.

But people had sensed something wrong. Deep down, they had been feeling their way around the shape of that fear.

The signs were already there.

Magical power levels rose by the day. Strange phenomena grew more frequent. Only a few months ago, an Arch Lich had appeared in Sichuan Province, China, and Monster Waves triggered with Magic Gems had followed one another across the world.

Scholars had studied that method of terrorism long ago. The leading experts in magical power had agreed it was impossible—unless the world's magical power reached a certain limit.

Today, Michael Silbert was telling them it had.

"Perhaps calling it a second war is wrong. But one thing is certain: what you and I believed was the end of the war was only a ceasefire."

"…!"

"I tell you now: the magical power throughout our world has already passed its critical threshold. A disaster like the one we faced before will engulf the entire world."

People could barely breathe.

This wasn't some drunk rambling in a neighborhood bar. It was a declaration from Michael Silbert—a hero of the Great Cataclysm who had remained at the forefront ever since, a giant who led the world's greatest Guild.

One of the stunned reporters managed to ask, his voice shaking, "D-Does that mean the Demon King… Does it mean Asmodeus is coming back?"

"On the Day of Victory, during the final battle that decided humanity's fate, the Demon King was undoubtedly erased without leaving so much as a trace. I saw it clearly with my own eyes, so that is an indisputable fact. However…"

Michael Silbert hesitated for a moment before adding, "Now, no one can be certain. No one can be certain what will happen in the future, or even whether the Demon King Asmodeus was truly erased."

"Ah… Ahh."

"How can this be…?"

Cameras shook. The reporters' dismayed voices came through the microphones and went out to the world.

No one watching from elsewhere complained about the disruption. They were no calmer than the people on-site. The terror they had refused to face had finally taken shape, and they trembled at the truth they had tried to ignore.

An unpredictable future. No—a disaster.

And the possibility that the Demon King Asmodeus might return.

Fear spread through their minds like dark clouds. Whether they watched Michael Silbert on a screen or stood before him, their eyes shook. They wanted him to take it all back. They even entertained the absurd hope that he might laugh and say it had been a joke.

His next words crushed it.

"Peace—or what we thought was peace—is over."

Michael looked into the camera. His sorrow and anger seemed almost tangible.

At least, they did to the people watching him.

"The war has already begun. We must fight, without hesitation and without taking a single step back."

His voice trembled between his lips like a wave. Michael Silbert poured out his words as though sobbing, as though pleading, then clenched his teeth.

"Together! More united than ever before!"

His reddened eyes burned, and his cry thundered through the microphones.

The cameras no longer showed Jin Taekyung. Every light, every spotlight, was fixed on one man.

Michael Silbert.

In the eyes of the people, he looked like a fighter filled with determination.

In his own mind, he was already a hero and a king. A hero offering a path to people in crisis. A sovereign who would reign over the world.

Amid the trembling air and countless watching eyes, Michael took his final step. He spoke the words he had waited for this day to say.

The World Hunter Federation.

Everyone caught their breath. The air seemed to go still beneath the overwhelming aura radiating from him.

"A federation encompassing every nation, bound by no restrictions. The very World Hunter Federation that saved us—all humanity—from the Great Cataclysm. Its return…"

He let the words trail off. His eyes shone as he gazed toward the hundreds of millions, perhaps billions, watching him around the world. Then he released the breath he had been holding.

"I dare to propose it here today."

"…!"

"…!"

The return of an international organization that stood above every law and restriction.

An unseen shock swept through the crowd, then traveled through cameras, microphones, and broadcasts to every corner of the world.

And just as everyone watching was seized by shock and an emotion they could not name, a voice shattered it all.

"Go fuck yourself."

Hundreds of reporters. The German soldiers and police holding them back. Even the other Hunters who had arrived late.

Countless eyes turned toward me.

Beyond the gleaming camera lenses, I could almost feel the unseen gazes and voices pouring in like a wave.

I didn't care. Or rather, I couldn't spare them a thought.

So that was it.

I felt as though I'd been hit in the back of the head. My vision swam.

Inside my mind, which looked as though a kindergartner's playroom had been turned upside down, the words I had just heard rang out with perfect clarity.

The World Hunter Federation.

Thirty-odd years later, all that remained of those old heroes' organization bore the name International Hunter Federation.

Age, gender, nationality, race—even the law had meant nothing to the Hunters who followed humanity's savior, Cheon Taemin. That was the World Hunter Federation.

They had fought solely for humanity's survival and won at the cost of countless lives. Then, as soon as the Demon King Asmodeus fell, they had gone their separate ways.

And he wants to bring that World Hunter Federation back?

Of course I respected the people who had fought in it, just as everyone else did. They had fought for all of us. And when the war ended, they had surrendered that immense power without regret.

But this was different.

The World Hunter Federation Michael Silbert dreamed of was nothing more than a kingdom for one man.

So I said it again, in front of everyone.

"Go fuck yourself."

"…!"

"…!"

People stared, unable to believe what they'd heard. Then a quiet voice reached my ears and threw my thoughts into turmoil all over again.

—Think it over one more time before you speak.

Michael Silbert.

The man who had driven the world into crisis so he could climb that crisis like a staircase to a throne.

The schemer in a hero’s mask smiled at me. His snake-like eyes glinted as he looked past my shoulder at someone behind me.

—If only for the sake of your monster friend.

Chapter 764

For a moment, the world seemed to stop.

The hundreds of people staring at me with their mouths open. The cameras and microphones jutting up between them. The dazzling lights illuminating the broad lot in place of moonlight.

Everything around me slowed and blurred.

Everything except the one man who had brought my world to a halt.

Michael Silbert.

The most cunning, unscrupulous man I had ever met stared back at me.

His eyes, usually so calm, held unmistakable amusement and triumph. His voice came through just as clearly when it reached my ears again.

“You seem surprised.”

I came to my senses and belatedly steadied my breathing.

A painful mistake.

Whatever he said, I couldn’t let him see me shaken.

Show an enemy an opening, and he’d find your weakness. I needed to be especially careful when that enemy was Michael Silbert.

It’s not too late. As far as I know, the Skeleton King’s identity is secure, and he hasn’t shown me any proof.

I had to stay calm from here on out. Whatever he said next, all I had to do was answer without letting it rattle me…

Damn it.

Crack.

Bones shifted audibly in my clenched fist.

I could tell myself whatever I wanted. It was already too late. From the moment I’d met his gray eyes, my instincts had been screaming that his remark wasn’t a mere probe.

Michael Silbert had come here certain, not guessing.

His next words settled it.

“You have two choices. Of course, you don’t have much choice at all, but you might as well hear them for the fun of it.”

His voice was relaxed. With his back to the cameras, Michael moved his lips, looking more pleased than I had ever seen him.

“First, your friend’s identity is exposed before the entire world. Second, you leave this noisy place, and the two of us have a private talk.”

“…!”

“So? What will it be?”

Damn it.

The curse slipped out in a whisper. Michael gave me a faint smile and stepped closer.

Brush. Pat.

His hand reached out slowly and brushed the dried blood and dust from my shoulder. At last, the reporters came to their senses and let loose the shouts they had been holding back.

“Mr. Jin Taekyung! Does what you just said mean you oppose the World Hunter Federation?”

“W-Wait! Please tell us exactly what you meant by that profanity!”

“Mr. Jin!”

Click. Flash-flash-flash!

The cameras kept rolling as flashes burst from every direction.

The dam of silence broke, releasing a wave of noise. Michael quietly raised a hand to settle the crowd, then spoke.

“My friend here is already a hero the whole world is watching. He is also a spirited young man. The battles and events of recent days must have exhausted him, so I ask for your understanding.”

“Are you saying Mr. Jin has post-traumatic stress disorder?”

“I’m sorry, but let’s leave that discussion for another time. There is only one thing I came to tell you today.”

Michael looked into the cameras.

“The war has begun again. For humanity to survive the coming flood of blood, we need an ark: the World Hunter Federation.”

“…!”

“That is all. Have a good night, everyone.”

That was his final word to the crowd.

Leaving the reporters shouting behind the German Armed Forces and police officers who blocked their way, Michael Silbert turned and walked toward his private aircraft, which had landed in the center of the open lot.

He left me with one last remark that only I could hear.

“I’ll make you some coffee. I hope you won’t keep me waiting.”

Grind.

My teeth clenched.

I knew why he’d said it.

“Mr. Jin!”

“Mr. Jin Taekyung! Please, just one statement!”

I turned away from the cameras as though fleeing and saw two figures hurrying toward me.

Confusion and shock were written across their faces. They spoke too quietly for anyone else to hear.

"We've been played. This was what it was all for."

"Damn it, what the hell is this mess? What's this World Hunter Federation thing, anyway?"

Their questions came in a rush, but I said nothing.

What could I say?

Where should I even begin, and how should I explain it?

As I wrestled with that, someone's face came to mind.

"Magic Johnson."

"What?"

The Skeleton King frowned at the name.

"Why bring him up all of a sudden? First, tell me what's going on… Wait. Is there something on my face?"

I'd been staring at him without realizing it. I shook my head.

"…No. Nothing."

I still didn't know whether to tell him what had just happened. Or what choice I—what choice we—should make.

But some feelings couldn't be hidden just because you wanted to hide them.

Team Leader Choi finally realized I was keeping something from them. His face hardened, and his lips moved.

"What is it? What happened that made you ask for Mr. Johnson?"

"…"

"Tell me. Right now."

My thoughts were tangled, but they didn't have long to wait.

After several dozen seconds that felt like an hour, I sent my voice toward Team Leader Choi through Sound Transmission.

"The Skeleton King's identity has been discovered."

"…!"

"Contact Magic Johnson. I need everything his investigation has turned up from the materials we took from the late Siegfried Bassmann's hideout, and everything he knows about Michael Silbert. All of it. Not a single thing left out."

Team Leader Choi's eyes trembled. He remained silent as though he had lost his voice, then slowly nodded. I took a deep breath and began walking.

The lot was now empty of people.

I headed toward the enormous private aircraft standing at its center like an impregnable fortress.

Toward the man waiting inside.

Michael Silbert.

Yes. The bastard was right.

The war had already begun.

Michael Silbert kept at least one promise.

"Come in."

The first thing I saw when I entered his private aircraft, as spacious as a suite, was a cup of coffee on the table.

It smelled freshly brewed. Beyond the steam rising from it, gray eyes—somewhere between darkness and light—watched me.

"I'm glad you came so quickly. I was worried it might get cold."

I sat down and quietly looked at the full cup. As the silence stretched on, Huginn, who had been standing at attention behind me, spoke.

"If it isn't to your taste, shall I prepare another coffee?"

His words were polite. The mockery in them wasn't subtle.

I gave him no answer. I looked away from the cup and jerked my chin toward Michael.

"I don't care if you keep a pet, but that crow won't stop cawing. It's getting on my nerves."

Whoosh.

The air grew heavier. A faint sound reached my ears as Huginn came one step closer behind me.

"If you don't want to walk on your arms from now on, get back where you were. And shut your mouth before I rip it open."

"…!"

"What? You think I can't do it?"

I was speaking to Huginn, but I kept my eyes on his master. Michael stared at me for a moment, then blinked.

"You're serious."

"I am."

"You would cripple Huginn right in front of me?"

"I might kill both of you."

An ordinary person might not have taken that provocation lying down. Someone who knew my fatal weakness might have used it to threaten me. Someone powerful enough that I couldn't afford to lower my guard might have threatened me with force.

Michael was both of those things, yet neither reaction suited him.

"Huh."

I couldn't read anything into the sound he made. He studied me with interest.

"Whether you could succeed aside, isn't that a little reckless?"

"If I'd been cautious, I wouldn't have made it this far."

He let out a short laugh.

"True. From what I've seen, the last few years of your life have been one reckless act after another. Perhaps that's how you won the public's love and trust."

"Maybe. But is that all? There must be things even you haven't seen."

"I once heard of an Eastern saying: empty bluster. Let's not waste time on meaningless words. I already know everything about you."

He was wrong.

Michael Silbert knew nothing.

He did not know what kind of life I had truly lived, or how much recklessness it had taken to overcome every crisis and survive until today.

No one in this world could even guess at that secret. One day, it would be a dagger I drove into an enemy's heart.

Michael couldn't know that. When I laughed, the smile left his face.

"Why are you laughing?"

"Because I'm enjoying this."

"Does this include the fact that the Stone-King is a monster?"

He was trying to rattle me. But I'd already made that mistake once, and once was enough.

Someone else was less composed. I felt a startled movement behind me and shrugged.

"Looks like your friend didn't know."

"He does now."

"He's been getting on my nerves for a while, so I couldn't say anything."

"Leave now, Huginn."

After a moment's hesitation, Huginn bowed his head and left the aircraft. Michael spoke again.

"As you know, I could have told the cameras everything."

"Yeah."

I nodded.

"And one of us would be finished by now."

"Exactly. But I didn't. Do you know why?"

"Scared shitless?"

Clink.

The teaspoon he'd been stirring through his coffee stopped. His gray eyes fixed on me.

"You really are… an unusual man."

"And you really are… a fucking asshole."

Honestly, I didn't know if this was the right move.

But even a cornered rat would bite a cat. Calling Michael Silbert a tiger wouldn't have done him justice, but right now, I was the Blazing Flame Divine Dragon.

Hiss.

Terrible heat surged through the palm I had laid on the table. Vapor rose around it, overpowering the steam from the coffee. I spoke quietly.

"Go ahead. If you're ready to die."

Chapter 765

Whoosh.

The air inside the private aircraft grew heavy, pressing down on everything within.

The auras flowing from Michael Silbert and me faced each other across an invisible line. Neither of us gave an inch. The standoff felt ready to erupt at any moment.

But if we crossed that line and clashed, there would be no turning back. One of us would die.

I had no intention of backing down. Now that he had found a fatal weakness, one step backward would be the end of me.

Tap. Tap. Crash!

The coffee cup cracked, then burst apart.

At the same instant, I sensed dozens of people racing toward us like streaks of light.

Bang!

The alloy door was ripped off in an instant, and a piercing sound rang out.

In the blink of an eye, the loyal hounds had entered the aircraft, wagging their tails at their master.

“Is something wrong?”

I knew that voice. Over my shoulder, Michael Silbert calmly addressed Huginn, who had returned only minutes after leaving.

“I told you to wait outside.”

“My apologies. I thought there was trouble.”

“Nothing of the sort. Our guest accidentally dropped his coffee cup.”

“I see.”

Huginn glanced at the glass scattered across the room.

“I’ll bring another.”

“No need. Whatever you bring, our friend won’t like it.”

“Then…”

“Go back outside. Don’t return until I call for you.”

Huginn hesitated at his superior’s quiet, firm order, then led his men away.

Once the guards had left the aircraft, Michael spoke again.

“I think we should stop here. What do you say?”

“…”

“Whatever happens if we continue, we’ll both lose a great deal. Is that really what you want?”

I stared at him, then slowly reined in my aura.

I hated it, but he was right.

As long as the world did not realize what he truly was, even if I killed him here and eliminated the threat of future consequences, I would be branded the worst kind of murderer and criminal.

I would have to spend the rest of my life running from pursuit and surveillance worse than those aimed at a public enemy of the Murim, while my family and friends lost their ordinary lives completely.

That was what frightened me most, and Michael knew it.

"That's better."

He brushed the glass from his clothes, then crooked a finger. A fresh cup and a coffee machine half-full of coffee floated over.

"Good thing I prepared spares. Would you like some?"

"If you've got more cups you want to throw away."

"I'll take that as a no. They were hard to come by. I hate seeing them break."

Trickle.

He filled his cup carefully.

"Now that you've calmed down, let's get to the point. Help me."

Go fuck yourself.

The words rose to my throat, but I swallowed them.

Michael already knew the Skeleton King's identity. He also knew that, however angry I was, I couldn't kill him here. Those two facts were the main reason I couldn't just get up and leave.

Damn it.

My fist trembled beneath the table. I kept my voice as even as I could.

"What if I help you?"

"The World Hunter Federation takes root. Without any controversy. Cleanly."

He dropped a sugar cube into his coffee.

"And I become the head of the new federation, of course."

"You sound awfully sure of yourself."

"Oh, Jin."

He gave a quiet, derisive laugh and shook his head.

"You already know who would take the top seat if the federation were founded now."

"…"

"Only you and I are qualified. And…"

Clink.

He slowly stirred the sugar into his coffee. After a sip, his face settled into an expression of perfect satisfaction.

“Once this useful conversation is over, I’ll be the only one still qualified.”

“…!”

“Are you sure you don’t want any? The aroma and flavor are perfect.”

Grind.

My teeth clenched.

I felt like the sugar cube in his cup. It would dissolve whether it wanted to or not, completing the flavor of his coffee.

And the finished coffee—the World Hunter Federation—would flow into Michael Silbert’s mouth. An armed organization powerful enough to ignore nations and restrictions alike would fall into the hands of a monster wearing a hero’s mask.

If this goes the way he wants… it’s over.

During the Great Cataclysm, the World Hunter Federation had earned its praise by serving as humanity’s sword and shield. Its members had chosen the public good over private gain. They had risked their lives for a greater cause instead of chasing wealth and power, then disbanded after the Erasure of Demon King Asmodeus.

Michael Silbert was their opposite.

A man who caused disasters without hesitation for the sake of his own interests and power. A monster consumed by endless desire was sitting across from me.

In place of the true hero, who had fallen into an indefinite coma, that monster sat across from me.

“…Cheon Taemin.”

The name escaped me like a groan. Michael’s face stiffened for a moment before he smiled faintly.

“Ah, yes. Sky. He was there.”

Click.

He set down his cup with an easy hand, and his voice was just as relaxed.

“In fact, I intend to ask him to lead the federation first.”

“What did you just say?”

“Why so surprised? He has more than enough qualifications. The living savior who rescued humanity from Demon King Asmodeus. The greatest hero in history, and the man who led the World Hunter Federation during the Great Cataclysm. Who could be better suited?”

It felt as though someone had struck me in the back of the head with an iron club.

I finally understood what Michael wanted. I bit my lip.

“You son of a bitch… Don’t tell me.”

“Isn’t it tragic? A hero of his stature should be leading humanity and saving the world once more, yet his illness prevents him from stepping forward. What a cruel whim of God.”

“…!”

“But the fortunate thing for the people is that Sky recommended someone else as his replacement. The captain who will lead the newly born ark known as the World Hunter Federation. Another hero of the Great Cataclysm known throughout the world, someone else who stopped the spread of terrorism through a noble spirit of sacrifice.”

My breath caught.

None of it had happened yet, but as he spoke, I could see the whole thing unfold.

Michael Silbert would nominate Cheon Taemin as Alliance Leader of the federation. Cheon Taemin would decline on account of his illness and recommend Michael for the position instead.

And after that…

“I think I’ll refuse three times or so. Humbly, of course. Once we’ve put on that little show, you can step forward. It’ll make a fine picture.”

Michael smiled at me. I couldn’t smile back.

He wanted more than my help. He wanted me to put him on the throne.

Once all those gears, large and small, had turned together, every accusation that he’d revived the World Hunter Federation for his own power would disappear. Everyone would seem to have urged him to take the throne.

Without any disturbance or suspicion.

With the support of Cheon Taemin, humanity’s living savior, and of me, his greatest obstacle, he would have an unassailable claim. The next savior—and a king with immense power at his command.

“You crazy son of a bitch…”

The words came out like a groan. Michael smiled.

“Don’t worry. If you and your friends cooperate, I’ll fulfill my duties as Alliance Leader of the World Hunter Federation.”

“You expect me to believe that?”

“Oh dear. It seems I haven’t done enough to earn your trust.”

“What?”

“You know everything I said in front of the cameras today was true. Magical power levels around the world have crossed the critical point. Humanity needs the World Hunter Federation.”

He drained his coffee and added calmly, “And I need the World Hunter Federation.”

“…!”

At those words, something hot surged up from deep in my dantian.

Grind.

I glared at him, fire in my eyes. My fists were clenched so tightly they'd turned white, ready to erupt like volcanoes.

For the sake of the power he wanted—that paltry thing—dozens of cities had been destroyed and more than a few million people had died.

And that wasn't all. Black smoke from the collapsed forests of buildings and the burning streets had blotted out the sun. Survivors who had barely escaped the sudden disaster now huddled in bomb shelters and their homes, clutching family and friends as they trembled in fear.

And he said what?

"You fucking bastard…!"

Fwoosh.

Blue-white flames surged from the fist that had been trembling all this time. Powerful Scorching Yang Qi burned the air and melted everything nearby.

Rage seized my entire body. Killing intent rose with it, and I drove my fist forward.

Whoom! Roooar!

Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist.

A single punch carrying heat fierce enough to reduce anything to ash tore through the space between us.

Toward the monster in human skin. Toward the madman who would sacrifice anything to get what he wanted.

I'll kill him here. No matter what.

For that moment, I forgot everything else and gave myself over to rage.

And in a world that seemed to slow without end, I saw it: a dazzling streak of light intercepting my flame-wrapped fist.

BOOM!

A tremendous blast shook everything around us. I withstood the shockwave driving against my body and stared wide-eyed at Michael Silbert.

At the last instant, he had drawn his sword like lightning and caught the Flame-Extinguishing Divine Fist on its blade.

Sizzle-sizzle-sizzle!

A gray aura, the color of its master's eyes, gleamed ominously. From beyond the blade pressed against my blue-white flames, his low voice reached me.

"I'm warning you. If you don't stop here, there really will be no going back."

Shhhk!

There was still one last line we hadn't crossed. As his warning sank in, I sensed Huginn and the guards approaching behind me. I closed my eyes.

In the darkness, the faces of my family and friends flashed before me.

Damn it.

My fist relaxed and slipped away from the blade.

Chapter 766

At some point, I had begun fighting without end.

When I had no power, I fought in Gates for the happiness of my people. After gaining power, I fought to protect them.

But… what an irony.

I had never backed down in the face of death. Now a few words were enough to make me retreat.

Slide.

The blue-white flames that had burned so fiercely died down.

Without giving an inch, I slowly drew back the fist pressed against Michael's sword.

"A wise choice."

His loathsome voice made my stomach twist. I lowered my fist, still trembling with rage.

No. The moment the tension in the air eased, I threw another punch.

BOOM!

Another deafening blast rang out, and a wave of scorching heat swept in every direction. An enraged shout erupted behind me.

"How dare you!"

Shh-shh-shhik!

Killing intent surged toward me with the hiss of weapons cutting through the air—

"Enough."

At Michael's quiet command, Huginn and the dozens of guards with him stopped dead.

Michael Silbert gave his men a calm glance that told them all they needed to know, then spoke to me.

"I believe I warned you."

Grrrrrk.

Fist and blade locked together once more. Powerful blue and dark energies shuddered against each other. I glared at him.

"Yeah. You did."

"Do you intend to see this through to the end? Here and now?"

I clenched my teeth.

In my mind, I had already killed Michael Silbert dozens of times. I had broken his limbs, crushed his mouth, and ripped out his heart before bursting it apart.

But this wasn't Murim.

No—whatever world we were in, no one would accept what I wanted to do unless I tore off the mask he wore first.

“If that had been my intention… I would have done it long ago.”

“You’re more reckless than I thought. And even more arrogant.”

“I’d be disappointed if you thought this was just arrogance.”

Michael’s expression shifted.

Slice.

A faint line of blood appeared on his smooth neck with a sound so soft I could only hear it because I was close.

His skin had finally split under the immense pressure of that instant’s clash.

“Huh.”

“That’s my warning to you. Remember it.”

I spat out each word. Michael answered calmly.

“I take back what I said about arrogance. I should add something else instead. You’re more interesting than I thought.”

“You son of a bitch…”

“And thank you for the kind warning. It’s made one thing clear, at least.”

“What?”

“Jin. You can never kill me.”

Amusement crept into his dry voice.

“Because… somewhere along the way, you acquired far too much to lose.”

“…!”

A chill I couldn’t explain raised the hair all over my body.

It felt as though something sticky and repulsive had reached out and seized my limbs. The horrible sensation of being dragged into a deep swamp made me knock his blade away on reflex.

Crack!

Our two energies mingled for an instant.

In the last flash of light, familiar faces flickered before my eyes. I stumbled before I knew it and drew a ragged breath.

I didn’t want to admit it. I couldn’t.

And yet… I had to.

Michael Silbert was right.

The moment I ended the life of the man watching me so calmly, as though the blood on his neck meant nothing, I would cut short my own life and the lives of everyone close to me.

Like the countless enemies I had defeated, they would burn to ash and vanish without a trace.

"May I take your silence to mean I was right?"

I said nothing. Michael Silbert smiled.

"I look forward to working with you. I'll be in touch soon."

Swish.

He held out his hand, smiling like a man certain of victory.

I turned away without taking it.

No moonlight came to Munich that night.

Jin Taekyung was gone.

Huginn watched him disappear into the darkness, then spoke.

"Will he cooperate willingly?"

Michael Silbert nodded.

"Without a doubt."

"But Jin Taekyung's recklessness defies all expectations. Hasn't he always been difficult to predict?"

"Everyone has a weakness. And he possesses one more fatal than anyone else's."

"What weakness?"

"His feelings. Jin Taekyung is more emotional than anyone."

Michael continued in the same calm voice.

"Someone whose joy, anger, sorrow, and pleasure are so clear is easier to handle than a materialistic person. Wealth and honor can be regained even after they are lost, but people cannot."

He looked at his private aircraft, all but wrecked by the force of their clashes.

It had been custom-built with cutting-edge equipment and Magic at a cost of hundreds of billions of won.[3133] Its destruction stirred nothing in him. It was only a heap of scrap metal.

People were different. Each had only one life to live.

"Jin Taekyung… has more to lose than I thought."

Perhaps even more than I do.

Michael swallowed the words before they could leave his tongue.

He didn't want to admit it.

He already had more wealth than he could ever spend and immense power besides. Once he took control of the reborn World Hunter Federation, he would be beyond anyone's reach. He would be king of this world.

How could Jin Taekyung have more to lose than him?

That makes no sense.

[3133] Hundreds of billions of won is approximately $71 million–$710 million or €65 million–€640 million.

Michael patted Huginn on the shoulder.

“There is no need to worry. In a few days, everything will be concluded successfully.”

“I hope so, but…”

Huginn kept staring into the darkness where Jin Taekyung had vanished.

“I don’t know if letting him leave was the right choice. I can’t shake the feeling we’ve made a mistake we can’t undo.”

“There’s no need to feel that way. We had no other choice, either.”

“What do you mea—”

Crash!

An unfamiliar sound cut him off.

Huginn turned. His superior stood holding a sword with nothing left but the hilt.

“Guild Master!”

Michael shook his head at Huginn’s alarm. With a strange look in his eyes, he gazed at the fragments scattered around his feet.

“Well, this is something…”

Only two clashes.

That was all it had taken to shatter his cherished sword, forged from the finest materials and imbued with Magic. Without the powerful aura surrounding its blade, it probably wouldn’t have held together even this long.

He really is more interesting than I thought.

Michael had thought he knew the extent of Jin Taekyung’s abilities.

Odin Guild had kept its eyes and ears on him since he first came to prominence. With every new report, Michael had revised his assessment of the young Asian man.

First a potential recruit. Then a promising next-generation S-rank Hunter.

And then… his greatest obstacle.

I thought Cheon Taemin was the only one left.

That was how it had been. That was how it should have been.

Yet today, calculations that should have allowed no margin for error had proved completely wrong.

Jin Taekyung.

Michael looked into the darkness that had swallowed the young man moments ago.

He pictured him from head to toe—not yet half Michael’s age—and thought again of the enormous power coiled within him.

What if I had used all my strength?

A moment later, he gave a faint scoff.

It was a pointless question. He had reached his current position precisely because he had never used all his strength against any enemy.

The one who uses all his strength wins the battle, but the one who hides his strength wins the war.

Michael Silbert wanted to win the war. Not the battle—the war.

He had lived for dominion, not mere survival, and only one final step remained between him and the throne.

Everything is within reach. No need to hurry.

At least not tonight.

Michael Silbert swallowed the words circling the tip of his tongue and suddenly raised his head toward the sky.

To his gray eyes, Munich's night sky shone more brightly than ever. Someone else had looked at that same sky only moments before and seen no moonlight at all.

Yes. At least not tonight.

Crack. Fsssh.

In his clenched fist, the impossibly hard sword hilt crumbled into powder and scattered on the wind.

Michael Silbert was not careless enough to leave an obstacle where it stood after it had blocked his path once.

Even after I had finished telling them everything, the spacious suite remained filled with heavy air and silence.

It couldn't be helped.

I looked at Team Leader Choi and the Skeleton King, both of whom had gone rigid, and muttered inwardly.

It was the reaction I had expected.

Nobody stays calm when their head's on fire. And in this case, being a monster instead of a human wouldn't make any difference.

"Damn it."

The Skeleton King broke the silence first. He muttered the curse, then spoke with a troubled look on his face.

"Wicked human. What happens now?"

"Hmm."

Under normal circumstances, I would have made a joke. But the matter was too serious this time, and I found it difficult to answer.

The Skeleton King probably had plenty on his mind. His identity had been discovered, and he had no idea what would happen to him next.

I couldn’t bring myself to say any of that. I just sat there, moving my lips without making a sound. Then he spoke in a grave voice.

“If it’s too difficult to answer, tell me just one thing.”

“Go ahead.”

“Will this body never be allowed to enter the club again?”

I blinked. For a moment, I couldn’t make sense of the question.

By the time I came to my senses, White Flame’s spearhead was driving into his chest.

Crack. Crunch.

“AGH! Aaaagh! It was a joke! I was joking!”

“Die. Please, just die…”

“Please spare me! My ribs! I’ve got a cracked rib!”

“You thoughtless bastard. Even Myeongnyun Jinsa Galbi[3134] has more sense than you…”

“Mr. Jin Taekyung! Mr. Jin Taekyung! You mustn’t!”

I must have lost it for a moment.

After a brief, rage-induced out-of-body experience, Team Leader Choi’s pleas finally brought me back to my senses.

Seeing the Skeleton King clutching his chest and trying to force his ribs back into place made my vision turn white again, but I endured through the superhuman mental fortitude befitting a Supreme Peak master.

Fuck. I think I’m about to suffer qi deviation.

Another ten minutes of watching that, and my qi and blood would have tangled so badly I’d have died or ended up crippled. Michael Silbert would have done a ridiculous little dance and recruited the Skeleton King as his new right-hand man.

Fortunately, a visitor arrived before qi deviation did.

[3134] Myeongnyun Jinsa Galbi is a Korean all-you-can-eat pork-rib restaurant chain.

Chapter 767

Bzzzt.

At the sudden vibration, Team Leader Choi pulled a smartphone from inside his coat. He checked it—one of the five phones he carried, no less—then mouthed my name.

Mr. Jin Taekyung.

The reason he wasn't speaking aloud was obvious. I quickly drew up my internal energy and spread it around us.

Fwoooosh.

An invisible barrier of qi sealed the suite without leaving a single gap.

Bzzzt.

Blue light poured from the smartphone lying on the table. In the blink of an eye, it gathered into a human-shaped hologram, and a deep voice rang out.

"Sorry I'm late. I just saw your message… But what happened to that guy? Don't tell me you've already had a fight."

Magic Johnson.

The towering Grand Mage blinked at the Skeleton King, who lay clutching his chest. I answered weakly.

"It's a long story."

Unlike the Skeleton King and Team Leader Choi, Magic Johnson's reaction was brief and clear.

"Fuck."

Of course, he didn't stop there. After muttering nonstop about a son and a beach, and about a third hole he normally kept hidden from view, he rubbed his perfectly smooth, hairless scalp.

"This… is about as bad as it gets."

Only then did something I hadn't considered occur to me. If the Skeleton King's existence were exposed, I would not be the only one to suffer a serious blow. Neither would Team Leader Choi.

"I'm sorry. I should've been more careful."

"No need to apologize, Jin. I chose to help you."

Johnson waved off my belated apology, then frowned.

"But how did he find out? My illusion Magic should have been perfect."

Magic Johnson was one of only three Grand Mages in the world. No—now there were only two. He had gone to great lengths to inscribe that illusion Magic, and its effectiveness and secrecy were second to none. No wonder his face showed so many conflicting emotions.

"With Siegfried dead, there's only one mage left who could see through my illusion Magic… And I guarantee you, even Michael couldn't get her to act."

If Magic Johnson was speaking with such certainty, it had to be true.

I had heard plenty about the other Grand Mage myself, and after decades had passed, most of what I had heard had turned out to be fact rather than rumor.

But even leaving her aside, we had enough clues. And I wasn't the only one who saw where they pointed.

"Japan."

"Leviathan."

Although the words were different, they meant the same thing. Team Leader Choi, who had spoken at the same time as me, continued slowly as everyone's eyes turned toward him.

"As you all know, what happened in Japan wasn't simply a terrorist attack or a Monster Wave."

"Choi told me about it. I think Michael Silbert was most likely behind it, too."

"But what we need to reconsider now is his objective."

"His objective?"

"Why did Michael Silbert wake Leviathan from its sleep deep beneath the sea? And…"

"Why lure it to Japan, of all the countries he could have chosen?"

I picked up where Team Leader Choi had left off. The five oceans covered a staggering seventy-one percent of the Earth's surface. There was no shortage of countries with coastlines. So why had Michael chosen Japan as the place to let Leviathan run wild?

And there was the second terrorist attack, which struck around the world on the same day.

The answer was already there, as Team Leader Choi's next words made clear.

"He calculated everything meticulously from the beginning, taking Japan's situation at the time and every other factor into account."

Johnson grasped what he meant and spoke with a groan.

"Then all of it—including the second terrorist attack—was meant to draw you in?"

"Yes. I'm certain."

"But why Japan? If that was his goal, wouldn't it have been easier to lure Leviathan to Korea?"

Team Leader Choi shook his head and continued in a calm voice.

"From Michael Silbert's perspective, it was the only possible choice. Even setting aside the fact that Korean Hunters are far stronger, our government has been on high alert ever since Go Jun artificially caused two Monster Waves. If magical power had suddenly surged, they would have noticed immediately."

"The Magic Gem…!"

"Exactly. But Japan had recently been hit by the first terrorist attack. The area around Tokyo, in particular, would have suited him in several ways."

It wasn't just any Magic Gem. It was an unrefined S-rank Magic Gem. The sheer amount and concentration of magical power it gave off had been enough to wake Leviathan deep beneath the distant sea.

But near Tokyo, magical power levels were already running wild because of the Monster Wave caused by the first attack. Another surge would have been hard to spot. Most importantly, there hadn't been a Gate near Tokyo Bay—the area Leviathan destroyed—that would have given anyone cause for alarm.

"Yes," Johnson said. "It all fits."

"He drew the outline based on that from the start, then colored it in with the second terrorist attack. Since Japan was fairly far from the major Hunter powers, it would not have been difficult to predict that its own forces would be unable to stop a Named Monster like Leviathan."

The Supreme Peak masters of Murim were proof enough that people at the same level could differ enormously in strength. Modern S-rank Hunters were no different.

And Japan's S-rank Hunter, Yamamoto Genji, was stuck on the lower floors of that pyramid of power.

If he was really as strong as all those Japanese netizens and Japan-worshipping fanboys dickriding him claimed, why had he shown up so late that Leviathan was already dead when he'd had an entire day to get there?

The answer was obvious.

The Japanese government must have known it, too. That was why they'd swallowed their pride and asked for help.

A country that had come through both worldwide terrorist attacks with little damage. An indisputable Hunter powerhouse, and a neighbor close enough to reach them faster than anyone else.

Korea.

And Korea had me.

No. Us.

"…!"

A chill ran down my spine. I abruptly raised my head as though I had just woken up and stared at the Skeleton King.

He'd been listening in a daze, too distracted even to put his dislocated bones back in place. At my stare, he flinched and shrank back.

"I—I've just been sitting here."

"…"

"I told you, I was joking because everyone looked so serious! Haven't you heard of lightening the mood?"

"That's not it."

"Th—then why?"

Damn it. My teeth had clenched without me noticing. My voice came out low and strained.

"It was you. From the beginning."

"This body? From the beginning? What are you talking about?"

The Skeleton King frowned. Team Leader Choi answered, his expression grim.

"Michael Silbert's target was never Mr. Jin Taekyung. It was you."

"…What?"

"Don't you see? The second terrorist attack. Leviathan. He arranged all of it to target you."

"…!"

The Skeleton King's pupils trembled. Johnson, who had been thinking in silence, let out a sigh.

"So he'd suspected it for some time."

"He would have needed evidence to turn that suspicion into certainty."

"Even at the cost of so many lives?"

"Do you still not know what kind of man he is? Hundreds could die. Tens of millions could die. Michael Silbert wouldn't bat an eye."

Team Leader Choi looked at me. His voice was rough as iron filings, nothing like it usually sounded.

"If it meant achieving his goal—if he could get the proof he needed—he could end all of this right now."

"…!"

He was right.

That was all the bastard had wanted: the weakness that would guarantee his victory in a war against me. So he'd set the entire stage, cutting off any chance of reinforcements from other countries and creating a situation where the Skeleton King had no choice but to step in.

And then… he finally got his hands around that weakness.

That wasn't all. His willingness to launch the second terrorist attack must also have had a great deal to do with the World Hunter Federation.

The worse the damage, the greater the chance of reestablishing it.

How far ahead had Michael Silbert calculated?

The question stole my breath. It felt as though an invisible cord were tightening around my neck. I took a deep breath and looked around.

Team Leader Choi. Magic Johnson. Finally, the Skeleton King.

At some point, all three had fallen silent. They were looking at me.

No. They were waiting for me to speak. Waiting for me to decide where we went from here.

Thoughts and doubts raced through my mind. At last, I broke the long silence.

“I…”

Three days passed.

No one said a word about the tremendous boom that had echoed across the vacant lot outside Munich, where the Odin Guild Master’s private aircraft had landed on the night disaster struck.

The reporters who had all but been driven from the scene wanted to know what had made the sound they’d faintly heard from a distance. But the German Armed Forces, which controlled the Munich area, gave them a firm answer.

First: no pointless questions, and no approaching the site.

Second: anyone who failed to comply would be deported immediately.

Even the most hot-blooded reporters, who had bristled at the first point, fell quiet at the second. With the proposed revival of the World Hunter Federation shaking the world, getting deported over something like this would be madness.

Two people central to that debate were still in Munich. One was Jin Taekyung, whose behavior in front of the cameras the previous night had baffled everyone. The other was Michael Silbert, the man who had lit the fuse on this powder keg.

“Hey, sorry, but have you heard anything about either of them?”

“No.”

“Do you mean there’s nothing to hear, or that you know something and won’t tell me?”

“Hmm. Both?”

“Come on, we’re colleagues. We ought to help each other out. Those Germans can’t take a joke, and they’re being ridiculously strict. What’s your name, anyway?”

“Franz Meyer.”

“…You’re not German, are you?”

“I believe I am. A strict, foul-tempered German who can’t take a joke. That’s me.”

“I didn’t say foul-tempered—damn it. Sorry. I didn’t mean that.”

“It wouldn’t matter even if you did. But if you’re really sorry, throw me a decent scoop.”

“A decent scoop? Then how about the emergency convening of the UN General Assembly?”

The bearded German reporter gave a short laugh.

“You’re joking. Who doesn’t know about that? The meeting’s been going on for ages.”

He was right.

At midnight three days earlier, following the Munich incident, the UN—reorganized after the Great Cataclysm—had called an emergency General Assembly. The leaders of 185 countries, led by the six permanent member states, were locked in fierce debate over videoconference.

They had gathered for one reason: the proposal to reestablish the World Hunter Federation.

Given what was at stake, the emergency session was being held under unusually tight secrecy. But word always leaked out. Major news outlets had already learned of it and were watching closely.

“And you call something everyone knows a decent scoop? Your sense of humor is worse than I thought. You’re in no position to make fun of Germans.”

“Hmm. What if I told you the vote is about to begin?”

The German reporter stopped as he was turning away. He stroked his stubbly beard.

“…Now that’s interesting.”

“Glad you think so. It isn’t a joke.”

“You’re sure?”

“Is anyone ever sure of anything? If you want a number, I’d say ninety-nine point nine percent.”

99.9 percent.

The German reporter repeated the near-certain figure under his breath and swallowed.

“That means…”

“Yes. That’s right. The UN will announce it soon.”

Simon, the reporter who looked a good ten years younger than the German man facing him, went on slowly.

“The result of the vote on the birth of the World Hunter Federation. An organization that would span the globe.”

“…!”

Chapter 768

Marie Antoinette Syndrome.

The name came from the story that Queen Marie Antoinette's hair suddenly turned white a few days before her execution during the eighteenth-century French Revolution.

No one had established the true nature or cause of the strange phenomenon, but at that moment, Baek Hanseong, the President of Korea, was certain it was extreme stress.

His own situation felt similar enough.

Fuck.

The curse he had kept to himself since his closely watched debut in politics swirled around in his mouth.

The sharp-eyed secretary who had worked with him since his days in the National Assembly gestured for him to cover his mouth. Baek ignored him.

The room was full of foreigners. None of them knew Korean well enough to read his lips, and they were far too busy to watch his mouth in the first place.

Why would they, when presidents from around the world had abandoned all dignity and were pointing fingers at one another?

"You call that an argument? Of course we have to reestablish the World Hunter Federation!"

"I'm not saying we should never establish it! I'm saying we should put it on hold. Do you know what on hold means?"

"Did you just speak informally to me? Are you insane?"

"You're the insane one. What are we going to do about the Federation's enormous authority? We haven't even properly reviewed the proposed changes. We can't just approve this in a few days!"

"You fucking… What's your country's GDP?"

Shouts flew through the translators. Faces glowed red.

Baek held a perfect three-for-three record in the brawls for which Korea's National Assembly was famous, so the sight was oddly familiar. But after days of it, he felt as though his head might burst.

What are they, children?

It wasn't always like this. Sometimes sharp words were exchanged and an uncomfortable atmosphere formed in accordance with international affairs, but the UN General Assembly was supposed to be a place where nations demonstrated their dignity and their leaders showed their character.

However, as the situation spiraled toward the worst possible outcome and the presidents were crushed beneath immense stress and pressure from all sides, they had no choice but to throw off the masks they had been wearing and reveal their true faces.

“We’re all going to die! What happens if we put off establishing the Federation even now?”

“Exactly! Saudi Arabia strongly supports the establishment of the World Hunter Federation—”

“The Middle East should know when to bow out. You’ve sold more than enough oil, and now you’ve even exported terrorists to the entire world.”

“What?”

At the words of the Russian president, who was old beyond measure, a middle-aged man wearing a turban bulged his eyes.

“How dare you, you dictator!”

“A dictator? That’s rich coming from a king. At least I was elected in a fair vote. I wasn’t born into a royal family and handed this seat.”

“Ah, are you talking about that fair election where the voter turnout reached 140 percent in the last presidential election?”

“Well, these things happen. It was a long time ago.”

More than twenty years earlier, Vladimir Furin had become Russia’s president for life in an election whose astonishing turnout exceeded the country’s entire population.

He swept his gleaming eyes around the room. Long past a hundred, he kept himself healthy with cutting-edge medical technology and Magic potions, and his voice remained strong.

“What matters is that I—and Russia—oppose establishing the World Hunter Federation.”

“You…!”

“Let’s be frank. I don’t think the Federation is unnecessary. I’m concerned about who will take charge of it.”

Tap. Tap.

His wrinkled fingers struck the table. The force of the gesture carried through the hologram, silencing the supporters who had been about to protest.

“When we first discussed establishing the World Hunter Federation, I supported it because I trusted Sky. I met him myself. He had little interest in power.”

“And the circumstances were far worse,” said the President of the United States, Doramp Jr.

Furin nodded. “They were. That damned Asmodeus was sweeping across the world.”

"The situation is still serious, but it is not as bad as it was then. I hope everyone will consider that the World Hunter Federation possesses far too much authority for us to make such a hasty decision."

The Cold War between Russia and the United States had ended more than a century ago. Their long-standing resentment had not vanished, but here, at least, the two presidents agreed.

For Baek, the first to call for a delay, that was welcome news. So was the support of another ally who had already promised to stand with Korea.

"Our People's Republic of China must once again express its deep concern."

Chairman Xiao Yang looked toward Baek.

"As President Baek of Korea has repeatedly stated, the establishment of the World Hunter Federation must be discussed with great care."

"Er, Japan also agrees with Kankoku's[3135] position—"

"Thank you both."

What the hell is that bastard about to say now?

President Baek Hanseong hurriedly cut off Prime Minister Koizumi before he could dump shit all over the discussion. He leaned toward the microphone fitted with a translation device.

"As I've said several times, we must handle the question of the World Hunter Federation with care. Deciding it after only three days would be far too hasty—"

"Only three days? Hasty?"

The French president cut in with a scoff.

"Do you have any idea what has happened outside during those three days?"

"That—"

"I don't know how things are in Korea, but France has already had five major riots. Doomsday fanatics are out in the streets screaming, and work and production have all but stopped."

"…Please, hear me out."

"If it's what we've been hearing for three days, I must respectfully decline. Half the Louvre Museum has burned. What else is there to hear?"

President Baek Hanseong was rendered speechless. Without realizing it, he rubbed his throbbing temples.

That damned bastard.

He knew perfectly well that Odin Guild's support had helped the French president reach office. But he could hardly argue when the man was telling the truth.

Michael Silbert.

A single statement from a hero with enormous public support had lit the fuse on a world full of fear and anxiety.

[3135] Kankoku is Japanese for Korea.

Half the world's population had watched him warn of a second Great Cataclysm in real time. Within a day, the fire had spread beyond the metaphor.

Huge demonstrations bordering on riots. People driven into the streets by fear and anger had little patience left, and fires soon broke out across their cities.

The police? The military?

Armed officers and soldiers demanded that the crowds disperse, but their calls fell on ears already half-deaf to reason.

If France, one of the world's ten most developed countries, was in that state, there was no need to guess how others were faring.

"What the people want now is a result. A result that will reassure them. A result that will guarantee the lives of themselves and their families."

"If the World Hunter Federation isn't reestablished, our country is finished. At the very least, the presidential palace will burn, and I won't escape unscathed."

"We have no choice but to support it wholeheartedly. The movements of our military factions are already deeply suspicious."

"You're opposing it now? Have you lost your mind? Do you think you can watch from the far bank while the rest of us burn?"

The spotlight was bright. Everything around it was dark.

A handful of developed nations enjoyed a civilization more advanced than ever. But how many of the UN's 185 member states shared in all of it?

Demon King Asmodeus had fallen, yet hunger and civil war remained. More than a few countries were still struggling to keep their governments intact while nursing the deep wounds left by the Great Cataclysm.

For them, this was more than a powder keg exploding.

It was a nuclear blast—one that would soon swallow their entire country.

At this rate, it would not be monsters burning down presidential palaces. It would be furious citizens and coup forces.

"We can't delay any longer!"

"Let's vote!"

"We do not trust the Security Council or the permanent members! We demand a full vote!"

The calls came from all sides. Baek knew the long meeting was nearing its end.

This… can't be stopped anymore.

The UN Security Council still held enormous power. The United States, the United Kingdom, France, Russia, and China had been permanent members since their victory in the Second World War. Korea had joined them after the Great Cataclysm.

Of those six, the United Kingdom had remained neutral on this question and France supported the proposal. The other four stood on the side effectively calling for a delay.

But even the permanent members' veto power had clear limits under the reorganized UN.

So this is how it ends.

The secretary-general's announcement that voting had begun sounded distant. All Baek could hear clearly was his conversation with Choi Minwoo three days earlier.

"We need to delay the UN's decision as long as possible."

"Delay it? Not stop it?"

"If we could stop it, I'd ask for nothing more. But even with the United States and China helping us, that would be nearly impossible."

"…You want to buy time."

"Even a few weeks. No, even a few days would be enough. Please do everything you can until we reach the limit of what is possible."

"Hah. What exactly is happening right now?"

After a long silence, Choi's answer had been brief.

"War."

"…Mr. President. Mr. President."

Baek snapped out of his thoughts. His chief secretary was watching him, concern and impatience mingling on his face.

"You need to vote. We're the last."

"Ah."

After letting out a short groan that sounded almost like a sigh, President Baek Hanseong looked at the presidents filling the office.

No—the holograms.

Then, thinking of Choi Minwoo and Jin Taekyung, who were probably preparing for war somewhere by now, he cast the final vote of this miserable meeting.

Sometimes you did not need to see someone's face, or hear more than a few words, to understand them.

A voice's tone and pitch could tell you enough.

In that sense, Choi Minwoo understood everything the moment he answered the call from President Baek Hanseong.

"I did everything I could."

A long silence followed. The few words they exchanged after that felt hollow.

When the short call ended, Choi walked toward a room crowded with documents and monitors. Inside, someone was so absorbed in what he was doing that he had not noticed Choi arrive.

Then, suddenly, Choi opened his mouth.

“The UN… has approved reestablishing the World Hunter Federation.”
The reply was short.
Fuck.

Chapter 769

Even the most clearheaded person could not stay composed every moment of every day.

Michael Silbert realized he was shaken only after brewing three cups of coffee in a row.

Shaken? Me?

The realization surprised even him. That surprise soon turned to displeasure.

A leader must never show himself wavering. Not to enemies, not to allies, and not even to himself.

To win this war, he could not show the slightest opening.

In the heat of battle, a person's movements began to slow the moment they realized they had been wounded.

Michael believed he could have everything only if he could ignore any pain. He had lived by that belief ever since the day he returned from the brink of death, long ago.

But today, two things had shaken him.

One was the thrill of being so close to his grand dream.

The other…

It's probably that bastard.

A face flickered through the steam rising from the coffee cups.

A young man far younger than himself, who had won the public's love in an absurdly short time and become his most troublesome obstacle.

Jin Taekyung.

The name lingered in his mouth, accompanied by a faint pain at his throat.

Swish.

Michael carefully pulled down the turtleneck that covered his neck. A dark-red mark stood out against his skin, warped by a brief surge of heat.

It was the first wound he had suffered in more than a decade. He was tracing the mark Jin Taekyung had left several days ago when—

Bzzzt.

A phone vibrated somewhere. His fingertips trembled against the wound, which had yet to heal.

Instinctively, Michael pulled his collar back up and looked at the name on his smartphone screen.

[Emmanuel]

There were many people in the world named Emmanuel. But only one could contact him directly without going through Huginn.

Click.

"Congratulations, Guild Master."

The President of France's voice came through the moment the call connected. Michael laughed aloud and tipped all three cups of coffee onto the floor.

Out went his anxiety and agitation, along with the face that had appeared in the hazy steam.

Once he had poured it all away, nothing remained in the empty cups but joy and triumph.

I… won.

The throne was ready. All that remained was a magnificent coronation.

Michael found himself wondering what expression Jin Taekyung wore now that he had heard the news.

The scene came so vividly to mind that his lips twitched.

It was strange.

Something that should never have happened had come to pass, yet I felt oddly calm.

Probably because I'd seen it coming.

"Fuck."

Still, I had to do what needed to be done. It wasn't like I could shout, Yay!

Having cursed out of habit, I looked at Team Leader Choi, who had just come through the door.

"So… we couldn't stop it?"

Team Leader Choi nodded gravely.

"There was only so much we could do."

"Even with Russia helping us? Russia, of all countries?"

"Even if the United Kingdom had joined us instead of remaining neutral at this General Assembly, I doubt the result would have changed much. We're already effectively at war."

Even someone as clueless about politics as I was knew how much power the permanent members of the Security Council held. I also knew that the "international situation" the experts went on about on TV was, in the end, a power game between nations.

This world was another Murim.

Martial artists flaunted their families and martial arts. Great powers showed off their militaries, economies, production capacity, and other resources, then used that power to crush weaker countries.

At this UN General Assembly, five permanent members—among the most powerful countries in the world—had joined forces to oppose the reestablishment of the World Hunter Federation.

Ordinarily, plenty of countries under their influence would have fallen in line like appendages, whether they liked it or not.

Ordinarily.

“More than twenty countries, including Congo, Syria, Ethiopia, and Myanmar, are on the verge of civil war,” Team Leader Choi said. “Coup factions are rising in the name of public sentiment. Those countries must have wanted a decision as soon as possible. The others aren’t in much better shape.”

“Damn it.”

“Fear is breaking down the rule of law. This is what Michael Silbert wanted.”

Politics had nothing to do with it anymore. This was about survival.

If several big, powerful men blocked the fire hydrant while your house was about to burn to ashes and told you to wait just a little longer, who would obediently turn around and leave?

I understood where those countries were coming from.

But…

Finding out the fire extinguisher is actually a flamethrower is another matter.

I had to admit it.

The World Hunter Federation was absolutely necessary.

During the last Great Cataclysm, when terrible flames had spread in every direction, they had played the role of excellent firefighters. They had done their best as heroes more devoted than anyone else.

But Michael Silbert was no firefighter.

What could be a greater black comedy than the person who had secretly started the fire being appointed as the new firefighter?

That was why, three days ago, I had told everyone we had to stop him. Within the time we had been given, we had to use every ounce of our strength to hold Michael Silbert back.

Now the sand in the hourglass we had turned over was almost gone.

After just three days.

“This… isn’t this too soon?”

Team Leader Choi and I weren’t alone in the room.

The Skeleton King’s words came out like a groan. He clenched the papers in his hand, crumpling them badly. Between his fingers, I could see a familiar face printed on one of the sheets: a man looking into the camera, younger than he was now, his expression more human.

Michael Silbert.

Michael Silbert several decades ago, to be precise.

For the past three days, we had been digging through everything brought back from Siegfried Bassmann's hideout and investigating Michael's past, searching for anything that might help us stop him.

But Michael Silbert was one of the most famous people in the world. Decades of information had piled up since the Great Cataclysm. There was too much of it, and time wasn't waiting for us.

"Can't we stop him?"

I had no answer for the Skeleton King.

Magic Johnson, who had been put in charge of the material from the hideout, might have discovered something by now, but the possibility was slim.

Even when he had come to us by hologram three days earlier, he had already gone over all the material more than ten times—and then gone over it again.

All I had left was a guess bordering on despair.

"Yeah. Probably not."

"…!"

"So far, all we've done is confirm what everyone already knows."

A heavy silence settled over the room.

The Skeleton King stared at the mountains of paperwork, his eyes trembling. Then he spoke.

"No. There is still a way."

"There's… a way?"

"A very simple one. No need to take the long way around."

What he said next was the last thing I expected.

"Wicked human, you need only erase this body."

"What?"

At first, I thought I'd misheard him.

But as I stared at him, the Skeleton King continued calmly.

"Not right away, of course. Reveal my identity in front of everyone, with important people watching, and then erase me. That will make the effect certain."

"…!"

"It is a simple solution, is it not? If you have been caught by a weakness so serious that you have no choice but to comply with his demands, then eliminate the weakness. Along with a suitable explanation."

A chill ran down my spine. Every hair on my body stood on end.

He stood before me as he always did, yet he had never felt more like a stranger.

His deeply sunken gaze. His faint smile. Even his calm voice.

Every part of him.

“This body is a monster. To you humans, I am practically evil itself, and I am also cunning enough to deceive the eyes of insignificant humans and approach them whenever I wish.”

The Skeleton King grinned.

“You, human—I confess that you are not nearly as wicked as I have called you. You are merely absurdly strong and even more stupid. The other humans know that too. If you show them with your actions, they should have little trouble believing you.”

Thump. Thump. Thump.

My heart hammered.

Thoughts tore through my head. My mouth had fallen open, but I couldn’t force a sound out.

This is fucking insane…

I had never once considered it. That made it all the more shocking.

Then, as I froze for an instant, a voice pierced my ears like a needle.

“It is a possibility.”

“Team Leader Choi!”

My shout burst out instinctively, but Team Leader Choi did not flinch in the slightest.

His face rigid, he continued.

“A weakness is only a weakness when it’s exposed and an enemy can use it. If you remove it yourself, there’s no problem.”

“What the hell are you talking about right now…”

“The public still loves you, Mr. Jin Taekyung. Although the extermination of the terrorist group brought about the appearance of The Prophet, it was done for the sake of a greater good, and you gave everything you had to save people despite the countless accusations thrown at you. In particular, the self-sacrifice you showed against Leviathan and during the Monster Wave in Munich…”

“Enough!”

My second shout finally stopped him.

But not for long.

“Then what are you going to do?”

“…!”

“Is there another way? A way to stop Michael Silbert from taking the World Hunter Federation—the entire world—into his hands?”

I couldn’t breathe.

With me at a loss for words, Team Leader Choi let everything he’d been holding back pour out.

“We could hide the Skeleton King somewhere far away, somewhere no one knows, or somewhere no one could ever find him. But if Michael Silbert revealed the truth, would people believe it?”

“But he…”

“Yes, I know. He’s saved many people. He fought beside us in Sichuan, Busan, Japan, and Munich. Perhaps hundreds of thousands of people owe him their lives. But—”

Thud.

Team Leader Choi stepped forward hard, bringing his face close to mine. His eyes held a tangle of emotions, and his voice was firm.

“People don’t believe it.”

His last words dwindled like a dying campfire.

“Because the Skeleton King… is a monster.”

Chapter 770

“Because the Skeleton King… is a monster.”

Silence followed as Team Leader Choi’s voice faded. But his last words kept echoing in someone’s ears.

A monster… A monster, huh.

The Skeleton King turned the bitter truth over in his mind.

It was true. He was a monster.

Monsters were humanity’s greatest and worst enemy in all of history. And among them, he wielded the cursed power of death.

He might look human now, but once the Magic shrouding his body fell away, all that would remain was the skeleton of a dead man who had defied his mortal fate.

That was the only truth.

Yes. That’s all there is.

The Skeleton King looked down at his hands, indistinguishable from a human’s, then raised his head.

Before him stood a young human with a familiar face, though his expression was so twisted he almost looked like a stranger.

The strongest being the Skeleton King had ever seen. Foolish, too, and therefore unable to accept the truth before his eyes.

But if they were to take the only way out, they had to accept that truth and use it.

“That human is right. It is all true.”

“…You.”

So many emotions filled Jin Taekyung’s strained voice. A few months ago, the Skeleton King would not have known what to call them. Now he did.

He shook his head at Jin, who could say no more.

“No matter what you say, this is the only way.”

“…!”

“This body is a monster. Whatever the reason, we cannot be allowed to remain together.”

Of course, some might understand even after the truth came out. They might trust Jin Taekyung and accept that the Skeleton King was different from the monsters they knew.

But…

“How many of them do you think would truly accept this truth?”

The Skeleton King pointed toward the closed window.

Most of the humans out there were ordinary people. They could hardly help hating monsters to the bone. Monsters had taken their families, their friends, or the people they loved.

Monsters killed humans, and humans killed monsters.

The chain forged with the descent of the Demon King Asmodeus was too thick and strong for anyone to break.

Not even a young hero loved by everyone was exempt. No—if everything came to light, he could no longer be the hero he had been.

“Many will condemn you, and Michael Silbert will get everything. So…”

His voice trailed off. Turning away from Jin Taekyung, the Skeleton King put a hand on the doorknob and added one last thing.

“Erase this body in front of everyone.”

Click.

The door closed behind him.

The Skeleton King crossed the hallway in silence without looking back. The lights overhead were bright, but the path before him was dark.

Like that place filled with thick fog and the energy of death.

Like the Gate he had been unable to leave from the moment he first opened his eyes—until one unexpected day, a human had taken him away.

What am I? What’s my name? My past? My homeland?

He thought he finally knew the answer to the questions that had come to haunt him.

He was a monster.

A cruel, savage monster without a trace of reason.

A being born of pure evil, incapable of living alongside humans.

That was the truth. No—it had to be the truth.

Faced with a reality he had no choice but to accept, the Skeleton King gave a hollow laugh.

Damn it. I’ll never be able to go to a club again.

And yet, for some reason, part of him felt relieved.

He was a monster without a heart, incapable of even ordinary emotions.

He was supposed to be.

You didn’t need anyone to tell you. Living day to day taught you soon enough: life was a series of choices.

They weren’t all grand ones. Small decisions started the moment you opened your eyes in the morning.

Get up or stay in bed? If I get up, take a shower? Or just wash my face and hair before heading out?

It depended on the situation. If you woke earlier than expected, you could sleep a little longer. If you were worried about being late, you could skip the shower.

What mattered was considering the result before you chose.

Because you were the one who had to live with it.

And right now, I stood at a crossroads where I could barely bear either choice.

“You… fucking lunatic.”

I barely managed to force the words out.

I might have been cursing the one who had left, or the other person still in the room.

Or maybe myself, unable to go one way or the other.

“Mr. Jin Taekyung.”

My tangled thoughts made my head throb. At the quiet voice in my ear, I closed my eyes without a word.

“You must choose.”

It felt like an invisible awl had gone straight through my skull. Every word made the headache worse.

“He has already chosen his path. A sacrifice that only he could decide to make…”

I grabbed him. Thud!

I didn’t know when I’d opened my eyes, much less how I’d ended up gripping Team Leader Choi by the collar.

Riiip.

The collar of his crumpled designer shirt tore under the force of my grip. Above my whitening knuckles, a pair of eyes silently gazed at me.

“Do as you wish. Beat me to a pulp. Break my limbs, or even kill me. But…”

His breath trembled. So did his voice.

“Afterward, you must choose. You must.”

“…!”

“You know time won’t wait for us.”

His words, his gaze—the strength went out of me all at once.

The energy boiling through my entire body as if it were about to explode, the hand clenched with all its strength—everything felt strangely unfamiliar.

I stumbled back as if I’d come to my senses after being possessed.

“…I’m sorry.”

I knew Team Leader Choi had done nothing wrong. Everything he had said was true. It was simply the only solution capable of breaking through this situation.

If the Skeleton King hadn’t offered it himself, Team Leader Choi would never have said a word.

That was who he was.

His cool judgment had shown him the only solution, but he had the decency not to force that sacrifice on someone else.

Some might call him a hypocrite. I wouldn’t. I knew the Skeleton King wasn’t just another monster to be killed and disposed of to him, any more than he was to me.

Even if he were the one who had to sacrifice himself, he would have offered it as the solution before anyone else.

Unlike me, Team Leader Choi was a born leader.

If the choice had been his instead of mine, he wouldn’t have run from it. He might have suffered alone, but he wouldn’t have turned away from the truth like a coward.

Damn it.

Time wouldn’t wait for us.

At the thought of his words, another world waiting for me beyond this one flashed before my eyes.

Murim.

If the Main Quest hadn’t blocked the Login function, if I could spend far longer thinking about this there, what would I choose?

No. Given enough time, would I even be able to choose?

And could I live with the result?

I’d fought countless battles. I’d struggled to survive and fought to protect my people.

But both paths before me ended in pain.

If I refused to sacrifice the Skeleton King, this world would fall into Michael Silbert’s hands. If I did sacrifice him… I didn’t think I could bear it.

Somewhere along the way, the Skeleton King had become my friend.

A comrade I’d fought beside. A friend.

Not someone I could sacrifice for the sake of the greater good.

I’d have to erase him. Do it myself, in front of everyone.

A cheap trick like using the Inventory to fake his Erasure wouldn’t work. Michael Silbert wasn’t that careless.

Proving I had complete control over the Skeleton King wouldn’t change anything, either.

To humanity, monsters were a raw nerve no one could touch. Hadn’t decades of experiments already shown that monsters could never be tamed?

The Skeleton King was unprecedented. But some truths were rejected the moment they became known.

In the end… there's only one answer.

I closed my eyes. Countless thoughts flashed through my mind, and then I spoke.

"Team Leader Choi."

He had been waiting in silence for my decision.

"Go ahead."

"Is there any chance the approval to reestablish the World Hunter Federation could be revoked?"

"Why do you suddenly—"

"Just answer me."

I opened my eyes. Team Leader Choi studied me with a conflicted look before replying.

"There is no chance of that."

"You're sure?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

"The World Hunter Federation is now indispensable. Given the current situation, with magical power levels rising every day, it is the only way to stop a spark that has already been lit from spreading."

"Even if something happens to me or that bastard?"

"…!"

His eyes shook violently. A moment later, he understood what I meant and shouted.

"Mr. Jin Taekyung!"

But I had already chosen.

Neither the first path nor the second. A third one, dark and choked with thorns.

I would kill Michael Silbert, the man at the center of it all.

"No!"

"Nothing's impossible. It's just difficult."

I answered calmly and kept going before he could interrupt.

"If I pull this off… you'll need to make your move, Team Leader Choi. Magic Johnson will do everything he can to help."

"Stop! Stop talking!"

"There's Chuck Hagel, Faye Chen, and Prince Felix too. Get the support of the S-rank Hunters you've built ties with and the nations friendly to us. Then take control of the reestablished World Hunter Federation."

"I don't want to hear it! And how could I possibly…?"

"Your maternal grandfather walked that path. If you can make people understand the weight of Cheon Taemin's name, you have a shot. If that seems impossible, you could back Magic Johnson instead."

I grinned.

"Well, you're smart enough to figure it out yourself."

"…!"

"Still, one more thing, just in case. Even if Michael Silbert loses his head, the rest of his organization will remain. You should find those people and get rid of them first—"

Shing.

A cold sound cut me off.

A sword stood in my way.

Team Leader Choi had drawn the Hero's Sword without my noticing. He glared at me, his face set.

"You're not going."

"Hmm. I don't think you can stop me."

"Nothing's impossible. It's just difficult."

He threw my words back at me. I stepped toward him.

"Fine. I was going to rough you up anyway. This works out."

"What do you mean?"

"Everyone knows we're close. If I beat you half to a pulp before I leave, it might keep them from getting suspicious."

"…!"

"…!"

Team Leader Choi gritted his teeth. A dazzling aura flared around him, its immense power rippling along the blade and stirring the air.

Rumble. Whoooosh!

A tremor spread through the entire building. The wind rose into a gale.

"You really do have talent. You've improved a lot."

I gave him a calm smile and was about to step forward when—

Bzzzt.

A faint vibration sounded from somewhere, cutting through the tension between us.

Chapter 771

Bzzzt.

It wasn't hard to identify the vibration. I had something in my own pocket that made a similar sound.

"Team Leader Choi, looks like you're getting a call. Aren't you going to answer?"

"Don't worry about it. That isn't what matters right now."

"What, afraid I'll jump you while you're on the phone?"

"That…"

Team Leader Choi trailed off.

The fact that we were facing off at all was absurd. No matter how gifted he was or how quickly he'd improved, he couldn't stop me.

The only reason he was still on his feet was that I was letting him stay there. I was holding back for a friend I had no choice but to bring down.

And I had another reason to hold back.

"If someone's calling your direct line, it must be important. Go ahead and answer. I need to wait for enough witnesses to gather anyway."

"Witnesses…?"

"Yes. Witnesses."

I watched Team Leader Choi turn the word over in his mind, then went on.

"The more people who see what happens next, the better. For all of us."

There was no other way.

Team Leader Choi and I had been in the same boat for a long time. If I killed Michael Silbert, he'd be implicated as my accomplice. And it wouldn't stop with him. The Peace Guild, the Ares Guild, my family and friends—everyone connected to me would be hurt.

That would be the end of everything.

To prevent the worst, I have to draw a line between us where plenty of people can see it.

Soon, I'd be a criminal as notorious as The Prophet, if not more so.

A traitor to humanity who, when a longtime comrade confronted him about joining forces with an undead monster, struck him down without hesitation and fled with the monster.

And… the murderer who killed Michael Silbert, the hero of the age, in broad daylight.

"A couple of broken bones won't be the end of it. While you're taking the call, check that you have a potion ready."

Team Leader Choi bit his lip.

"…You're serious."

"I've thought it through. I know which road I'm taking."

At some point, I'd gained too many things to protect. Every choice demanded that I think it through, then think it through again.

But once I'd decided, I had to cast hesitation aside. The moment I looked back, I'd hesitate. I'd leave an opening.

Little by little, I'd learned not to look back.

In Murim. In the modern world.

Among monsters that came charging at me to kill me, and loathsome people even worse than the monsters.

"This is the path I chose. Right now, it's the best one."

Sacrifice the Skeleton King, or hand the world to Michael Silbert.

I couldn't choose either. So I'd made a different decision.

Rather than let Michael control me like a puppet, I would kill a hero and become a traitor who had joined forces with a monster.

Even if that was what it took, I would tear out the root of this disaster.

He dies by my hand today.

Whoosh.

A scorching heat spread throughout my body. Spitting out a single word as though I were chewing it to pieces, I unleashed the qi wave I had drawn up to its limit in every direction.

Rumble!

A violent tremor shook not just the building, but the surrounding area.

The force dwarfed anything Team Leader Choi had released. The hologram television, which had been playing silently, crackled and shut off. Alarms throughout the building began to wail.

Beep, beep! Weeeee!

"What the hell is—ah!"

"Aaaah!"

"Emergency! This is an emergency! Everyone, please evacuate!"

The murmurs that Team Leader Choi's earlier tremor had stirred up turned to screams.

Amid the countless footsteps passing outside the door and the desperate shouts they were vomiting out, Team Leader Choi, who had been staring at me with a hollow expression, suddenly raised the Hero's Sword.

Thunk!

The silver blade plunged into the floor, slicing through it like tofu. He squeezed his eyes shut, then opened them and pulled a smartphone and a potion from inside his clothes as though he had resigned himself to everything.

Then I saw his eyes widen. A moment later, his fingers flew across the screen.

Flash.

A huge man appeared in midair amid the glow of a hologram. Magic Johnson looked more frantic than I'd ever seen him.

"Damn it. Why are you taking so long to answer? Did you look at the materials I sent? I found something strange a little while ago—wait, what the hell is going on here?"

He looked from Team Leader Choi to me. I didn't answer. I strode toward him.

More precisely, toward the documents in his hand.

This is…

Several photographs. Pages packed with tiny text.

My eyes were sharp enough to take in every detail in barely a dozen seconds. As I read, possibilities I'd never considered began to take shape.

Why the hell would this…? Wait. If that's true…

One thought led to another, tangling with the rest. A pale fog filled my mind, and I groped for whatever lay hidden inside it.

"Ah."

The sound escaped my lips. The energy roiling inside me, ready to explode, began to settle.

Fwoosh.

My qi wave dispersed, and the tremors slowly died away.

But my gaze wavered more than ever, as did my mind after glimpsing the true shape of something beyond the fog filling my head.

If this is true…

Yes. If it really was…

Unable to finish the thought, I stared blankly at Magic Johnson. Then I turned to Team Leader Choi—and to the Hero's Sword planted in the floor before him like Excalibur.

"Team Leader Choi."

"Yes?"

"Why did you pull your sword out all of a sudden? You scared me."

"What?"

"I need to think. Put it away and calm everyone down. It's really loud out there."

"…What?"

What the hell? Is he insane?

Reading the thought plainly conveyed through Team Leader Choi's eyes, I let out a hollow laugh.

No matter how people around us looked at me, I continued to quietly chuckle to myself like a madman for quite some time before suddenly slapping both cheeks hard.

Smack!

Maybe a little too hard.

The full-force slap rattled my skull, but it brought my mind back from its brief AWOL stint before it got beyond the garrison limits.

All right.

Finally back in the room, I looked at the two men's bewildered faces and spoke.

"All right, everyone. Now let's all…"

Good breathing. Good emotion.

Deliver the last part solemnly.

"Let's carve out a fourth path where every last fucking bastard dies and we survive."

Team Leader Choi's and Magic Johnson's eyes twitched at my grand, solemn declaration.

"Mr. Jin Taekyung…"

"Hey, Jin…"

What more needed to be said?

I gave a faint smile and nodded as though I understood everything.

The new hope I'd glimpsed at the last moment had lit a heat somewhere inside me, different from Scorching Yang Qi. It kept welling up.

No. It was overflowing.

Drip. Splash!

"…What the fuck?"

Was it really going to overflow?

Heat—or rather, a torrent of red liquid—gushed from my nostrils, which had opened up with refreshing force before the fourth path even had a chance to do so. The two men's gazes went cold.

"You have a nosebleed. A really bad one."

"It reminds me of the fountain in the plaza of my mansion. More precisely, it looks like the baby angel built into the fountain is pissing like that."

"You should have slapped yourself more gently."

"He's going to pass out from blood loss at this rate. Choi, do you have a potion?"

"I took one out just now. I didn't expect to use it for this…"

"Good. Give it to Jin. And what did you mean by a fourth path? No, never mind. Stop the nosebleed first, then explain."

"Here, take it. And step back a little, please. You're spraying blood."

"…"

As I accepted the potion from Team Leader Choi, I thought that going straight to fight Michael Silbert might have looked a lot cooler than this.

But this was me.

A man who might look anything but cool right now, who might make a damn fool of himself, but would still struggle for the best outcome he could get.

A realistic man busting his ass for the sake of this world where no one could see him, the true man of this era who was—

"What are you doing? Swallow it. All in one gulp."

"Jin, do you have trouble taking potions? Want me to help?"

Team Leader Choi was nagging me like a mother-in-law. Magic Johnson had started licking his lips for some reason. I looked at them in alarm, then hurriedly emptied the potion into my mouth.

Ssshhh.

Ice-cold healing energy coursed through me. The tremors stopped as if they'd never happened, and the hologram television came back on.

A familiar face filled the screen.

Gray hair. Gray eyes.

The man looked as though he had been born somewhere between light and darkness. He stood before countless camera flashes and cameras, continuing to speak without sound. Stark subtitles ran beneath him.

> Live: UN Emergency General Assembly Approves Reestablishment of World Hunter Federation by Overwhelming Vote
>
> Michael Silbert: I offer my wholehearted praise for the UN's decision on behalf of humanity, and propose an inaugural ceremony for the newly reestablished World Hunter Federation.

"Turn off mute!"

Beep.

At Team Leader Choi's urgent command, the sound trapped in the speakers rushed out like a flood.

"Does that statement mean that you intend to become the representative of the World Hunter Federation yourself?"

"Michael! Can an inaugural ceremony really be held in a situation like this?"

"When and where would you like it to be held?"

"We're from the Washington Post. Please give us a statement!"

The questions came like screams.

So many reporters surrounded Michael Silbert that the cameras couldn’t fit them all in. He answered none of them, merely waving a hand with a grave expression.

Swish.

He was a hologram. In reality, he had to be several kilometers[3136] away at the very least. Yet it all felt vivid.

The air around him. The sense that the entire scene had been arranged for him alone.

The presence of that man, radiating suffocating majesty simply by being seen and heard.

Only Michael Silbert was free to speak there now.

“I swear to God, I proposed the reestablishment of the World Hunter Federation three days ago for one reason alone: for this world, for humanity.”

“…!”

I could feel it. The tumult wrapping around them.

And there he stood beneath a spotlight brighter than any he’d known in his life: a born agitator and orator.

“The representative of the World Hunter Federation should go to someone other than me. A living savior, the hero of the Great Cataclysm who already saved humanity from the Demon King once before!”

His voice, infused with internal energy, carried on and on. Overcome with excitement, people looked to the sky and cried out.

Sky. Slayer. Cheon Taemin.

Many names for one man. But a considerable number of people were chanting another name, too.

Michael Silbert.

As the fervor spread like fire, he pressed on.

“The inaugural ceremony will be held without fail. Whether it is the mad terrorist who calls himself The Prophet, any monster whatsoever, or even the return of the Demon King, the Hunters of the World Hunter Federation will gather in one place, choose their representative, and swear that they have become humanity’s sword and shield!”

“Waaaaah!”

My ears rang. I could hear the roar now without the speakers.

Through the cracks around the tightly shut door, I heard the whole city shouting as one.

No. Perhaps it was happening all over the world.

Everywhere light reached and electricity flowed.

[3136] One kilometer is about 0.62 miles.

All those people cheering for the hero shining alone at the center of it, without the faintest idea that he was behind everything.

As the fervor swelled beyond anything the crowd could contain, Michael Silbert spoke with more force in his eyes and voice than ever before.

To the people caught up in it. To the cameras trained on him.

Or perhaps…

“Two days from now. Seoul, Korea.”

Toward me—the one who could do nothing but watch him from here.

Michael Silbert made his declaration to the world.

“In the savior’s homeland, where the World Hunter Federation first began, we will rise once more, just as we did then.”

Chapter 772

The incitement, the speech, the declaration—it was over.

But the enormous roar did not end. It continued without pause.

Reporters' cameras caught the crowds pouring into the streets, while their microphones picked up cheers shouted in half-hoarse voices. Everywhere felt like a festival.

Only days ago, disaster had descended on this city. Now an inexplicable hope and joy filled it. Those feelings gathered and flowed toward one man.

"Michael! Michael!"

They chanted his name and applauded with all they had.

For a very long time. With all their strength.

They poured out their gratitude and respect for a true hero who had stepped forward for their sake, without the slightest desire for the immense power of the World Hunter Federation.

Their hero stood on the stage and gazed at them, his face full of emotion. Then, unable to hold back his tears, he turned and hurried away.

The retreating figure of a hero who had always seemed so strong was beautiful.

From behind.

"You've arrived."

Huginn was waiting below the stage. He gave a slight bow and gestured, and the Odin Guild's Hunters hurried to block the reporters following Michael.

"Please step back."

"Just a moment. It'll only take—"

"I'm sorry, but not today."

As Michael walked on, the bright lights and the cheers gradually faded behind him. He wiped the tears from the corners of his eyes and spoke in a dry voice.

"They responded well. Better than I expected."

"They needed hope that badly. And those tears at the end—you were magnificent."

"Did you think I was acting?"

Huginn slowed at the unexpected question.

"You… meant them?"

"I did. Though I'm not sure I felt what they did."

Tears were strange things. They came with joy, sadness, anger—even emotions the person shedding them could not easily name.

His tears had been closest to that last kind.

What was it?

Joy at finally reaching his grand objective?

Or… a few of the fragments of feeling he had left?

Michael Silbert thought about the reason for his tears, which even he did not know, but soon shook his head inwardly.

He did not always need to find the right answer.

If he had tried to find the right answer to every problem he had faced, he would not be standing here now.

No. He would have died decades ago.

On that day.

“Guild Master?”

Huginn’s voice broke into his thoughts.

“Go on.”

“I have something to report. Just before you began your speech…”

“The small disturbance on the outskirts of the city?”

“You’ve already received a report?”

“No. I sensed it, faintly.”

Huginn, who had been following behind him, stopped short. Michael Silbert smiled faintly.

“Surprised?”

“To be honest, yes.”

“I thought you might be.”

The disturbance had been considerable, but it had happened several kilometers[3137] away. Michael recalled the sensation that had swept over him.

“It surprised me too. Heat reached me from all that way off, so suddenly it felt as though every hair on my body might stand on end. For an instant, it was as if I could look down over the entire city.”

“…Guild Master, could it be—”

“I know what you’re thinking, but I wouldn’t worry. I only felt it that intensely for a moment.”

Michael muttered, almost to himself, “Perhaps I’ve been training too hard.”

“You should stop training for a while.”

“I’ve already been holding back. I did push myself too hard this past year. Perhaps I grew impatient without realizing it.”

He already knew what had made him impatient.

As well as the identity of the intense heat he had suddenly felt in the distance just before beginning his speech.

“What happened to Jin Taekyung? If it had been an emergency, you would have interrupted me in the middle of the speech. It can’t have been too serious.”

[3137] One kilometer is about 0.62 mi; several kilometers is a few miles.

"According to the watchers, the Stone-King left the hotel first. Not long afterward, the area shook."

"The top floor where they're staying must have been the source."

"Yes. Then everything went quiet, as if nothing had happened."

"The monster left first. What else?"

"They tried various types of magic after approaching as closely as possible, but both the view inside and even the sounds were blocked, so…"

"That's enough. I'd expect as much."

Michael fell into thought. Then he murmured, "It seems they've had a disagreement."

"A disagreement?"

"They must differ on what to do. And judging by what Jin Taekyung has shown us, he may do something even more reckless than we expect."

"If you mean that reckless, surely…"

"What else? He doesn't have many options in this situation."

Huginn's eyes widened. Michael continued.

"Increase security and strengthen the surveillance network until the inaugural ceremony. In particular, don't take your eyes off that monster for even a moment. He is the most important key to this entire affair—he cannot be left out of it."

"Understood."

Huginn answered grimly, then asked, "Wouldn't it be better to use this opportunity to capture the monster alive?"

"Capture him?"

"Yes. If they hide him, or reveal his identity and sacrifice him before we can…"

"Huginn."

Michael cut him off gently and looked at his right-hand man.

"I told you before that Jin Taekyung has a more fatal weakness than anyone else. Do you remember what it is?"

"His emotions…?"

"Exactly. And that is why he has no choice but to hold on to the monster until the very end."

"You mean…"

"Yes. Somewhere along the way, Jin Taekyung began to think of the monster as a friend."

"…!"

"Funny, isn't it?"

Michael could not suppress a quiet laugh.

Even though he was remembered as one of the heroes of the Great Cataclysm, there had been plenty of walls in his way. Back then, he had not been overwhelmingly powerful, and the Odin Guild could hardly have been called a major guild.

So he had become stronger. He had brought down the walls and rivals before him by any means necessary.

But it was truly laughable.

And now? He had built a force and fighting strength no one could ignore, only to find that the obstacle in his path was the softest-hearted bastard he had ever faced.

Idiot.

Michael gave a hollow laugh and kept walking.

By then, his security team—no, his personal guard—had surrounded him on every side, each Hunter giving off a sharp aura.

Step after step, dozens of feet sounded as one.

When they reached the building where he was staying, the escorting Hunters spread out like a fan to secure the area. Their cordon was so tight that no one could break through.

Huginn stood at their head and gave a slight bow. Michael nodded to him without a word, then stepped into a space reserved for him alone.

Click. Whooom.

The moment he entered the room, the lock engaged. Dozens of defensive and security spells activated in succession.

The distant cheers he had still been able to hear seconds ago cut off.

At last, perfect silence.

Instead of settling onto the sofa, Michael crossed the broad carpet to a large full-length mirror covered in black cloth. He pulled the cloth away and channeled his energy into the clear glass.

Hummm.

A fine resonance filled the room. The mirror’s flawless surface rippled, distorting everything within it.

Whoosh.

The spacious room changed. So did the furniture and fixtures scattered around it. Finally, the person changed too.

In an instant, the scene in the mirror became one of utter darkness. A figure wrapped in a thick robe waited there for Michael Silbert.

“A very moving speech.”

The voice gave away neither age nor gender.

As The Prophet’s lips curled slightly beneath the robe, Michael Silbert’s eyes sank deep.

Winter nights are long.

That night felt especially long because most of the world could not sleep.

“The World Hunter Federation will protect humanity!”

Michael Silbert.

The declaration of a hero who had proven himself over decades set the public’s hearts ablaze again, just as his words had three days earlier.

People rushed into the streets, cheering and shouting. Fireworks burst over cities, and countless people sang as they marched through them.

All they had needed was a little hope.

Hope that someone would protect them and their loved ones from that monster. The hope that humanity would win again this time, just as it had in the past.

Michael Silbert’s declaration washed away the fear that had gripped them for three days, then spread to every corner of the world.

> Nigerian Civil War Ends! “We only wanted answers.”
> Congo: Protesters Halt March on Presidential Palace
> French President: “The protesters have dispersed. The peace we have now was possible because a hero gave the UN an answer.”

Strictly speaking, all of this had begun with a single word from Michael Silbert, but the public saw him differently.

> ㄴMichael did it all. He’s a true hero. ㄴExactly. If he hadn’t stepped forward, how long would it have taken to reestablish the World Hunter Federation? At least a month. ㄴFuck. A month? Those UN bastards would’ve dragged it out for a year. My family and I would be dead by then. ㄴWhat the hell are the other Hunters doing? Why did Michael have to handle everything himself? ㄴShooting commercials. ㄴCalm down. The other Hunters are doing their best too. Praise Michael all you want, but don’t put them down for it. ㄴYou sound just like my mother. Is your name Masa? ㄴHonestly, I’ve been a little disappointed watching this unfold. Especially in Sky and Jin. ㄴHmm. Same. ㄴWhat are those two doing right now? Everyone I know loves them, me included, but… I don’t get it. Jin even swore at Michael three days ago. ㄴI read that Jin’s showing symptoms of PTSD. You can at least cut him some slack for that. ㄴFine. I get it. What about Sky? ㄴEven the President of the United States probably wants to know. He hasn’t appeared in ages. ㄴI know one thing about him. He saved my parents. ㄴYeah, we all know that.

> Where is he now, and what's he doing? ㄴ You'll find out soon, so shut your fucking mouth. The inaugural ceremony is tomorrow. Are you whining like a little brat because you can't wait even one more day?

Hope. Joy. Questions. Anticipation.

Those countless emotions mixed and merged as the inaugural ceremony of the World Hunter Federation drew closer by the second, and prominent Hunters and Guild Masters from countries all over the world boarded private planes bound for Korea.

Of course, I was one of them.

Chapter 773

It was good to have somewhere to return to. Better still if there were people waiting for me there.

“Team Leader Choi! Taekyung!”

After several hours of flying, we arrived at Incheon Airport. From far away, a hairy giant came thundering toward us with both arms spread wide.

Whump!

The air caught in my throat.

Even as Im Kkeokjeong squeezed us in a hug that felt more like a chokehold, Team Leader Choi and I patted his shoulders while he sobbed.

It just felt like the thing to do.

“Why are you crying? Hit menopause already?”

“You’ve been okay—waaah! You’re not hurt anywhere—waaaah!”

“We’re fine. Please calm down.”

“I was so worried, so worried—sniff!”

Going by appearances, even the Green Forest Alliance Leader would have to step aside for him. But when it came to being sensitive, no one could match him.

The man’s outside and inside couldn’t have been more different.

And from over Im Kkeokjeong’s shoulder came a voice as clear and direct as the impression its owner gave.

“You should say we were worried, not I. What does that make me when you put it like that?”

Song Song stopped and looked Team Leader Choi and me over carefully.

“Hmm. You both look better than I expected.”

I asked in return,

“Are you sure? I’ll be suffocated in five minutes at this rate.”

“That’s five minutes from now. You look fine at the moment.”

“Can’t you see how bloodshot my eyes are? I haven’t slept properly in three days.”

“Why? You look much better than you did on TV a few days ago.”

She added, “Your eyes were completely gone then. You looked like you were about to drop dead.”

“…And now?”

“Hard to say. Like you might die in a hundred years or so?”

I couldn’t think of an answer, so I grinned.

Song Song was right. My body was exhausted, but my mind was incomparably clearer than it had been a few days ago.

Team Leader Choi’s was, too.

“How did the matter I asked you to handle go?” he asked.

“I delivered your instructions properly—to both the Peace and Ares Guilds. Once I narrowed the list down, there weren’t even ten people. But the ones I chose are all staunch loyalists.”

“Is there any chance the information leaked?”

“I picked only the most trustworthy senior members of the two Guilds. All their families are in Korea, too.”

“Well done. I’ll give the instructions myself from here on, so please make sure everything stays confidential, Miss Song.”

She nodded, then spoke cautiously. “But is Michael Silbert really…?”

“Shh.”

Looking perfectly composed, as though he hadn’t been sobbing a moment ago, Im Kkeokjeong cut her off. He whispered just loud enough for us to hear.

“He’s coming.”

He was right.

Several limousines glided across the quiet runway and stopped in front of us. President Baek Hanseong stepped out of one of them, looking as though he’d aged ten years since we last saw him.

“Welcome home, both of you.”

His voice sounded as worn out as his face.

A weekday afternoon.

The airport would normally have been packed. Instead, it was quiet inside, and outside was no different.

Police officers and soldiers appeared everywhere in the scenery passing beyond the limousine window. Here and there, people in black suits wore earpieces and, of course, Blue House badges on their chests.

“It’s nice and quiet,” I said.

“As you requested, we cleared everyone out in advance for security.”

Baek Hanseong continued as he threw away the red ginseng juice he had finished drinking.

“Of course, it was a necessary precaution with that terrorist out there.”

He meant The Prophet.

Only a few hours earlier, he told us, a huge crowd of reporters and well-wishers had surrounded the area.

“This may not be something I should say as President,” he muttered, “but lately, everyone seems to have lost their minds. Things are getting far too extreme.”

I agreed with him. I understood the crowds, too.

People who had no power to protect themselves were bound to go to extremes in a crisis. One moment they trembled as though humanity would be wiped out tomorrow; the next, the word hope made them blindly devoted.

…That's what he was counting on.

"Pardon?"

"Nothing. Just talking to myself."

Baek Hanseong seemed to sense something in my unthinking mutter. A complicated expression crossed his face, but I turned back to the window without another word.

He had helped us a great deal already. Depending on what happened next, he might be able to help us even more.

I couldn't tell him everything—not because I distrusted him, but because I couldn't trust what surrounded him.

There are plenty of ways.

Michael Silbert's eyes and ears were everywhere.

There could be a mole among Baek Hanseong's closest advisers, and there was every chance he was being watched.

The moment anyone was confronted with an unbelievable truth, they were bound to be shaken.

Being an experienced politician did not mean he could hide every emotion. If the enemy noticed something because of that, the situation would become even more disadvantageous.

And we can't rule out the possibility that the clue we found isn't the truth.

My eyes met Team Leader Choi's, and I could tell he was thinking the same thing.

He had limited his instructions to a tiny handful of the most trustworthy senior members of the Peace and Ares Guilds. Those instructions had been delivered covertly, and even they had nothing to do with the truth we'd uncovered.

They were only a safeguard for a worst-case scenario—a way to act before the grenade's pin was pulled, or to contain the blast if it went off.

For now, though, we couldn't be certain of anything.

Less than twenty-four hours remained before the inaugural ceremony. How it ended would decide everyone's fate.

Michael Silbert and me.

Beyond the simple divide between the enemy and us, it would decide where the world went from here.

Vroooom.

While my thoughts tangled themselves up, our limousine raced down the open road. Baek Hanseong filled us in on the latest news: the international situation, the decision to hold the inaugural ceremony at the National Assembly, and the list of participants confirmed so far.

He even told me how my mother and Hayeon were doing under heavy security.

"Your family has heard the news, and they're very worried. If you'd like, we could take you to them right now…"

I understood what his trailing words meant and shook my head.

"No. I'm planning to see them after the inaugural ceremony."

"Are you sure that will be all right?"

"Of course."

I missed my family more than anyone in the world, but I couldn't see them like this.

No. I mustn't.

I was afraid I'd lose my composure if I did.

Once everything was over, I wanted to face my mother and Hayeon with a peaceful mind. I wanted to rest in their warm embrace.

…If I can.

The words I couldn't bring myself to say lingered on the tip of my tongue, then faded. Just then, Baek Hanseong asked as though something had occurred to him.

"Where is the other person, by the way?"

"Ah."

"I'm fairly certain he was on the list of people entering the country… Has something happened?"

I hesitated, then met Team Leader Choi's eyes. I gave a bitter smile.

"He'll be late. Something came up."

It was a lie.

The Skeleton King was with us right now. He was simply keeping an endless silence inside a mysterious space no one else could see or sense.

Even now.

How long are you going to stay holed up in there?

This time, too, there was no answer.

That day, the whole world's attention was fixed on a small peninsula in East Asia.

The usual laughing, chattering variety shows were nowhere to be found on television. News channels, current-affairs programs, and internet forums were all abuzz over the World Hunter Federation's first inaugural ceremony, now less than a day away.

> ㄴWho's coming to the inaugural ceremony? ㄴNo idea. They flat-out said they wouldn't release the list because of the terrorist threat. Cleared out the airport, too. ㄴHeard they aren't broadcasting it live, either. They'll record it, though, so I guess we'll find out after it's over. ㄴWhy keep the list secret? If they're that worried about terrorism, why not hold a video conference like they did at the UN? ㄴFact: They showed up in person even during the Great Cataclysm. ㄴIt's a declaration that they won't back down, no matter what. Everyone's been fighting separately until now. Once the Federation is established, The Prophet is fucked. ㄴCheon Taemin's the most likely representative, right? ㄴYeah. Who else but Lord Taemin? ㄴMichael Silbert. ㄴJin Taekyung. ㄴI like Lord Fuck, but he doesn't measure up to Michael Silbert. Michael's got the seniority, and what he's done lately has been huge. ㄴDoesn't matter. It's Cheon Taemin either way. ㄴTrue. ㄴMaybe it's because Cheon Taemin hasn't shown up in so long, but I'm getting a chill. Just me? ㄴThen turn on the boiler.

The questions kept coming. Who would attend? Once they were all together, whom would they choose to represent them?

As the hours crept by, guests who had crossed thousands—even tens of thousands—of kilometers[3138] began arriving on the peninsula.

"We'll need to conduct a brief identity check."

The young man had neatly styled brown hair and faintly green eyes. He looked as though he'd stepped out of a fairy tale, and when he spoke, his voice carried an air of authority.

"I am Felix Alexander Louis, Duke of Cambridge, Earl of Strathearn, Baron Carrickfergus, Knight of the Order of the Garter, and Knight of the Order of the Chain."

"Pardon?"

"Those titles are merely for show. Feel free to address me casually."

"Ah, of course. Then, Mr. Felix…"

"Feel free to call me His Highness Prince Felix Alexander Louis. Casually."

"…Yes."

Prince Felix had just finished the brief scan when a large shadow fell over him.

"It's been a while, Felix. Oh, should I call you His Highness?"

At the familiar face looking down at him from far above, Prince Felix seemed about to frown, but then relaxed his expression.

He would have scolded anyone else. But this was one of the few people from whom he could tolerate a little rudeness.

[3138] One kilometer is about 0.62 miles; 1,000 km is about 620 mi, and 10,000 km is about 6,200 mi.

"Mr. Johnson."

Magic Johnson smiled faintly.

"Just get here?"

"I did."

"Faye Chen will be here soon, too. All of us who fought together in China will be in one place."

"So it seems. And who is the gentleman behind you?"

"He's with me. Though he's no gentleman."

Felix had never met the middle-aged man in person, but he recognized him at once. He was as huge as Magic Johnson, dressed like he'd stepped straight out of the American frontier, and had a cigar between his lips.

"…Chuck Hagel."

Chuck Hagel, who had been puffing away at his cigar in front of a no-smoking sign, answered,

"You calling me, Prince?"

At his irritable tone, Magic Johnson eased forward. "Since we've run into each other, how about a drink? Faye Chen can join us."

Felix studied them both for a moment, then shook his head.

"I have no interest."

"Too bad."

"See you tomorrow. Both of you."

"Sure. Then we'll do that."

A perfectly ordinary exchange.

Felix gave them a brief nod and walked off with his attendants. Under tight security, he reached his assigned lodgings, unpacked, and went to bed early ahead of the next day's ceremony.

Or so everyone thought.

But…

Click.

The locked door opened. The lights came on.

Felix had slipped out of his lodgings unseen. Now he could make out the figures who had been waiting for him in the dark—and the young man seated among them.

"It's been a while, Your Highness."

Felix gave a quiet laugh.

Choi Minwoo laughed with him. So did Magic Johnson, Chuck Hagel, and Faye Chen.

Their night, known to no one else, deepened.

Chapter 774

Back when I was a rookie Hunter, I used to cry sometimes.

No—if I'm being honest, pretty often.

Looking back, I suppose it was all growing pains. But that was how it was back then.

It was only natural. I had barely reached adulthood, and the Hunter Training Center was just that: a training center.

What was my first real fight like?

No matter how hard I try to remember, it's hazy as fog. Not because the memory has faded with age, but because I half-lost my mind the moment the battle began.

A few fragments remain clear.

The backs of the tanks as they buckled under the sheer number of monsters. The thick stench of blood and the reek of creatures that didn't belong to this world.

The spear feeling heavier than it ever had before. Sweat pooling in my grip…

That was all. The moment we clashed, everything around me seemed to recede. When I came to, there was blood everywhere.

The Team Leader had been waiting for me to wake up, a cigarette between his lips. The first thing he said was:

"You. Rookie."

"Y-Yes."

"You fucking bastard."

"Excuse me?"

"I almost died saving your ass. Did my wife put you up to it? Tell you to kill me so you two could split the insurance payout?"

"N-No."

"You fought pretty well for someone who'd lost his mind, but pull that shit again and you're going to die. Seriously."

"…I'm sorry."

"By the way, what's your name?"

"Jin Taekyung. Jin Taekyung, sir."

"What year were you born?"

"2020."

"Fuck. People were still being born in 2020?"

The Team Leader glared at me, puffing hard on his cigarette. Only then did he tell me his name.

"I'm Hong Cheonsu."

"Oh. Yes, sir."

"From now on, when we're off duty, call me… Uncle? No, that's a bit much. Call me hyung.[3139] Cheonsu hyung."

"Yes, Cheonsu hyung."

"This kid doesn't even pretend to refuse. And we're still inside the Gate, you little shit."

I didn't know it then.

I didn't know that I'd come to stick with that foul-tempered Team Leader like a brother through thick and thin. Or that, only a few years later, he would sacrifice himself for me.

"You did good. Here's your payout."

Six 50,000-won bills,[3140] after taxes and the Guild's fee.

I took my pay for risking my life that day and went back to my goshiwon.[3141]

When I opened the door, the room—less than four pyeong[3142]—smelled of mold. A family photograph sat on a table with a chipped corner.

And I cried.

At first, I sobbed quietly. Before long, I had buried my face between my knees and was bawling like a child.

If someone hadn't opened the locked door, I might have kept the entire goshiwon awake all night.

"Hey, new guy. Sorry for barging in without asking. I'm the manager here, but the complaints kept coming, so I had to use the master key…"

The manager took one look at my tear-streaked face and trailed off. He scratched his greasy hair, then closed the door.

He looked like some middle-aged guy, and I figured he wouldn't be back.

A little later, he returned with soju[3143] in one hand and a bag of ramen in the other.

"Want a drink? Oh, wait. You're not a minor… Obviously not. Look at the size of you. Whew."

Memories from nearly ten years ago.

Time passed, and I changed. My fear of monsters and the loneliness of being away from my family gradually faded.

No. I grew numb to them.

Like a hamster on a wheel, I just kept running.

Even if I wasn't getting anywhere, running was better than stopping. There were things I could protect only by keeping that wheel turning.

[3139] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses for an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

[3140] Each 50,000-won bill is worth about $36 or €32. The six bills total 300,000 won, about $210 or €190.

[3141] A goshiwon is a very small, inexpensive room-for-rent housing arrangement, often used by students and people with limited means.

[3142] One pyeong is about 3.31 m^2 or 35.6 ft^2; four pyeong is about 13.2 m^2 or 142 ft^2.

[3143] Soju is a Korean distilled alcoholic drink.

Family. Friends. Comrades.

I couldn’t stop anymore.

At some point, the little wheel in the cage that held me had become the enormous wheel of fate. And the word duty, which I carried in my heart, had grown clearer and heavier.

Maybe that was why.

Why I had been able to revisit that fading memory, if only in a dream.

Why my cheeks were wet when I opened my eyes to someone shaking me awake.

“…kyung. Mr. Jin Taekyung.”

I blinked. My blurred vision finally came into focus.

A familiar face looked down at me with concern. His expression had barely changed, which only made the small trace of emotion stand out more.

“Are you all right?”

I rubbed my wet eyes and answered.

“I don’t know.”

“Did you have a bad dream?”

“I’m not sure.”

I sat up, my voice hoarse. The clock showed that it was just past noon. Through a gap in the curtains, I could see how dark it was outside.

“I don’t know if it was a bad dream or a good one. I really don’t.”

Team Leader Choi watched me in silence before speaking calmly.

“Don’t dwell on it. It was only a dream.”

He was right. A dream was only a dream. Whether today brought good or bad fortune was up to us—and deciding that was my role.

No. It was everyone’s.

“I’m still half-asleep, so let me ask you something. Was last night a dream too?”

“Last night?”

“Yeah. There were a lot of familiar faces. Toward the end, I even saw a British prince dressed as a hotel bellboy.”

Only then did a faint smile touch Team Leader Choi’s lips.

“How strange. I had the same dream.”

“Oh, you did? Personally, I thought it was a pretty good one.”

“So did I.”

That part, of course, hadn’t been a dream.

Our secret conversation had gone on until the small hours of the morning. Worn out by the past few days, I’d fallen asleep as if I’d passed out.

Maybe that was why my mind felt clear and my body felt light.

Almost too light.

There is one small problem, of course.

I focused on the faint pain deep inside me.

Broken Body still hadn't healed. Its effects weren't just numbers displayed by the System. Like a parasite clinging to a host, it was eating away at some of my strength.

Can I do it? Even like this?

The question flashed through my mind. I shook my head.

Whether I could do it wasn't the question.

I had to.

For me, for my people, and for everyone else.

"Are we ready?"

Team Leader Choi answered without hesitation.

"Everything is ready."

There was certainty in his voice—the kind that came from having done everything he could to prepare.

But I asked again, this time addressing someone else, crouched somewhere out of sight.

"And you?"

Once again, there was no answer.

He must have seen and heard everything, but he chose silence again. As though he were trying to cut away every last shred of affection between us. As though he were a traveler packed and ready to leave.

But… I had no intention of letting him go.

Especially not for a reason as fucked up as this.

"Let's go."

I said it evenly and left the room. Team Leader Choi followed at once, and the Hunters of the Peace Guild and Ares Guild filled the corridor behind us, trailing like a dragon's tail.

It was time to set the enormous wheel in motion.

The sky was gray that day.

Dark clouds had spread across the capital region before dawn, bringing a light drizzle. The air felt chilly against the skin.

But the weather meant nothing to the people.

They expected the clouds to clear and the sun to shine through soon.

No. Certainty might have been a better word.

The historic inaugural ceremony of the new World Hunter Federation.

That was the sunlight they had been waiting for: an alliance of superhumans who would save them from the second Great War, soon to descend on them—or perhaps already begun.

Heroes of the past, present, and future would gather in one place and become Hunters in the truest sense. They would be humanity's sword and shield, drive away the dark clouds, and protect the world from the monsters surging in like waves.

Today.

Here.

New history begins.

Michael Silbert ran his fingertips across the table.

The enormous round table had three hundred seats. Marks left by sharp weapons covered its surface.

The marks the heroes left behind.

He remembered that day clearly.

When the World Hunter Federation—an alliance unlike any before it—was born, Michael Silbert had been there to share in its glory.

Beside those now long dead, he had shouted with his blood aflame. They had drawn their weapons and pointed them skyward, then driven their swords into the great round table and sworn to become humanity's sword and shield.

Yes. Right here.

He could never forget it.

Michael Silbert gently stroked the chair he had once occupied. Age had left it rough and creaking, yet even that stirred something in him.

But that was all.

He looked down at the chair that held those memories without sitting in it or leaning against it. His gaze drifted away from it, toward the center of the round table.

The only empty space.

There was no chair or platform there. Ringed by three hundred seats, it almost looked as desolate as an uninhabited island.

But neither Michael nor anyone else had thought so back then.

One man had always filled that space.

Stronger and brighter than anyone else. A hero among heroes, whom even those who envied him could only regard with awe and fear.

Sky.

Michael Silbert raised his head and looked around.

The First National Assembly Hall had since become a World Heritage site. Stained glass installed just after the war, depicting humanity's victory in the Great Cataclysm, glittered on every side.

Humans and monsters locked in fierce battle. Blood flowing in rivers. Corpses piled everywhere…

His gaze passed over the old heroes immortalized there by their dazzling feats, most of them now dead. Then it settled on the highest point in that glorious record.

Two figures set into the ceiling.

Well. You're still looking down at me from up there.

Michael Silbert gave a quiet laugh.

The savior who had driven his sword into the heart of Asmodeus—the Demon King who had cast humanity into a pit of fire—looked down at him.

As though warning Michael not to forget him.

As though he might descend at any moment and mete out divine punishment.

But…

Not anymore, Sky.

Michael Silbert smiled softly.

In his youth, he had been neither particularly strong nor particularly weak beside the other heroes. Now he had returned, his strength beyond anyone's denial.

And what about you?

Cheon Taemin—the man Michael had revered and feared, the man who had forced him to lie low for fear of attracting his notice—was gone.

All he could do now was remain as a record in this place and watch Michael, who would soon ascend the throne.

"I'll take the place where you once stood."

The words came out full of elation.

Grrrnnng.

The tightly shut door opened. Light spilled through the gap, along with a voice.

"What a load of bullshit. What a load of bullshit."

Chapter 775

Every now and then, what I really think slips out before I can stop it.

Like right now.

“What a load of bullshit. What a load of bullshit.”

Michael Silbert showed no reaction to my tone. Instead, he greeted me with the last traces of elation still on his face.

“You’re earlier than I expected. I’ve been waiting.”

“Practicing your musical all by yourself?”

“Musical?”

He considered that for a moment, then gave a short laugh.

“I suppose that isn’t wrong. What happens here today is a musical of sorts. One man directing, staging, and starring in the whole thing.”

“My mother used to say that if you eat whatever’s put in front of you, sooner or later you’ll make yourself sick.”

“No need to worry. Nothing will go wrong, and the show is guaranteed to be a hit.”

“That line you delivered just now was pretty awful. You sure it’ll be a hit?”

“It was only a rehearsal before the main performance, but I’ll take your opinion into account.”

The easy manner. The faint smile on his lips.

As he came closer, my stomach twisted. Each breath felt like a huge needle stirring around inside it.

Was this the effect of Broken Body? Or was it because I was standing face-to-face with the lunatic now right in front of me?

Maybe both.

“Did that friend come with you?”

“Find out for yourself.”

“Not a bad idea.”

Michael gazed at the firmly shut door over my shoulder, then nodded.

“I’ve confirmed it. You brought him here safely.”

An ordinary civilian watching us might have wondered what the hell he meant. I didn’t.

Sss…

There was no sound. No visible shape.

But I felt it: the wave of qi he had sent out, slipping back into his body the instant it found what he was looking for.

He did it with a natural, practiced ease more like a Supreme Peak master of Murim than a Hunter. He was unlike any ordinary Hunter I'd met. Worse, even I couldn't gauge how strong he truly was. He still hadn't shown his full strength.

But I couldn't let him see that anything was amiss.

A brief silence fell between us. I broke it.

"He came with me."

"Hmm?"

"I didn't bring him. We came together."

Michael looked puzzled for a moment, then laughed aloud.

"Very well. If the person involved insists on putting it that way, perhaps there is a difference. But what possible difference could it make?"

"A hell of a difference. Someone like you wouldn't understand, even if you died and came back."

"No. What matters is that you and your friend are here. And if anything matters more than that…"

The voice reaching my ears suddenly dropped into a low murmur.

"Your intention."

"My intention?"

"Yes. Your intentions today."

He watched me as though he'd suspected them from the start. I let the silence sit for a moment, then spoke.

"Let me ask you something."

"I'm the one who should hear an answer first, but very well. I'll permit the question."

"What are your intentions?"

"What?"

"Why commit all these atrocities? What could you possibly want badly enough to sacrifice so many people and push the whole world into a pit of fire?"

Step.

I closed the few paces between us until our noses nearly touched. I could see the smallest change in his expression, the fine hairs on his skin. I could feel his breath.

Human.

Considering everything he had done, it was difficult to believe, but Michael Silbert was undeniably human, just like me.

Blood, flesh, and bone.

So why?

"Why did you do it? What the hell was it all for?"

Ever since I'd first met him, all I'd felt toward Michael was anger. Not now.

I genuinely wanted to know. I couldn't understand him. The more clues I found about him, the more questions I had.

"Born on March 18, 1994, in Paris's Tenth Arrondissement. His father ran away before he was born, and his alcoholic single mother, who lived with him, died in 2012."

What I'd learned of one man's life spilled from my mouth.

I turned away from Michael Silbert and began to walk.

Step. Step.

One step, then another. As I crossed the First National Assembly Hall, now a World Heritage site, I retraced his past.

A polite, diligent child despite a difficult home life. Then, after his mother's death, a late turn toward delinquency and several criminal convictions.

Finally came the event that changed his life completely.

"In 2020, when the Great Cataclysm began, he awakened in his mid-twenties."

I stopped.

I raised my head. In the stained glass set into the wall, a young man stood alone amid countless heaps of corpses, tears running down his face.

December 25, 2020 — The Great Battle of Paris

They said it had been one of the ten fiercest battles of the entire Great Cataclysm.

Instead of bells ringing through the streets to celebrate Christmas, screams and thunderous explosions echoed through Paris. A thousand Hunters stationed in the city waged an urban battle against monsters that outnumbered them dozens of times over.

For a whole week.

Without reinforcements. A desperate fight in every sense.

When seven days and nights had passed and the last sun of 2020 had set, reinforcements arrived after finishing another battle. They found countless bodies, pools of blood, and one young man standing among them.

"That was you."

I turned slowly.

The face of the young man in the stained glass was there—the young man who had survived alone in that ruin, more than thirty years ago, while the stench of blood hung thick in the air.

"Michael Silbert."

He had listened without a word. At my quiet call, he finally spoke.

"I'll give you credit for the effort. You must have worked hard. The records from before my awakening were erased. They couldn't have been easy to find."

"You erased them. Having a criminal record wouldn't have done your reputation any favors."

“I won’t deny it. I thought it might stand in my way one day. Everyone was in chaos then, so it was easy enough to deal with.”

Michael Silbert answered calmly, then stared at me.

“But… if that’s all you found, I’m a little disappointed.”

“What?”

“The Tenth Arrondissement, where I was born, was a shithole. Fights broke out several times a day. Gunshots rang out every night. The alley wall I passed on my way to and from school was always dark red. Nobody cleaned the blood off. It would only be red again the next day.”

“…”

“That was my hometown. By day, gangs of every race roamed the streets. By night, neon signs lit up the entertainment district. You called my mother an alcoholic, didn’t you?”

He answered his own question without a change in tone.

“Apparently you didn’t know she was addicted to drugs, too. Whenever I came home from school, she’d be sprawled across that worn-out sofa with men I’d never seen before.”

Everyone had a painful past. Yet as Michael recalled his, a faint smile touched his lips.

“A man who planted his seed and ran. A woman who was my mother only in the eyes of the law. And their child, whose life became a string of assaults and thefts. That was me. But I’m also the hero who saved Paris twice, and the pioneer who was first to speak up for people in danger.”

“…!”

“I used to be ashamed of my past. Not anymore. From slum child to hero of the world. Excellent marketing, wouldn’t you say?”

I stared at him, at a loss for words.

What did someone have to go through to become so worn down? The clock that had run without stopping since the day he was born looked as though it had been ticking for six hundred years, not sixty.

His heart looked much the same.

Under my gaze, Michael’s smile widened.

“You’re looking at me as if I’m a monster. Are you afraid of me now, too?”

“Too?”

“Everyone who knows me looks at me with fear and respect. You aren’t the first.”

“Some of them are dead by now, I’m guessing.”

“If they won’t bow their heads on their own, shouldn’t they be forced to yield? They were fools.”

He wasn’t talking about enemies long gone. He was talking to me.

A warning to lower my head before he crushed me by any means necessary. A meticulous attempt to make sure not even the slightest possibility of things going wrong remained.

I studied him for a moment, then broke the silence.

"You're half wrong and half right."

"What do you mean?"

"It's true that I see you as a monster. But this isn't fear. It's pity. You could call it disgust, too."

"…!"

"I just wanted to ask. Whether this could be cleaned up before irreversible sacrifices occurred. Whether any trace of humanity remained in this lunatic. And…"

My voice sank.

"I'm a little disappointed. That you thought I could hold you back with nothing more than a few criminal convictions."

"What?"

Before he could make sense of it, I turned and held out my hand.

Whoosh. Bang!

Qi flowed from my fingertips and gently pushed the shut doors open. Beyond them, I could sense people drawing closer up the stairs.

I tipped my head toward Michael. His face had gone rigid.

"Don't keep busy people waiting. Start the inaugural ceremony you were so eager to hold, you fucking bastard."

"…!"

"You haven't even transferred the deed, and you're already acting like the landlord. What a fucking asshole."

I ignored his icy stare, sat in the nearest chair, and leaned back.

The die had been cast. It was still rolling, and soon we would see whether it came up one or six.

We'd find out who died and who survived, too.

And I had not the slightest intention of dying in a place like this.

Especially not at the hands of a monster instead of a human being.

Step. Step. Step.

Hundreds of footsteps finally entered the now-silent conference hall.

The first page in the history of the new World Hunter Federation was turning.

Chapter 776

Some questions in this world remain unanswered.

The relationship between troubled times and heroes is one of them.

Do heroes appear first, bringing troubled times in their wake?

Or do troubled times give rise to heroes?

Even after many years had passed, no clear answer had emerged that could satisfy everyone. But when faced with the history of the Great Cataclysm, even those who had argued for the former were forced to turn toward the latter.

A Great War unlike any other in human history.

The Great Cataclysm shattered everything people had thought they knew. It gave rise to countless heroes, then cast them into the jaws of death, leaving behind only their names and deeds.

But many heroes survived, too.

Heroes like those now gazing at the National Assembly Hall, filled with traces of glory, and the enormous round table at its center.

“Ah. This place hasn’t changed. Even the air feels the same as it did that day.”

“It’s changed a little. When did they put up that painting?”

“What are you talking about, hyung[3144]? It’s been almost thirty years. Weren’t you at the commemorative event?”

“No.”

“Why not?”

“Because I never wanted to remember those days again.”

Power beyond that of ordinary humans did not preserve everyone’s youth.

An old man whose hair had turned white with the passing years murmured in a hoarse voice.

“So many empty seats.”

The survivors had carried losses as great as their glory.

Where were the comrades who had once sat around this table and cheered? The ones who had fought back-to-back against monsters surging in from every direction?

“I never thought I’d come back here…”

Yet fate had brought them back, as if playing a cruel joke.

Back to this place marked by glory and pain. Back to swear once more that they would be humanity’s sword and shield.

And new faces were filling the seats left empty by those who were gone.

[3144] Hyung is a Korean term a man uses to address an older brother or an older man with whom he is close.

“Hello, Senior.”

“Who are you?”

“My name is Liam. We met during the Defense of Frankfurt, but I suppose you don’t remember me. Haha.”

“I’m sorry. I must be getting old if I can’t recognize someone I fought beside.”

“No, of course you wouldn’t recognize me. I was fifteen then.”

“Fifteen? Were you…?”

“Yes. I was one of the citizens in the bunker. You may not remember, Senior, but you saved my life back then.”

“Well, I’ll be.”

The great trees with sturdy roots were not the only ones to survive the typhoon.

Those who had once been saplings, weeds, or mere seeds had grown, too, and earned the right to sit at the round table.

But warm reunions like theirs were rare among the heroes of past and present. Humanity faced another grave crisis, and the heroes differed in both their values and the course they wanted to take.

Whom would they choose as their representative?

That was the most important question before them today. The older and younger heroes had naturally gathered with those who shared their views.

Two men stood at the center of it all.

Michael Silbert, renowned for his achievements and the first to call for the World Hunter Federation’s reestablishment.

And…

Jin Taekyung.

Michael Silbert repeated the name silently. He shook hands and exchanged greetings with the followers surrounding him, but his shadowed eyes remained fixed on the young man beyond their shoulders.

What exactly did you mean by that?

The voices flattering him seemed far away. All he could hear was what Jin had said moments earlier.

> “I’m a little disappointed. That you thought I could hold you back with nothing more than a few criminal convictions.”

The voice had faded, but the memory remained vivid. So did the shock Michael had felt at the time.

His heart, usually so calm, began to beat faster.

Wait. Could it be?

His gray eyes trembled as he watched Jin Taekyung.

Of all the possibilities he had considered, one had come to mind. It was the only way Jin could stop him now.

But… no. It couldn't be. It was absurd.

It's all but impossible for anyone else to notice. No, it's impossible.

Only one person could have done so: Cheon Taemin.

Even he, who had reached a one-of-a-kind realm, had merely sensed something in passing at the time. Michael Silbert, who had immediately noticed the warning sign, had been forced to lie low like a wanted criminal for a long time.

Until Cheon Taemin disappeared from the public eye.

Until Michael was certain Cheon Taemin's attention had shifted away from him.

And now Jin Taekyung, of all people? Not Sky?

As his unease grew, Michael shook his head inwardly.

No. Everything Jin had said was nothing but bravado.

Bravado meant to search for one final opening after everything was already over. The last desperate struggle of someone who had sensed his defeat.

But why?

Even as he dismissed it as a bluff, Jin's image rose before him like a haze, clouding his eyes and ears.

> "Then what is your intention?"

One question.

> "Why did you do those things? What in the world were you doing it for?"

Then another.

> "This isn't fear. It's pity. You could call it disgust, too."

That expression. Those eyes. That calm voice.

The young man had lived barely half as long as Michael, yet the emotion Michael had sensed in him was unmistakably close to genuine.

And if it was genuine…

Crack.

Bones shifted under the pressure of Michael's grip. A strained voice broke through his thoughts.

"G-Guild Master?"

"Hmm?"

"W-Why are you squeezing my hand…?"

"Ah."

Michael realized what he had done and loosened his grip.

The follower whose hand he had been shaking forced a smile through the pain.

"You certainly live up to your reputation. I used to be a tank, so I can hold my own when it comes to raw strength, but you're incredible, Guild Master."

The S-rank Hunters and heads of the great Guilds watching nearby were quick to agree.

"Of course he is."

"Haha. Odin Guild didn't become the best for nothing. Michael Silbert's name has been famous since the Great Cataclysm."

"Really, this was Paul's fault. I saw him squeeze first. Hahaha."

Laughter mingled with flattery disguised as praise.

Michael watched them, then felt a smile tug at his lips.

Yes. This was power.

This was why he had to gain authority by any means necessary.

The actions of the strong were always justified by the weak who feared their power.

It did not matter if they did not respect him. It did not matter if they did not love him.

If he could make them afraid—if he could reign over them rather than lead them—he would have everything.

Michael had first learned that truth in the back alleys of Paris's Tenth Arrondissement. He had seen gang members walk the streets with guns tucked into their waistbands, and people too frightened to report them. That was when he understood the path he had to take.

This is how the world works.

He gave his followers a gentle smile and turned his head.

Jin Taekyung was with the elders, many of whom had retired once already or still remembered Cheon Taemin's presence. Several other familiar faces were there, too.

Grand Mage Magic Johnson. Chuck Hagel, who had resigned as United States Secretary of Defense after the vigilante incident. Faye Chen of Hong Kong. Even Prince Felix of the United Kingdom.

They were formidable figures, even among the people gathered here from around the world. But their side held fewer than half of the three hundred seats.

The old generation must have come here looking only toward Sky, while the new generation followed Jin Taekyung.

But whom would they support once Cheon Taemin's condition became known?

His maternal grandson, whose only claim was their shared blood?

Or Jin Taekyung, absurdly young and so often reckless?

Even Magic Johnson, with all his achievements and popularity, fell short of Michael in fame and reputation.

Whether you wanted it or not, only one person remains.

Him.

The man who had harbored greater ambitions than anyone else and spent years preparing for this moment.

To Michael, the people across the table looked like sandcastles about to crumble.

Still… it pays to prepare for the unexpected.

He slipped a hand into his pocket.

The moment he pressed the pager inside, sending a signal to someone, his eyes met Jin Taekyung's.

A pair of reddish, heated eyes.

Michael felt the heat in them as keenly as a searing pain at the back of his neck, beneath his armor.

"…Hmm."

"Oh. What's wrong?"

"Mr. Silbert, are you feeling unwell?"

"I brought a potion just in case. Good thing I—"

"I'm fine. It's nothing. There's no need to fuss."

Michael answered firmly, then stared at Jin. Had Jin seen his reaction?

He fought down the unease.

But Jin was already looking elsewhere, and the sight of the figure seated beside him steadied Michael.

No—a monster in human form.

Stone-King.

As long as that creature was here, Michael would stand at the center of the round table.

He had to.

> —All attendees have arrived. Please take your seats.

The announcement came over the speakers. Michael clenched his fist.

The inaugural ceremony began, but the attendees did not fall silent.

If anything, their quiet whispers grew louder.

“All attendees have arrived?”

“That can’t be right. You must have misheard.”

“There must have been a minor mistake.”

The elders and the younger generation shared the same confusion. One person who surely had to attend was nowhere to be seen.

But after everyone took their seats, no correction came over the speakers.

Only then did they understand.

Cheon Taemin, humanity’s savior, would not appear.

Not today. Not tomorrow or the day after. Perhaps not before this second Great War came to an end.

“What in the world…?”

“Where is Sky? Where is that person?”

What everyone had taken for a simple mix-up set off a rising murmur, then shock and confusion.

And then—

Step. Step.

Someone rose from their seat and walked toward the center of the round table.

Chapter 777

So it's finally starting.

I muttered to myself as I watched the back of someone walking alone.

Then again, it wasn't just me. Everyone here was doing the same.

The cameras positioned throughout the room and some three hundred pairs of eyes around the round table followed Michael Silbert's every step.

Step. Step.

He walked without the slightest hesitation.

The murmuring had long since died away. As if by agreement, everyone had fallen silent, though they watched him with very different feelings.

Some couldn't hide their confusion at his sudden move. Others looked deep in thought. A few nodded as if this were only to be expected, or wore faint smiles.

I took them all in.

I caught every emotion that slipped across their faces, every slight movement at the corners of their mouths, and committed those faces to memory.

Then—

Swish.

Michael stopped just short of the center of the enormous round table. For decades, that place had belonged to one man alone.

His final step never came. It was as though something invisible stood in his way. He parted his lips.

"Everyone. Today, I received some deeply shocking news."

His voice was thick with emotion. Tears glimmered at the corners of his eyes beneath the lights.

He looked from the people unsettled by this unexpected turn to the cameras recording it, then continued.

"Just before the inaugural ceremony began, two young men came to see me and delivered the news. At first, I found it hard to believe. In the end, I had no choice but to accept it, and I needed time to compose myself."

"Could you tell us who those two young men were, and what news they brought?"

The question came at just the right moment.

Perfect timing. As if it had been planned.

No, it clearly had been.

In this scripted musical, the leading man delivered his next line in response to the bit player's perfectly placed question.

"There's no difficulty in telling you who came to see me. Both young men are well known, and both are here with us now. But I'm afraid I can't be the one to tell you what they said."

"Why not?"

"Because I'm not qualified to do so."

Michael answered calmly, then turned toward me—or, rather, toward Team Leader Choi, seated to my right.

"Unless you're family by blood, of course."

...!

Even the most oblivious person in the hall would have understood what he meant.

Hundreds of eyes converged on us. Amid them, a voice reached my ear in secret.

I don't know what you came here intending to do, but remember one thing from this moment on.

Michael Silbert was looking straight at me. The crocodile tears were gone from his eyes. Only ambition shone there now.

Every choice has consequences to match.

"..."

So choose carefully. You'll get only one chance, and you won't be able to take it back.

His final warning came with a stare. His eyes, and all the others fixed on us, felt so hot that I closed mine.

Yeah. So this is how it turns out.

From the very beginning...

There was no other way.

I opened my eyes, feeling hollowed out. Team Leader Choi met my gaze, read what was there, and rose from his seat.

Scrape.

The chair, which had endured for ages longer than its new master, slowly scraped backward. At that moment—

"Before we elect a representative—the purpose of today's inaugural ceremony—I must inform you that my maternal grandfather, Hunter Cheon Taemin..."

At last, his name was spoken. In the breathless silence that followed, the savior's only blood relative continued quietly.

"...has become seriously ill and will be unable to take part in this war."

...!

...!

An enormous, unseen shock swept through the hall.

A suffocating silence settled over the First National Assembly Hall.

Frozen by shock and confusion, the people inside could do nothing but turn those words over and over in their minds.

My maternal grandfather, Hunter Cheon Taemin, has become seriously ill and will be unable to take part in this war.

Barely ten minutes into the inaugural ceremony, a bomb had gone off.

No. In another sense, it was a catastrophe.

Sky is sick? What on earth does that mean?

How could he be? It can't be true.

The elders—the Hunters of the older generation—rejected the news most fiercely.

They remembered Cheon Taemin, the great hero who had saved humanity from the Demon King. The shock struck them harder than anyone.

It was only natural. In their memories, Cheon Taemin had been more than human, almost a living god.

They had seen him single-handedly destroy monster armies tens of thousands strong and tear the limbs from mighty S-rank monsters. His bearing had been as commanding as his strength.

With Cheon Taemin beside them, they had willingly marched into the jaws of death. Shoulder to shoulder, they had cut through wave after wave of monsters and kept advancing.

The elders could bear to remember those horrific battlefields because Cheon Taemin was part of those memories. Because those memories held the shining glory of having led humanity to victory alongside him.

And now he was ill?

The savior who had defeated even the Demon King Asmodeus was too ill to join the war?

Shock gave way to a hollow sense of loss. Some of the elders grew angry.

"What—what on earth is this supposed to mean?"

"Gravely ill? Even for someone like your maternal grandfather, that's too much to believe!"

"Explain yourself. There's no way he could be sick!"

But contrary to the elders' desperate wishes, Cheon Taemin's only maternal grandson merely shook his head, calm and composed.

"Everything I've told you is absolutely true."

"Young man!"

"I understand how you feel, Seniors. I felt the same way a few months ago."

"What… do you mean?"

"I always wondered where my grandfather was. What reason could he possibly have for not showing himself even to his only grandson, after all this time?"

Choi Minwoo looked around at everyone and continued.

“I didn’t learn the truth until after Vice Guild Master Lee Jungryong and Go Jun died. At some point, for reasons we still don’t know, my grandfather fell into a coma. A very small number of people had been hiding it.”

…!

Shock swept through the hall again. This time, the silence did not last.

“It’s hard to believe, but it’s true. I can vouch for it.”

A low voice had spoken up. A towering Black man, who had been watching the situation in silence, was looking at them.

“Magic Johnson!”

“Y-You knew too?”

Magic Johnson nodded before answering.

“Those young men contacted me a few months ago, and I came to this country. I didn’t expect to find Sky unconscious.”

“Th-Then it really is…”

“Yes. I drew on everything I know, every bit of Magic I could think of, and found no way to bring him back to consciousness. I couldn’t tell anyone else, either. If a secret like that got out, it would have caused even more chaos.”

People remembered what had been happening then. Magical power readings had begun to rise, and strange events had followed. In China, an Arch Lich had led a monster army through Sichuan, drenching it in blood. The public had grown more anxious by the day.

“But we can’t hide it any longer. The whole world is looking for Sky. Now that the World Hunter Federation has taken its first step, it has to give them the answer they want, just as the UN did.”

One word crossed everyone’s mind.

Leader.

With Cheon Taemin incapacitated, they needed a new leader somehow. A new hero who could fill the savior’s absence as much as possible. Someone who could win the support of a majority of the three hundred people gathered around this enormous round table.

Then…

By the time that thought formed, most had already made up their minds.

Strength. Fame. Popularity. A spirit of sacrifice and courage. Leadership…

Each had their own standards, and even among those already called heroes, only a handful met them.

One man in particular could not be overlooked.

Michael Silbert.

Countless eyes turned his way. Some people smiled triumphantly, as though the moment they had been waiting for had arrived. Others watched him, still weighing their decision.

Michael gave nothing away.

With only one step left to take, he was already thinking about what came after.

It's sooner than I expected, but… I need to get rid of him. As soon as possible.

The absolute power of the World Hunter Federation already felt close enough to touch. But an obstacle that would continue to trouble him had to be removed.

Michael Silbert fixed his sunken eyes on one man.

Even as voting began, Jin Taekyung sat with his lips firmly closed. Beside him was a blond monster with a calm expression.

I looked down at the scrap of iron in my hand.

What was it called again?

Ostracism? A pottery-shard lottery?

I thought it had originated with a method the ancient Athenians used to banish tyrants, but I wasn't sure.

One thing I did know: what I held wasn't a piece of pottery, but a fragment of a Tower Shield. And the person whose name appeared on the most fragments wouldn't be banished—they'd become the leader of the World Hunter Federation.

Would've been nice if it worked the other way around, huh?

I sent the Sound Transmission on a whim. To my surprise, an answer came back.

What the hell are you talking about all of a sudden?

Just saying. You're answering me this time, though.

Because this will probably be the last time.

I turned the scrap of iron over in my fingers.

You crazy bastard. I wondered why you'd answered me, but you're still on about that.

I know what you're thinking. But it's too…

Dangerous?

After a brief silence, the Skeleton King answered.

Yes. Even now, this body cannot be certain.

The odds are close to fifty-fifty. And this is just a guess, but I think the chance of success is a little higher.

Do you understand what that means? There's a fifty percent chance you could lose everything.

Really? To me, it sounds like there's a fifty percent chance I could protect everything.

…!

Trust me.

I looked around. Familiar faces. People I could trust, right beside me. Every one of them a comrade and a friend.

If you really can’t trust me, trust us.

This silence lasted longer than the first. Then, for the first time in a long while, I met the Skeleton King’s eyes.

Why go this far? Why take that risk when your family and friends could get hurt?

I answered with a truth that might have been settled the day I first met him.

Because you’re my friend, too.

Chapter 778

Because you're my friend, too.

At those quiet words, the Skeleton King's eyes trembled. I looked straight at him and continued.

That's all there is to it. You're my friend, too. If I lost you like this, I'd feel like shit for the rest of my life. That's why I can't give up.

…

Remember when we fought the Arch Lich in China?

The Skeleton King nodded silently.

Yeah. How could I forget?

That fierce battle was still etched vividly in my mind.

I really thought I was going to die. No—if things had kept going the way they were, I'd probably have died nine times out of ten.

It had been that hard a fight.

Countless monsters had blocked our path. And the Arch Lich we'd finally faced after killing Lee Jungryong and Wu Heixing, who had chosen to betray us, had been too much for me at the time.

But…

You saved me. Even knowing you might be erased.

I could still see him leaping out of my Inventory without even asking permission and taking the Arch Lich's strike in my place at that life-or-death moment.

It was a sacrifice.

A pure, noble sacrifice.

At the same time, it was a great deed that allowed an ordinary someone to finally become a new being.

And so the Skeleton Warlord who had ruled the Black Forest gained a crown.

He returned from the brink of Erasure, took up the radiant [Hero's Sword], and drove it into the Arch Lich's chest.

Why did you make that choice back then?

…Who knows. I don't.

The Skeleton King turned his gaze to empty space and muttered.

All I know is that I had a very stupid, very trivial reason.

A reason?

There was something I'd always wondered. Who am I? Where was I born, and what sin did I commit to become the monster I am now? Surely I wasn't always like this.

His hollow thoughts echoed in my ears.

But no matter how hard I tried, I couldn't remember my life before this. Even while living among humans, I was confused every moment I spent with them. I felt like something that was neither monster nor human. As though I were serving an endless sentence for a sin I'd committed in the past.

Yeah. Back then, that was how the Skeleton King had been.

He was always lost in thought, looking troubled. Sometimes he'd go into my Inventory and not say a word for days.

Then one day, I'd said something to him in passing.

I bet you were a pretty decent guy.

I didn't know for sure, but I was certain of it.

That was why. Maybe you'd only said it to comfort me, but I wanted to believe you. And part of me wanted to prove you right. If I really had been a decent guy in the past…

The Skeleton King slowly tilted his head. His gaze left the empty space and settled on me.

Then perhaps I could sacrifice myself for someone else… for a friend.

…!

Yes, that's right, you damn crafty human.

A faint smile touched the Skeleton King's lips.

You were the first friend this body made after coming into this world.

For a moment, I couldn't speak.

I had to say something. I should have, but not a single word came to mind.

So I just smiled.

I smiled silently at first, then let out a few quiet chuckles before I couldn't hold back any longer and burst out laughing.

Loud enough for everyone across the enormous round table to hear. Loud enough to draw hundreds of pairs of eyes toward us.

Then I looked at the Skeleton King, who was blinking in surprise, and said, "You only figured out something that simple now, you dumbass?"

C-Could you keep your voice down?

"Just say it out loud. Stop whispering so no one else can hear."

What the—

"It's too late anyway. Can't you see everyone's already staring?"

The Skeleton King looked around, then muttered in a half-resigned voice.

"Madman."

"What, madman? You finished?"

"I'm not finished. You attention-seeking bastard."

"Listen to the way this guy talks. Team Leader Choi, aren't you going to manage him?"

“Manage… what?”

Suddenly singled out, Team Leader Choi clenched his teeth, looking as if grim reality had just hit him.

“Yes, that’s right. I’m sorry. This is all my fault for failing to manage Jin Taekyung.”

“Come on, Team Leader. You’re going to hurt my feelings if you pile on, too.”

“I’m the one whose feelings are hurt. If things had gone according to plan, in a little while… No, why even make a plan if you’re going to do this?”

Fair enough.

But what could I do? Things had gone this way.

People’s affairs often took turns no one could predict. Just like right now.

Even so, I wasn’t the least bit uneasy about having done things out of order.

Yeah. That was good enough for me.

I burst out laughing again, then put on a deep, serious voice as I addressed Team Leader Choi.

“Team Leader Choi, haven’t you heard the saying, ‘It doesn’t matter how you get there as long as you get to Seoul’?”

“I don’t want to hear it. And we’re already in Seoul.”

“Come on, say it with me. Heave. Ho. Heave. Ho.”

“To hell with heaving and ho-ing. I think we’re royally fucked.”

“You’re acting all stubborn because you’re sulking, aren’t you? This was going to happen anyway.”

“The order is wrong! The order! Do you put the ramen in before the water boils?”

“No. Today I’m crushing it up and eating it without boiling it.”

“You motherfucking—!”

The man who could make Team Leader Choi swear like that.

That was me.

Just as Team Leader Choi’s eyes rolled back and he was about to spring to his feet, two enormous hands shot out from behind him and grabbed him.

Grab!

“Hey, Choi! Calm down!”

“Let go! You hear me? Get your hands off me right now!”

“Please, get a grip! I think Jin made a mistake, too, but… Wait. Have you been bulking up lately?”

This was a mess beyond all messes.

Seeing my chance, I gave Magic Johnson a thumbs-up as he felt Team Leader Choi’s lean muscles, then stood and looked around.

Open mouths. Faces asking what the hell was going on. Eyes gone unfocused.

A commotion had erupted out of nowhere at this important meeting to elect the World Hunter Federation's representative as humanity faced a crisis. Everyone looked as if they'd just seen Demon King Asmodeus brought back with Edo Tensei[3145].

Except for the few who already knew what was going on.

"Ah, I'm sorry. I wasn't planning to spring this on you yet."

It was a sincere, polite apology. But sometimes sincerity just didn't get through.

"You damn bastard. This might be the last cigar of my life."

Chuck Hagel pretended to answer with the bleak resignation of a terminal lung cancer patient, all while puffing on his cigar twice as fast.

"It's okay. I trust you. But go fuck yourself, Jin."

Faye Chen gave me a warm smile and raised her middle finger.

"I'm sorry, Your Majesty. I trusted that lunatic and made a rash choice…"

Prince Felix, third in line to the British throne, muttered with a look of regret.

But if I had to name the most bewildered person among the three hundred gathered here, it would be Michael Silbert.

What on earth… are you up to?

His voice crossed the space between us and reached my ear.

His face was stiffer than I'd ever seen it. I couldn't help laughing.

You're laughing?

It was only natural to answer someone who was curious.

I opened my mouth without a care.

"Yeah, I laughed. What are you going to do about it?"

You…!

The voice in my ear cut off. By now, everyone in the room was following my gaze, looking back and forth between Michael Silbert and me.

"If you have something to say, say it out loud so everyone can hear. You're too old to be whispering in my ear."

That sounded a little rude, so I shyly added one more thing.

"You motherfucker."

"…!"

"…!"

The room went silent, as if hundreds of nuclear missiles had swept through it. The air around us froze.

But unlike the others watching this unbelievable scene, I welcomed that cold air. It felt as if something blocking my throat and chest had finally cleared.

I can finally breathe.

[3145]Edo Tensei is a technique in Naruto that summons the dead back to life.

How long had it been since I'd felt this relieved?

I took a deep breath and started trudging along. I passed between the round tables, then got tired of even that after a few steps and leaped over everyone's heads.

Whoosh. Tap.

I landed lightly in the empty center of the round table.

Michael Silbert clenched his teeth. He stood there unable to set foot in that space, as though an invisible wall held him back.

"What… is this insolence?"

His voice was tightly restrained.

His eyes, fixed on me, held anger he couldn't hide. And I knew exactly why.

"What, you spent half your life wishing for that seat, and now some nobody gets there before you? That piss you off?"

"…!"

"Honestly, I understand. Something similar happened to me once. I'd saved some ice cream to eat after my bath, but when I came out, my little sister had eaten it all and left me the wrapper. I was pretty pissed. But…"

I trailed off, watching Michael Silbert's rigid face, then continued slowly.

"Then I suddenly thought, what am I getting so mad about over something this trivial? Is it really worth throwing a fit over?"

